THE TREATISE OF AN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES

Containing the Learned Collections, Judicious Remarks, and Memorable Observations: Not only Divine, Moral and Physical, But also Political, Martial, Historical, Natural, &c.

Translated out of the worthy Spanish Gentleman, Pedro de Mexia, and his famous Italian, Asolo, of illustrious Honour: by the Learned, and famous Doctor, John de la Vaca, Counsellor and Secretary: who has given the English Version.

LONDON
 Printed by W. Baskett, 1750

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPfull, Learned, and most Iudicious Gentleman, Sir THOMAS BRVDENELL, Baronet, all Happinesse most heartily wished.

SIR, this Worke, so long since promised, and now (after much Paine, Cost, and deare Expence of time) in part perfected, comes in al Humility to kisse your Hand : making no doubt of as kind acceptance, as it tenders it selfe in free and vnfaigned affection. It is not vnknowne vnto me, that those seuerall Natiue tongues, wherein all those Arguments do speake themselues, are much more familiar and readie to you, then they can receyue in English any Ornament by mee.
Neuerthelesse, I hope it shall not anie way be distastfull to you, that others may be benefited by the meanes of your Happinesse :
and that vvhich is thus effected for your f sake, may (from a perticuler good) extend it selfe to a generall.

To runne into multiplicity of Wordes, when one onely is sufficient to the Wise, may be but the Badge of my Folly, and an abuse vnto your Generous patience. And therefore, committing this Labour, and my selfe, vnto your Fauourable Construction, with whatsoeuer remaines in mee, by you to bee Comanded, I cease : wishing the Happinesse of you and yours as entirely, as any good that can happen to mee and mine.

Your Namelesse Well-willer, desirous to be knowne to none but your Selfe,

To the Reader.

Know (Gentle Reader) that Custome commands an Epistle to thee, for Favourable Acceptance, and honest Entertainment of such a great Labour. But I am (at this time) forced to Write vnto thee, both on the behalfe of my selfe and the Printer: in regard of many Escapes, which vsually chanceth in Printing, by reason, that immediately after the Bookes beginning, sicknesse & other infirmities, did bereaue him of his sight. If therefore any thing do or may appeare offensiue, either in Method or Matter, I would not haue thee displeas'd in any thing whatsoever, or that any Argument thorough the whole Booke, should be (in the least degree) preiudiciall to thee. Therefore, accept it with like Loue and Kindnesse, as it is sent vnto thee, in Honest Affection and Friendlinesse.

The History

The history of the world is a long and varied one, and it is one which has interested the minds of men from the earliest times. The events which have taken place in the world have been the result of the actions of men, and it is the duty of the historian to record these actions, and to show the causes which have produced them. The history of the world is a story of the human race, and it is a story which is full of interest and excitement. The events which have taken place in the world have been the result of the actions of men, and it is the duty of the historian to record these actions, and to show the causes which have produced them.

TO THE MAGNANIMOVS AND

Vertuous Lord, Anne D'Urfe, Marquesse of Bauge, Baron of Castle-Morand, Lord of Urfe, Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and Bayliffe for his Maiestie, in the Forrests, Countrey.

Here hath bin a great and long dispute (woorthy Lord) among the Learned, concerning the true definition of Nobility. Some haue held opinion, that this matchlesse Ladie, keepeth her seate in the Soule only; or else, with the Soule and Bodie together. Some other are of the minde, that her abyding is in Prudence: Others, in Iustice: And others, in the goodnesse of manners. There are also some few, who say; that they know no other Nobility, but such as proceedeth from Vertue. And if any one contemne Riches, voluptuous pleasures, glory; yea, and life it selfe, hee is held to be more Noble, then all the Kings and Princes in the world. So that they are perswaded, that al other things whatsoever which are in Man, are nothing els but Fortune, and meere presumption of the wealthy and proud.

Against whom also, there are diuers and contrary opinions. For, wise Plutarch affirmeth, that the calumny is false, which vniust Sophisters haue imposed on Nobility. For they will admit no other kind of prooffe, euen in things which are notorious and apparant to euerie eye: Albeit, to haue a good race of Houndes or Horses, they will seeke after the goodliest and worthiest. Likewise, they striue to haue the best seeds for their grounds, to produce the rarest plants and Hearbes: and yet (like Sots as they are) they dare maintaine, that Nobility by blood, is nothing auailable to following succession, because the Originall came from the barbarous, or descended of the Ciuilized French; not crediting, that in the Generation of Children, the Fathers do distribute vnto them, some seeds and principles of Naturall vertue.

Aristotle repelleth their opinion, and standing on much sounder termes; speaketh against them in this manner; That which Euripides teacheth (saith hee) is not true, to wit; That the honest minded man is only Noble, and not he that descendeth of an ancient race, and is borne of generous Parents: Because that in the definition of Nobility, the valour & Vertue of our Elders are comprehended, Nobility it selfe being nothing else, but a certain Vertue of that Generation, which being lawdable of it selfe, ought to be followed with great affection. Wherefore, he is worthy of praise & commendation; that employeth all his endeuor and diligence, to acquire the noblenesse of Generation; to the end, that afterward, worthy and valiant men may be deriued from him. So that at all times, and as often as the Originall of such generation, finds it selfe to bee commendable, it ought iustly to be tearmed Noble. For, such a beginning, beareth in it selfe both a naturall power and vertue, to beget and produce many other answereable, and like vnto it selfe. Therefore, when such a man is met withall in any nation, as is of such worth, that he can extend and spread his vertue to many succeeding Ages: his descendants and off-spring will be naturally generous, and of the best and manliest manners.

Con-

Contrarywise, he that is bad & wickedly bred, doth commonly beget as lewd and bad children: according to whom (beside his euill examples) they will deriue from him the like wicked habitude. And therefore the Proverb was not vndoubtedly spoken: Of a bad Crow, coms as bad an Eg. By this reason I hold, that all those whom we behold to be plunged in the gulfe of vices, and make mischief their chiefeft commendation, although they be neuer so great Lordes, they are but meere vsurpers of Nobility, being no way descended of Noblemen, but rather of Cham, and haue nothing else but the bare name of Nobilitie. Whereas on the contrary, they that are noted no way to degenerat from the vertue of their ancestors, but truly haue followed them, euen from Father to Son (as we commonlie vse to say) are said to be of noble stem & stock, and descended of the posteritie of Sem. Hence it ensueth, that in the world there are many men, Noble, Magnanimous, valiant, and like vnto their famous progenitors: among whom, you hold the place and ranke of a most worthy, honourable, and vertuous Lord, imitating so directly the tracts of your predecessors, that you may well be said, to be Nobility and vertue it selfe. If it were needfull, to come to the Antiquity of Nobilitie, by the Fathers side, you are descended of the house of Vrse, many whereof, haue held the very goodliest Estates and dignities in this Kingdome, and all by their most signale merits of vertue. What shall I say, concerning the pietie of your great Grandfather, M. Peter D'Vrse, Great Maister of the Hostie, The Churches & Monasteries builded by him, doe make sufficient testimony of his deuout zeale. What shall I say of your Grandfather, M. Claudius D'Vrse, Knight of the Order, Gouvernor to Messieurs les enfans de France, Ambassador for the King to his Holynesse, & a curious obseruer of Antiquities? Your house by him builded, the Statues of Marble, and so great number of Medalles, which he caused to be brought from Rome, do amply speake, how great a friend and loue he was of Vertue. As for your Father M. Iaques D'Vrse, Knight of the Kings Order, Captain of fifty men of Armes, Bayliffe of the Forrests, and Gouvernor of the said Country. The memory of his vertuous deportments is so fresh and recent, as it would appeare superfluous further to remember them.

By the Mothers side, who knoweth not, that you are deriued of the illustrious house of Sauoy, allied to the bloud-royall of France? But as touching your perfections, I would haue the whol world to know it, that you are one of the very best Poets in France, as more then 100. choise Sonnets can testify, which you haue pleased to shew me. A matter redounding to your no mean honor, in not hauing atained to 18. years of age, when you made them: you are (beside) enriched with so happy a memory, that you haue (ad vngue) all the Poetical fictions, with an absolut exposition of the, as wel in Ouids Metamorphosis, Homers Iliads, as also diuers other authors.

Now in recompence of the gracious communication of your Poems, & for the seruice I iustly owe ye, I dedicate this Book to you, collected out of many Authors, Greeke, Latine, Italian, Spanish, &c. from whom I haue traduced most singuler things, appertaining to the seueral intention of each Chapter, hoping to continue them on, till they compleat the number of 30. Bookes. Receiue then this former Volume, with like loue and good wil, as I salute your graces with my humble recommendations, praying God to send your Honor a long and a happy life.

From Montbrison this 11. of March.

Your humble Seruant Anthony du Verdier.

CHAP. I.

Sicut AVEV-STINE expounding that saying of DAVID, Dixit inspiens in corde suo, Non est Deus ;
The foole hath said in his heart, There is no God : doeth most evidently declare, that there is not a more miserable conditiō on the earth, then that of Atheists. For there is no Nation so barbarous, but it beleeuēs that there is some Diuinitie ; or holds opinion, that there must needs be an Essence of a first efficient cause, the producer of all things else whatsoeuer ; because the vertue of the God-head hath such powerful efficacie, that it very manifestly declares it selfe, to al such as haue the least taste of Reason. Aristotle writes, That all thinges, as well superiour as inferiour, were at the first well ordained, and are still much better gouerned, by the opinion and iudgement of one onely, than of many together : because it is very necessarie, that by and from that sole-beginning, all things should bee continued, ordered, & disposed. And heereupon was it, that Cicero and Varro made a meere mockery at the plurality of Gods. Damascene, considering with himselfe, how the whole World was so well ordered and ruled ; saide : It was impossible, that things so contrarie and dissemblable, could alwaies consort and agree together, but by the gouernment of one onely Commander.

Neuerthelesse, wee behold so much contrariety & dissimilitude in this world (as of Heat to cold, Light to darknesse, each of these contending for particular

Psalme 53. 1.

The wretched condition of Atheists

Regiment) as no vnitie or concordance in them can be expected, but darknesse wold continuallie haue the vpper hand, and neuer yeild any admittance to light: whereas we now perceiue, that the one in equality ensueth the other, by course or compasse more infallible then a clock, consonant to the times & seasons so well appointed by God. Heat also wold alwaies repulse the Cold, and rule in an ouer violent extremity, beyond the abilitie of any sufferance: whereby we may gather, the vrgent necessitie, that there should be one alone, by whose command they ought to bee directed, and constrained to keepe that equalitie, which he hath assigned them.

Moreouer, it is the propertie of God, to be perfect in all things; All Iust, Almighty, al Mercifull, nothing being any way opposite or contrary vnto him. So that if there should bee many Gods, it must then ensue as an especiall Maxime, that they must needs be all alike, or different in their powers. If they be all alike, or equall, why then they can be but al as one: for dissimilitude maketh the diuersity of things onely. For this cause, is Iesus Christ all one with God his Father, being wholly equall and like vnto him. But if there wer many Gods, dissemblable or differing in their equality; it is apparant that they could not be iustly called Goddes, if there bee any imperfection in one, more then is in the other. For, he that is absolute & most perfect, must needs be God, in regard that there is no imperfection found in him; and then, the other (being impotent, or imperfect) cannot bee tearmed Gods, but must needs submit their vtmost power, to the others perfect priuiledge. It is necessary therefore, that there should be but one God only, as (in very truth) there is no more then one; who is easie enough to be knowne by his Workes and effects, as the sole beginning of all things: and yet notwithstanding hath no beginning or ending. He created all thinges of nothing; he is inuisible, and cannot be any way seene in his essence, according as Saint Paul saith; Quem nullus hominum vidit, sed nec videre potest: Whom neuer man saw, neither can see.

enarravit, no man hath seen God at any time, the onely begotten Sonne, which is in the bosome of his Father, he hath declared him. And Iesus Christ is the Image of the inuisible God, because God the Father (as Chrysostome saith,) Hath no forme, quality, or any body. And if he be all in all, and by all, why then it is most certaine, that hee can communicate himselfe and appeare to the sight of men (according to his owne pleasure) by any thing subiect to him, without any imitation of himselfe. But if wee speake of the Sacred Scriptures, we shall finde there mention to be made of head, lips, mouth, armes, feete, eyes, eares, and other members of God; yet are not these things to be carnally vnderstood, and according to the killing Letter, as some Iddiot ignorant people are drawn to beleue, who do imagine, that God (in his Nature) is like vnto man, that he is seated on high in heauen vpon a Royall seate, and in a certaine place, somewhat answerable to the saying of Esay; Cælum sedes mea, terra autem scabellum pedum meorum, The Heauen is my Throne, and the Earth is my foot-stoole. And as the same Prophet speaketh in another place, Vidi Dominum sedentem super solium excelsum & eleuatum, I saw the Lorde sitting vpon an high throne, and lifted vp. No, no, these things are otherwise to be vnderstood, and his high Maiesty comprehended figuratiuely, and according to the quickning spirit.

If any man (saith holy Anselme) doe beleue that God hath human members and motions, or perturbations of soule, as wee haue; assuredly, hee doth but forge meere Idols in his heart. And therefore, wee are to knowe, that such phrase and manner of Language in the sacred Scriptures, is properly vsed, to make our rude and dull vnderstanding, the more apprehensue of the vnspeakeable Maiesty and greatnesse of the Lord and Father of all Worlds. For, he being inuisible, and yet willing to manifest himselfe vnto his people, doth accomodate his presence to men, by an Analogie of such things as are most frequent and familiar to them. For example, when it is said, That God speaketh in vs; It is to be vnderstood, that hee is discovered, manifested and reuealed in our hearts. Or, when God speaketh; that is, his inspiring (into

(into the spirits of the iust) his wil, or reuealing vnto them succeeding things, as he did vnto the holy Prophets. The hand of the Lord (in sacred writ) plainly signifyeth his might, power, and assistance; as God answered Moses, saying; The hand of the Lord, is it shortned? And S. Luke speaking of Saint John Baptist, saith; The hand of the Lord was with him; that is to say, his power and helpe. Sometimes the hand of God is taken for his vengeance, as in Exodus, Et viderunt Egyptios mortuos super littus maris, & manum magnam quam exercuerat Dominus contra eos; And Israell saw the Egyptians dead on the Sea bank, and the great hand which the lord had shewed vpon them.

The right hand of God, that is, the Son of God, otherwise called the glory of his Father; the euerlasting blessednesse, or, euery creature exalted vp to heauen, and on earth: euen as by Gods left hand, the Reprobate Creatures are vnderstoode; as the Deuill, the wicked and peruerse. The face of God, that is, the inuisible essence of the Godhead of his Sonne; whereof God speaking to Moses by his Angel, saide; Non poteris videre faciem meam, non enim videbit homo, & viuet; Thou canst not looke vpon my face, for there shal no man see me, and liue. And a little after, Videbis posteriora mea, facie autem meam videre non poteris. Thou shalt see my backe parts, but my face shal not be seene. As if he would haue said, Thou shalt see mine incarnation in the latter dayes, but my God-head or Diuinity thou canst not see.

The feete of God, doe signifie the incarnation of his sonne, being subiected to the God-head, as are the feete to the head. For as by the heade the Diuinity is vnderstood; euen so, by the feet is the humanity expressed. Sometimes by Gods feet, the holy Preachers and Doctors of the Church, are signified, of whom it is writte in Deuteronomy. Qui appropinquant pedibus eius, accipient doctrinam illius, They that come neere his feet, shall receiue his Doctrine. By the finger of God (in the singuler number) the Holy-Ghost is figured, according to that place in Exodus; Et dixerunt malefici ad Pharaonem; Digitus Dei est hic; Then saide the Enchanters vnto Pharaoh; This is the Finger of GOD. And IESVS CHRIST himselfe, in Saint Luke, saith; Si in digito

Dei eijcio Dæmonia? &c. If by the Finger of God I cast out Deuils? &c. In like manner is it of the other Corporall partes and mouings of the spirit, attributed to God, which euermore are to be interpreted spiritually; as S. Iohn Damascene very well declareth in these wordes. Multa igitur quæ ad Deum spectant tenui quadam & obscura cognitione percipiuntur commode, & proprie nequeunt efferi. Itaque loquentes de ijs quæ supra nos sunt, cogimur vti verbis nobis congruentibus. Ex quo fit vt Deo & somnũ & iram, & securitatem, & manus, & pedes, & alia eiusmodi tribuamus. There are many thinges which concerne God, that in signification doe carrie an obscure construction, and cannot properly be deliuered. Wherefore, in speaking of those which are aboue vs, we strue to vse apt and congruent wordes to our capacity; whereby ensueth, that sleepe, anger, ease, hands, feete, and other such like, may seeme to be ascribed vnto God.

The wrath or anger of GOD, is not any disquiet or perturbation of his Soule, but (according to Saint Augustine.) It is a Iudgement, whereby the sin of anger is punished. For when it is saide in Genesis; Pœnituit eum quod hominem fecisset in terra; The Lord repented that he had made Man in the Earth: It is not to be vnderstood, that God repented himselfe as a Man dooth, for any thing displeasing him: for iudgement of all thinges is to bee fully defined, as the fore-knowledge of them is sure and certaine. And the sacred Scriptures in vsing such wordes, doe not yet impleie any such signification. For when the Word Diuine (Iesus Christ himselfe) spake to his Apostles, and likewise to the Pharisees; his speech was many times by Parables, and making comparison of heauenlie thinges, euen by such as were most familiarlie knowne vpon Earth. Whereupon we reade, that one while (in the Gospell) he calls himselfe a Treasure, another time a Shepheard; sometime a Lambe, then againe a Lyon; in one place a Light, in another, a Vine, a Rocke, the Way, &c. And for as much, as there is great difference betweene him and vs, therefore it is verie necessarie, that he should be vnderstood of Men by some especiall Accident; that is to say, by the meanes of reason and such knowledge, as they are best able able to comprehend. And these thinges (saith Origen) are figuratiuely spoken, to the end, that the Names vsuall, accustomed and conuenable to the bodie, may intellectu- ally signifie their right Nature: Euen no o- therwise, then when sins are said to be wood, Hay, and Rubbish. In which wordes we doe not affirme, that delicts and offen- ces haue any reall body: no more then vertues haue, although they be tearmed by better names; as Golde, Siluer, and precious itones.

God is not li- mited or con- fined to any prescribed place, but where him- selfe best li- keth to be.

The Eternall Father of Heauen then dooth neuer goe in any knowne way, neyther walkes or wanders; hee neuer sleepe, or rayseth himselfe from slum- bering, but continueth alwayes in his place, or where his minde best liketh to be. He cannot be touched, or seene; yet he clearly seeth and vnderstandeth all thinges: not with any Corporeall eyes or eares, but by absolute power, which cannot sufficientlie be expressed. He beholdes and knowes all actions in this World, nothing euer being, or can bee hidden from him: yet notwithstan- ding, hee neuer moueth himselfe, or can be mooued by any power, neyther can bee comprized or contained in a- ny place; no, not within the whole circumference of the wide World, be- cause he was before the Worldes were formed, as much as to say; as from all Eternitie. He hath no neede of Name, or of any thing else, for (as Trismegi- stus saith;) God is one, and one hath no need of any Name.

Gregor. in Thcol Orat. de die Nat. de Christ.

God then hath no Name, because he is onely and alone, nor is there any vse (with vs) of any propper vocable, but onely for peculiar difference from the multitude, to the end, that each person may be distinguished by his apt appel- lation. But because that GOD is euer- more one and alone; his true Name is GOD, which in-effable Name in He- brew, consisteth in one Word, compo- sed of foure Letters, יהוה I E H O V A H, of which descendeth the Verbe היה, H A I A H, Fuit, which is as much to say; as He was, is, & shall be, and which abso- lutely declarerh his true propertie, for God hath beene alwayes, and shall bee eternally. Aeternitas enim nec tempus est, nec vllatemporis pars: For Eternitie is not time, neyther any part of time. And almost all Nations and Languages, doe especiallie write and pronounce the Word (whereby the Name of GOD is specified) with Foure Letters, which is a number euen and perfect, because he hath no imperfection in him.

All Nations write & pro- nounce the Name of God with foure Letters.

Beside our prooffe already made of the Hebrewes; The Persians doe write the Name of God with Foure Letters, oueh; The Wizards of Persia oueh; The Arabes, Alla; The Assyrians, Adad; The Egyptians, θωδθ, or θευς; The Graeci- ans, θεος από θεειν, à currendo, of run- ning; Quod ubique dum opus sit accurrat, ad sit, opemque ferat; siue ab vrendo, quod improbos habitus comburat, quando, ex ea re & ignis consumens dicitur. That euerie where (while neede requireth) he runneth, is there present, and giueth helpe: Or else of burning, that he will burne the dwelling of the wicked, when he is saide to be a consu- ming fire to them.

B. Westbmer in plvas. diuin. Script.

So doth Gregorie the Great, (called the Diuine) interpret it in his second Prayer to the Sonne. Or whether it be of the Verbe θεωτοι, as much to say, as to contemplate. The Latines breaking the Greeke word, in stead of θεος, say De- us; The French-men, Dieu; The Spani- ards, Dios; The Italians, Idio; The Dutch, Gott; The English and Scots, Godd; with a double Letter d, as hath been obserued in Antiquitie. There are some likewise, that doe yeelde another reason, and say; that the Name of God is contained in Foure Letters, to de- monstrate thereby, that it is hee who hath made and formed all thinges, that they are composed of Foure Elements, and that hee made also the Foure Ele- ments themselves, which doe rule ouer all thinges created in this World. But Moyses asking of God, by what Name he would be called; God gaue him this answere: Ego sum, qui sum; I am that I am, I am he that is: the Hebrewes say, Ero qui ero, expressing thereby his Na- ture, that hee is Eternall, without any ending; as if they would say (speaking in his person) I am truelie hee that is, and with me there is no change or alte- ration. Then sending Moyses to the He- brewes, to be their Guide, Prince, and Conductor, hee commaunded him to tell them: that He which is, or I am, hath sent me vnto you. Now because wee are are not able (of our selues) to comprehend him, or to attaine vnto the intire knowledge of him, in regard of the imbecillity of our frail vnderstanding: we finde in the Scriptures many Epithets and appellations, answerable to the manifold effects of his power, rule, and diuinitie.

He is called α and ω , Alpha and Omega, which are the first and last Letters of the Greeke Alphabet: because hee is both the beginning and the end, and yet there is neyther beginning nor ending in him. His Epithets are, Almightie, Strong, Great, Incomprehensible, Vncircumscribde, Vnchangeable, Truth, Holie of Holies, King of Kings, Most powerfull, wonderfull; and diuers other beside. Some haue thus defined him. GOD is a Spirit, holie and true, of whom onely and cheefly proceede the beginning, the action and moouing of all thinges that are: To whom, and to the Glory of whom, the end and conclusion of all thinges are referred. Cicero (so well as hee could) defined him in manner following. Deus mens est quaedam soluta & libera, segregata ab omni concretionem mortali, omnia sentiens & mouens, ipsaque praeclata motu sempiterno. God is a certaine intelligence, or Spirit, free and ready, separated from all Mortall mixture or concretion, knowing, and moouing all thinges, and hauing in himselfe an eternall motion.

Holy Iustine Martyr, in his Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, defines God in this order. I call Him God, that hath Essence of himselfe, and is continually permanent in one and the same kind, without receiuing any change, and hath giuen both beginning and forme to all thinges created. PHILEMON (as the same Martyr declareth) describes him verie breefely thus;

What thing is God? Truly, him God I call; That (being vnseene,) is he that seeth all.

All which Definitions, and many more beside, can giue vs no true knowledge of the Essence of GOD, because it is wholly Incomprehensible. Therefore he cannot be truly described or defined, as very learnedly the Philosopher Symonides answered. For he being demanded by Hierom, What God was; and hauing a whole dayes respite graunted him to returne his answer; when that time would not serue him, but three dayes more were allowed him; at last, when he came to make his reply to the question, he said; The more I strue to consider what God is, the more difficult I finde the matter to be. The Philosophers say, that definition may wholly specify the proportion of a thing; or his kinde, quality, difference, or some peculiar Accident: all which seuerall thinges are not to bee found in God, which is the reason, that he cannot bee defined or comprehended. Wherefore I will conclude this point with Saint Augustines opinion; solus Deus est altissimus, quo altius nihil est: Onely GOD is most High, aboue whom there is nothing higher. And in another place; Quid est Deus? est id quod nulla attingit opinio. What is God? It is that which no opinion can reach vnto.

Of the works which God created in six daies, and what day the Angels were created; with diuers other high and speciall matters, worthy our knowledge.

IN the beginning GOD created Heauen & earth, and when the Earth could not appeare or bee discerned, (being couered with an huge profound darkenesse, because that darkenesse was vpon the deepes; that is to say, vpon some confusion, not distinguished from the Earth and the Water, and the Spirit would walke vpon that Chaos aboue the Waters; to wit, vpon the Earth, which was hidden vnderneath them:) GOD commaunded Light to bee made, and when the Light was cleare, he diuided this bright splendour from the darknes; naming the one, Day; and the other, Night: The beginning of the Day, Morning; and the beginning of the Night, Euening. All this was done the first day, which Moses tearmeth to be one day. On the second day, he placed the Firmament of heauen, aboue all other things of this worlde, and fundering it from the rest, seated it alone by it selfe, as in a particular ranke or limit: & roofing it round about with congealed yce, tempered it sufficiently with a moist and watry Nature, to the end, that the earth might be duely watered.

The third day, hauing commaunded the Waters into their meet abyding, he caused the dry Land to shew it selfe, enquirting (as in a Girdle) all the Earth with the Seas: and the very same Day, the Plants (with their Seedes) came foorth of the Earth.

The fourth day.

The fourth day, he fixed two great Lampes or Lights in the Firmament of Heauen: the one exceeding in greatnesse, to gouerne the Day; and the other somewhat lesse, to rule the Night: these were the Sun and Moone.

The fift day.

Then did hee also spangle it with Starres, by whose influences, and hidden Vertues, he commanded that the reuolutions and seasons of the yeare should be obserued. The fift day, hee sent Creatures abroad, both to flye and swimme: the Fowles aloft in the Aire, and the Fishes beneath in the Waters; vniting them seuerally by a desirous instinct, to meere and company together, onely for the propagation of encrease, and multiplying in their seperate kinds.

The sixth day.

The sixth day, he created the foure-footed beasts, Male and Female, tame and wilde. The same day also hee formed Man, which day is called, the tenth of the Calends of Aprill.

How the world is called by the Grecians.

Behold, how the Father of all Eternity created this World, and made it of visible matter, and which (in regarde of the beautie and adornment) is so called by the Greekes, κόσμος that is to say; Fayre, or Beautifull. Man he made by the Workemanship of his owne hands, not onely to liue and enjoy the goods of the earth; but for a more especial and principall end, to wit; that hee might bee known and magnified of him. This creation of al things, was fully perfected in six dayes, for the compleate perfection of the number sixe, not that anie such length of time was needfull to GOD, or that hee could not haue created all things together, as he did (in this space) by conuenable moouings, according as

20

Salomon (in his Ecclesiasticus) saith he did. Qui viuunt in aeternum, creauit omnia simul. He that liueth for euer, created all things together. Whereunto Saint Basil, Saint Augustine, Saint Dionisius, S. Ambrose, Bede and Cassiodorus do consent, saying: That God created, or brought forth al things together.

30

Peter Lombard, fir-named Maister of the Sentences, in the second distinction of his second Booke, by Authoritie deriued from Ecclesiasticus, maketh this exposition. The bodily Nature and matter of the foure Elementes, was created with the spirituall creature, that is to say; with the soule, and with the Angels, who were created together. To maintain this, he brings in the iudgement of S. Augustine, vppon this place of Genesis, saying; That by Heauen and earth, ought to be vnderstoode, the Spirituall and Corporeall Nature, which was created at the beginning, to wit, of time.

40

Heer you may note then, how the scriptures are to be cōprehended, & they to be sought into generally ouer, without instance vpon any curious wresting. In another place of the same Booke of Ecclesiasticus, it is saide, Prior omnium creata est Sapientia: Wisedome hath bin created before all things. Yet heereby is not to be vnderstood, either God, or his son, who is the Wisedome of the Father. For, God was not created at all; the Sonne was begotten, & therefore neither made or created: and all the holye Trinity is but one Wisedome, which hath not bene made, created, or begotten, but proceeding.

Iesus the Sonne of Syrach, hee vnderstandeth by this Wisedome wherof we speake, the Angellicall Nature, often termed in the Scriptures, Life, Wisedome, and Light: for the Angels are called, & saide to bee vnderstanding. And albeit they were created so soone as Heauen and Time, yet are they neuerthelesse, said to be first created, by reason of their order and dignitie, being (indeede) most worthy Creatures. Nor were these Angelicall powers created for any neede, or necessitie that God had of them: but to the end, that he might be contemplated, praised, and that his liberalitie should be more aboundantly knowne.

But why then is it written, that God created all thinges together, seeing in the beginning of Genesis, it is saide; that God produced these bodily substances, by pauses and diuersity of daies? Dionisius Ribellus, a religious Monke, hath heereunto made a very profound answer; whose very wordes therefore I was the more willing to set downe, that the learned and curious (in so high questions) might be satisfied. Omnia hæc simul creata sunt, vel materialiter, seu quantum ad eorum materiam, vel exemplariter, vel in genere, vel similitudine. De isto enim sunt tres opiniones, vno dicentium; quod omnia vno instante à Deo producta & condita sunt in materijs & substantialibus formis suis: & formatio sequens intelligatur quantum ad formas accidentales. Omnia inquam, id est omnes principales partes mundi, scilicet corpora cælestia & elementa. Alia opinio est dicentium, quod Cælum empyreum cum Angelis, factum sit cum informi materia corporalium rerum, & postea in opere sex dierum, materia illa distincta sit per formas substantiales: sic tamen, quod fuit informis, id est, generali forma corporeitatis actuata. Tertia est, quod omnia simul producta sint, cum primis indiuiduis specierum perfecta in substantialibus et accidentalibus formis, & sex dies sint vnus dies sex rerum distinctionibus representatus: quæ opinio subtilior & naturalirationi consonantior reputatur. Sed aliæ duæ videntur scripturæ Geneseos amplius concordare. Nam & glossa hic ait: Rerum substantia simul est creata, sed non simul per species est formata: & simul existit per substantiam materiam, non simul apparuit per substantiam formam.

All these thinges are said to be created together, eyther Materially, in regard of their quantity of matter; or Exemplarily, eyther in kinde or likeness. Of these there are three opinions; one saying, that all thinges (in one instant) were by God brought forth, and builded in their materiall and substantiall formes, and the formation of them is to be vnderstood, according to accidental shape or fashion. I say all, that is, all the principall partes of the World; to wit, Celestiall, and Elementall bodies. Another opinion saith, that the highest Heauen with the Angels, were made bodily thinges of indigested matter, and afterward, in sixe dayes labour or worke, that matter was distinctly made into substantiall formes: but yet so, that the indigested matter, beeing before in generall forme, receiued speedie and bodily shape. The third is, that all thinges were created together, in their first vndiuided kindes, perfected in substantiall and accidentall formes, and sixe dayes were but one day, distinctly representing sixe seuerall thinges. Which opinion, to more subtile and naturall reason is accounted consonant. But the other two doe more fully and amply concord with the Scripture of Genesis. For the Glosse it selfe saith; The substance of thinges were created together, but not formed together in their seuerall kinds: and together they were digested by substance of matter, but yet appeared not together in substantiall forme.

Moreouer, after Moyses (in his first Chapter of Genesis) hath declared, what thinges were created on each of the sixe dayes: Wherefore, then in the second Chapter of the same Booke, doth hee speake but of one day onely, by way of Epilogue (as it were) to all that he had distinctly described before? Saying, Iste sunt generationes cæli & terræ, quando creata sunt, in die quo fecit Deus cælum & terram. These are the Generations of the Heauen and the Earth, when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the Earth and the Heauens. Seemes he not (in these words) to maintaine a great contradiction? If all thinges were made in sixe dayes, how can it be saide then, in one day onely? Heereunto I answer, that in this place, we must not take the dayes according as they denoate the distinction of Times, for God (as I saide before) had not any neede of time: but by reason of the workes of perfection, which is signified and compleated by the number of six, which first is accomplished in his partes. And therefore, the reason of the number is not to bee misprized, as being of any slender dignitie. For Auenzoar the Babylonian saith; That he which knowes to number well, knoweth directly all thinges. And it was not spoken in vaine, but to the praises of God; Omnia in mensura & numero, & pondere disposuisti. Thou hast ordered all thinges in measure, measure, waight, and number. And it is saide in Ecclesiasticus, *Arena maris, & pluvie guttas, & dies seculi quis dinumeravit? Who can number the sands of the sea, & the drops of the raine, and the dates of the world? who can number the heighth of Heaven, the bredth of the earth, and the deapth? But onely the Workeman of them, and the all-ruling wisdom. He (saith David) knowes the number of the Starres, and calleth every one of them by his name. And as it is said of S. Of the seaventh day.

Wherefore God sanctified the seaventh day.

Of the Iewes Sabbath.

Of the Christians Sabbath.

Gregor. Nazian. de perfect. num. sept.

How the number of seaven is framed.

Concerning the seaventh day, which is also among the Hebrewes a name of perfection, and by them much celebrated: God reposed himselfe from all his workes, and sanctified it. Not as if hee were weary, or ouer-spent with trauell; but because he ceased from making any other new Creature, hauing already created whatsoeuer he would, and the nature and formes whereof, had neuer beene before. For this reason also, the Iewes doe take truce with their labours, on such a day as they tearme their Sabbath, calling it by an Hebrew Word, which signifieth rest. Instead whereof, we that are Christians, doe solemnize Sunday, which is the first of the Sabbaths, and the eight day, because that our Saviour Iesus Christ, Sonne of the euer-living GOD, arose againe from the dead vpon the like day. The Hebrewes held in great honour the Septenarie number, because of the Sabbath, and it hath beene an especiall religious Mystery: the praise and renowne whereof, Gregorie Nazianzene, a Greek Author, discourseth in an Oration that he made of Pente-cost. Aulus Gellius, and Macrobius, haue also at large described the efficacy thereof. Chalcidius saith, that the Pythagorians commended this number, as the most naturall, absolute, and perfect.

The number of Three is the first imperfect number: the number of Foure is two whole paires, and of these two is the number of Seuen composed. And for this reason, it is often taken and vsed for vniuersall and infinite. Wee read, that God saith in Leuiticus: Addam correptiones vestras septuplum propter peccata vestra: I will punish you seaven times more,

according to your sinnes. And the Royall Psalmist saith; Eloquia Domini, aloquia casta, argentum igne examinatum, probatum terra, purgatum septuplum. The words of the Lord are pure wordes, as the Silver tryed in a Furnace of Earth, and which is fined seven fold. And we haue the like in many places of Scripture.

10 There are also great Mysteries for Christian Religion, contained in this Septenarie number, wherby the whole perfection of the Church is signified. Herevpon was it, that Saint Iohn wrote to the Seuen Churches of Asia; declaring (by this meanes) that hee writ to the flowing fulnesse of one onely. The Wise-man in the Proverbs saith: Sapientia edificauit sibi domum, excidit columnas septem. Wisedome hath built her house, and set Seuen Pillars vnder to support it. 20 There are Seuen gifts or gracious workings of the Holy-Ghost, whereof the Prophet Esay in diuers places maketh mention. God also betooke himselfe to rest the Seuenth day; but yet wee must not thereby vnderstand, that God had done any actuall labour in his working: for he onely but spake, and it was done; yea, by an Eternall Word, and not a Temporall. But the rest of God, 30 doth (indeede) signifie the rest of them that rest in God: euen as the ioy of the House, implyeth nothing else, but the ioy of them that doe, or are to reioyce in the house; neuerthelesse, it is not the House onely that makes them ioyfull, but some especiall matter thereby presupposed. This is then the manner of speeche, when we would signifie or expresse the thing contained, by the matter which containeth, and by the efficient, that which is already done. For when Moyse saide, that GOD rested or reposed himselfe: very conuenably is vnderstood thereby, the repose and quiet of them that rest in him, because he onely is the cause of their rest.

Now we must and do confesse (concerning the Angels) that there is no expresse mention made, in what order the Angels were created. But Saint Augustine saith; That if they had not beene omitted, they had beene signified or expressed, eyther by the Name of Heaven, or by the Name of Light. Albeit then, that he hath not plainly declared in Genesis, that the Angels were created by God, nor vpon what

We reade in Daniel, how the three Children in the fierie Furnace, extolling the workes of GOD in the excellent Song they sung, doe name the Angels to be Creatures of the Lord. All ye workes of the Lord, blesse ye the Lord, praise him, and exalt him aboue all thinges for euer.* Next followeth; Ye Heauens, and then, ye Angels, blesse ye the Lord, &c. And Dauid in the 148. Psalme, saith: Laudate eum omnes Angeli eius, &c. Praise him all yee his Angels.

To say that the Angels were created after all those other thinges, which are reckoned to be made in the sixe dayes, were an absurdity most intollerable. For God saith in Iob: Cum me laudarent astra matutina, & iubilarent omnes filij Dei: which wordes are thus translated, and very significantly; When the Starres of the morning praised me, all mine Angels, or the Sonnes of God, extolled mee with a loud voyce. And the Starres were made the fourth day, but yet the same Saint Augustine is of this opinion: That the Angels and incorruptible Soules, were created the first day, and that the Soule of Adam was created before his Bodie, like as the Angels were, and afterward diuinely infused. For when God said; Let there be Light, and there was Light: the Creation of the Angels is vnderstood in that Light, and without all question to the contrary, they were and are, made partakers of the Light Eternall, which is the selfesame vchangeable Wisedome of God, and the Word Diuine, by which, all other thinges were made. So doth Rupertus expound that place, in his Booke of the workes of the Holie-Ghost, saying, Videtur nonnullis Lucem tunc esse factam, non aliam quam aeris illustrationem: sed melius magni & nominatissimi patres intellexerunt naturam Angelicam lucis nomine significatam. Nec pro similitudine, sed pro re vera Angelica creatura dicta est Lux. There was then no Light at all scene to bee made, norie other then the Ayres illustration: But great and many worthy Fathers haue better vnderstood it, that the Name of Light signified the Angelicall Nature. Not for any similitude, but for a certaine truth, that when Light was commanded, the Angels were created.

And when it is saide; That God separated the Light from the Darknesse, by that diuision is likewise vnderstood, the dreadfull and terrible Iudgment of God against the Deuill; Because that from whence the Light came, thence also descended the Darknesse; to wit, the euil Angels: who were created good in nature, but they would not continue in that excellent puritie. And therefore, of bright shining Angels of Light, thorough their own sinne, they were made blacke Deuils of Darknesse.

Darknesse vnderstood by the Deuil and his Angels.

CHAP. III.

Of the good Angels, and of their Orders and Offices.

Having discoursed in the precedent Chapter, of the Creation of the Angels; I hold it now very meete and requisite, to set down in this succeeding Chapter, a brefe, but necessary obseruation, concerning the diuision which the Thalmudists haue made of them; as also vwhat Dionysius Areopagita, and other Christian Authors, haue written of the Angels, who are the Ministers, Messengers, Ambassadors, and Legats of God, for vvhich reason they are named in Greek Αγγελοι. They are vwithout bodies, or composition of matter, Corporeally impassible, but not in spirit: for the Scripture saith, that they glad or reioyce themselues, greue themselues, loue, and feare. They are altogether good by Creation and Substance; and some haue beene made euill by Election; and therefore, are separated from them that continue good still. But my purpose is, to discourse (in this place) of the Good Angels onely, and of the Celestiall Hierarchie, vvhich consisteth of nine seuerall Orders of Angels.

Of the first Order, are חַיִּיִּת הַקֹּדֶשׁ CHAIOTH HACODES: vvhom the Thalmudistes doe entitle to be those Angels, by vvhom God giueth life. Of the second, אֲרַפְיִם OPHANIM; vvhome they had certain assurance, that God had called him to Preach the Gospell in Macedonia. Judas Machabeus in like sort, expounding his Vision, whereby God had reuealed vnto him, the Prayers which Onias the deceased High-priest in his life time had made; armed all his people, with hope in God, to win the victory against Nicanor.

And yet let me tell you, that Visions haue not bene reuealed to all men, as indifferently, or without especial respect; but onely to holy persons elected of God, according as the Psalmist saith; God in a Vision hath spokē to his Saints, And all this hath been done by the Ministry of his Good Angels. And of those elect Vessels it is written; Videbunt filium hominis venientē in nubibus Cæli, cum virtute multa & maiestate. Et mittet Angelos suos cum tuba & voce magna: & congregabunt electos eius à quatuor ventis à summis cælorum vsq; ad terminos eorum. They shall see the Sonne of man come in the clouds, with power & great glory. And he shall send his Angels with a great sound of a Trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect, from the foure Windes, and from the one ende of Heauen to the other. Then, as it followeth, when he commeth in his Glorie, and all his holy Angels beeing with him: he shall sit vpon the Throne of his Maiesty, to iudge the liuing and the dead, and shall separate the good from the euill. The one shall haue life eternall, and enioy this Theory in endlesse contemplation of God: and the other shall be thereof depriued, and depart into Hels perpetuall torments.

CHAP. IIII.

Of this Earthlie, or Terrestriall Paradise, and of the foure Floodes thereto belonging.

MOYSES, proceeding on in his History of Genesis, from the originall beginning and birth of all things, saith; That GOD planted a Paradise in EDEN towards the East, and there placed Man whom he had formed before. He caused also to grow out of the ground, all kind of Trees, both pleasing to the eye, and good to feed on, beside the Tree of Life. But the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, that he had appointed to grow in the midst of this Paradise. This word Paradise, is a Greeke word, descending neuerthelesse from the Hebrew Language, or much rather of the Persian or Chaldean, which calleth it PARDES, the Name whereof is vsed in certaine places of Scripture, and is as much to say; as A Garden of delights, an Orchard or place of pleasure, wherein nothing is wanting, to recreate the eye. Of this Name, Aulus Gellius writeth thus. Vinaria que nunc vulgus dicit, sunt quos Greci παράδεισος appellant; That which the vulgar tearme the haunt of wilde Beastes, is that which the Grecians call Paradise.

The holy Scriptures doe also denote by this Name, the Seate or habitation of the blessed; according as is expressed in Saint Luke. Et dixit illi Iesus, Amen dico tibi, hodie mecum eris in Paradiso. And Iesus said vnto him: verily I say vnto thee, to day thou shalt bee with mee in Paradise. The Apostle Saint Paul learned the very same Title, in his writing to the Corinthians, by these wordes. Scio hominem in Christo (sive in corpore sive extracorpore nescio: Deus scit) raptum huiusmodi vsque ad tertium cælum. Raptus est in Paradisum, &c. I know such a man (whether in the body or out of the bodie, I cannot tell, GOD knoweth) which was taken vp into the third Heauen. How that he was taken vp into Paradise, and heard wordes which cannot be spoken, which are not possible for man to utter. And in the Apocalypse. Vincenti, dabo edere de ligno vite, quod est in Paradiso Dei mei: To him that ouer-commeth, will I giue to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

Moreouer, that which in the Latine Interpretation, is saide to be Paradisum voluptatis, the selfesame holy Scripture speaks it thus in Hebrew, GANBEEDEN, which is so much to say; as The Garden in Eden; which the seauenty Interpreters haue translated; παράδεισος ἐδέσση, Garden in Eden. The Chaldean Version is the selfe-same, whereby it plainly appeareth, that Eden is the proper name of the place where GOD (at first) had planted the Garden of delights: Not by taking the Grafts or Plants (saith Rupert) from from any other place: but (by the power of his Commaundement) made them there first of all to sprout and blossome out of the Earth.

This Garden is watered by a Spring or Riuer, which at the breaking from his maine head, doth diuide it selfe into foure seuerall spreadings, or extensions, and so do make foure great current waters or floods. One of these branching Armes, or wide swift Channels, is called פישון Physon, which is as much to say; as Multitude, or Many. And of the Grecians it is named Ganges, receiuing nineteene Riuers into the Lap thereof, and it enuironeth the Country of India, which Moyse calleth Euilath, in regard of Euila, the Sonne of Iectan, and so dischargeth it selfe into the Sea. Gold is saide there to create it selfe (as it were) likewise Bdelion, and the Onix stone. The Name of the second Flood or Riuer, is נון which in Greeke is called ρεω, Geon, or Gihon; otherwise tearmed Nilus. This Riuer watereth all Aethyopia, it batheth all Egypt, and afterward shoots it selfe into the Mediterranean Sea. The third Flood, is הנהל Hidechel, otherwise Tygris, by Interpretation; and it carries that name, onely in regard of his swift passage, streame, or current: For they of Medea, doe giue the selfe-same Title to an Arrow. It is otherwise also called, Diglath; and passing along by a part of the Parthians, it enters into Assyria, and Mesopotamia, and afterward buries it selfe in the Red-Sea, which Iaques Phillip of Bergamo, holds to bee scarcely true. The fourth Flood, is היא פרת Hu, Euphrates by Interpretation, which Iosephus calleth Phora, that is to say; Dispersion, or fructifying. It glides betweene Assyria and Mesopotamia, bedewing the Countries of the Armenians, Cappadocians, Syrians, Arabians, and Chaldeans, and seeking there to finish his race, shuts it selfe vp in the Persian Sea, and not in the Red Sea; as Quintus Curtius, Herodotus, and Dyodorus, haue imagined.

There are three seuerall opinions concerning this Paradise, deliuered by Saint Augustine, in his learned labour vpon Genesis. The first, doe vnderstand Paradise to be Spirituall onely. The second, hold it to be Corporall. And the third, suppose it to consist of both; And yet these Doctours cannot agree in the scituation or certaine being of this Paradise. Saint Augustine (consenting with Iosephus) will haue it to bee in the East. Thereunto also, venerable Bede giues his allowance, adding moreouer; That it is round engirt with the Ocean Sea, seperated from the other parts of the World, and scituated vpon a Mountaine, whereon no man is able to goe, and so high (withall) that it toucheth the verie circle of the moon, and whereunto the Waters of the Deluge could neuer reach or come nesre. Auicen, Polybius, and Eratoſthenes, are of another minde from Beda: for they suppose this Terrestriall Paradise, to bee vnder the Equinoctiall, in a more temperate Region then any other. But this is contrary to the censure (almost) of all our elder Writers, who doe hold, that vnder the way of the Suns passage, there neuer was any habitation. For the Equinoctiall cuts the Zona torrida, euen through the middest, and toucheth the Zodiaque in two points; to wit, in the two Signes of Aries and Libra, where very good temperature is saide to be, the day being equally twelue houres all the whole year in light, and as many houres also of darknesse. Now they that take Paradise to be in the East, doe not farre differ from this opinion: because the Equinoctiall circle hath both his East and West degrees.

There are some, who by the flaming or burning Sword, doe vnderstand the fierie Zoane of Heauen and Earth, euen there where the lightning breaks forth, & kindles the Thunder. Some Doctours say, that the exceeding temperature which is in this place, dooth cause such continual welfare and health, that who-soeuer happens to come there, can neuer dye: and therefore it is saide, that Henoch and Helias are yet liuing there. The certaine place of this Terrestriall Paradise, cannot be truly gathered out of the holie Scriptures; albeit the Septuagint or seuen Interpreters, haue commonly traduced it to be in EDEN, and on the East-side. Other Speculatifes, do affirme it to be in Syria, but Iohannes Scotus is none of that number, who saith; that in what place soeuer it is scituate, it may be saide to be in the East. Quilibet enim punctus in terra, potest intelligi esse ad orientem, in comparatione ad caelum, vel respectu diuersorum situum terra, praeterquam respectu duorum polorum; qui sunt immo- immobiles. In what soeuer place of the Earth it is, it may be vnderstood to be in the East, in estimation or regard of the Heauens, or respect of the Earths diuers scituations, beside the view of the two Poles, which are immoueable. Saint Ambrose saith; How can we describe the scituation of Paradise, which we haue neuer scene? And if we could see it, yet should we (neuerthelesse) be restrained from revealing it to others.

The things then that concerne this Garden of delights and happinesse, doe out-stretch the sense & capacity of men. Wherefore Franciscus Georgius saith; That Moyses the wise describer thereof, hath but lightly gone ouer the report of such important matters, and yet vnder Metaphors too, tending alwaies to an analogicall sense: Considering, that this Garden, not Terrestriall (as the vulgar doe imagine) but rather Diuine and Heauenly, was planted by the Diuine and heauenly Worke-man, not in this perishable Earth, but in the Land of the liuing, figured by the Land of Promise. And this is the reason, that such as would willingly discouer somewhat, concerning the secrets hidden vnder the Veile of the holy History, haue wholly referred (whatsoeuer can be said of Paradise) to thinges of easier apprehension, and conuerted the fruitfull trees thereof, into good manners of Life, and call it the Paradise of the Soule, wherein alvertues should haue the surest plantation.

By the East (where they suppose it to bee scituated) they vnderstand the most resplendishing Wisedome, perfectlie cleare, and truelie Orientall. And look how the Sunne (being risen) discouers all his bright beames vpon the heauens; in like manner, haue the vertues such shining beames, as they doe thereby penetrate into the Soule, and make it of a most glorious luster. This Paradise may likewise represent, or designe, the life of the blessed; or else the Church. And the foure Riuers flowing thence, bee compared to those foure royall vertues: Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance, and Iustice: Or else the four Gospels; or the foure Elements. The Trees may signifie all profitable disciplines, or the liues of the Saints, their super-excelling fruites, with the holy Manners and religious Workes of the good and vertuous. The Tree of Life planted in the midst; the Saint of all Saints, our LORD IESVS CHRIST: And the Tree of knowing good from euill, the experience gotten by the first transgression, or the Riches of mans free will before his Fall.

In breece, there is no one that can deny, but this Paradise may (Allegorically) be transferred vnto spirituall occasions; as the two Testaments was figured in two Children, which Abraham had: by his Hand-maid Hagar, the one, and by Sara his Wife the other. As Iesus Christ was signified and described, by the Stone and Rocke which Moyses smote, from whence the truth of holie Scripture (like the Water) issued forth. Philo the Jew, and many more beside him, haue conuerted the whole Narration of this Paradise, into a spirituall vnderstanding, referung (neuerthelesse) the verity of the Historiall discourse in his bodily Carracter. For the holie Doctours, doe hold by a common consent, that this Paradise hath been made in some certaine place of the World, and was planted with all kinde of flourishing and fruitfull Trees. And it appeareth, that Homer tooke the shape of the Garden of Alcinous, by some former description made of Paradise, and it may bee truely gathered; that his excellent representation thereof, hee borrowed from Moyses, in his setting downe the order of the Garden of Paradise. Euen as Ouid hath done the like, when he describeth the Golden time or age of Saturne, when the Earth did then bring forth all her rich encrease, without any labour bestowed thereon. Why then this Terrestriall Paradise may truly be said to be vpon earth, and it behooueth vs to credit the truth of that holy History, which is so much and often recommended vnto vs, by so faithfull a rehearsal, of all things that were done in elder times.

celestial, & the forenamed pleasant place of Paradise. For the Kingdom Celestiall is much about the Firmament of Heauen, & Paradise is vnder the Firmament, vpon Earth. Therefore the Realme or Kingdome Celestiall must needs bee Spirituall, and Paradise appertaineth to the Body and the minde. Moreouer, the pleasures of the Celestiall Kingdome, doe consist in the visible beholding of God, and eternall beatitude receiued with the glorious Angels: But the delights of Paradise onely doe concerne, the sight of pleasant desireable Trees, their enticing fruits, as also the great & admired floods, which continually water and bedew it.

The Celestiall Kingdome no Mortall eye hath at any time seene. 1. Cor. 2. 7.

Furthermore, the Celestiall Kingdome hath neuer beene seene by any Mortall eye, nor heard by any eare, or euer entred into the heart of Man, according as the Apostle Saint Paul plainly telleth vs: But Paradise hath beene visible to ADAM, and EVE his Wife, euen to their very bodily eies; it was vnderstood by their eares, and comprehended in their euident knowledge. Beyond all this, they are both seuerally distinguished, not onely in the Law, but likewise in the Gospell. In the Law, the holy Father Moyſes, in the Booke which we vse to call Genesis, as much to say; as the Birth of all things, maketh mention of Paradise; and there hath described it by notes and markes: but hee hath not spoken so much as one word, concerning the Realme Celestiall of the Kingdome of Heauen. In the Gospell, our Lord and Maister Iesus Christ, as also his Disciples, and Saint John Baptist, in their Sermons and Preachings, haue exhorted all Mortals to repentance; because the Kingdome of Heauen was at hand: but they neuer saide, that Paradise was at hand.

Of the Law & the Gospell, distinguishing both Paradise and the Celestiall Kingdome.

The main and principall difference betweene them.

Finally, there is this difference more betweene them; that after the Resurrection, the Iust shall ascend vp into the Celestiall Kingdome, and there enioy vnspeakeable felicities, according to the true and faithful promise of God himselfe. But no man (after the Resurrection) shall enter into this Paradise, which must remaine voyd of all Inhabitants.

The learned Fathers distinguishing this Argument.

To conclude this point, all learned Doctours doe assure vs, that the Kingdome Celestiall (or of Heauen) and this Terrestriall Paradise, are two seuerall distinct things. And among those learned Fathers, there is one named John, whom Moyſes Bar-Cepha (for his honor) dooth name in his Oration, because of his worthy writing, concerning the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: And likewise vpon those words, which Christ spake to the good Theefe, saying; This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. And another also, called Seuerus, in his two and twentieth Oration of Epi-thronius.

CHAP. VI.

Of Hell, and of the Fire that is said to burne there continually.

THE word Hell, is taken in holy Scripture by diuers significations. In Hebrew it is called שְׁאוֹל SCHOOL, which is as much to say, as a Graue or Sepulcher. Sometimes likewise it is taken for the dead, by a figure termed Metonymia: Also for death it selfe, as the Prophet Dauid saith in his 18. Psalm; Dolores inferni circundederunt me: praoccupauerunt me laquei mortis; The sorrowes of the Graue haue compassed me about, the snares of death ouertooke me. In the New-Testament, by the Gates of Hell, the power of death is vnderstood, which (by the meanes of sinne) are bent continually against vs. Moreouer, Hell is signified (in those blessed Bookes) to be the estate or condition of them, that haue incurred iudgement of the Diuine displeasure, which bringeth with it the true death; according as it is spoken by Iesus Christ himselfe, speaking to the city of Capernaum: Vsque ad infernū demergeris: Thou shalt be thrust downe, euen to Hell. Also of the wicked Rich man, who lifting vp his eyes (when hee was in the torments of Hell) saw Abraham a farre off, and Lazarus in his bosome. To speak yet more of the New Testament, which containeth the Mysteries of the Olde; Hell is there likewise vnderstood, to be the reward and receptacle of the wicked: and Paradise, and the bosome of Abraham, for the happy habitation of the

The graue compared to the estate of the damned.

And not without great reason, is the Graue compared to the deplorable estate of the miserable and damned. For what thinges else are to bee found in Graues, but Death, darknesse, and noysome fauours, answerable to that which Job saith. Antequam uadam, & non reuertar, ad terram tenebrosam, & opertam mortis caligine. Terram miserie et tenebrarum, ubi umbra mortis, & nullus ordo, sed sempiternus horror inhabitans. Before I goe, and shall not returne, euen to the Land of darknesse it selfe, and into the shadow of Death. Into a Land (I say) darke as darknesse it selfe, and into the shadow of death, where is no order, but the Light is there as darknesse, and there eternall horror dwelleth. Such (in like manner) is the quality of the Reprobate, when God hath denounced the iudgement of condemnation against them: for then they are seized on by Death and endlesse darknesse.

Some are of the minde, that Hell is in the middle part of the Earth, and 3245 Miles vnder the vpper part thereof. And the learned say, that it is vnder the Earth, by interpretation of the Name, which is plurally spoken Inferi, as beeing in the inferiour partes of the Earth. It is called Gehenna, which is as much to say; as, Fire of the Earth, or the Land of Fire: For yⁿ in Greeke, is Earth, or Land of Fire, whereof our Fire is said to be but a meere shadow. God himselfe is sometimes tearmed in Scripture to be Fire; as in Zacharie, and Deuteronomy: GOD is a Fire, deuouring or consuming; Yet he neither consumeth or destroyeth his Friends: but he is said to eate them; as much to say, that he receiteth, and turneth them into himselfe. And it is Plutarchs opinion, That God is a Spirit fiery, or of fire, not hauing any forme, but transforming into himselfe what soeuer he pleaseth, equalling himselfe to all things, and all thinges to him. Which he doth, not by the Elementary fire, but by himselfe, or by the Seraphicall enflaming, which is something neere to this diuine Fire. But he punisheth the wicked with a very strict Fire, full of torments, but neuer shining or consuming: And hence is it, that such as are afflicted and tor-

We must needes confesse then, that the wicked are tormented by Fire, by testimony of the truth it selfe, euen Iesus Christ, saying; Omnis arbor qua non facit fructum bonum, excidetur, & ignem mittetur. Every Tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewen downe, and cast into the Fire. Nay, it is further added, that it shall bee burned, with the Fire which God hath prepared for the Deuill and his Angels. This Fire did God neuer ordaine for our damage or destruction, neyther shall any one bee therewith tormented, except his own finnes doe kindle and light the Fire. As wee may learne by the Oracle of Esay, saying: Walke in the light of your Fire, and in the flame that your selues haue lighted. Now albeit, that this Fire hath beene prouided by God, yet notwithstanding, no man shall suffer or feele the torment thereof, if the sparkes of his enormous finnes do not set it ablazing. For looke how we kindle a fiery Feauer in our body, by offensue meates, excesse in drinking, or immoderate labours in this life time: euen so do we kindle both in soule and body, (when after death they shall bee reuited) the torments of this quenchlesse Fire, by the superfluity of our wicked workes, and depraued affections. The super-abounding torment whereof thus flowing in Men, dooth boyle, fry, and fiercely encrease their paine; that by their own lewdnesse first lighted this fire.

Why then (to follow the opinion of the Pythagorians) the Fire which is large in extendure, and brightly burning, makes him a happy man that hath a wide and spacious heart, by walking in the Commaundements of God. As contrariwise, a small and narrow Fire, so made by their owne bad and vile disposition, that hate their hearts hardened, & closely shut vp against all goodnes (like to the forging Anuile) is made obscure, darke, and torturing, euen according as the Sunne or Fire softens or hardneth the diuersity of these subiects, that from eyther of the do receiue their warmth or coolnesse. The Doctrine of the same Fire of blisse and torment, is not much varrying from the holy Scripture: because in Deuteronomy it is called, a Fire deuouring; & in the same place also, a Fire, blessing, beautifying, and transforming. And in Exodus we reade, that the Law was giuen in a visible flame of Fire. Quia ecce (saith the Prophet Esay) Dominus in igne veniet, & quasi turbo quadrigia eius, reddere in indignationem suam, & increpationem suam in flamma ignis. For behold, the Lorde will come with Fire, and his Chariots like a whirlwind, that he may recompence his anger with wrath, and his indignation with the flame of Fire. For the iust and godly, he ordained the Fire from the Worlds first constitution, but to be to them, in ioy, splendour, and reioycing: which Fire also hee appointed for the wicked and rebellious, to bee to them a seuerer affliction, torture, and punishment. But this tormenting Fire is ordained euerm-lasting; as not onely appeareth by the sentence of the highest Iudge, saying; Goe ye wicked into euerm-lasting Fire, But likewise by the Prophet Esay, who speaking of the Carkasses of them that had greatly sinned against God, saith; Their Worme shall neuer dye, or their Fire euer be extinguished. By which words, the Prophet plainly declareth both the one and the other torment; to wit, the Interiour, and Exteriour, and that they are both to be Eternall.

Now presupposing this Fire to bee Eternall (according to the common receiued opinion) and our Soules and wicked apprehensions, or intelligences, being wholly separated from our Bodies, Saint Gregory makes a quicke riddance of it, in this Nature; Imagine (saith he) this Fire to torment the wicked, as an Instrument of the Supreme Justice. But yet he leaueth to bee presupposed, how this Fire should be an Instrument, and (in mine opinion) whether it tormenteth by his owne proper forme, or whether it bee agitated by some other means: as by a Sythe, or Hammer, cutting or smiting continually vpon the wicked? Assuredly, it is something strange, that Saint Gregory hath bene doubtfull in this case; considering, that (else-where) he saith, The Angels and Demons haue bodies, but yet so thinne and slender, as (in comparison of ours) they are said to be without bodies; whereof (in this case) there need no difficulty to be made. Our latter Diuines, some of them are of opinion, that the wicked Spirits and Soules are tormented with a Corporeall Fire, as by an obiekt most disproportionable, and greatly molestuous. And the Academicks hold, that all the euill Demons haue one body; whereunto consenteth Saint Basile, Nazianzene, and the ancient Doctours mutually, from whom Saint Augustine dissenteth not, neither is different. For he, in his Book vpon Genesis, rendreth a reason, how the euill Spirits do become in that manner: Because (saith he) they haue most subtile Bodies. And a little after, he saith; The Demons are Ayrie and Fiery Creatures, who being actiue, are not so thin or slender, as the Terrestriall and Watry Creatures. Some others say, that not onely the Angels, but Soules also, being separated from their Bodies, haue aetheri-

 all Bodies. But if wee had studied in Saint Pauls Schoole, who had his enstruction in the third Heauen, we could easily vntye these knots. For he teacheth vs, that the warre between the Spirit and the Flesh, is denounced by such a Law, as who soeuer conquereth, shall giue his properties and qualities to the vanquished, and the conquered shall be cloathed with the Nature of the Conqueror. Because of such as in the Spirit shall become victorious, he saith; Cum autem mortale hoc induerit immortalitatem, &c. When this corruptible hath put on incorruption, and this Mortall hath put on Immortalitie, &c. And a little before; It is sown a sensuall or naturall Body, and is raised a spirituall Bodie. So then, the Soule being cloathed with the Nature of the Body, shall be tormented by the Corporeall Fire; like as the Body, cloathed with the Nature of the Spirit, shall receiue Beatitude together with the Soule.

Origen, and the ancient Academicks, do assigne another punishment to the damned, and say: It ensueth by a deordination or confusion of those partes, which ought to bee well ordained, disposed and assembled. For like as when the Members of ones Bodie are disioynted or broken in their Nerues and Bones, we feele a generall torment and greuous anguish: Euen so, when the Soule shall bee out of this order of Hermony, wherein it was Created by GOD himselfe to doe well, and liue profitably; she shall suffer suffer paine and punishment by that same deordination and confusion. Answerable to that which Saint Augustine saith: Thou (o Lord) hast appointed it, and it must be so, that euery disordered Spirit shall be a punishment to it selfe. Of this torment that ariseth from the disorder of the Soule, which ought euermore to be concordant to God; many other things are said, not onely by S. Hierome, Saint Augustine, S. Ambrose, and diuers other Doctours; but likewise by Proculeius, Hierocles, and others, among whom, Cicero writing against Catiline, saith; Thine owne iniquities, shall not they appeare like so many furies before thee? The Prophets also say the very same: Vnderstand (saith Jeremy) and know, that this is a most bitter and wretched thing vnto thee, because thou hast forsaken the Lord God. And the same Esay affirmeth; The Heart of the wicked Man (saith he) is like vnto the boyling Sea, which neuer can take rest, but as the billows, so do they redound and regorge, to his grieffe and dolour; for there is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord.

The before named Authots, doe describe another reason of this torment, which they gather to be engendred of a wicked Idoll or representation. For our soule or Spirit, calling to remembrance those thinges, whereof she imprinted some shape in her selfe, euen at the time when the sin was committed, shall see and discern before her own eyes, some History (as it were) of her transgressiōs. And then must the conscience be hurried with her owne piercings; The verie thoughts accusing one another (saith the Apostle) whereof are begotten some torments, euen by those bad affectiōs. And they shall be punished by the hot fierie flame of wicked embracings, oblique loue, and selfe-wounding indignation: or by the pale-freezing fire of Enuy, or else consumed by freneticall sadnesse. It is no maruell then, if the supreme Iudge of all, doe thus torment the wicked in Hell, giuing them much greater paine, then the most cleare light, or brightest beames of the Sunne can do to beared eies, scarrified, or any way else offended: And with-holding also from them his benigne influence, whereby all thinges are filled with goodnesse, leauing them in their own vile deordination. For euen he himselfe, that will be seene (of the good and vertuous) to their ioy & comfort in the resurrection; will be likewise to those euill doers, their dismall paine and endlesse consumation.

This is that whereof the Prophet Ezechiel speaketh, saying that hee saw the Lord; A lumbis eius & desuper, & à lumbis eius usq; deorsum, vidi quasi speciem ignis splendentis in circuitu: Euen from his loynes upward, euen from his loynes downward, I saw as a likenesse of fire, and brightnesse round about. The Lord then is one while a bright and beautifying fire, making the iust to glitter and shine, like to the Stars, or as sparkles of fire: another while, he is a boystrous storming Fire; to the Children of Leuy. One while he is a consuming fire of Wood & Straw, to wast, destroy, and ruinate (as Ioell saith) Speciosa deserti, The Pastures of the Wildernesse; that is to say, the wicked Actions committed by them that are forsaken by the Grace of God, and the heauenly influxion which would haue made them appeare bright and glorious: Another while also, he is a blacke burning and tormenting Fire, and as Ioell else-where saith; Ante faciem eius ignis vorans, & post eum exurens flamma; A Fire deuoureth before him, and behind him a Flame burneth.

Now whether this Fire be incorporeall or no, that only is best knowne to God, and yet Origen prooues it to bee inuisible, by the iudgement of the Apostle: This Fire (saith hee) is of such substance; that being constituted inuisible, it yet burneth visible thinges, according as the Apostle saith. For the things which Men see, are Temporall; and those which bee not seene; are Eternall. If then this Fire be Eternall where with they are punished that separate themselves from God: it falleth then vpon necessitie, that it must be also inuisible, because by the opinion of the Apostle, the onely thinges Inuisible, are Eternall. And it is not to bee Wondered at, (saith the same Origen) that this Fire is both Inuisible and tormenting, because no Man can see the heate or warmth which is accedentall to the Body, and yet it measurably tormenteth them sometimes, that are but indifferently molested with that Fire, which is of a quite contrary sort or kind, to the Fire which we haue in common vse here on Earth.

God is (to the good) ioy, and comfort, but to the wicked, endlesse sorrow. Ezechiel. 1, 27.

God is one while a bright gladson Fire, and another while a darke deuouring Fire.

Nothing is of greater torment in this World, then out visible fire

Neuerthelesse, it is compared to ours, in regard, that there is nothing in this world, which giueth a greater torment then the visible Fire: and if we doe desire to shun the other, which tormēteth eternally, let vs take good heede, that there be no eternall euill disposition in vs ; but rather such, as we may receiue the supreme Fire in ioy, or (at least) in consuming away our wood and straw, the inordinate desires and appetites of this life. And so by expurgation of the Scum, or Dregges and Drosse of the Mettall; we may shine like bright Vessels of pure Golde, fit to be placed in the Celestiall Clouds, and in the dwelling of the eternally blessed.

CHAP. VII.

Of Man (the Image of God) to what end he was created: with the signification of those two words, Image of God, and Similitude or Likenesse of God.

When our good and gracious GOD, by admirable prouidence had Created the whole World, and all that therein is comprised (which is nothing else, but euen a Shop (as it were) wherein the bright Beames of the Diuine Wisedome doe shine and are made manifest.) Presently, for a full accomplishment of his worke, hee formed Man in his owne Image or resemblance, to constitute him, as Emperour and Maister of all things that he had so excellently created on Earth. To the ende, that Man knowing the Dignity of his Creation, and how much hee was obliged to his Maker, might bee the more incited, to loue and serue him in al his powers, and should imploy himselfe in acknowledging so great a benefit, as to be made according to the semblance or Image of God. Not proudly to presume or ouerweene, that the shape of God is answerable in forme to his owne ; for this Word Image is not so vnderstood, concerning the exterior forme or similitude: but rather, according to the spirituall intelligence, of the more precious part, which is the Soule.

For looke how God (by his increated power) is wholly God, and in all places viuiſieth and gouerneth all thinges, and (as the Apostle saith) Wee moue, liue, and haue our being in him: Euen so, the Soule giueth life in the Body, to euery part thereof. And now behold how she is said to bee the Image of God, like as in a Trinity. For albeit, that (by Nature) she can bee but one, yet it is most certaine, that she hath in her selfe three seuerall Dignities; to wit, Vnderstanding, Will, and Memory. And looke how the Sonne is begotten of the Father, and the Holy-Ghost proceedeth both of the one and other: In like manner, is the Will engendred of the Vnderstanding, and Memory hath her procreation from them both. And euen as the three persons of the Trinitie are but one God; so the three powers of the Soule, are but one only Soule. Seeing then that wee are Created in the semblance or likenesse of God, and that this is an vndoubted Maxime; That euery like delighteth in his like: Wee should euermore wish, to bee vnited with our similitude, which is God. And looke how much these earthly thinges are far off from GOD; euen as farre doe wee estrange our selues from him, when we set our affections on those matters which are not giuen vs to vse, as our cheefest good, or Summum Bonum: but to this end, that knowing the goodnes of the Creator, who hath so willinglie provided vs of all things necessary, we should be free from all occasions of excuse, and make the larger confession of his benefits, powred in such abundance vpon vs.

Man then was Created, to the end that he might acknowledge his God, and in knowing him, to honour him; and in honouring, to loue him; and in louing, to serue and obey him: and all this to no other end, but that finally he might attaine to that end, for which he was created; to wit, the fruition of his God and Maker. For this cause, he made him with an erected and vpright Body; not so much for his dissimilitude frō the brutish Beasts, who are crooked, bended and looking downe vpon Earth: as to mount vp his vnderstanding, and eleuate his eyes vnto the Heauens, his originall, ginall, to contemplate there Diuine occasions and permanent, leauing the Terrestriall as vaine.

But if we shall better and more largely declare, the difference, betweene the Image and similitude of God, to make some vnity and concordance betweene them; let vs then set downe the Exposition which Hugo de Saint Victor hath made thereon. As in the Elements (saith he) two things are diuers in themselues, and the one far off differing from the other; as in the fire wee behold two dissenting things; to wit, brightnesse, and heate; the brightnesse nor beeing heat, nor the heate brightnesse; because the brightnesse is seene and glittereth, and the heate is onely felt, yet burneth; the brightnesse not burning, or otherwise felt, but by sight, nor the heat shining, or to bee seene: Euen so, two diuers things are likewise to bee discerned in the spirituall Creature; namely, the Image of God, and the semblance or similitude of him, which two doe somewhat differ and are vnlike. For, according as the spirituall Creature is made in the Image of God, so she shineth by knowledge; that is to say, according to intelligence and vnderstanding, the spirituall Creature is the Image of God; And according as she is made in the likenesse of God, so she heateth her selfe by loue and dilection; that is, answerable to will and behauiour, she is semblable to God. Now, the Authour and Maker of this spirituall Creature, ordered, that one part thereof should alwaies remaine simple and wholly spirituall, as the Angels: and that the other should be commixed, as the Soule of Man which dwelleth in the Body.

Origen is of opinion, that the Image of Iesus is Man, and that for this cause it is said, that he is made in the Image of God: For the Sonne is the Image of GOD. Others are of the minde, that the Holy Ghost is vnderstood by the Word Similitude: but truely, in the Image, and in the likenesse of GOD, is nothing else meant, but that Man is also the similitude of God Man is the Image of God, saith Saint Paul. This may likewise referre it selfe vnto nature; but Similitude or Likenesse must then order it selfe, by those things wherewith Nature is endued; to wit, Immortality, Vertue, and Wisedome, which doe make a man like vnto God. Thomas Aquinas, that great and learned Diuine, expoundeth the present case in this manner. Man is made in the Image and likenesse of God; according to his Soule, whereby he excelleth all vnreasonable Creatures. In the Image, that is to say; in Memory, Inteligence, & Dilection. In Likenesse, that is, in Innocency and Iustice, naturally disposed in the Soule. Saint Augustine in his Book of the quantitie of the Soule, saith; The Soule is made like vnto God, he hauing Created it immortal and indissolueable. Thomas Aquinas proceeding on in his last Narration, hath these wordes. The Image then, is as concerning the forme; and the Likenesse, is as concerning Nature. Whereby it appeareth, that Man is made (in regard of his Soule) according to the Image and Likenesse, not onely of the Father, or the Sonne, or the Holy-Ghost, but of the whole vndiuided Trinity together.

But God bestowed vpon Man when hee Created him, three especiall good gifts; and principally to be made reckoning of. The first is, that he gaue him his owne Image. The second, that he made him after his own Likenesse. The third, that he gaue him Immortalitie of Soule, if Man had continued in the obedience of his Creator. Which three great blessings (saith Hugo de S. Victor) were giuen by God vnto man, and both (Naturally, & by Originall Iustice) vnderstood then to be in him. Two other gifts also he enriched man withall, as exterior benefits; the one, vnder him; the other, aboue him: Vnder him, the World; aboue him, God; the world, as a visible good, yet transitory; God, an inuisible good, and eternall. In this neather gift (to wit the World) Man was created in the higher; that is, in God, Man is to be blessed. God hath beene and is aboue Man, by condition; and aboue the World in Dignity: diuiding himselfe from the inferiour world, to draw him vp to the Soueraigne and Superiour.

There are also three principall hurts or euils, which doe abuse and corrupt the three fore-named blessings; to wit, Ignorance of Goodnesse, Couetousnes of Wickednesse, and Infirmity or sicknesses of the Body. Thorow Ignorance, the Image of God hath beene, and is defaced in vs; and so by Couetousnes, is the likenesse of God: By Infirmity & sickness, the Immortality of the Body. For these three diseases, there are likewise

Three remedies against the three evils

The use of the three Remedies, in their severall degrees.

Of absolute Necessity.

Of Conditionall Necessity

Theorique hath three partes; Divinity, Philosophy, and Mathematical skil. Practique is divided into solitarie, private and publique: Or else into Ethicall, Oeconomical, and Politicall. There be also seaven kindes of Mechanicall order: whereof Hugo de S. Victor amply discourseth, and therefore to him I refer the Reader.

wise three principall Remedies; to wit, Wisdom, Vertue, and Necessity; to the end, that by three Soueraigne helpes, three dangerous harmes may be auoyded. To overcome Ignorance, we are to make use of Wisdom; to Master the Vice of Auarice or Couetousnesse, we must imploy the contrary, bounteous Vertue; and with Necessity, to tread downe Infirmity. Wisdom, is to vnderstand things as they are, without idle curiosity: Vertue, is an Habitude of the Soule after Nature, conformable to Reason. I call Habitude a quality, which (without great difficulty) cannot be removed from her place and Subiect. Euen as we tearme disposition to be another quality, which easilie is to be elbowed out of his abiding. By the Word Subiect, we vnderstand the vertue of the Soule, wherein the same Vertue (which is a Quality) maketh her residence. Necessity, which is tearmed Absolute, is, as when without it, nothing can be done: As, without feete a Man cannot goe; without food, he cannot liue; and without naturall sustenance, he must needes dye. There is another kinde of Necessity, which is called Conditionall: As, for a Mans easier traouailing, a Horse is expedient; and for a more delicate degree of Life, Partridges, Quails, and other Dainties, may be accounted requisite.

For these three forenamed Remedies, all Arts and Disciplines haue bene inuented: To attaine Wisdom, the Theorique (which is Contemplatiue) hath bene found out; For Vertue, the Practique (which is Active) came into use: And for Necessity, the Mechanicke onely was inuented. For after that ADAM had sinned, He, his Children, and Kindred, were necessarily constrained to the search of thinges: to know Plants and Hearbs; to plucke vp roots and eat them, to labour the Earth, by the sweate of their Browes, to get graine for food, and this Necessity they naturally learned, as afterward to grind the Graine, to make it in Paast to be baked: to kill wilde Beastes, and feede on their Flesh, and then to cloth themselves with their Skines. To builde little Habitations, thereby to auoyde the iniury of Weather. To plant Vines, daily adding inuention vpon inuention, either in finding out diuersity of viands, and then as variable orders of dressing them. To erect big Houses, to beate with Hammers, to File, to Sowe, to make Garments of Linnen, Woollen, Silkes of sundry collours, and other admired kindes of Habit. To buy, sell, and Traffique one with another. And Johannes Ludouicus Vines saith, in his Booke called The Introduction to Wisdom: Vtile indumentum excogitauit necessitas, presiosum, luxus, elegans, vanitas. Necessity found out Garments, profitable, precious, light, neate, and vaine.

God then so dearely loued Man, that he assigned him the whole Worlde for his Country and dwelling. And euen to this day, in what part soeuer thereof a Wise man traouaileth, he is said to bee (euery where) a free Cittizen: so that in all places, all thinges are his, and no where should he account himselfe eyther a Stranger, or to be Hosted. How much more then, was the first Man a Lord of all the Worlde, and as the Gracians say κοσμοπολιτης, Being the new workmanship of God, endued with all Vertues, Maister of all the Beasts of the Earth, of the Waters, and of the Ayre, with all Creatures to them belonging, he had the whole Worlde (as his Inheritance) in Possession. And did not God declare a great signe of loue to him, when he diuided parts with him? Hee gaue him the Earth to walke vpon, as if he were Sole-Maister thereof, according as the Etimology of the word signifieth. CHAP. VIII.

Of the Age of Man, and why in the first age of the World, Men liued longer, then now they doe in these later times.

In the first Age Men liued longer then now, by many yeares.

IT is well knowne, to all them that haue bene studious in the holy writings, that in the worlds first Age, and before the generall Deluge (for Sinne) had ouer-whelemed the whole Earth; the life time of Man was much differing in length, from the breuitie wherein wee now behold it. For it is most certaine, that A D A M liued nine hundred and thirty yeares; S E T H, nine hundred and twelue; C A I N E, or C A I N A M (as some call him) nine hundred and ten. So descending afterward frō one to another, we find, that he that liued least time of account, attained to the reach of seauen hundred yeares. But now in these our daies, we see very few arriue at eighty, or ninety yeares of age: which date if any one happento exceed, it is esteemed rare and maruailous; so that, we liue not the tenth part of the former life time. Wherefore the learned, both Diuines and naturall Philosophers, that haue seriously discoursed on this Argument, finding Nature (our productresse) to bee the very same teeming Mother with them then, and that those first Men liued naturally heere so long time, and not miraculously: they grew heereat into no little amazement, and therefore began to make curious Inquisition into the causes and reasons.

The shortest life time was seauen hundred yeares.

The iudgement of Diuines & Philosophers in this case.

Marcus Varro and others grew doubtful of the yeares in length.

To Marcus Varro, and an infinite number of other like Questionists, this worke of Nature appeared to bee so strange, that they grew into an imagination by themselves, supposing the yeares of that ancient time, to be none such as are in these moderne daies. But that coniecture was meere idle follie, and an error ouer great, as also inexcusable, vaine, & absurd, as shall be shewn in the following Chapter, after we haue first discoursed in this present, some causes, with the aduise of Graue, Wise, and Learned Authors.

When I looke into the Observations of others, and then make a discent from them into mine owne priuate opinion, I take the principall reason, why Men liue not now so long as ours Elders then did, to be this: That they had no such causes or accidents; as now (in vs) doe beget many infirmities, whereby both Age and Death doe soone steale vpon vs. Heere-withall it behooues vs to consider, that A D A M and E V E being the first Parents of all mankinde, were created by the hand of God, without any other meanes or helpe: wherefore it is to be presumed, that he made them of a most excellent complexion, perfect simpthy, and such proportionable humours, as must needes yeelde a reason for their healths continuance, so many yeares together. By means whereof, the Children that came from Parents of such rich perfection, and likewise their Off-spring succeeding to them againe, that naturally had the benefit of so long life, must needs resemble their first Deriuers, in selfe-same good and sound constitution, as being descended of most excellent matter; vntill such time, as by the alteration of Ages (whose propertie is to change & impaire all thinges) the condition of Man began feebly to decline, yeelding vp his daies to be few in number.

In those times also, they had one thing which greatly auailed for the lengthening of life, and which now to vs is very contrary & hurtfull. That was, great temperance in drinking, as well in quantity as in quality: Likewise their small variety of meates; for they neuer had so many sorts or diuersity of dishes, as now we haue; neyther knew they any such plenty of idle inuentions. Nor doe we any where finde, that the eating of Flesh was knowne (before the flood) to Men. Moreouer, it is held by common opinion (but yet most certaine) that

Our fore-fathers had no such infirmities as now we haue.

Adam and Eue made by the hand of God onely.

The alteration of Ages impaireth all things.

Temperance in drinking, and little change of meates.

Flesh not eaten before the Flood.

The Deluge made the Earth more barren then before.

Adam knew the vertue of all Hearbes, Plants, and Stones.

The life of Man much holpen by the course of heauen.

that Fruits and Hearbs (in those times) were of farre greater vertue and substance (beyonde all comparison) then now they are or can be; by reason they grew out of a new & vnwearied earth, and not any such as now it is; weake, worne, and vtterly fainting. For that vniuersall ouerflow and inuadation, bereft it of his former purity and fatnesse, making it more brackish, barren and vnfertile, by the Waters generall passage ouer it; which continued for many weekes together.

These reasons are so weighty and iudicious, as each of them may be sufficient to conclude (though many more be ranked with them) that it was no matter of maruaile, but rather meere naturall, for Men to liue longer then, then now they doe or can. It is further to be obserued, and we may boldly credit it for a truth, that ADAM was acquainted with the vertues, in all Hearbes, Plants, and Stones, and his Children so well profited therein by his instruction, as neuer could any (since then) attaine to the like perfection. All these then thus concurring; partly for the health and support of life, and partly for continuance in soundest temperature, expelled all danger of diseases to happen, onely by meere vse of common growing simples, detesting the venomous compounds of this Age, which in stead of purging and purifying Mens bodies, do weaken; yea, and oftentimes kil such as take them.

Beyond all this, in those first yeares of the Worlds infancy, the health and life of Men, was much strengthened and supported by course of the Heauens, as also the influence of the Starres and Planets; they being farre more beneficial and auspicious then, then now they are. For then there had not past half a quarter so many Aspectes, Coniunctions, Eclipses, with infinite other Caelestiall Impressions, whence haue come the causes of changes, variations, & strange alterations vpon Earth, and among the Elements themselues, that were the principall Motiues to life and health in those daies; as contrariwise they are the occasions of infirmities and death now. But to go somewhat further, then what foeuer yet hath beene said, as grounded only vpon naturall reason; I dare maintaine, that the very cause of so long life in our fore-fathers, proceeded from the vnspeakable prouidence of God; whose will it was, to haue their life time stretched out to such length, and that the fore-mentioned occasions, should mutually be aiding one to another; this being the onely intent, that of two Sole-Persons, many more might bee borne, the Earth inhabited, and mankind multiplied.

We see beside, that Men liued not so long after the Flood as they did before, as being (perhaps) in Gods secret counsell so determined: yet NOAH was permitted to enter the Ark, and there God saued more Men and Women, then at the first he had created, that the World might yet againe be the sooner inhabited. Saint Augustine discoursing on these matters, saith; That our fore-fathers had not onely a benefit beyond vs, in health and length of life; but in the stature of their bodies, as manifestly is remembred of them in diuers Bookes. And their Bones haue beene found vnder great Mountaines, as also in sundry Graues & Sepulchers, which haue beene beleued for a certainty, that those Bones belonged to Men liuing before the Flood. The same Saint Augustine also affirmeth, that hee being at Vrica, a City of Affrica, sawe there the Bones of a dead Mans Body, and the very Iaw-Bones were so big and weighty, that they would haue counterpoysed them of an hundred Men, now liuing in this Age of ours.

Neuerthelesse, although our life time be so shortned, yet we neede not make any complaint thereof, for in applying that breuity to euil manners, or offence of God, the Lord hath shewne himselfe most mercifull to vs, in cutting off so large a limit, then which, we can acknowledge no greater a benefit. And yet, if we would deuoutly apply our selues to his seruice, he hath allowed vs (in this little) time enough for it. For so great is Gods goodnesse and fauour towards vs, that he accepts our good desires and humble wils, for full, sufficient, and absolute payment.

The prouidence of God was the onely cause of our fore-fathers long life.

GOD saued more in the Arke, then he created at the beginning.

CHAP. IX.

That the opinion of such, as supposed the yeares in elder time, to bee shorter then now they are at this instant, is vtterlie false. Of the first Citty that euer was in this World. Finally, that our Auncient fore-fathers had more Children; then those which are remembred vnto vs in the holy Scripture.

Because it hath seemed to some, that the life time of nine hundred yeares, in our first Parents, should bee a matter impossible, in regard that they could not comprehend, and reach to the causes and naturall reasons, which haue bene alleadged in the precedent Chapter, as the onely occasions of their so long continuance. And (in not daring to deny the iust number of so many yeares, evidently specified & maintained in sacred writ) they wold yet insinuate a supposition, that those elder yeares, were shorter, then in these Moderne times they are; whereby the aduantage of their long life (out-reaching ours so farre) comes much short of the opinion by vs receiued: we must therefore settle our selues, to a full resolution of these imaginary conceptions. And yet we will examine part of their follies, in that some others among them, would perswade and assure vs; that one of our yeares now, carries equall quantity with ten of those in old time. Nay, there be others, who haue maintained, that each monthly course of the Moone now, stood with them then for a full and compleate yeare, which they pleased to call by the name of Annus Lunariss.

Other Dreamers bring in as dity an assertion, that three of our moneths, made them vp one whole yeare; by means wherof, one of our years should iump iust with foure of theirs: for in such manner did the Chaldeans, and likewise the Arcadians deuide their yeares, according as Lactantius recordeth. Marcus Varro, a Romaine, most learned in many matters, only (heerein) is somewhat blame-worthy, because he held, that these Anni Lunares, deriued their number from one Moones coniunction vntill the comming of another new Moone, which may consist of twentie nine daies, and some odde houres beside. Pliny likewise esteemes it but as a fable; that Men (in the Worldes none-age) should liue so long; and saith, that the Arcadians (according as wee haue already declared) numbred their yeares by three of our months: There is also among vs Christians, a certaine Booke of the Ages of the World; the Authour nameth himselfe Heliconiensis, wherein he witnesseth himselfe to be of the same opinion.

Notwithstanding all this, it is a case most plaine and apparant, that those yeares deliuered vs in holy Scripture, were none other, then these are in our time, and if there might be imagined any difference, yet it was not sensibly to be perceiued: and therefore, all opinions held to the contrary, are vaine, ridiculous, and meerely foolish. For it is so directly prooued by Iosephus, as also Lactantius Firmianus; but especially S. Augustine, in a more distinct and better manner, whose reasons and authorities, are sufficient to confound all former grosse and false opinions.

Concerning the first allegation; to wit, that each seuerall Moone (in that Age) made them vp a full compleat yeare, accounting alwaies from the one coniunction to the other: how can this be but an impudent error? Because we know very certainly, that so much time doth not containe fully thirty daies: Which being graunted as they argue, then it must needs follow, that Men in this present Age doe liue longer, then they did vpon the worlds Creation, for neuer any Man liued then, twelue hundred yeares, which (by such account) nothing surmounteth this Age of ours: And yet it is to bee iustified, that some (among vs) haue liued an hundred yeares; some also (though sildome) an hundred & twelue yeares: which wou'd amount to more then thirty hundred yeares, if wee should account them so by the course of the Moone.

We may well ioyne this to their error, whose opinion was, that ten of those elder yeares, did make vp fully but one

one of ours now. But might their coniecture passe for currant, then Men should bee capable of Generation, at seauen, eyght, and ten yeares of age, which is quite contrary to all naturall Philosophy. To approoue this, wee read in Genesis, that SETH the Sonne of ADAM begat ENOCH, he being then an hundred and five yeares old. If ten of those yeares, had answered (by equall proportion) but to one of ours now; it must needs then follow, that Men in the Worlde's first Age, did beget Children, at ten yeares old and a halfe of our instant account. CAIN also begetting MELALABELL at seauenty yeares of his age; by our reckoning, must needs be a Father at seuen yeares old of our time: Nay, we must fall to a farre lower account; if one of our yeares should hold leuell with twelue of the first Age, according to some others idle imagination. But more clearly will we yet reueale their grosse absurditie, & by that which ensueth, squash in peeces their vnexcusable error. For if their ancient yeare were but the tenth or twelfth part of ours now; it must then consequently ensue, that their yeare then consisted not of twelue months, or (at most) that their month had but three daies in it. Which is apparantly false, because the manifest Text of the Scripture saith: That the generall Flood began the seuenteenth day of the second month; whereby we may plainly perceiue, that the Months then, were none other then now ours are. As for the opinion of them, who hold, that the old year made but the fourth part of our Moderne account, and that their yeare consisted but of three months onely: the selfe-same Scripture doth approoue it likewise to be false, because in the fore-named place it is said, concerning Noahs Arke; That in the seuenth month, in the seuenteenth day of the month, the Arke rested it selfe on the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia. Afterward followeth, that the Waters still decreased vntill the tenth Month, and the very first day of that Month, the heads and tops of the Mountaines, each where discovered themselues. This very plainly demonstrates their abusive opinion, that would haue the Ancient year to be but three months long; because because mention is heere made, both of the seauenth and tenth Moneths. We may well see then, that the yeare in that Age had twelue Months, according as in these times our yeare now hath; for when hee there nameth the tenth Moneth, he doth not rearm it to be the last Month.

10 With as little discretion it is saide, that the Moneth then contained but three daies only; considering, the Text it selfe expressly nameth the twenty seauen day of the Month: Much lesse then could it be saide, that the day consisted then but of two or three houres, because it is likewise set down in the same Text, That the Windowes of Heauen were opened, and the raine was vpon the Earth, the full space of forty daies and forty nights. 20 Whereby it remaines very euident, that those daies were naturall daies, of xxiiij. houres in length, and the Monthes and yeares so long as now they are; or the difference so small, that it was not sensible. I speake this the rather, because they then accounted the course of Heauen, as now we do, and this order hath euermore bene obserued among the learned, as well Hebrues as Egyptians: 30 among whom *Moyse*s was borne and bred, who was the Author & Historiographer of those holy Bookes, wherein the long liues of our fore-fathers are written.

40 Now, albeit we should consent to the censure of many, who did holde, that the Hebrues measured their months by the ordinary course of the Moone, and that the full year contained then twelue Lunary Months, and each Month had in it twenty nine daies, and foureteene houres; little more, or little lesse, by which reason, the yeare should be shorter by twelue daies, then that which we now measure by the course of the Sun; to wit, three hundred, threescore, five daies and sixe houres: yet cannot this difference (any way) make doubtfull or vncertaine, the Liues and Ages of our elder Fathers. For it is a matter of no moment, that in nine hundred or a thousand yeares, twenty or thirty should be exempted, because the Lunary month was not compleated in thirty daies. By this authority then, we may be assured, that the nine hundred and thirty yeares which ADAM liued, and the nine hundred 50

dred likewise of others, were such as the hundred seauenty and fine of Abraham, and as the seuenty or eighty which men liuenow-adaies; for whosoever beleeueth otherwise, is in a mighty error.

There is also another consideration to be noted, alleaged by S. Augustine to this purpose. Put the case (saith he) that the Scripture makes no mention, that Adam and his Sonnes had any other Children, before them which are expressly named: yet is it most certainly to be affirmed, that both (before and after) they had diuers and sundry beside, for they had Children in their younger daies, whereof no mention is made in Scripture. And to make more ample prooffe thereof, it is saide; That Caine built a Citty, the first that euer was in the World, according as Iosephus reporteth, saying; That it was beautified with diuers Towers, engirt with wals, and he called it after the Name of his Son Enoch, which was then but newly borne vnto him. This may appeare to haue small shew of truth, there being then in the world but three or foure Men onely; for the Scripture makes mention to vs of no more. But well we know, that to the building of a Citty, the help of a great number of men is necessarily required: yet notwithstanding, the Text names but the principall heades of the builders; as appeareth, in saying; That their Sons & Daughters begat diuers others, which in no place of Scripture are named at all. We see, that the holy Euangelists haue done the very like, in setting down their Euangelicall History. For S. Mathew, treating of the Genealogy of Christ, according to the flesh, beginneth at Abraham, and numbring on to Dauid, saith; Abraham begat Isaac, neuer speaking of Ismael. Then afterward, Isaac begat Jacob, yet sayes nothing of Esau; albeit they were their first borne Children. Because, he hauing no other intention, but to descend from one degree to another (euen to Dauid) who was not of the Linage of Ismael, therefore he made no reckoning of Ismael. Then againe, Jacob begat Juda, and his Bretheren, yet was not Juda the first borne Childe. So that discoursing thus of the Generation, he accounted none but them onely, by whom he descended iust to Dauid. A prooffe sufficient, to encite all Aduersaries to beleue, that Moyse did the like in his History, and that our fore-fathers had diuers other Children, beside those which are spoken of, and named in the holy Scriptures.

CHAP. X.

Wherefore the Deuil made choise of the Serpents shape when he tempted the first woman, and came not to her in any other forme.

The proud Angell, first Author of all euill, beeing cast downe from Heauen; cunningly coueting to traine himselfe into Mans society, because hee was fallne from Heauen, thorow his insolent offence, therefore his hatred not a litle against him: & to the end that his subtilty might be the more court, he made choise of a Serpent in the Terrestriall Paradise, where, with Adam and his Wife, all other earthly Creatures orderly conuersed; not hauing any discord together, or being any way harmfull, but all (as well the sauage as domesticke) acknowledged man for their Lord & Maister, to serue his turn withall. For this Serpent, being a glyding Creature, that could turne and writh it selfe euery way; This false Angell (as S. Chrysostome saith) Found to be best fitting for his hellish enterprise and diuillish intended worke, to bee his Organe to speake by. And hauing (in spirituall mallice) subiected this Serpent to himselfe, by meanes of his Angelicall presence, & more excellent Nature, abusing it as an Instrument of falshood and treachery, he would thereby speake to the woman, addressing himselfe first of all to her, she being the weaker body, and least able to resist him.

For hee knew his strength was ouerfeeble, and his craft as yet scarce currant to deceiue the Man, but he must needs faile; except he coulde seduce him by the error of another. For as Salomon took it to be no error, when he fell to the seruice of Idols, and became an Idolatour, through the perswasions of Women his Concubins; So Adam committed the offence of transgressing Gods commandment, not as she did that spake the truth beeing seduced; but as hee yeilded for company; wherein he was no lesse fault- ty, hauing sinned with consent and per- fect knowledge.

This wicked Angell (perhaps) had a better will to haue come ro the woman in the shape of a Doue, if God would so haue permitted it. But venerable Bede saith : It was not lawfull for the euill spirit, to make that forme odious to Man, wherein the Holy-Ghost onely ought to appeare. It is not to be thought (saith Saint Augustine) that the Deuill did (of himselfe) chuse the Serpent, to tempt thereby: but (as his desire was to tempt) hee could not, but by such a Creature, as was permitted him so to doe. For will to hurt may be in any one, but the power commeth from God: he was therefore permitted to tempt by the Serpent, to the end, that therein the wo- man might take heed of his subtilty that tempted. And for this cause it is writ- ten; Sed et Serpens erat callidior cunctis ani- mantibus terra; The Serpent was more sub- tile, then any Beast of the Field.

The Serpent vnderstandeth no words, neither was partaker of reason, like as Man was: yet is hee (notwithstanding) called, most crafty, in regard of the sub- tilty of the Deuill. He hath spoken, like as Balaams Assē did; but it was by the Deuill, and the Assē by the good Angel. For good Angels & euill Angels work like operations, but then they are to di- uers effects; Before the Serpent was made the Devils Organe (saith Rupertus) for the perdition of man, he might haue beene tear- med most wise and prudent. For in another edition of the Bible, it is thus set down; And the Serpent was wise aboue all the Beasts, &c. But after that the Serpents wisdom was combined with the malice of the Deuill, and that it serued as an apt Instrument for death; he might (by better right) be tearmed cautelous and crafty. And before that his prudence lent any ayde and seruice to the Father of lying, he was such as the Disciples of Iesus Christ ought to imitate, as he him- selfe witnesseth, saying; Esto te ergo pru- dentes, sicut Serpentes; Be ye therefore wise, as Serpents.

Petrus Comestor, in his Scholasticall History saith; That at the time when the Serpent tempted the Woman, he was straitē, and went vpright like a Man; but after ward (by the curffe) he was cast down to the earth, to glide along thereon. Venerable Bede saith; The Deuill chose a Serpent, that had a face like to a Womans, Quod similia simili- bus applaudunt; That like might be pleasing ro like. Nor is the Serpent crafty or ve- nomous, because God said; Maledictus es, Thou art curffed: But God (euē in iu- diciary equity) denounced him that sen- tence for his wicked desert, and decla- red, that he was made odious to all the other Beasts and creatures of the earth. And why? Because he had bin the De- uils Minister, to the perdition of him, who had bin Created to Signorize and beare Maistry ouer all Beastes in the World. pythagoras tels vs, that the Ser- pent is engendred of the Marow which is in the Back-bone of a dead Man. And I remember, that (not long since) I read a good Authour, from whom I collec- ted these two verses:

Mutare credant humanas angue medullas.
Of putred Marrow in the backs of men, long lying dead
In Granes, some hold that Serpents, for a cert ainty are bred.*

If this be credible (as some haue very constantly auouched) a very great rea- son may be thence deriued; to wit, that as the death of Man ensued by the Ser- pent, so the Serpent receiueth life by the death of Man. Moreouer, it is ne- cessary to bee knowne, and well worth the obseruation: that those paines and punishments, pronounced by God vp- on the Serpent, he did in like manner ordaine for the Deuill, according as Ru- pertus expoundeth them in this manner. *Sub nomine Serpentis, quem inuasit Diabo- lus, ipse percutitur, & qui per superbiam suam similem se altissimo fore puta- uit, propter malitiam suam infirma Crea- tura quam ipse vitiauit, iudicatur fieri pæ- naliter similis. Great enmity betweene the Womans seed and the Serpent.

The naked sole of a Womans foote, is present death to a Serpent.

A Serpent biting a man by the sole of the foote, forthwith kills him.

Great enmities (in very deed) haue the Woman and her seed with this kind of creature; to wit, the Serpent. The seed of the Woman, that is Iesus Christ, who hath broken the head of that auncient Serpent the Deuill, As much to say; as the very print of his steps, hath abased al his vtmost practises. If the Woman do not daily actually break the head of the Serpent; yet is it neuertheless in her power continually to do it. For, if the naked sole of the foote of the Woman, can preuent the teeth of a Serpent; or, treading vpon his head neuer so lightly, forthwith he instantly dyeth: what shall we then say, when the like is not to be done (so soone and readily) by great leuers, Mallets, and Hammers, nor yet by Swordes, how sharpe soeuer they be? If on the contrary againe, the Serpent (who is so hainous to Man, that all his ayme is at his heele) do but fix his teeth on the neather part of the sole of the foote, he presently kills the man; because so soone as the venome of his bit dooth but touch the blood of a Man, it disperseth it selfe immediatly ouer all the body, and so the Serpent kills the enemy to his Nature, which is Man: Wherevpon the Poet Lucan said;

Lucan Lib. 9.

So hurtfull are the Serpents teeth, they pestilent the blood Of Man in byting, and his death can hardly be withstood.

10 Why then, looke how many kindes of Serpents there be, so many feuerall venoms there be, so many colours, so many torterings; and as many diuersities, so many dangers; yea, so many deaths. It shall not be any great sweruing from the matter, if now wee declare (in this place) what is signified by the flaming Sword, and the Cherubins set for the safety of Paradise. We vnderstand by the flaming Sword, the sentence of the Iudgement of God, which is said to be flaming: In flamma ignis dabitis vindictam; In flaming Fire rendring vengeance, saith the Apostle. Vndoubtedly, the Iudgement of GOD, is the Iudgement of the flame of Fire, for auengement of them that haue liued wickedly. Cherubin, is the Name of the Angelicall forces; that were placed without the Garden of Paradise, to guard the entrance to the Tree of Life; plainly to demonstrate, that wee cannot haue access to the Kingdome of Heauen, except we first passe through the fierie tryals of infinite afflictions, and be examined by the Ministry of the holy Angels. Saint Paule saith; Si quis autem super aedificat super fundamentum hoc, aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosus, ligna, faenum, stipulam: Vniuscuiusque opus manifestum erit, dies enim Domini declarabit, qui in igne reuelabitur, & vniuscuiusque opus quale sit, ignis probabit. And if any Man build on this Foundation, Gold, Silver, precious Stones, Timber, Hay, Stubble: Euery Mans worke shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it, because it shall be reuealed by the Fire, and the Fire shall try euery mans worke, of what sort it is. How can wee otherwise gather from these wordes, but that they may be applied to the Flaming Sword, placed at the entrance of earthly Paradise. As signifying, that we must passe through the fires of many sharp afflictions, which try our actions to the vitermost; how, and in what maner they haue bin done; and being thus examined in those fierie tryals, the words of the Pſalmiſt may be ſpoken to vs. Quoniam probaſti nos Deus, igne nos examinaſti, ſicut examinatur argentum. For thou (ô God) haſt prooued vs, thou haſt tried vs, as Siluer is tryed.

So many kinds of Serpents, so many perils to mans life.

And by good reaſon are the Angels there placed, called Cherubins; that is to ſay, Fulneſſe of Knowledge: becauſe they are filled with Knowledge to Iudge, knowing whatſoever is written of vs in the Books; that is to ſay, they haue ſto- red vp in memory whatſoever we haue done, either good or euill. They read them ouer daily, & at length, will be re- hearded that which is written in thoſe Bookes, according as it is ſaid in Daniel; And the Bookes were opened. The Fire of this brandiſhed flaming Sword, is vn- acceſſible of vs Mortals. For they that haue gone vpward the Riuer of Nylus, to finde the Spring thereof, haue bene hindred from the effect of their deſire, in regard of a ſmouldring fiery vapour, which they haue not bene able to en- dure: as Lucan ſaith, diſcourſing on the ſiue Zones of Heauen; Nilum videre ca- lentem; It is hot to ſee Nylus.

And becauſe we are entred into this diſcourſe, which appertaineth ſo eſpe- cially to the third Chapter of Genefis; let mee not forget, what I haue not long ſince read, in an Italian Authour, called Leo Hebraico, a great Philoſopher, who in his Philoſophy of Loue, doth make an Allegoricall and Morrall ſenſe of moſt of that Chapter, which out of Italian I haue thus tranſlated. The Serpent (ſaith he) is the carnall Appetite, which inci- teth and firſt deceiueth the Corporall Feminine part. It is called Corporall, when it is found any way deuied from the intellect, which is tearmed the Huſ- band, reſiſting againſt his ſtriſt & ſeuere Lawes, to acquaint her ſelfe with carnal Delectations, and darken her Natiue ſplendour, with acquisition of ſuperfluous and abounding riches or treaſures. Then by ſenſuality (which is the Tree of knowing good and euill) ſhe ſhewes him thereby, that their eyes are to be opened; that is to ſay, that they would know many thinges of that Nature, as thoſe are, which is ſhewne them in the Tree of good and Euill, and (which be- fore) they knew not at all; to wit, ma- ny ſubtilties, cautels, and other notices, appertaining to Lubricity and Auarice.

Hereof they neuer dreamed before, vn- till it was tolde them, that they ſhould be herein like vnto God; to wit, in an a- bounding Generation. For, as God is the intelligent, and the heauens are pro- ductiue cauſes of Creatures to Men heere on earth: euen ſo man, by means of continuall Carnall Meditations, at- taineth to the encreasing of a great Li- nage. In which point, the Feminine bo- dily part, not only ſuffers her ſelfe to be ruled and guided (as reaſon requireth) by her vnderſtanding Huſband: but ſhee drawes him further alſo, euen into the quagmire of Corporall occaſions, to eate (with her) the Fruite of the for- bidden Tree. Whereupon, immediatly their eyes are then opened, not onely their intellectuall eyes, (which they ſhould rather ſtill haue kept cloſed) but thoſe beſides of corporall fantaſie, con- cerning carnall and laſciuious actions. And by this meanes, they perceiue the- ſelues to be naked; that is to ſay, they know the diſobedience of carnall deeds to the Intellect: and therefore, procure to couer the Generatiue Members, as ſhamefull Rebels to reaſon & wiſdome.

Afterward it is ſaid, that hearing the voyce of God, immediatly they hid themſelues; as much to ſay, that know- ing and acknowledging what Diuine thinges they had forſaken, they grew a- ſhamed, and ſo ſubſequentially to ſin, ſuc- ceeded the pain. Alſo the holy Hiſtory, doth ſeparately recite the appointed pu- niſhments; of the Serpent, of the Wo- man, and of the Man. The Serpent was curſed, beyond any other beaſt or crea- ture, to crawle along vpon his belly, and to eate duſt all his life time; enmity be- ing put betweene the Woman and her race on the one ſide, and the Serpent & his race on the other ſide. So that Man ſhould breake the head of the ſaide Ser- pent, and the Serpent bruife the heele of the Man. Whereby may bee vnder- ſtood, that the carnall appetite of Man, is much more immeaſurable, then in a- ny other Creature. And whereas the Serpent drags his belly on the earth, it implyeth, that hee thereby makes the hart of man to encline to earthly thinges, ſhun- ning ſuch as bee high and hea- uenly. And to eate duſt all his life time, becauſe hee nourisheth himſelfe with thoſe thinges which are more baſe and abieſt and abiect then dust. As for the hate & enmity betweene them; it signifieth, that the carnall appetite soileth the corporall part, & defaceth it by ouer-flowing excesse, whereby doe ensue many bodily imperfections; as also diuers kinds of death. Likewise, by this means, the carnall appetite becommeth defeated, enfeebled, loosing it selfe by the intemperance of the complexion, and diseases of the body.

The Woman sentenced to plurality of paines.

As for the Woman, who was punished by plurality of paines in her Conceptions, & to bring forth her children with teares and lamentations, and yet to haue desire to her Husband, he hauing the only absolute power ouer her: Of this we may say, that a lasciuious life procureth the anguish of the Body all pleasures to be dolorous, & their whole race or off-spring filled with pain, trouble and afflictions. Neuerthelesse, the louing the intellectuall part, as beeing her Husband in him remains the intellectuall power (aboue her) to rule and temper it, aptest to the actions of the body. In the next place commeth the Man, who hauing heard and giuen consent to the wordes of his Wife, and eaten the fruite of the forbidden Tree; he must also be punished. God said vnto him, that the earth should be accursed for his sake; In trauaile and paine should he Till it all his life time; It should bring forth Thornes and Thistles to him; He should feede on the Hearbs of the field, and eate his Bread in the sweate of his Browes, vntill hee were returned into that earth, fro whence he had bin taken.

The sentence pronounced against the Man.

Terrestrial things are dangerous to the vnderstanding part: as appeareth in the degrees of Mans punishments.

Hereof we may easily apprehend the Moral meaning; to wit, that Terrestrial things are cursed to the Intellect. They are meats of sadnesse, greefe, and heauinesse; that is to say, they striue to make Immortality partaker of Mortall things, and (by accident of earthly actions) they do wound and pierce that supream part, euen with Thornes, as it were. His food should be the Grasse & Hearbs of the field (which meat belongeth only to brute Beastes) because he gaue ouer his better life, soly to sensuality. Then, if he will eate any Bread, he must do it in the sweate of his Browes, labouring and trauailing: As much to say; As, if he haue a desire to eate Mans meat, & not that as the Beastes do; or, if he would differ from them in manly actions; it should be very difficult for him so to doe, because of the contrary habitude, which he had already taken in brutish sensuality. It is also saide vnto him, that all these perturbations shal happen to him for his sin, vntill such time as he returne into the earth, from whence he was at first deriued. And so much the rather, because beyond all other things, (created only Mortall) he was made immortal: yet coueting to be but Earth and Dust (in hunting after Corporall finnes) this is the occasion that he must returne into dust, euen as he was at the beginning, resembling (in Mortality) the other Beasts of the earth. Whereby we gather, the pain & damnatiō of him, that giues himselfe wholly to sensuality.

The Text continuing on, saith; that Adam named his wife Eua, which name by Interpretation, is a talking, babling Creature: And Wife, because shee was the Mother of all things. To let vs vnderstand, that he named the Corporall part by a name common to brute beasts, in regard she was the cause, to produce all brutish abuse in Man. It denoteth withall, that God subiected their Intellect, and (of Contemplatiue) it became Actiue, basely to vnderstand and listen to the Bodies actions. Heerevpon they began to enstruct their vnderstanding in Arts, to make Garments of Beastes skins to couer them. Then are they expelled out of Paradise, to goe labour in the Earth; that is to say, Contemplation was taken from them; and they must now vnderstand Terrestrial things: neuerthelesse, power was yet left them, to eate of the Tree of Life, and so to liue eternally. To which effect the Text saith; That God placed on the East side of Paradise, the Cherubins and the flaming Sword, to guard the way of the Tree of Life. Where, the Cherubins doe signifie the two Angelicall intelligences concerning Man; to wit, the Agent, and the passible. And the flaming Sword which shaketh without Intermission, signifieth our humane fantasie; who returning from the Corporal, to seek the glorious light of the spirituall, games thereby this perswasion; that at length, leauing the corrupt way of Dust and Ashes, she may humbly attain the spirituall way to the Tree of Life, to liue in Eternity Intellectually. CHAP. XI.

Of Death, and that God neuer was the Ma-ker or Authour thereof.

After that our first Parents were expelled out of Paradise, they were brought vnder the subiection of Sin and Death, and (in them) all their whole posterity therevnto appointed. For Death is common to all Men, as it is said in the Law Licet, in Code, De pactis. And all Men must dye, concerning their Bodies. The Royall Prophet David saith; Quis est homo qui uiuet, & non uidebit mortem? What Man liueth, and shall not see Death? Statutum est omnibus semel mori; It is ordained to all Men once to dye: So saith the blessed Apostle Saint Paule: And a Greeke Poet saith; ἅπαντες ἀποικαίθανεῖν ὀφείλου.

All Mortall men to dye is necessary.

Death (saith Saint Augustine, in his Booke against the Pelagians) Is nothing else but a priuation of life, hauing a Name, and no Essence. As hunger is said to bee defect of food; Thirst, lacke of Drinke; Darknesse, the absence of Light: euen so, Death is but a Name for want of life. There may be another diffinition made of naturall Death, as to say; that it is the separation of the Soule and the Body, and plato makes vs such a diffinition thereof: As in like manner doth Aulus Gellius, saying; ὄματ' ἔνα' ψυχῆς διάλις. Death then hauing a Name without Essence, God was not the Creator thereof, neither cause nor Authour, for all things that God made, had Essence. Which tearme of Essence, comprehendeth that which is, or that is to be born. Most true it is, that for the punishment of Sinne, God pronounced the sentence of death against Man: but there is great difference, betweene pronouncing the sentence of Death, and to bee the cause of Death. They are the wordes of Salomon, and not mine; Deus mortem non fecit, nec latatur in perdi one uiuorum. God hath not made Death, neyther hath he pleasure in the destruction of the liuing. Creauit enim, ut essent omnia, & sanabiles fecit nationes orbis terrarum; For he created all thinges, that they might haue their beeing, and the Generations of the World are preserved. But in another place he saith; Inuidia autem Diaboli mors intrauit in orbem terrarum. Through enuy of the Deuill came Death into the World.

10 The Deuill then being the Authour of Sinne, is also the Authour of Death, by Sinne. The Deuill could incite Man to sin, but he could not constraime him to yeelde consent. ADAM could keepe himselfe well enough from tasting the Tree of Life; but Gods will was, that he should not sinne, and so (consequently) would not haue him to dye. But leauing Life, and taking Death, and following then the free liberty of his will, he made himselfe Mortall, and his fault and disobedience was the cause of Death to him, and all men else beside. The Apostle Saint Paule saith; Propterea sicut per unum hominem peccatum in hunc mundum intrauit, & per peccatum mors: & ita in omnes homines mors pertransit in quo omnes peccauerunt. Wherefore, as by one Man Sin entred into the World, and Death by Sinne: and so went Death ouer all men, forasmuch as all men haue sinned.

20 We haue then nothing more certaine or assured, then Death; neuertheless, the day and the houre thereof is most vncertain to vs: when, in what place, or how a Man is to dye, that only is in the Will, Power, and Knowledge of God. It is an wholesome and profitable thing for a Christian Man, to haue Death in his remembrance by contiual Meditation, and very often to thinke thereon: in regard, that as the forgetfulness of Death, is the cause of a Mans falling into Sinne, so the Memory thereof, turneth him quite from Sinne. Iesus the Sonne of Sirach saith; In omnibus operibus tuis memorare nouissima tua, et in aeternum non peccabis. Whatsoeuer thou takest in hand, remember the end, and thou shalt neuer sinne. And the Kingly Psalmist saith; Cogitari dies antiquos: & annos aternos in mente habui. Et meditatus sum nocte cum corde meo & exercitabar, & scopebam spiritum meum. I considered the daies of old, and the yeares of ancient time. I called to remembrance my Song in the night, I communed with mine owne heart, and Therefore watch and pray, for ye know not at what hour the Lord will come; let vs so labour, that he may finde vs ready, to drinke the same bitter draught, whereunto (in our first Parents) we are made subiect.

CHAP. XII.

The strange opinion of the Egyptians, concerning the scope of a mans life time, judging it by the proportion of the heart.

That whereof I am now to speake, may seeme a nouelty to many, and fabulous to diuers others, because it is a matter very difficult to be prooued: Nor do I purpose to binde my selfe, to iustifie or maintaine the truth thereof; albeit (in my iudgement) their authority that haue written on the same Argument, may graunt it for true, or very likely. Pliny, and Marcus Varro, discoursing on the time of a Mans life, do affirme; that the learned Egyptians had found out by experience, that Man (according to the course of Nature) could not liue aboue an hundred yeares. But if any one happened to out-step that limitation; it was iudged by particular influence, and power of the Starres, a thing (in Natures worke) very strange and maruailous.

The Foundation of this their settled perswasion, they gathered and conceiued by the hart of a Man, which hauing made prooffe of many times, by order of Anatomy; they thereby attained to the knowledge of very wonderfull secrets. For, say they; when a Man-Childe is a full yeare old, his heart poyzeth the weight of two of their Drams: Foure when hee is two yeares old, and so onward (as many yeares as hee liues) his heart encreaseth in weight a couple of Drammes yearely. So that when hee commeth to the age of fifty yeares, his heart then weigheth an hundred dramms. But thence forward, it is not more ponderous, but proportionably diminisheth his weight (ratably eucry yeare)

by two Drammes, euen according as before it encreased. So that at the age of an hundred yeares, the heart (by continuall decreasing) becomes to bee nothing in poize; and then (consequently) the man of necessity dies, if (by some other accidentall occasion) he dye not before: Because there are so many kinds of seuerall occasions, which can and do customarily hasten death, before men arriue at halfe the time of making this experiment in themselves.

If this do seeme strange to any of vs, yet let it be held for infallible, that the Egyptians obserued it as most certaine, according as these recited Authors doe auouch, beside others likewise liuing in our times; as Caelius Rodiginus alledging Dioscorides, speakes thereof (among other) many notable things. The like doth Petrus Crinitus, in his Book of honest Discipline. Galiot de Nargni, in his Booke of Man; and Cornelius Agrippa. I thought good to acquaint you with these seuerall Testimonies, because (with many) the matter is hard to be credited; therefore let euery man lend beliefe, as to himselfe seemeth best.

And in regard we are now discoursing on the Heart of Man, wherein doth consist such infinite excellencies, euen in that one litle part, because we would be loath to handle one point single or alone; let vs learne somewhat of that woorthy Phylosopher Aristotle, who saith; The Heart of Man is lodged on the left side in his body, but in all other creatures, it is naturally in the midst of their brest; and this doth he affirme in his first Booke of the nature of Beasts. It is also a common receiued opinion among naturall Phylosophers, that the very first part which is formed of Man, is the Heart, as the maine roote of al his other members; the Spring or Fountaine of Natural heat; & it is also the only member, that last looseth his mouing, and dyeth in man. It is a member so Noble & Delicate, as it can endure no touching, but presently the man dies.

Pliny reciteth another maruaile, which yet he maintaineth to happen many times; to wit, that men haue bin found with their Hearts rough or Hayrie; and he that hath it so, is a valiaunt man, and stoutly disposed. As was experimented in the dissection of Aristomenes.

menes, who with his owne hand flew (in one battaile) three hundred Lacedemonians; and escaping (afterward) manie great perils, only by means of his great valour, being dead, he was opened, and h's heart found to be very hayry. Suetonius Tranquillus, in the life of Caligula, (and Pliny also saith the same) that if a man dye by poyson, his Heart cannot bee burned, although it be throwne into the verie hottest fire; according as was verified by the Hart of Germanicus, the Father of Caligula; and the like hath bin tried, by such as haue died of Cardiaca, the Heart-ake, which some do term the falling sicknesse.

Moreouer, it is to be noted, that the strength of Laughter or laughing, abideth in the little Skinnes or Celles of the Heart. In approbation whereof, ancient Historians writing of the Romain Gladiatores, Fencers, or Sword-players, do affirme; that they being wounded in those folds, or thinne Wrappers of the Heart, thinges haue falne out at those Wounds, like little Threds, and they haue dyed in extreamity of Laughter. Now, euen as ioy or laughter proceedeth from the Heart, so likewise is Sadnesse and Melancholy thence deriued sensibly; and good or euill immaginations in like manner. Our Words are begotten in it; And many are of Opinion, that it is the principall seate and residence of the Soule: which seemes to be confirmed by the saying of our Sauiour himselfe, That badde and wicked thoughts do come out of the Heart. And that which enters at the Mouth, defileth not at al, because they are but thinges indifferent. Likewise, venerable Bede, in his Commentaries vpon Saint Marke, saith; The cheefest seat of the soule is not in the Braine, according as Plato hath maintained; but in the Heart, agreeing with the speeches of our Sauiour Christ.

CHAP. XIII.

The Reason wherefore Man goeth vpright. Why hee is more waighty fasting, then when he hath taken som sustenance: And the cause why he is heauier when hee is dead, then being aliuie: With many other speciall Observations.

Contemplatiue occasions, which do concerne the composition of men, are wel neer infinit. Lactantius Firmianus hath thereof Written a Booke by himselfe, only touching that argument, & so haue diuers other learned men done the like. And in truth, there is one thing (among the plentiful store of others) that deserueth periculer consideration in the knowledge thereof, that is; wherefore God hath made all other creatures (Man only excepted) with their heades stooping or bending downward, with their eies (for the greater part) looking to the earth: & not onely sensitiue creatures, such as are brute beasts; but likewise the vegetatiue Bodies; as Plants, Trees, and such like, who haue their heads & foundations within the earth, and their armes or branches highly extended. As for man, he onely was created with his eies vp toward heauen, his face aloft, and his body strait, in eleuated proportion. Now albeit, for a full and compleat reason in this case, it were sufficient to aledge the wil of God to haue it so; yet it seemeth beside, to relish and tast of some hidden Misterie or secrecy, and therefore it wel deserueth to haue further speculation.

To begin then with our very disposition; me thinkes it teacheth vs by manifest apparance, that we were not created or borne for the earth; but rather, that the purpose of our creation, was to imitate and contemplate high and celestiall matters, which are not comunicable to other creatures, neither are they capable of them, or any (but man only) worthy to behold them. God made all the beasts with their heads deiccted, declaring thereby, that man had the rule & command ouer them. One of these reasons is most elegantly noted by Lactantius Firmianus, saying; God hauing determined to make man for Heauen, & all other creatures for the earth; he created man of a reasonable soule, strait, and with an erected body, disposed to Celestiall Contemplations; to the end, that hee might admire their effects, and hold in reuerence the place of his Originall, and the Countrey of his Natiuity. The other Beastes hee made Base, Crooked, and bending downe vnto the Earth, because they haue no participation in Heauen. Aristotle who had not so much as the very glimpse glimpse of light, concerning faith, saith; That only Man (among all other Creatures) goeth vpright, because that his substance & best part thereof, are Celestiall, and not Terrestriall; and that the Office of Diuine Spirits, is to vnderstand and know. But heerein man could neuer haue knowne how to exercise himselfe, if he had had a heauy, huge, and deiected bodie, because the waight and burthen of such corporall sense, doth nothing but make the vnderstanding dull and slothful. The learned Thomas Aquinas, forgetting nothing in discursion & examining, leaues not this question without determination. For, in his exposition vppon Youth and Age, he saith; For two causes was man formed vpright towards Heauen. The one, to be the most perfect of all the creatures, & to be he that most pertaketh and neereſt approacheth to the quality of Heauen. The other, because that in the proportion of his body, he is more hot then any other Beast; & the Nature of heat, is, to lift vp it selfe. All other creatures do containe a meane, as lesse participating of the Celestiall quality, and lesse haue they of this heate, whereby to eleuate themselues: for this cause, they are not in disposition or shape like vnto the glorious Image of Man.

Heerein it appeareth, that Thomas Aquinas followed the opinion of the Platonists, who held, That heate and the Spirits of man (wherin he aboundeth more then any liuing thing, regard being had of the proportion of his body) are the causes why he goeth eleuated and vpright, as he doth. For, by meanes of the strength and vigor of his Spirits and Blood, he listeth and vprighteth himselfe: wherein also hee is holpen by the composition of the Elements, whereof man is composed in such equality and measure of waight, as he can erect and mount vp himselfe. And something else there is in this case to be considered, to wit; that partly in regard of his soule, and partly of his body, man is moued to the loue and contemplation of Heauen; therefore, hee ought to thinke & consider of nothing, but high, spirituall, and good matters; and contrarywise, to contemne and despise base earthly businesſes. Neuerthelesse, many times we are so affected to the abiect respect of worldly considerations, that when our eies and countenances are fixed on Heauen, our hearts and spirits are too too low humbled vpon earth.

Concerning the propriety of the Spirits of man, whereof we haue now treated, Pliny aledgeth another thing, which though it be not of such importance as the others are, yet it cannot but giue pleasing and content to such as know it not, or haue not so much as dreamed, on that which dayly experience maketh manifest: he saith, That a man being dead, waigheth heauier then when hee is liuing; and the same he maintaineth in al other kinde of Creatures. Hee likewise affirmeth, That a man that hath eatē any thing, weigheth lesse then he did when he was Fasting. Erasmus in a certaine Problem of his, doth say as much, with diuers other notable things, alledging the same Reasons as Pliny doth; which are all grounded on the Essence of the vitall Spirits, and the Ayre, which comforts & cheers them vp, as we haue before approued. The like is said of a man fasting, that his waight is then more ponderous, then when he hath eaten; albeit it appears in common iudgement, that he should be then lightest, because refection hath more charged him.

And yet notwithstanding, it is so for certaine, and there is no maruell to be made thereat, for drinking and eating do encrease those vitall Spirits which giue cherrishing to man, enlarging and multiplying naturall heate within him. And hence commeth it, that when one man essaicth to lift vp another from the ground, if he that is lifted vp be so pleased, he may make himselfe the heauier, by breathing forth abundantly the inward Ayre in his body: but if he retain and hold it in, hee makes himselfe then to be the lighter. So when a man runneth, he retaineth his breath onely, to hast him away the more speedily: for, the Ayre being a very light Element, coueteth to raite him the loftier in running, euen vnto his ayery place of abiding.

Experience heerein may be a present Tutor, by any Skin or Bladder, which being throwne into the Water empty, and not blowne vp with Ayre, sinketh of it selfe forthwith to the bottom: but let it bee filled with ayre, which is the breath of man, it floateth lightly on the face of the water. Pliny also telleth vs, that that a body dead in the water, if it be of a man, in rising, he hath his face vp towards Heauen; but if it be of a woman, she ariseth with her face downeward; wherein she may giue some honour to Nature, for so wise and discrete a provision, so to conceale the vnfighly Secrets of the Woman. Beyond al this, there is yet another naturall reason, to wit; that a Woman weigheth heauiest in her fore-part, by reason of hir breasts; and a man heauiest behinde, because of his shouldets.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Supreme Dignity of the Head above all other Members of the Body. That it is an euill signe to haue a little Head, or a strait breast. And whence it came, that it is accounted as a courtesie and honor, to take off the Cap or Bonnet, in saluting one another.

If it bee such an excellent preheminance, that Man among all other creatures hath his bodye of vpright stature, and his face aduanced to beholde Heauen, as his Hart also to meditate on Heauenly Matters; why then vndoubtedly, the head, which is the most eminent, lawdable, & highest part among all the others members, by reason, ought to haue aduantage & authority about the rest. And in verie deed, all the other parts are but as guardes and obedient Seruants to him; because, so soone as any harme or annoyance happeneth to the Head; presently the Foot, the Hand, the Arme, and all the other Members beside, do naturally endeouour for his helpe and defence. For in him consisteth the security of them all; in regard, that if the head bee diseased, all the other parts of the bodie, do feele the smart thereof.

The Head ought to haue preheminece ouer the other members.

Ambrose in Epist. 24.

Saint Ambrose giues vs an especiall Comendation of the Head, sayeng; The facture and composition of the Bodie, is a weere example of the whole world. And as Heauen is the most eminent and principall part, and the ayre and the other Elements thereto inferiour: so is the Head of Man su- preame to the other parts, as being their Governour, Lord and Maister; because they are but as a Casile or Cittadell, seated vnder a maine Rocke, in the midst of a Citty. In him lodgeth wisdom and Industry, which gouerneth euery part of the body; from him, both power and prudence is deriued, and (as Salomon saith) The eyes of the Wiseman is in his head. Lactantius Firmianus saith, The Lord there placed the Head of man, to the end, that in him might remaine the Empire and Gouernement ouer all the Beasts. Galen giues the Head the principality ouer all the other members of man. And Plato in his Timeus, nameth it The whole Body of Man. Being then of so great importance, and the Sanctuarie of the bodies Sences, and Powers; it were necessary that his forme and greatnesse, should be proportionable & fitting for such a potent priuiledge.

Belike it was vpon this Reason, that Paulus Eginetus saide in the first of his Bookes of Physicke: The ouer-little Head of a man, is a signe that hee hath very little Iudgement, and wanteth a good Brain. The same Reason is alledged by Iohannes Alexandrinus, saying; The little Head is as vnhealthfull, as the strait brest lockt vp and chested: Because that as the breast is the lodging of the Hart and Lungs, who cannot (without great danger) endure a strict enclosure, in regard that the hart being narrowly shut vp, cannot conueniently mooue it selfe, but looseth and diminisheth his Natural heat; and beside, decayeth al digestion: Euen so, in like manner, it behooueth, that the Head or dwelling place of the Organs, belonging to so many powers and vnderstandings, should be of a competent proportion. Galen affirmeth the very same, & maintaineth, That a little Head, is a manifest token of little intelligence, and an vnstable Brain; So that a Head of a good and indifferent proportion, signifieth a free and liberall vnderstanding.

The Naturall Phylosophers say, that a man hauing his Head trenched or bowed inward, cannot liue long. And if a man haue his Head cut off, whereby he cannot mooue or goe; yet, it is not through defect of respiration, but because all his Nerues are cut in sunder in the suprem place; and they are the Instruments and wayes of all the Bodyes Motions, euen as they are in all other Creatures liuing. after his Head was ſmitten off, hee wallous, then Naturall. Among all other liuing Creatures (as Pliny auoucheth) Man only, and a Horſe, do becom ſoo-neſt Hoary and white-headed, eſpecialcauſe he hath his Head rounder, higher aduanced, and cleaner from putrifaction, is therefore the more ſure & ſtrong in his Head; where contrariwiſe, who ſo ſauoureth moſt of imperfect moyſture, is commonly of weakeſt and ſlen-

We read of diuers worthy and valiant men, who haue had their Heades ſo ſolid, ſound, and well affected, that they could go daily bare and diſcouered. As among others: Iulius Caſar, Hanniball of who wold neuer couer his Head, either in his oldeſt age, nor yet for rain, ſnow, rough ſtormes and winds, or parching of the Emperours, Adrian and Seuerus, with diuers other of the ſame diſpoſition. And ſeeing we haue ſpoken ſo much of the Head, methinkes it were good likewiſe to know for what reaſon, and whence it enſued, that it was reputed for a courteſie, when one man tooke off his Bonnet or Hat before another, in ſigne of Reuerence; and that it was ſo conceiued, if a man diſcouered his head:

we will therefore not forbear to ſpeak ſomwhat thereof, although it may ſeem but of ſlender conſequence.

Plutarch ſaith in his Problemes, that in his opinion, this is the reaſon. In Ancient time (ſaith he) he which offered ſacrifice vnto the Goddeſſe, kept his Bonnet on his Head al the while. And that Princes and worthy perſonages, to do courteſie and Honor to the Sacrificer, in regarde of his high function, would (in humble manner) diſco-uer their heads before him: becauſe it ſhould not appeare, that they would preſume to paragon his ſupream authority, or equalize themſelues with the Goddeſſe; but ſatisfied both thus, in honouring their Sacrificer. He further tels vs, that it was the uſe, that when a man met his enemy, or any other that he hated, if his head had bene bare before, either by heate or otherwiſe, he would inſtantly couer it, in deſpight (as it were) of him, And yet he thought it fitting, that before his Prince or Friend, he ſhould be bare.

Marcus Varro, agreeing with Pliny, 10 faith and maintaines it; that at the firſt beginning heereof, it was not doone in regard of awe or reuerence, that men diſcouered their Heads in the preſence of Magiſtrates: but only, that through want of wearing their Bennets, they might make themſelues more health-full, ſtrong, and hardy; for which cauſe only, and to ſhew themſelues ſuch, they bared theit heads; and not for any duty, 20 as hath bin imagined. Galiottus of Nargni, is of opinion, that when a man diſcouereth his head to do any one honor, he giues therby alſo to vnderſtand, that in baring the principall, beſt, and moſt worthy member of Man, he offers and puts himſelfe into his power, whom he ſalutes; as ſaying and confeſſing to bee and Science of the liuing God onely. True it is, that the good Angelles haue an intelligence of future occasions, yet not in their owne Nature, but according as God giues it them by reuelatiō. The Devils also do sometimes foresee what is to ensue, yea a long time before it hapneth, by disposition of the celestially and inferiour bodies; like as men do sometimes foretell by knowledge in Astrology, bad and sterile seasons, from fruitfull and plenteous. As Thales Milesius (by meanes of the Stars) foretolde the abundance of Oliues which should be the yeare following. Somtimes likewise, the euill Dæmons or Spirits, doe presage future matters, by coniecture only, and then their predictions do euer fall out to the contrary. For it is their habit and custome, to mingle lyes with truth, to the end, that they may the more easily perswade the falshoode. Euen in like manner, as they vse to do, that are preparing a poyson, they mingle it with Wine, Hony, or some sweet thing, that the deadly venome may be couered & hidden vnder the sweet shadow: & it doth not a little delight those peruerse spirits, when they can any way abuse the credulity of men, by lying, in their Mystical prædictions of things to happen.

Wee finde it written in the second Booke of Kings, that an euill spirit being desirous to deceiue Achab King of Israel, said to the Eternall; I will go out, and be a false Spirit in the Mouthes of all his Prophets. Wherewith the Prophets of Achab being instructed, they and the lying Spirit assured him, that hee should haue the victory against the Assyrians. And yet notwithstanding, Achab was slaine in that battell, according to the words of the true Prophet Micheas. Porphirius saith, That the Goddess do often lye, & that the certaine foresight of future things, is not only oblique and vncuen to men, but likewise most vncertaine to the Goddess themselves, being full of many ambiguities. Nor indeed were the Gods of the Gentiles (wherof Porphirius thus spake) any other then wicked Dæmons or Spirits, as plainly may be noted by the name of Belzebub, as much to say, as God or lord of Flies; the Idoll of whom, was adored by the Accaronites.

Moreouer, the Devils are said to bee learned, and haue knowledge in the Sacred Scriptures, as appeareth in the gospell of S. Mathew; where it is declared, that Sathan brought our Saviour into the holy City, and hauing set him vpon the Pinnacle of the Temple, he said vnto him; Si filius Dei es, mitte te deorsū: Scriptum est enim, quia angelis suis mandauit de te, & in manibus tollent te, ne forte offendas ad lapidē pedem tuum. If thou be the Son of God, cast thy selfe downe, for it is writtē, that he wil giue his Angels charge ouer thee, & with their hands they shal lift thee vp, lest at any time thou shouldst dash thy foot against a stone. Which allegation of scripture, Sathan had borrowed, or rather stoln from Dauid, in his 91. Psalme, where the verie words are likewise set downe.

The good Father Athanasius recordeth, that an holy Religious man, discovered diuers subtilties of the Deuil, and acquainted therewith sundry of his louing Brethren, saying vnto thē, among other of their qualities, in this manner: It is their custome also, to sing very melodiously, and yet are not seene; With their impure mouths (O horrible guile) they meditate and talke of holy Scriptures. When wee are reading in them, like Ecchoes they wil often make aunswere to our last wordes, &c. Heereby wee may perceiue, that those vnclean Spirits do vnderstand the scriptures, but they apply them (by false exposition) to their own wicked purpose.

50 Long before our Saviour and Redeemer Iesus Christ suffered vpon the Crosse, the signe of the crosse was regarded and esteemed, as a Prognosticke sign, fatall and ominous to some. But the Egyptians caused it to be engrauen on the breasts of their Idoll Scrapis, which they reuerenced and honoured noured as their God. But for our better manifestation, how much this Figure hath bin respected; it is expedient first to know, that the ancient Arabians, who were most skilfull in iudgement of the Heavens, and the powerfull influences of the Starres, did vse to make (for many causes) Images and figures Carued in Stones, Mettals, Rings, & other things, for obseruation of certain pointes, and dayes of marke or note; whereof we purpose to speake in more conuenient place. Among all which signes, they most especially affected that of the Crosse, as attributing more efficacy and Vertue thereto, then they did to any of the other; because therby they compassed the knoledge of darke secrets, which with great curiosity they concealed to themselves, and hardly would impart to their children or dearest friends.

I purpose not to meddle with the opinion of Marsilius Ficinus, describing it in diuers manners, because the price of our redemption was paid thereon; but doe meane to consider the figure of the Crosse in it selfe meere. For in Geometrical contemplation, it is allowed to be a most excellent & perfect figure, because it containeth (in it self) an equal length and largeness. It is composed of two strait lines, euery way equall; the ioynture whereof, as it is taken by his Center, shapeth by his points & yt most reaches, an absolute perfect roundure. It containeth foure seuerall corners, directly each way extended, wherein is the greatest effects of the stars, because they haue the greater force and Vertue when they are extended to their extremities, and come nearest to the corners of East, West, North, and South: and being so seated, their very splendor then shapeth it selfe in signe of a Crosse, if with wary iudgement it be duely considered. Moreover, I could shew the reason wherefore the Egyptians so esteemed it beyond all their other markes and figures, & what signification they made therof: but my meaning is to speak first of some other of their Images, as also of their Hieroglyphicall Characters, with their purport and interpretation.

Before the Egyptians knew any letters, they wrote their intentions by Figures, Carracters, and Ciphers of diuers things; as Birds, Beasts, Trees, or by some of their owne perticular members; wherein they grew to be so prompt and ready, as they quickly apprehended the signification of any thing, onely by the frequent vse made thereof; the Father first instructing his Sonne, and so discending from one succession to another, as is witnessed by Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Diodorus Siculus, from whom, and from many places of Plinie, I haue Collected some scantlings of their reasons.

First of all, by the Gripe, they vnderstood Nature, because (say they) of that kind of Fowle, they neuer knew a male: the same affirmeth Amianus Marcellinus. By the Hawke or Falcon, they intended such things as were to be done quick & expeditiously, figuring this their meaning, by the swiftnesse and celeritie of the Fowle. By the Bee, they vnderstood the Dignity of a King; because (sayde they) a King ought to haue both Honey and a sting. By the Basiliske or Serpent, that round circled it selfe with his taile in his mouth, they figured the reuolution of the year, because it endeth where it beginneth. The Wolfes head, pointed at time being past; in regarde, that Beast hath no memory, but is all for the instant. The Lyons head, figured the time present, because of his power and imperious command. They set downe the head of a Dogge, licking his chaps with his Tongue, whereby they presented time to come, for euermore, our succeeding hopes do make vs to cherish them very carefully. The Oxe, signified the Earth, in regard of the great labour of the Beast. Iustice was Charactered by the Storke, for they alledged, (and many more haue affirmed as much) that this Bird dooth Iustice and Equity to his begger, feeding and cherishing him in his age, as the other first had nourished him, and brought him vppe diligently in his Nest.

They described Enuy by the Eele, because it neuer keepe company with other Fishes. The Liberall Man, was figured by a Right-Hand wide open: As contrariwise, the auaricious Niggard was, by a Left-Hand close gripte. The Crocodile, being a Beast of very vile qualities, by him they presupposed a deceitfull wicked man. The Eye figured wide open, gaue demonstratio of the man, who was a dilligent obseruer of iust actions. By the ear they vnderstood memory. And a man that was of exquisite memory, of him they gaue notice by the shape of a Hare, hauing both her cares wide open, and her eies bent forward. And thus could they discourse on all things, by practise and experience in such like retemblaunces, euen aswell as if they had bene written to them in Letters.

We returne now againe to our former speeches of the Crosse, holding it somewhat memorable, that among so many other seueral signes, it only shold be the most euident and knowne Character. And they placed it on the brest of their Idoll God, to signifie their future hope of Happinesse; and prognosticating (as it were) so long before, what vniuersall vse should afterwarde bee made thereof; as in adorning the wreaths and Diadems of Emperours, Kings, and other Potentates; the beautie of their stampes and Coines: but especially, the distinguishing of Christians, from barbarous Infidels. So speaketh Ruffinus in his Ecclesiastical History, and Petrus Criuitus the like, in his seuenth Booke of honest Discipline, as also Marsilius Ficinus before alledged. But contrariwise, among the Romain Iewes, and other such like people, the death of the Crosse was reputed most ignominious. And Constantine the Emperor, was the first that prohibited the condemned to death, from being any longer crucified; because GOD had miraculously shewne him in a Crosse in the aire, with promise (vnder that Standard) to conquer; whereof making triall, he fought with his enemy Maxentius, a great persecutor of the Christians, & vanquished him in the field, according as it is witnessed by Eusebius. So much shal serue to be spoken concerning the sign of the crosse, without any superstitious opinion thereof, or any friuolous worshppe yeilded therto, as too many (mistaking the true meaning) fondly & vainly do; but in all times it hath bene almost a custome, to draw error out of good intentions, and to wound with abuse, things meerly indifferent in themselues.

CHAP. XVII.

The excellency of Secrecy, & with what care it is to be kept: Diuers good examples are produced, apt to the intended purpose.

ONE of the principall partes, that makes a man knowne to bee wise indeed, is his intelligent strength and ability to couer and conceale those secrets, which (by anothers trust) are committed to him, with sound retention likewise of his owne serious affaires and priuacies. They that will reade the auncient Histories of times long past, shal find a great number of vertuous attempts, that neuer reached their endes and aimes (were it either in peace or war) but were shaken in shiuers, bruised and defeated, only through defect of secret concealment; and yet, beside such vnhappy prevention, infinit great euils haue thereby ensued. But amongst all other examples, let vs consider one more notable, and excelling all the rest, deriued euen from God himselfe; who so especially preserueth his own secrets to himselfe, that he would neuer let any man know what should betide or happen to morrow; neither could they that liued in the Ages past, imagin or diuine what should befall vs in these our dayes; wherby we may easily discern, that God himselfe is wel pleased with secrecy. And albeit, that (for mans good) he hath reuealed som things, yet impossible is it at any time to change or alter his determination; in regard whereof, the reuerend wisemen of elder times euermore affected to perform their intentions secretly.

We read that Cato Censorius often said to his friends, that of three things hee had good reason daily to repent himselfe, if he fel into the performance of al or any one of them. The first, if he did disclose any secret, to any one whatsoever; but principally to his wife. The second, if he aduentured on the water, & might keepe himselfe on dry land. The third, if he should let any day neglectly escape him, with omission of some one good action or other. The later two are well worthy obseruation, but the first concerneth our instant argument. Alexander hauing receiued diuers letters of great importaunce from his Mother, after hee had read them in the presence of none but his deare friend Ephestion & him-himselfe, he drew forth the signet wherwith he vsed to seale his most priuat letters, and saying nothing else, set it vpon Ephestions lips; intimating thereby, that he in whose bosome a man burieth his secrets, should haue his lippes fast lockt vp from reuealing any one of the. When King Lisimachus made offer to the Poet Phillippides, of whatsoeuer hee would make request, the Poet replied:

Phillippides his answere to K. Lisimachus.

O King, the very greatest good deede thou canst do me, is, neuer to acquaint mee with any of thy Secrets.

Antonius Sabellicus, concerning this purpose, declareth a notable & meruailous example. In the time of Pope Eugenius (saith he) the Siegnory of Venice had a Captaine named Cremignola, by whose disloyalty and treason, their army had receiued the ouerthrow. Whereupon, the Senate iudiciously consulted together, what might best be done in a case so desperate. Some were of opinion, by an instant mandation to call him home; and being possessed of him, to let him know the vertue of their Iustice. But others dissented, and held it against both honor and pollicy. Finally, it was concluded, that a maske or ignoraunce (as yet) shoulde muffle all, and not so much as suspition of his delict, any way be conceited; but purpose should be made seruant to more apt opportunity: & howsoeuer delay excused the error, yet death in the end should close vp all. This determination was deferred, and slept for the space of 8. months, but shut vp in each brest with such secrecy, as his eares (in all that time) could reach no supposition therof. This was (questionlesse) a matter of no mean maruel, considering there were so many Senators; among whom, diuers were much indred to Cremignola; some by propinquity in blood; others in friendship; & most of them by desertfull affection. Beside, many of them were poore, and pouteries eies being commonly bent on gifts & rewards (whereof there was no want in the Captain) might haue bin an easie benefit, & his best fortune. All which notwithstanding, this honorable seal of Secrecy, was set with such assurance vpon euery soule, that the 8. months hauing consumed themselues, he was verie kindly recalled home to Venice, entertained with all embracings and affectuous Ceremonies. But on the motrow, hee was surprized, condemned before the Senat to forfeit his head, and he paide it by imediate performance. This may well serue for a remarkeable president to all our modern States, their Senators, Iudges, and Counsellours, least it fall out with them, as it hath done to many, who forthwith haue discovered such secrets, as (in greater wisdome) they ought to haue concealed. In reproofe and iust check of whom, I will rehearse a pleasant discourse, deliuered by Aulius Gellius in his Attick nights, and by Macrobius in his Saturnals, according as followeth.

The Senators of Rome, at their vsuall sitting in the Senat house, had constituted a custome among themselues, that each man (hauing a Sonne) so soone as he was able to walke with his Father, he might bring him with him to the Senat, to abide or depart as occasion best required. Nor was this fauour generall, but extended only to Noblemens sons; and lasted til they were seuenteen years old: and the intent was, that by beholding the discreet behauiour of their Fathers, they might make the better apprehension thereof afterward, vntil they attained to riper yeares of gouernment, to be instructed in affaires of the wealepublicke. All which time, they were so well taught and tutord, as, whatsoeuer was discoursed in Counsell, it was concealed in them from publick reporting. One time, beyond all other, the Senate sat in consultation of a very serious and important cause, so that their rising was much later, then before had bin accustomed: and the conclusion was referred ouer vntill the next day, with expresse charge of Secrecy in the meane while. Among other Noblemens Children, that had bin there in this waighty Businesse, was the yong son of the graue Senator Papirius, whose family was one of the most noble & illustrious in al Rome.

The child being come home, his Mother (as women are highly affected to nouelty) intreated him to tell her, what strange case had bin that day debated in the Senate, that had power to detaine them so long beyond their vsuall houre? The Vertuous Noble youth tolde her, it was a Businesse not beeseeming him to speak of; & more (as al Noblemens sons else) he was commanded to silence. She hearing this answere, according to the immoderate heat of weomens desires, became more earnest in stricter inquisition into the case, & nothing but intelligence thereof might any way content hir. So that, first by faire speeches & entreaties, with large and liberal promises she practised to break open this poor little Casket of secrecy; that, not preuailing, to stripes & violent threats was hir next flight, because force may compel, where lenity cannot. The admired Noble spirit, finding a Mothers threats to be very harsh, but hir stripes more bitter then any thing beside, comparing his loue to hir as his Mother, with the duty he ought to his father; the one mighty, but the other more impulsive: he layes her & her fond conceit in the one scale; his Father, the Senate, himselfe in his yong budding reputation, and the serious iniunction to secrecy in the other; and finding her currant waight, as being his Mother, but lighter then wind, being thus gone out of hir selfe: whetting his tender wit vpon the sandy stone of her edging importunity; to appease her, and preserue himselfe sound (as out of a kind of constrained vnwillingnesse) resolued her thus. Madam. & deare Mother, you may well blame the Senat for their so long sitting, at least for calling in question a case so impertinent; For, except as many Senators wiues may be there present, as Senators that consult thereon, there can be no hope of conclusion. I speake this but out of my young apprehension for their grauity I know may easily confound mee. And yet, whether Nature or duty so instruct me, I cannot tell, albeit it seemeth good to them, that for encrease of people, & help to the weal-publicke, the Senators only should bee allowed to haue two wiues, or else their wiues two husbands: I shall hardly vnder one rooffe call two men by the name of Father, I had rather call two women by the name of Mother. This is the question Mother, & to morrow it must haue determination.

The Mother hearing this, and by his vnwillingnesse reuealing it, beleeuing it for infallible; her blood was quickly fiered, for this was Tinder apt enough to take. And (as commonly) such suddain heats do admit no consideration, but hurry the senses & faculties to further rashnesse: So shee, requiring no other counsel, but such as hir selfe, flings forth to the other ladies & Matrons of Rome, and by the bellows of hir breath, blowes them al vp into as brainsicke a passion. And, which is rare, for a Parliament of women to be gouerned by one speaker, yet, the affaire being so vrgent, the hast as pertinent, and the case (on their behalfe) meerly indulgent: the reuealing woman must prolocute for her selfe, & all the other women. And such a din is the next day at the Senat doore, for admission to sit with their Husbandes in this woonderous consultation, as if all Rome had bin in an vprore. Their minds must not be knowne before they haue audience, which (though against all order, yet necessity inforcing) being granted, such an Oration was made by the woman-speaker, with request that women might haue two Husbandes, rather then men two wiues, that could scarsely content one: as (vpon the Riddles solution) the Noble youthes secrecie being commended, the Ladies (with folly and impudence confounded) I guesse, that with blushing cheekes they thence departed. Neuerthelesse, for auoiding the like inconuenience, it was determind, that thence-forward, the Fathers should bring their Sons no more into the Senate; only yong Papirius was freely allowed, & his discreet policy to conceale the Senats secrets, not only applauded, but himselfe with Titles of honour dignified and rewarded.

Vndoubtedly, old men of these dayes, may make good vse of this young rare wisdom, and consider with themselus, that if a priuat secret do merit such concealment, much more then deserues that, whereon the whole weale publicke dependeth, especially among men of years and mature iudgement. Marcus Brutus, Cassius, and all the rest that had Conspired the death of Iulius Caesar, because in their eyes it seemed expedient, for benefit & liberty of their country; vpon their vowed determination, wold neuer yet disclose it to Cicero, one of their most intimate friends, and that desired (more then any of the other) the extirpation of tirany out of Rome; not for any distrust they had in him, but because he was reputed scarce a good secretary. Fulvius imparted an important secret to his wife, which the Emp. Octavian had before committed to his trust, but being dif-

disclosed by her, it came at length to the Emperors eare, which procured the Senator such a check from his Lord, for being no sounder to himselfe, that falling into dispaire vpon this disgrac, he resolved to kill himselfe. But imparting first his minde to his wife, to let her know what a shame she had done him, she made him answere; That he had no reason to be offended with her, because (during the long time they had liued together) till then, he had found no intelligence of her shallow Capacitie. But if he had made any prooffe before, his beleefe could not haue bin abused, by crediting her. Neuertheless, since hee had bin the motiue of this hir first offence, she would make no further reference to him, but inflict the punishment vpon her selfe: wherupon, immediatly she slew her selfe in his presence; so did her Husband very quickly after.

We read in the life of the Emp. Nero, that a conspiracy of his death beeing made in Rome, as a matter most requisite for the Romans, and the whole State beside, in regard of his cruelties: The man that had vndertakē to do the deed, meeting (by chaunce) with one, who was led to prison by the tirants command; and falling into a present consideration with himselfe, of the Emperors nature, that whomsoever he caused to be apprehended, could not escape death (as the present example of the prisoner approued, who wept bitterly because he could not auoid his hard lot) forthwith he stept to him, and (neuer remembering the important case which he was bound by Oath to conceale) said in his ear; Pray that thy life may be spared but till to morrow, for if thou canst escape this day, I dare assure thee, Nero himselfe shall not put thee to death. When the prisoner heard this, suspecting the case to be as it was indeed, and coueting to saue himselfe, revealed it to Cesar, willing him to haue especial care of his life. Heereupon, Nero caused him to be instantly attached that had spoken with the prisoner, and (by means of torments) forced him to confesse the whol coniuration; so by putting him to death the purposed plot was ouerthrowne.

Now Pliny reporteth an example to the contrary, of one Anaxarchus, who being taken vpon the like occasion, bit his tongue off in the midst betweene his teeth, because he would not disclose the secret complor; and afterward, he threw it in the Tyrants face. The Athenians caused to be erected in Brasse, the Statue of a Lyonnesse, in honor of a publique knowne Woman, named Lyonna; for a memory of her constancy, in keeping secret an especiall Conspiracy: and the Figure was made without a tongue, to declare Secrecy thereby. The Seruants and Slaues of Plancus are likewise much commended, because no Torments could preuaile, to make them confesse to their Maisters Enemies, (who searched narrowly for him, and faine would haue slaine him) in what place hee had hidden himselfe. The Slaue of Cato the Oratour, perceiuing some Offence by his Maister committed, by Torments was in like manner laboured, to reueale his abyding; but nothing could preuaile against his settled constancy, to be Secret.

Quintus Curtius telleth vs, that the Persians helde it is an inuiolable law, to punnish most greuously (and much more then any other Trespasse) him that discovered any Secret. For confirmation whereof, hee saith; That King Darius beeing vanquished by Alexander, and not knowing (in Flight) where to hide him-selfe; at length, when he had found out a place to his owne liking, no Tortures whatsoever, or liberall promises of recompence, could preuaile with them that knew it, or compell them to disclose it vnto any person. Hee saith moreover, that the Persians were of this Opinion, that no man ought to commit any matter of Consequence, to him that could not truly containe it.

Secrecie then is very necessarie in all things and occasions, but especiallie in Warre; and our most excellent and ancient Captaines, did euermore most iustly obserue it. Phillip, son to Antigonus the successour of Alexander, in the presence of diuers others, demanded of his father, when the Army shoulde march on? whereto the King angerly answered; Art thou so deafe, that thou canst hear a trompet, as other men shal? whereby he gaue him to vnderstand, that he had offended in such a demand, which deserued no other answere in the presence of witnesses. in the Army of Cecilius Metellus, who asked of him; what hee intended concerning the warres yssue? To whome Metellus replied: If I thought that my shirt knew what I haue purposed, I would immediatly burn it heere before thee. Horace among his Coniuniall Lawes, would haue euery man keepe secret whatsoever was done or said. For this cause the Athenians were wont (when they met at any Feast) that he who was most auncient among them, should shew to al the rest the doore whereat they had entered, saying; Take heed, that not so much as one word passe out from hence, of whatsoever shall heere be done or spoken.

The first thing that Pythagoras taught his Schollers, was to be silent; therefore (for a certaine time) he kept them without speaking, to the end, they might the better learne to preserue Secrecy, and neuer to speak but when time required: expressing thereby, that secrecy (among al other,) was the rarest vertue. To approue this true, when Aristotle was demanded what thing appeared most difficult to him, he answered; To be Secret and silent. To this purpose, S. Ambrose in his Offices, placeth among the principall foundations of Vertue, the patient gift of silence.

The Romaines, among their vaine & ydle Goddes, had a Goddesse of silence, named Angerona, which was figured holding her Finger vpon her Mouth, in signe of silence. And Plinie sayth, that they vsed to Sacrifice vnto her the xxi. day of December: whereof likewise Marcus Varro, Solyus, and Macrobius, doe make mention. The GOD of Silence was also honoured by the Egyptians, and painted with his Finger vpon his Mouth, as Catullus and Ouid in like manner haue written. Whereby we may easily gather, what reuerend respect hath beene made of Secrecie, in regard they honoured it as a God. Salomon saith in his Prouerbes, that a King ought to drinke no wine; for no other reason, but because, where drunkenesse is, there can be no containing of Secrecy. And (in his opinion) he is vnworthy to raig, that cannot keepe his own Secrets. He saith moreouer, That he which discouers secrets, is a Traitor; and he that concealeth them, a faithfull Friend.

The Lacedemonians (beyond all other of the Greeke Nations) delighted most in speaking briefely; so that when anie Man was heard to speake Compendiously, they would presently say; He discoursed Laconian-like. King Phillip, the Father of Alexander, sent them Worde, that he wold passe through their countrey with his Army; and therefore, they were speedily to answer him, if he shold passe as their Friend, or their apparant Enemy; whereto (without any plentie of wordes) they replied: Neither as the one, nor the other.

Artaxerxes King of Asia, likewise sent to tell them, that hee would come to make spoile and booty of the; to which threatning, they answered thus: Come and do what thou canst. I am of the mind, that in greater Coppy of wordes, they could not haue made a graner answer.

dispatch, that they might returne home againe; Agis King of the Lacedemonians made them this answer: You shall say to the Abderites, that wee heard yee all the huge while you were willing to speake.

A tedious Orator talking with Aristotle, well answered.

Vpon a time, a certaine Oratour talked with Aristotle, and was so prolix in his speech, as himselfe acknowledged his owne errour, and made his excuse, in concluding thus; That he desired pardon, because he had held so long discourse with so wise a Philosopher. Aristotle answered him pleasantly: Good friend, thou hast no cause at all to aske pardon of me, because I tooke no heede of what thou saidst.

Example of them that kild the Poet Ibycus.

Wherein Aristotle returned him a iust requitall, and replied aptly to our present purpose. Wee haue another example of too much pratling, by them that robd, and afterward kild Ibycus the Poet; for as thy halde him along throw the Fieldes, farr enough from being seene, or heard of any body; he espied a Flocke of Cranes flying in the Ayre, to whom he cryed aloud, saying; You Cranes shall beare witnesse what they doe vnto me. After his death, no knowledge (in a long time) could be gotten, who were faulty in so foule a fact: vntill a certaine day, when a publique solemnity being made in the same Fielde, whereat two of them that had murdered Ibycus happened to be present. Suddenly, a great noyse of Cranes was heard aboue in the Ayre, which one of them perceiuing, scoffingly said to his fellow (not thinking any stander by had heard him;) Hearke Fellow, these are the witnesses, that Ibycus said should disclose his death.

A notable example.

This being ouer-heard, by one too neer them, yet doubtful what he should imagine of such words, he began to suspect some euill; whereupon, he aduertised the Iudges and Gouvernours what hee had heard. In breefe, the two Gallants were apprehended, and confessing the truth, Iustice was executed on them; This ensued through their liberall talking, without circumspection. Therefore a Man ought to regard well what he will say, while hee is maister of his owne minde; and withall, to respect both the time and persons present. Hecates the Greeke Orator, was on a time reprooued, because (beeing at a merrie Banquet) he spake neuer a word, which checke being heard by Archimedes, hee replied thus for him: Me thinkes thou shouldst learne to vnderstand, that they which know well how to speake, do also know at what time to be silent.

Heere might be alledged infinite examples, of perills, ignominies, and death, hapning at diuers times to Men, onely by reason of too much talking. Wherefore, a Man should be very circumspect before hee open his mouth, least that which he speakes, do redound to his owne preiudice. Great Cato the Censor, from his Child-hood, was naturally sober in speech; whereof he being reprehended by many, who tolde him that he was too strict in Taurni, he thus answered them: I am not offended to be reprooued for my restraint of speech, seeing no man hath occasion to detect my life: for then, and not else would I break silence, and then it should be knowne how I could hold my peace. Isocrates in the Book which hee wrote to Demonicus, saith; There are two times for speaking; the one, when occasion dooth necessarily require it; the other, when a Man knowes whereof hee speakes. Plutarch compares them that talke (without knowing what, or whereof) to emptie vessels, which alwayes do found louder then those that are filled.

It is declared to vs, by Zeno the Philosopher, that Nature gaue vs two ears, and but one tongue: for no other reason, but to heare much, and speake little. Horace giues vs counsell, to shun such as are busie in many demaunds, because themselues are but Questioners, and needlesse Praters. Suetonius reporteth (in confirmation of other mens Arguments, to the same intent) that the principall cause, which moued Octavius to fauor Mecenas so much, was; because he vsed to speake sildome, and then but little too, giuing himselfe wholly vnto silence. Cicero affirmeth, that Cato the Oratour, would neuer set downe any of his Orations in writing, saying; I can repent my selfe of any thing that I haue said, but I would not haue my writing come to re-prooue, because that it cannot be anyway denied. And because in reprehending ouer-much talking, I would be loath to fall into the same errour, I will be silent, concluding thus with that Graue Philosopher Seneca: I haue many times repented my selfe for speaking, but neuer because I held my peace.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the famous Philosopher Plutarch; his learned Letter to the great Emperour Traiane, and diuers of his singular comparisons.

Plutarch was one of the most excellent Morall Philosophers that euer liued; and beside, hee was a true Historiographer. Hee was Schoole-Maister to the good Romaine Emperour Traiane, born in Spaine, euen at the time that the Romain Empire was more great in Power and Possessions, then euer it had beene before, or after. This Emperour was the best and iustest of all the rest, and one that would diligently listen to the councill of his Maister: who fearing, least Traiane should be forward to any errour, or doe any thing vnwoorthy the good Discipline which hee had taught him: one day among others, he sent a letter vnto him, wherein these following instructions were contained.

I know very well, both modesty and simplicity with-helde any desire in thee to the Empire, although thou didst euer more in merit out-go it, by thy vertue and perfection in manners: which made thee so much the more worthy of it, by how much thou soughtest least meanes to enioy it: So that I attribut all to thy vertue and good Fortune, which will enlarge and heighten my contentment, when I shall see thy faire Graces shine in thy Government: for if thou doe otherwise, I make no doubt of thy falling into daunger, and that thou wilt giue occasion of reproach towards me. The danger concerning thy selfe, is, that Rome could neuer endure a bad and cruell Emperour; and mine is, that people are alwaies ready, in imputing the Schollers faultes to the Maister. Wee haue two notable examples to confirme this; the one, of Seneca, against whom all Neroes wickednesse was daily murmured; and the other, of Quintilian, who bare the rebuke of his Schollers ryot and excesse. I am assured, that if thou doe not forget thy selfe, but first will take order with thine owne affections, referring all thine actions to vertue: thou canst do nothing but what is good and perfect. The rules which thou oughtst to obserue, that the manners of thine Empire may be mended, they are taught thee by my Bookes, if thou list to follow them: Plutarch may so be Authour of thy life; if otherwise, I call this my Letter to witnesse, that it was not by my councill or aduise, that thou didst any thing to the preiudice, and damage of the Common-Wealth of the Romaine Empire. So God preferue thee.

This Letter had such power ouer Traiane (with the helpe of his owne vertuous inclination) that he became a most excellent Prince. True it is, that before he was called to the Empire, hee was a Man of good manners and vertues: so that, although this Dignity had neuer before beene permitted to strangers, yet so it happened, that Nero his Predecessour (albeit hee had a great Kinred in Rome, and Traiane was a Spaniard:) yet hee (notwithstanding) elected Traiane to succeed him in the Empire, whereby Nero wan himselfe Grace and good opinion. For Traiane gouerned so iustly, and was a man so vertuous, that after his decess, when they went to elect and institute a new Emperour: the people alwaies desired of God, that he would giue him the goodnesse of Traiane, and the fortune of Octavian.

Plutarch then being a man of rare and especiall vertues, filled his workes with Learning and singuler examples; that any man (how well read soeuer he was) might thence deriue good Rules and Instructions, for guiding him to an happy and vertuous life. He had a great Grace in his comparisons, wherof I haue made obseruation of a few, according as they follow. He that abaseth himselfe, and forsaketh vertue. for any mishap that may betide him: is like vnto a Childe, who seeing something taken from him where with hee spotted, in a rage casts away all the rest out of his hand, though it were neuer so sweete and delicate to feed on.

As he that is amorous of a Woman, doth continually repute her to be faire, though some Wart or Scar may somewhat impaire her countenance: So a true louer of Vertue, albeit he beholde the vertuous despised and ill intruded, will neuer thinke of her waies the worffe, worse, or giue ouer for any disgraces wharsoeuer.

Of Enuy.

As Kites or Rauens can neither more or lesse hurt a liuing Body, but worke their tyranny on the dead: So hee that hateth any Man, lookes onely vpon his dead Vices, and neuer lifts vp an eye to his good and vertuous Actions.

Of Temperance.

As Water moderateth the heat and fury of Wine: Euen so in a Common-Wealth, old Men ought to temperate with good counsell, the angry and fiery spleenes of such as are young.

Of Discretion

As a poore Slaue or Seruant, is most ioyfull when hee gets free from the power of a sharpe and cruell Maister: So should an old man reioyce, to escape the bad inclinations and disordered affections, which alwaies are the dangerous companions to youth.

Of Negligence.

As a Blinde man growes quickly angry, and sticks not to call him Blinde, who (against his will) happens in meeting to harme him: Euen so wee complaine on our ill fortunes, though they come by our owne occasions, and worthily whip vs with our owne Rod.

Of Prouidence.

As through fault of quenching a smal sparke, a great fire is kindled, which consumes the whole House: So thorough want of prouidence, against the sedition of a few particulars, sometimes the whole State happens to be ruined.

Of Phisicke.

Plutarch tels vs moreouer; That hee who is subiect to Phisitions, Purgations, and Medicines; resembleth him, that being banished from the Cittie of Men wherein he was borne, is forced to seeke his fortune among hard-welcoming Strangers.

Of Willfaines

He that craues counsell and aduise for his errour, and then amends it not: is like vnto him, that needs will haue his Impostume opened, and yet cannot endure to haue it purged and healed.

Of Folly.

He that learnes Morall & Politick Philosophy, and knoweth not how to make vse of it: is like him that lights a Lamp, and feedes it not with Oyle to doe him seruice.

Of Wickednesse.

As the Worme is engendred at the Trees foote, and encreasing with it, at length destroyes it: Euen so a bad man, bolstreth his lewdnesse vnder the fauor of his Prince, and in the end becomes an ingratefull Traytour to him.

Of Talking.

The Originall and beginning of the Art Military, or Warre: Who they were that first intruded one vpon anothers Governmet. Of the Inuenters also of diuers kinds of Weapons, especially of Artillery, and such like.

It is a matter sufficientlie manifest, that warre, strife, & discord among Men, took their Originall from the finnes of our fore-fathers; and it remaineth to perpetuall remembrance, that of ADAMS first Sonnes, one killed the other. So that Originall Iustice being thus lost, afterward there neuer wanted debates and strife among Men; whereby it appeareth, that Warre and Enmity began in our first Parents. But the Science of Warre, or Military Art, as also the manner of making Warre, practised by a number of many, against as many (albeit his beginning came from Sinne, and his best part; yea, oftentimes his end is cruelty, blood, and impiety) yet hath it beene held in such reputation; that both the Art it selfe, and those skilfull therein, haue beene preferred by Men, beyond all other matters of Prudence and Industry, and hath risen (by degrees) to bee aboue all other degrees.

Others are quite opposite hereto, and say; that it was first knowne after the Flood: therefore it is hard to know the particular Author, whatsoeuer he was. Neuerthelesse, it seemes, that from the beginning, wars and quarrels (which arose among Kings and Princes) grew rather vpon ambition, & desire of honor, then any intent to bereaue or deprive the goods of one another.

Iustine, and Trogus Pompeius say, that Ninus King of the Assirians, was the first that guided an Army from his Kingdome, onely vpon greedy Auarice, and desire to subdue anothers Territories. The Pretor Fabianus certifies as much, in the beginning of that little scantling which wee haue of his History; and the like doth Saint Augustine. King Ninus so well gouerned both himselfe and his Army, that he ouercame many Citties and Countries, leauing them to his successours, and so they continued to his Posterity, according to the Computation and Record of Saint Augustine, Eusebius, and Diodorus Siculus, for the space of thirteene hundred yeares, still descending downe from Father to the Sonne, and no want or defect of Heires in succession, in the whole course of three and thirty Kings; or (according as some others do maintaine) for thirty six Kings, euen vntill the full power and rule came to the lubricious Monster Sardanapalus, in whose time the Empire was lost, and fell then into the Possession of the Medes.

Ninus then, according to the Testimony of our recited Authours, was the onely first victorious Conqueror; and yet we read, that (before his time) there had bin Wars; but (as we haue said already) it seemeth that it was not attempted, for the dispossessing Men of their Goods, Lands, and Inheritances, but for an affection after the Worlde's honor and estimation: as we find recorded of Vesfor King of Agypt, who would needs start out of his owne Kingdome, against Tanais the Scythians King. Tanais (bound in honor to meete him) hapned to be the Conquerour: and yet did not he bereaue Vesfor of his Crown or country, or any other of his Goods, as King

Ninus made it his visuall custome to do. Therefore it should appeare, that he was the first, that made and instituted lawes to be obserued in Armies and Battailes, allowing the victor to be Maister of the Lands & possessions of the vanquished.

Now concerning those Weapons (as well defensue as offensue) where-with they put their attempts in execution, & pursued the spleen of their violent fury: it is not to bee doubted, but that at the beginning of those Wars, they vsed no Weapons of inequality or aduantage. But (as the Poet Lucretius reporteth) they began with byting and scratching, teeth, and nayles; and afterward fell to Stones and Staues: euen as yet to this day, many barbarous Nations vse to do. For (as yet) they had not reached to the height of hate and mallice in men, to force Iron out of the earths Intrals, and therewith to graspe at their Neighbors goods. Pliny affirmeth, that in the first Wars of the Moors with the Agyptians, they fought onely with Cudgels and Staues: but afterward they grew to further practise, and inuented such diuersity of Weapons, onely to hurt and offend one another, that it was accounted very strange to behold, how men endeuored to kill and murder one another.

Concerning the men that were Inuenters of these deuises, the opinion is very diuers. Poets in their fixions do tell vs, that Mars the God of Armes was the enginer of them. Pliny recordeth, that the Aetolians were the first that euer carryed any Launce to the Fielde; and likewise saith, that the Lacedemonians first inuented the Head-peece, and the Sword and Axe for defence thereof. But Herodotus attributeth the deuising of the Helmet and Shield, to the Egyptians: as also the Arming Coat of Maile, and the Breast-plate, to a man of Misena, named Mydas; and Darts were deuised by one borne in Aetolia. It is likewise maintained, that Penthesilea Q. of the Amazons, was the first that fought in field with the Axe & Club: and that Scythes, the Son of Iupiter, was the first Inuenter of Bow and Arrowes, but it is thought to be Perseus; and Diodorus holds it to be Apollo.

the Art Military, were they that first in- uented Slings, for conueyance of stones against their Enemies, because they had no other Weapon of defence for themselves. Thus Men (we see) according to the times, necessity, and variety of their owne mindes, haue found out and deuised diuers weapons and Instru- ments: which neuerthelesse (in my conceit) the very same Weapons haue bin likewise inuented in other places, not much differing from the instant Times, without any intelligence or knowledge the one of the other. Therefore, that I may not bee troublesome to the Reader, I leaue to wade in further search of opinions; albeit, they are much pertinent to our present purpose: as to set downe who were the deuisers of sundry sorts of Engines, and Warlike Instru- ments, for battering of Walles, Forts, and Bulwarkes, wherein there is like- wise as great difference in opinion. For Eusebius affirmeth, that Moses was the Deuiser of those huge and great Engins of Warre. Plutarch tels, that Archytas of Tarentum, and Eudoxus brought and reduced these Artes to full perfection, and that they found out many Instru- ments, for the breaking downe of Wals and greatest Buildings.

The Beliers (and beside according to Pliny) found out the vse of the Sword at the sledge of Troy: but Vitouuius is of the mind, that it rather cam from the sledge of Athens. The Scorpion or great Crosse-Bow, where-with they would hurle huge Stones into Towns; in Plinies iudgement, was inuented by them of Creete and Syria. The people of Pha- nicia, were the first that releued them- selves with the Engines of repulse and sharp piercing: but yet all these Inuen- tions were light, triuiall, and of slender importance, because they are farre sur- passed in rigour and cruelty, by de- uise of Powder for the Cannon, and other such like Artillerie. These are said to be first deuised by a Germaine, whose Name we finde no where recorded, and deseruedly (in my minde) as beeing vn- worthy of any remembrance. The first that made vse of them, as Blondus & Ra- phaell Volateranus doe affirme, happened to bee the Venetians, against the Gene- waies, in the yeare one thousand three hundred and eighty. And yet according to better Iudgement, and partly I am of the same opinion, that this inuention is of more ancient standing: because in the Chronicle of Alphonfus, the elea- uenth King of Castile (euen he that con- quered Algazara) it is found recorded, that he being at the sledge of the saide Citty, in the yeare one thousand three hundred forty three; the besieged Moores did then throw forth of certaine Thundring Engines or Weapons, which were made of hollow Iron, like Morters or Troughes in them, diuers annoyances among their enemies; and this was forty yeares before the time whereof Blondus speaketh.

Againe, long time before that also, in the Chronicle of the saide King Al- phonfus, whose fortune was likewise to Conquer Tolledo in Spaine, the Lorde Don Pedro Bishop of Leon, writes that in a Battell by Sea, which was betweene the King of Thunis, and the Moore, King of Senile, whom King Alphonfus highly faouered: the men of Thunis had cer- taine Tonells or Bombards of Iron, & there-with they threw abroad strange thundrings of Fire, which needes must be Artillery; Although it was not in a- ny such perfection, as vse and time hath made it now to be: and this was foure hundred yeares since, and more.

CHAP. XXI.

The rare fortune of two Women, who by wear- ing the Habite and Garments of men; with Actions and Gestures sutable ther- to, attained to two mightie Dignities, the one to be Pope of Rome, and the other Empresse.

50 S Make no doubt, but that many haue heard of a Wo- man, who was made Pope of Rome, yet because al men do not know in what man- ner it was, and beeing one of the most especiall matters of maruell happening in those times; I am the more willing to speake thereof, according to the ex- tract made out of the truest Historians. Shee was borne in England, and in the time of her youth, she had acquaintance with with a learned Man, of whom finding herselfe to be beloued, with no lesse affection then she bore to him, she vnder-tooke the habite of a Man, & calling hir selfe by the Name of Brother Iohn, left her Countrey, and went to remaine with him in the City of Athens, where the Academies and generall studies then flourished. Therefor a certaine space she sojourned with him, and attained such a liberall flowing Spirit towards learning, that with-drawing her selfe thence afterward to Rome: she read there publicly in the Schooles, in the habit and degree of a Doctour. By which reading, besides diuers daily disputations, she wonne such an vnaccustomed conceit of her Auditory, that shee was reputed for one of the very chiefest learned Men of that time; yea, and gained such advancement by the rising of degrees, that the Seat Apostolicall being in intermission (by reason of the death of Pope Leo, the fourth of that Name, in the yeare of our Sauour, eight hundred fifty two, and being taken to be a Man by Nature) shee was chosen to be great Byshop of Rome; and Pope vniuersal, to gouern the Church, wherein she held the Seat for the space of two yeares, thirtie dayes, and (as is thought by some) some few others beside.

Being in this supream Dignity, which is a strange Spur to very bold attempts, (especially in a Sexe so fraile by nature) forgetfull of her former carefull and ciuill carriage; she affected the company of one of her Attendants, vpon whose trust and faith relying, shee not onely disclosed her imperfection of kinde, but also acquainted him with so much familiarity, that there grew an alteration in the supposed Grand-Pontifex; euen so much, as (in secret) might be saide, great with child. Neuertheless, she couered this Crime with such Art & cunning, as none but her Minion onely could any way reueale it. But that high and supream power, which continually hath an eye vpon the closest wickedness (in Iustice) permitted the meanes to bring it to immediat correction. For as she was carried in the vsuall solemnity, to visite the Church of Saint Iohn de Laterana: the time of womens denounced trouble suddenly came vpon her, and vnder suspicion of a contrary sickness (but indeede the fruites of her Louers disease) she was there deliuered of a Male-Child (though some say Female) euen betweene the Church of Saint Clement and the Theater, improperly called Coliseus, and there the Mother & Child died both instantly together, and were likewise so buried, without any pompe or solemnity.

For which vnexpected accident, the common opinion is, that a new order was determined for procession of the succeeding Byshoppes; which was, to shunne that former way, because it had giuen a note of so great scandall, and therefore they must passe through another streete, in detestation of a Fact so horrible.

And yet in regard of this reason, they haue set downe an obseruation, that when any one comes to be enstaull'd Pope, they haue a Chaire purposely made open, like a Close-stoole, and by their passage vnderneath it, it is secretly and assuredly knowne, if Habet testiculos, hee be a Man or Woman. And many Authors discoursing hereon, doe make an vndoubted certainty thereof.

Platina onely saith, that they haue a rich appointed Chair (but of the same fashion as is vsed in common necessities) to the end, that hee who is to be elected Pope, may (without further question) be knowne for a Man. What is saide heereof beside, as by the same Platina, Martinus in the liues of the Popes, Sabellicus, and S. Anthoninus in his Histories, they do all agree to the same effect. I finde also written, that in the sayde Streete, there is an Image or Statue of stone erected, which declares the childs birth, and death of this impudent and shamelesse Woman.

But notwithstanding all this, let the accident be held very strange, as it is indeede, yet during the time that this Woman abused the World, it was no reproch vnto the Church of God, neyther did it become any iot blemished in Faith, because shee can neuer want her true Head, which is Iesus Christ, who still bestowes on her the Influences of his Graces, and the blessed effects of the Sacraments; And so long as such a head doth protect hir, the Sacraments continue in their poverfull vertue, to such such as soundly receiue them, and with firme Faith, because Christ supplies (by his Grace) all other defects. Admit this woman, nor any other, can be capable of receiuing or giuing any one Character of orders, or absoluing any one, but that whatsoeuer was then done by her or them, it standes to no effect or purpose, as wee haue already said: yet the Spouse of Christ, standing clear and vntainted of any corruption, hath still recourse to the onely Head Christ, who euermore hath an especiall care of her and hers. Yet this we may say concerning her, that questionlesse her Wisdome appeared to be maruailous, onlie in this respect, that for so many yeares, and in such degrees of Estate, she could so well maintaine her credit.

But that which Theodosia, the Empresse of Constantinople did, is woorthy of as great admiration, because the minde of the one, was but to faigne her selfe a Man; and the other, to bee reputed a Man; notwithstanding, euery one knew her to be a Woman. For the Empire beeing vacant, by the death of her Brother Zoer, and her Husband Constantine, she being at that time entred into Religion: knew yet so well how to manage the State affaires, that she tooke vpon her to be Emperour, and (in his place) was feared and obeyed. For without the helpe of Father, Husband, or Brother, she gouerned the Empire most nobly in peace and prosperity, for the space of two yeares, and then died, to the great greefe of her Subiectes, and in the time of Pope Leo the ninth, and the yeare of our Lord, one thousand and fifty.

CHAP. XXII.

The first beginning of the Amazons, and of many notable thinges by them not onely attempted, but likewise boldly put in execution.

Although I haue not bound my selfe to any direct or absolute order, concerning my first intended purpose in this worke, but doe

10 write of thinges according as they present themselues, or els as they please me in Collection; yet notwithstanding, by this ensuing Chapter, I shall not much differ from the last declared Subiect, where I discoursed of two hardy and aduenturous Women, and the vnsuall fortunes that did befall them. For which cause, I holde it not amisse in this very next place (maintaining still the last argument) to speake of the Amazons, who were as woorthy as any other in the Worlde whatsoeuer. Albeit, there are many Men, that take a delight in abasing the perfection of Women, taxing them with leuity, wantonnesse, softnesse, and many other imperfections: yet I cannot but confesse, that there are men, who doe exceed the in a thousand greater defects. For to speake no more then meerly Iustice requireth, Women haue gone beyond men in all kindes of vertues, or (at least) not giuen place to them in any thing; either in Loue, Loyalty, Charity, Deuotion, Pity, Affability, Temperance, Mercy, and all other vertues that can be alleaged. And if among them; some one bad and imperfect body hap to be met withall, a thousand worse are easily found among me; and it is a case so plaine and apparant, as it were needlesse heere to insert any examples.

30 In one thing (perchance) men will claime some superiority aboue them, that they haue the aduantage of them in martial disposition, whereunto women are not so apt and able, because that in such an exercise, ther is required fiercenesse, cruelty, and many other stormy qualities, which (by nature) they cannot vse, neither hath it pleased God (if it be lawfull to say so) to make them thereto prompt or able. Yet notwithstanding, to the end that men may know, that euen therein also (when they list to imploy themselues) they can stand equall with them; yea, and (if neede be) somewhat surmount them. For there hath bin found many women, that haue performed admirable things in Armes. And because rehearfall of many commendable Histories to this purpose, doth require too long a discourse; it shal suffice to speake of the Amazons, who were most vvarlike vvomen, and (vvithout the counsell or aduise of any Man) 40 50

Men take a pleasure in disgracing the vertues of Women.

Womea haue equalled Men in all perfections whatsoeuer.

did vanquish diuers powerfull Armies, conquered great Countries, Citties, & Prouinces, which continued long time after in their rule and possession.

Many learned men both Ancient and Modern, haue approoued their Histories to be very certaine. Diodorus the Sicilian, he affirmeth them to haue two feuerall Prouinces of the World; the one was in the Asiatique Scythia, a Prouince in the North parts of Asia, which was very great, and contained in it many other Prouinces. Ptolomey did deuide it into two partes, by the Mountaine Imaus*, and it is at this day (in mine opinion) that which is cled Tartaria, in Asiaticke Scythia, and different from that Scythia which is in Europe. The other was in Lybia, a Prouince of Affrica, and (as one saith) that it was long before that of Scythia. But because most commonly, Authors (speaking of the Amazones) doe vnderstand and meane them of Asia; it is of them that I am determined to speake, and I will principally follow Iustine & Diodorus, who haue written most distinctly of them.

The Scythians were very warlike men, of whom wee haue good testimony in many Histories, they had (in their first yeares) two Kings, to whom they yeelded al obedience, and were in order gouerned by them. Neuerthelesse, because it is the naturall propertie of Dominion, quickly to wax proud; and not to allow any equall or companion: there happened betweene these two Kings so great question and controuersie: as at length it grew wholly to a ciuill warre. In which difference, one side remained Conquerour in the end; and two men (of greatest note) on the contrary faction; the one being named Plynus, and the other Scolopith, were bannished thence, with a great number of their Adherents; who with-drawing themselves to the limits of Cappadocia, in the lesser Asia, in despite of the Inhabitants of the Country, they made their abode along the Riuer* of Thormodon (now called Pormon) which entreth into the Euxine Sea, otherwise called Pontus*. There making themselves Lords of the Country, and of the neighbouring parts, they raigned there for some certaine yeares, vntill such time as the Country people and their Confederates, finding themselues to bee greatly offended, made a conspiracy against them, & assembling themselves secretly together, did so cunningly by deceit ouer-reach them, that (in the end) they slew them all.

The tidings of their death comming to the eares of their Wiues, remaining in the former Country, procured them to extreame greefe and heauinesse, and preuailed so with them, that (albeit they were Women) they tooke vpon them such a manly courage, as, concluding to reuenge the death of their Husbands, they rose vp in Armes, and grew to bee very expert therein. Now, to the end, that in this fortune they might bee all equal, and the sorrow common, without any exception: they slew some other of their Husbands, that remained behinde when the other were bannished. And then mustring themselves into a mighty Army, they left their dwelling, refusing mariage with many that earnestly thereto required them. When they were arriued at the Countrey of their Enemies, (who made slender account of it, notwithstanding they had sufficient aduertisement) they tooke them vnprovidid, and put them euery man to the Sword; heereof is deliuered credible testimony, by Pomponius Mela, Propertius, and Claudian in the rape of Proserpina. And they do further signifie, that this being done, they tooke vpon them the gouernment of the Country, abiding (at their beginning) along the Riuer Thermodon, in the place where their Husbands was slaine.

Now although that diuers Authours doe differ, concerning the first place of plantation or seating, where these Amazons made their dwelling; yet neuerthelesse it is a constant truth, that the beginning of their raigne, and the certaine place of their habitation, was by this Riuer: but of their surmounting afterward to many other Prouinces, diuers opinions are deliuered, which at large are discussed by Strabo, and others. But in these places they fortified themselves, and wan sundry other neighbouring Countries, making election of two Queenes among them; the one named Marpesia, and the other Lampedon. These two worthy Women, deuided their warlike Troop into two parts, continuing with great concord, and each assisting the other with boldnesse and hardiment, to defend the Countries which they had conquered. In the end, to make their name more famous and dreadfull (such was the folly and credence of weak Men in those times) they feigned themselves to be the Daughters of Mars, according to the affirmation of Iustine, and Seruius vpon the Aeneidos, and Valerius Flaccus, in part of his fourth Booke of the Argonauts.

Afterward, these wonderfull women liuing in this manner, with peace and vpright Iustice among them, they began to consider on the succession of time, that through want of Daughters to succede them, Warre and Time would at length deuour them: wherevpon, they purposed to contract Marriage with certaine of their Neighbours, whom Pliny reporteth to be called Gargarians, vpon condition, that at a certaine time, their Husbands should meet them in a place conueniently appointed, and there to keepe them company for diuers daies, vntill they could guesse themselves to be conceiued with child; which done, they were to returne againe to their owne Habitations. If they hapned to be deliuered of Daughters, they would bee Nurses to them, & breed them vp in aptnesse of Armes, with all other manly exercises: as to ride Horses, runne swiftly, Hauke, and Hunt. But if they were Male Children, then they would send them to bee educated by their Fathers, except they pleased to reserue some one or two only. Diodorus saith, that such Male Children as they kept with them, they wold writh and bruise their Armes and Legs; so that in no wise they should bee able to carry Armes, and therefore they serued to no other vse, but to spinne, sow, weaue, and performe such other like feminine qualities.

Now because these Amazons did much helpe themselves in their Wartes with Bowes and Arrowes, and finding that in this & other exercises of armes, their Dugs or Breastes were a very great hinderance to them: They vsed to burn off the right Pap, both of themselves and their Daughters; and therevpon they were called Amazons, which signifieth in the Greek tongue, No-Breasts; albeit some other doe giue another Etimology to this name. Encreasing still on by course of time, to be in number both many and mighty, they made great provision for Armes and warlike Actions, and leauing their Countrey (which seemed somewhat too little for them) to the custody of such as they reposed trust in, they wandred abroad, displacing & conquering all such, whom they found to be rebellious against them. Hauing passed the riuer Tanais, they entred into Europe, where they subdued many countries, and so directed their course towards Thrace: from whence they returned (afterward) with great spoiles and victories, and re-entring Asia, brought diuers other Prouinces into their obedience; which were so many, that Amianus Marcellinus saith, they went so farre as to the Caspian Sea.

They builded and peopled infinite goodly Citties, among which is comprised (according to the opinion of some Authours) that of Ephesus, so much renowned, because it had bin alwaies the cheefe City of their Empire; and the principall of all other, on the borders of Thermedon. They vsed in their warres, to defend themselves with Targets, which (according as it is saide by Virgill) were made in resemblance like halfe Moons. Martianus Capellus declareth, that at their entrance into battaile, they sounded strange kindes of Flutes, to harden and embolden their followers to the fight, euen according as the Lacedemonians were wont to doe. In large extendure did the fame of these Women spread it selfe, euen to the time that Hercules, Theseus, and many other valiant men liued in Greece. This Hercules was commaunded by Euristhenes King of Athens, that he should go with a strong power of armed men against the Amazons, & that he should bring away the Armors of their two Queenes, which then were two Sisters; to wit, Antiopa and Orythia. Vpon this commaund, Hercules (swelling with desire of honour) accompanied with Theseus, and others his deare Friendes: tooke Sea, and sayling by the Pontique Sea, landed in the most commodious place of the Riuer Thermedon, which hee entred so couertly, and at a time of such aduantage, as Orythia (one of the two Queenes) was gone out of the Countrey, with the greater part of her Women, to war and conquer a new found Countrey: so that he found Antiopa, neither doubting or knowing the least note of his coming. By meanes whereof, Hercules and his Followers found the Amazones vnprovided, and although they betooke themselves to Armes, & immediatly stood vpon their owne defence, with such diligence as so short warning gaue them leaue: yet were they neuerthelesse vanquished, throwne into disorder, and many of the flaine, and the rest surprized: among whom were two Sisters to the Queene, whereof the one was named Menalippa, prisoner to Hercules; and the other Hippolita, in like bondage to Theseus. Some Historians say, that they were conquered on a certaine day appointed for the battaile: And that afterward these two Sisters were vanquished in the Duello or single combat, one to one; but herein I follow the opinion of Iustine and Diodorus.

The Queene Antiopa perceiuing this ouerthrow, and that her Noble Sisters were in this manner taken; she came to a composition with Hercules, to whom she gaue her Armor to cary to King Euristhenes, vpon condition, that he should deliuer backe her Sister Menalippa. But Theseus, notwithstanding all Royall offers made him, by no meanes would returne his Prisoner Hippolita. Hercules hauing thus compassed his intention, returned home with his company. These newes comming to the knowledge of Orythia (then absent from her Country, (as we haue heard already declared) no tidings euer came to her of more griefe and disgrace; so that (growing iealous of a greater danger) she returned home suddenly with her Amazones. The greater part of them (iumping with her in opinion) perswaded the Queen Antiopa, to reuenge this their iniury vpon the Grecians. Whereupon, they prepared great prouision for war, and after they had assembled and marshalled the greater number of their Amazones, they sent to entreat Sigillus King of the Scythians, to lend them assistance: who then sent them his Sonne Peasagoras, with a great multitude of his ablest Horse-men. Being thus by them strengthened, the Amazones entred Europe, and proceeded on to the Limits of Athens, doing much damage all the way of their passage. But Peasagoras entred into a priuate quarrell with the Queene and her Women, by means whereof, the Scythians could not be drawn to fight, but withdrew themselves apart; which so weakned the power of the Amazones, as they were not able to endure the rough encounters of the Grecians, but perforce must yeeld to their hard fortune, being subdued and vanquished, and the most part of them cruelly massacred. Such as could escape, fled to the Camp of the Scythians, who tooke them into their defence, and so returned backe into their owne Country, where afterward they liued not so potent as before.

In following time it fortun'd, the Grecians passed into Asia, when they attained to that memorable Conquest of Troy, at which time raigned as Queene ouer the Amazones, a worthy Woman named Penthesilea, who remembering the former wronges receiued by the Grecians: went with a mighty band of her Amazones to succour the Troyans, where the Queen did performe very rare deeds of Armes. But the Troyans being conquered as fast as they fallied forth (wher they found the Amazones fighting in their assistance) they were almost all flaine: Penthesilea perished by the hand of Achilles; whereuppon, so many as remained aliue, returned home into their Countrey, with such small strength (in regard of what they had bin before) that very hardly could they defend and keep their ancient possessions.

And so they continued vntill such time as Alexander the great went into Asia, to make war vpon the rebellious Hyracians: At which time, one of their Queens named Thalestria, accompanied with a great number of her Amazones, left her Countrey, with desire to see and know that powerfull Conquerour. And comming neere the place where hee was, she sent an Ambassadresse vnto him, to attaine safe conduct for her fight of him; giuing him to vnderstand, that the renowne of so great a personage, had forwarded her desire to beholde him. Which being vnderstood by Alexander, he royally sent her his safe conduct, by meanes whereof, after she had selected some of the principall of her Amazones, to the number of three hundred Ladies (as some report) and left the rest in place conuenient : in very honourable equipage she went to Alexander, of whom shee was most graciously entertained, with extraordinary affability, & offered her whatsoeuer remained in his power ; so that very instantly he desired her, to demaund what she pleased, and it should not be denied her.

The answer of Thalestria to Alexander.

She answered in this manner : I come not (great Alexander) to desire Landes, Rule, or Dominations, because I haue sufficient of mine owne, but onely to know a King so much renowned; of whom I haue heard such matter of maruaile, that I come (if thou please) to accept thee as my Husband, and to haue Issue by thee, that I might baaſt of an Heire sprung from the Loynes of so excellent a Princee. And King, thou canſt not mislike my Linage or descent, being euery way as generous as thy selfe, and of so high Parentage as deserues no disdain. Withall, I promise thee, that if the Gods doe graunt me a Daughter by thee, I will bee Nurſse to it mine owne selfe, and make her mine onely Inheritour. But if it be a Sonne, then will I send it to be nourished as great ALEXANDER shall appoint it.

Alexanders answer to Thalestria.

Alexander replied, if she would goe along to the wars with him, & he wold respect her as his honorable Companion: But she shaping an excuse, replied; that she could not go with him, but to her shame, and in daunger to loose her owne Kingdome; wherefore, again she requested him, to grant her desire. To conclude, she kept company with Alexander for the space of thirteen daies, in modest (and yet secret) conuersation: which time being expired, and her leaue admitted, she returned to her Country againe.

The decaying of the Amazons Empire.

But, as it is the naturall property of time, to consume al things; euen so the raigne and power of the Amazons, grew afterward to a diminishing: so that decreasing still by little and little, it fell at length to be wholly extirpated. This hath beene generally helde for a true History, and for such doe I heere insert it. Trogus Pompeius affirmeth it, and so doth Iustine, Diodorus, Orosius, Martianus Capellus, Quintus Curtius, Herodotus, Iulius Solynus, Polihistor, Pomponius Mela, and Amianus Marcellinus, with many other auncient Authours, besides those that are Moderne. But whofoeuer shall reade the History of Bohemia (which Pope Pius the second hath written very truly, and with such painful diligence) and there perceiuethe how these Women long time helde the Dominion of Bohemia, ouer-treading the whole Countrey, & making very often and necessary warres, this Historie of the Amazons will no way seeme incredible to him.

We read also in the life of the Emperour Claudius the second, who triumphed ouer the Gothes, that in the battell which he had against them, there were taken ten Souldiers that fought verie valiantly: who being disrobed of their Garments were found to be Women, and it was held for an vndoubted opinion, that they were descended of the Linage of the Amazons.

What might we also say of the Maid of France, whom the French-men called the Pucelle de Vancoleur: There is hardly any Man, neuer so meanelly read in Histories; but is acquainted with the many battailes fought by her, wherein she had the charge of a Captaine; as also how many times she was in the Fielde, as valiant as any man in the world could be. I could yet name many other Women, but I must needs let them sleep in silence, to obserue the breuity which at first I promised.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquitie of Constantinople, and how it became Conquered by the Turkes.

Mong all the famous inhabited Citties of the World, there was neuer any (after Rome) that hath beene seene of so great strength & honor, as Constantinople very highly renowned both by the Grecians and Latines. Strabo calleth it Magnificent; Pliny and Iustine tearme it most Noble; scituated in a most excellent and fertile soyle, ennobled with great personages, and sumptuous Buildings. It was a long time the cheefe Citty and Seate of the Empire, wherein hath beene held many generall Councils, for destroying and extirpation of infinite Heresies. Many noble and notable occasions haue therein happened, both in the prosperity and tribulations thereof: and yet (as we too well knowe) it is fallen into captiuitie, whereof wee will breiefely declare the whole History.

Strab. lib 7. Cap. 2. Plin. lib. 6. cap. 9. Iustine. Lib. 7. Cap. 9.

It is a Cittie in Europe, seated in the Countrey of Thrace, being plentifull in Fertility, great in Circumference, and very mighty in power. Her plot and Plantation is on the narrow Sea, betweene Asia and Europe, at the entrance of Pontus, or the Euxine Sea, called the great Sea. For which cause, Ouid calleth it the Port of two Seas; because it standeth in a narrow, or straight. Constantinople (according to Ptolomy) containeth three and forty degrees of Latitude; that is to say (for their better apprehension who are herein ignorant) that it is distant from the Equinoctiall, three and forty degrees, there, where the Poole is eleuated, and in the sixe and fifty degree of longitude of the Meridian, which passeth the Island of the Canaries. The first founders of this Citty (by common opinion, and of the best Authors) were the Lacedemonians. Orosius saith, the Spartans, with Pausanias their Captaine and King: Albeit, Eustachius (according as Volateranus also reporteth) that it was founded by a Captaine of the Megarians, named Bizeus, and after whose name it was called Bizantium. Diodorus and Polybius doe say, that it was called Bizantium, after the Name of a Captaine, that laid the Foundation thereof. Neuerthelesse, Pliny affirmeth, that at the first it was called Ligos, and not Bizantium.

But that it should be true, that Pausanias founded it; Iustine iustifies it: The like doth Paulus Orosius, and all the Moderne Writers, deliuering the reason of the building it. For (say they) Pausanias being wandring with his beggerly followes through the Worlde, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, to know where he & they should make their abiding, and had this aunswere returned him; That hee should remaine face to face with the blind. This he vnderstood to meane the Megarians, who dwelling in Calcidonia, in a bad barren place, hauing forsaken the side of Constantinople, which was good and fertile. The selfesame is deliuered by Strabo; albeit hee doth not name the founder. But in what time soeuer it was, Eusebius speaking thereof, saith; that it was builded very neere to the time of the thirtieth Olympiade, euen then when Tullus Hostilius raigned in Rome. At the first beginning, it was but a small thing, as all other new erected Townes were wont to bee; and for a certaintie, it was some while subiect to the Lacedemonians; or, as others say, to the Athenians, vntill such time as those two great Estates contending together, it had leysure to growe rich, encreasing both in wealth and power, and by meanes of their dissention still continuing, it enlarged it selfe to some more greatnesse.

Afterward, it flourished it such sort, with the liberty which it had, and the fruitfulness of the soyle, that Phillip K. of Macedon; Father to Alexander the great, grew enamored of her beauty & mighty riches, and concluded to Conquer it; whereto (for his better attaine-ment) he laid a long time of besiedging, and yet could not take it. One day, Leo a notable Sophister, had conference with king Phillip, and the same was afterward written by Philostratus, in the History of the Gymnosophists. For as Phillip continued his enterprize: with a very huge Army of choise selected men. Leo a learned Sophister, dwelling in Bizantium, went vnto him, and spake in this maner:

40 Tell me King Phillip, what iniury hast thou receiued of Bizantium, that hath moued thee to make Warre vpon her, with such violent fury? I haue receiued (aunswere Phillip) not any iniury of the Citty, whereby to prouoke me as her Enemy: but because she seemes more beautifull to mee, then all the other Citties of Thrace; as enamored of her perfections, I would faine Conquer, and make her mine. Kings that are amorous (aunswere Leo) and would be beloved where they place affection: doe labour to compasse their intent with sweet Musick, pleasing speeches, gifts, and such like kinde behauiour; and neuer strine to enforce them, by rough tearmes and rude Warre.

And euen so it fell out with this King, for (as we haue already said) hee could not compasse his desire, but left it in far greater strength and liberty, then it was before. Afterward, by succession of time, when the Romains began to make warre in Greece, they entred into league and amity with the Bizantians, and many times were supplied with their helpe and kindnesse, in sundry warres & stout foughten battails, which strenghtned still her flourishing prosperity; and also augmented her buildings and wealth. A long while after, the Romain rule coming to the gouernment of Emperors, (Seuerus then rainging) the Tyrant Pessinius (enemy to the Emperor) tooke possession of this City of Bizantium. By meanes whereof, Seuerus sent thither a great Army to besiege it: but hauing not strength enough to surprize it by assault, they compelled him by Famine to yeeld himselfe; but first, the wals and goodly fortifications were battered, spoiled, and throwne downe vnto the ground, & so were all the goodly buildings. In brieft, the Tyrant had taken from them all their publick and priuate possessions, which he had wholly giuen away to the Parintians; and now after this besieging of it by the Romaines, there remained nothing of the former estate, but a very poore desolate City, wherein few or none desired to dwell. The parts and fragments of the destroyed wals and Houses, which remained to be seene in lamentable ruines, were of such an excellent kind of Stone, cut and squared with such admirable Art, that hardly could their ioyntes and closures be discerned.

This Calamity beeing ouer-blowne, and the Emperor Constantine rainging at Rome (euen hee that was surnamed the Great, Sonne to S. Helena the Queene, that founde the Crosse of our Sauour Christ) he determined to passe into the East, being mooued and meerey compelled thereto, by diuers Angures or Wizzards, concerning an Eagle, which broght him (as it is said) a cord between her Tallants, wherewith this Bird had measured out a new Habitation for him in another Countrey. Whereupon he concluded, to haue old ruined Bizantium againe re-edified, to honour it with another Name, and to make it the chief City of the world. By this means it was restored to her former estate, with such a large surmounting of Houses & faire Buildings, as she stood in contention with Rome for beauty. There he erected sumptuous Pallaces, goodly Churches, and high Towers; thither also he transported the Empire, with his Court, the Consuls, Senators, and all other Magistrates and Officers. Now, albeit he had amplified it in such forme and greatnes, that it seemed a new Rome, and so hee would haue had it called: yet notwithstanding, the voyce of the people so far preuailed, that the name of the Emperor must needs be giuen it, and so it was called Constantinople. The historians that then liued, & soone after, doe say, that the greatnes and sumptuous shew thereof was such, as it could not bee described without much prolixity.

The Emperor Constantine liued there many yeares, in the height of prosperity; so did the other Emperours likewise that succeeded him. There they continued the Empire, some in peace, others in warre, vntil such time, that (after a large expence of yeares) by diuers fowle sinnes committed by the Cittizens, occasioned thiorowe prosperity, ease, and ydlennesse, and partly by the weakenesse and negligence of the Emperours, the greatnesse and power thereof began to decline. So that hauing endured many misfortunes of fire, Pestilence, and terrible Earth-quakes, (the History whereof were too long to recite) there hauing also passed ouer cleauen hundred yeares of the Christians holding it in possession: This famous City (that alone ruled ouer so manie Nations, that was rich in Gold and Silver, honored with approued auncient excellencies, incomparable Churches, admyred Monuments, and raised out of the dust of Obluion by Gods permission, by Constantine; and afterward, by another Constantine, Sonne also to an Emperesse, named Helena) was besieged by Mahomet King of the Turkes, Lorde of the Lesser Asia, and of many other Regions and Prouinces, the grand-Fathers Father to Solyman, that liued when I wrote this History; the Predecessours of which Mahomet, had before that time Conquered the greater part of Greece.

The siedege was laid against this Cittie with such power and perseuerance, and maintained with so violent fury, that after Bizantium called Constantinople, after Constantines name.

Constantinople begins againe to decline her glory.

after many bloody Battels, & by course of as many Months while the siege continued, after the death also of infinite worthy men, as well on the one side as the other, the Turke appointed the last day of Battaille, to be the nine and twentieth day of May, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, fifty three (some say fifty two) the Emperor Frederick reigning then at Rome, thirde of that name, and he gaue them battaille by breake of day. In which extreame fury, the inhabitants being no longer able to resist the huge multitude of their Enemies and the impetuous storme; at length, the Cittie was surprized in the assault; and some Authours Record, that it was in this manner:

The manner
how Constantinople was conquered by the Turke.

The Emperor being giuen to vnderstand, that the Turke had abandoned the Citties Pillage for three dayes together, after many woorthy Orations made, he went out of the walles with a great number of his people, to defend the Barbacanes or Subburbes, which were of as high mounture and strength, as the walles of the Cittie. And he went himselfe in person, to counsell and giue order what was to be done, causing the Citties Gates to be fast shut after him, to take from his people all hope of Flight.

And euen now, did there happen the very fiercest and most cruell Battaille, that euer was scene since the inuention of Warre, with all kindes of Armes and Instruments for fight, as well for defending, as assailing. It seemed as if the very Heauens would haue split in sunder, with the noise and outcries of the Soldiers; and the earth looked like a Shambles, covered ouer with the Bloude of the slaine and Wounded. The Emperour on the one side, and the Turke on the other, added Spirite with their chearefull Wordes, to the great Encouragement of their armed Troopes, being themselves euer formost or hindmost, according as occasion and need required.

Of Iustinian
the valiant man of Genouay on whom the people
much relyed.

Among the Valiantest Warriors, that boldly stood for defence of the Barbacanes, there was a Genowese, named Iustinian, vpon whose Vertue and Valour the people within the walles not a little depended, in regard of his skill and manly power; and because in all the precedent battailes, he had bin stil the principall occasion of the Citties safety. Neuertheless, after a long resistance, being fore wounded, and his blood abundantly streaming from his hurts, he forsook the place that he defended, to haue some Medicines applied to him in the Cittie. Which when the people perceiued, their courage became immediately quailed; and worde thereof being brought to the Emperor, hee ran after him, instantly desiring him to returne & make good his place, shewing what necessity stood vpon his presence. But no conditions or promises whatsoever, could cause him to go backe: be it, that either it so pleased God, that his corage should faile him, or else that hee could no longer beare the griefe of his wounds, but (hauing them drest) intended to returne; the Gate was opened to him, and Chirurgions called to giue what help they could. In the meane space, his folowers that defended his quarter, not hauing him with them, began to shrink backe and giue ouer the place.

The Turkes no sooner beheld this advantage, but they fell afresh to a much more dreadfull assault; and contrariwise the Christians were so weake and out of hart, that being able to resist no longer, they turned their backs, seeking to shelter themselves in the City. The Gate remaining open, (wherat Iustinian had entered) in expectation of his returne; the Turkes mingled themselves among the Christians, and entering the City with them, went vp vpon the wals, and did pittiful massacres vpon the Christians. The Emperor (as some report) hauing changed his habit, to the end hee might not be knowne, was slaine by the enemies. Others say (among whom is Pope Pius the second) that as he desired to retire into the Cittie, grieving to see his people in such disorder, he was thrown down by the flying multitude, & being greatly trampled vpon by their passage ouer him, he died vnder the feete of his own folowers, euen in the very gate of the City. But be it howsoeuer, his body was knowne by the Turkes, who cut off his head, & fixing it on a Lances point, caried it (as their victories trophe) thorow the Camp; & after, into the City.

mentable misfortune) he seeing the City taken, fled away by the Sea, and dyed in a little Island, either of the woundes he had then receiued, or of some other disease; albeit he had it once in his own choise, to haue died honourably in the place where he had liued with so much Fame and Credit. The Turkes beeing thus entred the City, left no kinde of bloody cruelty vnperformed; that malice or villany could deuise. All the household and Kindered of the Emperour, both Men and Women, were (without mercy) put to the sword; & in like sort they dealt with all the people, except such as escaped, or whom they tooke to their slauish seruitude.

And heer I may not forget one notorious detestable action; for they could not content themselues, to execute their barbarous malice vpon Christian Men and women, but hauing gotten a goodly Image of the Crucifixe of Christ, they (in a shamelesse mockery) would needs performe another Crucifying thereof, vpon a Crosse made foule and filthy by their own beastly ordure, representing a new passion of our Sauiour; and ouer his head they wrote this Inscription: THIS IS THE GOD OF THE CHRISTIANS, with many other abominable blasphemies. In this manner, that Noble City of Constantinople fell into the hands of the Disciples of Mahomet, the sworne Enemies to Iesus Christ, as yet they doe continue. I would it pleased God, that euen as they hath bin in her wals many mutations to her great misfortune, that once againe it might bee regained, to serue to his Glory, and the generall good of Christendome.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of what Nation and race the Imposture Mahomet was, and at what time his Sect had his first beginning.

Here is a variation among the Historians, concerning of what Stocke or Parentage, as also of what country the false Prophet Mahomet was. Platina saith, that he was of a Noble lignage. Pomponius Letus, a very diligent Author (whom I meane to follow in this Chapter, principally in his abridgement of the Roman History,) He writes, and so doe diuers others beside, that he was of ignoble Race, Obscure and vile, and so indeede we may safeliest credit; because so wicked a man hauing nothing in him worthy of Memory, but a pride in Malice, Lewdnesse, and Iniquity, could neuer bee deriued from any Noble Blood. Some say, that he was an Arabe; Others, a Persian: but this is a matter of small moment, & yet both may haue some good colour of Reason, because in those times, the Persians had Dominion ouer Arabia. As for his Father, let him be either Noble or a Villaine, sure it is, that hee was a Gentile, an Idolater, and no Christian, much lesse a Iew, according to Platina, and all the rest. As for his Mother, most Authors are of Opinion, that shee was descended of Abraham, by the Linage of his Sonne Ismael, whom hee hadde by his Handmaid Agar: and therefore, she was Iewish, and obserued the Lawes of the Iewesse, for euery Father then delighted to instruct his Children in his owne Law.

This Mahomet, was of a quicke and liuely spirit, very soone apprehending whatsoeuer was taught him: but being yet very young, and left as an Orphant, was by a casuall aduenture, taken as a Slaue to the Scenites, who were then in that Countrey, as now at this day the Arabes are in Affrica. For they hadde no certaine place of abiding, neither any settled Goods or possessions, but liued in Common, vnder Tents and Trees, doing dayly Thefts and Robberies. Hee was afterward sold to a rich Merchant, named Adimoneple, who for the delight he had to see him so young, well featured, and quietly disposed, would not vse him as a Slaue, but rather as his owne Sonne. Mahomet being thus fortunately entertained, managed his Maisters Affayres with great care and diligence, making a mighty returne of profite, by trading dayly both with Iewes and Christians. Moreouer, by reason of this frequent conuersation, he learned sufficient in either of their lawes. While matters thus continued, the Merchant his

Mahomet would become a Prophet, and was a great Magician.

Maister died, without any children, leaving his Widdow very rich, aged about some fifty yeares; and she (according as I finde in the Chronicles of Constantinople, which agreeth with the opinion of some others) was of Mahomet's Kindred, and named Ladigna. She having made prooffe of his person, & his sufficiency, (euery way) took him to bee her Husband, making him (of a poore wretch) a rich Lord.

It fortuned at this very time, that there trauailed vpp into those parts of Arabia, a Christian cowled-Monke, named Sergius, a man of very euill nature, and who (for his Heresies) was fled out of Constantinople. Being come thither, he fell in acquaintance and amity with Mahomet, who already began (as puffed vp with Ambition) to thinke on great matters, and yet by very oblique waies. For he had an acute spirit, and was well entred into Magicall Sciences, so that by the Counsell and helpe of Sergius, he resolved to perswade the Gentiles, that he was a Prophet; and to that end, hee performed diuers sleights of Magicke, whereby his Wife, and they of his own house were first abused. Heere we are to vnderstand, that he hadde a disease (somewhat straunge to such as knew it not) which indeed was the falling sicknesse, wherat his wife and the rest waxing amazed, desired to know some reason thereof; and he would answer them, That the Angel of God vsed often to come and conferre with him, and hee could not (as being a mortall man) endure his Diuine presence, but fell into this Agony and alteration of spirit; but by these frequent visitations, he had instructions what to do, according to the will and direction of God. He was likewise so subtle and cautelous, that by meanes of his wife, who did constantly credit him, and made such straunge reports to her Neighbors, as also, the chiefeft of her friends and Kindred, that they grew by little and little to belieue him, and (among the Gentiles) hee attained vnto an especiall reputation.

Soone after, his wife died, so that he remained her vniuersall heire, in verie wealthy possessions, and huge sums of Money, which made him much bolder then he was before: and therefore, by assistance of Sergius the Monke, he published himselfe openly to be a Prophet, saying; that he was sent of GOD, to giue new Lawes to the world. And because he was very learned in al the laws, he practised so industriously, that he accorded partly with the Iewes, to possesse their affection, and partly with the Christians, not to make them his Enemies. Hee likewise held consent with many Heretickes then liuing, to compassse their fauour; with Macedonius hee denied the Holy-Ghost to bee God; & approoued the multiplicity of Wiues, with the Nicholaitans. On the other side, hee confessed that our Sauour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, was Holy, and a Prophet; and allowed that the Virgin Mary was also holy, and woulde much extoll her. With the Iewes hee helde Circumcision, and other Ceremonies: and generally, he permitted in his false Religion, all Vices of the flesh in absolute Liberty. In all which, beeing made potent and no way contradictory, they were written altogether in a Booke, named Mahomet's Alchoran.

Now because he distrusted the sufficiency of his cause, he did forbid to all men whatsoever, not to dispute his ordinances on paine of death, saying; that they ought to bee obserued by force of Armes throughout the World. At the beginning of these things, he was much frequented with the vulgar multitude, and men apt to be abused by his grosse perswasions. They flocked together in huge troupes, to bee acquainted with him, for all carnal vicious men were his chiefeft-fauourers, and being no meane number of them in the world, they grew to a very great Sect, and by their means and assistance, he assaulted the Confines of Arabia, and made himselfe Lorde of much wealth. This was done, in the year of our Lord, about 620. Heraclius being then Emperor of Rome, and holding his seat at Constantinople. Boniface the fift, being then Pope and great Byshop of Rome: and after him, Honorius his Successor.

This Newes comming to the Emperor Heraclius (as Platina testifieth) he prepared to redresse it; & partly did so, by entertaining in pay the Scenites of Arabia, a warlicke people, and who had fauoured Mahomet. The Emperour dispersed them into sundry places, and they pre-uailed

The reason why he tearmeth them to be Agarians, because they called the Christians so in come uailed so well by their power, that this new Sect (for a time) became indifferently asswaged: but it was a great error in him, that he did not still pursue them, or seeke such meanes, as might root vp that wicked generation, who deliuered such Diuinish Doctrines abroad. For proceeding on no further in his enterprize, it did the more harme that he had begun it; because through defect of keeping promise with the Semites, and paying them their accustomed wages; they (in meere despight) ioyned with Mahomet; and elected him to be their Captaine, because he was of great reputation, and held to be a Prophet of God. They grew to such boldnesse and strength, that they assailed the people and Countries belonging to the Romaine Empire, and entring Syria, conquered the Noble City of Damas, with all Egypt, Judea, and the Lands neighboring therabout, perswaded the Saracens, (a people of Arabia) that the Lande of Promise appertained vnto them, as the Legittimate Successors to Father Abraham.

Mahomet beholding such prosperous successe, and ayming to Maister all the World, he proudly attempted to warre vpon the Persians, who were then verie mighty: but at the beginning it went not well with him, in regard hee was vanquished; and some say, that it was in the very first battaile. Afterward, hauing recomforted his troopes, & enlarged them with a greater number, he set vpon the Persians againe, brought them into subiection, and inforced them to embrace his Religion. Now, albeit the Emperor Heraclius was heereof aduertised, yet he offered no such assistance as he ought to haue done, for hee might haue stifled this Brat in the verie breeding: but nowe, it was a matter much more difficult, for hee had conquered Cosroes the potent King of Persia, taking from him the Crosse of our Saviour, which he had brought from Ierusalem into Persia, as a safe defence for it, that it might not fall into the handes of Mahomet, and the Agarians his Complices.

I tearme them Agarians, because that they which followed Mahomet, and tooke part with him, wold cal the Christians Agarians, in derision and mockery, saying; that neither they, nor Mahomet, had taken their Originall from the line of Sara, the Wife of Abraham; and therefore ought not to be cald Saracens, as after Saraes name, but rather they shold bee called Agarians, as deriuing their fourse from Agar, the Hand-maid of Abraham. To conclude, after Mahomet had run thorough many strange & horrible things, he was poisoned, and died in the fortieth yeare of his age, (some say at the age of thirty foure yeares) in the yeare of our Lord (according to Sabellius) 3.

And because, Mahomet had often tolde his pertakers, that (after hee was dead) he should mount vp to Heauen, they kept his body for certaine dayes aboue ground; vntill such time, that it fauoured most horribly, stinking euen like his soule; & then, it was put into a chest of Iron, and they carried it to the City of Meca in Persia, where it is adored of all the people of the East; yea, euen of the greater part of the world, and that for our finnes.

Calipha succeeded Mahomet in the Empire, and Haly after Calipha. These two, did greatly augment the power & Sect of Mahomet, and so from time to time, by diuers orders and successions; but especially by the finnes and Cowardise of the Christian Emperors in those times, this pestilence hath spread ouer the world, euen to our dayes. But by the care and good dilligence of that Noble Emperor Charles the fift, we were once very graciously deliuered, euen when the great Turke Solyman, came with an Army of about 600000 men, to enter the Countries of Hungaria and Austria, with intention to conquer al Christendome. Against which enterprize, the Emperor Charles presented himselfe in person, hauing but a small moiety of men with him, in comparison of the multitude brought by the Turke, yet were they all well chosen, and able fighting men. At the report whereof, the Turke left his enterprize, with losse of many of his people, as hee did also the second time, in the yeare, 1537. when he came by Sea, and by Land, against Italy; and surprized some places in the kingdome of Naples.

The Originall and beginning of the Turkes, how they came to their Government, and what Princes haue ruled among them.

HE mighty Dominion of the Turkes, which at this day is so great & dreadful: likewise the Lignage and Family of the Ottomans & Kings; they are but nouell, and of no Antiquity, albeit the Turkish people haue bin of long continuance; so that it is a matter almost meruailous, that in such short time they should be so hugely augmented. For it is not about* two hundred and fifty yeares, that they were knowne to begin and get a Name. Behold therefore, how it may well be credited, that they were sent as a scourge by Gods permission, to chastise his vnthankful christian people, euen as heertofore, he sent an Antiochen, a Nabuchodonosor, a Cyrus, and such other, to oppresse and vex his elected children. And because the Christian Church hath receiued by them one of the most memorable persecutions and losses that euer she had, I held it not much differing from my purpose (especially, hauing made mention of the Originall of this Sect) to speake somewhat more thereof, as briefly as may be. As the like hath bin done by Aeneas Syluius, Raphael Volateranus, & Nicholaus Secondinus, far more distinctly then any of them before named. Also, Frances Philephus in a Letter which hee wrote to Charles 8. K. of France: & Antonius Sabellicus in his History. From all which Authors, I haue collected what I will briefly set downe. But principally, I do obserue Paulus Iouius, in a particular Tract by him Written, concerning these people and Turkish Nation, not forsaking Plinie, and Pomponius Mela, in the end of his first Booke.

To begin with these two last recited Authors, they say, That their Originall came from the * Sarmates, which are on the Confines of Scythia, at the vttermost entrance into the Caspian Sea, and that they liued sauagely in vast Fieldes, hunting for victuals to maintaine their Liues: Of which Sarmates or Scythians, it is certain (all other opinions left) that the Turkes (to this very instant) haue receiued their Originall. And all such as say or thinke, that they were discended of the Troyans, do but abuse themselves. It would seem to them, that because the Turkes haue ruled Troy, and that the Troyans were named * Teucres, that the Turkes had thence their first deriuation: But indeed, they are issued of the Sarmates, whom all our Ancients hold to bee Scythians, and so did they call them. But in former times long since, their proper name was Turaces. Pliny and Pomponius Mela do title them so, but since the, they haue bin called Turks; and so commonly are they vniuersally tearmed. These people (as Otho the Arch-bishop affirmeth in his History) about 800. yeares after the Natiuity of our Lorde (albeit some others write that it was before) would needs depart out of Scythia into the lesser Asia, which to this day, in regard of their name, is cald Turky; where by robbing and spoiling they conquerd some few Princes; and then (as people barbarous and void of Faith) they embraced the wicked sect of Mahomet, as the very first that presented it selfe vnto them, and seemed most conformable to their detestable customs. Thus this people, by reason of their multitude and sauage fiercenes, became dreadfull to the world, & soone surprized many Cities.

Some hold, that they intruded vpon Persia, Armenia, and Media, but howsoeuer it was, it is most euident (among all other things) that they inhabited the Lesser Asia, according as we haue already declared: yet not by meanes of any King, or any other chief notable head among them, but coupled themselves in in companies together; sustaining and defending one another, for a long space in that Countrey. Some of the most aparant or best note among them, wold call such supply of men as they best fancied, and with them they would goe to feize on Townes and Countries.

Among those of boldest spirit, there was one named Solyman, who got to himselfe the Realme of Cilicia, and part of the bordering limits. In those dayes, Duke Godfrey of Bullen, accompanied with diuers other christian Princes, passed the Seas (with such powers of men as they had assembled) to Conquer the Holyland. Against whom, Solyman (with his followers) came very forwardly, but they were all vanquished and scattered. By which means, the Turkes remained a long time without any Captaine or Commander of name among them; & therefore were little respected, vntill in the yeare, 1300. that another then named Ottoman (a man of base discent) began againe (by little and little) to gaine some reputation among them, for that he was a very valiaunt man, mighty of body, fortunat, and of an ingenious subtile spirit. This fellow, took occasion to aduance himselfe, for the discourse hee held with them, and strengthening himselfe with a multitude of able men, hee conquered and made himselfe Lorde of many Countreyes; aswell of his owne, as others of his neighbors. Being by this meanes become somewhat powerful, he left vnto his successors the raigne & authority, which continueth to this day by the linage masculine among the Turks.

He hauing raigned 28. yeares, died, in the yeare 1308. Bennet the 11. being the Pope of Rome. Ottoman thus deceased, a son of his, named Orcan, succeeded him; a man no lesse strong and valiaunt then his Father, but rather more industrious and better aduised in his Conquestes. Moreouer, he was a notable inuenter of many Engines & Instruments for war; magnanimious, and very bountifull to all men; in regard whereof, he so much augmented the raigne of his predecessor, and the number of his men of war, that (beside the Countreyes which his father had commanded in Asia) he vsurped vpon Bythinia, & the Kingdome of Constantinople. And in the lesser Asia, he subdued Hircania, Phrigia, Caria, and other potent Lands. When hee had raigned twenty two yeares, in assaying a Cittie, he chanced to be wounded; of which hurt he died, in the yeare, 1350. when Clement the sixt was Byshop of Rome.

He had to be his successor, Amurath the sonne of a Christian woman whom he had espoused, she was Daughter to the King of Celicia, now called Caramania. This Amurath was much different from his Graund-Father, and Father; for he was a mocker, a man double and false, weake of his person, and of wicked inclination; Ambitious, and very desirous to enlarge his Empire, whereof he had very faire occasion offered him, when the Emperour of Constantinople was in strife with diuers Princes his subiects who greatly fauoured the Lord of Bulgaria, which is a portion of the ancient neather * Mysia. For the Emperour was then constrained, to request aide of this Amurath King of the Turkes, who sent him fiftene thousand woorthy men of Warre, by whose helpe the Emperour ouercame his Enemies. And leauing part of these fiftene thousand Turks in his Countreyes, when hee had sent home the rest, Amurath got aduertisement (from them) of the peoples disposition. By meanes whereof, hee determined to visite Greece, vnder colour indeede, that he would helpe the Emperour against his Aduersaries. Heereupon, he leuied three score thousand footmen & a great number of Horse, with which strong power, he made himselfe Lorde of * Callipolis (which I thinke should more properly be called Galloris, because it was builded by Gallyans) and of other strong Fortresses therabout, as also the Cittie of * Adrinople, now termed Andronople.

On the otherside, the great Lord & Maister of Bulgaria, named Marcus, after he had prepared such an army as was possible for him to do, with the aide of Lazarus the Despote of Serua (which is a Prouince on the limits of Thrace, anciently called the higher Mysia, & assisted also with the Princes of * Albania, hee went against the Turke, where fighting a great battell, the Christians were in the end vanquished, and almost all slain. of Thrace, and also of Greece. When he had liued 23. yeares; a Slaue (that was Seruant to Lazarus Lord of Seruia) traitorously killed him, in the yeare, 1373. Hee left two Sonnes; the one, named Solyman, and the other Baiazeth; which Baiazeth, slew his Brother Solyman, and remained Prince alone: of a singuler Wisedome, & high resolved courage. He was extraordinary diligent, and of great iudgement in Warre, very ready in effecting what he had commaunded: And for this cause hee was called generally, King of the Sunne.

So soone as he began his raigne, hee determined to make war vpon the christians, in iust reuenge of his Fathers death, and with admirable speede (having prepared a very powerfull Army) passed into Greece. First of all he set on Marcus, Lord of Bulgaria, who ioyning battell with him, was there slaine, with the greater part of the Nobility of Bulgaria and Seruia. Three yeares after a victory so famous, hee returned againe vpon the Christians, and made most cruell warres in Hungaria; but first of all in Albania and Vallachia, which is a great Countrey, in ancient times stiled Dacia, and it extended it self in length euen to Hungaria: from whence he brought home into Turkey, a very great number of Christians, and there made them Slaues.

Seeing himselfe to bee possessed of the greater part of Greece; that is to say, of the old city and Country of Athens, of Boetia and Arcania; hee then came & laid siege to the great City of Constantinople; which was the reason, that the Emperour (in person) went to entreate the Westerne Princes, to fauour him with their needfull assistance. To help a case so desperat, Charles the 7. gaue ayd of 2000. Lances, amongst which faire Troope, were two French Gentlemen of worthy note, that ioyned their power with Sigismond King of Hungaria, who afterwards was Emperour, and had likewise provided a great Army for the same enterprize. With them tooke part the Despotes of Seruia, the grand Maister of the Rhodes, & a great number of other Christian Princes. Whereupon, Baiazeth leauing his attempt for Constantinople, marched suddenly with 300000 men, to meet these Christians, who were about an 100000. whereof there were 20000. Horse. Being met together, they had a wonderfull bloody battaile, wherein the Christians were conquered, and the greater number of them slaine, by reason of the base Flight of the King of Hungary, and the Maister of the Rhodes; as for the French-men, they wer all slaine, or taken: and this battell was fought in the yeare 1395. being the Eeuen of S. Michaell.

After which Victory, Baiazeth returned againe to his former besiedging of Constantinople, which hee reduced to such hard extreimity, as (without anie doubt) he had taken it; but that Newes came to him of Tamburlaine the Great, (of whose life and actions, we shall discourse heereafter, by it selfe) that (with a meruailous Army) he was entred into his Countries of Asia and Turkey, and there already had surprized many goodly Citties, Townes, and Prouinces. Wherefore, trussing vp bag & baggage, he returneth into Asia, where preparing to the Fielde his very ablest power, hee went to encounter this presumptuous Enemy.

Now, did the two most potent Princes in the whole world, make a meeting day in Martiall armes together; where, to speake of the dreadfulness of the fight and wonderful slaughter on both sides, it may much easier be imagined, then in any breuity reported. But fortune was aduerse to Baiazeth, for his power was vanquished, and himselfe taken; Nay more, he endured the most vile & strictest imprisonment that euer was. For, Tamburlaine led him in triumph along with his army, in a great cage of wood; (or of Iron, as some others report) & at euery time he mounted on his horse, he made the shoulders of Baiazeth his footstool. Moreouer, when he should eat, he made him to lie vnderneath his Table; to the end that he should feede on nothing, but what he cast down to him, euen as if he had bin a Dog. And in this manner, this Prince ended his life, who had bin the most aduenturous, most renowned, & more feared, then any other that was in his time. Tamburlaine Conquered Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, with many other countries in the Dominion of Turkey: and from thence, he went and made war vpon the Soldan of Egypt.

Amurath eight King of the Turkes, a fortunate Prince

The Children of Baiazeth, who escaped from the battell wherein their Father was taken, in their flight towards those parts which they commaunded in Greece; were surprized vpon the Sea by certaine Christian Gallies. But if such extremity had bin shewne them, as was necessarily required: those harmes had bin prevented, which after followed. For Calapine being one of them that was deliuered, comming to name himselfe Lord in the Empire of his father, began to strengthen himselfe, and mustering vp his peopletogether, fortifying also his holds in Greece and Thrace: the Emperor Sigismond made offer to hinder him, to the end he might not come vpon him againe; and also to reuenge on him, the battel hee had lost against his Father; wherupon he leuied his forces, and made against him very valiauntly. Calapine prouiding to encounter him, appointed the day for fight, wherein Sigismond was againe vanquished, & escaped from the battell by Flight: this was 3. yeares after his first discomfiture. Afterward, Calapine hauing sufficiently spoyled the country of Serua, he returned to his owne Prouinces, where hee raigned six yeares, and died in the time of Pope Alexander the fift.

Calapine left two sons, the eldest named Orcan, and the other Mahomet; but Orcan was slaine by his Vnckle, because he would haue had the gouernment himselfe. Neuerthelesse, Mahomet obserued so discreet a cariage, that hee slew the murderer of his Brother, & got the Empire into his owne hand. Soone after, he made strong Warre vpon the Christians in Valachia, and passed thence into Turkey, or the Lesier Asia, where hee reconquered the Landes and Prouinces which Tamburlain had gotten from his Grandfather. In which war, he spent 14 yeares of his raigne, and died in the year 1420. during the High Priest-hoode of Pope Martine the fift.

After Mahomet, succeeded a Sonne of his called Amurath, a very fortunate Prince: for he being at the death of his Father in Asia, assembled a mighty power of Soldiers, and in despite of the Emp. of Constantinople (who much laboured to resist him) he entred very far into the Christians Countries. He took diuers Cities in Serua, conquered the kingdom of Epire (at this day called Romania) & made diuers courses into Hungaria, then into Albania, which is a part of ancient Macedonia. In which enterprises, albeit he received many shrewd endamagements, yet such was his fortune, that hee still continued victory; beside much wealthy profit, and great store of Horses. He besiedged also the Cittie of Belgrade in Hungaria, on the riuer of Danubie; but yet he could not take it, wherfore he was compelled to raise his siedege, with great slaughter of his men.

Not long after, Ladislaus K. of Polonia and Hungaria, came with a great Arnie against him, which when hee heard, hee sent before him, one of his chiefest Captains, conducting a potent company of men; and the two Armies ioyning in battell, Ladislaus (after much resistance) became the Conqueror, with a wonderful massacre of the Turkes. By meanes whereof, and because Amurath was aduertised, that the K. of Caramania made warre on him in Asia, he was forced to make peace with Ladislaus: which peace while Amurath was fighting in Turkey, was broken, by perswasion of the Emperor of Constantinople, Pope Eugenius, the Venetians, and Phillip Duke of Burgundy, who altogether in one vnanimity, bound themselves by oath, so strongly to defend the straits of the Sea, at the entrance into Europ and Asia, that Amurath could not passe with his Troops, to succor those parts which were afflicted, and so Ladislaus should haue leysure to win, & make himselfe sole-Commander of them. Amurath hearing of this bolde enterprize, returned very powerfully, and in despite of the Christians Army, passed the straits, and after, came to present Ladislaus the battaile: wherein the aduerture was so doubtfull for Amurath, that hee saw no remedie but Flight. Neuerthelesse, one of his valiant Bathaes cōpelling him to stay, they got the victory, and Ladislaus lost his life; on S. Martins day, in the yeare, 1440.

After this great conquest made in Hungary, he set vpon the kingdom of Morea, in elder times called Peloponnesus, where the Famous old Cities of Lacedemon & Corinth were; and hauing broken down the wall at entrance into the Prouince, which contained sixe miles in length, he entred into the Ionian Sea: As also, the Egean*, where he conquered al, except some few coasting places. This he did, when he had raigne 31. yeares, and died in the yeare, 1450. Hee first ordained the band of Janissaries, which were reuolted Christians, who are the principall strength of Turkey. By reason of his death, his Son Mahomet came to succeed after him in the Empire. But some say, that his Father resigned it to him in his life time, feeling himselfe far spent and aged.

This Mahomet was excellent in all things, only he was somewhat too cruel. At the beginning of his raigne, to the end he might attempt some matter, answerable to the greatnesse of his mind, he determined first of all to conquer the Citty of Constantinople: and the better to accomplish his purpose, hee leauied mighty powers of men, as well by Sea, as on the Land, wherewith he besieged it, and wonne it also, according as wee haue declared in the former discourse of that Citty, and all other places in Obedience to that Empire. Which done, hee came against the Citty of Belgrade, but it was defended by the strength of a woorthy Hungarian Captaine, named Iohn Vauoida, who in many valiant Batels, vanquished great numbers of the Turkes best Captaines, and now also, he compelled him to raise his siege, after diuers sore wounds and losses, & to leaue his best Artillery behinde him. These things not prospering to his purpose, he sent one of his Bashaws to spoil Morea, which had entred into rebellion against him, by the assistance of the Venetians; and to rumaré the Isle of Neyropont*, in former times cald Euboca, with Mytelene and Lemnos, an Iland in the Archipelagus, bordering on the Egean sea. Then he entred the Prouince of Bossina, which is part of the vpper old Mysia, and into Seruaia, where he tooke the King, & commanded his head to be smitten off.

Hauiing gotté al these victories against the christians, he crost into Asia against Vsancaffanus the puissant K. of Persia, bidding him two seuerall battailes; In the first whereof he was vanquished; but after, remained conqueror. This businesse ended, he determined to set vpon the Emp. of Trebisand, which is one of the coasts of ancient Capadocia, on the shore of Pontus, or the Euxine sea, winning the Empire, and killing the Emperour himselfe. So ended all the gouernment which the Christians had in those Countries. He sent also a potent army (vnder Conduct of a valiaunt Captaine) into Italie, which passed on to Carinthia* and Isbria*, euen to the lands of the Venetians, who sent a strong power to withstand him: but in the conflict, the Christians were vanquished, and there perished many of the Nobility of Italy. Moreouer, he sent another army against the Isle of Rhodes; but beeing able to compasse nothing there, he withdrew again. Then he sent the like army to the kingdom of Naples, conducted by one of his Bashaws, named Acomath, who won the Citty of Ottanta, which was in the Turkes possession aboue a yeare, to the great scandall and damage of Italy.

Afterward, with an army of 300000 men by Land, and 200. Gallies, accompanied with 300. armed Shippes, he set forward to make war against the Great Soldan of Egypt, but he was preuented by death on the way; by means whereof, the enterprize went not forward, but was presently staide. And hauiing raigne 32. yeares, he died of the Collicke, in the year 1481. By whose death, the Citty of Ottanta was recouered, and Ponilla also released from the Turkes, which was a great comfort to Italy, in no meane feare and wofull Calamitie; which indeed was such, that Pope Sixtus, in whose time this terrour happened, determined to withdraw himselfe downe into Fraunce (the Auncient recourse of the Romaine Church,) for that there was small hope of defending Rome against him. And it is reported, that in the Warres of this vnhappily too fortunate Mahomet, there dyed (as well by Weapons, as other violences, which were acted and vsed in the saide Warres) more then three hundred thousand men.

Two Sonnes remained as Heyres to this Mahomet; the one, being Named Baiazeth, and the other Zizim, because their Elder Brother died before their Father. Each of these sons sought the aptest meanes, to get possession absolutely of the Kingdome. Zizim had the helpe of the Soldan, & some strong Bashaws, likewise another part of the Bashaws & Janissaries fauored Baidzeth:

on the other side, a Son to this Baiazeth, called Corcutus, was created grand Signeur in Constantinople. Whereupon, Baiazeth made such quicke speede thither, & carried with him so strong a power, that he took such sufficient order with his son, as the Empire was his own. Vpon this good successe, he returned again into Turky against his Brother, & droue him to Flight among the Christian forces; and finally, he died in Italy, Baiazeth remaining then Lord alone. Within 3. yeares after, hauing prepared a puissant Army, hee passed along on land, by the Ritter Danubie, & hauing performed many dismal stratagems, he returned home. Then sent he a strong power against the Soldan of Egypt, with whom he was exceedingly offended, for giuing aid to his Brother Zizim. The Soldan also sent an Army to meete him, which was much lesse then that of the Turkes, & yet they had the victory, with a great slaughter of the Turkes. Which when Baiazeth vnderstood, he took truce with the Soldan, and made war vpon the Christians, wherein he sped so wel, that he won the City of Durace* in Albania, and that of Vallona, which bordereth on the coast, & fronteth Pouilli. Hee sent also a great number of men into Hungary, against whom the Princes came with their forces, but were foiled to their great losses.

In these times, he did much harme to other Countries of the Christians; and ayd being requested of him by Lewes D. of Millaine (who made warre vpon the Venetians, that ioyned themselues with Lewes king of France) he sent him a stout Captaine with 10000. horse, who passing along by Frioly, without resistance, tooke, burnt, and made hauocke of the Country, euen so far as the Mountains which front Venice. The year following, in person he conquered the city of Modon* in Morea, with other Sea-coasting places held by the Venetians, and labouring to make a deuastation of all, his intention was hindered by the Duke of Sesarnum*, who being a Spaniard, by the helpe of a stout company of Spaniards, called him to battell, and there ouercam him, conquering also for the Venetians, the Isle of Cephalonia*; by means whereof, the Turke was forced to take Truce with them, which euer since hath continued, euen to our time. And in this narrow straite, ceased the fury of Baiazeth, for then he quite gaue ouer warre (seeing himselfe aged) to rest & betake himselfe to study. In his time, began the Empire of the Sophy in Persia, which hath bin, and is, a great bridle vnto the Turkes, and hindereth them from doing such endamage to Christians, as they haue done, and wold do. For these two mighty Princes, are continual enemies one to another: Which hapned, thorow a man named Ismael, that called himselfe a Prophet, and published a new manner of Alchoran, contrary to that which was inuented by Mahomet; by whose meanes he leuied a very powerfull army, wherwith he vanquished certaine Bathawes, which Baiazeth had sent against him, and so put himselfe into full possession of Persia, with diuers other wealthy Prouinces beside; since when, he hath much enlarged his Dominions. But to our former purpose.

This Baiazeth had three Sons: The first named Acomath, the second, called Corcutus, who (as wee haue already declared) gaue himselfe into his Fathers hands at Constantinople, and resigned vp the Empire. The third, was named Selim; great Grand-father to the Turke now raigning. And albeit this Selim was yonger then the other, yet had he a more manly spirit. This fellow, seeing his Father olde and decrepite, determined to take the kingdome from him, and put himselfe in possession thereof: which the better to effect, hee acquaints himself with the Great Tartarian, and makes his Daughter his Wife. No sooner came an inckling heereof to the other Brothers, but each of them went seuerally about the like purpose. It appeared for lawfull in the eye of Acomath, because he was the eldest Sonne, and in reason the Succession appertained vnto him. On the other side, Corcutus pleaded, that hee once had possession of the gouernment, and resigned it in dutie to his father, who being now old & vnable to rule the kingdom, he ought in reason returne it to him againe. The Old man perceiuing these busy disputes, and the dangers thereby like to ensue: became greatly perplexed, specially at the disobedience of his children. During these intercourses, diuers murmurs & tumults arose, wherin many of the chiefest parta-kers in either faction, died and miscarried. Neuertheless, Selimes side, (albeit he was the yonger Brother) continued yet of best ability : because (vnder colour of begging pardon, and making peace with his Father, as also defending himselfe against his eldest Brother, who made war with his Father) he caried his courses so currantly, and preuayled in short while, to win the hearts of the Ianissaries, and the other stoutest Warriours, that (by their helpe) he took the Kingdome from his Father, compelling him (perforce) to renounce it ; whereupon, he banished him from Constantinople, and in the end (continuing in exile) procured him to be poisoned. Thus died Baiazeth, in the yeare, one thousand, five hundred, and twelue. And in this manner, came the Turkish Empire into the hand of Selim, a Traitour and Parricide.

He caused himselfe to bee Crowned with great solemnity, euen the very same day, which fell out to be so cruell and bloody to Rauenna in Italy. So soon as he saw himselfe seated to his owne contentment, he began to distribute the Riches and Iewels of his Father, to his Ianissaries and Valiaunt men of Warre, which made him the better esteemed, and the more strong in power. Soone after, hee went into Turkey against his Brothers ; where first of all, he slew diuers Children of some other Brothers of his, deceased in the life time of his father ; and followed so fiercely on his Brother Corcutus, till hee got him into his hands, and then he murdered him. Acomah the eldest Son, acquainting himselfe with the Sophy and the Soldane, by their meanes provided himselfe of a great Army, wherwith he gaue his Brother battell, wherein hee loosing the day, was taken, and afterward strangled.

Thus this Wicked Tyrant, hauing flaine all of his owne bloud, liued without ieaousie of his Kingdome, and because he held the Sophy and the Soldan in disdain, hee made peace with Ladislaus then King of Hungary, and confirmed his league with the Venetians. Then preparing a very great army, with no meane forces of Artillery, hee went against the Sophy ; who trusting in his happinesse and prosperity, made heade against him with a strong Army, & wel provided. Notwithstanding, when it came to bee discided by battell, which was very sharpe & violent for the time : the Sophy was foyled and Wounded ; glad to saue himselfe by Flight, which meruailously augmented the honor and reputation of the Turke by this successe : and this discomfiture hapned the 24. of August, in the yeare 1514. The yeare following, he being addicted wholly to warre, would goe against a great Lord, whose Regiment was at the Mountaine Taurus ; and albeit he was a very valiant Prince, yet was hee so hotly pursued, that falling at length into the Turkes hands, he put him to death, and tooke possession of all his iurisdiction.

This done, hee concluded to make the like war vpon the Soldan, and bringing his army neare the Coast of Suria, gaue it out in common report, that hee wold once more try his fortune against the Sophy. But the Soldan, who was not void of suspition, had euermore in readinesse a mighty power of men, able to encounter the greatest Lorde, that would resist against him in Suria. In the end, these two puissant Princes came to accost each other, and met neer the City of Damas in Suria ; and after certaine skirmishes past on either side, the battell was giuen the 24. of August, in the yeare one thousand, five hundred and sixty, vpon the like day as the Sophie had before by him bin vanquished. This Battel was for a long while maintained very woorthily on both parties ; but in the end, the victory fell to the Turkes ; by reason of the great distruction which their Artillery made vpon the Soldanes people : and likewise, because a Captain (the Gouvernor of Alleppo) ioyned with the aduerse side, and yet would not fight neither he nor his men. In this Battaile the soldan was found dead, without any wound, but onely by being among the great throng of horses, hauing attained to the age of seuenty six yeares. The Turke tooke possession of all Suria, and likewise Palestine, with Iudea, and going towards Egipt, in pursuite of his victory, he rested for diuers daies in Ierusalem, where hee visited the Holy Sepulchre ; and passing further on, hee made himselfe well provided of Goats skins, and filling them with Water, they serued for his iourney through the Deserts

By this time, the Mammeluckes and other men of Warre, that had escaped from the battaile, and were retyred home to Ægypt, had elected themselves a new Soldane, a Gouvernour of Alexandria, named Tomombeus, who came in person against the Turkes with a very huge Army. The battaile being appointed, it was (by the report of very good Authours) the most cruell and dangerous fight that euer was: notwithstanding, by the wonderfull multitude and power of the Turkes, Tomombeus was conquered, and with-drawing himselfe to the grand Cayre, they fought there two daies and two nights together, without any repose or intermission. So that loosing the Citty, he fled ouer Nylus, and labouring to re-enforce fresh meanes for encounter, he was surprized by certaine Traytours, and deliuered into the Turkes power, who put him to death. After Tomombeus was dead, the Turk (in short while) got possession of the most auncient and mighty Kingdome of Ægypt, where he left (as also in Suria) such order as was best to his owne liking. Then returned hee in great triumph to Constantinople, where his Sonne welcomed him backe from his warres, and there he dyed of an Impostume, in the month of September, one thousand five hundred and twenty, hauing reigned eyght yeares, and liued forty sixe. This Tyrant was of such great and vndaunted Spirit, as hee was neuer noted to be fearefull of any thing.

He had but one Sonne named Solyman, who succeeded him in the Empire, and was Crowned the same day and yeare, that Charles the fift Emperour, was heere in Christendome. But so soone as the death of Selim was known in Suria, a great personage named Gazellus (who was Gouvernor) rebelled, and made himselfe Commaunder of Tripoly and Baruth, with other neighbouring Townes and Citties, drawing many Mammeluckes and other Nations to his faction. Against whom Solyman sent a Bashae, named Ferrat, who vanquished Gazellus, and put him to death, reducing Suria to quietnesse, and Ægypt also, which began to mutiny. The yeare following, Solyman went in person to war upon the Christians, and laid sledge before the Citty of Belgrade, which was the Port and chiefe defence of Hungaria, and had beene before in vaine attempted by his Predecessours: but king Lewes being then ouer young, and gouerned by the Princes of his Countrey, made no such resistance as was needfully required. Wherefore, by force of Arms, the Citty was taken by the Turke, although it cost much blood, and many liues of his people. When he had accomplished this enterprife, hee went againe in person (contrary to the opinion of al his Bashaes) and would needs besiedge the Isle of Rhodes, with an innumerable multitude of Men and Artillery, both by Land and Sea, and hauing conquered the Isle, hee brought his Campe before the Citty, in the yeare one thousand five hundred twenty and two, in the end of the month of Iune. During this sledge, there was then performed such Noble and heroycall deeds of Armes, as it is impossible to make any small abridgement of them, or sufficiently to extoll the vertuous valour of the besiedged. But in conclusion, after some sixe months hardy resistance, the great Maister and Gouvernor of Rhodes, named Phillip de Villiers, of the French Nation, was constrained to surrender it vp to the Turk, being vnable any way longer to defend it. Heereon, the Turke returned triumphantly to Constantinople, not a little glorying in so great good fortune. And three yeares after, which was, in one thousand five hundred twenty and sixe, hee entred Hungaria with a wonderfull Army: against whom King Lewes (badly councelled) went in person with his power, betweene Buda and Belgrade, at which place (being too confident of himselfe, and hauing ouer few Men) he gaue the Turk battaile, wherein hee was vanquished, and founde dead, drowned in a Ditch. The battaile was the same yeare, the eight and twentieth day of August, when as the Turke tooke Buda, and diuers other neighbouring places, stil returning home Victor. After which, once more hee came into Hungary, when Charles the fift, Emperour, gaue him resistance.

CHAP. XXVI.

That the death of Man or Woman, is to bee reckoned happy or unhappy, according to the quality and estate wherein the party dieth: with sundry examples of the death of many.

That a Man is to dye once, is a matter common to all Men, but to know when, how, or in what manner his death shall be, is not by any meanes reuealed to him, or euer hath beene in former times: for that mainly consisteth in the good or euill condition of death, and ought not eyther to bee called good or vnfortunate, but when a Man (in that estate) is not found as hee ought to be. Death therefore lyes oftentimes hidden in wayes, walkes, or houses, where men suspect or least looke for him; and sometimes (like his Wife) lies with him in Bed: for which cause, hardly should a moment of life time be spent, without due and intire consideration thereof. Examples tending to this purpose, are infinit, whereof I purpose to produce some very notable: albeit, the effectes of death are not to be wondred at, in regard they continually happen day by day.

Aulus Gellius, and so dooth Valerius Maximus also, set downe, that in Italy there is a Town called Crotonna, neer to Calabria, where a Man was borne, named Milo, who was so excellent, able, dexterious, and skilfull, either in action belonging to Playes, Wrastring, Dancing, and all sprightly kinds of exercises, as he was not to be equalled by any, but in all such delights he bare away the victory: so that of him it was commonly said, that no Man, eyther in strength, agility, or otherwise, could in his time be found to deale with him. This man, walking one day on the side of a Mountaine (beeing with-drawne out of the common high-way to refresh himselfe) among other Trees he beheld an Oake, which had two great branches or armes falne off and lying by, and had beene begun to be cleft by some labouring Man; who hauing left his Wedges in the Stock, it remained wide open extended by their stretching. Hee being desirous to finish the Mans labour, sets his hands to the braunch to teare it in sunder, and opened it so much by his strength, that the Wedges fell quite out. But whether (as it might bee) that his strength fayled him, or the Branch was ouerweldy for him, pausing a litle to breath himselfe, the rift clapt it selfe so suddenly close together againe (except his hands, being now betweene in stead of the Wedges) that by no meanes could he help himselfe, neyther came any passenger that way to helpe him. So that it was his hard fortune, to starue there and dye a most miserable death, worse then can easily be imagined, for he was a prey to wild Beasts, & thus ouerthrown in trying his owne strength.

But if this death of Milo, may (as it deserues no lesse) appeare to be strange: that then of the Poet Aeschylus may bee thought little lesse; for hee walking one day out of a Towne in Sicily where he dwelled, to take the Ayre of the fieldes, and comfort himselfe in the warmth of the Sunne, because hee felt his ioynts somewhat chill by standing; tooke this to be his wholesomest recreation. Hee beeing aged, white headed, and balde withall, sat downe vpon on high place, where the Sunne might haue greatest power to heat him, and being bare headed, an Eagle (by accident) was hounding aloft in the Ayre, holding a Tortuise in her Tallents, and espying the bald head of Aeschylus, which shee imagined to bee a stone, forthwith let fall her burthen from an high, to breake the Tortuise vpon that supposed stone, that afterward she might deuoure the creature. The Tortuise falling iust vpon the Poets head; cleft it so farre, that instantly he dyed. A matter of no meane maruaile, because he sat so high, and openly discovered, as it might seeme impossible, that any thing whatsoever, should from so high light vpon his head.

Baptista Fulgoso, in his learned Booke of extraordinary examples, declareth the vnfortunate death of a King of Navarre, named Charles. This Prince was old and very sickly, feeling great anguish in all his Nerues, and (for this disease) by aduise of most excellent and skilfull Phisiti-

The strange death of Charles K. of Navarre.

Phisitions, there could not any likely remedy be found but one onely, which was thus: His body was to bee round wrapped about with a Linnen Cloath, that first had bene well steeped in Aqua-vita, and then it must bee sowed somewhat strait about him. The party that performed this businesse, hauing fullie ended his labour, and wanting a Knife or Sheares ready to cut the thred: took the Candle to burne it in sunder, and the thred flaming to the Cloth, caught such sudden holde on the same and the Aqua-vita, that before any meanes of help could be applyed, the King in this flame was burnt to death. Thus was he cured of that extreame paine, and all other diseases he had beside.

The death likewise of Philemon was in a merry manner, for he seeing an Ass draw near to a Table, & feed vpon Figs that were serued in a dish for himselfe & others, fell into such an extreame laughter, that his life ended in his laughing. Wee see then what slender assurance there is of Life, when a man may loose it in a laughter. It is also recorded, that Phylition the Commicall Poet, dyed laughing. And many man haue dyed with excesse of ioy, among which number was Dyonisius the Tyrant, Sicilie, Diagoras, and the Romaine Lady, seeing her Sonne returne from the battaile, where she heard he was slaine. The accident also happening to Cratis the Goat-heard, was very strange; for he sleeping vnder a Hill side among his Goates, an Hee-Goat killed him, in ieaousie of his She-Goat, wherewith this Cratis had diuers times peruerted the course of Nature. This is faithfully affirmed by Ludouicus Calius, and Volateranus, who do alleage for their authority, diuers good Greek Authors.

I forbear to speake of diuers other kindes of Death, as that of Pope Boniface, who died in Prison with extreame ty of hunger; that also of Richard the second, King of England: or that of the Arch-Byshoppe of Magunce, who was kild and eaten vp by an huge multitude of Rats: or that of Decius the Emp. of whō Æmilius Victor writeth, that being very victorious, yet he was found dead, drowned in a Lake. In which manner diuers haue dyed in our time; as Lewes King of Hungarie, and Sforza the Father of that worthy Captain Frances Sforza, who drowned himselfe to saue one of his Pages. Andrew the King of Prouence dyed by the hand of a Woman, who (being assisted by other Women) hung and strangled him. The Emperour Tiberius was likewise poysoned by his Wife Agripina. And therefore Emperours, Kings, Princes, and great Lords, haue bene euen as subiect to vnfortunate and vntimely deaths, as the verie poorest or most wretched person, albeit (in vaine) they sometime purposed to preuent such inconueniences.

CHAP. XXVII.

How many Popes of Rome there hath bene since Saint Peter; And wherfore the Names of the Popes are still changed: As also, by what authority they haue bene vsually elected.

NE of the most excellent Histories, and deserueth among Men to be remembered, is the liues of the cheefe Byshops or Popes of Rome, who if Saint Peter were the first (because there hath bene much doubt and question about it) are tearmed his successors, and Vicars of Christ. I meane all them that haue bene Byshoppes of Rome, in successiue order from the first, who in regard of our purposed discourse, we will admit to be S. Peter, and so proceede by the obseruation of some Authors. And first we are to consider, that sometimes these chiefe Byshops haue bene absent from that Citties seat, yet Rome ceased not to bee the principall Seat, though the Byshop were absent, as belonging to the deputation of Saint Peter. But returning to our intent; there hath been in Rome two hundred and one and twenty Byshops and Popes, as I haue gathered from the beginning, to Iulius the third of that Name, who was then Pope, when I made this collection, among whom haue bene most excellent and learned Doctors.

But me thinkes it is a matter of some maruaile, and needes must haue some Mystery

The originall of changing the Popes names, and vpon what reason.

The new Pope
muſt be named after ſom
one of his predeceſſors.

Mystery in it, that not any one of them in ſo long a time of ſucceſſion, attained to ſuch length of time as S. Peter did: for it pleaſed God, that as he exceeded al other in ſanctity, ſo held he poſſeſſion of this dignity much longer then any other, for he liued twenty five yeares after the death of Chriſt. The firſt ſeauen he remained at Antioche, and the following eighteene at Rome (as it is ſaid) where he confirmed his Seat. And I haue read, by the opinion of ſome, that not any one of his ſucceſſors after to enſue, ſhould enioy ſuch length of time, as hee then did. There is alſo another thing, whereof I haue made obſeruation in the liues of the Popes; which is, that from the beginning, to this very day, there is not any one found, that (in the change of his name) hath bin called Peter, or that his name was ſo before the change: whereby (ſay ſome) that God would permit the Name of Peter to none other, but onely to him on whom he founded his Church.

But I know not (ſaith a very learned Writer) from what Authours this laſt opinion may be deriued, becauſe I can produce ſeauen (at the leaſt) whoſe Names before the changing, were Peter. And theſe were they. Innocentius the firſt; Iohn the two and twentieth; Celeſtine the firſt; Gregory the eleauenth; Boniface the ninth; Clement the ſixt; and Alexander the firſt, without adding hereto one Anti-Pope.

Now, it is good to vnderſtand whence proceeded this mutation of their names, and vpon what occaſion. Let me tell you then, that Pope Gregory the fourth being dead, in the year eight hundred forty two; the next election of Biſhop and Pope of Rome, was made of a worthy Romain, of Noble blood, honorable diſcent, & very gracious behauior, whoſe name was Hogs-face, or Swines-face, chuſe ye whether. Now, in regard that this name ſeemed very harſh, rude, and vnfitting a place of ſuch Dignity, they remembring withall, that our Sauiour had changed S. Peters name: they would now alſo begin that order, and changing his name, called him Sergius, according to the Name of his Father. And from hence came the cuſtome, which is yet obſerued to this day, that hee who is elected Pope, may make choiſe of what name he wil, or fancieth beſt: But albeit hee altereth thus his name, yet they hold an eſpeciall order, that he muſt accept the name of ſome one of his Predeceſſors. And Authours to iuſtifie this, are Platina, Mathews Palmierus, Eufebius, and others.

We are moreouer to know, as we find recorded in the beſt Hiſtories, that vntil the time of Conſtantine the great (who gaue ſuch wealth and large priuiledges to the Romain Church, becauſe many of the Biſhoppes had ſuffered the death of Martyrdoine) there was no ſuite made for the place, neither were any very deſirous of it; but contrariwiſe, by force or faire meanes, they were conſtrained to vndergo the charge; becauſe in thoſe times they were aduanced to that Dignity, onely by the Priests in the Romaine Church. But when the Emperors began to bee Chriſtians, and likewise many worthy Cittizens of Rome; the election then was made by them, when the Cleargy had made preſentation of the Man, and the voyce and conſent of the people concurring. Which being done, Meſſengers were diſpatched to Conſtantinople (where the Emperors then made their abyding) to deſire his confirmation of the election, becauſe their choiſe was not abſolute til then. And it appeareth, that this order was obſerued to pleaſe them, or elſe it was their will to haue it ſo: and ſometime it was done by a deputy or ſubſtitute of theirs, who remained for them at Rome, being named Hipparchus, exerciſing (in this caſe) the authority of the Emperour.

This manner and cuſtome of electing Popes by confirmation of the Emperour, made their eſtabliſhment the more certaine (though ſome ſay they did it as in tyranny, and not by permiſſion of the Church) yet after the death of Benet the firſt, Pelagius the ſecond was next elected, and becauſe (in that time) Rome was beſieged by the Lombards (of whom thoſe of Lombardy to this day are deſcended) and in regard alſo, that it rained ſo exceſſiuely, as the Floodes, Riuers, and other Waters ſwelled in ſuch ſort, that (as Platina ſaith) infinite people were drowned & periſhed, wherby it was expected to haue proued another deluge; therefore this Pelagius was the firſt that tooke on him the Popedome, without knowledg of the Emperour.

Neuer-

Neuerthelesse, fearing least Mauritius, Emperor then at Constantinople, would be offended thereat; he sent an Ambassadour to make his excuse, and deliuer those reasons before expressed.

Afterward, diuers yeares being past, and this order obserued without discontinuance; Bennet the second coming to be elected Pope, the Emperor Constantine, fourth of that Name, being aduertised of his singular Holinesse and Learning, in regard also of his own authority for his Election: hee sent the Pope a Charter and Letters Pattents, whereby he renounced to himselfe and his Successours, all causes and reasons before pretended, for confirmation of the Papal Election, but that thence forward, so soone as the Cleargy and people of Rome had made choise of their chiefe Byshop, he should then bee held as Gods Vicar, without any other confirmation or amplification: This endured for some small while, till afterward the Romaine Church happening to be afflicted againe, & her Patrimony much molested by the Lombards, who swayed mightily in those parts, being then succoured by Charles Martell, in the time of Gregory the third, and by his Son Pepin, in the time of Stephen the second; they were glad to let fall their former priuiledge, because they had found no mean helpe (alwaies) from the Emperours of Constantinople.

Finally, Pope Leo, the third of that Name, after much discourse and deliberation about this matter, considering what great helpe and succour he had received from Charlemaigne K. of France; laboured and procured him to bee named Emperour, and so translated the Empires Seat out of the Easterne parts, into the West, where it hath still remained to this instant. Whereby may easily be gathered, whether in regard of especial priuiledge, or vsurpation of Charlemaignes Successors in the Empire, the Popes helde on their confirmation by the Emperours or no; and confirmed & approued their election of the cheefe Byshops, in acknowledging alwaies the Westerne Emperours, and hauing recourse to them in all their affaires and necessities. By succession of time, and in the yeare eight hundred and seuenteen, Pascall the first was elected (by death of Stephen the fourth) and enstalled, without attending the confirmation of Lewes, Sonne to Charles the great. And yet he was glad to send an Ambassador to the Em. to make his excuse, and say; that hee was thereto compelled by the people, and could not stay for his confirmation. The Emperour Lewes allowed of this excuse, and yet sent an expresse commaundement, that he would haue all auncient Customes to be kept and preserued.

Long time after, and while the abuses of Men still encreased, there were many scandals and disorders happening at these elections; for remedy whereof, Pope Nicholas, second of that Name, in the yeare one thousand seauenty nine, procured a publique Counsell, whereby there was made a Decretall, which be-ginneh in Noxine Domini, in the three and twentieth distinction, and thereby it was giuen in full authority, to Bishops, Priests, and Cardinals, to make this election. According to which order, the Election hath in that kinde continued, without any request of the Imperiall confirmation, but in the absolute power & priuiledge of the Church, because by Emperours and Kinges, it hath not (since then) beene called in question.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The cause of those daies which are called Dies Caniculares, or Dogge-daies; And wherefore they are so called: With many notable examples incident to the same purpose.

Here are few or none, but (in common conuersation) they will talke familiarly of the Dogge-dayes, onely by reason of the extremitie of heate, which vsually continueth all that time: And yet notwithstanding, all men doe not know, vpon what occasion those daies are so called. Or let vs admit, that there are very few of any discreation, but the reason thereof is well enough knowne vnto them; yet may we speake our minde to those few, and satisfie them as well as the rest, accor-according to the iudgement of Astrologers, both Ancient and Moderne.

Most true it is, that among many other constellations and figures, which the auncient Astronomers both knew and obserued, in company of the fixed Starres; there were two especially, and they were tearmed Dogs: one of them the great Dogge; the other, the little, or lesse; which lesser hath two Starres, one equalling the first in greatnesse, the other not so much by a fourth part, and they are of the Nature of Mercury, and somewhat of Mars. This constellation of the little or lesser Dogge, was at the time of Ptolomy, in the signe of the Twinnes: and from that time to this instant (by reason of Motion in the eight Sphere) one of these two Starres hath attained to the fift degree; and the other to the nineteenth and a halfe, of the signe of Cancer. Of this Constellation these Authours doe speake; as Pliny, Iulius Firmicus, Mauilius, Eginus, and Ptolomy. But because that this is no occasion at all of our Caniculare or Dog-daies; let vs come to the other, which is called the great Dogge, which is a Celestiall Image or Figure, hauing eightene Starres, and they were placed also by Ptolomy (in his time) in the signe of the Twinnes; except one onely, by reason of the Motion it made by the eight Sphere, from the West to the East. But at this day, they are all to be found at the signe Cancer, except one or two, that are not (as yet) departed from the signe of the Twinnes.

Among which Starres, there is one that is saide to be in the throat of the fore-named Dogge, which by the Arabies is called Alfabor, and by the Greekes, Seirios. It is of the cheefest greatnesse, and more cleare and splendant then any other of the fixed Starres; which in the time of Ptolomy (as appeareth by his tables) was eightene degrees and tenne minuts from the Twinnes. Afterward, King Alphonsus, iustifying the saide Tables, found yet the saide Starre to be in the fourth degree, and forty eight minuts of Cancer: and now at this day, we finde it in the eight degree of the same signe Cancer. Her Latitude is Meridionall (according to ancient obseruation) sixteene degrees and ten minuts, and is vnvariable; notwithstanding, the opinion of Moderne Writers, touching the moouing of trepidation or terror: For although she were not certaine, yet most sure is it, that the mutation of the said Starre is no way notable. Her declination is Meridionall, by fiftene degrees, and fifty minuts. And albeit that the whole Constellation of this Celestiall Image, hath very great power and influence, yet are we to speake especially but of the very greatest Star; because all ancient and Moderne Authours, haue made great reckoning thereof, and by her occasion are the daies called Caniculare.

She is of such power and efficacy, as during the time that the Sunne and she doth go together from the East, the vapours and beames of the Sun, do in such sort heat and chafe themselues, by the vigor of her property; that shee procurereth a maruailous alteration & warmth, both on the Earth, Sea, and in all other things, as Pliny and Auicenn hath intirely noted. Hippocrates in his Aphorismes, did expressly forbid, that (while the Sun walked in this Constellation) no Man should take any Phisicke, because the time was full of dangerous effectes; which are so euident and certaine, as all the World is well acquainted therewith, and ancient Authours haue spoken thereof very plentifully. Especiallie Pliny in diuers places, saying; That during this time, the Wine is troubled, and becommeth starke naught. In some Countries, you shall see the Sea to cast up her Fishes, & they to swim dead aloft on the Water, the Dogs also to run mad about the streetes. In like manner, Columella giueth aduise to Shepherds, that while the Dog-daies doe continue, they should suffer their Flockes to feede from morning to mid-day, drining them continually from the East towards the West, to the end they should not haue the Sunne vpon their shoulders: But after mid-day is past, & onward to the Euening, to guide them from the west to the East, because they should neuer haue the Sun on their eies. For he further saith, that those daies are very dangerous, and doe cause many great inconueniences to happen vnto Men.

Moreouer, Iulius Firmicus saith, that such as are borne during the season of these Caniculare dayes, will prooue to be bee men of very badde inclination, forward and apt to commit great Euilles; Proud, Cruell, Furious, Daungerous, full of Vaunting, Seditious, and to be suspected; which MARCVS MAVILIVS in like maner affirmeth.

Cicero saith also, *The Inhabitants of the Isle of Ceaor Ceos, * Neighbour to Negropont, doe make Obseruation of this Starre, and iudge thereby the whole course of the yeare, whether the seasons will be healthfull, or subiect to sicknesse. For, if it appeare obscure or Clowdie, they gather thereby, that the Ayre is moyst, thicke, and naught, and the whole yeare to holde the like qualitie. But if it be seene to rise cleare, bright and shining, it then signifieth a pure ayre, Healthfull, and Sweete, and accordingly they do prognosticate wel fare vnto men.*

These things, are in this manner set downe by Cicero; and yet we know, that such kinde of Iudgements are not sufficient, because one Starre onely sufficeth not to prognosticate the whole yeares course. True it ist, that sometimes these Dogge-Dayes do fal out to be Colde, and the times verie Rainie, which is occasioned by the Suns Coniunction with Saturne, or else by some other Colde Starre, whereof Thomas Aquinas sufficiently speaketh. Besides, Saturne may bee the cause of this times ill disposition, beeing opposite to the Sunne, or in a Quartile Aspect with the Sunne.

Behold the Effects of this Star, and of her Constellation, which doe continue diuers Dayes, and beginneth when as the Sunne mounteth or ariseth with her in the Horizon: These are they, which deserue most especially to be noted and knowne at what time of the yeare they are. Then for our better direction heerein, it is to be vnderstood, that euery Starre is saide to be rising or springing; and likewise, that they doe bestow and order themselves in diuers kinds; some hauing respect to the Horizon, and others to the Sun, who one while keeps aloofe farre off from them, and another while approacheth neere vnto them. But we will speake of them onely, that aunswere to our purpose, which (at one time in the yeare) do rise with the Sunne vppon the Horizon, as hath beene well knowne, vnderstood,

Now this moment of birth or Originall, is not common to all places, nor at all times alike, because the moouing or motion (as we haue already said) being according to the succession of the signes, this Starre came forth (heeretofore) in one certaine time of the yeare, and now it happens in another. For the Star being in lesse degree of longitude, euen so as the Sun, it goeth according to the order of the signes, and passeth the rather to the point of the Zodiacke, that holdeth euen way with him toward the East, in what place soeuer wee shall consider him. Therefore, in one and the same place, and one selfe-same Horizon, the apparition of this Starre was more forward, and sooner in times past, then now adayes it is: And likewise, by the finitures or limits of sight, shee beginneth to yssue forth rather in some peculiar places, then in others. Wherefore, the Dogge-Dayes do beginne rather with them that are neere vnto the Equinoctiall, then with those that are more Northerly, according to the seat of the most oblique Horizons.

Necessarily then it is to bee noted, that although this Starre were in the eight Degree of Cancer, yet would shee spring or rise from one Paralell onely, in the same Degree; but (in all the rest) diuersly, more or lesse, according as shee raungeth or keepeth her selfe off from the Equinoctiall, so shall shee be the more slacke and tardie in her appearing; whereof an example may be hadde, by the Inhabitants of Ciuill, which is at the end of the fourth Climate, in thirty seauen Degrees of Latitude.

In those Dayes when as AVICEN LIUED, (according as himselfe hath Written and Recorded) beeing about foure hundred yeares agoe; the Dogge-Dayes beganne then the fiste day of the Month of Iune: and yet notwithstanding, in those verie times, when the Sunne had made two Degrees, and five and twentie Minutes in the Signe of Leo, this Starre yssued from forth the Horizon, so soone as the Sunne. This haue I equalled, by the Direction of John de Mont-royall,

The beginning of the Dog-Dayes.

The rising of the Dog-Star is not alike in all places, or at all times.

The Dogge-daies doe begin with them neere vnto the Equinoctiall.

Diuerfity of the dog-daies beginning, by diuersitie of places.

a great Astrologer and Mathematician, and it is to be seene and knowne by the Astrolobe. But, if wee speake of the ordinary time, which is the seauenteenth day of Iuly, then truly doe the Dogge-dayes begin in our City of Ciuit: so that it is an error to say, that they commonly begin the fift or tenth day of Iuly, although it might be true in some precedent times; and in like maner it may be beleued, that for certaine dayes, some of the effects declared themselues to the world, before the Sunne was perfectly eleuated in the Horizon, with the Starre.

To such as are far from the Equinoctiall, the Dog Star is long before it riseth

To such as dwel in places far off from the Equinoctiall line, and are neere neighbors to the North; the Dog-Dayes do begin much later, because the Sunne must be risen in more degrees of the signe Leo, and therefore more dayes of Iuly must be past. Also in the Paralell of 41. degrees, whether it be Rome, Tolledo, and other places; this Starre, riseth with the Sunne, when he commeth to the sixt degree of Leo, which will be the 21. day of Iuly, and then beginneth the Dog-daies with them. And to them that are vnder the 47, 48. or 49. Degree; as are Paris, Strasbourg, and Vienna, with other Citties; this Star ariseth in the Horizon with the Sun, euen then when he enters into the 12, 11, and 10. Degree of Leo, which shall be the 24. or 25. day of Iuly. Hence may it be concluded, that the Dogge-dayes doe not begin alike in all places; or euery yeare, at one certeine or selfe-same time of the yeare.

An especiall direction for the beginning of the Dogge-dayes.

It is an errour then to say, that they haue their beginning vniuersally, or in all places, the tenth day of Iuly. For, such as are vnder the seauenteenth Degree declining, haue thence that verie day to beginne with them. And they which are vnder the twentie nine and thirtith degrees, haue them the seauenteenth day of the saide Month; because (as we haue said before) this Diuersitie proceedeth from the different eleuation, in diuers Horizons or Limits of the eye. For which cause, those men that read Poets and Historians, are to be aduertised, that when they finde in diuers Authors, diuers Births or Originalles of this Starre, and as diuers beginnings of these Canicular dayes, they must duely consider, at what time, and in what Climat the Authors liued that Wrote those thinges, to the end, they may be confronted with truth; for otherwise, he may assure himselfe, that they do expressly contradict themselues.

The length of time or continuance of these Dog-dayes, which is all the while the Sun carrieth his passage in this constellation (according to the opinion of Physitians) is forty dayes, wherof some are much more dangerous then the rest, according to the Aspects that be in this Starre, and the Sunne, with the other Planets; because that if those Aspects be good; the good Plannets doe partly temperate and correct his Malice, but the badde doe worke the quite contrarie.

And now it appeares to mee, that in this matter, concerning the Canicular Starre, or Dogge-Dayes, we haue saide sufficient, and giuen tast enough thereof. Now, albeit there might be much more saide and knowne; yet in regarde that it is not fitting to euery mans Apprehension, I will rest silent, and passe on in this Argument no further. Many others, haue Learnedly and sufficiently Written, of the Power and Effectes of this Starre: as Plinie, Ptolomy, and almost the whole Schoole of Poets. Perseus calleth it the Madde Dogge, and sayth; That it burneth vp all Seedes. Ouid, Virgill, Macrobins, Iulius Firmicus, Marcus Manlius, with diuers other excellent Authours beside (aswell Auncient as Moderne) whom heere I will not spend time to name, they haue at large set downe their Opinions of this Starre; & such as are further inquisitiue in this case, may there be fully and amply satisfied by them.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Admirable Art (in Man) of Swimming: The Originall of the Fable of the Fish Colas, with some incident Histories beside.

Many men of good and founde iudgement do say, that matters of meruaile or rarity ought not

Matters of novelty, doe carry suspition of certainty.

The Fish Colas carried the true shape & proportion of a man in all parts.

Pontanus lib. 2. Alex. de Alex. and in lib. Dier. Genial.

Use & custom begets an habit of courage and boldnesse to be Written, because doubt of their truth or credit, dooth most commonly attend on them. Neuerthelesse, when for such things as are alledged, the Testimony of vnreprouable Authority is auouched; a man may remain the more assured of them. I can well remember, that in the dayes of my Child-hoode, I heard old people oftentimes talke of a Fish named Colas, that had the true Figure and proportion of a man, and vsed to swim dayly in the Sea. Of this Fish, many fabulous deuises haue bin reported, and my selfe neuer caried any other opinion of them: vntill by the reading of many Books, I found as many things written in them, and as full of admiration; so that, if I had receiued them from men of slender worth or respect, I should haue reputed them for vaine and ydle lyes.

Concerning those aged peoples Reports, which the comon vulgar held to be fabulous, I made some pause of rash Censure, after I had read two excellent men, of no lesse Authority then Learning: The one of them, being Pontanus, a great Humanist, Oratour, and Poet; the other, is Alexander of Alexandria, a Doctor of the Ciuill Lawes, a man of Deepe Experience and Learning, speaking of them in his Booke named Genial Dayes.

Both these Worthy men do write, that in their time, there liued in Catania a Towne of Sicilie, a man, whom euery one tearmed to bee the Fish Colas, that from his Infancie was wholly enclined to Bath himselfe in the Sea, and it was his onely chiefest Delight or pleasure, either in the Night time, or in the Day. This grew in him (by litle and litle) to such a Custome; and afterward to such an extremitie; that if a day had past him without spending the most part thereof in the Water, he would say; that he endured such a passion and sicknesse of stomacke, as made him doubtfull of immediate death.

Continuing in this exercise, and hee attaining to the yeares of manly disposition, his strength and dexteritie was such in the Water; that although the Seas were very violent and Tempestuous, yet hee would Crosse-swim them, without any feare or perill. And these two Authours say, that (at a certaine time) he was forcibly compeld to Swim aboute fise hundred Stades, without finding Land, or any where to rest himself, which Stades do amount to aboute fixteene or seauenteene Leagues. And sometimes hee would Swim in the Sea (as a Fish) two or three dayes together, wandering into diuers Coastes of the Neighbouring Countreyes, & was met by many passengers, to whom he wold cry and call in their Shippes. Diuers times they would take him vp vnto the, and after they had questioned him concerning his voyage, they woulde giue him both meat and drinke.

Thus would he (for some smal time) abide with them in sportful recreation, but when he saw his opportunity, then would he suddenly leape into the Sea againe, to returne whence he came; and by this meanes, oftentimes hee carried tydings to sundry neere Townes & Villages, of them that he had met at Sea.

Thus liued this man for a long time in good and healthfull Disposition; vntill at length, at a great Feast and Solemnitie, which King Alphonsus of Naples made at Messana (a most Famous Port in the Sicilian Sea) onely to approue the Swimming of this Man, and others, that made vaunt of their skill & dexterity in this Art. There he commaunded a Cup of Golde (of very great woorth and value) to bee cast into the Sea, and it was giuen as a reward to him that could soonest finde it, purposing to throw in other things of worth beside, after the triall of the Cup should first be made.

In this Assembly, there were manie excellent Swimmers, that made no doubt of their cunning and sufficiencie, and amongst them also was this Colas, who (with the rest) leapt into the depth of the Sea, at the place where the Cup was cast in; but afterward hee was neuer seene againe; nor any tydings what was become of him. Some thought, that hee fell into some Gulphe or deepe pit, which might bee in the bottome of the Sea, and his disafter was such, that not being able to ascend out of it, there hee died. This History, being deliuered by two such approued men, gaue me occasion to conceiue, that this might be the same thing which aged people had spoken of, concerning the Fish Colas.

A matter almost incredible, but that good Authours do auouch it for truth.

Swimmers, called Vrinators in olde time, but now Guzans.

In Rome they vsed to instruct their Children in Swimming.

The same Alexander, in the very same Chapter saith; That hee knew another Man, who was a poore Mariner, and had (almost) no other kinde of liuing, but onely by Fishing. This man (as he saith) was so expert a Swimmer, that in one day hee went and returned from an Island, which is face to face with Naples, named Æuaria, so farre as Prochyta, which is vp in the firme Land neere to * Puteoli; and there is betweene the one and the other City, the distance of fifty Stades. One day also it hapned, that as he threw himselfe into the Sea, to make the like Voyage, there were other men in a Boate to passe the same place also; but it was no way possible for them (albeit they had men that vowed very speedily) to ouertake the man in his Swimming.

Such things are truly maruailous, and our Astrologians say; that it proceedeth from the influence of the Stars, that gouerne in the birth of these men. And that such as haue then the signe of Pisces in the ascendent, shall be wondrous strong, and excellent Swimmers. Our Naturall Phylosophers doe maintaine, that a man hauing his Armes very small, shall be apt and agile to Swimming. The ability of diuing vnder water, is verie admirable in some Men of the West-Indies, whence our choysfest Pearles do come; for it is said, that they sinke downe into the bottome of the Sea, and do tarry there so long a time, as it seemeth to bee a thing altogether impossible. Our Elders termed these people Vrinators, but now they are called Guzans.

Al the Historians do report meruailous matters, of a man named Delio, so that it grew to be a common Prouerb, to say, the Swimmer Delio. And albeit (in very truth) it is no Vertue to Swim, neither is a man bound to Learne it, yet the knowledge thereof is no way hurtfull. For the ancient Romaines, according as Vegetius declareth, admonished their yong youths, not as yet invred to the Warres, that they should endeouour to Swim, and then they vsed to call Tirones. They had also a certaine Custome in Rome that the yong Children should pract se Swimming, in a place beside the Riuer of Tyber, neere to the felde called Campo Martio, and there they made it a daily exercise, as iudging Swimming to be a lawfull pastime, and necessarie for such occurrences as might happen in war, as well for the passage of Lakes & Riuers, as also to withstand harde fortunes on the Sea.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Men liuing in the Sea, called Mare-men or Seamen, and women of like Nature, termed Mare-maids or Sea-women, and of some other notable things.

It is a matter of no meane maruell, and it draweth a man into hie contemplation of Gods handyworks, to behold the great diuersity of fishes in the Sea; as also, the Beastes and Creatures liuing on the earth; whereof Pliny, Albertus Magnus, Aristotle, and many other natural Phylosophers, haue liberally discoursed. Full well I know, that man composed of reason & vnderstanding, is no wher to be found but on earth, and that men were not ordained to liue in the water. Neuertheles, I haue diuers times read, that there are fishes in the Sea, which beareth the liuely shape of a man; among which, there is both male and female: The Female hath the perfect resemblance of a woman; and as they are called Nereides, so are the males named Tritons. Of whom, I will not recite diuers things, which a number of light-headed men, and of slender authority haue reported, in whose Books may be read very strange & variable matters. And yet notwithstanding I may lawfully set downe those things which I haue obserued and collected from writers of sound iudgement; men of grauitie, and deseruing credit. Among whom, Plinie saith, that in the time of the Emperour Tiberius, the Inhabitants of Lisbone, a City of Portugall, (famous then, and yet continuing so to this day) sent Ambassadors to the Emperour, to certifie him; that they had seene one of these Trytons, or Marine men, oftentimes to withdraw and hide himselfe in a Cauerne near to the Sea, and that there he vsed

Plin. lib 6.

Tydings of a Tryton sent to the Emperour Tiberius, by the inhabitants of Lisbon used to sing in a great shell of the Sea. And Pliny saith moreover, that Oetavianus Augustus was certified, that on the Coast of France, many Nereides or Sea-women hath bin seene, who afterward were found dead vpon the Sea-shore. The like tydings also was sent to Nero, that among many Fishes of the sea (cast vpon the sandes) diuers Nereides were found, and other kindes of Creatures Marine, like vnto Beastes liuing on the Earth; The same, and much more is confirmed by Elianus, in his Booke of Beasts.

Ouer and beside, those of Antiquitie who haue written of these things, & diuers others in like nature. Our Modern Authors also haue spokē as meruailously; as (among others) Theodorus Gaza, a man very learned in sundry Sciences, & who was liuing in our Fathers Dayes. His writings are iustified by many, and especially by Alexander of Alexandria, who saith, that the said Theodorus being in Greece on the Sea-shore, after a huge stormy tempest that then happened, he beheld abundance of Fishes cast vpon the sands, among which was a Neriade, or Fish, hauing a face perfectly human, and like vnto a very beautifull Woman down to the Girdle, but all the rest was formed of Fish, writhing vp the tail like vnto an Eele; euen after the same manner, as wee haue seene a figure painted, called a Syrene of the Sea; so this Neriad being vpon the sands, by her outwarde gesture and behauiour, appeared to bee in great paine and anguish: Alexander further saith, that this Theodorus Gaza, tooke the said Neriade, and (by the best meanes he could deuise) put it into the water, wherein shee was no sooner entred, but shee beganne to swim very delicately, and vanished on a sudden out of his sight.

Georgius Trabazonzius, a man of no lesse learning and authority, affirmeth also, that passing along the Sea side, he saw a Fish rise vp in the water, & al that could be discerned vnto the middle, seemed to bee a very beautifull Woman, whereat hee was no lesse amazed then terrified, because she wold hide and discover her selfe, according as she perceiued her selfe not to be noted; but beholding too many eies to gaze on her, shee sunk into the water, & was neuer seen after. All these things are maruailous, & yet notwithstanding, who will not giue credit to such worthy men, being fortified with that which I can yet further say?

Alexander of Alexandria declareth, that in his time he was aduertised by credible assurance, that in Epirus, (now named Romania) there was a Riuer neere vnto the Sea, where children often used to fetch Water thence. In short while after, a Triton resorted thither, and would hide himselfe in a Caue neer adioyning, watching till he could see some maiden come alone: whereof speeding at last, he would seize and carry her along with him into the Sea, and thus he did to diuers young Maidens. The Inhabitants being heereof aduertised, beleagred the place in such sort with spies, that he was taken and broght before a Iustice there dwelling, where he was found in all his Members like vnto a man. For which cause, they put him vnder safe custodie, giuing him sustenance to preserue life withall; but he would feede on nothing that was giuen vnto him, and therefore pined away with hunger to death, by beeing too many dayes in an Element strange vnto him, and wholly contrarie to his Nature. This History, is in the same manner deliuered by Petrus Gellius a Moderne Authour, in his Bookes of Beasts: where moreover he saith, That being at Marseilles, he heard reported by an aged Fisher (a man of good repute) that his Father had affirmed for truth to him, that he had seen a Sea-man or Triton, like vnto such as we haue spoken of, who was presented to King Rene. We may well then say, that a matter so approved, and by such Learned Authors knowne to the world for men of sound truth, ought not to be held as a Fable, but for an infallible certain-tie.

CHAP. I.

What manner of Speech was used at the beginning of the world : And how the Division of Languages began at the first.

for there was (as then) no diuersitie of speech, neither was there any man, but hee easily vnderstoode when another spake to him. The first diuersity & confusion of Tongues, which hath done so much damage, caused so many mischiefs, and yet is the continuall Nurse of them to this day (through the sinnes of men) was sent them by God. Moyse recordeth in the Holy History of Genesis, that the Malice and Presumption of men encreasing, Nemrod (Nephew to Noah by the discent of Caine) was soone after borne, and manie others beside, of as audacious a Nature. These Men concluded among themselues, to make a Tower, the top whereof might reach vp to Heauen; and this they did, in remembrance of the deluge, because they had heard it reported, that GOD had sent such a Flood vpon the earth, and therefore they would thus resist against

God, if the like invdation should happen againe. Iosephus speaketh thereof, in the first Booke of his Antiquities, and saith; That so many men assited Nemrod in the erection of this mighty building, that the work grew incredible for height & state. Iosephus moreouer writeth, that they made the foundation thereof so large and deep, that although it was of wonderfull height (according as Holy Writ maketh mention) yet it appeared to be more broad then high.

But God being willing to Correct this audacious enterprize (albeit not with punnishment answerable to the pride) gaue instantly so many manner of speeches amongst them, and such a myraculous Confusion of Languages, that they who at first vnderstoode one onely tongue, were diuided now into seauenty two: by means whereof, such variance grew among them, that thorough defect of vnderstanding one another, not only the worke remained vnperfect, but euery man departed with them he best vnderstood, and so inhabited diuers Countries: and for this cause the Tower was named BABELL, that is to say, Confusion. Isidore saieth, that it was in height, five thousand, one hundred, sixty foure paces, all made with stone of Bricke, bound and knit fast with Clay, insted of Morter; of which clay, there was very great store found in diuers parts of the Country.

In the same place where that Tower was built, according to the said Isidore, Iosephus, S. Augustine, and Orosius, was likewise builded that most famous City, whereof so many great matters are remembered, called Babylon, vpon the Riuer of Euphrates, whereof the round Neighbouring Lands and Countries tooke their Names; as Chaldea and Mesopotamia. The Sacred Scripture also maketh mention, & is of the same consent with them, that the beginning of Nemrods raigning was in Babylon: wherefore, by opinion of the same Authors, it must needs be graunted, that Nemrod builded that renowned City of Babylon, which afterwardes was walled and more ennobled by Semiramis and Ninus.

The Original of the Hebrue Tongue.

Of the Chaldean Tongue, somewhat agreeing with the Hebrue.

Now to returne to our former intent, concerning tongues and Language; the question is well worthy disputation, to wit; what Language it was that men did then speake; before the Confusion and Diuision of Toongues. Saint Augustine moueth the argument, and plainly determineth; that the first Language or Speech was Hebrue, and the same that the Iewes do yet speake to this day. Which, according as may be gathered from the Bible, and likewise as Saint Augustine iudgeth, was preserued in Heber; of whom, both Abraham and the Hebrewes discended, because neither he, or any one of his Lignage, are found to haue giuen any helpe in the building of that Tower. In regard whereof, both hee and his discent, that neuer conformed to such a sinne, had no feeling of the punishment. And therefore, it may be very well presumed, that in Heber; and in his family, it remained still found and entire, euen the auncient and first Tongue, not any way corrupted or confused, but only in that house it continued firme, being vtterly lost in al the other; and hence it commeth, that of Heber, the Language hath euer since bin called Hebrue.

Maay Hebrues (his Successours) haue affirmed, that this Language is the very same that Adam spake, and al those men of the first Age, conserued in Heber: and his Successors Abraham and Iacob, & the very same also wherein Moyse Wrote. Such is the opinion of S. Augustine and Isidore, that it may be rather credited in this kinde, then their coniecture, that hold the Chaldean to be the first tongue. And yet in some measure they may be excused, because those two Tongues haue a very neere Neighbouring vnity, as also a great conformity in their Letters and Charracters, and in great store of other matters. Besides, in this case it hath bin questioned, and partly concluded, that if two Children or more in number, being borne and nourished in some obscure place, where company may bee no hinderance, or any other voice heard; some are of the mind, that their first Language would bee Hebrue; and others think, the Chaldean Toong.

But if we, may beleene Herodotus, a very famous and worthy Historian, he tels vs, that experience was made in this case, by reason of a contention happening betweene the Aegyptians and the Phrygians, each man pretending a primacie of Antiquity, and a soueraignie in Language aboue al others; as also for the first inhabiting of Citties. To stay the head-strong course of this difference, it was thus concluded betweene them; that two Children (of either Nation) should be nursed in such manner, as we haue before declared: & in such a place, where not any kind of speech might be heard, but that which they naturally began to speake, and it should bee confirmed, to be the first and chiefest: as also, the people (speaking the same) to be of oldest Antiquity. He addeth moreouer, that a King of Egypt, caused too infants to be nourished in a Desert, where no man could be heard to speake in any manner whatsoever: And when the Children had attained to foure years of age, he commanded them to be brought before him, & they vttered in his presence many times, the word Ber, which signifieth Bread in the Phrygian Language, & therefore the Phrygians (of all men) wer said to be most Ancient. Thus writeth Herodotus, and many other Authours, both Wise and Iudicious, do giue him their approbation, and (in such Differences) do chiefly alledge him.

Neuerthelesse, were it, that we should allow this his opinion for trueth, yet it may (by some others) be answered, that perhaps these Children heard and vnderstood the voyce of some Beast, Bird, or other Creature liuing in the Fields, that did bellow, bray, or shape the same word in his voyce; and so in that kind it might be learned. But for my selfe, I am of the minde, that were there two children now brought vp in this manner, I thinke thinke they would speake the first Language of the Worlde, and that is the Hebrue. And I dare as boldly maintain, that they woulde shap to themselues, some nouell strange speech, deliuering new and vnheard of Names, Accents, & Attributes, as Children (of themselues Naturally) are enclined to do, and will bestow names least knowne, on thinges that by them are most desired. Whereby we may gather, that Nature woulde instruct them in some new kind of Language, before they could attaine to that of their Fore-fathers. Experience (in this case) may cleare vs from all doubt, and serue (as a true Schoole-maister) to them that are most curious in questioning, if their Wisedome would striue to reach beyonde the best receiued apprehensions. And yet (in meane while) I will not be so preiudicat, but leaue euery man to be gouerned by his own censure; Prouided, that it stretch not to wrong the Learned, who haue labored heerein for their best information; and will further satisfie them, if they be capable of their writings.

CHAP. II.

Of the Deuision of the Worlds Ages, & what notable matters haue happened in them. Also of the beginning of Kingdomes and Common-weales.

Albeit that many men haue taken no meane delight in talking of the ages of the world, and what occasions haue hapned in one, with as straunge occurances following in another: yet are there a great number, that know not how the Diuision of these Ages came at the first, nor what yeares is required to each Ages accomplishment. Let me then tell ye, that the Age or lifetime of the world, from the first Originall vntill this instant, is diuided (by the greater part of Authors) into sixe parts or Ages. Neuerthelesse, there are diuers that number them into seauen, which diuision is made according to the Hebrues. But for my direction in this enterprize, I purpose to bee guided by Eusebius, with the common receiued iudgement of all Historians, that haue set downe their rest on the number of six. Concerning the Diuision of these Ages, there is great difference and confusion found among the, so that very hardly can a certainty bee resolued on. For it principally appeareth, that those authors are diuided into two feuerall factions: One side following the computation of the Septuagint, or seauenty two Interpreters, that traduced the Old Testament out of the Hebrew Tongue into the Greeke; the others do imitate the Hebrues, and the common Text of the Bible, all which opinions, I will seuerally declare.

The world diuided into six Ages by som, and into seauen by others

Variety and difference found among the Authors.

The first Age of the World, is reckoned (by the common account) from the first Creation thereof, to the vniuersal Deluge and drowning of it. And this was tearmed the Worlds Child-hood or Infancy, which Age lasted for a long continuance. Wherefore, it may well be credited, that during this time, there hapned many notable accidents among men, although there be no History, nor any recorded memory; made of them: Only the Holy Scripture saith; That after God had created Adam and Eue, and (before them) all other creatures, which he gaue in subiection to man, with absolute rule and foueraignty, both ouer the Beastes on Land, and Fishes in the Sea.

The first Age of the world.

Adam did then beget two Sons, who were Caine and Abell, that likewise begat diuers others Children, from whom ensued a mighty people. Moyse afterward Writeth, that Caine builded in the East, a City, which he called Henoeh, after a Sonne of his that was so named. In that time, Lamech was the first twice-married man, and that durst aduenture vpon two Wiues: By one of them, he had a Son named Tuball, or Tubal-Kaine. that inuented the Art of Musick, as also the found of Vialles and Organes. Caine deuised the skill to worke in Iron, & to engraue thereon.

While this Age continued, there wer many Gyants, of whom many Authors haue written, and say; that they were of wonderful stature and strength, sterne, rude, and robust, far exceeding humane ability. Finally, for the finnes

Contrariety in opinion, a- bout the length of time in the first age.	of men, came the generall flood vppon the earth, whereby all mankinde was drowned, except Noah, and such as wer preserued with him in the Arke. This Age endured, according to the opinion of the Hebrues, one thousand, six hundred, fifty six yeares; whereunto agreeth Philo the Iew, Beda, S. Ierom, & the common Text of the Bible. But according to the seauenty two Interpreters, Eusebius, and other Historians, it lasted two thousand, two hundred, forty and two yeares. Saint Augustine saith, two thousand, two hundred, seauenty two yeares: and Alphonsus King of Spain saith, two thousand, eight hundred, eightie two yeares.	afterward they made their abiding. During this Age, Tuball, or Tubalkaine, the Sonne of Iaphet, went to dwel in Spain, where he erected a kingdom, and began there his raigne. Some also say, that he was indifferently called Suball, or Tuball, the Sonne of Falech, and Nephew of Heber. The raign of the Scythians began in this Age, in the northern or Septentrionall parts; and therefore, they haue alwayes pretended, that their Dominion preceedeth all other in Antiquity, as Trogus Pompeius, and Iustine haue recorded: whereupon, great enmity still grew betweene them and the Egyptians; and heereabout they hadde continuall controuersie. Then was the Art Magick, & Incantations first found out by Cham, who likewise was called Zoroastres. About the ending of this Age, and a little before the birth of Abraham (according to the iudgement of Eusebius & Beda) the most potent raign of the Assyrians began to exalt it selfe, hauing Belus for their first King, whom some others tearmed to bee Iupiter. It is also Written, that the second Ninus, in whose time Abraham was born, did then conquer many Citties and Prouinces. Moreouer, there was then another kind of gouernment in Egypt, tearmed Dinastia, where the first supream Ruler was named Vexor, or Vexor (as Eusebius saith) who about the ending of this Age instituted the Kingdome or sway of the *Sicyonians in Peloponnesus, now caled Morea, whereof Agessilaus is said to bee the first King. In this time likewise beganne Idolatry and Gentilisme. Behold, what a confused knowledge we haue attained vnto, of this second Age; in the end whereof, the most famous Citty of Ninuy was builded, consisting of admyred greatnesse: for, according to the Scripture, it was three dayes iourney in Circuit about.	The begin- ning of the Scythians raigne.
The second Age of the worlde.	The second Age beganne in Noah, after that hee was come foorth of the Arke, and continued vnto the byrth of Abraham, consisting in length of time, according to the Interpreters, Eusebius, Isidore, and the greater part of Chroniclers, 942. yeares. But the Hebrewes make lesse account, and grant no more then 292. yeares; and of the same opinion is Philo and Iosephus. - S. Augustine affirmeth one thousand, seauentie two yeares. There remaineth very litle certainty, concerning such occasions as chanced in this Age, for no perticuler History is found thereof. Only there are some things saide in generall, touching the beginning of Kingdomes & States, and those that were the first inhabitants of Prouinces.	10 20 30 40 50	Trog. Pomp. Hee begat children, the like did his Sonnes, so that the world began againe to bee greatly peopled. Cham the second Son of Noah, begate Cush and Mizraim, of whom are the Aethiopiens and Egyptians descended; the Aethiopiens of Cush, and the Egyptians of Mizraim: then had hee Canaan, from whom the Canaanites are deriaed. His other Sonne Iaphet, begate Gorney and Magog, of whom so many nations descended, as were ouer-tedious heere to recite. In this time was the Tower of Babell builded, and the confusion of Languages then hapned by meanes whereof (as hath in the former Chapter bin declared, and as Iosephus truly hath recorded) men were thence fundered into diuers Isles & Prouinces, wher	20 30 40 50	Cham surna- med Zoroastres was the first inuentor of the Magicke Art.

formed her memorable actions. For, faigning her selfe to bee yong Ninus her Sonne, and hauing chaunged hir Womans habit, she raigned so a long time, and conquered many great Landes and Prouinces. She also re-edified, & round engirt the famous City of Babylon with wals. In this time did Abraham (by Gods Commandement) make his peregrination, and won the victory which he obtained ouer foure Kinges, in the rescue of Lot, whom they led away as prisoner. In this time also, the Amazons had their first beginning. And likewise, the Kings that were called Pharaohs, did then flourish in Egypt; and Sodome and Gomorrhah were also then destroyed. In Isaacs time began the raigne of the Argiues in Thessaly; and in the dayes of his Sonnes, Iacob and Esau, the Kinges of Cesta began their rule; the first whereof was named Acris. Then in short while after, Ioseph was sold by his Brethren to the Egyptians, in manner as the holy History discourseth; and likewise, how his Father and Brethren (with their children) went into Egypt, where the people of Israell that descended of them, liued foure hundred and thirty yeares, according as Beda writeth, and S. Augustine in his book of the City of God.

During this Age, Hercules of Lybia trauelled into Spaine, where he beganne his Government. And after him, were Hyuer, Brigus, Taga, Beto, Gerion, & diuers others. Of their seuerall raignes & Iurisdictions there, Berosus, with sundry other well approued Authours, do make like mention. In this time was the City of Siule first founded; and it is acknowledged in the world, to be one of the most ancient, as likewise is set down by Berosus and others. It was first of all called Hispalis, according to the name of Hispalus, the Sonne, or (as others will haue it) the Nephew of Hercules, who raigned worthily there; and it was hee that caused the first foundation thereof to be laide, and after built it in comely manner. Yet Isidore contrarieth this iudgement of Berosus, and saith; That it was entitled Hispalis, because it was erected in a very Marshy ground; and that for their safe security in building, they were compelled to driue great beames of Woode, Trees, and Stakes into the ground. But howsoeuer it was, the City of Hispalis was afterward called Spain, as wee are credibly certified by Trogus Pompeius, Iustine, & diuers others. True it is, that Iulius Cesar did terme it Siule, ennobling it with great enlargement, making it his chiefe Colony and abode for his Romaines, because it was (before that time) very famous and noble.

10 But returning again to our first purpose; by succession of this time, Moyse was borne; vnder whose guidance, the Hebrues departed out of Egypt: in which dayes also liued Iob the iust. And not long after, the mighty Deluge or overflow of Waters happened in Thessaly; whereupon ensued the encreasing of diuers Kingdomes in many Landes and Territories: For Aethiops the Sonne of Vulcan, first raigned in Aethiopia; which had bin first called Aetheria, next Atlantia, and lastly, a Kingdom, after Aethiops name: Siculus gouerned in Sicilia, & Loetius in Boetia. So that Kingdomes and Countries receiued their Names by them that were the first commaunding Princes: as Sardinia likewise was so called of Sardus, another Sonne of Hercules. In those dayes the famous City of Troy flourished, and Iason made his conquest of the Golden Fleece; & thence ensued the known history of Medea, that famous Witch, Daughter to K. Octa, by his Wife Hypsea. And now were the Amazons more powerfull in strength, then at any other time before or after; and then began the Kingdom of the Latines in Italy.

20 In this Age also, Paris made his rape of the faire Helena, which caused that long warre, and lastly, the destruction of Troy, with the comming of Aeneas into Italy, beside many other thinges which our intended breuity admits no speech of.

30 Now the third Age fayling, it gaue place to the fourth, entering at the beginning of Dauids raigne, who was second King of the Hebrues. This fourth Age continued, till the transmigration and peregrination of the Iewes into Babylon, containing 484. yeares, (but Beda counteth no more then 474. yeares.) This Age may wel terme it selfe the lusty and sprightly Age of the world; for in this time, infinite occasions hapned, wherewith all Histories are plentifully enriched. The victories of Ki. David.	holy King David had now their Originall: he conquered the Philistims , reuenged himselfe on the Ammonites for the disgrace done to his Ambassadors, and put to death the Captaine of the Affyrians . Next him, succeeded the raigne of the Wise King Salomon , who builded the rich Temple of Ierusalem ; but he dying, his Kingdome was diuided, Ierobom succeeding in ten Families, and Robom his Sonne in two. After this, the empire of the Affyrians , which hadde lasted more then 1200. yeares, became vtterly ruined, by the death of Sardanapalus , who was Lord thereof, & the most potent King in the world; but he being slaine by Arbacltus , the Empire then fell vnto the Medes .	of mighty Armies, would appeare so farre from common beleefe, that silence is more fitting, then an abusive abridgement; especially, in matters of such weight and importance. Almost at the beginning of this Age, the famous Monarchy of the Persians had hir Original, the raigne whereof was then most powerfull beyond all other, by the means of great Cyrus his victories, who raigned thirty yeares. In which time he vanquished and ouerthrew the rich King Craesus of Lydia , but was foiled himself, and put to death by Tomyris , Queene of the Massegeta or Scythians , who sowed his head in a barrell of blood. In the same Age, the powerful kings of Macedonia began their raigne, and the Grecians counted their yeares by Olimpiades , which were Feasts and sports of actiue variety; and continued (by them) from five yeares to five yeares, with prizes and rewards for the best deseruers. Then also was the magnificent City of Carthage builded by Queene Dido , and very soone after Rome , by Romulus and his Brother Remus , where the Romaine Kinges (from this their beginning) alwayes after held on their raigne. The great City of Bizantium , was now builded in like manner, and afterward, was named Constantinople . At this time beganne great Warres and alterations of Kingdomes in many parts of the world, but especially towards the ending of this Age, according as Histories doe at large discourse. Nabuchodonosor , King of the Medes and Babylon , went against Ierusalem , destroying both it & the Temple likewise; then led he the people of Judea thence as Prisoners with him, and thereof was it named the transmigration of Babylon .	10 20 30 40 50 Seauenty yeares of this Age beeing compleated, the Hebrues were deliuered out of their captiuity, and then was the Temple new built againe at Ierusalem , which formerly had bin destroyed. In Europe also, the Romaines expelled their Kinges, and gouerned themselues by Consuls; The first whereof, was L. T. Brutus ; and next vnto him succeeded Colatinus . In Greece also flourished learning and Chiuallry, which caused no lesse famous Phylosophers, then valiant and excellent Captaines. Xerxes came thither with an innumerable Armie, as hoping to conquer it, but hee was constrained to retire with mighty losse, and greater shame. After this, King Phillip began his raigne in Macedon , and he subdued Greece , the Mother of good Artes and armes, who had fostered (with her Milke of Knowledge) in those Dayes, Demosthenes , Themistocles , Epaminondas , Agefilaus , Zeno , Plato , Aristotle , and many such like beside. No sooner was king Phillip dead, but Alexander his Sonne would no longer abide in Greece : He entered into Asia , which he quickly conquered, destroying the Empire of the Persians , and by means of his victory against Darius , hee continued the rest of his lifetime, sole Monarch, and Emperour of the whole world. But after his death, his Captaines diuided his Dominions among them; which dishonorable deed, raised no meane dissention, with warres and battailes thorow Asia , as also in the greater part of Europe . CHAP. III.

Of the State and Governement of the Spartanes, the Common-wealth observed among them, their Lawes, & other memorable occasions.

HE City of Sparta, which also was named Lacedemon, and now is called Metrixa, was destroyed in the time when the Grecians flourished; but it was very famous, by manie honourable actions of her most excellent Captaines; and yet much more illustrious, in hauing Licurgus to be her ruler with his Lawes, which gaue hir long life, and might haue continued for many hundreds of yeares: but after she fell to contemne his Lawes, too soone she saw hir owne ending. Now, because hir ancient glory appeareth to me, to be a notable State, and worthy much Commendation, I cannot let hir passe, with speaking somewhat of hir.

Considering then, that the City of Sparta, (aboue all other Citties) was sufficiently inhabited with men of great strength, and of Name also, which only made it Famous in Greece; it appeareth to me a very Myraculous matter, how, and by what meanes it could be so compassed. But then againe, when I remember the study of the Spartanes, all meruaile easily is resolved. And yet, I must needs admire Licurgus, and repute him to be an especiall Wiseman, in giuing them such Lawes; and they being obedient to them, did thereby become so happy and blessed. For they, without taking example therein by any other City, but rather being farre contrary in opinion to many of them, did yet so carry themselus, that their country went beyond all the rest in their felicity.

For the procreation of Children, (because I take this the principall thing first to be spoken of) and because there are some, who with most curious food doe foster those Children, which they deeme fitting for such kind of delicacy: Wine they vtterly forbid them, or cause them to vie it with great allay of water; now what do they else heerin, but euen set so many Artificers (as it were) in a place of quietnesse, where no kinde of stirring is to be heard; and the women likewise to bee in their repose, setting onely the Virgins (in meane while) to spin their wooll for wearing. But who can any way hope, that this is the way to be borne great, and of women educated in this manner. Therefore Licurgus was of another iudgement, in that a better building was in this case required, and that it was the work of seruants and not Children, to sit and make Garments. And therefore perceiuing, that the generating of Children was an important matter, and with free-women, that were of as free disposition; he especially ordained, that the woman should exercise hir Body no otherwise then the man. According to this rule, the sport of running, and actiue vse of strength, was allowed (among them) to be as free for women as men. Because he held it a principall maxime in his iudgment, that Children being bred and born of chearfull disposed Parents, would themselues containe the like sprightly nature, and their issue also be of the same true temper. Whereupon, when conuenient time came, for women to take knowledge of men, it was duly considered, that they who were of such temperate capacity in conuersing with their wiues; in this case would haue a quite contrary opinion to the other. Therefore, he ordained, that when the Husband went to visit his wife, & when he likewise departed from hir, it should be done with such discretion, as it might not be discerned of any other; in which respect, it was so thought fit, both for the procuring of most sweet delight, and greater desire of pleasure in the state of Matrimony. It was withall considered, that they of the strongest Complexion, might sometime fall into infirmity, and therefore it required the lesse continuance together, till both the one and the other were in better condition.

Moreouer, he made a Law, that no man at his owne wil should marry with a woman, neither that any marriages should be made, til the parties had attained to ful ripeness of yeares, because hee conceiued, that it wold be the best help, both both to fecundity and strength. Now, if it hapned, that any old man should haue a yong wife; Licurgus did fore-see, that men of those yeares would bee hard to their wiues, and suspitious of them also: wherfore he ordained the contrary in this case, and instituted, that any woman of aged yeares being disposed to mary, should make choise of such a man, whose minde and body might best bee pleased with hirs, and take him home to her house, although no hope of Children were to be expected. Besides, he made another Law, that if a man had no will to a wife, and yet was desirous to haue free children: in this case he prouided, that if such a man had seene a generous & fruitful woman, if he could win the liking of hir husband, cōtenting him and she not displeas'd; hee might beget children of hir. Many like thinges were in the Lawes of Licurgus, permitting, that a man might haue two wiues in his house, if he would; and that maried folk might purchase Brethren to their owne borne Children, who equally shoulde participate of their family, and of their power, but neuer of their faculties. By this institution of begetting diuersity of children among the other Grecians, it may bee easily imagined, how farre the Spartans went beyond others; both in excellency of people, and of power.

Concerning their discipline (because the rest of the Grecians; & especially they who desired to haue their children nobly instructed, so soone as they should vnderstande what they spake; they would presently giue them in gouernment to pedante Seruants, and suddenly also provide them of other Maisters, to learne good Letters, Musicke, and such actiue feats as appertained to wrastling. Besides this, with shooes they then wold soften their Childrens feet, and adorne their bodies with diuersity of garments and moderate their Diet, according to the stature of their bodies. But Licurgus in exchange of pedanticall seruants, to whom priuately they gaue their Childrens gouernment: ordained, to haue them tutord by one of those men, that should be elected by the chiefest Magistrate, who, because he was an instructor of children, they vsed to call him Pedonomo. To him they gaue authority to congregare Children together, as in a

Schoole, and he might seuerely chastise them, that (by him) were founde inclined to bad, crafty, and lewde dispositions. According to their increasing in yeares, so was one set to walke vp and downe among them, that carried a rod in his hand, wherewith (as they offended) they were beaten: the punishment wherof, & the publick disgrace, in short time made the children so ashamed; that they would readily obey, and performe whatsoeuer they were inioyned to do.

And then at this growth, in stead of Hose & shooes they were appointed to go bare foot, and bare legd, because Licurgus foresaw, that by this hardning exercise, they woulde easily run vp the hills and rockes, as also, with most safety descend down again, mount, or dismount, running swifter vnshod, after they had well exercised their feet, then if they were suffered to weare shooes. And for variety of Garments, he commaunded, that they should vse themselves to one kind or fashion of habit onely, iudging, that (in this maner) they should the better indure both cold and heat. Next, he appointed, that the Male-child should haue so much meat, as neuer afterward his stomack might be offended with ouerfeeding. Aduising also, that he should be invred to tast want or scarcity: as wel vnderstanding, that such apted bodies as should be trained vp in such manner, would much better (when occasion serued) be enabled to endure labour without food, then others, because this kind of education, gaue them the meanes of longest abstinence; and beside, taught them to make vse of any other viands, then their accustomed meat and drink, so to content themselves with any nourishment whatsoeuer.

Also, he very well knew, that who-soeuer was desirous to preferue health, and to encrease the bodies stature, such kind of sustenance was more conuenient; then to feed the body with subtile & superfluous meats, which only made them grosse. And to the end likewise; that they might not be oppressed with famine, he would not permit, that such as suffered want through ydlenes; should haue any thing giuen them: but tolerated them to steal such food as might suffice against famine. And this he did; as knowing no readier way, wherby to make them industrious or forward, for their owne wants and necessities. And it is very euident, that hee that is desirous to steale any thing, it is necessarie for him, to spend the night in Watching, and the day time in subtile Deuises, laying his Traines equally in order, if hee will compasse those occasions which hee most aymes at. It is not to be doubted then, that they who would haue their Children quicke and aptest, for such necessaries as are to maintaine life, they should haue them in this manner educated and enstructed.

But some man may heere infer, that if to robbe and steale may be counted a good quality, when a man grewe expert and cunning in Theft, wherefore did they punish him with many stripes? Thus I answer, according to mine own opinion and coniecture, that as in other matters taught by men, the learners are punished for dooing them well; euen so in like manner, they that held on in these Pilferies, as pretending sufferance to be a License vnto their immoderate Libertie, were as seuerely chastised, as they that stole foolishly and without discretion, and both duly reprehended, for knowing no end of their owne leudnesse.

If the Pedonome chaunced to bee absent, yet that the Children might neuer be without a Maister, it was ordained, that the Cittizen, who was present at his departing, should haue Authoritie and command ouer the saide Children, to instruct them according to his owne liking, and as they offended, accordingly to correct them. But this prooued most vnto the Childrens shame and disgrace, in regard, that neither Children nor men will feare any one more, then him that is their chiefe Maister. Yet som man must needs be present, for the childrens better gouernment, and such an one as was imagined best able to command, he euermore had the Male Children in charge, as the like care was had ouer the Female; so neither of them were destitute of Maisters. But now, I hold it conuenient, to speak somewhat concerning the Childrens Loue, because it also appertaineth vnto Discipline.

tia, permitted yong men and Maides to be together; the Ephesians, in the interchange of affable courtesies, made especiall delight in eithers beauty, yet some others there were, who by no meanes would suffer yong Louers to talke together. Licurgus was of contrary opinion to all these, because if there were any, who (as Nature requireth) considering the inward beauty of a Maidens minde, became affectionat towards hir, & so to grow to irreprehensible loue, & without taint or blemish: he graunted them license, that they might be together, and reputed it to be honest discipline. If any were thought to desire the Maidens body, it (beeing iudged a most shamefull matter among the Lacedemonians) he ordained that Louers should no otherwise abstain from cōpanying with maidens, then as fathers did with their Children, or Brethren with Brethren, in the pleasures of Venus, which thing I maruel not a litle, if som there be that scarce belieue it; because in many Citties, that Lawes do not hinder their owne practise. But so soon as children leauing their schooling, attained to more forwardnesse in youth-hood, some ceased immediately from all control of Schoole-maisters or other Gouernors, & freely were at their owne disposition. This course also, did Licurgus much dislike, & as one that wel knew, that youth do naturally incline to great furlinesse of minde, by vnbridled license, and vncircumscribed Libertie of pleasures, therefore he enioyned them to very hard labors, and deuised such apt occasions for them, that alwayes they should be full of busines. Whereunto, he also added, that if any one contemnd or fled from such employment, he shold neuer rise to any degree of honour: ordaining withall, that not only publicke persons should bee deputed to this Gouernment, but that parents also should haue especiall care of their Children, to the end, that this kind of fear remaining as a Bridle in the city, few or none shold become insolent or vngracious.

Next to this, being desirous to plant in them a graue and naturall kind of honesty, he commanded, that passing thorough the streets, they should hide their handes vnderneath their Cloakes, and neither talke together, nor gaze about them, but still to keepe their eyes fixed vpon upon the ground. By which meanes, it was obserued, that the Masculine sexe excelled in modesty and bashfulnesse; the very choifest perfections in the Feminine. Their voyces were no more heard, then as if they had bin Statues of stone; and as easily were their eyes enduced to gazing, as if they had bin Pillers of Brasse; nor were the young Damofels more chaste in their Chambers, then young men were as they walked in the streets. In like manner, if they were inuited to Feasts or Bankets, they vsed neuer to answer or speake, except some question were first moued or demanded. Concerning Orders and Institutions among them, the one was no sooner commanded, but the other was as duly and diligently obserued, especially among the young men, of whome, no meane and prouident care was had, because the course of their education, did greatly auaille to inable them for the Commonwealths benefit. And for this cause, the Manners, Disposition, & behavior of euery one was diligently noted, and such as naturally were addicted to make prooffe of all Exercises; their Minds and affections were most listned vnto, the game of Wrastring being in frequent vse among them, because they reputed it an especial exercise, to imbolsden young men to buckle with Vertue; and thereby attaine to the chiefest perfection of all other good qualities.

The Ephori would Elect three of the gallantest Spirits among the rest, who in the Assembly of the Caualery or Horsemen, were called Hippagriti. Each one of these made election of an 100. men, declaring by their seueral respects, which sort were to be honoured, and which to be reiected. They that stood out of this honourable Election, were commaunded to incounter with the other in battell, to win the reputation which (as yet) they wanted, if their skill and indeuour would stretch so far, and so, by this meanes, iust trial was made of eithers Vertue. This proued to be a verypious and profitable contention for the Common-wealth, wherein such actions were best declared, as beseemed a man of vertuous inclination: and so seperately (on either side) such Study and diligence was daily put in practise, as no one could be found an idle & vnfit member, but altogither (one way or other) auailable to publick benefit. They were also constrained to haue an especial respect of health, in euery place where they met to encounter, either in ambitious fighting, or manly wrastring. And while in this maner they contended together, euery man that was there present, and had authority, might part the; but if any one would not bee obedient; the Pedonomo caused him to be called in iudgement before the Ephori, and they would very seuerely punish him, as men that hadde discretely ordained, that no man should be ouertome with rage or fury, but euery way be obedient to the Lawes.

So soone as these yong men came to years of Maturity, and some of them elected to be Magistrates: diuers of the Grecians; without any regard of their bodies strength, would put them to the affairs of war. But Licurgus made a law, wherein he declared, that it was an excellent exercise for a man of those years first to be trained vp in Hunting, except it might be hinderous to some publick Office, and thereby both yong men, as wel as others of riper yeares, were the better enabled to indure the trauaile of Military Discipline.

Now concerning their maner of feeding, for sustentation of life, Licurgus vnderstanding, that the Spartans, as also diuers of the Grecians, vsed much priuat banquetting in their Houses, he thereby gathiered; that much rior & excesse was daily committed: whereupon he commanded, that all such meetinges of the people shold be in publick; conceining that (by this means) they durst not transgresse their imposed iniunction, but obserue such a comly order in feeding, as they would not exceed, either in too little, or too much. Moreouer, idle persons were easily alured to commit many disorders; & rich men (ofittimes) held some resemblance with the slothful or negligent; whereby insued, that (while they sat at the table (they wer suffred neither to be too sumptuous, nor too sparing. Therefore prohibiting them of vnnecessary drinking, which offendeth both the mind and Body, it kept them from drinking til they wer thirsty, for that it was both wholsom & profitable: & the people being thus orderly gouerned, what is he that can wrong either himselfe or his dwelling, with vnseemely gurmardizing or drunkennesse?

In other Citties, men of equal condition would drinke extraordinarily together, and made such a custome thereof, that no shame or respect was hadde among them: but in the City of Sparta, Licurgus, to them of younger years, administred Discipline, and to the Elder, graue Customs and Obseruations. And it is a matter much concerning anie Countrey, that at Feastes or such like meetings, honorable occasions of the City should be the chiefest talke, to auoid all other lewde and vnbeseeing Discourse; as also, ouermuch quaffing, whereto vaine speech is the onely Spur and Prouoker; nor should any but honest actions passe thorough the Table, or any word that may make the speaker ashamed. And by this publicke feeding together, it proued to be another benefit, that men would haue care of their home-returning, and not ouer-weaken their Bodies with Wine, lest they should passe disorderly thorow the Streetes. For they knew very wel, that they were not to rest where they had supt, & night must be no other Mantle or Cloake for them, then the day had bin: wherefore, as they were vnder an honest subiection, so should they gouerne themselues honestly both for day and night.

Idle talke, the Spur to drunkennesse.

The benefit of publicke meetings.

Licurgus likewise considered, that such as went to labour after their meat, were of a well coloured Complexion, healthfull and lusty; but others, that consumed time in Idleness, became Corpulent, swolne vp, and verie sickely; therefore, he prouided against such inconueniences, and knowing that idle immaginations were but to pamper the body, as bringing fresh Fuell to the fire; he appointed, that the Elder persons in this case, should haue care of the younger, and keepe them stil from excesse of feeding, and set them to one lusty exercise or other, by which commendable meanes, hardly could any men elsewhere be found, that either in health or strength of body, could compare with the Spartanes, for they made equal exercise, both of their Legges, Armes, and the whole bodie.

Labour is the best nourisher of health.

Licurgus made Lawes also contrary to them of other Citties; for, in other Cities, each man was Lord of his Sons, Seruants and Money; but Licurgus ordained, that Citizens (without any offence among them) might haue the benefit of Commerce or Exchange, and no man to commaunde his Children or Seruants, but in such things as were iust and behoouefull. So that heereby, both Honesty of the Father, and Duty of the Sonne, were equally discerned; that, as no shame ensued by the Iniustice of the Fathers command, so no punishment followed by the Sonnes disobedience. And if Children quarrelled, or fell out together, so that blowes (perhappes on either side) ensued; if the Parents had no vniust hande therein, the reconcilment was the sooner, and no partie offended. Such order also was for the seruants, both in Domesticke and Open Busineses, and the Iustice of the Master, was no meane honour to the Seruant.

Hee appointed also, that Houndes for Hunting should be to common vse; and such as had no delight in the game, should yet keepe Hounds, & lend them to others benefit. The like seruice was commaunded of Horsses, and hee that was not able to trauell on foot, and had neither Horffe or Waggon, yet must needs bee at some place in hast, where his earnest occasions vrged his presence: whersoever he saw an Horffe, he might safely take him; and when his businesse was ended, restore him backe vnto the Owner, who might be as bold with him or any other, and all accepted in friendly manner, as doing no worse then hee would be done vnto. And when anie were returned from Hunting, and wanted food to supply their Hunger, it was ordained, that such as had supt, and left prouision fit for the vse of other, they should make it presently knowne, & deliuer it where such vrgent occasion required. By which meanes, the pouertie of many was oftentimes well releued, and those Victuals honestly eaten, that else (by couetous keeping) had bin spild and spoild.

For the exercise of Hunting.

In other matters likewise, Licurgus would haue the Spartanes to differ from other Grecians; for wheras in other Citties, euery man endeuoured (to his vttermost) for his owne enriching, some by Husbandry, others by Nauigation; others

Licurgus wold not haue free men to meddle with money.

others by Merchandize, and others by Handy-crafts: Licurgus did then prohibit the Spartans; that Free-men should not meddle with any thing, whereby any Money was to be gotten; but all such matters, as brought liberty to Citizens, & no way made the seruile; them he appointed, and them they might iustly terme to be their studies. For to what end should men toyle themselves for riches, where all things necessary are equally brought vnto them? By this institution for honest maintenance, it came to passe, that no occasions whatsoever, could make men desirous or couetous of Money. . And that which is much more, no gaine could enforce them to variety of Garments, because they cared not for any exterior or magnificent pompe in cloathing, but onely for well ordering and gouerniug their bodies. In which respect, they made the lesse esteeme of Mony, to haue vse or expence thereof in any company, because they were of the minde, that much more nobly one man might helpe another, being his friend or familiar, with the labor of his body; then with such needesse trash, which declared them to be as industrious in minde, as others were in gathering Riches. And yet notwithstanding, no man (in any case whatsoever) might enrich himselfe by anothers wrong or pteiudice. Wherefore first of all, was ordained such a piece of mony, as was of the value of ten Drachmaes, to the end, that so soon as it was brought into any house, it might not be hidden either by the Master or seruant, because it required a great place and carriage: Whereupon, diligent search was made for Gold and Siluer; and wheresoever it was found, the possessor thereof was seuerely punished. What needed anie man then to hide or hoord vp money in any place, where the keeping brought him greater daunger, then the getting could yeild him pleasure? By this it may be gathered, that among the Lacedemonians, euery one obeyed both the Magistrate and the Lawes. And I am of the minde, that Licurgus neuer attempted this excellent order of a Commonwealth, before hee had thereto first reconciled the Noblemen that were in the City. The rather am I induced to this perswasion, because in other Cit-ties, the men that were in greatest power, stood in little or no feare at all of the Magistrate, but held it dishonourable for them to be obedient. But in Sparta, the very Princes themselves would yeeld reuerence, especially to the Magistrate, and they reputed it their greatest glory to be humble, and would rather run then go, when they were called; so tractable wer they to obedience, because they were perswaded, that others would be the easier drawn by their example, when they themselves first shewed Humility, and so indeed it came to passe with them. But very like it is, that the power of the Ephori had thus ordained it, well vnderstanding, that obedience is the greatest benefite that can be in any Common-wealth, both in War abroad, and in peace at home: therefore the greater persons of esteeme, that are about the Magistrat, the sooner (in mine opinion) are Citizens drawn to declare their obedience.

The Ephori were such potent men, as they might punish whom they pleased, reconcile all differences, and depriue other Magistrates of their Authority, or prevent them before they came to it: they might commit any man to prison, and call him in question for his life. But these that had such supream priuiledge, would not permit (as in other Cities they did) that such as were elected to be Magistrates, should alwaies beare sway according to their owne wils: for so they might haue prooued to be Tyrants, or as ouer-awing Schoole-Masters, without feare or discretion, punishing what they pleased to term breach of Law. No, Licurgus in this case declared great prouidence; and as in many things hee became admired for conforming the people vnto the lawes, yet this (aboue all the rest) I hold to merit no meane applause, in that he wold not publish any Law to the people, vntill himselfe and the Princes had first gone to Delphos, to demaund of their God Apollo, whether it might be profitable, & for the wel-fare of the City of Sparta, if the people did yeild their Obedience thereunto. If he had answere from the Oracle, that it was for the best, then he would divulge it; iudging it to be not only very vniust, but also meeer wickednesse, if any man should be obedient to

An honorable death, preferred before a shamefull life

In one thing also, Licurgus is said to deserue immortall memory, because he inioyned the Lacedemonians to prefer an honourable death, before an infamous life. And surely, if men doe consider it well, they shall finde the one much more glorious then the other: And let them speake but truly out of their owne hearts, they do (in honesty) beleue, that they liue longer by the meanes of Vertue, then by the idle allurements of Vice; because Vertues Documents, though they appeare to be vntastable at the first receiuing; yet (in prooffe) they are found to bee more easie, more delightfull, more expeditious and lasting, then any other offered to the contrary. For, it is manifestly seene, that (aboue and beyond all other things) Glory is the onely Companion of Vertue, because all men (in a certain manner) do desire to be helpfull to the good and honest. Vppon which solid ground, methinkes it is expedient that wee should heere discourse, after what manner those people applyed their endeouour, that they might attain to such true fame and credit. They dealt therefore in such sort, that good men liued in honor, and bad men miserably. For, in the Neighboring Citties, when anie one offended lewdly, he was rewarded only with the name of a bad man; and yet notwithstanding, in one & the same Market, both good men and bad might Trafficke together, sit, sport, and feede in one company. But among the Lacedemonians, euery one took it as no mean reproach, if hee were but seene talking with a badde man, or offered to try his strength with him in Wrestling. And many times, a man of ill repute, intruding himselfe among them that plaid at Tennis; caused them instantly to giue ouer play, and could not be accepted as a Companion, on either side. And while the young people were at Dauncing, the very worst place of al was this vnwelcome Guestes allowance, and at parting thence, euery one would shun him on the way, and very rarely coulde he be admitted into any assembly, either among the young or olde: but that he must giue place vppon their present appearance.

Glory is the sole companion of Vertue.

Bad men, might not converse or sport with them that wer good and vertuous.

It was ordained also, that the Parents of Virgins should traine them vp in their owne Houses, till their abilitie of body made the fit to be seen abroad. And it was not lawfull for any Man, to leaue his Wife alone in his own house, least thereby he did incur great punishment: for solitude (oftentimes) admitted way to vnmeet insinuations, with others dangers thereon depending, easily listned vnto, & learned of the lewd, which Offences wer euermore seuerely chastised of the better sort. And therefore, when euill doers were exposed to publicke shame; it was no great matter of meruaile, if Men and Women did much rather couet death, then to liue in apparant disgrace and obliquy. Worthily then did the Lawes of Licurgus deserue commendation, which made such excellent prouision, that (to the verie extreimity of Age) euery one (in duty) might apply himselfe to vertue. For, such was his opinion, that the Crown or honour of a mans life, consisted on age, and therefore the younger sort (attaining to that renowne) by example of their Elders, were bound to the greater care of goodnesse and honesty. In which respect, wee may not omit another singular Law by him prouided, for such aged persons as were good and Vertuous. For he considering, that the best triall of true life indeed, was in the aged mans hand: expressely commaunded, that Age should be more highly honored, then the best strength of youth. And to speake vprightly, this time of triall or conflict, dooth make the best prooffe (beyond all other) of a man. For as the exercise of Wrestling, giues Testimony of the young mans able bodie. so do the Combats and Conflictes of Age, yeild absolute euidence of the old mans mind, and looke how much more excellent the soule is aboue the Bodie, euen as much, or rather more, doo the exercises of the soule conquer them of the body. Wherefore then should we not (euen to this day) admire & honor this good Institutiō of Licurgus? For after he perceiued, that such men as were negligent in the actions of vertue, could no way exalt the dignity of their country: he tooke diligent care, that in Sparta, all Vertuous endeouours should bee publickely exercised. So that, as men adorned adorned with vertues, doe easily vanquish abiect or priuate Spirits, and the studious, the negligent: euen so Sparta, that (onely) made publique exercise of goodnesse and honesty, ouercame (by many degrees) all other Citties in vertue. For they would punish such Men onely, as did iniury to others; but Licurgus would haue any man in like manner chastised, for not expressing a manifest care, both how to auoyd such offences, and how to equall his reputation with the best. For Licurgus was perswaded, that hee which did cast his Neighbour into Prison, or forcibly did steale any thing, or priuately vsed purloyning; all these were no more but priuate iniuries to the persons offended: but the Common-wealth was more haynously wronged, yea (in a manner) betrayed to the Enemy, when idle and vitious Varlets escaped vnpunished; and therefore, for such Cankers and Caterpillers to common good, hee ordained very strict and seuerer punishments.

Beyond all these fore-recited ordinances, as in an intollerable case of necessity, his care was extraordinary, for all ornament due to Ciuill life. And therefore, such as were of ability, and had least feeling of others wants, were enioyned to haue equall respect of the Common-weale; both in infirmities belonging to the body, and other occasions as they happened. Beside, if any Man were found negligent, in any office committed to his trust; he was not afterward numbred among the Citizens. Which appeared to be a very ancient Law, because Licurgus is found to be in the time of the Heraclidi; who albeit they were of great Antiquity, yet (in these times) they seemed new to others: and that which most of all is to be admired, was the promptitude of all men, to like and allow of their studies, yet not any City or State willing to folow their example, then which could be no greater benefit, both in Peace and Warre. Therefore, if any one be a curious Inquisitour in this case, he shall plainly perceiue, that Licurgus (better then any other) prouided for the affairs of Warre. First of all, the Ephori tooke graue aduise together, in what yeare they should send forth their Armies, vnder what Commaunders, and with what prouision; electing first the ordinary Footmen, and next to them Artificers, appointing Armour for each, according to their seuerall condition, and as the necessity of the case required: whereby ensued, that as the Lacedemonians had great plenty of Warrers, so could they as plentifully serue themselves, with able men of their owne Cittie. They likewise ordained, that those Engines or Instruments, whereof they had most neede in their Armies; should all be readily brought thither in Carts, or on Beasts backs: so that, euery Man might forth-with perceiue, which of them needed most employment.

And first of all, each Souldier was appointed to weare a Crimson Stoale or Tipper about his necke, and a Shield of Brasle; because they knew that this kind of Stoale (being most apt for war) was not meete for Women to weare, in regard it kept longest cleane, and free from soyle. It was permitted also, that such as had past the years of Childhood, might weare a little Bush or tuft of hair before on their heads, appearing thereby, to be free-borne, of greater Spirit, liberall endowments, and much more fortunate then others were. The Armies being in this manner ordered, the Horse and Foot-men were distributed into sixe Tribes or parts. Each Tribe of the City had a Tribune ouer the Souldiers; foure Marshals for the seuerall ranckes of Pikes, eight Quinquagenari or Gouvernours, of fifty yeares old each Man; and sixteene Captaines of the Squadrons. Out of these Tribes the seuerall Bandes were appointed, sometimes in three Squadrons, other whiles in six. But because there are many, who haue imagined this order of the Lacedemonians, to be very vnfit and impeachable for Warre. I will let them see, that they doe diuersly vary in their coniecture, and farre from the truth of the matter indeede. For in the ordination among the Lacedemonians, there were appointed diuers heads and commanders, who had power (in euery degree) ouer all things to the vttermost. And so easie was it to learne this institution, that no one (could hee but obserue the knowledge of men) was able any way to erre therein. For as some had commission to be guides, so others were commaunded to be followers. And the manner of moouing the Squadron, was deliuered from the Head or commander thereof, by a word, after the order of a Trompet. One while the Squadron appeared to be very thin and narrow; otherwhiles, more large & thickned with company, which (in their March) was no difficult thing to learne. And albeit sometimes (by encounters) they fell into disorder; yet was their obseruation such, as eue-ry one could retire againe to his rancke, and be as ready to meet with the enemy againe, onely by the enstruptions receiued from the lawes of Licurgus.

Many things were easie to the Lacedemonians, that wer

ther.

To the Lacedemonians many things were apt & easie, which to the Armies of other parts were very harsh and hard. For when they marched in forme of a Cornet, the Squadron came to his vtmost imployment behinde, and if the Enemies Battalion were noted (at the encountring) to proceed in the same order; the chiefe of the Squadrons were instantly commanded, to confront them with their Targettiers, and alwaies to be in that forme, although the Enemies battaile should stand firme. And if the Enemy (in this manner) assailed them behinde, they turned all immediatly in order: to the ende, that euermore the strongest might oppugne the Enemy. But when the Prince happened to be in the left Wing, they did not therefore iudge their condition the worse, but many times the better; because, if any attempted to engirt him, the strongest Army did presently relieue him. And for diuers respects it seemed profitable, that the Generall of the Army should lead the right Cornet, making the battaile of his Cornet, and ording his followers in such sort; that, as at the first the General guided the right band, so at the last he should be seen in the left. And if the battaile were securely fenced from the enemies right Cornet; they had no other care, but presently to change all their Ensignes, opposing the all against the enemy, as if they were aduanced on the prow of a Galley, and so should the rere-ward suddenly bring their power on the right side. But when the Enemy offered to make his assault on the left side, they were still ready for him, and either valiantly repulsed him, or reuer-

sed their Squadrons in such contrarie manner to the enemy, that stil the rere-guard stood like a Shielde of defence against them. In ording also, how their feuerall quarters should be lodged, Licurgus did iudge it very vnrequisite, that the Cantons should fall into a quadrant or four-square; but rather to plant their lodging round, except they were secured by some hill, or had behind them a wall or Riuer. He appointed a Guard for the day time, who should alwaies haue care within the Army, not in regard of the Enemy, but on the friends behalfe; because they might discern thence the Enemies Caualiery, and how best to defend themselues against them. And if any one did willingly issue soorth of the place appointed for lodging, order was giuen, that the Sciriti should obserue him; for they had authority, to suffer no man to step out of the lodging, and to be careful also, that strangers should not walke to suruay them. Sometimes they vsed to dislodge themselues, as best they might offend their enemies, & be helpful to their friends. And to the end they might be forward to this Martiall exercise, the lawes had ordained certain honorable rewardees for all Lacedemonians, according to their feueral quality in merit: whereby ensued, that among themselues they were most magnificent, and appeared to others very valiant. Each man must take no more paces, then the Tribune himselve did appoint him, because none should stray far off from the Army. But after the Warlike exercise was performed, the chiefe among the Souldiers, would commaund all the rest to sit down in a ring; and after they had dined, the Scouts were suddenly sent abroad, in which time they went to councel againe, graunting time of rest, to such as were to be vsed in the night-seruice. Which things being ended, supper is published by the sound of a trumpet, that afterward they may sing prayes to their Gods, and please them with sacrifices, while the Army reposeth.

Concerning the person of the King, when he is in the Camp, it is conuenient to know, that the City findeth his prouision, and all that are with him. His Guardes are the familiar Seruants of his House, and with them the Tribunes of the Souldiers, for they beeing euer

euver present with him; Councell is the readier, if occasion require it. The chiefe of these familiar attendants, are three especiall men of respected degree, who with the other together, haue the sole care of all necessary matters, and sildom are absent from businesse for the Wars. At the Armies leading forth, they doe first offer sacrifice in the House to Ioue their Patrone and Guide, and to the other Gods, that if any thing haue formerly bene amisse sacrificed, the Fecial Priest (who, of the Fire he carieth, is called Pirphorus) taking the fire from the Altar, may go before them to the Confines of the Countrey, where againe he sacrificeth, both to Ioue and to Minerva. So soone as this Sacrifice to the Gods is performed, he goes on still with them forth of the Countries bounds, the fire continually flaming with that Sacrifice, and Beasts of all sorts led ready by him, to offer as occasion serueth. About the dawne or breake of the day, he returneth from this seruice, perceiuing first, that he hath obtained the beneuolence and fauour of the Gods. About the Sacrifice stand the Tribunes of the Souldiers, the Gouvernours of the rankes, the chiefe of the fifty strange Souldiers, the Commanders of them that beare the Armies luggage, and the Pretors of the City. There are also present two of the Ephori, who do nothing, except they be thereto called by the King; but stand ready to guard what euery one dooth, and to punish as they perceiue conueniency. The Sacrifices being ended, the King calleth his Councell, and commandeth them what is to be done. And so, he that duely obserueth this kind of discipline, may easily iudge the weaknesse and want in others in Military affaires, and that the Lacedemonians might iustly be tearmed, true and expert Maisters in the managing of Armes.

When the King leadeth forth his Army, if hee see no opposition to come against him; none goes before him but the Sciriti, and the Horsemen appointed for discouery. And if he see necessity of comming to the battaile, the King taking the Squadron of the chiefe Tribe, leades it on with quicke expedition, vntill he come into the middest of the other two Tribes, and there ioineth himselfe with the Tribunes of the Souldiers:

And he that is of eldest standing in the Common-wealths affaires, giues order of Governement to all the rest, which are all those, that (in one and the same obseruation) doe feede together, as the Soothsayers, Phisitions, Trumpeters, Heades of the Army, and all other Officers, that voluntarily happen to be among them. Whereby necessarily ensueth, that there can bee no doubt of any thing needfull, but there it is in order readily provided. And vndoubtedly, in very excellent manner did Licurgus provide for all affaires in the Army, for if any were to suffer torture in the sight of the Enemy, the Law commanded, that al the Trumpeters should (by sounding) giue publike admonition thereof, and all the Lacedemonians to stand there present, with their Crownes of atchieued Honour on their Heads: that when the Army was rid of so foule an Obloquy, the young sprightly Gallants, and those of choiser election, might enter the next battaile with greater courage, and shew themselves more vndauntedly valiant. The care of all which, consisted in the chiefe of the Squadron, because it concerned none of the company to meddle in the matter, but only the Head and Commander of the Squadron; which directly he did, except he pleased to refer it to the Tribune of the Souldiers.

But when was fittest time for the Armies lodging or dislodging; Licurgus referred that to the will of the King, that hee should appoint the manner, time, and place. The order also for mission of Ambassages, treaty of Leagues, and motions of Warre; was likewise an Article of the Kings priuiledge, and euery one went to attend the King, when any such occasions were in hand. If any strifes or differences happened, the king committed them to the Iudges appointed for contentions: if about summes of Money, to the Treasurer; if about spoyles or robberies, to those that had to deale therein. Now when the King had ordered all these busineses, there remained no other negotiation for him about the Governement; but to carry himselfe as a Priest in Diuine cases, and as a Captaine in Armes towards his people: Because Licurgus had ordained, that the King (in all publique matters,

And because the King might feede in publique, he was appointed a publique Table, and at Supper he was honoured with a double seruice; not because hee did eat twice as much as any other, but in regard they would grace (with his leauings) whom they pleased. They allowed him likewise two companions, such as himselfe liked to make choise of, and them they tearmed Pitij. They presented him also daily, a farrowing Sow, that whensoever he needed to consult with the Gods, hee should not be destitute of an offering. Neere to his Court they made a great Pond or Pool of Water, which abounded in all prouision thereto belonging, and due care was still had for the maintenance thereof. All the Magistrates (sitting on their Seates) did reuerence to the King, except the Ephori, and euery month they gaue the Oath one to another; the Ephori in name of the Citty, and the King in his own. The Oath of the King was to commaund, according to the Lawes made for the Citty, which were, to maintaine in the Citty the Kings authority stable, and binde the whole Kingdome inuiolably to obserue the same. Those honours affoorded by the Country to their King in his life time, did very much exceed their priuate obseruations; because Licurgus would not attribute tyrannicall pride to a King, neyther prouoke the Cittizens to be enuious against the Maiesty of Kinges. But those Honours done to their dead Kings, are declared in the Lawes of Licurgus at large, who would haue the Lacedemonian Kings to be honored, not as men, but rather as if they were halfe Gods.

orderly Governement in their Common-wealth, exceedingly renowned. The first Originall theteof, was attributed to Minerua, euen as if it should be saide, that the men liuing in this Cittie in those daies, did manifestly declare, that Wisedome and Prouidence were the onely Builders of Athens. Theseus was her restorer or deliuerer, but Solon was he that did her the chiefe good; because he gaue such Lawes to her people, that diuers other Prouinces disdained not to liue by the selfe-same rule as the Athenians duely obserued. And the Romaines (at the foundation of their State) sent Oratours to learne the Lawes of Solon; approouing them for the most excellent, that the whole World at that time affoorded. Now, in regard that from this Citty, many other receiued their best forme & shape: I am the easier induced, to make knowin the order of her Common-wealth, which wil appeare to bee as profitable, as pleasing.

1. The Athenians, who highly delighted to be called Indigeni, as much to say, as naturally home-bred, not descending of other people, nor sprung from any other place, whereby to make their originall more high or diuine; were distinguished by three seuerall names, as many good Writers haue well obserued. The first were styled Epatride; that is, Noble-men, holding the like Dignitie in Athens, as the Patricij did in Rome. Geomori were the second sort called, who were Rustici, or Country-people, and so tearmed, because they had graunted them one part of the Atticke fieldes, for their their Husbandry. The third kind were named Artificers, who exercised in the City both Mechanicall Arts, and Merchandise also: According to the word Dimiurgi, which signifieth Artifex, and may likewise impart the very same, as the name Publicanus among the Romans; to wit, a Customer, or receiuer of toles and Customes. As for such as held the supreamest place among the rest, both in honour and yeares; they were called Demogeronti, or Senatours, who had a very high authority ouer the vulgar sort. The first name of Indigena, was not giuen at the foundation of Athens, nor to the place of people, or to the City it selfe; but only to these, who were the greatest persons, and the very cheefest whereof, had onely liued in Athens, and could boldly affirme, that their beginning was from no other place. So, by pride, pompe, and ouer-awing, they grew to be tearmed Sons of the Foundation; and this or the like names serued, with the memory of Letters, vntill such time as the names of factions arose, which hapning among the popularitie, and the Common-wealth; the diuision continued so long, till Draco the Law-maker ordained Magistrates, and the State to be governed by Oligarchia; to wit, a few persons managing the whole authority: And these were then their names; Pediei, Diacrij, Parali, and Ettimorij. The first soly fauoured (as beeing made firme by riches) Oligarchia, or the power of a few. The Diacrij were appointed to popular administration, enduring (though much against their friends) that the most potent should hold chiefest place in the Common-wealth. Those who were tearmed Parali, fauouring one while the one side, and another while the other, would leane to which part best liked them, taking to themselves, and from others, the meanes of liberty. In this combustion, all iniury fell on the backs of the miserable Ettimorij, because all men of least faculty were so tearmed, and euery yeare were they enforced, to giue the sixt part of their goods, to the tyrannous oppression of the stronger power. Whereby ensued (as in like cases it commonly fals out) that extreame right, proued to be extreame wrong, and as euill humours in a body not well purged, do beget and nourish infinite diseases: Euen so fared it with the Cittizens in their miseries, for they beeing forsaken of all fauours, were glad to beare off all blowes with their owne bare heads. And because the people of Athens may bee the better knowne, what care and discretion the Magistrates obserued, to contain themselves in their degrees and offices: I thought good to make some description thereof, according as I finde it in the sixt Booke of Polybius set downe.

The people of Athens were (saith he) like vnto a pylot, cast out of his Ship, and quite forsaken. For, as the Pilot giueth command in the Ship (when all the Mariners are accorded with him) that neyther by the Tempest of weather, or dread of Enemies, they should be driuen into disorder, but by their obedience, the greater diligence on all sides vsed: As also when security is thus obtained, they being (in some strange manner) to despise their head and guide, falling to mutiny and sedition, because euery man is of an humor by himselfe; some, desirous to saile on; others, labouring their Governour to put into harbour: As likewise, I say, by such distraction in behauiour (most abrupt to behold) the strife and diuersity of opinion among the Saylers, makes some strike the Saylers; others cast Oares into the Water, one part drawing this way; the other to another kind of course, whereon immediat daunger ensueth, and in hoping to gaine Land, runnes upon a Rocke, and so is split: Euen such, and no other, appeared the wofull estate of the Athenians. For when the Commonwealth had out gone great and dangerous perills, as well by the peoples vertue, as by the care and indulgence of many Magistrates and Captaines: it ruined it selfe rashly in the end, for matters of small importance, and among Rockes that were of no account to be feared. No better can be said of any estate, where the multitude haue the Helme of government in their hands: Thus far are the words of Polybius.

Now, where the people were so disagreeing both in will and reason, they could do no lesse, but shape themselves into a Monarchy, and to make choise of one head, who should take on him to gouerne such vnruely mindes. Therefore, by the consent of all, but most especially the popularity: Solon, for his integrity of life, and because he had neuer yeilded to any thing against the people, was called to this gouernment. But, it appearing to be a businesse full of perrill, the issue very doubtfull, hee being likewise a Man of great integrity, and admirable Wisedome; made refusal of their offer, with these wordes: If I haue spared mine owne Countrey, and receiued therein no tyranny, nor implacable violence, that could deface the glory thereof, or bring shame to my selfe: I feare the lesse, in that by these meanes I haue exceeded other men; especially in conquering my selfe: Thus auoucheth Plutarch of him. But he beeing condemned by many others, who sought for that Dignity by fauours, gifts, and earnest entreaties, yet wholly by him so lightly neglected, had diuers Verfes of scandall and disgrace framed against him, which more at large you may read in Plutarch.

Now, albeit he thus refused to bee a Sole-Monarch, yet was he not backward, in lending help to this disparing Common-wealth, by such medicinable Art as might be best auailing thereto; namely, Wisedome and Counsell. First of all hee bethought himselfe, how to succour such as were oppressed by the might of great men; wherupon he made a law, whereby any debt was frustrated, that any poor man ought to a rich man: but he should submit his body to his seruice and command, and yet (not in way of vsury) to abridge him any iot of his liberty. Many imagined, that such kind of proceeding would ouerthrow all manner of debts; and therefore, they who began to execute this Lawe before open publication thereof, were called Crecopidi; that is, Cutters off of other Mens debts, which was done in a kind of gratification to them, in whom the desire of such a law was most affected. Others were of opinion, that men of base condition, might free themselves from their Debtors after this manner, thereby to increase the price and value of Money: because that which formerly was worth seauenty Drammaes, was afterward esteemed at an hundred Drammaes, and according to the auncient valuation so passed. But both the one and the other were thought scarce tollerable, or the one without the other, because such cutting off of Debtors, grew as displeasing to Creditors, as it was pleasing & coueted by the poorer sort: wherupon it was supposed, that this would not proue the way to quench the flame already begun, but rather much more to encrease it. For the enhaunsing of the Drachmaes added to the former sum, was exempted from the poore mans power in paiement; wherby was imagined, that at one and the same time, it would commaund both the one and other; to wit, that it would increase to the Rich mans aduantage, that which by Law he could neuer haue recouered from the poore man. But because euery Law-maker, in giuing other men example, ought to begin with himselfe, deriuing the originall from his own possessions: Solon sent in six talents of Gold to the people, which valued as much to them, as forty five thousand Ducates do among vs.

In time, while things stood vpon alteration, the Law made, did yet hardlie please: because Rich men supposed themselves to be euill intreated, & poor men expected, according to the vsage of the Laconians, the benefite of the Atticke fields. Neuertheless, in proesse of time, the peace being well considered, that such a Law might produce; it was so generally approued and ratified, that they gaue it the name of Sisachthia among the sacred occasions. Things proceeding thus on by little and little, this proued sound Phisick to the former vnhealthfull body, and because it might fall no more into the like calamity, euery member was duely made vse of according to his Dignity. Then he ordained, that the peoples censure should be allowed of, to the end that each man, according to his faculty, might haue Honour and Dignity in the Common-wealth, making no difference betweene Plebeians or Commoners, and Gentlemen. Neuertheless, especiall regard was had, that such Noblemen, as at that time were seated in Magistracy; should not any way bee compelled to leaue their places, without their owne free consent. Wherupon, by this temperate kind of course, great men were the more easily enclined, to consort with them of meaner quality, & so much the rather; because, before it was held vnlawfull, for any Commoner to yndergo any office, or to be a Magistrate.

Of Tribes & other divisions of the people.

The people were then ordered into four divisions, with invention also of such tributes as were to be paid; to wit, Pentacosmedimni, Ippi, Zephrita, and Thita. The valuation of the first degree, was allotted to be five hundred measures of Corne. This was the first rate, and these were the first degree of Men in the Countrey, next vnto the degree of Senators. Gentlemen were wont to be elected in the Eseto Oligachia, a place so named, before Solon ordained the Ariopagiticall Senate. The charge of the Pentacosmedimni, was, when any necessity happened, or neede required to conferre matters for vse of the Common-weale. After this ordination, quickly ensued in the same, the second, of three hundred measures of Corne valuation, who were called Ippi, because to them belonged the breeding of Horses, which by their faculty they maintained; and in time of Warre, they were bound to pay so much as should sustain a Man and a Horse for a whole year. Next to them were the Zephrita, who were rated at an hundred and fifty measures of Corne, called halfe a Mina. Aristotle makes no mention of these men in his institutions of Solon, yet writes of them in the Books of his Politicks. Goldsmiths, Dyers, and other such like Artizanes, were comprehended vnder the Thita, who paid no more but a Crown to the Common-wealth, which (after their name) was tearmed Thitico: These men could neuer rise to any Magistracy, while they stood at so low a rate, and in so base a degree. In this manner did Solon appoint his Lawes, making a sound and settled estate, of that which before was extreame weake and sickly. And because the approbation of Lawes implied the greatest power, being imposed both on the Noble men and Commonalty; for sounder stability, they were engrauen in Tables, with the division of the Atticke fieldes; which being publicly knowne, and vniuersally allowed; they sacred his Lawes to immortality, without any sinister rumour or contradiction.

2 The people being thus reduced to peace, I think it requisite to begin from the first Originall, discoursing (by the way) of the Tribes. All people, all Nations & Cities (as Liuy saith) used to deriue their original from rare and excellent men, or else from such, whom rude Antiquity in the Worlds first infancy, placed among the number of the Gods, imposing names on them after their manner. Hereupon, many ascribed their beginning and protection to Ioue, Mars, Mercury, Pallas, Vulcane, & such like Patrones, for the greater supposition of vertue, yet grounded but on their owne bare opinion. By which example, the Athenians not contented with one Sole Nobility; to wit, that of Pallas, gaue diuers names to variant partitions of their people, whom they tearmed Tribes, after the name of the Eponomi, who were worthy Heroes, and whose Memory could not dye, because their statues were preserved, not so much for their vertue, but for others to imitate them, helping themselues (in that manner) to become the more worthy. There were four Tribes of the first kind; one was named Cecropida, of old Cecrops, because, if we may credit Pausanias, there were two severall Men of that Name. The second Tribe of that Nature, was called Astochton, that is; Indigena, the peculiar vocable to those people. The third were stiled Attican; And the fourth Paralia, taking name of their neer neighbouring to the Sea, which more aunciently was tearmed Cronao, and devided into four sundry parts. One Cronao was so called of it selfe; the second Attida; the third Diacrita; and the fourth Nezogena. Attida, so called of the people; The Diacri, of a high place in the City, because the Athenians liued in little hills, and the Mesogenij, of the middle Region, were so named. Now, the Mother of Erietheus, to hide her Adulterie, told him, he was the son of Ioue, which dissembling, for addition of greater grace to the father; taking away the old Titles, four other names (deriued from the Gods) were imposed vpon Athens. It was cald Diada, after the name of Ioue; Atineada, after the name of Minerva; Festiada, of Vulcane; and lastly Possidonia, of Neptune: each of them being devided into three partitions, and therefore tearmed by the Tribes of three; not so named of freedome by gift; compleated their full number to twelve. These 12. parts in threes thus devided, continued vntill the time of Alcmeon, sixe hundred and sixty yeares, or little lesse.

The Athenians gaue diuersity of names to their people.

The tentribes of the Princes, and how they tooke their names.

Afterward, by answer from the Oracle of Apollo, the tenne Tribes of the Princes were named, that before him should raigne in greatest fame. It was called Cecropia, of Cecrops; Ericthea, of Erictheus; Aegaea, of Aegaeus, Pandionia, Acamantia, Leontia, Aenea, Hippotoonta, Antioca, Eanta; whereunto were added Antigonia, and Demetria, to make vppe the iust number of twelue: all which (euery one by it selfe) like vnto the first foure, were deuided likewise into three partitions, and so made vp the number of thirty fixe Tribes, which the Romaines followed in imitation, wanting but one: whereby may be obserued, that not onely they vsed the example of their Lawes, but likewise the deuisions of the Athenian people. These thinges, as they were matters of very great and maine importance in in the Athenian Common-weale: so shall wee haue the more liberty to discourse of them, in our further progression.

The Romaines did imitate the Athenians, both in lawes and diuision of their people.

How the Eponimi first receiued name.

Of these Princes then, of whom the Tribes receiued their Originall Names, were likewise the twelue Eponimi first named, whom I knowe not, whether Herodotus (in his Erato) doe call the Gods of the Athenians, or no, because the selfe-same Authour, hauing there delcribed some of their Names, saith afterward in his Euterpe, that in Aegypt was the first honoring of twelue Gods, and that from thence they were brought into Greece, and that in Pisa they had an Altar, common to all of them, which was called the Altar of the twelue Gods.

Obseruatiions collected out of Herodotus in his Erato and Euterpe.

Moreouer, he saith afterward, that these Kinges were also called Gods, so many of them as had gouerned iustly: beyond which report, the Historie yeildeth no further credence, neyther doth Aristotle record any such matter in his Politiques. Whereby may partlie be gathered, that those Kinges might also bee tearmed Gods, and that they were foure and twenty in number; to wit, twelue brought out of Aegypt, and the other twelue ruling in Athens. Pausanias, in the place which hee speaketh of the Eponimi; saith, that Herodotus might well speake it. Yet notwithstanding, there is diuersitie betweene them of their Names, and he reckoneth neyther more or lesse then twelue, whereto consenteth Attalus, Ptolomeus, & Adrianus, in whose time he wrote. But else where shall wee speake of the Magistrate, named Eponimo. The people being made knowne, and their partitions declared; it is high time that we should say some-what of their Magistrates.

3 In three seuerall kindes did they vse to elect their Magistrates; to wit, by lot; by publique voyce of the people; and by election of Dignity. By Lot, they elected all the Magistrates that were intended for Iudgement. The Senate, who were elected in the like manner, were called, The Councell of five hundred Men. By publique voyce of the people, they created Captaines, Tribunes of the Souldiers, and the Generals for Warre, both by Sea and Land.

After what manner the Athenians elected their Magistrates. By Lot.

Such as were afterward made choise of by Dignity, by Riches, and by Nobility; were called Choragi, and serued in the publique Pastimes, as also for Sacrifices: in which weighty charge much liberality was vsed, and great expences of their owne Wealth. Of this order there were no more but tenne. Among, & by al which elections, as Demosthenes declareth in one of his Orations, the Common-weale was sweetly embraced by this three-folde Ligature. Because the Iudges (by sound reasons) defended the Citty from the iniuries of Domestickes, Neighbours, and Strangers: The Souldiers preferred and enlarged the Confines; And Religion kept the Soules of Men pure and vnpolluted. Now giue me leaue orderly to relate, how, during the offering of this Dignity, the order began of the Ariopagite.

4 In memory of Learning, the Senate Ariopagiticall had beginning, and both for equity and seuerity was accounted most honourable and famous. Now, as it was in great estimation, so was the number of them not a few; albeit, vncertaine how many, which incertainty of number ensued by the Tesmoteti (of whom we shall speake in their apt place) because, as they had ended their Magistracy, which lasted for a yeare: in rendring vp their account to the Logists for their passed Office, some of some of them were entertained and accepted among the Ariopagite. Such as were to go to the Logists, who were Magistrates for publique and generall accounts, should deliuer their Names to a Commaunder, and require open Proclamation in this manner; Whosoeuer can accuse such men of any vniust Act committed, let him come foorth, for they haue ended their Office of Magistracy. Vpon this Proclamation, enery Accuser that could make iust proofoe of offence, had his free admission; and this made much for the Logists credit. Now, by this kinde of iudgement so seuerely followed, it fell out, that few men, but of worth and reckoning, and supported by theit owne honest innocency, holpe to encrease the number of this Order. And whosoeuer was noted to be auaritious, or guilty of some other such infamous crime; could neuer gaine acceptance into this inuolable company. And because no man should vse any deceit or fraud, each man examined one anothers conscience, in open sight of the people, and of the Senate. Thus by the yearely addition of many of the Tesmoteti, the number grew to be vncertaine, and manifested apparantly, that the latter choise in this kinde of life, did much excell the former.

The like institution was inuented by Solon, because (in former times) Solon had appointed fifty Epheti; that is, Prefects or Gouvernours, who gaue sentence in Capitall causes, and on Robbers, which (before that time) apparained only to the Kings office. In their name then did Solon constitute the Senate of great authority in this Common wealth, who not onely answered in capitall occasions, but likewise in the very grauest busineses of State. The chiefe Magistrate of the Ariopagite, was by the Grecians named Adiadoxon; that is, perpetuall and diligent. Now, albeit, he was opposed to all scelerous matters, and publikely did punish them: yet notwithstanding, his peculiar businesse, was concerning impoysonings, burning of Houses, Murders, wounds, Cozonages, Treacheries intended against the Countrey, and many other. The manner of Iudgement then vsed, (according as by memory of good Letters is to be seene) was thus. The guilty person, or he that was accused to be guilty; after the first questioning, being confronted by coniecturall testimony, and of probation; immediatly sentence should bee giuen, without deferring it to any longer time, for compassion (in the Ariopagite) was reputed to be vtterly vnlawfull, and so neerely did the Epheti ioyne in this seuerity, as they would punish the offendour, with punishment equall to his transgression. Aristotle very highly commendeth this seuerity, in the beginning of his Rhetoricke, which praiſe Quintillian breefely Collecting together, saith. In Athens (meaning the Ariopagite) the Oratours were prohibited, from moouing their Auditors to any passion. For the Senators did apparantly perceine, that there was no matter whatsoeuer, but Oratours (by their Rhetoricke) would reduce the Hearers to their owne opinion therein. Let vs now proceede to the execution of their iudgement.

The Offendour being in Prison (let vs suppose the case to be Homicide, or Murder) by commaund: the Parents, Seruants, Friends, and neereſt acquaintance of the dead person, are summoned together, and as (in their Iudgement) the penalty is imposed, so dooth the punishment proceed, according to the iniury receiued: which Custome, because it is vsed and obserued to this day among the Turkes, wee therefore may make more ample demonstration thereof.

The Cadi (for so signifieth the name of a Iudge in the Arabian Tongue) so soone as an offendour in Murder is taken, presently aduertiseth the dead parties Parents thereof. If he haue none, then others are sought for, to whom the deceased was most beholding in his life time. If that none at all be found, yet will hee proceede as Atturney to the King, and punnish according to the written Law. He then entreateth, that such men as are there present, will declare, whether they will haue the Offendour punnishd by the Law, or payment of Money, and according to their desire, so shall be his sentence. If the man dead were thought to be worth threescore thousand Aspers, which (after our account) are a thousand and two hundred ducates of Gold: with that price shall the dead mans losse of life be paid. If he pay halfe, then he payes but for halfe a Man; and halfe a Man, is hee that lackes a hand, an eye, or some such member of his body, and so the payment is obserued, according to the dammage done to the body. If the party offended be dumbe, a fatherlesse Child, or imperfect in speech; the Podesta or Iustice hath power, to iudge the penaltie according to the condition, and answerably to punish the offender with Death, or pecuniary payment. Thus, as the Ariopagite vsed great diligence and seuerity in their Iudgements; so were they rarely or sildome troubled with such inflictions, and they gaue Iudgement onely but three dayes in a Month, and assembled not together, except they were thereto required, or vpon necessity of some important businesse. Which is very like vnto the Conncell of Venice, who, for election of Magistrates, do meete once together euery eight daies.

They gaue their sentence in the night time.

The silent Ariopagite.

The Venetians like to the Athenians.

Of this Senate, and of many other, Gulielmus Budens hath very amply written, in his Annotations and first Pandect, and therefore I referre these matters to those Authours, from whom hee hath collected them. And yet, (vppon Lucians Word) he saith; That the Ariopagite were wont to deliuer their Iudgement in the Night time, and in greatest silence, because they would not be surprized by the cunning of them, who (in the presence of Man) had most delight to talke: For so might their Iudgements bee interrupted, while others listened to the curiosity of Oratours eloquence. And hence grew that which is vsed as a common Prouerbe; The silent Ariopagite; signifying thereby, that a Wise Man should likewise be silent. Nor was their silence without great reason, because thereby they did the more attentiuely listen to Offendours causes: And neuer would they disclose the secrets of iudgement, but write downe the sentence, because they would not swarue from their opinion, who had beene of greatest wisdome and years, but euery way to correspond with the same. The Venetians are (in this case) like to the Athenians; to wit, that their sentence must neuer see light, or the secrets of their Iudgements, which doubtlesse is done with great discretion. For by this means neuer can their authority be impaired, while their opinion stands cleare from calumny, and not to bee wrested by other Magistrates, or rude capacity of the vulgar.

Next vnto the Gracians, it would be seene what the Latines haue written of the Ariopogite. Valerius Maximus writing of them, saith thus. In the selfe-same Citty was the most sacred Ariopago Councell, who vsed to haue care of that which euery Athenian did, and vwith what recompences they ought to bee rewarded: That Men should liue honestly, and be duely remembered, that they were to yeelde an account of their behauiour. The same Senate ordained, that euery good Cittizens head should be adorned with a Crowne, and kept it as a continuall custome, because honour was the onely nutriment of vertue. These thinges beeing found in autenticall Writings, it may be credited, that such as could not iudge well of those times; did suffer their Wittes to wander else-where at randome. But as it appeared then, so standes it cleare still from all contradiction; that they were extraordinarily iudicious, and meerey Diuine. For Cicero, a Man of singular iudgement, would needes compare this Senate rather to GOD, Governour of the whole World, then to the Romaine Senate. For (saith he) To deny that this World is gouerned without prouidence, is as if a Man should say, that the Athenians were to be gouerned without the Councell of the Ariopagite.

Concerning that which Pliny saith, in the seauenth Booke of his Naturall History; to wit, That the first cases of Capitall Iudgements, came from Ariopago; (eyther a Man so named, or the reason whereof the Sect tooke Name) therein I can perceiue very small likelihood: because it appeareth by al the Greek Authours, that Solon was the Man that ordained such a Magistracy, and vsed some moderation (as is said) which the Ephetti formerly obserued not.

But it is very manifest, that Draco was before Solon, and ordayed such seuerer Lawes against Captiues & Bondslaves, that, for the smallest matter of Theft, Draco was before Solon, and wrote his lawes not in Inke, but in blood.

Theft, each man was punished Capitally, whereon grew a vulgar and common saying; That Draco wrote not his Lawes with Inke, but with blood of men. But, if any one shall alledge, that by this Ariopago, Pliny would seem to mean Athens, or that people, it cannot be graced with the least glimpse of truth; because before the Grecian Empire, the state of the Persians, Affyrians, Egyptians, yea, & the Sorians, were ruined, who, without imposing penalties vpon Captiues; could not haue stode so long time, whereby it may appeare, that Plinie (in this point) speaketh not truely; which needs no wonderment, in regarde that himselfe being a Senatour, and much busied in the Negotiations of the Common-weale, very hardly could hee win time, to set downe the realty of his own Collections. Concerning the authority of this Senate, euery thing is perfected by very sufficient Authors: yet one Oration of Demosthenes against Aristocratia, doeth speake thereof in amplest manner, and thereto I referre the more curious Reader.

5 The Name of Nomoteto, or Nomotheta, comprehended many generations or kinds of Dignity, wherof I purpose to make some little Narration, before I proceed any further. I find (according to Suidas) that there were three Nomoteti among the Athenians; namely, Eraco, Solon, and Aeschylus, not the Famous Poet, but another born in Athens, and not made famous by any Authour. Moreouer, Nomoteto, or Nomotheta, signifieth a Law-Maker in any kinde whatsoever. And because the vocable or word, is answerable to the effect, the Athenians vnderstoode by Nomoteto, a thousand Cittizens congregated in a knot (as it were) together, who had absolute power, to cause the Lawes to be obserued, to ouer-see, change, and reforme them. These Nomoteti had authority to relate & discourse with the people, whether the lawes appointed, were pleasing to them, or no; and all questions were of no validity, if they were not first vnder-scribed by al the Magistrates of the Nomoteti. They vsed also to bee continually present, when Iudgement was giuen in grauest occasions: and if the actour or guilty person were not obedient to their sentence; hee had a pecuniary punishment imposed presently on him. This is all the opinion of Pollucius. But Budeus, seconded by Demosthenes, sheweth another matter, speaking much more largely in this case, and in what manner those Lawes were woont to be propounded; and therefore, wee will deliuer his owne words. Demosthenes makes mention, that Solon (among other things) thus ordained; That when any Law was to be proposed to the people, it should first bee rehearsed by the Law-maker himselfe. Afterward, it should be written in some notable place of the Citty, where greatest concourse and frequentation was daily. Then, a publicke Notary must read it in open Parliament, to the end, that if any thing were then distasted, it might by them bee amended: but if it were liked, it was then deliuered to the Nomoteti, who lastly should approue it; which beeing done, then it was appointed to be obserued. Thus saith Budeus, whose opinion, albeit it is most aparant, yet is it confirmed by the wordes of Macrobius, with this addition. Rutilius (saith he) writeth, That the Romans erected a Market place, wherein the Countrey people, for eight dayes together, might dispatch their affairs. But the ninth day, forsaking al other businesse, they should come to Rome, and there, in the Market place likewise, they must listen to the Lawes, because there they should be declared in the presence of all the people.

6 The Nomoteti, were much different from the Nomophilaci, who had that name of keeping the Books of the lawes, because, in vaine hadde the Nomoteti approued the Lawes; if they should not be put in practise, obserued, and iudged accordingly, which was the especiall charge of these Nomophilaci. Cicero doth elegantly expresse their Office, in the 3. Booke of Lawes. The Grecians (saith he) verie diligently, so soone as they had created the Nomophilaci, not only obserued learning, but the actions of men likewise, and registred them among their Lawes. In a second degree of Dignity, were these Nomophilaci, who vsed to wear on their heads a Linnen white Coife, after such manner, as the Dukes of Venice nowe a dayes do. Such honour did Antiquitie giue to the Commonweale, & so much did men then studie to preserue Good Lawes, because it is all one to haue no Lawes; as (hauing many) not to liue there-thereafter. The Ariopagite (at all times) were carefull for the making of Lawes, and likewise to haue them kept, which was a charge of great sanctity. Not any matter whatsoever, would admit one Office to intermeddle with another, except extreame vrgency so required. Because, one side heard the causes capitall in Offenders of the meaner sort; others afterward approved the sentence; others dealt in fiscall or penall occasions, and such like businesse. Neuertheless, all these partitions consisted of one & the same Senate, and were all members but of one body.

Our ancient predecessors, neither by long vse could grow so expert, or attain to such perfection, as to vnderstand (in what manner) one Magistrate must be proposed to diuersity of occurrences; but chose severall degrees of Officers, which now adaiies, one Senat is sufficient for alone. The criminall* Quarantia, or Quarantana, governing in Venice, is not much vnlike to that before reherfed, because they iudge of capitall delicts. But heere is the difference, that if any thing bee committed against the Commonwealth, against the Duke, against Religion or Nature (such as is the most abominable sinne of Sodomy) immediately that order of Magistracy, called, * Il Capode dieci, do giue a decree for due punishment.

Among the Turkes, two men are elected by the Iudges, and sent for the government of diuers Prouinces. These two are chosen from many other Learned, Discreet, and wisemen, and are named Cadi-lescher; to whom the Iudges are inforced to yeild a reason of their carriage in Iustice; and hauing misbehaued themselves, they are compelled to stand to their iudgement and sentence. If they Appeale, the Apealants are referred to the great Court, which they call Diuano. But when reason in the case so requires, both the one and other Senat shal iudge therof, one of four Bashaes being there as President, and the chiefeft men in authority also there present. This order of office, is answerable to that which (among the French) is onely done by the Chancellor, who may truly be tearmed the Lawes auenger. Because he compelleth all other Iudges to obserue the lawes, & iudge accordingly: but if they do the contrary, he either makes the feel the Lawes penalty, or speakes with the great Counsell of Fraunce, who giueth them such reward, as is fitting for scelerous offenders, against the Magistrate.

7. After the Ariopagite, in dignitie, name and fame, a Counsel was elected of 500. men: of whome, such memorie liueth among the Grecians, that there was no Oration, or any cause whatsoever; but it caried a full tast of their commendation. This Counsell had power, to giue iudgement in Ciuill causes, and all actions that daily hapned betweene man and man. They were many times Lieutenants to the Ariopagite, and their number was the cause, that hardly any vices could be suffered. Now, in regard that so great a multitude of men, being assembled together all in one place, could yeild but slender execution of the charge committed to them: they deuided themselves into ten partitions, according to the number of the Tribes. Each severall number of fifty, had their dayes appointed for Iudgement and sitting, and had three and thirty daies assigned them; in which time, they were to dispatch their Office. This number of dayes ten times repeated, makes (according to the Athenians account) the Lunary yeare of three hundred and fifty dayes: But, by the reckoning of our Sunnes course, it exceedeth theirs more then fiteene dayes, and one Quadrant. Moreouer, by the ouer-abounding multitude of these fifties, election was made of ten, who were called Presidents, out of the which tenne, they chose seauen Weekly, and enery day, each man was a President, for expedition of needfull occasions; and enery Night he carried the Keyes of the Cittadell, to him that had been the day before President: but heereof we shal discourse more at large heereafter.

When this number of five hundred hadde finished their Offices, the Name changed, and then they were called Pritani, who, as many dooth affirme, had care of all kind of Corne; to receiue the Monies brought into the Exchequer; and to receiue pawnes or pledges of such as voluntarily offered them, beside other affaires of the like Nature. These Pritani, with the Monies gathred in deposito from the litigious; paid the Iudges and and the best deseruers in the Common-wealth. If they were called so by place, then were they to render a reason therefore; and such, of whome the State deserued well, they were both honoured and maintained beside. Cicero is witnes heereof, in the first of his Oratour, and that this was great honor to the Commonweale; where speaking of Socrates, these are his wordes; He was in Athens condemned for guilty, whose deceit or fraud appeared not to be capitall. The sentence coming to be giuen, the Iudge would demaund of the offender, what punishment he imagined that his bad behauiour had deserued, as hoping to haue the crime confessed from his owne mouth. Heereupon, Socrates being asked what hee thought him to deserue, answered; That he deserued to be honoured and rewarded with ample gifts; moreouer, to haue a publicke liuing giuen him among the Pritany, which honor (among the Grecians) was verie great: Thus speaketh Cicero.

These Officers vsed to examin Edicts, Decrees, and Lawes, and giue sentence in cases vnderstoode to the contrarie. Otherwise, without this care and prouidence, the people would easily haue bin drawne into suddaine reuolts, in regard that they oftentimes desired, yea, and approued such thinges as returned to their owne ruine, if the foresight of others, and especially of this Counsell, had not preuented them. First of all, by frequency of their office, they propounded all Edicts, which (as readily) were deliuered to the fifty men, in asmuch as a man should say; That whatsoeuer had bin by them approued, was in order to passe from them to the Nomophilaci, & they should cause them not onely to be published, but also to be obserued. Moreouer, that man was very precisely noted; who (for peculiar pleasing of the people) had procured anie Lawe to stand in force, and not first brought it to the place where it ought to be amended.

This order of this Ciuill Magistracie, was subiect to yearely change, and their especial charge, was, to curb the proud minded, and to haue care of the times of Warre, Peace, Truce, Entertainment of Ambassadors, and publication of Edicts. Their forme of writing was in this maner, according as the Romaine Consulles obserued: Policies the Prince, sitting Iudge of the Commonwealth; of the Pandion Tribe. Demosthenis Peato-neus made the Decree; and the man thus named, was an Archonta, of whose Authority we shall speak in his meet place, as also of the Tribe heere named of these fifty men, who were deriued out of the five hundred Gouvernours of the Common-wealth. The Grecians made their account, according to the Olimpiades; the Musulmans, after Mahomet; we, from Christ; the Iewes, from the beginning of the World; and euery Nation beginneth with his originall.

8 Because euery day the number of Ciuill causes encreased, and the fifty men were not able to vndergo so great a burthen, therefore they elected (for their owne best helpe) foure and fortie Arbitrators, some by lot, and others by free election. These men, must haue past sixty yeares of age, and no way to be noted of any ignoble action, but reckoned of good and honest behauiour. They were constituted in a place, where the greater number of them might bee alway present, or readily called together, when contentions so required. And this was the manner of their Government. The Plaintiffe and Offender should make choise of these men, so many as him pleased: conditionally, that vpon their debating of the quarrel they were to finish it, or they to be punished, that wer disobedient to their sentence. Thus the party had double redresse, because, heere each cause was iudicially heard; whereas otherwile, the Apealant, going to the Ciuill Iudge, might haue had some delaying helpe in this cause. Such as were elected by Lot, were not so highly accounted of; not in regarde of their examinations, as because they might referre al matters to the Senates iudgements. The terme giuen to these men among the Ciuillians, was not so much Arbitrators, as Compromisers or Vmpiers in businessles. Only by such Monies as were to be laid down by the party, and adjudged to be paid, if he lost his cause. The Grecians in stead of Lots of Gold and Siluer, made vse of Beanes White and Blacke.

The Zitteti, who were as Inquisitors, did not much differ from the Dieteti, whose Office (according to Iulius Pollucius) caus) was, to search into the cause of matters, when they did not appear to be plaine and manifest, and then they referred the truth of them to the Senate. In which kind of Office, amongst the French, they do daily make Election of Commissaries: And (in scelerous causes) they are appointed by the Judges, be the matters Ciuill, or other Criminal. These Arbitrators wer made choise of as fit men for the place, if they hadde not committed any act of indignity, or had bin grieuously punished, or suffred shame in the company of others. All religious or holy matters, wer handled among them with great reuerence and sanctity. Pollucius writeth, that they could not heare any cause, whose worth exceeded the value of ten Drammaes. When any case was transferred from them to some other Iudge; they wrote their mind in a little Table, with what Constitution had first by them bin Decreed, as well for the Plaintiffe as the Offender: and at the beginning of his suite, they receiued a Drama of the Plaintiffe, which serued towards payment of other inferiour causes in that Court.

Captaines of the Gallies, who were called Trierarchi.

Order obserued among the Venetians

9 Let vs now speake of the Captaines of the Gallies, who were known by the name of Trierarchi, not that I attribute any great Fame to their dignity; but because the Athenians (in their Nauall affaires) did oftentimes repose especiall trust in them. Their iust number is not agreed on by any Authors, because according as necessity required, so their number increased or diminished. Only thus much is certainly known, that commonly twelue men had the main charge imposed on them; who, in the time of peace, had the government of the Arsenale, where the Ships and Gallies were kept in store and reparation. In time of warre, they were obedient to these Captaines, with other Prefects or Commanders: as the Venetians doe yet obserue to this day; for they create one Generall of absolute power, in Nature of a Tribunes Authority, which holdeth only in those places where hee conducteth the Army, but in the City he hath no rule at all. These Tribunes likewise were put in trust, to make new Shippes and Gallies; when the old were past vse, as also to gouerne them in their proper faculties and expences, by account yeilded vp to the State; whereof the cheefest Senatours had the care, who euer more did foresee, whether the Commonwealth did suffer losse or no, by charge of the Army, when other prouision could not elsewhere be made. Now to speake vprightly, this little belonged to the publicke Magistrate, and therefore was referred to a certaine number of Citizens; which custom (to this day) is obserued among the Venetians, necessity so requiring, because they pay by the Artezans. Not that themselues doo pay any thing, but that one or two trades, do pay the charges of one Gally, by which meanes they gather good store of Gold.

This kind of Office, waxing by little and little to decay, by the means of Demosthenes, grew to strength againe, hauing imposed a Law vpon such, as were to be elected to this charge, as is to be seene in diuers places; & among others, in an Oration of his, against Aeschines. Behold you men of Athens (saith he) what benefit I haue brought to the administration of your Commonwealth, when I perceyued your Nauall affayres to grow weake, & your Cittizens (exempted from paying Tribute) hauing paid but little mony, and such as had the meanest faculties to be (in a manner) oppressed with the burthen; and thereby your State pittifully to decline. Then made I a Law, that Cittizens should pay according to a due taxation, such as (in reason) was iudged conuenient, and so deliuered poore men from those iniuries, which they had indured by former oppression. And a little after, he speaketh more plainly. By the first Constitution of the 16. Law, they used to pay together the charges of one Gally, burding thereby, very litle (or nothing at all) such as were rich and able, but much oppressing poore Cittizens. But it is ordained by my Lawe, that the quality of euery person is to be reckoned: Whereby it appeared, that such as paid the tenth part for the expences of one Gally, might wholly satisfie the full charges of two. Whereupon ensued, that they would no longer be termed Trierarchi, but Contributors. The Oration of this our Author, is euen all one with that in the Androtione, where all this action is at large declared. Nor is there any diuersity at all in that which formerly hath bin related, except that the Pritani were woont to receiue to receiue a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vpright behaiour in the nauall businesse, which else by beeing ouer-much neglected, albeit euery such person were very diligent in all other Offices, yet this might haue bin despised, and quite ouerthrowne. The Latines called them Trierarchi, according to the Greeke word, as Cicero in his third action agaiust Verres, deliuereth Testimony thereof, in this manner; Of which matter thou heardst in the first action, Charidenius Chio witnesse, hee being then Trierarchus, and Verres departing from Asia, &c.

10. We read in Pollucius, that there were cleauen men called Nomophilaci, and Hiparchi, to wit; Presidents. Tenne men (saith he) were seuerally elected by one at a time, out of each Tribe, which number was encreased by the Chancellour, who made the cleauenth man. Their Office was, to conuince such Theeues as remained in prisons, and other malefactors beside. If they could not winne the truth out of them, they sent them to other Tribunnalles, where they were gladd to confesse their offences, and had their punishments accordingly appointed. Whereon they were tearmed Iudges of punishment, as at this day in France the Prouost Marshallles are called, who somewhat do resemble those men, that amongst the Turkes are named Vainoda. They can apprehend all manner of bad persons, and deliuer them into the hands of their nearest Iudges; but may impose no punishment vpon them. Such were the Wardens or Captaines of the Night, thoroughout all Gallia, and in the Venetian Prouinces, and (as I haue heard) among al their people. The place where the eleuen sat in iudgment, was called Nomophilacion, which place had a Doore behind it, tearmed Xaronion, out of which Doore, offenders were led vnto their punishment: euen as in the Field the Decumana Gate was vsed, whereby they sent forth seditious Soldiours and captiues to be corrected and chastised.

Demosthenes, maketh mention of them, saying; A man beeing fledde after a breach of prison, hee would goe vnto a certaine Woman, called Zobia, where formerly hee hadde beene allowed Entertainment, who hyding him, would tarry the first day, when the neereſt person ſhould come to ſerch for him, and make it openly knowne by Proclamation, that hee ſought for a guiltie Offendour. By this may be diſcerned, that the Delict being ſodainely committed, they vsed to make as ſodaine enquire after the Malefactor to apprehend and take him.

10 Heereuppon, Suidas doth take good note of these Nomophilaci, to bee verie much different from the first of that name; because they compelled the Iudges to liue according to the Written Lawes; and these did but binde, as it were, the common people thereunto. We will alledge one place more of Demosthenes in Timocrates. If any man (saith hee) were convicted of iniuring his Father, Mother, or for not hauing ended his charge in warre; or for abyding in any place, prohibited by the laws: the eleuen men hauing caused him to be apprehended, bound him, and committed him to Elieia (being the name of a place whereof we are to speake no more) where he was to be accused by whomeſoeuer would, according to the Law.

11. Albeit these Presidents might well be ranked among the five hundred men; out of which number, they were vsually chosen: yet notwithstanding, because I haue followed the more part of their Magistrates, and they being all very honourable, I am the willinger to make perticular mention of them. Out of five hundred men, who were diuided into ten Tribes, fifty men were elected, and out of those fifty, ten men also chosen, among whom perticularly consisted the absolute summity of the Commonweal. But haply some man may demand of me, after what maner he was to be elected, whose Vertues made him most cleare and commendable. I answer, that it was very easily done, as may bee discerned by the Venetians, who do first of all Constitute the Electours, as by lot they are called; and afterward, they put the names of them called, into an Vrne, and then take them foorth by publicke suffrages. When the Election is thus made, ten men are then chosen forth of the residue, by Lot, with silent suffrage, and with Beanes. These matters beeing carried in publique appaunce, no man receyue the reward of Vertue, till Iudgement dooth passe of him accordingly. Now, out of these tenne men men thus made choise of, seauen only may attaine to the Office of Presidents: and so is the lot cast among these tenne men, with such vpright and due obseruation, that the three remainants, can finde themselues no way offended. And because hee that sitteth in the cheefest place of Magistracy, was vsually called Prefect and President; al the rest did participate in honor of the same title. They were carefully and especially aduertised, that it was not lawfull for any man, to be twice in this Office, in one & the same yeare. When he sat in his seate of Magistracy, hee had by him the Keyes of the Castle, of the Exchequer, and Counsell of the Common-weale. At what time soeuer the Pritani called the Senate, they elected out of nine Tribes nine Presidents: but out of that Tribe called Pritanensa, whereof hee becing then the chiefe, they vsed not to cal any other.

Among these nine, they had power to choose the next chiefe successour, to whom the trust of publick benefit shold bee committed. In his hearing causes, there was diligent care hadde, that nothing should be left behinde, that either might instruct the cause it selfe, or make it more cleare to the Iudge.

Harpocratio speaketh the verie same of the Epistati, producing the saying of Iseus against Elpagoras. There were (saith he) in Athens, two Epistati: One in Lottery, elected by the body of the Pritani, & the other by the Poedri; of whose Office, Aristotle maketh declaration in his Politiks of the Athenians. Now to speak vulgarly, that man was called Epistato, who was authorized & admitted to any Negotiations, as Hiperides hath very well noted. Conuert wee now our speeches from the Epistati, to the Poedri. The man called Poedro, was as head or Duke of the Weale-polliticke. His Dignity was verie sufficient, and the full order thereof being comprehended by Demosthenes, in an Oration of his against Timocrates, I thought good to set downe the wordes of the Law by him induceth, which becometh in this manner. The eleuenth day of the first Moneth, after that the Crier or Proclaimer had made it openly knowne, the people went with suffrages to approoue the Law. The formost part of them that shoulde deliuer their liking, were they who had bin present, when the saide Law had formerly bin allowed by the Counsell, and by the Senate. The second, were such as thought meet to speake against it. These men, according as the Law was balloted, gaue it assignment. And if it hapned, that any tooke exceptions against this Law, which formerly had past approbation; the Pritani, who then were in Office, were the last day of ballottation with the Senate about the matter, and the Poedri also might iudge in the same case. Afterward, they sat downe according to their dignity; first, they that deserud priority for Religion; secondly, they of the Nomoteti. Then they consulted, from whence the Monies should be collected, that was to bee deliuered to the Nomoteti, for their better attendance on the Common-weales affayres. These Nomoteti were of their Order, that wore sworne in Elieia. Then from Elieia, if the Pritani held not the Senat according to the Lawe prescribed, and if the Poedri governed not according to reason and equitie: eath one of the Pritani should be punished in a thousand Drammaes, which they consecrated to the Exchequer of Pallas; & the Poedri should giue foure hundered also to the same Goddesse, and the accuser of the preferred to the Office of the Tesmoti. Then he lookes, if any of the Magistracy are indebted to the publick estate; and the Tesmoteti conuincing them thereof, do forthwith commit them to prison. If they refuse to doe it, they are subiect to open note of infamie, and excluded out of the company of the Ariopagiti, as contemners of the Lawes Gouvernement. Before the Senate assemble together, to render their suffrages, hee that will propound any Law, writes it at the place of the Eponimi, to the end, that according to their number, the people may haue time from the Nomoteti, to make first due examination thereof. And he that desireth to introduce a new Law; not once onely, but euery day hee brings it to the Eponimi, untill such time as the Senate shall be assembled. The Eponimi, from the whole number of the Athenians, doe make election of five men, who haue the charge only to defend and maintain the Lawes. Hitherto wee haue spoken sufficiently of the Lawes. Then followeth the forme of theit Oath, discoursed by the same Author after this manner:

I will deliuer mine opinion, according to the Lawes of the Athenian people, and the five hundred men of the Senate. By any fauour, hour, or helpe in me, Tyrants, or the Governement of a few, shall neuer be admitted in the Common-wealth. Neuer will I take part vvith him, that hath corrupted the people of Athens, or that shall intend it, or practise to compassse it. Neuer will I permit, that any New Tables shall be made, or any diuision of them already in credit; or diuision of the Atticke Fieldes, or of the houses. I will neuer reclaime any banished man, or him that is confined. I will graunt, that hee shall bee expulsed the Cittie, vvho shall denie to vse these Lawes, decreed in the Senat, and confirmed by the people of Athens. I will neuer permit nor suffer, that iniurie shall bee doone vnto any man. I will neuer constitute any Magistrate, to the end, that such a one, vvho hath not rendred an account of his passed Magistracie, may enter vpon some other Magisteriall office, eyther ouer men, or of such as by the Beanes of the Poedri (all vvhich were great dignities) are not lawfully elected. Neither will I permit, that any man (in one and the same yeare) shall be twice chosen Magistrate, or hold two Magisteriall offices in one yeare. I will not receiue any Bribes or rewardes, nor suffer that anie other shall do the same. I am thirtie yeares aged. I will heare the accuser and the accused, vvithout affection, and (vvithout difference of person) will pronouince condemnation, knowing (vvithout excuse) that the partie hath so deserued. I will sweare by Ioue, by Neptune, and by Ceres, vvho shall rinate both me, my Family, and my Children, if I do not iustly obserue all the fore-recited clauses. All this Demosthenes recordeth: Hauing now spoken sufficiently of the ten men, and their Office, let vs say somewhat of the Sufferages of the Comitij Subdiali.

12. Iiaia and Iiasis, were in Athens the greatest Tribunals, as Harpocratio saith, and there the publicke Iudges handled the causes both of the one side and other. They consisted of a thousand, or a thousand five hundred Cittizens, the very best men in all the City. Five hundred vsed to be in one place, a thousand in two iudgement places, and 1500. in three. Iiaseste was the name of the place, & Iiasis was the whole congregation in iudgment. Lysias vsed both these vocables to one signification. The interpretation (in the Oration against Timocrates) is in this manner: Iiaia is the place of the great Senate, and so are the mulitude of Iudges called, that there do yeeld a reason of their Office. Others would haue the place to bee called Dio, that is; beneath the aire, because the Grecians tearmeth the heauens Dion. Pollucius is of the same opinion, and saith, Iiaia was an assembly of five hundred Iudges; two, if a thousand; three, if a thousand five hundred. They vsed two kinds of Ballots in their voices or suffrages, one whol & sound, the other bored and empty. By these, they absoued and condemned, affirmed and gainfayed. They had a vessel like vnto a Tunnel, whereby their suffrage passed thorow two pipes; one of Wood, & the other of Brasse, vvith vvhich they approued and reprooued, according as we shall declare more amply, as time & place requireth. The interpretation heerof, in the Oration against Timocrates, is very diuers, because it is there saide, that insted of stone vessels, they vsed Beanes both white and blacke, for a kind of difference, as if one of the stone-vesselles were empty, and the other full; vvhereupon, this kind of electing Magistrates was tearmed, By the Beane. It is also sayd afterward, that Pythagoras commanded abstinence from Pease and Beanes, not in regard that they were Windie, and all things of like Nature; but rather, to signifye thereby, that hee vvhich will liue quietly, vvithout Ambition, and not bee opposed to the Baffulinges of Fortune, shoulde not trouble himselfe vvith Magistracy, nor seeke after Dignities, vvhich are as slippery, as Beanes are Windy:

13 One of the Tribes, were called Apodecta, that is; Questores, or treasurers, so many as made vp the number of tenne. These Questores were such, as now adayes wee tearme Collectors, or Gatherers of Rents and Customes. The Grecians and the Latines did commonly call them Erastetes, as wee vulgarly entitle our Collectours of Subsidies, or such like. The charge of these Apodecta stretched thus farre. Hauing receyued Letters from the State, (as like Election is made amongst the French, vvhen they will Collect anie sums of Money of the Prouinces, for some important businessse of the kings) they bound such as wer indebted to the Common-weal, that they should make payment according to like part of their faculties. All the while as these monies were receiving, the Antigrapher was still present, to wit; the Comptroller, who (naming the summes) did set all downe in a Journall or Day booke, and at the receipt, wrote downe each mans payment, whereof heereafter we shall speak more at large. The taxations which others (in reason) were to pay, were gathered by the Logists, and what remained behind to the Questores, came afterward to the Logists. The account being cast over, and some remnants remaining as vnpaid by any man; sodaine order was taken, that so soone as hee was able, the remainder should be paid. But, if it so chanced (as oftentimes in like cases it falls out) that any brabbling or strife ensued on these Collections: the quarreller was forthwith brought before the Magistrates, called the nine men, & promising there to pay their iudgement, he should be sworn faithfully to do it. Heer-in stood the difference of the Apodecta, from other Officers, they onely had power to receive, but not to compell any man thereto. This name or Title was much commended, as appeareth in the Booke of Aristotles World. According to these, the Questores of the Exchequer were ordained; the Captaines for the Wars; the Comptrollers for hunting. Then followed, the Receivers of gifts, and such as were like Lombardes, for supply of others necessities. The Latines termed them Susceptores, that is; Receivers. The like Budeus affirmeth, taking it from the Law-makers. But I imagine, that by Receivers, they meant and understood, such as entertained Theeves, and bad persons, who oftentimes were bound to pay (in the Kings name) to the Exchequer, matters of greater moment or sum, then any other beside; and yet no way to helpe or relieue the King, nor the publick benefit, but to moue and increase terrour in the people, vnder the Kings name.

14. The Logists (saith Harpocratio) were ten men, elected out of the Tribes, to whom, all such as had ended their Office of Magistracy (within thirty dayes of their authorities expiration) were to render an account of all such occasions, as they had then administration of in their charge. The Grecians named them Logisti, and Logiziste. Aristotle, in his Politicks of the Athenians, agreeth with the same Author, adding: That they were different from the Eutini, who were to heare other kinds of accountes. The Eutini did sit with the Nine men, or Nine Princes, making seizure of all such benefits, as the Common-Wealth had bin defrauded of, after the finishing of their Magistracy. There were in Athens (saith Pollucius) two Logists; one, that delt in the affayres of the Senate; the other, that was out of the Senate: And yet they both were elected by the Senate, to the end, that they should over-see the whole administration of the Weale-publicke. I am perswaded, that insted of two, Pollucius vnderstood two sortes of Logists; in regard that other Authors haue Written, that there were many of them. And it is not possible, that they should be but two onely, because they were not able to heare so many causes: we may conceiue then, that he, speaking only of two, inferred thereby the two Presidents of that power.

This Office is in Fraunce in great respect, and belongeth to the businesse of the Exchequer; and that whereof wee speake in this place, is in Paris called the Chamber of accounts. Whereuppon, they who hold the chiefest dignitie, are termed Presidents; they of the second degree, are called Auditours; and they of the thirde, are stiled Clarke of the Accounts.

These Logists received the Bookes deliuerd them by the Apodecta, or Questores, which they read in presence of the Auditours, and of the Arithmeticians. They not only kept account of the Monies, but likewise of all other matters, that appertained vnto the Kinges Reuennue, setting all downe (according to the yeares multiplication) in ordinary Bookes, where they might bee soonest found, and Faith made of the payment, to annoyd all strife or dissention, when the Monies publicke came to the receipt, or any other occasion whatsoever. In Venice, there are three men appointed to these accounts: and the Turkes likewise haue such a Magistrate. They haue a Baratemin, Prefect or Governour of the expences, who (with foure other men) doth heare all the businesse belonging to the Treasury. Eschin. in Orat. cont. Demost. & Stesiphon.

The sacred Senate of the Ariopagite.

Logistes Office, as it is set downe in the Oration of Æschines against Demosthenes and Stesiphon:

First of all (saith hee) the Law commanded; that the most sacred senate of the Ariopagite, should be written by the Logists, and that they should not be exempted from yeelding vpppe their accountes vnto them. And there you desire (O Athenians) according to that written by your command, that the Logists should bee Patrones of the venerable senate.

Next, your will and pleasure is, that the five hundred men shall render them an account of their Magistracie: and so distrustfull was the State of them, that hadde not rendered an account of their businesse, that suddainely it must bee done. Nor might any such Offender, depart the Land, vntill the Goodes to him belonging, were subiected to their power. Nymore, none might consecrate any thing whatsoever vnto the Goddess, or bee manumised. In briefe, they might not haue any right or power of their owne faculties, for want of rendering their accountes; but still should stand in further Obligation to the Commonwealth.

But some one may Obiect; He that hath spent nothing for publique good, nor redeemed any man, was hee likewise to render a reason for his defailliance? I answer, no man could bee exempted, from yeelding vpppe an account vnto the Citty, for matters of omission, as well as of commission. A little after he addeth, Thou oughtest (O Demosthenes) to haue suffered the Common Proclaimer or Crier of the Logistes, according to the custome of the Countrey, to call for any that could accuse the partie: Such are the Words of Æschines: vndoubtedly, if this Law were in force among vs, it would reueale the Thefts of Collectors, the fraud of Magistrates, the Deceipts of Rent-Gatherers, the corruption among Iudges, their priuate Faouours, and publicke Oppressions; if admittance might bee graunted of all Testimonies; punnishing first false witnesses with the losse of their heades. How many (thinke you) are by such indirect meanes, euen torne in peeces, spoyled, and meerey robbed of their Goodes, that dare not make anie publique speech thereof; but bite in their Oppression with sorrowfull and greeued hartes, that no such place of Iustice is permitted nor allowed, where they might freely accuse so many mischiefes and iniuries?

15 Those men, whom the Grecians tearmed Antigraphi, the Latines called Custodie. These were next in degree to them, of whom wee haue formerly discoursed, and Wrote downe the reckonings and Diuisions in a Iournall; as Men amongst vs in publicke managements vse to doo, especially in matters of money.

10 Æschines saith; At the first (O Athenians) the Antigrapharians were elected by suffrages, or voyces, and hee, at euerie meeting of the Pritaniij, should declare to the people what accountes were entred:

20 Suidas saith; That one Antigrapher was in the Senate, another in the publick administration; which apeareth to be credible, by such vse of the like, as (now adaiies) is made amongst vs. Because, in euey Court was a Notarie or Register, that Wrote downe all those thinges which the Iudges had pronouced. There was also another, who was Custos of the Common Expences and Receipts. But I cannot (saith Suidas) affirm, that there were three Notaries, as among the Romaines, who tearmed them Secretaries, that wrote the actions of the Senat, and preserved them.

30 The Grecians, would haue euerie Tribe to haue one, which should be very likely, for else, howe was it possible, that such a burthen of the Commonwealth, arising from the peoples often seditions, shold be comported by three Secretaries onely, considering, that the Iudges were so many, and so many severall Orders or degrees of them? Æschines addeth; That the Notaries wrote downe their Names in a Iournall, that had not formerly rendered an account (vnto the State) of the trust reposed in them, which likewise is Concordant to our instant Observation, in such as holde high and eminent places.

40 50 Many write; that there were ten men, appointed as Tribanes of the common people, or heads of the tribes, who (as Pollucius affirmeth) succeeded in the place of the Nacraroni, and were in euey tribe twelue parts, and were each man called Nacrarius, to whome likewise these Demarchi were appointed. The Nacrarij were obliged, to yeelde an Account to the Common-weale; of their expences in the time of warre, for two Horffes, and one Shippe. Of these Nacrary there were an hundred and twenty, as many Demarchi, as many Shippes, and of horses two hundred and forty, when the warre so required, beside such as wer maintained from the publick Treasury. They had care for all such things as appertained to the nauy, whereby they were much molestuous to poore people, in regard, that they payed ratably for businesse of the Field, for Houses, for Marchandizes, and for the Arts they professed: and if they denied or refused to pay, they might amerce them to the very vttermost of the Debr. Now, because the Demarchi (with lesse offence to the people) might make Collection of them, they would Write of the Prouinces, and of the Atticke Fieldes, how many of them were barren, and how many fruitfull; how much each one possessed, and then gathered, according to the benefit and vse of his Trade. After they had thus commanded their Monies, the second office of the Demarchi, was, to set downe in a Iournall, all such yong people, to whom (in regard of their yeares) it was lawful to allow succession and Inheritance, which did redound to great commodity. If at any time there grew any question about the age of any one (which only fell into the Magistrates guist, and to his allowance) presently they ranne to the Iournall, wherein the birth of euery one was Writen, and so cleared all doubting. Another benefit likewise thereby insued, to wit; the continuall fit Election of yong men for the wars.

Quaestores or Governours called Ephtimi.

17. There were ten Ephtimi or Creosti, redeemers of debts, iudiciall Hearers of such causes, & Maisters of compositions, to whom, because others wer constrained to yeild a reason of all such Occurrences, & the parties to set down euery thing vnder their owne hands, we cannot more aptly tearme them, then Quaestores of Accounts vnder Handwriting. These being elected by nine principall men, euen in the greatest calamity and businesse of the Countrey; they increased diuers Customes, Toll-Gatherings, and Fines to the people, & redeemed many debts; by means whereof, they were called Creosti, not because they should redeme, but in regard that they had redeemed many. The sums of Mony numbred by these Men, were deliuered in account to the Logists. They dealt in the affayres of the inferior Magistrates, and disposed of all their Receipts, beside the constituted pensions of the publique Chamber. They had the charge of all Ambassages, euen to their conclusion. A Notary vsed to attend on them, who should acquaint them with the peoples names, and leauy their Tributes according to their power. And when any disturbaunce happened among them, for any penalties imposed; they would lead the Offenders to the Tribunall of the superiour Iudges; and likewise such as had not wherewithall to pay, according as Isocrates maketh mention in his Trapezition, towards the end. The Scriuener or Notary thus attending them, kept account of the Corne, which was contributed by euery one, because it was bestowed in the publick Granary. They that had the distribution of this Corne, were called, Silometre; they that kept it in store, Sitophilaci, and the place where it was kept, Barophilachio. They that had care to see it conuayed thoroughout all the City, Sitoni, or, Maisters of the Sustenance.

The Venetians, doo make especial vse of such Magistrates; for there are some, that take the charge of bringing Corne from all partes; and those men, are called most commonly by the people, Puruayers, or Prouiders of Graine. They haue power and Authority to see it safely kept, and to distribute it to two Magistrates appointed for Meale, who doth cause it to be sold in two places; Namely, at Saint Markes, and at the Rialto, called the Store-Houses, at much better rate then the Marchants will affoord. This is thus done, least the Couetousnesse of many should prey vpon the poore, and the Common-Wealth, and so to murder men by Famishment. Which thing, is so familiar and frequent in these our Dayes, that many times, for the thirst of Gold, and coueting after a greater price for Corne: we may see it rotten and spoild, and so much cast away, or powred downe the Riuer, as might haue fed an hundred thousand Men. Thus by the endeuor of these two men, they they haue still abundance of graine, nor are the Venetians carelesse of these Officers, albeit they are hemd in with the Sea: when the Turkes are as prouident euery way, although it be falsely giuen vs to vnderstand, that they are vnskilful in such matters of Magistracy. They haue their Edili, and Gouernors of Cities, whom they tearme Sar Farin, that is; the Cities Ruler: his especial charge is, that the people haue alwaies abundance of Barley, and of other Corne, at reasonable rate. In the Army also, the Arpac Enim takes care, that there bee good prouision of Barley for the Horses.

The Romains were so careful of their Corne affayres, and Husbandrie for Graine, that they brought it from the Riuer Nilus at publicke charge, and by that meanes conueyed such abundance of Graine into Alexandria, that at length they brought it in like plentie to Rome, maintaining still the Riuer at incredible expences. Moreouer, they made a Law, that if any one brake the bankes of Nilus, or any other bankes of such riuers as they vsed, he was punished very capitally. The Fields of Bizantium in Africa, Campania, Sicilia, and all other places whatsoeuer, that yeilded any plenty of Corne, was so highly by them respected, that they honoured all such parts with the name of Prouinces. Returne we now to the Sitori, who little differed from those notaries or Scriueners, that I mentioned with the Sitori, who were tearmed Logographi, or Writers of the accounts, because they serued in place of the Epigraphi.

18. Hauing saide some-what of young men in the Office of the Demarchi, whose names were registred in the Journall, we will heere proceed therein a little further. Before they could haue any power in Hereditarie occasions, for the space of two yeares together, they must visite all the neere Neighbouring Regions, as seeking to learne the exercise of Armes. And then, from the eighteenth yeare of their age (at which time they departed from the Ephobie) to the twentieth; they were tearmed Peripoli, that is, Circuiters, or Wanderers; and Ephobie by their age, to wit; youthhood, and Ephodi, by the voyages they had gone.

They were likewise called, Choras Episcopi, that is; Inquisitours of the Regions, not because they were in any such Magisteriall Office, but in regarde that they (seeking after strange occurrences) were skilfull in all places and wayes of the Regions.

Two yeares being past, as in reward of their trauaile, they had the Title bestowed on them of Lisarchi, because the Grecians said, Lisarchi tu ligni, left to the inheritance. The power of inheritance being graunted them, they tooke then this forme of Oath: I will neuer become a shame to Armes. I will neuer forsake that Captaine, to vvhome I shall bee appointed in Seruice. For the honour of my Countrey, I will fight single, or against manie. I will neuer doe any damage vnto my Countrey. I will sayle to any Countrey or Region, whereto I shall bee appointed. I will condescend vnto the Equitie of the eternall Iudges. I will bee obedient to the Sacraments alreadie receyued. If any man shall disobey the Lawes, or seeke to Deface them, I will hinder him so much as lieth in me to do. Alone, or against many, I will be a reuenger of wrongs. I will alwaies honour the wise Gouernours of my Countrey.

30 Six men were thus named, and to them, power was giuen (at all times, when the Great Counsell Assembled) to Elect thirty other men, as Co-adiutors, all which; with a Thred, dipt in Vermillion Colour, marked all such as were negligent in hearing the Lawes, or in coming vnto the Senate, and they were then seuerely punished. Whereuppon, there grew a Prouerbe on such as were in Office, more for fear of punishment, then loue to vertue, to wit; Beware the halter dipt in red. A generation of such men, is almost in euery City, who will neuer vndergo any Office, except the lawes do compell them.

19 There were nine principall Men, renowned in Athens, who could not be elected into that Office, if they had not first taken an Oath, that (both by father and Mother) they were Athenians begotten and borne, and well knowne to be so, by his Father, Grand-father, and great great Graund-father. They were likewise demaunded, if they were Indigeni, or hadderiued their originall from any other people: as the Venetians do obserue the like Course, to knowe

the Natiue Children of Noblemen. In matter of Religion, they were questioned, if God Ioue were to them penitral and tutelary, and Apollo their first Founder. In the course of their life spent already, they were demanded, if they had bin beneficiall to their Parents; if they had vnder taken Armes for their Countrey, and for the Altar; if they had achieved honour in their Countrey deservedly: All which being approoued, they were then admitted, but otherwise they might not. All these Questions were asked them by the Ariopagiti; and in the Porch of the Kings Pallace. This Oath being first taken, then this other followed. That perpetually they should be obedient to the Lawes: That a man should neuer request any Statue of Golde, for the most beneficiall seruice hee could performe to his Countrey or Common-weale. That hee should not pursue the extremitie of Iustice, for any extraordinary benefit to himselfe.

Having promised by Oath all these things, hee was brought from the Senate, into the Acropolio, a strong Tower belonging to the Athenians, where hee made fresh replication of all the former promises. There is no great dissimilitude heerein, from him that is elected Captaine for the Nauie, belonging to the Senate of Venice, who vulgarly is called a Prouider or Purueyer. Heere onely is the difference, that this man is thus appointed, and hath care of all the Nauall Affayres, as also of Corne: And the other, vseth to administer the power of the Lawe. When they are thus brought vnto the strong Forte or Tower, although they be all elected Archonti; yet fixe of them are termed Tefmoteti: One, Archon Eponimo; a second, King; and the thirde, Captaine of the Souldiours Polimarcho, of whome, we shall heereafter speake more perticularly.

20 The Feasts of Bacchus, Apollo, and Diana, were Celebrated by the Eponimo. Hee heard the Differences betweene Wife and Husband, Kindered and Kindered, and appointed punishment for such, as did iniurie each other by oddes, or excesse of aduantage. He had care of Orphanes, for whom hee made choyse of good and honest persons, to be as their Tutors, and to yeild a reason of the Legittimate, from such as were made heyres by institution. The Grecians vsed to tearme such men, Chiron Epitopi, that is; Defenders of widdows: but in saying Traorphanon Epitropus, it signifieth Tutors of Orphanes, after they had regarded such Widdowes, as were left great with Childe at the Death of their Husbands. Their charge was, to bee respectiue of the Posthumi, Children borne after their Fathers decease, and that the Widdowes which were so deliuered, should bee cancelled out of the Iournall, and their Child-birth excused.

21 Plinie interprets him to bee a King, and chiefe Sacrificer; Whereby we may affirme, that the Romaines not only imitated the Grecians in their laws; but also deriued theit forme of government (in Common-weale affairs) from them. And as this King vsed, as it were, to administer all sacred thinges; so was this name of King the chiefest and most eminent in Authority. The first dignity of his office, was, to haue especiall care, that the Sacrifices should be offered to Bacchus and Ceres, according to accustomed vse, with the Curatori of the pastimes. In all their sports and delightes, the Athenians vsed to haue their Auditors, who not only (as I haue formerly noted) were Presidents of those sportes and feasts: but likewise out of their own properties, of meere liberality, and according to their faculties, would shape their expences, onely in regard of that name, to be chiefe in such occasions, & proposed the rewardes, partly of their own bounty, and partly of the publick. Concerning the charge of these Auditors, or Coragi, as the Grecians stiled the, and the priuiledges belonging to them. Demosthenes discourseth at large in one of his Orations, where, if any bee desirous of more ample satisfaction, he may be fully resolued. For those men appointed the Feasts, in what maner they should be doone, and on what charges they should consist.

Three Feasts were obserued among the Athenians, wherein vse was made of Lampes and Fires, (viz:) to Minerua, to Vulcane, and to Prometheus. Suidas sayeth, that Istrus left in his Writings; That the Athenians at making the Feast of Vulcan, did then imagine Lampes to be very conuenient . . In memory of which nouell inuention, they would neuer after sacrifice their pastimes to Vulcan, without the vse of many Lamps. Moreouer, because it added a great grace to the most prudent inuentresse of Arts, Pallas, and to Prometheus, first Fautor and Deuiser of driuers Artes among Men: Lampes were especiallie commaunded to be vsed in their Feasts, and that their Successours should follow their ordination. The Sacrifices being ended, they iudged such differences as happened among the Wrastlers and others Sporters. Afterwards, they brought in their criminall causes before the Ariopagiticall Senate, and the Offendour before the Tribunal, laying by his Crowne atchieued in the games, he fate down with the Ariopagite, and was the first to bee sentenced, according to the fault committed. Then, they heard the causes of Animaters and Imboldners, according as harms had happened on the common wayes; iniuries done to Houses, and such like transgressions, and sentence was deliuered as occasion required.

22 The third of these Princes, was the Polimarcho, which Title was declared by his Office, and whereto hee was by duty obliged. He was President at all thinges sacred to Diana, and Mars the God of Warre. Next to this, the Polimarcho, had charge of all the Combates fought in Lists, and for the Countrey. There was then a most excellent custome obserued in Athens, that all such as dyed in Warre for their Countries cause, their Names being enrouled in a Day-Book or Iournall; they were oftentimes celebrated with publique Feasts, and then their names were openly recited, as also their actions performed with glory and perpetuall honour. When young Men fought combats, that manner of fight was tearmed Epitaphicon; that is, belonging to a Graue or Sepulcher: whereto those young spirits went with enflamed affections, preferring the Weale-publique, before their priuate Welfare.

Moreouer, the Polimarcho tooke account of such verses and Canzones, as were made in commendation of the dead, and the assured truth of them: Then did he giue them to young Men, and they should sing them at their publique pastimes. They alwaies presented to the Ariopagiticall Senate, such as in War had gon out of order, or (for feare of perrill) fled away, and there required condemnation against them. In breece, his Office was, to mannage all Military matters, and rurall businesse. Many haue written, that he also kept the Keyes of the City Gates in the night time, and had especial care of all the Ports Now, because he had the full charge of Military occasions, we will heere giue a little touch of the other Captaines of VVar.

23 Next to the Polimarcho, followed two Hipparchi, Maisters of the Horse, to whom not onely all the Horse-men were obedient, but the Army vniuersally: otherwise, they would seuerely chastise the vnruely, and such as made scorne of their commaund. They were heedfull also, that men should keepe their rancke, and no one depart from the Captaine (of whom hee had once made election) without lawfull cause, or his especial licence, on paine of his Head: That order might be obserued in food and rayment, and not immeasurably any way exceeded: That no iniuries should be done by them to the people; and other like matters, meete to be prohibited in Souldiers. These men kept in order the Centurions, the Capi-di-dieci, & the vnder Souldiers. There were beside in Athens, ten Philarchi; to wit, Tribunes, and Captaines of the Tribes.

24 The Tesmoteti vsed to elect the Magistrates of the Horse; beside, their charge was, to see that the Iudges shold obserue the conditions set downe in writing, and iudge according to the Lawes: As wee, instead of these men, haue our Attornies and Aduocates. Out of accustomed times, they might cause the Senate to assemble, and at their pleasure. How great the authority of these men was, & of what charge; the Romaines made sufficient demonstration, in that (among them) these Offices were allowed to the Dictator, Consull, Prator; yea, and the most important occasions of the Tribunes, as well Military, as concerning the Common people. They were also to declare to the people, those matters whereon the Senate had concluded. They were troublesome to such Magistrates, as had had promulgated Lawes, which had not formerly been consented to by all; and vniuersally, they were Fathers and defenders of all the Lawes. Moreouer, it was their charge, to appoint punishment for false Witnesses, and to condemne the vniust Accuser; and yet to giue place to the Iudges, according to their honour.

25 Because our perfect intention may be the better vnderstood, I will recite the very words of Demosthenes, set downe in this manner. Diuers are the benefits among you (o Athenians) which nowhere else are to be found: among which, verily the most sublime and clearest, is, the Ariopagiticall Tribunall. Of whose praise, whoeuer would undertake to expresse the smallest part, he shall abound and exceede in such Copy of discourse, as nothing can be more euident: In regard, that both by ancient and Moderne Testimony, it hath beene very plentifully handled; yet notwithstanding, I will not forbear (for all that) to declare one thing recorded by Antiquity. It was the pleasure of the Gods, that in this place should be established iudgment of murder, and heere it is iudged, as it is framed. Neptune made Faith in this case, for his Sonne Alirrhothius against Mars. Twelue Gods did heere giue sentence, betweene Orestes and the Furies: but these are matters of Antiquity, let vs come to Moderne occasions. Such hath beene the reuerence helde and obserued to this Senate, and such the religious Faith; that no Tyrant in Oligarchy (which is the rule of a few potent persons) nor in Democracy (which exceedeth all other kindes of Government) euer durst be so bold, as to take iudgement for Murderers from this place, & appoint it any where else. Againe (which is a matter most maruailous) that neuer was there found any guilty person conuicted, or accuser that preuailed not, that deservedly appealed from their sentence. These are the wordes of Demosthenes; and Pausanias confirmeth the very same in his Atticks. First of all, on the right hand, was the Kinges Porch, wherein the King yearely vsed to sit in his greatest pompe. Harpocraton saith, in his first Oratton of Demosthenes, thus; There were three Kinges Porches. The first, of Ioue their deliuerer; The second, for the King, and continually vsed; The third, was adorned with variety of Figures.

Pausanias saith. The Field of Mars, was so named, because Mars was there condemned, for hauing slaine Alirrhothius; and where Orestes was adiudged, for murdering his Mosher. But he to escape the punishment, instituted an Altar to Pallas, which he called the Altar of Pallas Martia. Afterward he saith; There are other Tribunals in Athens, but not so famous: As the Trigon, so called of the triangular Figure; And the Paraniſta, so named, because it was in an obscure place of the Citty, and frequented but by few. But the cheefest of all, and where most plenty of persons might be assembled, was the Ilieia. The place where they sentenced Homicides, Poysoners, Parracides, and such like wickednesse, was called Palladium. In the Pritanio, the discoursed on ciuil causes; so saith Pausanias. But returning to Demosthenes, he saith; There was another Palladium, where all such were sentenced, as had committed Homicide against their will, or in defence of themselues, being injured. In this place, albeit the Parents and Kindred of the dead pursued the cause; yet notwithstanding, they should haue no censure in the affliction: but the matter being made knowne to the Senate, they sent the party to a place of security, vntill the Parents and Friendes ceased further molestation. Pollucius saith; That Troy being destroyed, the Palladium was transferred to Athens by the Greekes. But the Inhabitants of Phalera, (which port ioyned neere to the Pirea of Athens) taking them to be Enemies, threw them into the Sea. Acamath saith; That they were Grecians, who brought the simulacre of the Palladium, and called it THE VNKNOVNE ORACLE; because they being alike in yeares, familiars and friends, were thus dead, and not knowne. In which place, in memory of the accident, the Tribunall was made, and the sacred Palladium, where sentence was giuen for voluntary Murders, because the Falerians killed them, not willingly, but in defence of their Countrey. Demosthenes addeth a third Tribunal, which was called Delphinus; where Iudgement was giuen on them that denied not the Homicide, but proued that they had done it vpon good occasion. Pollucius sheweth, that it was made by Ægeus, and thereon named Apollo Delphinus, and Bellona Delphina. The first Iudgement pro-pronounced in this place, was on Theseus, when he dedicated the spoiles of the Theeues to the Goddes, not denying that he had slaine Pallantius; but approving, that he did it to good intent, because he should not be hurtfull to the State of his Countrey, nor him.

The fourth Tribunall, according to Demosthenes, was in the Pritanio, where these kind of cases were handled (viz.) If a Man (passing along the way) were smitten eyther by a stone, a ball of Iron throwne at him, or any other sencelesse thing, & the hurt done without knowledge of him that was the caster: they did then argue coniecturally, by what Art or meanes they might best attaine to know the Offendour that acted the harme, or whether the party were the cause of his own iniury; either of which beeing made apparant by prooffe, condemnation passed answerable to the importance of the case. In the proceedings of this Tribunall, whereof the King was the Head, the Councillours and Friends also of the King sat with him there together, who, after inquisition made of all coniectures, if the Author of the harme could not bee agreed on: they vsed presently to rent and teare the Proesse in peeces, and cast it into the Fire, or into the Sea, as a signe of punishment due to it. The fifth Tribunall, was in a place, which they called, The Well pit, or Grauell pit; where, if a Man (after a Murder against his will done, & should commit another willingly) came to his answer; he was constrained to yeild a reason for the Fact. Then standing on a Ship (as a Man vnworthy, deprived and exiled from his Countrey) not held by any Anker, Cable, Mast, or Saile, hee was left to the mercy of his Fortune.

26 In their most sollemne Judgements, sixe Paredri vsually were present, binarily chosen by each one of the three Archonti; whom Suidas affirmeth, that they were sometime foure, according to Aristotle in his Politickes. It was very expedient, that these men should be altogether of blamelesse life, and thereof (before they might come among the other Iudges) they rendred a very seuer and strict account, before five hundred men Pritani, for the first time.

The second, was to the Ariopagite, e-uery man obiecting against them, what soeuer they could alleadge, and deliue- ring it in accusation, to the Comandadore. The cause of so seuer inquisition, was, because they were to manage mat- ters of importance, and full of perill, wherein was great need of extraordinary fidelity: As, in deliueing the Iudges sentence, whereof, one word left out, changed, transported otherwise, or ad- ded vnto by the Notaries (who wrote very swiftly) might ouer-turne, or draw the sentence into a quite contrary sense, or (at least) make it very farre off from the Iudges meaning. They were there- fore set as Ouer-seers of the Notaries, to obserue all pointes and virgulers, in transcripts deliueired to the Iudges.

27 The Clearkes vsed to note downe, and send for them that were elected by the Colonies, and Inhabitants of the City, or of ancient possessions among the Athenians, or newly purchased, but not made habitable, and then to deuide the Bounds, Territories of the Coun- trey, and iurisdiction of each City, ac- cording to the lot of euery man, after they were vnable for further seruice. And heereon was the word Clarke for- med; to wit, to distribute to them the lot of their allowance. It was obserued as a custome among them, that such as were destitute of Goods and Houses, (which very quickly was knowne by di- ligence of the Ariopagite) and had sustai- ned such losse by imployment in the Warres: the Common Purffe allowed so much Mony as the iourney required, and then they were sent to the remotest Citties, naked or needing store of Inha- bitants, or else to some other conueni- ent parts adioyning, where the Coun- try maintained them, all the rest of their life time.

28 There were ten Dispensers, or Stewardes of the publique Treasurie, who (in presence of the Senators) from that Treasurie that was vsually kept in the Palladium; tooke so much as was necessary for publique vse: especially, for preseruing the Navy in good order, and all prouision for the Sea; for heereon, (as had beene many times obserued) depended the safety, not onely of Athens, but of all Greece beside. uident care: The one of them was called * Paralos; and the other Ammon. Beside, the fore-named dispensations, they were wont (in returning to the Senate, with publique Supplications) to beare the Golden Image of Pallas, the Signals of victory, formerly giuen to their Captains, and other ornaments of sacred thinges: which I read, was onely done by them, whom the Grecians vsed to tearme Calachieria, Ephori Calachieria, Ephori Philacis, and such like. But Harpocratyon affirmeth, that the words are all of equall Dignity, and that the Men were so called, because they placed, preserved, carried abroad, and husbanded all such businesse.

The Interpreter of Demosthenes Oration against Timocrates, saith; that there was a place in the hinder part of the Cittadell, which they called Acropolis: and of that place they were named Opistodomo, and Tamicon, because all the Money of the Churches was there kept. Yet afterward it happened, that all the vsury Money was found wanting there, by meanes of the said Guardians: because they that were then Tamij, burned the Treasury, to the ende that their Theft might not appeare, nor their slender care bee discerned. Demosthenes in his third Philippicke, calleth them publique Preseruers, whom we vulgarly vse to tearme Treasurers of spare, or Treasurers onely; hee calleth them beside, Moristi Tamia.

29 In speaking of these Tamij, it puts me in mind of the Hellinomy, whose office was, to preserue and administer such Monies, as were collected from those partes of Greece, that were vnder the Athenian Empire. The like also might they doe of sacred thinges, and of all taxations and Tributes; they vsed also to gather and summe vp the profits of the Islands. The Greeke Authours, in rendring a reason for this Name, doe say; that after the King of Persia was vanquished by the Athenians, in a Warre vpon the Sea; they, to preserue their Empire the more diligently (because suddainely, well neere all the Grecians exalted their courages, after such calamity and miserable slaughter as they had long suffered) commaunded; that all in generall should pay Tribute, toward the great charges of that Nauall Warre, whereby the Counties common Enemy was happily foyled. Heereupon, the greater part of the expences was quickly collected, and therefore they were called Hellinotamij, as much to say, as Chamberlains of Grecia.

33 There were others, tearmed Hellanodici, who gathered such Monies, as were giuen in the name of sacred vic, and afterward consigned to the Choragi, for the charge of Sacrifices, as also the sports of the Citty. This was collected of the citizens & inhabitants of Athens.

31 The Gineconomi, were Men that deliberated on the Ornaments for Gentle-women, and afterward for all other women; to the end, that no one might weare any thing vnbeseeing her degree, but ech one be adorned according to her quality: imposing also a pecuniary penalty, on such as durst doe otherwise, and the infliction was as speedy, as they were ready to offend the Law by them appointed. There was also a Law for Women, prouided by a Son of the Emperor Phillips, by which Law, if any walked dishonestly, they were quicklie fined at a thousand Drammaes: Pollucius affirmeth, that afterward they fell to twenty.

The Signeury of Venice, in some passed yeares, perceiuing the intollerable expences laide out in Ornaments for women, and that thence arose and increased (beyond measure) the danger of their condition: ordained, that no Woman, were she of Noble blood, or a Cittizen, Maide, or Wife, should dare to be seene in publike, with a Garment of Silke; except on the day of marriage, and such as shold go to mariages, or solemne inuitations. For, before this restraint, many, of very meane quality, would equall themselues with a Queen in pomp. They appointed, ouer and beside this good Lawe, that they should weare no Chaines of Golde, adorned with Gems; no Carcanets, or Girdles: and the Magistrates then in office, compelled the to obseruation hereof, according to the Law in that case prouided. I doe not tell yee, how meere and necessary this Law was, because I know, that there are many, who ouer-abounding in a vaine custome, will lay on their backs, and on the Garments of their Wiues & Children; almost their own wealth; yea, of others beside, houses, dignities, or whatsoever (in this vaine humour)

a Man can procure from any place, or otherwise vsurpe.

It was the custome of these Gineconomi, to haue a care of Feasts & meetings, if they were aunswerable to the Lawes therefore appointed, and to note the number of the Guests: Timocles in his Philodicaeste, leaues it so written, adding withall. Open (saith he) your doores, to the end we may be the better noted of you, & you of vs: then the Gineconomi passing along, do obserue who are the invited, and how many are in old or nouell fashions. Moreouer, he addeth, that Philochorus, in the seauenth of his Atticks, saith; The Gineconomi, with the Ariopagite, tooke obseruation of Mens company in euery house, likewise at Weddings, and at the Sacrifices; because there they vsed to excede in apparrell, diet and drinking. Athenaus saith; I cannot consent with Plato, concerning the number of invited Guests; because he will haue no more to be at a Wedding, but ten persons; five men, and as many Women. But the one wrote of things that happened, and the other but imagined, as in like manner is all his Common-wealth.

32 Those men, who by some Authors are called Inotti; to wit, obseruers of Wine; Plato in his feigned Common-wealth, tearmeth them Mnamonas; I thinke, because they recorded the Lawes. For, as the Gineconomi (as wee haue already said) compelled the determination for Womens Ornaments, the number of guests, and the order of their Viands: so these other in like manner; imposed Lawes for Wine; that if any one dranke more then needed, beeing thereof conuicted, he should learne the better at another time to drinke lesse. But, how many times their Elders vsed to drinke, is not declared, neither doth it much import to speake it: because regard is more to be had of nature, then number. But in this case, if any one be desirous to know the vse of diuers people; let him read the tenne and eleauen Bookes of Athenaus his Dinosophists, where almost nothing else is discourfed. These Inotti among the Athenians (as Eupolis the Poet faithfully deliuereth in his Polixena) were neuer seene in company of the Souldiers, nor they with them. O Citty, Citty, how delicate wouldst thou appeare, and how much better for thee; if thou wert still so prouident? So spake

Athenaus. Out of which words Eupolis comprehended, that our elders vsed to elect their Souldiers of such sobriety, and so slender drinkers, as they needed no Ouer-seers for their Wine, how greatly soeuer their number encreased. The Grecians were such sollemne Drinkers, that there grew a Prouerbe of them, to wit; * Pergracari. Good prooue was hereof among the Macedons, Thracians, Dacians, Misians, and Dalmatians; yea, among the Dutch and French, for their Warres fell out vnluckily, when Wine and Women were ouer-much frequented, but neuer ensued any harme by mediocrity and abstinence; but returne we again to Athenaus. These Inotti (saith he) obserued what soeuer was done at banquets, and if they dranke alwaies equally. He was an inferiour Magistrate, saith Pliny the Rhetoritian, of the Crocantidi discipline. There were three in number, who were cald Optalmi; because when they gaue admonition, they did thereby awake the eyes of the minde, which (by too much Wine) were lost and vtterly dazeled before.

33 In Athens there were ten Curatores, or Prouiders, belonging to the Pallace, who appointed the prices of all thinges, that they might be brought, not according to the will of the Seller; but aunswerable to iust and honest valuation: regarding withall, that in stead of good thinges, bad might not bee past away. Moreouer, they had charge, that no Cittyzen should engrosse more Wine or Corne, then was conuenient for his vse. And all such Graine, as exceeded the Cittyes daily vse, should be conuayed to meet places, in the name publike, and there sold for iust price, although there were neuer so great dearth or scarcify.

34 They had Bishops also, to whom the care of the Prouinces affairs appertained, and beeing appointed as Arbitrators thorough all the Prouinces; they inquired after contentions; publike wrongs, and iniuries to iurisdctions. If any one went against their ordination; they gaue sentence against him, wherto he must be as obedient, as if it had beene giuen by the cheefest Magistrate. They were likewise called, Aetatores, Guardians; and Prefects, and of the Greeks, Ephori; which word Cicero vseth in the first

CHAP. V.

In which of all the Heauens, God is said to haue his abiding.

The Authors alteration to a contrary argument.

Or bearing awhile, to wade any further in description of those ancient Commonweales, and that variety of reading may yeild them more delectation; we will alter our present subiect to a higher straine, and speake of matter much more remarkable. Already haue wee (in the beginning of the first Book) discoursed of God, his Creation of the World, and other occasions of like Argument: In this place we intend to speake of the feuerall Heauens, and in which of them it is said that God hath his abiding. Before the Incarnation of our Lord Iesus Christ, and till he had taught, by that incomparable prayer, which we call the Lords Prayer, that his Father, and ours likewise, by his ineffable mercy, dwelt in the Heauens, and aboue them all: the Philosophers, as Socrates, Plato, Pythagoras, Aristotle, Democritus, and others since then, learned Christian Diuines; as Dionisius Ariopagita, learned Thomas Aquinas, ingenious Scotus, & the latest in our time with Tithelmanus, haue all giuen vs assurance by their writings, that there are many Heauens, amounting to the number of eleauen. Now, in regard that diuers men, being slenderly acquainted with holy Histories, doe not know in which

God is to be sought in Heauen.

Philosophers and Diuines haue numbered nine Heauens.

of those Heauens God hath constituted his Throne (albeit he is euery where by his presence, Essence, and power) I will briefly speake thereof, to the end, that in their Prayers and Contemplations; they may seek after him with more loue and respect.

The Philosophers deuided the Celestiall Region, as they did the Elementary, alleadging, that there are eleauen: of which, the first Heauen (beginning at the most inferiour) containeth but one Starre or Planet, which is the Moone, and seemeth very great to vs, because it is the neereft vnto vs. The second, is that called of Mercury; The third, of Venus; The fourth, of Soll; or the Sunne, which the expertest Mathematicians write, to exceede the whole Earth in greatnesse an hundred sixty fixe times. The fift, of Mars; The sixt, of Iupiter; The seauenth, of Saturne. All these seauen Heauens haue each of them but one Starre or Planet (as wee haue saide) bearing the Name of each, and they are called errant or wandering Starres, because they keepe not alwaies one scituation, neyther are equally distant one from another; but one while they draw neere; another while, are farre asunder; sometimes that goes before, which at another time comes after. At his eleuation, it will be neere to another, according as the Spheares turne themselues, violently or slowly. That it cannot bee any way likely, that these seauen Heauens (with their Planets) should be seene the one aboue the other, is manifestly to be prooued; because that sometimes the inferiour doe so hinder, that no sight can be had of the Superiour. As may be discerned almost euery yeare, in the Eclipse of the Sunne: for the Sunne Eclipsed by the Moone, looseth a great part of his light, the Moone being then directly opposite. Next to the Heauen of Saturne, and much aboue him, there is another, called the Firmament, all filled with Starres, not numberable to Men, and they are tearmed fixed, because they are seene euermore to keepe one order, and are constant in their scituation. That it is so, wee are assured by the Prophet Dauid, who saith; What is he that can number the Stars of Heauen, or can call them by their names?

The Christaline Heauen.

Aboue the Firmament, is the Heauen Christaline, or watry, which learned men are of the minde, that it was created by God aboue the other Heauens; to the end that it might mitigate the great heat, which the other Heauens acquired by their motion, and by the Stars being in them. Of this opinion was Ptolomy, Alphraganus, and others; yea, holy writ maketh mention thereof, where it is affirmed, that the Creatour said; Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the Waters. Then afterward followeth. And the Firmament was in the midst of the Waters which was beneath. And the Psalmist singeth in another place: Praise God all ye Heauens, and ye waters that be aboue the Heauens.

Gene. 1.

The mouing Heauen, and the office thereof.

Againe, more high then the Christaline or watry Heauen, is another Heauen, called the mouing Heauen, which hath no Stars, no more then the Christaline; but his office is, to turne it selfe (Spherically) from the East to the west, by the South, which he dooth in foure and twenty houres; and by his strength and great velocity, he maketh all the other subiacent Heauens for to turne about.

The eleuenth Heauen, cald Calum Empyrium.

Moreover, aboue all these fore-named ten Heauens, the recited Philosophers and Diuines, do tell vs, that there is yet another Heauen, exempt from all locall motion, & is before all that which can be called the World: filled with infinite intelligences, and most happy spirits, that were created all in one place, and thereto deputed for the glory of God. This Heauen, incomprehensible in greatnesse, and much more then all the other (as including them all within his center and concauity) is abounding in lights: wherefore the Grecians called it Empyrium; that is, fiery, or shining in great brightnesse. Not that it burneth like the Fire; but by similitude, because the fire yeildeth a splendour, and so is this Heauen illumined with a most glorious light: This is the Seat of God, as his Pallace, where he is said particularly to dwell; because that there his will is fulfilled, and the obedience of the Angels and blessed Spirits is perfect. Or else, in regard that there more particularly, he worketh, as S. Augustine saith in his fifty seauen Epistle to Dardanum: where al the blessed Spirits are present, contemplating the face of God, the brightnesse whereof, our eies are not able to endure, no more then the Owle can the glorious Sunne, and there is no true or perfect light indeede; but that which proceedeth from him onely.

Why called Calum Empyrium.

August. in Epist 57 at Dardanum.

There are some that doubt, what the action of this Calum Empyrium is, saying; it hath no power ouer the inferior Spheres, or bodies infinite, and that it was not created for the gouernment or disposition of natural lthings; but only for the Throne of God, and habitation of the Elect: holding it very vnfitting, that so precions a dwelling for GOD, should serue for corruptible Creatures, and for this bodily World. Others maintaine the contrary, that it is eternal, and that, by this Heauen, inferior matters haue the longer continuance, and are the better entertained in their due order.

Moreover, although it should exceede all the other Heauens in height; yet are our Prayers carried thither. For Saint Paule saith, That the briefest Prayer pierceth Heauen. And the most faithful Euangelists haue written, that the Apostles and Disciples behelde Iesus Christ visibly ascend vp into Heauen. As much to say, as that hee passed thorow those ten Heauens; and attained vnto the eleuenth, where his Father abideth. Saint Paule also saith; That hee was rapt up into the third Heauen. S. Luke the Euangelist, and a Phisition, writeth; that blessed Stephen saw (a little before his death) al the Heauens opened to his bodily eyes, euen vnto Calum Empyrium, and it also, where the Diuine Maiesty raigned in Trinity.

Of the error committed by the ancient Mathematicians and Astrologers, yea, and such as haue continued to this day: in calling the Planets by diabolicall names; and attributing a Diuinity to them.

IN our precedent Chapter; discoursing of the Heauens, with their Starres and Planets; I call to minde, that auncient Mathematicians, and other other of much matter continuance, imposed deuillish names on them; to wit, the Heauen and Planet of Saturne, of Iupiter, Mars, and so of the rest. Euery one knoweth, that Devils (in elder times) made themselues to bee adored vnder these Names. They committed yet a much greater errour, in giuing the people to vnderstand, that those Stars, Planets, or Celestiall Figures, had such power ouer inferiour Bodies: as that they were the onely cause, of all good or euill happening to vs in this World. For example. To the Planet named Saturne, they attributed sterility and mortality. To Iupiter, happy times, and the beginning of life. To Mars, the cause of all debates, garboiles and Warre. To Soll, Riches and Treasures. To Venus, loues and marriages. To Mercury, eloquence and knowledge. To Luna, the Empire and commaund ouer humide matters. And God (in all these thinges) was counted as nothing, but euen as the figure (o) filling vp an empty place.

The Planets said to be Deities by the power each of them had.

An obiection concerning the Moone.

Some Man (perhaps) will say vnto me, that apparantly by the Moone, according to the estate and quadrature of her Body; the Sea hath his fluxe and refluxe. That the braine and Marrowe in the Bones of Creatures (she beeing in her full) is much more replenished, then in her Quadrature or Waine. I aunswere, that the Moone is a Starre or Planet; yea, a body insensible, that is no way animate, neyther hath any power of her selfe, but onely what God hath imposed and permitted.

The Answer.

The Moone hath no more Deitie then the water.

Moreouer, that in her there is no Deity, no more then in the Water, which being very moyst of it selfe, washeth foule Cloathes, nourisheth Fishes, and yeildeth many other great commodities, and yet (for all this) is no Goddesse. But like as if a man should make a good fire in some publike place, in a very cold and frosty time, and many comming thither to warme themselues, feeling their chilnesse well asswaged; should they (for this kindnesse) giue thanks to the fire, or rather to him that made it, or caused it to be made?

All power onely dependeth in God.

Euens so it is of the Planets, for they haue no power at all, eyther to make vs Wise, Rich, Poore, Warriours, Ver-tuous, Vicious, or what else: but all these depend on God onely, who hath made Man in his owne Image, and limited his good or euill, neyther to star or Planet. Now, by reason of this fond error in Mathematicians, I haue seene many Maidens, of good and honourable descent, who hauing been ouer curiously educated fell the sooner to folly, making ship-wracke of modesty, honesty, and all. I haue noted men likewise of as loose conuersation: yet both these Sexes, to couer their turpitude, haue not shamed to stand in defence of their lewdnesse, protesting it to be vnauoydable, in regard that Mathematicians had giuen them to vnderstand; that they were conceiued, and borne vnder such Planets, as had incited them to such euils, and therefore they could not (albeit they had neuer so much good will thereto) retire from committing such sin, but needs must still persist therein. Are not these faire Fruits of your Iudiciary Astrology? Let me boldly tell ye, that God, being wholly iust, hath (to your shame) prepared a Hell, to chastise such wickednesse in Men, as will haue good and euil to depend on the Planets power.

But true Mathematicall Prædictiones indeed, are to be deriued from the word of God, according as wee are enstructed in the sacred Scriptures, saying; Then doth he loue his people, when they haue obserued his Commaundements; yea, then shall they haue aboundance of Fruites, and the seasons shall beare themselues well in their qualities; whereon the health of men consisteth, and they shall liue in peace, with many other blessings besides. But when men shall go away from his commaundements, all euils shall befall them; and this a most assured prædiction.

The Christian Church, not onely (at all times) held Iudiciary Astrology in detestation; but euen the Ethniques also: For vnder the Empires of Augustus, and of Tyberius, Mathematicians and Astrologers were banisht out of Rome. S. Clement, who redigested the constitutions of the Primitiue Church, writes: That they then prohibited and withstood, that no Enchanter or Astrologer should bee receiued into the Church. In the Councell of Tolledo, it is said;

A most wicked opinion of Mathematicians, which hath been the ruine of many men and Women.

From whence we must fetch our truest predictions.

said; That if any Man thinke, that he ought to beleue Astrology, or Mathematique indicarie, let him be accursed; that is, excommunicated, and deliuered ouer to the Deuils power. Wherein they had great reason, because there is nothing in the World; that sooner induceth people to Idolatry, then Iudiciall Astrology. For it subiecteth both Body and Soule to Nature, which power likewise is giuen to the Planets, and this hath bene the reason of their adoration. And there hath bin found some people, euen in our time, that did, and doe the like.

Saint Augustine, Byshop of Hippo in Africka, who liued in the yeare of Iesus Christ 427. the Emperour Theodosius then raigning, excommunicated a Mathematitian, and caused him to be expulsed out of his Diocesse, because he maintained, that a Mans owne proper will made him not a Murderer, but the Planet Mars. Also, that GOD made not any Man iust; but Iupiter did it:
with many other such like opinions.
Afterward, this cunning Mathematician
(a Christian of a grosse Graine) within some few yeares after, acknowledged his error that he stood in, saying; that Sathan had thereto seduced him. And beeing better inspired by God, forsaking all his idle opinions: he penitently submitted himselfe, and was receiued againe into the Church. The day of his reception, and in his presence, the said Saint Augustine preached a most learned and excellent Sermon; whereto I referre the Reader; it is contained in his Workes on the sixty one Psalme.

I doe not heereby condemne those Mathematiques, that containe in them Arithmatique, Geomery, Cosmogra-phy, & Astronomy; these latter meanes containe their true integrity still, euen as it was in the time of ABRAHAM, before these Diabolicall names were admitted; which one would very little thinke, should win power, not onely ouer Mens bodies, but likewise ouer their Immortall Soules. This latter Astrology, is very profitable for such as sayle on the Seas, and (oftentimes) for them that trauaile by Land thorow desart places: heereby may be knowne
the Nature and course of the Windes;

for our better aduenturing in full carriere, or calme on the Sea. Also, when is best season to Sow, Plant, Graft, fell Woodes, gather Fruites, discerne the times, and for many other good effects. But that which they tearme Iudiciall Astrology, for the wicked precepts thereto appertaining, hath at all times bene hated by honest people; yea, euen to this day. In so many Coun-cels as haue bene holden, it hath ener-more bene condemned, as the source of too many heresies. The like was done in the last at Trent, & among the estates at Blois; as also not long since, vnder the raigne of Charles the ninth.

That this iudiciary Astrology is altogether a lyer, I will take a litle paines to demonstrate; for it affirmeth, that if any one be conceined or borne, while such a Starre, or such a Planet raigneth:
he shall containe the Nature of that Starre or Planet to him attributed.
Esau and Iacob were first conceined, and then borne vnder one and the same Planet, for they were Twinnes: yet when they were borne, the last held the other by the heele; notwithstanding, they were both of very different Natures. For Esau was Martiall minded, hairy, a great Hunter, disobedient both to Father and Mother, cruell, and (in breefe) of very bad disposition. Contrariwise, Iacob (no way sterne or hairy) was a louer of peace; continuing in the House, neuer studying how to range thorough Forrests, to seaze on sauage Beasts. He exercised labour, led a pastorall life; was obedient to his Parents, and vertuous: which (in the end) begot him the blessing; and the inheritance of his Father, and the other had the curre. If I were so disposed, I could alledge plenty of Histories. As of a Lady that was a Bordelois, that, after fue and twenty yeares past in marriage, had two Daughters at a Birth. The one, at meet years for a Husband (with much dislike of her Parents) became a religious Sister of the order of S. Clare.
The other kept a shop of sin in the open Brothelry. These two Histories may suffice. If it shall be obiected to me, that Mathematicians and Astrologers foretell of things, that are seene oftentimes to take effect, by their Diaries or Alma-nackes: I answer, that they in speaking

so much, & in so many severall natures, quite contrary one vnto another (as of Heat, Cold, Drought, Raine, Winds, calme times, Dearth, abundance of all things, Mortality, Health, that a great person shall be borne, or else one dye) it were vnpossible, but that some one of these must needs happen; albeit, their Prædictions fall out more by hazzard, then by Art. In like manner, if you will but conferre together the Almanackes of diuers Authours, you shall find no one of them to agree with another: Whereby may be easily conceiued; the vncertainty of this Iudiciall Astrology, which ought not henceforth to bee tollerated in any Christian Common-wealth.

Moreover, in imitation of Pope Syluester, first of that Name, who gouerned in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 318. the names of Idolles should be changed, and those of false Gods, attributed to Starres or Planets: as he did the dayes of the weeke. For the Sunday, which they called the day of Soll, or the Sunne; he would haue it to bee named the Lords day, & a day of rest to Christians. Munday, second day of the weeke, and so called in regard of the Moone, hee caused it to be called the second Holyday. And so consequently by numbers following, vnto Saturday, whereto he left the name, not for Indaising, but because the day was so cald by the mouth of God, and he willed that it should be strictly obserued in the auncient Iewish Law. We may well name the Heavens where the Planets are, without imposing any name of Idols on them: As the first Planet, second, third, and so to the number of seauen, or giue them some other conuenable names; which heereafter, would prooue a defence from falling into the ancient Paganisme, as our Moderne Astrologers would faine induce vs thereto.

The Histories of the Indiaes newly discovered, & those of the North parts, conquered by the Moscowite, do plainly shew vnto vs, that many people doe there (yet to this day) adore the Sunne, the Moone, and other of the Stars; yea, they are so addicted in deuotion to the, that it is a very difficult thing, to make them leaue this horrible Idolatry. How happy then are they, that haue true knowledge of him, who created all those Heauens, Planets, and Stars, and place their whole hope of saluation in him? As for the Almanacks or Diaries of our Iudiciall Astrologers now adaies; they are not receiueable, But onely in this kinde, to tell vs the moouable Feastes, and others; as also the Ecclypses and Months.

CHAP. VII.

Of the cause why the great Christian Philosopher, and learned Doctor Origen, did dismember himselfe.

Here are many, not onely of these times, but of those wherein ORIGEN liued, (which was in the yeare of Grace, two hundred twenty five, vnder the Emperour Alexander Seuerus, Maximinus, and Phillip) that were hardly conceited, that Origen, in the floure of his age, being then about twenty five yeares old, should deprive himselfe of Virga virilis; not that he had in those parts any disease, which might require such extirpation. This Act was diuersly thought of, by the ancients and Pastours in the Primitiue Church, especially one Demetrius, who was then Byshoppe of Alexandria (esteemed a most learned and vertuous Man) he blamed him very highly. For (quoth he) there is no expresse commaundement in holy Scripture, to mutelate or make any member imperfect. Albeit, in S. Matthew there is a passage, where Iesus Christ himselfe said: That some are chast of themselues, for the Kingdome of Heauen. All our Orthodoxall Diuines do hold, that this ought to be vnderstood, how we should rent away and separate those euill affections and vices that are bred and borne with vs. So likewise it is to be vnderstood, concerning coueting after earthly goods: for ther is nothing more contrary to the saluation of the Soule, then to busie it selfe in gaining worldly riches and treasures.

As concerning carnall sinne, I am of the minde, that the young man had not the leysure to thinke thereon. For day and

and night hee scarce had time to teach youth, were they Infants, Sons, daughters, Men and Women: not onely in the liberall Arts, wherein he was well skilled, but likewise in holy writ. And in the Primitive Church, people of all sexes and ages, made no difficulty at all, to be taught in the Schooles of Christian Doctors. Likewise, as I have read in Eusebius, the Ecclesiasticall Historian; he himselfe liued at that time, when Origen was so busied night and day, to instruct euery one that made offer of himselfe; which appeared to bee so labourious a paine, as euery man was much amazed thereat. He liued very austerely, for hee neuer dranke any Wine, neither fed on Flesh; but contented himselfe with a little Bread and few Fruits, as the onely meanes (in his owne opinion) to spoile his stomack. In like maner, he went bare foote, and bare leg'd, and had very hard lodging: during then the course of so strict a life; it can be no way likely, that hee gueldded himselfe; as feareing to bee tempted by the flesh. But I hold this cōiecture (with others) that he did it to auoid suspition, and to take away all calumny, that might be iudged of young Schollers loose liuing: For the Paganes in those times, perceiuing that the Christians (in regard of the rigorous Edicts made against them) met together in the night time, rather then in the day, and in close Caues, to heare such Prayers & Sermons, as their Christian Pastours made vnto them, dreading to bee discovered and grieuously punnished; falsely imposed on them, that they made no such assemblies, but onely that they might licentiously exercise all kindes of whoredome, and that their Pastors and Doctours, not onely abused the fairest Women, but euen Boyes also.

Then it is to be presumed, that Origen acted not this violence on himselfe, but onely to the end, that the more freely Maids, Women, and Boyes (that came to his Schoole to be instructed) might be cleare from blame, and himselfe also. Nor could he haue doone this, but by a magnanimity of courage, and great zeale in him, to aduance the Glory of God. In whose imitation, many, touched with the like zeale, did the like. As Melitus, a Man of heauenly minde and life; whose Bones remaine in the City of Sardis, as the fore-named Eusebius sets downe in his History, the fifteenth Chapter. From this height of his youth, he aspired to Martidome, and had attained thereto, had it not beene for his desolate Mother (who was before widdowed of his Father, that was a wealthy Cittizen of Alexandria) and some of her Children, lately become Christians. For they being faithfully informed of the day, when Origen ment in the morning to yeild himselfe to the Romaine Proconsull, he that was Deputy, to proscribe and put to death, all such as made profession of Christian Religion: She entering into his Chamber in the night time; when her Son slept very soundly, tooke away all his Garments, which shee hid and lockt vp very carefully, and by no meanes would deliuer them to him the next day, nor diuers daies following. Which hindred him of his Martyrdome; being ashamed to be scene naked. In which time, the Proconsull hauing executed his commissions, and the liues of no more Christians remaining in his hands: he went to another City, named Heliopolis, there to continue the rest of his charge. So it may appeare, that these occasions passed by Gods great prouidence, and Origen was then not to suffer death, in regard of the wonderfull benefit, which afterward redounded to all Christendome. For by his knowledge and dexterity in teaching; hee conuerted a great number of people to become Christians. He was likewise Schoole-Maister to many worthy and famous persons, who daily laboured to be worthy of Martyrdome: Namely, a young Lady, called Potamia, issued of a very illustrious Family, who endured so much in her Martyrdome; that Basildes (beeing her Hang-man or Executioner) inflicted all torment and extreame of cruelty on her, before hee could cause her to dye: yet after her death, bethinking himselfe of the holy words vttered by her, during her torments, became a Christian and within few daies after, was himselfe likewise crowned with Martyrdome.

Origen, at the age of forty yeares, learned the Hebrew tongue, to the end, that (by his Commentaries) he might the better interpret the holy scriptures: And such was his ingenuity, that one named Ambrose, a Byshoppe, gaue him seauen Secretaries to write vnder him; all which hee wearied, beside Men and Women, that wrote from his mouth as he gaue instructions. It is found in writing, that he composed fve thousand Bookes: neuerthelesse, by laps of time, the greater part of them were vtterly lost, and among them remaining, some haue bin approued by Diuines, and the rest not. He quenched many Heresies by his great experience; namely, that of Berillus, who maintained, that the Son of God was not before the Virgine Mary, from which error hee conuerted him. He reduced to the Christian Faith, the King of Arabia, and the Proconsull of Egypt: His Learning and admired knowledge, was published in so many places, that Porphyrius keeping then a Schoole of Philosophy in Scicily, and esteemed to be the most learned Philosopher since Aristotle; admiring *Origen*s workes, became a Christian. The Mother of the Emperor Seuerus, of whom wee spake in our precedent Chapter, hauing read some of his Workes, was conuerted. She sent for him to come see her at Rome, which he did, & remained there for some time: where hee was found to bee much more learned, then Fame had spoken of him. There is nothing found written of his death; albeit I haue made diligent search in Eusebius, from whom I collected this instant relation; and that he was liuing at the age of threescore years; wherefore it is presumed that he dyed very old.

Now, hauing waded thus far in discourse, concerning the mutilation that Origen made of himselfe: I am the more willing to recite some Historiēs (happening in our time) of other persons; who on their own priuate motion, and for other endes, haue deprived themselves of those parts; contrary to the order of nature. About the yeare 4573: there was an aged Countrey-man, of a Village neere Segur, a Cittie in the higher parts of Lymosine, whose name I spare to speake of, This man being a Widdower, it was noysed of him (but falsely) that he had vnlawfull familiarity with his owne Sons Wife. Whereupon, some that were his Enemies, or rather more malicious then wise, laboured the matter to a Iustice: who commaunded further certainty of information, that punnishment might be inflicted accordingly. The Country man being come to the City, to make his defence against this crime imposed on him, and dyning with his Aduocates Clarke in a common-Inne: found there a great company of young people, and other flouters, that in their drinking, spared not to deride and iest at the poore Countrey-man. After he had endured numberlesse bitter girds and tauntes, such as exceeded common patience to suffer; arising from the Table, and pretending to goe warme himselfe by the Fire; hauing sharpned his Knife on the Mantle-tree of the Chimney, which was of Freestone, he instantly therewith did cut off his secret Members. The Host that saw it, cryed out, and gaue great astonishment to all the rest there present: But, the Country man escaping thence, fled home to his owne House, which was more then halfe a league from the citty, bleeding extreemely all the way, and would haue no help of any Chirurgion, and yet he became recouered againe. In the doing of this Act, surely his intent was, either to auoid following suspicion of so foule a pollution; or, perhaps, in meere dispaire, seeing himselfe so scorned, as it was iustified.

A yong man of noblehouse, in the same Country, acted the like vpon himselfe, in affliction of spirit; because he could not haue carnall knowledge of a young widdowed Lady, only through his own disability. For he had long time pursued her, and she was as ready to accept (at three seuerall opportunities) as hee to offer. At last, taking his leaue of her, with some disgrace, that she should be so apt; and he so vnable: to be reuenged on his imperfect Plant, suddenly he slit it off, and would not admit any cure, but rather desired to dye, by the expence & effusion of his own blood. Yet at length he was perswaded to entertain remedy, because it was told him, that he stood in danger of his Soules destruction, and dying, he should be allowed no Christian bur'all; because it was an action of his owne wilfulnesse. The wound in short time after beeing cured, and the obloquy thereof remaining in fresh memory: he entred into a religious course of life, and continued afterward in good health for many yeares.

Marcus Paulus Thenetus, and Garcias d'Orta, a Portugall Physitian, do deliuer for a certainty, that in Bengala (a Kingdome most potent at this day, seated on the Islands and mouth of the riuer Ganges, in the East Indies) the Moors inhabiting that place, do trauell vnto other firme lands, and the Neighboring Isles, to buy young Children, whose parents being poore and couetous of mony, do sell their sonnes, else these villaines will robbe and steale them thence, and then quite take away, not only Virga, but Parastates also. Such as escape death after this cutting, they educate them very delicately, and afterward sell them to the Persians, and other Mahumetistes, who buy them at a very deare rate, (to wit; three or foure hundred Ducats a piece) to serue as men of their Chambers, in a foule and vnlawfull acquaintance, and also, to haue the charge of their wiues.

The Turkes that dwell in Europe and Asia, do vse the very same castration on such young Boyes as they can seize on in the Christians Countries, & then make sale of them in maner forenamed. As is made manifest by the Historie of the Lord of Villamont, vnder his owne hand in Writing, hee hauing seen the same in the City of Damas in Syria, in the yeare, 1589. hee saith, that a Bascha Lieutenant to the King, hauing married his Daughter, and being desirous for to make some honest present to hir before she departed from him, bethought him selfe of a Russian Slaue that he then had; beautifull, comely, and aged about 18. yeares: him did hee purpose to geld (in full manner before recited) and then to preferre him to his daughter, as one fit to attend her in her Chamber. This deliberation comming vnto the Slaues vnderstanding, he concluded to shunne his Maisters intent, because it was a hazard of life, either in Child or man. And therefore, rather then thus to die, he resolved to kill the Bascha his Maister; before hee would endure so notorious an Infamy. And indeede, hee executed his determination; for, finding his Maister (the second day after his daughters marriage) somewhat ouer wearied with Dauncing, Iusting, and Curuetting his Horse, and his belly well stuffed with Wine and Delicates, finding him fast sleeping on his bed, without speaking a word to any, he entered his Chamber; and with a most magnanimous Courage, gaue him many Woundes with a Knife in his throat. The Bascha awaking, cried to his people for succor: but the Slaue so expeditiously pursued his purpose, that the Bascha was dead, before any of his house could helpe him. Yet when they came, and entered the Chamber, seeing their Lord dead vpon the ground, and hee that did the deede there present, drawing forth their Cimetaries, and ouercome with extremity of fury, they hewed the slaue in more then an hundred pieces.

My conclusion then is, that all people whatsoever, as do vse such a wicked kind of Trafficke, in selling yong Children thus to be abused, are most Barbarous, vnworthy to be called men, and such also as serue their turn in this monstrous sin, because I hold it meere Treason against Nature. As for Origen, Melitus, and other Religious personnes, in acting such violence vpon themselues; I am of the mind of many Learned Diuines, that howsoeuer they did it on a sanctimonious intention; yet their zeal heerein deserued rather reprehension, then any rightfull commendation.

The checke and reproach, which Cublay, Emperour of the Tartars, gaue to the Iewes, Mahumetists and Pagans, mocking them to be Christians, when they had lost the battaile against him.

Finde Written in the Tartarian histories, that in the yeare, 1286. there raigned a most potent and wise Emperour ouer the Tartars, named Cublay, he that sent the great Captaine Bajam, to Conquer the great Prouince of Maugi, where was the admired Countrey of Cinquennie, which was rased by him, and all the Inhabitants slaine, for he killed thirty thousand Christians, against all right of warre, whereof I purpose to speake elsewhere. This Cublay, was a Pagan in Religion, worshipping the the Sunne, Moone, and the Starres, hauing (beside) certaine false Goddes, and (amongest others) one named Natagi, whom he beleued to haue power ouer

the fruits of the Earth, presented to him by diuers figures and Images: and this was the Faith and Religion which his predecessors had left vnto him. He commanded from the greater Armenia, euen to Calicut, a Kingdome in the Easterne Indiaes, insomuch, as then he might say of himselfe, that he was one of the greatest Lords of the world. He kept a verie magnificent Court, and (the most part of his time) in the goodly Citty of Cambalue, where he had a Pallace so great & spacious (standing on a faire riuer side running thorow the city) that he could easily giue entertainment to a thousand men. The City contained in circuite, about eight Leagues, and there was no day in the yeare, but there came thither more then a thousand Waggones laden with costly Cloaths of Silke. He hadde ordinarily twelue thousand Knights for his Guard, three thousand whereof, guarded him three Dayes, and three Nights together; then three thousand other (in like manner) succeeded them, and so (alternatiuely) the whole yeares space: which manner of Guard, he kept as well in the times of peace, as warre, to declare his greatnesse, pompe, and magnificence.

I will not speake of the sumptuous and wonderfull furnishment made for his Table, for it would be too long to rehearse, and almost impossible to be beleued. I will bee silent also, in his Bounty and Liberality, which he dayly ces, but out of his prouident sparinges:

without mollesting his Subiects by nouell Subsidies, or any that dwelt within his Lands, of what Religion soeuer they were; as the Turke hath at all times dealt with the Iewes and Christians, whom he suffers to liue in his Empire, and to vse their owne Religions, but there wanteth no strict or strange conditions. Such as haue seene him, and afterward set downe his behauiour, do credibly affirme, that he neuer offen-deth any man, except it be vnwittingly, and his Lieutenants and Commissaries do the very same. He loueth and supporteth his Subiects, to his vttermost power, and acknowledgeth any fauours or benefits done vnto him. Both he before, and now this other his Successor, haue had, and instantly hath in di-uers of his Lands and Signiories, people of sundry Religions; as Christians, Nestorians, Armenians, Abissines, Gracians, Mahumeristes, Iewes, and Idolaters:

yet haue they liued, and still do to this day, in all freedom of Conscience, without any further mollestation, then they that obserue his owne Religion, permitting them also to builde Temples, wherein to exercise such Seruice as is theirs to them most frequent.

appeared by Sultan Selim, Emperour of Corcutus; caused his Father Baiazeth also to be poysoned. And some few yeares before his owne death, demanding of his Sonnes, which was he that hoped to raigne after him, because hee would leau his empire to him; hee that durst boldly shewe this willingnesse to the State, so that it might be with his consent, hee caused him presently to bee strangled. But another of his Sons, named Sultan Solyman, who raigned not many yeares since, beeing admonished heereof by his Mother, who was well acquainted with the Emperours cruell Nature: refused the dignity wholly, terming himselfe his slaue, and not his son; who liuing after his fathers death, hardly could bee induced to take the charge on him, fearing that his cruell Father might as yet be aliue.

Muly Mahamet, King of Tunis, slew

peror, for Barbarossa had quite expelled him; his owne Son pulled out both his phewes and alliance in consanguinitie, to the greatest Offices and dignities hee could deuise. For, to som he gaue kingdomes, made others Lieutenantes ouer his greatest and goodliest Prouinces; others chiefe Commaunders of his Armies: briefly, in all the best manner hee could bethink him, did he promote his blood, yet liued in all equity and content among his people; yea, he was of so extraordinary humanity, as hee was neuer willing to be seene in any battell, (after hee was created Emperour) but one: yet had hee bin in more then 12. before, so highly did he detest the death of men.

It happened, that a Nephew of his, named Naiam, growing ingratefull, and abusing the bounty of his Vnckle (for he was a young man, aged about thirtie yeates, proude, and ambitious) forgetting the Lawes of Nature, being constituted Governour of many Prouinces, where he hadde mighty possessions to maintaine a Royall estate; without any subiection to yeild an account of his actions; moued by boldnesse and presumption, leauied a powerfull Armie, against his Vnckle and soueraigne Lord the Emperour Cublay, and brought it into open field. Now, to the end, that he might the better assure himself of victory, and to contend with some equality of strength, he found the means to draw a Cosin of his to his faction, another Nephew to the said Emperour, who had conceived a deadly hatred against his Vnckle, in regarde of many reprehensions receiued from him, for diuers insolences committed by him, in the charge of affairs committed to his trust: which made this Caydne (for so was he called) the readier to ioyne with his Kinsman, with presence of himselfe in person, & the aid of sixty thousand men. Following thus their desseigns, they plotted together, to assemble their forces on a certaine plaine, for safer entrance into the Countrey, and speedier inuasion of the Emperour their Vnckle, before hee should apprehend the least surmise thereof. Naiam failed not then, with 40000. men, to be ready at the place appointed: but Caydne, vsing all diligence hee could deuise to keepe his promise, had not as yet his whol number of men so suddenly furnished.

The great ingratitude of Naiam, Nephew, to the Emperour Cublay.

Preparation for hot warre against the Emperour.

This enterprize was quickly discovered to the Emperour Cublay, and with what courage his Nephewes (in publick conspiracy) were thus in open armes against him: He being a wise Prince; and a very worthy Souldiour, was not negligent in opposing himself against their purpose: wherefore, he appointed store of men to keepe the wayes, bridges, and passages, to hinder those two Armies from ioyning together, and that his Nephewes might not bee acquainted with his intentions. Afterward, he called his men of Warre to the Field, which hee had secretly drawne from the nearest parts to Cambalue; where he euer kept his Court. Yet now he had much ado, so suddenly to procure these Souldiours together, because he had sent two great Armies into Countries farre off, for the Conquest of some other new Prouinces. This Army thus made ready, as best means would permit; & so short a respite afforded, went to meet the one Enemy, who was not (as yet) ioynd with Cadne, and they were charged so vnprovided, as they had not leisure to raunge their men in battell array; but the one part were slaine, & the rest put to flight: Some were taken prisoners, amongst whom was Naiam, who being brought before Cublay, they would haue slayne him in his presence; but he commaunded, that he should be wrapped vp in a great cloath of Silke, well bound about with Cords, to the end he might bee smothered therein, which was accordingly executed. But before hee would suffer this to be doone, hee caused the slaughter (then made of his Enemies) to cease, sending them free pardon; & immediately more then forty Ensigns were brought and laid at his feete; in which Ensignes, were the figures of Crosses, such as we see at this day among vs.

Heere is to be vnderstood, that the people thus offending with Naiam; wer almost all Christians, according to the Nestorians, Armenians, or Absines, and he himselfe would haue seemed to bee such; but in very deed, he rather appeared to be of no Religion at al. Heereupon; the Iews, Mahumetists, and Pagans being Conquerours vnder the pay of Cublay, began to shout, scoffe, & make a mockery, at some fiftene thousand Christians, disarmed and brought as prisoners soners before him, expecting when hee would command them to be massacred. But quite contrary, beeing then mounted on a braue and gallant young Elephant, on whose backe his seate royall was most sumptuously carried, silence being made, and their mockeries appeafed: he commanded them all to troope about him, to hear what further he had to say vnto them, and then, in the open Field, he made this Oration.

The Oration of the Emperour

Cublay, to his Prisoners, and all other there presented.

His day I cannot deny, but that the victorie which I haue obtained ouer mine enemies, is by especial grace from my great GOD the Sunne, Moone, and the Starres, abiding in this glorious Vault of Heauen. To whom, I purpose to render thanks to morrow, euen in this open field of battaile, in making Oblation of good and worthy Sacrifices. Wherefore, let the Maisters of the field giue order, that the places be auoided of human bodies heer flaine, as also of the dead Beasts, and decent Altars purposely erected. As for the prisoners, beeing most part of them Christians, whom I behold despoiled of their Armes, shouted at, mocked, despised, and ieaisted at by the Iewes, Mahumetists, and others, vpbraiding them with their God Iesus Christ (who was sometime fastned to a crosse by the said Iewes) for not ayding and helping them to the victory, as wanting such power, because so many of their Ensignes are heere prostrated at my feet: From this present houre forward, I forbid all manner of persons, of what quality or Religion soeuer they be, to vse any more such derision of them, on paine to be deprived of their armes, and well whipped with Roddes at two seuerall times, yea, on the very greatest paine beside, that can be imagined. And so much the rather, because their God Iesus Christ is esteemed of vs, to be one of the verie greatest celestiall Deities, ful of al right, Equity, and Iustice. For, hee knowing these Christians to make warre vniustly against vs, being our subiectes, that neuer gaue them occasion, but reuolted of themselues, and adhered with our enemies: therefore hath hee permitted, that I should win the day, albeit I haue heard him to be called the God of battailes. Ouer and beside this, I pardon al them, that haue followed my vnkinde Nephewes Naiam and Cayduc, as being meerely deceiued by them, in making them beleue, that they were leuiued for my seruice; and therefore I receiue them againe into my protection. Giuing further to vnderstand, that all such as haue any prisoners, they are not to offer the least harme whatsoever, but immediately to set them at liberty, deliuering them their armes, and all other Equipages to them belonging, on paine to passe thorow the daunger of the Army, euen he the proudest that shall make deniall. Our charge imposed on the Christians, is, to pray vnto their God for our prosperity, and to do vs nine moneths Seruice, by taking Wages of vs, in our instant Warre against the King of Nixamora; who denieth to pay vs our tribute and striues to equall himselfe with our Greatnesse.

In regard of this Edict, the Christians had gentle vsage, especially, of the Iewes, who persecuted the Christians more (where they got superiority) then any other whatsoever. Euery man may iudge by this worthy deede, that Cublay was a very generous & vertuous Prince, full of piety, in acknowledging, that his victorious battels, proceeded of God, and not of men. It was neuer heard, that Alexander the Great, who wonne no meane store of battailes, with an infinit number of goodly strong Citties; that euer he rendred thanks to God, or (at the least) vnto his own Gods, in whom he pretended to haue some confidence. Oftentimes he consulted with profane Priests and Oracles, to know if he should be Monarch of the whole vniuerse, and whether he were the Sonne of Iupiter, or no, with diuers other such like ydle vanities. At length, hee would needs make men to adore him; Nay, there are some do write, that he exacted it vpon compulsion, but he liued not long after these ambitious follies had so blinded his

Iulius Caesar likewise, a famous Captaine, of admirable great spirit, & most expert in many singular sciences, yet he tooke this fond conceit of himselfe (seeing he had obtained the Roman Empire by Armes) that he had more in him the meer humanity, by his actions, perswading himself, that he was issued (in race) from the Gods, by meere alliance to Venus. Which being perceiued by diuers Princes, and many of the Commonweale also, coueting to please him in his ambitious arrogancy; they Dedicated Temples to him; yea, some Sacrificed vnto him. As yet at this day is to be discerned at Sydon, a City of Phœnicia, wher it is insculpt vpon the gate, Diuo Iulio Casari dicatum; Consecrated to Iulius Caesar the God. And on a Collome (which is placed on a little Mountaine, at the very mouth of the Euxine Sea, exposed on all sides to the violence of the Waues) containing eighteen foot in length, and eight and an halfe in Circumference, on the Bases of the Piller was Engrauen this Verse:

Caesar tantus erat, qd. nullus maior in orbē: that is, Caesar was so great, and of such power, as he might tearme himselfe the chiefe and most excellent of all Men in the world. It is very well knowne, that it was himselfe that caused this Inscription there to be engrauen. Yet (for all this) it was neuer knowne, that euer he acknowledged his victories for to come from God: for he reigned not long, & lesse then Alexander, because hee was murdred in the Senat house.

Charles, the fift Emperour of that Name, hauing won a great and memorable battaile against the Sectaries in Germany; and namely, against the Saxon, the foute and twenty day of Aprill, Anno Dom. 1547. would not proudly say, as Iulius Caesar did, when hee conquered Pompey the Great, and wrote these three words to the Romain Senate; Veni, Vidi, Vici. But Charles, full of true pietie, and well knowing, that victories descended from on high, said; Veni, Vidi, & Dominus Deus meus vicit, to wit; I came, I saw, but it was God my Lord that Conquered.

The History of the Emperor Cublay, may make som Christian Princes blushi with shame, who hauing warre against others of the same Law, Faith, and Religion, will not yet (in their victories) pardon their enemies, but put them all to the edge of the Sword. Neither will they acknowledge God to be Authour of their victories, but attribute all vnto their own strength and magnanimitie: wherein this blinded Prince (deprived of the true Knowledge of God, Cublay a Pagan, Emperour of the Tartarians) made it a great scruple to offend.

CHAP. IX.

From whence the name of Sarazins came at the first, and what people they haue continued, euen to this day.

have noted a verie great error, committed by Sabellicus, Blondus, the Tyrian Byshop, Volaterranus, and many other graue authors, who (in their workes) haue tearmed the Mahometists or Turkes, to bee Sarazins: for they neuer knew any such name, neither were at any time so caled, but only Musulmans, which is as much to say, as a people faithfull in their Law or Religion. Others, who thought their Iudgement to be much more pregnant, dared to say, that this name of Sarrazin, came of Sarra, the wife of Abraham, of whose race, the great Prophet Mahomet (inuentor and deuiser of their Religion and Lawes, held euen to this day by the Sarazins and Turkes) they affirme to bee descended. But this coniecture is not warrantable, because they rather coueted to be called Agarians, in regarde of Agar, Handmaid to Sarra; and Mother of Ismael: Or else Ismaelites; in iudging themselves to be yssued of the sayde Ismael, Bastard sonne to the fore-named Abraham.

But let vs leaue these false Etimologies, which neither carry, or can yeelde any true likely-hood, and come to the very Original of the name Sarrazin. The error grew from hence, that some short while before Mahomet, or Muhamet (as others terme him) arose, and began to extend himselfe as well towards Suria, as Persia: there liued in the rocky Arabia and and Idumea, certaine Arabes, who made their abode and dwelling (and yet do to this day) vnder little Tentes or enclosures, and had no other trade or maintenance for their liuing, but by Thefts & Robberies, which they daily exercisid vpon all passengers, were they Turkes, Christians, Pagans, or whatsoever. Of which Robbers and Theeues, the country could neuer be freed, neither yet can be to this day; as such doe faithfully affirm, who haue trauailed on pilgrimage to Mount Sinai, at Ierusalem. And the Turkes themselues do confes, that when deuotion drew them foorth on pilgrimage, to the City of Medina al Nabi, that is, the City of the Prophet, scituate in Arabia Fœlix, where the Sepulchre of Mahomet is; and when likewise they do yet passe through the very greatest solitudes and deserts (as many times the Christians doe:) They finde them to be peopled with these kinds of Theeues, as formerly hath been saide, who name themselues Sarracenis, not in regard of Religion or blood; but by an auncient appellation of the sayde people; of whome, Ptolomy maketh mention, and saith, that their liuing is in Idumea.

Amianus Marcellinus, in the History of Iulian the Apostate Emperour, makes a Description of them, and saith: Those places (more then two hundred yeares before the Originall of Mahomet, or of his Alchoran) were fully furnished with the Sarrazins; yea, so was Assyria afterward, euen so farre as the Cataractes of Nylus, or the Kingdome of Prester Iohn, where they vsed the same courses, violences, and Thefts, vpon Merchants & Inhabitants of the neighboring Countries, according as the Arabes or Alarbes do at this day. Whereuppon, because that their chiefe habitation was in the Deserts and Mountaines, which are in Arabia, and the adiacent quarters or Countries, as Chaldea, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Suria, and Egipt, when the Arabes arose with their new Religion, and had frequented the foresaid Regions: The nearer Countries supposed, that these people were those former Sarrazins, by ignorance of their Language, as also by the rashnes of some writers, who liued then in Suria, & since that time in Spain, pretending to haue good knowledge of those people, and therefore continually then called them Sarrazins.

Moreouer, to confirme that vain appellation, those Interpreters in Spaine, who (by commandement of S. Bernard) were appointed to interpret the Alchoran; in euery place where they founde the vocable, Mulfulman (which is as much to say in the Arabian tongue, as Peaceable and faithfull towards God) they translated the same Sarracenis, or Sarrazins. This Mulfulman then is the word, whereby all (that belceue in the Alchoran) will be called: whither they be Arabes, Syrians, Persians, Tartares, Turkes, or Moores. Whosoever then, woulde enter into any peaceable and Friendly Conference with them (albeit, none do hate their name more then the Turkes) must call them Mulfulmans, as we doe our selues Christians, or faithfull people. So are they all named, by the Author of the Ismael, or Ismaeliticke race, & by their Bastard Prophet. After our manner, & in respect of religion, they terme a man Mulfulman, and a woman Mulfulmina, or Mulfulminet; albeit, some say Musim, by a corrupt pronounciation, as we may conceiue by our selues, who do vse to call those disfigured Wanderers, that walke among vs with deformed faces, and long ill-fauoured lockes, vsing all subtle Thefts, Pilferies, and Legier du maines they can deuise; wee Nick-name to be Sarrazins, Egiptians, or Gypsies.

I thus conclude then, that when Historians Write, that the Sarrazins inuaded and made vse of Rhodes; Next, of Thrace, then of Italy, Spaine, and other Countries: it is to be vnderstood of the Orientall people & Affricans, that were of the Mahometane Religion; because they vsed the selfesame Cruelties, thefts and Robberies, as the Sarrazins of rocky Arabia did. And to speake truly, all Europe would (at this instant) haue bin haunted with those people, if they had not bin formerly expelled and spoyled. It remaineth yet fresh in memory, that the Great Grand-father to Phillip King of Spaine (not long since deceased) named Ferdinand, expelled them out of the Kingdome of Granacla, with their King called Melen; and he bestowed six whole yeares together in stout warres, onely for soyling them. And then the Dominion, which the Sarrazins and Moores

At what time the Sarrazins were expelled out of Spain, by king Ferdinand.

Moores held in Spain, had finall Conclusion. After which time, those faithlesse Mahumetists, durst neuer presume any more vpon Spain, where they had held the kingdom of Granado, for the space of 800. yeares.

Before the sayd Ferdinand, King Alphon- sus, in the yeare of our Lord, 1233. slew in diuers places, aboue 200000. of the, euen when they helde strong Castles, Forts, and Cities in Spain, all which he forced them to forsake, and since then, they haue bin vtterly ruined. Henric the Emperor made another great massacre of them in Italy, in the yeare of Christ, 1010. expelling them wholly out of that Country. Among the Sarrazins, there were not onely generous persons, but likewise some men of great learning, as Auicen, Mesius, Isaac, Mansbr, Auerroes, and many others.

Now, as all things haue their vicissitude and alteration by courses; so, after that the Sarrazins had raigned in Affrica, and partly in Europe, about the space of 800. yeares, there came a people from diuers parts of Scythia (which at this day we call Turkes) who in lesse then 200. yeares, ouercame in armes those people called Sarrazins, with many other christians beside, not onely in Asia, but also in Europe and Affrica. And albeit, those Turks were of the same religion; to wit, Mahumetists: yet did they not abstaine from vexing and troubling them vvith War, euen as they did the Christians. For in the yeare, 1012. they tooke Ierusalem, and all Iudea: but the Sarrazins of Egypt recouered them againe, and held them for 300. yeares after. Neuerthelesse, they were yet againe expelled thence, in the yeare, 1517. by the Turks; the Sarrazins loosing then, not only Palestine, and the Holy-land; but likewise Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and the very same Country of Idumea; whereas the Sarrazins had their Originall; and are there subiect to the Turks now at this instant. For Campson (their King) lost the day against Selim, Emperour of the Turkes, and Tomombeus his successour, beeing next chosen their King in his place: but he was taken, and (afterward) most ignominiously strangled in the Gravnd-Cayre, the very principall City of Egypt. Where we may behold the end of the Sarrazins; not any part of them now re-mayning, except a few in the place forenamed, who continue in base seruility to the Turkes.

This brieft discourse, may giue vs to vnderstand, that Sarrazins were not at all such as are called Mahumetists: but they that hadde their beginning in the Countries of Idumea; and the Desert of rocky Arabia, with all those that (being ioyned with them) commaunded vnder them in diuers Countries, bringing other Nations likewise in subiection to them by Armes, vntil such time, as they wer exterminated by the people, whose countries they vniustly vsurped by war, & also at length, by the Turks, although they be of the same religion. For war is maintayned among them, onely for desire of souerainty and ambition: which is not so commendable among vs that are Christians; or that we should be sick of such a bad disease.

Sarrazins began onely in Idumea, and none now remaining but only there.

Of the Title or name of Seruant, slaue, Bond-slaues, and such like. Their Original, and how they were vsed in elder times, and are at this present.

Orasmuch as in our time, we haue so great speech of the ouer-abounding multitude of captiues or Slaues, which the Turks & Moores lead away out of Christian Countries, wherof the French seem to haue no feeling at all; because such a case concernes not them, in regard of their good policy & order, by their most Christian King's care, & his counsel: yet notwithstanding such occasiō may heerafter happen; that if euer God should suffer his Mahometan enemy to preuail so far, as he hath done else-where; they would then acknowledge by most wofull experience, what the condition of captiues & Bondslaues is, wherof I purpose to discourse in this Chapter. And to begin at the ancientnesse of slaues or Bondmen, it would be somewhat hard to assure; at what time they first began to be so called and vsed. because we find in the sacred scriptures; that Abraham had no other seruants but

The quality and condition of a Slaue.

How the word Captiue or Slaue is to be vnderstood

Ius Gentium.

Fourseuerall waies wherby a man may become a slaue

Slaues, as well male as female, & (with- all) had a great number of them. Wher- by may bee presumed, that (long time before) there was such a seruile condi- tion: for, according to the supputation of Carion, the Germaine Cosmographer, A- braham lived in the yeare of the World, 2047. Their Originall then (vndoubted- ly) proceeded of wars, wherin the victor vsurped al right of domination ouer the vanquished.

The Romans called a Slaue or Captiue Seruum, as we in our Language entitle a Seruant, because he that was taken in the wars, was kept and guarded. And then, if he was not put to his ransome, (according as hee pleased, into whose power he was fahn, or else, if he bought him) he remaind as his slaue or seruant, and he might smite, beate, and kill him. Moreouer, he could not possesse any thing, that was in his Maisters charge & keeping, albeit he wer extracted by race Royall, noble, or ignoble. For the word Slaue, Seruant, or Captiue, it is to bee vnderstood, not onely of such as are taken in Land-battels, or Nauall skirmi- shes, encounters, surprizal of Citties, Townes, or like places; but likewise, al those that can bee, and are seized on in the enemies Countrey, although they be Infants sucking at the breast, or of greater yeares; Women with Childe, and the fruit in their wombes, alwayes were, and yet are to this day, subiect to seruitude. This is thus doone by the Law of Nations, and al Nations in for- mer times vsed the same, and so is it stil in vse, except it be in case of one and the same Religion.

One might be made a Slaue (as yet we see in all the East, & in Affrica, Spain, Italy, Poland, Moscouia, Germany, and in other Prouinces obserued, except in warring against people of one religion) foure manner of wayes. The first, was by War; the second, when he was the Son of a woman slaue; the third, when any man sold him, to participate in the price of his vendition, which oft times is done in a desperate manner, not ha- uing any meanes of liuing, or when a man will foolishly expose his own free- dome to bondage. There are too many at this day so hot of Nature, as, if they could, they would do the like; witnesse such, as leaue themselues neither lands, goods, nor Kindred. The fourth man- ner, was by crime and offence, when a man had not where-withall to satisfie the party offended; then he was sold, if the crime committed, required such a punishment.

It is a question, but (indeede) mine owne, whether it bee better to make a prisoner (taken in Warre) a slaue, or to kil him, according to the custom of Na- tions? I answer, that it seemeth more humain and ciuill, to take a prisoner (in war) in condition of a slaue; then to kill him, although it be in a mans power to do it, and without any impunity. For, by the Law of God & Nature, it is for- bidden to kil, but not to be made a slaue; because it appeareth that Moses permit- ted it. In like manner, it is the proprietie of a Wise or discreet man, to rule and gouerne his slaue or Bondman humain- ly; albeit it were much better for some, to be slaine outright at the very instant, then to fall into some mens handes, and liue in their subiection. The paines and torments which they suffer, & must do, God best knoweth how long, wee pur- pose to speake of heereafter. For, heere I would demaund another Question, to wit; whether it be beneficiall to a com- monwealth, to haue Slaues, or not?

How dangerous it is to a Common- weal or Kingdom, to haue a great num- ber of slaues, especially, if they can compasse the meanes to league & com- bine themselues: may be read in the Romaine Histories, much more then euer they dreamt of, and to the maine hazard of their whole estate. For they could not be hindred, but that they arose tho- roughout all Italy, to the number of threescore thousand, and vnder the con- duct of one Spartacus, they vanquished the Romans in three fought battels. It is most certain, that there was then in the field: ten slaues for one free-man. Silla made an Ediēt, that euery slaue that did bring the head of his Maister, should be enfranchised, to wit; of euery such man as had followed the part of Caius Mari- us, against him; which very many did. Now, it is not to be doubted, but that how many slaues soeuer wer in the bat- taile; as many enemies at home had they in their families. At such time as the persecutions began to grow hot against the Christians in the Primitiue church, there there was no Maister that durst become a Christian, except with the hazzard of his life, for hee must either enfranchise his slaues, or else they wold accuse him.

The power of the Sarrazins in Arabia, tooke first Originall, when as a Captain named Homar, Lieutenant to Mahomet, had promised Liberty to such Slaues as would follow him. Heereon he drew so great a number to him; as (in few years) they made them-selues Lordes of the East. For the word [Libertie,] and fame of the Conquestes made by the Slaues, enflamed the mindes of all them in Europe, and raysed them vppe in Armes. First of all in Spain, in the yeare, 781. Afterward, in the Kingdome of France, in the times of Charlemaigne, and Lewes the Pittifull, as may be gathered by the Edicts then made, against the Conspiracies of Slaues. Then Lotharius, the Sonne of Lewes, after he hadde lost two Battailles which he waged against his Bretheren, re-called the Slaues to his ayde, and they (soone after) began to pursue their Maisters; in the yeare, eight hundred fifty two: which fierce fire, suddenly kindled in Germanie; also, where the Slaues entering into Armes, shooke the estate both of the Citties & Princes; yea, the King of the Allemaignes was faine to assemble all his forces, to break the Gordian knot of this strange combination.

I remember the History of a Roman Senator, who was in very great perrill of his life, by beeing accused by one of his Slaues, before the Emperour Tyberius, to wit; that the Image of Tyberius, which was engrauen on a Ring that the Senatour wore in his finger, had touched the Urinall as hee was making water; and this was taken for an Offence of High-treason, such was the extreame Tyranny and light beleefe of the Emperour Tyberius.

In like manner, there haue bin many of later times, that murdered their Maisters, and committed other monstrous villanies, as not long since a slaue Moore did, in the Isle of Maiorica. This damned Villaine, hauing beene beaten by his Maister, for some notorious Offence, watching his opportunity for reuenge, first violated the honour of his Mittris, then threw two of hir children forth at the Castle window, wherein he made vse of this aduantage, locking the doors fast against his Maister, who stood without, and beheld this wofull spectacle. At last, he made his Maister to cut off his owne Nose, to saue the youngest child that yet remained aliue: For, the slaue had sworn, that if he would cut off his nose, he would not hurt the Infant. No sooner had the Maister acted this cruelty on himselfe, but the perfidious slaue Moore, cutting the childes throat, threw it down to the other, & then cast himselfe headlong after, in a villanous brauery. I could aledge infinit other examples, if I were so minded; but in regard of breuity, I wil entreat the Reader to rest satisfied with these.

Behold then what a danger it is, to be serued with slaues, and how a multitude of them, haue salne out to be the ruine of Countries; & as it is not good to haue many, so is it very behoouefull, to see that no wher they exceed the free. Wherefore it is very conuenient to manumise them, or els to vse them gently, to beget rather loue then hatred of the, not vrging them to desperat actions vnbeseming their duty; training them vp rather in mechanicall exercises (as was ordayned by Licurgus & Numa Pompilius) then in any sturdy or robust busines, besitting Armes. And in truth, the greater part of such Bondmen or slaues, wer then instructed in Mechanick Atts; for some of them were Shoo makers, Taylers, Carpenters, Smiths, Cloathiers, Ship-wrights, Masons, Gold-Smiths, Ioiners, & such like honest trades. They were also imployed by straungers, because they should return the gain which they made by their labor, to their Maisters. And that it should be so, Cato the Censor, who was so conscientious, and had about him 200. slaues, hee contented him-selue with the profites that (by them) came to him, and the Reuenues of a small Countrey Farme which he had; and that he sold to them backe againe, at an easie price, when hee beheld them to decline by age, because by their paine and endeour he at first purchast it.

Crassius, one of the richest Roman Citizens that euer was before or after him, had ordinarily five hundred very profitable Slaues, of diuers employments, beside such as he kept in his house. They enriched their Maister (within very few yeares) only by their gaines : for great account (in times past) was made of such a settled estate, and it was helde the very best assurance of inheritance, that a man could then leaue to his heires. And in these dayes, such as are vnder the Turkes Dominion, do vse the very same kind of benefiting, for he that hath foure or fve Slaves, strong, healthful, and lusty; attaineth to great riches by them. Beside, many are much better serued by them, then by their mercenary seruants; that leaue them at their owne pleasure, when these other dare not do so.

The Parthians vsed not to intreat their slaves vngently, but accounted of them as their owne Children; yet notwithstanding, they were prohibited from infranchising them. They multiplied in such aboundant manner, as, in all their Army, there was found but foure hundred and fifty free men. Florus saith, that the Romans did set at liberty eight thousand Slaves, whom they caused to bear Armes, in regard of the great losse they had receiued in the battell at Cannas, against Hannibal, and they did great seruice to the Commonwealth. Comming now to our instant daies, to speak what maner of vsage they indure; I am silent, and must dumbly let slip the execrable Villanies (without all dread of punishment) inflicted on them, of whatsoever sex they be: only I will discourse of other matters belonging to them, and according as my instant subiect grants me leaue.

So soone as such a one was falne into his enemies hand, be it of which side it should so happen; if he might not be rendred back vpon exchange, or put to his ransom, or be bought again as a captiue: then was the prisoners head presently shauen, and after marked with a hot iron on the arme, but more commonly in the forehead. If he wer of stature, he was then set to keep horses, work in the fields, Till the grounds; but very badly clothed, euen as the poor toiling slaves are in the gallies. Many times they haue bin employed in very vnclean Offices, as to empty Priuies, & to hold the vrinall. Witnes a Celt (that is, one born in Gaul) whom his new Maister set to holde the stoole wherein he auoided his Excrements, which made him say; I will make thee look on me whom thou hast bought, in much better maner. So getting vp to the house top, threw himselfe downe, and there died, affecting rather any kinde of death, then to do such vilanous seruices. Maisters euermore had the life & death of their slaves in their power, albeit Tyberius would not permit it; but rather suffred slaves to bring their Maisters to the iudgement bar, for their hard vsage, & he that killed his slave, was accounted as a murderer. The like ordained Nero, Adrian, & others; but it was neuer obserued, or (at least) it lasted but a while.

They were beaten (in those times) as oft as their Maisters pleased, & because they would not do it themselues, they had certain houses out of the city, wher men were purposely appointed and waged, to torment and beat the with hard knotted cords, knagged stauces, or certaine Bodkins, wherewith they would pierce into their bodies, euen in such places as wer most sensible; & this must be done as oft as the Maister commanded, standing by, beside good store of other torments. These men had for each slave they thus tortured, a certain sum of mony, euen as Hangmen haue; and either they did it in their Maisters presence, or some that were (by them) appointed to see it done. Many of them had their lips and Nostrils slit vppe, if they appeared to be short winded, euen as now adayes we deale with Horsses. The Emperour Adrian, a very humane Prince, who gouerned in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 120. returning one day from the fields, chanced to passe by the place where these cruelties were exercised; and buying all them that were thus to be tormented, bestowed their Liberty instantly on them.

If it hapned that a Master was slain in his house, about som quarrell, or otherwise, and by whomsoever, all his slaves were presently put to death. As it came to passe, by reason of a murder committed on the person of the great Prouost of Rome; when question was made, of putting al his slaves to death, according (saith Tacitus) to the ancient Custome. The vulgar people, who wer (the more part of them) enfranchised men, began to be moued, because it was wel inough knowne who was the murtherer; and yet notwithstanding, foure hundered innocents innocents should therefore suffer death. The matter being debated in the Senat, it was there concluded, that the custom must be kept; and thereupon, all the Slaues were put to death. I spare to speak of the murder of slaues, who were constrained to kill one another at Arènes, and then their Bodies were exposed to Beasts: all being done to delight the people, and for a custome in contempt of death.

The Emperor Adrian, of whom we haue already spoken, being in some choller, threwe an engrauen Iron at one of his Slaues, which Iron (vnhappily) hee had then in his hand; the slaue (not hearing what his Lord had commaunded him) by misfortune hadde this his eye smitten out. The Emperour calling the Slaue to him, said; He was infinitely sorry for the losse of his eye, and therefore desired him, to ask whatsoeuer he wold in recompence, and it should be granted him. The Slaue made answer, I can demand nothing of such worth, or thou grant it, that can equall the value of the eye I haue lost. Other Maisters neuer shewed such humanity in Nature, but rather were of much steerner cruelty: As Flaminius the Senatour, who caused one of his best slaues to bee slaine, without any other cause, but to please his Ingle boy (which he kept for Sodomy) who saide, that hee neuer saw a man slaine. At the sledge of Jerusalem, in one day, there was slaine twenty thousand Iewish slaues, because a Soldiour had espied Golde in the intrailles of a Jew, who had bin killed before, by the passage of a Sworde quite thorough his body. Hee aduertising his Companions heereof, the Roman Soldiers, they did forthwith cut the throats of all their Slaues that were Iewes, and searched into their Bowelles and Intestines, to see if there they could finde any Gold.

Augustus Caesar, banquetting one day with Asinius Pollio, his very great friend, a yong Slaue that waited on the Table, chaunced to breake a Glasse, whereof Pollio hauing notice, commaunded him presently to be cast into a Pond, where he kept certaine Murenes (which are Fishes of two or three cubits long, vvith very sharpe Teeth) to bee deuoured by those Fishes. The poore Slaue, threwe himselfe at the feet of Augustus, to entreat, not to saue his life, for hee confessed that he had deserued death, in breaking a Glasse that his Maister so esteemed: but only, that he would chaunge the torment to some other. Augustus would not so much as moue Pollio therein: Whereupon, the Slaue was thrown into the Pond, and miserably torne in pieces, as Seneca affirmeth. The Lacedemonians beholding their Slaues to multiply in great numbers; made a leauy among them of three thousand men, the very ablest that could be found, and pretending to release their bondage, in one night they were all slaine, without any knowledge what was become of them.

The Grecians, Spaniards, and Allemaignes, vsed the same manner of behaviour to their Slaues, as the Romans did. Iulius Caesar declareth, that the Gaules would Sacrifice their slaues, and throw a great number of them into the Fire, when the Bodies of their deceased Maisters were to be burnt. The Allemaignes exceeding these Cruelties, if it hapned that their slaues, either by sicknes, wearinesse, or famishment, could not follow them in their iournies; they would cut off their Feet, & so leaue them staruing to death. We wil heere end this Chapter, least wee should tire the Reader with length, and barbarous Cruelties. Now we will speake of Slaues among the Turkes, and what is become of the ancient race of slaues; also, how long it is since the Mahometans and Christians had no Slaues.

CHAP. XI.

Of Slaues made by the Turkes and Mahometanes. Also, how the race of the ancient Christian Slaues became lost.

Mahomet, first Inuenter and Father of the Alchoran religion, to attract people enow to his cursed sect (which he planted by armes) ordained, that not any Mulsulman, or such as made profession of Religion, should be a slaue, though he were taken in war, or otherwise, which hath bin seriously obserued, from the year, 742. to this present.

sent. Yet this was not kept by the Christians, who hauing Warre one against another, vsed their captiues and slaues, according as the ROMANS did. But the Pastors in the Christian Church preached so zealously, & so successfully, that they perswaded them (in example and imitation of the Sarazins and Mahometans) that they would make no slaues on eyther side, being al of one religion. We haue already spoken sufficiently, what fauor the slaues found among the Romaines, let vs now cast an eye, & note how the Turkes do handle vs, if it were our hard fortune to fal (in the like case) among them.

The vsage of christian slaues in diuers Nations.

It is most certaine, that all Christians who happen to bee slaues to the Turke, Persian, Tartare, Jew, Moore, or Arabe, as wel in the East, as in other places, aswel by right of war, as otherwise; bee they sucking children, Boyes, youths, men, old, or young, women or maids: they take the like authority ouer them, as on their beasts. Nay more, there are some people following the warres, that make no other benefit or traffick, but onely of Christian slaues; for they make triple commodity of their mony, because soldiers hastily sel them at indiffrent rates; then afterward, they make sale of them in Countries and Citties, where they know that they are very highly desired and sought after. A yong man of 18. or 20. yeares of Age, is now adaies sold for 25. Ducats. A young Infant, aged three or foure years, at five Ducats, Women and Maids are not sold so cheape. And before they buy them, they are oftentimes seene stark naked, to obserue whether they haue any imperfection on their bodies. Afterward, they look in their monthes, to see whether they haue good Teeth, & of what age they are. Finally, they are very dilligent and carefull in obseruing their Countenances; for, they that make Trafficke of Slaues, are commonly verie skilfull in Physiognomie.

The labour & dieting of their slaues, &
how they goe apparrelled.

For the most part, men are destenied (as it were) to delue in the erth, after such order as they are commanded, and with Instruments accordingly. Daily are they fed with course, and scarce holsom Bred, & but litle therof neither, so much as they think wil content nature, and no other drink haue they then Water. For clothing, they haue commonly Linnen breeches, a Doublet or Jacket of course cloath, of a blew or redde colour; their legs and feete bare; they lie on the hard ground, and somtimes in ditches, dragging a heauy Ladder after each one, lest desperately they shoulde kill their Masters, or set their houses on fire. They are beaten & tormented at all inoments of time, euen when the toy tickles the Masters head, iustly or vniustly, commonly with a stiffe rounde Cudgell, sparing no place of the body. Their Heades are shaued, and all other parts where anie haire groweth, which is obserued euery second month. There are some that allow them to learne occupations, & let them forth at daily hire, to serue as best they can be imployed, either in helping Masons, Carpenters, & such like labors.

As for female slaues, they serue for all busineses that they please to vse them in. Oftentimes (if they like them) they make them their Concubines, & when they grow weary of them, they eyther sell them away to others, or suffer them to attend the household affaires, & wait on their Mistresses. Heer is to be noted, that they are not compeld to alter their Religion, except they bee so bold, as to enter into their Mosquees or temples, or vse any wordes contemptibly of their Alchoran, or wound any of their Mahometan Religion: then, such an offender must be put to death, or else be forced to become of their Religion. And although they be Circumcised, and Mulsulmans, yet are they not therefore released; but perhappes they shall bee the gentlier vsed. For this cause, if Christians, warring against the Turkes, happen in their fights (either by land or Sea) to surprize any of these Christian renegadoes, they vse them vilely, knowing that (except they pleased) they wer not constrained to change their religion. And the better to know such, they serch their secret members; and finding the sign of their abiuration; they are handled like turkish slaues, & the oftner bastonaded. If a Christian or Jew liuing among the, shall haue carnal knowledg of a woman Turk; he must either die, or change his religion. In some places, he is sold in the open Market for the Princes profite, if he haue not bin circumcised. Heere I might telye, that some haue hapned on kinde

haue seene some so fortunate; but it fals out very rarely. Bellonius saith, that a Slaue in Turkey, might cite his Maister before the Iudge, to tell him for how long time he should serue him, or else, what summe of Money he would accept for his ransome. And the Slaue making a lawfull Act of the Iudges ordination; the Authour affirmeth, that he hath seene some (by this meanes) to gaine their freedome. This is to be vn-derstood, among the Burgesses in Cit-ties, or Field-labourers: But such as fall into the handes of Pyrats, or of great & powerfull Lordes, they very hardly attaine to liberty.

Furthermore, this is very certaine;
that young Male Children, either Sons cut off both Virga and the Testicles; by which kinde of incision, very many dye:

But such as haue the fortune to escape;
they sell them at an hundred, or two they grow greater, and come to apt watchfull and circumspect.) If hee be found to haue no lawfull passe-porte, then is hee stayed; and brought backe to his Maister, paying the Wine, that is, a certaine summe of Money: but afterward hee is very cruelly handled.

A Gentleman of Gascoigne, returning out of these countries but a while since, ria* two Spaniard Slaues, empaled or broached on stakes aliue and speaking:

because, that beeing Slaues, they vsed with many blowes of a Bastonnado.

Some yet (more fortunately) haue ad-uentured, by conference of sixe or seauen Slaues together, that (by diuing into the Sea, or some neere adioyning Ri-uer) could closely keep themselues hid all the day time, and afterward tranaile (with no mean hast) all the night. Then comming to some great Riuers vpon the Frontiers, haue made meanes to breake downe some branches of Trees, and making thereof a floatage to carry meanes some haue been known to saue ner some slaues haue

The Tartars, after their Slaues haue serued them seauen yeares, they do en-franchise them; provided, that they depart out of the Countrey. The Jewes are prohibited, to detaine any Christian for a Slaue, dwelling on the Confines, or in the Countries subiect to Christian Princes or Common-weales: but such they may take, inhabiting in the Turkes Territories; or others of the Mahome-tane Religion; if they bee none of the Turkes Slaues, and so knowne to be in their Countrey. The Jewes yet herein are more wicked then the Mahometans, who compell no Man at any time to alter his Religion; yet they doe it. And albeit they haue done so, they remaine (neuerthelesse) as Slaues with them stil.
Our Christians now adaiies perceiuing, that (in imitation of the Jewes) the Turkes and Mahometans will not enfranchise their Slaues, although they submit to their Religion: the very same course keepe they, and to speake truth, the most part doe it not, because they finde thereby not any iot of better v-sage.

tars* release

ligion admits

This is the reason; that the Hungarians, Transiluanians, Polonians, Bohemians, Germanes, Italians, Spaniards, Danes, and other people in these daies, doe not en-franchise their Slaues, for their alteration of Religion. France onely carrieth this priuiledge, that any Slaue treading on that ground, is forth-with enfranchised; as it was sentenced by an ancient Arrest of the Court, against an Am-bassadour. Bodin writes, that he saw at Tholossa,

Any Slaue, comming into France, is franchised.

A Shippe of Slaues Moores brought to Burdeaux.

Thioffa, a Geneway Gentle-man, who was there compelled to enfranchise a Slaue, which he had bought in Spaine. It happened, not many yeares since, that there arriued at Burdeaux (by Sea) a Ship laden with Moores-Slaues, of both Sexes, which a Marchant-Stranger had brought thither, in hope there to make good sale of them. Knowledge heereof being brought to the Lordes then in Parliament, they forth-with dismissed them, and gaue them free liberty. So they went to get dwelling, some in one place, some in another, wher they could finde best meanes of entertainment: And this (in mine opinion) proceeded from most equitable conscience.

What became of the Slaues in elder times

Now let vs see what became of the Slaues in former times, that were among our ancient Christians, and how the race of them became lost; in regard that their Children, and all such as descended of them, were alwaies of seruite condition, if they were not enfranchised by good will of their Maisters. It is to be vnderstood, that (by little and little) Europe ranked it selfe to the Christian Religion, and that the Bishoppes and Fathers in the Church, ordinarily Preached wholly Charity, perswading them (for saluation of their own soules) not to euill-entreat their Slaues, but rather to giue them liberty & enfranchisement: considering, that all Christians (euen by Baptisme) were freed from seruitude, and were their Brethren in our Lord Iesus Christ. By which, and such like holy remonstrances (continued for some length of time) the people began to lend attention thereto; and (by slow steppes or degrees) as well in respect of brotherly loue, as (peradventure) feare of reuolt, which the Slaues then might make, as in former times they had done; they granted them freedome, but let vs note how.

All Christians freed from seruitude by Baptisme.

The manner of enfranchising those Slaues, and vpon what conditions to their Patrones.

They vsed in those daies, to let their Slaues haue the tillage & husbandry of their Lands, and they matching in marriage with Women of their owne condition, gaue them speciall charge, to giue their Patrones (yearely) diuers kinds of Graine; as Oates, Wheat, Ric, Mony, and Poultry: beside all which, they were taxable for the foure accustomed times, for their Patrones or Lords prouision then, euen as if they were their Prisoners taken in Warre. If the Patrones chanced to mary their daughters; If they vnderooke any voyage beyond the Seas, against the Sarrazins; If they tooke the order of Knighthood, &c. then were these Seruants tyed to sundry kinds of seruices to their Lords. Moreouer, many were charged by their Leases and Couenants, to goe trauaile personally for their Lordes, when they should haue warning thereof, at certain daies limitation. Some found them Wine at their owne expences, and brought it home to their Houses with their Beasts. Some mowed their Meddowes; cleansed the Ditches of their Castles; twisted their spinning; and furnished them with so much Wood, (in part, or wholly) as they should burn for necessary vse. Nor could they alienate the Landes and Inheritances giuen them, but onely by consent of their Patrones: To whom, whatsoever they acquired or purchased out of their Iurisdiccions, or in the same; wholly returned, in case they had no Children: and both they and their Childrens children, were strictly bound to all these conditions. They ought not to leape, dance, or vse any kind of publique reioycing, during the whole yeare, wherein their Patron or his Wife deceased. In brieft, there were many seruitudes willingly accepted by the, some more, some lesse, whereto they yood bound. But the Patron had no power to smite, kill, or molest his Vassaile: for, if he fulfilled not the duties imposed, then should he bring him to open Iustice.

What was to be done at the Seruants own charges, &c.

Patrones had no authority to beat or kill their seruants

For such as went away from their Lords.

Lawes for some kinde of Seruants.

And albeit, one of this seruite condition, should depart, and dwell for euer out of his Lords land: yet notwithstanding, both he and his held, and still should hold the same estate of seruitude; if he did not compound by Money, or compasse (by speciall grace of his Lord) that he might be enfranchised. In many places, if the Seruant (in iudgement) did cut his Girdle, he quitted all his goods, as well present, as to come, or pretended euer to haue & possesse in his country. If then he went and dwelt in a place free, and not subiect to villanage; he was at liberty, and whatsoever he attained vnto afterward; he might dispose of to whom he pleased, not hauing any Children of his owne. Likewise, if a man of free or noble condition, either bought, or happened to haue adiudged him any goods in a Land of seruile quality; he was not therby made a Seruant: but if he chanced to dye without Children, the goods which he possessed in that Land, came to the Lorde and Patrone, but not any goods which he had else-where. In some places it is obserued, as an inuiolable Law, that he which remaineth (a yeare and a day) in a Land of seruile condition, and keepeth not Fire continually, without going out or extinguishing: although he be a Freeman, yet he shall there be in the like nature of the other Inhabitants, and hold what he hath by villainage.

Freedome by fire kept a yeare and a day.

The Lord of Roche-blanch, his pretence.

The Lord of Roche-blanch in Gascoigne, pretended to haue, not only the right of Mort-maine ouer his Subiects; but also that they were bound to til his grounds, manure his Vines, mow his Meddowes, reape and thrash his Corne, builde his Houses, pay his ransome, and stood taxable to the four vsuall Ember-weeks in the kingdom for his prouision: Likewise, that he might bring them backe with Halters about their Necks, if they departed his Countrey without his Licence. This last point (how euer the other stood in force) was cut off by Act of Parliament at Tholossa; as being prejudiciall to the right of liberty, and favoring of seruitude, which can take no place in that Kingdome. It seemes that the Monkes (who came very neere this kind of condition) did, and do little differ from such enthralled people: for they can haue nothing properly their owne, but are subiect to their superiours, and all rigours. But herein they differ from the other, that they haue spontaneally made themselues seruants for life time onely, in hope to enioy (after death) eternall liberty. It was prohibited by auncient Lawes, that Abbots, Priours, and Guardians of Conuents, should receiue any into Religion of seruile quality, without the Licence of their Patrones.

Monkes are almost meere Slaues.

The enfranchisements done by charitable Princes.

Many Princes long since, and in our times also, haue enfranchised them of their Countries, deliuering them out of villanage and seruitude, euen in meer Charity, or with Mony: And yet without any prejudice to the rights of Gentlemen, that held their Lands and Signeuries in such Nature. As for example, Lewes Hutin, King of France, who freed so many as offered themselues to him, with the price of Money, that serued to furnish his Warres. The like did Humbert, Prince of Daulphinie, in the yeare 1245. Henry the second King of France, by his Letters Patents, enfranchised them of Bourbonnois, in the yeare 1549. imposing a small taxation on them, annually payable. And in his imitation, Emanuel philibert, Duke of Sauoy, in the yeare 1569. did as much, by perswasion of his deuout and most vertuous Wife and Princeesse, Sister to the fore-named King Henry.

I do not infer, that all Prouinces were subiect to these seruitudes, yet there haue bene diuers in France; as part of la Marche, Champaigne, Auuergne, Forest, Bourbonnois, Lyonnois, Bourgongne, and others, whereof I may be ignorant. But the lower Allemaignes haue thereto bin more subiect, then any other that I know, euen as also Allemaigne it selfe. I would therefore aduise, that if any one happen (who is of an vnknowne place) to seeke coniunction in marriage: they would be careful first of his extraction, least it fall out with them, as I haue seen in Paris, by an Aduocate of Lyonnois, a man of great meanes (attained vnto only by his knowledge) who being married to a woman of an illustrious house, yet he dying without Children: the Patrone came and required lawfull succession, and it was adiudged him by the Court. I could produce diuers Histories to the like effect, but I let them sleep in silence, fearing to be too redious.

Diuers part in France subiect to such seruitude.

Great danger in marriages, without careful prevention.

Now a-daies, well neer all Christendome, begins afresh to make vse of Slaues, except in France, and some other few places. But such as are desirous to vnderstand more of their estate: let the read the Bookes of the Romaine Lawes, and there they shall finde sufficient discourse; as also plenty of the like matter. And because there is no vse made of the in France, they are not read of in their Vniuersities: for the reading of such argument, began to cease a little before Bartholus wrote, concerning the Law of right, who liued in the yeare 1350.

CHAP. XII.

Of the subuersion of the most potent Empire of the Chaldæans, and of their admirable Citty of Babylon.

Nothing was more famous in old time, nor more celebrated by all Historiographers, then the riches and magnificence of the Chaldean Empire; which, besides the Oriental Countries (from India to Æthiopia) included, al Ægypt, Affricke, and Spaine. In which respect, Daniell the Prophet said to Nabucadnezzer, who was King thereof: Tu es Rex Regum, & potestas tua in terminis vniuersæ terræ. Thou art King of Kings, and thy power extends it selfe to the bounds of the whole earth. Besides that, the wealth, strength, and beauty of Babylon (the Imperiall Seate of the Chaldean Kings) was such; as it giueth sufficient testimony of the Empires great power. For the wals were 50. cubits thick, and 200. cubits high. The Citty was (soure square) 15. miles from one corner to another; and sixty miles in compasse. Infomuch, that Aristotle affirmeth, that whē it was taken, those which dwelt in the furthest part of the Citty, did not heare of it in three daies. It had an hundred Gates, with the thresholds & posts of Brasse; great number of Marble temples, and golden Images: whole streets shining and glittering with Gold and precious stones. And among other Temples, there was one of Belus, four square, containing two Stades euery way, which was a quarter of a mile in length, and a mile in compasse. In the midst whereof there was a Tower, which (as weil in breadth, as in heighth) contained a Stade; that is to say, halfe a quarter of a mile: vpon the which were raised eight other Towers, one aboue another, with easie staires to ascend vp to the top, where there was a Chappell with a sumptuous Bed, and a Table of Gold. Finally, such wonderfull things are written by graue Authors, of Artificiall Mountaines, Orchards, and Gardens (called Horti pensiles) hanging Gardens, and such other things, that they Hereby we may gather, how admirable was the wealth of the Kings of Babylon, and how great the power of their Monarchy; whereof the destruction was prophesied by Esay, 200. yeares before it hapned, who said in the person of God. Ecce, ego suscitabo super eos Medos, &c. Behold, I will raise against them the Medians: and Babylon, which is so glorious amongst all other Kingdoms, and so notable and famous in the pride of the Chaldæans, shall be ouerthrowne. In like manner, Jeremy the Prophet (aboue sixty yeares before it was taken) said: Suscitauit Dominus, &c. The Lord hath raised vp the spirit of the King of the Medians against Babylon, and his meaning is to destroy it. Also Daniell the Prophet, interpreting to Balthazar King of Babylon, the words, Mana, Thekel, Phares (which were written miraculously before him, as hee was banqueting with his Nobility) fore-tolde the very day before it was taken, that God had giuen his Kingdom to the Medes & Persians. All which was accomplished the night following, when Darius K. of Media and Persia (whom Xenophon cald Ciaces) besiedging Babylon, tooke it on a sudden, with the help of his Nephew Cyrus the Persian, in the time of a great Feast, when the King, Nobility, & and people (contemning their enemies, in ouer-weening their owne strength) attended only to banquets & sports, as both Xenophon and Herodotus do testifie. They doe also declare the meanes how they tooke it, agreeing to the Prædictions of the Prophets: To wit, by a Stratagem of Cyrus, who caused certain ditches to be opened, to draw away the riuer Euphrates which passed through the Town; whereby the Channell was left dry, and the souldiers entring suddenly, surprised it without resistance.

Of this drawing away the Riuer, Jeremy prophesied plainly, saying; Desertum faciam mare eius, & siccabo venâ eius. I will make her Sea (that is to say, her famous Riuer Euphrates) desert, and I will dry vp the vaine or Channell thereof. And againe. Vada præoccupato sunt, &c. Her Fords or Waters, are preoccupied or intercepted. And againe. Siccitas super aquas eius. Her Waters shall become dry.

Thus began the execution of Gods wrath vpon Babylon, and on the Empire of

of the Chaldæans, which was then translated to the Medians and Persians, according to the Prædictions of the Prophets: which Prædictions (neuertheless) were not fulfilled all at once, but in proesse of time. For the Prophets fore-told not onely the surprize of the City, but also the vtter desolation thereof, and of the whole Countrey of Babylon. Murus ille Babilonis latissimus, (saith Jeremy) suffosione suffodietur, &c. That exceeding broad wall of Babylon, shall bee undermined, and digged up, and the high and magnificiall Gates thereof, shall be burnt. And againe in another place, speaking to the Babylonians, hee saith; Confusa est mater vestra, &c. Your mother (meaning Babylon) is wholly confounded, and made euen with the ground, &c. And all those which shall passe by it, shall be amazed, and shall hisse at it, in respect of the plagues that shall fall vpon it. Also Esay prophesied, that it should become a Wildernesse, saying; Non habitabitur vsq; in finem, nec ponet ibi tentoria Arabs, nec pastores requiescent, sed requiescent ibi bestia, &c. It shall not be inhabited to the end, nor the Arabian (who driues his cattell from place to place, to seek feeding for them) shall not pitch his Tentes there, nor so much as Shepheards shall remaine there, but it shall be a receptacle for wilde beasts.

All this (I say) was woefully accomplished afterward, for Darius the Sonne of Histaspis the Persian, tooke Babylon againe the second time, about forty years after the first surprize, by occasion of the Babylonians rebellion, and then he rased the strong and stately wals thereof. And though the City was left standing; yet it fell (by little and little) to desolation. Especially after the building of Seleucia by Seleucus Nicanor, and of Ctesiphonte by the Kinges of the Parthians: from which time forward it grew to be dispeopled. In so much, that in the time of Adrian the Emperour, there was nothing left of Babylon but a poore Wall, which serued in Saint Ieromes time (as hee witnesseth) for an enclosure for all kinds of wild Beasts, that were reserued and kept there, for recreation of the Kinges of that Countrey, when they came to hunt in those parts. And those which haue trauailed lately that way, affirme; that all that part where Babylon stood, is so full of Lyons and sauage Beasts, yea, and of murthering Theetes, and Robbers; that passengers are faine to haue Guards of Souldiers for their safety. Which I also note by the way, as an accomplishment of the Prophesie of Jeremy, who said. Habitabunt ibi dracones, cum fatuis sicarijs; Dragons or Beasts of the Desert, with wicked Murderers, shall dwell there.

Lastly, it is certainly reported by others which haue been there, that there is not there-about any Towne or Village (for Bagadat, which is now called New Babylon, is a daies iourney from the place where the olde stood) nor so much as a Tree or greene Hearbe in all that Territory: but that all is (as the Prophet Jeremy foretold.) Deserta & arenes, Desert and dry. Which may be wondered at; considering the admirable fertility thereof in times past, for (as Plinie saith) it was the most fruitfull Countrey of all the East. And Herodotus affirmeth, that the ground yeilded ordinarily two hundred for one, and some yeares three hundred. And he forbearth (as he saith) to recount other particulers thereof, because the same would seeme incredible, to such as had neuer seene it.

But for as much as the Prophets doe all specifie the particular causes; that is to say, the finnes whereby the Babylonians and Chaldæans incurred the wrath of Almighty God, and deserued so great a punishment: I will lay them downe in the Prophets owne words. Esay speaking of Babylon in the person of God, said. Quiescere faciam superbiam infidelium, & arrogantiam fortium humiliabo. I will make the pride of the miscreants or Infidels to cease, and I will humiliate the arrogancy of the strong. And in another place, the same Prophet speaking to Babylon, of the calamities that should fall vpon her, said. Vniuersa venerunt super te, &c. All thy miseries fell vpon thee for the multitude of thy Witch-crafts, and for the hardness of the hearts of thy Enchaunters, &c. Stand forth with the multitude of thy Witchcrafts, wherein thou hast laboured, euen from thine Infancy, and see whether they can profit thee any thing. Thy Astrologers, and those which were wont to contemplate the Starres, and to tell thee things to come: let them now come forth, and saue thee

I will render to Babylon, and to all the people of Chaldaea, all the euill and hurt they haue done in Syon.* And againe, The Foundations of Babylon are fallen, the wals are destroyed; for it is the reuenge of our Lord, and the reuenge of his Temple.

Dan. Cap. 5. Idolatry, and the prophanation of holy vessels.

Lastly, Daniell expounding to Balthasar (the last King thereof) the inscription written on the Wall, by the hand which appeared as he was banqueting with his Nobility: signified vnto him, that God had giuen his Kingdome to the Medes and Persians, as well for his pride and Idolatry; as also, because (in that banquet) he Prophaned the holy vessels of the Temple, which Nabuchadnezzar his Grand-father had brought from Ierusalem, when he led the Jewes into captiuitie. So that the mighty and potent finnes for which God did ouerthrow so great an Empire, were, Pride, Witchcraft, the superstitious use of Astrologie, cruelty towards the people of God, destruction of his Temple in Hierusalem, and the prophanation of holy vessels dedicated to Gods seruice. Whereby we may see, how heinous those finnes were in the sight of God, and how grieuous the penalty of sinne is. Lastly, how true it is which S. Jerome saith, speaking of that mightie Empires subuersion: All humane power is but dust and ashes, when the wrath of God striketh for sinne. Thus much concerning the destruction of Babylon, and Translation of the Chaldean Empire to the Medians: Next I thinke it most conuenient for me, to relate the destruction of Ierusalem, and wofull calamities of the Jewes euer since.

I omit (for breuities sake) the Prophecies of Esay and Jeremy, and will ouelie speake of two other: the one of Daniel, and the other of our Sauour himselfe. Daniel writing after the first destruction of Hierusalem by Nabuchadnezzar, during the Jewes captiuitie in Babylon, and hauing prophesied of the re-edification of the Temple, saith further in these wordes: Et post sexaginta duas hebdomadas, occidetur Christus, &c. After threescore and two weekes (that is to say, 490. yeares, counting the weekes by yeares, and not by daies; to wit, seauen yeares to euery weeke) Christ, or the Messias shall be killed, and the people which shall not be his people, and the Cittie and Sanctuary shall be destroyed, by a people that shall come with their Captaine, and the end of it shall be destruction, and after the end of the war, shall follow the determined desolation.

Daniels prophesie of Ierusalem destruction.

Dan. Cap. 7.

This was the prophesie of Daniell, of *Ierusalem*s destruction, and the cause thereof, about 500. yeares before it happened: which our Sauour himselfe told more particularly, who (a little before his passion) going downe to Hierusalem from the Mount Oliuet (whence he had the full view and prospect of the Cittie) wept for compassion hee had of the misery that was to fall vpon it, saying; Veniens dies inte, &c. The daies shall come in thee Hierusalem, that thy Enemies shall enuiron thee round about, and shall straiten thee on enery side, and shal not leaue in thee one stone vpon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. And againe (afterwards) he said to his Disciples. When ye shall see Ierusalem besieged with an Army: then know, that the desolation thereof is at hand. Then those which are in Iudea, let them fly to the Mountaines, and those that are in the midst of it, let them depart; and those which are in the Countries adioyning, let them not enter inso it: For that these are the daies of reuenge, to the end that al those things which haue bin written thereof, may be fulfilled. Woe be to Women with child, and to Nurses in those daies; for there shal be great misery vpon the earth, & wrath vpon the people: and they shall fall in the face of the Sword, and shall bee carried captiues into all Nations, and Ierusalem shal be troden under the feet of the Gentiles.

and your Children. For loe, the daies shall come, when they shall say; Happy are the barren, and the wombs that haue not borne children, and the paps that haue not giuen suck. Then they shall begin to say to the mountains, fall vpon vs; and to hills, couer vs, &c. Thus said our Sauior, which I haue set down the more particularly; to the end, we may consider, how the euent corresponded to his Prophecie, by the Testimony of prophane Authors; especially of famous Iosephus the Jew, who was an eye-witnesse, and partaker of the common calamity of his Country, though (being blinded no lesse then the rest) he had not the grace to acknowledge the true cause thereof.

Although there passed almost sortie yeares, before the siege of Ierusalem after our Sauiors death: yet Almighty God began much sooner, to execute his iust iudgements vpon the Iewes, in most euident and rigorous manner; not only in Ierusalem & Iudea, but also in al other parts where they dwelled. It seeming conuenient to his Iustice, that as they were assembled in Ierusalem at his passion, and all consenting to his condemnation; so they should pay the penaltrie thereof in all parts wheresoeuer they liued. And therefore, within 7. or 8. yeares after our Sauior suffered, there were infinite numbers of them slaughtered in all the Citties of Syria, Egipt, and other countries by conspiracies of the people against them. As in Scelentia 50000. In Damascus 18000. In Casarea 20000. In Scithopolis 13000. In Ascalon 2500. In Alexandria 50000. Beside 10000: more in other Citties of Egipt; and 5000. in Ioppa. Within a few yeares after, Claudius the Emp. banished al the Iewes out of Rome, by a publike Edict, and out of all the Country of Iudea. Besides, the City of Hierusalem was miserably infected with Theues, Robbers, Murderers; Magicians, false Prophets, and seditious persons, prophaning the very Temple with bloud: insomuch, that 20000: were killed, and the most of them stifled in a tumult in Hierusalem; at a Feast of Easter (as we call theit Pascha.) Al which Iosephus recounteth, as the preamble to their ruine. Besides, their Governours did vse such tyranny vpon them, vnder the Emperours Caligula, Claudius, and Nero: that very many of them were forced to abandon their Countrey, and the rest to rebell. Which brought vpon the Armies of the Romaines; first vnder Cestius, Governour of Syria, who burned, spoyled, and ransacked all Palestine, and besiedged Ierusalem it selfe. Afterward, Vespasian destroyed all the Country, and great numbers of the people with Fire and Sword: whiles also (in the meane time) they were miserably afflicted with Famine and Ciuill Wars, by reason of three potent seuerall factions, which arose amongst them; first, in the Provinces abroad, and after in the City of Ierusalem; where the seditious slue great numbers of their Aduersaries, euen in the Temple it selfe, and committed such horrible sacriledges, & other abominable mischiefes therin, that Iosephus saith thereof. Non recusabo dicere &c. I wil not forbear to say that, which sorrow forceth me to vtter. I verily thinke, that if the Romaines had not come when they did, against those most wicked men of my Nation, either the earth wold haue opened & swallowed the Citry, or another Deluge wold haue drowned it; or thunder-bolts and fire from Heauen wold haue destroyed and consumed it.

Thus saith Iosephus, and this was the state of the Iewes, when Vespasian (being chosen Emperour of the Romaines) left the charge and prosecution of the warre against them, to his Sonne Titus: who (presently after) planted his siege before the City of Hierusalem, while the Iewes (according to their yearely custome) were assembled there out of all parts, to celebrate their Feast of Pascha. Which time was ordained by the special prouidence of God, that the time of their punishment, might answer to the time of their offence (for that they had put our Sauior to death at their Paschall Feast.) And partly, to the end, that the reuenge might be the more compleat on the whol Nation, by reason of the infinit number of them that were assembled there, for celebration of the Feast; euen from all parts of Iudea; and the Countries adioyning: The Towne being besiedged, was (within few daies) enuironed by the Romaines, according to our Sauiors prophecie; not onely with a Trench, but also with a wall; in such sort; that no liuing creature could issue out any way: By means whereof, and of the great multitude of people within the Town, there grew (within a while) such extreame of famine: that they were forced to eat, not onely Horles, Asses, Dogs, Rats, & Mice, & the Leather that couered their Shields and Bucklers; but also the very dung out of the Stables, yea, and a Noble woman was known to eate her own child that suckt vpon her breast; wherein was fulfilled the Prophecie of our Sauiour, when he said: Beate steriles, &c. Happy are the barren, and the bellies which haue not brought forth Children, &c.

But to proccede, in the meane time, the besieged were no lesse infested with cruell sedition, and war amongst themselves; then with famine, & the assaults of their enemies abroad. Insomuch, that they filled the Citty and Temple with their own blood, and such as were taken by the Romans, were (by the commaund of Titus) crucified before the wals of the Citty, to the number of 500. euery day, vntill at length (as Iosephus reporteth) there wanted both Crosses for the Bodies, and place for the Crosses: so that, their clamorous sentence of Crucifige, (giuen against our Sauiour Christ) was iustly executed vpon themselves.

Also, great numbers of them, who (being forced with Famine) sought to saue their lines, by yeilding themselves to their enemies: were (neuertheless) killed by the Syrian and Arabian Souldiers, and their Bowels ript vp, in hope to find Gold therein; vpon a report, or at least a conceit, that the Iewves did swallow their Gold, to conuay it out of the Citty by that meanes. And such was the misery within the City, by Famine, Pestilence, and cruelty of the factions one against another; that (as Iosephus reporteth) all the sinkes, void places, and retreats; yea; the very streets were full of dead bodies, which were continually cast out from the Houses, and trodden vpon like Dust and Dirt. Wherein the Prophecie of Esay was fulfilled, who said; Facta sunt morticina, &c. Their Carkasses, became like Dirt or Dung in the midst of the Streetes. And although it was ordained at the first, that the dead Bodies should bee buried at the Citties publike charge, to remedy the contagion, which daily increased by the Pestilent fauour of them: yet the number grew within a while to be so great, that there was no place to bury them; insomuch, that the liuing were forced to cast the dead ouer the Wals, into the Ditch of the Towne, and in so great numbers, that Titus the Romaine Generall seeing it, and noting the filth and corruption that issued out of their Woundes and Plague-sores, most loathsome to behold, exclaiming, said: That it was some extraordinary punishment of God vpon them for their sinnes; and not any effect of his sledge.

Finally, after five months sledge, the Temple and City were burned, and the Wals rased, excepting one little peece thereof, which was left for some shelter and defence for the Souldiours, who were to remain in those parts: besides, some pieces of three Towers, which Titus commaunded should be left, for a Monument and remembrance of his sledge. Whereas al the rest of the Citty was destroyed (as Iosephus saith) that it seemed neuer to haue beene inhabited: Which our Sauiour signified, when he said; Et prosternent, &c. And they shall lay thee flat vpon the ground, and one stone shall not be left vpon another in thee. To conclude, the number of those which were slaine, and dyed during the sledge, was (as Iosephus reporteth) a Million and an hundred thousand, and of the Captiues 97000. whereof Iosephus himselfe was one: And of those, some were condemned to the publike works; others (of the stronger and handsomer sort) carried in triumph; and such as were vnder the age of 17. yeares, were sold for little or nothing. And those which remained in the Countrey, were loaden with such grieuous impositions and tributes, that they liued in continuall misery.

Thus much concerning the destruction of Ierusalem, whereof (I thinke) the like hath not bin read or heard in all Antiquity. But what was the Iustice of God satisfied, & his wrath towards the Iewves appeased with this? No, for (as the Prophet Esay said, when he prophesied of the lamentable destruction of the Citty:) In omnibus his non est auersus furor eius, sed adhuc manus eius extenta. His wrath was not auerted from them with all this, but his hand is still out-stretched to punish them.

This may evidently appeare, by the wonderfull calamities which fell vpon them after, not only in Iudaa, but also in all all other places where they were dispersed: As first (in the next age) in the time of Traiane the Emperour, within lesse then fifty yeares after the subuersion of Ierusalem; Infinita eorum millia, &c. (saith Eusebius) Infinite thousands of them were killed, for their rebellions in Ægypt, Mesopotamia, and the Island of Cyprus. For in Alexandria in Egypt, where they liued in great multitude, all of them were put to the Sword. In Macedonia, they were vtterly extinguished. And in Cyprus they were all eyther killed, or banished; and a Law made, that it should be death for any Jew to tarry there, though he were driuen thither by Tempest against his wil. And a few yeares after, Iulius Seuerus being called out of Brittany by the Emperour Adrian (to repress a rebellion of the Jewes) destroyed almost al the countrey.

For, as Dion writeth, he dismanteld fifty strong Forts, razed or burnt 965. Townes and Villages, and killed aboue 50000. Jewes in battaile, besides that, an infinite number of others either died by fire, famine, and pestilence, or were sold for Slaues. And such (saith S. Hierom) as could not be sold, Were translated into Ægypt, or else perished by ship-wracke, famine, or by the sword of the Gentiles. And the Emperour hauing (lately before) redified the Citty of Ierusalem, and called it (after his owne Name) Ælia Adria, commaunded by publike Edict: that no Jew should (euer after) enter into the Territory or iurisdiction thereof, nor so neere vnto it, that hee might behold it from any high place. Shortly after Adrians time, they were also miserably afflicted by the Emperour Antonius Pius, for another rebellion; and after him again, by Marcus Aurelius, who being wearied with their continuall tumults (as saith Ammianus Marcellinus) exclaimed against them, saying; That they were worse then the Marcomani, Quadi, and Sarmates, whom he held to be the most beastly of all barbarous Nations: And again, some yeares after they were subdued and destroyed by the Emp. Seuerus, who triumphed for his great victory against them, and renewed the decrees of Adrian, for their exclusion from the sight of their Country, by means whereof, they were counted no better then Vagabonds.

And therefore Tertullian (who wrote in the same time) said of them thus. Dispersi, palabundi cœli et soli sui extorres, vagantur per orbem sine homine, sine Deo rege. They wander about the world, dispersed, scattred, & banished from their natue soyle and ayre, hauing neither God nor Man for their King: Quibus nec aduenarum iure, terram patriam salutare conceditur: Who may not so much as (in guest-wise) salute or see their owne Countrey. Thus said Tertullian, and so odious & hatefull became they afterward to all men; that they were tearmed Fœtentes Iudæi, Filthy and stinking Jewes, as appeareth in Amianus Marcellinus, a Pagane Historiographer.

Whereof some also yeild a particuler reason, manifesting Gods malediction vpon them; to wit, That all Jewes haue a filthy and lothsome sauor continually, euer since their dispersion; and that they perswade themselues, that the same cannot be cured, but with drinking the blood of Christians. For which cause, they haue killed many children at diuers times, and in diuers * Countries. And particularly in Trent, in the yeare of our Lord 1475. at what time they miserably crucified a young Child of 20. monthes old, called Simon; and the Jewes being taken for the fact, confessed, that one of the causes that mooued them thereto, was to drinke his blood, for remedy of their stinking disease: as writeth Iohannes Mathias Tiberinus, a Learned Philitian, who liued in Trent at the same time. But to returne to the former ages, from whence I haue a little digressed. After the time of the Emperour Seuerus, they rebelled also against Constantine the Great; for the which, great numbers of them had their eares cut off, and were (by the Emperors commandement) dispersed throughout all Countries, with that and other marks of Infamy, for generall shame and reproach of al the Nation. And not many yeares after, there were many thousands of them slaine in Iudea, without respect of young or old: And three or foure of their chiefe Cities; and very many of their Townes, were burnt in the time of Constantius, Son to Constantine the Great, for another rebellion.

And heere I cannot but note by the way (for further manifestation of Gods wrath towards them) that although the

The fauour done to the Iewes by Iulian the Apostata, turned to their confuſion.

Emperour Iulian the Apostata, who ſucceeded Constantius, fauored the ſo much for the ſhort time of his raigne (which was but 20. months) that he gaue them leaue, not only to returne to Ieruſalem to inhabite there; but alſo to re-edicifie their Temple, yet it rather turned to their confuſion, then to their contentment and commodity. For firſt, as concerning the re-edicification of their Temple, when they had made collections of great ſums of Money (whereto, as well Women as Men moſt zealouſly contributed ſo much, as they were any way able, with intention to make it more beautifull then euer it was:) they loſt both their labour & charges, being forced (by three prodigious accidents) to ſurceaſe the worke after they had begun it.

The re-edicification of the Temple in Ieruſalem miraculoſly hindered.

For when all things neceſſarie for the building were provided, the foundation laid vpon the ground-workes of the old Temple, the wals riſing apace, the Iewes triumphing, and inſulting againſt our Sauour Chriſt and the Chriſtians (who were much diſmaied, in reſpect of the cleare prophesies of Daniell, fore-telling the perpetual deſolation of the temple:) It pleaſed Almighty God, that firſt an Earth-quake diſſolued the Foundation, and ouerthrew the wal that was begun; and then a fire from Heauen conſumed as well the Tooles and Inſtruments of the Work-men, as alſo the Timber and other matters prepared for the building; yea, and burnt very many of the Iewes themſelues. Laſtly, for their further confuſion, and that it might be manifeſt vnto them, from whence all this proceeded: there appeared a Croſſe in the ayre, and the apparrell of all thoſe which were preſent, was miraculoſly marked with Croſſes, which could neuer after be waſhed out, nor taken away by any meanes; where-with the Iewes were ſo confounded, that they deſiſted from their work, and many of them became Chriſtians. This Story is written by Ruffinus, Socrates, S. Gregory Nazianzen, and S. Chriſoſtome, who ſaith; *Huius rei nos omnes teſtes ſumus, noſtra enim at ite ante annos viginti hec acciderunt. heauenly King diſfaouereth and puniſheth for ſinne. And alſo how true it is which the royal Prophet ſaith; Niſi Dominus edificauerit domum, &c. Except the Lord builde the houſe, they labour in vaine who build it. And now as concerning the aboad of the Iewes at Hieruſalem afterwards, it is euident, that they remained not long there: but that within a while after Iulians death (who dyed preſentlie after this chanced;) they were not onely expelled thence, but alſo forbidden againe to enter into the City. For we read, that within 20. yeares after, in the time of the Emperors Theodoſius & Valentinian, their cuſtome was to purchaſe licence for Money (yearely) to goe thither, to bewaile the ſubuerſion of their Temple, in the aniuersary day thereof: as witneſſeth S. Ierom, who liued many years in thoſe parts, and wrote there (at the ſame time) his learned Commentaries vpon the leſſer Prophets. Wherein hee notably deſcribeth the miſerable eſtate, as well of the whole Countrey, as of the Iewes themſelues, which therefore I thought good to ſet down in his owne words.

As for the deſtruction (ſaith he) of the ſtrong Cirties, which were wont to be in Iudea; I thinke it may better bee iudged by the eye, then by the eare; better by ſight, then by report. And I eſpecially, who am now in this Prouince, cannot but ſee it, and approue thoſe things which haue bene written of it: For we ſee now ſcant any litle Monument of the old ruines, in ſome of the greateſt Citties which flouriſhed in times paſt. In Silo, where the Tabernacle and Arke of the Teſtament of our Lord was; the very Foundations of the Altar ſcant appeare. Gabaa, that great City of Saul, is pulled downe to the very ground. Rama and Bethoron, and the other famous Citties, built by ſalomon; are now little villages. And a litle after. And at this preſent day, the perfidious and Traiterous Iewes, are forbidden to enter into Ieruſalem; except it bee to weepe, and bewaile the ſubuerſion of their Temple, for the which alſo they are enforced to pay Money. So that, as in times paſt, they bought the bloud of Chriſt: ſo now they are faine to buy their owne teares, and cannot bee ſuffered ſo much as to weepe of free coſt. You might ſee, in Ierom. in Sophoniam. Cap. 1. Saint Ierome an eye-witneſſe of the deſolation of Iudea, and miſery of the Iewes.

As the Iewes bought the bloud of Chriſt, ſo they were faine afterward to buy their owne teares, in the day that Ierusalem was taken and destroyed by the Romaines (that wofull people) old Women at Deaths doore, and old Men loaden no lesse with rags, then yeares, came flocking thither, bearing the Testimony of Gods wrath in their very Bodies and Habits. And a little after; A wofull multitude of miserable people (whom yet no Man pittie) assemble themselues there, to lament the ruine of their Temple. And while they haue yet their Cheekes bedewed with Teares, and their naked Armes stretched vppe to Heauen; and their Hairespred about their eares: the pittilesse Souldier asketh them some reward, to suffer them to weepe a little longer. And can any Man (who shall see this) doubt, but that this is the day of their tribulation, and the time of their Anguish, Calamity, and misery, whereof the Prophet speaketh? Thus saith Saint Hierom, of the Infelicity of the Iewes, and their exclusion from Ierusalem, in the time of Theodosius.

Furthermore, Saint Chrysostome writing some yeares after, in the time of the Emperours Arcadius and Honorius, affirmed, that the Iews hauing lost their Liberty and Country; Were contemptible and ridiculous to all men throughout the World, from the East to the West, and to the very extremitie and further-most boundes of the Earth. Their misery also (in those times) appeareth by two Lawes of Honorius the Emperour; the one against them, and the other in fauour of them. By the first he ordained, That no Iewe should haue any kinde of Honour or Office in the Common-wealth, and that such as already had any, should bee deprived thereof. The other Law made in fauour of them; was; To repressse the fury of the people against them in all parts, because for foure yeares together, before that Law was made; their Sinagogues were burnt, & they themselues despightfully and cruelly handled euery where; which the Emperor restrained by a publike Edict, least (otherwise) they should be vtterly extinguished.

And who is able to recount all the plagues and calamities, which since that time haue fallen vpon the euery where? And how they haue bin oppressed, spoiled, banished, and massacred, wheresoeuer they haue liued? In France 50000.

of them were forced to be baptizd, or to fly the Countrey, in the yeare of our Lorde 614. In Spaine, a conspiracy of theirs being detected, in the yeare 694. all their goods were confiscate, themselves made Slaues, and their Children (vnder the age of seauen yeares) taken from them and Christned. In the yeare 1009. it being discouered and published, that certaine Iewes in France had intelligence (by Letters) with the Prince of Babylon, and had procured the subuersion of a famous Church in Ierusalē, wher the Sepulcher of our Sauior was said to be; there was such a general hatred conceiued against them throughout Christendome, that they were tormented & slaine in all places where they dwelled; some hanged, some burned, others put to the Sword: besides, very many; that (to auoide torments) killed themselues. Also in the year 1348. infinite numbers of them were massacred in Spain, France, Germany, and Italy, vpon a report, that they had poysoned the Wells in al those Countries, and caused a great mortality of people, which dyed at the same time. And in the yeare 1492. all Iewes were expelled out of Spaine, to the number of 124000. Families, of whom there died 2000. of the plague; as they were removing, and the like rigour was vsed against them in Portugall some few years after.

Also in England; in the time of K. Richard the first, great numbers of them that then dwelled in Lincolne and Yorke, were slaine (as well women as men) in a tumult of the people. And vnder King John, they were miserably oppressed with taxes and impositions, and such of them as wold not pay what was demanded of them; were cruelly tormented; vntill they gaue satisfaction. Amongst others, it is writen of one of them, that seauen of his teeth were pulled out, one after another, before he would graunt to pay a Taxe of ten thousand Markes; which he was content at last to pay, to saue the rest. Lastly, vnder King Edward the first, they were all banished out of England by Act of Parliament.

And at this present time, experience sheweth, that wheresoeuer they yet dwell among Christians; they liue in al contempt and subiection, being (as it were) slaues to them whom they most hate.

hate. And so odious is the race & name of them in most Christian Countries, that it is counted Infamy to be descended of them, or to marry with them, although they become Christians. In so much, that in Spaine and Portugall, where there are great numbers of baptized Iewes (whom they call Christianos nuevos, New Christians) no man is capable (of them) of any Knighthood, or yet (in some places) of any dignity Ecclesiasticall or Temporall; if he be any way descended of them, which is speciallie enquired of, by expresse Commissions sent forth for that purpose. Neither is this their oppression or seruitude onely amongst Christians; but also among Turkes & Moores, as graue Authours do testifie, and those which trauaile their Countries, do finde by experience.

Finally, we may adde hereto another plague (surpassing all the rest) which God hath laid vpon them, for the consummation of their infelicity & misery: I meane their blindnesse and hardnesse of hart, which is not only of it selfe magna damnatio, A great damnation (as S. Augustine calleth it, but also doth exclude them from all remedy, so long as it continueth. This the Prophet Esay signified when he said. Excæca cor populi huius, &c. Make blind the harts of this people, & agrauate their cares, and shut vp their eyes, least peradventure they may see with their eyes, and heare with their cares, and vnderstand with their harts, and be conuerted, and I moued to heale them. Also the royal Prophet Dauid, to the same purpose. Obscurentur (saith he) oculi eorum, &c. Let their eyes (o Lord) be obscured, that they may not see, and lay a perpetuall load or burthen vpon their backs. And the same was also signified, or rather prophesied by Moyse, when hee threatned the people of the Iewes; saying: Percutiet te Dominus amentia, &c. The Lord will strike thee with madnesse; blindnesse, and fury of mind, that thou mayst go groping in the mid-day, as the blinde man gropes in the darke, and mayest not direct thy waies, but alwaies sustaine shame and reproach, and bee oppressed with violence, and not haue any man to deliuer thee.

Thus said Moyse, threatning the children of Israel (in case they should forsake the Lord their God) but prophetically describing the inuincible blindnesse and miserable state, wherein the whole Nation of the Iewes should liue after our Sauours passion, vntill the end of the Worlde: at what time the Lord hath promised to haue mercy on them. And therefore the Apostle saide; that the blindnes of the whole nation of the Iewes ingenerall should continue: Donec plenitudo gentium intraret: vntill the fulnesse of the Gentiles should enter; that is to say, vntill all Nations should be conuerted: Et sic omnis Israel saluus ferit; And so all Israell should be saued. And to the same purpose the Psalmist saith: Conuertentur ad vesperam: They shall be conuerted towards the Euening; that is to say, towards the end of the world.

Now then, all this being considered, and in their dispersion throughout all Countries for 1500. yeares space, they haue euer conserued vntill this day their Name and Nation: we cannot but acknowledge with S. Augustine, that Almighty God hath (of his prouidence & iust iudgment) signed and marked them like Caine, that they may neuer bee extinguished, but remaine alwaies a distinct people from all other, to bear and endure the deserued scourge of his wrath, and to serue not onely for a manifest example of his iustice, but also for an euident testimony against themselves and all Infidels, of the omnipotent Diuinity of our Sauour Iesus Christ, whom they crucified; and of the verity of our Christian Religion, which they impugne.

This S. Augustine well considered, who expounding this Verse of the Psalme; Ne occideris eos, nequando obliuiscantur populi mei: saith, that it may well bee vnderstood as the words of our Sauior to his Father, concerning the Iewes, as though he should say; Istos inimicos meos qui me occiderunt, noli tu occidere, maneat Gens Iudeorum. These my Enemies (o Father) who haue killed me, doe not thou kill, but let the Nation of the Iewes remain. Whereof also he yeildeth two reasons; the one, that they remaining in continuall affliction, may be a Testimony to the World, as well of their owne sinne and great ingratitude to Almighty God; as also of his Iustice in punishing the same. The other reason is, Quia necessarij sunt credentibus gentibus: Because they are necessary for the Gentiles which which beleue. And why? Onely (saith he) to the end, that (as the Psalmist saith:) Almighty God may shew vnto vs his mercy in our very enemies, that is to say; That by their obstinacie and reprobation, we may see his mercy towards vs in our vocation. Besides that, They serue vs also (saith he in another place) for Porters, to beare and carrie after vs the Lawe and the Prophets, in testimony of the Doctrine of our Christian Catholick Church.

In which respect, S. Bernard saith notably. Non sunt persequendi Iudai, no sunt trucidandi, nec effugandi, quidem, &c. The Iewes are not to be persecuted, they are not to be killed, no nor to be chased from amongst vs. And then giuing the reason therof, he saith, Viui quidem apices nobis sunt, &c. They are liuely Letters, representing vnto vs the passion of our Lorde; for they are dispersed into all Countries, to the end, that while they pay the penalty of their horrible crime, they may be witnesses of our redemption. Besides that (saith he) if they were quite extinguished, how should the promise of their reduction and conuersion to the latter end of the world be fulfilled? Thus reasoneth S. Bernard, which I haue thought good to note by the way, to satisfie the scruple of some in these daies, who are scandalized to see the Iewes suffered to liue at Rome, and other Christian countries, not considering (as it seemeth) the perticuler prouidence of God therein, who so ordaineth it for their greter punishment, his owne greater glory, and the manifestation of his loue towards vs, the Confirmation of our Christian Religion; yea, and for the saluation of some of them, whom it pleaseth him to call to the Christian faith. While (neverthelesse) their whole Nation ingenerall, beareth the heavy burthen of their owne malediction, which they gaue against themselves, when as they cried, Sanguis eius super nos, & super filios nostros: His blood light vpon vs, and on our children.

Thus much concerning the Justice of God vpon the people of the Iewes for their sinne; which sin, as it was the greatest that euer was committed: so also it hath had, and still hath, the greatest and most rigorous punishment, that euer was laide vpon any Nation or Country; and is so euident, that it cannot be denied.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a crafty and subtile Physitian, who attained to be super-intendent in the affayres of France, and gouerned or ouerswayed King Lewes the eleuenth, who was accounted the best aduised, and most ingenious Prince in his time.

That hath bin said, and the same opinion (for the more part) stil continueth, that Lewes eleuenth of that name, and King of France, was the ablest and best aduised Prince, that either was before him, or hath bin since. In regard that at his entrance, he found the whole Kingdom in combustion; his Subiects, cheefest Citties, and Lords of greatest power coniuered against him: yet did he so dexteriously pacifie them all, & afterward, set such diuision among them; that he became sole Commander, retired Guyenne to him, which was his Brothers portion, who dyed soon after; not without some suspicion of the Kinges acquaintance in the act. Hee found the meanes to accord himselfe with the King of England, hauing preuailed with some of his Counsell, and made a present to him of a great quantity of good wines: albeit the said King had crost the Sea, to ioine his power with the Duke of Bourgongn (a heauy enemy to Lewes) and war fiercelly on France. Afterward, he dealt so discretly with the saide Duke, who was then busied in foyling the Suitsers, Lorraines, and the leagued Countries, that he compassed absolute peace. And because the power of the Duke continued very suspicious to the King; closely and vnder-hand, he maintained warre among the Subiects, against their duke: so that in the end, after the losse of some battailes, the Duke was slaine, and the Dutchy of Bourgongne seized on, which euer since hath remained to the Kinges of France.

Moreouer, he did so cautelously flye off from familiarity with some persons, whom he knew to be but badly affected towards him; that diuers of them were put put to death, vpon certaine crimes layd to their charge, according as hee dealt with his Constable, the Earle of S. Paul, and the Duke of Nemours. He called not the States vnto any new imposition of Taxes, according to the ancient custom of the Kingdom. He encreased (beyond reason) the imposed Taxes which hee found at his entrance, and disposed of al according to his owne fantasie, holding it as a certaine rule; That hee who knew not how to dissemble, knew not how to raign. In brieft, from his very Infancy, it was iudged, that he would proue a very dangerous Prince; especially, when not hauing attained to the age of 15. years, he arose against his father, whereon he was enforced to flye to the D. of Bourgoigne. Which when his father vnderstood, he sent to the saide Duke, aduising him to foster vp the Fox, that one day wold eat vp all his Pullen. And to speake truly, so long as he liued, hee imitated the behaiour of that subtle Beast. At length, he was smoked, and made to die, as vsually we put to death such old Foxes as wee hit on: after hee had run thorough bad courses enow, and how it hapened whereof we are now to discourse.

It is to bee obserued, that this King, because hee was ambitious, desirous of reuenge, & very suspitious, hauing discontented the most honorable & cheefest persons in his kingdom; became very curious in finding meanes of imposing new Subsidies vpon his people, for exercise of his own prodigalities, & compassing plots, how he might giue vnto such as deserued not, but euen on pleasure, & beyond reason. It came to passe, that among these diuersities of curiosities, the health of his body begā to alter in a very dangerous manner: for he was not only sicke in body, but in spirit likewise. So that it was found most true in him, which Galen said; Manners do alway follow the temperature of the body.

To proceed then, this King, in regard of the fore-named causes, became verie melancholy, that formerly had bin very facetious, affecting such as laboured any way to procure laughter. Hee began to be fearful of death, superstitiously enclined, & meruailous suspitious that something was intended against his State. Heer-upon, refusing visitation, he commāded his son Charls (who after was the 8.K. of that name) to be closely shut vp, and made strong Iron bars & doores to the house where he lodged. Moreouer, he ordained extraordinary Guardes, to watch night and day about his Court, being vnwilling to speake with any one. Hee would weare the richest and most sumptuous Garments that hee could deuise, albeit hee neuer went out of his Chamber: whereas, when he was yong & healthful in body and mind, he went but meanly apparrelled. Were not these apparant signs, of a man depriued of his best senses, & of that disease which Physitians do terme Melancholly?

There was a Physitian, which had bin entertained by the King, some short while before this extremity befell him, named M. Iaques Cottier, who had attained to that degree of profession; not so much in regard of his knowledge, as by the fauour of the Duke of Sauoy, who had bin his meanes of aduancement to the King. This man, perceiuing Lewes begin to bee weakely disposed in his vnderstanding (as hath bin already declared) hauing also serued in former times with some ordinary Physitians, finding the King one day alone, and al his vsual Physitians absent from him (happily about their practique affayres) himselfe soly attending, and none else neere: he tooke aduantage of this opportunity, in manner following. The King apprehending dayly more and more, a dreadfull perswasion of Death, which (indeed) is a matter most irkesome and terrible to Rich and mighty men, especially such a King as this, who was the most famous and Potent Christian Prince in his time; began to question with this Physitian, as desirous to know if hee could in this case cure him? The Physitian assured him, that hee could and woulde, provided that he wold repose such confidence in him, and he alone to haue the dealing with him, for better effecting the busines. Moreouer he alledged, that his other Physitians came farre short in knowledge of his naturall disposition, whereof he made serious and exact obseruation; for that from the first hour of entertainment into his Maesties seruice, he applied his whol study & practise to vnderstand his natural inclinatio, whereof the other had no care at al, but disposed most of their seruiceable attendance dance, only to enrich and benefit themselves withall, hee entreated the King not to reueale this secret information, proceeding onely from intire dutie and affection. And that he himselfe would still bee diligent about his person, searching and reading the most learned authors in Phisicke, to deriue from them an vndoubted remedy for his Disease. Heereto he added, that the more hee sought into the quality of that passion, the more it appeared doubtful and difficult to be cured, because it had formerly hazarded his life very often, but only was still frustrated by his carefull preuentions. And so much the greater he alledged his daunger, in regard, that his other Physitians had applied such Purgatiues vnto him, with other strong and violent Medicaments; which if hee had not very secretly and (vnknowne to them) corrected, the king had died long ago. In brieft, he then perswaded and ouer-ruled the King, euen as himselfe pleased, for no man could haue access to impeach him; yea, he so farre preuailed by this insinuation, as (from thence forward) especiall charge was giuen, that no man shoulde enter the Kinges Chamber, except Cottier gaue his consent thereto, by which meanes, he assured himselfe of sole-gouerning his Royall person.

Nowe, for a stronger fortification of this credite already wonne with the King, hee drew in likewise one Maister Oliuer a Barber, who was a Dane by birth, vtterly vnlearned, and yet serued as a Councillor about the King, as diuers others in like manner did, that were as vnworthy as both these men: and whatsoever Cottier saide, Maister Oliuer the Dane stoutly confirmed it, as iustified by the probable Rules of Art. The ordinary Apothecary belonging vnto the King, was drawne into contempt and disgrace, and so were all his other Physitians, as men not worthy to hold such place; but either vtterly ignorant, or playing vppon too much aduantage. These courses were heedfully obserued by two other Physitians, the one named M. Draconis de Beaucaire, Professor and Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Montpelier; the other, was a Scot by birth, and had (not long before) bin taken in the battaile at Nancy, where the Duke of Bourgongne was slain, and then was this man entertained into the Kings seruice, by the fame and good report spread euery where of him, for Learning, Honesty, and Merit, to be about a King. It will well appeare by this Historie, how easily Princes are induced to beleue false reports, and to reiect men of merit for base intruders.

The King grew into such extremitie of Melancholy, that as in those times yong Lyons being brought him out of Africa (by his owne expresse charge) to play and disporte withall; he would not indure to haue a sight of them. And one day (about the rest) his passion was so violent, that the humour tooke him, to dismisse an attending seruant of his Chamber, because hee had warmed his Prisane before he dranke it, and saide in Choller; that not onely he did it to beare his life, but all his household Officers were likewise consenting vnto it. Whereupon, M. Jaques Cottier, being then present, saide vnto him; I know very well Sir, that you comprehend mee in this suspition among the rest: but be you well assured, that after I am departed from you, you cannot liue the space of eight daies, and make account to find it most true. The King was so terrified with these words, that from thence forward, he not onely wholly committed his person to Cottiers disposition; but likewise all his Kingdome, and whatsoever else thereto belonged, so that his Physitian (as then) commanded al alone. He refused also to see his Queene, Children, and dearest Friends, because hee was possessed, that they Conspired against his life, and desired nothing more then his Death: in which vaine surmise, hee was not a little soothed by his Physitian.

It hapned afterward, that Messire Girard de Viennes of Bourgongn, being Marshall de Rieux, came to see the King, and could gain no entrance into his Chamber, but by permission of Cottier: which hauing yet at length obtained, the King (Child-like) complained to the said Marshall, of the great rigour vsed towards him by M. Jaques, as well in restraint of his drinke, as meat; and that hee would not permit him any recreation. Moreouer he told him, that the Virgin Marie had appeared to him diuers times, and Cottier gets pardon for two murders committed by one man.

Vpon a day, a Champernois Gentleman, named Cortenay (who had committed two feueral murders) cam to the Court to get his pardon, which he obtained at the request of Cottier the Kings Physitian. But when it cam to the Lord Chancellor, that this grace should be confirmed by the great Seale: hee made refusal thereof, as being granted against all right and equity. Intelligence heereof being brought to the King, he presently called for his Seales, and gaue the Custody of them to Cottier the Physitian, sending the Lord Chancellor home to his owne house, with enow disgraces, and reprochful speeches. Thus was the King wholly gouerned, and his Kingdomes affayres, by Maister Oliver the Dane, a Barber, who represented the Constable; Cottier a Physitian, Lorde Chancellor; and a mender of stockings, who was made Admirall.

A strange forgetfulnesse in a King.

An infamous gouernment.

Cottier his complaint to the King, concerning his new Office.

It happened afterward, that for the space of some ten or twelue dayes, this new made Chancellor receiued no Monies at all, by meanes of the Seales hee had in charge; whereof he complained to the King, alledging, that the extremity of this disease, wold not admit the least absence from his royall person, to attend the benefit due to his new office, and whereas now hee gained nothing, he had opportunity to apply his owne practise, his commodity wold be equal with the best, only by his visitations & consultations amongst sickely persons, whereof hee had no such cause to complain, till this restraint of attending the King only; and whereof hee entreated him to take notice, as also of his great deseruings.

An vnbecoming prodigality in a K.

The King, who was intirely perswaded, that his life depended onely vpon the Physitians care & cunning; fearing also, least his former Allegations might cause him to forsake him, commanded the Treasurer of his Exchequer, to deliuer him foure & fifty thousand Crowns to content him; and more hee should haue had, if more had then remained in the Coffers. Moreouer, hee caused the King to make his Nephew Byshop of Amiens, and to bestow on his other Kindred and Allies, such gifts and great estates as himselfe pleased. For indeed, such was the Kinges infirmity both in bodie and minde, as Cottier might doe what hee listed, and none durst contradict him.

As for Maister Oliver the Barber, the King sent him into Flanders, with large Commissions, and a powerfull Armie against the Daughter vnto the Duke of Bourgongne, but being able to performe there no matter of moment, hee returned backe againe to the King, who reioysed not a little to haue him neare about him. At length, the Kinges bodie became so dried vp, wasted, and consumed, that he appeared rather to be an Anatomy, then a man, only thorough the ignorance of this Physitian, as was well obserued by men of greater experience. For, a Melancholy body ought to be humected; and moderately heated, as well with Aliments as Medicaments. And albeit he continually desired to drinke Wine, and feed on a boyled Capon, which were very conuenient for his health: yet would Cottier by no meanes permit it, but made vse of a more hurtfull and dangerous diet.

M. Oliver the Barber sent into Flanders.

The Kinges extremitie was caused by his Physitians ignorance.

Now, as thus his bodye wasted in apparant view, so his Spirites became depraued, and strangely altered. For, hee tooke a sudden conceit, that his bodye stunke extreemly, and that hee felt nothing but very vnfauoury smels; which indeed he did not, but in meere opinion onely. And though all the standers by, yea, the Physitian himselfe affirmed the contrary, yet could he not (by any meanes) be dissuaded from this strong conceit, but daily desired a remedy for this supposed disease. Insomuch, as they were compelled to burn very odoriferous perfumes, and to giue him cordiall Powders of violent sauer: but his chiefeft delight was in receyuing perfumes, which both bred and brought him vnto daily sownings & Convulsions; whereby appeared, that these thinges happened by Diuine permission, rather then any indiscretion in them that applyed them.

A strange perfwasion in Melancholy.

Sweet cordial powders and strong perfumes applyed vpon no iust occasion.

These alterations were obserued and known to many, and among others, the Lord De l' Auardin, who (at what perill soeuer it cost him) would needs see the King, and said to Cottier the Physitian, that the King ought to bee put in mind of his Confessour or Ghostly Father,

An excellent inuention of the Lord de l' Auardin, to speake with the King.

ther, and very requisite was it, that hee should receive the blessed Sacrament, because it could not be otherwise, but his ending was very neere. The Physitian replied, that this matter was as well knowne to him, as to any other; and that no meane danger depended on very speech thereof, because for the space of halfe a yeare before, his Maiesty had bin continually fearefull of death; and now, if any man should but name death in his hearing, meer terror of the word would bereave him of life. Notwithstanding all which speeches, the Lorde De l' Auardin (having got entrance into the Chamber) said aloud to the King; That if he would be quit of this sickness, he must daily prepare himselfe to Confession, and receive the blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist: in regard, that his Father, being aged above an hundred yeares, and very sickely, recovered his health by that meanes onely. The King being indifferently perswaded, gave his consent: provided, that it might be doone by a Religious man, named Phillip, well entred into yeares, of good life, and had the fame to be verie Learned, being a Monke in the Abbey of S. Martine; which reuerend man, having admission to the King, advised him in the course of confession, to craue pardon of God for so many murders, Bontefoux and rauages, as in his former daies hee had committed, perswading him, that (to his vttermost power) he should make recompence and satisfaction. Among other matters, he alledged, that the people of the Franché Comté, who much complained, that albeit they were (almost all of them) brought vnder his obedience; yet notwithstanding, his men of war stil committed the most detestable insolences on them; that could be denied. He told him also, that if God had spoken it (with his own mouth) to his good servant Dauid, that hee would neuer dwell in a goodly Temple, which he purposed to build, because he had bin too prodigall in the expence of Mens blood by his wars, and ouer exceeded in his hostile actions; euen so it was to be feared, that he wold withdraw his grace from the blessed Sacrament, instantly to be administered, and he might hazard the receipt of his owne damnation, except he caused his Warriours to cease from their cruelties. He further advised him, to reduce the taxations of the kingdom to such estate as hee found them at his entrance; for his people were ouer-extreamely impouerished, and the greater part of them dyed by meere indigence.

The King made answer, that howsoeuer he repented the rauagements & spoils by him performed in the County of Bourgongne; hee was very hartily sorry, that all the Lands belonging vnto the late Duke of Bourgongne, was not brought into the same condition. As for the Subsidies and Taxations by him imposed vpon his people; so soone as he recovered health, he would discharge them, and no other answer could be had from him. Notwithstanding al which obstinacy, the Religious father performed his duty, deliuered him the blessed Sacrament, and left him to the further disposition of God. Soone after, they offered him meat to eat, which he could not receive, because he said, that he felt a foule stinking faubour ascending out of his body vp into his braine: wherefore, he commanded plenty of perfumes about him; whereof it seemed he could neuer receive sufficient, but euen in that manner surrendered vp his soule. So, shortly after, it grew to be a Proverb in France, That the King was smokt to death like an old Fox. Yet notwithstanding all these fantastick humors, he bethoght himselfe (some few yeares before) of his buriall, & gaue order to be interred in a Church (which was founded by himselfe) called, Nostre Dame a Clery, where he appointed diuers Cannons to pray for him.

Having thus discoursed the death of King Lewes, we may not forget Maister Oliuer the Dane, Barber; terming himselfe a Counsellor vnto King Lewes the eleuenth, no, nor M. Jaques Cottier the Physitian, and Chancellour. It hath been a long and common received saying; That of a good Life, ensueth a good Death, and of a bad life, as badde a Conclusion, which will be found most true, in the end of our fore-named M. Oliuer. For, you must first vnderstand, that King Lewes the eleuenth, extraordinarily doing in affection vnto this Barber: bestowed on him the Captaine-shippe of Chasteau de Loches, which was, and yet is to this present a most goodly estate; also, the gouernment of S. Quintins in Picardy; and from a meane Gentleman of his Chamber, aduanced him to many worthy Seigneuries. Infomuch, that being possessed of such large liuings & reuennues, and his courses not to bee controlled, hee plunged himselfe in all kinds of Voluptuousnesse, and euen as boldly after the Kinges death, as in his life time.

A History of a yong Gentleman of France.

It fortun'd, that a young Gentleman had committed some offence, of what moment I do not well remember, but the Prouost of the Kings household had him in charge as a prisoner. The Wife to this yong Gentleman wel knowing, that if her Husbands case came to strict examination of Law, it would endanger his life, laboured with earnest sollicitings from one to another, whom she supposed to hold best credit and fauour with King Charles, eight of that Name, and Sonne vnto the King deceased. At length she remembered the Dane, whom she thought to hold like esteem as when King Lewes liued (because hee was still much followed, richly accoutred, and entred the Kinges Chamber when himselfe pleased) to him wholly she addressed her suite, entreating him to bee the meanes of her Husbands deliuerance. This Oliuer, perceyuing the sollicitresse to be faire, young, and of comely personage, promised to free her Husbande from prison; provided, that hee might haue familiar knowledge of her, as Lovers in secret Dalliance vse to doe; whereto the poore Gentlewoman (seeing no other meanes of mercy) after infinit and potent Denials, was wonne to condescend.

The dishonest request of M. Oliuer the barber.

*M. Oliuer*s perswasions to the Prouost.

Hereupon, to keepe promise with the Gentlewoman, M. Oliuer went vnto the Prouost, and entreated him to stand in the Gentlemans iustification: which by no meanes he would do. Then hee desired him to winke at his breach or escape out of prison: but much lesse wold he listen to any such perswasion, albeit he promised to stand betweene him and all perill. At length, M. Oliuer seeing himselfe so neglected, and his suit denied, reproached the Prouost with great ingratitude, because he had placed him in that Office, and won him many guifts and graces from the deceased King; beside, when the King was once so incensed against him, as it stood vpon his no meane detriment, he appeased the matter, and wrought his peace. These, and other such like vrgent speeches, preuailed at length so with the Prouost, that he returned this answer. If M. Oliuer could aduise the meanes whereby the Gentleman might euade, and he sustain no perill when his prisoner should be cald for, he would gladly yeild thereto: whereto M. Oliuer thus replied. The safest and surest meanes for his riddance, & to auoid al further dangerous questioning on his own behalfe, is to strangle the prisoner in the Gaole, and then hurle his bodye into the Riuer. In this manner (quoth he) the party offended shall bee both auenged and satisfied, the Wife to the dead man not iniured, because hir husband stood not (as yet) in law condemned, and matters thus passing, al parties would be pleased.

The case thus fully concluded on betweene them, the Dane inuites the Gentlewoman that very instant Night to his lodging, to satisfie his lewde and libidinous Lust; which she (poor soul) accordingly did, being by him most assuredly perswaded, that the next Morning shee should see her husband at Liberty. But she (alas) was too much deceyued; for, while M. Oliuer entertained her in his bed, the Varlet of his Chamber, named Daniell, and another, called Oyac, a mender of Stockings by his first professio (whom I do imagine to be the very same man, that Sessell sayd to bee Admiral to King Lewes) went & strangled the woful Gentleman in the Prouosts Prison, and afterwards threw him into the Riuer of Seine, as if hee had wilfully leapt out of his Lodging Window, and coueted rather to be drowned, then to answer his accusation. The body floating vpon the water, as hauing no Capacity of sinking, by reason that life was first depriued, was by Sailers & Watermen haled vp on Lande, to lye there on the banke al the day insuing, where it was soone visited by multitudes of people, and easily knowne of euery beholder. The Gentlewoman arising from the Barbar in the morning early, fearfull to be noted, and no way doubting of hir Husbands freedome so dearly bought with her dishonor, heard as she passed along, along, that such an imprisoned Gentleman was dead, and lay vpon the banke of the Riuer. With heauy heart she hying thither, too soon found the truth of those heauie and sorrowfull tydings, throwing her selfe downe vpon the dead bodie, made most lamentable and pittifull complaints, cursing (in aboundance of tears, and wringing her handes) the Dane that had so falsely deceiued her, and robbed her of her cheefest Honour, vnder promise of her Husbandes most safe deliuerance.

The Lamentations of this faire weeping Gentlewoman, procured such compassion in the by-standers, that Iustice was soone acquainted with so foule an offence; and M. Oliuer being immediately apprehended, and confronted with the wofull Gentlewoman face to face, vvas forthwith (notwithstanding all his stoute denialles) condemned to the Racke and Tortures. Being vnable to endure the torment, he confessed the fact, relying so much vpon the Kinges fauour, and his owne proude Authority, that they durst not sentence him with death. But heerein the Deceiuer found himselfe Deceyued; for, being generally hated, because he hadde so highly abused the deceased Kinges trust reposed in him, and the whole State, beside the addition of this monstrous inhumanitie, he was adiudged to bee hanged, and strangled to Death. In which sentence, his man Daniell bare him companie, beside large amends out of his Liuing, to the wo-hearted Widow. As for Oyac the Hose-mender, he was not hanged, because it was sufficiently approoued, that he was not present in the prison, when Daniell alone strangled the Gentleman, but onely holpe afterward to throwe the dead bodie into the Riuer; wherefore he had his eares cut off, and then was banished out of the Kingdome.

Now, concerning Maister Iaques Cottier the Physitian, who was retired home vnto his owne House, enriched with fīue and twentie thousand Florins of Reuenues which he had gotten, partly by Offenders Confiscations, whereof the dead King had made him possessour; as also, by the large summes of Money so lately giuen him out of the Exchequer. It was justified by re-edition of the Treasurers accounts of the saide Exchequer, that he had receiued in readie moneyes, aboue fourescore and eightene thousand Crownes, besides other great giiftes by seuerall parcelles. Heereupon, he was pursued to make restitution; because those giifts were immense, and exceeding reason.

At length, the King being much hindered in his intended Voyage for Naples, onely thorough great want of money, Maister Iaques Cottier, voluntarily gaue his Maiesty (vnder the faigned Title of borrowing) the summe of fiftie thousand Crownes, and so all further enquire after his Wealth and possessions ceased.

This Historie may instruct such men as are high in the fauour of Kinges and Princes, and taste of their bountie in verie gracious manner, when Lordes and others of farre more merit, passe vnraged; not to abuse their Royall Liberalities, or become thereby more proud and vicious. But rather, to obserue a mediocrity in all their outwarde actions, knowing and considering the instabilitie that waiteth on this worldes best occasions.

Example of the Maister Cooke in his seruice to the Table.

Kitchin, hauing readily prepared al those Dishes on his Kitchen Table, that are to bee presented before the Prince; with a Morfell of Bread, he passeth ouer all those Dishes, dipping it also into the Broaths, Sawces, and all other Viands to bee fed on; then eateth he the said piece of bread, to the end, that all suspition of poyson may be auoided. Againe, those seuerall seruices are set on the Princes Table (and before him). he that placeth or ordereth those dishes, performeth as much as the Maister Cooke formerly did. Whereby it is presumed, that the Prince may feede with the safer security. But I am not of the minde, that these essayes or tastings haue any certaine assurance, because those essayers or Tasters doo receiue so small a triall, that albeit the meats should be impoysoned, yet it cannot hurt them; or (at the most) so little, as with very slender remedy, they may be deliuered from any danger.

A worldly way to make Princes wise.

The Authors reason for his doubt.

A Taster cannot bee easily poysoned.

Preseruatiues against poyson such as haue bin tried.

Many Monarchs & Kings haue bin poysoned, notwithstanding all care for preuention.

Moreover, he that had so diuellish an intent, as to commit an acte so detestable, that partie could not be easily poysoned, by meanes of forced Flesh or Fish, which most commonly is the seruice to great mens Tables. There is much matter (in this case) of important admonishment, to wit; that such treacherous Tasters or Essayers, may formerly haue receiued some precious Antidote, to preuent the poysons perill vnto himselfe; or filled his stomacke with fat and Oyle Meates; or drinke some quantity of Milke; or fed on very fat Tripes; or Lettice well prepared with Oyle, without Salt or Vineger. Nay, it may bee, that hauing receiued some pretty quantitie of poyson, and kept it by such meanes in his stomacke, hee will cast it vp againe, without any hurt or danger, and there is nothing more certaine then this. I say beside, that Cup-tasters and Butlers may do the like; in tasting their wines, or other drinks.

Heere some one may obiect vnto me, that there is great apparance of truth in my Wordes; and that manie Monarchs and Kings, notwithstanding their Essayers, Tasters, and other vigilant care to preuent such Villainy, haue been impoysoned, and dyed cruelly; as Alexander the Great, Drusus, Clandius Cesar, Charls first of that Name, King of Fraunce, John King of England, and diuers other. Also, that these Essayes, Tastings, and other such like Ceremonies, are nothing else but markes of Soueraignty and principality; and such vesselles of Golde and Siluer may bee made, at such time as the mettals are melted, that may haue such Antidotes mingled therewith, quite contrary to all poysons whatsoever. Moreover, hauing vesselles in this order prepared, they will preferue whosoever shall be impoysoned, if they feede on their viands out of them only, and receiue their drink out of none other; Nay, I my selfe beheld a Physitian, mounted vp to such a degree of folly, as hee would needes vrgen an absolute perswasion of all these things; to Catharine de Medicis, late Queene of France, albeit they are most absurd, and voide of all reason; for Golde-Smithes themselues do maintaine the impossibility of them. I referre the iudgement heerof, to such as are best experienced in naturall things, because nothing whatsoever can be mingled among Gold and Siluer; but mettals only.

I haue heard some to discourse of preseruatiues against poysons, in the presence of King Charles the ninth; and Queene Catharine his Mother; and they haue iustified very constantly, to defend any Man or woman from impoysoning; by wearing a Ring on his or her Finger, that should haue a Toad-stone placed so in it, as it might touch the flesh of the Finger; and such was the excellent Vertue thereof, as the party should feele it to burne his Flesh, if any poyson were presented to him.

Others haue affirmed, that there are certaine Carracters to be worne, hanging about ones necke, or engrauen in a ring, whose naturall property, expelleth al manner of poysons. They alledged Albertus Magnus, that hee saith in his Treatise of Images, that if any man caused to be engrauen in some precious stone, the Image of the Hearbe called Draggon-Wort, with all his Spots, Markes, and Starres, and doe but carry the stone about him, it is most singular against all Venoms. Pedro de Albano, was also produced, to set downe in his Writings that hee found in a certaine Booke, whereof in elder times, the Kings of Persia made especiall account, that whosoever procured to be engrauen in a Hematist, a man kneeling, circkled rounde about with a Ser-

Serpent, holding the head thereof in his right hand, and the taile in his left; then setting that Stone in a Ring of fine Gold, and wearing it dayly, it would preferue and keepe him from all manner of poysons.

In my poore opinion, if this Image should haue so rare a Vertue, as no where else was euer heard of, it were verie requisite, that the engraving must be done vnder the Constellation of some Plannet, whose influence shoulde infuse the propriety in the Sculpture. It was further added in the discourse, that the Agate or Iacinth, Orientall Saphire, Emeraulde, and the Stone which is called Draconitis, because it is saide to be found within the Head of a Draggon, and many other Stones beside, haue the selfe-same qualities.

As for my selfe, to deliuer readily my iudgement in this case, I thinke there is no great assuraunce to bee reposed in such carriages, because I neuer beheld so much as one experiment, whereto anie Faith or Credit might be giuen. And yet very neere all these fore-named things, haue bene experimented on diuers persons, condemned to death for diuers offences, on whom no effect at all could be wrought. And yet it may bee, that by subtilizing (very cunningly) an Emerald, Iacinth, Agate, or Saphire, and putting it into a Cup of Wine, or Cordiall water, the party offended with some poison may finde ease and helpe, because such stones do naturally strengthen the heart. But that wearing or carriage of them only, can quaille the malignity of any poison, I will neuer beleue (as some verie fondly do, vntill I may my selfe beholde some great and notable experiment thereof.

Not long after our fore-named discourse, there came vnto the said Kinges Court, an impudent bold-fact Fellow, a Champenois, aged about thirtie yeares, (whom I spare to name, because hee was extract of Vertuous Lignage, both by Father and Mother, to whom the louers of Learning are not a litle obliged, though he degenerated too far:) This man gaue solemne assurance, that hee had (about some yeare since past) trauailed thorowe diuers famous Citties of Germany, and frequented companies of diuers opinions, especially in Religion; among whom he heard it credibly reported, that they of the pretended reformed Religion in France, sought means to poison the king, his Brethren, & their Mother the Queen. Whereupon, he shaped his course out of Germany, into Italy, and thence into Spaine, only to find such occasions as best might assure and preferue their liues. At last, comming to Lisbone, the Metropolitan Cittie in the Kingdome of portugal, with verie great Labour, and at a deare Value, he bought a Stone, called Pazar, or Bazar, which had bene found in the brest or stomacke of a sauage Beast, like to one of the wilde Goats liuing in diuers places of india: adding withall, that hee had made diuers experiments of the like Stone, as well on Beasts, as Moores, and others of the Mahometan religion. Then with plentie of Oathes, hee assured their Royall Maiesties, that the partie whome hee bought it of, was a Captaine belonging vnto the Spanish Seas; and shewing the Stone, it was presently deliuered to the Physitians belonging to the King and Queene, for their aduise and counsel in the matter: shee being a very Wise Princeesse, and well enstructed, hardlie could shee be drawne to doe any thing rashly.

Counsell was giuen to the Queene, to make triall of the Stones Vertue, vpon criminall prisoners, such as had deserued Death, and extraordinary punishment. Whereupon, the Prouost belonging vnto the Household, was sent for; and being questioned, whether he had anie Offender in his prisons worthy of death, he answered; that he had a bold Theef, condemned for robbing the Kinges Receyvers of monies, and remained at his Maiestie mercie. Also he hadde another, a Cooke by his profession, who had robbed his Maister of great store of plate, & both these, without order to the contrary, were to suffer death the next Morning.

It was concluded; that poison should be giuen to both these condemned men, as much to the one, as to the other; and the Pazar or Bazar stone, being beaten to powder, a quantity thereof should be giuen to the one prisoner, and none at all to the other; to make a perfect prooffe of the Stones Vertue; which stone, I my selfe handled, and was as bigge as a common Almond. But hee that recieued the powder der of the saide stone, according to the proportion appointed by the Champenois, notwithstanding hee was holpen thereby, as much as could bee possibly deuised, yet he died as well as the other prisoner, both of them enduring much more heauy, great, and grieuous Torments, then they should haue done by the punnishments prepared for them. Which when the king & the Queen his Mother perceiued, they threw the rest of the Stone into the fire, and sharply rebuked the Champenois for his impudent lying. By this meanes, the imposture was frustrated of his intent, which was, to obtaine the guift of a thousand Crownes, beside the first Abby or Priory that fell vacant, or already was falne. The man was not long since known to be liuing in very miserable condition, lame in his limbes, aged aboue threescore, and generally scorned of euerie one that knew or heard of his apparant folly.

By this discourse, Princes and others of high quality may learne, not to be ouer-confident in such men, as giue the aduise and meanes to preferue themselves from poysons; wherof no sound experience hath beene made, but bequeaths them still to dayly dangers. For which reason, wee will declare in our succeeding Chapter, how, and in what manner they may be preserued and defended against poysons. Also, why poysons are vted to Princes, and men of high Authority, to bereaue them of their Liues, rather then by Armes or Weapons.

CHAP. XVI.

Why the liues of Princes are more attempted by poysons, then by Armes. And by what meanes they may preferue & helpe themselves, if they doubt or finde themselves to be impoysoned.

Rdinarily, such as pretend the death of Princes, Princesses, & of other illustrious persons by poysons, they do it in that kind, because openly murdering a Prince, expo-seth the parties life to ineuitable death; and neuer hath any one bin seene (or at the least very rarely) to escape, because he must needes be surprized by the Archers or Guardes, that continually attendeth the person Royall. Wherefore, such as dare contriue so wicked an action, are commonly men of highest rank or note, and (oftentimes) of their owne blood, either aspyring to their estate & dignities, or in reuenge of some receyued iniury; wherein no reason being able to rule them, fury and violent rage transportes them vnto this detestable meanes.

Now, to auoid and prevent all occasions of such dreadfull attemptes, a Prince ought not to vsurp on any estate appertaining to another. For this is an especiall reason, to leade both himselfe and his to daily danger. Hee ought also religiously to keepe himselfe in the state of grace, by frequent and deuout Prayers vnto Almighty God; to Loue his Subiects; to doo nothing against the Lawes of Nature, and to be Nobly Liberrall to such as are about him, & haue the hourelly care of his person. Moreover, they that attend on the health of any Prince or Princessse, as Physitians and their Adiuncts; they ought to vse their stomacks to Gargarismes and Castings, at least once euerie month, in the Morning. For, ouer and beside that it much auayleth against poysons, which at their first Working will thereby bee expelled presently, so is it one of the most soueraigne remedies and securities that can be deuised. To purge the stomacke, is likewise aduantageable against the Stone, Dropsie, Goute, &c. And two or three dayes he must vse to take Treacle, or Mithridatum, fasting. Some do highly commend the Confection of Iacinth; and by frequent vse of these things, very rarely shall the bodie be preferued them poyson.

But if it happen, that a Prince haue vndoubtedly receyued poyson, suddenly let him bee made to vomit by voluntary Drinkes, if Nature bee not easily therto inclined; or let him drink a good quantity of Lukewarme milke, and if Butter bee well mingled there among the cure is much the sooner compassed. After very strong vomiting, & so much as he is able to indure, with the receipt of some Moreouer, those Kitchen Vesselles for Cookery, wherein his Meates and Broaths are to be drest, ought daily and houely to be kept couered, to prevent the fall of any Venomous Creatures thereinto, as Stellions, Phalanges, Lizards, Scorpions, Serpents, & Spiders, who ordinarily make their aboad about Chimnies. Nicholas hath set downe in his Writings, that all the Monkes in a Conuent at Florence, dyed, by hauing eaten Pottage and Meate sodden in a Pot, whereinto (from the toppe of the Chimney by chaunce) a dead Spyder fell.

A strange History.

What Sauces are to be thinned by colour.

Besides, no Sauces are to be presented to Princes, especialy if they be thick, or in colour Greene, Red, or White; because very daungerous Poysons may be commixed in those Colours, they being also much like to them: These things diligently obserued, it shall be a very difficult matter, to bereaue any Princes life by Poyson. Now let vs see in our ensuing Chapter, if poysons may be giuen any other way, then in meates or drinckes.

CHAP. XVII.

That a man may bee impoysoned by Pomanders of sweete smell, Fumes, of Torches, Tapers, Candles; by Letters, Garments, and other such like things.

IN our former Chapters, we haue discoursed how poyson may be administr'd in Meats and Drinkes, to the preiudice of life. Now we are to suruay, whether the like Treacherie may be accomplished by sweet smelling Pomanders, Fume, or smoake of Torches, Candles; or by reading Letters, wearing Gloues, Shirts, and other Garments.

Many haue held Opinion, that the kissing of Princes Garmentes, before they be put vpon their persons, and generally all things presented vnto them, as Letters, Hand-kerchiefes, or whatsoever else, is done to no other end, but onely for Ceremony, Respect, and Honour, in duty and reuerence to their Greatnesse and Excellency. But, I am able to affirme the contrary, because it was at first inuented; and done, expressly to assure them from being Impoysoned, by such things as should be presented vnto them. And whosoever will read the Greeke Authours, shall finde that Wickednesse to be most auncient; especially we finde, that the Caribes (inhabiting the New World) haue long vsed it.

Why all things deliuered to Princes, are first kissed.

And to approoue my words, I will alledge some examples well knowne to our selues and that such things are to be done, it hath bin, and yet may be noted, that whosoever sleepeeth or sitteth any long while vnder the shadow of a Walnut Tree in Summer, shall forthwith be offended with a grieuous Head-ach. And such as take the Coole Ayre vnder the Yew Tree, will be in dreadfull peril. I my selfe haue obserued diuers inconueniences happening thereby; not only to Men and Women, but to Beasts likewise. Do we not (almost) daily behold, that the smoake of a Tallow Candle, the light being suddainly extinct, is very dangerous to Women with child, causing the Head-ach in extremest maner, and brought one (whom I very well know) to the falling sicknesse?

A Friend of mine, commonly called the Fat man, a Piccarde by Nation, and Chirurgion to the late Lewes of Bourbon Prince of Conde, who hauing handled and carried about him a sweet Pomander, for the space of siue or six Houres; which Pomander, an Italian Perfumer presented to the said Prince, & presently was deliuered to the sayd Chirurgions keeping, who soone after, fell into Sownings, Castings, Torments in the Braine, Convulsions, and afterwards, into most grieuous and miserable languishing. Yet two Moneths after, by the diligent cate and assistance of a Piemontois Physitian, who belongeth to my Lord the Constable at this instant, and then called Marshall d'Anville, hee was recovered. Also, the Seruant to the Apothecarie, called Gonier, dwelling in Paris, despising the Friendly

order (as sworn Lieutenant to the king) that the Towne might bee maintayned for his Maiesties seruice, and hauing (by example of Iustice) giuen terror to som Offenders; a Soldiour of som account, shutting himselfe into a Cabinet, least otherwise hee should bee discovered; by the vapor of a very small Char-cole fire, died in lesse then twelue houres, and could by no meanes be recouered. The fume and smoake of impoysoned Torches and Candles, are not they much more able to procure the death of anie person?

It is not long since, a Lombard gaue an impoysoned Gilly-floure, vnto one whose death he desired, albeit hee dissembled his inward treachery verie cunningly, and (in outward shew) with extraordinary friendship; but by smelling to the said Floure, the party suddenly fell downe dead. The smell or saueur of a Sea-Hare, is so pernicious, as not only it troubleth the sense, sight, and procureth casting; but likewise, if a man continue in the same, sent but for some few houres, it causeth death without any recouery, as I my selfe haue seene by experience.

These few written and recorded histories, of taking away life by impoy-soned Odours and Vapours, may serue as sufficient for our instruction; let vs com-now to those other kindes, which (by touching onely) do as much, or rather farre worse. About some two yeares since, I beheld the death of a yong man, aged scarcely twenty yeares, who suffered the application of a great Emplay-ster (made of the flies called Cantharides) to his cheek, whereon he had a great red blemish, which hee brought with him into the world at his birth, and appeared to him as no meane deformity; extreamity of paine would not permit him to indure the plaister hardly foure houres, but he was dead before the next Morning. And yet, as euery one well knoweth, the Cantharides are one of the weakest Venoms.

I also, sawe the death of a Gardiner, who, by pruning and cleansing his trees, the Egges of Catterpillers happened to fall on his face, and venomed it beyond recouery. Now, albeit this may seeme somwhat rare, that a mans death should be caused by so small a matter: yet it is most certaine, that both these Histories, and such as follow after, doo eu-dently declare, that by nothing but the very touch onely of some impoysoned thing, death ensueth without any Remedy.

Galen declareth, that a man in the City of Bythinia, scituate in the kingdom of Thrace, caused the death of diuers men by an Hearb, compassing the means that it might but sticke vpon their skinne only. And that the first knowledge or experience which he had thereof; was, by buying the Liuer of an Hogge in the Market, and returning from the City to his Country house, he had occasion by the way to do the Office of nature, laying the Liuer (in meane while) on the ground, on diuers hearbes. As he tooke vp the Liuer again, he perceiued blood to yssue foorth in great aboundance; whereby he iudged, that it proceeded from some Vertue in one of the hearbs, that stil cleaued fast to the Liuer: he further conceiued, that if the same Hearbe were applyed to men or Beasts; their death wold easily be thereby procured, which he accordingly performd on such as himselfe pleased. But his wicked and bloody practise being known, at length he was apprehended and broght before the Minister of Iustice, where, without sufferance of many torments, he confessed the whol matter, and what plenty of that herb grew in that place only, which he sware he neuer had reuealed to any person. When the Magistrate had heard his whole Confession, he condemned him to Death, and presently caused his eyes to be blindfolded: to the end, that as he was led on the way vnto the place whereas his Execution was appointed, he should not teach or instruct any other, in so horrid and damnable a practise.

Garments of corrupted persons: The Neapolitane disease is very easily so-taken in Italy, but rarely in France. Good Histories doe assure vs, that Hercules died with extreame torments, being impoysoned by a shirt which his wife had sent him.

Monsieur de Montagnac, Lord of Trenchillon, who accompanied Mesire Francois de Noailles, Bishop of Dax, Ambassadour into the East, deliuered vnto mee for an vndoubted truth, that a Turke in the City of Patara in Lycia, caused the death of a Wallachian, in this manner. The Turke very desirous of the Wallachians death, which yet he dissembled artificially, sought all vnsuspected meanes how to compasse it: & his reason was, because the Wallachian would not take his oath, that the Turke (being a Patavian Souldiour) was one of the first that mounted on the breach of a smal town, (but very strong) which the Turkes had besiedged and taken in Hungarie. For, such as can approue in Turky, that they haue performed any Generous Act; are recompenced with diuers Ducates, ouer and aboue their ordinary pay, and are likewise aduanced to the first vacant degrees. The Turke at last presented the Wallachian with a faire paire of red Buskins, which he accepting as a Signall of kindnesse, did presently put them on his Legges; or had not worn them aboue two houres, but a great heate and rednesse appeared on his Legges, which he himselfe (as yet) perceiued not. Hauing put off his Buskins, the rednesse conuerted into pushes, blaines, and blisters; which quickly running ouer his whole body, he dyed within twelue houres, exclaiming on the Patavian, who was fled away.

As concerning a common report, that the Saddles of Horses may be impoysoned, the Raines of their Bridles, the stirrups, and Scabberds and Sheathes of Swordes, thereby to impoyson such as sit, handle, or weare them: the Turkes that inhabite the higher Missa, are saide to be skilfull Maisters in such exercises; yet I make some difficulty of giuing credit hereto, because I neuer beheld any such accident to happen. Neuertheless, many men of sound credit, who haue trauailed the East, and the adioyning parts; do faithfully maintaine the truth thereof. But if there be nothing more certaine, then that a body may be impoysoned, euen to death, by a paire of Gloues, if but drawne vpon the hands, and by a Handkerchiefe, if the face be wiped therewith; Then let mee tell you for a truth, that a great Lady of France (some few yeares past) had both these wicked presents, onely for the couetousnesse of the great wealth she enioyed, and the strange manner of her death was bemoaned by many.

Seeing then, that the death of Princes and great persons may thus be compassed: I would aduise them that hold so high dignities, and liue among bad people; who make no conscience of vsing all kinds of wickednesse; to carry Powders about them, and other compositions, such as skilfull Physicians can well instruct them in, which may defend the Braine, the Lungs, and Heart, preserving both them and the other inward parts of the body, with receiuing often Treacle, Methridate, and such like vertuous things. As for Saddles, Reines of Bridles, and Scabberds of Weapons: danger in them may be auoyded, by seeing them well cleansed, chafed, and rubbed, with faire Linnen Cloathes before a mans face. And for Handkerchiefes, Gloues, and Letters, they ought to be well heated by good fires, and carried abroad into the ayre, before they be read or vsed, as the like is to be done in things of like qualitie.

Danger by Gloues and Handkerchiefes.

Necessary aduise to prevent such perils, and by what meanes.

CHAP. XVIII.

That all Venims or Poysons, haue not the power to kill the heart, but that diuers of them (by a certaine hidden or manifest property) doe rather worke against one certaine part of the body, then against another.

Diuers doe hold opinion, that all Venimes or Poysons, do containe operation alike, and all of them tend to no other end, but to kill the hart, which is the onely fountaine of life. But this coniecture hath deceived deceiued many, for the greater part of Poysons, haue an obscure or apparant property, to viciate or destroy rather one part then another. Because there are some that will infect the braine; others the mouth; others the Lights or Lungs; others the Liuer; others, the Melt, or Spleene; others, the Reines; others the Bladder; and others, the seuerall ioynts of the Body, &c. Concerning the meanest or most common kinds, whereof others haue saide somewhat before my self, I would discourse a little; and so much the rather, because what is handled in this Chapter, I wold iustifie for truth; and therefore we will beginne with a venomous simple, that woundeth and offendeth the Braine very greatly.

The danger of Hemlocke, or Hoalocke.

Hemlock, or Homlock, called in Latine Cicuta, an Hearb vulgarly knowne, by an apparant property, doth more offend the Braine, then any other part of the Body: insomuch, that they who haue tasted thereof, haue felt an instant wheeling giddinesse, or torment in the head, and sometimes meerey haue run mad. I haue seene two men, who thinking they did eate Parsley, were deceiued with Hemlock (for these two Plants haue a very neere resemblance) the one dyed soone after; and the other (while he liued) could neuer recouer his health, and this hath been noted in many more. The Athenians vsed to giue the Iuyce of Hemlock, to such honorable persons in their citty, as were condemned to death by sentence of the Iudge. In Tuscanie groweth a great quantity thereof, and if their Asses happen to feede thereon, they fall downe in such a profound sleepe, as they seeme rather to be dead then astonied. Many poore Countrey people were hereby much abused in former times, who little dreamt on any such strange alteration, or the cause thereof: for verily, imagining their Asses to be starke dead, and hauing more then halfe sleyed their skins, the beasts recouered, to the great amazement of their Maisters, but much delight of the Beholders. Hereby may be easily obserued, that Hemlock is altogether contrary to the Braine.

How the Athenians vsed the iuyce of Hemlock.

The people of Tuscany much abused by Hemlocke.

Crow-foot causeth men to dye laughing.

There is another Simple, cald Crow-foot; in French Batrachion, or Passe-floure; in Greek and in Latine Apium ri- sus, which if it be put into the mouth, it with-draweth the Iawes in such maner, as if it procured continuall laughter, & in laughing manner it causeth death. That which groweth in Sardignia, is not altogether so violent: yet, if it be applyed to the Flesh, as sometimes it is to the Arteries of the Armes against a Feauer Quartaine, it cauterizeth and burneth the Flesh.

The scent or smell of the Sea-Hare, and his Flesh dryed in Powder and taken, it greatly iniureth the voyce, and woundeth the Lights in such manner, that such as haue receiued thereof but three times, and in very small quantity, haue bin brought to an exulceration of the Lungs, and incurable consumption of the body. This was verified on a Chanter or Quirister, in the Chappell of King Charles the ninth, in the yeare 1566. by another man of the same quality, who beeing desirous to preferre a Kins-man of his into the other Mans place, he being in gracious respect with the King, gaue him some of this Powder, wheron grew an Vlcer in his lungs, his voyce vtterly spoyled, and he (in short while after) dyed. Here you are to vnderstand, that Chaunters vse sometimes to bacchanalize among themselves; especially, when they receiue any extraordinary benefits or rewardes of Princes, or other great Lords in the Courts, for Mornings or Euenings salutations with their Musique and voyces: then, for preservation of their voyces, they mingle diuers wholesome spices, compounded with Sugar among their Wines, to send them downe with the greater delectation. By which vn-suspected meanes, the Chanter could the more easily poyson his Enemy; whereof at last he dyed, hauing voyded (by extreimity of a Cough) a mighty Impostumation, which this dangerous Powder had bred within him. Neuerthelesse, the Fact was disclosed, and the Prouost of the Household directing his Procelle against the Chanter, he was (by sentence of the Iudge) hanged and strangled, and his body after burned.

The Poyson that is prepared of the Caterpillers, or litle red hairy Wormes bred in the tops of Pine-trees, and of the venomous blacke Fly, called a Long-leg, or Wag-legge; so frets and vlcerates the ulcerates the stomacke and bowels (but no other part of the body beside:) that whosoever receiveth it, will dye thereof in very short while remediless.

Concerning those Venoms that destroy the Liuer, there are some store of them; onely it shall content me to advertise the Reader, and remember him of the History alleadged in the precedent Chapter, of the Countrey-man of Bithynia, and how by the meanes of one onely Hearbe, which spoyled the Liuer he then carryed, he wrought the death of many people. And some of the Simplists of these our instant times, haue found out that dangerous Hearb; and yet, imitating the wisdom of their learned Maister Galen, they dare not make it openly knowne. They can likewise (for the same purpose) make Poysons of Minerals, and of diuers other Creatures in these daies, which neuer were knowne to our Elders; and they will take away life in very short time.

Against the Reines, Bladder, and genitive parts, I need speake of none but the Cantharides, whereof if any quantity be taken, or more then the skilfull Phisition shall prescribe by writing, without question death ensueth. As I myselfe saw happen to a young Gentlewoman, waiting in the Chamber of a Lady in Guyenne, to whom a wanton young Gallant (being amorous of her beauty and perfections) found meanes to make her receiue the weight of three drams of the Powder of Cantharides, mingled among certaine greene Hearbes, made Sallet-wise; onely to induce her to his voluptuous desires: and this he did by the Councell of a poore, needy, and wicked Apothecary, who (for three Crownes) sold him the said Powder of Cantharides. The Gentlewoman, within three houres after, fell into strange alterations: as a most violent heat, and exulceration of the Reines and Bladder, being desirous euery moment to auoid Vrine, with extreame stings and prickings, whereof in the end she dyed: And her body being opened after her death; the Reines, Matrixe, and Bladder, were found very blacke, dyed, and excoriated. Not onely the Cantharides being drunk, or otherwise inwardly receiued, are most pernicious, but likewise if they be outwardly applyed, as I

my selfe can witness, by that which happened to a Curtizane at Paris. She being offended because she was of a browne complexion, went to a certaine Mountebancke, to buy some meanes of fayrer beauty: He applyed a Cataplasme or emplayster, both to her Face and Neck, which was well compounded with the Cantharides, and this she must weare for the space of twelue houres; but within three daies after she died. There was likewise then present with me, one named Monsieur Greaume, a learned Phisition, who causing her body to be opened, her Reines, Matrixe, and Bladder (but no part else) were found to be Gangrened, and most filthily smelling.

There are also diuers kinds of Pulse or Graine (which I will forbear to speake of) whereof if any frequent vse be made; such debility will be found in the ioynts of the body, as in the Legs, Feete, Flanckes, Armes, and such like Members; that hardly can any ease be had for the paine. A Learned Phisition shewed me a Simple, with credible assurance, that if the weight of a Crowne were taken thereof; it would take away the benefit of sight within foure houres after. He shewed me also the root of another Simple, the powder wherof procured deafenesse.

Wherefore it is not to be doubted, but as there are Medicaments, which both purge and comfort certaine parts of a mans body: euen so there are diuers Venoms and Poysons; which assaile and molest one part more then another, as I thinke I haue sufficiently shewne. Witnessse Agaricke, that purgeth the braine particularly; and Muske likewise, which (in a small quantity) glads and comforts it: Aloes and Myrabolans, doe purge the stomack; Cinamon and Spicknard do make it well againe. Succory and Rheubarbe wil purge the Liuer; Ceterach and Cappier the Melt or Spleene; Terebinthina and cold Seeds, the Reines and Bladder: for al which, there are as many, or more kind of comforts: In like manner, there are Hearbs, Plants, Minerals, Animals, that both offend and help diuers parts of the body. Hauing (in mine opinion) discoursed sufficiently on this Argument, I thinke it not amisse (in our ensuing Chapter) to remooue their error; who do conceit, that Impoysoners can can worke so cunningly, on such bodies as they are willing to destroy: to make them languish, & liue so many months, weeks, daies, houres, or yeares, as they please to limit or appoint.

CHAP. XIX.

To know if an Impoisoner can so arteficially accommodate his poysons, that he may limit the houre, day, weeke, month, and yeare, in which time his intention shall cause the person to languish, & afterward die, by him poysoned.

Heophrastus is of the mind, that a man may so prepare Aconitum, or other poysons in such manner, as he may thereby cause another body to languish or die, according as himselfe pleaseth. He saith beside, that such as keepe poyson within them for any long time, shall dye with much paine, for it followeth on necessity, that the body will become dry and crumpled: whereas contrariwise, they that containe them but a short while, doe dye much more easily.

The vniuersality of Physitians haue concluded, that albeit some poysons are found to be more quicke and suddaine then others are or can be: yet notwithstanding, the one or others power, it is impossible to iudge assuredlie on what day shall be the period of their operation, in procuring the death of any one, as some haue supposed. For if we admit, that poysons are more sudden in somebodies, then in others: it proceedeth not from the naturall propriety of those poysons; but is caused by the greater or lesser resistance in nature, in the persons that bee impoisoned.

Hereupon it hath bin noted by experience, that in giuing one and the same poysons, and in iust equality of weight, to diuers condemned persons: one hath dyed within an houre, another in lesse then a quarter; and a third hath continued for foure and twenty houres; yea, in some man, nothing at all hath appeared, such hath bene the strength of Nature. This may be daily discerned in Laxatiue Medicines, for deliuering one and the same Medicine, (and in like quantity) to diuers diseased persons: in some it is found to be of facile motion; in others, of very tardy operation. To some, the Medicine dooth a little seruice; to others, a great deale; and to others nothing at all. It will purge some without grieffe or pain; in others, the same Medicine will cause a thousand languishes: and yet notwithstanding, all this proceedeth but from the diuersitie of temperature in Men, which cannot be so exactly noted, as to determine certainly, at what time naturall heat shall withstand or resist the poyson.

But let vs put the case, that there were an Impoisoner so subtile and ingenious, as (by experience and science) he could easily vnderstand the carriage of the vitall faculties in diuers and sundry persons, and that he could coniecture, how long he should liue to whom hee gaue the poyson: yet notwithstanding all this, it is impossible for him to know resolutely, which, shall bee the death-day of the party impoisoned by him. For it is not possible, that any Physitition or Philosopher (except it bee diuinely reuealed to him) should calculate so farre as the vtmost point, how much ther is in euery peticular body, both of Radicall humour, and of naturall heate: considering, that the principall qualities of our Bodies, do not alwaies continue in one condition. And hence it proceedth, that wee finde our selues to be more strong, or else more feeble, at one time then another: whereto wee may likewise adde, that internall causes doe alter and change our temperatures ordinarilie. Counter-poysons also, being giuing to such as are impoisoned, although they cannot surmount the malignity of the poyson; yet notwithstanding, they wil prolong the patients life. And therefore I hold it as a very great folly in any one to thinke, that hee can weigh and iudge of our inward faculties, euen as iustly as if he weighed Saffron.

It ought also further to be noted, that although the resistance happeneth, (for the most part) according as the Nature of the party Impoisoned is is weake or strong : yet neuertheless, it proceedeth likewise hence, that some men haue their arteries (through which some poysons passe, to penetrate so far as the heart) much greater and grosser then other men haue. For when a Poyson findeth the Conduits large & wide, not only doth it passe the more suddenly, but likewise it goes on and enters euen to the heart, by meanes of the ayre continually entring, that peerceth thorough the flabels of the heart, or other parts, where the poyson (by his hidden or manifest quality) seeketh to hurt. Which neuer happeneth in such persons, as haue a coole heart, and their vitall Spirits strengthlesse; because their Arteries are very narrow.

Hereupon ensueth the saying of Galen, that Hemlocke is mortall to men, and nutritiue to Stares or Starlings: for those Birds haue their Arteries so strait, that it is not possible for the venome in the Hemlocke, to penetrate so farre as the hart. And to approue my wordes, I will relate an History, of one named Seigneur Valentine, who was held to bee the naturall Sonne of Pope Alexander the sixt: & the same is alledged by Mathi-olus, who heard it reported credibly, by diuers men in his time. This Man, being desirous to poyson certain Cardinals at a banquet; without thinking thereon, poysoned himself also, with his Father, & diuers other friends: some wherof dyed within few daies after; others, some months after; others, some yeares; and yet himselfe escaped; by the help of certaine Antidotes which he tooke, and other remedies. He experimented the same poyson, by giuing it to diuers Mules and Mulets, which he could easily kill, according to the working of their naturall heat. The reasons then before alleadged, and this History may serue to perswade the Reader, that the vulgar opinion is not auailable; holding obstinately, that the Impoysoner can certainly determine the houre of a mans death, which is apparantly false.

Those people in the Prouince of Cumana, scituate in the West Indiæ; doe make a poyson which killeth the heart suddainely, eyther by the smell thereof; or touch: it is compounded of the blood of diuers Serpents; Gum made of a certaine Hearb, and a strange kinde of Apples, all commixed together, with the Heads of some Ants, that are full of venome. In composition of this vile Drugge, they shut vp an old Woman in a Chamber, giuing her all the seuerall substances, and such Wood as must boyle all the Simples together. This decoction continueth two or three daies and nights on the Fire, before it can be brought to perfection: and the old woman dyeth with the stincke and venomous fume issuing from the seething. If she dye, they then highly praise and commend the poyson; but if she scape without death, then they cast it away, and punish the woman very grieuouly. This poyson is said to be the very same, which is vsed by the Caribes, and against which, the Spaniards could neuer finde any remedy; being wounded by the impoysoned Arrowes and Darts, shot and cast at them by those Caribes.

I could haue proceeded further in this discourse of poysons, to the pleasing, or rather dislike of the Reader, because the subiect is some-what odious: but the cause procuring me to what hath beene deliuered, was, to aduise such as are constituted (in these our daies) in places of eminency and dignity, to haue an especiall regard of themselues, because ambition both hath beene, and yet is so great in some persons; as very few Princes haue not beene endangered by poyson. And if that way hath not preuailed, to make their liues subiect to their mallice; then Pistols haue beene employed, and impoysoned Knives: As on the most Christian King Henry the third, who was slaine in that manner at Saint Clou: Then on King Henry the fourth, whose memory will endure to the Worlds end, for a famous King and peerelesse Souldier: and who bare the markes of such villainous attempts all his life time, euen in his royall face, and could not preuent his death thereby.

I am also to be excused, in not setting downe the names of many poysons, & passing vnder silence the power of such as are very dangerous; because I held it no part of my duty, in regard that Galen himselfe refused to name them. Nicander, and (after him) Dioscorides, haue set downe the names of many poysons in their workes, and deliuered certaine signes, whereby to know what poysons are

What manner of people they were, that had the Title of Gymnosophistes.

Or better vnderstanding, what is meant by the word Gymnosophista, to such as are little experienced in the Greeke tongue, I direct mine intent, giuing them to know, that the Word is composed of two vocables; to wit, Gymnos, which is as much to say, as Naked; and Sophista, that is, Wise; euen as if you would say Naked.wise, for (in very truth) they went continually naked. Pliny and Cicero haue discoursed of them, and (after them) Saint Augustine. These Philosophers dwelt about Mount Caucasus, neere vnto the Riuer Ganges; where they went naked, as yet (to this day) the most part of the Inhabitants of that Countrey doe. They vsed to make Vowes, to liue in Deserts, some in Forrests: not during life, but for a certaine number of yeares, walking in contemplation of Celestiall thinges, and of Morall Philosophy. They would neuer enter into any Townes or Citties, neither married, but liued austerely, alwaies looking stedfastly on the Sunne, euen in the greatest heate of the day; standing vsually vppon one foot, in the very hottest and scorching sand or dust. Beeing wearied with long standing in that manner, they would stand as long vpon the other, and sildome stand on both feet together; this they wold likewise do in the extremest cold of winter.

They fed on nothing but Fruits and roots, which alwaies (in meere charity) was brought to them: for rather then to aske or require food, they would famish themselues to death. They vsed to lye in the coole shade vnder Trees, or else in the vast, wide, open fielde. Persons of great honorr, and multitudes of other people beside, vsed to goe see them, and brought their Children with them, to be enstructed by them; because it was reputed in euery opinion, that they were men of great sanctity, and excelled all other in knowledge. In breefe, all their Doctrine was to know God, shunne Vices, and (about all other) ambition. They invred their bodies to endure all kinds of afflictions, were it to bee burned aliuie: for many of them would cast themselues into a fire, if they had attained vnto the age of fifty yeares, or there about. There was no small number of them, but very many, and they accepted into their society children descended of the best houses. Whereof Cicero being certified, he maruailed not a little, that among so barbarous a Nation, and where they made no vse of letters: there should bee found so many Learned Philosophers, chaste, sober; adorned with many vertues, and accustomed to suffer all iniuries, as well of the Ayre, as in other externall matters.

Strabo writeth, that there were two kindes of Gymnosophistes; one of them dwelling in Deserts and Forrests, cloathing themselues with leaues and barks of trees, liuing bashfully and soberly, neuer dinking any Wine; and these Men were tearmed Hermanes. The other sort frequented Kings Courts, Citties, and assemblies of people, and they were called Brachmanes: who held opinion, that the day of death, was the birth-day of vertuous Soules; which opinion appeared to be truly Christian.

Alexander the great, hauing traailed farre in the Indiaes, heard report of these Gymnosophistes, and caused some of them to be brought before him: of whom he was sharply reprooued, because hee beeing but a Mortall Man, hauing but one mouth to feede, and one Kingdome, more then sufficient for his Gouerning; that yet he tooke such paines, and oftentimes fell into great dangers, to raunge, trouble, and conquer all the East

East and the Indiaes, which neuer any way had offended him. He seeing himselfe so toucht to the quicke by these naked Philosophers, for his limitless ambition; refused to passe on any further, but returned backe to Babylon, to liue thence forward quiet and peaceably, purposing neuer after to trouble any person.

Alexander taxed, represseth his ambition.

Aristobulus, who accompanied Alexander in all his voyages and Conquests, writeth, that two of those Gymnosophistes followed him, in his returning from the Indiaes to Babilon, both of them being continually naked, without any Garment on them. He that seemed the eldest or more auncient of them, would lye groueling on his face vpon the ground, euen in the powerfillest warmth of the Sunne, or heat of Summer, much molested with Wasps and other stinging Flyes; yet would he not stirre, or once make offer to driue them away. He that was the younger man, he would stand continually vpon one foote, holding a Log of Wood in one of his handes, containing the length of three cubits; and ordinarily would hee stand in this manner, as well before Alexander, as out of his company. Some while after, the elder man left this austerity, and began to liue more delicately; for which, being reprehended, hee answered, That he had liued (in his former manner) the space of sixe and thirty yeares, according to the vow he had made to God, to hold that rule of Gymnosophistæ for such length of time: which being now expired, he might returne to liue in the same sort as other Men did. The younger man being named Cabanus, hauing followed the Court and Army of Alexander, so farre as Persia, he made a goodly fire in an open assembly, and hauing annointed al his body ouer with Lard or Grease; he threw himselfe into the midst of the Fire, with a smiling, iocund, and cheerefull countenance, according to the custome of the Brachmanes, and so burned himselfe into Ashes.

where the Inhabitants are blacke, going all naked, except some small couerture for their parts of shame: they are great Idolaters, euen to this day; of friendlie conuersation, not nice or daintie, and they are often deceiued by Marchants-Strangers. None of those other Gymnosophistes are found in these partes, but there are certaine Priests and Women, who do (very nere) hold the same manner of behauiour, as the ancient Brachmans did, for they burne themselves when they become aged. If any man among them happen to dye otherwise, all his Wiues (for there they haue many) doe contend among themselves, which of them loued him best, and the case must be pleaded (for tryall) before a Iudge, Each of them is an Atturney in her owne cause, and she that is found to be of greatest affection, and hath done most accepted seruices to the dead in his life time; shee onely hath the renowne in Iudgement, and she shall haue the honor to be burned aliue, with the dead body of her Husband.

As for my selfe, I alwaies conceited, that those Gymnosophistes were religious persons, who believed the immortality of the Soule, and sequestred themselves from mens societies; because they would not be touched with worldly desires; thinking to do all things acceptable to God, and enstruct others how to liue vertuously. And in so much, as they willingly threw themselves into deaths power, before nature had runne her full course; it seemed to mee that they did it, to auoyd further offending God by their sinnes. There are found some Men among vs, euen in these daies; that sequester themselves from sight of other Men; exhorting vs to all charity & vertue, to haue daily remembrance of death, and to prepare all our thoughts to God: they are said also, to liue as (if not more) chastly and austerely, as the other did: but as I am not able to speak this of mine owne absolute knowledge; so will I not condemne any one thereto enclined, that doth it not on a superstitious kind of zeale, or to be held of greater sanctity then others, therefore I refer iudgement herein; to him to whom it iustly belongeth.

CHAP. XXI.

¶ Against the opinion of such men, as doe thinke, that the Septentrionall Countries, which bee vnder the North Climate, are vnfruitfull and inhabitable.

Here were many of our fore-Fathers, who helde opinion, that vnder Zona Torrida, no Man can haue any dwelling, in regard of the extreame heate there continuing: but they were therein much deceiued, for it hath bene found by Navigations of the Spaniards, Portuagals, and others, within some hundreds of passed yeares, that very many ciuill people doe inhabite there, and great store of Victuals for nourishment, dooth also there abound.

Contrariwise, some likewise haue thought, that the two Zones which bee imagined to holde the two extremities of the Worlde, are (by their violent colds) not habitable; because they are farre remote from the Zodiaque and Eclipticke, which is another imagined Line, and through which the Sunne maketh his course. Heerein also they haue bene greatly beguiled; for vnder the two Zones, the Land is couered with Men, Beastes, Hearbs and Trees: the inclemency of the Ayre, or of the cold Heauens doth there no hurt at all. Nothing but the Earth it selfe, which is found in some partes barren and vnfruitfull, makes them not to bee inhabited by men: as in the Desert and Sandy Arabia, whence yet you may passe into diuers Countries, carrying Victualles with ye. So is it likewise to be imagined of many other Desets, which are in many other parts of the World.

I haue alleadged these fore-named matters, because many yet doe holde, that the Septentrionall Countries are infertile; as Moscovia, Tartaria, Scithia, Getia, Prutania, Denmarcke, Suetia, Norway, Finland, and others; whereof it would aske some time to make recitall, which are all Neighbours, or vnder the North; in regard, there it is cold the greater part of the yeare, and at all times subiect to Snowes and sharpe Frostes; as also Fogges and Mistes are there very frequent, and the Ayre commonly cloudy. Wherein they are also much deceiued, for in all those Provinces, there are neyther Fieldes, Vallies, Mountaines, Hillockes, nor the Banckes of Riuers, but you shall see them couered with goodly Hearbes, Grasse, and Plants, faire spreading, and in fruitfull manner, as also plentie of Men and Beasts. Now, because coldnesse is vnprofitable to Generation; therefore many haue held these Countries to be very desert and empty of all thinges.

First of all, there is great plenty of Horses, fat, high-fed, and very good, so that when they goe in any expedition, their Troopes doe ordinarily consist of threescore or fourescore thousand horses. The Men also are very nimble and ready, so that if they had the vse of Armes among them; as of the Harquebush, Petronils, and other Artillerie, accordingly as wee haue: they would quickly ouer-runne Europe, or the Persian. That it can be no otherwise, we haue had good experience in our times, when they haue giuen assistance to the Turkes, in much greater number then I haue spoken off. Of Oxen, Kine, Sheep, Goats, Swine, and other Beasts for Housholde seruice, the Countries are (well-neere) ouer-burthened, and wonderfully well fed: abounding also in White-meates, which are their verie chiefest sustenance. So that, if those Countries were so barren, as most Historiographers, and some Cosmographers (that neuer dreamt on these things) haue written: wold beastes there multiply in such plenty, and thriue in such extraordinary manner?

As for the Women, they are so fruitfull, as commonly they bring two children at a burden, oftentimes three, and foure at-sometimes; whereof let no doubt or scruple be made. For I haue seene many, and frequented long with people of those partes (both of Honour and Learning) who haue confirmed the truth heereof vnto mee. All the Men of Warre heretofore, of the Gothes, Countries vnder the north.

The North hath yeilded very potent Armies.

Gothes, Vandales, Scythians, Hunnes, Normanes, and others; beeing in number aboue foure or five hundred thousand Men, and the Army of Tamberlain (who liued in the yeare 1390.) that consisted ordinarily of a Million of Men; were of no other people or Countries, but such as inhabited vnder the North. They are Men of Spirit, Learned, and preferue Annales among them, euen as we doe in our Nations: Some of them are Christians, after the Gracians manner; others, Mahumatists, and others Idolators.

The plenty of Furres which those Countries yeild.

These people were Furres, euen from sole of the foote (as wee vse to say) to the Crowne of the head: And whence can such prouision of Furres be made, but by the foecundity of their Landes? For they doe not onely cloath themselues, but they likewise furnish Fraunce, England, Italy, Germany, Spaine, Flanders, Greece, and other Prouinces; yea, with the very richest and fayrest: as Ermines, Sables, Martines, White Wolues, Foxes, and diuers others.

Great store of Venison.

Shall I speake of the great plentie of Venison, and exceeding in fatnesse, daily taken by them? As Harts, Hinds, Kiddes, Wilde-Boares, Hares, &c. very easilie and familiarly hunted among them. Likewise; Fowles of all kinds, as well haunting the Mountaines, as liuing on Plaines, and in Waters. All which Viandes are at such cheape rate, as, for halfe an ounce of Silver, which valueth twentie French Solz, or two Shillings of our English Money, a man may haue a Redde Deere, or a Wilde Boare; and a Hare for the fift part of a dramme of Silver, hardly valuing a Penie. I set not down the Names of their Monies, because the Scythians, of whom I speake more then others, and dwell direct vnder the North, haue no vse at all of Money: but both buy and sell all thinges for the weighe of Gold or Silver; Duckes, Mallards, Plouers, wilde-Geese, Ganes, Ringdoues, Pewets, Partridges, Quails, Blacke-Birds, &c.

in a manner for nothing, they are so easily taken; by reason of their great abundance. The people lead a Pastoral kinde of life, and haue no other dwelling then vnder Tentes, and in the open Fieldes, without any repining thereat, and yet they sleepe there verie soundly. This Countrey whereof I speake, containeth more then sixe hundred Leagues, which pliny, ptolomy, and Pomponius Mela, doe hold to be almost desert, and from an hundred Miles, to another hundred, hardly is any Towne or Village to be seene.

Their Seas are fertile, and abounding in Fishes of all kindes, for there they are greater, and much better nourished, then in any other Seas; witnesse the Whales, Coddies, Lings, &c. that doe come all (well-neere) from these Regions. And if any Whales be taken in the Spanish Seas, as I haue seene some, but very sildome; they are much lesse then the other, nothing so fat, nor in such store and plenty. Let vs proceede yet a little further. If these Countries were so vnsuitfull and inhabitable, as they are said to be; would Bees and Hony be in such abundance there as they are? For there is scarcelic any Tree, where those little Labourers doe not builde their Hives: especiallie if they can meete with any hollow Tree, wherein I haue heard it credibly reported, that Men haue diuers times sunke up to the shoulders in Hony. Whence comes such store of Waxe, as the Germanes send into Fraunce, and other places of Christendome, but onely out of those Countries? For although there be some store in France, yet is there not any such plenty or encrease, as would furnish Paris for one month onely. In breefe, their Trees are full of Honny, Waxe, and Fruits: beside, I haue been certainly assured, that the leanes in their least Groues and Thickets, haue well neer equalled your common Colewortes. The whole Land is euen covered (as it were) with extraordinary odoriferous Hearbs; especially young Mariorame, which is held there to bee so precious, as if we can get thereof; wee compound it with the Powder of Violets, and vse it as a restorative.

Great abundance of wax, Hony and Fruits.

Now, according to the opinion of all the very greatest Naturalists, coldnes is not aduantageable to generation and production; eyther in Beastes or Plantes; because we perceiue, that (in Winter) Beasts haue no familiarity together, and all Plantes become as if they were dead, or despoyled of their goodly leaues: which needs must be the reason of no such fecundity in these cold and freezing Countries; and yet there may be in those Climates, some humor intermingled with the earth (beyond the ordinary nature of other partes) which is the only Argument of such fertilitie. For the Butter-flies, Bees, and other common Flies, doe not feare any cold there; but are much greater and grosser then they be heere. Oftentimes, the very least or cold Frostes heere with vs, quite kills our Bees and Flies; but the very greatest coldes there, and (as one saith) when mighty ysickles couer al the Rocks; yet euen then doe they produce generation. Men are far more healthful there then we be heere; they feed more then we do, & digest their meat better, because (indeede) they are much more laborious. I haue obserued in Auuergne, that on the highest Mountaines there, (which are those called Mont D'or, and Domme) where the Snowes neuer stirre for nine months together: that yet neuertheless, they are very fertile, & yeild the greater quantity of grasse & hearbs; of better tast, and bigger and fairer, then the plaines do with all their temperate ayres. Beastes likewise doe much better fatten there, then commonly we see in other places.

Heere it may be objected to me, that the reason why Cosmographers and Geographers haue set down no Towns or Villages, on the plaines of those Countries; as namely, in Scythia and Tartaria; was, because there are either very few, or none at all. And so much the rather, in regard that the people dwelling vnder Tents, are still vnsetled and ambulatory; as seeking after new pasturages, when they haue made their feeding (any time) in one place. The people make no auouchable testimony hereof, but rather, that the reason why they dwell in Tentes, and in the open fields; is, because they will not be shut vp within Walls; to the end, that they may the sooner approach their enemies, when they Warre vpon them; as also for their apter courses, out-rides, and surprisals, for they are of very Warlike disposition. For other occasions, they haue all thinges sufficiently for sustentation of Mens liues, without neede of any thing brought from other places: except it be wines and Spiceries, which (of necessity) must needs there be verie scarce, and they haue little neede of.

I conclude then, that when any man shall fall in contemplation of the countries fruitfulness vnder the North, and also of their Seas; hee must not thinke, that coldnesse is the cause thereof, for it bringeth rather discommodity, then any good benefite. But let him propound to himselfe, as I haue formerlie saide; that the reason proceedeth of some good and fat humiditie, remaining in the Groundes of those Countries, and whereof we haue none such heere.

The Authors Conclusion.

CHAP. XXII.

A Paradoxe, approouing, that the meaneſt and simplest place of Birth or descent; maketh a Man to be truly most Noble.

That Noblenesse of Bodie and Heart (which our Elders euermore obserued for the minde) being both combined together, are the very fayrest partes to be wished in any Man; I make no more doubt thereof, then I do of truth it selfe. For, let there bee neuer so great a number of them, whom we tearme Gentle-men, Lords, mightie Magnificoes, or others whatsoeuer; yet, except they bee enriched with these vertues ioyntly: I reckon them not within the compasse of true Nobilitie. And I dare oppose my selfe directlie against any Man, who (in the peeuishnesse of his owne Spirit) shall aduenture to maintaine, that descent from a great House, without other Title then the bare name onely; is sufficient to make eyther a Nobleman, or Gentleman.

Admit the case, that (as some hold) Vertue auayleth but little, which (neuertheless) they shall finde to bee most false: yet the Vnnoble-borne person hath this aduantage, and the obscurity of the place (whence he is deriued) giueth him this power and Prerogatiue:

Nobility of body and mind.

The compasse of true Nobility.

Vertue of little or no account, yet free for all to vse.

to

to take delight (without any preiudice) in all those kindes of sportfull pleasures grounded on Vertue, which can bee in present vse. As, to vnder take strange enterprises, though appearing difficult and full of daunger; which hee may safely doe, without any to reprove him therefore, or cast a blush in his countenance: succeeding as well, as if he could say to himselfe, heere wanteth nothing now, but Nobility by Race, & Antiquity of Kinred.

I dare say beside, that a poore Man honestly borne, and of good Spirit, standes free from the rough severitie of troublesome Tutors, froward indiscrete Pedants, reckonieg himselfe in the number of them, who are truelie borne free and at liberty, and voyde of those distastes, which obscureth the splendor of famous Lignages. Hee findes not himselfe subiect to such diversitie of fashions in Garments, which wee behold to alter and change day by day; ostentimes making both minde and body answerable to those fantasticke and idle-headed Habites. Nor is hee bound (for preserving the honour of his House) to keepe a great Traine, or a surfeiting Table. Hee holds it no disgrace or shame, to walke on foote in his Countrey, without his quarrelling Rapyer, or other Weapons. If Fortune smile not, but overtaketh him with worldly and ordinary mishaps: he rather accounteth it credit for him, to vndergoe another mans honest service, then fall into misery, or hazzard his future hopes, with any blemish and staine of Obloquy. All which things they dare not doe, that cyther remember in themselves, or any other of their Race, the eminent place of their Birth and Off-spring: but, overweening themselves destyned to the same Fortunes; doe (ostentimes) endure and fall into the greater mischies; because the smoake of their famous Houses, laies diuers charges on them; inferiour to their Nobility and excellence, and beeing slipt or false in their first aduventure, they can neuer afterward (without great difficulty) rise againe.

The Man not Noble borne, is verie wary, before he fall into worse then his Originall Fortune, and makes his Industry his best pillars and vnder-proppes: by which commendable meanes, making Vertue his course, and pursuing the golden degrees of Wisedome, his name attaineth to be more illustrated & famous, then it can easily bee obscured by any sinister accident. Then, addiecting himselfe to Letters, and the liberall Sciences, or else to follow Military Discipline; he bestowes therein such labour and diligence, that by meere right and Iustice of Merit: first hee beares away the special benefit thereof; next, the luster and splendour of it waites on him continually; and the same (due to so high deseruing) cannot bee taken from him, by any Commaunder, Lorde, or Maister, to whom (for bare Name of Gentry) it may be thought more fitly to appertaine.

Example of Warlike actions hath beene noted, in Bayarde, Manleurier, Malherbe, and other valiant French Captaines; as also in Castruccio Castagne, Picine, Carmaygnole; and Ioannine in Italy; all which men (though descended of meane and humble Parentage) ther renowne did sufficiently manifest, that in them remained the onelie Vertue of high attemptes. The like may be saide concerning Learning, and the Sciences, if wee remember Henrie the eight, King of England, who is said to Write diuers worthy Bookes in Latine: which (neuerthelessse) were reported to be done by Sir Thomas Moore, who was his Lord Chancellour, a man that liued in great reputation, for singular Wisedome and Authority; yet descended but from meane place and Parentage, and (in regard of Blood, or House) might bee termed Vn-noble. Learning neuer secketh after eminent places, or mightie and Magnificent Houses, where sloth and negligence is much better friended, then all industrious dilligence or labour in actions of Vertue can attaine vnto. In approbation of this Maxime, we can produce; that Nobility of House maketh not the Philosopher, Poet, or Oratour; but studious paines and trauaile bestowed in either of them; these are the things that makes a Man both Noble, and immortal to posterity.

excellent pollither of the minde, he became a beater downe of bad and broken conditions, more hard then euer was the Iasper or Adamant. The auncient Tragicke Poet Euripides, came of very poore and abieft Parents. Demosthenes, the honour of Greeke eloquence, was not onely of meane place, but beside, of vncertain Parentage. Virgill, the famous Latine Poet, was begotten by a poore Mantuan labourer. And Horace, the incomparable Lyrick, was Sonne to a Trumpeter in the Warres. For Men Moderne, find but one onely that wrote in Philosophy, Poesie, Rhetoricke, or any other Science, who could renoune himselfe (at any time) by the Ancestors of his House. Ye may very well note to the contrary, if (out of a Noble or magnificent House) ye finde but one that giues himselfe to study, he is commonly tearmed a lasciuious wanton Pamphleter, a cunning Satyrift, a Rayler, or Brabler; and I pray ye, how is his house ennobled by him, when Vertue thus forsakes him, and lends him not her assistance.

If we shall neede to passe any further in this discourse; I dare vndertake to shew ye, that true Gentility (indeede) came at first from Men of meane condition, and many of them are yet (to this day) renowned by good Historians. Nay, more; that great Princes and Lordes haue receiued their Originall from poore Cottages, and simple Houses. For example, Tarquinius Priscus, was Sonne to a Marchant of a strange Countrey. Seruius Tullius, was begotten on a Woman-Slaue. Septimius Seuerus, came of very base degree. Agathocles, King of Sicillie, tooke it for no shame, to garnish his Pallace and richest Cup-boordes with earthen Vessels, in memory that hee was but a Potters Sonne.

Aelius Pertinax, was (at first) but a simple Seller of Wood. And Venadius Bassus came of maruellous poore Parents. If it bee so then, that among such great personages, the more part are found to bee deriued from poore and meane places: What reason haue so many men now-adaies, to search out such expresse inuented lyes, by counterfeit and Heteroclitie Titles, to tearme themselues Noble and Gentle;

meerely to purchase credit by supposed Preheminance of great Linage? And then, what a turmoyle and trouble doth it procure, when a silly Antiquary or Chronicler (or some other idle writer) eyther through want of discretion, or otherwise, sets not downe in his poore Pamphlet, all the Titles and qualities of such an vp-start Gallant?

10 It would cause an especiall content in minde to mee, if (by my paines) I could procure a cessation of this ouer-vaine and foolish humour, this heate of desire to be tearmed Noble or Gentle: were it but in such onely, as neuer knew what Armes meant, nor could euer expresse or approoue, one vertuous Act in any of their Predecessours. Surely, mee thinkes it is a very strange course obserued in the Kingdome of Naples, that euery base Groome in the Countrey, must (at euery Word) be tearmed Signior: And in the superscription to some sloenly Slaue, hee must haue the Title of Don such a one, which agrees euen as handsomely, as to call a filthy Slut in the Kitchin, Madama Lucretia, or Signiora Pampiluna. Oh intollerable absurditie? the like folly in no age (heeretofore) euer heard of. So, in Francke, euery Peazant and Lacky must bee called Sir, or Monsieur: then which, no greater stile can be giuen to the King, or his Brother, or the greatest Lord in Grace about him. In Burgundy, Flaunders, and Henault, a verie Lacky-Boy following the Campe, will make Armes for himselfe, after his owne minde and fashion, with Mantle, Helme, and Crest, after the Saxon guise, wherewith many Hostlers doots are famously dawbed. In Brittaine, ye haue not one, but his Father was a Lord at least. In Scotland: they all extract of the blood Royall: And in Aniou (as in Wales) they are all Gentle-men. And this is most certaine, that there are very fewe places to be found in the World, but (in them) some Seedes of this miserable ambition is disperfed. Scarcely is there any City, Village, Towne, or Borough; but shakes hand in this folly, euen for friendship sake.

I let passe the goodly City of Venice, wherin euery simple trafficker in Sugers, Cloths, Spices, &c. must be stiled a Gentleman at the least, or Messieur Magnifico.

If he be but a Sexton, and looke to the Church goods, presently hee must be intitled, Most Reuerend Sir, Most Religious, yea, and Most Blessed too, if it might bee admitted. Consider (seeing such dishonor don to true noblenes & Gentility) if it can bee endured with any patience? Would ye imagine, that these ambitious blastes haue past the Alpes; euen into Friseland; Saxony, and high Germany? I can assure ye, hauing bin in those partes, about important affaires, wherein then I had some imployment, that so soone as I perceiued this horrible misery; Oh Deuill (quoth I) how largely hast thou euer wher shot forth thy pernicious venom? Couldst thou not keepe within thy Natiue bounds, but thou must climbe ouer those admirable Mountaines, and places almost vnaccessable, to enflame mens minds with this thy hellish fury? I found in that Country; howe some would ride post to the Chambers Imperiall, only to buy the title of Gentility; and afterward, make vaunt of their Nobility; some, by two; others, by three; and others, by four feueral linages, curtalling the true names of their owne right Auincestors; to make their claime by a contrary way, the more likely. Some boasted of their discent from the Tuscans; some from the Romans; some from the eldest Allemaignes, and some were naturally bred of the race of Achilles Mirmidons. There was one, who for the Ensigne and Emblazure of his Nobilitie, in my conceit, had a very apte Coate of Arms giuen him, to wit; A Green-goose necke, in a Field Geules; couered with a Crest double staged, enriched with Mantle and Feathers; myraculously washed after the Tartarian manner, with other deuises of faire stranger fashion. Who soeuer had sworne to me, that among so great a number of rough and sterne people, there should be found one sparke of such peeuish ambition; I would neuer haue beleueed him. Because I was (euer before) giuen to vnderstand, that this folly dwelt onely in the Kingdome of Naples and Spain. But for ought I can perceiue, it hath euer where taken so deepe roote, that it hath receiued no smal hope in short time to haue an vniuersall flourishing.

I remember I haue read, that the Father of Euripides, expressing some outward ioy, because on a sudden he was ennobled, receiued from his Sonne these words; Good Father (quoth he) doe not reioyce so much at this matter, for the Prince hath but giuen yee a thing, which anie man else may haue for his money. For Nobilitie nowe hath no other foundation then on Riches, and hee that hath store thereof, hath power likewise to be made a Nobleman. This was it which moued good Socrates to say; Only Vertue maketh vs noble and excellent. For it auayleth nothing, to glory or renoune our selues by this or that family, if without Vertue wee thinke or perswade our selues to be Noble.

To this purpose, Cicero who deserved that famous name, to be alway called Pater Patrie, the Father of his natiue Countrey Rome, being reprehended by Salust in his inuectiues, that he knew him not to be descended of Noble race; but rather came from a place vterly vnknowne to Noblemen, he returued him this answer; My Linage beginneth in the name of Cicero, but the race and name of Salust, will end in Salust. Plato also maintaind, that seruants were descended of Noble bloode, if their Parents were Louers of Vertue, & they therein did follow their steps. And contrariwise, that all Princes and Lords were issued at first, from people of base and meane condition, and thence might deriue the antiquity of their race.

This was to quallify the pride of some insolent persons liuing in his time; who made no account of any thing; but of their goods and treasure; imagining, that Gentility in olde time, dropt from Heaven, like the fall of Manna to Aponillus Calaber, or Briancon. But the ancient Noblemen, were made by their Vertue & courage, which they woorthily manifested, both in manly fighting, and dying for the honor of their Country, committing no other action beside, that might bee blotted with the detection of villainie or reproach. Such as go that indirect way, and labor to get the name of Gentility, by actions apparantly lowe and dishonorable; them I may properly tearme to be Gentle-villaines, in regard that their long coveted Nobility, by such depraung behauiour, can giue it selfe no other Name; then the iust guerdon to such notable iniquitie.

The Egyptians, from whome came the Originall of all faire and honest disciplines, did hold opinion; that all persons in this world are Noble in quality, each one beeing composed of selfe-same matter, and framed by one onely builder or Worke-man, by whome their soules are infused into their bodies; being capeable (euen from their birth) of one selfe-same power and vertue. But they allowed afterward, that according to the disposition of each body, they which receyued the greatest portion of Vertue, had likewise greater preheminence aboue others; and so (for difference sake) were therefore called either Noble or Gentle. Vertue then is the truest Nobility; and Greatnesse of house, or antiquity of Lignage, are matters meerely of nothing. For, a poore Countrey-man, borne in Arpinum, hath bin as well called Emperour, and Father of his Countrey, as any Iulius or Augustus Caesar, descended of most auncient Houses.

A pleasant Allegoricall description of Charon, called the Ferry-man of Hell.

S*ENECA* in his Tragedie of Hercules Fureus, introduceth Theseus, who recounteth to Amphitrio, the strange sights he had seen in Hell. And he describeth Charon, according as Virgil doth, in the sixth Booke of Aeneides; and as Polygnotus painted him in a Table which hee made for the Temple of Apollo, as Pausanias recordeth. Boccace being desirous to interpret the figure of Charon, deliuereth his mind in this manner; By Charon, we are to vnderstand the signification of Time, who is saide to be Son of Erebus, and of Night. Erebus may be taken for the secret counsell and spirit of God, by whome, both Time and all things else were created, and Night was the Mother of Charon. For before Time was, there was not, as yet any light at all; but it was made in darknesse, and out of darknesse it first appeared. Charon was afterward commaunded into hell, because they that are in Heauen, haue no neede of Time, as we mortals haue, that inhabit this lower part of the world; fro whence, if we cast vp our eyes to them, we may (by good right) account out selues to bee in Hell. Charon carrieth and re-carrieth mortals, from one side of the Riuer vnto the other; wherby we may gather, that when we are borne, Time in like manner leads and guides vs on toward death, causing vs to passe the Riuer Acheron, which is as much to say, as without ioy or comfort, in which kind of course, slideth away our fraile liues, full of many and infinite miseries.

No neede of Time in Heauen.

Time looseth no strength by yeares.

The frail garment of our bodies.

Charon is old, and yet notwithstanding strong, hardy, and couragious; signifying thereby, that Time looseth no strength by multiplicity of yeares. His Garments are blacke and sullied, as shewing, that while we are slaues and subiects to Time, wee make no care or account of any thing else but the worlde, and occasions belonging to the world, which are vile, fowl, & much deformed, in comparison of them appertaining to heauen, and whereon we ought to set the very height of al our loue and desire. But the fraile Garment of our mortall body, which we continually cary about vs, doth in such sort couer the light of reason, that as led blind-fold, we walke through the hell of this world, guided onely by common sense, and a million of inordinate appetites. Wherefore, there needs no great meruaile, if we bee dayly enuironed with multitudes of euils which present themselues as readily, as soules descend into the hell of this our worlde, and take vp their lodging in our mortall bodies. In which manner also, may the speeches of Virgil bee interpreted, describing the wicked carried into Hell, in the sixth Booke of his Aeneidos.

CHAP. I.

Of Old Rome, in her Primitive Nature and condition: Of her first Religion, Lawes, Magistrates, Ciuill Pollicies, &c.

mongest all the Goddess, which the ancient Religion of Rome first exalted, it was Pan Lyceus, called by many, Faunus and Sylvanus; to whom, with the Lupercalles, they did the honour of Sacrifice, as is affirmed by many ancient writers. They say, that such kinde of sacrifices were first brought to Rome by King Euan-der that fled from Arcadia, who came to that place, where afterward was built the Fort of Rome. Shepherds, who held this God as their Head and Commaunder, vsed to perfourme their Sacrifices starke naked to him, with their faces covered, and a certaine Girdle in their hands; but this kind of naked sacrificing is not punctually known, in regard that our ancients haue written diuersly thereof. Some say, that he being their God, and naked; declared thereby, that he was more apt and ready with al diligence in their assistance; and therefore required, to haue his Ministers naked in like manner. Some others affirmed, that the Arcadians, the very an-cientest Inhabitants of Greece, who at the beginning, remained like wilde Beasts, in Woodes and Thickets of trees: After, they became reduced to a more Ciuill kind of life, would haue their God to bee honoured in the former manner, onelie in respect of their owne greater memory.

Many others haue VVritten, that Iole the Mistris of Hercules, was seene by this Faunus, and lasciuiously affected by him. The Old God, hauing from an hie rocke espied this beautifull aspect, became pleased beyond all patient sufferance; concluding with himselfe, to follow her whither soeuer she went. Shee, on the other side, hauing no notice of him or his intent, went along with her husband thorough the woods, seeking a place where to sleep in safety. In meane while, the night being at hand, she, according as she had formerly vsed to doe, tooke the hairy Lyons skin from Hercules, and spreading it about hir shoulders, tooke also his Club; then walking some distance from her husband, she laid her selfe downe to rest; for they were to Sacrifice to Bacchus, and therefore they ought to sleepe assunder. Sylvanus, burning in wanton heate beyond al measure, and perswading himselfe, that now was the aptest time to effect his amorous purpose, silently made stealth vnto the place where she lay; and putting forth his hand softly, felt the Lyons skin. Seeing thereat somewhat amazed, and thinking hee had mistaken her lodging, as whistly he withdrew thence, and went to the place where Hercules slept. His hand being there likewise his Taster, & finding more smoothnesse then he felt before; softly hee lifted vp the cloathes, and putting his hand still on, scarcely could he well feele the roughnesse of Hercules his body, but hee began to wake, and extended his hands to feele who troubled him. Sylvanus offered to escape, but feare and darke night barring sight of his passage, hee began to make a noise, whereat likewise the Lady awaked; and lighting her Lampes, Hercules could plainly perceiue who it was that hadde made this ydle attempt. If Faunus (seeing his folly thus discovered) were ashamed or no, the effect it selfe can best witness. Confounded both with grief & disgrace, he fled thence into the remoter Woods, and ordained, that in the Sacrifices offered to him, no Garments should be worne by the Sacrificers, because by them hee had bin so deceiued.

The Nursing of Romulus & Remus.

Notwithstanding, some doe assigne the especiall cause heeteof to Romulus, & say, that hee celsbrating the like Sacrifice all naked, in regard of the Suns extreame heate, heard by certaine of his Newes-Bringers, that diuers theeues (in the time while he was thus busied) had stoln away a heard of his Cattle. Whereupon, euen naked as he then was, he swiftly pursued, and taking the Theeues, in perpetual memory of this worthy deed, he would haue all his sacrificing Priests, to exercise their office naked. But let the custome arise of what cause soeuer, it is most manifest, that it so continued to the time of C. Iulius. For it is recorded, that Cæsar beeing Dictator, at the spectacle of the like sacrifice, M. Anthony (who was one of the Sacrificers, and afterwarde of the Triumueri) comming running, would haue crowned Cæsars head with a wreath of Lawrel, wherein there was a Royall Crowne; but Cæsar not accepting thereof, because all the people frowned thereat, he went and crowned his Statue therewith. Afterward concerning the name of the Lupercalls, and wherfore Sacrifices were in that kind called; there are many reasons founde. Some say, they were called Lupercalia, because by inuocating on the name of Pan; Woolues were frighted away from the folds of Cattle. Some tearmed the Temple wherein that God was honoured, Lupercale; whereon saith Virgil.

And the Lupercal under the frozen Cliffe. They shewe also, and are perswaded, that because the Wolfe was there found, which gaue suck to Romulus and Rhemus; thereupon it was called Lupercale. There wants not some also, who say, that it was so fir-named, after a Mountaine in Arcadia, called Liceus, where that kind of Religion is yet in account; for the Arcadians do call that Beast Licon, which we in Latine terme Lupus, a Wolfe. The especial deuotion vsed to this God, and the priests dedicated to him, was, as is found written; because women that could haue no conception or easy deliuey in childbirth, or prosper in constitution of their bodies, vsed to go to the Luperci, who were the Priests of Pan; and as they were more or lesse, beaten with a little rod, dipt in the blood of a young Goate, by the Priestes; euen so they conceiued, and were deliuered also of their Children. The solemnity done to this God, was celebrated the 18. day of Ianuary, as Ouid declareth in his Bookes to Faustus.

1. In the same time that Euander raigned, it is saide, that Hercules hauing flaine Gerion, brought along with him a heard of Oxen and Kine, of meruailous goodnesse; and hauing found neere the Riuer of Tiber, a place that liked him well for their feeding, made his stay there, and being weary with trauieling, did eate and drinke a little to sustaine nature; and afterward laide him downe to rest. Cacus, a Neat-heard of those parts, one that liued by others losses, seeing the seemly appearance of the Cattle, was very desirous to steale them: yet fearing least the owner should take notice of his theft (albeit now was the time of night) he took the verie fairest of them, and drawing them backward by the tailes, conueyed them in that manner into his Caue. At breake of day, Hercules awaked, and numbering his cattle as he was wont to do, not only discerned the Theft, but also the backward footing of the Beasts; whereby he coniectured no otherwise, but that they had wandered, and came forth of the caue again. Yet meruailing how the other should be gone, he concluded to inquire no further, but to depart with the rest; and driuing them thence with his wand, it happened, that the Beasts themselues missing the others gon, as naturally desiring their company, began to Low or bellow, which the enclosed Cattle in the Caue hearing, answered them againe in the same language. Hercules immediately knew the noyse of his Oxen and Kine, and ran presently to the Caue, wher Cacus comming to withstand his entrance, by resisting him manfully hand to hand, was there slain vnder the weight of his Club.

The Parents and Kindred of the partie slaine, with all the other Heardsmen together, immagining that this iniurie was not to bee endured, called Hercules, as a stranger, in iudgement before King Euander, who not long before, was fled thither from Peloponessus, and gouerned in these parts, rather by authority, then any right of Seigneury, yet was hee a man very venerable, for inuention of Letters among rude people; and much more venerable, by Diuinity of his Mother Carmenta, who before the comming of Sibilla into Italy, was honoured of the people as a Prophetesse. Euander hauing heard the case, and well noted the habit and stature of Hercules, which appeared to bee beyond ordinary manner, he demanded his Birth, Parentage, and Condition; but no sooner heard he his Name, Father, & Countrey, but presently he entered into these speeches; O Hercules, thou Sonne of Ioue, highly art thou welcome, my Mother presaged thy future being, telling mee, that thou shouldst encrease the number of Gods in Heauen; and that in this place an Altare should be dedicated to thee, which altar should be honored by the richest people in the world, observing thy custome.

Hercules vpon these wordes, gaue his hand to Euander, in sign of peace, answering him that he vnderstood the Angury, and woulde himselfe see the Diuine will executed; whereupon, he built and dedicated an Altar, and selecting fourth the best and fairest of his Oxen, they were giuen to be celebrated in Sacrifice, to Potitius and Pinarius; men of a family in those times, most honorable and famous. It fortun'd, that the Potitij (as Liuius declareth) were much more ready then the other, to the solemnity: whereupon, the inwards or intrails of the Beasts, were assigned to them. And the Pinarij coming so tardy, and finding them burnt, the rest of the Sacrifice was appointed to them; and thence-forward it was ordained; that while the generation of the Pinarij continued, the Beasts inwards should neuer be giuen to them on the solemn day. The Potitij, entrusted by Euander, were presidents for many years at the like sacrifices; and till this charge was imposed on publicke seruantes, there wanted not of this solemne family of the Potitij. Which was occasioned by Appius Claudius, an enemy to this family; and therefore it was imagined, that in iust reuenge and displeasure of the Gods, he was smitten blind.

2. I finde vnder good Authoritie, that the Brethren Arnales, were especiall Counsellors to the Romans, for preservation of their Corne fields, and that they might produce plenty of graine. I find also, that the first inuenter of this Religion, was Romulus the Father and first builder of Rome. For Accalaurentia, the Nurse to Romulus, being a strumpet, gaining greatly by that base profession, and becoming rich beyond measure; of two Sons which she had, one of them dying, by way of adoption she made Romulus her owne son; instead of the dead childe; and when she her self died, she made the people of Rome heires to all her wealth. The people meruailing at so great a liberality; and desirous to make a liuing memorie of their Kings Parentage; they gaue order, that the womans name should be registred in their yearely Kalender; and the children descending of her Kindred, to bee called Brethren Arnales, of Serendo, which is a Latine word, signifying to sowe; and of Arui, that is, Fields; so forming their appellation, and at what time the authoritie of this Brethrens Priest-hood flourished. It is also recorded, that there were but twelue of them in number; and whē they receiued their order of Priest-hood, their heads were crowned with wreaths of ears of Corne, and a Bend or Stole of the like put about their neckes.

3. About the very same time; the knowledge or Religion of Angurie or Soothsaying, was brought to Rome out of Tuscany, where the people were verie excellent in that Science. It is saide, that a certaine man, whose Name by antiquitie of time, is not remembred, as Naso writeth, being banished thence; conducted as I think by hope and perswasion of safe Sanctuary, came vnto Rome. I am of the mind, that Romulus and Remus, in contending to impose a name on the City, vsed the same kind of Angurie; for M. Tullius Cicero writeth in those Bookes, which hee entituled of Diuination, that Romulus was very expert, and especially skilled in the science of Diuination. Numa, who afterward succeeded Romulus in the kingdom, ordained, that this science should be obserued serued in a perpetuall Priesthood. I think, that in writing the custome which was kept in Diuination or augury, one example may be sufficient, because thereby may easily be comprehended euery other manner; therefore, out of all obseruations of ancient writers that euer I could see, this was the custome.

The custome obserued by Diuiners and Sooth-sayers in their Diuination.

The Diuiner or Sooth-sayer, who was to fore-tell what should ensue, ascended 10 vp on some Fort or Castle, or some other place of best discouery, where hee sat downe vpon a stone, turning his face into the South, leaning on the left side, and holding a crooked Wand in his Hande, commonly called the Augures Staffe. Hauiug thence well noted the City, and the fields round about, praying to the Gods they would design the Regions from the East to the West, and collocate the right hand partes from the South, to those on the left hand in the North; then silently, determining the signe, which his eie from farre should bring to sight, holding the wand in his left hande, hee would set the right hand on his head, of whom he was to augurize, saying; O Father Ioue, if it be lawful that this Numa Pompilius, whose head I lay my hand on, should be K. of Rome; giue a cleare signe thereof manifestly, euen there where I haue confined the place. Then naming what signe Ioue should send, it was forthwith sent, and Numa vnderstood to be King; whereon he descended vnto the Temple, which should be called after the designed Region from Heauen, by the little wand. This forme of Angury, as elsewhere I haue said, may serue for all other of the like Nature.

The words of Angury.

Many men of great Authority, joined hand in this science, crediting the famous skill of Accius Nauus the Sooth-sayer. Tarquinius Priscus, being desirous (beyond the forme of auncient order) to alter many things, and make addition of as many, without Diuination. Accius Nauus, a Noble Augure of those times, said; that those thinges appointed by Priscus, were not good, because they had not bin augurized before. The King grew offended thereat, and scorning both him and his Art, said; Now Sooth-sayer, vse thine Augury, and see if thou canst (with al thy skill) accomplish a thing which I haue instantly conceited. Accius hauiug conferred with the experience of other Augures, made answere, that the Kinges conceit was possible to be performed: whereupon Priscus presently replied; I haue already considered with my selfe, and say, that with this Razor thou canst not cutte this whetstone through the middest. Call now thy wits together, and vse the inspiration of all thy Birds, to try if possibly it may be done. It is affirmed, that Nauus instantly (without any delay) did cut the whetstone through the midst with the razor. In memory whereof, a Statue was afterward erected, containing Accius Nauus in liuely forme, with his head couered, a Razor in the one hand, and a whetstone in the other; and in a faire table of Marble, was the whole argument engrauen to perpetuity.

A Statue erected to Accius Nauus.

The authority and credit of these Diuiners so encreased; and the Priest-hood of the Augures (as Liuius declareth, and Cicero in his Books of Diuination) as not any thing was enterprized for future successe, either within doores or abroad, but first it passed the triall of Angury: and to this science and order of Priesthood, the most Noble men of the City, and the very cheefest Cittizens were wholly enclined. Tiberius Gracchus, the Father of Tiberius, & of C. in an assembly of the people, obtained to haue Consulles placed according to his owne minde. The Tuscan Augures saide, that hauiug consulted with their Diuination, they founde this creation of Consulles not to bee good: for which, they were reprooued as fools and ignorant men. But Gracchus beeing gone to his owne Prouince, could then write backe to the Senate, that the Tuscans said true, and were no fooles, in saying; that the present Consulles were by him most badly created, because they were elected in a Tabernacle without the walles of the City, contrary to custome and order by all their elders obserued; and therefore, they shoulde renounce them for Consulles.

Plin. lib. 9. Cicero in lib. de Diuinal.

Tiberius Gracchus obtaining the Consulship for whom he pleased.

Now, as this order encreased both in authority and reuerence, so did they likewise in number, insomuch, that a Colledge was erected for Augures & Sooth-sayers. At first, they were only created of three Tribes, to wit; the Rhamenses, Tatienses, and Luceres, and obtained together, that they might chaunge their number, and changing into vnequal number. According to this obseruation, they began to create foure orders, contrarie to the the Common people grewe desirous of this honour, both in the Senate, and in all other places. Therefore, by meanes of the Tribunes, they compassed, that as they were partakers in all other matters, so in like manner they might exercise the Augures Priesthood. After many Seditious and garboyles, they obtained, that with foure Noblemen; five Plebeians might bee ioyned. And this was doone, when M. Valerius, and Quintus Apuleius were Consuls.

Numa Pompilius King of Rome, was the first that instituted the Flamini Dialis, because in former times, the King himselfe did exercise the Office both of King and Priest, without any difference at all, as manifestly is to be seene in Virgill, both of Priamus, and of Aeneas. Anius the King (as the same Poet doth likewise witness) was King of men, and Priest of Phabus. The like hath bin obserued of their Successors; as of C. Caesar, of D. Augustus, & of many other Princes, who had (as wee may plainly see) the title of Pontifex Maximus, the chiefe Priest. Wherefore, Numa considering, that there might bee (in time to come) more Kinges like vnto Romulus, who (after his manner) would leaue all care of Religion, and rather attend to matters of Armes; he ordained 4. Priests, by him called Flamines, who continually were to waite on the Diuine seruice; and them he dedicated to diuers of the Gods. One Flamine to Ioue, and hee was called Dialis: Two to Mars, and one to Quirinus. They were called Flamini Diali, Flamines belonging to Iupiter (as Varro saith) because their heades were couered with Vailes, and bound rounde about with a Fillet of Wooll, whereby they hadde the name of Flamine; and Dialis was interpreted of Dion, which is, helping the Goddesses.

All the other Flamines had Titles of those Gods, to whose seruice they were appointed. It was ordained, that those Priests or Flamini Dialis, should wear very honourable Garments, and sit in those Iuory seats, which (in those times) were onely graunted vnto the chiefe Magistrates.

These men onely, were allowed to weare white Chaplets or Bonnets, because they were higher in dignity then the other; or else in regard of their sacrificing to Ioue, it seemed more proper to haue them vested in White. In all other occasions whatsoeuer, by their pontificall priuiledge, and iurisdiction, many other especiall prerogatiues were graunted to them, which Julus Gellius, in his Commentaries, of the Attick nights, hath left at large described. In honour of their Religion, they rode on horseback. It was not lawfull for them to sweare, nor to carry the Fire for their Sacrifice, but in hallowed places. If any man entered into his Church gilt, hee ought to be presently vngirt, and drawie forth againe by the haire of the head. They vsed not to wear any knot backward, or behinde them. If the Malefactor which was brought to be whipt, fell vpon his knees at his feet whom he had offended, it was held as a sinne if he suffered him to be whipt. He that was no Free-man, ought not to cut the haire of the Dialis. It was not lawfull for them to speake of, or touch a Goate, raw flesh, Iuy, or Beans. They might gather no clusters of Grapes, but on the top of the Vine. The feet of the bed wherein any one of them slept, ought to be besmeared with a certaine blew kind of Morter, and no other then himselfe might (lawfully) sleepe in that bed. The pairinges of the Naailes, and cuttings of the haire belonging to the Dialis, were buried in the earth vnder Flintes or pebbles; and euery day was (to them) a Festiuall. It was against their Religious Order, for any of them to be bare-headed in the open aire, and none of the Flamines or priests ought to go vncouered. They might meddle with no Flower or Dow, wherewith any Leauen was mingled: Neither ought any one of them, either put off or on, any shirt or Linnen Garment, but in some priuat and couert place; because he must not be naked vnder Heauen, or in the sight of Ioue. At dinner time no man might sit, but onely the sacrificing king. The Flamines marriage might be (by no meanes) separated, vntill death. They neuer entred into any place where any dead bodies were: Marcus Varro, in those Bookes which he entituled the Originall of the Latine tongue, saith; That in ancient time, they had as many Flamines, as they honoured Gods; as the Dialis, Martialis, Quirinalis, Vulcanalis, Furualis, Falagris, and many others of different manner in authoritie, and as we tearme Bishops, Arch-bishops, Cardinals, Patriarkes, and Metropolitanes.

toflamines, and Archflamines, who held

The beginning of Vestall honour (euen as of all other things) was found out by Numa Pompilius, although the Originall thereof be so auncient, that from the Troyans (Aeneas beeing their chiefe) it was transferred to the Albanes, as Virgill hath very well recorded: To the Goddesse Vesta (by some learned Terra, the Earth, and Mother of the Goddesse) they vied (in perpetuall memory) to consecrate an eternall Fire, which they committed to the care and heedfull obseruation of many elect Virgines; Daughters, to the chiefeſt Senators: thorough whose neglect or carelesnesse; if the sacred Fire happened to goe out, or to be quenched; they were (with certaine Roddes) beaten by the chiefe-Priest; according as Valerius hath left written, of C. Licinius Crassus the High-Priest, who did beate them, that vsed not diligence in preserving the fire:
It was ordained, that she who was condemned of vnchastnesse, and had had the carnall knowledge of a Man, should be buried aliue.

Labeo Antistius writeth, that it was not lawfull to accept into the Societic of the Vestall Virgins, any vnder the yeares of fixe, or aboue the age of ten; beside, that she must be the Child both of one Father and Mother: without any imperfection in speech, sight, hearing, or any other impediment of body.
None might be admitted to be a Vestall, except her Parents (one, or both of them) had beene of ability to keep Ser-uants, and stood clear from hauing vsed any bad or infamous quality. It is further said, that such a one might be excused from the vow of Vestality, as had a Sister elected into the same Order; or tha ther Father were a Flamine, Au- gure; or of the ten men that made the Sacrifices; or of the Epulones sect, or of other like Offices. The Spouse to the chiefe Priest, and the Daughter of the sacrificing King, had the same vacancie from such Sacrifices: And, as Capito hath writte, no Election could be made of any mans Daughter, that had not his dwelling in Italie, and yet his Daughter might be excused, if he had three Sons beside.

Next vnto the precedent decrees, many times it hath beene ordained by the Prætors Edict, that the Flamines Di- alis, nor the Vestall Virgines should be compelled to swear: But the Prætors words might serue in this manner. I command within my iurisdiction, by the publique Proclaimer, that neither Vestall Virgines, nor the Flamines Dialis, shall be enforced to take an oath. In election of the Vestall Virgines, these were especiall obseruations. It was ordained by the Papian law, that at pleasure of the chiefe Priest, twenty Virgins should be elected by the people, out of which number they were chosen by lots. The same law saith, that by Antiquity, many other thinges grew into forgetfulnesse. In election of Virgines, it was sufficient enough, that any man being borne of honest place, might go to the supream Priest, and offer his Daughter to the Priest-hood, she being able to vndertake such an authority: the obseruation of Religion referued, because the Senate only had power of the Law Papia. And then the custome was, that those Virgines were taken by the chiefe Priest, as if they had been surprised by the enemy, and the wordes vsed by him in the action, were these. If by the chiefeſt Law it hath beene allowed, that the Vestal Nunne or She-Priest, should offer these Sacrifices, which I am commaunded by the people of Rome, and by the Fathers: then (to that end) doe I take thee, o Amata. They vsed to tearme euery Virgine Amata, as witnessing thereby, that the first Nunne taken to that Office by Numa Pompilius, was called by the name of Amata. Shee being thus taken, and led to the Castle or Fort of Vesta; presently, without enfranchising, or alteration of degree, she is freed out of her Fathers power, and obtaineth authority, to make her Will & Testament. I finde in the Commen- taries of Lateranus, which he wrote vp-on the twelue Tables of the Lawes, it is thus written. The Vestall Virgine is heire to no man or Woman, that dyed without Testament, neither can any one be heire to her, dying intestate: but her goods or possessions are to be publicly bestowed.

made to Marti Gradivus. There were xii. men elected into this Order, who were called Salij, of Leaping or dancing, which they vsed in their sacrifices. To these men Tullus Hostilius added twelue more, when the Romans, conducting their men of war against the Fidenates; the Albans (vnder colour of treachery) rebeld against them; and would not fight, Metius Suffetius being their Captaine. For these men was appointed a very honourable kind of Vesture, with a Breast-plate of Steele. And they might weare Celestiall armor, which they called a Target or Shield, wherewith they leaped and danced through the Citie, singing Verses along as they went; & it was appointed, that at the end of euerie Verse, they should name Mamurius. It is said, that (in those times) this Mamurius, was a very notable Smith; and a Target being fahn from heauen, while Numa Pompilius and the Senate were sacrificing, it was committed vnto the saide Mamurius, that (by his Art) he should make many other, resembling that which fel from heauen. Which he hauing performed in very excellent maner, Numa commanded him to request whatsoever himselfe would make choise of, and it should be granted him. Whereupon, the ingenious workman, not moued with greedy desire of mony, but glory, requested that his name might bee mentioned by the Salij, at the ending of all their Verses and Daunces; which (as Linie affirmeth) was orderly obserued in all their assemblies, and in their Sacrifices for long time after. The number in this Priesthoode increased in such manner, that a Colledge was builte for them; and afterward, a chiefe Magistrate was appointed ouer them in the Colledge.

It is very manifest (according to Linie) that Bishops (like as all the other Priesthoods) had their Originall by Numa Pompilius; and (for long time together) were created by no other persons, then the Senators. They were at the first but foure in number, but afterward, when the Common people (by meanes of the Tribunes) obtained part in all the greatest honours; they wold likewise participat in the priesthood, and with euerie other most Sacred power. It was then concluded, that foure other Bishops should bee created of the vulgar people, in the Consulship of Marcus Valerius, and Quintus Apuleius. To all these there was appointed one Heade or Chiefe by Numa, and he was then called Pontifex Maximus, the Chiefe Bishop. He in his owne person, both noted and wrote downe euerie thing, that appertayned to Diuine worship or reuerence; as best knowing what sacrifice, what day, & also what time best fitted for the ceremonies. Hee also had the care from whence such Monies should be collected, as were expedient for the charge of diuine occasions: as (in like manner) all other sacred things; either publicke or priuate, were subiect to the Holy priestes allowaunce. Whensoever any dissention happened about sacred Misteries or Religion; the people did helpe (both with their care and counsell) in his assistance.

Numa Pompilius, Author and Founder of this priesthood, conceiued this to be the best course, to auoide perturbation in all things, contempt of religious persons; and Diuine seruices; in which regard, he inioyned very especiall care to be had by such men. It is further said, that the chiefe Priest had a table, wherein to know the Eclipses of the Sunne and Moone; as also a reason for all the featiuall dayes in the yeare, as monthly they happened. Varro writeth, that Q. Mutius Scauola, was wont to say, that of the words Potare and Fare, the title of Pontifex was compounded. But they would not so admit it, because they thought that Pontifex rather was deriued of Ponte and Facio, because (by them) was first made the bridge called Ponte Sublitio, and many times after very well repaired.

I do not find, that the Priests called Fecialis, were among the Romains, before Tullus Hostilius raigned. Nevertheless, as I do not maintaine, that Tullus was the first inuenter of them; so do I not also deny, but that Numa (the most Religious King of them all) might be the Originall of them. But be it howsoever, the first mention made of their name (according to Linie) was, when M. Valerius was Fecialis, Tullus Hostilius raigned. It was the Office of the Fecialis, to stand as president, when publicke faith was made by the people. Also, it was adiudged to be an vniust warre, except it were first denounced and made knowne by the Fecialis. When end or conclusion likewise was made of the warre, he constituted peace vnder solemne faith, which was tearmed

Of the Feccialis

The denunciation of war, by the Feccialis.

Fœdera, by the testimony of Varro: but by Ennius it is called Fidera, as induced by reason of making Faith, and therefore hee conceiueth, that Feccialis was formed of fides, and facere. The manner of offending or breaking (by the Feccialis) a league of peace, was such, as (in Liuius opinion) none can be found more ancient. The Feccialis (saith he) demaunded thus of King Tullus. O King, dost thou commaund, that I shall confirme or breake peace with the Paterpatrus, or king of Heraulds belonging to the Albane people? The King commaunding it to bee done; the Feccialis saith: Allow mee then (o King) the herbage that I must carry with me. The King commaunded him to take the very best: whereupon he taketh the choicest Hearbs out of the Herbage Castle, and againe thus proceedeth. Dost thou (o King) make me Messenger for thee, thy Kingdome, the people, and the Romaine Senate? The King replieth, that he doth. Then the peace being made, after many vttered wordes, concerning the Lawes on both sides, he beginneth againe with a loud voyce, saying; Heare me, o Ioue; Heare me, o Paterpatrus of the Albane people; Heare me, o you people, called Albanes; Heare mee from the beginning to the end: if I haue recited those thinges contained in the Tables, and vnder seale, without fraude, or any deceit, and according as they ought rightly to be vnderstood. The people of Rome will not bee the first breakers of so good Lawes; but if through lacke of good Councill in publike, by fraude or deceit they sinne in such sort: Then doe thou (o Ioue) that very day smite the Romaine people, as I doe this Swine; yea, so much the more violently strike them, as thou art much more potent and powerfull. The words are no sooner spoken; but presently hee throwes a stone at a Swine; appointed there for the purpose; & then streweth the Hearbs vpon the ground. The selfesame forme and speeches is obserued on the contrary side by their Priest, and then by his Dictator: and thus is peace fully agreed on.

But when warre is denounced by the Feccialis, then this is the manner. The Feccialis carrieth a Speare or Lance, headed with Iron, and halfe burnt with fire, and streweth Hearbes also all the way, euen to the Confines of them, against whom he is to menace warre. There, in presence of three men of good yeares; he openly declarerh; That so farre hee came strewing signes of peace, till hee found, that the people of Priscus Latinus, and the Men of Priscus Latinus, had dealt against the people and Senate of Rome, and had greatly offended them: wherefore, the people of Rome purposed to make Warre on Priscus Latinus. In which iust cause (saith he) I, and the people of Rome, doe denounce war against Priscus Latinus; and against the Latine people. When he hath so said, he throws the Lance (so far as he can) vpon their ground, to the end it may be seene, that the warre is iustly vndertaken.

9 There is no difference (according to Liuius) betweene the Paterpatrus and the Feccialis; yet notwithstanding, diuers haue comprehended; that there was and is some dissimilitude: wherefore, I am the more willing to discourse separately, both of the one and other; and how the State then stood in eyther condition, it shall not seeme much from our purpose, if I deliuer what I haue obserued. The vse of the Paterpatrus declarerh, that he was at the same time as the Feccialis was: because when the Feccialis went to breake peace, he needeth both the help and authority of the Paterpatrus. They vsed equall assistance to Patrare, that is; to commaund the Oath, in place where peace was to be concluded on. Marcus Valerius being the first Feccialis, Spurius Fusius was created the first Paterpatrus, in the first warre that Tullius Hostilius made against the Prisci Latini, hauing his bare head circled with a wreath, made of the Hearbe called Veruein. The other Office, that is, to demaund any thing whatsoever; was giuen to Ancus Martius, according to the custome of the Æquicoli, a very auncient people, and the auncient manner of their behauiour, was thus. The Paterpatrus, and an Ambassador with him, went to the Confines of them, of whom the demaund was to bee made, his head beeing couered with a Silken Vaile, and there he vsed these wordes. Heare me, o Ioue; Heare me, o you confines, of what people soeuer they be; And heare, o you Deities, honesty and plaine trash. I am the publike Messenger of the people of Rome, and I come piously and iustly with this Ambassador; therefore giue faith to his words words and mine. Then doe they manifest the summe of their demaund, and call Ioue as Witnesse thereof, proceeding thus. If I demaund for the people of Rome, or for my selfe, any thing of these Men that they possesse: deale with me so, that I may neuer participate in the ioyes of my Country. Hauing thus spoken, they passe on vpon the Confines, deliuering the same speeches to the first Man they meete withall. So entring the Citty Gates, and going on to the Pallace, there they declare (more at large) the full intention. And if that bee not giuen them, which they made demaund of, within the space of three and thirty daies; the time is no sooner expired, but Warre is denounced, in this manner. Heare me, o Ioue, Iuno, and thou Quirinus: Heare me also all you Gods Celestiall, Terrestriall, and Infernall. I make knowne before you all, that this people (and then he nameth them) are vniust, and will not pay that which is reasonable. Wherefore, wee will take Counsell (with our Countrey and our Elders) in these matters, and wee will duellie examine all meanes, that best may helpe vs, to regaine our own rights and dues.

So, returning back to Rome, to take further Councell in this case, foorthwith the King, the Dictator, the Consull, and all other that belong to the Senate, assemble together, and the matter is debated, in what respect the Paterpatrus, which (in behalfe of the Romain people) denounced Warre against the Prisci Latini, and the demaund made; wherein, no saying, doing, or repaying being made on the contrary part, according as they ought to haue saide, done, or paied; Make answer (saith he to him, that first is to speake his opinion) what is your mind herein? Then he standing vp, saith. I iudge, that these things are to be recovered by battaile, or otherwise by single Combate (body to body of two men) piously and honestly performed. Euery man deliuering his iudgement in order, and the greater part iumping with this resolution; the sentence then is determinately pronounced. Thus, consent must first conclude the warre, and then the Fecialis throwes his Launce vpon the enemies Confines, according as wee haue before declared.

10 The King of the Sacraments, who is also called the Sacrificer, had his first beginning, in the time of the first Consuls, Iunius Brutus, and Marcus Valerius. The occasion of this inuention, was the expulsion of the kings, because they (without any difference) vsed to execute the Priests Office. Whereupon, the people, after they were thus excluded, thought it very strange, that there was no sacrificing, and that ouer-much reputation was taken from Religion, by sending thus their Kinges away: They therefore created a Priest, and because he should be of no lesse authority then a King; they called him King of the Sacraments. Notwithstanding, they would haue him to be vnder the cheefe Bishops iurisdiction; least, being at his owne liberty, the expelled Kings might returne, or be called backe againe. But what his office was, is not at this present to be found.

11 The Gaules dedicated al Antiquity to Berecynthia, Mother of the Gods: which Religion, as many other beside; came to Rome from Phrygia, at such time as these Verses were found (by way of answer) in the Sybils Bookes.

30 Rome, farre hence is thy Mother, I command That thou go seeke for her, and if she come: Welcome her with a chaste vntainted hand.

The Fathers and Philosophers, hauing long considered on these wordes, and being vnable (by any sufficient meanes) to finde out what Mother was intended hereby, and also from whence she was to come: they sent to be resolved by Apolloes Oracle, from whence the Messengers returned with this answer. Take with ye the mother of the Goddess, who you shal finde in a hill. Hereupon Ambassadors were sent into Asia, where they had commaund to seeke for her, and hauing found the Simulachre or Image of the Goddess, to bring it thence with them to Rome. But Attalus King of Asia, denying the Romaines (after they had found the Image) the carriage of it thence, and they preparing theselues to depart without it: it is said, that a voice was heard from the Goddess, saying: I am desirous, to go to Rome, as to the habi-tacle of al the Goddesses. Attalus being amazed at this Miracie, gaue consent to the Ambassadors for her carriage thence, whereupon she was brought (by Sea) to Rome, & many of the people going forth to meet her, singing Verses, and making much ioy: it fortun'd, that by the great waight of the Statue, the ship sunk in the Riuer of Tyber; which caused the people to labour by all meanes, both with ropes, Cables, and other helpes of strength, to get it vp againe, but all proued to no purpose: There was then present among the throngs of Roman people, a Vestall Virgin, named Claudia Quinta, a Lady of incomparable beauty, who wearing more costly and sumptuous Garmentes then some thought conuenient for her degree, was suspected to be imodest and vnchast. This goodly young Virgin, knowing the peoples idle suspicion, and puritie of her owne soule, fel on her knees by the riuers side, and (as it should seeme) by that part of the Ship where the feete of the Goddesse lay, and holding a loose Girdle in her hand, which she had fastned vnto the Cable of the ship, vttered these speeches: Before them that haue accused me of immodesty, I beseech thee (O Sacred Goddesse) that by thy testimony my fault may be iudged: to the end, that beeing condemned by thee, I may by death suffer deserued punishment. But if thou approue me to be innocent of such foule shame, let this my chaste hand be thy guide, to raise and conduct thee hence. Hauiing thus spoken, and rising from off her knees, by her Girdle she easily drewe the Ship along, and (to the no little maruail of the people) guided the Goddesse into the City.

Scipio Nasica was only thought worthy to receiue the Image, and touch it with his hand. And to him it was committed, that he should cause a magnificent Temple to be built to the Goddesse, & Priestes dedicated to her seruice; who according to the ancient Custom of the Goddesse, ought to be guelded. The reason of this institution is said to be thus: Cybele, which also was the name of this Berecynthia, loued a young youth in Phrygia, and gaue him charge not to breake chastity. But he being enamored on a Nymph, named Sagarida, slept with her one Night vnder a Tree, which was dedicated to the Goddesse. Cybele comming thither, and cutting downe the tree, killed the Nimphe; which the youth percciuing, fled in hast to the nearest Mountain; & there, meerly confounded with grieffe and shame for so foule a fault committed, hee did quite cut off the wanton instrument wherby he had so highly offended. Vpon this occasion, the Goddesse (in memory of this act) commanded that all such men as sacrificed to her, should bee guelded. It is further said, that the name of the Gaules or Galli, was deriued from a riuer in Phrygia, which was neare to a Temple of this Goddesse. And I find written, that whosoever entred into that Riuer, or drank of the water, it forthwith caused them to run mad.

12. There were two men belonging to the Sacraments, or sanctified mysteries, whose charge and Office was, to read the sacred Bookes, the verses of Sibilla; and likewise, to interpret the deeds of the Roman people. Next, they were as Presidents at the sacred Ceremonies, which vsually were made to Apollo. And at all times when any Monster was born, or any prodigy happened, fore-telling the ensuing of some great accident, entering into their beds, before the Tabernacle of the Goddes, they would appease them with Sacrifices and praier, that their displeasure might some whither else be turned from them.

Furthermore, by their Decree and order, all Sacrifices (for times of prosperity) were solemnly determined and appointed. I find no other mention made of this Priesthoods Order, vntill such time as a Temple was Dedicated to Castor, by the Sonne of Posthumus the second Dictator, who was then one of the two men: for his Father being Dictator in the Latine war, made a solempne Vow to performe such a Temple.

These two men, being long time created in this order of Priest-hood, and the Common people coueting in like maner to create the Consuls among themselves, and so to meddle in all matters, they being no way else to be appeased, obtained at length, that on the same day as these two men were to be created, they might also create ten other men; five of the nobility, and five of the Comminalty. Heerupon, of two men they grew to be ten in number; and likewise to haue the name of the Ten men.

And so much the rather it is to be presumed, because in discoursing the vacancy of Vestall Virgines, it is saide, That the Sonnes of the Augures; of the ten sacred men; of the Flamines; and of the seauen men, called Epuloni, deserued, and had their lawfull excuses admitted. Whereby I gather, that among the other Priest-hoodes, this of the seauen men was included. Yet I know not how this matter should so fall out; because I can finde nothing (concerning them) worthy of faith and authority: wherefore I am the lesse forward, in affirming what office was committed to this Order. Neuerthelesse, I must needs say, that Pliny reciting an Oration of one that stood in some feare of his Auditors, saith; In the midst stood the Consul, and next, the seauen men, tearmed Epuloni. And euen to this present day, there is to be scene engrauen on a smooth Piramide in Rome, this inscription. Opera finita, &c. The worke ended the CXXX. day, by the Testament of Caius Cornelius, Tribune of the people, and seauen men of the Epuloni.

Hauiug determined with my selfe, to intreat of all other Magistrates, not appertaining to Religion: we are then to consider, that some Magistrates were called Greater, and some Lesser, and what the lesser were, may breesely be declared, because Aulus Gellius writeth at large on this Argument, taking his instructions frō the books of M. Messala the Augure, & these are his words. The authority of the Noblemen is divided in two parts. The greater is of Prætors, of Consuls, and of Censors, and yet neuerthelesse, there is not one kinde of iurisdiction or power among them: because the Censors are no Colleagues with the Prætors and Consuls, but the Prætors are Colleagues with the Consuls, and therefore the Prætors and Consuls haue not the power of the Censors, and the Consuls trouble not the Prætors and Censors. But the Censors among themselves, the Prætors and Consuls also among themselves, obtaine and enioy alike authority. The Prætor, as it were a Colleague with the Consull, cannot (in reason) vse the same power, as belongeth to the Consull, and to the Prætor; as wee haue learned from our betters, and as hath beene obserued before these times. And it is manifest in the thirteenth Commentary of C. Tuditanus, that the Prætor hath the lesser, and the Consull the greater authority: whereupon meere reason directeth, that the lesser cannot vse the power of the greater, nor the greater, the priuiledge of the lesser Magistrate. We in these times, creating a Prætor for the Prætors; haue followed the authority vsed of old, though wee haue not searched into the like power: for Censors, Consuls, and Prætors, cannot iustly deale in one & the same scrutiny. The rest of the Magistrates haue lesser authority, and therefore these other are called the Greater, and they, the Lesser Magistrates; the Greater are made according to the Centuriate leges, Lawes made by the whole assembly; and the Lesser, among the Tribunes priuiledges, but yet much more iustly, when it is done according to the Laws Curiate, Lawes made by the same assembly.

By all these words of Messala (saith he) may easily be gathered, what the lesser Magistrates were, and vpon what occasion they were so called. Hee saith also, that the Prætor was Colleague of the Consuls, because they were created by one absolute power. And he granteth them to haue the greater authority, because their scrutinie or search was more firme, and better ratified then the other: The Consull may reduce all the other Magistrates scrutinies, and their conference or Parlement: the Prætor had not the like priuiledge at all times, or equall reducing. The lesser Magistrates could not reduce any thing from the Consul, or to any other Magistrate: In an equall action, he that is first called of them, and first obserueth the search; he goeth directly to his charge: because hee may not moue the people twice, neyther can he carry one to any other, if hee will haue conference, and deale with the people; although many Magistrates together may admit conference. By these words of Messala, is euidentlie discerned, that it is one thing to worke with the people; and another, to deale by speech or conference. Because, to deale with the people, is to request some thing, which their suffrages either commaundeth or denyeth: But to haue speech and conference; is simply to speake to the people, without any roagation or intercession.

receiv'd Originall from Romulus. Hee was the first founder and builder of the City, and considering with himself, that it was sufficiently fortified with able youth, as also with others of competent strength; he conceiv'd also, that it was not the least important matter, if it had like helpe, or much better ability of Counsell (elected to the number of an hundred) of the chiefest Fathers and Citizens then to be found; who (for their honour) might be called Fathers; and (for their yeares) Senators; according to the saying of Caius, that those (amongst the Lacedemonians) were called Senes, that were men of years, and ought to haue the place of Magistracie.

The order among the Lacedemonians.

Tullus Hostilius increaseth the Senators number.

Afterward, such as were born or sprung from these first Fathers, were named Patricij. Tullus Hostilius made the number of them much more perfect, hauing vanquished Alba, and brought the Albanes thence to Rome. Hee then entertained among the Senators, the Tulli, the Servilij, the Quinti, the Gregani, and the Clodi. But the Kings being expulsed, the Consull Brutus, perceiuing the Senat to be empty of honest persons, appointed, that those men who were cheefest in the Order of Knight-hood, should be made Senatours, and beare the name of Patres Conscripti, Enrolled Fathers. Whereupon, from hence the Nomination of Conscribed Fathers, receiued Originall; and because he spake it, it had full approbation, and ioyned with the other Fathers.

Three Degrees of Senators.

Conscripti.

These Senators had such absolute authority, that they administr'd the maine importancy of all matters in the Commonwealth; in such sort, that neither the King, the Consuls, the Dictators, nor any other Magistrate dealt in any thing, vntill it hadde first passed Counsell in the Senate. For Tarquinius Superbus, hauing (beside the Senates authority) doone many things according to his owne will; was called Tirant, and (last of all) lost his state. I finde that there were three degrees or orders of Senatours, because some were called Pedarij, others Patricij, and some others Conscripti. The Patricij were they that descended (by Birth) of those hundred, elected at first by Romulus. The Conscripti wer such, as, by decree of the Consulles, the King and the Censours, were brought into the Senate. But I finde the Pedarij to be so called for diuers reasons. Some say, that though they were in the Senate, they might not bee allowed to speake their minds, but only to giue their consent to the rest, and (with their feete) to expresse the same, by making some little noise, whereon the Latine sentence of them was, Ibant pedibus in sententias, and therefore to be tearmed Pedarij. Others Write, that many of the Senators being great Magistrates, came to the Senate in their Horse-litters or Coaches. Others, (hauing no Office of Magistracy) came after them on foot; and thereupon were called Pedarij. Marcus Varro saith, That there were some Knights, who hauing bene employed by the greater Magistrates, and not (as yet) elected by the Censors in the Senat: They might not deliuer their opinion in the Senate, or giue any sentence. Onely it was lawful for them to be present with the rest in the Senate, and yeelde consent vnto that which was agreed on by their elders.

Pedarij, and the reason why so called by sundry opinions.

The saying of Marcus Varro, concerning the Pedarij.

Concerning the Consulles order in the Senate, all that I haue read, doe consent in this manner. It was the vse at first, that he (who by the Censors) was appointed chiefe in the Senate, should begin to speake his opinion; and other-whiles they graunted such as were elected Consulles leaue to begin. Cicero, in the book which he intitled the Elder Cato, of Old age, writeth; That they used to giue their preeminence to him of greatest yeares. Whereupon, he that was the most aged, hee began to speake his minde, and giue the sentence. Neuerthelesse, it is saide, that (by custome) it was introduced, that he who was desired thereto by the Consul, might be the first to speake. And yet it was not lawfull for him to intreate any man, that either was, or had not bin Consul. I finde recorded vpon this custome, that Caius Julius Caesar, in the Consulship which he held with M. Bibulus, made entreatie (out of common forme or vse) to three seueral men, (to wit;) M. Crassus, Cneius Pompeius and Marcus Cato. Afterward, Marcus Crassus, (as straining courtesie) began to entreat Cneius ompeius, because his daughter was his Wife: but preuailing with M. Cato, hee accepted the charge, but spake so loude, and continued so long in his Oration, as all the time was welneere spent, that the Senate obserued in their arguing. Caesar perceiuing that hee grew to no conclusion, but held on still; commanded manded him to be carried thence to prison. Cato obeying, and being led on the way towards the prison; the Senate rose and followed after him; whereat Caesar being enuiously moued, staid, and commanded to let him go.

Concerning the congregating and assembly of the Senat, M. Varro at the intreaty of Pompey, wrote a Booke when he was the first time designed Consull with M. Crassus: and it was conceiued that he who (till that time) had bin so long in the Warres, would (in that respect) make the better obseruation of customs, and other ciuill occasions. In like manner he wrote a Letter to Opimius, wherein he saith, that the fore-named Booke was lost in the age of Varro. In which letter (saith Aulus Gellius) Varro wrote many things of the same argument; and there was set downe, what they were, that might cause the Senate to be assembled; as also to nominate the Dictator, the Consul, the Prator, the Tribune of the people; the Interrex, the Praefect for the City; and that no other had authority beside, to congregate the Senate. Some adde (ouer and beyond the ordained authority) the Tribune militaris, or Tribune for the warres, who was first Vice-consull. The ten men who had then the Consuls power: the two men, created on especiall occasion, to order the Common-wealth: and that those men were of power to assemble the Senate. As for the Praefect of the City Latium, none do sufficiently proue, if hee might assemble the Senate, because (they say) he was no Senator, neither might speake his minde in the Senat. Yet M. Varro, and Atticus Capito do both affirme, that the Praefect of Rome City, had authority to Assemble them, as the Tribune of the people (before Law made to the contrary) had the like prerogatiue.

Their prohibition also are written of, Namely, that such men had authoritie to prohibit and gainsay, who had power ouer him that was to be prohibited, or wer greater in credit: which power they receiued either from the * Senatusconsultum, or the * Plebiscitum, or some other Decree from the purpose. But concerning the place where the Senate ought to assemble, or to request Senatusconsulti; it was flatly forbidden to be any where; that had not bin first ordained by the Augures and (by them) called a Temple. Whereupon, when they met first together in the Court Hostilia, in Pompeia, and afterward in Iulia, they being all prophane places; the Augures gaue order, that they should be made Temples, to the end, that (according to precedent custome) in them their deliberations might bee consulted on. Now, for meeete time of the enates Assembly, if it were before Sunne-rising or Sun-setting, it appeared vterly vnprofitable. Wherefore, the Censor gaue direction, for the time most fit and conuenient.

What yeares the Senators were to be of, is very apparant, and that youths had likewise leaue to be in the Senate House: but P. pyrius Praetextatus occasioned the absence of all youths afterward, as Valerius Maximus hath recorded. And then, it was ordained, that no person vnder the age of siue and twenty yeares, should be admitted entrance, as we read in Plutarch in the life of Pompey the Great. The like is comprized in the Romans Ciuill Lawes, whence likewise we receiued these instructions.

Varro also recordeth, that hee who was to be admitted into the Senat, should first be a Saerificer, and an Augure: and that his first speeches in the Senate, ought rather to be of Diuine causes, then anie humain matters. Moreouer he saith, that deliberations there, were in two kinds, by disputation; or (if the case were doubtful) by generall opinion: such order they obserued likewise, in conferring on Monies, pawnes, and punishment of them that appeared not (on summons) while the Senate sat. As for them that appertained to Senatorie Families, it was decreed, that vnder the appellation of any Senate person, they comprehended the Wife also, and that those children which were giuen in adoption, before the Father was admitted into the Senat, should also be Senators. They obserued also, that whosoener was of the patrician order, though the same were by adoption the son of a common Plebeian, yet he should continue a Patrician still: which law (in mine opinion) was scarcely obserued truly in those times; considering, that P. Clodius (being a Patrician borne) and coueting the Magistrates power of the Tribunitis, to make vse thereof against the faction of Cicero, gaue himselfe by adoption to a common man.

Concerning the daughters of Senators.

The Daughters of Senators, if any of them were giuen (openly) as wiues to Senatory Men; they were not comprehended vnder the name of honorable Women. And the Sonne of a Senator, being made free by his Father, as in the ciuil right of reason: lost the name of submission, and yet retained still the Senatory dignity.

Of the Posthumi or Post-nati in the Sons of Senators.

The Posthumi, who were borne after the death of their Fathers, were yet neuerthelesse, called Senatory men. But he that was conceiued, and borne, after that his Father had been remoued from the Senate: both Proculeus and Pegasus doe say, that he was not the Sonne of a Senator. But if before his Fathers remouueall, his Sonne was conceiued; meer paternal respect cleared him from any preiudice, and hee was esteemed to be Senatory. But if before his conception, his Father had lost the Senatory Dignity, and then dying, his Sonne fell into the power of his Grand-Father, (being then a Senator) so that he might seeme as not to be borne of a Senator: ye was he (notwithstanding) to beheld as Senatory. A Woman, being married at first to a Senator, and afterward matching with a Man of meaner condition; lost her Title among the Honourable Women. In regard whereof, many of them made intercession to the Princes, that although they were married to men of humble condition; yet that they might still retaine their Senatorie Dignity. And it is said, that D. Augustus did afford such grace to Iulian Aemilia, being his Cozin. The Law Iulia, of restitution, prohibited Senatours, such as were remoued from their Order (albeit they changed not State, but dwelt still in the City) yet could they giue no sentence, or bee Witnesses in any case whatsoeuer.

Tribunes of the light horse men, ordered in three Centuries by Romulus.

Ramnesi, Tatij, and Luceri.

15 I find, that Romulus was the first that ordained the Tribunes of light or nimble Horse-men, when hee selected three Centuries of Horse; whereof he made vse in all businessses appertaining to the Commonwealth, and gaue them these Titles: Of the Ramnesi; of the Tatij; and of the Luceri. The Ramnesi were named of Romulus; the Tatij, of Tatius: but the Luceri, the reason of that name was not knowne, as Linie remembreth, and nameth them all in this manner.

Three Tribunes he appointed to those Centuries, as Heades and Commaunders, and those three were chosen forth of three Tribes. It is said, that the Horse in number were three hundred, in regard that the Curie (being thirty) might haue to each one ten Horse. And the reason why he would haue them called swift or light Horse, was; because they should be alwaies in speedy readinesse, whensoever the Common-weales affaires so required. There be some, who affirme, that they were called Celer, or swift Horse, after the name of a Man called Celer, who was the first (ordained by Romulus) chiefe or Commaunder of those Centuries, according as Ouid affirmeth.

16 The Originall of the Quaestores creation, is very ancient, and they were ordained (some thinke) before all the other Magistrates. Gratian, in his Booke bearing the name of Times, hath written, that Romulus and Numa had two Quaestores, who were not by them created, but by the care and scrutiny of the people. But if (as it is not certaine lie noted) that Romulus had Quaestores; it is manifest, that Tullus Hostilius the K. created some. It is said, that they were called Quaestores, because their duty was to gather the publike Monies, and they had the charge also of the publike treasury. Gratian further saith, that they vsed to read in the Senate, such Letters as were sent from this or that Man, and that they were named (by the Prince) Candidati. I find beside, that sometimes these Quaestores examined Malefactors, and gaue them tortures. Whereupon, Varro wil haue it, that of Quaestionarius, an Inquisitour, or Giuer of the Strappado, the name of Quaestor was imposed on them. They vsed to create the Quaestores, as wel from among the common people, as the Patritians, euen as all other Magistrates; which authority, because it was giuen to the meaner sort, had neither any admonition or prohibition. And as those priuate men were to be called in question by the Prator; so is it likewise said, that (at the beginning) they had authority to speake their opinion in the Senate. And because the Consuls could not sentence any Romaine Cittizen to death, without commission from the people; therefore it was ordained dained to the people, that certaine Quæstores should have authority in Capitall occasions, and they were called Quæstores of Homicides or Murderers, whereof mention is made in the Lawes of the xii. Tables.

17. Romulus being dead, and the Fathers bethinking themselves in what manner they might then best govern the Common-wealth, and who should seeme worthy to succeed Romulus; as also, what course therein were best to be obserued, that the people (who were as without a Head) might enter into no such disorder, as (thereby) to draw war from neighbors, vpon a City without a guide: they congregated themselves seriously together, and concluded (after mature consultation) to make choise of an hundred fathers which should be diuided into ten bandes or Squadrons, ten for each compeny, & out of each company to elect one man; and he (with the other ten) should haue the charge of the other ninety. Out of these also, they made Election of one man, who should assume the place of a King; which dignity of his, was to last but five dayes, and the five dayes beeing ended, another was chosen; and so went it thorough them al, each man by his five daies, vntill a whole yeare was expired in this kind of gouerning.

But this Empery or rule appearing hurtfull, and the people complaining, that (for one King) they had now an hundred; the fathers likewise perceiuing what stirres might arise in challenging the sole Gouernment, they deuised what meanes might best rid them of so waighty a burthen, and throwing the same clog vpon the people, determined with them, that no Iurisdiction or power should remain to any future King, but only vnto such a man as they should make choise of. They further resolved, that he should be King, whom the people commanded to be elected as King, with this condition: That he should be said to be truly a king, if the Fathers gaue him their full Confirmation. The Inter-Rex, or five daies king, called a Parliament, and said to the people, as followeth: O you Quirites, create you a King, that may bee good, iust, and happy. If you create such a one, as may worthily be said to second Romulus; the Fathers will therein gladly ioyne with yee. With these conditions, they created him who should haue the generall gouernment. But in the time of vacancy, and when there was no King, he that had the chiefe power of the hundred, was called the Inter-Rex. It happened afterward, that wanting a King, and the Consuls being absent from Rome, as men imployed in the Common-weales waightiest affaires; and thereby to be excused by their absence; they could not find a man to generall liking. And therefore, being frustrated of a full and lawfull creation, the gouernment was referred to the Inter-Rex, by whose meanes they created their following Consuls.

18. There were two chiefe or capitall men, created in great authority, but if wee would vnderstand the Originall of these two especial men, we must then begin with the time of King Tullus Hostilius. He warring vpon the Albanes, had already conducted his army into an apte place; and Metius Suffetius, Captaine of the Albanes, came to haue conference with the King of the Romaines. Hauing long debated about the conditions of peace, it was finally concluded in this manner. There were then in the Albane army, three worthy Brethren, who were tearmed the Curiatij, & these three Gallants must fight (body to bodye) with three other Romain Brethren, called the Horatij. The resolution being past, without anie alteration, the day of battaile was determined, and the order to be obserued in their fight.

Hauing tried their manhood valiantly a long time together; at length the three Curiatij (who were all fore wounded) happened to kill two of the Horatij. The thirde man seeing his Brethren slaine, and himselfe (as yet) sprightly and vntoucht, began to consider, that to defend his life against the Curiatij, ther was now no need of any lost time, or to stand still in a season so perrilous; and therefore he began to run about the Lists. He of the Curiatij; that was in weakest estate, immagining, that the death of his brethren had amazed his senses, and therefore sought the best meanes how hee might escape; pursued him very speedily. But Horatius turning suddenly backe vpon him, manfully slew him: and the second making hast to succour his Brother, beeing ouer-feeble for the performance, was likewise slaine; and euen so sped the thirde, who needed not many strokes to dispatch him.

Hereupon (by common consent) a glorious Triumphe was prepared for Horatius, and he riding back to Rome in that manner; no meane confluence of people came to meete him, among whom also was the Sister to Horatius. This Lady, who formerly had bene given by her Brother, in marriage to one of the Curiatij, beholding the spoiles of her flaine Husband hanging on his chariot: fel both into such loud and lamentable exclamations, as made all present very much amazed. Horatius taking her sorrowes discontentedly, perceiuing them to be a blemish to his victory, and a trouble to the generall reioycing; suddenly slew her. The Triumphe being ended, Horatius was brought before the King, from whom he was sent to Prison, and (in common opinion) thought worthy of death. But his memorable fortune, winning great grace and fauour with the King; procured his tryall to be delayed, and he being desirous also to haue his cause duely examined, would be one in his owne royal person, and therefore created two men more, who should heerein assist him to their vttermoost power. The two chosen men pronounced Horatius worthy to dye: but then he appealed from them, and would put himselfe on the peoples sentence. At which time, the aged Father to vndaunted Horatius (halfe drowned in teares) fell on his knees before them, entreating, that hauing lost two of his Sonnes in battaile, and onelie for the honour of their Country; that they would not suffer him now to be deprived of the third. The people being moued to much compassion, and calling to minde, the no small hazzard of his achieved victory; clearly acquitted him.

Thus grew the Originall of those two Capitall men, to whom (not long after) a third man was added, and so they became three. Now, because they were appointed to Capitall Inquisitions: they had the charge of those Prisons, wherein capitall Offenders were enclosed, and thereupon had the Name of Capitall Men. And this degree of Magistracy, had hand in the condemnation of Caius Manilius Capitolinus, from the people of Rome. And the same authority chastised all them, that dealt in the conspiracy of L. Cataline, according as Salust describeth.

19 Concerning the Præfect, Prouoost, or Captaine of the Citty, there is nothing found written, before the time of Spurius Lucretius (Father to Lucretia) who was Præfect. I doe not heerein deny, but that there might be such Magistrates, and that all the other Kinges, from Tarquine forward, might create Præfects. But howsoeuer it might be, or was, the Reader is to take notice, that at all times, when the King had occasion to be farre off from Rome, he left (in his stead) the Præfect of the Citty. But as the Empire increased, so was the iurisdiction of all Italy committed to the Præfect. All delicts and offences which were found through Italy (as is witnessed by an Epistle sent from D. Seuerus to Cilionus) were brought before the Præfect of the Citty, in the beginning of which Epistle, are these wordes set downe.

20 We hauing committed the Government of the Citty to thy faithfull trust; know from us, that all such transgressions as happen in our Citty, shall appertaine to the care and ture of the Præfect thereof. His authority likewise extendeth, to confirme, and to banish. If any one shall faithfully affirme, that a Wife hath committed Adultery with her slaue; the Præfect is to heare his information: because he may (by his authority) make enquiry, whether the accusation proceedeth on spleene, or fraud, or whether the act were violently committed, or no. He shall also cause to appeare before him, Governours of Wards, or fatherlesse Children, and 50 Stewards of mens Landes or possessions, for enquiry of well or ill dealing in their offices: how they stand suspected, either for giuing Money to enioy their Gardianship, or deliuered any other bribes or rewards, without which, they had bene vnmeete for such authority;

thority; Also, whether they haue abused and diminished the Orphanes faculties, or (by fraudulent conueyance) got any part of his patrimonie.

Ouer and beside the precedent matters, D. Seuerus likewise added to the office of this Magistrate; That he should haue an eie to Seruants, least they swerued from their Maisters, to vnlawfull entertainers. To be carefull of the Moniers or Minters, in carying themselves vprightly, and to make knowne all their treacheries against the Lawes. That Maisters should not be iniured by their Free-Seruants, or Iourney-men, as we call them: neyther by his owne Children, or his Wife, or his Neighbour. All these occasions ought to bee heard before the Praefect, who, according as he findes the offence, may punnish the Free-man menace, disfranchise, or proceede to some heauier kind of punnishment; as the like is to be doone, if he haue practised and conspired with any of his Maisters enemies. He ought likewise to ouer-see all things that were to be sold, and giue admonition, that a iust value or price should not be exceeded. The Markets also were vnder his charge, for Oxen, Sheepe, Swine, &c. with the Shambles, Fishery, Hearbery, and such like. And to conserue the people in quiet, he kept the souldiers in their places of quarterage, to preuent any insurrection, vpon the least suspition. In the Citty he might prohibite the faculties, pleadings, and Sessions, at such times as himselfe pleased, and (in like manner) appoint them.

At length, when this Man had long time continued in this high place; his Authority was giuen to the Praetor of the Latines Holy-daies, vntill (at some other time) the like creation should begin againe. And when all the other Magistrates made Holy-day, yet they gaue place to the Praefect of the Latines Citty onely. I haue left some other things vnspoken of, concerning the authority of this Praefect, but they are not of any great importance.

The most auncient Writers doe consent, that the authority of Consuls was formed after example of the Kings. For when the Kings were expelled, two men were created; to whom no lesse power was graunted, then formerly had beene giuen to the King: onely excepted, that their Dominion endured but for a yeare. They had * Lictors, and all other Officers as the King was wont to haue. Now, because their especiall care was, to counsell what was most conuenient for the Common-weales benefit: thereupon they were named Consuls, and to them was committed the diligent respect of all occasions, which they could conceiue to be fittest for generall good. The first Consuls, after the rule of Kinges was controuled, were L. Iunius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus. Brutus concluded with his Colleague or companion, that (by turnes) one of them onelie should be seene with the Ensignes royall: to the ende, that the people (who had seen and knowne both the one and other) might not lament for the losse of one King, nor yet bee terrified with the sight of two. The Lictors or Sergeants were twelue in number, who with bundles of Rods & Axes, alwaies went before the Consull.

It is said, that Romulus instituted this number of Lictors, because as hee questioned with a Brother of the Augures; he beheld twelue Gripes or vultures on Mount Auentine. Many other Authors of credit hold opinion, that the Lictors, Commanders, the * Sella Curulis, the Gowne, and the long Roabe, called Pratexta; came to Rome from the Tuscan people, confining on the Romaines. For it is saide, that the Tuscan people, being of twelue seuerall kinds, and hauing created their King; each people afforded and gaue him a Lictor. They hold, that the word Lictor, was formed of Legare; because as suddainely as the Consull gaue command, eyther to apprehend, or to binde any man; they were as ready and officious thereto, and they gaue command also to any that was to appeare before the Consull: Iunius Brutus, one of the first Consuls, died in Warre, and P. Valerius remained aliue in the Consulship, because he was put in place of Tarquinius Collatinus; who for the hatred the Romaines bare to his Progenie; had renounced his Dignity: Such was the mutability of the vulgares mindes, not onely to beginne false Calumniationes against him, but also to intimate blames, suspitions, and (finally) vehement accusations. Notwithstanding all which, hauing called a Parliament, and iustified himselfe beyond their expectation: he was the Authour of making a Law, that a Man might defend himselfe, and appeale from any Magistrate. Then beganne the Consules Authoritie (which had long continued famous) to bee inferiour to kingly prerogatiue, and so largely spread the Seedes of Licence and Liberty, that quickly began too liberall a Haruest thereof: for they left creating of Consuls among the Fathers, and the Auspici or hopefull signes, would neuer afterward come neere any other.

At last, the Warres beeing ended with the Gaules, I meane that Warre wherein Titus Manlius Torquatus, raking the Chaine from the Gaule, that fought hand to hand with him, was slaine by him, and gaue the Sir-name of Torquatus to all his Posterity: the Romaines waxing wearie of the Tribunes continuall seditions; gaue grant, that one of the two Consuls should be chosen by the Common people. The first Consull (then) of the Plebeians or Commoners, was Lucius Sequatius, and the Plebeians hauing obtained before, that the Tribunes of the Souldiers might be chosen among them, because they serued in the stead of Consuls: oftentimes, in creation of the Tribunes, they made likewise a mixture of the Consules Authority, and that in such manner, that many times it happened, that the Consuls commaund was voide two yeares together, sometimes more, and sometimes lesse, according as occasion fell out.

Concerning the Constitution or creation of the Consuls power and priuiledges; I finde, that an assembly beeing called by the Consuls, or by the two cheefe men, or by the Inter-Rex, or the Dictator of the Squitinie, which Man was elected of the Tribes, or by the congregating of the Centuries; and all these meeting in the field, called Campus Martius*: such as were desirous to require the Consulshippe, came into the Fielde, and then they were called Candidati, in regard of White Robes or Garments which then they wore. He that obtained most Suffrages among the people, or had his happinesse by lot, hee was immedinly called Consull.

Now, because wee haue formerlie made mention of the Squitinie, whom the Latines tearmed Comitij: it shall not differ ouer farre from our purpose, if we set downe what wee haue collected concerning them. Among these Comitij, there were some called Calati, and other some, tearmed Tributi. Calati, because the Curiata Comitia were called by the Licitors. The Curiata were deuided into Centuries and Curij, and called Curiata, of Curij: who were thirtie in number, containing the Cittizens among them; whereupon, euery one of the Curij, was called by the Licitors to the Comitij or assembly. The Centurie were elected by voyces, and according to their yeares. The Tribunes were so named (as I thinke) of the parts of the Citty, and of the Tribes. It was not lawfull, to congregate the Centuriata Comitia within the Walls of Rome: because it was accounted vniust, that an Army should bee commaunded or gouerned, but in place most conuenient; which could not bee within a Cittie. Wherefore, the Centuriata vsed to assemble in Campus Martius, where by reason of speediest supply, Martiall matters might be best discoursed, and men trained. Beside this, it was necessary for such as demaunded the Consulship, that by themselues (personally) they should be with the Squitini or Comitij, because it was not accepted, or giuen by a third person: which I perceiue they also obserued in euery other Magistracy. Such as were Sonnes of the Family, and were not vnder the awe of their Fathers, or Grand-Fathers; might haue the Dignitie of Consull, and might also be made free when they would, by their owne authority. Finally, it was concluded, that such as were Consuls; without any other freedome of their Fathers, were at their owne liberty.

21 Titus Liuius beareth witnesse, that the Albanes had a Dictor (euen Mettius Suffetius) before the Romaines had any. The first Dictator authorized in Rome, was T. Largius, who had formerly been Consull: but it is not precisely knowne in what yeare, and vnder what Consuls. It is well obserued, that in time of the Latines and Sabines Warre, and when forty Men had conspired against gainst the Romaines (prouoked thereto by Manilius Octavius Tusculanus, Son in Lawe to proud Tarquine, and who bare him company in exile) that euen then it was ordained, to create a Dictator in Rome. This Dignity (among the Romaines) was of very great importance, and their auncient Writings doe testifie, that could none appeale from them: but he must be a Romaine Cittizen by blood, and (among them) consisted the Authority of the whole Common-wealth. All the Kings honours were attributed to the Dictator, and because he had cheefe rule ouer the people, therefore he was fir-named Maister of the People. Whence proceeded, that whosoever held any publique authority, as being bred or deriued fro the high Dictators office: they were likewise called Maisters, as the Candidi, of the Candidati.

It was not the custome to create a Dictator, except when some suddaine and vnexpected occasion hapned, that threatned ineuitable ruine to the City. At first, it was vnlawfull to create a Dictator, vnlesse he were a Patritian: neuerthelesse, it fell afterward much lower, for in the Warre which the Romaines had with the Falisci, and with the Tarquines; then was created the first Dictator of the Common people, named C. Marius Rutilus; and then (in like manner) did they elect L. Plancus, to be Maister of the Horfe, or Cauallery, a Plebeian also. This Magistrates power (being of such greatnesse) could be endured no longer then sixe months, and because he spake, nominated or elected the following Magistrates: therefore (saith Varro) he was rearm'd Dictator, vnder pretence of this or the like authority, L. Silla and Iulius Cesar gayned liberty, as coueting (so much as in them lay) to thunne the odious and infamous name of Tirants.

22 Such as were the Tribunes of the light Horfe, in the Kinges time; the like (with the Dictators) were these other Maisters of the Horfe. And as the Dictator had Iurisdiction ouer all the people; so had the Maister of the Horfe ouer all the Souldiers. The first that was chosen into this place, was Spurius Cassius, created by Titus Larginus, the first Dictator. To conclude, the Office of Maister of the Horfe, was such with the Dictators, as (with Cesar) was that of Præfectus Prætorium.

23 The occasion of creating Tribunes, was the deuision of the Common people with the Fathers, at Mount Sacer. For the Warre (on one side) being concluded with the Volsicians, and (on the other side) with the Æqui, and with the Sabines; the Common people also hoping, that (by a promised Law) freedome should bee had from the burden of Vsury, and perceiuing (to their hurt) that the Fathers did but prolong the time: suddenly M. Valerius was created Dictator, to appease the popular sedition, and for ease of a most important war. He hauing begun to intercede for the Common people, and finding both himselfe and them to be deceiued: hee renounced his Office, and went away from the people; who were not a little displeas'd, because the fathers thought, that the best way to quiet the peoples mindes (vnder colour of an Oath giuen them by the Consuls) was presentlie to lead them forth to Warre. The people taking the matter very ill, passed the Riuer Teueron, and went thence to Mount Sacer, which was three Miles distant from Rome. This bred such a terrour in the Fathers, not knowing how the Common-weale should be defended (being now destitute of all things necessary thereto) if Warre should be raised from any Neighbour Enemy: that they sent to them Mencius Agrippa, (a man dearely respected of the Fathers, and no lesse affected by the people) hee as an Ambassador, should comprenize this discontentment of the people. He speaking very grauely to them, induced the fable of the members, entring into conspiracy against the belly: which so highly pleased the people, that they consented to haue peace with the Fathers. But in the conditions of peace, they obtained; that there should be Magistrates of the Common people in the City. Whereupon ensued, that the Plebeians (from that time forward) were to haue two Tribunes in full authority, A. Virginius, and T. Vetustus then beeing Consuls.

Another time grew the like seperation, and then three Tribunes more were added to the former two: Appius Claudius

Claudius, and C. Quintius, being Consuls. Afterward, five other; in the Consulship of M. Horatius Pulvillus, and Q.
Minutius: and so (in this manner) the Romaines came to haue tenne Tribunes.
The authority of these men encreased in such sort, that whatsoever the Senate ordained, was of sure strength, if so be it were approved of the Tribunes.
They stood at the entrance of the place, where the Senate were assembled (because it was not lawfull for them to enter into the Temple) and those matters deliberated by the Sena-tours, were committed to the Tribunes, to examine them. If they were for the good of the Common-wealth, they should then ratifie them, changing, or adding whatsoever they pleased: and in signe that matters were confirmed by them, they should set (vnder the writing) the Letter T.

But concerning the power of the Tribunes, if I might speake at large thereof, I should then alleadge the iudgment of Labeo Antistius, that excellent Lawyer, whose wordes are these, as I finde them set downe in Aulus Gellius. Wee reade (saith he) in a certaine Letter of At-teius Capito, that Labeo Antistius, was of great obseruation, and very learned in the Lawes; yet was he extreamely enclined to liberty, and there-withall of such courage; that D. Augustus being then Prince, nothing whatsoever was allowed to be firme or good, but what he found to be sacred and iust in Romaine Antiquity.
Afterward hee sheweth, that the same Labeo, being called by a Commander of the peoples Tribune; sent answer by the same Commaunder, bidding him say thus to him that sent him. Tell the Tribune, that hee hath no authority to call me, or any other: considering, that (according to the custome of our Elders) the Tribune hath power to take, but not to call, or commaund. Wherefore, himselfe ought to come, and then to giue commaund to him who should be taken; otherwise, he hath no power to call an absent man.

Aulus Gellius affirmeth, that the very same is written by Varro, in his Book of Humane things. This Varro, being one of the Trismutri, maintained; that hee was not to be called by the Tribune of the people: And when he was Tribune, hee gaue no commaund that any Man should be called. Matter of greatest importance in the Tribune, was; that he went vp and downe (as a Mediator) in suites of Intercessions, to prohibite, that no violence should be done them by other Magistrates. His least power also, was, in publishing the Lawes to the people, those which were called Plebiscita. In which Intercessions, the authoritie of the Fathers making no interuention; they assigned such Men as were sent to the administration of the Prouinces, instead of the Consules: as we may reade in Plutarch, in the Life of M. Cato, and especiallie in the Tribune-time of P. Clodius. I finde also recorded, that when all the Tribunes were to agree vpon any matter, if one of them onely varried, and were discordant; he might doe more then all the rest, and easily hinder any other that was contrary to him.

24 I can finde no matter at all, concerning this Authoritie, vntill (vnhappilie) the Warre was made by the Romaines vpon the Aequi, which procured great terrour to the City. For the Consull which remained at that time in Rome, for the better mustering of Men together, and with the more speede, onely to helpe his Fellow-Consull, who was besieged: T. Quintius was created Vice-Consull, Albus Posthumius, and Spurius Furius being then Consuls. And because he was to be sent in stead of a Consull, he was (the rather) called Vice-Consull. To him, and others in like place, all the ensignes of a Consull was graunted, onely excepted, that but sixe Liectors attended on him, in not vsing the ordinary iurisdiction committed to the Consull: albeit (not long after) these Vice-Consuls beganne to haue equality in power and authority with the other. For the Confines of the Empire beginning to be enlarged; diuers charges in Warre were necessarily required. Where-vpon, it was concluded, that they which went forth of the Consulship at expiration of a yeare; should be Vice-Consules the yeare ensuing, and to them, by lots (deuiding the governments) all the Prouinces of the Empire were giuen in charge.

on out of his owne Prouince, albeit the case concerned and appertained to the Vice-Consuls administration. If the matter (peradventure) were fiscall or penall, it better deserved reference to Cæsars Procuratour or Attorney. If he carried his Wife with him into his Prouince (which were better for him that he did not) hee might chastise her for any euill Act committed. And as he was not to refuse Royall presents giuen him; so ought he also, to obserue a certaine meane in receiuing them: because, as it were very inhumane to receiue none at all; so likewise it fauored of too much couetousnesse, to take all things whatsoeuer; but, beside presents sent in free giuft, the Vice-Consull ought not to accept of any. Next, he might not buy any thing in one Prouince, to feede on in another. Hee ought not to treat, negotiate, or summarily define any cause, that had neede of further inquisition and examination. But if it concerned diligent enquire in some cases, as the obedience of Children to their Parentes, and (on the other side) what Children or Sonnes were to demaund of their Parents; such matters he might fully consult on, and define. He might also deale with free Seruants, that were ingratefull to their Maisters, or otherwise abused them; and commaund them to bee whipped, without councell of the Ciuill Doctor, or ordinary Iudge. He that wanted an Aduocate, eyther in regard of his pouerty, or powerfull oppression of his Aduersary: hee might, and ought to appoint him one, and take obseruation of the whole businesse, or any other of the like Nature (as in his owne right and lawfull authority) according as all other Magistrates had, to pardon or punish such delinquents. But because the flowing streame of daily occurrences, permitted not the Vice-Consull to attend all occasions: hee was suffered to haue his Legate, of whose office likewise we will speake somewhat briefly.

25 The Vice-Consuls, by the torrent of weighty affaires which continually came vpon them; vsed to send Legates into the Prouinces, who exercised iurisdiction, not as of themselues, or by their owne authority: but as it was committed to them by the Vice-Consuls; nor could they thus appoint them in their sted, except themselues had first bin in those Prouinces. If it happened, that any graue, waighty, or important matter came to the Legate, which required diligent care of the Iudge: the Legate ought to referre it to the Vice-Consull, because he had no authority to shed blood, nor punish by stripes: Neuerthelesse, he might giue iudgment in occasions of litigancy, and on such as had the tutelage of Orphanes. The vice-Consull vsed to ratifie arbitrated causes; and he might send no Legate, vntil himselfe were parted out of the Prouince. If peradventure the Legate died in the Prouince; the Vice-Consull tooke the charge on him, as the Legate in his life time left it. And if the Vice-Consull; (vpon some earnest and important businesse) was to part from the Prouince: hee might referre any cause to the Legate, although it concerned the life of a Man.

26 I am of opinion, that the Ædilitas plebei, was a very auncient kinde of Magistracy, and yet I make some doubt, whether the Ædiles were first created, before the Tribunes of the people. I remember, that (the Kings being expelled, and the separation of the people made at Mount Sacer) a great part of the Romaine people, remained a long time without any Magistrate in the Common-wealth, by whom it ought to bee defended. We read in Liue, that not long after the Tribunes of the people were created, one of the Consuls dying in a Pestilence, and the other being grievously sicke: the Ædiles of the people, tooke the charge of the Tribunes of the people on them, and the administration of the whole Common-wealth. Yet doe I not heereby inferre, that but (as then) their creation began; for it may be, that they were many yeares before: But the wealthinesse of the people encreased afterward in such manner; that out of their owne body or community, they yeilded Dictators and Bishoppes: yea, & many times (vniting themselues with the Fathers) they obtained of them, that two Ædiles of the people might be created.

ment for sollemne daies in the Kalender, both which were referred to their charge, they making deniall thereof: it is said, that the young Patritians challenged their aptnesse to such an Office, in honour of the Gods, and craved, that they might be made Aediles. Their motion being no way misliked, but rather much commended: the Senatours concluded, that the Dictator should elect two Cittizen Patritians, who must be Aediles; the Fathers and the Comitij, tearing themselves to bee Authours thereof. Wherevpon were created two Patritian Aediles, to wit; Cneus Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. Last of all, there were two other created by Iulius Caesar; who looking to the prouision of Corne, were therefore called Cereales. I finde among Authours, worthy of good credit, that the Aediles receiued their name of Aedes; which signified a sacred Temple, and their charge was, to be carefull of Temples. And because they were created of the Patritians, they had the name also of Curules; because they were carried, either to the Pallace, or else where by Land, in Chariots or Litters. The Plebeians and the Curules are so well knowne, that I thinke there needes no further report of their condition.

The Aediles appointed publique feasts to bee made, which was no small burthen: because it was ordained, that (according to their Dignity, and State of their Patrimony) such should bee their expences. Concerning this Order, Cicero giueth sufficient Testimony, in those Bookes which hee entitled De Officijs, where he makes mention of the time, when he himselfe was one of the Aediles, and of Pompey the great. * Asconius Pædiannus saith, that Pompey being created Aedilis, hauing (at his own cost) builded a maruailous rich Theater: beside the magnificent plaies which were there performed; would needs haue a sumptuous Chariot also, drawne by diuers Elephants. Whereby may further be gathered, that the Aediles were at the charge of the feasts, & of the arguments of the Comedies; because they carried name of those Aediles, vnder whose authority they were made and acted. The Aediles appointed the places for all men to sit in, with due obseruation of their quality and degrees. Valerius Maximus writeth, that Attilius Seranus, and Lucius Scribonius, being Ediles, were the first, that (in fitting) diuided the Senate from the Plebeians. If a Buyer were deceiued by a Seller, in deliuering him a sicke or weake Beast, for a sound; his helpe was had by the Aediles. They likewise had especiall care, that the Conduits for Water should be kept very cleane, and all other buildings neat and sweete. Finally, if bad things were sold in the markets, vnder the name of good; and rotten or corrupt wares, in stead of honest sufficiency: it appertained to the Aediles to controule.

27 It was not lawfull for the Magistrates of the Common-weale, to take away the regiment of the ten men, who are said to be created on this occasion. The common people being daily moued with new tumults, by electing Magistrates among themselves, to make lawes for freedome from oppression of Vsury; to contract marriages with the Fathers, and for confirmation of their owne possessions: by these means, matters (both diuine and humane) grew to an ouerthrow; and then, nothing was more desired then Common Lawes, to the end, there might be no lurking corner for enuy; which made them conclude, to deriue (from some place else) lawes for the City. Herevpon, three Ambassadors were sent to Athens, who should bring thence the written Lawes of Solon, hauing first well obserued the Customes and vsage of other Nations. The Ambassadors were these; Spurius Posthumius Albus, Aulus Manilius, and Publius Sulpitius Camerinus. These three men, three yeares after their departure from Rome; returned thither againe, and bringing with them the written Lawes: which Lawes, in regard they were to bee more fully perused, exemplified, & accommodated to their vse, there were ten men created by the Comitij of Centuries, to ouer-see them for the Common-weales benefit. The ten men were these; Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Castius, L. Veturius, C. Iulius, Aulus Manlius, P. Sulpitius, P. Curiatius, T. Romulius, and Spurius Post-humius; from whose iudgement and censure of the Lawes, no man whatsoever should any way appeale.

Lawes for Rome to be fetcht from some other Country.

Three Ambassadors sent to Athens.

Ten men created to peruse the Lawes, and their names.

Ten Tables made for the Lawes, that the people might aproue them.

Two Tables more to be added to the ten.

Ten other men chosen again, about the two other Tables.

The ten men appear before the people.

The pride and insolence of the ten men vnto the people.

This year (therefore) they made ten Tables, and published them openly, to the end, that the Lawes might be heard of all the people, with authoritie giuen them: that they might amend, Correct, interpret, and deliuer their opinions; promising to be patient in attention, while they were fully read and herd. After they had bin sufficiently perused, they were set downe in writing for continuance, openly manifested, and the former Magistrate quite displaced. But a certaine conceit rising among the, that if two Tables more were added to them, the Romaine Lawes (thereby) would be made most perfect: Heereupon, the Comitij were called together againe, euen in the former place of meeting; and there, other ten men were anew created. Then Appius Claudius, to whome the charge of assembling the Counsell was committed, contrary to his duty, and against the forme of all good vse: nominated himselfe for one of the ten, calling these also to be his Colleagues, Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Sergius, L. Minutius, Quintus Fabius Vipulanus, Q. Petilius, Titus Antonius Merenda, Catius Dilius, Spurius Opius Cornucius, and M. Robuleius. These men, being verie desirous to ouer-rule and commaund, made their appearance (the 15. day of May) in the Market place, with twelue Axes each man borne before him, interpreting the same to be a matter of the lesse moment, because they were created without apeale or prouocation. It is said that at their first comming into the peoples presence, they seemed as if they had bin ten Kings. And it is a matter (almost) exceeding beleefe, what a publicke feare this forme of behaviour bred in the Citty, wherein they were not much deceiued, nor their suspicion causelesse.

They began to waxe cruell, and libidinous against the people. There was no matter heard or handled amongst them, but it past rather by fauour and respect, then any Reason, Iustice, or Equity. They concluded together, that what matter soeuer they pronounced in publick, or else intended to do; if any man appeald from any one of the Confederates to another: he parted from him with such satisfaction as he had bin better not to haue appeald from the former. It was a generall opinion, that they had agreed amongst themselves, and confirmed it by oath, neuer to ceasse this kind of Counsell, but perpetually to hold this Order of Magistracie, with Dominion ouer all the Empire. Under this condition passed the greater part of the yeare; and vntill the two Tables were added to the ten, there was nothing else current, but what passed by publication of the Centuriata Comitij. Matters sading thus, the yeare being spent; and no other tidings heard from the Counsell: the people (not a litle lamenting their losse of liberty) began to mutiny, & moue a tumult. In somuch, that newes came, how the Sabines and Equi raised warre against Rome. Hauing pondered heereon awhile, the ten men assembled the people, and selecting an Army out of them, went to the Warre. While there they fought with variable fortunes, Appius Claudius, one of the ten, who remayned behind for government of the Citty, became inamored on a Plebeian Virgin, and practised (by what meanes hee might) to enioy her company.

The Father of the yong Maiden, whose name was Lucius Virginus, being absent from Rome at the warre, where hee had a place equall to his worth and merite; had formerly affianced his daughter to a yong Gentleman, named Leilius, one of the Tribunitij. Appius tempting the Virgin with entreats and promises, yet no way preuailling to gaine his intent: altered his purpose to pride and cruelty, and plotted with one M. Claudius, an intimate friend of his, that as he sat in his Tribunal to listen causes: M. Claudius should steppe forth, and challenging the Damosell to be his slaue, to demand her in iustice, and he himselfe would punish al them seuerely, that durst take on them to approoue her freedome. This lustfull wretch; taking aduantage of apt opportunitie, M. Claudius had seized the Virgin, as shee past ouer the Market place, calling hir his slaue-servant, and the daughter of a slaue: commanding her to follow him, and offering to carry her away violently, if she made any resistance.

The Damosell (having no other company then her Nurse) cried out for assistance, because there were many by, to defend her from Claudius. But he told them, that they presumed ouer-rashly vpon his right, there was neither time or place (as then) for tumults. But if they mistrusted what he had said, he entreated them to go with with him to immediate iudgement. Appius sitting ready to entertaine the busines, demanded of Claudius, the reason of his disquiet, whereto he thus answered. This Maiden (quoth he) was borne in my house, and of a slave my Servant: some while after he was stolne from me, and (under the name of daughter) conveyed to the house of Lucius Virginia, where euer since she hath forcibly bin kept from me. But hauing now seized her in mine owne right, I craue that she may be sentenced, & that she may part hence with hir maister, or else you deserue not the place of a Iudg. Appius perceiuing so good a beginning, to the end it might not appeare, that he was rash in censure before examination; he caused the Maidens defenders to be called, who alledged, that it was a very vniust proceeding, to call the Virgin in question, her Father being absent about the Common-wealths affairs. Adding other cases of like moment, the young Gentleman Icilius (troth-plighted Husband to Virginia) and Numidius his Grand-father, came before the iudgment seat. Icilius making a great stir and noise, vsing words likewise very neglect & carelesly, as being of bold and vndanted courage: command was giuen him by a Licitor (by Commission deliuered from Appius) presently for to make his departre thence. But he resisting, imboldned by a resolued spirit, and the goodnesse of his cause, a great multitude of Romaines also being there assembled: Appius, to auoide any nouell accident, which might rise frō the people, caused him to giue securitie, that Virginia (the day following) should bee presented againe in iudgment. These ill-pleasing Newes were soone carried to her Father, who needed no other Spurre to hast him to Rome; where hee himselfe brought his daughter (accompanied with manie worthy Matrons) the next day before the Iudgement seate. With teares and humble intreats, the graue Olde Father desired to haue Iustice; and that the whole case might be publickly discussed; the like did Icilius and mournful Virginia, assisted by the voices of all the other Ladies.

But Appius, whose heat of lust admitted no reason, despising all their woful lamentations; mounted vp to his tribunall, where he gaue sentence, that Virginia was the Bond-slave to Claudius. This Iudgement filled all the hearers with admiration; and Claudius offering to lay hand on the Maiden, with intent to carry her presently thence: her wofull Father stepped betweene him and the Iudge, and (with abundance of teares trickling downe his White Beard) vttered forth these speeches:

10 Heare (O you Romaines) that I haue espoused my Daughter to Icilius, and not to thee Appius. I bred and broght her vp, that she might go vwith a virgins honor to marriage, and not to libidinous rape or deflouring. But if (in a Fathers true affection) my words may seeme offensiue to thee; pardon me, that in thy presence, and before hir face, I may demand of hir nurse, whither she know me to be *Virginia*s father or no, that truth being acknowledged, I may part hence with the more contented minde. Then stepping to his Daughter, as if he intended to aske her some priuate question; he drew forth a Knife (which he had purposely hid) and there slew his Daughter, rather then she should be dishonored. The people amazed at this admirable resolution, gaue so loud a cry, that it drewe more people in multitudes thither; and Appius perceiuing a strange tumult toward, to secure his life, muffled his face closely, that he might not be knowne in his escape thence. The people taking addantage of this occasion, for their recouery of the City; forthwith entred into Armes, and chose wronged Virginia to be their Commander: parting away presently to mount Auentine. Icilius (on the other side) drew home his Fathers power of Souldiours; and in example of the Plebeians, tenne Militarie Tribunes were immediately created, who (accompanying the other Army) came in verie powerfull manner vnto Rome, forsaking Friends, Wiues, and Children, now to redeem the liberty of their wronged country.

20 The ten men, not a little confounded with this sudden alteration; made hast to assemble the Senate, and consult what might be done for safety of the Commonwealth. At length, after many and sundry determinations, with very bold reprehensions (by the Senators) giuen to the Ten men, calling them as many Tarquins: the Tenne were gladde and faine to submit themselues vnto the power of the fathers, so they might bee freed from publicke Iniuries, and all other doubted Daungers. Concluding withall, that Ambassabassadors should be sent to compound & quiet this great disorder. Heerupon, M. Horatius, and Lucius valerius, good men, and of great authority, were sent to deale with the people about the conditions of peace. The people demaunded (in their peace-conditions) that the ten men might bee punished according vnto their deseruings: but by faire and gentle language in the Ambassadors, such seuerity was mitigated. They were therefore contented, that their wonted Tribunes should be restored to them againe, and the gouernment returne (as formerly it had done) to the dignity of Consuls. By this means, the ten men renounced their Authority, and the Comitijs were warned for creation of the Consuls and Tribunes. Thus by this new ordination, the ten mens power was suppressed, and the State came vnto hir woonted honourable kinde of Gouernment.

2^d. Because wee are discourfing on Offices of authority, I hold it reasonable, that we should say somewhat of the Praefect for Corne, who (in these times) was created out of the woonted order. I find nothing concerning this Magistrate, but that hee was vnder the Consulship of Appius Claudius, and P. Seruilius, which was the very same yeare, when Tarquinius Superbus died, neare to Aristodemus the Tirant. It is faide, that about this time, a contention hapned between the Consuls about dedication of the temple of Mercury, which finally was concluded with this condition; that he who should dedicate the Temple of Mercury, should likewise be appointed for prouision of Corne. The people gaue the dedication to M. Pletorius, Captaine of the chiefe Squadron, not in regard that he deserud it, but as a shame and disgrace to the Consuls, for not carrying themselues vprightly in their Consulship. But not finding this matter so apparant in Linie, I am induced to thinke, that it was their error, who tooke vpon them to write so manifestly; because I find, that not long after, L. Minutius was made Praefect for Corne. This office was very expedient in hard times, when Corn wanted, and men sold it very deare. It was his charge to procure Corn from all neighboring parts; and he might command any man (who had more then fitted for his owne House and family) to bring it forth to publick sale (how farre soeuer it were off) and to set a price thereon. By meanes of this Magistrate, the people of Rome (being many times in great want of Corne) had present helpe. Pompey the Great, hauing the same authority, & the same Magistracy, as we now speak of, setting forth from Sicilie, with a great quantity of Corne intended for Rome, the Mariners told him, that it was not good for them to put to Sea in a tempest or storm. Whereto, it is said (in his Countie behalfe) he returned this answer. It is good and necessary to saile, but it is not necessarie to liue. The care for Corne (afterwardes) grew into such fauour and authority, that all such persons as were not thought meet, nor admitted to accuse in any other case: yet in this onely they had free admision, yea, though they were Strumpets (most infamous) and such like persons.

29 Through many deuisions of the Fathers, made with the people, who had demanded of them, that (out of their own condition) they might create Consuls, & yet by reason of the wars abroad, the people made no administration thereof: they were faine still to supply the Fathers with men, and giue way aswell to enemies far off, as to contentious Cittizens at home. The first discordancy among the Fathers, was in them, who supposed, that if the Tribunes were created of the Common people; it should be but vnder bare pretence of agreement. Whereby ensued, that matters were so caried, as (by the request of Camillus) the Fathers permitted Tribunes to be created, who should be in the sted of Consuls; aswell of the Plebeians, as of the Fathers indifferently, not altering any thing from the Consuls. Then were created three Tribunes of the Consuls authority, whom they called Military, & these were ordained by diuers numbers. Somtimes they were twenty; otherwhiles more, and then againe lesse. But the first three of all, were these; A. Sempronius Amacinus, L. Attilius, and C. Cecilius, all Patritians; and the people were contented, because it seemed, that their owne desires were obtained. At that time also, some came from the Consulship, to be Military Tribunes, yet of Consull-power: as when M. Genutius and P. Horatius left their Consuls Office. And next to this Magistracy, was that (the name wherof is not exprest) wherein they were in like authority as the Consuls had; chaun-

30. Many yeares were past in multiplicity of warres, and among ciuill diffentions at home; al which time, the people of Rome were not burdened with Tributes, paiments, taxation. or the Lustru; which was the Collection of Toll or custome euery fifth yeare; and purging the City by Sacrifices, according to the ancient manner. For this waighty burden was not laid on the Consuls, who vnderwent the many important occasions of warre: but was recorded by the Senatours; who thought fit to create a Magistrate for matters of waight; and yet not appertaining to the Consuls place, to which Magistrate should be giuen the charge of the Notaries, of the Prisons, of the Bookes, of the Tables, of the Lawes, and of the Taxations.

Hereupon, and on better consideration, they created two Censors, Papyrius and Sempronius; and in regard of the Tribute-collections, they were termed Censors: M. Geganius Macerinus, & T. Quintius Capitolinus being then Consuls. It was also ordained, that this Office or Magistracy should continue for five yeares. But this long limitation was afterwaerd altered, in regarde of the Censors insolence; and reduced to one man only, named Mamertius Emilus, Dictator, in the Consullship of Iulius Virgilius, and M. Appius. It is wonderfull to consider, how much this preheminence increased in power, being raised out of so weak an Original. It grew to such height, as (in this authority only) consisted the Customes, the Roman Discipline, the Senate, the gouerning of the Canalety, the Iurisdiction of priuate occasions, and the taxing of the publick places and people in Rome: Alledging in the Senate, electing the Princes of the Senat, gathering the Subsidies, celebrating the five yeares Sacrifices, adding good men to the Senate, and commaunding such thence, as were thought vnworthy in his iudgement.

I finde, that Caius Fabricius, beeing made Censor, he remooued P. Cornelius Ruffinus, a Patritian, from the Senat, because he had spent at one dinner at his table, ten pound in mony. Marcus Cato also did put from the Senate, the Brother of C. Flaminius, because (beeing entreated thereto by a Strumpet) he commanded a prisoners head to be cut off, he being (at that time) Vice-Consull in Gallia. What shall I say of the consuetudes of the Censors, in their aduertisements about all other occasions? Such as were corpulent and well-fed Souldiers, from them they would take both Horse and Armour, to the end they might the better breath themselves. And if any delighted in sweet smells, or curious apparrell, they accounted it in them as a note of infamy, and therefore remoued them from the army.

A Roman Cavaliero (costly and delicate in Garments, but riding on a Leane and meager Iade, so thinne and ouer-starued; that his bones might easily be counted thorough his hide) chanced to meete the Censors vpon the way. They demanded of him, how he came so neatly polished in attire, his countenance ruddy, and of so good complexion, and yet his horse sp euill-fauoured and vn-sightly? Where-to he answered; I my selfe haue care of my Cloaths and diet, but my seruant only looketh to my Horse. The Censors well regarding both him and his answer, without any shew of humanity or reuerence; did leaue him to his own vanity, worthily condemned of notorious infamy.

They obserued likewise another man, who was a Citizen, that vsed to yawne or gape very much; especially in those places, where they sat and gaue audience to serious affaires, and he did it with a very irkesome and vnseemly noise: but when they vnderstoode; that want of modesty was not the cause; but meere weaknesse and infirmity; they cancelled him out of their note of Taxation, requiring onely his absence from such place and occasions.

When the Censors went into such places where Weddings wer celebrated, and (according to their custome) demanded of the young men, if they tooke their Wiues with their owne free liking and full contentment, or no: If they made answer, that they accepted the marriage, because their Parents so commaunded; their company was thence-forward despised, and themselves set downe in the Kalender of infamy. Because they held opinion; that it was much vnfitting for the Maiesty they presented, in open sight of their Censoriall severity, that an vnmanly, foolish, or ridiculous answer should be made to them. ters might be spoken of; but concerning this argument, these may be sufficient. Only I may not omit, that they helde it somewhat religiously, when one of the two Censors died, the other was sufficient to serue, both in his owne place, and for him that was dead. I know not how this fauor was admitted, but this I am sure of, that it was (not long after) appointed: that the one Censor dying, the other should re-
 10 nounce his Office, and two other men be newly created.

The cause of this obseruation was thus. In those parts where the Gauls surprized the City, one of the Censors being dead, the other was substituted in his stedde, which seemed to the Romains to be a sign of an euil Augury; whereupon, it was set downe as a perpetuall Law, that such succession should neuer more be admitted. It was then vnlawfull to create any Cen-
 20 sors, but onely of the Fathers: yet this grew (euen as all things else) to an alteration; and then the election fell to be indifferent. The Censors also had authority, that they should limit the taking of V-fury.

31 The Arcni, and the Ardeati, hauing had many and continuall fights together on their Confines, waxing at the length weary of warre (in regard of great slaughters and ruins made on both sides) committed their cause of contention to the Roman people, and made them Iudges of eithers quarrell. Ambassadors being sent from each City to intreat this fauour, a Counsel was called, & (from the Magistrates) the case was referred to the people, whereon there grew verie grieuous contention. For three men being chosen to vnder-goe the charge of the whole businesse; P. Scaptius, a Plebeian, aged in yeares, rose vp and said: Consuls, if it be lawfull to talke concerning the Common-wealth; I cannot endure, neither wil I, that the people should erre in this matter. But the Consules laughing (as at a man that doted) would no further heare him. Hee grieuing, and much displeased, that such a publicke cause should be betrayed and smothered; was (by commaund) re-
 40 moued thence by one of the Lictors. He appealed from them to the Tribunes; and being brought before them, he began in this manner: I want not one day of ninetie three yeares old, and I do very well remember, that those Fieldes for which these two people contend thus together; belonged neither to the one or other, but to Coriolanus, for I (at that time) was a warre-fellow with him. Coriolanus taking these fieldes by fortune of the warre, they fell (by that meanes) to the people of Rome. In which regard (methinks) plain truth should perswade the people, not to deceine themselves in a case so apparant.

The grauity and authority of the man, moued not so much, as the vse and commodity of the fieldes, and so highly preuailed the power of the Tribunes, that this cause appearing in this forme to the people; a Law was forthwith made, whereby the Fieldes were interestted to the people of Rome. This act greatly blemished the Maiesty and reputation of the Romaine Common-wealth; and the Romains were much blamed and reprovied of their neighboring people, and of the Citties confining with them. The Fathers hadde no great liking of the matter, and not long after, a case of high iudgement hapning vnto the Ardeati, against the Volscians in their aide, beeing earnestly desirous also to cancel such an infamous sentence, they grew to this deliberation. In regarde that the City of Ardea (by ciuill warre) was 30 reduced into the hand of a few, and consisted but of a few inhabitants, they must be written for a Colony, or sent (for present helpe) against the Volscians. This conclusion being told to the people, & pleasing them (much better) to be written downe Rutilians, then Romanes: the Ardeati were iudged to be the chiefe, because their fieldes (at the first) had bin gotten by so infamous a iudgement. Then were three men elected to conduct these Colonies, to wit; Agrippa Menenius, T. Cincilius Succulus, and M. Ebutius Flauius. I denie not, but that this Office or authority might consist of greater personnes, because it had so high and notable a beginning: It appertained to this place, to deuide the field to new Colonies, to designe the City, and appoint conuenient places for buildinges, to distinguish it also into wards & streets; ordaining & composing the Common-weale; in forme of an excellent, especiall, and well ordered Tabernacle.

ted of the Plebeians, they referred onely this open way to the Consulship, and afforded the people, that they might create one only Magistrate of the Fathers, and cause him to be called an appointed Prætor; whereof a reason being rendered to them of the land, they termed him Urbanus, of U. bs, which was the City. Afterward, such was the Authority of this Magistrate, that in euery priuat and publick iurisdiction, hee had the power to erect new Lawes, and to take away the olde. Last of all, his prerogatiue so largely extended, that whatsoeuer the Prætor commanded, in honour of him, was called an honourable Law. All the regall Ensignes were graunted to the Prætor, and almost all the Consuls adornments; but yet, no more then sixe Lictors, and the seat called Curulis, with euery other thing to them appertaining.

Now, albeit the Prætors vsed but sixe Lictors, yet I finde in Plutarch, that Paulus Æmilius, Prætor, going into Hiberia, had twelue Lictors afforded him. The Prætors rode on White Horses, wearing likewise white Garments, and the Roman Footmen going by their Stirrops, were all apparrelled in white also, as Iuuenall affirmeth.

At length, an infinite number of strangers comming to Rome from all partes; and one Prætor seeming not to be sufficient for the multitude of businesse daily insuing, another Prætor was created, who was called the Pilgrim, because he heard the causes of Pilgrims and Strangers. But the Monarchy greatly increasing, the number of them likewise so enlarged, that sometimes there were eighteene Prætors, for the dispatch of occasions. And because it was thought inconuenient that Magistrates themselues should be seene publickly in the Night time, five men were appointed, who dwelt on each side the Riuer of Tiber, to execute the Office to such Magistrates belonging. But after the surprizall of Sardignia, Scicilia, Spaine, and the Narbone Prouince, there were so manie Prætors created, as Prouinces had beene taken, to the end, that some might attend the affaires of the City; and others also, apply the Prouinces businesse. Within a while after, Cornelius Sylla, added publicke tortures for Forgers of Writings, Parricides, and impoysoners, and added foure Prætors also. Caius Iulius Caesar, appointed two Prætors, and two Ædiles, who were to haue charge for the prouision of Corne, and (of Ceres) they were called Cereali; so that then there were twelue Prætors, and six Ædiles. Afterwardes, D. Augustus made vp the number of sixteen Prætors; and Claudius sought to haue added two more; but Tiberius placed one, and D. Nerua another, to render a faithful reason of the trust committed to them concerning the Treasuries priuat & publicke. And thus the number of eighteene Prætors was completed for gouernment in the City. All these things also they obserued, when they (as Magistrates) were in Rome: but when they went forth on anie voyage, there remained but one only for the businesse, and he was then called the Præfect of the City, which Præfect they before ordained.

Another Præfect was afterward induced, termed of the Latines Ferie, who was created yearely, the other Magistrates being absent, for they then being superintendents of the warres, vsed to permit others into their iurisdctions, except the Præfect of the Land, who continued in the City onely.

33 Thorough the disastrous Fortunes of warre, vsury being buried, as it were, and the Roman people quite vndon, by great summes of debts, the Princes of the people likewise many times attempting to remedy such an vsupportable difficulty: at length, all their minds inclined to concorde, and they (who were then Consuls) concurring heerein, referred the paiment of their debts, to publicke care.

There were therefore elected five men, who by their dispensing and dealing with Monies, were termed Mensarii, Bankers, or Mony-changers. The notable Equitie, and great diligence vsed by them, deserued worthily, that their names should be honoured in all their Annalles. The men were these, C. Duellius, F. Decimus, M. Papyrius, Quintus Pompilius, and T. Æmilius, who dealing in so waightie and important matters, supplied (euermore) both the one and others part, with much modesty, and little iniury. And such was their care and hourelly respect, as not onely they auoided offence to any person, but likewise could no way be complained on, which was wonderful in discharging such a multiplicity of debts.

34. Julius Caesar; being slain in the Senate house by them that accompanied Cassius and Brutus; and it appearing, that Anthony (by all his endeauour) sought to sway the whole State, and becom Prince of the City: proceeding on in his ambitious thirst of rule, hee trod downe Cicero, Brutus, & all the rest of that faction, that were contrary to him, & compelled them to forsake Rome. But Octavianus (who had bin set downe as heire in Caesars will) being returned from Asia: Cicero, and all other of that faction, ran to ioyne with his power. Whereon ensued, that Anthony being constrained to leaue Rome, was adjudged by the Senat as an enemy, and (for his vtter ouerthrow) Hircius and Pansa (being Consuls, were sent forth, as also Aulus with his followers, who neere to Modena put him to flight. Anthony being thē in a very desperat condition in most humble maner made his recourse to Lepidus. Being then wel backt by his countenance and power, they inforced Octavianus, who aspired to the dignity, to make a league with them: by which combination, many murders were concluded, & multitude of great persons proscribed to death: Among whom, Caesar granted Cicero to M. Anthony, by L. Caesar, Vnkle to the said M. Anthony. These men (vnder pretext of pious Magistrates) exercisid that bloody tyranny, which was called the Triumvirat, or office of three men, for gouernment of the commonwealth. But in thort while, their intention was apparantly discovered, hauing brought al occasions (both diuine & humaine) into a hurly burly: for hauing consumed both their own & others treasures, with all their vttermoſt abilities; at length, Caesar got the vpper hand, and being alone in authority, vpheld the Triumvirat for some ten yeares, as we may read in Suctonius Tranquillus.

35 Such as wer the Tribunes of the light horse for the King, or the Maister of the horse for the Dictator; euen such (about Caesar) were the Præfecti Prætorij. They, with Caesar held the second place, and (as Lieutenants) corrected publick disciplin. In such sort increased their authority (hating at first but a simple beginning) that for a certain time, it was lawfull to appeal from the Præfectus Prætorius; but yet the order how the appeale ought to be done, was by censure of the Prince, in granting the appeale from so great a Magistat. For the Prince held opinion, that such men as attained to this dignity, by their discrete and singular indultry (carying due respect of his supream power) should giue iudgment as if it had bin pronounced by himself. This authority had another priuiledg, that such of yongest yeares, being sentenced by the Præfect, could haue no excuse or defence from all the other Magistrats:

36 I find, that there was another kinde of Magistracy, for hearing of matters in the City of Rome. For the burden of war-busineses being remoud from the other Magistrats to the Prætor only: there were ten men created for hearing of matters, holding the places of Prætors, al the while that the other remained abroad, and they were called Magistrats or Iudges of contentions. It is said also, that at the same time, foure other men were elected, who had the charge (as Surueyers) of the highwaies. And three other beside, for care of gold & siluer, atending on the coinage of the Monies, and matters in the Mints.

37 The famous Augustus, reputing that publick welfare and safety appertained to no one person more then to himselfe, ordained seuen troops or squadrons of men in the most needfull places of the City, to the end, that (with all expedition) they might quench fires, or any harms that by fire should happen. And it was ordered, that euery two Regions or Wards of the City, might commodiously be defended by one squadron onely; the Tribunes being chiefe of the troops, and yet aboue al, the Præfect of the Guard or Watch. And albeit (amongst the ancient Romanes) this charge was committed to three Officers for the night, vnto the Ædiles, and to the Tribunes: yet notwithstanding, there hapning (in one day) more mishaps by Fire, then they (appointed for that purpose) could haue care of, as necessity required; Caesar Augustus thought it very expedient, that a Præfect of the Watch or Guard should be created. All occasions then concerning fires, thefts, and rapes, were dealt withall before the Præfect; except eyther the delinquents personnes were so stubborn, or the facts so famous, that they required reference to the Citties Præfect.

And because (many times) fires hapned by default in the Inhabitants, they were therefore punnished with whipping, because they were so negligent of their fire, or else reprooued with seuerer admonitions;

ons, if they escaped whipping. If any breach or decay appeared in such part of the house, where the Father of the family kept his thinges of most respect, eyther for householde seruice, or benefit of the wars abroad: the case was discussed and sentenced before this Magistrate. For so wrote D. Augustus, to Erichius his beloued Praefect, saying; If Garners or Granaries be rotten or wasted, it pertaineth to thy care to see them amended. Moreouer, it belonged to the Praefect of the watch or Guard; to haue his officers watch the greater part of the night; and being armed, and lighted Lanthornes caried with them; to walke all about the streets of the City, remēbring the people in their houses, to bee carefull of their Candles and fires. They commanded likewise, that euery one should haue water ready in their houses; that if any such casualty hapned, it might the quicklier be remedied.

38 We had like to haue omitted two Officers (whose charge was to order, settle, and place the Armies) thinking their imployment not to bee of any great importance; but seeing Linus hath recorded them, we may not silently slip them. In the yeare when Appius Claudius (who afterward was sur-named blind) was Censor, M. Valerius, and Publius Decius being Consuls, two offices then began by the peoples gift (as T. Linus saith) both of them appertaining to the Commonweal. One, which (by the Tribunes of the Souldiors) was created in the 4. Legions; and being a little before left, fell as a benefite to the Dictator & Consuls. These places by the Tribune of the people, was giuen to Attilius, and C. Martius. The other, was an ordination of two men by the same people, to restore, order, and settle the Armies by sea, & referd to the deliberation of M. Decius Tribune of the people. Not long after these publick fauors, 3. men were selected forth for night occasions; to whom (as I gather by some obseruations) in the difficult times of war and ciuil dissentions, the charge of the wals was committed in trust, and a Guard for ouer-seeing the soldiers. It was also referd to their fidelity, to preuent all tumults in the night; all idle walking and talking, and that the City might be in absolut quiet. Finally, the feveral duties of such a Magistrate, were granted to the Praefect, termed de Concordia. The very names of these Magistrats, did declare their offices; and Linus, the Authour of these matters, speaketh of the no further, nor find I other mention made of them. 39 It remaineth now in this last place, to speak somewhat of Cesars aduocats or Attornies, who was Judge between Cesar & the people of Rome; albeit custome induced, that soueraign greatnes (from whom proceeded the lawes, decrees of the whol Senat, and of the Magistrats) should not be subiected to law, whereof himself was head and president. And because it exceeded possibility to find a greater person than the Emperor, that might in his priuat cases, and other mens actions, yeild a direct proceeding, without the Prince himself; to sit as Judge in his own proper cause: it was therefore determined, that a Magistrate should be created, who (betweene Cesar, and a priuate person) might sit in iudgment, and to be called Cesars Procurator or Attorny. To this Magistrate was granted license, that whatsoeuer hee dealt in of the Imperiall affaires, was as firmly ratified, as if it had bin done by Cesar himself. But if the Attorny alienated any thing belonging to the Emp. as if it wer properly his own, it was not therefore to be iudged, that the Emp himself had made such an alienation; but it was firmly aliened; when *Cesar*s consent gaue testimony thereof. If he bought or sold, dealt in Donations or bargains, they were not good; because his charge was not to estrange any thing of the Emperours, but to execute Cesars busines diligently. Principally, he was to be carefull, that if a seruant of Cesars was ordinary here in any Will; hee should command his succession in that inheritance, & boldly do it in Cesars name; because such matters as a slaue attained to was by the means of his maister. But if he were Cesars heire, and the Attorny made mixture of a richer inheritance then his right; he was then no heire of the Emperours. But if the goods fell to Cesar, which could not easily bee found: the Attorny ought to preuent the Emp losse, by diligent inquisition of the will, and due examination of euer party. Thus haue we sufficiently discourfed of Cesars Procurator, and al the other Roman Magistrats, from the beginning, to the time of noble Cesar Augustus. The name of President was general, because the Vice-Consuls, Legates of Cesar, and al the Rectors; gouerning Provinces (as the Senators) were called Presidents.

CHAP. II.

Of Rome in her Moderne and later estate, since the Pope came to keepe his Court there, with his Cardinals, and other Assistant Officers, &c.

You haue seene Rome in hir Infancy and first original, so farre as we could go by our best observations. We come now to speak of hir, in another kind of nature, since the Apostolicke See grew to be planted ther, and hir government fell into the Popes preheminance. The authority of the pope, he being the chiefe, disperfed it selfe into so many members, that his Courtiers & followers grew into multiplicity of yeares, before they could well vnderstande that forme of government; yet I will bestowe my pains to discouer the same fully, & as briefly as may be. First of all, there is the most holy and Apostolical Senat of Cardinals, whose head is the chiefe Priest, & therefore called Maximus, and the Cardinals are his members: of whom, though in our times there is no definite number; yet I find, that in elder times there were but twelue, after the example of the Apostles. These honorable Fathers vsed formerly, to come altogether (twice in the week) to visit the Pope: but in later daies, important affaires & busines being scant, they meet once together only; & this meeting is vulgarly termed in the Consistory, of the word Consistere, which is as much to say, as being together: because on the day of their assembly, they stande firmly together, for publick negotiations. In this Senat are appointed and ordained such as are elected to Bishoppricks, Archbysshoppricks, to Metropolitane and Patriarchall churches; when such places are vacant; the election of which men, belongeth to the Chapter, City, Prouince, king, or some other person: or otherwise they are elected by the Pope, and this his Sacred Senate, to whom (by a referued Custome of al the Popes) this office properly is said to appertaine. Which referuation, was woont also to extend to certaine Monasteries, which wer found to be taxed in the bookes of the Chamber, and in this sacred Senate were either to be granted, or recommended to apt & sufficient persons; and therefore those Monasteries were cald Consistoriall, because no other disposition was made of them; but by meanes of the Consistory. In this place, they discoursed on all matters which appertained to Diuine Reuerence, Faith, Religion, and peace of the Christian flocke, also for preservation of temporal patrimonies giue to the church of Rome. In this Senat (as being the greatest in al the world) al Prouinces, all Iurisdiccions, and all Kings were saide to haue their defensiue Fathers; whom they tearmed Protectors: whose charge then was, to propound the election, and other occasions of their Prouinces in the sacred Senat. He that propoundeth the case, ought to hear (in the election) al contradictions if any hapned, and to seeke out of many, for the fittest person to bee elected, or to take order for the Church vacant, with al things necessary to the said Church, performing the same by way of testimonie. Which inquisition or search, was vulgarly called, proceeding by Proccesse; where in all things were orderly set downe; and recited at large by the propounder, he hauing first made his purposed preamble to the sacred Senat. Then was he to vnderstand the Senats answer, which (acording to order) was subscribed, and sealed; and vnder-written, the Apostolicall answer. This answer, by such as gaue attendance for it, was presented to the Vice-chancellor, who framed another Schedule in his name; whereby he faithfully signified to the Officials in all places, that had charge of expedition; what belonged to them to see immediately performed. The relation thus obtained, the Suppliants required and procured to haue a Breaffe, conformable to the Relation; to wit, That it might first be done among the Abbreviators, next indited in true forme among the Clarke; and being written, to passe through all the other Offices; then to the Chancery; next, vnto the Apostolicall Chamber, and (sometimes) to be extraordinarily fauoured by the Secretary; of all which Offices we will speake in their due places. Being dispatcht, it hadde the Scale of Lead; and this last expedition, was to be done by the Officials.

to the Pope, as being perswaded, that he had the selfesame blessings & graces conferred on him, as our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ bestowed on S. Peter; to wit; to loose & bind in earth, whatsoever seemed to his best liking. This prerogative of loosing and vnbinding, reserved by the Pope to himselfe; was granted by him to one of the Cardinals; whom we use to call the chiefe Penitentiary; & he, for so much heereof as appertained to him, consonant with the Law Diuine, and his owne saluation; did exercise this authority (committed to him by the Pope) by diuers Vicars and Substitutes, commonly called Penitentiaries, who were diuided into all the chiefe Churches in Rome; as S. Peters in Vaticanus, S. John Lateranus, S. Maria Maiore, &c. But the dispensation to be made in obseruation of human lawes, was not granted, except vpon some cause, and by himselfe, and by generall commission of the Pope. To heare first the suppliants in such cases; and after their demand were known, to see if there were cause, wherby the desirer deserued to be herd, & whether the case thus required, were wont to be granted to the Pope, or no. Then hee writes it vnder Apostolicall power, and of his Office, and not by the Popes mouth; but by the generall commission affirmed in his letter, and his Commission (authorized to write so) from the Popes mouth; and credit heerein is giuen to his assertion, as a matter belonging to his office. In supplications directed to the Pope, the rescription was in one of these kinds; Fiat in forma, Fiat de speciali, Fiat de expresse; by which variety of answer back, is declared to the Maister of the Taxations, the importancy of his request. And he, according as the Penitentiary hath varried in his forme, so doth he direct the other Officers, in taxation of payment. But now a dayes, the multitude of Lawes haue so increased, both of the Popes, the Counsels, and of Monasteries, that men (being formerly bound to a certaine rate) do desire againe their auncient liberty, and are the more humble seruants to the Penitentiary. But he, after he hath signed the suppliants request vnder his hande, the Bull is likewise dispatched vnder his name and seale. And because somtimes it is not precisely written yet cleare enough, what assertion of the supplicant is referred to his Iudge: the cause being so knowne, the act is absolued, and he restored to his Office againe. This sacred Office of the Penitentiary, hath (for the more commodious ease of such as come for expedition) 24. Defenders of the suppliants causes, who are termed Procurators of the holy Penitentiary. These men, as Aduocates, do declare the extendure of the parties request, and plead the case (as it were) to the Penitentiary; from whom they procure to obtain the matter demanded; and to make expedition of the Bull. They used also, to set downe the whole proceedings in Iustice, with all the Allegations, Pro & Con, on either side, in true and faithfull manner. To this Office, belonged dispensations for marriages, in degrees prohibited by humain Lawes, Legittimation of Children, Dispensation for defect in members of such as had taken orders; or were beneficed. Moreouer, for incompatibilitie of many Benefices, Absolution for Homicides in foro de conscientia, and for clarkes in both kinds, with retention of Benefices, or dispensation to some other benefice. The like for Simony, or for banishment, for an oath taken voluntarily, for a false Oath, for communication of Vowes, and Licence for obseruation of any humain Law, especially to Regulars, of what Chapter soeuer they were; with Indulgences for place and person. Beside infinite Commissions, in forma Iuris, in declaring a Nullitie or Validitie of Matrimony, which they termed Declaratory. And in many other matters, much better knowne to them that are practised in such iudgments, or in the ecclesiastical courts, where they are frequently entercoursed.

3 Continually, suit is made for matters signed by the Pope, in cases that come of his owne voluntary, or out of his liberality; as concession of Benefices, and other gracious fauours, which are likewise generally committed to the chiefe Penitentiary. Beside, there are some things concerning Iustice, about matters Ecclesiasticall, in most parts of the world, and also of the prophaned temporall patrimonies of the Roman Church, deuolued thereto by accounts of ecclesiasticall persons, or by the remission of princes, or by consent of other persons, and giuen to the Court of Rome. The Pope for all these occurrences, & for the speedier dispatch of suites; apointed two audiences, in which Courts both both those matters appertaining to grace, are made suit for; and those that do more properly depend on Iustice; for either of which, there is a Court of Audience, and they are termed by severall names, to wit; The Signature of Grace or favour, and The Signature of Iustice. To each of these Courts of Audience are certaine Lawyers appointed; and to the Signature of grace, do belong all those Cardinals that are Lawiers: for very rarely or sildom are any Prelates thereto appointed, if they be not Lawiers, and they are commonly called Referendaries, ordained both for grace and Iustice, by both the Signatures.

Their charge and employment is answerable to their Offices, to regard what is required by suppliants, as also, to oversee whether the requests made, doe tend to such matters, as vsually were and are to be graunted, which accordingly they insert in the forehead of the supplication, & then signify the same to the Pope: or to the Cardinall appointed to signe it, that the demand may be lawfully granted. But if the suppliant desire any thing, that may be prejudiciall to some other bodye; it is not granted, vntill the other party be first called. If then the case appeare to be important, rarely (in former times) seene to be granted; or else so doubtful, as the Referendary scarcely knowes what to resolve therein: it is then referred to the Court of audience, among other matters of like nature, where the suppliant is sure not to obtaine it, vntill it be agreed on by all belonging to that Signature. Heereupon, and for ease in such serious affaires, the Pope appointed a Cardinall, to attend on both the one & the other Signature, who ordinarily graunteth matters, if they be light; and great matters also, if they were wont to be granted. The vnder scribing De Iure, was vsed by the Pope; but he referred this Office to a Cardinall his Substitute; so that the Pope (very sildom or neuer) vnder-writeth De Iure.

The Referendaries attending on the Signature of grace, doe refuse all supplications, containing matter appertaining to Iustice, because it hath much displeas'd the Pope, that any belonging to the one Signature, should meddle in the others Office, but every man to respect his owne charge. One day in the weeke, is appointed for the Signature, wheron the Referendaries do meet together, & ioyn-

ly consult, whether any matters that haue passed in the Courts of Audience, do require them to bee there present, or not. And heereupon, the (day before that appointed for the Signature) the suters vse to come with their Aduocates, to the Referendaries for either occasions; because sildom (or neuer) any contradiction is disputed on the day, in any cause, be it neuer so vrgent. Vpon the day of hearing, it is the Office of the Referendary, briefly to declare (in the Court) the Suppliants request, which passing the iudgement of the Fathers: he who sitteth as President, graunteth or denieth the suite, according as most or fewest voices do yeilde liking therof. And the Referendaries do obserue it as a Law, that if a request be once denied; they neuer after vrgit any more.

If the Suppliant find himself to be contradicted in his suite, hee cites him that is hinderer, to come before the Referendary appointed for propounding the case, in this maner; Coram Reuerendo, A. let N. be cited to render reason, why the Supplication or Commission ought not to be signed. These citations are made answerable to the quality of the request, for appearance before the Most Holy, or Most Reuerend, because the Signature of grace requireth the presence of his Holmisse; and that of Iustice bescemeth a Reuerend presence; where it is lawfull for euery Referendary, to propound what time is expedient for grant; each mans eldership and dignity beeing duly considered. But at the Signature of grace, if it be broght before the Popes presence; two onely haue their authority to propound, as their antiquity appeareth by the Court Roll. And yet in the time of Paul the third, very sildom the second man had leaue to speak, so that then (by little and little) matters grewe restrained to one propounder only, especially as the businesse increased.

The Pope euermore subscribeth in this maner: PLACET, A. when it is a matter concerning Iustice: but if it appertaine to Grace, the Worde placet is changed, and then hee writeth; FIAT VI PETITVR A. and this Letter A. signifieth the Popes true Name; as Alexander the sixth. But if his name be otherwise; then, as Iulius the third; he writeth I. that is, Ioannes Maria; & so from time to time. If at any time the Pope subscribe, not by any suite or entreaty; but as

and his degree (by soleimne iudgement of all other Officers) is the very chiefest, and before all other belonging to the Court of Rome, both for dignity, authoritic, and benefit. This man, in regard of his proper Office, is President and present at the expedition of all Letters (concerning Ecclesiasticall occasions) that passe through the world, and ordereth the expeditors, who are a great number of them, as Abbreviators de parco maiori (whose Office is, to endite Letters at request of Suppliants; which enditing is tearmed a rough draught, or cōpy of the request) Clarke, Writers, and Abbreviators also De parco minori, whom the Italians doo call Gian-nizzeri, Casters of Leaden Bulles, and Registers or Keepers of Records. All these do attend on the expedition of Letters, in some one or other Negotiation. Next these, there are other Officers, who must be sought after in the time of expediting, for agreement of payments of Annates, first fruits, and such like, attending on no other charge, but receipt of the said Annats, fruits, and like payments, they being Clarke in the Chancery, Groomes of the chamber, and Bankers of Monies.

The order of expedition is in this maner. After that the Suppliant hath gotten his Supplication to bee signed and Registered, he or his Sollicitor for him, dooth procure amongst the Abbreviators, de Parco Maiori, that there may bee a rough Draught or coppie made of his request; which being in due forme enlightened, it is next drawne amongst the Clearkes in forme of a Letter, and Written in the Chancery among the bench of writers. Then it is taxed or valewed by him that is called the Rescribendarie; and vhen he hath taxed it, another Officer, termed the Contatore, or keeper of the Accounts, sets his hand therto, when payment of the taxations is made to the Clearkes. Afterward, another draught of the same is made among the Abbreviators De Parco maiori, where another taxation is paid to the Sollicitor, as the sum of fiue * Iulios, and there one of them likewise subscribeth his name. The Abbreviators de Parco Maiori, hauing receiued their fees, they then send backe the Bull to the Abbreviators, de Parco Maiori; at whose Bench or seat two Officers (thereto deputed) doe subscribe their Names, vnder the Name of the Abbreviatour De Parco Minori.

The order of taxations and payments of Monies in severall offices.

From hence, the Letter is carried to the Sollicitors Office, appointed for those Letters, called Giannizzeri, where payment is made, according to a taxation of so much in the hundred: for, if the taxation be of thirty Ducats, then two Ducats and two Carlines are deducted for the Chancery; but if the tax be vnder thirty, then one Ducat is paid, and two Carlines. From this place, it is afterward carried to another Seat of the Abbreniators de parco minori, where sit the viewers, or ouer-seers, and there the Sollicitor paises a Carline to one of the Abbreniators, who sets his hand to the Letter, a little beneath the subscription of the Clarke Apostolicall. But if the matter therein contained, be such as requireth the Annates payment; then pay is also made to al the Officers in the Chancery ratably: as to the Giannizzeri, or Apostolique Sollicitours, to the Clarkes of the Exchequer, to them of the Chamber, the Groomes and Bankers. The foresaid payments beeing made, the Bull is brought backe with the supplication therein enclosed, to the Abbreniator de parco maiori, that drew the rough draught. He peruseth the Bull, to see if it concord with the Supplication; and if he finde them correspondent; his iudgement passeth so, & then he writes down his name, in signe of approbation, which he testifieth, by casting the Bull, with the Supplication enclosed, from his Seat to the ground, and then the Keeper of the Chancery, or his seruant for him, taketh it vp from the ground, and looketh aduisedly; whether it be subscribed by all the Officers, according as the cause requireth; and if the date doe agree with the supplications grant of date; which doone, he sends it to the Regent of the Chancery. His authority is, to see by whom it hath been iudged and allowed, which if hee finde conformable to his liking, he sends it to one of the Abbreniators; to the end it may once more bee over-viewed; and then deuiding the supplication from the Bull, hee layes it aside where it ought to be kept. If the Bull doe containe grace and fauour, then is it againe subscribed by his hand, and on the right side hee maketh a great text Letter A. and on the left, an I. drawne very large and long. This being done, it is laid on a certaine Desk, and all the Officers of the Chancery being finished, the Officer of Lead cometh, and receiueth it from the Regents hand; he carrieth it to his leaden office, where hee fastens a Bull of Lead to it, with a silken little cord. Then the Keeper of the Chancery, perceiuing it to be returned to the Regent; he requireth it at his hand, that it may bee deliuered to the Suppliant, he hauing first paid a Iulio to each Man: then passing on by the Giannizzeri, there it receiueth finall expedition.

5 This Audience became so tearmed; on this occasion. There was a domesticke Audience of the Pope, where he himselfe both heard and discoursed on many matters: Whereupon, for speedier expedition, sixe Domesticke Prelates were made choise of, who were then called Clarkes of the Chamber, as men elected to be of the Popes Chamber; because Cheros (in Greeke) is as much to say, as elected by lot, by which example they were tearmed Clarkes, they being all elected for diuine seruice. These Men were Domesticall Councellours to the Pope, with whom the Pope vsed to discourse on all things that belonged to him; and deuided from the sacred Senate; as gouerning of the Cittie, the whole Temporal Estate, and the accounts of the Exchequer. Heere the Pope elected Magistrates, and there (to this day) an oath is receiued by them of the Chamber, for faithfull behauiour in their Offices. Heere, the contracts and bargaines are handled, of such matters (on the Popes behalfe) as concerne publique dealing by his disposition. Heere, expedition is vsed in Letters of Benifices, euen as well as in the Chancery; when Suppliants make choise of this way, for quicker speede, or in regard of the businesse; or because such matter belongeth not to the Chancery; but requireth the expresse command of the Pope. Heere, Malefactors are sentenced for punishment; be they Ecclesiastical or Temporal, according to the persons qualitie, or manner of the offence. Heere, the causes are heard, concerning Toules and Heere finally, concurrence is made, by way of appellation, or otherwise, for all such as are molested, in behalfe of the vniuersall Temporall State of the Church; as by a supream and proper Audience of the Pope. But Romaine busineses ouer-abounding, both in Negotiations and other causes: the Pope (easing himselfe by little and litle from this burden) commeth now very sildome into this Audience; except it bee on important affaires, concerning eyther the Treasury, or slow expedition of his Bulls. He vseth likewise (now a-daies) separatelie to expedite some of the fore-named matters by himselfe, without the chamber Audience; as election of Magistrates, and other causes most importing, which he thinkes fit to dispatch alone: in execution whereof, he calleth to him such as are his Familiars, who also are tearmed Household Secretaries.

6 The Chamberlaine vseth, on behalfe of all the rest, and sometimes euen of himselfe, to write De Iure to the Iudges, as of all profane matters appertaining to Magistrates, of the Temporall Estate of the holy Romaine Church. And abroad also, for paiment of tenths, of Fruits, of Benefices, of spoiles, of dead Clearkes, and of other causes belonging to the Apostolique Chamber. He writeth alwaies, as by Commission, from the Popes owne mouth, and is credited, as occasions really appertaining to his Office; the forme of his writing beeing tearmed, Letters from the Chamber. The expedition of these Letters are in two kindes; the one, close signed and sealed; the other open, and deliuered vnder the Chamberlaines Seale.

7 Next to the Chamberlaine, the Treasurer is the cheefest, in regard of his office: and he is called Treasurer, because hee is put in trust with all the Monies, that are brought into the Apostolique Chamber, where his charge is to receiue it, keepe it, and lay out for expences, as occasion requireth. For some certaine yeares, not long since, they vsed to bring the Money to some worthy Marchant, who (by Commission from the Treasurer) receiued it, and paid it forth again as his Cashiere, being tearmed the Depositarie. Whereby the Treasurer hauing the lesse encombrance, vsed to passe diuers things vnder his hand, which (in their owne nature) appertained to other Officers. Especially in those occasions, that (else) were dealt withall by the Commissarie; as payments, bargaines, of buying and selling, Fruits and Rentes, and demises graunted from the Chamber; yea, almost in all other matters, only through weakenesse and simplicity in some, that scarcely knew how to manage their offices.

8 Next to the Auditour of the Chamber, who is appointed for spirituall causes; the Gouvernor hath his place, and he pnunisheth Offendours with the temporall Sword: for, being the main power of the secular Arme, he decideth causes of strifes, compacts, assurances, breach of peace, quarrels of vassals against their Lordes, although they extend forty miles about Rome. He heareth and defineth causes of Hire or wages, without any iudgement Seat, summarily, without Writing, according to the forme of the Romaine Statutes, and common reason; when there is no particular Statute to the contrary. In all the recited occasions, he euermore preceedeth the Senatour; because the first recourse is made to him: but if all the parties be present at an instant, then the case is referred to the Senatour. And yet the Gouvernour cannot excommunicate, or threaten any Ecclesiasticall censure; because it belongeth to the peculiar charge of the Auditour of the Chamber. Finally, this man (as Vice-Chamberlaine) is appointed to all the Law-busineses, and offices in the cittie, & by reason of his precedency, attendeth for the peace of the Cittie, and Court of Rome, being assisted by all other Officers of the Cittie, and of the Court, in matters appertaining to the peace and quiet both of Court and Cittie; which is much furthered by his help and fauor. But if you read the Chapter of Sixtus Quartus, and the Bull of Iulius Secundus; there you shall more amply bee satisfied in the Gouvernours authority.

The President of the Apostolique Chamber.

9 After the Gouvernour, followeth another Officer, whom we call President of the Apostolicall Chamber; whose charge is, to attend the affaires of the Treasury, and receiue the accounts of euery person, that is admitted entrance into the Apolique Chamber, eyther from the Citty, or the Provinces. And there they sit as Censors, and confer in the Chamber Audience.

The aduocate for the poore, and priuate persons.

10 Because (in former times) some matters happened, betweene the Exchequer and priuate persons, in the Chamber Audience: it was concluded, that priuate persons should haue an Aduocate in this Audience, at publique charge, there to defend priuate causes, but especially the poore, in this Audience, against the Aduocates belonging to the Exchequer, or the Atturney generall.

The Exchequer Aduocate.

11 Then followeth another Aduocate, who maintaineth the Exchequer causes, not onely in this Audience; but likewise abroad, among the Iudges of the Romaine Courts; where he answereth by an Oath, for the Exchequer affaires, and he is one of the Concistorial Order.

The Atturney of the Exchequer.

12 Next to this Aduocate, the Procuratour or Atturney of the Exchequer hath his place in this Audience: and he discourseth, oppugneth and defendeth the Exchequer businesse, in this chamber of Audience, and among the other Iudges of the Romaine Courts. Exchequer causes are such, as concerne liberty, or publique Monies. This Office is very conuenable, to bridle euill Customs, and to preferue peace and quietnesse in any Christian Commonweale. In the Court of Rome it is of no meane power and authority, importing also very much, that both Princes and priuate persons should respect it, and to aduance a man of good learning and practise thereto. This Man sits as an assistant for the Exchequer, in the Chamber Audience, among the Fathers and other Iudges. Out of this Audience, he is acquainted with secret causes, hearing and ordering them after his owne will; giuing his voyce in all thinges, or councill at least, although he be no Iudge himselfe. He is allowed also to come into the publique Concistorie, and by his publique Office, may require and plead, as well as any of the Protonotaries, to haue a publique Instrument made by any of them, in perpetuall memory of thinges publique done, and to continue in the Commonwealt for publique Testimony thereof: as, of obedience yelded to the Pope by any Prince, or in matters doone of the like Nature.

13 Next to the Exchequer Atturney, sitteth the Commissary of the Apostolique Chamber, who handleth, dealeth, and executeth the Negotiations of the Chamber, that tend not to cases of Iudgement. He is appointed for Exactions; Toules, looking to the Mint and Corne, beside other businesse belonging to the Chamber; and this charge (of his owne Nature) was wont to be no way vulgar. Yet in our times, it hath been much debased: because the Gouvernour, the Treasurer, the President; and the Exchequer Atturney, haue vsed the same authority belonging to the Commissary.

14 Last of all the rest, a place is allowed in the Apostolicall Chamber, for him that defendeth the arguing, and entrances assigned to the Cardinals, and for what matter soeuer is to be discoursed on there, appertaining to the Cardinals: And he is called Clarke of the Cardinals Colledge, resident alwaies in the Apostolique Chamber.

15 Seeing we haue spoken sufficiently of the Members of this Chamber; let vs not omit to say somewhat concerning the maine Body. This Audience was wont to meete together three times each week, and in the same place, called the Apostolique chamber; where they discoursed on publique affaires, as already we haue declared, and heard what causes came before them there; as also committed abroad; and partly referred to other Ministers, as we haue else-where more at large dilated; to wit, vnfit expedition of Bulles by the Chamber; or controuersies among publique Magistrates, or Toules, and other publique entrances, for matters Ecclesiasticall in all partes of the World, and Temporall businesse also, concerning the Temporall estate of the Church, among the Offices in the Romaine Court, to whom assignement was made by the greater part, or among mong the Toule-gatherers, Receiuers, Collectours; or concerning them with persons priuate or vniuersall; or betweene those priuate vniuersalities; or finally, about any businesse of the fore-named Treasury. Beside these matters, heere were determined all causes of Merchandizes, which were brought from Sea by the Riuer of Tiber to Rome, or from the Mountaines, being termed Water-side occasions. For this businesse, two Iudges, Vicars, were appointed, attending at the Water side continually; one of them, being President for Sea-Merchandizes; comming farre off on the Riuer, and from beneath the City. He alwaies is called Chamberlaine of the Bancke, and this Office euer belongeth to a Cittizen borne of Rome: whose election and gouernment (euen of all the rest of the Audience abroad) was aunciently committed to the Romaine people, whom the frequent vse of Merchandize most imported. The other was appointed for Merchandizes which were landed on the Water side, and comming from those parts beyond the Mountaines; and he, as by a different name (from the other) was called the Banker.

Now, if any Offender (in these matters) would appeale to the Chamber, or be heard by these men, for his most commodious and speediest expedition: he commiteth his cause to one of the Fathers aside by himselfe, and heereupon grew their severall Names, of President and Banker. This charge hath bin sometimes giuen (euen for euer, as it were) to one Man alone, he being the ancientest Deane: but now a-daies it commeth to men by Order of Court-rolle, and all the actions done by them, are written in the publike Bookes, called Apostolicall. Which Bookes are kept in a publike place, and in the Chancery, whereto the Notaries may goe at their owne pleasure. And they are keepers of that place, and there they Register the Apostolike Letters, which are expediated from the Chamber, by the other Bookes of the Chancery, and were for this intent purposely ordained.

16 The number of Iudges in the Romaine Court, being very great, and many Offendours in the Prisons, who were to be heard each man by himselfe: it often hapned, that by want of Iudges, who were otherwise inployed, and (many times) very seriously; that matters were longer delayed, then the quality of the cause required, and to great annoyance of the Prisons. Heereupon they tooke another course, that the Fathers, as supream Iudges, and Vicegerents to their Prince; piouly vsed to visite the Prisons sundry times in the yeare; to wit, euery month each Prison. And yet, not all they that had place in the Audience Chamber, did meete together for this visitation; but hee that was Vicegerent to the Chamberlaine, and (well-neere euer) one of the seauen Fathers, Clearkes, and with them, all the other Ministers of the Chamber formerly named, except the Treasurer and the President. All these, on the day appointed, went to sit in a publike place of the City (for some space of time) neere to the Prison; where calling the Prisoners before them by forme of order, they might be heard, if themselves were so pleased. The Fathers hearing the guilty, and vnderstanding the merit of their causes, by graue discretion of Iudges, invred to such matters: by power of their office, according to the condition of the cause, the time endured of imprisonment, and nature of the offence; doe eyther determine on deliuerance, or longer debarment of liberty; or otherwise on expedition, eyther for death, or other kind of punishment, which (by meanes of the Fathers) is tempered with pittie and mittigation, in this manner. If any man, for a case of ciuill debt, shall be long time detayned in Prison, and hath had testimonie (in the Audience) of his pouerty: the Fathers vse to speake for his release, comforting the Creditor (according to his facultie) that the poore man may haue some further dilation, to make payment after such a rate, & with some security; sometimes vnder punishment in the Gallies, and losse of goods, if no security can be giuen.

Sometimes, when the parties pouerty is plainly apparant, and he (dispayring of all meanes of payment) will rather voluntarily yeelde his goods: the Fathers do (of themselves) admit the debtor to the benefit of simple cession of his goods, goods, and Faith being made, for demonstration of the goods; the partie is forth-with deliuered. From hence ensues it, that Creditors, at the instance of any imprisoned Debter; is vigilant, and euermore present at these visitations, and labour (by all their utmost endeavour) for the poor mans deliuerance. This Office of the Fathers is very pious and pittifull, and with them are ioined some others (at liberty out of the Audience Chamber) by the Popes will and appointment; especially the Vicare in the Cittie; and in the Popes Diocesse.

17 With the two Keepers of the Prisons; to wit, of Torre de Nona; and Corte Saueilla, certaine inferiour Iudges, called Pedarij, haue their abiding; who haue their names of the places, because one is called Iudge of Torre de Nona; and the other, of Corte Saueilla. The appellation of these Iudges, was wont to come from the Governours Court, concerning that of Torre de Nona; and that of Corte Saueilla; from the Auditour of the Chamber. These Men, as ordinary Iudges, by this Appellation and their owne faculty, do so heare and descide matters done; as the Governour may also intermit them in Appellation of the Iudge-Marshall: but the other, in regard it belongeth to the Auditour, is one of those Iudges called Curules, inferior to a Superior, because this Iudge of the Curules, is a Iudge ordained of an inferiour degree; who makes his abiding at Corte Saueilla, and attendeth on all them that follow the Romain Court; but not to excepted persons, or them that are of more humble condition, who haue also an ordinary Iudge for them. The Whoores and common Strumpets of the Stewes, doe yearelie pay to this Man a certaine Rent, which they tearme a tribute, and it hath had so long a continuance to this day; as no other reason appearing to the contrarie; it is gathered as by prescription; euen of them that are most vnwilling, and they are compelled to pay it.

18 Beside the ordinary Court, there is in Rome another Generation of Romaine Citizens, to whom the Pope hath giuen a Pretor, and them wee call Senators. These men commonly dwell in Campidoglio, and (by ordinary autho-

10 rity) heare the causes of Romaine Citizens. They haue three Vicares substitutes, two whereof, being Presidents in private Iudgements, are called Colateralis. These men are different in degree; because one is called the first; another, the second; and the third is called Iudge of euill actions. If a Man do appeale from any one of these, there is a Iudge beside in Campidoglio, who is ordinarily for all Appellations, whose sentence, if it bee conformable to the first Iudge; the party cannot by Lawe, (belonging to the Burgers of the City, which forbiddeth it) vrge any other appeale. There are also certain Tribunals, where all Arts or Trades (which are noted downe in little Tables, hanging in diuers Porches) are to be righted. Ther all the Mysteries are to be read, and election made of Maister work-men, who render account (as Ouer-seers) for others of the same Society: and yet the party offended, may appeale from their sentence, to certaine men calld Conseruatores of the city, that haue their abiding also in Campidoglio. This iurisdiction of Campidoglio, was confirmed by Pope Iulius the second; Leo the tenth, and last of all, by Paule the third.

30 39 There is yet a third kind of persons, who are Priests, to whom the Pope (as a matter proper and appertaining to himselfe) hath graunted a Vicare. This Man (as well in Rome, as in the whole Diocesse) hath the same authority in all things, as the Pope hath: for all Priestes are subiected to his iurisdiction, and he heareth Clearkes causes, in matters belonging to the Church, and the Ecclesiasticall Courtes. Hee imposeth also the forme of pennance to Penitentes, conferreth the Sacraments of the Church, and (by law of the Diocesse) calleth Congregations, visiteth Churchess and regulare Monasteries, where there is no exemption by especiall reason. Beside this, he hath some charge of his Ordinary, though it cometh not by his general deputation: as to enquire, correct, punish, remoue, and to giue Benefices. Hee reuonpon, Popes vsed to graunt the fore-laid matters, onely by his permission, concerning Benefices that were abroad. And by vigour of this permission, the Vicares iurisdiction extended to all Lay-

Abroad also, beside the fore-named power, his authority extendeth (by the same dispensation) to causes, wherein no speccn is made of propriety, but of Rents; and penstons out of those rents; remission of paiments; and in cases concerning Villages, Hamlets, Fieldes, Houses, Vineyards, and all kinds of waxes. But in other matters, where question is made of proprietie of thinges; he can proceede no further, but to sixty Ducates of Gold of the chamber. Now concerning the fore-named causes, his authority stretcheth forty Miles out of Rome, and in those occasions hee dealeth of his owne ordinary power, and within the summe of sixty Ducates limited. The Pope hath likewise giuen him all those Pontificall priuiledges, which euery Ordinary exerciseth in his Diocesse, which come not in generall within his Vicares deputation, & which cannot bee committed to their Vicare without dispensation, and Licence of Faith: As to consecrate prophane places; reconcile vnhalloved matters; promote to sacred Orders; elect any Bishop in times prohibited; and to punish the delict of any Body (in respect of the Church) out of Cleargy; as blasphemy, vsury, periury, incest, and such like. One of them heareth priuate and ciuill causes; the other, publike and criminall: who, vnder the value of sixty 20 After that matters in Rome grew to such height, that all parts of the World had recourse to the Pope, as well for accounts of Benifices, as diuers other occasions beside: all suiters, not onely priuate persons, but Princes and Kinges also, had their causes questioned in the Court of Rome; eyther by disposition of reason, nature of the action, weakenesse in the Prince, or verily, by consent of the offendour. And such was then the deuotion of our forefathers, that they voluntarily excited people from all parts of the World, to make their remorse to Rome, onely to be esteemed most holy Trauailers. All therefore recited causes (prouided that they wer not Concistorial) were heard by the Pope, and he himselfe, deuided from the Senate, heard the in his Chappell, & then (for their expedition) cald none but Lawiers: whereupon, they are now at this day called Chaplaines, and serue in the Chappell for diuine seruices. But the Bishops easing themselues by (little and little) from this businesse granted: that they should haue all suiters a part, and their causes, and therefore (by a new name) they became to be termed Auditors of causes in the sacred Pallace, and according to their relation, the Pope ordered his sentence. These men, as they haue admittance into this Order: haue authority to heare causes, by this most auncient delegation granted them by Popes.

originall in the holy Citty of Ierusalem, and passed there her first yeares of Infancy, with a great part of her adolescence: When as the Sarazins were Maisters of the holy Citty, and of the Country all about the sacred Sepulcher of our Lorde, which was ruined about the yeare of Salvation, 1012. by the commandment of Equin, Califfe of the Sarrazins, and continued so ruined, vntill the time of Constantine Monomachus, Emperour of Constantinople, who, at the intreaties of the Christians which then dwelt in Hierusalem (with the consent of Bomensor Elmonius Stensabus, Califfe or Soldane of Egypt) built it againe at his owne charges, in the yeare 1048. About which time, certaine Gentlemen and Italian Marchants of the Citty of Melphes, frequenting the Portes and Maritime Citties of Syria and Egypt, and bringing good Marchandizes into those Countries; won themselues much loue and liking, not onely of the Citties Governours, but also of the Califfe of Egypt. And being well disposed Christians, they would oftentimes goe to Hierusalem, to visit the holy memorable places: and hauing no place of retirement in the Citty, they obtained fauour and permission of the Califfe, to build there a Church and a Pallace, for their owne vse and habitation, as also for others of their Nation; in that quarter of the Citty, where the Christians might dwell neere to the holy Sepulcher. There they erected two Monasteries; one, in honour of the blessed Virgine Mary, called S. Maria de la Latina, (differing from the Greeke Churches which were in Hierusalem, and placed there an Abbot of Mont-Cassina) & was built to lodge Christian Pilgrims therein. The other, was dedicated to S. Mary Magdalen, as a place of entertainment of all such women, as should aduenture thither in Pilgrimage, they beeing also religiously gouerned. Not long after, they builded an Hospitall; wherein to lodge as well all sickly Trauailers, as any other Pilgrimes of honest disposition, with a Church also thereto belonging, beeing both dedicatod to S. Iohn Baptist. These Monasteries, Churches, and Hospitals, were long time maintained by the care and cost of the Amalphanes, who founded them: and vntill such time as the Citty was conquered by the Christians from the Infidels, and that Godfrey of Bullen was there elected King, which was in the yeare 1099.

10 THE Citty being thus won, F. Gerard was the first Rector or gouernor of the Hospitall of Saint Iohn, who, when the Citty was besieged by the Christians, was very ill dealt with by the Infidels, and was long time (by them) kept captiue Prisoner, because they distrusted, that he had some secret intelligence with the Christians; which beleagured the Citty. But after that the Christians were Maisters thereof, hee was deliuered out of Prison, and gouerned both wisely and charitably the hospitall of Saint Iohn; perswading and inducing Christian Kings and Princes, to entich & endow it with their liberality, which (indeede) they did in bountifull manner; so that in France, Italy, Spaine, and other Prouinces of Christendome, the Hospitall of Saint Iohn found good Benefactours; and attained (in short time) to great reuennewes and possessions. In the yeare 1113. Pope Paschall the second, receiued F. Gerard, and the Knights of Saint Iohn vnder protection of the Apostolique Seat, and graunted them great priuiledges; ordaining, that after the decease of F. Gerard, they should proccede canonically, to the election of another Rector or gouernor: who was afterward cald Great Maister, of the Order or Military Hospitall of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, a name which continueth yet to this present, after five hundred yeares from the beginning thereof.

20 IN the yeare 1118. F. Gerard departed out of this life, in the Papacy of Gelasius the second, and when as the order of the Knights Templers began. After his decease, there succeeded him by election, F. Raymond de Puy, who was a professed Knight of the Order: Albeit, some holde opinion, that F. Roger succeeded deceased Gerard; and gouerned the Hospitall of S. Iohn; from the yeare 1118. vntill the death of Baldwin, second of that name, King of Ierusalem, who dyed in the yeare, 1131. *F. Knights) made Statutes for the Order, formed and instituted a rule of life, which all the following Knightes were to obserue. He was called Great Maister of the Order, and yet he qualified that Title, by calling himselfe Seruant vnto the poore of Christ Iesus, and Guardian of the Hospital of Ierusalem. This Great Maister, perceiuing that the Reuennues of the Hospitall did daily increase, and that hee could not better employ such wealth, then against the Infidels, by making war vpon them: he made offer to the King of Ierusalem, of himselfe, his strength, and all his Knightly Brethren, who bare in their Streamers and Ensignes, a Crosse Argent, in a field Gules. And thence forward, these religious Brethren were distinguished into three degrees: for one company were Knights, another Captaines, and the thrid Seruants, not hauing (from the beginning) any other difference among them, but that some were Ecclesiasticall persons, and the other Layickes. And from that time forward, there was not any enterprize in Palestine against the Infidelles, but the great Master was present therat in person, with his religious Knightes: who were first called Knightes Hospitallers, or of the Hospital of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, afterward Knightes of the Rhodes; and lastly, Knights of Malta. They grew into so great credit and reputation, that they were employed in the manning and guiding all affaires of chiefest importance. Among others, Gerard Gebert, Knight of this Order, was sent by Fouiks King of Anion into England, to treat on the marriage of Constance (Princesse of Antioch, Neece to the Queen Meliscenda, and Daughter to Prince Boemond) with Raymond, Sonne to the Earle of Poicters, who was then in the Court of Henrie King of England. In like manner (this marriage being thus concluded, by the ingenuity of this Knight) at the same time, Raymond Berengarius, Earle of Barcelona, and Prince of Cathalonia (who had conquered the Isles of Maiorica and Minorica from the Moores, and in single combat) defended the chastity and honour of Mahauld, Wife to the Emperor Henry the fist, against two Allemaigne Knightes, that had falsely accused her of adultery) to shut vp the conclusion of his

daies, resolved to take the habite of this famous Brother-hood, and in that sacred profession, he perseuered all his life time after, which was in the year 1131. Not much differing from this time, it is reported, that three Knightes of this Order, being natiue French-men of Picardie, and detained then by the Soldan of Egypt in Captiuity, were admirablie deliuered and transported out of Egypt, with Ismeria, Daughter to the said Soldane, to the place where (at this instant) is the Church of Nostre Dame de Liesse, and this happened in the year, 1139. In the year 1153. Raymond the Great Maister, caused the siede to bee yet still continued before the Cittie of Ascalon, which the Infidelles had defended against the Christians more then fifty yeares: and at length, it was yeilded to the saide Maister, the 12. day of August 1154. which was in the tenth year of King Baldwine the third. In acknowledgement of a prize so signale, & beneficiall to all Christendome; Pope Anastatius the fourth, gaue and granted very great priuiledges, to the Order of these Knightes of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, the first day of Nouenber, in the same year, exempting them from the iurisdiction and controle of the East Ecclesiasticall Prelates, which was the cause of great troubles, betweene the Bishops of the Country there, and the Knightes of this Order: albeit the Pope and his Cardinals maintained them still stoutly. Some haue held, that this Great M. Raymond was a Florentine, but the most credible opinion is, that he was a French-man, a Natiue of Daulphine, issued of a verie Noble House, called Du Puy: whereof, namely, Jacques Bosius the Italian, (who hath amply written the Historie of this Order) is an ingenious witnesse. He dyed in the year 1160. with this reputation; that he had beene a Man of good and vertuous life, fearing God, valiant, wise, and aduised in the affaires of the World, and one well approued in warlike exercises.

3 After that Raymond was deceased, there succeeded in the Maistership and government of the Order, F. Auger de Balben: of whom there is found nothing deseruing Memory: but that (in his time) died King Baldwine the third, who who was not onely much bemoaned of the Christians, but likewise of the Infidels, who said: That the Christians had iust cause to lament for the death of Baldwin, because they had lost a Prince, that had not his equall in the World. This Great-Maister Auger, after hee had gouerned his charge in peace and repose about three yeares, dyed in the yeare 1163.

4. Arnold de Comps, was next elected Maister in his place, who was a Man of great Spirit, valour, and counsell. And in short time after his election, he entred into Egypt, with Amaury, the new King of Hierusalem, who made warre vpon the Califfe of Egypt; because he refused to continue and pay the annuall Tribute, wherein hee had bound himselfe to King Baldwine the third, for a perpetuall payment to the Kings of Ierusalem. Arnold, after he had (with great wisdome and courage) gouerned the Hospitall of *S. Insomuch, that he was enforced to borrow Money at interest, with condition; that if hee tooke from the Infidels the City of Belbeis (aunciently called Pelusium) hee should stand acquitted to his Brotherhood (as indeede hee did) and victoriously performed his promise, the third day of November, 1168. In which year he held a Chapter generall in Hierusalem, where perceiuing that hee was greatly indebted, and had charged the Hospitall, with more than an hundred thousand Crownes of meere debts; being also much grieued, that his attempts found not equall issue to his desires: he determined to renounce his great Maister-ship, which he did in the yeare 1169.

6. By his resignation, or renunciation rather, another Knight was chosen Great Maister, named F. Gastus, or Castus; of whom there is nothing found, that makes to any purpose of this our breefe History. And the breuity of his time of gouernment was the cause, by reason he was not a full yeare in the charge, but dyed in the very same yeare of his election, and had

7. F. Ioubert, a very religious Man, for his Successour, who in the yeare 1176. ioyned himselfe with Phillip Earle of Flanders, that was then come into Syria, to assist King Baldwine the fourth against Saladine; who had a very powerfull Armie, miraculously vanquished by the Christians, that were but few in number, in the Moneth of November, 1177. at which time the Emperour Fredericke Barbarossa, and Pope Alexander the third were reconciled together. At length, Saladine withdrew himselfe from the Country of Damas, in the yeare 1179. And then dyed Ioubert Maister of the Hospitallers, a Man very charitable to the poore, and sickly. It is said, that meere conceite of greefe, to behold (so manifestlie) the ruine of Christian affaires in Syria, with the shamefull and damageable truce, made betweene the King of Ierusalem, and the Earle of Tripoli (by his example) with Saladine; was the onelic cause of abridging his daies, hauing gouerned the Order of S. Iohn, about ten yeares.

8. In his stead was elected Roger de Molins, a Man of high discretion and courage. In his time happened a great dissention betweene the Prince of Antioch, and the Patriarch of the said place: and this Roger was chosen to be Mediatour of peace and agreement betweene them, which followed in the yeare 1181. This Roger (with Heraclius Patriarch of Hierusalem, and Arnold de Trogo, Maister of the Knights Templers) was sent by the King of Hierusalem (in qualitie of an Ambassadour) into the West, to require ayde of the Christian Princes: These Ambassadors were kindly entertained by the Emperour, King Phillip Augustus, Gods Guist, Sir-named the Conqueror, the Kinges of Seicilie, England; and Hungary: they returned backe againe into Syria, all but the Maister of the Templers, who died by the way. And Saladine hauing besiedged the City of Pto'omais, the Knights of Saint Iohn and the Templers (ioyning together) disordered the whole Army, and Roger the Great Maister, fighting valiantlie, there dyed, with the fall of his Horse vpon him, and smothered in his Armour, as also beeing much troden on with the Enemies Horses. His body being afterward found among the dead, was buried with great woe and sorrow. And notwithstanding this losse of the Great Maister; yet the Knights of Saint Iohn and the Templers, won the day of battaile against the Turkes and Sarrazins; of whom dyed then in the fiede about fiftene thousand, the first day of May, in the yeare 1187. F. Garnier of Naples in Syria (which was the auncient City of Sichem in Canaan) was elected Great Maister. In his time was a bloody battell fought betweene the Christians and Infidelles, wherein the King of Ierusalem (named Guy de Lusignan) was taken Prisoner, with the very cheefe Lordes of his Kingdome. It is saide also, that the Christians had then the true Crosse in the battell, but it was taken from them by the Infidelles: and almost all the Knights of Hierusalem, and the Templers, were one part slain in the battaile, and the rest beheaded in cold blood. F. Garnier, after hee had fought verie manfully, yet being mortally wounded in many places of his body; by the goodnesse and swiftnesse of his Horse, escaped into the city of Ascalon: where ten dayes after, he departed into a better life, the foureteenth of Iuly, hauing beene great Maister but two months and sixe daies.

The second day of October, in the same year, the City of Hierusalem was submitted to the power of Saladine: 88. yeares two months and seauenteene daies, after that it was deliuered (by Godfrey of Bullen) from the hands of the Infidels:

Fredericke the first, sir-named Barbarossa, then holding the Empire of the West, and Isaac the Angell, that of the East, at Constantinople, Vrbane the third being Pope of Rome, and Phillip the second, called Augustus, Gods Gift and Conqueror, raigning in France. Then were expelled out of Hierusalem, the Knightes Hospitallers, Templers, and all the Latine Christians, of which Christians, the Hospitallers redeemed from captinitie of the barbarous, to the number of two thousand with their Money. All the Churches of the City were then polluted and prophaned, except the Temple of the Resurrection: which was bought with a great summe of Money, by the Christians of the East. After the losse of Ierusalem, the Knightes Hospitallers were continuallie in Armes, faithfullie assisting the Christian Princes, that had put on Crosses, for the recouery of the holy Land, and did actions (of high desert) at the fiedge of Ptolomais: which, after a long fiedge of three yeares, was regained from the Infidels by the Christians, the twelst of Iuly, 1191. And in that City, the Knightes of Saint Iohn kept then their ordinary aboad and residence. And in the very same yeare, the Christians wonne a notable victorie against the Barbarians, and Saladine their chiefe: wherein they were worthily assisted by the Knightes Hospitallers, and Templers. The yeare following, beeing 1192. in Winter, dyed Ermingard d' Aps the Great Maister, in the city of Ptolomais, and then was chosen in his place

Hee made very worthy and commendable Statutes, whereof (to this day) there are some inuiolable kept. But because hee was of too stiffe nature, ouer-rough, surlie, and seuerer: hee incurred the hatred of the greater part of the Knights Hospitallers. Which was the cause, that he renounced his Maistership, and shipt himselfe for returne home to Partugall, in the same yeare of his election: But hee dyed the first day of March, in the yeare 1207.

13 THE same yeare that Alphonso renounced the Great Maistership, to wit; in the yeare 1194. Geoffrey le Rat, who was Graund-Pryour of Fraunce, was chosen Maister: And Saladine then dying, his Sonne Noradine, (Lord of Alepo) succeeded him. About this time, Simon, Earle of Montfort, was sent by King Phillip Augustus, with an Army into Syria; where finding much disorder, he tooke truce for ten yeares with the Infidels, in the yeare 1198.

Difference betweene the Hospitallers and Templers

In the time of this tranquile estate, there chanced a great difference, betweene the Knights Hospitallers and Templers, grounded on this occasion. The Hospitallers complained, that the Templers had enterprised too farre vpon their Iurisdiction, with much contempt, and violation thereof. Which quarrell (after many rough encounters and skirmishes) was appeased and accorded, by the interposition of King Amaury, the Patriarches of Antioch and Ierusalem, and other Princes and Christian Prelates, who comprimitted this difference, in the Name of Innocentius the third, which fell out very successiue-ly. For, after that GOD (the onelie Staffe and stay of all affaires in the Holy Land) had permitted this friendlie vnity, betweene these two Millitarie Orders of Knight-hood, King Amaurie of Lusignan so preuailed, that the Great Maister and Knightes of Saint Iohn; might liue with him in the Isle of Cyprus, where hee graunted the Gouvernement of the Kingdome to them. In the yeare 1205. King Amaurie dyed, so did Queene Isabell, who appointed her Daughter Mary (which shee had by Conrade of Monferrat) to be her Heire, and he left her to be tutored and guided by the Knights Hospitallers and Templers.

14 Guerin de Montagu, of the Language of Auuergne, who (with the Knights of this Order) ayded Lyuon King of Armenia, against the Turkes and Barbarians, that had intruded into his Kingdome. In recompence whereof, hee gaue them the City of Sales, with the Castles of Camard, and New Castle, and their dependances. Hee likewise recommended his Heire and Kingdome, to the Knights of the Hospitall of Saint Iohn; which giift was confirmed by the Pope, the first of August, 1209. At length, in the yeare 1230. Guerin the Great Maister dyed in the City of Ptolomais, and during his time, all the Christians affaires in the Holic Land, depended (very much) vpon the knights Hospitallers and Templers: who albeit they had many contentions betweene them, yet did they still agree together, (in all matters) against the Infidels. The Great Maister also, and his Knights with him (bearing him company) fought valiantlie against the Corasmine Infidelles. There the saide Maister was taken, and sent as a Prisoner to the Soldane of Egypt, where he dyed; and in his place, the Knights of Saint John elected (in the Cittie of Ptolomais) for their great Maister.

In his time, Lewes King of France, called Saint Lewes, tooke on him the Crosse against the Infidelles, with many Princes and Prelats of France, who went and besieged Damieta, where they were ayded by the Knights hospitallers and Templers, and the citty was soone after surrendered to King Lewes, in the yeare 1250. Then did the Soldane of Egypt giue battaile to the Christians, wherein King Lewes with his Brethren, Charls and Alphonsus the King of Cyprus, as also the Great Maister, and many Knights of the Hospitallers and Templers, were all taken Prisoners. Which surprizall, caused an attonement betweene King Lewes and the Soldane, and the Hospitall Knights lent Money to King Lewes, to pay his ransome. In the yeare 1251. Villebride the Great Maister died in the Cittie of Ptolomais, and succeeded by election

18. Gvillaum de Chasteau-neuf, or De Castelno, of the speech of Auvergne. He was a great obseruer of Iustice, and Pope Alexander the fourth, gaue to the Knights Hospitallers, the Castle and Landes of Bethania, in the yeare 1256. In his time, the Christians lost their vtmost hope, of any succour from the Princes of Europe: and in the yeare 1280. the Great Maister of Castelno died, when as the Hospitall Knights of Saint John elected in his stead

Knights of S. John, which greatly abated their power and repute. And in the yeare 1267. the Knights Hospitallers and Templers were assailed, and much confused in battaile by the Sarazins, neer to the Cittie of Ptolomais, for they wasted & spoiled all the Countrey there-about. In the yeare also 1270. the Knights of S. Johns lost the Castle of Craquuo, which was assaulted by the Soldane, and all the Knights within it, were put to the sword. It is likewise said, that this great Maister Renel, assisted King Lewes in the voyage to Tunis, where the saide King dyed of the Plague, and that in the ende, about the yeare 1278. the Great Maister Renel ended his daies, hauing held sine Chapters, or assemblies of the Brotherhood of *S. 1288

21 IN the same yeare, John de Villiers, a Frenchman born, was created Great Maister of the Order. In his tie, the City of Tripoly was taken from the Christians, by the Infidelles, as (in like manner) were the Citties of Sidon and Baruth, in the yeare, 1289. all which, were ransacked, ruined, and burned, and the City of Tyre brought vnder the Soldans subiection, whereon the christians of Ptolomais were glad to seeke their owne peace. During which time, the Great Maister went to Brundusium, with the Great Maister of the Templers, to sollicit the christia Princes of the Croisade, and the Soldan came to assaile the City of Ptolomais, which was vertuously defended by the Knightes of the Hospitall and Temple, with manie braue sallies forth vpon the besiedgers. Especially the Great Maister Villiers, who was sore wounded, with long sustayning the whole charges of the Barbarian Infidels; the Knightes Barricadoing themselves in a quarter of the City, which yet was afterward taken on Friday, the 18. of May, the same yeare, 1292. With this great losse, the christians were driuen out of the Holy land, 191. yeares ten months; & 3. daies, after it had bin conquered by Codfrey of Bullen. The Great Maister, with the rest of his Knightes, fled (for safety) to the Isle of Cyprus, where they were very kindly entertained by the king of the Island, who assigned vnto them and the Templers, the City of Limosson, which was a Port Towne or Hauen on the Sea. There did they inhabit; and there did the Great Maister assemble two generall Chapters, one in Decembar, 1292. and the other in October, 1293. making therein diuers good Statutes for the Order: and in the yeare, 1294. he died at Limos-

22. F. Odo des Pins, borne in Prouence, in the time of Pope Eonifue the eight. He incurred the hatred and disgrace of the knightes of his Order, by reason of his negligence and conetousnesse. And there was a purposed determination to depriue him of his Great Maisterhip; but it was impeached by the Pope, to auoid scandall, and at length hee was cited to appeare at Rome in person, to answer the complaintes of the Hospitallers; and thitherward he traualled. But before hee could see Italy, he died by the way, in the yeare, 1295. hauing (in the precedent yeares) held two generall Chapters at Limosson. He carried also a long with him, a Manuscript Chronicle, wherein he had appealed certaine Letters of the Popes, containing Excommunication, whereby he pursued and releued his owne Appeale.

23 THE Knightes hearing the death of their Great Maisters des Pins, elected (at Limosson) the 24. day of March, 1296. F. Guillaume de Villaret to succede him; who was of the same Countrey of Prouence, and Prior of S. Gilles, where he was at the time of his election. But hauing intelligence therof, he trauelled immediatly to the Kingdome of Cyprus, and gouerned in his charge very prudently. In his time, Vsan Cassanus, King of the Tartars, became a Christian, and recouered the City of Ierusalem, where hee placed the Knightes Hospitallers and Templers in Garrison, in the yeare, 1300. He tooke the City of Damas likewise; but it was quickly regained by the Infidels; and the Hospitallers and Templers returned then to Cyprus againe; where the Great Maister departed out of this life; in the yeare, 1308. hauing held siue generall Chapters at Limosson, and seen the vtter ruine of the Knightes Templers:

24 THE great Maister being dead, Folquet de Villaret, of the same Nation of Prouence, was elected in his room. For, in An. 1308. the very year of his election, hee made a voyage to Constantinople, and afterward, into France, wher the Pope gaue him the Isle of Rhodes (if hee could get it) which with his Knights he conquered, in the year 1309. and seauen other Islands neere adioyning. So that thither was the residence of S. Iohns Knights transferred, and then they were afterward called Knights of the Rhodes, yet keeping the name of S. Iohn of Ierusalem still. Not long after, Ottoman first Emperour of the Turkes, came and besieged Rhodes with a potent Army: but it was releued by Amadis the 4. Earle of Sauoy, and Ottoman was compelled to raise his siege. After which time, the Earls of Sauoy wore on their Armors a Crosse Argent, in a field Geules, in memory of the helpe they had giuen to the Knightes of the Rhodes.

The order of the Templers (having bin vtterly suppressed, in a generall Counsell holden at Vienna in Dalphine) the greater part of their goodes was giuen to the Order of the Rhodes, and confirmed by Pope Clement the 5. one thousand three hundred & twelue. In the year, 1314. the Knights of the Rhodes, conquered the Isle of Lango, with other Isles in the Archipelagus. And in the year, one thousand three hundred and seauenteene, Folquet the Great Maister (pleasing his owne Humour ouer-much in his Victories and Conquests) beganne to grow haughtie, proud, and insolent, which brought him into contempt of his Companions. Whereupon, the Knights reuolted from him, and if he had not saued himselfe in a Castle, they had seized his person. But in regard they could not get him, they deposed him from the dignity of Great Maister, and in his place, elected

25. Maurice de Pagnac, whereof Pope Iohn the twenty two, beeing aduertised, he was greatly offended thereat, and sent two Prelates to the Rhodes, to informe themselves of the fact, with command to cite the great Masters de Villaret and de Pagnac, to appeare at Auignon in person, Gerard des Pins, being appointed Lieutenant Generall in the meane while. At this instant time, Orchanes, Emperour of the Turkes, came boldly and besieged the Isle of Rhodes. But the Knights had an admirable victory against him; for there were then tenne thousand Turkes hewne in pieces. In this interim, Maurice Pagnac died at Montpellier, Anno, one thousand three hundred twentie two, and Folquet de Villaret, was re-established in the dignity of Great Maister. But he perceiuing, that it was against the liking of his fellow Knightes, renounced his Great Maister-ship, in the year one thousand three hundred twentie three, and liued as a priuate Knight, vntill the first day of September, 1327. when hee died, and was buried at Montpellier.

26. The same yeare that he gaue ouer his dignity, the Knightes of the Rhodes, chose Elion de Villeneuve, borne also in Frouence, and Priour of S. Gils. In the year 1343 a league was made between the Seignury of Venice, the K. of Cyprus, and Knights of the Rhodes. And the great M. having won the name of an happy Gouernour, died the twenty seauen of May, at Rhodes. In his life time, hee had enclosed the Great Maisters Pallace with wals and Towers, and diuided the Languages, Bayliwicks, and other dignities of the order.

27. After the decease of Villeneuve, Deo-dono, or Gods gift, (a Natiue of Frouence) was elected Great Maister. About foure yeares before hee was promoted to this dignity, he had fought with an horrible and monstrous Dragon, that greatly afflicted the Isle of Rhodes. And hauing killed the Monster, hee was therefore so highly honored and esteemd, that his memory yet remaineth renowned to posterity. In the yeare, 1347. he aided the king of Armenia against the Soldan of Egypt. Pope Clement the sixt, held the Knights of Rhodes in such esteem, that almost all the Forts in Italy (belonging to the See) were gouerned seuerally by one of them. In the yeare, 1351. Constance K. of Armenia, became a Brother-Knight of Rhodes. And in the yeare, 1353. the son to Iohn Cantacuzen, Emp. of Constantinople, came and required aid of the Great Maister of Rhodes: who after he had gouerned this Order of *S. 29. After the Great Maister was deceased, according vnto accustomed forme, Roger des Pins, borne likewise in Provence, did next succeed him. In his time, the Pope perswaded the Knights of Rhodes, to buy the Principality of Achaia, of Jacques de Sauoy, Prince of Piedmont, and the Knights of Rhodes made a generall assembly in the City of Auignon, to effect the treaty of buying of the sayde Principality of Achaia, and to reforme some abuses, crept into the Order. For their Statutes were nowe traduced into the Latine tongue; & to all Princes were sent authentickall Coppies or Volumes of them, by appointment of the great Maister. And in the yeare, 1359. the Great Commaunder, and the Marshall of the Order, were sent into France (in qualitie of Ambassadors) to be visiters and reformers. There was an assembly of the Knights, called at the City of Carpentras, but it could not holde in regarde of the great Maisters death, who died the 28. of May, 1365. and was much lamented, but by the poore especially, to whom he was a great and charitable Almoner.

30. Raymond Berengarius, of Provence also, was next chosen great Maister, who had bin before the Commaunder of Castle Sarrazin. In his time, the King of Cyprus, and the Knights of Rhodes, made a league together, & tooke (perforce) the City of Alexandria in Egypt, which they ransackt, spoylde, and burnt. The Armensans being expelled by the Sarrazins out of their dwellings, were charitably entertained by S. Johns knights, in the Isle of Lango: and at the same time the City of Tripoli in Syria, was taken and sacked by the King of Cyprus, and the Knightes of the Rhodes.

10 In the year, 1371. the Great Maister was (by the Pope) elected Nuntio from the Apostolicke seat, to appease the rumours & diuisions which were then in the Kingdome of Cyprus: whether he went in person, and both by his Authority and wisdom, he soone ceased all the troubles and molestations. The Great Maister hauing gouerned his Order about 18. yeares and an halfe, departed this life, in the yeare, 1373.

The great M. elected Nuntio.

31. IN the same yeare, Robert de Juliac; or of Gulich, great Prior of France, was chosen Great-Maister, who (at the time of his election) had the charge of his Priory: but vnderstanding the newes; he went forthwith to Auignon, where he was receiued with great honour, an assembly general of this Knightly order, being then there held, and the Great Maister had the gouernement of Smyrna imposed vpon him, vnder paine of excommunication. At his comming to Rhodes, he quallified all the contentions which had hapned in the time of his absence. At this time went 30 the Pope, to hold his seat at Rome againe, which he and his predecessors had kept at Auignon, for the space of seauenty one yeares, 1376. In which yeare, the 29. of Iune, died the Great Maister, and then 1373. Robertus Iuliacensis.

The Great Maister made Gouvernor of Smyrna.

32. IN his place came John Fernandes d'Heredia, a Natiue of Arragon, in the city of Valentia, who was Priour of Cathalognia, and Castillian d'Emposta. Twice he had bin married, and (chauncing to be a Widdower) hee was made a Knight of Rhodes, in the time of Villeneufue, who was then Great Maister. Beeing then but a simple Knight, hee went to visit the holy Sepulchre, and other memorable places in the Holy land. He was also Ambassadour from Pope Clement the sixt, to the Kings Phillip 6. of France, and Edward the third of England, and did very good seruice to king Phillip, in the year 1346. For he being dismounted from his Horse, on a day of battel against the English, he gaue him his owne horse, whereby the King escaped to a place of safetic: In like manner, hee fortified the Bastions and new wals of Auignon, wherof he was made Gouvernour by the Pope. great Maister, he took his way to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1377. and being required by the Generall of the Venetians army, to v-nite their forces together : they went to Morea, in the year, 1378. where they besieged the City of Patras, and took both it and the Castle. The Great Maister (fighting man to man with the Governour of Patras) slew him manfully. Afterward, in an Ambuscado of Turkes, he was taken prisoner, by reason hee was too well knowne to them. Whereuppon, to worke his liberty, Patras and other places (which had bin won from them) were redelivered to the Turkes. And yet notwithstanding, they would needes carrie him with them into Albania, where they kept him as a slaue three yeares. In the yeare, 1381. the great Maisters freedome was bought with mony; and hee returning to Rhodes, the Ambassadors of Smirna came to desire succor of him. In the yeare, 1391 Baiazeth Emperour of the Turkes, made some preparation to besiege Rhodes: Whereuppon, Phillebert de Naillac, Prior of Aquitaine, was sent by his fellow-Knights to Auignon, with Letters to the great Maister, to require aide against Baiazeth. Naillac returning to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1395. Heredia the great Maister died, & was buried at Caspa.

33. NEwes being brought to Rhodes, that Heredia the Great Maister was dead, Phillebert de Naillac, Graunde Priour of Aquitaine, and born in France, succeeded in his roome. At the Spring time, he was invited by Sigismond, K. of Hungaria, to come and assist him with his Knights, against Baiazeth, which hee did in person, in the yeare, 1397. And then was a battaile foughten at Nicopolis, where Baiazeth had the victory, the King of Hungary beeing glad to saue himselfe, and (with the Great Maister) retyred to Rhodes. Thither also did the Emperour of Constantinople send all his precious Jewels, to be kept by the Great Maister, fearing least Baiazeth should surprize Constantinople. But hee was disappointed by Tamburlain, who ouercam Baiazeth, and kept him captiue in a Cage of Iron, so long as he lived; and the siedege of Constantinople being raised, the Great Maister sent home againe the Emperours Jewels. After the foil of Baiazeth, the great Maister, de Naillac, sailed with an armie into Caria, and there builded an inexpugnable fortresse, which hee named Saint Peters Castle, in the yeare, 1399. vnder the raigne of Charles the sixt K. of France. In the yeare, 1403. there hapned warres betweene the King of Cyprus and the Geneweyes; which was pacified and ordered by the wisdome and authoritic of the Great Maister: to whom the Souldan of Egypt sent an Ambassador, for request of peace.

In the yeare 1409. the Great Maister gaue his personall assistaunce in the Counsell of Pisa, assembled to quench the Schismes which were then crept into the Church; and the guard of the Conclau was committed to the Great Maister, when Alexander the fift was elected Pope. The saide Maister was likewise at the generall Counsel of Constance, where three Popes were deposed, and Martine the fift elected, Anno. 1414. the gard of the Conclau beeing then againe giuen to the Great Maister. Trauailing into France, he held a general assembly of the Knights at Auignon, afterward at Florëce, and last at Ancona: whence returning to Rhodes, Anno 1420. he held there a generall Chapter, & in the beginning of Iune, 1421. he died.

34. ANd then in the deads place, Anthony de Fluuiano, or de Riuers, reported to be a Natiue of Arragon (but more say of England) was created Great Maister. In his time beganne the general Counsel of Basile, 1430. And not long after, the Soldan of Egypt (pust vp with the victory which he wonne at Cyprus) brake the Truce, and prepared a great Armie, with intent to besiege Rhodes. But when he heard, that the Great Maister was provided of sufficient strength to withstande him; he left off his determination, and so the Order that way remained in quiet. This Great Maister founded and endowed a chappel in the City of Rhodes, which (afterward) hee made a Church for his Knights. And the 29. of October hee died, after he had gouerned (in his place) with much wisdome, 16. yeares and an halfe.

35. THe sixt of Nouemb. in the same yeare, 1437. Iohn de Lastic, borne in Auergne, was elected Great Maister, albeit he was absent at his election, & remaiinained in Auuergne, wherof he was Priour. Before he would go to Rhodes, hee made a generall assembly of his Knightes at Valentia, in the month of December, 1438. When he cam to Rhodes, he began to build the new Hospitall for sicke people, which the precedent Great Maister, (by his will) had appointed to be done at his expences. In his time, Pope Eugenius the fourth, was deposed by the Counsell of Basile; and Felix the fift, created in his place, who was held at Rome to bee an Antipope. In the yeare, 1440. the Soldan of Egypt, being come neer to the Port of the Isle of Castelle Rouge (which apertained to the Knights) and from thence turning towards Rhodes, he was put to flight by an army of the Knights, who had but eight Gallies; and in the Souldans armie there were eighteen; and there were slain about 700. Sarazins, beside a great number that were wounded. This foyle did so highly offend the Soldan, that he leagued himselfe with Amurath, Emperour of the Turkes, with intention to make himselfe Maister of the Isle of Rhodes, and to kill or expell thence, that famous Order of Knight-hood.

Heereupon, in the yeare, 1444. hee came and besiedged Rhodes, which vvas vertuously defended by the Rhodian Knightes; and in the month of September the same yeare, a generall assembly was held at Rhodes, to helpe the ensuing necessitie of the order. So the yeare following, the Great Maister (by aduise of the Pope and the King of Cyprus) made peace with Amurath, and helde a generall Chapter at Rhodes. At which time, the D. of Cleues passed by Rhodes, in his returne from Ierusalem, where he had visited the Holie places. In the yeare, 1451. a generall assembly was made at Rhodes, wherein, the administration and gouernement of the Treasure, and whole fraternity, was giuen to the Great Maister: who in Anno 1452. after the death of Amurath, renewed the peace with Mahomet the seconde his son. And yet the yeare following, Mahomet became Master of the City of Constantinople; the 29. of May: when (being not a litle proud of this fortunate succes) he sent to the great Master of Rhodes, that he should pay him yearely, two thousand Ducats, in name of a tribute, otherwise, he purposed not to hold (any longer) the peace sworn betweene them. Whereunto the Great Maister made a couragious answer, to wit; That neither his religion, the Isle of Rhodes, nor himselfe were Subiects to any, but God and his Church; that he would neuer pay Turk any tribute, being rather resolved to dye (both he and all his Knightes) then to endure Christian Libertie, (which euer had bin free) to come nowe (by his meanes) into thraldome. Whereupon, he sent Ambassadors to the Pope and Christian Princes, to entreat supply from them, against the periured Mahomet. And in the yeare, 1454. the xix. day of May, he died, hauing valiantly gouerned his Order sixteene yeares, six months, & thirtene dayes.

36. Jacques de Milly, borne in Auuergn, whereof he was Prior, succeeded as Great Master, the first of Iune, 1454. being in his Priory when he was elected, & his Nephew George de Poismond, brought him first tidings thereof. Whereupon, he immediatly went to Rhodes, and helde a generall Chapter the same yeare, in the month of Nouember. In the yeare, 1456 the Isle of Rhodes was greatly afflicted with pestilence and famine, whereby it became halfe desert; and to re-people it againe, many generall citations wer sent abroad to all the Knights, to meete there at a certaine time. The yeare 1457. Mahomet besiedged the Isle of Lango, & the Castle of the Isle des Singes: but hee was couragiously repulsed, the Knightes hauing a very happy and singuler victory against him, which caused Charles the 7. King of France, to send the Knights (as a guilt) sixteene thousand Crownes. The Bayliffes, Commanders, and other Officers of the Order, beeing then enioyned (by a generall Chapter) to come to Rhodes, for the more secure defence thereof. The xvii. of August, 1461. the great Maister died, hauing (with much prouidence) gouerned his charge in harde & troublesome times, seuen yeares, two months, and sixteene daies. He was greatly lamented, because he was very benigne, affable, and humane, desirous to preferue peace and vnity among his worthy Brethren.

37 Peter Raymond Zacoſta, born in Ar-ragon, and Castilean d'Emposta, was created Great Master next, he being then absent in Spaine; but at his coming to Rhodes, by a generall Chapter there holden, den, the eight Language of Castile & Portugall, was then admitted into the order. For till that instant, there were but seven Languages there before; to wit, three of France, Auvergne, and Prouence; one of Italy, one of Arragon, one of England, & one of Allemagne or Germany. The yeare 1464. the Venetians army besiedged the City of Rhodes: but the siege was soone raised, and the Venetians returned home to their Countrey, the war being appeased by the wisdom of the Great Master, who caused the Tower of S. Nicholas to be built, at the mouth of Rhodes Port, in the very same place, wher (in elder times) the great Colossus of the Sun (numbered among the seven wonders of the world) had stood. As a helpe to this building, Phillip Duke of Burgundy, gaue ten thousand Crownes of Gold. The yeare 1463. the great Turke sent Ambassadors vnto Rhodes, to mediate a peace between him and the Knights Hospitallers: but they worthily refused it; and in presence of the Ambassadors, denounced warre against the Turke. The generall Chapter being then transferred from Rhodes to Rome; & the Great Master being present in person thereat, he died there the 21. of February, 1467. and was buried in the Church of S. Peter.

38. Baptista Orsino, Prior of Rome, an Italian by Nation and Tongue, succeeded the Great Maister Zacosta. No soone was he come to Rhodes, but he receiued intelligence, that the great Turke prepared a puissant army; purposing to be sledge either Rhodes or Negropont: wherfore, hee sent for a great number of the Knights, that were then absent, to come forthwith for defence of the Iland. Moreouer, he leagued himselfe with the Seignury of Venice, against the Turke. Neuerthelesse, in the yeare 1470. Mahomet forcibly tooke the City of Negropont, the last day of Iuly, committing verie great and horrible cruelties, killing (in colde blood) all the Latines there to be found, and (by sound of Trumpet) he proclaimed open war against the Knight of Rhodes; which enforced them to seeke all meanes for their best defence, prouiding euerie way to withstand the Turkish Army. But in this time of preparation, the eight day of Iune, the Great-Maister died of a long lingering disease, which had afflicted him a whole year together: and after him succeeded

39. Peter d'Abuffon, born in Auvergne, Priour there, and Captain of the City of Rhodes. He being chosen Great Maister, solemnly took his Oath (according to custome) to keepe the statutes of the Order. Hee visited the whole Isle of Rhodes, and made very great prouision to defend it against the Turkes army, sending for all Knights and Commaunders appertaining to the Order, to repaire thither for defence of the Isle, and renewing peace with the Soldan of Egypt. The same year, King Lewis preuailed to haue a Iubily in France, in fauor of the knights of Rhodes; taking order, that the monies thereby arising, should soly be imployed for their defence. And by this Iubily came great store of Money, wherewith Castles and fortifications were builded in the Ile. Truce also was taken, betweene the Knights, and the King of Tunis, for thirtie yeares; and the Knights of the Sepulcher at Ierusalem, were ioyned with the Rhodians of S. Iohn. In the yeare, 1479. Mahomet the second, Emperor of the Turkes, helde a solemne counsell, that Rhodes should be besiedged with a powerfull Army, as indeed soone after it was. In which siege, many sallies forth were made, and the Turkes daily repulsed and chased, albeit they were an 100000. fighting men, and the army consisted of 160. saile. The Great Maister, was much succoured by Mesire Antoine d'Abuffon his Brother, Viscount of Montelis, who was a great Warrior, and a most skilfull Captain, he was elected Captain Generall for the besiedged. In few daies, the Turkes gaue 3700. shot with the Cannon, against the City wals, and a maruellous assault was made of 40000. Turkes, who neuerthelesse were valiantly resisted, albeit the Great Maister receiued (in this fight) five great wounds, one whereof was thought to be deadly. In the end, so worthily were the assaylants withstood, that they were enforced to raise their sledge, hauing lost a great number of their Souldiers, & the Army of Turkes returned (with mightie shame and disgrace) to Constantinople, after they had besiedged the City, for the space of 89. daies. After this siege, Mahomet the second, concluded to come in person to Rhodes: whereupon, a generall assembly assembly of the Knights was made. But the death of Mahomet hindered this designe, and his Sonnes Baiazeth and Zizime performed the warre, after the decease of their Father, which gaue some breathing time of rest to the Knights of Rhodes. And yet Zizime (in person) came to assist the Great Maister, withdrawing himselfe to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1482. wher he was receiued with great honor, and from thence conducted into France. In the time of this Great M. D'Aubusson, the statutes of the Order were reformed, and brought into one Volume: Peace being concluded betweene the Knights and the Great Turke Baiazeth. The great Maister, was made a Cardinall by Pope Innocent the eight, and Legate also into Asia, with honour of Legate, and general of the legued Army against the Turk. Finally, he died at Rhodes, Anno 1503. the third day of Iuly, full of honor and reputation, and was interred with great funeral pompe. He had liued 80. yeares, three months, and 4. daies, and gouerned the Order 27. yeares, and xvi. daies.

40 There were 387. Knights assembled at Rhodes, when the Great Maister D'Aubusson died, who elected for his successor, Emery D'Ambois, Brother to George D'Ambois, Cardinall and Legate in France, Arch-bishop of Rouen. He was a French-man by birth, & great Priour of France, at the time of his election, Guy de Blanchefort comming into France, to accompany him in his voyage to Rhodes, wher he was receiued with much applause and reioycing, because the Kinges of France and Spain had written verie favourable Letters on his behalfe, to the Knights of the order. He was no sooner there arriued, but he held a general chapter, wherein was concluded, that a sumptuous Tombe of Brasse should be made, for the deceased Cardinall Great Maister. In the yeare following, they obtained a very famous and nauall victory, against the Soldane of Egypt, vnder the conduct of Phillip de Villiers, of the Isle Adam, a French Knight of the order, & afterward he was Great M. But this Maister Emerie D'Ambois died at Rhodes, An. 1512.

41 And the same yeare, 410. of the Knights were assembled at Rhodes, wher they chose Guy de Blanchefort, borne in Auuergne, and Nephew to the deceased Maister D'Aubusson, to be great maister. In his time, the generall Lateran Counsel was holden at Rome, wher Fabritio Carretto, Admirall and Procurator for the order of Rhodes, was Captaine of the Guard to the said counsel. This great M. de Blanchefort, embarking himselfe at Nicea in Prouence, to make for Rhodes, was surprized (by the way) with a dangerous sicknes, whereof hee died, the 2. of Nouemb. a yeare & two daies after his election.

42 In his sted, Fabritio de Carretto, born in Geneway, and an Italian by Language, was created Great M. in an assembly held at Rhodes, the xv. of December, 1513. wher were then present 550. Knights of the order the said Carretto hauing formerly bin Admirall of Rhodes. In the yeare 1516. peace was made between the Knights of S. Iohn, and Tomombecus Soldan of Egypt, successor to Campson Gaurry, who (but a short while before) was slaine in a battaile, wherein Selim (Emperor of the Turks) had the victory against him. And Tomombecus was as vnfortunat, for in the yeare, 1517. he was taken, and strangled at one of the Ports of the great Cayre, by the appointment of Selim. And this was the cause, that the great Maister fortified the Isle of Rhodes, to his vttermost power, sending Ambassadors to the Christian Princes, to let them vnderstand the great victories of Selim, the sooner to take order for sending succour. But Selim dying, his son Sultan Solyman succeeded him: and in Ianuary, 1521: the Great M. Carretto finished his daies at Rhodes, leauing great prouision and munition for warre, which soon after did seruice to his successor.

43 Phillip de Villiers, of the Isle Adam, great Priour of France, and there borne, wher because he also was at the time of his election, Gabriel de Pomereux great commander, was chosen Lieutenant to the Great Maister till he came. The very same yeare of his election, the xxii. of Ianuary, 1521. Sultan Soliman resolved to besiege the Isle of Rhodes, executing the last Will of his Father Selim: whereof the Great Maister being aduertised, he made his preparation (by all possible meanes) to withstand the Turkes enterprize.

Dilligently did he strengthen the City of hodes, sending for supply into Christendome, which as then hee coulde not haue, by reason of the Warre hapning betweene Frances the first, K. of France, and the Emperor Charles the fift. In the month of Iune, 1522. began the memorable sidge of the Citie of Rhodes, which was besiedged with an army of two hundred thousand Turkes; and afterwardes the army encreased vnto three hundred thousand men. The besiedged defended themselues most couragiously, and verie worthy exploits of war were there performed, especially by the Great Maister, who (during the sidge) did neuer put off his Armour. The assaylants were in many attempts repulsed, and in one of them, twentie thousand Turkes remained dead in the place: Soliman hauing then a purpose to raise his siege, but that there were some close Traitours, who hindered him from so dooing, and yet they did not escape unpunished.

At length, the Great Maister (receyuing no succour) was enforced to surrender the City, vpon composition, the 24. day of Decembre, 1522. the Turkes hauing lost more then an hundred thousand men. Soliman would needes see the great Maister, and when he beheld him, teares issued from his eyes, in meere compassion of him. So the first day of Ianuarie, 1523. the Great Maister (with fiftie saile) departed from Rhodes, and tooke his way towards Candie: after that the Isle of Rhodes had been in the power of the Knights Hospitallers, for the space of two hundred and thirteen yeares, to wit, from the yeare, 1309. to the end of the yeare, 1522. After this losse of Rhodes, the Great Maister, and his valiant Religious Knights, had not any assured place of abiding, vntill the Isle of Malta was giuen them by the Emperor Charles the fift. For they departed first into Candy, from thence they went into Sicily and Italy, where the Pope lent them the City of Viterbo, and where they held a generall Chapter. Afterwardes, thy sojourned for some small time, at Cornetto; then at Villefranche, and at Nicea. While they remaind at Nicea, the Great Maister made a voyage into England, and from thence to France; where being at Lyons, a great sickenesse tooke him: but after his recouery, hee went to Cambray, to holde the Baptisme Font for phillebert Emanuel, Sonne to Charles Duke of Sauoy. Afterward, coming with his Brethren-Knights to Malta, on Wednesday morning the sixte of October, 1530. he caused a Pallace to be there erected, for the abiding of him and his successours, calling it Castel Angelo, building another Pallace also in the olde City of Malta. VVhen he had gouerned his order thirty yeares, and seauen monthes (being aged seauenty yeares) the xxii. of August, 1534. he died at Malta, and was buried in a Chappell, which hee had builded nere to Castel Angelo, and then succeeded him by election.

ued Albeit he was discontented that they had not sent some of the Gallies, nor the great Carrack of the Order, for his conduct thither; wherefore he disarmed and destroyed the Great Carrack, which caused many complaints against him. Verie often would he discourse of the sledge at Rhodes, because he gaue generall notice thereby, that there he had lost one of his eies. He made a goodly Parke of Deare, and a very beautifull Garden in the Isle of S. Michael, and there would hee spend the greater part of the day, which rayled occasion of murmuring against him, that he was slacke in his publick government, and no way carefull to provide the Isle of Malta, of needefull supplies against the Turkes forces, for he trusted too much in the strength of Castel Angelo. In his time, the city of Tripoli in Barbary was lost by the knights of the order, & taken by the Turks, which droue him to no litle fear & amazement. In the year, 1552. Leo Strozzi, an especial Commander of the order, made an attempt vpon the Isle of Zoara, which had very harde successe, because many Knights were then slaine of all Nations, especially manie French, Auergnons, and Prouenceals. It being declared to the Great Maister, he grieved extraordinarily thereat, and saide; That a greater losse had not hapned to the Order, since the surprisal of Rhodes. He builded the Castles of S. Elme, and S. Michael, and being eighty years old, died the 6. of Sept. 1558 hauing gouerned xvi. yeares, x. months, and xv. daies, and was buried in the great Maisters Chappell.

46 Claudius de la Single, borne in France, was next created Great Maister, and at his election, there were then present at Malta, aboue foure hundred Knights of the Order. Hee Governed verie discreetly, by Counsell of five Worthy Knights his Officers and Attendants, (to witte;) by his Steward, Maister of the Housholde, Maister of the Horffe, the Treasurer, and Secretary: So that the Order was in great happinesse, during the time of his Maister-shippe, hauing obtained the priuiledge of Neutrality, of King Henry the second, and Charles the fift, Emperor, who made warre against him.

Hee was verie Valiant, Religious, and a most profitable Administratour of the Orders reuennues, in whose Treasury he left abundant store: dying of a Catarrh, which had much suffocated him, after he had attained to the Climacteriall yeare, 63. of his age.

47 J. John de Valette, borne in Prouence, succeeded next as Great Maister, and his election was verie pleasing to all the Order of Saint John, because he was generally beloued of all the Nations; and vniuersally desired, as most Worthy of that charge and Dignitie. In lesse space then two yeares, he was general of the Gallies, Bayliffe of Lango, Great Commaunder, Priour of Saint Ghes, and Lieutenant to the great Maister, and nowe at length Great Maister also.

Hee did so affect his Knightes and Order, that, after the day hee first entered into it, he would neuer more retorne into his Countrey. So that by making continuall residence there with them, he passed thorough all the Degrees and offices of honour in the profession: appearing still (in all his actions) to bee of rare iudgement, perfect integrity, & incomparable valour. So soone as he was advanced to this Soueraigne dignity, he resolved to builde a new Cittie at Malta, vpon the Mountaine of Saint Elme, knowing that all the other Fortes were not sufficiently munited, to endure the batterie of a potent enemy: yet this disleign was deferred till a further time. He fortified the Castle of the Isle of Goza, and forsaking his abiding at the Castle of S. Angelo, came and dwelt within the town of Malta, which hee defended most valiantly against the siege of the Emp. Sultan Soliman, when he was grievously wounded in his leg, in the year 1565: But the siege being raised, to the shame and confusio of the Turkes; he greatly strengthened the Isle of Malta, and began to build the new City, which was called Valette, according to his sur-name, and whereof himselfe solemnly laid the first stone, on monday the 28. of March, 1566. And by the sollicitude of the Great Maister, the building thereof, continued on still, eight thousand persons being daily employed therein, and five hundred thousand Crownes monthly paid to the workmen. At length, the one & twentie of August, 1568. the Great Maister died, on the like day as hee was promoted vnto his place,

After the obsequies of Valette the Great Maister, they proceeded to elect a new successor, which was Petro de Mente, an Italian borne, and Priour of Capua. Immediately after his promotion to the Maisterhip, hee caused his predecessors bodie to be carried into the New Citty, and to bee honourably buried in the Chappell of our Lady of Victory, for he worthily deserved to be surnamed the Father of Souldiers, the Shield and Defender of the Catholicke faith, and the great persecutor or queller of proud Infidels. This new Great Maister, before he attained vnto so high degree, had made good prooffe of his wisdome and valour, in sundry other honourable and woorthy Offices. For hee was first, Patron of the Gally, which was Captain or Commander of the band. Next, Lieutenant Generall of the Gallies, Castillion or Gouvernor of the Castle. S. He came from Rome to Malta, when he was chosen Great Maister, and followed his charge so effectually, that the new Citty was finished, and thither hee purposed to transfer the dwelling of the Order. For the good Old man, thought it as great honour, to dwell in the New Citty, and make it habitable; as it was for his predecessor Valette to build it. He did expressely prohibit, that not any Knight, (nor the Great Maister himselfe) might particularly haue any ship on the Sea, to vse any Piracies for his owne profit. CHAP. IIII.

The severall Orders of Knight-hood, both Ecclesiastick and Secular, as they haue bene, and are yet honored in this Christian World.

Ecclesiasticall Orders.

Knights of S. Iames of Compostella.

IN the year, 1070. this Order of Knight-hood began in Spain, after that Ramirus had won the most famous victory, in the Prouince of Compostella, against the Moores.

At first, their number consisted but of thirteene, and it was lawfull for them to take wiues. There was a chiefe man chosen of this order, by the name of Great Maister; who (together with the other 12.) had power to elect other knights.

The badge or note of honour of this Knight-hood, was a Red Crosse, carying the forme of a downe pointed sword. At the Feast of All-Saints, was their meeting appointed, that they might confer about their affaires. Many years haue they continued, with many priuiledges, & scarcely any but they (called Augustines) holde any such lawes.

Knights of Saint Iohns of Ierusalem, who were afterwarde knights of the Rhodes, and at this day are called Knights of Malta.

IN the year, 1099. the Citty of Ierusalem being recovered against the impulsions of the Infidelles, by Godfrey of Bullen, Duke of Lorraine. About that verie time, a certaine Hospitall was erected by the Christians in Ierusalem, consecrated by the name of S. Iohn Baptist, for the entertainment of Pilgrims. Soone after, was this Order of Knight-hood instituted, and the first Rector or Ruler was called Gerrard, and the next after him, Raimond. These Knights wore a Blacke Garment, with a Crosse Argent, in a field Gules, vpon their breasts.

10 In the year, 1308. being enforced from their former abiding by the Turkes, and the Isle of Rhodes granted them by Pope Clement the fift: they were (in that regard) called Knights of Rhodes.

In the year, one thousand five hundred twenty three, Rhodes being wonne from them, Malta was afforded them; whereon to this day, they are called Knights of Malta.

1523.

20 The duty of this Knight-hoodes Order, was, to fight for the Christian faith, to releue the oppressed, to defend Widowes and Orphanes, &c. Nor was any one to be admitted into this Order, that was descended of a Moore, Jew, Mahometist, or any such ignoble race.

Knights Templers, or Knights of the Temple.

ANNO Dom. 1117. Godfredus Alde-marus Alexandrinus, and Hugo de Planco de Paganis (Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, and King of Ierusalem being dead, and Baldwine then rainging) this order of Knight-hood first began, and a seate was granted them in the temple of Ierusalem, whereuppon, they were called Knights Templers, or Knights of the Temple.

1117.

40 By entreaty of Stephen, Patriarch of Ierusalem, Pope Honorius brought in this Order, and confirmed their Society, giuing them a White Garment, whereunto Eugenius the third, added a red Crosse on the breast.

The charge of these Knights, was, to guide trauiailers on the way of Ierusalem, and to entertaine strangers.

50 Anno Domini, 1310. Clement the fift (who then held his See in France) by perswasion of Phillip King of France, gaue order for the vtter subuersion of this Knight-hoods Society, and all their Colledges, throughout our Christian Worlde, wheresoever they were builded: in regard of a most abominable trechery, by them intended and ratified.

1130.

Some after that Ierusalem was regayned from the Christians, one Teuto a Nobleman, and abounding in Riches, instituted this Society of Knight-hood, building an house (for their entertainment) at Ierusalem, called, Hospitium Virginis Mariæ.

Among this Order of Knight-hood, neither Knight of Malta, nor any other, except a Germain (and he likewise to be Noble by birth) could be receyued into their degree. Their garment was White, and a Blacke Crosse figured vpon their Breasts.

In the yeare, 1184. these Knights (the City of Ierusalem being surprized by the Sarrazins) Ptolomais was graunted them: but beeing likewise driuen from thence, they came into their Countrey of Germanie.

In the yeare, 1220. they intreated Fredericke the second, Emperour, that hee wold suffer the to take Arms against certaine fugitiue Idolaters in Prussia: who beeing by them subdued, they obtayned there a new seating, and their Dition or Lordshippe of Liunia was then added to them.

Calatranian Knights, or Knights of Calatrana.

In the yeare, 1130. this order of Knight-hood was instituted by Sanctio, King of Toledo, in imitation of the order of Saint James.

These Knights, tooke the name of Calatrana, which was a place graunted vnto them, where (in former times) had stood a Church, that belonged to the Knightes Templers: And when the Sarrazins were ouer-powerfull for them, those Knightes were constrained to surrender this place vnto them.

These Knightes did were a black Garment, with a red crosse vpon their breast, and were said to be of the Cisternian Order, holding in Spaine large possessions.

These Knightes, held their name of a City in Castile, called Alcantara, and were of the Cisternian order.

They had a goodly Temple neere to the Riuer Tagus, where they helde very ample possessions.

Their Ensigne or Badge was a Greene Crosse.

In Anno Dom. 1212. this order was instituted by James King of Arragon, who Conquered the Islands called Baleares or Maiorque and Minorque, in the Spanish Sea.

1212.

It was the Office of these Knightes, to redeeme captiues: whereupon, the Title of Redemption was giuen them: they wer also called Knightes of Mary.

20

These Knightes Order was confirmed by Gregory the ninth, Bishoppe of Rome. And they wore a white Garment with a blacke Crosse vpon it.

Knights of Montesia.

This order was instituted much about that very same time, as the Knightes of Calatrana were.

1150.

They deriued their name from Montesia, in Valentia, where was their place of abiding.

The Ensigne of these Knightes, was a red crosse.

Knights of the Holy Sepulcher.

These Knightes (who deriued their name of Christis Sepulcher) did weare two Red crosses. This order (at this day) is quite extinct, or (as some do imagine) the Order of the Knightes of Malta, is said to be somewhat neare it.

1219.

Knights of Christ.

50

In Anno Dom. 1320. this order was instituted by John the 20. Bishop of Rome. The place of these Knightes abiding, was in Portugal.

1320.

A Black Garment, & a double crosse, were the Ensignes of this Knight-hoodes order.

Knights of S. Mary, the Mother of Christ.

1261.

Certaine Noblemen of Bologna and Modena in Italy, being much troubled and and molested by perturbations among the Princes, desired of Vrbane the fourth Byshoppe of Rome, that they might be suffered to begin some kind of Societie. Whereupon, this Order was graunted them, to holde in free and peaceable manner.

A little red Crosse, reflected with Gold, they wore vpon their Breasts.

These Knights did weare costly Garments, and fared delicately: whervpon they were vulgarly cald by the Italians: Frati Gaudenti.

They might not weare any gilt Spurs, or vse any Gold on their Horses Furniture.

This Order was confirmed, or (as some will haue it) restored by Pius Quartus. And yet the Knights of this order (are said to be) in the times of Basilius, and Pope Damasus, when Iulian the Apostata raigned, & then they flourished, as some do affirme.

The Ensigne or Impresse of this Order, was a greene Crosse, worne on the left side of the breast.

A man twice married, might not be admitted into this Order.

Knights of the round Table.

The Secular Orders.

In Anno Domini 516. Arthur, a worthy and warlike King, raigning in the Isle of Brittaine, the Countrey beeing infested and troubled with Armies of Saxons, &c. was yet (by him) very valiantly supported, and his fame out-stretched to the remotest Regions. Afterward, when peace was established, that other knightly mindes might bee inflamed with the like glorie: this Order he instituted, which continued (with others) in long and honorable obseruation.

The Order of these Knights was (especially) in the City of Winchester, as some haue recorded; and their yearelie meeting was there, at the Feast of Pentecost, or Whisfontide.

In the yeare 1349. Edward the third, King of England, hauing had great victories against the French; and other neighbouring Nations, did institute this Order, and consecrated it to Saint George.

10 The King appointed a Garter to bee the Ensigne of this Order, wrought richly with Golde and precious stones, which should circle the leg beneath the knee, and on it to haue these words apparantly discerned:

HONI. SOIT. QUI. MAL. Y. PENSE.

The number of these Knightes, are twenty fixe, whereof the King himselfe is the chief.

The time of this Societies meeting, is the Feast of S. George, and celebrated at Windsore.

20 These Knights do weare the Ensigne of Saint George (fighting with a Dragon) fastned to a rich Chain or Collar, which weighed or valued, neither more or lesse, then eighty pounds of English Money (as hath beene saide) in former times. Their Garments is Purple, with a red Crosse.

Knights of the Starre.

Anno Dom. 1350. John King of France, being much moued with the glory of Edward the third, King of England; did institute this Order of Knighthood, entitling it by those 3. Magi, who (going from the East to honour Christ) were guided by a Starre.

1350

The Ensigne of this Order was a Star, set eminently in the Hat: and the words were Monstrant Regibus Astra Viam.

40

The founder of this Order, beeing much molested with the difficulties happening in warre; could not perfect what he had instituted. And therefore (within a short while after) this Order ceased.

Knights of the Band.

In the yeare 1367. this Order was instituted by Aphonsus King of Spaine, the Son of Ferdinand and Constance.

1367.

These Knights did wear a certain red scarffe or Band, of three fingers bredth, which ('like a Stoale') was fastened on the left Shoulder, and so came vnderneath derneath the right Arme, thwart the body.

Into this Order, younger borne Brethren onely (of Noble descent and Family) and none of the elder, might be admitted.

Many Articles (belonging to this Order, and to be obserued by these Knights) are at large set downe by Sansonina.

Knights of the Annunciation.

1409 A Nno Dom. 1409. Amades or Amadeus, as some write, the sixt, Sir-named the Greene Earle of Sauoy, deuised this Order, who were tearmed Knights of the Virgine Mary, and for this reason instituted: because Amades the first Earle of Sauoy (with wonderfull fortitude) defended Rhodes against the Turkish powers, in his memory it was thus celebrated.

A Chaine or Collar (such as Knights vse to weare, made of Gold and Siluer Plates, and fastned together with little Linkes) each Man had about his necke, with these Letters engrauen thereon, F. E. R. T. that is; Fortitudo eius Rhodu tenuit. Thereat hung also (by another small Chaine) the Picture of the Virgine Mary, with the Angels salutation.

Knights of the Golden Fleece.

1429. IN the yeare 1429. Phillip, Sir-named the good Duke of Burgundy, instituted this Order, and dedicated it vnto Saint James.

The number of these Knights were twenty four, whereof the Duke of Burgundy was the chiefe.

They vsed to weare the Picture of a Golden Sheepe, affixed to a Chaine, inter-wouen like flames of Fire.

Charles the warlike Duke of Burgundy (who also is said by euery one, to be the first Founder of this Order) added thereunto these words: Ante ferit, quam flamma micet.

But now at this day, the Knights haue these words:

PRETIUM NON VIDE LABORVM.

Knights of Saint Michaell.

1469 IN the yeare 1469. Lewes the eleuenth, King of France, instituted this Order at Amiens, and dedicated it to Saint Michaell.

The begining of this Society, consisted of a Band of Men, to the number of thirty sixe, the very cheefest and noblest Peeres of the Kingdome, being Knights cleere from all detection; and the very cheefe of them was the King himselfe.

10 At this day, there are a great number of these Knights, and the Kingdom of France is not now so respectiue in their election, as at the first.

20 These Knights weare a Chaine of Gold daily, wouen like little shels, valewing two hundred Crownes: And thereat hangeth the Picture of Saint Michaell, fighting with the Deuill, the words being these; Immensi tremor Oceani.

These Knights did vse to meet euerie yeare, at the Feast of Saint Michaell, in the Church of Saint Michaell on the Mount.

Their Garments by Henry the second, King of France, were appointed in very honourable manner, Knights of Saint Stephen.

30 IN the yeare 1561. this Order was instituted by Cosimo de Medices, Duke of Florence, and the same confirmed by Pius Quartus.

1561.

The Ensigne of these Knights, was a Red Crosse, worne on a blacke Garment.

40 The Statutes of this Order, doe not much differ from the of Malta Knights: and they were allowed to haue Viues.

The Duke of Florence, is alwaies the chiefe of this Order, and it is not to be censured by any of the religious degrees, but properly it dooth hold a freedom in liberty.

Knights of the Holy-Ghost.

50 IN the yeare 1578. Henry the third, King of France, instituted this Order, and named it of the Holy-Ghost: the memory whereof, was to be celebrated in the time of Pentecost: vpon which day, the King was borne, and succeeded also in the Kingdom. These Knights are an hundred in number, and the king himselfe is President.

1578

This

This Feast is celebrated yearely the first day of January, in the Augustines Church in Paris, by the Parisians.

The Ensigne of these Knights, is a Doue (in which forme the Holy-Ghost appeared) in midst of a Crosse.

The last or lowest degree of Knight-hood, is theirs, who (as reward of their Vertues) haue Golden Spurres put on their Heeles, and vulgarly are called Knights.

Concerning Knights Bannerets, who had that Title giuen them by the Kings of England in Warre, Knights of the Bath; And Baronets last of all deuised, they being also created by the Kings of that Kingdome: because they are of another Nature; I passe them ouer, without vsing any further speech of them.

CHAP. V.

Of a strange Custome (though scarcely commendable) used by the People, in the Kingdome of Cathay, for marriage of their Daughters, when they want means of Weaith and dowry.

Some Geographers doe place the Prouince of Cathay in Asia, and others in the higher India: but it matters not much to me, in what part focuer of the World it is situated; for I am not a little ashamed to read the manner of their daughters marriages, when they haue no means to bestow Dowries on them, which I finde to be thus related. Their Daughters hauing attained to the able yeares of marriage, and they wanting means whereby to aduance them: they bring them into a publike place, where making a noise; by beating two boards one against the other (which may bee heard almost as audibly, as the sound of a good Bell or Trumpet) the people thereupon asamble together. The appearance being made to generall liking; the Maid that then is in question of marriage, must be mounted on some Pillar or ascent of Stone, where best she may be seene: and there, by commaund of her Parents (hauing Garments made for the purpose) she vnaceth and openeth all her nakednesse backward, and so suffers her selfe to be seene for a long space before them. Hauing laced her Garments againe, shee makes the like shew of her naked fore-partes; hauing first taken away her hairy excrements, if of such there bee any: And then, whosoever best fancieth her, and shee him; they are allowed to be Man and Wife, provided that he haue means to cloath and keepe her.

For my selfe, I condemne this custome as sauage and brutish, and hold the Cathayans to be very grosse people; albeit, they both say and beleue, that the whole World (beside them) dooth see but with one eye, and they directlie with both. I confesse them to be of great spirit, in matter of Architecture, for (in all the World) are not to be seen more beautifull Temples, nor so richly elaborate Pallaces, Bridges, & other buildings, then in that Country. Neither can any where else be seene, more goodly fashions of silken Cloathes, fine Linnen Cloathes, Cloath of Golde or Siluer, workes of Gold-Smitherie, Painters, and other ingenious Artificers. People for knowledge in Phisick, the Mathematiques, and Astrologie, they are not to be equalled. But in matter of ciuillity and pollicy, I protest they vnderstand iust nothing: in regard they compell their Daughters to discouer those partes, which ought to be with care concealed, and brute Beastes themselues doe obserue it. I am of the minde, that they should do much more honestly (notwithstanding their Custome) when they would haue their daughters to become wiues; to be contented with sight of their naked armes & Breasts: for if those parts do appeare to good liking, the rest of the bodie must needs be answerable. In like manner, it would be more ciuill and commendable, to follow the Law of Licurgus, who prohibited any gifts or dowries to be giuen to Maidens: to the end, that poore Mens Daughters might speede as well as the Rich do, and not blush to be seene as well behinde as before.

Licurgus made another Law beside, that Maids should go to publike playes and daunces, starke naked, except little cut Buskins onely, which they wore on their Legges : and this he did for diuers reasons, whereof I will alledge some. The first was, because he noted, that many young Men were so enamoured of Maides and Women; that they became vtterly lost in iudgement, and forgot all man-hood, appearing rather to be brute Beasts, both in desire and heat, then any way endued with reason or government. Such immoderate Amourists, would euermore be present (he supposed) at such assemblies, their to behold their naked Goddeses, and seeing their vnfighly partes, so neere neighbouring to the receptacle of all vncleannesse and loathsome conuayance of the Bodie: they would distast and abhorre such slavish affection, and declare themselues of more manly carriage, and that such a wretched shape deserued no such torments, forbearance of Meate and Drinke, and many Night sleepes losses. Another reason was, that Maides should not bee ashamed of those partes which Nature had bestowed on them; but feare to commit any foule Act with them. For he vsed to say; that Maids and Women should blush rather to commit any sin, then to shew the necessary parts of their bodies.

Lycurgus his second reason

The follie of Maids and Women now adaies.

Women vsing to wear vnder breeches.

Aduise to the Maides and Women of Cathay.

There are some Maids and Women now a-daies, who (I think) are perswaded, that Men doe desire they should haue great and fat Thighes, as the Cathayans did; because, they labour to ground this perswasion in Men, by their spacious, huge, and round circling Verdingales. Moreover, they exceede the Cathayans, who onely were naked vnder their garments: but our Women can haue close Breeches or vnder-slops, not of meane matter; as of fine Linnen, Fustian, and such like; but of Sattin, Taffata, Veluet, Cloth of Gold and Siluer, though they openly shewe them not. For by our lawes, we hold and account them as infamous persons, that freelie, or without cause, doe shew such secrecy. Me thinks it were more seemly for those Cathayans, to were close breeches of such rich stufes, to adde thereby a grace and alluring to those parts, and so prouoke men the rather to seeke after them for mariage: then that they should be vsed by any Women among vs (in manner as I haue formerly said) not suffering them to be seen, much lesse to be toucht. I know not, whether they wear them for pride or profit, but this I am assured, that it hath giuen occasion to many men, to iudge strangely of such women, & to repute them scarce chaste.

Let vs then mooue a question; to wit, whether women doe attract and allure more Suiters and Followers, rather by their nakednesse, then when they are seemly cloathed? For my selfe, I couer not to determine any thing, except by plurality of opinions; yea, of Men of good iudgment, who haue bin in those Regions and Countries, where Men and Women do vsually go naked; as in many places of Affrica, almost throughout the Indiaes; the Land of the Caribes; and in all the Brasiliame Territories (containing more then sixe or seauen hundred leagues) in which Countries are more goodly Women, and better formed, then are among vs. For ye shall finde none there, either corrupt in body, crooked, lame, or otherwise deformed. And yet they neuer knew that cruell law of Lycurgus, King of the Lacedemonians, which was; that euey Infant, Male or Female, appearing in birth to be misshapen, was presently put to death.

All those Spaniards, Portugalles, French-men, Flemmings, and Englishmen, beside diuers others, that haue bene very conuersant in those partes, where the people goe daily naked, they haue affirmed: that such manner of going, is neither sightly nor pleasing, and that nothing makes a Woman to bee more dispised and contemned, then to behold her ordinarily naked. Wherefore I conclude, that the Cathayans are not to be imitated, that so freely discover their parts of shame, onely thereby to gaine Husbands; nor the Affricanes, Indians, Caribes, or Brasilians, who goe naked, not for ostentation, but by Custome, either in regard of the countries great heate, or by not being acquainted with the vse of Garments: but rather wee ought to cloath and conceale those partes, which Nature her selfe hath placed so farre off, both from the sight of our selues and others. As expressly is discerned by the wordes of our Sauour Iesus Christ, commending Charity about all thinges: in giuing meanes meanes to the poore, whereby to clothe them, not only for their defence against heate, cold, raine, stormes, and byting Flyes; but also to hide their partes of shame.

CHAP. VI.

Of a good Custome among the Locrenses, or Locrians, that he who would be the Authour or maker of any new Law (if it were not allowed for good and profitable) must presently be hanged.

Here were sometimes a people, commonly called Locrians, and the Metropolitane Citty, was tearmed Locris, or Locros, scituare in the Countrey of Greece, neere adioyning to Beotia. This people, while liued vertuously, and admitted no inno- uation among their Countrey Lawes, but carefully kept them of their Prede- cessors; their Common-weale conti- nually flourished, and neuer could they be ouer-awed by Tyrants, where with they were enuironed, and very much enuied, but rather made themselues much feared and admired.

And to preuent, that no man should be so bold, as to induce any nouell laws among them, whereby to vrge alterati- on of them so long embraced; they made an Edict, and thereby (according as Demoſthenes recordeth) ordained: That euery Cittizen, that sought to bring in any new kind of Law, must come with an Halter about his Necke, and deliuer his Law publikely before al the people; to the end, that if the New Law were not receiueable, and highlie profitable to the Common-wealth; he might presently bee hanged; as a con- digne recompence for his hasty for- wardnesse.

In all well instituted Societies (saith Aristotle) and by Lawes well ordained, it behoneth to vse very diligent regard, not to diminish or change any thing; (how little soeuer it be) of the Lawes; and warily to fore-see matters, that (by little and litle) may intrude themselues. For if (then) resistance bee not vsed, it will fall out as in a dilease of the body, whereto, if at the beginning of the sick- nesse, prompt remedy be not appli- ed: the dilease so increaseth by flow de- grees; that that which (at first) might easily haue bene holpen, becommeth (by negligence) quite incurable.

The first signe to be obserued in an Estate, tottering towardes ruine, is, when we behold vnbrideled liberty, and facility in dispencing with good ordinā- ces; nothing being daily more listened vnto, then flying nouelties, tales, and rumours: because Law is a singuler rea- son, imprinted and stamped in Nature, commanding thinges which ought to be done, and prohibiting the contrarie.

The Ethnicks were much more consci- entious in keeping their Lawes, then Christians; for, if we would looké into many Lawes of the Emperours and Christian Kinges: we should finde no meane store of Nouell Lawes; forged in fauour of some one; and them of more Antiquitie, to be either quite cut off, or much modified. Following the opinion of Machiauell, who hath lest written: That a Prince may make laws, contrary to them of auncient standing, prouided, they be for his owne profit.

It was demaunded of Archidamus, Sonne to Zeuxidamus, King of the Lace- demonians, what were they that presided and commaunded in the Citty of Spar- ta? He made aunswere, that they were the Lawes. Surely, his reply was to good purpose, for in a well governed Common-wealth, chiefe authoritie is to be referred to the Lawes: for it is not permitted to any Magistrate, either to attempt against, or decline from the Lawes. Another, named Pausanias, and likewise King of Sparta, beeing asked; whether it were any great offence, to swerue from the auncient Lawes, and leane to them new made; replied, that it was a very great crime. For (quoth he) it behooueth that Lawes should haue authoritie among men, and not men among Lawes.

Chilo, one of the Wise-men of Greece said: That all Men were bound to obey the Lawes, and Princes themselues ought not to be exempted from them. Craesus, King of Lydia, demaunded of Pisacus the Mitilenian; Where was the best and chee- fest Government, who answered. It is in that that place, where the Lawes haue Soueraign authority; for there Tyranny (how little soeuer) could gaine no admittance. Agislaus, King of the Lacedemonians, said; That the multitude of Lawes, resembled the multitude of Phisitians, who, where they abounded, the like abounding of Diseases was found. In like manner, Where were plenty of Lawes, there likewise was the greater store of Vices.

Heraclitus the Ephesian, said: A Man of Honour ought (no iot lesse) to hazard his life for the Lawes, then for the Walles of his Country: Because (quoth he) a Cittie may subsist without Walles, but not without Lawes. At this day, Lawes seeme to litle purpose in France; for the good haue no need of them, and the wicked or vicious care not for keeping any one of them. By the precedent discourse, and sententious sayings of many worthy men, it plainly appeareth, that for the best conseruation of any Common weale, and to keep it in continuall flourishing; the ancient lawes ought strictly to be obserued, and no easie admittance of any new, because it giues way to euill disposed persons first to decline from them, and then (afterward) to trouble the quiet of the State.

CHAP. VII.

Of the strange life of Diogenes, the Cynick Philosopher; with a breefe repetition of some of his witty sayings, propositions, and answeres.

Five seuerall Men named Diogenes.

Finde among good and credible Authors, that there were five seuerall Men, all of them bearing the name of Diogenes, and each of them, both for his vertue & singuler learning, wel deserued report to posterity. Howbeit, omitting all the rest, our present purpose is, to speake onely of Diogenes, the Cynick Philosopher; whose learning, life, and rare qualities, though they seemed strange and vnimitable, yet their foundation was vertue and goodnesse. He liued continually in voluntary pouerty, exposing his body to all toil and trauaile. In Summer, his lodging was on the Sand, in the sight and heate of the Sun; to arme him with patience against violent warmths. In Winter, he would embrace huge Statues of Snow and Ice, for better inuring himselfe to the extreimity of cold. His feeding was on grosse Viands, and none of the best neither; to the end, he might neuer perish for want of sustenance. He neuer had any certaine place, where hee might determine his absolute abiding: but wheresoeuer hee came and stayed; there he fed, drank, and slept. He would neuer speake, except cause required, and looke what Garment he wore all the day, the same was his Couerlet likewise all the night season. He had a certaine Scrip or Waller, wherein he kept all his Victuals together; and a Staffe, which serued him as his Horse, when he felt himselfe sickely or weary. A Woodden Dish was his Cup to drinke in; wheresoeuer he trauailed: but, beholding a Boy (one day) drinke Water in his hand, he brake his Dish in peeces, saying; Why should Art finde me a Vessell to drinke in, when Nature hath bestowed one much better on me? The like did he by a Woodden Trencher; seeing another Man make vse of one made of bread, and did eate it afterward, to piece out his dinner.

The life of Diogenes in wil-

This Philosopher spent the most part of his dayes in Athens, which hee had made his retirement, being banished from his owne Gountrey. A Tun or great Tub (open at the one end) a long time was his House and dwelling; all things else being contemptible to him, but Vertue onely, and great was his feare to commit any sin. As for riches and honour, he counted them as nothing; but helde them in like slight regard, as he did them that enioyed them. It was an vsual saying with him, that he did not a little admire Mens vanity, in quarrelling and killing one another, for Dignity on the way, or taking the wall: neuer beholding any contention in them, who should excell each other in vertue. A rich ignorant or vnlearned Man, he alwaies compared to a golden Sheep; that had a goodly fleece, but no goodnesse else. And when he demaunded any thing that was needful for him, he said, he did it not in begging maner, but

but as asking due restitution; for that the goods of rich men, were properlie gathered to be the poores inheritance, because they wer gathered of the poor.

He had a certaine behaiour, which (in outwad apparance) seemed to sauor of folly, and yet it had a misterious and concealed vnderstanding. Many times he would resort to Images and Statues of stone or wood, and make an humble request for an almes; as if he had spoken an liuing persons, & his reason was: that heereby hee learned patient sufferance, because men would as to one deny poor men charity, as those dumb Images did when he desired an Almes, he made no exception of persons, but vsed these words. If thou vse to giue any charity to the poor, the let not me passe without somewhat; for I am the neediest of all other. But if (as yet) thou hast neuer giuen to any man, begin with me, and it will teach thee how to bestow on others. Comming (on a time) into a certaine mans house, who sometimes had beene wealthy, but his estate was now very poore: he found, that he had nothing to sup withall, but a poore Sallet of sower hearbs; whereupon, he said to him. Had thy former diet beene: no better, thou hadst beene sure now of a better supper. Whereby he gaue him to vnderstand, that his riotous and lauish wast before, made him now to vse necessitie as a vertue. Being demaunded at an other time; what biting of any Beast was most dangerous? He answered. Among wilde beasts, the slanderer and backe-biter: & among the tamer sort, the flatterer. One asked of him; for what cause Gold looked so pale and wan complexioned? Because (quoth he) all men (like Theeues) lie in waite to surprize it. Another man asked him, if he wanted a Seruant; and he told him no. Who shall then bury thee (quoth the other) when thou art dead? Many he (said Diogenes) that will dwell in my house. Some were desirous to know of him, when was the fittest time for marriage; and he replied: Young Men may marry at all times, for leasurable repentance; but old men may tarry, for little is their need; inferring thereby, that marriage (in neither age) required ouermuch hastinelle.

Thus, as Diogenes was free both in life and behaiour, so was he likewise in any words passing from him. For, as on a day he went thorow a street, and beheld a goodly house, belonging to a Lord of very dishonorable life; looking thereon more aduisedly, hee perceined (in faire Carracters) engrauen ouer the Gate, these words: No dishonest person hath here any entrance. Turning himselfe suddenly about, to such as then passed by him; he said: If this Inscription be true, which way doth the Lord and Maister enter into his owne house? Not long after, traouailing into the Country, he came (by chance) to a little Village, altogether as poore, as fillily peopled: yet the gates thereof were extraordinarily great & spacious, whereat, falling into a loude laughter, he said. Be wise ye Inhabitants, and shut up your wide Gates betimes, or else all your Towne will run out by their means. He chanced to passe by a company of Archers shooting in Crosse-bows, among whom there was one very meanly practised, for fill he shot faire and farre off from the marke; which when Diogenes noted, euer as that man shot, he would enter in; and stand directly before the But, and beeing demaunded why he did so? He answered. Heere is my safest standing; when this man shooteth, for here (I am sure) he meanes not to hit me. Looking on a young Lad, very well proportioned of body, but wicked in qualities: Alas my Boy (quoth he) why dost thou carry so bad a sword, in so seemely a Scabberd?

There were diuers, who commended a man that had giuen a smal gift to Diogenes, to whom he said: Why do ye not much rather commend me, that deserued it, before he had the wit to giue it? Vnderstanding thereby; that it is better to deserue a fauour, then to performe it vpon due desert. He neuer vsed to aske Money, as a gift from any man, yet (contrary to his custome) he once required a great sum of Money of a prodigall Companion; who being offended thereat, saide: Why dost thou vrge me in such an vnreasonable request? Whereto he answered: I aske of other men reasonably; as hoping often to speed with them: but my demand is thus liberall to thee, because I intend to moue thee no more; taxing (heereby) his immeasurable expences. Whence procedes it (quoth one vnto him) that men more gladly giue their Almes to the Lame, Blinde, Gouty, diseased and disreembred; then to Philosophers and Men of learning? Diogenes was the Scholler to Antisthenes.

For Astrologers.

For Musitions

For Logicians

Alexander the Great visiteth Diogenes, and their conference together

Diogenes taken by Pirats, and sold a Bond-slave.

He was very iudicious, discreet, and deeply learned in al the Sciences; for he was Scholler to Antisthenes, in the life time of Plato and Aristotle, and dispised all Arts that were vnprofitable, & them that studied them, more for curious knowledge, then the exercise of vertue. He reprooued Astrologers, that gazed on the heauens, and regarded not what they held in their hands. He would tell Musitions, that they could better tune their Instruments, then temper their owne disordered affections. When he heard an Astronomer argue skilfully of the Stars, he demanded of him; When he came last out of heauen? To a Logitian, that (by Sophisticall Arguments) laboured to disproue all motion; he scorned to make him any other answer, but walking vp and downe before him, saide. What, is this motion, or no? The renoune of this Philosopher did extend it selfe so largely through the world, that Alexander the great comming to Athens; desired to see and confer with him, of diuers matters concerning vertue. At length, Alexander said vnto him. I perceiue Diogenes, that thou art poore, and standest in need of many things: wherefore, demaund what thou wouldst haue, and I will giue it thee. To whom Diogenes replied. Which of vs two dost thou thinke is in most necessity? Either I, who desire nothing but my woodden dish to drinke in, and the least morsell of bread: or thou, that art king of Macedon, and yet exposest thy life to multitudes of perils, onely for further extent of thine Empire, insomuch, as the whole world sufficeth not thine auarice?

Diogenes on a time, was surprized by certain Athenian Pirats, yet his hart and speech neuer faild him in prison, but being brought to a place, where he should bee sold to him that offered most for him: a Merchant comming thither, demaunded of the Trumpeter, who had the charge to sell him, by what authority he exposed him to sale, and whether he were a bond man or no? Wherupon Diogenes said to the Trumpeter: Tel this man, that thou wilt sell him a Seruant, that knoweth how to commaund and gouerne his Maister. Aulus Gellius and Macrobius doe affirme, that he made this answer to Geniades, who was the man that bought him, and brought him to his Inne; Diogenes said to his new Maister. Take heede Geniades, for now it stands thee vpon, to be obedient to whatsoeuer I shall counsell or command thee. Whereto Geniades replied, that it were against all reason, for the Seruant to commaund his Maister. Diogenes answered. *If a sick man do chance to buy a wise skilfull Phisition: shall not hee doe well to obey, and follow his counsell? In like manner, if an vntutored Mariner (for his safer conduct) happen to buy a cunning Pilot, will not his passage be the freer from perill? If this appeare to be profitable, in cases of sicke and bodily infirmity, or preservation of life from infinite dangers: how much more then is his merit, that knowes how to order and direct the Soule, being respected but as a wise and vnderstanding Philosopher? All these sayings were well obserued by Geniades, for hee vsed the aduise of Diogenes in all his businesse, and made him Maister of his Children, to their no little benefit and aduancement. In this manner; and with such exercises, Diogenes liued the space of ninety years.*

Some hold opinion, that he died by the byting of a Dog. But others doe affirme, that when he saw himselfe to be old and feeble, without strength, or any longer desire of life: containing still the same constancy and courage wherein he had formerly liued: he caused his owne death, the very same day that Alexander the Great dyed. A little before he yeilded vp the Ghost, his Schollers perceiuing him so neere his end, desired to know, where he intended to be buried? He replied, that hee would haue them leaue him in the open fieldes vnburied. They maruailing hereat, told him, that therein he was not well aduised, because, beeing left in that manner; the Birdes and Beastes would feede vpon him. Why then (quoth he) lay my staffe by me, and I will keepe the Birdes and Beastes from comming neere me. At this answer they fell a laughing, saying; it were in vaine to do so, because the dead do neyther see nor feele. Why then (quoth he) trouble

CHAP. VIII.

Of diuers and variable Natures in Men, beyond vsuall and naturall inclination, and whence the occasions doe proceede.

He diuersity of complexions, and inclinations in Men, is a matter very mar-uailous, and greatly to be considered; for among so many as we doe daily behold, there are very few, or scarcely any to bee found, that are conformable in Nature one to another. You shall see some one man, that cannot abide some one kinde of meat; And others say, that there is no tast or rellish in their meat. Some will say, that they cannot feede well, but in company; And others, doe take no delight in their food, except they do eate it alone by themselues. All which variety of accidents, doe plainly testifie the great power of God, and of his vncircumscribed wisdome; who pleased to send such strange kinde of complexions, among so great a multitude of men. For let vs admit the case, that man had still enioyed the benefit of his owne free-will; yet it is most euident, that diuers dispositions & actions, variable promp-titudes, complexions, and conditions, (next vnto the will of God) are occasioned by influences of the Stars and Planets, as second causes and instruments, wherewith God is serued, because they haue a working in inferior bodies. And in regard, that among such an infinite multitude of men, there are som things more notable and apparant, then freequent or common: we will make some short discourse of them, according as they are set down and iustified by good and approved Authours.

Seneca writeth of a Man named Se-necius, who was very rich, but of strange and extraordinary condition: for all things that he would haue to doe him seruice, must be of excessiue greatnesse, or else he could not endure them. The Cuppes and Glasse wherein he vted to drinke, hee bought them of such hugenesse, as hardly could he lift them with both his hands. He sought to haue Horses for his riding, of monstrous stature; and that which was much more ridiculous, hee would weare shooes, which were foure or fve times bigger then his feet. He alwaies vsed to goe very fast in the streetes, and still on tip-toe, as we tearme it; to seeme more great & high, then he was by nature. He could neuer abide Women of low stature; but coueted and fancied such as were hugely big and taule. He would neuer eate Figges, Oliues, Pease, Chiches, or such like small Fruites; for he contained the same affection in all other things His garments were so long, that they trailed after him in the streets;

the like he did both at bed and boord: so that vpon this immeasurable appetite, he was commonly cald, Senecius the great.
*Pliny writeth of Marcus Crassus, Grandfather to the other Marcus Crassus the Triumuir, that was slaine by the Parthians: and he tearmeth him Agelastus, because he was neuer seene to smile or laugh. We read of Socrates; that he was neuer beheld more pleasant or melan-cholly, at one time, then at another.
And Pomponius the Poet, who neuer belched or brake wind vward or down ward. Marke Anthony neuer vsed to spit at any time. It is a matter against Nature, which the learned Pontanus writes of himself; that he neuer felt any stich, pricking, or ach in his bodie: albeit, he would sometimes wilfully fall on the ground, and yet notwithstanding, hee could feele no paine. In the same place, which is in his book of heavenly things, he speaketh of another man, who neuer in all his life time, did drink either wine or water. But Ladislaus, King of Naples; once compelled him to drinke, and it much endangered his life. I know not if that bee more admirable, which Theophrastus writes, of a man named Peninus; that in his whole life time, did neither eate or drinke any thing else but water.
*Aristotle speaketh of a certaine Maiden; who being in her infancy nourished with poyson: could as well digest it all her life time after, euen as we doe our naturall food. Albertus Magnus giueth credible assurance, that hee saw at Cullen

S. Augustine declareth, that he saw a man in his time, who could moue his eares like as a horse doth, one while the one, and afterward the other, and then again both of them together: howbeit, Aristotle maintaineth, that man onelic (among all other Creatures) cannot stir or moue his eares. He saith moreouer, that without stirring his head, or touching it with his handes; hee could raise or lift vp al the haire on his head, and make them fall flat vpon his face: afterward, he could likewise raise them againe, and return them orderly to their due places, which (questionlesse) was very strange, and argued admirable dexterity. He further declareth, that he saw diuers men, which could counterfeit the notes and singing of Birds; so naturally (and with such perfection) with their mouths, that very Birds were beguiled by them; witnesse a Moderne and late Vicount. He tels of one beside, that had a strange kinde of cunning (though discommendable and beastly) in breaking winde so readily below, and with such variety of sound; as if hee had sung to some musicke. In breece, we read of infinite things, quite contrary to common vse; both concerning the senses of hearing and sight, as in legerity of race.

Amistis and Phionides, swift runners.

Quint Curt in Hist. Alexand

Solinus and Pliny do both testifie of a man named Strabo, who in the time of the Punick war, could (from one of the Promontories of Scicilie) discern the Shippes setting forth from the Port of Carthage in Affrica, and count them one by one; albeit, the distance was more then fise and fiftie leagues. They speake also of Amistis, the Lacedemonian, opposing himselfe to Phionides (who was nourfed and brought vp with Alexander the Great) auouching, that they did runne aboue a thousand and two hundred stades, which are more then an hundred and threescore thousand paces. They adde moreouer, that a Page or Lacky of the age of nine yeares, did runne (from mid-day to night) the full distatice of seuenty and fise thousand paces: Quintus Curtius, in the History of Alexander, speaketh of a Man named Phillip, who was Brother to Lyssimachus;

he being armed, did follow Alexander, (riding in great hast) on foot, without any stay or breathing (as we vse to say) the space of two hundred stades, which containe foure and twenty miles in Geometry. Plato writeth of Socrates, that no man liuing could endure so much trauaile and paines as he; yet would he neuer rest, although he might do it. Beside, such hunger and thirst, (as was able to kil any other man) he could abide without any annoiance, oftentimes following the wars daily, without any wearinesse or debility. When he had abundance of victuals, he would eat no more then at any other time. In times of greatest frosts and colds, when no other men durst be seen out of their tents and dwellinges, except they were well wrapt in Furs: Socrates would walke abroad in no other garment, then that he wore in Summer, and go barefooted in the Ices and Snowes, distasting it no more, then they that were best hosed & shod. One while he wold stand a whole daies space vpright on his feet, without mouing or stirring out of the same place: then would he (afterward) walke all the whole night, without any signe or shew of desiring sleepe.

Pliny maketh mention of a certaine man, whose sight was so excellent, and his hand so ready; that he wrote all the Iliades of Homer, in the compasse of so much Paper, as he could very easily enclose within a Nut shell. The same Pliny (warranted also by Solinus) maketh report of one called Callicrates, who was such an ingenious Sculpture and Caruer; that he could make Flies and Ants in Iuory, so small, and yet so absolutely perfect, that it behoored such as would see them, to haue a very cleare sight.

It is a matter very meruailous, concerning both good and euill properties or qualities in diuers people. For, it is most notorious, that ther are both men and women in many places, whose eies are very venomous, and by looking intentiuely vpon a thing: the very acuitie or piercing subtilty of the sight, doth (in the meane while) both infect, and performe apparant harme, and when it is done on children, it is cald, bewitching by the eye. Solinus and Pliny do affirme, that there was Family in Affrica, who had the priuiledge, that if (in anger) they looked looked vpon any Fielde or Meddow: it dried vp immediatly; the like they did to Trees, and were the death of many Infants. In Scythia also there were Women of the same quality. Our auncient Phisitions haue experimented, & some (of latter times) doe confesse, that there are men in the world, of very venomous Nature; not onely by their sight, but likewise by their spittle. The blood of a red and freckled Man (if it be taken from him while he is enraged) is very venomous: yet God hath giuen the benefit to some men, by their spittle, to heale the byting of a mad Dogge, though others (thereby) can doe great iniury. These properties are to be known in cases of lesser efficacy. For it is most certaine, that let some man kill any Foule, they will suddenly fall into such putrefaction; as hardly any stomach can endure to feed on them. Againe, let such a party salt any meat; the flesh cannot possibly receiue the salt, but corrupteth presently, and yet the like (as hath been tried) could not be done by another body.

Pliny further auoucheth, that (in his time) there was a Kinred or Linage of people neere Rome, the men whereof, would go thorow any fire, without the least scorching. There was also another Family, who were called Marses; and they could heale the biting of Serpents, onely by the touch of their handes, as is approoued by many good Authours. These things are to be credited, especially when Pliny affirmeth any matter for certain; then boldly may faith be giuen to his wordes: though many times hee speaketh of things, which may seeme to deserue little beleefe. But then it is to be noted, that he neuer maintaineth any thing, as by heare-say from others; but onely such as himselfe hath scene or experimented.

That which Suetonius writeth of the Emperour Tiberius, is also very admirable, for he saith; that when hee rose in the night, although he was in neuer so obscure a place, and without any light: yet could he see (for a long while continuance) as persfily, as if a lighted Candle had stood by him, yet, soone after, he could not discern any thing. Quintus Curtius, and many other Authours say the same; that when Alexander the Great was in any sweate, it yeilded (of it selfe) a most sweete and pleasant fauour.

Many more haue written of sundrie men, priuiledged by very strange & no common qualities: but because in such arguments as these, I haue affected and aymed at breuity, I need wander no further in this discourse. For I perswade my selfe, that a sufficient view may be had of Mens strange complexions, by these alledged examples, deriued from true testimonies, and ancient Historiographers worthy of credit: not warranted by Poets or Fancists, from whom I make no account to fetch any verity. Let Virgill tell the World, the Legiere promptitude of Canilla*, Queen of the Volsians; Catullus brag of Achilles; Quid, of Atalanta; Statius, of Fidena; Sidonius, of Olphetus the Mariner; Higinus, of Orrion the Sonne of Neptune; and Claudian, of Lycaste; with many other of like matters: I onely cleaue to soundest authority, such, as (by the best iudgements) haue beene, and are still held for credible.

Of the great and large extendure of the Romaine Empire: Also, how, and in what time it began to decline and waxe feeble.

It is most apparant, that not any other consideration, can deliuer more certaine & intire knowledge, concerning the instability of worldly occasions; then that of the great and large extendure, which sometime belonged to the Romaine Empire, comparing it with that small portion, which the Emperours of Rome haue since then enioyed. For, in ancient & elder times, the most part of that, which is contayned and inhabited in Europe and Affrica, was subiect to the Romaine Empire, and likewise a great part of Asia. There to was subiected France, Spaine, England, Germanie, withall the Prouinces of Italie, and the Mediterranean Islandes: All Greece, Thrace, Hungaria, Polonia, Dacia, and as wee haue alreadie said, the very greatest part of Affrica, Mauritania, nia, Numidia, Carthage, Lybia; and (beside great store of Realms and Prouinces) Aegypt, and all her Confines. In Asia, Arabia, Siria, Iudea, Palestine; and Mesopotamia, they went through with their powers, and extended their dominion; euen to the famous Riuers Tigris and Euphrates: which happened in the time of the Emperor Traiane, who stretched his limits so far as the East Indiaes, conquering the Citties of Seleucia, Ctesiphonta, and Babylon, making Prouinces also of Armenia and Albania. In former daies, they had all the lesser Asia, Pontus, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Galatia, Bithinia, Cappadocia, and so many other Regions; as I know not when I should make an end, if I were to name them particularly. All which goodly length, and large scope, became restrained (through the pusillanimity of some Emperours) into one onely and little part of Allemagne or Germany, and Italy: wherefore we will declare how, in what manner, and when this huge Empire began to diminish.

The Empire restrained into a small part of Germany and Italy.

The principall and most notable wound, which the Romaine Empire receiued, and the very originall of her ruine; proceeded from the Gothes, a people greatly renoued in Armes, descended from the Northerne Scythia, to destroy and ruiuate al the rest of the world beside. But to deliuer the matter in due forme, I must make a backe retreat for a while, to recite breiefely the whole History. For I would amply describe, how many times the Gothes haue molested and affronted this Empire; how many Prouinces they destroyed; and how often they were repulsed; what victories they obtained, and yet were also vanquished by the Emperors and Romaine Captaines. But the discourse would be ouer long, and therefore it shal content me, to keep the same course we haue already continued, with breuitie and best order to please the Readers.

The Empires first wound grew from the Gothes.

To auoide confusion of opinions, I will forbear to dispute, from what part of Scythia they descended; or making declaration, which were they that named themselues Ostrogoths, and others Vuisgoths; because heerein is no difference, but that the Ostrogoths liued more towards the East. To conclude this point, they were all Gothes, and so will I name them, without any other note or difference among them. Passing ouer many things, that neede no repetition; Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that in the time of the Emperour Domitian, the Gothes enterprized to make war on the Romaine Empire. And, in some short while after, the Emperor Traiane took truce and peace with them; hauing first receiued assurance from them (vpon great promises) that they shold abide at home in their Countries quietly in peace, and so they continued for the space of ninety yeares. But this time being expired, they began to rise againe, and make another entrance vpon the Empires lands: against which attempt, the Emperor Antoninus made opposition, and vanquished them. Twenty years after, they became incensed againe, and assayed to passe the Riuer Danubius; wherein they were hindred by the Emperour Gordianus. Ten yeares after, being aduertised of his death, and in the time of the Emperor Phillip; they leuied an Army of three hundred thousand men, and subdued the Countries of Thrace and Misia, without any abilitie of resistance. Made proud with these victories, long time after the death of Phillip; they renewed warre againe, in the raigne of Decius his successor, and entering by the Country of Rome, Decius (in good equipage) got before them, and gaue them battaile. In which resistance (after cruell effusion of blood) the Romaines lost the day; and there remained Decius, who neuer after was seene, eithers aliue or dead, and there likewise died his Sonne.

The Emperor Antoninus vanquished the Gothes.

The Gothes army of 300000 men.

The Romaines conquered by the Gothes.

The Gothes conquered Thrace, Macedon, &c.

Afterward, all the Successors (well neere) of Decius, did euermore carrie themselues weakly in their wars against them: so that, in the time of the Emperor Valerian (who was conquered by Sapor King of Persia) the Goths made themselues Maisters of Thrace and Macedon, and also of Bythinia and Nicomedia in Asia, yet were they valiantly fought withall, and discomfited in Achaya, by Macrinus. Matters proceeding in this manner, when Claudius (second Emperor of that name) came to succede in the Empire; he gaue them battell, euen one of the most cruell and deadly, that any Histories doe make mention of. For it is most certaine, that three hundred thouthousand Gothes perished in this fight. The rest that remained, the Emperour was victorious ouer, and expelled them out of those Countries which they had formerly gayned: Moreouer, he surprized such an huge number of them, that there was not one house in the Empire, but it had a Goth Slaue in it. Their so often restauration, and re-assembling in warre, after so many ouerthrowes was receyued by diuers Emperours, was an euident Testimony of their great multitude and power: for continually (after such great destructions) they would returne a fresh in armes to the field, euen as if they had sustained no losse at all.

It happened within a while after, that the Emperour Emilianus bad them battell in his owne person, wherein was slain their King Carobius, with fiftie thousand Gothes beside, that stroue to renewe the warre again; so that (then) they seemed as vtterly ruinated. But growing to bee re-peopled, in the reuolution of 30. yeares: they mustred infinit troopes together, to bee reuenged of their passed harde fortunes; and being an army of mightie power, possessed themselues of Sarmatia. By meanes whereof, the Emperour Constantine the Great (who was gone to Constantinople, purposing there to keepe his Imperiall seat) made head against them, so foyling and killing them; that the Gothes weary of vanquishing, and beeing vanquished) desired truce of Constantine, and afterware peace, and did him seruice in war, against Lycinius, as formerly they had done the like to the Emperour Maximianus, against the Parthians. In this manner, by many Confederacies & Friendships with the Romans, they receiued warwages of them, because they were reputed very valiant and warlicke Souldiours: Since which last rout or ouerthrow, they liued quietly for more then threescore yeares, in Scythia, whence they first parted: and now they became to be no more feared, because they seemed as vtterlie bruised with their passed Trauailles; and therefore, were verie gladd to liue in quiet.

The foresaid time was no sooner ended, but it fortun'd, that another people, called Hunnes (who were likewise of Scythia, and neere neighbouring to the Rhiphean Mountaines) warring with great spleene and hatred against them; & scor-

ning that they should inhabite so neare them: became Conquerors of them, and (proouing the stronger side) chased the Gothes out of their Countries. They perceiuing their great number, and yet to be thus violently expulsed (being compelled by meere necessity) did send their Ambassadors to the Emperour Valens, intreating him, that he would giue them some Country to liue in; and (as his Vassailes) they would obey him. Whereto the Emperour condescended; and suffering them to passe Danubie; gaue them the Country of Misia, according as Crosius Writeth; where they held and liued in peace, vntill two Captaines belonging to the Emperour Valens, named Maximus and Lycinius (who had parted and deuided the places of their abiding, and kept there as a Guard for the Countrey) vsed them badly, tyrannically robbing them, and (thorough extreame Auarice) compelling them almost to vtter famishment.

Heereuppon, they were enforced to enter Armes, and to vse by force, that which by loue and fair meanes was denied them. So passing on further then their limitation, they entered Thrace, destroying, robbing the Country, burning and wasting the Citties and Townes al along as they went. Against this impetuositie and violence, the Emperour Valens opposed himselfe, presenting them battaile, wherein he was vanquished; and beeing wounded with a Dart, was faine to flie and saue himselfe in a Village house, vwhere the Gothes (being Victours) put fire to it; and burned him therein. Pursuing their fortunate successe, they besieged the City of Constantinople, which was worthilie defended by Dominica, Wife to the Emperour Valens.

Gratian, Nephew to the Emperour Valens, succeeded the Empire, during whose raigne, the Gothes (glorying in such a victory) assailed the Romaine Empire; and made warre in so many places thereof, that it was in great daunger to bee lost: Which Gratian perceiuing, as also the danger and distresse hee was in (hearing the great renowne of Theodosius, born in Spain; a very valiant man both in peace and warre) he elected him as his companion in administration of the Empire, creating him Captaine, to controule the pride and fury of the Gothes. Theodosius vanquished the Goths, and made them tributarie to the Romaine Empire.

Romes Empire decayed, after the death of Theodosius.

Trian, who seeing himselfe to grow Olde, & the Empire fall into much decadence, made choise of good Traian (borne also in the same Cittie of Spaine) who (by his wisdom and valour) not only defended the Empire, but likewise augmented it, in large extendure of Lands and Riches, more then any other did. In this maner, Gracian chose Theodosius (whom manie reputed neere Kinsman to Traian) and he became so worthy a Captaine, and afterward so wise an Emperour, that he hadde many victories against the Goths, of whō hee slaughtered so great a number: that he compelled them to begge peace, and yeild themselves tributary to the Romaine Empire, bereaving them of all that they formerly vsurped, and abated thē in such sort, that (all his life time) they were peaceable subiects to him, and tooke prestemony of him, to serue in his wars; beside, they had neither king nor Captain (while hee raigned) but such as hee allowed them.

So remained the Empire of Rome in peace, and restored (by him) to her first authority, albeit it was not accomplished without much trauaile, and great aduerture of his person. But after the death of Theodosius, this great Dominion turned topsie turuy (as we shall relate) although it was daily augmented so much in 1100. yeares. After which time, it fell into such decadence, as neuer (since then) could it be releued: except by the Nouell recidiuation, which it had by Mahomet, and reduced it into the same poverity, wherein the greatnesse thereof first tooke Originall.

CHAP. X.

The History of the Romaine Empire, further prosecuted, with the successe of the Gothes, and their surprizall of Rome.

Deuision of the Empire.

Theodosius dying, leste two Sonnes, the one named Honorius, and the other Arcadius, with one daughter called Placida; betweene whome, he deuided his Empire. Now, because they were verie young, and vncapable of gouernment, hee left them two notable Tutors; the one, called Ruffinus, the other Stellico: Ruffinus, for the Countries in the East, and Stellico for Italy and the West. This Stellico was a verie worthy Captaine, wise, and prouident; and the other (being euery way as valiant) pursued high and famous enterprizes. Wherevpon, enuy and ambitious thirst of rule, got footing between them; and they perceiving the Princes to be ouer yong, applied their seueral practises vpon the Empire; Ruffinus for himself, but Stellico for his Sonne. Now, because this could not be easily compassed, in regarde that the people of the Empire bare affection vnto the sonnes of Theodosius, remembering the Vertues and goodnes of their father: these climbing spirites (in the conuertest manner they could deuise) both desired and sought all meanes, whereby to throw Warre and distresse vpon the Empire. For they being men of great imploiment might thereby continually command, & preferue their awfull authority ouer the people.

Moreouer, by such election as might be made of them (as formerly had bene done of Consulles and Captaines) they might (as occasions gaue way) entermiddle in the gouernment of the Empire.

The first of them that made discoverie of his intent, was Ruffinus; for hauing (by some quiet means) prouoked strangers to make warre; and he being elected Captaine or Chiefe Commander, assayed to haue himselfe named Emperour; wherein failing, for this presumption he was put to death by the apointment of Honorius, who (by this time) was growne to pretty stature. Stellico, who was much more ingenious, and better knewe how to play with time, hauing ioyned Arcadius in marriage with one of his daughters: forestalled (thereby) all suspition of any badde thought in him. Yet notwithstanding, seeking all apt waies to compass his enterprize, he secretly sollicitated the Goths, the Vandals, the Hannes, and other barbarous Nations, to rise against the Empire, assaying them himselfe sometimes, and meerey prouoking them to Warre. Besides, hee sent Messengers to them, to giue them hope, that they might easlye conquer diuers countries in the Empire: all which he did, vnder absolute perswasion, of being elected Generall (as we haue alreaalready said) knowing himselfe to bee the most able man for armes that those times afforded. For, albeit Honorius and Arca- dius were then tall youths; yet their care (as yet) extended not to the Countreyes Government, as Princes ought to do.

Now came the Gothes with a main army, and Stellico beeing chosen Captaine against them, obtained some fewe victories: but they were in such sort, that no generall Conquest was intended, but only to lengthen out the warre without finishing; yet heereby he won himselfe such reputation; that whatsoeuer he did, needed no other approbation. In the meane while, the Gothes elected Alarick as their King, who went into Italy with a mighty army; against whome, Stellico opposed himselfe very powerfully: and although he had much disadvantaged the Gothes and their King, yet it was plainly perceived, that greater matters might haue bin performed, had he bin so pleased. Alarick who was a man of great fore-sight, and of good vnderstanding, discerned apparently, that Stellico desired no conclusion of the warre, least then his means of commanding should cease: for, by a full conquest, he could not attend the coming of som other barbarous nations, as namely the Vandals, who hee knew certainly would attempt against the Empire; and he being descended of their Nation, conceiued the greater hope, that (by their helpe and fauour) hee should the easier feize on the Empire, and so aduance his sonne thereto.

In this maner, Alarick being thoroughly acquainted with the drift of Stellico priuately aduertised Honorius thereof, desiring that he would graunt him peace, because he sought nothing else, but some small Countrey to liue in, with his people; in signe whereof, hee tendered him his faithfull seruice. The Emperour being thus certified of these proceedings; and looking into the cunning Stratagemis, with all other suspitions inducing to the purpose; clearly perceited the intention of Stellico. Neuerthelesse, he dissembled (as yet) all apprehension thereof, & yeelded to the request of Alarick, graunting him to inhabit a certaine part of Gaul.

While matters thus waied vppe and downe, manie daies passed on, quite frustrating the perswasions whereto Stellico bended his course. And albeit (according to the agreement) Alarick remoued with his army, to take possession of the place assigned for his dwelling: yet notwithstanding, Stellico practised secretly with a Captaine of his troopes (a Jew born, and named Saul) who pretending some per- ticuler quarrell against the Gothes, should find meanes, that vppon one day in the Easter, when the Gothes (as such Christians as they were) should celebrate their festiuall, to set vppon them vnprouided, and in this maner of assault, to kill so many of them as he could. For, his Office of captain, being void in this time of peace, the warre (by this meanes) would be begun againe, and Stellico aduanced to his former dignity. The Jew performed his desire, and assaying the Gothes, made a great slaughter of them: but in the end, he made them amendes with losse of his owne life: for the Gothes being quickly assembled, ran violently vppon him and his people, and he (with a great number of them) there perished.

Alarick beeing much offended at this treachery, marshalled his forces against them belonging to Stellico, vwho made shew of fearfulness, and woulde (by no meanes) aduenture themselues that day: but dispatching a Trompet to the Emperour, required to haue more men for his assistance. The Emperour well knowing (before) the cunning of Stellico, and standing in dread of his further meaning, sent such a potent Army to the field, & some others put in especiall trust for the purpose; as there was both Stellico and his Sonne slain, few or none being acquainted with the reason of his death, or the treason by him intended. Now, albeit Honorius had well provided against this scandall and danger, yet could he not suddenly take order for creation of a newe Captaine, so excellent and meete to manage matters in fiede. And Alaricke pondering heereon, that this might be occasioned by the Emperours direction, or that Stellico miscarried in his owne purposed mischief, tooke aduantage of so apt an opportunity, and went on towards Rome, without any impeachment by the way, putting to fire and sword (al) along as he iournied, and planted his siege before the Citty, in the yeare eleuen hundred, three-score and four, of the foundation therof. ded slender likelyhood of any speedy surprizall: he besiedged it on all sides verie strictly, and his sledge continued two whole yeares together;

Many Authours haue thus written, concerning the assault and taking of Rome by Alarick: neuerthelesse, the actions of Armes therein performed, haue been so brieft and slenderly described, as almost nothing thereof can be said. They that haue written thereof, are Paulus Orosius, in his seauenth Booke; Paulus Diaconus, in the History of Honorius; Iordanus, or Ienardus, in his History of the Gothes; S. Augustine in his seauenth Booke of the City of God; and S. Ierom, in the beginning of his Epistle, as a thing that hapned in his time. Isidore also speaketh thereof, in the History of the Gothes, with many other Moderne Writers: who (all agreeing together) say, that so it hapned. Moreouer, one saith, that as Alarick went marching against Rome, and as a Christian, though fierce and cruell: there traualled a Monke before him, of great Authority and holy life, yet could it not possibly be knowne, of what place hee was.

Alaricke affoording him audience, the Monke councelled and admonished him to leaue off this euil purpose, bidding him remember that hee was a Christian, and (euen for the loue of God) he should moderate his passions, for hee ought not to take any delight, in shedding so much Christian blood, considering, that Rome had neuer offended him. Wherto k. Alarick thus replied: Man of God, let me tell thee, that my going against Rome, is not of mine owne wil: but contrariwise, I assure thee, that euery day there goes a man before mee, who much constraineth and importuneth me, stil saying; Set on Alarick, goe against Rome, destroy it wholly, and bring it to desolation.

The Religious man beeing amazed at these words, durst make him no answer, but suffered the King to proceede in his purpose. I found this written in the Annals of Constantinople, annexed to the history of Eutropius; whereby it appeareth, that this aduersity of Rome, was by the especiall rod or scourge of God. Paulus Orosius affirmeth as much, and saith. That euen as God drew Lot out of Sodome, to deliuer him from destruction; euen so, did he free thence Pope Innocent the first, who (some few dayes before the sledge) went out of Rome, to visite the Emperor Honorius, who was then at Rauenna. Notwithstanding, Platina saith; That this desolation hapned in the time of Pope Zozimus: but it may be, that it began in the Papacy of the one, and finished in the others Gouvernement. Saint Ierom was likewise (in these yeares) out of Rome, in solemne penitence in the Deserts of Egypt.

Rome being thus besieged, the Gothes and Romaines performed many woorthie deeds of Armes: and so resolute were the Romaines; that they kept it till extreame famine came vpon them, for S. Hierome saith; When the Citty was taken, there were found very few prisoners; because deuouring famine had consumed, and (wel-neere) brought them all to death. For they were compelled to feede on infected victuals, and one did eate another: the Mother spared not her nursing infant, but (enforced thereto by famine) sent it backe to the place fro whence it came at first so little; These are the very words of S. Ierom.

Among Authours there is great variety, in what manner Rome was taken. Procopius the Gracian saith; That Alarick perceiuing his forces insufficient to take it, concluded to compasse his determination by treachery, and faigning as if hee meant to raise his sledge, made a certaine kind of truce, and sent three hundred prisoners into the Citty, with whom he had compounded during their imprisonment and durst relie vpon their vowed promises; for fulfilling such instructions as hee had giuen them, only to enioy their liberty, and other great benefits. The designed time being come, the prisoners that were at liberty in the Citty, to the number of three hundred; tooke one of the Gates, in despite of the Guardes which kept it; and thereat entered Alarick furiously, with all his followers.

Others say, that by the industrie and command of a Great Romain Ladie, this Gate was giuen into the Gothes power; & that this action proceeded from meere pitty in her, to see poore people suffer such extreame euils. For she was perswaded, that the enemy could not performe such cruelties in the City, as the Romaines acted vpon themselves.

There are others who say; That it was surprized by force of Armes: the people within being no longer able to withstand the the Gothes. But by what meanes soeuer it was, they all agree together, that before any person entered the Citty, K. Alarick proclaimed (on paine of death) that none of his followers should be so hardie, as to touch one liuing creature of them, that had betaken themselues into Churches for their safety, especially those Churches of S. Peter and S. Paul, which accordingly was obserued; but all the rest of the City was sacked and spoiled; in which sledge, perished many thousands of persons, beside multitudes of prisoners taken. Among whom, was the Emperors Sister, named Placida, who was deliuered into the power of Attaulfus (one of the chiefeest in the Army, and a verie neere Kinsman to King Alarick) which Attaulfus in short while after married her.

The day following, they made themselues (wholly) Lords of the Citty, and (for the more ignominy and disgrace to the Empire) the Soldiers made one Attilus Emperor, whom they carried vpe and downe in habit of an Emperour; but the next day after, hee was made to serue as a slaue. Thus remained the Gothes three or 4. daies in Rome; and then setting fire on it in diuers places, they departed out at the further side therof. Al which while the Emperour Honorius was at Rauenna, where he could not but heare these wooll tidings; yet did hee declare no compassion for the Citty, whereof hee bare the Title of Emperour. This is the first time, that Rome (being in hir full strength) was subiect to the power of strangers. As for the Frenchmens entraunce in the time of Brennus, I make no reckoning thereof, because it was but in Romes nonnage or beginning, and had not attained to such might, as shee did afterward. But from this time of the Gothes, the City and Empire went continually to wasting. And many other times (since then) it hath bin ouercome and destroyed, whereof we will briefly report the most notable successe; to the end, that all men may knowe the frailty of Kingdoms and worldly powers, and how Rome (sometime the Ladie of our vniuersall Nations) hath bene made subiect and Slaue to all manner of people.

Not many daies after, Alarick was gone out of Rome, hee would haue set saile towards Sicily; but fortune returned him backe into Italy, and hee died in Cosenza, a Towne in Calabria. In regarde of his death, the Gothes elected (as their King) the fore-named Attaulfus, who had taken to wife Placida, daughter to the Emperour Theodosius. Heereupon, this new-made King returned to Rome, with intent to ruinate and confound it to the very foundation, to dispeople it vtterly, and to burie the name thereof in obliuion: which determination hee had executed, but that the teares and intercessions of his Wife, preuailed with him.

These things, and many other passing, the Gothes departed out of Italy: but forty yeares after, the Vandels or Vandalles (who were likewise a Northerne people) came thither, vnder conduct of their King named Genfericus. They entred Italy with a stout people of Affrica, ouer whom they commanded: and comming to Rome, entred without any resistance, because the greater part of the Inhabitants were fled thence. Thus the Vandals (and their King Genfericus) remained in Rome, the space of foure daies: during which time, they made what spoil and hauock they could, and then set it on fire in many places.

Seauen and twenty yeares following this surprizall of the Vandals, (which was in all seauenty two yeares, after the Goths had entred vnder King Alarick) the King of the Arules and Thoringes, named Odoacres, came with a mighty armie against the Citty of Rome, which the Cittizens perceiuing, and how vnable they were to withstand so potent an enemy: went forth and entertained him amiably in peace, which caused him to name himselfe King of Rome, and there he raigned fourteene yeares.

Afterward, Zeno comming to succede in the Empire, sent Theodorick King of the Gothes, (who in those dayes) were become friends to the Romaine Empire; & Theodorick going against Odoacres, with a powerfull Army, only to recouer Rome, performed his purpose; and hauing the victory ouer Odoacres, not onely chased him out of Rome, but likewise out of Italy. Then tooke hee on him the name and kingdome, ruling there for the space of thirtie yeares in peace, and without anie contradiction. He dying, his Sonne Atalarick raigned there, eight or ten yeares, with his Queene Amalafunta.

the Empire, the Gothes returned againe into Italy, vnto the Ensigns of their most cruell King Totillus. But Bellisarius and Narfetes, most excellent men, exceeding all other in valour, and being Captaines in Italy for the Emperor Iustinian: did vanquish the Gothes diuers times, in the yeare of our Lord, five hundred & eighty. This Totillus, after he had many times besiedged Rome; and fought sundry hardie battels; at length, (by secret treason of some within the Citty) he won it; Pelagius being then the chiefe Bishop, who was found therein, and by his teares and earnest entreats, Totillus was moued, to moderat the cruelty and slaughter which his people vsed to the Inhabitants. This done, the cruell King sent his Ambassadors; to require peace with Iustinian, and because hee did not freely graunt it him, but referred him to Bellisarius (who was then Captaine generall in Italy against him) hee grew to great discontentment with himselfe, for sending to the Emperour; and to be thus denied. Heerupon, he destroyed almost the whole Citty, nothing remaining but the third part of the walles: he caused the Capitoll to be burned, and the greater part of the Citty; euen all that possibly hee could, commanding the Dwellers to get them from thence.

When the people had deuided themselves into diuers other Neighbouring Citties and Townes; he led thence with him many of the Senatours, and such as were of greatest respect in Rome; leaving the Citty wholly vn-inhabited, and most Goodly sumptuous buildings utterly desolate. In brieffe, such was the ruine and destruction, as neuer after could it be reduced to the former condition: Albeit Bellisarius (after his entrance into it) repaired a great part of the wals and dwellings, and gaue aide to the Romanie Princes; fortifying their Citty, so much as in him lay; and procuring the return of many dispersed Inhabitants, who had fled to sundry Neighboring places of Italy, now to beginne a New Population of Rome. In such good sort was it repaired, that it was strong enough to out-stand a second attempt of Totillus, who came againe, & laid his siege to it. But in regard that Bellisarius, at his departing out of Italy, carried thence with him the Manly courage wherewith such a Citty should be defended: therefore, King Totillus had his second surprize of it the more easily, and vsed effects quite contrary to his former. For, insted of againe destroying it, he laboured to restore what he had ruined, & such Cittizens as had fled (being fearefull of him) he caused their returne with verie kinde Welcome, and Royall Feasting.

10 Some Authours say, that the cause of this strang alteration, proceeded by these meanes. That he had sent into France, with request of one of the Kings Daughters in marriage, and answer was returned him; That he would not giue him any one of them, because he knew him not to be King of Italy, for if hee were King thereof, he would not labour so much to destroy it, but rather strue to maintaine it in all her rights. Others affirme, that repenting himselfe for his passed cruelties, he made a Vow to S. Peter and S. Paul, to restore Rome againe. But howsoeuer it was, it fell out to prooue so, and this was the last time that the Gothes entred Rome: for they lost it before many daies were past, being vanquished by the woorthie Narfes, or Narfetes, Captain to the Emperor Iustinian, who threw them whollie out of Italy, whereinto afterward, they neuer re-entred.

20 Neuerthelesse, it plainly appeared to other Nations, that Rome was no difficult thing to be conquered and taken. For in short time after, the Longobards went into Italy, where making themselves Lords of Cisalpine Gaule; by that occasion it is called Lombardy to this day. This hapned three yeares after the ruine made by Totillus, and vnder the raigne of King Clouis: then went they on to Rome, where they mainly besiedged it, and did great dammage to the Neighboring parts, albeit they could not take the Citty. Some while after, and in the life time of Gregory the third, Luitprand their King, besiedged it likewise; and being vpon the point of taking it, hee left off his enterprize, at the intreaty of Charles Martel.

30 After which, and in the yeare seauen hundred and two, another King of these Longobards or Lombardes, called Ataulphus, besiedged it once more, in the time of Pope Stephen the second; & although he entred not into the Citty, yet did hee engirt it with the most cruell inuasion, that euer hapned since the Tyrant Totillus;

lus, and worfe (for the extremitie) then he performed. And, if Pepin, King of France, and Father to great Charlemaign, had not gone to succour it: without all question they had entred in, and then it had beene vtterly destroyed, as appeared by the spoile they made without. This calamity being ouer-blowne, Rome had some respite, by the fauour of Charlemaigne; and so much the rather, because the Empire then came into the West.

Notwithstanding, by successe of time, and in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred thirty three, Gregory the fourth being Pope, and Lewes Emperour: Sarrazins (Disciples of Mahomet) descended with a mighty Army into Italy, and hauing destroyed Centoncella (at this day cald Ciuita vecchia, or the old Citty) they went against the Citty of Rome; which they both besieged, and tooke; prophaning the Temple of S. Peter. When they had performed many ignominies, and burned all they could: they returned vnto their Shippes, enriched with many Prisoners, booties and spoiles.

Rome hauing endured all these misfortunes, Gregory the seauenth came to succede in the Papacy, who had great wars against Henry, Emperour of Germany; and the Emp. pursuing his iniuries, brought his armed troupes before Rome, wherein he besieged the Pope: but the Romaines defended the Citty couragiously, and the Emperour resisted with such constancy, that the sledge continued a very long time. Neuerthelesse, in a battaile well ordered, he surprized the Citty, by meanes whereof, the Pope fled to the Castle of S. Angelo: in which place, being also belegered, he was succored by a great number of Normans. When the Emperour perceiued, that his stay could not (well) be long; hee destroyed (first) many goodlie buildings in Rome: and at his parting, he left the greater number of his Men in the Citty, to defend it with the Romains, who were then of his faction. Many more Normans comming to ioyne with the rest, in fauour of the Pope; the two Armies encountered together diuers times, and such was the dammage which the Citty receiued on both sides: as the greater part thereof was burned. For this was especially obserued, that whatsoever the Normans could seaze on their Enemies, were they houses, or what else: they were burned, rased, and laid flat with the Earth. The Capitoll it selfe, which had beene againe builded, and wherein the Emperour Henries people were fortified; was again burned and quite ruined. Finallie, the Normans and the Popes side got the victorie, but with such wofull hauocke and desolation of Rome: as neuer since then it could be restored, nor euer will be, to her first estate. Some that haue written, do a- uouch, that neither Totillus, nor any other Nation; did euer cause so much losse, as might be compared with the hurt it then receiued. And that it must needs be true, it is apparant at this day to be seene, for Vineyards, Gardens, and other empty places, doe supply roome where Churches, & other things (very remarkable) then stood, the which wofull ruine, hapned in the yeare one thousand eightie two.

Wherefore, whosoever shall well consider these misfortunes: will finde, that there is not any Nation in the World; (hauing heeretofore beene subiected to Rome) that in such diuersity of times, can to spoile. And for a last example, in our time, by meanes of our sins, especially of them there inhabiting: the Emperiall army (consisting of Spaniards and Germans) came before this Citty, tooke it, and sacked it. And because in the first assault, Charls Duke of Bourbon (a French Prince, and one of the worthiest men in his time, who was then Generall Commaunder of the Emperour) hapned to bee slaine: his Souldiers (becing at liberty) committed such enorme cruelties, that they acted euen all the villainies they could deuise, except setting the Churches on fire. Which proceeded (as hath beene presumed) by the iust iudgment of God, albeit the executioners thereof were not clear from grieuous sinnes: But it is necessary that scandals should happen, yet woe to them that cause and commit them.

That there is no height of spirit, valour, courage, or Man-hood, truly commendable; but such as is necessary, & grounded on vertue.

ments concerning Man-hood or Valor: but yet so weakely, and without any true validitie, as nothing can be collected from such enstructions; but meere Cowardise, and debility of courage. For they being empty of such naturall capacitie, as should conuay them to so high a knowledge: haue sought for such a Iewell in sinister places, and not where the perfect markes of this vertue is to be truly found. The French, Germanes, English, Italians, and Spaniards, haue (like Fresh-men) discoursed on this Argument, vsing so many words, and little grace; as if they were deprived of all meanes to write on such a subiect. For now a-daies, Man-hood is so slenderly practised among Noblemen; that it appeares no other then a cloud of Vanitie, which disperfeth it selfe at the first noyse of an armed Enemy. Because it is impossible for him, who hath no other courage, then a braue apparance onely (which is more proper to threaten, then to hurt an enemy) to forme any true resolution in his Soule, of being then valiant; when hazard disputes with reason, and feare coapeth with honour so rudely; that gallantry in desseignes, proues goutinesse in performance. Herevpon was it, that Maherball spake so courageously to his Numidians, on the great battaile day at Cannas; We come not hither to looke on, but to conquer; we are not here for shew, but for our liues. For the Romaines dispute about an Empire, and not for the excellency of Affricke or Europe. If ye couet flight, to preuent the great tempest that may fall vpon yee; let me aduise ye, to get ye gone, before ye be chased. For otherwise, they that shall haue more courage then you; to preserue their liues, will haue more breath to pursue the ruine of yours, then you can (by flight) can be assured of safety. Considering, that as there is no neede of fight, where no victory is to be had for the Conquerour, nor rout for the conquered: So let no man fly, when flight is not auailable; retreat being much more dangerous, then fight.

These, or the like wordes, vsed this great Caprain, Maister of the Horsemen to Hanniball, who was so happy in armes; as neuer was any slacknesse noted in him, no, not in the battaile of Zama, which he lost; by fighting rather against the rigour of Heauen, and the destinies waiting on the huge Empire of Rome; then by the violence of his enemies, who conquered, onely because they could not be conquered. Whereto we may adde, that whatsoeuer outward note or effect, could deliuer (for happinesse) in a wise and valiant Captaine: it was exactly deliuered (that day) by Hanniball: who (in so hard a necessity) did all the offices both of head and armes, so many times, and for so long a while together; that Scipio himselfe, after the battaile was won, made this loude exclamation, O Rome! What shouldst thou yet suffer, if Hanniball were liuing?

Now, it is most certaine, that the Affricane fought by power, being commanded by the Magistrats of his Common-weal, to whom he made apparant their errour, and his owne experience; accompanied with such perfect Man-hood, as he would neuer make vse thereof, but where it was so needfully required, that meere necessity tooke away all suspicion of vaine glory, and the issue gaue testimony of the beginning; to wit, effectes of their cause, more then legitimate and necessary. To whom then, shall not this true Valour in Scipio seeme admirable, that neuer came to manly triall, but by necessity? And hauing conquered, made no such assurance of his victory by his enemies foile; as by diligent search of their loue and amitie?

A wretched fortune attendeth on some Nations, wherein no Lordes or Gentlemen are found, to delight in the imitation of this auncient Man-hood, whereto so many Vertues were enchained: that they seemed rather a colligation of wonders, then any simple qualitie, reaped in the Fielde of a strong and couragious soul. There are so many inciulities mingled with our Man-hood, that they sympathize rather with wild Goats, or the heat of Bulles; then with the reall excellencie of humane Nature, which beeing the Image of the Diuinitie; figures vnto vs another kinde of strength and courage, then that which is proper to brute Beasts onely. For their transport, is desseigne, fury, fight, and hugeness of body, wherein assuredlie, they so far exceed vs; that if we esteem Manhood to consist in sudden fury: we shal find our selues more feeble then all other Creatures, worthily deseruing to be termed vnreasonable, & much lesse excellent then Lyons, Panthers, & Tigers, the least enraged whereof, so little feareth the brutall fury of any Man, (how Pyrrhus King of the Epirotes, demanded of his Ambassadour Cineas, what manner of people the Romaines were? he answered: They are goodly men. What more quoth the King. They are aduised, said Cineas. What else? saide the King. They are valiant, quoth Cineas. Is this all? replied the King. No, said Cineas they are (beside) vertuous and honest people. Why then (answered the King) we shall deale with three enemies more then I dreamed of. True replied Cineas, and the legerity of the Tarentines makes the fourth. But it is all one, provided, that the merits of Italy doe not exceede theirs of Greece: for the Epirotes and the Romaines must act a Tragedy, whereof the Tarentines will be the Iudges. The common Theater is Italy, the Gods & victorie will leane to him perticularly, that shall declare himselfe to be most worthy. How-soeuer it be, replied Pyrrhus, reason is on our side: for we haue crost the Seas, to yeild Iustice to the Tarentines, and mercy to the Romaines; if we be Maisters of the day. As for the rest, they are Sonnes to them whom our Fathers haue beaten, & we cannot be conquered; without doing iniury to the vertue of our Auncestours, who were neither lesse, or more valiant then we be, if we would enter into possession of one another.

Vndoubtedly, these were words, or rather Oracles, well becomming a Christian Captaine: and what were their effects, but meere perpetuall miracles? Romes fortune and vertue fell flat vnder his valor; the Sea stouped her breast vnder the weighty burthen of his Ships; the straites of Sicily opened wide (like mouths) to receiue his victorious triumphant feet; and Greece (his Countrey) had more honour then disgrace, in being subdued by so vertuous a Conquerour. And yet notwithstanding, in struing to be a more forward Souldier, then so good a Captaine; hee lost his life, not in the midst of his victories, but in the beginning of his triumphs; and vpon the very end of a fight. For, pursuing (to no purpose, and against all prouidence) a young Lad of the City of Argos, that was carried away in the assault:

he was slain by the stroke of a Tile, which the Mother of the lad threw at him in the pursuit. Was it not enough, that hee had shut vp King Antigonus, who had called him forth to fight? that he had commanded the day, & provided security against the assailants; but he must yeild himselfe to cominon seruices, which are more ignominious to great Commaunders (being done out of time) then they can bee honorable to the meanest Souldier, that serues no other God, but occasion, and seekes no pay, but applause and vulgar knowledge?

When it was told the wife Antigonus, of a certaine Polyperchon, that being excited thereto, or rather drunke with boldnesse; ran into the army of Eumenes, and had broken five Corps du garde of the Argiraspides, but was staid at the sixt. It is nothing (answered Antigonus) for I haue seene an Elephant much more signale and commendable in courage, that trauerse the whole army of Demetrius, and yet was neither slain nor taken. Hyrodes, Prince of the Parthians; beholding a Hircanian mainly galloping into the field, & smitten down at the first encounter; instantly gaue him this farewell. We are not now (my friende) at the passage of a Riuer; where every one strives for entrance into the Boat, before his Fellow; but we are heere to grow enamored of victory, and she is a Goddesse so full of Maiesty, that shee scornes to looke vppon Fooles and mad men. Pelopidas, the honour of Thebes, failed (by this meanes) in the day of battaile, which he hadde against the Tyrant Phalaris, of whom hee had won a verie great victorie: which at length he robd himselfe of (by vnadvised courage) in running rather to the ruine of a particular Thessalian Souldier, then to the conseruation of his Army, and the establishment of his Common-wealth; which was left more desolatee by his death, then this vnperfected victorie yeilded assurance and safetie to Beetia.

Gaston de Foix might serue vs for a sufficient example; without borrowing any among the Greekes or Romaines, whose losses (in the like cases) may the better direct vs to Wisedome. the brauing valour of some Gallantes, too apt in spurring on such as had betaken themselves to flight: more to be seene, then for any hope hee could haue of recalling them, lost his owne life. And his fall might be compared to that of a great and mightie Colossus; whose ruine not onely hurteth whatsoever is nere neighbouring; but thinges much further of, by very distant separations.

Like as the bright Luster of the Easterne Opalles, doe figure and represent to our eyes, the very lieliest Colours of all precious Stones; euen so is perfect Man-hood endued with this particuler Vertue, that it giueth to him (who is therewith possessed) a generall acquisition of all such varities, as may builde vp a faire Nature, and make it euerie way compleate. But he who is simply valorous, and hath no other merit, but onely a giddie and skipping kinde of courage: is borne rather for his owne hurt and ruine, then any aduancement; except he will goe liue among sauage Beastes, for whose humour (perhaps) he may be more capable, if they should make any dangerous fallie vpon his person. To this purpose, the famous Captaine Epaminondas, compared a valiant man, that had no other vertue; to a great goodly Shippe, wherein is nothing but a saile. Shee is not carryed by any Conduct, or whether the Mariners desseigne had appointed their Commerce: but fortune onelie is her course; the Windes her Pylor, and she hath no other anchorage, but ship-wracke. Yet if it so happen (as it may, though rarely) that hauing contended with the angry Heauens, and iniuries of the Seas, shee bring her selfe (vnbruised) into some safe harbour: no glory is therefore to be ascribed to the goodnesse of her prow, to the best form of her poepe, nor to any cost bestowed on her building; but onely to the oportunitie of the place, the nature of the Windes, the depth of the Water, and calmnesse of the Seas, that altogether, or one for all the rest, rather left her so without dommage, then warranted what thus hapned, they being insensible of good or euill.

Being abandoned in this sort, by the transport of gaine, and bootie of the Cittie (which was the more allarmed, then assaulted) their generall intention was to vanquish, onely thereby to enrich themselves; and this was the sole command of the assault, yea, the absolute forme or cause of the fight & victory. Wherein, the Conquerour (not knowing how to conquer his owne impaciency) declared himselfe vnworthy of such fauor, as the Heauens had then prepared for him, to make him Maister of the Queen of Citties: which could not haue been subdued, but by so Noble and famous a Commander, who (out of his death) begot a second life, and conuerted his particuler triumphe, into a generall mourning: for the Army and Cittie (which was then spoiled) were very far dissemlable, in condition of their fortune.

What Man-hood was that in Polydamas, who (all alone, and disarmed) ran after a great and strong company of Theues, amongst whom he was slaine: more satisfying (therein) his owne fury, then good intention, which was, to cleanse the Country of them? He wounded, slue, and chased the greater part of those common enemies to mens society: but what did he heerein, either for himselfe, or others? When his verie death, caused more courage & violence in the remnant of them that remained aliue; then the whol heap of them (before) had together? Could not he haue mustered the community of Greece, and selected young Spirits of his owne hot temper? with such a sindiquat, he might haue made opposition, rather against their flight, then violence, and (by this means) had the grace to vanquish them at the first fight, and by this first too, rather haue punished, then vanquished them. For so base a victorie, better becommeth the pursuit of a Prouost of iustice, or a polliticke Magistrate; then the dreaded Armes of a Prince. Were it not that one must haue the charge, when the leudnesse of men so far aboundeth, that Theues and Pirats may better giue the Title of army (yea, of a great Army) to their conspiracy; then of a simple simple company of misse-led men. As it happened in the time of Pompey, who was to fight with so great and prodigious a multitude of Sea Rovers: that the very Conquest of them, rather got him the Name of Great, then all the victories he had in Asia. This likewise was the verie greatest honour, that euer the valiant and inuincible Hercules attained vnto, if the Greekes write truely.

A good aduertisement to all Noble-men.

I am the more willing to continue this subiect, because it were no dishonest wish, that the Man-hood of all our Nobilitie, would declare it selfe (more then it hath done) in diligent search of Morall Vertues, and opposition against all vices, for whose destruction, they were first created by God, and secondlie by Kinges. For, let me tell yee, that the best and most famous Houses in Europe (let me not say of the whole World) were sometimes plain Yeomanry, & extracted out of the common Masse: out of which, some apparant and remarkable vertue gaue them distinction & separation. Because a recompence so faire and glorious, moued braue courages (in quest of such occasions) to become partners in the like benefits: which the meere courtesie of Kinges (animated by this subiect onely) established, to make differrence between more and lesse, good and better, the Comparatiue and the Superlatiue.

The Original of the best houses in Europe, and their separation.

Man-hood is commended by many, yet known of very few; because it is much more easily praised, then learned, or practised. It ought to be in the hart, like pure and cleere water in a Cesterne; whence it may be fetcht for diuers seruices, and all for no other end, then mens commodity. Some to make drinke therewith; others, Bread; others dresse their meats, Water their Gardens, and wash, as occasion is required. In all these vses, it is not onelic profitable, but also very needfull: and yet it may be abused, for ouer-much thereof, doth rather returne disaduantage, then any benefit. To elect it (then) for our best seruice, is not according to it selfe, as in a liuing thing; but answerable to manlie iudgement, & discourse of reason: which appropriateth the quality and quantity of this Element, according as the occurrence and neede thereof, shall require his vertue and succourable power. It is enen so in Man-hood, one while it is employed for the establishment of Kinges;

Much commended, but little knowne.

for the conseruation of their Estates; for particular defence of our assayed persons; and for perfection of the weake and innocent. Out of this, or the like subiect; it is ridiculous, changeth into fury, and gets the name of madnesse, rage, and desperation. This immaculate Virgine shunneth such a Spirit, as hath more cowardise to offend a Man, of whom hee thinkes he hath receiued an iniurie: then truevalor, to do him grace, by letting him rather know the pardon, thē the pain; the precept, then the punishment. Heereon was it, that Diuine Plato was wont to say. If we were all iust; Might would bee condemned in humane societie, for Iustice doth all by her owne proper Vertue. Shee made Aristides both couragious and patient. Shee made him more necessary thē Themistocles; more victorious then Miltiades; and more happy, then all the other Athenian Captains.

The application in the vse of man-hood.

The saying of the diuine Plato concerning Iustice.

There is no valour without Iustice, nor Iustice without courage.

It is impossible then, to be very valiant, without being iust; or to be iust, without courage; because, it is not faintnesse, or want of Spirit in the heart, that makes a Man acceptable in all Companies: but rather a Celestiall heate; which mounts the Soule beyonde common pitch, and seeketh after a commendable contentment, by delight which others apprehend in seeing our actions to hold euen gate with their good, as much (or rather more) then they doe with our owne. We are not bound to those boistrous wordes of Alexander the Great, when he said; That he did not abandon hazards, but to be honoured and renowned among the Grecians in generall, and particularly, of the Athenians: Who seemed (neuerthelesse) vtter Enemies to his Fortune, as formerly they had beene to his Father Phillip. Such speeches issued from the mouth; nay, the very heart of a Man; an Atheist: who had no other God, but Vanitie; no Reason, but Couetousnesse; no Iustice, but feare of contempt; Fortune for his Armes, Asia for his pay, and the rest of the World for his hope. Little was his care, if the whole Earth were afflicted, for the weake Subiect of his fraile satisfaction: for hee receiued but the rinde or shell of goodnesse, and tooke (from euery one) the whole heape of happinesse, which Peace onely bringeth.

World, whom he sought to oblige by his victorious Armes; and by the Graces he did them, to beleue, that hee excelled them in power and courtesie. Nor had he any other intention beside, either to assure the estates of Greece, or doe any good to his Countrey, much lesse would hee exalt any of his partakers: for all his proiect was, not to be equalled by any one in his life, nor seconded after his death, saying, not long before. He that hath no part in my Glorie, can be no Heire to my Conquest: How then should I make a Successour, that neuer could haue any Companion?

He well declared, that his valour was imperfect, when he flew his Friend and Benefactor Clitus, reproouing him for his ambitious vanitie: beside, it was very vnorderly done, and out of due time. He ought to haue expressed the truth of courage, in supplying the defect of the others indiscretion (if he pleased so to iudge it) then so furiously to bee his Destroyer and Murderer. Demetrius had more valiancy (but lesse Fortune) then Alexander, considering, he pardoned the Thebanes twice; but many times the people of Athens. Whereas (quite contrary) Alexander ruined Thebes from the top to the bottome, and neuer left the Athenians in peace: but when time serued not to proclaime open Warre; his mind being then busied and imploied in much greater matters, & yet notwithstanding, lesse perillous. For, it is most certaine, that had hee else-where conuerted his fury (rather destenied, then premeditated for the ruine of Asia, which (was in his time) the principall subiect of Gods wrath, of whose vengeance he was the onely Organe:) doubtlesse he had ended his Fortunes in Greece, and his triumphes had extended but the length of Macedon, which remained more vnvanquished, then victorious, by the Armes of this Shittle-cocke of the Heauens displeasure. At whose ending, all Tytants in the world tooke their beginning, and the vniuerse it selfe, was more shaken (then maintained) by the accidentall valour of this Monster of ambition, and of pernicious glory. For he had no Law, but superstition; no Magistracy, but prodigious and vsociable disdain. Yer could he outwardly seeme milde and familiar, because he affected this necessary vertue in a great Prince: especiallie in such a one, that exaltes himselfe (without any right or election) into others Empires and Monarchies. For power doth not so much strengthen the nouelty of a Kingdome; as hope, which subiectes (halfe desperate) doe deriue, from the accostable and kinde behauiour in him, who (in effect) hath forced, and (in apparence) striueth to surmount their feare, of being worffe entreated afterward.

The Empire of the Romaines, was of longer continuance then the other, because it daily begot more Friendes then Enemies, and onely began to loose it selfe; when they grew to disdain the Northerne people, who being farre off from Italy, by long distance of Seas, Ri- uers, Mountaines, and by so great a length of ground: the Gouvernors seemed to be meere proprietaries or Owners. By means whereof, they committed such prodigious violences, as were to be wondred at. But the patience of the afflicted, kept in, and continued so long a time, for a iust and necessariè punishment, that the Arrest being concluded on: the North (at length) leapt out of her limits, and brake the Ice of her heart in such sort, that the shiuers flew so farre as Rome; yea, and with so stearne a strength, that their power and Iustice (vsing necessity as their best helpe) made a meere break-neck of the Worldes pride. For hauing nothing but valour, and no equity in their first Oeconomy, they became so humbled; that their fall remaineth (to this day) very dreadfull, and it would exceed credence, in men most learned, if the ruines did not render a more apparant testimony, then all our Histories.

That all such, as had no other vertue, then meere and naked valiancy, or valour; haue ended their daies very vnfortunatly.

The wisdom of the first Monarcks in establishing their Empires their Empires, by election which they made of their Friendes and Enemies; then by force of Armes, or relying on their power. And true it is, that the people of Asia, had (naturally) more might and courage, then the Grecians; who notwithstanding, did almost daily beat them, because they had no other helpe, but such a transport of spirit, which being linked to indiscretion and fury: admitted no other meanes of conquering; but that which Nature enstructs brute Beasts withall, being furthest off from all iudgement. When the Grecians degenerated from the wisdom of their Ancestors; they suffered themselues to be led by the Romaines prouidence: who were a people, not so goodly of Body, so well proportioned, or of like courage to them of * Attica; where the Ayre was of such temperature, as nothing wanted, to be desired. Euerie one knoweth, that Greece was not onely the Mother of Sciences, but of all the Pagan Gods, and of all those most remarkable thinges, which our auncient Histories doe make mention of. It was the birth place of Hercules, Theseus, and Perithous, who knowing nothing else to be mastered in the World; went so farre as Hell to exercise their violence. Thence they drew out Cerberus, with his three heades, and (some say) they cornuted wretched Pluto: a goodly act no doubt, aunswerable to the birth of * Calais and Zethes, who rid the Countrey of the Harpies, that deuoured the foode of blinde Phineus. There was Meleager born, and all the Argonauts in generall. Of thence was Achilles and Diomedes, who wounded Mars and his Concubine Venus. Of thence was Alexander, Pyrrhus, Demetrius, Themistocles, and Alcibiades, all which, hauing giuen a substance of valiancy to their world: had Children to their Successours, that suffered themselues to be conquered by the Heard-men of Calabria, and Shepherds belonging to the Romain fields; onely because they were lesse wise then valiant, in comparison of their predecessors, who had true iudgment, both in the one and other.

Theseus had neuer got out of the Cretane Labyrinth, if hee had not brought more discretion to his enterprize, then meere valour. For he did not vanquish that great and dreadfull Monster, halfe a Man, and halfe a Beast; but by deuise and singuler cunning: in regard, that the prodigious Bull was endued with more strength and courage, then hee could be; the Nature (both of Man and Bull) being common and indifferent to him. Moreouer; it was (in manner) nothing, to haue surmounted such a confused masse of Flesh, because he had more need of conduct, to get foorth of the Forrest where he was enclosed; then power to warrant him against a violence, which was soule-lesse to all reason. And surely as offence (in another body) trained him vniustly to this hazzard; euen so was hee deliuered by strange vertue, which was as well acknowledged, not to be Domesticke to his owne Spirit, as he declared indiscretion and improuidence in his returne, which appeared more signale in the deplorable death of his Father, then any wonder could be discerned in his victory: for he was more prepared by wisdom in the King of Cretes Daughter, then well atchieued by vertue in the Athenian Prince.

The selfe-same (doublelesse) happened to Iason, Captaine of the Argonauts, who beeing (well-neere) inuincible for humane valour: had yet all been vtterly lost, without the industrie and prouidence of ingenious Medea. For shee knew how to conuert the Armes of the Garrisons of Colchos, quite against themselves, for whose vse and preservation they were onely destined. Here, amazement surmounted the courage of our young Conquerants; and their valiancy had no other vigour, but onely for flight: till she alone, without any other Armes then inuention; changed their feare, to a chearfull heat for fight; their incertitude, to assurance; and their vnauoydable ouerthrow, to a victory sudden, and done at an instant.

The meanest Fortresses would appeare impregnable to humane valiancy; without Art and inuention of a sprightly minde: who vniting the one with the other; bringeth supernaturall things to passe, or (at least) such as are extraordinary. The Poet Lucernus mockt our first men, that made bodily strength their best benefit of defence, vsing their teeth, nailes, feete, and handes, as their safest ran head-long into ineuitable dangers.

Homere also tels vs, that the Captaines of best ranke (as well in Europe as Asia) were singularly well armed: as Ajax, Sarpedon, the Son of Mars, Diomedes,
Glaucus, and Patrocles, that perished with the Armes of Achilles: who was not so hardie, as to run and reuenge the death of his perfect and intimate friend, till he had gotten him new Armour; to wit, much better then that hee had before. He, that (to shew himselfe couragious) throwes his vnarmed body into charges, breaches and assaults; declares the actions rather of a mad man, then one that is valiant. Some men haue bin seene, one, to cast himselfe into a Fire;
another, fall vpon the point of a sword;
a third, leap suddenly into a deep Riuer, or from the height of a dreadfull Rock;
according as frenzy altereth and misguideth the ordinary moouing of his disease. A fourth, as vnhealthfull in mind, guideth his life by the pathes of death, onely by defect of apprehension, which cannot, neither ought to bee lawdable or imitable: but onely in such, who being weary of life, doe desie both fortune and perill, and become obedient to dispaire and melancholly, which makes them to esteeme death more

Alexander the Great, banished a Macedonian from his Troupes, because he was vnarmed on the day of battaile, which he fought at the Riuer Granicus, saying to him. In this manner (my small Friend) we vse to goe to Weddings, and not to war; where he that is best armed, cannot be cleare from perill. The Spartanes condemned a young man of their City, to a very great penalty, because on the day when the Thebanes gaue their assault; he came naked to the fight, where (notwithstanding) his fortune was equall to his valour, deliuering such prooffe of high desert, as themselves, by whom his folly was condemned; adiuged a great salary to his valour, which had beene perfect, if it had been exercised in better forme. Lysimachus being vanquished by a Thessalian Prince (that was reputed barbarous, and slenderly acquainted with glorious actions) when he was mockt for his foile, made them this an-swere. *Mine enemy (what soeuer you conceine of him) seemes to haue as much wise-dome, as fury: for, the fortune of Alexander; and himselfe pertaking with me, could not make me inuincible; because I was ordained to be one of this Princes heires. But the mis-prison I made of my companion, deceiued my possessed assurance of conquest, and enabled mine enemy to fight, when I thought him more capable of flight, then of assailing. Ent why then (answered one) did you undertake such a difficult attempt? Because (qd.

he) I had courage enough to execute it, if meere valiancy had onely bin necessary.*

When rich Crassus was ouerthrowne in Assiria, by the Army of the Parthians, which were farre lesse in number, then that of the Romaines; a Patrician said to Cato: This rout seemeth to me incredible, considering the courage of many strong Le-geonaries; whereto Cato replied. There would haue beene much better apparance, if the couetous eye of Crassus had not lookt more to booty, then to the charge: which was more easily desired, then taken, and yet more easily taken, then kept. For it beho-ueth, that (in eucry desseigne) wisdom should exceed the power of execution, and execution to arise, not from possibility, or apparance; but from truth and certaintie of the matter, which distinguisheth it selfe by no other time, then when we are assured of it. This sacred cessitie*.

It is not might only, that surmounteth the ouergreat agitation of the Billowes, iniurie of the Winds, and their immeasurable violence. Might onely, doth not oppose it selfe, and make resistance against the Tempest of that ayre, or those turbulent stormes, that beget and forme the ruine of Passengers. Might onely, doth not facilitate the entrance or issue, of straites or narrow passages on the Seas, Riuers, and such like places: neither can it onely compell the rigour of seasons, nor their quality, to be either more or lesse intemperate; nor to fortify vs against dangerous change, from our first dwelling, to any other. In all these, might is but as fairer, or (to speake better) more lawdable and necessary vertues, for the atchieving of such high enterprises: wherein (oftentimes) meere Valiancy, simple valour, and courage onely (badly guided) and ouer-rudely imployed; is more dammageable, then beneficiall; and lesse sightly, then well beseeming. For, to speake truly, a braue and generous Spirit, thought it were naked of all other Grace; yet it carrieth with it an admiration aboue capacity: which followeth not other vertues, as by a selfe allurence, but inciteth their imitation out of his owne splendour.

Hercules was not numbred among the Gods, for the sole benefit of his greatnesse in courage: for, in Heauen, as much esteeme is made of a weak man, as of him that is most strong and vigorous. Seeing that it appeareth, to be rather as a defect of his bodie, which is ill disposed: then any iniury naturallie linked to the Spirit, of such as are more timorous, and lesse couragious then others. It was the Iustice of Hercules, that made him dreadfull to the wicked, and wonne him the fauour of euill ordered Common-weales. His Charitie made him necessary, for the mallice of his time, that abounded in tyrannies and cruell oppressions. His courage made him the lesse apprehensue of daungers; yet oftentimes dispaireing of their good issue. The greatnesse and Nobility of his Parents, made him the more famous, and knowne through all partes. But his settled Resolution, to be an vter Enemy to Vices, and a partaker with Vertues, much more requisite: that onely made him commendable among all men. I say, the brauest Spirit (in his time) durst not enuy his glorie, nor compare their actions of greatest merit, with the very meanest of his. Courage was one in number of his merits, neuerthelesse, it was not the principall, in regard hee ouercame many, that ought him nothing in that point: not reckoning Lyons, Hydraes, and other prodigious Beastes vanquished by him, to whom he might well haue seemed as a prey, if cunning and knowledge (by what meanes to shunne their violence and fury) had not beene a better subiect to him of hope, then of feare, in such bold enterprises, which alwaies were grounded on necessitie, occasion most apparant, and vndertaken with iudgement.

The great King Artoxerxes, compared courage onelic, to a sparke of Fire, which dyeth as soone as it is borne, and hath more apparance, then body. Hereby (quoth he) I perceiue; that my Brother and Enemy Cyrus, will be but of small continuance: For he is of the Nature of small Coales, which are good for nothing, but to kindle great Wood, and then suddenly they extinguish, because the great Fires flame, disperseth and scattereth them among the light Cinders. It came so to passe, for Cyrus enflamed all Greece and Asia, against the said Artoxerxes, who was much better qualified then his Brother: on whom rashnesse bestowed wings, to fly more swiftly to his owne ruine; then to prepare any danger for others. For they that had lesse power, and more pacience then he; assured their liues by the hazard of his, beeing more carried by the violence of his owne courage, then by the strength of his enemies.

O inconsiderate courage, principall Artezane of so many sudden losses; so many deplorable deaths, so many cruell Wounds, and so many light enmities! Thou art more hurtfull, then succourable to mankind. Thou art deadly Enemy to reason; thou blindest iudgement; thou art the Father of pride, and the peruerter of all order. Thou makest Families desolate; Wiues, to bee Widowes; Children, Orphanes; Citties, Deserts; Common-weales vnpeopled; and Kingdomes, shaken into shiuers. Thou neuer dost any good, except when faire hap (in such as inherit thee) bequiles their certaine hope, and all occasion, of loosing thee. The good thou doost, ensueth from hence, that thou hast not strength enough, to weaken the destiny that saues and deliuers thee, or (to speake better) the diuine benediction, that armes it selfe in thy succour, and opens an assured passage to the inconstancy of thy motions; which leads thee (without eyes) hither and thither, like a Skiffe beaten with the Windes and Billowes, euer ready for wracke, as often as eyther the one or other gains the maistry, and lifts it vp betweene those two light elements. the Witch that conceiueh contempt, brings forth despaire, and nurseth forward opinion. Thou art Foe to humility, and hast no shame, because thou art blinded; neither any vnderstanding, because thou ouer-turnest the braine, and engendrest the Palsie, both of the mind and bodie. Thou hast no Law, but sudden aptnesse and inclination; to be guided by thine owne transport; to assure thine owne despaire: that the rule of thine opinion, the Soule of thy distemper, and thy desire of reuenge; may make booty of impossible things. Thou only makest vs companions with beasts; takest reason from vs; settest diuorce betweene Body and Soule; deprivest vs of election; robbest vs of our owne wils; and destinarest vs to offer sacrifice, euen to all kindes of miseries and calamities. It was thou that didst build Hell, and Armed the Angels against God, yea, euen one Heauen against another. It was thou that madst the confusion of languages, when thou mountedst thy head as high as Heauen, by the proud top of audacious Nimrods Tower. From thy Womb, improuidence first receiued life, and all violent and insolent actions, tooke their former Essence. Thou makest vs presumptuous and miserable, full of melancholly, out of our senses, and meere mad men; by disposing vs to fiery diseases, whereon first rose the name of a fiery Ague. Thou makest vs all furie, drawest vs out of our selues, to be more beastlie then Beasts, to whom (by right) belongs the chiefe vse of thine imperfection. Thou distinguishest no times; but makest all seasons equall; all persons indifferent; all iudgements, venters; all authoritie, contemptible; all Iustice, powerlesse; the Magistrate doubtfull; and Lawe weake and imbecile, beyond her Nature. Thou raisest people into Armes; mockest all Superiors; formest * Anarchies; exaltest the wicked against the good; tyranisest our duty; seducest obedience, and excludest fidelity from our hearts, when they are thereto most willing. Thou art neuer pleasde, but in pleasing thy selfe; accounting patience to be faintnesse; counsell, excuse; disposition, delay; mildnesse, fear; and humility, sottishnesse.

* A people without Prince or gouernment.

To conclude, from thee springeth

the chiefest mishapes that can cometo Men; by teaching them an opinion of duty, as a shadow without a substance; debilitating their actions; & destroying (by immoderate power) all those Vertues, which Iustice establisheth in this great Theater of worldlie affaires; and would depend vppon diuine assistance; but for such a dangerous plague to all mankind.

10 But O deare Wisedome! How necessary art thou for the helpe of vs all? Thou seruest for an eye, or as bright day to our Soules, like those windowes properly designed to any goodly building. Fooles come to knowledge of thee, when thy vertue is not auileable for them, but to their sorrowes; and when repentance whips them, for not entertaining thee in due time. Rash courage commends thee, in the verie depth of his fall, and exalts thee aboue the height from whence he fel; because he did not accept thee as guide and directour. The vnfortunate tearme thee, to be none of their faction; and the fortunate ascribe the vertue of their content, onely to thy merit. The Blinde doe borrow eies of thee, whereby to direct them, and the best sighted (seeing thee) stand like meere Mummings, gazing at the glory of thy bright radiance. Thou seruest as Sentinell in Armies; as a Rampier for Citties weakly defended; as a faithful Guard to forsaken Princes; as the cheefe Starre for Marriners to faile by; and the first innuentresse of all Commerce. It is by thy Grace (next vnto God) that Kingdomes are established; Magistrates ordained, and Policies authorized.

20 It is thou that makest Kinges venerable; that keepest people in awe; the feeble in assurance; the strong in suspicion; bringest offenders to punishment, and containest the honest minded in their quiet being. It is thou that giuest esteeme to valour, and keepest courage in contempt; vntill it bee enriched by thy assistance. It was thou that gauest Testimony to God, of the Royall Prophet, when he said: I haue known David, the Sonne of Isai, a Man according to mine owne heart; in Wisedome and greatnesse of Courage. It was thou that madest the same David acceptable to the mildnesse of Thou gauest government to Ioseph in Egypt, Cadmus in Beotia; Ianus, in Italie; Triptolemus and Ceres, in Scicily; Bacchus, in the Indiaes; Saturne, in Asia; Pompilius, at Rome, and Ulysses euery where. Thou madst graue Nestor much more respected, then the furious and rash-headed Aiax; yea, more then the vntameable Achilles. In briefe, it is thou, that onelie inciteth and compelleth masse puissance, for more employment of the bodie, then the mind, wherein thou declarest thy selfe to bee the Genius, and fauourite of the Deuill.

Returning now to meere Valiancy, to form a necessary perfection for him; I say, that all such, as haue had nothing but courage onlie: haue lost themselues wilfully, and were thereto trained thorow their owne default. And (on the contrary) where Wisedome and true Iudgment hath managed the businesse; the maine matter hath not onely beene preserued, but established from perishing, euen to immortality. Courage, (let me not say inconsideration) ruined the two new Potentates of our time: for the one exalted himselfe aboue the Towers of his young authoritic; and the other became a founder of such a Fortune, as was blunted by the meere incontinency of his owne desires. I confesse, that courage lookes sweetelie (at first sight) in the eye of rash conceit: yet will she bee courted onely by the wise, I would say, by vertuous mindes; that conclude the perfection of their happinesse, by the Iustice of their actions; shaping them alwaies, to bee as commendable in desseigne, as by attempt and finall conclusion. The one, (without any other fore sight, then goodnesse of the place) promiseth himselfe an inuincible permanency: but the other iudgeth what is to come, by the issue of his precedent actions, which carried no splendor but by the vglinesse of theirs, that suffered them to shine in such true radiance, as they themselues could neuer attaine vnto.

How many hasty heads haue I seene perih; without any benefit to their Countrey, but onelie their owne example, as an admonition to prevent the like calamitie? how many Families haue I knowne desolated, by this plague of supposed happinesse, Glory and Life? How many young Gentlemen haue I seene buried, that (but for this dangerous diseate) had rather beene an admiration to Straungers, then sorrowe to their Friendes, by such vntimely losse? How many braue Castles haue I seene abandoned, by the rash fall of their Commanders, who would needs seek Death in their Enemies Trenches; and wilfullie loose their liues there, when neither vndermining, Cannons; scalds, or breach could preuaile against them; albeit, they were euen as common and familiar to them, as desire of superiority? How many Prouinces haue I seene deserted, by the ouer abounding courage in such, whom election and not lot, made their Governours? How many wilfull people haue I noted to perish; assemblies dissolue themselves; Comminalties abrogated; factious heads run to the libbet, training Troupes after them likewise, much more indiscreete, then faultie? Meere Courage is a double death, that stifles reason, and makes the body insensible of the thing, which most offendeth it; yea, killeth and ruinateth it altogether. Meere Courage is a double debilitie of Spirit, which altereth the Heart and Soule, principall Iudges of the humain Common-wealth, and Oeconomie of the little World. Meere Courage, is a double Enemy, that betrayeth vs by mis-gouernment, and leaderth vs into the Ambush, which our Enemies wiledome prepared for vs. Meere Courage is a double assurance, promising and performing victory, to him that out-reacheth vs in iudgment and counsell. Meere Courage, is a double Engine, that shaketh our naturall carriage, and changeth vs into that, which is much lesse proper, then the thing that animates and most enflameth vs.

I grow the larger in this Argument, to abate the prodigious pride of greatnessse, and to annihilate the presumptuous excellence, which they giue themselues aboue others, who (oftentimes) are rather inferiour to them in happinesse, then in merite. They attribute our Soueraigne and principall Felicity, to a braue and swaggering ostentation, as to the onely Lady and Queen of this life: which (notwithstanding) is not to be

be found in vs, but by the knowledge of true humanity. I am sworne Enemy to Court-flatterers, and Mountebanke Diuines. of these daies, who hold opinion, that to induce, & thrust a man on to the rule of duty: there is nothing more contenable and necessary; then to shew him all that is glorious in him, or worthy of most precious esteeme. Alasse, by this way, Princes (intemperate enough of their owne Nature) can meet with nothing but Rockes, which bruising themselves against, they must needs fall into the Guise of ignorance. Al this Cabala is practised to no other end, but to puffed vp vaine-glory, and to make apparance esteemed for an effect. By this meanes, a man labours to conceiue a good opinion of himselfe, and then aduentures vpon some enterprize, wherein he cannot chuse but faile. For the chiefest vertue in a man (that is truelie Man) according to the rule of truth; is properly placed in the slender estimation, which he ought to haue of his owne miserable condition, whereinto he was deiectioned by the fall of our first Father: by iust consideration whereof, all vaine glory and presumption will bee beaten downe in vs. For, if we duely weigh, in what manner our first grace is disgraced of Celestiall fauour, and that (instead thereof) we are plunged in the bottomlesse death of corruptions, all the parts of our Soules becomming so possessed with sinne, that each man, in himselfe (as the Eagle of Doctours, S. Augustine saith) is made a meere Enemy to Nature; If wee were liuely touched with the rigour of our importune mallice, and those out-ragious defectes, which betrayes vs in perticuler conduct of our liues: we would immediatly depart out of our selues; as empty and vnprouided of all goodnesse, and seek our glory else-where; yea, our Dignitie, Fortune, and perfect contentment; by sighing after those glorious qualities, as desirous to giue a new Title to humane Nature, the name whereof being so infamous and monstrous in it selfe.

It is our case, that being puffed vp with the little glory, which remaineth of our Originall, and tearmed (by our diuines) a portion of the Diuinity: we exalt our selues in such sort, that we grow proud of those things, which appertaine onely to the goodnesse of God, yea, and that in such manner, as he refuseth further to assist vs; because we referre that to our owne proper and peculiar vertue, which is due to his grace onely, being the sole Artezane of our cheefest felicity. We neede not bee proud of vnderstanding our primatiue excellency, if wee consider withall, in what darkenesse wee are enueloped, and detained in the Prison of that Curse, which is likewise false vpon vs, by the timerity of him, who; hauing touched what was forbidden, threw into obliuion that Wisedome, which might haue kept him to the subiect and object of his first condition. Alas, we conceit, that we haue something properly resident in our selues, which opinion being presented to our vnderstanding: abuseth our weaknesse, and eleuates vs to ingratitude; yea, euen to the ouerweening boldnesse of Nimrod, who thought to touch Heauen with his litle finger, as Lysimachus with the point of his Lance. Man hath naturally in him a Spirit, too capable of entertaining this life; and some discretion also of good and euill, grauen on the Table of his conscience. Hee hath likewise in him, some naturall knowledge of God. But all these thinges are sullied in him, much like to pure and good Wine, infected by the foule sauour of the Caske; which makes it loose the grace both of goodnesse and beauty, throwing a sower, harsh, and hurtfull tast to health on it.

In this manner, the iudgement remaining with him, whereby to discern the most from the least; is imperfect & confused in part, and whatsoever is solide in him, slydeth away in meere vanity. As (for example) his courage, or (to speake better) his will, which (without will) ouerthrowes it selfe by frenzies, and impetuous heate: according as his errour enstructeth him to runne, and as his bad Nature transporteth him with motion, which was not so familiar in the first man. In breefe, the intelligencē that courage onely (in Man) hath of his own good; is nothing else but an horrible source of errour, which declares it selfe in plurality of most necessary desseignes, and not onely ly therein, but in this faire and holy consideration: to wit; That the Heavens doe alwaies retaine their ordinary motion; The Waters their inconstancy, and course ordained; The Birds building their Nests; The Fruites fructifying according to their times; And finally, that no Creature (inferiour to Man) committeth any fault in his worke. Whereas (quite contrary) he drawes himselfe from his proprietie, to resolute and conuert into his contrarie; hauing lesse shame then the Molosses of Albania, and lesse feare then the Vultures, which follow battailes, and seek the furious encounters of cruell and dreadfull Armies.

We must deriue then our conclusion in this point (at least) if we followe Christianity, and the duty of a Christian Soule, which neither can, or ought to glorifie it selfe, but in the Grace of God; we must conclude (I say) that all our vertue, be it great or litle, cometh from no place else, but Heauen; or, to speake better, from the first, chiefe and Soueraigne Architect: who, without considering or regarding any thing beside himselfe (fore-seeing our weaknes) is willing (of his owne good pleasure) to helpe some, by placing them in honor, as vessels of his Almightyesse, and to leaue others in their own iudgment. So that the one haue Grace, which is not due to them, neither is giuen them, but by diuine clemency; and the other receiue such punishment as they deserue. For it is in Gods power, to communicate himselfe to them that are vnworthy (but onely by his grace) and not to vse the like to euery one; to make his iudgments admired, and to enforce our diligent search, for that, which wee esteeme more requisite for him to giue, then we are worthy of. Onely we are so much the lesse capable of this favor, by how much there is nothing more certaine; then that God will neuer pardon a man of violent courage, and of prompt execution in doing euill, being led by the rage of his own angry reuenging hart.

The whole drift of my scope in this Argument, is nothing else, but to enstruict Princes, that they ought to ioyne piety and pittie with their State affaires; and further to assure them, that their courage (without wisdom) is rather the fire of Gods anger, then any marke of perfect valour. The Gothes, Hunnés, & Vandals, may testifie the same, whose rage made an vniuersall terror in three great parts of the World, running here and there, like a tempest arising on the calme Sea: which yet (at length) dissolved of it selfe, and brought more amazement then perill to the beholders. The Gauls also witnessed as much, who, being growne great with courage, and improuident in their blindfolded hope; ran to ruinate the buildings of Rome, & not to the Conquest of the Cittizens. Tell me, I pray ye, to what end serued such hastinesse, temerity, and insolent fury? To what purpose were the Gauls so violently transported; but onely to tell the Romaines, that their Enemies were more vincible, then vneasie to be vanquished? That their fury, was without desseigne; their rage, without any premeditation; their rash leape, their owne breake-neck; their enterprise, a meere Chaos of dis tempered wils; and the issue of all, a shame very dammageable, a ruinous infamy, and a perticuler scandall to that Nation.

Courage (saith a learned Gentleman of France) is not for these times, when Men are growne madde; nor for these daies, wherein follie possesseth vs, transport commaundeth vs, and the verie Atomies of inconstancie, doe forme a body to our intentions. We make Warre with the Spaniard in a leafe of Paper; we gad thorough all our Parliament Chambers; our Cannon is yet in the Metall Mine; our Artillerie carriages yet growing in Forrests; our Pikes in the liuing bodies of Trees; our Souldiers in the purse; our Captains in creation; and our enemy (who hath not so much courage, as to enterprise any difficult thing, without a solide & robust bodie) mindes not the defiance in writing, but victorie, destroyeth Piccardie and Champaigne; and, in stead of Paper warre, which leadeth our Frenchmen by the nose, to the feuerall quarters of the Citty: he brings his Ensignes before our Bastions, his Trenches to our wals, & his Souldiers to our breaches. Of al which, our own rashheaded ambition is the only cause, & somewhat else, whereof I spare to speake at this time,

CHAP. XIII.

Of a strange and wonderfull accident, that happened in the Islands of the Molucaes, about the yeare of our Lord, 1525.

Haue long time forborne, to remember in this labour of important occasions, an admirable accident, which befell in the Isles of the Molucques, seated in the East Indiaes. Whereof (neuerthelesse) there is not any mention made, in the Booke of the generall Historie of the Spanish Indiaes, nor in Hierome Osorius, Byshop of Sylues, neither in Lopez de Castagneda, and other Historians of Portugall: but onely in the Booke of Laurentius Surius, Germaine, Chronicler to Charles the fift Emperour, entitled; The Historie of all memorable thinges, as well Ecclesiasticall as Seculer, happening within seauenty and eight yeares, in all partes of the World, beginning at the yeare 1500. But the saide Surius heard this strange accident, by people worthy of beleefe, who made report thereof to the Emperour, because they were there present at the time; and since then, I my selfe haue heard it confirmed by diuers honorable Gentlemen, who trauided for certaine knowledge thereof.

Laurentius Surius, Chronicler to the Emp. Charles the fift.

Five especiall Islands of the Molucques.

The Spaniards first discoverers of the Molucques.

The Isles of the Molucques are many in number, but among the rest, there are five, more great and remarkable then all the other; which are named Tidora, Terrenata, Mata, Matila, and Matiena. In which Islands, there is much greater increase of Spices, then in any other as yet discovered: as of Pepper, Nut-megges, Ginger, Cloues and Maces. Moreover, the Countrey aboundeth in Rice, which is their onely Corne, and in many other Fruites. The Spaniards were the first that discovered these Islands, and made very great profits of them, by Traffick of those Spices at meane prices. Which when the King of Portugall vnderstood, he made knowne to the Emperour Charles the fift, King of the severall Spaines; what wrong hee offered him, by sending his nauall Armies to Traffique in those quarters, because they belonged to his partage, which had beene made betweene the Kings of Castile and Portugall, by Pope Alexander the sixt, a Valentinois, who had heard the discoueries of the new lands, made by both these Kings, and the differences depending betweene them, for gouernment of them. Whereupon, of his owne meere good will and motion, hee gaue the Indiaes to the Kinges of Castile, and all the Coast of Affrica to the Kinges of Portugall; with charge, to conuert the Idolaters and Gentiles to the Faith of Iesus Christ.

And to the end, that the one should not presume any way against the other, he commaunded a line to be drawne vpon the Globe, descending from the North to the South, & passing towards the West more then 400. Miles from one of the Isles of Cap verdi; because it should not touch any iote of Affrica, which appertained to the King of Portugall. This line deuided the whole World, and serued as a borne or limitation, to the Conquests of both these Kinges. The partes beyond the line, belonged to the Spaniards, and those on the hither side, to the Portugals. And yet, notwithstanding this deuision, each of these kings was perswaded, that the Molucques belonged to his severall part, and there was a long time of contention (there-about) betweene them. But the Emp. hauing neede of Mony, to serue his Warres in Italy, Germanie, and Fraunce: quitted his rights to the King of Portugall, for three hundred and fiftie thousand Ducates, whereby the Portugals haue (ever since) enioyed the sole Trafficke, to their great and inestimable profit.

At that time raigned in the great Isle of Tidora, one named Mansor, a Man well skild in Astrology, and very affable, contrary to the nature of Mahometane Religion: for hee entertained the Spaniards courteously, as afterward hee did the Portugalles, permitting all his Sub-

Subjects to be instructed in Christian Religion, and so many of them as pleased to be baptized, the Portugalles having brought thither Priestes, and religious persons for the purpose. In the meane while, the Deuill (enuying that Gods Kingdome should be so freely furthered, in these rich and populous Islands) quickly altered the estate of Christian Religion: for this good King Mansor dying, his Sonne (succeeding him in the Kingdome) not onely interdicted the Portugalles Commerce with his Subjects; but also commaunded his people (as suddenly as they could) to kill them, and that none should be so bold, as to make profession of Christian Faith, or to meddle with any matter thereof. This was no sooner vnderstood by some, who were but badly affected to Christianity: but (before they could preuent it) many Portugals were slaine, and such as had any means of escape, fled into their Ships, lying neere at Anker, and returned home to Portugall with these ill tidings.

Heere ye are to note, that after this disloyall act, of so euill vsage towardes Strangers, and breach of fidelitie, without any cause giuen to procure it, (albeit the deceased King Mansor, whose owne Letters cleared from all such barbarous and Mahometane perfidie, had graunted to the Portugals, free libertie to sley any that hindred their Commerce, or any way scandalized their Religion, which they refused to doe) they carried themselues very patiently, in all the iniuries that these Mahumetist Molucques offered them, who were much assisted in their violence, by the Arabian Marchants, that repined and grudged at the Christians fauour and authority. After (I say) this massacre of Christians; for the space of two yeares, the Land of Tidora, and other Isles thereto adiacent, became to be barren, that had before beene as fruitfull, as any other Countries in the World.

Their Trees brought forth no more Fruits nor Spiceries, and albeit the grounds were sowed and re-sowed many times together; yet did they not produce any Corn, and the Rice which they kept for further sowing; putrified of it selfe. The sweete Waters became salt; the Cattell, as Elephants, Oxen, Kine, Camels, Sheepe, and such like, dyed (well neere) all, and caused the death of many people beside. All which notwithstanding, these wicked Mahumetists would not acknowledge their Apostasie (the greater part of the Island hauing made profession of Christianity in the life time of Mansor) abjuring the same now with their new king, who was of a wauering and inconstant Spirit.

The King of Portugall, named John, hauing heard by such as escaped, the Treason and iniury committed on his people, was not thereby dismayed; but arming himselfe with royall courage, and not regarding the great distance of two thousand leagues by Sea, with other difficulties of passages to the Molucques; leuied an army of four hundred men, who (two yeares after this massacre) arriued in the Hauen of Tidora, which is a great City, and whereof the whole Island beareth name. The Army landed, and (placing their Artillery) gaue great terror to the City, and erected a Fort on the Sea shoare: the King, with his Islanders and other Neighbours, labouring to hinder the Portugals purpose. Here we are to consider, that the principall Armes of the Islanders, were poysoned Arrowes, which they could deliuer from their Bowes very dexteriously, and those arrowes were very dangerously bearded, otherwise they went starke naked, as all the other Negroes doe.

Twenty thousand of these men of war being thus assembled, they ranne with such boldnesse and courage vpon the small number of Christians; that they had all beene immediately slaine, if these Apostate Molucques (God so appointing it) had not beene suddenly surprized with a mightie feare and terror, & that in such sort, as the Weapons fell to the ground out of their handes. For the Sunne (albeit it was then the houre of midday) was so obscured, as hardlie could they discern one another. The earth trembled and quaked, and fierie stones fell downe from Heauen, which bruised and battered their Mosques or Temples. The Trees were strangely rent and torne, the roots being turned vppward. This tempest beginning somewhat to flake, the Portugals ranne vpon the affrighted Barbarians, and stewe the greater number of them, not any one Christian being so much as wounded, and the Islanders flying, the Portugalles remained Conquerors, and finished vp the remainder of their Fort.

The Molucques enter into considerat on of this admirable accident

The Molucques hauing considered with themselues, that this losse sustained in battaile, the barrenesse of the Land, the Earthquake, terrour, darkening of the Sunne, the fiery stones falling from Heauen, and the Tempest which rent their trees in such sort, could not happen but by Gods heauy displeasure, and that their Prophet Mahomet could not be God, but rather an abuser and imposture, and that the Christians were assisted by the true God indeede, and to him onelie (and to none else) repaire ought to bee made for safetie, as well in this World, as that to come; Considering also, that the Famine, barrenesse of the Earth, and Mortality both of Men and Beasts, which hapned in the precedent yeares, was, because they had forsaken Christian Religion, and (returning to the Mahometane) had cruelly murdered them that enstructed thē in the truth, without any iniurie offered on their behalfe: Hereupon, they concluded to make peace with the Christians, with promise (thence forward) to liue in loue and fidelity with them, embracing Christian Religion againe. Moreouer, such as had not formerlie beene baptized, they caused them then to bee baptized, whereof there was so great a number, that in the space of a Weeke, more then fiftene thousand were become Christians. Beside, diuers of the neighbouring Islands, hearing of this wonderfull accident, came thither in great numbers to doe the like. Since which time, the Countrey returned, to the former fertility, & the most part of the people haue continued in Christianity. And not only these of the Molucques, but many of the great Prouince of China, of the Kingdomes of Narsingua, Bindana, Bennaga, Isaana, Coa, Calecuth, Arabia, and others, became Christians, who before were Idolaters, and of the Mahometane Religion.

The Molucques forsake their former Apostasie, and returne to Christianity.

Of other Nations that became Christians vpon this accident.

CHAP. XIII.

Of some, who haue counterfeited sicknesse, to exempt themselues from businesse and employment: And of others, who (in mockery of Men) haue feigned to haue their imperfections; and false (truelie) into sicknesse, and the same deformities.

with Oyles and other things, wrapping and binding vp his ioynts, because hee would haue nothing to doe at the Court, either by night or day, or attend (as Courtiers doe) vpon any great person. But in the end, his fortune so fell out, that he happened to haue the gout indeede. Appianus Alexandrinus reporteth also of another Romaine, who, to escape the proscriptions of the Romaine Triumuir, and not to bee knowne for what he was, by such as might take notice of him: kept himselfe close, and wore an emplaster of veluet vpon one of his eyes, which hee continued for a long time. After all such search and pursuite was passed ouer; the man took off his plaister, and found the vtter losse of that eye indeed.

A Romaine that dissembled to haue but one eye.

The reason of his fall into this accident, is plaine and apparant, in regard that the eye, not performing his action (which is to see) looseth it selfe. As may be gathered by such, who haue long time beene imprisoned in some dark Caue or Dungeon, where no light could be discerned; and haue lost their sight, or very greatly impaired it, by discontinuation from beholding light. Serpents containe the same quality, for when they come forth from vnder the Earth, where they hid themselues all the Winter: they see not any iote at all, and therefore they are the more easilie kild. This Cælius, who became Gouty, it may be, that idlenesse, the cloaths wrapped about his ioyntes, with the ranck & hot Oyles applied to his limbs and and Arteries; hauing made attraction of the humours; caused such goutines. For; if a bruise, receiued by a straiue shoe, or a seame of some hardnesse in a stocking, hath many times occasioned the Gout, according as some learned Phisitians haue writen: much stronger reason then is there for the fore-named matters.

But of another History, which I my selfe credibly knew to happen, I cannot alleadge any naturall reason. During those troubles of the union or league in France, it chanced, that (neere vnto a Castle) certaine honest men were: set vpon by Theeues, and robd in such sort, that they had nothing left them but their shirts. When they perceived the Castle; they went presently thither, and entreated the Lord thereof, that hee would lend them some assistance, for apprehension of the Theeues: in regard that he had a certaine knowledge of them; and was armed with such authority, as might (at least) helpe them to their Garments againe. But the wretched Gentleman would afford them no fauour; no, not so much as to see them: but feigned that hee had the Collique, and was vnable to stirre out of his Bed; or to attend vpon any businessse whatsoener. It was then the coldest season of the yeare, and the Seruants (albeit vnkowne to their Master) lodged these despised poore men, (for that night) in a stable; whence they parted homeward on the next morning, without drawing the least courtesie that could bee; from that vngentle Gentleman. Now, I know not whether it happed by iust vengeance of Heauen, or by some naturall occasion thereto leading: but he fell into the Collike indeed, and keeping his Chamber for it, the space of twenty daies, at last he died by violent extremity thereof.

An Abbot of Guyenne, and Archdeacon in a Bishoppricke, was cited by the Bishop and Chapter, to appeare at a visitation, for assessing of each Benefice in the Diocesse (according to their faculties) for the releefe of poor Parishes, from whence they deriued dismes and rents. The Abbot made excuse, saying hee had a plurisie (which was meere lyalle) & therefore he could not be there present. But within few daies after, hee was taken with such a grieuous paine in his side; that hee kept his Bed a whole yeare together, and was glad to haue his side cotterized in two places, all which notwithstanding, he could not recouer health while he liued.

Snibdager, King of Swedia, being very colerous; counterfeited deafnesse, to the end, he might heare no requestes made to him for bestowing of any gifts. For in that Country, he negotiated his whole reigne; by conference with the King, and so by writing or petition, as they do to this day: But in short time the King became both deafe and blinde indeed.

I know a young Scholler, descended of good Parentage in the Franche Countie, who was a very facetious Scoffer and mocker, and continually vsed to counterfeit the gait, gesture, and behauiour of his Sister (the Wife to his elder Brother, descended of a verie worthy and vertuous familie, and had brought great estates (and meanes to his Brother) but she was lame, and as she halted, so (in scorne) he would doe the like. But (no doubt by Gods iudgement) he chanced to breake one of his Legges, which could neuer after be recouered, or brought to any forme, but that he halted downe right to his dying day.

Mothers vsed to correct (& with verie good reason) their Children, when they counterfeited squinting in their eyes, gogling, blindnesse, limping, wry Mouthes, and other imperfections and deformities of body. For as a bodie so young and tender, wil easily apprehend any bad impression; so, oftentimes it falls out (by what meanes I know not) that they are suddenly surprized, euen in their wanton and mocking imitation. And assuredly, I haue seene many, who haue become sicke, in attempting (by scorne) to resemble sicknesse especially, if such dissimulation hindered their due presence from requisite occasions; and Children, in mocking yeares thers, by successe of time; haue bredde to the same disease or infirmity. Opium or Toade (very venomous). A 3. main remedy, must then be be ordered into a Syrop, as in that nature it is vsed, to displace phlegme, and an old dry cough. Hidromell or Metheglin gargarized, doth very well cleanse all hinderances, which proceede from any thicke phlegme, either in the throat; Vuula or the Almondcs. Concerning the fordidc and inneterate Vlcer, which he seemeth to haue had in his leg, and cured it by the helpe of Hony: the case is very euident, for Hony cleanseth, clearcth, and is vtter enemy to all fordidy or filthinesse, and having thus neated the Vlcer; it easily heals & closeth it vp. Touching that which he alleadged, of some, who haue distilled & put Hony into their eares, being deaffened, full of windes, and ascending vp into the braine: this must be vnderstood of very old Hony, foddcn with foure times as much old Wine, for all hot medicaments (as very olde wine and Hony are) they doe disperse windes very easily, and other cold causes, which procure deaffenesse, and other accidents in those parts.

That it causeth the drying vp of Itches, Tetteres, Ring-wormes; and other such like defoedations in the skinne; proceedeth from hence; that it is absteriue of his owne nature, and a great enemy to all corruption, for whatsoeuer things are confected in Hony, will neuer corrupt. By the same reason, it worketh the death of Itches and Tetteres, which are nothing else, but meere vncleanesse and filthinesse of the body. In regard of sight, questionlesse, being mingled with a little Fennell water, and so distilled into the eyes; it quitteth them from blearings and waterish humors, which congealing in the, doth greatly trouble the sight, especially in such as vse ouermuch weeping. To conclude, Ladies and Gentlewomen doe wash their faces and hands therewith, to keepe them smooth, faire and white. And Cato was wont to say; That to liue long, we must vse Hony within the body, and oyle without.

Galen thus finishing his prooffe (by very good reasons) that the olde man had spoken truly; would not so giue it ouer, but though the young man (who was oppositiuely contrary to the other) had declared so much against Hony; yet would he maintaine the truth of his speeches likewise. And directing his eye to him, began in this manner, discoursing with plenty of words, after the Asiatick course, and not Laconically, as his good and ancient M. Hypocrates was wont to do in his time. Let no man count it strange (quoth he) if thou doe mislike the vse of Hony, and lay so much blame vpon it: for it is very contrary to thy nature, being of an angry and chollericke temper, hot in action, and easily displeascd. And though I had not heard thee speak, nor beheld any action of thine: yet very sight had beene sufficient to me; thy haire being red, thy skin yellowish; thy body leane and meager; these are enow wherebý to direct iudgement. First, let me tell thee, that diseases are neuer cured, but by their contraries, for whereas thou saidst, that thou hadst a Feauer tertian, and supposed it to come by the vse of Hony, a food enforced in the time of thy captiuitie: I make no doubt at all thereof; for Hony conuerteth it selfe quickly into red choller; in any body naturally hot, as thine is, and I wonder it did not more hurt vnto thee, because it was in no manner prepared. For albeit that many viands are good, yet there be some that (before they are eaten) doe require preparation, to correct a certaine malignity, which they haue naturally in them. As Coriander, which is venomous of it selfe; Neuerthelesse, corrected with Vineger, it is an excellent medicine for the stomack, trauailed with indigestions, and filled with windenesse. In like manner, crude and raw Hony, not repurged from his excrements; offendeth the stomack, engendering a desire of casting, and descending into the intestines, begetteth there such windenesse, and so painefull gripings, as are not possible to be declared, and therefore thou hast affirmed nothing but truth. As for the drie cough which it raised in thee, there is no doubt thereof, for but by eating it rawe; some part thereof must needs fall into the conuoye of the lights and liuer, as it doth in all liquid things (that are thicke and impure) receiued into the body. And his tartnesse or saltnesse (not being scummed away before) prouoketh a dry cough, yet auoyding nothing in spitting, because no matter at all was descended to the lights & liuer. Which hapned not in like sort to this old man, for he had phlegm enough in him, to let fall downe ordinarily vpon those parts. But for that report, that Hony should engender wormes; it is quite contrary to all reason; because all things steeped in Hony, are exempt from vermine mine or corruption. But if it fall out, that a man vsing Hony, had wormes before, or is enclined naturally to them: then it doth maintaine and nourish them, euen as Suger doth; but it can bee no cause of their generation.

Concerning Hydromell or Metheglin, drunke in the continuance of thy Feauer Tertian, and presumed to prolong the same: there is nothing more certaine, then that this drinke (composed of Hony and Water) did it. But it was not caused by any defect in the liquor, which of it selfe is most wholesome, for Men of melancholly habitude, and for diseases of black Choller and Phlegmaticke: but for any chollericke person, such as thy selfe is, most certaine is it, that it is a true foment, and a maintainer of fiery Agues, euen such as thine then was, and he was greatly to be blamed, that thereto did aduise or counsell thee. And whereas thou saiest, that it is an enemy to such places, as the skin is flaid or gone off: it is to be considered, that it was no Vicer, like vnto the other; for it detergeth, cleaneth, and dryeth not. To regenerate new skinne, we must not apply detersive Medicines: but such as are desiccative, without any mordication. . . And I credit well, that burnt Paper was much more conuenient for it: but yet we must not say, that if Medicines be badly vsed, they are not therefore good, being fitly applied.

I conclude then (by these reasons) that you both haue spoken very well of Hony, albeit ye are so different in opinion: but all your contrariety hath no other ground, but that the younger man of ye both, did not vse Hony duely, and with consideration and good iudgement, according as the circumstances required. Thus Galen gaue ending to this Controuersie, and it was to be feared, that if Galen had not thus moderated the matter; the difference had caused blowes between them. Such debates and contentions, are daily seen in Countrey Townes and Villages, when a man will rashly commend his Scithe, Hatchet, Sickle, Dogge, Bull, or Cow, beyond his Neighbours, and thereupon are ready to goe to Law: But breaking off this discourse, because I would not be offensive to the reader: I wil adde another Chapter, to declare whence the matter of Hony is taken, and how it is made.

CHAP. XVI.

How Hony is made; Whence Manna proceedeth; Of the Aiery Hony; And of Sagar.

Hony commeth from the Dew of Heauen, which falleth vpon the Herbes and Flowers, and is sucked vp by the Bees, and enclosed in their stomackes: after ward, it is vomited or cast vp at their mouthes, and they preserue much part thereof in the hollow of their Iawes, to liue thereon during winter, and other hard times. Prouident Nature hath so well ordered all things, for the benefit and commodity of Man; that shee hath bestowed many vertues and vigours on those pretty Flies, in gathering sufficient for themselves, and liberall extendure for Man also. For it is a great merchandise, helpfull for diuers Maladies, and a singular nourishment for some bodies, as may bee gathered by our former discourse.

Nature hath bene so bountifull to Man, and still continueth the same affection; that she causeth great quantitie of this Hony dew to fall, euen like raine vpon the earth in some Countreys, vpon the Mountaines, and places where Frankinsence groweth. To gather it, the Inhabitants lay fleeces of Wooll vnder the Trees, and beat the Trees, to cause the Dew to fall vpon the fleeces, which drinke it in: afterward, they presse the fleeces, and receiuing this honny-dew into conuenient Vessels; they boyle and purifie it, making vse thereof in their foode, as also in their Medicines, as they thinke best, and it is much better then that which is wrought by the Bees.

Galen saith, that there fell such great quantity of this Dew (in his time) in his Countrey of Pergamus; that the Countrey people (greatly delighted therein) gaue thanks therefore to Iupiter: Aelianus writeth also, that there fell such such plenty thereof in India, in a Region which is called Prasia, and so moistened the Grasse, that the Sheepe, Kine, and Goates feeding thereon, yeelded Milke sweete like Hony, which was very pleasing to drinke. And when they vsed that Milke in any disease, they needed not to put any Hony therein, to the end it should not corrupt in the stomacke: as it is appointed in Hecticke Feauers, Consumptions, Tisickes, and for others that are vlcered in the intestines, as is confirmed by the Histories of Portugall.

Euripides and Aelianus of the vertue of Hony.

Hony both medicinable & venomous.

Dioscorides concerning hony

Hony gathered in Sardignia.

Another kind of dew beside the former.

Grained Manna, the best is of Calabria.

Euripides saith, that meere Hony fell vpon the Trees in Media; and Aelianus saith, that in Trapezonde, the people gathered Hony on the Boxe-tree leaues; and albeit it was bitter, and of strong fauour, yet it cured such as were mad, and them that were tormented with the falling sicknesse. Doubtlesse, it is very likely, that Hony should rellish of the Plant or Hearbes quality, from whence it is gathered: for if the Tree be venomous, such will the Hony be, and if the Hearb or Grasse be healthful, so is it likewise. Which was very well obserued by Dioscorides, who saith; In Heraclea of Pontus, there was some Honie so venomous, that it would reduce all the body into a sweat, and take away their senses, that did eate thereof: but the Hearbe Rhue being presently taken, was an immediate remedie. In Sardignia it is gathered of very bitter tast, because it may be, that much Worme-wood or Sothern-wood groweth in that Countrey: and yet notwithstanding, it is not venomous, but irksome to tast.

And to the end, that nothing may be omitted, of what may be said concerning Hony; I finde, that there is another kinde of Dew, beside the former, which congealeth of it selfe, & is found and taken vpon the leaues and branches of Trees, vpon Hearbs and stones, and sometimes on the very ground, forming it self into litle Grains, like Gum, which falleth from heauen before break of day; being very sweete in tast. And this dew or moisture, is called grained Manna, the best whereof commeth from Calabria, where they take it on their common Ash-trees, vpon the wide commons, and (many times) vpon some other Trees, by some secret of Nature. It maketh the belly loose, without any violence, as by daily experience it is to be seene, for if a man take the waight of two ounces and an halfe thereof; it releaseth the belly gently, and purgeth choller particularly: nor is there any feare, in giuing it to Women great with childe, and young sucking Children, if they neede any purging. Now adaies, because in stead of Hony, most part of men doe make vse of Suger, as being more amiable vnto Nature; it shall not vary much from our purpose, if wee enter into some breefe discourse thereof.

The vertue of this Manna in vse.

Suger is but the Pith or Marrow of certaine cultiued Reedes or Canes, naturally produced, and boiled in Water, vntill it grow to some hardnesse. The Suger, whereof our auncients (as Pliny, Galen, Dioscorides, Paulus Aeginetus, and others) make mention, was none other, but that which came forth of the Cane, by a rift made thereinto, as being ouer full of sugred pith, which congealed to the Cane like a Gumme; and long time (both before and after) no other kinde of Suger was knowne, but onely that, which quenched thirst in the hottest fiery Agues. Quite contrary to the Suger of these daies, which prouoketh thirst, and turneth it selfe into bitter choller, euen as Hony doth. This Hony was then rare, and all Sauces, Conserues, Confections, Opiates, Electuaries, and other medicinable compositions, were made with Hony; only through defect of knowing Suger in those times.

The definition of Suger.

Pliny, Galen, Dioscorides, Paulus Aeginetus.

The naturall Suger vsed by our elders.

But since Madame Auarice discovered the Art, of pressing and boyling those Suger Canes, deriuuing thence great aboundance of Suger: it hath happened; that the Indians haue (and yet yearly do) cut the Suger Canes, making also a yearely planting of the. And therefore there needeth no maruaile, if those great Suger Canes be not to be found, wherein nature shewed her effects, and so (by consequent) the naturall Suger vsed by our fore-fathers, is vtterlie lost. In stead whereof, our moderne rimes haue vsed Suger-candy, which is artificiall and cleare, drawne forth of minerall Salt; being sucked vp on the tongue, whereby it wholly resembleth the Suger of our Auncients.

The

Difference between Honey & Sugar in vertue.

How long time it is since sugar was first knowne.

*Majorque and Minorque.

The comparison which our Physitions make betweene Honey and Sugar, is, that they are both Absterfiue, Desiccatiue, and Resolueable; but yet Sugar much lesse then Honie. Sugar is not so contrarie to the stomacke, as Honie, neither so hot, that it may be numbered amongst those Medicines, which may be administered in Feauers: and this is the opinion both of Galen and Auicen.

The inuention of boyling, and making it into a Licquid kinde of Loaves, for common Traffique and distribution (in such great quantity) through all parts of the world, began within these last 800. yeares. In which time (yet farre off from the Originall) the Africans, and people of Asia, being Neighbors to the Indians, got the sight of making Sugar in India, & preparing their grounds aptly for Sugar Canes; by transporting some of those sugar Canes into their Countries, and husbanding their tillage for them. Afterward, they communicated the manner thereof to other people, as (at this instant) there is verie good Sugar made in Egypt, Madera, the Canarie Islands, throughout all Barbary, Sicily, the Isles * Baleares, in some partes of Spaine, and other places. The Reader may perceiue by this Discourse, in what case Honie is good, and in what euil: how it ought to be applied; and in what things it is best vsed; What difference there is betweene Honie and Sugar, and the generation both of the one and other. By obseruing also the disputation, which hapned between those men of different yeares, some profit may be gathered; in what kinde it is wholesome, Nutritiue, and Physicall; and in what Nature also, dangerous and hurtfull.

CHAP. XVII.

How the Gothes vsed to elect their Kings, Great, Fat, and Corpulent of Bodie. Contrariwise, how the Sarrazins wold haue their Kings to be Meager, Leane, and of sma' stature.

It were needlesse to declare, what manner of people the Sarrazins were, hauing formerly spoken sufficient thereof, in a Chapter onely thereto appertaining. And for the Gotes likewise, somewhat hath already bin saide, and the rest remaineth to more conuenient place. My instant purpose is, to relate of what stature and habitude of bodie, both those Nations vsed to create their Kings, thereby to appeare more apt and proper for command ouer them. The Gotes would not elect anie man to be their King, except he were tall, great, grosse, and verie corpulent. On the contrary, the Sarazins would haue no King to commaund ouer them, except he were little, lean, and low of stature. Whosoever considereth well on these matters, will find neither side to be void of reason, albeit their opinions were so opposite; and therefore wee will begin with them of great, grosse, and corpulent condition.

Hippocrates, the Prince of Physitions, saith; Great stature is verie seemly & commendable in a young man, and it begetteth him much grace; but it is an vnprofitable charge to age, and much worse then smallnesse. Doubtlesse, a Prince of high great appaunce, and goodly shape, is much more respected by the greater part of his people; then one that is lowe, leane, and little. To approue this, certain Normans, hauing made a Voyage into the Countries of Brasile (where the people were tearmed Saluages, and went whollie Naked, feeding on humane flesh) brought backe in their Ships diuers Captaines of the Caribes, and made a present of them to King Charles the ninth, who was then young in yeares, onely about the age of fiftene. The Saluages perceiuing his great attendance, and that euery one was verie respectiue of him, demanded what he was? One told them, that he was the King, who absolutely commaunded all France, a Countrie of large extendure; and well peopled. The Caribes answered, saying; Surely, there was but ill proceeding in the election of so young a King; rather this man, or that man had bin much better, pointing their fingers to two Switzers, of great corpulence, and were of the Guard belonging to the said King.

It is contemptible and vnseemlie, to behold a chiefe person, as the king, Captaine, or other men of command, to be of small stature, and their seruants great. The first King of Israel, which GOD chose and gaue to his people, was Saule.

Concerning

a man of high and great stature. After such slightly personage, commended by Hippocrates in a young man; he addeth, a great discommoditie, saying; Great Corpulence is insupportable and hurtful to age, because a great man being old, becommeth bending or bowing, and hath labor enough to beare the bignesse of his bodie, by the puffing up or swelling in his legges. Moreover, for the most part they are Cowardes, without magnanimitie or bodily strength: For neither their spirits, natural heat, or animal forces, are so well assembled and vnited, as in them of lesser corpulence.

If occasion so required, that such men should be exposed to danger, either by Sea or Land, or some misfortune or aduersity should befall them, they wil quickly shake and tremble with feare: vvhich hapneth thus to them, because their Naturall heat languisheth, their spirites are thin and little, and their blood lesse boiling. Besides, Naturall Vertue spendes it selfe, when it spreads into a long & large extendure; which vniting and enclosing it selfe in a little bodie, is much more vigorous and powerfull, then that which is heer and there disperfed. And that which yet is worse, what grace could the Gotes finde, in a bodie so great and grosse? For ouer and beside, that they must needs be vnable for all royal actions, either in bodie or vnderstanding; so likewise, life could not prolong it selfe so wel in them, as it commonlie dooth in leaner bodies. The reason is, because grosse corpulency hath not so manie vitall spirites, neither such plentie of bloode in the Veines and Arteries, as Leanness generally hath. For, Fatnesse doth cause great oppressi- on, whereby (such men) doe verie soone suffocate vnder anie laborious trauell, or sharpe disease. It procureth also, that in the least sicknesse or indisposition happen- ing to them; they thereby become daily tired, panting, sighing, grieuing, hart- lesse, deiected, and in such sort emptied of all courage, that life it selfe (thogh ten- derly affected) is tedious and irkesome to them.

Men of lesser stature, haue (naturally) a meruailous vigor, and the faculties of Nature strongly combined. We may discern in them verie excellent graces, both Corporall and Spirituall, with sin- gular promptitude and subtiltie of mind, and that in such sort, as not only they ex-cell, or equall (at least) the others in any disposition: but likewise, in strength and swiftnesse, as also in goodnes of stomack for eating or drinking. I haue oftentimes noted in our Armies, some French men of slender stature, who haue bin drinking a Vie (as we terme it) with Switzers and Germanes, great of bodie, and verie fat: but the Switzers and Germanes were sooner drunke, became sleepeie, reeling, and fell to the ground, vnable to vse any function of soule or bodie; then the other light timberd men, that went away clen- ly. The cause of all these thinges remain- eth, not only in great capacitie & large- nesse of the Veines and other Vesselles: but likewise in heate both Naturall and vehement, which boileth, concocteth, and consumeth all. Likewise, in a strong and firme braine, which doth not easilie apprehend or receiue fumes: but, in such maner, as a Tile made red hot with fire, or as a hot Iron, that slips water off, being cast vpon them; also, like to a verie drie ground, which suddenly dispatcheth and consumeth Water cast on it, for there it looseth it selfe, and passeth away, as in a subtile vapour.

Moreover, that commonly there is more magnanimitie and valour in a litle bodie, then in the corpulent; may be ap- proved by the Annals and Histories of Fraunce, in the life of King Pepin, called the Lowe or Little man, Maior of the Pallace, who liued about the yeare, 750. He was of no corpulence, yet contained in him a great spirite, generous and ro- bust of his members: which was the cause, that all the people of France, reie- cted Childerick (who was their legitimate and Naturall King, a man of great sta- ture) and hauing storne him as a Monk, did locke him vp in a Monastery, there to end his daies, because he was tearmed Do Nothing, a Coward, dull, and ordina- rily addicted to drunkennesse.

We read in the Romain Histories, that a man of Gaule, of immeasurable great- nesse, and higher (by the head) then anie in the Army, called or Challenged anie Romaine to fight with him in single com- bate. Among all the rest, Marcus Corui- nus (being a man of lowe stature) could not endure this insolence and arrogancy in the Gaule, but vndertook the fight with him, and slew him, in faire warre, as we vse to tearme it.

The Carthaginians were of no such humour as the Gothes and Sarazins, for their eyes were not fixed on Fatnesse or Leannesse, great or small stature; but on a man that was magnanimious and Vertuous, not any way respecting either bodily beauty, or feature. In brieft, I find that the Gothes were not so able in the election of their Kinges, as the Sarrazins. In like manner, they were people void of Letters or Learning, and those battailes which they won, consisted more in multitudes of men, then any industry or magnanimity.

On the contrarie, the Sarazins, Affricanes, and Arabians, had amongst them many men of great Learning, and vvell read in all the Sciences. Amongst all other excellent qualities, they were very skilfull in the choise of their Kinges; as being able (by Physiognomie) to gather mature iudgement of their Magnanimitic, Vertue, and Vices; well knowing, that in great and grosse Bodies, neyther Science, Good Spirite, or Generositie, hath (commonly) any abiding. And to this Day, they are knowne to be good Physiognomistes, and, but for them, all the Learning which the Gracians left vs, had vtterlie beene lost, thorough those bloody warres of the Gothes, Vandalles, Ostrogothes, Vuisigothes, and other barbarous people.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the abuse committed, in carrying sweet Drugges, Powders, and Perfumes, about Men or Weomen: What harme thereby ensueth, and at what time they came to be first vsed, and of their properties.

ME thinks, that the Romans dealt both wisely and worthily, in ordaining (at the request of their Censors, P. Licinius Crassus, & C. Iulius Caesar) that no man shoulde sell any sweet Odours, or Arromaticall Vnguents, which commonly were brought forth of strange Countries. For this law, they had (vndoubtedly) very great reason, because such sweet perfumes and fauours, do make men effeminate, weak in the brain, and all the other animal parts: engendering nothing else, but vertiginositie or giddinesse; and great torments in the head, with trembling of the Nerues; procuring (by these meanes) a pale and bloodlesse colour in the Face, and the verie selfe-same accident, which Quick-silver causeth amongst VVorkers in Golde.

Hippocrates and Galen doe both confirme as much, saying beside, That they do beget great paines in the head, and all such as make vse of them in wearing them about their bodies: it is only but to attract voluptuous Loue, whether it be in Men or Women. It was neuer seen, that any brane Princes, Captaines, or men of great erudition, and that made account of vertue, did vse any of those Perfumes, or Muske fauours. Not any (as I haue already said) but the voluptuous, or such as haue some defect in their bodie, do carry such smells about them; as a strong vasauntie breath, which commeth from the brain, or some Vlcere in the Lights and Lunges, beeing commonly called, a corrupt & stinking breath. Or for rotten teeth, full of putrified food sticking in them: Or for such as haue a Goat-like fauour, by reason of an ill-scenting sweat vnder their arme pits, & other parts of the bodie. For such people, I say, it is permitted (as a shadow to their defects) to carrie Perfumes, or sweete Powders about them, or else to haue their Garments perfumed. Martial speaketh the verie same in his Epigrams to Posthumus. The Easterne people did much more vse these sweete Vnguents, then they of the VVest; and were extraordinarily addicted to Luxuries and Voluptuousnesse, beyond all other parts of the world.

The verie greatest antiquitie that I can finde, for the vse of these sweete Vnguents, is in Genesis, where it is said, That Iacob sent such giiftes into Egypt; because there was a great dearth of Corne, and to be fauoured of Ioseph, who distributed the Kings corn out of his Garners, which he hadde reserued to preferue his people, or to make profit thereof; or rather, by diuine inspiration. Salomon in his Canticles, speaketh of most sweete Oyntmentes, especiallie in the first Chapter. The like dooth his Father DAVID, and that hee did Anoint his owne Face.

After that Alexander had conquered Darius, there was found (amongest the other spoiles) a little Coffer full of most sweet and singular Vnguents. We read in Herodotus, that Cambyfes King of Persia, and Sonne to Cyrus, sent his Ambassadors with very rich presents, and vessels full of precious Oyntments, to Macrobius, King of the Ethiopians. But the King hauing vnderstoode by the Ichthyophages, (who brought him this Present) in what manner those compositions were made: would by no means accept them, because, they were too effeminate for him.

In troth, this barbarous Moore gaue a good Lesson to vs that are Christians, and thinke our selues to excell all other in the worlde for Vertue: that wee are much more barbarous then hee, and all his Countrey of Ethiopia. For, in these our dayes, wee cannot bee content with perfuming our Garments, and the haire on our heads; but many are growne to such horride immodesty, as to annoint those secretes both in men and VVemen (only to prouoke Lust, and for the more lasciuiousnesse) which were not ordained for any such brutish wickednesse. Many also, haue their Beades made of sweet Perfumes, not to vse in their priuat Orisons, but only for Vaine-glorie, and where any interchange of affection is, to procure the better meanes for voluptuous pleasures, and seeme more acceptable to his wanton Mistris, or shee to her as idle seruant. Incense bestowd in churches, or on hallowed Altars, are matters of no great value or moment. And yet the Altar of God in Ierusalem, vvas not perfumed but with Sitim woode, according to his owne appointment.

Let me not heerein be mistaken, as if I would inferre, that Beniamine, Storax, Amber, Muske, Ciuette, and such like, which are the principall foundation of Vnguents, Pouders and sweets, are wholly to bee reiected; for they are of great Vertues, and haue peculiar properties against diuers diseases, and then they may lawfully be vsed, but not abused. Not as did Muleasses King of Thunis, who in the yeare, 1554. hauing left his Kingdome, to require aid of Charles the fift, Emperour, fearing the Turkish forces, which the Admiral to Barbarossa prepared against him; wherefoeuer hee went, hee abused these 10 blessings very highly. For he had ordinarily (well-neere) serued in to his Table, a Peacocke, and two Phesants, farced full of most precious and odoriferous Vnguents, amounting to aboue 200. Crownes: beside his other delicious Sawces, Pottages, & meats dressed in like maner, and this was plainly scene at Naples. He was so extreamply besotted in these sweete fauours, and yet without cause or neede, that when he was cast out of his kingdom for his cruelties, wherein he was re-seated by the said Emperour, and at the sacke of Thunis by the Spaniards, when he returned to his Castle, and found his Cabinet emptied of those precious perfumes, which the insolent Souldiers (not knowing their value) carelessly threw away; he said. That he grieued more for his Delicate Drugges, then if he had lost his whol Kingdome, which he had but newly reconquered, by the helpe of the Emperour.

20 Going afterward againe, to entreate fresh succour (being still feareful of Barbarossa) while hee went about this businesse, he placed his Sonne (as his Lieutenant) in his Kingdome, who seized it only to himselfe. Which when Muleasses heard of, he returned (with a few people) backe to Thunis, thinking they wold open the Gates vnto him; but hee found the contrary, for his Son hauing slain about fiteene hundred of his Followers, and finding the King to be none in number amongst them: at length his Father was knowne, only by the sweete smell of his Odours and Vnguents; and his Son Amades beeing possessed of him, caused his eyes to be pulled out. Beholde, what benefite this wretched King gotte by his sweete fauours and perfumes, being vsed vpon no cause or necessity. I haue known too many, that beeing gouerned with affection to this vanitie, and enriched with more wealth then wisdom, haue vtterly lost their health, and falne into exceeding pouerty.

30 Thus yee see, what I haue collected for yee, out of many good and auncient Authors, concerning the vsage of drugs or sweet Perfumes; what euil vse is made of them, and how being vnfitly applied, they are the chiefe causes of manie maladies, and seruing (for the most part) for nothing but voluptuousnesse. I hold Opinion, that no man dooth more abuse them, then a man that shoulde most respect spect his honor, and hold it in highest commendation; to be so much forgetful of himselfe, as to feed his effeminate and voluptuous appetites, with these vnfitting & wanton procurements. Now, because there are great controuersies, and manie are ignorant, from whence wee haue our Amber-Greece, Muske, Ciuit, Beniamine, and Storax, wherewith are composed the said Vnguent, Powders, Sweete Pomanders, and Perfumes, it shall not alter our determination, in our next succeeding Chapter (to recreate the Readers spirits) to speake something more of them, and of their faculties.

Y purpose is not, to speake of that Amber, which is bred among Rockes of coloured stone, and (by his Native Vertue) attracteth

Straw thereto, as the Adamant doth Iron: But of that sweet Aromaticall iuice of Amber-Greece; wherof, because many men haue diuers opinions, concerning the production of a thing so rare & precious, I thought good to make some briefe discourse. I woulde gladly also refute diuers Fables, deliuered in publicke conference thereof, without alledging any Authours in my conclusions, that write or speake by heare-say; but onely such persons as haue seen the places from whence it is had.

Concerning the name of Ambar or Amber, it is so called in all Countries of the name. Our ancients haue supposed, that it is the seede of the Whale, which is left by her vpon the Waters, and so is gathered, because in the Bellies of some Whales, there hath bene found thereof. Nicholas Monardus, a Spanish Physitian, saith; That in the year, 1560. (himselfe being present) a Whale was taken neere to the Canarie Islands, which are tearmed the fortunate, and in the Bellie thereof, was found aboue foure pounds waight of Amber. Afterward, he was also present at the taking of manie other, with their young Ones, but not a iotte was to bee found in any one of them. Others are of the minde; that amber is nothing else but the excrement of the Whale, which he auoydeth by his egestions in April and May: because hee then feedeth on certaine frutes growing on the Sea-bankes, which are verie odoriferous. Some do affirme, that it is not any excrement of the Whale, but of another huge Fish, as great, or much more in greatnesse exceeding the Whale: and it hath a head more hard then Marble, & neuer swimmeth but in the Northerne Seas. But all these coniectures come nothing neere to truth, because all thinges of good and great fauour, do com from Countries and Regions which are hot; as experience deliuereth by our Spicers, of which, no one kinde was euer knowne to be produced, from Northerly or cold Countries.

I finde some other Authors, who say, that Amber is sought for and found, being deuoured by a Great Fische; named the Azell, which dying, and floating vpon the Waues, hee is quickly knowne by Marriners, that seaze on him vvith their Hooke, and so dragge him on the shore. There opening his Bellie, they finde store of Amber; but that is onelic good and pure, which they finde against his chine-bone. But there is no aparance of truth heerein; for Amber is not anie kinde of poison, but a dear Friend to the heart and life. On the other side, Fishes doe neuer seeke anie thing to hurt them, except by Trecherie vsed to them, and that men do mingle Venom among other foode, which is apte and proper for them, as they do to Lyons, Wolues, Foxes, Leopards, Rattes; and diuers other harmefull Beastes, that liue on the land. Many also haue bin perswaded, that Amber is a kind of froth or scum of the Sea; but this Coniecture, is euen as Fabulous as the other. For, Amber is not found in those Seas, where Whales doo frequent, and much lesse in any place, where the Sea is continuallie full of Billowes, or store of froth appeareth.

Theuet saith, that hee Learned of diuers Arabes, Iewes, and Easterne Greeks, dispersed heere and there thorough the Turks iurisdiction, that there are certain Birds in the Isles of the Vicques (which are situated in the way leading to Mozambique, towards the North) as great as our Geese, and called by them Aschibobuc. These Birds, doe ordinarily withdraw themselves, farre off from any Inhabitations of men, and perch in the Night time, either in these vn-inhabited Islands, or on the toppes and pointes of Rockes and Clifts, for auoyding disturbance in their rest: and there they mute in great aboundance, because they company in huge flightes together, euen as our Cranes or other Wilde Fowles do with vs. It is faide, that this Dung or muting of these Birdes, is true Amber, which beeing concocted in the heate of the Sunne, purified by the Moones power in the Night, and refined by the ayres subtilty, which keepeth continually vpon those promontories: it so remaineth, till the Sea doth swell and rise (either by those violent Windes, or some out-ragious Tempest) and carrie it thence away. Floating thus, by Morcelles or Fraggements vpon the Waues, it is one while cast into Creekes, Hauens, or Neighboring Strands: and another while, deuoured or swallowed vp by Fishes. But, it beeing a matter vndigestiue, they are enforced to cast it vpe againe. And the other, that continueth still swimming hither and thither, yeeldeth a reason (by these seuerall meanes) of three kindes of Amber. The one, is of a Whitish Colour, which is the true Naturall qualitie of fine Amber-Greece. The second, is more Clowdie and obscure, and yet good account is likewise made thereof. But, as for the thirde sort, vvhich hath beene swallowed by Fishes, and sent vp againe, thorough the lacke of Digestion, being Blacke, waightie, and of much lesse fauour, they reckon it to be of slender perfection, and therefore, make no esteeme at all thereof. But all these things, come nothing neere vnto the truth, and I am verie sorrie, that Theuet (having trauailed so much) shoulde set downe this in Writing, euen in the verie same manner, as I haue deliuered it, beeing a matter no way likely or probable.

Æcius and Simeon Sethius, only Writers concerning Amber.

Æcius, and Simeon Sethius, Greeke Authors, who onely and chiefelic haue spoken of this Amber, do say; That it is a kinde of Bitumen, comming foorth of the Fountains or Springs in the bottom of the Sea, and that by floating vpon the water: it becommeth hardened, as manie things else doe, which houer vpon the Seas, being first bred in them; all which while, they are soft and tender; but coming forth, they wax presently hardened, as Corrall doth. This Amber thus floating, when the Seas are angry and tempestuous, as many times they bee: there is store thereof found among the Rocks and stones, as also about the trees growing on the Sea-shores, when the East-wind, or else the North-east (but more enclining to the East) bloweth.

A great quantitie thereof is found in Sofala, and in the Isles of Comaro, Demogra, Mozambique, and along this Tract, euen to the Isles of Maldina, or Naledina, which looke into the East. But when Zephirus, or the Westerne Windes do moue the Seas to choller, then is a great quantitie found in the later named Isles. There haue beene some fragments found floating on the Sea, as great and tall as any man; and others of the bredth of foure spannes, and twentie in length. Some do affirme, that they haue a whole Isle (as it were) all built of pure Amber; and within some fewe daies after, when searck was made for it, it was dispersed, and could not be found.

Garcias d'Orta, a Portugall Physition, from whom I tooke this latter opinion: and with whom, the best iudgements of these times doe giue consent, for, being alwaies found veritable, and hauing been present in the Countries where this drug is had, where hee kept possession of an Island belonging vnto the King of Portugal, wherein great quantity of Amber was daily founde: hee was of the same minde with Æcius and Sethius, & heard them when they delinered their Iudgement therein. Hee saith also, that in the yeare, one thousand five hundred fiftie five, neere to the Promontory of Comaro, a great lumpe or proportion thereof was founde, which waighed more then three thousand pounds waight, and hee that found it (supposing it to be a kind of Pitch or Bitumen) sold it almost for nothing. For himselfe, hee sayeth; the verie greatest lumpe that euer hee saw, did not exceed aboue the waight of fiftene pounds. But the Merchants which trauaile into Ethiopia, giue good assurance, that that they do ordinarily behold pieces of much greater scantling : for all the passage from Sophala, euen to Brana, aboundeth plenrifully in Amber. In the country of Brasile, there hath bin some found, and yet is, but very rarely. In the year, one thousande five hundred thirtie, a fragment was there found, contayning the waight of foure poundes, in sayling vnto a Porte of Portugall; called Setuball.

Amber found in the beakes of Birds, and cleauing to cockles in the Sea.

Some say, that Amber hath bin found in the Beakes or Billes of certaine Birds, which may be so : and cleauing to some Cockles and Scallops of the Sea, which I imaginie happened, by being fastned thereto. But, Maister Nicholas Rasseus, a verie Learned Man (my intimate Friende, living yet in Paris) and curious in search of the rarest thinges; shewed mee what manner of Beakes those were, and we plainly perceiued, that they were the beakes of Sounds or Cuttle-Fishes, and not of Birds.

Amber eaten by the rich Indians.

Amber, is of great estimation among the Wealthie Indians, for they eate it in their Meates; and looke how much the price appeareth in bignesse, so much the greater is his price in Value, euen as of precious Stones. There is no Countrey or Region, where more sale is made thereof, then in China: for, as the Portugales obtained fauour of the China Kinges, to Trafficke with that kingdom, and bringing thence some small quantitie of Amber, they solde the Waight of twentie Ounces, for fiftene hundred Crownes: Which beeing vnderstoode by other Merchants, they broght thence more store afterward, because (thenceforward) they would not pay such a hie price in that Countrey.

Amber sold at deare value in China, France and other places.

In Fraunce, it is commonly solde (at this day) for eight or nine Crownes the Ounce, at the least: Neuerthelesse, it is sometimes more, and sometimes lesse.

Amber maintaineth helth and long life.

Let no man count it straunge, that it is so curiously coueted by Rich and Noble persons; for it hath manie especiall properties, whereby to preserue soundnesse of Health, and to maintaine long life, as I will briefly declare. First of all, it strengtheneth the Braine, appeasing all paines therein, either of the Nerues or Heade, comming of Colde causes: by chafing the fore-head therewith, and all the Head outier, or making a good bigge Emplaister, and mingling a little Oyntment of Muske with it, lay it so to the Head. If a good lumpe thereof, be hanged about the Necke of Man or Woman, tempered with a little Lignum Aloes; and a small quantity of Musk, the very smell thereof cheareth vp a dull braine, augmenteth memory, and reuiveth both the spirits and heart extraordinarily. Besides, it is a singular remedy against the plague, and all colde distempers, onely by petfuming a Night-Cappe therewith. There is nothing more beneficiall for auncient people, and to lengthen life in them; if they moderately vse it in smelling, either in perfuming their Garments, anointing their faces, or mingling it amongst their Meates. A little powder of the Load-stone compounded with it, and applied Emplaister-wise to the Nauell, it holdeth and restraineth the Fruit, that it fall not before due and convenient time. It is a singular Remedie, not onely against the procidence of the Matrixe, but likewise to prevent the suffocation; being applied with a litle Cotton, and vsed in the secret parts. Applying it both outwardly & inwardly, it maketh Women fruitfull, whose barrennes is caused by coldnesse. It profiteth greatly for paines in the heart and stomacke, occasioned by windinesse. Such as are afflicted with the Epilepsie, that is to say, the falling sicknesse, or disease of S. Iohn, if they vse it as an ordinary sinell, or receiue it as a perfume, it quite appeaseth it, or causeth a mightie asswaging thereof, as hath beene many times crediblie experimented. In like maner, it is verie singular good against the Palsie, if, beside taking it inwardly, yee vse it as an Oyntment to the necke and Chin-bone of the backe, mingled with some neruall Oyle.

Amber of 4. feuerall Colours, and to know the best sort.

There is Amber of foure feuerall colours: White, Gray, Red, and Blacke; which commeth according to the variety of places or Regions, where it is found out. The Gray, is preferred before al the other, and is knowne to be good, if when pricking it with pin, it deliuereth forth a moisture like Oyle. It hath bin tempered in Torches, Tapers, and Candles, for Emperors, Kinges, and Great Princes: as in the Court of Campson, the last Soldane of Egypt, Muleasses King of Thunis, and diuers others. It is mingled also amongst other Drugges, for making of Chaines and Bracelettes, worne vsually by Ladies, and Great Courtiers, without anie great offence or discommendation, the causes in our precedent Chapter alwaies remembred.

CHAP. XX.

Of Muske, and of Ciuit, howe they are engendred, From whence they are broght, and how they are any way good.

Ext vnto Amber, methinks that Musk ought to haue his due ranke. The Barbarians call it Patt, and there are manie sorts or kinds thereof.

The best of all, is that which cometh from a Countrey, that leaneth very much into the West, as farre as the City of Chorasa doth, and is yellowish, or of Gold colour: The best, next to it, is that which is brought from the Indiæ, and appeareth blacke, whereby it is not so good as the first. The worst of all, is that which they bring from the Land of Sini. All these kinds of Musk, are engendred in the Nauell of a certaine Beast, like vnto a wilde Goat, which hath only one horne, and is verie great of bodie. When this Beast is in paine, by a raging swelling in his Nauell, which filleth it selfe with a kind of grosse blood, in manner of an impostume: he afterwarde voideth this bloude, halfe corrupted, and within a certaine while after, it becommeth of very sweet fauour.

Serapio (among the Arabes) hath written diligently and carefully concerning Muske, speaking in this manner: The Beasts that make Muske, and are like vnto wild Goats; are principally bred in the Countries of Tumbasco, & of Sini, which bee neere neighbouring to each other. The Muske of Tumbasco, is better then that of Sini, because the Goates which make the Muske, do feed on nothing but Spicknard, & other odoriferous plants, whereon only they liue. Which hapneth not so in the land of Sini, for, albeit the Musk-Goats do there liue also on sweet hearbs and plants: yet are they not to be compared in their Muske, neither to the Spickenard, nor to the other plantes of Tumbasco.

The maner also of gathering the Musk, is some reason of the difference, for they of Tumbasco, do neuer take the Musk out of the thin skin or wrapper, to sophisticate it; neither will they gather it, but when the season is bright & clear. But the men of Sini, they vse to squeeze the skin of the swoln impostume, and mingle and sophisticate it, euen in the issuing forth, not caring whither the time be foul or faire, and so they shut it vp in purposed boxes. That is the best Muske, which is the most odorant, and is very ripe when it cometh forth of the swoln bag. These goats which carry the Musk, are no way different, but onely in their teeth, for they haue teeth (there commonly cald Dogs teeth) very long, stading out of their mouths, aboue a span-long, like to the wild Boare.

Musk that is not mature & ripe, hath a most offensiue smell: but they which seek for the Musk, do shake the thin skins wherein it is not ripe; and hanging them in the open aire, there leaue them so, vntill they be ripe, and the foule fauour bee vtterly gone. It becommeth very odorant of it self, when it is perfectly baked in the aire: neuerthelessse, the best Muske is that, which naturally receiueth his maturity, euen in the thinne wrappers of the Musk-Goat. The people of this country, do doe gather it among Stones & Trunkes of Trees; for the Beast, when he feelles his impostumation ready to ripen: hee taketh great delight, in rubbing his body against the Rockes and Trunkes of Trees, vntill the Bag be broken, and all the congealed matter bee voyded out. This Muske is better then all the other, as being that which is plainly ripened; both by the good temperature of Heauen, and perfect concoction of the sun. They then that seeke after it, so soone as they haue found and gathered it; they close it vp in the thin skinnes and Bladders, of such Beasts as haue bred Musk, and haue (formerly) bin slaine by them in hunting.

The best Muske, and how it is found and vsed.

Of this Muske is it, that presents is made to Kinges and Princes, & whereof they make vse. It hath (almost) the equall properties to Amber, but herein it is much worffe; for if a Man beare too great quantitie about him, or if he receiue ouer much inwardlie: it brings him to a palsie trembling, and raiseth great torments in the head, enforcing so vehement an attraction of blood to the Nose; as many haue suddenly dyed by bleeding. But in a small and moderate quantity, it is good, against all paines in the head, comming of colde causes.

In what manner we finde Muske to be hurtfull.

I haue not found any Author, either Greeke, Arabe, or Moderne, but iumpeth with this Man in opinion, and in the gathering of Muske: except one Amatus, a Portugall Phisition, a Man of very great inconstancy, as diuers haue declared to mee, that had knowledge of him in Turkey. Hee makes a mockerie, of that which hath bene deliuered by diuers good Authours, concerning Musk, and labourerth to assure vs, that in a certaine Countrey of India, there is a Beast as big as the Hares here among vs, which being taken, and beaten to death with rods; the bowels and inwardes is then taken forth, and the Flesh bruised or beaten in a Morter. Afterward, it passeth through a Searce, to the end that no bone may remaine vnbruised, and then the flesh is made into round Bals, and wrapped vp in pieces of the said Beasts skinne; stil to preserve them in a round forme, and because the Merchants, that buy them thus readily prepared; may make no doubt, but that the Muske is of the very same Muske-beast. But both Portugals, Arabes, and Jewes, who haue trauailed into those partes, and seene these matters thus gathered: are of Serapios mind, and hold the courte which I haue formerly alleadged; and that our Muske commeth from a Beast like vnto the wilde Goat.

10 Marcus Paulus, a Venetian, in the first Booke of his Voyages, and the first Chapter, saith; That in the Prouince of Singul in India, himselfe found the best Muske in all the world. For in that Countrey, they haue a Beast, of no strange kinde, but about the bignesse of a Cat, with haire like to a Hart, or red Deere, very great Clawes; and foure teeth only; to wit, two aboue, and two beneath. Neere, or about the nauell of this Beast, betweene the Flesh and the skin, there is a bladder full of blood, which is true Muske, yeelding the vertuall sent and sweete sauour. I would be loath to belye such an approued Author: For it may very wel be, that this Beast is of the same kind, as the Muske-Goat is, notwithstanding the smalnesse in body: because (here among vs) we see Dogges, Horses, and other Beastes, of all shapes and formes: But yet he agreeth with all the rest in this; that the Muske is found about the Nauell, as hath formerly bin said.

The opinion of Amatus strongly refuted.

The report of Marcus Paulus, a worthy Venetian traualler.

20 Muske (by length of time) loofeth his good smell, or being tainted with wind, or too closely kept. Therefore, to preserve him still in his goodnesse, he must be kept in Boxes of Lead, verie well stopped.

The Authors censure with Marcus Paulus.

Of Muske loosing his sauour.

30 Platearius, a learned man, is of this opinion; That if Muske haue lost his vertue and good odour; it must be hanged in a Viall of Glasse, with the mouth open, in the midst of a Sink or house of Office, and so it wil recouer his former sauour. There is some found composed of another fashion; but then it is sophisticated; and how that composition is made, Gesner enstructeth in his History of Beasts.

40 50 Ouer and beside Muske, we haue yet another licquid matter, which is not onely odorant; but also pierceth all the senses and spirits at the first encounter. Perfumers make great vse thereof, in their compositions of sweete sinelles, which which they tearme mixtures. It is engendred in the skinne of the Testicles of a Beast, much like vnto a Feyne, some calling them Cats. To speake more properly, Ciuet is as a sweate, passing betweene the Testicles of this Beast, being of a temperature hot and moyst. If it be put into the pits about the Nauel, or into the Wombe-pipe; it serueth maruailously against the suffocations of the Matrix. Many times, vpon vrgent extremity, the Husband vseth it to his owne secrets, and so conuayeth it vnto his Wife; whereby immediate remedy ensueth for the paine.

And as we haue already saide, that Muske being tainted, or ouer-aged, recouereth his strength and quicknesse by stinking ayre, as of a Sinke or Priuy, as by one contrary to correct another. Euen so, in those Countries where these Ciuet Creatures are bred, there is another Beast, equalling the Ciuet Cat in bignesse, called Agobdilbat (which signifieth nothing else but foule sauer, and this beast is (indeede) the most stinking of all other) who continually is at Warre with the Ciuet Cat, his colour being very pleasing, & somewhat neere to a Sky-colour.

I call to memory, that beeing (one day) in the House of the Constable of Fraunce, Anne de Montmorancye, a Cat (not being discharged of her Ciuet, according as her selfe sought meanes and place) emptied her burden vpon the Gowne of a young Gentlewoman, deliivering thereon such a great quantitie of Ciuet; that all the spacious roome was filled with the ouer-piercing sauer thereof. Wherevpon, diuers were readie to fall into swoonings, others felt grieuous paines in their heads, and (among the rest) the young Gentlewoman fell suddenly into a suffocation of the Matrixe; yea, and in such extreame manner, that she was reputed dead for the space of twelue houres, and was cured by stinking fumes and ill smells onely. The Gentlewoman gaue sufficient testimony, that she had neuer (before) beene subiect to that perplexitie: and yet notwithstanding, when Women are vexed with the anguish forenamed, if Ciuet be put into the Nauell pites, they feele presently ease. But ye must vnderstand, that it ought to be applied in a very small quantity. For this cause is it, that Muske and Amber are wholesome for many cold diseases, being applied and taken in small quantitie. Here also the Reader may be aduertised, that there are people of such complexion, as do affect such saours naturally: and others againe, who finde them very hurtfull, and therefore doe fly from them; of which sort there are many more, then of the other. Therefore, when any vse is to be made of them, let euerie one well vnderstand his owne naturall inclination, or take the aduise of some skilfull Phisition: for oftentimes, by vsing them indiscreetely, they haue beene the death of diuers people.

How Ciuet ought to be vsed and applied.

CHAP. XXI.

Of an Edict, made by Dionisus the elder, King of Scicily, against Women, Maids, and youngest Virgines; whereby he purchased a double returne of Mony.

Whoever readeth the Grecian Histories, shall finde, that the Isle of Scicily hath anciently beene subiect, to be gouerned and commaunded by Tyrant Kings; among which Tyrants, it appeareth that Dionisus (whom they vsed to tearme the elder) surpassed all the rest in tyranny. For, after he had drawne all meanes from his people, by frequent, great and intollerable impositions: hee surcharged them againe with a new taxation, much more irkesome and burdenous, then any one, or all the other gone before. Which was an expresse payment, by poule, or head (as they call it) both for Men, Women, Maidens, children, great or little, young or old. And albeit the Collectours of these imposed Monies, made great and grieuous execution in the leuey, as well vpon Cattell, as seazing moueables and imoueables; yea, imprisoning the people (euen to the death of many) by cruell vsage, and bad handling: yet, notwithstanding all these extremities, no Mony could be had, because the Tirant had drawn them dry, euen to the vttermost most penny. All the Mony of this rich Island, hee had imployed (in daily payments) for ten thousand foot Souldiers, to guard his person, and ten thousand Horſſe-men, beſide foure hundred Gallies, well armed and furniſhed. Beſide this, he payed great penſions to other Common-weales, and to ſtrange Princes; to the end, hee might haue their ayde when neede required; reſoſing little (or no truſt at all) in his own Subiects. In breefe, he exerciſed all kindes of prodigalitie towards Straungers, at the coſt and expences of his owne people, for the more ſafe aſſurance of his Eſtate and dignitie.

Signes whereby to know the pouerty of the people.

He had aduertifement, that there was no more Money to be raiſed, neyther by Wine or Corne, or any other Commodities: for there was great dearth of Victuals two whole yeares together. He knew it evidently, becauſe the people were growne careleſſe, and did nothing but laugh at his impositions; as knowing, that he could not be paid, when they had nothing wherewithall to pay, which made them then raiſe that memorable Prouerbe: Where nothing is to be had, the King looſeth his right.

The Scitilians affected braue and proud apparrell, both in the Men and Women.

But this old Tyrant Foxe, knew well enough the Cuſtome of the Scitilians, which was, to be pompous, affecting brauerie in Apparrell, and (aboue all) to be richly decked with Jewels of gold and Siluer, embelliſhed with coſtly precious ſtones: neuer regarding their owne condition, as Huſbandes and Wiues, nor good of their Families; but ſuffering all their prouiſions to be ſold, to ſeede the Kinges impositions, and ſerue other Negotiations, prouided, that they might ſtill enioy their Jewels and brauery. The Men (for Antiquity of this idle Cuſtome) did willinglie tollerate it, though they were to endure all the neceſſities in the World; yea, death it ſelfe. And this was all which remained, of the mightie riches of Scitilie: for the Island had abounded in plenty of Corne, which was the maine hope of all the Inhabitants, and (next to Aegipt) it was one of the beſt Garners in the whole World.

The mighty riches of the Iſle of Scitilie.

A Tyrant taketh aduantage on all occasions.

Heereupon, he would inſtantly help himſelfe, according as the time fitted him with occaſion, which was (in regard that his tyranny, and the two precedent years, had greatly impoueriſhed the Kingdome) notwithstanding al former oppreſſions: he would now haue the Jewels of the Women and Damſels, then which, they had nothing elſe remaining to them. And for his more cleanly conueyance heerein, he cauſed to be publiſhed by the Prieſtes and Sacrificers (whoſe Ceremonies hee gaue no faith to, nor any way beleued) that the Goddeſſe Ceres was very greatly offended with the Iſlanders; becauſe there was no worſhippe giuen her, but in an old Temple, ruined, darke, and vterlie vnpleaſing: wherefore, ſhe would haue a new one erected to her, built with faire ſhew, and ſumptuous coſt, elſe there ſhould no more happy daies be ſeene in that Island. According to theſe remonſtrances, made by the Prieſtes and Sacrificers, with interpoſition of his owne authoritie: it was credibly giuen forth, that the Goddeſſe her ſelfe had appeared to him, & this the Prieſts ſollemnely iuſtified, being well enſtricted in the treacherie. Vpon this vrgent occaſion, and pretending carefull reſpect of the Common-weale, as alſo to appeaſe the high diſfauour of Ceres, (ſhe being the Goddeſſe of Corne and Fruites of the Earth:) he had determined, to erect her a new and magnificent Temple. Now, becauſe he had no Mony, nor the people neither, who are called the Kinges Purſe: he willed and commanded, that all Women, Wiues, Widdowes, Maids, & Damſels, ſhould bring forth their Jewels of Gold, Siluer, precious ſtones, and all other matter elſe whatſoeuer, to a certaine place, and at a time by him appointed; impoſing grieuous paines and penalties, on any that durſt vſe the leaſt contradiction. The female ſexe were in wonderful perplexitie, and durſt not hide any of their Jewels or brauery: becauſe they had ſo long openly worne them, and good note was taken of them from time to time, both of the riches and value, on feaſtiuall daies, at ſollemne ſacrifices, publique plaies, banquets, and marriages.

Now, for the better obtaining his purpoſe, and inducement of the people to more willing forwardneſſe heerein: he cauſed a ſpacious compaſſe of ground to be prepared, in an eminent place of the Citty Siracusa, not far off from the Fountaine Arcthusa, where hee made some proiect, of present building a goodly Temple, by a forme or Modell shap'd thereof. Farre off was his mind from any such intent, but day by day to get possession of the Womens Jewels, and hastned the leuicy of them with all possible speed. He gaue notice heereof also, to the round neighbouring Isles and Countries, where he had no command: from whence he got almost a Million of Gold, where-with they willingly furnished him, onely that the Goddesse would be gracious to them. And thus he held the people in suspence the space of the three whole yeares. In his time, the Land began (naturally) to waxe fruitfull againe, yeilding as great plentie of Corne and all things, as formerly it had doone: by which good meanes, Corne, Wine, and Cattell, thriuing stil with them, the Inhabitants became rich and sufficiently stored.

When the women began to tast of this well-relishing fertility; they could not forget their former vanities, but faine would fall againe to their pride & rich brauery: Only their feare was, least the Tyrant should play the like tricke againe with them. To make an estimate, of the inestimable masse of Wealth, which they were cōpelled to lay down, for building this new Temple to the Goddesse Ceres; is a matter exceeding my capacity, and yet no Temple at all builded. The Tyrants ayme was only at wealth, and hauing compassed what he intended; by the aduise of some well-willers to the Women (pretending comiseration on their disfurnishment of Jewels) a counterfeit request was made vnto him, that he would be pleased to permit their wearing of Jewels againe. Standing (like a crafty Reinard) vpon some strangenes for a while, the suit at length was granted, with this Prouiso. That euery one of the Female sexe (of what degree or age soeuer) should particularly present her offering to the Goddes Ceres, either in Gold or Siluer, according to the number and value of those Jewels, which shee purposed to weare: whereto they consented verie gladly, so foolishly fond were they of their curious adornments, which gaue way to the Tyrant, to make a double benefit of one and the same Edi&. And to this very day, the Women of that Island do continue this proud humour, in beautifying themselves with Jewels, beyond any other Country that I haue read of. The riches that he compassed by this Edi&, is not to be valued, for the Isle was (in those daies) much more peopled then now it is: And then the principall and royall Citty, was called Siracusa, which at this present is named Sarragossa. This Tyrant, hauing occasion then to vse men of Armes, beside such Strangers as he kept in pay: could leuy sixscore thousand foote, and twelue thousand Horsemen, beside foure hundred Ships and Gallies; whereas at this day, the Land will hardly yeeld fiftene hundred able fighting men. When it was surprized by the Romaines, for hauing taken part with the Carthagenians; there was found in one place (called the Magazine or Store-house for war) furniture to arme seauenty thousand men; and such large booty was found therein, that Carthage (which fought for the Empire) could hardly yeeld the like.

This Dionisius was an affronter and Deceiuer, who knew better then any Man else in the World, how to finde meanes of non payment, when reason & equity did require it. Among diuers other, he had entertained a young man, who was reputed to be very skilfull in playing on muscalle Instruments, and tearmed the very best that those times afforded, to whom he promised liberall wages. The Musition hauing serued him a long while, requested to haue his due recompence; whereto Dionisius replied: That he ought him nothing; Because (quoth he) I haue giuen thee as much contentment, by hope and promise of great wages and enriching thee, as thou hast yeilded me, for I haue taken paine enough, to heare the idle sound of thy instrument.

In breesfe, he cared not how he came by any thing whatsoever, provided that it would yeild him profit, making spare, neither of Statues of the Goddes, or any other sacred thing, but made a meere mockerie of all, as I shall haue occasion to speake else-where. The Scicilians haue neede of such a King in these daies, to punnish that shamefull murder and massacre, which they committed

Of the Word or Name Grammarian, and what it is truly and properly.

Those persons which the Latines properly called Grammaticos (which in all other Languages is tearmed Grammarians) were not any such men, as knew not how to speake congruately, or write Orthographically, with good obseruation of accents in their speech, as being vnskilfull in the Etimology of Dictions or Vocables, according as some (to this day) haue supposed. For well I know, that it hath beene a common matter, when one would point at a man slenderly learned, or little seene in the soundnesse of learning, as vnderstanding nothing but the very principles: they would tearme him a Grammarian, or a Grammer Schoole-Boy, for his greater scorne and open disgrace.

But contrariwise, the ancient Latines, as in the time of Cicero, had no other vnderstanding of the word Grammarian: then of a learned Man, well skild in all the Sciences, and thought fit to be the Interpreter of our grauest Authours. The Greekes called Grammarians, Critiques, of the Greeke Verbe κριτικω which signifieth to be iudged. For when learned men (were they Greekes or Latines) had any doubt about the interpretation of some Text, sentence, or saying, in any Science whatsoever: it was then wholly referred to a Grammarian.

Suetonius was of the same opinion, in his Booke of famous Grammarians, who were likewise called Learned, as for example, Mesala. Coruinus and Macrobius write, that one Didimus, sufficiently learned in the Sciences; was esteemed to be a great Grammarian. Ci-

CHAP. XXIII.

A Paradoxe, maintaining by witty Arguments: That speedy death is much better to be desired, then a long & tedious date of life.

O great is the disaster & miserie of worldly occasions; that long grieft, and ouer-burdenous compassion of them (without any other hope of speedy amendment) hath made the better sort of people to affirme and maintaine: That it is more expedient for a Man (who feareth GOD) to wish for death quickly; then long to endure in these labour some trauailes. For albeit that death (the true Minister of Iustice, end of all vexations, and most assured way of our eternall health) performs no other good or fauour to Men; but takes them from the afflictions of this World, hindering them (thereby) from offending GOD most strangely, and deliuering them from seruite subiection, being in the hands of rauinous, cruell, and bloody Tyrants: yet for this one and onely reason, hee is most highly to be extolled and praised. For, without this happy helpe, wee should be miserably condemned to vn-sufferable pains, and altogether pressed downe, or smothered, by vnresistable stormes. Our hope (without this) would be quite quenched. And, without this) what is the Sinner, be he neuer so great a Prince or Lorde, not knowing, fearing, and regarding God?

A definition of Death, and what good he performeth.

An especiall reason to be considered.

By death we liue eternally; and by death we are freed from the prison of all sorowes and mishaps.

A memorable custome obserued in Thrace.

This was the reason, why the ancient custome of Thrace was so deuoutly obserued, that at the birth of euery Infant, they vsed great sorrow and lamentation. Contrariwise, when any (eithers aged in yeares, or of what time soeuer) died: They would make much ioy, triumph, and feasting, and (according to the parties Dignity) celebrated the Funerall, with sportes, plaies, and other varietie of pleasures. If such a barbarous Nation as this was (deprived of all vse of Philosophy, and good Letters) could doe so great an honour to death: Is it not a shame for vs, that call our selues Christians, and know, that our very best benefit came by his death, to whom we pretend both Faith and seruice: to be so wretchedly amorous of life, which is nothing else (according to the learned Poets opinion.) But an obscure Prison, enthralling the best ennobled Spirits.

Foolish men doe couet long life.

Blessed Saint Paule, The Vessell of election, did not he desire to dye, That hee might liue with his Lord and Maister? Yet we (onely to compasse leysure, for committing ten thousand horrible excesses) make life our great God; adding daily one paine vpon another, and augmenting the Register of our numberlesse offences. Are not we so obstinately affected to this short and dangerous pleasure (if that may be called pleasure, which is the plaine high-way to euerlasting death) that for it onely: wee care not to loose the life celestiall, diuine, & (then which) the like can no way be so much as dreamt on? Ezechiel wished for speedy death; That hee might ioy in the beauties and excellencies of Heauen. But we couet long life; the more to entangle our selues in the filthes of this World. Wherefore (thinke ye) was it, that death was (by our Elders) called Thanasos? But onely in this respect: That (in the end) it makes vs all ioyfull, and wel pleased with that, which we ought most of all to desire. Are we then so ignorant and sencelesse; as not to acknowledge the aboundance of benefits; which we gaine by being taken out of this so hatefull a Labyrinth? Do we not plainly perceiue, that he which escapeth longest, and tarrieth the longest while in this world; beholdeth (euevery day) more troubles and discontentments, then reall ioyes, or true recreations?

If ye alleage vnto me, the noblenesse of Age and length of life, for great experience in things past, as seruing to discover and approue them which follow after. Let me then aske ye, of how much happinesse may we boast, in proouing our unhappinesse? Considering, that (whether we be well or ill-pleased) wee must patiently endure those thinges, which we cannot tell how to shun: hearing that which our cares hateth, and seeing thinges, wherewith our eyes are most strangely offended.

An Allegation for old Age, or length of life.

But what is that which we call olde Age; if not a continual dolour, and languishing disease? what other sir-names can we giue to aged men; but mouing Anatomies, or liuing Mortuaries? Filling them with so many distillations, & falling humors; as leaues them not one good houre, during the remainder of all their poore life time. If then, the verie memory of death, and houely cogitation of our departure, makes such a certaine aduantage for vs, and assures vs infallibly, that we are (thereby) permitted immunity from sin: how much more then would deaths reall presence preuaile with vs?

What old age is.

Remembrance of Death.

Who are more fearefull of death, then such, as neither know, nor vnderstand the faire strait passages thereof? which indeede are such, as all the art in Man cannot corrupt or blemish; except (like a Monster, and no sensible Creature) he would deface all Histories both sacred and prophane. What had the famous Romaine people bin, if the valiant Horatius Cocles had feared death? If Quintus Curtius had bin fearefull and timorous, and had not preferred glorious death, before the irkesome life of the world: had not (but for him) the goodly City of Rome, bin subiect to the most daungerous Hell, as can be deuised to name vpon earth? them, who (for the freedome of their country) went cheerfully to death, with striking vp the drum, and the very highest sounds of the Trumpet, euen as if they had been bidden to some triumph? Did ye euer know a man (that feared death) worthy of so great an honour?

The Custome of some barbarous Nations.

For this cause was it, that ancient Historians so highly praised & applauded, the Custome of some barbarous Nations, who, with like promptitude and alacrity ranne to their death: as if they were to be presented in some publique triumphe, or other great pleasures and Iouiall spectacles. Why are the Germanes entred into such credit with vs, if it were not onely for this; that they are knowne to be a Nation, meere lie prodigall of their liues, and couetous of most precious death?

Of the Germanes.

Conclude we then, that it much better auaieth to dye quickly, then long time to languish in this wretched world. Let vs also maintaine, that death is more noble and excellent, then life: Because his power extendeth ouer all, without any limit or exception; and in regard likewise, that he is the Maister Controler of this life. As, not without iust cause and good reason, a Philosopher (being demaunded what Death was) readily answered: An accident and passage ineuitable, from which, neyther by teares, entreats, sighes, or the sweetest Kisses, we can be deliuered.

CHAP. XXIII.

The saying of Plato familiarly interpreted, That Kings should be Philosophers, or Philosophers raigne.

Here are very many, who in reading good Authors, doe take thinges litterally, without any further ruminati- on: which makes mee

the more desirous, to interpret the saying of Plato, so often spoken of within these last two thousand yeares, by many learned and excellent Men. His words are these; Those Common-weales shall be most happy, where Kinges be Philosophers, or Philosophers are found in the places of government. And because that diuers Men (especially such as are not conuersant in State-affaires, doe wish for a King, who might altogether bee giuen to learning, and not to the pollicies fitting his Kingdome) greatlie abuse their iudgement heerein, for this would bee the totall ruine of his Monarchy: therefore I will set down some obseruation, what Philosophy it is that Plato meaneth, wherein a King ought to apply his studies, and wherby, there cannot but redound extraordinary good and profit to all his people.

This Diuine Man Plato, vnderstood not by a King Philosopher, a Prince so addicted and bent to studie, that if hee should chance to be deposed from his Dignitie; he might thereof make a benefit of liuing afterward. This humours appeared in Dyonisius, the younger (King of Sarragossa, and the greater part of the Isle of Scicily) Sonne to the affronter, and imposer of Nouell subsidies; for he being offended with his Subiects, and doubting least his estate would haue no long durance: fell to learne good Letters, to the end, that if he happened to be expulsed his Royalty; he might become a Schoole-Maister, for the better support of his life; as indeede (afterward) such fortune befell him. This his study of Philosophy, (which is as much to say, as the loue of wisdom) while he raigned King, proceeded but from a bad intention in him: for he had done much better, in effecting some worthy pollicies in his kingdome, then frequent vse of vices, and exercising tyranny, thereby to haue preuented the office of a Pedant, and liuing in such an abiect manner.

Nero was enstructed (from his youth) in the three partes of Philosophy; and being

How a Prince ought to be a Philosopher.

Disimulation in som Princes

The Emperor Commodus made but had benefit of his Philosophy.

Poetry is not reckoned to be Philosophy being created Emperor, was skilfull in Poesie, much addicted to Musique, and to play on the Harpe: yet would hee say, that he could liue well, if he were deposed from the Empire. We find recorded, that many Princes were giuen to learning, as Tiberius and Adrian, who found good companions of Ouids loue-Books, and Martiall his Epigrams. But this is no part of Philosophizing, neyther labour of minde, how a Prince should liue after his falling.

For a King to bee a Philosopher, it consisteth in establishing his Throne so assuredly; that he may neuer sit tottering in it, or be shaken out of it. In rendering himselfe necessary to the cōmonwealth, as well by his vertues, as generous disposition; he sits safe from all deiection: carrying himselfe in such sort, like one that is a Tutor ouer many inferiours, as well in charge, as in correction, and (as he) when time respiteth his Office; then to take delight and recreation. Princes that read plenty of Books, doe it (oftentimes) for pleasure, rather then to deriue any obseruations thence, for profit of their people. And when they cherish learned men about them; it is onely in hypocrisie, and to let their Subiects vnderstand, that they are gouerned by their aduise, and by Men of knowledge. So dealt the fore-named Dyonisius the elder, as himselfe would often reueale, to such as were his familiar and intimate friends.

The Emperor Commodus (Sonne to Marcus Antoninus, and Emperour likewise) fir-named the Philosopher; was learned, and read ouer diuers Books of Philosophy: And yet notwithstanding, he could not refraine, from being the most detestable Emperour, which had beene before, or came after him. Contrariwise, his Successour, who had employed all his life time, in exercising Marchandize about the sale of Wood or Billets: is numbred among the most bemoaned Emperors; and Traiane likewise (who scarcely could write his own name) was esteemed a very vertuous Prince and Emperour.

Princes are not to be repured Philosophers, if they can reade lasciuious Bookes of Loue, or compose in in poetry; as Thibaulte, Earle of Brie & Champagne, and Raymond, Counte of Tolosa, whose Poems are yet (at this day) to be seene, and they accounted rather ignorant, then learned Philosophers. This is no such Philosophy as ought to bee exercised: but that of true and especiall import, I will come now breefely to relate. It is to be vnderstood, that Philosophy is deuided into three distinct parts, to wit: into Phisicke, Logicke, and Morall Philosophy, according as Cicero saith in his Oratour. The first, aymeth onelie at an intire search into the obscuritie of Natures secrets. Logicke diueth into the subtilty of disputations and discourse. Morall Philosophy, speakes of Life and ciuill manners; & this is that which Kings ought to seeke after. The best exercising whereof, is neyther read or studyed in the Bookes of the Romaines Lawes, called Ciuill Law: For, how euer it produceth some honourable effectes, yet (questionlesse) it is the onely Motiue, whereby we enter into a Labyrinth of suits. Because, in not being built vpon one only piece, but running into diuersity of scantlings; ech man makes a cloak thereof after his owne fashion. Therefore, let Princes neuer meddle with such intricate matter, but referre the study thereof, to men destined for so troublesome a profession.

The first Lecture that a Prince ought to take, is out of sacred & vnreprouable writ; because (thereby) he shall learne knowledge both of God, & of himselfe, and that the beginning of true Philosophy, is the fear of God. Next, he ought (about all things else) to bring his people in obedience of the Magistrate, and the Magistrate of the Law, without any infringing or violation. We read of the Æthiopians, that at the receipt of their Lawes, they protested; that they would be subiect to those laws, & passe no other letters contrary to them. The people of France. when they place their K. in the seat of Iustice; they deliuer him a staffe in his right hand, on the toppe whereof is the figure of a hand: Giuing therby to vnderstand, that the K. should lend a strong hand to Iustice; and then they giue him a scepter in the left hand.

He must study to quench ciuill warres in his Kingdome, if there be any, and preuent such as may ensue, vpon the least presumption or apparance; euer more more keeping promise with his Subjects, for otherwise it may fall out, that delay and length of time, will bring his life and the State into great daunger. The death of Henrie the third, King of France, happened thorow euill counsell giuen him, and also to his Predecessour; as the Histories of Fraunce and Flanders (written according to truth) doe credibly declare: without crediting, what detestable Macchianell hath written on that Article. By the last ciuill warres in Allemaigne, the French brought their Frontiers into the Cities of Mentz, Toula, and Verdune, which are three goodly Imperiall Citties, and held by them to this day. They that are called the States of the Low-Countries, and of Flanders, hardned by long Warres against their naturall Prince, vpon refusall of some serious requests: are become Cantoned; so that in common opinion, the whole Countries haue suffered grieuouly: all which had bin well eased, if no Macchianellist had medled among them.

As for strange warres, which a King may haue with other Princes; he must bee mindfull of Faith therein, for they are euer the least hurtfull. Prouided, that he do it in such sort, that being fortified with alliance and Confederats, strength, and meanes; hee may haue peace when himselfe pleaseth. Euermore remebring, that he do not imitate Mithridates, King of Pontus, who coueting to make himselfe great, lost both his State and life together. And Frances the first, King of Fraunce, in seeking to ioyne Millaine and Italy to his Crown, was fondly taken Prisoner.

He must not likewise lend eare to some kinde of Courtiers, who commonly are prating, that a generous King should neuer be without war: For in time of their continuance, hee may impose great taxes and subsidies on his people, which the saide people, taking then to be a matter extraordinary; doe finde them (soone after) to hold on as ordinary. These meanes (indeede) may encrease his reuenewes; but somtimes they reach to troublesome rebellions, wherein the Prince looseth both his land and subiects. The leagued Countries of Germany, had neuer come vnder their Lords obedience; but for the like causes.

In like maner, he ought to make no Forts or Cittadels, except in case of very vrgent necessitie; for it doth but declare contempt and distrust, conceiued in the Prince against his people, procuring (oftentimes) a reuolt in the subiects, with desire to seeke a new Maister. As the like was imagined to haue happened at the good Cittie of Lyons, which hath euermore bene very obedient to her kings, and lent them strong aide in their necessities, when they haue bene thereto required. Neuerthelesse, through some bad counsell, and vpon small occasion, the Kings of Fraunce did build a Cittadell there, a meere retreat for al scelerates: who, by the cautels of diners loose Captaines, too much diminishing the reuenewes of the Douane*, and the Souldiers committed many insolencies in the Cittie, viciating diners Virgins, & making pillage of al things. Which was the cause, that the men of Lyons arose to ruinate this Cittadell, that serued for nothing else but wicked purposes. And albeit they were sollicit to take a new party, yet would they not yeild thereto; but kept themselues in obedience to their King, being contented with the demolition of the Cittadell, how euer the king otherwise mistrusted them. Such Cittadels ought not to be erected, but in countries newly conquered, and not in ancient and obedient Citties, whence Princes can receive nothing, but commodity & pleasure. Nor ought he to exercise prodigality, or giue immense gifts, especially to such people as haue no merit: for wee know very well, that it is the blood and labour of the people, which is so prodigally wasted. And for offending in such manner, some Kings haue been deiect from their Thrones; as hapned to Edw. King of England, second of that name, in the yeare 1325. who affected nothing but the Family of the Spencers, giuing them all great confiscations, and the Mony of his subsidies. These extreme and vsufferable courses, raised his Queene, Sonne and people against him, who were punished with death, & the King (at length) strangled.

Adde we hereto, that it is a great blemish and deformity in any King, not to bee liberall: for a couetous Prince is contemned of euery one, and hath few what is reported of him.

Friends. He should informe himselfe, what is reported of him, to vnderstand who are malecontent, and who pleased, prouiding for both in good discretion. As (very wisely) did Phillip, King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, who was informed, that an auncient Knight (following his Court) did nothing but speak badly of him, and raised diuers enemies against him. The King comming couertly to know the cause of this obloquy; heard the old Knight complaine, that he had imployed both his youth, age, and vttermost meanes in the Kings seruice, whereby he was not onely growne poore, but also vnregarded. The K. well noting so foule a fault in himselfe, prouided for the Knight in such gracious manner: that he had not (formerly) so greatly reprocud him, but now he did much more exalt him. Whē the King heard thereof, he said to every one about him; I was the sole cause of the Knights iust complaint, but hence-forward I will take order, that others shall not haue the like aduantage against me.

The bad and dangerous countell of Macchiauell.

He must be careful to constitute some bad man in great authoriuy, and to haue rule in his Kingdome, euen as his Lieutenant: to the end, that he may bear all the blame, and if the people fall into commotion, they may rest contented with killing him, and so the K. shall remaine safe. This is the Philosophy of Maister Macchiauell, a matter verie dangerous; for hereby, both the one & other may well loose their liues. As we may read in the History of England, that King Richard accusing his Earle Marshal to the people, to be the onely cause of Subsidies, and robbing them of their Monies, seeming willing to content the people; he banished him the Land. Which man, could finde no place of safety, either in Fraunce, Flanders, Allemaigne, nor thorow all Europe, where to make his abiding. After this bad man, the king committed the gouernment of his kingdom to four other Men, against whom, the people conceiued as great hatred, as before they had done against the Earle Marshall. Which caused the saide Richard to be imprisoned; where those foure men were beheaded before his prison window, and he himselfe (afterward) lost his life.

The cause why Richard
King of England was cruelly murdered.

He should study, not to be ouer dreadfull to his Subiectes, nor too familiar; for the one begetteth hatred, and the other contempt. He should punish the wrongs of other men, and be sparing in his owne. As did good King Lewes of France, the 12. who in the time when he was but Duke of Orleance, hauing some enmity with King Charles the eight, and seeking to seaze the City of Orleance, for security of his own person, least the King should further labour to disquiet him; the Citizens made fast their gates against him. It happened, notwithstanding many trauerfes and misfortunes; this Duke came to the Crowne, after decease of the said King: And then the people of Orleance came to entreat him, not to remember precedent accidents, but graciously to grant them pardon. The King made aunswere, that he had forgotten all iniuries doone him: but wished them afterward to be carefull, how they offended another man. After that Hamball with-drew himselfe from Italie, the Romaines found no better means of raiging in quiet for the time to come: then by forgetting those iniuries, which they had receiued by the Common-weales of Italy; that had ioyned with Hamball in making the warre. In quarrels among great men hee ought not to entermedle, to support one side more then the other: but cause them to lay downe their Armes, by his absolute authority, and seek best means to reconcile them. For, in formalizing himselfe, more for the one then the other, it hath many times occasioned intestine war, and sometimes the losse of Royal dignity, as hath too often happened both in France and England. He should not be addicted to wine, but shun drunkenesse as poyson. For a King being drunke, is like a Lion, or any other furious beast, that bites and teares the first he meets withall. It causeth beside, that the K. (hauing his spirits fiered and troubled with wine) may kil some one man in that fury, or otherwise so offend him: as may afterward endaunger both his Royall person and the State. He must moderate choller, so much as in him possible lieth, without vsing either a Sword or Staffe. Imitating heerein the Bees, whose King hath no sting at all: For choller and fury are the chiefe hinderers, that the soule cannot not forme her functions according to reason:

Incontinency, whoredome, and obscenity, should be detestible to him, and for his better support, he must frequent no luxurious company, nor have any such person about him, whose ordinary talk is euermore thereto enclining; but such, whose speech is alwaies vertuous. Luxury makes a man dull, neglect, and effeminate, and a King (giuen to that vice) should rather carry a distaffe, then a Scepter. Sardanapalus, King of Assiria, lost his life, by being over-greedily giuen to this sin. So did Nero, Emperour of Rome. King Frances, first of that name, became very vnhealthfull in his aged daies, by being too much addicted to this vice; and yet otherwise, he was vertuous, and a louer of learning.

Being affected of his Subiects, for his good life, his treasury is the purse of his people, who will succour him liberally when he shall haue any needfull occasion. Which, in our memory, and not long since, Elizabeth, that famous Q. of Eng. found to be true. For in al her time, she neuer oppressed her people, but declared her selfe to be the liuely Mirrour of true Maiesty. And therefore, when there came a very potent Army (verie strongly bent against her and her Kingdomes) such as (in humane iudgment) was likely to preuaile: yet her subiects Bounty & Loue (next to heauens blessing) stood so strongly to her, that when her enemies supposed her ruine neere, they were shamefully foyled, and she gloriously triumphed. Cyrus and Alexander, two great Monarches, made themselves mighty, not by their Money (for they had none at all, or at least very little, at their first aduenturing) but were only assisted by friends, and the purse of their people. Whereas on the contrary, Darius and Croesus, two Kings that had abundance of treasure, and no loue of their people; were brought into most miserable condition.

Let him not be easily led, to beleue some Couriers, men affected in the search of nouelties, vsing perswasion, to attempt Conquests and far off voyages; as crossing the Seas, either to Barbarie, Asia, and the foure quarters of the world, 500. a thousand, or two thousand leagues distant from his own kingdome, and ther to make war: such wars doe (oftentimes) beget the totall ruine of his owne estate. As hapned to King Lewes of France, ninth of that name, who lost a goodly Army of Noble-men and braue Souldiers in Syria, himselfe also beeing there taken Prisoner, to the no litle cost of his owne Kingdome. After his returne home, he would needes be gone thither againe: but he died before the Cittie of Thunis, and lost the verie greatest part of his Army.

By perswasion of the Genewaiers, Charles King of France, the sixt, sent an Armie into Barbarie, against the chiefe Cittie of Affrica: but one part of the French dyed there thorow Famine, and by inclemency of the aire, and the rest returned home; not hauing performed any one act of honour. John of Bourgogne, Counte of Neuers, was sent with a worthy French army into Epire, against Biazeth, Emperour of the Turkes; in assistance of the Hungarians: but there hee was surprized, and kept as Prisoner, with the Constable of France, and diuers others, and the whole French Armie quite defeated. Lewes of France the twelfth, sent an army against the Turks, that besiedged Mitylene, a Cittie in the Isle of Lesbos: but vtterly in vaine, for he lost (well neere) all his people. Notwithstanding, if a King make a league against any Infidell Prince, and that all Christian Princes (or the more part of them) are thereto likewise moued and sollicitated, vpon good reason: the King ought to contribute both Men and Money, but not to goe in person, except hee haue an assured peace with all his Neighbour Princes. Now, albeir a King had conquered a farre-off Country, yet scarcely knowes he how to keepe it for any long time: because the manners of strangers will hardly agree with theirs of that Countrey, and then the building of Cittadels is to be talkt on, but yet he must Philosophize how to maintaine them. It much better for any King, to sustaine himselfe vpon the forces of his men of armes, and fidelity of his Subiects; then on the strongest wals he can build. Which the Lacedemonians practised, by the aduise of Lycorgus. But after they had engirt the Cittie of Sparta with Walles, and gaue themselves wholly to the forti-fyng of places: thence forward, their Common-weale grew to bee iust nothing. The Turke practiseth the verie same yet to this day. The first Cantons of the Suitzers, had neuer any wals, and were no other then great Villages; for they relyed more vpon their strength, then any trust in wals.

But it may be alleaged vnto me, that it is good for a King to read, to the end, he may learne something, as other men doe, and as other Kings haue formerlie done. This I approoue, and do no way mislike, at such times as he is not to bee more seriously imployed: For, a King that will well discharge his duty, shall find very little time of respit or leisure. Bookes that discourse on matter of good manners, should then be most familiar with him: because, in them hee shall learne such lessons, as no man else dare be so bold as to teach him.

As for Bookes of Histories, he must haue choise and plenty of them, because in reading such as are another mans Collections, that neuer saw, or came where they were acted: they cannot alwaies talke of truth, in regard, that hee giueth credit but to what he finds in another mans Papers, and Writers, will (vsually) speak fauourably of their owne occasions. If they be Histories, concerning the time when the Authour liued: he wil be sure to fauor the Prince, and the party which hee best affected, or to whom he was Pentioner. As may be noted in Paulus Iouius, the Italian, and Sleydan, the Germaine Historian, who haue written well enough: except whē they fall into some particular matters, as of Religion, or such like; there they are evidently perceiued to wander, in speaking partially, or out of priuate affection. Likewise, he should not iudge of good and lawfull enterprises, according to the bad successe they haue had, or so to condemne them: neither, whē affaires haue bin ill grounded, & worse mannaged, to repute them good, because they haue passed with fortunate euent. Therefore it behooueth any Prince, to read Histories, with good and deliberate iudgement.

Alexander Seuerus (at an houre of leisure) would read Platoes Commonwealth, the Offices of Cicero, and sententious Horace. Wise Scipio, when occasion serued, would read the Institutions of Cyrus, proposed by Xenophon. Charles the first, Emperour, neuer reade any Authour, but Phillip de Commines, who wrote the life of King Lewes the eleauenth. I would not be mistaken herein, as (seeking by these allegations) to restraine a Prince from reading, or limit him none other, but these Books onely. But I say, that the principall Bookes, and those which bee most necessary for him: are such, as do discourse on the affaires of State, and of matter belonging to the Common-wealth.

Many times; it fals out, to bee more expedient for a Prince, to buy a Town by intelligence, or giuing Mony to the Enemy: then to take it by force of armes, though it cost him not so much; so is the Land sure to be no way ruinated.

To conclude, let a King stand vpon his Guards, and haue assured and trusty people about him; euermore ready, least occasion should present it selfe, & he be suddenly surprized: such as were the Legionaries, or those trained Souldiers, instituted by King Frances, first of that name.

And for conclusion to his Philosophy, he should be little, or of least reckoning in his owne eye, how great or potent soeuer hee appeareth to other. As it happened to Alexander, who had no sooner ended his Conquests in the East, but (standing vpon his own pride) he was cast downe, and poysoned by his owne Followers. Baiazeth, the verie greatest Emperour of all the Turkes that were before him: was vanquished, chained, and carried about in a Cage of Iron, by Tamberlaine, King of the Tartares, who was but a Neat-heard, by his first profession.

Behold (in summe) what Philosophy Princes ought to learne, which is not so much comprized in Bookes; as it is the braine (prouided of good and solid iudgement) the feare of God beeing alwaies principally preferred. So shall the saying of Plato be truely found in them: That Kinges ought to be Philosophers, or Philosophers raigne.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome of Persia; Nature of the Country and People; Condition of their Court, Lawes, and Commonwealth affaires, &c.

Persia hath caried the same name, from the beginning to this day, containing it in these feveral Regions, Lar and Requellmall. The principall City thereof is called Siras, in elder times tearmed Persepolis; which is gouerned by the Sophy, Great Lord of all Persia and Azimina, called (by our Elders) Assyria; and the Kingdom of Dearbech, sometime named Mesopotamia; and Seroan, that was Media; and Parthia, now called Iex; with Hica, now tearmed Coraxan; And Sarmania, now Dulcendana; and Asia, at this instant called Hetti. All these Regions, with the greater Armenia (which is a part also of them) are gouerned by the Great Sophy, and the greatest or largest City vnder his command, is named Tauris, being built in the midst of the Mountaine Taurus, foure Dayes journey off from the Caspian Sea. Next vnto Tauris, there are other Citties beside; as Soltania, Concassan, Saphan, Corazan, Lera, Mora, Sarmachaud, Gesti, Far, Siras, and Ormuz, a City in the Persicke

Siras the chief City of Persia

The Gouernment of the great Sophy.

Sea, which at this day, is called Mare Misindia. In this City, is great Commerce of Merchants, made with the Portugals, and there they Fish for great abundance of Pearles. There are also other Citties, as Cureh, Iex, Casmine, and Coy, with infinite Castles. On the west-side of the Cittie Tauris, are the Caspian Mountaines, which bee now called the Mountaines of Ararat: And on the Bacchan Sea (aunciently named the Caspian Sea) are these Citties; Summachia, Derbent, Bacchan, and Mamutaga. All these Prouinces, and their Regions, are very barren, because they haue small store of Riuers: the greatest whercof, is cald Bindarin, but (in former times) they entituled it Bragada. The people of these Regions, are warlicke, ciuil, and very valiant men: ther is not so much ciuility found in al-Asia, as in these people, but they are al Mahumetists.

These Prouinces do produce the best Horses that are to be found in the world. And there they make the best steele Armors, that is in any Lande, which are made at a place called Azimina, where there is great abundance of Silke. As concerning the Gouernment heere obserued, Zenophon (speaking of those elder dayes) saith; That they haue a certaine cheefe place, called by them, Freedome; wherein standeth the Kings Pallace, and all the houses of the cheefest men Neere vnto this, ther is such another void place made fit for Merchants, and things to be sold by Mercenary Artificers, seuered farre off one from another, to the end, that such as are addicted to vertue and Liberall Arts, may not be molested with fooles, and their ydle chatting; besides, beastly people, and the rude misgouerned multitude, may not presume to meddle with them.

The Market-place of Freedom or Liberty, is deuided into foure parts or habitations, and are tearmed Courts. In one, dwelleth young Children: In the second, Youths without Beards: in the third, men of mature yeares: and in the fourth, such as (by Age) are no more able or bound to follow the warres. Each of these (by Law) hath his place and exercise: the Children and men do assemble together daily, in their severall quarters; but the Olde men not so often, but only vpon some appointed dayes. The young men, with such Armes as they are allowed to exercise, doe tend about the the Princes dwelling in the Night time; except they be such as haue wiues, who, not being subject to such commaund, is fauoured for the Night-seruice. But they account it not honest but rather a shame and disgrace, to be ouer-soone married. Each Court hath twelue Præsfects, according to the number of the Persian tribes. To the Children, are old graue men appointed, apt for their better continuance in good manners: and such men likewise to the youthes, as (by their Vertue) can yeild them best example of imitation. For, the men of riper yeares, there are Governours elected, that by conformitie of their passed liues, and regular sway of authority, may holde good disposition with them, not anie way to swerne from the wil and direction of their Prince, but doe containe them in verie facile obedience.

The exercises of each age and degree (to the end that euerie man may knowe, with what care and industry he must become a good Cittizen) are these. The Children of Persia (like to ours) doe attaine to Learning in Schooles, and there they are taught to vnderstand, what it is to liue according to Iustice and honesty. Such as are their Governours there, doe spend the most part of the day, in iudging and giuing sentence on such Delictes, as are reported one of another. Such as are accused of Theft, Rapine, Violence, Deceit, Dishonest Language, and such like offences, being found innocent in these Crimes, the false accusers, are presently punished. Aboue all other Vices, Ingratitude is most seuerely chastised, as being the occasion of infinite shames among men. And he that is found negligent, in returning like thankfulness for a benefit receiued, they sticke not publicly to maintaine, that out of this Vice, issueth contempt of the imortall Gods, their Countrey, Parents, and Friends: & finally, that it is the head and manifest originall of all other euils whatsoever. Beside this, they learne to liue temperately, and for inducement thereto, they repute example of the most ancient, to bee best available, and the beholding of their temperate behauiour.

In like manner, with no great difficultie, they are incited to continencie, with abilitie to endure both hunger and thirst: by seeing men of such graue yeares, not part away thence to eating or drinking, without license obtained of the Præsfects. They eate not in the Mothers company, but alwayes with their Maisters: for their diet is brought to the School, which is Breade and Hearbes, commonlie called * Nasturtium. Little need of drink haue they, because they vse nothing but Water, vntill the age of sixteene yeares. They haue Bowes and Arrowes, wherewith they practise shooting, and afterward are sent to dwell among the * Ephoby, who are young youthes, that likewise haue, and do still lead the same kinde of life.

Their attendance and sleepe time, is as we haue already said, about the Princes Lodgings, and as well for a Watch or guard to the Citty, as also to prevent such Luxuries, which commonly do ouer-abound in these young years, except they be holpen by diligent sollicitude, & verie stirring exercises. In the day time, they waite vpon their Præsfects, to the end that they may bee alwaies in readinesse. When the King rides on hunting (which happens diuers times in the month) one part of them do go along with him, carrying each man his Bow, and Quiuer of Arrowes, his Axe or Long Sworde, his Shield, and two Dartes: one readie to draw, and the other to hold in his hand, as well to defend as offende with them. The King, as in a vision of a King, euen so in Hunting, he is the Captaine, pursuing the chase with greatest dilligence, and commanding all the rest what is necessary to be done. So that this exercise, appeareth peareth like vnto warre, by carefull foresight, to keepe a good houre of rising in the morning, to endure both colde and heate, to run after Wild-Beasts; and (by the sharpenesse of a sauage Countrey) to make the body able to euery labor. They are likewise (manie times) enforced, to awaite the wilde Beasts comming against them, respecting alwayes, that if hee be more powerful then he was reputed, they may all stirre presently, exercising still that small respit of time, euen as if they were in the Campe for battaile.

Euery man bears his own prouision.

Euery man carries his own food with him; and yet they eate not before the houre of supper time, except they haue leysure to stand still awhile, in expectation of some wilde Beastes comming, or haue giuen better order for the Chase. When they haue supt, the next day following they pursue still the Game, vntill the same houre of Supper againe, euermore without feeding, making two daies together but one, in respect of eating: which habitude is also most profitable in Warre, respecting times, which often do enforce a great scarcitie of Victuals. If there bee any dearth, then they vse to temper their bread, with the aforesaide Nasturtium, for no man there will eate, till vrgent hunger compell him. Farre differing from them, that care not what excesse they feede Gluttony withal, who can neuer iudge truly, how little would serue, or be really delightfull to Nature: like to him that can please appetite with simple Bread, or a poore small Cake; & seekes not to slake thirst with Wine, but harmelesse water.

In the time of dearth or Famine.

Concerning such as remaine in the Cittie.

They that remaine at home in their houses, for safegard of the Cittie, haue publick places appointed, for like exercises in them. They haue a care of all occasions, euen from verie Childe-hood, to see them vse their Bowes, hurle their Darts, and exercise Armes. They that are most vertuous, wise, learned, and actiue of person, doe carry greatest Commendation, and are honoured of the people; not onely the Præfects, but euen such also, as haue bin any occasion (by their diligence) of their education from Child-hood, they carry worthie Commendation, and are contained in highest fauour.

succour sent to some needefull place, in dealing with these occurrences, which require hast and strength of bodye; the Gouvernors make vse of none but young lusty men, who (hauing bin trained ten yeares in such Disciplines) are ranked among the number of men, that (to the age of fife and twenty) haue hadde the Gouernment of them, as the Præfectes had of their Childe-hood, euer to make them ready for seruice of the Commonwealth. When they go in battell order, they vse neither Bowes, Darts, or Weapons, to offend a farre off; but ech mans brest is armed with a Cuirace, his shield vpon his arme, and so he confrontes his Enemy, either with his Axe, or with his Sword. The Heads or Commanders, are all Præfectes, yet none of them abide in the City, hauing care of the yong Children and youth.

When they go to battaile.

What they do at the age of fifty yeares.

When they haue past this time, and attained to the age of fiftie yeares, they are placed among the old men, sent forth no more to warre: but rest in their countrey, where they elect Præfects, ordaine Iudges for publicke and priuate causes, and likewise (as Iurors) do passe vpon the liues of men, that sentence may be giuen vpon euery delict, acording as the crime appeareth by due eidence, in which cases, euery man offended, hath free liberty to accuse. He that stands condemned in the whole course of his life, is reputed most infamous. The whole Commonwealth of the Persians, containeth in it an hundered and twentie thousande men.

None are denied instruction in the publicke Schooles.

Difference betweene rich & poore mens sonnes.

There is no prohibition, of being instructed in the publicke Schooles, where Iustice is truly taught, neither is it forbidden by any Lawe, but that a man (by his Vertues) may attaine to dignitie and honor, no exception is made, but onely want of Vertue. Yet let me tell ye, most choise is made of Rich mens sonnes for the Schooles, not because their Parents haue least need, but that themselues are soonest infected with Vices. Aud poore mens sonnes (for necessity of common maintenance) are sent to Shoppes, to learne Mercenarie exercises, whereby to liue.

The Children that haue been entrusted in the Disciplines fore-named, may conuerse with the Ephebi, but not the others. The Ephebi, that haue liued according ding to the Lawes, may likewise abide among the men, and attaine to Honours and Magistracie. And these men, after they have liued according to the Persian Discipline, may go amongst the Oldest Men, who hauing liued (all their time) with greatest Iustice, are most woorthie and excellent Citizens in the Commonwealth.

An expresse note of abstinence in the Persians, is, that they can endure labour enough, yet liue moderately. But among vs, there is little or no respect at all, albeit they hold it for the greatest infamy, to spet in company, or make clean the nose, and to voide Vrine publickely, or do any such Offices in open fight. All which, we might easily shun, if wee would eate but little, and the grosse natural humors of the bodie, would consume themselves by labour and exercise of the body.

In these daies, all things in the world being altered, the Persians make their wars with most vnindifferent course, and (for ought I can perceiue) bad conditions, because as they haue a wonderful Caualerie, so they haue no certaine power of Infanterie or Footmen, either ordinarie or aged. By which part of strength, the Turke (euen in our times) hauing gotten many notable victories, and being neuer foyled in any place; hath brought verie great and important warres to end. It is a matter also verie vnbeneficial to the Persians, that they vse no Shotte, neither abounde in any Artillerie on Carriages; with which terrible helpe, euery attempt is soonest concluded. As was too well exemplified, by the vnhappy prooue of Vsan-Cassanus, and of Ismaell, whose Caualerie were then honourably victorious. Lately also, in the Caldean Fields, and (in memory of our Fathers) at Harsenga and Euphrates, where they could not endure the great and vnaccustomed noise of their Horses, in that most cruel & bloodie Tempest. Wherefore, in no place may the armed man of Persia, compare with the Turke, if he were disarmed. Because the Persian is (of all parts) couered with a scalie Cuirace; his Panciere or Belly-peece, of Iron; his buffed Helmet strongly crested, and hung thicke with Feathers, his Shield or Target rounde, and curiously embellished with Golde. But the Turke of Europe, as vtterly vnarmed, is scarcely halfe couerd with a round bended Target, after the manner of the Asian Shieldes, inter-wouen with Reeds, subtilly sweetned with Cinnamon, and embroidered with Silke of sundrie Colours. The Persian likewise couereth his arme and right hand, with a false sleeue and Gauntlet of Steele, galloping with a Launce of Ash, which hath two points; and being met in the midst, (after the Moores fashion) oftentimes beares off the blowe on high, for easier passage of the men and Horse disarmed. But, the Turke (according to the Gracian vse) placing his Launces butt-end in his flanke, and stouping it vnto his horses eare (like them that are made of light and brittle Firre) runnes swiftly vpon the spurre, breakes it at the first blow, and so passing on to the enemies Armie, is constrained to lay hand to his Semitar, or to his iron Mace, as vnable to gouerne the Persians furie. For, they are mounted on great & verte strong horses, that haue their foreheads armed with Iron, and their bodies covered with sodden Leather hides (after the manner of the Italians Capparisons) plaited together in narrowe foldes, and stuffed with Bumbast or Silke, to beare off euery blow falling thereon. In which regard, no one of them (except ouer-audaciously) will compare the best Persian, either with the Archer on Horsebacke, or foote-Soldier of the Turke. For he being armed with a big strong Bowe, full of manie knotted Nerues; drawes an Arrowe of good roundnesse, after the Tartars manner, and his fall is almost deadly.

All these thinges being equally compared together, the armie of the Sophie, euen bounde and deuoted to the King, (by an opinion of a high and Diuine minde, and by a certaine Religious Sacramentall reason) not being fearefull of death in any place, although it bee inferior to the Turkes in number, might seeme inuincible, if it were not oppressed by Treacherous and vnworthie men of valour, furie of Artillerie, and vnusual multitudes of men.

I finde, that the principall occasion, why Ismael brought so many Prouinces (by glorious Armes) vnder one sole Emperie, yet with lesse number of Soldiers then others would beleue (especially against Ottoman, who ouer-ran the countrey so farre as Armenia, and wasted all things)

The Persians Capparisons for their great horses.

The Bowes vsed by the Turkes.

The reason of Ismaels great successe in war things) was onely this : Hee released all Tributes, and tooke away euery taxation (onely to purchase fame by liberality) euen vpon his very entrance. And it much imported this new King then, so to doe; because (by force of Armes) he expelled the lawfull heires, from the State and Empire, after Vsan-Cassanus the Grandfire, and Iacoppo their Father. In which respect, hee was euer needie of Money; and therefore, when any warre arose, he brought forth no Armies, combined by their strong and iust Nerues, albeit the countries of the East (abounding in manie things) beside such diuersitie of rich Kingdomes) benignlie and largely wold haue afforded supply of pay, for all necessaries belonging to life and warfare. Quite contrary to Solymans case, who continually was serued with Infanterie and Horsemen, Maisters of the Artillerie, Captaines of the Army, and all such beside, as were either Officers for the field, or attended in his Pallace, who were daily and monthly paid by the treasurer, that deliuered forth monies. Nor in this case is there any want of Treasuries, because that in Constantinople there are seuen Towers or Castles, which containe in them inestimable mountains of mony, both of gold and Siluer, with perpetual entrance yearly, of so many tributes and taxations, as do exceed all expences whatsoever, by the fourth part.

Among the Persians there are 3. sorts of Soldiers, to wit, of the Guard; of men vnder commaund; and of voluntarie assistants. Those of the Guard, are at a certain pay, and are dieted at the Kings cost, and he likewise (according to an auncient Custome) and at cerraine times of the year, obserued in writing, as an ouerplus of bounty; giues them Armor, horses, Garments, Pauillions or Tents for the field, and victuals. At these times, being attended with a goodly companie of Lords, as also the Soldiers at command, and brauest voluntaries: hee maintaines the reputation of a frequent Court, and Progracing vnto places of best maintenance, proceedeth on to visit the most Noble Citties of the Prouinces. When ther is no wars, the Dinasti, Lords, Detrarchi, and Feudataries of ancient Nobility (who enioy the Signories of the Castles and Countries, giuen by their elders, do find all the prouision in Prograce; or if it be giuen them by the King, it is collected againe by Edict. They do also whatsoever else is commaunded them, according to the same reason, or equality in condition; as (vniuersally) al the Nobilitie in Spain, Fraunce, and Italy, doe vse to serue their Lord and King withall.

The number of the Soldiers is great, and when they are in Armes; they resort to their Ensignes: but if a diligent inquiry be made, they neuer amouit to 20000. Horse. Nor doe the third part of them, (furnished in such rich manner; as wee haue before declared) go so to battel, for all the rest are contented with their Helms, Mantles (of hard and thick-wouen stufte) wrapped about them, and cojered with sundry shields; their fight is onelie with the Lance and Bow. For they haue now learned to helpe those former kinde of Armes, and according as place & occasion requireth, do hurl the shield ouer the shoulder, to receiue the Launce of a pursuing enemy, and stands vpon his defence before, with his Bow and Arrows. Those Shields which are truely saide to come from Persia, and from the Royall City of Sciros (where Armor is made of most excellent temper, and verie worthy wormanship) are reputed to be of cheefest estimation.

Next vnto these, are the neighboring Assyrians, by authority of name; & therefore the Kingdoms of the Medes & Parthians, do afford the verie best and valiantest Archers, beyond all other, except the Tartars. But the Armenians, do couet most of all to fight on foot, & write them selues of the Infanterie. For they plant (vpon the ground) a long preparation of Shields, great and plaine, euen as if they had a Rampier before them, and so defend themselves against the furie of the Horsemen, fighting with Pikes, and very short Axes, as also Bowes and arrowes; yea, many times they fight both neer and far off, with Slings that haue short handles. People that come to helpe them, as voluntaries, are sent out of Iberia and Albania, who are their confederate Kinges, and neighbor vpon Media and Armenia, beeing (for the most part) halfe Christians, and therefore do maintaine equall hatred against the Ottomans; and warre against them.

CHAP. II.

Against Iulius Cæsar, because in his Commentaries of the Warres in Gaule, he oftentimes calleth the Gaules (at this day French-men) Barbarians.

That which I have purposed to handle in this Chapter, proceedeth not either from affection, or ouer-great animosity: but rather to defend (against the Spaniard, Italian, or Greeke) the famous Kingdome of France. For, when they are growne discontented with the French, or be chafed, and ouer-come by them in warre; they spightfully terme them Barbarians, Inciuill, and Saluages; and say, they learned it of Iulius Cæsar. Now, to discusse whether it bee true, or no, that the whole Ciuility of the world was amongst the Romaines, and that the Gaules hadde not as much or more then they; it remaineth vpon sufficient prooffe and triall. Although that Iulius Cæsar was a great Captaine, hauing all those good partes in him, which are required in an Emperour yet notwithstanding, it may plainly bee noted, that beeing vnable to effectuate his Conquestes in Gaule, hee therefore calles it a light Nation, inconstant and barbarous.

The first reason was (as I thinke) because they vsed humane Oblations in their Sacrifices, sacrificing sometimes their Children, other-whiles their slaues, and verie often themselues, vpon some Vow or solemne Oath taken: for vanquishing their enemies in Warre, or for som other speciall matter. Which I must needs confesse to be a great cruelty, and farre from all humanity: albeit that in those times, in al parts of the world, they vsed the same manner of sacrificing. And yet the Romaines did much worse heerein, then all other Nations whatsoever. For, from all Antiquity, in the Country of the Latines (where Rome is built) they threw manie men off a bridge, into the Riuer of Tiber, hauing their Feete and hands fast bound, to honour their sacrifices of Saturne. Nor would they otherwise massacre or dispatch them, in re-

The especiall occasion of this Chapter.

All Ciuility among the Romaines.

Iulius Cæsar was an excellent Captaine.

The Gaules and Romaines were both cruell in their sacrifices gard of an ancient Oracle (as Varro saith) the last Verse, whereof contayneth thus much: Send the cheefest to Hell, and the light to Father Saturne, that is to say, the Liues of men.

Varros words concerning the Oracle.

10 Titus Liuius, a Romain Historian, who was from the time of Iulius Cæsar, hath left Written; That the said Romaines had a Custome, when they behelde themselues in any great perill, to vow and promise solemnly, that they woulde immolate to Iupiter, all creatures that receiued life in the next Spring time, calling the Spring time Holy. In these vowes, were comprized al the Infants liues that shold be born during this season. But at length, they conuerted this sacrificing of infants, by sending them into exile: which likewise seemed verie cruell, to banish poore and innocent Infants.

Verie cruell vowes of the Romaines.

20 For ought I knowe, there is not anie people or Nation, that can say of themselues, they haue stood cleare from these horrible Sacrifices. For, in Chios, a Grecian Island, thy vsed the same. In Egypt, in Heiopolis, where euery day they massacred three men, to offer them to the Goddesse Iuno. The Lacedemonians Sacrificed to God Mars. The Phenitians did as much to Saturne, when they were vexed with Pestilence, or persecuted with great warres. Histrens, an auncient Author, saith; that the * Curetes, a people of Creete, vsed to appease Saturne, by offering young Infants in sacrifice vnto him. In Laodicea, a Cittie of Cælo-Syria, they did the like, to make the Goddesse Pallas placable. The Iewes do stiffely denie, that they did not immolat their Infants to God Moloch. The Thracians, Carthagerians, Scythians, and (wel-neere) all the Grecians, did exercise such detestable Sacrifices. And it was common euerie where, vntill the time of the Emperor Claudius, who made an Edicte to the contrary. And yet at this day, thorow all the Great Prouinces of India, otherwise called the New-world, not onely do they still sacrifice men, but also feed on humane flesh.

Who haue bin immolaters of humane Sacrifices.

* Sybils Priests called also Corybantes.

30 40 50 If Iulius Cæsar reputed the Gaules to be barbarous, because (hauing promised & made vowes to their Gods) if they might win battailes against their enemies, they offered such Sacrifices to them: I should rather iudge it great Piety and Religion in them, towards their Gods and Country, trey, because they made no spare of them selves, but Sacrificed also (with them) all that which they had conquered in warre, of what great value and estimation soeuer it were. For it is especially to bee noted, that wheresoever Religion & Justice is, there can bee accounted no barbarisme. Contrariwise, after victory obtained in some battaile, the Romaines sacrificed common Creatures, and made particular profit of the very greatest Riches conquered by them: as of Captiues, Gold, Silver, Horses, and such like, offering to their God Iupiter Phere-trus, moueables of small value; as some Armour, price-lesse Rings, and Garments. Moreouer, such was the vertue and magnanimity of the Gaules, as to endure so many tribulations, which time could lay vpon them while they liued. But the Romaines, to free themselves from all perils; would commonly kill themselves; if they were detained in prison, or otherwise, which is the act of men downe-falne in hart.

If he hold them for barbarous, because they haue eaten humane flesh; as it is very true: he must vnderstand, that it happened vpon an extreame necessity, when himselfe came downe vpon them with three hundred thousand Cymbrians, Teutons, or Allemaignes into Gallia Sequana, and besieged the City of Sens. For victuals failing them, by reason that all the Countrey was spoiled about them, and the Enemy kept a long and strict sledge vpon them: this poore distressed people (vnable to defend the City otherwise) consisting of aged persons, women and children, very young in yeares; did voluntarily expose their liues, to feede their bowels that defended their Countrey, and for preservation of the Gaules Commonwealth. But this was not ordinarily done, nor vpon any wanton or lickerish appetite; likewise, neuer was it euer heard to bee done; either before that time or after. Contrariwise, much more barbarously, and without any necessity at all; the Romaines made it a Iouial vse, to feed on mens flesh in their feasts and banquets, as Galen assures vs; that himselfe hath scene, in the time of the Emperor Commodus. Some Spaniards (euen in our times) haue done as much in the Indias, for, hauing no other victuals;

they would eate their owne companions, and Indians, that died on diseases, or famine.

Julius Cesar also makes a mockery, because there were certaine people, tearmed waged or mercenary Souldiers among the Gaules, who made a free gift of themselves to people of wealth, to do all such seruices as they would imploy them in; receiuing their whole nourishment and mainenance (from them) while they liued. But looke of what death soeuer their Maisters dyed; they would gladly and willingly follow them therein, to keepe them company, and do seruice to their Lords soules, in another world, because this was an Article of their Religion. But the Romaines had an inuiolable law, which was, that if a maister had few or many slaues, and he hapned to be slaine (albeit that some other had kild their Maister) yet all the Slaues must be slaine. Nay, they had worse customes, for if a Captaine were offended with his Soldiers, or some idle toy tooke him in the head: hee would haue euery tenth man in his Army culd out, and cause them to be hewen in pieces before him, by the other Souldiers of the same company. More, the great number of Gladiatores or Fencers, that they caused to kill one another (either in their open Theaters, or other publique places strewed with Sand) with very keene edged and sharpe pointed Swordes, before all the people, without any pittie or compassion, saying: Thus did the Romaine people, and more cruelly in war. Nor might these Fencers giue over the fight, what hurts or woundes soeuer they had receiued; except the people were so pleased. They would make their Captiues also fight with cruell Beastes; as Lyons, Beares, Tygers, and others, not in any small number; but by thousandes at a time; only for a pastime to the people, and to win themselves credit, that when they fought after any office, they might bee assured of their voyces.

Perhaps he called them barbarous, because that the Gaules (in his time) had no other food for their ordinary prouision, but Swines Flesh. I aunswere him, that it is one of the best and wholesomest meate, which can be vsed for any nourishment: for it verie easily conuerteth into the substance of man, as being almost of the same temperature. The Athletes and Wrastlers of Greece, to make themselves sturdy, strong, and of the best habitude, would feed on no other Victuals, but bread and Porke. But the Romaines of Caesars time, enriched and made fat with the spoils of the world; were become Gourmandes, dissolute, and prodigall, as the like could not be found in any other Nation. One may serue for an example of the rest, who termed himselfe a great friend vnto Caesar, named Lucullus, that spent vpon one meale, twentie thousand Crownes. But by this kinde of badde life, multitude and varietie of Dishes, and extreame Gluttonie vsed amongst them: the Romaines grew to be verie vnhealthfull, according as Cornelius Celsus writeth. And no man is so ignoraunt, but knoweth verie well; that leading such a life, doth rather truly fauour of Beasts liues and barbarisme, then of the least part or iotte of Ciuilitie.

Hee should not call them barbarous, because when they were at rest in their houses, they slept not vpon soft featherbeddes, but ordinarily vpon the harde ground; which the Romaines (in those times) could not doe. Most certaine it is, that it is rather a Vertue to sleepe in such manner, then otherwise, for more easie support of such discommodities, as commonly doe attend on men of warre: who (as it should seeme) are sent of heauen, for defence of their Countrey, to subdue inciuill people for their sinnes. Nor, for wearing of short Garmentes, could he call them barbarous, because it is the nature of a Warlike people, rather to be clad in Garmentes which are short, then such as be long and troublesome.

Besides the Title of Barbarous, he accounts them to be a light-headed people, verie mutable in opinion and counsell. Hee speaketh these thinges, as a sworne enemy vnto them. For, when he had sowne diuisions and Quarrelles among them, hee would feigne to be on one side, and quite against the other. But they perceiuing his subtilty, disclaymed from his kindnesse, and brake the agreements which they hadde made with him.

He neither surmounted or went beyond them in open and faire warre, for indeed he could not: but only by trecheries, because his intent was, to possesse himselfe of Gaule, and be King thereof, if he had vanquished Pompey. Now, because they discerned his deuises, & knew the Dominion of the Romans to be more insupportable, then that of the Allemaignes, whom the Gaules of Sequana had called to their aide, against them of Armeni, and so leagued themselves together very gladly: therefore he calls them light and inconstant. I leaue to further consideration, whether hee had sufficient subiect to hold them for such.

If he conceited them (then) not to be Lettered, hee was much deceiued; for from all antiquity, the Gaules had knowledge in that part of Phylosophy, which we tearme Naturall, and of the Ethique or Morrall too, instructing pollicie and good manners, which ought to support a Common-wealth. Nor went they among the Greekes to seeke instruction, as manie haue immagined. For, whereas Caesar saith in his Commentaries, That they vsed Greek Carracters in their writings; hee meaneth not, that they spake the Greeke Language. But three hundred yeares (or thereabout) before that Rome was taken and sackt by the Gaules, it was (as their owne Historians haue recorded) both without Law and Iustice. True it is, that they were good Warriors, and that tenne men were sent from them into Greece, to seeke lawes, whereby to pollicie their Common-wealth. The Gaules on the contrarie, would neuer vse the Lawes of any other; but contented themselves with those, which they hadde received from eldest antiquitie, as manie people vsed by their example; yea, euen the Romaines themselves, immitated them in Articles (enow) of their Religion, hauing withdrawne some of their Phylosophers and Priestes, who could not followe those other Gaules, when as they departed from Italy to goe into Greece, by reason of the Dearth of Victualles.

The Reader, by conferring both manners and fashions in behauior of the one and other; will finde as much, or rather more Barbarisme in the Romaines, then in the Gaules. And although they haue changed their Name, for that braue nation of Warriors in Franconia, who are mingled mingled among them: yet doo they carrie (to this day) the Fame and Renowne, to be the Gallant, Ciuill, and most courteous Nation of the World, and where Learned men abound, more then in any other Prouince. But the Romaines and Italians, haue had this Vice for long time; to make estimation of none but themselves. For, it is plainly seene in all their Histories, that they make themselves to be euermore Conquerors, without attributing anie thing to others. As may be evidently noted in the very commentaries of this Cesar: but if it were so wel knowne by other Historians of their owne Nation, how often the Gauls did beat, vanquish and put him to his flight, ouer-throwing the Pallisadoes of his Campe, by their cunning Mines made Vnder-ground, wherein they were verie skilfull Maisters: the Gauls (as I haue saide elswhere) neede care for no other Written Histories; knowing that (for the most part) they are either Flatterers or Lyers.

CHAP. III.

¶ How long time it is, since the Switzers were Cantoned: and vpon what occasion their Countrey was called, the Land of Leagues.

Efore we speake anie thing of the Switzers, I should describe the scituation, Ground-plotte, and confrontation of the country, which was giuen them; to bee Mountainous and strong (the onely benefit of begetting Liberty) to the end that the Reader may the better comprehend the History, purposely intended for his instruction, in knowing, why the people were Cantoned. To shew yee then, what the Country is, which is cald of the Switzers, or the Lande of Cantons, or of Leagues; ye must vnderstand, it is that which was called by the Romaines, Heluetia. It beginneth in the verie highest Alpes, and endeth (on the East side) at Rhein, descending towards the North, so farre as Waltshut and Lansembourg; and from thence it turneth towards the West, as in a direct tracte, by the Mountaine Inra, euen to the Lake of Genoua: and afterwards, remounteth vpon the Alpes againe.

An aduertisement to the Reader.

The length & bredth of the Countrey of Leagues.

A briefe Description of the Countrey.

The Country seemeth to be straight and narrow; as appearing, that the verie largest place, should not extend it selfe aboue forty Leagues, and (in some places) much lesse: the length also to consist of about an hundred and ten Leagues. It is verie Mountainy, populous, and yet more then other Countries; cannot nourish or maintaine men: They are a warlike people, able to endure all trauailes in warre. Manie of them (at this day) doe liue vpon such Wages, as they receiue of strange Princes that will imploy them: not that they take part with such as will giue them most Wages (as some think) but in willingnesse to serue whom most they loue.

Switzers take wages, not in regard of the money.

In this Countrey; there are manie goodly Citties and Townes, as also verie great Villages, and very well pollicied;

Of the Governour of three Vales, concerning three yoaik of Oxen.

Cruell tyrannies and oppressions in the Governours.

whereof we meane to speake hereafter.

The occasion then, wherefore this Country was and is reduced into Cantons, and to become leagued, against those that oppressed them; was thus, according as Blondus maketh faithfull relation thereof. About the yeare 1305. the Emperours and Kinges of the Romaines, during the Schismes of the Empire, did place Governours good store in the Switzers Country, as to recompence such as had taken part with them, not hauing where-withall (otherwise) to reward them. They gaue them leaue to do whatsoeuer seemed good in their owne opinion, being as many of them there, as there were Citties, Townes, and Villages, or few wanting: who molested the people with subsidies and borrowings, extorting all thinges else whatsoeuer from them, according as it came into their fantasie. And yet notwithstanding, a great many of the Citties, Townes, and Comminalties, had long continued their immunity & franchise; eyther by especiall grace of the Emperours, or by buying such priuiledges with their Money, for which they had good & sufficient Patents to shew. Neuerthelesse, these Harpie Governours, by perswasion of some Noblemen of the Country; did manifold wrongs and iniuries to this people.

It happened, that the Governour of three Vales, wherein are three great Townes; to wit, Vri, Suutz, and Vnderwalden (that were free of long time) sent sundry of his Catch-poles or Sergeants to demand three couple of Oxen, which belonged to a man of Vnderwalden, & to bring them away perforce: vsing no other reason, but: that Country men should labour with their hands, and not with the help of staule-fed Oxen. The Sonne to the man, from whom the Oxen were taken, impatient at his Fathers oppression; laying hand on his Sword, chanced to cut off a Finger of one of the Sergeants. The poore youth was afterward apprehended, and the Tyrant (beeing extreamely enraged) commaunded his eyes to bee pulled out.

Another Governour of the said Vnderwalden, sent for an honest Woman, that should prepare a bath for him in his owne House; which she did accordingly, as not daring to disobey the Tyrant. No sooner had she made ready his Bath, and purposing to part thence againe: but the Villaine rauished her, for which shee was slaine by her Husband, with the helpe of his Friends.

There was another Governour of Vri, who, beside his exacting on many meanes of the people, entred into such folly and presumption, that he erected (in a faire spacious place of the saide Vri) an high pearch or poule; on the top whereof was fastned a Hat or Bonnet, which he himselfe had sometime worne, commaunding the like to bee done in the Villedge of Suutz. Afterward, hee gaue charge, that the Country people should performe as much reuerence to the Bonnet, as if himselfe were there in person. There was a man of very generous Spirit, and borne in that Country, named Guillaume Tell, who refused to doe this frivolous reuerence. Whereupon hee was apprehended, brought before this proud and insupportable Governour, and sentenced with death: except hee could salue his disobedience, by taking a young Sonne of his owne (about five yeares old) and standing fifty paces off from the Childe; cleaue an Apple vpon his bare head, with an Arrow deliuered from a Crosse-bow, without any harme done to the Childe. The man was both famed, and knowne to bee an expert Crosse-bow-man, and being heereto thus rigorously constrained: he performed the deede, without any hurt to his Child; but it was more by the grace of God, then his owne industry.

The Governour beeing offended that the man had sped so well, and perceiuing that hee had another Arrow left vnder his Girdle; demaunded, for what purpose hee had that other Arrow, when he was enioyned to shoote but one? Guillaume Tell answered. If I had slaine my Son; this other Arrow should haue had thy life. In regard of these words, he was taken, bound fast with Cords, and put into a Boate, to be conueyed to prison. Now, it fortunated, that they were to passe a Lake in rowing thither, vpon which Lake hee escaped very strangely from them. For, hauing (by meere strength) broken ken his bonds; he threw himselfe suddenly into the Lake, and recouering certaine Mountaines not farre off; lyued there verie couertly, and awayting for the Governour (one day) in a verie narrow passage, there slew him with the forsaide Arrow.

Four Switzers enforced to eate their owne cares.

Another Governour, caused the cares of foure Countrey-men of Switz to be cut off; then commanding them to be roasted, he compelled them to eat them. The people of the Countrey, being not a little moued with these extreame iniuries, and manie other out-rages in the Governours: expelled them quite out of those three Vales; & (from thenceforward) entering into Confederacies, beganne to Cantone or quarter themselves, swearing a solemne League, with absolute promise to succor one another, if they should heereafter be mollested by any whosoeuer.

The rich Abbot of the hermits, claimeth an interest in Switz.

Within short time after, a rich Abbot, entituled of the Hermits, saide; That hee had right and Title, to leaue some Prouision of Come, and of Mōny also, vpon the Village of Switz, and summoned them to make payment thereof. They answered, that they neuer heard before of any thing due vnto the sayde Abbot, nor did anie such right (to their knowledge) appertaine vnto him: and therefore, they would pay him nothing. Hee growing verie angric at this answer, and being descended of a Great and Noble house: leaues an Armie, accompanied with Leopold, the Duke of Austriche, who had great Landes both within, and vpon the Frontiers of the Switzers. Besides, manie Barons and other Gentlemen of the Country, came vnto him (Voluntarily) from all partes, hauing already gone on, and vsed those places where they were to passe, more then Hostily.

The first victorie of the Switzers, against the Duke and Abbot.

The Armie of the three Vales, which could not amount vnto thirteene hundred men, charged with humble heads, (yet vnconquerable spirits and assurance) the Armie of the Duke and Abbotte; and hauing put them to flight, slewe verie manie of them, and a great number likewise were taken Prisoners, besides, the Dukes best safetie of his life, was speedie flight. This Victorie of these simple, but verie Warlike people, encouraged them to attempt and put in pra rise much greater matters, and to stand vpon their best defence, in all ensuing occasions.

The second victorie of the Switzers, against the emperor & duke.

These leagued Vallies, within little while after, to wit; vpon the sixteenth day of November, according as Murster declarath, in the yeare one thousand three hundred and fiftene; ouercame another Armie of twentie thousand men, which the Emperour Fredericke of Austriche, and Duke Leopold his Brother had prepared, to rinate those three Villages, because they would not take the Oath of allegiance to the saide Emperour; at his newe creation; and yet they had formerly doone it to Lewis of Bauiaria, who called himselfe also Emperour, and lawfully elected.

The occasion of this second warre.

Ouer and aboue this reason, he was vrged on, and thereto vehemently perswaded, by a great number of Noblemen and potent Lordes, who had made great spoyles both of Castels & Towns. But, the Confederated Switzers, being aduertised of FREDERICKS intention, closely ambushed themselves (to the number of fiftene hundred men) vpon the craggie hie Mountaines, and narrow passages, full of great Rockes and Quarries of stone; whereof they chose the biggest, & rowled them downe vpon the Armie, as it came vppe from the Mountaines foote, and went along the strait waies.

A politike stratagem, of the Leagued Switzers.

For, from the bottome of the Mountaine, the one side of the Rocke seemed like an vpright Wall on the one side; and on the other, were great Lakes of Deepe Water, not easie to be waded: and the huge stones tumbling downe so fast vpon them, drowned no meane number of them in those Lakes, or did beate out their braines; and the rest being disfronted, Duke Leopold was glad and faine to thift for his life the second time.

Duke Leopold saueh his life the second time.

Notwithstanding these two sustained foyles and losses, Duke LEOPOLDE lost not a iotte of his Courage and Valour, but made againe vpon them with fresh Forces; perswading himselfe, that hee should get the Maistry of these Boores, Peazants, and Shepherdes, for so hee termed these Confederates. Calling the Men of Strasbourg vnto his ayde and assistance; with diuers other Townes, that tooke parte with the Emperour Fredericke, and manie other great Princes: he entered againe into the Confederates Country, by the Valley of Vnderwalden amōg the Mountains. Now was he the third time well beaten and repulſed, by eight or nine hundred people, & yet his army conſiſted of aboute 1200. men.

The Switzers ſucceſſe, vpon theſe obtained victories.

Some Write, that the Duke himſelf; was not there in perſon; but the Count of Haſpouge, who went as his Lieutenant. From this time forwards, theſe three Cantons tooke hart and boldneſſe of ſpirit vpon them, ſeizing (by waie of Warre) the Caſtles, Townes, Forts, and Signeuries, of ſuch Gentlemen as had aſſiſted the Duke, quite ruinating the ſaide Forts and Caſtles, or appropriating them to their owne reuennues. For, before theſe fortunate ſucceſſes, they had not any thing in proper, but onely their Townes and Villages: but now adayes, they haue reduced thoſe lands into Bayliwickes, whereunto they depute Governours, which either they change yearly, or continue to further time; according as it is aduiſed by the Senate, belonging to each Village of the confederats, and ſome others, that haue (ſince then) Cantonned themſelues, and entred into alliance with them.

The death of the Emperour, and Duke Leopold.

Duke Leopold, and the Emperour his Brother, died within fewe yeares after theſe loſſes, without any Children, and their ſucceeding heires ſuffred theſe confederates to liue peaceably, till the yeare, 1390. Neuertheleſſe, they were moleſted by other great Lordes, whom ſtill they manfully withſtood, and ſtil got the better hand of all in their attemptes. At laſt, there came one, named Leopold alſo, deſcended of the ſame family of Auſtriche, an audacious Prince, ouer-light in beleefe, and ſcarſely aged xx. yeares. He was prouoked by thoſe Noble and Gentlemen, who either were expulſed from their houſes, or elſe had voluntarily forſaken them, and albeit there hadde paſt ſome tranſaction and truce between them: yet now they would breake their faith and promiſe made to theſe Confederates. All the pretence that this young Prince had for warre, was, becauſe Lucerna, which was a goodly Towne, had leagued and cantonned it ſelſe with the fore-named Villages, and many ſubiects of Duke Leopoldes, in regard of his often moleſtations, were now (by this means) become Bourgeſſes, and quietly enioyed the benefits of their Country. Theſe matters, intermedled with the Princes raſh furie, made him ſo violent in ſpleen againſt them: that ſo manie as hee could cauſe to be taken of Lucerna, or thoſe other ſubiects that had the office of Bourgeſſes, they were forthwith hangde and ſtrangled in the open fields.

The leagued Inhabitants, not a little diſpleaſed at theſe cruelties, broght their armed troupes into the field, and (by a ſudden aſſault made vpon this yong Duke Leopold) tooke the ſtrong Caſtle of Ptephicon, and put vnto death all that were found therein. At the very ſame time alſo, they tooke two Townes of Duke Leopoldes, to wit; Detlibouch and Sampach, that gladly yeilded themſelues into the protection of the Confederates, and Bourgeſhip of Lucerna. The Duke being highly heere with diſpleaſed, hauing an Armie readie of ten thouſande men; entered into the Countrey of the Cantones. But notwithstanding all his heate and haſt, by the aduiſe of ſome: peace was made betweene them, vnder certain conditions, ſo that no battel was fought, or Towne taken.

The yong Duke being returned home to his Court, with intent to ſport and recreate himſelfe, was perſwaded by many Noblemen, that he had greatly diſhonoured himſelfe in making anie contract of peace with his ſubiects, and that al Lords were diſpenſed withall, for anie oath taken in that nature. Moreouer, they objected, that this might prooue a principall cauſe, to hinder him from ſucceſſion in the Empire, whereto his predeceſſours had formerly attained. Being ouercome by their fooliſh perſwaſions, he employed a great part of the Empires forces; and moſt of the Nobilitie, beeing numbered twentie thouſand men, both horſe and foote, all verie expert and wel tried Soldiers, the greater part Noblemen, pretending intereſt in the cauſe, and accompanied with manie Princes of power. Thus came they vnto the field, with all kinds of munition, to beſiege Sampach: where the Armie alſo of the confederats met them, who were (in all) but a thouſand and ſix hundred men. But they being poſſeſſed of the moſt aduantageable place in the field, and where the Horſemen men could do no good for themselves, or prejudice to the Switzers: the Noble men were feigne to dismount, and battaile being giuen, the honor of the daie remained to the Cantons. It was such an extreame hot day, that the Noblemen were not able to endure any part of the paines (which the poore Rusticks were not so much enforced vnto, but could ably out-stand farre greater toyle) but were glad to flye. Albeit, young Leopoldic stood firme and courageous, vntill he was slaine, with manie other worthy men; as Otho, Marquesse of Hoch, John, Earle of Fustembourge, and diuers others: for very few escaped, but they were eyther taken Prisoners, or slaine. Two yeares after, some of the Gentle-men, which had then escaped, returned thither againe with sixe thousand fighting men: but two hundred men of Glaronna stood against the, and slew two thousand and foure hundred of them, compelling the rest to saue their liues by flight, according as I finde it recorded in the Books of Crantzius and Munster.

Now, these Noblemen and Gouvernors, did not onely molest these three Vallies and Lucerna; but likewise all them inhabiting about Bearne, pillaging all the goods in the fieldes of Bearne. Yet notwithstanding, by continuall waging War with them, the Cantons defeated all their purposes, ruinated their Castles, and appropriated all vnto their owne Dominions; except it were of such, as contracted amity and alliance with them. I forbear heere to set downe, the potent war which they had against the Abbot of S. Gal, especially those of Appenzell, because they vrged a right vnto their corne and other fruites: but they could get nothing of them but blowes, albeit, their Armies were verie great. Glavis, in short while after, being troubled by the Noblemen and cruell Gouvernours, which they of Austriche had set ouer them: entred into league with the men of Bearne, and other of the foure Cantons.

Zurick, a great and worthy City, seated vpon the Riuer of Indmat, had bene vexed aboue fiftie yeares by the Nobility, and a puissant Prince, who was the valiant Counte of Hapsurge, and extream in hatred to them; because 10 he was taken in Zurick (beeing entered thereinto in the night time) by meanes of the treacherous Inhabitants; with foure hundred men, he being made Prisoner, and all his men slaine. Yet, with in some few yeares, he was set at liberty, at the sollicitation made by his Cousin Albert the Emperour, and thence forward, Zurick came into the number of the leagued Confederats. This City called it selfe Tyгурum, and is the most rich and powerfull Cantone, aboue all the rest, next vnto Bearne; and holdeth precedence beyond all the other: because all Ambassadors resort thither, and the assemblies are most of all there made. Whereby plainly appeareth, that the Cantons doe not hold place of precedency, according as they were receiued into the league; and I confesse mine owne ignorance, not knowing how these degrees haue passed among them.

20 It is presupposed, that because there was (then) no Iustice for the people; but that all the Noble men (almost) in these quarters of the Heluetians, were (as we vse to say) cut out of one cloath, that is to say; had sworne the ruine of the third estate: Therefore, Zoug, Basle, Fribourg, Soleurre, and Shaffonze, (by laps of time) confederated themselves with the seauen before named. All which together, beeing in number thirteene, had many warres against the Emperors, and other great Lords, and were euermore Conquerours. It is therefore to be presumed, that they got not their libertie, nor the goodly lands which the more part of the do now possesse, in a day: but before they could haue peace with their Neighbors, they passed ouer (well neere) sixscore years.

30 40 50 This Countrey of the Leagues or Cantones, neither knew how to gaine their freedome, or conquer so many Countries as they haue done; if the Emperours had not bene busied in ciuill warres; whereof the Popes (for the most part) were the sole occasion, or Germany had bene vnited, as sometime it was. But the Nobilitie being become insolent by Ciuill wars, acknowledging no Superiours nor Gouvernours, that knew well enough how to fish in troubled Waters: enforced (by their tyranny) the people of the Heluetians, ians, to shake off the yoke of their superiors also, and to expell them thence. At this present, and since the time of King Frances the first, they haue made confederation with the Crowne of Fraunce, receiuing both presents and pensions.

The Authors purpose in this breefe relation of the Switzers.

Mine intent was not (in this breefe discourse) to shew my selfe any Historian, neither to set downe all the gestes and warres, which this warlike Nation haue made, since they began to seeke their liberty; for, to performe that labour, it would require three or foure great volumes. Beside, I haue spoken but of three or foure, the most notable and chiefest in the Countrey, thereby to let the Reader vnderstand; wherefore the Region of the Switzers, is called the Countrey of Leagues, or of the Cantons. Wherein I haue followed the best Writers; as Blondus, Crantzius and Munster. By this discourse, I would gladly giue aduise to Princes and Noble-men, to deale better with their subiects, then these Lords did in the Switzers Countrey; least (by successe of time) Heauen frowne vpon them, and they be throwne into the like disauster.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the excellency and deserued commendation of Trauaile; And what great dangers are begotten, and doe ensue of idlenesse.

Trauaile first commaunded by God.

WE are enioined by the law and commaundement of God, that wee must trauaile and labour in this world: For the very first Man that euer was, hauing broken Gods commaundement, was throwne out of Terrestriall Paradise, and the Earth was giuen him to enioy; but yet with this condition, to labour therein with continuall Trauaile, without any limitation of time, but euen so long as he liued. And yet this was not imposed vpon the first man onely; but it came as an iniunction also, to all his posteritie. Now, notwithstanding holy Scripture tels vs, that Trauaile was laid on Man as a matter of repentance: yet it appeareth likewise, to be a proper medicine, whereby to recouer and help some passed euils. For a man attaineth by Trauaile, to regaine that which he lost by feeding. And though this came as a castigation, yet God commaunding nothing, but what is good in it selfe; hath (in that nature) giuen man time to enioy the Land by labour, according as Iob saith; Man is borne to trauaile.

Trauaile is a Phisicall medicine for passed offences.

Iob 5.7.

The life of our blessed Sauour.

Looke vpon our Sauour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, our Soueraigne Maister, who, as an example to vs all; trauailed continually in painefull exercises, euen till his death. And beside, in his parables, he blamed and reprooued the sleepey Virgines, that were neglect and slothfull: euermore fauouring and commending such as trauailed, saying, in an especiall place of note; Come vnto me all ye that Trauaile and are heauy laden, and I will ease ye. If we would sit downe to read, we should finde, that the ancient Saints, imployed all their time in continual exercises and labours. Moreover, Trauaile is not onely healthfull for the Soule, but it is likewise as beneficiall to the body; for it causeth agility, strength, and quick disposition; it cheareth and encreaseth good Spirits, and consumeth all bad and offensive humors. And concerning the Soule, it cleanseth it from all occasions of euill doing, and conuerteth bad thoughts into better endeouours. Most certaine is it, that (without paine and trauaile) neuer did matter of any great consequence sort to good effect; but the paines seemed the sweeter, because no slothfull ease was interposed in the action. He that trauailes and takes paines, takes quiet repose and rest also, because to a weary man, all thinges are sweete and acceptable: his meate is fauoury to him, sleepe easie, and all pleasures are to him in truest contentment.

The benefits ensuing to the body by trauaile.

But returning to the benefits of the body, trauaile maketh a man discrete, vigilant, well aduised, wise, & all goodnesse else proceedeth thence. It is trauaile that apparelleth and beautifieth a Man: it maketh lodgings for him to rest in; waies to walke in; Ships to saile in; Armes to defend him; in breefe, innumerable are the blessings thereby abounding. are made fresh, teeming, and fruitfull: to such as are dry, it giueth water, by opening the earths Wombe, to let forth her owne moysture. It exalteth humble Vallies, where neede requireth, and throwes down high Mountaines, whose steepe passage offendeth. It turneth foorth-right Flouds and Riuers; to take their more needfull course by dry landes without waters, helping (thereby) to adorne and polliſh Nature, compelling her sometimes, to engender such things, as in her own proper wil she would not. It tameth the wildest beasts, and maketh them familiar. It maketh mens Spirits prompt and subtile, hauing the like power in all the other senses of man: and he that makes due tryall, findes the vnualliable riches which is got by Trauaile.

God would not haue his owne chosen Vessels to come to Heauen, but by the rugged pathes of paine and trauaile. If sumptuous buildings, goodly Pallaces, and populous Citties doe seeme mightie thinges: then know, that all those were performed by the labour, sweate, and trauaile of thy Predecessors. If likewise, Arts and Sciences doe highly content thee: why then remember, that they were the spirituall Trauaile of learned Men in times past. If thou looke vpon faire fields, beautiful Gardens, and plenteous yeelding Vines: say to thy selfe, all these proceeded from the workes of Trauaile; because idlenesse dooth not any thing, but rather destroyeth whatsoeuer is already done. By Trauaile, men attained to very great and famous renowne. It was that which made wise Plato, Aristotle, Pythagoras, and the rest of those learned men, neuer cease to trauaile their bodies and studious Spirits; both in writing, enstructing, & disputing, without any care at all for sleeping, feeding, or cloathing their bodies: and yet, at such times as Nature compelled them to these necessities; they seemed much more sweete and pleasing to them, then they can doe to idle and sloathfull Gluttons.

What was it that made Hercules so famous and farre honoured; but onelic his twelue labourious Trauailes? What was it that gave such splendour to the Names of Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, with all those excellent Kings and Captaines; but painefull exercise, and industrious Trauaile? Whereas on the contrary, Sardanapalus, and other such like idle and lasciuious Princes, both ruined and oppressed their Countries, and themselues dyed very shamefull deaths. Whereby may easily be gathered, that if the World were deprived of Trauaile; all would turne to nothing. Offices in humanity, would fall into Decadence; Mechanicall Artes, Letters, Studies, Goods, Remembrances, Iustice, Lawes and Peace, no one of all these could continue without Trauaile. All the vertues are supported, only by meanes thereof, and (without it) they could no way be exercised: because, he that will minister Iustice, ought to trauaile and take pains. To conclude, no vertue can bee set on worke, without Trauaile, and therefore Hesiodus said: By sweat and painefull Trauaile, Vertue is to be won.

If wee would well and exactly contemplate all the things which God hath created; we shall find, that by how much the more they are perfected in a certaine means, by so much the more may we truly say, that hee hath giuen to them great Trauaile. Let vs behold his superior handy-workes; the Sunne mooueth it selfe continually; the Moone neuer standeth still; the Heauens and the Plannets haue beene, are, and shall be daily in continuall motion. The fire cannot containe it selfe, without some operation; the Ayre goes alwaies to some place or other. In the inferiour bodies, the Water, Fountaines and Riuers flow incessantly, and the Sea mooueth without cessation. For the Earth it selfe, albeit it were immouable (for it ought so to be, & vpon necessity, both that men may Trauaile whether they would thereon, and afterward take their rest) yet notwithstanding, it neuer enioyeth any repose: but continually bringeth foorth Hearbs, Trees, and Plants, euen like a diligent and painefull Mother, that counts her selfe obliged, to maintaine and nourish both men and Beasts. And therefore, if we would bring all these thinges to due consideration, we should then finde, that Nature is intenuate to no other thing; but onely to continuall labour and trauaile: in creating, forming, making, vnmaking, producing, corrupting, altering, or gazing and toiling, without the least respite of rest or repose, in any kind whatsoeuer.

That this which I haue saide, must needs

needes be true, the wise Philosophers (in times past) signified by their daily labours, that they were neuer weary in commending the trauaile & exercise of the body. Virgill saith, That continuall labour surmounteth all things. Horace, the Lyricke and Satiricall Poet, saith in his workes: That God gaue nothing to Man, but with paine and labour. Euripides saith: Trauaile is the Father of Fame: God helpeth him that trauaileth: without Trauaile, there is no true renowne, praise, nor happie aduenture. The Poet Menander wrote very wisely; a healthful man idle, is in worse condition then he that hath an Ague. The saying of Democritus pleaseth me highly, where he saith: Paines taken voluntarily, are neuer distastefull when they bee enforced. When Hermicon was demanded, of whom he learned those deepe Sciences which he professed; he answered: Of Trauaile and Experience. It was the saying of great Pythagoras; That a Man ought to make choise of a good life, and to let it appeare, by paine and Trauaile, which brings it to a sweete and easie custome. Salomon saith; The slothfull man should learne example of the Ant.

I should neuer end, if I were to name heere, the plenty of testimonies to bee alleaged in this kinde. It shall suffice then, for me to say, that neuer was any man famous for Armes, Learning, example of good life, or any of the Arts; without great Trauaile. And, to speak truly, neuer were any idle people great, or knowne, but if it happened that a Man being borne great, liued neglectly or idle: most certaine it is, that (by slothfulnesse) his estate was ruined, or else hee lost his renowne, quiet or life, the losse being the true fruit of sloathes Tree, whereby all vices are multiplied, as the wise man wel witnesseth, saying; Idlenesse enstrueth many mischies. Ouid could affirme, that, Without idlenesse, Cupid hath no power, and hee spake truely: For in idlenesse, wickednesse is dreamt on, treasons inuented, and foule sinnes acted. Ezechiell numbred idlenesse among those sins, which were the caule that Sodome was destroyed.

To speak mine owne iudgement in this case, I neuer knew any thing, wherein idlenesse got entrance, but it came to vtter ruine. We see the fire, if it be not maintained, it quickly quench-eth of it selfe. The Aire likewise, it must be continually moouing; for if it bee withheld and restrained, it will breake forth of it selfe. Water, compelled to any limitted place, and where it may not haue his course and free passage; it putrieth, corrupteth, and stincketh. If the earth be not opened and laboured; it will produce nothing but Brambles, Bryers, Thistles, and other vnprofitable Hearbs. It is euident to our eies, that Gold, if it be not much laboured and purified, it will neuer appeare in his perfect beauty. Iron likewise, and other Mettals, will meerey rust and canker of themselues; except they bee wrought to some kinde of seruice. Provinces and Countries, if they be not inhabited and laboured; they will proue barren & subiect to pestilence. Houses and dwellings, let them stand voyd and empty; they forthwith fal to ruine and decay. Common high-waies, let them not be trauailed and frequented; they will shut vp themselues into impossibility of passage, so that all knowledge of them will be vtterly lost. All things whatsoeuer, if they be not imployed, and made vse of by labor; they perish, and made vse of by labor; they perish, impaire of themselues. Yea, euen the very vitall Spirits of Men or Women, if they be not quickned and viuified by daily exercises; they will become lazy and slothfull; so that the hart and soule will consume themselues, the powers of the body be so wasted and weakned, that no vse or motion can be made with them.

I haue already (in this Chapter) told ye, that trauaile makes a man agile, and chearefully disposed: and now (on the contrary) I am also to informe ye, that sloath and idlenesse spoyleth the complexion, corrupteth all good humours in mans body, and giues Dominion to them that are bad and naught. Galen saith: It is impossible for a man, to keepe himselfe healthfull, except he trauaile and labour. And Auicenne is of the same mind, with Cornelius Celsus, and other very excellent Phisitions. Horses, and such kind of Beasts, if they be kept idle; they become vnprofitable. Ships rot and seemely vgly, if they be kept still in Ports and Hauens: but when they saile abroad, they are both beautifull and beneficiall, and keepe themselues from base

Beside, I finde it faithfully recorded, that Hannibals idleneffe at Capua, was the onely cause of the Romaines victorie against him. The sloathfull man hath no other Lesson; but that all imployment is painefull to him. He that marcheth best in Warre, fights alwaies in greatest security: but hee that abiderth still in one place, is apt to all inconueniences, and the Sunne burnes him with the more aduantage. Plato, in Lib. 7 de Legib.

Of the Emperour Adrian & Turbo.

We do ordinarily behold, and finde it true in common experience, that both voyces and instruments, nor being imploied; they lose their vertue, sound hoarsly and discordant: whereas on the contrary, vs refineth, concordeth, and makes them most pleasing. There are some kindes of Wines, that must be rackt and roughly mannged, to preferue them in yeilding the better rellish. Pretious stones, if they bee not polished and purely cleansed, they cannot appeare in their perfect luster: but by painefull labour and trauaile, they are discerned in their highest excellencie. Rude Iron it selfe, the more it is vsed, the clearer it shineth. Among brute beasts, they that take the greatest pains, are most esteemed of men. To support this cause, I could alleadge to many authorities of Philosophers and Poets, al blaming and rebuking idleneffe: as would serue to compleat whatsoeuer is waating, for full confirmation of this needfull discourse. Saints haue curssed it; Philosophers condemned it; Ouid, Plato, Horace, Claudian, Virgill, and all other Poets haue sung against it. All Histories are full of the euils deriued from it. Plato and Aristotle, condemning idleneffe, doe highly exalt the Art that was called Gymnastia, whereby, all necessary occasions and matters for war were enstructed.

The Emperour Adrian had long time educated, fauoured, and (at last) exalted a man, named Turbo, who was a most diligent and labourious follower of his affaires, and the Emperour, noting him one day, that (in his opinion) hee was too earnest in his businesse, he said vnto him. Turbo, doe not kill thy selfe, but be more carefull of thy health: whereto Turbo replied. My Lord, the Man that hath bene nourished, fauoured and aduanced by an Emperour, as I haue bene, ought to dye in Trauaile at his foote. Quintus Curtius declareth, that the diseases of idleneffe should be cured by Trauaile. The Romaines had a custome, to begin the day at midnight, to the end, that at the rising and apparition of the Sunne; they might all fall to labour together: for they were perswaded, that (already) a moiety of the day was past, and yet no good Act performed by them. A Roman sought to perswade the Senate, that Carthage could not be destroyed; least the Romans boasting of security, by want of imployment there, should become idle. Vpon which occasion, Scipio Nasica, perceiuing that some held Rome to be in safety, after that Carthage was made desolate, and Greece wasted; gaue them this answer. I am of a contrary opinion, and doe thinke our selues now to be in much greater perill, because we now stand in feare of nobody. Whereby this worthy man inferred, that idleneffe was the cause of more dreadfull daunger, then either warre or neighbouring enemies; because feare yeeldes more aduantage of safetie, then when we stand free from all doubtfull consideration. And therefore the French haue a pretty Proverbe: Make Hollidaie when the times giue leysure.

Apuleius saide, that nothing seemed more commendable to him, then Fencers, who had idleneffe in such abomination; that the Maisters would neuer suffer their Schollers to eate, till they had first performed some act of vertue and man-hood. Cicero declareth (to the same effect;) That Men were truly borne to good deedes and aduentures; whereof our Soule is a sufficient argument, for it is neuer idle, or at rest. Draco, the famous Law-maker of Athens; among the most notable Lawes which hee deuised, he had one deseruing the chiefest praise of all; which was: That such men were sentenced with death, as should be found idle, or walking at their pleasure or pastimes, when others were seriously and honestly busied. Three Idols in great esteeme among the Gentiles.

ueth some consideration, to note in what account trauaile was among the Gentiles; in regard, that they had three Idols: the first was named Strenna, that is; dexterity, or agility: the second, Agenoria, which signified virility, or manlines: and the third, Stimula, which is as much to say, as a spurre and pricke to honour and vertue; and trauaile was (with them) in such precious reckoning, that they erected these Ideas to eternity.

The holy Scripture bindeth vs to trauaile.

But not to stay our selues (ouer long) on the Gentiles opinion, let vs come to the sacred Scriptures; where we are no lesse bound to trauaile, then restrained and prohibited from prophane things. Salomon in his Prouerbs, among those other places, where he so deeply condemneth idlenesse, saith: That the sluggard or slouthfull person, which forbeareth to worke in Winter, shall be a Beggar. Saint Paule, the Doctour of the Gentiles, taketh glory in nothing more, then in not beeing idle, commending labour and trauaile aboue all things. And writing to the Thessalonians, hee tels them, that they knew wel enough how to imitate him, for he was neuer idle among them, but it was foode to him both night and day, in that he had gained them; not by any indirect meanes or charge to them, but in giuing them good example. Saying moreouer, that hee that would not labour, ought not to eat. The like did he to the Corinthians, recounting his Trauailes taken for their example; and so in many other places beside. Let vs then (hence-forward) imploy our time in good and honest exercises, shunning sloth and idlenesse, that neuer can performe any act of estimation.

And yet wee are not commaunded, to follow labour and trauaile, with such extreamity or rigour; as to leaue our meate, drinke, sleep, or honestly taking our rest and quiet: for decent recreations, and honest repose is sometimes lawfull. In which regard, Cicero exalted and commaunded Scipio, who said: That he was neuer lesse at rest, then when he was at rest. Which Cicero maintaineth to be a notable saying: Because (quoth he) he declared thereby, that in his idlenesse, he thought on his businesse, and so in solitude, he could take counsell with himselfe. Moral Seneca alleaged; That idle time, without

Letters or study, is death and buriall to a Man, and onely they that are exercised in knowledge, know best what sloath and idlenesse is. Plutarch would haue a man to make some dispensation of his time, in exercising the difference betweene knowledge and experience. O that men (then) would but duely consider, how their time is to bee imployed; which glides away so swiftly, and remember withall, that they must render an account for euery word spoken vainely & idly. Cato, although he was a Pagan, yet he could say: That great and worthy Men did stand as much bound to yeilde an account, for their time lost or neglected; as they that could best deliuer reason for their honest imployment.

To conclude, we should make such good expence of our time, in honest, lawdable, and blamelesse exercises: that the fruites thereof may be aduantageable to vs, and we esteemed as hired Seruants for heauen; which is provided for none, but such, as are called to trauaile in the Lords Vine-yard, and shall haue their Wages according to their worke. And Saint John the Diuine saith. The dead which dye in the Lord, are fully blessed, for they rest from their labours, and their werkes and trauailes follow them. This authority doth well approue, that trauaile is the merchandise of this World; heere bought and sold; but rewarded in Heauen. For so Saint Paule testifieth, saying: Euery one shall receiue his wages and payment, according as he hath trauailed here beneath.

CHAP. V.

The reason, why the Palme was given as an attribute to Conquerours; and Lawrell obserued as a signe of victory.

Most certaine is it, that (in elder times) the Romaines gaue the Palme to Conquerours, in signe of Triumph; and it is so true, that by writing in Latine the word Palma, it is meerey vnderstood for victory. Plutarch also affirmeth, that for each kind of victory, there was a feuerall Crowne

Plutarch in Tract. de Computat.

Seuerall Crowns vsed among the Romaines for Conquerors.

Crowne designed, where-with their heads were circled, that had obtained such honor in field. One was made of Olive branches; another of Laurell; a third of Oaken Leaues, and others, of other trees: but among them all, the Palme was the general signe of victory. Those ancients do likewise say, that the cause why this signification (more then any other) was attributed to them: proceeded from an admirable propriety in the Tree it selfe, which (without any other prooffe to confirme it) is allowed to be most certaine, by authority of the that haue written thereon; as Pliny, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Aulus Gellius, and Plutarch. All which learned Writers do maintain, that the more the Palme-tree (or one of his branches) is charged with any heavy weight or burden; the more it resists and withstandeth the oppression. And whereas all other Trees doe yeelde vnder such lading, and are surmounted by the burden: the Palme only resisteth, and cannot be ouer-awed; because the greater the weight is, the more doth it still out-stand it. In this respect, both Plutarch and Aulus Gellius say: That he which goes with an intent to Conquer another, must not suffer himselfe to be surmounted by feare of the perrill, nor waxe weake in the attempt: but rather trauaile on with height of courage, and (with resolute resistance) pursue victorie, as being a man, meete to carry comparison with that Tree, which hath the same naturall quality, both in resisting and overcoming any weighty oppression, and therefore it is giuen as a signe of victorie.

Others say, that this honour was practised by the Gentiles, because the Palme was consecrated to Phæbus, long before the Laurell was, and was held to be a most auncient signe of victory. Pliny and Theophrastus, doe write of many other properties in this Tree, whereof we neede not speake, to auoide expence of time. And yet notwithstanding, I am very loath, to conceale that which is affirmed by so many; to wit, that as the Palme hath contrary effects to all other Trees: so is there of them both Male and Female, and the Females are they which bring forth dates; the Males onelic flourish, and when they happen to yeelde any fruite, they are verie small, without good tast, and no profit is made of them. It is also to be obserued, that in what place soeuer the Females grow, if the Males be not neere vnto them, they will not beare any fruit: but if it chance, that the Male-tree bee cut or disbranched; the Female (like a Widdowe) thence-forward, will neuer yeelde any more fruit.

But ceasing further speech of the Palme, we are heere to remember, that in the Triumphes at Rome, the Triumphers vsed to bee Crowned with Laurell, and the Captaine that triumphed, carried a braunch thereof in his hand. So is the Triumpe described of Scipio Africanus, by Appianus Alexandrinus, and many others, whereof Pliny yeeldeth some reason, and saith. The Laurell was consecrated to Apollo or Phæbus, because that on the Mount of Parnassus, there grew great store of them; And hee beleueth, that for this reason, the Triumphers Crowned themselues with Laurell.

He deliuereth another reason, concerning a wonderfull propertie in the Laurell; to wit; that (naturally) it is an enemy to Fire, and Thunder, and Lightning (be it neuer so violent) hath not the power to touch it. Heereupon was it, that so often as the Emperour Tiberius heard any Thunder, and beheld the lightning flashes; hee tooke a Leafe of Laurell or Bayes, and laide it on his bare head, iudging himselfe (by that meanes) to bee free from the Thunder and Lightnings daunger. The Priestes of Diuination in Rome, vsed also to Crowne themselues with Laurell, and afterward burning them; would diuine (by the noise it made) of that which was to ensue: and therefore Claudian called this Tree, The Diuiner of things to come.

Pliny and Suetonius, in the beginning of the Emperour Galbaes life, doe declare a matter very strange, saying; that Liuis Druilla (who afterward was named Augusta, because she was married to Cæsar Augustus) going from Rome, to a place out of of the Citie; called Vicetana; she chanced to sit downe vnder a Lamell Tree, and very soone after, an Eagle flying ouer her head in the Ayre (through the branches of the Bay-tree) did let fall into her lap, a Hen as white as Snow, that carried a branch of greene Bayes fast in her Bill. Linia being somewhat amazed thereat, caused the Henne to bee well kept, and of it came many more beside; wherefore, the name of the Graundge where shee kept the Henne, was euer after called Gallina. She commaunded also, that the branch (found in the Hennes Bill) should be planted, which grew so faire, and prospered in such plenty; as it was wonderfull to behold, what aboundance of Trees came of that one Plant. So that, from that time forward, both Octavianus and his Successours, (in a kinde of Custome, or superstitious Religion) when they triumphed: would cut branches of those Baytrees, and beare them in their handes; but when the Triumphe was ended, they would plant them againe by those Trees, from whence they had beene cut, and they prospered as well as the other did. This History is (in this manner) related by these two credible Authors. Suetonius, whose authority is of great reputation, addeth yet another matter, whereat I doe not a little maruaile. He saith, that at such times as any Emperour dyed; the Plant of Laurell likewise withered, and all the branches cut from those boughs, which had bin planted at the time of his triumph. And when Nero died, who was the last of the Cesars Linage, all the Bay-trees dried vp and withered, that had grown cheerefully before, and came of that one branch, which the Hen brought in her beake, and had bin planted by Luia. Beside, all the thriuing store of the white Hennes brood, dyed, not one remaining, and in the Imperiall Pallace fell such Lightnings and Thunder: as smote off the heads of the Emperours statues, erected there in their remembrance, and the Scepter which Augustus Caesar helde in his hand, was also smitten downe to the ground. Continually they placed Crownes of Laurell vpon euery Cornish of the Emperours houses. Ouid, among many other things in his Metamorphosis, saith; That the Romaines reputed the Laurell, to bee a very sacred Tree, and would make no vse therof, about things that were vile, vn cleane; or prophane: but euer accounted it as a signe of peace, and therefore tearmed it the Peacefull Laurell. Pliny saith, that the Laurell hath a vertuous property against the Pestilence, & against all venemous Serpents. Ouid declareth, that the faire & chaste Nymph Daphne, was conuerted into this Tree, and in regard thereof, it was consecrated to Phæbus, who (among other vanities) was adored by the ancient Romaines as a God.

CHAP. VI.

Of the abhominable and most detested vice of Cruelty; How horrid it is to humane Nature: With many excellent examples depending on this Argument.

AMong all vicious pollutions, which are most repugnant, euen to common humanity, and make men to become abhominable; me thinks, that cruelty is the supream and Soueraign of all other. For, man is a most Noble Creature, made in the Image and similitude of God; yea, borne to exercise nothing but mildnesse: but being feruile to cruelty; he becommeth a brute Beast, terrible, furious, wicked, and an vtter enemy to God, who is the Prince of clemency, and would not haue one man to be bitter, or tyrannous to another. Aristotle saith, that fiercenesse, cruelty, and inhumanity, belongeth only to wild and furious beasts. Seneca, in his second Book of Clemency, termeth it Felony against the Soule, and from thence concludeth; that it is opposite and contrary to the vertue of Clemency. Cruelty is the greatest enemy to Iustice and reason, and is a more detestable sin then Pride or Anger. For it seemeth, that anger proceedeth from som conceiued displeasure, to behold any euill offered to another: but in a cruell disposition, there is found far other malevolent matter, because in smiles (and without any disdain, but only in meere mallice) mercilesse torments are inflicted on men; yea, euen to the depriuation of life. Therefore it is capitall enemy to Iustice, which honorably defendeth; and will permit no man to receiue any damage or harme; without some fault com-committed, and yet taketh order also, that offenders shal haue milde and temperate correction. Seneca, in his Booke of manners, saith; If we call them Hangmen, that vse no measure in the correction of vices: what then may wee tearme them, that cruelly oppresse and murder Innocents?

Examples of cruell men are infinite, among whom was Herod, King of the Jewes, who raigned at the time, as our Lord & Sauior Iesus Christ was born. For, after the slaughter of so many Innocents (purposely performed, in hope to haue slaine him among them, that came into the world for our Redemption) he would yet make further shew of his cruelty, not only while he liued, but euen at the instant of his death. And because he well perceined his end approaching, he called all the chiefe persons of Ierusalem, who being come before him: he caused them to be seazed on, and fast lockt vp in a place neere to himselfe, giuing strict charge to his Sister: that at the point of his Soules surrender, shee should see them euery one put to death; wherein she failed, in regard that God appointed the contrary. And what was his reason for his bloody intent? Onely this, as himselfe confessed a little before his death. He knew very wel, that al the people of Ierusalem would be very ioyful for his departure, because other matters had happened to the people, then they expected; and therefore (mooued onely by cruelty) to make this the saddest day that euer they endured, he concluded this bloody slaughter and horrible murder. The cruelties of Abimelech; the Son to great Gedeon, were as wonderfull, for, that himselfe might enjoy the Kingdome alone, he put to death threescore of his owne Bretheren: one onely escaping, named Ionathas, who fled (by the will of God) that the Traytour might liue in continuall suspition. Now, I know not whether this cruelty; or the other following, may be counted the greatest, acted by the same man, against the Sichimites, and in reuenge, because they had expulsed him out of their Citty. But he getting entrance againe by power, and in the night time: slew all that were therein, Men, Women, Children, great and small. And because some were fled into the Temples; hee caused them to bee round engirt with wood, & putting fire thereto; the heat and smoak was so great, that there they were all smothered. Then destroying the Citty, he caused the ground to bee ploughed, and gaue commaund, that it should be sown with Salt.

Very great also, was the cruelty of the Carthagenians, executed on Attillus Regulus, who being taken Prisoner by the, they sent him (vpon his owne word) to the Romaines, to worke the meanes of peace by the pernuptation of Prisoners and Captiues. But he, not regarding his owne life, but preferring the honour of his Country before all other respects: returned againe to Carthage, where (for conseruation of his faith) he willingly yeilded himselfe. They, in extremity of cruelty, made him vp fast in a Tun of wood, which was stuck thick with sharp pointed Nailes of Iron, not affording the least place, where any member of him might be free from torture: and so, rowling him vp and down their streetes, did put him to death in that miserable manner.

All Tyrants haue a custome, to be cruell by nature; but aboue all the rest, the execrable and bloody Tyrant Phalaris of Sicily, carrieth the chiefe place of eminence. He slew infinite men, without any offence committed against him, and (if it were well considered) he was much more cruell in affection, then in action. For he had a Bull of Brasse, which Perillus (a cunning workman) had made for him, wherein the party was enclosed, whom he would haue to bee put to death. Then kindling an hot Fire round about it, the voyce of the poore patient (suffering this torture within) seemed to the Tirant, as if it had bin the bellowing of a true Bull: And this he did; to the end, that the cries of an humane voyce, in such extremity, might not mooue him to the least iot of compassion. Yet one thing is much commended in him, that Perillus, the intenter and maker of this terrible punishment; was the first (by the Tirants command) that made prooffe thereof.

Nor can I well aduise my selfe, with what kinde of cruelty, to compare that of Tullia, daughter to Tarquine, king of Rome, who caused her father to be slaine; because she might inherit the kingdome; which himselfe had willingly giuen her;

she would but haue stayed a little longer. And that which is much more note worthy in her cruelty, was; that her father lying dead vpon the ground, & she being mounted in his Chariot; would needes ride ouer the dead body. And whereas the Horses that drew the Chariot, being fearefull at sight of the dead body, refused to goe on; as also the Coach man that guided them (moued with compassion of his murdered Master) would haue turned them another way, to the end, that the Kinges body might not be dismembred: yet took she pleasure in her cruell affection, & what the dumb beasts (in pittie) denied to do; she (in meere cruelty) would execute, compelling the Horses to obey hir wil, and trample vpon the body of her Father.

Extraordinary cruelty in a Daughter.

The horrible cruelty of the Scythians to liuing men.

The Scythians, a people very furious & valiant in warre, are likewise recorded, (by Historians) to be exceeding cruell: but among their other cruelties (which gaue much matter of maruaile) this one is especially remembred. They wold that their greatest beasts, as Horses & Bulls, and such men as they would haue to be tormented, must be bound fast within the opened bodies of the slaughtered Beasts, so that they could not possioly stirre any way. There would they giue them food to eate, that while they thus liued: the Flesh of the dead beastes might putrifie and stincke, and the Wormes issuing forth of the putrifaction, should feede on the liuing men, and they dye in this cruell torment.

The cruelty of Maximinus and Maxentius

We reade that Maximinus, Emperour of Rome, did as much, hauing deuised the most horrible cruelty, that euer entred into the heart of Man: hee caused liuing men to bee fast bound to the bodies of dead men, and left them in that manner; till the noysome smell of the dead had kild the liuing.

The cruelty of Alexander Phercus.

Virgill affirmeth the like of Maxentius. As strange horrid cruelties doe we read of, done by Alexander Phercus, who commaunded liuing men to bee buried, being bound face to face one against another. Others, he caused to bee cloathed in the skinnes of Beares, and other wilde beasts, and then threw them forth into the open fields, among Wolues and Mastiuies, that they might bee torne in peeces and deuoured of them.

I know not, whether the cruelty done by Astiages (King of the Medes) to Arpalus, or Harpagus (one of the cheefest and dearest Friendes of his Kingdome) may be reported; without amazement and dreadfull astonishment. This Astiages appointed a young Sonne of his owne to bee slaine (in regard of a troublesome dreame, concerning the said Child) and gaue the charge of this bloody execution to Harpagus. But he, moued to compassion, by the moanes and teares of the young Infant (which was afterward called Cyrus the Great) and standing in feare also of the Childs Mother, she being daughter to Astiages: would not kill the Infant, but with all care and diligence, tooke order for the safety and education therof. Long time after, Astiages was aduertised, that the Child was not dead, which smothering inwardly to himselfe, with a countenance declaring no discontentment: he closely practised, how he might repay the pittie of Harpagus, in breaking his commaund, and preserving the life of young Cyrus. Harpagus hauing a young Sonne, Astiages (by secret meanes) got possession of him, and hauing inuited Harpagus to dine with him the next day, among the other viands serued in at the Table; the Father fed vpon the flesh of his owne Childe, with exceeding appetite and good liking, because the Kings cruelty was vnknowne to him. Astiages not satisfied with the bloody deceipt, did another most cruell deede: for, among the fruites and delicates to finish this dinner, vpon severall plates and dishes; the head, feet, and hands of the Infant was set vpon the table, and presented so apparantly before the father, that he could not auoyde the knowledge of his wofull dinner.

Contention between Marius and Silla, to exceed each other in cruelty.

Betweene the two Warlicke Capitall Enemies to each other, were so many tyrannies exercised; as it seemed, they listned to nothing else, but contended which should exceede in the greatest Crueltie. Silla caused foure Legions of Souldiers to bee slaine in one day. Likewise the Frnestines, a people of Italy, that desired mercy of hiin, because they had receiued Marius into their safetie and keeping; they could get no release from his tyranny, but were all generally flaine, and their bodies throwne into the fieldes, to feede Vultures and Rauens. The like, on the other side, did Marius, that he might not come a jot behind his enemy in cruelty.

Could the World yeelde an equall to the Emperour Tiberius, the Successour of Octavius? Hee, after a feigned clemency, at the beginning of his raig, suffered no day to passe him, without shedding the blood of poor Innocents. Moreover, he deuised a kind of cruelty, the like whereof (in mine opinion) was neuer heard: For he prohibited (on pain of death) that no one should be so bold as to weepe, or make any shew of sorrow, for them whom he had innocently put to death. Truly, this was a verie strange cruelty, for I am of the minde, that there can be no greater paine, then that which hindereth an afflicted heart, from easing his ouer-weighty butthen of woe, by sighes and teares, the poorest remedy that oppression can haue. That which he afterward did to young Maides and Virgines, deserueth no repetition, but onely to his endlesse shame. For, before their death, he would haue them violated and defloured by Ruffians and Hang-men, to the ende, that (with death) they might lose their chiefest honour and palme of victory. And such was his delight in putting people to death, that when newes was brought him, that one (whom he had condemned to death) had slain himselfe; he cryed out, saying. Oh how could this Cornelius (for so was the condemned persons name) escape me? Hee should haue understood, I vse to torment patients in such sort before they dye, that death it selfe is the greatest grace I can doe them. There then liued not any man, but he was amazed at his variety of inuentions, whereby he tormented and put men to death. When he was disposed to see some men dye, he would haue them first to drinke excessively, and when they were able to drinke no more; then should their conduct passage, for Urine bee so striclie bound, that the least droppe of Urine could not be voyded, and in this mercilesse Agony must they be left, vntill they dyed with extremitie of anguish. Beside, onelic for his pleasure, men must bee throwne head-long from an high Rocke (named Capraria, neere Naples) into the Sea, and because he imagined, that (thus dying in the Water) was too easie a death: hee would haue armed men to stand beneath, to receiue the bound bodies on their Pikes and Harbardes, so to mangle and cut the in pieces, before they were thrown into the Sea.

After the death of this Tiberius, euen such a death as hee worthily deserued; Caius Caligula succeeded in the Empire, and in the violent affection of his Predecessours. He wished, that all the people in Rome had but one head; that (at one stroke) himselfe might smite it off. He thought himselfe vntfortunate, & complained of the felicitie in his time; because that (while he gouerned) there was no Famine, vniuersall Pestilence, Deluges, Ruines, and subuersions of Countries, for vnter desolation of the whole World together. A man was brought before him, that formerly had beene banished by Tiberius, of whom hee demanded; what he did all the time of his bannishment? The man made answer (in meere adulation) that he prayed to God, without intermission, for the death of Tiberius, & that his Maiessty might succede in the Empire. Which when Caligula heard, he remembered himselfe, how many thousands of men had bin banished, & thrust into exile by him, who (doubtlesse) might make the like Prayer for him: he forthwith gaue command, that they should be all repealed, and euery man of them put to death. Such as (by him) were sentenced to die, hee would haue the manner of their dying prolonged by little and little, and inflict (at first) but small woundes on them, that their paine might last the longer. For he vsed to say to his Tormentours; Deale with them so, that they may feele themselves die. He obserued also a saying of his predecessor: People wish me ill, because they fear me. After this Caligula, Nero succeeded in the gouernment, & in no lesse fiercenes and cruelty; because he was a Man, in whom (if possible it might be) all the others cruelties were enclosed, and all else that could (by Men) be imagined. For, without any regard of sanctified thinges, or persons (of like qualitie) priuat or publike: hee caused the Citie

of Rome to bee set on fire, with expresse prohibition not to quench it, or any man to make safety of his owne goods. So the fire continued seauen daies, and seauen nights, burning the Cittie; and hee being on a high Tower, some small distance off, clapped his hands, and ioyed to behold this dismall spectacle, so far exceeding all humanity. He slew his owne Mother, and put to death the Husbands of Octavia and Sabina, which Ladies he married, and soone after deprived them of life also. Indeed this man attained to the verie height of all cruelty, for he was the first that persecuted the Christians: and in his time was the first & verie greatest persecution of the Church. And wel did he declare, that hee surpassed all the other in wickednesse, and was the Prince of all furious brutality: for he would often repeate a Greeke Verse, to this effect. After my death, let heauen and earth confound themselves together. Or I could rather with (quoth he) that such a generall dissolution might happen in my daies. For I had rather deriue mine examples from barbarous people, then anie touch of our precedent Romain Emperors. But the successours to these men, who imitated them in all vilenesse: barres my further proceeding, because they were such in tyranny, as no where else are they to be fellowed. And therefore I will leaue the liues of Domitian, Vitellius, Commodus, Maximus, and such others: but the cruelties of Dioclesian against the Christians, and whereof Eusebius maketh declaration in his Ecclesiastical History, I cannot well let passe, without some breefe note, to the end, that Blasphemers and bad people now liuing, may see what the Christians endured in the Primitiue Church, because they would not denie the name of Christ.

This wicked Tyrant, caused men to be dragd thorow the streets, at the tayles of Horses, and their bodies being thus fore bruised and broken, they were sent backe to prison againe, where they had no other beds to repose on, but broken Potshards, and such like vn-easie matter, whereon they were sure to taste no rest. He would also cause the lofty branches of trees, to be gently haled downe without breaking; and then binding the limbes of Christians vnto them, command their sudden exaltation, that so their bodies might be rent and torne in peeces. In the City of Alexandria, he commanded many to be dismembred, their eares, noses, lippes, hands, and feete cut off, leauing only their eies, that they might beholde each others wofull extremitie. He caused sharpe splinters of wood to be made, and thrust into their naked bodies, betweene the flesh and bones, and likewise vnder the Nails of their Fingers and toes. Molten Lead and Brasse, in extremity of the greatest heat, he would haue throwne vpon their naked bodies, and into their Secrets: making Women also to haue burning Irons bound to their Breasts, and all violence else that could be deuised. By all which cruelties inflicted on their weak bodies, hee sent infinite constant soules to God, who made this Tyrant and his Tormenters, Instrumentes (thus) to aduance his glorie, and his seruants afflictions to shine more clearly. All these Cruelties are written by faithfull Authours; for, besides those recorded in Sacred Scripture, the rest are recited by Iosephus in his Antiquities of the Iewish Warres, by Suetonius Tranquillus, Pintarch, Titus Linius, Iustine, Valerius Maximus, Eusebius, Pan'us Orosius, Iulius Capitolinus, & others of no lesse authority.

CHAP. VII.

How that oftentimes wicked Kings and Tyrants are Gods Ministers, and yet neuerthelesse, they haue continually bad and euill endes, in open viewe of the world.

As haue beene, & yet are subiected to wicked Tyrants, ought to consider (for their consolation) that though they are oreawed by such oppressours, they are (notwithstanding) the Ministers of God. In many places of the Holy Scriptures, they are named the seruants of God, because (by them) God punisheth the wicked, & perfe'eth them that are good. The Hebrewes hauing beene gouerned by Iudges and Priests, Samuel growne into old yeares, and sinne and contempt of God encreasing among the people; Kings wer giuen giuen vnto them, and the people themselves required the chastisement which they worthily deserued, in asking a King to be giuen them. This King was Saule, a good man at his beginning; but afterward a cruell Tyrant: for he tooke from them their goodes and libertie, and although he was tainted with many wicked vices, yet we cannot deny, but that hee was called the Lords annointed, by meanes whereof, God kept them all in feare and terror.

Idolaters named Gods Ministers.

Esay. 13. 3.

But let vs set aside, both him & diuers others, who liued vnder the law of God, and knewe him; and come to Idolaters, who likewise are named by the holy scriptures, Ministers of God; for so saith the Lord by the mouth of Esay. Let the Captaines enter by the Port of Babylon, I haue commaunded my sanctified, and called the mightie to my wrath, to the end that they may glorifie themselves in my glory. The Prophet spake these words on the behalfe of King Cyrus, and King Darius. Behold, how he called the Medes and Persians his sanctified, who (neuerthelesse) were neither holy nor iust, but only executioners of the will of God, for the punnishment of Babylon. In another place, by Ezechiel he saith, I wil bring my seruant Nabuchodonosor, and because he hath serued me wel neer to Tyre, I wil giue him Egypt also. And yet for all this, these men were no Seruants of God, because they neither knew him, serued him, nor beleued in him: neuerthelesse, they were executioners of his Iustice, and (in this vnderstanding) were named his seruants.

Ezech. 26. 7.

Totila called the Flaile of God.

Tamberlaine named the wrath of God.

Cruell Totila, King of the Goths was named the threshing Flaile of God, and iustly reputed so to be. Great Tamberlaine, who liued in the time of our Grand fathers, a most powerfull and cruel Captain, subduing and vanquishing numberles Prouinces; when he was demaunded wherefore he was so cruell and inhumane to men by him vanquished, Answered in great holler; Thinke ye that I am any other then the wrath of God? Hence therefore may we wel conclude, that (very often) cruell and wicked men are Instruments, whereby God punisheth the sinfull, and approoueth the vertuous. And yet notwithstanding, he doth not thereby cleare these men from beeing wicked still, and worthy of greater chastisement, euen for these actions of theirs: Because Wicked men are said to be Gods instruments.

(according to our Saviours wordes) it is necessary that scandals should be, but wo be to them by whose occasion they come. Also, it is a case most certaine, that God neuer leauieth them vnpunished, euen in this world (beside perpetuall afflictions prepared for them in the world to come) and that by most straunge and cruell deaths, answerable to such, as they haue inflicted on others.

Phalaris, the Tyrant of Sicily, died miserably in the Brazen Bull, which hadde beene the death of many of his subjects, and made like Musicke then to himselfe, as he had taken delight to heare from others. Plutarch declareth, that Sylla was miserably eaten with Lice, and by no possible meanes could get any remedie. Beside, Pliny tels vs, that he did bite & tearing his flesh with his own teeth. Marius his Capitall enemy, and euerie way as cruell, inhumane, and wicked as hee, was brought into such desperate condition: that flying to hide himselfe, he was glad to yeilde into the handes of Pontius Thesselinus, and entreat him to cut off his head.

The Emperour Tiberius, was murdered by his owne people, being smothered to death with pillowes: and yet Suetonius affirmeth, that his death was wrought by poyson. Caigula hauing receiued 30 wounds by the handes of Chereus, Cornelius Sabinus, and many others sworne in the same Conspiracy, there ended his daies among them.

Cruell Nero, before he died, saw himselfe deprived of his Empire, & iudged a deadly enemy to Rome; by which means, beeing enforced to hide himselfe in hollow Vaults, which were wholly infected with humane excrements, he wold needs kill himselfe. But wanting power to execute his owne will, and calling others to helpe him in the action: three Villaines came and murdered him, mocking him extremely all the while, which they delayed so long as they could, for his greater torment, according as Suetonius reporteth.

Dioclesian likewise, hauing left the empire, died by poyson, which he had secretly prepared for himselfe: Domitian also died, hauing receiued seuen woundes by Stephanus, Saturnius, Maximus, and others. Tullia, of whom we spake before, that vsed her owne Father so cruellie, be-

Astiages, Grand-Father to Cyrus, whom he would haue murdered in his Infancie, by the aide of Harpagus, and whom he made to feede on the flesh of his owne Childe, was despoiled of his Kingdome by Cyrus, and died wretchedly. Herod likewise, and many other wicked Tyrants, of whom to speake, would aske a tedious relation, died all the like infamous deaths. Let such then, as now do command & bear sway in the world; shun crueltie, and embrace clemencie, that they may the better be loued of their subiects. For the verie greatest and surest safety of a King, consisteth in the amitie and affection of his people.

CHAP. VIII.

The strange fortune, which happened to the Sonne of Cræsus, King of Lydia, and likewise to the Sonne of another King. In regard wherof, it is discoursed whether speech bee a thing natural to man or no: and whether man only speaketh, & no creature else.

Herodotus and Aulus Gellius.

Herodotus writeth, a merue- lous accident happening to the sonne of Cræsus, K. of Lydia: and in the same manner, is it reported by Aulus Gellius. This Cræsus was a Rich King, and the same that was vanquished by Cyrus, as many good Historiogra- phers haue declared. During the time that this King liued prosperously in his Countrey, he had by one of his Lawful Wiues, a goodly Sonne, healthfull and compleate in all his parts and vnderstan- ding. The Child hauing attained con- uenient yeares, to forme speech, & make vse thereof, was (notwithstanding) by the meanes of some vnknowne string, or o- ther hinderance in the tongue, debarred from speaking for long time after. Yet grew he to good stature, and aptly dispo- sed to diuers enterprizes, which caused him to bee much pittied, & this restraint of his speech, made euerie one to repute him dumbe, albeit hee had good know- ledge, and heard verie perfectly, which is against the order of Nature, for neuer was any man knowne to bee Naturallie dumbe, but he was deafe likewise.

It fortuned, that Cræsus was vanqui- shed, and the City wherein hee was, ta- ken by the enemies, so that the forwarde Soldiers pressed on to the Pallace wher- in the King and his dumbe Sonne were hidden together. But being found by a Soldier, who had perfect knowledge of them both: and lifting vp his sword, with full intent to kill Cræsus: his Sonne was so affrighted at the bloody proffer, and pas- sion had such a powerful working in him that he stroue for speech extraordinarily. And pressing the extreame Dominion, which the soule hath of the body, imme- diately the corporall Organes yeilded to the strong determination of the will, and breaking the strings that had so long re- strained his liberty of speech, he spake out alowd, saying; Oh do not kil him, consider that hee is King Cræsus, and my father. When the Soldier heard these wordes, he with-held his stroke, and woulde not smite the King: so he escaped death, and from thence-forward his sonne continu- ed in perfect speaking, even as if hee had spoken all his life time till then. Surelie, this was a matter verie maruellous, and I cannot imagine, what naturall reason may be sufficiently giuen for it.

Aristotle saith, that men are born com- monly dumbe and deafe, because they are not formed with such disposition of these two apprehensions, neither in such perfection as is required. Afterwards, in further growing on, they dispose them selues, and sttue first of all, to begin with hearing; and after they haue heard (for many daies together) then they labour how to speake. Pliny saith also, hee that is borne and continueth deafe, is compeld likewise to bee dumbe. For, most cer- taine it is, that if a deafe man hearde, he would easily learne to speake, and speech is impossible to be taught him that is en- tirely deafe.

Aristotle also saith: It may well hap- pen, that a Childe may pronounce some words before ordinary time, and yet not- withstanding, he will begin to lose those words againe, vntill such time as Natures allowed houre (for Infants to speake) be come, and when (by her appointment) they commonly vse to speake. To this purpose, Pliny speaketh of this sonne to King Cræsus (whose History we haue in brieft briefe related) and saith; That at the age of five moneths, hee pronounced some words, which were reputed as Prognosticators of his Fathers ruine: and so it seemed, that such effect proceeded from that fore-telling, for he neuer spake afterwards, vntill the memorable accident which we haue already declared.

Another Historie of the like nature.

I call to minde another aduenture in the like case, recited by Hiliben Ragel, in his Iudiciare, wher he speaketh, as an eie-witnesse; and being present in a Kinges Court, who had a Son borne, that within foure and twenty houts after his birth, began to speake perfectly, and stirred his hands, wher at al the Beholders maruelled not a little, for with a strong voice, he deliuered these words; I am borne unhappily, because I come to fore-tel that the King my Father shal loose his Scepter, & that his Kingdome must be destroyed. At the ending of which words, the Childes life ended also. This accident (vndoubtedly) was verie dreadfull; and yet it seemeth to mee, rather as an Aduertisement sent from God, then any wonderfull woorke of Nature. Astrologers do tell vs, that the Child whose birth shal happen when Mercury is Lord of the Ascendent and Orientall; hee will speake much sooner then anie other, who speake not, but according vnto the ordinary course of Nature.

The strange wordes of a yong Infant.

The opinion of astrologers

I remember likewise another matter, conformable to the case now in hand, to wit; that some haue helde opinion, That speech is not a thing naturall to man; but is learned and gotten; as other Artes and Sciences are. Others hold directly, that our speaking Naturallly, is not a matter proper and peculiar to man only. The first, who are of the minde, that speech is not a thing naturall, do labour to prooue it, in saying: That that strength, which is naturally conuenient to one kind, should be, and is as meet to all of the same kind. As wee may perceiue by barking in all Dogges, by Lowing or bellowing in all Bulles; Oxen, &c. and so (in like case) to al other kinds of Beasts. And yet notwithstanding, wee behold in men, that some speake in one manner; and others quite contrary, so that they do not vnderstand themselves naturally; and therefore it seemeth, that speech proceedeth rather from Art, then Nature.

Whither speech be naturall to man, or no.

Speech not naturall, approved how.

Plin. Lib. 6.

Againe, according to Pliny, there are some people that speake not all, but their speaking appeareth to be rather a kinde or forme of bellowing, then anie settled speech; which neuer could so happen, if all men did speake by the gift of nature, for, if it were so, then all men wold speake in one and the same manner.

Now, as concerning the other opinion, in such as say, that speech is not perticularly proper to man, they ground their iudgement on the words of Lactantius Firmianus, who tels vs: That wee haue some parts, which seeme to vs, proper to men onely; and yet neuerthelesse, the verie same are found to bee in other Creatures; as diuersitie of voice in Birds, by the seuerall tunes wee heere discern in one another; whereby we plainly perceiue, that they do vnderstand each other, so that it can bee no otherwise, but as a meere forme of Language among them. Moreouer, they maintaine their argument vpon this ground, in that manie Parrats, Pies, Poppingayes, and such like Birds, are heard to speake plainly.

But the truth of this matter is (albeit their opinions haue some apparance of veritie) that speech is the gift of GOD only to man, not that he purchaseth it by Art: but is proper and peculiar to him, and not to any other creature. True it is, that other Creatures haue voice, and yet notwithstanding, they haue no Speech: and such is the opinion of Quintilian, & likewise of Aristotle.

In like manner, wee haue good answers to these contraty reasons: As, to the first Argument we may well answer, That a thing may be Natural vniuersally, but in perticular, it may be exercised according to the will. It is naturallie euill done, and he deserueth punishment for it, that killeth another man, or robbeth him of any of his goodes; and yet neuerthelesse, to inflict one kind of correction or other (vpon him) for the offence, proceedeth from the will of the Iudge. Therefore, although that men do speake diuers tongues, yet is it not to bee said, that this their speaking commeth from Nature. And so much the stronger is the Argument, that such diuersitie and confusion of tongues, was for the punishment of their pride, that laboured to builde the Tower of Babel: for, as we haue already said, there was then but one language in the world, which could be said to be naturall. And

The language of the Troglodytes.

Of Birds that speake, a Parrot that could speake all the Creed.

The diuersity of Voyces amongst all creatures.

Observations among beasts and birds.

Man onely hath the benefit of speaking.

And as for the Troglodytes, who are are said not to speake at all, it is reputed, that this infirmity proceedeth, by reason that their tongue is ouermuch barbarous and imperfect, and they feele nothing, as it were, of humanity; and yet notwithstanding, it is a kind of Language among them, whereby they seeme to vnderstand one another. And whereas it is further said, that there be diuers Birds that speake, as the Parrat, whereof Lodouicus Caluus maketh mention, that belonged to Cardinall Ascanius, which Parrat (in his presence) pronounced (word by worde) all the Creed in Latine, without fayling in any one fillable: We may lawfully answer, that this is no speaking, for they knowe not what they say; but it is a certaine custom taught them for many daies together, whereby to forme such a voyce; but a true worde is conceyued in the soule, before it is pronounced, whereof Birdes haue no such Capacitie.

And to that Argument, which implyeth, that wee knowe all creatures by the diuersitie of their Voyces, that they vnderstand each other, and call one another amongst themselves: wee may not heereby inferre, that such a Voyce is a word formed. For as Aristotle saith, the Voyce looseth it selfe, and so can wee, (without any formed word) signifie and giue to be vnderstoode, either ioy or discontent, and all vniuersall passions: as wee see by the Voice, when it thus expresseth it selfe in laughter, & with pleasure, or by sighes and laments, in deepe sorrow and anguish.

And for the respect of brute beastes, that haue difference either in their song or voice, and may be knowne when they are displeased or contented: and the like in Birds, either by motion of their winges, loftie flying, or some such other sign according to the effect: these are matters not incident to the case in question. For to speake and vtter wordes, whereby may peticularly be expressed, profit, necessitie, harme, Mallice, Iustice, Iniustice, honestie, goodnesse, and whereby also passed actions are deliuered, and for-sight of them to come, by solide reasons and words, in declaring themselves, and other things are done, answerable to the benefit ensuing by speech: this is a blessing bestowed onely vpon man, euen as Hereditarie to him by Nature, & whereof no other Creature whatsoever, can any way be saide to stand in neede, or is so meete to merrite so gracious a benefite.

Of a Woman that was married manie times, And of a Man that had manie Wiues, and hapned at length, to ioyne in marriage with that woman.

Haue many times noted that the honor of Widowes, vnder-went common and publicke taxation, if they had beene married three or foure times. Now, albeit it seemeth exteriorly, that men had good reason for this detection; yer notwithstanding, no man ought to iudge of another bodies secret Conscience.

30

Marriage, was first instituted in Paradise, and is allowed by the Church to be Sacred and Lawful; in which respect no man should or ought vse any reprehension against it. And yet wee must not denie, but that a Chast life, without subiection to marriage, is the more perfect estate, and is to bee elected: as the better. Neuerthelesse, the bounty of heauen diminisheth no iot of eithers goodnes; but both estates are godly and commendable. If then a Widdow do marie, she offendeth not God therein; and besides, as concerning the World, it may very well be answered, that it is the smallest fault she can commit. And because I would no way be mistaken by the Reader, I will produce (vnto this purpose) what I haue read concerning a Widdow, and it is recorded by Saint Hierome: of whose Authority (I thinke) no one will make scruple, in regard of his Religion and great holinesse.

40

He saith, that in the time of Damasus, he both saw and knew in Rome a woman, that had lawfully beene married to two and twenty seuerall men, and remaining a Widdowe, after the decease of the two and twentieth Husbände: there was a man came thither, that likewise hadde beene bin married to twenty Wiues, and was then a Widdower of the last, and both of them at freedome and libertie: which being vnderstood to either, no difference in their degrees, but both of equal mean condition: they contracted Marriage together, which was a thing verie notable, and raised a generall desire in the people of Rome, to see which of this strange married couple should first die.

It fortun'd that the Woman first deceased, to whose obsequies, al the Roman people mainly flocked, to congratulate the Husbands happineffe, as beeing victorious in no simple Conquest: setting a Crowne of Lawrell vpon his heade, and placing him first in following the bodye of his Wife, bearing a branch of Palme in his hand, in signe of his victorie, and numberlesse people accompanying him in his triumph.

A Victorie of no mean moment.

Another History reported by S. Ierom

The same holy Father, recounteth another matter very notable, which he setteth downe for truth, because it was deliuered to him by such as deserued credit. The case concerneth a woman also, who to shewe her selfe some-what charitable, tooke a young Boy from verie poore parents, that had no releef but fro the Hospitall, intending to nourish the childe as if it were hir owne, feeding it at hir owne Table, and nightly lodging it in her bed. When the child had attained to x. yeares of age, the woman grew to be so incontinent, that she would needs haue carnall knowledge of the Ladde, and that in such manner, as at the terme of sixe moneths, she became quicke with Childe by him, contrary to the rule and order of nature, which neuer doth permit any such conception at ten yeares of age. But, it rather seemeth that this happened by the permission of God, to the end, that such turpitude and dishonesty in a Woman, (vailed vnder pretence of charity) should be apparantly discovered to the worlde. So that, although the other woman had married three and twenty severall times, yet are not we to iudge or conceite, that therein she sinned. For, I am perswaded, that in being so oftentimes lawfully married, in publicke confirmation of the Church, and without any iust cause of contradiction: she did much better then this other lustfull lewd Woman, in committing such a foule and inordinat sinne; for which, no colour or excuse can anie

CHAP. X.

10 The strange fortune which happened to two Princes of Castile.

HE power of sodain conceite, or immediate apprehension of some inward dislike, is knowne to bee of such strong impressio; that it is able to be the death of man, or Woman, and vnto this purpose tendeth our present discourse. Don Alphonso, eleuenth of that name, who was Father to Don Peter, hauing finished his raigne in Castile, left his Sonne Don Peter, a verie young King: In which regard, the kingdom was gouerned by two Princes of the Countrey (who were Vnckles to the King, the one named Don Peter; and the other Don Iohn) and likewise by Queene Mary, that was his Grand-mother.

Sudden conceit is very powerfull on the life of man.

Don Peter, and Don Iohn, Vnckles to the young King.

In the yeare one thousand three hundred and sixteen, these two Princes, who were Vnckle and Nephew, hauing manie times (like valiant and worthy men) made warre vpon the Moores, for exaltation of the Christian Faith, and returned with famous Victories, as well approued and vndauntable Captaines: concluded together to make Warre on the kingdom of Granado, with purposed spoyles & damages on the Countreyes belonging to the Moores; hauing ioyned with the Alcantaro and Galitrua, Great Maisters of Saint James in Galicia, and the Arch-bishop of Toledo.

Warre made vpon the Kingdome of Granado against the Moores.

The businesse being growne to full effect, and great numbers both of horse and foot assembled, they began to inuade the Country, and sped so well in the aduenture: that (with very successfull fortune) they came before Granado, where they fought valiantly, and surprized diuers Castels, among which, was that named Eliara.

When fitting time for retirement came, they returned backe againe by the Christians Countrey, and marching in good order, order; Don Peter was in the Vant-garde, and the Lord Don John in the Rereward, when he was suddenly charged by a huge multitude of Moores, that had assembled themselves from all parts, and their assault was so furious, as he was constrained to send to Don Peter, to leaue his leading, & to come to his assistance in the Arriere. Don Peter verie gladly yeelded thereto, and marching back with admirable courage: founde his men to bee so daunted and weakened with dismay, as by no meanes possible, could he cause them to returne with him. By meanes whereof, he entered into such a sudden alteration and conceiued displeasure, that albeit he contended woorthily to essay a fresh march vppon the enemy, inciting both his horse and foot thereto, and by no reason could preuaile; hee drew forth his sword, and smote some, thereby to terrifie the rest, and that terror might make them become obedient. But all prouing in vaine, his trouble in minde was so excessiue, that perceiuing he could no way helpe his Vnkle, he was no longer able to manage his sworde, but speech presently forsooke him, & vnderstanding likewise, so that he fell downe from his horse dead to the ground, without either stirring or speaking one word.

Don Peter, and Don John, were sharply assaulted by the Moores, in their returning backe.

This wofull accident, was (by some) too speedily reported vnto Prince John, who fought manfully against the Moores, and had (in a manner) quite vanquished them. When he vnderstood the occasion of his Nephews sudden death; as suddenly likewise entred he into an extreame passion, and gaue outward testimonie of such a violent inward alteration, that he fell also from his horse, losing the strength and vigor of all his members, and neuer after could vtter one word, so that he was taken vp by his people, and kept (in that strange maner) from midday to the Evening. In which time, the Moores being ignorant of these seuerall mishaps, were put to flight by the Christians: who marching onward in forme of battaile, at the instant, as the body of Don Peter was laid vppon an horse, Prince John gaue vp his latest gaspe. These accidents were verie remarkeable, and the like very seldome heard of: whereby plainly appeareth, that sudden conceit may cause the death of a man.

CHAP. XI.

¶ The strange and variable complexions of two Phylosophers: the one of them weeping, and the other laughing, at the gouernment & condition of the world.

IN the recitall made by Diogenes Laertius, concerning the liues & diuersity of Phylosophers: he speaketh particularly of two; the one being named Heraclitus, and the other Democritus, because each of them was in Nature and Complexion verie strange.

Heraclitus obserued (as a common Custome) that alwayes as hee walked along the streetes and publicke passages, hee would weepe and shedde abundance of teares, in regard of the compassion hee had on humane Nature. For, hee was absolutely perswaded, that all our life time, consisted in nothing but miserie, & that all the trauailes, labours, and endeauiers of men, seemed worthy both of pittie and compassion, both in their paines and afflictions, as also for the sins by the daily committed. This is much better, and more amply described, in a letter sent by this Phylosopher to King Darius, according as our fore-named Diogenes Laertius reporteth, and in these very words.

All men that walke vpon the earth, are verie farre off from Iustice: for they serue Auarice and Vaine-glory, with too much affection and losse of time. As for my selfe, I neuer thought any euill thing; and to the end that I might shunne the paine, which I feele by beholding and knowing these things: I haue euermore bene desirous, that I might containe my selfe in some such place, where I might neuer looke on men; because I can sufficiently content my selfe with that which is onely necessary for me. We read of this Phylosopher, that (in all things) he was conformable to this perswasion. For he liued the very greatest part of his time in solitude, and in the fields, contenting himselfe with hearbs and food of slender substance. All the while he was yong, he said he knew nothing; and when hee attained to greater growth, he saide, hee knew all things, and that nothing els had bin beene his enſtructor, but contemplation onely.

The Complexion of Democritus was no leſſe ſtrange then this mans . For, although he would leaue his lodging, and frequent mens companies, yet would he laugh immeaſurably at al the actions and behauiours of men, tearing the life of man to bee vanity and folly, and that all appetites and deſires, were fooliſh, true ſubiectſ to ſuch Maſters, and meere matter of laughter. And ſuch was the imagination of this Phyloſopher, that it was only enough for him, to go laughing along the ſtreets, as the other went weeping: and conſidering the paines and trauals of men, it ſeemeth that ech of them had reaſon ſufficient to do as they did.

Seneca in his Booke of the Tranquility of life, ſpeaketh of theſe two Philoſophers, approving rather the Opinion of laughing Democritus, and aduiſing to imitate his merrie humour, rather then that of weeping Heraclitus. And it appeareth, that Iuuenal was of the ſame mind, when ſpeaking of them both, hee ſayeth, That he was amazed, whence and how Heraclitus could receive ſo great quantitie of moiſture, as ſatisfied his liberall expence of teares. And to ſpeake truly of both theſe follies (for I hold theſe two complexionſ to be no otherwiſe) that of Democritus is allowed for the better, becauſe wee read that he was a man taking no diſlike at any thing whatſoever, and liued an 109. yeares. I find of him, that he uſed verie often to feed on Hony, and beeing on a time, demanded whither it were good to preferue the health of man, or no, he answered; Theſe are only fitteſt for mans Health, Hony taken inwardly, and Oyle outwardly, giuing thereby to vnderſtand, that Hony was good for feeding, and Oyle for anointing.

Laertius reporteth many thinges of him, whereby is evidently diſcerned, how great his knowledge was in naturall thinges. He ſaith, that one day among others, a meſſe of milke was brought him, & after he had looked on the Milke, he ſaide; This Milke is of a Goat that hath had young ones, & this is the firſt time of her Kidding, and indeed it was ſo. Another time, hee met a yong maid vpon the way, and with doing reuerence to hir, he ſaid; God bleſſe ye Maid. Meeting her againe on the next day following, he made no reuerence to hir, but ſaid; Farewell Woman. Such as had heard theſe ſeueral ſalutations, greatly meruailed thereat, and gathered thereby, that ſhee had companied that Night with a man, which Democritus knewe to be true, onely by the Womans countenance. Tertullian likewiſe telleth vs, that this Democritus did put out both his eies, becauſe he would not bee temptred with carnall concupiſcences, which ordinarily are occaſioned by the ſight of weomen. But Aulus Gellius ſaith, that he did it only the better to addict himſelfe to the contemplation of naturall thinges, for which, this Phyloſopher was very highly commended by the learned.

Cicero writeth the like of him, ſo doth Pliny, and many others. Pliny reporteth in diuers places, that hee was a great Aſtrogger, and a Magitian, and that to learne al the Arts, and practiſe them among the ſkilfull; he traualled through all Aſia, Arabia, Egypt, and many other Prouinces. And Solinus maketh mention of his Diſputations againſt Magitians. Concerning mine owne opinion of this man, I will conclude further ſpeech of him, with a matter inenailous, and not to be omitted, to wit; that by the means of naturall light only, he ſought for and beleued the immortality of the ſoule, and the reſurrection of all the dead, in which contentiption, and many other of like quality, he ſpent the length of life before remembred.

But as for Heraclitus, by his wretched Complexion, and feeding on nothing but heards, and ſuch like Viands, which continually kept him hungrie: Hee dyed conſumingly, and full of Cowtineſſe, being wrapt in an Oxe-hide, wherein hee had put himſelfe, in hope to bee cured. And ſome do ſay, that being thus hidden in an Oxe-hide; hee was deuoured by Dogges, that knew him not to be a man. Neuertheleſſe, he wrote Books of great Learning, but ſo difficult and obſcure, as few attained truly to vnderſtande them: which is a fault wherein many great perſons haue ſinned, only thorow preſumption and arrogancy.

CHAP. XII.

Of some perticuler notable occasions, which haue happened in one and the same manner, and rather in one place more then in another.

Hose things whereof wee haue spoken in our precedent Chapter, may vvell cause great meruaile in the consideration of men, whose Conditions and Opinions haue beene so extreamey estranged from one another; that the verie same thing, which hath made one man to weepe incessantly, hath caused another to Laugh without any intermission. It is likewise a matter well woorthy of Contemplation, to obserue, that in such rarietie of humane occasions: and amongst so many of diuers difference, som are found that do seeme as if they were meerly constrained, and that it ought vpon necessity, that (in some places) aduentures shold perticulerly happen, as we shall discern by our ensuing discourse.

First of all, it was a matter very admirable (as wee haue already saide) concerning the Cittie of Constantinople, to witte; That the first Emperour which builded it, and made his abiding there, should bee named Constantine, and his Mother Helena. In like manner afterwarde, that the last Emperour there raigning, and during whose time the Cittie was lost, shoulde bee called Constantine, and his Mother also named Helena.

It deserueth likewise due consideration, that there should be two such most Valiaunt men, as were Hercules & Sampson, and that both of them began their great deedes of Armes, with each mans encountering of a Lyon, and both of them deceyued and vndoone by Women, euen as if the one were obliged to the others Fortune. It is yet a matter more notable, that in Arabia, sur-named Happie, Cham the Sonne of Noah, and his Successours, should forsake the A-doration of the true GOD, to vndergo the Idolatrie of Men. And that in the same Prouince also, after so great and long reuolutions of yeares, shoulde bee bred and borne Mahomet, the persecuter of the true Faith and Doctrine giuen by our Saujour Iesus Christ, God and Man.

10 The Cittie of Carthage, a most powerfull Common-Wealth, had so manie seuerall forces in Armes, that no King or Captaine could resist against it. And yet notwithstanding, it was two seuerall times vanquished by two Romaine Captaines, both bearing one name, and called Scipios; so that it seemed, in that verie name consisted the power of Conquest.

20 It is likewise verie remarkeable, in the Historie of the Bishops of Rome, that al the Popes which bare the name of Alexander, were all Anti-popes, and that (in their times) grew the Scismes in the Church, as in the time of Alexander the second, third, fift, sixt, &c. Another meruailous matter was noted in Spaine, that commonly all the Kings which were named Ferdinands or Alphonsus, were very good and excellent Kinges. 30 Caesar and Pompey were two Captains of Rome, very famous and most puissant, great enemies and competitors one against another: yet it happened, that they both died on their very Birth-dayes, yea violent kindes of death, and by weapons. As worthy warriors likewise were Hannibal of Carthage, King Phillip, Father to Alexander, King Antigonus, Father to Demetrius, Sertorius the Romaine, Viriatus the Spaniard, and 40 in our time, Fredericke Duke of Urbine, and diuers others beside, resembling one another in behauour and Regiment of Warre; but in one thing, they were all truly equal, to wit, they halted euery one vpon one and the same leg, and each man lost his left eye by misfortune. The Emperour Charles the fift, was borne on the day of S. Mathias the Apostle, on which day also (in course of his life) vvas King 50 Fraunces taken by him in battaile, and the victory likewise woonne at Biccoque: Hee was also elected and Crowned Emperour on the same day, and many other great Fortunes befell him still vpon that day.

Yet I cannot choose but reprove such men, as in their woorkes and especiall actions, actions, do obserue perticular dayes and names, wherein to beginne or vnder take their purposed businesse: neuerthelesse, seeing that such things haue formerly bin considered and read of, I make the lesse account of their humour. It hath bene noted, that not onely the French, but some others Nations beside, do holde diuerse dayes to be vnfortunate, and that no respect in the world whatsoever, can cause them then to vnder take any fight or combat, because vpon those daies) commonly some great mis-fortunes haue befallen them. And yet they esteeme some other dayes, to haue a kinde of happinesse attending on them, because that on them no losse or euill mischaunce hath happened to them. All these things may wel vrge amazement, in regard that the causes are vnknowne to vs, albeit neuer so good a rule or reason may therto induce vs: such secrets are onely knowne to God, and such hath bene, and is his appointment. Of Accidents that haue hapned, and actions of notable successe (ensuing by one and the same meanes) both vnto the Romains and Gracians, Plutarch hath Written a Treatise called his Parallele, wherein hee alledgeth manie excellent examples, which the curious Searchers of Nouelties, may there reade more at large.

CHAP. XIII.

That diuers men haue bene so really alike, both in shape and countenance, that they haue many times taken one for another.

A wonderfull secret in Nature.

Ccasion doth heere free lie offer it selfe, to make mention of some perticular persons, that haue (in figure & gesture) bene alike and semblable each to other. And indeed, it is one of the greatest secrets and wonders in Nature, to behold such an infinit number of men, the varietie of their gestures, and all hauing one kind of forme: yet notwithstanding, it seemeth a matter of much more meruaile; when (in such a variable multitude) scarcely but two men can be culd out; that do truly resemble in all parts each other. Of which two severall matters, wee will relate the causes natural, after we haue first produced example of some, that haue held true and perfect resemblance vnto apparant Iudgement.

10 First of all then, we will speake of one named Arthemius, who lived in the court of Antiochus King of Syria, being (according to Pliny and Solinus) but of meane condition; albeit Valerius Maximus affirmeth, that hee was Kinsman vnto the King, and resembled him so truelie, that the Queen (hauing murthered Antiochus) concealed her Wicked Act by the meanes of this Arthemius, whom she had acquainted with hir purpose diuerse dayes before. Arthemius, was laide in the Kings bed, as if he had bene the Queens sickly Husband, for so shee then called him, and so was he reputed to bee, being visited by all the Princes of the kingdom, euen as if it had bene the King himselfe. Thus vnder shew and supposition of the King, hee made a Will, and named (as heire to the Kingdom) such an one as the Queene had determined: wherein hee was obeyed, for euerie one tooke him to be the true King indeed, which was a verie straunge and admirable deceipt. But (to this purpose) the aduenture of Queen Semiramis is much more notorious, of whom so many commendable Authors haue Written memorable actions: Iustine, and diuers others say, that hir sonne Ninus resembled her so perfectly, both in speech, gesture, and disposition of body, that after the death of the King her husband, shee cloathed her selfe in the habite of a man, and representing the person of her Sonne, held and gouerned the kingdom for the space of forty yeares; with absolute beleefe generally, that shee was her sonne Ninus, whom she so neere resembled, that in this maner was the State abused. In the time of Pompey, there were two men in Rome, the one named Biblius, and the other Publicius, who wer both so like to Pompey, as if there had bin no other difference, then in the plain figure, it was very difficult (as Pliny reporteth) to know which of them was Pompey or no, and euerie man supposed, that this resemblance cam from the father to the son by succession. In the time of Pompeyes father, there was in Rome a Cooke, called Menogenes, that so lively resembled him, as (for that very cause) the people imposed the name of the one vpon the other; and this is assured for trueth, both by Pliny and Solinus.

Two infant Slaues broght to Rome. and bought of Turannius by
ny*.

There was one likewise, named Turannius, that brought two Infant Slaues to Rome, of equality in age, and they both (in gesture and all other thinges) were of such resemblance, that people went to see them as a matter of meruell. Turannius also saide, That they were Twin-brethren by birth, but it was false; for the one was of Asia, and the other of Allemaigne. In regard of their so neere likeness to each other, Marke Anthony, Cozen vnto the great Octavius, bought them. But after hee had intelligence of the Deceite, and that they were not Naturall borne-Brethren: hee sent for the feller of them, and tolde him, that hee must restore the monie backe (which was a great summe) because hee had beguiled him, in making him beleue, that the Slaues were Twin-borne Brethren. But Turannius (very cunningly) auoyded repayment of the Money, in replying, that (in this respect) hee ought to haue a farre greater summe paide him; considering, that it was a matter of more meruaile, that the two Infants (being borne in diuers Nations) shoulde haue such a perfect resemblance, as if they had bene borne vpon one selfe-same day, and of one Mother. Which defence, was well accepted by Marke Anthony, the reason appearing to be sound and good; and therefore he held himselfe well contented.

A pleasant accident happning to the Emperour
Octavius.

Concerning this case of so meere resemblance, a matter of pretty merriment happened vnto the Emperour Octavius. There chanced a young Ladde to come and dwell in Rome, who had the feature of his face and bodie; so absolute in likeness vnto the Emperour Octavius, that no man in Rome could discern anie difference. This being brought vnto the Emperours knowledge, hee forthwith sent for the youth, and then the portrait of each other was more apparantly discovered. Which when the Emperour hadde well noted, hee being a man verie affable, pleasantly disposed, and moued (with the least occasion) to mirth, he saide to the young man, Tell me Brother; did thy Mother use at anie time to come to Rome? As inferring thereby, that then his Father might haue knowledge of hir. The youth perceiuing the facetious and pleasant humour of the Emperour, replied to him in as merrie a Disposition, with these Wordes: My LORDE, concerning my Mother, shee neuer came vnto Rome, but my Father resorted hither many times.

A witty and merry answer made to the Emperour.

Pliny writeth of a man, named Surras, Pro-Consull to Sylla, and borne in Sicily, to whom, there was a Fisherman of verie neere likeness, both in speeche and behauiour, for they both stammered in equall manner, and fashioned all their actions in one forme: so that when they were cloathed alike, it was impossible to make any distinction, neither could anie man dire stly say, this is the Pro-consull, and this the Fisherman; which was no meane meruell to the people. And yet Albertus Magnus, in his booke of beasts, declareth a much stranger matter. Hee saith, that he both knewe and behelde in Allemaigne, two Infant Twinnes, who resembled each other so truly, that when they were seperated assunder, the one could not bee discerned from the other. Moreouer, beside their iesture and actions, they had such a conformitie in all things els, as the one could not liue without the other. So that when they were sometimes for triall sundered, they indured verie straunge Agonies. They spake both alike in sounde of voice, and when the one was sicke, so was the other likewise: whereby plainly appeared, that they were two bodies formed of one Nature and complexion. For my iudgement in this case, I say, that this likeness must needs proceed, that they were both begotten in one instant, of one and the same matter strongly disposed: by reason whereof, all parts were equally and perfectly conditioned. S. Augustine, in his Booke of the Cittie of GOD, reporteth the verie like Story. And although these thinges doth seeme verie maruellous, yet may we not scornfully seeke to discredite them, in regard of Natures powerfull working, and vndoubted Authority of such as confirm them. For, we could speake of matters more lately happening, yea, euen in our times; as of the Lord Count Iohn Giron, who so absolutely resembled his brother, the Great Maister of Calatryana, that was flaine by the Moores, that by their owne parents rents and houſholde ſeruants, they were equally taken the one for the other. I remember that I haue read in the Hiſtorie of the Dukés of Millaine, that Fraunces Sforza (of whom ſomwhat hath bin ſaide already) had among his warlike troops, a Gentleman belonging to the company of his Light-horſe-men, that was of ſuch perfect reſemblance vnto the Duke himſelfe; as he was verie often both taken for him, and called by the name of Duke. I could alledge many other examples, which I am forced to forbear, becauſe I would not willingly offend anie Reader: wherefore, I will ſpeake of the occaſion of ſuch ueere reſemblance, wherof I find three principall, that (according to their degrees and places) ſhall ſpeak for themſelues.

The firſt is, that nature euermore traileth and ſtriueth, to make the beſt Workemanſhip that poſſibly ſhee can; and this reaſon is helde by all Naturall Phyloſophers. Hence it proceedeth, that ſhe eſſayeth to make the Male childe; rather then the female, and to faſhion him more like the Father, then the Mother; in imitation of the Painter, that portraieth one thing (according to Nature) by another. Now, if Nature be noted ſometime to faile heerein, wholly, or in part, it is alwaies by defect and debilitie in the matter: For, when a man hath not ſufficient perfection in him to procreat, then is he ſaid to forme a female childe. Likewise, concerning the geſture and figure, when that Vertue which makes the form (which the Phyloſophers call the Vertue informatiue) is moſt ſtrong and powerfull in the partes of man: the childe doth then more reſemble the Father, then the Mother. But when (in this Vertue) there happeneth ſome indifpoſition and defaillance in ſtrength, and that the Vertue and power of the Woman prooueth to be the ſtronger, the Child doth then reſemble the Mother. There are ſome other cauſes beſide, whereof wee ſhall ſpeake heereafter; and principally (in this caſe) the good or euill diſpoſition in the matter of the parties generatiue, is much auailable:

In the firſt place, it behooueth, that the Woman ſhould be as the partie patient or ſuffering, and the man as the Agent which maketh the worke, becauſe that (according to the diſpoſition) nature buſieth hir ſelfe in the ſimilitude, and frameth not only the vertue of the Paternall or Maternall party, in the likenesse of geſture, and of the members: but likewise in the complexion, diſpoſition, ſtrength, and (beſide) in ſome paſſions, diſeaſes, & other things. As wee may and do manie times obſerue, that the Sonnes of Balde-headed men, doe likewise become balde theſelues, & deaf mens ſons, are deaf alſo

Very often (in like manner) as Galen affirmeth, the Sonnes do become heires to their diſeaſes, as to the Gout, the dropſy, Palfie, falling ſicknes, &c. Auicen addeth Leproſie, Tiſicke, and Melancholy alſo. And that which is yet much more admirable, Nature, in mee deceiuing hir ſelf, doth giue ſometimes to Children, ſuch hurts and woundes, as their fathers haue formerly receiud; which is plainly to declare, that ſhe continually laboureth to make true likenes. Columella maintaineth the ſame argument, and ſo doth Pliny the yonger likewise, in an Epiſtle which hee wrote; where ſpeaking of the wife to Cornelius, he ſaith; That ſhe died of the gout, which was the diſeaſe of hir father, & of all his linage. This Author further ſaith, that infirmities diſcend from the father to the ſon, and oftentimes from children to children: as it hapned to Nicerus the the Poet, borne in Conſtantinople, of who Pliny writeth, that his Father & Mother being white, yet he was borne blacke, becauſe that his Grandfather (by the mothers ſide) was black. Theſe accidents we daily behold by prooffe, in horſes & other creatures, that doe reſemble their Sires moſt of al, not only in colour, but alſo in greatnes and diſpoſition. This is the reaſon of Ariſtotele, and of Empedocles, as alſo of Albertus Magnus. In this maner is formed the variety of geſtures in men, the diſpoſition and ſhape of their members, according to them of father and mother, euen then in the generatiue action.

The ſecond reaſon, is likewise deriued from Ariſtotele and Plinie, and they ſay, That it is the imagination of the Father, euen in the inſtant, and likewise the preſent affection or paſſion then workeing in the ſoule. For, ſight, or preſent imagination, is greatly auayling in this caſe, and is a moſt ſtrong occaſion, being ioyned to the former; becauſe the Father or the mother then thinking on ſom beauty, it is a great ocaſio of begetting a beautiful childe, Childe, and forming it answerable to the imaginéd subiect. And because it many times hapneth, that Fathers haue diuers imaginations; they do likewise engender diuersitie and difference of gestures, so that the Infant will resemble diuers persons. And this matter is reputed of such importance, that Empedocles saith, Some Women haue bene noted, that they haue conceiued, and bene deliuered of Children, that haue resembled Statues, Figures, and Pictures, that hung in the chambers, at the time of their conception. That this hath hapned in Beastes, is sufficiently probable in the History of Iacob, who layed the pilled rods (being White and Blacke) in those places where the flockes conceyued, by meanes whereof, partie coloured Lambes were also engendered. And it is further to bee obserued, that not onely this imagination hath power on the Corporall Members; but likewise on the Soules of Children. In regarde whereof, Naturall Phylosophers haue aduised, that when a man is angry, or Melancholy, or Drunke, he shoulde not companie with his Wife: Because (commonly) Children are of the same Complexion, wherein the Father was, at the generatiue action. And yet, it hath oftentimes come to passe, that a merrie-hearted Father, and deliberate of Nature, hath gotten a Melancholly Childe.

To this purpose, Alexander Aphrodisiens declareth a verie notable thing; that (manie times) Bastard Children, begotten in Adulterie, are wicked and vicious, in regard of the bad imagination, and fearefull terrour, wherein their Fathers were at the time of their begetting. From the verie same reason, may an answeré be framed to the case following. For, if it bee demanded, whence cometh it, that among men onely, there is so great diuersitie in figure? Aristotle replyeth, it is, because that Beastes haue no Cares, Thoughtes, or Imaginations, but onely in their present Action: whereas (on the contrarie) men haue their thoughts in many places, and on diuersitie of thinges; whereby ensueth, that manie children are borne, which neither resemble the father or mother.

Aristotle giueth (almost) the same answeré vnto the Question propounded: Wherefore are foolish Children begotten by Wise Fathers? Hee saith, That men which know little (as wee haue formerly spoken of Beastes) are very intentiue in the generatiue acte: by meanes whereof, the matter being disposed, and without any alteration, children are then borne perfect, because nature (in the verie same instant) was busied about no other occasions. But in wise and learned men, it doth not alwayes so fall out: because they (commonly) hauing their spirits more subtile and penetratiue, haue also their thoughts otherwise busied most part of the time, which is a great hindrance, when the power is not wholly imployed in the action. From whence it proceedeth, that the matter being not perfectly disposed; Nature coulde not perfectly perourme her Workmanship.

The third reason, rendered for answeré to this doubt, is from Astrologye caused by influence of the Stars, according vnto the opinion deliuered by Ptolomie. For, by the disposition of heauen, and the signe or image ascendant, & the Aspects which the Planets haue, both in the Conception and Birth of man: the manners and Naturall disposition are infused, rendering themselves semblable or different to the Father, according to the proportion and conformitie of the Father, or of the Childe, at the time of Generation. Wee might heere rehearse the Influences of these Planets, by their feuerall proprieties; but it would require too long a time: Besides, Ptolomie hath spoken thereof sufficiently; so hath Iulius Firmicus, Haly ben Rasel, Guy, Benatus, and others: And the reason is so strong, as it cannot bee denied; Considering and perceyuing the influxion and power, which the Superiour Bodies haue ouer the Inferiour, with their Effects.

Now, in regard that this ensueth by motion or agitation, which is the cause of generation and corruption, and is that which first disposeth the matter, and afterwarde formeth it: it followeth, that as the motion of time dooth neuer cease, and that there are diuers times, and diuers Motions. And besides (as vee haue already sayde, that they haue diuers Natures; euen so, the matter disposeth it selfe diuersly: and causeth variable actions and dispositions in the creatures, some-sometimes resembling one another, according to the conformity that was in Heaven, and in the one time, and in the other. Likewise, sometimes these causes and occasions are occurrent all together. Sometimes, one; or two: And (very often) the one proueth contrary to the other; from whence ensueth such diuers effectes, which daily offer themselves to our view. By the very same occasions, wee may easily discern, whence it cometh, that goodly Children are begotten by deformed and vgly Fathers, and likewise the contrary: wherein there can nothing else be alleadged, but the good or bad disposition of the matter, and the imagination of the parties agent and sufferant, with the Celestiall influence at the instant, all which we haue deliuered to be doubtfull, according as other things are of the like nature.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a very strange and memorable fortune, which happened in one kinde, though at sundry times, to two Knights of Rome.

He chiefe men in the conspiracy for the death of Iulius Caesar (according as Plutarch and others haue declared) were Brutus and Cassius, who afterward (with their Adherents) were profecuted, and proclaimed open Enemies to the people of Rome, by Octavius, Lepidus, and Marke Antonie, that had gotten possession of the City. Among the complices of Brutus and Cassius, Marcus Varro was a principall man, who (beeing present in the battaile, which Octavius and Marke Antonie had against the conspiratours, and when Octavius was the Conquerour) for safegard of his life, and escape of apprehension, chaunged his habite with a poore Souldier, and appearing as one of the common Prisoners, was rancked among them, and sold (in confused manner) as the rest were. It was his happe to be bought by a Romaine Knight, named Barbulas, who (within some while after) seeing his faire demeanor, and honett carriage of life; began to suspect, that he was a Romaine borne; alben, he coniectured the same by no other relation. To be resolved in this doubt, he tooke him (one daie) aside, and instantly entreated him, to tell him of whence, and what he was, promising him wishall, to pursue his pardon to Octavius and Marke Antonie. But Marcus Varro, dissembling still his aduerse fortune, by no meanes would disclose himselfe: so that Barbulas altered his former opinion; and perswaded himselfe, that he was no Roman, according as his iudgement had before imagined. Soone after, Octavius and Marke Anthony returned to Rome, and Barbulas also with his Slave, who (perhaps) was a better man then himselfe.

It fortun'd afterward, that Marcus Varro being at the Senate-doore, attending for his Maister, that stayed within vpon some vrgent busines: was known by a Romaine, that presently aduertised Barbulas thereof. Barbulas, not seeming to know any such matter, and vsing no further speech thereof; so labored with Octavius (who gouerned then in Rome) that he obtained his pardon, by meanes whereof, Varro enioyed his liberty, and being brought to Octavius, hee was honourable entertained, and thenceforward respected in the number of his friends.

Within a while after, Octavius and Marke Anthony fell at discord and variance, & Barbulas taking part with Marke Antonie (who was vanquished in the triall of fight) grew to bee doubtfull of Octavius, and made his recourse to the same remedy, as formerly Marcus Varro was forced to vndergoe, by changing his habite, and feigning himselfe to bee another. Marcus Varro not knowing him, by some length of time since last he saw him; but especially by the poerry of his habite; bought him in like manner as himselfe had been. But coming afterward to knowledge of him, he wrought so with Octavius, that his offence was pardoned, and hee set at libertie. So that, in satisfiing what he stood bound to doe, and repaying the kindnesse which he had formerly receiued: hee left a liuely example to vs, of the inconstancy of our liues best condition, with a rule and enstruction to all men, CHAP. XV.

The Ages of Man seuerally distinguished, according the enstructions of Astrologers.

Y common deuision of Astrologers, Arabians, Chaldeans, Greekes, and Latines, and particularly by Proclus, a Greek Authour, Ptolome and Haly ben Razell; the life time of man is diuided into seauen Ages, ouer each one of which Ages, one of the seauen Planets is said to rule and gouerne. The first Age is called Infancy, containing the space of foure yeares, during which time, the neereft Planet to the Earth hath Dominion, that is the Moone, because the qualities of Infancy hath vrged men to say; that the influence of this Planet is wholelie conformable to this Age, wherein the body is humide, tender, weake, moueable, and altogether like vnto the Moone. For the very least matter causeth alteration, his members (by the smallest Trauaile) is weakned, and the body (in little time) encreaseth, euen plainely to bee discerned by the eye. These thinges doe happen generally in all persons, by reason of the Moones gouernment, neuerthelesse, more in some then in others, and not equally alike; in regard, that other particular qualities, which hold no subsistence of the Moone, doe receiue their originall, in manner as the Childe commeth into the World, according to the estate and disposition of other Planets.

The second Age continueth tenne yeares, vntill he attaine to the yeares of foureteene: this Age is called by the Latines Pueritia, or Child-hood, which giueth a cessation to Infancy, and proceedeth on toward adoloscencie. In this Age raigneth another Planet, named Mercury, seated in the second Heauen. This is a Celestiall body, apt and easie to change, being good with the good, and bad by the aspect of euill. During this time, nature composeth it selfe, according to the quality of this Planet. For then doe young Children declare some principles, whereby to make relation of their Spirits: bee it in reading, writing, or singing, then are they docible and tractable, and yet notwithstanding, light in their speeches, inconstant and mutable.

The third Age, consisteth of eyght yeares, being named by our Auncients Adoloscencie, or Youth-hood, and it lasteth from foureteene, till two and twenty yeares be fully compleate: during which time, the third Planet, called Venus ruleth. For a man then beginneth to be prompt by Nature, powerfull, and able for procreation: as enclining to loue, to Women, and addicted to Musicke, sports, pleasures, bankets, and other worldly delights. This is to be vnderstood, of naturall prouocations in Man to any of these; for, hauing lost the benefit of his own free will and election, hee leaueth or taketh such inclinations by influences. And yet wee are to know, that neither the force of the Planets, nor power of the Starres, hath priuiledge on the liberty of the Soule; although they incline the sensitive appetite, the members and Organs in the body of man.

The fourth Age paceth on, vntill a Man haue accomplished two and fortie yeares, & is rearmed young man-hood, the course whereof continueth nineteene yeares; and hath Sol the Sunne for Gouernour and Commaunder, which is in the fourth Heauen, called by most ancient Astrologians, the fountaine of light, the principall eye of the whole World, King of the Planets, and hart of the wide vniuerse. In like manner, this Age is Prince of all other, and the floure of life, during which time, the faculties and powers of the body & of the Spirit, doe acquire and attaine to their strength, and man beeing then apprehensiuie, bold, and hardy; knoweth how to order and dispose of his owne affaires. He then desireth and purchaseth Treasures, he coueteth to be excellent, and well famed, and is still enclined enclined to well doing. Briefely, in all thinges generall, he delaréth apparantly, that the Sunne raigneþ oæc him.

The fift Age, named Mature Manhood, hath (according to the said Authours) fifteene yeares of continuance, and therefore makes his Prograce so farre as six and fifty yeares, being subiect to the Planet Mars, which (of it selfe) is euill, dangerous, and hot, enclining men to Auarice; and making them cholericke, sickly; yet temperate in eating and drinking, and constant in their actions.

Afterward, in adding twelue to fiftie sixe, you shall make vp sixty eight yeares; which reach to the end of the sixt Age, and is called Old Age, whereof Jupiter is the great Gouvernour. This is a Noble Planet, the signifier of Equity, Religion, Piety, Temperance, and Chastitie; prouoking men to finish al pains and hazzards, and seeke quiet-repose. In this time, men addict themselues to holy works, affecting Temperance and Charitie; desiring honour, accompanied with due praise; they are honest, fearefull of shame, disgrace, and reproach.

The seauenth and last of these seuen Ages, is limited from sixty eight yeares, so farre as fourescore and eight, and few there are that attaine thereto. It giueth a true and apt name to it selfe, being called, weake, declining, and decrepitate Age, in regard whereof, Saturn commaundeth ouer it, as the most tardy, and yet the very highest Planet, and which enuironeth all the other before named. His Complexion is cold, dry, and melancholly, wearisome, and troublesome. By this meanes, he cloatheth aged men with solitude, choller, meagerness, disdain, and anger. He enfebleth their memory and their strength, then doth he ouercharge their bodies with griefes, long sadnesse, languishing diseases, endless thoughts, and with an earnest desire to enterprise secret & concealed matters; and, which is more, they will be alwaies Maisters; Superiours; and wholly obeyed. If any man chance to goe beyond this Age, which is more admired, then noted in many; you shall euidently perceiue, that hee will returne to his first condition of infancy againe, and haue a part of the Moone to bee his Gouvernour, which was his first Planet (as I haue already declared) in his first Age of all. In regard whereof, they are then vsuallie dealt withall, euen as we doe to young Infants, according to their conditions and daily inclinations.

The deuision of these seuerall Ages; in manner as formerly hath beene discoursed, was the inuention of Astrologers, whereto euery man may giue credit, as himselfe best pleaseth. Let vs now come to the deuision made by Philosophers, Phisitions, and Poets, who were of diuers opinions: yet because in this Argument there are some notable things, we wil enter into some part of their report, that young Spirits may exercise themselues a little. The great Philosopher Pythagoras, how long soeuer the life of man was; made but foure partes thereof, comparing it to the foure seasons or quarters of the yeare. He said, Infancy is the Spring-time, when al things are in their floure, beginning to encrease and augment themselues. Youth-hood, he compared to Summer, by the Ardour and strength that men haue in that Age. Manly Age is Autumne, because (in this time) a man hath experience, is ripe and apt for good counsell, with certaine knowledge of all thinges. Old Age he figured in winter, being a fruitlesse time, cumbersome, and hauing no benefit of any blessings, but what haue proceeded from the former seasons.

Marcus Varro, a learned man among the Romaines, deuided the life of man into fise partes, attributing the space of fifteene yeares to each one of them. The first fifteene he named Pueritia, Childhood, as being but an entrance into further growing. The second was Adolescentia, the springall or stripling estate of a youth, which hee tearmed the encreasing time, for then the body goeth on by encreasing. The third fifteene yeares, mounting vp to forty fise yeares, he called Iuuentus, as comming of the Latine word Iuare, to signifie the time of helping; because men doe then serue as helpers to their Countrey, eyther in warlike occasions, or other affaires fit for the Common-wealth, and this Age is held for the stability or firmnesse of life.

life. After forty five, euen to threescore, the Age of man is called Maturitas, maturity, full of ripenesse, because (in Latine) such men are named Seniores, that is to say; Ancient men, or graue aged men, in respect of the precedent conditions. Also, in these times men doe begin to decline, and walke on toward Old Age, which accomplisheth the last fiftene yeares, after threescore, and containeth the rest of mans life time. Behold how Varro deuided the life of man, according as Censorinus hath declared.

Senectus.

Hippocrat. in Lib. de Diet. Nat. And his deuision.

Hippocrates the Philosopher, he deuided it also into seauen Ages, the two first seauens, rising to foureteene; The third, ascending from foureteene, to eight and twenty. The seauens that make vp the fourth and fift, doe rise to forty two: The sixt, from forty two, to fifty sixe; And the rest of mans life, he attributeth to the seauenth Age. Solon the Philosopher, as the same Censorinus relateth, brought these seauen parts into sixe, deuiding the third, the sixt and the seauenth in the midst, so that each of the sixe parts should last seuen yeares; And the like description is made by the other Philosophers. But Isidore hath distinguished it into sixe Ages, agreeing in the two first with Hippocrates, making euery one seauen; naming the first Infancy; the second childhood. Afterward, from foureteene to eight and twenty, he tearmeth Adolescentie, or the encreasing age. From twenty eight, to forty, he nameth it Iuuentus, or the helping time, which is the 4. in order. The fift, which he calleth declination, or the beginning of Olde age he maketh to consist of 20. yeares, and amount (in all) to sixty. The remainder of life, he attributeth to Olde Age, and nameth it the sixt Age.

The deuision made by Solon

Isidor. lib. 11. de Etimol. And his deuision.

Horace in Art. Poet. And his deuision.

Horace, the excellent Poet, hath likewise made deuision of mans Ages; but it is into foure partes onely, according as Pythagoras did, to wit; Child-hood, Youth-hood, Man-hood, and Old age: all which he hath elegantly described in his Art of Poesie, with those conditions belonging to men, in all those seuerall times. Neuerthelesse, according to the rule of naturall Philosophy, the life time of man should not be deuided, but into three Ages: The first, the encreasing Age; The second, the continuing Age, or, while a man remaineth in one estate; And the third, the Age of Diminution: For, according to Aristotle, All thinges that doe procreate or engender, haue augmentation, retention of Essence, and diminution: so, in like manner, three Ages ought to be assigned to Man. The Phisitions of Arabia haue beene of the same opinion, and yet notwithstanding, Auicenne, a very learned man, distinguisheth our life into foure Ages, or principall partes. The first, which lasteth thirty yeares, hee calleth Adolescentie, because, during this time, all things go on by encreasing. The second, from thirty, so farre as forty five, he calleth the stayed and setled Age, or of beauty and comelinesse; for at this time, a man is in his best perfection. From thence onward, and so farre as to threescore yeares; he tearmeth, secret diminution; and the way to Old Age. The rest that a man liueth afterward, as being his fourth and last estate; he nameth it, clearly discovered Old-Age, or falling, and downe-stooping Age. Now, notwithstanding this opinion of his, it is to be noted, that albeit he haue made this principall deuision: yet hee forgetteth not, to deuide the first of these foure (which containeth thirtie yeares) and maketh three parts thereof. Whereby wee may well say, that hee consenteth with such, as deuided it into sixe.

Now, after wee haue considered all these variable opinions, I cannot tell to which I should betake my selfe, as being the truest; and to speake vprightly, no man knoweth how to give an assured rule, or any certaine ayme; as well in regard of the diuers complexions & dispositions of men, as also their dwelling in sundry Landes and Prouinces, and their nourishing by good or bad foods; by meanes whereof, men arriue sooner or later at the state of Old Age. For which cause, Galen would haue no man to give any limited times to our ages: which being well considered, it maketh all these discordances of so many Authors, need no matter of strange maruaile, considering that each man had a seuerall consideration. According as Seruius Tullius, King of Rome had, who (according to Aulus Gellius) had had no respect but to common benefit, when he deuided the people of Rome into five estates. And yet he distinguished the life of men, but into three parts, calling the first age (which he assigned to be seauenteene yeares) Childhood. From that estate to forty sixe; he declared them to bee men, able for the Warres, and so caused them to be set downe in writing. Lastly, from forty sixe onward; he called them, ripe and mellow men, fit for graue imployment and counsell.

This deuision doth not contrary any of the other, because it is vniuersall, and includeth the meanest particulars in it, and it seemeth, that he grew conformable to the common deuisions, when it was vsually obserued, to separate (in diuers kinds) the Greene Age, Ripe-age, and Old-age. The Greene-age, from the time of our birth, euen to the ending of our youth, which goerh so farre as forty five yeares, little more, or little lesse; according as Virgill saith, Viridisque iuuentus, that is to say; Greenyouth. The Ripe and Mellow Age, proceedeth on to threescore yeares, which time was attributed by Seruius Tullius, to men of Wisedome, meete for graue counsels and consultations. The rest is tearmed to be decrepitate Old-age. These three parts, may likewise be deuided into other proportions; and (by that meanes) be answerable to the varietie, which appeareth to haue beene (by diuersitie of coniecture) among so many good Writers.

CHAP. XVI.

That there be certaine yeares in the life of Man, which our Ancients haue iudged to be more dangerous, then any other; And for what cause.

Ancient Philosophers & Astrologers haue obserued, that there are certaine yeares in our course of life, of much more perill and danger, then others be; which they named Climactericall, by reason of the Greeke word Clima, that is to say; a Ladder or forme of degrees, signifying thereby, that such yeares are limited, in the fashion of degrees or steps, but hard to passe, during the race of this mortall life. For, like as they maintaine in daies, that the seauenth, ninth, and fourteenth, are dangerous during mens sicknesses and infirmities: In like case, they haue especiall respect, that such a numberd limitation, taketh place also in the course and yeares of our fraile life; in regard of the members strength, whereof great account hath beene made by Pythagoras, Themistius, Boetius, Auerroes, and many others: Also, in regard of the influences and domination of euill Planets; as I may alleadge of Saturne, who reigneth in diuersity of seasons, and sundry Ages. Whereby they gather iudicially (according as Marsilius Ficinus, Censorinus, & Aulus Gellius doe testifie) that all the Septenary yeares, or those comprised of seauens; doe portend great alterations, changes; & impossible (as it were) that such tearmes can bee passed, without mighty hazzard, alteration of life, estate, health, or complexion. Vpon this occasion, the yeare seauenth, fourteenth, twenty one, twenty eight, thirty five, forty two, forty nine, and so for euery seauenth yeare, is to bee feared.

And because they defend the number Tenarie, or of three, to be likewise of great efficacy; they say, that three times seauen (which maketh one and twenty) is of maine imporrance. The like speech doe they make of the yeare forty nine, because it is composed of seauen times seuen. But the yeare (most of all other) to be feared, is that of sixty three. For, like as the number of one and twenty; ariseth out of three times seauen: so, likewise the number of sixty three, begetteth it selfe of three times one and twenty, or of nine times seauen, or of seauen times nine; which compleateth the number celebrated & recommended by the very wisest. When a man therefore commeth to the age, of entring into the year threescore and three; he ought to be carefull of his health and life, waiting (daie by day) for some change therein, or whatsoever else may happen vnto him, according ording as Julius Firmicus affirmeth in his Books of Astrology.

To this purpose, Aulus Gellius maketh mention of the Emperor Octavius his Letter, whereby he signified to his Nephew Cassius (having escaped this yeare of so much danger) how carefull he ought to be of the yeare sixty foure, because he had preuented the yeare sixty three; so that he declared a good intention, to celebrate his second Natiuity. For these reasons, our Elders made doubt of this yeare threescore and three, perceiuing many worthy men to die, euen at the arriuall thereof: for in the same yeare dyed Aristotle, and diuers other notable personages. And, as I haue formerly said, the number of nine was also feared, because they said, that he which escaped the yeare sixetic three, could not passe the boundes of fourescore and one; in regard that this age was composed of nine times nine: at which age died diuine Plato, the great Geographer Eratoſthenes, Zenocrates, the Platonicall Prince of the auncient Academie, Diogenes the Cinick, and other famous persons.

Gentlemen, I was willing to make some obseruation of these matters, more for curiositie and exercise, then for any credence giuen to them: albeit they are not viterly impertinent, nor voide of naturall reason. For, as wee may behold, that some sicknesses and humours doe end in a man, and, that in other Creatures, the change of teeth, encrease of Beard, the voyce augmenting, and nature worketh other effectes and notable changings, on such complexions as are knowne by the tearmes of yeares: wherefore should not wee credite, that (by the same meanes) limited times doe make other alterations and impressions? Why should we not beleue, that our humane body hath communication with the Celestiall influences, as with humours; by some especiall meanes, which is hidden from vs? Because, man is subiect to the will and gouernment of God. And God, although he hath formed all things miraculously, and super-naturally: yet notwithstanding, he will haue his works to be naturall; onely such excepted, as were created by him against the Lawes of Nature, and according to his owne secret and inscrutable iudgement.

That Orpheus, Homer, Pythagoras, Plato, and other of the auncient Philosophers and Poets, did read the Books of Moyſes, and haue taken many particuler points out of them.

It is not to bee found, that any man (before Moyſes) hath left any thing written; except it were Abraham and Enoch, whose learning, Moyſes (as their lawfull Inheritor) hath comprehended in his Bookes, adding thereunto, those things which he heard from the mouth of the liuing God, by Oracles daily received from him. At such time as Pythagoras and Plato learned the Sciences in Aegypt; they would (first of all) study the Doctrine of Moyſes, whose name (in those times) was in great admiration through all Aegypt, & out of his Bookes they conceiued the reason of God; to wit, of the first cause. After whom, Numenius the Pythagorian, wrote down in his Bookes, many things concerning Moyſaicall Doctrine, as Basile the great witnesseth; and the same Numenius saith, that Plato was no other then Moyſes, speaking in the Greeke Language. Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, doe both say, that the Gentiles received their very greatest Mysteries from the Iewes, wrapping & enfolding them in their Fables. That of Deucalion, was taken from the Historie of the Deluge: The fixation of Phaeton, from the retrogradation and going back of the Sunne, which was in the time of Ezechias.

A Mysticall signification, concerning the body of Eliseus, and of the dead man raised to life in the Prophets Graue.

It is written in the second Booke of the Kinges, and the thirteenth Chapter, that as they were burying a Man, they espyed the Souldiours of the Moabites: wherefore, they threw the dead man into the Graue of Eliseus, and the man beeing downe, and hauing touched the bones of Eliseus, he reuiued, and stood vppon his feete. This History containeth in it, the figure of our Lord Iesus Christ, and vnder the superficies thereof, is hidden a very great Mysterie. Dead Eliseus, is mysticallie vnderstood to be Iesus Christ, who died for vs; and the Souldiers or Theeues of Moab, doe represent wicked Spirits, and the finnes of the world.

The Men that espyed the Moabites, and threwe the dead bodie into the Graue of Eliseus; doe signifie the Apostles, who provided for the peoples sauing health, against the mallice of wicked Demons, and against the burthen of finnes: and therefore plunged mankinde (being dead) into the Sepulcher of Christ, that is to say, into the Water of Baptisme, because the Water of Baptisme is Christes Graue or Sepulcher, wherein wee are sanctified three times in the name of the blessed Trinitie, in regard that Iesus Christ continued three dayes and nights in the Sepulcher. Whereupon, Saint Paule saide to the Romaines: We are buried with him in his death by Baptisme. Concerning the dead man, that hauing touched the bones of Eliseus, reuiued, and rose vpon his feete: read but the same Apostle, in his second Chapter to the Colossians, and there you shall finde him perfectlie described.

beheld (in a Dream) a very great Image or statue, the glory whereof was high, and it had a terrible regard. His head was of fine Gold; his Breast and armes of Siluer, his belley and Thighes of Brasse; his Legges of Iron; and his Feete were partly of Iron, and partlie of Earth. He saw afterward, that a little stone (came of it selfe) out of a Mountaine, and descended from such an height; as by the very blow of his fall, the Image was broken in all parts, and beaten into Powder. Daniell Interpreted this statue, and gaue the signification thereof in the Kinges presence, as is contained in the second Chapter of his Booke: but heere it is more amply interpreted, and in a larger manner.

The signification of the Image, which Nabuchodonosor saw in his Dreame.

The Image or Statue, denoted the Monarchies of the World; the head of Gold was the Kingdome of the Assyrians; the Breast and Armes of Siluer, the Empire of the Persians; the Belly & Thighes of Brasse, the Monarchy of the Grecians; the rest remaining (consisting of Iron and Earth) the State and Dominion of the Romaines. The stone is Iesus Christ, who descending from the Celestiall Mountaine, hath humbled al these Kingdoms, & brought them to nothing. By this it appeareth, that we are in the last age, and that smal time of passing hence remaineth: because, this world must be ouerthrowne and ruined, all the Kingdomes hauing already passed, and all Prophecies fullie accomplished. All which, if we were not able to coniecture; yet might wee easily comprehend by good reasons.

Good reasons to perswade that we liue in the latest age.

In the first place, wee cannot deny, but that vertue is at her chiefeft height, and all Vices at their pitch of extremity. In the second place, who euer beheld Diuinity and Learning more exalted, then it is at this day? Philosophy, Musicke, Armes, Caruing, Painting, and Eloquence more common, then now they are? very children neuer grew so soone to be perfect. We daily behold, that men do not now reach to the yeares of an hundred, or if they do, it is very sildome; as in former times they did. And we may perceiue withal, that at the age of 18. yeares, a young Springall shewes himselfe of as good shape, and prouided of as able strength; as a young man at the age of thirty in elder daies. I cannot deliuer any reason, why men doe liue in this World so short a while; except it be thorough their bad gouernment, and that dissolutions and vices are the maine cause thereof: or rather, that God being willing to hasten the end of the World, would haue all these predictions, to be as warning pieces of his neere approach. We can deliuer another Allegory, or Exposition of King Nabuchodonosors Dreame. The Statue or Image, is this World, wherein we are Inhabitants, and where the more part of Mortall Men, are called Rich, Noble, and Mighty, vnder which Titles, we comprise the head of Gold. The cleare shining Siluer, and of very good sound; is the Learning of Men, tearmed wise, religious, and vertuous. By the Brazen part, wee vnderstand inuented Artes, by which ensue the benefits of life and maintenance. As for the feete of Earth and Iron, wee may well admit them to be our bad actions, the very best whereof, will scarce allow any boasting: because they are full of filthinesse, soyled with hatreds, enmities, and rancours, that (too soone) get possession of our harts. Our stupidity and vnaptnesse to good workes, and our iniquity of life, which is all made of Earth; both gouerneth and supporteth this huge masse, this vaine corruption, despoiled of all this, euen by it selfe, by this ouer-burdening and loading it selfe. But our Lord will descend from Heauen, the little Stone, euen that (I say) which became so great; and at his second comming, he shal cast downe to the ground, all humaine Estates, and shall iudge (in the last day) the Gold, the Siluer, and all the rest of the actions of our life.

thousand yeares, to wit; two thousand without the Law; two thousand with the Law; and another two thousand after the first comming of the Sonne of God. This was not the Prophecie of Helie the Thesbite, but rather the inuention of another Helie, a Rabbe of the Iewes, vpon the Talmud; in the tract Sanedrin; Chapter Helec; in the tract of Idolatry; Chapter Digne; and in the Tract of the Sabbath. The coniectures of whom, are reported by Rabbi Isaac, vpon the first Chapter of Genesis, the principall whereof are these that follow.

The first Versicle of Genesis, containeth the Summary of the workes of God, expressing six times the Letter N. Now, Aleph signifieth a thousand. Moreouer, God perfected the World in six daies, the seauenth hee ceased from his works, and sanctified the Sabbath: And, a thousand yeares are with God, euen as yesterday which is past, so saith the Psaimist. Finally, the six first Fathers, Adam, Seth, Enos, Caynam, Malaleel, Jared, are dead; the seauenth, to wit; Enoch, was transported aliue vp into Heauen. After six thousand yeares then, during which time, trauailes, and death will be in their vigour: shal begin the seauenth thousand of repose, and of the life immortall.

Nicholas de Cusa, a very wise Cardinall, gaue many other coniectures of the last times, which I wil relate here at large. If wee desire (saith he) to haue knowledge of the time (how little foener it be) concerning the ending of the world, and the last daies: wee haue iust cause then to meditate on the trauailes, which our Sauior Iesus Christ endured in this World. For, as himselfe hath taught vs, if we will liue as Christians; we ought to follow, and learne of him. Learne of me (saith he) for I am humble & meeke of heart. In like manner, himselfe hath giuen vs example; to doe as hee did, if wee desire to bee his followers. Moreouer, hee assureth vs, that all the faithfull are his members, when hee saith; that which is done to the least of his, hee reputerh it as done to himselfe. The Church then is his mysticall body, and shee, in her totall perigrination in this World; imitateth her head Iesus Christ, who opened Heauen by his as-

20 cension. He hath gone before, as her rule and example; his Church followeth after, as his Image and resemblance. Moyses behelde the truth, in the flaming Mountaine Sinay, by vision of the verity, and after the Vision was vanished, hee did according to the example which he had seene. Iesus Christ entred into this World; in the forme of a young Infant, hee increased in age and Wisedome, became a man, enstru- 30 cting the truth, and walking in it; vntill such time, as (to bee a Testimonie thereof) he was taken from this world, by the mallice of the Iewes, who made him to suffer death vpon the Crosse. Neuerthelesse, hee hath left his seeede, which is his Church, in whom he abideth, as Adam in Eue, his Wife formed of his Flesh, and brought forth of his side: to the ende, that his Spouse, the Church (full of his Seede) should after- 40 ward be nourished in the House of his heauenly Father, by her glorious assumption vp into Heauen. The Church was regenerated from hir Infancy, euen like an Infant; shee hath increased in yeares and diuine wisedome, and (by little and little) she shall accomplish and finish the time of her Trauailes in this World.

50 Now, if we would haue a liuely example, we may say by coniecture, that the time which Iesus Christ liued vpon the Earth; is represented and declared by his Militant Church. We know, that hee is called the Sonne of Man, and the Lord of the Sabbath. Likewise, in him was accomplished, that which was prophesied by Esay, to wit; The yeare of the Lord, which yeare of the Lorde, is the yeare of Iubilie and freedome. (For Iobell in Hebrew, is as much to say, as the fiftith yeare, at which time of Iubily in Israell, euery seller might (by right) recouer againe the things which he had sold, without restoring the price receiued.) All this time is reuolued by the septenary number, to wit; from seauen dayes, from seauen yeares, and from seauen times seauen yeares, which are fortie nine yeares. After which, the fiftith yeare following this laborious reuolution, is the yeare Iubilie, free and full of liberty, in which all seruitude ceasing, liberty returneth freely againe. And it is to Christ his entrance into this world.

The Church the Spouse of Christ.

The yeare of Iubilie.

This Parenthesis is not set downe in Nicholas de Cusa.

be noted, that fifty yeares of common account by the Catholique Church, do make one yeare of Iubily of the Lord our God. And the Church, who (as his owne Image) followeth her Lord and Patrone; doth both demonstrate and explicate by the number of fiftie, onely one of the yeares of Iubily of her Spouse. So that, the reuolution of one yeare of the Lord, made in peregrination of his Church, is answerable to one sunny reuolution of Iesus Christ, the true Sun of righteousnesse. By which reasons, wee make coniecture, that the Church cannot trauaile in this World, aboue fifty Iubilies, which are 2500. wherof already we haue had 29. * which are past; considering, that since the ascension of our Sauour, euen to this present, 1452. yeares haue runne their course. This is the allotted space, and very greatest continuance of the Church, after her Bridegroom, wherof there is much to be abridged.

Now if we will consider further, the things which our Lord & Sauour hath done, and those which he suffered after the twenty ninth yeare of his age, vntill the day that he arose, triumphing ouer Sin, Death, and Hell, and then, if wee extend those yeares into Iubilies: wee may (by coniectures) foretell what shal happen to the Church. So that, in the foure and thirtith Iubily, after the resurrection of the Redeemer of al mankind; she may well hope (by the goodnesse of God) to be raised vp into the glorie, to the ruine of Antichrist. And this is thought, that it will happen, after the birth of our Lord Iesus Christ into the World, 1700. and before the yeare 1734. And as in the time of Noah, the consummation of sin came by the Deluge, the 34. Iubily after the first Adam, according as wise Philo the Iew hath written: we may also fore-tell by coniectures, that in the 34. Iubily after the second Adam, both sin and the World shall be consumed by the fire of the holy spirit. And then shall the Church be transferred out of this corruptible world, into the glory of the liuing, by the comming of her Spouse to Iudgement. And yet the houre of this second comming will be vncertaine, for come he will, & when least doubt is made of him; like as a Thiefe commeth in the night, and as the deluge came vpon the earth. Philo the Iew declareth, that Moy-ses (at the houre of his death) desired God to reueale vnto him; how much of the time was passed, and how much (as then) remained: whereto God answered, that two had already passed, & two wer as yet to come. And so Moy-ses being full of vnderstanding, yeilded vp his Soule. Heerein then (saith he) God reuealed four times to Moy-ses, two past, and two to come: of which, from Adam to the Deluge or Floud, passed the first time. The second, after the floud, vntil Moy-ses. The third, from Moy-ses to Iesus Christ. And the fourth, from Iesus Christ, to the end and consummation of the world. Now, the last time took beginning at the Resurrection of the Son of God, and continueth to the ending of the world, vpon which good reason, the Saints (oftentimes) called them the latter daies, and the ends of the world.

Now, notwithstanding that these supputations of yeares are very diuers, according to the truth of the Iewes, according to the 70. Greeke Interpreters, as also according to Iosephus & Philo: I am of the minde (neuerthelesse) it is much more true, that there hath passed so many Iubilies from the death of Moy-ses to Iesus Christ; as from Adam to the time of Noah, and as many from the floud vnder Noah, vnto the death of Moy-ses. In like manner, as many Iubilies haue and shall run their course, from the resurrection of our Sauour, to the end of the last times, and of 34. Iubilies. Moy-ses died (according to that diuine reuelation) in the midst of these 4. times, wherof two were finished, & two were then to come. * There are many other coniectures of the latter daies, which are found written, and yet are so diuers; as no one agreeth with another. And to speak truly, the ending of the world, and the generall iudgement is vncertaine to any creature: for it is onely in the hand and power of God, whose secrets are concealed to himselfe, and he being God reserved them to his owne peculiar knowledge. So that, if those auncient men would needs vndertake to write thereof som perticularities; yet they al deceiud themselues by abusing coniectures, far off from all verity. We then of these daies, who haue much lesse learning & iudge-

* This is out of Cusa, who liued & spake this, in the yeare 1464. made Cardinall vnder Pope Pius the second. So that, in perfect account, the instant yeare, is the 31. Iubily, since Iesus Christ.

This is onely conceiued in opinion.

judgement then they had, without any comparison, and enjoy not a sparke of the like sanctity; ought to cease and desist, frō ouer-curious search into things to come, especially daies, houres, and moments, which God hath so restrained to his owne power, that the Angels in heauen do not know them. For so himselfe saith; Of that day and houre, no Man knoweth, no not the Angels of Heauen, but my Father onely. But sure and certain are we, that the world shall perish by an vniuersall flame, and shall bee reuiued: which the Spirit of God deliuered by Moyse, in his Song in Deutronomy: Fire is kindled in my wrath, and shall burne vnto the bottome of Hell, and shall consume the earth with her encrease, and set on fire the foundations of the Mountaines.

Sophocles the Pagan Poet, seemed to touch with his finger (as it were) the ending of the World, in diuers verses, translated by John de Maulmont, the meaning wherof briefly folowes thus. The Age shall come that wil bring vs riches from the high Heauens, when they shall be filled, and round engirt with fire. All places on the earth the flames shall enclose, and burne all things, as well in the water, as in the Ayre. Not any thing in this world, vnder earth, or in the deepest Sea, shall scape from burning. When then, by so cruell a flames fury, all things shall be consumed: the springes of all waters shall be without course, like a bottomes gulfe. No fields shal produce any more fruits, nor the earth be inhabited: No ships shall floate vpon the Sea: No Birds fly in the Ayre: But a cruell tempest of fierie thunder, shall hurle Heauen and Earth into eternall ruine; burning the Earth and all things into Cinders. Then shall her great backe resume no other essence, or yeelde any nourishment, for all is brought into putrifaction.

Saint Peter writeth; That Heauen and Earth which is at this instant, are reserved for Fire at the day of Iudgement; and the Elements shall resolve themselves into fire. Saint Augustine answered a demand which might he made, as thus. When after the Iudgement is ended, this World shall bee burnt, before (instead thereof) a new Heauen be created, and a new Earth: in what place shall the Saints be, when this burning is performed? Considering, it followeth necessarily, that they should be in some corporeall place, because they all haue bodies. They shall be (saith he) in high places, wherevnto the flames can neuer mount, as likewise the Waters of the Deluge could not. For they shall then haue such bodies, as they may bee where they will be, without fearing the Fire of burning, being made immortall and incorruptible: as the corruptible and Mortall bodies of the three Men, Sidrach, Misack, and Abednago liued, without being offended in the fiery furnace.

Now, if we will be Christians, we ought to beleue, that the Resurrection of the dead, is in Flesh, and that it will bee done in a moment, or in the twinkling of an eye, saith the Apostle: but our Faith heerein is not vnprofitable, although our vnderstanding doe not perfectly comprehend, howe, and in what manner it shal be done. Let vs leaue then to God, the causes and reasons whereby this is to bee done, and let not vs enquire (ouer busily) after his admirable secrets. I could continue on this discourse, with diuers other Chapters, and handle in them this Resurrection, setting downe the solution and answers of Doctors in Diuinity, touching those high questions and demands, which may be made in this matter. But I will faile no further in so high a Sea, nor enter into an  Eurypus* of reasons, where the Billowes may cause the sincking of my poore Spirits ship; therefore here shall be my Hauen and landing.

Phillip de Comines, a worthy learned Gentleman, who was Counsellour to King Charles, and serued him in the action: giueth notable testimony thereof, and therefore I think it not amisse, to vse his own words, in regard of his grauity and authority. He relateth first, the cruelty & tyranny of Ferdinando, King of Naples, and of his Son Alphonso, in causing 24 Noble-

The Iudgement of Phillip de Comines, of the Conquest of Naples, for the finnes of the Kings thereof

The tyranny, crueltie, and vicious life of the Kings of Naples.

Bishoppicks and Abbaies sold for money

Noble-men (their Subiects) to be most cruelly murdered in Prison: then, discourfing of their vices and wickednes, he afterward speakeh of Gods iudgements vpon them, proceeding in this manner.

No man (saith hee) was euer more cruell, more wicked, more vicious, nor a greater Glutton, then Alphonso, though his Father Ferdinando was more dangerous then he: for, in making men faire weather (as we tearme it) and good cheare; he commonly betrayed them. As he dealt by Count Iaques, whom he murdered villainously, though hee were Ambassadour with him for Frances Sforza, Duke of Milaine, and so he dealt likewise with many other, neuer vsing mercy to any, no, not so much as to his owne Kinf-man. Besides, he neuer had any pittie or compassion on his poore people, for hee made a very merchandize of his Kingdome, insomuch; that hee forced his Subiects to feede and fat his Hogges, and pay for them if they chanced to die. He bought vp all the Oyle and Graine in the Countrey, before it was ripe, and sold it afterward extreamely deare, compelling them to take it at his price, and, while he sold, no man else might sell any. If any Noble-man or Gentleman were richer then the rest; hee forced him to lend him great summes of Money. He tooke from his Nobility their races of horses, or else made them keepe them for him, whereby he had many thousands of Horses, Mares, and Coltes. Both the Father and the Son tooke many Women by force. They neuer had reuerence or respect to the holy Church; but sold Bishoppicks, as for example, that of Taranto, which Ferdinando the Father sold for 12000. Ducates, to a Iew for his Son, who (he said) was a Christian. He gaue Abbaies to Faulconers, with charge, to keepe him a certaine number of Haukes at their expences. Alphonso the Sonne neuer kept any Lent, nor made so much as any shew to keepe it. He neuer made conscience of any committed sinne, nor euer communicated: and, to conclude, it is not possible to doe worse, then they both did.

Thus saith this Authour, of the liues and manners of these two Kinges, and then hee further addeth, concerning Gods Iudgements vpon them. It may (saith he) seeme to the Readers, that I haue spoken this on some particular passion, or hatred towards them. But (in good faith) I haue not said it to any other end, then to continue the course of my History, and that it may appeare, that this voyage to King Charles to Naples, proceeded onely of the will of Almighty GOD, who ordained, that so young a King, destitute of Councell, Mony, and all sufficient meanes for such an enterprife: should be his Comissary (as it were) to chastice these Kinges, who were wise, potent, and rich, and had many wise Counsellours and graue personages about them; yea, many subiects, friends, and allies, abroad in Italy, whom it imported to conserue and defend that Kingdome. And yet neuerthelesse, though they fore-saw the storm long before: they could not find meanes to auoid it, nor make resistance any where. For, excepting onely the Castle of Naples, there was not any place, Town, or Fort, that stayed King Charles at one whole day. Insomuch, that Pope Alexander said very wel; That the French-men came with Chalke in their hands, like Harbingers to make and take vp their lodgings wher they pleased: For they had not occasion, so much as to put on their Armour, in all the Voyage.

Therefore I conclude, according to the opinion of very many good and religious men, and other sorts of people (& the voyce of the people is the voyce of God) that GOD did punnish these Kinges visibly, and in such eident manner; that it might serue for an example and admonition to all Kinges, to liue well, according to the commandement of God. For these Kinges whereof I haue spoken, lost their Honours and Realme, great riches, and moouables of al sorts; yea, and their owne persons in the ende, three of them in the space of one year, or little more. And, as I haue vnderstood of some (that were very neere them) they found (in pulling downe an olde Chappell) a Booke, whereof the Title was; The Truth, with her secret counsell; in which Booke, was contained all that had happened after vnto them: And when they three (onely) had read it, they burnt it.

Thus

Charles the 8. king of France the Comissary of God to chastise the kings of Naples

The admirable facility of the Conquest of Naples.

The eident punishment of God vpon the Kings of Naples.

A Prophecie of the Conquest of Naples.

Thus much I thought good to set down in the words of this wise and grave Author, to the end, that not only the bad liues of these Kings, but also his iudgement may appeare concerning Gods Iustice shewed vpon them and their whole Kingdome for the same. And this may also bee confirmed by other perticulers, which Guicciardine recounteth of them, and of the successe of that warre, signifying, that Ferdinando the Father being verie wise, and vnderstanding of that intention of King Charles, to come and inuade his Kingdome; he feared so greatlie the successe (in respect of his owne bad life and his sonnes) that hee laboured by all meanes possible, by Ambassadours and Friends to diuert him from his purpose, offering to pay him yearly Tribute, of 50000. Ducates, and to holde his Kingdome of him, by fealty and homage. And when hee saw that nothing would preuaile, hee fell sicke with sorrow, and died before King Charles entred into Italy.

And Alphonso his Sonne (who then succeeded him in the Kingdome) though he bragd long before that he would go so farre as to the Mountaines, to meete King Charles if he came forwards (which he said, he would neuer beleue he durst do) yet afterward, when the French were in Italy, and came so farre as Rome, hee tooke such a fright, that he cried out eue-ry night, he heard the French-men coming, and that the verie trees and stones cried France. And, as Guicciardine affirmeth (who was not a man either easily to beleue, or rashly to Write Fables) it was credibly and constantly reported, that the spirit of Ferdinando, his father, appeared to one that had bene his Physiti- on, and bad him tell his sonne Alphonso from him; that he should not bee able to resist the Frenchmen. For God hadde ordained, that his progeny should (after many great afflictions) bee deprived of their Kingdome, for the multitude and great enormity of their sinnes. And especially, for that which he had done (by the perswasion of Alphonso) himselfe, in the Church of S. Leander, in Chata neere to Naples; whereof he told not the perticulers.

Furthermore, the same Author signifieth; that Alphonso was exagitated with suspitions and feares, whiles he was waking, and in his sleepe, with the representation of the Noblemen, whom hee had caused to be secretly murdered in prison, (as I haue declared before) and that being in this miserable perplexitie, he resigned his Crowne vnto his sonne (that was called Ferdinando, after his grand-fathers name) and ranne away into Sicily, in such hast, that his Mother in-law (with whom only he communicated his intention) being desirous to flie with him, coulde not perswade him to stay for her so much as three dayes, which she earnestly desired, to the end, she might haue that comfort at least, to be Queen of Naples a full year. But he told her, that if she would not go presently with him, he would leaue her: protesting (as Phillip de Comines testifieth) that if any sought to stay him by force, hee would cast himselfe out at the Windows. Asking hir further, if she heard not enery one crie France, France. Thus being tormented with the horrour of his owne Conscience, and the terrour of Gods Iudgements, alreadye false vpon him: he fled into Sicily, taking with him diuers sortes of delicate Wines (which he had alwayes loued ouer-well) and som Garden seeds to sowe, and a few Jewels; and a little mony, without taking any order in the Worlde, for his goodes and Moueables, which he left in great quantitie and aboundance, in the Castle of Naples.

But being arriued in Sicily, and touch- ed with Gods grace, he fell into the account of his bad life past, and of Gods iustice executed vpon him, he became verie penitent, gaue great almes, and entered into Religion, in which estate, hee dyed soone after of the stone, with the extreamest torments that could be immagined, as some of the Religious, with whom he lined, tolde after to Phillip de Comines, as himselfe writeth. And to conclude the Tragical History of the Kings, his sonne Ferdinando, to whom hee resigned his Crowne, hauing assembled al his forces, durst make no resistance any where vnto the French, but fledde before them from place to place, vntill at length, almost all his subiectes forsooke him, and rebelled against him; whereupon, he fled also into Sicily, and within awhile dyed there. Loe heere the miserable calamity which (for the sinnes of these Kings) fell not on- ly vpon them, but also vpon their whole Kingdome, seruing for many yeares af- ter;

CHAP. XXII.

Of a Courtier; And what manner of man he ought to be.

He reason inducing mee to write of a Courtier, is to take away a false perswasion, imprinted in common and popular Iudgement, in thinking; that a Courtier is none other, the an afronter of Merchants, a Dissembler, a Flatterer, Inciuil, a Lyer, a ruffian, a Swaggerer, a troublesome fellow: In briefe, a man made vp of all Viccs, because that in the Kings times, the Sonnes to late King Henry the second, raigning in young yeares, many then were such, which being well obserued by that worthis and great man, the Lord de Pybrack, in his Poesie of Quatraines, hee sung thus:

Go not to Reuelles. if thou loue no dancing,
Nor venter on the Sea, if thou feare danger:
Go not to Bankets if thou canst not eate,
Nor to the Court, if thou speake what thou thinkest.

Now at this present, liuing in such a time, when wee haue a King of a constant age, of a ripe vnderstanding, and Princes and Princeesses, that will haue none in their Courts, but people of vertue; I purpose to propound, what manner of man a Courtier ought to bee, and his ends. To qualify this error of the people, wherein they haue beenc led full manie yeares. Moreouer, such as would or else pretend themselues to be Courtiers, may heerein marke and learne, by what meanes, and with what great facility, they shall attaine thereto.

First of all, he that desireth to followe the Courts of Emperors, Kings, Queens, Dukes, Dutcheesses, Marquesses, and Earles, or other illustrious persons, ought to be a Gentleman by birth, and of a noble house of Antiquity: because it is lesse reproachfull for a Ycoman, to fail in the exercise of Vertuous actions, then for him that is Noble borne; who erring from those steppes which his predecessors walkt in, soyleth the name & honor of his house and race. Before hee go to Court, he must be past the age of Adolescencie, which is about twentie or five and twenty yeares of his age: for beeing much older, he will not finde it to his liking. Hee must bee well featured and formed, both of his bodye and countenance, least he be misprized and scorned. He must bee of an indifferent stature, to wit; neither extreamly high nor low: for men of such sort, are lookt on like things of monstrous shape. Beside, men of so great stature, ouer and aboue their common addiotion, to dull vnderstanding are verie vnapt to all exercises of agility, matters verie commendable in a Courtier.

He must be expert in all kind of arms, to helpe himselfe, as neede shall require, both at all times, and in all places. He must be a good Horseman, and actiue in managing him; that he may bee knowne (among others) to be hardie and valiant. He must be loyall and faithfull vnto him whom he serueth, and addicted to acord quarrels and contentions, his own honor safely kept, and his for whom hee maketh the agreement. Besides, as hee ought to be skilfull in Wrastling, Leaping, dancing, and playing on some or manie Instruments of Musicke, so should he likewise readily sing any Poet or Historian. He must be exquisite in speaking diuers Languages: if he be French, English, or what else, he ought to speake Latine, Italian, Spanish, yea the Germaine tongue tongue also, if it be possible. And for his better attaining thereto, before hee practise any of them, he must haue visited the Countries where the Languages are naturally spoken. For, to learne them by Bookes, he shall neuer pronounce them truly. I meane the like of other Nations, in regard that the Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, and Germaines, do ordinarily conuerse together.

He must not vse any sottish presumption, nor bee a reporter of wearisome Nouelties, or so vnaduised, as to speake Offensue speches, in steade of such as may better please. Hee must not bee Opinitue, or Contentious, as some doe seeme to haue no other delight, then in being being crosse and troublesome, like Flies or Wasps, and make it their profession, to gainsay euery man despihtfully, without any respect at all. He must bee no prater, Vaine-glorious Boaster, Lye, Flatterer, or Knaue; but moderate and peaceable, vsing euermore (especially in publicke) reuerence and respect towards his Lorde, which is most commendable in a seruant. Fame and renoune do follow all good parts, if they appeare in action, both in due time and place, and he cannot faile in these things, but to his own great dishonor. He must make no vanta of himselfe, except he be truly valiant, & haue acted some great enterprizes, or done some memorable Stratagem. Neither must he vse any iests, that may offend his Prince, or others: except hee order his iests, and so fauor them, as the Prince may speake their woorth for wit and discretion, and not reprove them with want of Iudgement; but, insted of displeasure, thinke them to deserue both respect and recompence.

To this purpose, wee may alledge the Historie of a Marshal of France, tearmed of S. Andrew, who knowing that King Henry, second of that name, could hardly finde an Architect to his liking, to forme him a model for two bodies of lodgings, which he purposed to build at Fontaine-bleau, brought him a man of Lymosine, a Mason by his trade, yet ignorant. But hauing fitted him with sufficient habite, he made the King beleue, that hee was a great Architect, verie deeply experienced in that Art, & that it was the same man, who had proiected al the buildings which Charles the fift, Emperour and king of Spain, had caused to bee made. And indeed, this poore man had bin in Spain, in his yonger years, to gaine some knowledge by Trauaile, for his best practise could not maintain him in his own countrey. And hauing gotten in Spain (in the compasse of sixe or seauen yeares) some fiftie *Reals of siluer; thinking himselfe to be the richest man in his Countrey, hee returned home againe. Hauing spent a good part of his Money, he had married another Wife; for all Lymosines, or people of those parts, vsing Mechanical professions, when (for lucre sake) they trauaile into Spain: they marrie there (for the most part) to weomen that doo but lend themselues (as it were) for that time, and comming into their owne Countrey, there they are at libertie againe to take other Wiues.

This poore Mason came to dwell at Orleance, hauing spent well-neere all his Reals, and eaten vp his Wiues Dowrie beside, which might amount to twentie pounds; he heard uere of som other Masons, that earned daily seauen or eight *sols or Sous, and in his Countrey, they had no more but two sols, or six *Blanks. The Lorde Marthall meeting with this Mason by chance, as hee walked one day abroad in the Fieldes, to passe awaie the time pleasantly: he fell into Conference with him, and found that he had a verie proude and over-weening presumption of his owne sufficiency. So much the rather, because hee was a workeman at the building of the new Conuent of Nostre Dame de Monferrat. Wherein indeed he holpe to supply the Masons with Morter, which made him of opinion, that he was the verie best Architect of his time: Albeit hee vnderstood little or nothing, scarcely knowing howe to order or lay a stone in a wall in his right place.

The King crediting the Lord Marshals wordes, spake a long time together in good French to the Mason, and yet vnderstood nothing backe againe from him: for he stood with his Hat on, without vsing any reuerence to the King, or respecting him any more, then if he had beene his daily companion. Sometime, hee called his maiesty Monsieur, or my Lord the King, speaking one while Limosine, then again thrusting forth a word or two of Spanish: the King perceiuing nothing all this while, but continued his speeches earnestly to the Mason, that hee might at full vnderstand his mind.

At length, the King beholding that all the standers by smiled, and aboue all, the Lord Marthall, desired to knowe the reason of their Laughter; which beeing disclosed to him, himselfe fell into a verie mirthfull humour and laughed heartily, because he had no better noted the Language, the Crispe countenance and ignorance of the poore Mason. Nor did the King any way take the iest offensively; but contratywise, was well pleased, & much commended the Lorde Marthall for it. The like maner of iesting, inuented by a quicke and apprehensue spirite; with obseruation of time and place; may bee persons for State affaires.

If he bee invited by his Prince to anie play or pastime; he may safely yeild thereto, not in hope to make gaine of him, but only to yeild him contentment. And let him be careful, that he be not too opini-tive in any accident against him: but giue way to him in all, and by al meanes; in regard of so great inconueniences, that thereby do daily happen.

Likewise, let him not imitate some; who will spare no time (either daie or night) from playing, but thereby do lose many faire occasions, of performing som good Offices vnto their Prince, whence might be deriued great merit and fauors. Some haue beene noted so assiduate and earnest, that they would play away lands, houses, Garments, yea, their verie Hor-ses and Armours: and afterwards, bor-row (by importunitie of their Friendes) without any re-payment, whereuppon, haue ensued Contempts, Quarrels, and Bloud.

Let him not speak of any thing which he vnderstandeth not, wherein hee shall expresse more Wisedome to bee silent: for it is an honest shadow and cloake to his ignorance. Likewise, if he haue anie imperfection in some part of his body, let him hide and conceale it by all possible meanes. As did Ferrand King of Naples, who would neuer plucke off his Gloues; because his hands were not white. Iulius Caesar also did daily weare a Chaplet of Bayes, because he was bald.

He must keepe his credite with Mer-chants and others, not following the deal-ing of many, who are beholding to such as lend them: yet must be daily importu-ned to make repayment, euen vnto such enforcement, as their goodes and landes must be seized on, yea, sometimes their bodies confined to prison. These beha-uiours, do rather relish of a man vtterly lost and forsaken, then of a Vertuous Courtier.

In his talke and discoursing, hee must report no Myrales, that is to say, things that are not likely, nor neuer were. They that make profession of relating such no-uelties, are euermore held for Lyers; and euery man that is a lyar, will cary the like credit of beleefe, when he speaketh truth. Laughter likewise, except it light vppon good ground, is no vway commendable: For any man, that is subiect vnto long laughter, and without some sounde sub-iect, deliuers no better vnderstanding of himselfe, then of a meere Foole.

Now, because no Court appeareth to be compleat, except it be accompani-ed with Ladies; let vs admit the case, that our instant described Courtier, bee in such a Court so worthily furnished, and where he may bee become an amorous seruant to some beauty, and to an honest end: for (otherwise) he will find his own perill. He must not immediatelie make knowne his passions by parlaunce; with furious gestures and obstinations, as ma-ny vnaduised Courtiers haue done. But the best bewrayer of his affections, are continence, a sigh, respect, fear, & hum-ble meekenesse, which auaille more then a thousand fond words can do; and hee may so order his carriage, that his eyes may serue as his best messengers, & beare the true Embassie of his heart, to his dea-rest esteemed.

Afterward, by equall degrees, he may attaine to speak with his Goddesse, when a touch, or kisse of the hand, and such like honest fauors, may ciuilly be deriued from any Ladie of respect, honourable affected. Wherefore, hee that hath not lost the restraint of reason, will Go-uerne himselfe wisely, obserue fit times and place; and (when neede requireth) will containe due regard verie diligently, although it bee in neuer so sweete a pa-sture, because publick and apparant loue, is a matter of great difficulty to order.

The ends then of a perfect Courtier, such an one as I cannot heere sufficiently describe; is (in mine Opinion) to win by the meanes of those qualities which I haue set downe to him, the fauour and affection of his Prince in such sort: that his seruice may bee alwaies commenda-ble, and to tell him the truth in all things that are conuenient for him; to wit, with-out feare or danger of displeasing him, & so to order himselfe, that when he kno-wes his mind enclined to matters incon-uenient for him, to bee so hardie as to gainsay them. Seruing him in gentle ma-ner, and gaining fauour by the good parts in him; to the end, that he may pre-uent all bad intentions in him, and con-duct him the pathes of Vertue. And so, our Courtier hauing nothing but good-nesse in him, accompanied with promp-titude of spirit, chearefulness, prouidence, wife-wisedome, knowledge, in learning, and all other vertuous qualities: hee shall (in all occasions) woorthily make apparant to his Prince, what profite and honour commeth to him and his, by meanes of Iustice, Liberality, Magnanimity, Affability, Familiarity, and all other Vertues which are conuenable for a good prince. And contrariwise, what infamy and losse proceedeth from those Vices, which are sworne enemies to these Vertues. And for a full conclusion, as manie times it happeneth, that a Vertuous Courtier maketh the Prince good; so a vicious Courtier maketh his Prince wicked and detestable. Of this mind were all such, as haue medled in Writing of a Courtier; and among others, Balthazar the Castillannois.

A Vertuous Courtier maketh a good Prince.

CHAP. XXIII.

How a man may give praise and commendation to himselfe, without impeache or prejudice to others.

Cicero, in the third Booke of his Oratour saith; That no man can honestly commend himselfe, but others will conceiue enuie thereat, and re- proue him for it. Concerning this saying, albeit it hath beene allowed by many; yet it is not generally receyued and warranted. For, a man may lawfullie commend himselfe, without attraction of enuie vpon him: especially, if hee be a worthy Soldier, or a man of such merit, as can speake of generous actions, or valiant employments, if they beene performed by him, and their Carracter apparant. Iulius Caesar may serue for an example, who hath spoken great matters of himselfe, and yet (for al that) no way discommendable therein. His Commentaries which discourse of nothing, but his braue and generous exploits in the Gaulish Warres, were seene and read of all men in his time, yet no way blamed or despised, so farre as we know: but on the contrarie, were highly praised, both in regard of his eloquence, as also his singular expeditions.

But, if he had attributed to himselfe, or made vaunt of more then was performed by him: hee could not haue stood cleare from mallice, yea, in great men, who durst and would haue boldly tolde him, that hee lyed. And all such persons as doe make vaunt of small matters, or of any thing done by the meanes and helpe of others, attributing such actions soly to themselves: they cannot doe it, but with great shame and infamy.

In men of good and worthy respects, it hath beene, and is permitted (euen for the benefit of others) to speake deseruedly of themselves, and to their owne advantage. As, if in procuring to be credited, we render a reason of an honest integritie, by some effects of our owne past before; to the end, that hauing the meanes to continue our Vertuous actions, for the profit of manie: we may embrace their praise, in despite of their owne spleene (as we tearme it) and constrain them to receiue both profite and pleasure from vs, euen such as would else shun all like occasions.

This was it, which made Themistocles vse these wordes in the Counsell of the Athenians, euen when he sawe them fully glutted with his good deedes. O poore people (quoth hee) why doe you suffer your selus to receiue so manie benefits from one and the same person? At another time hee vsed these Wotds to them. In time of Raine and Tempestes, you make your recourse to me, as vnder the spreading armes of a Tree: And when faire weather comes againe, you teare downe each branch as you passe by.

Homer maketh Nestor to speake his owne Valiant deedes, to encourage Patroclus, and nine other Knightes, in attempting the Combate (bodie to bodie) against Hector. In like maner, the words of exhortation, action of the hande, and example with the Spurre of emulation; is liuely, and pierceth meruailously; yea, it bringeth (with courage and affection) hope to attaine vnto the heighth of anie thing, which otherwise woulde appeare impossible.

A man may also commend himselfe before an ingratefull person, to shewe him him his fault, in forgetting former benefits receiued. A stranger, to gaine the good opinion of Inhabitants, amongst whom he is newly arriued; may attribute some honourable Title vnto his present condition, and speake well of himselfe. As it is to bee noted in Virgil, that Aeneas did, after the Destruction of Troy his native Countrey, wandering by Sea and Lande, to seeke a newe dwelling, vsing these Wordes (when Enquirie was made of him) Sum pius Eneas, that is to say; I am Eneas the Trojan, full of Pietie and Religion; shewing the Goddess his aged feeble Father, and his verie young sonne, whom (with great perrill) he had sau'd from the ruine and destruction of his Countrey; and this was not vnfitting in him.

Cicero approved to be forgetful of himselfe.

I haue many times beene amazed at Cicero, who Writes (as I haue sayde in the beginning of this Chapter) that a man in praising himselfe, dooth but attract Malice and Enuie on his own head. And yet notwithstanding, there is an Epistle of his owne, which (in verie vehement affection) he wrote to an Historiographer; wherein hee entreats him, not to bee vnmindfull of inserting in his Histories of memorable actions, what hee hadde written perticulerlie of himselfe. In mine opinion, there was neither manners nor Modesty, but excesse beyond al reason.

Men shoulde not couet their owne praise.

Chrysippus and Diogenes.

There is nothing more vaine, or further off from equity, then for men to pursue the Quest of their owne praise & renowne. Chrysippus and Diogenes were the first Authors, and firme of al other, in the contempt of glory; for they saide, That among al desires, there is none more dangerous, or with greater care to be auoided, then that which commeth to vs from the approbation of others. And all the glorie of the world, is of no such merrit, as that a man of vnderstanding, should so much as stretch forth his finger, onely to gaine it. There are manie men in these dayes, that will neuer aduenture in the perrilles of Warre, or where their duty most commandeth them: if they thought that they should not be seene, or it should not bee publickely reported, that they haue performed some perticuler deed of praise, beyonde the honour they pretended to enioy, only because they are couetous of glory and reputation.

The vanity of such as seeke after praise.

If this might be allowd for good, then men needed not to bee vertuous, but in publicke; and the operations of the soule (where is the true seate of Vertue) should serue vs to no other end, but to vse them as a rule and order, without any endeour to attain the knowledge of them in other persons: Vertue then should bee a verie vaine and friuolous thing, if shee deriued her commendation from Glorie. For, what is more casuall and accidentall then reputation? To cause that our Actions should be seene and knowne, belongeth to the Handie-woke of Fortune. Oftentimes, the reputation of an action well performed, continueth (it may bee) but three or foure dayes: Other-whiles, so long as hee and his liueth; and yet soone after, no more memorie remaineth of either.

The powerfull operations of the soule.

Not to be noted, is to do well continually.

False honour soone gotten.

Some there are, that will rashlie and willingly fall into daunger, to purchase false Honor; and dying so, he is neuer after so much as talkt of: whereby, both he and his renowne dooth perish together. It hath been meere hazard, that is reported of some Captaines, Gracians, Romaines, Persians, French, Germanes, and others; as also of an hundred thousand men, that are dead, in execution of worthy enterprizes, or hindring of them, yet none spoken of, because all depended on Fortune. Wee reade, that Caesar was neuer wounded; yet was he present in more then fiftie battailes, and at infinite Citties surprizing. Whereas others, vpon much lesse occasions, haue bene maimed and slaine: and what can be said of Caesar heerein, but that it was his good Fortune?

Fortune much auaideth in purchasing commendation.

It hath beene, and yet is an ordinary Vice, that we are more desirous of great then of good Reputation: And it appeareth to be sufficient, that our names run thorowe other mens mouthes, as receyuing there both life and lasting, and must bee there kept, out of our owne possession. But Wise men do propose vnto themselves a more iust and certain end, in any important enterprizes, to wit; actions of Vertues, which are so Noble of themselves; as there needs no other praise or recompence to be sought for; but eue their owne worth & value, and Namely, not to seeke for their esteeme, in the vanitie of humaine iudgements. And yet notwithstanding, this false opinion sermortall reputation: for he taught them, that the true and only means of compas-certaine scelerous and bad persons com-

By what varietie of meanes, Frances Sforza, and Nicholas Pichinius wonne the renoune, of being the most skilful men in the Art Military, that liued in their dayes.

It appeareth, according to Naturall Reason, that he who hath attained to any degree, in anie Art or Facultie whatsoever it bee, ought whollie to accomodate himselfe thereto, following his beginning, thereby to purchase his Fame and Reputation. Neuerthelesse, we do daily see, that (by diuers meanes) men reach to one & the same end, wher-of we haue infinite examples: Among which, it likes me to nominate Fraunces

laine, and Nicholas Pichinine the Italian, men verie singuler and expert in Armes: who were in the time of King Alphonfus, of Arragon and Naples, and of Lewes Maria, Duke of Millaine. These two Captaines were very contrarie and enuious against each other, because they feuerally pretended, to beare chiefe honour in Armes about his competitor. In which respect, they both declared such courage and dexterity of spirit; as for a long while it was vehemently doubted, whether of them merited most to be preferred. This equall contention so long continued, till after expence of many yeares, and sundry well fought battailes on both sides; Pichinine was Conquered: by meanes whereof, Sforza hauing the right apparently on his part, got the glorie, was made Duke of Millaine, and was the sole Maister, or (at least) the more fortunate man.

uers parts of Italy, that he was renowned for a singuler good Captaine.

Now, as concerning his Competitor, Frances Sforza, his qualities and dispositions were quite contrary to those of Pichinine. He was bigge of body, well proportioned, and strongly limbd, of gentle countenance, a quicke stirring eye, bald-headed, a good presence, copious in discourse, and well ordered, a liuely spirite, and well aduised; desirous to reach high enterprizes, and patient in aduersities. He alwayes auoided the meanes of breaking Warre, labouring more to vanquish by besiedging, or temporizing, then present fight. He would neuer giue battaile, except he were enforced thereto, or that he saw himselfe vpon a great aduenture. He would haue his men march in good Order; and by the best meanes to be valiant, and yet gracious: making more account of his Infanterie, then his Compleatest Horssemen, continually preferring them to the greatest stratagemis, because hee placed best trust in them. He was firme and constant in all his enterprizes, quick and wise in beguiling his enemie; and discovering his Fallacies in all Brauadoes made vpon him. In Nouell inuentions, he would stand vpon his guard; being a man of readye counsell, and aptest spirit in all occasions.

By which Rules and Obseruations (although they were so different from those in the other) he was esteemed as a woorthy Soldier, attaining (by diuers meanes and deuises) to the Dukedom of Millain, and to be one of the cheefest men in the world. Of these two men, so deseruedly famous, manie Moderne Historians haue largely written: especiallie Trenus Syluius, Pope, in his Cosmography, and Antonius Sabellicus, in his Eneades, where such Readers, as are desirous to bee further informed, concerning these men, may read more amply their liues and actions; for in this place (according to our method in all obseruations, which barres vs from full report, and bindes vs to breuitie) we are perswaded, that we haue spoken well and sufficiently.

CHAP. XXV.

*That the Lyon naturally feareth the Cocke:
with many other notable matters concerning the Lyon.*

OD hath not made any creature in this Worlde so strong and powerfull, but there abideth in him some cause of feare or terror, and something is ordained to offend him. In like maner, there is nothing in this world firme and assured, for one thing is destroyed by another; and the same also afterward, ruined by some other thing: so that we know not what may bee warranted, or which thing can bee kept from corrupting.

Hence it ensueth, that oftentimes we shunne such thinges as are likely to hurt vs, and fall (some other way) into perils, which we least suspect or imagine. Moreover, among Beastes and other thinges created, there is a kind of naturall Loue or Hatred, by a secret and conceald propriety; by meanes whereof, some seeke and pursue, and others shun and auoyde each other. What Beast is more strong then the Lyon, the Prince of Beastes? Not any, and therefore beares he that name, because (according to som Iudgements) the worde Lyon in Greeke, signifyeth a (King): Or, according to others (Sight) & that in regard of his perfection in seeing, he is so named. But bee it howso-uer, this powerfull Beast which euerie one feareth, so soon as he espieth a Cock, he fearfully gets him gone: and that by a secret propertie in Nature, euen as the Hare shuns the Hound: and not onelie doth the sight of the Cocke cause this auoydance, but the verie smell, if he feele it far off; or hearing him Crow, it makes him maruailously affraid. Nor doth hee shun this creature only, but also the noise of a Charriot or Waggon running on the way: and by no meanes can hee bee compelled to stay, if he see a man bearing any light in his hand. Which seemeth to bee an incredible matter, that a Beast so furious, should stand in awe or dreade of so small a thing: and yet notwithstanding, it hath been noted by experience: Besides, that which is Written by Plutarch, in his Booke of the difference betweene Hate and Enuie: Pliny, Saint Ambrose, and Albertus Magnus, who sayeth and maintaineth, that if the Cock be of a White Colour, hee maketh the Lyon stande much more in feare of him. Nor can there any assured Reason bee yeilded in this case, but euen (as I formerly saide) that it commeth by a secret propertie in Nature. And yet Lucretius, the Auncient Poet, sayth; That the Cocke and his Feathers haue a certaine propertie or qualitie, which the Lyon seeing, hee receiueth great terror thereby, and is not able by anie meanes to endure it.

Some others do attribute the cause of this feare, vnto the supream and celestially Influences, and not vnto the Beastes Sight, Smell, or the matter it selfe. For, (say they) these two Creatures are subiect vnto the Sunne, the Vertue whereof toucheth the Cocke more then the Lyon: and thence it ensueth, that the Inferiour and lesse Vertuous in this kinde (albeit the bigger and greater in strength) feareth and obeyeth his superiour. And they say moreouer, that in regarde the Cocke is of the Sunnes Nature, hee reioyceth and singeth in the morning at the coming and rising of the Sunne. But be it howsoeuer, we know that the Lyon is more strong, and of greater spirit then all other Beastes; also, extreame in fury & crueltie, against all other of the like Nature. Neuerthelesse, wee haue infinite plain and manifest examples, of his great Mildenesse and Clemencie, whereof it shall not bee amisse to alledge some, according as I finde them credible recorded.

Appion the Greeke writeth (according as Aul. Gellius declareth, of a matter seen by himself, & the same is likewise affirmed by Ælianus in his Book of Beastes) that in certaine feastes, solemnly obserued in the Citie of Rome, it was vsed as a custome in the great Theater (where diuers kinds of Saluage and cruell beastes were kept, as Lyons, Leopards, and others) men condemned to death were brought and put in, to the end that either they might bee deuourd of them, or to deserue life by valiant

The history of Androdus & his Lyon.

A wonderfull vertue in a Lyon to a mā in misery.

Androdus cometh to take knowledge of the Lyon.

The Emperour sendeth for Androdus, and vnderstandeth by him his former knowledge of the Lyon.

hiant defence of themselves, a Spectacle (indeede) verie cruell and inhumaine. It happened vpon a day, that among other offenders thus brought thither, a man named Androdus, Seruant to a Romaine Senator, was to take his Fortune, and amongst the other Beasts in the Theater, there was a Lyon of insigne power and greatnesse, as also verie cruel, which had bin brought lately out of Affrica, and the eyes of all the Beholders were fixed on this Lyon. The Beast walking Maiestically about the place, beganne to looke aduisedly vpon Androdus; and seeming to consider, or take some acknowledgement of him; went steppe by step toward him verie gently, albeit, in opinion of all the By-standers, to rent and teare him in peeces. But their expectation was deceiued, for the Lyon bowing downe his head, came curteously to Androdus, who (trembling) awaited nothing else but immediat death; and walking along very lovingly by him, stroked his bodie on the legges and thighes of Androdus, kissing and licking his hands and feete, Leaping familiarly & gently on him, euen as yong Whelpes, and other waiting Dogs are wont to doe; when they haue not seene their Maisters in a long time.

Androdus perceiuing the perticular affability of the Lyon vnto himselfe, without any shew of the least kind to any of the other condemned persons: cheared his dismayed Spirits; and made much of the Lyon, smoathed his head & hayre with his hand, and looking aduisedly on him, came to former knowledge of him, deliuering manifest signes of ioy and gladnesse, conceyued by this notice taken. Whereat the people were not a litle amazed, & stricken with great astonishment, giuing forth straunge and variable speeches, according as each fancie made coniecture. By meanes whereof, the Emperour caused Androdus to be sent for thence, and being brought instantly before him; desired to vnderstand som reason for this priuate and familiar acquaintance, and where hee had formerly seene that Lyon. Whereunto he answered, that hauing beene in Affrica, at such time as his Lord was Lieutenant Generall, and great Governour there and of that Prouince: in regard of some wrongs & outrages done to him by his saide Lord, hee was enforced to become a fugitiue, and 10 hauing no other place of shelter or safe-tie, went secretly into a great Forrest, where he tooke vp his lodging in a Caut or Den. Not long had he staid there, but this Lyon entered in vpon him, and not only abstained from doing any harm but lying downe before him, shewed him one of his pawes, which was wounded and bleeding, euen as if hee would haue desired helpe and remedie of him for his griefe. Androdus dreading no danger by this milde behaiour, tooke vp the Lions legge, and looking vpon the bleeding wound, found a great sharpe Thorn sticking in the foot; which plucking forth so gently as possibly he could, hee stenchd the blood, so that the paine appeared to be indifferently appeased. This beeing done, the Lyon laying his head in the lap 20 of Androdus, slept verie soundly; & from thence-forwardes, the Lyon walking abroad daily, would bring the best preyes he could get (by his hunting) to Andro-dus, who drest his food in the Mid-dayes Sun, because hee had no other fire, and was well contented with such prouision.

30 After hee had liued thus continually with the Lyon, for more then the space of three yeares; he grew to bee wearie of this kind of life. Wherefore vpon a day, when the Lyon was gone abroad about his wonted game; Androdus departed thence, to take such fortune as might befall him. Not farre had he trauailed from the Forrest, but he was met by some, that knew him to be a fugitiue seruaunt: and therefore brought him home to Rome to his Maister, who iudging him worthie of death, as others in the like case were vsually sentenced, sent him with the other 40 offenders; to the publicke Theater, there to be torne in pieces by the wilde Beasts; and there the Lyon tooke knowledge of him, as formerly hath bin related. When the Emperour had heard this admyrable History, in his owne gracious Nature; & at the peoples importunity: Androdus was deliuered and set at liberty; so was the 50 Lyon likewise; because he had extended such fauor to him. Thenceforward; and a long time after; the Lyon daily walked thorow the streetes of Rome, in the company of Androdus onely, without dooing harne to any body, which was the cause, that manie Romaine Cittizens affected Androdus greatly, and bestowed diuers liberall giftes on him, tearing him the Lions Physition, and the Lyon the host to Androdus. Thus the Lyons misfortune, to bee wounded in the foote by a Thorne: instinct of Nature taught him, to make his recourse to man for helpe. And this appeareth to be verie true, because we haue manie more examples to the same effect, alledged by Authors worthy of credit.

Plin, in his Booke fore-named, speaketh of a Syracusane named Mutor, who being in Syria, mette with a Lyon, that presented himselfe gently before him, & couching downe on the grounde, made signes (as it were of entreaties) to him; but the Syracusane being fearefull of his life, fled away from him, with all the hast he could vse. The Lyon still followed, and got againe before him, fawning on him, and licking him verie kindely, till at length the Syracusan perceiued the Lyon to bee wounded in the foote: which the Lyon lifting vp vnto him, euen as if hee desired to be eased; Mutor tooke forth a sharpe splinter of Woode, which (by treading thereon) was runne farre into the Flesh, and so the Lyon was released. This Historie, being painted in a goodly Table by the same Mutor in Syracusa, continued there long after, as a true Testimonie thereof.

The same Authour speaketh also of another man, named Elpis, borne in Samos, who being disimbarqued in Affrica; espyed somewhat neere vnto the Hauen, a Lyon roaring, making towardes him, moaning and complaining verie grieuouly. The man being fearefull, for safetie of his life got vppe into a Tree, at the foote whereof, lay the Lyon flat vpon his backe, deliuering manie cries and moanes, lifting vp and shewing his paw all bloody, euen as to mooue the man to commiseration.

Elpis looking more aduisedly, with better courage descended from the Tree, and drew a great Thorne out of the Lyons foote. In acknowledgement of which good turne done vnto him, so long as the Shippe remained in that Hauen: the Lyon brought him and his men daily, great store of Flesh, which hee hadde kild in hunting, in a neere neighbouring Forrest, wherewith they were long time releued.

These Histories, are the better to be credited, by that which (in like manner) happened vnto Saint Hierome, who healed a Lyon, that hadde received the like hurt; in recompence whereof, the Lyon kept companie with Saint Hieromes Affe, that was Laden with Wood, euen till he brought him home vnto his Hermitage.

Wee read moreouer, that Godfrey of Bullen, after hee had Conquered the Holy Land, rode vppon a day on hunting in Iudea, where hee found a Lyon fighting with a Serpent: which Serpent had so writhed and knit his taile and body about the Lyon, that he was in verie great danger of death. But the Serpent being slaine by Godfrey, the Lyon in remuneration of this benefite, followed and accompanied him daily, without departing from his guard: and euer when he went on Hunting, the Lyon serued in stead of his Grey-hound.

It chaunced afterwardes, that Godfrey sayling vpon the Sea, the Lyon was lefte behinde him, and his Maister returned not, to take him with him in the Shippe: yet such was the Loue of the Lyon vnto his Maister, that he would needes swim after him in the Water, and was drowned before he could be succored. Concerning those Lyons of Babylon, that did no harme vnto the Prophet Daniell, and diuers other besides, that (in the times of Dioclesim and Numerian, Emperours of Rome) not so much as touched those Christians, which were nakedly throwne vnto them, for foode and sustenance: I set not them downe as examples of the Naturall loue or qualitie in Lyons, because God had a woorking power in so high a businesse; and those blessed Favours proceeded only from his appointment.

Amongest other notable thinges of Noblenesse in this Beast, one Writeth; That he will neuer do anie hurt to man, except hee be thereto constrained thorough great necessitie and Hunger. If hee then chaunce to meete a man and a Woman together. hee addresseth himselfe rather vnto the Man, then vnto the Woman; and neuer (or verie seldome) doth he anie hurt to Children. It appeareth, that the Lyon (in imitation of man) hath some Audacitie in thinges that concerne honour, with a kinde of feare to derogate from it. For, if hee finde himselfe to bee pursued, and knowe knowes that he is seene : he goes with a slow and tardy pace , to declare no want of courage in his flight. But if he know himselfe to bee in the thickest Woodes, and where no eye can catch hold of him : his flight is then to his vtermost power. It is further saide, that when hee flyeth in this manner, he neuer looketh behinde him, to declare thereby, how much hee contemneth them that follow.

The Lyon, by meere instinct or motion of nature, is of such great and perfect knowledge, that if any man wound him with a Lance, or any other kind of Weapon : let him bee in the company of neuer so many men, yet length of time is no hindrance to him, but he will select him out among them all, and be reuenged on him, if he can. To this purpose, Aelianus declareth the History of a young Infant, nourished and brought vp by Iuba, King of Mauritania, who growing further in years, and riding on hunting with the King; wounded a Lyon with his Launce. But the Lyon recovering his hurt, within some long while after, the King passed by the same Mountaine where the Lyon was wounded, accompanied with the same young Gentleman that did the deede, and a great many more in the same assembly. The Lyon knowing him that formerly had hurt him, came with great fury and animosity, and entering into the thickest of them; vsed his sight and sauer in such sort, as, if the young Gallant had not bene strongly defended, the Lyon had torne him ther in pieces.

The same Authour, and sundry others beside doe assure vs, of matter (in my mind) very maruailous, to wit; that if a Lyonesse haue companied with another Lyon: her Male doth take knowledge of it by her smell, and then will beate and punnish her very grieuouly. Likewise, when the Lyon waxeth so old, as he can fight no longer, neyther chase any other Beastes: his young Lyons, that are more strong and able, doe helpe to prouide for him, and killing their seuerall preyes, they bring it to him where he is, to feede thereon. The Authours to approue al these things; are Pliny, Aristotle, Albertus Magnus, and Iulius Solinus; who doe write many other matters; which now I speake not off. Onely I thought it good to set downe these examples, for to confound cruell and vnthankfull men; in shewing them, that among brute and sauage Beasts, clemency is not only found, but also acknowledgement of good turnes receiued.

CHAP. XXVI.

Who was the first Man that tamed the Lyon; And of Lysimachus, a Capitaine to great Alexander, what hapned between him and a Lyon.

He powerfull Beast, whereof we haue discoursed in our precedent Chapter, although he is so cruell & furious; yet notwithstanding, he hath bene tamed and made gentle, by diligence and dexterity in Man. The first that euer vndertook that labour, was a Carthaginian by birth, and named Hanno; but the reward he receiued therefore, was bannishment from his Countrey. For they said, that this act of taming the Lyon, was a presaging of such a Spirit in him; that hee would make himselfe Lord of the countrey. But Plinie saith, that the reason why the Carthaginians banished Hanno, was; because he hauing thus qualified the fierce Lyon; he might the more easily perswade the Cittizens, and worke with them what himselfe pleased. He maketh report also of Marke Anthony, Cozin to Octavius, who caused Lyons in such sort to be tamed, and brought to gentlenesse: as hee would put their neckes into yokes, and make them draw his Chariot where soeuer he rode. We finde that the like was done by Helio-gabalus, of whose prodigalities and lubricities, we shall finde fitter place to discourse. King Iohn of Castile, second of that name, had a Lyon so domestick and familiar; that at all times when he saie in his State, the Lyon would lye downe close at his feete. Messire I.ques of Deffa, Arch bishop of Senle, had the like. Lodouicus Caelius writeth, that hee read in a good and approued Authour, of an Ewe, which conceiued and eaned a Lyon, a matter very monstrous in Nature. We likewise read of men, that with their hands haue slaine Lyons, as Sampson, Dauid, Hercules, and others.

I remember also, I haue read that Lysimachus, one of the Captaines to Alexander the great, slew a Lyon in this manner following. Alexander had then in his company Calisthenes the Philosopher, who was a man free, learned, and wise; and (according to the true quality of such a man) would oftentimes giue him good enstruptions, and reprehensions also, when hee did not as became a King. Whereupon, Alexander growing into displeasure against him; caused him to bee put into a Cage among his Dogs. This was such a shame and ignominy, as so free and vertuous a Spirit as Calisthenes had, was no way able to endure: but rather would voluntarily haue embraced death, and wherein he was holpen by his Scholler Lysimachus, who grieued not a little, to see his Maister so dishonorably dealt withall. When Alexander was aduertised thereof, in a great rage; he caused him to be throwne before a Lyon, that the Beast furiously might deuour him. But Lysimachus, beeing a Man of excellent courage, secretly armed his right arme and hand, afterward, when hee was exposed to the Lyon, and saw him come running (greedily gaping) to deuoure him with a bold and vndaunted Spirit: hee thrust his Arme into his throat, and held him by the root of the tongue so strongely, that albeit the Lyon did him much harm with his pawes, (whereof he was afterward in daunger of death) yet would he not let goe his hold, vntill the Lyon seemed as quite choaked and strangled, by keeping his Arme so long in his throat. Alexander hauing intelligence thereof, desisted from all further anger and rage against him, and commaunded him to be carefully recovered: holding him (thenceforward) for one of his very chiefeft fauourites, yea, and in such account, as (after the death of Alexander) hee was one in the number of his Successors, & a most powerfull King. CHAP. XXVII.

That the most and greatest part of people in the world, spake at the first but one language onely, which was giuen them by the will of God: And after the destruction of Babell, then it was changed.

Orphyrus, Julian the Apostat Emperour, and other enemies to sacred letters, do confesse with the learned, that from the beginning of the Worldes Creation, as there was but one Man and one Woman: euen so there was likewise but one Language onely, which continued to all the people on Earth, vntill the Deluge; yea, till the destruction of Babell, for seruice of the people which made their abiding thereabout, and (by presumption) had made a Tower, or rather a high mounted causey, to warrant and defend themselves from another flood, if so be there should any other happen. But me-thinks, that the people of those times were very grossely conceited, in seeking to fortifie themselves by such cunning: because it had bene much better to hinder, then to whet on the anger of God.

There was neuer any man found, or heard of, how great an enemy foeuer he was to the holy Scriptures, that could euer render any reason of the variety of Languages, which are spoken in so many Nations: but onely that which Moyse alleadged; to wit, that it was done by the will of God, to the end, that the Earth might be wholly inhabited, as it was before the flood, and the great race of Noah (finding themselves dissemblable in tongues) might therefore disperse themselves abroad. For men deuided not the tongues, but the deuision of tongues deuided Men, neither was it any intention of men, vsed then sufficiently by necessary knowledge of Nature, and by the inuention of Artes and Sciences; but a punishment of God inflicted on mankinde. It is a case very cleare and eident, that Languages are not profitable, but in their diuersity, and and if there were but one onely vsed in the World, it would bee meere vanity to know many: for all the first tongues had diuers originals, and depending (in any thing) one vpon another.

Neuerthelesse, after that Warres began to be moued through the world, the people that were brought into subiection, receiued the Language of the Conquerours. And it is a true marke of Soueraignty, to constraîne the subdued to change their Language; which the Romains much better executed, then any Prince or people whatsoever: wherby they seeme (as yet) to commaund in the most part of Europe. Likewise, the last King of the Hetrurians, being vanquished, did all that the Romaines pleased, but yet he would neuer receiue the Latine toong. And by the like reasons, the Gaules, who spake as the Heluetians (as Glareanus and many other Authours thinke) in the time of Cæsar, as by coniecture may bee gathered in the Commentaries of the saide Cæsar: did afterward learne the Latine Tongue, because they were conquered by the Romaines. After that againe, they spake the language of the Franconiars, a people of Allemaigne, who were mingled among them, by their victories gotten ouer the Romaines. In following time, the Gothes, Vandals, Hunnes, and other people, that ranged thorow the world; left them also their tongues. In brieft, of all these seuerall languages, the Gauls (at this instant called the French) builded and framed one perticuler tongue, euen that which to this day they enioy. So that all the fore-said tongues, haue had their variant changes, in lesse then fiftene hundred yeares, very neere three times each seuerall tongue: for at this day, and so hence-forward, it will bee impossible to vnderstand the language, that hath bene spoken for the space of foure hundred yeares in France.

This hath happened in the very same manner at Rome, and in Italy, since the time of Cicero and before, for he saith; that no man can vnderstand those Hymnes, which the Priests called Salijs, or Saliens sung in their processions; which were composed in Latine, that Language being then there spoken; and very soone after the foundation of Rome: As also the Sibyls Verses, and many other ancient bookes of those times, that contained very sacred things: But being fearefull to offend the Gods; or to induce any novelty in Religion; a matter which draweth after it daily too many calamities: the Senate would haue no other Hymnes to be made; nor that any one should mingle other matter among them, or comment or correct those Bookes of the Sibylles.

It is generally knowne, that the ancient Language which Rome vsed first of all, was pure, delicate; and most eloquent Latine: and now at this day, there is hardly any one word thereof truly retained. The Italian tongue now spoken, declareth in plaine apparance, to haue taken originall and encreasing from Strangers, vpon the Empires declination; especially from such as did most harme to Italy it selfe; to wit; the Gaules, Prouncials, Gothes, Hunnes, Vandals, and other barbarous people, all voyde of humanity; who instead of Trophees, haue left them nothing but words and names, euen the most excellent that they had. It is not vnknowne to vs also, that the Arabians had planted their Language throughout Asia and Affrica; and yet within few yeares, Phillip King of Spain, hath constrained the Moors of Granada, to change both their habite and Language. Peru, commonly tearmed the golden Castile, a very great Prouince, now speaketh no more her naturall Language: for the Spaniard hauing conquered it, hath there planted his Language, although it bee distance thence the space of a thousand and five hundred leagues; euen as hee hath done the like, in all his other conquered Countries, in those Prouinces tearmed the new World.

In the Isle of Malta, they were wont to speak the Punick tongue; to wit, that vsed by the Carthagemans, when they would needes hold superiority ouer the Romaines: and now at this day, the Greek tongue is spoken there, but very corruptly, mingled also with Sicilian. That they had no other Language but the Punick, is easie to be prooued; because it is not about thirty yeares, since there was found engrauen in olde Marble, this which followeth, written in Greek Letters, and yet notwithstanding, the Language seemeth for to bee Hebrew.

Also, as the Foundation of Castle Angelo was laying, there was found vpon an olde Stone of Marble-Iasper, these words engrauen; IEHIEW IEPH-DAIA, and others, which (by the ini-ury of time) were quite defaced. And these latter wordes, were written (for the more part) in Hebrew Letters, and hardly was there found any one, were he Arabe or Iew (who doe surpasse all other Nations in the vnderstanding of terpretation thereof.

Egypt, from the time of Mercurius Trismegistus (Author of that worthy booke tituled Pimander.) that was before Abraham and Moyfes, had a perti-cular Language: a thing yet to this day to be seene, by Bookes written in the Egyptian hand, and in many places of Palestine, in the tongue vsed in those dayes, which (I say) was in the time of the first Kinges that were named Pharaohs, wherein nothing is to be comprehended, neither reade, albeit the Letters are very visible, and not defaced.

Neuerthelesse, at this day they doe not speake that Language, but the Arabian Tongue, without retaining any one word of her auncient tongue:
which is saide to bee graue, brieffe, accompanied with goodly tearmes, and proper to comprehend all Sciences, as all the Easterne partes (well neere) are,
and apt to discourse of Diuine matters; much more then the Greeke, full of ostentation and vanity. Which being well perceiued by that worthy Æsculapius, the fore-named Trismegistus:
he desired of GOD and the King, that his Bookes and Writings might not passe through the Grecians handes, neyther bee translated or commented by them.

Heerewe are to note, that if (at this day) wee haue any Bookes of the ancient Egyptians; they came from the Greekes and Iewes, who traduced them into their Language, when they kept their Schooles, where they taught all Sciences: witnesse Socrates, Plato, Democritus, Xenophon, Philostratus, Iamblicus, Apollonius, and diuers other great personages, who went purposely thither, to be instructed in good Sciences, whereof great account was made in those times. And let vs not forget Moses, the great Law-giuer, who was learned in all the wisdome of the Æ-gyptians: as we may gather by the words of Saint Stephen, in the seventh Chapter of the Actes of the Apostles.

In Palestine, and in Ierusalem, they were wont to speake the Syriake toong now a dayes they speake the Arabian.
Belonius, in his second booke of Singularities, hath noted, that at this day there are spoken twelue feveral toongs in Ierusalem; and yet notwithstanding, as I haue formerly saide, the Arabian tongue is the most common. Greece hath lost her auncient Language, for in the Citties and Townes, the Primitiue tongue is now not spoken: but a new kinde of Language, which the Turkes (since they began to bee Governours there) brought thither with them.
And yet neuerthelesse, in some perti-cular places, they speake Greeke verie vsuallic. But by little and little, as the naturall borne Greekes, by reason of their Princes tyranny, became Vagabonds, and went to seeke out other Countries: euen so they (for the more part) hoping there to meet with better entertainment, made themselues Mahumerists, that is to say; they forooke Christian Religion, and (by the same meanes also) left their Mother tongue, enclining wholly to the Turkish and Arabian; and therefore, before an hundred years can be expired, they wil not speak any more Greeke.

In the Kingdome of Tremissem, otherwise called Telesin, seated on the Coast of Barbarie, in the Mediterranean Sea, they were wont to speake the Phœnician tongue: now-a-daies they doe not retaine any one word thereof, but speake the Morisco Language, because they had beene formerly subdued by the great King Mansor. The cause why this people spake the Phœnician tongue (although they were distant from the Countrey of Phœnicia, verie neere foure hundred Leagues) I will briefely declare, according as Procopius

Sidon, so farre as Ægypt, was heretofore call'd Phœnicia, and such as haue written the History of the Phœnicians, do declare; that sometime one King onely raigned there. In these Countries dwelt the Gergesites, Iebusites, and others, who when they beheld Iosua's great Army comming against them: they passed into Ægypt, but soone after, that Countrey being not able to support the, they went thence into Affrica, where they builded many Townes and Villages, and peopled the Countrey, euen so farre as the Pillars of Hercules, and their language was Phœnician. In Numidia likewise they builded, and (among other Citties) that most strong and firmly seated Citty of Tingitana, where two Colomnes of white stone are to bee seene, neere the great Fountaine, whereon (in the Phœnician tongue) are engrauen these wordes. We are they, who were before that great Brigande Iosuah, the Son of Nun. Such (saith he) was the originall of these people, who are (at this day) called Maurusians, or Mauritians. Their Languages then became wholly changed, by the comming in of other people.

England was wont to haue a particular Language by her selfe, according as Caesar testifieth: but beeing afterward conquered by the Saxons, a people of Germany, they long time kept the Saxon tongue. In following time also, growing frequent with the French, hoping to ouer rule them: they well neere quite changed the Saxon tongue, begetting one Language, consisting partly of French, Danish, Saxon, and Pictish. So that out of all these tongues, they forged one intirely new, and that little aboue three hundred years since. Which hath beene well obserued by venerable Bede, a great Duine, and Sir Thomas Moore, sometime Lord Chancellour, and a very learned Gentleman, and both these Men of the English Nation.

The Polanders, Vandales, Bulgarians, Seruians, Dalmatians, Croatians, Bosnians, Rusians, Valachians, Bohemians, Lituanians, Mescouites, &c. spake the Germane or Tentonticke tongue: but at this day, they speak the Sclauonian language, that is to say, Illyrian, witnesse Ladislatus King of Lituania, who about the yeare 1399. hauing espoused a Virgine, named Anne, the Heire of Poland, that could speak no other Language but the Great nations speake the Illyrian tongue.

Allemaigne, as then in those times it was spoken in Poland: would neuer leaue her company, vntill she had learned the Lictuanian tongue, which shee easily attained vnto in eight months space. The Allemaignes also say, that the language which by them is now vsed, is not their auncient tongue; but is very diuers, and hath borrowed great store of wordes, from people by whom they haue hitherto beene foyled, or ranaged, or by beeing imployed in Warres, as among the Gaules in Italy, Spain, Greece, and the Eastern Countries. Neuer should I growe to any conclusion, if I were to set downe those feuerall people, that haue changed their Language since the Deluge: or prooue, that there is not any Nation at this day, which speaketh the Language of our first Father Adam and Noah. All haue changed, and yet will change, so long as the World endureth; for such is the Nature of vicissitude, in thinges of this world.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Grauing or Caruing, and of Painting: which of them is most ancient and excellent.

IN these times I haue heard of very many different opinions, concerning these two Arts of Statuary or Stonecutting, and Painting; to wit, which of them is most commendable, and best worthy of praise. Very pertinent reasons are alleadged both for the one and other, for in the Statue or Sculpture, there is discerned an artificiall imitation of Nature, representing therein the members wholly, round, well formed, and fully measured, euen as if Nature her selfe had shaped them, and much better imitated then in a Table; where we but behold the superficies and colours, which beguile the eye. For the substance is much neerer to truth, then the resemblance. Beside, Sculpture or engraving, is more difficult, because if a fault be therein committed, very hardlie ly can bee amended: in regard, that the Marble or other matter is not to be pieced or patched, but another figure must of necessity be made. Which falleth not out so in painting, for it may be altered a thousand times, adding thereto, or diminishing, by daily amending. Statues were (in elder times, & yet are to this day) esteemed sacred things, to beautifie Temples or publike places, for the commemoration of famous persons, and such actions of theirs as were heroycall: especially such as we see in the Porches of Temples, and diuers within; which are placed to no other end, but for a remembrance of holy Men or women, that performed many pious deedes, and stood for plantation of the Faith. And for the great respect then made of them, it was permitted (by Emperiall Edictes) to Offenders, and Slaues badly vsed by their Maisters; to haue their enfranchisement, and ease from further persecutions, by holding fast vpon some of those Statues, till audience might bee graunted to their oppressions.

Such as do hold Painting to be more excellent, make their allegations; that thereby is imitated much more truly, the very Nature of the thing so represented, then it can be by the Statue. And that it must needs be so, they produce (for example) that which is written by Plinie, concerning one Zeuxis, a Painter of Heraclea, who presented a Table, wherein hee had painted bunches of Grapes so naturally: that Sparrowes flying by it, stroue to rest on them, and pecked at them, as taking them to be true Grapes indeede, so that his workmanship was reputed to bee both famous and singuler. At another time, the same Zeuxis painted a young Man in a Table, carrying like bunches of Raisine Grapes in a Dish, which were so liuely made: as the Birds were thereby againe deceiued, the Birds likewise descending from the ayre, to peck at them as if they had beene very Raisins, without any feare at all of the young man.

They say moreouer, that Parrhasius, a Painter likewise, and an emulatur of the foresaid Zeuxis, painting a Partridge vpon a Collonne in Rhodes, drew it so naturally according to life: that (in the iudgment of euery beholder) it seemed to be alieue indeed. Nay more, the perfection of painting this Foule was such, and so compleate, that bringing other Partridges before it (such as now adaies are kept in Cages:) they would call vnto it, flutter their Wings before it, and vse their kinde of singing, taking it for a liuely Bird indeede. They yet goe further, saying, that Apelles painted a Horse according to life, and other Painters making prooue in their skill of the like; would needs vrge tryall of the most ablest workmanship. Wherevpon, it was thought fit to bring liuing Horses before him, for better approbation of the experiment, and beeing brought before those figures painted by the other Painters; they stood still, without any shew of account or motion. But when that which Apelles drew was presented before them; they began to stirre, tread, and whinnow, which they did not at the sight of any of the other: whereby, the greatest honour and aduantage in Art, was adiudged to Apelles, and he reputed to bee the most excellent Painter.

Now to speake mine opinion heerein, I say, that (for all these Fables, lesse seeming true, then Pliny writes them) Painting cannot be accounted to be the more excellent Art: For all Creatures that fly in the Ayre, or feede on the earth, or liue in the Water, do nourish themselves, and are more moued by the sence of smelling, then by sight. To approoue the truth hereof, let any man paint a Rat, and draw it neuer so artificially according to life: then let it bee presented before a Cat, to try if she wil stirre, or offer to take it. Let any man also set a Table before Fowles, with painted Capons, Hennes, Cockes, Pigeons, or such like; let there be likewise painted in the Table, Barly, Oates, or any other Corne fit for them to feede on; and try if they moue or come to touch it. Let any Painter portraite a Ginne or Snare, with either a Goose, Lambe, or any other prey surprised in the Snare, counterfeited by Art most naturally; and then make triall, if a Wolfe or Foxe will offer to lay holde on it, which indeede they would doe, if they had life.

In like manner, let there be painted in a Table a goodly Mare, formed with all all features neereſt to life, then bring a Stallion before it, and try if he will offer to cover her. Let there be also in the same Table a goodly fielde, with diuers Horses feeding at pasture; and try if he will beare them company. Shew to any Horse painted Prouender, and try if he will whinnow to haue it: which naturally he will do, if he be in his Stable, although there be none at all offered to his sight. By these Allegations I would plainly shew, that Creatures (of these kinds) do not so much moue themselves by sight, as by sense of smelling; and that all which Pliny hath saide of these Paintings, are meere fables, for these Creatures haue no knowledge of Paintings.

It serueth to no purpose, to say, that the Painters of these daies, are not so sufficiēt, neither do make such exquisite workes, as those in former times did. I answer, that there are men as excellent euery way, & that wil not giue ground in any iot, to the very best before them. For, there are yet to be seene in these daies, both Paintings and Statues of ancient Grecians, Romaines, Egyptians, and other Leuantines; which come nothing neere (by much) in perfection to things done by Painters and Statuaries of our time. I dare make them my Iudges, who, being curious in the sight of such thinges, and trauiailing thorow lower Germany; haue visited the Chambers and cabinets of many famous houses, as also in France and Italy, and what else is to be seene in Churches.

There is another History alleadged, borrowed likewise out of the same Plinies shop, that Parrhasius deceived Zeuxis by a Table, whereon nothing else was painted but a Curtaine, and it beeing presented to Zeuxis, to yeeld his iudgement of the workmanship; he offered to draw the Curtaine, to behold what was figured vnder it. I answer, that this History, how true soeuer it be, & whether it so hapned or no, may make painting to be much more commendable; then all the other Fables formerly deliuered from Pliny. For as man is the least of all creatures, in exquisite perfection of sense, and that often deceiueth himselfe, in the senses of sight, touching, tast, and smell; yea, euen in iudgement, especially when he is detained by a precipitation, or passion of Spirit, and then apprehendeth one thing for another: euen so might it then fall out with Zeuxis, in regard of the enuy he bare to Parrhasius.

Having confuted these fables alleadged by Pliny, which serue onely for the praise of Painting: I will now set down some reasons of mine owne, whereby I wil approue Painting, beyond Caruing or Grauing. In Statues or Carued Figures, there are many thinges defectiue, which cannot faile in Painting, and principally day-light and shaddow; because flesh yeildeth a different light, from that which Marble or stone affordeth, and that the Painter imitateth, with clearnesse or obscurity, more or lesse, according as the thing requireth, which the Image-maker cannot performe. And yet notwithstanding, though painting doth not make the Figure round: yet it sheweth the muscles and members in rounded shape, so that they are discerned; as ioyned to those parts which cannot be seene, & by such apt meanes; as it is easily knowne, that the Painter vnderstands and perfectlie knowes them. And heerein is required another artifice more great, in forming the members that lengthen or shorten, according to the proportion of sight, by reason of perspective; which by the power of lines and measure of colours, day-light and shaddowes, doe shew in their superficies on a plaine wall, neere or farre-off; more or lesse, as himselfe pleaseth.

Nor is the true imitation of naturall colours, a matter of such smal moment as some do imagine, in counterfeiting flesh, shape of Garments, and all other thinges requiring colours. And yet the Caruer cannot doe this; much lesse expresse and represent the gracious sight of the eye, black, green, or otherwise, with the splendour of amorous beames, or in Colour full of reuenge. The Caruer also knowes not how to discover the beames of the Sunne, Lightning, Thunders, and other such like thinges; as faire Lockes of Haire; nor the goodly troopes of armed forces, nor a darkesome night; nor a tempest on the Sea; nor a flath of Lightning, nor stormie Windes, nor the besieging of a Citty, nor the Suns rising in the morning, or Aurora her selfe, (bringing bright day) in her colours like Roses, disparkled with radiances of gold and purple. Briefely, he cannot represent Heauen, Earth, Seas, Mountaines, Forrests, Fields, Gardens, Riuer, Cities, nor Houses, all which the Painter can perfectly shew. It is also wel known, that if a Painter apply his colours vpon a carued statue, whatsoeuer it be; it will appeare so much the more commendable. In this respect, me thinks that painting is a more Noble Science, and of much greater artifice, then Caruing or Grauing, and I think that our ancients held it in great reputation, & as highly as other things: albeit, both these Arts do seeme to issue out of one & the same fountaine, because that in both the one and other; Geometry is very requisite, for the vnderstanding of perspective. This Science appeares to me, not to be mechanicall, because it is very conuenable, & may well be vsed by any Gentleman. I remember I haue read, that our auncient predeceffours, especially throughout all Greece, would haue Noble mens children enstruced in schools in the art of painting, as a Science most honest, and very necessary. It was admitted in the first degree of the liberall Arts, and soone after defended by publicke Edict, that it should not be taught to Slaues or Seruants.

Among the Romaines, Painting was held in great honor, and thence it deriued a most Noble sir-name, euen from the House of the Fabij; for the first Fabius was sir-named the Painter, because he was (indeede) a very excellent Painter. And so much was he addicted to painting, that hauing painted the wals of Templum Salutis; he placed there his owne name; as thinking, that although he was deriued of a noble house, honored with many Titles, Consulships, triumphes, and other dignities; albeit he he was learned, well read in the lawes, & numbred amongst the best Orators: yet he was of the mind, that hereby he might (neuertheless) encrease his renowne, by such an especiall splendour and ornament, and left it to memory, that he was a Painter.

Moreouer, many other are recorded of noble houses, that haue bin famous in this art, in which, beside the Nobility

& Dignity therof; many commodities are thence deriued. Especially in the time of wars, for designing and portraing Countries, scituations of Riuer, Bridges, Castles, Fortes, and such like thinges: which thus may be described to others, euen as if they were exactlie imprinted in memory, which otherwise were a difficult thing to do. I conclude then by this discourse, that the Art of sculpture or caruing, is much inferiour to painting: yea, and it will be of much longer continuance, if it bee kept in a dry place, and wel sheltred from winds and raine, and the longer it lasteth, so much the more pleasing it is to behold.

CHAP. XXIX.

Against such aged persons, as think nothing to be well done, but what was performed by themselves in their youth; blaming extremely the present times, and what is now done, in respect of the former; And what is the cause thereof.

HAuing many times considered, (and not without great admiration) whence such an error ensueth, which verily may be beleued, to be proper and naturall to aged people; because it is commonly noted in them, that they doe wholly (as it were) commend times past, condemning the present, and blaming our maners, actions, & whatsoeuer else they themselves did not in their younger daies; Affirming also, that all good customes, behavior of life, all vertue, and all thinges grow worse and worse: Truely, it seemeth to me a matter farre off from reason; nay more, very maruailous, that mature and ripe age should wander so strangely. For long experience begetteth custome, & (in sollemne allowance) presumeth to iudge perfectly of men. And yet herein their iudgments were so much corrupted, as they neuer perceiued, how the world began daily to impaire, and that the Fathers were better then their children; a very long time remaining, to arriue at the vttermost degree of wickednes, times still declining from better to worse. And yet notwithstanding all this, we behold it daily, a vice proper and

and peculiar to age, euen as it hath bin in former daies; so to continue still among vs lining. Which hath bene knowne and made manifest, by the writings of many very ancient Authours, and especially by the Comicks, who (much better then any other) expressed the true Image of humane life. Therefore I conceiue, that aged people hold this false opinion, because our yeares coasting away so swiftly, as they carry hence many other commodities; so (among others) they rob vs of our blood, and a great part of our vitall Spirits. In regard wherof, our complexion changeth it selfe, and the bodies Organes become feeble, that should exercise the vertues of the Soule.

And this is the cause, that in these our instant daies, the delicate and sweet floures of contentment doe fall from our heartes, as Leaues doe from the Trees in Autumne, and, in stead of clear and free thoughts; obscure, troubled, melancholly, and sad conceits get entrance, accompanied with a thousand calamities. So that, not onely the Body, but the Spirit also becometh sick, which retaineth not any iot of our passed Spirits, except a long remembrance, and Image of that acceptable time of youth: which wee perswading our selues to finde againe, it appeareth then to vs, that Heauen, Earth, and all things else are glad therof, and do smile at them (verily) in our sight; resolving our thoughts, that in them (as in a faire and goodly Garden) the sweet Spring time of ioyfulness still flourisheth. In which respect, perhaps it would proue profitable, when (already) in a cold and backward season, the Sunne of our life beginneth to decline to wardes the West, in despoyling vs of our pleasures: that we would also (there-with) loose the remembrance of them, and finde (as Themistocles said) A Science instructing how to forget them. Because the fences of our body are so fallacious; that oftentimes themselves do beguile the iudgement of the spirit.

And therefore it seemeth to me, that aged people are of their condition, who setting forth from any Port or Hauen, doe still fixe their eyes vpon the Land: whereby they conceit, that the Shippe moueth not, but that the land & houses are in motion, which neuertheless is quite contrary. For the Hauens, as also the time; and former or present pleasures, continue still in their wonted estate, and we (with the Ship of mortality) saile away; we coast on one after another, thorow this impetuous Sea; that deuoureth all things. Nor are we euer permitted to take landing againe; but being continually tossed by contrary winds, our vessell runs and breaks it selfe against one Rocke or other.

The Spirit (then) of a man waxing old, a subiect contrary to all kind of pleasures; it cannot apprehend any tast of them. And, as all sorts of Wines, although they be neuer so good, seeme bitter to such as are troubled with a Feuer, in regard that the tast is changed, onely by the meanes of corrupted humors: euen so in aged people, by reason of their indisposition (albeit there is no defect in desire) all pleasures seeme vntauory, cold, and far differing from such as they remember once to haue essayed; and yet those pleasures (in themselves) are the very same which they were wont to be. And because they finde themselves to be deprivied of those pleasures; they complaine and blame the pretime, as if it were naught, neuer considering, that this mutation proceedeth from themselves, and not from the time.

On the contrary, when they sit down, & call to memory their passed delights; they then likewise remember the time wherein they enioyed them, and (in that respect) repute them to be good, because it appeared then, and so doth yet, that they brought a sweete relish with them; which they (yet) remember to haue felt when they had them. For, in effect, our thoughts doe hatefully condemne all things, that haue bin companions with our displeasures; and loue all them that haue suted with their likings. In which regard, it happens sometime, that we see an amorous Fellow, take great delight to behold a Window, although it be shut against him: yet hee conceiueth a liking thereof, because (in former time) he had the fauour thereto gaze on his Lady, or loues Mistris. In like manner, to see a Jewell, a Letter, a Garden, or any other thing whatsoever; that seemeth (as yet) to be a testimony, to former effected pleasures:

whereas on the contrary, a goodly, faire, and rich adorned Chamber, will appeare hatefull to him, that hath been imprisoned therein, or that there hath suffered any disliking.

Strange humors in some Men and women.

I haue knowne some, who (by no meanes) would drinke in a Cup that resembled some other Cup, wherein (being sick) they receiued a medicine. For, as the window, or the Ring, or the Letter, representeth to the one party, a sweete remembrance, which to him is the more acceptable, by how much it appeareth still a pertaker of his former enioied pleasure: euen such is the other parties conceit, that the Chamber, or the Cup, are still fresh Ensignes of his imprisonment, or sicknesse. I think, that for the very same reason men (in years) are moued to commend passed times, and throw blamefull asperitions on the present. By means whereof, in speaking of Watres, Courts of Iustice, or those belonging to Princes, & such like, they affirme: that those in their time, and wherof they do yet bear remembrance; were much more excellent, and filled with more singuler men, then they are which at this instant they daily behold.

The reason of aged peoples reproving present times.

So soone as such cases doe come in question, they presently begin to exalt infinitely, the people that liued in their former times, and declare, that (in those elder daies) it could not bee found, but very rarely, that a man committed a murder; that then were any combats or fights, ambushes or treacheries: but an assured honesty and faithfulness, an amiable and loyall iustnesse among al Men. That in Courts (in those times) reigned so many good manners, & such a perfect honesty: that all Courtiers were then religious, and Saintes; that they would not take part with any man, who had offered a bad word to another, or had vsed any signe of dishonesty to a Woman of Honour.

The prayes giuen by aged people to former times.

On the contrary, they say, that now in these daies, they behold all things to bee quite opposite to the former, and that not onely among Courtiers, men of warre, and young people, brotherly affection is lost, and al laudable manner of liuing: but also in Courts and Cities, now raigneth nothing but enuies, euill will, wicked manners, and a life most dissolute, abounding in all kindes of vices. That Women are lasciuious, haue lost all shame, and men (for the more part) are become effeminate. Moreover, they blazon their garments to be dishonest, and ouer pompous. In breece, they reprehend a number of things, among which (truely) there are some that wel deserue reprehension, because it cannot be denied; but that there are (among vs) many bad and wicked men, by whose meanes, this present world must needs be fuller of errours, then that which these good people so highly commend.

Some faults that merit reprehension.

It appeareth to me, that they doe ill discern the cause of this difference, and declare themselues to be meere fooles; in that they would now haue the world to be wholly good, without any euill remaining in it, which is a matter vtterly impossible. For, euill being contrary to goodnesse, and goodnesse to euill: it appeareth euen necessary (as it were) that by a certaine kinde of repugnancie and contrariety; y^a, by a manner of counterpoise; the one should sustaine and strengthen the other. In such sort, that the one failing, or encreasing; the other likewise should encrease, or run to ruine, because there is no contrarie, without another.

An answer made to these complaints.

No contrary, but it hath another.

A reason for the present annoyances.

Who doth not know, that no Iustice could be found in the world, if ther were not grieuances, iniuries, & oppressions? No magnanimity, if there were not pusillanimity? No continence, if there were not incontineny? No health, if sicknesse had not his course? No truth, if ther were not lying & falshood? Nor any felicity or happinesse, if there were not fals and misfortunes? For this cause Socrates said well with Plato; He meruailed very much, that Æsop had not made a Fable, feigning therein, why God did not write pleasure and greefe together, tying them to such extremities, as the beginning of the one, might be the ending of the other. For we doe euidentlie behold, that no pleasure would at any time be acceptable, if sorrow had not gone before it.

The saying of Socrates and Plato.

The goodnes of al things is approued by the harme of their contraries.

What is he that could discern, how precious quiet rest and repose is, if first he haue not felt the pain of trauaile and wearinesse? Who could tell, what the benefit is of eating, drinking, and sleeping, if first he had not endured hunger, thirst, and watchings? Let mee tell yee then, then, that passions and diseases are giuen to men by nature, not principally to make them subiect thereto, for it would seeme very inconuenient, that she who is the Mother of all, should (by her counsell and wisdom) send vs many harms: But nature hauing made health, pleasure, and other good things: sends after them sicknesse, displeasure, and other annoyances. For all vertues being first graunted to the world, by the free gift and fauour of Nature: afterward immediatly, all vices, by a contrary concathenation or combination, follow as their companions or attendants. So that the one encreasing, or decaying; she is compelled to grant (in this manner) that the other also shall encrease, or grow to defaylance.

Wherefore, when old men do extol the passed times, affirming, that no men were then so vicious, as now they are in these daies: they may also alledge their ignorance, whether then such vertuous men were to be found, as many are well approoued to be at this day. Nor is there any matter of maruaile heerein, because there is no euill so great; as that which springeth from the seede of corrupted goodnes. And for this cause, Nature producing now great store of Spirits, of much better temper then before they were, as such who of themselves haue turned to goodnesse: hath performed a better workmanship, then in those times (shee did) whereof they talke so much, euen as they that turne to euill, doe so much the worse. We may not then say, that such as cease to doe euill (because they know it not) do in this case deserue any praise: for although they haue sildome committed any harme, yet (notwithstanding) they would haue done much more if they could.

Now, that the Spirits of those precedent times in generall, were much inferior to them lately or now liuing: may sufficiently be knowne, by all matters obserued of them: as well in learning, as in Painting, Statues, Buildings, and in all other things. And yet Men of yeares, doe reprove and blame many things in vs, which are not (of themselves) cyther good or euill, onely because that they (in those daies) did them not. They say, it is not fit for a young man, to ride on his Foot-cloath Nagge thorow the Cittie, but especially not on a Mule; or to weare any skinnes of Furies in Winter; or a long Gown in the Spring time; or any bonnet, vlesse the Man haue attained to the age of eightene yeares. And other such like things, wherein (truely) they greatly discontent themselves, because that such Customes (beside the commodity and benefit they affoord) haue been brought in by vse, and are as pleasing now to euery one, as then men delighted to goe in Cassockes or lackets, with open shooes, and close Breeches. And for a man to shew himselfe a Gallant, he must carry a Hawke on his Fist all day to no purpose; daunce, without holding his Mistresse by the hand; and vse many other fashions, which were then much esteemed: but now doe appeare to be grosse and vnbesitting. These are most of their foundest reasons, why the customes of these times should not be obserued, but remaine still to the calumnies of aged folke, extolling themselves, by saying: Twenty yeares and more were past with mee, and yet I slept with my Mother and Sisters, and knew not (in long time after) what a Woman was. But now, Boyes, almost as soone as they be borne, know more naughtinesse, then the tallest Men could reach vnto in those daies. When they vtter these speeches, they doe not perceiue; how strongly they confirme, that the very Children of our time, haue much more spirit, then aged Men had in those daies. And that was well noted by Horace the Poet, in his time, speaking of our auncients, to this effect: They commend whatsoeuer themselves did in their youth; and will haue young people to forme their liues by their Age. But I purpose to shew more pericularly in the following Chapter, the grossnesse of people in those forepassed times, and the subtilty of braue Spirits in young men of these daies.

CHAP. XXX.

A comparison betweene the Buildings, Feastes, Garments of Men and Women, Armes, and manner of making warre, in the daies of our fore-fathers, and those that are vsed in these our times.

Ourpredeceffors forme of building, very grosse & rude

WE will begin, without vsing any other preamble, with those Buildinges, which were made in the daies of our fore-fathers; consisting of nothing but very thicke wals, bad Windows, continually beaten with winds and stormes; chambers subiected one to another; the vaults or houses of Office, euermore in the most eminent places of the House, which ought to be much further off, both from the nose & eyes: imitating nature, who hath placed those partes in our bodyes, through which our vncleannesse is to be auoyded, farre enough off from the eyes and Nose. Of this fashion, and in such manner of building, it is no long time since, that the more part of Mafons and Worke-men shaped Castles, being places of pleasure, and Countrey houses of pleasure, in no other kinde of constructure. But within an hundred yeares, or there-about, a great part of them are demolished: and (in stead of them) others erected, after our Moderne manner, much more commodious, and of lesse cost, in regard of the time.

The Feasts & Banquets of our elders.

The first seruice.

The second seruice.

Some-what let vs say, concerning their Feasts and Banquets, and obserue in what manner they were ordered. The meate serued into the Table, was alwaies in great Chargers, filled with Pease and Bacon; Gammons of Bacon; huge Neats toongs salted; great pieces of Beefe, boyled Poultry, with pottage about them; boyled Mutton, Veale, & other grosse food, common (almost) in euery ordinary family; and they gorged in these Victuals, so long as they could cram any more into their bellies. Afterward, they brought in other meats, answerable to the former, but roasted and larded (oftentimes) with vnsauory lard, but it would serue for Pigs and Hares. After this second seruice had stood awhile on the Table, well-neere to no effect: then came in more dainty meats of Foules; as Mallards, wilde Duckes, Ringdoues, young Pigeons, Partridges, woodcocks, Quailes, Pheasants, woodhennes, Plouers, Turtles, and others of like kinde: which are carried away (like the second seruice) almost neuertoucht, for they (good men) had filled their stomackes with the first course meates, feeding hungerly on them, and drinking sower wines, such as Summer marreth, so they left the best and daintiest meates indeede, for their Varlets and base Seruants to feede on. Was not this a verie lourdery and blockishnesse, to vse their meates in this grosse manner? The Maisters ate nothing but the very heauiest meates of all, and their Knaues did feede on the lightest, most exquisite, and best for digestion. Let it then be helde no matter of maruaile, if those men had grosse and heauy Spirits, because, according to the opinion of Plato: Our manners do follow the temperature and quality of the Chylus, or white iuyce, of the digested meates which we vse to eat.

The third and best seruice comes last of al, and serueth for none but base groomes to feede on.

The saying of Plato.

Feasts vsed now adaies.

But in these daies, this manner of furnishing the Table at Feastes and meetings, is no more vsed: for in well gouerned houses, they serue in both boyld and roasted meates, grosse and delicate together, that each man may eat according to his appetite, or what he best liketh vpon the boord. For (vnder submission to better iudgement) I thinke it no way fitting, that the seruant should feed on the finest, and his Maister on the coursest; the Knaue serued like a Lord, and his commauder like a Buffone.

Bonnets vsed in auncient time, of very heauy weight

Proceed we now to mens garments. First, the head, hauing bush naturall (as they tearme it) a huge deale of haire on it; must haue as big a Bonnet to couer it; which (in those daies) were cald spanish Bonnets, hauing a turning vp behind, double fringed with red, and this turning vp contained halfe an Elle of woollen-cloath. I haue seene one of the in Paris, that weighed foure pound and sixe ounces. Another fashion they had, more honest and lighter, tearmed the Crosse-Bow-Cap; yet with seauen or eight Elles of Riband about it: This ponderous wearing (in my minde) did nothing nothing els but dull the braine.

Their Doublets (I meane for the better sort of men) were of leather or course Linnen Cloath behind; and before, of Woosted, or Serge of Arras, which serued halfe the Breast, and so on the armes likewise; yet some (from the Elbowe to the Wrists) vsed to weare Veluet or Satin. This kinde of Doublet, the Frenchmen tearmed Nichil-au-dos, Nothing Behinde, and it was cut according vnto the fashion of Weomens Gownes nowe adayes, that shewes their Breastes naked. The Weomen also in those dayes, had their plaited Collors, wrought with silke, either Blacke or Red, and they were fastened behinde the necke and Shoulders with Silke-Laces: so that they hidde and kept close that which was fairest, & wold haue made them most gracefull. Mens Hose or Breeches, answered in length to their short skirted Doublets, being made close to their limbes; wherein they had no meanes for Pockets. But in stead thereof, they hadde a large and ample Cod-piece, which came vpp with two wings, and so were fastned to eyther side with two Pointes. In this wide roome, they had Linnen bagges, tied with like Points to the inside, betweene the Shirte and Cod-piece. This serued as the receipt for Purse, Hand-kerchers, Apples, Plummes, Peares, Orenge, and other fruits. But did it not seeme verie Inciuill, that sitting at the Table, hee should make a present of such, preferud (for some time) in so sweet a Closset, euen as now adayes, some (as mannerly) vse the like out of their Pockets? As for papers, Letters, and such like, which they ordinarilie receiued, they were to put them in their Hat-bandes, or weare them at their Girdles, like Gloues: wher hung also a great Pouch, made fast with a Ring and Locke of Iron, waighing three or foure pound waight, and oftentimes no money at all in it. Surely, in my poore opinion, the fashion of Pockets made in the Doublet Sleene, or in the hose, is much more honest and commendable.

Leauing their high and vnhandfom Shooes, let vs speake a little of weomens habits then vsed wherein I meane not to be tedious. The Attire on the Head, was of great broad Wollen Cloath, of Red or Violet colour, set out with stickes of Woode, and made in the forme of a Suger-loafe. Her Gowne was verie large and plaited; and the Sleeues thereof so wide, that a Lambe might easilie leape into them. A Traine also was fastned to this Gowne, which commonly contained six paces in length. At assemblies and meetings of Weomen, as the rest, so did shee let fall her Traine, dragging it after her in Halles, Churches, perhaps ouer Dunghils, and other vnfaoury filthines. Preparing to Daunce, or some other delight, it was taken vp againe, though it serued to no purpose; and then made fast behind, either with a Tach-hooke of Siluer, or a Buton of Golde, or of Iuorie. This Garment was not made without great charge, and was verie painfull also to her that did weare it. For, I haue heard aged Weomen (of very honorable houles, that liued in those times, and vsed the same habite) credibly report; that they haue knowne and seene some weomen, who were meerly stifled vnder such long trained Gownes.

Moreouer, were it Winter or Summer, in regard of honour, they also were furred with Ermins, Martines, or Sables. I forbear to speake of their heauie Vardingales, worne vnder those long & waighty Gownes; the Fore-part whereof, was couered with Silke, or Cloth of gold or Siluer, & all the rest was course Buckram or Canuas. At Night, when they haue gone to bed, their bellies and thighs haue bene greenously chafed and flaid, by reason of so heauie a waight; and extremity of heate.

As for the defensue Armes then vsed, which was Harnesse; were they not (beyonde comparison) more massie and heauie, then those that now adayes wee warre withall? Neuerthelesse, they were commonly pierced with Arrows, Darts; and Quarries of Crosse-bowes, which in those times were their best weapons. But in these daies, they are so well made and yet not (by three parts) so waighty, that they will resist a Musket shotte. The like is to be vnderstood of their Swords, and other Weapons of Defence: for, in one Sword of their vse, there was more stufte, then now we haue in three; & yet they will perfourme as much, nay more, then theirs then did.

It hapned inanie times, that in their Sword-fight, the one man stepping aside for aduantage, the other smiting at him; the the verie waight of the Swords fall, hath smote it into the ground, so that he could not easily recover it, but stode vnto the mercy of his enemy. If we trauele yet thorow some partes, in auncient Castles or Fortresses, or Armories of long continued Citties; some of these vnwealdie weapons are daily to be seene.

They neuer made Warre but foure moneths in the yeare, or sixe at the most: after which time, both the one side and other withdrew themselves till Winter was past and gone. This course is quite contrarie vnto that which is to be done in the time of Warre: For, in Winter is the fittest season, and then doe our best warlike spirits performe the best exploit of Warre. Then are surprizals aptest, in regard of long Nights, when Ri- uers and Ditches (being filled with Waters) are strongly frozen. Then dooth a good Captaine take occasion, to make his attempt vpon some place, either to surprize it by scaling, or otherwise. For, then the Spies, Sentinelles, and Watch, are more subiect to sleepe, then at other times. And so much the rather, because (vsually) that mens Bellies are better fed in this season; then other-whiles they are, in regard of the plentie of Victualls, which makes the bodie sleepe and sloth- full. Likewise, by the fauour of Long Nightes, a great deale of Ground is easily ridden, and the Enemy set vpon, when himselfe least surmizeth it, without much effusion of Bloode, with lesse Companie of Men, and weakest Charges.

In those Elder dayes, they thought it a great offence and dishonor, to surprize an Enemy vnprouided: but he must haue a day assigned him, when hee pleased to accept the Battaile: and this was the reason, why wars continued so long a time. But we see quite contrarie, that Warre now commeth sooner to an end, by compelling the Enemy to come to fight, and prouiding polliticke Ambuscadoes for him: in imitation of Hunters & Woodmen, when they chase wilde and vnruely Beasts, that will neuer yeild, except they be enforced thereto. For, if they escape, they wil continually returne to their first bad Nature.

It was a Custome helde in those former Battailles, and verie often obserued, that when men were wearie with Fighting (beeing oppressed with the heauie load of troublesome Harnesse, Coates of Maile and Brigandines, where-with their bodies were couered, besides their maksie and waightie Swords) they should go repose themselves to take breath, yea, (many times) to eate and drink, and then returne to the fight again. As the French men did on the day of battell, before the City of Alexandria, about the yeare one thousand three hundred ninety one, which day they then lost, with Count John John d'Armignac their chiefe.

In those times, battails continued the space of a day; and if they were not then concluded, they went to it again the next morning, to know who then should be Superior. This was more for honor many times, then any profit ensuing therby, and to haue Songs afterwarde made of their sloth and negligence. But in these dayes, within two or three houres (commonly) the battell is won or lost, as I my self haue obserued in five fought battels, where I stood not as an ydle spectator: & the like haue I heard in other places, performed by the best and most approoued Captaines of these times.

What shall wee say of their Duello, Combate, or single fight, betweene man and man? It was commonly performed with Swordes, teamed two-hand swordes, without standing vpon anie warrantable Guard; but both parts meeting resolutely on foote; the one receyuing a stroake, while his Enemy stood waiting for another, without any couerture. For, euen like two Smiths beating vpon an Anuile, euen such was their behauiour, smiting alternatiuely; vsing then nothing but cut and slash, without any foine or thrust.

In our daies, this kinde of fight endureth but a moment of time, for nothing is vsed but Estocados: so that vwithin three or foure thrusts, the deadly combat is concluded. For Breuities sake, I omit many other remarkeable thinges: as that they would eat no kind of flesh, except it had some strange fauor, like Venison and wilde beasts. Now albeit these viands were dangerous to health, yet I refer it to all mens iudgments: for it is most certaine, that vse of such foode infecteth the heart, and is the cause of dissenterie. themselves respectively : must Learne much better directions, and imitate the worthy inventions of these daies, leaving those grosse absurdities (for the most part vnprofitable) of our Elders, which themselves approved and esteemed, but verie slenderly to any purpose.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Antiquity of Fraternities, Brotherhoods, Fellowships, Societies, or Companies: And to what end they were at first instituted.

THE first Princes and Law-makers, that had not as yet discovered the difficulties, how to maintain their subjects by iustice; permitted fraternities, Colledges, & Communities, the end, that the partes and members of one body (in a Common-wealth) beeing at Vnity, the whole Common-wealth it selfe might be the more easily governed. As wee may perceiue Numa did, a King and Law-maker amongst the first, who established Fraternities and Colledges, of all Trades and Occupations, and to each Brother-hood, he appointed certain Patrons, Priests, and perticular Sacrifices, after the Sabines name was abolished, that deuided it selfe somewhat from the Romaines.

Lycurgus also, not only gaue the same permission, but likewise strictly commanded the good entertainment of such Communities, aswell generall as perticular, & that all the Subjects should take their refection in those Colledges, from fifteene dayes, to fifteene dayes: and he cald such Assemblies in Greek, φιλιτια or φιλαιτιω, a Parsimonia, that is to say, of living Friggally, in regard of the amity they hadde sworne one to another, as also in all the Citties of Greece.

There were likewise of the like Fraternities, which were called εταιριαις. As in Italy, the selfsame Colledges were called Sodalitia, for Vnion, Frequentation, and Amity, which they helde together, eating and drinking (in one Assembly)

the most part of their time: and hauing no other Iudges but themselves. If there grew any difference among these Companions in Society: they knew that amity was the sole foundation of all Societies, and to be much more requisite amongst men, then Iustice. For Iustice who is neuer pittifull, but holdes on her direct course: oftentimes maketh friends enemies, and Amity giuing way to her Seuerity, establisheth true naturall Iustice. Considering, that the sole aime of all lawes Diuine and Humain, is to maintain loue amongst men, and the loue of men towards GOD, which could neuer be compassed, but by frequent and sociable Conuersation, and ordinary vnity.

The verie same we may see in the law of God, the Feast of Easter to be recommended in the company of ten, to tenne persons; beside the Feast of Tabernacles and ordinary bankets of sacrifices, which God commanded to be solemnized with all ioy and gladnesse, which were entertained in the Primitiue Church of Christians, who oftentimes made such Feasts, which they called ἀγαπαί, for the Kisses of Piety and Charitable embracements, which one gaue vnto another: besides the fraction; and ordinarie Communicating.

This Order is yet better kept in Swetia, then in any place of the world: For, in all Citties and Townes, Fraternities and Occupations haue their Common Houses, where they keepe their Feastes and Banquets; and there is no Village so little, but it hath a Common house only for this purpose, wher (continually) suits, Quarrels, and Contentions, are louingly concluded; and the sentence is Written downe with White Chalke, vpon the Table where they haue Banketted, in token of a white & pure ending of all strifes whatsoeuer. It were very necessary, that such an honest Custome should be euery where vsed: for it woulde prevent great expences and charges, bestowed in frivulous and idle pleadings, whereby infinite persons are vtterly vndone.

And euen in like manner as at Roine, according to the Institution of Numa, artificers, Merchants, Priests, Bishops, & all sorts of men had their Fraternities, and certaine Gods for their Patrons (as Mercury was assigned to the Merchantes, Apollo to Priests, and the like to others, after

Brotherhoods of whippers.	Herodotus (who liued before Rome was builded) writeth, that there were certain Societies of men in Egypt, who would beate and whip themselves so long as the Sacrifice endured, when they immolated a Cowe to their God Apis . Romulus hauing entered into alliance with Tatius , K. of the Sabines , instituted a number of Priests, which were cald the Tatian Fraternity. The said Romulus made himselfe one of a Brother-hood, which was called Amaux , that is to say, belonging vnto the Fielde, whereof hee was the Twelste man.	10 thus to the Lupercall Brother-hood, to be made fruitful. Marke Anthony the Emperor, he was one of this fraternity, in the yeare, 700. after it was instituted, & ran starke naked through the Citty, as the other did. Iulius Copiolinus saith, that many Brotherhoods were made at Rome , after the decease of Emperors, whom the Senate (in a manner) deified. As, in regard of Augustus , the Fraternities were called Augustales , and Flauiales , after the Family of the Flauians . Aurelians and Antonians , in respect of Aurelius and Antonius , Emperors.	Plut. in vit. de Cesar. Tertul. in Apol. Cornel. Tacitus.	About the time of Romes first foundation, because manie VVolues liued then thereabout, which destroyed the Cattle, so that great losses were dayly receyued: the Romaines , who were onely but fillie warlicke Shepherds, instituted a fraternitie, and associated many men together, electing God Pan to be the chief Patron, to the end, that vnanimately, and with one consent (when occasion required) they might oppose themselves against the VVolues ; this was their first foundation. Not long after, neere vnto Mount Palatine , they founde a Litter of younge VVolues , which hauing destroyed: they afterward builded there a field Temple, dedicated to their God and Patron Pan , according as then their power and ability serued them. This Fraternity kept their Celebration anually, and the Brothers went naked, running thorow the Citty, holding long strappes of Goates skines in their handes, wherewith they vsed to lash their bodies. The women among them, such as were barren, would (in like manner) strike themselves on the palmes of their handes; and verily beleued, that these superstitious Ceremonies would cause them to become fruitfull. As may be noted in Iuuenall , thus mocking a woman:	20 Tertullian , Byshop of Carthage , in the time of great persecutions and of Paganisme, beholding certain Brother-hoods to be made among the Pagans, carrying meats into the Temples, performing of Sacrifices, eating together, and giuing to the poore: hee admonished the Christians to doe the like, but not to meddle with any reuerence to the Gentiles gods, only they should continue firme in the Christian Faith. And it is verie likelie, that Popes, Byshoppes, and other holy men, haue perswaded the Christians to immitate those Assemblies and Fellow-ships: for continuance of praier to God, and censuring and separating one from another, when it should truly be known, that some one among them, had doone an acte vnbeseeming the name of a christian. Also, to conferre amiably amongst themselves, if any strifes or contentions had happened in the Company; then to accord such differences by their Pietie and Loue, rather then to plead those distastfull matters before Iudges; keeping purposely an Informer among them, onely to accuse such delinquentes. They would conclude amongst themselves, to redeeme prisoners for debts, and pursue the deliuerance of prisoners for their Faith; leuying a Collection of such sums of money, as should easily compasse this businesse. Also to giue aide and assistance to Christians, being in persecution, and forced from place to place: contributing for reliefe of the poor, comforting helpleffe VViddewes and Orphanes, giuing them food, cloathing, and maintenance, To marry and lend helpe to poor maids, in some competent and reasonable dowries; prouiding for the Funerals of needy people, dying in necessity, or beeing martyred, not hauing any thing lefte to burie	Good examples are worthy imitation.

burie them withall, but onely referred to their care and mercy.

Some Brother-hoods learned of those saide Pagan Aegyptians, to whippe themselves; and do practise yet to this day, yea euen to effusion of bloud, to subdrie their bodies (as they say) enclined to voluptuousnesse; and this they do twice or thrice weekely: Others more rarely, according to their Deuotion. These Fraternities haue stiled themselves Niniutes, because they finde in the Sacred Scripture, that the Inhabitants of Niniuy, being warned by the Prophet Jonas, that they should be destroyed for their sinnes: heereon they became verie penitent, put on sackcloath and ashes, and chastised their bodies, to appease the wrath of God.

The first Society or Fraternitie made among Christians (so farre as my iudgement reacheth) was in Ierusalem, where the euer-blessed Virgin Marie, the Mother of Iesus, all the Apostles, and many other, as well weomen as men, Disciples of Iesus-Christ, met together, and were in number about fixe score, after he was exalted vp into Heauen, where they receyued the Holy-Ghost, and afterwards, remaind long time in their Brotherhood and assembly.

I will not say, that both Holy and vertuous assemblies haue not bene abused, vnder pretence of Piety and religion, because it is long since, that it hath bin too well noted in Italy, when the factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines were vnder full faile, labouring with one consent (vnder the pretence of fraternity) quite to exterminat one another. As much is found to be done in Germany, especially in the Diocesses of Treucs, Cologne, Liege, Mayence and elsewhere, during the troubles of their Countreyes.

This miserie also made way into France, gathering vp Monopolies, in sted of congregating like louing Brethren; yea, bandying and eleuating themselves against their King, and against the Catholicke Church, which succeeded to nothing els; but multiplicity of seditions, only to support the part they had taken. But such vnlawfull assemblies are reprooued by the Church; and no such Fraternities should be permitted in Communion of the Sacrament, prophaning holy things, & the peace of the Church. For, they ought not to intrude into such matters as appertaine only to the Prince, vnder colour of reforming, but they should bee taken as seditious, factious, and scelerates; yea, to be quite cut off from the bodie of the militant Church.

Thus you see, what I thought good to discourse, concerning the Antiquity and Vtility of Fraternities or Brother-hoods. And that they were not instituted by the first Christians, for Sporting, Dancing, and Drinking, as many ignorant and detracting persons haue thought, and so laboured to perswade the simple people.

CHAP. XXXII.

20 Of Polybius the Romaine Ambassador, and his opinion of the Iewish Commonwealth, when hee was at Alexandria in Egypt.

30 Polybius the great Historian, a most elegant orator, and learned Phylosopher, School-maister, or (as some will haue it) companion vnto Scipio the Affrican, being sent by a Senat on an Embassie, to Alexandria in Egypt, hauing heard of the ciuill warres that then were in Iudea, made a mockery of the Iewes, and such as held opinion that the church and Doctrine of God, should bee constituted by the Iewish people. For then, all that Nation was full of troubles and intestine broiles, the great sacrificing Priest being violently dispossessed of his estate by another, and this man slain or murdered by another. Euen as Iason did, who expelled his Brother Menelaus: & then, his Fellow afterward caused his Brother Onias to be murdered. In briefe, by Ambition of the Sacrificers, who raised 40 ciuill warres, they prophaned the bloud of their Fellow-Cittizens, the Dead bodies of their elders were scattered in the streets, yea, hurled into the Porch of the Temple.

50 During which time, Antiochus King of Syria, called thether by one of the factious, exercised cruell theeneries in euerie

ry City. He placed his Garrison in the Temple, celebrated the Feast of Bacchus in the City; in which City only, stood the Temple of the true God. Circumcision was interdicted, and because two Weomen had caused their Children to be circumcised, they were led naked thorough the City, bearing their strangled Infants at their Breasts; and (at length) themselves were throwne over the wals. Another, who had seauen Children, was flayed, dismembred, and fried in a burning Caldron, because shee would not eate Swines flesh, contrary to the Ordinance of the Law.

Beside this, during these Calamities, there were risen three different Sects, of the Essees, Saducees, and Pharisees; who more tormented the Church, and her true Doctrine, then all the massacres committed by the Iewes. In the end, Polybius to behold this so much deformed estate, thought then, that the Romain Senate (where there was a Scipio, a Lelius, a Scauola, a Cato, a Fannius, and others, that gouerned in the World wisely) was the place where God delighted most to be; & that he fauoured the Romans most. For, they prospered more in all their conquests, then all other Princes or people of the world did: and hee iudged the affaires and condition of the world, according as hee saw people in their good or bad estate.

Now, albeit it was verie strange to see the Church in such a dissipation and deformity, yet notwithstanding, there were (euen then) some good members that cleaued fast to her: Such were Simeon, Zachary, and many others, both Maisters and Disciples in her Diuine School; and after them, the Almonees or Machabees. I alledge these things for many Reasons: First, to the end, that we should hold this Consolation, that God hath euermore his Church truly permanent, especially in this mortall life: to the end, that alwayes some part of mankind should truly know God, call vpon him, and celebrate his name, and that part need not doubt, but that they are preserued, counter-garded, and heard of God.

If Polybius had seen some hundreds of yeares afterward, when the Popes were expelled out of Rome, and persecuted, he would haue said as much of the Catholicke Church. As we read of Pope Alex- ander, third of that name, molested so many wayes by the most potent Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, finding no place in all Christendome for safety of his life: that (in the end) hee was constrained to retire himselfe to Venice, in the habite of a poor Priest, hiding himself in the church of La Charita, where he was receiued as a poore Chaplaine, and relieued for the loue of God. But at length, being known for the man he was indeed, hee found assistance, and was re-seated in his place. Pope Clement fift of that name, in regard of the factions in Italy, durst not abide at Rome, but was compelled to hold his See at Auignon, where (after him) it was continued by his successours; the space of threescore yeares and more. Likewise, because there happened about three and twenty Schismes in the Church, some whereof, lasted seauenteene yeares and more: sometimes three Popes were elected at one time, who made most cruell Warre one vpon another; One, defending Emperors; Others, som other Princes. I cannot expresse the Cruelties, Insolencies, Disorders, and Wickednesses, which (during these troubles) were committed in the Church. And yet neuertheless, in these hot times of Molestations, there were many good people, full of Piety, as well women as men, among whom Gods true Church was stil preserued and manifested.

For prooffe whereof, while these three Popes were thus in contention, to wit; Symmachus, Laurentius, and Petrus Altinus; there flourished great store of worthy personages, that were of Holie and vertuous life, of whom I wil name some. Fulgentius Byshop of Hispalis, a Monke; Theodoret a Græcian Priest; Isidore, Byshop of Auuergne; Eusebius of Carthage; Dionisius the Abbot; Auitus Vniencis; Seuerinus, Bishop of Treues; Ægissippus the Diuine; S. Patrick of Ireland; Pommerius and Honoratus; Cassiodorus the Monke; Fridolin of Basile, and many others. If an hundred yeares after Polybius liued, he could haue seene the Romain Commonwealth wholly dissipated by the factions of Pompey, of Cæsar; then of the Triumveri, all the World being filled with Ciuill Wars; to attribute that which those famous Romaines (in his time) had conquered, by so great prouidence and discreet preseruation, hee would then haue said, said, that God did not respect Rome more then he did any other nation. He should also then haue well noted the Pagans, among whom, Vertue, true Doctrine, and Honesty, was daily persecuted and despised: for then, if a man did but faigne to haue the truth, he was sure his Throate should be cut.

Polybius knew not God, but was a Pagan.

His Countrey and place of birth.

Polybius his Bookes lost & burned.

Titus Linius beholding to Polybius.

Polybius was a true Historian, not subject to the folly of some other writers

But Polybius is excuseable, for he had no knowledge of God, but was a Pagan. He could not comprehend, that the passage to the Kingdome of heauen, is thorrow infinite Tribulations. He beleeued, that there was no other Paradise, but onely to liue happily in this world. Hee was an Acadian, borne in the Cittie of Megalopolis, a great Phylosopher and Historiographer, verie wel skilled in militarie Discipline. He wrote fortie Bookes in the Greeke tongue, containing the gests and pollicies of the Romains. Of all which Bookes, at this day, hardly is any more to be found, then five: the rest were lost and burnt by his Maid-servant, being ignorant what they were. But a yong man, that sometime attended on him, knowing the merit of his writings, hindred the Maids follie, and preferued those which wee haue, from hurling them into the fire.

Titus Linius hath beene much beholding to him, for it plainly appeareth, that he followed him (word by word) in many of his passages, without altering anie thing: and yet it was the space of an hundreded years, or thereabout, between him and the saide Titus Linius. He was not so superstitious as some other Historiographers; who mingled false miracles of their Gods among their woorkes: as apparitions of Gods, Goddesles speaking with Captaines, or heads of armies; that they rained downe Blood, Milke, Stones, and such like; that Beasts did speake, Riuers conuert their Naturall colour into Blood, and other thinges meereley incredible. Nor did he write the Orations of Ambassadors, Captaines, and Kinges, wholly at large, without forgetting any iot, as many other Historians (both before and after him) haue done, laboring to perswade their Readers, that those affaires whereof they discourse, passed according as they are set downe, which is not easily to be credited.

Now, as concerning the cause why he went into Egypt, it was not to learne there what God was, or any of his woorkes: as did Plato, Democritus, Chrysippus, Anaxagoras and others; for he had read what those Phylosophers had Written, and many more beside. But the Romaine Senat well knowing him, although a stranger, and that he had done very much seruice to Scipio, in giuing him good aduise and Counsel, for his conduct in the wars of Affrica, and of Carthage; deputed him their Ambassador, to negotiate and accord some matter of peace, between Ptolemy Euergetes, King of Egypt; and Antiochus, King of Syria, and of manie other great Prouinces, who formerly had ranged ouer the Egyptian Territories, and Polybius accorded them verie worthilie. Hauing ended his Legation, he returned to Rome, where (it is said) he died, deeply charged with yeares.

The cause of Polybius his Embatsie into Egypt.

He taught and instructed that Noble Scipio, in many Vertues, and among other precepts which he left him: that he should neuer remooue from the place, whereto occasion called him, vntill hee had won himselfe a friend there. In brief, euerie man of good iudgement, will not iudge rashly, of good or euill persons, by outward apparence, beholding them to be fortunate, rich, or poore, nor seeing them afflicted; but rather, by their good actions, vprightnes of life, and purenesse of Doctrine.

The death of Polybius.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of a strange conceit or opinion, in the Women of Moscovia, to wit; That if they be not beaten by their Husbands, they thinke that they are not loued of them.

Imagined (for a long time) that that which is reported of the Women of Moscovia, should be a meere Fable, to wit; that if they were not very often beaten by their husbands, they presently supposed that they did not Loue them; although it is vsed as a common Prouerbe: Hee that loueth most; correcteth most. But such as are subject to Discipline, Correction, and Chastisement, as are Slaues, Seruaunts, and Children of a Family, being vnder the power of Maisters, Tutors, or Parents, they will hardly confesse themselves, to be beloued more then any other, because they are beaten more then other. Neuethelesse, the Women of Moscouia doo hold this opinion quite contrary vnto all other else-where, that if they be not beaten, they are despised, and no way esteemed.

I am well assured, that no man can perswade this for allowable, to the women of France, Italy, Spaine, England, nor to the German women, or that they would accept, and let it passe for currant Doctrine: although, if it happen that they should bee beaten, even when they haue verie iustly deserued it; yet notwithstanding, they will striue to cry first, yea, and to beate their Husbands too, if they could; or otherwise iniurie and abuse them. And Women-Neighbours to impeach the entraunce of so bad a Custome, would helpe such women as complained, both in their maledictions and imprecations, against such as (deseruedly) do strike their Wiues, aledging Saint Pauls saying; That no man should hate his owne Flesh. The Women of Moscouia, do neuer go out of their owne Houses, not so much as to the Churches, and do nothing else but spin. And to giue assurance of what I haue already said, I will declare three Histories, which very good Authors haue left Written, and which I my selfe haue heard credibly auouched by men of worth, that haue bin in those parts.

Laurentius Surius, a Religious Char- treux of Cologne in Germany; Writes in his Booke of memorable matters, as well Ecclesiasticall as Secular: how it happened (in his time) that a Germane traui- led into those parts, and married with a Woman of that Countrey, and his wife made a great complaint to him, that hee did not loue her, neither bare her anie kinde of affection, because he did not at any time beate her. The Germane hearing this, made answere; that hee loued her entirely; and perswaded himselfe, that blowes could bee no true signes of Loue. Afterward, he vsed to beate her so extremly, and so often, that he found

(by good prooffe) his Wife did loue him much better then she did before. But his beating was such, and so immeasurably, as (at length) the Hangman brake both his legs and necke.

I was verie familiar with a Germane of Lunebourg, whose father was Amba- sador for Ferdinando, Emperour, first of that Name, not long since deceased, de- 10 puted to Basilus, Duke and King of Mos- couia; and hee assured me, that this Opi- nion was a Custome, and still in vse with the Women of that Countrey; & heard his Father faithfully report it. For he being lodged in the house of an honorable 20 Burgesse in the City Moscouia, about the businesse then referred to his trust, sawe his hoste oftentimes beate his wife vpon no occasion; and yet notwithstanding, shee left not to loue him; and they spake 26 still kindly each to other, without the verie least shew of discontent: and yet the said woman was very often beaten, some- times with his dagger, or a staffe, or kickt with his fecte. He said moreouer, that there was a Gold-Smith in the same Ci- 30 tie, with whõ this Ambassador often fre- quented, because he knew him before in the Towne of Lunebourg. This Woman sent word by one of her young Children to her husband, that hee had not beaten his mother (so much as once) al that week 40 time: but if he would not beate her, she would neuer loue him, neither would she prouide any more diet for him. The Goldsmith being very busily imployed about his worke, regarded not his sonnes words, neither remembred this custome so generally in vse, as those (Naturally 50 borne in the Countrey) had great respect vnto it for their owne quiet. For hee was a man humane enough (for a Germane) and allowed not this barbarous behavi- our, to smite his dearest friend and wife, or so much as to shew her any vnkinde countenance: yet afterward, vpon her importunity, and to discharge his dutie, hee gaue her halfe a dozen blowes with a Cudgell on the backe and shoulders, & 50 puld off her Head-attire, wherewith she was well contented, and called him pre- sently to an excellent prepared Dinner. Otherwise, if a whole week should passe, and he not beate her, there could be no quietnesse in the house, nor should he get one good looke of her. This is an ordina- ry custome among the Women in the great great Prouince of Moscovia.

In brieft, this manner and custome of men beating their Wives, could not arise but out of Sathans shoppe; for the Christian Church hath euermore condemned it. There are none in these parts, but Knaues, Fooles, lealous Coxcombs, Drunkards, or men voide of vnderstanding, that will exercise such Barbarous behauiour on their Wives: yet let mee not be mistaken, for I do not excuse some Weomen, that deserue to bee beaten for their vices and badnesse, and wil giue extraordinary occasion to be sharply handled by their Husbands. But my meaning is, of vertuous, discreet, and well aduised women, whose merits are not meanly to be cherrished, but highly respected by their Husbands.

CHAP. XXXIII.

¶ That those things, which some Authors haue left written, concerning the Destruction and ruine of great Troy, performed by the Greekes, are true.

Cannot choose but meruel very much, at the wilful pertinacity of some men, who rashly haue esteemed, that those things written by many good Authors, deseruing credite and faithfull opinion of the warre and ruine of Troy in Phrygia, should be mere Fables, and ydle vanities. This error happeneth, because they haue not read some Bookes, Written by parties present at the Warre on either side, as well Greekes as Troyans: as Dichys of Creet; and Dares Phrygius, and others, who collected also their Writings out of sound Authority, liuing not long after the time when those things happened. As Herodotus and others, that heard them reported by Captaines & Commanders, who had charge in the said Warres: among whom, was Phalstus the Greeke, and some others beside, that selected them out of verie ancient Authors. As namely, Quintus Scipius the Romain; Damasceus Sigiernus; Emilius Macer the Poet; Euclide the Authors that haue written of the war of Troy.

Megari in Phyllosthet; and Homer, who was about eight score yeares after.

Many Monarkes, Kinges, and other Princes, took the paines, comming from farre Countries, to see the City of Troy: as Alexander the Great, that found it ruined by the Persians, who likewise destroyed all that part of Asia, wherein it was seated. But Penthyllus, Nephew to Agamemnon, builded it againe, after that the Greekes had sacked it: raigning there, & his successors (as is affirmed) vntill such time as the Persians ouerthrew it. Alexander the Great, then hauing read manie Heroicall actions, performed at the besiedging of this Cittie, and finding it laid desert, caused it to be re-edified, & gave great immunities and Priuiledges to the inhabitants, whom hee exempted from ordinary tributes; instituting there Free-Fayre, Martes, and Markets, for all such as would dwell there, or Negotiate with them: in regard whereof, it was named Alexandria. M. Aurelius, Dioclesian, & Claudius, Romaine Emperours, potent and mighty, tooke paines to trauell thither from Rome, not without much cost and labour. And to leaue a memorie to posterity, of their beeing there, they caused a goodly Columbe to be erected, (which is yet (at this day) to be seene) of white Marble, very great, and placed in it being called Troy: but in regard of the great Antiquity thereof, it standeth not directly vpright, but leaneth some-what towards the sea; and thereon is engrauen these words following.

Imperator Caesar. Mar. Antonius pius, Felix, Parthicus, Maximus, Trib. Pl. Imp. P. XV. Cons. III. Prouinciam, Asiam, per viam, & flumina, pontibus subiugauit.

And on the other side of the said Piller, was likewise written:

Imperator Caesar Augustus, Diocletiano, P. Cos. II. regnante Tribunicia vice potestate. M. F. T. et Claudius, C. VIII. P. R.

In the time of the Warre which the Romans had against Mithridates, this City was againe destroyed to the verie foundation by a Roman Captain, named Fimbria, because Mithridates was possessed thereof, and had planted there his Garrison, which did much harine to the Romains: Yet it was new builded againe,

(but I know not by whom) because in the time of Marcus Aurelius the Emperour, there was an excellent Vniuersitie in the same place, of all Sciences, and Galen the Physitian was then a Student there.

Likewise, Saint Luke testifieth, that Saint Paule passed thorough it, and that he raised vp there, a young man, named Eutichus, that fell downe deade out at a Window, from the third Loft of the house: Also, that he preached there, and celebrated the holy Communion, where there remained a great number of Iewes. Three hundred yeares after, or thereabout, this Cittie was once again destroyed by the Gothes.

I thinke it was yet againe re-built afterward, and that the Inhabitants were Christians, because (at this day) manie crosses may be seen Engrauen on stones, enclosed in the walles of diuers temples therein, that stand (as yet) most part of them, being not wholly destroyed.

At this present, no person dwelleth there, nor within a Leagues compasse round about it; I know not whence this differtion should proceed. The neere Neighboring Inhabitants do say, that before the Turkes got their enterance into Greece, it was then to be seen in the same condition. The six ancient Gates, are yet there (almost) intire, with their Posternes. The Towers about the walles in many places are yet standing vpright; and the height of the VValles are (verie neere) firmly standing; against which, are erected strong Piles and Spurres of two Fadomes breadth, to sustaine them vpright.

The wals were builded of Free-stone, blacke like Iet; hard, but spungy; asking a large time to goe about them: and the Ditches are not (as yet) filled vp. There are two Castelles, verie ancient, within the circuite of the Cittie, builded vpon the pendant of a Mountaine: one of the which, being much higher then the Cittie, as hauing command thereof, and was called Iliou Castle. The other beeing much lower, had command of the Sea; both of them beeing builded of bright Marble; and so excellent in their construction, as it is impossible for anie man in the world, wholly to demolish them.

Concerning matters within the Cittie, there are yet to be discerned the marks and tracts of such goodly buildinges, as exceed my capacity to expresse. There are yet to be seene strong Conduits and Cesternes, without any water belonging to them. The streets are verie confused, by reason of the houses ouerthrow which (for the most part) was flat forward. Of Welles or Fountaines, there is no more but one now to be seene, and that is neer to the Sea side. Naturall Baths are there yet to be noted, holding their nature dry and hot, builded by excellent Art, and Artificially couered with fine Bricke. But be it howsoeuer, it must be much greater matter, then as yet I haue heard of, that shall or can cause mee to beleue those things for Fables, that are written and reported of the greatnesse, wealth, and power of this Cittie.

There are yet many Sepulchres to be seen, both within and without the Cittie, of Captains and Princes, aswell Troians as Greeks, that were slaine during the warre, made (in Anticke maner) of Marble, all in one peece, after the fashion of a Chest, the couers whereof are whole & sound. Halfe a League or a mile from Troy, is the Isle of Tenedos, where are the most part of the Greekes Sepulchres. As that of Achilles, who was the terror of the Troians, yet slaine by Paris. He was so highly esteemed, that many of his blood were afterward carried thither, to lye by him in his Tombe, so much did they admire his memory.

This was the Tombe that Alexander went to visit, weeping ouer it, and much complaining, because he was not so happy, as to haue a man that could so well publish his praises, as Homer had doone those of Achilles; it remaineth yet entirely whole, with diuers Greeke Verses thereon engrauen. And about the yeare of Iesus Christ, 1379. when Baiazeth the son of Selim raigned ouer the Turkes, there was found in the saide Isle of Tenedos, the Sepulcher of an Amazon Queen, named Marpesia, who after many booties, being richly laden with spoiles, made hir return to this Island, verie sore hurt and wounded, and there ended her dayes. This Tombe is yet to be seene, betweene two hilles of indifferent height; and a litle before one of them, there is a Greeke Epitaph on the couer of the Marble Chest, and there her name is comprized in faire Carracters.

At any time, with opening verie little ground, or passing not aboue a foote in depth, many other famous tombs might be easily discovered. As the Tombe of Ajax was, in that quarter where Achilles encamped his men. About this Isle of Tenedos, there are many other little Islands, of as good ground as that of Tenedos, but vn-inhabited, except by some poore Fisher-men, that make their retirement thither sometimes. And it hath beene immagined, to be haunted with spirites, which speake to men: in regard whereof, the men that resort thither, and abide there any time, do say, that the spirit of Homer wanders in those Islandes, where he did (in former dayes) Phylosophize; and that he shewed himself to certaine Shepherds, as they passed that way to feed their Cattle. Thus you may heare the opinion of such as doo now dwell about Troy, and neere the Isle of Tenedos, touching visions and spirits that appeare in those Islands.

As for the Riuers of Simois and Xanthus, so much renowned by many Poets which watered the fields of Troy, we can now say no otherwise of them, but that they are small Brookes or Gulletts; scarce able to nourish a Loach or Minnow: for they are dried vp in Summer, and in the deepest of Winter, a Duck cannot swim there. But our Poets haue published so many Fables of these Riuers, as they should seeme to haue beene much greater, then now they are. Yet must we not (for all this) say, that the History is not true, because Painters and Poets are Licensed to embellish their woorkes with more then their infant subiect requireth; and we must likewise vnderstand, that vnder Poeticall Fables, there is vsuallie a morrall sense conuayed.

As concerning the Scituation of this Citty, Theuets maketh a quite contrarie description thereof, and saith; That these two fore-named, are great Riuers: and that it is seated in a good soile. I would be loth to contradict such a person, but that which I write, I haue gathered from Bellonius a Physitian of Mans, in the second Booke of his Observations: and I my selfe haue heard him often report, being at Paris, at Postell, that foure years he frequented that Country. Afterward, a man of Rohan, named Albert le bon, declared that he had bin in those parts, and remained there a whole Winter; agreeing in all things which Bellonius had written. I thinke verily, that Theuets was neuer there, but what hee hath recorded, was onely by heare-say.

That which hath giuen occasion to some, not to credite the destruction of Troy, is (as I haue heard) the iudgement of Paris, concerning the beautie of the three Goddesses Diana Phrygius writeth, that it was nothing but a Dreame which Paris had as he slept vnder a Tree, being wearied with Hunting in the Forrest of Ida: and Poets making vse of this dreame; haue aduised young Princes, not to imitate the folly of Paris. For hee refused Riches, which Iuno presented him; and wisdome and vnderstanding in all things, offered him by Pallas, if to eyther of them he would haue giuen the Golden Ball. But suffering himselfe to be swayed by voluptuous desires, hee chose rather to giue it to Venus, the Goddess of loose and mis-gouerned affections, that hee might liue (alwaies after) in such licentious liberty. And, as an especiall note of his skilfull progression, hee made a Rape of faire Helena, wife to Menelaus, King of Lacedemon; that entertained him in his Court as a kind friend. A matter which caused the ruine of all his family, and of all the Trojan Kingdome beside.

Secondly, they alledge also as a fable, that Priam commaunded his son Paris to be slaine, because Hecuba (his Queen) being great with childe, had a dreame that she should be deliuered of a Fire-brand. And hauing conferred with interpreters of dreames, the King was informed, that the infant then in hir womb, should be the cause of his ruine, and of the whole kingdome. This dreame might very likely be dreamed by Hecuba, in regard, that verie often, Princes and Princesses are (by especiall grace) forewarned of God, both in dreames and otherwise, concerning diuers things which are to happen; to the end, that they might prevent them. For accidents good or euil do not only touch them, but all the people likewise. In briefe; Paris from his infancy was so vicious, as his father could neuer afford him a good looke. And when he was in his youthfull dayes; without any aduise of his Parents, he married a Nymph of the Fields; but yet shee was verie faire and vertuous, Named Oenone; and afterwarde forfooke her, when he had enjoyed her virginity.

Thirdly, they affirme for a fable, that which Dicitur Cretenfis, Homer, and other Authours haue Written, of the Plague dispersed in the Campe of the Grecians, when they assembled to plant their siege before Troy, the Armie consisting then of no lesse, then twelue hundred thousand men. Every man knoweth, that contagious Diseases doo seldome cease from pursuing great Armies, because men liue there vnwholesomely, in regard of Corruptions by dead Bodies, and other annoyances amongst Men: Besides; Welles and Waters abused or corrupted; for men and beasts drinke all together, whereby the ayre becommeth infected.

The people then perceyuing so great a Mortality, without finding any Remedie for it, had re-course to their Goddes, and consulted with Oracles. The Priests being then verie subtle and crafty, made aunswere; That this Pestilence ensued by the anger of Diana, and this was the reason thereof. Agamemnon, Brother to Menelaus, elected Chiefe Leader of the Armie, had slaine a goodly Hinde, which was Priuate and Sacred, and was kept by the Sacrificing Priests (for pleasure) in some Fielde or Forrest, Dedicated to the saide Goddesse. They made them also beleue, that they had oftentimes seene Diana, to take great delight in sporting and playing with that Hinde. Wherefore, if they would haue the plague to cease, they must Sacrifice the Daughter of Agamemnon, King of Mycena, who was the onely cause of all the euill.

Now, it is well knowne, that this ydle practise or Gullerie, was expressely prepared against Agamemnon, by some of the other Kinges, who were malicious and enuious (esteeming themselues aboue him) because he was chosen chiefe Soueraigne, and commaunded ouer so great an Armie, wherein were no lesse then thirtie nine Kings. And this was deuised onely to discontent him, and giue him occasion for to depart home againe: yea, and the Oracle being entrusted to this Coosenage, returned that answere.

Being on the verie point of constraining him to deliuer his Daughter to bee

Sacrificed, Achilles and some other of his Friends, who had Credite sufficient with the other Kings, found the meanes to redresse this extremitie. For, they being asisted by some of the Priests and Sacrificers, that re-consulted with the Oracle, hauing receyued a good summe of Money, returned a report, that Diana would be contented with the sacrifice of another Hinde, and of a Bull, which accordingly was performed.

Then the Grecian Armie entered into their prepared Shippes, which amounted to the number of eleauen hundred and fortie Saile, or there-aboutes: and dislodging thence, chaunged the Ayre. So, by Naturall Reason, that Contagious infection ceased: and thus should that part of the Historie bee vnderstoode.

For the Palladium, which was an Image of Woodde, representing Pallas falne from Heauen, with a mighty thunder, into a Temple newly made, which the Troyans had builded in the Cittie; which being finished, and they not knowing to what God or Goddesse they should make their Vowes, or elect as their Patron, this happening in the Night time, the Gates of the saide Temple being fast shut. This was nothing else, but onely a meere inuention of men, and principally of the Sacrificers, and Couetous Idolatrous Priestes, who found the meanes (one Night) when there was great lightning, Thunder, and Raine, to bring the saide Image thither secretly. And coming the next morning to open the temple Gates, in the presence of manie people; they made them beleue, that in this terrible time of night, the Image was descended from Heauen. Whereuppon, the Troyans admyring this deceitful wonder, sent some of their Noblest Cittizens (with the Sacrificers) to Delphos, there to consult what was to be done with this statue descended from heauen. The Priests of Delphos, vnderstanding the drift of the subtle Troyans, conspired one with another, to aunswere by the Oracle (which was a Virgine closely concealed in the Vault, and well instructed in hir answer:) That the Image of Pallas had not bene sent from Heauen, but for the more assurance and preservation of the Troyans estate; and that so long as shee remained within the Temple, the Cittie of

A remedie found against so great an inconuenience, by retracting of the Oracle.

A fourth reason, the Palladium or image of Pallas in Troy.

Simple people are soonest decciud, especially vnder the cloud of Holinesse.

Troy

Both sides abused by a false Oracle.

Troy could not be surprized by Warre. The Trojan people tooke this Oracle for an Article of Faith, and so did the Grecians also: for it brought them into dispaire of euer taking the Citty, and gaue the other side vndoubted assurance, that they should neuer be surprized or vanquished; and the better to countenance their perswasion, the Trojans placed strong Guards (ordinarily well payed) about the Palladium.

Troy brought into wofull extremitie.

Now, it fortunedy that by long delay of time, many rough battailes and skirmishes, and all places of entrance into the Citty so strongly besiedged, that Troy could no way bee supplied with victuals. But being thus seuerelie beleagerd, themore part of the best men of warre; yea, euen the most resolued and valiantest Trojans, dyed with hunger: and none remained, but tyred weake men, wearied with sustaining so long a siedege, and voide of any hope of succour. Some Princes, and other men of marke, fore-seeing that the Palladium could not bee preserued; without speaking to Priam their King, (who was then very old and feeble) or Hecuba the Queene: conferred closelie with the Greekes, (who were as much weary and tyred as they, desiring nothing more, but to raise their siedege, & returne home to their owne Countrey) yet made an outward bold shew, of stil continuing the siedege. When they met to capitulate, among others were Anthenor, Aeneas, and some else, who promised, if they might haue their liues and goods saued, they would admit the Enemy benefit of entrance. Promises past on both sides by sollemne oath, in a place very secret and free for the purpose; the people (in meane while) supposing, that they treated of a truce among themselves, of the reddition of Prisoners, and recouery of worthy mens bodies, slaine in the skirmishes. But aboue all thinges else, the Greekes strictly held, that the Palladium should bee deliuered to them: for they were perswaded, that they should neuer get entrance into Troy, so long as the Image continued there; so farre did the deuill (then) preuaile with men. This fortish light beleefe, S. Augustine verie exceeding wel mocked, when he said: The Trojans were keepers of the Palladium, but not the Palladium of the Trojans. The Guards were won with Mony, and the Vestales that were there destined; contrary to their Oath and Vow, suffered their Palladium to bee lost, and another Image put into the place, very neerelie resembling it, couered with the same ornaments and lewels, whereof none was then mindfull.

The Palladium stolne, & how.

10 The Palladium being now in the besiedgers power, they were highly contented; and sent great presents to the Traytors, with reiteration of their Oathes. Whereupon, in the dead time of night, the Traytours opened the Gate called Scea, whereon was embossed the head of a Horse, and by a flaming Torch, gaue signall to the Greekes for entring the Citty, which they did, hauing yet the Traytours Children in their hands as hostages. Thus was the Citty taken, King Priam slaine, his wife and Children led away Captiues, and such as remained of the Royall Issue, were murdred, and almost all the people massacred: Faith was kept with the betrayers, but yet with great difficulty: neuerthelesse, after the reduction, they were exempted from spoile. To wit, 20 Anchises, Father to Aeneas, Anthenor, neere Kinsman to King Priam, Polydamas, Vcalagon, Amphidaimas, Dolon, and diuers other; to whom Ships were giuen, for conueighing thence their wiues, children, & whatsoever else they could carry away. After the sacke had continued the space of eight daies, the Citty was wholly burned, but they had great difficulty to destroy it: for the 30 buildings were all of Marble, or of free Stone, strongly couered and tarrassed. But the Greekes were very great in spleen against it, because the most part of them (in this long siedege) had lost many of their Kinred and deere Friends, beside their owne hard sufferance in the warre. There dyed in this besiedging, eight 40 hundred, eighty and six thousand Greekes, vntill the reddition of the Citty; and sixe hundred, seauenty, sixe thousand; as well of the Citty, as such succours as was sent them, by Kinges, Queenes, and their Allies abroad, without making any account of both Men and Women, that were led thence captiues.

which is said to be made by the Greekes, within whose belly men were hidden, and whereof they made an offering to Pallas, to compasse the meanes of breaking the wals thereby, and so to overcome their enemies: these (truely) are Poeticall Fables. But yet we are to observe, that the Citty was surprized at that gate, whereon there was the head of a Horse (very bigly) embossed, and of blacke Marble, as before wee have said, and it remaineth yet to be seene.

A sixt reason,
the Fables of the Amazones.

Next, for the Amazones, which are said to come to the succour of Troy, conducted by their Queene Penthesilea; this is a Fable too. But yet we must credit that this Woman was a Queen, and commaunded ouer many Countreys; a Friend and neere Ally to King Priam, in whose aide she came: bringing with her eight or ten thousand men, and not Women, that were flaine in severall fights; and she her selfe (at last) in a single combate with Achilles. For, there was neuer any Countrey, inhabited onely by Women, nor is at this present, which I purpose else-where to shew.

A seauenth reason, the tenne yeares
siedge of Troy.

It is also held for a Fable, that the Greekes should abide at the siedge of Troy, the space of ten yeares: this is not altogether incredible, because as much hath beene done in our time. The siedge which Baiazeth brought before Constantinople, lasted eight yeares and some moneths, in the yeare 1373. and yet (for all that) was not taken. That which I haue written, concerning the subtilties of the Priestes in those daies: I protest, I saw them in the hand of Monsieur Pelerin, a Parisian, Schoolemaister to the children of the late Lord De l'Aubespine, in a Booke being a Manuscript, & in the Greeke tongue, which a man of the Church had given him, who was a follower of Monsieur de Fumell, Ambassadour in the East. This man had the Booke of a Caloere, or religious Greeke at Mount Athos; and therein is the Interpretation of the Fables, which I haue alledged in this Chapter, and many more beside. The Authour thereof was one Temison, a Smyrnian, who (I thinke) was a Sacrificer, and afterward became a Christian.

There is a certaine Booke, intituled, Troy not taken, it is in the Greeke toong, and translated likewise into Latine, which is saide to be composed by one named Dion the Sophister, that liued in the time of Traiane the Emperour, and neuer vsed any other Garment, then the skinne of a Lyon. But he alledgeth such poore reasons, to proue that Troy was neuer taken, nor besieged by the Greekes: that a Childe of tenne yeares olde would set downe better. Therefore, such as doe yet hold that error, and are perswaded, that what hath beene written by many oculary Authours, and others beside of good credit, concerning the Troyan History, is no way veritable: let them see (to their shame) the ruines of that famous Citty, which yet (to this day) doe make shew of themselves, as I haue described them in this Chapter. The round neighbouring places, ports of the Sea, which doe (yet) retaine the very same names, that then they had. The Toombes of such famous men (with their inscriptions) that died as well on the one side, as the other; being all of Marble, with the couertures whole; but no bones in them: for neuer was any thing put into them, but the ashes of the dead, because (in those times) the bodies were all burned.

CHAP. XXXV,

How a Man may easily know, what kinde of drinke will soonest make one drunke: As with Wine, Beere, Ale, Cider, Perry, and other drinckes.

Wine is not the only drinke that causeth drunkennes, when it is immeasurable taken, or when it is receiued by Men or Women, whose braines are weake and feeble. For, there are many other arteficiall Beuerages, made in those Regions, where no Wine hath encrease or growth; as in Normandy, Brittaine, in the more part of Piccardie, the lower Germany, and other Northerly Countreys. But they make vse of Cider, Perrie, Beere, Ale, Rassis, and other drinckes, which procure drunkennes more then

Diversity of actions and behaviour in drunkenesse

Wine doth. In Turky, it is forbidden to such as are of the Mohometane Law, to drinke Wine vpon paine of life; and there are likewise Drinckes arteficiallie made.

The Caribes and Anthropophages, people that feed on the flesh of Men, make a kinde of drinke, which they call Canonin: it is made of certaine roots called Aypie, and grosse Millet, champed in the mouths of Women, and then boyled in some quantitie of Water. Of this drinke they make vse after their repast, for they drinke not at all in the time of their feeding, as wee doe in these partes: but rather imitate nature, as other Creatures do. This Canonin causeth drunkenesse, more then Wine doth here, if too much be taken thereof.

In the Kingdome of Narsingua, Tarangonor, Calecut and Peru, they drinke a kinde of liquor which cometh forth of a Tree, that is therefore purposed cut in the Spring time, like vnto the Palme; and it inciteth drunkenesse also. Many Countries in the Asian Indiæ, do make diuers drinckes of Rice and spiceries, which will procure drunkenesse likewise. In Turky they make a certaine Hydromell or Metheglin, which troubleth the braine much more then Wine. In breese, there is not any Nation that will content it selfe with drinking Water onely: but haue deuised one or other arteficiall beuorage to please the Pallet, and delight their tast. I my selfe hauing frequented those Countries; where no Wine at all is made, but other arteficiall drinckes daile vsed, as hath before bene declared: I haue apparantly perceiued, that such as receiue their drunkenesse by wine, haue quite contrary behaviour to others, that are ouercome with Beurages; as of Beere, Cider, Perry, and the rest.

And although those men that are drunke with Wine, do commit a thousand follies, and counterfeit diuers anticke sopperies: yet it is most certaine, that none can declare the like sottishnesse, and yeelde more argument of ridiculous laughter (when wee behold their faces, eyes, and gesture;) then such as are drunke with made drinckes, and (among the rest) with Beere. For they neither reele or stagger on any side; but onely backward, and fall downe flat on their backs: but such as are drunke with Wine, reele forward, and alwaies fall or lye vpon their face and nose; whereas the other do bruise their shoulders, and breake their heads behind. As likewise may be discerned when they are ouercome with sleepe in drinking, for they that are drunke with Beere, Ale, Cider, and other drinckes arteficiall; doe sleepe on their backs, with their bosomes open. I haue bene credibly assured, that euen such is their behaviour in Turky, the Indiæ, America, and other Regions, when they are in like case.

Where men doe become drunke with Wine, they sleepe vpon their faces, the Chinne enclining into the bosome. The reason is, because the fumes and vapours proceeding from Wine; do gaine possession in the heads formost part, and the anterior parts of the body also. But those fumes which mount aloft by other drinckes; doe incline to the head behind, and the posterior parts also: which is a reason, that they are very obliuious, euermore sleepey, and no great praters or brablers.

The French, that (during the States Warres in the Lowe Countries) trauailed thither as Souldiers; would make their boasts: that they had familiaritie with many Women there; when they found them to bee made drunke with Beere: for then they would fall downe backward, at which time, their pudicity might easilie be attempted, finding them in such vnwomanlie readinesse. Let them (therefore) that haue care of their Chastity, take heede how they become drunke. And as for men, ouer and beside, that many doe then disclose their owne secrets: they enter also (oftentimes) into quarrels, destroying their health, and vndoing themselues. Our Lawes do hold them for infamous persons, that are addicted to drunkenesse.

The difference in drinking wine and other beurages.

Wine seizeth on the foremost part of the braine.

French Souldiers are apt at all occasions.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Against the Axiome, which maintaineth, that all Repletion is naught, by what sustenance soeuer it be; But of Bread most pernicious.

Could neuer vnderstand the reason, although I haue enquired of many learned Phisitions, who (neuerthelesse) haue published the same also: that Repletion of bread, is more dangerous and pernicious, then all other nourishments beside. For not onely it seemeth to me voyd of all reason; but it hath bene so accounted, by all them that I haue conferred withall. Because all other foods, as the flesh of Oxen, Kine, Murton, Veale, Goat, Hare, Hart, Hinde, Boare, Swine, of Fowles, and also of all Fishes which we vse, and any Fruit whatsoever; doe corrupt easily of themselues, if they remaine any while in the stomacke and be not digested: the like doth Egges, and all things prepared with Milke, except Cheese, which is saide to be (almost) indigestible. All such as vse these meates without Bread, haue neuer any good colour, but are much subiect to vnfaoury breath, and sometimes (of their owne bodies) a smell scant pleasing: neither are they so wel nourished, nor so strong; as they that eate more Bread, then any other meat beside.

To prooue that it must needs be so, we may behold, that the most of other Viandes, how acceptable soeuer they seeme to the tast, well prepared and seasoned with good Sauces: they doe yet (very often) bring a dislike and contempt of themselues. Bread only neuer distateth, be it in health or in sicknesse; it is the last appetite lost, and the first recovered in sicknesse. In health, it is alwaies the first and last eaten, pleasing and most agreeable to nature, beyond all other kindes of repast. Againe, it is most certaine, that Bread

(by a wonderfull blessing in Nature) is endued with all those fauours; which perticularly doe incite and allure each meates to bee fed on: pleasing some in their sweetnesse, others in their sharpnesse or tartnesse; some in their saltnesse; others in their sowrenesse, and all in their due apprehension. Bread containeth in it, whatsoever any Man can tast, or is acceptable in other meates. For, albeit other foodes haue neuer so good rellish of themselues: yet can they not bee suitable, or profitable to feede on for health, except they be accompanied with Bread. To speake all in a word, Bread, by his goodnesse correcteth the vices of other meates, and helpeth their vertues; whereon it is vsed as a common Prouerbe: That all meates are good and beneficiall, when Bread is their companion.

Some Spagirickes, Alchymists, and Extractors of Quintessences, haue told and assured me, that hauing put Bread into their Limbeckes or vessels of glasse, as meaning to deriue an Essence from him: they haue diuers times found the Bread conuerted into Flesh. We doe daily note (as already I haue said) that the most part of them, which doe eate their meate without Bread, be it Flesh or otherwise, they haue continuallie stincking breath. The Athletes or stout Wrastlers (as I finde recorded in the Bookes of Galen) such as were esteemed the very best, and strongest in habitude among other men: had neuer any other nourishment but Bread, accompanied with a little Hogs Flesh.

When the Scots vsed to warre out of their owne limits, as in England and other places, if they thought to finde the Country ruined where they should passe: they droue with them a great number of Beasts for slaughter, and liued (by the way) vpon those Beastes. And because they had liued sometime by Flesh alone, their stomackes a long while would be sickely, by not hauing had the vse of any Bread. For remedie of which stomachall disease, each man perticularly carried a Sachell of Meale, weighing about some pound & a halfe at the most, and a little Iron Plate, thin and slender. Then mingling a litle of the Meale, in a wooden dish with water, and driuing it into a Past: they laid it it on the Plate over a small fire; and in this manner (immediatly) they made Bread. This doth in some manner resemble our Waferers making of Wafers. The Scots having eaten of this Bread; found their stomackes well refreshed, and their bodily strength sufficiently restored; after which, they would begin againe to vse flesh onelic, according to their wonted custome.

An argument to approue the power of good Bread.

I alleadge this History, to demonstrate, that if so little bad made Bread, neither leavened nor kneaded, could restore the languishing strength of men: what then is good Bread able to do, being kneaded and baked to full perfection? This benefit of baking Bread upon a Plate of Iron, brought much commodity to that Nation: for they needed little search after Brakes or Mills, which commonly are beaten downe and destroyed (before all thinges else) that in the degastes of warre, the enemy may haue no benefit by them.

Arabes and Moores become Theeves for Bread.

The Lord of Villamond declareth, that being gone forth of his Ship, and likewise all those in his company, at the Port of Iaffa, and putting themselves on the way, to trauaile by Land to Ierusalem: the Moores and Arabes entered vpon their vessell lying at Anker, and robbed them of nothing else but Bread. Other Theeves also, of the same sect and kinde of men, meeting with the same company the day following: tooke also nothing from them but Bread. All Nations haue not Bread, nor the vse thereof, and such as neuer had (as many Countries but lately discovered) when Christians giue it them to eat, although it be but a Bisket, and of the very coursest: they make great account of it, they finde it so sauourie.

Sauages doe highly esteeme Bread.

I am of the minde, that he which saith, satietie and Repletion of Bread, is more dangerous then all other nourishments: his meaning is of such bread as is not fast kneaded, and well baked, or without Leauen, because it is the more hard to digest. As for my selfe, my meaning is of such Bread, as is made of good and pure graine, wel cleansed, kneaded, raised, baked, and fresh. I speake not heere of Fish-bread, which is made in Hirland; among the people which dwell on the Lake of Barcena; & that in the Isles of Imangla, Inebila, and and an infinite of Countries on the red Sea, and else-where. Nor also of that which is made of the barke of Trees, vsed in the Country of Vendenao, which is called Sagu, and is saide to be very sauoury; being reduced into Meale, and afterward into Bread; As fruite also of the same Tree is, in the Isles of Moluquises. By the reasons fore-alleadged, I would perswade all persons, not to forsake the vse of Bread, for fond or licentious desire after other meats: if they couet to haue good strength, a chearefull complexion, and health.

Bread made of the barke of Trees.

The vse of Bread very ancient in the East parts.

Concerning the inuention of Bread, since what length of time it hath continued, and who was the first inuenter thereof; there is not any thing found for certaine. In the East Countries, the vse of Bread is very ancient, for we finde, that it was vsed in the times of Abraham, and of Jacob, when his Sons descended into Egypt, onely to buy Corne, to make Bread. But neerer vs, the vse thereof is not found so ancient; because the Romaines vsed no kinde of Bread, but onely Corne boiled (as likewise the Gaules and Germanes did) till they brought it a perfect risting in sunder, and then they did eat it among their other meates, euen as at this present as we do our bread. This continued thus till the Persian Warres, which was in the yeare (after the Cities foundation) 520. And then came Bread-makers, or Bakers of Bread, out of Asia to ome; who gaue instruction, how to multure or grinde Corne, then to knead it with Leauen; and lastly, to bake it in Loanes.

In Italy a long time after.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the excellent and profitable properties of the Swallow; And the Nature of the Bird.

Because the Swallow neuer nestleth in Citties, nor on their Wallles; which are subiect to be taken and retaken by war; because by her comming and presence, she assureth those places where she is, not to be subiect iect to the rigour of Warre; as also the House or Wall where she buildeth her nest, not to be threatned by any neere ruine: Because, that by her comming, she resolueth winter to be past, and the Spring time beginning; because (likewise) she hath in her many especial properties, by diuers benefits and other things arising to man, whereof we shal discourse hereafter: it seemed meet (in my iudgement) that this Bird well deserued to haue a perticular Chapter written of her, in her iust defence against such as labour to depraue her.

The Swallow abideth ordinarily, in Regions temperately hot, shunning the extreamity of heat, and of cold likewise. Pliny saith, that this Bird, feeling the extreame heat, of Affricke approaching; she flyeth thence in the prime, to delight her selfe in a temperate ayre: And when she perceiueth Winter ensuing, which is about the midst of September; she then returneth to the Countries extremely hot, where winter is in the same manner, as Summer is here with vs. This Bird hath such an absolute memory, that hauing re-pas- sed the Sea, and many other Regions, which are two thousand miles off, at the least: yet shee well knoweth to returne to the place or lodging, where (in the precedent yeare) she made her Nest, and where shee had young ones. This I haue seene, and made prooffe of by one Swallow, hauing tied a red Silk twine about her Claw; and she fayled not the yeare following, to returne and build her nest, where she had done the yeare before, bringing the Silke fast tyed at her foote. She neuer lodgeth two yeares together, in one and the same nest.

She is not affraid of a man, and (willingly) buildeth not her nest in Houses. It is saide, that God hath done this in his great prouidence, to the ende, that such Creatures, as haue no other feeding but on Flies, which doe so much molestation to men all Summer, and in the beginning of Autumne; might thus be deuoured. It is the onely Bird which feedeth in the Ayre, and there catcheth a prey, to carry to her young ones. But some people, not knowing what they do; will breake downe their Nests, shut their windowes and doores of their Chambers, to the ende, they may not enter in or out, to carry feeding to their young. Nay, they do them all the iniuries they can, breaking their Egges; yea, sometimes they kill both He and She. But if a man knew the good and commoditie, which these pretty Birdes doe bring vnto vs; they would be more milde, and let them liue in peace.

I know very wel, there are some who will alleadge, that the Dung of these Birds is so pernicious, as if it fall into a Mans eyes (as it did to Tobias) it will then, without all question, make him blind. But they that haue alleaged this History, were not skilful in the tonges; albeit Mathiolus, a man learned, hath a- uouched the same, following their opinion. For the Iewish Theologian Doctors, wel skild in the Syrian and Hebrew Languages, say: that it was not Swallows that dinged on the eyes of Tobias, but Sparrowes, which is confirmed by Dioscorides, when he saith, Swallowes being eaten, doe cleare the sight, like as the Beccicus, or Gnat-snapper. The Ashes of them, as well of the great as smal (their bodies being burned in an earthen pot, and Hony applyed to them) doe take away al impeachments that trouble the sight. It may then well be discerned hereby, that the dung of the Bird which tooke away the sight of Tobias, was not that of the Swallow, according to their iudgement. And Galen is of the same mind with Dioscorides: I refer it then to better censure.

She hath instructed man, how hee ought to bulde, for with Straw and Morter she buildeth her Nest, and with such cunning; that hardly can any Man make the like. When she desireth propagation, the Male medleth with his Female; but not in mounting, or reading vpon her, but by ioyning both their hinder parts together, for which to yeilde a reason, Alianus saith, that he neuer knew any rendred. They fly abroad in the fields, to seeke for Wool, which they plucke from the backs of Sheepe with their claws, and carry into their Nests, whereon they lay their Egges, to preserue them from breacking, as also the enclosed young ones from hurting.

place of Father and Mother, give feeding to their little Birdes, beginning at the first which is hatched, and first breaking forth of the shell. Then they seeke another feeding, & give to the second, and so to the rest following, euen to the fift and last: for they lay and sit no more but five Egges at each brood. Thus we may see, how this Bird instructeth man, how to carry himselfe in nourishing, exalting and distribution of his goodes to his Children, aduancing alwaies the first borne or eldest. They daily cleanse their nests of al ordure and dung found therein, and are very skilfull in defending themselves from vermine, which are enemies to their Egges, and will bite them. But nature hath endued them with so much knowledge, as they can well preserue their Egges from harmefull vermine: for they seeke out the Hearbe called Smallage, in Latine called Apium, and bring it into their Nests, and by the strong sent or bitterness thereof, the vermine dye.

Their young Birdes doe resemble whelps, that continue for a time blind: but the Male flieth abroad, and findeth a certaine Hearbe, by meanes whereof their sight quickly commeth. Very long and diligent inquisition hath been made after this Hearbe, and the Birdes very narrowly watcht for it; yet could it neuer bee knowne what Hearbe it is. If a man open the eyes of the young Birds, they recouer their sight without any other help: but some do assure vs, that (by meanes of that Hearbe) their sight is the clearer. Which being known to men, the Plant would serue to make their sight more perfect: and therefore (guessing at the true Hearb) they call it * Chelidonia, or Hirundinaria.

For so many benefits, which men receive by means of this Bird, beside those recited in the beginning of this Chapter; instructing how to build, keep our Houses cleane, delighting vs by her singing, preseruing sight by that kinde of Hearbe, and detroying hurtfull vermine: me thinks no man should molest her, but rather peaceably converse with her, as a guest or friend that cometh but to see him. She eateth not any thing of ours, but she frees vs from a multitude of flies, as she flyeth in the Ayre: and she should bee entertained,

(as Homer saith) chearfully, like a good guest at her coming: and when she is willing to depart, not to withhold her.

The Ashes and Flesh of this Bird, as we haue formerly said, doth not onely serue to cleare the sight, and recouer it if it bee lost: but it is a remedy also for many much greater euils. For, if we take the Swallows first young ones, in the Moones encreasing, and cleane them: we shal finde diuers litle stones in their bellies, whereof two are to bee taken; to wit, one that is of many colours, and another which is but of one colour onely. These stones, wrapt in the skin of a young Hart, or Heifer (before it haue toucht the ground) and tyed about the necke or arme: is much auailable for such as haue the falling sicknesse, and maketh them very chearfull. Galen giueth assurance, that Swallows ashes, incorporated with Hony; doe helpe the Squinancy, and all other defects or Impostumes in the throat, as also the Almondes, or Pallat or Vuula.

Pliny saith, that there are three kinds of Swallows, whereof, one buildeth her Nest vnder Houses; the second, in old ruined buildings, in holes and Caernes of Rockes and clifts on the Sea side; and the third, buildeth in the bankes of Riueres. In the Isle of Samos, there are Swallows naturally all white. Behold what I haue gathered out of good and approoued Authours, concerning the properties of this Bird; in whose imitation we may well order our Oeconomy or Household government.

I cannot sufficiently wonder at some Men, who haue compared these friendly Swallows, to scarce faithfull and dissembling Friendes; who are no Friendes, but so long as there are meanes remaining, to deriue any commodities from them. For they haue imagined, that these Birdes doe liue on the Seedes, Graine, and Fruites of the fiede; and that so soone as they are lockt vp, they flye away into some other Countrey. But it is a matter most certaine, that these kinde Birdes doe not liue vpon any kind of Graine or Fruites: but on Flies; which (by very great agility) they take in the Ayre, being very molestuous to men,

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradoxe in defence of Hard-Lodging, approouing it to be more healthfull and commendable; then those in great Pallaces, and houses of pleasure.

The benefit of poore and homely buildings.

Heauen no enemy to humble dwellings.

Great houses are fittest for great persons

Lready we haue discoursed of poore and meane descent, now come we to speak of the humble cottage, the dwelling wherein I haue and will maintaine. The building of such honest houses of harbour, doe require little expences and charge, in lesse time are they erected, more easily furnished, and with far greater commodity kept and frequented, then state-ly Pallaces, and houses of pleasure. The proportion of a handsome little house, carrieth good correspondency, and no outward wanton appearance. It is lesse subiect to the danger of Theeues, then is the large and spacious Pallace; compassed about with rare deckings, great & base Courts, Offices, Stables, Dog-kennels, Hearnries, Hauk-mewes, and other such superfluous delights.

The poore and simple house; is not easily toucht with lightning and tempests from Heauen, and a man may dwell there more quietly, then in the fairest prospected Lordship: garnished with so many Gardens, Arbours, Turrets, Vaults, Mountaine-like wals, and other curiosities, which doe nothing else but tire and weary men. The poore house is sooner provided, and with lesse cost then the greater. It excuseth the Maister from making Feasts, to such as (commonly) returne but mockes when they are inuited. The smal house is free from the Harbingers marke; of the Marshals of Princes, Cardinales, and Lords, that cannot be entertained but in pompous dwellings. Let vs but consider, where such States haue made but the least sojourning; how many things haue need of new mending? And their passage that way, resembled a storme and tempest of raine, washing all good order for a long while after. See if your Sernants become the better instructed thereby; your Household in any more ciuill manners, or your house furniture in such good sort as it ought to be. I had almost forgot, that (many times) they put their Host to the perill of borrowing, inciting great Lords to affect his Liuing. So that, if they can cunningly compasse the meanes in recompence of their kinde entertainment: the Host is brought to the hazard of confiscation, for the very least word inconsiderately spoken, eyther against the Prince or Religion.

This is the reason, why I cannot sufficiently meruaile, at the great follie and poore iudgement of some Men, who couet huge Pallaces, and sumptuous Houses for their abiding and lodging; being much grieued and offended, if they should take but one nights rest in a meane, poore, and populer house. As if our Soule (full of all excellent noblenesse, and endued with infinite priuiledges, which God hath thereto assigned;) should imagine the body too strait and narrow a roome, for hir to abide in. Or as if (in how short time God best knoweth, whether wee be willing or no) we should not render the bodie into a much lesse Lodging, to finde out one farre more excellent and magnificent for the Soule. Can a meane House, a hard Bed, or a narrow roome bee any hindrance: but that our Spirit (freely, and at her owne ease) may make discourse thorow all Celestiall pleasures, much better delights then can bee wished for in this world? It need not (there) stand bound to so many inconueniences; as the dwellers in faire and Lordly places, are euermore subiect vnto.

When Warre had his beginning, and entred into consultation, to burne and destroy the Countrey on all sides, as it proued most to yeelde disadvantage: the Soldiours, and men appointed for spoyle, receiued no charge to meddle with little Hamlets, or poore Shepherdes Houses; but the most magnificent and beautifull habitations of of great Lordes and Princes. Beside, if neede required to make a Fielde. assembly, in what place soeuer it were: the fayrest Castles & costliest buildings were sure to bee first taken vp and v. fed.

But let vs admit, that a poore mans Cottage suffers spoyle among the rest: yet the Man hath this comfort left him (a priuiledge beyond the large capacity of Castles) that his House will (well nere) be as soone builded againe, as a Captaine can commaund and set his fiede in order. But when a great Pallace becommeth ruined, many years are required to erect it againe; beside, it serueth (a long while after) as a receptacle for Rascals and Field Run-awaies, or as a warren for Toads and Serpents, or as a Garden for Fresh-water Souldiers.

I cannot chuse, but take pittie and compassion on such mens affections, that place their whole felicity on such thinges, whereby they can receiue no praise or honour. For it oftentimes commeth to passe, that the glorie of a goodly building, beareth not his name that caused it to bee made; but of the new Purchaser, or the cunning Architect, who deseruedly is stiled Maister of the worke. But say, that the party himselfe, who was at the charge of the building, doe carry Name and Title thereof: what a sillie glorie is it (but farre greater vanitie) to couet honour by beeing a Lord ouer Stones, which are thinges sencelesse and voide of life? To be Maister of a peece of Wood? Or, when all is said, a Lord of Chalke and Dust? Were it not much more famous for him, to bee entituled a Lord of many faire Artes and Sciences? Or to win honour by some heroycal, worthy, and vertuous actions.

That it ought to be so, ancient Princes and potent Lords, who more esteemed valour and vertue, then matters earthly & transitory; were neuer wont to set their affections on sumptuous buildings: but were altogether studious, and addicted to the excellencie of vertue and prowesse. Was not the house of great Euander, little, mean, & poorely built? And yet notwithstanding, the fame of the vertuous Maister thereof, made it esteemed of no lesse value, then other great & royall Pallaces, and deserued to entertaine the famous & highly renowned Hercules. Iulius Caesar, neuer builded but a little house; because he would not be hindred from so many singuler vertues, as brought him (at length) to gouern the great Romaine Empire. Mighty Scipio, that conquered most stubborne Affrica, had neuer any perticuler Lodging: but abroad in one poore village, then in another; to shake off wearinesse, and with-draw himselfe from the mollestation of great affaires.

Diogenes, the graue Philosopher, that was of such an excellent Spirit, as euer any man was in his time: made his dwelling in a poore Tub, to defend himselfe from the raine, and heate of the Sunne. Billarton, that good and deuout man, day very hardly in the Eastern Deserts, in a poore little Cell, which he had (as Saint Hierome reporteth) more truly made as a Sepulcher, then any House to dwell in. Galba lodged in a House so rent and torne on all sides, & open about so many places, that being (one day) desired by a friend of his, to lend him his Mantle: he answered that hee could not spare it, because it serued to counter-guard his poore lodging. This he spake, beholding a great hole in the rooffe ouer his head, which had been lately broken; and perceiuing a darke cloud not farre off, that threatned a present shewer of raine. Iulius Drusus Publicola, had (in like manner) a house so broken and shucred: as whosoeber was without, might easilie discern and count the moucables within, and behold what the good man did in his house.

To speake truly, we thinke they haue a great portion of folly and ambition, that couet to dwell in goodly Pallaces, holding little Cottages & meane Houses in contempt and scorue: as if those gaudy places, and built with such beauty, were more defensiu then the other, from meeting with the assaults of death, and infinite mishaps and diseases that befall vs in the World. Such as are read in Histories, or conceiue in the any pleasure, can say with me, that when Tullius Hostilius was smitten with thunder, he was then most merry in his Pallace royall. When Tarquinius Priscus was slaine, he was in his most magnificent nificent Lodging. How many other Lords may we speake of, both Ancient and Moderne, that haue beene flaine in their braue Castles, by diuers accidents and misfortunes? The Duke of Vrbine, who builded a Pallace most faire and rich: did it defend him from danger, or being the most wofull example of calamity to euery eye, that happened in his time? The goodly Pallace of Trent, said to be without comparison, for the infinite Roomes contained in the round: was it any priuiledge to the Builder thereof, in exempting him from as many miseries and mishaps, as the wretchedst Varlet in the World could haue no more? To what end serued so many and excellent rare Buildings, created by Lucullus and Metellus? wherein were Caligula or Nero more happy then others, though they had houses of such spacious circuit, as comprehended (wel neere) the whole Citty? The braue worke-man that builded the Pallace at Paris; could he warrant himselfe from stretching on Mount Falcon, which hee likewise made for Malefactors?

We wil conclude then, that he is to be accounted a meere Foole, that disdaines to dwell in a poore or meane house, or take quiet rest in a good hard bed: coueting with heat and greedy desire, to make his aboad in stately places, wherein (for the most part) lurketh all misfortune, fraud, dissimulation, slander, treason, and misery. He that is loth to credit what I say; let him make but one moneths experience; and he will finde it too true to his cost. For assuredly, these are the places, where commonly hapneth most secret mischiefes; either by broaths or drinkes, seasoned otherwise then they should bee, or by the power of too keene a Weapon; or other Stratagemes of like nature. They are safe shelters also, for wanton and libidinous pleasures: where a false friend may soonest graft hornes on his companions head, and where fire is soone kindled, but slowly quenched.

Let vs then shunne them so diligently, as (with our best meanes) we may, and let vs delight in simple habitations, fit and aptly furnished with all peace and tranquility. In so doing, we shall not stand obliged, or be any way beholding to cunning Builders, highly praised and esteemed by their Worke-Maisters; and yet can purchase good Liuinges out of their vanities, where afterward they sit and floute at their follies. Rather let vs content our selues to imitate the workes and Buildings of Doxius, Sonne to Celtus; who first found out the inuention, to crect his House after the manner of Swallowes. Then will wee remember, to frame our Houses, according as Mortall men ought to doe, not as if wee should continue in them perpetuallie: but as hoping (one day) after our short voyage in this world, to inherit & haue part in another manner of dwelling, builded after a much better fashion and compasse; then those that are framed, by the fraile and earthlie hands of men.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of some that haue beene punished, for hauing done better then they were commaunded: And others, because they did well, without commaund.

HE that dependeth on another mans will, ought to be careful of himself, not onely in well-doing; but also in doing better then he is commaunded. For, I will declare by some Histories in this Chapter, that of these two sorts, of doing well, and better then well; there haue been some seuerely punished. As it happened to an ingenious Maister of Athens, to whom Publius Crassus, a Mutian (being Proconsull in Asia for the Romaines, and being ready to besiege a Citty) gaue charge, to seeke for two Shippe Mastes, which he had seene in Athens, to make an Engine for battery of the wall, telling him, that he would haue the greatest. The skilfull Maister, beeing a Man of great vnderstanding, well knew, that a Mast of such greatnesse, would not be apt for any such effect: in regard whereof, because a meaner was much more conuenient for the battery, and easier for for carriage; he sent such a one to Crassus. When he perceiued his purpose to be thwarted, hee caused the ingenious man to be brought before him; and demaunded of him, why hee had not obeyed as he was commanded? And being willing to hear no reason or excuse; gaue charge to strip him naked, and to be whipt with Rods, as he was; and so long, till he dyed. For it appeared so Crassus, that in stead of obeying, hee sought to counsell him. So, it was not without cause, that there arose a common Prouerbe; A Man shall haue worke enough to gouerne himselfe well in this World.

Long time before this Mutian dealt so hardly with this skilfull man, one Papyrius, a Romaine Dictatour, did no lesse: but rather proceeded further, or more rigorously (in regard of qualitie among persons) towards a Noble Romaine, Colonell of the Romaine Cavalery. This man gaue battaile to the Samnites, without his expresse command, and slew twenty thousand of the enemies. Neuerthelesse, though he had done well and valiantly: yet hee was condemned to death (beeing named Quintus Fabius Rutilianus) without any respect of his merit, or race. And, as the custome then was, before the stroke of death, the condemned person must be seuerely bearen, which while the miserable Rutilianus endured: the most Honourable Lords in the Armie, entreated Papyrius, to deferre his death till the next morning, which (with much ado) at length he granted. In meanwhile, night granting means to the condemned man to saue himselfe, he fled to Rome, and implored the ayde of the Senate, for safetie of his life: but it was in vaine, for Papyrius still stood resolute for his death. Whereupon, the condemned parties Father (who had formerly bene Dictatour, and three times Consull) was constrained to make his recourse to the people, and (by way of supplication) to sollicite the Tribunes of the people for his Son; all which could not diuert the rigor of Papyrius. Finally, he was entreated of all the people, and by the Tribunes of the people, protesting, that he should not pardon Fabius the punishment hee had deserued: but to deliuer to the Romaine people, and the Tribunes, the power of his correction.

The people of Carthage would not haue laboured so much, to saue the life of any Man, that had committed such an Act as Rutilianus did: For, the Captaine or Generall, that had giuen battaile to the Enemy, without expresse commaundement of the Senate, although he had won the day; was sure to be hanged. And to speake truth, it hath euermore bene obserued, in all Militarie discipline; yea, from all antiquitie; that the Souldier or Captaine, that fought or gaue battell, against prohibition made vnto him, deserued death.

In like maner, Caesar speaking of one of his Captaines, named Syllanus, said: He did well and wisely, not to giue battaile, albeit he was sure to haue had the victorie. Because (saith hee) it is not in the Captaine, to goe beyonde the prohibitions giuen him. For it is most certaine, that nothing should be done in matter of warre, contrary to commands: nor a Captaine or Liutenant ought not to giue battaile, except he bee expresselie commaunded. And this was the cause, that the Counte of Aignemont was in danger, and had at length (by especiall fauour) onely as punishment, a reprehension publikely giuen him, by Charles the first, Emp. for going battaile to the Marshall de Termes, although hee had the victorie, because the danger of all the Low Country lay at the stake, if he had lost the day.

But this last point is to be vnderstood of Captaines, that haue no charge of command in title of offices, for the Officer, as the Consull, Constable, the Captaine erected in Title of Office, to haue full command ouer the Army, and make the war: may (by vertue of his office) without attending especiall command, giue war to a published enemy, pursue him, bid battaile, besiedge, and (if he can) take Fortes, and dispose the Army at his discretion; if hee haue not perticular prohibition from his Soueraine, by whō his power is appointed. But hauing taken strong holdes, or the chiefe of the enemies; he cannot re-deliver them without especiall command. True it is, that in the populer Common-weales, these points are not obserued, Obedience is the chiefe in Military discipline.

Of Heliodorus the Mytilenian and his banquet.

We read in the Greeke Histories, that one Heliodorus a Mytilenian, made a banquet, in midst whereof, deliivering demonstration, that his guests should not make spate of any thing: he comanded two of his Slaues to goe buy two Sep-tiers of Wine, of a Man that sold wine neere to his house. The Slaues finding the Wine to be bad, went and bought else-where, such as was excellent good, and liked all the company, saying, they neuer dranke better. Whereon the Slaues said, that it was not of the wine which their Lord sent them for, for it beeing naught, they were faine to buy in another place. Whereat Heliodorus grew offended, because they brought not according to his commaund, although the wine was better: when the company was departed, he so tormented the poore Slaues that they dyed. Thus you see what ill fortune it is, to be in subiection to people ouer seuerer, and without any temperance: punishing such as they haue command ouer, rather for doing well, then ill.

Of the Emperour of Æthiopia, called Prete-Ian, or Prester-Iohn: Of his Originall, and Customes of his people.

THe Great Emperour of Æthiopia, vnto whom we corruptlie giue the Name of Pres-biter-Ian, is neither Priest or sacrificer, though he be (by some) called PRETE-IAN, and (by his owne people) named Belaugian, that is to say, Toy of incompareable excellencie, or of most value; and by others of them, he is also called Ian, which (in their Language) signifieth Mightie. He commandeth ouer seauenty and two Kingdomes, which are all of different languages, hauing their diuersity of Customs, and the colour or complexion of their Faces; are much disagreeing. He is able to leuy in preparation for warre, a Million of fighting men; five hundred Elephants with their Armour and Munition for encounter, with an infinite number of Horses and Camels. His Knights or Warlick Soldiers, enter armed to the battell, each wearing a long Coat of Maile, stretching downe closely to their Thighes, a Sallet or Head-piece on the head, a crooked Fauchion by their side, and a Lance with two Steele points or Pikes. Such as haue no Sallets or Head-pieces, do wear thick quilted Caps on their heads, plaited after the manner of Mameluke Soldiers. The yonger sort, carry Darts, Arrowes, and Slings, obseruing the same Discipline, & be as obedient or well-gouerned, in ranging their battaile, as wee are. They vse Drummes of Brasse, and Trumpets also, to encourage their Soldiers to the fight, which is performd with great hardiment, appointing also, sundry honours, and respectiue rewards, to such as declare themselves to be of highest merit. They doo daily pay the families of their Warriours, and marke the Children that are born of them, with a Crosse, which they imprint suddenly in the flesh with an hot Iron, so that the signe remaineth, as if it were naturall vnto them.

His soldiers Armour for their defence, and such as Wine in a Cup of Golde; but he hath another kinde of drinke, made of fower Apples, and mingled with Sugar, which he receiuet in a cup of Chrystal. While hee feedeth, three hundred lustie young men (chosen out of the seuerall kingdoms vnder his Dominion, hauing the place of Archers, and of his Guard) doo stand about the Tent-royall. For, by an ancient custome it hath been kept, that the King liueth continually out of any City, wherein he neuer abideth but two dayes only; and those Tents are erected in such manner, that the back-part is euer placed to the East, and the doore opening is opposite to the West.

The vsual Armes or weapons of these Guards, are Swords, Daggers, and Iauelins, their neckes and shoulders beeing gurgerted with thicke skinned Beasts. Four Kings, who (by commandement) do attend the Court, follow (each after other) the Table-seruice, accompanied with many Barons, and meaner Officers, euen from the Kitchen, vnto the Tent of Prete-Ian, all cloathed in Silke, Seudale, and Scarlet: and there they deliuer it to the Pages, who come forth purposely to receiue it. The King and al his Court fare deliciouly, with Fowle, Fish, and al kind of Venison. So soone as he hath dined (for hee neuer sups, but in Feastiual dayes) his Eunuchs goe to fetch diuers Queenes (according vnto their seuerall quarters) being Wives of the forenamed Kings, to waite on the Queene, and wife to Prete-Ian, conducting her vnto his Tent, to giue him pleasure and contentment, and there they sing and Dance in his presence. He hath foure Wives, who are the Daughters of his neighbor-kings, yet he lodgeth but with one of them, to whom he is solemnly married with many Ceremonies; but if it chaunce that hee haue no Children by her, then he calt to his bed one of the other.

When he purposeth to shew himselfe in publicke, his face is couered with a vail of Taffata, which hee listeth vp, and pulleth downe, that hardly can his face be wholly discerned: but if it bee, it is verie quickly couered againe. Hee vseth to shew himself vnto the people three times in the yeare, that is to say, on the daies of Christmas, Easter, and the holy Crosse in September; and (for this purpose) is a goodly high Scaffold duly prepared. The cause of this Ceremony, receiued Originall from David Prete-Ian, fir-named Alexander, whose death was three whole yeares concealed by his chiefe Seruants, that gouerned the Kingdome in his time. Therefore to auoide all the like succeeding inconueniences, the Father of David Prete-Ian, at the earnest entreatie of his people, began first to shew himselfe on these ordained daies; which hath continually (euer since) been obserued, euen to Panuscius Prete-Ian, now raigning in Aethyopia, only excepted when he goeth in warre, for then he marcheth daily discovered. He is crowned with a precious Diadem; the one part whereof is Gold, and the other Siluer, and carrieth (instead of a Scepter) a Crosse of Siluer in his hand: All his Seruants are marked with a Crosse, in the verie flesh on the right shoulder. He is cloathed with rich Garments of frizeled Cloath of Golde, wearing a shirt of Silke, with verie large and wide sleeues, as Dukes in elder times were wont to doe. And from the Girdle downward, he weareth a wide Kirtle of Silke and Cloath of Gold, with a Linnen couerture, after a Bishops manner. On either side of him, goe two Pages, each holding a Crosse of Siluer in the one hand, and a naked Sword in the other.

His Lords, who are as Kings, and carry that Title, do pay him tribute of Gold and other Mettals; of Horsses: and great Cattell of diuers kinds: likewise of cloath of Golde, and of Wooll, according to the quality & best Nature of those countries vnder their Government: Which rights and Tributes they haue from their Subiects, although they be Vassalles (indeed) to none but Prete-Ian himselfe, and to whom they yeilde the greater part of their substance. Some do pay him large quantities of Corne, and of Salt, for the maintaining of his Armies. Others do bring him Pepper, which is a rare Commodity in that Countrey; and some do pay him Slaues.

The Rustrikes, and Country Boores, who liue in the wild and field-frequented Forrests, do bring vnto the Court great store of Lyons, Tygers, and other liuing sauage Beasts, which are afterward shut vp into apt appointed places, to yeelde pleasure and delight to him and his Princes. As for such as dwell further off from the Court, it is sufficient for them to bring Prete-Ian, is greatly honoured and loved of his people, who are verie rich in Gold, not Coined, and other Mettalles: and his Landes being well peopled and inhabited, he deriueth from them verie great Reuennewes. They cloath themselves with Linnen, Wollen, and Silke: addicting their minds much to Husbandry, and Tilling the ground.

In the Realme of * Secua, where the King most abideth, they haue two crops or Haruests each yeare, for they haue also two Summers. They gather all things necessary for the maintenance of life, and in great abundance; especially, the grain of Barley, and all kinds of Pulse, Pease, and Beanes, &c. Millet and Panicke, or Indian Oat-meale, groweth there so hie, as it ouer-toppeth a man riding on horse backe. The Vines do yeelde an infinitie of Grapes or Raisins, whereof they make great plentie of Wine: but beside, they do ordinarily make Beuerages of Beere, and other of Peares & Apples well compounded with Barley, Millet, or Wallwort, whereof the verie meanest of the people do daily drinke. They vse to set forth their Bankets yearely, with greene Figges, and Apples that are very fauoury. They haue great store of Wood, called Ibonie, and diuers kindes thereof: They vse to hunt Lyons, Leopards, Rhinocerotis, and Elephants. They haue great store of Cattle, goodly Horses, and gallant Mules, which they sell (at great price) to Barons of the Court.

The first dignity among them, is that of the Priest: the second; of prudent and wisemen, whom they call Balsanats and Tenquats; Bounty and good Conuersation is highly esteemed amongst them: The third degree is of Noblemen, and then that of Soldiers. Such as are established to render right and reason to euery man, do punish greuously the delinquements. They plucke out the eyes of Theeues, and then afterward, giue them a publick Slaue to keep them company, and lead them thorow far remote Countries and Kingdomes, getting their liuing by playing on the Harpe; to the sound whereof, they accord their voices, and so go singing from doore to doore:

and if they chauce to stay in one place more then a day, they are both put to death, the Theefe and the Slaue. They deliuer a Murtherer, into the handes of his Kindred whom he hath slaine, to the end, that they may take such vengeance, as to them seemeth good, for the outrage committed on their blood. If anie deale with Children, in the abhominable sinne of Sodomy, the offender is iudged (by them) to be worthy of death. And who-soeuer doth rashly reuolt from his Religion, is stoned to death before al the people. Also, hee that transgresseth the Ceremonies and Commandements of Religion, wickedly blaspheming God, the glorious Virgin, or the Saints, is burned aliue in a publicke place. Other delicts of lesser Nature, are iudged according to the will and Arbitrage of the Interpreters of the Lawes.

The Abyssines haue a perticular Language, and Characters of Letters proper to themselves, wherein the New Testament was imprinted at Rome. The Holy Scripture hath also bene translated into their Abyssine tongue; and * I my selfe (being then a young Lad at Rome) began to learne the Language; of one Frier Peter, an Abyssine, and of the order of Saint Francis, a man of excellent gifts, good life, and greatly beloued by Pope Paule the third, and all his Court. This Fryer dwelt behind the Tribunal of S. Peter, in the house and Church dedicated to the Abyssines, where they celebrated after their maner, and were maintained at the Popes charges.

The Abyssines do not stamp anie money, but make vse of that which cometh from others; which is of gold marked with Strabesque Letters, and they call those pieces of mony, Pardals & Syraphs. They pay their Soldiers in certain pieces of Gold and Siluer, of diuers waights; and with them also, they buy such things as are sold in the Markets. They celebrate their weddings with meats very solemly, and if the man or woman be taken in Adultery, they doo repudiate both the one and the other. They are baptised, and yet notwithstanding that, they adde some marke vpon the fore-head; with a hot Iron, and will not wholly leaue the Hebrue vse; for they cut the Prepuce, and take a little flesh also from womens secrets. Fathers, thorow the Kingdome; and by want of Males, one of the Kinred, being the most vertuous, doth next succede. This Prete-Ian gouerneth many Countreyes, and boundlesse Seas.

They haue greatly erred, that in their Maps and Tables, haue placed his seate in Asia, beeing ignorant that there is a double India; the one in Asia, and the other in Ethyopia. His Kingdome confineth (on the Leuant or East-side) the Red and Barbarian Sea: And on the South, the Sea called Agisimbe; and on this side, the Region goeth like a Promontorie towards the South, to the Cape called De bona Speranza. Almost at the end of Prete-Ians Land, in one of his Kingdomes called Goyanne, is the source of Nilus, a Riuer that runnes bathing all Ethyopia; and hauing made a long course, trauesing many Islands (whereof Meroe is the greatest) it passeth swelling along Egypt. It confineth on the North side, Egypt & Lybia; and on the West, the lower Lybia, and the Moors. But the Father of Prete-Ian, being a warlike man, and expert in Armes; amplified and enlarged his Empire; and among other difficult and perillous Wars, he vanquished the Trogodites, who vsing poysoned Arrowes, he tooke (by the way) King Casant, conquered in battell, and smote off his head, as an infamous and cruell Traitor. This man raigned also in that countrey, which looketh plainely Southward to the Sea, called Maagambizique, and is face to face with the great Isle of Saint Laurence. He ouercame likewise the King of Municongo, who afterward became a Christian; and Thermeda Prince of the Blacke-people. He vanquished also King Selan, Lord of the Mahometan Moors, whose passage was a long time out of Arabia Felix, by the strait of the Red sea, into the firme Land, neighboring on Ethyopia.

These Abyssines (for so are they called of all Prete-Ians subiects) haue a Patriark, whom they name Abuna, that is to say, [Father;] hee hath the gouernment of spirituall things, and soueraigne Authority ouer the Priests, which are infinit in number, and distinguished by their churches and Monasteries. To persons badly complexioned in manners, contumacious, and corrupted in the right rules of Discipline: hee exerciseth a seuerer Censure, and excommunication; so that being expelled and abandoned of all men, they wander and dye miserably starued. This Patriarke maketh residence (with his Senate) in the Cittie of Bovvaya, situate in a Mountaine verie austere and full of Woodes, enuironed with perpetuall umbrages, for his better recreation: and there the braunches of the broad-leafed Trees are so plyant, & twine themselues in manner of an Arch, that though the Countrey be most hot, yet in the midday Sun, little or no heate at all is there felt: for their continuall dewing with healthfull and liuely springes, compleateth the grace of their freshnes and verdure. This Patriark receiueth a great leuy of tenths; as also the Reuenues of the King Prete-Ian, who is greatly giuen and affected to Religion, as appeareth by his liberall pietie and deuotion.

He distributeth these Treasures to the poore, and to Hospitals, maintaining infinite Monasteries of Friers of diuers orders: of Saint Anthony, of Saint Frances, of Saint Augustine, of Saint Dominick, of the Calaguritains, and of the Macharians, many whereof he sendeth yearly to Ierusalem, to visit the Sepulcher of our Lord Iesus Christ. When the Patriarke dyeth, such Riches of his as is found remaining, returneth to the Exchequer Royall: and then they proceed to new election of another, that shall be indged to be the most vertuous. Hee liueth chastly, although it be lawfull for a Priest to take a Wife in Marriage; and yet he may haue no more but one.

The only glories of Prete-Ian and his Ethyopians, are, that they do repute themselues to be the verie ancientest Nation among men, because they haue alwayes liued in their innated libertie, and were neuer conquered, either by Semyramis, nor Hercules, nor Dyonisius, nor the Romaines; but they themselues vanquished King Cambyses, and ouer-threw his potent armie. Heereto they adde a more true and eminent glorie indecde, which is, that they were one of the first nations, in receipt of the christian Faith, wel-near from the verie beginning thereof. By meanes of the Eunuch, vnto the famous Queene Candace, who was baptized by Saint Phillip. And that since their Conuersion, they haue constantly kept the same Religion, for so many hundreds of yeares: Albeit, that during this time, they haue haue beene generally (euen as yet they are at this day) mollested, assaulted, and enuironed with Moores, Sarazins, & the Idolatrous Worshippers of Mahomet. And yet, notwithstanding all those cruel Tempests (which heerebefore destroyed the Romaine Empire, and the very greatest part of Christendom, Ethyopia could neuer hitherto be spoyled, either of their Dominion or Religion, albeit some Idolatrous mixture hath crept thereinto: which is the lesse to bee maruelled at, if we may credit their own saying, in alledging their constancie and Antiquity, because they deriue their Noble Originall and continuance, from the royall Kings, Dauid and Salomon; of whome, the blessed Virgin Marie (Mother to our Saviour) descended, and he himselfe, according to the flesh.

And afterward, in the yeare one thousand siue hundred thirtie three, Pope Clement the seauenth, and the Emperour Charles the fift, being met together at Bologna, an Ambassador came to them, from valiant Dauid King of Ethyopia, being named Don Frances Aluarez, a Portugualis, to whom audience was giuen in the publicke Consistory, the 29. day of January: There hee presented the Letter (ensuing) to his Holinesse, & (in name of his King) he gaue the obedience obserued from Antiquity, and likewise in his name, presented a Crosse of Golde, waighing a pound; hauing first kissed his foot, hand, and mouth. The Letter was written in the Ethyopian Language; afterward translated into the Portugual tongue, then into Latine, and againe into Italian, and it was read by the Secretary to his Holinesse, in the publick presence.

ost Happy and Holle Father, ordained of God to be the Consecrator of men, and to sit in the seat of Saint

Peter; to whom the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen was giuen, and whatsoever he bound or loosed on earth, the like should be done in Heauen, as Iesus Christ himselfe spake, and Saint Matthew hath written in his Gospel: The King to whose name Lyons doo reuerence, and (by the grace of God) named in Baptism, Atanatingil, that is to say, Inspired by the Virgin; but after I tooke the royal Scepter, was named Dauid, Beloued of God, a Pillar of the Faith, of the Line of Isaac, the sonne of Dauid, the sonne of Salomon, sonne to the Pillar of Sion, sonne of the seed of Jacob, sonne to the hands of Mary, by carnall succession, and son of Naku, Emperor of high Ethyopia, of manie great Kingdomes, Iurisdictions, and Lands; King of Xoa, of Cassata, of Parigir, of Angota, of Baru, of Beilerguanana, of Adear, of Pangua, of Gizama, whence issueth Nilu, of Amara, of Burghamedit, of Amben, of Tigremalton, of Sabaa, where raigned the Queen of Saba, of Bernagaps, and Lord so farre as to Egypt. All these Landes are vnder my power, and manie others, great and small, which I neither number or expresse by their names, as induced thereto by any pride: but onely to the end, that the soveraigne God may be praised, who hath bestowed Christian Religion on so many great Kingdomes, and hath enlarged to me so great a grace as continually I may do him seruice, hauing made me a Capitall enemy to the Moores, and such as worship Idollies. I send to kisse the feete of your Holinesse, as other Christian Princes vse to doo, to whom I am not the meanest both in power wer and Religion. I am in my Realmes, a strong Collumb of the Faith, and have no neede of any other, but put in God my whole hope and succour, he hauing alwaies sustained and gouerned me since such time as the Angell of God spake to Saint Phillip, when hee taught the true & sincere Faith vnto the Eunuch, belonging to the potent Queene Candace, Qu. of Ethiopia, when hee returned from Ierusalem to Gaza, where Saint Phillip baptized the said Eunuch; by whom likewise the Queen was afterward baptized, with a great part of her house and people. The successors of which famous Queene, did neuer since faile in true Christianity, but haue continued euermore firme & constant in the faith, so that my predecessors haue not beene holpen by any but God, and haue extended the Christian Faith, as I haue laboured to do the like.

Of Goyanna

I keepe my selfe impaled within mine own limits, like a Lyon compassed with: in a thicke Forrest, strong against the Moores, and other Nations enemies to Christ, that will not heare the worde of God, nor my faithfull exhortations. I haue pursued them with my sword in my hand, and (by little and litle) chased them from their Nestes, by the helpe of God, who neuer failed mee; which hath not happened in like manner to other Christian Kings; for when they wold extend their limits, they went not against Infidelles, as easily they might haue done, by meanes of assisting one another, besides their further aid of your Holinesse Benediction, wherein I also claime a part. For among my Charters, there is found the Letter of Pope Eugenius, which he sent heere tofore (with his benediction) to the King of the seed of Jacob; of which benediction, I haue iouissance, and highly delight in it.

Beside this, I holde the Temple of Ierusalem in great honor, and thither I send goodly offeringes by my Pilgrims, and much more rich and costly should they bee, if the wayes were assured from Infidelles, who beside their robbing the messengers of their presents, do hinder them also from free passage. And if the voyage to Rome were free and open, I wold com in familiarity and company of the Roman Church, as other Christian Princes do, to whom I am not inferiour. For, euen as they do, I confesse one direct faith, and one Catholicke Church, I belecue sincerely in the holy Trinity, one only God, and I beleue the virginity of our blessed Lady. I hold and keepe the Articles of the Faith, as they were written by the Apostles.

At this present, the Lord God by the hand of the most puissant King * Emanuel, hath opened the way, to the end that we may visit one another by Embassies, and (ioyntly in faith) serue one God. But it so pleased God, that his Ambassadors being in our Court, they told vstydings of his death, and the succession of his son (my Brother Iohn) in the Crown. So that the death of the Father, brought me not more grieffe and discontent, then the happy comming of his son to the Kingdom, caused ioy and gladnesse.

Aed such is my hope, that ioyning our forces and Armies together, we may run thorough the Prouinces of the Moores, and vtterly destroy them. By which meanes, Christians may (more commodiouse) go and returne from the Temple of Ierusalem. And as I earnestly desire, that I may be made pertaker of the loue of God, in the Temples of the holy Apostles Paule and Peter, so do I wish to haue the Benediction of the Vicar of Iesus Christ, which (without any doubt) I repute you to be.

I heare manie things also of your sanctitie to Pilgrimes, which go from our Regions vnto Ierusalem, and thence to Rome, returning backe miraculousely, which hath beene to mee vnspeakeable pleasure. But indeed, I should receiue much greater contentment, if my Ambassadors could vse a shorter way, and bring me (at all times) tidings from you, which I hope they will doo heereafter, sometime before I die, God assisting, who I pray maintaine you in health and holinesse. So be it. I kisse your Holie feete, and humbly pray your Holinesse to send me your blessing.

* This was the K. of Portugal.

ous Letters, amity encreaseth stronglie; especially when it is embraced by holy peace, from whence (doubtlesse) all humane ioy proceedeth. And like as the man that is extream thirsty, desireth earnestly fresh water, as is to be found in the sacred Writings; euen so my heart longeth, to haue Newes by Messengers and Letters from farre-off Countries, wherein I take incredible pleasure. And not only if I might hear some matter of your Holinesse: but also, if such Newes bee certaine, which have been reported to me, concerning Christian Princes, which ioy would be answerable to that, which Conquerors get by rich spoiles and purchases.

Which now at this time may the more easily be done, because the King of Portugall hath opened the passage, which long time hath bene vsed, sending mee his Ambassadors, accompanied with many valiant Knights, in the time of his Father Emanuel, & while he liued. Since when, I haue receiued neither Embassie nor Letters from any Christian King, much lesse from any Pope. Albeit in our Rolles, or Treasury of Charters, which belonged sometime to our great Grandfather, is preserued the memorie of Letters from a Pope of Rome, named Eugenius, sent into these parts, when the seed of Jacob raigned, the King of Kings throughout all Ethiopia, & the superscription of the saide Letters was in this manner: Eugenius Pope of Rome, to our Well-beloued Sonne, the King of the seede of Iacob, King of Kings throughout all Ethiopia, worthy to be reuerenced. And by the summary of the saide Letters, hee declared, that his Sonne Iohn Paleologus, who was as forgotten two yeares before, K. of the Romaines, was called from Constantinople, to celebrat the sacred Counsel, and with him went Ioseph the Patriarke of Constantinople, accompanied with a great number of Arch-bishops, Bishops, and Prelates of all sorts; and among them also assisted the Procuraters of the Patriarkes of Antioch, of Alexandria, and of Ierusalem, all assembled with him in loue of the holy faith and religion. By meanes whereof the vnity of the Church was confirmed, with grace of the Lord, and al difficulties of the passed times (which appeared to be erroneous, and contrary to Christian religion) taken away: which things, being by good order established and confirmed, the same Pope had giuen to all the world occasion of reioicing, as to each one particularly.

Now at this time, wee send you this Book of pope Eugenius, that hath alwaies bin kept by vs without corruption. We would also in like maner haue sent ye, the tract of the order and power of the pontificall benediction, had not the Volume bin ouer-great, for truly it is as big as the Booke of S. Paul to the Gentiles. And the Legates which brought these things hither on the Popes behalfe, were Theodorus, Petrus Dydimus, and George, seruants of Iesus Christ. But you (most holie Father, shall do well to command that the Bookes of your Rolles may be turned ouer and perused, where I think you shall find some memory of this which I haue written vnto ye, that if any thing be reserued on our behalfe, it may be diligently registred among our Bookes, that perpetuall memory thereof may remaine to our posterity & successors. And truly, I account him most happy, whose memory is in letters preserued in the holy City of Rome, the seat of S. Peter and S. Paule, who are Lords in Heauen, & Iudges of the whole world. And because my beleefe is such, I send yee these presents, to the end, that I may win grace with your holinesse, and with your most sacred Colledge, hoping that from thence will come holy benediction, with encrease of all goodnesse.

Moreover, I do intreat your Holinesse to send me some Images of the Saints, & principally of the virgin Mary to the end that the name of hir and of your holines, may be often in my mouth and memory, and that I may continually take delight in your presents. I also require ye to send me some Artzans and workmen, that know how to make those Images, and swordes and armor of all kinds, to fight withal; as also such as can engraue in Gold and Silver, Maister-Carpenters, Architects, and Masons, to make houses of stone. And men that are skilfull in Casting of Lead, Copper and Brasse, to couer the tops of those houses. Beside these men, we shall highly esteeme such worke in Glasse, or such as are Falconers, & such as can make Instruments of Musicke; as also such as can play on Flutes & trumpets. Al which workemen, I desire that may bee of your house; or if you bee not so sufficiently prouided, provided, your Holinesse may easily win such from other Christian Kinges your children, who are all obedient vnto your command: assuring yee, that no sooner shall those workemen heere arriue, but they shall be held in great honour, according to the seuerall merit of euerie man, and shall receiue of my liberality, ample courtesie, reward, and wages: with this condition, that if any one heereafter, be desirous to returne into his owne Country, hee shall depart from my Court so well recompenced, as shall giue him cause to rest contented, carrying hence with him, such things as himselfe shall please, for I wil not keep any man against his mind, when I haue receiued som benefit of his Art.

Now am I to speake of other things, and would gladly demand of you Holie Father, why you doe not admonish the Christian Kinges your Children, to agree among themselues, as it becometh brethren, considering they are of your flock and you their Shepheard? And wel doth your Holinesse know that which is commanded in the Gospell, where it is saide; Every Kingdome diuided in it selfe shall bee desolate. For, if the kings of Christendom were vnited and leagued together, easilie might they destroy the Mahometans, & all other Infidelles; and all their actions wold succeed to their wish; raiuating the Sepulchre of that false Prophet, which is in the Citty of Mecha. Wherefore I pray ye, to labour a firme league of amitie among them, exhorting them to lend me fauour and succor. For, on all the Confines of my Kingdomes, I am enuironed with Moores, Mahometans, and wicked people, who (neuerthelesse) do hold such fidelity together; as wee see not the like. They interchangeably aide one another, making alliance Kinges with Kinges, and Lords with Lords, in great Loyaltie and constancie, and all against vs. There is a King Moore my Neighbor, whom al the other Moore-Kinges (his Neighbours) do furnish with Armes, horses, and all other Instruments for warre. These men, are the Kinges of India, Persia, Arabia, and Egypt, by whom I daily receiue much grieuance, beholding the enemies of Christianity ioyned together in brotherly charity, enjoying peace: & christian Kinges my Brethren, not according together in any maner, nor are moued at their outrages, or any way giuing mee succour, as is the duty of al christians. And so much the rather, because the most filthy sons of Mahomes so aid one another. Not that (in this respect) I would haue you think that I desire any forces for such an enterprise, for I haue sufficient of mine owne, and more then I need. But I intreat only your Prayers and Orisons to God, and couet to find grace with your holinesse, & with all other Kinges my Brethren.

This is the reason why I seeke amitie with you and them, to the end, of being furnished abundantly, with such things as are before required; to the feare and astonishment of the Moores, and that my neighbours (enemies vnto the Christians name) may know, that Christian Kinges (my Brethren) can giue me fauour and assistance, which truly appertaineth to our common honor, since we agree in vnitie of Faith and true religion. We are resolved to continue firme in this counsell & deliberation, which seemeth to Vs, most assured, perfect, and profitable. God fulfill your desires to the praise of Iesus Christ, and of God our Father, whose name be praised of al, in al ages. And you holie Father, embrace mee with all the Saints of Iesus Christ, which are at Rome: and in the same imbracement, I pray ye to receiue al the inhabitants of my kingdomes, and they that remaine in Ethiopia. Thankes be rendred to our Lord Iesus Christ, by your spirit.

Your Holinesse shall receiue these Letters, by the helpe of my Brother King Iohn, son to the most potent King Emanuel, by the handes of Frances Alvarez our Ambassador.

CHAP. II.

Of the ouergreat Superstition of the Queen of Maugy, who lost her mighty Estate, by putting too much confidence in the predictions of Astrologers.

That Superstition is a verie great Vice; bringing manie discommodities and danngers, vnto such as are thereto inclined, may Ordinarily bee seene, As for example:

Note the vain opinion of this world, in meeting some accidents on the way.

If a man (returning from some journey, or setting forth vpon it, his businesse being serious and importent, if hee chance to meet an old Woman on the way, or perceiueth a Hare to crosse the passage before him, he presently takes it for an euill encounter, and to presage some perill towards him.

The Romains were greatly addicted vnto superstitions.

Some Huntsmen also are of opinion, that if they meete a Priest or a Frier vpon the way, as they ride on Hunting, they shall surely (that day) not take any thing. Some others, if they but heare a Pie to chatter, they shall shortly vnderstand of euill tidings. There are some also, so strangely incensed, that they verilie beleue, if they meete a Serpent or Snake: that day no inconuenience can betide them; with diuers other vanities beside, which fauour much more of Paganisme, then of any Christianity. Such superstitions were deeply grounded among the Romaine people, yea, much more then in any other, witness their Auspices, that is; their Consultations which they wold make, before they began any war or expedition, by the obseruation of Birds, beholding their flight, listening their songs, and whether they fed wel or ill; in regard whereof, they lost many commodities in their warres. And it is not to be doubted, but that euerie superstitious Captain, will hardly do any thing of desert; which Cicero well noted in his Bookes of Diuination, and maketh a mockery thereat.

Cicero in Lib. de Diuinat.

The Tartars of Asia very superstitious.

This follie is dispersed thorough the world, but yet in some Countries more then other. As among the Asian Tartars who are so much addicted to iudicial Astrologie, and therein so superstitious, as they will neither build a House, Village, Cittie, Temple, or any other building whatsoever, but at laying the first stone, they will set downe in Writing, the day, the houre, the moneth, and the season. The like they do at the Natiuitie of their Children, then they consult with Astrologers and Genethliques*, who then doo fore-tell what pleaseth themselves. And these people are now (at this day) more superstitious in these affaires, then euer they were. And this is the matter which I am now to speake of, in shewing that a woman (being too much ouer-swaied by these superstitions, lost one of the verie fairest Estates in the worlde, and how it hapned, I shall briefly relate.

* Casters of mens fortune by the day & houre of their birth.

The Tartarian Annales do declare, that there was a King of Maugy, named Iada, who beeing on Hunting, espyed a great Lake of Fresh-Water, thorough the middest whereof, passed so strong a Riuer, as was able to beare a Boat, which came from the East Indiæ, a rich countrey. Heereon he considered, that for Commerce and good of his Kingdome, the Territorie round about it was fruitfull, and the Lakes Water nourished great store of Fish, a faire Hauen also, being not farre off thence, standing for the benefit of all Windes; being on the Ocean Sea, which is (almost) continually caline, and in that quarter it would be verie conuenient to build a Citie. Having had Communication in this case with his Counsell, and they allowing the goodnesse of his conceit, hee gaue order to them, for further proceeding in the purpose: this hapned in the yeare of the worlde, according to their supputation, siue thousand, sixe hundred. This Citie was founded vpon piles, and (according to their Custome) they consulted with their Genethliques, to know if this Cittie should flourish and continue for any length of time. Whereto they answered, that it should neuer fall into anie others power, but only of them as should be of the Lignage of Iada, first founder thereof, vntill such time, as a man (who should haue an hundred eies, all clearly seeing) came to besiege it. The Citie was named Quinsay, a worde corrupted of Kynsin, or Checim, in the Iauian tongue, which signifieth a Happy Cittie, and whereof, the whole Prouince where it is seated, tooke the Name of Quinzi. There are two Castles, which command on the Sea, and are adioyning vnto the Lake before named: and there doo the Waters of the Riuer of Babala, yeelde surrender of themselves, as they make their passage ouer the Lake.

Of Iada the King of Maugy, and his hunting.

Determination, for building a Citie.

The foundation of the Citie of Quinsay.

The situation of Quinsay.

The greatnes and commodioufnesse of the Citie.

It is seated about forty siue degrees on this side the Tropicke, in the sixt climate, and the tenth Paralell. This goodly Citie containeth (as such as haue Voyaged thither say) siue good Leagues or thereabout in circuit: which is verie likely to be true, by reason it is erected in the water; and the streetes are verie large, the Pallace great, and forced Garden-plots: the whole bodie being planted at ease, & so well disposed, as a man may goe thorough rough all the Cittie on Land, and in the Channels also, which are large, easie, & great, because the Barkes may the sooner passe them. Horses also may easily passe through the streets, to bring such things as are necessarie for them of the City: And there is no enclosed City in the whole Vniuerse, either on this side, or beyond the Equator, of such wonderful greatnesse. In regard of the goodlie Scituation, it required no long time of peopling, & frequentation of Merchant-strangers, comming from many Countries: as from the rich Easterne Indias, by the Riner of Babala; and by Sea, the Ethyopians, Armenians, Persians, Arabians, Egyptians, Scythians, and others. Heereupon the King failed not to graunt good store of immunities, to draw inhabitants thither: which fortie to his expectation, hee builded a verie beautifull Pallace, that standeth yet intirely whole.

Now, it came to passe five hundred yeares after, that there raigned a King, very rich, named Fasfur; by whom, the Kingdomes were seated in the great Province of Maugy, which is said to be one of the verie greatest in the world; and by whom, the Lands and Seigneuries were so well fortified, as they were thought to be inuincible. By means whereof, none durst assaile or meddle with them; and this was the cause, that both the King and his people left off, and suffered the exercise of Armes to grow quite out of vse. For euerie Cittie was circled and engirt with great and deepe ditches (brim-full of Water) as also with huge walles, verie strongly flanked with goodlie Towers & vnder-props. And in those times, he had (at the least) the number of one thousand and five hundred; but now they can reckon no more then cleauen hundred; and yet hee had no Horses for warre, or anie other seruice; and this assurance occasioned, that the King made no vse of time, but continually tooke his delight & pleasure. He had ordinarily in his Court a thousand Gentlemen, beside his traine of Seruants and Officers, which was great and honourable. Neuerthelesse, hee held Iustice in highest esteeme; affecting peace and tranquility, and he was verie mercifull. No man durst offend, or do wrong to his Neighbor, but he was sure of seuerer punishment. In brecfe, his Kingdome was of such freedome and assurance, that (many times) Trades-men left their shops wide open in the Night, yet none durst be so bolde, as enter into them.

Strangers and Trauailers passing thorough the Countrey, might goe both night and day in safe securitie, without feare of any man. In like manner, the King was verie kind and charitable to the poore, and neuer suffered such as were in extreame pouerty, to complaine of their want and indigence. Moreouer, euerie yeare (by diligent search) he assembled together a great number of children, exposed as Orphans, and forsaken of their Parents (whereof sometimes there were twentie thousand) and them he caused to be kept & brought vp at his own charge, beside many other Charities which wold require much time to reherse, and which is not vsed by christian Princes elsewhere. And although he was a Pagan and Idolater, yet hee suffered Iewes and Christians (whereof some were Nestorians) to liue in all his Kingdoms; and these things were in the yeare of Grace, 1268.

Cublay, King of the Tartars, was then accounted one of the greatest Princes in the world; for he had (as some haue left in writings) thirty or fortie great Kingdomes. Such as make any doubt heerof, let them read M. Paulus, who was (at that time) in those parts, a verie true Author, and they shall find much more then I can heere speake of. His Captaines gaue him to vnderstand, that they could not find any more lands to conquer: for the Sea, and verie huge deserts had set a period at their Conquests, only this Kingdome of Maugy excepted, which confined on some lands of the great Cham Cublay. Now, albeit Fasfur was a friend, and had giuen no occasion of making warre vpon him, only because he was almost as powerfull as the said Cublay, yet Cublay was now aduised to contend for superioritie, and to make his great neighbor tributary vnto him. So minding to vse his men of war, he found them at variance among themselves, and that a great businesse was first to be ended, touching his two nephewes, whereof I haue formerly spoken. Heereupon, Nestordin a neere Kinsman to Cublay, was chosen for this expedition, albeit hee was not then in the Court; but the Commissions being directed to his abiding, the king had newes sent him, that he died two dayes before of a straunge sicknesse. Wherefore, the charge of this businesse, was transferr'd to Baiam

Chinsan, the Sonne of a publicke poore Woman, not auouched by anie Father, and he was borne with many spottes on his bodie, verie neere resembling the eies of a man; whereby hee had the fir-name giuen him of Baiam Chinsan, which signifieth in their Language, the sight of an hundred eyes.

This poore Boy was brought vp by his Mother, so well as her pouerty would permit, not hauing any man that would auouch her to be his wife. As he grew in stature, he addist his minde to follow one of the Emperors Armies, beeing at first but as a Lackey or Drudge, that carried a Soldiers furniture after him. Afterward, hauing attained to more yeares and strength, he was entertained as a Soldier, becomming first a Corporall:
next Ensigne, Lieutenant, Captaine, or Chiefe, then a Colonell: at length, being knowne a man of vnderstanding, valiant, and fortunate, he had the charge of an Army, which hee guided so successfefully, that he annexed to the Crowne of Cublay, Emperour of Tartaria, and his Maister, ten great Prouinces or King-domes, to wit; Miena, Curaiena, Beugala, Canguigu, Anu, Tholoriana, Grigui, Ca- cansu, Ciangli, and Tadiusu: and he neuer attempted any matter, but he brought it to full effect, except the conquest of Pi- amsu, whereof I am to speake elsewhere.

Baiam entered with a great Armie into the Prouince of Maugy, and summoned the King to render himselfe tributary, or else he would warre vpon him, for and in the name of his Prince Cublay: but the King made answere, that he had no such intention. Wherefore, at his first arriual, he besiedged the Cittie of Con- inganguy, and summoned the Cittizens thereof to yeelde themselues: as also, to take an Oath of fidelity and obedience to the Emperour Cublay, which they likewise refused to do. By meanes whereof, hauing heard their answere, he raised his siege, and departed thence, without offerring them anie other harme or mollestia-tion. Afterward, hee did as much to the next Cittie, which also made the like refusall.

Passing on, he summoned four or five other Citties, all which refused yeilding:

but comming to the sixt, he assailed it in great furie, and tooke it by assault: which being done, he returned backe vpon the other Citties, which he took and ruined, so that in very short time, he subdued & tooke twelue Citties. For, he had in his Army verie braue and valiaunt men, all pickt or choise Soldiers, bold and couragious. And the Great Cham, sent him another Armie, as a fresh supply of as great power as the first, which gaue great terror to them of Maugy, causing them to wax desperate, and their hearts to faile them. And King Facsur himselfe, hauing had such deare experience of the corage and valour of the Tartars, and perceiuing how they proceeded on still in their va-danted fury, became so much amazed, that he betooke himselfe to sea, with so many people as hee could muster togither, withdrawing into an impregnable Island, hauing with him aboue a thousand ships; and leauing the guard of the Citie of Quinsay, to the disposition of his wife, there to haue her best support & defence.
In this extreamity the Queen contained very manly courage: and caried her selfe so prouidently, as nothing wanted whatsoeuer, that was iudged necessary for ayd and defence of the Cittie. For she had fiftie thousand men of warre, both Inhabitants and strangers; and twelue or fifteene thousand Diuers, men that could abide long time vnder water, and pierce the bottomes of the enemies ships to sink them in the Riuer. The Cittie was well furnished with Victuals, and all needfull Munition, to endure a long siege, impeaching (euerie way) the entrance into the Hauen, by the Sea. Neuerthelesse, the Queene and the chiefe Commanders were possessed with ouer-great superstition, till they heard, that he who maintained the siege, was named Baiam Chinsan, that is (as we haue formerly said) the sight of an hundred eyes. This made both her and them to tremble with feare, re-membring both the Father and son: and also, because it was registred in the books which were kept in the publick treasure, that neuer should the Cittie be surprized,
but by a man that had an hundred eyes;
and therefore they resolued to yeelde it, though it seemed a matter wholly impossible, yea quite against nature, that a man should haue an hundred eyes. As they were vpon the point of surrendering the

the Citie by composition; the Christians, who had lived in all quietnesse in those Countries; by the meanes of their Bishop Gaspar, declared in the full Senate, where the Queen also was present: that no regard was to be made of such Prognostickes, as proceeded from lying Mathematicians, and Generalliaques, to whom if the Mans Name appeared for to have the sight of an hundred eyes; yet notwithstanding, the man himselfe had onely but two, as other men haue, and these were but the illusions of Sathan, the Father of lying. heereupon, some in the Senatehouse alledged many Histories, which happened in their time; to shew how vaine these friuolous predictions were. Neuerthelesse, the Cowardise of diuers, that neuer vnderstood the nature of warre, or what honour attended on bold hardiment, they being of the greatest in authority, and relying on these foolish superstitions; concluded to surrender the Citie. Wherefore, hauing made (by consent of the Queene) an honest capitulation: they suffered the Enemy to enter, that kept faith exactly with them. Whereat Baiam was not a little amazed, for hee imagined his strength neuer able to surprize it. Cublay being aduertised thereof, caused generall processions to be made, and sollemne sacrifices performed to the Sun; mocking at the superstition of the Quinsayans, and admiring the vnmatchable fortune attending on Baiam. As for the Queene, she retired her selfe to the Court of the great Chan, who received and vsed her very honourably: and concerning the King of Maugy her Husband, he continued his abode in the Island, where he ended his daies.

Quinsay yeelded vp to Baiam and his power.

The capitall Citie being taken, the lesser yeilded.

These Kingdomes could not haue been conquered in an hundred yeares.

At that instant also, the nine Kingdoms contained in that Prouince, yeilded themselves: except the Citie of Stanfu, which out-held the Tartars Army three whole yeares. And it had neuer beene taken, but that M. Paulus, and his Father and Vnckle (by permission of the Tartarian Emperour) made Engines of Wood, which hurled great Stones into the Citie, and did such harme to the so long besieged; as they were constrained to yeilde themselves. Thus you may perceiue, that superstition is the cause of much euill; for doubtlesse, if the Queene and the besieged had stil kept Quinsay, and the other Cities: an hundred yeares labour could not haue conquered the Kingdomes of Maugy.

And heere I would entreat the gentle Readers, not to conceiue amisse of me, for not following the writing of M. Paulus, in his description of Quinsay, for hee saith: That there is in the midst thereof a lake, which containeth ten miles in circuit, and that the Citie is 34. miles in compasse; and hath sixe hundred thousand Houses in it. I rather thought fit, to follow what I finde written in a Dialogue, made by Garcias Orta, a Portugall Phisitian, who saith: That it is not aboue thirty five yeares since he wrote, that it contained not aboue foure or five leagues in compasse, being seated wholly in a Lake, and hath not aboue threescore thousand Houses in it. I know not whether it be diminished, since the said Venetian came thence. It valued in reuennewes, fiftene Millions, and sixe hundred thousand Crownes, to the King yearely, in regard of his right (by way of leuey) vpon merchandises; and yet not counting the Toulc side on Salt, and this was but the ninth part of the great Prouince of Maugy. At this day, as I heard by a Iesuite of Chelous in Champaigne, named Gober, who told me, that he remained there aboue two yeares: and he saith, that the valuation is much more now at this instant.

What the state of Quinsay is in these dayes.

The great Reuenues of Quinsay yearly to the King.

A good kinde of superstition to Augustus Caesar.

Augustus Caesar made better vse of his superstition, then the men of Quinsay, or their Queene did; for, a little before the last battraile, which hee had against his Competitor Anthony: as he went from his Land-Army, to that on the Sea, hee met a Sutler or Victualer to the Campe, driuing an Ass laden before him, of whom he demaunded, how hee was called: the Sutler made answer, that his owne name was Eutchus, and his Asses Niconta: which two Greeke Names signified nothing else, but Fortunate victorie. Heereupon, the said Caesar, presaged by this encounter, that he should be victorious ouer Anthony, who contended for the Empire of the World, and that the Gods had designed it vnto him. On this assurance, he forth-with gaue battell by Sea to Anthony.

Anthony, wherein he prevailed, and so (by consequent) got the Empire.

Pompey neuer tooke any thing in good sort, or successfully.

Pompey, quite contrary, through a great distrust, that he could neuer saue himselfe, nor finde any ayde or assured retreat, after he lost the battaile at Pharsalia against Julius Cesar; grounded his folly on this occasion. In his flight, passing by the Isle of Cyprus, to the end hee might breath a while; with-drew into Ægypt. And being entertained (by the Governour) into the City of Paphos, where his lodging was prepared in a Pallace, builded in a very pleasant plot vpon the Sea, he desired to know who builded it, and how it was named. Answer was returned, that the place was called Cacobasilea, which is as much to say, as Bad Harbour. In regard of which name, it appearing to him to be an euill presage: hee would not enter into it, but passed on farther, and tooke Shipping very suddenly. Being verilie perswaded, that this accident to him at this Pallace, did presage; that he should soone enough meete with a bad lodging to last all his life time. Being landed in Ægypt, to deriue some succour from the King, whose Father he had re-seated in his Kingdome: he caused him to be trayterously slaine, as thinking to doe a great fauour to victorious Julius Cesar.

Sylla, by not being superstitious won the battaile.

But Sylla did better, who perceiuing his Army ready for to giue battaile to the power of Mithridates, King of Pontus; yet all being out of hart, as holding that the day would be lost, because both the Priests and Soothsayers had obserued, that the like day had been alwaies vnfortunate to the Romaines. For it was registred in their Calender, that (as on the very same day) three hundred and sixe Noble Gentlemen, al of the Fabij, wer. slaine in the Warre, by secret Ambushes of the Veientes, who had long time warred against the, hard by * Cremera; and many worthy Captaines beside, had receiued great mischances on the same day. But Sylla, who was no way superstitious, encouraged his Army, saying. Let vs shew our selues so valiant this day, that although it hath beene infortunate heeretofore: yet it may prooue happy to vs. So, suddenly giuing battaile, they won the day. Some other would not haue done it, but rather would haue giuen credit to the dissemblings of Wizzards and Sacrificers. But to punish such men, for weakning the courage of Soildjours prepared to fight: some of them haue beene put into the front of the battaile, where they haue beene slaiue, and very few others. In breece, superstition neuer caused any goodnesse; but hath procured many great losses.

CHAP. III.

Of the Order and Knight-hood of the Templers; and how long it continued.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, ninety six, some Christian Princes (of diuers Nations) made a Congregation, by the counsell of an Hermit named Peter, a man of honest and holy life. It was then determined, to goe for the Conquest of the Holy Land, which was in the power of prophane Infidels, who had kept it foure hundred and ninety years. Among the chiefe in this action, was Godfrey of Buillon, Duke of Lorraine, the most apparant of them all, and he that carried the greatest merit. It pleased God, that after many battailes, which lasted for the space of three yeares: the City of Ierusalem, and many other Cities in Syria and Iudea were conquered, beside diuers other neighbouring Prouinces. Afterward, all the Christian Princes hauing regard to the high deserts of Godfrey; elected him King of Ierusalem: and Arnulphus, Arch-bishop of Pisa, was likewise created Patriarch, by Pope Calixtus the second.

A congregation of Christian Princes, and the cause.

The Conquest of Ierusalem by Godfrey of Buillon.

Godfrey of Buillon remaining King of Ierusalem, there also continued in his company, many great and worthy Christians, who daily made warre vpon the Infidels; as well round about Ierusalem, as in other neighbouring Countries. Which being vnderstood by diuers faithful Christians in the westerne parts, and on what tearmes the affaires stood stood beyond the Seas : great numbers of people went continually thither, some (in meere zeale) to assist Gods seruice, and regaine the vsurped Landes; and others on voyages, to visite the Holy Sepulcher. Now, about a yeare after his Coronation, Godfrey of Buillon dyed, and his Brother, named Baldwine (a man equall euery way to the others merits) was crowned King in his stead. During whose raigne, among many other that resorted daily thither : were nine Gentlemen, intimate friends and great companions, of whom we finde the names but of two ; who (it may be) were the chiefeft, to wit : Hugues de Paganis, and Gaufrede de Saint Adelman. These men being come to Ierusalem, and hauing well contemplated the Countrey, and all the neighbouring places : they found, that at the Port of Iapha, and other places of their passage, there were many busie spies vpon the waies, that daily both robbed and kild Pilgrimes and Passengers. In regard whereof, after good and mature deliberation, they concluded, with the helpe of many more (for it is to be presumed, that they leagued themselues with other people of the saue mind) to make a vow, for doing some seruice acceptable to God, and to imploy their whole life time, in making the waies secure & passable, or else to loose their liues in the enterprife; while the other Christians were busied in other places, fighting with the Infidels. Perseuering in this religious purpose, they tooke (as an assigned place for their retreat) a Church, called, The Holy Temple; by permission of the Abbot there abiding: and in that respect, they were cald Templers, a name which alwaies after remained to them.

When the King and the Patriarch had intelligence thereof, and perceiued their paines to bee holy and commendable: they administred all thinges necessary vnto them, so that they liued (after this manner) in the Temple, both very religiously and chastly, and (which is more) their number multiplyed, and encreased day by day. Notwithstanding, albeit there were now a great number of them, yet had they neyther habite, or any ruses designed them, but liued together in common; obser-uing their vow, and so they continued for the space of nine yeares. During which time, for the great seruice they did to Christendome; their credite and renowne highly encreased, beside the meanes of so worthy an example. By reason of their encrease in number, Pope Honorius the second, at the request of Stephen, Patriarch of Ierusalem; deuised a rule and manner of life for them: appointing, that they should be cloathed in white. Afterward, Pope Eugenius the third, added a Badge, or Armoury of a red Crosse, to be worne on their breasts: which they promised by a sollemne vow to obserue for euer, according as other religious Knightes did. And therefore they were honored, to haue it brought them by the hand of Saint Bernard, a reuerend and holy Doctour, whom they elected as chiefe and first Maister of their Order, according as other religious Knightes had the like obseruation.

In short time after, such was the multiplication of their Order, and honour of their deedes in Armes; as not onely they kept the wayes of the holie voyage, safe from Theeues and Murderers: but also (both by Sea and Land) they made great incursions and strong warres vpon the Infidels. So that their fame and worth spreading it selfe throughout Christendome, the Kinges and Princes (in many partes) ordained and allowed them great Rents and Reuenues, which they imployed in those warres, like true Knightes, attending on the seruice of Iesus Christ. And by successe of time, growi^{ng} on in strength and ability of wealth: in all Countries and Prouinces, they had abiding in the cheefest Citties and strongest places; but most especially in the Holy Land, where ordinarily the great Maister of the Order made his aboad, with the greater number of them; keeping an Army continually there, as also in other places, where most necessity required. It happened afterward, that for the sins of men, discord mooued among the Christians, and the great negligence in Princes: not onely the City of Ierusalem, but other places also formerlic conqueied (as we haue before declared) were regained by the Infidels; ninetie yeares after the conquest made by Godfrey

All which notwithstanding, this Order of the Knights Templers left not their holy labour: but being expulsed thence, they assembled their forces to other places, performing still worthy deedes of Armes against the enemies to our Faith, and continued sixscore years (after the losse of Ierusalem.) preserving that which was left them in the East parts.

In the yeare one thousand, two hundred and ten, or thereabout, the Order of the Templers, which had continued more then two hundred yeares: was vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowne by Pope Clement the fifth, who then remained and kept his Court in the City of Poitiers, in the Kingdome of France: And (as some report) he did it at the request of King Phillip le Bell. This happened, either thorough their prosperity, or ouer-great abounding in welth, by meanes whereof they grew to wickednesse, and were the ruine of themselves. Or, it may be, King Phillip then reigning, was abused by false reportes made of them: Or peradventure, to get the riches of this Order, he perswaded the Pope to doe such a thing, for there are variable opinions written thereof. Neuerthelesse, it sufficeth to say, that they were condemned, and all their goods confiscated. And to compassse the matter the more easily (because they were growne very powerfull) a secret Inquisition was made against them, true or false: after which, the King tooke such order in all parts of his Kingdome, that vpon a certaine daie, purposely appointed, all the Templers that could be found, were taken, their goods seized, and deliuered into the hands of Iustice, which beeing done, processe proceeded against them, and iudgement executed, according as wee meane to declare.

As concerning the crimes imposed on them, they were these. That their Predecessors were the cause of loosing the holy Land; That they elected their Great Maister in secret; That they vsed wicked superstitions; That they helde some hereticall propositions; That they made their profession before a Statue or Image, cloathed in the skin of a Man; That they dranke the blood of Men; that they had made a secret coniuration, by their ayde and assistance, to betray all Christendome to the Turks; That they were guilty of the most abominable sin against nature, Sodomie; and all these matters directly proued against them. For which causes, processe was directed against their Great Maister, named Fryer Iaques, a native of Bourgougne, descended of a very worthy House: and consequent (after him) the like proceeding passed against all the other.

Finally, the Popes sentence condemned them all to the fire, and accordingly they were executed, and their goods made confiscate; the greater part whereof, was giuen to the Knightes of Saint John of Ierusalem, who, about this time, or a little before, had conquered the Isle of Rhodes from the Infidels. Another part of their goods was bestowed on other Orders; and a third part (by permission of the Pope, or otherwise) remained in the hands of Princes, who tooke possession thereof, euen so soone as the sentence went out against them. This sentence was published thorough all Christendome, and allowed for good and iust by the Chronicles of France; as also by Platina, in the life of Pope Clement the fifth; likewise by Raphaell Volateranus, and Polidore Virgill.

Neuerthelesse, there are some that doe maintaine the contrarie, affirming the sentence to be vniust, and giuen vpon false Testimonies, charging King Philip principally with the fault, saying; That for desire of their goods, he purchased their destruction: saying moreover, that at the time when they were iusticed, the common people reputed them for Saints and Martyrs, and kept peeces of their Garments as Reliques. Of this latter opinion was Saint Iaques de Magouce, Naclerus, and Antonius Sabellicus, in their Histories; and John Boccace, in his Booke of the fall of Princes, affirming, that hee heard it spoken by his owne Father, who was present at the execution of the sentence.

It appeareth also, that Saint Antonie, Arch-bishop of Florence was of the same minde, and reciteth the case as it happened, in manner following. Pope Clement (saith he) and his Romain Court being in France, whereas then he made his abiding, seeing himselfe much prouo-prouoked by Philip King of France, to keepe his promise made him, when he created him chiefe Bishop; which was, to condemne Pope Boniface, and cause his bones to bee burned; and the Pope deferring to doe it, because it seemed difficult to effect: It fortun'd, that a Knight of the Templers Order, a Priour in one of the Commanderies, named Monfaucou, in the City of Toulouse, was taken and brought as Prisoner to Paris, by appointment of the great Maister; in regard of some crimes by him committed, and (as some doe testifie) for Heresie. At the same time, another Natiue of Florence, and Knight of the same Order, was sent to the same Prison, by commaund of the Great Maister, for many other foule delictes. These two together, knowing that their misdemeanor had bene such, as admitted no hope of their deliuerie: concluded, to free themselues from imprisonment, and to be spleenefullie & maliciously reuenged on their Great Maisters, accusing their Religion, and charging the with such crimes as haue formerly bene spoken off. To effect it the better, they called some other to counsell, and practised with the Kinges Officers, accusing the Great Maister and the other Knightes, that they were worthy of death, and vtter destruction of their Order. Affirming also, that the King, beeing a Man good and iust, ought to labour it, considering the great benefit that thereby would redound vnto him, in confiscation of so many goodly houses. This being reuealed to the King, he quickly lent an eare thereto, and gaue order, for more ample conference with both the Prisoners. Afterward, he made it speedily knowne to the Pope; declaring, that such an Order deserued vtter spoile and ruine.

The Pope, after he had heard the Prisoners, or the relation made to him by others; or rather, to free himselfe from the Kinges importunity, against Pope Boniface: without vsing any more sufficient inquisition, or processe against them, but onely ied by these informations: wrote secretly thorow all Christendome, that a certaine day should bee appointed for the Knightes Templers, to apprehend their bodies, and seaze all their goods. On the same date as these Letters were expediated, the Great Maister (who then made his residence in Paris) was taken, with threescore Knights of the chiefest, and after proofe made, beeing brought to confronting: they stoutly denyed, and with great boldnesse, that euer they committed any such offences, no, not so much as in thought, but liued as good and faithfull Christians ought to doe. Neuerthelesse, the processe was concluded against them, and all the threescore persons (except the Great Maister, and foure other, who were reserued till another time) were drawne forth of Paris, and brought vpon a scaffold purposely prouided, where (before all the people) they were each after other throwne into a fire, to the ende, that if any one had confessed the offences, or any part of them, his life might haue bene saued. But although they were exhorted by their Kured and Friendes, to confesse the faultes, albeit they were not guiltie, onely to saue their liues: yet did they still make denyall, calling God and the Virgine Marie to witnesse their innocency, and were all burned, without confessing any thing.

This being done, the Great Maister, with one named F. Danfin, and one F. Hugues, and some others that had been Officers in the Kinges Court, were brought before the Emperour and the Pope (by whom great promises were made vnto them, if they would confesse the crimes where-with they were charged. By meanes of such importunity, they confessed some part of them, and other thinges beside: but after that they had made this confession, they were led away to punishment, where their processe was publickly read, and the sentence ratified, whereby the Pope had condemned the Great Maister, and all the rest of his Order. While thus they proceeded, the great Maister started vp on his feet, saying, that they ought to heare him; adding further, that he had iustly deserued death, by so many offences which he committed against God. Notwithstanding, the crimes where-with both he & the Knightes were burdened in the Processe; both he and they were innocent cent of them; and whatsoeuer he had confessed: he did it in feare, and at the Popes perswasion, speaking now nothing else but truth. The like saide F. Danzin, and thinking to proceede on in more speeches; they were exposed to the fire, and burned. But F. Hugues, and his companions, saved their liues by confessing their guiltinesse, according as it was objected against them in the processe: yet liued they not long after, but dyed (as is reported) miserably, as likewise the two imprisoned Knights did, who were their first accusers; the one, being saide to be hanged or strangled, and the other slaine, which seemed to the people as a great worke of God. In regard whereof, diuers great personages, and of good knowledge, were partly perswaded, that the sentence was vniustly given, and ill executed vpon the Templers. All these things are thus alleadged by S. Anthony, in the place fore-named, beside the other Authors. Wherefore, I stand doubtfull how to resolue herein, because it is hardly to be credited, that the Pope would faile in a case of such importance. On the other side, it seemeth as incredible, that such an Order, wherein were so many and great diuersitie of Knights; would wholly bee so wicked. But this secret, and many other, must be referred to the day, when the faults of all men will truely be reuealed.

CHAP. III.

By what meanes the Holie Apostolicall Chaire or Seate, was transferred into France: How long it continued there; And how it returned to Rome againe.

Seeing wee haue declared the History of the Knights Templers, me thinks it fiteth well our purpose (in this next place) to make some mention: for what cause, in the time of the very same Pope Clement the fift, the Holy Chaire Apostolique was transported into France. It is then to be vnderstood, that Pope Bennet, or Benedict, eleuenth of that name, being dead, who was an excellent and holy Byshop, and whose body was saide to worke miracles after his death: the Romaine Church was thirteene months without a Chiefe Bishop, by reason of the Schisme and discord among the Cardinals Electours, who (during this time) neuer came forth of the Conclauē, and yet could not agree vpon any election. For there was growne two factions or contentions among them; one side holding voice for the French Nation; and therefore they laboured to elect a man, that might agree with the appetite of their King. The other faction consisted of Italian Cardinals, that stroue to haue a Pope of their nation, and because both partes were equall in power and number; they continued in this long suspense, yet neither of them reaching to their intention.

When the French Cardinals perceived this impertinent losse of time, they be-thought themselves of a subtiltie, whereby they might beguile and ouerreach the other. For, they would make a party for them; to wit, they would name three Italians; one of which three, should be chosen by the Italians to be Pope. If they would not agree on that partie; then themselves should name three French-men, such as they had best opinion of, and one of them should be elected by the French, with their liking. The Italians (thinking the matter firmly in their power, purposed to nominate three French men, great Enemies to their owne Crowne, and that the meanest of them should be elected Pope) accepted the part of nomination, and gaue in the names of threemen, who were mightie Enemies to their King. For the King was then but slenderly esteemed by the Romaine Church, in regard of the great difference, that had beene betwene him and Pope Boniface, Predecessour to Bennet the eleuenth, and one of the 3. was the Arch-Bishop of Bordeaux, named Bertrand. The French Cardinals aduertised their King of this nomination, to the end; that he might compasse the meanes to reconcile himselfe with the other two, which beeing done, to let them haue know-knowledge thereof with all possible speede.

Heereupon, the King wrote a verie kind Letter, entreating the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, to meet him immediatly at a certaine place, about a matter of great importance, & highly concerning his honor and profit: assuring him, that he was very desirous to hold loue and friendship with him. The Arch-bishop (vpon this gracious motion) made no delay, but came presently to the place appointed by the King, where being met together: The King plainly told him, that he would make him Pope, vnder condition of promises to be passed between them. Which when the Arch-bishop heard, he made no difficulty of promising what the King should desire, provided, that he might attaine to so high a dignity. Finally, by meanes of many promises, signed, sealed, and solemnly sworne between them; the King gaue him his royal word, that he should bee elected, before the other two likewise named. Then, with the greatest diligence that possibly could be made, he wrote back to the Cardinals, who fauored and made good his cause: that they should nominate the Arch-bishop of Bourdeaux. So that, although he was then absent, hee was elected the Soueraigne Byshop, in the year of our Lord (according to Platina) 1205. and was named Clement the first. And he hauing intelligence of his election, at the instance and request of the King: went to the City of Lyons, whether hee caused the Cardinals, and the whole Court of Rome to come; for it was one of the promises which hee had made to the King. By meanes whereof, the Italian Cardinals found themselues deceiued, and constrained (greatly against their will) to come into France, to satisfie the pleasure of the Pope.

Platina would be perused, for according this preface of time, with that in the precedent Chapter.

Thus came the Court of Rome into France, where it stayed and continued with great honor; but to the endamage-ment of all Italy. And in this Cittie was performed, the sacring and crowning of Pope Clement the first, with no meane solemnity. But as they were in this serious business, and the whole World (as it were) attentue and beholding the ceremonies, a great part of a wal in the place where the royalty was performed, fell suddethly downe, and killed about a thousand men, among whom dyed the Duke of Bretaine, & diuers other worthy persons. And it happened in such manner, that the huge crowd of people, which thronged (for their owne safety) from the place of this mishap: overthrew the Pope from his Horie, where he was in great danger of his life. The King also was in meruailous great perplexity, being carried out of the crowd, sore wounded and trampled vpon. This businessse being somewhat more quietly over-blowne; the Pope created many new Cardinals, who were all on the part of France. He sent also three Cardinals to Rome, to gouernè there the State of the Church for Italy; hee determining to dye in France, where hee held the Seat eight yeares and cleauen months.

After him succeeded Pope Iohn, the three and twentieth of that name, who liued likewise in France, bringing his Court to Auignon, a part of Prouence: which was saide to appertaine to the Church; because it had benee bought (as diuers doe maintaine) by Pope Clement the first, of Madame Ioane, Queene of Naples, and of Prouence. There were sixe Popes, which liued and dyed there each after other; the seat remaining there the space of threescore yeares: whereby some Italians tooke occasion, to name it the transmigration of Babylon, and so it continued to the time of Gregorie the cleauenth, a learned Man, & of holy life, in whose gouernment this exile ceased, and the Seat was restored backe againe in this manner.

Vpon a time, as a Byshop of his Court passed by before him, the Pope demaunded of him; wherefore hee went not to the gouernment of his owne Byshoppricke; for it was not conuenient, to see a Flocke without a Shepheard? whereto the Bishop made this answer. Holy Father, why do you vse these speeches to me? Considering, that your selfe, who ought to giue vs example: doe not goe to abide at your owne Byshoppricke, which hath benee so long time without a Shepheard.

had happened in Italy, in the absence of the Prelacy: and therefore he determined to returne to Rome, being thereto also incited (as some write) by Letters and admonitions from S. Katherine of Sienna. And for his better attaining thereto, he caused secretly to be prepared one and twenty Gallies: pretending to vse them about some other busines, and bringing them on the River of Rosne, furnished with all things necessary belonging to them. Going aboard at an appointed time, they launched forth into the Sea, and within few daies after arrived at Genes, and from Genes, at Cornetta: where taking Land, they went directly to Rome, in the year 1364. where he was received with great magnificence, and vnspeakable pleasures, as a Father earnestly desired by his Children. Soone after, like a good Pastour, he re-edified Churches and Buildings in Rome, which were falne into ruine by age and negligence of men. In which workes, and other holy exercises, hee spent the remainder of his life; which he finished in the yeare, one thousand three hundred, sixty and eight, and was buried with as many moanes and tears, as any other that died before him. But after his death, neither Schismes, or any other discordes happening in the Church; could cause his Successours to forsake their continuall abiding at Rome.

CHAP. V.

How dangerous a thing it is, to Murmure against Princes: With praise and commendation of their clemency.

T hath beene a saying of great Antiquity, and deriued out of our Elders graue Prouerbes. That Kinges haue verie long Armes, and as wide Eares. Inferring thereby, that Kinges and mightie men, may (a farre off) be reuenged on such as offend them, and vnderstand likewise, whatsoeuer is spoken in secret of them: for there are so many, that contend for affection in such as beare command, as nothing can well be hidden from them. For this cause was it, that wise men aduised; To speak nothing of the King in secret, because (in such cases) meere wals are said both to heare and speake. And Plutarch saith; The Birdes can carry our wordes through the Ayre. If then, for speaking truelie and freely, men haue falne into great dangers: what shall we iudge of such as dare murmure against the mightie? Examples which might be alleaged in this case, are infinite. Among which, we read in the Histories, both Greeke and Latine, that Antigonus, one of the Captaines and Successors to Alexander the Great, his Arnie being in the field, and he couched in his Pauillion one night: heard some of his Souldiours talking without, murmuring greatly against him, not thinking that he was so neere to heare them. Neuerthelesse, he would make no shew thereof, but altring his voyce (as if it had been some other that heard them) saide softly to them: That if they meant to vse such language, they should get them further off from the Kinges Tent, or else himselfe might hap to heare them.

Of Antigonus the Captaine to Great Alexander.

Another notable example of the same Antigonus.

At another time, the same King Antigonus, guiding his Army (in the night time) through a way which was verie foule and dirty, the men finding themselves to be much wearied: murmured against him as they went along; speaking very bad words of him, imagining him to be far behind, & heard nothing. Notwithstanding, he being present in disguise among the, hauing heard their iniurious and discontented speeches, & perceiuing what a priuledge the darke night allowed him: hee fell stoutly to work among the rest, laboring (so much as lay in him) to releene them thence, And

And when his intent was compassed, he came among the Murmurers, that had well observed his paines, and wrought the harder with him for company: to who he said in like change of his voice. Speak against the King what you please, for bringing ye into such a filthy passage. But yet I hold it fit and reasonable, that you should make much of me, for helping yee so quickly to be released out of it.

Of Pyrrhus K. of Epire, warring in Italy.

The patience of Pyrrhus, King of the Epire, may well be said to be no lesse. For when he made war in Italy against the Romaines, he and his men being lodged in the City of Tarentum: there were some of his younger Souldiours, who, after they had supped together, began to talke murmurously of him at the Table. He having intelligence thereof, sent for them before him, and demanded whether it were true or no, that they had delivered such language of him: whereunto, one of them boldlie thus replied. Sir, most true it is, that all these speeces which wee have used of you, and be you well assured, that if wine had not fall'd vs at the Table, our tongues had walk'd much more liberally. Heereby hee stroue to shew (in his own excuse) that wine had induced them to speake euill of him. Pyrrhus was no way displeas'd with this answer, but falling into a pleasant laughter, sent them backe to their lodgings, without any other checke or punishment.

Of Tiberius, Emperor of Rome.

The Emperor Tiberius, although he was a cruell Tyrant; yet among other things, and fit for this purpose, he left a very memorable example. For, knowing that some body had made a diffamatory Libell against him, and that many people murmured at his cruelties: hee was perswaded by some, to do Iustice and correction vpon the offender. But he answered couragiously; That Mens tongues ought to be free in the Citty. Being yet further incited by some of the Senate, to find out (by enquiry) the inuenter of the Libell: hee would (by no meanes) yeilde thereto, but said. He was not void of other businesse, which required more due care; then such idle matter as a vaine Libell. The great mildnesse of Dyonisius, the Tyrant of Sicily (albeit hee was most cruell) to an aged Woman, may not be forgotten. For he being aduertised, that this old Woman prayed deuoutly to the Gods, for continuance of his prosperity; sent to seek for her, & caused her to bee brought before him. Then he demaunded of her, for what cause shee prayed so earnestly for him; considering, that al the rest of the people desired his death? Whereunto the aged woman made this answer. Know Sir, that when I was young, we had here in this Country a most cruell Tyrant, of a stern nature and wicked complexion: wherefore, I prayed to the Gods deuoutly for his death, and I found my desire to be accomplished. Next to that man succeeded another, who tyrannized in the kingdome much more cruellly then the first; and I prayed in like manner for his death. So that by continuall prayers and requests, made with such instancy to the Gods: as they heard me for the first, so did they for the second, because soone after his death ensued. In his place now art thou come, a more bloody man then both the other; and because I feare, that after thee another will come, worse then all the three: I pray continually to the Gods, that they would send thee long life and happinesse. This free and audacious answer of the old Woman, vrged no indignation or displeasure in him, who disdain'd all others that durst reprove him: but he suffered her to depart freely and pleasantly.

The old Woman's answer to the Tyrant

Plato, the Prince of Philosophers, who had long time continued with this Tyrant Dyonisius; craved fauour of him, that he might returne to Athens, & his suite was granted him. But at his departing thence, Dyonisius demanded of him, what report he would make of him at Athens, in the Academy of so many famous Philosophers: whereunto Plato (boldly) thus replied. I They that liue in Athens, are not so idle, neither can they find so much leysure, as to question of thee or thy actions. I remember two other aged women, that (with no lesse libertie of soule) spake to their Kinges, and both were patiently endured: the one was of Macedon, and spake to Demetrius, Son to King Antigonus, before named: the other was a Romaine, & vttered her mind to the Emp. Adrian. For both of them had the like kind of answer, when they required to haue Iustice done them: Demetrius & Adrian both replying, that they could not intend them. The Women made answer; That if they had no leysure to intend them, they should leaue the Empire to such as could do it. Neuertheless, neither of the Princes were offended with their words, but patiently admitted audience, and granted them Iustice.

Of Philip King of Macedon, & the Athenian Ambassadors.

Phillip, K. of Macedon, bidding Adieu to the Ambassadors of the Athenians, and making them goodly offers, as (in like cases) it had been a long continued custome; demaunded of them: If he should doe any thing else for them? Whereunto one of the Ambassadors, named Democrates (who well knew, that King Phillip greatly hated the Athenians) being not able to conceale his fury, answered: Wee would haue thee to hang thy selfe by the necke. At this answer; all his companions were much displeas'd, as also all the rest in presence, doubting least the King would doe some harme vnto them. But in his wonted naturall clemency (or dissembling his spleene) he made no other semblance, but turning himselfe to the other Ambassadors, said: You may say to the Athenians, that he that can endure such wordes, is much more modest then the wise Men of Athens, that haue not discretio to be silent.

Another example concerning the same Macedonian K.

Demorates the Cornician, went to see this King Phillip, at such time as he was highly offended with his Queene, and his Sonne Alexander. Among other speeches passing betweene them, King Phillip asked of him; If he had peace and vnitie with the Citties of Greece? Demorates, who knew very well, that the King took delight to see his Commonweales in discord; made answer, and truly (in my iudgement) very freelie, considering how it behooued him to answer such a Prince. Truely King (quoth he) because thou art at discord in thine owne house, thou enquirest after the dissensions of our Citties: But if thou wert at peace with thine owne, it would appeare more commendable in thee, then to seek after the afflictions of others. And yet notwithstanding, the King was not moued a jot heereat; but considered, that hee iustly deserved to be taxed, & therefore became friends with his wife and Son. As concerning the freedome and boldnesse; where with Diogenes spake to Alexander, and with what royall modesty hee endured it; is ample mention made of in the Chapter of the life of Diogenes.

Of Alexander and Diogenes.

But if we would haue some examples among Christians, that of Pope Sixtus the fourth, a religious man of the order of S. Frances, may well fit the purpose. He hauing attained to the Papacy, one of his religious Brethren, a very ancient man, went to see him in his Cordelier habit. To whom the Pope hauing shewn some Jewels and precious Stones, which were very rich; he saide withall. I cannot now say as sometime S. Peter did, I haue neither Gold or Siluer, it is true (answered the Fryer boldly) nor can you say (as he did) to the palse, lame, and impotent people, Arise and walk. Giuing him hereby to vnderstand, that the chiefe Bishops were now become more carefull of Riches, then of holinesse: and the Pope, who knew very well; that his poore Brother had reason to speake it, endured his words patiently.

Of the Archbishop of Colongne, and a poore Husband-man.

It happened (well neere) in the same manner, to an Archbishop of Colongne, conferring with a Husband-man in the fields. For, as the poore man was at his labour in the field, the Arch-Bishop chanced to passe by some what neere him, hauing a Guard of men waiting on him, after the order in Germany. As the Arch-bishop went by, the poore Country-man laughed somewhat loudly; which being perceiued, the Arch-bishop demanded, what moued him to laugh? Whereto the Husband-man presently answered. I laugh (quoth he) at S. Peter, who is tearmed the Prince of Prelates, that hee should liue and dye in so great pouerty, and his Successours to bee so rich. The Arch-bishop feeling himselfe somewhat toucht; to iustifie himselfe, thus replied. My friend, I go with this fair traine of attendants, because I am a Duke, as wel as an Archbishop. Which when the Husbandman heard, he laughed more extreamely then he did before; and the occasion being requested of this great laughter, the Country man spake verie boldly. I would (quoth he) my Lord gladly haue you tell me, that if the Duke (which you name your selfe to be) were in hell; wher do you think the Arch-bishop should be? In-ferring heereby, that two professions can neuer agree in one man: for, sinning in the one, he cannot iustifie himselfe by the other. At this answer, the Arch-bishop holding downe his head, not making any reply, or offering any displea-displeasure or iniury to the poore man, in a strange confusion, rode on his iourney.

To speak of Gentiles. Artaxerxes King of Persia, had knowledge giuen him, that a Captaine, named Achides, whom he had brought vp frō his youth, Mured greatly against him. For which offence, he gaue him no other chastisement, but sent him word by the same man that brought the accusation: Tell him (quoth Artaxerxes) that he may speak what hee pleaseth of his King; because his King may as well talke of him, and doe also what he listeth to him.

Of K. Phillip and Nicanor.

Phillip, the Father of Alexander, hearing that Nicanor spake euil of him publicly, was counsell'd by some, to send forth an especiall processe for him. To whom he answered. Nicanor is not the worst Man in my Kingdome; but I would faine know if he stand in need of any thing, for it may bee, that this necessity requireth our assistance. Presently he vnderstood, that Nicanor suffered great pouerty, and therefore, in stead of punishing his reprochful words; he sent him a rich present. Which being receiued, he that formerly had accused him, came and reported to the King: That Nicanor went vp and down the streets, speaking most honorably of the King. Why then (quoth the King to Simicrus, for so was the tell-tale named) I see that it is in mine owne power, to make men speak well or ill of me.

Of a rayler & deprauer of his Prince.

This Phillip was once more aduised, to banish out of all his Countries; a bad tongued man, one that did very much scandalize him; whereto he answered. In any case I wil not yeild to his banishment; for seeing he can slander a Man in his owne Country: I will not haue him doe as much in other strange places. Giuing hereby to vnderstand, that whatsoeuer hee did in clemency and magnanimity, proceeded from a Princes good aduise and discretion. He saide moreover, that hee was much bound in thankfulnessse, to the Gouernours and principall men of Athens. Because (quoth he) by the means of their continuall euill, speaking of mee and mine actions: to make them lyers; I may the more commodiously amend & correct mine owne bad gouernement.

Of the Gouernours of Athens.

A memorable example in a Prince.

He would neuer punnish any, that spake euill of him; but rather strouē to take away the occasion of any such defaming. If such rules might be in these daies obserued, they would bee two waies very beneficiall to vs: The one, in amendment of our bad liues; the other, that there would not be such store of depraues. For truly, it is a great vertue, to make no account of euil spoken in our absence: But yet there is much greater temperance, when wee are not moued or iniuriously prouoked, at offences vrged in our presence.

CHAP. VI.

That Imagination is one of the most principall inward powers, approued by true examples, and very notable Histories.

20

Ike as the exterior sences are five in number, as is generally well knowne to all men (to wit; Hearing, Seeing, Tasting, Feeling, and Smelling:) So are there likewise five inward sences and powers in man. Now, albei some doe reduce them to foure; yet the first is vulgar and common opinion, as namely: The sence common, Imagination (whereof wee are now to speake) Iudgement, Fantasie, and Memorie. Concerning the office and vertue of these seuerall sences, we purpose not to discourse at this time: but our intent only is of Imagination, the charge and property whereof, is; to retaine the Images and figures, which the common sence receiveth first from the outward sence, and afterward she sends them to Iudgement, from whence they proceed on to the Fantasie, and thence are conuayed into the Coffer, commonly called Memory. Imagination hath power to change it selfe, by the representation of thinges, although they bee no more presented: which the sence common cannot doe, except shee haue them in presence; wherein is demonstrated the greatnesse, and wonderfull power of Imagination! For we plainly perceiue, that a man being asleepe; and his sences at rest: yet his Imagination ceaseth not from labour; but still representeth all thinges, euen as if they were personallie present, and the man wide waking.

Five sences inward, as well as outward.

The admirable power of Imagination.

The strange and violent effects of Imagination.

Imagination is able to moue the passions and affections of the Soule, and it can (diuersly) prouoke the body, alter accidents, turning the Spirits topsyturuy, and the in-side outward, producing likewise diuers qualities in the members. Imagination can make a man sick or sound, and worke many other admirable effects. When Imagination conceiueth any matter delightfull; ioy brings the Spirits outward: But if it be of feare or terror, then they fly inward; because that the motion or concept of ioy, entranceth the hart, and sadnesse or sorrow shuts it vp in restraint. The imagination of feare begetteth coldnesse, makes the heart to tremble, expulseth heat, and causeth a kind of quiuering in speech. Merely being caused and incited by Imagination, in seeing the sufferings of some other body: doth (oftentimes) much more moue and change the party so conceited, then the patient himselfe. As may evidently bee noted in some, that will quickly sworne or fall into a trance; by beholding another person let blood, or his wounds handled and drest by the Chirurgion; yea, & in more violent manner, then the party that endureth the paine. Strong Imagination hath moreouer the vertue, to make a transmutatiō of things, though they be true when we behold them: as when we heare or see a man eate such things as are sharp or eager, it makes vs presently to feele a strange eagernes in the mouth. And contrariwise, beholding sweet and saury things eaten; the very sight and apprehension thereof, sendeth the like sweet Imagination into the mouth, euen as in bitter things it hath the like working.

Examples of strange Inmaginations.
*August. in lib. 4
de Ciuit. Dei.*

Of hearing a sad or mourn-full sound.

If we would haue examples of strange Imaginations; we may easily heare many. Saint Augustine saith, he knew a Man, that at all times when himself pleased, would sweate very abundantlic, exciting the expulsiue vertue by meere Imagination. He declareth also in the same Booke, that another man whom he knew, when he heard a mournfull song, or dolorous sounding voyce, or of one weeping or sobbing: he would apprehend the same with so strange an Imagination, as hee fell downe in a swoune, lying stone-still without any feeling. And whatsoeuer men did vnto him, pricking him with pinnes, or burning his fingers; yet he appeared not to feele any thing. Neuerthelesse, hee would reuiue, and come to himselfe againe, when some ioyfull or pleasing sound came neere him, euen as if hee heard it a great way off. Pliny reporteth (well-neere) the very same, of a Man named Hermotimus, who when he conceiued an Imagination: he seemed so strangely transported, as if the Spirit were gone out of his body, and when he returned to his former condition, he would report what wonders hee had seene. Monsieur Guillaume de Paris saith, he knew a man, who onely by seeing a Phisition, without tasting any dram or Potion: yet such was the violence of his Imagination, that he would fall to putging, as if he had ministred Phisicke to him. It fareth in like case with such as are subiect to dreaming; for, let vs admit, that it is Imagination which worketh heerein: yet it hath manifestly bin knowne, that in dreaming they haue beene burned, or killed; they haue felt pain and torment, though neither weapon or fire touched them, & they haue declared it by loud shrikes and cries.

Imagination hath such a powerfull Soueraignty, in the inward apprehensiu parts: that it imprinteth in it selfe the lively figure of imagined things, and then setteth them on worke in the blood; yea, this a matter of such power, as it extendeth it selfe to the members of a second person. As we may discern in a Woman great with Child, who, only through the preheminnence of Imagination, which she fastens on some food whereof she desireth to eate; imprinteth on the Infant in her womb diuers strange signes or Markes; yea, sometimes it extendeth to the death both of Child and Mother. It hapneth sometimes, that he which is bitten by a mad Dog; by his neere imagination conceiued of the Dog, hath the figure of a Dog imprinted in his Vrine. To this purpose, it is recorded by some Authours, that a King, named Cyphus, hauing (with great attention) noted a fight betweene two Bulles, falling (on a day afterward) into a very sound sleepe: the same Imagination presented it selfe before his thoughts. But when he awaked, he found the young

Hornes of a Bull growing vpon his head. If this were true, it proceeded from this cause; that the Vegetatiue Vertue, giuing aide and impulsion to the imagination: it raised such Humors in the head, as were apt to engender and bring forth hornes. According to this which we haue declared, the imaginatiue Vertue hath such Dominion, ouer the bodies of second and third persons; that Marcus Damascenus reporteth, that on the Confines of Pisa in Elis, in a place named Saint Peter, a Woman was brought to bed of a sauage child, hauing the skin in forme and semblance like vnto a Camels, which happened in this manner; by reason that at the instant of this childs conception, the Mother (ouer earnestly) contemplated the picture of Saint John Baptist, which hung on the Wall in the Chamber. And therefore, as we haue formerly spoken of Infants, that imagination hath such powerfull preheminance, as it can cause Children to resemble persons, imagined by the Fathers and Mothers.

Auicenne is of the minde, that imagination may bee so strong, as (when it listeth) it will take and benumb a man in his members, prostrating him on the ground, and tormenting him with the paines of madness. Moreouer, saith he, the charming or enchaunting which is made by the eie, passeth ouer from one person to another, by imagination of him that worketh the Sorcerie. Likewise Thomas Aquinas, speaking after Auicenne saith, What is that which can most subuert the body it selfe, either the melancholy imagination, or the most pleasing? answereth; The violence of the one and the other. For, it chaaseth all the spirits outward, and leaueth a man (as it were) linelesse. The other locketh them vp so strongly within, as it groweth to a violent suffocation. It was well obserued in Seuil, that Jaques Orosius (who was surprized as prisoner by the Catholick king) apprehended so strong an imagination of feare, as in one night onely, hee became white and aged, being the day before verie blacke and youthfull. Again, it hath oftentimes bene noted; that imagination hath made men to become Fooles: And other-whiles so extremely sick, that the power of imagination can neuer be sufficiently admired.

CHAP. VII.

Of what Countrey Pilate was: How hee died: Of the Lake named Pilates Lake, and the property thereof. As also of the Den or Cauerne in Dalmatia.

Pilate the most Wicked and sinfull Iudge that euer was, or shall bee, according to the most and common opinion, was a Natiue of Lyons in France. Neuertheless, some of that Nation, who take the matter scarce pleasing, do say, that the name Pontius came from an house in Italy, and from Pontius Iuuenus, Captaine of the Samnites, who vanquished the Romaines at the Caudine Fourca. But bee it howsoeuer, this Pilate, either whether it were in respect of his person, or for his parentage, became one of the most eminent men in Rome. And being well knowne by Tiberius, the successor to Octavianus (according to Iosephus and Eusebius) he was sent by him, in the twelfth yeare of his Empire, to gouerne Ierusalem, and named himselfe in his dignitie, Deputie of the Empire. In this manner then did Pilate gouerne the Holie Cittie, and the whole Prouince of Iudea, which was named Palestine, and his Office endured the space of ten years. In the seauenth whereof (which was the eighteenth of Tiberius his Empire, according to Eusebius, and venerable Beda) he gaue sentence of death, against the Saviour & Redeemer of all mankind, our Lord Iesus Christ, God and man. At which time happened those things, which the holie Euangelists declared of his death & passion, and his resurrection was eident & publicke in Ierusalem, albeit they greatly laboured to conceale it. Which being reported to Pilate (although hee was wicked) hee conceived, that such a resurrection and myrales of Christ, could not be done by any human power, but by God. In regard whereof (according as it is recited by Paulus Orosius, Eusebius & Tertullian in his Apologies) hee aduertised the the Emperor Tiberius in the matter: for it was a custome, that the Consules and Pro-consuls should send to the Emperor or Senate, to acquaint them with such occasions as happened in their Prouinces.

Pilate writeth to Tiberius, concerning Christ & his Myrales.

These meanes appeared verie meruailous to the Emperor, and he referd them to the Senate in Counsell, there to consult, whether they thought it fit, or no, that this Prophet by his memorable actions, should be honoured as a God. For without authoritie of the Senate, they could cause no new God to bee adored in Rome, ouer and beside the vanitie of their owne ydle Gods. But as the Godhead had not any neede, neither would confirme it self by the probation of men only: euen so God permitted, that the Senatours should not agree vpon anie thing, but rather (as some Authors say) they were greatly discontented, that Pilate had not written as well to them, as he did to the Emperour Tiberius. Notwithstanding, Tiberius prohibited the persecution of the Christians. After these occasions thus happening, Pilate made his abiding at Rome, and being confirmed by the Deuill for his faithfull seruant; he neuer did any thing afterward in his Office, but such things as were most vniust and wicked. Whereof being accused before Caius Caligula, the successor of Tiberius, as also because hee had prophaned the Temples, placing Statues & Images therein; and somtime had stolne monies out of the common Treasurie, beside other great crimes and vile actions: he was banished thence to the Cittie of Lyons; others say, to Vienna in Dauphine. And because this was the assigned place of his exile, some haue thought it also to be the place of his birth, where hee found such entertainment and welcome, that he slue himselfe with his own hands; which questionlesse could not happen, but by Gods diuine permission, and that his life should not be taken away, but by the most wicked man in the whole world, and that was himselfe.

Persecution of the Christians prohibited by Tiberius.

They that haue written heereof, are the fore-alleged Authors, and Beda in his Booke of Times, and likewise in his Ecclesiastical History on the Acts of the Apostles. Eusebius farther saith, that his death hapned eight yeares after our blessed Sauiours suffering: from whence this wicked Pilate could not deriue any benefit, because he died desperately. For so great is the goodnesse of God, that although he condemned his innocent Son to death; yet if hee had repented him of his sin, euen he whom he had adiudged to death, would haue granted him eternall life.

10 Hauing spokē thus much of Pilate, I may not forget a Lake cald Pilats lake, which Lake is in Swetia, neere to a City named Lucerna, on a plaine enuironed with very high Mountains. From the top of one of them (as some good Writers testifie) Pilate (in his desperate mood) threw himselfe into the water. And it is a common voice of the people to this day, that euery yeare he there sheweth himselfe in the habit of a Iudge: but whosoever seeth him, be it man or woman, is sure to die within that 20 years compasse. Beside this, and the common fame bruted of this Lake, I must alledge the testimony of Ioachimus Vadianus, a man very learned, who Commenting vpon Pomponius Mela, writeth another notable thing of this Lake, which is both certaine and meruailous. He saith, that if any one throw a stone, stick, or any thing else whatsoever it be into the Water; the Lake containeth such a straunge 30 propertie, that it swell, rise, and mooue with so impetuous a Tempest, that it ouerfloweth and drowneth a great part of the Countrey, whereby ensueth great losse and damages, aswell on the seeds in the grounds, as to Trees and beasts. And yet notwithstanding, if no such things be throwne into it, it standeth still without any motion. This Ioachimus further saith, (being a Native of Swetia) that there are 40 very seuerer ordinances made, prohibiting on paine of death, from casting anie thing into this Lake, and that such as break these prohibitions, haue bin put to death. Whither this do proceed naturally, or by miracle, I am not able to say, albeit some waters haue very great and admirable properties; for part whereof, reasons may be deliuerd, but for others not.
50 Pliny reporteth a matter like to this, & saith, that in Dalsmatia, ther is a deep hole or caue, wherinto if any man cast a stone, or any waighty thing, there sodenly issueth forth a furious aire so violently, as it procureth a dangerous Tempest, to all the neere dwellers. It well may be (which yet I will not stand to auouch) that the body of Pilate was throwne therinto; and that the Deuill (by diuine permission, and for his much greater infamy) doeth performe such horrid and vncouth accidents in this place. Howsoeuer the cause proceedeth, certaine it is, that such a Caue is there to be scene, and such affrightments issuing thence, vpon the hurling of any heauie thing into it: For the rest, I refer it to the Learned iudgement.

CHAP. VIII.

Of negligence, in the execution of Iustice vpon Offenders, and for the sins of the flesh.

Read in Plutark, that when Romulus King of Rome, and Tatius King of the Sabines, had made their composition to gouerne the Romains and Sabines ioyntly, there fell a strange kinde of plague and famine in the Citties of Rome and Laurentum, for two murders committed by the Romains and Laurentines. The one was done by the Kinsmen of Tatius, vpon certaine Ambassadors of Laurentum; which murder, Tatius neglected to punnith. And the other, by the friends of the said Ambassadors vpon Tatius, in reuenge of the Iniustice done by his Kinsmen, and suffered by him, which also, Romulus let passe vnpunished: whereupon, it being noted that the plague and famine encreased straungely in both Citties, and a common opinion conceiued, that it was a punishment of God vpon them, for those murders committed, and not punnished: they resolued to doo Iustice vpon the offenders; which beeing done, the plague ceased presently in both places.

The same Authour also ascribeth the sacke of Rome by the Gaules, vnto the iust iudgement of God vpon the Romains, for two Iniustices by them committed. The one, was the banishment of Camillus. The second, their refusall to punnith certaine Ambassadors of their own, who being sent to treat peaceably with the Gaules, in behalfe of the Clusians, committed acts of hostility against them, contrarie to the Law of Armes. And when the Gaules sent to Rome, to demaund reparation of the iniurie, the Romains not onely refused to giue them satisfaction; but also made their Ambassadors, (who had done the iniurie) Generals of an armie, to assit the Clusians against them: notwithstanding, that the Feciales (who were certaine Officers ordained by Numa Pompilius, to determine of the iust & lawfull causes, either for warre or peace) made great instance to the Senate, that the Ambassadors might be punnished, least the penaltie of their fault, might otherwise fall vpon the Common-wealth, as indeed it did. For, the Gaules giuing battell to the Ambassadors, easily overthrew them, and prosecuting their victorie, spoiled and sacked Rome.

Herein I wish to be noted, how grieuous a sinne it is, in the opinion of the verie Paynims themselues, and how dangerous to the Commonwealth, to neglect and omit the punishment of wrongs and iniuries done them; whereby the offences of perticular men, are made the finnes and transgressions of the whole state, and draw the wrath and punishment of God vpon the same. Whereof another example may also bee gathered, out of the same Author and history, concerning the cause and manner of the first comming of the Gaules into Italy, and of the great spoile they made in Tuscane; which seemed to proceede from the iust iudgement of God, for like negligence in the execution of Iustice. For one of the Clusians of Tuscane, called Aruntius, having his Wife taken from him, and kept (perforce) by a Nobleman, called Lucius, and finding no remedie by Iustice (by reason that his Aduersarie was supported by the Magistrates) was so incensed therewith against the whole state, that he went into France, and caried with him some of the Grapes, and other commodities of the Countrey, to inuite the Gaules to attempt the inuasion of Tuscane. Whereto he easily perswaded them, and serued them for their guide: God so disposing his Iustice, that hee to whom the State had done the wrong, should be the meanes and Instrument of the punnishment due to the same.

Herein I will adde another notable example (in the same kinde) of the overthrow of the Lacedemonians, & their losse of the Empire of Greece, by the iust iudgment of God for the like offence, as both Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Cicero, and others affirme, and the euent made it selfe manifest: the Story is thus.

Two Lacedemonians passing ouer the plaine of Leuctra, were lodged, and courteously entertained in the house of one Scedafus, who had two handsome Women to his Daughters. And returning that way againe shortly after, finding the two Women at home, and their father absent, they first rauished, and after ward killed them both.

The Father at his returne, finding his Daughters slaine, and vnderstanding who had beene the doers of it, went to Lacedemonia, to craue Iustice against the Malefactors. But so potent were both they & their friends there, that hee could by no meanes obtaine it. Whereupon, after infinite maledictions, powred forth (in the sorrow of his heart) against them & their whole state, he went home, and desperatly killed himselfe in the graue of his two Daughters. Not long after, wars growing betwixt the Thebanes and Lacedemonians, the soule or ghost of Scedafus appeared to Pelopidas (one of the chief captaines of the Thebanes) and encouraged him to giue battaile to the Lacedemonians on the plaine of Leuctra, where he & his Daughters were buried; telling him, that their death should bee reuenged, and so afterward it fell out. For there the Lacedemonians lost not only the battel, but also the Empire of Greece, which they had many yeares before possessed. Wherein may also be noted, how God executed his iustice vpon them in another respect. For, whereas the sinne of the flesh was growne in Lacedemonia to such excesse, as that no part of Greece was therewith so much infected, it seemed conuenient to the diuine Iustice, that the same should be a meane to draw his further wrath vpon their whole State, that so they might bee punished, by the meanes of that sin wherein they had most offended.

And truly, though many finnes are counted more hainous, and are more seuerely chastised by humane lawes, then the finnes of the flesh, yet almighty God hath not more rigorously punished any, in whole Countries and States, then the same. As, to omit the exemplary plague that fell vpon Sodome and Gomor by fire from Heauen, for the detestable sinne against Nature (which in that respect is called Sodomie.) We read in the Holy Scriptures, that all the whole Tribe of Beniamin (excepting only sixe hundred) was slaine by the Children of Israell, by the commandement of Almighty God, for a rape which those of the Towne of Gaba committed on the wife of a Leuit, whom they abused in such excesse, that she presently died. Whereupon, the other Tribes assembled themselues, and first demaunded to haue the Malefactors deliuered vnto them; and then vpon the refusall thereof, they consulted with Almighty God, whether they shoulde inuade them or no, which God commanded them to do, and appointed them a Captaine. And although in two battailes the children of Israell had the worst, yet in the third battaile, Percussit eos Dominus (saith the Scripture) in conspectu filiorum Israell, &c. Our Lord God strooke those of the Tribe of Beniamin, in the sight of the children of Israell, who killed of them 25000. men, that bare Armes. Whereby we may see no lesse, then by the former example, as well the enormitie of the sin of the flesh, as also, that refusal to do Iustice on a few Offenders of the Towne of Gaba, drew al the Tribe of Beniamin into participation of the Offence, which was therefore punished in them all alike.

But to omit the later consideration, to wit, of omission to do Iustice vpon Offenders, and to say somewhat more concerning the punishment of God for this fleshly sinne, we haue a notable & fearefull example thereof in the kingdom of Spaine, conquered by the Moores, and possessed by them seauen hundred yeares for that Offence. For, when the Kingdom had flourished both in Religion & power, from the time of King Reccared, the first Catholicke King thereof, the space of an hundred and twentie yeares: the wicked King Vitiza (being a man whollie giuen to Lust and Carnality) infected and corrupted all Spain, not only with the bad example of his owne dissolute life (hauing manie Wiues at once, beside diuers Concubines,) but also with abhominable Lawes, whereby he gaue leaue to all sorts of men, to haue as manie Wiues & Concubines, as they listed; enforcing Priests, & such as would haue haue liued chastly, to marry. By which meanes, all Spaine becam within a while, to bee no better then a common Stewes or Brothel. And althogh almighty God, (according to his accustomed mercy) expected their conuersion and amendment all the time of his raigne, and laide only the penalty thereof vpon him, depriuing him both of his Crowne and eye-sight, by the meanes of Rodericke; who succeeded him in the kingdome: yet when the saide Rodericke followed his steps, aswell in his vicious life, as maintenance of his abhominable Lawes, it pleased God in his Iustice to permit him, to giue the occasion both of his owne ruin, & likewise of the ouerthrow of all Spaine, by this sin of the flesh, wherewith the whole Kingdome ouer-flowed. For, whereas King Roderick had sent a Kinsman of his own, called Count Inlian, Ambassadour into Affricke, and (in the meane time) rauished his Daughter, or (as some Write) his Wife: the Count vnderstanding it at his returne, was so incensed there-with against the King, that in reuenge thereof, he practised with the Moors, to bring them into Spaine, who with his assistance so speedily conquered it, and with such destruction of the people, that the punishment of God was most euident therein. For, hauing first ouerthrowne K. Roderick (whose body could neuer after the battell be found) they subdued almost all Spaine in eight months or (as some say) 14. and slew 700000. of all sorts of people; beside great numbers of Captiues, which they sent prisoners into Barbarie. And from that time forward, they remained in possession of that kingdome, or of some great part thereof, for the space of 700 yeares.

This example of the Conquest and subuersion of Spaine, for the sinnes of the flesh, was so famous, and so much obserued by godly and Wise men, at the same time when it hapned: that S. Bonifacius, borne in England, and Bythop of Mentz in Germany, (who liued in the same age, and holpe to conuert the Saxons and Frisons from Paganisme to the Christian Faith) proposed it to one of the English Kings, called Ethelbald, K. of the Mercians, to withdraw him from his dissolute life. And forasmuch as his Epistle to him containeth verie notable matter, I will alledge heere some part thereof, translated out of Latine, thus.

I beseech thee deere Son in our Lord, that if this bee true which is reported of you, you will repent and amend your life; remembering how unfit it is for you, who haue the Image of God created in you, to conuers the same into the Image of the Deuill by Licentiousnesse. And that you, whom no merits or deserts of your owne, but the bountifull goodnesse of Almighty God; hath made a Prince and King to gouerne many, shoulde make your selfe slaue vnto the Deuill, by the sinnes of the flesh. For, as the apostle sayth, What sinne soeuer a man commits, hee makes himselfe Slaue thereof. And the Paynims themselves, who know not the true God, do obserue in this point, that which God ordained from the beginning, liuing in all true loue and oyaltie with their wives, and punishing Adulterie and fornication. For, if in olde Saxony (where there is no knowledge of Christ) either Maid or Wife do commit Adultery or Fornication, shee is first strangled, and after burnt. And he that corrupted her, is hanged ouer her. Or else, shee is stripped naked to the middle, and whipped by chaste Matrons from Towne to Towne, & prickt with sharpe Knives, vntill shee dye therewith.

If therefore the Gentiles (who knew not God) haue such a zeale and loue to Chastity, what shold you do that are a Christian king? Therefore haue pittie vpon your owne soule, & vpon the multitude of your people which perish by your example: and for whose soules you are to yeeld account. Consider also this, that if the English Nations (as the very Paynims in France & Italy do cast in our teeth) do contemne marriage, and giue themselves ouer to vnlawful Lust, it must needs follow that the Children which shal proceed of the, wil degenerate, and become (at last) Cowardly and weak in warre, vnstable in faith, shameful, and reproachfull among men; & hateful to God. As it hath already chanced to the Prouençales, Burgundians, & Spaniards, who falling from GOD by the same meanes, are now (by his iust iudgement) seuerely punished for the same by the Sarazins with losse of the Christian faith.

Thus wrote this worthy Bythop a few yeares after Spaine was conquered by the Moors; and further added certaine examples of Gods Iustice, extended vpon some English Kings for their Licentious life, and other offences. As vpon King Ceolred, predecessour of Ethelbald, who (saith he) was not only a deslourer of Religious Women, but also a breaker of ecclesiasticall priuiledges. And therefore it is said, that God suffered a wicked Spirit to take and possesse him, as hee was banketting with his Nobility, and to kill him, after that hee had blasphemed Almighty God, by his procurement. And to the same cause he also attributeth the vnfortunate end of Osred, King of Northumberland, who he saith, was Ea iudē culpārū reūs, Guilty of the same faults; and that therefore God suffered him to bee miserably killed. Thus this holy man admonished King Ethelbald, who as it may be presumed, contemned his Counsell; and therefore receiued at Gods handes, the punishment due to such great neglect: for he was afterward cruelly murdered, as appeareth in the English histories.

CHAP. IX.

Of the inuention of Belles, with the vse of them, and what benefite ensueth by them. Also, who were the first that coniuered Devils.

Although this may seeme to bee a meane subject, to speake of such a common thing as Belles: yet so it is, that considering how necessary they are for Diuine seruice, and conuocation of Christian people together, with other effects, whereof we are to discourse, it may (vnder fauor) be presumed, that the inuention & vse of them (in Gods Church) proceeded doubtlesse from inspiration of the blessed spirit. The Lord commanded in the old Testament, that two Trompets of Siluer should bee made, which the Priests should sounde, to the end that all people might bee called to the Diuine Sacrifices. And our Lord, speaking of his comming in the day of Iudgement, saith amongst other things; That he wil send his Angels with Trompets, to assemble and congregate the elect. Now following this good example, Christian people comming to increase in some number, ... to assemble so great a multitude together at one time, to make Prayers, and offer sacrifices in the Temples, neither Trompets which had bin formerly sanctimoniously instituted for this businesse, nor the voices of men could be sufficient; but it was the thought fit, to inuent some strong Instrument: by meanes whereof, an assembly might the sooner be made. And to compass this, among all other that men could dreame on, the vse of a Bell was found to be the best & aptest; as being of loudest sound, and to be heard the furthest off.

This inuention then must needs be reputed verie meruailous, and woorthy the name of so excellent a man, as was Paulinus Bishop of Nola, of equal standing in time with S. Augustine, and with S. Ierom: who wrote many letters vnto him, which yet at this day are to be read. He then was the first, that (in his Church and Bishopricke) brought vp the vse of Bels; which afterward was continued through Christendome, as a thing most necessary: and hence it commeth, that Nola being a Latine word, signifieth a Bell. Now, it is further to bee noted, that Belles are not good only in the cases fore-named, but they are said also to haue a wonderful effect, which is; that the Devils or Spirits hovering in the aire, do flie the sound of a Bell, and hold it in horreur, as a thing found out and instituted, for giuing honor and worship to the true God. And so much the rather, because as they delight themselues in Musicke, which inciteth & prouoketh men to euill; euen so, the sound of Bels they shun and are offended at, as being most hurtfull and contrary to them. And yet they cause a christian man to reuine his spirits, putting him in mind of God, and such times as besit his Prayers and Sacrifices: for being dedicated to those vses, they moue a man inwardly, & exalt his soule with chearefulness to deuotion.

They are said also to haue another verie profitable propertie, to wit; That the sound of them doth breake the ayre, and driue on the Clouds, diuiding thunders, and verie evidently resisting Tempestes: because, that by the power and promptitude of such sounds, tempestuous clouds do breake and scatter themselues: by which meanes their force and surie ceaseth. As daily may be noted by experience, that when there is any great wind or tempest, by by ringing a multitude of Belles, the extremity presently beginneth to growe calme. Notwithstanding all this, I deny not, but that the deuout Praiers of faithfull Christians, in such perrillous seasons haue much greater Vertue and efficacie: yet neuerthelesse (as I haue saide) it is a matter most certaine and naturall: and whereof wee haue had good apparance, by a great troope of people walking in the Fieldes; for, as they shout or exalt their voyces, the ayre (by little and litle) doth deuide it selfe, so that if any Bird (by chance) be flying aboute them, shee falles downe to the grounde for want of Ayre to support her. And it must needes be so, because (to speake truly) Voices and sounds in this manner formed, doo penetrate and cleaue the aire, euen so farre as the place of their power extendeth; and where they are to finish their strength.

Now, in regard it may seeme strange to some, that I haue saide Deuilles do fly away at the sound of Belles, because they haue no bodies or vnderstanding to hear or else to bee handled and felt, but that (simply) their intelligence is incorporeal. To such I answer, that those things which are not by bodily sense to be comprehended, which they want, they attaine vnto it by intellectuall knowledge; in which manner, wicked spirites are tormented by fire.

In like case, we read that Saint Paul commanded Women being in Churches, they should be silent, and vailed on their heads, for the presence & reuerence of the Angels, albeit they haue neyther eyes or eares. Also it is most certain, that the Angell Raphaell saide to Tobias, that he offered to God the Prayers which he made. According to this example, it is written in the 6. Chapter of Tobias, that the Angell Raphae going with yong Tobias, after he had kild the fish in the flood of Tigris, hee bad him keepe the Liuer, saying; That throwing it into the fire; the fume arising from it, had the power and Vertue to expell Deuilles from the place perfumed therewith, and they neuer to returne thither againe. Afterward, in the eight Chapter; wee read, that hee laid the Liuer vpon the burning Coales; and with the perfume arising from it, he chased away the Deuill, that had bin the death of Sarraes seauen Husbandes; and hee freely deliuered from all affliction.

Concerning the expelling of Devils, and Coniuring them by Holie words, & other meanes, as now adaves is vsed: it is a case so ancient, that Iosephus writeth in his Antiquities, that Salomon was the inuenter thereof; and the first that (by his speeches) chased them away, being therein illumined and instructed of God. He declareth also, that he knew an Heb-ew, named Eleazar, who in the presence of the Emperour Vespasian, and the whole band of armed men, healed such as were possessed with Devils; and in dooing it he would hold a Ring against the parties Nose that was possieit, whereto was fastned the roote of a certaine hearb, which (he saide) was taught him by Salomon; and while the hearbe continued his smel, and it was applied to the Patients power, the Deuill could not preuaile, but fled away from him. Returne we againe to Belles, whose sound is generally affirmed, to afflict, torment, and expell Devils or euill spirits. And for this cause, to despight the Deuill, and for his confusion, there is no Sect, nor Religion of Faith, or of any Law whatsoever, that dooth make vse of Bels for Diuine Seruice, but the Christian Catholicke Church only.

Salomon did first inuent the expelling of Devils.

CHAP. X.

Of a Combate fought between two Knights of Castille, in triall whereof happened very memorable accidents.

Inuers times haue chanced great adventures in the triall of Duelles & single Combats, which (in iust reason) haue deserued especiall memory. Neuerthelesse, being matters so manifest, I shal speake but of one onely; because therein hapned very strange fortune. In the time of Alphonse King of Castille; who was father to the King Don Peter; there grew a quarrell betweene two Knights of his Court; the one, being named Ruypaz de Viedna, and the other Pav hoarguez d'Avencia. The quarrell grewe from hence, that Ruypaz saide in presence of the King, hee being then at Validad; that

A Quarrell berixt two Knights of Castille, and the cause thereof that Pay was a Traitor, because hee neyther being of Castile, or a subiect to the King, came thither with the Armie of Portugalli, to the preiudice of Castille, and against his owne King, except he had bin drawne thereto by duty.

This he offered to approue by Testimonies, and by Armes, or any other manner of prooffe, whereto hee might stand bound: and heereupon he defied Pay Rodriguez, who was then absent. But being aduertised thereof, he wrote to the King, that hee stood not obliged to make any answer, because Ruyraez was a Traitor, and would haue slaine his owne King Alphonfus; whereof he would make prooffe by Armes, and on that accusation he defied him. And because the prooffe which he purposed to make, concerned no lesse then Capitall Treason, a case farre aboue his Aduersaries imputation to him, hee required the King to grant him safe conduct, whereby he might safely come to his Court, there to approue his words by Combate.

When the King was made acquainted heerewith, he stood in some doubt, which of these two Knights was the Accuser or Defender; considering, that the first man had first accused, and the other much more aggravated the matter. Wherefore, he aduised with his counsell in this case; & concluded, to giue safe conduct to the accuser of High-treason, by means whereof, he came to the Court, & made his accusation in the Kinges presence, where the partie accused gave him the lye: and therefore, the field was granted by the King, but the day somewhat prolonged, for the space of ninetie dayes, as is recorded, because Ruyraez was then sickly.

The day being come, they both appeared in the felde, where the accustomed solemnities being performd, they entred Combat, and some wounds being giuen on either side, the night preuenting anie further proceeding, they were parted, without victory to the one or other. The next day they were brought againe into the field, where like bold and hardie Knights, each did his best endeouour to vanquish the other: and albeit they fought verie manfully, with many wounds, both giuen and receiued, yet neither of them failed a jot in strength or courage, but wasted all that day likewise, without anie discerning, which of them had the better aduantage. Whereupon, vnder equall tearmes of victory, they were once more commaunded from the field, both with great meruaile and compasion in the Beholders, that two such worthy Knights should thus hazard their liues. Vpon the third day, they were in like maner brought into the field, with the very same vndaunted spirit in either, as formerly hath been witnessed, though not in such strong ability of body, yet thus they there continued againe till night came, neither being more aduantaged then the other.

When the King had well considered heereon, hee greatly pittied the losse of two so valiant Knights; wherefore, hee caused them to bee parted, determining to imploy them both in his wars against the Moores, and heereupon their Weapons were taken from them. And the King saide (out of his Iudgement) seeing Pay Rodriguez had done his woorst to kill Ruyraez, & yet could not conquer him, he was verily perswaded, that he had not conspired his death, but held him to be a loyall and true Knight. In like manner, hee absolved Pay Rodriguez, of the crime attributed to him by the other: because, hauing continued three daies in such sharpe triall, God surely would haue shewne the innocence of the one or other in both their quarrels. And therefore reputed them both to be good and worthy Knights, they were conducted from the field with great honor.

so vulgar, which neuerthelesse (in their Nature) do much amaze vs: Howbeit, we wonder to behold things, which seem repugnant to the common essence and order of things, as such bee, which are reported and affirmed by men of great authority.

Pontanus, a verie famous and most learned man, by reason of his great reading, faith, that he and manie more, haue seen an high Mountaine, in the Sea neere to Naples, being an huge part of a Rocke, or mighty masse of Flint, fallen down thinto by fortune. Within which flinty Rocke grew a great Tree, so fast knit and combined within the stone, as it seemed that Nature had there produced it, and made it meere grow out of the stone or Rocke, euen as if they were both but one bodie, albeit it was truelie Wood. Which appeared to proceed from nothing else, or anie other place then the earth, where the Water made a mixture of it selfe with the Tree; and so conuerted and knit it into the Rocke, locking it fast on all sides. Neuerthelesse, because it was in such a place, where (it may bee) men very sildome resorted, and it a matter of such rarity, it seemed the harder to bee comprehended.

Another thing is declared by Alexandrinus of Alexandria, in like manner very meruailous, which happened at Naples, where he then dwelt; to wit, that in cutting Marble stone, hewne formerly out of a Rocke, and preparing for building: as they Sawed thorough the middle, they found (within it) a Diamond of great Value, which had been cut and polished by the hand of man.

The same Alexandrinus further relateth, that as they prepared another Marble stone, struing to diuide it in the midst, it was of such extreame hardnesse, that they were faine to break it with pickaxes. And in the midst of the stone, they found a great quantitie of Oyle enclosed, euen as if it had beene in a Glasse or Bottle; and the Oyle was very cleare, faire, and of an exceeding sweete sauer.

Baptista Fulgoso, in the first Booke of his Collections, certifieth and saith; that hee had scene a Mountaine very farre off from the Sea, where was found (aboue an hundred fadome deepe in the earth) a Shippe ouer-turned, and euen as consumed: yet not so much; but that the form thereof might well be discerned; and perfectly knowne. They founde likewise Anchors of Iron, Mastes and Sail-yards, yet broken and halfe consumed. But that which is most to be admired, they found there the bones and heads of fortie persons; and these things were scene in the yeare, 1460.

10 Some of them that saw these things, were perswaded, that they had been thus couered with earth, from the time of the Vniuersall Deluge. (if before that time any Shippes were vsed, or men sayled on the Seas in those times) which may easily be beleued, in regard that before the Flood, almost all Arts were founde out. Others were of opinion, that this might be som Ship, which had been submerged in the Sea, and that by the interieur concavities of the earth, the waters had driue it in so farre; where, since the mutation of times, the earth remaining dried vp, it stayed there as immured vp in a Vault: but howsoeuer it came thether, the aduenture was admirable.

20 The same Authour declareth moreouer, that he saw an hard stone; which being broken thorowe the middest, a liue Worme was there founde within it: to whom it was impossible there shoulde come any nourishment, but what the stone it selfe afforded her. A Serpent also was presented to Pope Martin the fift, that liued in the middest of a stone likewise: and it seemed, that Nature had thus created her within; and that (without any other nouriture) she receiued sustenance by the onely Vertue and propriety of the stone.

utterly unknowne to the auncient Phylo-sophers, when they beganne to imagine and to search out the Originall and beginning of the world, and of all things else whatsoeuer.

Diodorus Siculus reciteth the opinions to this purpose, and saith; Some were of the minde, that the world and men had both a beginning. Others, out of more vaine fantasie, saide; that all things were eternall, and that not any thing had a beginning. Now, among the former of these two Opinions, there were great differences.

Epicurus, and some other of his Sect, (who mannged the Diuine prouidence by ignorance) affirmed men to bee casually created and granted their beginning by the Atomies; to whom he vsually attributed the Originall of all things. The Poet Lucretius also followed him in this vanity: VVhereat Lactantius Firmianus smiled, and elegantly mocked him. An-aximander found out a matter well de-seruing laughter, to wit; that of Water and Earth, and by the heate of the Sun, man was first producted; as if there belonged no more to a man, then vnto a Fly.

Empedocles was almost of the very same opinion, intermeddling the matter of man with Water and Fire, and saide; That e-uery member was first created by it selfe, and then conioyning themselus (at a venter) together, they formed and Organized the body of man.

Democritus was not wholly of the same minde, saying; That man was made of Water, and the slime of the earth. The Stoicks were of a more sound iudgment, for they confessed, that all things were made by Diuine prouidence. They further held, that God had created man, & all other creatures: Lactantius also speaketh as much. Diuine Plato was of this opinion, and of him (according to Lac-tantius) the Stoicks Learned. But much more clearely Cicero, in the first Booke of his Lawes, where (commending man) hee saith: This Creature, full of reason and Counsell, among all the other, was created by the Lorde God his Maister, in more great perfection then onie other animate thing.

Of the other and second opinion, to wit; that men are eternall, and without beginning, and to endure continuallie, was Aristotle alwayes, of whom Lactantius speaketh in his second Booke, that to draw himselfe from other opinions, hee held this: which also was obserued by the Sect of the Peripatetians, of whom hee was Prince. Pliny was of the same opinion, which Lactantius Firmianus repro-ued, and destroyed as false. The like (most learnedly) did Tho: Aquinas, in his Summary against the Gentiles.

10 But leauing these opinions of Men without Faith, wee ought to beleue for truth, that Man was formed by God, the Creator of all things, and that to multiplie this humaine progeny, it was conuenient to create the Woman: which hee did, and tooke her out of the side of the first man. And to the end, that he should not indiscreetly keepe companie with her, as other vnreasonable Creatures doo together, hee instituted Holie Marriage betweene them, saying vnto them; Encrease, Multiply, fill the Earth, and possesse it. As it is testified by Moses in Genesis, and by Iosephus, in the first Booke of his Antiquities. Notwithstanding, the Gentiles being depriued of this Holie Historie, do attribute the inuenti-on thereof to others. Among a great number of whom, Trogus Pompeius saieth, that Cecrops King of Athens, inuen-ted marriage. Finally, the Redeemer of all mankind being come into the world, he approued it, and instituted it as a blef-sed Sacrament, reproouing the repudiation permitted by the Iewes, to take away the rigour of their seueritie, as Saint Mathew declareth in his nineteenth Chapter: as also, Saint Marke, and Saint Paule.

20 Marriage then was thus instituted, ioyning one Man with one Woman, and not with manie, neither one Woman with manie Men; which was most iustly done, because the contrarie dooth wholly contradict Natural reason. More-ouer, it was appointed by Diuine Lawe and Ordinance. Besides, what thing could bee more conformable to Naturall rule (albeit, neyther the Lawe, nor Faith commaunded it) then to haue one sole Companion, and not confusion of two or manie VVomen? In which confusion, when as a VVoman will not liue and abide with her Husband, but withdraw her selfe to others, it is against the Lawe of Nature, which forbiddeth that

that to be done to another, that the partie would not haue done to himselfe, for amitie consisteth in paritie of personnes. How can it be then, that loue and amitie should be perfect, where there is so great inequality? And where a man is at libertie with manie Weomen, when the woman is combinde and made subiect vnto one man only?

It is not possible, that true and perfect amitie shoulde diuide and extend it selfe vnto manie, as Aristotle hath well maintained it. It would rather seeme a kind of seruitude, as wee may well note among barbarous people, who haue manie Weomen, and with whom they deal in the Nature of Seruants, rather then as Wiues, Friends, and Louers; besides, the multitude of Wiues doth hinder all good order, which ought to be obserued in Domestick affaires.

Moreouer, wee see Naturally, that in all kinds of Beasts, the Sires or Fathers (as we tearme them) haue a great sollicitude and respect to their young ones, as well for teaching as nourishing them, & they are euermore (or most commonly) paired. For, the Male hath no more but one Female, as we may behold in all Birds, and in the most sorts of foure-footed Beasts. Whereby may bee gathered, how a man ought to behaue himselfe, and how he should carrie his Loue and affection vnto his children, and that no man ought to haue more then one Wife onely.

Seeing then, it standeth thus on the behalfe of men, by the verie same reasons it is prooued, that the Woman ought to haue no more then one Husband. For, if she should haue more, there would arise thereby verie great inconueniences, because the Children borne of a woman which is married to manie Husbandes, cannot be saide to haue any certaine Father: by meanes whereof, and in a case so doubtfull, all loue and paternall care, eyther for education or nourishing, perissheth presently. Nay, besides this, the difference of Linage and Kindered cannot bee discerned or considered, whereon ensueth vnlawfull and damnable Copulations.

The first man that presumed (against the Law of Nature) to haue two Wiues, was Lamech the seauenth man, accounting from Adam, in descending by the line of the peruerse and wicked Caine, as it is found in the first Chapter of Genesis. By the example of which Lamech, many Iewes, and other bestiall barbarous Nations, accustomed themselves to take manie Wiues, wherein they erred and sinned greatly.

But if Jacob, David, and other Saintes of the Law, had more then one wife: it was because they were dispensed withall by the holy spirit, and for some perticular occasions. But the other Iewes, that tooke manie Wiues without perticular allowance from God; sinned hainousslie, and with them also haue failed many barbarous Nations, as being a matter conformable to their brutish inclinations, & carnall appetites. Among whom were the Numidians, Egyptians, Indians, Persians, Tharsians, and some others, who entertained as manie wiues as they were able to keepe.

VVicked Mahomet also in his false Law, both counselled and permitted the same sinne; to the end, hee might draw the more Iewes to him, and all other carnall-minded men. But the Romaines and Gracians, with diuers Nations, that had better Lawes and Customes, neuer allowed any man to haue more then one Wife, nor a wife more then one Husband.

Of what estate, and at what yeares or Age, a man should be married vnto a Woman.

He ancient Morrall Philosophers, held diuers Opinions concerning the age & yeares that men and Women should be married together, to the end, that they might bee proportionable in abilitie one to another. Aristotle deriuing his argument (it may bee) from hence; That Women conceiue and beare Children vnto the yeares of fiftie, and men are able to beget vntill the yeares of seauenty, saith; That they ought to Marrie at such an Age in either, that (at one and the same time)

time) they may both cease begetting & conceiving. So that by Aristotles rule, the husband ought to be twentie years (or thereabout) more aged then the wife. Hesiodus the Greeke Poet, and Xenophon the Philosopher, doo graunt them a little lesser time, saying; That when they marrie, the woman should be fourteene yeares olde, and the man thirtie. Licurgus the Law-maker of the Lacedemonians, conformeth himselfe almost with Aristotle: For, by his Law, he prohibited any man to marrie sooner then at thirtie seauen years, and the Woman at seatiene.

This Law of Lycurgus hath beene approved by diuers, to the end, that (the more facillie) the woman might invre hir selfe to the maners of her husband, coming then into his power from her yonger yeares. For, as Aristotle saith in his Oeconomic: The diuersity of manners & conditions, do hinder amitie and true Loue. Neuerthelesse I do not allow this Law of Aristotle, that grants a man twenty years more then a Woman (vnder reuerence and authoritie due to so worthy a Man) and my reason is, because wee see, that when a man attaineth to threescore years of age, albeit he can then beget: yet so it is (and that most commonly) if hee passe on further, the rest of his daies are so laden with diseases and passions, that if the Woman be then at the yeares of Fortie, he is then to her, rather a burdenous paine and trouble, then as a Husband of consolation.

Therefore, when there is a lesse difference in their yeares, their affections do mortifie themselues (as it were) both together at one time, and their willes and intentions grow to more conformitie, then when there is such great inequality in their ages. I denie not, but that the man ought to be the eldest; but it sufficeth, if it be by the space of eight or ten yeares, and the Woman sixteene, seauenteene, or more, hauing respect vnto the Ages and Liues of these our present dayes.
