so little Religion, that they forget that He that is not for us is against us. Gentlemen, I tell you, I have the Kalendar of this City here in my Hand; I have heard of those that have search'd into the very Sink of a Conventicle to find out some sneaking Radical to hide their Money by Night. Come, come, Gentlemen, to be plain with you, I find the Dirt of the Ditch is in your Nostrils. Good God! Where am I? In Bristol? This City, it seems, claims the Privilege of hanging and drawing amongst themselves; I find you have more need of a Commission once a Month at least. The very Magistrates, which should be the Ministers of Justice, fall out one with another to that degree, they will scarce dine with each other, whilst it is the Business of some cunning Men, that he behind the Curtain, to raise Divisions amongst them, and set them together by the Ears, and knock their Loggerheads together; yet I find they can agree for their Interest, or if there be but a Kid in the Case; for I hear the Trade of Kidnapping is much in request in this City.—Gentlemen, these things must be look'd into. I shall not now trouble you any further; there are several other things, but I expect to hear of them from you. And if you do not tell me of some of these things, I shall remind you of them. And I find by the Number of your Constables, this is a very large City, and it is impossible for one or two to search into all the Concerns of it; therefore mind the Constables of their Duties, and call on them for their Presentments; for I expect every Constable to bring in his Presentment, or that you present him. So adjourn," &c.

The Result of this furious Charge was, that the very Mayor himself, and several of the Aldermen were presented as Kidnappers: And no sooner was the Charge against them read, and the several Affidavits on which they were founded, than his Lordship drove them, reb'd as they were in Fur and Scarlet, from the Bench to the Bar; pelting them all the way with the worst abuse that the foulest of foul Mouths could give vent to; such as, See how the Kidnapping Regues look, &c. And when the Mayor, in particular, hesitated as if he was in doubt, whether he should yield Obedience, flaring, stamping, and bawling for his Guards, to make him quicken his Pace, and force him to take his Place in the Front of the Criminals. And this notable Feat of his Lordship's is discours'd of with an Air of singular Satisfaction by Mr. North, who is so highly displeas'd at the Insult offer'd by Papillon and Dubois, to Fritchard Mayor of London.

But notwithstanding all these extraordinary Endeavours, Jefferys, to his great Mortification, found no Traitors to fasten upon here: And as to the Trimmers, they escap'd for want of a Law to make Moderation pass for Treason: So that he was forc'd to quit the Place, without establishing any other considerable Trophy of his dictatorial Power, than what he had rais'd on the Necks of the Magistrates, or acquiring any other Spoils, than he could torture

Having thus completed his Commission, he return'd in Triumph to London, and was receiv'd as a Man whom the King delighted to honour; for he was immediately made a Peer, and Lord High Chancellor, in Consideration of the many eminent and faithful Services, render'd by him to the Crown, as well in this Reign as the last; for so it was declar'd in the Gazette. And hence it is manifest, notwithstanding what Father Orleans has asserted, That his Majesty was but too well satisfy'd with the Methods he had taken to obtain his Favour. On the other hand, as to what Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to say concerning the Barony bestow'd on Jeffreys, while he was yet Chief-Justice, scilicet. That it was without Example in these latter Ages, and that some held it inconsistent with the Character of a Judge, it ought to be esteem'd a mere Cavil; for we have seen the Precedent several times follow'd since; and his Name was, besides, scarce enter'd among the Peers, before he was plac'd at the Head of the House in quality of Chancellor.

To keep pace with the Year, we must now bestow a little Time on our foreign Affairs. The big Words in his Majesty's second Speech to his Parliament, That he had a true English Heart, and that he purpos'd to carry the Glory of the Nation higher than ever, in the World, had given an Alarm to France; at least we so learn by two Letters from that Court to their Ambassador in England, which are preserv'd by (k) Wood. In the first it is said, That the Strain of that Speech was quite contrary to what they expect'd: That tho' the King himself could scarce believe there was any Change in his Majesty (of England's) Affections towards him, he knew not what to make of that new manner of expressing himself on so public an Occasion: That if he and his Parliament should come to a cordial Treaty in one another, it might probably change all the Measures which had been so long concerting for the Glory of their Monarch, and the Establishment of the Catholic Religion: That it was hop'd the King had not forgot the Obligations and Engagements he had enter'd into with, and had receiv'd from, his most Christian Majesty, when Duke of York:

That it would be one of the greatest Services he, the Ambassador, could do, to search into the Motives and Advisers of this Speech: That he was to spare nothing to find both out: That if the Parliament should be forc'd his Revenues as to put him out of any Necessity to depend on them, it was to be fear'd, he would endeavour to please a Nation who had so ill an Opinion of him before; and that nothing would render him so popular, as the coming to a Breach with France. In the second, the Ambassador is gently chid for not having been yet able to come at the Secret; and for expressing his Apprehensions, that his Britannic Majesty was really in a Disposition to turn his Back on his old Friend; whereas, by the same Post which had convey'd his last, they had receiv'd better News from a sure hand. After which he is inform'd, that an Affair of great Importance, with relation to the Edict of Nantz, was depending, which could not be declar'd till his Majesty of England's Inclinations were fully known, tho' there was nothing which the King their Master had more at Heart to see done, if it could be done with Safety: Which is mention'd as a Reason why he ought to watch as narrowly the Current of Affairs here, as if those Apprehensions of his were well ground'd: And for a Clue to his Enquiries, he is instruct'd to observe exactly how the Prince of Orange stands in the King's Affections, and how his Ministers are affected towards him: For as to the Hollanders in general, he had hitherto shewn he neither lov'd nor fear'd them; and their Behaviour of late had given him no Cause to change his Opinion.

The Repeal of the famous Irrepealable Edict of Nantz was the great Affair allud'd to in these Letters; and, if they are genuine, it will follow, according to Reason, if not according to Evidence, that his most Christian Majesty did actually receive the necessary Assurances, that he might venture on that, or any other Master-stroke, without the least Apprehension of his Brother of England. Of what kind, indeed, these Assurances were, whether directly from himself, or indirectly from any Mercenary of his Cabinet, we here appears. The Marquis d'Annoyer was sent hither to congratulate his Majesty on his victories over Monmouth and Argyle; and what

(i) It seems Jeffreys had a peculiar Pleasure in humbling that very Pride in others, which was so predominant in himself. For Sir John Ker once occasion to tell us, that dining with Sir Yves Smith, Lord Mayor of London, "That Gentleman, said he, compleas'd me, that he enjoy'd no more than the bare Title of Lord Mayor, the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys usurping the Power; that the City had no Sort of Intercourse with the King, but by the Intervention of that Lord; that whatever was well done in the City was attributed to his Influence and Management; and that himself and the Aldermen were by the Court look'd upon no better than his Tools." That upon all Occasions his Lordship was so forgetful of the high Dignity of the City, as to sit him and his Brethren with Contempt; in fine, that the Lord Chief Justice was to be pity'd; that his Resolutions would be the Ruin of him; and that he actually intended to let the King into the Mystery of these things; but that he thought the present Time was not altogether so proper, seeing a Reconciliation of this Tendency might be construed into Mutiny and Disaffection. I answer'd, That the King was too well acquainted with the Lord Mayor's Servitude and Impunity, to suspect him of that; and that, in my Opinion, now was the first Time for exposing a Man in that Credit at Court; for that year (1685) and 1686 before this, in which the greatest Notice would be taken of all his Grievances. Indeed I was forc'd by my Herrero to see this good Man distressed in any degree; but I was so glad to find this great Man free through; for he had no Knowledge of the City of London as hardly as it was possible for him to see the City of London. For as I had he put out five Aldermen, they had solemnly suggest'd to keep them in, and that, without so much as allowing them to be heard as to the Crime, they stood accus'd of. The Lord Mayor had the very same had been frequently practis'd in London, and that many had been turn'd out of their Employment, without so much as being suffer'd to make their Defence." p. 107, 108.

(k) And which he gives us is communicated to him by a noble Person, who whole Papers in Relation to that Ambassador's Papers happen'd to fall at the Revolution.

scem'd to be the infallible Consequence, his Establishment on the Throne: But there is no Trace extant of any Intermixture of Business, under the Veil of that Ceremonial. Bishop Burnet also mentions a Visit of old Ruzigny's to the Court of England, about this Time; but then it is only for the sake of mentioning it, for he insinuates, he had neither Character nor Business, except to solicit the Restoration of Lord Ruffel's Son, who was his Great-Nephew, to the Honours which his Father had forfeited: And there is yet another Letter, which Widdow has preserv'd, and which will be made use of in its Place, from whence it is pretty apparent, that there was no express Concert as yet subsisting between the two Courts; and that King James was so deeply concern'd for the Success of his own Projects, that he had scarce Leisure to bestow a Thought on those of his Neighbours.

However this may be, the most Christian King was now fully convinc'd that the Principles of Time was come, for extirpating Heresy; and he accordingly set about in earnest; after what manner, is thus set forth by Bishop Burnet, who was an Eye-witness of what he describes; and whose Recital is, in general, supported by the joint Authority of many other Historians:

"Mr. de Loreux, says the Bishop, seeing the King so set on the Matter, propos'd to him a Method, which he believ'd would shorten the Work, and do it effectually: Which was to let loose some Bodies of Dragoons to live upon the Protestants on Discretion. They were put under no Restraint, but only to avoid Rapes, and the killing them. This was begun in Brain: And the People were so struck with it, that, seeing they were to be eat up first, and, if that prevail'd not, to be cast into Prison, when all was taken from them, till they should change; and being requir'd only to promise to reunite themselves to the Church, they overcome with Fear, and having no time for consulting together, did universally comply. This did animate the Court, that, upon it, the same Methods were taken in most Places of Guernsey, Languedoc, and Dauphine, where the greatest Numbers of the Protestants were. A dismal Confession and Feebleness ran thro' most of them, so that great Numbers yielded. Upon which the King, now resolving to go thro' with what had been long projected, publish'd the Edict repealing the Edict of Nantes, in which (tho' that Edict was declar'd to be a perpetual and irrevocable Law) he set forth, that it was only intended to quiet Matters by it, till more effectual ways should be taken for the Conversion of Heretics. He also promis'd in it, that, tho' all the public Exercises of that Religion were now suppress'd, yet those of that Persuasion who liv'd quietly should not be disturb'd on that Account, while at the same time not only the Dragoons, but all the Clergy, and the Bigots of France, broke out into all the Insanctus of Rage and Fury against such as did not change upon their being requir'd in the King's Name to be of his Religion; for that was the Sole every where,

Men and Women of all Ages, who would not yield, were not only strip of all they had, but kept long from Sleep, driven about from Place to Place, and hunted out of their Retirements. The Women were carry'd into Nunneries, in many of which they were almost starv'd, whipt, and barbarously treated. Some few of the Bishops, and of the secular Clergy, to make the Matter easier, drew Formularies, importing that they were resolv'd to reunite themselves to the Catholic Church, and that they renounc'd the Errors of Luther and Calvin. People in such Extremities are easy to put a stretch'd Sense on any Words that may give them present Relief. So it was said, what Harm was it to promise to be united to the Catholic Church: And the renouncing those Men's Errors did not renounce their good and sound Doctrine. But it was very visible, with what Intent those Subscriptions or Promises were ask'd of them; So their Compliance in that Matter was a plain Equivocation. But, how weak and faulty soever they might be in this, it must be acknowledg'd, here was one of the most violent Persecutions that is to be found in History. In many Respects it exceeded them all, both in the several Inventions of Cruelty, and in its long Continuance: I went over the greatest Part of France while it was in its hottest Rage, from Metz to Montpellier, and from thence to Lions, and so to Geneva. I saw and knew in many Instances of their Injustice and Violence, that it exceeded even what could have been well imagin'd, for all Men set their Thoughts on work to invent new Methods of Cruelty. In all the Towns thro' which I pass, I heard the most dismal Accounts of those things possible; but chiefly at Valence, where one Dherapine seem'd to exceed even the Furies of Inquisitors. One in the Streets could have known the new Converts, as they were passing by them, by a cloudy Dejection that appear'd in their Looks and Deportment. Such an endeavour'd to make their Escape, and were seiz'd (for Guards and secret Agents were spread along the whole Roads and Frontier of France) were, if Men, condemn'd to the Gallies, and, if Women, to Monasteries. To complete this Cruelty, Orders were given that such of the new Converts, as did not at their Death receive the Sacrament, should be denied Burial, and that their Bodies should be left where other dead Carcasses were cast out, to be devour'd by Wolves or Dogs. This was executed in several Places with the utmost Barbarity: And it gave all People so much Horror, that, finding the ill Effect of it, it was let fall. This hurt none, but struck all that saw it, even with more Horror than those Sufferings that were more felt. The Fury that appear'd on this Occasion did spread itself with a sort of Contagion: For the Intendants and other Officers, that had been mild and gentle in the former Parts of their Life, seem'd now to have laid aside the Compassion of Christi-

Of those that escap'd this Sword-in-Hand-Mission, several took Sanctuary in Orange; And this furnish'd his most Christian Majesty with the most effectual Method of trying the Extent of his Brother of England's Affection to his Nephew: For he sent his Orders to the Magistrates of that little Principality to expel those Fugitives again. They did so. After which they receiv'd Assurances from the Count de Guignon, and the Intendant of Provence, that they had nothing further to apprehend from the King their Master. Notwithstanding which, a few Days after, the Count de Tuffeneau Orange with two Regiments of the same Dragoons who had just converted the Inhabitants of Dauphiné, and quarter'd them at first on all the Burghers indifferently; but in the Sequel they were turn'd over to devour the Protestants only, on whom they, over and above, committed all kinds of Villanies: They even demolish'd their Churches: They seiz'd certain Officers of the Parliament, and all the Ministers, who were distributed into the Prisons of France where ten of them were detain'd for twelve Years together. "This was done, says Bishop Burnet, while that Principality was in the Possession of the Prince of Orange, pursuant to an Article of the Treaty of Nimwegen, of which the King of England was Guarantee. Whether the French had the King's Consent to this, or whether they presum'd upon it, was not known. It is certain he order'd two Memorials to be given in to that Court, complaining of it in very high Terms. But nothing follow'd on it." The same Author also adds,

Copy Memorials of Refugees sent to King William.

"That for some Weeks before the Parliament met, there was such a Number of the Refugees coming over every Day, who let about such a dismal Recital of the Persecution in France, and that in so many Instances that were crying and odious, that tho' all Endeavours were us'd to lessen the Clamour this had rais'd, yet the King himself did not stick openly to condemn it, as both unchristian and unpolitic. He, however, took pains to clear the Jesuits of it, and laid the Blame chiefly on the King, or Madame de Maintenon and the Archbishop of Paris. He spake of it often with such Vehemence, that there seem'd to be an Affection in it. He did more: He was very kind to the Refugees: He was liberal to many of them: He order'd a Brief for a charitable Collection over the Nation for them all. Upon which great Sums were sent in. They were deposited in good Hands and sure. The King also order'd them to be denizen'd without paying Fees; and gave them great Immunities." And surely in all this he acted like a wife Man and a great King: But as he had before shewn so little Compassion to his own Subjects, he deriv'd very little Honour from his Goodness and Hospitality to these Strangers: All was look'd upon as artificial: And as every body knew, that King Lewis could not be more a Bigot to his Religion than King James, every body expected the like Usage from him, as soon as ever he should be favour'd with the like Opportunity. At the same time also that he seem'd so greatly disgusted at the persecuting Spirit of his brother of France, and so tenderly touch'd with the Calamities of those who fled from before it, he unfortunately permitted in dispensing with the Laws against Papists, and even made no Secret of his Resolution to get them repeal'd.

A. D. 1685.

The King is extremely kind to them.

But before the Month of it, by his going in the Royal of the Toff, &c.

These Laws he began openly to say, were made against himself; the first to turn him out of the Admiralty, and the second to pave the way for the Exclusion: And hence he infer'd it was an Affront to him to insist any longer on the Observance of them: And made no Scruple to declare, That all those who would not consent to the Repeal, he should look upon as his Enemies. There is nothing a King can drop, but some Court-Vassal is ready to pick up. Thus, his Majesty had no sooner express'd himself to this Effect, but it was echo'd all over the Kingdom: And even the Church, in Person, was made a (1) second time a Suiter to both Houses

[Chap. 1. p. 51.]

(1) In these remarkable Words:

"My own Thoughts I told you in my last Remonstrance, which I shall here again repeat. The only Way and most secure, without doubt, to procure a Union with those who are essentially the King and Kingdom's Friends, and whose Interest as well as Principles oblige them to be faithful to him. We ought to secure all the Friends we can, and not exclude those, who are both able and willing to assist us, by Oaths and Tests, which are so far from alluring us of their Fidelity, that we cannot firmly rely upon their Allegiance who take them." The Remonstrance has often oblig'd to swear Allegiance to their King in my form, so it shews not what is due to God; and so we may assure ourselves, that they, who break their Allegiance due to God, under pretence of serving their King, are led by nothing but their Interest, which would bid them do any thing: So those who are known to be faithful to their God, and prefer their Religion and Conscience before their Interest, will, no doubt, make a conscience likewise to serve their King and Country, when the same God and Religion obliges them to do it.

Our former Christian Kings were for many Ages before even under the Roman Religion, when their Subjects were ty'd by Oaths, no less obliging to true than these, but cou'd in other Terms. Other Kings and Kingdoms think themselves no less secur'd than we, when such an Allegiance is sworn unto them. And shall we alone endeavour to enter the Conscience of those who make a conscience to serve their

King and Country; tho' ty'd by no other Bonds than the true Principles of Religion and moral Morality? We know 'tis not Allegiance they begg'd us, for when they are already ready to pay with the Hazard of their Lives and Fortunes; but 'tis their Religion they would not abandon, their Faith they would not quit, their God to whom they would not be rebellious. Shall we therefore, when we know they are Persons who be faithful to a King, who has promised us his Protection, and under whose Protection alone we can ever hope to subsist, shall we, I say, refuse state Assistance in their Conscience? We know many of the Remonstrants have been their Vassal and their Cousins in foreign Countries, where they learn military Discipline by Practice, and not by Speculation only: And shall we, when we know them to be fit Persons to be employ'd, to far injure ourselves and the Nation, as to exclude them from assisting us, for Niceties in Religion? We cannot doubt of their Fidelity to their own King; who thought so faithfully for Sovereigns, as we cannot doubt their Courage, who have'd their Values in the greatest Hazards; and we may hope their Conscience will be no less active, having learnt it in so great a School. These, no doubt, who are either for his Majesty's Security, for my Safety, or the Kingdom's Good, will be desirous to see them employ'd. None certainly but those who care not if they saw the law repeal'd down, and the Kingdoms turn'd into a Commonwealth, can be against this. Both they, and I, and all those who are for Humanity, are concern'd in the Preservation

ing perpetually employ'd in Acts of Charity and Goodness, to such as fell under the Indignation of the Government, was indicted capitally for compassing the Deaths of the late King, by harbouring, concealing, aiding, comforting, &c. one Burton, who had been concern'd in the Rye-Affair, knowing him to be a Traitor. Burton himself was produc'd as a Witness against her, and swore she had twice procur'd him a Vessel to make his Escape, and had given him Money to help to bear his Charges: Burton's Wife and Daughter were the other Witnesses; but neither of them could be brought to swear, that the Prisoner knew Burton was in any Plot, or even that his Name was in any Proclamations: Nor did it appear, that she had ever harbour'd him, or given him Meat and Drink, as the Indictment alleg'd. She was nevertheless found guilty, and receiv'd Sentence to be burnt alive; which was execut'd accordingly; and which she underwent with a Resignation, Cheerfulness, and even Magnanimity, that amaz'd her very Enemies. In her last Paper, she cites several Texts of Scripture to prove, that what she had done was no more than her Duty as a Christian, however it might be obnoxious to the Laws of Man: "If it was a Fault, said she, it was but a little one, and what might well become a Prince to forgive: But he that shews no Mercy shall find none: And I may say in the Language of Jonathan, I did but taste a little Honey, and so I must die for it: I did but relieve an unworthy, poor, distressed Family, and so I must die for it." She then enlarg'd on the Circumstances of her Trial, and not without some Bitterness against her Judges and Jury, who had condemn'd her on the single Evidence of an outlaw'd Man; and left the Vindication of her Cause to him who is the Avenger of all such Wrongs, and who would tread upon Princes as upon Mortar, and be terrible to the Kings of the Earth. Then addressing herself to those in Power, as Windsor, she declar'd, That, unless they could secure Jehus Christ and all his holy Angels, they should never accomplish what they had undertaken: And, in a Postscript, she took her leave, saying, That she had nothing to repent of, but that she had serv'd God and his Cause no better.

Cornish's Trial.

The same Day, viz. October 19, Mr. Cornish, once the famous Sheriff, and at that time one of the discarded Aldermen, of London, was put upon his Trial, for having assisted at the fatal Meeting at Shepherd's, together with Ruffin, Manwath, Grey, &c.; tho' his Name had never till then been mention'd on that Occasion. On the Tuesday before he had been taken up: On Saturday Noon he had Notice of Trial: He was deny'd the Use of Pen, Ink, and Paper: No Friend was suffer'd to come near him till 8 o'Clock Saturday Evening. And when a Petition was deliver'd to the King and Council by his Children for longer Time, Answer was given, That it was refer'd to the Judges: When therefore he came before the Court, he remonstrated these things, and farther, that he had a material Witness 120 Miles off; before he submitted to plead, as to many Reasons why an Reason and Equity he ought to be allow'd a longer Day. But all his Reasons were most brutally over-ruid: He was told his Demand was Matter of Favour, not of Right: And his Behaviour had been such to the Government, as entic'd him to no Favour from it. Being thus driven into the Tolls, he was forc'd to plead; and the first Man that appear'd against him was Rumsey, who was admitted as not only a legal, but a credible Witness against him, tho' he had before sworn. He had given in his whole Evidence, in which, as before observ'd, Cornish had no Concern. The Substance of his Testimony was, That when the Company were going away, Shepherd was call'd out by his Man, and soon after return'd with Cornish, who made his Excuses for coming so late, and for not being able to stay, being oblig'd that Night to meet the Persons who were engag'd in the Defence of their Charter; That nevertheless both he and the rest stay'd while Rumsey took a Paper out of his Stomach, and while he read it to the Company (Shepherd himself holding the Candle): That this Paper contain'd a Declaration which was to be made public as soon as the Rising took effect; and that the Prisoner express'd his Approbation of it; and farther said, That with the poor Interest he had he would support it. Thus we are to understand, that the listening to, and approving of, this Declaration, was all the Guilt that Rumsey had to lay to the Prisoner's Charge: And yet this very Rumsey had before depos'd, under the like solemn Oath, That no such Declaration had been read, while he stay'd; and contradicted Shepherd, when he had he thought he had been there. When Cornish had Leave given him to ask Questions, as usual, he let out as if he design'd to shew, that Rumsey was neither a legal nor a credible Witness: He urg'd, that he lay under a Charge of Treason, and had no Pardon to produce: But Mr. Attorney would allow this to be no Disqualifier, because there was no Indictment or Record against him: And when the Prisoner proceeded to speak to his Credibility, and, by way of Preface, began to say, that Rumsey, in his former Evidence was oblig'd, by his Oath, to deliver the whole Truth, he was interrupted by the Lord Chief-Justice (Jones) who rudely said: "Now you are minking your Speech.— It is not your Time.— You shall urge any thing against Mr. Rumsey's Evidence, or the Credibility of it, when it is your Time." But when this Time came, and, in order to make a proper Use of it, he urg'd, that Rumsey, in Lord Ruffin's Case, had sworn, That he had no more to say, or say any more, and quoted that very Passage in the very same Trial, in which the said Rumsey farther declar'd he had not heard the Declaration read, the Bench, to get the better of this double Perjury, pronounced, that the pointed Trial of that Nobleman, tho' set forth by Authority, was no Evidence.

For a second Witness against him appear'd

paid, his own Under-Sheriff, Goodenough, who, having been taken after the Battle of Sedgeborough, was Villain enough to redeem his own Life, by affiding to swear away the Life of another. What he had to urge was, That, being by chance at Alderman Cornish's, he said to him, "Now the Law will not defend us, tho' we be never so innocent: Some other way is to be thought of: That the said Alderman reply'd, I wonder the City is so ready when the Country is so ready: That he, Goodenough, then said, something has been thought of to be done here: But first the Tower ought to be set'd; and that the Alderman, after some Pause, rejoyn'd, I will do what God I can, or to that Effect."

The Prisoner in his Defence, said all'd, Whether Goodenough had his Pardon? And one being read, he quiers'd, that it did not comprehend his last Treason: But answer was made by the Lord Chief Justice, that he was not indicted upon it, and that till he was try'd and condemn'd, his Guilt did not take off his Testimony: So that tho' the Subject was liable to the Laws for harbouring an unconvicted Traitor, an unconvicted Traitor was nevertheless legal Evidence for the King against the Subject.

Mr. Cornish then enlarg'd on the Improbability of the Testimony, asserted his own Innocence with the most vehement Protestations; and argu'd, that none but a Man who had nothing to fear, would have expos'd himself to new Troubles, after he had been four times imprison'd, and always without Cause. He also call'd several Witnesses to his general Character, and some, in particular to shew, that he held Goodenough to be so ill a Man, that he would not trust him with a Hair of his Head; and that he was over-ru'd by Bethel's Obstinacy, and the Interposition of Friends, to admit him Under-Sheriff, which was ever against his Judgment.

This was the Substance of his Defence, and the Lord Chief Justice proceeded to give a Summary of all to the Jury, in which he took care to give no Weight to the Perjuries charg'd on Ramsay, no doubt, because they were not legally supported; and on the other hand, to enforce to the utmost of his Power, whatever had been advanc'd against the Prisoner. The Jury after this withdrew, demurr'd a considerable time; and being return'd into Court to give in their Verdict, Mr. Cornish beg'd that he might first be indulg'd in bringing in another Evidence; and by the dint of great Submissions obtain'd it. This was Shepherd who had avoided a Subpoena from the King and had obey'd one from the Prisoner. Ramsay had sworn, That Perrysson took the Declaration out of his Bosom, and that Shepherd held the Candle. Shepherd, on the contrary, swore positively, that Cornish did not stay Half a Quarter of an Hour in the Houle, and that there was not one Word read, or Paper seen, while he was there: And that when the Paper was read, Perrysson, instead of taking it out of his Bosom, took it out of his Shoe. These were Circumstances wholly irreconcilable; and yet, because it was admitted by Shepherd himself, that Cornish was once at his Houle to speak with one of the Persons, the Duke of Monmouth he thought, at the time when those Consultations were there held, the Court was pleas'd to think the Conclusion stronger against the Prisoner, from that one Circumstance, than for him, from all the others: And hence, without once observing that there was no Agreement in the Matters depos'd by the two Witnesses; That one of them was plainly perjur'd by his own Evidence, as well as Shepherd's; or that an Overt-act of any kind was not so much as hinted at by Either, tho' expressly requir'd by the only Signature on which the Prisoner could be try'd, the Jury, upon the Issue, found him guilty. He is deliver'd to the King's Mercy. He then threw himself on the King's Mercy, and promis'd to deserve it by his dutiful Behaviour: In return for which Submission, under such unjust and cruel Treatment, the Recorder call'd for the Executioner, and ask'd him, Why he did not do his Duty to Mr. Cornish?

As his Trial follow'd post on his Commitment, his Execution did the same on his Conviction: He was allow'd but one Day's Preparation for Death; which he made good use of, that no Man ever dy'd either with more Resolution or Resignation: When they hand-cuff'd him in Newgate, before they put him into the Sledge, he told them a Thread would have serv'd, for he had no Thoughts of an Escape: And when he came to the Place of Suffering, which to mortify him the more, was in the Heart of the City, almost before his own Door, with a loud Voice, and a firm Countenance, he call'd God to witness, That the Witnesses had sworn falsely and maliciously against him: That he never was at any treacherous Consult or Meeting: That he never heard a Declaration read: That he was altogether innocent: And, that he dy'd, as he had liv'd, in the Communion of the Church of England. But all this serv'd only to draw upon him the Insults of the Faction who had thus run him down; and who did not spare even to insult his last Moments with their barbarous Revilings, and who, to blast his Memory, declar'd he dy'd in a Fit of Drunkenness or Phrensy.

To complete the Horror of the whole Proceeding, his Quarters were set up on Guildhall, as a Warning to his Fellow-Citizens: And that each End of the Town might be gratify'd with a Spectacle of Horror, on the very same Day Mrs. Gawnt was burnt at Tyburn; and one Lindley was hang'd at Tower-hill, for running away from his Colours, tho' martial Law, at that time, had no Share in our Constitution.

The Talk of these various Executions was scarce over, before the King was to meet his People in Parliament; and; uplifted with the Flood of Prosperity, which during the Receipts had roll'd in upon him from every Side, he now presum'd, that even They would bend before him, and, like the Parliament of Paris, content themselves for the Future, with the Honour of receiving his Commands, and registering his Decrees. All Opposition

A. D. 1685. appear'd now to be at an End: The very Heart of Faction was broke; and all the Contest which now remain'd among the People seem'd to be, who should go farthest in aggrandizing the Prerogative, and in enslaving themselves and their Posterity. It was his Majesty's Unhappiness to mistake Power for Happiness, and to infer from thence, that the best Life he could make of this favourable Crisis was, to provide for the Establishment of his own Grandeur, by increasing the Terrors of his Government, instead of meriting the Esteem, and captivating the Affections of his Subjects. Thus he had not only let his Heart on the Repeal of the Tests, but on forming such a military Force as, under a proper Regulation, should enable him, in process of Time, to bring all his other Points to bear. He had already doubled the Number of Forces, Horse and Foot, which his Brother had left him: And if the Parliament could once be brought to allow of, and provide for, them, he believ'd he had the whole Game in his Hands.

The Passion was met.

In this Disposition of Mind; at least, and with these Purposes in his Breast, he ascended the Throne, November 9; and, in the dictatorial Style, thus communicated his Pleasure to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

By King's Speech.

After the Storm that seem'd to be coming upon us when we parted last, I am glad to meet you all again in so great Peace and Quietness: God Almighty be prais'd, by whose Blessing that Rebellion was suppress'd. But when I reflect what an inconsiderable Number of Men began it, and how long they carry'd it on without Opposition, I hope every Body will be convinced, That the Militia, which have hitherto been so much depended on, is not sufficient for such Occasions; and that there is nothing but a good Force of well-disciplin'd Troops in constant Pay that can defend us from such as, either at home or abroad, are dispos'd to disturb us. And in truth, my Concern for the Peace and Quiet of my Subjects, as well as for the Safety of the Government, made me think it necessary to increase the Number to the Proportion I have done: That I ow'd as well to the Honour as the Security of the Nation, whose Reputation was so infinitely expos'd to all our Neighbours, by having lain open to the late wretched Attempt, that it is not to be repair'd without keeping such a Body of Men on foot, that none may ever have a Thought of sending us again to miserably unprovided. It is for the Support of this great Charge, which is now more than double to what it was, that I ask your Assistance, in giving me a Supply answerable to the Expences it brings along with it; and I cannot doubt, but that what I have begun, so much to the Honour and Defence of the Government, will be continu'd by you with all Cheerfulness and Readiness, that is requisite for a Work of so great Importance.

Let no Man take Exception, that there are some Officers in the Army not qualify'd, according to the late Tests, for their Employments. The Gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them known to me; and having formerly serv'd me on several Occasions, and always approv'd the Loyalty of their Principles by their Ensigns, I think them now fit to be employ'd under me; and I will deal plainly with you, That after having had the Benefit of their Services in such time of Need and Danger, I will neither expose them to Disgrace, nor myself to the Want of them, if there should be another Rebellion to make them necessary to me.

I am afraid some Men may be so wicked, to hope and expect, That a Difference may happen between you and me upon this Occasion: But when you consider what Advantages have arisen to us in a few Months, by the good Understanding we have hitherto had; what wonderful Effects it hath already produc'd in the Change of the whole Scene of Affairs abroad, so much more to the Honour of the Nation, and the Figure it ought to make in the World; and that nothing can hinder a farther Progress in this way to all our Satisfaction, but Fears and Jealousies amongst ourselves, I will not apprehend that such a Misfortune can befall us, as a Division, or a coldness between you and us; or that any Man can shake you, in your Steadiness and Loyalty to me, who by God's Blessing, will ever make you Ratifiers of Kindness and Protection, with a Resolution to venture even my own Life in the Defence of the true Interest of this Kingdom.

What this true Interest was which his Majesty was so forward to venture even his own Life to defend, is left to Conjecture; for it is hard to find any Trace of it in his Speech, which, according to Mr. Richard himself, carry'd Surprize along with it to a People, who had often ventur'd so boldly for the Preservation of their Laws and Liberties, and who thought themselves secure of both, as well from the Constitution of their Country, as the solemn, repeated Promise of their Prince. They now began to believe, pursues the Archdeacon, in the Words of another Author, that the Jealousies of the late Reign, the populi fractura in theophrasto, were well-grounded, and remotely to discover, that the Government of a Roman-Catholic King was inconsistent with a Protestant Kingdom.

Both Houses immediately took it into Consideration; and, from the Reception it met with, it was easy to foresee, that the People of England would never quit into themselves, except in their own Ways, for a Motion being made in the House of Lords for an Address of Thanks, as a Compliment of courtesie, a Spirit of Opposition immediately shew'd itself; and, tho' it was carry'd, so many severe things were said in the Course of it, as shew'd that the Complaisance of the Peers was already on the Stretch, and would hardly bear any new Experiment: The Marquis of Halifax, in particular, who had just then turn'd out of the President's Chair, for refusing to countenance Measures which he could not approve, (or, according to Bishop Burnet, the Earl of Devonshire) ironically siding with the Courtiers: "Because," said he, the King, has spoken out so plainly, and thereby prepar'd us for what is to follow". What Language was made use of on this Occasion has not been thought worth Remembrance: And as to the King's Answer, it was partly in the usual Style of Thanks for their Debates, but accompany'd with an Assurance, That he would never offer any thing to their House, that he was not convinc'd was for the true Interest of the Kingdom.

[The Lords were an Address of Thanks.]

The Commons
answers.

It was expected, that the House of Commons would have gone as far as the Lords, in Compliments at least; and on that Presumption the Earl of Middleton, Secretary of State, mov'd, That the House would immediately return their Thanks to his Majesty for his most gracious Speech; and also proceed to the Consideration of the several Points therein contain'd: But the Commons were, it seems, in no such Hast; on the contrary, when they had recover'd their first Surprize, and had collect'd all the Remains of English Spirit to be found among them, came to a (7) Resolution to consider it on Thursday the sixth, in a Committee of the whole House; and to adjourn in the mean while: Which was done accordingly.

Adjournments, on these critical Occasions, ever imply Difficulties within-doors, and a Disposition to remove them by Treaty without: This House of Commons were as willing to be the King's Creatures, as any that ever sat in their Places, in every thing but what had a visible Tendency to render themselves useless; and it was this Regard to themselves that help'd to save the Nation: The very Manner of the Speech was sufficiently shocking; for it gave the Law, and foreclos'd the Liberty of Debate: But to be commanded to lay violent Hands on themselves was wholly indigestible; and therefore they set apart these three Days to solicit such Abatements in his Majesty's Demands; and if possible to obtain such a Compromise as should prevent a Rupture with the Crown, and keep themselves in Communion with the People: But notwithstanding this Precaution, the Time elaps'd, and no Temperament was found: So that the House met in the same Spirit that they parted: that is to say, inclin'd to go farther than they ought in obliging the King, but not so far as he requir'd, in leaving all at his Mercy.

Debate on the Speech.

The Committee being form'd, the Secretary (Middleton) was so far gratify'd as to have the Speech proceeded upon by Paragraphs: And Sir William Clifton (a Soldier) was pleas'd to open the Debate, by asserting, That some other Force besides the Militia was necessary, and moving, That a Supply might be given for the Army. He was seconded by Lord Proton, who had been recall'd from his Ministry at Paris, to (8) instruct the House of Commons in foreign Affairs: For, having open'd his Packet by saying, That the late Rebellion had shewn how little the Militia was to be depended upon; and by inferring from thence, that the House could do no less than approve the Augmentation which his Majesty had made in his Forces for that Reason, he proceed'd to urge, by way of Corollary, That France was become more formidable than ever: That the States of Holland had likewise increas'd their Forces: That, by way of Precaution, we ought to strengthen ourselves in proportion: That nothing could so greatly contribute to our Impotence abroad, as our Unanimity at home: And that the Harmony which had hitherto subsisted between the King and that House had already produced two great Effects in Europe, viz. 1. The Marshal Cromwell had Orders to march with his Army into Germany, and was far advanced on his Way: but the King his Master was no sooner inform'd of the Kindness of this House to his Majesty, and the Defeat of Monmouth, than he recalled him. 2. Another Body of the French Forces had been order'd against the Spaniards, in support of certain new Claims of the Former on Hay and Pontarabia, which had likewise been recalled in respect to his Majesty. From all which Particulars he concluded, That they ought to continue the same Kindness to him, that he might continue to be of the same Importance to them; that they ought to esteem the new Levies to be just, reasonable, and necessary, and that they ought to make Provision for them accordingly. Lord Rendelagh, another Placeman, rose up next; and rather than not display his Zeal, chose to do it at the Expence either of his Knowledge or Ingenuity: For, said he, "If the King of France had landed here at the same time with the Duke of Monmouth, what would have become of us?" Whereas all the World knew, there was not the least Connection between that unfortunate Adventurer and the French Court; that, on the contrary, that there had ever been the closest Engagements between the King and his most Christian Majesty; and that, when the House had any Reason to expect a French War, they never shew'd any Jealousy of an Army.

Old Sir Thomas Clarges, on the other hand, set out with an Intimation, That if it should appear, that the King's present Revenue was sufficient for all his Occasions, there was no Necessity for any new Supply; he then justify'd the Militia; said they did considerable Service in the late Rebellion, and that if a great Nobleman (the Duke of Arbemarck) then at Exeter, had been assist'd, and supply'd, it had soon been quell'd: Acknowledg'd, that the Happiness of Prince and People consisted in a mutual Confidence: But withal hinted, that the King himself

(7) Mr. Edward Norton had Colleton as the first Member who had the Honour to declare on this Occasion against Will and Pleasure, and to assert the Cause of his Country.

(8) According to Bishop Burton, it was owing to this Lord's Harangues on the rising Reputation of England, under his present Majesty; and the mighty things to be expected, in case the House should think fit to place an entire Discharge in his Majesty; that the Address, preferring his Royal Word even to the Law, for the Security of their Religion, was carry'd in the former Session: But it is more reasonable to think, that he did not make use of his Credit with the House till now; and that the Bishop has erroneously plac'd that Discourse in one Debate, which belong'd to another.

himself had put an End to it: For, continu'd he, His Majesty, at his Accession, complain'd, That he had been misrepresented, and promis'd he would maintain the Government in Church and State, and his People in all their just Rights and Privileges: And we, overjoy'd, gave him all he ask'd at once, a Revenue of 1,900,000, or two Millions a Year; whereas the Expence of his Establishment, the present Army included, amounts but to 1,300,000, a Year. It was said when the Bill of Exclusion was on Foot, that a Popish Successor would make way for a Popish Army. The Test-Act is already broken, and yet when it receiv'd the Royal Assent, the Lord Chancellor took occasion to pronounce, "By this you are secur'd against Popery. No Papist can now possibly enter into Employment." I am afflicted greatly at this Breach of our Liberties: And seeing there is so great Difference between this Speech, and those formerly made, cannot but believe it flows from some other Advice. This strikes at our All. And I wonder there have been any Men so desperate as to take any Employment, knowing they were not qualify'd. Let, therefore, the Question be put, That a standing Army is destructive to the Country?

This was going to the Root of the Evil, and the Majesty were only for Expedients: So the Motion not being seconded, dropt of course. Of this Sir John Earnly (Chancellor of the Exchequer) took the Advantage to try to captivate the House, by insinuating how little it would cost them to gratify the King. "The whole Number of the standing Forces, said he, is but 14 or 15000: The Charge is but 600,000l. yearly, the HALF of which, as I conceive, is all we need to provide for. Of the 600,000l. already given (to reduce Munnets) 200,000l. remains. This may go towards it, and the rest may be supply'd by a Tax on such Commodities, as; for rectifying the Balance of Trade, had better be charg'd than not." This was very artificial, but did not succeed. Many Members declar'd they were ready to gratify the King with Money, but not with an Army. And Sir William Twissden, and even Mr. Edward Seymour, undertook to shew, that no reasonable Pretence cou'd be assign'd for keeping one on foot. "We are now in perfect Peace, said the Former: The King is both fear'd and lov'd. What made the last Rebellion dangerous, was the Popularity of the Leader; and yet he was beaten by 1800 Men." And for the Latter, he was express, That the Security as well as the Profit of this Nation arose from their Ships: That the supporting an Army was maintaining so many idle Persons to lord it over the rest of the Subjects: That they had rather pay double to the Militia, from whom they had nothing to fear, than half so much to those of whom they must ever be afraid: That the admitting some into Offices who had not taken the Oaths, was dispensing with all the Laws at once: That it was Treason for any Man to be reconcil'd to the Church of Rome, the Pope being by Law a declar'd Enemy to this Kingdom:

A. D. 1685.

That to grant a Supply on the Terms it had been mov'd for, would be to establish an Army by Act of Parliament: That when they had thus got the Power in their Hands, Parliaments would submit by their Courtesy, and that therefore he was for putting the Question, That the Safety of the Kingdom did not consist with a standing Force, which it may be, addeth he, may disappoint those Persons who make it their Business this way to make themselves useful.

It is obvious, that there was but little Difference between this Question of Mr. Seymour's, and the former one of Sir Thomas Clarges: Notwithstanding which, Sir Thomas suffer'd this to fall to the Ground, as Mr. Seymour had done the other, perhaps for that very Reason, and made a Counter-motion for that very Address: But this again was thwarted by Sir Thomas Moore, who was one of the Undertakers, and at his Mr. Seymour, and who forelaw that Sir Thomas Clarges's Address would partake very largely of the Remonstrance. According to him the Number of the King's Forces did not come properly before them; and their Part of the public Business was to provide Money. He also said there was a bitter Spirit in the three last Parliaments, which was not yet well allay'd; infer'd, that a considerable Force was, therefore, necessary, besides the Militia; pleas'd that this additional Force might still go under the Denomination of Guards; and that for a Colour for the Supply, it might be granted for his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions, or for the Use of the Navy, or for any other Use they thought proper, provided a Supply was but given. This was oppos'd by Serjeant Maynard, who was clearly of Opinion, that the Power given by the Laws to the King and his Lieutenants, was sufficient to keep the Peace; and that the Money to be given was to be apply'd to the Maintenance of an Army, it ought not to be given under any Colour or Pretence whatever. Sir Richard Temple was for steering a middle Course, by rendering the Militia such as both King and Kingdom might confide in; for said he, to trust to mercenary Forces alone, is to give up all our Liberties at once; adding, "There is no Country in the World a Loze to set up an Army. — We have already made ample Provision for the Government. Kings are to come to the House from time to time for their extraordinary Occasions: And if this Army be provided for by Law, there will be no Occasion for him to come hither any more." Lastly, Mr. Seymour undertaking to shew, that the King's present Revenue was sufficient for the Maintenance of his present Forces, it so alarm'd the Courtiers, and those who were for compounding Matters, That the Question was call'd for, insist'd on, and at length stated simply in these Words, That a Supply be given to his Majesty, which being a Palliative, and calculated for a Screen to those who were desirous to mix between the Court and People, Sir Thomas Clarges, to force them to speak out, propos'd the following Amendment rewards the Support of the Additional Forces: Upon which the Committee divided, and, by the help of the Trimmers, it was carry'd by a great Majority, viz. by 22; against 126. So that, upon the whole, it was resolv'd, That a Supply should be given, and that the House should be mov'd for Leave to bring in a Bill to make the Militia useful.

Tho' many bitter things had been said in the Course of this Debate, both with regard to the Army, and the dispensing with the Tests, those who were most in earnest against the Court, and those who were for making the best Bargain with it they could, were far from being pleas'd with the Event of the Day. In granting a Supply, they thought they had granted too much. When, therefore, the House met again on the Morrow, and Lord Middleton call'd upon them to proceed to the further Consideration of the Speech, they resolv'd to manage, if possible, as to leave the Supply in Suspence, till they had apply'd for Satisfaction in the Article relating to the Tests. This, in the Course of the Speech, follow'd his Majesty's Demand of a Supply. As, therefore, they had to far comply'd with that Demand as to vote a Supply, and the Speech, by Order, was to be consider'd by Paragraph, they urg'd, that instead of proceeding afresh on the former, they ought to pass on to the next. This was violently oppos'd by the Courtiers, who clearly foresaw what was the Point in View; and thought it of the last Consequence to evade it: Accordingly, they made their Path, and oppos'd Craft to Craft, but without Success; for the Committee dividing on the previous Question, 182 were for proceeding to the Supply, and 183 to the next Paragraph: Many of the King's own Officers having the Grace on this Occasion to vote according to Conscience, and against his Majesty's declar'd Pleasure: Of which he complain'd to Sir John Ker in such Terms as show'd very clearly, that the Service of a corrupt Court, and that of the Country, are as opposite and irreconcilable, as those of God and Mammon.

The next Day, the 14th, the Committee being resum'd, Sir Edward Jennings made a Motion for an Address, humbly shewing, That such Officers as were not qualify'd for their Employments by the Laws in Force against Popish Recusants ought not to serve, and praying that they might be remov'd; which being seconded, gave rise to another vehement Debate, the Courtiers endeavouring to blast it by insinuating, That it was not to be support'd, that the King would be at once induc'd to eat his own Words; that it was not decent to sue it, and that in case of a Refusal, it would become them to reflect seriously on the Consequences of a Breach, which his Majesty had so earnestly recommended them to avoid. The Patriots on the other hand, insinuated, that the House was not to be perswad'd to; that it was a Part of their Duty to wait on the Throne both with their Passions and Advice; and that after so many and so great Proofs as they had given of their Loyalty and Attachment to his Majesty's Person and Government, it was not to be conceiv'd, that His Majesty would reject a Petition which requir'd no more of him, than to keep his own Promises, by making the Laws the Rule of his Conduct. Some were for having the Catholics, who had been so useful to his Majesty, and who were so well known to him, nam'd and compensated; others, again, who were for making the Address as palatable as possible, were only for stating the Cause of their Uneasiness, and leaving his Majesty to set in it as he thought fit: And this last Expedient being adopted, the Address was order'd to be drawn up accordingly, in the following Words:

" Most Gracious Sovereign,

" We your Majesty's most loyal and faithful Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do, in the first Place, as is Duty bound, return your Majesty our most humble and hearty Thanks for your great Care and Conduct in suppressing the late Rebellion, which threaten'd the Overthrow of this Government, both in Church and State, to the Extirpation of our Religion as by Law establish'd, which is most dear to us; and which your Majesty hath been pleas'd to give us repeated Assurances you will always defend and maintain; which, with all grateful Hearts we shall ever acknowledge. We further crave leave to acquaint your Majesty, that we have with all Duty and Readiness taken into our Consideration your Majesty's Gracious Speech to us; And, as to that Part of it, relating to the Officers in the Army, not qualify'd for their Employments, according to an Act of Parliament made in the 25th Year of the Reign of your Royal Brother, entitled, An Act for preventing Danger which may happen from Popish Recusants, we do, out of our bounden Duty, humbly represent unto your Majesty, that these Officers cannot by Law be capable of their Employments; and that the Incapacities they bring upon themselves that way, can no way be taken off but by an Act of Parliament: Therefore, out of that great Reverence and Duty we owe unto your Majesty, who have been graciously pleas'd to take notice of their Services to your Majesty, we are preparing a Bill to pass both Houses, for your Royal Assent, to indemnify them from the Penalties they have now incur'd: And because the continuing them in their Employments, may be taken to be a dispensing with that Law, without an Act of Parliament; the Consequence of which is of the greatest Concern to the Rights of all your Majesty's Subjects, and to all the Laws made for the Security of their Religion: We, therefore, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of your Majesty's House of Commons, do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that you would be most graciously pleas'd to give such Directions therein, that no Apprehensions or Jealousies may remain in the Hearts of your Majesty's most loyal Subjects."

On the 16th this was reported and agreed to; and to give it the more weight, the Country-Party mov'd for sending it to the Lords for their Concurrence; where not only the Bishops, but the Judges, might have an Opportunity of giving their Opinions concerning it. But here the Courtiers interpos'd a new; arguing, That the Lords had already thank'd the King for his Speech, which argu'd they were satisfy'd with it. And farther, That if they had the Right on their Side, it would be more for their Honour to address alone: And to little Firmness was there in many of those who affected to be so much concern'd for their Religion and Liberties, that upon the Question the Courtiers carry'd it, says Mr. Beard, by a small Majority; but by the Journals of the House, by 212 against 128.

Debate on the Supply.

Such Members as were of the Privy-Council having been order'd to wait on his Majesty, to know when he would be pleas'd to receive this Address, the House resolv'd itself into a general Committee, and reform'd the Consideration of the Supply: And first, of the Quantities: Under which Head, Two contrary Motions were immediately made; The one by Lord Camden, on the Patriot-Side, for 200,000*l.* which, with 200,000*l.* confest'd to be remaining of their last Grant, would make 400,000*l.* and the other by Sir John Herby the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for 1,200,000*l.* which he not only said was needful, but farther, That such a Sum had been formerly given, when an Address of the like Nature had been made to the late King. This look'd like putting a Price on the Concession requir'd by the Commons: But either the Leaders of the Country-Party look'd upon it as a Snare, or that more was ask'd for it than it was worth: For Sir Thomas Chazey, standing up, took occasion to enumerate the Particulars of what they had already given; as the Customs and Excise for Life; the additional Duty on Wine for eight Years, producing yearly 150,000*l.* the Tax on Sugar and Tobacco for the same Term, producing yearly 200,000*l.* and the Tax on foreign Linens, and East-India Goods, for five Years; producing yearly 120,000*l.* and to infer, That they ought to give little now, that they might have an Opportunity to give more hereafter; adding, "If we give too much now, we shall have nothing left to give; for what we have left to give will be taken from us." Sir Edward Jennings also would by no means admit of Mr. Chancellor's Precedent; "For, once, said he, 2,400,000*l.* was given; and, by the same Rule, we ought to give as much now." And, as the 400,000*l.* mention'd would more than answer the Charge of the Year, he was for giving no more. Lord Pringle, on the other hand, tax'd the Committee with Disingenuity, in voting a Supply unanimously, and then shewing a Disposition to give so little. Lord Randolph undertook to shew, that all they had already given was appropriated to particular Uses and Purposes; observ'd, that what was demand'd now was for supporting the Forces, which were as yet unprovok'd for; and therefore, said he, I am for 1,200,000*l.* Mr. Evers, one of the Trimmers, then mov'd, that 200,000*l.* might be given; which he farther signify'd might be rais'd by a Tax on new (*) Buildings, that might produce 200,000*l.* and a Poll-bill for the other 200,000*l.*; and these two Sums, with the 200,000*l.* already in the Exchequer, would have made 600,000*l.* which was three Fourths of the King's Demand. This however was oppos'd by Mr. Wogan, who observ'd, that the King had already 600,000*l.* a Year more than his Brother, and that therefore 400,000*l.* would be at present full enough. Lord Colleton was of the same Opinion, saying, "I am for giving the King no more than he really wants." Mr. Wynham of Salisbury also, more sensibly, closely, and freely, explain'd himself as follows:

"We give because we are ask'd. I am for the least Sum, because for an Army: I would be rid of them as soon as I could, and am more now against it than I lately was; being satisfy'd that the Country is weary of the Oppression of the Soldiers, weary of free Quarters, and Plunder, and some Pelowery, for which they have (on Complaint) found no Redress; and, since I heard Mr. Blackwate tell us how strict Rules and Orders were prescrib'd them by the King, I nod by their Behaviour that the King cannot govern them himself; and then what will become of us?"

Sir William Honeywood observ'd, that the Army was so thickly officer'd, that it might very easily be augmented a full Third: And yet even he so far relented, as to give into the Support of it for one Year, and to agree to the 400,000*l.* for that Purpose. Mr. Christy did the same; and yet in the same Breath declar'd, That they ought to leave their Posterity as free as they could: That his Zeal was greatly stunn'd by the Consideration, that the Army was under the Command of disqualify'd Persons: That the only Way to strengthen the King's Hands, without giving Umbrage to the Country, would be, to improve the Militia; for that Property was the best Security for Loyalty: That Armies were alike inconsistent with the Peace, the Laws, and Good-manners of Society, which they never fail'd to corrupt and debauch wherever they came; and that Court-martials, in the midst of a Civil Government, were most terrible: And, not content with all this, he yet farther ask'd,

"What

(*) A Tax upon New-Buildings had been under Consideration at the last Session, and it had been resolv'd, That it should be levied upon such new Foundations as had been built upon within the Compass of the Bills of Mortality since the Year 1660, excepting the late general Fires in the City of London, and Borough of Southwark. Scandal, That it should be levied only upon the Remains of the same Houses for the Term of one Year. The Bill, Upon such Foundations as were now hid. The Bill, That there should be a Clause to prevent any more Buildings within the said Limits. Protest, That the House should be mov'd, that a Bill might be brought in for that Intent; in all which the House concurred with the Committee: But without Effect; for the King wanting an immediate Supply, which he was enabled to raise by a Clause of Credit, in the Bill on East-India, the whole Affair was suffer'd to drop, and was revived no more.

Brandy, and East-India Goods, to continue till Midsummer 1690, should be given to his Majesty as 400,000*l.*: And that an additional Duty of s. 1. a Ton, on all French Wines, should be farther given, to make up the remaining 300,000*l.*; the 200,000*l.* in hand being wholly over-look'd.

This was the Business of the Forenoon; and in the Afternoon the House waited upon his Majesty, at Westball, with their Address; to which his Majesty return'd the following Answer, which, we are told by Sir John Reresby, he utter'd with great Warmth:

“Gentlemen,

I did not expect such an Address from the House of Commons: For, having so lately recommended to your Consideration the great Advantages a good Understanding between us had produc'd in a very short time, and given you Warning of Fears and Jealousies amongst ourselves, I had Reason to hope, that the Reputation God had bestow'd me with in the World would have inspir'd and confirm'd a good Confidence to you for me, and of all that I say to you. But however you proceed on your Part, I will be ready in all my Promises I have made to you, and be just to my Word in this, and all my other Speeches.”

It was so contriv'd, that the House did not meet again that Day; and on the Morrow, when they did, and the Answer was read by the Speaker, as usual, a profound Silence ensued, which continu'd so long, that Advantage was taken by (r.) Mr. Neale to call for the Order of the Day; which being oppos'd by nobody, the Speaker left the Chair, and Mr. Seymour was call'd upon to take that of the Committee, but excus'd himself, under the Pretence of Indisposition: Sir Thomas Moore was then nam'd in his stead; who immediately complying, How to render the Militia useful became the Question under Consideration; and the Objections rais'd against the present Regulation of it were principally these: 1. That the Horse was compos'd for the most part of Gentlemen's Servants, who seldom serv'd at two Musters successively. 2. That, of the Foot, some were liable to the same Objection, and others were unfit for Service. 3. That Twelve Days in a Year were too few for Exercise and Discipline. On the other hand, it was alleg'd, That if the Number of training Days were to be augmented, the Expence, which was already very heavy, would be insupportable, unless the Proportion of Property, at present charg'd with a Man or Horse severally, was alter'd in proportion. This drew on a Proposal, that, as in Oliver's Time, 12*l.* should be allow'd annually for a Horse, and 8*l.* for a Man, to be always in Readiness: But this was reject'd, because too much resembling a standing Army; as if a standing Army, form'd of the Country, and to be commanded by the Country, was not more eligible than an Army of mere Mercenaries, wholly at the Command of a Court.

The Result of all was certain Votes of the Committee, That every 100*l.* per ann. should furnish a Foot-Soldier: That 28 Days should be allow'd for training and exercising: And that the Charge should be laid on the Subject. But here they stopp'd; and after what particular Manner the Charge was to be borne, as also what Proportion of Land should furnish a Horse, was left to another Day's Debate, when they should have Leave to sit again. In truth, the whole Affair was a mere Matter of Amusement: The King would be satisfi'd with nothing but an Army of Mercenaries: His Ministers had undertaken to procure it the Sanction of Parliament: And the Commons, after all their Qualms, had enabled them to make their Engagements good.

The House being reform'd, it was expected that an immediate Adjournment would have follow'd, when Mr. Wharton (afterwards Lord Wharton) had the Courage to move, that a Day might be appointed to consider of his Majesty's Answer to the late Address, and nam'd Friday the 26th. He was seconded by Mr. Cole (of Derby) with this free and brave Addition, “I hope we are all Englishmen, and not to be frighted out of our Duty by a few high Words.” And as the Ministers were infinitely surpris'd and mortify'd at having the smooth Current of their Affairs thus suddenly disturb'd, they thought it their wisest way to endeavour to divert the Consequence, by drawing down the Indignation of the House on Mr. Cole. Accordingly Lord Preston having writ down the Words, made his Complaint; and immediately all the Slaves and Tools from every Corner roar'd out, To the Bar! To the Bar! To the Tower! To the Tower! It was in vain the poor Gentleman endeavour'd to justify himself, by saying, That he meant no ill; that he was not us'd to make set Speeches; that if he had offended, he ask'd Pardon, &c. He was told, The King was concern'd; and being withdraw'd, was order'd to the Tower, without Mercy, for his indecent Speech, as it was call'd; not one Member in the whole House daring to justify him, except by pleading his known Loyalty, for fear of being sent to keep him Company.

But tho' Mr. Cole, instead of receiving the Thanks of the House, which he highly deserv'd for his reasonable Zeal, was thus cruelly run down, the Courtiers did not wholly get rid of their Difficulties; for Mr. Seymour adopt'd Wharton's Motion, and was supported in it by Sir Thomas Clarges. But so miserably low and abject were these glorify'd Patriots become, that they durst not venture even to expostulate with a King they had so prodigally oblig'd, in Defence of the Laws of their Country, which had been so openly invaded, and for such Purposes as struck at the very Root of the Constitution, both

A. D. 1687. in Temporals and Spirituals: And instead of appointing a Day, scandalously (*) dropt the Consent by an Adjournment.

By this time the Danger of the Public grew so apparent, that the Lords grew ashamed of their first Day's Work; and even the Bishops put in for their Share of Merit, by moving, That a Day might be appointed for taking the King's Speech into Consideration. Compton of London, was the Right Reverend Father in God, who, on this Occasion, stood forth (courageously, says Echard) as the Mouth of the Bench. Alarm'd at this unexpected Attack, the Courtiers endeavour'd to stave it off, by urging, That having already given Thanks for the Speech, they had thereby adopted the Sentiments contain'd in it; and precluded themselves from finding Fault with any Part of it. And if this was not strictly true, it was an Argument that might be very fairly urg'd; for who returns Thanks for what they do not approve? Or if Men make Professions, what right have they to complain, that they are taken for Truth? This Plea was, however rejected with Indignation, and put an End, says Burnet (how truly, let the Sequel of our Annals demonstrate) to the Compliment of giving Thanks for a Speech, when there was no special Reason for it. The Lords Hollis, Nottingham, and Mordaunt, were the chief Speakers; for as to the Bishops, they acquiesc'd in what his Lordship of London was pleas'd to say for them: And tho' the Point before them was only for setting a Day, many things, we are told, escap'd in Relation to the Merits of the Case: As, that the Ten was now the best Fence they had for their Religion: If they gave up to great a Point, all the rest would soon follow; and if the King might by his Authority, supersede such a Law, fortify'd with so many Clauses, and above all with that of an Incapacity, it was in vain to think of Law any more. The Government would become arbitrary and absolute. All which, it seems, Jeffreys undertook to answer, and that in as haughty and arrogant a Tone, as he had us'd himself to on the Bench. But he was soon taught to know his Place; and that Frowns, and Noise, and Menaces would not pass for Arguments there. Upon the whole, the Court-Party finding themselves out-numbered, as well as out-argued, were forc'd to give way; and it was agreed, that, on the 23d the Speech should be taken into Consideration. "The King, says St. John Rereford, happen'd to be present, as he was generally constant in the House of Lords, and was much concern'd at the Freedom that was us'd upon

A. D. 1687. this Subject: And in truth it gave great Dissatisfaction, that the Law, in this Point, particularly, should be thus invaded and set at naught; and the very best of the King's Friends, as well as his Officers, whether Civil or Military, except such as were Popishly inclin'd, were strangely alarm'd thereat, and express'd themselves with great Freedom, wherever it happen'd to be the Topic of their Discourse.

It may not be amiss to add, that Mr. Echard ventures to pronounce this Debate of the Lords, extraordinary and unusual; whereas the Authors after whom he copies his Facts, and whose Sentiments he perverts, speaking of the Bishop of London's Motion, which gave rise to it, express themselves thus, "Which, as it was extraordinary and unusual in the House for the Clergy to thwart the Court, so it was no less surprising to the King, who now dreaded the Lords would concur with the Commons in their Address, and construed this Step to be a Piece of unpardonable Presumption in the Bishops."

But as to any Concurrence with the Commons in their Address, it was now, as we have seen, impracticable: And whether it was practicable to work them up to a Concurrence with the Lords, in any vigorous Measure, is greatly to be question'd. They had gone further in the King's Business than the Courtiers themselves had at first expect'd: And when his Majesty had, in an imperious Manner, overlook'd their Address, in relation to the Ten, they had sunk under his Displeasure: Besides on the very Day that the Lords were thus warmly engag'd, they were proceeding on Ways and Means with all the Serenity imaginable; and without bestowing a Thought on Mr. Wharton's Motion for appointing a Day to consider his Majesty's Answer.

Thus all the Hopes of the Public, for once, rested on the Lords; and unless they had stood in the Breach, the King would have had a Standing-Army and had remain'd in Possession of a Dispensing Power by their Concurrence. But, so thoroughly determin'd was his Majesty to make over the Power of his Crown into the Hands of his Catholic Friends, that he chose to part with all the Advantages of the Session, rather than hazard a second Attack on that Side: And accordingly on the 20th he came to the House of Lords; and beset on the Throne, and attended by the Commons, the Lord-Chancellor, by his Direction, spoke as follows: "My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of the House of Commons; I am commanded by his Majesty to let you know, it is his Majesty's

(*) And yet Bishop Burnet asserts, "That they resolv'd to hold on their Address; and then to proceed on the Petitions concerning Elections. And now, continues he, those that dur'd not open their Mouth before, spoke with much Force upon this Head." Whereas the House was permitted to sit but one Day afterwards, which was taken up, as above specify'd, with Ways and Means. His Lordship adds, "And it was probable, they would have condemn'd a great many Elections: For an Intimation was set round, that all those who had sunk to the Interest of the Nation, in the main House than before them, should be chosen over again, tho' it should be found their Elections were void, and that a new Writ should go out. By this means, those Petitions were now encouraged, and were like to have a fair Hearing, and a just Decision: And it was believ'd, that the absent Commons would have been voted out." And yet we have seen, that those obstinate Courtiers, were in effect the Majesty.

A. D. 1685. Majesty's Pleasure, for many weighty Reasons, that this Parliament be prorog'd to the 10th Day of February next, and this Parliament is prorog'd to the 10th Day of February next."

That his Majesty's Priests had their Share in the Advice which gave rise to this hasty Step, can scarce be question'd; and who join'd in it besides, we have no Means to know. Lord Sunderland in his Apology does not assume any of the Merit of it; but, on the contrary, affirms, that he was ever against the Motion, which the King had prevail'd upon to make in his Speech, of his Roman Catholic Officers, and which was the Rock on which all the Expectations of the Session split. It was, however, highly probable, that the French acted as Auxiliaries to the Priests: For, that they were as jealous of the Growth of the King's Power, as those of his Subjects who were most in Pain for their Liberties, is certain: And if in the former indolent Reign, when there was the utmost Confidence subsisting between the two Courts, they would not suffer the King to keep up above 7 or 8000 Troops, it is not reasonable to think they were over-pleas'd to see the present King, enabled by his Parliament to keep up treble the Number. Indeed the Third Letter preserv'd by Windsor from that Court to their Ambassador here, proceeds in a different (1) Strain, as if they were over-joy'd, that his Majesty had treated his Parliament so cavalierly; and with the Earnest he thereby seem'd to give, that he would soon make them know he was the Master: But then this Joy arose from a Foresight, that Menaces from the Throne would not fail to beget Opposition in Parliament, and Animosities among the People; in which Case, they well knew, the Power of the Kingdom would be enfeebled, and they should have the less to apprehend from it. The House of Commons, it must moreover be observ'd, had in particular disgust'd them, by laying a Duty first on French Linens, and then by augmenting that already laid on French Wines. All Impositions on Foreign Commodities, they knew had a Tendency to lessen the Consumption: And they had, for many Years back, shewn themselves to be as jealous of Trade as of Empire. In assisting, therefore, to bring on a Rupture between the King and his People, they further'd their own Interest in every Article: And possibly they found no Arguments so prevalent, as those that flatter'd his Majesty's high Notions of the Prerogative; and that set forth the absolute Necessity of his breaking thro' the Fetters of the Law, in Case he resolv'd to get the better of his heretical Subjects.

In Order of Time we here ought to take our leave of the Parliament; but some few Particulars which would not mix with the general Survey of Business, remain still to be spoke of. And first, concerning the controverted Elections, Bishop Burnet says, "That when the Petition in relation to them were presented, Seymour spoke very high and with much Weight on that Occasion; he said, the Complaints of the Irregularities in Elections were so great, that many doubted whether this was a true Representative of the Nation, or not: He said, little Equity was expected upon Petitions, where so many were too guilty to judge justly and impartially. He said, it concern'd them to look to their: For if the Nation saw no Justice was to be expected from them, other Methods would be found, in which they might come to suffer that Justice which they would not do. He was a haughty Man, proceeds the Bishop, and would not communicate his Design in making this Motion to any. So all were surpris'd with it, but none seconded it. This had no Effect, not so much as to draw on a Debate."

And thus we are left to understand, that what was spoke with so much Weight, had no Weight at all, and to conclude, if we please, that none of these controverted Elections ever came to a Hearing: But whatever the Representation may be, the Fact was otherwise: And Memorials have been left us of one Man whose Election was vacated, because, being Mayor of the Borough, he had return'd himself; and of another who was serv'd in like manner, because he had abated one of his Tenants zoh in his Rent, which was confirm'd to be a Bribe. No doubt, as they had their very Being from Corruption, they were not over-religious in their Decrees: But they were not arriv'd at such a Pitch of Insanity, as to trample on all Forms, and to set the World at Defiance.

The same Author further says, in the same Page, "The Courtiers were projecting many Laws to ruin all who oppos'd their Designs. The most important of these was an Act declaring Treason during that Reign; by which, Words were to be made Treason. And the Clause was to draw, that any thing said to disparage the King's Person or Government was made Treason, within which every thing said to the Dishonour of the King's Religion would have been comprehended, as Judges and Juries were then modelled. This was chiefly oppos'd by Serjeant Maynard, who in a very grave Speech had open the Inconvenience of making Words Treason: They were oppos'd ill heard and ill understood, and were apt to be mis-represented by a very small Variation: Men in Passion, or in Drink, might say things they never intended: Therefore he hoped they would keep

(1) At follow: "We are now out of Pain about the King's Intensions. This last Speech has sufficiently clear'd all our Doubts, together with what ——— has written upon that Subject. 'Tis no more than what I really expected; for I had always a better Opinion of him, than to think he could bear tamely the Petition which Heretics would endeavour to impose upon him. For the time to come, I hope he will sit as Master. Your Conduct there pleas'd extremely and, above all, your last Dispatch about what pass'd at your Audience. All you have promis'd shall be made good to a Title; and 'tis hop'd that we will be as zealous to keep their Promises to us. The Indesire you must deliver, but not till you see the Person has deliver'd it; for I am more and more persuaded, as well as you, that we cannot be too much upon the Reserve with him." &c.

keep to the Law of the 25th of Edward III. by which an Overt-act was made the necessary Proof of ill Intentions. And when others insisted, that out of the Abundance of the Heart the Mouth speak, he brought the Instance of our Saviour's Words; Destroy this Temple; and shew'd, how near the Temple was to this Temple, pronouncing it in Syrac, so that the Difference was almost imperceptible. There was nothing more innocent than these Words, as our Saviour meant and spoke them: But nothing was more criminal, than the setting on a Multitude to destroy the Temple. This made some Impression at that time."

Now it happens, unfortunately for us, or this Right Reverend Author, that there is not the least Trace of any such Bill to be found in any of the Accounts of this Parliament extant: And therefore we are under a Necessity to suppose, that if any such Clause was offer'd, it was by way of Supplement to the Bill for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person and Government; which, no doubt was first enough, and which pass'd the House of Commons, while Monmouth was in Arms, just before the Adjournment, but never reach'd the Lords.

The other Transactions, which deserve Notice, made a Part of the Business of the Lords: The Lord Delamere had been requir'd, by Proclamation, to make his Appearance before his Majesty in Council, within ten Days after the Date thereof; and had render'd himself to Lord Sunderland within seven: There was no Witness produc'd against him, nothing capital was laid to his Charge, and yet, instead of being admitted to Bail, as the Law directed, he was after Examination sent to the Tower; where he had been kept in close Restraint ever since the Twenty-sixth of July. These were Hardships that no Subject whatever ought to be expos'd to; and his Lordship was not of a Make to be over-patient under them. As soon, therefore, as the Parliament re-assembled, he set forth all these Particulars, in a Petition to his Peers; declar'd, that he was altogether innocent of any evil Practice against his Majesty, or the Government; and humbly pray'd their Lordships to take his Case into their serious Consideration. The Result upon the Question was, that the Lords with white Staves were order'd to wait upon the King with the Request of the House, to be inform'd why the Lord Delamere, a Member of their House, was absent from his Attendance there: And his Majesty's Answer was, "That the Lord Delamere stood committed for High-Treason, for levying War against the King last Summer, testify'd upon Oath; and that his Majesty had already given Directions that he should be proceeded against according to Law."

This not proving satisfactory to the House, they resum'd the Affair a few Days after, and were further told by Jessy, by the King's Command, "That the Treason charg'd upon Lord Delamere was committed in Cheshire; and that being a County-Palatine, the Prosecution must be there, and not in the Court of King's-Bench, as it might if the Treason had been committed in any other County; and therefore his Majesty had given Orders for a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, in order to the finding of an Indictment against him; which Commission was already pass'd; and if the Indictment be not found before the End of the Term, the Lord Delamere's Prayer being enter'd in the King's-Bench, he may be call'd."

There was yet another Peer, the Earl of Stamford, who, about the same time, had been seiz'd in Leicester-shire, and in like manner committed to the Tower; from whence he also put up his Petition, specifying the Particulars of his Case (one of which was, That he heard an Indictment of High-Treason was found against him, but where, when, how, or upon what Evidence, he knew not); asserting his Innocence, and imploring Justice. The Season prov'd as favourable to him, as before to Lord Delamere: The House immediately took the Petitions into Consideration; and order'd the Lord-Mayor, and the rest of the Justices of the City of London, before whom the said Indictment had been found, to return it by Certiorari into their House: Which being done accordingly, the Earl was brought to the Bar by Orders, and ask'd by the Chancellor, What he had to say to the House? To which he reply'd, That he desir'd to bear his Charge: And being ask'd again, if he had any thing more to say, his Lordship reply'd, "That he had been strictly confin'd for sixteen Weeks successively, during which time he had not been allow'd the Liberty of Pen, Ink, nor Paper; nor Friends to come to him; for which Reasons, he knew not what more to say, till he knew his Charge." Whereupon the House order'd, That the Earl of Stamford's Trial should be in Westminster-hall, on the first Day of December; that in the mean time he should be allow'd the Liberty of Pen, Ink, and Paper, and Friends to come to him, in order for his Trial; and that the Lords with white Staves should attend the King, to desire his Majesty, in behalf of the House, that a Place might be appointed in Westminster-hall for the Trial of the said Earl; and also humbly to desire his Majesty, to give Order for a Commission for a Lord High-Steward, in order to the said Trial. This pass'd on the 17th of November; and on the Morrow the King signify'd his Compliance with the Request of the House: But the Debate on the Speech occurring next, his Majesty did not think himself oblig'd to stand to his Word; and so put a stop to their Proceedings by a Prorogation: Concerning which, and certain other concurring Events, Sir John Kersey writes as follows:

"This gave Birth to many Conjectures: Some said, the King had so good a Revenue, and was so good a Manager, that he had it in his Power to subsist both his Fleet and his Army without more Money; and that therefore he would scarce have Occasion for any more Parliaments: That this seem'd the more likely, as he had, by this Prorogation, Prorogation, refus'd the Supply which the Commons were preparing to give him; while others believ'd the King would certainly meet us again, at the Term prefix'd; and that, in the mean time, he would find out some Expedient to satisfy the Houses as to the only Article they complain'd of, meaning the Affair of the Popish Officers; which nevertheless it was said, might be sturdily doubted, seeing that some of the Gentlemen who had signifi'd themselves for the Address, were first forbidden the King's Presence, which was the Case of Mr. Fox, Paymaster to the Army, Lieutenant-Colonel Darcy, Major Webb, and then laid aside.

Several other Members were also dismiss'd from their Employments, for not voting as the King expected they should, and particularly such as were Officers in the Army, without any Consideration for the Eminence of their Families, or their own particular Merits and Services to the Crown, to the great Surprize of every body.

Nor was this all, for it was now farther laid, that in Council it had been agreed, That all Persons, who, for the future, offend in the same way, would be serv'd in the same Manner, which flatter'd a Number of People. The Popish Party, moreover, behav'd with great Insolence; which was the more remark'd, as the King of France was now in the Height of persecuting his Protestant Subjects, who many of them fled as they could, poor and naked, having been first stripp'd of all they had. This is a great and cruel an Instance of the Spirit, that, for the most part, possesses those of this delusive Persuasion, was now the Talk of all thinking People, who began to be of Opinion, that every thing just and lawful, ought to be done to obviate the Growth, and abate the present Pride of the Papists in our Dominions.

The Duke of Albemarle, continues our Author, told me several things concerning the State of Affairs, which astonish'd me very much. Gentlemen were in a most unprecedented manner assaulted in the very Streets; one had a Powder thrown into his Eyes, which depriv'd him of Sight; another had his Throat cut by two Men, tho' neither of these Gentlemen had given the least visible Provocation or Offence to the Aggressors; and the said Duke of Albemarle was met by a Gentleman who threaten'd him as his Grace was going along in his Chair. And now it was whisper'd, That the King would still farther prorogue the Parliament till May; which certainly was the wisest Course he had, at this time, to take, if he could not resolve to give some proper Satisfaction to the House, with regard to the Popish Officers; but that this was far from his Thoughts, and quite contrary to his Intention, appear'd by a late Admission of several others of that Superstition into Military Posts. In short, the King unhappily persisting in his own way, discharged his Anger against the Bishop of London, a most worthy Prelate, Brother to the late Earl of Northampton; by putting him away from the Council-Board, on account of the Speech he had made in the House of Lords, concerning the Popish Officers; tho', as I was told by the Archbishop of York, it was spoken with all the Deference and Respect imaginable. Others again attributed his Dismission to his Industry, in keeping the Princess of Denmark within the Pale of the Protestant Church, in Opposition to some extraordinary Endeavours to win her over to that of Rome.

About this time Lord Sunderland was made President of the Council, and continu'd Secretary of State; his Lordship having artfully insinuated to the Queen, That the Friends and Relations of the King's first Wife, as Rochester, Clarendon, Dartmouth, and others, were in greatest Favour, and in Possession of the best Places, while her Friends, tho' she was Queen-Consort, were but slenderly provided for; and her Friends being reckon'd to be Lord Sunderland, the Lord Chancellor, (Lord Godolphin) and the Lord Churchill, the rival Factions began to play their private Batteries against each other.

Lord Sunderland
had made Lord Prif-
dent and con-tinu'd Secretary.

The two Leaders were, the Lord Treasurer, and the new Lord President; and of these it appear'd plainly, by his late Promotion, that the Latter had the Ascendancy; What therefore the Former had lost at Court, he endeavour'd to recover among the People; From being the most lordly and overbearing of Men, he grew all at once the most courteous and obliging: He affect'd to be the Champion of the Protestant Cause, and to have no other Concern than the Preservation of the Church; Whence it was concluded, that his Fall was not far off; that his Lordship was himself sensible of it; and that he was looking round for every Twig, which could help him to keep his Ground, or let him down softly.

Still the great Work went on of grinding down the Remains of Faction between the Mill-stones of the Law. Immediately after the Prorogation, Gerrard Lord Brandon was brought to a Trial at the King's Bench Bar, for conspiring with other false Traitors (Montmouth, &c.) to raise a Rebellion, depose, and put to Death the late King, &c. of which being found guilty by the prostitute Juries of the Times, he receiv'd Sentence of Death; but, by applying properly, made a shift to obtain a Pardon; which Sir John Reresby celebrates as a signal Act of Grace, because that Lord had been formerly condemn'd for breaking a Boy's Neck in his Caps, and had been admitted to Mercy.

Lord Brandon's Case.

But the sparing this Lord was no Proof that the Court was satiated with Blood; for there wanted yet another Life to close the iniquitous Scene. One Boteman, who had been Surgeon to Lord Shaftsbury, and who had dar'd to attend on Oates after his Whipping, and by his Art and Care to defeat the Purpose of his cruel Sentence, was now to be the Martyr of his own Humanity: His Crime was said to be a Concern in the Rye-Affair; and tho' he fell into a sort of Diffraction in Prison, he was nevertheless put upon his Trial. This, by one Party, has been treated as an Excess of Rigor; and that his Son was permitted to make his Defence, is by the other extoll'd as an Excess of Lenity. But against such Witnesses and such Juries, they who granted this Indulgence, well knew no Defence would be sufficient. When therefore young Bateman was quill'd by his own Affection to his Father, and his Persuasion of his Innocence to become his Advocate, he may be said to have seal'd his Fate; for while the Man continu'd out of his Reason; the Law could take no Cognizance of him: And for the same Cause, the Bench should not have admitted his Son to take that upon him which his Father was not in a Condition to authorize. But without any Breach of Charity, it may be presum'd they were glad of the Opportunity. The Witnesses were Lee the Dyer, and Godenough, who swore to several Conversations held by them with the Prisoner, about the Division of the City, the tearing of the Tower, and the Savoy, &c. but unsupported by any Overt-Act. The Defence turn'd on these Points, viz. That Godenough was not a sufficient Witness, for want of a sufficient (1) Pardon: That Lee did not deserve the least Credit, since he had never mention'd Bateman's Name till then, tho' so often examin'd concerning what he knew both as to Persons and Things: And that he had endeavour'd to suborn Evidence against the Prisoner, as was sworn by one Baker, who was the very Man whom he had to endeavour'd to suborn; under the Promise of making him a great Man: But, as might have been easily foreseen, all signify'd nothing; the Court directed, and the Jury found, a Verdict for the King; and on the ninth Day after his Trial, he was executed at Tyburn.

Hampton, the younger, his Case.

We left young Mr. Hampton in Prison for a Middlemear, loaded with a Fine of 40000*l.* But the Court being now better furnish'd with Evidence by the Acquittal of Lord Gry, it was resolv'd to proceed against him capitally for the same Offence, which was now denominated High-Treason. Accordingly, he was indicted after the usual Forms, and put upon his Country: But knowing it would be to no Purpose to enter upon a Defence, he first objected; That he ought not to be question'd for the same Fact twice; and then threw himself on the King's Mercy. This, however, did not satisfy the Court; the Chief-Justice told him he had not yet been try'd for Treason, and therefore he must either plead guilty, or not guilty. He chose the latter; and acknowledg'd he had highly offended his Majesty; and begg'd the Intercession of the Court in his Behalf; by which he greatly offended his own Party, and furnish'd his Adversaries with sufficient Matter to be very severe on himself; for if he was innocent, why did he purchase Life at the Expence of his Reputation? and if guilty, why did he afterwards fly in the Face of his Benefactor? For the Mercy he sought, he found; and yet we shall find him among the most active of those who took the Advantage of the Miscarriages of this Reign to bring about a Revolution.

A. D. 1655.

Lord Delamere's Turn was next; but not for any Concern in this fatal Treason. The Charge against him was, for being an Accomplice with Manwath in his late Rebellion: And tho' it had been urg'd to the Peers, by the Chancellor, that he could be try'd no where but in Cheshire, where the Charge was laid, the Cause was now remov'd, by a Removal of the Bill found in that County to Walsingham-hall, where a select Court of Peers (2) was erected by Commission, of which Jefreys was appointed Judge, in the sublime Character of Lord High Steward.

As to the Trial itself, after the introductory Forms were over, the Indictment was read, and the noble Prisoner gave in a written Plea; in which he argu'd, that his Cause being already before the Peers in Parliament, which Parliament was still subsisting, tho' under Prorogation, it did not come properly before them, nor could be otherwise decided than by the said Peers as before in Parliament assembled. But this was over-ruled by the Lord High Steward, at the Prayer of the King's Attorney: And his Grace, by the way, calling his Objections frivolous, the Lord at the Bar reply'd, "I hope the Privilege of the Peers of England is not frivolous; I assure your Grace, I do not offer this Matter for myself, but for the whole Body of Peers; and if they are satisfy'd, I acquiesce." This somewhat ruffled his Grace, who in return took occasion to request the Prisoner neither to misapprehend, nor misrepresent him; for it was his Plea, and not the Privilege of the Peerage which he had term'd frivolous: But added his Grace, "If your Lordship have a mind to have your Council heard, in God's Name, let them come:—They shall be heard. And when that is done to satisfy you the more, I will advise with my Lords the Judges, that are there to assist, what they take to be the Law in the Case; and, upon the whole, I will deliver my Judgment as well as I can." This the Lord at the Bar was to have understood to be a high Strain of Lenity: But he, tho' a Prisoner, nor forgetting he was a Peer, rejoind'd, "I hope your Grace will advise with my Lords the Peers, here present, it being a Point of Privilege:—Which so far got the better of his Grace's Temper, that he roar'd out, "Good my Lord, I hope you that are a Prisoner at the Bar are not to give me Directions who I should advise with, or how I should demean myself here." And soon after declar'd against any further Inter-locution; and rejected the Plea, because his Lordship had not Council ready at hand, which it was impossible for him to have, to argue it.

The Prisoner then pleaded Not Guilty, and the Judge gave his Charge, which, tho' deliver'd in the Presence of so illustrious an Audience, and on so solemn an Occasion, partook of the same coarse Dialect which had distinguish'd him first in the Old Bailey, and which, in the midst of his highest Elevation, still shew'd him to be a Son of Earth.

My Lords, said he, I know you cannot but well remember, what unjust and insolent Attempts were made upon the rightful and unalterable Succession to the Imperial Crown of these Realms, under the pretence of That, which has been so often found to be the Occasion of Rebellion; I mean, the specious Pretence of Religion, by the pretence, pretence, and fanatical Zeal of some Members of the House of Commons, in the last Parliaments under the late King Charles II. of ever blessed Memory:

Which, by the wonderful Providence of Almighty God, not prevailing, the chief Contrivers of that horrid Villany consulted together how to gain that Advantage upon the Monarchy by open Force, which they could not obtain by a pretended Course of Law.

And in order thereto, it is but too well known, how they had several treasonable Meetings, made bold and riotous Progresses into several Parts of the King's Dominions; thereby endeavouring to debauch the Minds of the well-meaning, tho' unwary and ignorant, Part of the King's Subjects.

But these their evil Purposes it pleas'd God also to frustrate, by bringing to light that curst Conspiracy against the Life of his Sacred Majesty King Charles II. as also against that of our dread Sovereign that now is, whom God long preserve.

Their bellicose and dammable Plot, one would have thought, could not have survived the just Condemnation and Execution of some of the chief Contrivers of them; especially considering, that, after it had pleas'd Almighty God to take to himself our late merciful and dread Sovereign, no sooner was his Sacred Majesty that now is seated in the Royal Throne of his Ancestors, but he made it his utmost Endeavours, not only to convince the World that he had quite forgot those insolent and abominable Indignities that had been put upon him, ONLY for being the best of Subjects, and the best of Brethren; but did also give forth the most benign Assurances imaginable to all his loving People, that he would approve himself to be the best of Kings.

And further, to evince the Reality of these his gracious and heroic Resolutions, he immediately call'd a Parliament; and therein repeated, and solemnly confirm'd, his former Royal Declarations of having a particular Care of maintaining our establish'd Laws and Religion: With which that wise, great, and loyal Assembly, were so fully and perfectly satisfy'd, that they thought they could not make sufficient Returns of Gratitude for such gracious and Princely Condescension.

And yet, my Lords, while the King and Parliament were thus endeavouring to out-do each other in Expressions of Kindness, that wicked and ungodly Rebellion broke out; and thereupon the Arch-traitor Monmouth was, by a Bill brought into the lower House, and pass'd by the general Consent of both Houses, (and I could wish, my Lords, for the sake of that noble Lord at the Bar, that I could say, it had pass'd with the Consent of every particular Member of each House) justly maintain'd of High Treason.

My Lords; what Share my Lord at the Bar had in these other Matters, I must acquaint you, is not within the Compass of this Indictment, for which you are to try him, as his Peers: For that it is for a Treason alledged to have been committed by him in his Majesty's Reign that now is, &c.

The rest of his Harangue consisted only of a Compliment to the Triers, and a Signification of his own Right to be the Mouth of the Court: And to these last Articles he pass'd so abruptly, that it was manifest the great End in view was, to inflame the Minds of his Auditory against the Prisoner; which, however warrantable by Custom, is scarce pardonable in a Council for the King, but, in a Judge, is little less than Perjury.

Yemour, the Recorder of London, and Sarverer the Attorney-General, then open'd the Cause for the King; the latter of whom gave in a large Deduction of all the several Matters that were to be produced in Evidence, and concluded with saying, "I shall plainly shew you all this that I have open'd, in plain Proof; and then we shall submit it to your Lordships Judgments, whether this noble Peer be not guilty, as he has pleaded to his Indictment."

The Evidence was prefac'd by the famous Lord Howard of Effrick, rather to justify the Lord High-Steward's Speech; it must be presum'd, than any thing else; for he had not one Syllable to depose against the Nobleman at the Bar; and even when ask'd by the Attorney, Whether he knew of any Design of a Rising in Cheshire? he answer'd, That he knew of none at all. He was follow'd by another equally famous Peer, the Lord Grey, who, having promis'd, that he had been subpoena'd on both Sides; tho' he had nothing to speak of his own Knowledge against the Prisoner, or for him, was led by the Attorney to speak to these two Points, 1. The intended Rising in the late King's Time. 2. Monmouth's Invasion. Concerning the first, he said, That "About the time of Election of Sheriffs for the City of London, the Duke of Monmouth, and my Lord of Shaftsbury, began to discourse about making use of That, as an Opportunity to accomplish their Design; for they thought the Ferment was so high, that Men would easily be dispos'd to an Insurrection: And after many Discourses to that Purpose, they came to this Resolution, That they would apply themselves to make what Interest they could to procure a Rising in three several Parts of the Kingdom at once: One in Cheshire, whither the Duke of Monmouth was to betake himself; and there be advised by my Lord Maclefield, my Lord Brandon, my Lord Delamere that then was, and the Prisoner at the Bar, what Gentlemen were proper to apply to, for joining in the Design: The second was in London, which was assign'd to be the Province of my Lord of Shaftsbury: And the third was in the West, which was committed to the Care of my Lord Ruffel. The Duke of Monmouth did accordingly go his Progress into Chester, as is very well known; and, upon his Return, was taken into Custody by the Sergeant at Arms: Upon which, Sir Thomas Armstrong was sent Post to Town, to get an Habeas Corpus; and withal, to deliver a Message to me, to be communicated with my Lord Ruffel, and my Lord Shaftsbury: Which Message, as near as I remember, was to this Effect; That he had been kindly receiv'd by the Gentlemen, of the Country; and had discuss'd the Matter with them, and found them all inclin'd very much to his Satisfaction: That, upon his being arrested, he had been advis'd to make his Escape into Chester, and rise immediately; but that he would not do a Matter of that great Importance, without the Approbation of his Friends.

And of the second, "That soon after the late King's Death, the Duke of Monmouth was at Amsterdam with my Lord Argyle, where there was an Account given of the Design that was in hand, of an Insurrection in Scotland, and the Preparations that had been made in order to it; and at that time there came over to Holland Mr. Crag, that came, as I was inform'd from Major Wildman; and his Errand was to promote and recommend a Reconciliation between the Duke of Monmouth and my Lord Argyle, who till that time had acted in separate Interests; and Crag then gave an Account, that Means and Money were prepar'd; he had no particular Message to the Duke, because he did not know of meeting him there at that time. The Duke of Monmouth upon this Encouragement, did send Captain Matthew (Armstrong's Son-in-law) into England, with a Message to Major Wildman, wherein he did desire him that he would procure a Meeting with my Lord Maclefield, my Lord Brandon, my Lord Delamere, and I think Mr. Charleton, and acquaint them that he had receiv'd a full Account of my Lord Argyle's Affairs, and the Preparations that had been made for it; and accordingly he had order'd his own Affairs to join with him; he likewise sent Crag with a Message to the same Purpose to other Friends in London, and he dispatch'd away one Battecombe into the West to prepare things there. When Crag return'd back again to the Duke, he gave him an Account, that Major Wildman had procur'd a Meeting with those Lords and Gentlemen, that I mention'd before, who were all of Opinion, that the Duke of Monmouth should go for Scotland, for they thought that his coming there would be the best Service he could do the Interest at present, and they should know the Strength of the Enemy here, by their sending Forces to suppress the Rebellion there. There was likewise a particular Message from Major Wildman to the Duke of Monmouth, That he desir'd he would bring over with him a Broad Seal to seal Commissions with, and to take upon him the Title of King; the other particular Branches of the Message I do not so well remember, but only this he was particularly ask'd, Whether the Prisoner at the Bar was there, and he said, he was."

This second Right Honourable Witness was farther led by the Attorney to speak of another Message brought from England to the Duke of Monmouth by one Jones, and of his being sent back with a Letter in relation to his landing, but to whom directed, he could not say; as also of his Grace's Dependence on his Friends in Chester for Assistance, which Friends he once nam'd to be the Lords Maclefield, Brandon, and Delamere, as in the first Branch of his Evidence; but then as to Chester, confin'd them to the two former.

Wade was then produc'd, and swore, That after Monmouth and Argyle had made their Concert, Captain Matthew was sent to England to apprise the Duke's Friends of it, and particularly those of Chester, the Lord Delamere being nam'd as one. He also nam'd the several Messages of Crag and Jones, the latter of whom was sent back with Advice of his Grace's Expedition, which, among the rest, he was to communicate to the Lords Delamere, Maclefield, and Brandon.

Godenough follow'd Wade, and swore, in like manner, that Jones, amongst the rest, was address'd to Lord Delamere; as also that he, Godenough, being in Discourse with the Duke of Monmouth, while these Affairs were in Agitation, his Grace said, That he hop'd the Lord Delamere would not break his Promise with him.

Jones himself was brought forward next, and depos'd, That in the latter End of April last, he carry'd a Message from one Mr. Disney in London to the Duke in Holland, signifying, That his Friends would not, by any Means, have him come to England; but advis'd, that he should either continue where he was, or sail for Scotland: That on the Delivery of this Message to his Grace, he fell into a great Passion, saying, "This was Wildman's Work: That he was a Villain: That he was resolv'd to come for England, and that he, Wildman, should either hang with him, or fight for him." That when he, Jones, was again setting out for England, his Grace gave him a seal'd Paper of Instructions, which he was to open at Sea, and not before; and after reading them he was to tear the Paper, and throw it over-board: That he further directed him, when he came to London, to find out Captain Matthew, and desire him to acquaint the Lords Maclefield, Brandon, and Delamere: "That he was resolv'd to set sail on the Saturday Morning following." Adding "The Captain is to send a Petition post to the Place nam'd in the Note for Intelligence of my landing, that those

Lords

A. D. 1685.

Lords, who are to be in Readiness, may be apprised of <sup>A</sup> twenty-four Hours before the Court, and have time to repair to their several Posts: That to the best of his Remembrance, the Contents of the Paper were to this Effect:

“Taunton in Somersetshire is the Place to which all are to resort; the Persons to be acquainted with the Time of Landing are, the Lord Macclesfield, the Lord Brandon, and the Lord Delamere; the Place to send the Coach to is, to Taunton, to Mr. Savage's House at the Red Lion, the Place where the Post was appointed to return was, Captain Mattbees Lodging, at Mr. Blake's, and he was to receive the Message; or if he did not, he was to appoint one that should receive it; or if it were to return to any other Place, that was left to him to do as he thought fit.”

That when he, Jones, came to London, which was on the 27th of May, being the Walnesday Fortnight before the Duke landed, he could neither find Mattbees nor William, both being out of Town: That he then communicated his Instructions to Disney; and that how Disney proceeded, with regard to them, he had never heard, nor could say.”

One Story was then call'd upon, who swore, That one Brand, of Bishop-gate-street, had, on the 28th of May, told him of Jones's Return from Holland with a Message from the Duke of Monmouth: As also, That his Grace had agreed to go to Taunton: That Dave, or Williams, of that Place, was to bring the News of his Landing: That Jones had deliver'd his Message to Disney, in the Absence of Mattbees: That Disney had thereupon had some Discourse with Lord Delamere; and that his Lordship had that very Night gone out of Town with two Friends, through Enfield-Chace towards Hatfield.

Two Persons were then produced, who swore, That they did accompany Lord Delamere, on the 27th in the Evening, out of Town: That he went by the Name of Brown; and that his Lordship gave out, that the Occasion of his Journey was to see a sick Child in the Country.

One Tracy Pauncesfort, and one Thomas Balington were next set up, to prove, that Brown was the exact Name that Lord Delamere went by among the Faction; and that certain of Monmouth's Declarations which had been printed at Disney's were to be carry'd to one Brown in Chester: And they said all they could to fasten some such Proof upon him; but his Lordship unluckily asking Pauncesfort, if he knew of no body else that went by the Name of Brown besides him, he was (as) forc'd to confess, that one Vermeyden went also by that Name; and so that whole Pile of Scaffolding came to the Ground.

The Landlord of an Inn in Coventry then stood forth, and swore, that the Prisoner had rid post backwards and forwards about five times before the Sunday Se'night before the Coronation, and the twenty-first of June following.

And, lastly, one Saxon, who had been in the Rebellion, and who had been a Fellow-Prisoner of Story's, before mention'd, as Story himself was oblig'd to own, swore point blank as follows:

“At the Beginning of June last, I was sent for to Mere, my Lord Delamere's House in Chester, where when I came, I was convey'd into a lower Room, where were my Lord Delamere, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr. Crew-Officer; and they told me I was recommended to them by my Lord Brandon, who had said, I was an honest useful Man, and they hop'd I would prove so: For they had sent to the Duke of Monmouth, who was in Holland, and receiv'd an Answer by one Jones; and as soon as they had an Answer, my Lord Delamere came away post into the Country under another Name, and by being convey'd through Meerfield, came down to raise ten thousand Men for the Duke of Monmouth in Chester, by the first of June; but now they had consider'd of it, and found they could not raise them till Midsummer, for they must have time to raise a Sum of Money, forty thousand Pounds in that Country to maintain the Men; they ask'd me, whether I would not undertake to carry a Message to the Duke of Monmouth, I told them, I would, and I had there given me eleven Guineas, and five Pounds in silver for my Journey, and I did hire a Horse afterwards, and did deliver my Message to the Duke of Monmouth.”

Being ask'd at what time he was trusted with this Mission, he would not undertake to be positive to a Day, but believ'd it was the third or fourth of June; and at whose Recommendation he came to be so trusted, he answer'd the Lord Brandon's.

And now the Charge being, to all Appearance, in every Circumstance, made good, the Attorney was pleas'd to declare, he should give no more Evidence, till he should see what Defence the noble Lord would make for himself. But his Lordship, instead of entering on his Defence, made his Request that the Court might be adjourn'd till the Morrow, that he might have Time to review his Notes, &c. The Lord High-Steward, on the other hand, had his Doubts whether this could be done by due Course of Law, and directed the Judges to withdraw to consider of it: Upon which the Lord Nettingham observ'd, That this Matter did not depend wholly on the Judges; and therefore mov'd, that the Peers might also withdraw to consider of it with them: It was seconded by the Lord Viscount Falensberge, with this Difference, that the latter pronounc'd it was a Matter of Privilege merely, and that the Determination, of course, did not lie in the Breast of the Judges; and the Lords appearing to be all of the same Opinion, his Grace thought it but decent to give way; and the Peers withdrew accordingly.

In about an Hour all return'd; and, being seated as before, the Judges were call'd upon for their Opinion: But the Lord Chief-Justice, on the behalf of his Brethren, excus'd themselves from giving any, except by Inference, from the Practice of the inferior Courts, as being a Matter wholly new to them, and left their Lordships to decide of their own Jurisdiction. The Lord High-Steward then resum'd the Difficulty into his own Hands, and gave the Peers to understand, that, tho' they were the Judges of their own Privileges, he was the Judge of the Law of the Court: That, in case he should give into an erroneous Adjournment, and the Peer at the Bar should be acquitted, he would be liable to a new Prosecution: And if he should be condemn'd after such Error, he himself (Jeffrey) would be liable to Censure, for having committed it: "And certainly, my Lords, said he, in a Strain of Gentleness that he had never been found to deviate into before, your Lordships, and I, and all Mankind, ought to be tender of committing any Errors in Cases of Life and Death; and I would be loth, I will assure you, to be recorded for giving an erroneous Judgment in a Case of Blood, and as the first Man that should bring in an illegal Precedent, the Consequence of which may extend I know not how far."

solv'd by the Lord High-Steward.

Dissolv'd.

Upon the Whole, his Opinion was, That the Trial should proceed, and the Lord at the Bar enter on his Defence, which he did accordingly, with as much Spirit and Presence of Mind as ever Man testify'd on any Occasion. He observ'd, That the producing and pressing such things against him as were but Hearsay's, or such other things as might be rack'd to any other Evidence against any other Person; was a strong Indication of his Innocence, and that these frivolous things were urg'd for want of other Matter: He quoted a Saying of the Lord Nottingham's, when sitting as Lord High-Steward, in the Case of Lord Cornwallis, "That the fouler the Crime was, the clearer and plainer the Proof ought to be: And that there was no other good Reason to be given why the Law refus'd to allow the Prisoner at the Bar Council, in Matter of Fact, when Life was concern'd, but only this, Because the Evidence by which he is condemn'd ought to be so very evident and plain, that all the Council in the World should not be able to answer it." He call'd Saxen the great Goliath of the Witnesses produced against him, and said, if he could cut him down, he suppos'd it would be thought that he had sufficiently purg'd himself. He then call'd several Persons to the Bar, that Saxen was an infamous Fellow; and several more, some of whom were of Distinction, to prove that Sir Robert Cotton was so far from being at his House in Chester, at the time specify'd, that he had not been in the County for several Months before and after that time. By several others he demonstrated, that it was impossible Mr. Osley should be there: And lastly, by several others, he farther demonstrated, that he himself was not only in London, June 5, but actually taking Notes when a Cause of Lord Macclesfield's was heard, in the House of Peers that Day. His Lordship then made some Remarks on certain other Passages in Saxen's Evidence; and all at once making a Transition to the Man, excus'd himself as follows: "My Lord, I cannot help it, if People will tell false Stories of me, but I hope your Lordship will consider the Credibility of them: Is it to be imagin'd that I would take a Man I knew nothing of, upon another Man's Word, into so great a Confidence, as to employ him about a Business of this Nature? I am glad that he was call'd in here again for your Lordships to view him: I beseech your Lordships to look at him: Is this Fellow a likely Fellow to be used on such an Affair? Does he look as if he were fit to be employ'd for the raising of ten thousand Men? Does he seem to be a Man of such considerable Interest in his Country? A Fellow, that tho' he be not direct Evidence, yet by several Witnesses I have shewn to be a Man of no Reputation in his Country, nay of a very ill one: And could we have none else to employ, in a Matter of this Moment, but such a Fellow as his Neighbours would not take his Word for any thing? It is an improbable Story upon these accounts, if I should say no more. Your Lordships likewise say, that he is so well thought of, that he dare not be truck'd out of Notgate, but is kept still a Prisoner, and as such gives Evidence here: And I know your Lordships will not forget that he swears to save himself, having been a Rebel by his own Confession; and he would fain exchange his Life for mine. * * * My Lords, I think I need say no more of him. Your Lordships Time is precious, too precious indeed, to be spent upon such a Subject as this; and so I set him aside."

His Lordship then proceeded to account for his several Journeys to and fro: The first he prov'd was to execute a Lease of between 6 and 7000*l.* Value, with the Bishop of Clyfford; and that he us'd such Expedition because Word was sent him, that the said Prelate was dangerously ill. With regard to the second, he acknowledg'd, that he did set out for Chester on the 27th of May; that he did go by the Name of Brown; and that he took the Road of Flatfield: But then he prov'd that it was to visit the best belov'd of his Children, who at that time lay ill in Chester; and that the Secrecy he us'd as to the Time and Manner of his Journey, was owing to Intelligence he had receiv'd, that a Warrant had been issu'd to apprehend him. He then prov'd that he stay'd but two Nights, and one Day in Chester; and that on the Receiving of a Letter from his Lady, signifying that the Report of the Warrant was a Mistake; and that another of his Children was ill, he took Post-Horses and rode with such Speed that, he arriv'd in London June the 3d. Having made out every one of these Particulars by sufficient Evidence, he call'd God to Witnes as to Jones, he had never seen his Face, nor heard his Name, till after he was committed to the Tower; as also that for three Years past he had never had any Correspondence with the late Duke of Monmouth, or receiv'd either Letter or Message from him. What else had been alledg'd against him, he not only treated as Hearsay, but Hearsay of Hearsay; and upon the whole concluded, that if any of their Lordships would think themselves in a bad Condition, as to his Fortune, if he could produce no better Evidence to prove his Title to his Estate, than what had that Day been produc'd against his Life, surely they would not think such Evidence sufficient to deprive a Man of Life, Honour, Estate and all.

Those who are conversant in State Trials will make no Difficulty to pronounce, that this was one of the best Defences that ever was made; notwithstanding which, the Solicitor-General thought it the Duty of his Office to put in a Reply; the great Streets of which he was pleas'd to lay on the violent Presumptions (for Saxons positive Evidence even he was pleas'd to insist on) arising from the Prisoner's Journeys, especially that of May 27, which, according to him, would bear no other Construction, than to be in Pursuance of the Duke of Monmouth's Message by Jones, communicated by Disney. And the Lord High Steward, in giving his final Charge, did not forget to urge, in Opposition to the Prisoner, who had insisted, That the Law requir'd two positive Witnesses in case of Treason, That Substantial Circumstances, in Concurrence with one positive Witness, were sufficient to satisfy the Law; nor to insinuate, that if their Lordships should believe Saxon's Testimony, the Circumstances of the Message and Journey did amount to a second Witness: But their Lordships the Tricars, tho' most of them Privy-Counsellors, or Servants to the King; and tho' his Majesty, in Person, was present during the whole Proceeding, valu'd their own Honour and Safety too much to be govern'd by such Falacies: And, accordingly, after having withdrawn for about half an Hour, they return'd into Court, and unanimously pronounc'd the Lord at the Bar, Not Guilty; who was thereupon immediately discharg'd: And as to Saxon, instead of being hang'd for his Concern in the Rebellion, he was some time after prosecuted for his Perjury; which being prov'd upon him, he was sentenc'd to be twice pillory'd, twice whipt, to pay a Fine of five hundred Marks, and to remain in Prison till he had paid the same.

He is unanimously acquitted by his Peers, and Salisbury.

Saxon the Witness whipp'd, pillory'd, and sent to Prison.

Lord Stanford admitted to Bail.

Still the Earl of Stanford continu'd in the Tower; and whether he distress'd his own Cause, or the Lawyers, intimidated by their ill Success in their late Cause, did not care to have any farther Dealings with the Peers, instead of being put on his Trial, he was on February the 7th admitted to Bail. And this particular Act of Lenity to him, was follow'd with what was call'd a Proclamation of the King's Majesty's most gracious and general Pardon; but which for little deserv'd to be call'd, that it was rather a Specification of the Persons who were still to be started by Informers, and run down by the Laws: For not only all and every of those Persons who had accompany'd the Duke of Monmouth in his Invasion; and who had serv'd as Officers under him, as also all Fugitives from Justice were in general excepted; but as before mention'd, the little Girls of Taunton, with their School-mistress, and one hundred and thirty-eight Persons by Name; among whom were the Spokes, Father, Mother, and Son; Reginald Tucker, William Stride, Esq; Henry Irton, Saxon the Witness, Godemund the Witness, Wade the Witness, Colonel Rowley the Witness, Oates the Witness, Fletcher of Saltoun, Major Manley, Aaron Saltib, Sir William Waller, Singsby Bethel, Esq; Francis Charlton, Esq; John Dutton Galt, Esq; Charles Earl of Macclesfield, John Treachard, Esq; John Wildman, Esq; and Robert Perguissin Clerk.

This Pardon was dated March 10, and tho' the Earl of Stanford was not one of the excepted Persons, it seems he was left under a Necessity of taking out a special Pardon, which pass'd the Seals on the 3d of April following.

All this while, the great Business at Court was to try such Practices on the refractory Members of both Houses, as bid fairest to stiffen them into a Compliance with the King's Partiality to his Roman Catholic Subjects; and, over and above, the public Examples which had been made of these in his Majesty's Service, who had presum'd to vote contrary to his Will, to strike a Terror thro' the Kingdom, his Majesty consider'd, in Person, to try the Force of his own Royal Rhetoric on such others as had join'd with them in the same ungrateful Proceeding. The Place where these Experiments were made was the Closet, and thence the Term of Closetting took its rise: But those who had the Firmness to withstand his Majesty's Ministers in Parliament, had likewise the Honour to maintain their Integrity even in this dangerous Encounter (for, to the Disgrace of Human Nature, both Sexes have found it much easier to withstand the Frowns and Menaces of Kings, than their Intricacies and Solicitations) and in the general, he had the Mortification to find, that, tho' he was heard with Respect, his Arguments made no Impression; and that even the Breath of Majesty pass'd like common Air.

And now, to use the Words of Lord Stan- King sets up fordland, in his Apology, "The King fell immediately to the supporting the disposing Power.
Power, the most chimerical thing that was ever thought of, and which must be to till the

[90] There was something peculiarly hard in this Man's Case. For, according to a Petition of his adherents presented to the House of Commons, he was not only condemn'd to Death, and his Estate given away; but his Wife, whom he had employ'd to purchase his Pardon, was, even before his Trial, encourag'd to marry one Wing for 1000, when it was thought proper to revoke Tucker's, was insensibly allow'd for so doing, by the King's special Pardon.

 the Government here is as absolute as in Turkey, all Power being included in that one: And, continues his Lordship, this is the Sense I ever had of it; and when I heard Lawyers defend it, I never chang'd my Opinion or Language, however it went on."

But whatever his Lordship's Opinion of this Chimera was, or whatever Language he us'd upon the Occasion, his Majesty having no longer any Hopes of his Parliament, prorogued it, as had been foreseen, yet farther to May 10, and made haste to establish that Chimera, as well by the Press, in the Minds of his People, as by the Authority of Westminster-hall.

But first, as if by way of Preparatory for what was to ensue, he sent his Letters-Mandatory, dated March 5, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, requiring him to restrain the bold Abuses and Extravagances of Preachers, in relation to Matters of Government and Controversy, under the several Heads which had been set forth, as Orders and Instructions to the Clergy, in the former Reign: Printed Copies of which Orders and Letters were made public by Authority, and distributed all over England, that nobody might plead Ignorance in excuse for Neglect or Disobedience.

Father Orleans condescends to say, "I am not one of those who believe a Man cannot have too much Zeal for Religion. I am, on the contrary, satisfy'd that that Fire, holy as it is, often burns the House of God, when it is kindled without due Precautions." And again, "I do not pretend to say there were no Faults in his (King James's) Councils." But then he asserts, that whatever his Faults were, he had the true Welfare of the Nation at heart, and took no Measures but what he thought would contribute to it. He further says, "It would be an Injury to his Piety not to acknowledge, that he desir'd the Conversion of his People; but then he never thought of any other Means but Persecution." He then magnifies his Forbearance, in leaving the establish'd Church, as he found it, in full Possession of all its Dignities, Powers, and Privileges: And then proceeds to say, That, having done so much for the Religion of the Nation, he thought himself bound in Conscience, Honour and Justice, to do something for his own. Which Something was no more than the granting Catholics, a free Exercise of their Religion; and the restoring them to a Capacity of officiating in public Employment.

These are the Palliatives of that Jesuit, who glories in having taken up the Pen at his Majesty's Command; and how far they are founded in Truth, let the several Facts of his Reign, as they occur, demonstrate.

We have already seen, that the very dispensing Powers, which is now to be the Subject of so loud a Controversy, was once set up in the former Reign; and we may remember, that in a Pamphlet set forth by Mr. Lock, after his Patron Lord Shaftsbury had lost the Seals, he introduces that Nobleman as an express Advocate for it: His Lordship had indeed been one of the Jurats, who had put his late Majesty on that desperate Measure, and had advis'd him to stand by it: But having found that, when a King had not Firmness, and a House of Commons had, the Laws would be too strong for the Prerogative, he held it convenient to recede, as the King had done before him, and instead of lodging such a Power in the Crown, at all times, in opposition to the Legislature itself, to content for the Exercise of it only when the Legislature was not sitting.

King James, however, resum'd the Project in its utmost Latitude, and, instead of following his Brother's Example in yielding to the Remonstrances of his Parliament, grew so much the more determin'd to establish it, in Defiance of them. It is agreed on all Hands that he was the best Oeconomist that ever sat on the Throne: And by refusing the late Aid which the Commons were preparing for him, he meant to give them the clearest Conviction, that he was in a Condition to carry all his Points without their Assistance: But he was willing to be esteem'd just as well as rich or great. And, having promis'd that he would govern according to Law, desir'd to keep himself in Countenance by a Shew of keeping his Word.

In order to which the following Doctrines were laid down, That the King's Prerogative was a fundamental Part of the Law; That whatever his Majesty might do by his Prerogative, he might legally do: That one of the Clauses of the Prerogative was a Power to dispense occasionally with the Penal Laws: That this Clause was fortify'd with Precedents, both in Number and Value, sufficient to vouch for its Authority: That therefore in dispensing with the Test-Acts in favour of his Roman Catholics, his Majesty did nothing but what he was warrant'd to do by his Prerogative: And that as long as he govern'd by his Prerogative, he govern'd by Law.

This is a Brief of his Majesty's Expedient to render his dispensing with the Laws agreeable to his Promise to govern by the Laws: And worthy it is of the School out of which it came: But, however dextrously the Dose was prepar'd, it was well foreseen that it must be gild'd before it would go down. This was the Work of the King's Lawyers, as the other was of his Priests: And from the Facility they had hitherto shewn in his Majesty's Business, he had abundant Reason to conclude, that they would continue to do whatever was requir'd of them: But then he did not enough consider, that some of these were even more attach'd to the Hierarchy than the Monarchy, and would no longer act as Slaves and Tools to the King, than the King continu'd to act as the Slave and Tool of the Church. Thus it is affirm'd by Coke, and yet more positively and circumstantially by Bishop Kennet after him, that his Majesty resolv'd to have Westminster Hall entirely at his Devotion: In order to which he clostetted his old Bargain, and would have made an express Bargain with them, that they should maintain his Prerogative of dispensing with the

the Penal Laws: But four of them, viz. the Lord Chief-Justice Jones, who had so lately dip't his Hands in the Blood of Cornish, the Lord Chief-Baron Montagu, who had been colleg'd with Jeffries in his Western Campaign, Sir Jos. Cavolin of the Common Pleas, and Sir Edward Neill of the Exchequer, instead of shewing a ready Compliance with his Majesty's Proposal, appear'd wholly dissatisfy'd with it. Sir Thomas Jones, in particular, it is said, told the King plainly, He could not do what he requir'd of him: And his Majesty answering, That he would have twelve Judges of his own Opinion, the other reply'd, Twelve Judges you possibly may find, Sir, but hardly twelve Lawyers.

Resolv'd, however, to convince the old Man to the contrary, April the 21st his Majesty gave him his Quintus and made Sir Henry Bedingfield, one of the Justices of the same Court, Lord Chief-Justice in his Room. At the same time Sir Edward Atkins was made Chief Baron in the Room of Montagu: Sir Edward Lutwich, Chief-Justice of Chesler, chang'd Places with Charlton; and Richard Hoath, Esq; was made a Baron of the Exchequer, in the Place of Neill. A few Days after, Sir Christopher Milton, an unworthy Brother of the great Poet, and a known Papist, was promoted to a Seat on the same Bench; Sir John Pender to another on that of the Common Pleas: And, as if to complete the Royal System, Mr. Fines the Solicitor-General, had the Honour to be remov'd to make way for Sir Thomas Potes, who, it seems, had yet fewer Scruples than he.

While these Preparatives were making in England, his Majesty was induc'd to try a new Experiment on his ancient Kingdom of Scotland; and indeed he had all the Reason in the World to depend on Success; for hitherto the Scottish Parliament had acted in all things like an Assembly of Slaves, and as if it was their Duty to do all they could towards the enslaving their Fellow Subjects. In the Preamble to one of their late Acts, they had even gone so far as to declare, "That they owe all their Blessings to the sacred Race of their glorious Kings, and to the solid, absolute Authority wherewith they were invested by the first and fundamental Laws of their Monarchy:— And therefore, that they abhor and detest, not only the Authors and Actors of all preceding Rebellions against their Sovereign, but also all Principles and Positions which are contrary or derogatory to the King's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute Power and Authority, which none, whether particular Persons or collective Bodies, can participate of, any manner of way, or upon any Pretext, but in Dependence on him, and by Commission from him:— And as it were intentionally to introduce a Despotic Power, says even Mr. Eschar himself, they pass'd another Act, to confirm and approve whatever had been done by the Majesty's Privy-Council, Justice-Court, and such commissioned by them in banishing, imprisoning or fining such as refus'd to take and swear the Oath of Allegiance, and to exercise the Royal Prerogative in the utmost Extent of them." So that from such a despotic People, no Opposition was to be expected or fear'd.

The Duke of Yatesbury, the High-Commissioner, after all his Services, was fallen into Disgrace, and had not only been turn'd out of all his Employments, but if any colourable Matter could have been found against him, says Bishop Burnet, it was resolv'd to have made him a Sacrifice. He had broke with the Lord Chancellor Perth: Both came with their Complaints to Court; and that the Latter might be sure to get the better of the Contest, he suffer'd himself to be reconcil'd to the Church of Rome, and prevail'd with his Brother the Earl of Murray to countenance him by following his Example. Thus, according to a lively Saying of the Marquis of Hallifax, his Faith made him rebels. And, instead of being thrown out of the King's Favour, (x) he became possess'd of a larger Portion of it than ever.

Scotland had yet another new Convert to boast of, the Earl of Murray; and it was for his Majesty's Service that every Man should find his Account in being of his Religion: Among these Three, therefore, he divided the Administration of that Kingdom: And as the two Brothers had the stable Power of it in their Hands, the temporary Place of Honour was given to the Lord Murray, who was appointed High-Commissioner to the Scottish Parliament, which was open'd April 29: And what his Errand was, the King's Letter, and his own Speech, very sufficiently explain: For, in the first, we find his Majesty recommending to their special Care "his innocent Roman-Catholic Subjects, who had always been assistant to the Crown, in the worst of Rebellions and Usurpations, tho' they lay under Discouragements hardly to be nam'd. These

as follows."The Earl of Perth set up a private Chapel in the Court, for Mass; which was not kept in private, but that many frequented it.""The Town of Edinburgh was much alarm'd at this: And the Rabble broke in with such Fury, that they almost every thing in the Chapel: And if the Earl of Perth had not been entic'd away in Diggle, he had very probably fallen a Sacrifice to popular Rage: The Grants upon the Alarm came, and dispersed the Rabble. Some were taken: And one that was a Ring-leader in the Tumult was executed for it. When he was at the Place of Execution, he told one of the Ministers of the Town, that was with him assisting him with his Prayers, that he was offer'd his Life, if he would accuse the Duke of Yatesbury, as the Person that had set on the Tumult; but he would not save his Life by false a Calumny.""Mr. Murray, the Minister, was an honest but weak Man. So when the Criminal charg'd him to make this Discovery, he did not call any of those who were present to bear witness of it: But in the Simplicity of his Heart he went from the Execution to the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and told him what had pass'd. The Archbishop solicited the Duke of Yatesbury with it: And he writ to Court, and complain'd of it. The King ordered the Master to be examined: So the poor Minister, having no Witness to swear what the Criminal had said to him, was declar'd the Perpetrator of that Calumny. And upon that he was turn'd out. But how severely severe those in Authority may humiliate a poor innocent Man, yet the Public is apt to judge true. And, in this Case, as the Minister's Weakness and Misfortune was prov'd, so the Earl of Perth's Malice and Privacity was as much detested." Vol. 1. p. 678, 679.

These he most heartily recommended to them; to the end that, as they had given good Experience of their true Loyalty, and peaceable Behaviour, so, by their Assistance, they might have the Protection of his Laws, not suffering them to lie under Obligations, which their Religion could not admit of; by doing of which, they would give a Demonstration of the Duty and Affection they had to him, and do him most acceptable Service. And this Love he expected they should shew to their Brethren, as they saw him in indulgent Father to his People. And in the Last, we find his Grace the Commissioner promising, in the most kind and engaging Manner, "That his Majesty would open a free Intercourse of Trade with his Majesty of England; and had fully intended his Envoy at the Court of France, to recover the Possession of the several Privileges of the Scotts Merchants trading with that Kingdom: That his Majesty would redress the Trouble that the said Merchants met with in the Matter of the Staple and Trade with the Netherlands; That he would remove the Prejudice which the Kingdom suffer'd, by the Importation of Irish Horses, Cattle, and Victuals: That he was willing to grant them a Mint, the Want of which was a terrible Prejudice to the Traffic of the Kingdom: That he would not at this time demand any more Supplies or Impositions of any kind, notwithstanding his great Charges in suppressing the late horrid Rebellion: That he would give his Royal Consent to all such Laws and Regulations, as might secure exact Payment to the Country from all his Officers and Soldiers in their Quarters. And lastly, That he would graciously pass his full and ample Indemnity, with some needful and necessary Exceptions, for all past Crimes and Misdemeanours whatsoever. And now, my Lords and Gentlemen, proceeds his Grace, after so great and excellent Designs for promoting the Honour, the Ease, and Wealth of this Kingdom; after his Resolution to pardon so many Enemies, and to free so many of the Guilty from further severe, but just, Prosecutions; his Majesty believeth that none will wonder, if he desire, by the Advice and Consent of this Great Council, to give Ease and Security to some of his good Subjects of the Roman-Catholic Religion, who have been at all times firm to the Monarchy, and ready to sacrifice their Lives and Fortunes for the Service and Security of the Crown. So that his Majesty, who so perfectly understands the loyal and dutiful Temper and Genius of Scotland, tells fully persuaded of your ready and cheerful Compliance with his Royal Desire and Inclinations, tending so much to your own Security, and his Satisfaction; and that you will send me back to my great and Royal Master, with the good Tidings of the continued and dutiful Loyalty of this his ancient Kingdom: By which you will shew yourselves the best and most affectionate Subjects, to the best, the incomparable, and most heroic Prince in the World."

This Speech was printed at large in the

London-Gazette, with this Note upon it,

"That the People, as well as the Members of Parliament shew'd a great deal of Satisfaction; and that there was all imaginable Ground to believe the Scission would be soon and happily concluded." Bishop Keeble and Mr. Beard also observe, That when the said Speech came to be consider'd, the Creatures of the Court shew'd a present Inclination for passing an Act in favour of the Papists, without looking farther than his Majesty's Desire. Bishop Burnet descends to Particulars, and says, Duke Hamilton was silent in the Debate: He promis'd, he would not oppose the Motion; but he would not be active to promote it. The Duke of Queensberry was also silent: But the King was made believe that he manag'd the Opposition under-hand. Ross and Paterfen did so entirely forget what became their Characters, that they us'd their utmost Endeavours; to persuade the Parliament to comply with the King's Desire. The Archbishop of Glasgow oppos'd it, but fearfully: The Bishop of Dunblod, Bunce, did it openly and resolutely: And so did the Bishop of Galloway. The rest were silent, but were resolv'd to vote for the Continuance of the Laws."

The same Prelate had just above made Use of these Words, "Ross and Paterfen, the two governing Bishops, resolv'd to let the King see how compliant they would be: And they propos'd an Address to be sign'd by several of their Bishops, offering to concur with the King in all that he desir'd with Relation to those of his own Religion (for the courtly Stile now was not to name Popery any other way than by calling it the King's Religion) provided the Laws might still continue in force, and be executed against the Presbyterians. With this Paterfen was sent up: He communicated the Matter to the Earl of  Middleton, who advis'd him never to shew that Paper: It would be made Use of against them and render them odious: And the King and his Priests were so sensible that it was an indecent thing for them to pretend to any special Favour, that they were resolv'd to move for nothing but a general Toleration. And so he perswaded him to go back without presenting it. This was told me by one who had it from the Earl himself."

Now if several of the Bishops had concurr'd with their two Governors in this scandalous Address, how can it be said, that all but Three were resolv'd to vote for the Continuance of the Laws? This is a Difficulty which our Right Reverend Historian was not aware of, and which no body else can solve. His Lordship farther says, "That such was the Meanness of most of the Nobility, and of the other Members, that few did hope that a Resistance to the Court could be maintain'd: Yet the Parliament would consent to nothing farther than to a Suspension of those Laws (against Papists) during the King's Life." Whereas our two other Evangelists are express, That the more considerate Party mov'd and prevail'd to have a Committee appointed to inspect those Laws: That such a Committee was appointed accordingly: That a Bill was prepar'd to indulge the Papists in the private Exercise of their Religion, but without repealing any of the Penalties then in Force against them, in case they ventur'd to worship in public: That when even this was presented to the Parliament for their Approbation, the Members divided, and many warm Speeches were made in Opposition to it: And that the King being appriz'd, that those who had made so, i. e. with the Liberties of their Country, were not altogether so tractable on the Head of Religion, he directed his Commissioner to put an End to the Session, without performing any of the fine Things which his Grace had set before the People, as the Price of the Concession requir'd of them in behalf of the Roman Catholics. Bishop Burnet adds, "That soon after the Dissolution of the Parliament, both the Archbishop of Glasgow and the Bishop of Dunkeld were turn'd out by an express Command of the King: That Pater-son was made Archbishop of Glasgow: That one Hamilton, noted for Profaneness and Impiety, and who sometimes broke out into Blasphemy, was made Bishop of Dunkeld: And that no Reason was assign'd for turning out those Bishops but the King's Pleasure."

We must now return to England, where by this time the Nation were almost universally (*) enabled to account for the Alterations which had been made in Westminster-Hall, and prepar'd for the disagreeable things they expected to follow: Sir Edward Hales, a Gentleman of Eminence in Kent, but a profess'd Papist, had been made Colonel of a Regiment, and exercis'd that Command without complying with the Conditions prescrib'd by the (y) Statute, 25 Car. II. for preventing Dangers from Popish Reculants: One Godwin, his own Coachman, inform'd against him; and, being duly indicted on that Information at the Assizes held at Rochester,

March 29, and as duly convicted on that Indictment, the said Plaintiff or Informer became entitled by the said Statute to the Penalty of 500 l. which Sir Edward had incur'd by his Neglect. But instead of paying it, he produc'd the King's Letters Patents, dispensing with his Nonconformity, removing all Incapacities, and remitting all the Penalties, Forfeitures, Damages, Disabilities, &c. which he had incur'd. Upon this the Plaintiff, in farther Protection of his Suit, brought his Action of Debt in the King's Bench. Mr. Northey was his Council; Sir Thomas Powell the new Solicitor-General appear'd for the Defendant; and upon the Issue, the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert declar'd "That if the King could not dispense with this Statute, he could not dispense with any Penal Statute: That nevertheless the King did, and had dispens'd with the Law in relation to Sheriffs ever since the Reign of Henry VII. tho' it was therein expressly provided, That the King should not dispense with it by a Non-Obstant: That therefore the Defendant might plead his Majesty's Dispensation; and that there was nothing whatsoever which the supreme Lawgiver might not dispense with." But the Matter did not rest here: And the Doctrines thus boldly advanc'd by one, were to be confirm'd by all the Judges of England. Accordingly, they were formally assembled at Sergeant's-Inn; and the Cause having been stated, argued, and determin'd, June 23, the Lord Chief-Justice in Westminster-Hall, publicly pronounc'd, That (1) eleven out of twelve were of Opinion, That the Cause was as clear as any that ever came before the Court; and that the King might dispense in this Cause, on these Grounds, viz. 1. That the Kings of England are Sovereign Princes. 2. That the Laws of England are the King's Laws. 3. That therefore it is an inseparable Prerogative of the Kings of England to dispen-

(*) The displacing the Judges, says Sir John Reresby, made a considerable Noise: They were Gentlemen of great Learning and Loyalty, whose only Crime had been, that they would not give their Opinions, as several of their Brethren had done. That the King by his Prerogative might dispense with the Test requir'd of Roman Catholics. The next Day I was inform'd by Mr. Jones, Son to the Chief-Justice of that Name, lately torn'd out, that his Father, upon his Dismission, observ'd to the King, That he was by no means sorry he was laid aside, and was worn out as he was in his Service, but concern'd that his Majesty should expect such a Contradiction of the Law from him, so he could not honestly give; and that none but indigent, ignorant, or ambitious Men would give their Judgment as he express'd, and that to this his Majesty made answer, It was necessary his Judges should be of all one Mind. He told me farther, that Sir Robert Sawyer, the Attorney-General, had been directed by the King, to draw up a Warrant, by virtue of his Prerogative, to invest a Priest of the Church of Rome with a Benefice, and to nominate one Walker, Head of a House in Oxford, and some Fellows of the same, who had erred over to the papal Communion, by a Non-Obstant: That the Attorney said, This would not be against one Statute only, but against all the Laws since the Days of Elizabeth; that he therefore durst not do it, and desired the King to weigh the Matter a little with himself, for that it struck at the very Root of the Protestant Church, quite contrary to his Majesty's late grants (Promises) in Force; that the Attorney first said, He doubted not but, as soon as another could be found to do the Work, he should lose his Place; such a slave was the King to the Priesthood of Rome! Reresby Mem. p. 233, 234.

(y) For preventing Dangers which may happen from popish Reculants, and quieting the Minds of his Majesty's good Subjects. See it enact'd, &c. That every Person that shall bear any Office, civil or military, &c. or shall have Command or Power of Trust from or under his Majesty, &c. within the Realm of England, &c. shall first bring in to the Court of Chancery, or to the King's Bench, or at the Court of Quarter-Sessions in that County where he shall reside within three Months next after his Admission into any of the said Offices, and there, in open Court, take the several Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and shall subscribe the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the Usage of the Church of England, in some Parish Church, upon some Lord's Day, immediately after Divine Service.

And every the Person aforesaid that doth or shall neglect or refuse to take the said Oaths, and the Sacrament, in the said Courts, and at the respective Times aforesaid, shall be ipso facto adjudged incapable, and disabled in Law to enjoy the said Office or Employment, and every such Office and Place shall be void, and is hereby adjudged void.

And every Person that shall neglect or refuse to take the said Oaths or the Sacrament as aforesaid, and yet after such Neglect or Refusal shall execute any of the said Offices, after the said Times expired wherein he ought to have done the same, and being thereupon lawfully convicted upon any Information, &c. in any of the King's Courts at Westminster, or at the Assizes, every such Person shall forfeit 500 l. to be recovered by him that shall sue for the same.

And as the time when the Persons concerned in this Act shall take the said Oaths, they shall likewise subscribe the Declaration against the Belief of Transubstantiation, under the same Penalties as by this Act is appointed."

penic with Penal Laws in particular Cafes, and upon particular neceffary Reafons: 4. That of thofe Reafons, and thofe Necessities the King is the fole Judge. And, which is confequent upon all, 5. That this is not a Truft invefted in, and granted to, the King, by the People, but the antient Remains of the Sovereign Power and Prerogative of the Kings of England, which never was yet taken from them, nor can be.

But whatever Authority this Sentence had in Wefminfter-Hall, and whatever Tendency it had to countenance and juftify the Proceedings at Court, it only ferv'd to alarm and exasperate the People beyond meafure, who look'd on it as a compendious Way of fubmitting all things to the King's Will and Pleafure, and of ruining the Conftitution at a Blow. The whole Affair, it was faid, was a Collufion to help his Majesty to fuch a Precedent as fhould at the fame time authorize his Difpenfations, and ferve as a Screen to thofe who had the Boldnefs to act under them: And fo many bitter things were faid of the Lord Chief-Justice, that he afterwards found himfelf under a fort of Necessity to publifh a Vindication both of the Thing itfelf, and of his own Conduct in it; in which he quotes Coke's Definition of a Difpenfation, as firft allowing a Right in the King to abfolve particular Perfons from the Reftraint of a general Prohibition, and the Penalties arifing from the Breach of it; as alfo the Opinion of all the Judges 2 Jac. I. to the fame Effect: From the Years-Books of Henry VII. fol. 2. he promulgues, That the King may difpenfe with a prohibited Evil, though not with that which is evil in itfelf: And from Vaughan's Reports, That by a Difpenfation, a Thing prohibited to all others, provided it was not malum in fe, became lawful to him who had it. To the Objection, That if the King had a Right to difpenfe with one, he might with all, to the utter Overthrow of the Statute, he replies, That from the Poffibility of Abufe it did not follow, that the King was not entitled to the Ufe; for in fuch cafe he would have no Prerogative at all: That as to the Judgment in Hales's Cafe, they could neither know, nor prevent if they did, any ill Ufe the King might make of his Power; and their Duty was only to declare fimplly on their Oaths, whether the King had fuch a Power, or not: But that even the Houfe of Commons themfelves had twice acknowledged, that this difpenfing Power was lodg'd in the King, viz. 1 Hen. V. and 3 Car. I. And as to the great Objection of all, That thofe thefe high Trufts and Prerogatives might be allow'd in a Proteftant Prince, they ought not to be allow'd in a Prince of a contrary Religion, becaufe of the Ufe which might be made of them to the Destruction of the Religion eftablifh'd by Law, he answers, That the Exceffionifts, in the preceding Reign, had urg'd the fame Argument, "If you leave him King, faid they, he will have all the Prerogatives of a King; and thofe Prerogatives may be made instrumental to the Ruin of your Religion;" which could not be deny'd by thofe who oppos'd the Bill, who had nothing left to reply, but Fiat juftitia, ruat cælum! Laftly, in answer to thofe who would needs have it, That the Action itfelf was feigned, he avers, He had never heard of it till it was brought: That if it was a feigned Action he law no Hurt in it; for the Law was as well try'd and fettled in a feigned Action as a true one: That there were feigned Actions directed every Day out of Chancery for this purpofe; and why the King might not direct fuch a one for his own Satisfaction, he could not conceive: Declaring, If there were any indirect Means us'd for obtaining Opinions, he knew nothing of it: He flood upon his Innocence, and defy'd all the World to lay any thing of that Nature to his Charge.

All this, it muft be own'd, was extremely plausible; but then, except among the Roman-Catholics themfelves, and thofe idolaters of the Prerogative, who are for refolving all Power and Authority into that only, it has met with no Acceptation: Sir Robert Atkins, another venerable Sage of the Law, has, in particular, fet forth a large Treatife to explode this whole Hypothefis. According to him, A Law cannot be juftly difpens'd with except by the whole Legislative Power, which not being wholly in the King, the King has no Right to exercife or affume.— Difpenfations came originally from Rome, and were only adopt'd here, and that firft by Henry III. All good Men exclaim'd againft them: A Multitude of Acts were provided againft them: They were firft us'd in fuch Cafes only as the King alone was concern'd in, in which, for that Reafon, he might remit or difpenfe as he pleas'd. It was not till later Times that they were stretch'd to Cafes which concern'd the whole Realm; nor was there yet any fuch Ufage as would warrant the difpenfing with fuch a Statute as that in queftion: Becaufe a Difpenfation is properly and only in cafe of a Malum Prohibitum, it does not follow that the King can difpenfe in all Cafes of Malum Prohibitum.— Neither Law-Books, nor the Refolution of Judges, nor the Practice of Judicatories, are of any Authority againft pofitive, exprefs Acts of Parliament: Yet even in the Cafe of Sheriffs, Judges had fometimes had the Firmnefs to pronounce, That the King did an Error when he appointed a Sheriff otherwife than as the Statute directed: That as the Dangers arifing from Popifh Recufants were look'd upon by King, Lords and Commons, as of the utmoft Importance to be guarded againft; fo they had made all poffible Provision to do fo: The very Grant of any Place or Office, but on the Terms therein prefcrib'd, is ajudic'd void: The Act itfelf precribes the Manner of trying the Fact; declares the Judgment, and leaves it only to the Judges to apply that Judgment to the Cafe before them. The late Lord Chancellor, Nettingham, taking Occafion to fpeak of this Act, had declar'd it abfolutely impoffible for the moft conceal'd Papift to get into any kind of Employment. The Lord Chancellor Bacon had pronounc'd, That to be the beft Law which gave the leaft Liberty ty to judge; and him to be the best Judge who took the least Liberty to himself. In Cases of mighty Moment, wherein the Sense of the Law-makers is doubtful, it is the Duty of Judges, to demur till the Parliament meet, and to resort to them for an Explication of their own Meaning. The dispensing with the Statute concerning Sheriffs was a Matter of far less Moment than the present Dispensation. Infinite Mischiefs arise from putting Papists into Office, and entrusting them with our Religion and civil Rights. It was against these Mischiefs the Act was levell'd. Those who made it, thought it was a sufficient Security; but by this Doctrine of dispensing, the whole Force of it was explain'd away. Those very Mischiefs had actually taken place. And are those Persons, proceeds Sir Robert, who have a Dependence on the See of Rome, and a Foreign Power, fit to be entrusted with the Power of the Nation, with the Militia and the Sea Ports? Is not this to commit the Lamb to the Custody of the Wolf? Lastly, as to the Point of the feign'd Action, which the Lord Chief-Justice seem'd to vindicate, it is allow'd, they may be useful. But this Action against Sir Edward Hales was suspected not only to have been feign'd and brought by Crown between him and his Servant and Friend; but it was feign'd and faintly prosecuted, and not heartily and stoutly defended. Like Prize-Fighters they seem'd to be in good earnest, and look'd very fierce, but agreed before-hand not to hurt one another.

It is no small Aggravation of the Charge against those in Power who advis'd or gave way to the violent Measures now pursuing, and against the Tools they found to put them in Execution, that while this great Cause was depending, the Parliament was yet again prorog'd. This was a new Proof that the King was resolv'd to shew no Regard to the Sense of his People till it corresponded with his own; and that, as it was found impracticable to procure such new Laws as would answer his Purpose, the sole Business of those about him was to gratify him at the Expence of the old.

[Mem. p. 275.] Sir John Reresby however observes, that before this last Prorogation, the leading Members of the House of Commons gave their Attendance in Town, for fear the Court should proceed to Business without giving the usual Notice; and that the King spoke of it with Reluctance, saying, he should not deal by them as they had often done by the Crown, steal an Advantage by Surprise. The same Gentleman was also told, about the same time, by Jeremy Lord Dover, a Papist and great Favourite, that the Parliament would certainly be suffer'd to sit at the time last prefix'd; and that if they should not then comply with the King, it would be their Business to look to the Issue: "In short, (continues Sir John) the King, having lately got a Jesuit for his Confessor, drove on at a great rate, and seem'd by far more intent than before upon promoting and spreading his own Religion."

But with whatever Speed his Majesty and his Ministry drove to their Purpose in England, it bore no Comparison to the Progress they made in Ireland: There the Roman Catholics were so greatly the Majority, that a Protestant Government could no otherwise be maintain'd than by the Terrors of a standing Army: When therefore the Government itself became the avow'd Champion for the Catholic Cause, that Army immediately lost its Terror; the Roman Catholics assur'd the Air of Masters; and behav'd, if they were on the point of driving out the Conventicles, and taking possession of the Unconquered Lands: But first there was a Necessity of disarming the Protestants. This Month's Insurrection furnish'd a Pretext to accomplish: And tho' the Civil Government was yet in the Hands of Protestants, viz. the Lord Primate, and the Earl of Down, in the Quality of Lords Justices, those Protestant Governors made a Merit of shewing an implicit Obedience to the Orders they receiv'd on that Occasion; which were to this Effect, That the King and Council having Reason to believe, that the Rebellion of Month had spread further, and deluded more, than had been yet discover'd, or than the Laws could reach, had come to a Resolution, That it would be for the Safety of the Kingdom to have the Arms of the Militia brought in, and deposited in the Magazines of the several Counties, to prevent their falling into ill Hands, when dispers'd abroad; and that they might be more in readiness, in case there should be any sudden Call to have recourse to them for their own Defence. Thus instructed, their Excellencies set forth a Proclamation, requiring the Militia to bring in their Arms accordingly: And to give it the greater Effect, the Primate, having conven'd the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin before him, made use of all his Eloquence to persuade them, That it would be as much for their own Honour, as his Majesty's Service, for them to give the first Instance of Obedience, and thereby set an Example to the whole Kingdom. It is said, these Magistrates were not insensible of the Drift of this Practice, and that they comply'd, because they could do no otherwise: But it is certain they did comply; that the Country did the same; and that, to exact a thorough Obedience from every Individual, it was given out, That if any Arms were reserv'd, under any Pretence, such as that they were their own, and not belonging to the Public, it would be interpreted as a Proof of Disaffection: And that such was the Terror which accompany'd this Menace, that Numbers deliver'd up the Arms they had bought with their own Money.

This great Point being thus carry'd, Lieutenant-General Talbot proceeded to the Reform of the Army; and, under the like Pretence of weeding Disaffection out of it, all who had been in the Service of the Parliament, or the Protector Cromwell, or even the Sons of such, were broke without Mercy: On the Credit of which Service he return'd to England, not without Hopes of being rewarded with the Lieutenantancy: What he had already done was sufficient to manifest his Zeal; and in Proportion to the Increase of his Power, he undertook to answer for his Success. To the Queen's peculiar Cabal, in which Father Petes presided, it seems the Violence of his Temper was peculiarly pleasing, and his Reception there was suitable to his own Wishes. They were for the shortest way, and the boldest Drive. Thus the Lords Bellasis, Powis, &c. who had the most Credit about the King, and who of the whole Faction best deserv'd it, look'd on him as a Man whose Rashness would be fatal to their Cause: Notwithstanding therefore that he had her Majesty's Countenance and Support, they made it their joint Endeavour to thwart his Ambition, and, for the present, with Success. They were for having the same Business done, if possible, under a Protestant Mask, and they well knew, that the sending Talbot over, as Governor in Chief, would be laying that Mask aside for good and all.

The Designs now carrying on had been concerted in the Close of the late Reign, and then they were to have been countenanc'd by the Earl of Rochester. Hence it was argued, that the Court which was held wisest then, would prove wisest now: And upon this Principle the Earl of Clarendon was appointed Lord Lieutenant. That Talbot, however, might be kept in Temper, he was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and with this new Honour sent back to prosecute more effectually the Work he had so happily begun. The Prime had been hitherto Lord Chancellor, as well as one of the Lords Justices; but now the Seals were given to Sir Charles Porter, who having shew'd a remarkable Readiness to forward the Purposes of the Crown, and being in necessitous Circumstances, was look'd upon as a fit Person to be one of the Tools of the Times. Even the new Lieutenant himself stood more in need of his Place, than his Place of him. And hence it was likewise concluded at Court, that he would be more under the Direction of his Interest than his Conscience: But whatever was expected of them, it was not thought proper to let any Part of the Secret escape in their Instructions: On the contrary, they were directed to maintain the Act of Settlement, and to declare publicly, that it was his Majesty's express Pleasure, they should do so.

It was not till December, 1687, that his Excellency set out for his Government; but Lieutenant General Tyrconnel departed long before, and carry'd over with him very extraordinary Powers with respect to the Army; for he was authoriz'd to dismiss any Officer or Soldier, or any Numbers he pleas'd; and was furnish'd with blank Commissions, sign'd by the King, to fill up all the Vacancies he made: And his Use of these Powers was, if possible, yet more extraordinary than the Powers themselves: For, as if his Purpose was to avenge his late Disappointment on all who had the Name of Protestant, or as if an Excess of Rigour imply'd an Excess of Merit, he not only disbanded five or six thousand Common Soldiers, but stript them of their very Regimentals, and turn'd them out in their Shirts, to beg, steal, or starve: He also broke between two and three hundred English Officers, who had bought their Commissions, without allowing them the least Consideration; and seiz'd on all the other Horles; as also on those of certain Troopers, who had purchas'd them out of their own Pay: And instead of reimbursing the Owners, gave them Notes to the Amount of about a Quarter Part of their Value. As nothing could be more unjust and wicked than this Proceeding, so nothing could be more insolent and provoking than the Manner in which it was done; for Complaints and Petitions for Redress never fail'd to draw down Menaces and Reproaches; and he that was most injur'd, was also most abus'd.

When Soldiers were thus made Sufferers for their Religion, every other Protestant in the Kingdom had Reason to apprehend the like or worse Treatment, when Pretences could be found, and Time should serve: And these Apprehensions became yet farther reasonable, when it appear'd that Prosecutions were every where spirited up against the most active and most zealous of the Party, without any other Foundation than the Villanies and Perjuries of the Informers; and when the Tories were on all Sides let loose to rob them on the Highway, steal their Cattle, plunder their Houses, and commit more outrageous Barbarities than are practis'd by civiliz'd Nations in the midst of an open War. Under so many severe Visitations, Numbers grew sick of the Air and Soil; and 500 Families at once transported themselves and their Effects to the Plantations.

This, we are told, was the melancholy Situation of things when the new Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor arriv'd first at Dublin; and so great and general was the Dependence of the People, that they drew no Comfort from their Arrival, nor expected any Benefit from their Administration: Tho' Protestants, they were Courtiers; and all such, they suppos'd, would have no Commission but to assist in devouring them.

But in this they were most agreeably disappointed; for his Excellency made it his Business to heal the almost broken Hearts of the Protestants, as far as his Powers would give him leave. He publicly declar'd, that he would take both their Religion and their Interest into his Protection. He visited the principal Parts of the Kingdom in Person, that they might be Eye-witnesses of his sincere Disposition to act in all things for their Service: And he every where caus'd Proclamations to be dispers'd, enforc'd by Rewards for bringing those infamous Robbers, just mention'd under the Name of Tories, to Justice. The Lord Chancellor also, threw his whole Weight into the same Scale. And thus the civil and military Branches of the Government were conducted on quite opposite and irreconcilable Principles: For Lieutenant General Tyrconnel had his Command independent of his Excellency, receiv'd his Orders directly from the King, and proceeded in relation to the Army with as much Fury as before: So that in Effect he was Master, and the Lord Lieutenant little better than a Prisoner at large. Of this his Excellency himself began to grow sensible, when he saw with his own Eyes a Creature of Tyrconnel's commanding his own Guard of Battle-Axes, the former Captain having been disinfranchised that very Morning without his Participation or Knowledge. The Earl was going to Church with the usual State when he made this Discovery; and having demanded and receiv'd an Account of so strange a Proceeding, had the Spirit not only to discharge the one and restore the other on the Spot, but to expostulate with Tyrconnel on the Indignity which he had put upon him; who defended himself, by saying, That he had done nothing but by the King's Orders: To which his Excellency reply'd, That while his Majesty entrusted him with the Government, he would not be dispos'd of by his Lieutenant-General.

From the unfriendly Collisions of the Great, Fire is sure to follow: Both thought themselves injur'd: Both made their Complaints to the King against each other; and Both us'd their utmost Endeavours to prepossess the Cabinet in their Favour. Who had the better of the Contest, we shall see in its Place. And in the mean time, we must resume the Thread of Affairs in England.

Five Catholic Peers introduced into the English Privy Council.

Having procur'd his dispensing Power to be so solemnly recogniz'd by the Judges, the King proceeded now to unfold a little farther the Use he purpos'd to make of it, by the Admission of four Catholic Peers at once to the Council-Board; namely, (z) the Earl of Prussia, the Lord Arundel of Wardour, the Lord Bellasis, and the Lord Dover: And as if he had so firmly establish'd his Superiority over the Laws, as to be above all Concern for the good or ill Will of his People, public Notice was given of it in the Gazette.

His People were, indeed, in the Condition of the Lion in the Fable; they had fallen in Love with the Prerogative; and to make their Courtship more acceptable, they had consented to have their Teeth drawn, and their Nails par'd: The King, on the contrary, had the Cudgel in his Hand, and shew'd himself in a Disposition to make effectual Use of it on the first Provocation. He had, early in the Summer, assembled his Forces on Hounslow-Heath; had repair'd thither in Person; had open'd a Chapel at his Head Quarters, where Mass was every Day publicly celebrated; and had spread his Missionaries thro' the Camp, that the Soldiers might be led to think it a Matter of Conscience, as well as Duty, to obey his Commands implicitly: Hence it was rightly concluded, That as he had no foreign War upon his Hands, nor Prospect of any, the only Service expected of them was to bridle their Fellow-subjects: And this it was to well know they were abundantly able to do, that those who were most concern'd for the Maintenance of the Public Liberties, and were most clearly convinc'd, that they might legally resist an illegal Force, as this certainly was, saw no other way as yet to follow the great Dictate of Nature, Self-preservation, than by courting the very Power they fear'd.

Thus we find Mr. Jackson (who has been already mention'd as Chaplain to the late Lord Ruffel, and as Author of Julian the Apollate) about this time, setting forth his humble and hearty (a) Address to all the English Protestants in the Army, not to make themselves

A. D. 1688.

The Army assembled at Hounslow-Heath.

(a) The Reader will recollect, that the three last of these Peers had the merit of being Sufferers for the Cause in the former Reign: And tho' the Lord Stafford's Bill had stuck in the House of Commons, his Majesty had found out a Way to do Justice to that Family, by creating the Heir of it an Earl, whereas his Father was but a Viscount.

(a) Yes. "Gentlemen, next to the Duty we owe to God, which ought to be the principal Care of Men of your Profession, who carry your Lives in your Hands, and often look Death in the Face, in the Service of your native Country, wherein you draw your first Breaths, and breathe a free English Air! Now I desire you to consider how you will comply with these two main Points, by engaging in the present Service. Is it in the Name of God for his Service, that you have join'd yourselves with Popes? Who indeed shall fight for the New Book, but will burn the Bible, and who seek to extirpate the Protestant Religion with your Swords, because they cannot do it with their own? And will you be aiding and assisting to fit up Majesties, to erect that Kingdom of Darkness and Delusion among us, and train up all our Children to Popery? How can you do these things, and call yourselves Protestants? What Service can you do your Country, by being under the Command of French and Irish Popes, and by bringing your Nation under a foreign Yoke? Will you help them to make forcible Entry into the Houses of your Countrymen, under the Name of Quartering, contrary to Magna Charta and Petition of Right? Will you be aiding and assisting to all the Murders and Outrages which they shall commit by their said Commissions, which were designed Ways, and sufficiently blam'd by both Houses of Parliament: Where had been any Need of it? For it was very well known before, that a Popish cannot have a Commission, but by Law it is utterly disabled and determin'd. Will you encourage your Bishops of English Laws and Liberties, for Married and Club-Law; and help to destroy all others, only at last to be crams of yourselves? If I know you well, as you are Englishmen, you hate and abhor these things: Therefore do not illegally yoke up with Idolatry and bloody

Popes. Be cautious for the Truth, and love yourselves Men. The same Considerations are humbly offer'd to all English Seamen, who have been the Bulwark of this Nation, against Popery and Slavery, ever since 1588."

While the House of Commons had the King's Demand before them in relation to a standing Army, the same Author also set forth the following Paper.

Several Reasons for the Establishment of a standing Army, and the dissolving the Militia.

1. Because the Lords, Lieutenants, Deputy-Lieutenants, and the whole Militia, that is to say, the Lords, Gentlemen, and Freeholders of England, are not fit to be trusted with their own Laws, Lives, Liberties, and Estates and therefore ought to have Guardians and Keepers assign'd them.

2. Because mercenary Soldiers who fight for Twenty-pence a Day, will fight better, in saving more to lose, than either the Nobility or Gentry.

3. Because there are no Irish Papists in the Militia, who are certainly the best Soldiers in the World: for they have Irish Men, Women, and Children, by hundreds of thousands at once.

4. Because the Drummers have made more Converts, than all the Bishops and Clergy of France.

5. The Parliament ought to establish one Standing Army at the least, because indeed there will be need of two, that one of them may defend the People from the other.

6. Because it is a thousand Pities, that a brave Popish Army should be a Riot.

7. Unless it be establish'd by Act of Parliament, the persons of Peace will be forc'd to support it in their own Defence: for they will be lock'd out farther thro' every Day they ride, out of Complaisance to a Popish Road. 23 H. IV. c. 2. 2 H. V. c. 2.

8. Because a Popish Army is a Nollis. For all Papists are utterly disabled (and punishable besides) from bearing any Office in Camp, Troop, Band, or Company of Soldiers, and are to be distrust'd by Law, that they cannot be any Service to be made in their Defence, without the Allowance of their

themselves the Tools of the Papists to enslave their Country, and subvert their Religion. And so fearful did the Court appear of the Effects of this and the like Paper-Barricades, that having discovered who was the Author, they resolv'd to proceed against him with the utmost Severity. Accordingly he was prosecuted for it in the King's-Bench; and, being convicted was sentenc'd to stand in the Pillory three times, and to be whipt from Newgate to Tyburn, which barbarous Sentence was yet farther aggravated by the Insults and Reproaches of him who pronounced it: Nor was this all, for to render his Punishment still more grievous and insupportable, it was mov'd by certain Courtiers, that out of respect to the Church, he might first be degraded; which was accordingly done: Mr. Johnson all the while remonstrating to the (b) Divines who officiated on that Occasion, "That they were making Rods for themselves: And how much he was griev'd, that since all he had written was design'd to keep their Gowns on their Backs, they should be made the unhappy Instruments to pull off his." An Attempt was made to get the whipping Part of the Sentence remitted, by an Offer of two hundred Pounds Consideration-Money to a Papish Priest, who, it seems, us'd his Endeavours, but could not prevail; his Majesty's most gracious Answer being, "That since Mr. Johnson had the Spirit of Martyrdom in him, it was fit he should suffer:" And no Martyr ever did suffer with more Fortitude than he; for we are told that, under the Agony of (c) three hundred and seventeen Lashes with a Cat-o-nine-Tails, he he was so far from fainting, that, had he not thought it would have look'd like vain Glory, he could have sung a Psalm with as much Composure and Cheerfulness as ever he had done in the Church.

This was a Warning to the Prest; and while this Prosecution was depending, to let the Soldiers see what they had to expect in case they swerv'd from their Duty, Two of them were hang'd by the Sentence of a Court-Martial for running from their Colours, tho' such Courts were then wholly unknown to our Constitution. That the Subjects in general might also be terrify'd from making too free with the Rights or Claims of Majesty, Wolstaker the Solicitor was condemn'd to pay a Fine of a thousand Marks for justifying the Rebellion of Forty-One, and the Murder of Charles I.

The Clergy, his Majesty had reason to believe, were ty'd down by their own Doctrines of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance, which they had promulgated with so much Warmth and Eagerness in the preceding Reign, from giving him the least Molestation; as also by the express Commands which he had so lately communicated to them, in relation to the Abuse of Preaching by the Intermixture of Politics and Religion; and any Deviation into the crooked Paths of Controversy, instead of jogging on in the plain, beaten Roads prescrib'd by the Hollies, &c. And thus, to all Appearance, it seem'd, that he had effectually stop't up every Avenue by which Discontent or Disaffection might find Entrance to disorder his Schemes, or raise the Dust of Popularity about his Throne.

But the Clergy had their Reserves, it seems, which the King, tho' so conversant with the Jesuits, was not aware of. These Doctrines of theirs were only calculated to enable his Majesty to tread down the Laity. It was fit for them to crouch down like Issachar's Ass under a double Load, and to obey their Drivers, tho' an Angel stood in their Way: But the Church was ever understood to be either militant or triumphant; and, consequently, when Danger appear'd, it was her Duty to found immediately to Arms. Mr. Eobard makes it his Boast, that the King's Letter relating to Preachers, and the Menaces it was accompany'd with, of exacting the full Value of their First Fruits and Tithes, and of laying them open to all the Mischiefs that the Displeasure of the Crown could bring upon them, were so far from being regarded, that the Chief of the Clergy did more to vindicate the Doctrine of their own Church, and expose the Errors of that of Rome, both in their Sermons and Writings, than had ever been done either abroad or at home since the Reformation. These Writings he is pleas'd to characterize by the Stile of glorious: The Authors of them he calls, The Church of England-Heretics: And the Causes of this sudden and vigorous Exertion of so much clerical Genius and Spirit he thus enumerates. "The Laws of England, by the Breach of a few mercenary Judges, in effect, were basely given up into the Power and Will of the King. The Roman-Catholics made it their Business to derive all possible Advantage from it. The free and open Exercise of their Religion was set up every where, and Jesuits Schools and Seminaries were erected not only in London, but also in the most considerable Towns in the Nation. The Church of England had now but a precarious Title to be the National Church, and began to see the impending Dangers, which, being increased by the slavish (d) Compliance of some few of her Members, now threatened the whole Body. Romish Candidates had already swallow'd up Ecclesiastical Preferments and Dignities in their Hopes and Expectations. Four Roman-Catholic Bishops were publicly consecrated in the Royal Chapel, and dispatch'd down, under the Title of Vicars Apostolical, to exercise their Episcopical Functions in their respective Dioceses; and their Pastoral Letters, directed to the Lay-Catholics of England, were dispers'd about the Country, and printed by the King's own Printer, with public Licence. Their regular Clergy appear'd in their Habits at Whitehall and St. James's, and made no Scruple to tell the Protestants, That they help'd in a little time to walk in Procession through Cheapside. The Building of St. Paul's Cathedral was carry'd on with greater Vigour than before, in Expectation that it would in time turn to the Benefit of the Papists. A mighty Harvest of new Converts were now expected; and that Labourers might not be wanting, whole Flocks of Priests and Regulars were sent from beyond Sea to reap it: In sum, the only Step to Preferment was to be of the King's Religion, or a Promoter of it, since all important Affairs were manag'd in the Privy-Council by Catholics, and some few others, whose Actions were more difficult to excuse or extenuate.

The Clergy
turn Patriots.

While the Laity only felt the Weight of the Prerogative, the Pulpits rang with the Duty of implicit Obedience; and while oppressive Laws were multiply'd against Protestant Dissenters, and executed with the utmost Rigour, it was represented as seditious to contend for Relief against them, or even to assert the Rights of Nature and of Reason: But now the Church was in Danger, pro Aris & Focis was the Cry; and it was held not only lawful but meritorious to wrestle with the Crown, and to interest Heaven and Earth in the Quarrel.

The Case of
Dr. Sharp.

To come to Particulars: Dr. Sharp, Rector of St. Giles's (call'd by Father Orleans, The railing Parson) having in the Course of his Sermons given Offence, by touching on the Points prohibited by the King's Letters, had a Piece of Paper put into his Hand as he was one Day coming out of his Pulpit, which at once challeng'd and defy'd him to make good those obnoxious Passages. The Doctor, it seems, thought his own Church the safest and properest Place to carry on the Controversy, and his own Congregation the fittest Judges. Accordingly, he made a set Discourse for this extraordinary Purpose; and having consulted his Adversary, proceeded to shew how unreasonable it was for Protestants to change their Religion on these Grounds; ergo, the Doctor had preach'd against the King, and ought to be made an Example: But according to the ordinary Government of the Church, this could only be done by the Authority of his

Diocesan the Bishop of London, who was deeply embark'd in the same Cause, and upon whom it was already decreed that the Vengeance of the Court should fall, as soon as any Pretence could be found, or a favourable Crisis should offer: Both, it was understood, were now within Reach; and that proper Use might immediately be made of them, Attorney the Messenger was sent with a Letter from the King to the Bishop, importing, "That whereas Sharp, in Contempt of the Directions concerning Preachers, which his Majesty had caus'd to be set forth, had presum'd to make some unbecoming Reflections, and to utter such expressions as were not fit or proper for him, as having a Tendency to beget in the Minds of his Hearers an evil Opinion of his Majesty and his Government, to make them discontented with both, and to lead them into Disobedience and Rebellion, it was his Majesty's Command, that he should immediately suspend the said Sharp till he had given his Majesty Satisfaction, and till his Majesty's farther Pleasure should be known." As nothing could be more positive than the Mandate, so there was nothing within the Power of the Court which the Bishop had not to apprehend from his Disobedience. But the Time was now come when Bishops were to become Patriots, and to contend for the Laws against the Prerogative. Notwithstanding therefore, the King had signify'd, that his Letter should be his Lordship's Warrant, that Prelate in his Answer, which was address'd to the Lord-President, Sunderland, took the Liberty to make his Confidence the Director of his Obedience. "I am duty to obey, said he, and shall, count it my Duty to obey the King in whatever Commands he lays upon me, that I can perform with a safe Confidence. But in this I humbly conceive, I am oblig'd to proceed according to Law; and therefore, it is impossible for me to comply; because tho' his Majesty commands me only to execute his Pleasure, yet in the Capacity I am to do it, I must act as a Judge; and your Lordship knows no Judge condemns any Man before he has Knowledge of the Cause, and has cited the Party." This was firm and honest; and by way of Softener, it was added, that Dr. Sharp was so ready to give his Majesty all reasonable Satisfaction, that he had thought it fit to make him the Bearer of the Letter. But neither the Letter nor the Bearer were acceptable; no Answer was return'd; and either in dread of something worse to follow, or to heap Coals of Fire on the Heads of his Prosecutors, the Doctor, on the Sunday following, waited on the King at Whitehall with a humble Petition, setting forth his Affliction at falling under his Majesty's Displeasure; declaring, that in Submission to his Command he had forborne all public Exercise of his Function; that as a Preacher he had made it his faithful Endeavour to serve both his Majesty and his Royal Brother to the best of his Ability; that instead of writing any thing in the Pulpit tending to Schism or Faction, or any way to the Disturbance of the Government, he had always set himself against all sorts of Doctrines and Principles which look'd that way; inferring from hence, that his Discourses must have been misrepresented to his Majesty; but, withal, solemnly protesting, that if any Words or Expressions in any Sermon of his had been capable of such Constructions as might offend his Majesty, he had no ill Intentions, was very sorry for them, was resolv'd to be so careful for the future, in the Discharge of his Duty, that his Majesty should have reason to believe him to be his most faithful Subject; and upon the whole, praying that his Majesty would lay aside the Displeasure he had conceiv'd against him, and restore him to that Favour, which the rest of the Clergy enjoy'd under his Majesty's most gracious Government.

The ecclesiastical Commission.

All was in vain; Having his Eye fix'd on Punishment, his Majesty, as in former Cases, would not compound for Submission: The Bishop was now in the Toils as well as the Doctor, and it was resolv'd that the Former should suffer for having screen'd the Latter. So long ago as April, it seems, it had been foreseen, that the ordinary Government of the Church would not answer the Views of the Court; and, therefore, an extraordinary Commission was provided, by which every Ecclesiastic in the Kingdom was made liable to whatever ecclesiastical Censures a motley Junto of Court-tools might be instructed to lay upon them. This was such an Exertion of the King's Supremacy, as had never been heard of since the High-Commission Court was abolish'd by Act of Parliament, 17 Car. I. nor could the like have ever been heard of again, if that Act had been left in its full Force; for it farther provided, that no new Court should be erected with like Power, Jurisdiction, and Authority: That whoever was convicted of any Offence prohibited by that Statute, should be utterly incapable of continuing in Office, &c. But it being apprehended from some other Clauses in this Act, that the Ax was thereby laid to the Root of all Ecclesiastical Power, the Idolaters of the Church to manag'd it, that in the 13th of Charles II. another Act was pass'd to secure the Clames and Prerogatives of the Bishops Courts against the Edge of the former; in which it was expressly declar'd, That nothing in the said former Act did or should take away the ordinary Power of the Archbishops, Bishops, &c. And that every Clause of the said Act, except those which related to the High Commission Court was thereby repeal'd. And hence the Popish Party thought they had a Right to infer, That there was no other Power taken from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, than that of suing, imprisoning, or tendering the Oath ex officio: That so much was suppress'd by the 17th of Charles I. and no more: That an Ecclesiastical Court exercising this Power, was put down, and the erecting the like for the Time to come strictly forbidden; but that the Court now set up by King James, was not like to that, since it pretended not to fine or imprison, or tender the Oath ex officio, but kept within the Bounds of Ecclesiastical Censures. And farther they boldly averr'd, That the Court held by his Majesty's Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was more legal than Doctor's Commons, and the Bishops Courts, the first being in the King's Name, and the other only in the Name of the Archbishops and Bishops. "And thus, says Mr. Behard, the Papiſts, supported by a King of their own Religion, worſhiped the Proteſtants, [or rather their Priests] with their own Weapons, and made Use of those very Statutes against them, which were chiefly design'd to discountenance Popery." Or, as the Archdeacon should have said, to maintain their own Dominion over their Fellow-subjects.

A. D. 1685.

The Commission itself was at first, for Form sake, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sanerſt; the Bishop of Durham, Cecro; the Bishop of Rochester, Sprat; the Lord Chancellor Jeffreys; the Lord High Treasurer Rochester; the Lord President Sunderland, and the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert: So that the Laity had the Majority; and what is still more remarkable, the Court could not be held, except in the Presence of the Lord Chancellor. As to their Powers, they were so full, and so extraordinary, that only the very Words of the Commission can give Posterity a proper Idea of them. "We, says the Edict Royal, for divers good, weighty, and necessary Causes and Considerations us hereunto especially moving, of our mere Motion and certain Knowledge, by force and virtue of our Supreme Authority and Prerogative Royal, do assign, name, and authorize, by these our Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, you the said Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, &c. from time to time, and at all times during our Pleasure, [these are the Words of the Commission] to exercise, use, occupy and execute under us, all manner of Jurisdiction, Privileges, and Pre-eminences, in any wise touching or concerning any spiritual or ecclesiastical Jurisdictions, within this our Realm of England and Dominion of Wales; and to visit, reform, redress, correct, and amend all such Abuses, Offences, Contempts and Enormities whatsoever, which by the spiritual or ecclesiastical Laws of this Realm can or may be lawfully reform'd, order'd, redress'd, corrected, restrain'd, or amended, to the Pleasure of Almighty God, and Increase of Virtue, and the Conservation of the Peace and Unity of this Realm. And we do hereby give and grant unto you, by force of our Supreme Authority and Prerogative Royal, full Power and Authority, from time to time, and at all times during our Pleasure, under us, to exercise, use, and execute, all the Premises, according to the Tenor and Effect of these our Letters Patents, any Matter or Cause to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And by all lawful Ways and Means, from time to time hereafter, during our Pleasure, to enquire of all Offences, Contempts, Transgressions, and Misdemeanors, done and committed contrary to the ecclesiastical Laws of this our Realm, in any County, City, Borough, or other Place or Places, exempt or not exempt, within this our Realm of England and Dominion

1 D. 1686. minion of Wales; and all and every of the Offender or Offenders therein, and them and every of them, to order, correct, reform, and punish, by Censure of the Church. And to enquire of, search out, and call before you, all and every ecclesiastical Person or Persons, of what Degree or Dignity soever, as shall offend in any one of these Particulars before-mention'd; and them and every of them to correct and punish, for such their Misbehaviours and Misdemeanors, by suspending or depriving them from all Promotions ecclesiastical, and from all Functions in the Church; and to inflict other Punishments or Censures upon them, according to the ecclesiastical Laws of this Realm. And also all such as shall seem to be suspected Persons in any of the Premises, which you shall object against them, and to proceed against them, as the Nature and the Quality of the Offence, or Suspicion, in that behalf shall require; and also to call all such Witnesses, or any other Person or Persons that can inform you concerning any of the Premises, and them and every of them to examine upon their corporal Oaths, for the better Trial and Opening of the Truth of the Premises, or any Part thereof: And if you shall find any Person or Persons whatsoever obstinate or disobedient in their Appearance before you, at your Commandments, or else in not obeying or not accomplishing your Orders, Decrees and Commandments, or any thing touching the Premises, or any Part thereof, or any other Branch or Clause contain'd in this Commission; that then you shall have full Power and Authority to punish the same Person or Persons offending, by Excommunication, Suspension, Deprivation, or other Censures ecclesiastical: And to award such Costs and Expences of the Suit, as well to and against the Party as shall prefer or prosecute the said Offence, as to and against the Party or Parties that shall be convened, according as their Causes shall require, and to you in Justice shall be thought reasonable. And whereas our Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and divers Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, Colleges, Grammar-schools, and other ecclesiastical Incorporations, have been erected, founded, and endowed by several of our Royal Progenitors, Kings and Queens of this Realm, and some others, by the Charity and Bounty of some of their Subjects, as well within our Universities as other Parts and Places, the Ordinances, Rules and Statutes whereof are either imbezled, lost, corrupted, or altogether impeded: We do therefore give a full Power and Authority to you, to cause or command, in our Name, all and singular the Ordinances, Rules and Statutes of our Universities, and all and every Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, Colleges, Grammar-schools, and other ecclesiastical Incorporations, together with their several Letters Patents, and other Writings, touching or in any wise concerning the several Erections or Foundations, to be brought and exhibited before you; willing, commanding and authorizing you, upon the exhibiting, and upon diligent and deliberate View, Search and Examination of the said Statutes, Rules and Ordinances, Letters Patents, and Writings, as in aforesaid, the same to correct, amend, and alter. And also where no Statutes are extant in all or any of the aforesaid Cases, to devise and set down such good Orders and Statutes as you shall think meet and convenient to be by us confirmed, ratified, allowed, and set forth for the better Order and Rule of the said Universities, Cathedrales, and Collegiate Churches, Colleges and Grammar-schools, Erections and Foundations, and the Possessions and Revenues of the same, as may best tend to the Honour of Almighty God, Increase of Virtue, Learning and Unity in the said Places, and the public Weal and Tranquility of this our Realm. Moreover, our Will, Pleasure, and Commandment is, That our said Commissioners, and every of you, shall diligently and faithfully execute this our Commission, and every Part and Branch thereof, in Manner and Form aforesaid, and according to the true Meaning hereof, notwithstanding any Appellation, Provocation, Privilege, or Exemption in that behalf, to be made, pretended, or alleged by any Person or Persons, resident or dwelling in any Place or Places, exempt or not exempt, within this our Realm, any LAWS, STATUTES, Proclamations or Grants, Privileges or Ordinances, which be or may seem to be contrary to the Premises, notwithstanding. Finally, we will and command all and singular other our Ministers and Subjects, in all and every Place and Places, exempt and not exempt, within our Realm of England and Dominion of Wales, upon any Knowledge or Request from you, or any three or more of you, as is aforesaid, to them or any of them given or made, to be aiding, helping and assisting unto you, and to your Commandment, in and for the due executing of your Precepts, Letters, and other Process, requisite in and for the due executing this our Commission, as they and every of them tender our Pleasure and Will, to answer the contrary at their utmost Perils. In Witness, &c.

Concerning the Commissioners, at least the Lords Spiritual, we are told by Bishop Barnet, in effect, That tho' the Archbishop had not the Spirit to come and enter his Protest against the Court as an Illegality, he had nevertheless the Grace to abstain from countenancing it with his Presence, under the Plea of Bodily Indisposition: That his Lordship of Durham glory'd in it, saying on the one hand, That now his Name would be recorded in History; and on the other, that he could not see without his Majesty's gracious Smiles: And that Dr. Sprat had fix'd his Eyes on the vacant Archbishopric of York, which he hop'd to earn by his Compliances. With regard to the Lay Lords, it may be presum'd, that they were govern'd by the like Motives: For no Man cares to forfeit the good Opinion of the People, unless for a valuable Consideration at Court; and it was scarce possible for a Countess to engage in a more unpopular Cause than this. Lord Sunderland, in his Apology, pleads the Example of So many considerable Men of several kinds as acted with him under that Commission, in Excuse for himself; and, yet farther, the Authority of those very Lawyers, whose Opinions in the Matter of the Dissolving Power, he acknowledges, had no Weight with him.

The Bishop of London's Case.

The very first Day they open'd their Commission, which was August the third, they sent a Citation to the Bishop of London to make his Appearance before them; which his Lordship obey'd, and found all but the Archbishop set in array against him. Jeffreys, as Chief, in the Commission, was the Mouth of the Court, and fell bluntly to the Business of the Day, by asking the Bishop, "What was the Reason he did not suspend Dr. Sharp, according to the King's express Command, for preaching seditiously against the Government?" To which his Lordship reply'd, "That he had been told, he could not legally do so, but by regular Process of Citation, Hearing, &c." Jeffreys urg'd, That he ought to have known the Law better; that the King was to be obey'd; and that it would be necessary for him to produce some better Reason. The Bishop, in Answer, humbly begg'd a Copy of the Commission, and a Copy of the Charge against him, or at least, that he might read them, or hear them read. This occasion'd a Demur; he was order'd to withdraw; and after a short time, being recall'd, was told by the Chancellor, "That neither of his Requests could be granted: That the Commission was upon Record, and might, besides, be found in every Coffee-house: That their Method of proceeding was not by Libel or Article, but by Word of Mouth: And that all that was requir'd of him was a satisfactory Answer to this short Question, Why he did not obey the King?" This Bishop thus hard drove, plead'd the Privilege of a Bishop, of a Lord of Parliament, and of one who had a public Trust to answer for; and considering the Seal of the Year, and that the Civilians were not in Town, desir'd, that he might be allow'd sufficient time to make his Defence. Till the next Term he demanded; but he obtain'd no more than six Days, Jeffreys saying, "That it was unreasonable, that the King's Business should be retarded by such long Delays." At his second Appearance, the Bishop was accompany'd by his

Nephew the Earl of Northampton, his Brother, Sir Francis Compton, and his Brother-in-law, Sir John Nicholas: And many (e) other Persons of Distinction had the Curiosity to attend the Issue of this new and strange Proceeding. The Bishop now pleaded, that he had other Reasons to desire a sight of the Commission, for that perhaps it might not reach him, or his particular Case. Jeffreys reply'd, That they would admit no quarrelling with their Commission; and that they were well assur'd of the Legality of it, or they should not be such Fools as to sit there. The Result was, that he was induc'd with a Fortnight's time more: And in this Interval, his Lordship having sent his Proctor to Bridgman the Registrar of the Commission for a Copy of the Minutes of their Proceedings, it was refus'd, tho' his Counsel assur'd him such Copies had never been refus'd in any Court before. But this Court was of the Inquisition kind, and therefore exempt from common Forms. The Bishop, however, when the final Day of Hearing came, enter'd on his Defence, as if it was no Court at all; saying, "That he no longer proceeded on his own Opinion, but by the Advice of his Lawyers, who were not only positive that their whole Proceedings were against the Statute-Law, but ready to argue the Matter before their Lordships." And, this being over-ruled, because against the Jurisdiction of the Court, his Lordship gave in a written Plea founded on the Act 17 Car. I. before quoted, which was also erected on the same Principle. His Lordship then challeng'd the Right of all Christian Bishops to be try'd by his Metropolitan and his Suffragans. Jeffreys reply'd, That their Proceedings were agreeable to what had been formerly done; that they had an original Jurisdiction; and that he still did but question the Court. And the Bishop rejoins, "If I am over-ruled in this, I must beg your Lordship's Patience in one Plea more. Your Lordships, in this Commission, after the general Words, are directed to proceed according to the Tenor of the Letters-Patents, &c. Now I conceive, in the Capacity I am in, you are only warrant'd to try me for Offences after the Date of the Commission.---- But the Court resolv'd, That they had Authority to look back."---- Then the Bishop put in his Answer in Writing, which was read by Mr. Bridgman, and which consisted of a (f) Recapitulation of the several Facts in his Case,

(e) Among these are remember'd Sir Thomas Clarges and Sir John Lubbock, by the following Circumstances: The former having cry'd out in the Court, when the Bishop objected to the Legality of Commission, "Well put I will not! My Lord speaks nothing but the Truth." And the latter, when the Court broke up, having said aloud, "There are some who have represent'd me as a Papist: But the contrary shall appear: For I will not be afraid nor ashamed to vindicate my Lord Bishop's Cause before the Commissioners themselves."

(f) In this Form, Rec. 1686. To the Question which was proposed to me by your Lordships, (see.) Why did you not obey the King's Command, in his Letter concerning the suspending Dr. Sharp? I Thomas Bishop of London do answer, That immediately upon Receipt of his Majesty's Letter from my Lord President, the Tenor whereof follows, &c. I took the best Advice I could get concerning Dr. Sharp; and was inform'd, That the Letter being directed to me, as Bishop of London, to suspend a Person under my Jurisdiction, I was therein to act as a Judge, it being a judicial Act; and that no Person could by Law be punish'd by Suspension, before he was call'd, or without being advis'd to make his Defence: I thought it therefore my Duty forthwith humbly to represent so much to my Lord President, that so I might receive his Majesty's further Pleasure in that Matter. Nevertheless, that I might obey his Majesty's Command, as far as by Law I could, I did then send for Dr. Sharp, and acquainted him with his Majesty's Displeasure, and the Occasion of it, by shewing him his Majesty's Letter. But he having never been call'd to answer any such Matter, or make his Defence, and proceeding his Innocence, and likewise declaring himself most ready to give his Majesty's satisfaction therein: In order thereto, I advis'd him to forbear Preaching, till he had apply'd himself to his Majesty; and, at his Request,

Cafe. Being then ask'd by the Lord-Chancellor, Whether he had any thing more to say; he answer'd, "That the Words of his Majesty's Letter were liable to two Constructions, upon a double Sense of the Word suspend; either a Suspension ab officio, which was a judicial Act, and he could not do but in a judicial Manner. The other Sense of the Word suspend, might be taken at large for silencing: And therefore he had advis'd the Doctor not to preach till he knew his Majesty's farther Pleasure. Which Advice, says he, from a Judge, the learn'd in the Law tell me, is tantumquam to an Admonition; and that if he had not submitted to it, I could have censur'd him for his Disobedience: So that if this last was his Majesty's Meaning, I have, in effect, obey'd the Letter; which is all I shall say at present; and and beg my Council may be heard, to clear the Matter in point of Law." This, it seems, was allow'd, and the Doctors Oldys, Hedges, Brice, and Newton, in general, argu'd, That if a Prince requir'd a Judge to execute an Order not agreeable to the Law, the Duty of that Judge was referre & reclamare Principi, which his Lordship had done. That, in the next Place, in silencing Sharp, he had in effect suspended him: That in going thus far, he had done as much as the Law would allow: That if he had done more, he had acted illegally, &c. It happen'd that Jeffreys, in answer to Dr. Oldys, had acknowledg'd, that all his Majesty expected of the Bishop, was to make Use of his Power to silence Sharp: And of this the Bishop took Advantage to say in the Clois of his Defence, "I suppose my Council have satisfy'd your Lordships, that in the severest Construction, Malice, or wilful Disobedience could not be imputed to me. But, as my Lord Chancellor has now explain'd it to Dr. Oldys, they have made plain to your Lordships, that I have effectually obey'd his Majesty's Commands: And if in any Circumstance I have been wanting, I am ready to make Reparation, by performing that likewise, and to beg his Majesty's Pardon."

It does not appear that any one of the Commissioners in the whole Course of the Hearing, shew'd any Disposition to favour the Right Reverend Culprit before them, or any Disgust to the Drudgery impos'd on them, tho' they were told from every Corner of the Land, That the Commission they acted under, was against Law: That it was intended for the Ruin of the Church of England, and to make way for the Re-establishment of Popery, by introducing it into the Universities. But to do their Lordships Justice when the Cafe came to be decided, it did not appear that they were altogether so unanimous as they had appear'd during the Trial. Jeffreys was for suspension during the King's Pleasure: And tho' Bishop Burnet has thought proper to make no Mention of the Lord President, we must, for that very Reason, conclude he was of the same Mind: His Lordship of Durham also, who was so fond of having his Name immortaliz'd in History, made no scruple to take the same Left-hand Road: But the Lord Treasurer, the Bishop of Rockefter, and the Ld. Chief-Justice Herbert were for accepting the Bishop's Submission, as a Means to preserve themselves from the King's Displeasure, which they were sure to feel, in case they refus'd to join in the Sentence of Suspension; and from the Odium of the Public, and the Reproach of their own Consciences, in case they ventur'd to pleasure his Majesty at the Expence of Law, Truth and Justice. How his Difficulty to ascertain, unless Bishop Burnet's Ipsi-dixit should be thought one; for he tells us, That the King, being resolv'd to carry his Point, spok'd roundly about it to the Earl of Rockefter, who seeing he must either concur in the Sentence, or part with the cedite Staff, yielded; in Consequence of which, he was suspended (s) ab officio. Dr. Kennet adds, "The Bishop would have spoken before the Sentence

quish, I made him the Bearer of my Letter to my Lord President; waiting for his Majesty's farther Order to proceed against him judicially, in case he should not at that time give his Majesty the Satisfaction required: And the said Dr. Sharp hath not since preach'd within my Diocese.

HENRY, London.

[1] In these Words: "Whereas Henry Lord Bishop of London hath been convey'd before, for his Disobedience, and other his Contempts, mention'd in the Proceedings of this Cause; and the said Lord Bishop of London being fully heard hereupon; We have thought fit, after mature Consideration of the Matter, to proceed to this our definitive Sentence, declaring, decreeing, and pronouncing, That the said Lord Bishop shall, for his Disobedience and Contempts, be suspended during his Majesty's Pleasure. And accordingly we do, by these Presents, suspend him the said Henry Lord Bishop of London; preceptually admonishing and requiring him hereby to abstain from the Function and Execution of his episcopal Office, and from all episcopal and ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, during the said Suspension, under pain of Deprivation and Removal from his Bishopric.

Given under our Seal, the 14th Day of September, 1686."

NB. It was sign'd by no body.

Bishop Burnet answer'd, "They did not think fit to meddle with his Revenues. For the Lawyers had declar'd that Pains that Benefices were of the Nature of Freeholds. So, if the Sentence had gone to the Temporalties, the Bishop would have had the Matter try'd over again in the King's Bench, where he was like to find good Justice; Burnet not being famili'd with the Legality and Justice of the Sentence.

While this Matter was in Dependence, (proceed; the King Prelate) the Princess of Orange thought it became her to interpose a little in the Bishop's Favour. He had confes'd, and married her: So she wrote to the King, earnestly begging him to be gentle to the Bishop, who she could not think would offend willingly. She also wrote to the Bishop, expressing the great share she took in the Trouble he was fallen into. The Princess wrote to him to the same Purpose. The King wrote an Answer to the Princess, referring severely on the Bishop, yet without those Sharpness on her for meddling in such Matters. Yet the Court seem'd usually, when they saw they had gain'd so poor a Victory: For now the Bishop was more consider'd than ever. His Clergy, for all the Suspension, were really more govern'd by the secret Intimations of his Pleasure, than they had been by his Authority before. So they resolv'd to come out as well as they could. Dr. Mory (having been first judicially suspended) was admitted to offer a general Petition, imploring how sorry he was to find himself under the King's Displeasure: Upon which he was dismissed with a gentle Reprimand, and suffer'd to return to the Exercise of his Function. According to the Form of the ecclesiastical Courts, a Person under such a Suspension must make a Submission within six Months. Otherwise he may be proceed'd against as obstinate. So, in Month after this Sentence, the Bishop sent a Petition to the King, desiring to be restor'd to the Exercise of his episcopal Function. But he made no Acknowledgment of any Fault. So this had no other Effect, but that it oppos'd all further Proceedings: Only the Suspension by Bill on him."

The Bishop

was real, to have recapitulated the Heads of his Case, and to have offer'd full Proof of his Compliance in silencing Dr. Sharp, and to have declar'd, since their Lordships had hitherto been his Accusers and Judges; they would at last, according to the usual Custom; have been his Council, and order'd their Advocate to lay down the Nature of the Crime, the Law it offended, and the Law it was to be punish'd by; that he might have given in his Exceptions: But no speaking was allow'd, till the Sentence was read." And, immediately after, Two of the Commissioners themselves, viz. the Bishops of Durham and Rochester, collegued with the Bishop of Peterborough, were authorized to officiate in his stead.

While the Nation was in a manner stunned with these outrageous Proceedings, we are told there was a general Meeting of the leading Roman Catholics at the Savoy, to consult how this favourable Crisis might be most improv'd to the Advantage of their Cause. Father Petre had the Chair, and at the very opening of the Debates it appear'd, that the Majority were more inclin'd to provide for their own Security, than to come to Extremities with the Protestants. Notwithstanding the King's Zeal, Power, and Success, they were afraid to push the Experiment any farther. The People were already alarm'd; the Soldiers could not be depended upon; the very Courtiers melted out of their Grasp; all depended on a single Life, which was already on the Decline; and if that Life should last yet a few Years longer, and continue, as hitherto, devoted to their Interest and Service, they foresaw insurmountable Difficulties in their Way; and apprehended Disappointments without End. Upon these Considerations therefore, some were for a Petition to the King, that he would only so far interpose in their Favour that their Estates might be secur'd to them by Act of Parliament, with Exemption from all Employments, and Liberty to worship God in their own Way, in their own Houses. Others were for obtaining the King's Leave to sell their Estates, and transport themselves and their Effects to France. All but Father Petre were for a Compromise of some Sort or another: But he disdain'd whatever had a Tendency to Moderation; and was for making the most of the Voyage, while the Sea was smooth and the Wind prosperous. All these several Opinions, we are farther told, were laid before the King; who was pleas'd to answer, "That, before their Desires were made known to him, he had provided a sure Retreat and Sanctuary for them in Ireland, in case all those Endeavours which he was making for their Security in England should be blasted, and which as yet gave him no Reason to despair."

Every Spring and Wheel of the whole Machine of Government was indeed at work in their Favour; but, as we have seen, not wholly in the Manner they approv'd: His Majesty had been admitted a Lay-brother of the Jesuits Society; which, it seems, he look'd upon as a greater Honour than the Supremacy of the Church of England; and, having given himself up entirely to their furious Councils, resolv'd to impose their Yoke on the Necks of his People, tho' at the Hazard of his Kingdom. It was this Rashness, this Insatiation, which alarm'd the Majority of those very Roman Catholics he was bent on serving: They had their Factions, as well as the Protestants; and the Jesuits were almost as obnoxious to the other Orders, as the Protestants themselves: They were, therefore, more inclin'd to rest satisfy'd with a moderate Degree of Indulgence, than to risk all their Hopes in pushing on the Grandeur of a Society, that aim'd at no less than the tyrannizing over their Brethren, as well as their Adversaries.

In the midst of this strange Disposition of Things, while Protestants were acting as the Dupe and Tools of Papists, and the Papists were at some Degree of Variance with one another, Tyrconnel had Leave to come once more to England; which was alone sufficient to shew, that, notwithstanding the Lord Treasurer's late Compliance in the Sentence against the Bishop of London, his Power and Credit were in the Wane. But Tyrconnel was receiv'd at Court as a Man who had much to hope, and little to fear; being called to the Council-board, and care'd of by the Queen, the Lord President Sunderland, and Father Petre, as if the Salvation of Ireland depended on him only. This gave an immediate Alarm to the two Brothers: The Lord Lieutenant call'd upon the Lord Treasurer to stand by him; the Lord Treasurer made his Application to the King; the King not only gave him all the Assurances he could desire, that he was perfectly well satisfy'd with his Brother's Government, and that he had no Thoughts of removing him, but, on a second Application, renew'd those Assurances with more Warmth than before, and, as it is said, confirm'd all by a Letter, under his own Hand, to Lord Cheridon in Ireland. And yet, says our Author, the Papists in Ireland confidently affirm'd, That, the Day before the King wrote that Letter, he had promis'd Father Petre, that Tyrconnel should be Lord-Lieutenant: And 'tis certain, none but the Queen was privy to this Resolution, no not Tyrconnel himself; for it was known he could not keep a Secret.

We are, moreover, assur'd, that it was at the same time resolv'd, by the same Persons, that the Lord Treasurer and the Lord President should be to the Test on the Subject of Religion; and that their Hold on the State should depend on their Return to the Bosom of Holy Mother Church. The Management of this Affair his Majesty in Person undertook, and chose to begin with the latter; because he was already at the Head of those few occasional Conformists, who, like Nanmart the Syrian, bow'd down to the King their Master's Idol, while they yet continu'd to profess themselves Protestants: But so thoroughly did that Lord play the Statesman, on this critical Occasion, that he had Leave to continue in that Profession, and Father Petre himself undertook to convince the Catholics, that it was necessary he should do so for his Majesty's Service.

The Attack on the Lord Treasurer made more Noble, and had a very different Issue; but is related so variously, that it is scarce possible to give the Truth of the Fact without Injury to the Parties concern'd in it. As his Lordship told the Story to Dr. Burnet, or as the Doctor told it after him, the King press'd him to be instructed in his Religion; and he stood off, alledging he was already satisfy'd in the Articles of his Creed; but on a Repetition of the same Importunity he yielded to hear his Majesty's Priests, provided some of the English Clergy were present. On the other hand, according to the Story told by his Enemies, as it is remember'd by the same Doctor, he had Notice given him, that he would shortly lose the white Staff. Upon which his Lady, who then lay sick, intreated the Honour of a Visit from the Queen; and her Majesty granting her Request, she made Use of the Opportunity to complain of ill Offices done to her Lord. The Queen reply'd, That all the Protestants were now turning against the King, and no Trust could be put in any of them: And Lady Rochester rejoind'd, That her Lord was not to wedded to any Opinion, as not to be ready to be better instructed. And this it was said, proceeds the Bishop, gave rise to the King's proposing a Conference. But then he adds, that the Earl deny'd every Word of it to him.

[P. 108.]

Mr. Echard also expresses, that his Lordship being tir'd out by the King's Solicitations, at length told him, That to let him see that it was not thro' any Prejudice of Education, or Obstinacy, that he persever'd in his Religion, he consented to hear some Protestant Divines dispute with his Popish Priests, and would side with the Conquerors. (b) Others again make it a Charge against him, "That he was so little fix'd and resolv'd in his Religion, that he yielded to be instructed." But all agree that there was such a Conference: That the Chaplains then in waiting, viz. Dr. Patrick and Dr. Jones, enter'd the Lists for the Protestants, and one Giffard a Doctor of the Serbonne, and one Widen, a new Convert, for the Papists. Mr. Echard, descending to Particulars, says, "That the Subject of their Dispute was, The Rule of Faith, and, The proper Judge of Controversy: That the Conference was long: That the Romish Doctors were press'd with so much Strength of Reason and Authority, that they were forc'd to quit the Field: That the Earl of Rochester openly declar'd, That the Victory obtain'd by the Protestants had made no Alteration in his Mind, he being before-hand convinc'd of the Truth of his Religion, and firmly resolv'd never to forsake it: That his Majesty quitted the Place abruptly, and was heard to say as he went off, That he never knew a bad Cause so well, nor a good one so ill defended." Bishop Burnet, on the other hand affirms, "That Patrick told him, That at the Conference there was no Occasion for them to say much: That the Priests began the Attack: That when they had done, the Earl said, if they had nothing stronger to urge, he would not trouble those learned Gentlemen, to say any thing; for he was sure he could answer all that he had heard: That he did accordingly answer it all with much Heat and Spirit; not without some Scorn, saying, Are these Grounds to persuade Men to change their Religion? That he urg'd this over and over again with great Vehemence: And that the King seeing in what Temper he was, broke off the Conference, charging all that were present to say nothing of it." But lest the Earl should derive too much Honour from this spirited Behaviour, the Bishop farther remembers, That it was moreover said by his Enemies, "That the Day before the Conference, he had an Advertisement from a sure Hand, That nothing he could do would maintain him in his Post; and that the King had engag'd himself to put the Treasury in Commission, and to bring some of the Popish Lords into it." And yet other of his Enemies are pleas'd to say, "That after the Conference was over, his Lordship remain'd so far in Suspence as not to declare which Side had the better." The Inconfinities in these several (c) Accounts are so glaring, that they need not be pointed out; nor have his Enemies fallen into more Mistakes than his Friends; for we find it asserted by the last, "That the King could not prevail so much upon him as to obtain his Silence, or even a Desire from him to have time to consider of it (the Proposal to change his Religion). That he turn'd an open Heretic, and that one of the Fathers thereupon said, That he might be anathematiz'd, and that the King could never prosper while such an Heretic was near him." It is, upon the whole, certain, that the white Staff was soon after wrested out of his Hand: But whether this was done by the Influence of the Papists only, or whether the Papists had their Work made easy, by Assistance from any other Quarter, remains a Question, which can be only solv'd by taking a Survey of our foreign Affairs: For with these we shall find our Home-Intrigues from henceforward most intimately connected.

And first, with regard to the Transactions between his Majesty and Holland, where the Scene of Business principally lay: Nothing could be smoother than the Language us'd on both Sides, and nothing perhaps was less sincere. The Algerines had broke their Treaty with the Dutch, and renew'd their Practices upon them; and while France absolutely deny'd those Rovers the Privilege and Protection of their Ports, the Ports of England were every where open to receive them: They had leave to lie in wait there for their Prey, Prey, to retire thither when purs'd, to sell their Prizes, and to supply themselves with whatever they wanted; at least it is so alleg'd by the Dutch Writers, with this Addition, that this Conduct of England struck a Horror throughout Europe; and tho' it is deny'd by some of our own in the Course of their Apologies for the Errors of this Reign; and who say, express Orders were issu'd to the contrary, we find no Authorities either in our Gazettes or Naval Histories to justify them. On the other hand, as if by way of Reprizal, the States extend their Protection to all the known Enemies of the King and his Government, who flew to their Dominions for Refuge; nor could be induc'd by any Complaints or Remonstrances to give them up. Among these was Sir Robert Peyton, who, as we have seen, had again apostatiz'd from the Court, and enter'd into a Correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth. Against him it seems, the King was peculiarly enrag'd; and that he might have his Revenge in his own Power, whether the States pleas'd or not, a Design was form'd to have him seiz'd at Amsterdam by open Violence. Certain English Officers in the Dutch Service were the Persons employ'd in this Outrage; and even the English Minister himself, Skelton, headed it in Person, to bespeak a more favourable Reception at his Return to Whitehall: But all was prevented by the Populace, who not only rose in favour of Peyton, and rescu'd him out of their Hands, but secur'd the Officers who had thus unjustifiably broke the Peace of the Republic. The States themselves also complain'd of this extraordinary Procedure in such lively Terms, that his Majesty thought it advisable to disown it: And yet when their Lordships put their Laws in force against the Persons who had thus flagrantly violated them, he so far interpos'd in their Favour, as to desire that their Punishment might be left to him. The States comply'd, and sent him over the Offenders: But instead of making Examples of them, he prefer'd them in his own Army to higher Commands than they had before. There was, also, an old Quarrel subsisting between the English and the Dutch East-India Companies, in Relation to the Commerce of Bantam, which the latter had found Means to engross to themselves, to the utter Exclusion of all other Europeans. This his Majesty was now pleas'd to revive and patronize: And from all these several Circumstances it was concluded at the Hague, That he was lying in wait for a Rupture. But that which weigh'd with them more than all, as they pretended, was his assembling his Forces on Haughers Heats; his issuing out a new Commission for repairing and augmenting his Navy; his assigning a stated annual Sum of 200,000*l.* to be issu'd quarterly out of the Treasury, for defraying the ordinary Charge thereof; and his holding a strong Squadron of forty-five Men of War in continual Readiness to put to Sea. Bishop Burnet gives us to understand, that the Earl of Rochester had made a Shift to keep in his Post longer than

was intended, on the Merit of having procur'd a Loan of the first 200,000*l.* that was apply'd to this Service; which, if true, is sufficient to justify a Suspicion, that he had other Enemies besides the Papists. But we have no authentic Proof in Print, that King James was ever under the Necessity of having recourse to Anticipations; and therefore, 'tis more natural to suppose, that Lord Rochester's Merit consisted in making such a Disposition of the Revenue as might regularly answer this and every other National Service. The same Prelate also argues from the Attention given to the Fleet this Year, and the Care which was all at once taken to render it formidable, that some great Design was in hand, and that the Priests every where gave out, That it was against the Dutch; and that both France and England would make War upon them all of the sudden: But he does not specify at what time these things were said, nor at what time, by the Advice of his Friends, he drew nearer to England, that he might be easier sent to, and inform'd of all Affairs, that he might employ his Thoughts and Time accordingly; nor at what time he found the Letters at Utrecht, which were writ to him by some of the Prince of Orange's Court, desiring him to wait on their Highnesses before he settled any where: And from such uncertain Premises it is impossible to draw any certain Conclusions.

The Date of the King's new Commission for inspecting and repairing the Fleet, is April 17, 1686; and the Bishop tells us, That the same Summer, having finish'd his Travels, he wait'd on the Prince of Orange at the Hague. Now his Majesty's Care of his naval Force might reasonably pass for a cautionary Measure at first, whatever was at the Bottom: And what was thus early brewing in Holland, the Bishop himself is communicative enough to inform us, for the sake of setting forth his own Importance. These that follow are his Lordship's own Words; not indeed as they stand connected in Order of Paragraph, but as they relate to the same Points:

"I found they (the Prince and Princess) had receiv'd such Characters of me from England, that they resolv'd to treat me with great Confidence: For, at my first being with them, they enter'd into much free Discourse with me concerning the Affairs of England. The Prince, tho' naturally cold and reserved, yet laid aside a great deal of that with me. He seem'd highly dissatisfy'd with the King's Conduct. He apprehended, that he would give such Jealousies of himself, and come under such Jealousies from his People, that these would throw him into a French Management, and engage him in such desperate Designs as woud force violent Remedies."

Of the Princess he says, p. 690, "She knew little of our Affairs, till I was admitted to wait on her. And I began to lay before her the State of our Court, and the Intrigues in it ever since the Restoration; which she receiv'd with great Satisfaction." Again, Bishop Burnet's own Account of his Transactions with the Prince and Princess of Orange.

A. D. 1686

A. D. 1686. In 1691, he proceeds thus: "I found the Prince was resolv'd to make use of me. He also recommended me both to Boyle, Dyck, and Halsbury's Confidence, with whom he chiefly consulted. I had a mind to see a little into the Prince's Notions, before I should engage myself deeper into his Service. I was afraid, lest his Struggle with the Lowstein Party, as they were called, (the Anti-Stadholderists) might have given him a Jealousy of Liberty and of a free Government. He assured me, it was quite the contrary: Nothing but such a Constitution could resist a powerful Aggressor long, or have the Credit that was necessary to raise such Sums as a great War might require. He condemn'd all the late Proceedings in England with relation to the Charters, and express'd his Sense of a legal and limited Authority very fully. I told him, I was such a Friend to Liberty, that I could not be satisfy'd with the Point of Religion alone, unless it was accompany'd with the Securities of Law.--- I thought it necessary to enter with him into all these Particulars, that so I might be furnish'd from his own Mouth, to give a full Account of his Sense to some in England, who would expect it of me, and were dispos'd to believe what I should assure them of. This Discourse was of some Hours Continuance: And it pass'd in the Prince's Presence. Great Notice came to be taken of the free Access and long Conferences I had with them both. I told him, it was necessary for his Service to put the Fleet of Holland in a good Condition. And this he propos'd soon after to the States, who gave the hundredth Penny for a Fund to perfect that. I mov'd to them both, the writing to the Bishop of London, and to the King concerning him. And, tho' the Prince's fear'd it might irritate the King too much, in conclusion I persuaded them to it."

"Upon the setting up the ecclesiastical Commission, some from England press'd them to write over against it, and to begin a Breach upon that. I told them, I thought that was no way advisable: They could not be suppos'd to understand our Laws so well, as to oppose those things on their own Knowledge: So that I thought this could not be expected by them, till some resolute Person would dispute the Authority of the Court, and bring it to an Argument, and so to a solemn Decision."

This, before the Bishop of London's Case came to a Hearing, while the King's naval Preparations were yet in Embrio, we find it convinc'd that a Breach was in Agitation, and that Thoughts were entertain'd of stretching the Credit of this Nation, for the Support of a great War on the Continent: And this Remark is necessary to be made in this Place, that the Reader may be honestly inform'd, That, in all State-Experiments, there is ever more of the Politician than the Patriot; and that, tho' the Grievances of the People furnish out the Pretences for all great Changes, the Redress of those Grievances is the last thing consider'd of.

In treating of the Transitions of the Year 1688, our Right Reverend Historian is more-over express, that the Lord Arundel, having obtain'd the King's Leave to visit the Prince of Orange, press'd him, in the present Year 1686, to undertake the Business of England, and represent the Matter as so easy, that it appear'd too romantical to the Prince to build upon it: So that his Highness only promis'd in general, That he would have an Eye to the Affairs of England, and would endeavour to put those of Holland in so good a Posture, as to be ready to act when it should be necessary: And that if the King should go about to change the establish'd Religion, or to wrong the Princess in her Right, or to raise forged Plots to destroy his Friends, he would try what he could possibly do.

Lastly, the same Divine makes it his Boss, [P. 397, 398.] That what fix'd him in the Confidence of their Highnesses was, the Liberty he took to dispose the Princess to make over all her Right to the Sovereignty of England to her Husband, and to be content with the Honour of being his Wife; which the most complaisantly submitted to: And though he repines, That the Prince never made him any particular Acknowledgment for this special Service, he nevertheless glories, that his Highness should lay to others, That, after having been Nine Years marry'd, he had never had the Confidence to press that Matter to the (K) Princess, which he, the Doctor, had so easily brought about in a Day.

But the more Care this Writer has taken to be minutely circumstantial in whatever regards himself, the more it is to be wonder'd that, like our common Historians, whom he professes to copy in nothing, he should suffer this Year to escape without the least mention of the famous League of Ausburg, which is by most foreign Authors treated of as the Basis of the great Change that soon after happen'd in England, and what made way for the great War that had waste the Continent, and of which the chief Merit and Glory are ascrib'd to the Prince of Orange. His Highness knew, that unless he could first provide for the Security of the States, the States would not come into Measures for the Furtherance of his vast and Hazardous Designs: And 'tis in this Light we must understand his Promise to Lord Mordaunt: That he would endeavour to put the Affairs of Holland in so good a Posture as to be ready to act when it should be necessary.

The Emperor was by this time in a fair way of making his Forty good against the Turks and their Allies the revolted Hungarians: He had obtain'd many Advantages over them in the Course of the War, and this Year in particular had forc'd the strong Fortresses of Buda out of their Hands, which they had held one hundred and forty-five Years. This Success enabled his Imperial Majesty to attend attend more closely to the Proceedings of France, and to think of new Precautions against her farther Encroachments. The Necessity of such new Precautions was besides apparent; for in Contempt of the Truce, by which it was provided, That all things should continue as they were, the most Christian King had erected several Forts in several Parts of Germany, not so much for the Security of his own Conquests, as to bridle the  Germans: And, what made the Insult yet more insupportable, many of these Forts were erected in Places where the  French had no Clames, either by Cession or Conquest. The Imperial Minister, in the mean time, ply'd the  French Court with Complaints and Remonstrances; but to no Purpose: They proceeded as before, and thereby put it out of all dispute, That nothing less than giving the Law to all  Europe would content them, and that nothing but Force could oblige them to be good Neighbours. The Repeal of the Edict of  Nantes, and the Cruelties exercis'd on the  French Huguenots by their  most Christian Master, had given the Alarm to the Protestant Powers of  Germany, who had already enter'd into Measures at  Magdeburg for their common Preservation: And tho' the Princes of the House of  Austria did not yield in Bigotry, Cruelty, or Tyranny, to those of  Bourbon, as had been sufficiently manifested by their Treatment of the  Hungarians and  Flemings, their Vassals, the Emperor and the King of  Spain, who were also as very Bigots as any of their Ancestors, made no Difficulty to avail themselves of this Heretical Confederacy, for the sake of their secular Interests.

The  Magdeburg-Association was said to be for the Defence of the Protestant Religion: But when it was adapted at  Aulburg, the Defence of the Empire was grafted upon it; and the Emperor,  Spain,  Saxony,  Bavaria,  Brandenburg, and the Circles of the upper  Rhine, were the original contracting Parties. The late Elector  Palatine of the Protestant Line had been a notable Stickler for a Project of this Nature; and tho' he dy'd before it could be brought to bear, his Catholic Successor of the House of  Neuburg, found, or thought to find, his Account in abetting the same Cause. But the Prince of  Orange was both deepest in the Intrigue, and most instrumental in its Success: And it is somewhat hard to conceive how a Man who hated Business of all sorts, as  Bishop Burnet assures us he did, should be so forward to undertake, and so indefatigable in prosecuting, such great Designs. The Webs and Snares of  France extended to every Court in  Europe, and he could no where fix his Foot but he found himself in the midst of them; yet such was his Address and Resolution, that he made shift to break thro' all; and in  July this Year had the Satisfaction to see a Confederacy against that aspiring Power brought to some Degree of Perfection.

But as yet, alas! it was no more than Wax and Parchment; and tho' his  most Christian Majesty appear'd really offended at it, he was to little terrify'd, that he soon after gave out, That if in consequence of this Measure any Infraction should be made in the Truce, he would enter the  Lills singly against the whole Confederacy: That he would send one Army of forty-five thousand Men into  Germany, another of forty thousand into  Flanders, a third of thirty thousand into  Catalonia, a fourth of twenty thousand into  Italy; and that he would, besides, have a sufficient Fleet to make his Flag respected at Sea. On the other hand, the Spirit of the Confederates, he caus'd his Arms to be set up in three several Places, within Musket-shot of the Citadel of  Namur. This was done in open Day, the  Spanish Garrison looking on: And while the Governor-General of the  Netherlands made a shew of drawing down his Troops, as if to make Vengeance on the Aggressors, he sent a Courier with a Packet of Expostulations to  Paris, and Others to the several Powers of the League for Advice and Assistance, in case this Incident should bring on a Rupture: But they were all for deferring the evil Day as long as possible, and for submitting to any Compromise rather than rush into a War: And the  Spaniards, thus abandon'd, was oblig'd to cede two Villages in another District, to procure the Removal of those shocking Proofs of the Superiority of  France, that the Garrison of  Namur might be a little less expos'd to the like Insults for the future.

To account for this Tameness on the Side of the Confederates, we must consider, that the System was not quite complete; and that the Accession of yet other Powers was necessary to make the Balance even. Among these, no doubt,  England held the first Place; and possible it was the great Preliminary on which all the Negotiations at  Aulburg, &c. turn'd, that  England should first be made a Party before any direct Allotment was offer'd to  France. By fair means, it is natural to think, the Prince of  Orange was fully convinc'd, that this could never be effected; and as fully, that neither could it be effected by downright Force of Arms. If the Kingdom was not unaccessible, he had reason to think it was invincible: But then it appear'd no such difficult Task to get the better of the King. His Majesty had lost the Hearts of his People, and consequently was already more than half subdu'd. Whatever therefore might be the Dictate of Nature in Tenderness to an Uncle and Father, if Tenderness ever touches the Heart of a Politician, Policy whisper'd, That the way to Success was to side with the People against the King, and to obtain the Use of his Power by crowding into his Place. But then it was not easy, nor perhaps wholly safe to communicate these Sentiments of his to his Catholic Allies. To them his Majesty's Proceedings must appear not only innocent but laudable. They were almost as zealous for the Expiration of Heresy, as he. Their Choice must, therefore, have been to have assisted him in reconciling the  English to the See of  Rome, provided they could whiln have kindled an irreconcilable Quarrel between him and  France: And it may be presum'd, that they actually did, for a while at least, labour in earnest to carry both these Points, by endeavouring to establish a Confidence between his Majesty and his Nephew; which it is certain might have been done if his Highness would have given into the King's Measures, and thereby extinguish'd all his Hopes from the People. Even Bishop Burnet furnishes us with the following Passage:

Pen's Negotiations.

Pen the Quaker came over to Holland. He was a talking vain Man, who had been long in the King's Favour, he being the Vice-Admiral's Son. He had such an Opinion of his own Faculty of Persuading, that he thought none could stand before it: Tho' he was singular in that Opinion: For he had a tedious, lascivious Way, that was not apt to overcome a Man's Reason, tho' it might tire his Patience. He undertook to persuade the Prince to come into the King's Measures, and had two or three long Audiences of him upon that Subject: And he and I spent some Hours together on it. The Prince readily consented to a Toleration of Popery, as well as of the Dissenters, provided it were proposed and pass'd in Parliament: And he promised his Assistance, if there was need of it, to get it to pass. But for the Tests, he would enter into no Treaty about them. He said, it was a plain betraying the Security of the Protestant Religion, to give them up. Nothing was left unsaid, that might move him to agree to this in the way of Interest: The King would enter into an entire Confidence with him, and would put his best Friends in the chief Trusts. Pen undertook for this so positively, that he seem'd to believe it himself, or he was a great Proficient in the Art of Disimulation. Many suspected that he was a concealed Papist. It is certain, he was much with Father Petre, and was particularly trusted by the Earl of Sunderland. So, tho' he did not pretend any Commission for what he promised, yet we look'd on him as a Man employ'd. To all this the Prince answer'd, that no Man was more for Toleration in Principle than he was: He thought the Confidence was only subject to God: And as far as a general Toleration, even of Papists, would content the King, he would concur in it heartily: But he looked on the Tests as such a real Security, and indeed the only one, when the King was of another Religion, that he would join in no Councils with those that intended to repeal those Laws that enacted them. Pen said, the King would have all or nothing: But that, if this was once done, the King would secure the Toleration by a solemn and unalterable Law. To this the late Repeal of the Edict of Nantes, that was declared perpetual and irrevocable, furnish'd an Answer that admitted of no Reply. So Pen's Negotiation with the Prince had no Effect.

Rafinesque's

Now, if nothing was left unsaid, that might make the Prince to agree with his Majesty, in the way of Interest, it is scarce to be suppos'd, that his governing Passion to humble France was forgot, tho' it has left his Lordship: And if it was, we can't wonder that Pen's Negotiation had no Effect.

But the King was no Stranger to that governing Passion, and was not so ill a Politician as to expect Concessions to his own, without the Offer of an Equivalent; which the putting his Highness's best Friends into the chief Trusts could not be understood to come up to. It is moreover remarkable, that tho' the King, soon after his Accession, had renew'd the Alliances of the Crown with Spain and the States, he had avoided doing the same with France; and though his Ministers sign'd a Treaty with that Crown October 27, O. S. this present Year, it had Relation only to the Plantations; and in particular provided, that in case of a Rupture between the two Nations in Europe, the Peace should nevertheless be maintain'd in those Parts, inviolably on both Sides. Thus his Majesty artfully avoided the Unpopularity of entering into any other open Engagements with France, than for the Security of the Commerce of his Subjects; and, at the same time, left an Opening to the Prince and his Allies to conclude, that he might yet be induced to embark in their Cause: And that his Highness did not make use of it, must argue a Conviction, as above-mentioned, that the Catholic Interest in England was irreconcilable with his own; and that, by setting himself in opposition to it, he should in the End be Master.

This was the Posture of Things abroad, towards the Close of this Year, when the King was induc'd to take that desperate Resolution of sending the Earl of Castlemain his Ambassador Extraordinary to the Pope; with Instructions "To reconcile the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the Holy See, from which they had for more than an Age fallen off by Heresy." This was High Treason by Law, says Bishop Burnet, who adds, "Jeffrey was very uneasy in it; But the King's Power of Pardoning had been much argu'd in the Earl of Dandy's Case, and was believ'd to be one of the unquestionable Rights of the Crown. So he knew a safe Way of committing Crimes; which was to take out Pardons, as soon as he had done illegal things." The Pope then reigning was Innocent VI; who being of the Austrian Faction, and also deeply embroil'd with the French Court, and no Friend to the Jesuits, to whose Intrigues this Embassy was owing, was by no means pleas'd either with the Ambassador or his Mission; and gave him a Reception accordingly, of which more will be said in its proper Place.

Any Step of this kind, if known, it was easy to foresee would greatly exasperate the People: But this, as if calculated on purpose to drive them to Despair, was render'd as public as possible, by the Profusion of Expence laid out upon it, and the Pomp and Glitter it was attended with: Nay, so thoroughly was his Majesty insatuated thro' the whole Conduct of this Affair, that he caus'd A Relation of the Journey, Entrance, and Reception at Rome of his Excellency the Earl of Castlemain, his Majesty's Ambassador extraordinary to his Holiness, to be set forth by his own Printer, for the Edification of his Catholic tholic Subjects. In all things, indeed, which had relation to Religion, he now began to act, as if the Time was come, when he might safely give the Reins to his Will; and as if his People were only to tremble and obey.

His Majesty's Attempt on the
house.

Thus we find him (K.) willing and commanding the Governors of the Charter-house, by Letter dated December 17, to admit one Popbam into the first Penioner's Place that should become void, without tendering any Oath or Oaths, or requiring any Subscription, and notwithstanding any Statute, &c. This Letter was address'd to the said Governors; but, instead of presenting it to them, Popbam left it with the Register; who thereupon did not come to acquaint the Master, Dr. Thomas Burnet, with the Contents of it, but sent Popbam to him, to be admitted, with a (1) Certificate under his Hand, in the usual Form, as a thing of course; giving him, the Master, no Notice that the Party was a Papist, or that the King had dispens'd both with his taking the Oaths, and with his Religion.

The Master however ask'd him, where his Letter of Nomination was, and to whom it was directed? He said it was directed to the Governors of the Hospital, and he had left it in the Register's Hands: If it was directed to the Governors, reply'd the Master, it must be deliver'd to them, before I can act upon it: And so telling him when there would be a Meeting of the Governors, he dismiss'd him without Admission.

On the 17th of January following there was a full Assembly, Popbam attended, and his Suit became the Business of the Day. The King's Letter being read to the Governors, Jeffrey, who was one of them, all at once mov'd, That they should immediately, and without any Debate, proceed to vote, Whether Andrew Popbam should be admitted or no, according to the King's Letter? And 'twas put upon the Master, as Junior, to vote first. But the Master told them, he thought it was his Duty to acquaint their Lordships with the State and Constitution of the Hospital, before they proceeded to a Vote. This was oppos'd by some; but, after a little Debate, the Master was heard; who thereupon acquainted their Lordships, That to admit a Penioner into that Hospital, without taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Su-premacny, was not only contrary to the Constitutions of the House, but also to an Act of Parliament provided in that Case; namely, to the Charter-house-Act, 3 Car. In which it is declar'd and order'd in (m) express Terms, That no Penioner, Governor, Officer, nor Penioner, shall be admitted into this Hospital, till they have taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. When the Master had said this, one Governor answer'd, What is this to the Purpose? To whom the Duke of Ormond reply'd, He thought it was very much to the Purpose, for an Act of Parliament was not so slight a thing, but that it deserv'd to be consider'd. Hereupon, after some Discourse, the Question was put again, Whether Andrew Popbam should be admitted or no? And it was carried in the Negative.

The Governors also intended to have return'd an Answer in Writing forthwith to the King's Letter: But as soon as that Vote was pass'd, the Lord Chancellor flung away, and some others follow'd him; so that there was not a Number left to act as an Assembly, or to do any more Business at that time. The Archbishop of Canterbury attempted several times afterwards to have another Assembly, that this Letter might be written to the King; but could not get a full Number together, till Midsummer following: And while the Business was hanging thus, there happen'd an Accident, which 'twas thought would have put an end to the Controversy. Another Person, one Chadwell, appear'd with a Letter of Nomination from the King, of a Date antecedent to that of Popbam's, who was a Person qualify'd for the Place, as being a French Protestant naturaliz'd. This was taken for a soft Method, invented by the Court, to supersede Popbam's Letter, and so let the Controversy fall without Noise. But it prov'd otherwise; for when this Man's Pretensions came to be known at Court, the King sent another Letter to exclude him, and to reinforce his former Order for Popbam.

Both these Letters were under the Signet; and there wanted only a Broad-seal, that the Forces of the dispensing Power might be employ'd in this Attack against the Charter-house. At length a Broad-seal was sent; to complete and ratify this Dispensation for Popbam;

(4) In these Words.

JAMES II.

Right trusty and right well-beloved Cousins and Counsellors, and right trusty and well-beloved Counsellors and Trustees, We greet you well. Humble Suit having been made unto us, in behalf of Andrew Popbam, Gentleman, that in regard of his Loyalty and Sufferings, and the necessary Condition he is thereby reduced unto, we would bestow upon him the Place of one of our Penioners in the Hospital of the Charter-house; which Request we are graciously pleas'd to consent unto. Our Will and Pleasure therefore is, That you chuse and admit him the said Andrew Popbam into the first Penioner's Place in that, or a Hospital, that shall become void, and in our Disposal; next after such as shall thereby obtain'd our Letters for the like Places, if any such be; without tendering any Oath or Oaths unto the said Andrew Popbam, or requiring of him any Subscriptions, Reconventions, or other Aids or Acts in conformity to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, as the same is now established; and notwithstanding any Statute, Order, or Constitution of us, or in the said Hospital, with which we are graciously dispos'd to dispense in this behalf: To hold and enjoy the said Place, with all Profits, Perquisites, and Advantages thereunto belonging. And so we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 17th Day of December 1686, in the second Year of our Reign." [Relation of Proceedings at the Charter-house, Feb. 7.]

(5) Fit. "There are to certify, That Andrew Popbam is to be admitted a Penioner into the Hospital, upon the Nomination of the King's Majesty: And that his Place is now fallen."

20 Decemb. 1686.
W. L.
Reg'd.
(6) Fit. "And be it enacted and established, by the Authority aforesaid, That every Person that shall from henceforth be declar'd a Governor of the said Hospital shall, before he exercise the Place of a Governor, take the several Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.—And that the Preacher, Minister, Schoolmaster, Usher, Officers, and poor Men, and every of them, henceforth to be elected or admitted, shall, before he exercise or take Benefit of any such Place, take the said several Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance."

A. D. 1686. Popbam, and a Copy of it left with the Master, collated in his Presence with the Original. They brought also Witnesses along with them, to attest the Delivery and Collation, and so left it in the Master's Hand.

But on Examination it appear'd, that there was a great Mistake committed in these Letters Patents, and in a Part that requir'd the greatest Care. The Act of Parliament that should have been dispens'd with in behalf of Popbam, was 3 Caroli: Whereas the Patents refer to, and dispense with one in the third or fourth Year of King James. The Governors were made sensible of this, and might have rejected them under that Pretence, but they would not lay any Stress upon a Circumstance, when the Substance was faulty, and therefore took no notice of it. On the contrary they drew up an (H) Answer to his Majesty's Letters, containing a direct Refusal to comply with them, together with the Reasons on which that Refusal was founded, which was address'd to one of the Secretaries of State. And thus the Governors of the Hospital, who were Persons of the greatest Quality, nor only shew'd themselves faithful Trustees to Mr. Sutton upon this Occasion; but what was far more meritorious, they made use of it to set a Precedent of Resistance to that encroaching Power, which now bid fair to swallow all things; as sometimes a little Frontier-Garrison, well defended, gives a Check to a great Army, and a good Example to the rest of the Country, to stand stoutly upon their Defence.

But what the Governors thus highly gloried in, the King was as highly displeas'd with. Having read their Letter, he gave it to his Chancellor, with a Command, That he should find out away that he might have Right done him at that Hospital: And several Ways were accordingly talk'd of; such as the letting loose a Quo Warranto against the Corporation, the bringing the Governors before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, &c. But so high was their Rank, so eminent their Characters, and so popular their Cause, that the Matter was at last let fall, and his Majesty was insensibly reminded, That tho' the Prerogative when it had the Sanction of the Laws, was irresistible, it was a mere Nullity, when set in Opposition to them.

It was during this Transaction, that the Discourse prevail'd, that the Lord Treasurer and his Brother would be remov'd, to make Room for others who could be more rely'd upon: And the Matter of Fact soon verify'd the Report. It was resolv'd to begin with the Letter: And as the chief Government of Ireland is never dispos'd of but in Council, it was thought necessary to comply with the Form, tho' the Place was, in effect, dispos'd of already. Accordingly his Majesty declar'd his Purpose to recall the Earl of Rochester, and put the usual Question, Who was fit to succeed him? Several were nam'd, but none approv'd of. At last the King himself nam'd Tyrconnel, and was seconded by the Lord President: But tho' the Majority of the Council were Catholics, and Tyrconnel was so strongly recommended, the old Objections against him were reviv'd, and enforce'd with more Warmth than ever, insomuch that the Council broke up without coming to any Decision. The Person set up against Tyrconnel, was the Earl of Feraris, because, it seems, he was the least unpopular of the Party, and because next to a ductile Protestant, a moderate Papist was held best qualify'd for the Service. And thus the Affairs continu'd in Suspence, till Feraris himself was prevail'd upon by the Address of the Lord President and a Consideration of four thousand Pounds a Year out of the Profits, to drop his Pretensions: Upon which Lord Clarendon's Commission was superseeded, and Tyrconnel had both his Ambition and his Resentment gratify'd together: And that the Government of Ireland might be of a Piece, the Seals were taken from Perier, who had uniformly (e) sided with the Lord Lieutenant against Tyrconnel, agreeable to a Declaration he had made in Public, That he did not come over to serve a Turn, nor would he act against his Conscience, and bestow'd upon one Fitten, who was not only both a profess'd and zealous Papist, but notorious on Record.

Tyrconnel made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

(e) In their Words:

My Lords,

His Majesty's two Letters, the one dated the 25th of December last, and the other the 21st of March last, concerning your Lordship, came to our Hands: Wherby his Majesty requires us, that we admit Andrew Popbam to be a Professor in Sutton's Hospital, without rendering any Oath or Oaths unto the said Andrew Popbam, or requiring of him any Subscription, Recognition, or other Act or Acts in conformity to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, as the same is now established, and notwithstanding any Statute, Order, or Constitution, as or in the said Hospital, with all which his Majesty was pleas'd to dispense. Which Letters were received with the Respect that is due to whatsoever cometh from his Majesty. And it hath not been any Fault of ours, that an Answer hath not been sooner returned; several Addresses having been appointed in order to it; but there were not, at those times, so many Governors in or about the Town, in a Condition to attend, as would make up the Number directed by the Constitution. We could not till now acquaint your Lordship, that, upon Debate of the aforesaid Letters, it is agreed to represent, in the most humble Manner, to his Majesty, by your Lordship's Ministers, and through your Hands; that we apprehend ourselves to be tied up, and to be under such strict Obligations, that we are not at liberty to comply with what is required from us, for these Reasons:

For that the said Hospital is of a private Foundation: and the Governors oblig'd to act according to the Constitution of the same.

That by an Act of Parliament, made in the third Year of the Reign of King Charles, of blessed Memory, it is enacted, That every poor Man to be elected and admitted into the said Hospital shall, before he receive Benefits of any such Place, take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance.

Therefore we pray your Lordship to represent to his Majesty, that we conceive we cannot, with a faithful Discharge of our Trust, admit the said Andrew Popbam. This we pray your Lordship to represent to his Majesty, in the most humble Manner: Wherby you will extremely oblige,

W. Cecil, Orator, Hill-farce, Cranoe, Dunly,

Widdowells, H. Lawson, T. Burnett,

(*) Which remov'd him to Downpatrick, that as he Return to London he could not, without some Difficulty obtain the Favour of killing the King's Hand: And when he did obtain it, and made use of the Opportunity to express all Humility, why he had been so ord' (for he had not a considerable Letter by his Postment?) his Majesty reply'd: It was not his Fault: Popbam seem'd several times, since to Cecil, and stood in the King's Eye; but he never was inclin'd to speak to him, nor to take the least notice of him. Secret Council, p. 77.

Record for several Forgeries, and who knew, says Bishop Burnet, no other Law but the King's Pleasure.

The Lord Treasurer's Turn was next, who, according to the same Author, had great Regards shewn him, either by Way of Recom-pense for past Services, or to qualify his Dis-mission: For, over and above his Grant on Lord Grey, which had produc'd him 16000*l.* and another valu'd at 20000*l.* he had a Pension of 4000*l.* a Year for his own Use and his Son's. The Treasury was then in Commission, at the Head of which was plac'd Lord Belaffin, and under whom con-descended to serve, Sydney Lord Godolphin; another Circumstance which our Historian of his own Times has thought proper to forget. The other Commissioners were Lord Dever, Sir John Evelyn Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir Stephen Fox. But it does not appear that the Earl of Clarendon had any of these Regards shewn him: On the contrary, he had the Mortification put upon him, of being oblig'd to deliver up the Sword to Tyrconnel in Person (p); and at his Return to London was depriv'd of the Privy Seal, which had been held for him by De-putation during his Absence, and which was now bestow'd upon Lord Arundel of War-wick.

Thus the Papists and their sworn Auxiliaries were in full Possession of the Cabinet, of all the important Trusts of the Three Kingdoms, and of all the Powers ordinary and extraordinary of the Prerogative, in De-fiance of the Resolutions of the People, and in Contempt of the Fundamentals of the Constitution. The whole Party were ex-tremely lifted up with this flourishing State of their Affairs, as we learn by a Letter from a Jesuit at Liege, dated Feb. 2, 1686-7, to a Brother of his at Friburg, in which are to be found the following amazing Particulars:

"It is wonderful to see King James's great Affection to our Society. Upon Father John Keymer's Return into England, he gave him a most gracious Reception (while Earls and Dukes were commanded for some Hours to wait for Admittance) with whom, in the Queen's Presence, he discours'd with all Fa-miliarity. He ask'd him, How many Can-didates for Orders he had, and how many Students? And upon the Provincial's Answer to his Majesty, who was very urgent with him, That of the Former, and of the Latter, he had above fifty; he reply'd, There would be Occasion for double or treble that Number, to effect what he design'd for the Advancement of that Society; and order'd that they should be all exercis'd in the Art of Preaching, For now, says he, England has need of such.

I do not doubt but you have heard, that the King, writing to Father de la Chaise, the French King's Confessor, concerning the Affairs of the House among the Wal-letons, declar'd, That whatever was done to the English Fathers of that House, he would look upon as done to himself. Father Clare, Rector of the same House, being arriv'd at London to treat of that Matter, got an easy Access to the King, and as easily gain'd his Point. The King himself forbid him to kneel and kiss his Hand, according to Custom, saying, Reverend Father, you have indeed once kiss'd my Hand; but if I had known then, as I do now, that you were a Priest, I myself, would rather have kiss'd a dozen, Father, and kiss'd your Hand. After he had finish'd his Business, in a familiar Conversation, his Majesty told his Father, That he would either convert England, or dye a Martyr; and he had Father due the next Day and convert it, that reign twenty Years peacefully and happily, and not offend it. Finally he call'd himself, A Sox or true Socrry, of whose good Succes, he said, he was as glad as of his own. And it can scarcely be express'd how much Grati-tude he shew'd, when it was told him, That he was made Patriarck, by the most Reverend our Provincial, of all the Merits of the Society; out of which he is to nominate one for his Confessor; but hitherto it is not known who it will be: Some report that it will be the Reverend Father the Provincial; but still there is no Certainty of that. Many are of Opinion, that Father Edward R. Petre, who is chiefly in favour with the King, will obtain an Archbishopsric, but more believe it will be a Cardinal's Cap. To him has been granted, within this Month or two, all that Part of the Palace in which the King us'd to reside when he was Duke of York, where there is not a Day but you may see I know not how many Courtiers waiting to speak

(p) Upon which Occasion he thought proper to re-mind to his Society, "That the Misunderstanding and Feuds of that Kingdom were things much to be lamented, and he could wish the Occasion of them were remov'd, which was this, viz. That the English of that Kingdom had been represented as a Company of dissidied and fanatical People; that this was a hard Charge, if it were true; but from what he had learn'd, both by his own Observation, and the Information of others, he believ'd them to be as loyal Subjects, and generally as true Sons of the Church of England as any it has; That it is a Church that can make it her Range, thro' all the Conspiracies, Plots and Rebellions, that ever have been against the King; not one cri-minal Member of her Communion has been any way in them; That he propos'd himself to be of this Church, and consented to be examin'd hereupon that he was so; That as for the Protestants of that Kingdom in particular, he could say in their Favour, that when the Reformation of the King was oppos'd in England, they were the Men that us'd their inextinguishable Industry to effect it; That he design'd to tell this to the King, and hop'd by his Lordship's Presence these Communes and Assemblies, that had laid upon them, would be remov'd, and that as they and the Roman Catholics were the Subjects of one Prince, so they would unanimously agree in their Love of one another, and in promoting his Honour and Happiness. He clos'd his Speech with telling him, That as he receiv'd the Sword of France, so he deliver'd it in Peace. Tyrconnel's Answer was to this Effect: "That it was the King's Design, and consequently his Command to him, to govern that Kingdom according to the Law, without any Partiality; and therefore he declar'd, that all Men should enjoy the Exercise of their Religion and Properties, according to Law: That he knew there were great Fears in the Kingdom, some removing their Goods, some their Lives, others their Money; what the Reason of it was he could not imagine; but, for his own part, he would not have any distrust in the King's Proceedings: That the Lord Clarendon had hinted, that so Dissolution of Names ought to be encourag'd, or any thing else that might breed Jealousies among the King's Subjects; which he would make it his whole Business to bring about, for this was the Command of the King, who was both the greatest and justest Prince that ever rul'd these Kingdoms."

A. D. 1686-7. speak to his Eminence, for so they say he is call'd: For the King advises with him, and with many Catholic Lords, who have the chief Places in the Kingdom, to find a Method to propagate the Faith without Violence. Not long since some of these Lords objected to the King, That they thought he made too much Haste to establish the Faith. To whom he answer'd, I am growing old, and must take Large Steps; else, if I should happen to die, I might perhaps leave you in a worse Condition than I found you. When they ask'd him, Why then was he so little concern'd about the Conversion of his Daughters, who were the Heirs of the Kingdom? he answer'd, (9) God will take Care of that; leave the Conversion of my Daughters to me: Do you, by your Example, convert your Tenants and others to the Faith.

He has Catholic Lord Lieutenants in most Counties: And we shall shortly have Catholic Justices of the Peace in almost all Places. We hope also, that our Affairs will have good Success at Oxford. In the public Chapel of the Vice-Chancellor, who is a Catholic, there is always one of our Divines, who has converted some of the Students to the Faith. The Bishop of Oxford himself (Parlier) seems to be a great Favourer of the Catholic Faith; he propos'd to the Council, Whether it did not seem to be expedient, that at least one College should be granted to the Catholics at Oxford, that they might not be forc'd to study beyond Sea at such great Expences. But it is not known what Answer he had. The same Bishop, having invited two of our Brethren, together with some of the Nobility, drank the King's Health to a certain Heretic Lord who was in Company, wishing his Majesty good Success in all his Undertakings; adding also, That the Religion of the Protestants in England did not seem to him in a better Condition, than Buda was before it was taken; and that they were next to Atheists that defended that Faith. Many embrace the true Religion, and four of the most considerable Earls have lately made public Profession of it.

As to Prince George, it is yet uncertain what Religion he professes. We gradually begin to get Footing in England: We teach human Learning at Lincoln, Norwich and York; and at Worcester we have a public Chapel, protected by a Guard of the King's Soldiers; and we are to buy some Houses in the Town of Wigan and Lancashire.

There are many Houses bought in the Savoy, near Somerjet-house, which is the Queen Dowager's Palace, towards the erecting the first College in London, for about eighteen thousand Florins; and they are hard at work to bring them to the Form of a College, that a School may be open'd before Easter.

The Parliament will certainly sit in this Month of February, of whom his Majesty is resolv'd to ask three things? First, That by a general Act all the Catholic Peers may be admitted to sit in the Upper-House: Secondly, That the Tith may be abolished: And, Thirdly, which is the chief Point, That all Penal-Laws against Catholics should be abrogated. And that he may the better obtain these things, he designs to let them all know, That he is resolv'd to turn out all those who will not heartily act for the obtaining of them; and likewise dissolve the Parliament. At which Resolution some Heretics being terrify'd, came to a certain Earl to advise with him what might be done; to whom he answer'd, "The King's Mind is sufficiently known; what he has once said he will certainly perform: If you love yourselves, submit to the King's Pleasure. There is to be a great Preparation of War at London, and a Fleet of above an hundred Men of War is to be fitted out against the Spring, but against whom it is uncertain. The Dutch are under great Apprehensions; but for what Reason, altho' they are said to make an Armament, Time will best discover."

To prove the Genuineness of this Letter, (Palp. 711.) Bishop Burnet writes as follows: "The Jesuits at Friburg shew'd this about; and one of the Ministers on whom they were taking some Pains, and of whom they had some Hopes, had got a Sight of it; and he obtain'd Leave to take a Copy of it, pretending that he would make good Use of it. He sent a Copy of it to Heidegger, the famous Professor of Divinity at Zurich; and from him I had it. Other Copies of it were likewise sent both from Genova and Switzerland. One of these was sent to Dyckvelt, (while Minister from the States in England) who, upon that, told the King, That his Priests had other Designs (than his Majesty thought fit to treat of with his Nephew must be understood) and were full of those Hopes that gave Jealousies which could not be easily remov'd. And he nam'd the Lige Letter, and gave the King a Copy of it. He promis'd him he would read it, and he would soon see, whether it was an Impudence made to make them more odious or not. But he never spok of it to him afterwards. This Dyckvelt thought was a confessing that the Letter was no Forgery."

Of Dyckvelt and his Mission, we shall treat more at large when we make the next Transition to Foreign-Affairs. And in the mean while, it is necessary to observe, that the Lige Letter was sufficiently countenanc'd, as well by the Preferences bestow'd on the Catholics before spoken of, as by those other Measures which the King now us'd upon, in the Sight of all Europe: For in this very February when he suffer'd his Creatures to give out, That he would certainly meet his People in Parliament, in order to obtain their Sanction for what he ventur'd to do without it, he sent his Letter to the Privy Council of Scotland, authorizing and commanding them to set forth a Proclamation for the Ease of tender Consciences; Jo

(9) Bishop Burnet, in his Brief of this Letter, has not given this Passage fairly: For he says, p. 711. That one to convince the World of his Inclination to Moderation, &c. And in Obedience thereto, such a Proclamation was accordingly set forth, as argu'd, That he look'd upon himself as an absolute Monarch, and of course fully empower'd to deal by his Vassals as he pleas'd. "His Majesty, it said, being resolv'd, as far as in him lay, to unite the Hearts and Affections of his Subjects, to God in Religion, to him in Loyalty, and to their Neighbours in Christian Love and Charity, had therefore thought fit, by his Sovereign Authority, Prerogative Royal, and absolute Power, which all his Subjects were to obey WITHOUT RESERVE, to give and grant his Royal Toleration to Moderate Presbyterians, to meet in their private Meeting-Houses only (Field-Conventioniers were still to be prosecuted according to the utmost Severity of the Laws,) Quakers, to meet and exercise in their Form, in any Place or Places appointed for their Worship; and to Roman Catholics; for whom his Majesty was farther most graciously pleas'd to play the Advocate, by declaring, That the severe and cruel Laws made against them, were made under a Course of (r) Treasons, Factions, and Usurpations; and that his Majesty, of his own certain Knowledge and long Experience, knew the said Catholics to be good Christians and dutiful Subjects. "We do therefore, proceeds his Majesty, with the Consent of our Privy-Council, by our Sovereign Authority, Prerogative Royal, and Absolute Power, suspend, stop, and disable all Laws or Acts of Parliament, made or executed against any of our Roman Catholic Subjects, in any time past, to all Intents and Purposes, making void all Prohibitions therein mention'd, Fines or Penalties therein ordain'd to be inflicted: So that they shall in all Things be as free in all Respects as any of our Protestant Subjects whatsoever; not only to exercise their Religion, but to enjoy all Offices, Benefices and others which we shall think for to bestow upon them in all time coming,----- And whereas the Obedience of our Subjects is due to us by their Allegiance and our Sovereignty; and that no Law, Difference in Religion, or other Impediment whatsoever, can exempt the Subjects from their native Obligations to the Crown; and considering that some Oaths are capable of being wrested by Men of finistrous Intentions, a Practice in that Kingdom, as fatal to Religion as Loyalty; we therefore call, annual, and discharge all Oaths whatsoever, by which any of our Subjects are incapacitated from holding Places or Offices in our said Kingdom, discharging the same to be taken or given in any time coming, without our special Warrant and Consent; and we do stop, disable, and dispense with all Laws injoining the said Oaths, Tests, or any of them, &c." And finally he bestows a Ray of Comfort on the Episcopal Church in these Words: "For the Encouragement of our Protestant Bishops, and the Regular Clergy, and such as have hitherto liv'd orderly, we think fit to declare, That it never was our Principle, nor will we ever suffer Violence to be offer'd to any Man's Conscience, nor will we use Force or invincible Necessity against any Man on the Account of his Persuasion, nor the Protestant Religion; but will protect our Bishops and other Ministers, in their Functions, Rights and Properties, and all our Protestant Subjects, in the free Exercise of the Protestant Religion in their Churches."

Care was taken to publish this Masterpiece in the Stile-Royal in the London-Gazette, together with an Article from Edinburgh, signifying, that it was receiv'd there by the People with great Demonstrations of Joy; as also a Letter from the Scotts Privy-Council to his Majesty, declaring unanimously, "That they would maintain and assert his Royal Letter.

(r) Among other occasional Pieces compos'd at the Hague about this time, for the Good of the Cause, by Dr. Burnet, there is one, to be found in the State Tracts, Vol. II. temp. Car. II. intitl'd Reflections on his Majesty's Proclamations, in which are the following Passages:

"Another Foundation laid for repealing all Laws made against the Papists, is, that they were enacted in King James the Sixth's Minority; with some harsh Expressions that are not to be inflied on, since they were more the Heat of the Penmen, than the Dignity of the Prince in whose Name they are given out. But all these Laws were ratify'd over and over again by King James, when he came to be of full Age; and they have received many Confirmations by King Charles the First, and King Charles the Second, as well as by his present Majesty, when he represented his Brother in the Year 1685, and since he himself came to the Crown: So that whatsoever may be said concerning the first Foundation of those Laws, they have received now for the Course of a whole Hundred Years, that are lapid since King James was of full Age, to many Confirmations, that, if there is any thing certain in human Government, we might depend upon them: But this new-coined absolute Power, must carry all before it.

It is also well known, that the whole Settlement of the Church hady and Tibet, with many other things, and more particularly the Establishment of the Protestant Religion, was likewise enacted in King James's Minority, as well as those penal Laws; so that the Reason now made use of to amend the penal Laws, will serve full as well for another Act of this absolute Power, that shall abolish all those: And if Mixims that unshake all the Securities of human Society, and all that is sacred in Government, ought to be look'd on with the justest and deepest Prejudices possible, one is tempted to lose the Respect that is due to every thing that carries a Royal Stamp upon it, when he sees such Grounds made use of, as most shake all Settlements whatsoever; for if a Prescription of one hundred and twenty Years, and Confirmations reiterated over and over again these hundred Years past, do not purge some Defects in the first Formation of those Laws, what can make us secure? But this looks to be like a Fetch of the French Preceptive-law, both in their Proceeds with relation to the Edit of Nantes, and those concerning Dependencies at Metz, that this seems to be a Copy from that famous Original.

It were too much ill-nature to look into the History of the last Age, to examine on what Grounds those Characters of Pious and Blissful, given to the Memory of Queen Mary, are built; but since King James's Memory has the Character of Glorious given to it, if the Civility of the Fairer makes one unwilling to look into one, yet the other may be a little dwell'd on. The peculiar Glory that belongs to King James's Memory is, that he was a Prince of great Learning, and that he employ'd it chiefly in writing for his Religion: Of the Volume in Folio in which we have his Works, two Thirds are against the Church of Rome; one Part of them is a Commentary on the Revelation, proving that the Pope is Antichrist; another Part of them belong'd more naturally to his Poet-Dignity; which is the Warning that he gave to all the Princes and States of Europe, against the treasonable and bloody Doctrine of the Papacy. The first Ad he did when he came of Age was, to swear in Person, with all his Family, and afterwards with all his People of Scotland, a Covenant, containing an Enumeration of all the Points of Popery, and a most solemn Renunciation of them, (somewhat like our Parliament-Tell: His first Speech to the Parliament of England was copious on this Subject, and he left a Legacy of a With on each of his Potentates should go over to that Religion, which in Good-manners is suppress'd.

A.D. 1686-7.

Royal Prerogatives and Authority with the Hazard of their Lives and Fortunes: That they would do their utmost to render his Government easy to those whom he thought worthy of his Protection: That such of them as were or should be employ'd in Offices of Trust Civil or Military, were sufficiently secur'd by his Majesty's Authority and Commission for exercising the same. And, lastly, that they return'd his Majesty their most humble Thanks for giving them his Royal Word, that he would maintain the Church and Religion establish'd by Law, as being safely d'it was the best and greatest Security they could have.' This was sign'd at Whitehall by the Lord Chancellor Pertb, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Marquis of Atbol Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, the Duke of Gordon, the Marquis of Douglas, eight Earls, two Viscounts, two Lords, Lechbart Lord President of the Session, Dabrymple of Stair Lord Advocate, Faulis Lord Justice-Clerk, and five more; and in London by the two Secretaries of State the Earls of Murray and Melfort, and six other Earls. So that if the Countenance of his Majesty's Counsellors and Ministers, or of so large a Body of the Nobility, could reflect any Lustre on his Measures, they had all the gilding in their Power to bestow: And if on the other hand, it should be pronounc'd, That his Majesty's Measures were such as would admit of no Excuse or Palliation, then it follows, that all these Nobles, Ministers, and Counsellors were answerable to their Country for having contributed as far as in them lay to the Subversion of its Liberties and Laws. Bishop Burnet affirms, that such a Claim of absolute Power as was contain'd in this Proclamation, was an Invasion of all that was either legal or sacred: That the only Precedent that could be found of such an extraordinary Pretension, was in the Declaration which Philip the Second of Spain sent by the Duke of Alva into the Netherlands, and that in requiring the Obedience of his Subjects without Reserve, his Majesty went farther than even Philip himself.

But however high his Majesty was pleas'd to carry his Claims and Pretensions in public, it is certain that, in private, he had his Doubts and Fears: That he plac'd too great a Weight on so slight a Foundation; and that all would soon fall to Pieces again, unless he could procure the Consent of the Legislature to keep all fast; for, had he been thoroughly convinc'd that he had all Power in himself, and that his Subjects would yield him the implicit Obedience he requir'd of them, he would have been under no Necessity to temper any longer with the Members of both Houses, or to keep the People in continual Expectation of a Session; whereas the (1) Clauses, before spoken of, were not only continu'd, but the Judges had Orders in their several Circuits, to feel the Pulses of those who, departing of the Public, avoided coming up to London: And such Persons as perished in refusing to gratify the King, at the Expence of Honour and Conscience, were blotted out of his Favour, and dismiss'd from his Service. Among these, particular Mention is made of Admiral Herbert, the Chief Justice's Brother, who, tho' a profess'd Libertine in his Life and Manners, and a Man of vast Expence, chose rather to part with his Places of Vice Admiral, and Master of the Robes, rather than be number'd among the Enemies of his Country. That such a Man should have so much of the Patriot in him, was the Subject of much Admiration without Doors, and not a little disconcerted Matters within: For now the King began to be convinc'd, that since the Dole he had to administer was so unpalatable to so debauch'd a Taste, it would scarce be endur'd by those who already look'd on the Prescription with loathing. And yet so intimated was he, that he was resolv'd to force it down the Throats of the Nation notwithstanding: This render'd a further Prorogation indispensibly necessary. And, accordingly, March the 18th, his Majesty was pleas'd to declare in Council, that he had, for divers weighty Considerations, thought fit to prorogue the Parliament till November; and that, in the mean time, he had resolv'd to issue out a Declaration for a general

Charging of Members as in usual.

Parliament further prorogued.

[Ibid. p. 713.]

(1) The Manner of which is thus set forth by Sir Joh Ray:

'It is to be observ'd, that the Way of dealing with Men who propos'd any Bill to themselves in the Government, and especially the Members of both Houses of Parliament, that were in possession of Place, and near the King, was this: His Majesty took them aside, and told them, The Bill was made in the Height of Faction, not so much in prejudice to the Roman-Catholick, as in general, as to himself in particular, and to obviate his rightful Accession: That while that and the penal Laws remain'd in force, no good of their Persons could be felt: That it was against all municipal Law, for free-born Subjects to be excluded the Service of their Prince; or for a Prince to be restrain'd from employing such Subjects as he thought for his Service; and that therefore he hoped they would be loyal as not to refuse him their Voices for annulling such unreasonable Laws. Every Man that perished in a Refusal to comply with this Declaration was sure to be noted.'

The Time for the Meeting of the Parliament now drawing near, and several of the Members neglecting to repair to London, the King order'd the Judges in their several Circuits to feel the Pulses of the Men; in consequence of which I was, to my great Surprise, accus'd as Turb by the Judge, who told me, he had Orders to talk with me upon the subject. I ask'd him, if his Majesty had made particular mention of my Name? to which replying, That he had, only re-ceiv'd a general Order from the King, to sound the Inclinations of the several Gentlemen who sat in Parliament, and that he had had a particular Intimation from the Chancellor only, as to myself by Name, I desired them to consider of it, and the next Morning return'd for Answer, That I particularly a Denial would be construed into Disloyalty: That I had lately waited on the King, and given such Assurance of my Integrity, that I could not apprehend his Majesty could harbour any Doubt as to me, and the other said he had not been pleas'd to make use of my Name: That I should not counter my self oblig'd to declare myself to any body else; but that if his Majesty should think fit to say any thing to me further than he had already said, when I had the Honour of waiting on him, which I intended should be presently, I would in compliance my Loyalty, and my Conscience, as to give him all the Satisfaction in my Power. The Judge told me he would make Report of what I had said; and did not seem to be very forward in pressing a Compliance: He told his Orders, and he obey'd them. I desired that to be the most prudent Reply I could at this time make; for had I answer'd in the Affirmative, I might have intur'd the Displeasure and Censure of the greater Part of the Nation: If in the Negative, I should have utterly disoblig'd the King: A Caution his most necessary to be taken, as there was no Likelihood there would be any Meeting of Parliament, to control him in his Conduct.'

A. D. 1686-7. a general Liberty of Conscience to all Persons, of what Persuasion soever; which he was mov'd to do, by having observ'd, That tho' an Uniformity in religious Worship had been endeavour'd to be establish'd within this Kingdom, in the successive Reigns of four of his Predecessors, assisted by their respective Parliaments; yet it had prov'd altogether ineffectual. That the Restraint upon the Consciences of Dissenters, in order thereunto, had been very prejudicial to the Nation, as was fully experienc'd by the horrid Rebellion in the time of his Majesty's Father: That the many Penal Laws against Dissenters had rather increas'd than lessen'd the Number of them: And that nothing could more conduce to the Peace and Quiet of this Kingdom, and the Increase of the Number, as well as of the Trade of his Subjects, than an intire Liberty of Conscience; it having always been his Opinion, as most suitable to the Principles of Christianity, That no Man should be persecuted for Conscience sake; for he thought Conscience could not be forc'd; and that it could never be the true Interest of a King of England to endeavour to do it. And for a Cloie of all, he gave Directions to his Attorney and Solicitor-General, not to permit any Process to issue in his Name against any Dissenter whatsoever.

On the 21st following these Passages were set forth in the Gazette, by way of Preparative, and April 4, the Declaration itself made its Appearance; but in a Style far different from that of Scotland, tho' calculated to answer a like Purpose. It set out most laudably with asserting, That there was nothing which his Majesty so earnestly desir'd as to make his Subjects happy, and to unite them to himself by Inclination as well as Duty, and that this could only be done by granting them the free Exercise of their Religion, in Addition to the perfect Enjoyment of their Property, which had never been invaded by him since his Accession to the Crown, and which should ever be preserv'd to them during his Reign, as the truest Methods of their Peace, and his Glory. His Majesty then proceeds to say in Substance, That tho' he could not but heartily wish, that all his Subjects were Members of the Catholic Church: Yet he had always declar'd, That Conscience ought not to be constrain'd, nor People forc'd in Matters of mere Religion: That Force was contrary to the Interest of Government, and never obtain'd the End for which it was employ'd: That this was become manifest by the Experience of the four last Reigns; and that this shew'd the Necessity of his present Declaration, which, by virtue of his Royal Prerogative, he had thought fit to issue forth, and which he made no Doubt the two Houses would concur with him in, when he should think it convenient for them to meet. De-

A. D. 1687. sending then to Particulars, his Majesty in the first Place, declar'd, That he would protect the Archbishops, Bishops, &c. of the Church of England in the free Exercise of their Religion, AS BY LAW ESTABLISHED; and in the quiet Enjoyment of their Possessions, without any Molestation or Disturbance whatsoever. 2. That the Execution of all, and all manner of Penal Laws in Matters Ecclesiastical, should be immediately suspend- ed. 3. That he gave his free Leave to all his loving Subjects to serve God their own way, either in Public or Private, provided they took special Care that nothing was preach'd or taught among them tending to alienate the Hearts of the People from his Government. 4. That it was his Command that no Disturbance of any kind should be given to them, under Pain of his Displeasure, and of being proceeded against with the utmost Severity. 5. That it was his Royal Will and Pleasure, That the Oaths, commonly call'd, The Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, as also the several Tests and Declarations mention'd in the Acts of Parliament of the 25th and 30th of Charles II. should not for the future be requir'd to be taken by any Person, who was or should be employ'd in any Place of Trust: And that it was his further Pleasure and Intention, to grant his Royal Dispensations under the Great Seal to all Persons so employ'd, who should not take the said Oaths. 6. That he did thereby give his free Pardon to all Nonconformists, Recusants, and other his loving Subjects, for all Crimes and Things by them committed against the said Penal Laws: And that the Pardon so given should be as good and effectual to all Intents and Purposes, as if every Individual had been therein particularly nam'd, or had receiv'd particular Pardons under the great Seal. And lastly, That he would maintain his loving Subjects in all their Properties and Possessions, as well of Church and Abbey Lands, as any other.

With regard to the Reception of this motly Piece, in which the Expressions most worthy of the Father of his Country were made use of to colour over the worst Purposes, Bishop Burnet says, it gave great Offence to all true Patriots, as well as to the whole Church-Party: But an Author of that Party, tells us, with his usual Rancour and Bitterness, that what appear'd to the Churchmen a dangerous Storm, likely to prove fatal to their Laws and Religion, for that very Reason, appear'd the more like a refreshing Shower to the Dissenters: But he does not chuse to recollect, that those Churchmen had lived in a State of Hostility with the Dissenters, except for one short Period, when they apprehended the like Storm which had now burst over them, ever since the Restoration: That they had furnish'd them with The Exception it met with.

[Cavert, P. ii. P. 40.]

[*] There is in the Collection of Lord Somers in Almanac for this Year, call'd the CATHOLIC ALMANAC, printed by Hills, the King's Printer, for the Use of his Majesty's Household and Chapels, in which, after a List of the Popes from St. Peter, there is another of the Kings of England, from the most plausible Pretences to enter into a League with the Papists, by laying them under the same Penalties and Disabilities: That their prime Leaders had made it their Glory and their Boast, that they had enforced the Execution of the Penal Laws with the same Rigor against the one as the other: And that till this very Crisis, those Dissenters had been persecuted without Mercy: And this being the Truth of the Case, what could be more natural than for those who, for so many Years together, had groan'd under so heavy a Yoke, to overflow with Joy on finding it unexpectedly remov'd; and, in the sweet Remission of present Ease, to shut their Eyes on future Danger? Nay, had they seen without Concern that very Yoke transferred to the Necks of their Enemies, it was still but natural: For, whatever Christianity may teach, and Christians profess to believe, no Man feels himself injur'd by another, without feeling himself incens'd at the same time; and Anger is very apt to produce Revenge.

William the Norman to Henry VIII, and of the Archbishops of Canterbury, from Agilno to Reginald Pole: So that, by the King's own Authority, to the Prejudice of his own Ancestors, the Reader is left to conclude, that, after the Nation shook off the Pope's Supremacy, it had neither King nor Bishop.

But the Dissenters were both stimulated by Injuries, and courted by almost all the Blandishments the Crown could use: That very Bench of Middlesex Justices, who, in their Address on Keyling's Discovery, had been so severe on Dissenters and Conventicles, now interceded with the Earl of Craven, Castles-Retainer for that County, at their general Sessions, humbly to beseech his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleas'd to grant the same Dispensation from taking the Oaths, to the Protestant Justices, which he had granted to the Catholics. And to this Message his Majesty was most graciously pleas'd to answer, "That he took kindly the Confidence they plac'd in him; and that he would certainly take care of them." This however was no more than a Taste of his Majesty's gracious Intentions towards them; for we are farther told, that it was propos'd to all the several Sects, "That the King design'd the settling the Minds of the different Parties of the Nation, and the enriching it, by enacting a perpetual Law, that should be pass'd with such Solemnities as had accompany'd the Magna Charta; so that not only the Penal Laws should be for ever repeal'd, but that public Employments should be open'd to Men of all Persuasions indifferently, without any Tests or Restrictions whatever. And yet, if the same Authority is to be depended on, the most considerable among them were fully sensible, that the Court now paid to them was not owing to any real Kindness, or good Opinion, that his Majesty had entertain'd of or for them: That they need not be told, that the Notion of a general Toleration was propagat'd only to procure an Establishment for the Papists, who, when Time should serve, would not fail to complete their Project by a general Persecution: That they knew his Majesty's Displeasure against the Church-Party, and his Kindness to them, were too unnatural to last long: That therefore they resolv'd, not to behave so to the King as should oblige him to come to an Accommodation with their old Persecutors; nor, on the other hand, so to exalperate them, as would drive them into an Accommodation with the Court.

But these cool and moderate Notions of the most considerable among them did not obtain universally, as we shall find it acknowledg'd by the same Author: For no sooner was the Declaration made public, but Numbers of all Denominations were inclin'd to prostrate themselves before the Throne, with their Thanksgivings; in which they did their utmost to outflatter all the Flatterers who had gone before them, and of whom they had always spoken with Contempt and Loathing. The Amphibaptists led the Way; and, having premis'd how greatly they had suffer'd by the Penal Laws, and how sensible they were of their Deliverance from them, declar'd themselves firmly resolv'd, as in Conscience bound, to give such Proofs of their Duty to his Majesty, that he might never have occasion to repent of his Princely Favour towards them: To which they added certain Expressions of Confidence, that Almighty God, by pouring out his signal Blessings on his Majesty, his Royal Posterity, &c. would convince the whole World of the Wisdom and Truth of his Sentiment, That Conscience was not to be forced. They were followed by certain of his Majesty's Subjects, who, having been in Arms against him, ow'd their Lives to his Mercy, and who were now unable to contain their overflowing Thankfulness for his most gracious Declaration. On the Heels of these came several Ministers of the Gospel, commonly call'd Presbyterians, with their grateful Acknowledgments to God and the King, whose Princely Pity had rescued them from their Long-sufferings; and by the same Royal Act restor'd God to his Empire over the Conscience, &c. The Quakers then came forward, with their humble, open, and hearty Thanks to the King, for setting open their Prison-doors by this Act of Mercy; which, it seems, gave less Surprise to them than others, because some of them knew, that it was his declar'd Principle, before his Accession to the Throne of his Ancestors. Divers of the loyal Inhabitants of Wilmington were of Opinion, that his Majesty, in his late heating Declaration, had shewn himself the common Father of all his People, and that the Professions of Loyalty, which God had made their Duty, his Majesty had made their Interest to fulfil. Certain Persons, calling themselves of the Congregational Persuasion, declar'd in their Address, that his Majesty's Indulgence was founded upon Reasons most convictive from the Light of Nature and Christianity. The Grand Inquest for Towson, upon their bended Knees receive, with all the sense and all the Acknowledgments possible, his Majesty's Kingly Declaration; and pray, with the utmost Powers of their Souls, that as God had rais'd him up, as heretofore he did the great Cyrus, to redeem and to restore his People, so he would be pleas'd to make his Throne as easy and glorious, but more lasting. The Grand Jury and Justices of Middlesex, by Shower, their Chairman, who was knighted on the Occasion, pronounc'd, That

A. D. 1687; his Majesty had found out the best Means (by his Declaration) to preserve his Royal Person and Authority, and increase his Fame and Greatness, as well abroad as at home; and withal return his Majesty their hearty and sincere Thanks, for the great Care and Tenderness therein express'd to his Subjects of the CHURCH of ENGLAND. The Roman-Catholics in a Body, with the Lord Privy-Seal (Arundel), the (†) Marquis of Ponoi, the Lord Bellafse, and all the rest of their Nobility, at their Head, testify'd their Thankfulness to God and the King for so happy an Expedient for the Ease and Comfort of all his loving Subjects; call'd it the severest Part of their Misfortune, that they had been thought not to desire the least Ease to those that differ'd from them; express'd their Joy in the Universality of his Majesty's Royal Bounty, and that it flow'd from a Prince of their own Religion; as also their Belief, that his generous Resolutions were built on the truest Basis of Government, &c. Divers Dissenting-Inhabitants of London, calling themselves Merchants, Traders, and others, concluded, That God had rais'd up his Majesty, like Moses, to be the Deliverer of his People from the Yoke and Bondage of Penal Laws, a Slavery and Darkness, worse than that which punish'd Egypt. The Citizens of his Majesty's ever-loyal City of Bath, having first made good their Claim to that Title, by putting him in mind of the Stand they had made against Monmouth, and the Glory they had acquir'd by killing his Trumpeter, who summon'd them to surrender, offer'd up their due and hearty Thanks to his Majesty, for showing such Mercy and Goodness to his greatest Enemies; and declared, that if this should not cure their distracted Minds, they would hazard their Lives in defence of his most sacred Person. The Benchers and Barriers of the Middle-Temple, who, without the least Scruple, had charg'd the Bye-Conspiracy on desperate Persons of Jacobitical Principles, with for the Voice of Men and Angels to return sufficient Thanks to his Majesty, for his Condescension and Clemency to all his Subjects; among whom, those especially of the Profession of the Law, as they farther specify, had Reason to be thankful for the Honour he had conferr'd on them, by asserting his own Royal Prerogatives, which were the very Life of the Law, and of their Profession; which, as they were given by God, so they declar'd no Power on Earth could diminish, or separate from his Royal Person; and which, as they had study'd to know them, so they were resolv'd to defend them by asserting that DRIVE MAXIM, A Deo Rex, a Rege Lex. The Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple were clear, That so great a Blessing as his Majesty's Declaration of Indulgence could flow from none but the best and wisest of Princes, whose Royal Thoughts were wholly taken up how to make their Religion as free as their Property. The Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London prostrated themselves at his Majesty's Feet, with their most humble and thankful Acknowledgments for his having provided for the Union and Peace of all his Subjects, without Distinction; and conclude with offering up themselves, their Lives and Fortunes, to his Majesty's Service. And, lastly, (for it exceeds all Patience to particularize all the Varieties of Adulation, that flem'd up to the Throne from every Corner of the Kingdom, on this Occasion) Crow, Bishop of Durham, unanimously supported by his Dean and Chapter; Cartwright, Bishop of Chester, supported by his Dean and Prebendaries, and the rest of the Clergy of his Diocese; Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, supported by his Dean, Archdeacons, and Clergy; Wood, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, supported by his Clergy; Wilton, Bishop of St. David's, supported by his Clergy; and the Chapter of his Majesty's Collegiate Church of Rippon, join'd in the general Chorus of Thanksgiving, for the gracious Expressions in his Majesty's Declaration, of Kindness, Favour, &c. to the Church of England, tho' it was visible, says Barnet, that the Intent was to destroy the Church. But Mr. Echard endeavours to palliate the Matter, by saying, "These particular Addresses were so jejune and insipid, that they seem'd rather like the forced Thanks given by a corrected Child to a severe Parent that holds the Rod per him, than like the hearty and free Acknowledgments which flow from the Sense of real Favours." And farther, that "Parker, Bishop of Oxford, was not so successful as these other Court-Prelates; for, notwithstanding the uncommon Zeal he shew'd upon this Occasion, his Clergy still refus'd to sign an Address which might prove of so dangerous Consequence: Yet, to let the World know, that it was not out of a fullen Humour, or Disloyalty, that they deny'd to pay that Homage to his Majesty, they gave their Reasons in Writing to their Bishop."

But tho' the Addresses themselves were almost innumerable, we are told by the Bishop, last quoted, That few concurr'd in them, which appears so much the stranger, when we recollect, that in the very Paragraph preceding, his Lordship records, That many promis'd to endeavour that such Persons should be chosen to serve in Parliament [when a time of Choice should come] as should concur with the King in the enacting what he had now so graciously granted. The Truth is, that tho' Mr. Baxter, and others of the most conscientious and experienc'd Dissenters, did not fall in with the Views of the Court, nor countenance those Addresses, yet the Majority row'd with the Tide: And that they might redouble their Speed, we are farther told by the same Prelate, "That the King made the Cruelty of the Church of England the common Subject of his Discourte. He reproach'd them for setting on so often a violent violent Persecution of the Dissenters. He said, he had intended to have set on this Toleration sooner, but that he was restrain'd by some of them, who had treated with him, and had undertaken to shew Favour to those of his Religion, provided they might be still suffer'd to vex the Dissenters. He nam'd the Persons that had made those Propositions to him; in which he suffer'd much in his Honour: For as the Persons deny'd the whole thing, so the Freedom of Discourse in any such Treaty ought not to have been made Use of to defame them."

But to carry this farther, and to give a public and an odious Proof of the Rigour of the Ecclesiastical Courts, the King order'd an Inquiry to be made into all the vexatious Suits into which Dissenters had been brought in these Courts, and into all the Compositions that they had been forc'd to make to redeem themselves from further Trouble; which, as was said, would have brought a scandalous Discovery of all the ill Practices of those Courts: For the Use that many that belong'd to them had made of the Laws, with relation to the Dissenters, was, to draw Presents from such of them as could make them, threatening them witha Process in case they fail'd to do that; and upon their doing it leaving them at full Liberty to neglect the Laws as much as they pleas'd. It was hop'd at Court, that this Fury against the Church would have animated the Dissenters to turn upon the Clergy with some of that Fierceness, with which they themselves had been lately treated. Some few of the hotter of the Dissenters answer'd their Expectations. Angry Speeches and virulent Books were publish'd. Yet these were disown'd by the wiser Men among them. And the Clergy, by a general Agreement, made no Answer to them; so that the Matter was let fall, to the great Grief of the Popish Party.

Some foolish Men retain'd still their old Peevishness: But the far greater Part of the Clergy began to open their Eyes, and see how they had been engag'd by ill meaning Men, who were now laying off the Mask, into all the Fury that had been driven on for many Years by a Popish Party. And it was often said, that, if ever God should deliver them out of the present Distress, they would keep up their domestic Quarrels no more, which were so visibly and so artfully manag'd by our Enemies to make us devour one another, and so in the End to be consumed one of another. And when some of those who had been always moderate, told those who were putting on another Temper, that they would perhaps forget this as soon as the Danger was over, they promis'd the contrary very solemnly. Now the Bed-chamber and Drawing-room were as full of Stories to the Prejudice of the Clergy, as they were formerly to the Prejudice of the Dissenters. It was said, they had been loyal as long as the Court was in their Interests, and was venturing all on their Account; but as soon as this chang'd, they chang'd like wife.

It is proper in this Place to recollect the Prosecution of Mr. Baxter in the Beginning of this Reign, and in what Manner the Dissenters, in a Body, are treated in the first Memorial set forth in the Name of the Church of England, as also the specious Arguments therein us'd to make way for a Reconciliation with that of Rome, since nothing will better serve to illustrate the real Designs of the Court or to account for the sudden Alteration of their Steerage, and the shifting of their Sails.

The Church had certainly the first Offers, both public and private, and might have had tolerable Terms: And as this Firmness has, on the one hand, been the Subject of much pompous Panegyric, so the yielding of the Dissenters, on the other, has drawn upon them, as before observ'd, an equal Quantity of Invektive. How far either has been misplac'd, may be gather'd from these Considerations, That by taking shelter under the Prerogative, the Dissenters, for the present at least, were sure to be Gainers; and by departing from their Hold on the Laws, the Church was equally sure to be a Loser, as a great Genus of these Times afterwards undertook to demonstrate. Both Parties have interchangeably approach'd each other with being govern'd only by Interest and Lust of Dominion: And what is worse, have by their Conduct very sufficiently justify'd their mutual Accusations. Thus we find a notable Court-Advocate, who, at the Entrance of this Reign undertook to shew the Expediency and Necessity of granting the King his Revenue for Life, and who never lost an Opportunity of exposing and vilifying the Dissenters, boldly averring, "That plain Religion is not the Matter in question, nor Conscience the Motive of all these Frights and Apprehensions: Worldly Interest, says he, is the Spring that moves all the Wheels. And provided these Men of Zeal and Devotion could but secure in their own Hands all the Offices and Employments in the Kingdom, I am morally certain they would not much care what Mode of Religion should be in Fashion." And again, by another Author of a different Class, but in the same Service, it is said, "That there was a sort of Men in the Kingdom who no longer thought themselves happy than they were in a Capacity to destroy all those who durst not commit their Souls to their Conduct." The first of these Pieces is written in the Style, and printed in the Manner of Lettres, and the last, if it is not the Work of a Dissenter, at least came from a (2) Press that had ever been engag'd in their Quarrel: And yet the one is an avow'd (2) Attempt to justify the Dissent-

(2) Traveller.
(2) The Title of this remarkable Tract is, The Key's Dissolving Power explained and asserted: It is divided into three Sections: The first of which is to prove, That the

Dissolving Power is a Jewel inherent in the Crown: The second, to evince the Safety of taking out a Dissentation: The third, That the King's Exercise of his Dissolving-Power can never be injurious to Liberty of Conscience: And

ing Power, and the Favour throw thereby to Roman Catholics: And the other, tho' calculated on purpose to lead the Church-Party blind-fold into his Majesty's Measures, and to establish an implicit Dependence on his Royal Word and Promise, makes no Difficulty to (x) inculcate, That it was the Interest of neither Church nor State to make an outward Profession of the establish'd Religion a necessary Step to Preferment: And that the Church, in particular, can never suffer more by any thing, than by Occasional-Conformity.

But tho' it was not held expedient to enter into angry Expositions with the Dissenters at this Crisis, it was held necessary to make some Attempts to reclaim them; and even to solicit that Union which had before been rejected with Contempt and Disdain. This, immediately after the first Appearance of the Declaration for England, a Paper of Reflections upon it was let forth, not only to expose the general ill Consequences to be apprehended from it, but, in particular, to caution the Dissenters against being misled by it, into such Compliances as, in Exchange for a transient Interval of Relief and Indulgence, might endanger the whole Protestant Cause. It was in this Paper allow'd (y), That the Church of England had misbehav'd towards them: That they had been treated with too much Rigour; and that they had some Reason to rejoice in their Deliverance: But withal it was insinuated, that if with such Pretensions to Compassion and Favour in a better Time, they should so behave as to forfeit the Power of all in the Close sum'd up in these Words: "On the Whole it is clear,

I. That it belongs to the King's Prerogative to dispense with all those Penal Laws, that are a Grievance to the Subject, or derogate his Majesty's Authority.

A Prince had never a more fair Occasion to exercise the Dispensing Power than our King has, who by it hath saved the Nation from Ruin, and given that Ease to Conscience, which renders us the most contented People imaginable. For which Cause it cannot but surprise the Imperial and Usur'd, or, in short, those Gentlemen denying the Dispensing Power to belong to the King, that for many Years together have boldly assumed the sole Legislative Power to be in his Hand: Especially considering, that the Prerogative has been so well established by the Veneration of the Dissenters, that at this time especially, when exercis'd only for the Relief of the Oppress'd, which formerly it was not, that our High-Church men are for the Prerogative, if by the Help thereof they may establish their own Dominion and Overlord; but will be afraid it, if his Majesty exercises it for the Benefit of the Dissenter; which is a thing that cannot so soon be so foolishly insinuated to be for the Honour of the Protestant Religion.

II. That those to whom a Dispensation is given may, in obedience to the King's Command, lawfully enter on Places of Trust and Profit, in any thing in the Text-Laws notwithstanding.

For, besides assenting on a Consideration that both its Weight too, and that the Consideration must be at the King's Suit, by Indulgence or Information, before the Penalty be incurred, or the Person admitted by the said Act, in which his Majesty can at pleasure dispense, or pardon, and thereby secure his own Disgrace, altho' he had no Dispensation: I have from an Account of a Dispensation extract, that those dispens'd with do not transgress the Law, they incur no sin on the Faculty, and therefore are in no danger, especially considering, that very lately the judges here, in a judicial Way, determin'd it; for hereby, had the judges Resolution been contrary to Law, yet the Gentry, and others, who must govern Conscience by the judges Resolutions, can so hazard by trusting on Force of Time, with a View of some day's Act of Parliament: How much less, then, where the Cause, for many hundred Years together, has been clear!

The Relief of which is, That his much more safe for Dissenters to take a Dispensation, than contrary to their Conscience submit unto the Assent of Conscience &c. The Case is plain. Take a Dispensation, and you are no longer in this World, or that which is to come: But if you submit the Oath, or take the Sacrament according to the Oath of the Church of England, contrary to the plain and unalter'd Constitution of Conscience, you may be miserable here, and hereafter too.

III. That the King's exercising this Dispensing Power cannot in the least hinder the falling Liberty of Conscience on full just and equal Footings as to possession of the Power of Law: Being as it is by Prerogative.

Let the proceeding of any Bill, upon the account merely of his Conscience, be declared void, as, in such an Act, as is in the History, and that his Majesty thereby be render'd Incapable. (See of the Succession of Crowns, vol. 2. c. 22.)

It is his most reasonable Request, by way of Motion, in the House of Commons, that a Resolution may be made, that a Christian King, who is profess'd his Conscience before his Kingdom. (See King Charles's Fifth Speech, &c. c. 2.)

In their Words:

"The Nonconformists are now invited to set an Example (of obedience) to the rest: And they who have valued themselves hitherto upon their Opposition to Popery, and that have quarrell'd with the Church of England, for some small Approaches to it, in a few Ceremonies, are now solicited to rejoice, because the Laws that enforce us against it are all plac'd up; since they enjoy at present, and during Pleasure, Leave to meet together. It is usual for all Men to love to be set at ease, especially in the Matter of their Consciences; but it is wiser, that those who allow them this Favour do it with no other Design, than under pretence of a general Toleration, they may introduce a Religion which shall perform all equally. It is likewise apparent how much they are hated, and how much they are courted, when they are beloved by the Illustrious of those who now court them, and who have now no Game that is more profitable, than the engaging them and the Church of England into new Quarrels. And as for the Protestants now made to them, it cannot be supposed that they will be more loving than those that were made some time ago to the Church of England, who had such a better Title in Law, and greater Right upon the Crown, to assure them that they should be well us'd, than those can pretend to. The Nation has already forgiven some of the Church of England the Penitence into which they have fallen themselves to be coar'd; it though now they see Popery banish'd, the Saint that they have made, irreversible Opposition that they have given to it, is that which makes all their writings no longer what it was, and raises again the Glory of a Church that was not till this day by the Indifference and Weakness of those that were its set to believe and hope, and to suffer themselves to be made a Property to those who would make them a Sacrifice. The Sufferings that the Nonconformists, and the Party that the popish Party expected against them, had recommended them so much to the Compassion of the Nation, and had given them to put a Protestation of Favour on a better Time, that it will look like a Crime of God upon them, if a few Men, whom the Court has chosen to betray them, can have faith on all Indulgences upon them, as to make them throw away all that Merit, and their Compassions, which their Sufferings have procur'd them; and to go and court those who are so very friendly kind to them, that they may destroy both them and us. They must remember, that as the Church of England is the only Establishment, that our Religion has by Law, so it is the main Body of the Nation, and all the Sects are but small and struggling Parties. And if the Real Settlement of the Church is dissolved, and that Body is once broken, those lesser Bodies will be all at mercy; and it is an easy thing to believe what the Mystics of France say.

But tho' it must be confess'd, that the Nonconformists are full under some Temptations to receive every thing that gives them present Ease, with a little too much Repentance; since they are exposed to many Evil Laws, for which they have of late lost the Weight very heavily; and as they are often read some of them as illustrious than on other People, so it is no wonder if, upon the soft Serpents of the Declaration, they are a little oblig'd to see the Church of England, after all its Services and Submissions to the Court, so much courted by it; for that, taking all together, it will not be strange if they commit four Follies upon this Occasion. Yet, on the other hand, it falls all Imagination on the Church of England, especially their many Names, we know are so particularly burden'd in the point of Persecution, chiefly when it is serv'd against the Dissenters, rejoice at this Declaration, and make Address upon it. It is hard to think that they have assented to so high a Pitch of Christian Charity, as to thank those who do now desperately use them, and that as an Exhortation that within a little while they will persecute them! (See Tracts, they Car. II. vol. II. p. 291, 292.)

forfeit them all, it would look like the Curse of God upon them, &c. When this better Time was to come, or by whom, is left in utter Darkness; unless it should be thought, that a Ray of Light breaks in thorough that Passage, in which, tho' it is agreed, that Acts of Violence or Injustice committed in the executive Part of Government, did not warrant Resistance; it is also said, "That the total Subversion of a Government, which was imply'd in the placing the whole legislative Power in the single Person of the King, and which was so contrary to the Trust given to Princes, who ought to execute it, would put Men upon such uneasy and dangerous Enquiries, as would turn little to the Advantage of those who were driving Matters to such a doubtful and dangerous Issue."

But whatever Interpretation this Passage was capable of, or whenever this better Time might be expected, the Bulk of the Dissenters, as we have seen, were not willing to stay for it; but on the contrary rush'd into the Snare they were thus caution'd to avoid. This render'd a new Attempt necessary: Tho' stay'd they were not to be lost: They had not yet retraced in Form their old Principle of Resistance, and therefore might again be induc'd to stand forth in the first Files of Opposition, as before. Accordingly,

[State Trials, temp. Car. II. c. ii. p. 294.]

A Letter of Advice was address'd to them, in which it is again allow'd, That, fore as they were with their past Sufferings, and loaded as they had been with the Exclusion and Rebellion, it was no wonder that they ran to the nearest Remedy, without regarding Consequences. Two things were then submitted to their Consideration, viz. 1. The Cause they had to suspect their new Friends. 2. The Duty incumbent on them not to hazard the public Safety, neither by Desire of Ease or Revenge. Under the first they were told, That their new Friends did not make them their Choice but their Refuge: That they had made their first Courtship to the Church; and that when rejected there, they took up with them: That instead of intending any Favour, they only made Use of them as a Shelter for themselves: That an Alliance between Liberty and Infallibility was utterly impracticable: That as to the Agents or Mediators of this new Alliance, if it should appear that they were under Engagements to one Side, their Arguments to the other ought to be receiv'd accordingly: That if it should appear these Agents had formerly been empower'd to persuade by secular Arguments, in Consequence whereof, they had sprinkled Money among the Dissenting Ministers: And if they had still the same Powers, and us'd the same Means, it might be fairly urg'd, that they were rather purchas'd than convinc'd: That if it should appear there was at that very Instant a much closer Friendship between their new Allies and those who were so far from allowing Liberty, that they allow'd no Living to a Protestant among them, surely it must follow, That as soon as the present Turn was serv'd, the Stronger would devour the Weaker: That if the Consideration expected from them in Return for the Indulgence, should be the giving up their Right in the Laws, they would give more for it than it was worth: That, after returning Thanks for the Breach of one Law, they would have to Pretence left to complain of the Breach of the rest; and that if they set up a Power at one time to help them, which, by a Parity of Reason, might be made Use of to destroy them, they would deserve neither Relief nor Commiseration. Then with regard to the second Head, namely, Their Duty to the Public, they were farther told, That if an Address of Thanks imply'd Approbation, and precluded all future Complaints on the same Head, they ought to think that the Constitution of England was too valuable a thing to be complimented away: That for the same Reason that they were desirous to enjoy Liberty, they ought to be as desirous to preserve it: That therefore, they ought not to engage themselves beyond Retreat, nor in Politics any more than in Religion, rely on a Death-bed Repentance: That as to their Quarrel to the Church of England, they ought rather to take Warning by her Mistakes, than by treading in her Steps, to precipitate themselves into the like or worse Calamities: That if they blam'd the Prelates of that Church for retaining too long and too bitter a Remembrance of the rough Usage they had met with from the sectaries, when uppermost, they stood self-condemn'd, in sacrificing their Interest, like them, to their Revenge: That the common Danger had worn out all the Rigour of those who had kept them at such an uncharitable Distance, and turn'd a deaf Ear to their most reasonable Scriptures, had for ever extinguish'd that Haughtiness which had been shewn towards them, and turn'd the Spirit of Persecution into a Spirit of Peace, Charity, and Condescension: That this Change was not however so much the Effect of Necessity as Choice; for at that very Hour, in the midst of the Heat and Glare of Court Sunshine they were at present surrounded with, the Church of England could in a Moment gather Clouds against the Royal Thunder upon their Heads, or blow them off the Stage with a Breath, if she would give but a Smile or a kind Word: That it could not be said she was unprovok'd, since Books and Pamphlets came forth every Day, on purpose to kindle the Quarrel: That there was to reach Virtue in her Patience and Forbearance, that it was scandalous not to applaud it; and that with all her Faults she chose rather to bear the Weight of Power, than by criminal Compliances, get it remov'd.— Here follow'd a (ε) String of pathetic Arguments and Exp-

postulations, which could not fail of having the greatest Weight, not only with the Disfenters, but the Nation in general: And after them, for a Clofe of all, these other Particulars, which have so intimate a Relation to the Intrigues now on Foot, that our History would be scarce intelligible without them:

Besides all this, you act very unskillfully, against your visible Interest, if you throw away the Advantages, of which you can hardly fail in the next probable Revolution. Things tend naturally to what you would have, if you would let them alone, and not by an unteachable Activity lose the Influences of your good Star, which promiseth you every thing that is prosperous.

The Church of England, convinc'd of its Error in being severe to you; the Parliament, whenever it meeteth, sure to be gentle to you; the next Heir bred in the Country which you have so often quoted for a Pattern of Indulgence; a general Agreement of all thinking Men, that we must no more cut ourselves off from the Protestants abroad, but rather enlarge the Foundations upon which we are to build our Defences against the common Enemy; so that in truth, all things seem to conspire to give you Ease and Satisfaction, if by too much haste to anticipate your good Fortune, you do not destroy it.

The Protestants have but one Article of human Strength, to oppose the Power which is now against them; and that is, not to lose the Advantage of their Numbers, by being fo unwary as to let themselves be divided.

We all agree in our Duty to our Prince, our Objections to his Belief do not hinder us from seeing his Virtues; and our complying with his Religion, hath no Effect upon our Allegiance; we are not to be laugh'd out of our Passive Obedience, and the Doctrine of Non-resistance, tho' even those who perhaps own the best Part of their Security to that Principle, are apt to make a Jest of it.

So that if we give no Advantage by the fatal Mistake of misapplying our Anger, by the natural Course of things, this Danger will pass away like a Shower of Hail; fair Weather will succeed, as lowering as the Sky now looketh, and all by this plain and easy Receipt. Let us be still, quiet and undivided, firm at the same time to our Religion, our Loyalty, and our Laws; and so long as we continue this Method, it is next to impossible, that the Odds of two hundred to one should lose the Bet, except the Church of Rome, which hath been so long barren of Miracles, should now in her declining Age, be brought a-bed of one that would cut-off the best she can brag of in her Legend.

It is probable Burnet was the Author of the first of these Pieces; and it is certain the second was the Workmanship of that Master-hand, the Marquis of Hallifax: With what Views, and from what Motives, will best appear from a farther Prosecution of our Foreign Affairs.

In the Clofe of the last, or the Beginning of this Year, Skellon was recall'd from his Residence in Holland, and sent to France; and one (*) White an Irishman, who had serv'd as a Spy for France and Spain by Turns, was station'd at the Hague in his stead, under the Title of the Marquis d'Albeville, which had been bestow'd on him by the Court of Madrid, either as an Equivalent for Arrears of Pay, or in Acknowledgment of Services.

In February this Man had his first public Audience of the States, and therein declar'd, "That he had Orders to assure their Lordships of the Continuation of the King his Master's Friendship; and that he was resolv'd to observe inviolably the Treaties which he had renew'd with them, since his Accession to the Throne: That those Assurances ought to dissipate all the Apprehensions which they had too easily entertain'd from the Stories which had been maliciously spread abroad, with respect to his Majesty's Naval Preparations: And that in Truth those Preparations were made with no other Design than to enable his Majesty to keep the Peace, to give a more quiet, and full of Election, be satisfy'd if you are return'd.

Will you, as Parliament, justify the Dispensing-Power, with all its Consequences, and repeal the Test, by which you will make way for the repeal of all the Laws, that were made to preserve your Religion, and to smother others that shall destroy it?

Are you dispos'd to change the Liberty of Debate, into the Liberty of Obedience, and to be made Instruments to repeal or enact Laws, when the Roman Catholics are Lords of the Assembly?

Are you to flake with your new Friends, as to reject any Indulgence a Parliament shall offer you, if it shall not be to comprehend in it, against the Pope's In it?

Consider that you implied Conditions of your new Treaty are on left. Can that you are to do every thing you are desir'd, without examining it, and that, for this pretended Liberty of Conscience, your real Freedom is to be sacrificed? Your honest Friends long the Chain's Bill about you, you are let loose only upon a Bill, the first Act of Non-compliance hinders you to God again.

You may see that this Bill themselves do not rely upon the Impolicy of the Convent, when you were justify; since they being so very watch in yet it established by a Law, and the doing such very hard things, in order, as they think, to obtain it, it is a clear Evidence, that they do not think, that the single Power of the Crown is never to be a good Foundation; especially when this is done under a Prince so very tender of the Rights of Sovereignty, that he would think it a Diminution to his Prerogative, were he coöperate it through enough to go alone, to call in the legislative Help of Strength and Support it.

You have formerly nam'd the Church of England, and not without Reason, for going to her as they did in their Compliances; and yet as soon as they serv'd, you see they are too easily deserted, but reflected. Consider then from this Example, that you must never break off your Friendship, or resolve to have her hands in it. If they do not succeed in their Design, they will leave you first; if they do, you must either leave them, when it will be too late for your Safety, or else after the sequents of having at a Surplice, you will be forced to swallow Transubstantiation.

Remember that the other Day those of the Church of England were Witnesses, not enduring you, and now by a sudden Turn you are become the Witnesses, do not deceive your selves, it is not the Nature of living Points, or to hang up in a Night; you may look gay and green for a little time, but you want a Root to give you a Continuance. It is not so long since it to be forgotten, that the Maxim was, It is impossible for a Dispute not to be a Rebel's Cause at this time in France, even the new Convert were to be from being employ'd, that they are disarm'd. Their sudden Change makes them still to be distrustful, notwithstanding that they are reconcil'd: What are you to expect then from your dear Friends, to whom, wherever they shall think fit to show you will appear, you have in other times given their Arguments for their Recusal?

His private Negotiations with the Prince and Princess of Orange.
[Vol. V. p.
708.]

Peace, and provide for the Defence, of his Kingdoms.

This was the Substance of his public Professions: And with respect to his private Negotiations with the Prince and Princess of Orange, our Historian of his own Times (who, by the way, is explicit, that by the particular Direction of his Highness, he was let into the whole Secret of the English Affairs) assures us, That before the Marquis enter'd on Business with either of them, he exacted a Promise from both, that they would not only forbid him (the Doctor) the Court, but that they would never see him more: And that this Preliminary being granted, he open'd his Commission with very positive Assurances, That the King had no Intention to injure them in their Right of Succession; and that the whole of his Design was to assert the Rights of the Crown, which they, in their Turn would reap the Benefit of. After which he proceeded to the old Point of the Repeal of the Test and Penal Laws; which he said, The King was resolv'd on; the first, because they were a Restraint on his own Liberty; and the second, for the Sake of those of his own Religion, who had serv'd him well, and who had suffer'd only on his Account, and for Conscience sake. The great Point of all, as in Pen's Negotiation, was to engage their Highnesses to cooperate; but on what Motives, or for what Consideration, is still left an impenetrable Secret; unless we can suppose, that the Pleasure of hearing Mr. d'Albeville speak of the most Christian King as a poor Bigot, who acted implicitly according to the Injunctions of the Archbishop of Paris, and Madame de Maintenon; and declare, that his Majesty despid'd him for it, came up to the Height of the Prince's Expectations from the King his Father-in-law.

Before the Arrival of Albeville at the Hague, a Resolution had been taken to send Mr. Dyckvelt, before mention'd, to England, with Directions, says our Right Reverend Historian, how to talk to all Sorts of People, to the King, to the Church, and to the Dissenters: And, notwithstanding Albeville's Arrival, he did set out accordingly. "I, continues the Bishop, was order'd to draw his Instructions, which he follow'd very closely. He was order'd to expostulate decently, but firmly, with the King upon the Methods he was pursuing, both at home and abroad; and to see, if it was possible to bring him to a better Understanding with the Prince. He was also to assure all the Church Party, that the Prince would ever be firm to the Church of England, and to all our National Interests. The Clergy, by the Methods in which they corresponded with him, which I suppose was chiefly by the Bishop of London's Means, had desir'd him to use all his Credit with the Dissenters, to keep them from going into the Measures of the Court; and sent over very positive Assurances, That, in case they stood firm now to the common Interest, they would in a BETTER TIME come into a Comprehension of such as could be brought into a Conjunction with the Church, and to a Toleration of the rest.

They had also desir'd him to send over some of the Preachers, whom the Violence of the former Years had driven to Holland; and to prevail effectually with them to oppose any false Brethren, whom the Court might gain to deceive the rest; which the Prince had done. And to many of them he gave such Presents, as enabled them to pay their Debts, and to undertake the Journey. Dyckvelt had Orders to press them all to stand off; and not to be drawn in by any Promises the Court might make them, to assist them in the Election of Parliament. He was also instructed to assure them of a full Toleration; and likewise of a Comprehension, if possible, whicsoever the Crown should devolve on the Princes. He was to try all sorts of People, and to remove the ill Characters that had been given them of the Prince; for the Church Party was made believe, he was a Presbyterian, and the Dissenters were possess'd with a Conceit of his being arbitrary and impetuous. Some had even the Impudence to give out, that he was a Papist. But the ill Terms in which the King and he liv'd put an End to their Reports at that time.

Here we have not only Evidence, that the Phrase better Time was already current on both sides of the Water, but a Hint, That foreign Affairs made a Part of the Subject-Matter of Treaty between the King and his Highness; as also Proof that a Disposition was making to take such Advantage of the present National Ferment as should hasten that better Time.

It is moreover observable, that about the same time that Dyckvelt receiv'd these Instructions at the Hague, there arriv'd at London an Envoy Extraordinary from the Emperor, who could have no other Business, than to mediate between the King and the Prince, that the great Purpose of the Empire might be answer'd, of engaging England in the League against France: And that the Count de Castellanaga, Governor of the Netherlands, and Don Pedro de Remonillo the Spanish Ambassador, left no Expedient untry'd to enforce the same thing: Nay, the latter, according to Father Orleans, went so far as to promise the King, That if he would come to a Breach with his most Christian Majesty, his Parliament should ratify all he had done for the Establishment of Religion. But 'tis equally incredible that Don Pedro should make any such extravagant Offer, or that the King should place any Confidence in it, if he had. The Prince of Orange was apparently the only Person who could take upon him to answer for any parliamentary Measure. A Treaty on that very Subject was then actually depending; and his Answers in Person to Albeville at the Hague, and by Dyckvelt to his Majesty in England, went no farther than what he had before declar'd, to Pen, viz. That he would willingly agree to the Abolition of the Penal Laws, but not of the Test. The King, on the other hand, was to the full as resolute to admit of no Compromise, as the Prince to make no farther ther Concession. He said to Dyckvelt, I am the Head of the Family, and the Prince ought to comply with me, whereas he hath always set himself against me. Dyckvelt reply'd, That the Prince could not carry his Compliance so far, as to give up his Religion to his Pleasure; but that in all things else he had shewn a ready Submission to it, as had appear'd by his Conduct in relation to the Outrages committed by the French in his Principality of Orange, in Violation of the Treaty of Nimwegen, of which his Majesty was Guarantee. As the King had not thought proper to interpose in his Behalf, he had not troubled him with Remonstrances on that Account, which was a sufficient Proof, that he chose to sacrifice his own Concerns, rather than disturb the King's. The King could not be sensible of the Reproach that was cou'd under this Plea of Religion; And, either thro' Conscience, or Displeasure, made no Answer. Upon which Lord Sunderland, and the rest of the Cabinet took up the Dispute, and press'd Dyckvelt with all the Arguments and Inducements they could think of, to prevail with the Prince to concur with his Majesty. In particular, offering and engaging, That on that Condition the King would enter into close Measures with him against France.

The King offers to give up the Prince, in case the Prince would consent to the Royal of the Test.

Thus, in Effect, is the Story told by Burquet, agreeable to the Lights he had receiv'd from Dyckvelt; And, in perfect as it is, we learn from it, that the Line of the Treaty was at last put on the governing Passions of both Sides; and that Hopes were entertain'd of a Public Agreement on the Basis of mutual Gratifications, tho' without Effect. For, according to the same Right Reverend Author, neither Dyckvelt nor the Prince would be much as listen even to his own Favourite Measure, on such disadvantageous Terms. But if such an Offer was made, it can scarce be suppos'd that the Ministers of the Emperor and Spain were not made acquainted with it; and if they were, it is next to impossible, that they should not engage their respective Courts to use their utmost Influences with his Highness to accept it: For whatever particular Scruples he had in relation to the giving up of the Test, they could have none. On the contrary, whoever had a Tendency to further the Catholic Cause, figur'd as perfectly with their Principles in Spiritual, as a Breach with France did with their Interest in secular Concerns. It follow'd, therefore, that they must grow as importunate with the Prince to comply with his Majesty in the Point of Religion, as they had been before with his Majesty to comply with the Prince in Reference to France. And either we must suppose that his Highness relinquish'd and overcame those Impugnances, for the sake of the Protestant Religion and his peculiar Concern for the Church of England, or else that he had Reason to think there was no Sincerity in his Majesty's Offer, and that the Snare was laid for him, only to run him with his Party in England. Posterity will conclude of his Motives, as they see Cause from his Actions. But it is certain he did hold out with equal Steadiness both against the King and his own Allies. In Consequence of which, Dyckvelt's Negotiations here, and Abbeville's at the Hague, became fruitless: And his Majesty, in plain Terms, inform'd the Spanish Minister, "That he would inevitably observe the Alliance he had renew'd with his Master; but the same Justice oblig'd him also not to break thro' his Friendship with his Kinsman, the late Christian King, who was desirous to live in Peace with his Neighbours, and to preserve it among them as he could."

But, says our Historian of his own Times, [P. 1. p. 712.] if he, Dyckvelt's, treating with the King was without Success, his Management of his Instructions was more prosperous. He desir'd, that those who wish'd well to their Religion and their Country would meet together, and concert joint Advice, and Advertisements, as might be fit for the Prince to know, that he might govern himself by them. The Marquis of Hallifax, and the Earls of Sherburne, Derbyshire, Dart, and Nottingham; the Lords Mordaunt, and Lansy; Herbert, and Ruffel, among the Admirals, and the Bishop of London, were the Persons chiefly trusted. And upon the Advice that were sent over by them, the Prince govern'd all his Motions. They met often at the Earl of Sherburne's: And there they concert'd Matters, and drew the Declaration on which they advis'd the Prince to engage.

It is no uncommon Thing for Statesmen to look one Way and row another: And yet there is scarce any Circumstance of this Reign more worthy of Remark, than the inconsistent Parts now act'd by two such eminent Men as the Marquis of Hallifax and the Earl of Sunderland; and the inconsistent Behaviour of his Majesty towards them. The Latter, who had gone warmly into the Exclusion, under a seeming Conviction of the many Evils likely to befall the Public under the Reign of a Catholic King, and who was now the Oracle of the Cabinet, labour'd with all his Might to introduce those very Evils, if not to entail them on Posterity. The Marquis, on the contrary, who had been indefatigable to shew, that the Exclusion alone was a greater Evil, than all those put together; and yet was now out of Place and Favour, for that Reason probably, took as much Pains to convince the World, that his former Triumph was but a lucky Mistake, and rather owing to the Superiority of his Parts, than the Goodness of his Cause. It is true, he talk'd in his Letter to the Dissenters, against being laugh'd out of his Non-resistance and Passive-obedience-Principles: But 'tis certain from these Meetings and Measures, and his Concern in them, he could not help foretelling the most probable Revolution, he speaks of, nor being conscious, that his own Intrigues had a Tendency to hasten it.

The account of our Behaviour of the Lords Hallifax and Sunderland.

Dyckvelt took his leave of Whitehall towards the latter-end of May; and scarce was he return'd to the Hague, before Abbeville presented a Memorial to the States, importing, That the King his Master was greatly surpris'd at the Arrival of his Officers

cers (a) in England; and at the Complaints they laid before him of such long Imprisonment and such severe Usages might well be thought an Outrage to him, and what he might reasonably demand Satisfaction for: That according to these Complaints, it farther appear'd, their High and Mighty Lordships had not distinguish'd between the Innocent and the Guilty; and that as it was manifest, the greatest Part of them had not infring'd the Laws of the Republic, so he hop'd, that, as well in Consideration of their Innocence, as of his Majesty's Interposition in their Favour, their Lordships would recall those Officers, and re-establish them in their respective Posts.

Tho' the States were sufficiently appriz'd that Dybech had left the Court of England with no very favourable Disposition towards them, and a Complaint of this frivolous nature might have justify'd a sroward Answer, their Lordships thought it for their Interest as yet to smother their Resentment, and to use more Honey than Gall. Accordingly, in their Reply, they set forth, That the Officers were indeed culpable of what was laid to their Charge: That if they had been thrown into Prison, it was no more than the Laws requir'd: That while there, they had been left to the usual Forms, the States having never interpos'd in the Prosecution neither directly nor indirectly: That, instead of being ill treated during that time, they had themselves at their Departure thank'd the Commissary for the Favour he had shew'd them: That it was absolutely impossible to discharge them of the Accusation lodg'd against them: That his Majesty was too great a Lover of Justice to insist, that such Actions should pass unpunish'd, because committed by Foreigners: That if such was to be the Case, no Sovereign could either protect his Subjects, or secure himself from the Infracts of Sojourners: That the particular Crime of these Officers, was aggravated by the Consideration, that they were in the Pay of the Republic; and that they had taken the Oath of Fidelity, by which they became jully liable to be treated as Subjects: That if they were not permitted to chastise Offenders, because Aliens, it might be fatal to their Government to have any such Aliens in their Service: That, in Compliment to his Majesty, they had chose to overlook the Heinousness of the Crime, and had made him Judge in his own Cause, in the full Assurance that he would never think of putting them to the Pain of conniving any farther at such an Outrage: That in truth they had made no Distinction among them; but then it was because no one of them appear'd wholly innocent, or even attempted to purge himself from having had any Concern in the Affair: That for all these Reasons they still hop'd his Majesty would desist from his Demand on the Behalf of those Offenders; or if not, all they could further say, was, that if there was any one among them, who thought so well of his Case as to submit it to the Decision of a Court-Martial, and who should be acquitted by them, he should be instantly reinstated in his Employ.

This was fair as well as firm; but when Men are in Pursuit of a Quarrel, they can no otherwise be satisfy'd than by finding one. Thus before June was at an End, the Affair of Bantam was not only reviv'd, but in a higher Tone than ever. Mr. d'Alberville, in his Memorial, gave their Lordships to understand, that he had express Orders from the King his Master, to put them in mind of the vast Losses, atrocious Injuries, and shocking Indignities which his Subjects in those Parts had suffer'd by the surprizing, unjust, and iniquitous Proceedings of the Dutch East-India Company. This was follow'd by another Remonstrance in the same bitter Style, in relation to a new Treason committed on the Subjects of England, by the said Company, who, under the Pretence of taking Satisfaction for a large Debt, due to them from the Inhabitants of Majapapan on the Coast of Cocanahel, had seiz'd on the Place, and expel'd such English Factors, &c. as they had found resident there: And this again by a fourth, demanding that (b) Dr. Barnet (whose occasional Wranglings, at this Crisis, had

(a) Those who had assist'd Stables in his Attempt on his Father's Paper.

(b) Let us hear the Doctor tell his own Story: "My Commission at the Hague, says he, made him (the King) conclude, that I was an intriguing Delinquent myself. And some Papers in single Sheets came out, reflecting on the Proceedings of England, which seem'd to have a considerable Effect on those who read them. These were printed in Middleburg. And many Copies of them were sent into all the Parts of England. All which influenced the King the more against me; for he believed they were writ by me, as he did most of them words. But that which gave the Crisis to the King's Anger was, that he heard I was to be married to a considerable Fortune at the Hague. So a Project was form'd to break this, by charging me with High-Treason for corresponding with Lord Albion, and for conversing with some that were outlaw'd for High-Treason."

The King order'd a Letter to be writ in his Name to his Advocate in Switzerland, who professes one the same possible thing or other, which was intended only to make a Noise, not doubting but this would break the intended Marriage. A Ship coming from Switzerland the Day in which this Publication was order'd, that had a quick Passage, brought me the full News of it, long before it was sent to D'Alberville. So I petitioned the States, who were then sitting, to be naturalized in order to my intended Marriage: And this pass'd in course, without the least Difficulty; which perhaps might have been made, if his Majesty's name longer in Switzerland, had been known. Now I was oblig'd under the Protection of the Spirit of Bullion. Yet I was a full justification of myself, as to all Particulars laid to my Charge, in some Letters that I sent to the Earl of Middleburg. But in one of these I said, that, being now committed in Holland, my Allegiance was, during my Stay in these Parts, transfer'd from his Majesty to the States. This I said, in another Letter, that, if upon my Non-appearance Sentence should pass against me, I might be perhaps forc'd to justify myself, and give an Account of the same that I had in all six or seven twenty Years past. In which I might be oblig'd to mention some things, that I was afraid would displeas'd the King: And therefore I should be sorry, if I were driven to it.

Now the Court thought they had somewhat against me: For they knew they had nothing before. So the Earl's Citation was set fall, and a new one was order'd on these two Accounts: It was intended to be High-Treason, to buy my Allegiance was now transfer'd. And it was set forth as a high Indignity to the King, to threaten him with writing a History of the Transactions past these last twenty Years. The fall of these struck at a great Point, which was a Part of the Law of Nations. Every Man that was naturaliz'd took an Oath of Allegiance to the Prince or State that naturaliz'd him. And, since no Man can serve two Masters, or be su-had render'd him more obnoxious than ever) might be deliver'd up to the Justice of the King his Master, tho' now become a naturaliz'd Subject of Holland, and consequently intitled to the Protection of the Republic. But against all these several Attacks the States stood their Ground as against the first; that is to say, they appeal'd to the Letter of the Treaties subsisting between the two States in answer to some things: They return'd Compliments and fair Words in answer to others: And upon the whole, they shew'd a Determination to give no farther Satisfaction, than those Treaties authoriz'd his Majesty to demand, and was consistent with their own Honour and Independency to allow. This Stiffness put the Court of Whitehall to a stand: And to gain time for farther Expedients, Mr. d'Albeville quitted the Hague and return'd to England; where he continu'd till the Beginning of the following Year.

What particular Concert was, all this while, kept up between his Majesty and his most Christian Brother of France, is rather to be conjectur'd by Circumstances, and glean'd up from the partial Representations of Party-Writers, than drawn from such authentic Papers as will not admit of Doubt or Controversy. What has been already mention'd from Father Orleans, concerning the King's refusing to break with so sure a Friend as France, in favour of Spain, is sufficient to shew, that the two Monarchs were then, at least, as closely united as ever. But if what Bishop Burnet writes concerning Lord Costerman's Negotiations at Rome may be depended on, it must be concluded, that the same Union subsisted long before that Declaration was made, and that both Parties look'd upon their Interests as inseparable.

When that Lord came to Rome, the Pope, who from his first Elevation to the Chair of St. Peter, had sided with the House of Austria against the House of Bourbon, was in the height of his Quarrel with his (e) eldest Son about the (d) Franchises, which the Emperor and all the other Sovereigns of Europe had given up to his Holiness: France alone stood out; and great and terrible as her Monarch was become, Innocent was resolv'd to carry his Point against him, or dye a Martyr to the Rights of the Popedom. Accordingly, the Duke d'Esprez, the French Ambassador at Rome, dying there in the Beginning of the Year, his Holiness laid hold on that Opportunity to issue a Proclamation, importing, That there was no longer any French Quarter, and that all Exemptions and Privileges under that Pretence, were at an end. At the same time, however, to qualify this notable Step, as well as he could, he caus'd his Nuncio at Paris, Cardinal Rinuccio, to lay before his most Christian Majesty the Grounds and Reasons of this Proceeding, and to request, that, after the Example of all the other Potentates of Europe, not excepting Queen Christina of Sweden, who had in Person submitted to this Regulation, he also would give way to it, &c. But whatever Extravagance of Zeal the eldest Son of the Church had shewn, in his endeavouring to extirpate Heresy, his Bigotry now gave way to his Pride, and he answer'd fiercely, "That his Crown had never been us'd to follow the Prescriptions of any other; but had, on the contrary, ever been the Example which other Crowns had been proud to follow: That he was resolv'd to maintain his Rights to a Scruple: That he would send another Ambassador to continue the Respects which were due to his Holiness; in a full Persuasion, that no-body would presume to intrench on his Franchises, which were an ancient Appendage to his Crown, and which he would never suffer it to be depriv'd of, as long as it continu'd on his Head." His Holiness, on the other hand, was as tenacious of the Rights of St. Peter as his Majesty could be of those of St. Lewis, and perceiving his Resolution of suppressing the Franchises, at all Hazards and Events. Accordingly, he issu'd a Bull to that Purpose, in Confirmation of those of Sixtus V. and such other Pontiffs as had us'd to tread in his Steps: And to shew how much in earnest he was to go thro' with what he had undertook, he added a thundering Clause, to the following Effect, That whoever for the future, either Ecclesiastic or Secular, should pretend to have, or to defend, a Right to Franchises, vulgarly call'd Quarters, or should presume, directly or indirectly, to disturb the Officers of Justice in the Execution of their Orders, with respect to the said Quarters, should peremptorily incur all the Pains and Penalties of the greater Excommunication.

This was the great Concern at Rome during Lord Costerman's Residence there, and what our Historian of his own Times writes concerning the Part he took in it, is as follows: "The Ambassador at Rome press'd Cardinal Cibo much to put an end to the Difference between the Pope and the King of France, in the Matter of the Franchises, that it might appear, that the Pope had a due Regard to a King that had extirpated Heresy, and to another King who was endeavouring to bring other Kingdoms into the Sheepfold. What must the World say, if der a double Allegiance, it is certain, that there must be a Transfer of Allegiance, at least during the Stay in the Country where one is naturaliz'd.

This Matter was kept up several times for some time, the Court delaying proceeding to any Sentence for several Months. At last a Sentence of Outlawry was given: And upon that directly said, that, if the State would not deliver me up, he would Etd such Instruments as should seize on me, and carry me away forcibly." Hist. vol. 4. p. 725, 727.

The Letters of the Doctor, mentioned in this Passage, were also printed for the Good of the Cause: But as they contain'd solemn Protestations of his Loyalty to the King, and return'd to Sentences of the same Tendency, prescribed by him at the Hague, as well as at London, his Enemies took occasion to call them very Letters the Regulus and Records of his own Intemperance and Hypocrisy: For, say they, how was it possible for him to have any Remains of Loyalty or Grace, who could make such Protestations, when he was slip in all the Contradictions and Compensations that were then carrying on to pave the Way for the Revolution?

two such Kings, like whom no Ages had produc'd any, should be neglected and ill us'd at Rome for some Punctilio? He added, that, if these Matters were settled, and if the Pope would enter into Concert with them, they would set about the destroying Hercy every where, and would begin with the Dutch, upon whom, he said, they would fall without any Declaration of War, treating them as a Company of Rebels and Pirates, who had not a Right, as free States and Princes have, to a formal Denunciation of War. Cibis, who was then Cardinal Patron, was amaz'd at this, and gave Notice of it to the Imperial Cardinals. They sent it to the Emperor, and he signify'd it to the Prince of Orange. It is certain, that one Prince's treating with another to invade a third, gives a Right to that third Prince to defend himself, and to prevent those Designs. And, since what an Ambassador says is understood as said by the Prince whose Character he bears, this gave the States a Right to make Use of all Advantages that might offer themselves.

When the Ambassador saw that his Remonstrances to the Cardinal Patron were ineffectual, he demanded an Audience of the Pope. And there he lamented, that so little Regard was had to two such great Kings. He reflected on the Pope, as shewing more Zeal about temporal Concerns than the spiritual; which, he said, gave Scandal to all Christendom. He concluded, that since he saw Intercessions in his Master's Name were so little consider'd, he would make haste home: To which the Pope made no other Answer, but let Deus esse, he might do as he pleas'd. But he sent one after the Ambassador, as he withdrew from the Audience, to let him know how much he was offended with his Discourses, that he receiv'd no such Treatment from any Person, and that the Ambassador was to expect no other private Audience. Cardinal Houssart did what he could to soften Matters. But the Ambassador was so entirely in the Hands of the Jesuits, that he had little regard to any thing that the Cardinal suggested.

It is easy to see, by the Use made of this Passage, for what End it was inserted, which alone is sufficient to draw it into Suspicion with some People: But 'tis affirm'd by foreign Historians, that the King himself was one of the Potentates who had given up the Franchises, and whose Example had been us'd by the Nuncio at the Court of France: And if his Majesty could stoop to make use of his Credit and Interest with the Pope, to obtain that Favour for another, which he did not think fit to aspire to himself, it must argue, that he was the meanest of Men.

Dr. Wallwood, on the other hand, says, Dr. Wellwood's Account of Calistinus's Election.
That Callistin had several Audiences of the Pope, but to little Purpose, for whenever he began to talk of Bullnets, the Pope was feignably attack'd with a Fit of coughing, which broke off the Ambassador's Discourse for that time, and oblig'd him to retire. These Audiences and Fits of coughing continu'd from time to time, whilst Callistin continu'd at Rome, and were the Subject of Diversion to all but a particular Faction at that Court. At length he was advis'd to come to Threats, and to give out that he would be gone, since he could not have an Opportunity to treat with the Pope about the Bullnets he came for. Innocent was so little concern'd for the Ambassador's Resentment, that when they told him of it, he answer'd with his ordinary Colloquy, Well let him go, and tell him, It were in his Rise early in the Morning, that he may rest himself at Noon; for in this Country it is dangerous to travel in the Heat of the Day.

In the End, he was recall'd, being able to obtain of the Pope two trifling Requests only, that could hardly be deny'd to an ordinary Courier: The one was a Licence for the Marschal d'Harmer's Daughter to marry her Uncle: And the other, a (e) Dispensation of the Statutes of the Jesuits Order, to Father Petre, to enjoy a Bishopric, the want of which, says my Author, was the Reason that the Archbishopric of Trent was kept so long vacant.

The same Author adds, That though the Pope carry'd himself in this manner towards the English Ambassador, yet the Jesuits paid him the highest Respect imaginable, which did him no Service with the old Man; for he and that Order were never hearty Friends. They entertain'd him in their Seminary with the greatest Magnificence, and nothing was wanting in Nature or Art to grace his Reception. All their Stores of Sculpture, Painting, and Poetry, and Rhetoric, seem to have been exhausted upon

The Improbability of this Account.

(e) According to Bersart, he strove to procure his Cardinal's Hat, but received a flat Denial.

(f) Amongst other Devices, according to Mr. Nisard, there was one of a Lilly, from whose Leaves distilled some Drops of Water, which, as the Naturalists say, become the Seed of new Lillys; and the Motto was, Leaves rise to produce Leaves for Children: Underneath which was this Dutch Verse.

Did this pass for the Children, O James! thou art of Kings!
If Nature dares, Heaven will govern them.

This will serve as a Specimen of their Poetry and Sophistry: And as to their Rhetoric, Dr. Wallwood has profus'd the Speech of this Rector to the Ambassador, which he has thus translated:

— S. I. R.

You must not think this Galley alone can be merrily and if they could, their Silence must be a Crime, or a time when this City is fill'd with universal Joy, upon the News of your Excellence's Arrival; and all Places round the Pillars of Temple the Strand, and this Obligation on the Catholic Church has to that illustrious Prince. It is the Name of this City of Hope, as in the best place accordingly there, Foreword, in whose Reign the precious Imperial Crown is added to the Papal Dignity. It is now your Holiness can properly use that Apostolic Exclamation, Be Joy and by Crown. Heaven has ordered this happy Day this long, that to great a Blessing might not be obtained without long and unnumber'd Prayers; and at last entreated when two such Princes as James and Leopold should concur to resign, men in England and elsewhere in Rome. What a Surprise have all Catholic Kings gain'd by the Accidents! What an Honour to the orthodox Faith receiv'd, and what a Defence against the Enemies of the Name of Christ! The Thunder of his invincible Fleet will strike greater Terror into the Purges of Barbary and the Levant, than Storms and Waves can do. How highly must this Entertainment: And tho' all the Incriptions and Emblems did center upon the Triumph of the Romish Religion, and the Ruin of Herety in England; yet Care was taken not to omit such particular Trophies and Devices as were adapted to their new acquir'd Liberty of setting up their public Schools at London.

His Holiness did, however, so far acknowledge the Honour done him by his Majesty, that he return'd the Compliment by sending Cardinal Della his Nuncio to England, who had a public Audience of the King at Windsor on the third of July, to which he was accompany'd by the Duke of Grafton, and Sir Charles Gatterel; and having in his Train the Coaches of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, many other State-Officers, and of (c) two Bishops, namely, Cromwell Bishop of Durham, and Cartwright Bishop of Chester. We are told the Scene was laid at Windsor, for fear it should have created some Disorder at London; and that it gave no small Pain to those who by their Places were oblig'd to assist in the Ceremonial: All Commerce with the See of Rome being declar'd Treason by the Law; and it being apprehended, that the very participating in this Ceremonial would fall within the Reach of the Statute: But all the thorough-pac'd Courtiers comply'd nevertheless, depending no doubt on the Virtue of a Dispensation, or being assur'd of a Pardon. Some there were, however, who would neither accept of the one nor the other, and who, for that Reason, had the Honour to be dismiss'd from all their Employments. Among these particular Mention is made of the Duke of (*) Somerset, who could not be prevail'd upon even by the King himself to commit a Treason, because his Majesty had it in his Power to forgive him.

But tho' his Majesty law himself abandon'd by every Man who had a due Respect for the Religion and Laws of his Country on this extraordinary Occasion, and had Reason to know, that except he should make such a submission to France in Temporals, as he had already made to Rome in Spirituals, he could not give greater Umbrage to his People, than by opening this public Correspondence with his Holiness, (such an Affecancy had his Zeal over his Discretion, that he caus'd an Account of this Transaction to be inserted in the Gazette; and afterwards, by the same Vehicle, inform'd the Public, that he had admitted the Earl of Caslemain, his late Ambassador at Rome, to a Seat at the Council-board: By which Means, he in a manner authoris'd his Enemies to vilify and undermine his Government.

But, however impolitic or illegal these Proceedings were, it does not appear that those who expected to reap the main Profit by exposing them, thought there was any Crime in holding a Correspondence with the Pope, on Matters purely temporal (and if Lord Caslemain himself is to be credited, his Commission reach'd no further): For Dr. Burnet acknowledges, in his History, as well as his Travels, that previous to his Settlement in Holland, he made a Journey to Rome, was complimented with the Offer of a private Audience by the Pope, and actually enter'd into a very great Intimacy with Cardinal Howard, &c. And his Adversaries will not be persuaded to think, that he had no (f) other Business there, than merely to collect Materials for the Press. The same Doctor further intimates, that Mr. Sydney, formerly Envoy-Extraordinary to the States, Brother to Algernon Sydney, beheaded in the late Reign, and Nephew to Lord Sunderland, who was in the whole Secret of the Prince of Orange's Intrigues, also spent almost a Year in travelling round Italy: And tho' we are left by him to conclude, that he did so, only to keep out of Haza's way, others, who glory in belov'ing an Innocent XI. the Tide of THE PROTESTANT POPE, make no Scruple to avow, that Mr. Sydney was at Rome all the while that Lord Caslemain continu'd there: That he was admitted to several private Audiences in the Closet, when his Excellency could scarce be favour'd with a public one: That tho' Sydney had no public Character, he was intrusted by the Prince of Orange with some Secrets to be communicated to the Pope: And that some People have even fancy'd, that the Revolution was one of them.

When Affairs are treated of in this loose and art thou, O Britain! Empress of the Ocean; once fettered from the Earth, now Mistress of the Countess of the Easters and Western World! What Prosperity mayest thou not hope for, under the Reign of so excellent a Prince! Raise thy Hopes; raise thy Courage; and banish all unjust and unreasonable Fears. I have no Inclination at this time to recount those Difficulties and Calamities which England has been the Theatre of, for above an Age past, to the Grief and Abolishment of the rest of the World. But if Providence has made these the Steps for James the Second to mount the Throne, I can hardly refrain declaring how cheaply thou hast purchased to grant a Bill: It is certain that your present Happiness will increase Early in succeeding Times; and however dear it has cost thee, Gallantry will esteem it more the Blessing and Protection of Heaven, than a Recompence of their Gallantry. In such a Conjuncture, your Excellency, who have had feel this happy Day at home, and have next been the Messenger to bring it hither, I shall not here presume to praise your great Wisdom, your learned Warnings against Heresy, that steady Courage you have shewn in those many Prison you have honour'd for your Zeal to the true Religion; your prudent Conduct, for your other extraordinary Qualities: All these are nam'd up in one; and your Character is in the conpleted by the Choice your great Master has made of you, to sustain the most considerable Affairs of his Kingdom, as present glorious Embassy: In which all the World must own Him up to be the most competent Judge, and You the fittest Person.

(c) This Circumstance is remember'd on the Authority of a Paper, call'd, A full and true Relation of his Excellency the Pope's Nuncio making his public Entry at Windsor, &c. which is preserv'd in Lord Sunderland's Collection, vol. xxiv.

and indefinite Manner, we ought, no doubt, to be so much the more cautious in our Conclusions: But when Certainties cannot be obtain'd, we ought not wholly to reject Probabilities: And it is not to be suppos'd, that such a Politician as the Prince of Orange would neglect any Opportunity of advancing his Interest. Now the Quarrel of France with the Holy See was at that Conjunction of the utmost Importance to the Confederates against the former, and as it was natural to think, that King James would offer his Mediation to make it up, for it was peculiarly the Interest of his Highness to render that Offer ineffectual, to render the Breach as wide as possible, and to give such a Turn to his Majesty's Negotiations, as should center all Advantages in himself; which could only be done, by having an Embassy on the Spot, whom he could entirely rely upon, and who, by a dextrous Use of every Incident that arose, might keep the Roman Cabinet steady to the Interest of the League. In truth, to extremely vigilant and active were the several Powers of which it was compos'd, that no Opportunity was lost of increasing its Strength, by enlarging its Circuit. Thus, at the very Carnival of Venice this Year, where Pleasure was the only Business seemingly attended to, Ways and Means were found to induce the Elector of Bavaria, and the Duke of Savoy to become Parties: And from all these several Movements, it is beyond all Dispute, That the humbling and reducing the overgrown Power of France, was the great Object of the Confederacy; and that every inferior Spring and Wheel was brought to co-operate in the general Motion.

The Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Savoy join the Confederates.

We must now keep pace with the Year in the Progress of the Ecclesiastical Commission, which his Majesty, notwithstanding the pernicious Effects it had already produc'd, was fatally led to prosecute with as much Intemperance as ever. His Jesuits somewhat too rashly concluded, that the Horse was now bridled and saddled, and that all they had to do was to get up and ride; but then they were such bad jockies, that they did not chuse the Advantage-Ground in mounting; and when in the Stirrup, threw themselves forward with such Violence, that they misd the Saddle, and fell on the other Side. In a Word, they thought by getting Possession of the Universities, they should have the Fountains in their Hands, and might direct the Streams as they pleas'd. But as Bishop Burnet well observes, the Privileges of Colleges are esteem'd such sacred things, that few will venture to dispute, much less to disturb them: And when an Attack is made, all who belong to the Body as Students, as well as those who are interested in the Endowments, think themselves bound in Honour and Gratitude to assist and support them: And hence it was reasonable to think, that every such Attempt would answer no better than the Monkey's Experiment on the Hive.

A. D. 1687.

(P. 1. p. 697.)

But, looking on the King as their strong Tower against every Danger and every Enemy, these bold Adventurers resolv'd to make their Push, notwithstanding, and did so; after what manner is now to be explain'd.

It had been a Custom in both Universities to confer honorary Degrees at the King's Instance, on eminent Strangers, without any Regard to the Article of their Faith; and agreeable thereto, a Degree had actually been confer'd on a Mahometan, Secretary to the Morocco's Embassador. On this Ground it was hop'd a Precedent might be obtain'd in favour of the Dispensing Power, and the Obedience due to the Royal Mandate. Accordingly his Majesty's Letter was procur'd in favour of one Father Francis a Benedictine, to the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, &c. enjoying and requiring them to admit the said Father a Master of Arts. But, however plausible the Snare was hid, it was detected, and, upon debating the Matter in the Consistory, it was unanimously resolv'd, That they could not admit the said Monk, unless he took the Oath, without breaking their own. Two of their Body were assign'd to remonstrate thus humbly to his Majesty, and to beseech him not to force them on wilful Perjury; but without Effect; on the contrary, they were told by one of the Secretaries of State, that the King was offended at the Proceedings of the University, and would take order shortly to give them a farther Answer; which Answer prov'd to be, a Citation for the Vice-Chancellor

Which is not comply'd with.

(1) Two since reported, (say our Compiler just quoted) that he (the Nuncio) had a secret Message sent from the Pope to communicate to his Majesty in his Cabinet, at which it was said none but the Roman Catholics were desired to be present. — And further, being well assured there were none in the Cabinet but what were such, the Nuncio was pleas'd to open himself to this Effect: His Holiness is pleas'd to invite your Majesty into a Confederacy with several Catholic Princes, of which you are to be the Head, against the King of France, who at this time of day despises his Holiness's Supremacy, and all the World may judge that he is setting up for an universal Monarchy; and if he obtains it, he will make the Cardinal de Noailles Archbishop of Paris Pope; and this is no doubt of it. The Articles his Holiness would have your Majesty enter into, and insert into are as follows: That no Peace be made with Lewis XIV. till he has made Reparation to the Holy See for his disobedience to his said Majesty. — That he should not make any such all his said Majesty's Proceedings in France against the Holy Father, Innocent XI. — That all things which apply (in France) should be referred to their former State. — And it was bruited about Town, that his Holiness at that time required of King James his Promise to use his Endeavour to have the Oath of Secrecy taken away in England.

— Thus said that, after some time of Consideration, King James was pleas'd to oblige himself to the Effect: — That, by Marriage, the French King and he were firmly allied; — one to the other; that his whole Family, as well as himself, in the Troubles of the Civil War, had been greatly obliged to him upon many Accounts; I presume 'tis well known to his Holiness, without putting me to the Trouble of a Repetition. — And as touching the Oath of Secrecy, his Holiness may say well as the Crown from my Head, for my Subjects, I am sure, will never consent to it. — And in these Points he desired his Holiness would be pleas'd to exempt him. — Upon which it was said, that the Nuncio withdrew, and the Council broke up. — Some said, that King James was in the right to make the Pope such an answer. — Others said, he was in a secret League with the French King, and durst not do otherwise, for, for he should discover it to the World. — Others said, 'twas true, the Pope might as well have asked King James's Crown, as the taking off the Oath of Secrecy. — And others said, certainly the Pope had a mind to quarrel with King James, as he did with the French King. been given to one Malley an actual Papist. Thus the Jee was broke, and by the Example of the one, and the Authority of the other, the Jesuits began already to promise themselves that Oxford was their own.

Another Mandamus to Magdalen College, Oxford.

About the time that the Commissary-Business was in Embryo, Dr. Clerke the President of Magdalen College, which is one of the richest Foundations in England, dying, the Vice-President, Dr. Atwater, gave the usual Notice of Time and Place to the Fellows, to proceed to a new Election; and at this Opening, the Jesuits resolv'd to make their Entrance. One Farmer, a new Convert, was pitch'd upon to be their Man; and the King was to have the Honour of introducing him. A Royal Mandamus, accompany'd with a Dispensation, was issu'd accordingly, which was deliver'd by Mr. Robert Charnock, one of the Fellows, two Days before Election was to be made, and which was read the same Day by the Vice-President to the rest of the Body. Of this Mandamus they had receiv'd Intimation before it was serv'd; and to prevent, if possible, the ill Effects of it, they had besought his Majesty, by Petition, to leave them to the Discharge of their Duty and Conscience, agreeable to his late most gracious Toleration, or else to recommend a statutable Person, which Farmer, in no respect, was. To this Petition the College expected an Answer, and, therefore, by the Consent of all, except Charnock, agreed to postpone the Election till the very last Day prescrib'd by the Statutes, in hope his Majesty's Pleasure would by that time be known. This last Day was April 18; and when the Fellows were met, two of them acquainted the rest, from the Lord President of the Council, That his Majesty expected to be ob'd; All Hopes of an Accommodation being thus at an end, all but Charnock took the Sacrament, and proceeded to the Election, by Scrutiny; upon the Issue of which it appear'd, that Mr. Haugh, a Man of Sense, Courage, and Integrity, was duly elected, by a Majority of eleven out of thirteen; the two Dissenters being Charnock and one Thomson, who had refus'd to take the Oath appointed by the Statutes, and who declar'd, in voce, for Farmer, according to the King's Letter: On the Morrow, the new President was presented to the Visitor, the Bishop of Winchester, for Confirmation, which he receiv'd upon the Spot; and having the next following Day comply'd with all the remaining Forms, enter'd on the Execution of his Office.

The Fellows refuse Obedience.

This new Instance of Disobedience, which agreed to ill with the extravagant Professions formerly made to the Throne from this very Place, so highly incens'd the King, that he resolv'd to let loose all the Terrors of the Prerogative against the Offenders, that their Example might be a Warning to the rest of his Subjects. The first Intimation of his Majesty's Wrath, was by a Letter from the Lord Sunderland, signifying that he was much surpris'd at their Proceedings, and that he expected an Account of them, &c. This indeed the Vice-President and Fellows to draw up a Brief of their Case, and to beg the Mediation of the Duke of Ormond, the Chancellor of the University, in their Behalf; whilst expatiating on the strict Obligations they were under to act according to their Oaths, and the unspeakable Regret with which they disobey'd the least of his Majesty's Commands. But with whatever Zeal his Grace might undertake their Cause, it was without any Success: He had refus'd, upon Application, to countenance his Majesty's declar'd Purpose to take off the Tents and Penal Laws; and, for that Reason had lost the little Remainder of his Credit and Interest at Court.

What follow'd was, a Citation from the ecclesiastic Commissioners to the College, to answer for their Non-compliance with his Majesty's Mandate: Which being obey'd, the Matter came to a regular Hearing: Jesuits put his Questions; the Defendants had Time given them to reply, and accompany'd their Plea with a Variety of attested Proofs of such Follies and Vices committed by Farmer, as, over-and-above his Disqualifications with respect to the Laws, abundantly justify'd them for setting him aside. But tho' the Jesuits had so much Reason to be assur'd of their Man, they resolv'd to prosecute their Cause: And so trac were their Lordships the Commissioners to their Instructions, that they proceeded first to deprive Mr. Haugh, now advanced to the Degree of a Doctor, and then to suspend the Vice-President, and Dr. Fairfax. After which, upon Information received, that neither of these Sentences was submitted to, his Majesty was induc'd to send a formal Inhibition to the College, in these Words: "Our Will and Pleasure is, That no Election or Admission be made of any Person or Persons whatsoever into any Fellowship, Demonymship, or other Place or Office in our said College, till we shall signify our further Pleasure; any Statute, Custom, or Constitution, to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Matter brought before the ecclesiastic Commissioners.

Dr. Haugh deposed, Dr. Fairfax suspended, and the College inhibited.

The next Experiment that was try'd upon the College was, to send down a new Mandamus, in behalf of Parker Bishop of Oxford (for the Objections brought against Farmer were insurmountable) accompany'd with a Letter from Lord Sunderland, imposing, That his Majesty expected their ready Obedience, and that they were to transfer to his Lordship a speedy Account of their Proceedings; as also a Request from the Bishop himself, that he might be admitted by Proxy: But still without Effect: Their Answer was, That the Place was already full; that they could not proceed to a new Choice, till the former was legally annull'd, &c. And this Firmness on their side redoubled the King's Indignation against them: And after what an extraordinary manner he condescended to express it, we shall specify in its proper Place.

Another Mandamus in behalf of Parker Bishop of Oxford.

To clear the Way, as we go, we must now speak of several other Occurrences which took place this Summer, and which all equally partook partook of the same violent Spirit that had taken possession of the King, and drove him as violently on to his own Perdition.

The Army was again encamp'd on Hounslow Heath, and grew to sensible of their own Importance, that the Soldiers began to give the Law in their Quarters, and the Officers to plead an Exemption from the Civil Power: And, at the same time that these Intolerances were overlook'd, and the King was in perfect Peace, the Judges were requir'd to put in force an obsolete Act, which made it Death for Soldiers taking Pay in his Majesty's Service, either in his Wars abroad, or in Scotland, or on the Seas, to run from their Colours. But even the Lord Chief Justice Herbert and Wilkins himself, the famous Abbot, had their Qualm upon this Occasion, as had also Sir John Holt, who chose to resign the Recordership of London, rather than enter into such a Conspiracy against the Lives of his Fellow-Subjects. Wilkins had also his Qualm, and was succeeded by one Altham in a Papiet. The Lord Chief Justice Herbert was remov'd from the King's Bench to the Common-Place, to make Room for Sir (n) Robert Wright, who was by far a more thorough-pac'd Tool than he: And even previous to this Retirment, and Changes, the Court was gracify'd, and the People shock'd with the Execution of two Defectors; one of whom was hang'd in Green Garden, and the other on Tower-Hill.

The Performance of a Papiet.

It is also to be noted, that the King, having farther prorog'd the Parliament from the 25th of April to the 22d of November, in order to gain so much the more Time for his Practices to take effect; but, on the contrary, finding that the Prince of Orange refus'd to co-operate with him on one hand, and that the Members confin'd as intractable as ever on the other, thought it advisable, in the Beginning of July, to dissolve it; which was accordingly done by Proclamation, without any Mention of the Advice of Council, or any Hint of calling another.

Prince George, just in the Court of Denmark.

On what Errand Prince George was, a little before, sent to Denmark, cannot be treated of with any Degree of Precision; nothing positive in relation to it having transpir'd to assist our Conjectures. There was at that time a Difference subsisting between his Danish Majesty and the States, in Relation to the Tolls of the Sund; and for fear the Artifices of France should work up the Dispute to a Rupture, the Elector of Brandenburg had offer'd his Mediation, which had been thankfully accepted by the States, who had abundant Reason to avoid one if possible. Now 'tis certain that King James was, at this very time, plying the States with his captious Memorials; and from thence it appears not improbable, that his Danish Son-in-law was commission'd to prevail with his own native Court to reject that Mediation, and to induce them to enter into a Concert with England to bring the Dutch to Reason by Force of Arms. But if this was, indeed, the Purpose of his Voyage, he either came too late, or had not sufficient Interest to carry his Point; for his Danish Majesty not only chid with the Elector of Brandenburg's Offer, but agreed that as long as the Matter should continue in Suspence, the Dutch should have Leave to continue their Commerce on the same footing as before; so that after a Stay of about a Month or six Weeks, the Prince return'd indolent to England.

The King doing a Papiet.

It seems pretty apparent, that, in Proportion to the Difficulty that his Majesty found in bringing the Prince of Orange into his Measures, he grew more and more dissatisfy'd both with him and the Republic he was at the Head of: And possibly this Dissatisfaction with his Highness, or his Zeal for his own Religion, or both, were the Motives of the extraordinary Desire that he now testify'd to have a Son. He had some time before renew'd his Commerce with Mrs. Sedley, who had honour'd her with the Title of Countess of Dorchester, had created her Son Duke of Berwick, and had sent him with a noble Equipage and suitable Appointments to serve as a Volunteer against the Turks in Hungary. All these Circumstances had given the Queen great Uneasiness; but none more than the first. Mrs. Sedley was a Woman of Wit, Spirit, and Liveliness, and had a sincere Contempt both for the King's Measures and the Adversaries of them, which she acknowledg'd very freely on all Occasions. This alarm'd the Priests, who well knew, that an Ascendancy over the Heart was often an Over-match for an Ascendancy over the Conscience, and produc'd a notable Effort to redeem the King out of her Hands, which the Queen was easily prevail'd upon to be at the Head of. Her Majesty had been for some time in an ill Habit of Body

(which Dr. Burnet takes care to remember) was of such a nature as afforded a very melancholy Preface, that she could have no Children: And one Morning, while in this languishing Way, by particular Message desir'd to see the King in her Closet. He came, and found her surrounded with all the Reverend Fathers who had'd in her Confidence, and was astonish'd to see them fall at once upon their Knees before him, her Majesty in the middle, who open'd the Scene with a bitter Complaint of Mrs. Sedley, her own Misfortunes, &c. After which the Priests took their Turn, and gave his Majesty to understand, That this Bleimish in his Life blast'd their Designs, and that the more it appear'd, and the longer it continu'd, the more inefficual all their Endeavours would prove. In short, the Experiment answer'd: The King was touch'd with Shame, as well as Compassion, and not only promis'd never to see the Lady any more, but to oblige her to quit the Kingdom for a while, on pain of losing her Pension: And he was in part as good as his Word; for he obliged her to attend herself accordingly: But, after a while, he not only suffered her to return again, but kept up the same Correspondence with her as before. This, as it may be reasonably imagined, renewed her Majesty's Uneasiness, and consequently her Complaints. For want of an Heir, she saw herself without Root in the Soil to which she had been transplanted; and her Poetics were in the same Predicament. Whatever, therefore, she had to urge on that Head, they were sure to espouse; and at the same time the King's Displeasure with the Prince and Princess of Orange disposed him to listen to all Expedients on that Head, as favourably as either could wish.

The King makes a Progress, while the Queen sits the Bed.

Thus, towards the Close of the present Summer, a Coincidence of Passions and Interests produced an unanimous Resolution of the whole Court, King, Queen, Ministers, Priests, and Physicians, that the Royal Couple should separate; that the Queen should make a Visit to the Barb; and that the King, under the pretence of taking a Progress thro' several of the principal Places of his Dominions, should pass on to Hoblywell in Flintshire, to offer up his Prayers and Vows to St. Winifred, the Patroness, if not to partake of the Virtues, of that supposed invigorating Spring.

But tho' an Heir was the principal End of this Progress, it was not the only one: His Majesty, we are told, was willing to try whether his gracious Presence among his People would not reconcile them to his Measures; whether, in case of a new Election, he could not prevail with the Country-Gentlemen to vote according to his Recommendation; and whether, by courting his old Enemies, the Presbyterians, he could not spirit them up to do as great things in furtherance of his Cause, as they had formerly done against it. Another Design of the Progress, says Bishop Kennet, was, to diffuse (p) Popery over the Kingdom, by the Sermons preached during the Course of it, in the Royal Presence: Another, to draw in People to be touched for the Evil, according to the Form of a Popish Office, pretended to have been in use in the time of King Henry VII. and now printed with Rubric Letter, wherein officiated Father Warner, as Chaplain and Confessor to the King: And yet another was, to give the Popish Bishops an Opportunity to hold their Visitations and Agreed the 16th their Majesties left Winifred, the King taking the Road to Perth, to review the Harbour and Fortifications; and the Queen passing on directly to Bath, at which Place the Royal Couple met again on the 28th, and continued together till the 22d; when the King set out on his Progress or Pilgrimage to Hoblywell, and where he arrived on the 29th following; having been met at Shrewsbury, on the 23d, by the Earl Tyrconnel from Ireland, with a Train of above sixty Noblemen and Gentlemen of that Kingdom; and who continued to wait upon and confer with, his Majesty till the 26th following, at which time he set out from Chester, on his Return to his Government; the credulous World being instructed to believe, that he had crossed St. George's Channel only to pay his Court to his Sovereign. But one Day did his Majesty devote to St. Winifred, and then by several Stages directed his Journey to Oxford; where, in the midst of the (q) Commitments of the University, who behaved to him, as we find it acknowledged in the Gazette, as the Patroness, as well as the Persuaders to, Loyalty, he entered personally into the Dispute with the Fellows of Magdalen-College, with as much Warmth and Passion, as if he had travelled thither for no other End than to exact that Obedience to his Commands, which they had hitherto refused: For when private Applications were found ineffectual, the Earl of Sunderland sent them an Order to attend the King at Christ-Church, in a Body: They obeyed; and what passed at this remarkable Interview we find set forth in Colloquy, by the Fellows themselves, in the following Words:

King. What's your Name, are you Dr. Puffly?

Dr. P. Yes, may it please your Majesty.

K. Did you receive my Letter?

Dr. P. Yes, Sir, we did.

K. Then you have not dealt with me like Gentlemen; you have done very unbecomingly by me, and undutifully.---(Here they all kneeled, and Dr. Puffly offered a Petition, which his Majesty refused to receive; and said.)

K. Ye have been a stubborn, turbulent College; I have known you to be so these twenty-six Years: You have affronted me in

(p) A Sermon preached before his Majesty at Chester, by Father Sabon, was printed by Henry Hills, his Majesty's Printer; and also a Pastoral Letter from the four Catholic Bishops to the Lay-Catholics of England.

(q) Among which we are not to forget a Speech made to his Majesty by a son of Sir Edward Bates, in the Name, and on the behalf, of the Roman Catholics, which was afterwards printed, and in which are to be found the following Passages:

"And we hope, that as Providence hath returned a Reformation to your Majesty, after so long and deplorable a Breach; so you will be pleased to protect and encourage this tender Beginning among us. For the Winds and the Storms threaten us, yet being founded upon a double Rock, the one of the Firmness of the Church, the other your Majesty's Foundation, we rest fearless and resolute, till it shall please our good Lord to settle it in that Peace and Liberty which we confidently hope for in your Majesty's Life and Government. Next, we, with the rest of the Nation, acknowledge your Majesty's great Goodness for that; absolute Liberty granted to all your Subjects, retaining nothing but what is eternally contrary to the Preservation of Peace and Justice.

You have only kindled kindled kindled Wickiandness and Violence to one another, which could not have been committed without the Breach of all Law, and many Confusions; and that you keep me daily towards God in every Conscience, yet you have hereby taken off the Visant of Rebellion, and manifested to all the World, that whatsoever hereafter takes up Arms against your Power, must not pretend either Reformation, or Religion, or Justice of the Government, as an Inducement.

It is a long time since, that the Wounds of this Nation have been ill widened by intercalated Petitions, applying only Grievances.

Your Majesty hath, by pouring in Oil and Wine, begun an Union and Calming of the Parts: An Union at least in the Concerns of the Nation, tho' not (as we desire) an Unity in Religion. Yet for much of Religion, too, as to be at Peace with one another, &c." [Lord Somers's Collection, Vol. xxiv. Part 2. 61.]

in this. Is this your Church-of-England Loyalty? One would wonder to find so many Church-of-England-men in such a Business. Go home, and shew yourselves good Members of the Church of England. Get you gone: Know I am your King, I will be obeyed; and I command you to be gone: Go and admit the Bishop of Oxon Head, Principal, what do ye call it, of the College? — (One stood by said President.) I mean President of the College. Let them that refuse it look to it; they shall feel the Weight of their Sovereign's Displeasure.

The Fellows going out of the Lodgings were called back.

K. I hear you have admitted a Fellow of the College, since you received my Inhibition: Is this true? Have you not admitted Mr. Holden Fellow?

Dr. P. I think he was admitted Fellow: But we conceive—

Mr. Geo. May it please your Majesty, there was no new Election or Admission, since your Majesty's Inhibition; but only the Confirmation of a former Election. (They always elect to one Year's Probation, then the Person elected is received, or rejected for ever.)

K. The Confirmation of a former Election! 'Twas downright Disobedience! And 'tis a fresh Aggravation. Get you gone home, I say again; go, get you gone, and immediately repair to your Chapel, and elect the Bishop of Oxon, or else you must expect to feel the Weight of my Hand.—

The Fellows offered again their Petition, on their Knees.

K. Get you gone, I will receive nothing from you, till you have obeyed me, and admitted the Bishop of Oxon.

Upon which they went immediately to their Chapel, Dr. Puffey proposing whether they would obey the King, and elect the Bishop of Oxon? They answered in their turns, They were as ready to obey his Majesty in all things that lay in their Power, as any of the rest of his Subjects: But the electing the Bishop of Oxon being directly contrary to their Statutes, and the positive Oaths they had taken, they could not apprehend it in their Power to obey him in this Matter.

It is not to be supposed that such a Transaction as this, in such a Place as Oxford, could be kept secret for half an Hour; or that his Majesty should not feel that he was a Loser by the Experiment: He had descended from his Dignity, in having had recourse to it; instead of shewing his Power, he had shewn his Weakness; the very Men, whom he thought to awe and terrify by his Presence, shewed, by their Firmness, that they looked on the Authority of the Laws to be greater than his; and, as the whole University was interested in the Event, his Majesty could not but be sensible that they made the Case of this College their own, and that the Professions they overflowed with were rather the Effect of Fear than Love. More disgusted, therefore, with the Repulse he had met with, than obliged with the Ceremonial of his Reception, on the third Day after his Arrival at Oxford, he set out on his Return to Bath, where the Queen had all this while remained, and from whence his Majesty had been absent fifteen Days.

Bishop Burnet says, That he had designed to go through many more Places; but that the Small Success, he had in those he visited made him shorten his Progress. The same Prelate also affirms, That his Majesty staid with the Queen at the Bath only a few Days, two or three at most: But in this latter Circumstance at least, his Lordship is mistaken; for it appeared by the Gazette, that the King returned to Bath, September 6, and that he did not leave it again (unless for one Day, when he dined at Bristol, together with his Consort) till the 12th following. In this Interval, it must be presumed, that his Majesty's Physicians were again consulted, as well as his Ministers; and that, by their Advice, it was found necessary for the Royal Couple to part once more, for the greater Likelihood of accomplishing their mutual Wishes: For tho' his Majesty set out for Windsor on the 12th, the Queen continued the Use of the Bath-Waters for twenty Days longer, and did not follow the King to Windsor till October 4. So much depends on these Circumstances, that 'tis necessary to be thus minute in the Recital of them: And possibly Dr. Burnet thought himself obliged by the same Necessity to account so very (r) particularly, as he has done, for the Queen's staying at Bath a Week longer than the designed.

As to the Success of the Progress with the People, if we may believe the Gazette, never was the most popular of our Princes, on the most popular Occasion, received with more lively Expressions of inviolable Loyalty and unfeigned Affection, than his Majesty in every Place where he came. Bishop Kennet is pleased to say, That as the Presence of a Sovereign strikes an awful and commanding Veneration on the Minds of those who seldom approach Majesty, so it could hardly be expressed with what joyful Acclamations he was received, and what dutiful Acknowledgments were paid him. Another Writer also asserts the same thing, in the same Words, and farther, That, in almost all Places besides Oxford, the King's Solicitations had a wonderful Success; the Electors promising to send such Representatives to Parliament, as should concur in his Majesty's Designs: And his Majesty, by way of Inducement, declaring, That he would not suffer any Roman-Catholic to sit in either House. But, according to Burnet, most of the Nobility and Gentry industriously avoided him; and those who did come in shewed in their very Countenances such a Coldness, as was visible even to the King himself, and as gave him equal Displeasure and Uneasiness. All agree, that if the Church-Party were backward in their their Addresses to him, he frowned upon them in return; that if the Papists had his Heart, the Protestant-Dissenters had an equal Share of his Countenance; that wherever he came, he treated them as his peculiar Favourites, not excepting even those who had sided with Monmouth against him; and that the Dissenters, to shew their grateful Sense of this unmerited Partiality, promised all that was required of them, with respect to the Repeal of the Test and Penal Laws. His Majesty was scarce returned from Oxford to Hath, before he was followed by a new Deputation from the Fellows of Magdalen-College; complaining of a Misrepresentation of their Actions, and offering to evince their Duty and Loyalty, by a ready Obedience to his Majesty's Royal Pleasure, in any Instance whatever that did not interfere with their Consciences, which, in the Case of all his other Subjects, he had shewn himself to solicitous to preserve inviolate. This produced a Letter from Mr. Pen, no doubt by Authority, in which, with the Air of one who was passionately concerned for their Interest, he first undertook to persuade them, either to a Compliance with his Majesty's Commands, or to make an Offer of some such Expedient as might prevent the Ruin of themselves and the College, before it was too late, by inducing him to recall the Quo Warranto issued against it. Then, having recourse to Terrors, he gave them to understand, that they could not be insensible how highly his Majesty was incited against them: That every Mechanic knew he would never receive a Bessie in what he heartily espoused: That no Instance could be given, in which a Suit of this kind ever went against the Crown: That, however hard their Case was generally thought, they would not do well to rely on the Goodness of it: That they ought rather to wait with Patience for a Season more favourable to Persons of their Character: That, where so many Statutes were obligatory, it was next to impossible that all should be observed: That a Failure in any one Point forfeited their Grant, and laid the College open to the Royal Disposal: And, that their Overthrow might make way for the so-much-aimed-at Reformation, first of the University, then of the Church, and administer such an Opportunity to the Enemy as, otherwise, might not occur in his Majesty's Reign. The Fellows answered in substance, That, not being conscious of having given his Majesty any just Cause of Offence, they had no Reason to fear a Quo Warranto: That their Danger arose not from the Breach, but the Observance, of their Statutes: That Suits of the Kind they were threatened with had often been determined against the King, as might be seen in the Law-books: That they relied on his Majesty's sacred, inviolable, and Royal Word and Promise, that he never would invade any Man's Property: That their President in virtue of their Choice stood invested of a legal Freehold under the Protection of his Majesty's Laws, which they could not invade: That there was no Precedent of a Quo Warranto brought against a College: That in case the Corporation of a College should be dissolved, the Revenues would return to the Founder's Heirs, and not to the Crown: That their Resolution to maintain their Statutes ought not to bring their Loyalty into question; for they had the Merit of many Services to urge; in particular, the raising a Company at their own Expence against Monmouth; and that they hoped their good and gracious Sovereign would not exclude them from that Liberty of Conscience which he had been pleased to extend to all his Subjects.

It now appeared that his Majesty had a Will by the Ears, which he could neither hold nor safely let go. On the one hand, if his assumed Dispensing Power was defeated in any one Instance, it would gradually become ineffectual in all; and if on the other, the Fellows persisted in their Opposition, it was foreseen, that the Violence necessary to maintain it, would interest the Bulk of the Nation in their Quarrel, and, somewhat too precipitately, oblige his Majesty to lay aside the Sceptre for the future, and govern entirely by the Sword. To avoid both these Extremes, therefore, it was resolved, that Mr. Pen should once more renew his Mediation, and try whether the Fellows might not be induced to admit the Bishop of Oxford, without proceeding to the Forms of an Election. Accordingly, six Queries dated from Windsor, September 15 (all tending to set on foot a Compromise, and to those that almost any Expedient would be accepted) were addressed to the Fellows; who, in their Answer, set forth, That there was but one Instance in their Register of a President's being admitted without Election, which arose from the Error of the College in suffering the time of Election to elapse, and under a Protestation that it should not supersede the Statutes, or injure the Right of Election; for which reason they refused, as before to elect, so now to admit the Bishop of Oxford: And if they entered into Parley concerning any other Expedient, they have not thought proper to leave us any Memorial of it. For 1687 they published the (1) six Queries at large, they accompanied accompanied them with Answers but to four: It may, however, be concluded, that the whole was alike unsatisfactory; for about the middle of the next Month, the President and Fellows were served with a Citation to appear before the King's Commissioners on the 21st of November; and possibly the hearing was so long deferred, that the Dread of Suspension and Deprivation might operate with the greater force.

Unpopular as these Proceedings were, and apprehensive as his Majesty had reason to be of the Consequences, so thoroughly was he possessed with the Demon of Superstition, that he could not help rushing at the same time into new Difficulties. The forward Endeavours of the Orthodox Sons of the Church had, in the preceding Reign, as we have seen, put the Crown in Possession of a discretionary Power over the City of London, in Opposition to those who were for interesting Heaven and Earth in their Quarrel against Popery; and his Majesty resolved to exercise it at the Expense of those who had not only procured it for him, but who had the additional Merit to plead of having placed the Scepter in his Hand. Kings hold themselves exempt from the Imputation of Ingratitude, by holding, That the Services of their Subjects can never exceed their Duty. All those Magistrates, therefore, who did not shew themselves as compliant to his Majesty's Religion as his Government, were dismissed without Mercy; and Fanatics were appointed in their stead. Thus the Face of things was at once wholly reversed. Those who had made it their Glory to pave the way for Popery to ascend the Throne, and who would then hear of no Opposition, on account of the Dangers that might attend it, now had sufficient Cause to repent of their Blindness and Infatuation; and those who had clamoured loudest in the Apprehension of those Dangers, on the contrary, did all they could to facilitate their Approach, became assured they would fall on their Adversaries only.

It was in Consequence of this new and strange Alliance, that his Majesty condescended to accept an Invitation from the City to dine with the new Lord Mayor, Sir John Smeaton, on the Day he was sworn into his Office, accompanied by Prince George of Denmark, the great Officers of State, Privy-Councillors, Foreign Ministers, &c. And a pompous Account was given in the Gazette of the Ceremonial of his Reception, with these additional Circumstances, That the Queen intended to have done the City the same Grace and Favour, but was prevented by Indisposition: That the Pope's Nuncio, and the French Ambassador were present; and that when the Aldermen and Sheriffs waited on his Majesty the next Day with their Compliments, he knighted two of the former, namely, Bowden and Aylmer, as a Mark of his gracious Acceptance of their Entertainment.

Concerning the Pope's Nuncio, two very different Accounts are given: Bishop Burnet asserts, That when the Sheriffs waited upon the King with the Invitation, his Majesty commanded them to invite the Nuncio: That they did so in virtue of that Command, overthrow some Bodies Plea and Exception against their Authority.

The King dined

5. Whether you called the Men filled in Beliefs, when you refused Mr. Fox's Meditation, who, you may be sure, had good Authority for what he did? You could not but know that Man, and therefore must needs be fore-armed against any Wits that could be offered to you. Whether an unanimous Subscription for an Expulsion (which indeed I think you ought not to refuse in good Measure, from the King was pleaded in private, it proposed in his Majesty by Mr. Fox, or another Favourite, would prevent the Destruction of the best Foundation in Europe?

Lastly, Whether you be our down beyond your Knowledge, by some hot-headed Advisers, who never consider the present State of his Majesty's Court of Justice?

The Answer, dated the 27th of September, 1687.

To the first. We cannot, without Violence, to our Conscience, and deliberate Perjury, admit any Person to be President of our College, that is not elected thereunto, and qualified according to our Statutes; whereby the Bishop of Oxon is in no way capable; nor is there any Member in all our Registers of any Admission of a President without Election, but of one Dr. Nicholas Bond, whose Case was as followeth, viz. Upon the Death of Dr. Lawrence Humphrey, about the year of our Queen Elizabeth's Reign, the Queen recommended Dr. Bond (being a Fellow of our College) to be elected President. Many of the Fellows inclined in their Judgment to elect one Smith (another of the Fellows); and, at this Meeting for Election, the Contention was so great, that they rose without electing; and the Oblivion continued till the Place became lapsid: And there being no Provision in our Statutes to direct us what to do in such a Case, the Queen, by her Letters Patents, constituted the said Dr. Bond to be President; and therein declared, That her Majesty, being informed that the Fellows had neglected to make Election of a President in due time, as our Statutes required, and these Statutes having made no Provision for such an Omission, she, out of her princely Care for the Place, and Indulgence for those Persons who had been guilty of that Neglect, did, by Advice of the Bishop of Worcester his Visitor, constitute Dr. Bond their President; with Provision nevertheless, that he did not thereby pretend to supersede their Statutes, or invade their Right of Election, which was thereby invaded in them, but took the Course, in the only Means left, to supply their Defect of Election.

To the second. We would not make ourselves guilty of deliberate Perjury, for any Considerations whatsoever, both in respect to our Conscience, and that we may not by such a Breach upon our Statutes, expose our Constitution to a Forfeiture, nor do Evil that Good may come on it.

To the third. We conceive us shall be more acceptable to all good Men, the doing honestly according to our Conscience, than for voluntarily and unjustly departing from our Right.

To the fourth. We pretend not to make it a Question, whether his Majesty, by his Authority Royal, as Supreme Visitor, can grant a Commission for Visitation of any College that has a Head Visitor by their Statutes, and are not Royal Foundations: But we are advised, that by Commission can be granted under the Great Seal to Visitors, to purge and displace Members of Colleges whose Places are Forfeited by Absence, or otherwise; but they must proceed according to legal Diligence, that is, by the Laws and Statutes of the Land, and the local Statutes of the College. And Places concerned for the Heads and Fellowships of Colleges are temporal Possessions, and cannot be impugned by summary Proceedings. One Dr. Thomas Lorton, President of our College, was deprived in Queen Elizabeth's time, by the Bishop of Worcester, the legal Visitor thereof, established by Royal Authority, and he appealed to the Queen; but by the advice of all the Judges it was held, that the Queen, by her Authority as Supreme Visitor, could not meddle in it, but he must bring Worcester's will, because Deprivation was a Cause merely temporal; the King has a great Authority spiritual as well as temporal; but no Commission can be authorized by the Crown to proceed in any Commission under the Great Seal, or otherwise, but according to Law; in spiritual Causes by the Canon-Law, in temporal by the civil Laws and Statutes of the Land. And wherein the Proceedings in some Commissions are directed to be in omnibus & de jure, &c. these Words are to be applied to Barren the Forms of Process, and not for Matter of Judgment. For Magna Charta provides for our spiritual Liberties, as well as our temporal. [Unpar. Relat. lib. 1. p. 200, 21.]

A. D. 1657. Command, not by Authority from the City: And that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen disowned the Invitation, and caused an Entry to be made in their Books (which the King took very ill, and from thence took occasion to call the Dissenters an ill-natured sort of People, which could not be gained) that the Nuncio came without their Knowledge.

[P. 1, p. 464.] On the other hand, Bishop Kenny, Archdeacon Edward, &c. are express, That it was contrived that he should be invited to come with the King himself: That he was received at Temple-Bar by the two Sheriffs; and that he was complimented by Sir John Slocoter, the Lord Mayor: Which, if true, implies, that he was invited by them, and not forced upon them by the Injunction of his Majesty: And the Intercourse of Acknowledgments and Civilities that passed between the Court and the City, the next Day, seems to argue, that both Parties were mutually satisfied; which could scarce have been, if there had been any such Force on one Side, or Protest on the other. Bishop Burnet farther asserts, That the King signified to the Lord Mayor (who was a Dissenter) that he might use what Form of Worship he liked bell in Gold-hall-Chapel, to the End that when a Popish Mayor should be in the Chair, he might have the like Indulgence: That the Lord Mayor instead of embracing this seemingly-gracious Offer, submitted it to the Consideration of the Commissioners for the Diocese of London, during the Bishop's Suspension; who gave it as their Opinion, that he could not accept of it without a Violation of the Laws; and that for this Project miscarried. The Truth is, that the Mayor trimmed between the King's Indulgence and the Laws: For in the Morning he went in state with the Sword, &c. to the established Church; and in the Afternoon he worshipped God after his own way, in his own Chapel at Greens Hall. This Moderation we find imputed to him for Righteousness; and as the whole Power of the City was now put into the Hands of the Nonconformists, by the Influence of the Prerogative in their favour, it is likewise held meritorious in them, that they exercised it on the Terms prescribed by the Legislature, by taking the Tests; ordering the 5th of November to be observed as usual, &c.

Hence it is apparent that the Papists had no concern in the immediate Government of the City; and, having engrossed the Cabinet wholly to themselves, they might well assign that Share of the public Spoils to their new Allies: In all other Corporations however, and on all the several Benches of Justice in England, not excepting even that of Middlesex, they had their full Share of Power, and lost no Opportunity of exerting it for the good of the Cause.

It is natural to imagine, that this cautious Behaviour of their new Allies could not fail to give Umbrage to the Papists: But no Repentment was shewn, because the Times would not bear it. For the same Reason that they were called in as Auxiliaries, it was still necessary to retain them. The People in a Body were still too strong for the Prerogative, but if divided might be subdued. On this known Maxim the Qualification was carefully preserved; Offices were overlooked, and every Tool and Engine of the Cabinet was kept perpetually employed in perfecting the grand Work of re-establishing, as well as re-placing, Popery on her ancient Throne.

All which had hitherto been done, had been done against the Laws; and repeated Experiments had now shewn, that whatever Professions Men made, they would obey, to their own Prejudice, no farther than they were obliged by those Laws. Even the French Protestants, who had been favoured with a Grant of the Stow-Chapel for a Place of Public-Worship, and who were now solicited by the Jesuits to resign it to them for a valuable Consideration, were taught by the opposing Lords, Hollis, Dandy, and Nottingham, to whom they applied for Advice, to reject their Offers. Let them pass for their wisest Measures! said they, with more Artifice, perhaps, than Ingenuity, suffer yourselves to be drawn out of your Church; for by that means you will do but your own Business and the Nation's. Apprehending therefore, with much Reason, that the Authority of the Laws would, in the end, prove too mighty for the Power of the Prerogative, the ruling Jesuits began to be more and more desirous of a constitutional Establishment, which could no otherwise be obtained than by the Sanction of a Parliament; and Parliaments they knew were like Quick-Sands, which change their Form and Situation as the Tide ebbs and flows. While the King remained under a Persuasion that the Church-Party were the fittest for his Purpose, they had seen the Influence of the Crown in Elections operate so successfully in favour of that Party, that the Dissenters and Malcontents of every other sort stood almost as effectually excluded from any Share of the Legislature, as if the like Bill had passed against them, as they had so warmly tickled for against the King when Duke of York: And hence they argued, that an extraordinary Exertion of the same Royal Influence would give a contrary Turn to the Scale, and enable them to give the Law in Parliament as absolutely as at Court. Accordingly they not only proceeded with more Vigour than ever in the modelling of Corporations (most of which were now reduced to an absolute Dependence on the King's Pleasure) by the old Expedient of Two Warrants, but a new Commission was issued to certain Lords, &c. under the Denomination of Regulators, with full Powers to judge of the Rights, Capacities, and Dispositions of Electors, and to qualify or disqualify Persons in Conformity to the Representations they received from their Agents, who were dispersed all over the Kingdom, to spy into the Principles, Characters and Deportments of all Men; that such only might be trusted with Votes as would return a true Representative of themselves; that is to say, Prostitutes and Bigots. Nor was this all, for his Majesty was further induced duced to order the Lords-Lieutenant of the several Counties to assemble their Deputies, as also the Justices of the Peace, and to put to them the following Questions, viz. 1. Whether, in case the King should think fit to call a Parliament, and they should be chosen Members of it, they would vote for the Repeal of the Test and Penal Laws? 2. Whether, as Electors, they would vote for such Candidates as they had reason to think would do the same? 3. Whether, in case they chose a Neutrality, they would live in Fellowship, as Christians ought to live, with those who differed from them in Religion, agreeable to the Principle contained in the Declaration of Indulgence? Such of the Lieutenants as refused to comply with this Order, were turned out; as were also such of the Deputies and Justices as did not in their Answers come up to the Expectation of the Court. And that the whole Kingdom might be thoroughly apprised of the great Point in view, the following Notice was given in the Gazette: "His Majesty having by his gracious Declaration of the 4th of April last, granted a Liberty of Conscience to all his Subjects; and resolving not only to maintain the same, but to use his utmost Endeavours that it may pass into a Law, and become an established Security to After-Ages; hath thought fit to review the Lists of the Deputy-Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace in the several Counties, that those may be continued who shall be ready to contribute what in them lies towards the Accomplishment of so good and necessary a Work; and such others added to them, from whom his Majesty may reasonably expect the like Concurrence and Assistance." As to the Effect of all this Apparatus, it was various, and has been as variously represented.

[Vol. II. p. 495.]
 Bishop Kennet asserts, That in some Counties almost all the Gentry disappeared on a sudden, to avoid the Summons of the Lords Lieutenants: That those of Devonshire, in particular, declared in Effect, That they could return no Answer, except by their Representatives in a free Parliament: And that in Cheshire, out of seven hundred Persons, but seventeen could be found who would enter into the Engagements required. But Bishop Burnet says, That many Counties answered very boldly in the Negative: That others refused to give any Answer; which was understood to be equivalent to a Negative; and that even the new Mayor and most of the new Aldermen of London were among the latter: And, according to Sir John Rerby, the most general Answer returned by the Protestants of the Church of England, was, That in case they were chosen, they would vote as Reason and Conscience should direct them: That as Electors, they would vote for such as they believed would do the same: And that they would live peaceably with all Men, as good Christians and loyal Subjects.

[P. 253.]
 Burnet moreover adds, That those who had refused to oppose the Court, became more encouraged than ever by the Discovery now made of the Sense of the Nation in these Matters: And yet, continues his Lordship, such Care was taken in naming the Sheriffs and Mayors for the next Year, that it was believed the King was resolved to hold a Parliament within that time, and to have such a House of Commons returned, whether regularly chosen or not, as should serve his Ends. He also adds, "It was concluded, that the King would make use both of his Power and his Troops, either to force Elections, or to put the Parliament under a Force when it should meet; for it was so positively said, That the King would carry his Point, and there was so little Appearance of his being able to do it in a fair and regular way, that it was generally believed, some very desperate Resolution was now taken up, &c." But this is no more than Suggestion; and no one Fact is brought to support it: The King, indeed, as hath been already mentioned, had his Troops encamped this Summer on Hamble Heath, in like manner as the Year before; but then his Majesty seemed more concerned for their Conversion to his Religion, than to render them serviceable to his Politics: That he had, however, determined to make his last Appeal to Force, is not unlikely; but then it would have been his last: Nor can it be supposed that, when he was in quest of a Legislative Authority for what he had done, he should frustrate his own Pur suit, by having Recourse to Violence. Besides, the People as a Herd were already at his Mercy, and might have been dragooned into any thing: Whereas, when represented in Parliament, they grew formidable even to the Throne; as his Majesty had good reason to remember, from his Share in his Father's Sufferings.

What had the worst Aspect of all, while he was thus endeavouring to prevail the very Parliament itself into his Service, he continued to act as if his Prerogative was all-sufficient, and all the Rights and Powers of Government centered in his own Will and Pleasure. Thus, in the Beginning of November, Father Petre made a Private Council-
 public Notice was given in the Gazette, that Father Edward Petre, Clerk of the Closet, had been honoured with a Seat at the Council-Board: And, about the same time, he caused a new ecclesiastical Commission to be issued out to Watson Bishop of Chesler, Wright Lord Chief-Justice, and Jamieson one of the Barons of the Exchequer, to take cognizance of the late Proceedings at Maxwell-College, Oxon, as supreme Visitors, &c. In virtue whereof, their Lordships made their Entrance into that Place on the 20th, guarded by three Troops of Horse, who were to quarter there as long as the Hearings lasted. On the next Day, having convened the President and Fellows before them, their Lordships opened their Commission, and the Bishop of Chesler, as Chief, in a florid Harangue, declaimed very fiercely against Disloyalty; insisted, that the Church of England taught an unconditional and unqualified Obedience; as also, that the King's gracious Promises to Archbishops and Bishops, in his Declaration, deserved Thanks, on bended Knees: Said, it could not be expected, but that the King would give all the Encouragement

A. D. 1687. ment to those of his own Religion that he could, without Severity and Cruelty, which he abhorred, or Injury to the Church of England; as at present established by Law: That this Corporation, as well as others, was the Creature of the Crown: That it was Injustice in their local Statutes to spurn against their Maker: That their Discontents had brought this Vilitation upon them, the Consequence of which might be mischievous, both to the Church and University, &c. He then exhorted them, in the Bowels of Christ, to consider these things; and, through the Whole, intermingled Promises with Threats, and every other Inducement that might prevail with them to persevere themselves, in compliance to his Majesty, and his Religion. But they continued deaf as ever to the Voice of the Charmer. Dr. Hoagh, in the Quality of President, stood forth at their Head, and, with an equal Mixture of Courage and Address, defended their Rights, and asserted his own. Being asked, whether he would submit to the Vilitation? he replied, As far as it was consistent with the Laws of the Land, and the Statutes of the College; and he twice demanded that this might be recorded. Being asked, on the second Day, whether he would submit to the Decree of the Commissioners ecclesiastic, by which his Election was declared null? he asserted, That the said Decree was in itself a Nullity: That there could be no other President as long as he lived, &c. That therefore he should not submit to their Decree, nor resign the Keys, which, together with the Statute-books, were the Badge of his Office. This Firmness he however qualified with many dutiful Expressions with regard to his Majesty; but without effect: The King's Proctor accused him of Contumacy: And the Bishop, in the Name of the Bench, struck his Name out of the College-book, and admonished the Fellows to submit no longer to his Authority. On the same Day, their Lordships put the Question to the Fellows, whether they would assist at the Instalment of the Bishop of Oxford, as President, by virtue of the King's Mandate? To which two answered doubtfully, one (Charneck) in the Affirmative, and all the rest in the Negative: And, in the Afternoon of the same Day, Dr. Hoagh, in open Court, protested against all their Proceedings as illegal, unjust, and null, and appealed to the King in his Courts of Justice: With which undaunted Proceeding the Scholars and Strangers then present were so transported, that they gave a loud Huzz, in testimony of their Applause: This, it seems, was not only undecisive as an Insult to the Court, but the poor President was made answerable for it; and, though he offered to purge himself by Oath from being any way accessory, the Chief-Justice obliged him to give in Bail for his Appearance at the King's Bench on the 12th of November ensuing, on the Penalty of 2000*l*.

The next Day, the Commissioners having called in the Bishop of Oxford's Proxy, and read the Royal Mandate for his Admission, again put the Question to the Fellows, who-ther they would assist at his Instalment? which they again refusing, their Lordships adjourned to the Chapel, where they installed the said Proxy themselves, and then conducted him to the President's Lodgings, which, having caused them to be broke open by a Messenger and Tippstaff, they put him in possession of; none of the Fellows (except Charneck) assisting, or being present at either of these violent Proceedings. In hope, however, that they would submit to that, when done, which they would not be concerned in doing, their Lordships required the said Fellows to submit to the new President, thus obtained upon them: Dr. Fairfax refused; the rest demurred, and in the Afternoon delivered in a written Paper, containing these Words: "That whereas his Majesty hath been pleased, by his Royal Authority, to cause the Right Reverend Father in God Samuel Bishop of Oxen to be installed President, whose Names are hereunto subscribed do submit, as far as is lawful, and agreeable to the Statutes of the College, and no way prejudicial to the Right and Title of Dr. Hoagh." This, having the Face of a Consent, proved acceptable to their Lordships, who were apparently glad of any Pretence to rid their Hands of such a troublesome Affair: To render it however yet more palatable to the Court, they prevailed with the Society to leave out the latter Clause, relating to Dr. Hoagh, Wright and Jenner assuring them, that they were of no Significaney towards the Doctor's Service.

The next Step was, to send an Account of their Proceedings to Whitehall, together with a Copy of the Paper thus signed by the Fellows: And, to fill up the Time till his Majesty's Pleasure should be known thereon, they deprived Dr. Fairfax, (who had kept pace with the President in every Instance of Steadiness and Bravery) of his Fellowship, for having denied the Authority of the Court, refusing to obey the Bishop of Oxen whom the King had made President, and taking Commons after he had been suspended.

On the 28th, having received the Dispatch they waited for, their Lordships assembled the Fellows once more, and the Bishop of Chester gave them to understand, "That his Majesty expected some further Submission; and that it was their Lordships Advice, that they should comply with his Expectations, by acknowledging the Contempt they had shewn his sacred Person, by promising to behave more loyally for the future, by avowing the Justice and Legality of the Court, and throwing themselves at his Feet, to implore his Pardon." The Fellows staring at this unexpected Proposal, the Bishop, as a Matter of Grace, added, That they might word it themselves; and they withdrew, as if in order to obey him: But the Paper delivered at their Return rather implied a Concern that they had already so far submitted, than a Disposition to make any farther Submission: For therein they made use of these Words: "Being conscious we have done nothing but what our Oaths and Statutes indispensably oblige us to, we cannot make any Declaration whereby we acknowledge knowledge that we have done any thing amiss; having acted according to the Principles of Loyalty and Obedience, so far as we could, without doing Violence to our Consciences, or Prejudice to our Rights." The Commissioners were now surprized in their turn, and complained, that this fell short of their former Paper: The Fellows justified themselves; and, in particular, one Fulham denied that they had been guilty of any Contempt towards his Majesty; said, That, as their Lordships had been pleased to accept their former Answer, their Honour was engaged, as he conceived, that no more should be required of them: And Dr. Bailey explained away even the Force of that Answer, by intimating, that they meant no more by it, than to submit or give way to the single Act of installing the Bishop of Oxford, but not to yield him any future Obedience: The Fellows in general then declared, they could not obey the said Bishop as President. Fulham moreover asserted, that the Right was solely in Dr. Hough; and being asked by their Lordships, whether he would obey the Bishop, as in possession? he answered in the Negative, because he had not lawful Possession, which, as he was informed, was to be given by the Sheriff, with the Posse Comitatus. This threw the Lord Chief-Justice into such a Rage, that he said, "Pray who is the best Lawyer, you or I? Your Oxford Law is no better than your Oxford Divinity.— If you have a mind to a Posse Comitatus, you may have one soon enough."— Fulham would have apologized for what he had said, but was interrupted, and, together with the rest of the Society, ordered to withdraw: After which, the Buttery-book was called for; and Fulham, being brought in again, was suspended from the Profits of his Fellowship, during his Majesty's Pleasure; for, what was called, his Contempt, and opprobrious Language.— Their Lordships then adjourned the Court till the 16th of November, and returned to London to make their Report, and receive new Instructions; which were become the more necessary, as the Affair was become more perplexed and embroiled than ever.

All the Nation, by this time, had their Eyes fixed on this extraordinary Proceeding, and thought themselves concerned in the Event: And, if the King was openly the Aggressor on the one side, it can scarce be supposed, that the opposing Lords, and others, did not, underhand, spirit up the Fellows to abide all Extremities on the other. But, how popular soever their Cause was, or how strongly soever it was supported, his Majesty unhappily resolved to carry his Point at all hazards: Accordingly, the same Commissioners made another Parade to Oxford; and, having opened their Court at Magdalen College, on the very Day fixed by the late Adjournment, entered one Turner and one Alibone actual Fellows, by their own Authority, in the stead of Paisley deprived and Ludford deceased: All Oaths being dispensed with, except that of a Fellow; which being done, the Bishop, in a long and elaborate (s) Speech, severely upbraided the

Society

(s) In these memorable Words:

Your many Contempts, and wilful Disobedience, have occasioned this Visitacion, which will end at last in your Ruin. This Society of yours has been long exercised in the Methods of Quarrelling; it has always been troubled with schismatical Spirits, and many Murmurs, ever since the Restoration of the late King. You have encouraged Quarrels among yourselves; Quarrels between yourselves and President; Quarrels at length, between yourselves and Visitor. For I have often heard your late Visitor complain, that this Society was ever beset with an insolent and turbulent Generation. By these Steps, from quarrelling with the President and Visitor, you have at last advanced to the highest Pitch of Insolence, to quarrel with your Prince, and affront his sacred Majesty. I endeavoured before, at the opening our Commission, to make you sensible of the Scandal that your Disobedience will bring upon your Religion; how much you stain and dishonour your liberal and ingenious Education, in this Society.

You cannot but know his Majesty is your Supreme Ordinary. You cannot but have read Becket's story, who was twenty Years Lord Chief-Justice under King Henry III. Now prosecutus fuisse rios displicere, ut dicitur contra factum qui nocere. All Disobedience implies Pride; for no Man can disobey his Governor, but he who thinks himself wiser. The Reputation and Honour of a Prince at home, and his Respect abroad, are the chief Standards of a Government. But these Pillars, as much as in you lies, you have endeavoured to shake. And, unless his Majesty's Honour and Right be vindicated by us, he can neither be feared at home, nor obeyed abroad: Your Punishment must be as public as your Crime. It cannot be concealed but his Majesty, in Justice, in Honour, in Clemency, and in his Royal Tenderness, could have proceeded otherwise than he has done. On the 16th of April it was published, that Dr. Clark was dead: On the seventh a Mandamus was directed to you, for choosing Mr. Bowyer. On the ninth you presented a Petition to the Lord President; wherein you had your selves prostrate at his Majesty's Feet, repenting to him the Incapacities of Mr. Bowyer; desiring the Benefits of his gracious Declaration for preserving your Rights and Properties, and detesting him to nominate another Person qualified according to your Statute, in the Edition of whom you would be your ready Obedience. So said and so done, Gentlemen, had been very well.

But, immediately after the Delivery of the Petition, you, not waiting his Majesty's Answer, proceeded on April the fifteenth to an Election of Dr. Hough: So that by this Act, which was plainly contrary to his Majesty's Authority, whose Mandate did certainly imply an Inhibition, you directly contemned your former Promises of steady Obedience, and were resolved to give the King nothing but good Words: When you had done this, as Men of ill Design are always impatient for a Commission of it, you immediately went and surprised your Visitor, and by that means periodical him to condemn Dr. Hough, that very Day he received an Order from the Lord President to the contrary.

Upon this News the King was much amazed, and required an Account of your Proceedings: Therefore the Lords Commissioners issued out a Citation, and, after hearing the Plea, upon mature Consideration with the Learned of both Laws, judged the pretended Election of Dr. Hough to be void and null, and him to be removed, by an Interdictum dated the which was affixed on the Gate. After this, a Mandate was sent on the to you to elect the Bishop of Ossa; upon which Terms, his Majesty was graciously pleased to dispense with your Disobedience hitherto. But, this being disobeyed, his Majesty in person, on the fourth of September, sent for you to Christ-Church, and required you immediately to elect the Bishop of Ossa President. You went first to the Chapel, a Place one would think should have inspired more Devotion and Awe of his sacred Majesty in you; and there contemptuously blasphemed and signed a Paper, directly thwarting his Majesty's Command. The Ground of your Disobedience, you presented, that you could not elect him; whereas you could not but know, by a written Mandate that lay by you, that obsequies would have finished his Majesty. Confidence, the false topic of Rebellion, was here brought to vindicate your peculiar and obstinacious Behaviour. You presented, that you were obliged by Oaths; and I am sorry that at the same time you forget that of Allegiance. And indeed there is not a greater Sign of Hypocrisy than partial Obedience. Had you any Respect to the Father of your Country, and your Mother the Church, you would have sacrificed your pretended Scruples, as a Peace offering, to the King. The best of us, I am sure, have Reason to give God and the King's Pardon.

Society with their manifold Offences, which he took care to recapitulate minutely, and in the Conclusion required them to sign the following humble Petition and Submission, before they left the Room, viz. "We your Majesty's most humble Petitioners, have a deep Sense of being justly fallen under your Majesty's Displeasure for our Disobedience and Contempt to your Majesty, and to the Authority of your Majesty's Commissioners and Visitors: We do in all Humility prosecute ourselves at your Majesty's Feet, humbly begging your Pardon for our said Offences, and promising that we will for the future behave ourselves more dutifully; and as a Testimony thereof, we do acknowledge the Authority of your Majesty's said Visitors, and the Justice of their Proceedings. And we do declare our entire Submission to the Lord Bishop of Oxen as our President."

This being read, the Vice-President, Aldworth, required time to consider of it, and Leave to answer it in Writing; but both his Requests were refused, Jennour telling him, That no Answer would be admitted but Aye or No. The Vice-President then entering into the Merits of the Case, and urging the Statutes of the College, the Bishop told him, "Their Statutes were over-ruled by the King's Authority." Aldworth reply'd, That the very Visitation then subsisting, imply'd, that there were certain Laws and Statutes which they were to be governed by, &c. His Lordship then asked, whether they were not to obey the King as well as the Founder's Statutes? And Aldworth answered, That as those Statutes had been confirmed by several Kings and Queens, they obey'd the King in obeying them. The Bishop upon this observed, That they had never been confirmed by the present King; but was silenced by one Dr. John Smith, who said, That neither had they been repealed by him, and what was not repealed, was confirmed. Thus their Lordships finding that in point of Argument they were like to have the worst of it, they had recourse to their Authority, and required the Fellows to sign without any farther Delay. But as they could not enforce Conviction, so neither could they exact Obedience. The Vice-President first refused; and after him all the other Fellows did the same, except two (Mr. Thomas Smith and Charneck;) Nothing therefore remained but for the Court to close their Proceedings; which they did the same Day, by depriving the said Vice-President and Fellows of their respective Fellowships, and fixing the Sentence on the College Gates. On the first of December following a Brief of the whole Affair was published in the Gazette, under such Colours as would best serve to dazzle the Public, by justifying their Lordships the Commissioners, and making the President and Fellows the Authors of their own Misfortunes. In the Gazette of the 15th, Notice was given in the Name of the whole Ecclesiastical Commission, that their Lordships had declared, decreed, and pronounced, that the said President and Fellows should be incapable of receiving or being admitted to any Ecclesiastical Dignity, Benefice, or Promotion; and that such of them as were not as yet in Holy Orders, were adjudged incapable of receiving or being admitted into the same. And and declared incapable of Preference.

Pardon. But you, as if his Majesty reigned by Courtesy, would have a King under you, but none over you. You urged the Observance of your Statutes, of which, as it hath appeared, you have not been so constant Observers: When your own Honour prompts you to a Dispensation, then you can easily embrace it, without but find of being served per Male, by which great Scandals have come to this Society by reason of Bishops.

But when the King interposed, in whose Power alone it is to dispense with them, then you presently act according to such Methods as these. None of these Pretences will ease you with wife and sober Men.

This was the only Opinion his Majesty in his Progress received: Wherever his sacred Majesty came, he witness'd a universal Contention, except in Oxford; and so far failed every one with the Equity of his Proceedings, that none went away discontented from his Presence, unless it was for this Reason, that they could not enjoy it any longer.

On the 20th we came down: and, upon opening our Commission, I took care to represent to you the Heinousness of your Offence, and to persuade you to a serious Repentance, but all in vain.

For on Wednesday Morning, we required you to admit and install the Bishop of Oxen; which all, except three refused: In the Afternoon Dr. King, having been deprived, and by us commanded to depart the College, came unto us without any Leave, but not without great Attendance; Circumstances, I think, much unbecoming a Man pronounced expelled; and there entered a Protestation against all that we had done, or hereafter should do, as illegal, unjust, and null; which he delivered not in Writing, but by Word of Mouth; and a third respondent to the Nature of all Appeals, and, which was worse, without the usual Salve to his Majesty's Supreme Power. When he had spoken it, there followed such a tumultuous, sedition, and insolent Humour; which, if you yourselves had not applauded, or at least consented to, it was impossible but that you would have discovered some of those Mutinies. However, since his Carriage and Language gave occasion to it, 'twas thought fit that he only should be obnoxious; and accordingly he was bound over.

On Thursday we ourselves caused the Bishop of Oxen to be installed by his Proxy; after which we proposed to you, whether, being now installed, you would submit to him in Civitate et Imperio. To which you gave an Answer under your Seals in the Affirmative. You then also desired us to represent your Case favourably to his Majesty, giving all Assurance of your Loyalty and Obedience: but his Assurance of Submission lasted not long; for, on Thursday, being required of us to subscribe such a Submission to his Majesty as we thought agreeable to your Duty, you required Time to consult of it; and, after Deliberation, signed such a Paper, which seemed rather to be a Protestation against your former Submission, than an Acknowledgment of your Crime. Upon this we might justly then have proceeded to an Expulsion; but we thought fit, in compliance to you, to take a Journey to London, and acquaint his Majesty with your Disobedience and ungrateful Behaviour. His Majesty was extremely amazed that his Clemency should be despised; but yet, to your Comfort be it spoken, his Patience and Goodness extends as far as your Proveniences can: But if you still persist in your Obstinacy, these that are too tall to stand, and too stubborn to bend, desire to be broken. And now, I think, I have said enough to let you know, that the Highways you have so artificially lined together, are now full-time to cover your Nakedness. I wish to God you had the same Tentations for your Concern, as his Majesty's Commissioners have for you. But if you still persist to oppose the Royal Power of the King, we, who are come to vindicate the Royal Honour of his Majesty, resolved to discharge our Conscience and Duties in God and the King, without any Respect of Popularity; and that's but the Business of Faith, and Sense of what Men: And therefore, as for us, we have no more regard to People's Opinions, than what they dream: by reason therefore of your late hypocritical Submission, the Commissioners have thought fit, upon mature Consideration, to draw up an Instrument, which shall be read to you, to which, if you still immediately subscribe, before you leave the Room, we shall leave you to his Majesty's Pardon: And this we expect from you all, except Mr. Thomas Smith and Mr. Charneck, with whose Behaviour the King is so well satisfied, that he expects no more from them.

A.D. 1687.

And on the 21st following the Earl of Sunderland prefixed his Imprimatur to a VINDICATION of the Proceedings of the COMMISSIONERS; in which it is asserted among a Variety of other Matters, That the King had done nothing to contradict the Promise he had made of protecting the Church of England as by Law established; That he had been to very tender in that Point as not to go so far as justly he might: That it was impossible for those of that Church to arraign the Authority of his Majesty's Commissioners, or to condemn the Legality of their Proceedings, without condemning themselves for what they had done against the Puritans: That the Agreement between what the King had done, and the Church-of-England-Law, was so exact and full, that it was also impossible for Churchmen to vindicate the Proceedings of the Magdalen-Fellows, without tearing up the very Foundation of their own Ecclesiastical Constitution: That the Legislative Power in Matters Ecclesiastical, was lodged in the King, which Power was too ample to be limited by Act of Parliament: That the King could grant whatever Dispensations the Pope had formerly done, provided the things dispens'd with were not mala in se: That the Magdalen-Fellows were no longer obliged by their Statutes after they had received his Majesty's Dispensation, which took away all their Forces: That in denying the Jurisdiction of the Court, they endeavoured to ravish from the King a part of his Supremacy: That in pretending Conscience in Excuse for their Disobedience, they made use of the very Cant which those of their own Church had so often exploded: That when the POOR DISSIDENTS, who had not gone half so far in their Disobedience to the regal Authority, had made use of the same Plea, the Prelatists had censur'd them as schismaticus, factious, and rebellious and declar'd them incapable of any Ecclesiastical Benefice: And lastly, that it was his Majesty's Royal Pleasure, that his Commissioners should not exercise that Severity against those of the Church, which they had exercised against their Protestant Brethren; nor to take those Advantage: against them which he might, unless he should be drove to it by some most violent Provocation.

Thus whatever could contribute to widen the Breach between the King and the Church, was steadily pursued, inasmuch that Commissioners were not only appointed, and Offices opened to receive, but Advertisements were set forth in the Gazette to encourage, Informations of what Money or Goods had been seiz'd or levied for any Matter relating to Religion, since the 29th of September, 1677; at once to expose the persecuting Spirit of the Church of England, and to make a Merit of his Majesty's gracious Purposes towards the several Sufferers.

By the Courtesy of England our Kings are understood to do nothing but by Advice; and hence their Ministers are supposed to be only answerable for their Misdeeds. It does not however appear that this Maxim was over-scrupulously regarded by any Party while King James was yet in Possession of the Throne: But afterwards when a different Turn was to be served, it was passionately espoused; The Nation was taught, that his Majesty was betray'd and deluded; that he gave himself up blindfold to the Earl of Sunderland's Direction; and that Advantage was taken of his Confidence and Credulity to push him on Measures that could not fail to end in his Destruction. "I confess, [Covent, p. 5.] says an Orthodox Son of the Church, I have thus far a charitable Opinion of the Intentions of that unhappy Prince; I believe he did not yet think of proceeding any farther in the Advancement of his own Religion, than to grant those of that Persuasion the free Exercise of their Worship, and restore them to a Capacity of holding Employments, that he might be at Liberty to use and reward the Services of such of them, as he thought merited his Favour.

But, if he was drawn from his first Resolutions, and his Actions in the Course of his Reign afterwards give any Umbrage of farther Designs in View, it was owing to a Treachery unparalleled by any Instance to be met with in the Records of Time, except that of the arch Traitor Judas: And in every Circumstance, one excepted, the Villany of this betrayed Prince's perfidious Servant exceeds that of his elder Brother, as much as it falls short in that one; the Treason of Judas being a single Act suddenly thought of and executed, and almost as soon repented of; but the other was a Course of the blackest Treachery and Ingratitude, continued thro' a Number of Years, and never followed by any Marks of Penitence, he and his Party being utter Strangers to every thing of that nature." Who this second Judas was, we learn from the Character of the Earl of Sunderland, which follows; "He was cut out by Nature for a Politician, endued with a ready, penetrating Wit, an extended Forecast, and a sedate Spleen; he was a close Dissembler of Injuries received, and a nice Observer as well as a subtle Flatterer of the Failings and Weaknesses of Princes (two Qualities proper to gain and keep an Ascendant over them); nor was he clogged with the troublesome Incumbrances of Honour or Conscience, which might embarrass the free Exercise of his natural Qualifications.

When in Disgrace, he did not, like some other discarded Statesman of that Party, openly declare War against the Court, and set the Nation in a Blaze; he had seen the ill Success of that in his Friend and Fellow-Labourer, Shaftsbury; but lying quiet a while, and finding the Wind blow hard against his Party, he veered his Sails to another Point.

The Ax which cut off Monmouth's Head, had made a clear Stage for Sunderland's Hero (the Prince of Orange): That dangerous Rival had entirely possessed the meaner Hearts of the Faction, which might now be easily centered in the other; so that from that Action, which seemed to secure King James, and quiet his Possession, may be dated his Ruin.

all laid on
Lord Sunderland.

A. D. 1687.

He had by his Arts gained an entire Ascendant over the King, and found out his weak Side, who, like most Men naturally honest, was credulous and easy to be persuaded; but he was also impatient of Opposition, and zealous even to Bigotry in a Religion, as opposite to the Humour as the Interest of his People.

This was as fit a Disposition as could possibly be for Sunderland's Purpose; but as this chief Actor was not able to sustain all the Parts of his Tragi-Comedy himself, his next Care was to chuse such about the King, as might be proper to receive his Impressions, and carry on his Plot, or rather be carried on by it. The Royal Consort had a great Influence over a too uxorious Prince, was as great a Bigot as he, and of a haughty, ambitious Spirit; and was doubtless, on many Occasions, made subservient to the Designs of this Machiavel: But his chief Engine was Father Petre, a light, conceited, proud, daring, ambitious, covetous Priest, a great Dabber in Politics, in which he was always out of his Depth. This Tool, Sunderland, pitched on as a fit Vehicle to convey his poisoned Counsels to the King's Ear; which being always gilded with the specious Pretences of advancing the King's Prerogative and Religion, the vain, ignorant Ecclesiastic fondly adopted as his own; so that the Contriver seemed only obediently compliant in the Furtherance of his own Projects, and had an excellent Opportunity of clearing himself of the Guilt.

Thus muffled with Zeal, and under the Conduct of Fools and Knaves, it is no wonder the King fell into the Pit his Enemies had dug for him; so that from this time, almost every Act of his Reign was a Step towards his Ruin.

To effect which, all Efforts were to be used to remove the only Supporters of his Crown; the Loyalty of the Church of England was to be unhinged, if possible, to clear a Passage to the Throne; their Services were to be rewarded with Discouragements and Hardships, that the King might be deprived of them at his Need; and the Yoke of Government laid so heavy upon their Necks, as should force them at any rate to endeavour to ease their Condition.

Thus we have it confessed, that even Non-refusing Churchmen may be provoked by ill Usage to resist, and to spurn at the Yoke they are unable to bear. And as to the Charge so bitterly laid against the Earl Sunderland, we find him in the Face of the World denying a great Part of it. According to his Lordship's Apology, it was well known, that he had defended Magdalen College for a good while, by his own good Management; tho' all the several Letters and Orders transmitted to that Body, were signed by him: That he had many hundreds of times begged of the King not to grant Mandamuses, nor to change any thing in the regular Course of Ecclesiastical Affairs; That the King often inclined to follow his Opinion, but was over-ruled against his own Sense by others: That even Complaints were prefer'd to his Majesty against him for his Opposition to the Repeal of the Tests and Penal Laws, as a Man who ruined all his Designs: That he hinder'd the Dissolution of the Parliament for several Weeks, by representing that they would do any thing but give up the Church to oblige him: That in case he dissolved it, he must give over all Thoughts of Foreign Affairs; for no other would assist him but on such Terms as would ruin the Monarchy, and either abroad or at home, he must be undone if any Accident should happen, of which many were to be apprehended, to make the Aid of his People necessary to him: That all this, and much more, he had said both privately and in the hearing of others: That the Parliament was broke, and the cloistering went on in consequence of his being over-power'd; and that his great Fault consisted in continuing to serve, after his Advice had been so often and so fatally over-ruled, when he ought to have quitted, &c.

When pernicious Measures are pursued in the Cabinet, there is in truth no effectual way even for Innocence itself to avoid the Imputation of being concerned in them, but by quitting the infected Place. But whoever is understood to be the Lord of the Ascendant there, as this Nobleman certainly was, must expect to bear the whole Infamy of the whole Administration. The People have it not in their Power to discriminate; nor, if they had, would they hold a Man excusable, for having said what was right, and acted what was wrong. It is said this Nobleman stood so high in his Majesty's Favour, that he would scarce grant any Suit to any Person, unless at his Instance, or under his Approbation: That when his Majesty was told he got all the Money of the Court, he replied, He desired it: And that when any Application was made to him, his usual Question, with regard to the soliciting Parties, was Have they spoke to Sunderland? If, therefore, he introduced Father Petre to the Council-board, against the Consent of the Queen, and the most considerable Roman-Catholics, as is asserted by Mr. Echard, and not denied even by his Lordship, and that Father advised on the one hand what his Lordship opposed on the other, it may, upon the Whole, be concluded, without any great Violence to Truth, that he really did act a double Part: But that he did so for the Prince of Orange's sake deserves further Consideration: Like a true Statesman he had ever his own Establishment in View, and consequently every Turn he made was for his own Interest. If he foresaw that the King was likely to fall into Danger, it is next to impossible that he should foresee the Prince's Success: That was too remote, and depended on too many Contingencies for such a Refiner to build all his Hopes upon: But by temporising with each in Turn, he made sure, as he thought, to reign with the one, or triumph with the other.

It is now time to make a Transition to the Affairs of Ireland under the Vicegerency of Tyrconnel. It is in the Provinces that the true

A. D. 1687. true Temper of Government is best understood; and to know what further Reason the Protestants of England had for their Fears, it is necessary to touch on the Hardships imposed on their Brethren there. We have already observed, that it was in the Beginning of the Year that the new Lieutenant landed at Dublin; and the London Gazette adds, that never was seen so great a Concourse of People, at any chief Governor's Landings; as at his, nor did they ever express their Satisfaction with louder Acclamations: But, according to other Authors, never was the Sword of that Kingdom wash'd with so many Tears, as when it was put into his Hand. Both perhaps are in the right: For as the Protestants look'd on his Promotion to that Post, as portending their utter Ruin; so the Papists, who were by far the Majority of the Populace, look'd upon it as an Earnest of all the Good that possibly could befall them. Their Conduct, it seems, was exactly justifiable to the Difference of their Sentiments: The Papists, as if already licenced to do Mischief, committed a thousand Excesses, at the Expence of their Protestant Neighbours, Friends, Patrons, and Benefactors; and Numbers of the Latter, unable to bear such Treatment, and dreading worse to come, made haste to sell off their Estates, and take leave of a Country where they could no longer live in Security, or find Protection. This Circumstance we have found already touch'd upon in Tyrconnel's Answer to Lord Clarendon's farewell Speech: And as soon as he entred upon his Office, as his Master had done before him, he set forth a Declaration, to quiet the Fears of the People, according to him, unjustly and maliciously raised, and heightened by some few fiery Spirits, who had in the Pulpit taken upon them to treat of Matters that did not lie within their Province, in which, he gave them to understand, that he was particularly charg'd by his Majesty to assure them, that his Intentions were to govern by Law, to indulge them in the free Exercise of their Religion, and to protect them in their several Properties and Privileges agreeable thereto; and that he was himself resolv'd to render his own Behaviour exactly and perfectly agreeable to his Majesty's said Commands. But then their Performance in their Duty and Allegiance to his Majesty, without giving any Occasion of Disturbance to the public Peace, was made the Condition of all this Grace and Benevolence; and they were moreover strictly charg'd and required to forbear speaking any undutiful or irreverent Expressions of his Majesty's sacred Person and Government, on pain of being prosecuted according to the utmost Rigor of the Law. The inviolable Observation of the Act of Settlement, which was call'd the Magna Charta of Ireland, and which had hitherto made the principal Clause in every such Address, was moreover left out in this: And this important Omission, which had been deliberately and purposely made, after the Matter had been debated at the Council-board, gave more Pain to those who had reaped the Benefit of the said Act, than it was in the Power of any other Assurance to remove. At the same time, the Proclamation set forth by Lord Clarendon, for suppressing Tories and their Harbours, was renewed; all Magistrates were required to put it in force; "And we do expect, said his Excellency, that such as are instrumental in apprehending the said Tories should be rewarded for their good Services." Upon the Heels of this came out another Sumo Instruction, to bind the Soldiers to their good Behaviour, on pain of being cashiered, and suffering such other Punishment, as, in the last Retort, the Lord-Lieutenant and Council should think fit and proper to inflict. And now, the Outside of Government being thus speciously gloss'd over, his Excellency and his Creatures address'd themselves, with all imaginable Vigour and Dispatch, to give such a Bias to the Interior, as would most effectually further the Catholic Cause, and with it their own peculiar Interests.

Accordingly one of their first Measures was, to complete the Reform of the several Branches of Judicature. Fittes, the new Lord Chancellor, has been already spoken of, but, to complete his Character, it is necessary to add, that even upon the Bench he has been heard to say, "That the Protestants were all Rogues! And that, among forty thousand of them, there was not one that was not a Traitor, a Rebel, and a Villain." Under him, as Masters in Chancery, were placed, one Stofford, a popish Priest, and one O'Neal, whose Father was infamous for being one of the most active Murderers in the horrid Massacre in 1641. If Stofford, the Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, because of his Alliance by Marriage to Lord Sunderland, was not removed, Nugent, the Son of another of those inhuman Rebels, and a professed Papist, had a Grant of the Reversion of his Place; and while he lived, which was not long, sat beside him on the same Bench, collegued with one Lynden, who, oppress'd with the Weight of a numerous Family, and other Encumbrances, lay under the cruel Necessity of sacrificing his Conscience to his Place. In the Exchequer, from which only, of all the Courts in Ireland, there lies no Appeal, or Writ of Error, in England, one Rice was made Lord Chief-Baron; a noted Gambler, who had no better Qualification for his Office than his avowed Hatred to all Protestants, and a Cavalier Saying of his, "That, if ever he became a Judge, he would drive a Coach and six Horses through the Act of Settlement." His two Coadjutors were of the same Leaven with himself, and Worth, in particular, is upon Record, for being the leading Voice to determine every Cause against the English, or Protestant, Interest. In the Common-Pleas, the Lord Chief-Justice Kerling, tho' a Protestant, made a Shift to maintain his Ground, on a Presumption that he was well-inclined to the Cause; and under the Check of two such Assistants as were in every respect qualified to be the sworn Instruments of Will and Pleasure.

Privy Council.

We are farther told, That the Privy-Council, which, in Ireland more especially, has a very great Sway in the Government, was to modell'd that the Papists had the Majority; and Matters were besides managed there; that the Protestants still remaining among them, hackney'd as they had been in the dirty Roads of Power, grew to atham'd of appearing there, or so discontented at being on all Occasions over-ruled, that they declin'd giving their Attendance, and left the Drudgery to those who engros'd the Advantage.

And Council
Cause.

That the same Interest might be equally predominant all over the Kingdom, the Commissions of the Peace underwent also the like Regulation: Instead of the Names of active and zealous Protestants, those of zealous and active Papists were inserted; and tho' a few of the former were suffer'd to continue, for Countenance-sake, they were so few, that they were insignificant; and had upon every Occasion the Mortification to be not only overpowered, but by such as, for the most part, disgrac'd the Bench they sat on; the Sons of Felons and Murderers, and who inherited the worst Qualities of their Fathers: Nor was this all; for such Care was taken of the Lists of Sheriffs, that there was but one Protestant to be found in the whole Number; and he put in by mistake, for another of the same Surname, who had the Merit to plead of being a Papist.

But however large these Strides were, they fell short of the Point in sight. The Commissions were still in the Hands of Protestants, who had also Power by their Charters to elect their own Magistrates, with an Exclusion to all Papists. The same Commissions had also vested in them the Right of being represented in Parliament, and consequently, at every general Election, would rather return such Members as would remonstrate their Grievances, than such as would serve the crooked Purposes of the Court: Such Methods therefore were still to be taken as would break down the Mound, and let in a Majority of Irish Papists every where: And the first was by a Letter from the King, making it his Request, that, for the Encouragement of Trade, for uniting the Affections of the People, and for the Advancement of the common Good, they might be admitted to all the Privileges enjoy'd by any of his other Subjects. The Force of this Expedient was try'd on the City of Dublin: But they, alarmed at the Demand, and aware of the Consequences, returned for Answer, That they were restrained from complying by Act of Parliament, on pain of forfeiting all their Charters: And whatever Success the Project met with in the inferior Towns, it operat'd so slowly, that the Effect was scarce worth waiting for. In order, therefore, to quicken the Process, which was to render the whole Kingdom entirely Catholic, the Lord Lieutenant sent for the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin, and signify'd to them, That it was his Majesty's Pleasure to call in all the Charters of the Kingdom, in order to enlarge their Privileges, and that he expected a ready and cheerful Obedience from them, by way of Example to the rest of the Kingdom. It is well observ'd, that the same State trick had scarce ever succeeded twice the same Year; and it must be remember'd, that, under the like Pretence, that very City was before cajol'd out of their Arms. The Lord-Mayor, however, return'd the Answer usual in such Cases; namely, That he would call an Assembly or Common-council, and lay the Business before them. He did so the next Day, and upon the Issue it was resolv'd, That the Lord-Mayor, Recorder, &c. should wait upon his Excellency, and acquaint him, "That, as the City had ever been exemplary in their Loyalty and Obedience to the King and Queens of England, so they humbly conceived it to be their Duty to lay at his Majesty's Feet the great Services they had done the Crown, under the Grants and Immunities of One hundred and Forty Charters, derived from his Royal Ancestors; all of which were still preserved in their Treasury; and at the same time to pray his Excellency to make a favourable Representation of their Condition to his Majesty, in hope that he would be graciously pleas'd to continue to them their ancient Government." On the Delivery of this Answer, his Excellency fell into a Tempest of Passion; told them, That this was the Continuance of their former Rebellion, in which they had turn'd out every loyal Subject, as they would now do, if it was in their Power: Adding, "It is your Disobedience to his Majesty's late Commands, for admitting Catholic Freeman, that has induced him to recal your Charter. Therefore go your ways, and resolve to obey him now, lest a worse thing should befall you." Aghast at his Lordship the Mayor was at these Reproaches and Menaces, he had nevertheless the Presence of Mind to require a Signification of his Excellency's Pleasure to the Common-council, in Writing, as had been usual on the like Occasions. But this, as a mere Formality, was over-ruled, and he was again charg'd to carry the Message he had received by Word of Mouth. What followed was, the calling another Assembly, the Members of which had the laudable Firmness to persist unanimously in refusing to surrender their Charter; only, the better to qualify their Refusal, it was resolv'd, that his Excellency should be made acquainted with the Reasons on which their said Refusal was founded; and should also be pray'd to allow them Time to petition his Majesty, who, they persuad'd themselves, would take into his princely Consideration their eminent Sufferings for his Royal Father of blessed Memory, which he himself had by Letter acknowledged; withal assuring them, that he would as eminently reward them for it, in case he was ever restor'd to the Rights and Prerogatives of his Crown. All this was accordingly urg'd to his Excellency; but without effect: He continued to show as before; said, that, instead of applying in their Favour, he would write against them; and, to shew them he was in earnest, issued a Warrant against their Charter. Frighted at their

their

A. D. 1687. these violent Proceedings, they appeal'd by Petition to the King; but his Majesty refus'd to accept it, and reprimand'd Sir Richard Reeves, their Recorder, who offer'd to present it, for coming over without the Leave of the Lord Lieutenant. The Citizens, however, resolv'd to defend their Charter, if possible: But the Bench prov'd too mighty for the Laws; Judgment was given for the King; and this City, which, for its unspotted Loyalty, had been call'd The Virgin City, was given up to the Pleasure of the Court. The like Judgment was also given against all the Charters of the Kingdom, that were not quietly surrendr'd: But the far greater Number of Corporations feeling, by the Example of Dublin, how vain it was to resist, made a Merit of their Resignation: And thus the Protestant Interest was wholly subdu'd; for in all the new Charters a Clause was insert'd, which subjected them to the absolute Will and Pleasure of the Crown. For thereby the chief Governor was authorized and empowered to turn out and put in whom he pleas'd, without any formal Trial at Law, or even shewing any Cause at all.

The moderate Catholics endeavour to get him recalled.

These, it is natural to think, were esteem'd great and signal Services at Whitehall: But the moderate Party of the Catholic Counsellors were still as apprehensive as ever of Tyrconnel's Extravagance, and lost no Opportunity to humble him. Thus when his Excellency had set forth a Proclamation to take off the Duty of Iron, in Breach of an Act of Parliament, and without asking the King's Permission, which is always done before any Measure relating to the Revenue is carry'd into Execution, and the Matter came to be examin'd before the King in Council, Lord Bellasis, with an Oath, declar'd, That that Fellow in Ireland was Fool and Madman enough to ruin ten Kingdoms. He was also oblig'd to set forth another Proclamation; and even his great Patron, Father Petre, gave him to understand, That if he did not proceed, for the future, with greater Caution, the King could not possibly preserve him in the Government. Occasion was also taken from the languishing State of the Revenue, which had most sensibly diminished under his Administration, in Consequence of the great Desertion of the Inhabitants, the Fall of Rents, the Decay of Trade, &c. to endeavour to root him entirely out of his Majesty's Favour and Affection. And so alarm'd was he at those Endeavours, that he made use of his whole Credit and Interest to obtain leave to meet his Majesty at Coşter, in order to his Vindication. Not caring, however, to rely on his own Talent at Persuasion, he took over with him the Lord Chief Baron Rice to be his Advocate, who, having none to contradict him, gave his Majesty such a precious Representation of his Affairs, as left him perfectly convinced that all was

A. D. 1687. right. Thus, contrary to the Expectations of many, the Cloud blew over, and his Excellency return'd in Triumph to his Government, having at this last Interview obtained special Orders to break all such Protestant Officers as yet remain'd in the Army, except such as should give the requisite Assurances of their good Behaviour; which his very faithfully and punctually obeyed.

But tho' his Court-Enemies were not a little mortified at this Disappointment, they did not give over their Opposition: On the contrary, they still made use of every Incident that fell into their way to undermine him. Thus when a Quarrel arose between him and Sheridan, formerly mentioned in the Course of the Popish Plot, and now Secretary of State for Ireland, the latter found Encouragement to bring the Matter to a Hearing before the King and Council, till his own ill Character became so notoriously known, that every body grew ashamed of his Cause on that Account, and left him to be run down by his more mighty Enemy. In abandoning him, however, they did not wilfully abandon the Use they design'd to make of him; for they still remonstrated to the King, that so much Scandal arose to their Cause from their mutual Accusations, that it was necessary to make Examples of both alike; and there was reason to fear, that their continual Importunities would, in the long Run, take effect. Under this Apprehension, it may be (a) presum'd, that Tyrconnel applied to his old Friend, Father Petre, and that he, to preserve his Creators, recourse to an Expedient that was agreeable to the Society he belonged to. As Colleman he knew to be the Parliament's whole particular Account Tyrconnel was to be supplanted: And over and above the Efforts which his Friends had made in his Favour here, they had so managed it with the Court of Rome, that we are told even his Holiness was prevail'd upon to be his Advocate with the King, by the Interposition of his Nuncio, who lost no Opportunity to fulfil his Orders. His Majesty on the other hand had not only lent a willing Ear, but had engag'd to gratify him with something as soon as a Vacancy could be made. For fear, therefore, that this Vacancy should be made at the Expence of Tyrconnel, Petre takes Occasion to strike at Jeffrey (now become, in some Degree, obnoxious for endeavouring to divert the King from proceeding to Extremities with the Fellows of Magdalen-College) by giving it as his Advice to his Majesty, That the most effectual Course he could take to establish the Catholic Religion, was to let his Ministers and the World understand, That all Court-Merit consisted in promoting the Catholic Cause; and that no Service they had done, or could do, should protect them, in case they shew'd the least Symptom of Inclination to desert it. And so ready was the King to give into Proposals

(a) The Facts upon which this Recital is grounded are taken from the Tract call'd The first Grubbs, &c. But such Tern is here given to them, as will best tally with the fals of this nature, that he not only suffer'd it to be brought into the Cabinet, but therein retir'd it, December 17. That Jeffreys should be removed; that three of the Lords of the Treasury (Powis, Bolton, and Dyser) should be made Commissioners of the Great Seal; and that Castlemain had been made Lord Treasurer; by which Disposition Tyrconnel would have been left to lord it in Ireland, in Peace and Safety.

It happen'd, however, most favourably for the Protestant Religion, that the Quarrel between his Holiness and his eldest Son, about the Franciscans, now raged with more Fury than ever: Levanderin, the new French Ambassador, had enter'd Rome with a Retinue of armed Men; had brib'd the Populace to be of his side; had taken possession of his Quarters; and had signify'd his Resolution to maintain them. On the other hand, the Pope had retir'd the said Ambassador Audience; had declar'd him notoriously excommunicated; and had interdicted the Church of St. Lewis, because his Excellency had been there permitted to perform his Devotions on Christmas-Eve. This again had been represented in France, that the Attorney-General was order'd to draw up an Appeal to the next General Council: The Parliament engag'd in the Quarrel, and call'd upon the King to summon a National Council, or an Assembly of the Grandees, by whose Advice he might fill up the vacant Benefices; and also to prohibit any farther Commerce with the Court of Rome, by sending Money thither, &c.

The Effects of this Quarrel were felt at every Court where the two Powers had an Opportunity to thwart and oppose each other. Thus, even in England, where the Catholics, who were the Few, had, by committing a Violence on the Constitution, obtain'd an unnatural Ascendancy over the Many, and consequently stood in need of all their Address, and all their Strength, to maintain their Ground, they fell into Dissentions; Part adhering to the Rights and Claims of the Church, and Part espousing the Resentments of France. Among the latter were Petres, and all the Desperadoes, who thought their own Extravagances would oblige his Majesty, at last, to depend on his most Christian Brother's Alliance: And among the Former, all those who were for moderating Matters, that there might be no Occasion for it: And hence only we can account for the Defeat of Petres's Project to save Tyrconnel, by providing for Castlemain: For defeated it was, after it had subsist'd about ten Days. Tyrconnel was of the French Faction, as well as Petres; but so was Jeffreys, too: Whereas Castlemain, and the rest of his Junto, adher'd to his Holiness. As far, therefore, as was necessary to go for the Preservation of Tyrconnel, Petres had the Countenance and Assistance of France; but when he thus undertook to alter the Balance of the Court, for his sake, or rather perhaps for his own, with a View to the Cardinal's Cap that he aspir'd to, he had the Wind of France in his Teeth, and found it too strong for him to bear up against; in consequence of which, Jeffreys was re-establish'd, and Castlemain remain'd ungratified: But, to pacify Petres and Tyrconnel, (or) Assurances were given them, that the latter should never be supplanted or removed, as long as the Influence of that Court was able to protect him.

Things having taken this sudden and unexpected Turn, the Dissentions of the Cabinet became more violent, and the King more embarrass'd than ever; for, as his religious Prejudices prompted him to drive over the Necks of his Subjects, in his way to Rome; so his Dread of their Resentments kept him in such a slavish Dependence on France, that he durst not dissolve the one in compliment to the other. In this Situation, he found it one of his greatest Difficulties so to proportion his Favours, that neither of the two Factions should have Cause to accuse him of Partiality; and they, on the other hand, from his very Endeavours to keep the Peace, started fresh Matter of mutual Jealousy and mutual Complaints.

No sooner was Petres's Project to reconcile the two Parties at the Expence of Jeffreys over-ru'd and set aside, than Castlemain's Friends made a new Attack on Tyrconnel, and no sooner was Tyrconnel inform'd of it, than he thought it necessary for his own Salvation to add to his Faith and Trust in the Mediation of France, the Merit of his own Works. Accordingly he enter'd into a close Cabal with the Irish Lord Chief-Baton Rice, and Nugent, now Lord Chief-Justice, in the Room of Darvis, who directed him to a Repeat of the Act of Settlement; and, desperate as the Advice was, his Excellency greedily embraced it. The same Persons as desperately undertook to carry their Scheme into Execution, and first in a Memorial, set forth, That there was no other Way to render Ireland entirely Catholic, than by the said Repeat: That, while the English Inhabitants were in a manner Lords of the Soil, they would hold their Faith in defiance of the Government; but that, when touch'd in their Estates, as Scots urg'd in the Case of Job, his Majesty would have the Advantage. This was accompany'd with the Draught of an Act, by which the King was complemented with the Disposal of almost all the Lands of the Kingdom: For the Catholics were to be restor'd but to one half of their Claims; and his Majesty was authoriz'd to dole away the rest, to such as he found most devoted to his Service.

Tyrconnel, always true to the Act of Settlement.

"It is said, he was forc'd, with the French Interest, because he was rather the Deputy of Lewis than James; Again, "It being shinn'd in Paris, That he was removed,

A. D. 1687. Service. Lastly, the same two Persons were dispatch'd to negotiate the Completion of this grand Affair with the King and Council; and, for Luck's sake, embark'd on St. Patrick's Day, that they might have the whole Benefit of his Favour and Protection.

The Persons at Court whom they were principally address'd to were, the Lord Sunderland and Father Petre; and, to facilitate their Suit, they had Instructions to purchase their good Offices almost at any rate: Lord Sunderland in his Apology owns, that he was offer'd forty thousand Pounds for his Vote and Interest, on this memorable Occasion: But whereas he further asserts, and appeals to Lord Gedolphin, and Tyrconnel's own Agents, for the Truth of it, That he not only refus'd his Concurrence, but made the King acquainted with the Offer which had been made to him; and moreover so thoroughly convinc'd him of the Injustice of what was propos'd, that his Majesty, for that Year, resolv'd to reject it, we find it elsewhere asserted, with equal Confidence, That his Lordship and Petre were the very Persons who, in Closet-conference with his Majesty, broke the Matter to him, and reconcil'd him to it: That, upon the Issue of this Conference, the only Difficulty before them was, how to get the better of Castlemain's Faction, who, it was foreseen, would neither care to trust Tyrconnel with such a Power, nor suffer him to have the Merit of such a Service: That, by way of Experiment, it was agreed, that the two Irish Judges should be publicly introduced to the King, with their Project for calling a Parliament in Ireland, and to lay at his Majesty's Feet the deplorable Condition of his Catholic Subjects there, occasion'd by the palpable Injustice and Oppression of the Act of Settlement, which they were to represent as so notorious, that the very Protestants, who were Gainers by it, were ashamed of it, and would gladly part with such a Share as would satisfy the Irish Claimants, provided they might have a good Act of Parliament to secure the rest: That all this was formally put in practice: That the said Judges brought their Project in Writing, and presented it to the King at White-hall, who told them, that he would advise with his Council about it: That his Majesty himself communicated it accordingly to the Board, on the next Council-day: That, when it was read, the Lord Bellasis inveigh'd bitterly against it, saying, "If such Delights as these are encouraged, England (meaning the Catholics) had best look out in time for some other Country, and not stay to be made a Sacrifice for Irish Rebels!" That Lord Powis seconded the Opposition thus begun by Lord Bellasis: That to many other Lords follow'd in the same Track, that neither Sunderland nor Petre had the Courage to dispute what they had before induc'd the King to patronize, except by moving, That those who had brought over the Project might be admitted to say what they could in its Justification: That Bellasis, on the contrary, was for committing them, or at least ordering their immediate Departure, that it might not be thought they had met with the least Countenance: That, however, a Day was at last appointed to admit them to a Hearing: That, in the mean time, the Secret of their Errand became publick, and created so much Rejoicing, that the very Boys in the Streets follow'd Rice and Nugent in their Coaches with Peasies fasten'd on Sticks, crying out, Make way for the Irish Embassadors! That, when they came to be heard, Rice open'd the Matter with great Plainness, and undertook to answer all the Objections rais'd by the Lords Bellasis and Powis: That Nugent, on the contrary, by a Succession of Blunders, pull'd down all the Scaffolding which his Collegue had so artfully rais'd: That the two Lords last-mentioned took the advantage of all, and treated the two Embassadors with more (so) Contempt and Indecency than became the Place and Presence they were in: That the Majority of the Council threw their whole Weight into the same Scale: That the King himself remain'd silent, and broke up the Council without coming to any Determination: That the Affair was brought on the Carpet no more: And, lastly, That the said Embassadors, having kiss'd his Majesty's Hand, march'd off with great Haile and Precipitation, for fear of being insulted by the very Catholics themselves.

This Assertion encounters Assertion, and Truth is murder'd in the Fray. We are, however, assured, That the violent Spirit which appeared against Tyrconnel, on this Occasion, encourag'd Castlemain's Faction to make another vigorous Effort to remove him: They recapitulated the Mischiefs he had already done; they enlarg'd on the comprehensive State of the Revenue; they took care to shew, That, if the Government remain'd in his Hands another Year, it would not be sufficient for the Pay of the Army; and they urg'd, that the very Dread of this last desperate Project of his would clear the Land of the last Remains of its Industrious Inhabitants; in consequence of which, Trade would stagnate, and the whole Country would be reduced to its primitive Poverty. The King lent an Ear to all this; seem'd to be affected by it, but suffer'd Tyrconnel to continue in the Government notwithstanding: Not daring to do otherwise, as we are told, for fear of dishonouring his Brother of France. Of this his Excellency was sufficiently appriz'd; and yet he fell into such a Fit of Despondency soon after this Defeat, that he look'd upon himself as a lost Man; as appears by his saying to some Officers at his Court, one Day, That tho' he had

(see) Bellasis. "Make haste back to the Fool your Master, and bid him employ wiser Men, and upon an honest Errand."

Powis. Tell him, that the King has better Use to make of his Catholic Subjects in England, than to sacrifice them for Reprints to the Protestants of Ireland! [Secret Confess. p. 20.]

A. D. 1687. had received repeated Assurances from his Majesty that he should not be removed; he had now Reason to think he should: Adding, "I would have given five thousand Pounds to have known it a Month sooner." An Expression, we are told, that was then much wonder'd at, tho' for what Reason is not explain'd.

Stuart's Letters to Penfioner Engel, concerning the Repeal of the Tests, &c.

In pursuing the Course of the Irish Affairs thus far, we have intently overtaken another Year: But, before we proceed any farther, it is necessary to take our Leave of that more immediately before us.

Over and above the several Negotiations which had been carry'd on at Whitehall and the Hague, by the Ministers on both Sides, to bring the Prince of Orange to cooperate with the King in the Repeal of the Tests and Penal Laws, one Mr. Stuart, a Scott Lawyer, was employ'd to open a Correspondence with the Penfioner Engel, on the same Subject. He had been a Malcontent of long Standing, had been concern'd in all the Struggles of the Times, more especially with Archie, and had been driven into Holland for Sanctuary; where he enter'd deeply into the Confidence of that Minister, and from whence he was invited home, at the Instance of Pen, and put in a Way to merit his Pardon, and even the Favour of his Majesty, by undertaking this special Service. The Method he took was, to press the Penfioner by Letter, in the King's Name, and profess'dly by his Direction, to prevail with the Prince to concur with his Majesty; urging, among a Variety of other Considerations, That the King was resolv'd not to consent to the Repealing of the Penal Laws, unless the Tests were repealed also: And that the refusing to consent to that Condition in favour of the Dissenters, might, in Time to come, expose them to another Persecution. No Answer being return'd, Stuart repeated his Instances, but with no better Success than before: Both the Penfioner and the Prince preserv'd an obstinate Silence; and, as if in sight of the Proverb, it was asserted most industriously, both in Conversation and in Print, That his Highness had given into the King's Measures. This struck a Damp into his Friends in England, who began to fear they were sacrificed; and, on the other hand, his foreign Catholic Allies stood aloof from his Proposals, in the Apprehension, that he and his Party intended nothing less than the Extirpation of Popery, in case they gain'd their Ends in England. For the sake, therefore, of binding them effectually to his Cause, on one hand, and of reasserting his English Partizans, on the other, he at last commision'd the Penfioner to write a long and full Answer to the several Letters receiv'd from Stuart; the most remarkable Passages of which were as follow:

The Penfioner's Answer.

"I must then first of all assure you very positively, that their Highnesses have often declared, as they did it more particularly to the Marquis Albeville, his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary to the States, that it is their Opinion, That no Christian ought to be per-

A. D. 1687. secuted for his Conscience, or be ill us'd because he differs from the public and established Religion: And therefore they can consent that the Papists in England, Scotland, and Ireland, be suffer'd to continue in their Religion; with a Branch of Liberty, as is allow'd them by the States in their Provinces.

And their Libertines are very ready, in case his Majesty shall think fit to desire it, to declare their Willingness to concur in the settling and confirming this Liberty, and, as far as it lies to them, they will protect and defend it; and, according to the Language of Treaties, they will confirm it with their Guaranty, of which you made mention in yours.

And if his Majesty shall think fit farther to desire their Concurrence in the repealing of the Penal Laws, they are ready to give it; provided always, that those Laws remain still in their full Vigor, by which the Catholics are shut out of both Houses of Parliament, and out of all public Employments, ecclesiastical, civil, and military.

You wrote, That the Roman Catholics in these Provinces are not shut out from Employments and Places of Trust; but in this you are much mistaken, for our Laws are express, excluding them by Name from all Share in the Government, and from all Employments either of the Policy or Justice of our Country. It is true, I do not know of any express Law that shuts them out of military Employments; that had indeed been hard, since, in the first Formation of our State, they join'd with us in defending our public Liberty, and did us eminent Service during the Wars; therefore they were not shut out from those military Employments; for the public Safety was no way endangered by this, both because their Numbers, that served in our Troops were not great, and because the States could easily prevent any Inconvenience that might arise out of that, which could not have been done so easily, if the Roman Catholics had been admitted to a Share in the Government, and in the Policy or Justice of our State.

I am very certain of this, of which I could give very good Proof, that there is nothing that their Highnesses desire so much, as that his Majesty may reign happily, and in an entire Confidence with his Subjects; and that his Subjects, being perswaded of his Majesty's fatherly Affection to them, may be ready to make him all the Returns of Duty that are in their Power.

Their Highnesses have ever paid a most profound Duty to his Majesty, which they will always continue to do; for they consider themselves bound to it, both by the Laws of God and of Nature.

I do not think it necessary to demonstrate to you how much their Highnesses are devoted to his Majesty, of which they have given me real Evidence, as are beyond all verbal ones; and they are resolv'd still to continue in the same Duty and Affection; or rather to increase it, if that is possible."

Thus it appears, that while his Highness maintain'd his former Firmness with regard to

A. D. 1687. to the Tests, he took care to satisfy the Scruples of his Catholic Friends, to convince the English Papists, that he had no Intention to make their Condition worse than it was left by his late Majesty, and to establish a firm Perseverance in the King of his own filial Duty, Affection, &c. and that, in every one of these Instances, he acquitted himself like a thorough Politician. This Letter was dated November 7, and was by Stuart deliver'd to the King, who laid it before the Cabinet-Council. Bishop Burnet adds, That no Resolution was then taken upon it: That all the Lay-Papists of England, who were not engaged in the Intrigues of the Priests, earnestly pressed his Majesty to accept of the Prince's Offer, as what would render them both safe and easy for the future: That the Emperor himself was satisfy'd with it, and promis'd to use his Interest at Rome, to recommend and enforce it: That whether he did so or not, he, the Bishop, had never been able to learn: That, if he did, his Interposition had no Effect: That the King was in all points govern'd by the Jesuits and the French Ambassador: And, that Stuart wrote back, by his Majesty's Order, in the old Style, that he would either have all, or nothing.

But notwithstanding this Letter, and this Answer, we are farther told, That the Report was still propagated, that their Highnesses had given their Consent to the Repeal of the Tests; that the Prince had Advice of this Report, from several Hands; and that, to confute it, he order'd the Pensioner's Letter to be printed, and dispers'd all over England; that it was every where received with an universal Joy; that even the Lay-Papists were so well pleas'd with it, that they complain'd of those ambitious Priests and fawning Courtiers, who, for their own sinister Ends, had tender'd it ineffectual; and that the Court, sensible of the Hurt which they receiv'd by the Publication of the said Letter, endeavour'd to stille it, by affecting to treat it as an Imposture.

Certain it is, that, in a Pamphlet publish'd about this Time, call'd Perthampton pacificus, or, The happy Union of King and People on dissolving Parliament, (which had the Earl of Sunderland's Allowance) it was asserted, That the said Letter was Forgery, or, if really penn'd by the Pensioner Foye, it had been done without the Authority of the Prince, or, at least, of the Princess, of Orange: And this was not sooner known at the Hague, than the Pensioner sent an epistolical Complaint to Abbeville, in which he asserted, That the King and his whole Court, not excepting Sunderland himself, who had lent his Authority to the Falseness, knew the Letter to be genuine; and that his Excellency (Abbeville) was able, of his own Knowledge, to bear him witness, that every Title therein contain'd was perfectly agreeable to

A. D. 1687. the Sentiments of both their Highnesses, &c. This Complaint was also made public in England; that the Antidote might accompany the Poison; and his Majesty was so provok'd at a Proceeding which had such a manifest Tendency to embroil his Affairs, that he began, says our History of his own Times, to speak severely and indecently of the Prince, not only to all about him, but even to foreign Ministers.

Abbeville was, before this time, return'd to the Hague; and, by his Depoiment, shew'd that his last actions were as cautious as before: He renew'd his Memorials with respect to the Affair of Bantam, as also the Persecution of Dr. Brenet, whom he represented to the States as a Fugitive and a Rebel, but with no better Success than before: Their Lordships were equally import and firm on both these Points. They call'd upon the King to send his Commissioners to the Hague to settle the former, as the Treaty directed; and, with regard to the latter, the Dutch Ambassador in England gave his Majesty to understand, that the Doctor, being now a naturalized Subject of theirs, had a Right to their Protection; but that, if he had any thing criminal to alledge against him, Justice should be done in the Courts of Holland: This, the said Doctor himself assures us, the King took so ill, that he said it was a just Cause of War; that, however, he should not make use of it, tho' he knew there were Designs carrying on against him; but that he should not fail to put himself on his Guard. The same Author adds, that the Ambassador endeavour'd to draw the King into a farther Explanation of this Point, but fail'd; and, again (x) speaking of himself, (a Subject he is immeasurably fond of) that the Heat wherewith his Majesty seem'd inflam'd against him, carry'd him to say and do many things, that were very little to his Honour. The particular Matters urged by Abbeville against this Divine were, certain Passages in his Letter to the Earl of Middleton, before-mention'd; namely, 1. His saying, That it was yet too early to persecute Men for Religion, and therefore Crimes against the State were pretended. 2. That he was in danger by some Irish Papists. But the Truth was, that the Dutch Press being kept in perpetual Employment by the Malcontents of England, he was made answerable for the Trepanning of the whole Party: And as he could not be punish'd for Papers which could not be prov'd to be his, it was necessary to ground his Accusation on one which could. At the same time also, that a Stop might be put to the Evil, the same Minister made it the Subject of another Remonstrance; but not being able to support his Allegations with all the Formality of Proof, which is requir'd by a State, when call'd upon to act against the Current of their own Inclination, like all the rest, it became ineffectual.

While

(*) He also, call'd of Rewards, offer'd to effluinate him; and Consultations with Taffers, concerning what might be done against him, in a private Way; which, however, he is inclin'd to suppose were only talk'd of, to frighten him into Submission, or Silence at least.

Proclamation of the Queen's being with Child.

While Matters were in this uneasy Way between the two States, a Proclamation, dated December 23, but not inserted in the Gazette till January 5, was set forth, with the glad Tidings, That the Queen was with Child, and that it was his Majesty's Pleasure, at the humble Request, and by the Advice, of his Privy-Council, to appoint, command, and require, that solemn Thanks, and public Prayers, be offered up to Almighty God, on that Occasion, &c. and that he had directed the Bishops of (y) Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, to prepare a suitable Form, which was to be observed by those of the established Church: All his Majesty's Ministers, residing in foreign Courts, had Orders to put up the like Prayers and Thanksgivings, after the Catholic Mode; which was done accordingly, with all the Splendor and Magnificence which that gaudy Religion was capable of.

The Effect of this News was equally great on the two Parties, and at the same time wholly different: The Jesuits, at Court, and their Followers, overflowed with Raptures, and joyfully talk'd of it as little less than a Miracle; which, in such a Country as this, could not fail to excite Ridicule, and bespeak Unbelief: Some boasted of the Virtue and Efficacy of her Majesty's rich Offerings to our Lady of Loretto: Others of her Mother the (z) Duchesse of Modena's Vows when living, and Intercession when Dead: Others of the Pilgrimage of the King to St. Winifred: And others, among whom was the Earl of Melfort, of the Holy Ghost moving on the Bath-Waters: All were strangely elated on the Occasion; and some made no Difficulty to pronounce that it was a Son; Abbe vile was one of these; and, when he return'd to the Hague, was so intoxicated with this Persuasion, that he spoke out, says Bishop Burnet, what a wiser Man would have suppress'd: For when the Prince of Orange put him in mind of the King's Promise to maintain the Laws, and the established Church, he very cavalierly said, "That, upon some Occasions, Princes must forget their Promises; and that, as to that Body which he call'd the Church, it would not have a Being two Years to an End." On the other hand, those who had no other Prospect of Deliverance out of the Harpy-Talons of Popery and Slavery, than by the Succession of the Prince of Orange, received the Confirmation of this News with much inward Sorrow, and outward Contempt: Some inventing, many believing, and all circulating such Stories as would best serve the great and necessary Purpose of establishing a Belief, that the whole Affair was no better than a solemn Imposture; and which Stories were neither over-decent, well-timed, or charitable: A Pilew, a Dropfy, a Tympany, a (*) Cullion, the Queen's Maladies, the King's crazy Constitution, were the favourite Topics of the Wit and Honour of the Day: Nor were they confin'd to Conversation only; they found the Way to the Press; they were set forth in (a) Verse and Prose, and were circulated from Hand to Hand, thro' every Corner of the Kingdom. Partridge, the Almanac-Soothsayer, in his Predictions for the Year 1688, printed at the Hague, took upon him to say, "That there was some bawdy Project on foot, either about buying, selling, or procuring a Child or Children, for some pious Uses." And again, "Some Child

(y) These were the Commissioners for the Diocese of London to Arch, according to Bishop Kenne's, the Office being'd to the Archbishop of Bishoprick.

(z) She (the Queen) says Burnet, came to Windsor on the 6th of October. It was said, that, at the very time of her coming to the King, her Mother the Duchesse of Modena made a Vow to the Lady Loretto, that her Daughter might, by her means, have a son; and it went current, that the Queen found herself to be with Child in that very Instant in which her Mother made her Vow. Of which some Travellers have offer'd me, there was a solemn Record made at Loretto. But surely if his Lordship had recollected, that the Duchesse dy'd July the 19th, 1687, and she certainly did, he had never supposed this idle Tale of her Highness's vowing Vows on the 6th of October.

(*) "As to the Queen's being with Child, that great Custom goes, as well as we could wish, notwithstanding all the furious Discourses of the Heresies, who content themselves to vent their Poison by Libels, which by Night they diffuse in the Streets, or fix upon the Walls. There was one lately found upon a Pillar of a Church, that importeth, that such a Day Thanks should be given to God for the Queen's being great with a Cullion. If one of these Pay-son-makers could be discover'd, he would have but an ill Time of it, and should be made to take his last Farewell at Tyburn." (Letter in P. a Chain, said to be written by F. Vere.)

(a) Of which the following is a Specimen:

I.
Ye Catholic Statesmen and Churchmen rejoice,
And praise Heaven's Goodness with Heart and with Voice, None greater on Earth or in Heaven than she;
Some by the 3000, or the best of the three:
Her Miracles hold,
Were famous of old,
But a braver than this was never yet told:
We pity that every Catholic living
Had not heard on't before the last Day of Thanksgiving.

II.
In Lambeth-Lane, great Melissa's Duchess
Was snatch'd from her Kinspire by Devil's Great Clutches:
When to Heaven she came (for neither she went)
Each Angel receiv'd her with Joy and Consent.

On her Knees she fell down
Before the bright Throne,
And begg'd that God's Mother would grant her a Boon,
Give England a Son in this critical Point,
To put little Orange's Nose out of joint.

III.
As soon as Our Lady had heard the Petition,
To God for the Angel the Brain gave Commission;
She pluck'd off her Smock from her Shoulder Divine,
And charg'd him to hasten to England's fair Queen's Go in the Royal Dime,
To give her the Gem.

And bid her for ever to guard my great Name:
For I in her Favour shall with such a Woman,
Shall keep the match incessant if she come.

IV.
Tell Venus (my best Son) his Part of the Matter
Will be with this only to cover thy Daughter:
Let him put it upon her; with his own Royal Hand,
Then let him go travel and visit the Land,
And the Spirit of Love
Shall descend from above.

The's not so before in the shape of a Dove,
Yet down he shall come in June Shape or other,
Perhaps like Courts * Dandy, and make her a Mother.

This Message with Heart full of Faith was receiv'd;
And the next News we heard was the Queen had conceiv'd,
You grant over-invented, unprovoked Diffidery, Grave Judges, Lords, Bishops, and common Conventers;
You Commissioners all
Ecclesiastical,
From M— or the doubtful, to Ch— the tall;
Pray Hasten to strengthen her Majesty's Palace,
For if this Trade fall, then beware of your Jacks.

* The Pope's
News.

A.D. 1687-8. Child is to be topp'd upon the lawful Heirs, to cheat them out of their Right and Estate.—God preserve the Kingdom of England from Invasion! For about this time I fear it in earnest, and keep the Protestants there from being dragon'd.— And here in England, Queen Mary's Affliction of a big Belly, and the Discourages it gave rise to, as recorded by Fox the Martyrologist, were again reviv'd; no Endeavours were wanting to shew, that the two Cases were exactly parallel: And, upon the Whole, it was concluded, that, if any Process was on foot to shew the Nation, the very Attempt call'd for the highest Releasement; or if, on the other hand, the Queen should really bring forth a Son, the Nation could not be afflicted with a heavier Calamity.

It happen'd that, about the same time that these Liberties were taken with the Queen's Pregnancy, several Pamphlets were set forth in defence of the established Church, intermix'd with many severe Reflections on that of Rome, and the reigning Priests and Jesuits at Court; all which were greedily bought up; and contributed not a little to increase the Ferment of the Times. In order therefore to deter the Dealers in these prohibited Wares from bringing any more to Market, a Royal Proclamation was set forth, February 10, citing the Act 14. Car. II. for preventing Abuses in printing Editions, treasonable, and unlicensed Books and Pamphlets, which had been reviv'd by the last Parliament, requiring and commanding the said Act to be put in execution; and strictly prohibiting all Hawkers or Pedlars of Books, or any other Person or Persons, to sell or expose to sale any such unlicensed Books or Pamphlets, under such Pains, Penalties, and Forfeitures, as by the said Act was provided; and on pain of incurring such further Punishments, as by the utmost Rigor of the Laws, and by the Prerogative Royal, might be inflicted on such Offenders, for their Contempt, &c.

And thus the very Party who first presented this Act, and who so lately had reviv'd it, were, in a more particular manner, made liable to the Smart of it: While he'd round with Court-Favour, as well as founded on the Rock of the Laws, they had as proudly as vainly imagin'd, that Adversity could never come nigh them; and in that Conceit had, on all Occasions, inveigh'd with the utmost Fierceness, against all those who had presum'd to defend the Rights of human Nature, against the Intolerance of Office, and the Abuse of Power: But now, when convinced of their rash Mistake, they had recourse to the very Means they had before condemn'd, as if Good and Ill were mutable things, and that became right in them, which was wrong in others: Whereas the naked Truth is, that as those in Place ever call themselves the Government; so those in Opposition, of whatever Party, or of whatever Principles, must expect to be call'd the Libellers.

At the same time also that both the speculative and intriguing Part of the People were thus busy'd and amus'd with these political Fireworks, the very Mob declar'd on the Protestant Side of the Controversy, and not only disturb'd the Priests in their Celebration of Mass, (which was now done openly in several Parts of the Town) but, on the least Opposition, proceeded to Violence: Hence Prays ensued, the Magistrates, the Militia, and sometimes the Soldiery, were call'd in; and every Day's Experience seem'd to denote, That a general Sedition was at hand.

This being the State of Things, his Majesty, it may be suppos'd, was not without his Fears; and, if he had his Fears, no doubt he had his Precautions: And, among these, mention is made of his Design to erect a Citadel in the Neighbourhood of St. Swithuns, at once to bridle the Populace, and preserve himself. It is even said, that he sent to Mr. Vanboer for a Model; and that his Brother of France laid his Commands on that Engineer to go over to England, and survey the Ground in Person. We are also told, that he gave out new Commissions for raising more Troops, and that he made extraordinary Efforts to have a formidable Fleet ready to put to Sea, on the first Appearance of Danger.

But neither his Fears of his own Subjects, nor his Jealousy of the Prince of Orange, dispos'd him to make any Concessions to either. On the contrary, on January 17, his Majesty wrote a Letter to the States of Holland, to demand the six English and Scotch Regiments that were in their Service. And on the 2d of March, his Majesty issued a Proclamation, forbidding his natural-born Subjects to enter or lift themselves in the Service of any foreign Prince or State either by Sea or Land.

The States return'd a civil Answer to his Majesty's Letter, but excus'd themselves for not complying with his Desire. They declar'd, by a Resolution taken in their Assembly, February the 2d, That having examined all the Treaties of Alliance, and all that had pass'd thereupon, when those Regiments were form'd, they could find no Agreement or Capitulation that could oblige them to grant his Majesty's Demand, at least at such a Juncture of Time. They own'd, indeed, That by the Treaties concluded between England and the States-General, it was agreed, That, in case that Crown should have War with any neighbouring Prince, or suffer under any intestine Rebellion, the States should be then oblig'd to send back the six Regiments into England, as they did in 1683, upon the Rebellion of Monmouth: But that now his Britannic Majesty was in Peace with his Neighbours, and had no Troubles at Home; and therefore they saw no Reason that could oblige them to send back those Troops. However, to preserve a good Correspondence with his Majesty, they offer'd Pledges to all the Officers of the six Regiments, that were willing to return home; which about forty of them accepted: That this not proving satisfactory, Alberville presented a Memorial to the States, to press them to comply with his Majesty's Desire: And they persisting in their Resolution, another Proclamation was issued out, commanding a Return of all the King's Subjects, who had taken Arms under, and were then in the Service of, the States-Generall of the United Provinces, either by Sea or Land, tho' upon no other Allegation, than that the King thought it fit for his Service. This Proclamation produced a Debate among the States-Generall, but no farther Concession to the King's Demand: On the contrary, they justified their Refusal, by alledging, besides what has been already mentioned, That there was nothing so agreeable to Nature, as that he who is born free, should have the Right and Liberty to settle himself where-soever he shall think it most advantageous for himself; and that it is in his Power to be naturalized, and become a Subject to them under whose Sovereignty he submits his Person: And that any Government receiving such, does thereby acquire over him the same Right that it has over its own proper and natural Subjects. In answer to this, Alberic by express Orders from his Master, deliver'd a second Memorial to the States, peremptorily demanding the Dimission of the said Troops, in which he moreover urged, that this pretended natural Liberty could not subsist after that Dominion and Obedience had been introduced; so that the Right of Sovereignty and Subjection was now only to be considered: And that by virtue of these Rights, it had been the common Opinion, in all Times, That no Natural Subject can withdraw himself from the Obedience he owes to his lawful Prince; as also, that there was a solemn Capitulacion made in the Year 1678, with the Earl of Ossory, by the Prince of Orange, in quality of Captain-General to the Republic, in which, among other things, it is agreed, That, in case his Majesty of Great Britain should recall his Subjects that should be in the Service of the States, they should be permitted to retire, and to repair to any Sea Port, which his Majesty should think fit to appoint for their embarking: And that this Capitulacion could not be binding to their Lordships, seeing it was concluded by his Highness as an Act of State, and that several Articles in it have since been fulfilled, which could no otherwile have been done, than by their Authority, &c.

The States, on the other hand, defended themselves against this pressing Demand, and the Reasons on which it was founded, by referring back to what they had urged before: That the King's Right to recall these Forces was limited by his being in a State of War, either with his Neighbour, or his own Subjects; and that by Consequence, as he was now at perfect Peace both abroad and at home, neither was his Claim properly warranted, nor were they obliged to observe it.

At the same time, moreover, that his Majesty was thus embroiling himself with the only Power he had to fear, he was multiply induced to renew his Declaration of Indulgence, with this memorable Preamble: "Our Conduct has been such in all things, as ought to have persuaded the World, that we are firm and constant to our Resolutions; yet that our People may not be abused by the Malice of envious, wicked Men, we think fit to declare, That our Intentions are not changed since the 24th of April, 1687." Here follow'd the Declaration, wherein, as it had been publish'd the Year before, and then his Majesty proceeded as follows: "Ever since we granted this Indulgence, we have made it our principal Care to see it preserved without Distraction, as we are encouraged to do daily by Multitudes of Addresses, and many other Assurances we receive from our Subjects of all Persuasions, & Testimonies of their Satisfaction and Duty, the Effects of which we doubt not but the next Parliament will shew; and that it will not be in vain, that we have respect to our utmost Endeavours to establish Liberty of Conscience, on such just and equal Foundations, as will render it unalterable, and hence to all People the free Exercise of their Religion for ever, by which future Ages may reap the Benefit of what is so indispensably for the general Good of the whole Kingdom. It is such a Security we desire, without the Burthen and Constraint of Oaths and Tests, which have been unhappily made by some Government, but could never support any: Nor could Men be advanced by such Means to Offices and Employments, which ought to be the Reward of Service, Industry, and Merit. We must conclude, That not only good Christians will join in this, but whoever is concerned for the Wealth and Power of the Nation. It would, perhaps, prejudice some of our Neighbours, who might lose Part of these Advantages they now enjoy, if Liberty of Conscience were settled in these Kingdoms, which are above all others most capable of Improvement, and of commanding the Trade of the World. In pursuance of this great Work, we have been forced to make many Changes, both of civil and military Officers throughout our Dominion; not thinking any ought to be employ'd in our Service, who will not contribute towards the establishing the Peace and Goodness of their Country, which we most earnestly desire, as unbiass'd Men may see by the whole Conduct of our Government, and by the Condition of our Fleet, and of our Armies, which with good Management shall constantly be the same, and greater, if the Safety or Honour of the Nation require it. We recommend these Considerations to all our Subject, and that they will reflect on their present Ease and Happiness, how, for above three Years that it has pleased God to permit us to reign over these Kingdoms, we have not appeared to be that Prince, our Enemies would make the World afraid of; our chief Aim having been not to be the Oppressor, but the Father of our People; of which we can give no better Evidence than by comparing them to lay aside private Animosities, as well as groundless Jealousies, and to chuse such Members of Parliament as may do their Parts to finish what we have begun for the Advantage of the Monarchy, over which Almighty God has placed us; being resolv'd to call a Parliament that shall meet in Novemb next at Windsor.

The King's Promise of a Parliament as any other time would have been Matter of great Satisfaction: but now when the declared Purpose of it was to procure a Ratification of the very Grievances the Nation so loudly complain'd of, instead of enacting the Minds of the People, it alarm'd them more than ever: No Parliament, it was forc'd, would be permitted to meet, that did not come pre-determined to sever his Majesty in all things. Those who had been most active in subjecting all Corporations to the Prerogative, were most apprehensive of the Effects of their own prelate Endeavours. Indeed, if ever it is lawful, as it certainly is not, for short-sighted, prejudic'd Men, to denounce Loss Judgments on the Enormities of their Fellow-Creatures, it would now be so. He that set the Snare, fell into it; and he that fram'd the Yoke, had it fitted to his own Neck. Thus the Example which the Bishops and Clergy had set in the preceding Reign of circulating the King's Declarations, was now remember'd to their Cost, and Father Pease had the Illudence to say, That he would make them eat their very Tongue. Accordingly, on the 6th of May (the Declaration and Comment upon it bear Date April 27) it was Order'd by the King and Council, that the said Declaration should be read in all Churches and Chapels at the usual Time of Divine Service; and that the Bishops should cause it to be sent to, and distributed throughout, their several Dioceses, to be read accordingly.

dox-Sons of the Church, was trying the utmost Stretch of Obedience to make them Accessaries to a Breach of the Laws, by publishing what they thought to be illegal, or at least highly inconvenient; and which being levelled at the Interest of themselves and their Religion, they could not, either in Reason or Conscience, obey; and was putting Violence on the Consciences of the King's best Subjects. Ec. So that we have it establish'd, at last, That the Laws are the Measure of Obedience: That Men have a Right in public Affairs to think for themselves; as also to withhold their Obedience when it is likely to prove inconvenient or detrimental to their Interests; and that some Regard is due to the Conscience of Legal Protestants, who have not been flow'd by them to Ignominious Sacrifices.

It is, however, beyond Controversy, that ever any Prince appear'd more thoroughly insinuated than King James in the whole Course of this delicate Measure: For, even while he considered to talk in the Language of Treaty, to those who undertook the Support of the established Church, and to listen them with the Promise of an Equivalent, he deceiv'd himself as effectually as he design'd to deceive them. Churchmen can have no Equivalent for Wealth, Power, Dignity, and Importance; and they knew by themselves, that if the Priests and Parsons of Rome ever procur'd themselves a legal Establishment in the Constitution, they would not bear the Shadow of a Rival: And as to what was talk'd of concerning new Laws to secure civil Liberty, which had been so grievously shaken since the Dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, civil Liberty was so far from being any Concern of theirs, that the grievous Shock it had received was owing principally to them, as hath been already demonstrated. Besides, when the said Equivalent was first made the Subject of Discourse, that great Undertaker for them and their Interests (the Marquis of Halifax) employ'd his excellent Pen in endeavouring to shew, in a Variety of Cases, Instances, and Arguments, That there was no bargaining with Intallibility; it being so much above Equality, that it could not bear the Indignity of a true Equivalent: And he said, that giving them as good a Thing, which was the true Meaning of the Word, was neither in the Power nor Purpose of those that offer'd it. Sapote, said he, in his Anatomy of an Equivoque, in any mix'd Government, the chief Magistrate should propose upon a Condition,

Thus says the Champion for the Ortho-

(9) N. The Franch of a Parliament, in how behalf, and was resolv'd accordingly. John Fisher Fox and Fox engaged the King to it, but with a different Prospect. Fox, and all the 1600 who were employ'd to buy him, had their own Ends of setting a Parliament to oppose with the King's of two great Things, viz. the Law: Whereas Fisher in delivering a Parliament and Protestants, as if more were intended, but that it was only talk'd of to amuse the Nation, all other Designs were gone.

On the other hand, Father Pease and the Cavaliers saw that the King was resolv'd to do many things that they oppos'd, with the help of the Commons of a Parliament. And the Order of going now to Windsor, which might oblig'd that, had not a Condition that was very uneasy to them. They thought, that more Time was already lost, and that they made but a small Progress. They began to apprehend, that the Protestants, who were still looking down upon Hapsburg, and were still more than ever, did not only oppose them, but that they were not the least into more People, and to keep themselves the better in Credit and in Power; but that they did not in the least mix with the main Party, and therefore could not be an unweary Part with the King. Therefore they resolv'd to put that Matter to the last Trial, resolving that if the King was it was in vain to hope for any thing in a parliamentary Way, he might be more easily carried to extreme and violent Methods. [See art. 1681. p. 76.] injunctions and Refinements were stated, as they believed would both warrant their present Refusal, and reconcile it to their former Doctrine. "An heroic Act, says both Bishop Kennet and Mr. Ecard, in the same Words, worthy of the Character of the Bishops of the Church of England, who now resolv'd to be Confessors, as their Predecessors had been Martyrs for the Church of England!" And yet this Declaration itself had been extant so long, and the evil Tendency of it had been so fully expos'd, the Term prescribed by the Order of Council for their Obedience was almost expir'd, before they could work themselves up to the Heroism that is thus magnify'd. On the 21st the Declaration was to be read, and late in the Evening on the 18th, six of the seven Prelates who at Lambeth undertook for the Church against the King, viz. Lords of St. Asaph, King of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, Wate of Peterborough, and Freulovey of Bristol, waited on his Majesty at Whitehall with a Petition in their own Name, and that of Samuel their Metropolitan, at that time indispos'd, which was conceived in these very Words, viz.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty. The Humble Petition, &c.

Their Petition to the King.

"Humbly sheweth, That the great Averseness they find in themselves to the distributing and publishing in all their Churches your Majesty's late Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, proceeds neither from any Want of Duty and Obedience to your Majesty (our Holy Mother, the Church of England, being both in her Principles and in her constant Practice unquestionably loyal, and having to her great Honour been more than once publicly acknowledged to be so, by your Gracious Majesty) nor yet from any Want of Tenderness to Dissenters, in Relation to whom we are willing to come to such a Temper as shall be thought fit, when the Matter shall be considered and settled in Parliament and Convocation. But among many other Considerations, from this especially, because that Declaration is founded upon such a Dispensing Power, as hath been often declared illegal in Parliament, and particularly in the Years 1662, and 1672, and in the Beginning of your Majesty's Reign; and is a Matter of so great Moment and Consequence to the whole Nation, both in Church and State, that your Petitioners cannot in Prudence, Honour or Conscience, so far make themselves Parties to it, as the Distribution of it all over the Nation, and the solemn Publication of it once and again, even in God's House, and in the time of his Divine Service, must amount to in common and reasonable Construction.

Your Petitioners therefore most humbly and earnestly beseech your Majesty, That you will be pleas'd not to insist upon their distributing and reading your Majesty's said Declaration."

Their Lordships were introduced by the Earl of Sunderland; and this Circumstance serves to reflect some Credit on what that Minister solemnly protests in his Apology, namely, That till the King thought fit to order his Declaration to be read in Council, he had never heard one Word of any such Intention. Kennet and Ecard assure us, that upon reading the Petition, the King started, and shew'd himself to be very much incus'd: And Burnet, who professes to be more in the Secret of Things than public Historians, in Effect asserts, That the King was much surpris'd, having been flatter'd and deceiv'd by his Spies: That Cotesworth Bishop of Chester had possess'd him with a Story which both of them too easily believ'd, viz. That the Bishops intended to petition the King to continue the old Method of addressing such Precepts as these to their Chancellors, in order to extricate themselves out of their present Difficulty: And that this Story was so acceptable to the Court, that it procur'd their Lordships an easy Admission, on the Pretension, that desirous to make Peace for themselves, and not to throw the Nation into a Flame. Hence therefore, we are to suppose, that the Surprise and Anger his Majesty shew'd, arose from his Disappointment; and his Answer seems to confirm the same thing. "I have heard of this before, but did not believe it. I did not expect this from the Church of England, especially from some of you. If I change my Mind, you shall hear from me; if not, I expect my Command shall be obey'd." (c) The Bishops with all Reverence reply'd, "We resign ourselves to the Will of God," and then immediately retir'd.

"About the same time also, that a due Quantity of the same Spirit which had animat'd these Fathers of the Church on this great Occasion, might also be communicat'd to the inferior Clergy, a Letter was drawn up by a great Hand; says Ecard, as I have been since inform'd by Dr. Sherlock himself, privately printed, and directed to all the Clergy in the Nation; being fill'd with excellent place, they could not but discern, that a new Magis Quæritur for Liberty of Conscience would be of no Validity to them, for a new Declaration might dispense with it as Protestants: And that the World and Bed of them would look upon their Refusal as a Testimony of their Sincerity to the Protestant Religion, and not of any Dissimulation to them. To the last Objection it was answer'd, That the Church and their Religion would suffer less by the Continuance of their suspended Prelates or Ministers, than it would by their legal Compliance in so great and important a Point: That they had better Thoughts of the King's Clemency and Justice, when he should be inform'd by Men of Conscience against the Council of Men of Church, for how could the King, at the very

Time he proclaim'd entire Liberty of Conscience to all, even those who formerly were look'd upon as his Enemies, do an open Violence to the Conscience of those who had ever been acknowledg'd to be his Friends? And, in sum, I trust they ought to perform their Duty, and leave the Event to the Mercy of God; and, That a certain Evil was not to be done to avoid a consequent one." (Kennet, Ecard).

(c) According to Bishop Burnet he said, They should be made to feel what it was to disobey him. According to others, he called the Bishops, The Transgressors of Palestine. But neither of these Circumstances seems to be fully warranted.

cellent Arguments to dissuade them from reading the Declaration: Out of which we shall infer the following Passage, as representing the present Case of the Clergy. "This is the Difficulty of our Case; we shall be censured on both Sides; but with this Difference: We shall fall a little sooner by not reading the Declaration, if our gracious Prince resent this as an Act of an obstinate and peevish, or factious Disobedience, as our Enemies will be sure to represent it to him; we shall as certainly fall, and not long after, if we do read it; and then we shall fall unpitied and despised, and it may be with the Curses of the Nation whom we have ruin'd by our Compliance; and this is the way never to rise more: And may we suffer all that can be suffer'd in this World, rather than contribute to the final Ruin of the best Church in the World! Never was a Sheet of Paper more industriously and effectually dispersed throughout the Kingdom; many thousands being sent from unknown Hands, by Posts, Carriers, and other ways; which serv'd to confirm such as were wavering, and to flame out such as were willing to oblige the Court, at the Expence of the Church and King of England."

Many of the Bishops, however, were really deterred from their Metropolitan Addresses, and obey'd his Majesty's Edicts, from an Opinion, that the Rubric would not be read, tho' not approving of any thing to be published in the King's Name, as being sinful: "Not considering, says the Author, That the proclaiming or publishing in the Church during the time of Divine Service, what is enjoined by the King or by the Ordinary, could be meant only of regular and lawful Injunctions, not of any arbitrary and illegal Acts." Some few of the inferior Clergy (tho' not above seven in London, nor above two hundred in the whole Kingdom) were also so weak and so prostitute as to follow their Example. But even of these the far greater Part were deserted by their Congregations as soon as they began to read; and they themselves grew so much ashamed of their own Compliance, that they scarce suffer'd the Cuck to crow on their Sin, before they repented of it.

[P. 739.]

And now, as the Historian of his own Times rightly observes, Affairs were come to a Crisis; both Parties were so deeply engag'd, that neither could handsomely retreat; his Majesty had so often said he would be obey'd, that it now behoved him to shew, that with the Word of a King there was Power: And the Bishops had so far interested their Prudence, Honour, and Conscience in the Dispute, that they could not recede without declaring to the World, that they had no Pretence to either. The whole Nation believ'd that their own Fate, and that of their Posterity was involv'd in the Cause; and with a suitable Degree of Impatience and Anxiety waited for the Event.

Almost three Weeks did his Majesty take to consider of the Prospect before him; during which time the moderate Catholics in his Service, foreseeing the dangerous Consequence of enforcing his Declaration, earnestly press'd him to let it fall. And as to Lord Sunderland, he assures us in his Apology, That he was so openly against violent Measures, and so continually inveigh'd against the Injustice and Imprudence of them, that he had like to have sunk under the furious Resentments of those who would be contented with nothing else; and was forced at last to temporize, that he might both save himself, and still continue to serve the Public as well as he could. Among these Desperadoes, Burnet names Father Petre, and one Lab, an eminent Teacher among the Dissenters, with whom the King condescended to advise, tho' he was not of his Privy Council. It may be also suppos'd that Bulter, the Abbat of Quack, as we find him call'd, was also of the Junto; and no doubt, whoever else had serv'd under the Banner of the sejants, as the strongest Side. Surrounded and importun'd by these Furies, and guided on by his own eager Passions, it is therefore the less to be wonder'd at, that his Majesty unhappily gave himself up to the Conduct of those who studied more to prey upon, than serve him, and turn'd his Back upon wiser and honest Men, because they offer'd him less palatable Councils. But we are farther told by the Author last quoted, that tho' there was at first this Difference of Opinion among his Privy Counsellors, the King found Means to make them all concur, by Closet Applications to each. And when he had thus foreclos'd all Freedom of Debate, and adjust'd every Man's Sentiments by his own, he assembled his Privy Council, and demanded their Advice: And what that was, appears by the Event; for on the 8th of June, the obnoxious Bishops, together with their Metropolitan, were summoned before them; and, having made their Appearance, were ask'd Whether they own'd the Petition? to which they reply'd, We humbly hope, that if we stand here as Criminals, his Majesty will not take Advantage against us; for we are always ready to obey his just Commands. The Question was a Snare: The Bishops were to undergo a rigorous Prosecution; but there was no Evidence against them; and this unfair Experiment was try'd, that they might be proceeded against upon their own Confession. They were sensible of this, and therefore evaded a direct Answer. Thus all was at a stand; their Lordships were order'd to withdraw; were recall'd; were ask'd the same Question, return'd the same Answer; were order'd out again; were again recall'd; and at last, driven against the Wall by the Lord Chancellor's pressing them either to own or disown the Paper; Being ashamed to do the one, they thought it advisable to do the other; the Archbishop first acknowledging, That it was written with his own Hand, the rest, that they had sign'd and deliver'd it; and all doing so. Thus they had done nothing but what they were ready to justify. They were then charged with the Publication of it, and so sent into Print almost as soon as it was written; and the Clergy were said to have subscribed all over the Kingdom, instead of the Declaration. But they absolutely deny'd all Concern in, or Knowledge of, it; the Archbishop affirming, there were but two Draughts made by him, viz. the Original, which was still in his own Possession, and which he had never shewn to any body, and the Copy which they had given to the King, and which they had all sign'd. Finding therefore no more to be expected in the way of Confession, Jeffrey fell into his old menacing way, and with many Reproaches, undertook to make them sensible of the ill Consequences of their Disobedience, which tended to diminish the King's Authority, and to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. Finding at last, that he only wasted his Breath, he asked, Whether they would give their Recognizance to appear before the Court of King & Bench, to answer this high Misdemeanour? This they all refus'd, insisting on the Privilege of their Peerage, which they were resolv'd to maintain, as well as the Rights of the Church; being equally bound by their Callings to oppose all Innovations both in Government and Religion. As this was more than was expected from them, and what had a manifest Tendency to interest the whole Body of the Peers in their Quarrel; the Council, we are told, betray'd some Marks of Astonishment, which Jeffrey attempted to draw them out of, by threatening to send the Delinquents to the Tower, and to prosecute them with the utmost Rigour of the Law, unless they immediately recanted, and withdrew their Petition. They unanimously answered, That they were ready to go whithersoever his Majesty was pleas'd to send them: That they hop'd the King of Kings would be their Protector and their Judge: That they fear'd nothing from Men: And that having acted according to Law, and their own Consciences, no Punishment should ever be able to shake their Resolutions.

Finding them thus immovable, a Warrant was drawn, and subscriv'd by the Lord Chancellor Jeffrey, the Lord President Sunderland, the Lord Privy Seal Arundel, the Marquis of Down, the Earls of Mulgrave, Huntingdon, Peterborough, Craven, Murray, Middleton, Melfort, and Collerman, the Lords Dortneub, Godolphin, and Dover, Sir John Ervil, Sir Edward Herbert, and Sir Nicholas Butler, to commit them Prisoners to the Tower; the Reason given in the Warrant being, For contriving, making and publishing a seditious Libel against his Majesty, and his Government: And Mr. Attorney and Solicitor-General were ordered to prosecute them for the same the next Term. Kennet, and after him Echard, affirm, That it was said, some of the Judges, who were present, refus'd to set their Hands to the said Warrant: But, according to Barnet, it was sign'd by the whole Board, except Father Pitre, who was excus'd by the King's express Order. However this may be, it was immediately executed, and they were sent to the Tower by Water, "left the People," says Mr. Echard (who is never more eloquent than upon this Occasion) should be too strongly affected with this moving Spectacle." And it must be own'd, that there was much Reason for this Precaution, however vain it prov'd. The News immediately took Air, and was circulated on every Side, insomuch that the Banks of the River were croud'd with Spectators, who, having never before seen the Bishops in Opposition to the Court, and who now saw nothing but the dazzling Out-side of things, were equally struck with Amazement, Veneration and Compassion, which they express'd by loud Acclamations, Prayers for their Deliverance, and whatever else could shew an Attachment to their Persons and Cause: And what is still more remarkable, the Contagion of their Example caught hold of the Soldiery, who were drawn out upon this Occasion to keep the Peace, and who fell on their Knees and besought the Blessing of those they were appointed to guard. In this manner their Lordships had the Consolation to make their Passage to the Tower, and to be receiv'd at their Landing, not to improve the Crisis to the utmost, but that Affliction had increased their Devotion, they repair'd immediately to the Chapel of Evening Prayer, where it is observ'd, the second Lesson was by the Course of the Court, extremely well adapted to their Condition, being the sixth Chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians; Giving no Offence to any, so that the Ministry be not blamed; but in all things approving ourselves as the Ministers of God, in much Patience, in Affliction, in Necessities, in Distresses, in Stripes, in Imprisonments, &c.

In the midst of the mighty Ferment occasion'd by this extraordinary Incident, viz. On the very Day that the Bishops were committed, her Majesty, all of a sudden, declar'd her Purpose to remove on the Morrow from Whitehall to St. James's, in order to lie in; and did remove accordingly, tho' not till late in the Evening; and between Nine and Ten the next Morning, as we are assur'd by the Gazette, was lately deliver'd of the Prince, his Majesty, the Queen-Dowager, most of the Lords of the Council, and divers Ladies of Quality, being present: At Noon a Council was held; when it was order'd, That a general Thanksgiving should be observ'd, in acknowledgment of so great a Blessing: That the glad News should be imparted to the Lord-Mayor: That the Tower-Guns should be fir'd, &c. And we are farther assur'd, by the same Authority, that the City flam'd with Bonfires, and other Demonstrations of that extraordinary Joy, which, on that happy Occasion, had fill'd the Hearts of his Majesty's Subjects. But, in contradiction to this, Bishop (f) Kennet confines this this extraordinary Joy to the Papists only: Adding, "The Protestants were generally silent and reserved, as doubting the Fact, and dreading the Consequence." We have it nevertheless upon Record, That no sooner was the News communicated by Express to the Regency of Scotland, than the Lord Chancellor caus'd a solemn T. Deum to be sung, the Lords of the Council appointed a Day of solemn Thanksgiving, and dispatch'd the Earl of Balcarras, one of their own Body, "to go with all possible Expedition to wait on his Majesty, with the humble and hearty Expressions of their due Congratulations, and extraordinary Joy, upon this so signal an Occasion;" and, in the Afternoon, the Magistracy of the City concurred with their Lordships, and all the rest of the Nobility, as well as many Thousands of the People, in expressing their solemn and sincere Joy upon this so universally-acceptable an Occasion. Among the Cities of England, Exeter was the first that approach'd the Throne with their Felicitations; and they thought themselves highly oblig'd to thank God, for the Birth of a Royal Prince; a Blessing inestimable, and one of the greatest to his most sacred Majesty, and these Nations, &c. The Town of Berwick desir'd, among the first of his Majesty's Subjects, upon the long-wish'd-for, blessed Occasion of the thrice-happy Delivery of his great and Royal Consort, to congratulate, &c. and put up their Prayers, that God would graciously bestow a Male Posterity, from the same Royal Line, to sway the Scepter of these Kingdoms to the End of the World. The Townsmen of Dartmouth, full of Transports of Joy, throw themselves at his Majesty's Royal Feet, to congratulate the happy Birth of the Prince, the greatest Blessing that good Subjects could desire, or Heaven could grant. The Town of Portsmouth call the Birth of a Prince an Act of Grace from the Almighty, which had crown'd the Wishes of all his Majesty's good Subjects; and, thro' the whole of their Address, seem to be stark mad with Joy. The Grand-Jury for the County of Middlesex solemnly and heartily congratulate his Majesty's great Happiness and Satisfaction in the Birth of their high, hopeful Prince, and account it no less Happiness to these Nations. The City of Durham acknowledge the Birth of the Prince to be the greatest of Blessings; and yet pray, that their Majesties may be further blessed with more Children, and more Sons. The Lord-Lieutenant and his Deputies, and the Justices, of Kent, not only lick the Dust at his Majesty's Foot-stool, but acknowledge, that his admirable Goodness, Piety and Justice, have obtain'd from their most gracious God this so inexpressible a Blessing; and undertake to make choice of such Members in the next Parliament, as should unite his Subjects in Charity and Christian Correspondence, by repealing the Tests, &c. The City of Bath thought it unjust to be silent, and therefore offer up their Thanks to the great Jehovah, &c. The exceeding Joy of the Citizens of Carlisle transports them above Mortals, and makes them partake of Heaven upon Earth: According to them, his Majesty had been, in a most high measure, the Care of Almighty God; witness his past Deliverances, and now, to close all, this heavenly Blessing to complete the Miracle: A Prince born, to the World's Astonishment! The Grand-Jury of Hereford declare, that the Prince of Wales was a Blessing sent from Heaven, for the perpetual Establishment of Liberty of Conscience; and, after touching on his Majesty's gracious Intentions to his Subjects in general, in abrogating the penal Laws and Tests, roundly proceed in these Words: "We will not, like others, go about thanking your Majesty for your particular Favours of promising to maintain the established Religion of the Church of England 1688; but do freely, willingly, and unanimously give our best Thanks, general, and without any Restriction whatever: We are neither for designing Evil, nor for carrying it on when it is begun; therefore do promise to use our utmost Endeavours (when your Majesty, in your great Wisdom, thinks fit to call a Parliament) to chuse, and promote the chusing of such Representatives, as will, in all respects, comply with your Majesty's Desires." To conclude on this Head, tho' there is still a Troop behind, certain of the Clergy of Cheshire, who thought they could no otherwise prove themselves dutiful and loyal Subjects, make it their Glory, that they had heartily read his Majesty's Declaration, not repining that all their Fellow-Subjects did with them enjoy a Portion of the Royal Favour: Some, they acknowledged, had well deserv'd; and as to the rest, towards whom his Majesty us'd the subtlest Method of conquering, they hoped, if his Mercy was not successful, his Power would at least preserve him safe. Then recurring back to the Declaration, they assert, That, if the Matter of it was not according to their Wishes, the publishing of it was their Duty, in virtue of the express Prerogative of his Majesty's Supremacy over them, &c. Adding, "So that we cannot but with Trouble of Mind hear of the Proceedings of the Seven Bishops, who, tho' they tenderly promised the Dissenters something, yet refus'd to do their Part about the Declaration, lest they should be Parties to it: Which Reasonings, with due Modesty, (and relying on a higher Authority) esteem insufficient; seeing the Parliament of 62 did not think the reading most of the People, who flock'd to them in such Numbers, for their Blessing, and to console their hard Labors, that great and very extraordinary Remarks were made, both of Person and Behaviour. Among these, THE NONCONFORMIST Ministers went to pay him a Visit, which the King took so liberally, that he sent for five of them to reprimand them; but they shew'd more, That they could not but adhere to the Princess, as Men cou'd not and shou'd to the Protestant Faith, or to that People. Nay, what is more extrordi-nary, the very Soldiers, that kept Guard at the Tower, would frequently drink good Health to the Princess, which being understood by Sir Edward Hales, Comdr. of the Tower, he sent Orders to the Captain of the Guard, to see it was done no more: But the Answer he receiv'd was, That they were doing it at the very Instant, and shou'd drink that, and no other Health, while the Bishops were here. of the Common-Prayer was approving it, without Assent and Consent, publicly declar'd, We, therefore, become earnest, tho' too mean, Intercessors to your most gracious Majesty, in behalf of the Church of England, that the Faults of these and others may not be laid to her Charge, in whose Communion there are many, and we hope there will be more, who concur in promoting the Purposes of your mild Government. We farther beg leave to make our Congratulations for the happy Birth of the young Prince, in his hereditary-successive Kingdom. We, in this Palatinate, are the first Lot of Inheritance to the First-born of our Kings; and as we have a greater Part in him, so we have a more plentiful Joy that he is born to us; praying a long Life to him, and the Inheriting of his Royal Father's Crown and Virtues. We hereby bind ourselves to continue steadfastly, &c.

And now let Posterity judge, whether their Addresses were less fulsome than those before treated of, as we had it asserted, with this Addition, That the Fervor was much abated, and that no Papist could express his Joy for the Birth of a Prince of Wales, but a Protestant was ready to answer, But the Bishops are in the Tower.

And Congratulations.

The Gazette, at this time, were also crowded with pompous Accounts of the splendid Entertainments given, and the public Rejoicings made, by the King's Ministers at foreign Courts, more especially that of Rome, under the Direction of Cardinal Howard and Sir John Lyttel; as also with the solemn (g) Congratulations of almost all the Princes of Europe, not excepting their Highnesses of Orange, who sent over Mr. Zuylerstein on that Errand; and, as a farther Mark of their Respect and Sincerity, caus'd the young Prince to be pray'd for in their Chapel; which Bishop Burnet makes some Apology for, by saying, The first Letters gave not those Grounds of Satisfaction that were sent to them afterwards.— But before we enlarge on this controverted Point, it is necessary to returne the Case of the seven Bishops, which we left in Suspence, and which in this Interval was turn'd on to a Decision with such Precipitation, as if it had been foreseen, that the Fate of the Crown depended upon it.

Upon the fifteenth of June, being the first Day of Term, their Lordships were brought up by Water from the Tower, and were received at their landing by several Persons of Quality, a Crowd of Divines of all Ranks and Degrees, and such a Concourse of the Populace, as had scarce ever been seen together before, all rendering the Air with Shouts, and expressing in their very Faces all that Excesses of Passion, which on these extraordinary Occasions Men catch of one another, and which renders them at all times dreadful, and often as mischievous as the Irruptions of Atna, or the Ocean in its Fury. The very Bishops themselves, it seems, were almost afraid of the Spirit they had rais'd; for as they wedg'd their way along thro' the Crowd, and dispens'd their Blessings on all Sides, they also added their Admonitions, That they would fear God, honour the King, and maintain their Loyalty. Being come into Westminster-hall, they found the Floor crowded, like the Streets, and the Scaffolding fill'd with Rows of Gentlemen and Ladies; all led thither by an equal Mixture of Zeal and Curiosity, and omitting no Opportunity of testifying their Concern for their Deliverance; as if, says Bishop Kennet, this was to be the last Trial for the Liberties of the Nation. On the Bench appear'd the Lord Chief-Justice Wright, assisted by the Justices, Holloway, Powell, and Alibone; and within, and beside the Bar, as Council for his Majesty, his Attorney-General, Powis; his Solicitor-General, the late great Patriot-Speaker, Williams, who had been fin'd ten thousand Pounds in that very Court, for scandalizing the King in whole Behalf he now appear'd; Storer, the Recorder of London, and Baldock, and Trinder, of the Brotherhood of the Quoit: And for the Defendants, those glorified Loyalists, Sawyer and Finch, the late Solicitor and Attorney Generals; Sir Francis Peuberton; Pelloxen, who had set out as a Whig, and yet had acted as King's Counsel in Jeffery's Western Campaign; Treby, who in the preceding Reign had made himself obnoxious to the Abhorers, by his close Attachment to the contrary Party; and Sommers, of whom such frequent mention is to be made hereafter.

The Return and Warrant having been read, the Attorney-General mov'd that the Information might also be read to the Prisoners, and that they might answer and plead to it. This Motion the Bishop's Council oppos'd, objecting, first, That the Prisoners were committed by the Lord-Chancellor, and some other of the Privy-Council, without expressing in the Warrant, that it was by Order of the Privy-Council; and therefore, that the Commitment being illegal, the Prisoners were not legally in Court: And, secondly, That the Fact for which they were committed, was such, as they ought not to have been imprison'd for; because a Peer ought not to be committed, in the first Instance, for a Misdemeanor. The King's Council on the contrary alladg'd, That if a Peer might be committed for Treason, Felony, or Breach of the Peace, as Sawyer himself had acknowledg'd, there could not be a greater Breach of the Peace, than for a Man to come to the King's Face and publish a Libel against him: That there was nothing which did so tread upon the Heels of a capital Offence, and that two or three Degrees more might carry it to High Treason. Judge Powell refus'd to deliver his Opinion before he had consulted Books: But the Lord Chief-Justice, Judge Alibone, and Judge Holloway agreed, That the Fact charg'd in the Warrant, was such a Misdemeanor, as was a Breach of the Peace; and therefore, that the Information ought to be read, and the Bishops must plead to it. The Information being being then read, the Bishops Council desir'd, that they might have an Imparalance till the next Term to consider what they had to plead. Sir Samuel Astry, Clerk of the Crown, being ask'd, What was the Courfe of the Court? answer'd, That of late Years, if a Man appear'd upon a Recognizance, or was a Person in Custody, he ought to plead at the first Instance; but that he had known it to be at the Discretion of the Court, to grant what Time they pleas'd. After this Answer, the Lord Chief-Justice declar'd, That the Bishops should now plead to the Information. Thereupon the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury offer'd a Plea in Behalf of himself and his Brethren, the other Defendants; alledging, That they were Peers of this Kingdom of England, and Lords of Parliament, and ought not to be compell'd to answer instantly, for the Misdemeanor mention'd in the Information; but that they ought to be requir'd to appear by due Procees of Law; and upon their Appearance, to have a Copy of the said Information, and reasonable Time given them to imparle thereupon. The King's Council labour'd hard to have the Plea rejected. After a long Debate, Judge Powl said, he was for receiving the Plea, and considering of it; but the rest of the Judges declar'd for rejecting of it. So the Prisoners at last pleaded, Not Guilty. The King's Council pray'd, the Clerk might join Issue on behalf of the King; and desir'd the Defendants to take notice, That they intended to try this Cause on that Day Fortnight; adding, That they were bailable, if they pleas'd. Sir Robert Sawyer desir'd, that their own Recognizance might be taken; which was readily granted, and that on such small Sums as 500*l.* for the Archbishop, and 200*l.* each of his Suffragans.

Never did the Genius of the Bar display itself more fully, than thro' the whole Courfe of this Hearing; nor did ever a Bench exert less Spirit, or shew more Patience. The Council on both Sides seem to have had a Licence to be as clamorous and as abusive, as they pleas'd: Nor had the Chief-Justice Authority to restrain their Licentiousness, nor Courage to attempt it, nor Quickness to invent Expedients, nor any Recourfe of Knowledge to direct the Court; but on the contrary was (h) avowedly directed by it. In the very Beginning of the Pleadings, the Solicitor, Williams, declar'd in the Face of the Court, that the very Arguments now us'd by Sawyer had been formerly us'd by him, and over-ral'd by Sawyer himself, when Attorney; adding, with an Effrontery, beyond Example, I am glad that they now learn of me to tack about: In support of the Law-Doctrine, that a Libel was a Breach of the Peace, he reminds the same Sawyer, that in all the Informations exhibited by him for Libels, the Words (i) Vt & memi, & contra pacem, had ever found a Place: In another Part, he charg'd Finch with not agreeing with himself, not being the same Man in 1678 that he was in 1688. And lastly, it seem'd to be admitted on all hands, That common Understanding and legal Understanding, were two things, which, no doubt, re-dounded much to the Honour of the Profession.

To proceed: That the Bishops were thus far at Liberty afforded such Matter of Joy and Triumph to their good Friends and Allies the Mob, and so extravagant were they in their Expressions of it, that their Lordships chose to make their way to the Water-side by a private Passage, for fear perhaps of being press'd to death by the Over-violence of their Favours. Mr. Echard adds, "And even then, they were not wholly free from the buzzing Throng; several Persons running into the very Water to beg their Benedictions. When the Day was ended, the public Rejoicings still continued, the whole Night being spent in making Bonfires, and drinking to the Seven heroic Prelates, with all the Demonstrations of unlimited Affection. Within two Days after was the Thanksgiving for the Birth of the Prince of Wales, and tho' the Conspits in the City were made to run with Wine, for several Hours together, and extraordinary Bonfires, &c. were appointed, yet the Joy of the People appear'd to be no way comparable to that upon the account of the Enlargement of the Bishops."

Finding that Zeal had thus got the start of Loyalty, and that the Mitre was more revered than the Crown, it was thought advisable to set forth an (j) Answer to the Bishops Petition, in hope, as the Author of it expresses himself, that the bestowing some Ink upon the Tetter might hinder it from spreading any further: Accordingly, such an Answer was, about this time, exhibited from the King's Press; and in it their Lordships Refusal is call'd, a Fire kindled from the Altar.— They are also told, That they have the Voice of Jacob, but the Hands of Esau: That they are fallen, and, if they repent not, their Candlestick must be removed, &c.

But

(5) Lord Chief-Justice. "We have shew'd, and inform'd ourselves from the Bar, whether we may or can reject a Plea; and truly what they have said hath fully inform'd me that we may, if the Plea be frivolous. And this being a Plea that contains no more than what has been over-ral'd already, after hearing what could be said on both sides, I think the Court is not bound to receive the Plea, but may reject it, and my Lord the Bishops must plead over." [Echard's Treatise, p. 42.]

(6) Here the Bishop of Peterborough address'd him, "Whether it was in his own Case I be answer'd." "Yes, it was in my Case; and you were one of them that profecuted me, for ought I know; or, if you did not profecute me, you preach'd against me; or, if you did not, some of your Tribe did." [Echard's Treatise, p. 42.]

(7) Bishop Kewer also mentions another Arrangement of their Lordships before the People, in a famous Harangue, intitled, The Examination of the Bishops, upon their Refusal of reading his Majesty's most gracious Declaration, and the Nonconformance of the Church of England, in regard of the Penal Taxes and Tithes fully debated and argued. With Allowance, 1688. 4to. Beginning in such a strain, as would make it suspicious that we were to lose the Truth and Purity of our Language, as well as of our Religion. "It has pleas'd the Almighty Power, which rules the Heavens of Finest, to enlighten and adorn his present gracious Majesty with such peculiar Beams of Mercy and Clemency, that our truly Royal Virtues, that render him the merest Portrait of that Deity, whose Vicegerent he is. To win therefore the universal Love of his People, (and that of all that are) and indeed reserved for, his Great Self, he has graciously promis'd all of Compassion, receiving to pardon the former Offences of those his Subjects, whomsoever they be, who have not yetted themselves; who may have any ways repented."

But the Court had soon Reason to be convinced, that this Paper-Expedit had work'd no Miracles in their Favour: For, when the Day of Trial came, the Bishops came into Court with a far greater and more illustrious Train than before, being countenanced by no less than Twenty-nine Temporal Peers, (viz. the Marquesses of Hollifax and Worcester, the Earls of Sbrensbury, Kent, Bedford, Pembroke, Dorset, Belingbroke, Manchester, Rivers, Stamford, Carnarvon, Cheslerfield, Scarsdale, Clarendon, Dunby, Suffex, Rabner, Nottingham, and Abington; the Viscount Balcanberge; and the Lords Newport, Grey of Ruthen, Paget, Chandos, Vaughan-Carberry, Lambey, Cartaret, and Ossulton;) a great Concourse of the Gentry, and such Numbers of the Populace, as filled the Hall, and all the Avenues and Places adjacent.

It is however natural to think, that such mighty Assemblies as these are not form'd by chance; or by the mere Reputation of any Persons, or Party, or Cause whatever. In factious Times, scarce any Incident arises, that is not made some use of; and Lord Hollifax never once comes upon the Stage, but the Plot thickens, and some great Event is in Embrio: As therefore the Prosecution of the Bishops was the great Hinge, on which all the Hopes of him and his Party turn'd, it may be imagin'd, that these Peers were rather his Followers, than the Defendants: Indeed we are told by Bishop Kennet, that this splendid Appearance was chiefly owing to the indefatigable Care and Solicitation of the Clergy, and especially of Dr. Tennison; and, if so, it is a Matter of Wonder, that their laudable Endeavours had not the like good Effect on the rest of the Right Reverend Fathers of the Church, who were more peculiarly interested in the Event, not one of whom appear'd to countenance either their Persons or their Cause, but stood aloof (as it is carefully remember'd the Dissenters did) in expectation of the Issue; as if it was scarce safe to be within the Reach of the Shadow of their Downfall.

However the Fact may be, it was under this favourable Aspect for the Defendants, that the Court was open'd; and, to take off the Edge of the Peoples Resentments, or at least to bespeak a more favourable Audience on the King's Side, the Attorney-General artfully premis'd, That the Bishops were not prosecuted as Bishops, much less for any Point or Matter of Religion, but as Subjects of this Kingdom, and only for a temporal Crime, as those who had injur'd and affronted the King to his very Face: That they were not prosecuted for omitting to do any thing, but as they were Actors, for censuring of his Majesty and his Government; and for giving their Opinions in Matters wholly relating to Law and Government: That there is not any one thing which the Law is more jealous of, than all Accusations and Arrangements of the Government: That no Man is allow'd to accuse even the most inferior Magistrate of any Misbehaviour in his Office, unless it be in a legal Course, tho' the Fact be true; tho' least of all, may any Man censure the King, for it tends to possess the People that the Government is ill administer'd; the Consequence of which is, to set them upon desiring a Reformation; and what that tended to, and would end in, they had all had too dear bought Experience of: And that Men were to take their proper Remedies for redressing of any Grievance they lay under, which the Laws had sufficiently provided for. Then, proceeding to the Matter of the Declaration, he urg'd, That his Majesty had caus'd it to be publish'd for the Ease of his People: That he had requir'd it to be read in the House of God, that they might be the more convinced that he was earnestly bent to observe it: That, instead of the Thanks which were due to him for his Favour and Goodness to his People, the Defendants had, in what they call'd a Petition, treated him with such hard Words, and brought so heavy an Accusation against him, as a private Person would be little able to bear: That, as before his Accession he had been accus'd of Cruelty, so now he was arraign'd for his Mercy: And that his Majesty resent'd this ill Usage so far, that he had thought fit thus publicly to vindicate his Honour, by bringing the Matter to a Trial, in the Assurance that the Jury, as to all other Persons, would do him Right.

After this Harangue, the Court proceeded to a formal Proof, that the Bishops were really the Authors and Deliverers of the Petition in dispute; in order to which, their own Confession in Council was brought in Evidence against them; (tho' Milnes, one of the Council-Clerks, bore witness, that when the Archbishop did acknowledge it, he also express'd a Reliance on his Majesty, that no ill Use should be made of such Acknowledgment;) and the Lord President Sunderland depos'd, that they apply'd to him to be introduced with the said Petition; that he obtain'd the King's Leave for their Admission; and that he had given Order for their Admission accordingly.

Here the Fact was referr'd; for no Attempt was made to fasten the Publication upon them, otherwise than by the Delivery; and the Council for the Bishops enter'd upon their Defence; in the Progress of which, as well as in the foregoing Part of the Trial, they had a Taste of those Mortifications from the Bench, and of those Petulancies from the King's Council, which they themselves, when in Power, had formerly let fly at, and help'd to draw down upon, the Advocates for the Subject.

Sir Robert Sawyer stood up first, and in several Places of the Bishop's Council, Opposition to the Words of the Information, That the Bishops had conspir'd to diminish the Royal Authority, by falsely, maliciously, and seditiously making a Libel against the King, under the Pretence of a Petition, undertook to shew, That the Petition was presented to his Majesty in most private and humble manner: That it had not the least Tendency to any Sedition, or the Diminution of the King's Authority: That it was only a Prayer to be reliev'd against an Order of Council, which the Defendants conceiv'd they were griev'd by; accomaccompany'd with an Excuse for their Non-compliance with the King's Order, because the Dispensing Power, upon which it was founded, had been several times in Parliament declared to be against ( $\delta$ ) Law: That it can be no Question, but that any Subject who is commanded by the King to do a thing which he conceives to be against Law, and against his Conscience, may apply himself to the King, and tell him the Reason why he does not concur with his Majesty in such a Command: That, whereas the King's Council had insisted, That in this Case the Bishops were not sued as Bishops, nor prosecuted for their Religion, he knew not what they were sued for else, the Information being against them as Bishops, and no otherwise, and for an Act they conceiv'd they lawfully might do, with relation to their ecclesiastical Policy: That the main Stumbling-block to their Lordships, in the Declaration, was the Clause, by which all manner of Penal Laws, in Matters ecclesiastical, were suspended; for if their publishing it had any Effect in Law, and these Laws were suspended by virtue of it, then certainly it was of the most dismal Consequence; and it behov'd the Bishops, as Fathers of the Church, humbly to respect it to the King: That when a Law is suspended, the Obligation thereof is taken away: So that the Declaration abrogat'd at once all Ministers and Clergy-men for a performing their Duty in seeing the Service of the Church, and their Hearers from attending upon that Service: That the pretended Power of suspending Laws had often been declar'd illegal by the Parliaments, as appear'd particularly in the time of Richard the Second, concerning the Statute of Provisions; for where there were particular Dispensations for that Statute, the King was enabled to do it by Act of Parliament, and could not do it without: That in delivering this Petition the Bishops had done nothing but their Duty, and meddled with their own Affairs, which appear'd from the general Care that is repos'd in them by the Laws of the Land; urging farther, That they are frequently cited in Law-Books, The King's Spiritual Judges: That they are entrusted with the Care of Souls, and the Superintendency over all the Clergy; and besides, That there is a special Care put upon them by the express Words of an Act of Parliament made in the first of Elizabeth, which makes them especial Guardians of the Law of Uniformity, &c.

Mr. Finch, in his Turn, having premis'd, that in point of Evidence, the very Delivery of the Petition was not positively prov'd; in the next Place asserted, that the Contrivance bid in the Information to diminish the King's Power, could admit of no Proof at all: For whereas the Power in Dispute was a Power of dispensing all Ecclesiastical Laws, &c. he insinuated that his Majesty had no such Power: That a Power to abrogate is as much a Part of the Legislature, as a Power to make Laws: That in Effect there was no Difference between abrogating Laws at once, and disabling them by Degrees: That if the whole Legislative Power was, by the Constitution of England, in King, Lords, and Commons, it could not be legally assum'd by either: That if the Declaration in question (being a Legislative Act) was founded but upon a Part of the Legislature, it could not be a legal and true Power or Prerogative: That in the Year 1662, where there was but the least Umbrage given of such a Dispensing Power, altho' the King had declar'd in his Speech to the Parliament, That he wou'd be bad such a Power, which his Declaration before seem'd to assume, the Parliament was so jealous of this, that they immediately made their Application to his Majesty, by an Address against the Declaration; alledging among other Reasons, That the King could not dispense with those Laws without an Act of Parliament: That there was another Attempt in 1672; and then, after his Majesty had in his Speech mention'd his Declaration to them, the Parliament, particularly the House of Commons, presented an Address to his Majesty, setting forth, That this could not be done by Law, without an Act of Parliament: And his Majesty concurr'd with them so far in that Opinion, that he caus'd it to be made known to the House of Lords, by the Lord-Chancellor, That his Majesty had broken the Seal, and cancell'd the Declaration, with this farther Declaration, That it should never be drawn into Example or Consequence: And that upon the whole, the Defendants had done no more than their Duty as Bishops and Peers, in thus modestly, humbly, and privately excusing themselves from obeying what his Majesty had no Authority to command.

Pollaxfen, who spoke next, yet more bluntly alledg'd, That, whereas the King's Council would have the Petition to be a Libel, because it said, The Declaration was founded upon a Power which the Parliament had declar'd illegal, the King had no Will but that of the Law: That, if the King's Will was not consonant to that of the Law, it was not obliging: That this Declaration under the great Seal was not agreeable to the Law, because, at one Blow, it set aside all Laws, &c. And Penborton, that the Kings of England had no such dispensing Power as had been exercis'd in the Declaration: That it struck at the very Foundation of all the Rights,

(4) While Sir Robert was enlarging on this Topic, the Lord Chief Justice, speaking aside, said,

L. C. Jus. "I will not suffer this: They intend to dispute the King's Power of suspending Laws."

Mr. Jus. Powel. My Lord, they must necessarily fall upon that Point; for, if the King hath no such Power, (as clearly he hath not in my Judgment) the natural Consequence will be, that this Petition is no Diminution of the King's Regal Power, and so not seditious or libellous.

L. C. Jus. Bother, I know you are full of that Doctrine; but, however, my Lords the Bishops shall have no occasion to say, that I deny to hear their Council. Bother, you shall have your Will for once, I will hear them, so their talk all they are weary.

Mr. Jus. Powel. I desire no better Liberty to be granted them, than what in Justice the Court may give; and that is, to hear them in defence of their Cause.

A.D. 1688. Rights, Liberties and Properties of all the King's Subjects: "If, said he, the King may suspend the Laws of the Land which concern Religion, I am sure there is no other Law but he may suspend: And, if the King may suspend all the Laws of the Kingdom, what a Condition are all the Subjects in for their Lives, Liberties and Properties? All at Mercy!— Lastly, Sommers gave the Essence of all that had been said, in these Words: "That as to the Matters of Fact alledged in the said Petition, there could be no Design to diminish the Prerogative, because the King has no such Prerogative; that the Petition could not be seditious, because it was presented to the King in private and alone; not false, because the Matter of it was true; nor malicious, for the Occasion was not sought, the thing was pres'd upon them; nor, in short, a Libel, because the Intent was innocent, and they kept within the Bounds set by Act of Parliament, that gives the Subject leave to apply to his Prince by Petition when he is aggrieved."

The Attorney and Solicitor Generals made long and vehement Replies, particularly the Latter, who now treated the Sense of Parliament with as much Disdain and Contempt, as ever any of his Compatriots had formerly shewn to the Sense of the Court; and was heathenly hiss'd by the whole Auditory for his Pains.

The Opinion of the Judges. Upon the whole, the Lord Chief-Justice, after summing up the Evidence, told the Jury, That sometimes the dispensing Power had been allow'd, as in Richard II's Time, and sometimes deny'd, but that it was a Question out of the present Case. Then he gave them Directions, to conclude, That if they believ'd the Petition to be the same, which was presented by the Bishops to the King, the Publication was sufficiently prov'd: Next, that any thing which tended to disturb the Government, or make a Stir among the People, was certainly within the Case of Liell's Janity; and his Opinion, in short, was, That the Bishops Petition was a Libel. Mr. Justice Hellway declar'd, That the End and Intention of any Action was to be consider'd; that the Bishops were charg'd with delivering a Petition, which according to their Defence, was done with all the Humility and Decency imaginable; and that as they were Men of good Lives, the delivering of a Petition was no Fault, it being the Right of every Subject to petition: Therefore if the Jury were satisfy'd they did it with no ill Intention, but only to shew the Reason of their Disobedience to the King's Command, he could not think it to be a Libel. Mr. Justice Powell more plainly declar'd, That he could discern no Sedition, or any other Crime fix'd upon the Reverend Fathers, the Lords Bishops, since there was nothing offer'd by the King's Council to render the Petition, false, malicious, or seditious. He admonish'd the Jury to consider, That the Contents of the Petition were, that the Bishops apprehended the Declaration was illegal, being founded upon a Dispensing Power claim'd by the King; but for his Part he did not remember in any Case in all the Law, That there was any such Power in the King; and if there be no such Power in the King, the Petition could not be a Libel. He concluded with telling them, That he could see no Difference between the King's Power to dispense with Laws Ecclesiastical, and his Power to dispense with any other Laws whatsoever: That if this were once allow'd of, there would be no need of Parliaments, and all the Legislature would be in the King; and he left the Issue to God and their Consciences. Mr. Justice Allybone, who spoke last, laid down these two Positions, first, That no Man can take upon him to write against the actual Exercise of the Government, unless he has leave from the Government, but he makes a Libel, be what he writes true or false. Secondly, That no private Man can take upon him to write concerning the Government at all; and that when he intrudes himself into other Mens Business, that does not concern his particular Interest, he is a Libeller: And these Positions he back'd by a Resolution of the Judges in King James the First's Time, That to frame a Petition to the King to put the Penal Laws in Execution, was next door to Treason; but was told by Mr. Justice Powell, that he had mistaken the Case; and by Serjeant Pemberton, that he should have said, To petition against the Penal Laws. This laid him under a Necessity to acknowledge his Blunder; but he nevertheless persever'd in his Opinion, that the Bishops had meddled with what did not concern them; and that they took upon them, in a petitionary Way, to contradict the actual Exercise of the Government, which according to him, no private-particular Persons, or single Body, ought to do.

The Matter now rested with the Jury, who happen'd to be the first Twelve upon the Pannel (for the Bishops made no Challenges; and it was presum'd, that none were return'd who had any remarkable Bias in their Favour); and tho' the Trial had lasted ten Hours, they took the whole Night to consider of their Verdict: According to Bishop Burnet, this was done, because they thought it both the solemn and safer Way; but, according to others, it arose from the Obstinacy of one Arnold, who, being Brewer to the King, stood out all that while, for fear of losing his Place. At Ten the next Morning, however, the Court being set, the Defendants at the Bar, and, if possible, yet greater Crowds attending than had attended the Day before, the Jury came in, and by their Foreman, Sir Roger Langley, declar'd their Verdict to be, Not Guilty: Which Words were no sooner pronounced, than they were echoed with such Shouts thro' the Hall, as had scarce ever been heard upon any Occasion before; and these being repeated by the Multitudes waiting in the two Palace-yards, the whole Town partook of the News almost at the same Instant: That Monster, the dispensing Power, was now look'd upon as subdued, and no Victory was ever celebrated with more eager or more universal Joy. Even the very Army, which, as in the two preceding Years, was encamp'd at Hounslow-Heath, had the Day before betray'd such a Disposition in favour of the Bishops, as made the Court uneasy: And, this Morning, to awe them by his Presence into a Conformity to his Measures, the King in Person had thought fit to make them a Visit: But, while he was yet in the midst of them, the News of the Acquittal arriving, they threw off all Restraint, and shouted as loudly and freely as the Populace had done before. His Majesty, who was then in Lord Fewellham's Tent, alarm'd at the sudden Uproar, sent out that Nobleman to know the Cause; and, being inform'd, It was nothing but the Joy of the Soldiers for the Discharge of the Bishops, reply'd, in much Disorder, Do you call that nothing?— But so much the worse for them,— meaning the Bishops, and not the Soldiers, as has been generally understood. Thus it appear'd, that neither the refractory Spirit of his Army, nor the avowed Disposition of his People, had any Weight with him: In less than a Week after the Bishops were acquitted he struck Hillossay and Powel off the University of Oxford as a public Mark of his Displeasure: And, as if he was still resolv'd to carry his Point, in defiance of Juries and Parliaments, he caus'd his ecclesiastical Commissioners to issue an Order, July 12, to all Ecclesiastical Archdeacons, Commissioners, and Officers, to enquire in what Churches and Parishes his Majesty's Declaration had been read, and to transmit an Account of them by the sixteenth of the next Month. Thomas (I.) Bishop of Oxford, was the first, who, in the midst of these Translations, he not only sent his Mandamus to the Magdalen College to elect Gifford, a Scholastic Doctor, secular Priest, and titular Bishop of Madaura, to be their President in his stead, but would have oblig'd the University to have honoured him with a Doctor's Degree; and, they resolutely refusing, proceeded even so far as to nominate the said Gifford to the See of Oxford: At least it is so said; though not sufficiently prov'd; for we find, that one Hall, an obscure Divine of London, was afterwards promoted to that Dignity, on the Merit of having comply'd with the Order of Council to read the Declaration. Nay, so far did his Resentments carry him, that Endeavours were us'd to prosecute certain Persons as Rioters, who had been at the Expence of Bonfires, when the Bishops were discharged: But tho' the Jury were sent out no less than three times, they refus'd to find the Bill.

Herby's
Memo. p. 256.

We are yet farther told, that, finding it was exceeding difficult, if not impossible, for him to effect his Designs without open

Force, he thought it advisable to order that he might depend upon his Army, by inducing them to subscribe a Writing, in which they should engage themselves to conform, as far as in them lay, towards the Repeal of the Tests and Penal Laws. To bring this to bear, it was thought fit to propose the same to all the Regiments one by one; not doubting but that if two or three submitted, the rest would follow their Example. Accordingly, the Major of the Lord Litchfield's Regiment was order'd to open his Majesty's Desire to that Battalion, and command all such as would not instantly comply with it, to lay down their Arms: But he was not a little surpris'd when he found that, except two Captains, and some popish Soldiers, the whole Regiment obey'd the latter Part of his Command. The King himself remain'd speechless for a while; and, having recover'd his Astonishment, commanded them to take up their Arms again, adding, with a discontented, sullen Look, That, for the future, he would not do them the Honour to ask their Advice.

Of all the Matters of Accusation brought against the King, this seems to be the most heinous, as it implies a Resolution to perpetuate that Violence which he had committed on the Constitution by Force of Arms. Whether the Fact is to be depended on, or not, is not so easily decided: That many of our most prejudic'd Historians have made no mention of it; that no Trace is to be found of it in any of those labour'd Invectives which were the Growth of those embitter'd times; and that those who have mention'd it, apparently follow one-another, without citing any Authority; seems to argue, that, if it had any, it had but a slender Foundation. And, on the other hand, it is scarce supposable that Names and Circumstances should be so distinctly specified if it had no Foundation at all.

In this Interval, to make a proper Use of the Victory he had gain'd, his Grace the Archbishop sent a Paper to the several Bishops of his Province, containing eleven Heads, or Articles, on which they were to enlarge to their Clergy; of which the most remarkable were as follow: That four times a Year, at least, they incultate, that all usurped and foreign Jurisdiction being, for most just Causes, abolished in this Realm; and that the King's Power being in his Dominions highest under God, they, upon all Occasions, persuade the People to Loyalty and Obedience to his Majesty, in all things lawful, and to patient Submission in the rest; promoting, as far as in them lies, the public Peace and Quiet of the World:

That

(1) Concerning this Prelate we find the following Passage in the Letter said to have been sent from Father Pere to Father de Choise:

"The Bishop of Oxford has not yet declared himself openly, the great Goliath is his Wife, which he cannot rid himself, his Design being to continue Bishop, and only to change Communion; and this 'tis not doubted but the King will permit, and our Holy Father confirm: So I do not see how he can be further useful to us in the Religion in which he is yet, because he is suspected, and of no Esteem, among the

Heretics of the English Church; nor do I foresee, that the Example of his Conversion is like to draw many others after him, because he declar'd himself so suddenly: If he had believ'd my Counsel, which was, to temporally stay some longer time, he would have done better: But I am sorry, or rather Zeal, that hurry'd him. The same may be said of other Prelates that will do no less than this: I am sure, 'tis better, to see how they may be serviceable to the Church, and produce more Fruit, while they are in the World, than to

That they maintain fair Correspondence (still in the kindest Respects of all Sorts) with the Country and Persons of Quality in their Neighbourhood, as being deeply sensible, what reasonable Affluence and Contenance the Church had receiv'd from them in her Necessities: That they also walk in Mildom towards them who are not of our Communion: And, if there be in their Parishes any such, that they neglect not frequently to confer with them in the Spirit of Meekness, seeking, by all good Ways and Means, to gain and win them over to our Communion: More especially, that they have a very tender Regard to our Brethren the Protestant Dissenters: That, upon Occasion offer'd, they visit them at their Houses, and receive them kindly at their own; and treat them fairly wherever they meet them; persuading them, if it may be, to a full Compliance with our Church; or, at least, that whereunto we have already attain'd, we may all walk by the same Rule, and mind the same thing: And, in order thereto, that they take all Opportunities of assuring and convincing them, That the Bishops of this Church are really and sincerely irreconcilable Enemies to the Errors, Superstitions, Idolatries, and Tyrannies of the Church of Rome; and that the very unkind Jealousies, which some have had of us to the contrary, were altogether groundless: And, in the last place, that they warmly and most affectionately exhort them to join with us in daily fervent Prayer to the God of Peace, for an universal blessed Union of all Reformed Churches, both at home and abroad, against our common Enemies, &c.

Mr. Richard also observes, that the more moderate Dissenters, about this time, becoming Converts to the Merits and Sufferings of the Church, and shewing an unusual Readiness to come in, the good Archbishop, and others, considered of proper Methods to promote this Inclination, and to gain them over, without doing any Prejudice to themselves. Accordingly a Scheme was laid out to improve and enforce the Discipline of the Church; and to review and enlarge the present Liturgy, by correcting of some things, and by adding of others; and, if it should be thought fit by Authority in Convocation and Parliament, by leaving out some few Ceremonies, confessed to be indifferent in their Natures, as indifferent in their Usage, so as not to be necessarily observed by those who made a scruple of them; till they should be able to overcome either their Weaknesses or Prejudices, and be willing to comply with them.

About this time also, Sprat Bishop of Rockester, who had sat thus long with the ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the Sunderland-Principle, of being servicable to his suffering Brethren, put in for his Share of Popularity, by taking a solemn (m) Leave of them and their Proceedings: Hence Conclusions were drawn, that the Commission itself was not long-lived; for it was the known Characteristic of that Prelate, That no one had a quicker Apprehension of Danger than he, or had more Sagacity to avoid it: Indeed the Terror of it was already so miserably sunk, that scarce any Regard was shewn to their last Citations; and even upon the few Returns that were made, they did not think it proper to proceed: On the contrary, after a long Consultation, having renew'd their former Order, and assign'd a longer Day for those concern'd to shew their Obedience to it, they adjourn'd, and never met as a Court any more.

All this while, the Ferment of the Public both continued and increas'd, and that not only thro' their own Reincitements of the ugly Facts already recited, but the dextrous Use that was made of them: For, in political as in other Experiments, Nature must be help'd by Art, or 'tis odds but the whole Process goes off in Smoak: Inflammatory Writings and more inflammatory Reports, were the Growth of almost every Hour, and had the same Tendency to render the Government odious, and prepare the People for Change. Thus it was said, that the Bishops themselves, to hinder a general Insurrection, while their Cause was depending, had only prevented it, by exhorting the People, in the Words of St. James, "Be ye patient! Establish your Hearts! For the coming of the Lord's Deliverance draweth nigh." Thus, while the Preparations were making for the magnificent Fireworks, which were to be play'd off in honour of the Prince of Wales's Birth, it was given out, that, under that Pretence, a Design was carrying on to bombard the City, by way of Revenge for the extravagant Rejoicings they had made for the Deliverance of the said Bishops: And thus, when the Sky happen'd to be cover'd with thick Clouds, and inflam'd from End to End with Lightnings, which continu'd for many Hoars together, unaccompani'd either with Rain or Thunder, on the Night when those Fireworks were play'd off, all was turn'd into Prodigy

Inflammatory Reports.

[m] In these memorable Words:

"I most humbly intreat your Lordships favourable Interpretation of what I now write, That, since your Lordships are resolv'd to proceed against those who have not comply'd with the King's Command in reading his Declaration, it is absolutely impossible for me to serve his Majesty any longer in this Court as usual. I beg leave to tell your Lordships, that, tho' I may still dissent in that particular, yet I will never be any way instrumental in punishing those my Brethren that did not. For 'tis I still God to witness, that what I did was merely in a Point of Conscience; so I am fully satisfy'd, that their Forbearance was upon the same Principle. I have no Reason to think otherwise of the whole Body of our Clergy, who, upon all Occasions, have signaliz'd their Loyalty to the Crown, and their zealous Affection to his present Majesty's Person, in the word of Times. Now, my Lords, the Safety of the whole Church of England seems to be exceedingly concern'd in this Prolocution, I will declare I cannot, with a safe Confidence, sit or judge in this Cause, upon so many pious and excellent Men, with whom (if it be God's Will) it rather becomes me to suffer, than to be in the least an Occasion of their Sufferings. I therefore earnestly request your Lordships, to intercede with his Majesty, that I may be graciously dismiss'd from any further Attendance at your Board: And to assure him, that I am still ready to further whatsoever I have to his Service, but my Confidence and Religion."

and Portent; and it was impiously call'd an Expression of God Almighty's (n) Indignation against the Cheat which his Majesty had put on his Protestant Heirs.

The Son of the Charge against the King.

We are now come to that Point of Time, when it is suppos'd his Majesty had fill'd the Measure of his Iniquities; and we find the Right Reverend Historian of his own Times, in this Place, summing up the Evidence against him: But tho' he affects to draw his Conclusions from the Equity of the Case before him, he sets out, a little unluckily, with a Thought that seems to indicate, that Matter of Policy was to the full as much consider'd as Matter of Justice. The Trial of the Bishops, says he in effect, was consider'd all over Europe as a Trial of the Strength of King and Bishops; and the Decision was as favourable as possible. The Point of Prudence being thus compendiously dispatch'd, our Author proceeds to the Point of Right. The Dispensing Power, which had been usurp'd so soon, and exercis'd so long, he makes the Basis of all, and calls it, in his dry, perplex'd Way, a Power to make Laws void, and to qualify Men for Employments, whom the Law had put under such Incapacities that all they did was null and void; So that the Government, and the Administration of it, was broken: A Parliament, return'd by such Men, was no legal Parliament.— The same Power, that set aside these Laws, might have done the same by the rest. "And, continues his Lordship, when the King pretended, that this was such a sacred Point of Government, that a Petition offer'd in the modestest Terms, and in the humblest Manner possible, calling it in question, was made yet great a Crime, and carry'd so far against Men of such Eminence, THIS, I confess, satisfy'd me, that here was a total Destruction of our Constitution avowedly begun, and violently prosecuted. Here was not Jealousies and Fears: The thing was open and avowed. This was not a single Act of illegal Violence; but a declared Design against the Whole of our Constitution. It was not only the Judgment of a Court of Law: The King had now, by two public Acts of State, renew'd in two successive Years, openly publish'd his Design. This appear'd such a total Subversion, that, according to the Principles that some of the highest Assertors of Submission and Obedience, Barkeley and Grotius, had laid down, it was now lawful for the Nation to look to itself, and see to its own Preservation. And as soon as any Man was convinc'd that this was lawful, there remain'd nothing but to look to the Prince of Orange, who was the only Person that either could save them, or had a Right to it; since, by all the Laws of the World, even private as well as public, he that has in him the Reversion of any Estate has a Right to hinder the Possessor, if he goes about to destroy that which is to come to him after the Possessor's Death."

All Parties, in the Infancy of their Undertakings, affect to act on Principle, and so ill is Government for the general administer'd, that the dullest of Men scarce ever need be at a loss for such Pretences as will set a Gloss on their Designs. The Dispensing-power was indeed such an Engine, as put the whole Constitution out of Joint; and the Admission of Popery into the Government, under whatever Mask, seem'd to threaten the very Fundamentals of civil and religious Liberty: This has been confes'd, even by those who have taken the most Pains to draw the Composition of Posterity on the King, and their Reproaches on his Adversaries: But then it is not altogether so clear, that, if the Nation had a Right to look to itself, the Exercise of that Right was confin'd solely to the Person of the Prince of Orange; nor that as yet his Highness himself was fully entitled to interpose on their Behalf, in virtue of his Claim

(n) The Catholics, on the other hand, who, on the Queen's being declar'd with Child, had made no Difficulty to pronounce, That it would be a Son, for God never did his Work by halves, now as freely pronounced, That the Heavens were on their Sides, and rejoiced in their Joy. And the following Passage from Mr. Echard further shews, that they put in practice all manner of Devices to advance their Cause, as well as their Opponents.

* The Priests being now at the height, says the Archdeacon, were not wanting in putting all their crafty Methods in practice, in order to establish their Religion; and among the rest, they serv'd all Stratagems us'd in the Times of Ignorance; and sent terrible, threatening Letters to Persons of Quality, and others, if they did not very shortly reconcile themselves to the Mother Church of Rome. And, to shew the Spirit of the Persons and the Times, we shall insert a Letter that never was yet printed, from a Rome Friend in London to a Gentleman of the same County, who had given some Length with that Party, and done them singular Services when they were under Difficulties in the late Regency. The Letter, verbatim from the Original, runs thus: "Sir, That you have been eminent for your Loyalty in the worst of Times, no body can doubt; but now it is expected, that you should give some farther Testimony of your Affection: That which was reasonable a Year ago is now become necessary; and it cannot be surpris'd that you, who have gone thro' so far along with us, should first follow the End of the Race; but one Stage more carries us to the desired Haven, where we shall be rewarded for all our Pains and Dangers. This is the time, let every good Catholic declare himself; let us therefore do it greedily and boldly, to the Terror of our Enemies and Salvation of ourselves and Brethren. Those who should oppose us are lost; and thro' their Divisions; they are become stupid Anti-mal, only fit for Burthen, mere Machinal Puppets; we standing silent, have made them play our Game; when they knew not what they did: We have deceiv'd them into a Snare, and we may now come from behind the Curtain, to afflict them farther. Now, Sir, I would advise you, for your own sake, to declare yourself for the Mother Church of Rome: You have been a powerful as a true and faithful Son; do not then, thro' Inadvertency, lose the Reward that is laid up for you. She is resolv'd to embrace no Ballards, nor to give her Children Bread in Dags, as Heretics have been always accus'd: They can desire nothing from Her, but her great Services. She now is willing to own all her Children, that are desirous to embrace her for a Mother: Let me tell you, in short, it is better to do it willingly, than by Compulsion; and she is resolv'd to make a thorough Reformation, to use our God, that it corrupt not again. I speak not this, that I think you want any Persuasion to induce you to renounce yourself; but only to give you a new Prospect of Affairs; and that a Man that has been so useful to us, as you have been, may not want the Respect that is due to his Merit. Come, therefore you are call'd! Many considerable Persons do daily declare themselves; you cannot but see that: I believe in three or four Months, they will come over to us in such Numbers, that they will scorn Heretics. We are strong enough already to see France; but we are willing to distinguish between those that come over for Love, and those that come over through Fear: That you may consider of at your Leisure; and I hope, it will be of use to you. And so, wishing you Health and Welfare, I remain, in Reversion, since he had by his Minister Zuylichem just receded, in effect, from that reverſionary Clame, by acknowledging the Son of the King.

Your affectionate Friend,

But, in Times of infant and preſſing Danger, ſuch Niceties as theſe are not attended to; when Self-preservation becomes the only Point in view, all things are held lawful that are expedient.

Befides, the Majority of thoſe People, who, in the late Reign, had gone ſuch Lengths in ſecuring the Inheritance of the Throne to a popiſh Heir, were now become ſick of their own Choice, and dreaded above all things the Continuance of that Succeſſion which they had then ſo fondly choſen. While the King remain'd without a Son, tho' they murmur'd, they ſubmitted; what they ſuffer'd under him, they expected the Princeſs of Orange to remove; and tho' his Highneſs her Conſort was not over-ſatisfy'd with the Conduct of his Father-in-law, he had his Reaſons for not proceeding to Extremities with him: But when an Heir apparent was brought to light, it was deem'd unpolitic to temper any longer; and both the Prince of Orange and the People of England grew alike impatient to incorporate Intereſts, and make one great and infant Effort to accompliſh their ſeveral Purpoſes: So that the very Boon which his Majeſty had ſo ardently beſought of Heaven, as the greateſt Bleſſing it could beſtow, and which, according to the ordinary Courſe of Things, was the only thing wanting to render his Throne unmoveable, (ſuch are the unſearchable Decrees of Providence) only ſerv'd to accelerate his Calamities, and precipitate his Ruin.

As to humble the Pride and reduce the Power of France was the governing Paſſion of the Prince of Orange's Life, ſo repeated Experiments had convinced him, that, without England, no Confederacy that he could make would ſuſſer the End; as alſo, that, while England continued under the preſent Direction, it was next to impoſſible to make it a Party in the Quarrel, or to break the Union which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two Crowns. In order, therefore, to make this neceſſary Acquiſition, it was neceſſary to alter that Direction, which could no otherwiſe be done, than by removing the King: And this now appear'd to be no very difficult Talk; for, having loſt the Hearts of the People, he ſtood, like a tall Tree without a Root, liable to be laid prostrate by the firſt rough Gale that blew.

Thro' the Whole of the preceding Reign, it may be remember'd, that his Highneſs took care to eſtabliſh an Intereſt, both in the Court, and among the People, of England; and, after Monmouth's Death, it may be preſum'd, that he made it more his Care than ever. It is acknowledg'd by B. Burnet, (as already hinted) that, ſo early as the Year 86, he had not only been prevail'd to undertake the Buſi-neſs of England, by Lord Mordaunt, but had engaged to be ready to act when it ſhould be neceſſary; that the following Year, the Earl of Shrewsbury apply'd to him on the ſame Head; and that his Agents were all the while as buſy as poſſible in working up the Ferment to ſuch a Pitch, as ſhould both authorize and enable him to interpoſe, in the Manner moſt conducive to his own Advantage: As the People had Reaſon to complain, he took upon him to redreſs, and ſo acquir'd the glorious Name of Deliverer; while the Part he really play'd was that of a contumacious Politician. If this is not Paſſegric, it is Truth; and, as ſuch, it carries with it its own Apology. Princes are govern'd by their Intereſts and Paſſions, as well as private Men; and thoſe who have been moſt idoliz'd by the modern World, have, in their moſt ſplendid Actions, proceeded on Motives very different from that Love of Virtue and that Appetite for Glory, which animated the Heroes of Antiquity.

The ſame Prelate, after whoſe Light (glimmering and uncertain as it is) we are oblig'd to walk in this intricate Path, farther informs us, that early in the preſent Year, Mr. Ruffel, who was a Conſin-German to the late Lord of that Name, and who had been a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the King when Duke of York, came over to the Hague, with a Commiſſion from many of great Power and Intereſt in the Kingdom, to ſpeak very freely to the Prince, and to know poſitively of him what might be expected from him: What he ſaid, we are told, was to this Effect: That all People were now at Gaze: That thoſe of little or no Religion had no Inclination to embrace a bad one, if they could ſee any probable Way of avoiding it, without ſuffering in their Intereſts; but, if not, they would be govern'd by Intereſt (e) only: That all were at preſent united, but, if a Breach ſhould once be made by Men of Figure, the Abandoned and Diſſolute, eſpecially in a diſſolute and abandon'd Army, would threaten themſelves under that Example, in which caſe the King would have a Party, and would grow formidable; whereas the Soldiers, tho' bad Engliſhmen and worſe Chriſtians, were as yet ſuch good Proteſtants, that neither were they attach'd to his Majeſty, nor could his Majeſty depend on them. The Prince answer'd, at leaſt we are told ſo, That he muſt ſatisfy both his Honour and Conſcience, beſore he could enter into ſo great a Deſign, which, if it miſcarry'd, muſt bring Ruin both on England and Holland: That neither Ambition nor Reſentment could ever prevail with him ſo far, as to make him break with ſo near a Relation, or engage in a War, which might prove fatal to the Proteſtant Religion, and the general Intereſt of Europe: And that therefore, he expected formal and direct Invitations, from thoſe Perſons who called upon

Mr. Ruffel's Negotiations with the Prince of Orange.

(*) There is a Paſſage in the Letter from Father Estre to Father de Chaul ſubſtantially to this, viz. "That which does at ſuch Hours with the Lords and great Men is, the NUM. LXXXIV.

Apprehenſion of a Heretic Exceſſor: For (as a Lord, told me lately) Affore me of a Catholick Succeſſor, and I will of ſure you, I and my Family will be for it." for his Affluence: Ruffel objected the Danger of trusting such a Secret to great Numbers: And the Prince reply'd, That if a considerable Number of such Men as might be suppos'd to understand the Sense of the Nation should do it, he would acquiesce in it; and believ'd he might be ready to come over by the End of September. So that we find his Highness was of opinion, that the Voice of the People was the Voice of God; and that the same Returns which would serve to remove his Scruples in point of Prudence and Discretion, would operate as forcibly on his Honour and Conscience too.

Our Historian of his own Times fixes this Interview in the Month of May; but adds, "The main Confidence we had was in the Electoral Prince of Brandenburg; for the old Elector was then dying: And I told Ruffel at parting, that, unless he dy'd, there would be great Difficulties, not easily master'd, in the Design of the Prince's Expedition to England." Now the said Elector died on the last Day of April, O. S. whence it follows, that Ruffel had receiv'd his Audience, and taken his Leave, before that Event took place; and, consequently, that Measures were forming in England against the King, and embracing in Holland, before the second Declaration of Indulgence was publish'd, or the Order of Council, which was founded thereon; or the Prosecution of the Bishops was thought of; which his Lordship holds of such Weight for the Justification of those Measures.

To draw no farther Conclusions.—Who the Persons of great Power and Interest were, in whose Name Mr. Ruffel enter'd into this dangerous Negotiation, is not upon this Occasion specify'd; but, in speaking of Mr. Ruffel's Return, our Historian mentions, besides the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earls of Devonshire, Danby, and Nottingham, the Lord Lamby, and the Bishop of London; the first of those Earls, as a Person to whom Mr. Ruffel thought fit to communicate what had pass'd at the Hague; and the rest, as Persons now for the first time apply'd to, and giving their Concurrence to the Design: But surely this is either a strange Instance of Forgetfulness or Inaccuracy; for, in the Transactions of the preceding Year, as given by himself, we find every one of these Noblemen by name, concerting Matters with Mr. Dykvelt, the Dutch Embassador, at the Earl of Shrewsbury's, and actually drawing up the Declaration, on which they advis'd the Prince to engage. In the same Passage, he also sets the Marquis of Halifax at the Head of the List; whereas he now tells us, that Mr. Sydney try'd, whether he (the Marquis) would advise the Prince's coming over; and that, as the Matter was open'd at great Distance, he did not encourage a farther Freedom, as concerning the thing impracticable, or at least so precarious, that no Man in his Series would build upon it: We are led by him into the like Perplexity, with regard to the Earl of Nottingham; for as, in the first Account, we find him set down as a sure Man on the Prince's Side, in the last, we find him embracing it at one Meeting, and destroying it at the next, on a Scruple of Conscience. Possibly the last of these Accounts is most to be rely'd on; for John Rossby assures us, from Lord Hallifax's own Mouth, That he was not, at first, in the Secret of the Prince's Expedition: Nor is it reasonable to think, that Matters were so soon ripe for a Declaration: And, on the other hand, it is scarce supposable, that a Man of his intriguing Genius should be so industrious to pave his Highness's Way, without being in the Secret at all.

Our Historian, however, enlarges his Drama, as he draws near the Catastrophe; and, in particular, names three of the chief Officers of the Army, as the Persons to whom the Design was next propos'd; namely, Trelawney, Kirk, and Lord Churchill; Adding, that Trelawney engag'd his Brother, the Bishop of Bristol in it; and that Lord Churchill undertook for the Prince and Princess of Denmark; over the List of whom, his Lady had to abdicate an Ascendancy, that she had it in her Power to mould her into what Shape she pleas'd. He also takes care to inform us, that Admiral Herbert was not only of their Party, but that he actually went over to Holland; and that the Management of his Pride and overbearing Humour was in a great measure left to him; for so high a Value did he put on his own Merit and Importance, and so much was requir'd of the Prince in his Favour, that his Highness found it no easy Matter to put such a Constraint on his own Temper, as was necessary to accommodate it to his.

Concerning the Earl of Sunderland, he says, That a Suspicion prevail'd with some in England, that by the Means of Mr. Sydney, who was in the whole Secret, and who was not only his near Relation, but his intimate Friend, he would get into the Prince's Confidence; and that, when things were ripe, he would betray all: That this was signified to him from the Party by a Letter, with a Desire that he would put the Matter home to the Prince; and a Declaration, that till they were satisfy'd thereon, they would not go on: And that his Highness in answer did say, very positively, That he was in no sort of Correspondence with him. Our Historian adds, "His (Lord Sunderland's) Councils lay then another Way: And, if Time had been given him to follow the Scheme then laid down by him, Things might have turn'd fatally." His Lordship, it seems, had made his Application to the Queen, after her Delivery, as soon as Decency would give leave, and had represent'd to her, That the State of her Affairs was quite changed by her having a Son: That there was no longer any Necessity of driving on Matters so precipitately: That, under a gentle Management, Time would bring all about: That it would become her, in particular, to be the Author of moderate Councils, and thereby to quench the Flame that was already kindled: That, by this means, she would gain the Hearts of the Nation, to herself and Son; and might be declar'd Regent, in case his Majesty should die before the Prince came of Age: That these these Advices began to be hearken'd to: That, to give them the more Weight, he, all at once, declar'd himself a Papist; and thus, being thus in the same Interest with his, and most violently hated on that Account, he gain'd such an Ascendancy over her, that his Scheme was in a fair way of being put into Execution.

But, if his Lordship was not himself of the Party, we are assur'd by another Bishop, Kennet, that his Lady was: And this latter Prelate farther tells us, that Lord Mordaunt was said to be the Undertaker for the City; that the Earl of Macclesfield, who had retired into Germany, now came back to the Hague, to assist in the common Cause; that the Lord Wharton, old as he was, went abroad to countenance it; that the Marquis of Winchester was in the Secret, and sent his two Sons to the Hague, on the glorious Errand of Liberty; that the Lord Elmhurst, Son to the Marquis of Hullifax, was a voluntary Hostage to the Prince of Orange for his Father's Sincerity, as was also the Lord Dunblain for the Earl of Derby: He also mentions the two Hampdens, Father and Son; Mr. Herbert of Chertsey, &c. And Mr. Erskine throws in the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Dorset, the Lord DeLamere, the Lord Willoughby Son of the Earl of Lindsey, Sir Robert Peyton, Sir Rowland Gwyn, Mr. Powle, and several eminent Citizens of London (p).

Another fam'd Historian, and Dignitary of the Church, who, by his Countenance and Example, had contributed to bring things to this deperate Pass, and who liv'd to be assur'd of his Duëty, takes occasion to make it his Glory and his Baist, "That the main Body of those who made to brave a Stand, (by concurring with the Prince of Orange) were all of the Church of England; and that the Principles on which they stood were all Church-of-England-Principles." So that we are to conceive, that while the Crown and Mitre were in close Confederacy against the Dissenters, and every Severity was put in practice against them, that could possibly drive them to despair, it was the Principle of the Church of England to contend for the Omnipotence of the Prerogative, and to exact an absolute and unconditional Submission from the Subject: And that, when Popery had usurp'd the Chariot of Power, and they themselves felt the Wheels going over their own Necks, it was the Principle of the Church of England to contend for the Liberty of the Subject, and to make use of the Laws to overturn the Prerogative. Thus we find the same Inconsistency in Parties as in Governments; and Men endeavouring to cheat themselves, and one another, without Appearance of Principle, when nothing but present Convenience, or Self-Interest, is to be found at the Bottom.

That very Zuylijstein, who came over hither with Compliments and Congratulations to the King on the Birth of his Son, had, under that smooth and courtly Commission, another, which would not bear the Light, and which tended to undermine and subvert that very Throne, he pretended to felicitate: For, it appears, that he made it his chief Business during his Stay here to mix with the Malcontents, and to co-operate with Sydney, Ruffel, &c. in bringing Matters to a Crisis, and so closely and happily did he follow his Instructions, that, we are told, he carry'd to the Prince at his Return such positive Advices, and such an Assurance of the Invitation he had desir'd, that his Highness became fully fix'd in his Purpose. Our Historian farther tells us, that these Advices were, That the Prince could never hope for a more favourable Conjunction, nor for better Grounds to break on, than he had at that time: That the whole Nation was in a high Ferment: That the late Proceedings against the Bishops, and those which were still kept on foot against the Clergy, made all People think the Ruin of the Church was resolv'd on, and that on the first Occasion it would be executed: That the pretended Birth made them think Popery and Slavery would be establish'd: That if this Heat went off, People would lose Heart: That the Army continued as good Protestants, tho' as bad Englishmen, as ever: That they drank the most reproachful Healths that could be invented, and treated the Papists among them with Scorn and Averision: That the King was so sensible of this, and so afraid of the Consequence, that he had broken up the Camp, and dispers'd them into Quarters; and that it was believ'd he would bring them no more together, till they were modell'd more to his Mind: That the Seamen shew'd the same Inclinations: That Admiral Strickland, who had the Command of the Fleet, and who was a Papist avow'd, having dismiss'd the Chaplain of his Ship, on some frivolous Pretence, and introduced certain Priests to officiate in his stead, the Seamen so highly resent'd it, that the whole Fleet was in a (7) Uproar: That Strickland having recourse to Severities, they grew more and more enflam'd: That the King thought the Matter of such Consequence, that he came down himself to accommodate the Matter: That he spoke very softly to the Seamen, but without making any great Impression, for they hated Popery in

The Design chiefly carry'd on by the King of the Church of England.

(7) According to Bishop Kennet, in the second Edition of his Complete History, vol. 1. p. 318, Note (c), Mr. Edward expressly affirms, That several of the Bishops, seriously reflecting on the imminent Danger to which the Protestant Religion, as well as the whole Nation, was expos'd, wrote Invitations to his Highness the Prince of Orange to succour them: But either that Prelate has misrepresented Mr. Erskine, or Mr. Erskine differs from himself; for, in his History of England, p. 1109, this very Party runs at full length: Many Troops of Lords, and considerable Gentlemen, seriously reflecting, &c.

(8) That Fact is thus related by Sir John Royle:

"The King went down, to the Thames's Mouth, as pretended, only to take a View of the Fleet; but the real Cause was, to appease the Seamen, who were ready to mutiny, on account of some of their Captains, who had publicly celebrated Mass in their Ships. The King flatter'd them all he could, wear from Ship to Ship, called them his Children, said he had nothing to do with their Religion, and that he granted Liberty of Conscience to all; but that he expected they would behave like his Men of Honour and Courage, when there should be occasion for their Service; tho' they were to far gratify'd, that all the Priests were order'd on shore." in general, and Strickland in particular: That when a Trial was made of their Affections with regard to the Dutch, they call'd them their Friends and Brethren, but said, they would willingly go against the French: And, lastly, that the King, from a due Sense of all this, was resolv'd to take other more moderate Measures.

After having proceeded thus far with this grand Confederacy of the Nobles, Gentry, and People, and the Consent they had form'd with the Prince of Orange, it is but natural to ask, On what Terms the said Consent was form'd, and what were the great Points in view? But here our great Oracle of his own Times has chosen to be silent; and whether so remarkable an Omission was the Effect of too much Art, or too little Intelligence, must be left to Posterity to determine. He talks indeed of Invitations, but he never stays to explain what they were; and, to supply this Defect, we are under a Necessity to have recourse to the State-tracts of those Times: Among which we find two Pieces of that Nature; one, call'd, A Memorial of the Protestants of the Church of England to their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange; and the other, A Memorial of the English Protestants to their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange, concerning their Grievances, and the Birth of the present King of France and Wales: The First is extremely short, the Last extremely long: One, according to its Title, enters into a large Description of the said Birth, the Other makes mention of it at all: This is said to have been presented to their Highnesses, That is, address'd only to Mr. Bentick, to be by him communicated to them: Both are without Name, or Date; and both begin in pretty much the same Manner: Whence it seems not unreasonable to conclude, that the same Persons were privy to Both; and that, for Expedition's sake, the short one was dispatch'd to the Hague, to serve as an Earnest of their good Intentions, till the other was completed. Even in the Sketch, there was a List of Grievances, and another of Clauses, which last was sum'd up in these Words: "They most humbly implore the Protection of your Royal Highnesses, as to the suspending of, and Increasement made upon, the Laws made for Maintenance of the Protestant Religion, and our civil and fundamental Privileges; and that your Royal Highnesses would be pleas'd to insist, that the free Parliament of England, according to Law, may be restor'd, the Laws against Papists, Priests, papal Jurisdiction, &c. may be put in execution; the suspending and dispensing Power declar'd null and void; the Rights and Privileges of the City of London, the free Choice of their Magistrams, and the Liberties as well of that as of other Corporations restor'd; and all things return'd to their ancient Channel." We are told by Bishop Kennet, that this Sketch was accompany'd with a List of such eminent Divines as were call'd for the coming of his Highness to redeem them from the Danger they were in: And he adds, That among them were the Names of several, who were then sensible of that Danger, and yet afterwards loath'd their Deliverance.

The other Memorial is of itself a Volume, is partly historical and partly argumentative, and is calculated to prove, that the People of England had a Right to call upon their Highnesses for Assistance; and that their Highnesses had an equal Right to grant it: It begins, like the other, with a Recapitulation of Grievances: It relates the perfidious Behaviour of the said Charles King to his Protestant Subjects, by the Repeal of all the Edicts in their Favour, and the Persecution that follow'd it: And it charges a Part of that infamous Proceeding on his Majesty, by urging, that his Brother of France durst not throw off his Dignité, till he had publicly expos'd the Cause of Popery, and thereby

[Vol. III. p. 517.]

(*) The Influence are too many to be recoll'd, but some are these, viz. 1. Each of the Freeholders are oblig'd to declare for a Repeal of all the Laws made for Reformation of our Religion, and its Settlement. 2. All the Subjects are forced to solemnly swear and obey those that are no lawful Judges, Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Lord-Lieutenants, and other Commanders; and all are threatened, vexed, and persecuted (as the Lord Lockhart now is) that bring any such have no lawful Authority. 3. All the Subjects are commanded to suffer all the Additions and Changes of their Lives, and the Severing of their Heirs to be inserted into, and their chief Inheritance, and many of their Freeholds, to be judged by the Discretion of a few of the King's Creatures, call'd his Counsellors for Ecclesiastical Affairs, whose Commission is, to proceed without and against the Rules of our Laws, with a sole obedience to all other Laws; and every Man is required to yield their arbitrary Powers, on behalf of their Country, which extend to Imprisonment for Life. 4. All our Ministers are required, under grievous, unseasonable Penalties, to be the King's Oriers, to pronounce in the Churches, the King's Power to suspend at once the Force and Use of all our Penal Laws made in four hundred Years past; to secure the Rights of the Crown, the Freedom and Property of the Gentry, and the Privileges of the Protestant Religion. 5. All the Protestants are forced, by Fear of the King's Wrath, to suffer the Rights of the Crown, and the Freedom of the Nation, against foreign Powers and Laws, to be publicly denied, and the Force of foreign Laws over them to be maintained; they are oblig'd by the King to resign their sacred Duties to God, to the Crown and Kingdom, of protecting at Law those Persons which they are duty bound, for which no Exemptions can be made, by Preference of Liberty of Conscience in Christ's Religion. 6. The Justices, and other Officers, being justly the King's, are oblig'd to quarter French and Irish on the necessary Soldiers, in their Neighbour Houses, against their Wills, in contempt of the ancient Laws, and the express Words of the late Statutes. 7. All the Gentlemen and Freeholders are press'd to renounce their native and legal Freedom in their Choice of Members for Parliament. 8. The Possession of the Cities and Towns are seized to yield up to the King's Will, the Tenure of their Magistrams, and all their free Customs and Privileges. 9. All the People are forced, by Fear of Punishment, to suffer a Child to be declared Heretick against the Crown, which ought not, by the known Laws of the Kingdom, to have been acknowledged, until lawful Writings of his Birth of the Queen had been duly published to the Kingdom, it was necessary in this case, whereas public Faith matters had a Commission. Yet, to their Shame and Confusion, the People are forced to term in their public Papers to protest him to God as their Prince, and then not to allow the Writings of his Birth. 10. Many of their Justices are press'd to find their Neighbours Criminals, tho' in their Consciences they think them innocent, as is notorious among many other Instances in the Case of those that made innocent Reprehensions of their Joy by the Justice that was done the French Bishops: And many are forced to submit to be tried by Masters above the Lord of their Estates by Force, and their Lives also, by Juries returned by secret Contrivances and Nominations, contrary to the Direction of our Laws, being neither of the said Justices nor most indifferent of the several Neighbours: to the Faith in question, nor by Sheriffs sworn as the Law requires; whereby the Courts of the Kingdom's Justice is perverted, and the legal Government subverted.

thereby reduced himself to a Necessity of relying on his Friendship; agreeable to the Speech made to that Prince by the Bishop of Coblenz, as the Mouth of the French Clergy; which was afterwards made public, with the Allowance of the French Court, and in which, after extolling the Merit, and enlarging on the Glory, of suppressing Heresy in France, he proceeds to say, "The King of England, by the Need he will have of Succour, and of the Support of your Majesty's Arms, to maintain him in the Catholic Faith, will quickly present you with an Opportunity to bestow a Protection worthy yourself." And farther declares, That the same popish Councils, which then prevail'd in England, were also at work to ruin the Religion and Liberty of the United Provinces: Whence it was reasonable to conclude, that the common Design of both Kings was, to extirpate the Protestant Interest every where. But the Topic which takes up most Room in this Memorial is, the Birth of the Prince; and, to shew that the whole Affair was a mere Imposition, no less than twenty Folio Pages are employ'd: The Refusal of their Highnesses to join with his Majesty in the Repeal of the Tests is made the Ground-work of it; and the Menaces contain'd in Stewart's last Letters are said to be preparatory to it; Stewart's Correspondence had been open'd in July; and, thro' the whole Course of it, he had press'd for a speedy Answer: But none coming, August 5, he gave his Highness to understand, "That if he did what was desir'd by the King, it would be the best Service to the Protestants, the highest Obligation on his Majesty, and the greatest Advancement of his own Interest; but, if not, all would be contrary." This, also proving ineffectual, is farther said, that a Friend of the Memorialists at Whitehall had, about the latter End of August, given them to understand, that all Talk of an Accommodation with their Highnesses was at an End; and that a Whisper had escap'd in August, "That they were obstinate in their Errors; that they were making their Court to the Church of England; and that they should repent it:" That what follow'd was, the Queen's Journey to Bath, the King's Pilgrimage to St. Dunstons, and a thousand legendary Tales of a Conception almost miraculous, &c. which serv'd only to excite Laughter and Ridicule in the Gay and Frolic, and, among the more Serious, immediate Apprehensions that a supposititious Son was to be produced, in order to render their Highnesses less significant for the future; agreeable to the Practices of the Priests on the like Occasions: That, in this Interval, Stewart, in another Letter, dated October 8, declares he should use no more Arguments with their Highnesses; laments the Loss of the Time of Compliance; and, in particular, breaks out into this Expression, Alas! that Providence should not be understood: Again, in November, he says, "All Hopes of your Highnesses Concurrence in the King's Design is quite given over; and Men are become as cold in it here, as your Highnesses were positive there:" And yet, again, upon a new Conference with the King, he not only signifies his Majesty's Dislike of Fitzgel's Letter, but expressly adds, "That their Highnesses Answer had been too long delay'd, and the King had quite given over that Matter." Considering all these Circumstances, our Memorialists proceed to say, that they became confirm'd in their Suspicions; that the Collections and Observations they had since made abundantly justify'd them all; that they concluded and believ'd this pretended Prince of Wales to be a mere Counterfeit; and that they thought it their Duty to their Highnesses, to their Country, and to the whole Protestant Interest, (this Child being set up against all these) to set forth those Collections and Observations; the most material and most decent of which are as follow, viz. 1. The bodily Infirmities of the King and Queen, and the Sentence pronounced on their former Children by Dr. Willis, Mala stamina vita. 2. The almost universal Persuasion which prevail'd, both abroad and at home, that no Fruit was to be expected from such a Stock. 3. That it was hard to believe the Queen had conceiv'd at Bath, because she had not the usual Signs of Conception to warrant that Belief; and because the meanest Physician about her would have inform'd her, that Bathing would, in all Likelihood, destroy the Embryo. 4. That, in case she had her Reckoning from the Time of her following the King to Windsor, the Birth must be held premature; which was never intended, nor could have been credited; since the Child had none of the Passions usual in that Circumstance; but, on the contrary, was equally strong and lively. 5. That, during the Progress of her Majesty's Pregnancy, those skilful Matrons, who were planted, from time to time, to observe the several outward Indications of a big Belly, could not be satisfy'd, that there was such a Swelling in her Hips and Breasts, or such an Alteration in her Gait, as are incident to other pregnant Women; and that, for several Months together, she withdrew from her Chamber into her Cabinet, to dress and undress, with two or three of her own Italians; nor would ever suffer any of the Protestant Ladies to follow her, as they had before done without Difficulty. 6. That there had been no Notice given to the Princess of Orange of the Time of the Queen's expected Travel, tho' she was so deeply interested in the Event. 7. That Care was taken that Advice should be given to the Princess of Denmark, when she wanted atringent Medicines, to go to the loosening Waters of Bath, that she might be out of the Way when that Time should come. 8. That the Place where her Majesty purpos'd to lie in was kept in such Uncertainty, and often publish'd variously, (Richmond, Windsor, and Hampton-Court, having at several times been severally nam'd) that none of the Kindred and Friends of the Heir-presumptive, nor of the Protestant Nobility, could know how to prepare themselves for Attendance, according to their Duty. 9. That neither, when St. James's was at last nam'd, and the Queen so passionately declar'd she would lie there the

that Night, tho' she lay on the Floor, nor when that Night came, and her Majesty rose from Cards to make her Words good, did the least Sign appear of an approaching Labour. 10. That the Room which had been chosen was fit for the introducing a supposititious Child, that in common Prudence it ought not to have been made use of, had not that Finesse been its Recommendation; there being a private Door within the Rail of the Bed, which had Communication with another Apartment, and which, had there been no bad Purpose to serve, ought to have been nail'd or seal'd up, to prevent the very Imagination of an Imposture. 11. That the Time of the Delivery was the Time of Divine Service, when all or most of the Protestant Ladies were likely to be at Church. 12. That no Physicians were in Waiting, as was both usual and necessary on the like Occasions. 13. That the only Persons admitted within the Rail were, the Midwife (Mrs. Wills), Mrs. Labadie, and Mrs. Towry (or Turin); all suspected Persons, because the two last were Foreigners, and all were deep in the Queen's Confidence. 14. That there appear'd nothing in her Majesty like the usual, natural Travel of a Woman in her Extremity; nor of those Symptoms preceding a Birth, which cannot be hid. 15. That the whole Progress of the Labour was carry'd in the dark, the Curtains being close drawn about the Bed. 16. That when the Bath was declar'd, it was not confirm'd by the Infant's Cries, which is one of the most constant and most natural Evidences that a living Child is born. 17. That, when the Midwife had deliver'd something close cover'd up to Mrs. Labadie, she left the Queen to follow the said Mrs. Labadie into the next Room; which could not have been done, without the utmost Danger to her Majesty, if the Birth had been real. And, lastly, That the usual Applications had not been made to repel the Milk; that the usual Consequences of Delivery did not appear; and that her Majesty was not left in so weak and languishing a Condition, as was natural to a Woman of her known Delicacy.

After a long and tedious Discussion of these Particulars, (which our Memorialists imagine to be sufficiently forcible and convincing to disinterested Persons) mix'd with a great Variety of Digressions, serving rather to cloud than clear the subject-matter before them, they, artfully enough, advise their Highnesses not to ground any Enquiry upon them, nor to take upon themselves the Burthen of proving a Negative, but to demand, in the Name of the Princess, and in behalf of the People, that a sufficient Number of lawful Witnesses of both Sexes should solemnly testify, that the Child, then call'd the Prince of Wales, was naturally born of the Queen's Body; and, in case this was refus'd, that they should then demand a Retraction of the false News which the King's Ministers had publish'd in all the Courts of Europe, of the Birth of a Prince of Wales. They also say, "We crave Pardon, that we must freely tell your Highnesses, that it hath been our Astonishment, that your Highnesses have been so long silent, and have deferred to make your just Demand; and that you have so long suffer'd her Royal Highness's Chaplains to pray publicly for this supposititious Prince of Wales." — And again, — "We believe your Highnesses to be true Christians, that tremble in the Worship and Prayers before the eternal Majesty; and therefore hope, such a Shew of owning him will not be longer (1) suffer'd to be acted before the great God, that searcheth all the Hearts of Princes and Subjects."

Proceeding with their Remonstrances, they farther say, That their Highnesses may be absolutely certain, that the King acts, not by virtue of the English regal Office or Prerogatives, in his authorising Treasons to be daily committed against the Realm: That no King of England ever had a Right to grant Offices to Persons disabled by positive Acts of Parliament, nor to dispose at Pleasure any of their Subjects of their Properties: That such Actings were not the Actings of a legal English Monarch, but despotical Usurpations: That nothing remain'd to complete his Majesty's Renunciation of the Truths and Obligation of the English Regal Office, but his depriving the rest of the People, as he had already done most of the Boroughs and Cities, of their Liberty to chuse their own Representatives: After which, the ancient English Government would be wholly dissolv'd, and Englishmen would no longer have any Property in their Estates, their Families, or their Lives: That it was with bleeding Hearts they besought their Royal Highnesses Aid to defend them against such extreme Oppression: That as they were the next right Expectants of the English Crown, there could be no Question of their Right to interpose: That when he, who was, at first, a legal, supreme Magistrate, and who ought to have been obey'd, if he had so continued, call off the Quality and Use of that Character, and so abus'd his Power as to destroy the very End for which it was repos'd in him, in such Case he divested himself of the Office and Trust of a lawful Magistracy, to which alone the Laws of God and Man require Obedience: And that, upon the whole, in virtue of their own Right, and these Applications to them from the People, they humbly coug'd them to demand and insist inseparably, 1. That the ancient, free Government of England, by its own Customs and Laws only, made or approv'd in Parliament, be immediately restor'd in all the Parts of it, through the Kingdom; that is, that the Right of the Crown, and Freedom of the Realm, be forthwith vindicated from all the Submissions publicly

(1) Speaking of this Matter, Bishop Burnet says, "It was also taken in England, that the Princess should have begun to pray for the pretended Prince: Upon which, the naming him discontinued. But this was to highly reiterated by the Court of England, that the Princess, fearing it might necessary a Repulse, order'd him to be again nam'd in the Prayers." [Vol. 4. p. 754.]

publicly made to the Pope by the King that now is, to the Dishonour and Abatement of the English Crown and Realm, and from all the Clames made by the Romish Church, of any Powers and Jurisdictions whatsoever over Christians, or the Church of England. 2. That all Laws now in force against the Admission of the Canons and Jurisdiction of Rome, contrary to our Customs and Laws, and against the Maintainers of them, be forthwith declar'd to be put in due Execution, and all Suspensions of them, or Dispensations with them, without the Authority of Parliament, be declared null and void. 3. That the ancient Customs, Liberties, and Privileges of the City of London, and the whole Form and Course of its Government be forthwith restor'd, the Customs thereof being part of the Common Law of England, and its Liberties being established by the Great Charter, and many Acts of Parliament: That the Customs, free Election of their Magistrates, and all the Privileges of all the Cities and Boroughs of England confirmed by the Great Charter, and other Laws, be duly restored. 4. That legal Officers both civil and military be settled in all the Places of Magistracy, and all the Commands throughout the Kingdom. 5. That all Commissions whatsoever be forthwith revoked and declared null and void, whereby are granted any Powers of Discretion over the Persons, or Interest of the Subject, contrary to the Laws and Customs of England; especially the Commission for ecclesiastical Affairs, with its monstrous non obstante to all our Laws. 6. That the Freedom of Elections, which is the Foundation of the Government, be duly vindicated, and all the most unworthy Prerogatives to elect and vote as the King would have them revoked and renounced. 7. That the Kingdom may be restored as soon as possible to a Capacity of holding a legal Parliament, in such Form and Manner as the Laws require; by whose Help the Civil Government may be re-established, and Force and arbitrary Powers therein utterly abolished. And lastly, "We have your Highnesses Pardon, say our Memorialists, that we further humbly offer to your Highnesses, that Time and Accidents always make Changes in the Usefulness of Laws; and that it hath so happened in our Penal Laws made for Uniformity in the Profession of Faith, and in the outward Worship of God. Four of our succeeding Parliaments perceiv'd the Abuse of these Laws, and the Mischief arising thereby to conscientious Christians, and declared their Intention of relieving them if the King would have permitted them; and they endeavoured to stop the Execution of them, and desired a Settlement of Liberty of Conscience as due to Christians.

In these Regards, and the Subversion of the whole Government since made, Necessity and Charity may have the Force of Laws to enforce the Stay of the Execution of some of these Laws for Conformity, until those Matters may be settled in Parliament.

We therefore humbly pray your Highnesses to procure, as a Case of Necessity, that none be disturbed until a legal Parliament shall have resolv'd the Case, for the Profession of their Faith in Matters merely supernatural, or the outward Expression of their Worship, so, as Both terminate only in God, and neither wrong nor hurt any Man on Earth in Soul, Goods, and good Name, but their own Souls only, if they be mistaken therein.

We now most humbly submit ourselves, and all herein contain'd; to your Highnesses Wisdom, Candor and Charity, and shall pray, &c."

It is as uncertain at what particular time this Memorial was presented, as by what particular Persons it was compos'd: There was no Date prefix'd to it, as already observ'd: It was address'd to Mr. Bentinck: It was sent by Express: And those who sent it, conclude their Billet to that Minister, with a Hint, that he might hereafter know who they were. But by whomsoever it was drawn up, or whensoever it was presented, it is pretty plain, that neither they, nor the Authors of the former, at that time, intended to make any farther Use of their Highnesses, than to redeem the Constitution out of Popish Hands, and to secure it from the like Danger, by securing the Succession to the Protestant Line: And it may be not unreasonably presum'd, that they believ'd they had made it sufficiently their Highnesses Interest to concur with them, by sending them such Helps to remove their little Supplanter out of their way. What more extended Views the Grandees of the Party had, is another Question. Those who lead, have always their Reserves, which they very carefully conceal from those who follow: And it is not to be conceiv'd, that the Sydney and the Ruffin communicated all they knew to the Burnets and the Wildmans. What the Prince of Orange meant by his Expressions to Mr. Ruffin, in part before cited, that if he was invited to come and rescue the Nation and their Religion, he believ'd he could be ready by the End of September, has been already hinted at, and will be more clearly and undeniably explain'd by subsequent Events: For, to suppose with some, or to represent with others, that he had nothing more at Heart than the Interest of the Reformed Religion, and a Concern for the Liberties of England, or than to be honour'd by Posterity as a Saviour and Deliverer, is scarce warrantable, either by the known Ingredients of his Character, or the Circumstances of the Times.

From the very Opening of this Year, when the Pregnancy of the Queen was made public in all the Courts of Europe, such Dispositions began to be made at the Hague, as seem'd to indicate some extraordinary Purpose in View: Measures were taken to bring the Difference which had arose between the Dutch East India Company, and that of Brandenburg to an amicable Decision: And those between North and South Holland, in relation to the Imposts laid on several Merchandizes carry'd out of one Province to the other, were actually accommodated by the Mediation of the Prince of Orange, on which

Occasion the States acknowledged his Services in a solemn Letter of Thanks. Much about the same time a considerable Augmentation was made in the Number of Seamen; Orders were given for preparing two strong Squadrons of Men of War, under the Presence of protecting the Commerce, and chastising the Agerines: A general Survey was taken of the Frontier-Towns, the Fortifications of which, particularly of Maastricht and Bergben op Zeem, were repaired and improv'd; and a Fund was provided to answer the Expence. In April, when the Contest between the King and the States, in relation to the English and Scots Troops in their Service was at the height, the Elector of Saxony came to the Hague, and was caressed in so extraordinary a manner, both by the Prince and the States, as very sufficiently shew'd there was something more at the bottom of that Visit, than mere Matter of Curiosity on one Side, and Ceremony on the other. Upon the Elector of Brandenburg's Death, his Highness immediately sent his Favourite, Bismark, to compliment the new Elector (Who, we are told, was full of Zeal for the Reformed Religion, and had placed an entire Confidence in his Cousin of Orange) as being before him the State of Affairs, and to state the Design upon England to which he solicit his Assistance in putting it in Execution, &c. And we are further told, that his Answer was frank and full; that he desired all that was ask'd, and more; and that while the Negotiation was under a secret Management, the Elector of Cologne's Death came in very luckily to give a good Colour to Intrigues and Preparations. He was a Prince of the House of Bavaria, and of very considerable Power and Wealth; for his annual Revenue amounted to four Millions of Guilders; and the Troops upon his Establishment to twenty thousand Men: His Territories consisted of the Archbishopsric of Cologne, and the several Bishopsrics of Liege, Munster, and Hildesheim, which, in a manner, surrounded the Netherlands. Munster lay between them and the northern Parts of Germany, from whence their best Recruits came. Cologne commanded twenty Leagues of the Rhine, by which both an Entrance was open'd into Holland, and the Spanish Provinces were entirely cut off from all Succours out of the Empire; and, through Liege, nothing was easier than to penetrate into Brabant. Of all the Terrors that could arise from this Situation, the French had hitherto had the Advantage, by the Assistance of their old Instrument, the Cardinal-Prince of Furstenberg; who, having an absolute Ascendancy over the old Elector, had retain'd him always in their Interests: When, therefore, this Vacancy happen'd, the Pope, the Emperor, Spain, Holland, and all the Princes of the Empire, who were not in the Pay of France, made it a Point of the utmost Moment to have it fill'd by a Partizan of their own: But this appear'd a Matter of great Difficulty: The Election lay in the Dean and Chapter: The Cardinal-Prince was himself the Dean, and during his Administration

he made use of all Opportunities to model the Chapter to his own Mind: The Canons are nam'd by the Bishop, and the Dean and Chapter, by turns: The Vacancies which fell to the Bishop's Lot he had Leave to fill up as he pleas'd; and his own Influence, as Dean, went a great Way in the Choice of the rest: Thus, before the Elector dy'd, he saw himself surrounded with his own Creatures; and, what was more, found means to make trial of their Intentions in his Favour, as follows: He had the Address to inspire the Palatine-Family with Hopes, that the Election might be carry'd in favour of a Prince of that House; and to persuade them that the best Way to secure it, would be, to obtain the Emperor's Consent to the Election of a Coadjutor in Cologne. They apply'd to the Emperor accordingly, and obtain'd what they ask'd: But when the Matter came to an Issue, it appear'd, that the Cardinal had only made them his Tools; for, of twenty-five Voices, he had nineteen, and they only six.

This sufficiently shew'd the Cardinal's Strength, and the Necessity of putting in practice any State-trick that could be devis'd to get the better of it. Accordingly, Ways and Means were first found to gratify the Interest of Bavaria on that of Palatine. The Elector of Besavia had serv'd in Hungary against the Turks, with Success and Reputation; but finding the Duke of Lorraine more considered at the Imperial Court, grew discontented, and began to hearken to the Temptations of France. Alarm'd at this, the Emperor endeavour'd to mollify him, by the Offer of a separate Command of twenty thousand Men; but without Success: For, about the same time, his great Rival being seiz'd with a Fever, he thought the Opportunity favourable to put in for the Command in chief; and made his Instances accordingly: His Imperial Majesty now demurred in his turn; and, in daily Expectation of the Duke's Recovery, deputed that Command to General Caprera: This exasperated the Elector more than ever: The Duke of Lorraine several times relaps'd, and, while the Dispute was yet in Suspence, the Archbishop of Cologne died: In order, therefore, to fix him once more in the Emperor's Interest, and to strengthen the Opposition to the Cardinal, his Electoral Highness was both gratify'd in Hungary, and had also the Palatine Voices in the Chapter made over to him, in favour of Prince Clement his Brother.

As the Prince of Orange and the States had a large Share in this Intrigue, and they were not unwilling to have it thought, that the military Preparations they were now making had a Relation to the Affairs of Germany, the Count d'Assoux, in six Days after the Death of the old Elector, presented a Memorial to the States, signifying, "That he had Orders to let them know, that whereas the King his Master desir'd nothing more than to preserve the Peace of Christendom, his Majesty was willing to prevent whatever might trouble it: That, seeing nothing was more likely to trouble that Peace, than such an Interposition of the Princes in the Neighbourhood of the Electorate of Cologne, as should encroach on the Liberties of the Chapter, and thereby hinder them from proceeding canonically in the Election of a new Archbishop, his Majesty, in such Case, could not refuse the said Chapter the Assistance they might stand in need of, for the Preservation of their Rights, and for the Security of the Places and Country depending on this Electorate: That, if any of those neighbouring Princes should go about to cause any Troops to march towards the said Electorate, under any Pretence whatsoever, and to force the said Chapter in any manner whatsoever, or to use any Force or Violence against the Places or Country of the said Archbishopric, his Majesty would send thither, at the same time, all the Successors which should be necessary to maintain those who had the Administration thereof, in all the Rights which belong'd to them: And that, on the contrary, in case the said neighbouring Princes and States did leave the Chapter at full Liberty to chuse a fit and worthy Person, and there should be no moving of Troops, either in the Empire, or in the Territories of the States, or in the Spanish Netherlands, to intimidate the said Chapter, those of his Majesty would also have Orders to abstain from any Action whatsoever, which might have a Tendency to trouble the public Peace, or give the least Apprehensions to such as were best dispos'd to maintain it.

[Baronet.]

But whatever Effect this intimidating Memorial might have with respect to the March of Troops, it had none on the Resolution which had been taken, at all Events, to set aside the Cardinal: On the contrary, he found the Courts of Rome and Vienna to closely and strongly consider'd against him, and so many ways able to embarrass all his Measures, that, notwithstanding his Pre-eminence in the Chapter, and the Protection of Prussia, he soon found Cause to be in pain for the Event. He was already in possession of the Bishopric of Strasbourg, which the French had forced him to accept of, in case of the Pension which they had engag'd to pay him; and, by the Rules of the Empire, he that was already a Bishop could not be chosen to a second, but by a Postulation; in which Case it was also necessary to have the Concurrence of two Thirds of the Chapter. In order, therefore, to get rid of that ugly Condition annexed to the Postulation, he chose to resign Strasbourg. But here arose another Difficulty: The Resignation could not be made without the Consent of the Pope; and thro' the King of France sent a Gentleman to his Holiness, with a Letter written in his own Hand, desiring him to accept of that Resignation, and promising him upon it all reasonable Satisfaction, he did not admit the Bearer, nor receive the Letter, saying, While the French Embassador is here like an Enemy, who had invaded his Court, he would receive nothing from

But so intricable as his Holiness was on one side, he was ductile on the other. Prince

Clement was then but seventeen, and was not of the Chapter of Cologne, consequently not eligible, according to their Rules, till he obtain'd a Dispensation from the Pope; which was granted as soon as ask'd; and with it the Emperor sent one to manage the Election in his Name, with express Instructions to offer the Chapter the whole Revenue and Government of the Temporalties for five Years, in case they would chuse Prince Clement, who wanted all that time to be of age: If he could make nine Voices sure for him, he was to stick him to his Interest; but, if he could not gain so many, he was to consent to any Person that should be set up in opposition to the Cardinal. He was order'd to charge him severely before the Chapter, as one that had been for many Years an Enemy and Traitor to the Empire. This was done with all possible Aggravations, and in very injurious Words.

The Chapter now saw, that this Election was like to be attended with a War in their Country, and other distasteful Consequences: For the Cardinal had been chosen Vicar, or Guardian, of the Temporalties; in virtue of which Trust, he had put Garrisons in all their fortified Places, which were paid with French Money: And they knew he would put them all in the King of France's Hands, if he was not elected: They had besides promis'd not to vote in favour of the Bohemian Prince, and therefore, by way of Compromise, offer'd to the Emperor's Agent, to consent to any third Person. But having made fire of the Number of Votes to Prince Clement, requir'd by his Instructions, he could not accept it. So the Election went on, and on the Day of Decision it was found, that the Cardinal had thirteen Voices, Prince Clement nine, and the Prince of Neuburg, and Count Reichen, one apiece. Thus it appear'd, that the Cardinal's Postulation was defective, since he had not two Thirds of the Chapters. And, upon the Whole, Prince Clement's Election having been ratify'd by the Emperor, as to the Temporalties, it was by him committed to his Holiness, who refer'd it to a Congregation of Cardinals, by whom it was finally pronounced valid.

Prince Clement's Birth was declar'd July 1684.

To complete the Mortifications of the Cardinal and his Party, the Deans of Munster, Wilsheheim, and Lige, were, by the like Management, severally promoted to those vacant Sees: And at the last of those Places, we are told, nothing but the Cardinal's Purple sav'd him from the Violence of the Populace; he being equally hated by them for his Attachment to France, and for the Effects of his own violent and cruel Administration.

This whole Affair had such an immediate Relation to the Peace and Safety of Holland, that, says By Burnet, if they had miscarried in it, the Expedition design'd for England would not have been so late, nor could it have been propos'd easily in the States. By this it appear'd, what an Influence the Papacy, low as it is, may still have in Matters of the greatest Consequence. The foolish Pride of the French Court, which had affronted the Pope, in a Point in which, since they allow'd

The HISTORY of ENGLAND.

...the Prince of Rome, he certainly could not have such Rules as he thought fit, did not defeat a Design that they had been long driving at, and which could not have miscarried by any other Means, than those that they had found out. Such great Events may and do often rise from inconceivable Beginnings. These things furnished the Prince (of Orange) with a good Blind for covering all his Preparations; since here a War in the Neighbourhood was unavoidable, and it was necessary for the States to strengthen both their Alliances and their Troops: For it was visible to all the World, that if the French could have fixed themselves in the Territory of Cologne, the way was opened to enter Holland, or to seize on Flanders, when the King pleased; and he would have the four Electors on the Rhine at Mercy. It was necessary to dislodge them, and this could not be done without a War with France. The Prince got the States to settle a Fund for nine thousand Seamen to be constantly in their Service. And Orders were given to put the naval Preparations in such a Case, that they might be ready to put to Sea upon Orders. Thus things went on in July and August, with so much Secrecy, and so little Suspicion, that neither the Court of England nor the Court of France seemed to be alarmed at them.

But his Lordship is not over-accurate in the latter Part of this Account, nor indeed consistent with himself: For tho' it should be shew'd, that the Affair of Cologne had a Tendency to lull the Court of England into Security, we shall find it had a quite contrary Effect on that of France. Besides, the same Prelate acknowledges, "That Alberville came over fully persuaded that the Dutch design'd the Expedition against England." Now the very Yacht which carry'd back Mr. Zuylichem, in the Beginning of August, brought home Alberville; and if he was so fully persuaded of the real Designs of the Dutch, it must be admitted that the King had, thus early, Intelligence of his Danger. We cannot help remembering, moreover, that his Majesty not only entertain'd, but express'd, his Suspicions of the States long before, and having to lately broke with the Prince of Orange so tender a Point, it was but natural for him to keep his Eye perpetually fix'd on the Progress of his Highness's Repentment. Indeed, the whole Current of his Measures shews that he did so; for when the Dutch fitted out a Fleet, he did the same: And Lord Sunderland intimates, that the French made an Offer in the Summer of strengthening his Hands with a Squadron of theirs, which was refus'd.

The Bishop yet farther assures us, that France took the Alarm first, and gave it to England; and possibly Mr. Bonrepa's sudden and unexpected Arrival in England might help to establish that Notion: But he did not arrive here till the 11 of August, and so may be rather suppos'd to confirm than bring the News. Besides, whoever duly considers the Relations of things, will see Cause to conclude, that he came as a Minister to improve a Crisis, rather than as an Express with Packets of News, which Mr. Stetten, the King's Minister at Paris might have forwarded as well. August 10, the Canons of Liege had given the killing Blow to the Pretensions of the Cardinal of Furstenburg, by electing their Dean Bishop. As soon as ever the News reached Paris, the new Christian King made a new Promotion of General Officers, order'd his Forces to be augmented with 10,000 Foot and 6000 Horse, and form'd the necessary Dispositions for assembling a considerable Army in Flanders, and another in the Empire, and dispatch'd Mr. Bonrepa to England, to offer his Britannic Majesty that Protection, which the Bishop of Casiers had so clearly foreseen he would stand in need of; or in other Words, to negotiate a formal Alliance, offensive and defensive, on the old Plan, it may be fairly suppos'd, of destroying the Dutch, and rooting out the Northern Heresy. Our Bishop certifies, that Mr. Bonrepa had Orders, by way of Inducement, to offer his Majesty the Assistance of twelve or fifteen thousand Men (others say thirty thousand) or as many more as he should desire, and to propose that they should land at Parisbanc; as also, that the said Place should be put into his Hands, to keep the Communication open between the two Kingdoms. His Lordship adds, "All the Priests were for this, so were most of the Popish Lords. The Earl of Sunderland was the only Man in Credit that oppos'd it; he said, The Offer of an Army of forty thousand Men might be a real Service, but then it would depend on the Orders that came from France: They might, perhaps, master England, but they would become the King's Master at the same time; so that he must govern under such Orders as they should give, and thus he would quickly become only a Vice-roy to the King of France. Any Army less than that would lose the King the Affections of his People, and drive his own Army to Desertion, it not to Mutiny." The King did not think Matters were yet so near a Crisis, so he did neither entertain the Proposition, nor let it fall quite to the Ground. There was a Treaty set on foot, and the King was to have an hundred Merchant-Ships ready for Transportation of such Forces as he should desire, which, it was promis'd, should be ready when call'd for. Lord Sunderland, himself, slip declares in his Apology, "That, after the Noise of the Prince's Design, more Ships were offer'd, and it was agreed how they should be command'd, &c. ever after." I, continues he, oppos'd to Death the accepting of them, as well as any Assistance of Men; and can say most truly, that I was the principal Means of hindering both, by the Help of some Lords, with whom I consulted every Day, and they with me, to prevent what we thought would be of great Prejudice, if not ruinous, to the Nation.

This, it is obvious, did not come up to Bonrepa's Commission, or the Expectations of the King his Master, who was not so desirous to engage in the Quarrel of England, as to connect the Weight, Power, and Consequence

But this amounted to a provisional Treaty; and that the French Ministers, ordinary and extraordinary, Bourepes and Bardillon, condescended thus to put the labouring Oar upon their Master, was owing to a Persuasion, that when his Majesty found himself in the Toils, he would be glad to accept of Deliverance on any Terms.

Don Pedro de Rengilla was still the Minister for Spain at the English Court; and to a Person of his Sagacity, the very Arrival of Bourepes; at such a Crisis, was sufficient Information of his Errand: That, however, he might be able to give Satisfaction to his Court on somewhat better Grounds than his own Conjectures, he enter'd into a free Conference with Lord Sunderland; to whom he remonstrated, "That Mr. Bourepes's Business must be either public or private: If the Latter, he had nothing to say to it; if the Former, he desir'd to be made acquainted with it; otherwise, said he, those whom it may concern will be at Liberty to make their own Conclusions, and take their own Measures." And the Answer he received was exactly agreeable to what has been already recited concerning Bourepes's Negotiations, viz. "That whatever Measures the King should take, they would be only such as might serve to secure him against the Designs of Holland." This was at once a Proof that the Secret of the Dutch Preparations had already surpris'd, and an Avowal, that the King thought himself at Liberty, as he certainly was, to take what Measures he thought fit for his own Preservation.

What further pass'd at this Conference has not been remembered: But this, and the Notice which had been given in the Gazette, That his Majesty (August 24) had resolv'd to call a Parliament, and that the Writs should be issued on the 18th of September, were sufficient to convince Rengilla that the Alarm had already made to sleep an Impression, that nothing would be omitted to pacify the Ferment at Home, and to guard against the Danger from abroad. In order, therefore, to spread a new Veil before the Eyes of the King and his Ministers, he demanded a private Audience of his Majesty, which being granted, he began with assuring him, That the Dutch had no Design upon England; and then proceeded to set forth the fatal Consequences of his entering into an Alliance with France, and how ill it would found to the Nation, that, while he amus'd them with the Hope of a free Parliament, he should lay them under the Restraint of French Forces, whom, of all Foreigners, they most abhor'd. The King, on the other hand, play'd the Politician too; and affect'd to be greatly concern'd, that his Brother of France should draw upon him, the Suspicion of his Allies, by sending over Bourepes to so delicate a Crisis; call'd it the most unfriendly Turn he could have done him; wish'd it had been in his Power to have sent him back, the next Day after his Arrival; said, he should have no Encouragement from him to continue here; and concluded with assuring him, that he had much rather maintain a good Correspondence with Holland, than place his Dependence on an Alliance with France.

Thus both Parties endeavour'd to circumvent each other; but, of the two, the King appears by far the most excusable: For, tho' he did not acquaint Rengilla with the whole Truth, he did not, like him, advance a gross Falshood; and, on the contrary, said enough to convince him, that, for the sake of Peace at home, he was ready to break off all Connection with the Power so much dreaded abroad. But, whereas it is currently said, and commonly believ'd, that Van Citter the Dutch Embassador at London confirm'd what Rengilla had advanced, with regard to the military Preparations of the States; as, that they were not design'd against any Part of the British Dominions, and assert'd farther, that France had perhaps more Reason to be alarm'd than England, our own Gazettes bear witness, that Van Citter return'd, on his private Affairs, as it is said, to Holland, in July, and that his Return was not even talk'd of at the Hague till the September following.

On the 6th of September N. S. we, moreover, find Alberville return'd to the Hague; and, on the 8th, presenting a Memorial to the States, in which he remonstrated, "That the great and extraordinary Preparations, which their Lordships were making, both by Land and Sea, at a time of Year when military Undertakings, especially by Sea, were usually given over, and which were Matter of Alarm and Surprize to all Europe, had oblig'd the King his Master, who had nothing more at heart than to live in Peace, and maintain a good Correspondence, with the States, to require, by him, the Tendency of these Preparations: That his Majesty, as their Ally and Confederate, had a Right to demand an Explanation: That he had been in continual Expectation of being inform'd by their Embassadors: But that he being wholly silent, his Majesty found himself under a Necessity to reinforce his Fleet, and to put himself in a Condition to maintain the Peace of Christendom."

The very next Day, Mr. d' Arvaux presented also a Memorial to their Lordships, setting forth, "That the sincere Desire of the King his Master to maintain the Tranquillity of Europe would not suffer him to see the mighty Preparations they were making, without taking such Measures, as the Prudence, inseparable from all his Actions, inspir'd him with, in order to prevent the pernicious Consequences, which the Continuance of those Preparations would intally produce: That as his Majesty, from a Persuasion of the Wisdom of their Councils, could not imagine that a free State should, on eight Grounds, resolve to take up Arms, and kindle a War, which, at the present juncture, could not but prove fatal to Christendom; so neither could he believe, that they would engage in such vast Expences, both at home and abroad; that they would entertain such Numbers of foreign Troops; that ... would fit out so numerous a Fleet, for the present Year; and prepare such vast Armaments, if they had not some Design in view, answerable to such immense Preparations; That from all these Considerations, his Majesty could not help concluding, that this Armament was directed against England; and had therefore commanded him to declare, in his Name, to their Lordships, that, in such case, the Ties of Friendship and Alliance, between him and the King of England, oblig'd him not only to assist him, but also to look on the first Act of Hostility, which should be committed by their Troops, or their Fleet, against his Britannic Majesty, to be a manifest Infracture of the Peace, and an open Rupture with his Crown.

As the King had in person assur'd Roussille, and other foreign Ministers, that he had enter'd into no Alliance with France, this Memorial had the worst Effect imaginable, not only as it brought his Majesty's Honour into Question; but as it furnish'd the States with a new Pretence for continuing their Preparations, and placing the Guilt and Odium of a War to his Majesty's Account. It was enough for them, that, as well from the timing of the two Memorials, as from the Contents of the Latter, there was Room to surmise, that the two Courts acted by Concert, and to affect a Concern for their Safety: And, according to this outward Appearance of Things, without recurring to any War at all to Mr. de Avenus, they gave great Liberty to understand, in effect, "That they had arm'd, after the Example of the King of England, and other Princes; and that they had been long convinced of the Alliance between the two Kings, which Mr. de Avenus had now communicated."

The Court of England was by this time so disconcerted, that this dry Answer threw them into the utmost Consternation; and, from all those towering Flights, which us'd to fill their former Memorials, they sunk into the most abject Timidity: As soon as the News was receiv'd, a Council was held, in which it was resolv'd to disown Mr. de Avenus's Proceedings, and to order his Majesty's Ministers at the Hague, Brussels, Madrid, &c. to deny that there was any such Alliance subsisting; and declare, that the French Memorial was presented without his Majesty's Knowledge or Participation: The Blame of all was, at the same time, laid on the (r) Omisciousness of Skelton who, it is said, had recommended that Measure to Mr. de Cressy, and who was soon after recalled in disgrace, and committed to the Tower.

But all was too late: Such a Discovery, whether true or False, was of more Consequence at the Hague, than all the Concealments the King could make; for which reason they resolv'd never to be undeceived; and, on the contrary, represented every Attempt of that Nature, as a Part of the Concert between the two Courts; so that one, by owing the Measure, might be at Liberty to make use of Force, and the other, by disowning it, might beat once served and screened. Hence it happen'd, that what was Policy in the Prince of Orange, and the States, pass'd on their Dependents as Conviction: And thus we find Bishop Burnet positively asserting, That this Memorial was a full Proof of a secret Alliance between the two Kings. "Otherwise," says he, "no Instance, how pressing soever, would have prevail'd with the Court of France to have own'd it in so solemn a Manner: For, what Embassadors lay in their Masters Name, when they are not immediately disown'd, passes for authentic." Not considering, that the Words Amity and Alliance, which are the very Words of the Memorial, are indefinite, and seem rather to relate to a general, than any particular Engagement, nor recollecting, that even Lord Somers, in his Apology, makes use of these Expressions: "I cannot omit saying something of France, there having been to much Talk of a League between the two Kings, I do protest, I never knew of any." Nor that he himself had just before said, That the King did neither entertain the Proposition (Bourgeois) nor let it fall quite to the Ground.

If it should be ask'd, how France came to interpose so rashly, and unwarrantably, in the King's Affairs? it may be answer'd, That it either was to make a Merit of their Friendship to his Majesty, and to find an Excuse for setting Europe once more in a Flame; or else, to render him so suspected to the Princes of the Confederacy, that he should have no other Choice, than the returning to those Proposals, which he had just refus'd.

On the same Day that Mr. de Avenus presented this notable Memorial to the States in relation to the Design upon England, he presented also another, in relation to the Affairs of Georgia, in which, in the same menacing Strain, he gave them to understand, "That the King his Master, being inform'd of the Motions and Cabals that were made towards the Frontiers of that Electorate, against the Cardinal of Porcia, and the Chapter, had order'd him to declare to their Lordships, That he was resolv'd to maintain the

Another Memorial of France to the States in relation to the Affairs of Georgia.

(r) It happen'd not Day, that Minister de Cressy being in earnest discourse with Bellevue concerning the Queen's Affairs, he propos'd, she latter answer'd, he had no other design, but to be inform'd in any matter that should be offer'd to the said Cardinal King, and to be ready at the Hague, to declare in the Name of his Majesty, his interest himself in the Affairs of his Majesty, and to be inform'd in such case, in case of any thing being offer'd against him, that he would quickly make use of his Preparations, and thereby bring the Affairs of the Prince of Orange, and of the Protestant States, into a full and open War, Mr. de Cressy took the Hint, and so soon afterwards that King with it, but he sent Orders to the Court of France to declare to the States, &c. Letter of King William, vol. 1. p. 520.

(s) As also, that he was the more confirm'd in this Matter by what he had heard from St. Willian Trumbull, at that time the King's Embassador at Constantinople, who said, that about three weeks, he was surpris'd to see Minister de Avenus the French Embassador, in such a manner, without their Convention, start upon Bourgeois, which he receiv'd for, by telling him, There was no Alliance betwixt them, nor any more, for that he was inform'd by Mr. de Cressy, and by Seigneur de St. Amand, that the King had resolv'd, that now, and henceforth, he would maintain the two Kings. said Cardinal and Chapter in their Rights and Privileges against all that should go about to molest them: And that his Majesty therefore assur'd himself, that those who desir'd the Preservation of the public Tranquility, would not commit the least Hostility against the said Cardinal and Chapter, nor against the Places and Country of that Electorate, which were rightly and properly under their Administration: And this will serve yet further to shew, that France was at present resolv'd to hold the Republic in Check, and which way soever the turn'd her Arms, to find its Account in opposing her. Nor was this all, his most Christian Majesty had also done his utmost to distress the Dutch, by prohibiting the Exportation of all their Manufactures both Linnen and Woollen, as also their Herrings, unless cur'd with French Salt. This was done with an Expectation, that all those concern'd would have immediately grown discontented with the present Measures of their Lords, and have clamour'd for such an Alteration as the Court of France should think fit to prescribe. But the Effect was quite otherwise. The People seem'd to have no Sense but of Indignation: And taking Advantage of this Disposition, the States made Reprisals on the French Trade, by prohibiting their Wines and Brandies, till the Current of public Affairs should return to its ancient Channel.

The Conferences at Lindeu.

In this Interval, the Prince of Orange had several (se) Conferences with the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the Duke of Zell, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, at Linden; in which the great Affair was adjust'd of taking into the Pay of the States such a Body of their several Troops, as should be sufficient to replace those of the Dutch, which his Highness propos'd to employ in the Expedition to England; and without which Precaution, the States had never come into the Measure at all, as being with Reason apprehensive, that France would never miss so tempting an Opportunity to shake the Republic to its Foundation. These Conferences were held between the sixth and the fourteenth of September, N. S. and at the Return of his Highness to the Hague, the whole Affair was debated by the States, who, upon the Issue, not only resolv'd to ratify the Agreement which he had made with those Princes, and to augment their own Forces with a new Levy of ten thousand Men, but, from henceforward concurr'd with him unanimously in every Measure tending to facilitate the great Design in hand.

It is not long, since we left his Highness of Orange in the most perplexed Circumstances, traversed at every Step by the Lowvolesin Faction, oppos'd by the Lords of Amsterdam, and entangled in the Snares of France; and now we find him at the Head of the Commonwealth, directing its Motions as he pleas'd, without any Molestation from his Adversaries, and trampling the Interest of France under his Feet. To account perfectly for this great and sudden Change, without farther and better Lights than have yet appear'd, is out of our Power: For to suppose that the Animofities of Enemies, the Intrigues of Statesmen, and the Selfishness of Princes, should all at once give way to Zeal for Religion, and Tenderness to a suffering Neighbour, is utterly impossible: It is true, Bishop Burnet forgets, that Mr. de Louvois, who hated the Count d'Arance, had cut out the large Allowances which us'd to be made him for his Services: But tho' it should be admitted, that French Money had sometimes an Influence in the Dutch Cities, it will not follow, that the Opposition to the Prince was kept up by that only. On the contrary, it was the Power, Interest, and Credit of the Stadholder, which inter'd with the Ambition and Avarice of the Grandees of the State, that was the Root of that Opposition; and while those continued, it is natural to think the Opposition would have continued also. To solve this Difficulty, we must therefore conclude, that the Lowvolesin Party gave way to the Prince's Designs, on a Presumption, that if they miscarri'd he would be ruin'd; that, if they succeeded, he would chuse to reside where his Ambition would have the largest Scope, and that, either way, they should be deliver'd from the Umbrage of an overgrown Power, that obscur'd and oppress'd their own.

In this Interval Mr. Bonaparte left England; and, at once waving the Reluctance which the cool Reception of his Proposals had rais'd, and expecting the Effect of Mr. d'Arance's Memorial to the States, Mr. Barillon, as we are told, was order'd to make another Proposal, in his Master's Name, viz. That he would abandon his Designs on Germany, and carry the War into Holland, on condition, no doubt,

Further Proposals to the King from the Court of France. [Life of K. William, &c. p. 325.] [Knevet, &c. lib. p. 519.]

(10) In treating of this Affair, which Bishop Burnet erroneously dates as antecedent to the Death of the Elector of the Hague, he is lapsing through in one of his own false Stories, which deserves to be pointed out for the Admiration of Posterity.

"The Duke of Hanover, was at that time in some Engagement with the Court of France. But, since he had married the Princess Sophia of the Palatine House, I ventured to send a Message to her by one of their Courts, who was then at the Hague. He was a French Refugee, named Mr. Bourne. It was to acquaint her with our Design with relation to England, and to let her know, that, if we succeeded, certainly a perpetual Exclusion of all Princes from the Succession to the Crown would be enacted: And, since she was the next Protestant Heir after the two Princesses, and the Prince of Orange, or whom at that time there was no Issue, I was very confident, that, if the Duke of Hanover could be distinguished from the Interests of France, so that he came into our Interests, the Succession to the Crown would be lodged in his Person, and in her Possession; tho', on the other hand, if he continu'd, as he stood then, engaged with France, I could not answer for this. The Gentleman carry'd the Message, and deliver'd it. The Duchess entertain'd it with much Warmth; and brought him to the Duke to repeat it to him. But at that time this made no great Impression on him: He look'd on it as a remote and a doubtful Project. Yet when he saw our Success in England, he had other Thoughts of it. Some Days after this Frenchman was gone, I told the Prince what I had done. He approv'd of it heartily; but was particularly pleas'd, that I had done it as of my self, without communicating it to him, or my way engag'd him in it, for he said, if it should happen to be known that the Proposition was made by him, it might do us hurt in England, as if he had already declar'd himself for France as to the forming Projects concerning the Succession to the Crown."

doubt, tho' it is not specify'd, that his Majesty would declare War against the Republic at the same time, and admit of no Treaty or Accommodation, without the Concurrence of his most Christian Ally. Four or five of the Council approv'd this Overture; and certainly, as far as the King's immediate Interest was concern'd, it was of the utmost Consequence: But the Majority as warmly oppos'd it, alleging, "That such a Violation of the Treaties subsisting between the two States would be sufficient to put the whole Nation into an Uproar, and utterly deprive the King of the Hearts of all his Protestant Subjects. The latter Opinion prevail'd, and possibly with so much the more Ease, from the Influence of a remarkable Incident, which had happen'd at Portsmouth just before.

Rejected.

Irish Recruits refused by certain Officers.

The Army had behav'd to the People, in every respect, as ill (x) as possible, except in their Adherence to the Protestant Religion: On which account they had render'd themselves as obnoxious to the King, as they had done by their Licentiousness to their Fellow-subjects: Hence his Majesty had entertain'd a Resolution to new-model them, by the Introduction of Catholic Recruits from Ireland, and chose to begin the Reform with the Duke of Berwick's Regiment, quarter'd at Portsmouth. The Experiment was try'd with about thirty, or, as some say, fifty, who were recommended by the Duke in Person; but, about the expected Success; for the Lieutenant Colonel, Beaumont, and five Captains, Fisher, Parks, Orms, Cooke, and Port, who had rais'd the Regiment at their own Charge, during the time of Monmouth's Invasion, had the Boldness to reject them; Beaumont remonstrating to his Grace, "That he was desir'd by these Gentlemen, (with whose Sense he concurred) to inform his Grace, that they did not think it consistent with their Honours to have Foreigners impos'd upon them, without being complain'd of, that their Companies were weak, or Orders had been sent to recruit them, not doubting, but, if such Orders had been given, they that first, in very ill Times, rais'd them Hundreds, could easily now have made them according to the King's Compliment. Therefore they humbly petition'd, they might have leave to fill up their Companies with such Men of this Nation, as they should judge most suitable for the King's Service, and to support their Honours; or otherwise, that they might be permitted, with all imaginable Duty and Respect, to lay down their Commissions."

A. D. 1688.

The King was then at Windsor, and being inform'd of the Matter by Express, immediately dispatch'd a Party of Horse to bring up the Offenders, in order to their being punish'd with all the Rigor of martial Law; and they were brought up accordingly: But, before they could be proceeded against, Mr. d'Avau's Memorial had set the Kingdom in a Flame; and, therefore, instead of hanging them for Mutiny, as was at first given out, they were only (y) cashier'd. That Piece had been immediately set forth in French and English, and those who gave the People their Cue, took care to connect the Portsmouth-Affair with this suppos'd Alliance: It was given out, that the French Forces were to have landed at that Place, and that these Irish Recruits were introduced to facilitate their taking possession of it: There was a Disposition abroad to believe any thing of that Nature: And, on the other hand, not the least Suspicion prevail'd, that Beaumont, and his Associates were in the Interest of the Prince of Orange. The Nation thus reeling, the King himself grew giddy, and was advis'd by Sunderland, that there was no Way left to remedy the Disorder, but to unthread the Maze he had bewilder'd himself in.

Of all Doctrines, that of Self-denial is the most disagreeable to hear, and the most difficult to practise; and to those most, who have met with the most Indulgence: It was not, therefore, without great Reluctance, that his Majesty consented to ravel his own Web; and when he enter'd on that ungrateful Talk, he could not conceal how much it was against the grain, nor how loth he was to give over the Project, which he had gone such Lengths to accomplish. Thus, in his Declaration of September 21, which is expressly calculated to preserve those revoke Rights it was to chiefly (z) Members of Parliament from being under any Prejudices and Mistakes, thro' the Arti-

(x) A Captain, who was quarter'd at Southwark, had caus'd the Mayor of that Town, tho' a Man devoted to the Court, to be seiz'd in a Basket by his Soldiers, for being loy to him; which Indignity the King did not think it punish at this Juncture. (Life of King William, p. 222. Kennet.

(y) Sir John Hervey said, "With great Reliance on the Part of the King, who seem'd to dread the Consequence of it. They were offer'd Forgiveness if they would but accept the Men, but they all refus'd it; which caus'd a great and general Discontent throughout the Army, and sent many of the Regiment, most of which soon after mutinied." (Ibid. p. 273, 274.

(z) Nothing will better serve to exemplify under what Passions the Parliament was to have been chosen, than the following Reason from the Author just quoted, in the preceding Note.

"Upon my return to York, I took leave of his Majesty, but with terrible apprehensions that he would put the same Questions as he had to others, concerning the Report; but he had nothing at all of it, only enjoin'd me to stand a Candidate, for the next Parliament at York, which I would gladly have been excus'd, but it could not be; and so he wish'd me a good Journey. Just at this time I had News, that the Question had been put, the Week before, to all our Judges of the West Riding, and that they had all answer'd in the Negative; so that I could not but think I had a lucky Escape.

I sent Notice to the Mayor and others of York, that I intended to stand for one of their Representatives, at the ensuing Election, and found the Magistracy would be for the most part against me, tho' I had good Recommendations from the Commons. The Trade, however, I was not so much to know how to do in this Matter; I was not desirous to be of this Parliament, not only because I was grown sick and almost unfit to attend the Duty of the House, but also because I was afraid the King would expect more from me than my Conscience would extend to; for as I was determin'd not to withdraw from on the one Side, so I could hardly resolve to stand for good a Matter on the other. In this Struggle, I went to the King at Windsor, and show'd him the Letters I had sent to York, and the Answer I had receiv'd thereto; desiring his Majesty to indulge me with Replies 29

A. D. 1638. fices of disfaffected Persons, his Majesty, with the same Breath, declares it his Purpose to endeavour a LEGAL Establishment of an universal Liberty of Conscience; and that he was resolv'd inviolably to preserve the Church of England, by such a Confirmation of the several Acts of Uniformity as should never be alter'd, unless by repealing the several Clauses which inflict Penalties on Persons not promoted, or to be promoted, to any ecclesiastical Benefices, &c. And thus, while, to remove the Fears and Apprehensions which many Persons had entertain'd, that the Legislative Power would be engros'd by Roman-Catholics, and turn'd against Protestants, he sets forth his Willingness that all such should remain incapable to sit in the House of Commons, he leaves an Opening to conclude, that he meant to reform the Roman-Catholic Peers to their Seats in the House of Lords.

Deputy-Lieutenants and Justices re. &c.

It immediately appear'd, that the Reserves in this Piece gave more Disgust than Satisfaction to the Public; and therefore, in the very next Gazette, an Article was inserted, signifying, That his Majesty had authoriz'd and empower'd the Lords Lieutenants of the several Counties to grant Deputations to such Gentlemen as had been remov'd from being Deputy-Lieutenants; and that he had also directed the Lord Chancellor to put into the Commission of the Peace, the Names of such others as had been laid aside, and as should be recommended by the said Lords Lieutenants.

His Majesty courts the Dutch.

In this Interval, also, by the Advice of the same Ministry, Instructions were sent to Alberville at the Hague, to dispel the Storm that was gathering there; if possible, by giving such Assurances, and making such Offers, as might remove all reasonable Grounds of Suspicion against his Majesty with respect to France, and make it the Interest of the States to forbear coming to a Rupture with him. Accordingly, upon the 5th of October N. S. his Excellency solemnly repeated those Offers and Assurances, in a formal Memorial to their Lordships, to this Effect, namely, "That whereas a great deal of Art and Industry had been us'd to make the World believe, that his Majesty had entred into secret Treaties and Alliances with the most Christian King, his Majesty, to shew the great Regard he had to the Friendship and Alliances subsisting between him and their Lordships, and his Desire to continue the same, had commanded him, the said Envoy extraordinary, to assure their Lordships, in his Name, that there was no other Treaty between his Majesty and the most Christian King, than those that were public and in Print: And, farther, that as his Majesty extremely desir'd the Preservation of the Peace and Repose of Christendom, so he would be glad to take such Measures with their Lordships, as should be most convenient for maintaining the Peace of Nimwegen, and the Truce of twenty Years." The like Offers and Assurances were also made to all the other Ministers of the Allies; and his Majesty moreover declar'd in Council, that he would send an Ambassador Extraordinary into Holland, to negotiate a strict Alliance with the States, on such a Foundation as should bid fairest to secure the Peace and Repose of Europe. Of all this, Bishop Burnet makes no mention: Only he says, "Alberville did continue to deny the Alliance between the two Kings, even after the Memorial (that of Mr. de Aranne) was put in." All however prov'd fruitless: Their Lordships turn'd a deaf Ear, affect'd to remain unconvinced, and proceeded with their Preparations, as if unalterably determin'd to carve out Conditions for themselves.

A. D. 1638.

Thus disappointed abroad, his Majesty's next Relource was to make a Merit of those Endeavours at home: Accordingly, in the same Gazette which certifi'd, that the Dutch Preparations were really desin'd against England, Alberville's last Memorial was publish'd, that the whole Kingdom might be induc'd to believe, that his Eyes were at last open'd, and that he was willing to embrace any Measures which had a Tendency to disperse the Cloud which hung over him: As a farther Quillner, the Lord President Sunderland, by the King's Command, invited the Archbishop of Canterbury, and such of the Bishops as were within reach of the Town, to come to Court, his Majesty thinking it requisite to three Queries I had to make. 1. Whether, seeing the Cause was like to be both chargeable and difficult, and the Success extremely doubtful, it was his Pleasure I should stand? He reply'd, positively, I should. 2. Whether, as the Opposition was very strong against me, he would impute it to my Weakness if I miscarry'd? He promis'd he would not. 3. Whether he would think me all he could to prevent my being baffled, and particularly by such Means as I should propose to him? His Answer was, Yes; and he gave immediate Orders to the Lords for purging of Corporations, to make whatever Change or Alteration I desir'd in the City of York, and to put in or out, which the King, it seems, had reserv'd to himself by the last Charter, just as I pleas'd. But I was content of what I did in this regard: I consider'd, that if I put out some, it would look as if I had no Power, and debas'd me too; and that if I displac'd too many, it might exasperate the City against me, make them believe I was too deep in the Court Interest, and prevent my Success on the other hand; I therefore only declar'd that the Lord Mayor might be dismiss'd in Office, and Sir Thomas appointed in his stead, which would prevent his being a Member of Parliament; and that too, Mr. Edward Pejus and Mr. Renshaw, who were my principal Friends in the former Election of me for York, and were afterwards turn'd out, partly on my Account, might be restor'd in Aldermen.

I afterwards desir'd Mr. Bress, the Agent for Corporation Matters, that if he had the Power, I might, with some others I should name, be added to the Bench of Justices in that City, by a Writ of Assistance, which he promis'd me should be done.

Again, afterwards—Sir Walter Fenwick, and Mr. Middleton, came up to make Report to the King of the Answers they had receiv'd from the Wig Bishops and the Corporations, to the Queries they had put to them; in which I found the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of York were so fealty, that they would out of Court, and that I need not give my self the Trouble of getting them remov'd, and more remarkably my greatest Opposers; so I left them to their Star, and only insist'd on the Commission of Assistance for myself and Friends: I should name; but every Fall brought me new Fears I should not be chosen at York, tho' several Alterations and Restrictions from popular Elections, to a Mayor and twelve Aldermen, when the King appointed as he pleas'd, were now made by new Charters, for the more certain Election of such Members as might be to the King's good liking. And now Lord Hallifax, when I took leave of him, advis'd me not to be too much in earnest with my Election, it had, not to make too free a Use of the Court's Assistance, for many Reasons he then offer'd to my Consideration. (Berry's Mem. p. 267, 268, 269, 270, and 272.)

spoke to them (these are his Lordship's Words): But all that pass'd at the Interview was general Expressions of Favour on the King's Side, and of Duty and Loyalty on the Bishops, both which, as one of their Lordships, Dr. Ken, pettishly observ'd, would have been in the same State, if they had not stirr'd one Foot out of their Dioceses; except that his Majesty gave them to understand, that he intended to take off the Bishop of London's Suspension; which was done accordingly.

Given public Notice of the Dutch Design.

At the same time, a Royal Proclamation was set forth, importing, "That his Majesty had receiv'd undoubted Advice, that a great and sudden Invasion was on the point of being made on this Kingdom, from Holland; That, tho' some false Pretences, relating to Liberty, Property, and Religion, contriv'd or worded with Art, might be given out, the real Purpose of the said Invasion would be nothing less than an absolute Conquest of the same, and the utter subjecting Princes and People to a foreign Power: That what seem'd almost incredible, certain of his Majesty's own Subjects, of restless Spirits, implacable Malice, and desperate Designs, not being mov'd with his reiterated Acts of Grace and Mercy, which he had study'd and delighted to abound in, were again endeavouring to embroil the Kingdom in Blood and Ruin, for the sake of a Prey or Booty out of the public Confusion: That, tho' his Majesty had receiv'd Notice, some time since, of the said intended Invasion, he had always refus'd furnish Succour; had chosen, next under God, to rely on the true and ancient Courage, Faith, and Allegiance of his own Subjects, with whom he had often ventur'd his Life, and in whose Defence, against all Enemies, he was resolv'd to live and die: That, therefore, he solemnly conjur'd his said Subjects, to lay aside all manner of Animosities, Jealousies, and Prejudices, and heartily and cheerfully to unite in the Defence of their King and native Country, &c. That, in regard of this strange and unreasonable Attempt from our neighbouring Country, without any manner of Provocation, which was design'd to divert his gracious Purposes to quiet the Minds of all his People in Matters of Religion, he found it necessary to recall the Writs which had been issued for the Election and Return of Members of Parliament: That he thereby strictly charged and commanded all his loving Subjects, whose ready Concurrence, Valour, and Courage, as true Englishmen, he no ways doubted, in so just a Cause, to be prepar'd to defend their Country: And that he did as strictly and expressly enjoin and prohibit all and every his said Subjects, of what Degree and Condition soever, from giving any manner of Aid, Countenance, or Succour, or holding any Correspondence with his Enemies."

This was dated September 28; on the 2d of October a general (a) Pardon was issued, with an Exception to sixteen Persons, viz.

Robert Parsons, Edward Matthews, Samuel Venner, Andrew Fletcher, Colonel Rumsey, Major Manley, Isaac Manley, Francis Charlton, John Wildman, Titus Oates, Robert Ferguson, Gilbert Burnet, Sir Robert Peyton, Laurence Braddon, Samuel Johnson, Thomas Tipping, and Sir Rowland Gwynne. And, on the same Day, his Majesty having sent for the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs of London, was pleas'd to tell them, That, out of his Concern for the Peace and Welfare of the City, and as a Mark of the great Confidence he had in them at that time, when the Kingdom was threaten'd with an Invasion, he had resolv'd to restore to them their ancient Charter and Privileges, and to put them in the same Condition that they were in, at the time of the Judgment pronounced against them upon the Quo Warranto, that so they might be the better enabled to serve him with that Duty and Loyalty, which they had given the King his Brother and himself for many Testimonies of, and upon which his Majesty did depend. He also directed the Lord Chancellor and Attorney-General to prepare and pass such a Grant or Instrument of Restoration and Confirmation as should be requisite, and that the same be forthwith dispatch'd.

Orders the Charter of London to be restor'd.

When the Bishops waited on his Majesty, it was in expectation that he would require the Assistance of their Councils, and under a Persuasion that he was ready to do whatever they should think necessary for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and the Peoples Rights; and they came prepar'd to advise him accordingly: When therefore they were so coldly entertain'd, and so unexpectedly dismiss'd, on a Pretence that the King was not at leisure to give them a Hearing, they retir'd in as much Mortification as Disappointment; and, to recover their Game, they entreated the Archbishop to procure them a second and more particular Audience, in which they might deliver their plain and sincere Sense of the dangerous Condition of the Church and State as became Men of their Character. This was their Purpose, as the Case is stated by Dr. Sprat; and the Archbishop applying for this Favour on Sunday September the 30th; his Majesty promis'd to admit them to a full Liberty of Speech on the Tuesday following; "at which time, says the same Prelate, had we been admitted, we could not have fail'd of getting some Credit to ourselves and the Church." But the King it seems was not willing they should acquire this Credit wholly at his Expence, and therefore postpon'd their Audience till the next Day; and, in the mean time, set forth his general Pardon, and endeavour'd to make his Peace with the City: On the Wednesday, however, they made their Appearance before him; and the Archbishop, with such a becoming Meekness, Gravity, and Courage, as indeed were admirable, says Dr. Sprat, presented him the following Plan of Advices:

Advises the Bishop to give him Advice.

"1. Our

(a) According to the Author of the History of the Desertion, there came out not some few Days before, but some few Days after, which all Corporations and Bodies Politic were excepted.

A. D. 1688.

1. Our first humble Advice is, That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to put the Management of your Government in the several Counties, into the Hands of such of the Nobility and Gentry there, as are legally qualified for it.

2. That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to annul your Commission for ecclesiastical Affairs, and that no such Court (as that Commission sets up) may be erected for the future.

3. That your Majesty will graciously be pleased, that no Dissolution may be granted or continued, by virtue whereof any Person, not duly qualify'd by Law, hath been, or may be, put into any Place, Office, or Preferment, in Church or State, or in the Universities, or continued in the same; especially such as have Cure of Souls annexed to them: And, in particular, that you will be graciously pleased to restore the President and Fellows of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxford.

4. That your Majesty will graciously be pleased to set aside all Licences or Faculties already granted, by which any Persons of the Romish Communion may pretend to be enabled to teach public Schools; and that no such be granted for the future.

5. That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to desist from the Exercise of such a disposing Power, as hath of late been used, and to permit that Point to be freely and calmly debated and argued, and finally settled in Parliament.

6. That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to inhibit the four foreign Bishops, who style themselves Vicars Apostolical, from further invading the ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, which is by Law vested in the Bishops of this Church.

7. That your Majesty will be pleased graciously to fill the vacant Bishopsricks, and other ecclesiastical Promotions within your Gift, both in England and Ireland, with Men of Learning and Piety; and, in particular, (which I must own to be my peculiar Boldness, for 'tis done without the Privity of my Brethren) that you will be graciously pleased forthwith to fill the archiepiscopal Chair of York (which has so long stood (b) empty, and upon which a whole Province depends) with some very worthy Person: For which (Pardon me, Sir, if I am bold to say) you have now here before you a very fair Choice.

8. That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to supersede all further Prosecution of Writs Warrants against Corporations, and to restore to them their ancient Charters, Privileges and Franchises, as we hear God hath put into your Majesty's Heart to do for the City of London, which we intended to have made otherwise one of our principal Requests.

9. That, if it please your Majesty, Writs may be issued out with convenient Speed, for the calling of a free and regular Parliament, in which the Church of England may be secured according to the Acts of Uniformity; Provision may be made for a due Liberty of Conscience, and for securing the Liberties and Properties of all your Subjects; and a mutual Confidence and good Understanding may be established between your Majesty and all your People.

10. Above all, That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to permit your Bishops to offer you such (c) Motives and Arguments, as (we trust) may, by God's Grace, be effectual to persuade your Majesty to return to the Communion of the Church of England, into whose most holy catholic Faith you were baptiz'd, and in which you were educated, and to which it is our daily, earnest Prayer to God, that you may be reunited.

These, Sir, (continued the Archbishop) are the humble Advices, which, out of Conscience of the Duty we owe to God, to your Majesty, and to our Country, we think fit at this time to offer to your Majesty, as suitable to the present State of your Affairs, and most conducing to your Service; and so to leave them to your Princely Consideration.

His Grace concluded all with a Prayer, that God would dispose and govern the King's Heart, that he might ever seek his Honour and Glory, and truly to preserve the People committed to his Charge in Wealth, Peace, and Goodliness, &c. The Bishops who concurred on this Occasion, were those of Ely (as we a part of our worthy) Chichester, Rochester, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, London, Winchester, and St. Asaph: And,

(b) For the sake of Esther Perce, as the Story is told.

(c) We are assist'd by Mr. Edward, that this last Point of reconciling the King to the Communion of the Church of England the Archbishop afterwards reinforced in a private Conference with the King, by a Discourse full of convincing Arguments, and which savour'd of all the free Brethrens of the penitential Times of Christianity. But the Romish Religion had now taken too deep Root in his Royal Breast.—Bishop Ken adds, "A Reader of this, from the Event of Things, would think it a great Providence, that neither the Father, nor the pretended Son, would have taken to any Counsel of forsaking Joseph." Which is certainly not of the English Remains that ever was said.

Mr. Edward (upon the Example, and nearly in the Words, of another Whig) is all eloquence upon this Subject, of the King's consulting the Bishops.

"Upon the reading a Letter from Alleswell, says he, consulting Advice, That Penitentiary Fogel had frankly own'd to him the Design of the Prince of Orange; adding, That if the Dutch Embassador in England had had any thing to the contrary, he had done it out of his own Head, and without Orders from the States: That several English Lords and Gentlemen had already cross'd the Sea, and lay private in Holland, ready to accompany the Prince in his Expedition, the poor King could not, and for a while remain'd speechless and astonish'd: The airy Castle of unlimited Power, rais'd by the Magic of Jesuitical Councils, now vanish'd in a Moment; and the mislead Monarch, by the Prince's Approach, freed from his Inchantment, found himself upon the Brink of a Precipice; while all his intellectual Fountains flood thunder'd with a Distress, without daring to lend him a helping Hand, for fear that both he and they should be involv'd in the greater Ruin. One great Man, as I have been well inform'd, undertook to support his Spirit, by showing him, That the Danger was not great, and that the Prince of Orange might be diverted from the Design, or defeated in the Attempt. But he made answer in the Purview of the Informer, I know my ten-to-one's Character so well, that if he undertake any Design, he will go through with it; he will never be diverted, and very hardy defeated.

In this Extremity, the sinking Monarch, whom this imminent Danger had render'd clear-sighted, discover'd the chief Support of the English Monarchy, the Bishops, and eagerly endeavour'd to lay hold on that which before he had attempted to overthrow." [P. 1112.]

A. D. 1688.

A. D. 1688. And, says Dr. Kennet, tho' these Proposals, at any other time would have rais'd the King's Indignation, the Necessity of his Affairs now oblig'd him both to thank their Lordships for them, and to promise to comply with them.

Dr. Sherlock's Remarks upon them.

First Collection of Papers, p. 7.

But how favourably soever they were seemingly receiv'd within Doors, or how well soever they were calculated to re-establish the King and re-compose the Nation, they did not give universal Satisfaction without, as appears by a Paper, at that time, set forth by Dr. Sherlock, call'd, An Account of the Proposals, &c. in order to remove the groundless Jealousies, and unreasonable Surmises, which they had given rise to among some People, and silence the ill Constructions which had been put upon them. "They waited upon the King, says the Doctor, not as a Party separate either from the Nobility or Gentry, whom they could, I believe, have wish'd his Majesty would rather have call'd for at this Juncture, or from the rest of the Bishops or Clergy of England, but as Persons whom the King was pleas'd, upon Reasons known only to his own Royal Breast, to command to attend upon him." He also adds, towards the Close of the said Paper, "I do assure you, and I have the best Grounds in the World for my Assurance, That the Bishops will never stir one Jot from their Petition, but that they will, whenever that happy Opportunity shall offer itself, let the Protestant Dissenters find, that they will be better than their Word given in their famous Petition." Who these some People were which the Doctor alludes to, and from whence proceeded their Dislike of the Bishops Proposals, may be gathered from the following Passage of Mr. Samuel Johnson: "As soon as ever I saw them, I plainly perceived they were all of them deceitful and mountbank Remedies: And being urg'd for my Opinion of them, I gave my Thoughts freely concerning them; and the rather, because they were said to be very much applauded abroad. I said, that I was sure the King would comply with them, but not all at once; but he would make his Concessions so, as to garnish the Gazette with them twice a Week, and to amuse the People with a Succession of Favours, as if there were to be no End of them: That these Grievances being thus redress'd, there would be no need of the Prince of Orange's Expedition, to take care of that which was already done in his hand: That these Concessions would stand, till the King had recover'd his Fright; and then all things would return into the old Channel."

Tho' of Mr. S. Johnson.

The plain Truth is, that nothing could have prov'd more fatal to those embark'd in the Designs of the Prince of Orange, than such accommodation between the King and his People. Whatever therefore had any Tendency that way, could not fail to give them Umbrage: And so much the more in Proportion, as the Expedients offer'd seem'd to promise Success. But then it must also be confes'd on the other hand, that if these were alarm'd, the Catholics were exasperated, as is evident by their affirming, in a Tract published at this time, under the Title of The Dutch Design anatomiz'd, "That the Bishops Proposals were the Contrivance of the King's Enemies, fram'd on purpose to amuse the People and make them believe, that the setting us to Rights was the only Design of the Dutch; as if till they were granted, we were not safe: (d) And if they then took the Liberty to complain of those Proposals, as so many Impositions put on the King, they made it reasonable to fear, that what was extorted at one time, would on that Provenience be resum'd at another."

And of the Jesuits.

His Majesty, however, set out as if he was sincerely dispos'd to fulfil his Promises to the Bishops; for, on the second Day after their Audience, viz. October the 5th, he was graciously pleas'd to declare in Council, "That, in Pursuance of his Resolution and Intentions to protect the Church of England, and that all Suspicions and Jealousies to the contrary might be removed, he had thought fit to dissolve the Commission for Causes Ecclesiastical:" And accordingly he then gave Directions to the Lord Chancellor, to cause the same to be forthwith done.

The King dissolves the ecclesiastical Commission.

On the next Day the Lord Chancellor Jeffrey, that he also might have the Merit of making his Court to the City, in Person carry'd back the Charter in great Pomp and State, together with the Instrument of Restoration; and in his way to Guildhall met with such Treatment from the Populace, as at once testify'd how much the Government was fallen into Contempt, and how particularly odious he had render'd himself by his own tyrannical Behaviour. Sir John Shorter the Lord Mayor for the Year, was dead, and Sir John Eyles, a Nonconformist, had been appointed by the King to succeed him: But now he was superseded, and, Sir William Pritchard, to whom the Compliment was first made, having declin'd it, Sir John Chapman, a Churchman, was put into the Chair in his stead, to serve till the Feast of St. Simon and St. Jude; at which time the Citizens were to have the Election of their Officers as usual. All the displac'd Aldermen, who were still in being, were, at the same time restor'd; the Hall rang with Shouts of Joy; and before these Transports had time to wear off an Address of Thanks for the great Grace and Favour shown to them, in restoring to them their ancient Liberties and Franchises, was prepared and presented to his Majesty by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs; in which they moreover assur'd him, That they should, with all Duty and Faithfulness, cheerfully and readily, to the utmost Hazard of their Lives and Fortunes, discharge the Trust repos'd in them, according to the Address of Thanks from the Lord Mayor, &c.

(d) In the same Pamphlet it is also said, "If out of pious Stubbornness, some will sit still and not assist the King in this juncture, or traitorously join with the Invaders, what can they expect from his victorious Arms, but the Punishment due to their Perfidiousness and Cowardice."

A. D. 1688. aword Principles of the Church of England, in Defence of his Majesty and the establish'd Government. "The Commissioners of the Lieutenantcy, who were on the same Day restor'd to their ancient Powers and Privileges, came also with their sincere and humble Acknowledgment for his Majesty's peculiar Care of, and Acts of Bounty and Mercy towards, his ancient and famous City of London; especially for putting their Preservation into their own Hands, by suffering them to chuse their own Officers: And, "we must confess, said they, our Lives and Fortunes are but a mean Sacrifice to such transcendent Goodness: But we do assure your Majesty of our cheerful Offering of both, against all your Majesty's Enemies who shall disturb your Peace upon any Pretence whatsoever."

Hall consecrated Bishop of Oxford.

An extraordinary Form of Prayer.

Lords Lieutenant requests restor'd to hold over the Affairs committed by the Regulators of Corporations.

At such a Juncture as this, the Court seem'd to have had a good Bargain in obtaining two such Papers as these, in Exchange for the Restoration of the Charters; and it seems they thought so, by causing both to be immediately printed in the Gazette, as Inducements for the rest of the Nation to follow the Example. Two of the Confederated Bishops, viz. the Archbishop, and the Bishop of Chichester, about the same time, so far relented, as to join with their obnoxious Brother of Chesler, in consecrating Mr. Timothy Hall, Bishop of Oxford; tho', says Dr. Kennet, "The Advancement of such an unworthy Person to that See, could be nothing but a Despite to the University, and a Contempt upon the Church of England."

And in the extraordinary Prayers that in these doubtful and dangerous Times were added to the usual Forms, their Lordships, the Composers, threw in a great many Expressions, which seem'd to argue a thorough Attachment to his Majesty's Person, and as much Zeal for his Government as was consistent with their late Protestation against the Errors of it, as appears by the following Passages:

"In this time of Danger save and protect our most gracious King; give thy holy Ang. Charge over him; preserve his Royal Person in Health and Safety; inspire him with Wisdom and Justice in all his Counsels; prosper all his Undertakings, for thy Honour and Service, with good Success, &c." Another had these Petitions, "Preserve that Holy Religion we profess, together with our Laws and ancient Government; and unite us all in unfeigned and universal Charity one towards another, and in one and the same holy Worship and Communion."

To proceed with the Course of his Majesty's Concessions, upon the 11th it was farther declar'd in the Gazette, "That his Majesty, having receiv'd several Complaints of great Abuses and Irregularities committed in the late Regulations of the Corporations, had thought fit to authorize and require the Lords Lieutenant of the several Counties to inform themselves of all such Abuses and Irregularities within their Lieutenantcies, and to make forthwith Report thereof to his Majesty, together with what they conceive fit to be done for redressing the same; and that thereupon his Majesty would give such farther Orders as should be requisite. On the 12th it was again published from Whitehall, That the King having declar'd his Resolution to preserve the Church of England in all its Rights and Immunities, his Majesty, as an Evidence of it, had signify'd his Pleasure to the Right Reverend Father in God, the Lord Bishop of Winchester, as Visitor of St. Mary Magdalen College in Oxford, to settle that Society regularly and statutablely."

And on the 17th a Proclamation was issu'd for restoring Corporations to their ancient Charters, Liberties, Rights and Franchises: And Orders of the Council for removing and displacing all Mayors, Sheriffs, Recorders, Town-Clerks, Aldermen, Common-Council-Men, &c. which had been put in by the late King, or his present Majesty, ever since the Year 1679.

All these reasonable Acts of Grace, we are taught to believe, were but as so many Tubs to the Whale; And it must be acknowledg'd, that his Majesty's Conduct during this Interval was not all of a Piece. Sir John Reresby observes, that in the Beginning of October a special Messenger came down to York with a Commission to purge the Corporation, to put out the former Lord Mayor, and to appoint others, almost all Papists (as were also the two Lords Lieutenants of Yorkshire, the Lord Thomas Howard, then his Majesty's Ambassador at Rome, and the Lord Fairfax) but that the said Commission was so defective, and so many Mistakes were made in the Execution of it, that it frustrated the Design. The baptizing the Infant Prince into the Roman Communion, the admitting the Pope to be his Godfather, and the making the Ceremonial solemn Article in the Gazette, is represented as another unpopular thing, and what might well be thought a design'd Insult upon the Protestant Religion.

The King had, indeed, so utterly lost his Credit with the Nation, and the Nation were so thoroughly sharpen'd against the King, that whatever had a Tendency to blacken him sunk easily into their Minds; and whatever, on the contrary, ought to have been admitted in extenuation of his Misdeeds, made no Impression at all. For the general, the People are apt to run into the opposite Extreme; to be struck with foolish Compassion for their Princes in distress; to accept of verbal Penitence; and to become the Bubbles of their own Credulity: But now, no Sign of Sorrow, no Acts of Grace; not even actual Restitution, could mollify them: Art had now got the better of Nature: Those who had first work'd up the Tempest took daily care to keep it raging; And hence it follow'd, that, while the Uproar lasted, the still Voice of Reason could not be heard.

Of all the Stories that were propagated at this time, none had so deeply affected the King in the Hearts of his Subjects, as those in relation to the young Prince's Birth; and now they grew louder, more frequent, and more fatal to him than ever. The Memorial before-quoted had been publish'd in Holland, and found its Way into England; almost every Hour gave birth to some new Whisper, in confirmation of the Imposture; and, to put it out of all Question, that nothing had been advanced on that Subject, which could not be demonstrated; it was even asserted, that the true Mother of the pretended Prince had made her Escape with a certain Lady to Holland, and would be brought over in the Dutch Fleet.

This was carrying the Charge as far as possible; and in exact proportion to the Confidence with which it was laid, it obtain'd Belief: Hence, when the Mischief had taken root in every Corner of the Kingdom, it came to be consider'd at Court, and his Majesty found himself under the cruel Necessity of making such an Enquiry, and publishing such a Report, as would have shock'd the Meanest of his Subjects.

October the 22d, the Privy-Council being extraordinarily assembled, and the King present, the Queen-Dowager, as also several of the Peers both Spiritual and Temporal, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Judges, &c. attended, by his Majesty's express Desire and Appointment, to whom he address'd himself, as follows:

"I have called you together upon a very extraordinary Occasion; but extraordinary Difficulties must have extraordinary Remedies. The malicious Endeavours of my Enemies have so poison'd the Minds of some of my Subjects, that, by the Reports I have from all Hands, I have Reason to believe, that many do think this Son, which God has pleas'd to bless me with, to be none of mine, but a suppos'd Child. But I may say, that, by a particular Providence, scarce any Prince was ever born, where there were so many Persons present. I have taken this time to have the Matter heard and examin'd here, expecting that the Prince of Orange, with the first easterly Wind, will invade this Kingdom; and therefore I thought it necessary to have it now done, in order to satisfy the Minds of my Subjects, and to prevent this Kingdom being engaged in Blood and Confusion after my Death."

His Majesty then call'd on the several Persons who had been present at the Queen's Labour, to declare what they knew concerning it, beginning with the Queen-Dowager; which many of them did in such broad Terms, that 'tis fit to spare Posterity the Blushes which must accompany the reading them:—Tho' some Extracts must be made, for Impartiality's sake. The Queen-Dowager was pleas'd to say, "That when the King sent for her to the Queen's Labour, she came as soon as she could, and never stirr'd from her till she was deliver'd of the (r) Prince of Wales." The Lady Powis, a Catholic, depos'd, That she was with the Queen a Quarter of an Hour before, and at, the Birth; that the Prince was the Child then born; and that she had never been from him one Day since. The Ladies Arvan and Rescouson, Protestants, depos'd, That they saw the Child taken out of the Bed. The Lady Peterborough, another Protestant, that she stood by the Bed-side while the Queen was deliver'd of the Prince of Wales. The Lady Fingal, a Catholic, that she stood by the Bed's-foot, when her Majesty was deliver'd of the said Prince. The Lady Bulkeby, another Catholic, that she heard the Queen say, Mrs. Wilke, don't part the Child! The Lady Bellagi, a Protestant, that she saw the Child taken out of the Bed; with the Addition of such other Circumstances, as she thought most convincing on such an Occasion. The Lady Wentworth, and the Lady Wadgrave, threw in other Circumstances of the like Nature; and the first of them, in particular, depos'd, That she did once feel the Child stir in the Queen's Belly, while her Majesty was in (s) Bed. Mrs. Dawson, a Bed-Chamber-Woman, swore, that she found the Queen alone, sitting on a Stool, when her Pains came on: That she receiv'd the Queen's Orders for preparing her Bed: That she saw Fire brought into the Queen's Room in a Warning-pan, to warm her Bed: That she saw the Queen go to Bed; and that she never stirr'd from her till her Majesty was deliver'd of a Son. Mrs. Brunley and Mrs. Tivini, two other Bed-Chamber-Women, depos'd, they were present all the Time of the Labour. Mrs. de Labadie, Dry-Nurse to the Prince, depos'd, That she receiv'd the Child from the Midwife, and took care of it till she had done with the Queen, &c. &c. Mrs. Wilke, the Midwife, depos'd, That she made the Bed for the Queen, in the Presence of most of the Ladies; and omitted no one Circumstance necessary to prove a Labour and Delivery: And Mrs. Pearse, the Queen's Laundress, swore, That she saw the Prince of Wales given by the Midwife to Mrs. Labadie; and that she and her Maids receiv'd the Linen from the Queen, &c. This is the Sum of the Evidence deliver'd by the Ladies, &c. except that by Lady Sunderland, which requires to be made a separate Article.

Concerning this Enquiry, Bishop Burnet Dr. Burnet's writes as follows: "It was at first prov'd, Obedience, P. 1. p. 785. that the Queen was deliver'd a-bed, while many were in the Room; and that they saw the Child soon after he was taken from the Queen by the Midwife. But in this (the taking the Child from the Queen must be understood) the Midwife was the single Witness, for none of the Ladies had felt the Child in the Queen's Belly. The Countess of Sunderland did indeed depose, That the Queen call'd to her to put her Hand, that she might feel how the Child lay: To which she added, Which I did; but did not say, whether she felt the Child or not: And she told the Duchess of Hamilton, from whom I had it, that, when she put her Hand into the Bed, the Queen

Queen held it, and let it go no lower than her Breasts; so that she really felt nothing. And this Deposition, brought to make a Shew, was an Evidence against the Matter, rather than for it; and was a violent Presumption of an Imposture, and of an Artifice to cover it.

The Lady Sunderland's Evidence, taken together, was as follows: "That, when she came to the Queen, her Majesty told her she believ'd it would not be her Labour: That the Bed was warm'd; that the Queen went into it; that she persisted in her Opinion, that she should not be brought to bed a good while; that the Midwife, on the contrary, assuring her that she would have but one thorough Pain to bring the Child into the World, her Majesty reply'd, It is impossible.— The Child lies too high;— and commanded her to lay her Hand on her Belly: "Which, continues she, I did;— and, after the great Pain came, the Queen was deliver'd of a Son, and I made a Sign to the King, that it was a Son."

The Evidence of the Lords who attended his Majesty in the Queen's Bed-Chamber, during the Labour, is less circumstantial than that of the Ladies; for which Reason it is needful to repeat it, except that the Earl of Craven, a Protestant, said, "I took that particular Mark of the Child that I aver that the Prince of Wales is that very Child, that then was brought out of the Queen's Bed-Chamber."

Dr. Witherly and Dr. Waldgrove (the first a Protestant, the second a Catholic) depos'd, that they were present at the Birth; that they follow'd Mrs. Labadie, who had the Child, into the next Room; and that there they assisted at the administering to him a certain Remedy against Convulsions, which the Queen and the Ladies had prescrib'd. Dr. Scarborough and Dr. Brady, both Protestants, depos'd, That they assisted on the same Occasion, &c.; and Mr. St. Anand, the King's Apothecary, a Protestant likewise, that he was present with them, and that he made up the Medicines for her Majesty, which the said Physicians had prescrib'd.

The Depositions were in all forty; and, when they were clos'd, his Majesty, after touching on the Excess made by the Princess Anne for not being there, again address'd himself to those present, in the following earnest and pathetic Words:

"And now my Lords, altho' I did not question, but every Person here present was satisfy'd before; yet, by what you have heard, you will be the better able to satisfy others. Besides, could I and the Queen have been thought so wicked as to endeavour to impose a Child upon the Nation, you see how impossible it would have been: Neither could I myself have been impos'd upon, having continually been with the Queen during her being with Child, and the whole Time of her Labour: And therefore there are none of you but will easily believe me, who suffer'd so much for Conscience-sake, incapable of so great a Villany, to the Prejudice of my own Children. I thank God, those that know me know well, that it is my Principle to do as I would be done by; and I would rather die a thousand Deaths, than do the least Wrong to any of my Children."

To close on this Head: These Depositions were severally read over in the Court of Chancery, on the 27th, to the several Deponents; and, after having been solemnly sworn to, were enter'd, as a perpetual Record and Appeal to the Judgment of After-ages. They were afterwards made public, to very little purpose, says Bp. Kennet, without stopping to give his Readers any Insight into their Contents. And Bishop Burnet pronounces, that they had an Effect quite contrary to the Expectation of the Court. "The Presumption of Law (proceeds his Lordship) before this was all in favour of the Birth, since the Parents own'd the Child: So that the Proof lay on the other Side, and ought to be offered by those who called it in question. But now that this Proof was brought, which was so apparently defective, it did not lessen but increase the Jealousy with which the Nation was possess'd: For all People concluded, that, if the thing had been true, it must have been easy to have brought a much more copious Proof than was now published to the World. It was much observ'd, that Princess Anne was not present. She indeed excus'd herself. She thought she was breeding: And all Motion was forbidden her. None believed that to be the true Reason; for it was thought, that the going from one Apartment of the Court to another could not hurt her. So it was look'd on as a Colour, that shew'd she did not believe the thing, and that therefore she would not by her being present seem to give any Credit to it."

It must be own'd, that the Jaundice of Parties is very apt to give strange Colours to Things: But neither the Conceptions nor Representations of the distemper'd Person affect the Object; that always continues the same, however the Sight may alter: And hence it may become a Question, whether the Princess did not believe the thing, or would not be thought to believe it? In the Memorial above-quoted, it is affirm'd, that her Highness was advis'd to use the loosening Waters of the Bath, that she might be out of the Way at the Time of the Birth: And this Historian of his own Times takes a great deal of (g) Pains to prove the same Fact; and also

(g) "The Princess had miscarri'd in the Spring. So, as soon as she had recover'd her Strength, the King press'd her to go to the Bath, since that had so good an Effect on the Queen. Some of her Physicians, and all her other Parents, were against her going. Leaver, one of her Physicians, told me he was against it: He thought she was not strong enough for the Bath, tho' the King press'd it with an unusual Vehemence. Millington, another Physician, told the Earl of Serouffrey, from whom I had it, that he was press'd to go to the Princess, and advise her to go to the Bath. The Person that spoke to him told him, the King was much set on it, and that he expected it of him, that he would persuade her to it. Millington answer'd, he would advise a Patient according to Direction, but according to make some very notable Use of it: While, on the contrary, we are told, from the Account of Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, his Fellow-labourer in the same Cause, That he, the said Bishop of St. Asaph, did actually ask the Princess herself, whether she was sent to the Bath? and that she answer'd, No; that she went upon the Advice of her Physicians. We find it elsewhere asserted, in so many Words, "That, if the Absence of the Princess of Denmark was a Fault, it could not be attributed to the King or Queen, since she was not commanded out of Town." And whereas, in the Sequel of her Answer to Dr. Lloyd, she is made to say, "That she stay'd there longer than she would have done, before she could get leave to come home;" we find it also asserted, That her Royal Highness was sent for as soon as the Queen fell ill; and that the Distance of Place requiring so much Time for the Messenger to go, and the Princess to come, it was as impossible for the Queen to stay for her, as it would have been for the Princess to make the Queen the like Compliment in the like Circumstance.—Besides, she actually did return to Town on the 15th of June; and, if she had found any Difficulty in the Point of Leave, it must be presum'd the same Difficulty would have continued for some Days longer; since her Suspicions and Enquiries might have been as mischievous then, as at any time before. Lastly, if any Credit is to be given to the Reports of those Times, the Lord Churchill was one of the Persons summon'd by his Majesty's Command (it must be presum'd, on the Princess's Behalf, because of the great Confidence repos'd in his Lady by her Highness); and, as she was so deeply concern'd in the Event, and an Imposition was so universally apprehended, it is Matter of no small Astonishment, that he also should chuse to be out of the way.

To leave this Mystery veil'd over as we found it: All this while the King was not contented barely to redress the Grievances of his People, or endeavour to set a Gloss on his own Character; but proceeded to make such Preparations on all Sides, as seem'd to argue, that he was firmly resolv'd to make a Defence worthy of himself and his Kingdoms: He order'd new Levies to be made, both of Soldiers and Seamen; he gave out Commissions to such of the Nobility and Gentry as offer'd their Service to him in this Time of Need; among whom we find the Names of the Duke of Newcastle; the Earls of Derby, Lindsey, Pembroke, Westmorland, Aylesbury, Burlington, and DANBY; the Viscount Falckenberg; the Lord Brandon, Son to the Earl of Macclesfield; the Lords Jermyn and Huntingtower; the Marquis de Mirmont, Nephew to the Earl of Ferensham; Col. James Gage, &c. And he not only took care to render his Fleet as formidable as possible, by the Addition of Fireships, &c. but also endeavour'd to reconcile the Seamen to their Duty, by placing the Lord Dartmouth at their Head, whom even Bishop Burnet styles one of the worthiest Men of his Court: He gave Directions for raising the Militia of the several Counties, and that those of London should hold themselves in readiness to march: He caus'd three thousand Scots to take post at Carlisle, and two thousand five hundred more to be landed at Closter from Ireland: That Kingdom he was in no Pain about, for Lord Tyrconnel had made himself absolute: And as to Scotland, he had receiv'd Assurances from his Privy-Council there, That they had taken the proper Measures to put the whole Kingdom in Arms; that their Behaviour should be exemplary to his other Subjects, on that great and extraordinary Occasion; and that they hop'd all who were call'd would express a Zeal suitable to the Duty they ow'd to so great and good a Prince, in whose Preservation all their Happiness lay.

The King had also the Pleasure of seeing himself surrounded with Volunteers of Quality and Distinction, who all seem'd ambitious of drawing their Swords in his Quarrel, and if Need were, of dying in his Defence. At the Head of these, appear'd the young Duke of Ormond, who had just been honour'd with the Garter, in Acknowledgment of the Merits and Services of his illustrious Father and Grand-father, and in his Train Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont, and the other Officers lately cashier'd, on account of their Behaviour at Perthmouth.

To improve all these flattering Circumstances, and that his Subjects might crowd with more Alacrity to his Standards, his Majesty condescended to displace several of his Catholic Lord-Lieutenants, and to promote Protestants in their Room. Sir Edward Hales, who was far obnoxious to the City, was moreover remov'd from his Government of the Tower; and the Duke of Grafton, who had aspir'd to the Command of the Fleet, and who had thrown some Discontent on Lord Dartmouth's Preference, was appointed to succeed him.

As a farther Precaution, a Proclamation was set forth, "commanding all Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Sheriffs, and other Officers civil and military, in the respective Counties, Cities, &c. to cause the Court to be carefully watched; and, upon the first Approach of the Enemy, to his own Reson: So he would not go. Sarborough and Wiltshire took it upon them to advise it: So she went thither in the End of May.

As soon as she was gone, those about the Queen did all of the sudden change her Reasoning, and began it from the King's being with her at Bath. "This comes on so quick, that, tho' the Queen had set the footmen of Yorkshire for going to Windsor, where she intended to lie in, and all the Preparations for the Birth and for the Child were order'd to be made ready by the End of June, yet now a Resolution was taken for the Queen's lying in at St. James's; and Directions were given to have all things quietly ready. The Barb Water either did not agree with the Princess; or the Advice of her Friends were so pressing, who thought her Absence from the Court at that time of such Consequence, that in compliance with them she gave it out, it did not, and that therefore she would remain in a few Days.

The Day after the Court had this Notice, the Queen said, she would go to St. James's, and look for the good Hour. She was then told, that it was impossible upon to find a Woman to have things ready. But she was to suppose, that the fact, she would be there that Night, &c. [Pag. 4. p. 250. 251.]

Enemy, all Horses, Oxen, and Cattle, which might be fit for Burden or Draught, and not actually employ'd in the Service and Defence of his Majesty and the Country, to be driven and remov'd to the Space at least of twenty Miles from the Place where the Enemy should attempt to land."

Extraordinary Prayers in his Chapel.

And, besides all these human Preparations, we are told extraordinary Prayers of forty Hours were said in the King's Chapel; the Host was expos'd; and the whole Possé of Priests on the Royal Establishment weary'd Heaven with their Importunities for the King's, but more for their own, Preservation. But this Scene of Devotion was of no long Continuance; for the Mob, taking Advantage of the present disjointed State of Things, had declar'd War against all popish Chapels; and, as no one knew how far their present Fury might carry them, his Majesty thought fit to shut up his own: This, according to some, struck a Panic into his Priests; all of whom made haste to flit for themselves; in the Persuasion, that, if the King could not protect his Religion, neither could he protect them.

[Life of King William, v. 1. p. 337.]

But there is Reason to think, that this Dread and Dismay of the Priests did not take place just at this particular time. In collecting his Strength, the King began to recover his Confidence; and, to shew that he did so, no sooner were the Depositions relating to the Birth of his Son deliver'd in, than he let forth a Proclamation, which partook of the old Leaven, and shew'd, that he thought himself still in a Condition to prescribe as well as capitulate.

Proclamation to restrain the spreading of false News.

It is intitled, A Proclamation to restrain the spreading of false News; but, after a Complaint, that divers evil-dispos'd Persons made it their Business to defame the Government; and that, notwithstanding the great and heavy Penalties that such Persons were liable to by the Statutes, there had been of late more bold and licentious Discourses, both public and private, than formerly, it proceeds to say, "We therefore, considering that Offences of this sort proceed from the restless Malice of some Persons, or from the careless Desecration of others, who presume too much on our accustomed Clemency and Goodness, have thought fit, by this our Royal Proclamation, by and with the Advice of our Privy-Council, straitly to forewarn and command all our Subjects, of what State or Condition they be, that they presume not henceforth, either by writing, printing, or speaking, to utter or publish any false News or Reports whatsoever, or to intermeddle with the Affairs of State or Government, or with the Person of any of our Counsellors and Ministers, in their common and ordinary Discourses, as they will answer the contrary at their utmost Perils." And, in the Conclusion, the same Woes are denounced against such as should listen to false News, without turning Informers, as those who breach'd it.

Nor was this all; for, in the same Gazette which contains this menacing Piece, we are inform'd, that his Majesty had remov'd Lord Sunderland out of the Secretary's Office, and appointed the Lord Viscount Prosper to succeed him. This argued a total Change of Councils and Measures: That the Catholic Interest was again uppermost; that the King no longer intended to proceed on the Plan which that Minister had laid down, of maintaining the Throne, by giving Satisfaction to his People; and that, for the future, he would carry things with as high a Hand as ever: At least we are so taught to reason and conclude, by the Earl's own Paper, in which he discourtes concerning his own Administration and Disgrace in the following Terms: "These things (meaning the several Condescensions which he had induc'd his Majesty to make) were done effectually, by the Help of some about the King; and it was then thought I had destroy'd myself, by engaging again the whole Roman-Catholic Party to such a Height as had not been seen. They dispos'd Libels of me every day; told the King that I betray'd him; that I ruin'd him, by persuading him to make such shameful Condescensions; but, most of all, by hindering the securing the chief of the disaffected Nobility and Gentry, which was propos'd as a certain Way to break all the Prince's Measures; and by advising his Majesty to call a free Parliament, and to depend upon that, rather than upon foreign Assistance. It is true, I did give him those Councils, which were called weak; in the last Moment he suffer'd me in his Service. Then I was accus'd of holding Correspondence with the Prince; and it was every where said, amongst them, that no better could be expected from a Man so related as I was to the Bedford and Leicester Families, and so ally'd to Duke Hamilton and the Marquis of Lullifax. After this, Accusations of High-Treason were brought against me; which, with some other Reasons, relating to Affairs abroad, drew the King's Displeasure upon me, so as to turn me out of all, without any Consideration: And yet I thought I escap'd well; expecting nothing less than the Loss of my Head, as my Lord Malbroug can tell; and I believe none about the Court thought otherwise; nor had it been otherwise, if my Disgrace had been deferred a Day longer; all things being prepar'd for it: I was put out the 27th of October; the Roman Catholics having been two Months working the King up to it, without Intermision; besides several Attacks they had made upon me at home, and the unusual Assistance they had obtain'd to do what they thought so necessary for the carrying on their Affairs, of which they never had greater Hope than at that time, as may be remember'd by any who were then at London."

By these Expressions of his Lordship's, unusual Assistance, possibly we ought to understand, that the Queen, who had hitherto been led by him, now turn'd thort upon him, and headed the Party against him: But, as to his dark Hint in relation to Affairs abroad, unless it can be suppos'd that he really was in the Prince of Orange's Secret, and that his Perfidiousness had been detected, as so many have

(j) furnis'd, and he himself has not positively deny'd; it is utterly unintelligible: But, if he was in his Highness's Secret, it is plain he acted a double Part, with respect both to the King and him; and his Disgrace ought to have been the least Part of his Punishment.

Not to be too particular on the Fate of a Minister, when the Fate of a whole Government is in the Scales, we must now cross the Ocean again, in order to continue the Connection of foreign Affairs with our own.

Foreign Affairs.

The Emperor's Successes against the Turks.

Thro' the whole Course of this Summer, both the Emperor and the Venetians had carry'd on their War against the Turks, with almost uninterrupted Success: The Prince and States of Transylvania had revolted from the latter, and, by a formal Instrument, put themselves under the Protection of his Imperial Majesty: The Elector of Bavaria, after a long and obstinate Resistance, had taken the Town and Castle of Belgrade by Storm, by which a Passage was open'd not only into Serbia and Bulgaria, but likewise into Romania, and even to Constantinople itself. Difficulties and Commotions fill'd that City of course, and, in dread of worse Consequences, from the Pursuit of so fatal a Quarrel, the Divan thought it expedient to sue for a Peace: On the other hand, their Proposals were rudely listen'd to by the Imperial Court, who desir'd nothing more than to bear leisure on that Side, in order to be in readiness to improve the favourable Crisis, which they expected soon to take place on the other.

The Dutch.

Every one of these Circumstances gave a sensible Alarm to his most Christian Majesty and his Ministers, who very well knew, if the Storm had Time to gather where it would certainly fall: That, therefore, the Turks might be encourag'd to continue the War, that the Alliances form'd in the Empire might not have Time to take effect, and that the Impression they design'd to make might be made while the Dutch were embroil'd with England, it was resolv'd to carry the Flame of War once more into the Bowels of Germany, and the necessary Dispositions were forthwith directed and completed accordingly.

France last Siege to Philippsburg.

In the Cabinets of most Princes, it is usual to take the Resolution first, and to find a Colour afterwards: but, in the Case before us, the Train was laid and fir'd at the same Instant. On the 20th of October N. S. the Dauphin laid Siege to Philippsburg; and, after the Trenches were open'd, appear'd a Manifesto, which was to convince the World, that in so doing his most Christian Majesty was right: For therein it is asserted, that the Emperor had, on all Occasions, declar'd himself an Enemy to France: That the Truce was no sooner made, than he enter'd into Cabals to break it: That Alliances had actually been form'd for that End, as appear'd by the League of Ausburg, and the Congress at Nuremberg: That he had rejected the Motions which had been made him, even by the Pope himself, for converting the Truce into a Peace: That he entertain'd Designs to force the Electors to chuse his Son King of the Romans: That, at the Instigation of the Electors-Palatine, he had given ear to the Overtures of the Turks, in order to the turning of his Arms against France: That the said Elector had refus'd to give the Duches of Orleans Satisfaction, with regard to her Claims on the Estate of her Brother the late Palatine: That the said Elector had been the original Promoter of the Feuds then subsisting about the Electorate of Cologne, by caballing first in favour of one of his own Sons, and then of Prince Clement of Bavaria, in hope that the Bavarian Succession would thereby devolve to his own Family: That it was owing to the Emperor's Instances, that the Cardinal of Ferentino had been excluded, in prejudice of the Rights of the Chapter, and in contempt both of Canons and Treaties: That his Imperial Majesty had enter'd into Concert with several Protestant Powers, in support of Prince Clement; and had even provided Protestant Troops for his Defence, to the manifest Danger of the Catholic Religion in that Country: That having Reason to apprehend, that the same Concert would be made use of against France itself, and that Philippsburg in such case would be favourable to their Designs, the most Christian King had resolv'd to possess himself of it, and afterwards demolish it: That he also design'd to take Kaiserslauter from the Electors-Palatine, and to keep it till the Duches of Orleans receiv'd Satisfaction: And that he was resolv'd to maintain the Rights of the Cardinal, and the Chapter of Cologne. On the other hand, he declar'd, That he had recourse to the Sword, only for the sake of re-establishing the Peace; and, in order thereto, he offer'd to the House of Bavaria,

(j) The Occasion of his Disgrace was this: Skelton, to justify his Conduct in France, told the King, that, having receiv'd Informations of the Prince's Design from Mr. Bald de Percey, he had writen six or seven Letters about it to the Earl, to which being an Answer, he had apply'd himself to the King of France, who thereupon dispatch'd Bezepe to England, and sent Orders to his Ambassador at the Hague to expulate with the States the Relations of their warlike Preparations. This Account of Skelton began to raise Suspitions against the Prime-Minister; which were soon after increas'd by the Discovery of one Richford, formerly a Monk, who, being accus'd for holding Correspondence with the King's Enemies, and examin'd before the Council, charged the Earl of Southwell, to his very Face, with revealing his Majesty's Secrets to the Prince of Orange; whereupon Richford was committed to the Callosity of a Messenger, from whence he made his Escape. This Accusation, from a Man of his Character, had been little regarded as another Injustice; but agreeing exactly with that of Skelton, the Earl's past Conduct was more notably form'd; and the King call'd to mind, that the very same Person who had all along advis'd him to strengthen his Authority by the Alliance and Power of France, had made him reject that Alliance, when he had most Need of it; which persuaded his Majesty that he was employ'd in another Interest, and which occasion'd the Earl's Removal from his several Places. 'Tis reported, that, to convince the Earl, the King shew'd him the Original of a certain Treaty, which he answer'd he had never seen, and which the Earl's Enemies had had transacted to the Prince of Orange: That the Earl positively deny'd it, adding, that as for Skelton's Letters, it is given an Account of them to the King, 'twas not because he had Intelligence with the Prince of Orange, but because he had an invincible Contempt for Skelton, who never wrote but scandalous News. [Life of K. Will. 2. p. 352, 353.]

Bavaria, that Prince Clement should be choic'd Coadjutor; as also to raise Friburg, and to restore Kasparjauter, on the Condition above-specify'd: He moreover demanded, that the Truce between him and the Emperor might be turn'd into a Peace, under the Mediation of the King of England and the Republic of Venice: And, lastly, he declar'd, that he would not hold himself oblig'd to stand to these Conditions, unless they were accepted before January (1).

A friend against the Pope.

About the same time also, the eldest Son of the Church came to a Resolution to humble his most Holy Father the Pope: And of this likewise all Europe was appriz'd by another (m) Manifesto, in the Form of a Letter to Cardinal d'Esprez, to be by him communicated to his Holiness. In this were enumerated all the several Instances of Partiality, which he had shewn, during his whole Pontificate, in Favour of the House of Austria, and to the Detriment of France: He mention'd the Business of the Regale; his refusing the Bulls to the Bishops nominated by him; the Dispute about the Franchises, of which his Embassadors had been long in possession; the denying Audience, not only to his Embassador, but to a Gentleman whom he had sent to Rome without a Character, and with a Letter written in his own Hand; He charged him with breaking the Canons of the Church, in granting Bulls in favour of Prince Clement, and in denying Justice to Cardinal Turlemburg: "After such Proofs of Partiality, continued he, I can no longer acknowledge him as Mediator in the Contest between my Sister-in-law and the House of Newburg; and I myself best know how to do her Justice.— Nor can I suffer my Ally the Duke of Parma to be any longer depriv'd of his Estates of Castro and Ravenniana, in which he was re-establish'd in virtue of the first Article of the Treaty of Pisa, of which I was Guarantee.— I shall, therefore, cause my Troops to march into Italy, there to continue till those Estates are restor'd to him: And, in the mean time, I shall take possession of Avignon, either to restore it again when the said Treaty of Pisa is entirely fulfilled, or else to detain it, and to give the Duke the Money for which it was mortgaged, by way of Compensation for the Damages which he has sustain'd, by being so long kept out of Possession." In fine, he makes no Difficulty to accuse his Holiness of having done his best to plunge all Europe in a general War. "It is his ill Conduct, says he, which has given the Prince of Orange the Boldness to make such Preparations, as argue a settled Design to attack the King of England in his own Dominions, and even to urge the Preservation of the Protestant Religion for his Excuse. It is this which has given the said Prince's Embassaries and Writers in Holland

A. D. 1688.

(1) "This Declaration (says our Historian of his own Time) was much censur'd, both for the Matter and for the Style. It had not the Air of Gratitude, which became crowned Heads. The Duchess of Orleans's Pretensions to old Flanders was a strange Rise to a War; especially when it was not allow'd, that there had been demitted in the Form of Law, and that Justice had been denied, which was a Course necessarily to be observ'd in Things of that Nature. The judging of the secret Intentions of the Elector Palatine, with relation to the House of Bavaria, was absurd. And the Complaints of Delign to bring the Emperor to a Peace with the Turks, that he might make war on France, was only an Emperor's Design to force an Election of a King, of his Interest, was the coming into the secret of these Thoughts, which were only known to God. Such Conjectures, to remove and succeed, and that could not be proved, were a strange Ground of War. If this was once admitted, all Treaties of Peace were vain things, and were casuist or relied on. The Reason given of the Intention to take Philipp, because it was the proposed Peace by which France could be invaded; was a throwing off all Regards to the common Decencies observ'd by Princes. All fortified Places on Frontiers are intended both for Resistance and for Magazines; and are, of both Sides, Conveniences for entering into the neighbouring Territory, as there is Occasion for it. So here was a Pretence for beginning a War, that put an end to all the Securities of Peace."

The Bishop of Colgne was judg'd by the Pope, according to the Laws of the Empire: And his Sentence was said: "Nor could the Dissolution of the Majority of the Chapter be valid, unless two Thirds join'd in it. The Cardinal was commended in the Manifesto, for his Care in preserving the Peace of Europe. This was ridiculous to all, who knew that he had been for many Years the great Intendant, who had betray'd the Empire, chiefly in the Year 1672. The Charge that the Emperor's Agent had laid on him (the Cardinal) before the Chapter was also complain'd of, as an Infradition of the Amnesty stipulated by the Peace of Nimwegen. He was not intord to be call'd to an account, in order to be punish'd for any thing done before that Peace. But that did not bind up the Emperor from endeavouring to exclude him from so great a Dignity, which was like to prove fatal to the Empire. There were some of the Counsellors that put'd on this Manifesto; which was indeed look'd on, by all who had consider'd the Rights of Peace and the Laws of War, as one of the most srownd and solemn Declarations that ever was made, of the Perfidiousness of that Court. And it was thought to be some Degrees beyond that in the Year

1672; in which that King's Glory was stretch'd as the chief Motive of that War. For, in that, Particulars were not reckon'd up; So it might be suppos'd he had met with Astron, which he did not think consistent with his Greatness to be mention'd. But here all that could be thought on, even the Hangings of Hollidore, were enumerated: And altogether amounting to this, that the King of France thought himself slay'd by no Person; but that when he suspected his Neighbours were intending to make war upon him, he might, upon such a Suspicion, begin a War on his part." [Ed. 1. p. 774, 775.]

(2) About this time, Mr. Barillon caus'd the Proceedings of the Parliament of Paris, and the Declaration of the Commons concerning the Justification of the Pope, to be publish'd in English; and it is remarkable, that, in the latter, the following Propositions are laid down: "That God gave to St. Peter and his Successors, Vicars of Christ, and to the Church herself, Power of spiritual Things, pertaining to eternal Life, but not of civil and temporal Matters. For the Lord said, My Kingdom is not of this World; and again, Render unto Caesar the Things that are Caesar's; and unto God, the things that are God's. And therefore that of the Apostle must stand, But every Soul be subject to the higher Powers: For there is no Power but of God, the Powers that be are ordain'd of God; whosoever therefore resisteth the Power, resisteth the Ordinance of God.— Therefore Kings and Princes are not subject to Temporals to any ecclesiastical Power by the Ordinance of God, either as they, by the Authority of the Keys of the Church, directly or indirectly, be depos'd, or their Subjects shew'd from their Faith and Obedience, and Oath of Allegiance which they have taken.— And this to be firmly retained, as necessary to the public Peace, and not less useful in the Church than to the State, as being consonant to the Word of God, and Tradition of the Fathers."

We find also the following Article in the State of Europe, for the Month of November 1688: "The Lord Hunsard, Embassador Extraordinary from his Majesty of Great Britain, has had Audience of his Holiness, and has given him to understand the Danger that threatens his Master from the Enterprise of the Prince of Orange. He said, that he frankly told him, That, if he (the Pope) had taken other Measures, no such thing could have happen'd; and that he was to be answerable for it, both before God and Man. He further added, That he is to have his Audience of Leave very speedily; and that his Majesty will send no more Ministers to Rome, unless there be an Alteration in the Face of Affairs."

A. D. 1688. land the Insolence to treat the Birth of the Prince of Wales as an Impollure, and to excite the British Subjects to a Revolt: And, lastly, it is this which has encourag'd the said Prince to avail himself of the Necessity which has constrain'd me to send my Forces into Germany, in defence of the Cardinal and Chapter of Cologne." &c. (n)

He joins Avignon; takes Philippsburg, &c.

It must be confess'd, that, upon all such Occasions as these, his most Christian Majesty was always as good as his Word. Thus we find him Master of Avignon, a Day before his Forces fat down before Philippsburg; and of Philippsburg, on the 1st of November following; he also oblig'd Mentz, Triers, and Heidelberg, to receive French Garrisons; bombard'd Coblenz, reduced Manheim, Frankendale, Heilbron, Spire, Keyserlauter; and, in one Word, laid the whole Palatinate under Contribution.

Prints Clement, 1688. The Prince of Orange, one of the Canons, by virtue of a Procurator from Prince Clement, took possession of the Archbishopric and Electorate, in his Highness's Name; and, what was still worse, the City could not be prevail'd upon even to accept of a Neutrality from France, but, on the contrary, admitted a Garrison for their new Lord of six thousand Men; in consequence of which, his Highness of Orange, and the States, having nothing to apprehend on that Side, had full Leisure to prosecute their Design upon England.

The great Monarch was, however, disappointed in his Designs upon Cologne. On the 5th of October N. S. the Prince de Croÿ, one of the Canons, by virtue of a Procurator from Prince Clement, took possession of the Archbishopric and Electorate, in his Highness's Name; and, what was still worse, the City could not be prevail'd upon even to accept of a Neutrality from France, but, on the contrary, admitted a Garrison for their new Lord of six thousand Men; in consequence of which, his Highness of Orange, and the States, having nothing to apprehend on that Side, had full Leisure to prosecute their Design upon England.

Thus, by a wonderful Coincidence of Interests and Circumstances, the Prince of Orange had the Pleasure to see his own Country in a State of Security, and to find himself in a Condition to undertake the great Experiment, on which he had grounded all the Hopes and Expectations of his Life. How cheerfully and unanimously he was assisted in it by the States, we have already seen: And, for what regarded the People, we are further told, by Bishop Burnet, that Pensioner Fogel furnish'd all the eminent Ministers of the chief Towns of Holland with Arguments and Inducements to reconcile them to an Adventure, which was like to bring the very Being of their State into Danger: But then he also tells us, that they were reconcil'd to it, from an Apprehension, that the very Being of their State would have been equally in Danger, if they had not engag'd in it: For, says his Lordship, in their remarkable Words, "The Publication of the Alliance between France and England by the French Ambassador, made them conclude, that England would join with France. They reckon'd, they could not stand before such an united Force; and that, THEREFORE, it was necessary to take England out of the Hands of a Prince, who was such a firm Ally to France."

The whole State being thus actuated by one and the same Spirit, his Highness, and his faithful and zealous Coadjutor Fogel, had nothing to do but to economise their System, and put it into Motion. The great Men of England, who had invited the Prince to their Assistance, had advis'd him to have but a small Army, not above six or seven thousand, and a large Fleet, to avoid the Suspicion, or perhaps to prevent the Danger of a Conquest: But his Highness, it seems, could not be prevail'd upon to adopt that Opinion: He was for making sure Work, if possible; nor would venture without such a Force, as should bid fair to master the King's, and by consequence the People. Accordingly, he draughted out upwards of ten thousand Foot and about four thousand Horse, being the Flower of the Dutch Forces; and prevail'd with the Elector of Brandenburg to suffer Marshal Schomberg, then in his Electoral Highness's Service, to pass into his, that he might now have the Benefit of that Skill and Experience, which he had formerly found superior to his own.

The Command at Sea was given to Admiral Herbert; tho' not freely; for both the Prince and the States, we are told, thought it an absurd thing to commit that Power and Trust to a Stranger: But nothing less, it seems, would content him; and, in the Persuasion that his Name, Interest, and Character, might be a Means to induce the English Fleet to revolt, it was thought advisable to give him his own Term.

About this time, Intelligence had been sent to the Hague from England, that Strickland lay in the Downs, with no more than eighteen or twenty Men of War; but that a much greater Force was providing: In hope, therefore, either to seduce or surprize them, Herbert, for his first Service, had Orders to stand over with the Dutch Fleet, and make the Experiment: But the Winds proving contrary, and the Weather extremely tempestuous, instead of the Success propos'd, he was glad to return to Port in Safety; and that he did so, was almost as satisfactory to the States, who, during the Interval, had been

He goes in part of the English in the Downs.

And he forced back by bad Weather.

(n) Our Historian has also undertaken the Defence of his Holiness against the Force of this Manifesto, as of the Emperor against the other, in the following Words:

"It was strange to see the Disputes about the Franchises made a Pretext for a War: For certainly all sovereign Princes can make such Regulations as they think fit in their Matters. If they cut Ambassadors short in any Privilege, their Ambassadors are to expect the same Treatment from other Princes: And as long as the Sacredness of an Ambassador's Person, and of his Family, was still preserved, which was all that was a Part of the Law of Nations, Princes may certainly limit the Extent of their other Privileges, and may refuse any Ambassadors, who will not submit to their Regulation. The Number of an Ambassador's Retinue is not a thing that can be well discuss'd. But if an Ambassador comes with an Army about him, instead of a Retinue, he may be denied Admittance. And if he forces it, as Lascaris had done, it was certainly an Act of Hostility: And, instead of having a Right to the Characters of an Ambassador, he might well be considered and treated as an Enemy.

The Pope had observ'd the Canons in rejecting Cardinal Furber's defective Postulation. And, whatever might be brought from ancient Canons, the Practice of that Church for many Ages allow'd, of the Dispensation that the Pope granted to Prince Clement. It was looked on by all People, as a strange Reversal of Things, to see the King of France, after all his Cruelty to the Protestants, now go to make war on the Pope; and, on the other hand, to see the whole Protestant Body concurring to support the Authority of the Pope's Bulls in the Baniets of Cologne; and to defend the two Houses of Austria and Bavaria, by whom they were laid to low but threescore Years before this."

A. D. 1688. been in continual Pain for their Navy, as a Victory.

It was this Misadventure that gave rise to the Advices which were sent to England, That the Dutch Fleet had been disabled, and driven home to refit: For we find an Article to that purpose, in the very same Gazette, which contains the Order for re-settling Magdalen College: And as to the Effect of those Advices, we are assur'd almost on all (s) Hands, that they produced an immediate Countermand of that Order: That the Bishop of Winchester, who, as Visitor, had set out for Oxford to put it in execution, was on some frivolous Pretence recalled; that the whole Proceeding was at a stand, till, by farther Advices, the King was better inform'd; and that this above all things confirm'd the Public in their Suspicion, that his Majesty's Concessions did not flow from his Heart; and that what he had granted, when the Tempest was rising, he would vacate when it was blown over.

At the Hague, in the mean while, such Disputes arose among the Prince's English Counsellors, as greatly embarrass'd him. Among the Requisites for so immense an Undertaking, a Manifesto or Declaration held a principal Place; for the Justification of those concern'd, in the Eyes of the World; and for inducing the Bulk of the Nation to follow their Example: This Article, we are inform'd, had been thought of by several Persons; and, out of their several Essays, Penfioner Fogel, by his Highness's Direction, form'd such a Draught, as would best serve the Purpose in view: Bishop Burnet, who had the Honour to put it in English, calls it a long and heavy one; takes notice, that the Penfioner was fond of it; and does not forget to observe, that he (the Bishop) nevertheless got it to be much shortned. This was shewn to the English Nobility and Gentry at the Hague, who were Joint-Adventurers with his Highness, and among the rest to Willman, who, notwithstanding the Breach of Faith laid to his Charge by the Duke of Monmouth, had still his Followers and Admirers: But he, it seems, had made a Draught of his own, in which he had coupl'd the Grievances of the last Reign with those of this; had laid down a Scheme of Government; and had endeavour'd to set Firebrands between the Prince and the Church: When, therefore, he saw the Spirit which prevail'd in the Penfioner's, he was so far from approving it, that he rais'd a violent Opposition to it, which was carry'd to such a Height, that many refus'd to engage on those Grounds; among whom our Historian particularly mentions the Earl of Macclesfield and Lord (p) Mordaunt. On the other hand, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Mess. Sydney, Russell, &c. appear'd as violent against Willman's System, as he and his Friends appear'd against the Penfioner's: They said, that a Retrospect to the Reign of King Charles would disgust many of the Nobility and Gentry, and almost all the Clergy: That the Declaration was to be so conceiv'd, as to draw in the Body of the Nation: That the Discussion of the Laws and Government did not belong to the Prince, but to the Parliament. The Dispute was stily maintain'd on both Sides; but at last it ended in a Compromise: Some things were omitted, some were alter'd, and, upon the Whole, Policy got the better of Equity.

What came next under Consideration was, and the Manner of making their Attempt. Willman and his Faction were for sending out Herbert and the Men of War once more in quest of the English Fleet, that in case the Latter adher'd to the King, and ventur'd a Battle, the Former might fight under the less Disadvantage; as also, that, in case they were victorious, the Land-forces might have the Sea open to them, and of course have it in their Power to make their Descent where they pleas'd: And so plausible did this Proposition appear, and so warmly was it espous'd by the Majority, that nothing but the Prince's own Inflexibility could have set it aside. He urg'd, That the Season was already so far spent, that the losing Time was the losing every thing: That if two Fleets were equally desirous to engage, it might be long before they found an Opportunity; and if either had no such Desire, much longer: That it was utterly impossible to keep an Army on board Ship, in expectation of so precarious an Event; and, lastly, that if the Winter should set in with as much Severity as it sometimes did, their Ports would be frozen up; in which Case, neither the Transports could put to Sea, nor the Men of War return. But whatever Weight his Reasons had, we are taught to believe his Authority had more; and that, when the Contest was brought to an End, his Opponents were rather silenced than satisfi'd.

These Difficulties being thus got over, it was

Dispute rais'd in England, about the Damage they had sustain'd.

A. D. 1688.

(s) In Kennet, more particularly, we find the following Note:

"One of the new Fellows of Magdalen College, becoming afterwards Rector of Strabridge in the County of Gloucester, publish'd a Sermon on St. Barnabas' Day, in 1713, in the Preface where to he tells us, 'I happen'd to be Fellow of Magdalen College, when their blind and greedy Zeal began with some of the Heads of the University, and a Society thereof. All the rest must soon have taken their Turn likewise out of their Freeholds, had there not been a Prodigious Wind. Thereby hangs a Tale, which hath not been told publicly, that I know of; and I think it not unreasonable to tell it now, that we may thence learn how to trust Popery another time.' When the Prince of Orange, our late Sovereign of glorious Memory, was almost ready to embark, a kind of general Intimation was dispatch'd after us, to return from the several Counties whether we were sent a grazing. But when some of us were come back within four or five Hours of the University, a certain Notice was sent us on the Road, that we need not make much Haste, for that the Wind was chang'd at Court. But when, after some few Days, it was fear'd again there that the Prince would shortly arrive, we might go forward; and the Bishop of Winchester (the local Visitor) was sent down to reinstate us in our College: But his Lordship had scarce retir'd himself, before a Courier came and beat up his Quarters, and requir'd his Return to Court, without returning us to our own again: Tho' it was some at last, when there was a Protestant, or rather Presbiterial, Wind again." [Kennet, vol. iii. p. 122.]

(p) The Author of this Work has been assur'd, that, in the Margin of Bishop Burnet's History, now remaining in the Peterborough Family, there are several direct Contradictions, in the broadest Terms, to several Passages of it, in the late Earl's own Hand.

A. D. 1688.
The Army and

was forthwith resolv'd to put the Machine in Motion: Five hundred Sail of Transports were hir'd in three Days time; the Troops had Orders to march from Nimeguen, where till now they had continued encamp'd, and to embark in the Zuyder Sea: Twenty thousand spare Arms were also bought and shipp'd at the same time, for the Use, if need were, of such as should join the Prince at his Landing: And a Sum of Money being still wanting to defray the current Charge of this vast Undertaking, the States came to a Resolution to lend him four Millions of Guilders, which they had before agreed to raise, to defray the Charge of repairing the Fortifications of their frontier Towns: It pass'd without one dissenting Vote, or the least Whisper of Opposition; and the whole Sum was brought in by Anticipation, on the Credit of the Fund assign'd for raising it, in four Days.

All things being in this Forwardness, "On the 6th of October O. S. (says our Historian of his own Times) the Wind, that had stood so long in the West, came into the East. So Orders were sent to all to haste to Helvoets-Sum. That Morning the Prince went into the Assembly of the States-General, to take leave of them. He said to them, he was extreme sensible of the Kindness they had all shew'd him upon many Occasions: He took God to witness, he had serv'd them faithfully, ever since they had trusted him with the Government, and that he had never any End before his Eyes but the Good of the Country: He had persued it always: And that any time he erred in his Judgment, yet his Heart was ever set on procuring their Safety and Prosperity. He took God to witness, he went to England with no other Intentions, but these he had set out in his Declaration: He did not know how God might dispose of him: To his Providence he committed himself: Whatsoever might become of him, he committed to them the Care of their Country, and recommended the Princess to them in a most particular Manner: He assur'd them, he lov'd their Country perfectly, and equally with her own: He hop'd, that, whatever might happen to him, they would still protect her, and use her as she well deserv'd: And so he took leave. It was a sad, but a kind, parting. Some of every Province offer'd at an Answer to what the Prince had said: But they all melted into Tears and Passion; so that their Speeches were much broken, very short, and extreme tender: Only the Prince himself continued firm in his usual Gravity and Phlegm."

And now the Declaration of this Armament was so far from being continued any longer a Secret, that, two Days after, the States made a solemn Order, That Notice should be immediately sent to all their Ministers abroad, of the Reasons which had induced their Lordships to assist the Prince of Orange with Ships and Forces, in his Expedition to England; and that the said Ministers should be at liberty to make use thereof in the several Courts where they resided, as they should find most convenient: And this Notice was, in substance, as follows, viz. That his Majesty of England, seduced by the evil Counsel of wicked Ministers, having notoriously violated the fundamental Laws of the English Constitution, and long labour'd to subject his People to the Miseries of Popery and Slavery; that several Lords and other Persons of great Consideration in that Kingdom, having earnestly and repeatedly called upon the Prince of Orange to rescue them; that his Highness, both in his own Right, and that of the Princess his Consort, being highly concerned in the Welfare of that Kingdom; that the States themselves, having received frequent Assurances that their Majesties of France and England had in concert endeavour'd to separate the Republic from her Allies; and having just Cause to apprehend, that, if the latter of those Princes should have Leisure to compass his Project of obtaining an absolute Power over his People, both, for Reasons of State, and in hatred of the Protestant Religion, would co-operate in bringing the said Republic to utter Ruin; their Lordships, for all these Considerations, had resolv'd not only to countenance his Highness in his laudable Design for the Redemption of an oppress'd Nation, but, as his Auxiliaries, to aid and assist him with such Sea and Land-forces, as should be sufficient to procure him Success in his Undertakings; He (the Prince) having protested to their said Lordships, "That he had not the least Intention to invade or subdue that Kingdom, or to remove the King from his Throne; much less to make himself Master thereof, or to invert or prejudice the lawful Succession, or to expel or persecute the Roman Catholics; but that, on the contrary, it was purely and simply to assist the Nation in re-establishing their Laws, in recovering their Liberties, and securing their Religion, by the means of a free Parliament, compos'd of Persons legally qualify'd to sit therein, and who might make such farther Provision for the perpetuating their Religion and Liberty, that they should be no more endanger'd; and for putting the Nation into such a Condition, as might enable it powerfully to concur with the common Cause of Christendom; and the restoring and maintaining the Peace and Tranquility of Europe."

Many of our Historians have pass'd over this remarkable Order of the States in Silence; and all of them have suppress'd the latter Part of it, which contains so authentic an Account of the Prince's Protections to their Lordships; and have chosen either to copy those Protections from other Authorities, or to speak of them without any Authority at all. Thus, according to Kennet and Selwold, his Highness call'd God to witness, "That he did not undertake such an arduous Affair but for his Glory, for the Welfare Welfare of his Country, and of the Christian Religion, to set the States at greater Liberty, and deliver them from their Apprehensions of their too powerful and ambitious Neighbours: And, according to Bishop Burnet, as we have already seen, his Highness called God to witness, That he had no other Intention than those express'd in his Declaration: But, in this Order of the States, not the least Connection is preserv'd between the verbal and the written Declaration; between that calculated for the Meridian of Holland, and that which was to serve his Turn in England: And the Truth is, that the same Policy which requir'd the Prince to lay to the Dutch whatever would contribute to establish and increase their Confidence in him, by inducing them to think, that he sought their Interest only, requir'd him also, when speaking to the English, to make such Reserves as should effectually serve his own.

And this leads us to treat of that Declaration, which was printed at the Hague, in order to be dispers'd at his Landing in England, and which bears Date Oct. 10, N. S.

The Prince's Declaration.

It has for its Basis the two following Assertions, viz. 1. That the Peace and Happiness of any State or Kingdom cannot be preserv'd, when the Laws, Liberties, and Customs of it are openly transgress'd and annul'd; and, more especially, when Attempts are made to subvert the Religion establish'd by Law. And, 2<sup>dy</sup>, That, in such case, those who are most immediately concern'd in it are indispensably bound to interpose with their Assistance, to preserve those Laws and Liberties, and restore that Peace and Happiness, &c. It then proceeds to set forth the several Instances in which Law, Religion, and Liberty had been violated, and which were to justify the Prince for interposing, in order to their Preservation; namely, 1. The assuming and exercising a dispensing Power; which was pronounced illegal, and what no King could assume or exercise, without turning a limited Monarchy into an absolute Tyranny. 2. The obtaining a Declaration from the Judges, that this dispensing Power was a Right belonging to the Crown, by Menaces and Corruption, by displacing the Refractory, and by preferring others, who made the Sacrifice of the Laws the very Condition of their sitting as Judges. 3. The notorious Breach of the Test-Laws. 4. The setting up an illegal, ecclesiastic Court, and the pernicious Use of it. 5. The open Encouragement given to Popery, by the building several Churches, Chapels, and Colleges, for the open Exercise of that Religion, and the Propagation thereof, against many express Laws; and the raising up one Jesuit to be a Privy-Counsellor, and Minister of State. 6. The Practices try'd on all Lord-Lieutenants, Deputy-Lieutenants, Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, &c. to gain their Concurrence to the Repeal of the Tests and Penal Laws, and the Removal of such as had the Firmness to refuse. 7. The invading of some Charters, and procuring the Surrender of others. 8. The subjecting Mens Lives, Liberties, Honours and Estates, to an arbitrary and despotic Power, by obliging the Judges to give Sentence, not according to their Consciences and Oaths, but the Direction they receiv'd from Court; in consequence of which, a great deal of Blood had been shed in many Places of the Kingdom, against all the Rules and Forms of Law. 9. The putting the Administration of Justice into the Hands of Papists, and the entrusting them with military Employments; by which they were become Masters of the Kingdom: Whereas the Laws, on the contrary, had render'd them incapable of bearing Office, or wearing Arms. 10. The placing the whole Government of Ireland, in the same unqualify'd Hands; and the dreadful Apprehensions entertain'd by the Protestants there, on that Account, which had driven Numbers of them out of the Kingdom, &c. 11. The assuming an absolute Power over the Religion and Laws of Scotland, as appear'd by the Proclamation in which it is declar'd, That all his Majesty's Subjects were bound to obey him without Reserve. 12. The Despair which the Nation had been reduced to, by seeing the humblest and modestest Petitions treated as Crimes; the Bishops prosecuted as Delinquents, for no other Offence, and Judges turn'd out for only giving an Opinion in their Favour. 13. The treating a (r) Peer as a Criminal, for only saying, "That the Subject was not bound to obey the Warrant of a popish Justice of Peace." 14. The ill Constructions put on the Expedient which their Highnesses had offer'd, in relation to the Repeal of the Tests and Penal Laws, with a View to promote a good Agreement among the Subjects of all Persuasions; namely, That they had thereby design'd to disturb the Quiet and Peace of the Kingdom. 15. The Endeavours which had been us'd to corrupt Elections, by turning out of all Employments such as refus'd to vote as they were requir'd; by ordering such Regulations to be made in Boroughs, as should turn the original Right of popular Elections into a Court-Nomination, &c. In consequence of which Abuses, it was impossible for the People of England to be duly and legally represented, or for those returned to vote freely, as they ought, upon all Matters that were brought before them, having the Good of the Nation ever before their Eyes, and following in all things the Dictate of their Conscience. And, 16. The great and violent Presumptions which had arisen, that the Prince of Wales was not born of the Queen, and which, as yet, nothing had been done to remove.

This is, in effect, the List of Grievances contain'd in this Piece, which, however, are not laid to the King's Charge, but to that of the evil Counsellors, who had taken possession of him: And, in like manner, we are to understand, that it was not against his Majesty that the Prince made such Preparations, but for his own Defence against the Violence of those evil Counsellors.

(r) Lord Leech. He had beaten his Footman: The Fellow had recourse to the Law, and obtain'd a Warrant of course; which his Lordship refus'd to obey, on the Pretence above specify'd.

His Highness further signify'd, That, since both himself and the Prince had to great a Concern in this Matter, and in the Succession of the Crown; that since the People of England, in the Year 1672, in opposition to the then Government, had us'd their utmost Endeavours to put an end to a most unjust War, by the Government carry'd on against the States; and had ever testify'd a most particular Affection and Esteem both for his Highness and his dearest Consort; and that since he had been earnestly sollicit'd by a great many Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, and many Gentlemen, and other Subjects of all Ranks, to interpose, he could not excuse himself from espousing their Interests; and from contributing all that in him lay for maintaining the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of these Kingdoms, and for the securing to them the continual Enjoyment of all their just Rights.

He also declar'd, in so many Words, That his Expedition was intended for no other Design, but to have a free and lawful Parliament assembled as soon as possible; and that, in order thereto, all the late Charters, which the Elections of Burgesses were limited, contrary to the ancient Custom, should be considered as null and of no Force: That likewise all Magistrates, who had been casually turn'd out, should forthwith resume their Employments: That all the Boroughs in England should return again to their ancient Prescriptions and Charters; and, more particularly, that the ancient Charter of the great and famous City of London should be again in force: That the Writs for electing Members of Parliament should be address'd to the proper Officers, according to Law and Custom: That none be suffer'd to chuse, or be chosen, Members, but such as are qualify'd by Law: That the Members, being thus lawfully chosen, should meet and sit in full Freedom, that so the two Houses might concur in the preparing such Laws as they should think necessary and convenient for confirming and executing the Law concerning the Test, and such other Laws as were necessary for the Security and Maintenance of the Protestant Religion, for establishing a good Agreement between the Church of England and all Protestant Dissenters; as also, for the covering and securing of all such who would live peaceably under the Government, as became good Subjects, from all Persecution upon the account of their Religion, Papists not excepted; and for the doing of all other things, which the two Houses of Parliament should find necessary for the Peace, Honour, and Safety of the Nation, so that there may be no more Danger of the Nation's falling, at any time hereafter, under arbitrary Government. To this Parliament we will also refer the Enquiry into the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, and of all things relating to it, and to the Right of Succession: And we, for our part, will concur in every thing that may procure the Peace and Happiness of the Nation, which a free and lawful Parliament shall determine; and we have nothing before our Eyes in this our Undertaking, but the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, &c. Lastly, his Highness promis'd to send back his foreign Forces, as soon as the State of the Nation would admit of it; to take care of Scotland and Ireland; and invited all Persons, of all Ranks, to join him.

It may be almost said, that the same Packets which brought over Advice that the Dutch Fleet was on the point of setting sail carry'd back the News of the several Concessions which the King had been induced to make, to recover, if possible, the Confidence of his People. Hence it appear'd, that many of the Props, on which the Declaration rested, were taken away; and it became requisite for the Prince either to give over the Project, or to assign some farther Reasons to shew the Necessity of carrying it on, by the same Means, and with the same Vigour, as before. But his Highness was not dispos'd to encourage this relenting Humour in the King, or to suffice the Grievances he had complain'd of, to be redress'd by any Hand but his own: To the Manifesto, therefore, which he had already prepar'd, he caus'd a Supplement to be added, importing, "That the Sense of their Guilt, and the Distrust of their Force, had induced the Subverters of the Religion and Laws of these Kingdoms to retract some of the arbitrary and despotic Powers which they had assum'd, and to evacuate some of their unjust Judgments and Decrees, hoping thereby to quiet the People, and to divert them from demanding a Re-establishment of their Religion and Laws, under the Shelter of his Arms: That, in answer to what they had given out, namely, That the Prince intended to conquer and enslave the Nation, he was confident no Persons could have such hard Thoughts of him, as to imagine he had any other Design, than to procure the Settlement of the Religion, Liberty, and Property of the Subject, upon so sure a Foundation, that there might be no Danger of the Nation's relapsing into the like Miseries at any time hereafter: That the Forces he brought along with him were utterly disproportion'd to any such wicked Design: That the great Numbers of the principal Nobility and Gentry, who had engaged him in this Expedition, and who were many of them eminent for their constant Fidelity to the Crown, would cover him from all such malicious Insinuations; since it was not to be conceiv'd, that they would join in a wicked Attempt of Conquest, which would vacate their own lawful Titles to their Honours, Estates, and Interests: That he was confident all Men would be convinc'd, how little Weight was to be laid on all Promises and Engagements which could be now made, by recollecting, how little Regard had been had to the like Promises in Time past: That, as the imperfect Redress now offer'd was a plain Confession of the several Violations of Government, which he had before set forth; so the Defectiveness of the said Redress was no less apparent, seeing they laid down nothing which they could not take up at Pleasure; and that they reserv'd entire (without so much as mention) their Claims and Pretences to an arbitrary and despotic Power, which had been the Root of all their Oppression, and of the total Subversion of the Government: That it was plain there could be no Redress nor Remedy offer'd, but in Parliament, by a Declaration of the Rights of the Subject, which had been invaded; and not by any pretended Acts of Grace, to which the Extremity of their Affairs had driven them: And, lastly, That he had therefore thought fit to declare, that he would refer all to a free Assembly of the Nation, in a lawful Parliament.

His Letter to the King's Army.

A Letter, in the Prince's Name, was at the same time prepar'd, and address'd to the Officers and Soldiers of his Majesty's Army, in which he invites them to concur with him, in his Design to secure these Nations from Popery and Slavery, tells them, they were only made use of as Instruments to enslave the Nation, and ruin the Protestant Religion; prepares them for what they had to expect, when they had done the Drudgery impos'd on them, by putting them in mind of the cashiering of the Protestants in Ireland, the bringing over Irish Soldiers, to be substituted in their Places; and what had happen'd to many of their Fellow-Officers, for standing firm to the Religion and Laws of the Kingdom; cautions them against suffering themselves to be abus'd by a false Notion of Honour; advises them to prefer, as Men of Honour should, their Duty to God, their Religion, their Country, themselves, and their Posterity, to all private Considerations and Engagements whatsoever; signifies his Expectation, that they would therefore consider the Honour now set before them, of serving their Country, and securing their Religion; and promises, both to remember the Service they should do him on that Occasion, and to place such particular Marks of Favour on every one of them, as their Behaviour should deserve of him and the Nation; in doing which, he should greatly distinguish those who should most reasonably join their Arms to his; &c.

Admiral Herbert also, by his Highness's Direction, made a like Address to the Commanders and Seamen of his Majesty's Fleet; in which he thought fit to assure them, That Infamy or Ruin would infallibly attend them, if they did not join with the Prince in the common Cause: Infamy, if by their Means the Protestant Religion should be destroy'd, and their Country depriv'd of its ancient Liberties: And Ruin, if it pleas'd God to bless the Prince's Arms with Success. "It is therefore, proceeds the Admiral, that I, as a true Englishman, and your Friend, exhort you to join your Arms to the Prince, for the Defence of the common Cause, the Protestant Religion, and the Liberties of your Country. It is what, I am well assur'd, the major and best Part of the Army, as well as the Nation, will do, as soon as Conveniences offer. Prevent them, in so good an Action, while it is in your Power, and may it appear, that as the Kingdom hath always depended on the Navy for its Defence; so you will yet go farther, by making it, as much as in you lies, the Protection of her Religion and Liberties; and then you may assure yourselves of all Marks of Favour and Honour, suitable to the Merits of so great and glorious an Action."

And that no Inducement might be wanting to bring the whole Nation into the same Way of thinking, Dr. Burnet was employ'd to compose a Tract, called, An Enquiry into the Measures of Submission, and the supreme Authority, and of the Grounds on which it may be lawful or necessary for Subjects to defend their Religion, Lives, and Liberties; in which he more particularly undertakes to (f) explain away the Force of that Law, which provides, that the Subject shall, on Burnet's Treatise on the Measures of Submission.

(f) The Passages here referred to are as follow:

"The main and great Difficulty here, is, that tho' our Government does indeed assert the Liberty of the Subject, yet there are many express Laws made, that judge the Militia King's in the King, that make it plainly unlawful, upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the King, or any Commission'd by him: And these Laws have been put in the Form of an Oath, which all that have borne any Employment, either in Church or State, have sworn; and therefore those Laws, for the asserting our Liberties, do indeed bind the King's Conscience, and may affect his Ministers; yet, since it is a Maxim of our Law, that the King can do no wrong, these cannot be carried so far as to justify our taking Arms against him, be the Transgressions of Law ever so many and so manifest. And since this has been the constant Doctrine of the Church of England, it will be a very heavy Imposition on us, if it appears, that tho' we held these Opinions so long as the Court and Crown have favour'd us, yet, as soon as the Court turns against us, we change our Principles.

Here is the true Difficulty of this whole Matter, and therefore it ought to be exactly consider'd: For, All general Words, how large soever, are still suppos'd to have a tacit Exception and Reserve in them, if the Matter seems to require it. Children are commanded to obey their Parents in all things: Women are declar'd by the Scripture to be subject to their Husbands in the Lord, as the Church is to her King: And yet, how compassionate soever these Words may seem to be, there is still a Reserve to be understood in them; and tho', by our Form of Marriage, the Parties swear to one another till Death them do part; yet few doubt, but that the Bond is dissolved by Adultery, though it is not named; for odious things ought not to be suspected, and therefore not annual upon such Occasions: But, when they fall out, they carry still their own Force with them. So, when there seems to be a Contradiction between two Articles in the Constitution, we ought to examine which of the two is the most evident, and the most important, and so we ought to fix upon it; and then we must give each an accommodating Sense to that which seems to contradict it, that so we may reconcile them together. Here then are two seeming Contradictions in our Constitution, the one is the public Liberty of the Nation; the other is the imposing of all Resolves, in case that we are invaded. It is plain, that our Liberty is only a thing that we enjoy at the King's Discretion, and during his Pleasure, if the other against all Resistance is to be understood according to the strict Extent of the Words. Therefore, since the chief Design of our whole Law, and of all the several Rules of our Constitution, is to secure and maintain our Liberty, we ought to lay that down for a Conclusion, that it is both the main plea, and the most important of the two. And therefore the other Article against Resistance ought to be so interpret'd, as that it do not destroy it. So, since it is by a Law that Resistance is commanded, we ought to understand it in such a Sense, as that it do not destroy all other Laws: And therefore, the Intention of this Law must only relate to the executed Power, which is in the King, and not to the Legislative, in which no Pretence whatsoever, take up Arms against the King; and to shew, that when a King endeavours to destroy the very Fundamentals of the Constitution, and to make the Force of the Laws depend on his own Good-will and Pleasure, he forfeits the Benefit of them; that all Obligations of Government become thereby dissolved; that he may and ought to be resisted; that he ought to be under Guardians; and that the next Heir falls naturally to be the Guardian.

The Prince falls in his Expedition:

Thus arm'd at all Points, the Prince, with his whole Corps of Joint-adventurers, left the Hague, and came to Helvoetsluis, in order to embark for England. On the 21st of October the Signal was given for sailing; which the whole Fleet (consisting of fifty-two Men of War, twenty-five Frigates, as many Fireships, and near four hundred Transports, &c.) obey'd; Admiral Herbert having the Van, the Prince himself (with the Colours of England at his Top-Mast-head) the main Body, and Vice-Admiral Svertson the Rear. The Wind was at first favourable; but no sooner was Night come on, and this huge Body got out to Sea, before a horrible Storm arose, and continued to rage with such Violence, for twelve Hours together, that the most forward Pretenders to Heroism were glad to put back again, and instead of aspiring any longer to Victories and Triumphs, thought of nothing but Safety. The Fear was, however, greater than the Damage; for, tho' some Ships were driven to the Northward, and were forced to beat the Seas for seven or eight Days, they at last came in; and, tho' others were grievously shatter'd, not one was lost. The States, we are told, were not at all discouraged with this rough Beginning of so great and hazardous an Enterprize; but gave the necessary Orders for repairing all Mischiefs, and supplying all Necessaries, in order to make a new Essay, as soon as the Winds and Weather would give Leave. In order to draw some Advantage, moreover, even from this Misadventure, the Havlem and Amsterdam Gazettes were ordered to set forth a lamentable Relation of the Losses sustain'd by it. Namely, That nine Men of War, and several smaller Ships, had founder'd in Sea; that a thousand Horses had been thrown over-board; that Dr. Burnet, and several other English Gentlemen, were drown'd; that the States were greatly dismay'd; and that it was impossible for the Prince to prosecute his Design till Spring.

This was done that the Court of England, in a Persuasion that the Danger was over, might slacken their Preparations, might resume their former arbitrary Courses, and thereby furnish his Highness with fresh Matter to inflame the Nation: And for this Artifice did actually succeed, that the Roman-Catholics took occasion from thence to give out, that God was of their Side, and had now recompens'd them for the Ruin of the Spanish Armada, one hundred Years before: And, even in the London-Gazette, we find such Accounts of the Dutch Losses, as seem'd to argue, that the King and his Ministers either believ'd, or would have the People believe, that the very Turbulence of the Season, and the Care of (1) Providence, were alone sufficient for their Preservation.

About this Time, one Captain Langham, who had the Command of a Company of Foot in one of the British Regiments in the Service of the States, and who had found Means to get safe to London, with a large Quantity of the Prince of Orange's Declarations in his Portmanteau, which it was his Business to disperse, was seiz'd upon Suspicion; and, the Declarations being found upon him, was committed to Prison, as a Traitor: But, tho' it was resolv'd to make him an Example, so fearful were those in Power of the Mischief which that dangerous Paper might cause, that they laid the Bill against him without producing a Copy of it; and this, the only Evidence of his Crime, being suppress'd, the Grand-Jury took the advantage, and refus'd to find the Bill.

But the Prosecution of Langham was the slightest Circumstance which flow'd from this Discovery: In the Apprehension that his Highness might have other emissaries employ'd on the same Errand, a Proclamation

we cannot suppose that our Legislators, who made that Law, intended to give up that which we plainly see they resolv'd still to preserve entire, according to the ancient Constitution. So then, the not resisting the King can only be apply'd to the executive Power, that so upon no Pretence of ill Administration in the Execution of the Law it should be lawful to resist him; but this cannot with any Reason be extended to an Invasion of the legislative Power, or to a total Subversion of the Government. For it being plain, that the Law did not design to lodge that Power in the King, it is also plain, that it did not intend to secure him in it, in case he should let about it. The Law mentioning the King, or those commissioned by him, shews plainly, that it only design'd to secure the King in the executive Power: For the Word Commission necessarily imports this, since if it is not according to Law it is no Commission; and, by consequence, those who act in virtue of it are not commissioned by the King, in the Sense of the Law. The King likewise imports a Prince clothed by Law with the Regal Privileges; but if he goes to subvert the whole Foundation of the Government, he subverts that by which he himself has his Power, and, by consequence, he annuls his own Power; and then he ceases to be King, having endeavour'd to destroy that upon which his own Authority is founded.

It is acknowledged by the greatest Assertors of monarchical Power, that, in some Cases, a King may fall from his Power; and, in other Cases, that he may fall from the Exercise of it. His deserting his People, his going about to enslave or sell them to any other, or a furious going about to destroy them, are, in the Opinion of the most monarchical Lawyers, such Abuses, that they naturally divest those that are guilty of them of their whole Authority. Instancy or Phrency do also put them under the Guardianship of others. All the crown'd Heads of Europe have, at least secretly, approved of the putting the late King of Portugal under a Guardianship, and the keeping him still a Prisoner, for a few Acts of Rage, that had been fatal to a very few Persons: And even our Court gave the first Countenance to it, tho' of all others the late King had the least Reason to have done it, at least last of all, since it justify'd a younger Brother's supplanting the elder; yet the Evidence of the thing carry'd it even against Interest. Therefore, if a King goes about to subvert the Government, and to overturn the whole Constitution; he by this must be supposed, either to fall from his Power, or, at least, from the Exercise of it, so far as that he ought to be put under Guardians; and, according to the Custom of Portugal, the next Heir falls naturally to be the Guardian." [P. 8, 9, 10.]

(1) When his Majesty first receiv'd the News of the Storm, he said to Mr. Barillon, laughing, Je suis, que le Wind me declar'd ennemy; Je Paysis; Avez vous, remarque son serieux Air, et sonneuse son Voies, he added, Je sçavois, for they three Days, I have said the Holy Sacrament is in Procession.

was set forth, forewarning and admonishing all Persons of what Quality or Degree soever, from publishing, dispersing, repeating, handing about, or presuming to read, receive, conceal, or keep any of the treasonable Papers or Declarations, contriv'd and fram'd by the Prince of Orange, and his Adherents, to seduce the People, and, if it were possible, to corrupt the Army, upon peril of being prosecuted according to the utmost Severity of the Law. And when that Passage in the Declaration came to be consider'd, which asserts, That the Prince had been earnestly invited to engage in his present Enterprize, by a great many Lords, both spiritual and temporal, the King, who seem'd greatly affected by it, was advis'd to send for those of the Bishops that he suspected, and to put them to such a Test as should either let him into the Depth of the Confederacy against him, or lay them under a Necessity to assist in defeating it: Accordingly, his Majesty sent immediately for the Archbishop, and gave him to understand, "That it would be very much to his Service, and a thing well-becoming the Bishops, if they would meet together, and draw up an Abhorrence of the Prince's Design." But, tho' Abhorrences went down so smoothly in the former Reign, when the Church was permitted to share in the Triumphs of the Crown, not even the Requisition of the King himself could render them palatable now. His Grace first urg'd, That the Bishops having had his Majesty's Leave to repair to their respective Dioceses, it was at present impossible to get any considerable Number of them together. The King, on the other hand, endeavour'd to set aside that Objection, by naming the Bishops of London and Peterborough; but withal took no notice of those of Durham, Chester, and St. David's, tho' all three were at hand, and made their Appearance at Court almost every Day. What the Archbishop reply'd, nor how the Interview ended, is not explain'd; but the next Summons, we are told, was sent to the Bishop of London, who, being shewn the Passage in the Declaration relating to the Lords spiritual, and ask'd, whether the Prince had any Foundation for it, answer'd, somewhat ambiguously, in these Words: Sir, I am confident, the rest of the Bishops will answer in the Negative as myself. The King rejoind, That he did believe them all innocent; But, nevertheless, pursued his Design of forcing them to purge themselves, in the most open and explicit Manner. Thus the same two Prelates were again summon'd to attend his Majesty; and, to keep them in humour, the Bishops of Durham, Chester, and St. David's, likewise. Being admitted into the Closet, his Majesty directed the Lord Presson, Secretary of State, to read over the Clause in question; and, after certain general Expressions, signifying, as before, his Persuasion of their Innocence, called upon their Lordships to give him that farther Satisfaction already specify'd. The Archbishop, hereupon, declar'd, "That he ow'd his Majesty a natural Allegiance: That he had confirm'd this by voluntarily taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy: That he would have but one King at once: That his Majesty well knew, he never worshipp'd the rising Sun, nor made his Court to any but the King: That, as to this particular Charge, and his personal Concern in it, he was perfectly innocent: And that he did not know, nor could believe, that any of his Brethren had given any such Invitation." The Bishop of London's Turn was next: But he contented himself with saying, That he had given the King his Answer the Day before. As to the other three, they made no Difficulty to say whatever the King could require: And, upon the Whole, his Majesty, on the one hand, injur'd none more on some public Disfavour and Dislike of the Prince's Designs; and their Lordships, on the other, requir'd Time to deliberate upon a proper Answer; which was granted.

Of these five Prelates, we find but two, viz. The Archbishop, and the Bishop of London, that join'd in this Deliberation; and whether the other three were excus'd by the King, or excluded by their Brethren, or declin'd it of themselves, is wholly undetermin'd: We find also two more assisting in it, as far as appears, without any particular Call; namely, the Bishops of Rochester and Peterborough: And that their Lordships came to no direct Conclusion to comply with the King's Instances, we are farther told, was owing to the Timidity of the Bishop of Rochester; who, being obnoxious for his past Behaviour, durst not join in so unpopular a Measure; and the Guilt of the Bishop of London, who was as deep in the whole Secret as any Man.

They could not, however, avoid making their Appearance before the King, nor proposing some Expedient to avoid a decisive Answer: And what pass'd on this memorable Occasion was in effect as follows: The Bishops of Rochester and Peterborough did, in the first place, absolutely and expressly deny and disown their having done any thing towards the Invitation imputed to some Lords spiritual and temporal: And then the Archbishop made it his humble Request, "That the small Number there present might not be separated from the rest of the Bishops, and put upon so particular a Vindication; and that so few being about the Town, whom he could advise with, his Majesty would be pleas'd to summon up the rest of the Order, or at least as many of them as were not at too great a distance." The King objected, that this would be a Work of Time, and that the Matter would bear no Delay. To obviate which, the Bishop of Peterborough mov'd, "That his Majesty, in the Declaration he was about to publish, would be pleas'd to specify what had now pass'd between him and them, that the World might know they had disown'd all Concern in the Invitation." His Majesty alledg'd, "That something of their own would be more effectual than any Act of his, to create Faith in the People." And the same Prelate reply'd, "That, as they could not presume, that any Act of theirs was needful to strengthen his Majesty, so neither could they refuse to confirm what he should set forth on their Behalf; seeing, that not to do so would expose them to the Suspicion of Treason, and to disown it would involve them in the Guilt." The Archbishop also join'd with him in pressing his Majesty to accept of this Expedient; but without Success: His Majesty persisted in his Demand of something under their Hands, as what alone would give Satisfaction to the People. Thus forcibly beset, and alike fearful of consenting or refusing, their Lordships at last recollected, or came prepar'd to recollect, that the temporal Lords were chargeable with the same Imputation; and, for that Reason, made it their humble Prayer, that they might be join'd with them in preparing this Protestation. To this the King made the same Objection as to the Proposal for convening the Bishops; That it would bea Work of Time, &c. Upon which, as his last Resort, the Archbishop besought his Majesty, "That he would, at least, be pleas'd to direct a certain Number of Temporal Lords, to be nam'd by himself, to consult with them upon the whole Matter; assuring him, that, in such case, they would act in a Manner becoming the Duty of good Subjects, and as should be most expedient for his Service." And here we are to suppose the Matter rest'd; at least we are led to believe, by the Account from whence these Particulars are taken; which was drawn up, according to Mr. Richard, &c. by the Direction of the Archbishop and certain of his Brethren, and which is in the Nature of an Apology for the Conduct of the Bishops on that Occasion.

But there is also another Account, which was set forth by Spirit Bishop of Rochester, and in which several Particulars occur, that in this are not mention'd at all: As, That among the Proposals made by their Lordships to the King, to evade the Compliance he would have extorted from them, they desir'd to have the Matter referred to a free Parliament; urging, "That they, being but five or six in Number, could not sign a Paper which concern'd not only the whole episcopal Order, but also all the Peers of England." That the King was highly dissatisfy'd with this Answer: That Lord Presbiter told them, his Majesty expected more from their Loyalty, and from the Principles of their Church: That the Archbishop, seeing the Bishops of Cheshire and St. David's in the Presence as mere Spectators, without any Concern in the Difficulty, made it his Request, That, before he explain'd himself any farther, his Majesty would order them to withdraw: That this being done, his Grace proceeded to say, "That it was owingly to their Peccage and Profession, to promote War against a Prince so nearly ally'd to the Crown: That, however, if a verbal disowning of the Invitation would satisfy his Majesty, they were not only ready to give it, but to consent that it should be printed." That the King continuing to insist on a formal Renunciation, and the Bishops to refuse it, his Majesty left them abruptly, telling them, He would trust to his Army: And that the Bishop of Durham, after this, would appear no more at the Council-Board, saying to the Archbishop, "That he was sorry for having so long concurred with the Court, and that he now desir'd to be reconcil'd to his Grace and the other Bishops."

There are still (1) other Accounts; and it is added, That the King was never seen more vehement in his whole Deportment, than while engaged in this Parley with the Bishops: That he parted from them all with great Indignation; and that the jesuit'd Party at Court appear'd so openly enrag'd against them, that one of that Party is said to have advis'd, in a Heat, That all of them should be imprison'd, and the Truth extorted from them by Violence.

Upon the whole Matter, it is natural either to conclude, that the Bishops were not altogether so express, even in their verbal Protestations, nor so warm and pressing in their Request, that his Majesty would take upon himself to publish those Protestations, as their Apologists above-quoted would have us believe; or else, to wonder, that they were not taken at their Word: For, not to insist on the Bishop of Rochester's own Account of the Affair, which differs so materially from his, had their Expressions been so favourable and full to the King's Purpose, as the said Apologists represents them, it is hard to be conceiv'd, why his Majesty did not compound the Matter with them, and make the best Use he could of the Concessions he did obtain, since he could obtain no more, and since the Example of those Reverend Fathers had then such Weight with the People: For, in the Declaration before alluded to, and which will be inserted in its Place, he makes not the least mention either of them or their Compurgation. It is also as natural to conclude, That, if the Bishops did not actually invite the Prince in form, they were in Heart his Well-wishers: For he was look'd upon as the Champion, Saviour, and Deliverer of the Church, then groaning under the Yoke of Rome, without Hope or Prospect of Redemption, except by the

which is the substance of this Matter.

Reflections upon the Whole.

(1) At 10 Bishop Beverly, with his usual Incoherence, he confound'd this Interview between the King and the Bishops with the other, when his Majesty call'd upon them for their Advice; and also, their declining the Point of Absolution, with the Advice then given by them; that his Majesty would immediately summon a Parliament, &c. His Words are these: "In order to lay the Heat that was rais'd in the Nation, the King sent for the Bishops; and set out the Intention of this unusual Invitation that the Prince was desir'd to; He assur'd these of his Affection to the Church of England; and protest'd, he had never intended to carry things farther than to an equal Liberty of Conscience: He desired, they would declare their Absolution of this Intention; and that they would offer him their Advice what was fit for him to do. They declined the Point of Absolution, and advis'd the present summoning a Parliament; and that, in the mean while, the ecclesiastical Commission might be broken, the Proceedings against the Bishop of London and Magdalen College might be remov'd, and that the Law might be again put in its Channel. This they deliver'd with great Gravity, and with a Courage that astonished them to the whole Nation." [Vol. 4. p. 284]

the Interposition of his powerful Arm: And the Historian of his own Times moreover assures us, "That the Church-Party did, at that time, shew their Approbation of the Prince's Expedition, in such Terms as surpris'd many: They spoke openly in favour of it: They express'd their Concern to see the Winds continue averse: They wish'd for an East Wind, which, on this Occasion, was call'd the Protestant Wind: And they spoke with great Scorn of all the Steps taken by the Court to regain the Hearts of the Nation." Besides, if, according to the Doctrines of the Church, there was so much Merit in implicit Loyalty, those who glory'd in being passive under Oppression ought to have glory'd as much in being active in support of the Crown, when expos'd to such imminent Danger: And yet, we find their Lordships, in this Time of Trial, formalizing with their Sovereign, holding him at bay, pleading Privilege against his express Commands, and weighing out their Compliments by Scruples, as if their Business was only to hold the Scales between Party and Party, and to give the Turn as they should see Cause. In fine, Bishop Sprat proceeds so far as to make a Comparison between their Behaviour and that of the Scottish Bishops, who were drawn into such a Declaration, as (a) amounted to an Abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's Enterprize, and a Renunciation of the Principles on which it was founded, and to pronounce upon it, "That as the English Bishops, by refusing to stand by the Doctrine of passive Obedience, ev'd Episcopacy in England, to the Scottish Bishops, by adhering to that Doctrine, destroy'd Episcopacy in Scotland." Which is as much as to say, That, for the Preservation of the Mirr, a Bishop may dispense with his Duty to the Crown.

The Prince
his just cause.

In this Interval, the Prince of Orange completely re-fitted his Fleet, re-supply'd his Army, and, on the 1st of Nov. O. S. with a favourable Wind at East, set sail once more on his Expedition to England, with a Design to make for the North, and to land either in Burlington-Bay or a little below Hull, in conformity to the Advice which he had receiv'd from the Earl of Danby and the Lord Lioney, and who had engaged, in such case, to procure a Rising in his Favour: Accordingly, all the whole first Night, and Part of the next Day, his Highness held that Course, till Lord Dartmouth's Scouts, which were station'd on the Coast to observe his Motions, had all disappear'd, to carry and confirm the News: After which, the Signal was given for the whole Fleet to tack about, and put before the Wind to the Westward:

Cause.

And, on the 3d of November, between ten and eleven o'Clock, they were discover'd mid-way between Dover and Calais, stretching down the Channel with all the Sail they could spread, the Shores of both Kingdoms being cover'd with Multitudes of People, who stood gazing on a Spectacle, at once so pleasing and so dreadful, with an equal Mixture of Terror and Admiration. For full seven Hours together this huge Body continued passing, and, when past, form'd a Line of above twenty Miles in extent; the Rear being in a manner close at hand, when the Van seem'd to be lost among the Clouds.

Dover.

The same Day the News was carry'd to the Court of England, where it struck both the King and his Ministers with no small Degree of Astonishment: He had receiv'd Notice of the Prince's Design to land in the North, and had made his Dispositions accordingly: The Scots were still continued in those Parts, and a large Detachment of the English were sent down to co-operate as Need should require: Lord Dartmouth also, with sixty-one Men of War, (thirty-eight of which were of the Line) lay at the Gunfleet, off of Harwich, and it was believ'd he would from thence be able to intercept the Dutch, let them take what Course they pleas'd: His Lordship had, besides, discretionary Powers; had a personal Pique against Admiral Herbert; had all the Zeal imaginable for his Master's Service; and did not want either Bravery or Capacity; and hence, in proportion to the Confidence placed in him, the Disappointment was the more sensibly felt. But tho' it has since been Matter of Wonder, that he did not answer the Expectations conceiv'd of him, it does not appear that the Sense of the Court was against him then: On the contrary, his Majesty gave out, and fully believ'd, "That, if the Wind was the same at Sea as at Land, his Fleet would soon be up with the Enemy, and would fill give a good Account of them." Some of our Historians, indeed, have endeavour'd to excuse his Inactivity, by insinuating that a Fog interven'd between him and the Enemy: But Fogs seldom accompany a brisk easterly Wind; and we have besides seen, that he had his Advice-boats out, to give him timely Information: And as to what is said by Mr. Burckot, and others, That Matters were so concerted among the Flag-officers and Commanders, that had the Admiral come up fairly with the Dutch, it would not have been in his Power to have done very much against them, Bishop Burnet says, That Lord Dartmouth himself assur'd him, "That, whatever Stories were then propagated, concerning either Officers or Seamen, he was confident

(a) These Expressions were as follow:
"We are amaz'd to hear of the Danger of an Invasion from Holland, which excites our Prayers for an universal Repentance to all Orders of Men, that God may yet spare his People, preserve your Royal Person, and prevent the Effusion of Christian Blood; and to give such Success to your Majesty's Arm, that all who invade your Majesty's just and undoubted Rights, and disturb or interrupt the Peace of your Realm, may be disappointed, and clothed with Shame, so that on your Royal Head the Crown may still flourish."

As, by the Grace of God, we shall persevere in perfecting a firm and unshaken Loyalty, so we shall be careful and zealous to promote in all your Subjects an inextinguishable and stedfast Allegiance to your Majesty, as an essential Part of their Religion, and of the Glory of our holy Profession; nor doubting, but that God, in his great Mercy, who hath so often protected and delivered your Majesty, will still preserve and deliver you, by giving you the Hearts of your Subjects, and the Necks of your Enemies." [Guaner, p. 273.]

confident, that they would all be soon in a very hearty." Then, as to the Motion made by Sir William Jennings, at a Council of War, to stand over to the Coast of Holland, and there attend the coming out of the Dutch Fleet, on which the above Conclusion against the Flag-officers, &c. is in part grounded, the same Prelate is express, That it had been a continual Storm for some Weeks: That this Storm did not abate till the 28th of October: That, immediately after, the Wind came about to the East; and that the same Gale which drove the Dutch to happily down the Channel, hinder'd the English from getting out of the River: Whence it is apparent, on the one hand, that Sir William Jennings's Motion could not have been embraced, without exposing the Fleet to Danger, if not Ruin; and on the other, that there was no Necessity of conjuring up a Fog, to account for the Prince's passing by the Mouth of the Thames without Interruption.

But, from his Highness's Conduct, it becomes farther evident, that he was under real Apprehensions of the King's Fleet, even after his good Fortune had led him safely into the Channel: For, while he was yet in the very Streight between Dover and Calais, he held a Council of War; and, upon the Issue, it was resolv'd, that he himself should sail in the Van with three Men of War; that the Transports and Victuallers should form the main Body, and follow close behind him; and that the rest of the Fleet, under Herbert, should bring up the Rear, in order to make head against the Enemy, in case they should come up Time enough to interrupt their Progress.

Yet farther: Torbay was the Place they resolv'd for, as being the most commodious for the Reception of so vast a Fleet: The very best of the English Pilots in the Dutch Service had the Direction of their Course, in the foremost Vessel of the Fleet, in which were Dr. (c) Burnet, and the rest of the Prince's Domestics: And when it appear'd, on the 4th in the Morning, that, contrary to his express Orders, he had out-run his Reckoning, and led the whole Fleet not only beyond Torbay, but Dartmouth, Mr. Russel, who had recommended him, and who came on board that Vessel with him, in no small Disorder, bid the Doctor go to his Prayers, for all was lost: Which imply'd the strongest Fear imaginable of Lord Dartmouth and his Squadron; and that, in case of an Engagement, they were like to find no Favour. Plymouth was the next Port, which was in the Hands of the Earl of Bath, whom they were by no means sure of as yet; and, in case they tack'd about, the same Wind, that had hitherto favour'd them, would have been on the other Side, and brought the Enemy into the Midst of them: In this terrible Perplexity, which, in all Appearance, nothing short of a Miracle could have deliver'd them from, while Russel was ordering out the Boat to go on board the Prince, the Wind, which had till now continued at East, dy'd away, and soon after, a soft and easy Gale at South arising, carry'd the whole Fleet in four Hours time into Torbay.

To close on this Head; Lord Dartmouth had made use of the first Abatement of the Wind to weigh and follow the Dutch with all possible Expedition; which is a new Proof that his Intention was to fight: And we have seen, that he would not have wanted an Opportunity, if Providence itself, for its own unsearchable Ends and Purposes, had not preserv'd those he pursued from falling into his Hands. As the Violence of the East Wind, had hinder'd him at first from getting under Sail, so the Calm which succeeded had again arrested him in the Channel: And what was still worse, that Calm was follow'd by a furious Gale at West, which continu'd to rage for several Days together. But even against this Storm he endeavour'd to make head: Bishop Burnet is express, that he was got as far as the Isle of Wight, and that he did what he could to pursue them; and Mr. Burnet brings him before Torbay in sight of the Dutch Fleet: But then, according to him, it was rather to give the Dutch an Opportunity of seeing what he was able to do, than with a Design to treat them as Enemies; and a late Writer endeavour'd to reconcile the different Opinions of these two Authors, by supposing, That the English were in a Disposition to fight when they set sail; and that while they were beating the Seas, those who were in the Prince's Interest had an Opportunity to dipole them otherwise. But if Lord Dartmouth did really come so far as Torbay, it ought to be presum'd that he came to manifest his Zeal to the King, not his Compliance to his Highness: And we find in the Gazette, that he kept the Seas beyond the Middle of November, and that he was, at last, forced into the Isle of Wight, as being expressly said, That the Fleet under his Command had been in very ill Weather.

Thus every Circumstance that occur'd, seem'd to favour the Prince; for while the King's Ships were in this Distress, not a Bark of his was in the least Danger; all lay safe at Anchor under the Land; and while the fair Weather lasted; he had landed his whole Army.

Care is taken by Dr. Burnet to (w) inform Posterity, that his Highness was desirous to land on the fourth of November, being the Anniversary both of his Birth and Wedding-Day, on the Presumption, that it would be taken as a good Omen by his Soldiers. "But we all, continues his Lordship, who considered that, the Day following being Gun-Powder-Treason Day, our landing that Day might have a good Effect on the Minds of the English Nation, were better pleas'd to see we could land no sooner." Another Author records, that as one of the Dutch Ships, call'd the Golden Sun, approach'd very near the Shore, a Divine of the Church of England got upon the Poop of the Ship, and, flourishing his Bible in his Hand, cry'd out, For the PRINCE and the Protestant Religion! And almost all our Books take notice, that the English Colours, at his Highness's Mast-Head, were surrounded with this Motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION AND LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND, underneath which was writ, Je maintiendrai (I will maintain) being the Motto of the Nassau Family: As also, that the Coat was every where covered with People, who welcom'd their Deliverer with loud Acclamations, and brought in all manner of Refreshments for his Army.

In the whole Adventure he had lost but one Transport, having on board four Companies of Foot, a Vessel laden with Hay, and two Fishing-boats with 24 Horses; the first of these was taken by the Swallow Frigate; which, as its Name denoted, being an excellent Sailer, kept in sight of the Dutch Fleet till they enter'd Torbay: And on the very same Day Captain Aylmer, who commanded her, sent up one of his Officers Express to the Court with the News, who was to overcome with the Fatigue of his Journey, and so affected with the Story he had to tell, that he fell speechless at the King's Feet. Other Couriers, however, from Dartmouth and other Places along the Coast, successively confirm'd and explain'd what his Strength and Spirits would not hold out to do. An extraordinary Council was hereupon immediately call'd; in which it was resolv'd to treat the Prince and his Pretences with all the Sharpness imaginable; as appears by the Proclamation which his Majesty immediately caus'd to be set forth, and which was in Substance as follows, viz. "That as he could not consider the present unchristian and unnatural Invasion of his Kingdoms by a Person so nearly related to him, without Horror, so it was Matter of the utmost Trouble and Concern to him to reflect upon the many Secret Proclamations against him.

Mischeries and Calamities which an Army of Foreigners and Rebels must bring upon his People: That it was evident by the Prince's Declaration, however plausibly worded, that his Designs at the Bottom tended to nothing less than the usurping his Crown and Royal Authority: That this appear'd by his assuming the Royal Style; his requiring the Peers, spiritual and temporal, and all other Persons of all Degrees to obey and assist him in the Execution of his Designs, which was a Prerogative inseparable from the imperial Crown of these Realms: That his calling in question the Legitimacy of the Prince of Wales, who, as if by the particular Care of Heaven, was born in the Presence of so many Witnesses of unquestionable Credit, furnish'd an undeniable Proof of his immoderate Ambition, which nothing could satisfy but the immediate Possession of the Crown itself: That with regard to his seeming Desire to submit all to the Determination of a free Parliament, in the Hope of ingratiating himself with the People, nothing could be more evident than that a Parliament could not be free in all its Circumstances, so long as there was an Army of Foreigners in the Heart of his Kingdom: That he, the Prince, was in truth the sole Obstructor of such a free Parliament; for it was his Majesty's full Resolution, as soon as, by the Blessing of God, his Kingdoms should be delivered from this Invasion, to call a Parliament, which could no longer be liable to the least Objection of not being freely chosen, since he had actually restored all the Boroughs and Corporations to their ancient Rights and Privileges; and in which it was his Purpose not only to receive and redress all the just Complaints and Grievances of his good Subjects, but also to repeat and confirm the Assurances he had already given to them to maintain their Religion, Liberties and Properties, and all other their just Rights and Privileges whatsoever; and that upon these Considerations, and the Obligations of their Duty and natural Allegiance, he could no ways doubt but that all his faithful and loving Subjects would readily and heartily concur and join with him in the entire Suppression and Repulsion of those his Enemies and rebellious Subjects, who had so injuriously and disloyally invaded and disturb'd the Peace and Tranquility of his Kingdoms."

A. D. 1688.

This was dated November the 6th, and in the next Gazette was circulated all over the Kingdom; but without the desired Effect: The Notion which had universally prevail'd, that the Promises of Papists were no longer binding, than the Priests pleased, and the little Regard which his Majesty had shewn to those which he had made at his Accession to the Throne, had destroy'd all Confidence in him; and instead of reading with a Spirit of Acknowledgment, they read with Indignation; while on the other hand, the Prince's Papers, most of which could now be no longer suppress'd, were receiv'd almost as implicitly as if they had contain'd a new Revelation.

Which is the

In order, therefore, to reason the People, if possible, out of their fatal Prepossession, and retain them in their Duty, the Declaration itself was, at last, reprinted, by the Direction of those in Power, with a short Preface, and some middl Remarks upon it, as they are call'd, by way of Antidote; at the End of which, to complete the Packet, was annexed a Paper of Animadversions, suppos'd to be written by Steward (before spoken of) but then attributed to Lord Caslemain, says the Writer of the History of the Desertion, adding, "But whoever was the Author of it, it is a spruce Piece of Sophistry, and he was a Person who well knew what could be said for a bad Cause, and where it was not possible to make any Defence: And there would insensibly glide by, as if he had not minded the Difficulty." Specious Animadversions they are call'd by Mr. Richard, who with that bare Notice removes them out of his way. And as to the rest of our Historians, they have pass'd them over without any Mention at all; how properly, let Posterity judge from such Excerpts out of those Pieces, as follow :

In the Preface it is urg'd, That a Sight of the Prince of Orange's Declaration had been eagerly desir'd; because most Men expected, that some extraordinary Secrets, some hidden Works of Darknes, would have been brought to Light in it; and, more particularly, concerning the clandestine League between his Majesty and the French King for extirpating Protestants, which had been so confidently discours'd of, and of which nevertheless not one Word was said: And, in the modest Remarks, the Question is ask'd, Whether, in case there had been the least Ground for such a Suggestion, those who had aggravated every little Circumstance to swell out their Charge, would have slipt over an Article of such Importance, without any Notice at all? And again, in relation to what is said concerning the Birth of the Prince of Wales, (all which, the Remarker asserts, amounts to no more than a violent Presumption;) Whether the very Noice of such a Presumption was Reason enough to justify a War? He more-over asks, Whether all the other things were not redressable by Parliament? And maintains not only, That a Parliament was the main thing to be insisted on, but that the irregular Choice of a Parliament could not warrant the present Invasion. This he exemplifies by urging, That the long Parliament, in the late King's Reign, was actually dissolv'd in virtue of the triennial Bill, nine Months before the Repeal of that Bill was thought of; and yet, tho' they continued to sit and act so long afterwards, that Irregularity was never thought a good Reason for a War: That this was beyond any Trespas committed by his present Majesty: That it was in the preceding Reign that the Charters were first resum'd; and those who enter'd on violent Courses for their Restoration were proceeded against as Traitors: That the late Duke of Monmouth also made this last Circumstance a Clause in his Declaration: And that a Parliament chosen by the garbled Corporations voted him a Traitor. He then asks, If the Blood of Monmouth, and all those who suffer'd with him, lies upon such of the Nobility and Gentry of the Church of England as were concern'd in bringing them to Execution? Or, if that which was held criminal in them, or the Presbyterian Plotters before them, could be held excusable in the present Undertaking; more especially, bringing with it, as it did, the additional Guilt of making the Nation a Prey to Foreigners; whom, in neither of the former Cases, nor even the civil War itself, it had been visited with before? Observes, That, how great soever the Grievances of the People had been, they were now remov'd: That all things had been replaced on the ancient Bottom, in order to the calling a free Parliament; which had been done before, if the Prince, by this Expedition, had not hinder'd it, and would still be done, as soon as he took his Leave: That, hence it appear'd, all his Pretensions were taken away; and that nothing remain'd for him to do, but to return home, or contend for the Crown. Proceeding on to his Highness's additional Declaration, our Remarker affirms, "That the said Addition did very plainly unfold the Prince's Design. He will abide among us, continued he, with a foreign Power, and make the Choice of a Parliament impracticable; and therefore the Call of one a very weak and foolish thing; and yet oblige us to distrust every Promise made us; lessening what is done, and insinuating, that all things will soon be undone." And again, "The Dutch, knowing how the Prince hath ravish'd from them their Liberties and Privileges, and what Danger they are in of being utterly undone, if Liberty of Conscience be settled among us in England, precipitate the Prince on this hazardous Undertaking; not doubting, but either they shall be delivered from the Prince's Exercise of a despotic Power over them, or spoil our Liberty, to the Continuance and Advancement of their own Trade." He afterwards asks, If the Prince would deserve Belief in any thing, if what he has affirm'd concerning the earnest Solicitations which he had receiv'd from the Lords spiritual and temporal to invade us, should prove untrue? And they, says he, not only declare, that they never did solicit his Coming, but that they look on his Invasion to be sinful. And, lastly, he takes occasion to shew, That the Bishops could not do any such thing, without acting most contrary to their avowed Principles, and the most solemn Oaths and Declarations; nor without endangering their hierarchical Grandeur even by their own Success: For it was reasonable to suppose, that whatever had been said to induce them to co-operate had been said only to ensnare them; and that the utmost they had to expect was, to be kept in Dependence on the Government by a yearly Salary, in lieu of their present Lands, Leases, Lordships, &c.

The Animadversions are plainly the Work of some other Hand, who had both more Knowledge, and more Bitterness, than the former. He sets out with observing, That, for a long while, the Preparations in Holland were very unconcerning News in England; no one supposing it possible, that a Prince, who was born of one Daughter of England, and marry'd to another, would bring Fire and Sword into England; and fight personally against his Uncle and Father-in-law: That, when it was found that this Incredulity had deceiv'd those who had entertain'd it, his Highness's Declaration was impatiently wait'd for, in hope that the Public would therein be inform'd what Injury, beyond the Reach of Satisfaction, he had receiv'd, which had prompted him to such violent Measures: That now this Declaration was come out, they were more at a loss than before: That England was not the Country where the Laws were openly transgress'd, and Endeavours were us'd to introduce a Religion contrary thereto: That some Laws were indeed suspended; but then they were so little necessary to the public Peace, that even his Highness, almost in the same Breath, had declar'd his Intention to take them away: That,

A. D. 1685.

That, with regard to the Introduction of Popery, had the King really intended to introduce it, he would never have render'd it impossible, by granting Liberty of Conscience to all alike: That, however, if the Designs of the Papists had been ever so irreligious, booted Missionaries were no Ministers of the Gospel; nor could Endeavours to do bad Actions warrant the committing the worst: That, were the Case of the English People as bad as he states it, he had no Right to interpose, except by his friendly Offices: That his Majesty would pass for a very bad Neighbour, if he should take upon him the Cognizance of the Disorders in the Dutch Government, and undertake to compose them by War: That the most immediate Concern in the Succession would not warrant such an Interposition, since a Son could no more dispose of his Father's Estate, chuse his Tenants for him, or prescribe the Conditions of his Leases, than a Stranger to his Blood: That, upon the same Grounds which his Highness had declar'd against the King's Counsellors, he might, with more Reason and Justice, declare against the Counsellors of any King upon Earth: That, however bad his Majesty's Counsellors were, his Highness's were worse; Men whose Brains reach'd no farther than to copy from their rebellious Ancestors of 41: That, as to the Matter of the dispensing Power, Kings were not bred at the Inns of Court, but were as much oblig'd to trust Lawyers for Law, as Physicians for Physic; and that, as it was a parliamentary Business, he should leave it to Parliament: That, in relation to the naming and displacing Judges as their Opinions agreed or disagreed with that of the Court, it was no more than what his Highness himself did, and all other Princes, who make Obedience to their Commands the first Qualification for that Service: That, notwithstanding the Rhetoric of his Highness's Penmen, they could not believe the King had broken his Coronation Oath, annulled the Laws, &c. while they saw Justice dispensed in his Courts as usual, and assisted every Day at the Exercise of the established Religion: That the Wisdom of our Nation had provided for the Redress of our Grievances, by Parliament; nor had made any Provision for Recourse to Fire and Sword: That, since the several Particulars enumerated by his Highness in his first Declaration were redress'd before he set sail, it was palpable, that the Reasons assign'd for his coming were not the true Reasons: That, as to the King's granting Employments to Papists, it were to be wish'd, that the greater Readiness of his other Subjects to act in his Defence might convince the World he had made an ill Choice: That, as to the Number of Papists in the Army, they were not one to fifty: That, if they were incapable of serving in Arms while the Kingdom was in Peace, his Highness had now remov'd that Incapacity; for in case of War, as of Fire, any Help was lawful: That, with regard to the Introduction of the Irish, the same Plea had the same Force, and, as they were the King's own

A. D. 1685.

Subjects, the Nation had less to apprehend from them than absolute Foreigners: That the Words objected to in the King's Scottish Proclamation are the very Words of a Scottish Act of Parliament, which moreover acknowledg'd and declar'd, That the Happiness of Scotland arose from the uninterrupted Succession, and absolute Power, of their Kings: That, in Ireland, Papists were not by Law excluded from Employments: And that therefore it appear'd no easy Task to please his Highness, seeing he complain'd of the breaking Laws in England, the making them in Scotland, and the keeping them in Ireland: That, whatever lawful Remedies were allow'd of to the Subjects of other Nations, under such insufferable Oppressions, the calling in of foreign Enemies was, in England, nothing less than Treason and Rebellion: That as to his Highness's Acknowledgment, that the last great Remedy was a Parliament, it was plain his Majesty thought so himself, by his issuing out the Writs for calling one; and that the Prince himself had render'd his own Demand impracticable; for Votes were not Cannon-proof; nor could a Parliament be freely chosen under the Law of Arms, nor vote freely with Swords at their Throats: That the violent Presumptions, and vehement Suspicions, concerning the Birth of the Prince of Wales, were Suspicions and Presumptions only, and were to held by every good Subject and sensible Man in the Kingdom; which was the Reason they had been so long disregarded: That the Gratitude of the Dutch, made manifest by their invading the English unjustly, for taking their part when they were unjustly invaded, was utterly unintelligible: as was also his Highness's enspousing the Interest of another, because he had an Interest of his own; That, however, he might as well have spoke out; for that nothing was more evident, than that he came for himself, not the People; and that ~~we might have either sunk or swam~~ for any Care of his, if it had not been for his own sake: That, as in the former Instance, it was making a strange Return for the Affection and Esteem which the Nation had testify'd for their Highnesses, by visiting them with a War, and subjecting them to all the Calamities inseparable from it: That, as to the Pretence of bringing over an Army to defend himself against the Violence of the King's evil Counsellors, nothing could be more groundless; for, in his own single Person, unattended by a single Footman, he would have found Security and Veneration, all England over: That, if he had nothing in view but a free and lawful Parliament, as he gave out, he might as well have staid at home; for all that he himself had thought requisite thereto had been granted before he embark'd; and such a Parliament would either have been sitting, or ready to sit, at that very Hour, if his Highness would have given it leave: That the referring the Birth of the Prince of Wales to this free Parliament was no better than mere Amusement; for every body knew what the References of Conquerors signify'd, and what

what the Freedom of their Arbitrators; That the Expedient provided by his Highness to give Force and Vigour to the new Laws, which he thought necessary to be made, viz. That he would concur in every thing, &c. and further, that he would take care that a Parliament should be call'd in Scotland, and that the Settlement of Ireland should be observ'd, threw the King entirely out of the Question, and avow'd, in effect, that he would be King in his stead; for that none but Kings took those Offices upon them, or could be authorized so to do: That this was farther confirm'd, by what he says concerning the sending back his Forces; which imply'd his own Intention to stay: And lastly, that if his own Words had not warranted these Conclusions, no body would have carry'd their Suspensions so far as to suppose, that Interest could have drawn him to dethrone the King, unprince his Son, and seize the Crown for himself.

In answer to the additional Declaration, our Ambassador farther observes, That the Plea made use of by his Highness against the Assertion of a Conquest, from the Disposition of his Forces to such an Attempt, and the Junction of English with him, was an Attempt to declare the Nation out of their common Sense, by declaring them into a Rebel, that he was not capable of intending what he was actually doing: That this Disposition was not his Fault; for the whole Power of his Auxiliaries the States could not have remov'd it: That the Concern of his English Joint-Adventurers for their Titles to their Estates, Honours, &c. was equally absurd; since it was notorious, they had forfeited all those Titles by the very first Overt-act which they had committed: That the calling the King's Concessions a fleming Redress, demonstrated that the Prince's Expedition was unalterably resolv'd on, without any Thought or Care of the Good of England, or its Concerns: That the referring all again to a free, lawful Parliament, and yet referring all to the Sword, was utterly irreconcilable: That the Arguments address'd to the Soldiers and Seamen, and drawn from the Danger they were in from Papists, and the Fear of falling into his Highness's Hands, were the most unsuitable to English Natures that ever were found out; as supposing them Cowards as well as Fools, and to be frighted even with the very Sound of Danger: That, as to Papists, the Prince had more in his Army than the King in his; and as to the Dutch, his Highness would find they were not so terrible as he imagin'd: And that whereas it was said (where is not specify'd) the Papists had sworn the Ruin of the Protestant Religion, his Highness would much oblige the whole Nation in verifying it, by naming the wicked Men who had done so, that, when convicted, the next Gallows or Tree might save the Trouble of Parliaments and References.

There was yet another Paper which came forth about this time on the King's Behalf against his Highness, under the Title of Reflections on the Prince of Orange's Declaration and which also deserves Notice, because it contains a Thought or two not touched upon in the two others, and because it was answered in Form by his Highness's Advocate.

According to the Author of this Piece, the Prince would have need'd less Apology, if he had aim'd only to deliver the King from evil Counsellors, to divide him from France, and to engage him in the common Cause of Europe; and if he had endeavour'd first by way of Negotiation to prevail with his Majesty, to remove those Counsellors, to alter his Measures, and to give his Highness the necessary Satisfaction with respect to the Birth of the Prince of Wales. And on the other hand, we are to conclude, that he remain'd without any; because, without any lawful Call, he had invaded the Kingdom with an Army of Foreigners: Because he had acted in every respect so as to demonstrate, that his real Design was upon the Crown; which was a manifest Departing from the Words of his Declaration, and making the King answerable for the Charge he had laid against his evil Counsellors only: Because he had paid so little regard to his Majesty's Concessions: And because he had stak'd the whole Protestant Religion on his Success.

According to the Prince's Advocate, it was and should be notorious that his Highness had so little Interest with the King his Father-in-law, that his known Dislike of a Man was the best Recommendation to Favour and Preference; and that those were sent to reside in Holland whom he hated most: That therefore it was to be understood Negotiation would have prov'd a very unavailing Method: That nevertheless, the Prince did only require the Removal and Punishment of those evil Counsellors in a free Parliament: That for the same Reason, he refer'd the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales to the same Arbitration: That as to a lawful Call, setting aside his Relation to the Crown, it was as lawful for the Prince to accept the Invitation he had receiv'd, as for one Neighbour to break into another's House, upon an Out-cry of Fire or Murder: That supposing every minute Objection could not be answer'd, it was more for his Honour to have enter'd upon the Stage a little before his time, than to have stood till the Plot was finished and the Curtain let fall: That to argue or even suppose, that the Prince aspir'd to the Throne, was to be esteem'd a very unjust Calumny cast upon so great a Prince, since he had so often made such high and solemn Protestations to the contrary: That the King's Concessions bore date only from the Notice of the Prince's Preparations: And that what was said concerning the Protestant Religion was fair Warning, which, it was to be hop'd, God would give every Protestant Grace to make a right use of.

Thus it appears, upon the whole, that both Parties had their fore Places; that each in turn could probe and irritate that of his Antagonist; and that neither had a Plaster broad enough to cover its own.

The Dispute was not, however, left to the Decision

A. D. 1688.
Measures taken by the King for his Defence.

Decision of the Pen : At the time that these Appeals were severally made to the Understanding of the Public, his Majesty put on the Mask of Resolution, and gave out such Orders as put all Europe in Expectation of a vigorous Defence : His first Care was of Portsmouth, whither he sent down the Duke of Berwick with as many Troops as were judg'd sufficient for its Defence : His next was to recall his Forces from the North, and appoint a general Rendezvous of his whole Army on Salisbury Plain : And that his Soldiers, on their March, might give as little Occasion for Clamour as possible, at so critical a Juncture, to the Body of his Subjects, he prudently order'd public Notice to be given, by Beat of Drum in every Town or Village where they lay or halted, that all, both Officers and private Men, were duly to pay their Quarters; and that before they march'd out, upon Complaint made to the Commanding Officer, by the Magistrate or Civil Officer of such Town or Village, that the same had been omitted, or any Wrong had been done, Satisfaction should be immediately made, on pain of such Commanding Officers being cashier'd, or otherwise punish'd as his Majesty should see Cause. Lord Feverham, as before against Monmouth, had the (so) Command in chief, till his Majesty took the Field; for he gave out he would command in Person against the Invader, and seem'd at first to confide of Success, that when he was inform'd some Motions were on foot in the City of London, and the Counties of York and Kent, for preparing an Address, That he would be graciously pleas'd to come to an Accommodation with the Prince of Orange, he declar'd in Council, That he should look upon all those as his Enemies, who should pretend to advise him to treat with the Invader of his Kingdoms.

The Prince's March to Exeter.

The Flow of his Highness's good Fortune, in the mean while, seem'd at a stand; he had, indeed, land'd all his Forces in Peace and Safety; but his Cavalry were in a bad Condition; abundance of Rain fell; the Road became almost impassable; their Soldiers had both their Tents and Provisions to carry themselves; and even the Officers of all Ranks were expos'd to all the Hardships of the Weather and the Soil, without Horses, Servants, Change of Cloaths, or any kind of Refreshment whatsoever; for the Baggage was order'd round to Exeter, and from thence by Water to Exeter, whither the Prince was at the same time directing his March, as fast as such a Variety of Embarrassments would give leave. It is said his Highness exerted himself in an (x) extraordinary manner on this Occasion: That he order'd Horses, Carriages and Provisions from the neighbouring Country; and that nevertheless, his Army suffer'd so much in this March, that had it lasted two Days longer, he would have been reduced to great Extremities; of which, however, the King, by a strange Fatality, was in no Condition to take the Advantage.

A. D. 1688.

His Highness, had, moreover, the additional Mortification to find the People not so forward to receive him as he expected: They had smarted so lately and so severely for the Share they had rashly taken in Monmouth's Adventure, that they dreaded to embark again, and therefore stood aloof, not daring to join the Deliverer, tho' longing for the Deliverance. Sir William Courtney had been deeply engag'd in Lord Ruffel's Affair; and yet tho' the Prince of Orange took up his Quarters the two first Nights after his landing, at his House, we do not find any Mention made of Sir William himself, or that any of his Tenants or Neighbours join'd his Highness. This gave a sensible Damp to his Ardour, and caus'd him to make his Approaches towards Exeter with so much the more Caution. Captain Hicks, the Brother of the Non-conformist Minister who suffer'd under Jeffreys, was first sent thither to feel the Pulse of the Inhabitants, and to enlist such as offer'd into the Prince's Service. But no sooner was he arriv'd, and began to enter upon his Commission, than he was apprehended by a Warrant from the Mayor, and an Order was made for his Commitment, but not executed for fear of the Populace. He was nevertheless detain'd in Custody, and so continued till Lord Mordaunt and Dr. Burnet with three or four Troops of Horse came up to redeem him. There were no Soldiers in the Place, nor was it capable of Defence. The Gates were nevertheless shut for Form's Sake against the Prince and his Partizans, as against Enemies; nor when Lord Mordaunt had obtain'd Admittance, on his requiring them to be open'd on Pain of Death, would the Mayor acknowledge his Highness in any Capacity, or pay him any Compliment, or accept of any Deputation from him. The next Day, being the fourth after his landing, the Prince himself made his Entry, and met with no better Countenance than his Fore-runners had done before him. Dr. Lampugh the Bishop took wing on the first News of his Highness's Approach; and upon his Appearance at Court, was, for the Example's sake, rewarded with the Archbishopric of York, which had been so long kept vacant for another Person. The Dean also withdrew; and we shall find the whole Hive of Canons, Chanters, &c. took the first Opportunity to shew, that they were of the same Sentiments with their Superiors. Upon Sunday the 11th (of November) Dr. Burnet took Possession of the Cathedral Pulpit, and

The Prince does not find the Countenance he expected.

[Robin.]

(x) We are told by the Author of the State of Europe, That it was first offer'd to the Count de Roy, a Foreigner likewise, and that he cashier'd himself, under pretence that his Ignorance of the Language made him incapable of that Honour.

(*) It is remember'd, by one of his own Writers, That one of his Parties went to Tor-Atley, and carry'd off with a Provisions, Horses, &c. took the first Opportunity to shew, that they were of the same Sentiments with their Superiors. Upon Sunday the 11th (of November) Dr. Burnet took Possession of the Cathedral Pulpit, and in a long (y) Discourse, endeavour'd to convince his Audience, That in the whole Progress of their Undertaking, God had shewn himself to be of the Prince's Side, and had now chose to begin the Deliverance of England on the same Day that it had been formerly devoted to Ruin and Destruction. This is a Circumstance which the Doctor in his History has thought fit to pass over. But then he endeavours to account for the Bishop and Dean's running away (so he phrases it) and the standing off of the Clergy, tho' they were sent for, and very gently spoke to by the Prince, by saying, "That the Doctrines of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance had been carry'd so far and preached so much, that they could not, all on the sudden, get out of that Entanglement, into which they had, by long thinking and speaking, all one way, involv'd themselves; or, they were assur'd to make so quick a Turn." Possibly the little Effect of these very gentle Speeches of the Prince became manifest on the Sunday, by the Non-Attendance of the Clergy to this Discourse of the Doctor's; and for that Reason it was, that a new Experiment was try'd on them the next Day, by requiring all the Canons and Choristers to assist at a solemn Te Deum, in the Prince's happy Voyage, and safe landing. But neither had this the full Effect; the Canons did not appear at all; and tho' the Choristers did so far condescend as to assist in the Service, no sooner had Dr. Burnet begun to read the Prince's Declaration, than they all to a Man withdrew. The Doctor, however, persever'd; and when he came to the Close of it, added, God save the Prince of Orange, without any Mention of his Majesty; which was so much the more remarkable, since Policy as yet requir'd, that he should be treated with all the Decency and Respect imaginable, and Christianity, that we should pray even for our Enemies.

The same Part that Burnet play'd among those of the establish'd Church, Ferguson, who was also in his Highness's Train, undertook to play among his dissenting Brethren, and met with the same, or rather worse, Success: For Burnet got peaceable Possession of the Cathedral, tho' he could not prevail on the Posses belonging to it, to officiate jointly with him. But Ferguson was oblig'd to force his way into the Meeting-house, and met with no more Countenance than the Success of such Violence could give him.

As the Prince was fully persuaded, that immediately upon his landing, the whole Country would have come in to him; and that the only Struggle among all Sorts of Protestants would have been, who should have been foremost in their Acknowledgments to their common Saviour, it is no wonder that the extraordinary Cheerfulness which he shew'd on his first coming ashore should vanish, as soon as he found the State of things so different from his Expectations. Instead, therefore, of advancing any farther into the Country, in order to take Advantage of the first Surprise, and of the unprepar'd Condition of the King's Affairs, he linger'd at Exeter for many Days together, in hopes the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and others, who were to verify his Declaration, would fulfil their Engagements. At last, however, growing out of Patience, and perhaps out of Heart, he call'd a general Council of War, in which it was (2) propos'd to re-embark for Holland, by whom is not specified, nor on what Considerations the Motion was suspended or over-ru'd: But that such a Motion was made, is sufficient to prove, that the Force his Highness had brought with him, was indeed insufficient to manage the Kingdom, without dividing it against itself, in which Case, no Kingdom can stand.

His Majesty, in the mean while, made his Use of the Discouragements which had thus befallen the Prince: That the Bishop had left Exeter: That none but the Rabble join'd his Highness: That Ferguson was forc'd to break open the Meeting-house: And that the Invaders had not only taken 300 l. from the Collector of the Excise, but confin'd the Man for not being over-forward to give up his Trust, were severally made Articles in the Gazette, in hope they would render the Prince and his Adherents contemptible in the Eyes of the People, and deter even the most disobligh'd and most desperate from joining him.

But this Sunshine did not continue long. Major Barrington of Worcester the Gentry of Devonshire, and Somersetshire, shuck off their Escapes and came in Troops to join his Highness: And among them Sir Edward Seymour, so often already spoken of; at whose Instance, that they might no longer be a Rope of Sand, as he phras'd it, an Association was drawn up, and sign'd by all present, to this Effect, viz. That they did engage to Almighty God, to the Prince of Orange, and to one another, to stick firm to the Assistance of his Highness, the Defence of the Protestant Religion, the Laws and Liberties of the People of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and never to depart from that Cause, till their said Religion, Laws, and Liberties were so far secur'd, in a free Parliament, that they should no more be in Danger of falling under Popery and Slavery. And that whereas their engaging in this Common Cause, under the Protection of the Prince of Orange, might be a Means of exposing his Person to the desperate and cur'd Delights of Papists and other bloody Men, they did farther engage themselves to Major Barrington of Worcester the Gentry of Devonshire and Somersetshire shuck off their Escapes and came in Troops to join his Highness.

An Association form'd and sign'd.

(1) His Text was the last Verse of the 107th Psalm: Why is noise, and will ye blow their things, even they shall understand for Lovely kindess of the Lord.

(2) Lord Dilwyn observes, That when the Prince saw to very few resort to him, after he had been some Days on Shore, he began to look towards his Ships, and had actually gone away if the Scene had not very speedily chang'd.

A. D. 1688. God and to one another, in case any such Attempts should be made upon him, to pursue not only those who made them, but all their Adherents, and all they should find in Arms against them, with the utmost Severity of just Revenge, to their Ruin and Destruction: And that the executing any such Attempt should not prevent them from pursuing the Cause they did then undertake, but, on the contrary, should encourage them to carry it on with all the Vigour that so barbarous a Practice should deserve.

His Highness
approb'd them for being so tardy.

But however feasible or serviceable the Meeting was which produced this Association, his Highness, in his first Address to the Gentlemen who compos'd it, could not help giving vent, somewhat ungraciously, to his Spleen, at their Expence: "You see, said his Highness, we are come according to your Invitation, and our Promise. Our Duty to God obliges us to protect the Protestant Religion; and our Love to Mankind, your Liberties and Properties. We expected you, that dwell so near the Place of our Landing, would have join'd us sooner; not that it is now too late, nor that we want your military Assistance so much as your Countenance and Presence; to justify our declared Pretensions, rather than to accomplish our good and gracious Designs." Here his Highness clear'd up a little, and proceeded to say, "Tho' we have brought both a good Fleet and a good Army to render these Kingdoms happy, by rescuing all Protestants from Popery, Slavery, and arbitrary Power; by restoring them to their Rights and Properties established by Law, and by promoting of Peace and Trade, which is the Soul of Government, and the very Life-Blood of a Nation; yet we rely more on the Goodness of God, and the Justice of our Cause, than on any human Force and Power whatever. Yet, since God is pleas'd we shall make use of human Means, and not expect Miracles, for our Preservation and Happiness; let us not neglect making use of this gracious Opportunity, but, with Prudence and Courage, put in execution our so honourable Purposes. Therefore, Gentlemen, Friends, and Fellow-Protestants, we bid you and all your Followers most heartily welcome to our Court and Camp. Let the whole World now judge, if our Pretensions are not just, generous, sincere, and above Price; since we might have even a Bridge of Gold to return back: But it is our Principle and Resolution, rather to die in a good Cause, than live in a bad one; well knowing, that Virtue and true Honour is its own Reward, and the Happiness of Mankind our great and only Design."

It is in this Place to be remember'd, that Mr. Spoke, the Fellow-servant with Braden, for being too inquisitive into the Murder of Lord Essex, was now at Exeter, as a Spy for the King, having been retain'd (if his own (a) Account is to be depended upon) with an Offer of refunding to him 5000 l.

which had been paid into the Exchequer, for purchasing the Peace of his Family, and the Deposit of 5000 l. more in any Goldsmith's Hands, for his Use, when he had executed the Service required; and having retir'd those tempting Considerations, in order to create the more Confidence in his Majesty, and to be more serviceable to his Highness, to whose Cause, we are to understand, he was by Principle devoted, he tells us himself, That the King fell into the Snare; that he took this generous Refusal of his for such a Mark of his sincere Intentions to serve him, that he made no Difficulty to trust him with three blank Passes, one sign'd by himself, and two by Lord Percerham, in these Words: Suffer the Bearer hereof to pass, and repose freely, at all Hours, Times, and Seasons, without any Molestation, Interruption, or Denial: That he set out directly for Exeter; that falling in with Colonel Talmaff, who commanded the Prince's advanced Guard, he communicated to him the Commission he had receiv'd from the King, and the Use he design'd to make of it for the Service of his Highness: That Colonel Talmaff gave him a Letter of Recommendation to Mr. Brentinck, who introduced him to the Prince, to whom he gave the Passes he had receiv'd from his Majesty, and who made no small Use of them: That his Highness was pleas'd to honour him with his Confidence, and from time to time to peruse the Letters which he sent to the King; the Tendency of which was, to work upon the timorous Disposition of his Majesty and his Ministers, by assuring him, that several of his greatest Officers wanted nothing but an Opportunity of being near the Prince's Army to go over to him; and thereby to raise a Mutiny and Jealousy in his Mind, even of those who were heartily and sincerely in his Interest.

Thus far Mr. Spoke: And we learn from Bishop Burnet, that the first Persons of Quality who actually did join the Prince were, the Lord Colchester the eldest Son of the Earl of Rivers, Mr. Wharton, Mr. Russell, Brother to the late Lord, and the Earl of Abington; &c. But the Bishop has forgot to observe, that Lord Colchester was the first Soldier in the King's Service, who deserted him: He was Lieutenant of Lord Dover's Troop of Life-Guards; and, besides four of his Men whom he prevail'd on to follow him, he was accompany'd by Colonel Golfrey, John How, Esq; and about sixty Horsemen more. The Lord Lovelace made the next Attempt in the Prince's Favour; but not with the same Success: For, as he was endeavouring to pass through Cirencester with his Corps, which consisted of about seventy Horse very well appointed, he fell in with a Party of the Militia, who had been posted there by the Duke of Beaufort's sharp Skirmishers, in which Lord Lovelace himself, and thirteen of his Followers, were taken Prisoners, and several more wounded. About the same time, Spoke's Intrigues betray the King.

A. D. 1688.
Lord Corbory's
Defiance.

Lord Corbory, who was just come to the Rendezvous at Salisbury, with the King's own Regiment of Horse, commanded by the Duke of Berwick, the Regiment of Horse commanded by the Duke of St. Albans, and his own Regiment of Dragoons, and who knew the first of those Dukes was to be there that Night, and the Lord Feverham the next Day, pretending he had receiv'd Orders from his Majesty to that Purpose, caus'd the two Regiments of Horse, and his own of Dragoons to march to Dorchester, under pretence of beating up the Enemy's Quarters at Honiton; but, in reality, to carry them over to the Prince of Orange; who, on his Side, to facilitate the Junction, order'd a Body of his own Forces to advance twenty Miles to receive them: There was a Necessity to march full speed, as well to prevent a Pursuit on one hand, as to recover the Shelter of the Dutch on the other: Accordingly, his Lordship posted on for thirty-eight Miles together; having, in that whole March, halted but two Hours; But few of his Officers were in the Secret; among whom Lieutenant-Colonel Langston is particularly mention'd: And this Over-haste drew him into a Suspicion with the rest; so that, when the Dutch were in fight, a Whisper ran among them, that they were betray'd: His Lordship, we are told, had not the Presence of Mind that is critical an Affair requir'd; consequently could not prevent the Confusion which follow'd: The Major Part immediately march'd about, and made as much haste back to Salisbury as their present Fatigue would give leave; and the rest, having follow'd their Leader till they were within the Prince's Guards, could not retreat; but nevertheless continu'd in such ill Humour, that nothing less than a Large of a Month's Pay could satisfy them. Both Sides affect'd to exult on this Occasion; the one, because they had not lost the whole Party; and the other, because they had gain'd some, and because they expected many more to follow the same Example. Bishop Burnet says, "This gave us great Courage, and shew'd us, that we had not been deceiv'd in what was told us of the Inclinations of the King's Army."

The King and Queen embark

The same Reasoning also prevail'd at Court; for, whatever Countenance the King and his Ministers put on, they were in perpetual Fear that the Ground was hollow underneath them, and that it would give way when they stood most in need of its Support: The rest of the Army, the Artillery, and even the King's Equipage, were on the Road to Salisbury, when the News of that ungrateful Incident was brought up; and the immediate Effect was, a sudden Order for them all to halt; for it was now become a Question, whether his Majesty ought to trust his Person among those who had so little Zeal for his Service, and who lay so open to the Designs and Practices of his Enemies. And possibly it was at this Crisis that his Majesty's best Friends advis'd him to call a Parliament without delay, before his Subjects importun'd him on that Head; assuring him, That, if any Attempt was made upon his Royal Person or Authority, it would certainly engage many honest Men to stand by him; and that, besides, it would always be in his Power to prorogue or dissolve it, and, at last, to trust to his Forces: But, in answer to this, we are further told, the Jesuits, who entirely possess'd him, represent'd, That, in such case, the thing to be most fear'd was, the Union of those Forces with the Parliament against him; or, at least, that the Majority in Parliament would have the Majority of the Army at their Devotion: And that if, on the other hand, he stood his Ground resolutely and firmly, if he rejected all Expedients, and plac'd his whole Confidence in his Army, they would acknowledge no Master but him, and would do their Duty bravely, in the Belief that in fighting for him they fought also for themselves. The last of these Advices prov'd the most palatable, and for that Reason was follow'd: And it was upon the Whole concluded, both in the Camp and the Cabinet, that the last Appeal should be made to the Sword, and that the King should take the Field; his very Presence among the Soldiery being held alike sufficient to inspire them with Courage, and strike a Terror into the Enemy.

[History of the

rejected.

It was accordingly resolv'd, that the Troops, &c. should pursue their March, and that his Majesty should follow them forthwith: But first, a Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting the holding of Exeter Fair, that evil dispos'd Persons might not avail themselves of that Pretence to join the Prince of Orange; And that the Populace of London might not be impell'd by their Wants and Distresses to raise a Sedition, his Majesty signify'd his Pleasure to the Bishop and Lord Mayor, That they should cause such Public Collections to be made throughout the said City and Suburbs, and Parts adjacent, as should be competent for the Relief of such as, thro' the Calamities of the Times, stood in need of it.

Poor.

But, notwithstanding this and the like Precautions, his Majesty found himself unable to shake off his Fears. There was a Spirit in the City, that he knew was not to be won, that he durst not provoke, and that was, nevertheless, to be guarded against. If it was necessary for him to go in Person against the Prince of Orange, it was as necessary for the Queen and her Son to fly. And his Concern for their Safety induc'd him to alter his first Resolution of taking his whole Force with him, in order to leave such a Body of Troops as should be sufficient for their Protection in all Events.

In the mean time it became the Talk without Doors, that his Majesty had declar'd himself resolv'd not to call a Parliament, but that whoever should presume to require it of him, would incur his highest Displeasure. This was matter of great Concern to those who were anxious for an Accommodation, and of as much Pleasure to those who thought it their Interest to enflame the Broil, and who knew that the King could, upon no Ground whatever, be attack'd with more Advantage or Success than this. Hence it follow'd, that both those Parties, without entering into each other's Views and Motives were easily brought to a Meeting at the Bishop of Rochester's; and when together, consisted of the following Persons, namely, The Archbishops of Canterbury and York (Lampugh who had lately fled from the Prince of Orange) the Bishops of St. Asaph, Ely, Rochester, Peterborough, and Oxford; the Dukes of Norfolk, Devon, and Ormond; the Marquis of Halifax; the Earls of Oxford, Dorset, Anglesey, Nottingham, Clare, Clarendon, Burlington, and Rochester; the Viscount Newport; the Lords Chandos, Poget, Carberry, and Ossington. To petition the King for a free Parliament, was what they all agreed in; as also, that his Majesty would entertain some Expedient for keeping the Peace in the mean while: But when the following Clause came to be propos'd, viz. That the Peers who had join'd the Prince might sit in that free Parliament, Debates ensued, the Parties divided, and upon the whole, it was rejected (as needless, says Bishop Kennet) by a great Majority: Upon which the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Oxford and Nottingham, and the Lord Carberry withdrew; and the Petition agreed upon was drawn up in the following Words:

A Meeting of several Lords to petition the King for a Parliament.

The Petition.

" May it please your Majesty, We your Majesty's most loyal Subjects, in a deep Sense of the Miseries of a War now breaking forth in the Bowels of this your Kingdom, and of the Danger to which your Majesty's sacred Person is thereby like to be expos'd, and also of the Divisions of your People, by reason of their present Grievances, do think ourselves bound in Conscience of the Duty we owe to God, and our holy Religion, to your Majesty, and our Country, most humbly to offer to your Majesty, That in our Opinion, the only visible way to preserve your Majesty, and this your Kingdom, would be the calling of a Parliament, regular and free in all its Circumstances. We therefore do most earnestly beseech your Majesty, that you would be graciously pleas'd, with all Speed, to call such a Parliament, wherein we shall be most ready to promote such Councils and Resolutions of Peace and Settlement in Church and State, as may conduce to your Majesty's Honour and Safety, and to the quieting the Minds of your People. We do likewise humbly beseech your Majesty, in the mean time, to use such Means for the preventing the Effusion of Christian Blood, as to your Majesty shall seem most meet. And your Petitioners shall ever pray." &c.

As it was now no longer to be fear'd that the Pretenders of Petitions would be prosecuted as Criminals, the two Archbishops, and the Bishops of Ely and Rochester undertook to present this, in the Name of the rest; which they accordingly did on 17th of November, and receiv'd the following Answer:

" My Lords, What you ask of me, I most passionately desire: And I promise you, upon the Faith of a King, That I will have a Parliament, and such an one as you ask for, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this Realm: For, how is it possible a Parliament should be free in all its Circumstances, as you petition for, whilst an Enemy is in the Kingdom, and can make a Return of near an hundred Voices?"

The King's Answer.

Both Petition and Answer were immediately made public, and gave rise to a warm, but short, (b) Controversy, in which the Controversy between the

(b) The two Papers, which were exchange'd on this Occasion, and which afford an excellent Comment on the Duty-proceedings of these Times, are as follow:

" Some Reflections upon the humble Petition to the King's most excellent Majesty, of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal now published the 17th of November 17, 1688.

That the Power-makers are misled, is a Truth our Saviour hath left recorded in the holy Scriptures, and those are truly to be honoured, who can contribute any thing to his happy Work: But that either this Way of petitioning, or the Matter in it desired, is likely to produce to great a Blessing, is a Question worthy serious Consideration.

I shall first therefore take notice of some of the dubious Expressions in the Petition, and then lay down some few Reasons why I judge the Petition in itself unreasonable; and, lastly, endeavour to show how unpracticable the summoning of a Parliament is at this present.

The Expression, That a War is now breaking forth in the Bowels of the Kingdom, shews, that their Lordships either know, or foresee, that a civil War is fomenting; and I pray God, this Petition do not, more than any thing else, occasion it; or that the Prince of Orange, intends to carry on the War through the Bowels of the Kingdom: Whereas those that wish well to the King hope it will be kept in and about the Parts where he is hindred.

Secondly, As to the Division of the People under their present Grievances: it seems to many true Members of the Church of England, that it had been every what as agreeable to your Lordships Character, to have rather thank'd his Majesty for his late extraordinary and gracious Favours, than to have accus'd the Subjects at this time with the Appearances of Grievances, without any Intimation what they were; for it is well manifest, that, by such remonstrating of Grievances, the People were inclin'd to that bloody Rebellion in 1641.

As to the Expression, That your Lordships think yourselves bound in Conscience, of the Duty you owe to God and our holy Religion, and to his Majesty and our Country, may hardly consist in the Matter, that, in your Opinion, the only visible Way to preserve his Majesty, and his Kingdom, would be, the calling of a Parliament regular and free in all its Circumstances: I hope to make out, that the summoning a Parliament now is so far from being the only Way to effect these things, that it will be one of the principal Causes of much Misery to the Kingdom; and I am here both our Duty to God and our holy Religion, as well as to his Majesty and our Country, doth plainly enjoin us to use one other effectual Means to obviate the Miseries of a civil or intestine War; which is, the keeping inviolably our Allegiance to our Sovereign, and effectually joining with him to resist all his Enemies, whether foreign Aggressors, or native Rebels: And it is much to be wonder'd at, that this Duty, so well known to your Lordships, should never be mention'd.

As to the regular and free Parliament in all its Circumstances, I shall now proceed to prove, that at this Season, all our Wishes for such an one are impotent, and must be ineffectual.

First, It is a known Truth, and fully experienced, That, whenever the People are in a great Ferment, and contrary Parties are bandying one against another, the giving Liberty to the People to meet, in great Bodies, is dangerous to the Government; and you yourselves not long since were of that Opinion, when you oppos'd the vehement Addresses to King Charles II. for summoning a Parliament, when he judg'd it would strengthen the Faction against him; and you very well know, when great Heats were among the Members, and unreasonable Votes were pass'd against the late Succession, and other Matters endangering the Government, the King was oblig'd to prorogue some Parliaments from time to time, that such Separation might produce more sober Councils: And then the great Cry was, That, for the Preservation of the King's Person and our Religion, they were to chuse to have a Parliament meet.

Secondly, It is impossible there can be a regular and free Election, while the Electors are so violently divided; and the petitioning Lords are on the one hand treated as Incendiaries at least, if not Rebels; and on the other, it is suggested, that no Faith ought to be given to Papists; and that the

A.D. 1688.

Part of them being so vehement Wilners of the Success of the Prince of Orange, that they fight all the Miseries that unavoidably will fall on the Country thereby, upon the bare Hope that he will preserve Religion and Property. Now, in such a time as this, when, if we will give Credit to the Prince's Declaration, there are so many that have invited him, can it be safe for the King to grant a Commission, even to the People, we assemble in such great Conflux, as may afford them Opportunity of lifting themselves against him.

Thirdly, If we yield that Elections can be without outrageous Riots; yet, when the Parliament is met, it is requisite by the very Constitution, that every Part of that august Assembly should be free in their Assent or Dissent to what is to be debated; and that Freedom is as fundamentally necessary in the Person of the King, as in the Members of either House; and that one of the proper and necessary Circumstances of that Convention ought to be, that all the Members shall be present. I shall therefore show, that, at this time, none of these can be practicable.

First, As to the King: While such powerful Enemies are in the Country, and so many ready to catch any Opportunity to join with them, how can the King be absent from his Army? the providing for, cherishing, animating, and ordering of which, will sufficiently employ the most intelligent of Princes. And none can think, that any Prince can watch the Motions of such an Enemy, and time his Opportunities of assaulting them, or defending himself; and, at the same time, be embroil'd with a Party in the Hobbs, that may as dangerously be levelling their Votes against him, as the Invaders are their Artillery.

However, here can be no Freedom to the King, who undisturb'd never; because the impending Storm may fright his Council, that they may advise to the yielding of those things that may be of ill Consequence to the Government; for whatever loses the King's just Prerogative, as he may do, in depriving him of exercising his negative Voice, is at one time or other prejudicial to his Subjects.

Secondly, As to the Lords: There can be no free Conventions of them, since several of them have so far forgot their Allegiance, that they are actually in the Prince of Orange's Army, and many other Lords are attending the King, and their Charges; so that, while their Armies are in being, they cannot meet in their House but by their Princes's Will. I suppose none can expect will be allow'd to the Peers that are in Rebellion, if we may be allow'd to call that such, which all our Laws adjudgeth.

The like may be said for the House of Commons: All the Gentlemen of Interest in their Country, by their Allegiance are bound to serve the King in his Wars at his Command; and will be few enough to keep their respective Counties in Peace. And I am confident none will think that a Parliament, as this ought to be that is desired, should consist of more who have been, than consent that to public Affairs, or have small Interests in their Counties.

So that, upon the Whole, I cannot see how any free Parliament can meet, unless it be such a Convention as the Saxons obtain'd of the Britons on Salisbury-Plains; where the mainstems of both People were to meet unarmed, and there amicably adjust Matters in difference; but it is well known, that the Saxons under their long Coats had their Weapons, wherewith they flew the Flower of the British Nobility, and thereby rendered their Conquest more easy.

It is true, such a Stratum is not now like to take effect; but the King, and those that with will to the Succession of the Monarchy and the Preservation of their Country, must needs fear, that there will be as dangerous Councils within the Houses as may be in the open Fields; and thereby little rather expected from such a Parliament, which can redound to the public Good of the Kingdom.

Fourthly, Those spiritual and temporal Lords, that have signed this Petition, either have not, or they have, consulted the Prince of Orange, before they propos'd this Advice.

If they have not consulted him, they ought to satisfy the King how they can warrant a Cessation of Arms on the Prince's Side, or how they can hinder him from advancing further, to awe Debates in the House, or what Assurance they can give that he will acquiesce in the free Decision of the Matters propos'd; or that he will peacefully depart out of the Land, when things are settled, and will not pretend a Stay here, till the vast Summ be paid him that he hath expended on this Occasion; or, lastly, will not find new Occasions of questioning the Security of Performance of any Agreement to be made.

If they have consulted the Prince, they ought to show his Commission, obliging them to make Papists, or show the Heads of those Grievances he demands to be redress'd; for some they urge in their Petition there are, which distract the People: But, I suppose they are more careful of their Heads, than to own any such Correspondence.

If these noble Persons would have effectually sav'd Effusion of Blood, they should rather have used all their Interest to have kept the Prince of Orange in his own Country, tho' with his Army and Fleet in readiness, and have obtain'd his sending his Demands; and have waited, like dutiful Subjects, till the King had conven'd his Parliament; and have try'd how gracious the King would have been in redressing Grievances, and securing Religion and Property; and, after the King's Refusal, there might have been some Colour for his Invasion; but none, upon any Pretence whatsoever, to have invited him to it.

Fifthly, Those who will not openly, and with a bare Face, justify the Prince of Orange's Pretensions, cannot think it consistent with the Honour of the King, to stoop so low as to summon a Parliament at the Direction of an Invader, who can never be conceiv'd to desire it with that Espérance, if he did not judge it very much conducive to his Interest: For which very Reason, the King ought to be jealous of such Councils.

And, I usually conceive, those Peers are not sufficiently considered how prejudicial this sort of Address may be to the King's Affairs, and how much it will conduce to the further alienating of the Affections of the Subjects from the King, when they shall hear of his Death, to comply at present with this Expedient, and never hear the Reasons thereof; since they have not divulged his Majesty's gracious Answer, together with their Petition; and I am sure, at this time, the putting the King upon such a Dilemma is the greatest Diservice can be done him, and very little inferior to joining with his Enemies.

I might add many more Arguments to prove, that the King cannot in honour yield to this Advice, without making that undeniable Preterogative the Laws give him, of making War, or concluding Peace, if those Matters should be submitted to the Arbitrament of the two Houses; or owning that the Allegiance of his Subjects did not bind them to assist him in the Defence of his Crown and Dominions, without the Votes of a Parliament. But I shall conclude with some few Considerations I humbly offer to those Right Reverend and noble Lords, and all those who are of the same Judgment with them, to reflect upon.

First then, I desire them to consider, whether it will not be more glorious, and agreeable to the Principles of our Religion, essentially to assist our undoubted lawful Sovereigns, than to suffer him to be detron'd solely because he is a Roman Catholic; since the Papists themselves, tho' they neither take the Oath of Allegiance or Supremacy, yet do, and ever have declared, that if any Roman Catholic Prince, yea the Pope himself in Person, should invade any King of England, tho' a Protestant, yet that he was bound to oppose such an Invasion, as a King against a King, as much as if they were Protestants.

Secondly, Whether, since the true and original Cause of this Invasion, and consequently of all the Bloodshed these Lords so earnestly desire to prevent, hath not been the denying to concur with the King in establishing of Liberty of Conscience, even with such Security to the Protestant Religion, and Church of England, as could be desired; and whether, in all human Probability, that would not be more conducive to establish the public Tranquillity of the Kingdom, and its Increase in Wealth and People, and consequently the most efficacious Means to reduce the Dutch to be just and tractable Allies and Neighbours, rather than any thing can be effected by this Invasion, or the trucking to such avowed Enemies to our Country, our Religion, and our King.

Thirdly, Whether the King's entire Trust in the Fidelity of his own Subjects for his Defence, and not admitting of foreign Aids, that were, sought for, profess'd, do not oblige all that have any Sense of Gratitude or Duty, to aid him to the very utmost against such Foreigners, as so ungenerally and so unjustly invade him; and when it hath pleas'd God to give Success to the King's just Arms, we are not to doubt, but the King, according to his solemn Promise in his late Majesty's Declaration will specially call a Parliament, and, in it, redress all such Grievances as his People can justly complain of, with a full and ample Security to the Church of England and all his Protestant Subjects; which it will much more be our Interest to have in a truly harmonious and free parliamentary Way at that time established, than at this present in a tumultuary and precipitate Manner, so patch'd up, as will not be durable, and the more earnestly we desire to see this good Work to be set upon, the more shall the Nobility and Gentry should make to expel those who hinder'd the Convention of that Parliament, which was much more likely to have settled Matters to the Content of the King and his People, than this Invasion can ever hope to effect.

A.D. 1688.

the People could have no Security but in the Sword of their Guardian Angel the Prince of Orange.

On the very same Day that this Petition was presented, the King was to begin his Journey to Salisbury; but before he set out, as if to shame his Subjects and Soldiers into Fidelity and Obedience, he summoned such of his Officers as were then about him, into his Presence; among whom, it is particularly remember'd, were the Duke of Grafton, the Lord Churchill, and the Colonels Kirk and Trelawney, and spoke to them in the manner following:

The King's Speech to his Officers.

"According to the Lords Petition, I have engaged my Royal Word to call a free Parliament, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted the Kingdom; and I am resolv'd to do all that lies in my Power to quiet the Minds of my People, by securing their Religion, Laws, and Liberties. If you desire any thing more, I am ready to grant it. But if after all this any of you is not satisfi'd, let him declare himself; I am willing to grant Paffes to all such as have a mind to go over to the Prince of Orange, and spare them the Shame of deserting their Lawful Sovereign." Father Orleans adds, That this seem'd to make some Impression at that time; and that they, one and all, declar'd, "They were satisfi'd, and that they were ready to spill the last Drop of their Blood in his Service." At the same time, his Majesty recommended the Care of the City to the Lord Mayor, telling him, "He left a sufficient Number of Troops for their Defence: That upon any Exigence, he was to apply himself to the Privy Council; assuring him, That if he returned victorious, he would punctually perform what he had already promised, for the Security of their Religion and Liberties."

By the Privy Council, we are to understand the Cabinet, of whom the Majority were Papists, and not one had any Credit with the Public, because all had either advis'd or countenanc'd the violent Measures, which had brought on the present Troubles, While, therefore, the Administration continued in the same Hands, the People expected a Continuance of the same Measures, and consequently, nothing the King could say made any Impression. Thus he had scarce turn'd his Back upon his Capital, before that turbulent Spirit began to shew itself, of which he had entertain'd such cruel Apprehensions. Every Man was become Statesman and Patriot, and thought himself privileg'd to do what was right in his own Eyes. What was Zeal at first, by Degrees turn'd to Phrenzy. No News was pleasing that did not help to increase the natural Ferment. He that retain'd any Degree of Temper, was suppos'd to have parted with his Honesty. And when such a licentious Damon had taken Possession of the Populace, 'tis perhaps less a Wonder that they began to discharge their Fury upon the Mass-houses, than that they did not proceed to a general (c) Massacre of the Priests.

A.D. 1688.

On the 10th the King arriv'd at Salisbury, having, to ingratiate himself with his Army, brought down with him in his Train a Protestant Chaplain, Mr. Chetwood, who, finding the Romish Priests in Possession of the Chapel in the Bishop's House, where his Majesty had taken up his Quarters, had the Courage to apply for leave to remove them, or to withdraw himself. A Request of this nature, at this time, had, in a manner, the Force of a Command: The Priests had Orders to dislodge, which, after some Dispute, they obeyed. Mr. Chetwood officiated in their stead. And tho' his Majesty was no occasional Conformist, his Officers crowded the Chapel, and overwhelm'd the Chaplain with their Carresses, not because they were more religious than before, but because the Current of the Times

He arrives at Salisbury.

"A modest Examination of the Petition of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal for the calling a free Parliament.

This Defence is grounded upon three fundamental Principles: 1. The Right of Petitioning. 2. The Necessity. 3. The Duty.

I. It is the undoubted Right of the Subjects to petition, being founded upon an Act of Parliament, and the highest Reason in the World; for that is a very monstrous Government, where the People must not approach their King, and acquaint him with their Grievances. The People have the greatest Property in the Land, and therefore the most concern'd when a foreign Enemy is upon it: Their Welfare is the supreme Law, and yet they must not desire to meet in order to consult their own Preservation. The Tyrants (the sworn Enemies to the English Nation) will take care of us, and our Posterity; therefore why should we trouble ourselves at this Justice? They can levy Money with a Proclamation, they can dispense with all Laws, and what should we do with a Parliament, when the whole Statute Book serves for no other End but to wipe the Tails of these reverend Savages, who fly into their dens and Thickets, at the very Sound of a House of Commons?

II. The Necessity, and that an indispensable one; the Government turn'd Top-sy-turvy, no Law, no Rule, all in a State of War; all Treaties broken, all Obligations ceas'd; and yet the People must not come together to know why or wherefore they fight, or how they may avoid destroying one another; they must hack and cut one another to Pieces blindfold, and to no other End, but to save the Tyrants and the Knaves, and to ruin themselves. But the most Reverend Bishops are told, that they shall have a free Parliament as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this Realm; that is, such a free Parliament as they were like to have had before the Prince came hither, suffred, cut, and hack'd by Mr. Brent and his Missionaries; or perhaps ten times worse, or rather none at all; for the Church of Rome is grown such an infamous Blackspot, that no body will trust her further than they can command her: She may be compar'd to the Tyger, which lows, sneaks, and lurches, as long as the Hunter is arm'd with his Spear and his Gun; but when once the Weapons are laid down, the Beast flies upon the unwary Forester, tears and devours him.

III. The Duty; for what better Office could those pious Prelates and Patriots of their Country do for the Public Good, than to make all People Friends, to save the Lives of many thousands, and to heal all our Wounds and Sores, which they of the Roman Faith have inflict'd upon a People too kind and good natur'd for such ravenous Monsters, who go about seeking whom they may devour. France, Ireland, Hungary, and the Valleys of Piedmont are still reeking with the Blood of their poor innocent Preys, and echoing with the Lamentations of a People ruin'd, by trampling these Crocodiles too much; and if God in his infinite Mercy had not watch'd over these Kingdoms, and sent a Gabriel to guard them, they have strandy fallen a Victim to the insatiable Prize, the lawless Fury, and untractable Barbarity of a sort of Animals call'd Caribbees; subtle and treacherous by Custom and Discipline, not to be chain'd by any Law, either of God or Man; and therefore every body knows how far we may rely upon them, when the Archangel leaves us.

Essex, Nov. 21, 1688.

(c) Obsequium, with an Air of Satisfaction, affirms, That a Priest seeking off with a Silver Candlestick, had his Hand, Candlestick, and all, cut off by a Goldsmith's Apprentice whom he knew.

A. D. 1688. Times set that way. This, it must be suppos'd, was no very pleasurable Sight to the King; in order, therefore, to get rid of a Man so dangerously popular, in a popular way, his Majesty removed Dr. Trevelyan from the Bishopric of Bristol to that of Exeter, and nominated Chetwood to succeed him; who, seeing the Times very unquiet, as we are told, continued quiet himself ever afterwards.

His Majesty had, however, the Pleasure, on the Evening of his Arrival, to be complimented by such of his Officers as were most professedly attach'd to him, and who, upon that Occasion, express'd their Abhorrence of Lord Cornbury's Desertion in the strongest Terms they could use. This, no doubt, was a Cordial to the drooping Spirits of the King; and on the strength of it, he agreed the next Day to visit the advanced Guard of his Army, which was quarter'd at Warmünster, but was prevented by a violent Bleeding at his Nose, which nothing could stop, and which was at last diverted by the opening a Vein.

Is prevented from visiting Warmünster's Guard by a bleeding at his Nose.

Almost all Authors take notice of this Incident, but not for the same Reason. Bishops, Statesmen and others only mention it, to show the Disorder of Mind the King was in, and to what a Degree it affected his Body. But Father Orleans, and his Followers, pretend it is accidental, and suppose that if it had not happen'd, his Majesty would immediately have been deliver'd up to his Enemies.

According to these last, it was at Lord Cornbury's Instance that he undertook this late Expedition, and a Plot was actually laid against him and Kirk, who commanded the Armistice, to carry him off, and put him into the Hands of the Prince of Orange. But this is confidently deny'd by those of the other side; and it is to be lamented that none of them have brought any Facts or Arguments to disprove it; more especially as Sir John Ker's Story seems to adopt the Story, and to disavow it, as the Talk and Belief of those Times.

It seems, however, to be generally agreed, that the same Day most of the chief Officers, and even some of those who had so lately made such Professions of their Fidelity, came in a Body to Lord Feverham, and gave him to understand, "That however devoted they were to his Majesty's Service, they could not in Conscience fight against a Prince who was concern'd with no other Design than to procure the calling a free Parliament for the Security of their Religion and Liberties." That Lord Feverham having conceiv'd a strong Suspicion of Lord Churchill, conjur'd his Majesty to lay him under arrest, as a Warning to his Confederates; That his Majesty refus'd to consent to it: That the next Day the said Lord, together with the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkeley, four or five Captains of his own Dragoons, &c. went over to his Highness; and that he left a Letter to the King behind him, which contain'd an Apology for what he had done; and in which, after acknowledging that he lay under the greatest personal Obligation to his Majesty, he alledg'd, that nothing but the inviolable Dictates of his Conscience, and a necessary Concern for his Religion (which no good Man could oppose, and with which he was instructed nothing ought to come into Competition) could have induc'd him to offer that Violence to his Interest and Inclination, which he had done. "Heaven knows, continu'd his Lordship, with what Partiality, my dutiful Opinion of your Majesty hath hitherto represent'd those unhappy Designs, which inconsiderate and self-interested Men had fram'd against your Majesty's true Interest and the Protestant Religion. But as I can no longer join with such to give a Pretext by Conquest to bring them to Effect, so will I always, with the Hazard of my Life and Fortune (so much your Majesty's Due) endeavour to preserve your Royal Person and lawful Rights, with all the tender Concern and dutiful Respect that becomes, &c."

A. D. 1688. The Duke of Grafton and Lord Churchill desert him.

It is easy to imagine how greatly the King must have been shock'd with such an Instance of Tenderness, Gratitude and Duty: But his Majesty had not Leisure now to ruminate long on one Misfortune; for they came on like Waves in Succession, and all broke full upon him. On the same Day that he was prevented from going to Warmünster, about an hundred and twenty of his Horse and Dragoons under the Command of Colonel Sarsfield, fell in with about thirty of the Prince of Orange's Men at Wincanton, who were in quest of Horses for the use of his Highness's Carriages, and who made so desperate a Defence, that Sarsfield, on a false Alarm that a Reinforcement of the Enemy was at hand, was glad to make off: And we are told, that the Account given by his Men of this inconsiderable Action, help'd to intimidate the King's whole Army. Close on the Heels of this Misadventure, his Majesty receiv'd Information that Lord Delamere had, on the 16th, founded the (r) Trumpet in Che-

A Storm at Wincanton

Lord Delamere declares for the Prince.

16. The Words are these, "We were told that a Number of great Men, Officers of the Army, and particular Confidence of the King, had revolted and gone over to the Prince of Orange; particularly, that on the nineteenth of November, the King then having reach'd Salisbury, where his Army was rendezvoued, the Lord Churchill, one of his Major Generals, under Presence of showing him his Outguards (would have) misled his Majesty into a Train which must have betray'd him to the Hands of a Party of the Prince of Orange's Army, had not an immediate bleeding at the Nose prevented the King from proceeding; and that the said Lord perceiving his Design to be thus frustrated, immediately went over to the Prince, accompanied by the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkeley and others; tho', it must be observ'd, that this Lord Churchill was rais'd from a Page to the King (when Duke) to the Degree of a Viscount of England, and in Possession of a great Estate therewith, which was entirely owing to his Majesty's Bounty.

(r) What his Lordship's particular Provocations had been, we have already seen; and what his declared Sentiments were of the Crisis, we find in his Speech to his Tenants, before he set out on the Expedition; the most material Part of which was as follows:

"I see all lies at Stake; I am to chuse whether I will be a Slave and a Papp, or a Protestant and a Freeman: And therefore, the Cause being thus, I shall think myself false to my Country, if I sit still at this time. I am of opinion, that when the Nation is deliver'd, it must be by Force shire for the Prince of Orange, and had set out from Boden-Doroni at the Head of one hundred and fifty Horse to join his Highness: And almost every Hour furnish'd him with new Reasons to apprehend, that the Infection would spread by Degrees through the whole Kingdom. In vain did he set forth by Proclamation, his Royal Promise of full and free Pardon to all such as, having been seduced by the false Suggestion and Misrepresentations of his Enemies, to join themselves with Foreigners in a most unnatural Invasion of their Country, should quit his said Enemies in twenty Days and return to their Allegiance: No body regarded it; and instead of reclaiming any one Deserter, he saw the whole Body of his Subjects on the point of following his Example. At this very Instant of Time, the Earl of Derbyshire, another of the patriot (f) Peers, had drawn together a Party of the Nobility and Gentry of the Northern Counties, with such of their Tenants and Followers as they could induce to take Arms after their Example, and march'd into Derby; where the Earl himself deliver'd a Paper to the Mayor, setting forth, That as Christians and good Subjects, they thought it their Duty to endeavour, to the utmost of their Power, to heal the present Distractions, and to prevent greater: That they were equally apprehensive of the sad Consequences which might arise from a foreign Army, and concern'd for the many Invasions of our Religion and Laws, which had given Occasion for it: That as the Meeting and Sitting of a Parliament had ever been the great Expedient on these Occasions, they were resolv'd to promote it; and to much the rather, since the Prince of Orange had declar'd himself willing to submit his Pretensions to their Determination: That they heartily wish'd and humbly pray'd his Majesty would content to this Expedient, in order to a future Settlement, and hop'd such a Temperament would be found, as might prevent the Army now on foot from giving any Interruption to their Proceedings: But that if it should prove otherwise, they would to their utmost defend the Protestant Religion, the Laws of the Kingdom, and the Rights and Liberties of the Subject.

At Nottingham it was yet further declar'd, That the Liberties and Privileges of Englishmen were their Birthright: That this Birthright, as by innumerable Grievances they had been made sensible, the Justicial Privy Council had labour'd to deprive them of: That not being willing to deliver over their Posterity to Popery and Slavery, they were resolv'd to oppose the same to the utmost, and with all their Might endeavour to recover their ancient Liberties, by joining with the Prince of Orange, whom they hop'd God Almighty had sent to their Rescue: That they hop'd all good Protestant Subjects would be assiduous to them therein, and not be beguerv'd by the opprobrious Terms of Rebel: That they did indeed own it to be Rebellion to resist a King governing by Law, but not to resist a Tyrant who made his Will the Law: That the late Mock-Swears of Reid's, were no other than Snarcs: And that they thought themselves bound in Conscience to rest on no Security that should not be approv'd by a free-elected Parliament, to whom, under God, they retir'd their Cause.

On the very same Day that this bold and notable Declaration was made at Nottingham, the Earl of Darby, who had been so long in the Confidence of the Prince of Orange, and whose Name had been so lately inserted in the Gazette, as one of those zealous and faithful Subjects, who had taken out a Commission to serve against him (g), surpriz'd the Garrison of Toré, and put the Governor, or by Miracle. It would be too great a Privilege to respect the latter, and therefore our Dutycasts must be by Force, and I hope this is the Time for it. Providence is now put into our Hands, and he that is just in this time, may very well expect that God will make, when the Fear of Affliction comes upon him, which he thought to avoid by being indifferent.

If the King prevail, farewell Liberty of Conscience, which had hitherto been allow'd, not for the sake of the Protestants, but in order to settle Popery. You may see what you are to expect, if he get the better; and he hath already given you of this Troop, a Tonic of the highest efficacy he will maintain in his Army: And yet you are of what sort of People (alluding to the Pop), who had been quarrell'd in their Country he intends his Army to consist of. And if you have not a mind to serve such Masters, then stand not by and see your Countrymen perish, which they are endeavouring to defend you.

(f) His Lordship, while a Member of the House of Commons, had dilated only himself by his Zeal for the Revolution; whether out of any private Animosity to the then Duke of York, or not, it is hard to determine: But 'tis certain there subsisted an irreconcilable Enmity between them, ever after. Dillon was the Earl's Follower; and, as it is said, Colonel Catwax was employ'd to assist him, in the Court, to persuade that his Resignment might transport him into some Extravagance, of which an Advantage might be taken, to humble it not raise him; that, if that was the Design, it fails, as it is said, in the Execution: For, tho' the Colonel actually carry'd his Commission to see for what he had, and even to draw Blood from him, he so far mov'd himself, as to proceed against him as the Law directed on such Occasions: And Lord Dillon, in a speech in the House of Peers, afterwards said, That he had heard the King interpose, and prevent'd Lord Dillon, that Catwax should never be allow'd to appear at Court again: But if the Proceedings were such, it is not clear, that Lord Dillon ever met him there again on any other the same spot, and immediately shut it in with him in the next Room.

The Colonel comply'd with what when it was required, to go down stairs from hence, he refus'd to give the least Satisfaction for his former behaviour, he instantly retir'd: Upon which the Earl took him to the Congress of which was, that his Lordship was resolv'd with a Westminster Lord Chief Justice Wray, and oblig'd to give in some 1000000000 personal Bail, and had a Surty for 2000000 more: What was still harder, when the Case came to be try'd, he was resolv'd the Privy Council should, upon the King, the Court avoided. That he should not be a Peer of the Realm, that he should be committed to the King's Bench, if it was pleas'd: And that he should give a Security for his good behaviour for a Year.

Thus far we have Authority on our Sides: And the Author of this Work has been told, that soon after this free Sentence was pass'd, the Countess her Mother, who had long absconded herself from Court, made her Appearance at the Circle; and having requested his Majesty, that she was come to pay her last Duty, presented that with an Acknowledgment, under the Hand of King Charles II. that he had intended to the Father, for she had seen that was now to be speak'd out of the Box.

(g) The Particulars of which are thus recounted by Sir Henry Spelman.

It is the wish of about a hundred Gentlemen, — Sir Henry Goodrich deliver'd himself to the King: — That there having been great Endeavours made by the Government of late Years to bring Popery into the Kingdom, and by many Devices to set a stopper to the Laws of the Land, there would be an proper Return of the many Grievances we labour'd under, but by a free Parliament; that now, as is the only Time to prevent a Pollution of that Sort; and that they could not make a better Pattern than had been set before them.

would have it in his Power to return upon his own Terms.

This is rightly call'd the worst Advice that his worst Enemy could have given him; and whether it was given at the Time and in the Manner here suggest'd or not, we shall find it had more weight with him than any other. Possibly, he was now so distract'd with what he felt, and what he fear'd, that he was no longer able to distinguish between right and wrong. Burnet is express, That he lost both Head and Heart at once. And Lord Delamere writes a long Letter to a Friend, which is extant in his Works, purposely to shew, that his Majesty's Fear had taken the Place of his Reason, and that all he did and said was the Result of that unworthy Passion. He had put his whole Trust in his Soldiers; and, says that Nobleman,

[P. 61, 62.]

"Never had any Prince in his Army so many Men whom he had personally oblig'd as King James had in his: For whilst he was Duke of York he was industrious to gain People of all Qualities; and what he did for any body, as well whilst he was Duke of York, as when he was King, was with so much Dispatch and so good a Grace, that his Favours carry'd with them a double Obligation, whereby he got the Character of a steady Friend, tho' other things gave him that of an irreconcilable Enemy." From all which his Lordship concludes, "That no Overture could have prevail'd with these Men to have deserted him, if they had had any sort of Gratitude or Sense of Honour." And yet this Army, or rather these Officers, whom he had thus meritoriously serv'd and oblig'd, slipp'd from his Grasp like Water; and he found, or thought he found, himself in so abandon'd and helpless a Condition, that all Hope was at an end; and that he had nothing left to do, but to commit himself to the Mercy of the Torrent, which he could no longer withstand.

Accordingly, no sooner was he inform'd, tho' falsely, that Marshall Schomberg was making a forced March to attack him, than he order'd his Forces to dislodge, and, with very sufficient Marks of Disorder, retir'd towards London. This Counter-motion was made the 25th, so that his Continuance at Salisbury was not quite six Days. The first Stage of his Retreat was to Abinger; where he supp'd that Night with the Prince of Denmark and the Duke of Ormond; and where they left him before Morning, together with the Lord Drax, Sir George Hewitt, and others: The King's own depending Behaviour having perhaps given them the Hint, that it was high Time to fulfil their Engagements to the stronger Side. His Highness, indeed, as Lord Churchill his Leader had done before him, made it a Case of Conscience; and, in a Letter to the King, endeavour'd to excite his Reverberation as well as he could, by urging his Majesty's own Example, who had preferred his Religion to all other Considerations. "Whilst the restless Spirit of the Enemies of the Reformed Religion, proceed'd his Highness, back'd by the cruel Zeal and (b) prevailing Power of France, justly alarm and unite all the Protestant Princes of Christendom, and engage them in so vast an Enterprise for the Support of it, can I act so dangerous and mean a Part, as to deny my Concurrence to such worthy Endeavours for disabusing of your Majesty, by the Reinforcement of those Laws, and Establishment of that Government, on which alone depends the Well-being of your Majesty, and of the Protestant Religion in Europe? This, Sir, is that irresistible and only Cause, that could come in competition with my Duty and Obligations to your Majesty, and be able to tear me from you, whilst the same affectionate Desire of serving you continues in me." &c.

By the Resemblance which this Letter bears to Lord Churchill's, even to the very Phrases, it is reasonable to think they were penn'd by the same Secretary; and the plain Truth is, that they acted by Concert; or, rather, that his Lordship was the Undertaker, and that his Highness gave himself up to his Direction. Bishop Burnet, as we have already seen, makes no difficulty to acknowledge as much; as also that Mr. Ruffel was the Negotiator between him and the Prince of Orange; and there is moreover a Passage in the Earl of Baharraz's Memoirs, which very sufficiently proves, that the Bishop may in this Matter be rely'd upon; for, speaking of the Earl of Argyle, and his Desire to be of the Orange-Party, he tells us, That he could not be admitted till his Request had been made known to Prince George; that the Condition upon which he was to be admitted was, the taking an Oath upon the Sacrament, to go in to the Prince of Orange whenever he land'd; and that he took the said Oath accordingly, in the Presence of the Duke of Ormond, and a Gentleman who belong'd to the Princess of Denmark.

Hence then it may, without any Violence, be concluded, that every Step which was taken by either of these eminent Deferters, was taken with mature Deliberation; and was purposely so tim'd and circumstanc'd, as should most effectually contribute to throw his Majesty into Despair, and of course facilitate the common Deliverance: Thus, on the Receipt of a Note address'd to Lady Churchill, giving an Account of the Prince of Denmark's Defection, the Princess and that Lady, in a Fright, we are to understand, left the Court (*) at Midnight, without staying to Prince George and the Duke of Ormond desert him.

(*) A Consideration which had never had any great Weight at the Court of Denmark.

(b) Mr. Leland, in his Life of the Duke of Marborough, has inserted the following Passage by way of Observation, but without mentioning from whom it is taken: "About five Weeks before the Princess left Whitehall, he had order'd a private State-council to be made, under presence of a more commonious Passage to the Lady Churchill's Lodgings, but in reality, that she might make her Escape that Way, when her Person or Liberty were in danger." The Night before her Royal Highness withdrew, the Lord-Chamberlain (Earl of Belmore) had Orders to apprehend the Ladies Churchill and Bowling, but the Princess being him to desert executing these Orders till she had spoken to the Queen; the Lord-to supply themselves with any Necessaries of any kind, and, under the Conduct of the Bishop of London, made the best of their Way to Northampton, where the Earl of that Place (who was the Bishop's Nephew) receiv'd her Highness with all imaginable Respect, form'd a Guard of Horse about her for her Protection, which by degrees increas'd to a little Army of Volunteers, who chose to be commanded by the Bishop, and of which Command, says his Brother of Salisbury, he too easily accepted.

There is yet another Circumstance or two relating to this Affair, which deserve a short Notice, as they lead yet farther to discover the Traces of Premeditation, tho' Endeavours have been us'd to pass it upon the Public for a sudden Thought, which took its Rise from the Prince's Dread of her Father's Displeasure only. The Bishop had then withdrawn himself from his usual Residence, to a private Lodging: No Reason is given why he did so: The King had just parted with him in Peace; nor was in a Condition to proceed with Rigor against a Father of the Church, however deeply concern'd against him: Lady Churchill was nevertheless in the Secret, and no sooner did the Note arrive, than she had recourse to his Lordship for Advice and Assistance; and he as readily undertook the Service: And, what is remarkable, her Highness made her Escape from Whitehall the very Night that the Prince her Consort left the King at Audover: So that, on the Whole, it is scarce possible not to conclude, that the Intrigue was laid; and that the Bishop absconded for that Purpose only.

However this may be, the first News his Majesty met on his Return to Whitehall, was the Flight of his Daughter; and as this was a more confounding Stroke than any he had hitherto met with, it got the better of all his Constancy: Tears burst from his Eyes; and, in such a Transport as none but a King and Father could fall into, he cry'd out, God hold me! My own Children leave me forsaken! --- There is an Author, who, in treating of this Reign, makes it his Glory, that he endeavours to extinguish his Compassion: But surely, there is no great Merit in the Violence he has chosen to put on himself; For, how blamable soever his Majesty's Government certainly was, it must be own'd, on the other hand, that he suffer'd grievously for it; and that, therefore, whatever other Forfeitures he incurred, he has still a Right to the Tribute of our Commiseration.

To proceed: The Princess of Denmark also left a Letter behind her; but then it was to the Queen; and the Allegations contain'd in it were different from those contain'd in the other two. According to her Highness, Being not able to bear his Majesty's Displeasure, she had absented herself to avoid it; she had follow'd her Husband only to assist him in preserving her Father; she should stay at a great distance, as not to return before she heard the happy News of a Reconciliation. — She afterwards makes a Transition to the State of the Public, and says, "I see the general Falling-out of the Nobility and Gentry, who avow to have no other End than to preel with the King, to secure their Religion, which they saw to much in danger by the violent Councils of the Priests; who, to promote their own Religion, did not care to what Danger they expos'd the King. I am fully perswaded, that the Prince of Orange desires the King's Safety and Preservation; and hope all things may be compos'd without more Bloodshed, by the calling a Parliament."

Thus in the very Instant that her Highness is apologizing for her own Conduct, the ventures, by Insinuation, to arraign that of the Queen, justifies the Prince of Orange, and countenances the Cry of the People, by insinuating the Necessity of calling a Parliament: This was indubitably sowing the Quarrel, and Thoit, who consider, that instead of following her Husband into Dorsetshire, she follow'd the Northern Road, and that she took for her Advisers and Protectors the known Partizans of her Brother-in-law, will be apt to conclude, that she actually engag'd in it, and that she was directed to take the Course she did, in order to keep up the Spirits of the Undertakers in those Parts, and prevent them from entering into any Treaty, which, if left wholly to themselves, they might perhaps have been easily induc'd to have done; for as it is shrewdly, though (I) selfishly, observ'd by Lord Dekkers, they took care that their Courage should not out-run their Discretion, those at Paris not even naming the Prince of Orange, and all the rest limiting their Demands to a free Parliament. By which Means, says his Lordship, they left it in the King's Power to oblige them to put up their Swords as soon as he pleas'd; for whenever he thought fit to put forth a Proclamation for that End, they stood oblig'd by their own Words to give over the Contest.

Her Highness's Letter to the Queen was, however, of some Service to the Court; for when it became the Talk of the Town, that she was missing, the first Conclusion of the Herd was, That she was made away with: And so great and general a Ferment did this foolish Imagination cause, that it was found expedient to publish her Letter, for fear the Papists should have been cut to Pieces in revenge, even by the King's own Guards.

Overwhelm'd with such an Accumulation of Misfortunes, and finding his ordinary Council under too much Concern for themselves, to be able to give any Relief to him, his Majesty now found himself under a Necessity to have recourse to the several Heads of Parties,

Lord Chamberlain did so accordingly. Not long after, the News came, that the Prince, with the Duke of Gennet, was gone to the Prince of Orange, her Royal Highness's Woman, entering her Chamber to acquaint her with it in the Morning, were surpris'd to find the was not in Bed, where they had left her the Night before."

(1) The main Drift of his Lordship's Paper is to prove, That the want of most Service to the Prince of Orange, who actually went over to him, as well as declar'd for him, with the Forces they had rais'd, who had help'd to do the Prince of Orange's Work, within the Laws, and who still affected to have all imaginable Regard for the King's Welfare: But they declin'd taking the Load upon themselves, and refer'd him to the whole Body of Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Town. All were summon'd accordingly; they were about fifty in Number (at least we are so told by Sir John Reresby) and tho' at this Meeting the ill Conduct, not of the governing Party, as one Author has stated it, but of the King himself, was severely handled by the Earl of Clarendon, not without some indecent and insolent (J) Words, says Bishop Burnet, the Licentiousness of his Speech was so far from being countenanc'd by those present, that it was generally condemn'd. Surrounded, therefore, with so large a Body of his Peers, who profess'd to make good all the Duties of their Allegiance, having lost but one Ship of his Fleet, and but two thousand in all from his Court and Army; in Possession of his Treasury, his Stores, his Capital City, and all the Emblems of Sovereignty; who could have thought, from the Outside of Things, that his Majesty might not still have defended his Throne, have chas'd his revolted Subjects, and driven the Invaders out of his Kingdom? But under all this Shew, there was no Strength or Solidity; and the Majority of those who attended this Assembly, did so, not with any Design to countenance the King with his People, to assist him with their Lives and Fortunes, or to rescue him out of the bad Hands which had hitherto mistreated him, but to take the Advantage of his Calamities, and to drive him into the Toils that were set for him: All which appear'd plainly enough by the Proposals that were made to him, and which appear'd to be the Sentiments of that Majority, viz. First, To grant a general Pardon to all those that either were come over with the Prince of Orange, or had join'd him since his Landing. Secondly, To depute some of the Lords to his Highness, to treat with him about a Suspension of Arms, and to endeavour to bring Matters to an Accommodation. And Lastly, To turn immediately all Papists out of their Employments, to convince the World that his Majesty acted a sincere Part. The King took that Night to consider of their Advice, and the next Day declar'd in Council, that he was resolv'd to call a free Parliament, which should meet on the 15th of January next following: Accordingly, the Lord Chancellor was order'd to issue out the Writs; and a Proclamation was set forth, wherein his Majesty, after commanding and requiring all Persons whatsoever that they presum'd not either by Menaces or any other undue Means to influence Persons, or procure Votes; and all Officers to make fair Returns, proceeds to set forth, That for the Security of all Persons, both in their Elections and Service in Parliament, all his Subjects should have full Liberty to elect, and all the Peers, and such as should be elected Members of the House of Commons, should have full Liberty to serve and sit in Parliament, notwithstanding they had taken up Arms, or committed any Act of Hostility, or been any way aiding or assisting therein: That for the better Assurance hereof, his Majesty had directed a general Pardon to all his Subjects to be forthwith prepar'd to pass his great Seal: And that for the reconciling all public Breaches, and obliterating the very Memory of all past Miscarriages, his Majesty did hereby exhort, and kindly admonish all his Subjects to dispose themselves to elect such Persons for their Representatives in Parliament, as might not be bias'd by Prejudice or Passion, but qualify'd with Parts, Experience and Prudence, proper for this Conjunction. His Majesty further declar'd, That he would name Commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange; but at that Part of the Lords Advice relating to the Roman Catholics, he sufficiently signify'd his Disapprobation of it by saying, He would leave that Matter to be debated in Parliament.

This was, no doubt, a fatal Reserve; for the leading Men of all Parties had not their Attention so much fix'd on the Public Peace, as on Power and Preferment; and while they saw the King continued his Attachment to those already in Possession, they resolv'd to regard his Interest as little as he regarded theirs. Even low as he was now reduc'd, and unprofitable as his Service was become, it was thought worth contending for; and his Majesty had the additional Curse to find almost as much Difficulty in appointing his Commissioners to the Prince, as in settling the Terms of Negotiation. The Marquis of Halifax and the Earl of Rochester were still Opposites, and had each their Train of Followers: The Latter had the more zealous, and the Former the more moderate, Churchmen at his Heels, together with the whole Train of Nonconformists, who had by this time found it their Interest to turn their Back on the King, who had involv'd them with Liberty of Conscience, and to declare for the Prince, who proffer'd them the Security of a Law. Both these great Men were Candidates for this Employment, as rightly judging it would furnish them with a noble Opportunity to serve themselves, if not their Master; and both supported their Pretensions with all their Might. There was Room for both; and it was purpos'd to employ both, that neither might be disobligh'd. But so great was their Animosity to, and their Jealousy of, one another, that they would not serve together. When, therefore, it was found necessary to set aside one, it was resolv'd that one should be Rochester; and at the same time, to keep his Party in honour, if possible, sible, the Earl of Nottingham was nominated in his stead. But this Party Leaders are apt enough to think, that the Head ought to compound for the Body, they can never be persuaded, that the Body ought to compound for the Head. Thus no sooner was this Mark of Preference shewn to Lord Halifax, than Clarendon the Brother of Rocheſter went off to the Prince of Orange; but without finding the Confidence he expected: for, 'tis observ'd by Bishop Burnet, that he suggested so many peevish and peccoliar things when he came, that some suspected his Heat before; and his Deſertion now was all Colluſion, and that his real Buſineſs was to raiſe Factions among thoſe that were about the Prince: And on the other hand, the Marquis of Halifax, by ſeeming ſo warmly concern'd in the late Meeting for his Majesty's Service, and pleading to earnestly for an Accommodation, had render'd himself suspected likewise, among ſuch of his Party as were for driving Matters to Extremities; while others again were pleas'd to ſay, That his pretended Zeal for the King was but the Trick of the Day, and that his whole Aim was no more than to gratify his own diſſonouring Spirit, which ſeem'd ever aſpiring to Power, and for engroſſing all to himself.

To leave Meaſures to God, who, perhaps, only knows them; it was once intended to ſhake a little Court Holy Water on the Church, by naming the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely in the Commiſſion; but this was done, for what Reason is not explain'd. And now the neceſſary Compliments having been made to both Parties; it was time for the King to think for himself: And, that he might have an Commiſſioner, whom he might be the more truſt, he nam'd the Lord Compton, who had, all this while, been of his Cabinet, and who by his Rank in the Queen's Houſhold, muſt have made ſuch occasional Compliances as were requiſite to preſerve himself in her Majesty's good Graces.

Compton
to the Prince.

The great Debat being thus ſettled on the laſt Day of November, being the ſame that the Proclamation for calling a Parliament bears date, a Trumpet was ſent to the Prince of Orange with a Demand of the neceſſary Paſſes; and, without waiting for his Return, on the ſecond of December the Commiſſioners began their Journey; but withal, they proceeded ſlowly, that they did not reach Reading till the next Days, at which Time and Place they receiv'd their Paſſes. The Trumpet had found his Highneſs at Edington, between Bath and Salisbury, in his Way to Oxford; for we are told by his Hiſtorian, that he choſe to avoid the great Plains of Wiltſhire and Deſſetſhire, becauſe the King was ſo much ſuperior to him in Horſe; as alſo, that his Deſign was to have ſecur'd Berſel and Glaouſter, that ſo the whole West might have been in his Hands, if there had been any Appearance of a Stand to be made againſt him by the King and his Army. But, continues he, his Majesty's precipitate Retreat put an End to this Pre-entation. Till the Arrival of the Trumpet,

1. p. 793.]

he did not, however, give over his Deſign of marching to Oxford: And then finding the Plot thicken ſo much ſaſter than he could have expected, he all at once concluded, that the neareſt Road to London was the beſt, and thenceforward proceeded to act as if the promis'd Land was already his own. At the ſame time that he granted the Paſſes requir'd by his Majesty, he ſent a Trumpet of his own to require a Paſs of Lord Essex from a Gentleman who was to be ſent to the Princeſs of Denmark, which was readily granted; as alſo another to the Dutch Embaſſador, who was deſirous to repair to his Highneſs. All theſe ſeveral Circumſtances created a Belief in the Publick, that the Diſtreſſes of the Court had render'd them very ſincere in their Endeavours to bring about an Accommodation; and on the other hand, that the calling a free Parliament, would, almoſt alone, be ſufficient to effect it: For thoſe who have not ſeen the laſt Workings of State Machines, are very apt to conclude, that when they ſee the exterior, they ſee all; and that when a Politician has given in the Sum of his Demands, he can neither be ſo unjuſt or ſo inmoderate as to bring in ſuch a Supplement as ſhall exceed all he had demanded before. Thus no ſooner had the News of the King's Conceſſions reach'd the Fleet, than the three Admirals, Dartmouth, Berkeley, and Strickland, and thirty-eight Captains join'd in an Addreſs to his Majesty, letting forth, not over accurately, "The deep Senſe which they had had of the great Dangers to which his Sacred Perſon had been expoſ'd, and the great Effuſion of Blood that threaten'd his Majesty's Kingdoms, and which in Probability would have been ſhed, unleſs God of his infinite Mercy had put it into his Majesty's Heart to call a Parliament; the only Means in their Opinion, under the Almighty, left to quiet the Minds of his People; and alſo their moſt humble and hearty Thanks for ſuch his gracious Condeſcention; beſeeching God to give his Majesty all imaginable Happineſs and Proſperity, and to grant that ſuch Councils and Reſolutions might be promoted, as would conduce to his Honour and Safety, and tend to the Peace and Settlement of the Realm, both in Church and State, according to the eſtabliſh'd Laws of the Kingdom."

Addreſs from the Fleet.

What Acceptance this Addreſs met with has never been ſpecify'd; but, as it never was honour'd with a Place in the Gazette, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe it was not over-favourable: Tho' the King had ſubmitted to call a Parliament, it was ſorly againſt the grain; and it was impoſſible he ſhould reſiſt a Compliment on what had been extorted from him: On the other hand, the Prince was ſo little ſatisfy'd with it as his Majesty: He had indeed made his Appeal to a free Parliament, while the Succes of his Undertaking was yet precarious; but now, when every Gale from every Quarter blew in his favour, and he ſaw the Port open before him, he did not care for parting with the Rudder out of his own Hand, nor to be

A. D. 1688. over-scrupulous as to the Means, provided he attained the End. This is certain, that the Commissioners were scarce on the Road, before a Paper was made public, under the Title of Papists Treacheries not to be rely'd on, in a Letter from a Gentleman in York, to his Friend in the P. of Orange's Camp, in which a Number of Examples are amass'd together to demonstrate the Proposition contain'd in the said Title; and, on other hand, as much Pains is taken to set up the Prince as another Fabrizius or Archides, that the whole World could not corrupt. "Among all the Courts of Europe, says this Letter-writer, where I have convers'd, that of Holland is the freest from Tricks and Falshood: And, tho' I am naturally jealous and suspicious of the Conduct of Princes, yet I could never discover the least Knavery within those Walls: It appear'd to me another Alcibi of Philosophers, and the only Seat of Justice and Virtue now left in the World." — But enough of this fallow Stuff! — About the same time also, that no Inflammatory of any kind might be wanting, a Hue and Cry after Father Peter was hawk'd about the Streets; the famous Ballad called Lillibullero was set forth in ridicule of the Irish, and sung in Chorus at the Play-house, even by the (English) Officers of the Army: And, to crown all, there came forth a third Declaration, in the Name of the Prince, dated at Shirburne-Castle the 28th of November, in which, after a new Descant on his Highness's Zeal for the Protestant Religion, the Success it had been thus far rewarded with, and his Resolution to proceed with his Undertaking in such a manner as should make both King and People once more happy, we find the following memorable Passages:

"And that we may effect all this, in the Way most agreeable to our Desires, if it be possible, without the Effusion of any Blood, except of those execrable Criminals, who have justly forfeited their Lives, for betraying the Religion, and subverting the Laws, of their native Country; we do think fit to declare, that, as we will offer no Violence to any, but in our own necessary Defence; so we will not suffer any Injury to be done to the Person even of a Papist, provided he be found in such a Place, and in such Condition and Circumstances, as the Laws require. So we are resolv'd, and do declare, That all Papists, who shall be found in open Arms, or with Arms in their Houses, or about their Persons, or in any Office or Employment Civil or Military, upon any Pretext whatsoever, contrary to the known Laws of the Land, shall be treated by us and our Forces, not as Soldiers and Gentlemen, but as Robbers, Free-booters, and Banditti; they shall be incapable of Quarter, and entirely deliver'd up to the Discretion of our Soldiers. And we do further declare, That all Persons who shall be found any ways aiding and assisting to them, or shall march under their Command, or shall join with, or submit to, them, in the Discharge or Execution of their illegal Commissions or Authority, shall be looked upon as Partakers of their Crimes, Enemies to the Laws, and to their Country.

And whereas we are certainly inform'd, that great Numbers of armed Papists have of late retired to London and Westminster, and Parts adjacent, where they remain, as we have reason to suspect, not so much for their own Security, as out of a wicked and barbarous Design to make some desperate Attempt upon the said Cities and their Inhabitants, by Fire, or a sudden Massacre, or both; or else to be the more ready to join themselves to a Body of French Troops, design'd, if it be possible, to land in England, procured of the French King, by the Interest and Power of the Jesuits, in pursuance of the Engagements, which, at the Inligation of that pestiferous Society, His most Christian Majesty, with one of his neighbouring Princes of the same Communion, has enter'd into for the utter Extirpation of the Protestant Religion out of Europe. Tho' we hope we have taken such effectual Care to prevent the one, and secure the other, that, by God's Assistance, we cannot doubt but we shall defeat all their wicked Enterprises and Designs.

We cannot however forbear, out of the great and tender Concern we have to preserve the People of England, and particularly those great and populous Cities, from the cruel Rage and bloody Revenge of the Papists, to require and expect from all the Lord-Lieutenants, Deputy-Lieutenants, and Justices of Peace, Lord-Mayors, Mayor, Sheriff, and all other Magistrates and Officers Civil and Military, of all Counties, Cities and Towns of England, especially of the County of Middlesex, and Cities of London and Westminster, and Parts adjacent, that they do immediately disarm and secure, as by Law they may and ought, within their respective Counties, Cities, and Jurisdictions, all Papists whatsoever, as Persons at all times, but now especially, most dangerous to the Peace and Safety of the Government; that so not only all Power of doing Mischief may be taken from them, but that the Laws, which are the greatest and best Security, may remain their Force, and be strictly executed.

And we do hereby likewise declare, that we will protect and defend all those who shall not be afraid to do their Duty in obedience to these Laws: And that for those Magistrates and others, of what Condition soever they be, who shall refuse to assist us, and in obedience to the Laws, to execute vigorously what we have required of them, and suffer themselves at this Juncture to be cajol'd or terrified out of their Duty, we will esteem them the most criminal and infamous of all Men, Betrayers of their Religion, the Laws, and their native Country, and shall not fail to treat them accordingly, resolving to expect and require at their Hands the Life of every single Protestant that shall perish, and every House that shall be burnt or destroy'd by their Treachery and Cowardice."

It is agreed on all hands, that never any Paper had a greater Effect than this; for, as no doubt was made, says Bishop Barnet, [P. 1. p. 793.] that that it was truly the Prince's Declaration, it set all Men to work; a Quantity of them was at first sent by the Penny-post to the Lord-Mayor of London, who carry'd them immediately to the King at Whitehall; and, afterwards, one Captain Baker had the Boldness in person to require his Lordship, before Witnesses, to put it in execution: Nor was this all; for the inferior Officers call'd upon him for his Assistance to obey his Highness's Orders: The Papists in general were struck with the utmost Contemneration; and even the King himself was so alarm'd at this new Method of making war, that from this Moment, as we are told, he thought of nothing so much as securing a Retreat. But, according to the Prelate last-quoted, the Author of the State of Europe, and others, the Prince knew nothing of this Paper, and disown'd it as soon as he saw it; and Mr. Speke, his since arrogated the Merit of it to himself; tho' he did not think proper to do so, as long as the Prince surviv'd, whom he had run such Lengths to serve, and from whom, if he was indeed the principal Transfuser in the Revolution, as he boasts, he had a Right to challenge so immense a Reward. The said

[P. 39, 40.] Mr. Speke however declares, "That he gave it first to the Prince with his own Hand at Sherburne-Castle; that he seem'd somewhat surpris'd at first; that, when he had read and consider'd it, both his Highness and all that were about him seem'd not at all displeas'd with the thing; and that, in a little time, they were all fensible, that it did his Highness's Interest a great deal of Service."

That Interest is however ill serv'd, which is serv'd by such Methods; and the more sacred and venerable his Highness's Pretensions were, the more openly he should have discountenanced and disavow'd so unjustifiable a Piece, and so impudent an Artifice. But his Disavowal, it seems, was barely (A) verbal, and reach'd no farther than the Circle of his immediate Followers: The Public was still left in their Error: And as he condescended to accept of the Service, tho' assum'd of the Means, so the Court had not the Spirit to set forth a Counter-Order, or to expose such a manifest Usurpation of the kingly Office, while the King was yet in possession of the Throne; or to punish those who had so far acknowledged the Usurpation, as to insist, that Obedience should be given to the Prince's Commands.

All this while the King receiv'd nothing but ill News from every Corner of his Kingdom. The Earl of Sherburne and Sir John Gase took possession of Bristol without Opposition, and were join'd by the Earl of Seamford and Lord Dunmore: This made way for the Deliverance of Lord Lowland and his Followers, who had till then been confin'd in Gloucester-Castle; for the Prince's Party growing thus formidable, on the Receipt of an Order from Sir John Gase, the Goaler durst detain them no longer. At Worcester, the Lord Herbert of Cheshire, Sir Edward Harley, and most of the Gentry of that County and also of Herefordshire, had a Meeting; and, upon the Issue, declar'd for the Prince of Orange and a free Parliament. On the 4th of December, his Highness made a sort of triumphant Entry into Salisbury, having been solemnly receiv'd by the Magistrates in their Formalities, and loudly welcom'd by the People. Here he was join'd by the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Oxford; and from hence he detain'd the Duke of Ormond with a Party of Horse to Oxford, as well to make his Excuse to his Friends there for not accepting their Invitation, as to engage that important Body yet farther in his Cause and Interest; by inducing them to sign the Association. In the North, Lieutenant-Colonel Copley, Deputy-governor of Hull, by the Help of the Townsmen, Seamen, and Part of the Garrison, seiz'd the popish Governor Lord Langdale, in the Night; as also Lord Montgomery, and a great many other Papists who had fled thither for Refuge, and made himself Master both of the Town and Castle. The Duke of Norfolk made use of the very Commission he had receiv'd from his Majesty as Lord-Lieutenant of the County, from whence he deriv'd his Title, to summon all the Gentry thereof to Norwich: Upon which Occasion his Grace was pleas'd to acquaint the Mayor in the open Market Place, That the Cause of their Meeting was to declare for a free Parliament, and that they would do their utmost to defend the same, &c. And some Days after, he rais'd the whole Possess of the County; though for what End is hard to say; seeing the Proclamation for a general Election had been some Days abroad, and the King was in no Condition to disturb it, if he had been so inclin'd. Lord Lumley was receiv'd into Newcastle; and even Berwick, which had for some time, and with some Shew of Firmness, held out for the King, at last submitted to the prevailing Party.

Nor was this Contagion confin'd to this Side of the Tweed, or less epidemic in Scotland than England. After all the Parade which had been made of the Love, Zeal, and Loyalty of that Kingdom, and the Stress which had been laid on the Laws pass'd there, in favour of Monarchy and Episcopacy since the Restoration, it now undeniably appear'd, that all had been the Result of Corruption and the Terror of a standing Army: For, no sooner had the King order'd his regular Forces there, to pass the Borders to his Assistance against the Prince of Orange, than the whole Privy Council, with the Lord Chancellor Perth at their Head, sent up a pathetic Remonstrance against that Measure, founded on the Necessity of keeping those Forces there, in order to keep the Kingdom in Peace; and by way of Alternative, making an Offer to draw together an Army of 13000, compos'd of what they call'd the model'd Militia and Highlanders, to be dispos'd in such a Manner between the two Kingdoms, as to be able to act in either, as Occasion should demand. But neither was this Offer accepted, nor this Remonstrance regarded. The March of the Forces into England was insisted on, and all the Abatement that could be procur'd was the assigning them Carlisle for their Station till farther Orders; and a Licence for such of his Majesty's Servants to march with them as were afraid to stay behind. They accordingly did march; and tho' they were immediately supply'd by such of the Militia as were most like Soldiers, such a Foresight had the Presbyterians that the Day of their Deliverance was at hand, and such Advantage did they take of the Nakedness of the Government, that they crowded up to Edinburgh from all Parts, form'd themselves into Clubs, deliberated on what was fit for them to do at that Juncture, and grew so strong and so well cemented, that tho' the Ministry had their Spies among them, and knew the whole Scope of their Designs, they durst not make use of their Authority to suppress them. Finding themselves thus secure, they soon resolv'd to be formidable; in order to which they form'd a Scheme to cut off all Intelligence between the Court and the Regency, by intercepting the Packets on both Sides; and so far did they effect it, that it was seldom that a Dispatch escap'd them. The Consequence was, that the Malcontents had all the Information, and the Regency none, or none but what help'd to increase their Embarrassment.

[4] Which is so much the more to be wonder'd at, since it was not circulated, if the Author of the Ripley of the Defiance deserves Credit, till about the 6th of December; and the Prince had left Sherburne at or before the Beginning

They cut off all Intelligence between the Court and the Regency.

To remedy this Inconvenience, they resolv'd to send a particular Messenger (one Brand a Merchant) whom they thought they could confide in, with a Detail of their present distracted Condition, and a Request, that his Majesty would furnish them with such Instructions as should be most suitable to it. But when this particular Messenger had made his way into England, and found how the Current ran, he carry'd his Dispatches to the Prince of Orange (who, thereby, got into the whole Secret of the Government, and was enabled to take his Measures accordingly) being introduc'd by Dr. Burnet; and moreover assur'd his Highness, that he was sent by several to make a Tender to him of their Service. Finding the Door of Intelligence thus once more shut against them, the next Expedient the Regency had recourse to, was to appoint three of their own Body, viz. The Earl of (1) Balcarra, the Viscount Tarbat, and the Lord President, to wait upon the King in Person; but the two Latter made their Excuses; and, before the Former could set out on his Mission, he had the Mortification to see the Oligarchy, which had been so long establishing in Scotland, overwhelm'd, and Anarchy tyrannizing in its Room.

The Earl of Balcarra just express'd to London, with a Treatise of the Government.

A. D. 1688.

The Marquis of Arbole was, by his Place, the second Man at the Council-Board; and his Ambition, as we are told, was to be the first. In this, however, he could no otherwise be gratify'd, than by getting the Militia, such as they were, disbanded; for his Purpose was to make use of the present Fury of the People to drive away the Chancellor; and while there was any thing which had the Face of a standing Force, it would be no easy Matter to work them up to the Pitch requisite for such an Enterprize. He had for his Supporters, as we are also told, the Viscount Tarbat, and Sir J. Dalrymple, or rather those two affected to support him, in order to make a Tool of him; for it was he that was to stand foremost, and in case of Danger, to be the Sacrifice; but in case of Success, they knew the Merit would be ascrib'd to their superior Abilities, and consequently, that they should be entitled to the Reward. What encourag'd the Marquis to entertain this Project, and those to second it, was the News of the Prince of Orange's Success, and the King's precipitate Retreat to London. Hence all Dread of being call'd to account being remov'd, Lord Tarbat made the Proposal in Council, That the Troops might be disbanded, urging the Expediency of doing so, because the Prince of Orange had, in his Declaration, urg'd the Illegality of keeping up Forces in time of Peace, and because of the Saving that would thereby accrue to the Revenue. He was follow'd by many more, and the Lord Chancellor, not discerning his own Concern in the Question, came into it without any great Difficulty. Accordingly, the very next Day they were all dismiss'd, except four Companies of Foot, and two Troops of Horse, for the Service of the Revenue.

A Protest made in Council against dissolving the regulated Militia, and agreed to.

For some time before this, the Humour of Popery Burning had been reviv'd, as well to furnish the Populace with an Opportunity to insult those in Power, as for a Pretence to draw them together. Accordingly, the Train had taken, the Populace had rose, and had thought forth such a Jargon as serves best on those Occasions; such as, No Pope! No Popish! No Popish Chancellor! No Melfort! No Father Peter! And no sooner were the Forces dismiss'd and order'd to their respective Homes, than the Marquis, taking the Advantage of these Tumults, came to the Chancellor's Lodgings, and gave him to understand, that neither he, nor any of his Friends thought it safe to repair to Council, as long as he, and several of his Party, continu'd to sit there; and that, if he and they could be prevail'd on to withdraw for a while, they should soon see such a Change, as would not fail to please them; viz. The King effectually serv'd, the Populace satisfy'd, the Malcontent-Assemblies broke up, &c. The Chancellor requir'd a short Time to consider of it, for he had received previous Notice of the Marquis's Intentions, and had assembled the Duke of Gordon (Governor of Edinburgh Castle)

Castle) and all the other Catholic Counsellors, to take their Advice upon it; and withdrew for that End. But this was as if Ye-mas had consulted with the Mariners whether he should be thrown over-board after the Lot had fallen upon him. In a general Wreck all were like to suffer; but in removing him from the Helm, they had Hope: the Storm would be appeas'd: As if with one Voice, therefore, they persuaded him to withdraw. But then they took care to use no other Inducements, than such as seem'd to flow from their Concern for his Safety and Welfare, without any Intermixture of their own; urging, in effect, that those who drove him into this Difficulty, were in a Condition to force a Compliance, and that he would depart with a much better Grace if he took his Leave, than if he was kick'd out. It is said he was determin'd by these Arguments, and no doubt he was; for when a Man finds himself overpowered on one hand, and given up on the other, he has nothing to do but to make a Virtue of Necessity, and to seem to chuse what he cannot avoid. His next Business was to let the Marquis know his Resolution; and having done so, and provided a good Guard for his Security, he drove out of Town as fast as possible, for fear a worse thing should befall him. While he was yet passing through the Streets, the Drums beat to Arms on every Side: And when the People, in all the Distraction which accompanies Fear attended with Uncertainty, issued from their Houles to enquire the Cause; they were warn'd to stand upon their Guard, for that the Town swarm'd with Papists, who design'd that very Night to burn them in their Beds. There is no Passion more credulous than Fear: Every one that listen'd believ'd: The Snow-ball gather'd as it roll'd: Their Rage increas'd with their Strength: And at last they were ripe for any Mischief of any kind whatever. This was what their Leaders wanted, who had actually enough produc'd the Motion without stirring in the Spring. The Chapel of Holy-Rood House had been adorn'd with great Cost and Splendor, as well for the Celebration of Mass, as for the Ceremonial of the Order of the Thistle. There was also a Seminary of Ysairs in the Neighbourhood of it; and in fear that the Populace would discharge their Fury first on these Places, one Captain Wallace, a Papist, with a hundred and twenty Men had been posted there by the Council a few Days before, with Orders to stand upon the Defensive, and to repel Force with Force. To try, therefore, what Length they would go, and how far they might be depended on, or perhaps to disperse a Body of Men, who had dar'd to take such a Service upon them, a Motion was made to begin with the Papists before they began with them, and, in particular, to demolish these two Places. This produc'd a Roar of Approbation, and immediately the whole Herd ran desperately on, with a full Resolution to do all that was expected from them. Wallace had Intelligence of the Storm; and sent out a (w) Ag-join to warn them from making any such Attempt, as they regarded their own Welfare; for that, in case they did, he should be oblig'd to do his Duty and fire. This was but as Oil to the Flame; they continu'd to rush on as before; the Captain was as good as his Word; a Volley of Shot was discharged about a Dozen were kill'd upon the Spot; three times that number were wounded; the rest took to their Heels; and it was immediately spread all over the Town, that Wallace, like Hovard, had butcher'd the Innocents, and that there were few Townsmen of any Condition, but what had lost a Son. Hitherto the Students and Apprentices had made up the Bulk of the Rioters; but now the Inhabitants in general ran to their Arms, and the malicious Leaders came out into the Streets, publicly espous'd the Quarrel, and offer'd their Service, which was gladly accepted. Hence this Uproar became louder than ever; and it was propos'd and agreed to renew the Attack; but first it was held advisable to apply to the Marquis of Abbe for a Warrant, as a Person known to be in their Interest. A Deputation was sent to him accordingly; and with the Concurrence of the Earl of Bute, Lord Turbat, and Sir John Dalrymple, a Warrant was granted, authorizing the Town-Magistrates, assisted by the King's Heralds and Trumpets, the Trained-Bands and Town-Company, to require Wallace to surrender, and in case of Refusal, to compel him by Force of Arms. Thus countenanc'd and reinforce'd, and making up a strange Mixture of Order and Confusion, they proceeded on to the Abbey-House: And being come within Gun-shot, the Heralds and Trumpets were sent foremost to give the Summons requir'd. Wallace refus'd to obey it, saying, He had his Orders from the Council to defend it; nor would he give it up but to the same Authority. The Warrant was then produc'd; but he objected to it as insufficient, having been sign'd but by a Quorum; whereas he was posted there by the whole Regency. Finding him thus obstinate, both Parties began to fire; and the Magistracy and the Gentry very wisely left the Soldiery and the Rabble to fight it out by themselves. The Place, it seems, was tenable against such a Storm as this, and Wallace and his Men did not want Resolution. But then, while he was thus active in Front, he forgot that there was another Entrance behind him, till the Enemy had found it out, and were pouring in upon him with all the Fury imaginable. He then thought it was high time to shift for himself; and accordingly did, leaving his Men at Mercey; who immediately diately laid down their Arms and begg'd Quarter. 'Tis added, however, that several of them were kill'd in cold Blood, that many more were wounded, and that the Residue were thrown into Prison, where, several of them were suffer'd to perish either for want of Surgery or Food. What follow'd was Disorder and Mischief of every kind, such as was to be expected from a victorious Mob. Whatever they could reach either in the Chapel or the Abbey, went instantly to wreck; whatever was combustible they committed to the Flames; the Jesuits Residence they, in a manner, demolish'd; and for two or three Days after (for so long we are told the Sedition lasted) they diverted themselves with searching and plundering the Houses of the Papists; none of the Council interposing, because one Party was pleas'd with the Mischief, and the other was fearful of undoing the same Visitation.

The Abbey Chapel and Jesuits Seminary burnt.

The Marquis of Athole procures an Address from the Council to the Prince of Orange.

To make a proper use of all these Successes, the Marquis of Athole, as first Lord of the Regency on the Spot, now call'd a Council, and propos'd an Address to the Prince of Orange, containing the highest Acknowledgments of his generous Undertaking to free these Nations from Popery and Tyranny. But this was so warmly oppos'd by the two Archbishops, the President of the Session, and some other Lords, who had Grace enough left to be ashamed of eating their own Words so soon, that the new Premier was forc'd to compound the Matter with them, by abating the Ardour of his Expressions, and making the Compliment as general as possible. But such an Address was, however, actually carry'd, and one of their own Body was deputed to wait on his Highness with it.

To return now to his Majesty's Commissioners, whom we left at Reading on the third of December, furnish'd with the necessary Passes to make the best of their way to the Prince; and who, it was natural to think, would, for their Master's Sake, have made all the Expedition possible: And yet, tho' the only thing for which his Highness came over, a Free Parliament, had been granted in the most explicit Terms, and made public all over England, his Highness could not find Leisure to assign them an Audience till the sixth. Amberbury was the Place appointed; the Commissioners gave their Attendance; but instead of meeting the Prince, receiv'd a new Direction to pass on to Hungerford; where again, instead of treating with him in Person, they were refer'd to two Commissioners on his Highness's Behalf, namely, the Earls of Oxford and Clarendon, who desir'd them to make their Proposals in Writing; possibly, in a Persuasion that the Commissioners were not authoris'd by their Instructions to give into any such Condescension, or would refuse to treat before they had been admitted to an Audience. But the King's Circumstances would not bear a Dispute about the Ceremonial, and therefore their Excellencies were oblig'd to comply: They did so; their Paper bears date the eighth; the Prince receives it; makes another Day's March towards London, and then delivers his Answer, the sixth, not the eighth, as Bishop Burnet has (n) asserted; and at Littleton, not at Hungerford, as he has left us to conclude; after suppressing entirely the Appointment at Amberbury, and kissing the Day's March under these evasive Expressions, A Day was taken to consider of an Answer.

A. D. 1688.

The King had all this while Intelligence of every Incident that arose, as fast as it was possible for his Couriers to pass and repass; and, from the first Disappointment which his Commissioners met with at Amberbury, had no great Reason to build on the Success of their Negotiation: But he grew more and more discontented, when he was inform'd that his Highness had wav'd a personal Treaty with them, and had requir'd their Demands in Writing. This was interpreted as a Contempt to his Majesty; and, from the Choice he had made of his Commissioners, it was infer'd, that the Prince had no Inclination to come to an Agreement; for it was scarce possible that the Marquis of Halsifax and the Earl of Clarendon should meet on tolerable Terms, seeing they were avowed Enemies to each other, and the ancient Quarrel between them had so lately broke out afresh: And as to the Earl of Oxford, he was quite a Stranger to Business, and therefore by no means capable either to temper Matters between these two Opposites, or to take the Direction upon himself. There was also a particular Letter of one of the King's Commissioners, who was suppos'd to be most in his Majesty's Interest (whoever that was; for Posterity will perhaps find it hard to determine) which, we are told, contain'd such Advices as gave occasion to the popish Cabal, together with Mr. Borillon, and the Count de Lauzun, (who was come from France to offer his Service to the King, and who was deep in his Confidence) to conclude, that the Prince would on no Condition be induc'd to quit his Hold; and that it would be most advisable for his Majesty to think of providing for his own Security, by withdrawing with the Queen and Prince, and taking refuge in France.

The Court alarm'd and surpris'd.

Letter of King William, no. 1. p. 577.

The King advis'd to withdraw.

Thus we are led to believe, by this Account, that the Prince's Behaviour furnish'd his Majesty with Reasons for his withdrawing: But, on the other hand, says our Historian of his own Times, "Now strange Counsels were suggest'd to the King and Queen. The Priests, and all the violent Papists, saw a Treaty was now open'd. They knew, that they must be the Sacrifice. The whole Design of Popery must be given up, without any Hope of being able in an Age to think of bringing it on again. Severe Laws would be made against them. And all those who

A. D. 1688. who intended to fluck to the King, and to preserve him, would go into those Laws with a particular Zeal: So that they, and their Hopes, must be now given up, and sacrificed for ever. They infused all this into the Queen. They said, she would certainly be impeach'd: And Witnesses would be set up against her, and her Son: The King's Mother had been impeach'd in the Long Parliament: And she was to look for nothing but Violence. So the Queen took up a sudden Resolution of going to France with the Child. The Midwife, together with all who were assisting at the Birth, were also carry'd over, or so dispos'd of, that it could never be learn'd what became of them afterwards. The Queen prevail'd with the King, not only to consent to this, but to promise to go quickly after her. He was only to stay a Day or two after her, in hope that the Shadow of Authority that was still left in him might keep things quiet, that the might have an undisturbed Passage. So she went to Portsmouth. And from thence, in a Man of War, she went over to France, the King resolving to follow her in Disguise.

But, unluckily, all the rest of our Historians agree with Father Orleans, that the Queen did not set sail from Portsmouth: And what is yet more remarkable, scarce one of them insinuates, that she even went down further for that purpose: The young Prince was indeed convey'd thither with all possible Secrecy, under the Conduct of the Marquis and Marchioness of Pois; and Lord Dartmouth had Orders to send him away with a sufficient Convoy to France: But then he refus'd to obey those Orders; and, after the Marquis had try'd the whole Force both of his Rhetoric and Impunity upon him to no purpose, he was forced to reconduct his Charge with the same Privacy to Whitehall, where he arriv'd on the 8th, late in the Evening. And now it was that the Queen herself thought it advisable to provide for her own Safety, as well as for that of her Offspring: Father Orleans gives the Story of her Escape in (e) detail, and is in general follow'd by all our own Writers. According to him, the Manner of it was contriv'd between the King and the Count de Louvois, between the ninth and tenth, and executed immediately. And here recurs the Question, Whether the Resolution to withdraw was wholly owing to the strange Councils of the Papists, as the Bishop inculcates, or from the Advice his Majesty had receiv'd from his own Commissioners, as hath been suggest'd by others? Each Party will claim the Decision, in order to give it in their own favour; and each has plausible things enough to urge to countenance and amuse their credulous Followers. But their Quest is after Opinion, not Truth; whom they avoid as an irreconcilable Enemy; and the very few, who have diverted themselves of their Prejudices, will make it their Glory to follow neither.

The King, Queen, and whole Cabinet, indistinctly saw no one Object but through the Median of their Fears, which represented all much larger than the Life: Their Priests, who still maintain'd their fatal Ascendancy over them, and who partook of the same Panic, if possible, in a greater Degree, thought of nothing but their own Preservation; and the French Emiffaries, whom, in this time of Danger and Distress, the King had taken into his very Bosom, made use of that Confidence only to throw his Majesty into the Protection of the King their Master; not so much, it may be reasonably presum'd, on a Principle of Generosity or Compassion, as with a View to make him an Instrument to embroil the Nation in a Civil War, and thereby prevent them from engaging in the grand Confederacy which had been form'd against him on the Continent, and which, as we have seen, was one of the great Motives of the Prince's Enterprize.

But if, on the other hand, his Highness had not set all his Engines to work to excite a Perturbation in the King, that he really was in danger, it is scarce to be suppos'd, that any Arguments, either of those French Emiffaries, or of those cowardly Priests, or of the Queen herself, would have induced him to forsake an Empire, that his Splinter had run such an almost desperate Risk, and taken such inconceivable Pains to acquire: Nor, as it was, will he stand accus'd to Posterity for having so meanly abandon'd what he had so haughtily exercis'd, without striking a Blow, without one Appeal to the common Sense of the People, or making one Effort to convince the World, that he deserv'd to possess, what only his ill Stars had oblig'd him to part with.

To proceed to Facts: The Paper deliver'd by his Majesty's Commissioners at Hungerford was as follows:

"SIR, The King commanded us to acquaint His Majesty's Appals.

(e) To this Effect: That the Queen was oblig'd: That she was accompany'd by the Marquis of Pois and his Lady, certain Foreigners of Distinction, and certain Italian and French Domestic of her own: That the Prince of Wales was in his Nurse's Arms: That they cross'd the Water from Whitehall in a roughness rain; Night: That both her Majesty and the Infant were expos'd to all the Severities of it: That the whole Company went on board a Vessel, which had been prepar'd for them, at Greenwich: That three Irish Captains attended her as a Guard: And that she arriv'd safely at Calais.

Bishop Knox has thought fit to throw in the following Remark on this Occasion: "Here seem'd a Providence in that hurrying away the young Child for a French and English Education. For in the following Delays of the Lords and Commons, about the Throne being vacant, and the filling up that Vacancy; it seems very probable, that had the Child been in English Hands, there would have been some Mention at least of an English Protestant bringing up."

The Author of the State of Europe, yet more unaccountably, reasons upon it as follows: "Politicians cannot apprehend that there was any Reason why King James should send away the Prince of Wales to early see France. His Story, say they, was the only Means to better the Condition of his Affairs; seeing that, through his being so present, abandoned by his Subjects, there would be a first Attempt to receive his Party. But he had Reason to be chary of him, for fear he should have fallen into the Hands of the Prince of Orange; which would have been the Ruin of all his Hopes. For then, if once the Prince, as lawful Heir, were advanced to the Throne, there would be no Colour for raising a Rebellion, and engaging the People, who many times pay Respect to the Papacy, without ever giving to the Bottom of the Intrigue. Besides, that the Loss of this pretended Prince would lose King James all his English Party." [Vol. 1. p. 76.]

quaint you, That he observes all the Differences and Causes of Complaint alleg'd by your Highness seem to be referred to a free Parliament. His Majesty, as he has already declar'd, was resolv'd before this to call one, but thought that, in the present State of Affairs, it was advisable to defer it till things were more compos'd. Yet, seeing that his People still continue to desire it, he has put forth his Proclamation in order to it, and has issued forth his Writs for the calling of it. And, to prevent any Cause of Interruption in it, he will consent to every thing that can be reasonably requir'd for the Security of all those that shall come to it. His Majesty has therefore sent us to attend your Highness, for the adjusting of all Matters that shall be agreed to be necessary to the Freedom of Elections, and the Security of sitting; and is ready immediately to enter into a Treaty, in order to it. His Majesty proposes, That in the mean time the respective Armies may be restrain'd within such Limits, and at such a Distance from London, as may prevent the Apprehensions that the Parliament may in any kind be disturb'd; being desirous that the Meeting of it may be no longer delay'd, than 'till it must be by the usual and necessary Forms."

The Prince's Answer.

And this was the Prince's Answer, given at Whitehall:

"I. That all Papists, and all such Persons as are not qualify'd by Law, be disarm'd, disbanded, and remov'd from all Employments, Civil and Military. II. That all Proclamations which respect us, or any that have come to us, or declar'd for us, be recall'd; and that if any Persons, for having assist'd, have been committed, that they be forthwith set at liberty. III. That, for the Security and Safety of the City of London, the Custody and Government of the Tower be immediately put into the Hands of the said City. IV. That if his Majesty shall think fit to be at London, during the sitting of the Parliament, that We may be there also, with an equal Number of our Guards: Or if his Majesty shall please to be in any Place from London, at whatever Distance he thinks fit, that We may be at a Place of the same Distance: And that the respective Armies do remove from London thirty Miles; and that no more foreign Forces be brought into the Kingdom. V. That, for the Security of the City of London, and their Trade, Tilbury-Fort be put into the Hands of the said City. VI. That, to prevent the landing of French, or other foreign Troops, Portsmouth may be put into such Hands as by your Majesty and us shall be agreed upon. VII. That some sufficient Part of the public Revenue be assign'd us, for the maintaining of our Forces, until the meeting of a free Parliament."

Now our Historian of his own Times is express, That the Lords seem'd to be very well satisfy'd with this Answer: He adds, that they sent it up by Express; and, in the Preface to some Sermons of his, he affirms, that his Majesty himself acknowledg'd, That the Terms were better than he expected: But this is not (p) over probable, as well because of the dictatorial Air, which runs thro' the Whole of them, as because, in Court-language they made it as plain as possible, that a free Parliament was not the sole Object which the Prince had in view, whatever he had so solemnly pretended. Besides, the same Prelate tells the following astonishing Story: "The Marquis of Hallefax (when waiting for his Highness's Answer) sent for me. But the Prince said, tho' he would suspect nothing from our Meeting, others might. So I did not speak with him in private, but in the Hearing of others: Yet he took occasion to ask me, so as no body observ'd it, If we had a mind to have the King in our Hands? I said, By no means; for we would not hurt his Person. He ask'd next, What if he had a mind to go away? I said, Nothing was so much to be wish'd.

Remarkably Dignity of Princes 254
Hall's and
Dr. Burnet.

(p) The Author of a Piece call'd The Deserion discov'rd, undertaking to answer another notable State-Performance, call'd The History into the present State of Affairs, and address'd to Dr. Burnet, takes the Liberty to discourse of the King's Situation at this time, and the Prince's Offers, in the following cavalier Manner:

"But our Author pretends the King's Affairs had a much better Aspect: Let us observe how he proves it: Why, he tells us, That, when the Prince of Orange's Proposals came to his Majesty, the Army and the Fleet were left in his Hands. They were so, that he might pay them for the Prince's Services; for they own'd his Majesty's Authority scarce any other way than by receiving his Money, and eating up their Meats. 'Tis to be hop'd they have since repented of their Actions. But the Enquirer goes on with his Inventory of Forts and Revenues; which the King was to have still. He may know if he pleases, that we have but four considerable Forts in the Kingdom: Now Hull and Plymouth had already equip'd of themselves, and the Tower of London was demanded for the City; so that there was none but Portsmouth remaining. And as for the Revenues, 'tis to be fear'd, the northern Collections would have been almost as slender as those in the West. And now one would think our Author began to relent; for he owns, that few things which the Prince of Orange propos'd may be call'd hard; viz. his demanding, that the Law against Papists which were in Employment might be executed. But the Enquirer is much mistaken, if he thinks the Prince of Orange insist'd upon no more than the bare Execution of the Law in this Point. For the disbanding of all Papists (which was Part of his Proposals) is much more than the Law requires; by which the Papists are only excluded from Offices of Command and Trust. But neither the Test-acts, nor any others, but the King from lifting them as common Soldiers. And, lastly, to deliver up his best Magazine, and the Strength of his Capital City: To be oblig'd to pay a foreign Army, which came over to enable his Subjects to drive him out of his Dominions; were very extraordinary Demands, and look'd as if there was a Design to reduce him as low in his Honour, as in his Fortune. To forgive a Man who endeavour'd to raise me is great Christian Charity; but to articulate away my Estate to him, because he has injured me, is such a Mortification, as no Religion obliges us to. This is in effect to betray our Innocence, and give away the Justice of our Cause; and own that we have deliver'd all that hard Usage, which has been put upon us; so that 'tis easy to imagine what an unaccountable Aversion the Spirit of Princes must needs have to such an unnatural Peace. In short, when the Forts and Revenues were thus dispos'd of; when the Papists were to be disbanded, and the Protestants could not be trust'd; when the Nation was under such general and wild Dissatisfactions; when the King, in case of a Rupture, (which was not unlikely) had nothing upon the Matter but his single Person to oppose against the Prince's Arms, and those of his own Subjects; when his moral Enemies, and those who were under the highest Forcitures to his Majesty, were fit Judges of his Crown and Dignity, if no farther; when Affairs were in this tempestuous Condition, to say that a free and indifferent Parliament might be chosen, with relation to the King's Right, as well as the People's; and that his Majesty had no just, visible Cause to apprehend himself in danger, is to outrage the Sun, and to trample upon the Undertanding, and almost upon the Sense, of the whole Nation. (State Truths, temp. W. III. vol. I.)

A. D. 1688. ziff'd. This I told the Prince, and he approv'd of both my Answers." Father Orleans also affirms, that the King was privately inform'd by one of his three Deputies, That there would be no Security for his Person in any Part of the Kingdom. And Sir John Reresby yet farther unfolds this Secret, by saying, that he was inform'd by a Court-Lady (Lady Ogletorpe) That the Marquis of Hallifax had treated with the King to come again into Botines, a little before the Prince's Intention was certainly known; that he was the very Person whom his Lordship had sent on that Errand to the King; that his Majesty actually gave him a Meeting at her Houle; that they had agreed upon Terms, and, what was more, that his Lordship had even treated with the Priests for his Return to Court; that, upon this account, his Majesty more particularly depended on him, when he nam'd him out of his Commissioners to the Prince; that, after having conferred with his Highness, he sent the King a private Letter, intimating an ill Design against his Person; and that this was the real Cause of his Majesty's resolving to leave the Kingdom. Thus it appears, that the Strange Suggestions of the Priests were actually authoriz'd by the Advices which his Majesty had receiv'd from the very Man he most depended upon among his own Commissioners: That, if the King did in some degree mistake his Fears for Reason, he had also Reason for his Fears; that, if the Prince of Orange did not prompt those Advices, he approved them; and that, tho' his Highness pretended to treat, his real Purpose was, if possible, to drive the King out of the Land, in order to make the Stage clear for himself.

[1688] To dispatch this Head; The Author of the State of Europe, after acknowledging in one Place, that, in all the Manifestos which had appear'd in Relation to the Prince's Expedition, it had been declar'd in express Terms, That he had no Intention to invade the Throne, cannot help suggesting in another, that an Accommodation would be extremely difficult, because the Prince of Wales was an insuperable Obstacle: Whence he makes no Difficulty to infer prophetically, That the next Parliament would declare, that his Majesty had forfeited his Crown, and in Consequence, would make a Transfer of it to his Highness in Right of his Wife: And in a third Place he allows that his Hero (the Prince) was instrumental in disposing, and even assisting the King to leave his Kingdom: But then, that we may not presume to suppose, that his Highness had any selfish Ends to serve by so doing, he imputes it to him for Righteousness; and would have us believe there was no other way to rescue him out of the Hands of his People, who intended, it seems, to shew him no Mercy. In a Word, there is no one Grievance in the whole Course of the King's Reign that is more flagrant than the Prince of Orange's Ambition: And to do Justice, if we admit, as we ought, that the People had sufficient Reason to call upon him for his Assistance, we must admit likewise, that he heard them for his own sake, and that he resolv'd to be paid his own Price for his Trouble.

As the Prince was now esteem'd irresistible, and there had been no Stipulation for a Suspension of Arms by way of Preliminary to the Treaty, no sooner was it rumour'd at Court, that his Highness, instead of meeting the Commissioners, was marching on towards Reading, than Orders were sent to the advanc'd Guard lying at that Place, to retire to Maidenhead, and to the Earl of Ferriburgh to take up his Head Quarters at Colebrook; which was done accordingly. The Colour assign'd for it, being to prevent farther Desertions. Finding, however, by the next Day's Intelligence, that the Prince's Van had as yet reach'd no farther than Newbury, and growing alarm'd, perhaps, of so dishonourable a Retreat, his Majesty remanded them to their old Posts. But while they were on this Counter-March, the Inhabitants of Reading (who were not overpleas'd with their Scottish and Irish Inmates, of which two Nations the Party was compos'd that was first to face the Enemy) sent an Invitation to such of his Highness's Forces as were nearest, to push on, in order to get the Start of the Royal Detachments: But tho' no time was lost in complying with so agreeable a Motion, the said Detachment came up first; and Colonel Lanier, who had the Command, and who had receiv'd Notice that the Enemy was advancing, made the necessary Dispositions to maintain his Post, by placing a Party of Irish Dragoons to guard a Bridge, over which they were to pass, drawing up a Regiment of Scottish Horle in the Market Place, and sending to Lord Ferriburgh for an immediate Reinforcement. But all his Precautions prov'd ineffectual, for, on the first Approach of the Prince's Party, which is said to have been but a small one, the Irish gave one Discharge, and wheel'd about, the Scots follow'd their Example, and both (g) fled in Confusion together, till they fell in with their General, who was coming up in Person to their Assistance; but who did not, however, think proper to rally the Fugitives, and make a Push to dislodge the Enemy: On the contrary, he contented himself with covering their Retreat to Maidenhead, and with fortifying the Bridge of that Place, instead of breaking it down; in Hope his Soldiers would, under the Cover of great Guns at least, do their Duty, and, by maintaining that Pass, keep the Enemy at Bay. But to thoroughly had the King's apparent Despondency taken Possession of his Troops, that they were become utterly unserviceable: And this was moreover

(7) They excus'd themselves by alledging, that the Inhabitants fir'd at them behind, out of the Windows, while the Dutch charg'd them in Front: But the Inhabitants de-no'd the Fact, and said, The Fears of the Irish made them think so.

over fo visible, that the very Townfmen became fenfible of it; and in the Night beat a Dutch March, in the Perfuaſion, that the bare Sound of the Prince's Drums would be fufficient to fright them away: And we are told, that the Experiment answer'd; that they did not wait till their Eyes juſtify'd their Ears, and that they not only left their Poſt, but their Cannon and all behind them.

and Maiden-head.

There were new Proofs that his Majeſty's Reliance on his Army was as ill-plac'd, as his Reliance on the Non-refuſing Principles of the Church: And he became now effectually convinc'd, that they would neither fight for him on Hounſlow-Heath, nor even make a Stand at Brentford-Bridge, where a ſmall Party on the Parliament's Side had once withſtood his Father and his whole Army. About the ſame time that theſe Advices were brought him, he had the additional Mortification to be inform'd, that a Battalion of Douglafs's Regiment, whoſe Fidelity above all others he confid'd in, had declar'd for the Prince: That when their Officers endeavour'd to reclaim them, they oblig'd them to deſert, by threatening to fire upon them: That another Body of Horſe, which had been order'd to reduce them by Force, had refus'd to advance, and had even ſhewn a Diſpoſition to join the Deſerters; and that four Popiſh Officers had ſurrender'd their Commiſſions at Maidenhead where they were quarter'd.

Certain of his Horſe declares for the Prince.

And this was the Situation of his Majeſty's Affairs when he receiv'd the Prince's Demands, accompany'd with the Marquis of Halifax's Intimations, That it was time for him to provide for the Security of his Perſon, &c. than which ſcarce any could be more alarming or more deplorable: Deſperate, it is plain, he thought it, or he would have continu'd to ſeize againſt his ill Fortune, inſtead of throwing down his Sword, and compounding for his Life on any Terms whatever. One Reſource, it is obvious, was ſtill in his Power, which was, to have aſſembled the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who had adviſ'd him to ſend Commiſſioners to the Prince, and to have laid his Highneſs's Demands before them, together with the Notices that ſo nearly affected his own perſonal Safety; in which Caſe, he might have provid'd, that the Prince had already violated his own Declaration, by riſing in thoſe Demands, and inſiſting, even by way of Preliminary, to have the better Half of his Power and Prerogative; and declar'd, that unleſs they would be answerable for his Life and Liberty, it could not be reaſonably expected that he ſhould conſent to the prolonging a diſadvantageous Treaty at the ſuppos'd Hazard of both. Poſſibly ſuch a Remonſtrance as this might have turn'd the Tide in his Favour, or at leaſt, abated the Violence of the Torrent which drove againſt him: But he could not bear the Thought of giving up his Roman Catholics: And he well knew from what had paſs'd in the former Aſſembly, That the Lords would have join'd with the Prince in that Article, whatever Mitigation they might have contended for in the reſt. Beſides, we are told by the Duke of Bucks (Sheffield) that about this time, he conſulted only with a few of that Religion: And 'tis no wonder that they unanimouſly adviſ'd him to fly, ſince they found themſelves under a Neceſſity to do the (r) ſame themſelves; and ſince in his Exile they were ſure to retain the ſame Aſſentancy which they had been poſſeſs'd of till that fatal Hour, and which under any other Meaſure they ſaw themſelves oblig'd to forego for good and all.

[Sheffield's Works, vol. I. p. 90.]

Thus beſet with Impertunities on one hand, and Terrors on the other, the unfortunate King not only reſolv'd, but grew impatient to lay down the Scepter he could no longer wield on the Terms he lik'd, and to ſolicit the Protection of that Prince, whoſe Aſſiſtance he had till now refus'd; perhaps indulging his uneaſy Thoughts, ſays the noble Writer juſt quoted, with reflecting, that he abandon'd three Kingdoms, not to much to ſave himſelf, as to follow a Wife and only Son. And ſo unapprehenſive was he that this was what his Enemies moſt deſir'd, that he kept his Purpoſe as ſecret as poſſible from all, without Exception, but ſuch as were to further it, as if in the Dread of Prevention: Thus we are told, that he ſaid publicly, That he deſign'd to return to his Army, in order to give Battle to the Prince of Orange; and that his Life-Guard had Orders to march to Uxbridge to be in Readineſs to attend him: That tho' he had a long Converſation with the Lord Down, who was both a Popiſt and had been much in his Favour, the Night before his Departure he let him into no Part of the Secret: That the Earl of Mulgrave, his Chamberlain, coming into the Bed-Chamber, juſt as he was ſtepping into Bed, he turn'd about to whisper him in the Ear, That his Commiſſioners had newly ſent him a very hopeful Account of ſome good Accommodation with the Prince of Orange; which he ſaid with a View to divert that Nobleman from entertaining any Suſpicions of the Truth (f): That he had even appointed a Council to be held the next Morning; and that he purpoſely left his Chancellor expoſ'd

(r) The Earl of Melfort and Father Peter had already made their Eſcape; the latter having taken Shelter in the Train of Lord Waldgrave, who ſucceeded Skelton as the King's Miniſter to France; or, according to others, having accompany'd the Queen: And even the Pope's Nuncio, tho' he had nothing to fear from the Prince of Orange, was ſo ſhock'd at the violent Spirit which appear'd againſt Popery, that he choſe to ſeal away behind the Coach of the Miniſter of Seville; and had then got off, if the Spaniſh Embaſſador had not ſeiz'd the Prince of Orange to be walk'd out of his Sleep, in order to ſign a Paſſport general for the Savoyard, and his whole Entourage: By which they prevented an Accident, ſays his Grace of Bucks, that would have made an ill Impreſſion, at this time, upon all the Prince's Confederates of the Roman-Catholic Religion.

(f) "To which that Lord only reply'd with a Queſtion; aſking him, if the Prince's Army ſhalted, or approach'd nearer to London? The King own'd, they ſhall march on: At which the other ſhook his Head, and ſaid no more; only made him a low Bow, with a dejected Countenance, humbly to make him underſtand, that he gave no Credit, to what the King's hard Circumſtances, at that time, oblig'd him to diſſemble." [Sheffield.]

to the Rage of his Enemies, in Reſentment of his horrid Proceedings in the Woff, which, it was now ſaid, were contrary to his Maſteſty's expreſs Orders, and which had fo greatly contributed to the Calamities of his Reign: This laſt Article indeed is liable to ſuch Objections as are not eaſily answer'd; for it is allow'd on all hands, That the King, before he withdrew, order'd, that no more Writs ſhould be iſſu'd for the Meeting of the Parliament; that a Caveat ſhould be enter'd againſt the making uſe of thoſe already iſſu'd, and that he took the great Seal into his own Poſſeſſion. And as none of this could be done but in Concert with the Chancellor, and as all made it manifeſt that his Maſteſty was reſolv'd to unhinge the Government, Jeffreys ſtood in need of no farther Notice, that it was high time to take care of himſelf.

All this was done Monday the 10th, the Day after the Prince had given in his Preſcriptions at Hungerford; and his Maſteſty had in Truth receiv'd a Diſpatch from his Commiſſioners juſt before the Earl of Mulgrave came into his Bedchamber; but then it was of ſuch a Nature, as ſerv'd only to quicken his Departure. Accordingly, at three o'Clock the next Morning, he withdrew by a back Way, and left Orders with the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord in waiting, not to open the Door before his cuſtomary Time of riſing. It does not appear, that he gave him any other Injunction, or assign'd any Pretence for his leaving his Palace at ſo unreaſonable an Hour: But whether he did or not, the Duke kept his Secret, and ſcrupuloſly obey'd his Orders. In the Morning, the Rooms fill'd of Courſe with Perſons of Diſtinction to attend his Levee: And when the Doors were open'd, inſtead of ſeeing the King come forward as uſual, his Grace imparted the aſtoniſhing News, That he was gone. Had the Ground open'd, had the Sun withdrawn his Light, had the laſt Trumpet ſounded, it could ſcarce have produc'd more Conſternation than appear'd in every Face on this Occaſion: Whiſpers, Murmurs, and Confuſion fill'd the Room; ſome fancy'd their Ears deceiv'd them; ſome could not believe what they heard; all had a thouſand Queſtions to aſk; and when reſolv'd, remain'd as unſatisfy'd as before: Having learn'd all they could, they at laſt ran from one another to ſpread the News all over the Town, and to propagate the ſame Diſorder with it.

As the People had left the King at the Mercy of the Prince of Orange, ſo he left them at the Mercy of one another; poſſibly, that the Confuſion which he had been told would operate ſo much in his Favour, might begin to operate the ſooner. As he had left no Deputation of his Power, no body could act by his Authority: all Commiſſions were at an end; the Laws were no longer binding; the Government was apparently diſſolv'd; every Man was free to do what was right in his own Eyes; and had the Populace known their own Strength, they might have taken Advantage to level all Diſtinctions at once. Both the Peers, and the Magiſtrates of London were under terrible Apprehenſions of their Fury; and with very ſufficient Reason; for no ſooner was it the Talk of the Town, that the King was gone, than the Mob gather'd on all Sides, and not only fell upon the known Roman Chapels in and about the Town, and laid them in Ruins, but demoliſh'd and almoſt ras'd the Houſes of the (1) Spaniſh and Portugueſe Miniſters; in which, many of the Roman Catholics had deposited their moſt valuable Effects, ſome joining in the Riot out of ſtark Zeal, ſome for the Sport's ſake, and ſome for the Plunder. While this Sedition was yet raging, News came to Town, that Lord Feverſham had diſbanded the Remains of the King's Army, without either diſarming or paying them, to live at Diſcretion on the Country. His Lordſhip it ſeems had that Morning receiv'd a ſort of general Diſcharge from the King in the following Words:

"Whitehall, December 10, 1688.

"Things being come to that Extremity, that I have been forc'd to ſend away the Queen and my Son the Prince of Wales, that they might not fall into my Enemies Hands, which they muſt have done, if they had ſtaid, I am oblig'd to do the ſame thing, and to endeavour to ſecure myſelf the beſt I can, in hopes it will pleaſe God, out of his infinite Mercy to this unhappy Nation, to touch their Hearts again with true Loyalty and Honour. If I could have relied on all my Troops, I might not have been put to the Extremity I am in, and would at leaſt have had one Blow for it; but though I know there are many loyal and brave Men amongſt you, both Officers and Soldiers, yet you know, that both you and ſeveral of the General Officers and Men of the Army told me, it was no ways adviſable for me to venture my ſelf at their Head, or think to fight the Prince of Orange with them; and now

(1) "The Lord Chamberlain Mulgrave, tho' his Maſter was gone, and his Staff laid aſide, yet thought the Honour of the Nation ſo much concern'd in ſo high an Inſolence to the Embaſſador of a crown'd Head, that he perſuad'd to ſet upon himſelf to order an Apartment in Whitehall (ſimmediately for Don P. de Berwick) and a great Table to be kept for him twice a Day, with Yeeſons of the Guard to attend in his outward Room (which they never do, but on the King only); for which Strain of Authority he had the Fortune to be thank'd both by King James and the Prince of Orange." [Sheffield, vol. ii. p. 104.]

The French Embaſſador, tho' the moſt obnoxious to the Populace of all the foreign Miniſters, had the good luck to eſcape their Fury, by being in the Neighbourhood of certain of the Nobility, who had provided ſuch a Force for their own Safety, as was ſufficient to keep the Peace: And the Portugueſe Miniſter had the Precaution to demand a Party of the Guards for his Protection. But wherever elſe they thought fit to direct their Batteries, down went all before them, as if Ruin was the only Way to Reſtoration. They demoliſh'd the Convent and Chapel at St. Paul's, the Convent and Chapel in Lincoln-Inn-Fields, the Popiſh Chapels in Lime-ſtree, in Beckleyſbury, at Wild-hill, &c. The Order in theſe Tumults was very wonderful: No Place was ſaffected, but what was mark'd out; if they fell upon any other by Miſtake, their Captains, who would ſave them, ſeiz'd them, in Lincoln-Inn-Fields, was ſeiz'd by a Straggler of writing up. This ſeem'd to be the ſervice of one who was come over with the Prince.

there remains only for me to thank you, and all those, both Officers and Soldiers, who have stuck to me, and been truly loyal. I hope you will still retain the same Fidelity to me, and tho' I do not expect you should expose yourselves by resisting a foreign Army, and a poison'd Nation, yet I hope your former Principles are so enrooted in you, that you will keep yourselves free from Associations, and such pernicious things. Time presses, so that I can say no more.

(r) J. R."

This he communicated at a Council of War to his Officers, and then to the Troops themselves, who were drawn up in a Body for that Purpose; after which he gave them their Dismission in Form, and then sent (u) a Letter of Advice of what he had done to the Prince of Orange; with what Effect, we shall see in its proper Place.

The whole Community being in this disjointed Condition, and every Hour threatening to produce new Distractions; such of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal as were in Town thought it behov'd them, as holding the second Rank in the Commonwealth, to interpose for the common Preservation, in concert with the Magistrates of London. Accordingly they repair'd to Guildhall with that View; but finding those Magistrates insensible of their own Importance, and utterly at a Loss how to act with the Sense and Spirit that so delicate a Crisis requir'd; instead of advising with them, as they first intended, they immediately set up for themselves, and gave their Orders to the Lord Mayor to raise the Militia, &c.; which, we are told, he obey'd as submissively, as if they had been back'd with all the Authority of the Constitution: This encourag'd them to form themselves into a sort of supreme Council, or Senate, and to take upon them the whole Exercise of the Royal Prerogative; they chose a Council Room; they appointed their Clerks; they issu'd their Commands to the Fleet, the abandon'd Army of King James, and to all the considerable Garrisons in England; which kept them all in Order and Submission, says the Duke of Bucks. And to take off the Apprehensions of the City with respect to the Tower, they appointed Lord Lucas, who had the good Fortune to be quarter'd there with his Company of Foot, to be Governor in the Room of Skelton. But what was the most important Act of this memorable Day, they unanimously agreed to the following Declaration:

(Sheffield, vol. II. p. 102.)

(r) There was also a Postscript, which contain'd an Acknowledgment of the Earl's Loyalty, a Remembrance that he had found him a kind Master, and a Promise that he should still find him so.

(u) Viz. " Sir, Having received this Morning a Letter from his Majesty, with the unfortunate News of his Resolution to go out of England, and that he is actually gone, I thought myself oblig'd, being at the Head of his Army, having receiv'd his Majesty's Order to make no Opposition against any body, to let your Highness know it, so soon as it was possible, to hinder the Effusion of Blood; I have order'd already to that purpose all the Troops that are under my Command; which shall be the last Order they shall receive from, &c. Usbridge, Dec. 11. 1688, at Noon."

Their Declaration.

" We doubt not but the World believes, that in this great and dangerous Conjunction, we are heartily and zealously concern'd for the Protestant Religion, and the Laws of the Land, and the Liberties and Properties of the Subject. And we did reasonably hope that the King having issu'd out his Proclamation and Writs for a free Parliament, we might have rested secure under the Expectation of that Meeting: But his Majesty having withdrawn himself, and, as we apprehend, in order to his Departure out of this Kingdom, by the pernicious Councils of Persons ill affected to our Nation and Religion, we cannot, without being wanting to our Duty, be silent under those Calamities, wherein the Popish Councils, which so long prevail'd, have miserably involv'd these Realms. We do therefore unanimously resolve to apply ourselves to his Highness the Prince of Orange, who, with so great Kindness to these Kingdoms, such vast Expence, and so much Hazard to his own Person, has undertaken, by endeavouring to procure a free Parliament, to rescue us, with as little Effusion as possible of Christian Blood, from the imminent Dangers of Slavery and Popery.

And we do hereby declare, That we will, with our utmost Endeavours, assist his Highness in the obtaining such a Parliament with all Speed, wherein our Laws, our Liberties and Properties, may be secur'd, and the Church of England in Particular, with a due Liberty to Protestant Dissenters, and in general, that the Protestant Religion and Interest over the whole World may be supported and encourag'd, to the Glory of God, the Happiness of the establish'd Government in these Kingdoms, and the Advantage of all Princes and States in Christendom, that may be herein concern'd.

In the mean time we will endeavour to preserve, as much as in us lies, the Peace and Security of these great and populous Cities of London and Westminster, and the Parts adjacent, by taking care to disarm all Papists, and secure all Jesuits and Romish Priests, who are in or about the same.

And if there be any thing more to be perform'd by us, for promoting his Highness's generous Intentions for the public Good, we shall be ready to do it, as Occasion shall require (v)."

The Lords who were thus unanimous upon this Occasion, and who had even the Courage to sign their Opinions, were the two Archbishops, the Bishops of Winchester, St. Asaph, Ely, Rochester, and Peterborough; the

(v) Bishop Burnet says, " They sent an Invitation to the Prince, desiring him to come and take the Government of the Nation into his Hands, till a Parliament should meet to bring all Matters to a just and full Settlement." He also takes care to remember, that the Archbishop was there; and to be express'd, that this (Invitation) they all sign'd. But their own Declaration bears witness, that no such thing pass'd at this Meeting; and when such a thing did pass, it is but Justice to acknowledge, that the Archbishop was not there. So strangely does he jumble different Facts together, and so fatally does he mislead his Readers by that means.

A. D. 688. the Earls of Pembroke, Dorset, Mulgrave, Thanet, Carlisle, Grewen, Alesbury, Burlington, Berkeley, and Rochester; the Viscounts Newport, and Weymouth; and the Lords Wharton, North and Grey, Clondu, Montagu, Jeremy, Vaughan-Carberry, Culpeper, Crew, and Ossalfon: Not one of whom started the least Objection to the Prince's Enterprize, on the old non-resisting Principle, or paid the least Reflection on his Highness for not closing purely and simply with the King's Offer of a free Parliament, according to his own original Promise; or made any Enquiry whether the King's Retreat was owing to any Apprehension of Violence to his Person; or set on foot any Proposal for recalling him, or even to keep Matters in Suspence till they knew what was become of him. On the contrary, they flate his Majesty's withdrawing himself as a Desertion of the Government, tho' not in express Terms; suppose themselves to be under a Necessity to apply themselves to the Prince of Orange; resolve to do so without any Delay; speak of his Highness and his Undertaking in the warmest Style of Acknowledgment; call it a Rescue from Popery and Slavery, and promise to assist him in calling a Parliament; which, according to the Doctrines laid down by the Majority of them, could no otherwise be done than by Royal Prerogative. They also caus'd this Declaration to be imparted to his Highness by one Earl, one Viscount, one Bishop, and one Baron, that he might have the more respectful Assurance that it was the unanimous Act of the whole Body. And they also directed that an Account of what else they had done might be laid before him, as if to bespeak his Concurrence and Approbation.

This was certainly going a great way to meet his Highness's Wishes: But the orthodox-Magistracy and Lieutenantcy of London (whether inspir'd by their own Zeal, or led by the artful Management of the Intriguers they were now surrounded with, is uncertain) went a great way further: They proceeded by Address instead of Declaration: The Former render'd their deapest Thanks to the divine Majesty for having bless'd him with miraculous Success: They beg'd leave to present their most humble Thanks to his Highness for his appearing in Person in this Kingdom to rescue England, Scotland, and Ireland from Slavery and Popery: And, being disappointed in their Expectation of some Remedy for their Oppressions and Dangers from his Majesty's Concessions, by his withdrawing himself, they request'd to make his Highness their Refuge: In the Name of that Capital City, they imploer'd his Highness's Protection; and they most humbly besought his Highness to vouchsafe to repair to that City, where his Highness would be receiv'd with universal Joy and Satisfaction. And the Latter could never sufficiently express the deep Sense they should ever retain in their Hearts of the many Dangers which his Highness had expos'd himself to, for the sake of the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom; without which unparallel'd Undertaking, they must probably have suffer'd all the Miseries that Popery and Slavery could have brought upon them. They had been greatly concern'd that they had not had any seasonable Opportunity before, to give his Highness and the World a real Testimony, that it had been their firm Resolution to venture all that was dear to them to attain those glorious Ends, which his Highness had propos'd, in setting these distracted Nations. — They unanimously presented to his Highness their just and due Acknowledgments for the happy Relief he had brought to them. That they might not be wanting in this at that Coniuncture, they said, they had put themselves into such a Posture, that, by the Blessing of God, they might be able to prevent all ill Designs, and preserve the City in Peace and Safety till his Highness's happy Arrival: And they humbly desir'd that his Highness would be pleas'd to repair to the City with what convenient Speed he could for the perfecting the great Work which his Highness had so happily began, to the general Joy and Satisfaction of all.

In the mean time, the military Men about Town were as busy as the Courtiers or the Citizens, and seem'd resolv'd to be as forward with their Peace-Offerings to the Prince as either. Thus we are told, that the very Duke of Northumberland, who had receiv'd his Majesty's last Command, as a Lord of the Bed-chamber, had no sooner discharg'd it, than he assembled his Troop of Life-Guards and declar'd for his Highness: That the Marquis de Miremont, who had a Regiment of Horse, did the same; and that the rest of the principal Officers had a Meeting at Whitehall; at which it was resolv'd to send an Express to the Prince of Orange to acquaint him with the King's Departure, and to assure him, that they would assist the Lord-Mayor to keep the City quiet, till his Highness should think fit to resort thither in Person.

At the same time also, the Western Road was in a manner cover'd with those who posted to the Prince to make a Tender of their Services, to solicit his Commands, and to bargain for their Rewards: His Camp had the Face of a Court; he gave it that Title, his Favourites began already to behave as if they had the Nation at their Disposal; and his Highness himself, it may be presum'd, could not reflect without Pleasure on the Careless he receiv'd from all Ranks and Degrees of Men, who thus labour'd to put him in possession of what he had so long languish'd for.

If his Felicity had any Alloy at this time, it arose from the Conduct of the Lords; for tho' they had so unanimously undertook to act in Concurrence with him, he was perhaps uneasy that they undertook to act at all. The immediate Offer of the Administration, was, no doubt, the Compliment he expected, and that, it seems, they were not as yet in a Humour to make him. Having found the City to trouble the first Day they had on the second, they went to Whitehall, and proceeded to the Choice of a Prefidant, as if their Purpose was to act as Mediators between the Prince and the People, and by their own Authority, to keep the Wheels of Government in Motion in the mean while.

The President thus chose was the Marquis of Hallifax; and we find it insinuated by the Duke of Bucks, who put him in Nomination, that the Compliment was rather made to his superior Title, than to his superior Merit; for, says his Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury refusing to come any more among those Lords who met at Whitehall, and the Archbishop of York being unaccustom'd to the Business of such an Assembly, he was nam'd and approv'd. And he adds, "This was the Cause of all his Favour with the Prince of Orange, who finding him in that manner, at the Head of such a Council, and indeed ready to serve any Turn, thought he might be useful in this Conjunction, tho' before he had always forbidden his Agents ever to trust him with their Design of coming into England."

Jeffreys fall
of the Mob.

On the second Day of their Meeting, and first of their Sitting at Whitehall, a very remarkable Incident happen'd in the City. The Lord Chancellor Jeffreys had disappear'd the Day before, as the King had done; and it was universally concluded that they were gone off together. But tho' it is reasonable to think he was in his Majesty's Secret, he was not of his Party. His Lordship, when the Prince's Design began first to be talk'd of, being ask'd, whether he could guess what the Heads of his Manifesto would be on? And, now growing sensible, that his Prophecy was in a fair way to be fulfilled, had wisely resolv'd to make his Escape: In order to which, he shav'd his Eyc-Brows, put on a Seaman's Habit, and, all alone, made the best of his way to Wapping, with a Design to take shipping for Hamburg. Thus far all was well, and his Lordship had Reason to think the worst was over: But his evil Genius follow'd him; and while he was looking out of a Window, say some, but, more naturally, while he was drinking a Pot of Ale in a Public House, say others, a Scrivener of that District, whom he had once, upon a Trial, frighten'd almost into Convulsions, got a Glimpse of him, and recollecting in a Moment all the Terrors which had then taken such hold of him, gave the Word to the Mob, who rush'd in upon him like a Herd of Wolves, and shew'd a Disposition to tear him in Pieces. So dreadfully did his own Insolence and Barbarity recoil upon his own Head; and so much was he to suffer as a Criminal, who as a Judge had brought such Sufferings on others. Every Face that he saw was the Face of a Fury; every Grasp he felt, he had reason to think was that of the Demon that waited for him; every Voice that he could distinguish in so wild an Uproar, overwhelmed him with Reproaches; and his Conscience eccho'd within him, that he deserv'd them all. In this miserable Flight, in these merciless Hands, with these distracted Thoughts, and with the Horror and Despair in his own ghastly Face, that was the natural Result of all, he was goaded on to the Lord-Mayor; who, seeing so great a Man, whom he had never look'd up to without trembling, brought before him as the worst and most abhor'd of all Malefactors, fell into Fits, and was carry'd off to his Bed; from whence he never rose more. This oblig'd the Lords to interpose, who soon had Notice of what had happen'd, and who sent their Warrant to commit him to the Tower; which was at this time rather a Deliv'rance than a Punishment: For now the Rage of the People was grown more ungovernable than ever, and such horrible Menaces did they roar out against him, that it was thought expedient to surround him with no less than two Regiments of the Trained Bands: Nor did he yet believe himself safe; he saw the same threatening Faces on all Sides of him; he saw them hold up Whips and Halters; he saw them pressing in upon him almost at the Post of their own Lives: And, holding up his Hands, sometimes on one Side of the Coach, and sometimes on the other, he cry'd out in Atonics, For the Lord's Sake keep them off! For the Lord's Sake keep them off! "I saw him, and heard him (says Mr. Oldmixon) and I truly say without Pity, tho' I never saw any other Malefactor without Compassion and Concern." He had, however, at last, the Consolation to be safely lodg'd in the Tower, and had Time and Leisure to bestow many a painful Reflection on the Enormities which had brought him thither.

And is not
Tower.

About the same time another Incident yet more extraordinary than this happen'd, which threw not only the two Cities of London and Westminster, but the whole Kingdom, as it is said, into a dreadful Disorder: And this was an Universal Outcry, That the Jesuits were at hand, burning and destroying all before them, which gain'd Credit wherever it spread, and carry'd so much Terror along with it, that every Man, thinking he was either to kill or be kill'd, had recourse to his Weapons, and stood upon his Guard: Lights were moreover plac'd in all the Windows of the Houses, that the Approach of the Destroyers might be the sooner descri'd: The Militia Drums propagated the Alarm through every Street; and even in the Country the Fire-Bells rung, the Beacons blaz'd, and those Towns and Villages that were within reach of each other, mutually fancy'd that they heard the Cries and Groans of their suffering and dying Neighbours. But, however certain it is, that such an Event did actually happen, there is scarce any such thing as settling precisely either the time when, or the Place where, it took its rise; or whether it was owing to Chance or Design. Oldmixon dates it the eleventh, which was the Day the King withdrew, and his Army was disbanded; and says it began at Westminster about eleven o'Clock (at Night must be understood) upon the Report of some Country Fellows: In which latter Circumstance, together with Echard, he follows the Author of the Life of King William: But then they both assign a different Date, viz. the twelfth, towards towards Midnight: And the Compiler of the History of the Defection, the thirteenth, about three o'Clock in the Morning; Kennet, by Circumstance, does the same; for he says, "Chancellor Jeffrey was committed the twelfth, the Day before this Confection." And as to Burnet and Rapin, they only mention the Thing, for the sake of throwing the Blame of it on Lord Feverham, without specifying any Date at all. But what makes the Date a Matter of some Importance, is this: The Politicians, it seems, were of Opinion, That these Country Fellows had their Instructions from Marshal Schemberg, and that his End in it was both to feel the Pulse of the Nation, and to inspire them with Resentment against the Popish Party, by letting them see to what Dangers they were expos'd, by the introducing Irish Troops into the Kingdom, and by letting them loose afterwards without Pay, and with Swords in their Hands. Now that the Outcry arose on the 11th, as Oldmixon would have it thought, this Opinion would have appear'd without the least Foundation; since there was scarce time between eleven in the Forenoon, when Lord Feverham's Letter to the Prince was writ, and eleven at Night, to frame such a Project, much less to put in Execution: But if we pass on to the twelfth at Night, or the thirteenth in the Morning, that Objection in part vanishes, and we may reasonably enough conclude with the Politicians, that it was form'd in the Prince's Cabinet for some such Purpose, tho' not perhaps the same as has been already nam'd, more especially when we recollect what has been already quoted from the Duke of Duaki, viz. That the King's abandon'd Army was kept together, and in due Order and Subjection. The same Quotation also contains a ridiculous Story, which, it is reasonable to suppose, was circulated on Purpose to put the Public on a false Scent; namely, that all this Confusion was caus'd by the burning of a Cottage by six or seven hungry Irishmen, which took Fire during the Fight; whereas it is utterly inconceivable that an Army which was so contemptible in a Body, should grow all at once so terrible when disbanded, unless we suppose that the Alarm was precipitously laid, and that proper Orders were properly plac'd to give fire to it when the signal should be made, in order to communicate it from one End of the Chain to the other. Nay, Mr. Speke, the principal Transactor in the Revolution, stands forth, and (as) takes the Merit of the whole thing upon himself; acknowledges, That it was all Contrivance on one hand, and Imposition on the other; and challenges a Reward for being the grand Incendiary.--- How amazing! That a Man should betray an Ambition to be thought the Author of so nefarious a Contrivance, which might have occasion'd a general (x) Massacre of the Papists, and thereby polluted the Land with such ingrain'd Wickedness, as the Penitence of Ages could never have wash'd away! What is farther remarkable with respect to this astonishing Imposition is this: On the very same Day that it took such hold on our Capital, viz. the thirteenth, the Prince of Orange set forth the following Order from his COURT at Henley, under the old Title of a Declaration, viz. "Whereas we are inform'd, That divers Regiments, Troops, and Companies have been encourag'd to disperse themselves in an unusual and unwarrantable manner, whereby the Public Peace is very much disturb'd; we have thought fit hereby to require all Colonels and Commanders in Chief of such Regiments, Troops and Companies, by Beat of Drum, or otherwise, to call together the several Officers and Soldiers belonging to their respective Regiments, Troops and Companies, in such Places as they shall find most convenient for their Rendezvous, and there to keep them in good Order and Discipline. And we do likewise direct and require all such Officers and Soldiers forthwith to repair to such Places as shall be appointed for that Purpose, by the respective Colonels and Commanders in Chief, whereof special Notice is to be given unto us for our further Orders."

To say nothing of the Phrase encourag'd to disperse, instead of disband; nor to object, that he lays no one Outrage to the Charge of the Troops so disbanded or dispersed, it is flagrantly obvious, that the Prince here acts in the Capacity of a Conqueror, and prescribes Laws to the Military, at least, who had neither made any Submission to him, nor over whom he had receiv'd any Authority; as also, that he breaks in upon the Administration of the Lords sitting at Whitehall; and that, after exacting Obedience from Men born free, and now discharged by their Prince, he leaves them as he found them, to be subsided by the People: And what renders this notable Exertion of Power, in such absolute Terms, so much the more extraordinary, x The Words are these: "He (Mr. Speke, for he has to us a Monthly, in which he writes of himself in the Third Person, like a Cavalier, to adapt things to the Temper of the Century and Country, in all the several Counties, and by what Means to disperse any Papers of that Nature with the greatest Secrecy and Discreetness; as appear'd soon after that, in the most surprising Manner, in a Matter (the Irish Alarm) solely contriv'd and manag'd by himself, which was a Mystery to the greatest Politicians of those Times, and long continued to be so, and which made no small Noise, not only all over this Island, but in other Parts of Europe, and was at that time of such eminent and signal Service to the Protestant Interest in this Nation, that, from that Day forward, the people's Factions, and their Emulations, never durst attempt to lay any their Hands, or hardly to draw their Heads." His End in giving this Alarm, he also says, "was, in the first place, to expose the Weakness of that in it self contemptible Faction of the popish and popishly affected Party, when depriv'd of the Support of an arbitrary Prince, and a profligate Court. This he thought no way so difficult to accomplish, as by putting their Strength to a Test: He also propos'd, by that means, to weaken the Hands and the Hearts of King James's Irish Soldiers, and to terrify them from making any desperate Attempt in the Crisis of their Master's declining Tyranny, by letting them see how despicable and fatal it would prove to them to put Matters on a War, which might involve them in so horrid a Destruction." P. 40, 41, 42.

(x) As it was, we are told by Mr. Oldmixon, and others, That the People every where trembled, and were inclin'd to betray all the Irishmen and Papists, who were inclin'd to venture to commit any Outrage.

inary, it was not till the next Day, that the several Deputies from the Lords, and the Magistracy and Lieutenancy of London, came to him with their several Tenders, at Henley: And, on the same Day, the Whitehall-Assembly set forth a particular Requisition to the Irish Officers and Soldiers, to repair to their respective Corps, and deliver up their Arms to the Officers of the Ordnance, appointed to receive them; accompany'd with a sort of Engagement, that, if they behav'd themselves peaceably, they should have Subsidance paid them; and a Menace, that, in case they did otherwise, they should be treated as Vagabonds; of which all Justices and Constables were requir'd to take notice.

We are farther told, that, at the same Time and Place, his Highness committed several other Acts of Sovereignty; Such as ordering Mr. Blauwaine, Secretary at War, to bring him an Account of the King's Army; the directing the Lord Churchill to reassemble his Troop of Horse-guards; and the Duke of Grafton, with his Regiment of Foot-guards, to take possession of Tilbury-Fort. The King, indeed, had dropt the Imperial Mantle; but his Highness was not as yet authoriz'd to take it up: He had made, as we have seen, the most solemn Proteftations to the contrary: He had not so much as set forth any new Declaration, on occasion of his Majesty's Departure; nor, whatever Bishop Burnet has taken the liberty to say, had he been invited by the Lords to array himself with the Spoils of the Throne.

But while he was thus domineering at Henley, and they at Whitehall, and both were striking up an Intercourse in pursuit of their several Interests, another more extraordinary Adventure than either of the two former took place, which is thus recounted by the Duke of Bucks: "The Lord Mulgrave happen'd to be advertiz'd privately, that the King had been seiz'd by the angry Rabble of Feverham, and had sent a poor Country-man with the News, in order to procure his Release; which was like to come too late, since the Messenger had waited long at the Council-door, without any body's being willing to take notice of him. This sad Account mov'd him with great Compassion, at such an extraordinary Instance of worldly Uncertainty; and no Cautions of offending the prevailing Party were able to restrain him from shewing a little Indignation at so mean a Proceeding in the Council. Upon which their new President adjourn'd it hastily, in order to prevent him, but that Lord earnestly conjur'd them all to sit down again presently, that he might acquaint them with a Matter which admitted of no Delay, and which was of the highest Importance imaginable. Accordingly, the Lords, who knew nothing of the Business, could not but hearken to it; and those few that guess'd it, and knew the Consequence, yet wanted Time for concerting enough together about so nice and so very important a Matter, as saving or losing a King's Life: The Lords therefore sat down again, and he then represented to them, what a Barbarity it would be for such an Assembly to connive at the Rabble's tearing in pieces even any private Gentleman, much more a great Prince, who, with all his Popery, was still their Sovereign: So that mere Shame oblig'd them to suspend their Politics a-while, and to call in the Messenger, who told them with Tears, how the King had, with much Difficulty, engaged him to deliver a Letter from him to any Person whom he could find willing to save him from so imminent a Danger: The Letter had no Supercription, and was to this effect: 'To acquaint the Reader of it, that he had been discover'd in his Retreat, by some Fishermen of Kent, and secur'd at first there by the Gentry, who were yet afterwards forc'd to resign him into the Hands of an insolent Rabble.'

On so pressing an Occasion, and so very publicly made known, the Council was surpriz'd, and under some Difficulty: For as there was danger of displeasing by doing their Duty; so there was no less by omitting it: Since the Law makes it highly criminal to be only passive in such an Extremity. Besides that most of them, unacquainted as yet with the Prince of Orange, imagin'd him prudent, and consequently capable of punishing so base a Desertion, either out of Generosity or Policy: These found afterwards their Caution needless; but at present it influenced the Council enough to make them send two hundred of the Life-guard under their Captain the Earl of Feverham: First, to rescue the King from all Danger of the common People; and afterwards to attend him toward the Sea-side, if he continu'd his Resolution of retiring; which they thought it more decent to connive at, than to detain him here by Force."

Bishop Burnet's Sketch of this Council-Scene is materially different. "The Privy Council, says his Lordship, met upon it (the News of the Feverham-Adventure); some mov'd, That he should be sent for: Others said, he was King, and might send for his Guards and Coaches, as he pleas'd; but it became not them to send for him: It was left to his General, the Earl of Feverham, to do what he thought best. SO he went for him with his Coaches and Guards." And again, the Compiler of the History of the Desertion, the Writer of the Life of King William, Bishop Kennet, and Mr. Archdeacon Echard, on the other hand, are express, That the Lords sent four of their Body, namely, the Earls of (1) Feverham, Aylesbury, Tarnewth, and Middleton, to invite him back, "or (says the first of them) only to see him safe on board any Ship he should chuse, in case he perished in his Resolution of going out of the Kingdom;

News brought to the Lords, that the King was seiz'd at Feverham. [Sheffield's Works, vol. ii. p. 106.]

Different Accounts of this Desertion.

(1) Sir Jas's Recess also mentions these four Peers; but moves us to conclude, that Lord Feverham, say, waited on him with his Guards, &c: I can't express, that his Orders were, to leave it to his Majesty's own Choice, either to go, or to return; it being desired, to put any Restraint upon him.

A. D. 1688. Kingdom: Which so far agrees with the Account given by the Duke of Bucks; and that Account, upon the Whole, as coming from one who had so considerable a Share in the Business he writes of, deserves most to be regarded. As, therefore, the Notion of Bishop Burnet's, That Lord Feversham was left to act, upon so great an Occasion, as the pleas'd, is to be rejected, on one hand; so neither can it be allow'd, That his Majesty was invited back, on the other: It is, on the contrary, pretty plain, that the Lords were as fond of a Desertion, as the Prince of Orange; both on account of the Advances they had already made to his Highness, and because they knew if he continued to be King, the Catholics would continue to be his Favourites, if not his Ministers; which, among the Grandees, was held the greatest of his Sins: And yet, says the Historian of his own Times, "the Prince thought the Privy-Council had not us'd him well, who, after they had sent to him to take the Government upon him, had made this Step without consulting him." Other Writers however say, That they dispatch'd an Express immediately to his Highness, with an Account of what had pass'd: And it may, upon the Whole, be pronounced, that, without a total Departure from all the Laws of Decency, they could not have done less in Compliment to their late Sovereign; nor could they have done more to facilitate the grand View of him who was so impatient to king it in his room.

The ungrateful News of the King's Demise had nevertheless reach'd his Highness before; in what manner is thus recounted by the Prelate last-quoted: "Two Gentlemen of Kent came to Windsor the Morning after the Prince came thither, (which was on the 15th, and where he immediately display'd his Banner, by way of Signal that he had taken possession): They were address'd to me; and they told me of the Accident at Feversham, and desir'd to know the Partis Misjurs upon it. I was affected with this dismal Reverse of the Fortune of a great Prince, more than I think fit to express. I went immediately to Bentinch, and wak'd him, and got him to go to the Prince, and let him know what had happen'd, that some Order might be presently taken for the Security of the King's Person, and for taking him out of the Hands of a rude Multitude, who said, They would obey no Orders, but such as came from the Prince. The Prince order'd Zuylewain to go immediately to Feversham, and to see the King safe, and to find Liberty to go whithersoever he pleas'd." In this summary and plausible Way does his Lordship pass over this tender Passage in his History: But, as this may not perhaps give full Satisfaction to Posterity, it is fit to add the following Note from another Right Reverend Father of the Church, &c.

"Mr. Thomas Napleton, a Gentleman of Feversham, went away to the Prince of Orange, to acquaint his Highness with this stopping of the King in his Passage to France, which he thought would be very acceptable to his Highness; but he found it rather a Dislike to him. Upon which, Mr. Napleton had such an Impression of Discontent, as hardly ever went off from him." As also, that Bishop Burnet himself (when afterwards entangled in the Briars of Controversy, to get rid of a worse Imputation, namely, that, in Discourse with the said Mr. Napleton, who was one of the two Gentlemen he mentions, he wish'd they had left the late King to be torn in pieces by the Mob) admits, that he said, that, instead of hindering his Majesty from prosecuting his Voyage beyond-sea, it was his Opinion, they ought to have help'd him in it; And that his Lordship annexes, Mr. Napleton's own Account of the said Discourse, as given by the latter to Dr. Geese, in these Words, "Mr. Napleton said, That I did, indeed, ask him several times, Why they did not let King James go? and that he did answer, The Mob would have torn him in pieces. That within a little while I ask'd him the same Question again; and that thereupon he ask'd me, Would I have had him torn in pieces? To which he added, that I reply'd, God forbid! I abhorred the Thoughts of it." Thus one Account rectifies the other; and, from the last, it becomes manifest, that, by taking order for the King's Security, ought to be understood, the taking order for covering his Retreat: For Mr. Napleton's Errand was not to demand Succour, but to give Information; and he had expressly inform'd the Doctor, as he himself in the Course of that Contest allows, That, upon the Gentlemen of the County's coming to Feversham, they had brought the People to shew him more Respect: Besides which, not only Father Orleans, but the Duke of Bucks, and others, declare point-blank, That Zuylewain's Message was, to forbid his Majesty from coming any nearer London, than Rehester.

As much of the King's Case as brings it down to his Retreat from Whitehall, we have seen at full; and by touching somewhat more particularly upon what follow'd, we shall be enabled to decide upon the whole of it. He chose for his Attendants, it seems, Sir Edward Hale, Mr. Sheldon and Labadie; and, having cross'd the Thames, from the Privy Stairs, as the Queen had done before him, posted down to a Place in the Neighbourhood of Feversham, in order to embark on board a small Vessel, which had been provided to carry him on to a Frigate, that waited for him off of Margate, under the Command of one Murdonnald, an Irishman. The Vessel was there, but, unfortunately, wanted, or was thought to want, Ballast: And while that was being in, Hale sent a Footman, in his own Livery, which was known the whole County over, with a Letter to the Post-House: A Person who had been once a Gunner at Dever Castle, and had been discarded by Hale, knew the Man, dogg'd him down to the Water-side, and saw him taken on board the King's Vessel; after which, applying to the Fishermen and other Adventurers of the Place, who, taking Advantage of the Troubles of the Times, had set up a new Trade, which was, to way-lay the Coast for Fugitives, as well for the sake of a Passage as a Reward,

Reward, he soon got a Crew of those amphibious Ruffians to give Chace to the King's Whiffel; the Consequence of which was, that they came up with her, clapt her on board, and, knowing Hale, declar'd her to be good Prize. He was a Catholic on Record, that was Crime enough; and those that were with him were guilty of being in his Company. On these Premises they fell to pillaging, which was the main of their Business, without Mercy; and did it as such Free-Booters ever do; with all the Insolence and Brutality imaginable. The King suffer'd it in common with the rest, or rather worse than any; for being disguis'd in a plain Suit and Bob Wig, they took him for Hale's Priest. Majesty is not, like the Sun, to be distinguish'd by its own Effulgence, but when shorn of its Power, is thorn of its Glory. The King had about him 3 or 400 Guineas, and several valuable Seals and other Jewels; They strip him of all; And tho' so rich a Treasure prompted them to think the Owner was a greater Man than he seem'd to be, that Consideration only serv'd to make them more eager to carry him ashore, in Hopes of enhancing the Profits of their Voyage. It was in vain to expostulate; they were now the Masters, and they expected to be obey'd. And thus one of the greatest Kings in Europe became a Prey to the meanest of his Subjects, and presented one of the most affecting Spectacles to the Word, and one of the most dreadful Warnings to Princes that ever struck the one with Terror, or the other with Compassion. What his Reflections were under this severe Visitation, may perhaps be more easily imagin'd than explain'd: But if he deriv'd any Consolation from his being unknown, he was soon depriv'd of it; for as they drew near the Town, a Crowd of People, as usual, came on board of them, to entertain themselves with a Sight of the Prisoners; and among the rest a Constable, who thought his Authority might be worth something on such an Occasion, and who no sooner cast his Eyes on the King, than he knew him; and falling at his Feet, besought his Pardon for those Miscreants who had so misus'd him: He also commanded them to restore what they had taken from him; which they preparing to do, his Majesty shew'd he was still a King by refusing the Coin, tho' his whole Stock, and contenting himself with the Jewels. The Scene was now chang'd at once; those who the Moment before had treated him with the most shocking Indignities, now stood aloof, as if there had been Lightning in his Eyes, and every Glance was mortal. This reviv'd his former Purpose of making his (2) Escape, and

(1) It is in this Manner the Story is generally told: But Mr. Smith has inferred in his Work an Account, which he says, is a Manuscript Letter from one of the Gentlemen that came to the King when he was taken, to his Friend in London; and in which no Mention is made of the Circumstances of Sir E. Hall's Footman, or of the Constable: But these many Particulars are to be found in it, which afford a very broad Comment on those rustic Words of Mr. Newton's, above treated of, Would you have him turn to pieces by the Mill? or may he pass'd from such as follow:

—“ He inflict much upon going off, after he was taken; and I believe he put the Question to every Layman and Churchman in the Room, to get him a Boat, and let him escape. He said the Prince of Orange fought his Crown and Life; and, if he were deliver'd up, his Blood would lie at our Doors, for he don't think they would murder him. Nob. Tell us, the Opportunity is in your Hand; but if you miss this, it will not be in your Power to help me. He argued much upon these Words, He that is not with me is against me; and Jeronim's dill on Floor, making Reflections on Men's Condition to serve him in that Extremity. While he was thus going off, and used all Motive proper, to be thought, in being shy, praying, trumping, arguing, persuading, reasoning, &c. which was for above three Hours, the Rage of the Seamen took fire, apprehending he would prevail with some to let him escape secretly; and therefore utter'd some contemptuous Words, and so small Particulars one'd; which I almost think had not happen'd, if the Fear of his Escape had not lain so much in their Minds, as that they durst not be so much forward, dissenting to such a Design. For the Seamen much valued themselves on their Change, and all apprehend their own Lives in danger, if he went off imagining they had done a singular Piece of Service to the Nation, and resolving there to keep him, till Order from the Prince, or the Lords at Whitehall. And the King himself undertook to discourse them, and shew'd the Seamen, By what Authority do you stand here? Am not I your King? And here you shall see how you shall. Will you not give me a Glass of Wine? Will you be so good to buy me some Ale, or a Glass of Beer, and set me a Boat, and I'll go off. Afterward, he went so far as to regulate their Way of keeping a Guard; but then stand farther off: Go down, and keep your Distance. Which so enraged them, that some of them forgore all Decency and Reverence to him; and such that Sir Edward Hall was oblig'd to take the King off from that Discourse, which made him cheap, and prov'd unprofitable and unseasonable. But still the Rage of the Seamen increas'd; and they took hands, and cry Downing and Down. It is better rather than to stay here; I got together in a Boat, and broke out into a general Hurra, and for a while demolish'd their Guard, till it was time to go to him but when they well knew, he had their Masters, and made ready to go, they resolv'd to sit upon any that oppos'd their Masters. They resolv'd immediately the King, and his Spe- rits seem'd much down; which made him keep his Eye upon the Door, and watch all their Motions narrowly, and desire not to be much alone, but the Gentlemen to stay with him. Towards Night, the Earl of Windsor came, and then it was resolv'd to remove the King to a private House; which the Seamen still oppos'd for fear of Escape. But my Lord, putting his Honour for the King's Safety, the better Sort of them conform'd, but the Mob still rais'd a Noise as the King came down-stairs, I believe more than twenty Swords were drawn over his Head, and some Throats rais'd; and at the Bottom of the Stairs they stopp'd him near a Quarter of an Hour. At length, the Matter was compos'd, upon condition they only should be the King's Guards, while he stay'd. So at length the King was oblig'd to walk down the dirty Streets to his private Apartments, with the irregular, disorderly Crew at his Heels.

Next Day, being Thursday the 13th, came in two hundred Gentlemen from Canterbury and Exeter, and, in the Night of them, John's a strict Conversation with the Prince of Orange; which much afflicted him, for that he then said he was not safe where he was. And towards Night Captain Crawford and another Captain came from Cherbury, declaring the Resolution to deliver up to the Prince the Fort, and the Ships in the Beaulieu, which is a Road under the Protection of the Fort. Upon the hearing of which he said, he would consent to any thing, to prevent Bloodshed; but seem'd extremely afflicted therewith. He was really very melancholy at times, and often shed Tears. His Guards were so ferre upon him, and press'd him from one Room to another; and rais'd upon him in his Pyrexia, for that he had rais'd the Civilities from the Seamen that were due to a Gentleman in Restraint; scarce Leisure to be devoted, or rest to the Calls of Nature; so over-officiously did they guard him. Fresh Rumours oft were rais'd of his going off, which intreated the feathered Seamen together, and were the Occasion of fresh Heats and Insolencies. In this tumultuous manner was the poor King guarded; neither would they suffer the Gentlemen to take their Turns.

When Friday Night came, and the Guards, that were sent from the Lords that were then at Whitehall, were within two Hours March of Feversham, the Rage of the Seamen increas'd, because the Earl of Feversham was with them, and some others they dislike'd; that they swore bloodily, no Guard should come in there, and so run all to Arms. Upon Signs of which, the Gentlemen were forc'd to dispech Expresses away to stop the Guards, and pray'd them to lodge as Strangers; for doubtless if the Guards had come that Night into Tower, there had been bloody Work; for by what I heard and saw, I verily believe the Seamen have over-ruled them.

At length, Saturday Morning came, when the King was guarded out by the Seamen and Gentlemen, and so receiv'd four Guards, by which they were less for him.

He calls a Council, and sets forth an Order for suppressing Tumults.

His former Condition.

[Oldmixon.]

They might personally and amicably confer together on the Means of an Accommodation. This was, in Effect, signing a Carte Blanche, and surrendering at Discretion: And the His Majesty, as above hinted, did venture to call a Council, in which, perhaps, he did take the Liberty to speak with a little Bitterness of those who took up the Government the very first Hour almost of his Absence, without the least Thought of a Proviso, in case of his Return, it does not appear that he proceeded to any other Business, than the setting forth an Order to put a stop to the Excesses of the Mob; which has been blam'd as an ill tim'd Instance of the Continuance of his Zeal for the Catholic Cause, and what author'd a Belief, that he came back only for this Purpose (?). Indeed, as almost every thing which happen'd to him, during his short Stay at Whitehall, carry'd along with it Demonstration that his Power was at an End, so, except in a very few Particulars, he scarce made any Attempt to reform it. The producing the great Seal would have been the most authoritative way of doing so: But he neither did nor could reach to it, for being ask'd, as we are told, tho' not by whom, or on what Occasion, what was (r) become of it? he gave for Answer, That the Queen had taken it along with her; and the Truth was, that before his or her Departure it had been thrown into the River. Being also press'd to issue the Writ for summoning the Parliament, which would have been an Exertion of one of the highest Branches of the Prerogative, he could not prevail upon to come to any Determination; nor does it appear, that he entertain'd any Thought of reprimanding the City for their forward Advances to the Prince of Orange, tho' provok'd afresh by the additional Sight, of their omitting to wait upon him at his Return to Whitehall. And this Tameness of his in the Wane of his Sovereignty, contributed perhaps as much to his Ruin, as the All-sufficiency that he assum'd when it was at the full; for if his Subjects learn'd to hate him then, they despis'd him now; and made no Secret of their Contempt, because they saw he had not Spirit enough remaining to punish them for it. This, like what is said of the Mouth of March, he came in like a Lion, and went out like a Lamb: And as, when he first enter'd upon the Stage of Empire, he seiz'd and apply'd the Brevet as the Creature of his own Will and Pleasure, without waiting for the Sanction of Parliament, so his own Officers, both in the Treaty and Exchequer, now refus'd to obey his Orders in the Disposal of any Part of it, without the Consent of the Prince of Orange, who had as yet no Right nor Pretence to interfere with it at all; which is so much the more worthy of Remark, because one of his Demands was for a small Sum to keep watch, and he was driven to such Distress, as to be forc'd to borrow a hundred Guineas at least: it is so said, of Lord Cashbin.

We ought now to wait upon the Prince and his Adherents at Whitehall; but first, it is fit to remember, that Zuylichem having mist'd the King at Rockefor, ported after him to Lerdow, as holding it expedient that he should be made acquainted with his Majesty's Will and Pleasure, tho' it was too late for him to comply with it. By one of his Majesty's Advocates we are told, That the overtook him at Sommelet-Haufe; that the King, having read the Prince's Letter, mock'd reply'd, "That he would have comply'd with it, had it come sooner to his Hands;" and that the putting such a Restraint upon a Monarch in his own Dominions, was a Piece of Haughtiness and Insolence above all Example. But however great the Affront was, or however elated the King is said to have been with the Acclamations of his People, Zuylichem was forc'd to depart in Peace. On the other hand, when the Earl of Ferberstein arriv'd with his Majesty's Letter at Whitehall, and the Prince understood, that his Message by Zuylichem had not answer'd the End propos'd, he, who needed Council sometimes, say the Duke of Bucks, and now more than ever, assembled a general Council of all those about him, who were of Quality in Consideration enough to assist it, to deliberate on what was fit to be done at so extraordinary a Crisis, and which, in the very Haven's Mouth, threaten'd to shipwreck all their Hopes, or rather Dependencies; for ever since the King's Departure, they had look'd upon the Kingdom as their own, and had allotted to themselves their several Shares. "The Prince, says the Historian of his own Times, heard the Opinions, not only of those who had come along with him, but of such of the Nobility as were now come to him, among whom the Marquis of Halleifax was one. All agreed, that it was not convenient that the King should stay at Whitehall. Neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the City, could have been safe, if they had been both near one another. Tumults would probably have risen out of it. The Guards, and the officious Flatterers of the two Courts, would have been unquiet Neighbours. It was thought

Zuylichem mist'd the Prince's latter is his.

[Great Britain's 1st Complaint, lib. 1. 9.]

The Effect of the Court of Whitehall.

(1) This Order was return'd to the Houses, as if to give notice, that the King had return'd the Reins of Government: And as if to countermand him so by, the Number of the eight Commissioners, who attended him on that Occasion, were press'd to the Head of it, were the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Orford, Bevilston, and Widdow, the Lord Viscount Leicester, the Lord Godolphin, Archer, the Master of the Rolls, and Mrs. Sturt.

(2) The Council of Lords sent three Intermittories to Whitehall in the Tower, one: 1. What he had done with the Arrestment? 2. Whom the Parliament Writs were, and how they were used? 3. Whether the King had given him leave to depart the Kingdom? To the first he said, The NUMB. 30.

King sent for the Great Seal ten Days before; and tho' he had the Parliament Writs carry'd about with him, yet he had not face then had the Seal. To the second he answer'd, That he had given the King the Writs that were not sent to the Country; and the Clerk of the Chancery could tell better than he, what had become of those that were. To the third he said, The King had given him leave to depart the Kingdom; and he had follow'd from the French and Spanish Embassadors. [Oldmixon, vol. 1. p. 67.]

thought necessary to stick to the Point of the King's deserting his People, and not to give up that, by entering upon any Treaty with him.

It was a tender Point how to dispose of the King's Person. Some propos'd rougher Methods: The keeping him a Prisoner, at least till the Nation was settled, and till Ireland was secured. It was thought, his being kept in Custody would be such a Tie on all his Party, as would oblige them to submit, and be quiet. Ireland was in great Danger. And his Restraint might oblige the Earl of Tyrconnel to deliver up the Government, and to disarm the Papists, which would preserve that Kingdom, and the Protestants in it. But, because it might raise too much Compassion, and perhaps some Disorder, if the King should be kept in Restraint within the Kingdom, therefore the sending him to Breda was propos'd. The Earl of Clarendon press'd this vehemently, on the Account of the Irish Protestants, as the King himself told me: For those that gave their Opinions in this Matter did it secretly, and in Confidence to the Prince. The Prince said, he could not say out that this might be good and wise Advice; but it was that to which he could not hearken: He was so industriously with the Grounds of this Expedition, that he could act against the King in a far and open War: But for his Person, now that he had him in his Power, he could not put such a Handicap on him as to make him a Prisoner. And he knew the Prince's Temper so well, that he was sure he would never bear it; nor did he know what Disaster might ensue, or what Effect it might have upon the Parliament that was to be call'd: He was firmly resolv'd never to suffer any thing to be done against his Person: He saw it was necessary to send him out of London. And he would order a Guard to attend upon him, who should only defend and protect his Person, but not restrain him in any Sort. The Duke of Bucks also writes, "That some who yet have been since the greatest Enemies to the Nonjurors, propos'd the sending King James to the Tower, and limited at nothing further." Adding, "But next the worst humour'd Princes are less severe than Counsellors on such Occasions, especially to Persons of their own Rank, with whom they cannot avoid having a kind of Fellowship. Whether, as some partial to it, it have imagin'd, it proceeded either from Generosity, or some Promise made to his Wife, or rather; or whether he was made believe, that neither the King's Death nor Imprisonment would help him to the Crown so soon as his escaping into France, a Country so hated by the English, as whether he might apprehend his Wife's. This would be found better than his own, in case of her Father's being dead, or which way of these Grounds it was, the Prince of Orange, at last, resolv'd to confine the King's going into France, and to prevent him from Violence in order to it: According to this Design of forcing him away by the Despair of any Accommodation, the Earl of Beverston was, instead of a civil Reception, clapt into Prison immediately. Mr. Bentink, as we learn elsewhere, was the Man who demand'd his Sword. The Presence assign'd for it, was his disbanding the Army, in Conformity to the Letter he had receiv'd from the King his Master: And, in Answer to those who alledg'd, that this was a Breach of the Law of Nations, it was given out, That as he had serv'd in Arms against the Prince, and now came to him without a Passport (as Zuylerstein, by the way, had done to the King), he had no Claim of safe Conduct, and consequently was liable to be made a Prisoner of War.

There is no need to expatiate on this Point: It was a Strain of Policy, as well as Power: The King's Years were what they were to work upon; and they well knew, that according to the Treatment given to his Embassador, he would expect to be treated himself. But this was not all; the Experiment was to be carry'd much farther; for the Words striking to the Desertion, us'd by the Bishop, are best explain'd by the Phrase, forcing him away, us'd by the Duke. And in order to this, it was necessary to take all the Advantage of his present helpless Condition, and make him feel the whole Severity of it. A new Disposition was to be made, and a new Message was to be sent to him, and that too of such a Nature as would have shock'd the Heart of any Man not disciplin'd in the Statesman's savage School, where Humanity passes for Weakness, to deliver: A Message, that, in case any Regard had been shewn to Decorum in it, should have been deliver'd by the Bentinks and Zuylerstein, who had follow'd the Prince's Fortunes, and in the Language of their Country, not in English by Englishmen, to the King of England, in his own Court, and his own Capital: Yet so it was; the Lords Strawberry and Dolmery, who had already gone such Lengths in his Highness's Service, readily undertook it: And what is yet more extraordinary, the Marquis of Hollifas suffer'd himself to be put at their Head. The Duke of Bucks says, he was forc'd to undergo an. (d) Self Trial

[18] The Account says Mr. B. Higgin, in his Short History, naturally pass'd in mind of the general Action in the Life of Alexander, who, dead in the Ethic of Aristotle, could not fail to be instructed in all Principles of Generosity and Humanity by so great a Master: Alas that Euthydemus, Prisoner, in thought himself oblig'd to comfort the Prisoners in such Distress, by a Message that might give them Assurance of his Protection: At last he pitch'd upon a Persian Deceiver to carry the Compliment; but, on second Thoughts, reflecting that the Sight of a Renegade, who had betray'd Susa in Lybia, and declar'd against his Master Darius, might probably disturb the Ladies, and raise their Terrors, he resolv'd, the Parsons, and sent a Greek without Interpreter. This Goodness being the Argument towards distressed Majesty, is a most successful Example of Reason in his Memory, than his having conquer'd so many Millions, than having pass'd down the mighty Empire founded by Cyrus, and receiving from the Duke of the Thames his Entrance into the Bowels of India, and falling in a Triumph to the Mouth of the Ganges. The Application of this Example is obvious: And, on the other hand, it is a good Example, that

(Life of King William.)

A.D. 1688.

That before that Party would entirely confide in him. This is the only Trial he speaks of. The Prince, himself, nominated him, and could not help smiling, as he own'd afterwards, to see a Man who came a Commissioner to him from the other Side, submit to act to low a Part to very willingly.— To proceed: His Highness resolv'd to come to Court; but then it was not to confer, but to take Possession: And if Bishop Burnet is to be credited, he trusted the new Disposition he had made in order thereto, as well as his new Meeting, to the same Persons, viz. the Lords just mention'd, "who were first to order the English Guards that were about the Court to be drawn off, and sent to Quarters out of Town. And when that was done, Count Salm was to come and take all the Posts about the Court." But other Writers allege, That while the Prince and his Peers were yet in the midst of their Deliberations at Windsor, the Dutch Guards under Count Salm had Orders to march on to Chesham and Kennington, and to quarter at those Places all Night: That upon the general Issue, the Count had fresh Orders to push on and do the Business that very Night: That, on the Receipt of these, he went himself to Whitehall, and communicated them to those on Duty, whom he was thus to relieve: That his Majesty being immediately inform'd of this strange News, sent for him, and ask'd, Whether it was not possible for him to be indulg'd with the Continuance of his own Guards for that one Night? That the Count replying, his Orders were positive, the King added, Then do your Office: That hereupon the Count order'd his Corps to advance: That they took Possession of St. James's at 10 o' Clock: That the Earl of Craven, who was the Colonel on Duty at Whitehall, refus'd to dislodge, and made Preparations to stand upon the Defensive: That the Dutch march'd up to him in Order of Battle: That a bloody Engagement was apprehended; and that it was not till twelve o' Clock, that the Earl and his Corps were perswaded to withdraw. The Duke of Backs asserts, that this unnecessary Bloodshed was prevented by the King's Command; for the stout Earl of Craven, says he, resolv'd to be cut to Pieces rather than resign his Post to the Prince's Guards.

His Majesty being thus in the Toils, the three Lords Deputies from the Prince sent the following Billet to the Earl of Middleton: "My Lord, there is a Message to be delivered to his Majesty from the Prince, which is of great Importance; that we who are charg'd with it, desire we may be immediately admitted; and therefore desire to know where we may find your Lordship, that you may introduce, my Lord, your Lordships most humble Servants, Hallifax, Shrewsbury, Delamere."

The Earl soon appear'd in answer to this Summons (which, according to his Grace of Backs, was rather exacting than desiring Assistance) and introduc'd them to the unfortunate King, whom they found a-bed, and to whom, after a short Apology for breaking in upon him at so unseasonable an Hour, they gave the following Paper:

"We desire you, the Lord Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Delamere to tell the King, That it is thought convenient, for the greater Quiet of the City, and the greater Safety of his Person, that he do remove to Ham, where he shall be attended by his Guards, who will be ready to preserve him from any Disturbance."

Given at Windsor the 17th of December, 1688. W. Prince Orange."

The Historian of his own Times makes no Mention of this Paper; but says, The Lords told him (the King) The Necessity of Affairs requir'd, that the Prince should come immediately to London: That he thought it would be for the King's Safety, &c. to retire to St. James's House out of Town; and that they propos'd Ham. He adds, indeed, that the King seem'd much dejected: That he ask'd, If it must be done immediately? That they reply'd, He might take his rest first: And that withal they gave him to understand, That tho' he was to be attended by a Guard, they were only to guard his Person, not to give him any Disturbance. Having thus discharged their Commission, they withdrew, but were immediately follow'd by Lord Middleton, with a Proposal in his Majesty's Name, that instead of going to Ham, he might have leave to go back to Rochester. This was meeting the Prince's Proposals full half way; the Answer of the Deputies was as gracious as possible, They would immediately acquaint him with his Majesty's Desire, and made no Doubt that his Reply would be to his Majesty's Satisfaction. His Highness, it seems, was advanc'd as far as St. James's House, that he might be ready to take all Advantages: And so much in earnest was he to make a golden Bridge for a flying Enemy, that before eight the next Morning, Mr. Bentick gave Notice to the Lords Delegates, that his Majesty's Request was granted. We find it nevertheless asserted, that the time of his arriving at Ham having been fix'd by the said Lords, his Majesty, that he might be punctual in his Obedience, was an Hour in his Barge before he knew what Course he was to take: That he had been refus'd

The Dutch Guards take possession of the Court at Midnight.

Reply, from the Mouth of the Court-Lady before-quoted, (and with whom he, about this time, seem'd to have enter'd into a very close Correspondence) That the Reason given by the Marquis of Hallifax for his having been concern'd in so important a Message was, That he was pleas'd the Prince's Party had in Council resolv'd to seize on his Person, and imprison him: And that his Majesty, for the Notices and Advices of this kind which he had receiv'd from him, own'd himself inclin'd to him for his Life now, as before, that he had not been excluded from the Crown. But, 'tis plain, the Prince did not design to imprison him, and that his Lordship knew there was no such Design; and therefore the only Conclusion to be made in his Lordship's Favour is this, That he acted the Part of a good confidant to the Pretorian; and that he had at once the Address to serve the Prince in the most essential Point, by contributing to his Majesty's Persecution, in that he pleas'd, it would be at the Peril of his Life; and to make his Majesty believe, that he himself was his only Preserver.

refus'd the Eaſe of his own Coach, as well as the Countenance of his own Guards: Tho' he declar'd, that he could not travel by Water in ſo cold a Seaſon, againſt Wind and Tide, without greatly endangering his Health: That he was not allow'd to have his Charges borne out of his own Exchequer; and that the whole manner of his Oſtlet, and his taking Leave of the Spaniſh Embaſſador, and ſuch Lords and other Perſons, who had the Humanity to (e) wait on him to the Water-Side, was ſuch, as drew Tears from their Eyes.

Life of King William, Richard, &c.

Moſt of theſe Circumſtances, indeed, are taken from the inflammatory Pamphlets which were afterwards written in his Favour, by his profleſs Apologetiſts. But as we have occaſionally had recourſe to Pieces which have been written againſt him, as well in his own Reign, as that of his Predeceſſor, it is but fair to make the ſame uſe of ſuch as have been written for him. And here it is worth obſerving, that thoſe of the Court, as well as of the Church, who had hitherto declam'd with the moſt Bitterneſs againſt all Papers and Opinions that preſum'd to clamour againſt the Government, adopted the very Practice they had ſo often condemn'd, as ſoon as the Government was wreſted out of their Hands; and tho' that ſort of people had, for ſo long together, made the moſt uſe imaginable of the Preſs to ſerve the Intereſts of their Party, were now for dealing as ſeverely with all Offenders, that way, as they had been dealt with themſelves: So that Power, however attain'd, wherever lodg'd, or however exercis'd, is to be held ſted and above Cenſure; and though the Truth is the moſt provoking of all Things when urg'd in Oppoſition to it, however reaſonably, worthily, or nobly, an unparliamentary Sin.

To return. On the ſame Day that the King was thus remov'd from Whitehall, the Prince came to St. James's, with a magnificent Train of Courtiers and Officers; having but very ſlightly provided for his Security, and ſcarce his own Forces to ſerve (f) him in the Tower, and to quarter themſelves all round about the Town: Tho' ſome of theſe, it ſeems, were as forward to do him welcome, as they had been juſt before to welcome the King at his Return, and ſeem'd by ſhowing to ſeaſt their Eyes with the Triumphal Entry of their Prince. "But he, ſays the Hiſtorian of the Times, not loving Shews nor Showings, went thro' the Park; and even this Triumphant ſet People's Spirits an edge." The ſame Author begins his next Paragraph with the following remarkable Words: "The Revolution was thus brought about with the univerſal Applauſe of the whole Nation." As if the removing the King, and ſetting up the Prince in his ſtead, was all that the whole Nation had in View; whereas the Ends propoſed by his Highneſs's Declaration, not one of which had as yet been anſwer'd, were what alone the Bulk of the Nation aim'd at: And when they found how egregiouſly they were bubbled, their Repentment was anſwerable to their Diſappointment; tho' it is certain they were not aware of their Miſtake, till it was too late to rectify it. Even the Biſhop himſelf makes the following Concluſions in the following Words: "Only theſe two Steps began to take a Fermentation. It was but a weak and unſignificant Thing to waken the King out of his Sleep, in his own Palace, and to order him to go out of it, when he was ready to ſubmit to every thing. Some ſaid he was now a Priſoner, and remember'd the Saying of King Charles the Firſt, 'That the Priſon and the Grave of Princes lay not far diſtant from one another.' The Perſon of the King was now ſtruck at, as well as his Government. And this ſpecious Undertaking would now appear to be only a diſguiſed and deſign'd Uſurpation. Theſe things began to work on great Numbers: And the putting the Dutch Guards where the Engliſh Guards had been gave a general Diſguſt to the whole Army." As to the Diſguſt of the Army, it is not worth mentioning; they had refus'd to take very Poſts, and left their King in the Hands of his Enemies. But as to the Diſguſt of the Nation, or of great Numbers of the Nation, the Biſhop himſelf in part juſtifies it, by diſtinguiſhing Poſſibilities for it, which he does not take upon him to (g) anſwer. While the King was ſurrounded with Dutch Guards, he certainly was the Prince of Orange's Priſoner; and if he had not ſubmitted to the hard Terms impos'd upon him, what can ſay what would have been the Conſequence? The Prince, it was plain, had it now in his

Power

(f) The Scottiſh Troops, Litchfield, Arms, and Dan were ſent to ſerve him to Redford.

(g) He was not ſo ready to ſubmit, that he had ſent the Duke of Ormonde with his Regiment of Foot-guards, to receive William from the Irish; but they, it ſeems, ſcarce being come up, and endeavour'd to make their way to him in a Merchant-ſhip, which they ſaid to be the Prince's ſhip, for the Seaman for the Ship ſprung, and they were ſent to the Halls of the County-ſeats. In his way the Seaman ſprung in his Expedition, the Ship was attacked at the Head of his Regiment by an Irish Troop, who were ſum'd to ſave his Return with the Lords of his Life.

(h) But, what he has thought fit to avoid, another Perſon, who is call'd a reviv'd Officer by Mr. Audenſteron Edward, is ſufficiently ſufficiently.

(i) That the Prince never ſhew'd his Clemency, or indeed his Tenderneſs, for King James, was not then upon this Occaſion. The Prince was taken in a ſudden Neceſſity of entering London the next Day. The Troops that he commanded, and who would in all Probability have taken poſſeſſion of Whitehall, were Foreigners, or of a different Language and Temper, and ſuch as might have ſhew'd Violence to the Perſon of their Monarch, notwithstanding their Obedience to the contrary. But though ſome of the French and Genoaiſe for that Service the Swiſs and Italians, which were his Guard, ſhall the Honour of King James would have been the greater: Several of thoſe Officers had ſerv'd in the French ſervice the King, and had been broke of their Commiſſions purely for being Proteſtants; and others had ſerv'd Spain and France to find a Liberty of their Religion abroad, which they found in ſo much Danger at home, in which Numbers were Engliſh and Scottiſh. Another Party were perſonally diſpleas'd at the King, in Religion and Party, and many more of Quality and Dignity. Therefore who have commended them to guard their old Monarch, ſuch as when they had, or pretend to have, to many Caſes of William and Edward, would have been Murderers in any Perſon who attempted on King's Life and Mourning ſhould have been ſent to the Counteſs of St. James's which was the whole Duty of the Prince of Orange with reſpect to his Uncle and Father-in-Law.

A. D. 1688.

Power to fulfil his own Declaration himself, to rectify every Grievance, and establish the Protestant Religion on what Foundation he pleas'd: The King himself, in the Letter he sent to him by the Earl of Feverham, had shewn an entire Resignation: And, if that was wholly rejected, on one hand, and nothing would satisfy his Highness but the Possession of the Crown, on the other; how is it possible to silence those who make use of his own Actions to detect, expose, and confute his Pretences?— But Statesmen laugh, when their Fellow-subjects reason upon Principle, in Cases of this Nature; as well knowing, That, in the Cabinet, all Virtue is plac'd in Success.

The King's Court breaks up.

No sooner had this remarkable Revolution taken place, than Whitehall became a Desert: Those who had Staves, Keys, and such-like Badges of Office, laid them down; and the whole Herd of Hoppers, Seekers, Expectants, and Claimants, flock'd to St. James's, and even jostled each other in their Endeavours to be foremost with their Oblations to the new Court-Idol. Nor was this done by Individuals only: The Prelate last quoted asserts, "That all the Bodies about the Town came to welcome him: That the Bishops came the next Day after his Arrival; only, says he, the Archbishop of Canterbury, tho' he had once agreed to it, yet would not come." By the Word only, we are left to imagine, that all the Bishops, except the Archbishop, appear'd in a Body on this Occasion: But as Dr. Burnet and his servile Followers are the only Persons who touch on this remarkable Circumstance, and as several of those Right Reread Fathers afterwards acted a very different Part, it is to be widd'd, that he had been more particular in his Account of it. His Lordship adds, That the Clergy of London came next: And we find elsewhere an (b) Intimation, that the Bishop of London, that (f) Champion for the Church, was at their Head; and, what was yet more remarkable, that he was follow'd by certain of the Dissenting Ministers, in whose Name he congratulated his Highness, as well as that of his own legitimate Flock: As also, that, some Days afterwards, the (g) Residue of the Nonconformist Ministers came in a Body with their Compliments, and met with a most favourable Reception. But none were so forward with the First-fruits of their Gratitude to their Deliverer as the Citizens of London: On the very same Day that his Highness came to St. James's, tho' Sir John Chapman the Lord-Mayor lay then upon his Death-bed, a Common-council was held, in which it was unanimously resolv'd, That all the Aldermen, and all their Deputies, and two Common-council-men of each Ward, should wait upon, and congratulate his Highness the Prince of Orange upon his Arrival, at such Time and Place as he should appoint. Sir George Treby was their Speaker upon this Occasion, and laid out all the Rhetoric he was Master of in their Service.— "Labouring for Words, said he, we cannot but come short in Expression.— In reviewing our late Danger, we remember our Church and State over-run by Popery and arbitrary Power, and brought to the Point of Destruction by the Conduct of Men that were our true Invaders, that brake the sacred Fences of our Laws, and,

City of London.

(f) In the Edith Collection of Papers, as follows:

"Statement of the humble Application of the King and noble Great Henry Lord Bishop of London, with the Reverend Clergy of the City, and some of the Dissenting Ministers, to the illustrious Prince William Henry, the Prince of Orange, on the 29th Sept. 21. 1688."

He declared in excellent Words, That they came to pay him their humble Duties and most grateful Thanks for his very great and most hazardous Undertakings for their Deliverance, and the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, with the ancient Laws and Liberties of this Nation.

He added, That they gave up daily many Thanksgivings to Almighty God, who hath hitherto been graciously pleas'd to wonderfully preserve his Person, and prosper and favour his good Design. And they promis'd the Continuance of their fervent Prayers to the same God, and all concurrent Endeavours by their Circumstances, for the promoting yet further that Work, which was so happily begun, and also for the preserving of it, not only in this Kingdom, but in other Christian Kingdoms.

He likewise touch'd on the good Prince, That some of the Dissent'g Ministers, and their Brethren, were there present, who in the same Sense of his coming hither, with themselves, had bound themselves with them by him, to render him their humble and most grateful Resignations.

His Highness was pleas'd to declare, That he thank'd them for their Attendance, and requited them very briefly with the chief of his own Religion and chargeable Expedients. That indeed it was no private and secure Protestant Religion (his own Religion and their Religion) and stirring them he could not think any thing (not Life itself) too dear to hazard in promoting and perfecting to good a Work. And he offer'd up (with great Devotion) his Acknowledgments to Almighty God, for his Fidelity with him, and Blessing upon his Endeavours and Arms hitherto; and all'd the Continuance of all their Prayers to God for him."

(g) When he took upon him the Command of the Princers of Orange's Guard, he accompany'd himself in a Coat of blue or purple Acoet, and Jack boots, rode with Pistol in his Holster, and a drawn Sword in his Hand.

(h) To the Number of about ninety, having been introduced by the Earl of Downshire, the Earl of Windsor, and the Lord Wharfedale On which Occasion, they profess'd their grateful Sense of his Highness's heroick and successful Expedition, which the Favour of Heaven had made it surprisingly prosperous, &c. They esteem'd it a common Felicity, that the worthy Partion of the Nobility and Gentry of this Kingdom had unanimously concurr'd into his Highness's Design, by whose most prudent Advice, the Administration of public Affairs was devolv'd, in this unusual Conjunction, into Hands which the Nation and World seem'd to expect for the greatest Undertaking, and so suitable to the present exigency of our Case. They promis'd the utmost holiness, which in their Circumstances they were capable of affording, for the promoting the excellent and most desirable Ends for which his Highness had declar'd. They added, that their continual fervent Prayers to the Almighty should be, for the Preservation of his Highness's Person, and the Success of his future Endeavours for the Defence and Persecution of the Protestant Interest throughout the Christian World. They declar'd they would all most willingly, have chosen, That for the Season of paying this Duty to his Highness, when the Lord Bishop, and the Clergy of London, attend'd his Highness for the like Purpose (which some of them did, and which his Lordship was pleas'd condescendingly to make mention of to his Highness), had their Notice of that intended Application been so early, as to make their more general Attendance possible to them at that time. That therefore, tho' they did not appear in a distinct Company, they did it upon a distinct Account, but on that only which is common to them and to all Protestants. And that tho' they were some of eminent Note, whose Age or present Infirmities hinder'd from coming with them, yet they concurr'd in the same grateful Sense of the common Deliverance.

To all which, his Highness was pleas'd to answer, That he came purposely for the Defence of the Protestant Religion; and that he was his own Religion, wherein he was born and bred, the Religion of his Country, and of his Ancestors; that he was resolv'd by the Grace of God always to adhere to it, and to do his utmost Endeavours for the Defence of it; and the promoting a firm Union among all Protestants.

and, which was worst, the very Constitution of our Legislature.--- So that there was no Remedy but the LAST. The only Person under Heaven that could apply this Remedy was your Highness. You are of a Nation whose Alliance in all times has been agreeable and prosperous to us.--- You are of a Family most illustrious, Benefactors to Mankind.--- To have the Title of Sovereign Prince, Stadtholder, and to have worn the Imperial Crown, are among their lesser Dignities.--- They have long enjoy'd a Title singular and transcendent, viz. To be the Champions of Almighty God, sent forth in several Ages, to vindicate his Cause against the greatest Oppressions. To this divine Commission, our Nobles, our Gentry, and, among them, our brave English Soldiers, render'd themselves, and their Arms upon your Appearing.--- Great Sir, when we look back to the last Month, and contemplate the Swiftneſs and Fullneſs of our present Deliverance, astonish'd, we think it miraculous.--- Your Highness, led by the Hand of Heaven, and call'd by the Voice of the People, has protect'd our dearest Interests; the Protestant Religion, which is Primitive Christianity itself; our Liberties, which are our ancient Title to our Lives, Liberties, and Estates, and without which, this World were a Wilderness.--- But what Retribution can we make to your Highness? Our Thoughts are fill'd with Gratitude. Your Highness has a lasting Monument in the Hearts, in the Prayers, in the Praises, of all good Men throughout the Kingdom. And latest Posterity will celebrate your ever glorious Name till Time shall be no more.

--- Since your Highness return'd to this Kingdom, Panegyric, or whether he condescended to return any, we do not find specify'd. Perhaps his Highness did not agree with the Doctor in setting so high a Value on the Monument he talk'd of in the Hearts of good Men: And as he offer'd him nothing else by way of Retribution, he thought that offer'd with his Acceptance. But however it may be, there is an Order of Court (the Council) that Mr. Recorder be desired to plan his Speech; And, what is remarkable, in the Preamble and Date of the said Order, the Continuance of his Majesty's Reign is fully acknowledg'd by express Mention. So that if the Laws were really prepar'd by the coming of his Highness, and were still in force, this very Record bore Witness against those who made it. But, in Truth, the Government had been in a State of Dissolution ever since the King's first Departure. He had lost his Power before; and then he even departed from his Authority. The People were left to shift for themselves, and had actually taken care of themselves. It was on this very Presumption that the City had before solicited the Protection of the Prince of Orange: And, having proceeded thus far with Facts, it was high time to dispense with Forms; at least with such as are concluded so unluckily against themselves.

To close on this Head of Compliments and Congratulations, our Historian of present Times; not only informs us, that old Baron Maynard came with the Men of Law (whether those which had been led up before, by Shower and Mackworth, and who had made so bold with the Clames and Rights of the Subject, in order, to piece the Prerogative, his Lordship does not specify) but makes him say, what he calls the liveliest thing that was heard of on that Occasion. The Prince, says he, took notice of his (Maynard's) great Age (he was then near ninety) and said, That he had outliv'd all the Men of the Law of his Time; he answer'd, "He had like to have outliv'd the Law itself, if his Highness had not come over (6)."

But whatever Concern this Nepos of Lawyers here affects to have for the venerable Codes, he had so long thriv'd upon, our Historian, in his very next Paragraph, introduces the Body of that Prescription advising his Highness to take Possession for Esse, and to derive his Title from his Sword. The Lawyers, proceeds his Lordship, were generally of Opinion, That the Prince ought to declare himself King, as Henry the Seventh had done. This, they said, would put an End to all Disputes, which might otherwise grow very perplexing and tedious. And they said, he might call a Parliament, which would be a legal Assembly if summon'd by the King in fact, tho' his Title was not yet recogniz'd. This was plainly contrary to the Declaration, by which the Settlement of the Nation was left to Parliament. Such a Step would make all that the Prince had hitherto done, pass for an aspiring Ambition only to raise himself: And it would disgust those who had been hitherto the best affected to his Design, and make them less concern'd in the Question, if instead of James, all the Nation should offer him the Crown, he should assume it as a Conquest. These Reasons determin'd the Prince against that Proposition. Thus far the Bishop. And, to leave the Lawyers to justify themselves, we have here an Acknowledgment, that the Crown was the great Object of the Prince's Pursuit; and that when he even refus'd to seize it in Compliance with this strange Advice, it was an Expectation of being gratify'd with it in a less exceptionable and less hazardous way.

As to the Lords who had so formally undertaken the Administration of the Government, and to provide for the Security of the Public Peace, from the time the Prince came to Town, they met no more till call'd upon by his Highness, which was a tacit Renunciation of all Power and Authority to him, and contented themselves with making their Application to him for themselves, instead of acting as the Heads of the People, and

(4) The Author of this Work has somewhere found a Representation of this or the like Saying of Maynard's, as an Answer of his to the Lords at Windsor, when they

and standing in the Breach which the King had made, to protect the Remains of the Constitution from being borne down by a successful General at the Head of a foreign Army; who, according to the Duke of Buck, were now become the Masters, as the Rabble might have been before, if they had known their own Strength; and who, notwithstanding the Encomiums bestow'd on them by Bishop Burnet, his Grace represents as but one Degree better.

The Prince James the First to St. James's.

The same noble Author, however, falls into a slight Mistake when he says, That the Prince summon'd the Peers to St. James's the next Day after his Arrival there. It may be recollected that he came thither on the 18th, and it was not till the 21st that he touch'd to call upon them for their Advice and Concurrence; so that the first Evening, and two whole Days besides, were employ'd in Cabals and Intrigues, before that Expedient was agreed on: And, no doubt, his Highness had sufficient Reason to be convinc'd, that the King's Cause would find no Advocates among them, before he agreed to it at all. The Number which met upon this Occasion is by some mounted up to about seventy, and by none is stated at less than sixty: And when they were met, we are further told by his Grace of Buck, "That the Prince, in a few Words, open'd to them the pretended Cause of his coming, and desir'd of them to consider of the fittest Means to accomplish the good Ends and Promises in his Declaration; which, as it was the first time, so it was also the last that ever he seem'd to remember those Promises during all his Reign." Whether this Assertion is founded on Truth, the Reign itself will demonstrate. On the Occasion immediately before us, it must be acknowledg'd, that his Highness proceeded with all the seeming Fervour imaginable; for, having made this short Speech, and laid his Declaration before them, as the Basis of their Deliberation, he withdrew, and left them to debate the Matter among themselves. The Declaration was accordingly read, as the first Step to Business, and that naturally produc'd a Motion for a Vpote of Thanks to his Highness for coming over, which was carry'd; in what Terms, or whether unanimously or not, is not specify'd. To strike up a more near and intimate Relation between their Lordships and his Highness, another Motion was also made. That all present should sign the Exeter-Affection; and all did sign it accordingly, except the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Pembroke and Nottingham, the Lord Wharton, and all the Bishops but his Lordship of London. The main Objection of the Bishops, says Mr. Belard, after another Writer, was to the unchristian Word Revenge, which being chang'd for that of Punishment, they were afterwards better satisfy'd. Lord Wharton said, if Mr. Oldmixon is to be rely'd on, He had sign'd so many Affections which had no Effect, that he was resolv'd to sign no more. A certain French Author suggests, that the Earls of Pembroke and Nottingham stood off, because Mr. Finch, the Brother of the last, and Sir Robert Sawyer the Father-in-law of the first, were not appointed to assist this Assembly in Matters of Law, in the Room of the Judges: And for the Dissent of his Grace of Somerset, no body presumes to assign any Reason at all. To proceed: the Assistant Lawyers to nam'd on this Occasion, were Maynard, Holt, Pollexfen, Bradford, and Atkinson; and to close the Proceeding of the Day, they resolv'd for the future to assemble in their own Houie at Westminster; no doubt that their Resolutions might derive an Air of Authority from the Place, and seem the less dependent on the Will and Pleasure of a Dictator, under the Mask of a Deliverer. For the next Day's Work, they chose for their Speaker the Marquis of Halifax, appointe Mr. Guyne to be their Clerk, and made a Order to oblige all Papists that were Sovereigns, to remove ten Miles from London: And that the whole Kingdom might be appriz'd, that, tho' the King remain'd still at Rochester, the Body of the Peerage had thought fit, to meet and act under another Name, and by another Authority, the second of these Orders was set forth in the Gazette, and underneath it the Names of all the Lords present when it was made, viz. The Archbishop of York; the Dukes of Norfolk, Somerset, Grafton, Ormond, Beaufort, and Northumberland; the Marquis of Halifax; the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Bedford, Pembroke, Dorset, Devonshire, Bellingbrake, Manchester, Rivers, Stamford, Thanet, Scarisdale, Clarendon, Burlington, Suffolk, Macclesfield, Radnor, Berkeley, Nottingham, and Rochester; the Viscounts Falconberge, Mordaunt, Newport, Weymouth, and Hatton; the Bishops of St. Asaph, and Ely; and the Lords Delaware, Eure, Wharton, Paget, North and Grey, Chankin, Mantagu, Grey, Maynard, Jermy, Vaughan-Carberry, Colpeper, Lucas, Delamere, Crew, Lumley, Carteret, and Ossington: In all fifty-three.

And adjourn to their own Houie at Westminster.

In this Interval, the abandon'd King had full Leisure to become acquainted with his own last Condition, and to be convinc'd, that he had been so fully over-reach'd by the Wiles of his Enemies, that the very Precautions he had taken, against the Dangers he fear'd, had put them in possession of all they hop'd for: Tho' in the Hands of Dutchmen, who had every Hour an Opportunity of committing any sort of Violence upon him; he saw himself in full Security; and, on the other hand, every Dispatch which he receiv'd from London made him more and more sensible, that those who had no Thoughts of putting an end to his Life, thought of nothing so much as the putting an end to his Reign. This Alteration of Sentiment produc'd also a seeming Alteration in his Conduct: For, instead of seeking all Opportunities to withdraw, he was prevail'd upon to use all his Endeavours to stay. We are told, at least, that, before he left Whitehall, he sent a Message to Sir Thomas Stump and Sir Simon Lewis, two-of the Aldermen of London, desiring them to acquaint their Brethren, and those of the Common-council, That he was willing to put himself into the Hands of the City, there to remain, till by a free Parliament he had given all Satisfaction to his People, by securing their Religion, Liberties, and Properties to the full; on the Condition that they would be answerable for the Security of his Person: And that the said Message being communicated accordingly, it was over-ruled by the Influence of Sir Robert Clayton; on a Presumption, that it was out of the Power of the City to bestow the Security requir'd: And, while his Majesty linger'd at Rochester, a Lady, before nam'd, by his Order and Direction, as she herself declar'd to Sir

[Mss. p. 312.] John Reresley, apply'd to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, to know whether they, in concurrence with the rest of their Brethren, would receive and protect him; but with no better Success than before: Their Lordships, it seems, had neither (1) Goodness enough to accept the Offer, nor Courage enough to refuse it; and left the King to conclude what they durst not express. His Majesty's last Resort was to the Earl of Danby, in the North, as that Lord also acknowledg'd to the same Gentleman; the Person he employ'd to him was Charles Bertie, Esq; and the Offer he made to him was of the same Nature with those which he had made to the Bishops and the City of London before: To which his Lordship answer'd, That his own Force was not sufficient for his Security; but that if his Majesty would bring a considerable Party with him, and leave his Wife behind him, he would sooner lose his Life than he should suffer the least Injury: According to Lord Danby, the King would not part with his Papists: But surely, if he would have parted with them, he drawing to either such a considerable Party, as the Lordship seem'd to think necessary, was no longer in his Power: The few Lords that were with him at Rochester had no Followers; the Prince was already in possession of all things, even the very Army, which the King had rais'd and led, now depended on his Highness for Subsistence, and obey'd his Orders: So that his Majesty lost all power to his Royalty remaining than the Title, which at present was rather an Incumbrance than an Advantage; and, consequently, could carry nothing with him but the Contagion of his own Calamities. There is indeed a Passage in one of Dr. Burnet's Tracts, which says, "That, while he continued at Rochester, and found himself under no Restraint from the Guards that attended him, all his Protestant Friends press'd him to stay, and summon a Parliament; assuring him, that there was a great Turn in the Minds of the City, and of the English Army, and that Pity and Compassion for him then generally prevail'd:" And again, in his History, "Many that were zealous for his Interests, went to him, and press'd him to stay and to see the Issue of things; a Party would appear for him; good Terms would be got for him; and things would be brought to a reasonable Agreement. He was much distracted between his own Inclinations and the Inconveniences of his Friends. The Queen, hearing what had happen'd, wrote a most vehement Letter to him, pressing his coming over, remembering him of his Promise, which he charg'd on him in a very earnest, if not an imperious, Strain. This Letter was intercept'd. I had an Account of it from one that read it. The Prince order'd it to be convey'd to the King, and that determin'd him." Now those who lay the most Stress on his several Applications to the City, the Bishops, and to Lord Danby, do so, in order to shew, that he had left all Hold of his People, and that he was thereby reduced to a Necessity of seeking the Protection of France: The Historian, on the other hand, who insists so much on the Liberty he was allow'd at Rochester, and the Advice that were given by his Friends, to stay, &c. would from thence have us conclude, that he was free to follow their Advice; that he might have follow'd it with Honour and Safety; and that his Retreat was therefore a Matter of Choice, and not of Necessity.— And probably the very Truth of all was, That the King look'd upon the Liberty allow'd him, and thus boast'd of, to be no more than a Liberty to leave the Kingdom; that he believ'd, that, in case he should venture to make any other use of it, he should meet with other Usage; that therefore, when he lent an Ear to the Councils of those who advis'd him to stand his Ground, in hope the Relentings of his People would operate in his Favour, he did it on the Condition, that they gave him some Proof of their good Intentions, by engaging first for the Security of his Person; that, when he found this Condition on all Sides refus'd, his former Misgivings return'd; and that he resolv'd upon his Life as it was he had left to save.

Whether these Conjectures are right or not, it is certain, that on the (m) 23<sup>d</sup> of December, between two and three o' Clock in the Morning, the King departed from Rochester, accompany'd only by the Duke of Berwick, Sheldon, and Labadie; and without communicating his Purpose to any body else, no not to the Earl of Dunbarton, who lay in his Chamber, and whom he left asleep; nor to the Earl of Middleton, who had follow'd him from London, and who continu'd faithful to him to the last. His Majesty, and his little Train, went on Horseback to a certain Place by the River-side, where Captain Macdonald, before-mention'd, waited with his Frigate to receive him, embark'd without any Interruption, found the Wind favourable, and after a speedy Voyage arriv'd

(1) The Author of Great Britain's just Complaint, who was a Scotch Protestant Baronet, asserts, That the Answer of the Bishops was, "That they could not receive him either publicly or privately, under their Protection; for, in that case, they would be responsible for his Safety; and they were not in a Condition to secure him against the Ambition of the Prince, who was resolv'd to accomplish his Designs, and who was surrounded with so many Troops to support him." And something of the like Nature is also suggested, by the Author of A Dialogue between A and B, 1688, plain Country Gentlemen, concerning the Times.

(m) On the last Day of this memorable Year, says Bishop Burnet; how erroneously, will become self-evident by the Sequel.

A. D. 1688. at Ambletuse in France; from whence he repair'd to his Queen at St. Germain's.

His Majesty left two Papers behind him at Rochester: One of a private nature to Lord Middleton, requesting him to gratify the Captains of the Prince's Troops, that were appointed to guard him, with an hundred Guinea's piece, the Lieutenants and Ensigns with fifty, and to reward some others, who had attended him, in proportion: And the other, which was also address'd to the same Nobleman, contain'd his Reasons for withdrawing himself from Rochester, in the following Words:

"The World cannot wonder at my withdrawing myself now this second time, I might have expected somewhat better Usage, after what I had written to the Prince of Orange by my Lord Feversham, and the Instructions I gave him: But, instead of an Answer, such as I might have hop'd for, What was I to expect after the Charge I receiv'd by the making the said Earl a Prisoner, against the Practice and Law of Nations, the sending his own Guards at eleven at Night, to take possession of the Posts at Whitehall, without advertizing me in the least manner of it; the sending to me at one o' Clock, after Midnight, when I was in Bed, a kind of an Order by three Lords to be gone out of mine own Palace before twelve that same Morning? After all this, how could I hope to be safe, so long as I was in the Power of one, who had not only done this to me, and invaded my Kingdoms, without any just Occasion given him for it, but that did, by his first Declaration, by the greatest Aspersions upon me that Malice could invent, in that Clause of it which concerns my Son? I appeal to all that know me, may, even to himself, that, in their Consciences, neither he nor they can believe me in the least capable of so unnatural a Villany, nor of so little common Sense, to be impos'd on in a thing of such a Nature as this. What had I then to expect from one, who, by all Arts, hath taken such Pains to make me appear as black as Hell to my own People, as well as to all the World besides? What Effect that hath had at home, all Mankind have seen by so general a Desertion in my Army, as well as in the Nation, amongst all sorts of People,

I was born free, and desir'd to continue so; and tho' I have ventur'd my Life very frankly on several Occasions for the Good and Honour of my Country, and am as free to do it again (and which I hope I shall do, old as I am, to redeem it from the Slavery it is like to fall under) yet I think it not convenient to expose myself to be secur'd, so as not to be at Liberty to effect it; and for that Reason to withdraw, but so as to be within Call whenever the Nation's Eyes shall be open'd, so as to see how they have been abus'd and impos'd upon by the specious Pretences of Religion and Property. I hope it will please God to touch their Hearts, out of his infinite Mercy, and to make them sensible of the ill Condition they are in, and bring them to such a Temper, that a LEGAL Parliament may be call'd; and that, among

A. D. 1688. other things which may be necessary to be done, they will agree to Liberty of Conscience for all Protestant Dissenters; and that tho' of my own Persuasion may be to far consider'd, and have such a Share of it, as they may live peaceably and quietly, as Englishmen and Christians ought to do, and not to be oblig'd to transplant themselves, which would be very grievous, especially to such as love their own Country; and I appeal to all Men, who are considering Men, and have had Experience, whether any thing can make this Nation so great and flourishing as Liberty of Conscience. Some of our Neighbours dread it. I could add much more to confirm all I have said; but now it is not the proper time."

Thus we are, at last, come to the Catastrophe of this long, but serious, this perplexed, but interesting, Story: We have seen the two Royal Brothers, from the very Depth of Ruin and Misery, not only restor'd to the Possessions of their Forefathers, but exalted to a higher Degree of Power and Greatness than their Forefathers ever knew: We have seen Parliaments, which for so long together had trampled the Prerogative under their Feet, endeavour, with all their Might, to let it above the Reach of Force or Accident, Turn or Change: We have seen the eldest of those Brothers grow weary of those very Parliaments to whom he stood so highly indebted, and disoblige that Church which was the chief Support of his Throne. In Resentment of these impolitic Measures, we have seen such a Storm of Opposition rais'd, that the Prince in possession was almost on the point of throwing his Successor over-board, in order to appease it: We have seen the Leaders of that Opposition undo themselves by their own Extravagance, and for want either of Sense or Honesty to make a right Use of the Advantage they had acquir'd: We have seen the King, by making his Peace with the Church, by gratifying their Demands against the Nonconformists; and by enjoining his People in general, become absolute Master of the Constitution, and receive the very Thanks of the Wretches he had enslav'd: And we have seen that King descend to the Grave, in the midst of these flattering Circumstances, without leaving any legitimate Child behind him to reap the Harvest which he had sow'd. We have seen the Duke of York, whose Pretensions had been over and over again extinguish'd by one whole Branch of the Legislature, succeed in Peace to the Monarchy, which had ever since the Portuguese Marriage been allotted to him: We have seen him enter on the Exercise of his Power, with those tremendous Words in his Mouth, For such is my Pleasure, and I expect to be obey'd: We have seen him avail himself of the whole Revenue, without the Sanction of Parliament; and dispense with the Laws, in favour of Papists, in defiance of it: We have seen him (in virtue of the Duo Warranto's, which had, in a manner, turn'd popular Elections into Court-nominations) at the Head of a Parliament of his own choosing, of whom he demanded the Continuance and Enlargement of that Revenue, and by whom he would not suffer his Dispensations to be called in question: We have seen that Parliament accept of his Royal Word, as of more Force than a Law, for the Security of their Religion, and, in effect, comply with his Will in all things, but one; as if in acknowledgment that they were the Creatures of his Breath, and the Vassals of his Power. We have seen him assail'd in two of his Kingdoms at once, and victorious in both: We have seen his idoliz'd Rival fall at his Feet, and bleed at his Command: We have seen this Attempt to subvert his Throne seemingly establish it beyond the Reach of Fortune or Fate: We have seen him, on that Presumption, courted abroad by all the Princes of Europe, and, at home, persisting in setting the Feet of the Few upon the Necks of the Many, by illegal Excessions of Power, and the Terrors of a standing Army: And we have seen his Felicity render'd complete, by the Birth of a Son and Heir. We saw then seen the Tide turn, and the very Persons who, as long as they were the Instruments of Oppression, had been the Preachers of Non-resistance and Passive-obedience, by their own Words, when oppress'd themselves, and openly avowedly act as if the Right of Self-preservation abolish'd all other Claims whatever. We have seen even the Fathers of the Church enter the Lists against the Crown, patronize the Clamours of the People, and co-operate with the Prince who had stood forth in Arms as their Champion and Deliverer. We have seen the like Terrors take hold of the King, which he had fear'd among his People: We have seen him voluntarily laying down the Spoils of the Commonwealth, and offering to compound with his People, by restoring the Balance of the Constitution. We have seen his Concessions, as well as his Authority, slighted; his Promises discredited and despis'd; his Virtues, for Virtues he certainly had, <sup>and his whole</sup> ~~and his whole~~ People either openly confederated against him, or conniving at his Destruction; as if his own Violations of the Laws had depriv'd him of the Benefit of them; and Abuse of Power, on one hand, vacated Allegiance on the other. We have seen the Creatures of his own Favour espouse the Cause of the People against him, and plead the Dictates of Conscience in excuse for their Ingratitude. We have seen his own mercenary Forces desert him, with his Pay in their Pockets.

A. D. 1688.

We have seen his own Children forsake him. We have seen his own Guards tamely resign him into the Hands of his Enemies, without drawing a Sword in his Defence: We have seen him at the Mercy of an insolent, brutal Rabble: And, lastly, we have seen him driven into Exile, after having vainly sought for an Asylum among his own Subjects.

To conclude, when his Reign is thus treated of in the Lump, it is always presum'd, that his Misfortunes were, purely and simply, the Result of his Guilt; as, on the other hand, the Prince's Success is imputed to the Goodness of his Cause, and the righteous Views of his Coadjutors: But, as we have already found Cause to suspect, that the Prince had little more of the Saviour, nor his Coadjutors of the Patriot, in their Compositions, than the King and his Implements, so there is Reason to conclude, that many Princes have been as guilty, without being as unfortunate: That his Faults, great as they were, serv'd chiefly as a Ground for his Highness to spread his Pretences upon: That, if the particular Discontents of the Grandees had not weigh'd more with them, than the Grievances of the Public, they had never embark'd in its Deliverance: That perhaps his Majesty's suffering his Papists in a manner to engross his Favours was held the most capital of his Sins: That the very Frugality of his Administration, which was exemplary, help'd to increase the Number of the Disobliged; and that his extreme Attention to the Interest of (n) Trade was not more alarming to the Body of the Dutch, than his apparent Resolution not to rush into a Quarrel with France was mortifying to their Stadtholder.— But, however this may be, nothing is more self-evidently true, than that the Quarrel of the People against him was scrupulously just, because founded on Self-preservation and Self-defence: That they had consequently a Right to ~~swear~~ themselves <sup>of any Government</sup> that was within their Reach: That whatever Doctrines were advanced to justify their Resistance to King James were either fallacious themselves, or must for ever hold good: And that, as the Contest was carry'd on in their Names, for their Sake, and, in the End, at their Charge, they were entitled to the First-fruits of the Victory.— Whether Justice was done them by those who undertook to rectify all things, or whether those Undertakers threw away the Net when the Fish was caught, the Sequel will demonstrate.
