Captain (e) Herbert in the Cambridge Man of War, off the Nesi, came in sight of six Sail of Ships, one of sixty Guns, one of fifty, one of twenty-six, and three Fireships; five of them were under Dutch Colours, and the sixth English; and when he came up with them, not one of them striking, he fir'd a Gun, as usual, to put them in mind of the Respect that was due to the Flag of England: Upon which they lower'd their English and Dutch Colours, and hoisted French. Herbert had fallen in with them to Leeward, but nevertheless, running up along Side of the largest Ship, demanded the Reason why they did not strike; and receiv'd for Answer, That they struck to nobody: Upon which he fir'd a Shot, which was immediately return'd by the French Commodore, and by another of the Party with a whole Broadside. Herbert then thought it high time to sheer off, as knowing a single Ship would have made no Figure against a Squadron; but instead of prosecuting his Voyage, he put into the next Port; and making the best of his way to Court, not only complain'd of the Indignity, in very lively Terms, to the King and Council, but intreated to be sent out with a proper Force to demand Satisfaction.

A French Squadron refuses to strike to the Flag of England, in the English Channel.

Agreeable to the King's former Behaviour with respect to Holland, his Majesty by this Indignity was released from all his Engagements to France; and by embarking in a popular War, on this popular Point, might have establish'd himself in the Hearts of his Subjects; and, safe in his own superior Merit, might have set the Faction at Defiance ever after. But Expedient suited more with his Genius than Enterprize; and he contented himself with demanding Satisfaction by a Letter instead of a Trumpet. It ought, however, to be acknowledg'd, that he obtain'd it; Captain Pannetier, who had offer'd the Insult, was sent into England to acknowledge his Fault, and implore his Majesty's Pardon, which he made no Difficulty to grant.

rates now seem'd to have over France, there is a wide Difference between a Prospect and Possession. "It was expected, says Sir William Temple, that the Imperialists in Alsace would either enter into Lorraine, or, at least, take the chief Towns of Alsace, and post themselves to the following Winter, as to be ready for such an Enterprize in the Beginning of the next Spring; and Count Montecuculi being'd first Hagenau, and afterwards Saverne, to that end: But after Hagenau had offer'd to surrender upon Conditions, he rose with his Army to fight the Prince of Condé, who was sent out of Elzanders into Alsace, to supply the Place of M<sup>r</sup>. de Turenne, and who made a Motion with his Army, as if he intended to relieve it; but to order'd it, as the Germans fail'd both of the Battal and the Town. It was never comprehended, how Montecuculi afterwards came to rise of a sudden from the Siege of Saverne: Some said, it was upon express Orders from Vienna the Night before; others, with design of fighting the French Army, or besieging Philippsbourg: But neither happen'd: And, which is worse than all, he ended the Campaign with passing back his whole Army over the Rhine, and leaving Alsace wholly in possession, and at mercy, of the French Troops: Nor have I ever known any Action of such public Concern so unaccountable as this Retreat; since 'tis hard to suspect, either Corruption, or Court Faction, should go so far; tho' both were accus'd of having part in this great and almost decisive Event."

The Conduct of Count Montecuculi.

Du Mont.

The Prince of Baden Durlach, in particular, so loudly complain'd of his Conduct at the Court of Vienna, that he found himself under a Necessity to quit the Army, and appear there in person to make his Defence; which consisted in shifting the Fault from himself to the Magistracy of Strasbourg, who, according to him, had not furnish'd him with the necessary Supplies; but they, by their Deputies, pang'd themselves in their turn, and the Count, in the Issue, bore the Blame of all; but was no otherwise punish'd than with the Loss of his Commission, which was given to the Prince of Lorraine; his Uncle, the old (u) Duke, so often mention'd, dying in the midst of these Transactions of a broken Heart, according to Sir William Temple, or rather a Martyr to the Fatigues of a military Life, which his invincible Spirit prompted him still to undertake, but which the Infirmities of old Age would no longer suffer him to sustain.

Death of the old Duke of Lorraine.

As to the Residue of the Campaign in Elzanders, it produc'd nothing very extraordinary, the Duke de Luxembourg succeeded the Prince of Condé in the Command of the French Army there, with Orders, however, to act only on the defensive, and not to hazard a Battle, if it could be by any way avoided. And on the other side, all that the Prince of Orange and the Duke de Villa Hermosa were able to do, was to reduce and demolish Binche; which very ill answer'd the Hopes, or ballanc'd the Expences of the Campaign.

France torn with Seditions.

Upon the whole, it will be matter of astonishment to all Posterity, that France should be so much expos'd, and yet suffer so little: She was not only surrounded with Foreign Enemies, but torn with Seditions in her own Bowels. At Rennes, Nantes, Morlaix, Bourdeaux, Teouluse, and several other Cities of France, the Populace rose all at once, as if by Consent, declaring against the new Taxes which had been impos'd for the Maintenance of the War; killing the Collectors, burning the several Offices, and the Houses of all who oppos'd them. This insurrection first shew'd itself at Rennes; and the Marquis de Cohon, the Governor, endeavouring to suppress it by violent Means (killing thirty or forty of the Ringleaders, and throwing as many more into Prison) it grew more violent than ever, and spread all over both upper and lower Bretagne. Hence the Duke de Chaulnes was induc'd to change the Method of proceeding with these Desperadoes, and allure them back to their Allegiance by the Hopes of a general Pardon. Such a Pardon was accordingly procur'd; the Offenders gladly embrac'd it, and thought of their Grievances no more. But Intelligence being soon after receiv'd, that it was but a Feint to seduce them to submit, that Forces were pouring in upon them on all Sides, and that a severe Chastisement was prepar'd for them, they assembled anew, hung up in the Church Steeples all the Gentlemen, with their Swords by their Sides, who fell in their way; kill'd the Marquis de Montgalliard, a Lieutenant General, and pillag'd and burn'd all the Houses of all the Nobility and Placemen in the Province.

In the mean time, the Troops arriv'd, indeed, both by Land and Sea: Upon which the Mutineers collected themselves from all Parts into one Body, consisting of about 10000 Men, and set up for themselves, deifying the King, and disowning his Authority. They even went so far as to elect a Duke, and constitute a General: But having neither Money, nor Arms, nor Provisions, nor one tenable Place, nor the least Idea either of Discipline or Government, Tyranny very easily got the better of Anarchy; Part were executed, Part flew out of the Country:

(u) The Character of this Prince is thus given by Sir William Temple: "He seem'd not to deserve the Fortune of a Prince, only because he did not seem to care for it: to hate the Constraints and Ceremonies that belong to it; and to value no Pleasures in Life, but the most natural, and the most easy; and, while he had them, was never out of humour for wanting the rest: Generous to his Servants and Soldiers, when he had it; and when he wanted, endeavouring to make it up, by the Liberties he gave them; very much beloved by, and familiar among, both: And, to give his Picture by one small Touch, one of his Ministers

"told me, that not long before he dy'd, all his Family were, a Gentleman of his House, as he was called; another of his Chamber; and a Boy that look'd to a little Nag he us'd to ride: One Day he call'd for his Horse; the two first told him the Boy was not to be found. He bid them, however, get him his Horse: They could not agree which should go and saddle him, till the Duke bid them go, and one or other of them do it, or else, he swore, he would go down and saddle his Horse himself. They were sham'd; and it was done."

try: All were effectually subdued; and even the very Towns where the Insurrection began were (e) oppressed more grievously than ever, by way of Punishment, for having been too sensible of Oppression before.

Some time before this the Chevalier de Roban, who was descended from the ancient Dukes of Bretagne, had enter'd into a Conspiracy with the Spaniards to excite some such Commotion as this; but before it could take effect, the Intrigue was discovered, and he himself was beheaded in the Court of the Basilic; as also one Madam Villars, and the Chevalier (no de Préau). It has been observ'd, that if these two Attempts had coincided; had the Chevalier de Roban been supported by such a Body, or that Body been directed by such a Head; or had the Dutch been ready with their Fleets to countenance the Insurrection as they actually did the Conspiracy, or had the Reformed become Parties and set up their Standard in the same Cause, as they were politically enough invited to do, this one Affair had given the Court of France more Trouble than the general War they were engag'd in against to great a Part of Europe.

Result of Melina.

But Spain had her Distempers as well as France, without the same Vigour of Constitution to throw them off; and if ever she took a wise Measure, her Strength failed her in the Execution. To make herself amends for the Loss of France Compté, she undertook to reduce Rouffion. The Dutch enter'd into the Concert, and by a particular Treaty, furnish'd both a large Fleet, and a Body of Land Forces. But when all was ready for Execution, Messina revolted, and it became necessary to give over the Design on Rouffion, in order to preserve Sicily. Admiral de Royster, with the (x) Dutch Fleet were already on the Coast, and Count Horn had embark'd his Forces. The Queen-Regent, therefore, endeavour'd to induce those two Commanders to concur in the second Enterprize, since the first was no longer practicable; but without Success: They thought themselves oblig'd to conform to the Letter of their Orders, and so made the best of their way back. This oblig'd the Spaniards to slip their whole Force, and leave Catalonia expos'd to the Attempts, and almost at the Mercy of France; and what was worst of all, when they came before Messina, they found that vigilant and active Power had got the Start of them, had taken the Messinese into its Protection, had furnish'd them with (y) Provisions, Troops and Officers; and on the very Day that the Spanish Fleet came in Sight, surpriz'd the Castle of St. Salsador, and thereby utterly defeated the Ends of their Expedition.

The Messinese, however, soon became sensible that the French Yoke was still heavier than the Spanish; and it gall'd them to much the more to find an Oppressor, when they expected a Deliverer. This dispos'd them to think favourably of their old Masters, and to wish for their Assistance to re-deliver them from their new. But they who were strong enough to protect, were strong enough to subdue; and the less hold they had by Affection, the more use they made of their Power: All that France propos'd by her Concern in this Affair, being to distract the Councils, and divert the Strength and Wealth of Spain into this Channel, during the War; and to make a cheap Purchase of a Title to France Compté, by abandoning Sicily, at the Conclusion of a Peace.

To this short State of Foreign Affairs, no more needs be added than that, before the End of the Year, the Danes took Wismar from the Swedes; and by an open War, these two Crowns came to be engag'd in the common Quarrel: And that after a great Expectation of some extraordinary Success in the Spanish Affairs from Don John's intended Expedition into Italy to command all the Peres and Provinces of that Crown, both there and in Sicily, when he was ready to go and meet de Royster, who, by a new Concert with the States, attended him at Barcelona; with the Dutch Fleet, design'd for Messina, he was, by a Court Intrigue, recall'd to Madrid. The King was then arriv'd in his fourteenth Year, and took upon him the Government as now in Majority; and by the Advice of some near him in Favour, writ a Letter to Don John, to invite him to Court, to assist him in the Government. He obey'd, but staid there not above a Fortnight, or three Weeks, till by the Credit and Authority of the Queen Mother he was forced to quit his Ground there, and return to Saragosa; and so vanish'd a mighty Expectation that had been rais'd in Spain and other Places, of great Effects that were to follow this Prince's coming to the Administration of Affairs; very great Sums of Money were wholly lost that had been employ'd in the Preparations of his Journey and Equipage for Italy; and Sicily was left almost hopeless of Recovery.

As to Scotland, it was still as we left it, in the Hands of the Duke of Lauderdale, and his Instrument Lord Haltoun; and, as if to shew what sort of Commissions, the late Non-Resisting Test was calculated to authorize, the Case of the Wild Conventicles, was again recommended by the King's Letter to the Secrets Privy Council; and, as if in Conformity thereto; the Number and Danger of them were set forth; as also the Insufficiency of the several Laws in being to suppress them; and the Necessity of having recourse to some wholesome Expedient that should operate where where they had fail'd. This wholesome Expedient which Lord Halton was neither afraid nor ashamed to patronise and recommend, was neither better nor worse than the Introduction of military Execution, by distributing Garrisons, where it should be thought convenient in certain strong Houses, in several Parts of the Kingdom. A Proposal of this alarming nature could scarce have been made any where without Opposition. Even in the Duke of Lauderdale's Council, tho' the favourite Project of his favourite Creature, some few were found, who could not be prevail'd on to stiew it the least Countenance, but on the contrary, took upon them to prove, that it was equally a Violation of Law and Justice, Liberty and Property. Unfortunately this reverend Words had lost their Significancy, and pass'd for common Air. Lord Halton reply'd, It was the King's Pleasure to have it so, and it was become almost as dangerous to resist the King's Will, as his Power. As soon, therefore, as those awful Words had been made use of, all Debate was at an End, the Command was understood to be absolute, and these venerable Councilors were willing to set the Example of implicit Obedience.

In plain terms, an Order of Council was made for the quartering of twelve Garrisons of fifty Foot and twelve Horse each in twelve several Houses; And when the respective Owners would have presented their Petitions, shewing the extreme Hardship of being turned out of their own Dwellings, as well as the Loss and Damage they must necessarily incur by it, they were rejected without a Reading, as if in scorn both of their Sufferings and Remonstrances.

Neither did this notable Stretch of Power terminate here. These military Supervisors were to be sed as well as lodg'd: And as few single Estates could support so large a Family, a Motion was made in Council, for an Order to oblige the several Shires, in which the Houses were situated, to make good all Disbursements. Duke Hamilton, and those who had the Honour to oppose the first Motion, appear'd with the same Warmth and Resolution against this, alledging, that the Council had no Authority to lay the least Imposition on the Subject; which was contradicted by the Lord Halton; who was positive, they could both do that, and more also: And, it seems, the Majority had Faith enough to believe him; for they made no Difficulty to establish a Rate for this Service, and to appoint the Commissioners of the Excise to levy it: But many of these had the Honesty to refuse Obedience; and some, the Courage to avow the Reason, viz. That it was expressly against Law, to lay any Burthen on the Subject, without the Authority of Parliament; for, even in the third Act of his Majesty's first Parliament (in which the King's Prerogative over the Militia is asserted) it is so provided in plain Words.

A. D. 1675.

But this Reference to the Laws serv'd rather to exasperate than intimidate these thorough-paced Counsellors; for they not only renew'd their Orders, but charg'd the said Commissioners to obey and execute them, within six Days, on the penalty of being declar'd Rebels.

Terrify'd with this extravagant Proceeding, and equally afraid of obeying or disobeying, the Commissioners dispatch'd one of their Number (Sir Patrick Hume) to sollicit the Suspension at least of the Outlawry; which appear'd the more terrible, because to take place so suddenly; but without Success. The Privy Counsellors, to whom he presented their (x) Bill for that Purpose, refus'd to pass it: Upon which he thought it advisable to enter a Record of their Application, properly witnessed, before a public Notary. This gave so much Offence to their Lordships, that Sir Patrick was cited to make his Appearance before them; and, though he pleaded, that he did not enter his Record with a View to bring any Privy Counsellor into a Snare, for refusing to pass his Bill, but only as Evidence that he had fulfilled the Deputation he had been entrusted with, he was censur'd as an Insolent Person, and sent to the common Gaol.

Upon the whole, however, finding the Kingdom was likely to be inflam'd, and apprehending some untoward Inferences might be drawn from it by the Parliament of England (now on the point of re-assembling) to the Prejudice of the Duke of Lauderdale; it was thought advisable to slacken this Over-see'd, and to jog on fair and softly to their Journey's End. Accordingly another Order of Council was issued, requiring the Obedience of the Shires to the former Orders, declaring their Scruples to be groundless, and setting forth, that it was the Intention of the Council to defalc whatsoever was rais'd for these Garrisons out of the first Payment of the Excise: But as this Intention had been kept a profound Secret hitherto; so it is certain, that the Order to the Commissioners was absolute for the Assesment, without the least Hint of a Warrant of Reimbursement: And when once a Precedent had been set, upon whatever Pretence, of taxing the Subject by Order of Council, it might be said, that the very Being of Parliaments was in danger. The Prerogative not only reaches far, but holds fast; and when once Privilege falls within its Grasp, scarce any thing short of a Miracle can set it free again.

All this while, it appears, Mr. Coleman carry'd on his Intrigues with the French Court, in the Duke his Master's Name; the principal Drifts of which were, First, To sollicit 200,000 l. to procure a Dissolution of the present Parliament, which he represented as a certain Way to procure a Peace; and that failing, so small a Sum as 20,000 l. with which he undertook to carry two great Points, in the ensuing Session, viz. the Parliament upon making their humble Request to the King, that the Fleet might be put into his Royal Highness's Care; and, secondly, to get an Act for a general Liberty of Conscience.

These things were not discover'd till afterwards, but are proper to be placed here; the (a) Letter to Father le Chaise, in which they are contain'd, bearing date September 29, 1675; and the Parliament being to meet October the 13th following. Mr. Coleman had, it seems, apply'd before to Mr. Rowley, for this piddling Sum; nay, as he says himself, shamefully begg'd it; but without Success: That Minister wanted to be made sure of the Ends, before he would part with the Means; and thereby plainly indicated, that he thought the Secretary had undertaken for more than he was able to make good; and that though the Sum was trifling, when compar'd to the Service, it was too great to be thrown away. This ill Success with his most Christian Majesty's Minister induced Mr. Coleman to make a new Essay on his Confessor; to obtain whose Confidence, and to show how favourable the Crisis was to God's Church, he crowded a whole History into the Dispatch, and characteris'd the Duke as a Person, "who regarded not any thing in the World, in comparison of God Almighty's Glory, the Salvation of his own Soul, and the Conversion of this poor Kingdom, which had been a long time oppress'd, and miserably harass'd, by Heresy and Schism." But neither did this new Device answer any better than the former: The Father return'd a civil but cool (A) Reply; encouraging, indeed, the Continuance of his Correspondence, but offering not a single Louis d'or to make it worth his while.

All this time, the principal Bureats at Whitehall had been to inspect the Revenue, and to put the Disbursements on such a Footing, that the growing Frugality of the House of Commons might the less affect both King and Minister for the Time to come. By a Paper of the Lord Treasurer's, dated September 29, 1675, and presented to the Council October the 8th, it appears, that the annual (c) Disbursements amounted to 1,387,770 l. the New Revenue of the 25th year.

(a) In this Letter are the following remarkable Passages:— But I believe I saw Mr. Rowley's Policy all along; who was willing to have his Master's Money, upon an Assurance we would do all we could to have of the Parliament, for our own sake; that we would struggle as hard without Money, as with it; and we having by this time, upon our own Interests, prevail'd to get the Parliament prorog'd till the 13th of April, he thought, that the Prorogation, being to a Day so high in the Spring, would put the Confidence as much beyond their Measures, as that it might procure a Peace, and be as useful to France as a Diffusion.

(b) The Lord Arlington set forward upon his Errand to Holland November the 16th, 1674, and return'd not till February the 6th following. During his Absence, the Lord Treasurer, Lord Keeper, and Duke of Lauderdale, were the only Ministers in any considerable Credit with the King, and who all pretend'd to be entirely united to the Duke, declared boldy, and with great Violence, against the said Lord, and his Actions in Holland, and did hope, in his Absence, to have totally supplanted him, and rooted him out of the King's Favour; and, after that, they thought they might easily enough have dealt with the Parliament: But none of them had Courage enough to speak against the Parliament, till they could get rid of him, for fear they should not succeed, but that the Parliament should sit in spite of them, and come to hear that they had used their Endeavours against it; which would have been an unpardonable Crime with our omnipotent Parliament, that no Power would have been able to have freed them from Punishment.

But they finding, at his Return, that they could not prevail against him by such Means and Arts as they had then tried, resolv'd upon new Council, which were to surprize him in his own Court; which accordingly they undertook, and became as fierce, Asps, and as venomous for the Protestant Religion, and against Spain, as ever my Lord Arlington was before them; and, in pursuance thereof, persuaded the King to issue out those severe Orders and Proclamations against Catholics, which came out in February last, by which they did as much as in them lay to extirpate all Catholics, and Catholic Religion, out of the Kingdom.

PARIS, 23d of October, 1675.

The Letter which you gave yourself the Trouble to write to me, came to my Hands but the last Night. I received it with great Satisfaction; and I assure you its Length did not make it seem tedious. I shall be glad, on my Part, to assist in recouping your good Intention. I will consider of the Means to effect it; and when I am better inform'd than I am at present, I will give you an Account; so the end I may hold Intelligence with you, as you did with my Predecessor. Sir, I desire you to believe that I will never fail as to good Will, for the Service of your Master, whom I honour as much as he deserves; and that it is with great Truth that I am &c.

A. D. 1675. Branches were not forgotten: And particular Orders were sent from the Lord Treasurer to the several Officers, to know exactly what their yearly Value was; how the same arose, how charged; how accounted for; and how far it was improvable.

*Fifteenth Sep-
tem.* October the 13th, both Houses met, according to Prorogation: And his Majesty, in his gracious Speech, gave them to understand, That he met them with more than usual Concern for the Event of the Session: That he hop'd they would avoid the like Debates, which occasion'd the last Prorogation: That, if any thing of that kind should arise, he desir'd them to defer the Discussion of it, till they had dispatch'd such public Bills as might conduce to the Good and Safety of the Kingdom; and that he particularly recommended to them whatever might tend to the Security of the Protestant Religion, as established in the Church of England.

This was the Amount of the first Part of the Speech: It is fit the Sequel should be given in his Majesty's own Words:

"I must likewise desire your Assistance in some Supplies, as well to take off the Anticipations which are upon my Revenue, as for the building of Ships: And tho' the War has been the great Cause of these Anticipations, yet I find by a late Account I have taken of my Expences, that I have not been altogether so good an Husband as I might have been, and as I resolve to be for the future; altho', at the same time, I have had the Satisfaction to find, that I have been far from such an Extravagancy in my own Expence, as some would have the World believe. I am not ignorant, that there are many, who would prevent the Kindness of my Parliament to me at this time; but I as well know, that your Affections have never fail'd me: And you may remember, it is now above three Years since I have ask'd you for any thing for my own Use."

These several Points were taken up at the Rebound by the Lord Keeper, who was all-eloquent upon each of them; but to the great Disgrace of Rhetoric, since it does not appear, that it had the least Effect on any one Member of either House.

The Commons, in particular, met in the very same Disposition that they parted; that is to say, those in opposition to the Court resolv'd to give all the Trouble they could; and those in league with it, instructed, perhaps, to join in several popular Points, as the Price of a Supply, which was the great Point they had to labour.

Thus we find all the Proceedings, which had miscary'd last Session, resum'd in the Beginning of this: And that, when the King's Speech came under consideration, a Demand was made on one side, and allow'd as reasonable on the other, of a Scrutiny into those Debts and Charges, which the People were call'd upon to make good: The Result of which was, that it appear'd, the Expence of the late two Years War with the Dutch amounted, in the whole, to 2,040,000 l. and that the Money given by Parliament; what arose from the Customs, which ought to have been appropriated; what was gain'd by Prizes; and the 800,000 Patacoons given by the Dutch; at least amounted to 3,040,000 l. Whence it was infer'd, that, instead of the King's being run almost a Million in debt by the War, as those who took upon them to answer for the Court alledg'd, he might have been a Million in pocket. It was, upon these Principles, further observ'd, that, by the illegal Stop of the Exchequer Payments, the whole of the Revenue, as well as the Customs before-mention'd, came clear into the Exchequer, and was more than sufficient to answer all the reasonable Expences of the Crown; those of the Government not much exceeding 700,000 l. per ann. whereas the clear Income of the Revenue amounted to at least 1,600,000 l.

From the whole it was more than insinuated, that the Debts of the Crown arose rather from the Extravagances of the Court, than the Necessities of the Government: And some undertook to demonstrate, that, by an honest and careful Management, both his Majesty's Expences might be sufficiently supply'd, and his Debts discharg'd, out of his present Revenue, in the course of a few Years: Adding, that no Parliament was oblig'd to pay the King's Debts, by taxing the Subject: That such Precedents were dangerous, and might be fatal: For if once a House of Commons grew over-prodical, and a Court but moderately frugal, the Parliaments of England would become as insignificant as those of France.

Either these Facts and Considerations had such weight with the House, or the Majority, contrary to the Opinion that is generally entertain'd of them, were so little under the Influence of the Court, that they resolv'd not to grant any Supply to his Majesty for the taking off the Anticipations of his Revenue. There were four hundred Members in the House; and the Negative was carry'd but by four Voices.

In comparison with the Lavishness and Extravagances of later Times, these things have all the Air of Patriotism and Public Spirit; but if (f) Mr. North, and all the other Writers on the Side of the Prerogative deserve

A. D. 1675. serve any Credit, we are to conclude, that this Excess of Oeconomy, did not arise from any Tenderness to the Public, but a settled Resolution to distress the King.

That this Session, however, might correspond in all things with the last, they again proceeded to grant three hundred thousand Pounds for the building of twenty Men of War, viz. One First Rate, eight Second Rates, and eleven Third Rates; and withal renew'd the appropriating Vote to annex the Tonnage and Poundage to the Use of the Navy.

Several Ways were debated for the raising of this Sum, as upon Lands, upon the Taxes by way of Poll, or upon French Commodities; and lastly, upon our own Consumption, and upon Merchandize. At length it was to be levy'd upon Lands, and paid in eighteen Months, to be lodg'd apart in the Exchequer, and appropriated to that particular Use, with very severe Penalties upon the Officers that should apply it to any other. All which was by no means agreeable to the Court.

It is fit to be recorded, that from the State of the Fleet which was now given in, it appear'd we had no more than eight First Rates, nine Second Rates, and forty-three Third Rates; while the French exceeded in the Number of these Rates by TWENTY-SIX, and the Dutch by fourteen; so that the FRENCH were already become the greatest MARITIME POWER in Europe.

There being at this time, a Treaty of Commerce depending with France, the House thought it advisable to call for a State of the Imports and Exports, in order to form a Judgment of the Balance of Trade between the two Kingdoms.

Accordingly, Sir George Downing, the rough Hand formerly made use of to nurse up a War with Holland, now a Commissioner of the Customs, presented a Copy of a Paper to the House, which had been drawn up for the Use of the Lords Commissioners employ'd by the Court in the said Treaty: Shewing that the Silk and Linen Manufactures imported from France, amounted to upwards of eight hundred thousand Pounds. That the Wine, Brandy, and other Products of that Country amounted to upwards of three hundred thousand Pounds more, besides Toys, rich Apparel, rich Lace, &c. to an incredible Value. That, on the other hand, the Manufactures of Silk and Wool exported into France, did not amount to eighty-five thousand Pounds. That all our other Exports did not amount to ninety thousand Pounds more: So that the Difference to the Disadvantage of England, amounted to at least a Million sterling. Sir J. Kersey says thirteen hundred thousand Pounds. By the way of Inference in the said Paper it was shewn, That it was the Interest of the French to hold the Treaty in Silence, since it was scarce possible for them to get more by the Conclusion of it than they now did; as it was scarce possible for England to get less; since our Commerce with them was so many ways restrain'd, that it amounted almost to a Prohibition. This determin'd the House to order in a Bill upon this Matter, which, from whatever Party-Views deriv'd, was demonstrably necessary, in order to stop a Leak, which bad far to drain the Profits of all our Commerce with every other Nation.

Upon this Occasion it was made appear, that every thousand Pound per Annum had since the Restoration paid an hundred Pounds in Taxes to the Crown.

In the last Session, when the Non-Resisting Test was under Debate, an Oath of Purification, with respect to Offices and Rewards, had been mention'd in the House of Lords by the Marquis of Winchester; and now a Suspicion prevailing in the House of Commons, that a Party could not uniformly and steadily oppose every Vote and every Motion that lean'd to the popular Side, and as uniformly and steadily forward and support every Motion and Vote that was calculated to favour the Court, unless they were under some Influence, which was inconsistent with their Trust, the following Test was introduc'd and enter'd in their Books, tho' it does not appear to have been administer'd to this Day.

I A. B. do protest before God and this House of Parliament, that, directly nor indirectly; neither I, nor any for my Use, to my Knowledge, have, since the first Day of January, 1672, had, or received any Sum or Sums of Money, by ways of Imprest, Gift, Loan, or otherwise, from the King's Majesty, or any other Person, by his Majesty's Order, Direction or Knowledge, or by Authority derived from his said Majesty or any Pardon, Discharge or Respite of any Money due to his said Majesty, upon account of any Grant, Pension, Gratuity, or Reward, or any Promise of any such Office, Place or Command, of or from his Majesty, or out of any Money, Treasure or Estate, or of belonging to his Majesty, or of, from, or by, any foreign Ambassador or Minister, or of, from, or by, any Appointment, or with the Knowledge ment of two Matters, which, brought in perfection, would crown their Work. The first was, to bring the king into great Necessity; and the other, to plant only those of their own Party about him. These, considered in general, must needs be very efficacious; for, first, if the King was once pinch'd with extreme Want of Supplies, he must, at length, throw himself upon the Parliament, and do whatever they should say was needful, for securing the Public against Popery and arbitrary Power. And the Faction concluded, if it came once to that, he would soon be reduced, and render it necessary. And they, so less reasonably, expected, that all his Struggles and Shifts, to avoid that Extremity, would but halve the Opulence, and bring forward the grand Crisis.

Again:

"And, first, of the bringing Necessity over the King. It was considered, that the settled Revenue was a grand Security to the Crown; for, with a reasonable Manager, and not lurching into profuse Undertakings, the King might live well upon his own. And this Good was owing to the early loyal Parliament. But yet, as the King order'd the Matter, it was seldom that he found himself without great Need of Supplies. Pleasures, Building, the Navy (which was his beloved) and other Royal Occasions, kept him always in a Diffusion, if possible, to be well with his Parliament, from whose occasional Supplies he expected his Satisfaction; and

So HELP ME GOD.

The Houſe alſo voted it a Grievance, that Juſtices of the Peace ſhould be ſummoned to appear before the Council, to answer what they did in their judicial Capacity.

About this time, an Accident happen'd, which not only renew'd the Cry againſt Popery, but rais'd it louder than ever.

One Luzance, who from a French Jeſuit became a Convert to the Church of England, preaching in the French Church in the Savoy, took occaſion to inveigh with great Bitterneſs againſt the Errors of the Church of Rome; and afterwards printed his Sermon. This alarm'd the Papiſts, and particularly one Dr. Burnet, otherwiſe called Father St. Germain, a Jeſuit and Confeſſor to the Duچهs of York, who finding him alone in his Chamber, and having poſted three Men at his Door, threaten'd to murder him if he did not make Satisfaction for the Injury, and ſpeedily return to France. The Man thus aw'd and terrified, not only promiſed faithfully whatever was requir'd of him, but ſign'd a formal Retraction, in order to get his Liberty. But no ſooner was he ſafe and free, than he went to Dr. Brewſter another converted Jeſuit, and told him the whole Story: The Doctour communicated it to Sir John Kerſley, and Sir John to the Houſe of Commons, who immediately took ſure upon it, appointed a Committee to examine the Matter, and order'd Kerſley to produce Luzance the next Day; who confirm'd all; adding, moreover, the following Particulars: That the ſaid St. Germain, in ſeveral Conferences with him, had attested, that the King was a Roman Catholic in his Heart, that the Court was endeavouring to get a (g) Liberty of Conſcience for the Roman Catholics; and, that granted, in two Years, moſt of the English would acknowledge the Pope; that he knew the King's Intention concerning Religion, and that he was ſure his Majesty would approve of all he ſhould do in that Matter; that he laugh'd at the Parliament, as being only a Wave, that had but a little time; and ſaid, that no body was more welcome at Court, or had greater Intrigues with the Nobility than he; that it was good, ſometimes, to force People to Heaven; and that there were an infinite Number of Priests and Jeſuits in London, who did God very great Service.

When all theſe Particulars, which Luzance offer'd to atteſt upon Oath, had been reported to the Houſe, Lord Cavendiſh call'd upon Sir John Kerſley to give an Account of ſome other things which he had heard from Luzance: One was, that two French Proteſtants, being Merchants of great Subſtance and Credit, had been threaten'd by certain Papiſts, that if they were not lets ſevere upon the Romaniſts, they would ere long ſee the Proteſtant Blood flow in London Streets. A Committee was appointed to enquire into the Truth of this Matter; and Luzance being ſummoned, gave Evidence to the very ſelf ſame Effect, and gaye it under his own Hand. The Parties he had his Information from, being ſent for, appear'd alſo, and declared ſuch Threats to have been uſed towards them by ſome French Papiſts; but, to what Cauſe it was owing, is uncertain; they gaye in only ſuch Names as were of Perſons either abſent, or of no Eſtimation; ſo that little came of this Buſineſs. But theſe and other ſuch Informations, concerning the Height and Inſolence of the Papiſts, did ſo exasperate the Houſe, that many Motions were made to humble them. Some were for a ſpeedy Confinement of them to the Country, others for Banishment, and ſome again for diſarming them, and the like.

His Majesty alſo was pleas'd to iſſue his Royal Proclamation, November 10, ſignifying, that he had taken Luzance into his Royal Protection; ſetting forth St. Germain's Offence; offering two hundred Pounds Reward for the (h) apprehending of him; commanding all Conſtables, &c. to uſe their beſt Endeavours to that End; and declaring, that whoever harbour'd him ſhould be proceeded againſt with Severity.

This Affair ſhew'd the Neceſſity of an Union among Proteſtants; and, accordingly a Door of Hope was once more open'd (i) to

(i) In the Houſe of Lords, at the Inſtauce of the Duke of Buckingham, who expreſs'd his Opinion in the following ſenſible and noble manner upon that Occaſion:

My Lord,
“ There is a thing called Liberty, which (howſoever ſome Men may think it, that the People of England are fond of; it is that they will never part with; and is that his Majesty in his Speech has promiſed us to take a particular Care of. This, my Lords, in my Opinion, can never be done without giving an Indulgence to all Proſtant Diſſenters. It is certainly a very uſeful kind of Life to any Man, that has either Chriſtian Charity, Humanity, or Good-Nature, to ſee his Fellow-Subjects daily abuſed, divested of their Liberties and Birth-Rights, and miſerably throven out of their Poſſeſſions and Freedom, only becauſe they cannot agree with others in ſome Opinions and Niceties of Religion, which their

Conſciences will not give them leave to conſent to; and which even by the Conſtitution of thoſe who would impoſe upon them, are no way neceſſary to Salvation. But, my Lords, beſides this, and all that may be ſaid upon it, in order to the Improvement of our Trade, and Increaſe of the Wealth, Strength, and Greatneſs of this Nation (which, with your Leave, I ſhall preſume to diſcourſe of ſome other time) there is, methinks, in this Notion of Perſecution a very groſs Miſtake, both as to the Point of Government, and the Point of Religion. There is ſo as to the Point of Government, becauſe it makes every Man's Safety depend on the wrong Place; not upon Governours, or Man's living well towards the civil Government eſtabliſhed by Law, but upon his being tranſported with Zeal for every Opinion that is held by thoſe that have Power in the Church that is in ſiſtion; and I conceive it is a Miſtake in Religion, becauſe it is poſitively againſt the expreſs Doctrine and Example of Jeſus Chriſt. Nay, my Lords, as to our Proteſtant Religion, there is ſomething in it yet worse; for we Proteſtants maintain, that none of thoſe Opinions, which Chriſtians diſſer about, are neceſſary; and thereto the Dissenters; Leave having been given, in both Houses, for the Introduction of a Bill in their favour.

In a short time after this, the Matter of Dr. Shirley's Petition to the Lords against Sir John Pegg was again renew'd, tho' it had broke up the Parliament the last time. There were those who thought the King had consented to it, as disliking the warm Proceedings of both Houses.

Of this Opinion was Marvel, who says, that the Speaker, going through Westminster-hall to the House, and, in his Way, seeing some of the Lawyers (who had pleaded at the Lords Bar in that Cause) commanded his Mace to seize them, and led them up Prisoners with him; which it was pretium'd that he, being of his Majesty's Privy-Council, would not have done, but for what some Men call his Majesty's Service; and yet this was the highest of all the Provocations which the Lords had receiv'd in this Controversy.

Others again believ'd, that the Lords of the Country Interest had persuaded the Doctor thereto, with a View thereby to kindle such a Flame between the two Houses, as should oblige the King, either to prorogue, adjourn, or dissolve them: The said Lords apprehending, that, if this Parliament should sit much longer, the Majority might be gain'd over by Places and Money, so as to become quite obsequious to the Court; and this, Saville Lord Hullifax, then in the Interest of Lord Shaftsbury his Uncle, told Sir John Rereley was his Opinion.

There is an admirable Speech of Lord Shaftsbury's extant, on this famous Contest, which begins with OUR ALL IS AT STAKE; out of which it is necessary to make some Extracts, not only for the clearing up of this Doubt, and explaining the Dispute between the two Houses, but even for letting in some better Lights on our Story, which are no where else to be found: But first it is necessary to premise, that the Bishop of Salisbury had given it as his Opinion, that the House should rather appoint a Day to consider what to do upon the Petition, than to appoint a Day of Hearing; and the Lord Keeper, as a Way far less liable to Exception, and less offensive, and less injurious to the Privilege of the Peers, had propos'd, that their Lordships would appoint a Day, nay, a very long Day, to consider what they would do upon it; urging first, that it was against their Judicature, to hear a Cause which was not properly before them, nor ought to be relieved by them; secondly, that it was doubtful, whether the Commons had not Privilege; and thirdly, that their Lordships were all convinced in their Consciences, that if it was prosecuted, it would cause a Breach.

In opposition to both these Lords, and their several Expedients, Lord Shaftsbury rose to speak; and having dispatch'd the first and second Points which the Lord Keeper had advanced; in answer to the third, proceeded as follows:

"But, my Lords, when I hear my Lord Keeper open so eloquently the fatal Consequences of a Breach, I cannot forbear to fall into some Admiration how it comes to pass, that (if the Consequences be so fatal) the King's Ministers in the House of Commons, of which there are several that are of the Cabinet, and have daily resort to his Majesty, and have the Direction and Trust of his Affairs; I say, that none of these should press these Consequences there, or give the least Stop to the Career of that House in this Business; but that all the Votes concerning this Affair, nay, even that very Vote, That no Appeal from any Court of Equity is cognizable by the House of Lords, should pass per se incontumacientis: And yet that all the great Ministers with us here, the Bishops and other Lords of greatest Dependence on the Court, contend this Point, as if it were pro aris & fociis. I hear his Majesty in Scotland hath been pleas'd to declare against Appeals in Parliament: I cannot much blame the Court, if they think (the Lord Keeper and the Judges being of the King's naming, and in his Power to change) that the Justice of the Nation is safe enough; and I, my Lords, may think so too, during this King's Time, tho' I hear Scotland, not without Reason, complains already. Yet how future Princes may use this Power, and how Judges may be made not out of Men of Ability or Integrity, but Men of Relation and Dependence, and who will do what they are commanded; and all Men's Causes come to be judged, and Estates disposed on, as great Men at Court please.

My Lords, the Constitution of our Government hath provided better for us; and I can never believe to wife a Body as the House of Commons will prove that foolish Woman, who plucks down her House with her Hands."

In answer to the Bishop, he said, "This Matter is no less than your whole Judicature; and your Judicature is the Life and Soul of the Dignity of the Peerage in England; you will quickly grow burdensome, if you grow useless: You have now the greatest and most useful End of Parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new Laws, but to redress Grievances, and to maintain the old Land-marks. The House of Commons Business is to complain, your Lordships to redress, not only the Complaints from them, that are the Eyes of the Nation, but all other particular Persons that address to you. A Land may groan under a Multitude of Laws, and I believe ours does; and when Laws

fore if it is in us somewhat an inextinguishable Conception, that Men ought to be deprived of their Liberties, and all the certain Consequences and Advantages of Life, because they will not agree with us in our secret Opinions of Religion, My humble Motion therefore to your Lordships, is, that you would give leave to bring in a Bill of Indulgence to all Protestant Dissenters. I know very well that every Year of this Reign hath a Right to bring into Parliament any Bill he conceives to be useful in this Nation: But I thought it more respectful to your Lordships to sit your Leave before; but I cannot think the doing of it will be any Prejudice to the Bill, because I am confident the Reason, the Prudence, and the Charitableness of it, will be able to justify it to this House, and the whole World."

A. D. 1675. grow to multiplied, they prove oftener Snares than Directions and Security to the People."

Again, "My Lords, I have all the Duty imaginable to his Majesty, and shall with all Submission give way to any thing he should think of Importance to his Affairs; But in this Point it is to alter the Constitution of the Government, if you are asked to lay this aside, and there is no Reason of State can be an Argument to your Lordships to turn yourselves out of that Interest you have in the Constitution of the Government; it is not only your Concern that you maintain yourselves in it, but it is the Concern of the poorest Man in England, that you keep your Station: It is your Lordships Concern, and that so highly, that I will be bold to say, the King can give none of you a Requital or Recompence for it. What are empty Titles? What is present Power, or Riches, and a great Estate, wherein I have no firm or fixed Property? It is the Constitution of the Government, and maintaining it, that secures your Lordships and every Man else in what he hath, the poorest Lord, if the Birthright of the Peerage be maintain'd, has a fair Prospect before him for himself or his Posterity; but the greatest Title, with the greatest present Power and Riches, is but a mean Creature, and maintains those in absolute Monarchies no otherwise than by servile and low Flatteries, and upon uncertain Terms.

"My Lords, would you be in favour with the King? It is a very ill way to it, to put yourselves out of a future Capacity, to be considerable in his Service. I do not find in Story, or in modern Experience, but that it is better, and a Man is much more regarded, that is full in a Capacity and Opportunity to serve, than he that hath wholly deprived himself of all for his Prince's Service. And I therefore declare, that I will serve my Prince as a Peer, but will not destroy the Peerage to serve him.

My Lords, I have heard of twenty foolish Models and Expedients to secure the Justice of the Nation, and yet to take this Right from your Lordships: As the King by his Commission appointing Commoners to hear Appeals; or that the twelve Judges should be the Persons, or that Persons should be appointed by Act of Parliament, which are all not only to take away your Lordship's just Right, which ought not to be altered any more than any other Part of the Government, but are in themselves, when well weighed, ridiculous. I must deal freely with your Lordships, these things could never have risen in Mens Minds, but that there has been some kind of Provocation that has given the first rise to it. Pray, my Lords, forgive me; if on this Occasion I put you in mind of Committee-Dinners, and the Scandal of it; those Doves of Ladies that attended all Causes; it was come to that pass, that Men even hired or borrowed of their Friends, handsome Sisters or Daughters to deliver their Petitions: But yet for all this, I must say, that your Judgments have been sacred unless in one or two Causes; and those we owe most to that Bench from whence we now apprehend the most Danger.

There is one thing I had almost forgot to speak to, which is the Conjunction of time, the Hinge upon which our Reason of State turns; and to that, my Lords, give me leave to say, if this be not a time of Leisure for you to vindicate your Privileges, you must never expect one. I could almost say, that the Harmony, good Agreement, and Accord that is to be prayed for at most other times, may be fatal to us now! We owe the Peace of these last two Years, and the Disengagement from the French Interest, to the two Houses differing from the Sense and Opinion of Witchell: So at this time the thing in the World this Nation hath most reason to apprehend is a general Peace, which cannot now happen without very advantageous Terms to the French, and disadvantageous to the House of Austria. We are the King's great Counsellors, and if so, have Right to differ, and give contrary Councils to those few that are nearest about him: I, for fear they would advance a general Peace, I am sure, I would advise against it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wish nothing from you may add Weight and Reputation to those Councils, who would assist the French. No Money for Ships, nor Preparations you can make, nor personal Assurances our Prince can give, can secure us from the French, if they are at Leisure. He is grown the most potent of us all at Sea: He has built twenty-four Ships this last Year, and has thirty more in Number than we; besides the Advantage, that our Ships are all out of Order, and his so exquisitely provided for, that every Ship has his particular Storehouse. It is incredible the Money he hath, and is bestowing in making Harbours; he makes Nature itself give way to the Vastness of his Expence; and, after all this, shall a Prince so wise, so intent upon his Affairs, be thought to make all these Preparations to fall over Land, and fall on the Back of Hungary, and batter the Walls of Koninits?"

His Lordship then spoke either factiously or impolitely (since his Speech was to be printed) of the Ease wherewith this French Hero of his could master Ireland: Adding,

"My Lords, to conclude this Point, I fear the Court of England is greatly mistaken in it, and I do not with the Reputation of the Concurrence of the Kingdom; and this out of the most sincere Loyalty to his Majesty and Love to my Nation."

His Lordship, in the next place, proceeded to take notice, that he had often seen the Arguments of strongest Reason, and most convincing to the Lay-Lords in general, lose all their Effect on the Bishops Bench; who had unanimously gone against the Sense of the House, in Matters which many of the Peers thought their essential and undoubted Rights. To account for this, his Lordship was pleas'd to suppose a Difference of Principles; which must carnally produce a Difference of Conclusions: And hence his Lordship took occasion

caſion to give a State of the Principles on both Sides, in the following Words:

"My Principle is, That the King is King by Love, and by the ſame Law that the poor Man enjoys his Cottage; and ſo it becomes the Concern of every Man in England, that has but his Liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmoſt, the King in all his Rights and Prerogatives. My Principle is alſo, That the Lords Houſe, and the Judicature and Rights belonging to it, are an eſſential Part of the Government, and eſtabliſhed by the ſame Law: The King governing and adminiſtring Juſtice by his Houſe of Lords, and adviſing with both his Houſes of Parliament in all important Matters, is the Government I own; am born under, and am oblig'd to.

But there is another Principle got into the World, my Lords, that hath not been long there; for Archbiſhop Laud was the firſt Author, that I remember, of it; and I cannot find that the Jesuits, or indeed the Papiſt Clergy, have ever own'd it, but ſome of the episcopical Clergy of our Britiſh Iſles; and withal, as 'tis new, ſo 'tis the moſt dangerous, deſtructive Doctrine to our Government and Law, that ever was. 'Tis the firſt of the Canons publiſh'd by the Convocation, 1640. That Monarchy is of divine Right.

We all agree, that the King and his Government is to be obey'd for Conſcience-ſake; and that the divine Precepts require, not only here, but in all Parts of the World, Obedience to lawful Governors. But that this Family are our Kings, and this particular Frame of Government is our lawful Conſtitution, and obliges us, is owing only to the particular Laws of our Country. This Anglican Doctrine was the Root, that produced the Bill of Test, laſt Seſſion; and ſome very perplexed Oaths, that are of the ſame Nature with that, and yet impoſed by ſeveral Acts in this Parliament.

In a word, if this Doctrine be true, our Magna Charta is of no uſe, our Laws are but Rules among ourſelves, during the King's Pleaſure. Monarchy, if of divine Right, cannot be bounded or limited by human Laws; nay what's more, cannot bind itſelf: And all our Claims of Right by the Law, or Conſtitution of the Government, all the Juſtification and Privilege of this Houſe, all the Rights and Privileges of the Houſe of Commons, all the Properties and Liberties of the People, are to give way not only to the Intereſt, but the Will and Pleaſure of the Crown. And the beſt and worſhieſt of Men, holding this Principle, muſt vote to deliver up all we have, not only when Reaſons of State, and the ſeparate Intereſt of the Crown, require it; but when the Will and Pleaſure of the King is known and would have it ſo. For that muſt be, to a Man of that Principle, the only Rule and Meaſure of Right and Juſtice. Therefore, my Lords, you ſee how neceſſary it is, that all our Principles be known; and how fatal to us all it is, that this Principle ſhould be ſuffer'd to ſpread any farther."

His Lordſhip concluded, with a Requeſt to the Houſe, that they would not be ſed

de ſe, and a Motion for appointing a Day for hearing the Cauſe; which was carry'd in the Affirmative: Whence it is plain, that the different Behaviour of the King's Servants, in the two Houſes, is wholly irreconcilable: Unleſs it can be ſuppoſed, that his Majeſty, if not his Miniſters, had given into the Sentiments of his Brother, and contributed to the Ferment, in order to render a Diſſolution unavoidable.

But whatever the Cauſe was, the Effect was ſuch, that the Commons reſuſing to let their Member plead at the Bar of the Lords during a Time of Privilege, reſolv'd, that the Lords, by receiving an Appeal from any Court, either of Law or Equity, againſt a Member of the Lower-houſe, during a Seſſion of Parliament, were thereby Infringers of the Privileges of the Commons of England; and that ſuch Lawyers as ſhould attend as Council; to plead in any ſuch Cauſe at the Lords Bar, ſhould be deem'd Betrayers of the Rights of the Commons of England; and that the ſaid Vote be affixed to the Door of the Houſe of Commons, Wyſtinghall, and the Inns of Court; which was accordingly done: And the ſame Day it was voted by the Lords, that the ſame was illegal and unparliamentary, and tended to the Diſſolution of the Government: And, upon the whole, that they would not recede from their Right of Judicature by Appeals from the Courts of Equity.

It was then propos'd by Lord Moban, to addreſs his Majeſty to diſſolve the Parliament, and call another; as alſo, that there might be a frequent Change of Parliaments. This gave riſe to a vehement Debate; in the Courſe of which, all imaginable Arguments, that could either influence Court or Country, were made uſe of to procure an Affirmative:

The King was flatter'd with the Hopes, or rather brib'd with the Promise, of a large Sum to pay his Debts: And the Church receiv'd the warmeſt Aſſurances, that, though Proteſtant Diſſenters ſhould find ſome Favour and Eaſe, her Lands and Dignities would be ſafe: And, on the popular Side of the Queſtion, the Conduct of the preſent Houſe of Commons, was expoſed with as much Severity, as if the Nation had not one true Representative. From the Length of Time which the Part of the People had been in their Hands, and the free Uſe they had made of it, it was urg'd, that they were become more than Lords. They were charg'd with having violated the ancient Rules of Parliament, by not admitting the Right of the Lords to reduce their Grants. They were reproach'd for having ſeveral times rejected, with Scorn, a Bill for the more fair and equal Trial of the Peers. It was ſaid, ſeriously, that they had never met without exciting the greateſt Apprehenſions in all ſober and wiſe Men, and ironically, that it was owing to the Goodneſs of the Prince, and the Virtue of the Members, that Honours, Offices, Penſions, Money, Employments and Gifts, had not been beſtow'd and accepted as a Conſideration for reducing the Government to the Model Motion in the Houſe of Lords for an Address to diſſolve the Parliament. History and Proceedings of the Lords, Vol. I.

A.D. 1675. Model of France, Denmark, &c. where the Will and Pleasure of the Prince had taken place of the Laws.

It was added, "How easily this may be done in future Ages, under such Princes, and such an House of Commons as may happen; if long and continued Parliaments be allowed for Law, may be made some Measure of judging by This; where, tho' the Prince had no Dispens, and the Members of the House of Commons have shewed to great Candour and Self-denial, yet the best Observers are apt to think, that we owe it to the strong and opposite Factions at Court, that many things of great Alterations have not passed.

It was also observed, that in former times when Parliaments were short and frequent, the Members constantly received their Wages, both from their Counties and Boroughs; many of the poorer Boroughs petitioned to be excused from sending Members, as not being able to bear their Charge, and were so: Laws were made in favour of the Gentry, that Corporations should compel none but the Freeman of their own Town to serve for them; nay, that in all the ancient Returns of Writs for Knights of the Shires, their Sureties for their Appearance were returned with them. But that now the Case was so alter'd, that 1500*l.* and 2000*l.* and lately 7000*l.* was a Price that Men paid to be entrusted. That it was to be hoped the Charity of those worthy Persons, and their Zeal for the public Interest, had induc'd them to be at this Expence: But that it were better to be otherwise; there being a scurrilous English Proverb, That Men that buy dear, cannot live by selling cheap.

Puffs in the Negative.

The Debate continued till eight o'Clock, when it pass'd in the Negative by two Voices. Content, thirty-eight; not content, fifty. At the Head of the Lords who were for the Address, appear'd the Duke of York, who by his Conduct on this Occasion has given much credit to the Politics in Mr. Coleman's Historical Letter to Father le Chevre, before quoted. His Royal Highness, however, was not followed by the whole Body of Catholic Peers; for some of them divided against him, and in particular, the celebrated Earl of Bristol, so often mentioned in the Beginning of this Reign.

The Lists on this Division were remarkable in several respects, but in nothing more, than to see the Names of Buckingham, Shaftsbury, Essex, Wharton, Hales, Townshend, &c. follow in Train, after that of the presumptive Heir, whom they so soon after, with so much Violence, endeavoured to set aside.

But tho' they join'd in the Measure, it was with very different Views: The Duke wanted to get rid of this House of Commons, because of their Zeal against the Catholics; and in hope, that by a Confederacy with the other Nonconformists, such a Change might be made in the representative Part of the Legislature, as might pave the Way for a general Toleration: The rest, because the two Parties approach'd too near an Equality; because the Condemnations of the King, or the Practices of his Ministers, might, in a Day's time, take the Game out of their Hands, and put the Lurch upon them.

But, tho' defeated, as a parting Blow, they enter'd a Protest in their Books, which, tho' the Measure of a Party, and calculated to answer their own particular Views, had its Foundation in Truth and Reason, and deserves to be remembered, both as a Lesson and Warning to Posterity, viz.

We whose Names are under-written do humbly conceive, 1st, That it is according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of this Realm, that there should be frequent and new Parliaments; and that the Practice of several hundred Years hath been accordingly.

2<sup>dly</sup>, It seems not reasonable, that any particular Number of Men should, for many Years, engross so great a Trust of the People, as to be their Representatives in the House of Commons; and that all other the Gentry, and the Members of Corporations of the same Degree and Quality with them, should be so long excluded; neither, as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the Government, that the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, should be confined for so long a time to such Members as they have once chosen to serve for them; the mutual Correspondence and Interest of those who chuse, and are chosen, admitting great Variations in length of Time.

3<sup>dly</sup>, The long Continuance of any such, who are intrusted for others, and who have so great a Power over the Parle of the Nation, must, in our humble Opinion, naturally endanger the producing of Factions and Parties, and the carrying on particular Interests and Designs, rather than the public Good.

Buckingham, Shaftsbury, Dorset, Newport, Westmoreland, P. Wharton, Delamere, Grey de Ruliffen, Salisbury, Mordaunt, Stamford, H. Savile, Howard E. of Berks, Clarendon, Townshend, J. Bridgewater, F. Fauconberg, Halifax, Widdowes, Farquhar, Cressfield, William Petre.

Which were all the Lords who were in the House, early enough to set their Names, before the King came to prorogue the Parliament; which he did November the 22d, without a Speech, to the 15th of February Twelvemonth; that Time might extinguish those Flames, which his Majesty's Breath had only serv'd to heighten.

It ought here to be observ'd, that, however violent the Government continued in Scotland, it does not appear, that, since the Parliament had struck an Awe into the Court, the same arbitrary Spirit had been let loose in England: The Laws, for the general, had their Course; Justice was indifferently administer'd; whatever Influence the Ministers had in Parliament, it had not prov'd sufficient to sanctify any one Mischief, by the Concurrence of the Legislature: The Complaints of the Nation, at this immediate Crisis, were rather founded on strong Presumptions, than known Facts; but were, however, in part authoris'd by the King's Adherence to the Duke of Lauderdale. His Majesty

A.D. 1675. Majesty, also continued apparently in the Interest of France; and his Royal Highness as apparently in that of Rome. But tho' the Remembrance of what was past, and the Knowledge of what was then passing on the other Side of the Trench, afforded both Presence and Cause for the People's being on their Guard; it did not warrant them to clamour as loudly, as if the Fires were kindled in Smithfield, and every Individual was on the point of being suon à la mode de France.

Fear indeed always magnifies Danger; and the political Medium, thro' which they beheld every Object, was calculated to make it appear larger than the Life. The great Magician, who had contributed so powerfully to the raising the Storms, suffer'd no one Moment to escape, without some notable Endeavour to increase it. To say all in a word, Stowery had enter'd into the Herd; they were possess'd; and, provided they had their Courte, they regarded neither the Precipice, nor the Abyss beneath it.

When such is the Disposition of the People, it is undoubtedly Time for Governments to use Precautions: But such a Fatality waits on Power, that when it should pour in Balm, it has recourse to Cauterics: And when Ministers are under Terors of their own, they endeavour to remove them, by striking a Terror into the Public.

Thus, it having been found, that the several Proclamations to restrain the Subject from canvassing the Measures of the Court had fail'd of their Effect; and that they were treated not only with more Licence, but with more Bitterness, than ever, it was now thought advisable, by an Act of State, on December the 20th, to suppress and put down all Coffee-houses, as a Means to prevent the Communication of Slanders, said the Courtier; of Truth, said the Patriot: As if it was possible to remove the Effect, without removing the Cause: As if it was possible to extinguish the Light of Reason, or subside the Power of Reflection: As if the Ill Humours of a free People would ever want a Vent: Or, as if the very Markets would not have rung with Complaints, if all other Meetings had been prohibited, as long as the People either found, or fancy'd they had, Cause to make them.

In Matters of Opinion, it seems more natural to operate by Reason than Authority; and if the Prejudices of the Public were causeless, a plain, sensible Appeal to their Understandings would have been the most effectual Expedient to silence their Clamours, and pacify their Discontents.

Certain it is, this Measure had so much the Air of the Administration then domineering in Scotland, that it did his Majesty more Hurt than Good: The People in general complain'd of it; and their Leaders did not fail to make a proper Use of their Resentments: A Question even arose, whether it was (a) legal; and, after it was made public, the Judges were consulted, to know whether it was so or no; who, according to the laudable Art of Interpretation, found out Two things, to enable the Court to find out a Third, viz. That no body could retail Liquors without a Licence: And that the Sessions could refuse a Licence to whom they pleas'd: Ergo, What might be refused to any one Person might be refused to all; But such a total Prohibition was never once thought of, when the Act was made; which was Judges consulted as to the Legality of it.

(A) That the Reader may be Master of both Sides of the Question, Mr. North's Account of this Affair is here inserted verbatim.

“About this time, the Parties began to form a Method of propagating seditious Lies, and Misrepresentations of all the Government did; and it was ordered by certain Clubs, where the Lies, wherever at first invented, were delivered out, to be dispersed abroad, among all sorts of People, by the means of Coffee-houses; and, in the chief of them, Talkers and Ledger were appointed to attend, and vend the Commodity to all Comers gratis: And, by that means, the Coffee-houses began to be direct Seminars of Seditions, and Offices for the Disputing of Lying, and carried on to such a Degree of Inconvenience to the Public, as scarce any Government in the World would have endured. The Matter was considered at the Council: Many were of opinion, that a stop might be put, if his Majesty would use his Power, by prohibiting the licensing of any, and commanding the Licences, already granted, to be revok'd; all which might be done at once by a Proclamation. But, as the Use of that Time was, every thing, on the side of Government, was critic'd upon; and, if it was legal, yet many strove to make it look as if it were not: And, accordingly, Objections were made to the Legality of such a Proclamation; and the more, because Sir William Jones, then Attorney-General, being attack'd to the Faction, and a cautious Man, might be influenced not to justify it.

It was therefore thought fit, and ordered, that the Judges should attend; and all, that were to Tower, in Jan. 1675, did so. They were told, that some Doubts, in the Law, had arisen concerning the retailing Trade of Coffee, and concerning the Act 13 Car. II. whereupon their Opinions were asked upon these Questions: 1. If any Man may retail without a Licence? 2. If Licences might be denied at the Sessions? 3. If Licences were granted for a certain Term, by Order of Sessions, if they might be revok'd within the Time? And my Lord Chancellor propos'd these, as Questions to the Bar: 1. If the Sessions could grant Licences for Years? 2. If the chief Magistrate, or the Sessions, ought to grant Licences in Corporations? Upon this, the Judges desired Leave to withdraw; and, after they had conferred together, they returned; and it was answer'd, that they were all of Opinion, 1. That the Act prohibits generally; so none could retail without a Licence. 2. That the Sessions are not bound to grant to any that will ask, but may refuse any Person Licences at their Discretion; and that they did not find that the chief Magistrate, but only the Sessions, had Power to grant them. And, as to the other Doubts, they answer'd, they were not agreed in Opinion: So the King press'd them no farther.

Upon the Agitation of this Matter, the most reasonable Account, as might be collected, seem'd to be this: That this Licence being by Order of Sessions, and no Direction, nor Power, express'd in the Act, to grant for any certain Time, the Court ought to order Licences generally, and could not grant a Term in a Licence, whereby to provide a succeeding Court from dissolving the same. That it was not like the Case where Commissioners have Power, by 13 Car. II. to grant Wine Licences for Years; nor like Licences from the King, or any particular Person, that may conclude themselves, by granting for a Term; but here was a standing Fault in a Court, that had Power over its own Orders, which cannot be anticipated. And an Order of Licence a bar as a Rule of Court, and not like an Admittance or Judgment. It would be unreasonable, if Licences might not be revok'd till Question of Misdemeanor; for Parole ought to be prevent'd, and this might require Time. It was said, that the retailing Office might be in Immortal Trade, as it might be exercised; but, as it is used at present, in the Nature of a common Assembly, to discourse of Matters of State, News, and great Persons, as they are Narratives of Intelligence and Pragmatism, and under the Experience of our native Provisions, they might be thought as common Necessaries.

I give here the Deliberation had about this Affair of Coffee-houses, to show the Case used by the Government, as to what might be said; but then, whatever was done, legal or illegal, was made the Subject of Clamour.

was calculated only for the Improvement of the Excise: Nor doth the Clause in the Act which relates to the Licences, to be taken out by the Retailers of Coffee, &c. authorise even the Sessions to refuse them at discretion; but, on the contrary, specifies expressly the Condition of granting or refusing a Licence, to be no other than the giving good Security for the due Payment of their Dues to the King.

Estates at Large.

Eccles., p. 141.

The Conclusion of this Matter was, according to Mr. North, that, upon Application made by Petition of the Coffee-men, who promised to be wonderful good for the future, and to take care to prevent treasonable and seditious Talk in their Houses, the King receded, and let them go.

It is now time to resume the Thread of Foreign Affairs: And first, of the Progress of the Mediation: Concerning which the less shall be said here, because every Step of it may be so minutely traced in the Papers of Sir William Temple, and Sir Leslie Jenkins, which are in Print, and to be found, at least those of Sir William Temple, every where.

Nimeguen chosen for the Place of Conference. Temple's Memoirs, Part II.

Nimeguen had been, early in the preceding Year, agreed upon by all Parties, for the Place of Treaty: But there the Affair stopp'd again; the French refusing to send their Ministers thither, till the Emperor had given them Satisfaction on the two Points so long insisted upon; of Prince William of Furstenburgh's Liberty, and Restitution of the Morisy; seiz'd at Coler; and the Court of Vienna as obstinately refusing that Satisfaction; at least, by way of Preliminary, and consenting only to do so, when the Treaty should be concluded.

At last, however, an Expedient was found out to save the Honour of France, by the Bishop of Straßburg's making a formal Request to his most Christian Majesty, that no private Interests or Respects of his Brother might delay the Treaty of Peace: Which being easily comply'd with, all Europe began to hope that the Powers on both Sides were in earnest, when they talk'd of restoring the public Tranquility.

His Majesty of England, the Mediator, hereupon, invited all the Princes concern'd in the War, to send their Ministers to the Place of Congress, and order'd his own, (the Lord Berkeley, Sir W. Temple, and Sir L. Jenkins) to repair thither without delay.

But, notwithstanding these Appearances, how distant from the Prospect of Peace was, may be gather'd from the Prince of Orange's Answer to Sir William Temple, who ply'd him with his Majesty's Caution against rendering the Houle of Austria as much too powerful, as France was apprehended to be, viz. That it would be time to think of that, when they should go beyond the Peace of the Pyrennes: As also from his Conference with Sir Leslie Jenkins, upon his Arrival at the Hague: We, said he, Confederates, will insist to have France reduced to the said Peace of the Pyrennes; and France will pretend to keep all that it hath got: Sir Leslie objected the extreme Difficulty of reducing France by Force of Arms: The Prince reply'd, that a Battle, thoroughly won would effect it: Sir Leslie then represented to him, according to the Instructions he had receiv'd from his Majesty, the Opportunities which the French had of reinforcing their Army in Flanders, upon any Emergency, by throwing in the Household Troops; the Jealousies and Divisions incident to all Confederacies; and the true Season to make a Peace, when things appear'd not too far distant from a Balance: His Highness broke off with saying, that he did not see how these Extremes could be reconcil'd; and, consequently, that he saw but little Hopes of a Peace: And afterwards, in Railery, upon taking his Leave, that he would pray for the Peace-makers at Nimeguen.

Jenkins's Letters, vol. 2. p. 326. Conference between the Prince of Orange and Sir L. Jenkins.

Sir William Temple, moreover, receiv'd a Letter from Mr. Pomponne, the French Secretary for foreign Affairs, refusing Passage to the Couriers of the Allies, thro' the Dominions

Temple's Memoirs, P. II.

(i) Who was then Ambassador at Paris; and, during the whole Course of this long and intricate Negotiation, did not fluctuate above six Months; during which Interval, Sir William Temple says, his great Age and Infirmities suffer'd him to have but little Share in the Intrigues of it.

(k) Sir William Temple was already in Holland; and when Sir Leslie, in the King's Yacht, approach'd the Brill, such another Incident befel him, with respect to the Flag, as the Reader will find recounted in Note (c), p. 257, and of which his Excellency gave the following Account, dated 22 Nov. 1675-6, to Mr. Secretary Williamson.

The Captain was forc'd to make his Demand of the Respect due to his Majesty's Flag; and had it paid him, 'twas as I hope, that Point, upon this Coast, will admit of no farther Question. As to Matter of Fact, 'twas this: We being come within these Lands to the Pir, as they call them, below the Brill, the Dutch Pilot who had come on board, but as unexpectedly upon a French Man of War, that rid there as Anchor with his Pennant flying aloft: The Man of War gave us five Guns, but did not strike his Pennant: Hereupon Captain Fagel, after some serious Reflections upon his Order, instead of answering his Salute, gave him a Shot at thwarts his Forefoot, and, some time after, another over him; upon which he struck his Pennant. Somewhat farther, I must needs the Brill, and in the very Place where you and I, Sir, as we came back from Coler, had the Rencontre with the Spanish Man of War, that carry'd the Embassadors from hence to England, May 1674, there did ride another Man of War as Anchor, with his Pennant flying at the first; but he struck without more ado, and behaved in a like wise. Captain did he demand at all, for us to give the Captain the Trouble to demand it of him. I should not be just, if I did not give the Captain the Testimony he deserves in this Rencontre; he having behav'd himself with as much Caution on one side, and with Resoluteness on the other, as could possibly be expected from any Man on such an Occasion.

The Port at the Brill afterwards failed us with thirteen Guns; we answer'd them with five: They re-fail'd with thirteen again; we answer'd with three; and they closed with fifteen: Which the Spanish looks upon as extraordinary. (Sir L. Jenkins's Letters, vol. 1. p. 353.)

But, however excessive the Dutch were in their Accomplishments upon this Occasion, those Adventures of Sir Leslie's excite much Resentment in Holland; as appears by a Book soon after publish'd in that Country, in which his Majesty, says that Minister, was treated with barbarous, and more than hostile, Insolence; and, in which, both these Affairs are set down as Articles against him: Sir Leslie became likewise so apprehensive of the Consequences which they might produce, that, having some Reason to think he should be recalled towards the latter End of the next Month, February, he desir'd that some of his Majesty's Yachts, or ships, might be sent for him, but that he might be left to shift for himself; as being persuaded, that the Dutch would be on the watch to repair themselves upon him, 'twas being so loudly tenacious of the Honour of his Country.

nions of France, during the Congress; as also Passports to the Ministers of Lorraine, with the Style of Duke, which carry'd that of BROTHER, and pretending that Duchy belong'd to his most Christian Majesty, by the Treaty in 1662, between him and the last Duke.

This equally surpriz'd both the States and all the Allies. The French had never set up such a Claim before: Even when they had seiz'd upon that Duchy, they profess'd it was only to preserve the Peace of Christendom from the Practices of the late Duke, without any Intention of detaining any Part of it.

And as to the Treaty, Mr. Serinbamps, the Lorraine Envoy, alleg'd, that the last Duke had no Right to dispose of that Duchy from his Nephew; because, if the Salique Law had place in Lorraine, it was unalienable from the next Heir Male: If the Feminine Succession, then that Duke himself, had no Tide at all to it, but it belong'd to the present Duke even in the Life of his Uncle. Secondly, that the Treaty, if he had such Right, was invalid by the Non-performance of the French of the only Condition on their Side; upon which the old Duke pretended to have made it, which was, That the Princes of that Family should be admitted into the Rank of Princes of the Blood of France; and that, upon requiring that Treaty in the Parliament of Paris, without that Clause the old Duke had declar'd it void within three Weeks after it was made. And, thirdly, That another Treaty was concluded the Year after, being 1663, at Marsal, between the most Christian King and the said Duke, by which he was to enjoy all his Territories, as before the first Treaty; which he did accordingly, till the Year 1670, when they were seiz'd by France in the midst of a profound Peace, under the Profession of Argumentation.

These Arguments had such weight with all the Confederates, that they were unanimous and firm, in positively insisting upon the Passports of that Duke with the usual Forms; which was represented by his Majesty the Mediator, to France, but without Effect; and both Parties continuing peremptory, the Congress began to be look'd upon, from all Sides, as a thing ended before it began.

The Truth was, says Sir William Temple, That France had been forc'd to discover upon this Incident, That there were three Points for which she thought the War worth continuing to the last Extremity, which were, rather than restore Lorraine, or Burgundy, or leave a good Frontier on both sides the Spanish Territories in Flanders. The last would hinder the Progress of their great Design, whether of extending their Empire only to the Rhine, or beyond it; and the two first would hinder their Conquest of Flanders, whenever they pursued the finishing of that Adventure; by leaving a Passage to the Germans to relieve it; and that by so great and dangerous a Diversion as entering France thro' Lorraine or Burgundy.

Sir William further asserts, that his Magesty most certainly disapprov'd the Pretence of France to Lorraine, but yet acknowledges he was prevail'd upon by Mr. Rouvigny, to offer as an Expedient, that his Majesty, as Mediator, should give all the Passports necessary to the Congress, which, however, the Allies would not admit of; some refusing it with Heat, and Reflection on his Majesty's Partiality to France, and others with Sullenness and Silence referring themselves to new Orders from their Masters. Upon which the Congress grew wholly desperate, and all Parties prepared for the Field, without any other View for the three Months following the first rise of this Pretension.

We have already touch'd on a second Concert between his Catholic Majesty and the States, by the Junction of a Dutch Squadron under the Command of de Ruyter, with the Naval Forces of Spain. It was some time before the Close of the last Year that this Junction was made; and on the 7th of January, N. S. they fell in with the French Fleet, consisting of twenty-two Men of War, six Fireships, and two other Vessels, making, with a fair Wind and full Sail, for Sicily. The Engagement, however, did not commence till the next Morning; before which time the Wind freshen'd to such a degree, that the Spanish Gallies could not keep the Sea, and were oblig'd to take shelter in Lipari. This, no doubt, was a Disadvantage to the Allies; but de Ruyter was always in earnest, and scorn'd to make use of any Pretence to avoid doing his Duty. At nine o' Clock, therefore, he bore down upon the Enemy, who, under the Command of Mr. de Quésne, defended themselves so well, that the Action lasted till five in the Afternoon, and prov'd undecided at last; as to the Point of Honour, but not as to the Profit and Loss; for the French got safe to Messina, which it was their sole Business to fuccour; and the six Month's Concert between Spain and the States being expir'd, de Ruyter quitted the Service with his Squadron, and return'd to Leghorn; leaving the Spaniards both in Naples and Sicily under the greatest Difficulties and Distresses imaginable; as not having a Strength of their own sufficient to look the French in the Face. At Leghorn, however, he found an Order from his Masters, to co-operate with Spain for six Months more, which produced a third Junction of the two Fleets on the Coast of Sicily: And in Consequence thereof, a Project was form'd to lay Siege to Augusta, by Sea and Land. This was undertaken in Concert with the Spanish Viceroy, April 18th N. S. and three Days after, viz. the 22d, the French Navy quitted the Port of Messina to relieve the Place, by giving Battle to the Allies; the former being now augmented to thirty Sail of Men of War, seven Fireships, and some other small Vessels; and the latter amounting to scarce thirty Sail in all. As to the Order of the Line, the Dutch had the Van and Rear, and the Spaniards the Center. The Action was rather fierce than long, beginning at four in the Afternoon, and ending at seven. The Spaniards fired smartly, but at too great a Distance to do any great Execution. The Dutch began the Attack, and bore the Brunt of the Day, but were so warmly received, that they had three Ships disabled and tow'd out of the Line. The French, however, gave way first, and the Dutch having given them Chance for one Hour, had the Name of a Victory.

But how dearly did it cost them? de Ruyter, who had contributed no less to the Preservation of his Country by Sea, than the Prince of Orange by Land, here receiv'd a Wound in his left Heel by a Cannon Shot, the Anguish of which brought on a Fever, and within a Week put an End to his Life. He died at Syracuse in the seventy-first Year of his Age, as full of Honours as of Days, lamented by his Country, applauded by all Europe, and recorded by the ablest Pens, as an Example for Posterity.

It is with States as with Men, when they grow unfortunate, they grow choleric. The Dutch, finding themselves Sufferers in all their Adventures with the Spaniards, now broke out into open Complaints against them, accus'd them of not supplying Mr. de Ruyter according to their Engagements, and talk'd as if, under such Failures on one side, they were virtually discharged from all their Obligations on the other.

But tho' they clamour'd, they proceeded: The Chain was of too many Links to be easily broke; and their petty Actions serv'd but as a Prologue to the Tragedy that follow'd. On the 31st of May, N.S. the French Fleet, which was now form'd of twenty-eight Men of War, nine Fireships, and twenty-five Gallies, under the Duke de Vicenne, Commander in Chief, Mr. de Ruyter, and Mr. Galbaris, came in sight of Palermo; and the next Day, the allied Squadrons, which had repaired thither from Syracuse, after the last Engagement, appear'd without the Mole, in a Line, which was compos'd of twenty-seven Men of War, nineteen Gallies and four Fireships; having the Mole on their left, the Fortrets of Castle-Mare behind their Center, and the great Tower, and the Bastions of the Town on their Right. Their Disposition was good, and their Appearance formidable. But the Enemy had the Advantage of the Wind, which encouraged them to make the Attack, and the Dutch were fast at Anchor, which gave their Lieutenant to perceive, while it left them without Power either to meet, or avoid, Danger. It was not, however, till the second of June, that the Engagement began; when the Duke de Vicenne detach'd nine Men of War, seven Gallies, and five Fireships, to charge the Van of the Allies. Accordingly, being come within a Cable-length, they cast Anchor, and prepar'd to send in their Fireships among them, under the most terrible Fire they could make. The Allies on the other hand, defended themselves for a while, both firmly and bravely; but having the Smoke in their Eyes, and trusting too much to the (A) Forts and Bastions of Palermo, and dreading the Fireships, which were coming down full upon them, they, at length, cut their Cables, and endeavour'd to save themselves by running ashore. In this Disorder, three of their Men of War were burnt; and at the same Instant, the two other Divisions of the French Fleet, fell upon their Main-Body and Rear, where were the Admirals of Spain and Holland; the Cannons play'd furiously on both sides. The French were intrepid, the Allies desperate; But the Advantage of the Wind, and the Number and well Management of their Fireships, render'd the first irresistible. Two of the fastest upon the Admiral of Spain, and destroy'd him: Fearing the same Fate, the Spanish Vice-Admiral, and the Dutch Rear-Admiral cut their Cables and made for Shore, and were follow'd by seven more; but found it impossible to escape. Every one of them was on fire, as they lay; and, as if to complete the Horrors of the Spectacle, the four Dutch Fireships set fire to themselves, to avoid falling into the Hands of the Enemy. Scarce ever did War display a more astonishing Scene: The Wind blowing fresh, the Men of War and Fireships, burnt with incredible Fury: As their several Powder-Rooms blew up, Pieces of Cannon and huge Fragments of Ships were hurt'd flaming into the Air, which, in falling, either burnt or sunk six of the Spanish Gallies, kill'd and maim'd Numbers of Men, greatly damag'd the Ships in the Port, and even ruin'd several Houses in Palermo. In a word, This dreadful Disaster cost the Allies (B) twelve capital Men of War, besides their Gallies and Fireships, 700 Cannon; and 5000 Men; and what was still worse, render'd the French Lords of the Mediterranean; to the Amazement and Terror of all Europe, and the no less Reproach of both the Dutch and English, who had, in turn equally contributed to the rendering them a Maritime Power; tho' it was so apparently the Interest of both, that they never should be able to put a Ship to Sea.

As to the Fruits of this Victory, the Duke de Vicenne, contented himself with drawing Contributions of Provisions from Calabria, which he had long and grievously stood in need of; and with reducing Taurinina, St. Alexis, La Croci, Savona, and Scaletta. This was bad for Spain, but much worse was apprehended; that is to say, no less than a general Revolt both of Naples and Sicily. Almost at the same Instant, seditions had broke out at Naples, Palermo, Syracuse, and several other Places; and the Inhabitants of Naples had, in plain Terms, refus'd to assist the Viceroy with Money in any Proportion; tho' he besought it in the most earnest manner, and the Necessity of a Supply was self-evident, for the Re-establishment of the Fleet.

But when a Government is distemper'd in the Head, it is no wonder that it grows sick at Heart, or loses the use of its Limbs. The Different Circumstances of Spain and France, arising from Differences of Government.

Factions

(A) Which, according to some of the Dutch Accounts, never fired a Shot, tho' they acknowledge, that, during the Engagement, one of the Bastions blew up.

(B) Mr. de Mev mentions but Seven Men of War and Three Gallies.

A.D. 1676. Factions of the Queen Mother and Don John, kept the Court of Spain in a perpetual Ferment; each striving for the Dominion of the King, and neither caring what became of the King's Dominions. Hence that huge Body had neither Strength nor Spirit, and became alike the Prey of Rebel and Invader.

It was quite otherwise in France; Lewis, by shewing himself able to command, had made his Subjects believe it was their Duty to obey, without reserve; and by concentrating all their Affections in himself, induc'd them both to dare and suffer as much for his peculiar Glory, as the old Romans for that of the Commonwealth.

Since his declaring War with Holland, this was the fifth time that his Armies had followed him to the Field, not in their own Defence, nor to enrich themselves with the Spoils of the Enemy, or to carve themselves out Possessions and Lordships with their Swords; but purely and simply because it was his Will and Pleasure, and because they presum'd their Lives could not be better employ'd than in his Service. The late Insurrections of the miserable Populace had only serv'd to enlarge his Power, and establish his Authority: Unusual Taxes, and unusual Levies were now submitted to without a Murmur; and the Nod of the King gave the Law to his People. Hence his Treasury, his Magazines, and his Army were full; and he was able to form Sieges and reduce Towns, before the Confederates were ready to quit their Winter-Quarters.

But even this great Monarch was a Man, had both his Prejudices and Frailties, the Marquis de Louvois, his Favourite, had found them out, and, like other Favourites, so practis'd upon them, as to make them correspond with his own. The Prince of Condé was neither agreeable to King nor Minister; he had treated the one as a petty Clerk; and of the other, in the midst of his Triumphs over the Hollanders, he had said, That he had not the Soul of a Conqueror. These were Sins that no Services could expiate: Whether therefore it was thought, that he valued himself rather too much on his late Exploits in Flanders and Germany, or whether it was so represented, he was this Year laid aside, and the Marshal Duke de Luxembourg was appointed to command on the Rhine in his Room.

The Marshal de Lorge, who had so many Pretensions in the Right of his Great Uncle, Mr. de Turcotte, and whose own Merits pleas'd so strongly in his Favour, was laid aside likewise; at least he had no other Commission, than to follow the King to the Field, as a Volunteer; under the handsome Pretence that his Majesty would stand in need of his Councils during the Campaign. The same fine thing was said to the Marshal de Schomberg, upon his being recalled from his Command in Catalonia, in which he was succeeded by the Marshal de Navaille. And as to the unfortunate Mr. de Crequi, who was look'd upon as a lost Man, he was unexpectedly honour'd with the Charge of a separate Corps of fifteen thousand Men, with Orders to open the Campaign with the Siege of Condé. Of such Consequence he found it to have Mr. de Louvois for his Friend.

Condé was accordingly invested, April 17, N. S. by Mr. de Crequi: The 19th he was join'd by the Marshal de Humieres, who was returned from putting the County of Alst under Contribution: And the 21st the King himself accompany'd with the Duke of Orleans, arriv'd in the Camp: The same Day the Trenches were open'd; and tho' the Besieged had let go their Sluices and laid the Country under Water, so determin'd was his Majesty to prevent the Prince of Orange, who was coming to their Relief, that he order'd a general Assault to be made on the 26th; and after an obstinate Dispute, which lasted till Midnight, carry'd the Place by Storm.

The Siege of Bouchain follow'd immediately that of Condé. The Honour of this Exploit was given to the Duke of Orleans, who had a Detachment of 15000 Men under his Command; and the King with the Residue of his Army undertook to cover the Siege against the Prince of Orange and Duke de Villa Hermosa, who made their Approaches in all Haite with the Spanish and Dutch Forces, as if with a Resolution to give him Battle: But when both Armies fac'd each other, which was in an open Plain near Vauciennes, without Hedge or Ditch between; and made their several Dispositions, as if to engage, neither seem'd to care for the Engagement. The King was not over forward to risque his Glory, nor the Spaniards the Residue of Flanders, which they knew would be lost in Case they were defeated. In this manner the two Armies held each other at Bay for two Days together; and on the third Bouchain surrend'r'd; which was made known to the Allies, by a triple Discharge of the Arms and Artillery of the whole French Army.

The two Brothers of France having thus gather'd each his Sprig of Laurel, it was thought advisable to think of a fair Retreat, in order to give a new Bias to the Campaign. To do this with Honour and Safety, appear'd, however, to be a Matter of no small Difficulty; the Country lying quite open; the two Armies being of equal Strength, and that of the Enemy under the Command of an enterprizing General. And yet either so excellent was the Conduct of the French, or so admirable their Fortune, or so distracted the Councils of the Allies, that the two Armies separated without a Skirmish remarkable enough to deserve notice. The French decamp'd the 20th of May, and the Allies the Day after.

The most Christian King continued in the Field, after this, till the Beginning of July, but without engaging in any other considerable Enterprize: On the contrary, he directed his March into the Country of Alst, (which had now reason to curse its own Fertility) not to make Conquests, but merely for the better Accommodation of his Army. Here he detach'd one of his Adjutant-Marschals (de Lorge) to the Government of Lorraine. Mr. de Crequi, he sent with his Corps of 15,000 into Germany, either to amuse the Troops of Bunfler, Zell, and Osnabrug, or to reinforce the Duke of Luxemburg, as occasion should require. De Himieres he made Governor General of the new Conquests. De Schonberg had the Command of the Army. And having made this Disposition of his Forces, he returned with his Household Troops into France.

Siege of Philippsburg.

We must now follow the War into Germany; where a Resolution had, at last, been taken to lay siege to Philippsburg, which the Elector Palatine had so long solicited in vain. The Princes of Baden, Frederic and Herman, assisted by General Wertmiller with the Forces of the Circles, had the Charge of this Enterprize; while the Duke of Lorraine with the Army of the Emperor and the Empire, made it his Business to come to a Battle, if possible, with the Duke of Luxemburg, before he was reinforced by the Detachments he expected from Flanders. June 3. N. S. the two Armies came in sight of each other, and, as they were divided only by a little Brook, it was expected an Action would have ensued that very Day; but the Ground was so interlocked with Hedges and Ditches, that it would not admit of a proper Disposition on either Side. The Duke of Lorraine, therefore, shifted his Post the next Day in order to gain an Eminence, which lay between the French and Savoyne, from whence he had it in his Power to take them in Flank; This obliged the Marshal to make a Motion likewise to prevent him; so that the two Armies march'd in sight of each other, almost in parallel Lines. The Imperialists being first in Motion, had the Advantage of Ground; and, as the French were passing a hollow way which led up to the Hills, fell in with a great Part of their Left on their Rear; and, tho' the Marshal, who, expecting the Shock, was there in Person to sustain it, had endangered the whole Army, if Sir George Hamilton, with the English and Scottish Troops under his Command, had not stood like a Mountain against a Torrent, and render'd all their Efforts ineffectual; overthrowing the great Squadrons of Imperial Cuirassiers, and remaining themselves impenetrable. Sir George himself, however, was kill'd upon the Spot. And, tho' the French were thus sav'd a second time by these gallant Auxiliaries, the Duke of Lorraine found Means to post himself to advantageously, that with his Cannon he commanded the Enemy's Camp, and annoy'd them greatly: He also fir'd 3000 Shot into the Village of Savoyne, and probably had reduc'd the Marshal to great Extremities, or forced him to engage with all the Maxims of War against him, if he had not on the ninth of June received positive Orders from the Emperor, by the Marquis de Grana, to give over all his present Pursuits, and apply himself wholly and solely to the Reduction of Philippsburg; a Step which both surpriz'd and dissatisfy'd the States; and, which on the other hand, equally tally'd with the Interest and Inclinations of the German Princes.

Jenkins's Letters, vol. I. p. 427.

Upon this, the Duke immediately decamp'd; and taking the Road of Strasbourg, (which City still continued in the Interest of the Emperor) arriv'd in the Neighbourhood of Philippsburg on the 12th; where being inform'd that the Marshal de Luxemburg, having receiv'd a considerable Reinforcement, was advancing to throw some Succours into the Place, he repair'd the Rhine on the 15th, and took post at Green-Viesbourg, with a Resolution to observe there the Motions of the Enemy, and to regulate his own accordingly.

The Siege went on, and the two Armies continued thus attentive to each other, till the End of the Month; when the Marshal, having sent out a Detachment on the Side of the Sarre, with a View, as the Duke of Lorraine apprehended, to find a Passage by the Mountains into Philippsburg, his Highness decamp'd; and, after having dismantled the little Towns of Lauterbourg, Landau, and Wassenbourg, sat down again at Meebtersboym, within reach of Philippsburg itself.

The Marshal's next Scheme was to burn the Bridge of the Imperialists, by the means of certain Machines, which were to float down the Stream, under the Convoy of Boats, fill'd with Soldiers, and to operate in the manner of Fire-ships; But, to prevent this Mischief, the Duke had collected a Number of Carpenters, Smiths, and Watermen, from Spire; who, by means of Rafts, stored with Combustibles, laid the said Machines aboard, burn'd them before they could approach the Bridge, and routed and dispers'd their Convoy.

As his last Effort, finding it utterly impracticable to force the Duke in his Camp, the Marshal endeavour'd to throw a Reinforcement of five hundred Men into the Place, by water; but still with the same ill Success: They were intercepted in their Passage by the Imperialists, who drove them back to their Boats, almost as soon as they had set foot on shore: And, to throw the Marshal into utter Despair, his Army was visit'd with the Bloody-flux; which carry'd off almost as many as a Battle. This convinced him of the Necessity of abandoning Philippsburg to the Imperialists, and of compounding for the Preservation of the Residue of his Army; But tho' he decamp'd August the 10th, the Governor, du Fay, held out till the 9th of September following (being the Anniversary of his first falling into the Hands of the French, in the Year 1644) when he surrender'd the Place to the Imperialists; the Prince of Baden presenting him on the spot with a Sword set with Diamonds, in honour of his signal Bravery.

In the North, the Swedes had every day more and more Cause to repent their taking part in the Quarrel of France: By Sea, their Fleet was totally routed by Van Tromp, who had now enter'd into the Service of Denmark; And, by Land, they had totally lost the Duchy of Bremen; which was divided between the King of Denmark, the Duke of Lauenburg, and the Bishop of Munster: Besides sides all which, the Elector of Brandenburg was on the point of driving them out of Pomerania.

As to the Residue of the Campaign in Flanders, it was of a piece with the Commencement; that is to say, equally favourable to France, and mortifying to the Allies.

Taking advantage of the Retreat of his most Christian Majesty, the Prince of Orange, with a mixed Army of Dutch, English, and Germans, to the amount of about 26,000 Men, set down before Maftricht, July 9, N. S. The rest of the Allies were divided into two separate Corps, under the Command of the Duke de Villa Hermosa, and Count Waldeck. It having been agreed, that the First should find Employment for the Marshal de Camieres; and the Latter to post himself, as to be equally ready to join either the said Duke, or the Prince, according as Marshal Schomberg should direct his Motion, to overpower either the one or the other.

Wife as this Disposition seem'd in the Project, it did not answer in the Experiment: The Duke de Villa Hermosa was not strong enough to hinder Mr. de Camieres from making himself Master of Aire, Linct, and Overfleche; nor the Prince to carry Maftricht; nor Count Waldeck to hinder Mr. de Schomberg from marching thro' the Heart of the Spanish Netherlands to his Relief.

The Prince of Orange has been accus'd of not exerting himself with his usual Vigour in this Siege, because the Place, when reduc'd, was to be surrender'd to the Spaniards: But the very Gazettes of those Times bear witness, that he never underwent greater Fatigues, nor expos'd himself to more imminent Dangers, often continuing in the Trenches for whole Nights together; and Men seldom trifle, when both Life and Reputation are at stake: And, as he behav'd with the utmost Bravery himself, he was bravely supported, both by Officers and Soldiers; among whom (a) his three Regiments of English (the English were suffer'd to sacrifice themselves on both sides) distinguish'd themselves by an Intrepidity almost beyond Example: Having a separate Quarter assign'd them, at their own Request, and making their Attacks in a separate Body, that they might set an Example to the Army.

The Siege had lasted till the latter End of August; and many thousands of gallant Men had lost their Lives, on both Sides; when Mr. de Schomberg, (a) who had been reinforced by the Forces till then under the Command of the Marshal de Camieres, and the Cavalry from Charleville, which had been detach'd by Mr. de Crequi, advanced with all possible Speed to succour the Besieg'd; as did Count Waldeck, and the Duke de Villa Hermosa, to succour the Prince of Orange; the latter of whom had the French Army almost at his Heels.

Upon the Junction of the Allies, and the Approach of the Enemy, a Council of War was immediately held; wherein it was resolv'd, both to abandon the Siege, and avoid a Battle: Accordingly the necessary Orders were given to dismount the Batteries, draw off the Cannon, embark the Baggage, burn the Camp, and make the best Disposition to retire towards St. Tron. But before all this could be effected, and the Army put in Motion, the Besieg'd made a vigorous Sally, and, at the same time, the Marshal de Schomberg fell upon their Rear, tho' without doing any great Execution; and the Duke de Villeroy, and Mr. de Montal, took fifty of their Boats, in which were forty-six Pieces of Cannon, 7000 Muskets, a very great Quantity of Powder, and many of their sick and wounded Men. The Besiegers themselves left three Pieces of Cannon in their Trenches, set fire to many of their Boats and Carriages, threw great Quantities of Provisions into the River; and made it appear, that they were glad to make off, lest a worse thing should befall them.

And in this melancholy Manner ended the Campaign.

But tho' the War was carry'd on thus violently by all Parties, all affected to have nothing more at heart than a reasonable Peace: Even France herself, about the Middle of May, consented to grant the Passports to the Lorrain Ministers, in the Form, and with the Styles, demanded by the Allies, which she had till then so haughtily and peremptorily refused: And, early in June, her Embassadors, Colbert, d' Estrades, and d' Acaus, arriv'd at Nimwegen; the French, says Sir William Temple, desiring no better Peace, than upon the present Plan of Affairs; and hoping, by their Forwardness, and the great Backwardness of some of the Allies, to make way for some separate Treaties with those among them who began to be impatient for the Peace.

To divide was in truth their principal Aim: And, among such a Diversity of Interests, Claims, and Pretensions, it was natural and reasonable, that they should promise themselves Success.

The States had arm'd for Self-Preservation only. That Point was gain'd, and they desir'd no more. Spain and Germany, on the other hand, had stepp'd in to the Rescue of Holland, not only to prevent so vast an Access to the Dominions of France, but with a View to the forming such a Confederacy, as should enable them to retrieve their own Losses, and give the Law to that encroaching Power, for the time to come. This Point of Prospect seem'd as far off as "It is remarkable, that tho' his Highness did, afterwards, make use of Marshal Schomberg's Councils and Experience,

"in his Expedition into England, and in the Reduction of Ireland, yet he still had a secret Pique against that great General, for forcing him to retire from Maftricht."

at first; and the Defection of Holland would have put it for ever out of their Reach. To keep the Republic firm to her Engagements, was therefore the great Endeavour, on one side, and to detach it, the great Endeavour on the other: France row'd with the Stream; the Allies labour'd against it: What France sollicit, the Dutch passionately long'd for: War and Commerce are irreconcilable Enemies; and they found the one was in danger of being devoured by the other. On the other hand, all the Hold the Allies had on the Republic was, by the military Genius of the Prince of Orange, and his personal Prejudices against the most Christian King: And yet they gave his Highness perpetual Causes of Complaint; which the French Ministers never fail'd to make the most of: A Letter from General Caprara, full of Villanies, says Sir Leoline Jenkins, against his Highness, and Count Waldeck, had fallen into the Hands of his most Christian Majesty; who sent it to the Prince, with an Intimation, that he might, thereby, see what manner of Friends he was among: And Sir William Temple was no sooner come to Nimeguen, which was about the Middle of July, but Messieurs d'Esprades and Colbert, knowing his Foible, overwhelm'd him with Compliments, in the King their Master's Name, authoriz'd him to offer the Prince of Orange a Carte blanche for himself, if he would use his Authority with the Allies, to accept of such Terms as they should agree upon, and endeavour'd to dazzle his Excellency, not only with the Glory of having alone given a Peace to Christendom; but the more solid Consideration of his own Price, from the Generosity of the King their Master. Sir William had, however, the Grace to resist, tho' he speaks without Repentment of the Temptation: And as to the Prince, his Answer was truly heroic: "Let them find a Way of saving my Honour, by satisfying Spain, and no Concern of mine shall retard the Peace a Moment."

Temple's Memoirs, Part B.

While France was thus active, the Allies, who had set all their Hopes on the War, and who had accepted of the Mediation, rather as a Compliment to the Mediator, than either out of a Persuasion or with a Will that it would be effectual, delay'd the sending their Ministers to Nimeguen, as long as there was a Possibility of hindering the Dutch from proceeding without them. The King of England was manifestly in the Interest of France; they, the Spaniards at least, had taken care to secure a notable Interest both in his Parliament and People. Hence they reason'd, that if the French continued to be successful, their very Successes would compel his Majesty at last to obey his own Interests against his Inclinations; and if not, the Strength of the Confederates, as it now stood, would reduce them to their own Terms; which, as things were now circumstanced it would be downright Presumption to hope for by Treaty.

Tho' the French have been often over-power'd, they have been rarely outwitted: They discover the remotest Advantage; they foresee the smallest Difficulty; they have Expedients of all kinds in Series to remove the one; they have Refinements of all kinds to improve the other. Finding nothing was to be done separately with the Prince of Orange, they let their Emiliaries to work in Holland, with Offers of such a Regulation of Commerce as the Dutch should desire, the Restitution of Majstricht, and full Satisfaction for all the Claims and Losses of their Stadtholder. This occasion'd a general Clamour for Peace in every trading Town in Holland: And to raise it yet higher, they gave out at Nimeguen, towards the End of September, That the most Christian King, wearied out with the Delays on the Side of the Confederates, after so many Advancements, would recall his Ministers, unless those of the principal Powers, concern'd in the Congress, should repair thither within the Space of a Month.

The Dutch clamour for Peace.

Of this the States took the Advantage to declare, That they would enter upon the Treaty by themselves, if their Allies did not respectively dispatch their Ministers to the Congress, within the time limited by France. The Consequence was, that the Allies did indeed send Ministers, but not such as were either instructed or empowered to bring things to an Issue: In Reimbursement of which, the Dutch, both at the Hague and Nimeguen, not only complain'd publicly, that tho' the Allies had first enter'd into the War for the Defence of Holland, they now pursued it for their own separate Interest and Ambition, but declar'd, that the States would pay no Subsidies to their Allies the next Campaign, unless they would, by their fair and sincere Proceedings, make it evident, that they sought the Peace in earnest.

But notwithstanding all this, the very Powers of the Ministers upon the Spot, were not produced till the twenty-first of November; and even then, those of France were objected to by the Dutch, as containing Expressions, that were fitter for a Manifesto, than the Powers of a Treaty: In particular, one Passage asserted the War to be just in the Beginning, on the French Side, and necessary in the Continuance, which they deny'd, since all the World knew that France had begun the War without making any Pretensions, and might have had Peace whenever it pleas'd: And another ascrib'd to the most Christian King the Honour of naming Nimeguen as the Place of Treaty, and thereby of making the Overture for the Congress; which they said was not true, since the Merit of both belong'd to the King of England: Neither would they allow the Swedes to insinuate, that any Infraction of the Treaty of Westphalia, had either occasion'd or authoriz'd their drawing the Sword, and making a Diversion in favour of France in the North. On the other hand the Swedes and French started Doubts and Difficulties with respect to the Dutch Powers: And upon the whole, by way of Compromise, the mediating Ministers were desired to settle the Form which should be made use of by all Parties.

It is an obvious Remark, that all this Trifling and Artifice, shew'd very little regard gard to the Mediation: But this is the less to be wonder'd at, since the Mediator himself chose to take the Matter as low as possible; and instead of acting as an Arbitrer, which he might and ought to have done, to become a mere Vehicle or Channel of Conveyance of Demands and Replies from one Party to another. Indeed his express Refusal to act in any wise, jointly with the Pope (who had been received as a Mediator, not only by France, but some of the Allies) or to permit his Ministers to enter into any Commerce either of Visits or Conferences with his Nuncio, seems to have been the only Sign of Spirit and Independency which he shew'd during the whole Affair: And there is (p) Reason to think his Firmness on this head arose rather from the Temper of his People, than any Sentiment of his own. Had he known his own Strength, at least, had he resolv'd to exert it, it may be presum'd he would not have conniv'd at the Admission of any Power, that could not act as a joint Mediator with him, to enter upon the same Office on the same Ground, without, if not against, him; or suffer'd the Embassadors of England, to intermeddle in the Language of France, while those of the Pope claim'd it as their Privilege, and had it allow'd to them, to treat in their own.

Temple's
Ministry, Part ii.Conference of
Sir William Temple with the Prince of Orange and the Pensioner.

The Congress had gone no farther than Forms, at the Beginning of the Year 1677, when Sir William Temple made a Step to the Hague, at the Instance of the Prince of Orange; and in the first Conference which pass'd between them, his Highness acknowledged, That Peace was not only the Interest of the States, but absolutely necessary for them; and declar'd, That if his Majesty had a mind to make it, and would let him know freely the Conditions upon which he either desired or believed it might be made, he would endeavour to concert it the best he could with his Majesty, and that with all the Freedom and Sincereness in the World, so it might be with any Safety to his own Honour and the Interests of his Country.

Sir William's next Interview was with the Pensioner, who immediately unbosom'd the ill Condition of their Affairs, the Reasons they had to complain of their Allies, the Mismanagements of the last Year, his Apprehensions of the next, the good Terms they might have from France, and the Danger of refusing them. In particular, concerning England, he said, "That for his own Part, he had ever believ'd, that England itself would cry, Halt! at one Step or other that France was making; and that if we would be content to see half Flanders lost, yet we would not all, nor Sicily neither, for the Interest of our Trade in the Mediterranean. That the King had had the Peace in his Hands, for these two Years past, might have made it when he pleas'd, and upon such Conditions, as he should think fit, of Justice and Safety, to the rest of his Neighbours, as well as himself. That all Men knew France was not in a Condition to refuse whatever Terms his Majesty resolv'd on, or to venture a War with England, in Conjunction with the rest of the Allies. That the least Shew of it, if at all credited by France, was enough to make the Peace. That they had long represent'd all this in England by Mr. Van Beuninghen, and offer'd his Majesty to be the Arbitrer of it, and to fall into the Terms he should prescribe; but not a Word in answer; and all received with such a Coldness as never was; tho' other People thought we had reason to be a little more concern'd." From all which he concluded not only that a Peace was necessary; but even a separate Peace; since there was scarce any Prospect of obtaining any other.

In Sir William Temple's Collections, there is a Detail of both these Conferences, address'd to Mr. Secretary Willamson, together with his own Thoughts of the Crisis; and, at the same time, his Colleague, Sir Leoline Jenkins, discovered that what was talk'd of at the Hague, of a separate Peace, was actually in Agitation at Nimsugen. Of this likewise, our Court had immediate Information from both these Ministers; and the Result was, that Sir Leoline received Orders to protest publicly in his Majesty's Name against it; the Vanity of which Proceeding is very well expos'd by Sir William Temple, as tending only to irritate both Parties against England, and bind them faster to each other.

Sir William had likewise enlarg'd on the State of Holland, and the present Disposition of the Prince of Orange, to the King, as well as his Ministers; to which he received a long Answer from his Majesty's own Hand, complaining much of the Confederate Ministers in England caballing with Parliament Men, and raising all Mens Spirits as high against the Peace as they could; and that they had done it to such a Degree, as made it very difficult for him to make any Steps with France towards a general Peace, unless the Dutch Ambassador would first put in a Memorial, pressing his Majesty from the States to do it; and declaring, That without it they saw Flanders would be lost.

On communicating the Contents of the King's Letter to the Prince and Pensioner, Sir William press'd his Highness, both for Expedition's sake, and as a Proof of Confidence, to come to a thorough Explanation with his Majesty at once; and the Prince, after a Pause, agreed to do so, tho' he hinted he had many Reasons to influence him to the contrary. His Highness then propos'd, "That if the King had a mind to make a sudden Peace, he thought he must do it upon the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, which he would have the more Ground for, because it was a Peace he both made and warranted. That for Exchanges, he thought there should be no other propos'd upon it, but but only of Aeth and Charleroy, for Aire and St. Omer, which two last he thought imported a great deal more to France than the others, unless they would declare, that they intended to end this War with the Prospect of beginning another, by which they might get the rest of Flanders. That this was all needed pass between France and Spain; and for the Emperor and the States, that the first having taken Philippsburg from the French should rate it; and the French having taken Mastricht from the Dutch should rate it too; and so this whole War should pass like a Tempest which had blown over, after threatening much, and causing very little Alteration.

This hasty Sketch of an Accommodation, Sir William forwarded to the King, January 14; and in another Dispatch of the 22d, by the Prince's Direction, gave his Majesty farther to understand, that his Highness had had Reason given him to believe France would be content to give not only Charleroy, and Aeth, but Oudenarde and Courtray for Aire and St. Omer; and that he hop'd his Majesty would be so much a Friend to the Preservation of Flanders, as to manage this Discovery to the best Advantage; adding from the Pensionary, that France would farther expect that Sweden should be restored to all the bad lot.

In ten Days Sir William received the King's Answer, which he immediately communicated to the Prince. It consisted of two Parts; the first, an Offer of his Majesty's entering into the strongest defensive Alliance with the States, thereby to secure them from all Apprehensions of France, after the Peace should be made. The second contain'd his Majesty's Remarks rather than Conclusion or Judgment, upon the Terms proposed by the Prince for a Peace. That he believ'd it might be compass'd with France, upon the Exchange of Cambray, Aire, and St. Omer, for Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenarde, Coudé, and Bouchain. That this Scheme was what his Majesty thought possible to be obtain'd of France, tho' not what was to be wish'd.

The Prince's Countenance chang'd as Sir William read; and his first Remark was, That he must rather see than make such a Peace.

In discoursing of Particulars, having artfully enough distinguish'd the King, who had offer'd the Alliance under his own Hand, from his Secretary Williamson, who had dress'd up the Terms of a Peace, he fell upon the last with great Bitterness: Said, that it was treating him like a Child with sextet Cream: That since all had been before the foreign Committee, he knew very well it had been with the French Ambassador too, and that the Terms were his, and a great deal worse than they could have directly from France: That in plain Language they meant, that Spain must part with all Burgundy, Cambray, Aire, and St. Omer, which were of the Value of two other Provinces, in the Consequences of any War between France and Spain, and all for the five Towns mention'd: That if Flanders were left in that Posture, it could never be defended upon another Invasion, neither by Holland nor England itself: That he was so far of the Spaniards Mind, that if Flanders must be lost, it had better be so, by a War than a Peace: That whenever that was, Holland must fall into an absolute Dependence upon France; so that what his Majesty offer'd as to an Alliance with them, would be to no Purpose, for they would not be made the Stage of War after the Loss of Flanders, and wherein they were sure no Alliance of his Majesty, nor Forces neither, could defend them.

Having sent the Detail of this remarkable Conference to his Majesty, Sir William returned to Ninewagen, where he found that a secret Intelligence was grown between the French and Dutch Embassadors, which was manag'd by Mr. Olvecrantz the second Swedish Ambassador, and wholly apart from his Colleagues, whose Intervention had been only us'd when the Matter was first agreed between those Parties; and that Mr. Bewerking (the chief of the Dutch Ministers) drove on very violently towards a Peace, and with little regard of his Allies, saying, He had Orders from the States to push on the Business as far as it was possible.

So little Regard was paid to the Mediation! And in Truth, so little was it worth.

We now draw near a Session of Parliament; but there is still another Vein of the Transactions of the last Year, to be open'd, before we can proceed to those of the Legislature.

Ever since the Crown of England had been compelled by the Voice of the Parliament and People, to leave France to fight her own Battles, and to strike up a separate Peace with Holland, his most Christian Majesty had taken equal care to live well with the King, and to be avenged on his Subjects. For, over and above the high Duties which he had imposed on all the English Manufactures, which amounted almost to a Prohibition, he had let loose his Privateers to prey on their Commerce, which they did in so flagrant a manner, that the Depredations of the French on the English, was the common Talk of the Times.

The Pretences they urg'd, and the Excuses they made, were, That their Enemies traded under the English Flag, embarr'd their Wares in English Bottoms, carry'd on their Navigation with English Seamen, and gave out Commissions military to English Subjects. Complaints of this nature were even made to the Court of England, and met with such Regard, that we find them, in part, adopt'd by a Royal Proclamation, bearing Date May the 17th, 1676, which sets out with an Acknowledgment, that Complaints had been made to his Majesty by the Ministers of several Princes and States, with whom he was in Amity; that divers of his Subjects had lately taken military Commissions from certain other Princes and States, with whom he was also in Amity; and afterwards strictly prohibited all Persons whatsoever from taking any such Commissions, or making use of any they had already taken, upon pain of being punish'd with the utmost Severity of Law and Justice.

which prove dissatisfactory to the Prince of Orange.

The whole Herd of Merchants and Mariners are not spotless, any more than Ministers: The desperate Adventurer for Gain is more apt to regard the End than the Means; and those who have not Property to risque will make merchandise, not only of their Characters, but their Lives. It is not unnatural, therefore, to suppose, that some of these did actually give occasion for these Complaints, and furnish out some Colour for Reprimands, of the same, or the like Nature. But then again, there is Reason to conclude, that the French had recourse to these rapacious Practices first: so early as June 1674, there is a Record of their seizing two English Ketches, bound from London to Spain; which serv'd as a Precedent for many more of the like Outrages, in the Course of that Year: And, from that time forward, they both continued their Piracies, and carry'd them to such a Height, that, in the Year 1676, they made prize of the English Ships, almost in the (9) English Harbours. This was so loudly complain'd of, by the Sufferers, and became so notoriously known to, and was so highly resent'd by, the whole Nation, that the Government, partial as it was to France, could connive at it no longer.

Gazette, Numb. 1101.

June the 2d, another Proclamation was, therefore, issued, which first avow'd, that the Security of Navigation and Commerce, to and from his Majesty's Ports, had (in that Time of War) been very much disturb'd; and that even the Reverence due to his Ports had been violated; and, then proceeds to set forth Seven Rules and Ordinances, which it was his Majesty's Will and Pleasure should be obey'd. The first declar'd, that all Ships, of all Nations, in his Majesty's Ports, should be under his Majesty's special Protection: The Ships and Goods of all Offenders to be, ipso facto, confiscated: And the second directed, that all his Majesty's Officers and Subjects should prohibit the roving of Men of War to near his Majesty's Ports or Coasts, as to give apprehension to Merchantmen, or hinder the Commerce of his Subjects: As also, that they should succour and rescue all such Merchantmen, and others, as should be attack'd upon his Majesty's Coasts, and apprehend and seize the Offenders, in order to the bringing them to condign Punishment:

But then, the fourth command'd the proper Officers to visit all Ships, and Vessels belonging to his Majesty's Subjects; and, if they had ground to suspect, that they were design'd for any other than trading or fishing Voyages, to detain them till farther Orders: And the seventh forbid all his Subjects to enter into the martial Service of any foreign Prince or State; and recalled all such as were already enter'd, on penalty of being apprehended, and sent to the next Gaol, if they should ever after come into his Majesty's Dominions: So that this Instrument seems to have been equally calculated to satisfy Complaints from abroad, and silence Clamours at home.

But there still remains behind a more solemn State of the whole Case, which deserves to be brought forward, to shew how highly the French had trespass'd, how severely the Commerce of England suffer'd, and how much his Majesty could forgive.

August the 4th, the Lords of the Committee of Trade presented to the King, in Council, a Report touching the Injuries which his Subjects had receiv'd from the French; in which they set forth, That a Petition had been presented to his Majesty in Council, on the 31st of May, in the Name of all the Merchants of London, and other Places, signifying, that the Ships and Goods of his Subjects, tho' mann'd according to the Act of Navigation, and furnish'd with all necessary Palses, were daily seiz'd: That the Delay and Charge of Prosecutions in France devour'd half the Value of their Effects, even when they carry'd their Cause: That of Privateers no Reparation could be got; which induced them to seize on all they met, and perpetually molest the Navigation of his Subjects: And that they implor'd his Majesty's Protection, and Relief.

Their Lordships then observ'd, that his Majesty had, hereupon, been pleas'd to issue his Command, that certain Frigates should be appointed to clear the Coast of these Privateers, to seize them, and bring such as had offended to make Restitution: As also, that the Committee of Trade should prepare a State of the Cases and Complaints depending, that such of them as were of Weight and Merit might be fitted to receive his most gracious Report of the Lords of the Committee of Trade thereon. State Tracts temp. Car. II. Vol. 1.

(9) For Instance

February 25, 1676. The John and Elizabeth, English built, Thomas Roper Master and Part-owner, six Mariners all English, John Smith, Edward Smith of Rye, and the Master, all Subjects of his Majesty, Owners of the Cargo: She was in her Course from Rye to Rotterdam, in December 1675, seized, within Pilot Boat of Dover-Pier, by Nicholas Boffel, a French Capen, the Master was shot, and one of the Men that belonged to the Boat, for no other Reason than not striking the Top-sail, so the Capen hath been commisd by the Judge of the Admiralty, in March last.

May 20th, and June 20th, 1676. The Elizabeth of London, English built; Barthen about 80 Tuns, John Razzoer Master, instructed with Englishmen, having a Pass from the Lords of the Admiralty, and a Post-Pass from Dover, being laden with Merchandise at the Procurator, partly on the account of Abraham Chapman of London Merchant, and the rest his English and Portuguese, and bound for Amsterdam, was seized by the Chevalier de Bonnavent, a French Capen, on the 14th of May, near Portland, and carried into Chesham, where the Master hath been ill used, and the Ship and Goods threaten'd to be confiscat.

June 21st, 1676. The James of London, a free Ship, John Williamson Master, the Owners all English, manned with 12 English and two Strangers, with a Pass from the Lords of the Admiralty, and other necessary Permissions, Shes and laden with Salt and Bristol, and coming to London, was, on the 20th of May, within Gunshot of Dover-Castle, seized, and carried into Calais, the ship run a-ground, the Deck broke, and Men aboard, and their Papers taken away.

June 28th, 1676. The Peace of Dublin, George Advertiser Master, belonging to William York and Andrew Terry, his Majesty's Subjects, and by them laden at Garvey in Ireland, with raw Hides, Tallow, Leather, and other things, of the Growth of that Country, consign'd to William Eaton of Dover Merchant: Had Bills of Lading, Sea-brief, and other necessary Papers aboard, yet, in March last, was, near Dover, seized by Captain William Brown, Captain Peter Fermill, and Secret Longboats: She is carried into Deal, to the Owners Decrement of 1000 l. and the Ship's Company were thript, plunder'd, and exceedingly abus'd, by the said Brown. gracious Recommendation for Relief; and collect the Number of Seizures, that his Majesty might know what Hardships his Subjects had undergone, and what Justice France had administered.

That, in obedience to his Command, they had annex'd a List of Seizures, to the Number of Fifty-three; together with the Cases of those who had repair'd to his Majesty for Relief; which, from that very Circumstance, might be suppos'd to have Justice on their side, and likewise to infer a Suspicion of great Hardship in the Method of Redress. They added, that the Number of Captures was no small Proof of the Facility of Condemnation: That all the Instances of Redress, which had come to their Knowledge, were no more than Seven: And that in the midst of their Prosecution of this Affair, they had receiv'd a Paper from Mr. Secretary Coventry, who had receiv'd it from Mr. Courtin, the French Ambassador, being an Extract of a Letter from Mr. Colbert to Mr. de Pomponne, dated June the 20th, 1676, and containing a Justification of the French Proceedings; the principal Part of which was as follows:

"In giving Judgment, all Vessels which have any Appearance of being English, are releas'd, and very often, and almost always, although we are satisfy'd that the Ships are Dutch, yet they are releas'd because there is some Appearance of their being English; and every thing is judg'd favourably for that Nation: And it is true, that all Ships that are taken are of Dutch Built; that they never were in England; that the Masters, and all the Equipage are Dutch; that the Documents are for Persons unknown, and which are not oftentimes so much as named; that they carry with them only some Sea-briels from Waterford, or some other Town of Ireland or Scotland; that the whole Ship's Company depose, they were sent to Holland; that we have found on board three or four Vessels, Bills of Accompts, by which is seen the English take two, three or four per Cent. for owning of Ships; and altho' it is impossible to avoid confiscating them, yet these are the Ships which make such a Noise in England."

Their Lordships then, by way of Remark on this Paper, proceeded to declare, That their Sentiments of the Justice and Lenity of the French were widely different from that Representation; that, as they understood the Case, many of the English Mariners, who had been carried into the Ports of France, had met with ill Treatment, and some with Torment; that their Papers were seiz'd, and they themselves confin'd, till all the Depositions were prepar'd; that the said Depositions being sent to the Privy Council at Sr. Germans, Judgment was definitively given; that seldom any Reasons for Condemnation were mentioned in the Decree; and never any Appeal or Revision was admitted (r).

As to the other Part of the Paper, which contain'd such harsh Imputations on the English Traders, their Lordships besought his Majesty to cast his Eye on the List they then presented, to examine, whether all the Ships taken were Dutch built? Whether all were such as had never been in England? Whether all the Masters and Mariners were Dutch? Whether, in the whole List there was more than one Ship from Waterford; or six from the rest of Ireland? From Scotland not one. Whether it was credible, that all the Ships Companies should swear, they were sent to Holland, when so many were taken even coming from Holland? Adding, "Your Majesty may see how many Ships in the List are English built, taken with English Colours, English Mariners, English Owners, some of them knows to your Majesty, and to whom the best Papers your Majesty, or your Ministers can sign, or the Treaties do require, are given; but all in vain: So that if the Case be, in the general, quite different from what, in the general, is represented; we hope it will be no Crime, for your Majesty's Subjects to make some Noise in England, when they are hurt, when they see their Goods taken from them by Violence, and that Violence rather justify'd than redress'd by Law."

Their Lordships then took occasion to touch on the Licence given by his Majesty to his Subjects, to supply their great Loss of trading Ships, during the late War, by the Purchase of foreign Vessels, that they might the more immediately enter on the extensive Commerce, which was open'd to them by

(r) They added after this:

"That the Methods of your Majesty's Clemency and Justice, on like Occasions, have been far otherwise. And we appeal to the present Ambassador Monsieur Courtin, if almost in all Cases, that be or any other of the Ambassador thought fit to own (when his Excellency was here before, and your Majesty in War with Holland, seizing many Ships as Prize, and under great Suspicion claimed by the French) whether it were not very customary to have a short Reference, and a summary Examination of all Papers by the Judge of the Admiralty, in his Chamber; and that if any things appeared in the Case, whether the Ships were not immediately releas'd, without Law, Charge, or Delay? And 'twill not be out of Season, we hope, to annex herewith the Copy of an Order of the 22d of July 1675, signed by the then Lords Commissioners of Prizes, where it will appear, that Eighteen French Ships (which were laden with Wine and Brandy) being at Dover, and detained as Prize, were all English, by one Order, discharged, without any Law, or even the Ceremony of the Judge Examination, being singly on the Credit of the Ambassador's Word, affirming that they belonged unto the French.

And as for the Matter of Rescues or Appeals, after Sentence in the Court of Admiralty here; we know his Excellency will also remember, that never any Man was deny'd his Liberty there; but, on the contrary, your Majesty gave a standing Commission for Appeals in all Cases of Prize, and filed it with the Lords of your Council only, that every Case might receive a candid as well as unquestionable Determination.

We might also put your Majesty in mind, that, during the whole Term of your late League with France, whatsoever any French Ships were seized by the Hollanders, and afterwards retain'd by his Majesty's Frigates, such French Ships were always return'd on Demand, no Consideration being had of the Time they were in possession with the Hollanders, whether a Month, two, or three, as sometimes they were; and when the French Owner, as it hath happen'd, knew not of such retaking, but that the Ship was, according to Law, condemn'd to your Majesty, and sold with other Prizes, yet the Claimer appearing, your Majesty hath order'd the Money and Product of the Ships to be rais'd unto him.

Such various Methods of Justice and Clemency might have entitl'd your Majesty to a different Acknowledgment, and more advantageous Effect."

A. D. 1676. Peace; and concluded in these significant Words: "Wherefore, considering that the Root of all this Disorder arises from the Violence and Rapine of the French Capers, who ought to be looked on as Disturbers of the public Quiet, and Enemies to the good Friendship between the two Crowns, we are humbly of Opinion, That your Majesty has just Occasion from the Injuries past, and those which are now depending, and which do every Day increase, to make a very serious Representation of all unto his most Christian Majesty; and not only press for some better Method of repairing the Grievances mentioned, but earnestly to insist on the calling in of all Privateers, or else your Majesty shall do Right, and give Defence to your Subjects from all the Injustices which they so frequently meet."

Order'd to be transmitted to France.

This important Report was sign'd, Frédéric C. Anglé, Bridgwater, Bath, Craven, the Countess, J. Féné, G. Carteret, Robert Earl of Seel. The King himself gave it his Approbation, order'd a Copy of it to be transmitted to his Ambassador at Paris, and another to be given to the French Ambassador here; with whom Mr. Secretary Coventry was also directed to expostulate upon all these Injustices, and the little Remedy given to his Majesty's Subjects, either on the Merit of their respective Cases, or the Recommendation of his Majesty; that to his Excellency being made sensible of his Majesty's Dissatisfaction, and the reasonable Dissent of his Subjects, the King his Master might from him receive suitable Imprecations of both, and be disposed to remove the Evils complain'd of, and grant the Satisfaction desired.

French Capers seiz'd, by way of Reprisal.

Moreover, in this very Month of August, while the Report of the Lords of Trade was under Deliberation at the Court of France, the King's Ships actually seiz'd four of the French Cruizers; of which public Notice was given in the Gazette, that such as had been seiz'd by them, might bring in their Complaints, in order to obtain Redress.

But neither this Step which seem'd to be an Advance towards the making Reprisals, nor the lively Remonstrance we have just spoken of had any Effect. The Privateers continued their Depredations as before; and the Merchants became liable to a new Oppression, in Consequence of an Ordinance set forth by his most Christian Majesty, requiring all foreign Ships, which came into his Ports, to furnish themselves with Passports from him; without which, they were to understand, there was no Protection.

An Imposition of so extraordinary a nature, which either subjected the Merchants to Excursions on Shore, or Piracies at Sea, both redoubled their Retirements and Complaints. In the Beginning of October, they again presented themselves at Court, to display their Grievances a-new, and again solicit his Majesty's Interposition in their Favour.

Upon this one Mr. Brisbane was dispatch'd to Paris, in the capacity of Agent for the suffering Commerce of England; but, says Mr. du Mans, met with an indifferent Reception at first: The Scarcity of Money in France at that time, obliging the King to connive at almost every Expedient that contributed to replenish his Coffers.

When Brisbane went over, Sir Ellis Leighton, who had been Secretary to the Earl of Berkeley, and who had been charg'd with the Concerns of the Merchants, was recall'd; and upon his Return, was order'd Prisoner to the Tower, for having taken Bribes on both sides; of the Sufferers, to undertake their Suit, and of the Privateers, not to appear against them. He made a Shift, however, to make his Escape from the Messenger who had him in Custody; and, except by a Proclamation offering 100*l.* for apprehending him, we hear no more either of his Crimes or of his Punishment.

In the mean time, Brisbane's labour'd so effectually at Paris, and the Relentsments of the People were so violent at London (of which, no, doubt, all imaginable Advantage was taken by the Intriguers in the Opposition) that, before the Middle of November, his most Christian Majesty was pleas'd to issue another (2) Ordinance, strictly forbidding all Captains of Men of War or Privateers, to stop or detain any English, Scottish or Irish Vessels, furnished with the Passports of the King of Great Britain, or his Admiralty, &c. on pain of being punish'd according to the Rigour of the Law: Nay, so necessary was it become to do something extraordinary to allay the Wrath of England, that, it being made appear by Mr. Brisbane, that not only certain Privateers had violated his Majesty's Edict, but that some of his Judges, particularly the Balliv of Cherbourg and his Brother the Chevalier de Beaumont, had presum'd to condemn the Prizes by them so insolently as well as unjustly seiz'd (on the Supposition, perhaps, that the said Edict, had either been extorted from him, or had been issued only for Form's sake) his Majesty caus'd them to be proceeded against as capital Offenders; the former being hang'd at Caen, and the latter behead'd in Estifly.

But neither did this Example, severe as it was, put a (T) stop to the Rapine on one hand,

(1) This Instrument had the following artificial Preamble: "His Majesty being inform'd of divers Complaints, made by the English, Scots, and Irish, that their Vessels are stopp'd on their Voyages, and brought into the Ports of this Kingdom, on divers Pretexts, &c. And that, since they do obtain the Privilege of their Ships, &c."

(2) Mr. Morant, in his Sketches of Papers, upon what Authority I know not, enlarges on this Subject, as follows: "And yet, all this while that they made their intolerable and barbarous Practices and Depredations upon his Majesty's Subjects, from hence they were more diligently than ever supplied with Decrees, and those that would go voluntarily into the French Service were encouraged; others, that would not, pressed, imprisoned, and carried over by main Force and Coercion, even to the Parliament here was ready to let them pass, notwithstanding all their former frequent Appearances to the contrary; And his Majesty's Magazines were daily emptied, to furnish the French with all sorts of Ammunition, of which the following Note contains but a small Parcel, in comparison of what was daily convey'd away, under colour of Cooks for Torrey, and other Places."

(3) Mr. Morant, in his Sketches of Papers, upon what Authority I know not, enlarges on this Subject, as follows: "And yet, all this while that they made their intolerable and barbarous Practices and Depredations upon his Majesty's Subjects, from hence they were more diligently than ever supplied with Decrees, and those that would go voluntarily into the French Service were encouraged; others, that would not, pressed, imprisoned, and carried over by main Force and Coercion, even to the Parliament here was ready to let them pass, notwithstanding all their former frequent Appearances to the contrary; And his Majesty's Magazines were daily emptied, to furnish the French with all sorts of Ammunition, of which the following Note contains but a small Parcel, in comparison of what was daily convey'd away, under colour of Cooks for Torrey, and other Places."

Jenkins's Letters, vol. 1. p. 392.

1676-7. French King appears his March for Flanders, the Day the Parliament met.

It is even observ'd by Mr. Marvel, of the Authority of our own Gazettes, that, on the 5th of February, the very Day the Session was to be open'd, the French King appointed his March for Flanders; as if, says he, his Motions were in just Cadence; and that, as in a grand Ballet, he kept time with those that were tuned here to his Measure; and he thought it a becoming Gallantry to take the rest of Flanders, our natural Outwork, in the very Face of the King of England, and his petites Maistries of Parliament.

The Interest of Success.

The King's Speech to the two Houses, upon this Occasion, was extremely plausible; for, after alluding to the late Differences between the two Houses, as the Cause of so long a Prorogation, his Majesty declar'd, he came prepar'd to give them all the Satisfaction and Security, in the great Concerns of the Protestant Religion, as establish'd in the Church of England, that should be reasonably ask'd, or could consist with Christian Prudence: As likewise, what farther Security for their Liberty and Property, by as many good Laws, as they should propose, or could consist with the Safety of the Government.

Having proceeded thus far, by way of Sweetener, his Majesty caution'd them to avoid all Causes of Difference between the two Houses; and made a sort of Appeal to all Men, who was most for arbitrary Government, they that fomented such Differences as tended to dissolve all Parliaments, or he that would preserve all Parliaments from being made useless by such Dissentions.

His Majesty then desir'd them to consider the Necessity of building more Ships; to continue farther the additional Excise (which was to expire June the 24th, 1677); and to grant him some reasonable Supply, to make his Condition more easy.

What the King had said to well, the Lord Chancellor, as usual, spoil'd it, by framing to do it better; and, had not the (u) Lord Treasurer us'd a far more effectual Way of Persuasion with the Commons, there had been the same Danger of the ill Success of this Meeting, as of those before.

But, instead of entering upon Business, as usual, a Question was started in each House, whether they had any Right to enter upon Business at all? in short, whether they were a Parliament?

A Motion to extraordinary, it may be presum'd, took its rise from Motives and Views as extraordinary. The French Party had carry'd their Point the second time, by putting a sudden Period to one Session, and throwing the next so forward into the Season of Action, as gave the most Christian King time to take the Field, before they could take a Resolution: And the Dutch (Party) by way of Revenge, were willing to disappoint their Adversaries

A Short Account of some Ammunition, &c. reported from the Port of London to France, from June 1675, to June 1677.

Gravelles without number, burnt off under the colour of sawdust Iron.

Lead Shot	—	Tuns.
Gun powder	—	Barrels.
Iron Shot	—	Tuns. — 600 Weight.
Musk	—	Tuns. — 1000 Weight.
Iron Ordnance	—	Quantity, 292 Tuns, — 500 Weight.
Carriages, Bombards, Pikes, &c.	uncertain.

This was the French King to be justify'd, for undoing us by Sea, with contributing all that we could raise and send of Men or Ammunition, at Land, to make him more potent by both, and more formidable.

(u) Concerning his Majesty's Applications to Members, Sir John Royle left us the following Memorial, which, whether it contains the whole Truth, or not, let the understanding read impartially judge.

Being in my Capacity in the Country, I do honor return'd to London, that my Lord Treasurer did to speak with me. I would on this therefore, and found him very open in his Discourse upon several Subjects, but for the most part intending that his Countrymen would not allow him an Opportunity to be of Service to them with the King, and making many Propositions that the Jealousies of those who submit themselves to the Country Party, were entirely groundless and without Foundation: That to his certain Knowledge, the King must be other than to preserve the Religion and Government by Law established; and, upon the whole, wish'd that neither himself or his Majesty might prosper, if he did not speak what he really believed: That if the Government was in any Danger, it was most from those who pretended such a mighty Zeal for it; but who under that Appearance were endeavoring to create such Differences between the King and the Nation, as might produce Confusion in the King, and insisted me to be careful how I embarked myself with that sort of People. My Reply was, That I hoped I was not one to be wilfully misled; that I should have no Role to go by in that House but my Reason and Conscience, and that so I could be of no particular Faction or Party. That as much as I yet understand of the Duty of a Member of the House of Commons at this time, I engaged to me a Moderation between the two Extremes, and to have an equal Regard for the Preservative of the Kingdom and the Liberty of the Subject.

True it is, till now, that the Treasurer us'd such solemn Allegations, with regard to the King's good Intention, and pretty clearly convinced me that some of the Objects of the Country Party had much at Heart, their own private Interest, whenever they insisted in Favour and Defence of the Public, that I had great Notion of the Truth and Sincerity of the Country Party. p. 36, 37. And again, p. 45. The Session had gone on smoothly and industriously through in both Houses; my Lord Treasurer having, to order'd it, that the King's Party's business, rather than the other, but it was much fear'd, that some Vices were obtain'd more by Purchase than Affection.

Marvel's Growth of Power.

Lord's Debate on the Resolves, Whether the Parliament was dissolved.

A.D. 1676-7. Adversaries of their After-game, of Supplies; which, they knew, neither could nor would be employ'd in their Service.

Could the Parliament have been induced to pronounce their own Sentence, and to lay violent Hands on themselves, this End of theirs had been effectually answer'd: And not only all possible Pains had been taken, by Writings and Pamphlets, to persuade them that it was their Duty to do so; but great Numbers of People attended, on the first Day of their Meeting, to buck these printed Arguments with their earnest Intreaties, that they might have the Pleasure of seeing the Execution perform'd.

Perhaps this is stating the Matter somewhat too ludicrously: And to make the Reader amends, he shall have the Merits of the Case out of the Duke of Buckingham's own Mouth, who had the Courage to bring the Affair first before the House of Lords. His Words were these:

"The Ground of this Opinion of mine [that there was then no Parliament] is taken from the ancient and unquestionable Statutes of this Realm, and give me leave to tell your Lordships, by the way, that Statutes are not like Women; for they are not one jot the worse for being old. The first Statute that I shall take notice of is, that in the 4th Year of Edward III. chap. 14, thus set down in the printed Book: Item, It is accorded, that a Parliament shall be holden every Year once, and more often if need be. Now, tho' these Words are as plain as a Pike-staff, and no Man living, that is not a Scholar, could possibly mistake the Meaning of them; yet the Grammarians of those Days did make a shift to explain, that the Words, if need be, did relate as well to the Words, every Year once, as to the Words, more often; and so, by this grammatical Whimsey of theirs, have made this Statute to signify just nothing at all. For this Reason, my Lords, in the 36th Year of the same King's Reign, a new Act of Parliament was made, in which those unfortunate Words, if need be, are left out, and that Act of Parliament relating to Magna Charta, and other Statutes, made for the public Good. Item, For Maintenance of these Articles and Statutes, and the Redress of divers Mischiefes and Grievances, which daily happen, a Parliament shall be holden every Year, as at other time was ordained by another Statute. Here now, my Lords, there is not left the least Colour or Shadow for Mistake; for it is plainly declar'd, that the Kings of England must call a Parliament once within a Year: And the Reasons why they are bound to do so are as plainly set down, namely, for the Maintenance of Magna Charta, and other Statutes of the same Importance, and for preventing the Mischiefes and Grievances which daily happen.

The Question then remaineth, Whether these Statutes have been since repealed by any other Statutes, or no? The only Statutes I ever heard mentioned for that are, the two Triennial Bills; the one made in the last King's, and the other in this King's, Reign. The Triennial Bill, in the last King's Reign, was made for the Confirmation of the two above-mentioned Statutes of Edward III. For Parliaments having been omitted to be called every Year, according to those Statutes, a Statute was made in the last King's Reign to this purpose: That, if the King should fail of calling a Parliament, according to the Statutes of Edward III. then, the third Year, the People should meet of themselves, without any Writs at all, and chuse their Parliament-men. This Way of the People's chusing their Parliament of themselves, being thought disrespectful to the King, a Statute was made in this last Parliament, which repealed the Triennial Bill; and, after the repealing Clause (which took notice only of the Triennial Bill, made in the last King's Reign) there was in this Statute a Paragraph to this purpose: That, because, by the ancient Statutes of the Realm, made in the Reign of Edward III. Parliaments are to be held every often, it should be enacted, that within three Years after the Determination of that present Parliament, Parliaments should be holden oftener, if need required. There have been several half-kind of Arguments drawn out of these Triennial Bills, against the Statutes of Edward III. which I confess I could never remember, nor indeed those that urged them to me ever durst own: For they always laid their Faults upon some body else, like ugly foolish Children, whom, because of their Deformity and Want of Wit, the Parents are afraid of, and so turn them out on the Parish.

But, my Lords, let the Arguments be what they will, I have this short Answer to all that can be wrested out of these Triennial Bills, That the first Triennial Bill was repealed, before the Matter now disputed of was in question; and the last Triennial Bill will not be in force till the Question be decided, that is, till the Parliament is dissolved. The whole Matter, my Lords, is reduced to this short Dilemma: Either the Kings of England are bound by the Acts above-mention'd of Edward III. or else the whole Government of England by Parliaments; and by the Laws above, is absolutely at an end: For if the Kings of England have Power, by an Order of theirs, to invalidate an Act made for the Maintenance of Magna Charta, they have also Power, by an Order of theirs, to invalidate Magna Charta itself; and if they have Power, by an Order of theirs, to invalidate the Statute itself, de Tallagio non concedendo; then they may not only, without the Help of a Parliament, raise Money when they please, but also take away any Man's Estate when they please, and deprive every one of his Liberty, or Life, as they please."

The Answers were, That those Acts have not been so understood, nor hath the Usage been to regulate the holding of Parliaments upon that foot, ever since the Laws were made; and it is a Rule of Law, that ancient Statutes are to be construed by the general Usage. That the Words, if need be, go as well to the holding every Year, as to the more often; and, repeating them accordingly, it runs thus: A Parliament shall be holden every Year,

A.D. 1667. Year, if need be, or more often, if need be; and the King is Judge of the Need. That it is ridiculous to say the Parliament is jure die, when a Day stands appointed by the Prorogation. And, if the King were by Law obliged to hold a Parliament every Year, and doth it not, but seldom; it may be confuted a Misgovernment, or Grievance, to be redress'd in the ordinary Way, by Petition, but not to vacate future Parliaments, and their Acts. Add, farther (what is not argumentative, but express) the Time of parliamentary Vacation is alter'd by later Laws; as the before-quoted Triennial Act, temp. Car. I. and 16 Car. II. which repeals the other, it is thereby enacted, That, hereafter, the Sitting and Holding of Parliaments shall not be interrupted, or deferred, above three Years; which amounts to an Allowance of a Vacation not exceeding three Years. That Parliament had then been continued above four Years: And this Question, if it should turn upon the Reasoning on the other Side, would avoid all the Acts of Parliament made after the Year expired; which would make strange Work with the Laws of this and other Parliaments.

It is easy to see there were Faults on both Sides. The Prorogation was manifestly vicious, and it is as manifest, that the Motion was calculated to create Confusion: It was moreover, as impolitic as it was factitious. While it was yet in Embryo, the opposing Lords divided upon it: Only the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shaftsbury and Salisbury, and the Lords Wharton and (e) Hales were for it, all the rest were against it, rightly judging it was too slender a Thread to hang to great a Weight upon: All depended on the Breath of the Majority: In such a Case as this, it was beyond all question, that the Court would be strongest; and it was well foreseen that an Attempt to force a Dissolution, would dispose the Commons to become more pliant than they had lately proved.

But this a Motion so unprecedented might deserve Censure, it scarce deserv'd Punishment: The Duke, who made it, had been extremely cautious to preserve Appearances; he had artfully observed in his Introduction, that nobody was answerable for more Understanding than God had given him.

He had taken care to put the House in mind of the Debate of last Session, concerning the Necessity of a Dissolution, the almost equal Division upon the Question, and the Majority of Lords present, which voted in the affirmative: And he had declared, he was desirous to maintain his Argument with all the Judges and Lawyers in England, leaving it to their Lordships to decide whether he was in the Right or not: Besides, the House of Commons could only be affected by it. There was Reason to believe that a Dissolution would have produced many Changes there. Mr. North affirms, the Party was secure; that if this Parliament was dissolved, the Country was season'd to make more Elections for their Turns: But the House of Lords must have remain'd the same, and not the smallest Privilege of the lowest Peer, could have been taken by it.

But any Pretence that could be of any Use to either Party, either Party made no scruple to lay hold of: Those in Power were glad of an Opportunity to attack such daring Opposers, with the Sense of the House, to much on their Side: Lord Fevershille, therefore, began the Cry, To the Bar! as soon as the Duke had concluded his Speech; but was check'd in his Career by the Earl of Salisbury, who not only treated the last as an extravagant Motion, but supported the first with as much Spirit, as if he was ambitious of a Share in his Grace's Danger. The Lord Arundel of Warwick then renew'd the Motion of calling the Duke to the Bar; but was call'd to Order himself by the Earl of Shaftsbury, who enforce'd whatever the Duke had urg'd, and endeavour'd to supply whatever he had omitted. To the Lord Chancellor are to be ascribed the shrewd things according to Low above quoted, by way of Reply: And the Lord Wharton undertook the Reply upon him: The whole Debate lasted five or six Hours, and ended in a Negative (as it may be presum'd) without a Division.

The Tables were now turn'd on his Grace, and his Followers: The Lord Prebottle's Motion was renew'd, and gave a Rise to a Contest which held for two Days: One Side urging, That a manifest Design to throw a Nation into Disorder, deserv'd the Reformation of the House; and the other, That it was destructive to the Freedom of Parliament to call any Man to account for a matter of Opinion, which had all the Forms of the House, as this had, to warrant it.

Upon the whole, the four Lords were call'd upon to recant their several Speeches as of evil Tendency and bad Example, and to ask Pardon; and upon their Refusal, were committed to the (w) Tower for a Contempt, there to continue during the Pleasure of the King and the House.

Thus instead of overwhelming the Mountain, their noble Persons were overwhelm'd by it; and thus, says Starek, a (e) Prorogation without Precedent was to be warrant'd by an Imprisonment without Example.

In this Interval the same Point was taken up in the House of Commons, says the same Author, fore against their Inclinations; but they Buckingham, Shaftsbury, Salisbury, and Wharton, sent to the Tower.

The same Point more tenderly touch'd by the Commons.

(w) He did not attend the Debate, being withheld by the Court. REARY.

(e) Bishop Burnet says, the Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Shaftsbury, desired to have their own Servants to wait on them, and nam'd their Coach first, which his Majesty highly resented. The Bishop adds, They were much censur'd, which occasion'd an Order to make them sit close Prisoners, nobody being to be admitted to their window Leave of the King and the House.

(z) The longest upon Record, was one in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, which was for three Days beyond a Year.

It is a matter of some Astonishment, that upon this remarkable Occasion, it was not observ'd, that the very Power, which our Princes had usurp'd, of prorogation, was a Novelty with regard to the ancient Constitution of Parliaments, which had been in this Debate allud'd to: Henry VIII. being the first who had brought it into Practice.

they handled it as tenderly, as if they were afraid to touch it: The first Day instead of the Question, Whether the Parliament were, by this unexpected Prorogation, in Deed, dissolved, it was propos'd, somewhat ridiculouſly, Whether this Prorogation was not an Adjournment? and the Debate, which arose on this odd Propoſition, was adjourn'd to the next Day; and, after that, again to a third; and, even then, thoſe who had brought it into the Houſe ſtipulated for (y) Freedom of Speech, before they would venture to enlarge upon it any further (as if Freedom of Speech was not a Conceſſion of Right, which had been granted to this, and was ever granted to all Parliaments;) and, by this Timidity in alking taught the Houſe to deny it: So all ended in a cleanly Queſtion, Whether their grand Committees ſhould ſit? which, involving the Legitimacy of the Houſe's fitting, was carry'd in the Affirmative, as ſmoothly as their own Hearts could wili.

Mr. Marvel adds the following amazing Particulars:

"And yet it is remarkable, that ſhortly after, upon occaſion of a Difcourſe among the Commons concerning Libels and Pamphlets, firſt one Member of them flood up, and, in the face of their Houſe, ſaid, That it was affirmed to him, by a Perſon that might be ſpoke with, that there were among them thirty, forty, fifty, God knows how many, Outlawed. Another thereupon roſe, and told them, It was reported too, that there were divers of the Members Popiſh: A third, That a multitude of them were (a) bribed, and Penſioners,

(y) Mr. North in his Examiner, p. 69. has the following Paſſage: "But the Commons did not follow the Pattern the Lords had ſet, by committing any of their Members who agreed in the Houſe for the Diſſolution, which puts me in mind of what I heard a wife Man ſay at that time, viz. That it was a Symptom the Parliament was not long to laſt, when the Commons ſuffer'd themſelves to be taken by the Deed and Biſcay by ſuch People, as manag'd this Talk, without making uſe of an Excecuſe of a Crew of diſreputable Undertakers, that ſo deſperately affronted them."

(a) Under this Head this Author ſubjoins as follows: "For it is too notorious to be conceal'd, that near a third Part of the Houſe have beneficial Offices under his Majesty, in the Privy Council, the Army, the Navy, the Law, the Houſehold, the Revenue both in England and Ireland, or in Attendance on his Majesty's Perſon. Theſe are all of them indeed to be eſteem'd Gentlemen of Honour, but more or leſs according to the quality of their ſeveral Employments under his Majesty; and it is to be preſum'd that they brought along with them ſome Honour of their own into his Service at firſt, to ſet up with. Nor is it fit that ſuch an Aſſembly ſhould be diſturb'd of them to inform the Commons of his Majesty's Affairs, and communicate his Councils, ſo that they do not by irregular proceſſing of Elections in place where they have no proper Interſt, thruſt out the Gentlemen that love, and thereby diſturb the ſeveral Counties; nor that they ſeem to enter into the Houſe in Numbers beyond Moderety, and which inſtead of giving a Temper to their Deliberations, may ſeem to affect the Preſdominance."

Again, a little below:

"Yet common Diſſention would teach them not to feel after, and agree ſuch different I ruſs in thoſe bordering Intereſts of the King and Country, where from the People they have no legal Advantage, but ſo much may be gain'd by ſcratching them. How improper would it ſeem for a Privy Counſiller, if in the Houſe of Commons he ſhould not juſtly the moſt arbitrary Proceedings of the Council Table, repreſent Affairs of State with another Face, deſeal any Miſgovernment, puniſh the greateſt Offenders againſt the Kingdom, even tho' they were too his own particular Enemy, and exact the ſuprem'd Privilege on all Occaſions, to the Detriment of the ſubject's certain and due Liberties? What Self-denial were it in the learned Council at Law, did they not vindicate the Midsmanneſs of the Judges, perplex all Remedies againſt the Corruptions and Encroachment of Courts of Juſtice, would all Acts towards the Advantage of their own Professions, palliate unſavoury Elections, extenuate and advocate public Crimes, where the Criminal may prove conſiderable, they into the Chair of a Money Bill, and run the Clauſe ſo diſtinctly, that they may be interpreted in Wolfeſborough's behalf, beyond the Houſe's Intention, miſlead the Houſe, not only in point of Law, but even in Matter of Fact, without any Reſpect to Veracity (a Word frequently us'd by the Chancellor) but all to his own further Promouion? What Soldier in Pay but might think himſelf fit to be call'd, ſhould he oppoſe the Increaſe of Standing Forces, the Deprivation of Civil Authority, or the Eripping of Money by whatever Means, or in what Quantity? Or who of them ought not to alſe, that Irreſolute Politicians, of taking Arms by the King's Authority againſt thoſe that are commended by him in Purſuance of ſuch Commiſſion? What Officer of the Navy, but takes himſelf under Obligation to magnify the Expence, extoll the Management, conceal the Neglect, increaſe the Debts, and preſs the Neceſſity of rigging and unrigging it to the Houſe in the ſame Moment, and repreſent it: all at once in a good and a bad Condition? Should a Member of Parliament and of the Exchequer ſomit to transform the Accounts, conceal the Liens, heighten the Anticipation, and in deſpight of himſelf oblige whoſever chance to be the Lord Treaſurer; might not his Reſiſtance (Sir Robert Howard) juſtly expect to be put into proſect Poſſeſſion of the Office? Who, that is either concern'd in the Cellars, or of their Brethren of the Exchequer, can with any Decency reſuſe, if they do not invent all further Impoſitions upon Merchandiſe, Navigation, or our own domeſtic Growth and Conſumption; and if the Charge be but temporary, to perpetuate it? Hence it came, that, inſtead of relieving the Crown by the good old and certain way of Subſidies, wherein nothing was to be got by the Houſe of Commons, they deviſed this foreign Conſide of Revenue, to the great Grievance and double Charge of the People, that ſo many of the Members might be gratified in the Farms or Commiſſions.

But to conclude this Digreſſion: Whatſoever other Offices have been ſet up for the Uſe of the Members, or have been extinguiſh'd upon occaſion, ſhould they have ſeem'd at a Queſtion, did not they deſerve to be turned out? Were not all the Votes, as it were, in Ferme, of thoſe that were intruſted with the Sale? Muſt not Saracens be a ſufficient Cauſe of quarrel with Holland, to any Commiſſioners of the Plantations? Or who would have deny'd Money to continue the War with Holland, when he were a Commiſſioner of Prizes, of Sick and Wounded, or reſtoring the Engliſh, or of ſaving the Dutch Priſoners? How much greater would the Wardſhip be for thoſe of his Majesty's Houſehold, or who attend upon his Royal Perſon, to forget by any chance Vote, or in being abſent from the Houſe, that they are his domeſtic Servants? Or that all thoſe of the Capacity abovemention'd are to be look'd upon as a diſtinct Body under another Diſcipline; and whatſoever Sin they may commit in the Houſe of Commons againſt the National Intereſt, they take themſelves to be juſtified by their Circumſtances; and their Hearts indeed are, they ſay, with the Country; and one of them (Harvey Vice Chamberlain) had the Boldneſs to tell his Majesty, That he was come from voting in the Houſe againſt his Conſcience.

And yet theſe Gentlemen being full, and already in Employment, are more good-natur'd and leſs dangerous to the Publick, than thoſe that are hungry and out of Office, who may by probable Conſideration, make another third Part of this Houſe of Commons. Theſe are ſuch as having obſerv'd by what Steps, or rather Leaps and Strides, others of their Houſe have aſcended into the high Places of the Kingdom, do, upon meaſuring their own Birth, Educaſion, Parts, and Merit, think themſelves as well and better qualified in all reſpects as their former Compaſſions. They are generally Men, who by ſpeaking againſt the French, inveighing againſt the Debauched of Court, railing of the ill Management of the Revenue, and ſuch popular Flourishes, have cheaſt the Country into electing them; and when they come up, if they can ſpeak in the Houſe, they make a faint Attack or two upon ſome great Miniſter of State, and perhaps relieve ſome other that is in danger of Parliament, to make themſelves either way conſiderable.

In Matters of Money they ſeem at firſt difficult, but having been diſcour'd with in private, they are ſure right, and begin to underſtand it better themſelves, and to convert their Reſolutions; for they are all of them to be bought and ſold; only their Number makes them cheaper, and each of them doth ſo overval himſelf, that ſometimes they outland or let ſlip their own Market.

It is not to be imagin'd, how ſmall things in this caſe, even Members of great Estates will ſloop at; and moſt of them will do as much for Hopes, as others for Fruition; but if their Patience be tired out, they grow at laſt inquisitive, and revolt to the Country, till ſome better Occaſion offer.

Among theſe are ſome Men of the beſt Underſtanding,

A.D. 1676-7. finer. And yet all this was patiently hush'd up by their House, and digested, being, it seems, a thing of that Nature, which there was no Reply to.

Dr. Cary
for'd and im-
prison'd.

To close on this Affair of the Dissolution: One Doctor Cary, was brought to the Bar of the House of Lords, and question'd concerning a Manuscript, treating of the Illegality of the Prorogation, which he had carry'd to the Press; and because he declin'd answering such Questions as were put to him, and took Sanctuary in the Laws, which oblige no Man to accuse himself, they fin'd him a Thousand Pounds, and sent him close Prisoner to the Tower till it was paid: Possibly, that those terrible Examples might not be wanting, which the House of Commons did not think it prudential for them to make.

That the Lords, who had made free with their own Privileges, by submitting the Liberty of Four of their Body, at once, to the Pleasure of his Majesty, should make thus free with both the Liberty and Property of a Commoner, is perhaps scarce to be wonder'd at: But that the Commons, who are the express Guardians of the People, and who had so lately taken arbitrary Commitments, by his Majesty and the Privy Council, into their Consideration, in order to make a better Provision for their Security, should, all at once, grow so negligent of their Trust, as to suffer any ONE INDIVIDUAL to apply to them in vain for Protection and Deliverance, can never be wonder'd at enough: And yet, the Session before us produces an Instance, remarkable enough on all accounts to challenge a Place in the History of England.

One Mr. (s) Harrington, the Son of a Cavalier who had suffer'd much in the Royal Cause, while the House was sitting, happen'd to meet with two Scotchmen, return'd from abroad, who complain'd, that they had been press'd out of Scotland into the French-King's Service; and that there were several Hun-

were they of equal Integrity, who affect to impose all Burdens, to be able to crush any good Motion by parliamentary Skill, which themselves be the Authors, and to be the leading Men of the House, and for their natural Lives to continue so: But these are Men that have been once fooled, most of them, and miscovered, and slyly set at Court; so that all some turn of State shall for them in their Adversities: They, they look fallen, make big Motions, and cooive peculiar Bills for the Subject; yet only want the Opportunity to be the Instruments of the same Councils, which they oppose to others.

There is a third Part still remaining, but as contrary in themselves as Light and Darkness; those are either the worth, or the best of Men; the first are most prostitute Persons that have neither Hopes, Conscience, nor good Mirth left, yet are therefore pleas'd out as the necessary Men, and while Votes will go farthest: The Cause of their Election are defray'd, and they sit down to a Table set kept for them at Whitehall, and through Mismanagement, that they may be ready at Hand, when Call of a Question: All of them are received into Pension, and know their Pay-day, which they never fail of: Intomach, that a great Office (the Lord Treasurer) was pleas'd to say, That they came about his life in many Thousands for Choice, at the End of every Session. If they be sent to Parliament, they think he by Force; and as they are protect'd themselves, by Privilege, so they vent their Penicions to others, to the Obstruction of many Vessels together of the Law of the Land, and the public Justice; for their life it is that the long and frequent Adjournments are calculated; but all, whether the Court, or the Opposition of the Country Party, or those that protest the Title of Old Cavaliers, do equally, that upon differing Reasons, like Death, approach a Dissolution: But notwithstanding this, there is an Insolent of Nobles, a Sprinkle of Knights, that hath hitherto perform'd this giddy Body from Dissolution: Some Godsdown that are constant, irrevocable, indeed Englishmen, such as are above Hopes, or Fears, or Dissimulation, that can neither flatter nor betray their King or Country: But being conscious of their own Loyalty and Integrity, proceed thro' good and bad Reports, to account themselves in their Duty to God, their Prince, and their Nation: although to snail a Scandal in numbers, that Men are force-act of this more than a Regime's insomuch that it is difficult to conceive how they was first brought to light in the World, than how any good thing could ever be produced out of an House of Commons: continued: which, as that is imagined to have come from the striking of a Tree, or battering of Rocks together, by accident; so by their clashing with one another, have struck out an useful Effect from so unsteady Causes: But whatsoever actual Good hath been wrought at any time by the Amixture of ambitious, factious, and dissipated Members, to the first, but solid, and unyielding Party, the more frequent Effects and Consequences of so unequal a Mixture, is long continued, are demonstrable and apparent: For while scarce any Man comes thither with respect to the public Service, but in design to make and raise his Fortune, it is not to be Express the Deficiency and weakness, which, upon occasion of Elections to Parliament, are now general habitual through the Nation: So that the Vice and the Excess are risen to such a possible Height, that few sober Men can endure to stand to be witness to such Conditions: From whence also arise Feuds, and perpetual Animosities, over most of the Counties and Corporations, while Gentlemen of Worth, Spirit, and ancient Estates and Dependances, see themselves overpowered, in their own Neighbourhood, by the Drunkenness and Bricery of their Competitors: But if nevertheless any worthy Person chance to carry the Election, some mercenary or corrupt Sheriff makes a double Return; and to the Cause is handed to the Committee of Elections, who are so better, but are ready to adopt his Adversity into the House, if he be not legitimate: And if the Gentleman aggressed seek his Remedy against the Sheriff, in Writs, he is told, and the Troop be so palpable that the King's Bench cannot avoid how to do him Justice; yet the major Part of the twelve Judges fall, upon better Consideration, recuse the Sheriff's Fine, and reverse the Judgment; but those of them that dissent from their Brethren are in danger to be turn'd out of the Bench, without any Cause assign'd: While Men therefore care not that how they get into the House of Commons, neither can it be expected that they should make any Considerance of what they do there; but they see only into how to reimburse themselves (if their Elections were at their own Charge) or how to bargain their Vote for a Place or a Pension: They fill themselves straightways into some Court-bidder; and it is as well known among them, to what Lord each of them return, as when formerly they wore Coats and Badges: By this long standing together, they are grown too familiar with one another, that all Reverence of their own Assembly is lost; that they live together, not like Parliament-men, but like so many Goodfellows, met together in a public House, to mix'd merry: And, which is yet worse, being so thoroughly acquainted, they understand their Number and Party; so that the Use of a public Council is frustrated; there is no Place for Deliberation; no persuading by Reason; but they can see one another's Votes thro' both Throat and Cravat, before they hear them.

While the Causes are so well known, they are only fit for a Cheat, and no fair Gamester but would throw them under the Table.

Hereby it is, that their House hath lost all the ancient Weight and Authority; and, being conscious of their own Guilt and Weakness, dare not adventure, as heretofore, the Impeding of any Man before the Lords, for the most heinous Crimes of State, and the most public Misdemeanors; upon which Considerance it is, that the Confederates have so long perswaded, and gone unpunish'd. For altho' the Confederates have sometimes (that this House might appear still necessary to the People, and to make the Money more easily yielded, that even their own Names should be robb'd among them, and Grievances be talk'd of, yet, at the same time, they have been so prevalent, as to hinder any Effect; and, if the House be empowr'd itself beyond Instructions, then, by clashing them with Prorogation, fighting them with Dissolution, comforting them with long, frequent, and festal Adjournments; now by suspending or diminishing their Pensions, then again by increasing them sometimes by a Scous, otherwhies by a Favour, there hath a Way been found to reduce them again under Discipline.

How dreadful a Representation! For the Honour of England may it be thought a Libel! And may it never be countermand'd by the Proceedings of future Times!

(s) This Gentleman's Case, as publish'd by himself, under his own Name, we find in Lord Sims's Collection, vol. xxx. It is likewise taken notice of in the Manuscript called England's Looking-glass, with this Addition, that one Mr. Harrington was persecuted in the same manner, at the same time.

dreds of their Countrymen, as well as themselves, who had been forced from their Houses, Wives and Families, bound together; and so, like Galley-slaves, secur'd in the public Gaols; their Friends and Relations not being suffer'd to come near them; and from thence put on Shipboard, and transported into the Service of France, contrary to the Addresses of Parliament, his Majesty's Answers therunto, Proclamation thereupon, and what is of more Authority than all, the Privilege of Nature itself, that exempts every Man alike, from being forced into a Danger, in which he has no Concern.

Mr. Harrington was touch'd with their Case, and thinking himself happy in an Opportunity that bid fair to put a stop to those (b) Supplies which were sent almost daily to France, brought these Scotlines to several Members of Parliament, to whom they evidenced the same things: His View was to have them examin'd at the Bar of the House, when Time should serve; and, in the mean while, fearing that Endeavours might be us'd to corrupt them, he carry'd them to a Master in Chancery, who took their Depositions upon Oath.

This was scarce done, before he was seiz'd by a Messenger, carry'd before the King and Council, and accus'd of suborning those Scotlines to disturb his Majesty's Government. While under Examination, he was not well treated by the Lord Chancellor (these are his own Words) and extremely ill by the Lord Treasurer; and, upon the Issue, was committed close Prisoner to the Tower (the Cause assign'd in the Warrant being for Subornation of Perjury, tending to the Defamation of his Majesty and his Government; and for contemptuously declaring, he would not answer his Majesty any Question, which his Majesty, or his Privy Council, should ask him); debarred the Use of Pen and Ink, the Access of his Friends, confin'd in such a Place over the Tower Ditch, as threw him into a dangerous Sickness; and deny'd the Assistance of either Physician or Divine; After all this, he made a hard Shift to get a Petition presented to the House of Commons, which produced an Order for his being brought before the House; before whom he gave a clear Account of the whole Matter, and of his Behaviour at the Council-board.

But of the two Scot Soldiers, the one made himself perjurd, without being suborn'd by Harrington; denying, or misrepresenting to the House, what he had sworn formerly: And the other, the honest Fellow it seems of the two, only absented. However, divers Members of that House attested voluntarily, that the Soldiers had affirmed the same thing to them; And indeed the Truth of that Matter became notorious, by several other Soldiers that came over afterwards, and by further Account from Scotland. Mr. Harrington also carry'd himself towards the House with so much Modesty, that it seem'd inseparable from him; so that a Disposition appear'd in the Members to have concern'd themselves for his Liberty; when Mr. Secretary Williamson stood up, having been a principal Instrument in committing him, and, because the other Crimes rather deserved Thanks and Commendation, and the Warrant would not justify itself, he insisted upon his strange Demeanour towards his Majesty; deciph'd his very Looks, says Mr. Marvel; and but that his Majesty and the House remained still living Flesh and Blood, it might have been imagin'd, by his Discourse, that Mr. Harrington had the Head of a Gorgon. But this Story wrought with, and amazed the Commons, that the (c) Prisoner found no Redress, but might thank God that he escap'd again into close Prison.

If

(b) Sir Leoline Jenkins, not only, in one Place, observes, that very spiritual Notice had been taken of the Conduct of England, in this respect, in the Norwich Gazette; but in another, that the Dutch arriv'd the most signal Successes of France to their Aid. It was also prov'd, at the Bar of the House, that 1000 Recruits had been sent into the French Service, from Scotland, in January last.

(c) The Release of this Gentleman's Case, being exceedingly curious; and having, no Place, either in the Great Trials, or any other Collection extant, that I know of, we here insert, for the Information and Warning of Posterity.

"Having urg'd, that by what Measures Sir Joseph Wildman obtained of the House, that no further Care was taken of him, but that he was to be carried back, and remain close Prisoner as he was before, is only known to the Honourable House it self. He proceeds to say, But this he knows, that whatsoever Sir Joseph Williamson, or any other Person did utter against him, did not appear to be made good upon his Heads Charters; for, upon the first Day of the next Term, his Council moved for that Writ, and had it granted; and he was accordingly brought up, and the Cause of his Imprisonment returned: The Report was, the pretended Subornation aforesaid, and no other; yet he was enforced by the Court to give four thousand Pounds Bail, to appear the last Day of the Term; which he accordingly did; and there found an Information put in against him, for certain Words, pretended to be spoke three Quarters of a Year before: So that the Subornation of these Scotlines, to disturb his Majesty's Government, and all other Discourages of Sir Joseph Williamson against him, for which he had lain so long close Prisoner in the Tower, on the great Prejudice of his Health and Estate, are utterly vanish'd, and appear, as they really were, utterly Sagittines.

Upon Inquiry, this Information was put in by one Elizabeth, of Low in the County of Devon; but in the Name of one Geare, who was then in the Country, not able to shew his Head for Debt; but however he was sent for by a Messenger on purpose, to own the Informations; but, as Mr. Harrington was credibly inform'd, and is ready to prove, that Geare, when he came up, declar'd he did not remember the particular Words of the Discourse then between them; it being so long time since, and his Memory much decay'd, by reason of an Apoplexy he hath lately had in his Head; upon which, Mr. Attorney refus'd to take his Evidence; yet the Information proceeded so far, that Lieu was join'd upon it; Notice was given for Trial, and Mr. Harrington had had his Counsel, when Notice was again sent, that, unless Mr. Harrington would consent to the Amendment of the Information, the Trial should be put off; and only the Beginning of Michoumas Term last, a Nisi Pross was entered to the Information, and a second Information put in; wherein, to avoid the Nicety of proving the Words exactly, the Words are set down in Latin; which is of most dangerous and destructive Consequence; and whatever Precedent it may have in former Times, to justify it, as there is hardly any thing so ill that wants a Precedent, very few Ages having been so curious to search out and condemn the ill ones; yet this is against Reason itself, and the Practice of the last Hundred Years, and more; and can by no Precedent be made justifiable; since there is no Language, but the Translation of it into another may be by several Ways and Expressions; and Words are capable of various Constructions; so that the introducing this, upon the Subject, is a Matter of very great Consideration and Consequence.

Once said before all this, Matters were to order'd; at the Cross office and the Compter, that he is denied a Copy of his Jury, and could not obtain any.

The Trial came on at Quinshill the 31 of December, before the Lord Chief Justice Rainsford. There were three Witnesses, whereof the Evidence against him fully rely'd; Geare, Lieu,

A.D. 1676.

If the Commons were once more settled in their Seats, they had not got over their Dread of losing them; and if they were more than ever oblig'd to the Court, they A.D. 1676. also stood more than ever in awe of the People: This critical Situation of their oblig'd them

Eliza, and Ranfey's Case is a Papiſt, brought out of Ilchester's Goal to make good his Charge, his Father died in the annual Necroſity, ſoliciting for old Debts and Arrears from the Crown, and left his Son nothing but thofe Pretensions: So that 'tis not to be wonder'd, that upon conſideration he recover'd his Money, and ſwore any thing, perſuadeventure that he might eat ſomething. This Case refus'd to answer ſuch Queſtions as Mr. Horrington's Council did ask of him, which were, Whether he did not deny to Mr. Attorney General, upon the firſt Interrogation, that he did remember any particular Words of Mr. Horrington's; and how he came ſince eaſily to remember them. To this he refus'd to answer, ſaying, he was a Witneſs for the King only, and the Lord Chief Juſtice did not require him to answer.

Eliza, the next Witneſs, was a Man notoriously infamous in his own Country: he had been an Indulger againſt the King's Party in Croſwell's days; and was, at the Trial, prov'd by ſeveral Witneſſes to be a Cheat, and a Tripan, and to have tamper'd with one Mr. Flux to have ſuborn'd him to have ſworn more than he knew againſt Mr. Horrington. Colonel Sear prov'd, that this Eliza did to him ſwearing againſt the Government, and in Diſcourſe told him afterwards, that he had ſeveral Quarrels with Mr. Horrington, but now he would be reveng'd on him for all; and that he, and a black Dog he had in the Country, ſhould worry him. Eliza himſelf ſwears, that he kept his Company to long, only to get ſome Words from him that might be his Ruin, or Diſadvantage. And, ever and above all this, ſince his Proſecution againſt Mr. Horrington, Mr. Eliza hath put a Patent of 200*l.* per annum, out of the Customs, to him and his Children, during their Lives: It cannot be ſaid, that this Patent was granted him, or diſpatched the ſame, upon this Conſideration, ſince the Patent recites another Conſideration; yet Mr. Horrington doth heartily with the pulling of this Patent, or his Duties with my Lord Treaſurer, had been at ſome other time; ſince it was prov'd at the Trial, by Mr. Mowbray, that one Nichols, Nephew to Mr. Bury, and principal Witneſs againſt him, ow'd to him, that he had twenty Guineas from my Lord Treaſurer, juſt before the Time of Mr. Bennet's Trial.

Mr. Ranſey, the third, is now my Lord Treaſurer's Sergeant, but formerly went by the Name of Ranfey, was a Highwayman, and being deſcrib'd thereon, conceal'd himſelf in Sir William Smith's Lead Mines in Dorſetſhire. Since changing his Name, he kept a little Writing-room near Temple-Bar, from whence, for his good Character, he is call'd to this conſiderable Employment; and by my Lord Treaſurer directed to manage Eliza in his Proſecution of Mr. Horrington; who, from time to time, was to bring in Writing the Words he heard him ſpeak in Company, and ſo by the ſpecial Order of the Lord Treaſurer, and my Lord Juſtice directs, that Ranfey always ſign the Papers, that he may thereby know them again.

But although the Characters of theſe three Witneſſes are very bad; yet they have forc'd their Teſtimony as far as it was poſſible for Mr. Ranſey ſwears that he received Mr. Eliza's Note the Day after the Words were ſaid to be ſpoken, which he knows by his Interſuitment with his own Hand of the Day whereon he receiv'd it, and he then immediately ſhow'd them to my Lord Treaſurer: But then it is to be conſidered, that Mr. Eliza gave a Note of other Words to Mr. Attorney, upon which the former Information is drawn; nay, when Mr. Attorney deſireth to ſhew their Information with Mr. Horrington's Conſent, the Note of the Words Mr. Attorney ſwears, which he ſaith to be put in inſtead of the former, were yet different from the preſent Information; which Uncertainty and Variouſneſs could not have been, had they had by them the Words writ down the ſame Day of the ſpeaking of them.

The Words of the Information were, Our Government is by three Elizas, and to ſubſcribe ſome writt, ſe by againſt all ſuch Elizas, is the Rebellion. The Note Mr. Attorney ſwears, for having his Conſent to altering the ſaid Information, was, Our Government is by three Elizas, and if Eliza be not againſt all three Elizas, it is no Rebellion. The ſaid Words of the ſecond Information, are, Quod omnes Gallorenſes de tribus Baribus conſtituti, & a Rebelibus requirentur in Reges, & ſunt accuſati ſive contra omnes tres Statu, ſive de Rebelibus.

Mr. Horrington was very hardly us'd by the Court in ſeveral Particulars. When he offer'd to ſpeak in his own Caſe, the Lord Chief Juſtice Ranfey refus'd to hear him; ſaying him ſelf was Eliza's way, and that he ſhould acquaint his Council what he ſaid to ſay, and ſpeak by them: Whereas, for the Subject to ſpeak in his own Caſe cannot by Law be deny'd them, nor ought not, eſpecially in Tryals of this Nature, which depend moſt upon Matter of Fact, whether ſuch very Words were ſpoken, and the manner of ſpeaking them; which gave a great way in making the Words ſideliouſly ſpoken or not. Before, in Caſes of this nature the Council may be overus'd, and not dare, for a Fee, to emper their Teſtimony; it is neceſſary for the Preſervation of theſe Clauſes; and proſſing the Law very hard, may be confin'd in them a Kidnaps in the Court.

The next Handſhip Mr. Horrington underwent, was, That the King's Council having ſpoken and urg'd to the Jury for Law ſeveral things directly contrary to Law, and having had great weight upon Geare's Teſtimony, Eliza's beſt had ſaid, upon the Proof againſt him. Mr. Horrington deſired Leave that he might ſpeak, having ſeveral things to offer to invalidate the Teſtimony of Geare, which the Lord Chief Juſtice refus'd, ſince the King's Council would conſiſt, alledging that Robley could ſpeak after them. The Mercator and Robley of Courts law, and ought to be made uſe for the better Reſolve, and not for the Detraction and overthrowing of News Caſes. The Jury thought ſo to be ſaid, and the Cafe left to imperfect to them, for want of hearing what Mr. Horrington could ſay for himſelf, as concerning Geare's Teſtimony; that, after ſome time of withdrawing, they returned, and ſaid of the Court that they might be allow'd to hear (if the Court thought fit) what Mr. Horrington had to ſay concerning Geare; but the Lord Chief Juſtice refus'd them ſaid, declaring he would not admit Mr. Horrington to ſpeak, ſince the King's Council did not conſiſt.

Another Handſhip, and a very great one, Mr. Horrington receiv'd, was, That the King's Council in their concluding Speech, and my Lord Chief Juſtice in his Introduction to the Jury, did alledge, that no Witneſs was required by the Statute Law to prove Words, ſo as it only required by the Common Law; and not only the King's Council, but my Lord Chief Juſtice argu'd it to be the Jury's as if upon an Information at Common Law, as this was, they had the lame Obligation upon them to ſaid the Words ſpoken upon the Evidence of one Witneſs, as they had upon two, if the Information had been upon the Statute. Whereas it is very true, upon two direct Witneſſes, the Statute obliges the Jury to find it, but the Common Law leaves the Jury wholly at Liberty, and upon their Conſideration betwixt God and themſelves, they may find it, upon one direct Witneſs or leſs Teſtimony, and they may relate it upon three direct Witneſſes or more: And in a Cafe of this nature, the Reaſon of the Law will tell them, that they ſhould be more than ordinarily ſatisfied and clear in the Evidence, before they find it, and make a Man an Offender for a Word; and deliver him up to Ruin for one unſworn, perjur'd Diſcourſe. Before, the Lord Chief Juſtice did not open to the Jury their Duty in the Cafe, but directed them to find whether the Words were ſpoken or not ſpoken; whereas, the Jury might be ſatisfied that the Words were ſpoken, and yet they could not find the Information; becauſe either out of the Circumſtance of the Diſcourſe, or the Nature of the Words themſelves, it did appear to them that they were not ſpoken ſideliouſly; for they do not only find that the Words were ſpoken, but that they were ſpoken with a ſideliouſ Intent; whereas, indeed, the very Words themſelves, in this Cafe, can poſſibly bear ſo ſuch Conſtruction. But my Lord Chief Juſtice not performing his Duty in this Point, may be the Cauſe of the Jury's falling into the Error: For how can ever the ſideliouſ Doctrine againſt the Government, in a Cafe that hath, but can never happen again, be ſideliouſly ſpoken! When the Jury came back to give their Verdict, ſeveral of them were heard to ſay, They were not agreed on ſideliouſ it; it is altho' the Note and Habit of the Court juſtified it over.

Mr. Horrington was ſaid 100*l.* and committed Priſoner to the King's Bench on this Conviction. His Council was ſilenc'd and affronted, and threaten'd to have his Crown pluck'd over his Ears, and himſelf to be ſung over the Bar (Mr. Wallis was the Perſon, whoſe Virtue, Wiſdom, and Integrity is ſufficiently known) only for ſtanding for him, and alledging Error to qualify the Information.

Nor did the Malice of his Enemies flop here: A Gentleman that ſerv'd the Intereſt of the Houſe of Commons, againſt the Miniſters, muſt be ſacrific'd, at any rate; nothing leſs than his entire Ruin would pleaſe. This I ſought, on his publiſhing his Caſe, which contains nothing but Truth, gave ſuch an Alarm to the Lord Treaſurer, that great Endeavours were us'd in the Houſe of Lords, under the Pretence of violating the Privileges of Parliament, to have us'd him in the moſt barbarous manner; but of this having timely Notice from his Friends, he firſt directly parted with a Goal, and then the Nation, thinking it muſt be better to truſt Providence than fit mercileſs Enemies: But the Diſcovery of the Popiſh Plot, which happened ſome ſer, and the Lord Treaſurer's being ſent to the Tower, made the obtaining his Pardon not to be thought unſatisfactory in that Juſtice of Affairs.

them to proceed with more than ordinary Caution; and a happy Temperament was found out to assist the King, without exposing themselves to the Ill-will of the Public. The Reasons urg'd for a Supply, were the Condition of the Navy, and the apparent Necessity of augmenting it. Twenty Ships had been talk'd of in the last Sessions; thirty were contended for now. The Courtiers were for laying out a Million, or eight hundred thousand Pounds at least in this Service. The Opposers, on the contrary, did every thing possible to flint the Sum to four hundred thousand Pounds. Between these, arose a third Party, who call'd themselves Moderate Men, and they compounded the Matter for (d) five hundred and eighty-four thousand Pounds; which was granted on the one hand, and accepted on the other. To tender this Supply yet more agreeable to his Majesty, they did not accompany it, as before, with a Bill to appropriate the Tonnage and Poundage to the Use of the Navy, but then again they made the Officers of the Exchequer accountable to them for the Use and Application.

By the Word them, must be understood the House of Commons only: And Bishop Burnet acknowledges, that this Clause was put in, in hope that the Lords would alter it, and make the said Officers accountable to both Houses: Whence a Contest must unavoidable arise, in which there was great Probability the Bill itself would be lost.

The Affair took this Turn accordingly: The Lords made the Alteration expected: The Commons would not admit it; alleging the Lords could neither add nor take away from a Money Bill; for as it was their Peculiar to give Money, it was their Peculiar also to receive an Account of it. The Lords reply'd; That to deny them the Power of calling the Officers of the Exchequer to a Reckoning, was to abridge them of the Privilege of Judicature, which was unquestionably theirs as the supreme Court: By way of Precedent, urging, That when the Convention gave Money for disbanding the Army, an Account of the same was order'd to be laid before their House, as well as the other. Upon the whole, both Houses adher'd tenaciously to their Point, till the King, says Sir John Revelly, at length prevail'd with the Lords to crafte their Clause, and so the Commons got the better of the Day.

As another Artifice of this Session, Mr. North adds, That when the grand Committee were making their Enquires into the Rates, Scandings, and Charge of these thirty Ships, in order to adjust the Sum to be rais'd, the Faction busy'd themselves abroad among the Artists to effectually, that Men were brought to declare their Judgments, and had Credit in such manner, that after the Tax, so regulated, was given and brought in, and the Ships built, it was found, that the Charge was above (e) 100,000 more to the King than the Tax amounted to.

To close on this Article of Patriot-Craft, we find Sir John Revelly informing the Lord Treasurer, that some of the Discontented had resolv'd to hasten the Money Bill as fast as might be, that so the House might rise before Easter, and the public Bills, that were preparing, be left unpass'd; hoping thereby to incense the Nation, and bring about Cause of Complaint against the King, as if he call'd the Parliament for nothing but to get Money from them: His Lordship answer'd, That the King, well aware of the Design, would prevent it by a Message to be deliver'd that Day to the House, by Mr. Secretary Coventry, to this

(d) And for this, says Sir John Revelly, I gave my Vote: After which his Majesty leads him to display a Scene, which gives the most lively Idea of the Calumnies and Callets of that Reign imaginable, as follows:

"My Lord Treasurer took it so kindly that I sided not with those, who did all they could to weaken and discredit the Crown, that he would needs carry me to kiss his Majesty's Hand, which I had not yet done since I came to Town, and presented me in the Lobby of the House of Lords, next to the Prince's Lodgings, nobody being present but his Majesty, his Lordship and myself. He said much more of me to the King, than I desired; but lately, that as my Family had been always loyal, he knew I was perfectly inclin'd to try'd in their Footsteps, and that the best way to confirm me in such my Disposition, would be to let me understand how little of a Whig there was in the Pretences for us to do to discredit the Crown, and withdraw them from their Duty." The King, said he, had known me long, "and hoped I knew how to sell as to give no Ear to such Reports of him. I know, says he, it is not I aim at the Salvation of the Government and Religion: That I intend to lay aside Parliaments, and to raise Money another way; but every Man, say those who fill the most of the Court, whose the thing in all its Circumstances, to be safe. There is not a Subject that lives under me, whose Safety and Welfare I desire less than my own: And I shall be as fiery to invade his Liberty and Property, as that another should invade mine. Those Members, continued the King, who build this mighty Friendship for the Public, are of two sorts, either those who would actually and irreversibly subvert the Government, and reduce it to a Commonwealth once more; or else those who seem only to join with the former, and talk loud against the Court, purely in Hope to have their Mouths stopp'd with Fines and Preferment." And to say the Truth, the Treasurer had named some of the Chiefs to me, who had desired to do so of the King, and upon such Condition promised to come over.

I made answer to the King, That indeed the Pretences were many, and, to some I believed, plausible, that were rais'd in Opposition to what others understood to be for his Majesty's Interest: But that they had gain'd but little on me, who had had the Honour of being so long known to his Majesty, and had been so truly confirm'd in my Belief by Assurances from my Lord Treasurer: That to the best of my Knowledge I should never do anything that became not a true and faithful Subject, so should be inconsistent with the Prosperity of his Majesty's Royal Person and Government. The King, said he, was very well pleas'd that he had seen me, commended me to wait on him sometimes, and told me I should have Access to him when and wherever I desired it.

Unfortunately, Sir John's Election was contested; and a few Days after, he tells us very candidly, "That the King and Duke had both of them much interested themselves in the Affair of my Election; which being to be try'd very soon, his Majesty gave Order to his Servants, that were of the House, to attend the Committee, and assist me with their best Services, when it came on. He likewise gives us to understand, that his Estate had been granted away, on a Pretension that it was forfeited. The Pretence for which, was founded on an idle Story, rais'd by his Enemies; but the very Truth, possibly, his Activity in the Affair of Essex, before-mentioned."

(e) By way of Correction of this Passage, it is however necessary to observe, that Mr. Pepys, in his Memoirs of the Navy, p. 16, calls this an ample Provision. And afterwards, p. 20, having taken notice that the Commissioners had swell'd the Charge of Building to 670,000 l. he adds the following Words: "Therein exceeding not only the Navy Officers and Shipwrights, and their Master Shipwrights Demands, but even the Charge which some of them afterwards had been actually built for, by above one hundred and seventy thousand Pounds."

this Effect. That if aught remain'd undone, which the House judg'd necessary to be done for the Good of the Nation, the King would allow them a sufficient time after Easter, and that when they were ready, his Majesty would pass their Bills: Such a Message was delivered accordingly; which shews that all Regard to Decency was not lost even in the Reign of King Charles the Second.

Years longer.

But, however artificial the Conduct of the opposing Members was, and however mischievous it was intended to be, it had not all the Effect that was expected from it. The Majority were inclin'd to let the Balance of the Session turn in favour of the Court; and, therefore, they continued the additional Excise, which the famous Triple League had induc'd them to grant, for three Years longer. Marvel, however, makes no Scruple to call this the Purchase of their own Continuance; and that it should have been intitled, if Property had been consulted, An Act for the extraordinary Occasions of the House of Commons; adding: But that they might seem, within this Tenderness to themselves, not to have call'd off all, towards the People, they sunk the Prosecution of all the Grievances they had formerly complain'd of, into a Bill for regulating the Proceedings in Chancery; as well knowing, that a Suit in that Court would be sooner ended, than a Reformation of it effected: And that, thereby, they had found Work enough to take up the whole Session: And of their usual Bills for the Liberty of the Subject, they sent up only that of Hebeu Corpus; pretending, and perhaps truly, that they durst not adventure them either in their own, or the Lords House, as they were now govern'd, lest they should be more entangled, by striving for more Liberty.

While these were the Proceedings of one House, the other dispatch'd the Business before them with all the Harmony and Unanimity imaginable. No sooner did the opposing Lords disagree among themselves, than they became insignificant: And those who had committed four of their Body, gave the Law to the rest.

The blessed Fruits of this happy Temper, were, a Bill for the farther Regulation of Printing Presses, and the suppressing all unlicens'd Books; with a Clause for the breaking open all Houses whatsoever, where it was suspected any such Books were conceal'd: And two others, with most plausible Titles, but of a most pernicious Tendency. The first was call'd, An Act for securing the Pro- testant Religion, by educating the Children of the Royal Family, and providing for the Continuance of a Protestant Clergy. And the second, An Act for the more effectual Convulsion and Prosecution of Popish Recusants.

All three, we are told, had an easy and undisputed Passage thro' the House of Lords; but in the Commons they met with very different Treatment. No sooner was the last of them read, than a Member rose up, and in a short Speech unmask'd it to effectually, that a second mov'd that it might not only be thrown out; but with some particular Mark of Infamy: And the Question being call'd for, a third demand'd, That they should stay a while to see whether there was any Man to be found hardy enough to speak one word for it: Which no Man promising to do, it was forthwith rejected, with this Censure added to the Journal, Because the Body of the Bill was contrary to the Title. A Method of Proceeding so totally different from the stated Rules of Intercourse between the two Houses, that nothing, but the Crimes of the Bill could have render'd it excusable.

is reputed with a Mark of Infamy.

As to the other Bill for securing the Protestant Religion, &c. which was call'd by one Party, A Bill against Popery, and by the other a Popish Bill; it was likewise of the Janus kind; for, under the Pretence of educating the Children of the Crown in the Protestant Religion, it admitted the Kings of England to be successively Papists. They were indeed required to make a Declaration upon Oath, that they did not believe that there was any Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; but if they refus'd it, they might: And all that they were to pay for this Licence, was, the paying with so much of their Power, as regard'd the filling all Ecclesiastical Vacancies, but such as were in the Gift of the Lord Chancellor, which were then to devolve to the Bishops, under certain Limitations, as express'd in the (1) Bill itself: So that, in effect, this Bill was no better than a Compromise between the (2) Church and the Duke; by which the Latter pass'd a sort of Fine to the Former, for being of what Religion he pleas'd.

But this notorious Bill, as Marvel calls it, had not the same Fate with the first, but was read a second time and committed; after which it dy'd of Neglect; the Committee either disdaining or not daring publicly to enter upon it. Nor had the Bill to lay an additional Restraint on the Press any better Success. Tho' the House was under too much Influence to do every thing that was

(2) On this Subject, Mr. Marvel writes as follows:

"But, because all Men have Image taken Occasion to accuse the Lords Spiritual, as the Authors both of this Bill and the other, it is necessary to insert here the true Fact, in their just Vindication. It was above two Years ago that a select Council of great Ministers, had been consulting about Church Matters, thro' it whom happens (see til'd it in this History) that the Swearing was more forward in meddling with Religion, than the Churchmen with Government, but each more than with impugning out of their Promises. This the only Difference, that what Ecclesiastical Persons may do by Chance or Consequence, that Harm the other commit on set Purpose: For it was by their Politicians that those two Godwin's Eggs were laid, and by their assiduous Incubation intended. It is true indeed, afterwards, they took some few of the Bishops into Communion, and as it were for Advice upon what was before resolved: And to make this Bill go the better down, they flatter'd them with the other, as wisely calculated, forsooth, to the Churches Interest. And by this means, possibly, they prevailed so far, that the Bishops both there and in the House, did vigorously opposed. But that the Bishops were either the Committers or Promoters of the Bill, is a scandalous Falshood, and denied by the Authors to throw the Odour of it from themselves upon the Clergy, and (the Bills that aimed at the Ruin of the Church of England having miscarried) to compass the same End by this Definition. A sufficient Warning to the Clergy, how to be engaged with the Statesmen for the future!"

right, it was too modest to do every thing that was wrong: Licence they knew was already obnoxious to Law; and they had now Reason to be convinc'd, that Truth ought not to be punish'd.

Indeed, the alarming Advices receiv'd about this Time from abroad, and these daring Attempts on the Common Sense of the Nation at home, gave a new Bias to the Session. But before we can proceed with the Residue of the one, it is necessary to explain the other.

A remarkable Resolution in the Court of Spain.

Between the Close of the last Year and the Opening of the present, a very remarkable Resolution had happen'd at the Court of Spain. Notwithstanding the young King had been inclin'd to decare himself of Age, and of Course put an End to the Regency of the Queen his Mother, he had still to much Credit and Consideration with him, and manag'd both to well, that he kept Don John at Distance from the Court, and procur'd the Administration of Affairs to be plac'd in the Hands of the Marquis de Villa Sierra. But what he had Authority to establish, he had not Power to maintain. The Dukes of Alca, de Acerra, the Prince de Castiglione, and fifteen or sixteen more of the principal Nobility, enter'd into an Association, confirm'd by Oath, to represent to the King the Mischiefs and Dangers that must unavoidably attend the Marquis de Sierra's Ministry, and not to desert till they had procur'd his Removal; till Don John was established in his room; and till the Will of the late King was perform'd; which directed, that when the King enter'd into his Majesty, the Queen should retire into a Nunnery. The Council of Castille also join'd with them herein; and a suitable Representation was accordingly made to his Majesty; who, at first, express'd some Displeasure, but, hearing the Cry of the People was equally for Don John and against the Marquis, and finding the Torrent was too mighty to be withstood, he grew moderate, and sent for the Cardinal of Aragon, and express'd a Disposition to be govern'd by his Advice. The Cardinal came, accompany'd by Don Pedro his Brother, the Duke de Medina Celi, and other Grantees, who all humbly advis'd his Majesty to send forthwith for Don John, as the most effectual way, not only to prevent the Disorders which the Agitations of Mens Minds then seem'd to threaten, but likewise to provide for the Honour, Safety, and Happiness of his Kingdoms. The Issue was, that the young King came to a Resolution that the Marquis should depart from Madrid forthwith, that Don John should be declared chief Minister, and that the Queen his Mother should be desired, in a convenient time, to conform herself to the Will of the late King. Proper Orders were given accordingly: Not only the King, but even the Queen, sent Letters of Invitation to Don John, who, in his Answers, express'd all imaginable Duty and Affection to both, without any Mixture of Complaint or Relicentment: But then his Progress to Court, rather resembled a March than a Journey: He had 6000 Men at his Heels; and when he enter'd into Madrid, he was receiv'd by the Populace rather as a Conqueror than a Subject.

From so vigorous an Exertion of national Spirit at home, all Europe expected a suitable Alteration in the Conduct of Spain abroad: But the first Care of Ministers is ever secure themselves, by removing their Enemies, and rewarding their Friends: And till this is done, they have not Leisure to attend the Public. It was thus at Madrid: A very large Remittance had been already sent to Brussels, to satisfy the Demands of the Dutch; and as to the Protection of the Residue of Flanders, it was left to the Care of Providence and England: Which last they thought would never suffer it to be lost, because they had an Interest in its Preservation; tho' nothing is more fallacious, as Sir William Temple well observes, than to reason upon the Councils or Conduct of Princes or States, from what is conceiv'd to be the true Interest of their Countries: Since there is, in all Places, an Interest of those that govern, and another of those that are govern'd: And nothing is more certain, than that the Last will ever be forced to give way to the First.

While such was the Resignation of Spain on one hand, France, on the other, chose to have no other Reliance than on its own exquisite Foresight and Prudence; and to mix no more of Devotion with its Politics than was contain'd in a Te Deum for its Successes. However sure of the Court of England, or satisfy'd that Don John was in no Condition to do the great Things expected from him, to shut out all Prevention, his most Christian Majesty set out for Flanders (where all things were thus early in readiness to open the Campaign) February 17: And in the Beginning of March sat down before Valenciennes, which held out till the 27th, and then was taken by Storm; the King in Person entering the Town, to put a stop to the Fury of the Soldiers; and, by this Exploit, giving occasion to Sir William Temple to say, that he had surmounted the very Force of the Seasons.

French King carries Valenciennes by Storm.

At the very time that his Majesty of France was actually in the Netherlands, and making his Dispositions for this vigorous opening of the Campaign, Sir William Temple had another Interview with the Prince of Orange at Seefeldyke, and communicated to his Highness his last Dispatches from England; which contain'd little more than a Justification of the King's last Proposal, which the Prince had so ill relish'd; a Request, that his Highness would think farther of it; and an Offer to hand over any other Proposition to France, which he should think fit to make. All these Particulars were so shocking to the Prince, that he could scarce bear the reading of them; and his Conclusion upon the whole whole was, That he should think no more of them; that the French Embassador was still at the Bottom of all; that if he wanted to open a Correspondence with France, he knew a nearer Way; that his Intention was only to enter into a Confidence with his Majesty, on the subject of the Peace; and that if the King made Proposals to France, unless in his own Name, it must be from the Body of the Alliance, not from him.

French besiege St. Omer and Cambrai at once.

The Siege of Valenciennes was no sooner over, but St. Omer and Cambrai were invested; the latter by the King, and the former by the Duke of Orleans: And, to take advantage of the Backwardness of the Allies in all Places at once, the French Troops in Germany had Orders to break into the Provinces on the other Side of the Rhine, and to lay waste all before them; which they executed in so terrible a manner, that the Allies made their Complaints to the King of England, who employ'd his Officers towards France, to hinder such an Abuse even of War itself, while a Peace was treating under his Mediation: But the thing was done, and their Point gain'd; which was, by an entire Ruin of the Country, to hinder the Imperialists from finding any Subsistence for their Troops, if they should march into Alsace, and thereby give a Diversion to those Forces, which they intended to make such notable use of, before either the Spaniards or the Dutch could be in a condition to hinder them.

Thus all depended on the Vigour and Resolution of the Prince of Orange, who, alike exasperated with the Negligence of England, the Inactivity of Spain, the Distractions of Germany, and the Successes of France, made prodigious Efforts to collect such a Body of Forces as should enable him to take the Field, and, by the rique of a Battle, put it within the reach of Possibility, at least, to disappoint the Schemes of the Enemy, and thereby give a new Face to the Campaign.

Battle of Mont-Cassel.

With these Thoughts, his Highness, with only a Part of the States Army, and without any Reinforcement, or even Guides, from the Spaniards, march'd directly to St. Omer, with a Resolution to force the French to an Engagement; and was met on his way, near Mont-Cassel, by the Duke of Orleans, assisted and strengthen'd by Mr. de Luxembourg; with all the Forces the King his Brother could spare from the Siege of Cambrai: The French had taken post at a small Village call'd Zuyll Pecqueur, to secure the Passage of the River Peene; but, on the Prince's Approach, retir'd: His Highness then order'd his Troops to pass the said River, and having advanced somewhat farther, found himself oblig'd, contrary to the Information he had receiv'd, to pass another small Stream, in sight of the Enemy, who were drawn up in Battalia on the other side. It is not unnatural to suppose, that this Defect of Intelligence produc'd some Errors of Conduct; and that what discompos'd the Leaders, dismay'd the Soldiers: This is certain; the three Battalions of Dutch Foot, who began the Action, fell immediately into such great and irreparable Disorder, that they bore down four more, which were marching to their Assistance, and, together with them, the Prince in Person, who had desperately thrown himself into the midst of the Fugitives, with his Sword drawn, and vainly endeavour'd, both by Threats and Blows, to turn them again upon the Enemy: This whole Rout fell in among the Cavalry, who yielded to the Impetuosity: The French made the most of their Advantage, and charg'd on all sides, with their usual Impetuosity: The Bulk of the Dutch Troops, however, stood their Ground firmly, and fought bravely: The Dispute lasted three or four Hours; at the End of which time, the Prince, finding Reason to conclude, that an Error in the Beginning of a Fight is very rarely repair'd in the Issue, gave Orders for a Retreat, which he had wisely made Provision for, by causing Bridges to be laid over the Peene, while the Armies were yet engag'd: At this instant came up, most opportunely, the Count de Nassau, with 4000 fresh Horse, who made such a Stand, as gave the Prince time to continue his Retreat to Ypres; tho' not without the Loss of his Cannon and Baggage, and between five and seven thousand Men, who were left dead on the Field: The Prince himself receiv'd a Shot in his Cuirass, and had a Horse kill'd under him: It was often his Fault, to forget he was a Commander in chief; but now, perhaps, it was meritorious; for Soldiers are never so prodigal of their Lives, as when they see their General let no Value on his own: And the same Necessity that forced him to the Field, forced him, when there, to act as if Victory was worth every thing, and Safety nothing.

The French too had their Laurels dipt in Blood; But God's Vicegerents, for the general, value nothing so little as his Image: The Vanity of a wide Dominion was the Bubble that his most Christian Majesty pursued; and, to augment the Number of his Towns, he made no scruple to diminish the Number of his Subjects: Thus the Acquisition of St. Omer and Cambrai, which were the immediate Fruits of the Battle of Mont-Cassel, reconcil'd him to the Slaughter; and he thought it more illustrious to subdue the innocent Inhabitants of other Countries, than to protect and foster his own.

The Spanish Netherlands were now in apparent Danger: Nieuport and Mons to the Land, and Ostend and Newport to the Sea, were the most considerable Places of strength, which remain'd for the French to conquer: All beside were great, untenable Towns, which must be oblig'd to submit at the first Summons, and take the Law from the Conqueror.

We must now return to England, and resume the Business of the Session.

So early as March the 6th, in a Committee of the whole House, upon Grievances, the growing Power of France had been taken into Consideration; and, upon the Issue, it was resolv'd, that an Address should be prepar'd, to represent to his Majesty the Danger of that Power; and to desire that his Majesty, by such Alliances as he should think fit, would both secure his own Kingdoms, and the Spanish Netherlands, and thereby quiet the Fears of his People.

Such an Address was accordingly prepar'd, and presented on the 16th; when his Majesty was pleas'd to answer, that he was of the Opinion of his Parliament, that the Preservation of Flanders was of great Consequence; and that he would use all the Means he could for its Preservation, consistent with the Peace and Safety of his Kingdom.

This was saying just nothing, and it was so understood by the House: Another Address was, therefore, mov'd for, on the 26th, and reported on the 30th, to the following Effect:

That they did, with most earnest and repeated Desires, implore his Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to take timely Care to prevent those Dangers that might arise to these Kingdoms by the great Power of the French King, and the Progress he daily made in the Netherlands, and other Places:

And, therefore, that his Majesty would not defer the entering into such Alliances as might obtain those Ends: And in case it should happen, that, in pursuance of such Alliances, his Majesty should be engag'd in a War with the French King, they did hold themselves oblig'd, and did with all Humility and Cheerfulness assure his Majesty, that they, his most loyal Subjects, should always be ready, upon his Signification thereof in Parliament, fully, and from time to time, to assist his Majesty with such Aids and Supplies, as, by the Divine Assistance, might enable his Majesty to prosecute the same with Success.

A Debate ensu'd: Against this Address it was alleg'd by the French Party, that, to press his Majesty to make farther Alliances with the Confederates, against the French King, was, in effect, to press him to a War; since the one would be the infallible Consequence of the other: That the Consideration of War was the Peculiar of the King, who alone had the Secret of foreign Affairs: That a hasty War was a dangerous thing: That the French would immediately seize our Merchant-ships and Effects in their Ports, interrupt our Commerce, and fill upon our Plantations: That our Fleet was inferior to theirs: That it would require two Years to finish the thirty Ships, now provided for by Parliament: That we had no naval Stores: That, when we were engag'd, the Dutch would give us the slip, and have all the Trade to themselves; which was the very Advantage we had at that time: That it was scarce possible to unite so many thwarting Interests, as were to be the Ingredients of such an Alliance: That it was easy to begin a War, but hard to end it: And that a long War was the worst thing that could befall a trading Nation.

The Dutchmen reply'd; That they did not address for making War, but making Leagues; which might be a Means to prevent War:

That, admitting a War should ensue, as was not unlikely, it would contribute to our Security in the End: That if France was not reduced, we must fight or submit, first or last: That it was the common Fate of those who were neutral, when their Neighbours were at War, to be made the Prey of the Conqueror: That those who would not assist could not expect to be assist'd: That now was the critical Season for a Rupture, when we were sure of so many Confederates: That if such a Rupture was dangerous now, it must end in our Destruction, when left to struggle with so mighty a Power by ourselves: That we had already disobligh'd the several Princes and States in Alliance, by suffering so many British Subjects to go perpetually into the French Service, against them: That we had contributed, in many other Instances, to their present Greatness; of which, the Sale of Dunkirk, the Departure from the Scope of the Triple League, and the joint War with France against Holland, were mention'd: That the Objections drawn from our Commerce and Navigation would always remain: That the immediate Effects of a War would be the saving of 900,000 l. or a Million yearly, now wasted in French Commodities: That it was to be lamented, that the French were already our Superiors at Sea, as well as Land: But that the Dutch were ready to associate, and thereby we should again be Masters of our own Element: That, on the same Principles that so many Powers were already united, one more might be admitted: And that, however false some Men might esteem the Dutch, Interest would not be; and it was so much theirs to reduce the Power of France, that it was not to be imagin'd they would desert any Friend that should embark with them, or any Alliance that should be fram'd for that Purpose.

Upon the whole, the Address was carry'd, and presented to the King that very Day; but no Answer was given till the Eleventh of April; in which Interval, France had obtain'd the great Successes before-mention'd; and propos'd, as usual, to make the necessary Detachments to strengthen their Forces in Germany; as knowing they had already conquer'd as much as they could hold, at least, till another Campaign, which they had good Reason to believe would put the last Hand to the Reduction of Flanders.

This Answer was, That his Majesty had consider'd their Address; and, upon some late Alterations abroad, thought fit to put them in mind, that the only Way to prevent Danger to these Kingdoms would be, to put him in a Condition to make Preparations for their Security, &c.

The Alterations here alluded to were explain'd by Mr. Secretary Cventury, who brought the Message to the House, to be those occasion'd by the Progress of the French Arms. And now the Tables were turn'd: The Ministers affect'd to be concern'd in their turn, for the Fate of the Netherlands; and said plainly, that nothing could put his Majesty in a Condition to make fitting Preparations parations to preserve the Kingdom, but ready Money: They did not, indeed, take upon them to say, they had Direction from his Majesty to avow, that he intended to act offensively: But they took shelter under an Is which (is a Particle of infinite Use in Parliament); In there were any Approaches towards War, it would be necessary to make the Computation recommended in the Gospel beforehand; at least, we ought to be in a defensive Posture, both by LAND and SEA. The ordinary Charge of the Navy stood the King in 400,000*l.* per annum: And he could not make the necessary Additions of Men and Furniture to the Summer Guard of Forty Ships, already appointed, without 200,000*l.* more.

It was answered, That the King's Revenue was greater now, than when he carry'd on a War with France and Holland jointly: That Ireland was able to take care of itself: That a Month before, they had been told, the French King was drawing off his Troops to Germany, and would take no more Towns in Flanders, if he might have them: That, therefore, by Land, we had nothing to fear: That the very recalling our own Troops, and shifting them to the other Side, would make a great Alteration in the Balance: That Ships were the Defence of an Island: That Prussia had already their Hands full of Sicily: That his Majesty did not speak out; did not say he would form the Alliances requir'd: That, as long as there was any Reserve on his Side, they had no clear Grounds to grant Money for Preparations on theirs: That, how honourable soever his Majesty was thought of, a Suspicion prevail'd, that some of his Ministry were under French Influence: And that all they desir'd was, that his Majesty and his People might come to a mutual Confidence, by speaking out on both Sides, as the only Way to extinguish all Jealousies.

It was objected, that secret Purposes ought not to be expos'd to a public Assembly.

It was reply'd, that the thing did not require Secrecy; for, said they, let the King take a great Resolution, and put himself at the Head of his Parliament and People, in this weighty and worthy Cause of England, and let a flying Post carry the News to Paris; and let the French King do his worst.

It was added, that his Majesty never had, nor would have, Cause to distrust his People: That they had given him several Supplies in support of the Triple League, tho' made without Advice of Parliament: That when he made war on the Dutch, which the Parliament thought not for the Interest of England, they nevertheless gave him one Million two hundred thousand Pounds, to carry him through with it: And that, therefore, there was more Reason than ever to be confident, that the Measures he enter'd into, by the pressing Advice of Parliament, the Parliament would think themselves both concern'd and oblig'd to support.

We hope, said they, his Majesty will declare himself in earnest: And we are in earnest, knowing his Majesty's Heart with us.

Let his Hand rest off, that is not stretch'd out for this Affair! We will not stick at this or that Sum or Thing: But we will go with his Majesty to all Extremities.

For a Conclusion, as 200,000*l.* had been mention'd, they propos'd to annex a Clause to the Bill for continuing the additional Duty of Excise, by which the King should be enabled to borrow that Sum, at 7 per Cent. But to this it was objected, that the said Duty had been already granted for other Purposes, &c., to give the King Ease, by enabling him to pay the Interest of his Debts. The Answer was express, that they did not intend to withdraw any Part of that Gift; and that they would reimburse his Majesty for so much of it as he should lay out of it in extraordinary Preparations. The Courtiers rejoic'd, that, as it was a kind of denouncing War, 200,000*l.* was a miserably incompetent Sum, to defend us against the Power we should thus provoke. But this Objection was remov'd, by a farther Declaration, that this was to be understood but as an Earnest of their Intentions: That they were willing to make additional Grants, as the Business went on: And that, however weak we were at present, we were nevertheless as safe as the several little Princes of Germany, who ventur'd to make war on France, not depending on their own peculiar Strength, but on that of the whole Confederacy.

The Debate was clos'd with an Answer to his Majesty's Message, by way of Address, which contain'd an Offer of the full Sum of 200,000*l.* and a Promise to reimburse whatever his Majesty should expend in extraordinary Preparations; as also to furnish him with so large Proportion of Assistance and Supplies upon this Occasion, as might give his Majesty and the whole World an ample Testimony of their Loyalty and Affection, and as might enable his Majesty, by the Help of God, to maintain such stricter Alliances as he should have enter'd into, against all Opposition whatsoever.

By way of Answer came another written Message on Easter Monday, April the 16th, signifying, That his Majesty desired the House should know that not only the Fund they had annex'd the borrowing Clause to, but any other within his Power, should be engag'd to the utmost of his Power, for the Preservation of his Kingdoms: But as he was then circumstanc'd, he must tell them plainly, that, without the Sum of six hundred thousand Pounds, or Credit for such a Sum, upon new Bonds, it would not be possible for him to speak of all those things, which should answer the End of their several Addresses, without exposing the Kingdom to much greater Danger, &c.

This, after some Debate, produc'd another Address, in which the House acquainted his Majesty, that many of their Members, in Expectation of an Adjournment before Easter, being gone into the Country, they did not think it parliamentary, in their Absence, to take upon them the granting of Money, for which Reason they desired leave to ad-Journ for such short time, before the Sum of 200,000*l.* could be expended, as his Majesty should think fit; and that his Majesty would, by his Royal Proclamation, command the Attendance of all their Members, at the Day of Meeting; by which time they hop'd his Majesty would have form'd his Affairs, and fix'd his Alliances, that he would then be able to impart them to his Parliament; no ways doubting but his Majesty would then, not only meet with a Complaisance in the Supply he desired, but such farther Assistance as might be necessary. In Confidence whereof, they hop'd his Majesty would be encourag'd, in the mean time, to speak and do such things as might attain those great Ends, which, the House had formerly represented to him.

Both Houses adjourn'd by the King's Command.

While the House was yet sitting on this Affair, in the Evening of the very Day that his Majesty's Message was dated, the King came suddenly to the House of Peers, and having order'd the Commons to attend him, gave the Royal Assent to such (5) Bills as were ready: After which the Lord Chancellor signified that it was his Majesty's Pleasure, that both Houses should adjourn themselves, till the (8) 21st of May.

Theoral Views of both Parties.

All this while the Nation fix'd their Attention on this solemn and important Controversy, and persuaded themselves, that National Concerns were indeed the Points in Dispute. The Idolaters of Royalty believing, that the King acted in all things as the Angel of God; and those who had their Eyes dazzled with the glittering Pretensions of Patriotism and Public Spirit, on the contrary, placing as implicit a Confidence in their Leaders; and never once imagining, that under so fair a Mask, they had any sinister Designs to cover.

The Truth, however, was, that the most active and busy among them, lifted themselves up on the Shoulders of the People, only to reach the easier those Advantages which grew in a Court. Had they seen Cause to believe that the King and his Ministers might be induc'd to adopt their Schemes, and follow their Footsteps, in the broad Road of Popularity, they had never propos'd to be their Guides: But they knew they were secure on that Side; that the Attachment of the King and his Brother to France was insurmountable; that the more plainly they expos'd that Attachment, the more odious they should render them: And that if the Violence of the Public should at last force them into a War, their Conduct of it would be such as would afford more Matter than ever, for Complaint, Embarrassment, and Distress; which were the great means by which they propos'd to gain their Ends. To such Corruption are the best things liable; and so difficult it is to distinguish Integrity from Imposture!

But all were not Pretenders: The Bulk of the Opposition were Country Gentlemen who neither persu'd nor hop'd to be overtook by Court Favour; who thought all Men as honest as themselves; who voted according to Conscience; who had never lost Sight of the desperate Measures which were the immediate Fruits of our Fellowship with France: And who from thence most reasonably concluded, that the Power and Greatness which his Majesty at first so openly assist'd, and afterwards so pertinaciously committ'd at, would, in the End, be made use of to subdue the Constitution, if not the Kingdom.

And as to the Expediency of England's becoming a Party in the War at this Crisis, and contributing to the setting Bounds to that Power which made such mighty Efforts to swallow up the rest, even Mr. North acknowledges, "There was great Reason to be arm'd, and effectually enter, for obtaining a Stop to the French Conquests, and the Ends of the Triple League, which was the saving Flanders: And there was no Reason to stand still, while the Kingdom of France went on gaining against the Empire, and eating up the Spanish Low Countries. After which Annexations to France, it would be difficult for the Dutch, English, or any Nation to resist them. All this, in Abstract, is most rational. — But then he adds, — "And it is clear the King was of the same Opinion, as all his Negotiations at Home and Abroad, when fairly look'd into, will demonstrate."

Examen. p. 475.

It is impossible to read the latter Part of this Quotation, without recollecting the Passages which had so lately pass'd between the Prince of Orange and Sir William Temple; the Proposals they gave rise to, and the Reception those Proposals met with: And it is equally impossible not to conclude, that if the King would not make use of his Interest with France, to procure a tolerable Peace for the Allies, he had neither the least Intention, nor Inclination to draw the Sword for their Assistance.

But if Don Bernard de Salinas, the Spanish Minister at London is to be depended on, the King was so angry with these Addresses against France, that he call'd the Authors of them,

Proofs of the King's Attachment to France.

(5) The most remarkable of which were, the two Money-bills: an Act to take away that terrible War, & Heretic's comburbs; and an Act for creating a Judicature to determine Differences touching a late dreadful Fire in Southwark. This Disaster had happen'd in May 1696, and no less than 600 Houses were either burnt or blown up: But we do not find, that either Mercet or Burnet, or Oldman himself, ascribes it to the Popery.

(6) Mr. North, while interposing very falsely, and not without Cause, against Bishop Keeble, for Suggestions, or Neglects, upon these several Addresses and Answers, is to suppose, or to imply, as to misstate every one of them:

The 1st Address he even pushes forward to the 23<sup>d</sup> of May, whereas the Parliament was adjourn'd, as we have seen, the 10th of April: And of this Adjournment he takes no notice at all. If the curious Reader will likewise compare his Extracts with those here given, he will find, that some of them were not over-ingeniously taken: All which is so much the more to be wonder'd at, as he contends so ardently for Accuracy, and Exactness; and uniformly trusts Mr. Morrey's Growth of Popery as the worst of all Labels; which would have set him right, in the Particulars here alluded to, if he had thought it worth his while to have consulted it.

them, A Company of Rogues. It appears in Sir William Temple's Memoirs, that Don Bernard made no Secret of this Story to his Friends in the House of Commons; which his Majesty so highly resent'd, that he order'd him to depart the Kingdom within certain Days.

Sir John Reresley also bears witness, that the Lord Treasurer told him, that the Duke was the greatest Promoter of the French Interest, that the King had no mind to fall out with France, and that in the Sequel of the Conversation, his Lordship added, "That if the Parliament would effectually engage him in that War, their way would be to furnish him with Sums of Money to prepare for it, and that no less than six hundred thousand Pounds would be absolutely necessary for that Purpose. That if the King accepted of this, he would be obliged to carry on the War; but that if the Parliament would not trust him, he was in the right not to embark himself, and might justly argue, How can I depend on my Parliament to furnish me with regular and equal Supplies to carry on a War, which they will not so much as enable me to prepare for? But (continues the Knight) I easily saw thro' this; I plainly perceiv'd it was all Artifice to get the fingering of Monty.

He (the Treasurer) moreover said, according to Sir John, That the King could not in Honour join the Confederates against France: That in all the Treaties, the King of England had been mentioned as Principal in the War: That in the Beginning he did actually join with France, and that for him now to turn his Arms against that Crown, would look neither just nor honourable in the Eye of the World. This his Lordship told me (Reresley) was the King's own way of arguing, whenever War happen'd to be the Subject of their Discourse together; but that his Answer to his Majesty was, That he needed not to be regardful of that Transaction, the French King having plac'd him the very same Trick when Chancellor Hyde was chief Minister. To this he replied, That the French King had a Pique against the Lord Chancellor: To which the Treasurer subjoin'd, That whatever was the Cause, the thing was as he had said.

Again, Sir Leslie Jenkins, in his Dispatch to Mr. Secretary Williamson, dated April 19, which was three Days after the Adjournment of Parliament, specifies, that Mr. Beverning, (the Chief of the Dutch Plenipotentiaries) had, in a Conference with him, express'd himself as follows: "That the French were at this time so high, that there was no talking to them of a Peace, nor Hopes to have it upon reasonable Terms; and that for four Reasons, which he gave in this Order: 1. For the late Successes of their Arms. 2. For that they had nothing to apprehend du Côté de l'Angleterre (on the Side of England.) 3. For that there would be a Breach between Poland and some of the Allies. 4. For that Don John, would be glad to make a Peace at any Rate, and that he had open'd himself to the Pope's Nuncio to that Effect. Then, resuming again the Article of England, he said, It was most certain that the most Christian King, had, not long since, said in his Discourses, that tho' the Spanish Netherlands were to be wholly lost, yet England would not arm one Man of War to oppose it.

And what is still more extraordinary than all the rest, The Adjournment had scarce taken Place, but a pompous Embassy arriv'd here from France, consisting of the Duke de Crequi, the Archbishop of Rheims, Mr. Barrillon, and a Train of between three and four hundred Persons of all Qualities; so that, says Marvell, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of France, with many of their Commons meeting the King at Newmarket, it look'd like another Parliament, and that the English had been adjourn'd in order to their better Reception. Sir John Reresley also acknowledges, "That this gave just Cause to think there would be no War between the two Kings, contrary to what the Parliament had so earnestly desired." Sir John adds, "That he saw a Copy of the Letter which these Ambassadors brought; out of which he quotes only the founding Titles in the Address; and observes upon it, "That our King's Neutrality deserv'd all this from France, and much more."

The Letter itself was calculated to shew, that, contrary to what his Enemies gave out, his most Christian Majesty had no Intention to conquer Flanders; that notwithstanding the great Advantages he had gain'd, and the great Force he was Master of, he was contented, by a long Truce, to leave things as they were, in case his Allies the Swedes would agree to it; which he desir'd his Majesty to inform himself of, since he had not Convenience of doing it, for the want of Liberty of sending Couriers into Sweden.

A Copy of it was also communicated to the French Ambassadors at the Congress: With what Effect, may be collected from Mr. Beverning's Reasonings upon it, who openly declared, That the French were to be commended, who never neglected any thing of Importance, nor so much as of Amusement: That they had given their Blow, and now would hinder the Allies from giving theirs: That the Reason of Sweden's Content was an easy way of avoiding the Truce, if the Allies should accept it: That if they had meant any thing fair by this Offer, they should have made it in January last: And that having now possess'd themselves of all the Frontiers of Flanders, they had a great deal of Reason to desire it, because in two or three Years time, all they had gain'd, either in Flanders or Sicily, would grow to be as much French, as Picardy or Languedoc: That when the Force of the present Alliance was once broken, it would be easy to make an End of the rest at any time, in one Campaign: That as the French had great Reason to be for a Truce, the Dutch had but little against it: But that he did not believe the Allies of either side would consent to it; and, perhaps, the Swedes as little little as the Spaniards, who were very sensible of their ill Usage, tho' they did not know how to help themselves.

Hereby.

In England, however, this Embassy had all the Effect that could be desir'd: It amas'd, at least, if it answer'd no farther Ends: And the King, we are told, was punctual in returning the Compliment, by the Earl of Sunderland: So that tho' his Majesty was forward enough to take advantage of the Importunity of the Commons, to fill his Coffers, it does not appear, that as yet he entertain'd one serious Thought of breaking with France, in order to be well with his People: But we are not to pronounce, till we come to the End of our Evidence.

Eaton, P. 470.

Mr. North, his Majesty's Advocate, is pleas'd to say, His chief Care was of two Things: 1. That the Dutch should be engag'd as well as himself, to the end that he might not be caught in a forward Declaration of War, and then be left alone in it. 2. That, before he engag'd, he might be sure of a Foyd settled, as might enable him to carry on such a War.

And to these two things, two more occur in answer, viz. 1. The Commons plainly made it a Fundamental, that the Dutch should BE ENGAGED, as well as the King; and not only they, but the greater Part of the Confederates. 2. Whatever Reason his Majesty had to distrust the Parliament, the Parliament had as much to distrust his Majesty: And whereas that Gentleman further endeavours to prove, that the Dutch, as a People, labour'd, by all possible means, to HAWL England into the War, for their own sinister Ends, we find the following Evidence to the contrary, in the Dispatches of Sir Leoline Jenkins, dated June 4.

“ He (Mr. Bevering, who was just return'd from the Hague with final Instructions about the Peace) took occasion to say, That the Spaniards flatter'd themselves very much upon their Hopes from England: And that Mr. Van Banning (the Dutch Minister in England) did the same, in all his Letters of late, even to that by the last Post: But that he, Mr. (Bevering, for his part, neither believ'd anything of it, nor desir'd what they propos'd to themselves: That he had much rather his Majesty should make the Peace than War; and that most PEOPLE in Holland were of the same Mind, tho' he knew some were of another: But he did not think the Business of Holland was to draw out the War into length; that he would be very glad France might believe the King were in earnest, and resolv'd to prescribe the Terms of a reasonable Peace, and not to see Flanders lost; because he knew very well, that this Apprehension in the French would certainly make the Peace: But they believ'd as little of it as he did; repeating what has been touch'd upon before, that he was as sure as of the Sun's Shining, that the King of France had said, in confidence, to some he could name, since the Beginning of this Campaign in Flanders, that he was not in pain about England; and that the King would not stir, so much as to hinder him from the Conquest of the last Town in Flanders.”

A. D. 1677.

We are now to resume the Session once more, and proceed with the Trial of Skill between the King and Parliament; which was, either to distrust the Former into a War with his Brother of France, against his Will, or to draw a large Supply from the Latter, without any Purpose to answer the End for which it was granted.

Parliament re-assembled.

On the 21st of May, both Houses met, according to Adjournment; and the Business in the House of Commons was open'd with a verbal Message from his Majesty, by Mr. Secretary Coxworthy, signifying, that, as he had issued out his Proclamation of Summons for a full House, he did now expect they would forthwith enter upon the Consideration of his last Message; and the rather, because he did intend there should be a Ketch very quickly.

The Affairs of Alliance resumed.

The said last Message, and the Answer thereto, were then read; and, after a long Silence, it was urg'd, that they came with an Expectation to have Alliances declar'd; and that, if such Alliances were not form'd, they were not call'd, or come, to the Purpose they desir'd: An Alliance with Holland was particularly mention'd, as not only expedient, but necessary: We alone, it was said, could not withstand the French; their Purse and Power were too great. Nor could the Dutch withstand them: But both together might.

Growth of Popery.

The Secretary and his Corps answer'd, That these Alliances were Things of great Weight and Difficulty: That the Time had been short: And that, if they were finish'd, it would not be convenient to publish them, till the King was in a Posture to defend and maintain them; that is to say, without six hundred thousand Pounds; till when, his Majesty could not so much as speak out, according to the Expressions of his Message before-quoted.

The Adversary then interjected, That when they desir'd an Adjournment, they nam'd no particular Day: It was in his Majesty's own Breast to have extended it to what Time he pleas'd: And if the Time first appointed had been found insufficient, he might have signify'd as much in his Proclamation; and the House might have adjourn'd themselves to a longer Day.

But it was asserted, that the Time was sufficient; especially considering the Readiness of the several Parties to meet our Proposals half-way: That it was five Weeks since the Receipt; and the principal Agent in the Triple League had inform'd the World in Print, that he had completed that Measure in Five Days: That the Dutch were then

(1) These Expressions of Mr. Bevering's, Sir William Temple, in his Memoirs, has connected with the Discourse of the said Minister, on the French King's Proposal for a long Truce.

then in profound Peace; which made it the more difficult to embark them in a Measure which had a Tendency to interrupt it: That, on the contrary, they were now embroiled, and in Distress; and therefore would be glad to embrace any Proposals, which promised them Assistance and Relief.

And as to the Objection, that it was not fit to publish Alliances, before our Preparations were made, it was answer'd, that the asking and giving Money, in consequence of the several Addresses and Answers which had pass'd; and which could be no Secret in France, would give the Alarm as effectually, and operate as dangerously, as the Acknowledgment of Alliances; since both were alike declaratory that a Rupture was at hand.

Many other things were said of the same Tendency; and probably the Courtiers kept the Money still in their Eye, and had recourse to every Subterfuge, and every Falacy, which might any way flatter their Hopes of taking possession. But, upon the whole, the House adjourn'd, without coming to any Conclusion; having first ordered the Committee for the Bill to recall his Majesty's Subjects out of the French Service, to sit in the Afternoon; which they did accordingly, and went thro' with it.

The Adjournment was from Monday till Wednesday; and, in the Interval, both Parties busy'd themselves, as usual upon the like Occasions; that is to say, in concerting the most effectual Measures to get the better of each other.

By way of Expedient on the Court-side, his Majesty sent a Message to the House, to attend him presently at Whitehall; where he made them a Speech, which, to obviate all Cavils, is here inserted verbatim:

"Gentlemen,

King's Speech.

"I have sent for you hither, that I might prevent those Mistakes and Disturbances, which I find some are ready to make, as if I had called you together, only to get Money from you, for other Uses than you would have it employ'd. I do assure you, on the Word of a King, that you shall not repent any Trust you repose in me, for the Safety of my Kingdoms; and I desire you to believe I would not break my Credit with you; but as I have already told you, that it will not be possible for me to speak or all those things which should answer the Ends of your several Addresses, without exposing my Kingdoms to much greater Dangers; so I declare to you again, I will neither hazard my own Safety, nor yours, until I be in a better Condition than I am able to put myself, both to defend my Subjects, and offend my Enemies.

"I do further assure you, I have not lost one Day since your last Meeting, in doing all I could for your Defence; and I tell you plainly, it shall be your Fault, and not mine, if your Security be not sufficiently provided for."

Had the Word of a King never been forfeited, it is reasonable to suppose, that, upon this great Occasion, it would have been taken: Or, if all Appearances had not been utterly irreconcilable with these Professions, those who contended so warmly for the End, must have granted the Means: But as the Case was, Opposition was not only countenanced, but applauded: And the Majority, both of the Parliament and People, acted as if there was more Reason to dread the Designs of their own Monarch, than even of his Brother of France.

The Commons being return'd to their House, Mr. Secretary Coventry, and his Followers gave them to understand, That the Supply was not insisted on; but that they were not to expect any Alliances without it: That the King had declar'd he could not speak nor act without it: That the King had the Files of Peace and War in his keeping; as they had the Money in theirs: That as the King could not have Money without them, they could not have Alliances without the King: That the King had consider'd the Matter: That this was the King's Judgment: That it was true, the Grant of a Supply would give the alarm as effectually, as the declaring an Alliance; but then it would defend too: That the King would strip himself to his Shirt, to preserve the Nation: That he had set out forty-four Ships already; but they were to be distributed in Coovoyes: That forty more would be wanting to act in a Body: That Seamen were scarce: That they were gone into the French Service: That the King was forced to press now: That he had apply'd to the City for some Fruit of the 200,000*l.* Credit provided for him; and that the Lord Mayor had return'd for Answer, that he could not encourage his Majesty to depend upon the City for it.

The Opposers, on the other hand, finding the King thus put in Front of the Battle, thought it proper to remove him before they made their Attack; which they did very artificially, by laying it down as a Maxim, That the King's Messages and Speeches should be treated there as his Patents and Proclamations were in the Courts below; that is to say, they should be considered as the Manufacture of his Ministers; and that for what was said in them, not the King, but they, were to be made answerable. Under this Umbrage they proceeded to say, There was no Necessity for a Sum of Money previous to the forming and concluding of Alliances: That Alliances might be made forthwith, and then Money would be granted forthwith: That if they were declar'd to-day, the 600,000*l.* should be given to-morrow: That forty Ships, with the Assistance of the Dutch, were sufficient for the Defensive: That by the Triple League, the Quota to be furnish'd by England and Holland were forty Ships each, and no more: That if forty more were wanting, 600,000*l.* would defray the Cost of all: That if any other Preparations were meant, by filling the Land with Forts, Garrisons, &c. six Millions would not serve: That our Strength and Defence consisted in our Ships: That the Debate of that Day concern'd our very being, and included Religion,

Debate thereon.

A. D. 1677. Religion, Liberty, and Property: That the Door towards France must be shut and guarded; for so long as it was left open, our Treasure and Trade would creep out, and their Religion would creep in: That we were not in immediate Danger, while France was beset with so many Enemies; but that our Business was to be provided against the future, and not leave it in her Power to disable us by concerting the very Alliances which we neglected.

Others said, That without these Alliances they could not answer the giving Money either to themselves or their Constituents: That they had made several Addresses already against some of the King's Ministers, and their Conduct, without Success: That those Ministers had, almost to that Hour, either sent, or committ'd at the sending of Succours of Men, Powder, Ammunition, Ordnance, &c. to France: That such Ministers therefore, were not to be trusted without taking the proper Precautions: That the Alliances demanded were the best Security they could give for their good Behaviour: That the parting with the Money beforehand, was, in Effect, to leave all at their Mercy: That the Lord Mayor had not apply'd for the Loan in the usual way to the Common Council; and that the very Citizens expected the Alliances to be made, before they would part with their Money, tho' for a valuable Consideration.

A Motion was then made for an Address, that his Majesty would enter into a League Offensive and Defensive with Spain, the States, and other of the Confederates: But Spain was afterward left out, for the sake of bringing the Affair to a more speedy Issue. And as to the States, it was objected, That they were already treating with the French; whence it was likely they would slip themselves out of the Collar, make a separate Peace for themselves, and leave us engag'd alone in the War. But it was answer'd, That the States were driven into this Treaty by their Despair of Assistance from us; and that if they found the Court of England as well dispos'd as the People to join with them, the Reason of their Treating would cease, and they would readily sling away the Scabard.

The Question being finally put, tho' there was an extraordinary full House, it was carry'd for the Address with so general a Consent, that there were but two Negative Voices against it.

It was now natural to suppose, that all Debate was at an end, and that those who had been so effectually routed would rally no more. But the Event did not answer this Supposition; the Address was reported on May the 25th, and, for the sake of giving the whole Truth, deserves likewise to be inserted without Abridgment, as follows:

" May it please your Most Excellent Majesty,

Your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, have taken into their serious Consideration, your Majesty's gracious Speech; and do beseech your Majesty to believe it is a great Affliction to them, to find themselves oblig'd (at present) to decline the granting your Majesty the Supply your Majesty is pleas'd to demand, conceiving it is not agreeable to the Usage of Parliament, to grant Supplies for Maintenance of Wars and Alliances, before they are signify'd in Parliament (which the two Wars against the States of the United Provinces, since your Majesty's happy Restoration, and the League made in January 1668, for Preservation of the Spanish Netherlands, sufficiently proved, without troubling your Majesty with Instances of greater Antiquity) from which Usage if we might depart, the Precedent might be of dangerous Consequence in future times, though your Majesty's Goodness gives us great Security during your Majesty's Reign, which we beseech God long to continue.

This Consideration prompted us, in our last Address to your Majesty before our last Recess, humbly to mention to your Majesty our Hopes, that, before our Meeting again, your Majesty's Alliances might be so fixed, as that your Majesty might be graciously pleas'd to impart them to us in Parliament, that so our earnest Desires of supplying your Majesty for prosecuting those great Ends we had humbly laid before your Majesty, might meet with no Impediment or Obstruction; being highly sensible of the Necessity of supporting, as well as making, the Alliances humbly desired in our former Addresses, and which we still conceive so important to the Safety of your Majesty, and your Kingdoms, that we cannot (without Unfaithfulness to your Majesty, and those we represent) omit, upon all occasions, humbly to beseech your Majesty, as we now do, to enter into a League offensive and defensive with the States General of the United Provinces, against the Growth and Power of the French King, and for the Preservation of the Spanish Netherlands, and to make such other Alliances, with such other of the Confederates, as your Majesty shall think fit and useful to that End, in doing which (that no time may be lost) we humbly offer to his Majesty these Reasons for the expediting of it:

1. That if the entering into such Alliances should draw on a War with the French King, it would be least detrimental to your Majesty's Subjects at this time of the Year, they having now fewest Effects within the Dominions of that King.

2. That tho' we have great Reason to believe the Power of the French King to be dangerous to your Majesty and your Kingdoms, when he shall be at more leisure to molest us; yet we conceive the many Enemies he has to deal with at present, together with the Situation of your Majesty's Kingdoms, the Unanimity of the People in the Cause, the Care your Majesty hath been pleas'd to take of your ordinary Guards of the Sea, together with the Credit provided by the late Act for an additional Excise for three Years, make the entering into, and declaring Alliances, very safe, until we may, in a regular Way, give your Majesty such further further Supplies, as may enable your Majesty to support your Alliances, and defend your Kingdoms.

And because of the great Danger and Charge, which must necessarily fall upon your Majesty's Kingdoms, if, through want of that timely Encouragement and Assistance, which your Majesty's joining with the States General of the United Provinces, and other the Confederates, would give them, the said State, or any other considerable Part of the Confederates, should this next Winter, or sooner, make a Peace or Truce with the French King (the Precedent whereof will hitherto be acknowledged a singular Effect of God's Goodness to us) which if it should happen, your Majesty would be afterwards necessitated, with fewer, perhaps with no Alliances or Assistance, to withstand the Power of the French King, which hath so long and so successfully contended with so many and so potent Adversaries; and whilst he continues his overbalancing Greatness, must always be dangerous to his Neighbours, since he would be able to oppress any one Confederate, before the rest could get together, and be in so good a Posture of offending him as they now are, being jointly engaged in a War. And if he should be so successful as to make a Peace, or dissolve the present Confederation against him, it is much to be fear'd, whether it would be possible ever to reunite it; at least, it would be a Work of so much Time and Difficulty, as would leave your Majesty's Kingdoms exposed to much Miserie and Danger.

Having thus discharged our Duty, in laying before your Majesty the Dangers threatening your Majesty and your Kingdoms, and the only Remedies we can think of, for the preventing, securing, and quieting the Minds of your Majesty's People, with some few of those Reasons which have moved us to this, and our former Addresses on these Subjects; we most humbly beseech your Majesty to take the Matter into your serious Consideration; and to take such Resolutions, as may not leave it in the Power of any neighbouring Prince, to rob your People of that Happiness, which they enjoy under your Majesty's gracious Government; beseeching your Majesty to rest confident and assured, that, when your Majesty shall be pleas'd to declare such Alliances in Parliament, we shall hold ourselves obliged, not only by our Promises and Assurances given, and now with great Unanimity revived in a full House, but by the Zeal and Desires of those whom we represent, and by the Interests of all our Saeties, most cheerfully to give your Majesty, from time to time, such speedy Supplies, and Assistance, as may fully and plentifully answer the Occasion, and, by God's Blessing, preserve your Majesty's Honour, and the Safety of the People.

All which is most humbly submitted to your Majesty's great Wisdom.

On the reading of this Address, a new Debate arose: The particularizing what Alliances the King ought to make was represented as an Invasion of the Prerogative, and as carrying along with it a disrespectful Insinuation, that what he was to do was by their Leave: That it tended to put the King upon a great Indecorum, who acting, at Nimwegen, the Part of a Mediator, ought not, at the same time, to declare himself a Party: That this Driving was the Way for the King to have a worse Bargain with the Confederates; who would make Abatements in their Offers, in proportion as they saw his Majesty compell'd to come in: That his Majesty agreed with the House, in the End (this was several times repeated): That they were perswaded he would also prosecute it by the same Means: But that his Prerogative was not to be encroach'd upon: That this manner of proceeding would never obtain with the King; and, if they persisted in it, their Address would miscarry.

It was answer'd, That the Question before them was, whether they should agree or disagree to the Address, as drawn by the Committee by Order of the House? And that if the said Address did not correspond with the Order, they had Cause to reject it; but the Exception taken was to that Part of it which contain'd the very Words of the said Order, and which, in the former Debate, had been allow'd, Two only contradicting, and not one asserting, or seeming to think, the Prerogative was invaded. They would not however allow, that the Prerogative was at all invaded: They only offer'd Advice: They did not take upon them to negotiate Alliances, the King was left free as ever, either to adopt or reject it as he pleas'd: But if his Privy Council might advise, his Great Council might do the same: And that, according to the Drift of this Argument, the King's Prerogative consisted in not being advised by his Parliament. That there were, however, Precedents manifold of such parliamentary Advices; several of which they enumerated: That if there had been no such Precedent, they themselves might have made one; Matter of Advice not being reducible to any fix'd Laws: That it had been the Desire and Endeavour of Kings, in all Ages, to engage their Parliaments in advising War, that so their Parliaments might be obliged to furnish them with the necessary Supplies: And that Parliaments, on the contrary, had sometimes prudently wav'd all Concern in the Quarrels of their Kings, for fear they should become burdensome to the People: That as to his Majesty's Mediation at Nimwegen, they did not desire such Alliances as would further the general Peace he was in pursuit of, but such as would prevent it: That their pressing him into Alliances was so far from exposing him to a bad Bargain with the Confederates, that it authoriz'd him to insist on the Best; since a League with England was then most valuable, when it was enter'd into by the King, by the Advice, and with the Applause, of his People: That it was not supposable, that the particularizing in the Address would endanger its Miscarriage; since the more particularly the Sense of the House was made known, the less Opportunity they would have

A. D. 1677. have to excuse themselves from giving his Majesty the necessary Supplies, under the Pretence, that the Alliances he had made were not such as they expected, and had promis'd to support him in: That so much precious Time had already been lost, that they could not avoid speaking out now: That to address in general Terms, was the Way to lose as much more: That as his Majesty, both in his last Speech and Message, had so solemnly assur'd the House, that the Money should be employ'd to no other Uses, than such as it should be granted for, nothing was more pertinent than for them to specify what those Uses were; especially as there was no Alliance but that with Holland, which the House thought worth such a Sum: That there was no Cause to apprehend, that his Majesty would take offence at any such Signification, since they had address'd his Majesty, more than once, for Alliances against the growing Power of France; and his Majesty had received, admitted, and answer'd those Addresses: And if the House might address for Alliances against any particular Prince or State, it was well urg'd, why not for Alliances with any particular Prince or State?

It was added, That, from all their past Addresses, and his Majesty's Answers, it appear'd, that what he expected, and would have, was not to limit and check their Advice, but to open and enlarge their Gift: And that they being ready to furnish him with Money, nothing was more reasonable, than to present him with their Advice for the Application.

And, in the Close of all, it was said, That there was not only a Necessity to reduce France within her antient Bounds, but to take every other Measure that would contribute to empower her, by destroying her Trade.

Both Parties having, at last, exhausted their Arguments, the Question was put, Whether the PARTICULAR of a League offensive and defensive with the Dutch should be left out of the Address; and carry'd in the Negative: YES 142, NOES 182.

The next Morning, being the 26th, having receiv'd Notice that they were not to wait on the King with the said Address till Three in the Afternoon, they gave the last Hand to the (n) Bill for recalling his Majesty's Subjects out of the French Service, and sent it up by Mr. Powle (or Powed) who had been Chairman of the Committee, to the House of Peers; who was also order'd to put their Lordships in mind of a Bill for the better suppressing the Growth of Popery, which had been sent up to their Lordships before Easter.

Motions were also made, for the reading of several other Bills; but none were admitted; the Members in general declaring, they would proceed on nothing but the French and Popery.

On presenting their Address, his Majesty was pleas'd to say, That it was long, and of great Importance; that he would consider of it; and would give them an Answer as soon as he could. Accordingly, the next Day but one, this Answer was given by the King in Person to the whole House, attending on him by his Command at Whitehall: His Majesty first read it, and then gave the Paper to the Speaker; to whom he also signify'd his Pleasure, that the House should adjourn to the 16th of July.

The Contents of this decisive Paper were as follow:

"Gentlemen,
"Could I have been silent, I would rather have chosen to be so, than to call to mind Things so unfit for you to meddle with, as are contain'd in some Parts of your last Addresses, wherein you have entrenched upon so undoubted a Right of the Crown, that I am confident it will appear in no Age (when the Sword was not drawn) that the Prerogative of making Peace and War had been so dangerously invaded.

"You do not content yourselves with desiring me to enter into such Leagues as may be for the Safety of the Kingdom, but you tell me what sort of Leagues they must be, and with whom; and (as your Address is worded) it is more liable to be understood to be by your Leave, than at your Request, that I should make such other Alliances as I please, with other of the Confederates.

"Should I suffer this fundamental Power of making Peace and War to be so far invaded (tho' but once) as to have the Manner and Circumstances of Leagues prescribed to me by Parliament, it is plain, that no Prince or State would any longer believe that the Sovereignty of England rests in the Crown; nor could I think myself to signify any more to foreign Princes, than the empty Sound of a King. Wherefore you may rest assured, that no Condition shall make me depart from, or lessen, so essential a Part of the Monarchy. And I am willing to believe so well of this House of Commons, that I am confident these ill Consequences are not intended by you.

"These are, in short, the Reasons why I can by no means approve of your Address; and yet, though you have declin'd to grant me that Supply which is necessary to the Ends of it, I do again declare to you, that as I have done all that lay in my Power, since your last Meeting; so I will still apply myself, by all the means I can

The Address carry'd.

(n) This Bill was in Substance as follows:

That all and every of the natural-born Subjects of his Majesty, who should continue or be, after the first of August next, in the military Service of the French King, should be liable to inherit any Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, and be incapable of any Gift, Grace, or Legacy; or to be Executor or Administrator; and, being convicted, should be adjudged guilty of Felony, without Benefit of the Clergy, and not pardonable by his Majesty, his Heirs or Successors, except only by Act of Parliament, wherein such Offenders should be particularly named. The like Appointment for such as should continue in the Sea-Service of the French King, after the 28th of May, 1678.

" can, to let the World see my Care, both for the Security and Satisfaction of my People, although it may not be with those Advantages to them, which, by your Assurances, I might have procur'd."

The Speaker's speaking Behaviour at the Adjourning.

The Members being return'd to their House, several of them rose up, possibly to express their Sense of this cavalier Treatment; but were overborne by the Speaker, who took upon him to play the Dictator too, by insisting vehemently, that, after the King had requir'd the House to adjourn, there was no more Liberty of Speech: This being however contested, and those who had stood up demanding still to be heard, the Speaker had the Confidence (says Marvell) without any Question put, and of his own Motion, to pronounce the House adjourn'd; and therewithal stepp'd down on the middle of the Floor; leaving the Members astonish'd at so flagrant a Violation of their inherent Privileges.

They had also the additional Mortification to see this chiding Speech of the King's made public in the (a) Gazette of the next Day, being the first which had ever appear'd in that Paper, to point them out both to their own, and all other Nations, as refractory, disobedient Subjects, who had lost all Respect to his Majesty: Care being at the same time taken to suppress even the written Copies of the Proceedings of the House, that nothing might appear in their Justification.

To show, moreover, that this ignominious Dismissal was to affect only that House which had presum'd to disturb the Tranquility of the Court, the Lords had Leave to adjourn themselves after the ancient Form; The Question being first propounded by the Lord Chancellor, and agreed to by the Lords present, as usual: All Adjournments (unless made by special Commission, under the Great Seal) tho' directed by his Majesty, having always been the Act of the House.

Presumption that the Court was, at this time, divided.

There is, after all, some Reason to think the Court was divided at this time. We have already seen, that the Lord Treasurer had enter'd into very close Engagements with the Prince of Orange; and we shall soon see that he was a thorough Opposer of the Designs of France. It is therefore not unreasonable to think, if he did not contribute to the raising this Storm, that, in the Cabinet, he endeavour'd to make, at once, both a politic and popular use of it; but that he found the Duke too mighty for him, and was forc'd to give into Measures he could not approve.

Marvell, speaking of the different Turn which the Session had taken, from the Direction it set out with, says: " It were easy to assign the more intimate Causes; but they having therein also acted according to the public Interest, we will be glad to suppose it to have been their only Motive." And we find by a Letter of Mr. Bristow's to the Lord Treasurer, that Mr. Rutsgen, who was with Reason, believ'd to be the Man in France who understood England best, was of Opinion, the Parliament would grant the 600,000 l. without any harsh Conditions, or appointing Administrators of their own; BECAUSE the Lord Treasurer was in concert with them, and had promis'd that the Money should be dispos'd of as they desir'd.

Lord Danby's
p. 314.

Possibly it may be thought we have dwelt rather too long on this obstinate Struggle between the two Factions: But there is scarce any Section of our Story, in which Posterity is more concern'd. Those who, under Pretence of serving their Country, made it their Business to throw it into Confusion, could not have planted their Batteries on a more advantageous Ground, than the obvious Necessity of England's becoming a Party with the Confederates in the War against France: Nor could the King have taken a Step more

Faction in putting the King on a French

fatal to his own Repose, than in thus gratifying the Views of his Enemies; by rejecting their Advice and refusing their Offers; and in relying more on the (6) Amity and Support of his most Christian Brother, than the Affections of his own People. The Soil was now prepared for the worst Seeds that the work of Men could fester; who became immediately as vigilant and active as the Devil with his Tares; and who, not unreasonably, promis'd themselves as rich a Harvest. Nor did it operate less fatally abroad than at home: All Europe now saw, that the two Kings could not be divided; and if not divided, that France could never be humbled. In order, therefore, to avail themselves of the Disposition of the People of England, some of the most politic amongst them, perhaps this early, form'd Designs on the Royal Family; and, by a Transfer of the Power of the Kingdom into other Hands, purpos'd to render it subservient to their own Views.

Fatal Consequences of the
clining it.

Certain it is, that if his Majesty had now clos'd in earnest with the Desires of his People, he had disculpated himself, he had subdu'd the Faction; he had not only prevail'd, but secur'd a Balance of Power in Europe; and had sav'd this unhappy Country from being exhausted and beggar'd in the several foreign Wars which have since sadden'd our Annals, and made us the Property, in turn, of almost every State whose Quarrel we officiously espous'd.

One Word more remains yet to be said of the Adjournment: The four obnoxious Lords were full under Confinement; and while the Session was only suspended, not completed, there was no way left for them to obtain their Liberty; but by Petition to his Majesty. It was for this Reason that the House was adjourn'd rather than prorog'd; and three of their Lordships, viz. Buckingham, Salisbury, and

imprison'd Lords petition for and obtain their Liberty.

(a) Upon this Occasion Marvell adds, " Thus were they well requited for their lack of perpetual Sitting, and of sitting: The Parliament being grown to that Height of Contempt, as to be gazett'd among run-away Servants, Lad-dogs, Brandy Horncs, and Highway Robbers."

(b) In the Letter of Mr. Bristow's above-quoted, there is likewise the following Passage:

" They (the French Court) think or say, at least, that the personal Friendship betwixt our Prince & them, that our Master has no where else so good a Security for the Support of his Prerogative: And I think, and dare say, they would be loth, upon occasion, the Defence of it should cost them any thing."

and Wharion, chusing rather to make their Submission, than continue in Durance any longer, petition'd, and were discharged: But the Spirit of the Earl of Shaftsbury was not so easily subdued, it was not for inflicting that the Parliament was dissolved that he stood committed, but for refusing to recant that Doctrine: The Lords Order express'd no other Cause than high Contempt, which could hardly warrant a long and close Imprisonment: His Lordship likewise knew, that his Perseverance would be deem'd meritorious, and that his making a Baffle to procure his Liberty by Law, would encrease his Popularity. Accordingly in Trinity Term, June 27 and 29, he made his Return by Habeas Corpus to the King's Bench, and demanded to be dismissed upon Bail; but the Court being of Opinion, That they had no Jurisdiction of the Cause, he was (p) remanded to the Tower, where he continued for some Months longer, meditating Mischief and Revenge; till at last, finding there was no other way out than that which the Lords his fellow Prisoners had taken before him, by Submission, he consented to tread in their Steps, and was again let loose, like the Dragon in the Revelations, full of Wrath, and more desperately bent than ever to throw the Kingdom into Confusion.

From the Broils of the Senate, we must now turn to the Intrigues of the Cabinet.

Mr. Montagu, who had been Ambassador at the Court of France, during the Administration of the Cabal, and who rather prefer'd to be than was in the Secret of the two Courts, had been sent thither again, in the place of Lord Berkely, towards the Close of the last Year; and like a thorough Courtier, look'd round

Mr. Montagu's Undertaking to procure the King more Money from France. [Lord Danby's Minister, vol. 1.]

(p) The Cause was soon after made public, together with the following Speech, which his Lordship made in the Court:

My Lord, I did not intend to have spoke one Word in this Business, but something hath been objected and laid to my charge by the King's Council, Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor, that enforce me to say something for your better Satisfaction. They have told you, that my Council, in their Arguments, said, that this Court was greater than the House of Peers; which I dare to appeal to your Lordships and the whole Court, that it was never spoken by them: I am sure, was not by any Disciples of mine. What is done by my Council, and by me, is, that this is the most proper Court to refer unto, where the Liberty of the Subject is concern'd. The Lords House is the supreme House of Judicature in the Kingdom; but yet there is a Jurisdiction that the Lords House does not meddle with. The King's Council hath mention'd, as a Wonder, that a Member of the Lords House should come hither, to diminish the Jurisdiction of the Lords. I acknowledge them to be superior to this or any other Court, to whom all Appeals and Writs of Error are brought; and yet there are Jurisdictions that they do not challenge, and which are not natural to them, or proper for them. They claim not to meddle in original Causes; and so I might mention in other things: And I do not think it a Kindness to give Power, or Body of Men, to give them some Power that are not natural or proper to their Constitution. I do not think it a Kindness to the Lords, to make them absolute and above the Law, for to I humbly conceive this must do, if it be adjudg'd that they, by a general Warrant, or without any particular Cause assign'd, do commit me, or any other Man, to a perpetual and absolute Imprisonment: And, my Lords, I am not so inconsiderate a Person, but what you do in my Case, shall be Law for every Man in England.

Mr. Attorney is pleas'd to say, I am a Member of the Lords House, and so lay weight on the Word Member: It is very true, I am one of them, and no Man hath a greater Reverence or Esteem for the Lords than myself; but, my Lords, I have my being as a Peer, as a Member of either House, shall not lose my being as a Subject, or make me to have less Privileges than Magna Charta, and the other Laws of England Liberty.

My Opinion is not with one of my Council, who argued very learnedly, that the passing an Act by the King's Royal Assent can make a Sentence; because the usual Promise was not in it. It was without any Intimation of mine to mention that Point.

The King's Council tells your Lordships of the Laws and Customs of Parliament; and if this was so, I should submit; but the Case of mine is præsumptuous, and is a new Way, such as neither Mr. Attorney nor Mr. Solicitor can show any Precedent of; and I have no other Remedy nor Place to apply to, than the Way I take.

Mr. Attorney contends, that the King's Pleasure may release me, without the Lords. If so, this Court is exram regem. This Court is the proper Place to determine the King's Pleasure. This Court will and ought to judge in Act of Parliament word; if it be against Magna Charta; much more may judge an Order of the House, that is put in execution to deprive any Subject of his Liberty. And if this Order of Commitment be a Judgment, as the King's Council affirms; then it is out of the Lords Hands, and properly before your Lordships, as much as the Acts which were lately pass'd; which I presume you will not refuse to judge of, notwithstanding that the King's Attorney General saith, that this Parliament is still to be going. I take it something ill, that Mr. Attorney tells me I might have applied elsewhere.

My Lord, I have not quitted what became my Duty to wards the King; for, besides the Oath of Allegiance I took as a Peer, or an Englishman, there is something in my Breast, that will never suffer me to depart from the Duty and Respect that I owe him: But I am here before him; he is always supposed to be here present; and he allows his Subjects the Law.

My Lord, they speak much of the Custom of Parliament; but I do affirm to you, there is no Custom of Parliament, that ever their Members were put out of their own Power; and the Inconvenience of it will be evident.

Mr. Attorney was pleas'd easily to answer the Objection of one of my Council: If a great Minister should be so committed, he hath the Care of a Nation, a Proportion, or a Dilection: But if the Cause should be carry'd by forty Members, or a greater Number, may not as well be taken away, without Remedy in any of the King's Courts, he will not so easily answer; and if in this Case there can be no Relief, no Man can foresee what will be hereafter.

I desire your Lordship well to consider what Rule you make in my Case, for it will be a Precedent, that in future Ages they choose every Man in England.

My Lord, Mr. Attorney saith, you can either release or remand me. I differ from him in that Opinion. It's not just to insist upon a Remand: I have been a Prisoner above five Months already, and some hither of Nottingham, having no other Way to get my Liberty; and therefore am willing to tender your Lordship Bail, which are in or near the Court, good as any are in England, either for their Quality or Estate; and I am ready to give any Surety or Number.

My Lord, this Court being possid of this Business, I am now your Prisoner. [Out of the Collection of Sir Thomas Webster, 262.]

Bishop Burnet observ'd (vol. 1. p. 405.) that Lord Danby oppos'd this Motion (of the Lord Shaftsbury, in the King's Case) highly, as done in contempt of the House of Lords; and said, he would make use of it against him, next Session of Parliament.

This Application to an inferior Court was accordingly taken notice of by the Lords, who voted it a Breach of Privileges, for which the Earl was to answer his Contempt, at the Bar of the House. On the Twenty-second of February he was brought to the Bar, where he offer'd to acknowledge his asserting this Dissolution of the Parliament to be an unduly Action, and to beg their Lordships Pardon for his Offence in bringing his Habeas Corpus. Soon after the House proceeded to a Remission and Acknowledgment in a Form prescribed by that House, without which they were to expect no Release. This, they a formalization to a high Spirit, the Earl was forced to submit to. Accordingly the Lord Chancellor read the following Words to him, while the Earl, kneeling, repeated them at the Bar: 1. I do acknowledge, that my endeavouring to maintain that the Parliament was dissolved, was an ill-advic'd Action, for which I humbly beg Pardon of the King's Majesty, and this my be-arrable House. 2. I do acknowledge that my bringing a Writ of Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, was a high Violation of your Lordship's Privileges, and a great Aggravation of my former Offence; for all which I beg Pardon. Having both repeated and subscribed this Recognition, the House order'd the Lords with white Stuffs to acquain his Majesty, "That they had received Satisfaction from the Earl of Shaftsbury in the Matter of the Habeas Corpus, and the other Contempt, and pray'd him to discharge the said Earl from his Confinement." Accordingly the Earl was released, after an Imprisonment of about thirteen Months; and the next Day took his Seat in the House of Lords. [Hist. and Precedent of the House of Lords.]

round on every side for Opportunities to make himself useful, in order to make himself great. This warm Contest between the King and the Commons, had again put him on a scent, which he had pursued with much Eagerness once before, viz. To advance the Price of his Master's Neutrality, in Proportion as his Majesty found it more difficult and troublesome to maintain.

Correspondence between him and the Lord Treasurer therein.

To this end, he writes a Letter to the King, June 24. in which, to pave his way, he discloses several Secrets that deserve here to be enumerated, both by way of Comment on past Transactions, and of Key to those which are to follow: As 1. The Rage which Mr. Ruvigny express'd, when the King had made his separate Peace with Holland. 2. His Majesty's Message to him by Mr. Montagu, signifying, "That he gave great Marks of his Friendship to France, in not taking up the Triple Alliance again; and that whilst the Concert between the two Crowns had lasted, the west Christian King had greatly advanced his own Interest, but that of his Majesty not at all, as he was oblig'd to by his Treaty." 3. Mr. Ruvigny's Reply, That after such great Sums as his Majesty had paid in England, it was hard to be left to. 4. Mr. Montagu's Rejoinder, that they had no Reason to repent the Money, since the Neutrality of Sweden cost them two Millions and an half (Livres.) And that, for so vast a Fleet, and ten thousand of his Subjects in the French Service, his Majesty, tho' so great and powerful a King, had but three Millions. 5. Mr. Montagu's own Remarks on this Conference to Lord Arlington, That Mr. Ruvigny appear'd to be frighted at the Mention of the Triple Alliance, that he was sure if the Ambassador was well managed, the three Millions his Majesty had during the War, might be continued to him. 6. Mr. Ruvigny's Complaints to him, that he found the Ministry all turning against France, and the Lord Treasurer, in particular, absolutely in the Prince of Orange's Interest; and that he fear'd his Majesty would be brought in to join with the Confederates and abandon France. 7. Mr. Montagu's Advice to that Minister (as a Means to fix him in the French Interest) to offer the Continuance of the three Millions; for that in this World, nobody does any thing for nothing. 8. Mr. Ruvigny's Confession, That he had communicated this Advice to his Court, that they consented to it, with a Recommendation to be as sparing of the King's Money as possible; and that he had done it to effectually as to bring his Majesty to be contented with ONE hundred thousand Pound, when he might as easily have paid him THREE. 9. Mr. Montagu's Application of all these Particulars, viz. That the King might the better know his own Power and Greatness, and consequently set a greater Value upon it. 10. His remarkable Assertions, That the Greatness of the King of France was supported only by his Majesty's Connivance at what he did, and the good Will Christendom saw he had for him; and that the Advantage he had by it even in point of Revenue by his Conquests, did amount to five times the Sum he then had from him. 11. His Proposal to get for his Majesty a Million of Livres yearly, while the War should last, and four Millions after the Peace should be made, over and above what he had then from France. 12. A Request, that if his Majesty trusted any Minister in this Affair, it might be the Lord Treasurer, because he thought him to be the best Judge of it: And 13. another Request, that, unless his Majesty should think it for his Service, that his Lordship should see this Letter of his, his Sister, the Lady Harvey, might see it burnt; because the Particulars contain'd in it relating to Mr. Ruvigny, might prove his (Mr. Ruvigny's) Ruin.

To this remarkable Dispatch, the Lord Treasurer return'd two several Answers; one dated July 15, by the King's Order, with his Majesty's Sentiments; and the second July 16 with his own.

The first signify'd, That the King would take it for a good Service to get an additional Million to be well paid, during the War, and four Millions, well secur'd, to be paid within six Months after the Peace should be made; but that, unless there was a Certainty of the four Millions then, the one Million would not be sufficient now: And that it was impossible, with less than two hundred thousand Pounds sterling a Year, while the War lasted, to support his Affairs; in which, says his Lordship, "He suffers so much for their Sakes, as I confess, in my own Opinion, no Money can recompense."

In his Lordship's second Letter, he wonders to find that his Majesty had no more than a Million of Livres a Year (after the Peace with Holland) and that but for one Year past: Repeats the very same Words he had us'd before, as to the King's Sufferings for the sake of France: Declares he had so little Faith in French Promises, that unless he (Montagu) could procure Security for Performance, he should expect the Noise rather than any Benefit from them: Avows his Satisfaction to find by him, that Mr. Chiffineb had been, and was to be, the Receiver of whatever Remittance should be made from France, as being himself desirous to have as little to do with them, in any kind, as he could, unless it were to cudgel them out of that (9) Contempt they had not only for our Nation,

(9) We find the following Character of the People of England in a Work call'd Traité de la Politique de France, and addres'd to his most Christian Majesty; which, however false and fondness in some Particulars, deserves our most serious Attention in many more. Our own Self-complacency being more essentially injurious to us, than the Injustice of our Enemies.

"As to the English, they have no Friends: They are a People without Faith, without Religion, without Probity,

"without the least Justice, inconstant to the last degree,

"cruel, impatient, pharisaical, proud, insensible, covetous, fit

"for heavy Blows, or a sudden Overtake; but incapable of "conducting a War with Judgment: Their Country affords them a Subtilty, but is not rich enough to enable "them to make foreign Acquisitions. Thus they have never conquer'd any Country but Ireland, the Inhabitants "of which are feeble, and ill Soldiers: And on the contrary, they themselves have been conquer'd by the Ro-

A. D. 1677. Nation, but the very Person of the King, altho' he was so unhappy as not to believe it: Mentions his Approbation of a Project of Mr. Montagu's for removing the Congress from Ninewgen to London; because, says he, I would have his Majesty change his Figure from Arbitrator into Mediator: Expresses his Fear, that, for that very Reason, his Majesty would not do it; thinking himself to be ty'd up by such nice Points of Honour, as, I durst take the Sacrament, continued his Lordship, would not be stood upon an Hour by the King of France: And desires his Excellency to make use of the many Opportunities, which his Station afforded him, to furnish him with some of those frequent Instances, which he was confident there were, of that Court's despising the Councils of this; as it might be a means of saving the Nation from Ruin, which he believed it was the great Design of France to accomplish.

It appears by the Event, that his Excellency attended more to the Instructions in the first Letter, than the Reasonings in the last: He thought the Money would be the most acceptable Service, and therefore address'd himself with all his Might to compass it: He made his Demand in form, back'd it with all the Arguments he could think of, set all his Engines to work, and even adventur'd to bribe, as far as (*) two thousand Louis-d'ors, to facilitate the Jobb: But, in the midst of his Career, had the Mortification to be inform'd by Mr. Pomponne, that Mr. Courtin, who was still in England, had enter'd upon the Negotiation with his Majesty, and had induced him to be content with two Millions of Livres yearly during the War, instead of two hundred thousand Pounds Sterling.

Concerning this Counter-Proceeding on the French Side, and the Countenance it receiv'd from his Majesty, Mr. Montagu expostulates with the Lord Treasurer, in his subsequent Dispatches; and, in particular, to shew upon what good Grounds he had proceeded, gives him to understand, August 27th, that he had come to the Knowledge of those Sums which were given to the Dukes of Bavaria and Hanover; who, he hop'd, were both much less considerable Princes than his Master; and yet the Former had, at least, as considerable a Sum of Money, privately paid, as what he insisted on for his Majesty: And that he had drawn such Arguments from hence, as the French Ministers could no otherwise answer, than by desiring him to have Patience; till they had a Confirmation from Mr. Courtin, that the Affair was already adjust'd on the Terms before-mention'd, and even with the Concurrence of the Lord Treasurer.

Mr. Montagu had, in a preceding Letter, inform'd his Lordship of the Circumstance relating to himself; and he, on the other hand, had, in answer, made the most explicit Declaration, that all Mr. Courtin had written, or Mr. Pomponne said, with respect to his Concern in that Matter, was utterly false; he having never spoken in his Life with Mr. Courtin, either about that, or any other Affair: When his Majesty arriv'd from Plymouth (whither he had made a naval Progress, with a Part of his Summer Guard; which was the Royal Parade of those Times, as Reviews have been since) a Part of the Truth came out: The King himself acknowledging, that he had agreed, in the Presence of the Duke, to accept of two Millions of Livres; but expressing his Concern thereat; as not having consider'd the (1) Difference between the two Sums; declaring Two hundred thousand Pounds was the Sum necessary for his Service; and directing, that Orders should be given to Mr. Montagu to insist upon it, as before. The other Part Mr. Montagu himself discover'd: Mr. Pomponne, thro' Eagerness to convince his Excellency, that his Instructions were at an end, shew'd him Mr. Courtin's Letter; which signify'd, that the Affair had been transacted privately, at Mr. Chiffinch's Lodgings, without the Participation of the Lord Treasurer.

The former Demand was now renew'd; Mr. Montagu had the Negotiation to himself; and not only took upon him to give it a Colour at the Court of France, but even prompted his Majesty to refer Mr. Barillon, who succeeded Mr. Courtin at London, to the Lord Treasurer; in case he should endeavour to keep him to the two Millions; of which Refinement he also made a Merit in his Lordship; by informing him, that he had made the thing to easy, that he might have the * men, Danes, and Norwegians; and even their present Kings inherit in Right of a Conqueror. They hate one another, and are in perpetual Broils, either about Matters of Religion or Government. A French War of three or four Years would utterly ruin them. We should therefore have no Peace with them, but on such Conditions as were greatly in our Favor; except his Majesty should think fit to defer the Execution of this Project till some other time; or should receive such promising Hopes to the Tranquillity of his Subjects. None but a King can feel what it is to love his Subjects, as none but a Father can feel what it is to love his Children. In a Word, to ruin the English there is no more necessary, than to oblige them to keep on foot a standing Army; France would have nothing to fear from it: For should they undertake a Detachment, it would be their Destruction, even if no Rebellion should interfere and oblige them to keep their Forces at home: but if they had Forces, they would inevitably cut one another's Throats. It is likewise necessary to put them into great Apprehension for that End, to keep them in continual Alarm, for the Lives of Garnesly, Jersey, Wight, Mar, and Ireland; which would oblige them to maintain large Garrisons; and that again would lead the People to insult, that the King entertain'd Designs on their pretended Liberties. While a King of England is alive, he will ever be laud'd by his People. Their Factions should be kept up; their Sects should be encouraged; and above all the Garibolus. The Benedictine Monks should be promoted in the Name of the King of England, in which it is easy to deceive them, that they shall be restored to all their ancient Possessions, of which they were depriv'd (at the Reformation.) Upon which, their Monks will engage Heaven and Earth in their Quarrel; the Catholics will declare themselves; and if the Ramus, which already prevails, that the King is a Protestant, is renewed and strengthened, the English Monarchy will be divided, and all will be thrown into Confusion.

(1) On the Merit and Strength of having, a Year before, for the like Sum dispos'd of to the same Persons, got his Majesty retir'd from that Article between the two Crowns, which oblig'd him to raise and maintain six thousand Men, at his own Charge, for the Service of France. (1) Which was 50,000 l. besides 12,000 l. by the French Address, as Mr. Montagu calls it, in the Exchange.

A. D. 1677.

Credit and Advantage with the King of concluding the Affair: As also, that, for the time to come, it would play all things of Consequence into his Hands, and confirm the King, more and more, in the Opinion he had of his Ability and Fidelity: And, agreeable to this Declaration, his most Christian Majesty, upon the Issue of several Conferences with Mr. Montagu, signify'd, that Mr. Barillon should finally adjust the Matter in dispute with the Lord Treasurer.

Thus stood the Affair in the Beginning of October (when this intriguing Minister, having, as he says, many other things of Importance to communicate to his Lordship, which would be of service for him to know, desir'd and obtain'd Leave to come home, for a Fortnight); and thus the King fulfilled his Engagements, in his last Speech to the Commons, "That, as he had done all that lay in his Power, during the Adjournment, so he would still apply himself, by all the Means he could, to let the World see his Care for the Security and Satisfaction of his People."

Progress of a separate Peace between France and Holland.

While such was the Situation of things between England and France, it is scarce to be wonder'd, that the States and People of Holland grew more eager than ever for a separate Peace; that Mr. Beverning, their leading Plenipotentiary at the Congress, should persist in his Opinion, that no Good was to be expected from England; and that, in this Belief, he should hurry on the Essential Treaty, as it was call'd, almost with Precipitation.

[Jenkins's Letters, vol. ii. p. 120, 121, 122.]

On the 7th of June, as we learn both from Sir William Temple and Sir Leoline Jenkins his Colleague, Mr. Beverning, in a Conference with those Ministers, freely and plainly declar'd, that he would enter immediately into Negotiation with the French Ministers; that he would carry them the Project of a Treaty ready dress'd to the very last Line; that he had already given the Allies to understand, that he would stay no longer; that if they had acted as they might and should have done, they might have been in peace before that time; and that, whatever his Hopes were from the Residue of the Campaign, his Fears, arising from the Misunderstandings of the Allies, overbalanced them; and convinced him of the Necessity of pursuing the Peace, that they might not lose the next Spring, as they had lost the last.

Before the Dispatch was clos'd, which contain'd the Detail of these Particulars, it appear'd, the Dutch and French Ministers had brought Matters so near to an Accommodation, without the Interposition of the Mediators, that there remain'd but one Difficulty between them, unadjusted; which related to the Regulation of Commerce, upon the following Plan; which, for Form's sake, was left with the said Mediators, by the Dutch, to be handed by them to the French, that it might not be said, his Majesty's good Officers were not made use of:

The Conditions of it.

1. The Re-establishment of Peace and Amity. 2. The prefixing the Time, and Bounds, of a Cessation of Hostilities by Sea. 3. An Amnesty. 4. That the Parties should not consent to any Treaties prejudicial to each other. 5, 6. That, for the more effectual Security of Commerce, for the time to come, all Confiscations, made during the War, should be annulled, and the Proprietors restor'd. 7. The Parties should remain seiz'd of all they possess'd, either in or out of Europe. 8. The most Christian King, as a Proof of his Amity, should restore Majricht, with its Dependencie. 9. Renunciation of all Pretensions, past and present, on both Sides. 10. Release of Prisoners, without Ransom. 11. The present Treaty to subsist, and be made good, notwithstanding all Contraventions. 12. The Articles touching the Pretensions and Interests of the Prince of Orange to be insert'd, word for word, in this Treaty. 13. The Emperor, the Kings of Spain and Denmark, the Electors of Treves and Brandenburg, the Duke of Lorraine, the Bishop of Munster, the Dukes of Niueburg, Zell, Wolffenbuttel, and Osnaug, to be compris'd in this Treaty, as Allies. And 14. A full Liberty to all to guaranty their respective Treaties, which should be made jointly with this.

By the Beginning of July, this good Understanding between France and the States was so well advanced, the Mr. Beverning, who expected as little Help from England in the Peace as the War, began not only to play the Part of a Mediator himself, but of something more, says Sir William Temple, pressing on his Allies towards a Peace, with Pauses very earnest, and something rough, and, as some believ'd, more than he had Orders for from his Masters, who yet pretended to hold Hands with their Allies.

Temple's Memoirs, P. ii.

A transient Mention has already been made of the ill Usage which Sweden had received from France; it is now proper to explain wherein it consisted: The Dukes of Zell and Wolffenbuttel had shar'd with Denmark and Brandenburg in the Spoils of Sweden: And, to divide them from the Confederacy, France offer'd them a Guaranty of all their new Acquisitions, in Bremen: This Sweden was call'd upon to consent to, without the Offer of any Equivalent; but the Neutrality of those Princes: And, at the same time that these Lauenburg Princes had 8000 Troops against the Swedes in Pomerania, they had but 3000 against the French. They were indeed under an Engagement to furnish 5000 more; but on these Temperings with France, refus'd to furnish them, without some new Stipulations.

The Swedes ill-us'd by France.

While the Swedish Ministers, on the one hand, made their Complaints of these things to the Mediators, their French Allies, on the other, in the midst of the Confidence which was now growing between them and the Dutch, made no scruple to avow, That they would not part with one Village in Flanders, in order to restore the Swedes to what they had lost: In which, however, they overshot themselves; since it gave Mr. Beverning occasion to say, "This is sufficient to shew us, how much we could rely on the French, if we should " should

A. D. 1697. " should make a separate Peace with them, and thereby lose the Support of the present Confederacy; since France did use the Swedes in such a manner, who had adventur'd so much for them."

Separate Negotiations between France and Spain.

The Dutch were, moreover, uneasy, not only on account of the separate Measures like to be concluded between France and the whole House of Brunsfwick, but upon new Intelligence, which had been receiv'd both from Vienna and Madrid, about a separate Peace, then in agitation, between Don John and the French, for an Exchange of the Spanish Netherlands, for what should be restor'd them in Roussion and Sicily.

England rejects her Troops out of the French Service. Temp. Mem.

They likewise, in common with the rest of the Confederates, receiv'd an additional Mortification from England: For, having made great Instances, That his Majesty would recall his Troops in the French Service, to whom, as before hinted, they attributed all the Successes of the French in Germany, his Majesty excus'd himself upon the Equality of a Mediator; and by alleging, that there was a greater Number of English Troops in the Service of the Allies, which was look'd upon as an ill Sign of that Prosecution which they hop'd for from his Majesty, for the Relief of their languishing Affairs.

As to what pass'd at the Congress, during the Residue of this Summer, it scarce deserves mention; Sir William Temple himself confessing, that it serv'd only to keep the Mediators in Countenance and no more. It was once indeed in danger of being broke up by a passionate Motion of the Swedes, who peremptorily insisted on a Freedom of Passage for their Counters, thro' the Territories of Denmark, which the Danes as presumptuously refus'd. The Dispute lasted for about a Fort-night or three Weeks, with some Warmth, and then all grew calm again. About which time the French began wholly to change their Language, and to say, upon all Occasions, That France could not make a Peace without the full Satisfaction of, and Restitution to, the Swedes: And it was discours'd, that the French and Swedes had enter'd into an Alliance at Paris to this Purpose; some believing it was by Consent between them, that this Shock was given by the Swedes to the Congress; and that the French had, at that time, a mind to break it, and to enter into a Treaty with Spain, under the Pope's Direction, and at Rome; as not knowing to what Measures his Majesty (of England) might be induc'd by the Progress of the French Conquests, and the Distempers rais'd in his Parliament upon that Occasion.

Content between the Confederates Armiss in Germany and Flanders.

The Residue of the Campaign, resembled that of the Congress. It promis'd much, it produc'd nothing. His most Christian Majesty left the Field, almost before the Germans were ready to speak in it; and thro' a Plan had been laid for the two Armies of the Confederates in Flanders and Germany to act in Concert, and thereby strengthen and support each other, it fail'd in the Effect, if not in the Execution. In June all the Advices out of Germany were full of the Motions of the Duke of Loerain towards his own Duchy, in order to penetrate into Champagne, while Mr. de Crequi, who had the Command of the French Troops on that Side, being inferior in Strength, found it advisable to retreat before him. This gave the War a flattering Aspect to the Confederates; but like all other Flatterers, it was deceitful; for no sooner was the Marshal reforc'd with several strong Detachments from Mr. Schomberg at Carignan, than he fac'd the Imperialists, who had pass'd the Sille, and posted himself so advantageously, that he could neither be forc'd to an Engagement, nor stretch'd for Forrage and Provisions. On the other hand, the Imperialists fell into such great Wants and Difficulties, their nearest Magazine being at Treves, which was 15 or 17 Leagues off, that they were soon forc'd to dislodge, and were follow'd in their Turns by Mr. de Crequi. Every Day the News of a Battle was expected, but none follow'd: A River (the Mozelle) a Rivulet, a Hollow Way, or some Obstacle or another, always prevented; and the two Generals, as if by Consent, display'd their Skill in Marches and Encampments only.

This, however, we are told, answer'd, or it was believ'd would answer the Design of the Allies, which was to hinder Mr. de Crequi from sending the Reinforcements to the Duke de Luxembourg, while the Prince of Orange sit down before Charleroy; and which, it was presum'd, was neither prepar'd for a Siege, nor could be time enough reliev'd. But the French had early Intelligence of the Design; and the Piece was not only put in a Condition to hold out a long and vigorous Siege, but Mr. de Loewen, the first Mover of the French Councils, with great Diligence, drew together such Bodies of Forces to reinforce the Duke of Luxembourg, that, without weakening Mr. de Crequi, he was able to face the Prince before Charleroy, before the Frenches could be open'd.

Upon this unexpected and surprizing Effort of the French, his Highness call'd a Council, to advise whether to march and fight the French Army, or raise the Siege. The last was resolv'd, and accordingly executed, and therewith ended the Campaign in Flanders.

But this March, says Sir William Temple, and Retreat of the Prince, pass'd not, without many Reflections, not only among the Allies, but in Holland too, as if he had given over the Design upon some Intelligences and Expresses between him and the King (of England). About this time Lord Ossory happen'd to arrive in the Camp (the Day before the Council of War was held); upon which the Siege was rais'd, which made many think that something his Lordship brought from England, was the Occasion of it: But I (proceeds Sir William) could never find there was any thing more in his Journey, than the Hopes of seeing a Battel (which was ever a particular Inclination of Lord Ossory) and a Call of my Lord Avilington's to preserve himself in the Prince's Favour and Confidence as much as he could; by Lord Ossory's keeping close to him at a time, when he saw the Balmess of Christendoms roll so much upon the Person of this Prince.

Sir

A. D. 1677.
H Jenkins's Let.
p. 155.

Sir Leoline Jenkins, in his Dispatch of August 20, has indeed the following Passage: "Some Days since Mr. Chauldeigh, happening to fall into Discourse with Mr. de Main, a Kinsman of Mr. Colbert's, of the Affairs of the Campaign, and of what happen'd at Charleroy; and from thence speaking of the Report, which is so general in this Country, and so very unjust to his Majesty, as if my Lord Offory had been sent over expressly to endeavour the raising of that Siege; Mr. de Main said, That Mr. Hulf, Secretary to the Dutch Ambassador, had affirm'd it with this Circumstance, That the Prince of Orange, having in the Morning held a Council of War, wherein it was resolv'd to give the French Battel, his Highness had afterwards chang'd his Resolution upon a particular Conference that he had with Lord Offory." But Lord Offory was, of all Men in the World, the most unfit to be sent on any such Errand: War was his Element: And to have been made use of to damp any great Undertaking, would have given him the greatest Mortification imaginable: Besides every Difficulty is clear'd up in the most satisfactory manner, in a Letter from Mr. Bentinck to the Lord Treasurer; as the Excerpt that follows bears witness.

As was to be rememb'd.
Dunby's Memoirs,
vol. ii.
p. 145.

"Our Affairs here have had such a Turn, as makes us fear this Campaign will not end much to our Advantage, which is chiefly to be imputed to the bad Measures which the Spaniards force us to take. They give us Assurance, That let the French bring as good an Army as they could into the Field, they, with the Troops of the Allies (among whom were the Luxemburgers, who had not completed their Treaty with France) should be in a Condition, not only to make head against the French, but likewise to cover our Siege: And yet we found that they (the French) took the Field with an Army as strong as all ours together, before our Lines were half finished; which oblig'd us raise the Siege without any Possibility of bringing them to an Engagement; which in the Opinion of all our Generals, could not be effected, but with the greatest Hazard and Disadvantage in the world; we being oblig'd to march in sight of the Enemy thro' a large Wood, which lay between us, by Detaches, against their Army, which was drawn up on the other Side. Your Lordship will easily judge, since Affairs are at present in this Condition, if the Enemy make the same Advantage of the next Spring, as they have done the foregoing Years, whether it will not then be too late to think of providing for the Safety of the Low Countries, when the French are Masters of them."

Upon the whole, whoever was in Fault, all had their Share in the Misfortune. The Spaniards gave out, that this Attempt cost them three Millions of Florins, the Imperialists that in keeping Mr. de Crequi in play, they had sacrificed ten thousand Men, and the Dutch, who consider'd all things under the Heads of Profit and Loss, that they run out every Year more and more in the Prosecution of an Adventure, which could never make them suitable Returns; so that the more the Confederates suffer'd from the common Enemy, the more dissatisfy'd they grew with one another.

The Campaign ended as much to the Advantage of the French in Germany as in Flanders. The Marshal of Crequi, not only holding the Duke of Lorraine at bay, but obtaining a very considerable Advantage over him, at a Place call'd Koebberg; and after that, carrying Friburg in Brigave, before his Highness could come up to its Relief.

The Swedes, on the other hand, continued as unfortunate as ever. The Danes had obtain'd another very considerable Victory over them by Sea. The Confederate Forces had also the Advantage of them by Land. And after a long and obstinate Siege, which lasted till the Middle of December, the Elector of Brandenburg made himself Master of Stetin.

While both the War, and the Congress, proceeded thus unfavourably to the Views and Designs of the Prince of Orange, his Highness, who, according to Sir William Temple, had told Lord Offory, That his Fortunes were not in a Condition for him to think of a Wife, now found Cause to alter his Mind, and to seek for that Alliance which he had declin'd before.

He had, it seems, unbosom'd himself on this delicate Affair to Sir William, when he (the Prince) was upon the point of opening the Campaign of the preceding Year; intimating, That, since his Friends would have him marry, he was more inclin'd to make his Addresses to the Lady Mary, than any body else. But starting two Queries, viz. Whether her Highness had sufficient Conformity of Temper to accommodate her Behaviour to his? Whether it was worth his while to disoblige his Friends the Malecontents of England, by allying himself, contrary to their Advice, yet nearer to the Royal Family? To which, receiving satisfactory Answers; in particular, That it was a great Step to be one Degree nearer to the Crown, and in all Appearance the next; and that his Friends were not in a Capacity to give the Crown the Disturbance they imagin'd, he resolv'd to enter upon the Pursuit.

Lord Dunby, however, assures us, that it was not till May 1677, when the Houle of Commons was in the Ferment before describ'd, that this Project became ripe enough to be communicated to the King; nor till at least two Months after, that his Majesty gave any Hopes of his allowing any Treaty about it: And tho' the Prince sent Mr. Bentinck over into England about the Beginning of June, to desire leave to make a Journey thither as soon as the Campaign was over, his Majesty civilly discourag'd it, by expressing his Wishes, that he would first think of making the Peace, and rather defer his Journey till that was concluded. Mr. Bentinck was, nevertheless, most graciously received by the King, and most cordially by the Lord Treasurer; and return'd with a Promise, that his Majesty would enter into a Confidence with the Prince, and would send over to him a Person he could rely upon to carry on the Correspondence between them.

Sir William Temple had, about this time, been summon'd from Nimeguin to enter upon the Office of Secretary of State, in the Room of Mr. Coventry (which he had, however, declin'd, on finding Mr. Coventry did not care to part with the Seals, unless he might chuse his Purchaser, as well as set his (x) Peice) and frequently entertain'd the King on the Subject of a Peace, and the Expediency of the Prince's Journey to England; which seems to have been fiddled for by him in Concert with the Lord Treasurer; and by the Last wish'd a View to balance the French Interest, which he had Reason to fear would otherwise be too mighty for him; and as an Expedient to recover the Confidence of the People.

But for the very Reason, that this Journey was likely to give (u) Umbrage to France, it was likely to be ungrateful to the Duke; unless Ways and Means could be devised, that France should find her Account in it; and possibly, as Mr. Montaigne's Money-Intrigue was depending at this very Crisis, the King himself might have an Eye to the same Consideration. However this may be, his Majesty, in all these Conferences, continued warm for a Peace, but cool to the Visit, till that was first established; treated the Claimour for a War with France, as the Tool of the Faction to make their own Terms with him; and express'd a thorough Aversion to the having any Concern in it, for fear of being at their Mercy. He, nevertheless, acknowledged, that the longer the Confederates continued the War, the more they were like to be Losers: But then he infer'd, not that they ought to be assisted, but that they ought to give over the Dispute; and express'd his Desires that the Prince would make the Peace for them, if they would not do it for themselves; adding, That if he and the Prince could fall into the Terms of it, he was sure it might be done.

This ended, at last, in a formal Proposal from the King to Sir William Temple, to make a short Turn to the Prince, to try if he could persuade him into his Majesty's Sentiments, and to assure him, That after the Peace was settled, he should be the gladdest Man in the World to see him in England. As both the Duke and the Lord Treasurer join'd with the King in this Expedient, it may be presum'd, that it was, at this time, become the common View of all three, to disarm the Faction, by putting an End to the War upon any Terms, or at any Price. But Sir William, recollecting the ill Success of his former Endeavours, and being sufficiently convinc'd of the Prince's Inflexibility, chose to decline the Commission, and recommend Mr. Hyde, who had some time officiated as joint Plenipotentiary at Nimeguin, to undertake it in his stead.

Mr. Hyde was accordingly dispatch'd, and made his Efforts, but to so little Purpose, that in the Account he gave of his Reception, he declar'd, That he had never seen such a Firmness in any Man. The Prince, however, renew'd his Instances with the Lord Treasurer, for leave to come over; and express'd a sort of Confidence, that, by the Help of the Treasurer's mighty Interest, he should bring his Affair to a good and happy Issue: And of such Importance did his Lordship think it to oblige him; and so effectually did he make use of this mighty Interest of his for the Prince's Service, that, he at length carry'd his Point. The King gave way; Leave was granted; and his Highness arriv'd at Harwich, October the 9th.

His Reception was accompany'd with all that open and winning Frankness, which render'd the King not only the most gracious of Princes, but the most agreeable of Men: But, as scarce any Man had less of this amiable Ingredient in his Composition than his Highness, scarce any Man was less sensible of the Charms of it in another: Both, however, made their different Temper serviceable to their Designs: The King seduc'd; the Prince aw'd: And Reserve and Sullenness in the one, were made use of to effect what the other compass'd by Smiles and Affability. Each had his Point in view: Peace was the King's; to be a Step nearer the Throne, the Prince's. Both were to play the Politician; and in the midst of mutual Professions mutually to outwit and over-reach one another. The King had the Duke for his Second, and possibly all the Creatures of France for his Auxiliaries: The Prince had the Treasurer, and his old Friend Sir William Temple. The King and Duke open'd first, at Newmarket, where the Court then was: But the Prince would not so much as parley till he had seen the Lady he was in pursuit of. She had the Fortune (whether good or ill, who shall decide?) to please him: And then the Intrigue was push'd on both Sides with all the Vigour and Artifice imaginable: The King insisting still on the Peace prior to the Marriage, and the Prince on the Marriage prior to the Peace; saying, "That his Allies, who were like to have had Terms of the Peace, as things then stood, would be apt to believe that he had made this Match at their Cost; and that for his part, he would never sell his Honour for a Wife." Both Sides were positive; and for three or four Days continued so; at the End of which time, Sir William Temple found his Highness in the worst Humour he had ever seen him in; sorry he was come to England; resolute to be gone, in two Days, if the King did not recede; adding, in the minatory Style, "That, before he went, the King must chuse how they should live hereafter, for he was sure it must be either like "the greatest Friends, or the greatest Enemies?" And desiring Sir William to be his Herald, and declare as much to his Majesty next Morning. He did so (for it seems neither Party had as yet learn'd the Art of engrossing the King to themselves) and back'd it, with a Remonstrance of his own, concerning the ill Consequences of a Breach between them, considering the ill Humour of so many of his Subjects, upon the late Measures with France, and the Invitation made the Prince by several of them, during the late War. This Pass took the King in his Foible, and disarm'd him at once. His Majesty, however, put a good Face on the Matter, and affect'd to bestow his Niece on the Prince, not because he was a dangerous, but because he was an honest Man. Sir William had then Orders to communicate his Pleasure to the Duke, who seem'd surpris'd; but said, "The King shall be obey'd; and I would be glad all his Subjects would learn of me to obey him. I do tell him my Opinion very freely upon any thing; but when that is done, and I know his Pleasure upon it, I obey him." Sir William then returned to the Prince with his good News, who affect'd to be surpris'd as well as enjoy'd; and, till after this, according to Sir William's own Account, not even the Lord Treasurer, was in the Secret of the King's sudden Change.

His Marriage with the Lady Mary.

Nov. 1245.

The Retirement of Burnet, &amp;c. l. A. 410.

(cc) The same Evening the Match was declar'd at the Committee, and on the Morrow to the Council, which was, upon that Occasion, extraordinarily assembled, and in the next Gazette to the whole Kingdom. Wherever the News spread, Joy accompany'd it. It was look'd upon as a Deliverance from the French; and no Man, at that time, dreaded any other Slavery.

According to Bishop Burnet, who derives his Informations from Mr. Montagu, (cc) October 24: Now the Prince landed at Harwich the 25th; and yet Bishop Burnet says, That, after a fruitless stay of some Weeks, he returned to go back, without proposing Marriage. His whole Account, which he gives on the Authority of Mr. Montagu, is so different from this, which is founded on Sir William Temple's, that it deserves to be inserted here, that the Reader may follow which he pleases.

"After a fruitless stay for some Weeks, he intended to go back, without proposing Marriage. He had no mind to be deny'd; and he had no Hope of succeeding, unless he would enter more entirely into his Uncle's Measures. Lord Dowry spent his stay, a few Days longer; and that the Management of the Matter might be left to him. So next Monday Morning, after he had taken care, by all his Creatures about the King, to put him in a very good Humour, he came to the King, and told him, he had receiv'd Letters from all the best Friends his Majesty had in England, and desir'd a Benesse of them; (in which he was pretty sure the King would not trouble himself to read them; probably they were written as he had directed.) They all agreed, he said, in the same Advice, that the King should make a Marriage between the Prince of Orange and the Duke's Daughter; (for they all believ'd he came over on that account) and, if he went away without it, so nobody would doubt, but that he had propos'd it, and had been deny'd: Upon which the Parliament would certainly make Addresses to the King for it: And if the Marriage was made upon that, the King would lose the Grace and Pleasure of it: But if it was still deny'd, even after the Address of both Houses, it would raise Jealousies, that might have very ill Consequences. Whereas, if the King did it of his own Motion, he would have the Honour of it; and, by so doing, he would bring the Prince into a greater Dependence on himself, and bring in the Nation into a good Opinion of him, as would lay a Foundation for a mutual Confidence. This he enforced with all the Topics he could think on. The King said, the Prince had not so much as propos'd it. Lord Dowry would he had spok'd of it to himself; and said, that his not moving it to the King was only, because he apprehended he was not like to succeed in it. The King said next, my Brother will never consent to it. Lord Dowry answer'd, perhaps not, unless the King took upon him to command it: And he thought it was the Duke's Interest to have it done, even more than the King's: All People were now possest of his being a Papist, and were very apprehensive of it: But if they saw his Daughter given to one that was as the Head of the Protestant Interest, it would very much lessen those Apprehensions, when it did appear, that his Religion was only a personal thing, and to be deriv'd to his Children after him. With all this the King was content. So he sent for the Duke, Lord Dowry being still with him. When the Duke came, the King told him he had sent for him, to desire he would consent to a thing that he was sure was much for his Interest, as it was for his own Quiet and Satisfaction. The Duke, without saying what it was, said, he would be ready always to comply with the King's Pleasure in every thing. So the King left it to the Lord Dowry to say over all he had said on that Head to himself. The Duke seem'd much concern'd. But the King said to him, Brother, I desire it of you for my sake, as well as your own: And upon that the Duke consented to it. So Lord Dowry sent immediately for the Prince; and, in the King's Name, order'd a Council to be presently summon'd. Upon the Prince's coming, the King, in a very obliging way, said to him, Nephew, it is not good for Men to be alone; I will give you a Help meet for you: And so he told him he would bestow his Niece on him: And the Duke, with a seeming Heartiness, gave his Consent in very obliging Terms: The King adding, Nephew, remember that Love and War do not agree well together." Conferences on the Peace. No doubt, a Measure, that apparently took off so much from the King's own Weight and Influence; that encourg'd France to stand upon higher Terms; and that, by striking a Dependency thro' the Confederates, dispos'd them all rather to submit, than to continue the Struggle any longer; contributed very much to moderate the Transports of the Prince of Orange: But having obtain'd his own Preliminary, he was not in a Condition to prescribe any farther: All that remain'd for him now to do was, to reason his two Uncles, if possible, into the Demand of such a Peace, as might provide a sufficient Barrier, for the future Security of Flanders. This he endeavour'd; but still had the Mortification to find the King more concern'd for present Peace, than future Security; and willing to believe, that France was more weary of the present War, than dispos'd to begin another. Much was however repeated in the Temple's Memoirs, P. II. (x) Conferences held on this great Occasion, to convince his Majesty, that France would never be at rest till they were in possession of all Flanders, and Germany to the Rhine; which would reduce Holland to an absolute Dependence upon them; and thereby render the Condition even of England precarious. In the Debates which arose on the Question, whether Burgundy should remain to France, or be restor'd to Spain, the Prince had the Glory to say, when the King offer'd to procure him either a free Enjoyment of his (y) Lands there, or a full Equivalent for them, "That he would be content to part with them all, to procure one good Town more for the Spanish side, on the Frontier of Flanders." At last it was agreed, that the Peace should be concerted on the following Terms: All to be restor'd by France to the Empire and Emperor, that had been taken during the War, the Duchy of Lothain to its proper Owner, all on both sides between France and Holland; and to Spain, the Towns of (z) Ath, Charleroy, Oudenarde, Courtray, Tournay, Condé, Valenciennes, and Binch: That the Prince should endeavour to procure the Consent of Spain, and his Majesty that of France; and that a Person should be sent with the Proposition to France, with Orders to enter into no Reasonings upon it, but to demand a positive Answer in two Days; and, after that, to return immediately.

The Terms agreed upon.

Sir William Temple was nominated for this Employ; but was soon after set aside, that the Lord Duras (Earl of Beversham) who was in the Confidence of the Duke, might have the Honour of the Charge, or the Merit of the Success; which show'd, that the Firmness requisite to support so firm a Measure was already departing. The Event answer'd the Omen. Tho' his most Christian Majesty, on giving Audience to Lord Beversham, had politely said, The King knew very well he might always be Master of the Peace, he nevertheless disrupted the Terms; and tho' the Ambassador had declar'd he had but two Days to stay, he consented to linger out a few more: Which it must, however, be understood, he had Authority for; since the Lord Treasurer, in his Dispatch to the Prince of Orange of December 8, expressly says, that he had acquitted himself very well. This Concession of further Time was understood in France to be a Sign of Irresolution; and an (a) Answer was calculated accordingly, viz. "That the King of France did not expect the King of England would have thought such Propositions reasonable; and that he should think it as reasonable to desire of him, that he should cut off his Legs, and then bid him walk: That to shew his Intentions were not to take all Flanders, he would be willing to consent to a Truce, for all the Spanish and Holland Towns between the Meuse and the Sea, as was in the Year 1668; and that Truce to be for a Year, or what farther convenient Time the King should think fit."

In this Interval, the Prince and his Bride had taken Leave of the Court, and set out for Holland; the King assuring him, he would never part from the least Point of his Scheme sent over: And that he would enter into the War with France, if they refus'd it.

But Sir William Temple observes, that his Majesty suffer'd himself to be seduc'd by the Sestings of FRANCE; and, contrary to his Engagement, continu'd to treat, instead of drawing the Sword. The Lord Treasurer, however, kept up the Prince's Spirits, by assuring him, That his Majesty would not recede from the Demand of the Seven Towns, before agreed upon; and that he would add St. Ghilian to the List, in case it should be carry'd by the French (it was then, December 8, invest'd, and soon after capitulated) or any other Acquisitions they should make: He even took upon him to shew, that our Temper was alter'd for the better; for that the King would now join with Holland, to oblige France to accept the Proposals sent by Lord Beversham; in case Holland would join with him to oblige Spain to do the same, if they should refuse it; and would rely on his Highness's single Engagement for this, without

(z) Sir William Temple adds St. Ghilian to these; but that Town was not taken till afterwards; and there is Cause to think that the Eight Towns remaining, should be restor'd to France.

(a) The Answer here insert'd is taken from the Dispatch of the Lord Treasurer above-quoted: But, according to Sir William Temple, it was to no Issue Effect with that which he had receiv'd at first. "That the most Christian King had a Brother, would not break with him for one or two Towns: But even upon them too, he would send Orders to his Ambassador at London to treat with his Majesty himself."

Numb. 1258.

That the French Court, moreover, might have some reason to think, that we were preparing to rouse ourselves in earnest, a Proclamation was set forth in the Gazette, signifying, that, for divers weighty Considerations, it was his Majesty's Will and Pleasure, that the two Houses, which stood adjourn'd to the 4th of April, should meet on the 15th Day of January; and that his Majesty was desirous, in respect of several important Matters, intended to be debated and consider'd, to have a full Assembly: And the (b) Merit of this Circumstance also, the Lord Treasurer takes care to enforce to his Highness.

The Prince, in his Reply to his Lordship, acknowledges, that he was equally surpris'd and pleas'd at so much good News: Acquaints him, that he had given the Lord Ambassador Holt such an Answer as the King desir'd: And that he had never engag'd in any thing more to his Satisfaction: Withes, however, that they might not suffer themselves to be impos'd upon by Amusements; and that, if the King of France did not give a speedy and direct Answer to Mr. Montagu (who, a little before this, had been again dispatch'd to that Court) the Resolutions which had been taken might be immediately put into execution; since the Season was so far advanced, and the Low-Countries in so bad a Condition, that, if any Time was lost, it would neither be in their Power to make a Peace, or maintain a War.

This Letter of the Prince's was dated December 27, and the 27th of the same Month, Mr. Montagu, who had been charg'd with a Repetition of the Offers made by Lord Overstruck before, inform'd his Majesty, that Mr. de Louvois had peremptorily assur'd him, that for Valenciennes, Cambré, and Tournay, the King his Master would make war for a hundred Years, rather than part with them: That he (Mr. Montagu) by way of Reply, had told him, that his Majesty would never have suffer'd the most Christian King to have made such a Progress in Flanders, if he had not, several times, solemnly given his Promise, both by his Ambassadors in England, and to him there, to stand to his Arbitrage for a Peace: That Mr. de Louvois proceeded to say, that if his Majesty would procure a general Truce for a Year, and in that time manage the Prince of Orange so as not to insist upon those Places, he should be paid as much as if the Places were his own: That for Secrecy's sake, the Money should be return'd in Wedges of Gold, inclos'd in Bales of Silk: That the Lord Treasurer should have any thing he would ask, in Pearls and Diamonds: And that Mr. Montagu himself should not be forgot, if he would take upon him to make these Propositions: That, in another Interview with this Minister, after he had made a Report of this Conference to the King his Master, he further signify'd, that he found his Majesty resolv'd not to part with the three Towns above-mention'd, and very hardly with Courtray; and that since he (Mr. Montagu) had declin'd proposing the Money, Mr. Basilion should have Orders to do it; in the hope, that the King of England would find it more for his Interest to have his Share in the Towns, than to enter into the War: That, in an Audience of the King himself, his Majesty had repeated all that Mr. de Louvois had said, with this Addition, That the thing he fear'd most, was a Breach with his Brother of England; but that all was to be hazarded, rather than have his Arms and Legs, for such he accounted these Places, to be cut off; softening this again with an earnest Request, that he (Mr. Montagu) would let the King his Master know, that he would submit all things to his Decision, but such as affected his Honour and his Conscience.

This Letter of Mr. Montagu's was follow'd, or possibly accompany'd, with a Courier from the French Court to Mr. Barillon, with the Offer of a general Suspension, &c. which being communicated to the King, his Majesty reply'd, "That that was a Matter to which he could not answer without first knowing the Minds of the Confederates," but he would take it well, if the King of France would forbear his Arms in the Spanish Netherlands for two Months, in which time he would inform himself of their Mind." The French Ambassador then said, That would only be to lose time, and the King answer'd, That without time to find new Expedients, he could not depart from those he had offer'd. And this is what the Lord Treasurer, in his Dispatch to the Prince of Orange of December 27, calls behaving with all the Firmness of Resolution.

We must now have Recour'd to Sir William Temple, who says, about the End of December, the King sent for him and told him, he could get no positive Answer from France, and therefore, resolv'd to send him into Holland, to make a League there with the States, for joining both France and Spain, if either refus'd to make the Peace upon the Terms he had propos'd. But Sir William told the King, what he had agreed, was to enter into the War with all the Confederates abroad, and the People at home: But to make such a League with Holland only, would satisfy none of them, and disoblige both France and Spain; adding besides, that it would not have an Effect or Force as the Triple Alliance had, being a great Original, of which this seem'd but an ill Copy; and therefore, executing himself from the Voyage. The King nevertheless insist'd, possibly, that the Measure sure might have the greater weight with the Public; but on the Duke's Interposition, Sir William got off, and Mr. Thyne was sent from the Office with a Draught of the Treaty, which Mr. Hyde was to execute at the Hague: And it was executed accordingly on the 16th of January, tho' not without great Difficulties and Dissatisfaction of the Prince, says (c) Sir William Temple, who was yet cover'd in it, by the private Consent of the Spanish Minister there, in Behalf of his Master, so as the War could not break, but upon France, in case of their Refusal.

The Basis of this Treaty was the Agreement which had been made between the King and the Prince of Orange, relating to the seven Towns (to which St. Ghislain was now added) which were to constitute the Barrier of Flanders. The King of Great-Britain was to use his Interest and Endeavours with the most Christian King; to consent to a Peace on those Conditions; as also to procure a Cessation of Arms for three Months; and to induce the Catholic King within that time, to acquiesce with the said Conditions. And as to the coercive Part of the Treaty, it is contain'd in the eighth Article, which says, That if the said most Christian King should refuse his Consent to the said Articles; it is agreed, by Virtue of this League, between his said Majesty and the said States, they shall forthwith, and without any manner of Delay, endeavour with joint and utmost Power, to bring the most Christian King to a Compliance with them, pursuant to the Counsels and Methods upon which they shall punctually agree among themselves. The Ratifications were to be exchanged within four Weeks.

It is remarkable, that a few Days after Mr. Thyne was sent to Holland, viz. December 24, O. S. Mr. Montagu received Orders both from the Lord Treasurer and Mr. Secretary of State, to make Infrances with his most Christian Majesty, for a general Truce for a Year, and that he would pass his Word to attempt nothing in Flanders till the first of March: And January 7, his Excellency in a Letter to the King, informs his Majesty, that in Obedience to his Commands, he had represented to the KING of FRANCE, with all the Respect that could be; his Majesty's Intention of continuing his kind Correspondence, and how, upon that Account, he desir'd a two Months Cessation, which he would own as the greatest Mark of Kindness he could give him; but had as yet receiv'd no Answer. He then proceeds to mention a Lure which had been thrown out by the French Court, with regard to a Marriage between the Dauphin and the Daughter of the Duke of Orleans, by the Princess Henrietta, the King's Sister; adopts and recommends it himself as an Expedient that might serve to bring his Majesty off from the Terms he had insisted upon; and ends with a Hint, that it would be difficult to procure a Suspension.

In another of the same Date to the Lord Treasurer, he refers to a Proposition (a ridiculous one he calls it) of the French Minister's, to postpone the Meeting of the Parliament, as the Price of a Suspension; and says he cannot imagine whence it should take its Rise, except from the Opinion of that Court (which he acknowledges they had reason enough to entertain) That we ought to do every thing to please them; and that they ought to do nothing to please us. He also gives it as his express Opinion, that they would rather break with us, than agree to the Terms propos'd; BECAUSE they were so much forwarder and better prepar'd for a War than we.

But while the Answers given to Mr. Montagu at Paris were thus delusive, extravagant, or evasive, Mr. Barillon at London could speak out plainly on the two Months Respite, viz. That whatsoever the King of France should take before the first of March, he would restore, in case the general Suspension should be agreed, on all hands, before the said first of March: But that he would not consent to stand still so long, because so much Time would be lost and the Suspension not accepted at last.

Hence it was rightly concluded, that his most Christian Majesty would no longer defer his March into Flanders; for which he was already prepar'd; and the King grew so dissatisfis'd with the French Conduct (at least the Lord Treasurer so assures the Prince of Orange, in his Dispatch of January 7,) that he was now wholly dispos'd for going to War. Accordingly, while the Fit lasted, he demanded Ostend and Port Malon of the Spaniards for the Accommodation of his Ships and Troops, and that Holland should join him with seventy capital Ships at least; but, withal it was signify'd, that, till these Points were settled, England would take no other Share in the War than by Sea.

It was now the time for the Parliament to sit for the Dispatch of Business; but it was thought fit to adjourn them again for thirteen Days: One Reason for which, was to know whether the Spaniards would comply with the King's Demands, as to Port Malon and Ostend, which Mr. Godolphin was in that Interval soliciting at Brussels: And another is given by the Lord Treasurer, in a Letter to Mr. Montagu, dated January 17, viz. To see if any Expedient for the Peace could be found out in that time.

We have already touch'd on the exquisite Enquire Policy of France; and never was it more manifest or more successful than now. No Jenkin's Letters, col. 1. sooner was the Eventual Treaty between them p. 140.

(c) There is not only something obscure in this Passage of Sir William Temple's, but irreconcilable to the Prince's own Testimony; who, January 20, N. S. gives the Lord Treasurer his heavy Thanks for the most useful Plans he had taken in bringing about this good Agreement between the King and the States, for which he had so strenuously long'd; and express'd his further Desires, that the said Treaty, according to the present Plan, might be immediately ratify'd. Let the Reader determine, whether the Author misrepresents, or the Politician dissembles.

them and the Dutch, in a fair way to be settled at Nimeguen, than they obtain'd a Passport, which they had long solicited for three Gentlemen, the most accomplish'd in the Train of the Embassy, to spend a Fortnight in Holland. What their Commission was, can only be guess'd at by Consequences. The Dutch had been long as weary of the War as desirous of Peace: And from this time forward, that Disposition of theirs, every Day, and almost every Hour, increas'd. The Defeat at Mount Cassel, very sensibly mortify'd them; but the Disappointment at Charleroy put them beyond all Patience. The Prince's Voyages to England and his Successes there, had greatly increas'd the Jealousy which the Affair of Guelderland, before spoken of, began. The de Wit or Aristocratic Party, who equally abhor'd the Orange-Dictates, and the Democracy they were supported by, not only began to form anew, but gather'd Strength, and grew popular, by driving on a Peace as violently, as the Prince drove on the War. A Chaim in the Dams of Holland, could scarce threaten more Mischiefs to that Country, than this unseasonable Division; for at every such Opening, the French, like Water, are sure to insinuate themselves, and carry Ruin along with them: And it is notorious, that there is something treasonable in the Root of every Faction; for rather than sacrifice their own private Views, they make no Difficulty to sacrifice the Public.

As the Marriage was follow'd so immediately, by the long Adjournment of Parliament, the whole Proceeding had very much the Air of a Compromise: And the Equillities of France, tho' sensible the last Step was taken purely to reconcile his most Christian Majesty to the first, did not fail to represent it accordingly: Nay, they gave out, and found Belief, that by the Match, the King and Duke had drawn over the Prince wholly into their Interests or Sentiments; whereas the Prince went away posses'd with an Opinion, that he had drawn them into his.

Having thus prepar'd the Soil, they, the French, proceeded to scatter their Grain: They propos'd to the Dutch other Terms of Peace, far short of the King's, and less safe for Flanders; restoring only six Towns to the Spaniards, and mentioning Lorrain but ambiguously; which would not have gone down in Holland, but for the Suspicions rais'd by the Prince's Marriage among the People there, who had an incurable Jealousy of our Court, and thereupon, not that Confidence in the Prince which he deserv'd. They even found Means to reconcile the two ruling Burgo-masters of Amsterdam, who had the whole Sway of that great City, which had so great an Influence in Holland, and who had long been Enemies: The Cement of which Union was, their Concurrence in pushing on the Peace, on the Terms offer'd by France.

They, also, took the like Advantage of the Divisions in England, and employ'd the like Practices to render them equally servicable to themselves: For, after so many and such great Successes, they neither car'd to be forc'd into a Peace they did not relish, nor to pay an extravagant Price for one they did; nor to be overmatch'd in the War, in case they should resolve to continue it. The Dutch, they knew, could not be more jealous of their Stadtholder, than the English of their King. It was the Design of what he might one Day be induc'd to attempt with the Assistance of France, that principally induc'd them to lay hold of this Crisis to divide him from France. If therefore, a Belief could be established, that in arming his Majesty against France, the People would find they had arm'd him against themselves, it was easy to foresee the Pur-suit would be given over at once: And the very Insinuation would have a Tendency to create Dissidence and Irresolution; and thereby render it ineffectual. We shall find the Event authoriz'd these Conclusions: And, that some such Artifices were actually brought into play, we have the following Evidence out of Mr. Montague's Letters to the Lord Treasurer.

In that of January 11, before quoted, he says: "I am confident some of the discontented Parliament Men have been intriguing with the French Ambassador, Mr. Barillon; for I saw a Letter of his to Mr. Courten (which I beg your Lordship never to take notice of) where he says: 'Tho' the Court should set themselves to oppose you, we have good Expectations to save ourselves by the Parliament, whose Inclination for the War is not so strong, as has been insinuated to us.'"

Again, January 12: "The Occasion of my giving you this Trouble, is to give you the best Light I can into the Reason of Mr. Rozvigny's Son's Journey into England, who will be there, perhaps, as soon as this Letter. If his Father's Age had permitted it, I believe they would have sent him; for they have chosen the Son, who is to make use of Lights his Father will give him; and by the near relation he has to the Lady Vaughan, who is his Cousin-german, and the particular Friendship which Father and Son have with Mr. (Lord) Wm. Russell, he is to be introduc'd into a great Commerce with the malecontented Members of Parliament, and insinuate what they shall think fit to cross your Measures at Court, if they shall prove disagreeable to them here, whilst Mr. Barillon goes on in his smooth, civil way."

Again, January 13: "I have had one with me, that is very exactly, as can be, inform'd of most things here; and has told me the Reason of Rozvigny's Journey. His chief Errand is to let the King know, that the King of France did hope he was so firm to him, as not to be led away by the grand Treasurer. He was an ambitious Man, and to keep himself with the People, would gratify their Inclinations, by leading his Master into an unreasonable War against France. That as for Money, if he wanted that, he should have what he would from hence. His Instructions are, if this does not take by the Means of William Russell and their discontented People to give a great deal of Money, and cross all your Measures at Court."

And

And again, March 11, "This same Man (Mr. de Tolde, a great Acquaintance of the Duke of Buckingham) tells me, That, young Ruvigny, by Orders from the King of France, has made Mr. Borillon strike up a League with him (d) (Buckingham); that they often meet privately; and that Mr. Borillon is much guided by him."

There is so much of Design in all the State Letters of these Times; and the Politics of the several Courts from whence they came studied so often, almost daily and hourly, that it is scarce possible to reduce them to any Consistency, or draw any solid Inferences from them. Neither the Letters of any one Man, or any one Correspondence contain the whole Truth. On the Contrary it breaks out here and there; and to pursue the Vein, we must thread the whole Maze of Perplexities that lies before us.

Mr. Montagu had his Views in all he writes to the Lord Treasurer. The Lord Treasurer has his Reserves in all he writes to Mr. Montagu. According to Mr. Montagu, Mr. Ruvigny had it in Charge to blast the Treasurer with the King. According to the Treasurer's own Account, Mr. Ruvigny declared before witnesses, that his Master had a good Opinion of him, and held the same Discourse to his Majesty. Mr. Montagu writes of Mr. Ruvigny, as if he was either an Enemy to the Man, or to his Commission; and yet both Mr. Ruvigny, and Mr. Montagu make use of almost the same Language, and apparently point at the same End. Mr. Ruvigny said, January 16, O.S. "That his Master might be brought to part with Valenciennois and Coudé, but never with Tournay; and the main of his Drift was to engage the Treasurer, to prevail with the King, to prevail with the Prince of Orange not to insist on that Town; and press'd the Matter on his Lordship, as if he had an Interest of his own with his Highness, sufficient to carry this Point, and thereby put an End to the War. Mr. Montagu writes, January 12, N. S. "Your Lordship has so great an Influence (by the Obligations he had to you, and personal Libecun he has for you) over the Prince of Orange, that I am confident he will comply to what you shall make him see is the King's Interest; which I cannot think will be to enter into a War so unprovided as he is."

While Mr. Ruvigny was on the point of setting out for England, Mr. Montagu also, either to prepare his way, or fill it with Snares and Difficulties, for it is uncertain which, displays a new Scene of Influence to the Lord Treasurer as follows: "I have had twice with me an intimate Friend of Mr. Colbert's with great Professions of Respect to the King our Master, and saying how reasonable a thing it was that he, who has suffer'd so much in his own Kingdom, for his great Friendship to the King of France, should share with him in the Advantages he has had by the War; and, for his part, he would contribute to his being fitly'd if he could. That he knew Mr. de Louvois had sung out some Offers of Money; but that was only to amuse my Master, and gain time; for that Mr. Louvois intended nothing more than the continuing the War; whereas he (Mr. Colbert) was desirous of nothing more than the Peace, as the only thing that could best secure him, and the King his Master. That if the King my Master would, as an Expedient for the Peace, hearken to a great Sum of Money, and give me Power to treat with him; it should be done with all the Secrecy imaginable; and the Peace made, whether Mr. de Louvois would or no, provided Tournay might remain to the King of France. In consideration of which, the King our Master should have the Honour of making his Niece (Madame's Daughter) Queen of France. And for Valenciennois and Coudé, such Expedients as should be honourable for the Spaniards and the Prince of Orange. And for the Sum of Money our Master should insist on for himself, Mr. Colbert thinks he could make it come easier than Mr. Louvois who must come to him for it first."

What was the Result of Mr. Ruvigny's Mission, we shall see in its proper Place.

While all this Variety of Amusements was practis'd on the French Side, we seem'd resolute either to have Peace, on the Terms propos'd by Lord Fettersham, or to enter forthwith into the War: Preparatory to which the Duke of Monmouth's, and the Lord Dunbarton's Regiments were first recalled out of the French Service, under the Pretence of some Disorder in Scotland; and shortly after Orders were sent to recall the rest. It must, however, be observ'd, that these Orders were not accompany'd with a Proclamation, as usual, on these Occasions; and the Answer given by his most Christian Majesty, was, That the Capitulation should be kept, which left it in his Option to retain them, till thirty Days after War should be declar'd between the two Nations: And in the mean time he order'd the Regiment of Dauphin to march into Dauphiné.

The Prince of Orange, in the mean time, in every Dispatch to his Friend, the Lord Treasurer, endeavour'd to keep up our Spirit, and to dissuade us from doing things by halves:

(d) His Excellency, who makes it the sole Business of this Letter to ingratiate himself with the Lord Treasurer, as the Expecter of his Grace, proceeds thus:

"You know, my Lord, how freely he (the Duke) speaks his Mind; and he told this Man (de la Tolde) that he did not doubt of finding you, and being better with the King than ever: And, in order to win you, he had confided his Friends, whether he had better mix up with you or not; and that he was advis'd not to be friends with you. And, therefore, desir'd the King, who offer'd to make you friends, not to do it. Therefore, pray, let not your Generosity or Good-nature prevail upon you enough to trust him: But be upon your guard; for if he can do you Mischief, he will."

And, after the Paragraph above-quoted:

"The Duke of Buckingham, I find, reckons that he has the greatest Part of the Court for him; and owns the having a Promise of being very soon again a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber. I have had, from several Hands, an Overture of Excommunication; if not, I am to be one of the Prelates; and I intend to do with him, what he resolves to do with your Lordship; that is, not make up. And if I might be worthy to advise, were I in your Lordship's Place, I would do to you; for I am confident you will find his Friendship as troublesome as I'll tell you he will be."

*And, to excite a Confidence in him, two thousand eight hundred Men, together with a proportionable Number of Transports, were actually got ready here, in order to be thrown over into Ostend and Nicuport: Both which Places were left destitute of Garrisons by the Spaniards, and consequently lay expos'd to the Attempts of the French; who were, thus early, on the point of taking the Field: But the Spaniards, tho' in such a desperate Situation, seem'd as much afraid of their Friends, as their Enemies; nor would even admit of our Protection, tho' Mr. Godolphin was sent on purpose to offer it, till the Prince of Orange join'd his Influances; and, possibly, took upon him to answer for our good Behaviour. earnest Instances to the Duke de Villa Hermosa, to press him to a Resolution to put the Town of Ostend into his Majesty's Hands, during the War: He has, hereupon, come to a Resolution to receive into it the Troops his Majesty shall send, not being able to declare himself further upon this Point, till he receives the Orders from Spain, for which he has written. If he has no Instructions, as he protests he has not, this is all that I can see in his Power to do." And yet without any Mention of this Circumstance, Mr. North is pleas'd to say, "Spain itself, whose Work was to be done, would not aid their own Preservation in Flanders; by trusting the King of England with a marine Town, that he might land his Forces, succour and recruit them with Ease."

(e) Concerning the several Adjournments, which had taken place since the last general Meeting by Proclamation, Mr. Marvell, with usual Freedom, writes as follows: "They begin again at the Day appointed, the 16th of July. Under the pretence of these frequent Adjournments, which seem'd to further to confirm their Title to Parliament, they quite forgot how they had been outlaw'd in the Council; or if any Sense of it remain'd, there was no Opportunity to discover it: For his Majesty having signify'd, by Mr. Secretary Coventry, his Pleasure, that there should be a further Adjournment, their Speaker, Mr. Seymour, would not suffer any Man to proceed; but an honourable Member requiring modestly to have the Oath read, by which they were before adjourn'd, he interposed him, and the Speaker of that Motion: For he had, at the last Meeting, gain'd one Precedent, of his own making, for adjourning the House without question, by his own Authority, and was loth to have it discountenanc'd; so that, without more ado, like an inflexible Judge, and who had the Power over Councils, he declar'd, in Camera, that they were adjourn'd till the 31st of December next. And in the same Moment stamp'd down on the Floor, and went forth (trampling upon, and treading under foot, I had almost said, the Privilege and Usage of Parliament, but however) without showing that decent Respect which is due to a Multitude in Order, and to whom he was a natural Rival.

These remain now only to relate, that, before the Meeting appointed for the 3d of December, his Majesty's Proclamation was issued, signifying, that he expected not the Members Attendance, but that those of them about Town should appear themselves till the 4th of April, 1678. But these Words, that the House was adjourn'd themselves, were very well receiv'd by those of the Commons who imagin'd themselves thereby restor'd to their Right, after Mr. Seymour's Invasion: When, in reversal of this, he, probably desiring to retain a Jurisdiction that he had twice stirr'd up, and to add this Power to the Crown, of his own planting, Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered a written Message from his Majesty, on the 3d of December, of a contrary Effect, that 'not of the Fine Validity, with the Proclamation; to wit, That the House should be adjourn'd only to the 15th of January, 1677: Which as soon as read, Mr. Seymour would not give leave to a worthy Member, offering, to speak; but abruptly, now the third time, of his own Authority, adjourn'd them, without putting the Question; altho' Sir J. Francis, for once doing so, in serio Carali, was accus'd of High Treason. This only can be said, perhaps, in his Excuse, that whereas That in serio Carali was a Parliament legally constituted, Mr. Seymour did here do as a Sheriff, that disperses a riotous Assembly. In this manner they were kick'd from Adjournment to Adjournment, as from one Star down to another; and when they were at the Bottom kick'd up again, having no man yet to go out of doors."

And here we are to take our leave of Mr. Marvell, and his Book; which I own I have the better Opinion of, on account of the following ingenious Declaration, which he makes towards the Close of it.

"Thus far hath the Conspiracy against our Religion and Government been laid open; which if true, it was more than once that it should be discovered: But if any thing therein has been falsely juggled, the disproving of it, in any Particular, will be a Courtesy both to the Public and to the Relater, who would be glad to have the World convinced of the contrary, tho' it be to the Prejudice of his own Reputation."

But tho' we find it uniformly treated as the work of Hell, by Mr. North, and all the other Apologists for the Reign; no better Warmth occurs to us, than that he has been lavish in his Praises of the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Shaftesbury: Answer to it, I have met with none; except in the King's Proclamations, signing the Remission of six hundred Pounds to any Person who should discover the Author, or Sender to the King's and fifty Pounds for the Printer, or Publisher.

And, because I have made such frequent and large Use of his Works, I have thought myself oblig'd to insert the following Testimonium of his Probity and Virtue: The first is taken from his Life, prefix'd to his several Writings by Mr. Child; and the second from the Monument of Cassaubon, Latins, and English, erected to his Memory by his Countrymen, the Bishops of Exeter and Bath.

"He made himself obnoxious to the Government, both in his Actions and Writings; and, notwithstanding his Proceedings were all contrary to his private Interest, opening could ever shake his Resolution. His being one Night been entertain'd by the King, who had been often displeas'd in his Company, his Majesty the next Day sent the Lord Treasurer, Drury, to find out his Lodging. Mr. Marvell, who then lodg'd up two Pale of St. Giles, in a little Court in the Strand, was sitting when the Lord Treasurer open'd the Door abruptly upon him. Surpris'd at the sight of an unexpected Visitor, he told him he believ'd he had mistook his Way. The Lord Treasurer reply'd, not, now I have found Mr. Marvell; telling him, that he came with a Message from his Majesty, which was, to know when he could do to visit him? His Answer was, in an usual factious Manner, that it was not in his Majesty's Power to force him. But coming to a serious Explanation of his Meaning, he told the Lord Treasurer, he knew the Nature of Courts full well; he had been in many; that whoever is distinguish'd by a Prince's Favours is certainly expected to vote in his Interest. The Lord Treasurer told him, his Majesty had only a just Sense of his Merit; as regard to which alone, he desired to know whether there was any Place at Court he could be pleas'd with? These Others had no Effect on him, tho' they urg'd with the greatest Earnestness. He told the Lord Treasurer, he could not accept them with Honour; for he must be either angry with the King, in voting against him; or false to his Country, in giving into the Measures of the Court; therefore, the only Favor he believ'd of his Majesty was, that he would esteem him as dutiful Subject as any he had; and more in his proper Interest, in refusing his Offers, than if he had embraced them. The Lord Treasurer, finding no Argument could prevail, told him, the King's Majesty had order'd a thousand Pounds for him, which he hop'd he would receive, till he could think what further to do of his Majesty. This last Offer was reject'd with the same Goodness of Mind, as was the first; tho', as soon as the Lord Treasurer was gone, he was forced to send to a Friend to borrow a Guinea."

"Nearst in Blood iseth the Body of Andrew Marvell, Esq; A Man so endow'd by Nature, so improved by Education, so Study, and Travel; so consummated by Experience, that joining the most peculiar Graces of Wit and Learning, with a singular Penetration and Strength of Judgment, and exercising all these, in the whole Course of his Life, he became an unmatchable Standard in the Ways of Virtue, so became the Ornament and Example of his Age; beloved by good Men, fear'd by bad, admir'd by all; tho' imitated, also; by few, and scarce paralleled by any. The Parli-
King's Speech.

January 28 the Session was opened; and the King in his Speech to both Houses, signify'd, That he had made such Alliances for Holland, as were for the Preservation of Flanders, and which, with due Assistance, could not fail of that End: Acknowledg'd, That he had us'd all possible Means, by a Mediation, to have procur'd an honourable and late Peace for Christendom, knowing how preferable such a Peace would have been to any War; especially to this Kingdom, which could not but be sensible of the vast Benefits it had receiv'd by Peace, while its Neighbours were such Sufferers by the War: Declar'd, that since a Peace by fair Means was no longer to be hoped for, it should not be his Fault if it was not obtain'd by Force; and that he had recall'd his Troops from France: Intimated, that tho' the Dutch should do their Parts, ninety Capital Ships would be necessary, and thirty or forty thousand Land-Men: Contented to have the Money given for these Services, appropriated, as strictly as could be desired: Made a Merit of forwarding the Building of the new Ships (which he said had cost 100000*l.* more than the Act allow'd) and of repairing the old: In doing which, and furnishing them with Stores and Ordnance, he alleg'd, he had expended a great deal more than the 200000*l.* he had been enabled to borrow on the Excise: Enlarged on the Expence he had been at in reducing a Rebellion in Virginia, and carrying on a new War with Agiers: Touch'd on his Engagement to the Prince of Orange for his Niece's Portion; and signify'd that he should not be able to maintain his constant, necessary Establishment, unless the new Imposts upon Wines, &c. were continu'd to him: Put the Commons in mind, tho' not by particular Address, of their Promises: Said he had done all he could to remove all sorts of Jealousies; that by marrying his Niece to the Prince of Orange, he had given full Assurances that he should never suffer his Interests to be ruin'd, if he could be assist'd, as he ought, to preserve them; and that he expected a plentiful Supply, suitable to such great Occasions, whereon depended not only the Honour, but, for aught he knew, the Being of the English Nation; which would not be sav'd by finding Fault afterwards; but might be prevented by avoiding the chief Fault of doing weakly and by HALVES, what could be only hop'd from a vigorous and thorough Prosecution of what we undertook.

It is natural to think the Dutch Party had now the Ascendancy in the Cabinet, as it had, or seem'd to have, in the Senate, at the last Meeting: We find the very Expressions of the Prince of Orange in the Speech; and this thundering Demand of so huge a Land Army, is founded on a Scheme of his Highness's, which he had sent over, at the Instance of the Lord Treasurer. His Words are these:

(f) "Since you desire to know my Thoughts how England may act with the greatest Prospect of Success against France, in case of a Breach with them, I will give you my Opinion in a very few Words. You must have a very considerable Fleet in the Mediterranean to interrupt their Commerce. You must likewise have a powerful Army as can be rais'd, which may be either put on board, in order to make a Descent upon France, and thereby cause a very powerful Diversion, or else be transported into the Low Countries, there to act according as Occasion shall offer. I think, as Things are at present, the latter of these two ways of employing the Land Forces, is the better; for unless a very vigorous Effort be made there, it will be impossible to save that little that remains of the Low Countries." It is likewise natural to think from the Appearance of things, that Opposition would now have been at an End, and that the Parliament would, readily and cheerfully, have supported the Measures they had so strenuously recommended: Or if any Difference had remain'd, it would have been only such as arose from the different Opinions of Men, in the manner of conducting a Measure, which all affected to consider as indispensable. But either the House, by long Habit, was grown fond of Controversy, and willing to believe the King, instead of being never, was always in the wrong; or their Leaders had the Penetration to see to the Bottom of things; and found Cause to apprehend that the Money and Troops they were to levy against France, might be employ'd against themselves; or, at least, that the Court would, on one hand, take Money of them for a War, and of France for a Peace on the other: For when the Speech was taken into Consideration, and the plentiful Supplies demanded, which were tickled for in it, a Spirit of Incredulity prevail'd; and till the Alliances which his Majesty had made were actually produced, no Disposition appear'd to forward the Grants which were to support them (g).

So far, however, there was nothing in their Conduct unreasonable: But Opposition is liable to Abuse as well as Power; and when they proceeded to draw up their Addresses, many Clauses were propos'd and admitted, which had a stronger Tincture of Faction, Faction than Patriotism, and shew'd a greater Proneness to distress the Court, than serve their Country. They set out, indeed, with their Thanks to his Majesty for the Care he express'd for the Preservation and Encouragement of the Protestant Religion, in concluding a Marriage between his Niece and the Prince of Orange; but they proceeded to beseech him not to admit any Treaty of Peace, whereby the French King should be left in Possession of any greater Dominion or Power, than was left him by the Pyrenean Treaty. (This seems to have been prompted by the Spanish Ambassador.) That both on our Parts, and the Parts of the Confederates, no Ship or Vessel might be admitted to come out of any Port of France, but that the Ships and Men be seiz'd, and the Goods destroy'd: That he would please to provide that none of the Parties who should join in this Alliance and Confederacy against France, depart from the said Alliance, till the said King be reduced to the said Treaty. That neither we nor the Confederates admit any Trade with France, or suffer any Goods to be imported from thence on pain of Forfeiture. That his Majesty would proceed in making such Confederacies as were necessary for attaining these Ends: And lastly, tho' they took it for granted, that his Majesty could never doubt of the Affections of his People, yet, upon this Occasion, they renew'd their former Protestations and Engagements to persevere in the Prosecution of the said War; and when he should be pleas'd to impart such Alliances and Confederacies to them in Parliament, they would give such ready Assurances, upon all Occasions, as might bring the War to a happy Conclusion.

The King's Answer was to the following Effect:

That he was not a little surpris'd to find so much inserted in their Address of what should not be, and so little of what should. That his Speech was to both Houses jointly, and the Return ought to be from both. That in their Address of the 20th of May last, they did invite him to a League Offensive and Defensive with Holland against the French King, and for preserving the Spanish Netherlands; and upon his Declaration of such Alliances, assur'd such speedy Assurances as might fully answer the Occasion. That he had made such Alliances, yet found no Return but the old Promises upon new Conditions, and so he might be us'd to Eternity, should he seem satisfy'd with such Proceeding: That on the 28th of May last he told them, how highly he was offended at the great Invasion of his Prerogative; yet they took no notice of it, but added to their former ill Conduct new Invasions. They desir'd him to oblige his Confederates never to consent to a Peace till the most Christian King be reduc'd to the Pyrenean Treaty; a Determination fitting only for God Almighty, since none but he can tell the Terms of Peace who knows the Event of War. They defire him not to suffer a Ship of theirs to come from France under pain of Confiscation, not excepting Allies, Prince, or Embassadors (if any among them.) That he did not believe any Assembly of Men ever gave so great and public a Provocation to the whole World, without so much as considering to provide one Ship, Regiment, or Penny towards justifying it. That, however, if by their Assistance he might be put into Arms sufficient for such a Work, he would not be weary till Christendom be restor'd to such a Peace, that it should not be in the Power of one Prince to disturb it. That the Rights of making and managing War and Peace were in his Majesty; and if they thought he would depart from any Part of that Right, they were mistaken; the Reins of Government were in his Hands, and he had the same Care to preserve them there, as to preserve his own Person. He kept both his People's Protection and Safety; and that if the House of Commons would encourage his Majesty to go further in Alliances, they must consider of raising speedy Supplies; for from the Consideration of those, he must take his Measures.

Tho' his Majesty evaded the imparting his Alliances, which was indeed the sole Point the House should have insisted on, he had to clearly the best of the Argument, and express'd himself with so much Sense and Spirit upon it, that the naming the Alliance had all the Effect of communicating it: And, upon the Question, it was carry'd to assist his Majesty in the Prosecution of the War, by a Majority of sixty-two.

After what manner his Majesty should be assist'd, and how far, came next under Deliberation: And now the Courtiers utterly forgot, that the Dutch Ministers at Nimeguen would have compounded for the shipping of the British Troops out of the French Service into theirs, and for a Squadron of Ships to block up the French Ports on one side, while they took the same care of the rest: According to the Intimation in the King's Speech, both a mighty Fleet, and a mighty Land Army were demanded; but, on the last Head, a violent Debate arose; a Jealousy being entertain'd, says Sir John Kersey, "that the King indeed intended to raise an Army, but never design'd to join with the War; and, to say the truth, some of the King's own Party were not very farre of the contrary." According to Bishop Burnet, Sir William Coventry, in particular, shew'd the great Inconvenience of raising a Land Army, the Danger that might follow it, the little Use that could be made of it, and the great Charge it must put the Nation to. He was for hiring Bodies from the German Princes, and for assisting the Dutch with a Navy. He thought that which did more properly belong to England was, to set out a great Fleet, and to cut off the French Trade every where: But, adds the Bishop, the King had promis'd to many (b) Commissions to Men of Quality, Quality, in both Houses, that they carry'd it for a Land Army.

As our foreign and domestic Affairs now run a parallel Course, we must journey between both; and turn from one to the other, alternately, as we are led by corresponding Circumstances.

Hand. Mem.

Messieurs de Barillon and Rouvigny, with the rest of the French Agents, had taken such advantage of the ill Humour the Commons set out with, and were surpris'd with the vigorous Resolutions they had come to since, that they found Ways and Means to give a new Bias to our Court System. His Majesty not only gave way to Abatements, on the Terms sent by Lord Feversham, but dispatch'd (i) Mr. Godolphin to the Prince of Orange, to induce his Highness to do the same: And it is upon this Occasion, that we find the Lord Treasurer shewing, in a very extraordinary Manner, how totally averse he was to the keeping any Measures with France, and how resolute he was to embark with the Commons in the War. The very Words of his Dispatch to the Prince of Orange, which was dated February 9, are as follow:

Secret Correspondence between the Prince of Orange and the Lord Treasurer.

"Since my Letter of Yesterday, when I thought Mr. Godolphin would have been dispatch'd the same Day, I have Reason to believe that the Proposition about giving Charlemont, or some other Place for Tourney will be accepted in France: And I have no less Reason to believe, that the making the Peace upon that Proposition, would be very fatal to the Interest of the King my Master. I confess I cannot see, but that the Consequences must be ill to your Highness also, when the Confederacy shall be thereby broken, and we, perhaps, ty'd to such Conditions, as may leave us incapable of giving you those Assurances we ought to do: Besides, the Parliament has now voted 26,000 Foot, and 2000 Horse and Dragoons, and 90 Sail of Men of War; and I am confident will not stop there, in case his Majesty will go freely into the War, which yet they all doubt, AND NOT WITHOUT CAUSE. I will have no Reserve to your Highness; and, therefore, you must know, that Mr. Rouvigny (who has been here this Fortnight) goes on Monday to the French King with this Proposition, and designs to return hither, with an Answer the last of this Month (our Stile) or the first or second of March; and till that time expects the King will declare nothing against him. But his Majesty has promis'd, that, only in case they should attempt no Sieges in the mean time; so that this may prove a happy Expedient to hinder them so long from making any Progress, and may give both you and us so much more time to make our Preparations; and, at last, unless your Highness will not consent to this Proposal, the King will not be engag'd to the French at all. From what I have now inform'd your Highness, and more that I must not say, I hope your Highness will not consent to any Alterations of the first Propositions by my Lord Feversham: But if I may offer my Advice, I would not desire the Dispatch of Mr. Godolphin too soon, because the King should not think you reject any Propositions of his with-fers, "That not less than a hundred Commissions were sign'd by Secretary Willoughby to Irish Papists, to raise Forces; and that, without his Royal Highness's Approbation, no Commission was dispos'd of: Or if by choice any had got Commissions, not right for the Popish Cause, no sooner had they rais'd and recruited their Men, but a Complement was put upon them, and others more worthy set in their Place."

"(ii) His Instructions were as follow:

"You are immediately to go to the Prince of Orange, and to represent to him,

1. That (contrary to my Representation) I find the Parliament very backward in their Proceedings, to give the necessary Supplies for the Support of a War against France.

2. That the Ship, which have been made towards it hitherto has been with very great Difficulty; and that I have seen much reason to be confident, that all I shall be able to get at last from them, will either be too little to maintain the War, or given to late, and for so short a Time, as will not enable me to do him any good, but may probably put me into a dangerous Condition, both at home and abroad.

3. That I have receiv'd Letters from my Resident at Brüssel, who writes, that by the Duke de Villa Herme's Directions he was to let me know, that the Duke hop'd I would conclude a Peace upon the best Conditions I could get, for that he despair'd of having Flanders by a War, and resigned these Designs to him twice.

4. That altho' the Marquis de Barnevaine would not directly own the Saying so much as my Resident had writ; yet he confess'd, and does still, that the Duke de Villa Herme wishes a Peace, much rather than the Continuance of the War.

5. That when the Spaniards shall see our Backwardness, and how little Assurance I shall be able to give them this Year (or perhaps at all) and seeing to what Extremities they will be reduced, by the great Preparations made against them; I cannot but believe they will either submit to my separate Peace which shall be offer'd by France, or that they will be no longer able to keep their Towns from giving themselves up to the French.

6. That these Considerations have mov'd me to send you purposely to acquaint him with the same State of Things here, to the end that he might take his own Measures the more conveniently; and that I might receive his Opinion, what (in the Case aforesaid) might be most advisable for us both.

7. That I have reason to think (altho' it has not been directly propos'd to me) that the Propositions for a Peace, first by my Lord Feversham, would be accepted, being the Town of Tourney; but that as I will never hear of any Alteration, without the Prince of Orange's Consent to it; so I have told the French Ambassador, that I would never propose to the Spaniards the quitting of Tourney, because it opens such a Passage into the Heart of Flanders: But I desire to know, whether (as is said) you will Condescend by the War the Prince might see think expedient to let me offer Conditions for some other Place for my Tourney, if by such an accommodation the Peace would be procur'd; because I am confident the Duke de Villa Herme would be glad of it: And I have the same Opinion of the States.

8. You shall give him full Assurance, that these Propositions proceed not in the least from any Change, or Alteration of my Resolutions to remain firm to him, and to the Treaty I have made with the States; but purely to prevent, by all possible Expedients, those great Evils which I fear may befall both him and me, by my Incapacity of assisting him as I would, and the great Uncertainty of securing either timely or sufficient Supplies from my Parliament to do it.

9. You may also assure him (in case you shall get my Scruple on this part) that the Proposal of changing some Place for Tourney is wholly from myself; and that I never have receiv'd any such Proposal from France; so do I know whether any such thing would be accepted.

10. You shall also let him know, that, in case a Peace cannot be sign'd on, it will be impossible for me to send any Troops into Flanders, unless I may have the Port of Ostend put into my Hand: And I desire that he will interest himself to let in that Matter, that I may by him know (in that case) whether the Spaniards will let me have it or no.

Lastly, You are to remind him, how long I have been in expectation of somebody from him, to concern the naval Preparations, and other Matters relating to the War; and I desire, that somebody may be sent over for that purpose, with all convenient Speed.

You shall communicate all these Instructions to my Ambassador Mr. Hyde; but both of you are to pretend your Business to be only, to give the Prince of Orange an Account of your Negotiation with the Duke de Villa Herme about Ostend.

You are to return in two Days after your Arrival at the Hague, or where else you shall find the French, unless he shall direct you they come time long.

out due Consideration. On the other hand, I cannot wish him detain'd above four or five Days, because it will be of absolute Necessity he should be back before the Return of Mr. Ruvigny. You see how intirely I trust myself in your Highness's Hands, where I can no more doubt of my own Safety, than I can of your Honour, especially since the Design of all this is for the Safety and Honour both of my own Master, and your Highness.

The Prince in his Reply (which was dated February 11) repos'd as much Confidence in the Lord Treasurer, as he had done in his Highness, saying: "For, to conceal nothing from you, the generality of the States will make no Scruple to accept of Charlement instead of Tourney, and, perhaps will be content to confend even to lower Terms of Peace, rather than be persuaded to carry on any longer a War, for the Support of which they find they cannot, without all the Difficulty in the World, raise Money sufficient. As for the Spaniards, I can't say what their Sentiments might be, if they had full Assurance, that, upon yielding up Charlement, a Peace might be had upon the Terms propos'd; but to think of yielding up Luxemburg or Ypres, is the vainest thing in the World. Upon Mr. Ruvigny's Return from France it will appear what are the last Intentions of that Court, and, accordingly, what Measures are to be taken, since it is of the most fatal Consequence in the World that it should be so much as imagin'd, that any Terms of Peace lower than those propos'd, can ever be agreed to. It is certain, had not his Majesty at first, when he propos'd the Conditions of Peace, made the Terms as low as it was possible for us to consent to, but had made his Proposal higher, as you know I earnestly desired, and with great Velmence press'd him to do, the Peace had been made before this, which nothing could have hinder'd, but that France sees the great Backwardness which your Court shews to enter into the War, and the little Stomach they have here to continue it; and this it is, that gives me the greatest Uneasiness, and makes me, I do assure you, entertain those Sentiments of Affairs that now I do."

Doubts and Jealousies in the House of Commons.

In this Interval, Doubts and Jealousies had again taken possession of the House of Commons; which, tho' the Tools of the Faction, were likewise made use of by Men of Honour and Probity; and it was not without much Opposition, and many Debates, that the Supply was at last obtain'd. Many Difficulties, says Sir John Reresby, were started, and many Distrusts of the King; which even he, however, admitted there was Ground for: And, on the other hand, according to Burnet, Sir William Cecily came over to the Court, on this Point; declaring the King was engag'd, and that he had rather be guilty of the Murder of forty Men, than do any thing that might retard the Progress of the War. Upon the whole, February the 27th, they voted a Million, to enable the King to make War with France, for the Preservation of Flanders. The Ways and Means to raise this Sum remain'd still to be litigated: But the Proceedings of the French, at this time, quicken'd those of the House. Mr. Ruvigny's Proposals, it seems, met with little Attention from his most Christian Majesty, that, instead of resting upon his Arms, till the 1st or 2d of March, he took the Field sooner than ever: February 7, N. S. he began his March from St. Germans, being follow'd by the Queen, and the whole Court, as far as Nantz; where they arriv'd February 12: By this Motion seeming to threaten Luxemburg, Namur, or Mons: But, having drawn the Spanish Forces that Way, on a sudden, he crosses the Country, sits down before Ghent, and, by the End of the Month, takes both that Town and Ypres; and thereby gives a mighty Alarm to Holland; and strengthens the Credit and Endeavours of those he had already dispos'd of his Terms of Peace, as being now grown more necessary than ever.

The Alarm even reach'd England; and the King caus'd a Body of two thousand eight hundred Guards, and other Troops, to be dispatch'd immediately, under the Command of the Duke of Monmouth, for the Security of Ostend: His Majesty likewise took occasion to signify to such Members of the House of Commons as appear'd at his Leave, "That, except the Money voted was speedily rais'd, it would come after the French King had done his Work": Which, however authoris'd by the present desperate Situation of Things, authoris'd also the Reflections made in the House, at this time, on the King, or his Ministers, or both, who could not be prevail'd upon to stop his Progress before. To add to the Confusion of the Times, Advices were received, that Mr. Ruvigny was expected over with Offers of a Peace. The Parliament, says Reresby, started at this, and grew jealous that those Offers would be accepted; but still our Forces march'd onwards, in their way to Ostend: And in the Beginning of March, the Bill for raising Money by way of Poll, was perfected, but not without the strictest Clauses of Appropriation, and a total Prohibition of all the principal French Commodities, which was tack'd to it; that in case the War was not suffered to proceed, the Nation might nevertheless derive some Advantage from their Gift: So the Opposers, at least, pretended; but the Courtiers, on the other hand, were positive, that the real Design of the said Prohibition, was to reduce the Revenue by lowering the (£) Customs; and while they gave on one hand, to take away on the other.

It ought further to be observ'd, That the Parliament

(1) "Speaking of the Customs, says Mr. North, puts me in mind of the prodigious Industry and Diligence used by the Leaders of the Country Party, whereon I have touch'd; but I was told by one of them, that they took occasion, and, with much ado, prevail'd to have certain general Books of the Customhouse Accounts laid before the House; and being desirous to be Masters of them, which could not be in that sort ting as was allow'd for them to lie upon the Table, to be perused by the Member, they took an Opportunity, and employ'd Stationers, who decompos'd the Books, and dispersed them to be transcribed by many Hands; and, after the Copies (were) finish'd, had the Books bound up again, and laid upon the Table, in less than forty-eight Hours. [See above, p. 468.]

A.D. 1677-8. Parliament gave Credit upon this Act for three hundred thousand Pounds in Money, and an indefinite Credit for Goods and Stores, beyond the said three hundred thousand Pounds; and yet it brought in, upon the whole, but 256,223 l. 2 s. 4 d. to the King's Use.

All this while, tho' the King and the Duke appear'd urgent for a War, it was suspected, that, in their Hearts, they were still more inclin'd to Peace: And in truth they had given such a free Scope to the ambitious Career of France, that to stop it appear'd now to be almost impossible. In a Dispatch from Mr. Hyde, dated March 8, N. S. to the Lord Treasurer, he acquainted him, That in a Conference with the Pensionary, Fogel, he, the Pensionary, gave Flanders for lost: Said, that the Spaniards wished for Peace upon any Terms: That the Contermination in Holland was become so great on the Siege of Ghent, that Designs were entertain'd to submit themselves to France: That he was afraid the Torrent was too violent to be opposed: That he would use his utmost Industry to delay any Resolution, till they could know the Measures of England, tho' he fear'd all Help would come too late: And that if his Majesty could procure them any Peace, which had the least Appearance of Safety, it would be look'd upon as a great Service done to the States, and as he took it, for the Interest of the Prince of Orange, which was so weaken'd by the ill Success of the War, that nothing but a Peace could establish it. On the Receipt of this alarming Letter, and another from his Highness, confirming the ill Posture of Flanders, his Lordship took up the Pen again, (1) March 4, whether to express his Master's Sense or his own, will best appear by his own Expressions, which were to this Effect: "That the ill Conduct of the Spaniards, both in Flanders and in England, had contributed as much to their Misfortunes, as the good Conduct of the French: That their dilatory Proceedings (with respect to Ostend) had been the Cause why Succours had not been sooner sent from hence: That their Negotiations among the Parliament Men, had retarded the Supplies: That there was no Money-Bill yet in readiness, either to pay the Troops already rais'd, or raise more: That his Majesty would, nevertheless, give out Commissions for twenty Regiments more, and procure Money for the raising them, as well as he could: That his Majesty had too just a Ground from Mr. Hyde's Letter, to fear that the States would have a Peace on any Terms, and that it would be neither in his Power nor the Prince's, to hinder it: That his Majesty desir'd to know his Highness's Opinion on this Matter, without flattering himself in it, since any wrong Judgment of the Intentions of the States, would be the most fatal Mistake that could be made, to them both: That, by his Majesty's Command, he was to let him know, that the French Ambassador had Power to sign the Treaty sent by Lord Feverham, excepting Tournay, Valenciennes, and Condé: That his Majesty had refus'd to make this Proposal, as from himself, but thought it fit that his Highness should know it had been made since the taking of Ghent: That the said Ambassador had told his Majesty, That the Pope's Nuncio, had on the Part of Spain, offer'd to quit Tournay, before the Siege of that Place: That this, together with what the Pensionary had said to Mr. Hyde, and his Majesty's unprepar'd Condition to give any considerable Assistance, did move him to agree to the leaving Tournay and Valenciennes out of the Propositions of the Peace, in case his Highness and the Spaniards should desire the Peace on those Terms, which his Majesty believ'd were yet to be had, before the French had taken any more Places, tho' they seem'd very positive for Condé also: That his Majesty would come to no Conclusion without consulting his Highness, being resolv'd to pursue his late Treaty of Alliance to the utmost of his Power. But in case any of those Propositions should be thought necessary in the present Conjunction, he desir'd by his, the Prince's Means, to know the Mind of Spain as well as the States, because he would act nothing without the Concurrence of both: That if any thing of this kind should be approv'd, it would be of the utmost Importance both to the King and his Highness, that all should be kept secret, even from the Secretaries of State; and that nothing should appear but a Cessation of Arms, while Matters were formally treated and concluded at Nimeguen: That the Offers of the French Ambassadors, came to near what the Pensionary propos'd to Mr. Hyde, that his Majesty thought it necessary to have them communicated to him by Mr. Godolphin: That he thought it would be a great Service done both to the States and his Highness's Interest, which his Majesty was of Opinion, nothing but a Peace could establish: That if any thing about the Peace should be thought convenient, the Proposals for it must proceed wholly from Spain and the States: That his Majesty was to have no other Part in it, than to use his Endeavours, at their Request, to procure such a Peace as they should desire him to get for them; and that, in the mean time, his Highness might rest assur'd, That his Majesty neither did, nor would, lose a Moment in acting all he could for his Assistance."

While Mr. Godolphin was on his Voyage with this Dispatch, and the Instructions before inserted, the Transactions of the Commons were as fluctuating and inconsistent, with respect to the Supply, as those of the Court with respect to the War. And had the Conduct of the King been spotless, their own had been inexcusable: They reason'd, however,

(1) Which very Day, according to Sir John Percey, the Bill was presented by the House of Commons.

A.D. 1677-8. however, rather from their Fears, than their Knowledge; for tho' they knew he had still a Correspondence with France, it does not appear that they knew upon what Hinge it turn'd. No doubt Mr. Barrillon himself took care to contribute all that he safely could to inflame this Jealousy: But what Ruysson has had the Assurance to advance, and (as) others have had the Folly to copy; namely, that while the Cry of the Court Pensioners was, A War! Mr. Garraway declar'd to the House, That he could produce the very Articles of a Treaty between France and us, neither had, nor could have the least Foundation. A Marine Treaty for the Security of our Navigation, had indeed been negociated by Mr. Montagu, and was sign'd at St. Germain, Feb. 23, 1677-8; but that was not only innocent, but laudable; and there is not the least Trace or Footstep of any other to be found. The plain Truth is, that both Sides were equally to blame, and each has endeavour'd to mislead Posterity by extenuating their own Faults, and aggravating those of the Adversary.

The Duke and Lord Treasurer apprehensive of being attack'd by them.
Sir John Reresby reports, that both the Duke and the Treasurer were at this time apprehensive of an Attack from the House, and made Interest with their Friends, among whom Sir John himself had the Honour to be rank'd, to save it off: His Lordship even enlarg'd on the Particulars he expected to be laid to his Charge: And among these, he nam'd a Treaty between the King and Prince of Orange; which, he said, had no Existence; and also, his advising the King to make a Peace, which he never did; adding, however, "That possibly, such a Design there might be; but if there was, it proceeded from the King's own Judgment, who was much bent that way, if it was lawful to say so."

We are further told by the same Author, that, on March 14, several Speeches were made in the House, full fraught with Jealousies and Fears; and particularly with regard to the Army at this time levying, as if it was rather intended to erect absolute Monarchy at home, than infect the Enemy abroad. Complaints were also made of evil Council, and evil Counsellors; but nobody was nam'd. It is reasonable to think that the immediate Business of the Day, was the farther Consideration of the Supply, the far greatest Part of which was still unprovided for; but the wayward Disposition of the House inclin'd them to postpone the Means, tho' they contended as warmly as ever for the End; making it a Point to have the Court at their Mercy, rather than submit themselves and the Nation to the Mercy of the Court. The Debate was long, and gave rise to an Address containing the Advice of the House, "That, for the satisfying the Minds of his good Subjects, and the Encouragement of the Confederates, his Majesty would be pleas'd to declare War against the French King, for the Prosecution of which they had already pass'd a Bill of Supply; giving him Assurance that from time to time they would give such plentiful Supplies, as so Royal an Undertaking should require; beseeching him to recall his Embassadors from Nimwegen, and to cause the French Ambassador to depart from hence, that his Majesty being disengag'd from acting as a Mediator, might enter into the War for no other End, than that the said French King might be reduc'd to such a Condition, as to be no longer terrible to his Majesty's Subjects, and that Christendom might be restor'd to such a Peace, as might not be in the Power of the said King to disturb." It was also flily contended for, That a Part of this Address should be to intreat the King to put away those evil Counsellors from about him, who had advis'd him to adjourn the Parliament in May last, and thereby prevented a War with France all this time. But this being put to the Question, it was carry'd in the Negative by five Votes only: And, whereas, the King had before reprimand'd them for giving their Advice, without the Concurrence of the Lords, they resolv'd to remove that Cavil by calling upon them to join in it: But whatever Endeavours were us'd for that Purpose, their Lordships suffer'd the Address to lye before them, if not without Notice, at least without Answer.

Finding the Door thus shut against them there, they had recourse to another Expedient; by resolving the 18th, that such Members as were of the Privy Council should acquaint his Majesty, That a Bill of Aid had pass'd both Houses, and was ready for the Royal Assent: To which his Majesty retorted, by Message, next Day, That he was well pleas'd to hear the Bill was ready: That he would pass it on the Morrow: That he desired them to pass the rest of the Supply promis'd him with all Expedition: That the Sea and Land Service would run great danger of being disappointed if those Supplies were retard'd; and that it would be a Satisfaction to his Majesty, that no more time should be lost, in a thing so necessary for the Safety and Reputation of the Nation, as the finishing of those Supplies.

The Commons, however, resolv'd, That a Day should be appointed to consider of the State of the Kingdom with respect to Popery. And three Days afterwards, says Sir John Reresby, my Lord Treasurer sent for several Members of the House, and the among others, to the Treasury Chamber. His Lordship there told us, It became all good Subjects, to withstand all such Motions and Proceedings, which tended only to perplex the Minds of Men, and disturb the public Tranquility; in short, to raise Jealousies of the Government. The Duke also

Address of the King would declare War against France,

Mr. Godolphin's Conference with the Freewomen of Holland.

Dutch Mem.

We must now return to Mr. Godolphin, who arriv'd in Holland, March 27; and the next Day, according to his Instructions, communicated Mr. Barillon's Proposal to the Penfionary, founding his own Mission, and also his Discourse, on the Representation made by him, the Penfionary, to Mr. Hute, of the Terrors which had seiz'd on the Provinces, and their universal Desire of Peace. The Penfionary reply'd, That the Condition of their Affairs was now worse than ever. For one Instance of which he said, That their Actions were fallen since the time he had made that Representation, twenty in the hundred; That notwithstanding this, those of Amsterdam (whom he had most apprehended) had refus'd to make another Contribution toward the Support of the War; and declin'd for the present taking any hasty Measures towards a Peace, till they had a Return from England: That he was sensible, that neither the King of England, nor any of their other Allies, were in a Condition to send them such considerable and immediate Succours, as the urgent Necessity of their Affairs required: That the Spaniards had not in all Flanders, above 4000 Men: That the Emperor's Army could not possibly march to their Assistance till May, at the soonest: That the Forces of Brandenburg and the other Allies, were likewise very backward; and concluding, that if the Peace was not accepted upon these Conditions, had as they were, the French must presently be Masters of all the great Towns in Flanders. Mr. Godolphin then told him, That tho' the French insist upon Condé, as well as Valenciennes and Tournay, his Master had Hopes to get that Place restor'd. The Penfionary added, he would lose no time in communicating the Proposal to the Prince of Orange, with his own Opinion of it; and that, if the Prince concurr'd in it, as it was apparently his Interest to do so, when it came to be imparted to the States, it would diffuse a general Joy through the whole Country.

Mr. Hute was present at the Conference, and both he and Mr. Godolphin took care to urge how important it was, that this should be done at the Instance and Desire as well of Spain, as of the States. Mr. Godolphin then proceeded on, according to his Instructions, to the Prince of Oranges, who was then at Bonne; with what Success may be gathered from his Highness's Letter to the Lord Treasurer, dated March 27, which says, "I sent immediately (on Mr. Godolphin's Arrival) to the Duke de Villa Hermosa, to acquaint him with his Commission, and to know what Resolution he would come to thereupon, who says, he will agree to the Proposition, namely, That Valenciennes and Tournay shall remain to France, and all the rest shall be restor'd to Spain, according to the Treaty which his Majesty has made with the States: As for us, we shall agree to it; and thus is the Peace made, if France continues willing to have it on this foot, which I very much question. It is very necessary to know, as soon as possible, what France resolves herein; and if they do not agree to it, it is as necessary, that you declare War immediately, without any further Loss of Time. I will not now tell the Reasons which induce us to consent to so destructive a Peace, nor the ill Consequences, which, in all Probability, will result from it, since I have desir'd Mr. Godolphin to go back to England, and he will be able to give you a better Account of Affairs of this high Consequence by Word of Mouth, than is possible for me to do by Letter."

Upon Mr. Godolphin's Return with this Answer, the Court thought they had the Game in their own Hands. Instead of the Town of Tournay, which France first stickled for, they were to have both Tournay and Valenciennes; and as to Condé, which they now took the Advantage of their Arms to insit upon, it might be presum'd, perhaps, that it was only with an Intention to put the two others out of the question, and to recede from again, as if in Compliment to England (or if not, the Confederates were in no Condition to dispute it); Mr. Barillon had offer'd six Millions of Livres, for a Peace upon French Terms: Mr. Montagu had given Intelligence, that Mr. Barillon's Orders were to make the Market as low as possible: He had besides undertaken to get as much again, as Mr. Barillon offer'd, if the Negotiation was left to him: And the Confederates had desir'd of his Majesty, That, while the necessary Powers were preparing for the Conclusion of the Peace, he would find by some private Means the Humour of the French King, whether it was likely he would abide by those Propositions; as believing it would be some Disadvantage to the common Cause, to make such Concessions on their Side, if they were liable to a Refusal on his.

In drawing in the Confederates to make the Peace their own Demand, we thought we had acted the rein'd Politician; since it afforded us the best Plea imaginable to evade an ungrateful War: And to maintain that Character, nothing now remain'd but to make the French pay us handsomely for the peaceable Possession of those Places, which their own Arms had acquir'd.

Accordingly, the Lord Treasurer (who, in answer to Mr. de Louvois's Proposal to Mr. Montagu, of giving his Lordship Pearls and Diamonds for the very Towns in dispute, had said, (n) That he thought 'twas the same thing, as if it should be made to the King, to have Windsor put into the French King's Hands, and to be should treat it) now play'd the Secretary once more, and enter'd into a private Treaty with France, by the Interposition of Mr. Montagu; in which the Terms extorted

The Intrigues of England, to share in the Spoil with France.

Prints of Orange accept the Peace, on the Terms proposed by England.

(n) This Circumstance is mention'd by Sir William Temple; but he mistakes the Time when it happen'd, placing it in April 1677; when, in truth, it was the latter End of December, 1677.

A. D. 1677-8. extorted from the Confederates by their present clamorous Situation, were loaded with a pecuniary Demand in Behalf of his Majesty: How fitly and justly, has been the Matter of so much Controversy, that it is indispensably necessary to insert his Lordship's Dispatch on this extraordinary Occasion, entire.

London, 25 March 1678. O. S.

My LORD,

Lord Treasurer's Letter to Mr. Montagu.

Since my writing to you by Mr. Brisbane, the Resolutions have been alter'd, as to the sending you Instructions as yet for the proposing any thing to the French King.

The Particulars which will be consented to on the Part of the Confederates (and of which this is a Copy) will be communicated to you by Mr. Secretary Coventry; but you will have no other Direction from him about them, but only thereby to be enabled to find the Pulse of that King (or his Ministers at least) against the time that you shall receive Orders to make the Proposals to him.

That you may know from whence the Nicety of this Affair proceeds, it is necessary to inform you, that, for fear of its being ill-represented by the Parliament here, the King will not make any Proposal at all of Peace, unless he shall be press'd to it by the Confederates: And altho' by Mr. Godolphin he is sufficiently inform'd, that they desire the Peace upon the Terms sent you by the Secretary; yet not having receiv'd that Desire formally, the Council will not advise his Majesty to let his Ambassador propose that which he is not formally empower'd to make good; and so by staying for that formal Power, which by Letter his Majesty is sufficiently authorized to propose, the Time will be lost of effecting the Peace, if at all it can be had. To supply this Defect, therefore, and to prevent the King's sending again into Holland, before he knows the Mind of France, I am commanded by his Majesty to let you know, that you are to make the Propositions enclosed, to the King of France, and to tell him, that the King will undertake for the seeing them made good on the part of Spain and Holland, in case they shall be accepted by him; and, in your Answer, you must write the same thing to the Secretary, by way only of having felt the King's Pulse; which you must do the King, as a full Answer from the King of France; and such a one as the King may depend upon, whatever that shall be. For the more dextrous Management of this Matter, the King is advis'd to shew those Propositions to Mr. Barillon, but not to give him a Copy: So that by the Strength of Memory, it is expected, he shall write to his Master; and by that means only are we to hope for an Answer to a Matter of this vast Importance; and consequently, you may imagine what a Satisfaction we are like to reap from it, when it comes.

I doubt not, but by your Conduct it will be brought to a speedy Issue, which is of us great Importance as the Thing itself; there being no Condition worse for his Majesty, than his standing unresolv'd betwixt Peace and War. I find by Mr. Barillon, that 'tis like some Places, which are Dependencies upon greater Towns, may be demanded by the King of France; but if he intend the Peace (which you will do very well to know his Mind fully in) you may justly say, you hope he will neither stand upon one single Place, tho' a fortify'd one, nor upon any Place unfortify'd, which is a Dependant upon those which are to be restor'd to Spain: And if any thing shall be mention'd about Sicily to remain in the French Hands until the Peace of Sweden were concluded; you are only to say, that you are not empower'd to say any thing upon it, and you are confident the King has done all he could to get the utmost Propositions they would consent to; only you are to say, that the King has again sent about Cadix, not being well satisfy'd, that they have not left it in his Power to give or refuse as he should have found convenient, and hopes still for some good Answer. In case the Conditions of Peace shall be accepted, the King expects to have (p) six Millions of Livres a Year for three Years, from the time that this Agreement shall be sign'd betwixt his Majesty, and the King of France, because it will probably be two or three Years before the Parliament will be in Humour to give him any Supplies after the making of any Peace with France, and the Ambassador here has always agreed to that Sum, but not for so long time. If you find the Peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the Money at all; and all possible Care must be taken to have this whole Negotiation as private as is possible, for fear of giving Offence at home; where, for the most part, we hear in ten Days after of any thing that is communicated to the French Ministers.

I must again repeat to you, That whatever you write upon this Subject to the Secretary (to whom you must not mention a Syllable of the Money) you must say only as a thing you believe they would consent to, if you had Power formally to make those Propositions. Pray inform yourself to the Bottom, of what is to be expected from France, and assure them, That you believe this will be the last time that you shall receive any Propositions of a Peace, if these be rejected (as indeed I believe it will) so that you may take your own Measures, as well as the King's, upon it. I am, &c.

ter, or the greater Security to the Writer, the King added a short Postscript, with his own Hand in these Words: This Letter was writ. by my Order, C. R. And when it became afterwards public, by what Means, will be shewn in its proper Place, and produc'd Consequences very disagreeable to his Lordship, an Explanation of it was made public likewise, in which no Endeavours are spar'd to make it appear not only innocent, but meritorious. It urges that the Subject-matter of the Proposals was not only known to the Secretaries, but approv'd by the rest of the Council; and that the Money-Article was conceal'd from the Secretary in Conformity to Mr. Montagu's own Request before sign'd in one of his Letters to his Majesty: That it was, likewise, at the Influence of the Confederates, that the Pulse of the French King were first to be felt; before the said Proposals were to be made in form: That unless these Proposals, which, contrary to the Character given of them by the Prince of Orange, are in this Piece called advantageous enough to answer for themselves, are accepted, the Money was not to be mentioned at all: And that if his Majesty could have received a good Sum of Money towards the Charges he had been at, without taxing of his People, it ought to be esteem'd good Policy.

No doubt it is better Policy to take than give Money for a bad Treaty; but either it was necessary or not for the Confederates to have an immediate Peace: If the Last, it is reasonable to think the King should have fulfilled the Condition of the Poll-Bill, which was for an actual War with France: If the first, he should not have increas'd the Difficulty of obtaining it, by enslaving the Terms, without the Participation of those who had submitted to vast a Concern to his Management. Besides, while the Feeling of the Pulse of France, which the Confederates recommended to be done both privately and previously to any express and formal Offers, was left to the Secretary's Office, the King by his Ambassador, both unobscurely to his Brother of France, and roundly undertakes to make all good. The Consequence of which was, that the French Court, immediately perceiving the Drift, and satisfy'd, that they could obtain both easier Terms of the Confederates, and reduce the mighty Demand, which they expected from England, by way of Brokerage, drew up a Plan of Peace, in many respects, less favourable to the Confederates, which receiv'd the Fiat of his most Christian Majesty, April 9, N. S. and was solemnly communicated by the whole Corps of French Plenipotentiaries at Nimeguen to Sir Lesline Jenkins, now the sole remaining Mediator, April 4. O. S. not to be debated on, not to receive any Answer to, but a single one, as Sir Lesline expresses it: And with a Limitation that had all the Air of giving the Law; Mr. Colbert, who was the Speaker for them all, declaring, "That the King their Master would expect the Issue till the roth of May, after which he would probably carry on the War with a bigger Force than hitherto had been seen; and particularly, that there would be such an Impression on the Catalonian Side, as would quickly make the Spaniards repent of their having refus'd a Peace on these Terms." And afterwards in an Assembly of mixt Company, "That it was for the greatest Glory, and would be for the greater Advantage of his King, to make this Declaration, and even raise his first Terms and Demands, at a time when the Parliament of England made their Menaces against him."

On the very Day that France acted this haughty and provoking Part at Nimeguen, the Lord Treasurer sent another Dispatch to Mr. Montagu, in which he says, "We are full of Expectation of what the next Letters will bring, as being the last by which our Measures must be taken. In the mean time we are prepar'd to believe they will bring nothing but good Words, and general Terms of Uncertainty; and by their bringing their Men from (g) Sicily, and the ill Usage of our Troops amongst them, we conclude, that at the Bottom, they intend no Peace, or none but such as must leave Flanders in their Power when they please. Our Reason for being thus prepar'd is, because Mr. Barillon did talk such sort of Language to the King last Night, and acknowledged to have a Courier newly arriv'd, in answer to what he had wrote to his Master, which was the Substance of what you had to say to him. If it prove as we expect, I cannot tell whether the War will not be declar'd next Week.

While this Letter was on the Road to Paris, came another from Mr. Montagu to his Lordship, dated April 7, in which are these Words: "I have, at two several times, discours'd with the King of France, the Project of Peace you sent me. I find as to Condé, he reckons upon it as a sure thing; and for Ypres (which was a new Encroachment) he seems to be very positive in not restoring it. I told him, That our Master could not, with any Honour, at home or abroad, consent to any other Peace than the List you sent me contain'd; only promis'd his good Offices, That Condé might remain to him in case he gave him Satisfaction in all other Points. His Answer to me after two Hours Discourse, and shewing me in the Map, how necessary Ypres was to him, was, 'I find we shall never convince one another. I will send such Orders to Barillon about Ypres and other Affairs as, I make no question, will be to the Satisfaction of the King Advantage taken of it by France, to impose their own Terms on the Confederates.

Jenkins's Letters, vol. ii. p. 326, 327, 330.

(g) When England recalled her Troops out of the French Service; and it began to grow probable, that the Violence of the Parliament would force the King into the War; his most Christian Majesty, that he might be the better able to deal with his new Enemies, sent the Marshal de Feuilade into Sicily, as it was then believ'd, upon some new Enterprize; but, in fact, to bring home all his Forces from thence, and abandon both Algeria, and all his Conquests in that Island: Which he did; after he had first declar'd to the Senate, the King's Orders, and the Necessity of them.

'King your Master.' These Words, other Affairs, I believe, was the Money, of which, according to your Lordship's Directions, having not such an Answer to the Peace as I thought would satisfy, I made no Mention at all.

In another Dispatch to the Lord Treasurer, dated the 7th he seem'd confirm'd in his Opinion, that the KING OF FRANCE would rather forego Tpres than suffer England to declare War against him; because his Majesty grew mighty hot and passionate on the Subject, and behav'd more like one that was angry that he was oblig'd to part with a thing, he had a mind to keep, than that he had seriously and positively resolv'd to keep it: He added, "His (the King's) great Argument was, That he was sure, that the Spaniards and Hollanders would be glad of the Peace; nay, that they had offer'd it without Tpres or Cond"; and he ended with me, saying, "I hope the King your Master will not enter into War against me, on the Account of Tpres, and that I shall find him more reasonable than you." The next Day Mr. Churton, and one St. Roman (who are great Confidants of Mr. Louvois) were with me, and told me of all that had pass'd between the King and me, and desir'd me, that I would not exasperate Matters in England, and that if the Lord Treasurer would be quiet, and suffer Mr. Barillon to treat alone, the King of England might be brought off from insisting upon the Restitution of Tpres, and that I should oblige the King here (his most Christian Majesty) particularly to acknowledge my Services herein.

Finding himself thus over-reach'd and trifled with by the Court of France, the King began to shew some Glances of Resentment, which the Lord Treasurer, on one Side, took care to fire, and the French so little to extinguish, on the other, that they caus'd the Copy of their (r) Declaration at Nimeguen to be printed and dispers'd all over Europe, tho' it contain'd many things extremely injurious to his Majesty, and was calculated manifestly to draw him into Suspicion with the whole Confederacy.

In particular, it set out with asserting, that his most Christian Majesty's known Fidelity to his Ally, had induc'd him never to listen to any Proposals of Peace, but such as should give a real and perfect Satisfaction to the King of Sweden; and declaring, That this had been likewise absolutely promis'd him by the King of Great Britain, who was earnest to gain this Point, both for him and the States General.

Again, coming to the Concerns of Spain, it proceeds to say, "That, since the Interest of that Crown seems to be the most confiderable in this War, and both England, Holland, and some Estates bordering upon Flanders have farther express'd their Desire, that that Crown should retain such a Frontier in the Low Countries, as might be able to make that a Bar, which they judge is so very important to their Safety; his Majesty, AT THE INSTANCE OF THE KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, agrees to the means of settling it: And upon this Consideration it is, his Majesty declar'd himself to that Prince, that he had offer'd already, and doth yet offer to restore to Spain the several Places" before mention'd, with the Exception of Valenciennois, Cond and Tpres; and a Proviso that St. Ghislain should be raz'd. An Offer was also made of Charlemont, or Dinant and Bourcuis in lieu thereof: By which means the Spanish Frontier in the Netherlands, would, for the future, begin from the Sea to the Meuse, by Newport, Dismude, Courtray, Oudenarde, Arthys, Mons, Charleroy, and Namur.

And, again, in the last Paragraph, "These are the Terms which may or ought to make the Platform of a general Peace, and upon which his Majesty has long ago declar'd himself to the King of Great Britain. His Majesty desires they may be imparted to the Assembly at Nimeguen; and that his own Plenipotentiaries propose them to the Consideration of the rest, as containing the lowest Conditions he can admit; and upon which his Enemies may make choice either of War or Peace."

All this while, a quadruple Alliance had been forming here, between the Emperor, England, Spain, and Holland; the Negotiation of which had been entrusted to the Lord Treasurer, and Sir W. Temple; and which had either advanced or stood still, as the Cajoleries or Insults of France either provok'd or amuss'd us: Upon the Publication of this Piece, which abounded equally with Insolence and Falshood, we seem'd to have lost all Patience: We sent word to Nimeguen, That we could neither accept, nor so much as countenance the French Conditions: We took up and pursu'd the quadruple Alliance, with more Diligence than ever, and seem'd resolute to bring it to a Conclusion; when Mr. Van Banninghen, the Dutch Ambassador, broke all to pieces, by declaring he had no Powers to conclude, without a previous Application to the States. And this unexpected Accident gave rise to the following free Letter from the Lord Treasurer to the Prince of Orange; which contains more of the Secret of Things, than any other Record of those Times:

London, April (s) 16, 1678.

"We are so surpriz'd here at the Obligations given by the States to the general Treaty

A. D. 1678.

A quadruple Alliance in negotiation.

[Temple's Memoirs.]

But says with the Dutch.

The Lt. Treasurer's Letter to the Prince of Orange therein.

The King display'd with France.

They'd in their Declaration published at Nimeguen.

(r) The Article in this Piece relating to Holland was contain'd in these Words:

"As for the Articles which concern the States General, they are so very favourable, that they cannot but conclude, that his Majesty doth purpose to receive them into the former Friendship, after the Peace shall be concluded. His Majesty is willing to restore them Majrichte, and to agree to the Treaty of Commerce, in such Form as it was fram'd at Nimeguen with the States General."

(s) At the same time, his Lordship sent the following Letter to Mr. Hyle:

"My Lord,
Besides that my Time would not allow me to say much, I am sure it is not necessary, since you will have to good an Informer

A. D. 1675. Treaty of Alliance betwixt us, the Emperor, Spain, and them, that it has put Things amongst us into greater Uncertainties than ever: And that which amazeth most is, to find them stop, upon the (1) binding all Traffic with France, when Monsieur Van Beuninghen has insisted so long to gain it here, and, as he said, by the States Order, to assure the King of their entering into the same Obligations; but pretends now not to have the same Power, when there is most need of it. We are not able to understand the Meaning of this, at a time when my Master is so ready to go into the utmost Alliances against France, which any of the Confederates will come up to; and to declare the War, whenever these Treaties can be perfected: But if it should proceed out of an overearnest Desire of a (u) Peace (which is said here to be the Cause) I am sure it is the worst Way which can be taken to have one.

In short, I can assure your Highness, that the Fault will not be on our Part, if the War against France be not pursued to the utmost: And there hath nothing hindered it hitherto, nor will yet, so much as the suffering ourselves to be still deluded by France, with daily Expectations of a Peace: And if that Expectation could be driven out of the People's Heads in your Country, it would quickly be taken out of ours by the Effects, which would soon follow. We have received in Print the Propositions of a Peace made by the French at Nimwegen, which I am glad of, both for the Illness of them, which I hope can be liked by nobody, and for the Falseness of that Part which concerns my Master about Sweden, and which hath so exasperated him, that he is resolved to let the World know the Falseness of it. Mr. Godolphin will acquaint your Highness at large, what Resolutions are taken here with the Ministers of the Emperor and Spain, in case the States will not come up to what we all desire jointly, and which ought to be a Secret, as well to your Highness as the States, but that we are to well assure of your Highness's being of our Mind, and not theirs, in the Matter of supporting the War;

And therefore, in my Opinion, one principal thing to be done by your Highness (who hath so absolute Power upon the Pensioner) is to get the Peace out of his Head, so as to make him employ his time in the States to encourage them to the War, and to let them see that it can be by War only, that a tolerable Peace can be hoped for. The want of Monsieur Van Beuninghen being sufficiently impower'd, has occasion'd an (v) Adjournment of the Parliament to the 20th Instant; and above all, I must confess, that I lament the Condition both of my Master and yourself, who have more Difficulty to save your Friends at home, than you would have to beat your Enemies, if our Parliament and your States would do what they ought, for the Preservation both of themselves and the rest of Christendom: Whereas I do from my Soul, believe they contribute more to the Service of the French King, and to his Successor, than the best Army he has could do. As it is, the best I can hope will depend upon a clear and good Answer from Holland, as to their Conjunction in this Quadruple League, and I doubt not but your Highness will put your utmost Help to it, as I shall ever, to them myself, &c.

As War was the Prince's Element, both this Dispatch and Mr. Godolphin, the Bearer of it, were extremely welcome to him. The States, were then sitting, with Thoughts and Views wholly pacific; and so little Credit had the Propositions of England with them, that enforc'd and recommended by his Highness, that the utmost he could obtain of them, was to procure the sending over Mr. Van Leeuwen to be himself convinc'd of the Dispositions of the English Court, and to delay their final Resolution, till they should receive the necessary Confirmations from him. That this Expedient, however, might be the more certain of Success, the Prince himself took upon him to advise, tho' under all the Guards of Secrecy imaginable, how he should be receiv'd, and answer'd, that is to say, roundly, as to his Errands, and very civilly as to his Person: Mr. Hyde, in his Dispatch of May the 30, N.S. by his Highness's Direction, adding,

His Highness received Mr. Van Leeuwen to his seat in England, and by post his Reception there.

Informers of all things by Mr. Godolphin (who was entrusted with the Secret, as well as the Prince and Lord Treasurer). I will therefore only give, that, according to the Instructions you will receive by him, you will make the Postulate, and all the foreign Ministers in that Place, as feasible as our Master is, of the Inconvenience and Disadvantage of what the French have said of his conspiring the Treaty, and the Grounds for the States in their behalf; and that you will endeavor to put all Thoughts of Peace out of their Heads, and especially the Princes; it being no longer to be look'd for by them, till the French Legislature be a little calm'd by a War. I will trouble you with no more but an Assurance of my being, &c.

(1) Mr. Van Beuninghen acknowledged to Sir Leslie Jenkins at Nimwegen, that nothing could be more salutary, than an absolute Prohibition of all Trade with France; but that, in their Country, it would never take effect.

(2) In a Letter from Sir Leslie Jenkins, at Nimwegen, dated April 22, to Mr. Secretary William, we find the following remarkable Passage:

Mr. Bevering came hither to Nimwegen from the Hague Fifth Night; and this Morning, he and his Colleague gave me a Visit: He told me, he was sent away by his Masters in such Manner, that he could not speak with the Prince, when he knew so to expedite them every Moment: That there whole Country is in such Impatience for a Peace as the French Declaration, that is now printing in several Places and Languages, having had that Effect upon them (especially in Holland) that they are too pers'd on to take on you doing you la Paix (all possess'd with a Zeal) functioning extravagance for the Peace; there being not, he said, a Boat or a Wagon stirring any where in those Countries, but their Print is in English Heads, and made the Subject matter of their Resolutions and Discourses; and every body concluding, that it matters not to them of this Country, that Spain have two or three Towns the less, if they may have their own (that is Melrike) restor'd to them, and their Trade to revive and flourish again: This, he said, is the ordinary Discourse of the Country-people; and not only so, but of their great Towns, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Leyden.

He told me plainly enough, that, if they could have a Peace upon any tolerable Terms, they would prefer it to any War: He acknowledg'd his Majesty's joining with them would be a most considerable Accession; but yet it would bring no Alliance with it, that their Success would be any better than it had been. Besides, that they shall want the only Mediator capable to set the World in Repose again.

(3) This must be understood of the last Adjournment; for the first was made at the Desire of the House (who were resolv'd to see the King farther embark'd in the War, before they would proceed farther with the Supply) figur'd by an Address to his Majesty, March 26, and held but for a fortnight; whereas this last did not expire till the 29th of April.

ding, "That if his Majesty would be pleas'd to let the Parliament be acquainted with these Proceedings of the States, and their un-governable Inclinations to a Peace: That when his Majesty expected from them Instructions to conclude a Treaty of Alliance, instead of that, they sent an Envoy to desire a Peace upon such ruinous and insupportable Conditions; and that his Majesty would be pleas'd to allow the Parliament to make some Declaration of their disapproving such a Conduct, and a Contempt of their Safeties and Means to accept of such Terms: It would be of great use to the setting them again in their Wits.

I have no more to say of the Information, but as to the Informer, that he made me promise him very solemnly I would not name him: That besides that, if he were discovered, it would cost him all; it would render the Service the Prince expects from this Van Leeuwen's Journey (as a Man in whom the contrary Party to his Highness have entire Credit) wholly ineffectual, if it should come to be known, that the Answer the King gives proceeds from any Intelligence here; and to that End, he desired me not to write it in a Letter that was to be produced to any other Person. He wished, that his Majesty might have the Information of it for the Direction of his Judgment: That he may reasonably expect a perfect Compliance from this Country, if he pleas'd to declare he would not accept such a Peace.

When Mr. Van Leeuwen arriv'd in England, Sir William Temple was sent, for Form's sake, to know his Errand; and, upon that Occasion, was freely told by him, That it was the most against their Hearts, in Holland, that could be, to make a Peace upon Terms so low and unsafe for Flanders; and that if the King had gone into the War, as was promis'd, if France should either refuse, or delay to accept, his Scheme; they would certainly have continued it: But that his Majesty's Proceedings had look'd, ever since, to uncertain, or unresolv'd, that it had rais'd Jealousies in Holland, of our Measures being, at bottom, fix'd and concerted with France; which made most of the Towns in Holland think they had nothing else left to do, but to close with them too, as fast as possible: And the Approach of the French left them no time to deliberate. Yet he profess'd, in Confidence, that if the King would immediately declare War, he believ'd the States would still go on with it, in pursuit of their Alliance, and the Terms therein contain'd.

In this Interval, viz. April 29, the Parliament was to meet; and, on the 20th before, the Lord Treasurer assur'd Sir William Temple, that the King's Resolution was fix'd to go into the War; and desir'd him to make a Draught of what was proper to be said upon the Occasion: And no doubt, if ever his Majesty was in earnest provok'd against France, it was now; when they had not only hely'd him in their Declaration, over all Europe, but triald with him in his Money-Treaty: We are, therefore, to give so much the more Attention to the Scope of the Lord Chancellor's Speech to both Houses, at their re-assembling; which is very imperfectly touch'd upon by Mr. Echard, and totally suppress'd by Rapin, and every other (as) Historian. His Lordship set out with reminding them of the King's offensive and defensive League with Holland: Signify'd, that his Majesty had endeavour'd to improve that League, by entering into farther and more general Alliances, for the Prosecution of the War; but that he had nevertheless thought fit, before he made his last Step, to take farther Advice of BOTH his Houses of Parliament; and that he resolv'd to govern himself by it.

His Lordship then undertook to give a brief Deduction of Affairs, from March 16, 1676, to shew, 1. That the Address of the Commons did not recommend immediate War, but Alliances, in particular with Holland, by way of Preparation for a War. 2. That the said particular Treaty could be no otherwise set on foot, than with the Prince of Orange, who was in to great a Hurry of Business, and such a Heat of Action, that no Time could be found to enter with him upon that Treaty. 3. That his Majesty, to lose no Time, had laid out all the 200,000  $\text{L}$ . he was enabled to borrow, in military Preparations; and that if he had been furnish'd with the 600,000  $\text{L}$ . he demanded, he should, likewise, have laid it out, by that time, in Land and Sea-Stores and Provisions, to universal Satisfaction. 4. That, when the Prince himself arriv'd here, it appearing the States still continued violent for a Peace, which they had apply'd to him to procure for them, in January, May, and September last; and that, consequently, his Majesty's Endeavours (for that End) would be grateful to them; he took that Opportunity to engage the said States, that, in case of Refusal, they should co-operate with him to carry his Point by force of Arms; his Majesty well perceiving, that, being then weary of the War, they would enter into no Alliance with him, without a Prospect of Peace. 5. That, in the time of their most pressing Dangers, his Majesty had given his Neice to the Prince of Orange, as a Pledge of his Attachment to their Interest; and which was alone enough to extinguish the Fears of all at home, and raise the Hopes of all abroad. 6. That, to the end it might be known, whether the most Christian King would consent to such Conditions of Peace, as would be grateful to the States; the Earl of Feverisham was sent to Paris; but return'd with an Answer very dissatisfactory. 7. That, hereupon, his Majesty happen'd the Meeting of Parliament; and concluded the League offensive and defensive with Holland; which he was graciously inclin'd to communicate to Parliament, if they should desire to see it.

8. That

Lord Chancellor's Speech. [Lord Sommers's Collection, vol. 1. M. 8.]

Mr. Van Leeuwen's Conference with Sir W. Temple. [Temp. Memoirs.]

(a) It is remarkable, that even Mr. North, when correcting the Omission of Bishop Kennis, either overlook'd it, or had no Intelligence of this remarkable Speech.

8. That he had, moreover, concluded a perpetual defensive Alliance with the States.
 9. That, in pursuit of the first of these Leagues, he had call'd upon the States to adjust the several Quotas by Sea and Land, which the several Parties were to furnish: That he had communicated his own: That he had sent some Forces into Flanders already; and would have sent more, if some Difficulties had not been made, on that side, (relating to Offend) which, for Friendship's sake, he did not think fit to communicate.
 10. That the next thing absolutely necessary to be done was, to form one common Alliance for all Parties to enter into, for the making the necessary Dispositions for carrying on the War, for establishing a general Prohibition of Commerce, and providing against all Possibility of a separate Peace.
 11. That to this End, his Majesty had appointed Commissioners, on his Part, to treat with the Ministers of the respective Powers; but when it came to the Issue, it appear'd the Dutch had no Power to treat (conclude; his Majesty should have said.)
 12. That when, upon his Majesty's own earnest Instances, Powers did come, they were unaccompani'd with Instructions.
 13. That his Majesty now found what he had always fear'd, that the Dutch were making haste to get out of the War, and were so far from being dispos'd to enter into any new Alliance for the more vigorous Prosecution of it, that whether they would persevere in that they had already made, depended on very many, and very great Uncertainties.
 14. That at that very time, they gave ear to such a Treaty as the miss Christian King thought fit to offer (at Nimwegen as beforementi'd) tho' without his Majesty's Consent or Privy, and (s) contrary to that League, by which they stand oblig'd to him to prosecute the War till a much better Peace could be obtain'd.
 15. That his Majesty had sent to desire an Explanation of this manner of Proceeding, and to dissuade them from it, by letting them see, that this would be as ill a Peace for them and the rest of Christendom, as their Enemies could wish.
 16. That as yet he had received no Answer but Complaints of their great Poverty and utter Inability to carry on the War, and that he was told by their Ambassador that they intended to send over an Envoy Extraordinary, to beg his Majesty to accept of the Propositions, and to excuse themselves on the general Impatience for a Peace.

 17. That this was the State of the Case between us and Holland; so that there was little Reason to hope that the States would so far enter into the common Alliance, as to make it quadruplicate: And, 18. Upon the whole Matter, his Lordship ended as he began, with his Majesty's Demand of their Advice, as to what would be fitting for him to do in that difficult Conjunction.

On a Recollection of the Matters already treated of, we cannot avoid being sensible, that this Speech is not altogether so ingenious as it seems to be: But the Commons, it is reasonable to think, had not the Advantage of all the Evidence that Time has since brought to light: And if they had, there was so much of what was right in it, the Crisis was in truth so delicate, the public Necessities so urgent, and the Appeal so fully, fairly, and so precisely made, that it deserv'd a much more candid Reception than it met with. They did, indeed, on their Return to their House, order such of their Members as were of the Privy Council to apply to his Majesty for all such Leagues and Speeches as were mention'd in this Speech; but they resum'd, the same Day, the Consideration of the State of the Kingdom, with regard to Popery, and receiv'd and approv'd certain (y) Reasons to be us'd in a Conference with the Lords, to induce them to co-operate in seeking a Remedy against this growing Evil, which ended with these remarkable Words:

And that this may be done with all Expedition, because the Commons cannot think it just to their Trust for them to consent to lay any further Charge upon the People, how URGENT SOEVER THE OCCASIONS MAY BE THAT REQUIRE IT, till their Minds be fully d that all Care and Diligence is us'd to secure the Kingdom and prevent the Dangers that may rise from the Prevalence and Countenance that is given to that Party, by some more effectual Course than hath been provided.

Sir William Temple charges Sir Thomas Clarges with having been the Author of this perverse Vote, as he calls it, in Sploen, the Lord Treasurer. Sir William adds: "This left all so loote, and so lame, that the King was in a Rage, reproach'd me with my popular Notions, as he term'd them, and ask'd me

The League with Holland called for. The Affair of Popery resumed.

(x) Mr. Beveridge, in the mean while declar'd to Sir Lucius Wolsey at Wimborgh, that the States expected nothing from England's for by Treaty, they were oblig'd to come to a Report; and yet they did not.

(y) i. The Difficulty of conceiving a Remedy Prick, by proving their Obedience by Authority derived from the See of Rome; which makes them more confident to appear in public, and perform their Offices and Functions, without Fear of Punishment.

2. That Justice of the Peace are discouraged, because several of those that have been forward in executing the Laws against Popery, in such Counties where they do most abound, have been turn'd out of Commission, without any apparent Cause; while others, who have been popishly inclin'd, have been continu'd in Commission, or put in de novo.

3. That, in several Counties, many Protestant Dissenters have been indicted under the Notion of Popish Recusants; and the Penalties of the Laws lay'd upon such Protestant Dissenters, when the Popish there have been either totally, or for the most part, discount.

4. That the Popish do evade the Penalties of the Laws, by making over their Estates by secret Trusts and fraudulent Conveyances, yet receiving the Profit of them to their own Use and Benefit; whereas, in former Times, considerable Sums of Money were raised by the Forfeitures of Popish Recusants: That now, by the Remissions of some, and Discommissions of others, of his Majesty's Officers and Ministers of Justice, little or nothing is lev'y'd upon them, or likely to be lev'y'd hereafter; unless the Care thereof be committed to Persons commission'd in the several Counties; and the Money arising thereof apply'd to some public Use, for the Advancement of the Protestant Religion, which may recompens'd Persons so far from.

5. That Persons are not discouraged to bring up their Children, or suffer them to be bred up in the Popish Religion; because they are as capable of inheriting the Estates of their Parents or Relations, as any other of his Majesty's Subjects.

me when or how I thought he could trust the House of Commons to carry him through the War if he should engage in it? And I had not much, indeed, to say, considering the Temper and Factions of the House; nor could I well clear it to myself, by my Observation, whether the King was firmly resolv'd to enter into the War; or if he did, whether the House of Commons would have supported him in it, or turn it only to ruin the Ministers by the King's Necessities. 'Tis certain, no Vote could ever have pass'd more unhappily, or in such a Counter Season. And again a little below: "In short there was such a fatal and mutual Distrust both in the Court and Parliament, as it was very hard to fall into any sound Measures between them."

The same Day that this Affair of Popery was thus mischievously resum'd, the House likewise order'd an Application to be made to his Majesty for the original Proposals, Dispatches and Instructions sent over into France by the Lord Feverham, and the Answer of the French King thereto; but received for Answer the next Day, That the said Proposals were, verbatim, the same contain'd in the Treaties offensive and defensive, and that the Answer of the French King was verbal, viz. That he did not think them reasonable; and that if he should accept them, he knew not how to answer it to his People.

The Treaties with Holland, were, however, communicated on the very Day they were demanded; but instead of giving Satisfaction, they gave such Offence to the House, that on the 2th of May they came to the two following Resolutions, which were by Order of the House presented to his Majesty, with a sort of Apology for their not being drawn up in the usual Form of an Address.

Resolved, That the League offensive and defensive with the States General of the United Provinces, with the Articles relating thereto, are not pursuant to the Address of this House, nor consistent with the Good and Safety of the Kingdom.

Resolved, That it is the Opinion of this House, That his Majesty be humbly advised and desired, forthwith to enter into the present Alliances and Confederations with the Emperor and the King of Spain, and the States General of the United Provinces, for the vigorous carrying on of the present War against the French King, and for the Good and Safety of his Majesty's Kingdoms. And particularly, That effectual Endeavours be used for continuing the States General in the present Confederation. And that it be agreed by all the Parties confederate, to prohibit all Trade between their Subjects and Countries, and France, and all other the Dominions of the French King, and that no Commodities of France, or any of the Dominions of the French King, be imported into their Country, from any Place whatsoever. And also, that all Endeavours be used to invite all other Princes and States into the said Confederation. And that no Truce or Peace be made or agreed to with the French King by his Majesty or any of the Confederates, without general Consent first had therein.

His Majesty, on the other Hand, complain'd both of the Matter and Form of these Votes; and urg'd (by Message) That if they had been no otherwise exceptionable, as he had ask'd the Advice of both Houses, he should give no answer to any thing of that Nature from one only.

The Cry was now rais'd against evil Counsellors; and an Address was, in particular, call'd for against those who advis'd the Answer his Majesty was induc'd to give to the Address of May 26, and January 31; and carry'd in the Affirmative; Year 152, No's 159. And the Duke of Lauderdale being expressly nam'd, it was resolv'd by a Majority of forty-five, to address his Majesty to remove him from his Council and Pretence. The next Day, May 8, the first of these Addresses was read for the first time by Sir Thomas Clarges, and occasion'd to much Debate, that the House adjourn'd, without coming to any Decision. May 10, (2) it was read a second time by Mr. Pease; and a Question being stated whether they should proceed upon it, it was carry'd in the Affirmative but by two Voices; No's 174, Year 176. There were three other Divisions on particular Parts of the Address; and Motion to adjourn; and in all of them, the two Parties continued to near an Equality, that kept the highest Difference.

The Address itself consist'd of three Parts. The first of which contain'd a Justification of the Matter and Manner of their Votes, as also their humble Request, that his Majesty would communicate to them the Resolutions he had taken thereupon. The second ascrib'd all the present Inconveniences and Dangers of the Kingdom, to the Non-acceptance of the Notice contain'd in the two Addresses above specify'd; and also ascrib'd the said Non-acceptance to the Misrepresentation of their Proceedings, by some particular Persons, in a clandestine Way, without the Participation and Advice, as they conceiv'd, of the Council Board; as if they had trespass'd on the Prerogative; whereas they only offer'd Advice, which was a Right never question'd by the Crown before, and without which the Crown could never be safe: Urg'd that this rejecting their Advice, had infinitely discourag'd his Majesty's good Subjects, and reduc'd his Affairs to a most deplorable Condition: And humbly desired that for the Good and Safety of the Kingdom, and the Satisfaction of his Subjects, his Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to remove the Advisers of those Answers, &c. The third humbly desir'd his Majesty favourably to accept their humble Petition and Address, as proceeding from Hearts full of Affection and Loyalty;

(a) Sir John Royle's Cry, "That the same Day, it was carry'd, tho' but by one Voice, in a full House: That the King's Message, lastly sent them, to consider of some Measure for Supply to his Majesty, for paying off his Fleet, should not be observ'd."

Loyalty; and assur'd him, that they would never be wanting to support his Majesty's Greatness and Interest, while he rely'd on their Councils; which however misrepresented, had no other Tendency than to advance both. And to all this they tack'd their Vote against the Duke of Lauderdale.

The next Day, after an Intimation from his Majesty, that he would receive their Address in the Afternoon, Mr. Secretary Williamson added by Command, That the King expected they would dispatch the Supply, or he should be oblig'd to lay up several of the great Ships already provided, and disband many of the Forces newly rais'd. But this had no Effect: They were more dispos'd to reduce the King, than to reduce France; and like able Politicians, at least, if not good Patriots, resolv'd to make his Majesty pay their own Price for the Supply, before they would part with it.

But the King was as positive as the House; and, on receiving their Address, signify'd, (a) That their Address was so extravagant, that he was not willing speedily to give it the Answer it deserv'd.

This warm Language serv'd rather to incense than intimidate: The Party-Leaders knew their own Strength, and the King's Weakness; and resolv'd rather to break than bend: Accordingly, their Debates ran higher than ever. And that Ways and Means might be found to divert the Torrent he could not item, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and express'd himself as follows:

Meaning speech to the Peers only, and touching the Parliament.

"My LORDS,
I have receiv'd an Address from the House of Commons, of so extraordinary a Nature, that I cannot but be highly offended at it; and therefore I have resolv'd to prorogue them for a few Days, that they may consider of it, that they may behave themselves hereafter more respectfully. I have lived long enough to be sensible of the Consequences of such Addresses; and I assure your Lordships, I am very well satisfy'd with the dutiful and respectful Carriage of this House towards me; and hope, by the next Meeting, you will have consider'd what Advice to give me in this present Juncture of Affairs."

After which, the Commons being called, his Majesty prorogued the Parliament till the 23d Instant.

Nor was the Prorogation the only Effect of this Ferment in the House of Commons: The King's Indignation against them got the better of his Indignation against France: Instead of exposing their Fissures, &c. according to the Lord Treasurer's Declaration to the Prince of Orange, he fell again into a Money-Treaty with them; saying, facetiously, to excuse it, "That since the Dutch would have a Peace upon French Terms, and France offer'd Money for his Consent to what he could not help, he did not know why he should not get the Money." The Negotiation, however, was not suffer'd to pass thro' Mr. Montagu's Hands, who had been so ambitious of that Honour; but was, by the King himself, directed into those of Sir William Temple; whom his Majesty required to treat upon it with the French Ambassador, who had Orders to that Purpose. Sir William would have excus'd himself; but the King would not admit it; saying, he could not help seeing him; for that he would be with him, at his House, by Seven next Morning. He accordingly came: But Sir William told him (as he says himself) very truly, that he had been ill in the Night, and could not enter into Business. The Ambassador, tho' much disappointed, pursued his Point notwithstanding; and Sir William, on the other hand, urg'd his Indisposition, with such a resolute Perseverance, that his Excellency took his Leave, without opening his Commission.

Sir William Temple refused to be concern'd in it.

Sir William thought, that when the Service was unjustifiable, Obedience was criminal. More like an honest Man, therefore, than a ductile Courtier, he immediately made his Retreat to his Country-house at Shrew; from whence he dispatch'd his Lady with a Letter to the Lord (b) Treasurer, complaining of his being put upon such a Treaty with the French Ambassador, that did not belong to his Post; and which, they knew, he thought dishonourable to the King; and offering Offers to resign his Embassy at Nimwegen; and a Promise he had receiv'd of being Secretary of State: But his Lordship would not suffer his Administration to be blasted with so untoward an Incident; as well knowing, that when a Man of try'd Integrity voluntarily turns his back on Preferment, it proclaims to the whole World, that the Tenure was infamous: His Answer, therefore, was, "That the King forced no Man upon what he had no mind to: But if Sir William resolv'd, this should be said to his Majesty, he left him either to do it himself, or to chuse some other Channel; for he would not make his Court for him, in a Way so unsuitable to the Times.

But whatever a King's Purposes are, he will never want Agents to put them in execution. What disgust'd Sir William's Delicacy, others greedily gap'd after: The Treaty therefore went on, tho' he refus'd to be the Agent: But when the Terms came to be settled, the French, it seems, propounded one Article, as the Basis of all the rest, which expos'd his Majesty, that he said, he would never forget it as long as he liv'd. Sir William Temple affirms, he had this from a good Hand; without explaining what the offensive Article was: But the Editor of his Works, Dr. Swift, has supply'd this Defect; namely, that

(a) This Answer is not enter'd in the Journal of the House; but I find it in Sir Thomas Walker's Collection, in certain Extracts of that Session, which are taken with great Fidelity; and it is also confirm'd by Sir John Rush, in his Memors, p. 62.

(b) It ought to be observ'd, that there is not a Syllable, in the Volume of Letters publish'd by his Lordship, relative to this Affair.

that France, in order to break the Force of the Confederacy, and elude all just Conditions of a general Peace, resolv'd by any means to enter into separate Measures with Holland; to which End it was absolutely necessary to engage the good Offices of the King of England; who was look'd upon as the Master of the Peace, whenever he pleas'd. The Bargain was struck for either three or four hundred thousand Pounds: But when all was agreed, Monsieur Barillon, the French Embassador, told the King, that he had Orders from his Master, before Payment, to add a private Article, by which his Majesty should be engaged, Never to keep above eight thousand Men of standing Troops in his three Kingdoms. This unexpected Proposal put the King in a Rage, and made him say, Cod'ziffl! does my Brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his Promises to make me absolute Master of my— (People) come to this? Or does he think That a thing to be done with eight thousand Men?

The King again displeas'd with France.

Articles of Peace in copy sent to the Dutch.

Jenkins's Letters, vol. II. p. 350.

In this Interval, France took all imaginable Advantages of the violent Propensity of Holland to rush into a Peace; and not content with the favourable Mention of the Dutch Concerns, in their public Declaration, their Embassadors at Nimegue, were inform'd in their private Dispatches, "That the King (of France) was better dispos'd to the Hollanders than ever: That he would further their Commerce, not only by diminishing one half of the Impositions upon it; but that he would give their Merchants full Satisfaction for past Abuses: That he acknowledg'd their Zeal for the Peace; which he had himself so much at heart, that, for the sake of it, he had dismember'd his Crown of so many Places, which his Enemies were not able to wrest out of his Hands."

And the States, as well as the People, were so captivated with these cordial Expressions on one hand, as well as surrounded with so many Difficulties on the other, that, on the very Day the King prorog'd the Parliament, Mr. Beverning acquainted Sir Leonine Jenkins, that he had the Night before receiv'd Orders from his Masters, to propose to the Ministers at the Congress a (c) Cessation of Arms with France, to press them to it; and, in case they should refuse, to enter his Protestation against them, for all the Damages and ill Consequences that might befall the Alliance. He said, his Masters were in despair; and that those who had assist'd the Prince of Orange to keep things in a kind of Balance, hitherto, now knew not which way to turn themselves: For, first, they found, upon Examination of things, that Spain had not above 2500 Horse and Dragons, and 5000 Foot in all the Lowe Countries; and of the Foot, one half were Boys. 2. That the Dutch were not able, unless they disarm'd their Garrisons, to take above 16,000 Men into the Field; which was the very utmost they could do. 3. Not one Man of the Allies would march: The Prince of Orange had sent Orders for 3000 Lunenburgers, and others, to join his Army: Their Answer was, (d) They would not stir, till they had receiv'd their PAY: And the Duke de Villa Hermosa, being press'd by the Dutch Ministers at Brussels to pay them, as he stood engag'd to do, said, He had not a Penny of Money to do it with. 4. The English Letters of the 7th gave them no Hopes of any effectual Relief from thence; nothing being to be expected from the Parliament till they had obtain'd Satisfaction touching the Papists. 5. That the French King with an Army of 45000 effective Men was in the Heart of Flanders; and whether he undertook any thing on the Sea Coast to cut off all Possibility of Succours from England, or whether he attack'd Antwerp and Brussels, he could carry all before him; those of Antwerp declaring, they would open their Gates to receive him: All the Spaniards in the Country being too few to defend the Citadel.

The Dutch Minister in England had also Orders to lay this Question before his Majesty, and even to intreat his good Offices for a Cessation: And it may be presum'd it [Temple's Answer.] was upon this Occasion that Mr. Van Leeuwen began to discourse boldly (as Sir William Temple expresses it) of the Necessity his Masters found to make the Peace as they could, since there was no relying upon any Measures with England for carrying on the War; and the Season was too far advanced to admit any longer Delays: And certain it is, that the very Day after the King directed Sir William Temple to treat with Mr. Barillon (e), his Majesty gave his Consent that the States should depart Mr. Beverning to Ghent, where the most Christian King then was, not only to solicit the Cessation, but to take their own Measures to procure a Peace.

Which is demanded, with the Consent of England. Jenkins's Letters, vol. II. p. 359-363.

There is reason to think that all this was a (f) Secret to the Prince of Orange; for on the Arrival of a Trumpeter from his most Christian Majesty with a Letter (dated May 18, N. S.) to the States, inviting them to send their Deputies to him at Ghent, and a Resolution taken by their Lordships, for Form's sake to communicate it to the Ministers of their Allies at the Hague, his Highness sent private Intelligence of their Design to Mr. Hyde

(c) Mr. North, who affects to write critically on these Points, has the following amazing Paragraph:

"It must be noted, that all or most of the Brigues I am about to name happen'd pending the Treaty of Nimegue: Much of which Time was employ'd, in Cessation; when all Parties, instead of fighting, fell to bargaining." Essex, p. 470.

(d) When the parliamentary Influence of Alliances ran high, supposed to be made with the Emperor and the Princes of Germany, the King, who knew their Poverty, was heard to say, viz. "The Gentlemen of the House of Commons would have me league with the German Princes: But they "do not know what an immense Charge I should bring upon them, if I did." Essex, p. 477.

(e) Who was, at first so stuck'd with the Commission, which he thought both destructive to his Country, and dishonourable to himself; that he declared to Sir Leonine Jenkins, that he would rather lose his Head, than undertake it.

(f) Mr. Montague, in his Dispatch of May 7, insinuates, that his most Christian Majesty was fure of having such a Peace from the Dutch as he desired: which had been managed under-hand, by great Prelims: to which as were not Well-wishers to the Prince of Orange.

A. D. 1678. Hyde and possibly to all the rest, advising him, by way of Answer, "To put them in mind of their Promises and Obligations to the King his Majesty; and press them in his Majesty's Name, to make good their Alliance with him." And for want of better Information, his Excellency thought fit to comply with it; with what Effect will be immediately explain'd.

Resolution of the States relating to a Peace.

The States took (g) four Days to deliberate, and on the 11th, by a Trumpeter of their own, gave his Majesty to understand that they had instructed Mr. Beverning to wait upon him with fresh Assurances, &c. of their sincere Inclination for Peace. Mr. Beverning receiv'd his Orders soon after, and set out the 22 from Nimeguen: And on the Whit-Sunday following the States came to the following Resolution: "That they, having contributed all that lay in their Power to the common Cause, were now so exhausted, that they could do no more: That seeing the Danger the Spanish Netherlands were in of being altogether lost, seeing the most Christian King, with his Army, was now in the midst of them (in the Pays de Waes) that little or no Help was to be expected from other Parts, that their own Forces were too weak to make head against him: And lastly, seeing the Uncertainty of the Conduct of England, they, the States, did look upon a Peace as the only Means to save that Country: That they could most heartily wish, that they were able to procure it upon Conditions more advantageous for their High Allies: That they had done their utmost to that End; but that God not having blessed their Endeavours, and the Danger increasing and approaching every Day, their last Resort was to pray their said Allies rather to give way to the hard Conditions prescribed by France, than continue a War, like to be more and more destructive: That they desir'd to know of the Ministers of their said Allies, wherein they could contribute to the Satisfaction of their Masters, which they would undertake with the greatest Cordiality and Affection; and that they should be greatly concern'd, that a Peace should be concluded otherwise than with the common Consent: And that they hop'd the said Ministers would do them the Justice to consider, that, in Circumstances so desperate, wherein the States see themselves abandon'd on all Sides, they could do no less than seek the Preservation of the Republic from immediate Ruin, by the only way that was left to obtain it.

Engagement of the States.

This Resolution was communicated by Mr. Van Haren, the Dutch Plenipotentiary, to Sir Leoline Jenkins at Nimeguen, May 21, who forwarded it immediately, by Express, to England; and two Days after the Parliament was to meet, according to Prorogation:

Upon which Occasion, his Majesty address'd himself again to the House of Commons, as well as the Lords; but enlarg'd on his Wants and Requisitions in a Sile and Manner which could not but alarm all that heard him. The first, in particular, he call'd upon to consider, in cold Blood, whether they had, at their last sitting, made him a Return suitable to the End he propos'd by asking their Advice, which was the saving of Flanders: Said, that Conjunctions abroad, and our Distempers which had so much inflam'd them, had driven things violently into a Peace: That where they would end he could not tell: That he was resolv'd, as far as he was able, to save Flanders either by a War or a Peace, as Circumstances from abroad should direct: That for his Part he thought the being arm'd was as necessary to make Peace as War, and that either way both his Army and Navy should for some time be kept up; but as that depended on the Supplies, left it to his Parliament to consider whether to provide for their Continuance or Disbanding; in either Case signifying, that they ought not to discourage so many worthy and gallant Gentlemen who had offered their Lives and Services to their Country in pursuit of their Resolutions: Said, he must put them in mind that a Branch of his Revenue was near expiring, that another Part was cut off by the Poll-Bill; and that 200,000*l.* was necessary to indemnify him for what he had taken up on the Credit of the Excise. On these Points he required their Resolutions should be speedy, because the present Necessity requir'd it; adding, as if by way of Equivalent, That he would consent to any reasonable Bills that should be offer'd to him for the Good and Safety of the Nation. His Majesty then address'd himself to both Houses; assur'd them, That whatsoever some ill Men would have believ'd, he never had any Intentions, but of Good to them and his People; and further declar'd, he would do all he could for their Ease and Safety as far as they themselves would suffer him: Desir'd, that since these were his Resolutions, they would not drive him to Extremities, which must end ill both for them and him, and (which was worst of all) for the NATION, which they ought all to have equal care of: Desir'd again, therefore, that they would prevent any Disorders or Michiefs that might befall them (the Nation) thro' their Disagreement: And in case such Michiefs or Disorders should happen, left it to GOD ALMIGHTY to judge between them, who was the Cause; and concluded with a firm Assertion, That he would never more suffer the Course and Method of passing Laws to be chang'd; and that if several Matters should ever again be tack'd together in one Bill, that Bill should certainly be lost, let the Importance of it be never so great.

There

(g) The Doubt lay, whether to send their Answer by Deputies, or simply, by Letter; and the last Method was resolv'd on, even the Prince himself was almost inclin'd to keep in the Field; saying, in Confidence, to Mr. Hyde, "I was the Distractor and Division in England, which increased every Day, did, most of all, discourage him from struggling any longer against the Inclinations of the whole Country to a Peace." Lord Danby's Letters, p. 361.

The Lord
Chancellor's Harangue.

There is an equal Mixture of Honey and Gall in this Speech, and the first bid fair to qualify the last: But unfortunately it was then held necessary for the Lord Chancellor to enlarge on the same or the like Topics; if not for the better Information of Parliament, at least to palliate Matters to the People. Accordingly his Lordship set out with propounding the three following Heads. 1. The present State of Christendom, in Reference to a general Peace. 2. The Influence that Peace was like to have upon us. 3. The Necessity of returning to some better kind of Intelligence amongst ourselves, than appear'd at the late Prorogation.

Concerning the Peace, his Lordship said, That, however it had been hasten'd by some late Occurrences, it had been meditated and prepar'd by the States long ago; the Occasion of which he alleg'd to be the Backwardness of Spain to fulfil their Engagements, and their leaving all their Towns perfectly defenceless, as if they were intended to be abandon'd. That the said States did not the last Year accept such a Peace as they sought now, he ascrib'd to the Force and Merit of his Majesty's late offensive and defensive League with them; which, according to him, furnish'd no small Hopes of putting a considerable Stop to the Growth of the Power of France. "For, continued his Lordship, tho' the Dutch were still inclin'd to accept of a Peace, and were hearkning, after the French Propositions at Nimwegen, yet such were his (the King's) Resolutions to hold them to that League, and so CONSTANT WERE ALL HIS REFUSALS TO HEARKEN TO SUCH A PEACE, OR TO HAVE ANY PART IN IT, that they must of Necessity, at last, have been oblig'd to continue in the War some way or another." He then proceeded to lay the Blame of the grand Disappointment of all, at the Door of the House of Commons; "For when, it was heard abroad, said he, that this League with the States had been so ill understood at home, and had been to unfittingly and undeservedly reflect'd upon; that a Resolution had been taken to give no Money till Satisfaction was given in Matters of Religion, and such an Address presented to the King, as had never been heard of before in any State or Kingdom in the World; and his Majesty had proceeded so far as to express his Resentment of it; then they concluded with themselves, that it was in vain to rely any longer upon England, for England was no longer itself. Then all Sides began to wish for Peace, even Spain, as well as Holland; and if the Cessation which is endeavour'd to be made, in order to it, takes Effect, as, in all likelihood, it will, we may conclude the Peace will follow."

His Lordship then came to his second Head, The Influence such a Peace would have upon our Affairs, which, he said, was fitter for Meditation than Discourse; only this was evident, that, "by the Preparations we had made for War, and the Prohibitions we had made of Trade, we had given no small Provocations to a mighty King, who might be at Leisure enough to resent them if he pleas'd."

Whence he infer'd, as many other notable Politicians have done since, "That it importeth us, so to strengthen ourselves both at home and abroad, that it might not be found to cheap and easy to put an Affront upon us;" which in plain English, was as much as to say, That we had negociated ourselves into the Necessity of keeping up a standing Army.

Under his third Head, The Necessity of coming to a better Intelligence among ourselves, his Lordship said so many fine Things in so fine a manner, that they will scarce interweave with the coarse Web of History. He took occasion to refer to the Pretences which gave rise to the late Civil War. He mention'd the printed Libels of the present Times, as Symptoms of the Return of that fatal Distemper, from which we were so lately recover'd. He started a Doubt, whether we did not bring some kind of Scandal upon the Protestant Religion, when we seem'd to distrust the Truth and Power of it, by shewing ourselves afraid of its Continuance: And, taking upon him to prove that our Liberties and Properties were in as little Danger as our Religion, his Lordship was bold to say, "Can there be a greater Evidence of the Moderation of a Prince, and his Tenderness of the Liberty of the Subject, than to suffer, as he does, every Day, so much licentious and malicious Talk to pass unpunish'd? If there be not any one Influence to be found in a whole Reign, of a Man that hath suffer'd against Law; and very few Examples of those that have suffer'd by it, Shall we endure them that dare say in Coffhouses and public Places, that the Nation is enslave'd?"

His Lordship clos'd his Harangue, with enforcing the Necessity of making good the Failures, and supplying the Wants of the Revenue; and with shewing the mischievous and dangerous Consequences of Tacking; saying, These Innovations the King resolves to abolish, and hath commanded me to say to you, State super Vias antiquas!

Whatever Advantage had been taken of this ten Days Prorogation, or whatever Means had been us'd to bring the Commons to a better Temper, with whatever Success, the Freedom they had been treated with in this Speech, gave them great Offence. But tho' many angry things were said, no angry Motion was made; and the Business of the Session was open'd with renewing the standing Order of the House; by which it is declar'd, That if any Candidate to serve in the House of Commons should give any Voter Meat or Drink, above the Value of ten Shillings in the whole, or any other Gift or Present, or any Promise, Obligation or Engagement to make such Gift or Present, such Gift or Promise was Bribery; and, being duly prov'd, should be deem'd sufficient Cause to make his Election void.

A Motion was then made for an Address, that his Majesty would acquaint the House with the State of Affairs in relation to War and Peace; as also to specify, that, in case he thought fit to enter into a War against the French King, in concert with the Emperor,

This look'd well on the Court Side : And yet so thoroughly did the opposite Party belie themselves, that, at their next Sitting, the Majority shifted again ; and a Question pass'd, to the same purpose with the former ; with the Addition of a Clause, importing, that in case his Majesty declin'd to enter into the War, the House would provide for the speedy Disbanding of the Army. It is remarkable, that the House did not reduce their Votes into an Address ; but order'd them to be presented to the King, in their original Form, without making any Apology for so doing : And his Majesty return'd the following Answer, without making any Exceptions as to the Point of Ceremonies.

but carry'd the next Day, with an additional Clause for Disbanding the Army, if the King declines a War.

The King's Answer.

"That the French King hath made such Offers of a Cessation till the 27th of July, as his Majesty doth not only believe will be accepted, but will end in a general Peace ; yet, since that is not certain, he does not think it prudent to dismiss either Fleet or Army before that time ; nor doth he think it will add much to the Charge, in regard the raising Money, and paying them off, would take up that time, were they to be disbanded as speedily as possible." In the mean time, he desired Money for their Subsistence ; that, as hitherto they had been the most orderly Army that ever came together, they might be encouraged to continue so. Then he concluded with reminding them of the two hundred thousand Pounds, formerly mentioned in his Speech, which he wanted for the Subsistence of his Household.

We have now one of those delicate Points before us, upon which so many plausible things may be urg'd on both Sides, as makes it difficult to conclude on either. Had the King's Inclinations really dispos'd him to cloze with the Desires of his People, and the apparent Exigencies of the Times, by entering into the War, in case it continu'd ; no doubt, it was agreeable to the Dictates of true Policy to continue the Army, till the Peace was sign'd and ratify'd : But if the Secret of the French Treaty had taken air ; if there was any Room to conclude, the King was endeavouring to avail himself of the Crisis, to keep up a standing Force on one hand, to bridle his People, and oblige his most Christian Brother to be at the Expence of it on the other ; all foreign Considerations ought to have given way ; and the sole Concern of an English Parliament should have been the Conservation of the Liberties of the English People.

Possibly the Patriots of these Times were not govern'd by Motives of this Nature ; Possibly, there is Reason to think, the Spirit of Faction was as predominant in the Senate, as the Spirit of absolute Dominion at Court ; and those who clamour'd loudest in behalf of the People were, at the bottom, as little concern'd for their Welfare, as the most obstinate Courtier of them all.

However this may be, on the Receipt of that Message, the Commons unanimously voted, That all Forces rais'd since the 20th of September last, except those transported to foreign Plantations, should be forthwith paid off and disbanded. They also voted (June 4.) 200,000 l. to be rais'd by a monthly Tax, in six Months, after the Land-tax, then in being, should be expir'd ; with an appropriating Clause, that this should be for disbanded the Army by the End of the present June : They also voted 200,000 l. towards defraying the Expences of the Fleet ; and seem'd inclinable to throw in such another Sum for the King's extraordinary Occasions.

About this time also his Majesty sent them another Message, signifying, "That his Mind was still the same with what he deliver'd in his Speech the 27d of May last, viz. That the Army and Fleet ought to be kept up till the expected Peace be concluded : And he further recommended to their Consideration, whether it were not dishonourable for him to recall his Forces in Flanders, from those Towns which he had taken into his Protection, before they could provide themselves of other Succours."

The Reason assign'd in this Message was irresistible ; and produced a Resolution to extend the Time, as to the Forces in Flanders, till the 27th of July : But shortly after, viz. the 15th, as if an Apprehension began to prevail, that the House was falling back into its old Complaisance, it was mov'd, That, after the Tuesday following, which was the 18th, no Motions should be made for any new Supplies of Money, till after the next Receipt ; and carry'd in the Affirmative : The Courtiers losing the previous Question by Six, and the Question itself by Nine Voices : And 314 Members being present at the first Division, and 217 at the last.

To make one Effort more on the now dubious Temper of the House, the King was induc'd to come to the House of Peers, on the said 18th of June, and to express himself, from the Throne, to the following Effect : viz. "That the Season requiring a Recess by the Middle of next Month, it was convenient, that he and his Parliament should part fairly, and with a perfect Confidence in one another : That, therefore, he should open his Heart freely to them : That a Peace was ready to be determin'd, at least as to Spain and Holland ; in which his Part would be not only that of a Mediator, but Guaranty : That Spain moreover demand'd of him, to be at the Charge of maintaining Flanders, even after the Peace : That this would oblige him to keep up his Navy ; and call'd for some Assurance to the World, that we were well united at home : That tho' the House of Commons might perhaps think such a Peace as ill a Bargain as a War ; they would nevertheless be reconcil'd to it, if they seriously consider'd, that otherwise Flanders would have been lost, perhaps by that time, and that they would, he believ'd, give much greater Sums, rather than the single Town of Ostend should be in the French Hands ; which would enable them to keep forty of their Men of War over-against the River's Mouth :

The King in Person demands an additional Revenue of 300,000 l. per annum ;

Mouth: That if they desir'd to keep up the Reputation England had acquir'd abroad, by raising thirty thousand Men in forty Days, and preparing a Navy of ninety Men of War; in they desir'd to maintain the Honour of the Crown at home, to look to the Safety of the Balance of Affairs abroad, and pursue the War with Morocco; if they desir'd he should pass the rest of his Life in Quiet, and all the rest of it in Confidence and Kindness with them, and other future Parliaments, they must find a Way, not only to settle for his Life his Revenue, as it was at Christmas last; but also to add a new Fund of three hundred thousand Pounds a Year; upon which he would pass an Act to settle five hundred thousand Pounds on the Navy and Ordnance; and should be, likewise, always ready to consent to all such Laws as they should propose for the Good of the Nation: And, for a Cloze, he put them in mind of the forty thousand Pounds, for the Princess of Orange's Portion; the first Payment of which was due, and had been demanded."

It is worthy Observation, that this extraordinary Demand tallies exactly with that which was made upon the French; and, probably, was meant to answer the same extraordinary Purposes: Certain it is, the House seems to have carry'd their Jealousies higher upon this Occasion, than ever they had done before: Money they very wisely consider'd as Power; and, therefore, they thought it expedient, not to part with so much at once, as should render themselves useless. No doubt, the Message had been preconcerted, and, according to Custom, the Undertakers for the Court had made their Musters, and answer'd for their Corps: But those who, perhaps, had approv'd of the Project, sunk under the Experiment. In short, never was any Court-Point, on which so much depended, so shamefully defeated. They confin'd their Thanks to the gracious Expressions in his Majesty's Speech. On the Article of the additional Revenue, it does not appear, that the Undertakers had the Courage to divide the House: And even when a Motion was made, to give his Majesty a Compensation for what he lost in his Customs by the Prohibition of French Commodities, it pass'd in the Negative, by fifty-seven Voices; when there were three hundred and forty-seven Members in the House.

Not satisfy'd with this complete Victory, the Anti-Court-Party pursued their Blow, and call'd for an Account of what Pensions had been charg'd upon the Revenue; what Privy-Seals had been issu'd for secret Services since May 1677; and for a Test concerning the Bribing of Members for giving their Votes: Much was also said concerning Popery, and taking the Sacrament; Members conversing with foreign Ministers, and receiving Money from them; such as had receiv'd Money for Connivance relative to any Bill depending in the House; or any Reward for being Chairman of a Committee; or had solicited for Voices, in any Cause depending before the House; such as had offer'd their Service to great Persons to give their Votes in Parliament, and had been refus'd; such as kept public Tables; and such as had taken Money for Protections.

But though these several Particulars were warmly talk'd of, and very probably not without sufficient Cause; and tho' a Resolution was taken to enter into an Enquiry concerning them; the whole came to nothing: Whence it may be fairly infer'd, that the Clamour was meant to be the Use.

After this grand Attempt of the Court to procure a stated, sufficient, and independent Revenue, had been thus miserably blasted, the next favourite and important Point they had to husband, was the new-rais'd Army. The same Reasons for the Continuance of it still subsisted, nay, were become more cogent than ever: But as the House now dreaded every Proposal which came from the Court, and nothing so much as a standing Army, all the Skill and Address imaginable were requisite to render the Motion palatable. To this end Care was taken not only to procure it the Sanction of the House of Lords, but to convey it thro' their Channel to the House of Commons. Things being in this Direction, June 20, their Lordships desir'd a Conference on Matters of great Concern, the Commons, of course, agreed to it; and the Committees of both Houses being met, the Lord Privy Seal (Anglesy) gave notice of the Commons to understand, that the Affair in question was a Message from his Majesty, which the Lords judg'd to be of such Moment to both Houses and the whole Kingdom, that they thought it ought to be communicated without Delay. After which solemn Introduction, his Lordship delivered to Mr. Peable, the Manager for the said Commons, a Copy of the said Message; which was as follows:

The Lord Treasurer, by his Majesty's Command, did let the House know, "That his Majesty had receiv'd a Letter from his Ambassador at Nimwegen, Sir Leoline Jenkins, dated June 15, which gave an Account that the French Ambassador had declar'd to the Dutch, that they would not void any of the Places they held in the Spanish Netherlands, until Sweden be effectually restor'd to the Places taken from them, notwithstanding the Peace was already sign'd and ratify'd between them: That, upon this is arisen a Difficulty upon the Side of the Spaniards, whether they will accept the French Conditions: That Mr. Beverning, one of the States Ambassadors there, had thereupon earnestly requir'd of them, whether the Army of England was presently to be disbanded, for nobody could tell to what End things would come: For if France would keep all the Places in the Netherlands filled with Troops, it is in vain the States have taken so much Pains about the Barriers, for then they will have none when all is done: That Mr. Beverning was very anxious till he heard out of England, that the Army might not yet be disbanded: That the Imperial Ministers had been to visit him that Day, and that their principal Business was to learn what they could from him, and in what State our Army

Mr. Povole having made his Report, and the Message having been read, it appear'd upon the Result, that the Lords had no more Credit with the Commons than the King, or his Ministers; For tho' the Facts specify'd in the Letter, were beyond Controversy true, as Sir Leoline's own Papers, at this Day bear witness, so strong a Prejudice had they imbib'd by this time, that no Circumstances whatever would reduce his Majesty to break with France, that they chose rather to desert their own Project, than contribute any further to their own Ruin. And to make this as intelligible as possible, all the Notice they took of the Lords Message was, by another, to remind them of the Bill which lay before them, intitled, An Act for granting a Supply to his Majesty, to enable him to disband the Forces rais'd since September 29.

All these noble Refinements of the Court being thus a second time defeated, instead of weaving a new Web of their own, they endeavour'd to entangle and perplex that of the Commons. The Bill to disband the Army, as drawn by the Commons, was liable to some reasonable Objections; as to the Penalties of Forfeitures and Disabilities to bear Office, which those Persons were obnoxious to, who did not comply with the Letter of the Act, within the time prescrib'd; but with all it was a Money Bill; to which they knew the Commons would not suffer the Lords to make any Additions or Alterations: A Dispute was sure to follow: And the longer it lasted, the longer the Army must of course be kept on foot. This was the Project: And as to the Event, the 26th of June the Lords return'd the Bill with Amendments. The 27th the Commons agreed to a Proviso which was at once calculated to remedy the Objections made by their Lordships, preserve their own Rights, and carry their grand Point of breaking the Army; and with this the Bill was again deliver'd at a Conference to the Lords; who rejected it for six Reasons, which they communicated at a second Conference; and of which the Principal were, "That it was very doubtful, whether the Proviso as it was pen'd, took off the Forfeitures and Disabilities; and that the Proviso itself was inconsistent with the Bill; the one appointing short Days under great Penalties, and the other prolonging the Days without Penalties." When this was reported to the House, as a further Expedient, they adopted one of the Lord's Amendments, rejected the two others, and resolv'd to abide by their Proviso: They, however, drew up Reasons, which were deliver'd at a free Conference; and receiv'd for Answer, That the Lords had voted to adhere to their Amendments, and to disagree to the Proviso. This produced two counter Resolutions of the Commons to adhere to the Proviso, and disagree to the Amendments. They likewise appointed the Committee, who had manag'd this Dispatch, to draw up a (b) State of the Rights of the Commons, and in the mean time, July 2, came to the following Resolution: That all Aids and Supplies granted to his Majesty in Parliament, are the sole Gift of the Commons: That all Bills for the granting any such Aids and Supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and, that it is the undoubted and sole Right of the Commons to direct, limit and appoint, in such Bills, the Ends, Purposes, Considerations, Conditions, Limitations, and Qualifications of such Grants, which ought not to be chang'd by the House of Lords.

And, also, to break the whole Contrivance, they made one general Bill of the Supply, which amounted to 619,380*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* and which was to answer the Expences of Disbanding the Army, to repay the 200,000*l.* borrow'd on the Excise, and provide for the Princess of Orange's Portion, and the King's extraordinary Occasions. But in the midst of all this laudable Vigilance, from whatever Motive, to obviate all Pretences to make a standing Army a Requisite to Government, they had, nevertheless, the Complaisance to reject a Motion from the over-righteous Quarter, to appropriate the Exceedings in the Supply to the use of the Navy, and to prolong the additional Duties on Wines for three Years; which, considering the whole of things, both abroad and at home, was to the full as much as could have been (i) reasonably expected from them.

And now, having fat their time, and the Cry against Papery, which had been so violent in the middle of the Session, dying away towards the End of it, as all Party Clamour generally do, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, July 15, gave the Royal Assent to the several Bills that were presented to him, and directed the Lord Chancellor to prorogue Parliament, which he did to August 1, Orange's d. with an Intimation, that, unless there was occasion for their assembling sooner, his Majesty would not require their Attendance till Winter.

In this Interval, the French Ministers at Nimegue maintain'd their Refusal to evacuate the Spanish Towns, with a Haughtiness beyond Example: They even rais'd new Difficulties with the Dutch, with regard to the Treaty of Commerce: They refus'd to pass the Prince of Orange's Article, as it was propos'd: They insist'd on keeping Marselis likewise, till Sweden was satisfy'd: And, what was most horrible of all, as Mr. Bevering express'd it, they said, "The King

(b) Which they did: But the Entry of it in the Journal was refused, on the Day of the Prorogation, till farther Orders: the Controversy being then at an end.

(i) And yet the Author of the History of Taxes has the Modesty and good Sense to say, when speaking of the Supply of this Session, That they gave the Money full before to raise it (the Army,) and now to disband it; because the King had not, immediately at their Beck, declar'd War with France; and, therefore, they put it out of his Power to declare it for the future; not trusting his Majesty with the Money, but putting it into private Hands, to disband the said Army: Now the Spirit of Rebellion, which had been working more privately ever since the Resolutions, began to appear bursted. [Hist. of Taxes, p. 317.]

King their Master would not suffer the Swedes to give some Kind of Consent, as they were willing to do, to the Elector of Brandenburg: Adding, "It was not for the Glory of his Majesty to suffer any such Composition; and, therefore, he would hinder it all he could." And, all this, they further assur'd the Marquis de los Balbases, one of the Spanish Plenipotentiaries, had been concerted with the King of England: And again to Mr. Beverning, That France had nothing to apprehend out of England; which, according to him, had oblig'd itself, by Treaty, not to stir against France upon this occasion.

It is certain, that Sir Henry Wootton's Mission, That it is the Duty of an Ambassador to live for the Service of his King and the Good of his Country, is not without Foundation: But these intemperate, as well as unfeasible, Sallies of those of France, were not absolute Falshoods; for Mr. Barillon, at that time, look'd upon his Negotiation, as in a manner perfected; and, it is probable, had sent Intelligence accordingly: So that they only anticipated what they believ'd Time would warrant: And it is with the same Allowance, that a Passage which Sir John Roxby, an Englishman, and now transform'd into a thorough Courtier, one of the Lord Treasurer's Junco in the House, and in some degree of Confidence with the King himself, has slipp'd into his Memoirs, p. 65, 66, is to be understood, viz. "About this time (June 22.) there was fresh Discourse about a War with France; the French King and ours not agreeing concerning the Interest of the King of Sweden, which the French would have to be adjusted, before they would deliver up the Towns they had taken in Flanders: But by what I heard, I thought the thing had but an unlikely Aspect; and particularly, as I had seen the King, Duke, and French Ambassador, in very often merry and intimate together, at the Duchets of Perth's moul's Lodgings, LAUGHING AT THOSE WHO BELIEVED IT IN EARNEST."

Sir William Temple, again, who appears to have been better acquainted with the King's Mind, when upon Business, than with his real Face when dissipat'd in Pleasure, affirms, that his Majesty was both surpris'd and angry at this Proceeding of France: That the next Morning, after he was assur'd of the Fact (for at first, it seems, he did not believe it) he sent for Sir William to the foreign Committee, and declar'd his Resolution to dispatch him immediately to Holland, with a Commission to sign a Treaty with the States; by which they should be oblig'd to carry on the War, and his Majesty to enter into it, in case France should not consent, within a certain limited Time, to evacuate the Towns. Even the Duke fell into this Counsel, with great Warmth; saying, It was plain by this Face, that France was not sincere in the Business of the Peace: That they aim'd at universal Monarchy; and that none but his Majesty could hinder them from it, in the Posture that Christendom stood. All the Lords of the Committee, moreover, agreed, with so general a Concurrence, that it was hard to imagine, continues Sir William, this should not prove a steady Resolution, how little soever we had been given to any such.

It appears, however, that this general Concurrence, this Warmth of the Duke, this Anger and Surprize of the King, and this vigorous Measure, which was the Result of all, did not arise from the Proceeding of France at Nimwegen, with respect to the Evacuation of the Towns in question; but Mr. Barillon's thundering Demand, with respect to the Army before-mention'd; and rather than part with that, it was thought advisable to make this new Step towards a War.

The Particulars of Sir William's Negotiations at the Hague may be found at large in his Works: The Issue was, that he had the Address and Happiness to conclude the Treaty in six Days; by which France was oblig'd to declare, within fourteen Days after the Date thereof, that they would evacuate the Spanish Towns; or in case of their Refusal, Holland was engag'd to go on with the War, and England immediately to declare it against France, in conjunction with Holland and the rest of the Confederates.

To traverse a Measure he apprehended so much, and expected so little, his most Christian Majesty descend'd so far from his late Elevation, as to offer, by his Ambassadors at Nimwegen, first to advance himself as far as St. Quintin, and then to Ghent, to meet any Deputies the States would send thither; and treat with them in Person: But the States, now persuas'd that England was at last in earnest, declin'd the Compliment; and only desir'd a positive Answer as to the Evacuation; at the same time signifying, that they should not be many Days at liberty to receive it. Of such Weight was England, at that time, in the Scales of Europe!

As it is a Maxim in French Policy to lose no Opportunity; no sooner was the Treaty with Spain and Holland at a stand, by the Obstacles they themselves had rais'd, but in order to derive an immediate Benefit from it, they block'd up Mons, one of the few remaining Places that interrupted the free Progress of their Conquests; which was expected to fall into their Hands, before the Expiration of the Term for their Choice of Peace or War.

While, therefore, the Politicians were at work in the Cabinet, the Prince made the most vigorous Preparations imaginable to take the Field: Ten thousand of the new-rais'd English were already arriv'd in Flanders, with Orders to join him; and his Resolution, says Sir William Temple, was, either to relieve Mons, or die in the Attempt, whether the

A. D. 1678. Peace succeeded or not: So as, the Continuance of the War seem'd unavoidable.

The Confederacy had now assum'd a new Face: The Demeanour of France was no longer so overbearing as it had been: And all Europe was in expectation of a Series of extraordinary Events; since it could scarce be imagin'd, that France would recede from a Point, she had so magnificently insisted upon; nor that England, after once drawing the Sword, would not throw away the Scabbard.

But it appears, France knew us better even than we knew ourselves; and that as they had given the Wound, they could also heal it, on the first Application: Accordingly, so happily and effectually did they ply their usual Arts, at the Court of England, that when but five Days remain'd of the Term allow'd them, by the Treaty between his Majesty and the States, for the Evacuation of the Towns, one Du Croix, a profess'd Agent of the Duke of Holland's, but a known Tool of Mr. Barillon's, arriv'd at the Hague, together with Mr. Meredith, the Secretary of the Embassy, with a Packet from Court to Sir William Temple, commanding him to go immediately away to Nimeguen, and there to endeavour all he could, in his Majesty's Name, to persuade the Swedish Embassadors, to signify to those of France, that they the Swedes, would, for the Good of Christendom, consent to the Evacuation of the Towns, and even desire the King of France no longer to defer it, and consequently the Peace, upon the sole Regard and Interest of the Crown of Sweden; as also, to assure the said Embassadors, that after this Peace, his Majesty would use the most effectual Endeavours he could for Restitution of the Towns and Countries the Swedes had lost in the War. Du Croix himself also gave Sir William to understand, that the King had taken this Measure with Mr. Barillon, and had sent an Express over with it into France: That he, the King, was resolv'd upon the Peace; and, to that purpose, had hasten'd Sir William away to Nimeguen, whether he, Du Croix, hop'd to attend him.

Whoever recollects, that the Swedish Ministers had already offer'd to make this Advance, for the sake of Peace, and that the French would not allow it, must conclude, that the Mission of this Creature (who was called by the Pensioner Fagel, a Cheat of Cheats, because of the Notoriety of his Character) could not be to compass what was already in their Power: It must therefore be presum'd, that the great Drift of France was, to make the King their Tool, to draw himself into Suspicion, to undermine his own Figure and Importance, to destroy the Confidence which the States began once more to place in him; and thereby to render it utterly impracticable for either them or him to pursue the War; all which was so effectually done, by this amazing Step, that Sir William Temple himself avows, in a Letter to the Lord Treasurer, written in the Anguish of his Heart, That he did believe the King had taken his absolute Measures with France. Du Croix having every where asserted whatever had a Tendency to put the Matter beyond all Dispute; and Sir William's Removal to Nimeguen, in consequence of the Orders he had receiv'd, seem'd to confirm every thing. From Circumstances it appears, that this last was a Point, which France thought of great Consequence to the Success of their Artifices: For du Croix not only quicken'd his Departure himself, as above-mention'd; but, in a joint Letter from Messieurs Temple and Jenkins, at Nimeguen, to Mr. Secretary Williamson, dated August 9, N.S. we have an Article to the following extraordinary Effect:

"Mr. Bevering offering to sign the Peace, His Majesty's and saying they should not be many Days at liberty to do it, because of their Engagements; the French reply'd, You confide in your Engagements, Gentleman, and the King in two hundred thousand Men, well pay'd; adding, that his Majesty of England had such Treaties with France, as would keep him from performing what Sir William Temple had negotiated at the Hague: And Mr. Colbert, in particular, saying yet further, And why does not Sir William Temple come hither? He has the King his Majesty's Orders to do so; and yet he continues to do Mischief at the Hague."

Sir William, as it appears by a long and circumstantial Letter of his to his first great Friend and Patron the Duke of Ormond, was in the greatest Trouble in the World, whether to obey his Instructions, or first acquaint the King with the Consequence of them. Three Days he continu'd thus irresolute: But finding, by that time, that Du Croix had made all public at the Hague; and was gone to do the same at Nimeguen; as also, that a new Artifice had taken place, namely, that tho' the Swedes had declar'd they would desist, they had declin'd doing it in Form, till his Arrival at Nimeguen: And fearing an ill Use would be made of his Stay, as if he chose to hinder his Majesty's Paces towards a Peace, in favour of the Prince's Inclination for a War; he, at last, determin'd to obey his Orders.

By the time, however, that he join'd the Congress, but three Days remain'd of the Term, prescrib'd by the Treaty, for the French to take their choice of Peace or War. They had already, indeed, admitted of the Concession of the Swedes, with respect to their Concerns, which had been made the 26th of the preceding Month: But then they still insisted upon the Dutch sending to St. Quintin, to adjust other Points of the Peace; which they constantly refus'd: So that, notwithstanding the late Intrigue of du Croix, and all the mischievous Effects it had produc'd, the Peace seem'd in a manner desperate, and the War unavoidable.

Things continued in this Situation till the decisive Day, August 11, N.S. when the French Embassadors came to the Dutch; and, after a Conference of five Hours, wherein they very much press'd to keep some of the Towns; but found the Dutch resolute for all, agreed to sign the Treaty: And both Parties came to the Mediators, to desire they would sign with them; who, finding Spain was not included, absolutely refus'd it, or to have any any Concern in the Affair; their Instructions directing them to take all Measures necessary for a general Peace, but none for a particular one.

The Treaty between France and Holland sign'd.

They, moreover, expostulated with the Dutch, for undertaking to sign without Spain, contrary to what had always been his Majesty's and the States Intention: But Mr. Beverning said, He must sign that Night, tho' he lost his Head: And accordingly they (1) did so, between eleven and twelve o' Clock; the Instruments having been hardly finish'd by that Hour; when the Treaty with England, for carrying on the War, would have taken place.

And thus, says Sir William Temple, in his Memoirs, were eluded all the Effects of that Treaty, and the late Hopes conceiv'd by the Confederates of the War's going on; which so provok'd several of their Ministers, as to engage them in sharp and violent Protestations against the Dutch Embassadors, by which they hop'd to deter them from signing the Peace without new Orders from their Masters. But all was to no Purpose; Beverning was unmov'd, and the thing was done.

Advantages taken of it by France.

But the very next Day he found sufficient Reason to repent of it; for no sooner did they (the Dutch) interpose in the Business between France and Spain, but the French started so many Difficulties, and made so many new Demands, that it became manifest, that the Design of all this Precipitation was, That the Spaniards might not have Leisure to adjust their Treaty, so as to sign at the same time; nor the Dutch to send to the States for specific Instructions whether they should sign without the Spaniards or not: That the two Powers might be divided by this Means; and that France being oblig'd only so restore Mastricht, they might find Pretences to keep the several Places demanded by Spain yet longer in their Hands.

The Dutch concern'd for their own right Proceedings; but lay the blame on England.

Mr. Beverning himself, now saw Cause to acknowledge, That they had made a Peace, which was equally ruinous to the States and all their Neighbours; but withal, he laid the Fault upon his Majesty of England; who, according to Mr. Van Benningben's Accounts, first refus'd to ratify the late Treaty without Conditions that were not possible for the States to admit of; and then by the Credit he had given Du Croix, if not by his Instructions to him, had induc'd the said States to believe, that the King had taken his Measures with France for a Peace, and consequently that there was no longer any Dependence to be plac'd on the War.

No doubt Mr. Beverning was very well warrant'd to make these Excuses, at the King's Expence: And yet (m) two Days after the Peace had been thus huddled up, as if purposely to confound all Certainty of Opinion, thro' the whole Course of our Conduct in this Affair, an Express arriv'd, from England, at Nineguen, with Orders for Sir William Temple to return to the Hague, and to exchange the Ratifications, without any Mention of the Difficulties which had been before started to delay it.

It is most remarkable, that the last Day allow'd for the said Exchange was the 15th; so that if the Courier had, by contrary Winds, or any ill Accident, been detain'd on the Road twenty-four Hours longer, or if Sir W. Temple himself, had not prosecuted his Journey Night and Day (the two Places being twenty-six Leagues asunder) the Command he brought, could not have been executed; and so the Court had lost the Merit of this Step, and the Allies the Uic.

While Affairs had taken this sudden Turn at Nineguen, the Prince of Orange was pursuing his Purpose to relieve Mons, with all his Powers and Faculties: The English and Scots, under the Command of the Earl of Offery, had join'd him, as likewise what Forces the Spaniards could muster, under the Duke de Villa Hermosa. The French Army was so posted on the Summit of a Precipice, under the Shelter of thick Woods, which were no otherwise accessible, than by narrow and intricate Paths, that Mr. de Luxemburg, in a Letter to the Marshal d'Esprades at Nineguen, had asserted, That if he had but ten thousand Men, and the Prince fifty thousand, he would find it impossible to attack him.

The Battle of St. Dennis.

But all these Difficulties, tho' so confidently believ'd to be insuperable, did not deter the Prince from his Resolution. August 19. the Confederate Army decamp'd from Saignes, and march'd towards the Enemy, who had their Right posted at the Abbey de St. Dennis, and their Left at Mamey St. Pierre. About Noon they brought their Cannon to play upon St. Dennis; and as his Highness was sitting down to Dinner in the open Field, he was join'd by the Duke of Montmouth.

A. D. 1678.

mouth. After a short Repast, Count Waldeck receiv'd Orders, with the Battalions under his Command, to attack the Abbey; supported by all the Regiments of the left Wing, animated by the Presence, and directed by the Orders of the Prince himself.

At the same time, the Spaniards in the Right, strengthened by the Prince's Guards, and the English and Scottish Auxiliaries, who had never seen Service before, made their Impression on the Side of Coffaux; and, tho' they met with extraordinary Resistance, so thoroughly were all inspir'd with Emulation, with respect to each other, with Zeal for the Common Cause, and by the Example of their Commanders, who were the bravest Men in the World, that, after a long and obstinate Dispute, attended with great Slaughter on both Sides, they oblig'd the French to retire, and made themselves Masters of the Post; which, however, they did not think fit to hold, because of the great Difficulty of making good the Communication with it.

It was here the Prince of Orange (who was resolv'd this Day should be the last or the most illustrious of his Life, and who after seeing his own left Wing in a fair way to force the French, on that Side, had push'd on to the Right to extend his Care, communicate his Spirit, and share in the Danger every where) had breached his last, if Mr. Overkirke had not killed a French Officer, in the very Instant that he was going to kill his Highness. It was here, also, that the Earl of (a) Osborn behaved in such a manner, as almost countenanced the Wonders of Poetry and Romance; leading on every Regiment in Person, expos'd to all the Fire of the Enemy, as if he had been invulnerable, as well as invincible.

The Battle lasted till the Night put an End to it, when the Marshall de Luxembourg thought fit to make his Retreat; leaving the Confederates in Possession of St. Dennis, as also of his Camp; and, according to some, of the very Plate he had used that Day at Dinner, in the Post he had vainly deem'd impregnable.

But if the Confederates deriv'd great Honour from this Action, they deriv'd no other Advantage to counterbalance the Loss of so many gallant Men as fell in procuring it: For the very next Morning the Prince receiv'd Advice of the signing of the Peace at Nimeguen; and having imparted the News to Mr. de Luxembourg, it made way for a Cessation of Hostilities, and serv'd only for a noble Catastrophe to the War.

We must now follow Sir William Temple to the Hague, where he found the Penfioner infinitely chagrin'd at the manner of the Peace, if not the Thing; and as much pleas'd with Sir William's Erand to the Hague: For under the Countenance and Authority of the Ratification with England (if England did not again waver) the States had still a back Game to play, by refusing to ratify with France, till Satisfaction was first given to Spain.

But tho' the Ratifications were exchange'd in time, and the Treaty was so far in Force, the Triumph of the States was again shock'd by Letters from Mr. Van Heuninghen of the 22d, which signify'd, That tho' the King and Court had, at the first Report of the Peace being sign'd, seem'd a great deal surpris'd; yet he had the next Day talk'd with them, and found them very well pleas'd with it, and with the Conduct of the States: And one private Letter of Intelligence to the foreign Ministers at the Hague said, "It went so far, that they were on the Point of disowning their two Embassadors for refusing to sign the Peace as Mediators."

And yet the second Day after these Letters were received, viz. the 24th, Mr. Hyde arriv'd at the Hague, in twenty-four Hours from London, with positive Instructions to let the States know, how much the King had been surpris'd with the signing of the Peace, without the Participation of Spain; as also his Concern for the Difficulties still remaining upon the Spanish Treaty, and the Evacuation of the Places: That his Majesty was thereupon of Opinion, That they could not ratify their late Treaty with France; but that they were engag'd to him to proceed with the War; and that if they were still of the same Mind, and would signify as much to him, he would, within three Days after such Signification, declare War against France, and fulfill in all Points his Obligations.

The Prince had by this time quitted the Army, and was return'd to the Hague; and upon the Communication of this Dispatch, could not help expressing his Abhorrence in very strong Terms, at such inconsistent and unaccountable Conduct. He for himself, however, to make the best of it, by retarding the Ratifications of the Nimeguen-Treaty, till Spain was comprehended in it, which he prevail'd soverally with the States of Holland, and the States General, to agree to; tho' his Aulveraries did not fail to represent this new Turn of the Court of England, as the Result of some Concert between the King and Prince, to carry on the War, tho' France should perform the very Conditions the State had accepted; and to redouble their Opposition under that Presumption.

But no sooner did this new Measure begin to operate, than this Majesty sent Orders to Sir Leoline Jenkins, at Nimeguen, to propose a general Suspension of Arms for six Months, in Concurrence, as Sir Joseph Williamson signify'd, with the Prince's Desire. This disjointed all again. His Highness ask'd how this corresponded with the Proposition made by Mr. Hyde? Adding, That when he desir'd a Suspension, it was before he knew the last Resolution of his Majesty, and on the the contrary, while he thought him pleas'd with the Peace.

It is upon this Occasion that Sir William Temple says, That whoever should take the Pains to lay together the Papers the Court had made for three Months past, in this great Affair, would conclude our Secretaries of State never remember'd one Day, what had been done the Day before, or never car'd what would be done the next.

There are indeed many Passages both in the same Minister's Letters and Memoirs, which have a Tendency to insinuate, That in the Affair of du Crois, his Majesty was impos'd upon: And in a Letter from the Lord Treasurer to him (Sir W. T.) dated August 17, there is the following remarkable Passage: "You will find, that Mr. Hyde is no less impos'd of to give Satisfaction about Mr. Du Crois, who was so far from having any sort of Commission from the King, that if the Pensioner will permit any thing to be prov'd against him of those private Discourses, which you say in your Letter of the 16th, you had from the Pensioner, his Majesty will make him a public Example for the Satisfaction of himself, as well as the rest of the World." No doubt, the Falacy lies in the Word Commission. Possibly he had not a formal Commission of any sort: But in the very Instructions, brought over by him and Mr. Meredith to Sir William Temple, there is an Avowal, that all they contain'd was founded on the Insinuations made to his Majesty by du Crois, who was sent, at the same time to the Swedish Embassadors upon this Occasion. These Instructions came from the Lord Treasurer. Sir William, in his Memoirs, says expressly, he receiv'd them from this Man; and in a Letter to his Lordship, on the Court's suffering such a Man as du Crois to give so unbecomingly a Bravall (Shock) to the Affairs of the World, he expostulates with him in the following warm manner: "But after all must beg your Lordship to let me know when you did resolve to send him, and those Instructions, why not to Sir Leoline Jenkins, that was on the Place, but to me, that was engag'd here in Affairs of another Nature?" The Question is shew'd, and his Lordship wisely evades the Force of it, by returning no Answer. Whence we may fairly conclude, that the French sollicit the King's Interposition with the Swedes, to do what they had of their own accord done already, only for a Pretence to get Sir William Temple remov'd from the Hague to Nimwegen, and thereby, furnish Credit for all the plausible Follies, that Du Crois should think fit to raise on so far a Foundation.

And that he, Du Crois, had an imply'd Commission, or, at least, a Trust that amounted to the same thing, must be understood and admitted, from Sir William Temple's own Account of this mysterious Affair; which was publish'd in the Life-time of the Lord Treasurer, and long after he had heard and weigh'd the best Apologies his Lordship could make for having lent his Countenance, at least, to such a Man, and such an Intrigue. Sir William's Words are these:

"How this Dispatch, by Du Crois, was gain'd, or by whom, I will not pretend to determine; but, upon my next Return for England, the Duke told me, That he knew nothing of it till it was gone; having been a hunting that Morning: My Lord Treasurer said all that could be, to excuse himself of it: And I never talk'd of it to Secretary Williamson: But the King told me pleasantly, That the Regue Du Crois had outwitted them all. The Account I met with at Court was, That these Orders were agreed and dispatch'd one Morning, in an Hour's Time, and in the Duchess of Portsmouth's Chamber, by the Intervention and Pursuit of Mr. Barillon. However it was, and what Endeavours soever were made, immediately after, at our Court, to retrieve this Game, it never could be done; and this one Incident changed the whole State of Christendom."

Sir William, also, expressing his own particular Repentment of this Measure, in his Letter above-quoted to the Lord Treasurer, says, "That it had so broke his Head, that he thought it would never be right again: Begg his Lordship to let the King know, that he grew old and infirm, and unfit for such sudden Journeys: Expresses a Resignation to his Majesty's Pleasure, till the End of that Conjunction, with an Exception to his returning any more to Nimwegen; where one Mediator he thought was sufficient; and where none could be serviceable, if no better instructed than he fear'd Sir Lionel Jenkins was." But his Lordship declin'd this Commission of Sir William's, as he had done one of the like Nature before; and in his Reply, by way of getting the better of his Scruples, and reconciling him to those Jobs, that were inseparable from Court-Service, throws in that standing Palliative, which sometimes the best of Ministers are glad to have recourse to, and the world have always in their Mouths; "We must bear with a great many wrong Paces, to prevent worse, which would follow to his Majesty in the Hands of such as would pursue their own Humour, and seek their Ease at any Hazard of our Master, or his Concerns."

Notwithstanding the Exchange of the Ratifications between England and Holland, and his Majesty's solemn Invitation by Mr. Hyde to the States, to break with France, and proceed with him in the War, the latter had so little Confidence in our Resolutions, that they even took off the Edge of their Vote, not to ratify their Peace with France, unless Spain was included, by coupling with it an Order to their Ministers at Nimwegen, to go as far as possibly they could in accommodating the Points in dispute. All those, indeed, who saw little more than the Outside of Things, and who are the Many, imagin'd, that the States would now no longer keep any Temper towards France; and that the War would break out again, with more Violence than ever. But the Prince and Pensioner, from the Beginning, declar'd, that England had stuf'd too often, and delay'd too long; and that all the Fruit of her present Resolution would be, to facilitate the Treaty between France and Spain, and procure a Rectification of the (6) Mistakes, which, thro' Haste and Inadvertency, Mr. Beverning had committed in their own. The Peninsular, in particular, assur'd Sir William Temple from the first, that this was all the use that could be made of it; and that the States were so unsatisfy'd with our Conduct in the Business of the Peace, that tho' they should be glad to see us in the War, they resolv'd to have no further Part in it.

The Spaniards

The Spaniards, however, seeing the English Forces every Day transported into Flanders, knowing besides, that the Confederates in general, were so fond of making use of their Assistance as themselves, and depending on the Resolution of the States not to ratify till they were satisfy'd, made use of all the Arts imaginablè at Nimwegen, to prolong the Treaty in order to break it. But this dangerous Drift of theirs was soon discern'd by the French, and not without some Concern; for they best knew what was to be apprehended from the present Disposition of England; and it was never their Design to continue the War, with that additional Strength against them. In order, therefore, to obviate the Mischiefs, they first dispatch'd a Courier to their Embassadors at Nimwegen, with leave to satisfy the States in those Clauses of their Treaty wherein they seem'd to except justly against Mr. Beverning's Conduct, and thereby cover the Credit of that Minister, who had been so effectual an Instrument in bringing about the Accommodation; as also to lessen a little of the Rigour they had hitherto exercised in the smallest Points contended by the Spaniards: Their next Shade of Complaisance, was to remit all the Points in Dispute to the Arbitrage of the States; as Spain had already done to the Arbitrage of the States and England.—And finally, assuming an Air of Generosity, they even departed from their Pretensions, without any Arbitrage at all. All which were such full and satisfactory Indications of the most Christian King's Sincerity, in his late Advances toward a Peace, that it had all the Effect design'd by it. The several Towns and Provinces proceeded with a general Concurrence to the Ratifications of the Peace, that they might lie ready in their Embassador's Hands to be exchange'd when that of Spain should be sign'd. Mr. Beverning, now favour'd, says Sir William Temple, with a Lie Gale from home, the Humour of the Country blowing the same way with his own Dispositions, and seconded with the great Facilities that were given by France, made such a Dispatch of Words and Forms, which were, in a manner, all that remain'd to be fetted, that on the 20th of September, N.S. the Peace was sign'd: And thereupon the Dutch Ratifications were exchange'd, agreeable to the Declaration before made by the States: As all these Measures were apparently counter to those of England, Sir Leoline Jenkins had no Part in them: The Office of Mediator was, therefore, supply'd by the Ministers of the States; who had the (3) Treaty sign'd at their House, and were particularly careful, that no Disputes about the Ceremonial should blow up their Hopes at the Moment of Execution.

(1) The five principal articles were these: 1. That, in the Peace, the French King should be the Protector of the States. 2. That the Neutrality, to which the States-General were oblig'd by that Treaty, was indefinite, and by Consequence might be extended beyond the present War. 3. That he had executed his Commission, in having oblig'd the States to withdraw the Neutrality of Spain. 4. That he had omitted an Article of Amnesty and Oblivion, which ought mutually to be figur'd in all Treaties of Peace. And lastly, That he had forgot to mention the Barrier, which the French King granted to Spain, in Consideration, and for the Security, of the States-General.

(2) 1. That there be a firm and lasting Peace between the two Crowns.

2. All Contraventions, however they happen to be committed, to be faithfully repaired on both sides.

3. All Cases of Enmity, and Misunderstanding to be for ever extinguish'd.

4. Charities, Bishops, Arch-Bishops, and Clergy, with all their Appurtenances and Dependances, to be restor'd to Spain.

5. The City and Duchy of Limburg, &c. Country of Ostemburg, Ghes, Part of Rodanus, Country of Wass, Leuze, St. Ghisain, &c. and Paderick in Catillon, with all their Appurtenances, to be restor'd to the King of Spain.

6. No Pretension to be made for ever by France to any of them.

7. Other Places taken during the War, in whatever Part of the World, to be mutually restor'd; and all to be faithfully perform'd on either part.

8. All judicial Proceedings, during the French King's Possession of those Places, to remain firm; yet capable of a Review.

9. Fort Fribourg, part of the Fort of Nancy, Dien, and the Sinners of Nevers, to remain to his Catholic Majesty.

10. The French King to remain possessor of the Strasbourg, Alsace, Valentinus, Bourbon, Comte, Cambray, Cambrésis, Artois, St. Omer, Tournay, Combray, Wargemont, Papillon, Bellain, Cuffin, Wouvi, and Maubeuge, with their Dependances, and all Civil and Religious Rights therein, for ever; the King of Spain renouncing all Claim thereunto.

11. Charlemagne to be restor'd to Spain, upon condition the Bishop of Leige make a Cession of Dinant to France.

12. Exchanges to be made of some Lands about the Sambre, for others, for mutual Convenience; as also, of the Village of Verger of Meuse, Provostship of Meuse, &c.

13. Commissioners to be appointed for settling the Limits.

14. No Custom-houses to be appointed, or Duties exacted, for passing one another.

15. The French King to carry away all the Artillery, &c. from the Places restor'd.

16. Contributions to continue till the Tenth of October.

17. Arrears of Profit due to the French King, from the Places restor'd, at the time of Relinquish to be paid him.

18. All Papers, Writings, &c. particularly those taken out of the Citadel of Givet, and Chamber of Loffe, to be restor'd.

19. Subjects on each side to be restor'd in their Rights, as before the War; Debts regulat'd in the same manner; and Ecclesiastical Benefices, confer'd during the War, to remain in the present Possessors, but without Prejudice to the Right of lawful Collation.

20. No Part of the Pyrenean Treaty is intended to be revok'd hereby, save what concerns Potenza; nor of that of St. la Chapelle, but what is alter'd hereby.

21. The King of Spain engages to be neutral in respect to his Allies.

22. The time Period comprehend'd in this Treaty, is in that between France and Holland.

Difficulties between the Emperor and France.

Spain delays the Exchange of their Ratifications.

The French ravage Flanders.

To close on this tedious, and intricate Affair for good and all, tho' by Anticipation as to order of Time, it appears, That, tho' these separate Bargains of Spain and Holland, left the Ministers of the Emperor at Nimeguen, fullen, and those of Denmark and Brandenburg, enrag'd, those of the States had still Credit enough with the Allies to keep the Conferences on foot; and Sir Lodovick Jenkins had Orders to resume his Function; tho' Sir William Temple observes, that the remaining Part he had in the Affair, was rather that of a Messenger than an Embassador. A general Suspension of Arms was the first Measure solicited; but France rais'd so many Objections on one hand, and made such great Preparations on the other, to attack the Empire, under the Pretence of forcing them into the Terms they had preferib'd for the Peace, and thereby gave so great Terror to the Princes of the Rhine, who lay first expos'd to the Fury of their Arms, that those Princes sent in great Haste to the States, demanding to be included in the Peace, by virtue of an Article therein, which gave them Liberty, within six Weeks, to extend the Benefit of it to such as they should name for their Allies. But France, now deliver'd from her Apprehensions of England, again resum'd the (9) Master, and would hearken to no other Interpretation of this Clause, than as it related to the Emperor and Empire in a Body. On the other hand the Imperial Embassadors profess'd a Readiness to negotiate Terms of Peace, but protest'd against the having them impos'd as Laws. France demanded the Re-establishment of the Treaties of Westphalia, with free Passage for their Troops, whenever they found it necessary for the putting it in Execution. The Emperor agreed to the first, but refus'd the last. France also insisted, that by the Treaty of Munster, ten Towns in Alsace were to be dependent on that Crown, and the Imperialists both deny'd the Authority, and refus'd to comply with the Demand.

Spain, in the mean time, seem'd determin'd to wait the Issue of this Dispute before she would accept of the full Benefit of her late Treaty, by an Exchange of the Ratifications. Twice the Term allotted was suffered to elapse, and as often it was renew'd at the Instance of the States: But during this unhappy Interval, the French Troops made Incursions into the richest Parts of Flanders, and which had till that time been best cover'd, and there exacted such great Contributions, and made such Ravages, where they were disputed, that the Spanish Netherlands were more ruin'd between the signing of the Peace, and the Exchange of the Ratifications, than during the whole Course of the War.

Such insupportable Calamities call'd aloud for Remedy; and Peace was now become the only one: All Hope from England was cut off: The Emperor and Empire found themselves no Match for France: The Dutch could only assist with their good Offices, with which they interpos'd at Nimeguen with great Solitude: Tho' Spain had made such bold Experiments on the Peace, she durst not renew that of the War: And France, in the End, for a Day for the Acceptance of her Terms, on the Penalty of raising them much higher if they were refus'd.

Thus cruelly beset both Branches of the House of Austria found themselves, at last, under a Necessity to submit to what they had so long struggled to avoid: And as ill a Figure as they made with respect to the War, England made with respect to her Mediation. In the two former Treaties she had voluntarily avoided all Concern; and in this, when she offer'd her Service, it was, in Effect refus'd; for the Imperialists would not yield the Precedency, and the English Embassador would not sign without it.

As to the Concerns of the poor Duke of Lorraine (who had acted so noble a Part in the War, and had such high Pretensions on the Peace, both from his own Rights, and the many repeated Declarations of all the Confederates in his Favour) of the two Alternatives that were laid before him by France, both were so extremely injurious, that his high Spirit could stoop to neither. Of the Article as it stood in the general, of being restor'd to his Duchy, with the Exception of Nancy, he did indeed, at first, accept: But when it appear'd that his Duchy was to be dismember'd of several considerable Portions, and that the rest would be subjected wholly to the Discretion of the French, who insist'd upon great Spaces of Ground to be left them in Propriety, quite cross the Country, for the March of their Armies, whenever and wherever there should be Occasion; he disdain'd to authorize so dishonourable a Prescription, or to hold his Inheritance at the Courtesy of his Enemy.

The

(9) In a Letter from Sir William Temple to Sir Joseph Williamson, dated Dec. 1678, is the following Passage:

"Mrs. Barrow, who is at Amsterdam, and was deep in the Cabal of promoting the Peace, writes plainly, That he expects nothing from that (the French) Court, upon any of their Pretensions: That they were grown so insolent, with their Prosperity, and the ill Volure of all their Neighbours, as not to trouble themselves with going Raxions, or receiving them, upon any thing they treated. To this, in general, he writes two Propositions, that were something more surprising: The first was, that Mr. Pensey had told him, that the King his Master had order'd him to take notice of the Peace, having turned out the Catholic Magistrates at Madrid, and put in Protestants in their room, as a thing contrary to his Treaty with the States. The second, that Mr. de Louvois had told him, upon Discourse of the remaining Contributions of Breiss, that the King his Master had heard what the Prince of Orange had said to the States, in the Declarations upon that Matter: Et le trouvent mauvais, & que le Prince veut parler ses sermens. Upon the first Point, the States Deputies thought fit to discharge the Prince, by taking upon themselves what he had only acted by their Orders, and to defend their having refused nothing contrary to the Treaty; or innovated any thing in matter of Religion at Madrid: But that, on the other side, the French had no Right to concern themselves in what the States did in the Government of a Town, which was now become again their own. Upon the second Point, which touch'd only the Prince, his Highness said, that tho' the States knew he had never spoke any thing upon that Occasion, which might deserve that Term, yet he was of Opinion, no Answer should be made upon it: That he was born in a free Republic, and that he had so continued hitherto; he could not tell how long it might do so, at the rate they were now treated; but that, while he liv'd in it, he would, according to his Duty, give his Advice, and speak his Opinion, freely in it, without giving Account to any of what he said, but to God alone."

The Peace of the Norb is all that now remains to be spoke of; which was also adjusted on such Terms as France thought fit to exact: Denmark and Brandenburg, at first, broke out into passionate Complains of being thus deserted; and declared in very strong Terms, they would defend what they had conquer'd from the Suedes in Germany. But no sooner did the French Troops march into the Territories of the last of these two Princes, than both made what Haste they could to finish their separate Treaties; and upon the Payment of certain Sums of Money agreed on, deliver'd up all they had gain'd in the War to the Crown of Sweden; which, together with the Subsidies they had receiv'd in exchange for the Blood of their Countrymen, was all the Equivalent that Kingdom could procure, for contributing so fatally, both to herself and her Neighbours, to the Aggrandisement of the Power of France.

Thus ended this calamitous War, which took its rise from the joint Designs of England and France to lay the Republic of Holland in Ruins; and which serv'd equally to illustrate the Power of the one, and the Influence of the other; but in a very different Manner: The Power of France was made manifest by its mighty Effects: The Influence of England more by the Expectations it rais'd, than the Good it produc'd. France was under such a rational Direction as shew'd the Soul was equal to the Body: But from the Conduct of England, it became a political Doubt, whether she was under the Direction of any rational Principle at all. No Opportunity, however fair and inviting, was of use to England: And France suffer'd none, of whatever Completion, to escape. Thus if France became odious to all Europe, she became also terrible; at the same time that England became both odious and contemptible. In a word, whatever France should think fit to attempt, it was presum'd England would connive at: And the inglorious Supineness of the last, was held almost as dangerous to the System of the World, as the mischievous Activity of the first.

But not even the (r) Peace itself, could put an End to the Entrenchments of France. Under the Pretence of Dependances on the Places, already in her Possession, and the right of Decency, they form'd such Claims, and pursu'd them by such imperious Methods, both against the Empire and the Spaniards, as render'd their Acquisitions after the Peace, at least in consequence, greater than those they had made by the War: Not only great Tracts of Country, but Strasbourg and Luxemburg falling Sacrifices to their Ambition; and not one of the Neighbouring Powers presuming to interpose for the Relief of the Sufferers.

We must now confine ourselves to our own immediate Affairs; and before we can again pursue our Subject Matter, in order as it lies, it is necessary to bring forward such Points, as we have hitherto left unnoticed.

In more than one Walk of our History, in the Duke of Monmouth hath cross'd us; in the striking Character of a brave Officer, who, as a Soldier, had serv'd and receiv'd the Applauses of all Europe. We are now to enlarge on those other Circumstances and Features which compose the Figure, and describe the Situation of this belov'd, presuming, gallant, unhappy Man.

All know he was the eldest natural Son of King Charles, by one Mrs. Walters, otherwise Barlow, and that he was beyond Comparison of all his Sons the dearest to him: His Person was amiable, his Manner captivating, and he made the happiest Use imaginable of both, to render Entrenchments of France after the Peace.

Some Account of the Duke of Monmouth.

(r) The Forms of the Meditation were continu'd at Niamego till August 1679, when Sir Lucius Yorket left that Place; and it ought to be remember'd to his Honour, that as his good Offices had not been effectual, and as he thought France, in particular, had not behav'd well to the King his Master, he absolutely refus'd any Present from that, or indeed any other Quarter. The Conference on that Occasion (says the Writer of his Life) between Sir Lucius and Mr. Colbert, the French Ambassador, was so generous and unbecoming on both Sides, that I cannot forbear giving it a Place here. A Day or two after the signing of the Peace, Mr. Colbert came to Sir Lucius's House, and after a long Practice, full of Respect and Reverence to his Majesty, for his intricate Care and Zeal in bringing about the general Peace by the means of his Mediation; and concluding with an honourable Mention of the Peace taken by his Majesty's Messengers there, and in particular by Sir Lucius, who had assist'd so much more than his Colleagues, took out two little Cases, wherein he had were the Pillars of his King (a very large and rich Jewel of Diamonds) and said, "That he had it in charge from his Master, to deliver him the one for himself, as a Mark of the King his Master's Esteem for his Person and Merit, and to convey the other into his Hands for Sir William Temple, then absent." Sir Lucius's Answer was full of Respect to his majesty's Majesty, and of the great Acknowledgment that was due to him, for designing to think of him; and how much he was oblig'd to Mr. Colbert and his Colleagues, for making so favourable a Report of him; that he should look upon the Present as an infinite Honour intended him; but desired to be excus'd from receiving it, and would be content with the Honour of being thought worthy of it by so great a Prince. Mr. Colbert reply'd upon him with all the Civility and Complaisance that could be; but Sir Lucius detain'd himself from receiving of the Presents. Where Mr. Colbert saw he was in earnest, he used many Arguments to induce his Acceptance of it, "from the common Usage of all Kings and Princes, especially of the Kings of England, to give Presents to Embassadors; from the Practice in all other Treaties of a general Peace; and from the particular Example of the Pope's Nuncio, in that very Treaty who, tho' a Churchman of great Rank and Quality, and had serv'd but a short time in the Function of Mediator, yet had receiv'd the King his Master's Presents."

To this Sir Lucius answer'd, "That he had the greatest Regard that could be to all those Uses, and was far from presuming himself to be in the right; but that he had some little Examples of his own, which he did not know how otherwise to satisfy, but by withholding his Hands from so great a Present, which he was sensible he had no Pretence to deserve." Then Mr. Colbert told him, "He was sure the King his Master would be greatly offended with his Refusal." But still Sir Lucius pleas'd himself, by repeating to him, "that he was too low an Object for the Displeasure of so great a Prince." When he saw Sir Lucius was resolv'd not to take the Jewel, he told him, "It was a Mortification to himself in particular, to see his Master's Present refus'd; and that he would write to Mr. Bavillon, to complain of him at Court; and doubted not, but that, upon his Motion, his Majesty would be pleas'd to lay his Commanda upon him to receive it." To this Sir Lucius answer'd, "That he should always have a perfect Obedience for his Majesty in all things; yet hoped that his Majesty, who best knew how little worthy he was of it, would judge it a sufficient Honour, that he had such a Present offer'd him, without his presuming to take it."

At last Mr. Colbert put up the Case, and said he would send it to Mr. d'Arques at the Hague, to remain in his Hand (for that he himself should go from hence before Mr. Bavillon's Answer could come) in the end it might be there ready for him, when the King's Injunctions should be laid upon him to receive it.

But tho' the King's Injunctions were accordingly apply'd for, and obtain'd, Sir Lucius persist'd in his Refusal notwithstanding.

render himself gracious in the Eyes of the People; and with such fatal Success, that they almost ador'd him: As he was naturally vain as well as rash, he was charm'd to find himself their Idol, and greedily accepted the Incense that was offer'd to him. No doubt he had also his Flatterers, who made their Court to him by nourishing his vainglorious Humour; and as for the deep Designers, they presently discern'd, and resolv'd to make their Advantage of it: It does not appear that even the King, himself, who could be no Stranger to it, took any Pains to mortify it, at least on its first Appearance: On the contrary, whether out of Affection to an Object he had been us'd to love, or out of Policy to form a sort of Balance to the Power and Credit of his Brother, whom he certainly fear'd, we find him indulging the Weakness he should have restrain'd. He took care to marry him to the Heiress of the House of Buckleigh, one of the greatest Fortunes in Europe. He made him Captain of his Guard, Master of the Horse, and Lord-General of his Forces: And not only suffer'd him to make use of all Opportunities to signalize himself, but seem'd delighted with the Praises bestow'd upon him. The very Times themselves could scarce fail to inspire him with Ambition; and encourag'd, if they did not authorise, him to grasp at Power, by any Means, how extravagant soever. The presumptive Heir to the Crown grew every Day more and more obnoxious to the Public; and rather endeavour'd to secure his Power than recover his Popularity. A Faction was, already, form'd against the Court, which had great Strength in itself, and much Credit with the People. This Opposition made their Court to him; and he thought it for his Interest, as well as his Reputation, to be at their Head. Thus qualify'd, circumstanc'd, and favour'd, a swifter Man than he might, like him, have dreamt of a Throne, and wak'd on a Precipice.

In the preceding Year, to lift him as high in Power as Opinion, an Attempt was made to procure him the Lieutenantancy of Ireland, in the Room of the Earl of Essex; and as his Attachment to the Party was not then, perhaps, understood, both the Duches of Portsmouth, and the Lord Treasurer, Danby, were his Advocates with the King, who was of himself strongly dispos'd to gratify them.

This alarm'd the Duke of York exceedingly; who began already to apprehend something of Rivalship, and who did not care that the young Spark should thus get a taste of Sovereignty, and become Master of the whole Power of that Kingdom to support his Pretensions on Occasion.

In order, therefore, to divert what he had so much reason to fear, his Highness made a Plea of the Merits and Services of the Duke of Ormond (which had been so long forgot) and who alone could stand in Competition with his Grace of Monmouth, to influence the King, to set aside the Latter, and to procure the Former to be reinstated in that great Employment. And so great was his Ascendancy over the Spirit of his Majesty, that he gave way to his Influences against his own Affections; and the Duke of Ormond was, accordingly, reinstated: The King, after his frank manner, declaring to those about him, upon that Occasion: "I have done all I can to disoblige that Man (Ormond) and to make him as discontented as others; but he will not be out of Humour with me; he will be loyal in spite of my Teeth: I must ev'n take him in again, and he is the fittest Person to govern Ireland."

As the Duke of Ormond's Character was above Censure in the Article of Religion, it was, without question, a very wise Measure to take Advantage of his great Ability and unreserv'd Loyalty in such turbulent and suspicious Times; and it appears his Conduct as a Delegate, was every way answerable to the high Trust repos'd in him: Not knowing, says his Historian, how soon there might be Occasion for the Army in that Kingdom, he made it his Business to put it into a Condition to serve his Majesty either there, or in any other Part of his Dominions; as also to provide for their Pay, out of the standing Revenue, and in the best Manner he could, for the Security of the Kingdom.

Tho' some Governments are more happily constituted than others, all are good or bad as they are ill or well administr'd: The worst, in good Hands, becomes tolerable; the best, in bad Hands, becomes a Grievance. The two Vicegerents of Scotland and Ireland, the Dukes of Ormond and Lauderdale, had the same Point in View; but they took very different Means to compass it. Ormond in maintaining the King's Authority, maintain'd also the Laws, and exchange'd Protection for Obedience. Lauderdale, on the contrary, made Terror the Companion of Power, and would have the King's Will and Pleasure illimitable, that nobody might dare to dispute his own. Hence the Enthusiasts of Scotland groan'd under Oppressions on one hand; and breath'd out Rage and Resentment on the other; whilst the Papists of Ireland were rode with to loose a Rein, and so easy a Saddle, that they scarce felt the Bit, or the Weight of the Rider: And hence one Administration reflected the Graces and Benefits of Monarchy, and the other its Mischiefs and Deformities.

But all Objects, tho' equally within the Command of the Eye, do not make an equal Impression on the Mind: And hence the Horrors which arose from the calamitous State of Scotland, were fresh in the Memory, when the Ease and Quiet of Ireland were forgot.

All the Advocates for this Reign bear witness unanimously, that the Malcontents entertain'd Designs not to reform, but to destroy the Government: But those Advocates are extremely careless at the same time, not to mention any of those notorious Oppressions, which, tho' exercis'd in one Kingdom only, lent Countenance and Authority to the Suspicions and Fears of another.

We have already, in part, shewn how ill the Duke of Lauderdale deserv'd the great Character given of him by Mr. North: We are now to have recourse again to our Manu-

Affairs of Scotland.

A. D. 1678. script, call'd, A Leaking-glass for ENGLAND, where we find the following amazing Particulars; which serve yet farther to illustrate his Merits and Services.

His Grace had made a Visit to his Provinces in 1667; and all at once affected a Disposition to be all Goodness and Mercy to the Presbyterians. His Dukes also wore the like Countenance; and both made such Advances, as gave those persecuted People room to flatter themselves, that their Day of Grace was come. This sudden Alteration was owing both to public and private Views, Lady Lauderdale had it in her Head to marry her (s) Children into the richest Families of the Party, and thought it necessary to clear her way, by opening to them a Prospect of Favour: But the Duke's Design lay deeper, and to carry it on with Success, he chose the President of the Session for his Tool, who in 1650, had join'd in the Remonstrance against the King; in 1662, resign'd his Judge's Place, rather than renounce the Covenant, and who profess'd still to be of that Sect, tho' a great Scandal to his Profession. This Man's Wife was also in the Secret, and both made it their Business to carry on a Treaty of Accommodation, which his Grace gave out he was desirous of.

This no sooner became public, than it produc'd two natural Effects. The Bishops were alarm'd and angry, and the People so pleas'd and satisfi'd, that, without waiting till their Peace was formally and circumstantially made, they trusted to Appearances, and crowded to the Conventicles with little or no Reserve. The Bishops upon this grew more furious than ever; they made their Complaints with as much Bitterness as Zeal: According to them, these wicked Conventicles were the Nurseries and Seed Plots of Rebellion: And Persecution in all its Rigour was to be let loose against them.

Finding by these and the like meek and Christian-like Insurgitions, that the Reverend Fathers were ripe to go any Lengths with him in his way, if he would do the same in theirs, his Grace, all at once, laid aside the Mask; adopted these charitable Sentiments of the Prelates, and devoted those who had so credulously thrown themselves on his Mercy, to all the Mischiefs, that the most extravagant Abuse of Power could bring upon them.

But to countenance these Seventies, he first trumps up a Deposition of one in Ireland, either feign'd or suborn'd, says our Author, which was given out as the Discovery of a Plot: And henceforward, the Field Meetings were call'd Rendezvous; and such an Alarm was spread both in England and Ireland, (t) that Troops from both Kingdoms were order'd to march towards the Borders, as if a Rebellion was on the point of breaking out.

The Scots were amaz'd at these Proceedings: They had, indeed, taken Advantage

A. D. 1678. of the late Shew of Indulgence, to worship God openly, after their ridiculous Fashion; but they had, in all other Respects, been as passively obedient, as the most courtly of all Court Chaplains could have required them to be. Bishop Burnet also, who is free to declare, "That Conventicles grew in the West to an insufferable Pitch; and that they had generally with them a Troop of armed and desperate Men, that drew up and sent Parties out to secure them;" yet adds, "When their Sermons were done, they dispers'd themselves; and there was no violent Opposition made at any time to the Execution of the Law."

If it is urg'd, that these armed Meetings were certainly illegal, and might prove dangerous: It may with equal Justice be reply'd, That the very Law they offended was a Grievance: That no Government whatever either can or ought to have any Dominion over the Conscience: That all Penalties to enforce Obedience, in such Cases, are Instruments of Torture; and that the first great Dictate of Nature, Self-Preservation, also warrants Self-Defence.

To observe something of Method, even when resolv'd to proceed to Extremities, the Orders of Council were first issued to the several Shires, requiring the Hereticks, or Landholders, in his Majesty's Name, to take such Course with these Delinquents, as might secure the Peace; who reply'd, That they would engage for the Security of the Peace, but could not undertake for the suppressing of Conventicles, without depriving themselves of their Tenants and Servants, and consequently of their own Subsistence.

This Answer, however, was not only held unsatisfactory, but was made the Pretence for giving out Commissions for the raising and arming the Highlanders, and letting them loose to live at Discretion on those miserable Enthusiasts, who ought rather to have been consider'd as Lunatics than Malefactors. And that Posterity may know what an arbitrary Spirit could prompt, and what a blind and undistinguishing Loyalty has undertaken to defend, a Copy of the said Commission, which contains a Summary of the Disease, as well as prescribes the Remedy, is here inserted verbatim:

"CHARLES, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; To all and sundry Officers:

"For as meikle as our Royal Government has been of late much affronted, and the Peace of this our ancient Kingdom much disquieted, by irregular flocking to Field-Conventicles, those Nurseries of Rebellion, by withdrawing from public Worship, invading the Person and Pulpits of the Orthodox Clergy, building of Meeting-houses, the killing, wounding, and inceding, of some who were commanded, in our Name,

"Name, to suppress the said Insolences; we have thought fit, in maintenance of our Laws, and out of that tender Care which we have always had of this our ancient Kingdom, to require and empower the Lords of our Privy Council, to call together, not only our standing Forces, and those of our Militia; but likewise we did warrant them to commissionate and empower such Noblemen, and others, as did offer to bring any of their Vassals, Tenants, and Adherents, to the Assistance of our Forces: And therefore we, with express Advice of the Lords of our Privy Council, do hereby empower and require - - - to convocate and draw together the Gentlemen and Heritors of - - - who are to march under his Command, on Horseback; and to convocate and raise the Highlanders in the said Bounds, and others under his Command, within his Lands, Property, or Superiority; and to form them into Regiments, Troops, and Companies, as he shall think fit; and to do every other thing necessary for raising and forming them, as said is: And they being so raised and formed, we authorize and command the said - - - to march with them to Sterling; and to be there upon Tuesday, being the 24th Day of January next: And in his and in their March, there to take Quarter for their Money; and to force Quarter for Money, in case the same be refused: And when they are arrived at the Town of Sterling, the Day aforesaid, we hereby command him and them to obey such Orders as shall be sent from our Privy Council, their Committee, or such Person or Persons as we, or the said Lords of our Privy Coun-

As in the Firmest the Nation was already in, it was reasonable to apprehend that such extravagant Measures as these would not fail to excite a suitable Resentment: That therefore, their Complaints might not even transpire, or, at least, that no Application might be made to the King to have them redress'd, a Proclamation was set forth, January 5, prohibiting the Nobility and others to withdraw from the Kingdom without special Licence in the following Words:

"And lest any Person should withdraw from the said Service by going out of this Kingdom, we, with the Advice of our Lords of our Council, do hereby require and command all Noblemen, Heritors, and Magistrates of Burges Royal (except actual Traffickers within Burges) to remain and continue within this Kingdom, and not to depart forth thereof upon any Pretext whatsoever, without special Licence from our Council, as they will be answerable at their highest Peril. Our Will is therefore, and we charge you strictly, and command, that incontinent these our Letters seen, ye pass to the Market Cross of Edinburgh and other Places needful, and thereat, in our Name and Authority, by open Proclamation, make Publication of the Premises, that none pretend Ignorance.

Nothing is more difficult, than to assign the real Motives of public Measures; and nothing is more unwarrantable, than to draw positive Conclusions from Matter of Suspicion and Conjecture only. But this is obvious, if an Administration had form'd a Plan to render a People desperate, in order to force them to a Rebellion, they could not have taken a more effectual Method, than by thus loading them with Oppressions, and cutting off all Possibility of their obtaining Satisfaction.

Our Manuscript observes, that tho' the Preamble of the King's Commission to raise the Highlanders, seems only levelled against the Dissenters; yet the Authority given therein, to take free Quarter, included all, and was

A. D. 1672 was accordingly exercis'd indifferently upon all: Which was indeed no more than was to be expected from Soldiers of any Sort, who are, at best, but ill Judges in religious Controversy, and from these above all others; as being alike Strangers to Religion and Civility, the Laws of God or Man: And yet such Savages as these were made the Champions of our establish'd Church, and the immediate Defenders of our Faith.

Those Words in the said Commission, Incauding the Pulpits of the orthodox Clergy, and those other Words, killing, wounding, &c. we are, moreover, told had no better Foundation, the first, than the Rashness of one hot-headed Pield-Precacher, who stepp'd into the Pulpit on a rainy Day, before the Curate came: And the last, than the Defence of one House, against the Endeavours that were us'd to force it, in order to apprehend an (u) inter-commun'd Person, in which some were wounded.

The hard Case of one Mitchell.

That the World might entertain a fill worse Opinion of these insatuated Wretches, this Crisis was made use of to bring on the Trial of one (w) Mitchel, a desperate Enthusiast, who, in July 1668, had made an Attempt to pistol Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, in his Coach, in resentment of his severe Persecution of himself in particular, and his Malignity against the whole Brotherhood; which appear'd at all times, upon all Occasions, and never more remarkably, than when he endeavour'd to postpone the gracious Effects of his Majesty's Pardon to those concern'd in the Rebellion at Penitland-bill; and which he actually did postpone, till many of the Delinquents were executed. This wicked Design of his, Mitchel's, did not however take effect; for at the Instant he fir'd, the Bishop of Orkney, then going into the Coach, receiv'd the Shot in his Arm: Mitchel thereupon made his Escape, and came no more to Edinburgh till the latter End of the Year 1673; soon after which he was apprehended by Sir William Sharp, and carry'd first before the Archbishop, and afterwards before the Privy-Council, and Duke Lauderdale, then Commissioner; who, after using all manner of Methods to bring him to a Confession, order'd him to the Beet, an Instrument of Torture at that time us'd in Scotland, which he underwent with a Fortitude worthy of a better Cause; and remaining still invincible, stood acquitted by the Law of Scotland, as well as the Civil Law. But in Feb. 1674, he was sent for again, before a Committee of Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor Rothes, the Duke of Lauderdale, Lord Halton, &c. who gave him to understand, that if he was the Assassin, he would do well to confess it, to prevent other innocent Persons from being put to the Torture: And,

A. D. 1672 as a farther Inducement, they offer'd him a Pardon, both as to Life and Limbs. And now he, who had flood the Storm, melted in the Sun-shine; and under the Umbrage, both of his former Acquittal, and the present Promise of Pardon, confess'd that he alone was answerable for that Villainy.

Having thus worm'd out the Secret; in contempt of all Faith and Honour, they put him on his Trial; in the expectation, says Bishop Burnet, that he would plead Guilty: But after the Libel, or Indictment, had been read, instead of repeating his Confession, he retracted it, any otherwise than as it was coupled with the Condition of Pardon: Upon which Sir John Nesbit, the King's Advocate, withdrew the Prosecution, and the Judges gave way to it.

His next Remove was to the Basse, a Rock in the Firth, where he continued a close Prisoner till about the time that the Commission for ruffing the Highlanders was given out, when he was remanded to Edinburgh, to be once more put within Reach of the Laws.

By this time, Sir John Nesbit had been turn'd out, for want of that Dexterity which is the sole Qualification for Business, where Courts expect to be oblig'd without Reserve: And Sir George Mackenzie, as before mention'd, was made King's Advocate in his room.

When his Trial came on, which was January 7, one whole Day was spent in reading the Libel, and discussing whether the Prisoner's Confession, before the King's Commissioner, &c. was judicial or extrajudicial; as also, whether in case it was made in Hope or in Promise of Pardon, he ought not to be acquitted: And whether by the Act for securing his Majesty's Privy Counsellors, an Attempt to assassinate the Archbishop, he being one of that Body, was capital or not. The next was taken up in the Deliberations of the Judges on these several Points; and the third, they gave their Opinions for the last and first in the Affirmative. After which the Jury was impannell'd and the Witnesses sworn, viz. The Bishop of Galloway, and Lord Halton, to prove the Confession; which they had no sooner done, but Mitchel call'd upon the very same Lord Halton, as also on the Lord Chancellor Rothes and the Duke of Lauderdale, to declare upon Oath, whether they did not induce him to make that Confession, on their promising and swearing to secure both his Life and Limbs; which they all, upon Oath, deny'd. He then appeal'd to the Council Registers, and mov'd that they might be brought into Court; but that was overrul'd, on the Duke of Lauderdale's urging, that this should have been done before they had been sworn; which was, by most present, understood to carry along with it

(u) We have an Epimastion of this Term in the following Passage out of Bishop Burnet's:

"Numbers were collin'd: And a Writ was issued out, that was indeed legal, but was seldom us'd, call'd inter-communing; because it made all that harbour'd such Persons, and did not force them, when they had it in their Power, to be involved in the same Guilt. (Vol. I. p. 399.)

(w) This Man's Story, as told by Bishop Burnet, is, I think, one of the best in that Author's two Volumes. But as it differs in some Points from our Manuscript, I have chosen to follow the last, notwithstanding; that the Reader may follow which Authority he thinks best.

it an Implication, that they were all forsworn.

In short, the Man was to be sacrific'd; and sacrific'd he accordingly was on the 18th of January following, tho' according to Bishop Burnet, "As soon as the Court broke up, the Lords went up Stairs, and to their Shame, found the Act (of Pardon) recorded, and sign'd by Lord Rethe, as President of the Council." The same Prelate adds, "That the Duke of Lauderdale, at last, relented, and would have reprieved him, till the King's Pleasure was known. But Sharp said, that was, upon the Matter, the exposing his Person to any Man that would attempt to murder him, since Favour was to be shewn to such an Assassin. Then said Duke Lauderdale, in an impious Jest, Let Mitchel glorify God in the Grate Market (the Place of Execution.) This Action, and all concern'd in it, the People look'd at with Horror; and it was such (x) a Complication of Treachery, Perjury, and Cruelty, as the like had not, perhaps, been known."

The Clergy, however, applauded it highly, as a Piece of signal Justice; and chose to have it thought, that Mitchel suffer'd for having attempted the Sacred Person, such was their Phrase, of an Archbishop; tho' nothing could be more notorious, than that the Law sentenc'd him, for having attempted the Sacred Person of a Prety Counsellor.

The great View of both Priest and Politician, by this Trial and Execution, seems to have been, to have fix'd the detestable Principles and Practices of this Desperado on the whole Body of (y) Dissenters, and thereby to have render'd them so odious, that none of any other Community might think them worthy of the Protection of the Law, or the Compassion due to Fellow-subjects and Fellow-creatures.

But a Proposition so extravagant, carried with it its own Confutation. Had the Roman Catholic Worship been made answerable for Ravillac's Paricide, or the Protestant for the Murder committed by Felton, both must have been extirpated, nay, the whole Christian Scheme, on the same Principle, must have sunk under the Enormities of its Professors.

This Tragedy was poisoner over; but the new-raisd Army, amounting to about eight thousand Men, was ordered to rendezvous at Sterling, whither they march'd with as much Parade and Solemnity, as if a foreign Enemy was actually at hand, or a Rebellion had already broke out; whereas there was not the least Appearance of either.

From Sterling they proceeded on to Glasgow, where they spread the Country round about for five or six Miles; and, tho' under the immediate Command of a Committee of Council, exercised all kinds of Hostilities, says our Author, on those who never resist-ed the Authority of a Constable; inasmuch, that the standing Forces, before quarter'd in the same Place, were, in Comparison to these, esteem'd Tutelar Angels.

In the Beginning of February, these authorized Banditti proceeded on to Ayre, scattering Terror before them, and leaving Desolation behind them; whereupon several of the Inhabitants chose rather to quit their Dwellings, than expose themselves to such Insults and Outrages as those of Glasgow had suffer'd; and which were so great and unsupportable, that, in a Months time, it was a Rarity to see a Plough at work for thirty or forty Miles together.

At the same time that the Country lay thus under the Ban of the Government, and suffer'd all the Severities of Military Execution, another new and strange Device to extort Security for the Subjects good Behaviour, kept pace with it; namely, That all the Land-holders of the Western Counties should enter into Bonds for themselves, their Wives, Children, Servants, Tenants, and all that liv'd on their Estates, that they would not go to Conventicles, nor harbour any vagrant Preachers, or any intercommun'd Person; and that they should live, in all Points according to Law, under the Penalty of the said Laws.

But as the Gentlemen, for the general, did not care to act under the Commission, fo, likewise,

(x) "And yet, continues the Bishop, Duke Lauderdale had a Chaplain, one Stick, afterwards Dean of Worcester, who publish'd a false and partial Relation of this Matter, in order to the justifying it." His Lordship adds, "That he took his Narrative from an authentic Record of the Trial, sign'd thro' every Page by the Clerk in Court."

(y) In our Manuscript, we find the following Plea given by the Seditious Presbyterians, for withdrawing from their Kirk, and returning to their Field-preachers:-

"That upon his Majesty's Restoration, and the Admittance of the Episcopal Government, most of their Pastors were turn'd out, and lockt put over them, to speak modestly, as had nothing in them to work upon their Auditors, or overcome their Prejudice conceiv'd in their Minds for the Innovation made upon their Education and Preaching, in the Presbyterial Principles; but were very ignorant and scandalous; so that being in a Struggle how they should justify before God, for the Neglect of their Souls, and the Vow they had made; and their Countenance, besides, checking them for mispending the Sabbath, and their precious Time, in Attendance upon such Popish Causes, he sent for the Charge they had taken upon them, they judg'd it their Duty to meet, and worship God, with their former Pastors, from whom they had receiv'd Banns and Intestations; and this they did, as first, in private Houses; but the Law made from time to time, to prevent such Meetings in private Houses, filling exceeding heavily upon those in whose Houses Meetings were discovered (that it was the Rob of many) they thought it better that every one should fulfil, equally, and, thereafoward, for several Years, they have held those Meetings in the Fields; and, in some Places, had built Sheds, to cover them from the Weather; and have met in them very quietly; the People of the Neighbourhood seeing them, by their constant Deportment, a serious and peaceable sort of People: And they hoped to have continued so, by the Careless that were given some of them by the Duke and Duchess, since their coming down; but, by they, we have reason now to apprehend he is putting his execution what we formerly suspected; occasioned when the Duke procur'd an Act to pass, giving the King Authority to change the Government of the Church, and to order all Ecclesiastical Persons and Matters as he pleas'd: So that if our King should ever prove a Papist, he may set up Papery by a Law. And the next Year, Duke Lauderdale's coming into Scotland, after the time that Milford had been at Devon, another severe Act pass'd, against all such as went not to Church; so which, with his own Head, he added a Proviso, That it should only reach Presbyterians; whereby the Papists are excepted from the Severity of it. Of these Acts, many, as well as the Disfranchisement, took much notice; and many galled whose Support he aim'd at, and whose Favour he courted, by that Exaltation of the Prerogative; and many will not be persuaded, but that the real Design of this Act is, to lay a sac Foundation for the Papist and arbitrary Government, by raising war, and driving hence, not only the Disfranchisement, but all such as cannot brook the Loss of their Liberties and Properties (by Bonds and Edicts of the Council, proceed only by such an insidious Favourite;) and by seizing on the Estates of such as shall be made Transgressors of the said Bonds and Edicts, the King's Treasury will be greatly augmented, for the Maintenance of the Duke and his Army."

likewise, they refus'd to enter into these Bonds, as being illegal, oppressive, and tending to expose them to certain and unavoidable Ruin. Those of Age, however, in hope of being delivered from their present Visitation, went so far as to offer the Security requir'd for themselves, their Wives and Children. But those in Power insist'd on the Bond in the (a) Form prescrib'd, nor would hear of the least Mitigation: And the Duke of Lauderdale, in particular, hearing on all Sides, how ill his System of Slavery was received, fell into such a Phrenzy, that he made bare his Arm to the Elbow, and swore, by Jehovah, he would make them enter into these Bonds.

[Burnet, v. i. p. 418.]

And what was yet more provoking than all, those who, to get rid of the present Evil, subscrib'd to the Bond, remain'd as miserable, tho' in a different way, as those who refus'd it: being oblig'd to turn off their Tenants and Servants to avoid the Penalties they incur'd by their Trespases. Thus many thousands were, in a few Weeks, forc'd to quit their Habitations; And that the Wretches, who fled from Persecution, might never get out of the Reach of it, an Order of Council was issued Feb. 13, requiring, that no Tenants, Servants, &c. thus dismiss'd, should be entertain'd, or set on any Man's Land, or in any Man's Service, without a Certificate from his former Master or Landlord, or the Minister of the Parish, signifying, That he had liv'd, in all respects, conformably to the Laws; and also declaring, that whoever should receive, or employ any such Tenants or Servants, without such Certificate of his good Behaviour should be liable to be FIN'D at the Pleasure of the said Privy Council.

Those who take, and stay who refuse them, equally wretched.

Three Days after this, viz. the (a) 14th, another Order of the Council was also publish'd; by which it was requir'd, that as well those who had subscrib'd, as those who had refus'd, the Bond, should be oblig'd to enact themselves (the Scottish Phrase) in the Council Books, that they themselves, their Wives, Children, Servants, and Tenants, should keep the King's Peace; that they should not go to Field Conventicles, nor commune with Rebels, or Persons intercommun'd; and that they should keep the Persons, Families and Goods to their regular Ministers harmless; and all this on Pain of forfeiting double the Value of every Man's yearly Rent, if he had any, or such other Penalties as the Privy Council should think fit, if he had none. It was also ordain'd that all such Persons as refus'd the said Bond, should be summon'd to make the said Entry in the Council Books, within six Days, after they received the said Summons, on Pain of being declar'd Rebels.

A. D. 1678.

Unable any longer to endure such a Series of Tyranny and Oppression under the awful Name of Government, the Duke of Hamilton, and several of the Nobility resorted to Edinburgh, in hope to bring their Lord Paramount to Reason, and to procure a Mitigation, at least, of their insupportable Grievances. To this End they presented a Remonstrance to the Council, shewing how unreasonable it was to require Men to expose themselves to Ruin, by taking upon them to be responsible for the good Behaviour of others. But all the Effect this produc'd, was a new Proclamation (March 8) commanding all those of the West, who had not taken the Bond, to depart the Town, and in three Days to repair to their respective Homes, under severe Penalties.

Several of the Nobility repaired to Edinburgh for Redress.

Are ordered home by Proclamation.

This again was follow'd by another of the 13th, requiring six more Counties, viz. Edinburgh, Shadington, Berwick, Lanthberon, Peebles, and Selkirk, to take the Bond; which was look'd upon as a Preparatory Step to the Army's shifting their Quarters; who, by this time, had (b) eat up all before them, and began to grow almost as hungry as the several Districts they had exhausted.

And to all these horrid Circumstances, Vol. i. p. 419. Bishop Burnet adds, "That when all other things fail'd to evidently (to force a (c) Rebellion)

(a) Which was as follows:

"I, _____, subscribing, do faithfully bind and oblige me, that I, my Wife, Burnet, and Servants, respectively, shall in no way be present at any Conventicles, and disorderly Meetings, at the time coming; but shall live orderly, in obedience to the Law, under the Penalties contained in the Acts of Parliament made thereunto: As also, I bind and oblige me, that my whole Tenants and Cottars, respectively, their Wives, Brides, and Servants, shall likewise refrain and abstain from the said Conventicles, and other illegal Meetings, not authorized by the Law; and that they shall live orderly, in obedience to the Law: And further, that I, nor they, shall receipt, supply, or committ, with forc'd Persons, intercommuned Ministers, or vizard Preachers; but shall do our utmost Endeavours to apprehend their Persons: And in case my said Tenants, Cottars, and their forefolds, shall contract, or take, or apprehend any Person or Persons guilty thereof, and prefer them to the Judges-ordinars, that they may be fined, or imprisoned, thereto, as is provided in the Acts of Parliament made thereunto; otherwise I shall remove them and their Families from off my Ground. And if I shall fail herein, I shall be liable to such Penalties as the said Delinquents have incurred by the Laws: Consenting to the Replication hereof in the Books of his Majesty's Privy Council, or Books of any other Judges competent, that Letters and Executions may be serv'd thereupon in form, as aforesaid, and continue in my Proclamations."

(b) On this Day (St. Paulinus's) says Burnet, Duke Lauderdale, and his Party, instead of driving Ministers, drove Episcopos, on the Proclamation, that no man should use cause a Rebellion; and that they should enrich themselves with the Forfeitures.

(c) Our Manuscript affirms, "That they not only forc'd free Quarter, but Ex-posto, captive prize, and often a heavy price for them: That, in many Places, they carried 20 Quarters for Men they had not; and sometimes had whole Parishes under Contribution: As that of Berwick, for Instance, where they levy'd 120 Six-pences, for but two or three Days Exemption."

(d) Correspondent with this Opinion of the Bishop, our Author writes as follows:

"Thus you see, here is a War levell'd, and whole Counties rais'd, without any real Provocation: For if such circumstantial Disorders, arising only from Nonconformity, shall be made the Causes of War, there can never be any settled Peace in any Country: Besides, 'tis unreasonable; and we have several old Statutes, which require the King's Subjects should be govern'd by Law, and not by Force of Arms."

Was not many Months ago, this very Council order'd, that the Laws should be regularly executed, and that no Bloods should be taken for Obedience, seeing that the Laws were sufficiently binding: Yet are their Forces rais'd, and Bonds impos'd of an unusual strain, upon pain of quartering, flogging, and imprisoning, and being declar'd Rebels: And at this same Time, Lauderdale's Pretence of advancing the King's Authority, and securing the Peace; when, in truth, they are but his own Passions and Humours, which he will have, tho' he expose the King's Authority to the Scandal and Contempt of the whole Kingdom: Sure he would never finish things, to this pitch, were it not to split the bell of the bellion) Recourſe was had to a Writ, which a Man, who ſuſpects another of ill Deſigns towards him, may ſerve him with; and it was call'd Law Barrumb, as moſt uſed in Burroughs. This lay againſt a whole Family; the Maſter was anſwerable, if any of his Houſhold broke it: So, by a new Preſence, this Writ was ſerv'd upon the whole Country at the King's Suit; and upon ſerving the Writ, Security was to be given much like the binding Men to their good Behaviour. Many were put into Priſon for reſuſing this Security.

Duke of Hamilton, &c. to London,
to ſolicit Redress.

The Grievances of the Country growing thus intupportable, and no Proſpect appearing of Redreſs or Deliverance, the Duke of Hamilton, accompany'd with ſeveral Noblemen and Gentlemen, went on from Edinburgh to London, with their Remonſtrances; on the Preſumption, that the King would ſhew no Countenance to the Enormities committed in his Name: But his Maſtey not only reſuſ'd to ſee them, becauſe they were come up in contempt of a Proclamation (tho' that very Proclamation was one of the Points they had to complain of) but was prevail'd on to ſend down the following Letter to the Scottiſh Privy Council; which gives ſo expreſs an Approbation of all their Proceedings, and that in ſuch extravagant Terms, as nothing but a Copy of the (a) Record itſelf could render credible, viz.

“ CHARLES R.

“ Right truſty and well beloved Couzens and Councillors; right truſty and well beloved Councillors, we greet you well: We underſtood the Inſolence of the diſorderly ſhires, and a great part of your Progreſs in reducing them to their Duty, before your Letter, dated the 16th of March, came to our hand; for their Irregularities make ſo much Noiſe, and are ſo destructive to our Intereſt, that we admire how any of our Subjects ſhould think (as your Letter intimates ſome do) that what we (who take ſo much Pain to know the Affairs of Scotland, both from our extraordinary Affections to that our ancient Kingdom, and becauſe of the frequent Repreſentations that have been made to us) do, for ſecuring the Peace there, proceed merely from the Suggellions of our

Council, and Want of true Information, ſince all have had open Acceſs to us. And we have heard, of late Years, many of our Subjects in that Kingdom fully and patiently, whilst they endeavour'd, by weak Reaſons, to juſtify to us the Occaſion of their differing from our Miniſters, and oppoſing our Authority: Nor could we have expected that thoſe who have ſo often our Authority, and given ſuch ill Example to our Subjects, and have caſt off the Principles of all Government, could have dar'd to think, that we may yet have approv'd of their rebellious Courſes. And to let you further know our Reſentment, we do thank you very heartily for your careful Proſecution of what we recommended to you in our Letter, dated the 11th of December laſt. And after Peruſal of your Commissions and Inſtructions (which we have ſign'd to ſhew that they were compar'd by us with our ſaid Letter) we approve of your ſending our Forces, and of the Commissions given by you to thoſe Noblemen that have their Intereſt in the Highlands, and to thoſe given to the Militia of Horſe and Foot, and to kill ſuch as ſhould oppoſe our Authority by Arms, for the ſuſtaining Field Conventicles, which we, as well as our Laws, think the Renderwouſes of Rebellion; and the reſuſing to ſuppreſs them, did juſtly oblige you to look upon theſe ſhires as in a State of Rebellion, in which theſe and ſeveral Courſes are neceſſary and unavoidable, and are very gentle in reſpect of thoſe Miſdoings that follow'd lately in the like Beginnings. We approve likewiſe of that Bond preſented to our Subjects, in which, after ſerious Peruaſal, we ſee no Cauſe of Diſcontent to any who reſolve to live peaceably; and for ſubſcribing whereof, we are very well ſatisfy'd with our Judicatories. And ſince all our Judges and all the learned Lawyers in that our Kingdom have ſubſcribed the ſame; we muſt, and our PEOPLE SHALL ſee, that ſuch as call it illegal do ſo, merely from the Principle of Faction and Humour. We are alſo well pleaſed that the ſame Bond ſhould be offered to all landed Perſons and Magiſtrates within our Kingdom, without any Exception, that we may thereby know how each of them ſtands to our Government; and you juſtly obſerve, that the moſt powerful the Nobility and Gentry (that will not conform to his Dictate) that they deſign nothing but Sedition; and, by degrees, if it were poſſible, to cauſe ſome Diſturbances; and then hope, by a rule, unſuſpected Rebellion, to juſtify all he hath done: And ſuch a Rebellion may be ſoon ſuppreſs'd, and afford much Frey out of the tormented Kingdom, to him and his Partners. This, many believe, is Part of the Deſign; and they are as careful to guard againſt it, as he it ſelf to provoke it.”

(2) Our Manuſcript ends with this extraordinary Piece, which the Author of it introduces with the following Reflections.

“ In ſine, you perhaps will wonder, why there hath been no greater Appearance againſt the Duke of Lauderdale; and that he is not accuſed for theſe Tranſgreſſions, that ſeem ſo enormous?”

To this I anſwer, To whom ſhall he be accuſed? The Parliament of England cannot take cogiſſance, and judge of any thing, purely in Scottiſh Affairs; unleſs it entrencheth upon the Honour, Intereſt, and Safety of the King and this Kingdom; or concern'd in the Security of it, as it relates to foreign Invaſion: Neither doth the King fully underſtand our Laws and Conſtitution; and ſo would certainly put over any ſuch Occaſion, upon the Judicatories; now they being all conſtituted by Duke Lauderdale, who having been abſolute Miniſter, of all Scottiſh Affairs, for theſe ſeventeen Years, hath choſe all the Judicatories with his own Creatures; that any ſuch Accuſation would be ſo far from any juſt Entertainment, that were it never ſo true and clear, it would be call'd back on any ſhould offer it: But if the King will give us a free Parliament, and a fair, independent Comiſſioner, we ſhould not proceed againſt him, and many others, by common Name, or by Address, but by the fair and legal Way of Impeachment.

And if the King will but give the leaſt Inſinuation, that he deſires to be ſatisfy'd in theſe, and many other Particulars complain'd of; and that he will give a fair Hearing to his oppreſs'd Subjects; there would ſoon be hundreds at his Feet, to prove true, and many more.

But I muſt conclude, that beyond all my former Admiration of the Duke's Preſumption, the Letter he hath procured from his Maſtey, dated at Whitehall, 26 March 1678, exceeds all: It needs no Comment, 'tis Plain-dealing; and therefore I give you it as I have it.”

powerful should be most jealous. We approve, likewise, of that Legal Surety, which you call Lawsborough, and of your having settled Garrisons, and of the way taken by you for the providing of them; of which Garrisons, we think, none should complain who love our Government and the Peace of their native Country; since they are very necessary for both these Ends. And in those disorderly Shires, we approve, likewise, of your re calling the Freedom of those Burgeſſes as will not value their Magistrates according to Law; and of debarring those very few Advocates who did not compare, when they were cited by our Judges at that time the Bond was offered to those of their Society. These Courses being founded upon our Command, and taken for the common Interest of us and our People, WE OWN AS DONE BY US; And we hereby declare, that whatsoever Person or Judicatory shall offer to quarrel with any Person for being in Accession thereto, shall be punished as Murmurers against our Authority and Royal Prerogative. And for the Encouragement of all such as serve us, we declare, that this our Approbation shall have the Force of an ample and absolute Indemnity and Letter of Thanks, to all any way concern'd in this Expedition, either in Council, Command, or Execution; we having very good Reason to consider the same as our especial and necessary Service; and so we bid you heartily farewell.

Given at our Court at Whitehall the 26th of March, 1678, and of our Reign the 30th Year.

By his Majesty's Command.

LAUDERDALE."

Bishop Burnet says, that the Madness of these Proceedings of Lauderdale, made the King conclude his Head was turn'd: But if this Assertion had any Authority, his Majesty's own Head must have been turn'd likewise, when he took the Odium of them all, so explicitly and circumstantially, upon himself.

The same Prelate farther adds, That he intended to put Scotland in another Management, and to set the Duke of Monmouth at the Head of it: But the same Reasons which disqualify'd that Nobleman for the Government of Ireland, concluded much stronger against trusting him with Scotland; for he had there, besides, a considerable Interest of his own, by his Alliance with the House of Buendeburg; the State of the Country would have given a large Scope to his Popularity; And the State of the Government, as modell'd by Lauderdale, would have arm'd him with Power sufficient to make use of it.

However, this may be, the Scottish Nobility were, at last, favour'd with a Hearing, before the Cabinet Council; by whom they were treated rather as Offenders against the King's Proclamation, than Appellants in Behalf of their injur'd Country. And instead of obtaining Relief, "Duke Lauderdale, says Burnet, took Advantage from their Absence to desire leave from the King to summon a Convention of Estates, from whom he might, more certainly, understand the Sense of the whole Kingdom. And what by corrupting the Nobility, what by carrying Elections, or at best Disputes about them, which would be judg'd as Matters would happen to be at present, he hop'd to carry his Point. So he issued out the Writs, while they were at London, knowing nothing of the Design; and these being returnable in three Weeks, he laid the Matter off, that before they could get home, all the Elections were over; and he was Matter of above four Parts in five of that Assembly. So they granted an Assessment for three Years, in order to the continuing a greater Force. And they wrote a (e) Letter

(e) That the Reader may have the better Idea of the good Understanding, that, by the usual Arts of Court, was made to subsist between the Crown, the Ministry, and the States of Scotland, it may be proper to insert some Extracts from the kind Correspondence that now pass'd between them. Says the King, in his Letter, "The great Kindness we bear to that our ancient Kingdom last, at all times, inclin'd us to be very watchful over all its Concerns: And, considering, that all Kings and States do at present carefully secure themselves and their People, by providing against all such foreign Invasions, and intestine Comotions, as may make them a Prey to their Enemies, it is not fit, that that our Kingdom should only, of all others, remain without Defence; especially at a time wherein those dangerous Field-Conventions (so justly termed in our Laws, The Enemies of Rebellion) do still grow in their Numbers and Insolencies; against all which, our present Forces cannot in reason be thought a reasonable Security. Therefore, and that we may be the better enabled to raise some more Forces, for securing that our Kingdom against all foreign Invasions, and intestine Comotions, and to the end they may be maintained by such equal and regular Ways as may give just Satisfaction to our People, and to let the World see the unanimous Affection of our People to us: There are the only Reasons of calling you together at this time. And altho' we have been always very unwilling to lay Burthen upon that our Kingdom, yet we could not neglect the giving you this Opportunity to witness your Affection to our Service, especially in so dangerous a Time, and for so important a Cause. And seeing we are resolv'd to employ what you shall give only for the Peace and Security of that our Kingdom, we doubt not but you will cheerfully give such a Supply as may be effectual for the Ends proposed, such as the Kingdom can bear."

Says his Grace, the King's Commissioner:

"You may remember, that, four Years ago, in the last Session of the last Parliament, tho' the King was actually engag'd in a great War, yet knowing the low Condition of this Kingdom, he, chaf'd to Supply; for then there was no Appearance of any Interruption here, tho' soon after the End of that Parliament, the Famines broke out very suddenly in divers Places: I shall not recite how this came.

But this Year they have been much more insolent in numerous Field-Conventions, which the Law justly terms Revolutions of Rebellion; and the Commission justly declared, that they were not able to suppress them; so there was a Necessity to draw Forces together. I shall not repeat what follow'd upon that Occasion, nor recite upon any thing that pass'd there: I will only look forward, how the Kingdom may be secured in this great Conjunction, by the fairest and most easy Ways.

About the time of the Date of the King's Letter, there was an Appearance of Peace betwixt our nearest Neighbours, in France, Flanders, and the United Provinces; which now seems to be at last retard'd, and all Countries prepare for their Defence: Which makes it necessary that this Kingdom should not be the only Country left naked, without any Defence. Here is no more than one Regiment of Foot, and one Troop of Guards, of standing Force (exclusive of the Militia) and the King's Revenue can bear no more: I need not therefore enlarge on the Necessity of raising more standing Force, regularly paid, to prevent free Quarters, which would be otherwise unavoidable. For if there should be an Invasion, or if those Field-Conventions (the true Revolutions of Rebellion) should join in open Rebellion, as they did in the Year 1666, the whole Power of the Kingdom must be drawn together; how burdensome that would be, I leave Letter to the King, not only justifying, but highly magnifying the Duke of Lauderdale's Government. This was so base, and so abject a thing, that it brought the whole Nation under great Contempt."

It is not to be presum'd, that these Disorders, and Discontents in Scotland, did not constantly echo into every Part of England; and that they did not excite very melancholy Reflections in every thinking Man; nor that those who had the Direction of the declar'd Malcontents did not make their own Use of all. It is an undeniable Truth, that the Mismanagements of Ministers, and the Calamities arising from them to the Public, are the Seeds from whence all selfish and aspiring Oppositions expect their Harvest: And therefore, it must be expected that they will make use of all kinds of Manure, to quicken their Growth. The Proof of one ugly Fact, affords Room for an ingenious Architect to raise a Pile of plausible Fallhoods: And thus between the Abuse of Power, and the Abuse of Liberty, the People perish.

The Rigours exercised in Scotland, the arbitrary Spirit which had shewn itself from time to time in England, through the whole Course of this Reign; The Subserviency of our Court to that of France; the Reluctance we had shewn to enter into the War; the Fondness to continue the Army, without any visible Design to employ it; the Indulgence and Favour which had been uniformly extended to Papists; and, above all, the Care that had been taken to aggravate all these several Causes of Discontent, had dispos'd and prepar'd the Minds of the People to think as ill of the Court, as their worst Enemies could desire, when the Papish Plot broke out: A Transaction which had its Root in Hell, and its Branches in the Clouds; and which, at the same time that it excites so much Curiosity, remains to this Hour almost inexplicable.

Out of the almost numberless Volumes of Narratives, Trials, Parliamentary Proceedings, and Controversies upon Controversies arising therefrom, we must therefore endeavour to form such a Compendium of Facts and Circumstances, Appearances and Opinions, as may, at least, shew upon what Grounds the two Houses of Parliament were hurry'd into the Belief of, and to give their Sanction to, the Plot, and Courts of Justice to convict, and condemn their Fellow-Subjects for being Accomplices in it.

August 12, 1678, one Mr. Kirkby or Kirby, First Hist of you to judge; and nothing can prevent such a Rebellion, but some more lasting Force, regularly paid; which may not only prevent it now, by God's Blessing, but secure us from it for the future.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King, like a true Father of his Country, puts you in mind of your Danger, and proposes to you the surest, the easiest, and the most equal Remedy. His Majesty hath these eighteen Years, in all his Kingdoms, firmly profess'd his Abhorrence of arbitrary Government, his ruling by the Law, and his inviolable Care to preserve the Liberty and Property of his Subjects: That Professors have been fully made good, by all the Acts of his Government, since his happy Return. And I do, in his Majesty's Name, assure you, that he is, and shall be as careful of your Liberties and Properties, as of any thing on Earth that is nearest and dearest to him: And if any entrud by him shall transgress, they may certainly expect to be crush'd under his just Dispensate."

Says the Daily Letter of the Estates of SCOTLAND:

"May it please your sacred Majesty,

When we reflect upon the great Happiness of living under a King of our own Nation and Religion, whose Predecessors have for many Ages kept us from being conquered by Strangers, and a Prey to one another; and how that tho' we have been so unhappy, as not to have had your Majesty's sacred Person amongst us, yet your Majesty does always, with a most fatherly Care, provide for our Security and Happiness; so that whilst our Neighbours have been spending their Estates and Blood in cruel Wars, we have enjoyed a most sweet and pleasant Peace, we cannot be so far wanting to our Duty, as not to embrace every Occasion of testifying to the World, our humble and thankful Acknowledgment of those Blessings; which we value as much, because they are Marks of your Majesty's Favour, as for being the Effects of your Royal Protection.

And therefore we, your Majesty's most faithful and most loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Representatives of the Shires and Boroughs of this your ancient Kingdom, being assembled in this, the fullest Convention that ever has been foun of your Majesty's Estates, do, in a dutiful Return to those and the other Marks of your Majesty's Royal Care and Kindness, assure your Majesty, That though factious and frowny Persons may seduce some in this Nation to depart from their Duty, yet there are generally so much honest, rational, and valiant Knights and Dukes, in the Hearts of the Subjects of this your Majesty's ancient Kingdom, that these Errors do, in no proceed rather from a Misrepresentation of your Majesty's Inclinations, than from any formal Repugnance of opposing your Authority. And that the World may know how much we trust your Majesty's Judgment, and how intirely we believe the Misfeaser you take to be the BRIT, and SAFER, we acknowledge it in us. we should enable your Majesty to resist all foreign Intrusions, at this time, especially, wherein all Europe has too apparent Reason to be jealous of so potent and restless Neighbours. And therefore, without going into foreign Affairs (which are the proper Employment of Princes) we do, with all humble Confidence, repose intirely upon your Majesty's wise Counsel; being fully resolv'd to contribute our Lives and Fortunes towards the Maintenance of your Majesty's Honour and Greatness, in which our Peace and Safety are inseparable included.

Again: Such as trouble our Peace becoming daily more considerable in their Numbers, as they have for a long time been, and have, in this Representative of your Majesty's Kingdom, appear'd to be, as to their Interest; And that their religion and Schismatic Principles may be rooted out by lawful and suitable Means, we have offered your Majesty a Supply, which nothing, save the Sincerity, Unanimity, and the Affection wherewith it was offered, could make any way considerable. And to make the time yet more circuitous for arriving to desirable Ends, we assure your Majesty, that we shall contribute our hearty Endeavours for supplying those vacancies and Schismatic Humours, which if favour'd or indulg'd, would soon ripen into a new Rebellion; knowing, that the surest way to lessen our Burden, is to remove their Cause. And as this Supply is furnished, at this time, with respect only to the present Expence, so this shall not lessen our Forwardness in appearing universally betwixt sixty and sixteen (conform to the Laws of this your Majesty's Kingdom) with great Abunty and Cheerfulness, whenever your Majesty shall call for our Assistance.

We hope the Duke of Lauderdale will inform your Majesty, with what Respect we received and used him as your high Commissioner; knowing, that not to believe what is reported in your Majesty's Name, by your MINISTERS, is as dangerous, as to oppose your Person in DEVERSE of your AUTHORITY; both of these furnishing equally Brechts of opposing the Royal Power, when it does not please us. His Management of Affairs in this Convention, has justified your Majesty's Choice of him, and will, we hope, answer your Expectations. [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, Vol. 1.]

A. D. 1678. (Kirkby further inform'd him, that two Men, nam'd Grove and Pickering, had undertaken to shoot his Majesty, and Sir George Wake-man to poison him. Adding, that his Friend, Dr. Tonge, from whom he had his Intelligence, was at Hand, with the Detail in Writing, for his Majesty's Perusal. The same Evening the Doctor, also, was admitted, and deliver'd to his Majesty a Sketch of the Plot in forty-three Articles: Both he and Kirkby requesting, That those Papers might be kept secret and safe; otherwise the full Discovery would be prevented, and their Lives in hazard; as also, that they might have Access to his Majesty, under the Notion of Charity, to prevent Suspicion. But this last Proposal his Majesty declin'd, as being the next Morning to set out for Windsor; and refer'd them to prosecute the Affair, for the future, with the Lord Treasurer; to whom he sent the said Articles, seal'd up, by a Person of Quality; with a verbal Intimation, that Kirkby would bring a Gentleman to speak to his Lordship about it. This Gentleman was the said Dr. Tonge, who is characteris'd by Bishop Burnet, as a mean Divine, credulous, simple, full of Projects and Notions, but always look'd upon as a sincere Man. All which is totally irreconcilable with the Insinuations of Mr. North, and the Assertions of L'Estrange; which we shall have Occasion to specify by and by.

Both Tonge and Kirkby waited on the Lord Treasurer, as directed by his Majesty; and the first being ask'd by his Lordship, whether the Papers he had sent to his Majesty, were Originals or Copies, answer'd, that they were Copies, taken by himself; that the Originals were thrust under the Door of his Chamber, he did not know by whom; that, indeed, he guess'd who the Author was; and that, tho' he did not know where to find him, he had met him lately two or three times in the Street, and that it was likely he should meet him again before it was long.

Thus ended the first Conference; and about three or four Days after, the Doctor coming again to the Earl, told him, "He had met the Man; that it did prove to be as he had guess'd, that he own'd himself to be the Author, and had given him another Paper of the like kind, and number'd into Heads, as the (f) first was, but desir'd not to have his Name known to any body but the Doctor, because the Papists would murder him.

In these Papers, Mention being made of the Design to assassinate the King by the Hands of Grove, otherwise Honest William, and Pickering, his Lordship ask'd the Doctor, whether he knew those Fellows, or where they liv'd? To the last of which Questions he answer'd in the Negative; and to the first, That they walk'd frequently in the Park; and that he would undertake to show one or both of them to any Person his Lordship should appoint.

This Offer his Lordship embrac'd: And having appointed a Person (one Mr. Lloyd) to attend the Doctor's Motions, waited upon the King, who was then at Windsor, with these farther Informations; and, withal, propos'd that Warrants might be issued from the Secretary's Office, for the apprehending the Persons nam'd to be the Assassins; as also, that the Affair might be communicated to others of the Council; neither of which his Majesty would suffer; but, on the contrary, commanded the Earl not to speak of it even to the Duke of York; and clos'd all with saying, He would be very careful of himself.

For the next Stage of Discovery, the Doctor inform'd his Lordship of the Dwellings of Honest William and Pickering; and also promis'd to give certain Intelligence when they set out for Windsor: Upon which his Majesty was prevail'd with to alter his former Resolution, and to give order for their being seiz'd, as soon as they should arrive there. Such Intelligence the Doctor did accordingly give, not only naming the Day, but undertaking, that the Earl's Gentleman (the Person before appointed to take a View of them in the Park) should bear them company in the Coach, or on Horseback by the Coach Side, in case the Coach was full.

But all this Concert was defeated; the Journey being put off; and again a second time, and both times for such trivial Reasons, as are not worth remembering. This, it seems, induc'd his Majesty, who gave no Credit to it from the Beginning, to treat it as mere Fiction; growing more positive than ever, not to have it communicated to any body; and saying, "He should alarm all England, and put Thoughts of killing him into People's Heads, who had no such Thoughts before."

The Affair now took another Direction: Instead of attending the Motions of Honest William and Pickering, the Doctor gave notice to the Lord Treasurer of a Paquet of (g) Letters from Jesuits concern'd in the Plot, which were to go to the Post-House in

For Mr Brounfeld Windsor.

A. D. 1678. in Windsor, directed to one Bedingfield, a Priest. Upon which his Lordship hurry'd out of Oxfordshire, where he then was, to Windsor, with the Doctor's Letter of Intelligence; which his Majesty no sooner saw, than he signify'd, that such a Packet had been delivered some few Hours before, by the said Bedingfield, to the Duke of York; and that Bedingfield had told the Duke, he fear'd some Ill was intended him by that Packet, because the Letters therein seem'd to be of a dangerous nature; and that he was sure they were not of the Hand Writing of the Persons whose Names were subscrib'd to them.

Who carries them is the Duke of York.

His Majesty now grew more incredulous than ever; and we are told in the Lord Treasurer's Name, That his Lordship doubted whether he had ever been permitted to produce the Papers and Intelligence he had receiv'd from Mr. Tonge; if his Royal Highness had not been earnest to have the Truth of those Letters examin'd; by which means his Lordship also got leave, at the same time, to produce the said Papers and Letters to the Council.

The Appearance of Oates.

F. L. p. 427.

* In this Interval it appear'd, that the Person whom Dr. Tonge had met accidentally in the Street two or three times, and who had thrust the Information under the Doctor's Chamber-Door, was Titus Oates, of whom Bishop Barnet writes as follows: "He was once presented for Perjury. But was got to be a Chaplain in one of the King's Ships; from which he was dismiss'd upon Complaint of some unnatural Practices not to be named." The Picture of this noted Man is also drawn with the like Features by Mr. North, Leffrange, and all the Court Writers of those Times; with this only Difference; that they are set forth by the last, with bolder Strokes, and stronger Colours.

Kirkby's Narrative.

And now it was that Kirkby was first made acquainted with him by Dr. Tonge, who introduced him to his (Kirkby's) Lodgings at Vaux-ball, to be furnished with Money for his necessary Expences while this great Affair was depending.

This was on the 2d of Sept.; and a regular Correspondence being now establish'd between them, they met again the next Day, but at another Place, for fear, it seems, that by his Oates's, being often seen with Tonge, all should be discover'd; as also on the 4th, when Oates told a sad Story of his having fallen into the Hands of Whitebread, the Provincial of the Jesuits, who had not only charged him with discovering the Plot to the King, but had beaten him for so doing; Upon which Kirkby resolv'd to go to Windsor; and seeing Oates was discover'd and in Danger, advis'd Tonge to do the same. He moreover gave it as his Opinion, that Tonge should get Oates's Information sworn before some Justice of the Peace; which was accordingly done on the 6th before Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, whom they would not then permit to read the Particulars; telling him, That his Majesty had already a true Copy thereof; and that it was not convenient that it should be yet communicated to any body else; only acquainting him in general, that it contained Matter of Treason and Felony, and other high Crimes. They, however, desired him to attest Oates's Affidavit, which he did; and at the same time Tonge made oath, that it had been made known to the King.

While this was passing in Town, Kirkby went to Windsor; but could procure no Audience, either of the King or the Lord Treasurer; Under which Discouragement he returned on the 9th; and after a Consultation held with Tonge and Oates at the Flying-Horse in King's-Street Westminster, where Oates had taken shelter for fear of the Jesuits, he took the Latter along with him to his Lodgings at Vaux-ball; as well, says the Narrative, for his Security, as that he might have Company to cheer him in his then sad Condition.

Entertain'd by Kirkby at his Lodgings.

From this time to the 27th, Oates employ'd himself in writing out Copies of his Information;

For Mr Beaufield at his lodgings in Windsor leave this with the Post master at Windsor to be delivered to him Windsor.

A. D. 1678. Information; and Tonge, in soliciting Audiences of the Lord Treasurer, who gave him no manner of Encouragement; all three being much perplex'd both in regard of the Danger they were in, and the seeming Neglect of the Discovery they had made.

Tonge from
at the Council.

On that Day, the 27th, Mr. Lloyd, before mention'd, brought a Summons to Dr. Tonge, to attend the Council; but before they could get thither, it was broke up, and an Order was made for his Attendance at ten o'Clock the next Morning.

The Advantage they took of this Demur, was to go all three to Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey's, the next Day, before the Hour appointed for the Hearing, with the first Deposition, and two other Copies to be sworn to, and attested in the same manner; that each might have one: But Sir Edmund insisted on detaining one, which was left in his Hands, and till when, as before observed, he was a Stranger to the Contents.

His Examination.
[Lecturer's Brief History,
c. vii. p. 130.]

Tonge now made his Appearance before the Council; and, notwithstanding the Neglect before complain'd of, declar'd (b) he was sorry the Affair was discover'd so soon; and that it would have been much better, and more would have been discovered, if the Business had been kept conceal'd some time longer. When question'd, he also refer'd himself to the Papers he had given, or transmitted to the King. Being desired to give the like brief Account to them, as he had done to his Majesty, he again refer'd to a written Account, he had before delivered to his Majesty, which was read: And, being afterwards desired to put the Papers before the Board into Method, he answer'd, That they were a Journal, and order'd as he receiv'd them; not only by Dates, but, by nominal Numbers.

Thus it appear'd the Doctor would be no Witness; and therefore it became necessary for him to produce the Informer, which he was order'd to do, and did accordingly the very same Day.

Practises
Oates's

Of this prodigious Man's (Oates's) Behaviour before the Council, we have no very exact and circumstantial Account. But as to the Particulars of his Discoveries, we have them at large in his own Narrative; which he dedicated to the King, and of the most material Parts of which it will be necessary to insert the following Abridgment for the Admiration of Posterity, viz.

[North's Examinations, p. 57, 58.]

"Father le Sire, the French King's Confessor, had lodg'd 10,000*l.* in the Hands of Worsley, a Goldsmith in London, for killing the King, Art. 9.— Just the same Sum promised for doing the Job by a Spanish Provincial of the Jesuits in New Castle, 8.— The King of France to land an Army in Ireland, and 40,000 black Bills provided for arming the Irish Catholics, 11.— The Duke of York was to be killed, if he did not answer Expectation, 13, 16, 20, 60.— One Hensell William, and one Pickering, were appointed to shoot the King in St. James's Park; but the Flint of Pickering's Pistol was loose; so he deferred it to another time: And Pickering was to have 30,000 Muffles for his Soul, 19. It appears elsewhere, that the other, who was one Grove, was to have ----- and ----- Muffles, which, at 1*s.* per Muff, came to near that Sum.— The Duke of York was to be founded about the Business, 23.— There was to be a Raising of 25,000 Horie and Foot in Ireland, to let in the French; and divers had taken Commissions of War from the General of the Jesuits (Father Olivea) at Rome, by virtue of the Pope's Bull, 27.— A general Consult of the Jesuits at the Whitehorse's Tavern in May 1678, divided into five or six Sub-consults, for killing the King; and Oates carried Tickets of Resolves from Company to Company, 28.— The Author that translated the Jesuits Morals, Dr. Tonge, Dr. Stillingsfleet, and the Author of the Synopsis, Mr. Pool, were to be killed, 30.— Sir George Wakenan (the Queen's Physician) was to have the 10,000*l.* in Worsley's Hands, if he would undertake to poison the King, 33.— If he refused that, he was to have 5000*l.* more, to make the Work sure, 37, 39.— The 34th gives the Process of firing London, for the sake of Plunder; the Charge whereof came to 14,000*l.* There were, it seems, eighty-six Firemen, and seven hundred Fire-Balls, employed: And, in the Confusion of that, the King was to be killed; but he appeared so industrious, they could not find in their Hearts to do it then.— About these Affairs it cost the Jesuits 4000*l.* in Intelligence, 41.— Father le Sire had a lurking Intelligenceer, one Smith, that Coleman, the Duke's Secretary, used to assist, as he was told, 44.— Wakenan was to have his full 15,000*l.* for his Work; but, for all that, Pickering was to go on, 46.— Grace and Pickering fired Southwark, and had 1000*l.* for it, 49.— The Duke of Ormond to be cut off; and a Mass or two, for the Prosperity of the Jesuits in it, 50, 63.— It was said, by a Jesuit, that the Catholics might well rise and cut 100,000 Protestants Throats, 53.— If the King did not become R. C. (Roman Catholic) he could not long continue C. R. (Charles Rex), 55.— The Prior of the Benedictines agreed to furnish 6000*l.* in order to the Design, 60.— Oates was urged to shoot the King; but he durst not let off a Gun. Then a Benedictine Monk was to do it; and a Wager of 100*l.* was laid, and Stakes made, that the King should eat no more Christmas-Pyes, 60.— The Dominicans alledged Poverty, and could not advance Money towards killing the King; but would contribute Prayers, &c. 61.— Pickering's Fellow-

[A] This was own'd by the Doctor himself, and attested in the House of Commons by Sir Thomas Delmon, one of the Clerks of the Council then in waiting. [Dashy's Memoirs, p. 57.

And when it was objected, that the Papists might kill the King in the mean time, he, Tonge, said, Care should be taken of that; they should be so narrowly watch'd, they should not be able to do it. [Memorial in North's Examinations, p. 177.

A. D. 1678.

Fellow-Assassin had a sore Throat, and durst not go by Water to Windsor, for fear of a Cold, which might disable him for Service. 62. Dr. Fogarty said, Coleman was at the Consult when Wakeman was agreed with, and he said he had hir'd four Ruffians to observe the King's Postures at Windsor, 64.— The Jesuits sent 80*l.* to bear the Charge of these Ruffians, with Instructions for their Behaviour, 66. Coniers shew'd a deadly Dagger which cost 10*s.* (not dear for the Work it was to do) for it was to kill the King, 68.— He had done it sooner, but his Horse fell lame, and he had got a Sciatica, 68.— A Paper Model was made for the firing London, and an architectonical Scheme, shewing where to begin, and go on, as the Wind should serve: And Oates had a Post assigned him, as an Encourager of a Parcel of Firemen; and was to have 1000*l.* This Project was sign'd by the Provincial, 71.— The Pope, by Bull, filled up the Preferments in the English Church, and the List is added, 72.— In Scotland, 8000 Scotch Catholics, when the Business grew hot, were to join, 73.— White, the Provincial, suspected Oates for a Discoverer, and basted him; but seeming reconciled, Oates ever-dropped somewhat worse to happen; so run away. It seems he was to be tortured, and sent beyond Sea, and another Fire-Encourager was put in his Place; and he overheard they intended to torment him, to make him confess his Complices, 79.— A List of Lay-Officers under the Plot, by Commission from Father Oliva; so also of the Conspirators.

This Variety of Matter gave Bishop Burnet Occasion to say, The Plot consisted of so many Particulars that it was thought to be above Invention. His Lordship, however, acknowledges, that this travelled, truly, important Agent, of so important a Body as the Jesuits, mistook the Name of the French King's Confessor; and, instead of la Chaise, call'd him le Shoe; as also, that having asserted, that when he was in Spain, Don John, had, in Person, to him, promis'd great Assistance in the Execution of their Designs, and being ask'd by the King what sort of a Man Don John was, he answer'd, he was a tall, lean Man; whereas Don John was a little, fat Man, Mr. North, also speaks of the same Circumstance, tho' not exactly in the same Words; but adds, that when Oates spoke of the Jesuits College, his Majesty ask'd him where it stood: And he answer'd as much out of the way, as if he had said Gresham-College stood at Westminster.

The Bishop further admits, that tho' he accus'd Coleman of a strict Correspondence with la Chaise, and, in general, of being acquainted with all the Designs of the Jesuits, (1) he did not know him when they were confronted, and that he charg'd him only upon Hearsay: That tho' he nam'd Wakeman the Queen's Physician, neither did he know him: That being ask'd if he knew any thing against him, he answer'd, he did not; adding, God forbid he should say any thing more than he knew; he would not do that for all the World: And that he did not so much as name Langborn, the famous Lawyer, who, indeed manag'd all their Concerns.

But neither the Appearance of Oates, nor the Torrent of Evidence he discharg'd, induc'd the King to treat the Plot with any more Respect than before; for the very next Day (says Burnet, erroneously, but in truth, October 2.) he set out for Newmarket, and left the People to receive, and the Council to prosecute it, as they pleas'd. This the Prelate, just mention'd, says was censur'd as a very indecent Levity; but surely it rather indicated a thorough Contempt.

The Council, however, shew'd so much Countenance to it, that they took Tonge and Oates under his Majesty's Protection, and order'd them Apartments in Whitehall. Warrants were also issued for the apprehending several Persons that Oates had inform'd against: And he himself, accompany'd and assisted the Messengers while putting them in Execution.

Coleman was one of these: And as the Apologist for Lord Danby assures us, not one of his Papers had been seiz'd, but for the Care of his Lordship, who caus'd a Warrant to be drawn for that Purpose, and got it sign'd by five of the Privy Council, after the Council was risen, who had omitted the Direction of seizing his Papers, out of the Warrant for apprehending his Person: Upon which Passage, Mr. North comments as follows:

“It doth not appear, that the King knew of this; and then it was a bold Stroke; but favouring the Discovery of Coleman's Intriguing, all was well. But certainly it was no Court made to the Duke of York, under whom Coleman serv'd; and his Lordship must needs know, that whatever the Papers were, material or not, neither the Duke, nor any more private Person, would approve the having his Servants Correspondences expos'd.”

Thus the Duke and the Lord Treasurer were alike instrumental, in putting this dreadful Machine in motion: But from very different Inducements. The Duke had apparently nothing in view, but to purge Bedlam, who was his Confessor, from the Suspicion of carrying on any such Correspondence, as the Letters before-quoted seem'd to indicate: But the Lord Treasurer either believ'd in Oates, or else made use of his Depositions to blast the Popish Party, whom he found it so difficult to manage; as also to make his Court to the People.

Thus, in the Pamphlet, called, An impartial State of the Earl of Danby's Case, written apparently under his Lordship's Direction, we find his Merits and Services, in furthering the Discovery of the Plot; much magnify'd; and, in particular, the Article of seizing Coleman's Papers; without which, we are told, all had signify'd nothing: And this, we are also told, the Papists could never forgive him.

Examen,
p. 174.

In one of those Memoirs, which Mr. North has occasionally inserted in his Examen, and which, it may be presum'd, were compos'd by the Lord Keeper North, his Brother, we also find, that when Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey had read over Oates's Narrative, "he went to Mr. Coleman, and told him of it, and advis'd him to wait upon the Duke of York, and know, if he had heard nothing of it; and to tell him, it concern'd him highly." The same Memoir adds, "That another Message was sent him of the same kind: That the Duke, thereupon, went to the King, and told him; and that the King, as was believ'd, told the Earl of Danby, who sent for Godfrey, and threaten'd him." Neither the Writer of these Hints, nor Mr. North himself, specifies, in this Place, for what Godfrey was threaten'd by the Lord Treasurer: But the Last, Page 100, expressly says, it was for communicating the Information to the Duke, by his Secretary. Whence we may infer, that his Lordship apprehended, the giving this Alarm would put Coleman on his Guard; and of course prompt him to remove his Papers out of the way. Bishop Burnet affirms, he actually did so: Only, says he, he forgot a Drawer under the Table, in which those relating to the Years 1674, 75, and Part of 76, were left: That Prelate adds, "If he had either left all his Papers, or withdrawn all, it had been happy for his Party."

The Ferment of the Times.

However this may be, as soon as the Papers, thus foolishly and fatally left, had been seiz'd, and the Report of their dangerous Contents taken air, the whole Nation, as one Man, threw'd the Excess of their Jealousy, that Popery was at hand, by their excessive Credulity, and execrable Resentment. Says Sir John Reresford, "No body can conceive, that was not a Witness thereof, what a Ferment this rais'd among all Ranks and Degrees." Says Mr. North, "The Discovery of Coleman's Papers made as much Noise in and about London, and, indeed, all over the Nation, as if the very Cabinet of Hell had been laid open. It took away common Freedom of Speech, about Oates, and his Plot; for People's Passions would not let them attend to any Reason or Deliberation on the Matter: But if any Person was more moderate, and, retaining some Doubt, was dispos'd to ask Questions, he was rebuff'd with a What? Is there a Plot, or no?— This popular Logic carry'd it in all ordinary Conversation; so as one might have deny'd CHRIST with less Contest than the Plot." Says yet another Author, pretty much to the same Effect, "He that could not swallow Absurdities, reconcile Contradictions, and believe Impossibilities, was an Enemy to the Protestant Religion, a Papist, or popishly affected. He that question'd the least Title of the most monstrous Fictions about it was a Concealer of the Plot, and a Defamer of the King's Evidence. In fine, it was less criminal to doubt all the Articles of Christianity, than that one Article of the Plot; and to deny the Saviour of the World, than the Saver of the Nation, with which Title they were modestly pleas'd to dignify (Oates) the Salamanca Doctor." And says Lafrange, "It was come to this, in short, That a Man might with more Credit and Security give his Oath to twenty palpable Falshoods, than assert one generous, righteous Truth."

To complete the Horror and Phrenzy which had taken possession of the Public on this Occasion, Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, who had attest'd Oates's Depositions, was found, on Thursday October 17, with his own Sword thrust thro his Body, in a Ditch near Prinse-bill, in the Way to Hampstead, having been missing ever since Saturday the 12th. As it had been taken for granted, that Coleman's Papers confirm'd every Article that Oates had sworn; so it was no sooner known, that Godfrey was killed, than, by the general Voice, the Papists were charg'd with the Murder.

Thus the Cry against Popery, which had been so many Years in raising, and which the most eminent Loyalists, both Laymen and Ecclesiastics, had most eminently contributed to, now spread through the whole Kingdom; and was echo'd back from every Corner of it: All Parties join'd in it: Every Gale favour'd it: And no disagreeing Voice could obtain a Hearing.

The Court were amaz'd and confounded, to find so small a Cloud produce so great a Storm: And thought it of the utmost Consequence to divert that Fury they were no longer able to oppose. It was this gave us Temp. Men. the hot Fit, before-spoken of, against France; and put us upon rushing into the War, we had so long, and so industriously, endeavoured to avoid. And while we were thus nursing up a Rupture abroad, to give vent to the dangerous Humours gathering at home, it was thought expedient, rather to flatter the Rage of the Populace, than provoke it with the least Shew of Opposition: Accordingly, the Coroner and his Jury, who sat on the Body of Godfrey, having given it as their Verdict, That he was murdered by divers Persons unknown, a Proclamation was issued on the 20th, offering five hundred Pounds Reward, to any Person who should discover the said Murderers, or any of them; as also, a Pardon, and the like Reward, to any of the said Murderers, who should discover the rest: And a Suggestion arising, that Discoverers would be found, if they were not under the Apprehension of being murdered themselves, another Proclamation was set forth, four Days after, to add an Assurance of Protection to the former Promise of Pardon and Reward: So that, says Lafrange, Brief Hist. here was Indemnity, Money, and Security, Part iii. p. 51 to the fairest Bidder.

As Physic to the Patient is Food to the Doctor, so the Party Leader finds his Account in the Calamities of the Public. Nothing could have fallen out more favourable for the Malcontents in Parliament than this Clamour of a Plot, and the several Circumstances which arose to give it Credit and Countenance.

Countenance. The War with France was now become a Court-Tool, and was, besides, already worn out and unfit for Service. Some other Device was therefore necessary to amuse without Doors, and embarrass within: And Machiavel himself could not have fram'd one of a more efficacious kind than this of the Plot, which Fortune threw in their way. The Conjunction of time was, also, as favourable as the thing itself: For tho' the Dawn of the Plot was in August, it gave neither Heat nor Light till the Beginning of October: And when Coleman's Papers, and Godfrey's Death, had rais'd it to its Meridian Splendor, the Session was at hand; and all those who had an Interest in the Prosecution of it, ready to make their Hay while the Sun shin'd.

King's Speech.

Among whom we must again insert the Lord Treasurer himself; not indeed as a Malcontent, but as an enterprising Minister, who thought all Plots the Perquisites of his Office, and that by his Power and Abilities, he could make every Event subservient to his own Purposes. LeStrange speaking of his Majesty's Incredulity, says, "The King's Hardness of Belief was quickly smok'd by the Plot-Master and his Advisers, inasmuch, that tho' they could not totally take the Matter out of his Majesty's Hand, they did what they could yet, by a Side Wind, to transfer the Cause from the Privy Council to the Parliament, where they made themselves sure before-hand of a Majority to bid it welcome." And we have his Lordship's own Authority, "That the greatest Displeasure King Charles ever shew'd against him, was for bringing Oates's Information concerning the Plot, before the Parliament; telling him, with much Repentment, That altho' his Lordship did not believe it, he would find he had given the Parliament a Handle to ruin him (the Lord Treasurer) as well as to disturb all his (the King's) Affairs and that he would live to repent it." This Measure of his Lordship's appears, besides, so much the more extraordinary, as it was taken on the very first Day of the Session, and, as it were, in Opposition to the King's Speech; in which his Majesty expressly says, I will leave the Matter to the Lords.—But we anticipate—

October the 21st, the Day after the first Proclamation was publish'd, relating to Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Murder, the two Houses re-assembled, in such a Temper as may be more easily imagin'd than describ'd; and his Majesty gave them to understand, in his gracious Speech, That for the well securing of what was left of Flanders, and the keeping his Neighbours from Despair, he had been oblig'd to keep up his Troops: That both the Honour and Interest of the Nation were so far improv'd by it, that he was confident no Man would repine at it, or think the Money rais'd for their Disbanding, to have been ill employ'd in their Continuance: That he was so much out of Purse for that Service, that he expected they should supply it: That how far it would be necessary, considering the present State of Christendom, to reduce the Land and Sea-Forces, or to what Degree, is worthy of all their serious Considerations. He then proceeded to signify, That he had been inform'd of a Design against his Person by the Jesuits; but said he forbore to give his own Opinion, lest he should seem to say too much, or too little: That he should leave the Matter to the Lords; and that, in the mean time, he would take as much care as he could to prevent all manner of Practices by that sort of Men; and of others too, who had been tampering in a high Degree with Foreigners, and contriving how to introduce POPEERY amongst us. He concluded with recommending his other Concerns to their Consideration: Said, he had been under great Disappointments, by the Defects of the Poll Bill: That his Revenue was under great Anticipations: That, at the best, it was never equal to the constant and necessary Expence of the Government; and that he intended to have the whole State laid before them, that they might consider of it with that Duty and Affection, which he was sure he should always find in them.

The Lord Chancellor then, by his Majesty's Command, added, among other things of less Importance, That the Close of the last Session was very memorable for leaving things in a sort of an Uncertainty between War and Peace: That this Uncertainty proceeded not from any Unsteadiness at Home, but from the Mutability of Affairs abroad: That in the midst of these, his Majesty was daily and earnestly supplicated and importun'd, not to disband the Forces he had rais'd: That there was no resisting such repeated Intercessions: That it was now acknowledged by all the World, that what was sav'd of Flanders, was sav'd by his Majesty's Interposition: And that tho' the Peace was not such as his Majesty could have wish'd, it was such a Peace as his Neighbours were resolv'd to have. His Lordship then proceeded in these Words: "Let no Man wonder then, if the Money given towards their Disbanding has been apply'd towards the Payment of the Army as far as it would go. There needs no Excuse for what was inevitable. The Provision which was made for paying off the Army went no farther than till the last of June for Part, and the last of August for the rest. But the Fleet was provided for only till the fifth of June; so that the Continuation of the Fleet and Army, from that time, was wholly upon his Majesty's Charge." Hence his Lordship infer'd, that as the Service was, at once, so necessary, honourable and useful, they could not but be well pleas'd to put in for their Share of the Merit by defraying the Residue of the Charge. His Lordship in the next Place, enlarg'd on the Straits of the Revenue; and then made a Transition to the Affair of the Army. Upon which Topic, he urg'd all the things, that have been so often repeated since, with so much better Success: "And surely, said he, in that State of things to which they are now reduc'd, 'tis visible and plain enough what must be our Business for the time to come. First, we must look to ourselves, and provide for our own Safety: For that which the Confederates acknowledge knowledge with Thanks, we may be sure hath a quite different Resentment in other Places. And in order to this, Care must be taken so to strengthen ourselves both at home and abroad, that they who see us in a firm and well settled Estate, may have no Hopes to surprize, nor any Temptation to make any Attempt upon us. And herein it will be necessary to take notice of what his Majesty hath recommended to you, and to weigh very well the Importance of reducing the Sea and Land Forces, and the Consequences which may attend such a Reducement: For this, be assured, that nothing in the World would more gratify our Enemies, than to see us afraid of maintaining ourselves in a Posture of Defence, which is the only Posture they are afraid to find us in."

To quiet the Fears of Papery, his Lordship, in the next Place, observ'd, That it was now become the Interest of his Majesty's Person to protect the Protestant Religion, and prevent the swarming of Priests; and thence, glancing at the Plot, added, That tho' his Majesty did not prejudge the Persons accus'd, yet the strict Enquiry into that Matter had been a means to discover so many other unwarrantable Practices of theirs, that his Majesty had reason to look to them. His Lordship made a distinct Article of Coleman, whom he described, without naming him, as a Factor and AGITATOR for Rome, and one who carry'd on pernicious Designs by a most dangerous Correspondence with Foreign Nations. He, nevertheless, took care to insinuate, That the Parliament need not concern themselves about it, by laying farther, "What kind of Process the Proof will bear, and to how high a Degree the Extent and Nature of these Crimes will rise, is under Consideration, and will be fully left to the Course of the Law." His Lordship then pass'd on to the King's Wants, and enlarg'd both on the Expediency and Necessity of removing them: And for a Cloise, express'd himself as follows.

"There is so strange a Concurrence of ill Accidents at this time, that 'tis not to be wonder'd at, if some very honest and good Men begin to have troubled and thoughtful Hearts. Yet that which is infinitely to be lamented, is, that malicious Men too begin to work upon this Occasion, and are in no small Hopes to raise a Storm that nothing shall be able to allay. If you can refuse the King's Affairs from such a Tempest as this; if you can weather this Storm, and steer the Vessel into the Harbour; if you can find a way to quiet the Apprehensions of those who mean well, without being carried away by the Passions of others who mean ill; if you can prevent the Designs of those without Doors, who study nothing else but how to distract your Councils, and to disturb all your Proceedings; then you will have performed as great and as reasonable a Piece of Service to the King, as ever yet he stood in need of."

It was the Chancellor's Misfortune to be unseasonably and injudiciously florid; his Harangues had more the Air of the Schools than the Cabinet; and by having too much Emblishment, they had too little Authority. It must, however, be allow'd, that nothing ever said to both Houses, more deserv'd their most serious Regard than those Paragraphs of his, last quoted; and if there had been half the Quantity of Patriotism in Parliament, that was affected, they had operated accordingly. But the Times were so enrag'd, that the Voice of Reason could not be heard. No Man could be admitted among the Sons of God, unless the Devil introduc'd him; nor could be thought a Friend to the public Cause, unless he set himself to widen the Breach instead of repairing it.

It was owing to this furious Spirit, that when the King's Speech was taken into Consideration in both Houses: The Plot! the Plot! was all their Cry; and nothing could be heard that had not a Tendency to inflame, rather than compose the Minds of the People.

Both Houses set out with a joint Address to his Majesty for a solemn Fast, to implore the Mercy and Protection of Almighty God to his Majesty's Royal Person, and in him, to all his loyal Subjects, &c.

This was follow'd with other Addresses of the like alarming nature, namely, for such Papers as had a Tendency to the Discovery of the horrible Designs against his Majesty's Life; to remove Papists Recufants from London; to cause the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to be every where administered; that no unknown or suspicious Persons should have Access to his Majesty; and that the Lord-Mayor and Lieutenancy of London, and the Lord-Lieutenants of Middlesex and Surrey might be commanded to appoint such Guards of the Trained Bands, in the said City and Counties, as should be thought necessary.

They also appointed Committees to scrutinize into the Particulars of the Plot, as also to receive Informations concerning Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Murder.

This immediately open'd the Doors of both Houses to Mr. Oates, who gave in the Contents of his Narrative at the Bar of each: And so much Regard did his Evidence meet with from the Commons, that Oct. 29, about nine o'Clock in the Evening, they sent for the Lord Chief Justice Serjeants, and desir'd him to issue out his Warrants for apprehending the Earl of Powis, Viscount Stafford, Lord Arundel of Wardour, Lord Peter, and Lord Bellasis, all of them Roman Catholics, and all accus'd by the said Oates of high Treason; and who issued out his Warrants accordingly; having first taken the Deposition of Oates against them, upon Oath, to cover himself from the Reientment of the House of Peers. It does not appear these Warrants were serv'd that very Night: But the next Morning the Lords Powis and Arundel appear'd before the Chief Justice, and were by him advis'd to render themselves to the Gate-House, Westminster, as the Lord Bellasis was to the King's Bench; which Advice they made no Difficulty to obey. The Lord Stafford, on the contrary, took his Seat in the House of Peers on the Morrow; and having there deny'd the Fact he was charg'd with, withdrew, and instantly surrender'd himself to the Lord Chief Justice.

Lord Peter also, not only attended in his Place, but desired to know the Cause of the Lord Chief Justice's issuing his Warrant against him; and having receiv'd the same Information, which the said Lord Chief Justice had before given the House, he withdrew, and an Order was made for his immediate Commitment to the Tower.

Mr. Coleman
exam'd in Newgate.

Both Houses, moreover, sent their respective Committees to examine Mr. Coleman (k) now closely confin'd in Newgate, who severally examin'd him, and made their several Reports; the Substance of which was as follows, viz.

"That the Prisoner Coleman deny'd any Design against either the King's Life or Authority; or that he ever knew or heard of any Commissions to raise an Army. That he likewise deny'd, that he ever design'd or endeavour'd to change the establish'd Religion, or introduce Popery; but confesses he did attempt to get this Parliament dissolv'd, in order to procure Liberty of Conscience, which he thought they would never grant. In order to which, he solicited 300,000 l. from France; adding, that there were not three Men in England acquainted with his Designs, or Correspondence; of which the Duke of York was one (which he, however, deny'd) who, he believ'd, communicated them to Lord Arundel of Wardour.

That he farther confess'd, that his first Correspondence in France, was by certain Letters he had address'd to Sir Wm. Blackmore; by which means he commenced a second with la Ferrier; on whose Death, he sent three or four Letters to la Chaise: That he had also confess'd a Correspondence with the Pope's Nuncio at Brussels; which was occasion'd by a Proposal from the Pope, to furnish the King with a great Sum of Money, provided the Catholics here might receive proportionable Favour.

That, upon this, he was dispatch'd by the Duke of York to Brussels to the said Nuncio, for a further Explanation of that Proposal; who then disown'd, that he had any Authority from the Court of Rome to make it; but that he had made it as a private Man; Offering however, his Services at his Return to bring it about: That, notwithstanding, he had not corresponded with him for three or four Years.

That the Cypher, with the Provincial's Mark, was that used between him and Father St. Germain: That he used no Cypher to the Provincial: That he used another Cypher to Rouvenig's Secretary, but not in public Concerns.

And being then ask'd, whether he knew of any other Sum propos'd or treated on, he answer'd, That he believed there was, to keep the King from joining the Confederates; but could not affirm that any had been paid."

Thus far is agreeable to Mr. Saubeverel's Lord Jurat. Report to the Commons: That to the House of Lords was agreeable to this, as far as there was an Agreement in the Questions put to the Prisoner, by the several Committees: But the Lords went rather deeper into the Matter than the Commons. They charg'd him with forging Letters in the Name of his Royal Highness: Which he at first deny'd, saying, If there were any such Letters, they were not forg'd; but being shewn the Letter from his Royal Highness, before-quoted, to Father la Chaise, he own'd it was his (Coleman's) Hand; and that he had hid it before his Royal Highness; who had rejected it: He also said, he had no Orders from his Royal Highness to prepare it; but that he did it of his own Head. He however acknowledg'd, that his Royal Highness was acquainted with his Correspondence with Ferrier and St. Germain, not perhaps with every Letter, but in general. On the other hand, he deny'd his having ever corresponded with la Chaise; but thought proper to confess the contrary, on their Lordships producing la Chaise's Letter, acknowledg'd the Receipt of his long Letter of the 29th of September 1674. The Lords Committees then gave him to understand, as they were directed by the House, that if he would make a frank Confession of all he knew, he should be both pardon'd and rewarded: Adding, by way of Inducement, that, without any further Confession, there was enough in his Papers for the Law to take away his Life: But all the Answer this drew was, That he had been guilty of a great many Follies. Being further ask'd, why he had desired to speak with the King and his Royal Highness, he reply'd, it was to know how he should govern himself as to naming the Duke: And (1) finally, being ask'd, why he had taken such Liberties with the King's Ministers (in his Letters) by reproaching some of them with Breach of Faith, and Promises to his Royal Highness; and whether he knew, or had heard, any such things of them, as warranted such Reproaches? he answer'd in the Negative, and that this was one of his Follies; he having deliver'd those things as Facts, which had had no other Foundation than his own Opinion.

The Lords Committees, the same Day, October 28, examin'd also Thomas Jenkinson, Edward Peter, and William Ireland, who stood committed to Newgate, for being Accessories in the Plot, severally, all of whom readily deny'd their Knowledge of any such Plot, or Design; nor would make the least Confession relating to it, tho' promis'd, as Coleman had been, not only a Pardon, but a Reward. The last of these Men was one of those

(k) He was, at first, only committed to the Custody of a Messenger.

(l) Their Lordships shew'd him, moreover, a Draught of a Letter, to be sent to Father Olive, which he own'd, as also, that it was from his Royal Highness the Duchess, and that she had prepar'd it by her Order.

(m) This Letter was not produced either of the Confessions set forth by Sir George Treby, Chairman of the Committee of Secrecy.

those whose Names had been subscrib'd to the five Windfor Letters, before-quoted: And the Lords, upon this Occasion, shewing him some of the Letters and Papers which had been seiz'd (at his Lodgings) he confess'd they were of his own Writing; but, withal, insisted, that the Letter sent in his Name to Mr. Beddingfield, at Windfor, was forg'd.

The next Day, their Lordships made their Report to the House; and a Motion being made, to communicate the several Papers mention'd therein immediately to the Commons, at a Conference, that both Houses might join in their Advice to his Majesty, it was over-ruled on the previous Question, without a Division: Notwithstanding which, to great was the Zeal of the Lords Essex and Shaftsbury, that they enter'd their Protest; but without assigning any Reason for the same.

Capt. Berkeley enter'd by the Lords for communicating certain Papers of Coleman's to the House.

There were, it seems, yet other Papers of Mr. Coleman's, besides those that were seiz'd and laid before the Council, and those that he himself is suppos'd to have secreted, which fell into the Hands of one Captain Berkeley, who deliver'd them to the Duke of Monmouth; by whom they were deliver'd to the King; who, after he had read them, order'd his Grace to restore them to Mr. Coleman again: And this being done accordingly, the Lords not only took offence at that Proceeding, but laid their Commands on the Lord Chancellor, to reprehend the Captain at the Bar of the House, for his Indiscretion: Which is the more remarkable, in as much as they came to the Knowledge of this Incident, by the Information of their Committee; who had the Lord Treasurer for their Chairman: And the Censure pass'd on Captain Berkeley, at the Rebound, affected the King himself.

Oates before the House of Lords.

It was not till October 30, that Oates made his Entrance into the House of Lords; and then, it was not to give in his Informations, but, what is most surprising, to wipe off the Apertions thrown by Mr. Coleman on the Duke of York: His first Assertion being, that his Highness was wholly innocent; which he supported with the following Reasons:

Produce the D. of York.

1. Because they (the Jesuits) had a counterfeit Seal of his Royal Highness's; and that he was sent into Spain, with Credentials under that Seal: Being ask'd where that Seal was, he said, it was in the Custody of Richard Stenage, the late Provincial of the Jesuits; that the Party who sign'd his (Oates's) Credentials wrote [James], but he was not then so well acquainted with the Jesuits, as to know who it was.

2. Because, in February or March last, a Proposal had been made by the Fathers at Ghent, that they wonder'd the Duke was not acquainted with it, to which Answer was made, because his Love was so great to the King his Brother, that he would not be true to them, tho' he was a very good Catholic.

3. Because there was a Letter wrote to Mansfield, saying, They long'd to see the Duke trespass'd into the Business.

4. Because there was a Parcel of Letters and Papers to be deliver'd to his Royal Highness, that he might burn them, thereby to draw the Duke into the Plot: This, he said, he was not certain of. But Merrill's Lloyd said, They brought them to the Duke for that Purpose; and he would bring him thither to assist it.

5. He said (being ask'd) That he had carry'd no Letters into Spain signed James by the Duke; but the Credentials he had in Spain with him, were sign'd and seal'd in his Presence, by the Jesuits, James, and the counterfeit Seal; so that he was received as a kind of Ambassador both as from the Duke and from the Society.

6. Because they have made Officers of State and War, without the Duke's Privilege.

All this was deliver'd, not only in Presence of the Duke, but of the King himself, and whether it ought to be esteem'd a Proof of his Artifice, or Plain-dealing, it is not yet time to determine. The Lords, it seems, from this Specimen, either thought his Revelations of such Importance, or thought it of such Importance to come to the Bottom of his Revelations, that they appointed the next Day for him to make his Narrative at large: And, that they might be the better able to judge of his Confistency, if not his Veracity, they address'd his Majesty for the several Papers of Whitebread and Mico (Jesuits) which had been seiz'd, as also the Minutes of Oates's Examination at the Council Board.

According to Order, Oates the next Day made his Appearance again at the Bar, and wearied out his Lungs, before he had exhausted his Memory; being oblig'd to withdraw to refresh himself, before he could finish his Story: But in the Afternoon, as if re-inspir'd as well as recruited, he fell into such a Detail, grew to circumstantial and prolix, that the Lords grew weary in their turn; and gave him to understand, that he was not expected to be so very particular, as to Facts: But if there were any particular Persons concern'd in them, of what Quality soever, the House expected he should name them: Notwithstanding which, he kept to those he had already nam'd in his Narrative, nor could name any other.

Upon the Whole, to shew the high Sense the House had of his Merit and Importance, he was told by the Lord Chancellor, That the House took very well what he had done: That they had recommended to the (Lord General) Duke of Monmouth, to take care of the Safety of his Person; to the Lord Chamberlain, for better Accommodation of Lodgings; and to the Lord High Treasurer of England, to supply him with Necessaries.

And the very next Day, after all this Countenance had been shewn, and Encouragement given, to the Informer, the Information itself receiv'd the Sanction of both Houses, NEMINE CONTRADICENTE, in the following extraordinary Terms:

Resolved, That, upon the Evidence that has already appeared to this House, the House is of Opinion, there hath been, and still is, a damnable and heinous Plot, contriv'd and carry'd on by the Popish Recusants,

That Houses adopt the Plot.

"sants, for the assassinating and murdering the King, and for subverting the Government, and rooting out and destroying the Protestant Religion."

The Words of this Vote were fram'd by the Commons, and by them communicated to the Lords, at a Conference, for their Concurrence, with the following Comment thereupon:

"The House of Commons, being very sensible of the imminent Danger both the King and Kingdom are in, do think it their Duty to acquaint your Lordships therewith; and do pray your Lordships will be pleas'd to take it into your serious Consideration, what Remedies are fit and suitable to be apply'd for the preserving the King's Person and Government; to which the Commons shall readily concur, as they doubt not of your Lordships Concurrence to such Remedies as have, or shall be, by them propos'd to your Lordships, for effecting this great End."

To which the Lords reply'd, That they did most readily and unanimously concur with the Commons in their Vote; that they were very glad to see that Zeal which the Commons had shewn upon this Occasion; and did fully concur with them, that the most speedy and serious Consideration of both Houses was necessary for preventing these imminent Dangers. In order whereunto, their Lordships had resolv'd to sit de Die in Diem, Forenoon and Afternoon, and desired the House of Commons would do so too. That when their Lordships should have well consider'd of it, and proper Remedies for these Dangers, they would be ready to communicate them to the House of Commons, and would also take in good part, whatever shall be communicated to them by the House of Commons; and would suffer nothing to be wanting on their Parts, which might preserve a good Correspondence between both Houses, which was absolutely necessary to the Safety of the King and Kingdom.

On the very same Day that there had been this solemn Intercourse between the two Houses, and both had thus formally adopted and authoris'd the Plot, the Funeral of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, was celebrated with such Circumstances of Parade; that if the political Undertakers of those Times had made it their Study to rouse the Passions of the Populace, and prepare them for any Impressions but those of Truth and Sobriety, they could not have proceeded more happily. As the Prologue to this tragical Shew, the Body was, the next Day after it was found, "brought to Town, says Mr. North, with a prodigious Attendance of Rabble, and laid in the Street, expos'd to all Comers; and all that saw it went away inflam'd. It is not easy to imagine what Consternation as well as Fury this Spectacle caus'd in the Minds of the common People." The same Author adds the following detestable Piece of Sophistry:

"It was well at that time there was a fettle Government, and Guards in good Order, not without just Precaution and Resolution to secure the Public: Else, if the Leaders of this Rout, by their Emiffaries interpers'd, had infill'd into them any manner of Mischief, and hounded them on, in all Probability, they had gone, with all the Rage of Madmen upon it, whatever Maffacre and Destruction had follow'd." Bishop Burnet says, "The Body lay two Days expos'd, many going to see it, who went away much mov'd with the Sight; and, indeed, Mens Spirits were so sharpen'd upon it, that we all look'd on it as a very great Happiness, that the People did not vent their Fury upon the Papists about the Town." And even the Railer, Oldmixon, himself, is pleas'd to acknowledge, "the People were strangely affected with the Funeral of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey," which, for the more Offentation, was so order'd as to set out from Bridewell, whence it proceeded to St. Martins in the Fields. Seventy-two Divines leading the way, and above a thousand Persons of Quality and eminent Citizens, following in Train. And at the Sermon, which was preach'd by Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, besides the Preacher, says Mr. North, two other thumping Divines stood upright in the Pulpit, one on each Side of him, to guard him from being kill'd, while he was preaching, by the (m) Papists."

By this time the Plot which had hitherto halt'd on the single Evidence of Cates, receiv'd an Additional Prop, by the coming in of one William Bedles, who is thus characteris'd by Bishop Burnet: "He had led a very vicious Life; he had gone by many false Names, by which he had cheated many Persons; he had gone over many Parts of France and Spain as a Man of Quality; and he had made a Shift to live by his Wits, or rather by his Cheats; so a Tenderness of Conscience did not seem to be that to which he was subject."

As soon as the several Proclamations relating to Godfrey's Death were publish'd, this Person set out suddenly for Bristol; but on the Road (at Newbury) calls for Pen, Ink, and Paper to write, as he said, to Secretary Coxworthy, which he did, and sent his Letter by the Post, saying, at the same time to a Woman-Passenger, who went down with him in the Coach, "That if the Business of that Letter succeed'd, he would present her with a Diamond Ring." This Letter was dat'd October 28. November 2. the Secretary answers according to his Expectation; namely, dchres

(m) Mr. North proceeds as follows:

"I did not see this Spectre, but was credibly told by some that affirmed they did see it; and altho' I have often mentioned it, as now I do, with Precaution, yet I never met with any that ever contradicted it. A most portentous Spectacle sure! Three Parsons in one Pulpit! Enough of itself, on a less Occasion, to excite Terror in the Audience. The Day, I guess, was never seen before, and, probably, will never be seen again; and it had not been so now, as is most evident, but for some Stratagem deriv'd upon the Impetuosity of the Mob. And, however clear of the Black Purports of the Plotters, we cannot acquit their Reverencies of some lower Designs, relating to the Royal Family, and the Succession, which should not have been found covered with their venerable Habits, who could thus pretend to do Evil, that Good, in their Sense, might come of it."

A. D. 1678. desires him either to come to Town clandestinely, according to his own Expression, or to make use of an Order from the (n) Mayor of Bristol, as he thought fit; which Bedloe had desir'd, and which the Mayor was author'd to grant. Bedloe chose the last, procures himself to be taken up at Noon-Day, upon the Talley or Exchange, notwithstanding his Caution of Privacy; leaves Bristol the 5th, and on the 7th was examin'd by the two Secretaries, in Presence of his Majesty, touching the Murder of Godfrey, which he swore was committed at Somerſet Houſe, by one Walſh, & Phaire, Jesuits, and two Lay-Men: At the same time, declaring also upon Oath, That he could ſay nothing at all as to the Plot that was then in Queſtion. But, on the very next Day, being brought before the Lords, by the King's Directions, to give the same Account he had done the Evening before to his Majesty, that is to say, concerning the Murder of Godfrey, he, all at once, made a Transition to the Plot, and declar'd, That two of the Persons he had nam'd, as the Murderers, viz. Walſh and le Phaire, had inform'd him, that the Lord Bellasis had a Commission to command Forces in the North, the Earl of Powis in South Wales, and that Lord Arundel of Wardour had a Commission to grant Commissions to whom he pleas'd; that Coleman was a great AGITATOR in the Designs against the King; that he asking them why he had not been sooner let into the Secret concerning the King's Death, they answer'd, none were permitted to know it, but such as Lord Bellasis nominated.— Here he stopp'd short, desiring time to put his whole Narrative in writing, which he said he had begun. And being asked if he knew Tina Oates, answer'd in the Negative, without any Reservation.

Ibid. p. 16. Declares on his Oath to the King, that he knew nothing of the Plot. Lords Journ.

Commons Ad- dress'd for printing Coleman's Letters.

This new Evidence produc'd a new Course of Orders and Proclamations. Somerſet Houſe was immediately to be search'd for Arms and Papers, not excepting the Queen's Closet, Cabinet and Council-Chamber: And the King was address'd for a Proclamation to apprehend Walſh, le Phaire, Fritchard, Coyers, Simmond, and Cottaway, as Persons guilty of the damnable and hellish Plot.

By this time the Commons had prepar'd an Address, and sent it up to the Lords for their Concurrence; importing, That whereas a most wicked Design had been carry'd on for several Years past for the utter Extermination of the Protestant Religion and the established Government; and that it was necessary to proceed against the Persons concern'd with an unusual Secrecy, the House did humbly conceive, that the best way to satisfy the Minds of the People, and stop the Mouths of the Papists, would be to publish some undeniable Evidence of their Transactions here, and Correspondences abroad; and therefore humbly desir'd that his Majesty would order Coleman's Letters to (o) la Chaise to be printed till a farther Narrative of the Particulars relating to the horrid Conspiracy might be publicly set forth.

The Court was alarm'd at this Proceeding, which seem'd to have a dangerous Tendency, and to affect the Duke of York in a very particular manner, who had been directly struck at in two several Motions. In order, therefore, to qualify the Venom of it as much as possible, it was thought advisable for the King himself to fall in with the Humour of the Times, and to put in for his Share of Popularity, by countenancing what he did not believe.

Accordingly, November 9, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and, having sent for the Commons, address'd himself to both Houses as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen.

"I am so very sensible of the great and extraordinary Care you have already taken, and still continue to shew for the Safety and Preservation of my Person in these Times of Danger, that I could not satisfy myself without coming hither on purpose to give you all my most hearty Thanks for it. Nor do I think it enough to give you my Thanks only, but I hold myself oblig'd to let you see withal, That I do as much study your Preservation too as I can possibly; and that I am as ready to join with you in all the Ways and Means that may establish a firm Security of the Protestant Religion, as your own Hearts can wish; and this not only during my Time, of which I am sure you have no fear, but in future Ages, even to the End of the World. And therefore I am come to assure you, that whatsoever Bills you shall present, to be pass'd into Laws, to make you safe in the Reign of my Successor (so they tend not to impeach the Right of Succession, nor the Descent of the Crown in the true Line; and so as they restrain not my Power nor the just Rights of any Protestant Successor) shall find from me a ready Concurrence. And I desire you withal, to think of some more effectual Means for the Conviction of Papists Recusants, and to expedite your Councils as fast as you can, that the World may see our Unanimity; and that I may have an Opportunity of shewing you how ready I am to do any thing that may give Comfort and Satisfaction to such dutiful and loyal Subjects."

In the Days of Q. Elizabeth, this Speech had been receiv'd with unfeign'd Acknowledgments, because understood to be sincere; But in these distracted Times, the mutual Confidence that should subsist between the Sovereign and his Lieges, had been mutually forfeited: The King dreaded the People; the People distrust'd the King: Both had Reason; for neither had Virtue. Hence counterfeit Grace was rewarded with counterfeit Loyalty: And instead of cordial Endeavours to assist, their common Study was to over-reach, each other.

In this very speech, his Majesty took care to guard against the Parliament's asking too much; and thence they concluded he meant to perform too little: So that Words produced nothing but Words. He had spoken graciously, and they humbly and heartily thank'd him; which is all we hear of this Royal Proposal for the future Safety of the Protestant Religion.

And as for the Address for printing Coleman's Letters, the Lords, after a long Debate, refus'd to join in it, and so it came to nothing.

In this Interval Bedloe had given in his Depositions to the Lords Committees relating to Godfrey's Murder, and completed his Narrative of the Plot. Concerning the first he depos'd, he had been offer'd by le Phaire and Walsh, about the Beginning of October last, a Reward of 4000*l.* if he would be one of the Four or Six that should kill a Man that was a great Obstacle to their Designs; which, it seems, he at first agreed to, but afterwards not liking the Proposal, wilfully fail'd of: Notwithstanding which, so thoroughly was le Phaire infatuated, that on the Monday-Night after the Fact was committed, in the Middle of the great Court at Somerfet House, he let Bedloe into the whole Secret; that the Person was kill'd; that the Body then lay in Somerfet House; that he might still have half the Reward before offer'd, if he would only help to remove it; and that himself, Walsh, the Lord Bellaſſi's Gentleman, Ashkins (Clerk to Mr. Pepps, Secretary to the Navy) and one that he (Bedloe) believ'd belong'd to the Queen's Chapel, were to be the other Assiliants: That the said le Phaire then led him by the Hand to the Room where the Body lay: That, by the Help of a Dark Lanthorn, which le Phaire took from under his Coat, the Deponent saw the Persons before nam'd, of whom he knew le Phaire, Walsh, and the Person presum'd to belong to the Chapel: And the other two, who own'd themselves to be, one the Servant of Lord Bellaſſi's, and the other, Clerk to Mr. Pepps: That they all agreed to carry the Body in a Chair to Clarendon House, and thence in a Coach to the Place where it was afterwards found; at eleven o'Clock that Night ('twas now between eight and nine) That they threw off a Cloak, which lay on the Body, and shew'd it to the Deponent: That he asking who it was, they told him, an old Man who belong'd to a Person of Quality, who had taken some Examinations tending to the Discovery of their Design: That the Deponent then ask'd, why it was not more proper to kill the Person of Quality himself? And that they answer'd, "No; for this Man had the Depositions in his own Custody, and that their Design of getting him thither, was to get him to send for them by fair Means or foul, and that they did not question but the next Examination would be so contrary to that, it would appear upon their (p) TRIALS, two several Stories; and that when they should be brought to TRIAL, upon the latter Examination, they would (q) produce the former to contradict it, that it might seem Partiality to the World." That the Deponent then made an Excuse to leave them for half an Hour; but return'd no more: That meeting le Phaire the next Day, by accident, he (Bedloe) excus'd his last Breach of Promise, by pleading that he was unwilling to come, because he knew the Person, naming Godfrey: That le Phaire not only admitted his Excuse, after these two Failures, but trusted him yet further, by explaining when, how, and where, they decoy'd the Justice into their Power; and consenting, that, on his declaring he had sent the Examinations to Court, and refusing to answer any more Questions, he himself, Walsh, Lord Bellaſſi's Gentleman, and the other two, fill'd him with a Pillow, as they thought; but finding he still struggled for Life, completed the Jobb, by strangling him with a long Cravat; and that they had made a Wound in his Body, and laid his Sword on him in the Fields, that it might be thought he had killed himself, which he appear'd confident would be the thing believed.

This was Bedloe's Account of the Murder; and as to the Plot, he was now able to enlarge to the following Effect:

That his first Employment among the Jesuits was, to carry a Letter from the Lady Abbess of the English Nuns at Dunkirk to Sir John Warner, and other Jesuits, at St. Omers; which he open'd by the way, and found it to be a Recommendation of himself, as one wholly fit to be employ'd in the DESIGN: That he was sent from thence to Antwerp, and after that to Doway, to be initiated by degrees: That, at the last of these Places, he was inform'd, in confidence, That a DESIGN was now in hand to make England happy, both as to Body and Soul, by which his Fortune was to be made, if he continued faithful to the End: That he was sent from thence to England, with a Latin Letter to Father Harcourt, after receiving the Sacrament four times, as the Seal of Secrecy: That Harcourt employ'd him as a Letter-Carrier for four Months; at the End of which time he was posted to Paris; and thence, with a very great Packet of Letters, to Monsieur de Mearns, containing, as he was inform'd, Orders to several Persons, by him named, to hold a Consultation; as also, Intelligence, that at Rome, and all Places beyond the Seas, the Business went on very well: That, after this, he came again to London, and kept company with Harcourt, le Phaire, and other Jesuits, by whom he was again sent to St. Omers, and thence to Doway; where Dr. Gage, the Rector of the English College, inform'd him, "That in a Year, or something more, they did not at all question but to be establish'd at Christ-Church College in Oxford; and to see England flourish in the true Religion

Religion of Rome: "That on his (Belloc's) asking, what they would do with the King? the said Rector answer'd, They would keep him well in a Convent: And again, who should govern in chief? "That a Tender should be made of the Crown to one, if he would acknowledge it from the Church; but that they believ'd he would not accept it; in which case, the Government should be left to certain Lords, under the Nomination of the Pope: "Which Lords he had since (that is to say, after a Journey to Paris, another to Spain, and a third to England) learn'd from le Pbaire, Walsh, Pritchard, and Lewis, were the Lord Arundel, in chief; the Lord Belleis, as General; with Mr. Thimbleby of Ernham, and several others, of whom Sir Ratcliff was one; who was to command in the North; and to receive from Flanders TEN THOUSAND MEN, to be land'd in Bridlington-Bay: That the seizing of Hull was to be their first Enterprize: That the Lords Paris and Peter were to form an Army in Rudolfshire; who were to march to Milford-Haven, to join another Army, consisting of TWENTY or THIRTY THOUSAND RELIGIOUS-MEN AND PILGRIMS, which were to land there from St. Jago in Spain: That this Design was just ready to be put in execution, when the Design against the King's Person was discover'd, upon which Occasion, le Pbaire had again oblig'd him to take the Sacrament to be true to the Cause: That asking him (le Pbaire, the most communicative Person in the World) how, and where, the King was to be dispatch'd? he answer'd, "It was design'd several Ways, and at several Times; but the certain Way they had pitch'd upon was, in his Morning Walks at New-market; and that Conyers had undertaken to do it: That one Kevis was to kill the Duke of Monmouth, Pritchard the Duke of Buckingham, Knight the Earl of Staffbury, Oncale the Earl of Offory; and somebody, whose Name he had forgot, the Duke of Ormond: That when these Persons were remov'd, they made no question of managing the rest: For they would give such great Pay, that all sorts of Malcontents, and Persons of desperate Fortunes, would be ready to serve them: That whatever should happen, the Power they had was sufficient: That they had FORTY THOUSAND MEN ready in London, BESIDES those that would, on the Alarm, be posted at every ALE-HOUSE DOOR, to kill the Soldiers, as they came out of their Quarters: That for Money, Lord Stafford, Coleman, and Ireland, had enough to go thro' all this: That several Gentlemen had great Sums to contribute likewise: That Captain Spalding was to surrender the Castle of Chryslow: That he (Belloc) was to have his four thousand Pounds, as being one that would murder a Man; as also a Commission from Lord Belleis, with a Benediction from the Pope: And that, when he ask'd, how they would establish their Government? his friendly Informer answer'd; Securely enough; for they did intend utterly to extinguish all sorts of People that would not be really converted to the Church of Rome.

Here he said, he had no more to add, that he could then remember; but presently recollected farther, That he had been inform'd by le Pbaire, That Conyers, who had undertaken to kill the King, was the Lord Belleis's Confessor; as also that, if any Person concern'd in the Plot was imprison'd, they would, by one means or other, kill them before they should come to their Trials, tho' they burnt the Prisons where they were in custody: That Gwerissey and Jersey were to be surpriz'd by a Power from Dress and other Places of France, and that some French Ships had been in and about the Channel all this Summer upon the same Occasion. And finally, that le Pbaire, Pritchard, Lewis, Kevis, Walsh, England, Latham, Stapleton, Sheldon, and Dr. Gage, had often told him, that there was not a Roman Catholic in England of any Quality, or Credit, but was acquainted with this Design of the Popsist, and had receiv'd the Sacrament to be secret and assistant in carrying it on.

Such was the Deposition of Belloc, as reported to the House of Lords from their Committee by the Marquis of Winchester, November 12. And to give it an additional Weight with their Lordships, the Informations of four other Persons were annex'd to it; who testify'd they had seen him in Company with le Pbaire and Walsh.

The Marquis himself, also declar'd, That the Lords Committees having conjur'd the said Belloc to speak nothing but Truth, he did, in the Presence of GOD, as he should answer it at the Day of Judgment, assure all to be true he had depos'd.

This second Sever of the Nation made also his Appearance before the House of Commons, November 18; and in the Speaker's Chamber not only ran through his Part again, but, his Recollection being strengthened by use, enliv'n'd it with fresh Matter, namely, That the Lord Carrington was in the Conspiracy for raising Money and Men to carry on the Design against the King's Person and Government; and that the Lord Brudenel was, also, one of the Conspirators; having confessed to him (Belloc) that he was going into the North to further it; and that Lord Carrington was to raise five thousand Pounds, and a proportionable Number of Men in order to join the Lord Belleis.

Upon this the Commons call'd upon the Lord Chief Justice to issue his Warrant for apprehending the said Lord Carrington; but his Lordship absconded till the next Day, when he returned to the House of Peers, and in his Place, with great Earnestness, disavow'd the Charge, asserted his Innocence, and submitted himself to their Lordships Pleasure; which was, to take him out of the Power of the Lord Chief Justice, in order to commit him to the Custody of the Black Rod.

All the other Persons, mention'd in Belloc's Narrative, wherever residing, were moreover seiz'd at their several Dwellings, and committed without Mercy: Nay, that no one Opportunity might be lost of letting loose Parliamentary Vengeance; nor no one Criminal escape, the Lords Committees were arm'd with Blank Warrants, and authoriz'd by order of the House to fill them up with what Names they pleas'd, with a Salvo to the Members of their own House.

So dreadful a Spirit had these Informers rais'd, and so dangerous it was to be within its Circle.

On the very Day that Bedloe had given in his supplemental Evidence to the Commons, the House was further inform'd that, since the Meeting of Parliament, and Discovery of the Papists Conspiracy, several Commissions had been given to Papists Recusants to serve in the Army; as also Warrants, that they should be mulcted, notwithstanding they had not taken the Oaths and subscrib'd the Declaration, as requir'd by Act of Parliament. All which were counterign'd by Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State.

This was like so much Wild-Fire thrown among Combustibles. Sir Joseph was immediately call'd upon; and acknowledging the Fact, was in a Flame of Repentment sent to the Tower, not as a Servant of the King, but a Member of the House. This the King resent'd as highly on the other side: And sending for the Commons the next Day to the Banqueting House, gave them to understand, "That tho' they had committed his Servant without acquainting him, yet he intended to deal more freely with them, and acquaint them with his Intention to release him."

The Commons being return'd to the House, and having taken his Majesty's Speech into Consideration, voted an Address, in which they set forth the Facts that appear'd against the Secretary, and pleaded the present imminent Danger of his Majesty's Person (the Safety whereof was, above all things most dear to them) in Excuse of their Proceedings: But, withal, humbly desir'd his Majesty not to discharge Sir Joseph; as, also, that he would recall all Commissions granted to Papists, in any Part of his Dominions. His Majesty reply'd, that he had discharg'd his Secretary, before he receiv'd their Address, as he had declar'd he would; but promis'd to recall the Commissions in question, according to the Desire of the House.

Indeed, such were the Apprehensions, and such the Violence of the Times, that every thing, branded with the Name of Papish, underwent a Proscription: A Bill was brought in, to disable all Persons to sit in either House, who refus'd to take a Test against Papery; in which not only Transubstantiation was renounced, but Image-worship of all kinds was declar'd to be Idolatrous: And notwithstanding the Birthright of the Peers, to sit and vote in Parliament, had, a few Years before, been represented as so (*) sacrosanct, and radically inherent in the Peerage, it pass'd the Lords, as well as Commons, from whom it had its Origin.

His Royal Highness the Duke, deeply affected on this Occasion, mov'd for a Proviso to exempt himself. He said with great Earnestness, and, with Tears in his Eyes, That he was now to cast himself upon their Barnet. *Favour, in the greatest Concern he could have in this World; added much of his Duty to the King, and Zeal for the Nation; and solemnly protested, that, whatever his Religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own Soul: Notwithstanding all which, he carried his Point but by two Voices; and, on passing the Bill, enter'd his Protest, being follow'd by the Duke of Norfolk; the Earl of Berkshire; the Lords *Hunsdon, Audley, Stourton, Cardigan, and Trybam.

That the Court might be also purg'd, as well as the Parliament, and the Army, Care was taken to add a Clause, or Clauses, to the Bill just mentioned, to oblige all the Servants of the King, Queen, Duke, and Duchefs, to take the said Test, or be render'd incapable: And this was clamour'd for with as much Heat, as if the Fate of the Kingdom had depended on it.

There is a Speech in the State Tracts of these Times, ascrib'd to the Lord Lucas, perhaps Lucas, which carries this Matter not only to an indecent, but a ridiculous Length; and yet such an Infatuation attends on Party-Heats, that Men have been found foolish enough to adopt and perpetuate those very Words, that his Lordship, when the Eagerness of the Debate was over, would, no doubt, have gladly blotted out of his own Memory:—"I would not, said he, have so much as a popish Man, or a popish Woman, to remain here; not so much as a popish Dog, or a popish Bitch, nor so much as a popish Cat to pur or mew about the King." It appears, however, that this Over-vehemence had little Effect on the House: The Lords, on the contrary, were for mollifying the extreme Rigour of the Commons; and return'd the Bill with Amendments, in favour of the foreign Servants of the Queen and Duchefs; which the Commons rejected; assigning for their principal Reason, as above, their excessive Concern for his Majesty's Safety: This brought the Matter again before the Lords; who, finding the Person of the King thus thrown in their Way, gave up the Men-Servants, and insisted only on certain Women-Servants, from whom no Assassination could be reasonably expected. The Commons reduc'd this Number to Nine; and there the Contest ended, which had been hurry'd on, not only with Passion, but Outrage; especially in the House of Commons; where even Blows were exchange'd between Sir (x) Jonathan Trelowney and one Mr. Ash; and all things were carry'd, as if the Representatives of the Nation had been only the Representatives of the Mob.

Another Scene of the Plot now unfolds itself. Both Oates and Bedloe, tho' they had so largely unboisom'd themselves before to the King and Council, and both Houses of Parliament, had still in them a little Reserve, which the Crisis called upon them to discharge.

Each Journal.

And first Oates, (r) November 24, deposes upon Oath, before Mr. Secretary Coventry, That, in the Month of July, he saw a Letter from Sir George Wakeman to Rich. Timbleby, in which he assures him, that the QUEEN would assist him to poison his sacred Majesty: And that, in the latter Part of the same Month, the Deponent waited upon Keines, Langworth, Harcourt, and Fenwick, (Jesuits) to Somerfet-houfe, where the Queen then was, and, in an Anti-chamber where he was left, did hear the Queen say, She would take those Affronts no longer, that had been done unto her; and that she would revenge the Violation of her Bed: Adding, that, being immediately after presented to her Majesty, he saw no living Soul there, but her Majesty and the said Fathers: That he heard the Queen say, she would assist in the Propagation of the Catholic Religion: That she had, by one Coker, a Benedictine Monk, given several Sums of Money, to pervert his Majesty's Subjects, as the said Deponent did believe: That several Sums had been to us'd by the Jesuits, in her Majesty's Name; and in particular, that 5000*l.* had been paid to them by her Majesty, in order to destroy the Person of his Majesty, and subvert Religion and Government; as appear'd by several Instructions from the Queen to the said Jesuits, as the Jesuits themselves confess'd to the Deponent.

The next Day he confirm'd all these Particulars upon Oath, as before, in the Face of the King and Council; with some additional Circumstances; as, That Sir G. Wakeman did, in his Letter to Timbleby, alias Ashey, declare his own good liking of the Proposals about poisoning the King, provided good Terms might be had: That the Meeting at Somerfet-houfe was in obedience to a Summons from the Queen: That he, with some others whom he did not remember, were left in a Room without; yet the Door not being quite close, he, by listening, had overheard the Words above-recited, deliver'd in a Woman's Voice: That on his being presented to her Majesty, to his thinking, she gave him a gracious Smile: And that he saw a Letter, which Mico had prepar'd, to the General of the Jesuits; wherein mention was made of 5000*l.* given by the Queen; 4000 at one time, and 1000 at another. He was then interrogated, 1. How he came to see this Letter? To which he reply'd, that Mico, the Secretary of the Order, had consulted him upon a Latin Phrase in it. 2. Why he had conceal'd so important a Matter so long? His Answer was, That he had much Distrust with himself in his Judgment about the Discov'ry of it:

That he had once intended to disclose it, upon Sir George Wakeman's Business at the Board; but was willing his Majesty should know it first in private. An Objection to the Fact being also started, from a Recollection, that, after Pickering, who was to have kill'd the King with a Pistol and Silver Bullets, had been disciplin'd for having fail'd in it (which was before the Consult in April last) the Execution of the Affair was left to other Hands; he answer'd, That the Design had been form'd ever since the Year 1670; that he knew her Majesty, let her Virtues be what they would, held Correspondence with the Bishop of Rome, &c. That she was not to act till Matters were ripe, nor till all other Means fail'd.

Being put in mind, that he had declar'd, at the Lords Bar, that he had no more to say against any Person of Quality; he reply'd, That his Meaning was, that he had no more to say against any Member of that House. Nor did he fail to remind the Council, in his turn, That he then desir'd to be press'd no farther, that his Evidence might not be superfluous. Having intimated, that he could not tell the precise Day when he heard these Words in a Woman's Voice; and being farther question'd, how he came to be so defective in this Article, when in other things he had refer'd himself to his Papers; he declar'd, that he had not committed this thing to Writing; nor daring to trust more with it than his own Soul; yet hop'd he might recollect (*) something as to the very Time; and he would examine his Papers.

Being ask'd, whether he knew Bedloe before? he reply'd, It was like he had seen him; but, if he had, it was in Spain, when he went by the Name of Williams; and not as concern'd in this Business.

Being ask'd, how many several Hands he could write? his Answer was, That he wrote differently, as his Pen was; but when he saw a Hand that pleas'd him, he endeavour'd to imitate the same.

And being farther ask'd, why he had omitted so material a thing against Sir George Wakeman, as the dangerous Letter written by him to Timbleby? he answer'd, He was faint and weak at that time, having been up two Nights together.

Having dropt, by the way, that, tho' he was never at the Place where he heard the Words, before nor since, he believ'd he should know the Room again if he saw it, the Lords Ossory and Bridge-water were directed to take him to Somerfet-houfe, that he might authenticate his Evidence, in some degree, by finding it out: But when he came there, none of the Rooms, it seems, tally'd with his Remembrance; and he continu'd to talk of a light Pair of Stairs, Rooms large and high, and great Folding-doors, that could not be found.

The 27th, Bedloe took his Turn to attend the Council-board, and, for his Encouragement

(r) His first Application to the King, on this Subject, was on the 15th. (*) He afterwards nam'd St. James's Day.

ment to speak out, was told by the Lord Chancellor, that the King had order'd the Attorney-General to prepare his Pardon for all Concealments of Treason, from the Beginning of the World to the 20th of that Instant November.

Hereupon, having first sanctify'd his Lips with the Touch of the Holy Gospel, he proceeded to depose, That, about the latter End of April, or the Beginning of May, last was Twelve-month, a Consult was held in the Chapel-Gallery at Somerfet-houfe; where were present the Lord Bellasis, and as he thought, the Lord Poncis, Coleman, le Phaire, Pritchard, Lutbam, Sheldon, two Frenchmen in Orders, whom he took to be Abbots, two other Persons of Quality, whose Faces he did not see; and amongst them the Queen: That, farther, Coleman and Pritchard told him, that, after the Consult, the Queen wept at what was propos'd there, but was over-persuaded to content, by the Strength of the two Frenchmen's Arguments: That, during the Consult, he (Bedloe) was walking in the Chapel below, with other Persons, of whom he only remember'd Walsh and the Chapel-keeper: That, after the Consult was over, the Queen came thro' the Room where the Priests dress themselves; and that he then observ'd some Alteration in her Majesty: That he was, after this, dispatch'd by Coleman with Letters for France: That he went by the way of Cambray, where he overtook Stapleton, for whom he had Letters; which the said Stapleton read by a Key or Cypher, and then said, Well, I am glad we have brought her to it; we are now better back'd than ever: That he the Deponent did not know what they meant by her: That Stapleton added, They got ground every Day; that it was better a hundred Kings should be destroy'd, than that the Catholic Religion should not be propagated: And that the Contents of those Letters were about subverting the Government.

It was a known thing, that his Majesty was not over-fond of his Consort; and it was generally believ'd, he would have been glad of another, as well for the sake of Issue as Variety. Here then was the fairest Opportunity imaginable laid before him, to do what he was thought to desire most: A Charge of High-Treason, brought home to her Majesty's Life by an Overt-Act, and supported by a Brace of Witnesses; and all this, at a time when the People were so exasperated against the Presumptive Heir, that any Expedient, of any kind, to set him aside, would have met with a hearty Welcome.

But to the King's Honour it ought to be remember'd, that, instead of embracing it, he attended to the Depositions with Indignation; and was heard to say, according to Mr. North, They think I have a mind to a new Wife; but for all that, I will not see an innocent Woman abus'd. Certain it is, that, upon this Occasion, he caus'd Oates to be clapt up in close Confinement, his Papers to be seiz'd, his Servants to be dismiss'd, and no body to be admitted to converse with him, unless one of the Clerks of the Council were present.

Both Walsh and Poncis gave the same Evidence to the Commons.

Notwithstanding which, the very Day after Bedloe's Examination, the same Gentlemen found their Way to the House of Commons, before whom they told the same Story; and from whom it receiv'd such Countenance, that the following Address was immediately prepar'd, and order'd to the Lords for their Concurrence, viz.

"We your Majesty's loyal and dutiful Subjects, the _____ and Commons in Parliament assembled, having receiv'd Information, by several Witnesses, of a most desperate and traitorous Design and Conspiracy against the Life of your most Sacred Majesty; wherein, to their great Astonishment, the QUEEN is particularly charg'd, and accus'd: In discharge of our Allegiance, and out of our Affection and Care for the Preservation of your Majesty's Sacred Person, and, consequently, of the whole Kingdom, do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that the QUEEN, and all her Family, and all Papists, or reputed or suspected Papists, be forthwith removed from your Majesty's Court at White-hall."

Address of the House on that Occasion.

This Address was communicated to the Lords, at a Conference, with an Intimation, That the House was in Amaze, when they consider'd the Danger both of the King and his Government.

The Lords, no doubt, were amaz'd likewise, when the said Conference and Address were reported: But that their Concern might not get the better of their Reason, they postpon'd the Consideration of it till the next Morning; and, in the mean time, order'd the two Witnesses to attend the House by Nine o' Clock; the Clerk of the Council to produce the several Depositions they had made before the Council; and the Judges to be present.

All this was perfectly agreeable to the Dignity and Justice of the House; and the illustrious Quality of the Royal Personage accus'd; who, aware of the Storm, that was ready to fall upon her, had before taken Occasion to claim the Friendship, or rather the Protection of the House.

The Occasion this: When Bedloe had first laid the Scene of Godfrey's Tragedy at Somerfet House, and the Lords had, in Consequence, order'd a Search to be made there for Arms, Papers, and suspicious Persons, her Majesty had not only given way to it, but with so much Readiness and Cheerfulness, that their Lordships thought it but a decent Compliment to vote her an Address of Thanks; in Return to which she was pleas'd to give the following Answer:

Her Majesty takes occasion to avow herself of the good Opinion of the Lords.

"That her Majesty was very sensible of the Civility of the Lords to her; and she should be extremely glad to contribute any thing on her Part, to the Discovery of this horrid Fact; and the more, because she hears it was done at Somerfet House, at the time she was there. She hop'd the Lords would continue their good Opinion of her, when any of her Concerns came before them, which would be ready to deliver from them, upon all Occasions."

This Answer was given to the House the 15th, and Oates had two Days before, desir'd a private Audience of the King, in order to unburden himself of the great Secret in Relation to the Queen.

Oates's Account of his first Application to the King, in regard to the Queen.

This Oates himself made known to the Marquis of Winchelsea; as also, that his Majesty had chose to refer him to the two Secretaries; that he had declin'd making a perfect Narrative, because Sir Joseph Williamson was present; and that Mrs. Elliot having since let him know the King would speak with him privately, he had attended accordingly, and made his said Narrative complete.

All this the Marquis specify'd to the House, on the 28th, before the Conference with the Commons; and the next Day both Oates and Bedloe attending according to order.

Both he and Bedloe examined by the Lords.

Oates, as Principal, was first call'd upon; who, previous to his Evidence, took care to set forth the Hardships and Severities he had undergone, and besought the House to interpose in his Behalf, that his Restraint might be taken off, and that his Pardon might be renew'd; because he was under Misprision of Treason.

After this Preliminary, which the Lords agreed to take into their Consideration, he set out with a Repetition of what has been already recounted: At the Close of which, being ask'd, whether Mrs. Elliot came first to him from the King, or whether he sent her first to the King? he answer'd, She came first to him, to tell him, the King would speak with him; whether from his Majesty or not, he could not tell: Adding, He never desir'd her to speak with the King. He said further, That when he went to the King, on the 15th, his Majesty was dissatisfy'd with what he said; and that he did not speak so freely as he should otherwise have done, because there was one present, whom he believ'd to be an Enemy to the King and Kingdom.

Several Questions were then put to him of the like Nature with those before started by the Council; and having return'd the like Answers, he was order'd to withdraw, that Bedloe, his Second, might communicate what he had to say by way of Confirmation. His Evidence was short, as before, but somewhat fuller: For by this time, he had farther recollect'd, That when Stapleton had uttered those significant Words, I am glad they have brought her to it, he, Bedloe, ask'd, Who was meant by HER? And Stapleton said, THE QUEEN. Being then ask'd, where he stood in the Chapel, when the Consult was above? He said, he came in from the Water-Side, through the Room where the Priests put on their Vestments; and standing below, he saw the Queen look over the Gallery. Being also ask'd whether he knew Oates? He said, he remember'd he had seen THE MAN at Val-ladeld, but knew not he was concern'd in this Business; adding, he went there by the Name of Ambrose; and that when he was formerly ask'd whether he knew him, he had deny'd it, because he knew him not by the Name of Oates, and had not then seen him here.

Mrs. Elliot was then brought to the Bar; and being ask'd upon Oath, Whether Oates had sent her first to the King, or the King had sent her first to Oates? she said, That the Lady Gerard of Bronby had told her, Dr. Tonge desir'd to speak with her; and that when they met, it appear'd the Doctor's Business was to tell her, That Oates must needs speak with the King, privately. Being then ask'd whether the Doctor had intimated what Oates was to speak to the King about? She reply'd, That by the Words he dropt, she guess'd the QUEEN was concern'd; but that he did not explain why or wherein; and that she went to the King, before he spoke with Oates, at Dr. Tonge's Desire.

Having thus finish'd with Mrs. Elliot, the several Depositions of Oates and Bedloe before the Council, as also the Address of the Commons, were severally read: A long Debate ensued, at the Conclusion of which the Question being put to agree with the Commons, it pass'd in the Negative, without either Division or Protest.

The Lords reject the Commons Address.

In this Interval, it is hard to say, whether out of Policy or Credulity, whether from a Dread of Bedloe's formidable Armies of Rebels and Invaders, or with a View to aggravate the Terrors of the People, the Commons prepar'd an Address, most humbly to desire his Majesty, that he would command all the Train'd-Bands to be in readiness, that one third Part might do Duty for 14 Days and so in Succession, the two others the same; and to require them to be very vigilant in the seizing all suspicious Persons, especially such as travel'd with Arms, or at unreasonable times, or in unusual Numbers; and, likewise, to command the Sheriffs to be ready with their Posse, &c.

Commons Address to raise the Militia.

It happen'd, however, that, in this Instance, the Zeal of the House out-ran their Knowledge; for when the said Address was left with the Lords for their Concurrence, their Lordships took time to consider how the Laws relating to the Militia stood; and, upon Inspection found, that, without farther Authority, the Militia could not be kept up above twelve Days in a Year; four of which, were for general, and the other eight, by two at a time, for particular Musters. This they communicated to the Commons at a Conference: As also that of these twelve Days, some had been already made use of by the Lieutenants of several Counties: Adding, that by his Majesty's Direction, as appear'd by the Statute, they might be kept up longer; but withal, that they could not had there was any Power to raise Money to pay them.

sent up to the Lords, for their Concurrence.

Who had it irreconcilable to the Lords.

The Lords here point out a Way by which the Kingdom might have the Benefit of its own settled, legal Forces (as the Militia was call'd in the Preamble to the Address, in contra-distinction to the standing Army:) The King could prolong the Time of their continuing in Arms; and the Commons could provide for their Pay. But the King's Name was thought to carry along with it more of Terror than Security. This Expedient, therefore, was not hearken'd to; and a Bill was brought in, and pass'd both Houses, to put the Militia on the Establishment desired.

But

The King refuses to pass the Militia-Bill.

But the King was to the full as jealous of the Power of the Sword, as the Commons were fearful of its Use and Application; and as loth to open a Possibility of its passing into their Hands, as they to contribute to the enlarging of it in his. When, therefore, the said Militia-Bill, and the other for disabling Papists from sitting in either House, were ready for the Royal Assent, viz. November 30, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and having sent for the Commons, pass'd the one, and rejected the other: On which Occasion, he express'd himself to the Effect following: "That he did not refuse to pass this Act for the Dislike of the Matter, but the Manner; because it put the Militia out of his Power for so many Days. But if it had been but for half an Hour, he would not have consented to it, because of the ill Consequences which it might have, in time to come; the Militia being wholly in the Crown: Adding, that so far as he was enabled by Law to raise the Militia, if they would provide Money for their Pay, he would employ such of them as he thought fit, and found necessary for the Safety of himself, and the Kingdom. That as for the other Bill, which was also of great Importance, and might produce ill Consequences hereafter, he had pass'd it, to oblige those who had thought it fitting at this time; and in the hope they would be careful to give him all Satisfaction for the future."

At a Crisis, when every additional Scruple in the Balance of Power was disputed on each Side; and when both were, perhaps, for throwing the Sword into their own Scale, like Brennus of old, by way of making Overweight to themselves; as it was not reasonable to expect, that the King would be over-lavish of his Prerogative, so it was not reasonable to presume, that Men, whose Passions were all on edge, would be oblig'd by halves; or that they would be more pleas'd with the carrying of one Point, than disgust'd with the Loss of another.

The Opposers thought themselves in a Situation to insist on both; and if they had lain under a Necessity to compound for one, the Disabling-Bill, as now qualify'd and reduc'd, appear'd no longer an Equivalent for the other.

Almost in the first Stage of the Plot, the Duke of York, against whom the Endeavours of the Party were principally levelled, as if convinced of his own Unpopularity, and apprehensive of the Persecution he was to expect, had taken occasion to declare in the House of Lords, "That, since he found Dislike taken by some particular Persons, at his Appearance in the Committee for foreign Affairs, and at his meeting among the Lords of the Admiralty, he would, for their Gratification, hereafter forbear." This Yielding rather encourag'd than pacify'd his Purifiers. Two express Motions, as before-hinted, were made against him; one by Lord Ruffel, for an Address to his Majesty, "That his Royal Highness might be remov'd from his Presence and Councils." Another, "That the Opinion which the Papists have of the Duke's being for them, and of their Religion, was the Cause and Occasion of the Plot." Now, tho' these Arrows did not fly home to the Mark, they flew far enough to shew where they were aim'd: Some Temperament was therefore thought necessary, at once to preserve the Succession, and quiet the Fears of the Nation, with regard to their Religion. This (in spite of the Duke's Remonstrances, who, finding the ill Success of his former Concession, was for making no more) produced the condescending Speech before-quoted; which was also accompany'd with a sort of Declaration in his Majesty's Name, which the Lord Treasurer had the Credit of circulating, That the King was willing something should be enacted, to spare the Nails of a papist Successor; but that he would never suffer his Brother to be taken away from him, or the right Line to the Crown to be interrupted.

But these two Motions prov'd unpalatable to the Majority of the House, as well as the Crown: The first was dropt, and the last rejected: Hence it was found expedient to proceed after the Manner of Jockies, who bring the Horse by degrees to bear the Object they intend to ride over. The Disabling-Bill had probably never been (a) reviv'd, if it had not been to (x) throw the Duke out of the House of Lords; and as the Proviso, in his Royal Highness's Favour, had disappointed that great View, it became, or was held, of little or no (y) Use.

Thus it appears, the King only fed the Flame he thought to extinguish; and dismiss'd the Commons more exasperated than he found them.

This was the first Bill that had been (z) rejected

(a) If it fit the Reader should recollect, that the like Attempts were made in the Thirtieth Session of this Parliament; and, in the same Session, an Address was also presented for raising the Militia.

(x) This is acknowledg'd by Ferguson, in the second Part of the Growth of Popery, p. 222.

(y) Some Writers are of Opinion, that the Court Officers found their account sufficiently in this Bill, by the Duke's being openly record'd a Papist, by Act of Parliament: But, in my humble Opinion, all that could be gain'd by a Publication of that Kind, was already gain'd, by his Royal Highness's resigning his Commissions, in the Year 1673; toward complying with the Terms specify'd in the Proviso, which was us'd to the Money-Bill, That no Papist should be capable of holding public Employment: For, by this Act of his own, his being a Papist became as universally known, as it could be made by Act of Parliament.

(z) The Party Account of this Affair is thus given by Ferguson:

Reverdy's Memoirs, p. 70.

"The Nation being in this Confusion, and expecting every Day when our Troops should be cut by the Papists, resolv'd to have the Nation in a Posture of Defence, and to raise the Militia throughout the Kingdom; and, therefore, prepar'd a Bill for that Purpose, for the Militia to be in Arms for so many Days (forty-two) which Bill pass'd both Houses without Difficulty: The Papists, and the Conspirators, (seeking to great a Harmony between the two Houses, and their Zeal to defend themselves and the Nation, as well as to secure themselves from further Mischiefs, brought themselves to this Stratagem, to divide the King from the House, and to put a Stop to the passing the Bill; fearing, that if the Militia of the Kingdom were rais'd, it would quiet the Conspirators out of their Gears, and be a Means to frustrate all their Designs, after the Parliament was dissolv'd. And they in possess'd the King with the Danger of this Bill, and that whatever he did he should not pass it, telling him, it was too great a Trust repos'd in the People, and would be of dan-rejected since the Restoration; and never could this great Privilege of the Prerogative have been exerted at a more unhappy Time: Those who then clamour'd for a King were now angry at the Exercise of kingly Power, and discours'd with such Warmth and Bitterness, on their Disappointment, that his Majesty was induc'd (a) December 4, to palliate his Refusal yet farther, by the following Message:

King's Message concerning the Militia-Bill.

"Charles R. His Majesty, to prevent all Misunderstandings that may arise from his not passing the late Bill of the Militia, is pleas'd to declare, that he will readily assent to any Bill of that kind, which shall be tender'd to him, for the public Security of the Kingdom by the Militia; so as the whole Power of calling, continuing, or not continuing them together, during the Time limited, be left to his Majesty, to do therein as he shall find most expedient for the public Safety."

To any sensible Foreigner, who saw what was passing publicly on the Stage, but who remain'd in the dark as to what was passing behind the Scenes, nothing could appear more strange and unaccountable, than to see the Leaders of the People as urgent for the Militia-Bill, as if Perdition was at the Doors; and, at the same time, as urgent to disband the Army, as if no Danger was in prospect: And nothing could appear more strange and unaccountable, to any unprejudic'd Englishman, than to hear Hebe witnessing, that such mighty Differences were on the point of embarking from Spain and Flanders, to invade Us, at the very instant that the Spaniards themselves were solliciting the Continuance of our Troops on the Continent, for their Preservation.

The Facts relating to the Army were as follow:

The Affair of the Plot in a manner engrossing the Attention of the House of Commons, and that Part of the King's first Speech, which related to providing for the Army, meeting with no manner of Regard, November 25, while the Militia-Bill was yet depending, the King came again to the House of Peers, and made another Speech on that Subject only, signifying, "that he had been forced to employ the Money for the Continuance of his Forces, which was provided for their Disbanding: That he himself was much more out of Purse for that Service: That he had undergone that Expence so long, that he found it impossible to support it any longer: That he had therefore entertain'd Thoughts of recalling his said Forces with all possible Speed, who were already expos'd to the utmost Want and Misery; being without any Prospect of farther Pay or Assistance: That, while he was about to do this, the Spanish Ministers had importun'd him to continue them a little longer, till the Ratifications of the Peace should be exchanged; without which, all that had been hitherto sav'd of Flanders would fall into the Hands of their Enemies: That he was in a great Strait between the said Importunity of the Spaniards, and his own Inability; That he had thought fit to lay the Matter before them, for their speedy Advice and Assistance; and that if they did not think it for the public Safety to continue them, no Man could wish more heartily than he, that for the public Ease, they might be immediately paid off, and disbanded."

And, that the Assertions contain'd in this Speech might be supported with proper Authorities, 1. A Memorial of the Count d'Armaux to the States-General, refusing to comprehend the Duke of Newcastle, or any of the Princes of the Empire, or even the Emperor, severally, but only in their collective Capacity, in the Peace. 2. A Memorial from Mr. Van Benninghen, the Dutch Minister, to his Majesty; setting forth the Apprehensions of his Masters, from this Procedure of the French, and the Progress of their Arms in their Neighbourhood (Cloveys and Switers) as also demanding his Majesty's Advice and Opinion thereon. 3. A Memorial of the Count d'Esmeat, the Spanish Minister; beseeching his Majesty to continue those auxiliary Troops, which he had in Flanders, for the Security thereof, as long as Affairs continu'd in their present uncertain Situation. And 4. The States Answer to the Count d'Armaux; were laid before the Lords, and it must be presum'd before the Commons too; but without the desired Effect: For, on the 27th, the latter, proceeding to the Consideration of the State of the Nation, in relation to the Army, resolv'd, Nemine contradicente, "That it is necessary for the Safety of his Majesty's Person, and Preservation of the Peace of the Government, that all the Forces which have geton. Consequence to his 1. Doc they knew what they fear'd was their own, and not the King's: And so far they wrought with the King, that he absolutely deny'd the passing the Bill; which put a great Dissent upon the People: more especially because they were furnished with unlawful, armed Men, who by quarter'd up and down the Country, upon the Insurrection, without being disbanded, as they ought to have been; and the rejecting of which Bill was look'd upon as no good Omen." [Second Part of the Growth of Popery, p. 219, 220.]

(a) Two Days before, the House order'd, that an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, containing a Representation of the present State, and Dangers of this Nation, to be presented on the following Heads, viz.

1. On the Misrepresentation of the Proceedings of this House.
2. On the Dangers that have and may arise from private Advice, contrary to the Advice of Parliament.

[The House divided on this Article, and it was carry'd in the Affirmative, Yeas 138, Noes 114.]

3. On the great Danger the Nation lies under from the Growth of Popery.

4. On the Danger that may arise to his Majesty and the Kingdom, by the Non-observation of the Laws, that have been made for the Preservation of the Peace and Safety of the King and Kingdom.

"This Day Mr. J. Berkeley, p. 1.3. almed at my Lord Treasurer, and four others of the Cabinet Council. This was carried by two-and-twenty Votes, and seven four of the Courtiers were for it; whence it was by some esteem'd, that the Duke, being no longer in Council, was grown jealous of the Treasurer, and had a mind he should be remov'd. It was now said the Duke had been persuas'd (but unjustly) that his Lordship endeavour'd to insinuate into the King, that there was something of Probability in the Accusation against the Queen, partly that he might resolve to a Divorce, and marry another, more likely to bring Children to the Crown."

A. D. 1678. have been raised since the 29th of September 1677, and all others that, since that time, have been brought over from beyond Seas from foreign Service, be forthwith disbanded: And farther, in these Words, resolved, "It is the humble Opinion and Desire of the House, that the Forces which are now in Flanders may be immediately call'd over, in order to their disbanding."

presented to the King.

These Votes were, moreover, by Order, presented to the King; and, as Mr. Secretary Coventry reported to the House, his Majesty reply'd, "That the Disbanding the Army being a Matter of great Moment, he would consult and advise with his House of Lords, before he would give an Answer." But a few Days after, December 7, the Speaker inform'd the House, that he having acquainted his Majesty, altho' it was not by Order of the House, with the Entry which had been made of the said Answer, his Majesty was pleas'd to declare, That he never gave Orders for such Answer; that his Majesty's Intention (Scruple) was only in relation to the Forces in Flanders; and that Circumstances, even as to those, were now so alter'd, that he had already given Orders for their Disbanding.

That, however, some farther Time might be gain'd, under a plausible Pretence, the Lords, at a Conference on the 10th, signify'd, that being inform'd his Majesty had sent Orders for withdrawing the Forces out of Flanders, in order to their Disbanding, many Difficulties and Dangers do occur to their Lordships, if such Rules and Orders be not established by Confidence and Advice of both Houses, that the Disbanding may be made with Safety; which their Lordships conceive cannot be, by the Addition of such a Power to the Forces already here; and do therefore propose, that the Forces already here may not be increased by the Accession of more from abroad; but that a proportionable Number of the last may be disbanded, before the Regiments from Flanders shall arrive; and that after Consideration hereof by the Commons, by the joint Advice of both Houses, a Regulation may be made accordingly.

The Commons grant a Supply for that End,

And to this the Commons agreed; but, nevertheless, proceeded to grant a Supply of 200,462*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* and prepare a Bill, which pass'd thro' all the Forms of the House by the 16th, for the effectual paying off and disbanding the Forces rais'd, or brought over from foreign Parts into this Kingdom, since Sept. 29; and withal, on such very ungrateful Terms, namely, by directing the Money to be paid into the Chamber of London, instead of the Exchequer, that it gave more Disgust than Satisfaction. The King espous'd his Ministers Resentments, and the Lords, espousing the Resentments of the King, interpos'd, thro' in a Money-Bill, in behalf of the Prerogative, started such Cavils, and made such Amendments, as shew'd they were much more solicitous to be well as Court, than to exonerate the People: At least it so appears from the following Reasons, assign'd by the Commons at a Conference, for disagreeing to the greater Part of their Lordships Amendments:

A. D. 1678. Chas. II. and Proceed. of the Commons.

That the Appointment of a Receiver-General by his Majesty, being made by their Lordships in reference to the Payment of the Money into the Exchequer; the Commons disagreeing with their Lordships in that Amendment, the Reasons of that Appointment cease.

That if the nominating a Receiver-General should be delay'd, the whole Business of disbanding would be delay'd or disappointed likewise.

That the Commons granted a Sum of Money for disbanding the Army last Year, and intrusted it to the Exchequer; but that the said Sum was employ'd for the Continuance of the Army, without disbanding one Man; and that they cannot think it safe to trust the Exchequer again, while manag'd by the same Persons.

The Commons have directed the Payment of the Money into the Chamber of London, for its Security; and that their Lordships never before chang'd any such Disposition made on a Supply granted by the Commons.

That the Commons, thinking it necessary for the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, that the Army should be immediately disbanded, to prevent all Evasions, have enumerated all ways hitherto used for that purpose, that they might be declar'd to be within the Penalties of the present Act.

That it being essential, that the Soldiers should disperse as soon as they are disbanded, the Commons do not think the Penalty of Felony too great in case of Disobedience.

That the Commons think it to continue the Preamble to the Clause of Indemnity, because it contains the Reasons for inserting that Clause in the Bill.

That this being an Act for the more effectual disbanding of the Army, the Commons did limit the Indemnity to the Officers and Soldiers, being the Persons that were to be disbanded; that, thereby they might be encourag'd to disperse, when they were satisfy'd they might return home with Safety: And the Commons not thinking it necessary or convenient to extend it any farther.

That the Commons do not think it fit to extend the Indemnity to any Person enlisted, or muster'd, since November 1; because they see no occasion why any such Person should be taken into the Army, unless it were to increase the Charge; or for some ill Purpose.

The Lords, on the other hand, at a second Conference, took occasion from the Necessity of continuing the Army, to justify the Credit and Conduct of the Exchequer, it setting aside a Parliamentary Appropriation; Notwithstanding which, they urg'd, "That they could not suspect, that any Person concern'd in disbanding the Army, would misemploy the Money which was appropriated for that Purpose, under such severe Penalties, and to be dispos'd of by Commissioners appointed by the Commons," and upon the whole, insisted on their Amendments against the Reasons of the Commons; because they conceiv'd the effectual disbanding the Army, was secur'd, as they had amended the Bill. As the Commons sent it up, they added, it would have invaded the King's declar'd Power, to have rais'd or employ'd the Army on any other Emergency; it would have disabled him from filling up the Guards and standing Troops, and furnishing the Islands out of the Forces so disbanded; which was likewise a main Reason why the Lords could not consent to make the Penalty of Felony so extensive, as to reach any to employ'd.

They also insisted on leaving out the Preamble to the Clause of Indemnity, because of the Necessity there was for the Army's Continuance.

And, instead of limiting the Indemnity to Officers and Soldiers, as the Commons had done, they thought fit to enlarge it to all other Persons; and that being a Work of Mercy, no Officer should be impeach'd or question'd for Breach of the former Act.

But if the Lords were thus preemptory, the Commons were the same; and, upon the Report of the Conference, rejected their Lordships Reasons without a Division: Tho' Sir John Reresby affirms the contrary.

Before we pursue this Affair to its final Issue, 'tis necessary to take a View of some other Transactions of the Session.

By Mr. Montagu's Letters to the Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Charles Bertie, of March 29, April 11, and June 4, 1678, and his subsequent Conduct, it appears, that his extreme Earnestness to engage the King and Lord Treasurer in a Money-Intrigue with France, and to be himself the grand Negotiator of it, arose either from his Ambition to be Secretary of State, as the Reward of his good Services, or to have it in his Power to ruin that Minister, in case he was disappointed. Those several Letters turn principally on his Wishes and Endeavours to obtain that important Post; and moreover specify that he was willing to lay down ten thousand Pounds, the Price Mr. Secretary Coventry had set on his Resignation, whenever the King gave his Consent he should come in.

But the Lord Treasurer, unwilling, perhaps, to admit such an Intriguer so far into the Secret of Business, or having Reason to suspect, if not conclude, he would be more the Tool of France, than the Servant of England, rather travers'd than forwarded his Suit, and threw all his Weight and Interest into the Scale of Sir William Temple, who, at once, both deserv'd the Trust, and declin'd the Acceptance of it. His Lordship, however, made no Secret of his Engagements to Sir William, even to Mr. Montagu himself. On the contrary, he both acknowledg'd and pleaded them in Excuse for not supporting that Gentleman's Pretensions to his Majesty: And in Return for this plain Dealing, Mr. Montagu assures his Lordship, That nothing should alter the Professions he had made of being, in Truth, his Servant.

They were, indeed, Professions, and no more: For no sooner did his Excellency apprehend that all his Projects were like to blow up, than he desir'd Leave to come over; and, that being refus'd for such solid Reasons that he himself was oblig'd to (b) subscribe to; he, nevertheless, left (c) Paris shortly after, and came privately into England; where he had the Meanses to solicit the Treasurer's (d) Protection; and, at the same time the Perfidiousness to meditate and contrive his Ruin.

If Mr. Bristane's Narrative is to be depended on, who, was Deep in Mr. Montagu's Confidence, tho' more at the Devotion of the Lord Treasurer, his Excellency no sooner set Foot on Shore, in a manner, than the French Minister, Barillon, was of his Party, and visited him afterwards, constantly and privately, four or five times a Week.

He arriv'd here from Paris in August, and in October sent for Bristane, in all Haste, to be his Agent for a Seat in the House of Commons, which, in those Days, was not essential to the holding any Place of Trust or Profit in the Government, and which he himself had formerly treated with great Contempt. Bristane went immediately Post into Sussex to procure him return'd for Grinstead; and that failing, set out on the same Errand for Northampton, where (e) he made a Shift to carry his Point.

It was not long before the Lord Treasurer had some Intimation of these Proceedings, and, fearing the worst, thought it advisable to be ready with a Countermine: In his Lordship's Letter to Sir William Temple, of November 19, we find him laying out for Intelligence; and, in particular, saying, "That Mr. Oliverant, one of the Swedish Ministers at Newquen, could tell some things, if he pleas'd, that would both spoil his (Montagu's) Plots, and his Seat in Parliament." These Things, it seems, Mr. Oliverant was prevail'd on to disclose; and on the Strength of his Information, December the 10th, Sir John Ernle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, signify'd, That he was commanded by his Majesty to inform the House of Commons, that his Majesty having receiv'd Information, that his late Ambassador in France, Mr. Montagu, a Member of this House, had held several private Conferences with the Pope's Nuncio there, without any Direction or Instruction from

(c) The French Minister then in London, Barillon and Ruviers, having given him Intimation, that tho' he had escap'd being sent to the Tower, the King would strike him out of the Council, he wrote as follows to the Lord Treasurer: "There is nothing the King can do to me but as that; for it keeps me from coming to Court, faster than any thing: Wherefore, I beg the Continuance of your Lordship's Favour to me; and that, between this and Wednesday, you will be pleas'd to find out by the King, if he intends any such thing; your Lordship's taking me into your Protection is enough to put a Stop to it, and to oblige me to all the Acknowledgments, &c."

(e) Bristane was afterwards retain'd as an Intelligence to the French Ambassador, with a Pension of a hundred Pounds for a year, and receiv'd thirty Guineas from Lady Harvy, Mr. Montagu's Sister, in part of Payment; but, as it appears, was, afterwards, induc'd to leave this Coast, and betray all to the Lord Treasurer.

from his Majesty, to the end he might know the Truth of that Matter, he had given Order for the seizing Mr. Montagu's Papers.

Upon which the House resolv'd, That no Judgment could be made, either in relation to their Member, or Privilege of the House, which may be in a great measure invaded, unless his Majesty will be graciously pleas'd to let this House know, whether the Information against Mr. Montagu was given upon Oath, or of what nature the Offence was, that was thus complain'd of.

A Committee was then appointed, instantly to wait upon the King with this Vote, who, upon their Return, inform'd the House, That they had been to wait upon his Majesty according to Order, who had sent them Word out of the House of Lords, that he was at that time very busy, and that his Majesty had rather they would attend him at Whitehall, when the House was up.

Mr. Montagu then took his Opportunity to assure the House, that the Affair then before them was a mere Artifice, contriv'd by the Treasurer to save himself; But that his Lordship had deceiv'd himself: For that, altho' most of his Letters were seiz'd, he had by good Luck sav'd the most material, which he conceiv'd might tend very much to the Safety of his Majesty's Person, and the Preservation of the Kingdom. This produc'd an Order of the House, That certain Members should be dispatch'd to bring the said Papers before the House; which was forthwith done accordingly: And Mr. Montagu himself was order'd to open the Box, and select such as he thought might be for the Service of the House, and dispose of all those which properly concern'd himself, as he pleas'd. Mr. Montagu then presented the two Letters, before quoted, dated January 17, 1677, and March 25, 1678, both which were read by the Speaker to the House, and serv'd as a lighted Match to the Train which had been long laid to blow up the Treasurer. The authoritative Words at the Bottom of the Letter, namely, This Letter is Writ by my Order, C. R. appear'd now to have no Authority at all. A Motion was made that these Letters contain'd sufficient Matter for an Impeachment; and the House dividing on the previous Question, it was carry'd in the Affirmative by a Majority of sixty-three Voices. A Committee was appointed immediately to draw up the Articles, of which Mr. Montagu was one: And a Resolution pass'd, That the Speaker should not, at any time, adjourn the House, without first putting the Question, it insisted on.

The next Day the Lord Treasurer sent Mr. Montagu's Letters of the 11th and 18th, of January, likewise before quoted; the first giving Notice of young Ruvigny's Journey to England, and his Practices among the Malcontents; And the last, among other things, mentioning old Ruvigny's Maxim, That they (the French) must first diminish the Lord Treasurer's Credit, before they could do any good in England.

These Letters, his Lordship himself affirms, the House of Commons would not permit to be read: But Sir John Reresby affirms the contrary, in his Memoirs, p. 77; as doth also one of his Lordship's own Apologists, and even the Journals of the House of Commons.

But if they were read, they had no Weight: Mr. Montagu had all the Favour usually shewn to those who impeach their Accomplices, and was thought to act so meritoriously in the Discovery, that no body car'd to reflect that he himself was the chief Promoter of the Guilt.

Six Articles against the Lord Treasurer were reported to the House on the 21st, to the following Purport, viz.

1. That he had traitorously engros'd to himself regal Power, by treating in Matters of Peace and War, with foreign Princes and Embassadors, and giving Instructions to his Majesty's own Embassadors, without the Participation of either the Secretaries of State or his Majesty's Council.

2. That he had traitorously endeavour'd to subvert the ancient and well-established Form of Government, and, instead thereof, to introduce Arbitrary Power; to effect which he had rais'd an Army to be rais'd under Pretence of a War against the French King; and had continu'd that Army, contrary to Act of Parliament; at the same time misapplying the Money given for the disbanding thereof, and wilfully neglecting to take Security of the Paymasters, &c.

3. That he, traitorously intending to alienate the Hearts and Affections of his Majesty's good Subjects from his Royal Person and Government, and to hinder the Meetings of Parliaments, and to deprive his Majesty of their safe and wholesome Council, did propose and negotiate a Peace for the French King upon Terms disadvantageous to the Interest of his Majesty and his Kingdom; for the doing whereof, he endeavour'd to procure a great Sum of Money from the French King, for enabling him (the Lord Treasurer) to carry on his said traitorous Designs and Purposes.

4. That he was Popishly affected, and had traitorously conceal'd, after he had Notice, the horrid and bloody Plot: That he had suppress'd the Evidence, and reproachfully discountenanc'd the King's Witnesses in the Discovery thereof, in favour of Popery.

5. That he had waded the King's Treasure by issuing for unnecessary Penions and secret Services, to the Value of two hundred thirty one thousand, six hundred and two Pounds, within two Years, &c. and had remov'd two of his Majesty's Commissioners in the Exchequer for refusing to consent to such his unwarrantable Actings therein, and to advance Money for private Uses.

6. That he had, by indirect Means, procur'd from his Majesty to himself divers considerable Gifts and Grants of Inheritance of the ancient Revenue of the Crown, even contrary to Acts of Parliament.

These Articles were no sooner read, than the House fell into all that Warmth and Bitterness of Spirit which impress the Stamp of Faction on both Sides. Both he that acquitted, and he that accus'd, appear'd equally under the Dominion of Passion and Prejudice; and, consequently Reason and Justice took leave of the Assembly, as having no Concern in their Decisions.

The first Motion that could be heard, was, That the Articles be committed for the greater Freedom of canvassing the Particulars they were compos'd of. But this was overru'd, by 179 Voices against 137. The next was for Candles, which was carry'd in the Affirmative by a Majority of 50. The third was to have the important Word traiterously left out of the first Article, which pass'd in the Negative, Yeas 179, Noes 141.

A Question being then stated, that the Lord Treasurer be impeach'd on the above recited Articles, a Counter Motion was made to adjourn, but without Success; the Impachers carrying their Point by 28 Voices: And lastly the House divided on the 4th Article, viz. Whether it should remain as part of the Charge against his Lordship, which also pass'd in the Affirmative, Yeas 143, Noes 119.

While this last Question was under Dispute, a younger Son of the Earl's, who had a Seat in the House, join'd Issue with the Persecutors of his Father, and made it his Request, that this Part of the Charge might be permitted to stand.—That, from thence it might appear with what sort of Zeal the whole Affair had been conducted.

Carry'd up to the Lords.

On the 23d these Articles were carry'd up to the House of Lords, and the Earl was impeach'd in the usual Forms: After which, a Motion being made, that his Lordship should withdraw, it was overru'd by a Majority of twenty.

Burnet, &amp;c. i. p. 441.

A great Debate, however, arose on the Question, Whether the Impeachment should be receiv'd as an Impeachment of High Treason, only because the Commons had added the Word High Treason in it?

It was said, the utmost that could be made of it, was to suppose it true. But even in that Case, they must needs say plainly, that it was not within the Statute.

To this it was answer'd, That the House of Commons that brought up the Impeachment, were to be heard to two Points, viz. To the nature of the Crime; and the Trial of it. But the Lords could not take upon them to judge of either of these, till they heard what the Commons could offer to support the Charge: They were bound therefore to receive the Charge, and to proceed according to the Rules of Parliament, which was to commit the Person, to impeach, and then give a short Day for his Trial; which would leave things as they were, in case the Commons could not prove the Matter charg'd to be High Treason. We are told that the (f) Debate was conducted with much Heat on both Sides: And on the Issue it appear'd the Majority were against the Commitment.

His Lordship had desir'd to be heard in his Place, while the Motion for his withdrawing was yet in Dispute; and let out with declaring his Abhorrence of Treason to be so great, "That were I sure, said he, that the dearest Child I have, were guilty of it, I would willingly be his Executioner." He then proceeded both to deny and disprove the several Articles alleg'd against him: And beginning with the first, profess'd not to understand what was meant by his assuming Regal Power, since he had never done any thing of great moment in his Life, either at home, or relating to foreign Matters, without his Majesty's Command; and particularly for the Letters then made use of against him, which were warrant'd by his Majesty's Orders given under his own Hand. The second, relating to the Army, he thought scarce needed an Answer; it being obvious that the said Army was no more rais'd by him, than every other Lord in that House: Adding, That a Treasurer must be a Fool, who was the Author of a Measure that created a Want of Money, more especially such a Devourer as an Army: And that the Charge relating to the Pay-master was false in Fact; for Security had been taken to the Sum of four hundred thousand Pounds. The third he alleg'd to be of the same nature with the first, and therefore he left the same Answer to serve for both; only he thought fit to throw in a Word with regard to his Accuser, viz. "That tho' he esteem'd it one of the greatest Misfortunes that could befall a Man, to lye under such a Charge of the House of Commons, yet he had rather be under that Misfortune, great as it was, than under his Circumstances." The fourth, which turn'd on his Inclination to Popery, and his Suspicion of the Plot, he made no Scruple to declare was not only false in every Part of it, but that it was not possible to believe it true, without believing, at the same time, that he was the greatest Fool, as well as the blackest Villain

His Lordship's extraordinary Speech.

(f) Among the Speakers on this Occasion was the Earl of Carnewick, a Lord who is said never to have spoken before in that House; who, having been heated with Wine, had more excited to display his Abilities by the Duke of Buckingham (who meant no Favour to the Treasurer, but only Ridicule) was refused, before he went up, to speak upon any Subject that should offer itself. Accordingly, he stood up, and delivered himself to this Effect:

My Lords,

I understand but little of Latin, but a good deal of English, and not a little of the English History, from which I have learnt the Mischief of such kind of Prosecutions as these, and the ill Fate of the Prosecutors. I could bring many Instances, and tho' very ancient; but, my Lords, I shall go no further back than the latter End of Queen Elizabeth's Reign: At which time the Earl of Essex was run down by Sir Walter Raleigh. My Lord Roos, he was run down by Sir Walter Raleigh, and your Lordships know what became of my Lord

Bass. The Duke of Buckingham, he ran down my Lord Roos, and your Lordships know what happen'd to the Duke of Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wilmot, afterwards Earl of Stratford, ran down the Duke of Buckingham, and you all know what became of him. Sir Harry Fans, he ran down the Earl of Stratford, and your Lordships know what became of Sir Harry Fans. Chancellor Hyde, he ran down Sir Harry Fans, and your Lordships know what became of the Chancellor. Sir Thomas Osborne, now Earl of Dunby, ran down Chancellor Hyde; but what will become of the Earl of Dunby, your Lordships had our roll, but let me see that Man that dare run the Earl of Dunby down, and we shall soon see what will become of him."

This being pronounced with a remarkable Humour and Tope, the Duke of Buckingham, both surpris'd and disappointed, after his Way, cry'd out, The Man is right! and Christ has done the English.

Villain on Earth: "For, said he, were I capable of such a Wickedness, yet the more wicked any Man is, the more he is carry'd to his own Interest: And is it possible that any thing under Heaven can agree less with my Interest, than the Destruction of this King? Can I possibly hope to be better than I am? And is it not apparent that there is not one Man living whose Happiness depends so much as mine upon the Preservation of his Person?" He then enlarg'd on the Circumstances already related with regard to the Discovery of the Plot, and his Concern in the seizing Coleman's Papers; and thank'd God, that as to his being Popishly affected, some of those who had voted against him had borne witness to the contrary. Then as to the waisting the King's Treasure, which was the Amount of the fifth, he affirm'd, that, in his time, there had been no Treasure to waste; not one Farthing having been given in almost six Years, but what had been strictly appropriated by Parliament, and as strictly apply'd by him. He also particulariz'd some of the good Effects of his own Administration, and concluded on this Head with saying, "I doubt not but to appear meritorious, instead of being criminal on that Article." And, as to the sixth, which mention'd his great Gettings, he said, "I cannot deny but I serve a Master, whose Goodness and Bounty hath been a great deal more to me, than I deserv'd, and to whom I can never pay Gratitude enough by all the Services of my Life: But when the Particulars of those Gettings shall appear, it will be found very contrary to what is suggested already: And that, in near six Years time, in this great Place, I have not got half that which many others have got in lesser Places, in half that time. And from the Examination of this, which I desire may be seen, there will arise Matter to accuse my Prudence, in not having done for my Family what I justly might, but nothing to arraign my Honour, my Conscience, or my faithful Service to the Crown."

Having thus gone through the six Articles severally, his Lordship added upon the Whole, "If my Obedience to the King should not be held criminal, I think nothing else would stick upon me from these Articles: For my own Heart flatters me to believe, that I have done nothing but as a true Protestant, and a faithful Servant both to my King and Country. Nay, I am as confident as that now I speak, that, had I either been a Papist, or Friend to the French, I had not been now accused: For I have Reason to believe, that the principal Informer of the House of Commons hath been assisted by French Advice to this Accusation: And if the Gentleman were as just to produce all he knows for me, as he hath been malicious to shew what may be liable to Misconstruction against me, or rather against the King, as indeed it is, no Man could vindicate me more than himself." To make this clear to the House, he then touch'd upon several Passages in Mr. Montagu's Letters, touching the Offers of the French to his Majesty, and their Animosity to himself; and then proceeded in the following extraordinary manner: "Besides what that Gentleman could say, if he pleas'd, I hope his Majesty will give me leave, in my Defence, to say in his PRESENCE, and in the Hearing of divers Lords, with whom I have the Honour to sit in the Committee of Foreign Affairs, that which, were it not true, his Majesty must think me the impudentest and worst of Men to affirm before him, that, ever since I had the Honour to serve his Majesty, to this Day, I have delivered it as my constant Opinion, that France was the worst Interest his Majesty could embrace; and that they were the Nation in the World from whom, I did believe, he ought to apprehend the greatest Danger, and who have both his Person and his Government under the last Degree of Contempt: For which Reason alone (were there no other) I would never advise his Majesty to trust to their Friendship."

For a Clofe, his Lordship, after having taken occasion to felicitate himself, that his Peers were to be his Judges; and to compliment them on their known Wisdom and Justice, proceeded to animadvert on the Word traiterously, annex'd by the Commons to their Articles of Impeachment; and very dextrously insinuated, that, tho' the House had wisely provided to have the special Matter before them, they would do well to consider, whether that special Matter was what it was call'd; that is, Matter of Treason. Some of his own Expressions are as follow: "As for Example; If a Man were accus'd of having traiterously pass'd the River in a Pair of Oars, this is special Matter, and styl'd Treason, by inserting the Word traiterously; yet your Lordships would not therefore proceed, as taking it for Treason: So in this case, I beg for all your Lordships Sakes, as well as my own, that you will please to use that Caution, which will be necessary for all your Lordships Safety and Seats in this House. What the House of Commons may do in such a Case, there is no question, but his Majesty may do the same by his Attorney; and what either of them may do against one Lord, they may do against more: (and we have seen it done, in our Days, against all the Bishops at once) Were it not very precariously then that your Lordships hold your Seats here, when by either of these ways, as many of your Lordships, as, for a Time, it might be convenient to remove, should be at the Mercy of having a thing CALLED Treason, whether it be so or no? Truly, my Lords, I have Reason to believe that, in the House of Commons, the Matter of my Charge, if prov'd, was not thought to amount to Treason, either by Statute or Common Law: And I hope your Lordships have too sad an (b) Example in your Memory, ever

(b) Every body will be aware that his Lordship here refers to the Case of the late Lord Strafford: And yet Sir

John Evelyn relates the following Circumstance: "And here I cannot but take notice, that the King, observing the Lord ever to assist the making of Treason by Accumulation."

Of the Impolicy, as well as Injustice of accusing a Statesman in the wrong Place, Notice has been already taken: But we have again a like Opportunity to make the like Reflections. Had the Mob been to fit in Judgment on the Lord Treasurer, no doubt it had been politic, however injurious, to lay the high Crime of Popery to his Charge, as being, at that time more especially, the unpardonable Sin: But as the Lords only were to decide the Merits of the Cause, what serv'd to inflame without Doors, serv'd only to excite Abhorrence and Indignation within: And what was calculated to aggravate the Earl's Guilt, contributed more to the Manifestation of his Innocence.

His Lordship, we find, discern'd the Advantage it gave him, and made the most of it: His Defence on that Head has an Air of Ingenuity that is irresistible; and those who saw one Article so effectually subverted, were easily brought to question the Validity of the rest. If he had not assum'd a Regal Power, he had assum'd the Ministerial Prerogative, and thereby done Violence to our Constitution, which acknowledges no such thing. He had quitted his proper Province in the Treasury, and taken the Direction of the Cabinet, principally, if not solely on himself: If he had not rais'd the Army, he had us'd his whole Influence, to get it rais'd: And within a few Days after the Parliament had made Provision for a War, he had enter'd into a clandestine Treaty for a Peace. Whatever plausible things might be urg'd to shew the Necessity of keeping up the Army, he had acted in Defiance of an Act of Parliament, in applying the Money granted for the disbanding it, to the continuing it still on foot. And in Excuse for all this, he had nothing to urge but his Obedience to the King's Command, which in England is no Excuse at all. The Commands of our Kings are no longer sacred, than they are warrantable both by Law and Equity; nor is any Englishman oblig'd to serve his Sovereign to the Prejudice of his Country. He who obeys, when he ought to resist, does it at his own Peril; nor can the Power of the Crown protect him from being question'd by the Laws, tho' it may preserve him from being punish'd by them. When Sir William Temple was call'd upon to lend his Countenance to the same dirty Job, he gloriously disobey'd, and has adorn'd our Story with one shining Example.—But he that blam'd the over-delicacy of it, could not be expected to follow it.—

The Lord Treasurer's Conduct was, therefore, liable to Exceptions;—Nay, he himself seems to be conscious of it; and for that Reason takes Shelter under Misdemeanours to avoid the capital Charge of Treason. On the other hand, nothing but a capital Charge would answer the Purposes of his Enemies. They wou'd the Account they brought against him, not because they had sufficient Vouchers to support it, but because they thought it would be otherwise insufficient to get him committed, and consequently remov'd, which was the grand Point in view. But the Judges in this Case were not altogether so zealous as the Jury who had found the Bill, nor in a Disposition to admit Allegations as Proofs. In short, tho' they had committed five Popish Lords on the Oath of one single Witness, they would not commit a Protestant Treasurer, as hath been already observ'd, at the Suit of the Commons of England.

Tho' it had been usual for the Parliament to adjourn during the Whole of the Christmas Holidays, so intent were both Houses now on the Prosecution of the Plot, that they sacrificed but two Days to the Season. December 5, the said Popish Lords had been severally impeach'd at the Bar of the House of Lords, viz. The Lord Arundel of Wardour, by Mr. Wharton, the Earl of Powis, by Mr. Maynard, the Lord Bellasis, by Mr. Tymme, the Lord Petre by Sir Philip Warwick, and the Lord Viscount Strafford, by Sir Scroop Hew. And the next Day both (i) Houses join'd in an Address, that his Majesty would issue his Commands to all the Sheriffs, Justices, Mayors, &c. of the Kingdom to apprehend, detain, and secure all Popish Recusants, and all others who should or might be justly suspected to be Popish, and to oblige them to give in sufficient Bail for their good Behaviour.

This was arming Persecution with Authority, and destroying the Peace of the Nation, under the Notion of preserving it: And yet, so harden'd, or so insatiate were the Times, that almost all, but the Sufferers, thought these savage Proceedings just. Early in the Session, at the Instance of the Commons, Informers of all kinds had been invited by Proclamation, to come in and make their Discoveries; in consideration of which, they were promis'd not only Indemnity, if Accomplices in the Plot, but a Reward for their good Service. This had such an Effect, that scarce a Day pass'd, but some strange Story was told of armed Men marching by Night, Arms conceal'd, treasonable Letters found, and Consultations held, which were not only patiently heard, but actually enter'd into the Journals of the Lords; as if worthy of the Knowledge and Attention of Popery.

But tho' it would be both useless and endless to recount all the several abortive Prodigies of this teeming Age; the more fruitful Births, which are upon Record in our Courts of Justice, must likewise have a Place in our Annals.

December 20, one John Wren, who lodg'd in

Lord Strafford to be very violent in the House against the Earl of Danby, (which it seems took birth from a personal Pique to him, for obstructing a Pension he had from the Crown) told me, He wonder'd at it much, seeing his Father came to the End he did by the very self-same Method of Proceeding. in the House of Miles Prance, a Silvermith in Covent-garden, one Joseph Hail, and another Person, obtain'd a Warrant against the said Prance, on a Presumption that he was one of the Murderers of Godfrey, grounded on his absenting himself from his House about the Time that the said Godfrey was first missing; on his hiring a Horie to go out of Town; on his having a Brother who was a Priest; and his having dealt with Groves, Pickering, Fenwick, and Ireland. This Warrant was serv'd the next Day; after which Prance was carry'd away in Custody, says LeStrange, into a little Room within a Lobby, by the House of Commons; whence, after some Hours waiting, he was remov'd to an Eating-house call'd Heaven, and into a Room where Bedloe was waiting; who, on sight of the Prisoner, starting up, declar'd, with an Oath, "This is one of the Rogues that I saw, with a dark Lanthorn, about the Body of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; but he was then in a Periwig." What Prance reply'd, we do not find mention'd: But being carry'd, after some time, before the Lords Committee, Bedloe charg'd him with the Murder, and Wren with being out of his House when the Body was missing: But he deny'd all, upon his Examination; affirming, that he knew nothing of the Murder, neither did he know Bedloe; and objecting against Wren, as an incompetent Witness: And the Heads of his Depositions were as follow:

*Details all Concern in,
and Knowledge of, that Murder.*

"That he had been a Papist, but was now a Protestant, and had taken the Oaths: That he had wrought in his Trade for Groves, Pickering, Fenwick, and Ireland: That the Sunday after these Persons were taken up, he said, in a Coffee-house, they were very honest Men; which some People took offence at. He kept out of the Way, for fear of being question'd. He never lay out of his House, but three Nights, in two Years: Nor did he go to the Queen's Chapel once a Month. He deny'd the hiring of a Horie, at first; but confess'd it afterwards, and that it was to go out of Town, to avoid the Oaths: That an Arrest stay'd him in Town: That his Wife was a Papist: That he chang'd Guineas for one Mr. Owen, a Layman: That he had nothing to do with the Death of Godfrey: That he lay at a Neighbour's House on Monday, when Sir Edmund was missing: That he made a light flaxen Periwig, of his Wife's Hair, but he never wore it: That he had dealt with Groves for Guineas, and had Money of him for Work: That he knew Pickering, and had been lately in his Company, but neither Wolff, nor Pritchard: That Pickering was a Clerk in the Queen's Chapel: And that he did not know le Pbaire," &c.

Is committed in Newgate.

His Examination being ended, he was by their Lordships committed to Newgate; and not only so, but, by particular Order, put in heavy Irons, and lodg'd in the Condemn'd-Hold.

On Monday the 23d, the House of Lords was inform'd, that Miles Prance had made some Discovery of the Plot; and had offer'd to make further Discovery of the said Plot, and also touching the Death of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and the whole Manner of it, if he might first be fully assur'd of his Majesty's gracious and general Pardon, &c. And it was forthwith order'd, that the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquis of Winchester, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and Lord Grey of Wrotham, should acquaint Miles Prance in Newgate, that Afternoon, with his Majesty's gracious Assurance; and that they should then and there proceed to examine him thoroughly, in order to a true and perfect Discovery; and that Care should be taken, that no other Person, Lord or Commoner, should be present at the said Examination, but the said Lords, and the Prisoner.

A. D. 1678.
Examined Miles Prance concerning the Murder of Godfrey.

The House of Commons also pass'd two Orders of the same Date likewise, upon the same Subject, viz.

1. That the Committee of Secrecy, or any three of them, do repair to the Prison, and take the Examination of Mr. Prance touching the Plot, and the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. And in the Afternoon,
2. That the Committee of Secrecy appointed to examine Mr. Prance, do impart to the Prisoners in Newgate the Contents of his Majesty's Proclamation in Relation to the Discovery of the Plot against his Majesty's Person and Government.

It makes a Man tremble, says LeStrange, to think what a Jail-Delivery of Discoverers this Temptation might have produc'd. The Assurance of a Pardon, had by this time so mellow'd Prance, and made him ripe for a further Examination, that upon Tuesday Morning, December 24, he was examin'd by the King in Council, about the Plot, and about the Murder, with a Promise of Pardon upon a full Discovery.

Hereupon he declar'd, that one Girald, He makes a Confession. an Irish Priest, spoke to him about the killing of a Man, not saying who it was; this was about a Fortnight before the Murder: And about a Week after, Girald, Green, and Hill, told him they would kill Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, for he was an Enemy to the Queen, or her Servants: He had us'd some Irishmen ill: And Girald told him, the Lord Bellasis would see the Action rewarded; Girald owning an old Grudge to Sir Edmund, about a Business of Parish Duties. He said they had watch'd him a Week or Fortnight before his Death: Green had call'd at his House that Saturday Morning; and that he, Girald, and Hill, had dogg'd him that Day, until he came by his Death.

His Majesty thereupon appointed the Duke of Monmouth, and the Earl of Ossory to take Prance's Information at Somerset-House, from Place to Place, where the things were acted; which they did accordingly, and (i) reported the Matter to his Majesty in Council: And it appear'd that the Particulars

(1) The said Report, which is very remarkable, was as follows. In Obedience to your Majesty's Order signified to us this Morning in Council, we have been at Somerset-House, and there taken the Examination of Miles Prance a Silvermith, touching culars were very consonant to what he had spoken at the Board, in the Morning before his going; at which time being also further ask'd, Why he gave to different a Relation to the Committee of the Lords, from what he now so freely confess'd? he made answer, He was in much Confusion before the Committee, being not sure of his Pardon; but now being sure of it, and also upon his Oath, he did speak the whole Truth, according to his Knowledge. And being then further ask'd, Why he came not in upon the Proclamation, and the Reward it offer'd? he said, He was afraid to trust thereunto. And being further ask'd, What Reward he had receiv'd from those that employ'd him? he said, he had yet receiv'd no Reward, nor had he fought for any, but only the Promise of Girald, that there should be a Reward, by the Lord Billogis. He said, that he wrought in the way of his Trade to the Queen's Chapel, and was a Roman Catholic; but that, about eight Weeks ago, he had taken the Oaths. Being ask'd, Whether there were no Guards in the usual Places, at the time of carrying on this War? he said, he did not take notice of any. And being ask'd, Whether he saw Breda, when he was carry'd to see the Body, when it lay in the Back-chamber near the Garden? he answer'd, He could not tell whether Breda was there or no; but doth remember, that Girald and Green were then present. He adds, that Hill, Green, and Girald, told him, that they had a Prinseps-bill thrust Sir Edmund's Sword through his Body, till it came out an Inch out of his Back: And that he struggled very much at the time they thrust'd him, but that Green punch'd him with his Knees upon his Body, to hush his Death.

The Council sat again in the Afternoon, and France was confronted with Green, Hill, and Berry, who deny'd every Syllable of the Charge, and France stood as stoutly to every Point of the Accusation: Adding, there was a Time, when he also deny'd things as falsely as they.

The same Day, he also gave in his Depositions relating to the Plot, upon Oath, to the Council-board; which were to the following touching the Murder of Sir Edmund's Gifford, upon the Place where the same was committed, and in virtue of the Oath taken before your Majesty, he declared as followeth:

A. D. 1698.

The Depositions made by France, Hill, Green, &amp;c.

That it was either at the latter end or in the beginning of the Week, that Sir Edmund's Gifford did, about Noon, of the Clerk at Night, pass from towards St. James's as far as the Great Water Gate at St. James's House, being watch'd and followed by Lawrence Hill, One Green, and One Girald: that Hill making them halt before, kept within the Wicket which was open, and turning soon out again, called to Sir Edmund as he was passing, and said there were two men quarrelling within, who might soon be quarr'd if once they saw him: Whereupon he passed through the Wicket, and said him, Green and Girald, and drove they all went, till they came to a Bench that is at the bottom of the deep Defeat and joining to a Rail next to the upper end of the Stables on the right-hand: That upon the said Bench there were sitting and attending their coming, the Examinate, John France, and One Berry the Porter of the Other Gate, together with an Irishman that lodged at Green's House, whose Name he knoweth not. And by that time they were come half-way down, he, the said Berry, went up to the Wicket there to reveal, and give notice, if any came; and at the same time the said Berry went first on, into the Brook toward the Steps Stairs which led to the Upper Court: and when Sir Edmund's Gifford came down to the Bank, Green, who followed him, put about his Neck a large twisted Handkerchief, and encompassed all the neck about, and dragged him into a Corner which is behind the said Bench and the said Rail: And Green, who inform'd him in the manner aforesaid, and with whom he had before seen the large twisted Handkerchief, added, that he had thumped him on the Breast, and twisted his Neck until he broke it.

And the Examinate saith, that he did, in about a Quarter of an Hour after he had been standing at White-church, come down to see what was done; and found that they had throated him, but his Body remain'd warm, and seem'd hardly dead: But he, together with the said Hill, Green, Girald, and Berry, and the Irishman, took him up, and conveyed him through a Door that is on the left hand coming down at the Corner of the Coach-house, which leads up several Stairs into a long, dark Passage or Gallery, opening at last into the Upper Court, in which Passage there is a Door on the left hand, which being open'd, leads up with Eight Stairs into another House adjoining; but immediately upon the right hand, being got up, there is a little Chamber, or square Room, into which they convey'd the Body: and there let the Body brending, with the Back against a Bed, which the Examinate having now seen upon, thinks to be the same Bed that was there at the said Time. He further said, that Hill lived at this House, and the Body was for Two Days left there, in his Care; but then, being afraid of Discovery, Hill, Girald, Green, Berry, and the Irishman, as they told him, did take and convey the Body first, three about Nine or Ten of the Clock at Night, and carry'd it into the House, and into some Room towards the Garden; and that while the Body lay there, he was, by Hill, conducted to let it, and saw the Body as it lay bound, and Green, and Girald were present. That from thence, upon a Tuesday Night, the Body was brought back near to the Place where first it lay, into a Room in the said Gallery, over against the first Door, somewhat higher up towards the Corner, the Chamber belonging to some of the Servants of St. James's House, where it remain'd until Nine or Ten of the Clock on Wednesday Night, and then, thinking it fit to remove it to the Little Room where first it lay, the Examinate happen'd to come as they were lifting upon the said eight Steps; whereupon Hill and Berry flew, as supposing him to be some Stranger; but Girald, Green, and the Irishman, stood still; and so he helped them to lift up the Body into the former Chamber, and there it staid until about twelve of the Clock the same Wednesday Night, when Hill and Berry came to them when their Fight was over; and Hill having got a Sedal, and placing it in the leg, cast Berry, at the Foot of the said eight Stairs, they got the Body thence into. The Examinate France, and Girald, first took up the Chair, and convey'd it through the upper Court; Berry the Porter open'd half the Gate, and let them out; and they rideth away till they came to Covent garden; where Green, and another Irishman, took their Horse, and so carry'd the Sedal, and Body in it, as far as the tow Grace Church in the Sale; and there Hill met them with a Horse; whereupon they took out the Body, and fixing upon the Legs, they set it into the Horse, Hill riding behind to keep the Body up, while Green, Girald, and the Irishman, went to accompany him. Berry the Porter did not depart from the Gate; and the Examinate France, hearing to be missing, return'd home when the Body was set on Horbeck; and the Sedal, which was left at one of the new, unfinish'd Houses, they took it up, and brought it home to see come back.

He further saith, that the Body lay in Coventry House about six or seven Days, before it was carry'd out: But he is not certain in the Number of the Days. He was very positive as to the Place where the Murder was committed, and the Master of it; as also for the Room, where the Body was first laid; but being desir'd to conduct us to the Room next the Garden, he led us to the Corner of the Passage on the left Hand, and so down a Pair of Stairs, and for so far'd to be assur'd he had been led, and did not think that he pass'd through the great Court below: But when from thence we went up and down into several Rooms, he seem'd very doubtful, and could not ascertain the Place; saying, he had never been there, but that once when Hill convey'd him thither with a Dark Insulation; but that it was some Chamber towards the Garden.

In the House where the Body was first laid, we found a Woman, whose Deposition we have taken: She was House-keeper to Dr. Godwin, and the said Hill had been a Servant to said Doctor in this House for above seven Years; and continued to live there, since the Doctor's Departure, until Mitchell was led: But that he had been there three several times since; and she also knew the Examinate, and call'd him by his Name.

All which is humbly submitted to your Majesty.

CLERK.

lowing Effect: That, some time before Mibaclmas, being at Ireland's Chamber, together with Grove and Fenwick, Ireland said, there would be fifty thousand Men in Arms: And Prance asking, Where? and for what Purpose? Ireland answer'd, we must have them in a short time, to settle Religion, or else all will be ruin'd: That Grove, coming to his Shop, soon after this, to buy two Silver Spoons, he, the Deponent, ask'd him, Who were to govern this Army? he said, the Lords Bellasi, Petre, and Arundel: That Fenwick told him the same things: That one le Feser bought a second-hand Sword of him, because he knew not what Times were at hand; and Prance expressing some Concern for poor Tradesmen, in case such Times came, le Feser reply'd, It would be better for Tradesmen, if the Catholic Religion was brought in; and, particularly, there would be more Church Work for Goldsmiths: That taking occasion to speak of a brave Horse, that he had seen one Moore, who belong'd to the Duke of Norfolk, riding, the said Moore wish'd that he had ten thousand of them; and hop'd, in a short time, they might have them for the Catholic Cause: That one Lawrence an Apothecary, when the Oaths was a tendering, wish'd that half the Parliament were poison'd, for they would ruin them all: And that he had heard one Messenger, a Domestic of the Lord Arundel's say, He hop'd to see the Catholic Religion flourish here before it was long.

And yet, after all this circumstantial Evidence, both as to the Plot and the Murder, this wretched Man, being again summon'd before the King and Council, on the 20th, made it his Request, says Le Strange, to be admitted privately to his Majesty first; and that Grace being accorded to him, he fell on his Knees, and (whether of his own mere Motion, or by the Persuasion of the King, is uncertain) retract'd his whole Story, in the Hearing of Mr. Chiffinch, and Captain Richardson the Keeper of Newgate, whom his Majesty had call'd upon to bear witness to his Confession. He farther declar'd, with great Passion and Earnestness, that the Men he had sworn against were all innocent, and that he himself was forsworn. Upon your Satisfaction, said the King, is this so? Upon my Satisfaction, said Prance, the whole Accusation is false. He was then referred to the Council; and, before all the Lords, persisted in unswaying all he had sworn before. Being then ask'd, What Inducement he had to forge this Story? Why he had sworn against those Persons? and, Who put him upon it? he answer'd, No body had prompted him: He only knew the Men he had sworn against: He had never seen Bedloe before he was taken up: He knew nothing of the Plot, or the Murder: He was not guilty of any Man's Blood; nor could rest, for the Story he had told: Wren ow'd him Money; and he, Prance, pressing the Payment of it, Wren had threaten'd him, and so had frighten'd him into it.

Upon this, some of their Lordships, we are told, call'd him a thousand Villains, and threaten'd to shew him the Rack; but without Effect; he persisted, as before, in asserting all he had utter'd to be a Forgery; and was remanded to Newgate, there to ruminate on the Part he had acted; in swearing a Lie, or belying his Oath.

On the Day that Prance was first examin'd before the Council, one Stephen Dugdale, who had been Bailiff to the Lord Allen, gave in the following Information, upon Oath, before two Justices of the Peace; which having been transmitted to the Earl of Essex, was by him communicated to the House of Lords, December 28, 1678.

1. That soon after the Queen's Almoner went beyond the Seas, he was told by George Hopson (Servant to the said Lord Allen) that there was a Design then intended, for the Reformation of the Government to the Romish Religion.

2. That in the Beginning of September 1678, meeting the Lord Stafford near the Gates of Tixwell-hall, Lord Allen's Seat, the said Lord Stafford complain'd to him, of the sad Necessity they were under of saying their Prayers in a clandestine Manner: But that there would be a sudden Reformation to the Romish Religion: That, on the 20th of the said September, the said Lord Stafford told him, the Informant, that there was a Design in hand, and if he would engage in it, he should have a good Reward, and might make himself famous.

3. That immediately after, the said Informant went to the Chamber of Francis Kew, alias Euars (a Jesuit) in Tixwell-hall, and ask'd what Lord Stafford meant by those Words? Who, after swearing him to Secrecy, on his Knees, told him, It was to take away the King's Life; by shooting him, or otherwise: That he should have a good Reward for being instrumental to it; and that he need not entertain any Fear on the Occasion, for that the Pope had excommunicated his Majesty; that all who were excommunicated by him were Heretics; and that those who kill'd them should be canoniz'd for so doing.

4. That the said Euars and Hopson both said, The Design was to kill the Duke of Monmouth, as well as the King.

5. That George North (Nephew to Pickering, and Servant to Lord Allen) lately told this Informant, that they had taken his Uncle (Pickering) and put him into Newgate; and that he thought the King deserv'd such an execrable Death as was intended him, because of his Whoring and Debauchery.

6. That Mr. Euars said Mr. (A) Bennifield (Beddingfield) had a Packet of Letters deliver'd to him from the Post-house (at Windsor) which he fear'd the Lord Treasurer had notice of: For which Reason he delivered them to the Duke of York, who delivered them

A. D. 1678. them to the King; by whom, after he had read them, they were again made over to the Lord Treasurer: But that his Majesty did not believe them; which was happy, for else the Plot had been discover'd.

There were two other Items, signifying, that the said Informant had broke up many of Euers's Letters, all tending to the Re-establishment of the Romanish Religion; and that he himself had receiv'd several Sums of Money, and knew of divers others who had done the same, to put forth for the Use of the Jesuits.

On the reading this Paper, the Earls of Bridgewater and Essex were order'd to go immediately to the Towers, and examine the Lord Viscount Stafford thereon; and to return before the House rose; which they did, and reported, that his Lordship confess'd he came to the Lord Alton's at Tiscobell-hall, about the 12th of September last: That he knew Dugdale-Ewers, Hobson, and North, as being all the said Lord Alton's Servants; but absolutely deny'd every other Particular relating to himself in the whole Information.

This was the last Transaction of the Session; which, in almost every Step, had gone counter to the King's Inclinations: The violent Prosecution of a Plot, which his Majesty, tho' most immediately concern'd, gave no Credit to; the seditious Use which had been made of every Circumstance relating to it; the Practices that had been try'd to alter the Establishment of the Militia; the Terms on which the Supply had been granted; and which the Commons, to the last, would admit no Alteration of; and above all, the Resolution that appear'd to insist on the Commitment of the Lord Treasurer; had, successively, displeas'd him; inasmuch that it was no (1) hard Matter to induce him to think it the least Evil, to put an immediate Stop to their further Proceedings.

Accordingly, December the 30th, his Majesty came to the House of Peers; and the Commons attending, signify'd, from the Throne, "That it was with great Unwillingness he came to prosecute them: That all of them were Witnesses, he had not been us'd well, the Particulars of which he would acquaint them with, at a more reasonable Time: That, in the mean while, he would immediately enter upon dissolving the Army; and do what he could for the Good of the Kingdom, and Safety of Religion: That he would prosecute the Discovery of the Plot, to find out the Instruments of it: That he would take all the Care in his Power to secure the Protestant Religion, as it was then establish'd: And that he had no more to say, but to direct the Lord Chancellor to prosecute the Parliament, as he had commanded him. Which his Lordship did accordingly, to the 10th of February.

We have hitherto follow'd the Noise of the Execution: Mr. Coleman, who, of all the several Prisoners, committed on the separate or joint Evidence of Oates and Bedles, seem'd most obnoxious to the Law, was call'd to his Trial (m) first; but not till repeated Endeavours had been us'd to make him turn Evidence against his Accomplices: He had shewn some Reluctancies to the Committees of both Houses, as formerly mention'd, and some Confessions he had made: But as these went little farther than his own Letters had already evidenced, it was thought a more explicit Offer would induce him to be more explicit in his Acknowledgments. This produc'd an Order of the House of Commons, Nov. 2. for the Speaker to address his Majesty from the House, that Mr. Coleman might be pardon'd, on a full Discovery; and that otherwise, neither Pardon nor Reprieve might be granted him: To both which Requests, his Majesty was pleas'd the same Day to accord. It was likewise order'd, That Mr. Speaker should signify what had pass'd to Mr. Coleman in Newgate; who reply'd, "That he was very sensible of the Miserableness of his Condition; for that he knew there was enough already known, to take away his Life; and that he did not know enough to save it."

On the 7th he was examin'd again; and Sir Henry Capel report'd, that he had farther acknowledg'd the Receipt of 300 l. of Mr. Ravigny, and of Mr. Curtin 360 l. for Intelligence of every Day's Debates in Parliament; and for keeping a good Table.

That he receiv'd last Session of Mr. Barrillon 2500 l. to be distributed among Members of Parliament, which he had converted to his own Use: That Mr. Barrillon had, on the Occasion, pointed at several Members; and that he had told Mr. Barrillon, he had comply'd with his Instructions.

That, at the End of the last Session, he receiv'd of Mr. Barrillon 260 l. more for Parliament Intelligence.

That Mr. Ravigny, believing the Parliament was dissolv'd, by the Confederates, against France, did therefore encourage him to pursue a Correspondence with Members: To render which more effectual, he did treat with St. Germain, about a Sum of Crowns to be dispos'd of among them.

That none of that Money was receiv'd: That he enter'd no foreign Letters in his Books, after his Correspondence with la Chaise ceas'd: That he was to receive 30,000 l. on procuring Coleman's further Examination in Newgate.

The King inclin'd to prosecute the Parliament.

His Majesty's Speech on that Occasion.

(1) Ferguson, in his Sermon to the Growth of Popery, p. 224, is of a different Opinion; giving us to understand, that the Resolution was taken late at Night, at the Dukes of Parish's Lodgings, when all were pretty well with Liquor, and were so tipsy till the next Morning.

(m) The Reader will perhaps recollect, that Staley the Goldsmith us'd try'd a Week before Coleman: But the Indictment against him lay for Words spoken in French to this Effect, "That the King was a great Heretic, and the greatest Rascal in the World: Alas, there's the Heart, and here's the Hand that would kill him: And, the King and Parliament think all is over; but the Royal are mistaken: Except the Words all is over, not a Syllable in his Case relates to the Plot: And the Evidence against him were not Oates and Bedles, but two Scavengers, called Capsairs and Sutherland.

While upon his Trial, Staley had acknowledg'd, not only that he was a Roman Catholic, but that he intended to die in that Faith: And after he was consider'd, the Lord Chief Justice (Sergeant) charitably threw in, Now you may die a Roman Catholic; and when you come to die, I think you will be found a Protestant.

procuring a Security for the Banker's Debt, which was afterwards reduced to 7000 l. in Silver, and 3000 Guineas: Of which he received but the Moiety of the Silver only.

And that this Contract, made between himself and Sir Robert Viner, Alderman Bakershall, and Mr. Whitehall, was verbal only.

As these Particulars relating to himself did not come up to the Expectations of the House, they did not think fit to interpose with his Majesty for the Pardon which had been promised him, on the Condition that he confessed the whole Truth, but left him to God and his Country.

His Trial
amen, p. 178.

His Trial was at the King's Bench Bar, November 28, 1678, and the Indictment was grounded on the first Article of the Statute 25 Edward III. for imagining the Death of the King; and for overt Facts, were alleged; 1. His proposing a Rebellion, and to bring the King to Death. 2. His Letters, which were specify'd in the Indictment, and are alleged to be wrote to procure, against the King, the Aid, Assistance, and Adherence of the French King, by Means of Monsieur la Chaise; and the like of Letters to one Turackmorton. After the Harangues were over, the Prisoner spoke in Answer to a Sermon against him, which was, that his Correspondence from 1675 to 1678, two whole Years had been conveyed away; and it was to be presumed, if those had appeared, all the foul things of the Plot would have been found in them. He said, that he had been urged in Prison to be ingenuous in his Confessions, and he had been so, and particularly affirmed there, as he now did with Affirmations, that in 1675 he left (n) off corresponding, and afterwards he had no Letters that he kept, but all were slighted, and made away as common Paper; for the Correspondences he then had, were but curiosity and of no Moment to be kept; and he offered to be tested in any manner whatever. But that could not regularly be done: And as, on the one Side, this Sermon was little more than a Flourish, and the Argument from thence (viz. if down to 1675 his Letters were such, what were those down to 1678?) rather a rhetorical Trope, than of Force, as Evidence, against the Prisoner for his Life; so, on the other, the Answer, that there were none such of any Value kept, concluded as little in his Favour. These Letters, as we shall afterwards find, were read against him, the Pinch of which was the procuring Aids and Assistance of the French; which, if understood Arms, was Treason, if Money only, not. Every thing in them would have been Misemeanour, but that only (so construed) came up to Treason.

The oral Testimony against him was positive, viz. Oates, who swore, that he was at his House, saw carried a Packet from him to St. Omers, in which was a News-Letter that call'd the King Tyrant; affirming also, That the Marriage of the Prince of Orange, and Lady Mary, would prove the Traitor's and Tyrant's Ruine: That he writ a Latin Letter at the same time to Father la Chaise, by the Provincial Strange's Directions, thanking him for the 10,000 l. which, he said, should be employed to no other Use, but to cut off the King: That Coleman officiated on this Occasion, because Strange had run a Reed into his Hand, and could not write; and Alicia, the Secretary, was ill. Oates gave this Letter to la Chaise, and brought an Answer inclosed in one from the Society, which he facit, having a Patent to be of the Confess, as also, Power to open Letters. He tells us of a Consult held (in April, 1678) by virtue of the Pope's Brief, at the White-Horse Tavern in the Strand; wherein it was resolv'd to send one Cary to be their Procurator at Rome: That, the Assembly, afterwards subdivided into several little Clubs; in all which the grand Affair of killing the King was discuss'd; and upon which it was finally resolv'd, that it should be by the Hands of Grove and Pickering; one of which was to have fifteen hundred Pounds for his Reward, and the other 30000 Muffles. All which Particulars were communicated to Coleman in his (Oates's) hearing,

[a] In the Collection of Papers publish'd by Sir George Treby, Chairman of the Committee of Secrecy, we find the following.

"A Letter, writ'd at Mr. Coleman's, directed, A Monsieur Monsieur le Polair, proche de Charenton-lez-Lyon, pour faire venir a Monsieur James Clark.

September 25, 1678, Paris.

I had yours of the 14th Instant, till Night; but this these three last came in late: My Friend being with the Crowd, it's impossible for me to reach him now; but last Night he sent me the Friend I mentioned, to tell me that this Peace has broke all our Measures at present here, so that to write to our Friend at present is useless, notwithstanding he had proposed all things in very good Order, had the Courier brought Peace in his Mouth, which stop'd his as to our last Design; so that now they pretending here, the Peace being made, they have no need of us; so that by consequence they wou'd cease us, as they would if the Peace had been full oppos'd. But, in a word, to put our Trope about, it's absolutely necessary that my Friend come speedily over to you, and to converse with you and our other Friend, because his Measures are so well taken in Italy, that we can't miss to establish this Commodity letter from those Parts, than from any here at present, tho' whether we may find Means and Helps from London too. But if you will return, now is the time, or occur, to put things in Order in Italy; it will give, for England, what you may very well give; and whatever my Friend or my other Friend in the Crowd can write, will signify nothing;

So whatever we say by Letter will be always imperfect, and without Effect; so that to clear all Doubts, and for better Security too, it's absolutely necessary that our Friend comes to you, and to that Intent, in Terms as above as you please. It's necessary that our Friend with you desires our Friend at the Crowd here; to give Liberty to my Friend with him, to come over to converse with him; for he says himself, it's you must put him in the Way to make the Measures he has taken in Italy to take Effect; for he knows what Power he hath here, but he knows not of what Constitution you are in: Besides, the Proposition he makes for Peerless can't be done at this Distance, but in such Terms, as the natural Desire he has to have our Friend with you, and to our Trade quite spoils; so if our Friend with you signify the least Desire he has to have our Friend come over, he'll easily clear all Difficulties, and discover to you the Dispositions of both Countries to use Pepper, and I no ways doubt, but you'll have entire Satisfaction; however, there will be no Room to hear what he can say, and to see the Place that's made for this kind of Traffique. I expect your Answer as to this Particular, and shall ever be as you would have me to be.

This Letter is indorb with Mr. Coleman's Hand thus: Received over ab, but imperfectly, and with a Promise of a clearer and fuller Defence by the next Post. And the following Note was annex'd by the Committee: [Note.] This dark, suspicious Letter was received but a very few Days before the Plot was discover'd to his Majesty's Privy Council, and Mr. Coleman thereupon committed.]

A. D. 1678. hearing, in Wildenfe; and Coleman said it was well contrived, and wrote to have the Duke trepanned into the Plot to kill the King. Coleman was also to get the Duke of Ormond killed in Ireland, and to send 200,000*l.* for carrying on a Rebellion there: That 80*l.* was sent to the four Russians who were to dispatch the King at Wiffes; and Coleman gave the Messenger a Guinea for Expedition: This was August 23, 1678: That he (Coleman) copied out Instructions, and dispersed them to the Conspirators about in England. Wabeman was to have 20 thousand Pounds to poison the King; but Coleman thought it too little, and would have five thousand more added, to make the Work sure. These Copies were sent to advance the general Contribution, then on foot, which would come freer, seeing what was done from beyond Sea. That he (Coleman) had a Commission from Father Obea, to be Secretary of State. More is said of the other Commissions, which were left with one Langburn. Now what was in the printed Narrative against Coleman, was not any Knowledge Oates had of himself, but only what Fogarty had told him, viz. That Coleman was present at Wabeman's Consult: But here was enough of positive Knowledge sworn, and to spare, though generally it is from Sight of Letters, except some Confessions: He farther says, he could evidence more, but did not, because of other things that were not fit to be known yet.

Mr. Coleman, in his Defence, opposed to Oates, that upon the direct Question at the Council, and View of his Person there, Oates said, that he had never seen him in his whole Life. Oates answered, "That his Sight was had by Candlelight, and Candlelight alters the Sight much; but, when he heard him speak, he could have sworn it was he; but it was not then his Business; he could not see a great way by Candlelight." The Lord Chief Justice particularly asking, If he was demanded, at the Council-board, whether he knew Coleman; he reply'd, Not to my Knowledge. The Prisoner appeal'd to Sir Thomas Doleman, then present in the Court, who said Oates's Words were, He did not well know him. And to other Questions of the Court, Sir Thomas reply'd, That he, Oates, did not know the Prisoner as he stood there (i.e. before the Council) and to the best of his Remembrance, that he had no Acquaintance with that Man (Coleman). The Prisoner farther arg'd, that his Charge against him was so slight at first, that the Council alter'd their Warrant, and committed him to the Custody of a Messenger, instead of sending him to Newgate. And the Lord Chief Justice demanding of Oates, why he charg'd no more against him; he answer'd, "I did design to lay no more to his Charge, then, than what was Matter for Information; for Prisoners may supplant Evidence when they know it, and bring Persons to Circumstances, as Time and Place. My Lord, I was not bound to give in more than a general Information against Mr. Coleman. Mr. Coleman did deny he had Correspondence with Father la Chaise at any Time; I did then say he had given him an Account of several Transactions, and, my Lord, then I was to weary, being up two Nights, and having been taking Prisoners, upon my Salvation, I could scarce stand upon my Legs."

My Lord Chief Justice asked him, What was the Information he gave at that time? His Answer was as notable as the former, viz. "The Information he gave at that time (as near as he could remember, but he would not trust to his Memory) was for writing of News-Letters, in which, he (Oates) did excuse the treasonable Reflections, and called them safe Reflections at the Council Board. The King was sensible, and so was the Council, he was so wearied and tired (being all that Afternoon before the Council, and Sunday Night, and sitting up Night after Night) that the King was willing to discharge him; but, if he had been urged, he could have made a larger Information." The Chief Justice recapitulated the dismal Treasons he had sworn there; and then, said he, Could you omit all this? Oates answered again, "He was so tired and weak, that he was not able to stand on his Legs; and he remembered the Council apprehended he was so weak, that one of the Lords said, that, if there were any further occasion to examine Mr. Coleman, Mr. Oates should be ready again, and bid him retire." The Chief Justice said, You was by when the Council were ready to let Mr. Coleman go almost at large.—"No," said Oates, I never apprehended that; for, if I had, I should have given a farther Account." Then the Chief Justice asked, What was done to Coleman at that time? Was he sent away Prisoner? Oates answered, "Yes, at that time, to the Messenger's House; and, within two Days after, he was sent to Newgate, and his Papers were seized—" The Chief Justice asked again, Why did you not name Coleman at that time? Oates answered, "—Because he had spent a great deal of Time in accusing other Jesuits." Another Judge (Wild) asked, What time was there between the first time you were at the Council, before you told of this Matter concerning the King? Oates answered, "—When he was first at the Board, which was on Saturday Night, he made Information, which began between six and seven, and lasted almost to ten; he did then give in a general Account of Affairs to the Council without the King: Then he went and took Prisoners; and, before Sunday, he said, he thought, if Mr. Coleman's Papers were search'd into, they would find Matter enough in those Papers to hang him. He spoke those Words, or Words to that Effect. After that, Mr. Coleman's Papers were search'd, Mr. Coleman was not to be found; but he surrender'd himself the next Day. Again, he took Prisoners, five that Night, and the next Night four."—The Chief Justice, upon Occasion of what he said of Wabeman, and the 3000*l.* Coleman was to give him, besides the 10,000*l.* to poison the King (which was an Harvey, and therefore not much heeded by the Privy Council) asked him, Why did you not accuse Mr. Coleman by Name? He answer'd, "For want of Memory,"

A. D. 1678. Memory, being disturbed and wearied in sitting up two Nights, he could not give a good Account of Coleman, as he did afterwards (meaning to the Parliament, for he had been examined there) when he had consulted his Papers; but when he saw Coleman committed he needed give no further Account.

Trial, p. 40. Sir Robert Southwell being call'd upon by the Court, confirm'd the Circumstance before mention'd, as to the Privy Council's altering their Warrants: But then he also confirm'd that other Circumstance of Oates's referring to Coleman's Papers, and acknowledged he had mention'd the Bargain with Wakeman to poison the King, but as a thing he had (o) heard of, not seen.

[Bedloe's Evidence.]

As for Bedloe's Charge, it was to this Effect: That Sir Henry Tichbourn told him, that he brought a Commission for Mr. Coleman and the Lords, from the principal Jesuits of Rome, by order of the Pope: That he carried a Packet from (*) Mr. Coleman to la Chaise, dated in April, 1675: That he delivered the said Letters to la Chaise, and brought Mr. Coleman an Answer: That he did not understand what was in it, because it was in a Language he did not well understand; but that it was about carrying on the Plot: That Harcourt went to Coleman with Letters, and took him, the said Bedloe, along with him, but made him stay over the Way: That Harcourt, afterwards, gave him a Beck to come to him; and there he heard Coleman say, "If he had a hundred Lives, and a Sea of Blood, to carry on the Cause, he would spend it all for the Establishment of the Church here; and if there were an hundred Heretick Kings, he would see them all destroy'd." And the Prisoner asking him, If he had ever seen him in his Life? He answered, "You may ask that Question; but in the Stone Gallery in St. James's House when you came from a Consult, where were great Persons, which I am not to name here, that would make the Bottom of your Plot tremble, you saw me then."

The Evidence arising from the Prisoner's own Letters.

To corroborate, tho' not confirm all this, sixteen of the Prisoner's Letters were read in Court; the first and second of which were from him to Father Ferrier, the French King's Confessor, dated June 29, and Septem- ber 25, 1674; both turning on the common Interest of his most Christian Majesty and the Duke, the Necessity of that King's Assistance to subdue entirely those that were as much exasperated against the one as the other, (i. e. by advancing Money to procure a Dissolution of the Parliament) and engaging for the Duke, that, in Recompence of such Assistance, his Royal Highness should perform all his most Christian Majesty should ask of him. The third was from the said Confessor to Mr. Coleman, signifying that Sir William Thorckmorton was come express with an Answer to his Memorial. The fourth was from Mr. Coleman to the Pope's Intermuncio, complaining of the King's Weakness in giving way to the Duke's Enemies; alluding upon him the Intermuncio, to provide some Support for his Royal Highness among his Friends, the Emperor and Pope, particularly, to furnish him with a little Sum of Money; and declaring, "they had great Designs in Agitation, wherein they had no Doubt to succeed, perhaps, to the utter Ruin of the Protestant Party." The fifth was again to the Intermuncio, shewing the Necessity of a Supply of Money, "to open the Eyes of the King, or to carry him wholly to his own Advantage, which Money would easily do, having such an absolute Dominion over him, that he could not resist it in any thing." The sixth from Cardinal Norfolk (Howard) dated April 18, but without the Addition of any Year, mentions Sir Henry Tichbourn's Journey from Rome to England by the way of France, with his (the Cardinal's Father's) i. e. the Pope's, particular Recommendations to the Duke and Duchess. The thirteenth and fourteenth were Mr. Coleman's long Historical Account of three Years Transactions to Father la Chaise, and that Father's Reply. The fifteenth was the Letter writ by Coleman in the Duke's Name, as he declar'd, without his Authority: And the sixteenth was the second Letter to la Chaise, in which was that remarkable Paragraph: We have here a mighty Work upon our Hands; no less than the Conversion of three Kingdoms; and by that, perhaps, the utter subduing a pestilent Heresy, which has dominion'd over a great Part of this Northern World, &c.

(†) A DECLARATION prepar'd by Mr. Coleman,

(*) This the Chief Justice was pleas'd to call charging the Prisoner here.

(*) In the Consideration of the Trials, see forth by the Judges, we are told, that Bedloe had never been seen by any of Coleman's Family; which had been impossible, if he had received and carry'd Letters, as he pretended.

(†) Which is here inserted, as the best Key to the Views and Designs of his Party.

"We having taken into our serious Consideration the Hates and Animities which have of late appeared among many of our very loyal and loving Subjects of this Kingdom, and the many Pains and Jealousies which some of them seem to lie under, of having their Liberties and Properties invaded, or their Religion altered; and withal, carefully reflecting upon our own Government since our happy Restoration, and the End and Aim of it, which has always been the Ease and Security of our People in all their Rights, and Advancement of the Beauty and Splendor of the true Protestant Religion established in the Church of England; of both which we have given most equal Testimonies, even to the shipping out of many royal Preceptors, which our Predecessors enjoyed, and were our undoubted Due; as the Court of Wards, Parliaments, and other things of great Value; and desiring to ourselves many Advantages, which we might reasonably and legally have taken by the Forfeitures, made in the time of Rebellion, and the great Revenues due to the Church at our Return, which no particular Person had any Right to: Instead of which, we consented to an Act of Obivision of all those barbarous Usages which our royal Father and ourself had writ withal, much more full and gracious than almost any of our Subjects, who were generally become in some measure or other Obivious to the Law, had Confidence in us; and freely renounced all our Title to the Profit which we might have made by the Church-laws, in favour of our Bishops, and other ecclesiastical Ministers, out of our Zeal to the Glory of our Protestant Church; which Clemency towards all, and some even high Offenders, and Zeal for Religion, we have to this Day constantly continued to exercise. Considering all this, we cannot but be sensibly affected to see, that the Forwardness of some few tumultuous Heads should be able to infect our loyal and good People with Approbations contradictory of their own, and the general Order of our Kingdom; and more especially, their Proceedings should be powerful enough to distract our very Parliament, and such a Parliament, as has given us such Testimonies of its Loyalty, Willing, and Bounty, and in which we have given so many Marks of our Affection and Esteem, to as to make them mis-counsel all our Endeavours for to preserve our People in Ease and Prosperity, and against all Reason and Evidence to represent them to our Subjects as Arguments of Force and Duty; and under these frequent Pretences of securing Property and Religion, to demand unreasonable Things, manifestly destructive of what they would be thought to aim at; and from our frequent Condemnations, out of our mere Grace, to grant them what we conceived might give them Satisfaction, tho' to the actual Prejudice of our royal Prerogative, to make them presume to propose to advance such Extravagancies into Law, as they themselves have formerly declared detestable; of which we cannot forbear to give our truly loyal Subjects some Notice, to wit: that we our innocent and well minded People, who have many of them of late been too easily misled, by the fallacious Enthusiasms of some turbulent Spirits. For example, we having judged it necessary to declare War against the States of Holland, during a Recess of Parliament, which we could not defer longer, without losing an Advantage which then presented itself; nor have done so, without exposting our Honour to a present Shame without due Preparation; we thought it prudent to send all our Subjects at Home, and did believe a general Indulgence of tender Conscience the most proper Expedient to prevent it; and therefore did by our Authority as God-father, which we thought sufficient to warrant what we did, suspend penal Laws against Dissenters in Religion, upon Conditions expressed in our Declaration, out of Respect of State, as well as to gratify our own Nature, which always we could not but be oblig'd to, especially in Religion, when Tenderness might be as useful. After we had engaged in the War, we proposed our Parliament from April to October, being confident we should be able by Taxations to draw our People in such Success to our Charge. At October we could have shew'd them Success, even beyond our own Hopes, or what they could possibly expect; our Enemies having lost by that time near a hundred strong Towns and Forts, taken as they were, we holding them but at Sea, while our Allies possess'd themselves of their Lands, with little or no Resistance; and of which the great Advantage would much probably have been ours, had not the Flocks we now complain of, which have been so much unhappily parted, and miserably improved by time few, dissuaded our People, distracted our Councils, and render'd our late Endeavours vain and fruitless; so that we had no Reason to doubt of our People's ready and liberal Concurrence to our Assistance in that Conjunction. Yet our Enemies proposing to us at that time a Treaty for Peace, which we were always ready to accept upon honourable Terms; and considering with ourselves, that in case that Treaty succeeded, a large Sum of Money would serve that Occasion, that otherwise would be necessary, we out of our tender Regard to the Esteem of our People, proposed our Parliament again in February, to attend the Success of our Treaty, rather than to demand too much Money in October, as would be fit to carry on the War. But we soon finding, that our Enemies did not intend us any such Satisfaction, saw a Necessity of prosecuting the War, which we designed to do most vigorously; and in order to it, resolved to press our Parliament to supply us as speedily as they be, to enable us to put our Fleet to sea early in the Spring; which would, after their Meeting, grow on apace. And being inform'd that many Members were dead during the long Recess, we issued out our Writs for new Elections, that our House of Commons might be full at the first Opening of the Session, to prevent any Delay in our public Affairs, or Dissolve in our People, as might possibly have risen from the Want of so great a Number of their Representatives; and if any thing of this kind had been thought of, we could not but have been happily so. Having govern'd our Actions all along with such careful Respect to the Esteem of our Subjects, we, at the Meeting of our Parliament in February 1672, expected from them some suitable Expressions of their Sense of our Favours; but quite contrary, found ourself alarm'd with clamorous Complaints from several Cabals against all our Proceedings, frightening many of our good Subjects into strange Conceits of what they must look for, by their seditious and false Constructions of what we had so candidly and sincerely done for their Good; and interrupting with a noise of our House of Commons, against our Writs of Elections, which we intended for their Satisfaction, against many Proceedings of ours, or without any Colour of Law of their Side, denying our Power to issue out such Writs, addressing to us to issue out others; which we consented to do at their Request, chusing rather to yield to our Subjects in that Point, than to be forced to submit to our Enemies in others; hoping that our Parliament, being sensibly touch'd with that extraordinary Condemnation, would go on to consider the public Concern of this Kingdom, without any farther to do. But we found another Use made of our 46 easy Compliance, which serv'd to encourage them to sit still; so that soon after we found our Declaration for inducing tender Conscience annull'd, void and illegal; though we cannot to this Day understand the Cause of that Vote, with our undoubted Supremacy in all Ecclesiastical, recognized by many Acts of Parliament, and required to be sworn to by all our Subjects; and Address'd us, one after another, to recall it; which we contended to do. From hence they proceeded to us, to weaken ourself in an actual War, and to render many of our Subjects, of whose Loyalty and Ability we were well satisfied, incapable to serve us, when we wanted Officers and Soldiers, and had reason to invite as many experienced Men as we could to engage in our Arms, rather than to incapacitate or discourage any. Yet this also we granted them to be, to gain their Affection against our Enemies, who grew high by their own Differences, rather than to give our Country to their Power and Fury; hoping that in time our People would be confounded to see our Concessions, and be sham'd of their Errors in making such Demands. But finding the unfortunate Effects of our Division the following Summer, we found our Parliament more outrageous at the next Meeting than ever, addressing to us to hinder the Consummation of our dear Brother's Marriage, contrary to the Law of God, which forbiddeth any to separate any whom he hath joined, against our Faith and Honour engag'd in the solemn Treaty; oblig'd us partly in this Address, after we had acquainted them, that the Marriage was then actually ratify'd, and that we had acted in it by our Embassador; so that we were forced to separate them for a while, hoping they would be their selves better at their Meeting in January. Instead of being more moderate, or ready to consider our Wants towards the War, they voted, as they had done before, not to assist us still, till their Religion were effectually secured against Popery, Aggravations redress'd, and all Obstacles thereto removed from us; which we had reason to take for an absolute Denial of all Aid; considering the Ineffectiveness of what was to proceed, and the moral Impossibility of effecting it, in their Sense; for when will they fly their Religion is essentially bound from Popery, if it were in danger then, by reason of the Insolvency of Papists? When our House of Commons, which is made up of Members from every Corner of our Kingdom, with Invitations publicly sent to all Men to recruit them, has not yet, in so many Years as they have complain'd of them, been able to charge one single Member of that Commission with so much as a Misdemeanor; or what Security could they possibly expect against that Body of Men, or their Religion, more than we had given them? Or how can we hope to live in perfectly, that Study and Pain may not make a Collection of Grievances, as considerable as that which was lately presented to us, than which we could not have wish'd for a better Vindication of our Government; Or when shall we be free from all Obstacles, for any remedy from us, when common Party Politics fit to call them for; which is to every Body, without any Proof, sufficient to render any Man obnoxious, who is possibly affected, or any thing else that is ill, tho' they have never in often or lately complain'd with their own Tolls and Marks of Dissolution and Discriminations? Finding our People thus unhappily disorder'd, we saw it impossible to prosecute the War any longer; and therefore did, by their Advice, make a Peace, upon such Conditions as we could get; hoping, that being gratify'd in that darling Point, they would at least have paid our Debts, and enabled us to have built some Ships for the future Security of our Honour, and their own Properties; but they being transported with their Success in sitting, were relolved to go on still that way, and would needs have us put upon the removing of our Judges from those Charges, which they have always hitherto held at the Will and Pleasure of the Crown, out of our Power to alter the ancient Form of trying of Heirs, and to make it a Præsumptio against Subjects (in a Cafe happen'd) not to fight against ourself; Nay, some had the Heart to ask, that the hereditary Succession of our Crown (which is the Foundation of all our Laws) should be changed into a sort of Election, they requiring the Heir to be qualify'd with certain Conditions, to make him capable of succeeding; and outbidding that Popish Doctrine, which we have so long, and so loathly, with good Reason detest'd, that Herety incapsitate Kings to reign. They would have had, that the Heir of the Crown, marrying a Papist, tho' he continued never to outbraid himself, should be forfeit by Right of Inheritance; not understanding this paradoxical Way of securing Religion by destroying it, as this would have done that of the Church of England, which always taught Obedience to their natural Kings, as an indispensable Duty in all good Christians, let the Religion or Department of their Prince be what it will; and not knowing how soon that Impediment, which was supposed as sufficient to keep out our Heir, might be thought as fit to remove a Possessor. And considering that Bill which would have it a Præsumptio in a Sheriff not to raise the Flag Commissions against our Commission (in a Cafe there suppose'd) tho' we ourself should find that our Commission in our Person; for not being excepted it imply'd with the other, made by this very Parliament in the last Year of our Reign, which all our Subjects, or at least many of them, were oblig'd to swear,

A. D. 1678. was as deaf as Justice blind: All Pleas came now too late: The People were clamorous for an Execution, and Policy requir'd they should be indulg'd. Sentence was according pass'd: And upon that solemn Occasion, Mr. Coleman having been advis'd by the Lord Chief Justice to make an unreserved Confession, he reply'd, — "Pray hear the Words of a dying Man: I have made a Resolution, I thank God, not to tell a Lye, no not a single Lye to save my Life. I hope God will not so far leave me, as to let me do it. And I do renounce all manner of Mercy that God can shew me, if I have not told the House of Commons, or offer'd it to the House of Commons, all that I know in my whole Heart, towards this whole Business: And I never, in all my Life, ever made any Proposition, or received any Proposition, or knew or heard, directly, or indirectly, of any Proposition towards the supplanting or invading the King's Crown and Dignity, or to make any Invasion or Disturbance to introduce any new Government, or to bring in Popery by any Violence or Force in the World."

His Declaration
in Court,

and at his Execution.

At the Place of Execution, as a dying Man, he again disown'd all Knowledge of any Plot either to destroy the King, or subvert, or disturb, the Government. He also renounc'd the King-killing Doctrine imputed to the Roman Church; declar'd that the Witnesses had done him Wrong; that he had never seen Bedloe before his Tryal, and that he knew nothing of Godfrey's Murder.

Trial of White, Fenwick, Ireland, Grove, and Pickering.

Coleman was executed, December the 30, and the 17th White alias Whitebread, Fenwick, Ireland, Grove and Pickering were indicted, the three first for being of the Consult to kill the King, and the two last for undertaking to be the Assassins. The Witnesses against them were Bedloe and Oates; Oates charg'd home against all the Prisoners, but Bedloe had his Scruples with respect to White and Fenwick: So these two were remanded to Newgate, there to lye, till other Evidence should appear against them: Ireland unfortunately fell within the Reach of both. Oates swore, he, Ireland, was one of forty or fifty Persons who had sign'd the Resolution taken at the (p) several separate Consults (April 24) to put the King to death; as also that he himself carry'd the Result from Lodging to Lodging; tho' he elsewhere says, he was, at that very time, oblig'd to lye close at Grove's House: And Bedloe swore that, some time in the August ensuing, he, Ireland, was present at Harcourt's Chamber with the said Harcourt, Pritchard, Figgarty, Grove, Pickering, as also Bedloe himself, when it was talk'd that the four Russians who were sent to Windsor, having mis'd of killing the King there, Greece and Pickering should go on, and that Conyers should be join'd with them, who was to Assassinate his Majesty in his Morning-Walks at Newmarket, agreeable to his former Deposition. And this was, moreover, direct against Grove and Pickering, who with their flew'd Pistols, and Silver Bullets, make for formidable a Figure in Oates's Evidence.

The Charge was, however, solemnly deny'd by them all: Upon which Occasion the Lord Chief Justice was pleas'd to exercise his Charity so far, as to say, That they would deny any thing in the World. Fenwick and Whitebread aver'd, Oates was at St. Omers at the very time he swore he was in England: Whitebread, in particular, said, he was at that Place from November to June; which he offer'd to prove by abundance of Witnesses; and by an authentic Writing, attested by the whole College. Ireland's Sister and Mother declar'd, that he set out for Staffordshire, August the third, and did not return till a Fortnight before Michaelmas. Sir John Southcot's Coachman likewise affirm'd, that he took him up at St. Albans, August 5, and drove him to Lord Aston's Seat at Tixwell, and thence the 16th to West-Chester. The Chief here grew angry: And You WITNESS! said he: Who do you lye with? The Witnesses reply'd, With Sir John Southcot. The Record goes on: — Who brought you hither?

WITNESS. I came only by a Messenger, last Night.

CHIEF. Was not Sir John Southcot in that Journey himself?

WITNESS. Yes, my Lord, he was.

CHIEF. Then you might as well have sent to Sir John Southcot himself to come.

IRELAND'S Sister. I did it of my self; I never did such a thing before, and did not understand the way of it.

IRELAND. It was mere Chance she did send for those she did.

CHIEF. But why should she not send for Sir John himself?

IRELAND. She did not know that Sir John was there.

CHIEF. You were not deny'd to send for any Witness, was you?

IRELAND. I was expressly deny'd: They would not let me have one Bit of Paper.

CHIEF. Fellow! What Town was that in Staffordshire? Tell me quickly!

WITNESS. It was Tixwell, by my Lord Aston's: There we made a Stay for three or four Days; then we went to Nautwich, and so to West-Chester.

One Mr. Gifford then stood forth, and witness'd, That he saw Ireland at Woburnhampton, a Day or two after Bartholomew Day, that he continued there till the 9th of September, and that he could bring twenty and twenty more, who could swear the same. On the other Hand, one Sarah Pain, who had been Servant to Grove, swore she saw him, Ireland, going into the Door of his own Lodgings, as it was made out by Circumstances, about the 12th of August: And tho' both his Mother and Sister, affirm'd, they resid'd at his Lodgings all the time of his (q) Absence, the Court thought fit to give more Credit to what was advanc'd against the

(p) Oates is express as to four, and intimated three more, tho' he could not give a good Account of them.

the Prisoner, than to what was advanc'd for him. Sir Denny Abburnham was then call'd upon to produce a Certificate of the Town of Hastings, which Place he represented in Parliament, setting forth, "That Oates had sworn the Peace against a Man; and at his taking his Oath, did say, there were some Witnesses that would evidence such a Point of Fact, which, when they came, would not testify so much; and so was sworn." Thus much the said Sir Denny made the Court acquainted with, but the Chief would not admit the Certificate to be read, as not being authentic Evidence: And Sir Denny himself, before he disclos'd thus much, had the Precaution to say, That Mr. Oates's Evidence was so corroborated with other Circumstances, that, tho' in his Youth, no body could depend on what he said, now nothing could be said to take off his Credibility.

Ibid. p. 63, 66.

As to Greene and Pickering, they contented themselves with solemnly disavowing all that had been sworn against them; and Pickering, in particular, declar'd he had never stol off a Pistol in his Life. But neither Asservations nor Testimonies had any weight with the Court: The Chief summ'd up the Evidence, gave a thundering Charge to the Jury, and when they brought in their Verdict, which was for the King against the Prisoners, expect'd himself from the Bench in the following Words: "You have done, Gentlemen, like very good Subjects, and very good Christians; that is to say, like very good Protestants: And now much Good may their (r) thirty thousand Masses do them!"

1678-9.

Ireland and Greene were executed, January the 24th; but Pickering not till the 9th of May: And all three, with their last Breath, persisted in denying the Crimes laid to their Charge, and pray'd for their Accusers.

Trial of Hill, Green, and Berry, for Godfrey's Murder.

On the 20th of Feb. (\)* Hill, Green, and Berry were try'd at the King's Bench for Godfrey's Murder. Oates led up the Evidence, or rather prepar'd the way for them, by declaring, That Sir E. Godfrey had told him, that he had been threaten'd by several Papish Lords, particularly some of those, at that time in the Tower, for being too busy about the Plot, and by others for being too remiss; and that he went in continual Danger of his Life from the Papish Party. Mr. Robinson, the chief Prothonotary of the Common Pleas, also swore, that asking the said Sir Edmund, whether he had not taken Examinations about the Plot? he reply'd in the Affirmative, with this Addition, "That he should have little Thanks for his Pains, or some such Words: That he had done it unwillingly: That he had given the said Examinations to a Person of Quality, and that he fear'd he should be the first Martyr,"

Then France having been directed by the Attorney General to take his Story from the Beginning, gave the Court to understand in a loose, rambling, obscure way, That about a Fortnight or three Weeks before Godfrey was murder'd, he was intic'd into an Alehouse by the Waterside, call'd the Plough, by one Girald and one Kelly. He also mention'd Green, as one of the Company; and that they said, "It was no Sin; it was a charitable Act; he was a busy Man, and had done, and would do a great deal of Mischief." These are his Words: In this abrupt manner he spoke; the Attorney General giving him the Lead all the way; and the Recorder (Trotter) encouraging him with a Well said! to hearten him thro' the Residue of his Story. Being then ask'd by the Attorney, How long it was before Godfrey dyed that this Discourse happen'd? He reply'd, a Week or a Fortnight; and mention'd Hill as one of the Gang, whom he had not nam'd before, and omitted Kelly. He also skip'd over their coming to a Resolution to undertake the Jobb, and came, at once, to the manner in which it was to be executed. "There, (at the Plough) they resolv'd, said he, that the first that could meet with him should give Notice to the rest to be ready: And so in the Morning, when they went out on the Saturday— He was thus proceeding to make short work of his Evidence, when the Attorney General interpos'd with— "But before you come to that, do you know of any dogging him into the Fields?" This Question drew him into a Recollection that Girald, Kelly, and Green, had follow'd Godfrey into Rushden Fields. And being farther ask'd, "Whether he knew any thing of any sending to his Home, or going to it?" He also recollected; "That one such time he did know of, viz. Sunday-Morning (the Day he was murder'd,) Kelly, he said, gave him notice, they were gone ahead to dog him: And afterwards they told him, that Hill or Green did go to his House and ask for him, and was told by his Maid, that he was not up: Adding immediately after, "As soon as they heard he was within, they came out and staid for his coming out and dogg'd him." Being then ask'd by the Chief, Whether all three went to Godfrey's House? He return'd to his first Testimony, That it was either Hill or Green. How do you know that, said the Chief? They told me so themselves, reply'd France. Q. Who told you so? A. It was Girald and Green both. Q. Who dogg'd him? A. Girald, Green, and Hill dogg'd him into St. Clements, and about seven o'Clock, Green came and gave me Notice, that he was at St. Clements, and I came to Somerstons as fast as I could. Q. Who gave you Notice?

Journal, which show'd where he was every Day, and who saw him, from the 14 of August to the 24th of September, being the Time of his Absence from London. The chief Places were Tottenham, Hatfield, Waterhouseham, and Beckford. The Persons that saw him were of great Quality, viz. my Lord John, and his Family; Sir John Bartholomew, and his Family. He proceeds to name several other Families, and others to above forty Persons more; adding, "Nor is there one Day, during the whole Time, in which there cannot be produced above a Dozen of his Witnesses."

(*) The Reward assign'd one of the Assizes, for killing the King.

(*) Hill was taken to Dr. Geobins, Green, an obscure, foolish Man, was Callow-keeper to Somerstons Church, and Berry Potter to the said Palace.

A. D. 1679. trac? A. It was Green: He told me that Girald and Kelly were watching him. It was necessary to point out these minute Circumstances, that the Reader might have a thorough Idea of France and his Evidence.

After these troublesome Queries were thus dispatched, he slid into the smoother Parts of his Narrative, as before set down in the Report made to his Majesty by the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Offory; but even in that he fell into Inconsequence, which, at any other time, or upon any other Occasion, would have had some Weight with the Court; for having said, that, about a Quarter of an Hour after Goffrey had been inveigled through the Wicket, he came down, and found he was not quite dead; for he laid his Hand on him, and his Legs totter'd and shook; and then Green wrung his Neck quite round: And the Clery asking, If he saw him do this? He answer'd, No; but that Green told him so afterwards. This brought another String of Queries, and among these, Who watch'd the Water-Stairs below, while France watch'd the (a) Wicket above? To which he answer'd, Berry; which is the first time we find his Name mention'd in the Trial. The Recorder then ask'd, what they did afterwards? France began to reply, Why afterwards—and either falling in his Speech, or appearing at a Loss for his Sequel, the Attorney General artfully reliev'd him by such Questions as help'd him to his Clue again: By the direction of which, he proceeded to give an Account of the Body's being carry'd by them all into a Chamber of Hill's, in Dr. Godwin's Houle; of its being remov'd at Midnight to Hill's Chamber in Somerfet House on the said Monday Night, by the help of a dark Lantern which Hill carry'd; of its being remov'd again on Tuesday Night to the Chamber where it had been first deposited; but finding somebody there, they were oblig'd to lodge it in another Room over against it; of its lying there till (c) Wednesday Night; of its being again remov'd about nine o'Clock that Night to the said Chamber of Hill's, which, the Somebody just spoken of had detected them from approaching the Night before, and of its being finally carry'd off about twelve the same Night, in a Sedan-Chair, thro' the upper Gate of the upper Court, which Berry open'd, France and Girald carrying the Sedan as far as Covent-Garden, where they were reliev'd by Green and Kelly; and at St. Sep's Church, Hill met them with a Horse; on which the Body being set astride, Hill, who was mounted behind it, convey'd it to Prinseps Hill; Green, Hill, Girald and Kelly attending by the Horse's Side (for France himself, it seems, return'd home) where they ran him thro' with his own Sword, threw him into a Ditch, and laid his Gloves and other things upon the Bank by him, as they were found. The Attorney General then prompted him to relate what pass'd at a Meeting at Bow; and by the Help of a Paper, he nam'd one Lewis a Priest, as he thought, one Ferratt, or Fornatt, one Cassio, one Detbeck and Girald. Mr. Attorney thought it necessary he should tell what they had for Dinner; he did so, as also, that they read the (a) Writing of the Murder; that they were very merry, and that he, France, threaten'd to kick a Drawer down Stairs for listening. But he let slip the main Circumstance, which Mr. Attorney brought him back to, by asking, whether there was no Reward to be given for the doing this? To which he answer'd, That Girald and Ferratt did speak of a great Reward, which was to come from the Lord Bellasi: But tho' the Drawer appear'd, and bore joint Witness of Detbeck's being at his Master's Houle with Company, of his own listening at the Door to the Reading a Paper, &c. he added no Confirmation of the Reward.

The Reader, who recollects Bedloe's Depositions relating to the Murder in question, will no doubt be at a loss to reconcile the two Stories: But tho' they are in many (a) Instances totally different, a venerable Sergeant (Stringer) introduced the said Bedloe, as one whose Evidence supported that of France; and, that the Court might be duly prepar'd for what was to follow, couples the Names of Girald and Kelly, mention'd by France, with those of de Phaire and Waffis, mention'd by Bellasi: He also threw in that artful Circumstance of Bedloe's knowing

(a) Of the great inter-gate at Somerfet-house, which leads to the Stable.

(c) In his Informations to the Lords Monmouth and Offory, France was not certain as to the Number of Days the Body lay at Somerfet-house. Here he is circumstantially exact.

(a) Probably, one of the full and true Accounts, usually published on such Occasions.

(2.) As a Specimen of this, the Reader is desired to consider the two following Columns:

EDWARD'S DEPOSITIONS.

1. That France, because Sir Edmund seem'd to be an Object to them; and had taken the Information of Dales and Bury, about the Plot, resolv'd and contriv'd to take away his Life.
2. Pursuant to which Design, they hir'd for 4000 l. de Phaire, Waffis, Adams, Detbeck, the Deponent, and some Troop, to do the Fact.
3. Accordingly, the above-named Persons trepan'd Sir Edmund into Somerfet-house, about five o'Clock at Night, on Saturday the 17th of October, 1678.
4. This Trepan was effected thus: The Deponent was told by de Phaire, that he, Waffis, and Adams, met Sir Edmund near the King's Head Inn in the Strand, and deceiv'd him into Somerfet-house, under Pretence of apprehending some Protest.
5. When they had him in the upper Great-Court of St.

FRANCE'S DEPOSITIONS.

1. That France, because Sir Edmund seem'd an Enemy to the Queen's servants, and would not consent to discharge one Girald from Parish Duties (so another Justice did) resolv'd and contriv'd to take away his Life.
2. Pursuant to which Design, they hir'd (for what Reward the Deponent doth not know) Hill, Green, Kelly, the Deponent, Girald, and Berry, to do the Fact.
3. Accordingly, the above-named Persons trepan'd Sir Edmund into Somerfet-house, about eight or nine o'Clock at Night: But the Deponent doth not well remember the Day.
4. This Trepan was effected thus: Green gave the Deponent notice, that he and Girald had set Sir Edmund in St. Clements; and Hill deceiv'd him down in the Water-gate, under Pretence of passing a Fry between two Fellows quarrelling in the Yard.
5. When they had him near the Rail, by the Queen's

A.D. 1578-9. France in the Lobby, tho' he had never seen him before, but by the Help of le Pbaire's Dark-lantern in Somerfet-houfe, together with Godfrey's Body. But, after all, Bedloe's Evidence, as to the Prisoners, and their two Confederates, Kelly and Girald, was little to the Purpose; for Girald, as he acknowledg'd himself, he did not know; Kelly he never could mention'd; nor could he say he had seen either Hill, Green, or Berry, about the Body: As to the Fact itself, he said, They (le Pbaire, &c. it must be presum'd) told him, they had strangled him: But now, HE COULD NOT TELL. He also bore witness to the Dark-lantern, as before; as also, to the (x) Covering of the Body; that the Body was to be carry'd out in a Chair; and that the PORTER was to sit up to let them out. One Elizabeth Carris, a Chairewoman in Godfrey's Family, also swore, That Green had been with her Master about a Fortnight before he dy'd; that Hill had been with him the Saturday Morning, which was the last of his Life; and that some Men, she could not tell who, had brought him a Note, ty'd up in a Knot, the Friday Night before, which he said he knew not what to make of. The Master of the Plough Alehouse, and his Servant, bore witness, that Primer had been there, in Company with Green, Hill, Fitzgerald, and Kelly. Unfortunately Hill had deny'd before the Council, that he knew Kelly: The contrary was here prov'd; and great Stress was laid by the Court on the Contradiction, tho' it so happen'd that they took no notice of the Contradictions in the Evidence.

P. 40. P. 45, 45, 50. Mr. Recorder, in the next place, called upon one Mr. Thomas Stringer to inform the Court, what Mr. Berry had said concerning the Directions he had receiv'd to keep all Persons out of Somerfet-houfe, about the 12th or 14th of the preceding October; who accordingly declar'd, that the said Berry had confess'd to the Lords Committees, that he had Orders from the Queen not to admit any Strangers, or Persons of Quality, during the A.D. 1678-9. (y) 12th, 13th, and 14th of that Month: That, in consequence of the said Orders, he had refus'd the Prince (Rupert): And that he had never receiv'd such Orders before. Berry here interpos'd, bluntly enough, The Prince might have come in, if he would: He however confess'd, he had such Orders from the Queen's Gentleman-Usher; but withal deny'd, that he had ever said (z) He had receiv'd no such Orders before; for the contrary was true: He also assert'd, that several had been admitted then; and Mr. Recorder allow'd, that five or six had been prov'd. Mr. Attorney would nevertheless have Berry's own Deposition read against him; and it was read accordingly: Upon which Mr. Justice Wild observ'd, "This was a kind of Reflecting-Evidence, and that he would have no more made of it, than the thing would bear."

As to the Defence of the Prisoners, it was various, according to the various Circumstances of the several Parties: Sir Rob. Southwell being ask'd, upon his Oath, whether France's Evidence to the Court was suitable to that which he had given to the Council; answer'd in the Affirmative: But only now he said more than he said then. Being also ask'd, whether Prince did hesitate in shewing the (a) Lords the several Papers in Somerfet-houfe, mention'd in his Narrative of the Murder; he answer'd, That he went directly and positively, till they ask'd him where the Body was carry'd; and then he led them thro' a Maze of Entries, Stair-cases, Courts, Rooms, &c. saying once, Thus far I am sure I am right; and, at last, fell into a great Distraction, as to the particular Room in question.

These Articles were not unfavourable to Hill's Defence. The Prisoners in general: But neither took advantage of them.—Hill, indeed, pleaded, that France had retracted his first Story; and being thereby perjurd, was an incompetent Witness:

BEDLOEN DEPOSITIONS.

Somerfet-houfe, they thrust him into a Room, put a Pillow to him, threaten'd him if he made a Noise; then stilled him between two Pillows; and finding him still alive, strangled him with a long Cravat, in the Room where he lay.

6. On the Monday following, precisely between nine and ten o'Clock at Night, the Body was taken to the Deponent by le Pbaire, in the Room, or the next to it, where the Duke of Albemarle lay in State, in the upper square Court: There it was by the Help of a Dark-lantern the Deponent saw the Body, in the Presence of le Pbaire, Walsh, Atkins, and two other Persons.

7. On the same Monday, at nine o'Clock at Night, the dead Body was carry'd out through the great Gate, by certain Chaimen (Retainers to Somerfet-houfe) whose Names were unknown to the Deponent: These Persons carry'd him in a Chair to the Corner of Clarendon-houfe, and from thence convey'd him in a Coach to Primrose-hill, where they made a Wound in his Body, and laid his Sword by his Side.

It is proper to add, in this Place, that Mr. Neesh, in his Examen, p. 208, writes as follows: "But omitting all other Circumstances, to show what had Mixture these Men meet with, I well remember a Passage told me by no small Man, who was present with the Lord Chancellor Feild, when Sir — (William Jones) came to give his Evidence as Accuser of the Commission of the three: But, said the Lord Chancellor, How did you answer such and such Incongruities in the Evidence which he offered. My Lord, (said Sir W. J.) I ordered the Briefs to, that none of these things appear'd, which this Person said brought an Haemorrhage over his Spirit."

(a) This is called a Cloak, by Beaue, in his former Depositions; but now a Thing; France having before call'd it a something, he could not tell what.

(y) Here Mr. Attorney General ask'd, What, Three Days? and Stringer reply'd, Two, or Three Days. Berry

FRANCE'S DEPOSITIONS.

Stables, Green strangled him with a twisted Handkerchief; then fasting him still alive, wrung his Neck quite round, and punch'd him with his Knee in the open Yard; which done, they dragg'd him into Dr. Goswin's Lodgings.

6. On the Monday following, precisely between nine and ten o'Clock at Night, the Body was taken to the Deponent by Hill, Green, and Girald, in a Room in the back Queue Court below Stairs, next the Garden. There it was (by the help of a Dark-lantern) the Deponent saw the Body in the Company of the said Hill, Green, and Girald, who were only present.

7. On the next Wednesday after, about twelve o'Clock at Night, the dead Body was put into a Sedan, and carry'd out by the Deponent, and Girald, into Coveys-garden, where Green and Kelly took him up, and carry'd him to Lang-bore: There the Deponent and Girald remain'd their Burden, and carry'd him to the Sabb: from thence he was convey'd afloat on Horseback, before Hill, into the Fields, where they thrust his Sword through his Body, and call him into a Ditch.

[Lords and Commons Journal, admitted but Two Days] and nam'd the 11th, 12th, &c. afterwards.

(z) Nor did any such thing appear in the Deposition he was induced to sign.

(a) Sir Robert had attended the Lords in this Quest.

A.D. 1678-9. Witnels: But this was explain'd away by the Chief; who said, Prance had accus'd the Prisoners upon Oath, but had not retract'd that Accusation upon Oath; and, therefore, could not be perjur'd: Mr. Attorney also said, That, whilst Prance was a Papist, and not sure of his Pardon, he was, 'tis true, under Disturbances and Fears, which prevail'd with him to come before the King, and deny what he had sworn; but no sooner was he come back to Prison, than he insist'd on making a second Appearance before his Majesty, to confirm all again. This was supported by Captain Richardson; with this Difference, indeed, that whereas the Attorney said, that Prance himself was for going back to Court, Richardson swore, he begg'd him, the said Richardson, to go back to the King, and to acquaint him, that all he had said was FALSE, that all he had sworn was TRUE; and that if his Majesty would send him a Pardon, he would make a great Discovery. Mrs. Hill, towards the Close of the Hearing, demanded that Prance might be ask'd, upon Oath, Why he had deny'd all that Prance reply'd, "It was because of his Trade; and for fear of losing his Employment from the Queen and the Catholics, which was the most of his Business; and because he had not a Pardon." Mrs. Hill call'd upon him again to answer, Whether he was not sworn? He answered in the Negative. Mrs. Hill rejoyn'd, "It was reported about the Town, he was sworn:" And again, "There are several about the Court, that heard him cry out."

Hill himself call'd for Mary Tilden, his Master Dr. Godwin's Niece, and Mrs. Broadstreet's his Housekeeper, as also the Maid: The Amount of whose Evidence was, "That he was a truly Servant; that he never kept ill Hours; that he always came in by eight o'Clock; that he could not go out afterwards, because the Maid lock'd up the Doors; and the Family was always up till Eleven: That he was at home, on Saturday Night, when Godfrey was kill'd; and on the Wednesday Night, when carry'd away: That their Houie and Stairs were to (b) little, that it was impossible that any thing could be brought in or out, without their Knowledge: That the Room, where the Body was said to have lain, was not only over-against the Dining-room, but a Room that had the Key in it always: That every Day they went often into it, for something or other; and that if any Company came to see the young Lady, their Footmen were oblig'd to sit in that very Room, for want of Convenience to receive them elsewhere: The Servant-maid also declar'd, That the call'd in at the Door of the Chamber every Day, and was last up every Night."

The Inferences drawn by the Court from all this positive Evidence were not, that Prance was sworn, or even mistaken; but, that the Parties (being Catholics) might say any thing to a Heretic, for a Papist: That they had a general Answer for all Questions. These were the Oracles deliver'd by the Lord Chief Justice. Mr. Justice Dalben was pleas'd to pronounce, This is a mighty improbable Business. Mr. Justice Will added, That, for his own part, he would not judge them (the Three Witnesses); but, that the Body should be carry'd there about nine o'Clock at Night, o' Saturday Night, and remain there till Monday Night, he said, made it very suspicious, that, if they were in the House, as they said they were, and us'd to go into that Room every Day, they must either hear it brought in, or see it." Mrs. Broadstreet replying to this, But we did neither, my Lord; Mr. Justice Dalben again put in, It is well you are not indicted. Mrs. Broadstreet then making a home Charge on Prance, that he knew all these things to be false; he, very opportunely perhaps, took off the (c) Edge of the Court, by answering, I lay nothing to your Charge. He, however, proceeded to tax Broadstreet with lying before the Duke of Monmouth, that Hill had left those Lodgings, before the Time in dispute, that is to say, of Godfrey's Death: Sir Robert Southwell also said, That the swore he had done so about Michaelmas, two, or three, or four Days after: And Mr. Attorney, as charitably as reasonably, did his best to terrify her, by asking, Whether she had not a Brother who was a Priest, and in the Proclamation? But him the silenced, by replying, I hope I must not impeach my Brother here: And to Sir Robert she reply'd, I beg your Pardon: I only said, I could not tell the Time exactly. One Gray, Hill's Brother-in-law, moreover, declar'd, that he kept him company from the

(b) Sir Robert Southwell confirm'd this, as follows: "My Lord, it is an extraordinary little Place: As soon as you get up eight Steps, there is a little square Entry; and there is this Room on one hand, and a Dining-room on the other." Trials, p. 56.

(c) The following Dialogue had likewise been exchange'd between the Bench, and their Stickers for Hill:

Mr. Justice Will. What Time was it you carry'd him (Godfrey) out of Somerly on Wednesday Night?
Prance. It was about ten or twelve o'Clock, Hill went to fetch the Horse.

Mary Tilden. We had never been out of our Lodgings after eight o'Clock, since we came to Town.

Mr. Justice Yates. When were you out of Town?

M. Tilden. In October.

Mr. Justice Dalben. Nay, now Monday, you have spoil'd all; for in October the Barber's was done.

Mr. Justice Yates. You have undone the Man, instead of saving him.

M. Tilden. Why, my Lord, I only mistook the Month.

NICH. XXXVI.

L. C. Justice. You, Woman, (speaking to Mrs. Broadstreet) What Mouth was it you were out of Town?
Broadstreet. In September.

L. C. Justice. 'Tis apparent you consider not what you say, or you come hither to say any thing will serve the turn.
M. Tilden. No; I do not: For I was out of September's came to Town the latter End of September.

L. C. Justice. You will remember what you said: That you came to England in April last; and, from that time, he was always within at eight o'Clock at Night.

M. Tilden. Except that time that we were out of Town, which was in September, the Summer-time. And it is impossible but if the Body was in the House, as Prance said it was, but I must see him; or some of us must. I used to go every Day into that little Room, for something or other; and I could never see him, if he was there.

L. C. Justice. You told me just now, you were not upon Conscience; and I tell you now so, you are not. Trials, p. 55.

 8th of October till he took his Houfe, which was after the 20th. But as he alfo declar'd, that he left him every Night, about eight or nine o'Clock, the Chief was peremptory, that his Evidence did Hill no Service. One Hill (d) affirm'd, he had been employ'd by Hill, to repair the Houfe he had taken; that he fec about the Jobb on the 8th; that he wrought that Week every Day, and for twelve Days and a half in all: That Hill was there every Day: That they din'd together on Saturday the 12th; that they met about nine or ten; and that they parted about one or two. One Cutler testify'd, that Hill was at his Houfe from four or five in the Afternoon, till between seven and eight; as alfo, that he was with him on the Wednesday from five to feven. One Archbold, a Gentleman of the Life-guards, faid, That his Taylor (Gray) being at Hill's, he went thither in queft of him; and being ask'd by Gray, What News? he answer'd, Very good News; for Prance was taken for the Murder of Godfrey: Upon which, Hill, who was prefent, declar'd, He was glad of it; and wifh'd they were all taken: Adding, that when he came the next Day after, he was told Hill had been taken out of his Bed, for the fame Murder: That Hill had this Intelligence, was confirm'd by one Mr. (e) Ravencroft; who was inform'd of it by Mrs. Hill, the fame Day; as alfo, that it occafion'd ftrange Talk concerning her Husband: And that he, Ravencroft, asking what Hill faid to it, and where he was; the reply'd, he was at home, and defy'd Prance, and all his Works. Upon all which Ravencroft obferv'd, that it was a good Sign of his Innocence, that when he had Notice he did not fly. This Gentleman, alfo, was fufpected, and charg'd from the Bench, with being a Papift; tho' he had taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy: And Mr. Attorney was pleas'd to intimate, that all he meant was, to fhew the Court he could fpeak (f) Latin.

Green's Defence.

As to Green, he call'd upon his Landlord, one Warrior, and the faid Warrior's Wife, who were both Proteftants; and declining to ask them any Queftions, left them to tell all they knew: Upon which the Man declar'd, That he, Green, came home the Night the Murder was committed at half an Hour after Seven, and that he did not go out again till after Ten. This gave Occafion to the Chief to ask, How long after the Murder he began to recollect himfelf? The Man answer'd, A Month; and then, becaufe the faid Green was a Prifoner in the Gatehoufe; and that he remember'd the time particularly, becaufe Green had been at his Houfe but fourteen Days before he was apprehended. It was reply'd, That Green was then in Prifon about the Oath: That it was the 24th of December, before he was fecur'd on Account of the Murder; and that he, the faid Warrior, had told Captain Richardfon, That he and his Wife could do Green no good. To this he answer'd, He call'd it not then to Memory, tho' he had fince done it by his Work; adding, be-fides, That he never knew him out after nine in his Life. The Woman alfo affirm'd the fame with many whimfical Particulars; but, calling the Day, Saturday Fortnight after Michaelmas, and Michaelmas being on a Sunday, this, in Rigour, was October 19, which furnifh'd a Plea to reject their Teftimony: Whereas it might be charitably prefum'd, that the Woman meant by that Expreflion a bare Fortnight after Michaelmas: For otherwife, Saturday the 19th being the Day after Friday the 18th (which the exprefly faid, was the time, when her Milk-Woman told her of finding Godfrey's Body) fhe muft have known, that what fhe had to fay was nothing to the Purpofe.

It was now Berry's Turn, whofe Maid testify'd, That, on the 16th of October (the Day the King came from Newmarket, and the Queen went from Sermerfet-houfe, as alfo) her Mafter came home from Bowls in the Dulk of the Evening; that he was not abfent an Hour all Night; that he lay within her Chamber; and that he went to Bed about twelve o'Clock. But what was moft furprizing of all, was the Teftimony of the three Sentinels and their Corporal, who watch'd that Night from feven till four in the Morning, at the great Gate of Sermerfet-houfe, through which the Body was faid to be convey'd in the Sedan: For they declar'd, That there came in no Sedan, but that which flood there every Night; but that none ever went out, during their refpective Watches: It being impoffible for any to pafs by, or for the Gate to be open'd, without their Knowledge: That they did not drink one Drop, whilft on Duty, nor fir a Pike's Length from the Gate: That the Porter could not open the Gate, but they muft fee him; and that they had been twice examin'd as to the Matter by the Committee (whether of Council, or either Houfe of Parliament, is not mention'd) before Prance was taken up.

P. 70.

All the Evidence being now difpatch'd, and the Court proceeding to an Iffue, it ought not to be forgot, that Mrs. Hill declar'd herfelf difatisfy'd with their Proceedings, faying, "My Witneffes were not rightly examin'd; they were modeft and the Court laugh'd at them." Nor that Mr. Attorney took the Pains to collect all the feveral Particles of Evidence together, that could affect the Lives of the Prifoner, and to give them fuch an Air of Confiftency, as might render the whole fatisfactory to the Jury. In which laudable Talk he was alfo affifted by Mr.

(d) This Man being ask'd by the Court, whether he was a Proteftant? and answering equivocally, Prance charg'd him with being a Papift, and the Queen's Carpenter: Which gave Occafion to Mr. Justice Jones to fay, That what he faid was as true, as that he was a Proteftant.

(e) Hill had been for near twelve Years Servant to this Gentleman's elder Brother, and had lately marry'd his Mother's Maid. [Hist. p. 66.]

(f) He had faid, If Flight be a Sign of Guilt, as no doubt it is, Adam, who is? and Courageousnefs a Sign of Innocency; then this Man is innocent. To Mr. Attorney's Sneeze, he reply'd undauntedly, "I thank God I can fpeak Latin as well as any Man in the Court: And afterwards add'd, warmly, "If this Man were guilty, rather than I would fpeak for him, if there wast a Hangman, I would do it myfelf." [Trial, p. 67, 68.]

A.D. 1678-9. Mr. Solicitor. And, as to the Lord Chief Justice, he allow'd in his Charge nothing material to have been offer'd in Behalf of the Prisoners, but that of the Sentinel, who had his Post at the great Gate from ten to one o'Clock; and who was positive no Seditious came out in his Time; and upon which his Lordship observ'd as follows: "Now how far that single Testimony of Nicholas Wright the Sentinel will weigh, I leave with you; who may be mistaken, either by Reason of the Darkness of the Night, or that Berry's Voice being known to him, he might not call him, and so Berry might open the Gate without any great Caution, or more particular Obedience by the Sentinel." His Lordship, also, took occasion to say,—"There is a manifest Evidence of the whole Plot itself by this Fact; for we can ascribe it to none but such Ends as these, that a Man must be kill'd; for it must be either because he knew something the Priests would not have him tell; or they must do it in Defence of Justice, and in Terror to all them who dare to execute it upon them; which carries a great Evidence in itself.—So I leave it to your Consideration, upon the whole Matter, whether the Evidence of the Fact does not satisfy your Consciences, that these Men are guilty; and I know you will do like honest Men on both Sides."

P. 81. This ended the Charge; and the Jury in a short Space, bringing in their Verdict, All convicted: Guilty, his Lordship was farther pleas'd to throw in the following tremendous Ecks: "Gentlemen, you have found the same Verdict that I would have found, if I had been one of you; and if it were the last Word I had to speak in the World, I should have pronounc'd them (g) Guilty."

Both when they were brought up to receive Sentence, and at the Place of Execution, the Prisoners persever'd in asserting their Innocence: And Berry, in particular, who was a Protestant, as the Cart was drawing away, lifted up his Hands, and said, As I am innocent; so receive my Soul, O Jesus!

and are protesting their Innocence.

The Trial of Mr. Atkins.

It is remarkable, that on the very Day these poor Wretches were convicted, Mr. Samuel Atkins, the Clerk to Mr. (b) Pepys, who had been mention'd by Bedloe for one of the Persons whom he had seen, by the Help of le Phaire's Dark-lantern, with Godfrey's Body at Somerfet-houfe, was brought up, together with them, to receive his Trial, as he thought, at the same time; but the contrary happen'd: It was held advisable to try the Efficacy of Prance's Testimony first.

Examen, P. 250.

And, in the Afternoon, when Atkins was again brought to the Bar, he was told, he must stay for his Trial till the Sessions; and ask'd, if he had Bail ready? His Answer was, He was better prepar'd for his Trial, than to give Bail: And upon his insisting to be try'd, and shewing his Witnesses were sea-faring Men, and who could not stay so long; he obtain'd the next Day.

It ought to be observ'd, that he had been allow'd Pen, Ink, and Paper, to prepare for his Defence, some Weeks before; and that, when it was presum'd he was in readiness, all his Papers were seiz'd by Capt. Richardson, and carry'd to the Secret Committee: As also, that being arraign'd February 5, he desir'd his Papers should be restor'd; which was in effect refus'd; the Court only saying, That what was reasonable should be done; and that he might be favour'd with a speedy Trial; having already lain sixteen Weeks in Prison: Of which more will be said hereafter.

There were divers Passages at the Trial, which, being in their Nature extraordinary, deserve to be remembered. Mr. Attorney said the Prisoner had good Luck that Prance came in and discovered the Murder; else, upon Circumstances, Probabilities, and Presumptions, he must have gone for the Principal, but now he should be charged only as accessory. And I may add he had, says Mr. North, good Luck that he had never been a Papist; for that Question, often ask'd, seem'd to imply that, if he had been so, it might have prov'd a nicking Evidence against him. This is confirm'd by an Incident or two at the Trial. The Attorney General was told there was a Boy would prove him at Mafe at Somersets-houfe divers times; and if so, said the Attorney, that is being a Papist, he is a Party concern'd, for it was the Interest of those of that Party, to have Godfrey cut off. But, on calling the Boy, the Prisoner ask'd on a sudden, Do you know me? And the Boy answer'd, No. And then the Attorney fell into a Rage against the Officer, for bringing him in. The Boy was sent away, and it was call'd a Mistake. And when, on the Prisoner's Part, the Witness said he was a Protestant, and a zealous one; Ay, said the Chief Justice, there is much in that. Such strange Law-Logic prevail'd in those Days.

When the Prisoner came to his Defence, and began to open against Captain Atkins, to shew him the veriest Rogue upon Earth, for which he was amply provided of Testimony, he was stopp'd and not suffer'd to go on, because that Evidence did not press him. But the Jest came at the Close; for when, by indubitable Evidence, it appear'd that, on the 14th of October at ten and eleven, or twelve, at Night, Mr. Atkins was absent at Greenwich, and there, at an Entertainment of some Ladies, soundly foxed, the Attorney General threw up; but with a Speech that all this was no disproving of the King's Evidence, Mr. Bedloe. No, no, have a care of that; and the Chief Justice added, that Bedloe was the more to be credited. But Mr. Attorney was not satisfi'd with all this, but came over with it again, desiring that the Company might not go away with the Mistake, that the King's Evidence were disprov'd. And the Chief Justice made a short Eclair-

The Attorney General's Protestation.

(g) At which Words, says the Trial, the whole Assembly gave a great Shout of Applause.

(b) Who was himself committed to the Tower, as a Conspirator, by Order of the House of Commons.

A. D. 1678. g. Eclaircissement, how this might very well happen; that is, out of Jealousy of the Murder, and Willingness to find it out, and none was to blame for pursuing Mr. Bellin's Evidence; and all they said might be true, and yet Mr. Samuel Atkins was a very honest Man.

The Gazette gave equal Notice of the Acquittal of Atkins, and the Condemnation of Green, Berry, and Hill; but we do not find the Sentence of the Court made so strong an Impression on the Public, in the former Instance, as in the latter: A strong Faith in the Plot was the Test of all political Merit; not to believe, was to be a political Reprobate; and according to the Zeal was the Cruelty of the Times. The Terror excited by the Plot had caus'd such a Thirst of Revenge, that nothing but Blood could satiate; every suppos'd Criminal was precondemn'd; and no sooner did the Victim appear, but the People called out for the Sacrifice: Pity was look'd upon as not only impertinent, but almost criminal; and even the great Prerogative of Mercy lodg'd in the Crown, was of no use.

In this terrible Interval, both the King, and his persecuted Minister, as well as the Duke, found themselves in the most distressful Situation imaginable: Without a Supply, the Army could neither be kept up nor disbanded: Without the Parliament, there could be no Supply: And while the present Parliament lasted, it was almost as dangerous to resemble them, as it was impossible to proceed without their Assistance. To dissolve the present Representative in anger, and call a new one, was to disperse the ill Humours, which were gathered in the Head, through every Part of the Kingdom: It was, besides, an Experiment, which very rarely answer'd the Ends of a Court; and much oftener increas'd Difficulties, than remov'd them. It was, however, thought the least Evil, and bid fair to humour the Passions, at least, of all Parties: The Duke, as well as his Agent, Coleman, had long ago advis'd it, and found his Opinion supported by the Leaders of the Opposition: The Lord Treasurer had such apparent Reason to fall into it, that the Measure is plac'd to his (i) Account; and even the King himself had his Expectations, that he should have less Difficulty to manage a new Parliament, than to accommodate Matters with the old.

Sir John Kersey, upon this Occasion, says, "This Parliament was, for the most part, VERY LOYAL, BOTH to the KING and the CHURCH; which made those of adverse Sentiments very desirous of its Dissolution: And the way they contriv'd to bring it about, as was credibly reported, was by persuading the Treasurer to obtain it of the King; proposing, if he should succeed therein, That there should be no farther Prosecution against him in the next Parliament."

However this may be, the King resolv'd to part with this once very loyal, but now very troublesome Parliament: Lord Shaftesbury had call'd it his Wife; and the Dissolution was call'd a Divorce: And in the Proclamation, declaring his Majesty's Pleasure therein, the Cause ascrib'd for this Proceeding, is, The many Inconveniences arising from the over long Continuance of one and the same Parliament.

His Majesty in the Course of many Years Experience, had, without doubt, found equal Cause to like and loath it. While the first Flame of their mutual Affection lasted, he was all Grace and Goodness; and they all Submission and Compliance: They were prodigal of their Favours; he was as lavish of his Thanks: He declar'd their Approbation should be the Standard of his Government; they vow'd an unalterable Attachment to the Prerogative: The full Power of the Scepter and Sword they restor'd to him, and only reserv'd that of the Purse, by way of Security for their own Privilege. But even in the midst all those Professions and Acknowledgements, on both Sides, it appear'd, that each had a Rival: His Majesty cast an amorous Eye towards Popery; his Parliament made an open Tender of their Affections to the Church of ENGLAND: Jealousies and Heart-burnings ensu'd: The King found it his Interest to give way: The People paid for his Concessions; and the Church had the Benefit: And now his Majesty having felt the Curb, grew out of Humour with the Bogle, and call'd upon France to set him free. France promis'd fair: The King believ'd, and throw off all Restraint, in the Pretension, that he was now the Master: But Necessity open'd his Eyes, and compell'd him once more to court the Assistance of those he had disoblig'd; who having now got the better of their Fondness, took advantage of that Necessity, and now resolv'd to make a Sale of their Favours. Henceforward their Intercourse was mutually mercenary; the King chas'd for a Supply, and the Party Leaders set their Prices: But tho' willing to be bought, they were afraid to trust him with the Purchase-Money. Hence the very Means of Corruption fail'd; and they began to dread the Power they had bestow'd: Hence all their subsequent Endeavours were to undo their own Work, and reduce their Monarch once more to the Servant of the Commonwealth; not, however, from honest Motives, or by honest Means, but by any Means indiscriminately; and as our own Barbarians on the Sea-Coasts, hang out Lights in tempestuous Times, to mislead the Mariner, that they may prey on the Wreck.

Good often rises out of Evil: Had not the King slighted this Parliament, and had not they shewn a proper Repentment, the Constitution had been long ago at an End: Tho' their Opposition was, in many Instances, extravagant, and always partook of the Leaven of Faction, it serv'd to awe the Throne and keep the Flame of Liberty alive among the People:

A.D. 1678-9. People: And as to the Brand of Penſioner-Parliament, which was ſtamp'd upon it, every Man of common Senſe muſt join with the admir'd Author of the Difſertation upon Parties, who ſays, "I cannot hear it call'd the Penſioner-Parliament, as it were by way of Eminence; without a Degree of honeſt Indignation; eſpecially in the Age, in which we live, and by ſome of thoſe who affect the Moſt to beſtow upon it this ignominious Appellation."

To return: No wonder was it known that a Diſſolution was at hand, and that a general Election was to follow, than all Parties, and almoſt all Individuals beſtir'd themſelves upon the Occaſion, as if the Fate of the Kingdom was at Stake: Both the (A) Pen and the Purſe were call'd upon to aid and aſſiſt, and every other way of Influence, however unfair, however unjuſtifiable, as if Succes was the only Virtue. Sir John Rerſley acknowledges, That both the King and the Duke advis'd him to ſtand, and aſſur'd him of their Aſſiſtance, in caſe his Election ſhould be contriverted; as alſo, that the Lord Treaſurer wrote to the High Sheriff of Yorkſhire to be ſecurable to him

(4) There was, in particular, a Pamphlet publiſhed about this time, call'd, A Letter from a Jeſuit at Paris to his Correſpondent at London, ſhewing the moſt eſſential Way to ruin the Government and Proſperity Religion: The Diſt of which was, to excite an Opinion, That the great Heats in the late Houſe of Commons, againſt the Lord Treaſurer, were kindled by the Jefuits: that the Bill-ſwearers of the Oppoſition were under their Influence: That the throwing a Vote into the Houſe of Commons was the ſureſt Way to elude the Proſecution of the Plot: And that the Oppoſers would join with the Catholicks, the French, or the Great Turk, rather than loſe the Pleaſure of being ſome great Perſons take the Senſure from the Barliments of Honour. In this Pamphlet, the following Eſtructions were alſo inferred, as the Work of Le Chaiſſé and his Calal at Paris, for promoting the Catholic Cauſe in England:

"And firſt, as a thing preceſſous to the Elections which ſhall be made, let the Engliſh in all Counties and Corporations, eſpecially ſuch as have Burgheſſes, be vigilant to enquire who are to be the Candidates for the ſucceeding Elections.

Secondly, Uſe all Endeavours among the Diſſenters, according to your Intereſt, to get in as many of the late Members as you can reſpectively P. G. B. M. &c. Our excellent Friend M. hath aſſur'd his Illuſtration the N. that he will not fail to be in again, nor to do as the beſt Service he can, now, as well as in the laſt.

Thirdly, If that cannot be done, but that new ones are ſet up, if they be Perſons firm in their Loyalty, and ſuch as have any the remotest Dependence or Eſpauſante upon the Court or Army; then give out among the People, though in paſſant only, as you ſee at your Luſe, that you certain Knowledge ſuch Gentlemen are great Courtiers, and are of that Party who deſign to reduce the Nation to the Medal of France, by the arbitrary Power of a ſtanding Army, whereby to introduce and eſtabliſh Papery among us, which you muſt be ſure to make moſt vehement and bitter Declamations againſt. If they are Perſons ſtrongly inclin'd to the Church of England, then give out confidently that they are Papiſts in heart, and that you know where they have declar'd themſelves ſuch; and that it is moſt viſible, by their being ſo much for Cromwell. This all the Diſſenters will not only eaſily credit, but will be very helpful to us in ſpreading and juſtifying the Reports: then they ſpeak with Confidence, and a ſenſe of ſome intimate Knowledge of them, and that you ſee divulge theſe Secretes out of ſincere Affection to the Nation, ready to be betrayed to Papery and arbitrary Government, will by theſe Wild ſee among the ordinary People, who will know-hill in hand to hand, and father it upon Perſons of Repute, not knowing the original Hand from whence it firſt came; and the repeated Ride of their Fears will both reſtable, and confirm it. By this means you ſhall, with the Aſſiſtance of the Diſſenters, who generally by hold of this Occaſion, which they have ſo long widd'd for and expected, be ſure to promote the Election of ſuch, eſpecially Burgheſſes, as are diſſect'd both to the King and Church; and tho' poſſibly in many Counties the Loyalty and Intereſt of the Country will carry it againſt us in the Knightes; yet the greateſt Number counſiling of the Corporation Repreſentatives; there we ſhall be too hard for them. And then mark what will follow upon this; they will meet, with an invincible Prejudice againſt the King, and eſtablish'd Government, both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical; they will fall violently upon the Church as well as the Papiſts; they will be ſo taken up with their own Affairs, and the Embroiderment our Friends will engage them in, that ours will ſleep; and being ſo hot and diſorderly, they will, in probability, oblige the King to ſend them home again, and ſeek for another.

By this means the City and Country will be under the greateſt Diſappointment and Diſſatisfaction imaginable; the Army, which is unſatisfiſd, will be thought neceſſary to be kept up; but there being no Money to buy them, they will be heartleſſe, and conſpire the Country, and augment the Jealouſy of a ſtanding Army. A Fleet muſt alſo be put to Sea, becauſe of the Alarms of the French; and when they ſome June, the Seamen muſt be tar'd adrift for their Jayroo. It may be a new Parliament may not be called in ſome time; but ſuch Ways may be taken to raiſe Money, for the public Neceſſity, as may render the Government odious, and diſpoſe People to a general Inſurrection; and then the Deys of our own; then my noble Lords will love their Heads, for they muſt be try'd by a Parliament; and, if our Affairs jump luckily, they ſhall out-live Mithraſem, if they live to ſee a Parliament loyally as to give the King Money, or endeavour to ſettle the Peace of the Nation.

But, in the ſecond place, if the Parliament ſhall fit, and there appears any Danger to us by their being unanimous, and ſo like to continue, and to bring the Lords to their Trial; all Endeavours muſt be ſied by ſuch as can be got to be of our Party, firſt to run them again upon the Miniſters of State, as being poſſibly affected, and deſigning to ſubvert Parliaments, and introduce arbitrary Government. I need not ſpeak much of this, you are ſufficiently inſtruted how to manage it, and cannot want a Cry to ſet up.

Secondly, Obſtrudt as much as poſſible the riſing of Money, and yet cry out of the imminent Danger and ſtruts of the French; it may be you will have Reaſon and Truth in that particular; however, delay the Money, by ſeeking ſuch unreaſonable Things in recompence of it, that the Money-Bill, upon ſuch Terms, may be rejected; and be ſure it may not be near enough for the preſent Neceſſity: Urge the miſpending of the great Revenues of the Crown; but by all the Blame upon the Miniſters; you cannot miſs the King, if you hit the other. This will put the King out of all Hopes of this Parliament, and may poſſibly occaſion either a long Protraction, or a Diſſolution; and we ſhall be better provided againſt a new Parliament, than we could be now, being ſo much ſorry'd in the Diſſolution of the laſt. And beſides, if this Parliament, upon which the Faſtious have built ſuch Hopes, be either prorogued or diſſolved, it will eaſily reſtore the Nation; and they will be apt to receive the Inſpiration of their own Fears and Jealouſies, as well as thoſe we muſt now ſow thick among the Diſcontented; and if it continues, we muſt ſill play the ſame Game, and with Grievances, Inſart Vozs, and ungrateful Adreſſes, keep up and increaſe the Miſunderſtandings, and widen the Differences, between the K. and the H. C.

Thirdly, Aſperſe all that are not of our Party as Court-Penſioners, or poſſibly affected: This will ſecure ours from being diſcover'd, and will render the other odious to the People; and hinder their being elected into a future Parliament, if this ſhould happen to be laſtly diſſolved.

Fourthly, Let our Party bring in a Bill for Comprehention, or Toleration: If it does no other Good, it will occaſion great Heats and Alterations, long Debates, and will be an excellent Remove to all other Affairs, it will make them highly the Favourites of the Separatiſts, who will be the moſt active againſt the Crown and Government; and if that can be prevented, it is no matter how feverely it excludes all Catholicks from the Benefit of Indulgence, it will certainly ruin the Church; and we ſhall be well enough able to do our Buſineſs, and to prepare the People for a Rebellion, under the Shelter of the ſeveral Sects, who have both the King and Church ſufficiently already, and will in a little time become ſo numerous and confident, that by their Help we may be able to effect our Deſign. This politic Tax of a Toleration has alſo another Face; for it will alienate the Affections of thoſe who are zealous for the Church from the Crown, when they ſee that give them up as a Prey to their Enemies; and if it does not yet, it will diſturb them from doing it the Service they would, in caſe of neceſſity: So that if it comes to a Rebellion, the King will be deſtitute of Aſſiſtance of all Sides, and muſt ſeek for Aid among the Catholicks, and from foreign Powers. And which way ſoever the Game goes, we ſhall be ſure not only to ſave our Stakes, but to win by the Hand."

Ferguſon calls this counterfeit Jefuits Letter a Beaſt to deter the Parliament from ſtriking any of the great Miniſters of State. And adds, I know not from what Authority, that it was, at laſt, prov'd in the Houſe of Commons, to be the Lord Treaſurer's Contrivance, and ſent by him to be printed. him in the Return: And the Author of the Caveat against the Whigs affirms, That to make all sure, the Dissenters and their Friends fell to splitting of Freeholds, to sprout twenty Mulroom Votes out of 40 l. per Ann. which, according to him, was the first time that scandalous Practice is to be met with in our Story.

The Time of a general Election is always a Time of Ferment; and, possibly, contributes as much to deprave the Morals of the People, as to preserve their Liberties: But this Ferment was, at this time, artificially rais'd to a higher Degree of Fury than ever, and threaten'd to be productive of more dangerous Consequences: One Party gave out, that the Standard was on the Point of being set up for the Good Old Cause of the Commonwealth; and the other, that Papery and Slavery were at the Doors: The blind and undistinguishing Herd were like the Waves of the Sea between these opposite Winds, and rag'd and foam'd, only to dash each other to Pieces, while those who collected the Vapours, and let loose the Storm, enjoy'd the Honours of it, and gloried in the Power and Pleasure of doing Mischief.

As to foreign Affairs, they were no longer attended to; nor, indeed, were they any longer worthy of Attention: No body fear'd our Power; no body sought our Assistance: It was, not unreasonably, concluded, That Disputes to chafily set on foot, and so fiercely maintain'd, could only be decided by the Sword, and that the Trumpet would very speedily proclaim a second Civil War.

Scarce ever was the Kingdom cover'd with a more portentous Darkeness: The Plot hung like a Comet over it, and was supposed to have a Complication of all Calamities in its Train: The Leaders of the Opposition took care to fix all Eyes on this political Prodigy, and read such alarming Lectures on it from time to time, that the People grew frantic with their own Fears, and concluded the last Day of their Liberties was at hand. Under this Impulse, the Elections went, for the general, against the Court; the new Parliament wore a more threatening Aspect than the old: The King had Reason to believe they would exert their Strength on the same Principles, and with the same Views, that they had acquir'd it; and he was but in a poor Condition to wrestle with them, when they had so much the advantage of the Ground.

In order therefore to divert the Torrent he could not withstand, and to disarm the Rage he could not resist, he gave into the Lord Treasurer Darby's Advice to induce

quit the Court, but the Kingdom; it being presum'd that when the great Object of the public Terror was remov'd, the public Tranquility might be restor'd; and that in Return for this unrequir'd and unexpected Concession, the People would make no Difficulty to come into all his Majesty's Measures by way of Acknowledgment.

Tho' his Royal Highness had tender'd himself obnoxious on account of his Religion, and had been mention'd in the House of Commons, as thereby giving Encouragement tacitly to the Designs of the Roman Catholics, nothing criminal had been laid to his Charge: Oates himself, as before mention'd, had answer'd for his Innocence to the House of Lords; and, no one Fact had since turn'd up to authorize the Suspensions of the Times: He had, therefore, a Right to dispute his Majesty's Pleasure, if he thought proper, and to stand his Ground against all Persecution: But tho' he no ways relish'd the Treasurer's Politics in this Proceeding, and thought it equally unkind and unjust, he at once play'd the Part of the Politician and devoted Subject, by obeying and setting his own Price on that Obedience.

He had, for some time past, regarded the Duke of Monmouth with a jealous Eye: The King favour'd him, the People loved him, the Opposition courted him, the favourite Mistress cabal'd with him, the Minister fear'd him, and every Circumstance of the Times seem'd to befriend him. That therefore his Absence might not enable him, Monmouth, to improve all to the Accomplishment of his Willies, he stipulated with the King, 1st, That he should solemnly declare he was never marry'd to the Duke of Monmouth's Mother. 2<sup>d</sup>, That he should never give his Assent to any Bill to vacate his Right to the Crown; and 3<sup>d</sup>, that he should give him an Order under his Hand to remove; that his Withdrawing himself might be understood as an Act of Duty to his Majesty, and not any Acknowledgment of Guilt or Dread of Danger. His Majesty made no Difficulty to comply (1) with all these Demands; and then his Royal Highness consented to be made the Scopel-Geat of the Court and Administration.

While Affairs were in this embarrassed State, Sir William Temple return'd from his Residence in Holland, with a View to enter upon the Secretary's Place, to which he had been invited by the Lord Treasurer; and as he intimated, himself, was immeasurably surpris'd to find the immortal Parliament, as it had been call'd, dissolv'd, and the presumptive Heir going into Exile. He arriv'd the Day with Sir W.

Temple.
[Temple's Memoirs,
P. iii. p. 331.]

(1) The Declaration relative to the Duke of Monmouth's Mother was entered in the Council-Books January 6, and renew'd the 3<sup>d</sup> of March (being the Day his Royal Highness arriv'd in Holland, in his Way to Brussels) possibly, that it might seem to flow from his Majesty's own Motion, and rather as a mere Act of Justice, than as a Matter of Constraint, to let the Duke out of the way.

The King's Order, agreeable to the Concert between the two Brothers, was as follows:

"I have already given you my Resolution at large, which I think is fit, that you absent yourself, for some time, beyond the Seas: As I am truly sorry for the Occasion, so you may be sure I shall never desire it longer than it shall be absolutely necessary, for your Good, and my Service. In the mean time, I think it proper to give it you under my Hand, that I expect this Compliance from you, and desire it may be as soon as conveniently you can. You may easily perceive, with what Trouble I write this to you, there being nothing I am more sensible of, than that the Kindness you have ever had for me. I hope you are as just to me as to be assured, that no Absence, nor any thing else, can ever change me from being truly and kindly yours.

G. R."

A.D. 1677. Day before the Duke was to depart, and having just time for one Audience, was by his Royal Highness made acquainted with all the Steps which had been taken towards that Resolution: The Duke upon the whole observing, "That it was much against his Opinion; and bidding him remember what he then foretold, That however this was thought likely to stop the violent Humour rais'd by the Plot, he would see it would end in the Lord Treasurer's Ruin, tho' he did not expect it: And the Event soon shew'd that his Highness had Reason on his Side.

The desperate Situation of the Lord Treasurer.

[Temple's Memoirs, Part iii.]

No doubt the Treasurer thought his Influence would be more absolute over the King, when the Duke was remov'd; but he did not seem to reflect, that by weakening the Royal Family, he also weaken'd his own Support; and that his Case was now of such a nature; as rather call'd upon him to guard against his Enemies in the State, than to supplant a Rival in the Cabinet: He had not only the Clamour of the People against him, but the united Cabals of all the Intriguers at Court, and the Party Leaders of both Houses: Sir William Temple, particularly, specifies his old Enemy, Lord Arlington, as still contributing his best Endeavours to throw him out of the Saddle; as also, that the King's Female Favourite, the Duchess of Portsmouth, his darling Son the Duke of Monmouth, and even the Earl of Sunderland, who had declar'd himself his Friend and Servant, were join'd with the Earl of Shaftsbury in the Designs of his Ruin. The Removal of the Duke pass'd with all these, rather as a Sign of Weakness, than a gracious Condescension; and instead of receiving it with the grateful Acknowledgments, which it deserv'd, they took the Hint, to make the Storm drive harder on the Court than ever; in the Persuasion, that if the Plot had already thrown so valuable a Part of his Cargo overboard to make his Vessel fail the easier, the same foul Weather would, in the End, oblige him to quit the Helm, or expose him to the Danger of a Wreck.

The new Parliament meet.

King's Speech.

This was the State of the Court and Kingdom, when the New Parliament met, March the 6th; upon which Occasion, his Majesty deliver'd himself to both Houses to the following gracious Speech: "That he met them with the most earnest Desire that Man could have to unite the Minds of all his Subjects both to him and to one another: That he resolv'd, it should be their Faults, if the Success was not suitable to his Desires: That he had, already, done many great Things to that End; as the Exclusion of the Popish Lords from their Seats in Parliament, and the Execution of several Men both for the Plot and Godfrey's Murder: That it was apparent he had not been idle in prosecuting the Discovery of both: That he had disbanded as much of the Army, as he could get Money to do: That he was ready to disband the rest as soon as they would reimburse him the Money they had cost, and would enable him to pay off the Remainder: That above

A.D. 1678 all, he had commanded his Brother to absent himself, because he would not leave malicious Men Room to say, He had not remov'd all Causes which could be pretended to influence him towards Popish Councils. By which last great Step he propos'd to discern, whether the Protestant Religion, and the Peace of the Kingdom, were as truly intended by others, as they were aim'd at by him: For if they be, continued his Majesty, you will employ your Time upon the great Concerns of the Nation, and not be drawn to promote private Animosities under Pretences of the Public; your Proceedings will be calm and peaceable, in order to those good Ends I have recommended to you; and you will curb the Motions of any unruly Spirits, which would endeavour to disturb them. His Majesty then signify'd a Hope that there were none such among them, since every Man must see the fatal Effects of such Animosities, at that time, both abroad and at home: Engag'd, not to give over his Endeavours to find out what more of the Plot and Murder he could; desir'd the Assistance of both Houses in that Work: Said he had not been wanting to put all the present Laws in Force against Papists; and declar'd his Readiness to join in the making such further Laws, as might be necessary for securing the Kingdom against Popery: Desir'd also their Assistance in the Supplies to disband the Army; as likewise for paying that Part of the Fleet which had been provided for by Parliaments but till the 5th of the preceding June: And the Debt (m) for Stores, which was occasion'd by the Pole-Bill's falling short of the Sum, which the Parliament gave Credit for: Adding, I must necessarily recommend to you likewise, the discharging of those Anticipations which are upon my Revenue, and which I have commanded to be laid before you; and I hope I shall have just Cause to desire such an Increase of the Revenue itself, as might make it equal to my necessary Expences; but by reason of those other Supplies, which are absolutely necessary at this time, I am contented to struggle with that Difficulty a while longer; expecting for the present only, to have those additional Duties upon the Customs and Excise to be prolong'd to me; and that you will some other way make up the Loss I sustain by the Prohibition of French Wines and Brandy, which turns only to my Prejudice, and to the great Advantage of the French. His Majesty concluded with recommending to them that such an Establishment ought to be made for the Navy, as might render the Kingdom not only safe, but formidable; and with signifying, that it was his earnest Desire this should be a healing Parliament; that he would, with his Life, defend both the Protestant Religion and the Laws; and that he did expect from them to be defended from the Calumny as well as Danger of those worst Men, who endeavour'd to render him and his Government odious to his People."

What more was thought necessary to be said,

(m) To the England Merchants.

A.D. 1678-9. said, was left to the Lord Chancellor, who set out with a sort of Apology for his Majesty's dissolving the last dutiful Parliament; and yet gave a sort of Notice, that for the future, he would frequently shift the Representative Part of the Legislature, that he might have a right and true Understanding of the Desires of his People, and that he might be rightly understood by them. His Lordship then discours'd of the Necessity of Union from the great and surprising Dangers at home, and the formidable Appearance of Danger from abroad; adopted the Plot; enlarg'd on the horrid Practices of the Papists, and charg'd them with trying to set up the Dominion and Supremacy of the Pope in the three Kingdoms; made a Merit of the Diligence that had been us'd in making farther Discoveries, of the Execution of some, and the Severities exercis'd on the whole Party. "In a word, said he, so universal is that Despair to which the Papists are now reduc'd, that they have no other Hopes left but this, That we may chance to overdo our own Business, and by being too far transported with the Fears of Papery, neglect the Opportunities we now have of making sober and lasting Provisions against it." His Lordship in the next place, proceeded to give a panegyric Comment on the several Points and Articles of the King's Speech; and from his parting with such a Brother and such a Friend, instructed both Houses to believe he had now no Favoured but his People. His Lordship also bestow'd a Paragraph on the poor Church; and in the same Breath, among the many good Laws, which were to be the Growth of this Session, recommended one for the further Regulation of the Press. His Lordship's next Transition was to the Dangers which might come from abroad; which arose, it seems, from the general Peace of Europe, that left great Fleets and Armies unemployed and ready for an Occasion. But these Dangers, his Lordship seasonably be thought himself, would not be so considerable, if the present Wants of the Crown were not so well known; he, therefore, modestly enough, signify'd that these Wants ought to be remov'd, "His Majesty hoping, That the good Understanding between him and his People would be for ever maintain'd, by a perpetual Reciprocation of Grace and Favour on his Part, and Duty and Affection on theirs." And upon the whole, his Lordship, as if suddenly inspir'd, broke out into the following sensible, noble, and affecting Particulars, which will possibly bear witness against the Over-righteousness of these Times, to all Eternity:

"You have now an Opportunity of doing great Things for the King and Kingdom; and it deserves your utmost Care to make a right Use of it: For it is not in the Power of a Parliament to recover a lost Opportunity, or to restore themselves again to the same Circumstances, or the same Condition, which they once had a Power to have improv'd. Would you secure Religion at home and strengthen it abroad, by uniting the Interest of all the Protestants in Europe? This is the Time. Would you let the Christian World see the King in a Condition able to protect those who shall adhere to him, or depend upon him? This is the time. Would you extinguish all your Fears and Jealousies? Would you lay aside all private Animosities, and give them up to the Quiet and Repose of the Public? This is the Time. Would you lay the Foundation of a lasting Peace, and secure the Church and State against all the future Machinations of our Enemies? THIS IS THE TIME. The Results of this Council seem to be decisive of the Fate of these Kingdoms for many Ages, and are like to determine us either to Happiness or Misery of a very long Duration."

As nothing could be better said than all this, nothing could be worse done than what follow'd: When the Commons return'd to their House to chuse a Speaker, Colonel Birch nominated Mr. Seymour; who, being unanimously approv'd of, was plac'd in the Chair, after the usual Forms: But Mr. Seymour was on ill Terms with the Lord-Treasurer, who was rash enough to indulge his Repentment, at the Expence of his Royal Master's Interest, and the Repose of the whole Kingdom: For so it was, that when Mr. Seymour, the next Day, made his (a) Appearance in the House of Lords, as usual, for the King's Approbation, the Lord-Chancellor stood up, and said, "That if his Majesty should always accept a Person pitch'd upon by the House of Commons, then it would be no great Favour to be chosen a Speaker; and therefore his Majesty, being the best Judge of Persons and Things, thought fit to except against Mr. Seymour, as being fitly qualify'd for other Services and Employments, without giving any Reason to the Persons chusing, or the Person chosen. And therefore he order'd them, in the King's Name, to fix upon some other Person by to-morrow Morning, to be presented to his Majesty for his Approbation."

This Proceeding, and the Nomination of Sir Tilmot Mearns by Sir John Ernle, who pleas'd the King's Orders, immediately threw the Commons into all the Heat and Animosity they had been caution'd to avoid. (b) Sachseverel, Williams, Clarges, Garraway, Lee, Birch, and

(a) Concerning this Translation, Ferguson writes as follows:

"But there being a Council that Night, and Notice coming that Mr. Seymour was chosen, the Treasurer persuaded the King from accepting him, to shew his Prerogative-Right of rejecting: So that, the next Day, when the House came to present their Speaker, he was rejected: But the House, having some Intimation he would be rejected, order'd him, or he of himself retir'd, not to make the common formal Apology, of Inefficiency, at the Lords Bar: but, instead thereof, roundly told the King, that he was unanimously chosen, by the Suffrages of all the Commons of England, to be their Speaker; and that he was resolv'd to serve his Majesty, in that Station, to the utmost of his Power: So that the Chancellor, who had Orders to accept of his Election, now had not a Word to say. At last, upon deliberating, and whispering aside, he recolected himself, and told the House, &c." [Growth of Papery, Part II. p. 235.] and Powell, all leading Members, launch'd out with great Bitterness on this Occasion, and pointed all their Reflections at the Lord Treasurer: Colonel Birch, in particular, declar'd, that Mr. Seymour had made his Majesty acquainted with their Choice the Day before, who had express'd himself as very well pleas'd therewith: And for the Truth of this he appeal'd to Mr. Seymour himself. It was, however, the Opinion of the House to adjourn till the next Morning, when a Resolution was form'd to address his Majesty for more Time to deliberate on a Matter of so great Importance; which the King agreed to, and assign'd Tuesday the 11th for the Day of Issue; Declaring, at the same time, that as he would not have his Prerogative in- trench'd upon, so neither would he do any thing against their Privileges. This Interval was employ'd in searching of Precedents and canvassing Expedients; all which ended in an Address, in which the House set forth, "That it was the undoubted Right of the Commons to have the free Election of one of their Members to be their Speaker, and to perform the Service of the House: And that the Speaker, so elected and presented according to Custom, hath, by the constant Practice of all former Ages been continued Speaker, and executed that Employment, unless such Persons have been executed for any Bodily Infirmary: That, according to this Usage Mr. Seymour had been unanimously chosen, and that they hop'd his Majesty, upon due Consideration, would not think fit to deprive them of so necessary a Member, by employing him in any other Service, &c." His Majesty's Answer was, "Gentlemen, all this is but Loss of Time; and, therefore, I desire you to go back again, and do as I have directed you." This produc'd another Address the next Day, signifying "their great Trouble and infinite Sorrow, that his Majesty was pleas'd to give an immediate Answer to their Address, without taking any further Consideration: Insinuating, that the Occasion of this Question had arisen from his Majesty's not being truly inform'd of the State of the Case; and beseeching him to take into his further Consideration, &c." The King reply'd somewhat sharply; Gentlemen, I will send you an Answer to-morrow. But instead of keeping his Word, he came to the House of Peers, and prorog'd the Parliament till the Saturday fol- lowing. A. D. 1678-9.

In this Interval, such a Temperament was found out as enabled the House to proceed to Business; but without restoring them to that Moderation that was necessary within Doors, when all was Diffraction and Confusion without. The Commons no longer insisted on Seymour, nor the King on Mercy. And when Sergeant Gregory, who was chosen in the Room of the first, was presented, his Majesty ratify'd their Choice without any farther Hesitation. The Dispute compris'd.

Being now in a Capacity to go on, they trod in the last Footsteps that their Predecessors had left behind them: They appointed one Committee to draw up a State of the Matters they left depending; and another, of Secrecy, to take Informations, prepare Evidence, and draw up Articles against the several Popish Lords under Impeachment in the Tower; as also to take such further Informations as should arise as to the Plot and Godfrey's Murder. They, moreover, by Message, put the Lords in mind of the Articles of Impeachment lying before them against the Earl of Danby; desir'd he might be sequester'd from Parliament, and committed to safe Custody: And not satisfy'd with this, they empower'd their Committee of Secrecy to draw up yet other Articles against the same obnoxious Nobleman.

The new Par- liament trod in the Foot- steps of the last.

To keep Pace with all this flaming Zeal and Loyalty of the Commons, the Lords also appointed their Committee of Privileges to examine and make a Report concerning the State of Impeachments, brought up from the House of Commons, last Parliament, and all the Incidents relating thereto; who, accordingly gave it as their Opinion, that the Dissolution of the last Parliament did not alter the State of the Impeachments, brought up by the Commons, before the said Dissolution took place. This Report was made on the 17th, and on the 19th it was taken into Consideration by the House: A Debate ensued, which was interrupted in the midst, whether purposely or casually, is uncertain, by the Earl of Lincoln; who coming into the House, demanded to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and subscribe the Declaration, &c. The said Debate was, however, return'd; and upon the Issue, both the previous

(f) Among a great Variety of dishonest Articles us'd at this time, to run down this great Minister, a List of Lord-Treasurers, from St. Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, was made public, for the sake of the following ironical Account of Lord Danby, and his Family: "In the Year 1673, Sir Thomas O'Brien was prefer'd by the Duke of Buckingham, and some others, to his Majesty, as a Person deserving the Honour and Trust of the Kingdom's Treasury; and in order thereto he was (worth about Ten, and so on). This Honourable Gentleman was born in Yorkshire, in the Year 1631; Ph. 66, being Monday, about four o'Clock in the Morning; his Father was President of the Council in the Norwich; his Grandfather was knighted in Ireland, for Mercy; he is the fourth Knight of his Family, and the second Knight and Baronet, the first Earl, and the first Lord Treasurer; and descended from O'Brien, a quondam Lord Mayor of London, who, being but mean in his Minority, was advanced, by the Marriage of his Sister's Daughter, to some decent service; by him performed, which to mention in this Place would not be so grateful as true—but (pari passim) let us consider some of this worthy and eminent Person's Virtues:

1. He hath been a great Royalist; which Qualification made him the fitter for this great Employ.
2. He hath been an extraordinary good Husband; so that he hath, from a small Estate, advanced himself to a considerable Revenue.
3. He was a great Preferrer of his Kindred, especially to the Parliament-houses; Witness the Case of Mr. H. T. in the last Parliament, and at several Elections in this.
4. He was ever a very grateful Person; which was evidently seen in his Carriage to the illustrious Duke of Buckingham, in the Beginning of this present Year 1670; whose great Gold was freely serviceable to him, when his Necessity obliged him to want.
5. He is a very good Accompanyer; which I suppose the whole Kingdom know to their Cost.
6. And lastly, To him, and some others, we owe our Thanks for our last eight Months Distraction and Distractedness, not forgetting innocent Godfrey's Death." N. B. This last Item will be further explain'd by and by.

previous and main Questions to agree with the Committee, were carry'd in the Affirmative.

As Affairs were in this Forwardness among the Lords, when the Message of the Commons, in relation to Lord Danby, was receiv'd; And now it was that his Lordship was to make his last great Effort; his Pursuers follow'd him at full Cry; and his own Peers were ready to turn upon him, and gore him out of the Herd. This one Day, however, he made a shift to stand at Bay, and was so well supported by his Friends, that the Issue of the Debate was adjourn'd till the Morrow, when the King himself did him the Honour, to become in Person his Advocate with both Houses; declaring from the Throne, in a set Speech, "That it was by his particular Order, the Lord Treasurer had written the two Letters produc'd by Mr. Montagu: That it was not the Lord Treasurer who had conceal'd the Plot; but that it was himself who told it his Lordship from time to time, as he thought fit: That he had granted the said Nobleman a full Pardon; and that, if Occasion requir'd, he would give it him again ten times over; but that, however, he intended to lay him aside from his Employments, and to forbid him the Court."

The Lords proceed against him by a Bill of Pains and Penalties.

The Commons enquire into the Manner of passing his Pardon.

This Speech gave a new Turn to the Debate which was yet in Suspence; for, instead of complying with the Desire of the Commons, their Lordships now inclin'd to give into the Expedient, insinuated by the King. Accordingly, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Bill, that his Lordship might be made for ever incapable of coming into his Majesty's Presence, and of all Offices and Employments, of receiving any Grants or Gifts from the Crown, and of sitting in the House of Peers; And it was also order'd that these Resolutions should be (g) communicated to the Commons at a Conference.

In this Interval, the Commons had appointed a Committee to trace the Pardon mention'd by the King thro' the several Offices, who finding no Entry made in any of them, had Recourse to the Lord Chancellor for Information, who, after promising that he neither advis'd, drew, nor alter'd it, acknowledg'd "That the Pardon was pass'd with the utmost Privacy, at the Desire of the Earl, who gave this Reason for it, That he did not intend to make use of it, but to stand upon his Innocence, except false Witnesses should be produc'd against him; and then he would make use of it at the last Extremity. That he advis'd the Earl to let the Pardon pass in the regular Course; but, after consulting with the King, his Majesty declar'd he was resolv'd to let it pass with all Privacy; And suddenly after, the King commanded the Lord Chancellor to bring the Seal from Whitehall, and, being there, he laid it upon the Table; thereupon his Majesty commanded the Seal to be taken out of the Bag, which his Lordship was oblig'd to submit unto, it not being in his Power to hinder it; and the King wrote his Name upon the Top of the Parchment, and then directed to have it sealed; whereupon the Person that usually carry'd the Purse, affixed the Seal to it." The Chancellor added, "That, at the very time of affixing the Seal to the Parchment, he did not look upon himself to have the Custody of the Seal: And said, It was a Stamp'd Pardon by Creation."

This strange Narrative, which would have much better become the Mouth of a little quirking Attorney, than that of the Lord High Chancellor of England, was no sooner reported, than it stir'd up all the ill Humours of the House, from the very Bottom: Every Man, who aspir'd to the Character of a Patriot by saying florid or angry things, indulg'd the Malignity of his own Heart, under Pretence of displaying his Zeal for public Justice: In particular, Mr. Pease overflow'd with Rage and Invective; (r) and, to exasperate the House yet further against the Man, ascrib'd to him all the Wickedness of the Reign. In conclusion it was resolv'd, Nemine Contrahente, That a Message should be sent to the Lords, to demand Justice against Thomas Earl of Danby, in the Name of the Commons of England; and that, agreeable to their former Message, he might be immediately sequestered, &c. They also agreed on an Address to his Majesty, representing the Irregularity and Illegality of the Pardon mention'd by his Majesty to be granted to the Earl of Danby, and the dangerous Consequences of granting Pardons to any Persons lying under an impeachment of the Commons of England.

The Lords, it seems, were not uninform'd of the Flame that rag'd thus violently in the House of Commons, nor unaware of the Consequences to be expected from it: That, therefore, they might share in the Merit of persecuting a fallen Minister, they proceeded to order the Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod, to bring his Lordship as a Delinquent, in safe Custody, to the Bar of the House; so that when Sir Henry Capel, &c. came up with the Commons Demand of Justice, &c. their Lordships were enabled to reply by a Messenger of their own, that they had given the necessary Orders for committing the said Earl, before they had receiv'd the last Message from the Commons.

But the Bird was flown, at least the Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod so reported; but the contrary was true; for tho' his Servants deny'd him, both at his House in Town, and and at Wimbleton, Sir John Berkeley saw him come out of his Closet at Midnight, from a Consultation with his Intimates, the 24th, which was the very Day the Lords made the Order for his Commitment: And when he did disappear, it was only to take Sanctuary in Witchhall. The Commons, however, refusing not to be defeated, order'd a Bill to be brought in to summon him to render himself to Justice, by a certain Day, or in Default thereof to attain him. In short, so hard was this great Man drove, and so little Credit and Interest had he now remaining, (for he had (s) resign'd his Office some time before) that even Bellie and Oates were encourag'd to assist upon him; which they did in the Face of the House of Commons; the first making great (t) Complaints of the hard Usage and Disappointment he had met with from the Earl, while Treasurer, and setting forth, in particular, That going to him for some Money, by virtue of an Order from the Council, his Lordship took him into his Closet, and asked him whether the Duke of Buckingham, or Lord Shaftsbury, or any of the Members of the House of Commons, had desir'd him to say any thing against him, and to tell him who they were, and he would well reward him; and to know if he would desist from giving Evidence against the Queen and the Lords in the Tower, &c. To which Bellie answering, That he had once been an ill Man, but desir'd to be no more, the Earl reply'd "You may have a great Sum of Money, and live in another Country, as Geneva, Sweden, or New-England; and shall have what Money you will ask to maintain you there." But he, Bellie, refusing all such Temptations, his Lordship began to threaten him, saying, There was a Boat and a Yacht to carry him far enough from telling of Tales. And after this, the Guards were at Spies upon him, and he was very ill us'd, till by their Advice to the King the same was remedied, and better Care was taken. Oates, also, at the same time, declar'd, "That, being one Day in the Privy Garden, the Earl of Danby passing by, reflected upon him, and said, There goes one of the Saviours of England, but I hope to see him hang'd within a Month."

In the mean time, the Lords proceeded with their (u) disabling Bill, which, being calculated to mitigate the extreme Rigour of the Commons, serv'd to exemptify the Text, That the tender Mercies of the Wicked are Cruelty. A Question being propounded, whether the House should proceed farther with that Bill, without summoning the Party concern'd, it was resolv'd in the Affirmative, Leave was also given to the Committee, to make such Alterations as they should think fit: And they, accordingly, turn'd it into a Bill of Banishment, which had the next Day, the final Approbation of the House (but three Lords, viz. Northampton, Aylesbury, and Berkeley, dissenting, tho' without offering Reasons) and was sent down to the Commons, by whom it was rejected on the first Reading: Nothing short of their own Bill of Attainder would satisfy them; which, April the 1st, was read for the third time, and sent up to the Lords, who had now a fair Opportunity to reject in their Turn, as the Commons had done before them; but the Times would not bear so rough an Experiment: Their Lordships, therefore, made a notable Attempt to convert the Bill of Attainder, sent up to them by the Commons, into a Bill of (w) Banishment, like that the Commons had before rejected. This they communicated at a Conference, to prevent Controversy as they us'd; accompany'd with an Observation, That the greatest Affairs of the Nation were at a stand, at a Time of the greatest Danger and Difficulty that ever the Nation labour'd under; as also with a Request that the first Interruption of the

King's

(t) Said Sir John Berkeley, in his Memoirs, p. 22, 23: "I was awerk to this Story, I confess, and would have had him flood in Ground, as long as the King would stand by him, dying, an Religion would but expose him the more to the Favour of his Enemies; in short, that the Lords would fear him the less, and the Commons not love him a bit the better. Several Persons had got possession of good Employments, not to reach by any Lord's Favour and Kindness, as by giving Money to his Lady, who had for some time driven on a private Trade of this sort, tho' not without his Lordship's Participation and Concurrence. This I knew, but had neither the Face nor the Inclination to come in at that Door; so that I was polluted to many, who, as I thought, deserved as little as myself; but they had but a bad Bargain, they were now all swept away with the same Torrent that began to overthrow his Lordship."

"Mr. Beale indeed hath said, that this Lord (though at that time under the Accusation of concealing the Plot) would have tempted him by Money, to have been gone beyond Sea, and not to say any thing against the Queen, nor the Popish Lords in the Tower. But when the Circumstances of that Story come to be told (which are not yet convenient) I suppose Mr. Beale will think as fit to retract that Information against his Lordship, as he hath already done another he told to the late Bishop of Exeter (now of Petersburgh) concerning the same Lord, viz. That this Earl was one of those at the Consult with the Queen, in her Chapel at Whitehall; nor the Earl complaining of this in Council, Mr. Earle did not only deny that ever he said so, but told the King himself, and several others (besides his Oath in the Lords House, relating to all the Lords) that he knew nothing against that Lord; and has told the Earl himself, in the hearing of good Witnesses, that he was able to say several things in his Lordship's Defence; and that there were some Persons (and among them one great Man) who would have endeavour'd to foborn him to swear against the Earl; but Mr. Beale said, he was not a Man to be galld to do any such base Act; and as a Demonstration of his Honesty and Justice to the Earl, he brought him the Copy of an Information relating to the Earl, and sign'd Ed. Panton; and promised to inform the Earl of the Name of that great Man, and the others, who would have foborn him before the Meeting of the Parliament, which was to be in March following; and he told this to the Earl in February before. (Memoirs of the Earl of Danby, p. 29, 30.)

(w) When this Bill was first committed, the Earl of Shaftsbury entered his Protest, for the following Reasons:

1. Because no Summons, or Hearing at the Party, is first directed; which, by the essential Forms of Justice, ought to be.

2. Because 'tis conceived this will be Error.

3. Because 'tis a dangerous Precedent against all the Peers, to have to pass a Bill precipitated.

4. Because no Committee can proceed on any Bill, without hearing Parties; and no Peer is to be tried in Parliament, but by the whole House of Peers.

And the Lord Berkeley did the same; because he had been against committing the Bill.

(x) By this Bill, his Lordship was to be attainted, in case he should return into, or be found in, any of the King's Dominions, after the first Day of May 1679. On passing, the Lord Berkeley, Northampton, Lowmore, Aylesbury, Shaftsbury, Eyre, Leicester, and Hovell, entered their Dissents.

A. D. 1679.

King's Clemency might not proceed from the two Houses. But the Commons were not to be diverted from their Purpose by fair Words; on the contrary, they refus'd to admit their Lordships Alterations: Because they had wholly alter'd the Nature of the Bill: Because Banishment was not the legal Punishment in Cases of high Treason: Because the Earl of Danby, by flying from Justice, while under the Impeachment, had confess'd the Charge, and was, therefore, liable to the Judgment of high Treason: Because the said Earl, from the Illegality of his Punishment, might argue, That either the Commons were distrustful of their Proofs, or else the Crimes imputed to him were not in their Nature High Treason; and because the Example would encourage all other Persons, in the like Circumstance, to withdraw from Justice; which they would always be ready to do, if not prevented by a timely Commitment, in the hope of obtaining a more favourable Sentence from their Lordships in a legislative way, than they would be oblig'd to pass upon them in their judicial Capacity. With these Reasons the Bill was return'd to the Lords, and at the same time they address'd his Majesty to issue out his Royal Proclamation for the apprehending the said Earl, and, in particular, to require all Officers of the Household to take care, that no Person suffer him to conceal himself in any of the King's Palaces.

This Address the Lord Chancellor, by the King's Command, communicated to the Lords, together with an Intimation, that, as it regarded a Cause before that House, his Majesty would have been better satisfy'd, if it had come from both Houses, and therefore desir'd their Lordship's Advice as to what was fit to be done thereon. This was manifestly a Snare to embroil the two Houses with each other. But they took Care not only to avoid it, but even to advise his Majesty to set forth the Proclamation, which was then done accordingly.

The same Day that this Address was agreed to, viz. April 8, the two Houses had a second Conference on the Bill; in which the Lords reply'd to the Reasons of the Commons, That they had not desired the said Conference so much to argue and dispute, as to mitigate and reconcile: That their Concern for the too long and too great Obstruction given by this Affair to the public Business, was the chief Reason for their interposing in it: That upon this Consideration, if a Way might be found to remove the public Fears, by doing less than the Bill proposed, the Lords did not think it advisable to insist on the most rigorous Satisfaction that public Justice might demand: That, to induce the Commons to comply, the Lords did acknowledge, that Banishment was so far from being the legal Judgment, in Cases of High Treason, that it was not the legal Judgment in any Case whatever; since it could never be inflicted, but by the legislative Authority: That, however, they saw no Cause why the legislative Power should be always bound to act to the utmost Extent of its Power; for there might be a prudential Necessity, sometimes, to make Abatements; and it might be of fatal Consequence, if it were otherwise: That to remove all Jealousies, as to Precedents of this kind, the Lords declar'd, that nothing done in the Earl of Danby's Case should ever be drawn into Consequence, for the time to come; of which an Entry should be made in their Journals: And that, upon the Whole, their Lordships did insist upon their Amendments, so far as to exclude all Attainers; and promised themselves the Commons would in this Point give way, since their Resolutions were grounded only on their Tenderness and Consideration for the Public.

The Commons however continued immovable; and demanded a free Conference of the Lords, to shew they had Reason as well as Will on their Sides; which the Lords comply'd with immediately; but withal, their Manager at the said Conference, the Lord Privy-Seal, Anglesey, took care to make a Merit of that Compliance: His Lordship, however, own'd the Cogeny of the Commons Reasons; and that the Lords were therefore content to make the Bill absolute, without assigning the Earl a Day to appear. He also threw in some Family-Considerations; as that by the Bill of Attainder, not only his own Possessions, but those he had acquired by his Alliances, would be forfeited; and that if the Commons required any further Penalties, they should be gratify'd, provided they did not tend to the absolute Destruction of the Lord impeach'd. His Lordship added, to dazzle the Commons, that in this Affair they had gain'd two great Points, viz. 1. That Impeachments laid by the Commons in one Session, or one Parliament, were adjourn'd to be always in force till heard. 2. That the Lords admitted, that of right the Party impeach'd should be ordered to withdraw, and then committed to safe Custody, if special Matter had been shewn; but not otherwise; for in such case, he did not know how many of their Lordships might be pick'd out of a fudden. The Lord Shaftsbury, who was also of this Committee, did not however agree to this Distinction; but said, the Lords gave no Order to make any such Distinction, which was also confirm'd by the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Falkenberg. His Lordship (Shaftsbury) also declared, that the Way now propos'd, he thought, would conduce to the helping the Bill to pass; and that there were weighty Reasons, which were easier understood than express'd, that prov'd it necessary, for the Good of the Public, that the said Bill should speedily pass. The (x) Commons, on the other hand, were tenacious of the Letter of the Law; which, they said, ought to be the Guide in passing Acts of Parliament, as well as in the ordinary Course of Judicature; calling upon the Lords to follow the Example of their Ancestors, urging Precedents old and new for the like Attainers; ascribing all

A. D. 1679. all the Rigor of their Bill to the Earl himself, who, by his Flight only, had forfeited his Goods and Chattels; affirming, that this Proceeding of the Lords had a Tendency to shew, that different Degrees of Persons should have different Degrees of Punishment; whereas the poorest Englishman was to have the same Proceedings against him as the greatest Peer; asking, Whether their Lordships would make the same Provision for a flying Commoner? inveighing with great Severity against the Man, and his Conduct; denying, that they had gain'd any Point, in the Course of this Affair; and, upon the Whole, delivering the Bill again to the Lords, with their Amendments, and Expressions of Hopes and Desires of their Concurrence with them, that Justice might take its Course, and the great Affairs of Parliament be no longer obstructed, by spending more Time on him, who had brought the Kingdom into so bad a Condition.

And thus they so obstinately adhered to their own Bill of Attainder, that, within two or three Days time, the Lords thought fit to give way to the Heat of the Season, and pass'd the Bill; in which the 21st of April was appointed for the Earl's surrendering himself to Trial: But he finding himself reduced to this Extremity, rather than risk the Mischief that might happen to himself, or to the King, if he should refuse to pass the Bill, chose, on the 15th, to surrender himself to the Usher of the Black-rod; which was, soon after, signify'd to the Commons in form.

He is brought before the Lords;

The next Day his Lordship was brought on his Knees at the Bar of the House, and so continued till he was directed by the Lord Chancellor to stand up; who also gave him to understand, "That he stood impeach'd of High Treason, and other high Crimes, by the Commons: That Time had been given him by the Parliament, to put in his Answer; which he had not done, but had withdrawn himself, and thereby caus'd the Parliament to spend much Time about him, which was then very precious, both to the King and Kingdom; and that the House expected to know what he had to say as to that Matter."

His Lordship then urg'd the best Excuses he could; which being accepted, he proceeded to make several Requests, viz. That he might have a Copy of the Articles against him: That he might have Time allow'd him to put in his Reply: That in case any new Articles should be exhibited against him, the Time so allow'd might be yet further enlarg'd: That he might know the whole Charge against him, before his Trial came on: That he might be allow'd the Advice and Assistance of Council: That he might have Liberty to take Copies of Records and Journals, in order to his Defence: That his Witnesses might be summon'd: That he might have Leave, at his Trial, to explain such Words as thro' Misapprehension might be writted to his Prejudice: And that he might continue in the Custody of the Black-rod. With all which the Lords comply'd, except the last; for instead of leaving him in the Custody of the Black-rod, they committed him to the Tower.

and committed to the Tower.

Tho' the Prosecution of the Earl of Danby seem'd to engross the principal Attention of the House; they did not however lose sight of the Plot: On the contrary, they shew'd all imaginable Countenance, not only to Oates and Bedloe, but to every other Discoverer, who were invited to come in by Promises of Pardon and Reward, and every other Inducement that could influence the Zeal, or gratify the more ferocious Passions, of Mankind: In particular, they apply'd by Address to his Majesty, that Bedloe might have the Reward of 500 l. promised by Proclamation to the Discoverer of Goffrey's Murder; for tho' France had been taken up on Wren's Information, it was Bedloe's Oath only that prov'd him to be one of the Murderers: They also recommended the Care of his Safety to the Duke of Monmouth. And upon Oates's declaring that Colonel Edward Sackville, a Member, had said, "That they were Sons of Whores who believ'd there was a Plot; and that he was a lying Rogue who said it;" they not only expelled him the House, but prepar'd an Address to the King, that he might be made incapable of bearing any Office.

But the Lords even went beyond the Commons, in these kinds of Severities; for they authoriz'd their Committees to send for and examine such Persons as they should think fit, who had declared, or should declare and publish, that any of the Persons who had been executed, as guilty of the Plot, were innocent, and had suffer'd wrongfully; as also, to send for such Justices, Constables, &c. as had been entrusted with the Execution of his Majesty's late Proclamations for banishing papish Recusants from London and Westminster; and to require an Account why the said Proclamations had not been effectually prosecuted: Many (3) Persons were accordingly call'd upon to answer for their Sins

(3) By way of Specimen of which Proceedings, the following Extract from the Lords Journals is submitted to the Consideration of the Reader:

Mill, 21st April 1679.

The Information of Dr. William Jones, M. D. taken upon Oath, the 23rd Day of March 1679, before me Edmund Wreap, Esq. one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said County and Liberty.

This Informant saith, that it being known that he was a Physician to Mr. William Bedloe, Discoverer of the horrid Plot against his Majesty's sacred Life and the Government, one Dr. Smith a Physician came to this Informant on Saturday the 21st Instant, pretending some private Business; when this Informant, after some Discourse, said, he must go to Mr. Bedloe; to which Dr. Smith reply'd, Are you great with Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedloe? This Informant replying, he was Physician to them both, Smith answer'd, God damn them both, why do you not poison them? you may have Money enough for that Service, more than you know what to do withal. This Informant reply'd thereto, That an Enemy could not do him a greater Injury, than to put a Trayal in him; how then could this Informant do Mischief to his Friends? All which pass'd between this Informant and the said Dr. Smith, at his, this Informant's, Lodgings at the Ball at Charing Cross.

Sins of Omission and Commission, under these two Heads; and were treated with almost as much Rigour, as we read of in the Proceedings of the Inquisition. A Pamphlet having been publish'd in French and English, tending to vindicate the Papists from the Crimes imputed to them, and to invalidate the Proofs which had been urg'd against them, the Lords in the Tower were call'd upon, by Order of the Peers, to disclose what they knew concerning it, and to be accessory to the Prosecution of their own Advocate.

Both Houses join'd in a Vote, "That there now is, and for divers Years last past hath been, a horrid and treasonable Plot and Conspiracy, contriv'd and carry'd on by those of the Papish Religion, for the murdering his Majesty's sacred Person, and for subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient and well-establish'd Government of this Kingdom: As also, in an Address, "for appointing a solemn Day of Humiliation, by Fasting and Prayer, to seek Reconciliation with Almighty God; and to implore him, by his Power and Goodness, to infatuate and defeat our Enemies, continue the Light of his Gospel; and particularly, to bestow his abundant Blessings on his sacred Majesty and the present Parliament," &c.

A Second-Rate Politician would have thought the Disturbances of one Kingdom a sufficient Game to manage: But the Earl of Shaftsbury could not be satisfy'd, unless all Three Kingdoms were involved in the like Confusion. The King's Attachment to the Dukes of Ormond and Lauderdale, who had still the Command of Scotland and Ireland, appear'd to be indissoluble; but withal, his Majesty's Authority had been grievously shock'd and weaken'd: He had been induced to part with his own Brother, and oblig'd to give up his Minister: And if the Parliament, in their present Plenitude of Power, should insist on the Removal of these his only remaining Supporters, it was scarce reasonable to suppose, that he either could or would contest it with them.

Upon the 25th of March, therefore, when a Motion was made in the House of Lords, to appoint a Day to consider the State of the Nation, the said Earl took occasion to digress from the immediate Point, as if by a sudden Impulse, to the State of Scotland and Ireland. He set out with declaring, That he always spoke what he was commanded by the Dictates of the Spirit within him; quoted the mystical Text in the Canticles; We have a little Sister, and she has no Breasts; not forgetting the strange Supposition of her being a Door, a Wall, &c; said we had several little Sisters without Breasts, namely the French Protestant Churches, and the two Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland. Those Churches he call'd a Wall for the Defence of England; and Scotland and Ireland, Doors to let in Good or Mischief.

"Popery and Slavery, he also said, like two Sisters, go hand in hand; and sometimes one goes first, and sometimes the other; but wheresoever the one enters, the other is always following close at hand.

In England, Popery was to have brought in Slavery; in Scotland, Slavery went before, and Popery was to follow." Adding,

"I do not think your Lordships, or the Parliament, have Jurisdiction there. It is a noble and ancient Kingdom; they have an illustrious Nobility, a gallant Gentry, a learned Clergy, and an understanding, worthy People: But yet, we cannot think of England as we ought, without reflecting on the Condition they are in. They are under the same Prince, and the Influence of the same Favourites and Councils; when they are hardly

Ld. Shaftsbury's Speech, relating to the State of Scotland and Ireland.

And this Informant further saith, That he, with Dr. Smith, went thence to an Alcove in Green-Street, near the Musy, where the said Dr. Smith did, among other Discourses, positively affirm, That the Plot was no Plot at all, but a thing contriv'd by Oates, Bellin, and the Earl of Shaftsbury, merely to ruin the poor Roman Catholics; whereupon this Informant said, that if Mr. Oates and Mr. Bellin did live, most of the Lords in the Tower would suffer; To which the said Dr. Smith reply'd, They will, or they shall, not live to see that Day, for they are not great Rogues to have a Living.

The Examination of Dr. Emanuel Smith, taken the 10th of April 1679, in pursuance of an Order of the Lords Committee, for examining Matters relating to the Discovery of the late horrid Conspiracy, before Mr. Edmund Wray, Esq; one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace in the said City and Liberties.

This Examinant saith, that he knows no more of any Plot than the Child unborn; and as to any Belief of a Plot, he says the Circumstances speak as if there were a Plot; but how, what, or by whom he knows not, nor for what Ends; but says, if he knew of any Plot against the King, the Government, or the true Protestant Religion, he would reveal it; he confesseth, he hath been acquainted with Dr. Jones about five or six Years, and that there never was any Difference between them; and this Examinant confesseth, that he and Dr. Jones were together at the Green Musy, about the Time in the Interrogation mention'd; where one Baxter, as this Examinant believes his Name to be, came to them, and there was a Discourse about the Defense he then complain'd of; but that Examinant saith, that there were no little Concerns about Mr. Bellin, in the Discourse then, that he remembers it not, nor took no notice of it; and this Examinant saith, that Mr. Jones declaring Mr. Bellin was his Patient, this Examinant did or might say, Why do you not prescribe him a Pill? but meant not thereby any ill to Mr. Bellin; and this Examinant saith, he had not any Thoughts of doing any Mischief to Mr. Bellin, upon any account of the Papists; and denies that he ever mention'd the Word Papists: He owns, that he is a Christian, but of what Profession in Religion, refuseth to confess: And this Examinant saith, that his Remembrance or Belief, there was not the least Discourse about the Earl of Shaftsbury, or of any Design that his Lordship with Mr. Bellin or Mr. Oates had to frame any Design against the Papists; or as if they intended any Design to make the Papists to be believed, to interpose any thing against the Government established: And he saith, that Mr. Oates was mention'd at the same time; and that he had no Malice either to Mr. Oates or Mr. Bellin; or any Incent, by Mooty or otherwise, to persuade Dr. Jones to any Act of Poison or hurting them. And this Examinant further saith, that when he is in Town, he lodgeth in Green-Lane, at Mr. Lawrence her House; and when he was in the Country, he was with an Aunt of his Wife's, at or near Basingstoke in Hampshire, at one Mr. Chandler's; and all their Family are Protestants: And he saith, that there was any Discourse whatsoever concerning the Trial of the Lords in the Tower: And further saith not.

 Edm. Wray.

Hereupon the House made this ensuing Order:
 Whereas Emanuel Smith, Doctor in Physic, is charged to prevail with Dr. Jones to poison William Bellin, as appeareth by the Information of the said Dr. Jones, taken upon Oath; it is ordered, That the Keeper of Wood Jones Computer, in whose Custody the said Emanuel Smith now is, do forthwith deliver him the said Emanuel Smith into the Prison of the Gatehouse at Whitechapel, there to remain a Prisoner till further Order; and, for so doing, this shall be a sufficient Warrant.

hardly dealt with, can we that are richer expect better Usage? For 'tis certain, that, in all absolute Governments, the poorest Countries are always most favourably dealt with.

When the ancient Nobility and Gentry there cannot enjoy their Royalties, their Shrievaldoms, and their Stewardries, which they and their Ancestors have possessed for several hundreds of Years; (but that now they are enjoin'd by the Lords of the Council, to make Deputations of their Authorities to such as are their known Enemies) can we enjoy our Magna Charta long under the same Persons and Administration of Affairs? If the Council-table there can imprison any Nobleman or Gentleman for several Years, without bringing him to Trial, or giving the least Reason for what they do, can we expect the same Men will preserve the Liberty of the Subject here?

His Lordship then enlarged on the late arbitrary Measure of letting loose the Higlanders to live at discretion on the obnoxious Counties, which, according to him, there was scarce a colourable Pretence for, nor any other Reason of State; but that those wicked Ministers design'd to procure a Rebellion at any rate; "which, said he, as they manag'd, was only prevented by the miraculous Hand of God; or otherwise, all the Papists of England would have been arm'd, and the fairest Opportunity given, in the just time, for the Execution of that wicked and bloody Design the Papists had; and it is not possible for any Man, that duly considers it, to think other, but that those Ministers that acted that were as guilty of the Plot, as any of the Lords that are in question for it."

"I am forced to speak this the plainer, continued his Lordship, because, till the Prefecture be fully and clearly taken off from Scotland, 'tis not possible for me, or any thinking Man, to believe, that Good is meant to us here.

We must still be upon our guard, apprehending, that the Principle is not chang'd at Court; and that these Men are still in Place and Authority, who have that Influence upon the Mind of our excellent Prince, that he is not, nor cannot be that to us, that his own Nature and Goodness would incline him to.

I know your Lordships can order nothing in this; but there are those that (a) bear me can put a perfect Care to it: Until that be done, the Scottish Weed is like Death in the Pot, Mors in Olla. But there is something too, now I consider, that most immediately concerns us; their Act of twenty-two thousand Men, to be ready to invade us upon all Occasions. This, I hear, the Lords of the Council there have treated as they do all other Laws, and expounded it into a standing Army of six thousand Men. I am sure we have Reason and Right to beseech the King, that That Act may be better considered in the next Parliament there. I shall say no more for Scotland, at this time; I am afraid your Lordships will think I have said too much, having no Concern there: But if a French Nobleman should come to dwell in my House and Family, I should think it concern'd me to ask, what he did in France? for if he were there a Felon, a Rogue, a Plunderer, I should desire him to live elsewhere: And I hope your Lordships will do the same thing for the Nation, if you find the same Cause.

My Lords, give me Leave to speak two or three Words concerning our other Sister, Ireland: Thither, I hear, is sent Douglas's Regiment, to secure us against the French. Besides, I am credibly inform'd, that the Papists have their Arms restor'd, and the Protestants are not many of them yet recover'd from being the suspected Party; the Sea-Towns, as well as the Inland, are full of Papists: That Kingdom cannot long continue in the English Hands, if some better Care be not taken of it. This is in your Power; and there is nothing there, but is under your Laws; therefore I beg, that this Kingdom at least may be taken into Consideration, together with the State of England; for I am sure there can be no Safety here, if these Doors be not shut up, and made sure."

Whether the Duke of Lauderdale, who had a Seat in the English House of Peers as Earl of Guildford, made any Reply to this extraordinary Speech, in which he was so deeply wounded, we have no Authority from History to determine; but the Earl of Offory took fire at that Part of it which glanced at his Father's Government; and not only purg'd him from all Suspicion of being a Favourer of Popery, by a Recapitulation of some of the most eminent Actions of his Life, but rebuk'd our flaming Patriot for his own pernicious Councils, after the following equally polish'd and pointed Manner (b): "Having spoken of what he has done, I presume, with the same Truth, to tell your Lordships what he has not done. He never advis'd the breaking of the Triple League; he never advis'd the shutting up the Exchequer; he never advis'd the Declaration for a Toleration; he never advis'd the falling out with the Dutch, and the joining with France; he was not the Author of that most excellent Position of Delenda est Carthago, that Holland, a Protestant Country, should, contrary to the true Interest of England, be totally destroy'd. I beg your Lordships will be so just, as to judge of my Father, and of all Men, according to their Actions and Councils."

The Effect of this Speech, as we are told, was such, that that the Earl of Shaftsbury thought it advisable to mitigate his Charge, and, in particular, to exempt the Duke of Ormond, Lord Offory's Reply.

List of the Duke of Ormond, c. ii. p. 491.

(a) It must be presumed the King was present.

(b) Mr. Carte has not only prefer'd this Speech entire, in the Appendix to The Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. but also a Letter from the Prince of Orange to the Earl ofOffory, full of Compliments on the Occasion of the said Speech, which, it seems, had found its Way to Holland, and had been printed there.

A. D. 1679.

Ormond, by declaring he had no Thoughts of doing Prejudice to his Grace, by his late Reflections on the State of Ireland. It was, nevertheless, resolv'd, on the Issue of the Debate, that a Day should be appointed for taking the State of the Kingdom into Consideration, in this Time of imminent Danger. The 31st was accordingly agreed upon; at which time, all the several Accounts of the Lord Lieutenant's Proceedings, since the Discovery of the Plot, were communicated to the House by the Lord Butler; by which it appear'd, that his Grace had taken the most effectual Means to preserve the Peace of the Kingdom, without making the Catholics desperate, by giving into all the Rigors of Persecution, which would have been more acceptable to the violent Spirit of the Times; and that, in consequence of his equally moderate and vigilant Administration, that Kingdom was not only in a State of perfect Tranquility, but arm'd and provided against every supposable Danger.

Resolutions and Orders relating thereto.

Something was however thought necessary to be done to countenance an Enquiry so solemnly insisted on, as necessary not only for the Welfare of Ireland, but the very Being of England. So a Bill was order'd to be prepar'd by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, assisted by the Attorney-General, to oblige the Inhabitants of Dublin, and other Towns and fortify'd Places of Ireland, to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and to subscribe the Tests; as also, the Members of both Houses of the Irish Parliament. Their Lordships, moreover, address'd his Majesty, that the Laws in force in that Kingdom, for disarming Papists, might be strictly and vigorously put in execution: That his Majesty's Protestant Subjects there might be furnish'd with Arms and Gunpowder, at the Rates charg'd to his Majesty: That such Bonds as had been enter'd into for the educating of Children in the Protestant Religion, and had been forfeited, might be put in Suit

That Provision might be made, that Papists might not be of Juries there: And that the Lord Lieutenant might be order'd to put the Laws in execution to the utmost, against all Jesuits, and such other Popish Priests as exercised ecclesiastical Jurisdiction after the Romish manner in Ireland.

To dispatch on this Head: The Duke of Ormond's Friends could not tell how to imagine that this formidable Attack on his Administration would end in a bare (*) Suggestion, that he had not sufficiently play'd the Persecutor; but, on the contrary, both expected, and prepar'd his Grace to expect, an Accusation in form; who, on the other hand, being always as ready to answer as his Enemies to accuse, and knowing all their Menaces were rather aim'd at his Place than his Person, gallantly resolv'd both to maintain his Power, and defend his Character: And to that End (c), apply'd for Leave to come over, that he might be on the Spot, to answer whatever might be alleg'd against him. But it soon appear'd, that there was no Necessity for his Journey, Lord Shaftsbury and his Followers being convinc'd; that nothing in a parliamentary Way could affect him, gave over the Attempt: And in every other Avenue for Mischiefe, the King himself interpos'd with his Protection; taking all Opportunities to declare, "That he had one of his Kingdoms in good Hands, that he was resolv'd to continue it so; and that while the Duke of Ormond liv'd, he never should be put out of the Government of Ireland." But this laudable Firmness of his Majesty, than his personal Friendship for the Duke; for, as he had before continued him in his Place of Lord Steward, after he had depriv'd him of his Lieutenantcy; so now, when he was thus determin'd to continue him in the Lieutenantcy, he was prevail'd upon to call (d) upon him to resign his Stewardship: But whether the Duke's very sensible and modest

Remembrance

(*) Notwithstanding this fair Acquittal of the Duke's Conduct and Character, in open Parliament, against all the Malice as well as Suspicion of those distracted Times, we find the following Paragraphs in the Letters of Algernon Sidney, Esq; to Henry Saville, Esq; the English Envoy Extraordinary at the Court of France:

"The Earl of Ormond's Misconducts are so extreme, and his Favour to the Irish so apparent, that few believe he can continue in the Government of Ireland." P. 25. Again,

"I find Men Hearts much set upon taking the Government of Ireland out of the Earl of Ormond's Hands." P. 35. Again,

"Ireland is in extreme Disorder, by the Duke of Ormond's Negligence, Ignorance, and Favour to the Irish." P. 35.

So liable are even the most accomplish'd of Men, as well as the Vulgar, to have their Opinions warp'd by their Prejudices and Passions!

(c) His own excellent Letter to Mr. Secretary Coweney, on this Occasion, shews, at once, so much Purity of Heart, and Greatness of Mind, that I cannot forbear transcribing a Part of it.

S. J. P.

Dublin, 30 April 1679.

I do not remember any Session of Parliament held, when I was out of England, but that I was holily alarm'd by my Friends of Preparations and Contrivances to accuse me; and I have sometimes made Voyages thither, principally to prevent, or to be ready to answer, any thing that could be objected against me. But it has fallen out, that, upon my Arrival, I have still been offer'd to be quiet. I have now again the same Informations, and I have at least as much Reason to give Credit to them as heretofore; and, if I were at liberty, would hasten over to defend my Honour, Innocence, and Conduct in the Truths that have been reported in me, as well as I could. I know the chief Grounds of Mens ill-will to me are, Malice because I would not bear Calumny, and Envy at the Place I held. These are Motives that will never die, or be at rest, as long as the Object remains; and I am now come to an Age and Inclination fit for Retirement, that I would be content to purchase it any rate, but that of Dishonour, or Prejudice to my Fortune and Family. Therefore, though I could with all imaginable Cheerfulness and Content lay this gear and envious Place at his Majesty's Feet, from whose Hands I receiv'd it; yet I cannot bring myself to offer it as a Ransom or Composition, but had rather undergo the strictest Enquiry and Trials of my Actions." &c. [Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 491, 492.]

(d) The King's Letter, and the Duke of Ormond's Answer, touching this Affair, were as follow:

The KING to the Duke of Ormond.

January 15, 1679.

"It would be convenient to the Condition of my Affairs, that I might for some time put the Employment of Steward of my Household into the Hands of one I would gratify at the present with that Place. I do not intend by it to take the Place from you, if you should at any time leave the Command you have in Ireland.

But since your necessary Services in that Country will require your constant Attendance there, this will in the mean time be suitable to my Service, and shall be no Prejudice to you.

I will

A. D. 1679. Remouissance on that Occasion, had the Weight it deserved with his Majesty; or whether the King no longer thought that Sacrifice necessary for his Service, he at last receded from his Demand, and his Grace enjoy'd both those important Posts, during the Residue of the Reign.

Hitherto the new Parliament had, in all respects, proved as intractable as the old; nor had any effectual Expedient been thought of to bring them to better temper. Of all the several Points recommended from the Throne, but one had met with any Attention; namely,

A Supply granted, for disbursing the Army.

A Supply for the Disbanding the Army. And even that was delay'd till April the 16th: At which time they granted 206,462*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for that Service; being the very same Sum which had been voted by the former Parliament in December; and which the Lords had rais'd to many Scruples to, because of the ungrateful Clause which directed the Payment of it into the Chamber of London, &c. And tho' the Majority now no longer insisted on the like Clause, it was stickled for by a very large Party, who divided the House upon it; and were no otherwise to be quieted than by (*) appropriating the Money to the Purposes specify'd in the Bill, and laying heavy Penalties on such as should presume to divert it to any other Use. With this wholesome Restriction, however, the Bill made a shift to find its way to the Lords, who, after some Cavils, gave it their Approbation, and May the 9th it receiv'd the royal Assent. But while this Affair was yet before the Commons, they made no Scruple to vote, that all the Forces then on foot in England, except the Trained Bands, were kept up contrary to Law: And tho' say Mr. Sydney, "It was objected that the King's Guards, and the Garrisons of Portsmouth and other Places would be included, it was answer'd, That Kings governing according to Law, had no need of Castles, Garrisons, and that it was better to have no Garrisons at all, than such as were commanded by Leg. Holmes, and their Peers." As to the Grant itself, apart of the manner of treating it, however right and fit it was for the Commons to rid the Country of the Burden and Terror of a Standing Army, and thereby disable the Court from doing Mitchell, in case it was mischievously disposed, it reliev'd more of Fear than Love, and shew'd their Parolse was rather to disarm than to assist his Majesty.

The Pardon granted the Earl of Danby had excited more Discontent, than his Removal and Commitment had given Satisfaction: And the placing the Earl of Essex at the Head of the Treasury in his Room, had rather brought that Nobelman into Suspicion among his Patriot Friends, than induc'd them to think more favourably of the Court. We are told by Sir William Temple, That the King was now in the Hands of the Duke of Monmouth, in Conjunction with the Duke of Portsmouth, and the Earl of Sunderland; who all discovered a violent Inclination to bring in the Earl of Shaftsbury; apparently, because of his inveterate Hatred to the Duke of York, and his great Acendency in the present Parliament: But that his Majesty complain'd to him notwithstanding, that since he had parted with his Treasury, he had none left to whom he could so much as speak in Confidence. Sir William also insinuates, that he himself had afterwards more of his Confidence than any other Man; and that he made use of it to break this growing Cabal; on the Presumption that the Duke of Monmouth had such Views as might affect the very Succession of the Crown; and that if he could procure a Ministry at his Devotion, the several Interests of the Duke, the Duke's Children, and the Prince of Orange, would be all sacrific'd to his Ambition.

A. D. 1679.

LORDS at the Head of the Treasury.

Duke of Monmouth's Views.

Sir William was moreover of Opinion, that the violent Spirit which now troubled the House of Commons, boded no good to the Crown, and that it was of the last Consequence to strengthen the declining Authority of the King, and, if possible, restore him to the Affections of his People.

To answer all these great and important Ends, this notable Undertaker propos'd to a new-model the Privy-Council, that all Parties might be equally gratify'd, and equally balanc'd by each other; that the Succession might be secur'd; that the Parliament might be inclin'd to reverse, rather than distrust and oppose the Measures of the Court: Or, in case they should still continue their Animosities, Sir W. Temple's proposals to re-model the Privy-Council.

I will make no Excuses to take off any Marks of Unkindness in this Matter; because I have given you to many Proofs of the contrary, and am still as ready to shew you, that I am, as much as ever, your true and constant Friend,

CHARLES ROY.

The Duke of Ormond's Answer.

Dublin, Feb. 7, 1679.

The few Hours I have presumed to take to consider what your Majesty was pleas'd to propose, concerning my Steward's Place, in your most gracious Letter of the 3rd of the last, were not employ'd to determine, whether I should give cheerful Obedience to your Pleasure or no; for that I can never be found unprovoked for. But it was no slight a thing to new to me, and most humbly to propose the Accommodation of your Majesty's Condescension with your desired Purpose, that I should not suffer by it; and that I shall most feebly do, if the World do not as manifestly see, as I do confidently believe, that my Remove from an Office of that Dignity and Advantage is not a Mark or Effect of your Displeasure which I could very ill support, and very hardly distinguish. How this can be avoided otherwise, than by your Majesty's assigning for me such a Compensation, as may shew my Dismission to be voluntary, I know not; nor how the putting my Staff into another Hand can be without Prejudice to me; considering that I think there is no Probability to be found of any Man's parting with such an Office, but by Requestion, or Ostrace taken by the Prince, and the Displeasure manifestly by other Circumstances. But since I conceive your Majesty will believe, that whilst I am in this Station, contending with many Difficulties, rais'd against your Government, and against me for being Chief in it, the Demonstrations of your Favour are my greatest Support and Encouragements, I cannot fear that you will withdraw from me; and therefore, I do with all Assurance and Submission, lay myself, and this whole Matter, with my Life and Fortune, at your Feet,

ORMOND.

[Appendix to the Duke of Ormond's Life, vol. ii. p. 93, 94.]

(*) By another Clause it was also provided, That no Soldier or Soldier should for the future be quartered upon any Subject or Inhabitant of this Realm, without his Consent: And as to the great Train of disbanding, the Government took care, that it should be executed by a Committee of their own, of which Colonel Birch was Chairman.

A. D. 1679

munities, that the Council itself, by the Credit, Interest, and Property of the Members of which it was compos'd, might form a sort of Counter-poise to the Parliament; and not only advise, but aid his Majesty, in case his Necessities could be remov'd no other way.

This great Scheme, Sir William most explicitly affirms was concert'd (e) only between the King and him: That, when it was perfected, it was at his Motion, and by the King's Command, severally communicated to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Sunderland and Lord Essex; who all receiv'd it with the most cordial Approbation. In forming this new Constitution, as Sir William affects to call it, but two Difficulties arose; one from the King; who, it seems, was so strongly prejudic'd against Lord Halifax, that he was very hardly prevail'd upon to admit him as a Member; and one from Sir William Temple, who, when his Majesty himself nam'd Lord Shaftsbury, and the three Lords before-mention'd, not only clos'd with him, but farther, concluded that he (Shaftsbury) should even be President, in the Hope that distinguishing Honour would satiate his Ambition, and hinder him from creating any new Disturbances, vehemently oppos'd it; in the Belief, that he would ruin all they were endeavouring to raise. But as the King was over-persuaded to admit Lord Halifax, Sir William found himself under a Necessity to give way to Lord Shaftsbury; tho' not without putting in a vain Protest (f) That it was without his Approbation.

Tho' the Duke of Monmouth had always for large a share of the King's Affection, and at this Crisis, in particular, was so much consider'd at Court, he was not suffer'd to participate of this great Secret, till the very Night before it was publish'd to the whole World; and almost from the Moment that his Majesty gave him a general Intimation, that the Council would be changed on the Morrow, he told it to so many, that when the Morrow came, it was scarce a Secret to any body: A Manner of Proceeding that is, not unreasonably, ascrib'd to his Levity, or a vain Ambition to have the whole Lustre of so dazzling a Measure reflected upon himself.

The whole Constitution, being adjust'd, and the several Persons who were to compose it agreed upon, an extraordinary Council was assembled April 20, to whom the Lord Chancellor, by the King's Command, read a Declaration, importing, That his Majesty had called them together to communicate the Resolution he had taken, and which he doubted not would receive their Approbation. That, in the first place, his Majesty thank'd them all for the Services they had done him, and the good Advices they had given him. That the over-great Number of that Council had render'd it unfit for the Secrecy and Dispatch which were necessary for many great Affairs: That this had forc'd his Majesty to make use of a smaller Number of them, in a foreign Committee; and sometimes to confine himself to the Advices of some few of them: That the ill Success of this late Court, which his Majesty was equally sensible of, and sorry for, together with some unhappy Accidents, had rais'd great Jealousies and Dissatisfactions among his good Subjects, and thereby left the Crown and Government in too weak a Condition to struggle with those Dangers which there was Reason to fear, both at home and abroad: That his Majesty however hop'd that all might yet be prevented, by a Course of wise and steady Measures for the future, and the Kingdom recover its former Figure; which it might always maintain, while in Union, and while its Conduct was equal to its Strength: That, to this End, he had resolv'd to lay aside the Use he might have hitherto made of any single Ministry, or private Advice, or foreign Committee, for the general Direction of his Affairs; and to constitute such a Privy-Council, as might not only by its Number be fit for the Consultation and Digestion of all Business, both domestic and foreign; but also by the Choice of them, out of the several Parts this State is compos'd of, might be the best inform'd in the true Constitution of it, and thereby the most able to counsel him in all the Affairs and Interests of this Crown and Nation. And that by the constant Advice of such a Council, his Majesty was resolv'd hereafter to govern his Kingdoms; together with the frequent Use of his Great Council of Parliament, which he took to be the ancient Constitution of this State and Government.

That, for the greater Dignity of this Council, his Majesty resolv'd their constant Number shall be limited to (g) Thirty: That, for their greater Authority, fifteen of his chief Officers should be Privy-Councillors by their Places; and that for the other fifteen, he

The King's Declaration by dissolving the old Council.

(e) And yet Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to relate this extraordinary Occurrence in the following Words:

"The Treaty was put in Commission; the Earl of Essex was put at the Head of it; and Hyde and Gualthorp were two of the Commissions. The Earl of Sunderland was brought over from France, and made Secretary of State: And Lord Essex and Lord Sunderland join'd with the Duke of Monmouth to press the King to change his Councils, and to turn to another Method of Government, and to take Meas of the greatest Credit into his Confidence. Lord Essex was much pleas'd for going in to early into the Court, before the rest were brought in. He said to me, he did it in the Prospect of working the Change that was afterwards effected. Lord Sunderland also told me, that the King was easy in the bringing in Lord Shaftsbury; for he thought he was only angry in revenge because he was not employ'd; but that he had no ill an Opinion of Lord Halifax, that it was not easy to get over that."

The Duke of Monmouth told me, that he had as great Difficulty in overcoming that, as in any thing that he ever stud'd to bring the King to. At last the King was prevail'd on to admit the whole Council, which was all made up of Lord Dumb's Creatures; and the chief Men of both Houses were brought into it." Vol. I. p. 474.

(f) Sir William had foretold this very thing the Year before; saying to the King, when his Majesty fell into all the violent Expressions imaginable against that Earl, "That, with his good Leave, he would hold any Wage, he should see that Lord ag'in in his Business." And when the King call'd him, What made him think to be answer'd, "Because he knew he was restless while he was out, and would cry every day to get in; had Wit and Industry to find out the Ways; and when Money would work, had as much as any body to bestow, and Skill enough to know where to place it." Temp. Mem. part iii. p. 355.

(g) The former Council was compos'd of Fifty.

he would chuse ten out of several Ranks of the Nobility, and five Commoners of the Realm, whose known Abilities, Interest, and Esteem in the Nation, should render them without all Suspicion of either mistaking or betraying the true Interest of the Kingdom, and consequently of advising him ill: That, in the first place, therefore, to take care of the Church, his Majesty would have the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of London, for the Time being: And to inform him well in what concerns the Laws, the Lord Chancellor, and one of the Lord Chief-Justices. For the Navy and Stores, the Admiral, and Master of the Ordnance: For the Treasury, the Treasurer, or First-Comptroller, and Chancellor of the Exchequer. That the rest of the Fifteen should be the Lord Privy-Seal, the Master of the Horse, the Lord-Steward, and Lord-Chamberlain of the Household, the Groom of the Stole, and the two Secretaries of State; which should be all the Offices of his Kingdom, to which the Dignity of a Privy-Councillor should be annexed. That the others his Majesty had resolv'd on, and hop'd he had not choic'd ill. His Majesty intended besides, to have such Princes of his Blood as he should at any time call to this Board, being here in Court; a President of the Council, whenever he shall find it necessary; and the Secretary of Scotland, when any such shall be here. But that their being uncertain, he reckons not of the constant Number of Thirty, which shall never be exceeded.

Upon the Issue of all, the present Council was with repeated Thanks for their past Services, and Assurances of the King's Satisfaction in them, dissolv'd; the next Morning was appointed for the Meeting of the new one; the several Members of which were the same Day (b) declar'd; and as many as were then present, were immediately sworn in, and took their Places at the Board accordingly: His Majesty farther declaring, That he would have all his Affairs debated freely, of what kindsoever they were, and therefore, with absolute Secrecy.

Thus it was presum'd, that by the Help of a political Medium, the most discordant Particles might be made to incorporate without a new Fermentation. The great Officers of State, who made up one half of the Constitution, were almost all of the old Leaven; Persons devoted to the Prerogative, and some of them, Arlington and Lauderdale in particular, obnoxious for having serv'd it, at the Expence of all other Considerations: On the contrary, those who were now to be made a Part of the same Mass, deriv'd their Credit from their constant Opposition to the Court, and their Strength from their Popularity. As their Numbers were equal, it was understood that neither would be able to give the Law; and that the King's Weight on either Side, would turn the Balance as he pleas'd. And as to the Division of Power, Care was also taken to gratify, but not to gorge, the new Comers. Scotland and Ireland were still continued under the old Direction: Sir William Temple, himself, was nominated to be one of the Secretaries of State: And the Lord Sunderland, the other, tho' now drawing with the Duke of Monmouth and the Favourite Duchess, stood indebted, as we have seen, to Lord Danby for his Promotion: If the Lord Edix was at the Head of the Treasury; he had Sir John Ernley (who was Chancellor of the Exchequer) and Mr. Hyde, join'd with him in the Commission, to temper his Influence at that Board: And if his Brother, Sir Henry Capel, was set at the Head of the Admiralty, with other Patriots for his Satellites, the old Courtiers were not wholly left out of the Commission. Bishop Burnet observes, however, that out of all these Removals and Promotions, the Duke's Creatures were so wholly excluded, that they gave both themselves and him for lost. But if they were really in this desponding Condition, it was rather, perhaps, for themselves than him; for the Friends to the Prerogative were all equally Friends to the Legitimate Succession; and his Royal Highness, himself, had, before his Departure, exacted all the Securities that the King had Power to give. The Duke of Monmouth, indeed, seem'd to be Lord of the Ascendant; he had a great Place at Court; he was at the Head of the Soldier; he had a Seat in the new Council: The President Shaftsbury, was known to be deep in his Interest, and all the rest of the new Men were presum'd to be at his Devotion. But they were rather flattering Appearances, than Proofs of solid Strength. The King was dispos'd to yield much, but not all: And it must be presum'd, that the Reserve he had made of his old Counsellors, was purposely to defeat the Projects of his new ones; in case they should push for such Changes as might not only divide the Court, but embroil the Kingdom. Possibly that the intriguing, restless Duke of Buckingham, who in all Changes, hitherto, had been so considerable a Figure, should have neither Place nor Name in this, was, at first, as disagreeable to the Protestant Secretaries, whose avow'd Patron

tron and Favourite he was, as the Banishment of his Royal Highness was to the Roman Catholics. But whatever his Abilities or Pretensions were, or whoever espous'd them, it does not appear that they were at all consider'd on this great Occasion; even tho' the main Object was to mollify the Rage of Parties by taking off their Leaders. Sir William Temple does not so much as mention him; nor does it appear that either the York or Monmouth Faction, thought him worth enlisting, or any longer capable of doing Good or Harm: All the mighty Advantages he possess'd, of Mind, Body, Birth and Fortune, serving only to render him splendidly insignificant.

The King communicates the Matter to both Houses in form.

The very next Day after this new Constitution had been declar'd, the King came to the House of Peers, and, in a short Speech, communicated in form that memorable Event to both Houses, saying, "That he had made choice of such Persons as were worthy and able to advise him; and that he was resolv'd, in all his weighty and important Affairs, next to the Advice of his Great Council in Parliament, which he should often consult with, to be advis'd by this Privy-Council: And that he desir'd them all to apply themselves heartily, as he should do, to those things which were necessary for the Good and Safety of the Kingdom; and that no Time might be lost therein."

All who are conversant with Sir William Temple's Writings must have discern'd, that tho' no Man was more a Friend to Mankind, no Man was more full of himself, or more solicitous to have his Merits seen and acknowledg'd by others: Thus we find him expatiating, in his Memoirs, with much Pleasure, on the general good Reception his new Constitution met with from the Country; the Bonfires it kindled in the City, and in Ireland; the Lift it gave the Actions of the Dutch East-India Company; the Resolution it excited in the States to send over Mr. Van Loon, one of their best and most considerable Men, to England upon the Occasion; and the Embrace it gave to France; and, withal, betraying as sensible a Mortification, when he comes to speak of the Damp it met with from the House of Commons: His Words are, "The House of Commons receiv'd it with most Coldness, where the contrary was most expected; and the pretending Knowers among them, who were not of the Council, pretended now to know nothing of it, to expect new Revelations, to doubt it might be new Court-Juggle, and to refer it to Time to tell what it was in truth; in the mean while to suspend their Judgments."

The Parliament fallen upon the Occasion.

In fact, it does not appear, that either House acknowledg'd the Compliment of the King's Speech by Address, which is now become almost a Matter of Course, on much less considerable Occasions; or even that any such Acknowledgment was mov'd for: "This, says Sir W. Temple, was the first Effect of my Lord Shaftsbury's good Meaning to the King and his Affairs, into which he he was now enter'd, but not with the personal or transcendent Credit he aim'd at with his Majesty, and which he thought those who had been Authors of this new Constitution had the greatest Share in."

No doubt, that Lord was too able a Politician to exchange the first Place in such a Parliament, at such a Crisis, for the nominal Priority in such a Council; and, consequently, it must be presum'd, that Sir William had Reason to place some Part of the Sullenness the Parliament shew'd to his Account. But the whole Burthen ought, by no means, to rest on his Shoulders: The Dispositions of Government were, as yet, insufficient to gratify the several Leaders of the House: And that some were taken, rather incens'd than loosn'd those that were lost: Even the very Herd would not be whittled to Court: While in their own Way, they were ready enough to follow; but that being chang'd, they were as ready to change their Guides: The Venal gav'd for a Consideration; the Vain were bigotted to their Idol, Popularity; the Malignant pant'd for Contusion; and the Men of Principle of both Parties seem'd more apprehensive of what was to happen next, than reconcil'd to the what Time had already brought to Light. Among the Discontented it was soon given out, That Counsellors were changed, and not Councils: And those popular Men, who were over-look'd in the late Compromise, were very industrious to have this Doctrine establish'd as self-evident. Ferguson makes no difficulty to call the said Compromise the greatest Masterpiece which the Conspirators (meaning those in the Interest of the Crown) had brought to Perfection, since the Design was first form'd, to introduce Popery and arbitrary Government into England. According to him, it was a Design to blind and cozen not only the House of Commons, but our most wise Statesmen, the Enemies of those Conspirators: "A Design, says he, laid, at least, three Removes from the first Sight, and which took the Effect the Conspirators aim'd at; which was, in this Outcry against Popery and Popish Councils, to make it appear to the World, that the Court was as eager, and as real, in the Prosecution, as the House of Commons could be." For this, he farther says, they, all of a sudden, agreed to shew their utter Dislike of all former Councils; that the present Council should be dissolv'd; and that, in their stead, the Darlings of the People should be chosen, &c. &c. On the other hand, Mr. North, Examener, as Foreman for the contrary Faction, gives in his Verdict, as follows: "And for the Action itself (the Dismissing the old Council) not only his faithful Subjects, but all considering Persons, thought that the King had rather Cause to be alarm'd, as of the weakest thing he ever did in all his Life. It look'd to them as if he was, like a Ship at high Water, upon the turn, to surrender himself into the Hands of his Enemies, to be buffeted to and fro by them; the very Mistake his Royal Father fell under. They supposed he was betray'd by the subtle and treacherous Promises of them, whose Study

Day and Night, it was to destroy him. As when their Predecessors told King Charles I. they would make him a glorious King; and so they did indeed, whatever they meant. Now it was believ'd, that the Faction, being satisfy'd the Work could not be done by their own Efficacy, by Promises of making all Matters easy and pleasant, had prevail'd upon the King to do it for them himself; and all upon Terms of trusting them, whose Justice, Fidelity, and good Nature, his Majesty's Father had prov'd.

The Loyallists almost in Dis-pair.

These were the Thoughts of those faithful Subjects, who, being stunn'd with a Change of this Nature, were melancholy to the last Degree. They could not foresee where, or at what, the King would, or (if willing) could make a Stand; but now concluded, that, having begun, he must go on yielding every thing to his Enemies; each Concession rendering him less able to resist the next Demand, till he was denuded of all his Prerogative and Power, as the Militia, Justices, Lieutenantcy, Navy, &c. And then, as the Party-men most scandalously gave out, to take up with a Mistress or two to pass his Time (having no Business) as they supposed his Humour served best to be kept quiet. The Loyallists knew not whose Fortune it would be to be first mortify'd. But all, who had been actively such, expected their Turns. They had nothing to do, but to stand silent and still, expecting the Event. And, in a Word, the Discouragement was so great, that it was a Wonder his Majesty's Friends did not fill from him, or that any were left to stand the Brunt in his Interests. So apt are People, in this wicked World, in dangerous Cafes, to make timely Provision for themselves, not caring what becomes of the rest!

But a little Time and Observation diffipated these Clouds; shewing that, in this Change, the King did not yield out of Weakness, but what he did was upon a politic View. And whereas the Faction intended to make a Property of him, he made sure Work, in serving his own Turn upon them; but not without immense Hazards, as the Nature of the thing shews.

And, as if to balance the Account on both Sides, Sir John Reresby throws in this Remark, "That most of the Lords and Gentlemen of the Privy Council, those great Patriots before in the Esteem of both Houses, began, in some measure, to lose their Credit with them. So true it is, that there is no wearing the Court and Country Livery together!" Or rather, when the Rage of Parties grows to Extremities, so sure are those who rush between them to undergo all the Fury they meant to discharge against each other!

However this may be, nothing is more certain, than that the Change in the Privy Council produc'd none in the Proceedings of the House of Commons: On the contrary, the Current ran with the same Violence as before; or rather it grew more impetuous, and more irresistible. They had, early in the Session, impeach'd the five Popish Lords; all of whom had severally put in their Pleas at the Lords Bar, in Person, except Lord Belkiss, who being confin'd to his Bed with the Gout, was permitted by his Peers to answer in Writing: And now the several (1) Pleas of the Lords Pearce, Strafford, and Arundel were voted against the five Popish Lords.

(1) The material Part of that given in by the Earl of Pearce was as follows:

As to that Part of the Impeachment, that containeth the Matter following: "Namely, that for many Years now last past, there hath been contrived and carried on by Pearce, a traitorous and execrable Conspiracy and Plot, in this Kingdom of England, and other Places, to alter, change, and subvert, the ancient Government and Laws of this Kingdom and Nation, and to suppress the true Religion therein established, and to extirpate and destroy the Professions thereof; and that the said Plot and Conspiracy was contrived and carried on in divers Places, and by several Ways and Means, and by a great Number of Persons of several Qualities and Degrees, who acted therein, and intended thereby to execute and accomplish their aforesaid wicked and traitorous Designs and Purposes; and that the said Earl of Pearce, and the other Lords therein named, together with several other Persons therein likewise named or mentioned, as false Traitors to his Majesty, and this Kingdom, within the Time aforesaid, have traitorously contrived, consulted, and acted, to and for the accomplishing the said wicked, pernicious and traitorous Designs; and for that End, did most wickedly and traitorously agree, confeder and resolve, to imprison, depose and murder, his sacred Majesty, and to deprive him of his Royal Estate, Crown and Dignity, and by malicious and advised Speaking, Writing, or otherwise Declaring, such their Purposes and Intentions; as also to subvert this Kingdom and Nation to the Pope, and to his tyrannical Government, and to seize, and flure amongst themselves, the Estates and Inheritances of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects; and to erect and rehouse Abbies, Monasteries, and other Convents and Societies, which have been long since by the Laws of this Kingdom suppressed, for their superstition and Idolatry, and to deliver up and refuse to them the Lands and Possessions now vested in his Majesty, and his Subjects, by the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and also to found and erect Monasteries and Convents, and to remove all Protestant Bishops, and other ecclesiastical Persons, from their Offices, Benefices, and Preferments; and by this means to destroy his Majesty's Person, extirpate the Protestant Religion, overthrow the Rights, Liberties and Properties of all his Majesty's good Subjects, subvert the lawful Government of this Kingdom, and subject the same to the Tyranny of the See of Rome; and that the said Conspirators, and their Complices and Confederates, traitorously had and held several Meetings, Assemblies and Consultations, wherein it was contriv'd and design'd amongst them what Means should be us'd, and what Persons and Instruments should be employ'd to murder his Majesty; and did then, and there resolve to effect it, by poisoning, strangling, stabbing, or some other like Ways and Means." And also as to that Part of the Impeachment, which chargeth, That the said Earl of Pearce, and the other Persons in the said Impeachment named, the better to compass their traitorous Designs, have consulted to sell Mien, Money, Horses, Arms and Ammunition; the said Earl of Pearce, (serving to himself, and which he humbly prayeth may be retrieved to him, the Liberty of answering over, and denying, all and singular the said Crimes and Offences, so imposed upon him by the said Impeachment, says, the said Charge is so general and uncertain, that he cannot by any Possibility give any direct Answer thereto, nor make his just and lawful Defence, upon any Trial of the same, for that the said Charge hath no manner of Certainty in point of Time, it being laid only for many Years now last past. A traitorous and execrable Plot and Conspiracy hath been contriv'd and carried on; which may be for five, ten, twenty, thirty, or more Years past, whereby, although the said Earl knoweth himself to be altogether innocent of such horrid and detestable Crimes, as by the said Impeachment are objected against him; yet it is no way possible for him, upon any Trial thereof, to be prepared with his just and lawful Defence, by Witnesses, to prove himself absent, and in another Place, at the time of such Meeting or Consultation, to or for any the wicked Designs or Purposes in the said Impeachment mentioned, or upon his Trial may be suddenly objected against him, when he cannot by any Case or Forefight whatsoever have such Witnesses ready as could disprove the same, if he were actually charged for any Act or Crime at any time, certainly allyed in the said Impeachment more certain, as to the Place of any such traitorous Meeting or Consultation, laid down in the said Impeachment; it being only alleged to be at divers Places within the Realm of England, and elsewhere; which, for the Cause aforesaid, is

A. D. 1679. voted (k) evasive and insufficient; and it was resolv'd that, being such, the Commons neither could nor ought to reply to them. As also, that if the said Answers were sufficient, Proceedings ought to be stop'd till the Lord Bellasis had answer'd in Person likewise; and that the House of Lords should be call'd upon to order the said five Lords to perfect their Answers, or in Default thereof, to proceed to Judgment against them. And to all this was added, by order, That the House desired their Lordships would appoint a short Day for the said impeach'd Peers to put in their effectual Answers, which was in fact desired the Lords, to command Lord Bellasis to be well; or to take the Continuance of his Distemper, as a Proof of his Guilt; and not only to involve him therein, but the four other Lords whom they had just involv'd in the same Prosecution.

The Commons enquire into the several Fires which had lately happen'd.

[Chand. Hist. and Proceed. of the House of Commons.]

One Stubbs charges them on the Papists.

They, also, laid out most sollicitously for fresh Matter of Clamour against the Papists in general: And several Fires having lately happen'd in several Parts of the Town, a Committee was appointed to enquire into the manner, &c. of their breaking out. And on the 26th of April, Mr. Rigby the Chairman of that Committee reported, That one of the said Fires (at one Mr. Bird's in Petter Lane) had been caus'd by Elizabeth Oxley, a Servant Maid; she having confessed, that she had purposely set Fire to certain Books and Papers, in a Closet, at the Instigation of one (I) Stubbs a Papist, who had given her half a Crown in hand, with a Promise of five Pounds more. That the said Stubbs being taken into Custody and examin'd, had also confirm'd all this; and moreover acknowledg'd, that he had been engag'd in the Business by one Father Gifford, who taught, That it was no Sin to burn the Houses of Heretics: That he had drawn in several to be his Accomplices: That he was to receive 100*l.* of the said Gifford, who was to be supply'd with the Money by the Church: That the said Stubbs, moreover, confessed several other Particulars relating to a general

Masfacre of the Protestants, which was to be covered by an Invasion from France: That he expected to be made an Abbot or Bishop for his good Services; That he had been taught, it was no more a Sin to kill a Heretic than a Dog: That he was sworn to Secrecy: That he was told he should be dam'd if he made a Discovery, and that when all their Forces met in the Middle of June, the Word was to be, Horse at the King!

Here was a new Vein of Plot-Evidence open'd; and as it promis'd to be rich in Discoveries, the House took care to apply to his Majesty, by Address, for the Pardon of these Wretches, as an Acknowledgment of their frank and full Confession; as also for a Proclamation requiring the Persons nam'd by the said Stubbs as his Accomplices, to come in by a certain Day: But, tho' Stubbs was so circumstantial in his Narrative, and that Part of it relating to an Invasion from France, tally'd so exactly with the (m) Panic which then prevail'd, we do not find the Story was even adopted by Bergafon himself, or that it answer'd any other End than that of blackening the Papists, who were now, it seems, to be sacrific'd for the Sins of the People. With the same View it was the same Day reported to the House, That the Lord Cottingham, who dy'd many Years before in Spain, had appointed an Epitaph to be written on his Tomb, expressing his Desire, that his Body might rest there till England should be restor'd to the Church, and then carry'd over thither: That this was done last Year; and that a Warrant was produc'd from the Earl of Darby to the Commissioners of the Customs to let it pass.

After all this Preparation, a Motion was made and agreed to for setting apart the next Day, being Sunday, to consider of the Means for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person; as also of the Succession of the Crown in relation to Popery.

It is obvious that the first of these Points was only to serve as a Vehicle for the last Grand Debate on the Means to preserve the King's Person.

It is likewise to utterly uncertain, that it deprives the said Earl of his just Defence upon his Trial: The Uncertainty likewise of the Number of Meetings, or Consultations, to the wicked Purposes in the Impeachment mentioned, and the not showing how many Times the said Earl met and consulted, and with whom in particular, doth likewise deprive him of all Possibility of making his Defence, or producing his Witnesses: For that the said Earl, being wholly innocent, cannot suppose, or imagine what Meeting or Consultation, either to raise Men or Money, for the carrying on of a traitorous Design, or to any wicked Intere or Purpose in the said Impeachment mentioned, shall or may be objected against him upon his Trial; and it is as much impossible for him to bring Witnesses to prove all the Meetings he hath had with others in his Lifetime, as it is for him to know, upon this general Charge, what Meeting or Consultation may, upon his Trial, be objected against him, as a traitorous Meeting or Consultation: And whereas it is in the said Impeachment charged upon the said Earl, that he hath utter'd Treason by malicious and advised Speaking, Writing, or otherwise Declaring; the said Earl saith, That never any traitorous Thought ever entered into his Heart; and therefore he cannot possibly know, or discover what Words, or Writing, he ever spoke, utter'd, wrote, or declared, which are now charged upon him as Treason, there being no Words or Writing at all specified in the Impeachment, whereby the said Earl might know how to prepare his Defence against them; or that this most honourable House might judge, whether the said Words or Writing were in Law unreasonable, or not all with Innocen-ties, and the imminent and apparent Danger of the said Earl, being thereupon surpris'd in his Trial of a Cause of this Consequence to the said Earl, wherein his Life and Honour, more dear to him than his Life and all else that is dear to him in this World, are immediately concerned, being seriously weigh'd and considered by your Lordships, he humbly prays, as by his Counsel he is advised, that your Lordships will not put him to answer the said Impeachment, as to the Charges herein above recited, till the same be reduced to some competent Certainty, that the Earl may know what to answer unto, and may be thereby enabled to make his just Defence accordingly: All which, notwithstanding, he humbly submiteth to your Lordships grave Judgment and Consideration, professing himself always ready and willing to do, and to submit to, whatsoever your Lordships in Justice shall order or think fit: And as to all other the Treasons, Crimes, and Offences whatsoever, contained, mentioned, or specify'd in the said Impeachment, the said Earl protests, that they are uncertainly and insufficiently alleg'd; and therefore saving to himself the Benefit of Exception thereto: For Answer thereto, saith, that he is not, nor never was, guilty of the said Treasons. as also of the

the Crown.

The King was inclin'd to make the Case of the Succession his own; and the Commons were as much concern'd to separate them; or rather to make their Concern for his Safety, the immediate Cause of their Zeal against Popery. Scarce ever had a Matter that so nearly affected the very Fundamentals of the Public Peace come under the Cognizance of Parliament: Scarce ever were the People more divided than in their Opinions, Hopes and the Hopes of his coming such to the Crown, had given the greatest Countenance to the present Conspiracies, and Designs of the Papists against the King and Protestant Religion." They moreover voted an Address, that all Sea-Ports, Places of Strength, and Command of Ships, might be put into trusty Hands; and concluded this important Day, with referring the farther Consideration of the great Matter in dispute before them, to the next Wednesday; against which time, the Secret Committee were order'd to bring into the House such Letters and Papers as they had in their Custody relating to the Duke of York.

The bloody Hand of Persecution would stain the whitest Robes that Patriotism can put on; and whatever plausible or rational things might be urg'd for these violent Proceedings against the Duke, an Assembly of Saints would remain for ever inexcusable for thus taking advantage of the Fury of the Times to force the King upon an Act of Cruelty, that would fully as well as fadden his Reign. Tho' Pickering had been accus'd and condemn'd as one of the Conspirators, the others were charg'd with no other Crime than the simple Exercise of their Priesthood: And not only Sir William Temple, but all whom Zeal had not blinded, or Passion harden'd, thought it wholly unjust to put Men to death, without giving them reasonable Warnings, for practising only what thorough three Reigns had been conniv'd at.

When the Law was satisfy'd, the King was free to exercise his great Prerogative of Mercy: But such was the Jealousy then predominant, and such Advantage was taken of it, that his Majesty was, in the End, forc'd to give way to the Torrent. With what Reluctance may be gathered from the Answer he return'd to the Commons Address, as follows:

" Gentlemen, I have always been tender in Matters of Blood, which my Subjects have no reason to take Exception at. But this is a Matter of great Weight; I shall, therefore, consider of it, and return you an Answer."

But, tho' the Commons undertook, in this Case, to wrestle singly with his Majesty; in the great Vote relating to the Duke of York, they chose to have the Concurrence of the Peers. Lord Ruffel, tho' one of the new Privy Council, was pitch'd upon to carry it up; which he did accordingly. But the Lords (n) defer'd the Consideration of it, till the Wednesday following, and so the whole Affair hung in suspense.

Intrigue of the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Shaftsbury.
Temple's
Memoirs,
P. iii. p. 335.

Sir William Temple not only bears witness, that these violent Proceedings grievously alarm'd the Court and perplex'd the new Council, but lays them most explicitly to the charge of the Duke of Monmouth, and the Earl of Shaftsbury; between whom the most perfect Union was established, no doubt, in virtue of a secret Treaty between them, that all imaginable Ways and Means should be us'd to alter the Course of the Succession; and that, in case their Endeavours took effect, in Exchange for the Name of King allotted to the former, the latter should hold the Reins, and drive the Chariot of Government, according to his own good Pleasure. Sir William is also positive, that the Session could never have taken this desperate Turn, but by Lord Shaftsbury's pretending among his Patriots, That the Duke of Monmouth had so much Credit with the King, that his Majesty desir'd but a good Occasion of consenting to all the Parliament should insist on, and which would be given him by their Heat and Obstinacy in so popular a Point, as that against Popery: And if that were once gain'd, the Duke of Monmouth and he should be able to steer all the rest to the Satisfaction of those who call'd themselves the Good or the Honest Party. Such a Mischief, continues he, could never have grown, if Lord Shaftsbury had not work'd himself up into Credit, both in Parliament and City, by the Appearance of having it with the King, and in the Council, where he was President: And by the Insinuations given of his having or growing yet into greater, by a more secret Spring, which was the Interest of the Duke of Monmouth, and the Kindness of his Majesty increasing, as appear'd since the Duke's Absence.

But to whatever Causes the Ferment in the House of Commons was owing, the new Council thought it a Matter of the utmost Importance to use their best Endeavours to allay it. The whole Art of the Politician consists in finding out practicable Expedients, and making a dextrous Application of them. It could not be presum'd, that the Commons would be quieted without some Concessions; and it was pretty apparent the King was in no Disposition to grant all they demanded. It grew, therefore, the chief Concern of those who were equally solicitous to gratify both Prince and People, to find out such a Temperament as might reconcile both. And accordingly, after much Hammering, says Sir William Temple, some Heads were prepar'd, which having receiv'd the Approbation of his Majesty, and all his Council, except two, were, in the next place, to be laid before the Parliament.

On the very Day, therefore, that the Commons were to resume the farther Consideration of the Dangers apprehended from the Duke's Pretensions, &c. and the Lords were to discuss the Vote already left with them for their Concurrence, the King in a Speech from the Throne to both Houses, recommended the Prosecution of the Plot, the (e) disbanding the Army, and the providing a Fleet for the Common Security. After which his Majesty added the following gracious Expressions: "And to shew you that, whilst you are doing your Parts, my Thoughts have not been misemploy'd, but that it is my constant Care to do every thing that may preserve your Religion, and secure it for the future, in all Events, I have commanded my Lord Chancellor to mention several Particulars; which, I hope will be an Evidence, that, in all things that concern the public Security, I shall not follow your Zeal, but lead it."

These memorable Particulars were thus express'd:

"And to the End it may never be in the Power of any Papist, if the Crown descend upon him, to make any Change either in Church or State; I am commanded to tell you, that his Majesty is willing that Provision may be made, first to distinguish a Papist from a Protestant Successor; then to limit and circumscribe the Authority of a Papist Successor, in these Cases following, that he may be disabled to do any Harm: First, in reference to the Church; his Majesty is content that Care be taken that all ecclesiastical and spiritual Benefices and Promotions in the Gift of the Crown, may be conferred in such a manner, that we may be sure the Incumbents shall be always of the most pious and learned Protestants: And that no Papist Successor, while he continues so, may have any Power to controul such Presentments. In reference to the State and Civil Part of the Government; as it is already provided that no Papist can sit in either House of Parliament; so the King is pleas'd that it be provided too, that there may never want a Parliament, when the King shall happen to die, but that the Parliament then in being may continue indissoluble for a competent time; or if there be no Parliament in being, then the last Parliament which was in being before that time, may re-assemble, and sit a competent time, without any new Summons or Elections. And as no Papist can by Law hold any Place of Trust, so the King is content that it may be farther provided, that no Lords or others of the Privy-Council, no Judges of the Common Law, or in Chancery, shall at any time, during the Reign of a Papist Successor, be put in, or displaced, but by the Authority of Parliament: And that Care be taken, that none but sincere Protestants may be Justices of the Peace. In reference to the military Part, the King is willing that no Lord-Lieutenant, or Deputy-Lieutenant, nor no Officer in the Navy, during the Reign of any Papist Successor, be put out or removed, but either by the Authority of Parliament, or of such Persons as the Parliament shall intrust with such Authority.

It is hard to invent another Restraint to be put upon a Papist Successor, considering how much the Revenue of the Successor will depend

But yet, if any thing else can occur to the Wisdom of the Parliament, which may farther secure Religion and Liberty against a Papish Successor, without defeating the Right of Succession itself, his Majesty will most readily consent to it."

Disapproved of by Lord Shaftsbury and
Sir William
Temple.

Before we proceed to treat of the Fruits of his Majesty's Condescensions, it is necessary to explain, That the Two of the Council who could not be brought to relish them, were the Lord Shaftsbury and Sir William Temple: Men of as opposite Principles, Habits, and Dispositions, as any two Men in the World; and, therefore, 'tis more to be wonder'd, that they should agree in disapproving the same Measure, than that their Reasons and Motives for so doing should be as opposite and irreconcilable as all the other Particulars of their Lives and Characters. Sir William's Dissent was founded, it seems, on these two Considerations: First, That nothing from the King, upon these Points, was like to prove acceptable to the Commons; who, if inclin'd to enter into any Compromise, he thought, ought to have propos'd their Terms, and left it to his Majesty to take, or refuse. Secondly, That he did not see any Certainty of Ease arising from these Expedients, to the King, tho' accepted by the two Houses; at the same time that it was evident to all Men, that they would leave the Crown, after him, in Shackles; which, tho' put on only to fetter the Duke, might not be easily shook off by any of his Successors. Lord Shaftsbury, on the other hand, affect'd to be confident, these Shackles would have no Hold at all; and made no scruple to declare, That, if the Duke had Strength enough to take possession of the Crown, the same Strength would enable him to break thro' all Restraints and Limitations.

For different Reasons.

It is obvious, that if one of these notable Politicians was in the right, the other must have been in the wrong; because no King could be just and look'd at the same time: And if, as Sir William pretend'd, these Shackles were really binding, however he, as a Courtier, might be shock'd at the Operation, they ought to have been put on: Magna Charta bears eternal Witness, that the Kings of England are within the Reach of Pacts, as well as Laws; and that the doing Mischief of any kind is no Part of their Prerogative: From a Prince of so absolute a Turn as the Duke of York, who was besides known to be so unreluctant a Bigot to the Church of Rome, real Dangers were to be apprehended; and therefore all imaginable Precautions should have been established, to hinder their taking place: These offer'd by the Court bid fair to prove effectual: In appearance, they flow'd freely from the Crown; they had not been exacted by the Commons; consequently, no Plea of Force or Constraint could afterwards have been urg'd for the removing them. They were, indeed, of such a Nature, that, by the Help of Mr. North's Key to the King's Conduct, before-quoted, we may almost venture to conclude, they never would have been offer'd, but in the Persuasion they would be rejected. Bishop Burnet affirms, the Duke himself was struck with the News of the King's Concessions, when it reach'd him at Brussels; and that he, the said Bishop, saw a Letter written by the Duchess the next Post; in which she wrote, "That as for all the high things that were said by their Enemies, they look'd for them; but the Speech of the Lord Chancellor's was a Surprise, and a great Mortification to them." And what the Duke and Duchess had Reason to be alarm'd at, the People had equal Reason to be satisfy'd with. As to Lord Shaftsbury, and his Opinion, he was not fit a Politician, as to dilate the Use of Entrenchments and Fortifications, because he knew of none that were impregnable. The plain Truth, with respect to him, was, that Limitations of any kind gave a Sanction to the Duke's Title, however they might curtail his Power: And it was impossible for him to admit his Royal Highness of York, on any Terms, without Breach of Faith to his Grace of Monmouth. It was for this Cause, tho' for a different Pretence, that he gave his Negative to all Expedients, at the Council-board; and it was for this Cause, likewise, and to manifest his own Power and Importance, that he practis'd upon the House of Commons to do the same.

Vol. i. p. 456.

Time was the first thing to be gain'd: That very Day the Consideration of the King's and Chancellor's Speeches came properly before them, as having an immediate Reference to the Order of the House: But it was not thought advisable to trust first Impressions; nor to suffer the Matter to come to a regular Debate, till those who were to manage had agreed on their respective Parts, and properly instructed their Followers.

That it might, moreover, be taken for granted without-doors, that they could not proceed to provide for the Security of the Nation, without endangering themselves, they order'd an (p) Address to be presented to the King (the Lords also concurring unanimously) in which they call'd upon his Majesty to order the Militia of London, Westminster, Southwark, the Tower Hamlets, Middlesex, and Surry, to be rais'd forthwith: Al-

Militia.

(p) Whether it may be presum'd that this Address took its Rise from the Incident mentioned in the following Pages, let the Reader judge.

On Saturday (whether May 5, or 10, is uncertain) the King having appointed sixteen small Pieces of Ordnance to be sent to Parliament, Notice was taken thereof in the House of Commons, and a great Suspicion, that they being first with Field-carriages, Horses for Horses, and all Necessaries belonging to the Train of a marching Army, they might be intended rather for such an Use, than to furnish a Garrison, as is pretended. At the same time, Reports were spread, that the Duke of York was return'd into England, or hourly expected; and some believe his Business is to hinder the disbanding of the Army, with such others as the Knowledge of his Nature, together with the Persons that command in Parliament, the Use of Rights, and some other Places, may suggest, in the most jealous Time that I have ever liv'd in." Report, out of Coleman's Letters, against the Duke of York [Recrity.]

ledging, however, by way of Reason, That the Papists might be induc'd to make some desperate Attempt to prevent the Tryals of the Popish Lords; as also, that it was necessary that some farther Security should be provided for his Majesty's Sacred Person.

It was not till Sunday the (9) eleventh of May, that the Concert was wholly adjust'd; and against that important Day, the Committee before spoken of had, according to Order, re-examin'd Coleman's Letters, as also those of his Correspondents, and extract'd such Particulars as related to the Duke of York, which were then reported, viz. That his Highness had written thrice to the Pope; that his first Letter miscarried; that the second gave his Holiness such an Excess of Joy, that the old Gentleman could not refrain from Tears; and that the third was to excite the Consent he gave to have his Daughter married to the Prince of Orange, and to acquaint him, that the Run of the Times had oblig'd him to such involuntary Compliance. Upon this and some further Intimations of the same Nature, a Debate arose, whether a Bill should be drawn up in the way his Majesty had suggest'd, or whether they should immediately proceed to a total Exclusion. The Friends for the Limitation argued, that we might be as safely secur'd the one way as the other; that a small Revenue might be settled upon a Popish Successor while he continued in that Persuasion; that the Militia might be taken out of his hands; and that a Parliament might be empowered to assemble, whenever the present King should die, and to sit for six Weeks, in order to settle the Affairs of the Kingdom, to appoint Protestant Officers, Military and Civil, and to make choice of Bishops, which the Successor, if a Popish, should have no Power to reject.

To this it was objected, that such a Project of Procedure was altering the very Frame and Constitution of our Government and Monarchy, and directly to reduce it to a Republic; that it would be quite ineffectual; that the King, by the fundamental Laws of the Land, was at the Head of the Legislature; that a Parliament so convened as above, could enact nothing valid without him; that while he enjoyed the Title of King, he would exercise a Power adequate to his Office; and that therefore the Means propos'd were delusory and unsafe, in comparison of an utter Exclusion. It was replied, that this last Expedient was, by far, more to be avoided than the former; that it was depriving the Duke of his Birthright; that if his Highness surviv'd, he had as clear a Claim to succeed the King, if he died childless, as any man whatever had to succeed to his Father's Possessions; that probably a Prince of his Spirit could not easily submit to be so disinherited; that such a Disturbance of the Succession had seldom, in this Kingdom, been of any lasting Effect; that Right had always prevail'd at last; that Civil Wars, upon the like Occasions, had been disastrous to England; that Success would reverse all Attainders; and that should his Highness force his way to the Crown, the Overthrow of Religion and Government were more, much more, to be feared, than by his peaceful Accession.

Many (7) Motions were made in the Course of this Debate; but in the end it was order'd, that a Bill should be drawn up, to disable the Duke from inheriting the Imperial Crown of these Realms. Sir Francis Winnington and Mr. Vaughan would have put off the Debate, until the Trials of Lord Danby and the Popish Lords were over. Sir William Coventry, Sir Thomas Littleton, and others, spoke directly against the thing; but the Major Part, by much, was of the other Opinion; so that on the Division upon the Question, whether there should be Candles, the Inequality was so great, that the Pains of telling was spared, and when the main Question was put, there was no Division at all.

They also resolv'd, nemine contradicente, "That, in defence of the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion, they would stand by his Majesty with their Lives and Fortunes; and that if his Majesty should come by any violent Death, they would revenge it to the utmost on the Papists." A Resolution, which, even at this Distance of Time, cannot be read without Horror! As devoting the Innocent to Punishment, indiscriminately with the Guilty; and rather exposing the King's Person to Danger, than providing for his Preservation: For if the Earth had produced a Wretch profligate and

(7) In this Interval, viz. May 5, Mr. J. Sydney writes to Mr. Saville, as follows:

"The Courtiers did believe, that the King's yielding that the Parliament should end with his Life, or be revers'd by his Death, if it should be dissolved in his Life-time, and not have the Nomination of all Officers, both civil and military, if his Successor proved to be a Popish, would have given entire Satisfaction unto the House of Commons. But to the contrary, it is certain, that the Supposition that the next of Blood must be King, tho' a Popish, is so distasteful to them, that nothing will please upon that odious Condition; and as to this Particular, it look'd as upon as a Trick to bring the Parliament to consider and confirm the Duke's Title; that is, a Trade Guild to convey a possession full. This parliament appears various Counters; some would impeach him, upon what is discover'd of his Part in the Plot; Others incline more to bring in an Act to exclude him from the Succession of the Crown, as being a Popish, and thereby a Friend unto, and dependent upon, a foreign and enemy Power. Some, of those that are of this Mind, look upon it as a Trick to force, if it should be; and they are for the most part divided between the Prince of Orange and Duke of Monmouth. The first hath plainly the most plausible Title, by his Master and his Wife; but, besides the Opinion of the Infancy, once it is believed the Duke of York would have over him, it is fear'd that the Commonwealth-party in Holland would be so signified with that, as to end itself absolutely into the Hands of the King of France, who might thereby have a fair Occasion of raising both England and Holland. I need not tell you the Reasons against Monmouth, but the Branded Lieber alledg'd for him are, that whosoever is oppos'd to York will have a good Party, and all Scotland, which is every day like to be in Arms, doth certainly favour him; and may probably be of as much Importance in the Troubles that are now like to fall upon us, as they were in the Beginning of the last." Others are only upon Negatives. But when I have said what I can upon this Business, I must confess I do not know three Men of a Mind, and that a Spirit of Giddiness reigns amongst us, far beyond any I have ever observ'd in my Life."

(8) Among the rest: A Gentleman moving these Words should be put in: "Or ever had been a Popish," they were bid slide, as some believe, in respect unto him the Duke of Monmouth, perhaps) who, by the Direction of the late Lord Capet, was brought up under the Discipline of the Père de l'Oratoire. Exclusionists had the best of the Argument by a Majority of Seventy-nine; the Numbers being (1) 207 and 128.

Having led the Reader thus far thro' the principal Walk of the Session, it is now time to turn aside into those other Paths, which run parallel with it, and which, tho' neither so striking in their Entrance, nor terminating in so grand a Point of Sight, deserve nevertheless to be laid open to Posterity.

While the Court Proposals with relation to the Succession, lay yet before the Commons, and the Fate of them was rather guess'd at, than known, Lord (u) Russell delivered a complicated Message to the House from the King, importing, That his Majesty was willing the Law should pass upon Pickering, but that the rest of the condemn'd Priests were under Examination before the Lords. That his Majesty repeated his Instances, that the Fleet might be put in such a Posture, as might quiet Mens Fears, and, at least secure us from any sudden Attempt: And that tho' his Strights and Difficulties were very great, he chose to bear the Burden some time longer, rather than interrupt them, while they were employ'd about the Discovery of the Plot, the Trial of the Lords, and the Bill for securing our Religion, by pressing for any further Supply. This Message was delivered in the Beginning of May, and the Month wasting without producing any Effect from it, on the 14th Mr. Powle produc'd a second; in which his Majesty declar'd, "That considering the Advance of the Season, and that our Neighbours were before us in their Preparations, he could not hold himself discharg'd towards his People, if he did not now, with more Earnestness, again recommend the Fleet to their present Care and Consideration; and the rather because the (w) Streight's Fleet, to which a great Arrear was due, was daily expected home. That he must thereby acquit himself of the evil Consequences which the want of a Fleet, in such a Juncture, might produce; and that he had not urg'd them on this Head, without considering, that the entring upon this Work presently, could be no Hindrance to the other great Affairs upon their Hands, but rather a Security for their Dispatch."

The Patriot Maxim, That the Distresses of Kings and Ministers afford the only Opportunities to redress the Grievances and re-establish the Claims of the People, was never more steddily, nor perhaps more intemperately, adher'd to, than now. Notwithstanding these Messages were so cautiously worded, and were made to glance so favourably at the several popular Topics of the Times, the House continued inexorable; nor would hear of any further Disburisment for any Consideration whatever, without a Change of the Succession, a proper Security for Religion, and a Removal of all Officers they disliked, the Kingdom over. Such was the Tenor of the Debate: But no Vote pass'd, except to adjourn the farther Consideration of this Matter for eight Days.

To understand what was more immediately meant by the Removal of obnoxious Officers, it is necessary to intimate, that in the Interval between those two Messages, the House had again fallen upon the Duke of Lauderdale: And to add the more Weight to their Resentment, order'd the (x) Address they had prepar'd against him to be presented by the whole House: Which was done accordingly; and the King coldly reply'd, "That he would consider of it, and return

In the same Interval also, tho' at a time when it was notorious the Crown was not overburden'd with Revenue, and that its Influence in the House of Commons was never at a lower Ebb, they call'd upon Mr. Charles Bertie, who had a Patent for disposing of 20000*l.* per annum, under the Head of Secret Service Money out of the Excise without Account, to give in the several Items for what, to whom, by whose Command, &c. and, he refusing to comply, Sir Robert Howard, Auditor of the Exchequer, also enflaming Matters, by informing the House, That from *Lady Day, 1676, to March 26, 1679, 252,467*l.* 1*s.* 0*d. had been paid to the said Mr. Bertie for the same Service; they order'd him into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms, for adhering to his Trust, in contempt of their Resentment.

Mr. Bertie committed for a Contempt of the House.

Towards the End of the Month (of May) having received a farther Information, that Sir Stephen Fox was the Paymaster to several Members, and that the Names of the said Members, and the several Sums paid to them, were regularly enter'd in his Account-Books; the

(w) Sir J. Rereby adds, that a fresh Provision of naval Stores were then very much wanted in all the Yards of England, which is utterly irreconcilable with the Accounts given by Mr. Pops.

(x) The Address itself, being extremely remarkable, is here added as follows.

"We your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful Subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, finding your Majesty's Kingdoms involved in imminent Dangers, and great Difficulties, by the evil Designs and pernicious Councils of some, who have been, and are, in high Place, and Trust, and Authority about your Royal Person; who, contrary to the Duty of their Places, by their seditious and destructive Councils, tending to the subversion of the Rights, Liberties, and Properties of your Subjects, and the Alteration of the Protestant Religion established, have endeavour'd to alienate the Hearts of your loyal Subjects, from your Majesty and your Government. Among whom we have just Reason to accuse John Duke of Lauderdale, for a chief Promoter of such Councils; and more particularly for contriving and endeavouring to raise Jealousies and Misunderstandings, between your Majesty's Kingdoms of England and Scotland; whereby Hostilities might have ensued, and may arise, between both Nations, if not prevented. Wherefore, we your Majesty's loyal Subjects, could not but be justly affected with Trouble, to find such a Person (notwithstanding the repeated Addresses of the last Parliaments) continued in your Councils at this time, when the Affairs of your Kingdom require room to be put into such Employments, but such as are of known Ability, Interest, and Esteem in the Nation, without all Suspicion of either mistaking or betraying the true Interest of the Kingdom, and consequently of advising your Majesty ill. We do therefore most humbly beseech your most sacred Majesty, for taking away the great Justification, Difficulties, and Fear among your good Subjects, that your Majesty will graciously be pleased to remove the Duke of Lauderdale from your Majesty's Councils, in your Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and from all Offices, Employments, and Places of Trust, and from your Majesty's Preface for ever."

the House, moreover, order'd the said Sir Stephen to fetch the said Books; that three Members should accompany him; that he should not go out of their Sight while absent on this Mission: And that no Member should quit the Service of the House, till they return'd. But notwithstanding all these Precautions, they were disappointed. The Books were at the Lord Chamberlain's (Arlington) Office, who being on the Spot, had the Presence of Mind to ward the Blow, by alledging, That he durst not suffer any Books or Papers that concern'd the King to go out of his House, without his Majesty's special Leave. The last Resource was to order the Clerk to read the List of the House, and that Sir Stephen should by Memory prefix every Man's Price to every Man's Name: He was pliant enough to yield Obedience: And, lo! it appear'd, that the Sum of 3,400*l.* in stated, annual Salaries, was distributed among nine Members, in the following Proportions: Three at 500*l.* a Year, two at 400, three at 300, and four at 200: That 3,900*l.* had been occasionally disburs'd among six, and 7,400*l.* upon Account, in different Sums, to twelve others. In Addition to all which, the Secret Committee afterwards discovered, that three more had 400*l.* per ann. apiece; and that there were yet five more who had Pensions; but to what Value was not explain'd.

No doubt it was of high Importance to guard against the first Approaches of Corruption, and to set a Mark on the Corrupt: But, when we reflect with what Affectation one List of thirty-five Pensioners in this Parliament, and another of the (y) Club of unanimous Voters in the last were circulated in Print all over the Kingdom, by the Patriots of this Reign, it affords Matter of Astonishment, that a Practise, then so fiercely decry'd, should, in Process of time, be adopted by other Patriots professing the same political Faith, and avow'd to be the Master-Spring of Government.

A Bill is now sent the Seats of Peers and Pleasants.

To close on this Head, a Bill was order'd and prepar'd to preclude all Members from receiving any Pensions or Places of Profit, during that Session of Parliament; which was read twice, and then dropt; on a Fore-sight, perhaps, that the Session itself, would be at an end before the Bill could receive the Sanction of both Houses.

Another to re-
tions.

This Session also produc'd another abortive Bill, for regulating Abuses in Elections of Members to serve in Parliament; by which it was provided, That such only should vote for a Shire or County, who had been Householders and Inhabitants for a Year before, in the said Shire or County, had paid Scot and Lot, &c. were of Age, and worth two hundred Pounds in Fee, clear of all Debts and Encumbrances. That in all Cities, County Towns and Boroughs represented in Parliament (except London, York, Norwich, Exeter, and Bristol) none but such as had been

A. D. 1679.

Householders and Inhabitants, and paid Scot and Lot, &c. for a Year before, should have Votes; any Law, Charter, &c. to the contrary notwithstanding. That no Person, either by himself, or others, should by feasting, treating, bribing, &c. or under any pretended Charity for the Poor, endeavour, directly, or indirectly, to procure the Election of any Person or Persons; under the Penalty of Incapacity to sit as a Member, and the Forfeiture of 500*l.* That every City, Town and Borough where such Feasting was practis'd and allow'd, should forfeit their Privilege of sending Members. That all Mayors, Justices and Constables, should be empowered to arrest and commit all such Offenders to Goal. That such Magistrates as refus'd or neglected to do their Duty therein, should forfeit 100*l.* for every such Neglect or Refusal. That every Magistrate who should suffer himself to be feasted, brib'd, &c. should be disabled from voting, and forfeit 100*l.* for every such Offence. That no Suit should, for the future, be prosecuted against any Place, by any Member for Wages. That to prevent false and undue Returns, if any Sheriff, Portreeve, &c. should adjourn an Election, except as need requires from Evening to Morning, or from the Place for convenience sake first appointed, the Proceedings after such unlawful Adjournment should be void; and the Person who, at the time of the said Adjournment, had the Majority of Votes, should be held duly elected. That if any Returning Officer should be engag'd by Gifts or Promises to make a wrong Return, or should not do his Duty in the Premises in every such Case, the Offender, if a Sheriff, should forfeit 500*l.* if a Mayor, or Minister 200*l.* with treble Damages to the Party griev'd: All Promises and Engagements to save the said Offender harmless to be void; and the very making such Promise and Engagement, to incur a Penalty of 500*l.* That no Returning Officer should take above two Shillings and Sixpence for the Return of any Writ. That all the several Penalties and Forfeitures aforesaid, should be recoverable, within a Year, in any Court of Record; in which Suits, no Privilege of Parliament, or other Privileges should be allow'd. That all County-Sheriffs should cause this Statute to be audibly read at the Place of Election. That all Mayors, &c. should cause it to be set up in their Town-Houses. That against a general Election, it should be read in all Churches. That for the Prevention of the long Continuance of any Parliament for the future, no succeeding Parliament should be continued by Adjournment or Prorogation, or any other way whatever, above the Space of two Years; but at the End of that Term, every Parliament should be ipso facto, dissolved; and that in every Indenture made or seal'd by any Electors, a Clause be inserted, signifying, That the Persons therein nam'd, were were authoriz'd to serve in Parliament for two Years, if the said Parliament should so long continue, and no longer.

Such was this valuable Bill, which the Nation has since had frequent Reason to lament the Loss of; and of which this Sketch is inserted, as a Hint to the Claims and Pursuits of future Parliaments.

We are not enough in the Secret of these Times, to determine whether popular Bills were introduc'd only to inflame, and with a Fore-Knowledge that they would come to nothing: But there was yet another which was once read before this jealous and severe House of Commons, under the plausible Title of securing the Subject from the illegal Exaction of Money, but which, it is possible, was rather calculated to serve as an additional Preservative of their own exclusive Privilege of granting Supplies, and yet farther to disable the Prerogative from helping itself.

They moreover set on foot an Enquiry into the Mismanagements of the Navy; apparently more with a Design to blacken the Duke, than to (a) re-establish our Naval Affairs: For the (b) Report of their Committee turn'd but upon two Articles; the first charging Sir Anthony Dean, Peppy's Secretary to the Admiralty, and others, with fitting out a Sloop out of his Majesty's Stores, in the Year 1673, making her free of the French Ports, and procuring her a French Commission, in order to cruise on the Dutch; which being contrary to Treaties, might have occasion'd a War between the two Nations, &c. And the second, charging the same Persons with causing to be made certain Maps, Sea-Journals, Draughts and Models of his Majesty's best built Ships; and filling fourteen Sheets of Paper, closely written, with an Account of the Number, State, and Oeconomy of the Navy-Royal; the Means to allure the English Seamen into the French Service; the Weakness of those Places where our Fleets lay; Defects of Stores; Descriptions of Forts, Rivers, Garrisons, &c. All which Papers, &c. the said Dean was accus'd of carrying over to France, and delivering to the Secretary of the French Admiralty, in order to carry on the Popish Plot against his Majesty, &c.

How far these Particulars were true or false, is no where clear'd up; for tho' Dean and Peppy were immediately committed to the Tower, by Order of the House, and the Attorney-General was enjoin'd to prosecute them; it does not appear, that ever any such Prosecution took place: So that, if innocent, they suffer'd too much; if guilty, too little; and Justice was equally offended either Way.

But the great, essential, and inclinable Service, done to the People of England, by this Parliament, was in perfecting the HABEAS CORPUS Bill; which had been so long in Agitation, and by which many wholesome Provisions were made, to preserve the Liberty of the Subject from the Invasions of the Prerogative. Abuse of Power, and the Prevention of such Abuses for the future, are the Causes assign'd in the Preamble of the Bill for the enacting Clauses it is compos'd of: The most material of which are, 1. To oblige all Sheriffs, Gaolers, Ministers, or others, when serv'd with a Writ of Habeas Corpus, to obey it, within (c) three Days after the said Service, by carrying up the Body of the Person therein named to the Court, or Judge, by whom the said Writ was granted; and before him to certify the true Causes of his Detainer and Imprisonment, on the Penalty of 100*l.* for the first Offence, and 200*l.* and to be made incapable of holding his Office, for the second: As also, under the like Penalties, to grant the Prisoner a true Copy of the Warrant of Commitment and Detainer, within six Hours after Demand. 2. To provide that no Person shall be recommitted, for the same Offence, after being enlarg'd by Order of Court, on the Penalty of 500*l.* Also, 3. That if any Judge, either

The whole Reserve of the King's repairable Ships were repossessed by the Surveyor of his Navy, and Body of the Navy-board, in a Condition of being thoroughly fitted for the Sea, and furnish'd with Sea-Stores, for 50,000*l.*

And towards this, and the answering what extraordinary Supplies this Fleet might have had occasion for, beyond the six Months first allotted for the Service, a further Reserve remain'd untouched in Magazine, to the Value of threescore thousand Pounds.

Lastly, a Force additional to all this, of thirty capital Ships, was then actually in building (and for which the Parliament had already provided), whereof eleven were newly launch'd, and the Remainder (all of them) under an additional Prosecution upon the Stocks. An Addition rendering the Whole a Security not unequal (ordinary Providence concurring) to the public Ends of it, in the Maintenance of the Peace and Honour of the Government on Shore, and Support of its ancient, rightful, and envy'd Title to Dominion at Sea. [Peppy's Memoirs, p. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.]

All which Premises being allow'd, it follows, indeed, that there were no Mismanagements in the Conduct of the Navy; but, withal, that the Navy labour'd under no such extreme Wants and Necessities, as had been represented to Parliament.

(b) According to the said Report, the also made Prize of a free Ship of England, called the Catherine of London; which, tho' prov'd to be English, before his Majesty and Council, the Check-matter of Portsmouth was sent to Paris to get condemn'd.

Ferguson, with some Bitterness, affirms, that this Bill met with great Opposition from the Lords; that it gave rise to several Conferences between the two Houses; and that, tho' it was far short of what it ought to have been, it was almost a Miracle that their Lordships suffer'd it to pass at all: And so much of Truth there is in these Assertions, that the Committees of the two Houses met several Times upon it, without coming to any Agreement; inasmuch that the completing of the Bill was put off to the last Hour of the Sessions; and, even then, the Commons were glad to admit of the Lords (e) Amendments, that they might have the Merit, and their Fellow-subjects the Benefit, of so useful a Law.

It is indeed undeniable, that the vehement Spirit which carry'd all before it in the House of Commons, had not the same Ascendancy in the House of Lords; who, except in such Particulars as immediately regarded the Plot, never fail'd to shew, that they were more inclin'd to adopt the Passions of the Court, than humour the Prejudices of the People. In particular, it is observ'd by Mr. Alg. Sydney, that, by the Industry of the Bishops, they had so well penn'd a (f) Bill for banishing the Papists out of London, that, if the Commons had pass'd it without Amendment, all the Nonconformists would be driven out of Town, and half the Shops shut up. But, as it happen'd, the Commons did make the Amendments necessary to prevent this Depopulation; which so rebated the Edge of their Lordships Zeal, that the Bill itself came to nothing.

Papists out of London.

Sydney's Letters, p. 55.

But this different Disposition of the two Houses broke out more fiercely in the several Cases of the Earl of Danby, and the Five popish Lords: And with as brief an Explanation of this Matter, as the Intricacy will admit of, we shall take our Leave of this turbulent Session.

We have already taken notice, that the Earl of Danby had surrender'd himself; and that, by Order of the Peers, he had been committed to the Tower. This was made known to the Commons April 16, and the very next Day they appointed a Committee to prepare Evidence, as also to draw up farther Articles against him, as they should see Cause, who were to sit de die in diem. The Lords also, to be as expeditious on their Side, ordered him to put in his Answer in Writing, to the Particulars already charg'd upon him by the Commons, on the twenty-third; but, afterwards, at his own Instance, indulg'd him to the twenty-fifth; on which Day he deliver'd in his Plea and Answer at the Bar of the House; the last being a solemn Protestation of his Innocence, against every Part and Particle of the Impeachment; and the first, an express Claim of the Benefit of the King's most gracious Pardon; a Copy of which was annex'd: And specify'd, That his Majesty had, under the Great Seal, of his especial Grace, certain Knowledge, and mere Motion, pardon'd, remis'd, and releas'd, to the said Earl, all and all manner of Treasons, Misdemeanors, Felonies, Insurrections, Rebellions, Felonies, Exactions, Oppressions, Publications of Words, Misdemeanors, Confederacies, Concealments, Negligences, Omissions, Offences, Crimes, Contempts, Misdemeanors, and Trespases, whatsoever, by himself alone, or with any other Person or Persons, or by any other, by the Command, Advice, Assent, Consent, or Procurement of the said Earl, advised, commanded, attempted, made, perpetrated, conceal'd, committed, or omitted, before the 27th of February last past, &c. &c.

Earl of Danby
by pleads the King's Pardon.

This Double-dealing of the Earl's occasion'd various Reflections: In particular, it was said, that it was ex Industria perpleca; and that, having the Court and the Lords to favour him, he could not for the Inconsistency of protesting his Innocence, which render'd his Pardon useless, and pleading his Pardon, which was a Confession of his Guilt: But, in truth, the Earl did not lye altogether so open to the Charge of Inconsistency, as is here presum'd: For he did not plead his Pardon as a Skreen for his known Crimes, but a Cover for such Lapses as he might have made thro' Ignorance or Inadvertency. The Words of the Preamble to his Plea are these: "But for that the said Earl is sensible of his own Weakness, in the Management of so great an Office and Employment; and that altho' he knoweth his Heart to be sincere, having never admitted a Thought into it, leading either to Treason, or any other Crimes against his Majesty, the Government, or Religion established; yet that he may have erred out of Ignorance, or Want of Understanding, or Ability to manage an Office of so great Trust, &c. and for that he cannot foresee what Misinterpretation, or severe Construction, may be put upon any of his Actions, &c. and chiefly, that he may not seem to waive his Majesty's Grace and Favour to him, the said Earl, for Plea saith, &c."

With regard to the Reception this Plea met with from the House of Commons, it appears they immediately refer'd it to their Committee

(d) Except in Cases of Treason and Felony, plainly and specially express'd in the Warrant.

(e) When these Amendments were delivered to the Committee of the Commons, by the Lords, Sir Thomas Murray took occasion to say, in Irony, "The Amendments are very many, which are a Sign your Lordships are careful to make to cleave a bill secure." Lords Journ.

(f) The sending this Bill down to the Commons produc'd a Prodig, sign'd by Lord Shaftsbury, and seven other Peers; accompany'd with an Intimation, that there were thousands of Dissenters, who would be faithful to Death, against the common Enemy the Papists: But that the Addition of the Overto to the Tyr, might tempt them to think it their Interest to join with those very Papists against the Church, for their common Security. About the Time, also, that this Bill was under Examination, the Lord above mention'd took occasion to say, "That he would neither live with, nor order, a Papist."

Com. Journ.

Sydney's Letters, p. 40.The Commons demand, whether he will abide by his Plea?

Com. Journ.

Committee of Secrefy: Who, upon the 28th, reported, "That they found no Precedent of any Pardon granted to any Person impeach'd by the Commons of High Treason, or other high Crimes, pending the Impeachment." It grew also to be an establish'd Maxim, both within-doors and without, that the King could not pardon a Man impeach'd by Parliament: And, moreover, That, if he could, this would be of no Value, as being defective in all the Formalities: And, upon these Premises, it was order'd, "That a Message be sent to the Lords, to desire their Lordships to demand of the Earl, whether he would rely upon, and abide by, the Plea of his Pardon? All the shrewd ones presupposing he would abide by it: In which Case, their Trouble, of bringing Proofs to support their Charge against him, would be prevented; and, if his Pardon was deem'd a Nullity, he would be left, without any Plea at all, at the Mercy of his Enemies.

It is not to be presum'd that the Earl was not aware of the Net that was spread for him; and yet, concluding, that, if he kept fast hold of the Prerogative, it would be strong enough to drag him safely thro' it, he made his Appearance again at the Lords Bar, May 3, and express'd himself in these Words: "The Plea I have put in was put in by the Advice of my Council; who tell me that my Pardon is good in Law, and advise me to insist upon my Plea put in; which (g) I now do, and desire that my Council may be heard, to make out the Validity of my Pardon." &c. With which the Lords agreed, and, by Message, gave notice of it accordingly, the same Day, to the Commons; who, on the 5th, taking the said Message into Consideration, "Resolved, That the Pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby was illegal and void, and ought not to be allow'd in bar of the Impeachment of the Commons of England." And, following their Blow, the whole House, with their Speaker at their Head, went up to the Lords Bar; where the Speaker, in the Name of all the Commons of England, demanded Judgment against the said Earl, he standing impeach'd of High Treason, and other high Crimes, and having pleaded a Pardon, which the Commons conceived to be illegal and void.

Nothing could be more artificial than this Procedure of the Commons. It was manifest, that, in condemning the Pardon, they, in effect, condemn'd the Man; and yet they seem'd to leave the Peers in full Possession of their Privilege of Judgment. The Lords, on the other hand, had their Expedients and Resources as well as the Commons; and resolv'd, not only to center the whole Authority of Decision in themselves, but to make sure of such a Decision, as should be favourable to the Prerogative. In order to which, they made an Order the same Day, "That the House, on the Morrow, would take into Consideration, whether the Lords Spiritual were to give their Vote in Judicature, in Cases of Blood, or upon Bill of Attainder, as a Preliminary to the Demand of the Speaker, concerning the Earl of Danby." And tho', upon the Morrow they came to no Resolution on the said pretended Preliminary, they proceeded to fix the following Saturday for the hearing of the said Earl's Council to make good his Plea; as also, to address his Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to appoint a High-Steward to preside on that Occasion; and, moreover, at the Tryals of the five Popish Lords, which were likewise fix'd for the Tuesday following.

The Commons being appriz'd of these hasty Steps, by a Message on the 8th, desir'd a Conference; at which they gave the Lords to understand, 1. That they could not apprehend what should induce their Lordships to apply to his Majesty to constitute a High-Steward; since Judgment might be given in Parliament upon impeachments without one. 2. That there being several other Matters contain'd in the said Message, which, if not settled, might interrupt and delay their Proceedings, the House of Commons did propose, that they might be refer'd to a Committee of both Houses, in order to prevent the Inconveniences which might otherwise arise. And this again being reported to the Peers, by the Lord Privy Seal, who was at the Head of the Managers for the Lords, a long Debate ensued; in the Close of which, it was resolv'd by their Lordships, not to have any such Committee, for the following Reason (which was the next Day signify'd to the Commons at another Conference) viz. Because the Lords did not think it conformable to the Rules and Orders of Proceeding of that Court; which was, and ever must be tender in Matters relating to their Judicature.

Mr. Sydney affirms, that this Vote was carry'd only by two Voices, the one Side having 54, the other 52; that of 18 Bishops that were present, sixteen were on the victorious Side, and only Durham (Dr. Crew) and Carlisle (Dr. Rainsborough) were so humble as to join with the vanquish'd: That of thoir fifty-two, one-and-fifty the next Day protest'd; and that he thought Laziness only hinder'd the Earl of Leicester, who was the other, from doing the same. But if this was true, the Records of Parliament have dropt the Names of thirty-two, and have only left us the nineteen following; Finch, C. Clark, Newport, Eure, Wharton, Arlington, Essex, Stafford,

(g) Concerning this Proceeding of the Earl's, Mr. Sydney writes to Mr. Sewall, as follows:

"We live in a Time, that no Man, by what is past, can well judge what is to be expected for the future: But I am much inclin'd to believe, that Danby, having in his last Act follow'd his own Disposition, that ever delighted in Juggling and Indirectness, will, by the Tricks he hath play'd, have found a Way to hang himself." P. 59, 60.

Again, in another Place, he says, "This Point I only find to be clear, that if the Pardon can be found good, tho' the Formalities are wanting, it will be made good, and the Burthen left upon the Chancellor, that put the Great Seal on to it, without taking care to see them observ'd." P. 41.

(f) The Uneasiness which the Commons shew'd on this Occasion arose from a Jealousy, that the Lords meant thereby to leave it in the King's Discretion to put a stop to all their Proceedings, by refusing or delaying to constitute a Lord Steward.

A. D. 1679. Stafford, Rockingham, Grey, Huntington, Clarendon, Salisbury, Halifax, Newcastle, Bedford, Derby, Dillamore, Paget.

However this may be, the Commons, seeing their favourite Point thus peremptorily wrested out of their Hands, came to a Resolution, "That no Commoner, whatsoever, should presume to maintain the Validity of the Pardon pleaded by the Earl of Donby without their Leave, on pain of being accounted a Betrayer of the Liberties of the Commons of England: And that the Answer of the Lords tendered to the Interruption of the good Correspondence between the two Houses." The next Day (May 10) they, moreover, acquainted the Lords at a Conference, "That things standing as they did upon their Lordships Answer, they could not proceed upon the Tryals of the Lords, before the Methods of Proceedings between the two Houses were adjusted. And this being reported by the Committee to the House, another long and vehement Debate arose; and upon putting the Question to agree to the Proposal of the Commons for removing the Difficulties likely to arise on those Tryals, it again pass'd in the Negative. In the Afternoon of the same Day, they, however, condescended to appoint a free Conference, which was to turn on those very Points, under this single Restriction, "That the Managers of it were not to enter into any Dispute about Judicature." And on the Report of what pass'd thereat, thought fit to condescend yet farther, by receding from their former Votes, and appointing (12) twelve Lords to confer with a double Number of Commons on the several Articles in Dispute.

The Lords
take it ill, and then agree.

The great Controversy between the two Houses, in relation to the Power of the Lords Spiritual and temporal Cases.

The next Day (the 12th) the two Committees met in the Court of Wards, and the Commons open'd the Subject Matter of Conference, by proposing first, That the Tryal of the two Lords should be put off (which was soon settled; both Parties agreeing, that the fixing a Day for that purpose, should be the last thing to be consider'd.) 2. That the Application made by the Lords to the King to appoint a Lord-Steward might be clear'd up: And 3. That the Lords would specify whether the Bishops were to assist at these Tryals or not; all Tryals of the like nature, as they conceiv'd, having been left to the Temporal Lords only. And now the great Difficulty took place. This last Particular manifestly fell within the Injunction which the Lords-Committees had receiv'd concerning Judicature, and was the very thing to be guarded against. They withdrew, therefore, made their Report, and the Lords thereupon, order'd, That the Tryal of the Five Lords should be defer'd till further order; and declar'd, "That the Office of High-Steward was not necessary in Tryals of Peers upon Impeachment, but that the Lords might proceed in such Tryals, tho' a High Steward was not appointed according to their humble Desire. But here they stopp'd short, and left the main Point in dispute undecided, as before. The next Day the two Committees renewing their Conferences, the Commons renew'd their Demand with Relation to the Bishops, and press'd for Satisfaction upon it; and the Lords in their turn, saying, "That it belonged not to the Commons to concern themselves in the constituting Parts of the Court upon such Tryals, but that the Judgment of this Matter belong'd entirely to the Lords;" the Commons reply'd, That Judgment after Tryal was in the Lords; but under this Restriction, that they were not to pronounce, unless at the Demand of the Commons; adding, withal, That if the Bishops were suffer'd to sit on the Tryals then depending, they should not demand Judgment: And, in particular, demanding to be resolv'd, Whether they were to vote on the Validity of the Earl of Donby's Pardon; which was not to be consider'd as a Preliminary, but the very Essence of the Tryal.

The Lords Committees having no Instructions to answer this Question, return'd to their Principals, and reported what had pass'd; upon which the House immediately enter'd into a Discussion of the Claims and Pretensions of the Bishops, and came to a Resolution, "That they had a right to stay in Court in capital Cases, till such time as Judgment of Death came to be pronounc'd: Or, as it was afterwards explain'd, till the Court proceeded to the Vote of Guilty, or Not Guilty.

It is easy to see that all this (h) Contest about the Bishops Vote arose from a Presumption, that their Weight would turn the Scales; and that both Parties were equally certain into which it would be thrown. In order, therefore, to embarrass the Lords as much as possible, the Commons instructed their Committee to insist, "That the Lords Spiritual ought not to have any Vote in any of the Proceedings, upon the Impeachments against the Lords in the Tower; and that they knew not how to proceed in Capital Matters before a new Court:" Which being reported to the Lords, Friday the 16th, their Lordships had the Address to retort the Difficulty, by resolving that the Tryals of the Five Lords should begin on the Tuesday following: After which, the Lords Spiritual, formally, "Ask'd the Leave of the House, that they might withdraw themselves from the Tryals of the said Lords, with the Liberty of entering their usual Protestation."

The next Day the two Committees met again; and the Lords communicating both the said Vote, and the Bishop's Request of Leave, Leave,

(1) viz. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the Marquis of Winchester, the Earls of Salisbury, Clarendon, Essex, and Windsor; the Viscounts Hudford and Newport; and the Lords Wharton and Hallifax.

(2) Edw. Burnet writes of it as follows:

"The Truth was, they [the Bishops] desir'd to have withdrawn; but the King would not suffer it. He was so set on maintaining the Pardon, that he would not venture such a Point on the Votes of the Temporal Lords: And he told the Bishops, they must stick to him and his Prerogative, as they would expect he should stick to them, if they came to be pass'd. By this means they were expos'd to the popular Fury." Vol. 1. p. 462.

Leave, &c. the Commons reply'd, That the Vote of their House extended to the Earl of Danby, as well as to the said Five Lords: That the said Earl's Case was capital as well as theirs: That the Bishops, as they conceiv'd, had no right to be at any one Vote in any capital Case: That the granting Leave to withdraw, imply'd a Right to stay; and that the asserting and admitting of that Right, constituted a new Court, which the Commons could never acknowledge. And in another Conference on the 19th, the Commons signify'd, That they had been farther instructed by their House, to insist on their former Vote, relating to the Lords Spiritual; and also to declare, "That when that Matter should be settled, and the Method of Proceeding adjusted, their House would be ready to proceed on the Tryal of the Pardon of the Earl of Danby, against whom they had already demanded Judgment, and afterwards to those of the other Five Lords in the Tower." To all which they added, that the postponing the Cause of the Earl of Danby to that of the said Five Lords, was inverting the Order they desir'd to follow: That for want of these Tryals, all public Business was at a stand: That tho' the Lords endeavoured to lay the Stop at the Door of the Commons, it lay more properly at their own. (This was rather insinuated than asserted) by appointing a Day for Tryal, before the Parties had settled the Methods of Prosecution, which they hop'd the Lords would give them leave to wonder at: That they had a right to know before what Court they were to appear: That they desir'd to give no Disturbance to the ancient Judicature, which they own'd to be sacred; but that the Lords might as well make the Judges Part of their Court, as the Bishops in this Point.

The 23d they had yet another Meeting, at which the Lords Committees deliver'd to the Commons, by way of Amusement, a Paper of minute Circumstances, to be observ'd in the Forms of the Tryals; which, the Commons receiv'd with an Observation, That the Lords were pleas'd to answer several things not ask'd, and to be silent on those that were; as also, with a Caution, That they received it as a Paper of Propositions, to which they should return no Answer, till the Lords had given them Satisfaction in the great Difficulty relating to the Lords Spiritual. After which they proceeded to say, That the Lords, they thought, had not acted according to the good Correspondence, which ought to have been maintained between the Committees of the two Houses, by appointing a Day for the Tryal of the Five Lords, without any previous Concert with them. "They standing engag'd, that that should be the last thing to be agreed on:" Adding, moreover, That the Commons did not recede from their former Proposal to proceed on the Tryal of the Earl of Danby, before those of the Five Lords: And concluded with two Questions, viz. 1. Whether the Lords intended to enter on the Tryals of the said Lords, without the Consent of the Commons? 2. Whether the Commons were to expect any Answer to their Demand concerning the Bishops, without which it would be to no purpose to continue the Meetings of the Committees any longer?

These Questions were address'd by one House to the other thro' their respective Committees; and, therefore, it was now incumbent on the Lords to speak out, or, at least, to return such Answers, as should exempt themselves from any farther Impunity. Accordingly, after Debate, their Lordships came to the following (1) Resolutions: 1. That it shall be an Instruction to the Lords Committees appointed to meet the Committee of the House of Commons, to let them know, that their Lordships are not empower'd to give any other Answer, than what has been already given concerning the Lords Spiritual. 2. That it shall also be an Instruction, &c. to let them farther know, "That there occur to the Lords Difficulties in the Case of the Earl of Danby, which are not in the Case of the other Five Lords; and that, therefore, the Lords have resolv'd to proceed first to the Tryals of the Five Lords."

The Lords Committees were also, by Order, to let the Commons know, that the Paper of Regulations, before deliver'd by them to the Commons, contained the Orders of the House of Lords de bono esse, preparatory to the Tryals; yet such, that if the Commons have any thing to object, or to offer by way of Addition, the Lords would consider thereof, and do what should be reasonable.

The result of all was, that, on the Signification of these several Particulars to the Commons Committee, they reply'd, that they had receiv'd Instructions from their House, to give no Answer to the Propositions made by the Lords, till the Lords had given an Answer to the Propositions made by the Commons. This was Saturday, May 24; and, on the 26th, the two Committees meeting again, the Commons demanded, whether their Lordships were yet empower'd to give an Answer to their Propositions? The Lords answer'd in the Negative; and so ended the Conference: But the same Day, Sir John Trevor, one of the Managers for the Commons thro' this whole Affair, and others, were sent up to the House of Lords, to desire a Conference upon Matters of great Importance to the Kingdom, and for preserving a good Correspondence between the two Houses: Which being comply'd with, Mr. Sacheverell, in the Name of the Commons, recapitulated all the Particulars already enumerated, with a proper Mixture of such Reflections as might best serve to throw the Blame of all Miscarriages on the Lords; and, for a Close, signify'd, That the Commons found

(1) But not without a Division, and two several Protests, which were sign'd as follows: Buckingham, Huntington, Wiltshire, Grey, Say and Seal, Howard, Darlington, Shaft- found themselves oblig'd not to proceed with the Trials of the Lords; and to adhere to their former Vote, "That the Lords Spiritual ought not to have any Vote in the Proceedings against the Lords in the Tower; and that, when this was adjust'd, they were ready to proceed on Lord Danby's Plea of Pardon;" for the following Reasons:

1. Because your Lordships have receiv'd the Earl of Danby's Plea of Pardon, with a very long and unusual Protestation, wherein he has aspers'd his Majesty, by false Suggestions, as if his Majesty had commanded or countenanced the Crimes he stands charg'd with; and particularly, in suppressing and discouraging the Discovery of the Plot, and endeavouring to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government; which remains as a Scandal upon Record against his Majesty, tending to render his Person and Government odious to his People, against which it ought to be the principal Care of both Houses to vindicate his Majesty, by doing Justice upon the Earl.

2. That setting up a Pardon to be a Bar of Impeachment defeats the whole Use and Effect of Impeachments. For should this Point be admitted, or stand doubted, it would totally discourage the exhibiting any for the future: Whereby the chief Institution for the Preservation of Government would be destroy'd, and consequently the Government itself. And, therefore, the Case of the said Earl, which in consequence concerns all Impeachments, ought to be determined before that of the said five Lords, which is but their particular Case.

And, without resorting to many Authorities of great Antiquity, the Commons desire your Lordships to take notice, with the same Regard they do, of the Declaration made by King Charles I. in his Answer to the Fourteen Propositions of both Houses of Parliament, wherein, stating the several Parts of this regulated Monarchy, he says, "The King, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons have each particular Privileges." And among those which belong to the King, he reckons the Power of Pardoning, after the enumerating of which, and other his Prerogatives, his said Majesty adds this again: "That the Prince may not make use of his high and perpetual Power, to the Hurt of those for whose Good he hath it; and make use of the Name of public Necessity, for the Gain of his private Favourites and Followers, to the Detriment of his People."

"The House of Commons, an excellent Conserver of Liberty, is solely entrusted with the first Propositions concerning the Levies of Monies, and the Impeachment of those, who, for their own Ends, tho' countenanced by any surreptitiously-gotten Command of the King, have violated the Law, which he is bound, when he knows it, to protect; and to the Protection of which they were bound to advise him, at least not to serve him to the contrary."

"And the Lords, being entrusted with the judicatory Power, are an excellent Screen and Bank between the Prince and the People, to assist each against any Encroachments of the other; and by just Judgments to preserve the Law, which ought to be the Rule of every one of the three.

"Therefore, the Power legally placed in both Houses is more than sufficient to prevent and restrain the Power of Tyranny."

3. Until the Commons of England have Right done them against this Plea of Pardon, they may justly apprehend, that the whole Justice of the Kingdom, in the Case of the five Lords, may be obstructed and defeated by Pardons of the like Nature.

4. An Impeachment is virtually the Voice of every particular Subject of this Kingdom, crying out against an Oppression, by which every Member of the Body is equally wounded: And it would prove a Matter of ill Consequence, that the Universality of the People should have Occasion minister'd to them to be apprehensive of the utmost Dangers from the Crown, whereby they of Right expect Preservation.

5. The Commons exhibited Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Danby, before those against the other five Lords, and demanded Judgment upon these Articles: whereupon your Lordships having appointed the Trial of the said Earl to be before that of the other Lords, now your Lordships, having since inverted that Order, give a great Cause of Doubt to the House of Commons, and raise a Jealousy in the Hearts of all the Commons of England, that, if they should proceed upon the Trial of the said Five Lords in the first place, not only Justice would be obstructed in the Case of these Lords, but that they never shall have Right done them in the Matter of the Plea of Pardon, which is of so fatal Consequence to the whole Kingdom, and a new Device to frustrate public Justice in Parliament.

The next Day, these Reasons, and the Recapitulation, which serv'd as an Introduction to them, were a second time read in the House of Lords; a long and vehement Debate ensu'd; and, upon the Issue, a Resolution was taken to insist upon their Vote concerning the Lords Spiritual: Against which, the following Lords entered their Protests, viz. Buckingham, Bedford, Suffolk, Grey, Leicester, Derby, Clare, Huntington, Winchester, Lovelace, Stamford, Searisdale, Delamere, Salisbury, Kent, Rochester, Townshend, Newport, Wharton, Howard, Falconberg, Shaftsbury, North and Grey, Herbert, Say and Seale, Strafford, Paget, Windfor.

We are now come to the last Scene of Newcastle, this wayward Session; for the Ink of this Protest was scarce dry, before the News was brought to the Lords, by the Great Chamberlain, that the King was on the Point of coming to the House, in his Robes; as it prov'd, to prorogue the Parliament: But before we wait upon his Entrance, it is necessary to prepare his Way, by shewing as well what was doing behind the Curtain, as what was perform'd on the Stage.

Bishop Burnet pronounces, "That the Prosecution of the Earl of Danby was the Point on which the Parliament was broken."

And,

Vol. 1. p. 460.

A. D. 1679.

And, according to the Outside of Things, he seems to have Reason on his Side. But we must look deeper.

Sir William Temple takes great Pains to convince the Public, that those who had the Ascendancy at Court were, himself, and the Lords Effix, Sunderland, and Hallifax; and all other Writers speak of the three last, as the great Disposers of all things there; and call their Administration that of the Triumvirate.

But Court-favour, in those Days, had more of the Shew than Substance of Power connected with it: And Lord Shaftsbury, tho' frown'd upon at the Head of the Council-board, while idoliz'd in one House, and dreaded in the other, made himself more formidable to the Ministers themselves than those Ministers were to the rest of their Fellow-subjects: And without Confidence in the King, or Credit in his Council, he work'd up such a Storm against both, as we have seen, that the Triumvirate thought it of the utmost Consequence, almost at any Price, to allay it. In order to which, they form'd a Project to invite him into the first Digestion of Things; and, together with him, the Duke of Monmouth: As a farther Bait, offering to agree with them in the Banishment of the Duke (of York) either for a certain Term, or during the King's Life: Lord Sunderland even undertook to bring Sir William Temple into it; and, when he fall'd in the Attempt, together with his two Associates, pursued the Concert nevertheless, and cabal'd with those two Aspirers, till they found that nothing less would satisfy them than an absolute Surrender of the King into their Hands; and that, even in the mean time, they made use of all their Interest and Power in the House of Commons, to force him out of their Keeping, and make him their own Property ever after.

(By the Advice of the Lords Sunderland, Effix, and Hallifax.)

This open'd the Eyes of the Triumvirate, and instead of leagu'ing with such dangerous Enemies, they thought it their wisest Way to disarm them, by proroguing the Parliament. In this Expedient, it seems, Sir William Temple very readily join'd with them, as foreseeing it would absolutely break the Triumvirate from all farther Commerce with Monmouth and Shaftsbury: And as easy it was to foresee, that when the new Part of the Council was thus broken, the old must again take the Lead, and of course would direct the Current of Power into its former Channel.

When the Resolution to prorogue the Parliament was taken, it was also resolv'd to procure the Sanction of Council for so bold a Measure; which it was thought, would be obtain'd without any Difficulty; one half depending on the King by their Offices, and as many of the rest being under the Influence of the Triumvirate, as join'd to the others, made a sure Majority. Unfortunately, in the midst of this safe Disposition, the Court was alarm'd with sudden News, That there were Remonstrances, says Sir William Temple, ready prepar'd in the House of Commons, to inflame the City and the Nation, upon the Points of the Plot and Popery; or, perhaps, according to the Intelligence sent by Mr. Algernon Sydney to Mr. Saville, That an Address was framing in the City, sign'd by a hundred thousand Men, giving Thanks to the Parliament for their vigorous Proceedings in discovering the Plot, and opposing of Popery, and promising to assist them in so doing, with their Lives and Fortunes. Upon which the King and his three wise Men were struck with such a Panic, or infected to be so, that they would not trust the very Council with their Fears, till by the (m) Prorogation, they had got rid of the Danger. Accordingly, on the very Morning that these dismal Tidings were receiv'd, his Majesty went post to the House of Peers, almost without Attendance, as well as Advice; their Lordships having scarce time to robe, nor the Commons to make their Appearance; and with more Brevity than Accuracy, express'd himself as follows:

(But without the Participation of the Privy Council.)

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I was in good Hopes that this Session King's Speech.
"would have produc'd great Good to the "Kingdom, and that it would have gone
"on unanimously for the Good thereof;
"but to my great Grief, I see there are such "Differences between the two Houses, that
"I'm afraid very ill Effects will come of them.
"I knew but one way of Remedy for the "present, assuring you, that, in the mean "time, I shall shew my Sincerity with the "same Zeal I met you here: Therefore,
"my Lord Chancellor, I command you to "do as I order'd you."

His Lordship, accordingly, prorogued the Parliament on the 14th of August, to the infinite Astonishment, and no less (n) Indignation of the Exclusionists, who express'd their Resentments aloud, and without any Reserve. Lord Shaftsbury, himself, being so far transported, as, even in the Houe, to threaten, That he would have the Heads of Temple's Memoirs, P. iii. p. 538.
those who had been the King's Advisers upon this Occasion. On the other Hand, the

(m) Freyssa writes thus:

"The Votes of deliberating a Popish Successor could by no means be borne with by the Conspirators; therefore, abroad and at home, they now began to possess the King, that it was high time to send them home; their Votes tending to root up all their Designs at one Stroke: And accordingly, from this time, all Diligence was us'd to find an Occasion to break this Parliament: The Duke sent his Messengers every day privately, to hasten their being sent home; and his Friends about the King were very vigilant in setting forth the Danger it would be to the Crown of England, for such an Innovation to be made upon the literal Detent of the Crown: All the Duke's Friends would leave him (the King) and then he had none to stick to, but such as would be still imposing on him; and, by that means, he would be in danger to be serv'd as his Father was; that if he desired the Duke now, it was the Way to exasperate him, and to make other Princes the King's Enemies; and farther, crying to the King the Unkindness to do such a thing to a Brother. Tho' less Arguments would have serv'd the turn, yet more were us'd; so that it was, at last, concluded, their Time of sitting should not be long." Growth of Popery, Part II. p. 242.

(n) "The City of London, where the Anti-Court Party was very strong, took to great Offence, at this, and were so angry, that it was thought they would have risen; but all, with much ado, was hush'd, and kept quiet." Revolvy, p. 96.

A. D. 1679. the Friends and Partizans of the Duke were as much overjoy'd. They were, before, under some Apprehension that the Violence of this Parliament might get the better of the King's Resolution: But now it was apparent that these Apprehensions were without Ground; and that by whose Advice soever his Majesty had acted, they either were in the Interest of, or made their Court to, his Royal Brother. The more Dispassionate, contented themselves with wondering, that his Majesty, in continuing the Privy Council, should publicly promise, that he would have no Cabinet-Council, but that he would in all things follow their Advices, next unto those of his great Council, the Parliament, and that now he should so suddenly prorogue that great Council, without so much as mentioning it to the other.

State of the Government, as left by Lord Danby.

As to the Earl of Danby, tho' he had escap'd out of the Hands of the Commons by the Prorogation, he could not make his Escape out of the Tower: Tho' the King had pardon'd, he could not enlarge him; nor would his Majesty's new Counsellors advise him to strain a Point in favour of one, whom they had sufficient Reason to think, would, in return, ease them of all farther Trouble in his Majesty's Service. To take our Leave of his Administration, Mr. Afternoon Sydney observes, That at his first Entrance into Power, he had engag'd to bring the Parliament into an entire Subjection to the King's Will; to pay off his Majesty's Debts; increase his Revenue, and render him considerable among the neighbouring Princes: "Which are verify'd, says he, in his leaving (a) twenty-two Shillings and Ten-pence in the Exchequer; two-and-forty hundred thousand Pounds of passive Debts, the Revenue anticipated for almost a Year and a half; and the Account his Lordship was pleas'd to give in his Speech to the Peers, of the Fifteen the King of France had for his (Majesty's) Person and Government."

From these Particulars, the Transition is natural to the State of the Government and Kingdom in general; both which had a very melancholly Aspect. Tho' the King's Coffers were empty, his Officers and Servants were as clamorous for their Salaries as if they had been full: And Mr. Sydney also writes, That Lord Danby's Management of the Treasury was not more extreme than (p) Sir Thomas Chicheley's of the Ordnance; for, continues he, besides the Extravagancies of furnishing the French Army with Arms and Ammunition, and that the Stores were fuller two Years ago, than ever they were known to have been; there are now but six hundred Muskets in the Tower, and other things in proportion." Sir John Reresby adds, "That the Carillons were all out of Repair, the Platforms decay'd, the Cannon dismounted, the Army divided, for the Duke of York, and against him; and the Officers of State the same." And what was worst of all, Government had lost its Authority, the Laws their Observance, and the King the Esteem, if not the Affections, of his Subjects. Religion and Liberty on one side; and Loyalty and Submission on the other, had rent the Nation into two desperate Factions; which, in the gross, deserv'd no better Distinctions, than of Slaves and Incendiaries: The one was impatient of all Restraint; the other profess'd to hold no Yoke too heavy: All were Englishmen, all were Christians; yet all forgot those healing Names, and look'd upon Difference of Opinion, as a Warrant for the most uncharitable Censures, for the most provoking Injuries.

Such terrible Symptoms seem'd to argue the Body Politic to be in imminent Danger, and that the Disease was like to prove stronger than the Constitution; Mr. Sydney himself bearing Testimony, "That the Parliament-Men went down discontented, and were like, by their Reports, to add to the Discontents of the Countries, which were already very great; and that the Fears from the Papists at home, and their Friends abroad being added thereto, they began to look more than formerly into the Means of preserving themselves."

P. 79.

We have now more Reason than ever to be particular in the Scottish Affairs; for it appears there was not only an Understanding between the Malcontents of both Kingdoms; but that Advantage was taken of the Communication, to light the Train of that side, in hope it would run by degrees from one end of the Island to the other.

Affair of Scotland.

Scotland, under the Duke of Lauderdale, had really felt all the Grievances and Oppressions that England only fear'd; for which no better Excuses could be assign'd, than the obstinate Fanaticism of the Field Conventicles, and the pretended Necessity of adding Terror to injurious Laws. Oderint dum metuant was his Maxim, as well as Caligula's: And as long as he kept the Peace, by whatsoever Means, the King was resolv'd he should keep his Place. The Complaints prefer'd by the suffering People, had been patroniz'd by the disobligh'd Nobility; and by seeking Redress for them, they hop'd to grow great themselves. But Remonstrances had prov'd feeble Things; and Ways and Means had been found to make their own Parliament rivet their own Chains. The last Resort, therefore, lay in the Parliament of England,

(a) Sir John Reresby bears witness, that Sir Robert Howard, Auditor of the Exchequer, declar'd, in the House of Commons, that there was no Money sufficient for Bread for the King's Family.

(p) Who was about this time dispos'd, and the Master-ship of the Ordnance put into Commission, to gratify other leading Members of the House of Commons: Which gives Mr. Sydney occasion to say, "Some think their Ways of employing many Parliament-men may strengthen the King's Party in the House. Others think, that a King is ever a Loser when he enters into a Faction, and handles against his Subjects: Besides that these Men will lose their Credit; and, having only single Votes, will be overpowered by Numbers." He adds, I do not find the new Privy-Counsellors well at ease; and am not free from Fear, that, while they endeavour to keep fair with both Parties, they may give dispute to both." Syd. Lett. p. 82, 83.

A. D. 1679.

England, and That could no otherwise co-operate, than by redoubling their Efforts against Lauderdale, in order to render him furious in one Kingdom, that the King himself should no longer be able to protect him in the other; or, if his Majesty perished in upholding him against the declared Sense of both, to make the Case of the Seafish People thereby appear so deplorable, and the Conduct of the Government to blameable, that the first should remain wholly excus'd for having Recourse to any Remedy, how desperate soever, and the last without any Excuse at all, for having driven them to such Extremity.

Forty Copies of Ed. Shaftsbury's Speech just to Edinburgh, Edinburgh, Edinburgh, p. 86.

If there is any Truth in what is quoted by Mr. North, authoritatively, from a Tract, called, The Spirit of Psycery speaking out of the Mouths of Janatical Protestants, which says, that forty written Copies of Lord Shaftsbury's Speech, relating to our two Sisters Scotland and Ireland, were sent, the very next Post after it was spoke, to Edinburgh: It must be presum'd, that this was the Plan of Operation agreed upon by the Party Leaders of both Kingdoms. Mr. North, himself, in his warm way, makes no Scruple to say, "It was no other than as a Trumpet Signal to the Scotch, who must needs be bold, when such bold things concerning them had been spoke in the English House of Peers." And the Author of the Tract just quoted, asserts, "the Fanatics grew so insolent and daring upon it, that several loyal Gentlemen wrote up Accounts to what height of Insolence this Speech had blown up the Enemies of the Church and Monarchy; and that they had just Reason to fear, that very dangerous Attempts, if not a downright Rebellion would speedily ensue thereupon." What these Insolencies were, we find no where specify'd: But that some such Incidents as shew'd a Tendency to a Breach, did really happen soon after, cannot be deny'd: For Mr. Algernon Sydney in his Letter to Mr. Saville, of May 5, before quoted, remarks, "That all Scotland was every Day like to be in Arms," which must argue a Disposition to resist, on one hand, as well as a Disposition to oppress on the other.

The Murder

The horrid Assassination of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, which was perpetrated May 3<sup>d</sup>, is, however, the first tragic Scene that can be discours'd of with any Certainty; and even that has been cook'd up as many different ways, as there are different Palates to please. Edward's is express, not only that the Field Conventiclers, had taken their Measures to rebel, under the Encouragement of Lord Shaftsbury's Speech, but "dropt Lists of those Men they design'd should fall by heretical Hands; in the Head of which stood the name of the perjor'd Apollat, Sharp, as they term'd the Primate of Scotland." He also says, that "two Men well mounted and arm'd, enquir'd in the Village where the Archbishop lay, if he was there; and, hearing that he was, immediately rode away." Thus we find him mark'd out for Slaughter, and actually waylaid by his Murderers. If Bishop Burnet deserves Credit, a Party of furious Men riding thro' a Moor near St. Andrews, saw the Archbishop's Coach appear unattended, and concluded, God had deliver'd him into their Hands. Oldmixon, again, [P. i. p. 470.] from the Author of the Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, assumes, "That some late military Executions (he particularizes above 100 Men kill'd in cold Blood, at a Field Conventicle) had so exasperated some resolute Men among the Covenanters; that they resolv'd to take Vengeance on one of their chief Persecutors, the Laird of - - - a cruel, bloody Man.—They had no thought of the Archbishop, who happen'd to be passing in the Road.—And mistaking the Laird, they resolv'd the Archbishop should not escape them." According to Bishop Kennet and others, that Prelate was kill'd by rigid Presbyterians, and Field Conventiclers. According to Mr. A. Sydney, upon Informations from Scotland, he came by his End, thro' a private Quarrel with some Gentlemen, one of whom had been his own Steward, that, by Fraud and Power he had thro' out of their Estates. Edward speaks of him with the Reverence due to a Saint and Martyr. Sydney on the other hand, says, "he was most remarkable for outrageous Covetousness, and other Episcopal Qualities. And with these Minutes of Sydney's, in the main, agrees the most circumstantial, and most natural (g) Account

A. D. 1679. The death of St. Andrews.

(g) "Our Lord of Cauchie, being Vassal to the Bishops of St. Andrews; the late Archbishop, upon the account of some few Dates relating to him, did get to his own Behold the Bishop of Cauchie, in prejudice of his numerous Family, and many Creditors. One Hastings of Rochester being one of these Creditors, and at that time a Favourite of the Archbishop, prevailed with him; upon his giving Bond to the Bishop for 1000*l*. Scots, or thereby, to sign the Gift in his Favour. Thereafter the Archbishop, conceiving Prejudice against him, registr'd Hastings's Bond, forcipus too at St. Andrews, having call'd for him, takes him with Captivity, and keeps him Prisoner in St. Andrews for several Months, until one Mr. Falconnor, a conformist Minister, obtains his Liberty. But Hastings, having stronger Remorsements of his Imprisonment than of the Liberty to which he was releas'd, at his Liberation, in presence of Witnesses, vowed and swore, God damn him, if ever he went in Church so long as there was a Bishop in Scotland; and that, if he liv'd, he should be revenged on the Bishop's Prejice.

This Hastings was a vile Person, had nothing of good in him, and was force admitted to the Society of sober Men; he was once not only a Favourite, but Servant of the Bishop, having collected Part of his Rents. However now, the Archbishop (who was Enemy to any thing that had Interest in Hastings's) command'd Captain Cochran, Gorret, and one Scarle a Tinker, to apprehend John Walker of Kilbride, Brother-in-law to the said Hastings (so Prelate, tho' an Enemy to the Bishop, upon the Injury done to Hastings his Brother-in-law) who related the said Cochran, and wounded some of them; and thereupon was cited before the Council (though Cochran had no Warrant to apprehend him, only to graze the Bishop's) where not daring to appear, he is detourn'd and intercomman'd, and made a Stranger to his own House for two Years; wherewith, and with the Robbing and Spoiling committed by Balfour Cornhill, the Secret-Council's Sheriff departs in 1579, the said Hastings and Balfour, being arrayed and inflamed with the Deive of Revenge upon the Archbishop, they did, upon the 31<sup>d</sup> of May Instant, with eight or nine other Ruffians (three of whom, as they say, Balfours) with his Return from Edinburgh to St. Andrews, and there, near a House call'd Mayno, in an open Place, and within two Miles, or thereby, of St. Andrews, they surpris'd him; the Coachmen and Postmen perceiving, advertise him, and drive with all their might to escape; so that for near three Quarters of a Mile they could not overtake them: At last, Balfour and Hastings being better mounted Assassinations upon whom, or by whomsoever committed, can neither be stigmatiz'd nor punish'd too severely: Considering, therefore, the Rank of him who fell thus miserably, and the shocking Insult thereby offer'd both to the Government and Laws of Scotland, nothing could be more fit or necessary than to issue an immediate Proclamation for apprehending the Murderers. Such a Proclamation was accordingly issued the very next Day after the Murder was committed: But therein the Fact is mark'd on the Fanatics; which is the more remarkable, inasmuch, as that very Proclamation avows an utter Ignorance of the Persons concern'd in it; and actually offers a Pardon and ten thousand Marks to any one of the Assassins who should discover his Accomplices. The first Steps of Rage and Fury are into Absurdity: And as that Proclamation every where abounds, with the hiss Rancour, it abounds every where, also, with the like Indictions. From the Murder of the Archbishop, it makes a Transition to the Field Conventiclers, salutes them in the usual Stile of Rendezvous of Rebellion, and Forgers of all bloody and unjustical Principles; and in the mid Phrenzy of Inveective, publishes to the whole World, that the present Disorders of Scotland were as much owing to the Rigour of the Government, as the Obstinacy of the People.

Advantage was yet further taken of the general Horror excited among all Ranks of People by the Murder of the Archbishop, and the open Resort of the Populace to their Field-Meetings, in Defence of the King's Forces, as well as his Edicts, to set forth yet another Proclamation; by which it was declar'd Treason to be at any of the arm'd Field-Conventicles; and orders were given to the Soldiery to fall upon all Persons so assembled, as Rebels declar'd, and put them to the Sword.

Being thus made desperate by the Laws, when without Defence, and by all the Violence of military Excursion, when arm'd for their own Security; encourag'd, no doubt, underhand, by their own discontented Nobility, and taught, that the Situation of Affairs in England was extremely favourable to them, they broke out into open Rebellion; a small Party of about eighty of them, on the 29th of May, proclaiming the Covenant, at (r) Rutberghs or Raglan, as 'tis call'd by Edward, burning the several Acts of Parliament, by which Prebrytery was abolish'd, and Prelacy re-establish'd, the Covenant condemn'd, &c. prefixing a Manifesto at the Market-Cross, and endeavouring to do the same at Glasgow, but without Success; a superior Number of the King's Forces obliging them, for that time, to give over their Design.

This, however, was but a Prologue to what follow'd. On Sunday the first of June they rendezvous'd upon Louden-Hill, says Edward, being increased to near 500 Men, well arm'd, in good Order. Says Oldmixon (still following his Scotch Author, before quoted) there was a very great Meeting of perfected People in the Fields near Louden-Hill; by Report, of many Thousands, their Intention to have the Community, and to make it both a Day of Humiliation and Rejoicing. But hearing Captain Grabme of Cleavercaise, afterwards Viscount Dundee, was coming to disperse them, about (1) 200 arm'd with Fire-Arms, resolv'd to cover the Field and defend the rest of the Community.

They were the different Representations of the two Parties: But all agree, That the said Captain Grabme did attack them, and was repuls'd, with the Loss of about thirty out of three hundred Dragoons, with which he made his Onset. Elate with this Success, the Covenanters, the next Day, push'd on to Glasgow once more: Which the Royalists now, very complacently, abandon'd to their Mercy. Here they made Proclamation, that they fought against Supremacy, Popry, and Prelacy; and issued their Commands to the Magistrates, to turn out all the Archbishops, Bishops, and Curates, their Bains, and Servants, and all Families and Servants concern'd in the King's Army, within forty-eight Hours, under the highest Pains. They are also said to have committed many Outrages, both in the Town and Parts adjacent; but none are particulariz'd, with sufficient Authority to entitle them to a Repetition: And if it may be presum'd mounted them the rest, Balfour comes up with the Postillon, commands to stop, and, he refusing, strikes him over the Face with his Sword, dismounts him, and disorders the Coach horse; Harlow comes to the Coach, and fires several Pistols at the Bishop; but none of them, altho' they hit his Body, did pierce him; they pierced through his Cloath, but he only felt smart Marks upon his Body, somewhat like to Burning.

Whereupon Harlow drags him out of his Coach, strikes him over the Left-eye with a deep Wound, who thereupon fell; and gave him several other mortal Strokes upon his Head, and Cut in his Arms; rides his Pookan, and his Daughters (who was with him in the Coach) of their Gold Watches and Rings, disarms his Servants, without hurting any except the Postillon, who was wounded at first; and that his Daughter receiv'd a Wound on her Thumb, grasping to save her Father; and then flee all together.

This is the Account, both of the Persons, the Occasion of their wicked Act, and the Circumstances of the Act itself. Which is discover'd and made known by the Examination of the Bishops own Servants upon Oath, and a Servant of the House near the Place where the Fact was done, whose Har- low and Balfour left their Coats before they attack'd the Bishop; and, after it was done, came and brought them away.

The Bishops Servants depone, that a Man, mounted on a bay Horse, struck the Postillon, and turn'd the Coach; and that he mounted on the white drag'd the Bishop out of the Coach, and kill'd him with his Sword.

And the Servant in the House depone, that it was John Balfour of Kilbrack was mounted on the bay Horse, and Harlow that was mounted on the white. That these two Persons had a personal Spire and Harved at the Bishop, for the Cause before, all know, and the Records witness: That the Bishops did not pierce his Body, was seen by the Chirurgion, William Westwell, who was sent by the Council to view his Body. [Out of the Collection of Sir Thomas Weldon.]

(r) This is disputed by Mr. Oldmixon, in contradiction to Mr. Edward: But the Truth was so.

sum'd that their Actions corresponded with their Professions, set forth in their second (1) Declaration at Hamilton, their Treasures were far from being as heinous as their Sufferings had been grievous.

Earl of Linlithgow returns, and leaves the Country in their Hands.

The Defeat of Grabme, and the taking of Glasgow, in the mean while, so alarm'd the Council at Edinburgh, that they sent the Earl of Linlithgow, with a Body of a thousand Foot and four hundred Horse and Dragoons, in quest of the Enemy, who return'd without daring to look them in the Face, either thro' Fear, as some suggested, or as others, that the Rebels might have time to fall into such Excesses, as might serve to justify those of Lauderdale's Administration. * Thus, says Bishop Barnet, the Country was left in their Hands; and if there had been any Designs or Preparations made formerly for a Rebellion, now they had time enough to run together and to form themselves: But it appear'd; that there had been no such Designs,

(1) It was express'd in these Words:

"As it is not unknown to a great Part of the World, how happy the Church of Scotland was, whilst they enjoy'd the Ordinances of Jesus Christ in Purity and Power; of the which we have been deplorably deprived by the Re-establishment of Popery: So it is evident, not only to impartial Persons, but so professed Enemies, with what unparalleled Patience and Constancy the People of God have endured all the Cruelty, Injustice and Oppression, that the Will and Malice of Prelates and Malcontents could invent and exercise. And being most unwilling to let any thing which might inspire Opposition to lawful Authority, or engage the Kingdom in War, although we have all along been groaning under the overturning the Work of Reformation, Corruption of Doctrine, flight of Worship, despising of Ordinances, the changing of the ancient Church-discipline and Government, thrusting out of us many of our faithful Ministers from their Churches, confining, finally imprisoning, exiling, yea and putting to death many of them, and intruding upon their Flocks a Company of inefficient and scandalous Priests, and Sings, confining, imprisoning, torturing, tormenting, scourging, and flagellating poor People, plundering their Goods, quartering upon them rude Soldiers, selling their Persons to foreign Plantations, houses, and intercommuning many of both sexes, whereby great Numbers in every Corner of the Land were forced to leave their Dwellings, Wives, Children, and Relations, and made themselves as Plighted to the hands of their Lives, some daring to resist, labour, or supply (tho' Barren) or so much as to speak to them, even upon Death-bed, without making themselves obnoxious to the same Punishments; and their things cited under colour of Law, in effect tending to banish, not only all Sense of Religion, but also to extinguish natural Affection, even amongst Persons of the nearest Relation: And likewise passing under the intolerable Yoke of Oppression in our civil Liberty, our Bodies, Liberties, and Estates; so that all manner of Oppresses have been most arbitrarily exercised upon us through a Tract of several Years past a particularity to the Year 1678, by sending amongst us an armed Host of barbarous Savages, contrary to all Law and Humanity; and by laying upon several Impositions and Taxes, as formerly, so of late, by a Meeting of pre-ordained and over-aw'd Members in the Convention of Estates in July 1678, for keeping up of an armed Force, harried (as to a great Part of it) into the Hands of several Rapists, or a ravouser of them; by whom bloody Injuries have been made upon us, and most enormous Abuses, and incredible Injustices, committed against us: And we being continually sought after, while Meetings in Houses for divine Worship; Ministers and People frequently apprehended, and most rigorously used; and so being necessitated to attend the Lord's Ordinances in Fields, in the most desert Places; and there also often hunted out, and distressed, to the Effusion of our Blood, and killing of some, whereby we were inevitably constrain'd, either to defend ourselves by Arms at these Meetings, or be altogether deprived of the Gospel preach'd by the faithful Ministers, and made absolute Slaves. At one of which Meetings, upon the first Day of June Instant, being the Lord's day, Captain Grabme of Clonsilla, being warranted by a late Proclamation to kill whomsoever he found in Arms at Field-conferences making Resistance, did furiously assault the People assembled; and, further to provoke, did cruelly bind like Beasts, a Minister, with some others, whom he had that very same Morning found in Houses: And several being killed on both Sides; they knowing certainly, that by Law they behaved (if apprehended) to die: They did stand to their own Defence, and continue together; and thereafter many of our Friends and Countrymen being under the same Oppression, expecting the same Measure, did freely offer their Assistance: We therefore, thus inevitably, and of absolute Necessity, forced to take this last Remedy, (the Magistrates having first the Door by a Law against Application, that whatever our Grievances be, either in Things Civil or Sacred, we have not the Privilege of a Supplicator to judge ourselves bound to declare, that there, with many other horrid Grievances in Church and State (which we purpose to manifest more fully hereafter) are the true Causes of this our intemperate and bloody State: And we do most solemnly, in the Presence of Almighty God the Searcher of all Hearts, declare, That the true Reasons of our continuing in Arms civilly and sincerely are these:

But tho' there was no regular Project of Rebellion on foot, there certainly was to work up such Troubles in Scotland, as should oblige the King to dismiss Lauderdale, and put the Administration into other Hands.

This has been intimated already; and becomes farther apparent, from the Circumstances that follow.

Lord Shaftsbury's personal Attack on that Duke in the House of Peers, having prov'd against him in the House of Commons, May the 8th: And soon after, the Duke of Hamilton, who was commission'd to accuse him in the Name of his Country, arriv'd in London with

A. D. 1679.

Circumstances that argue they were countenanced by greater than themselves.

Duke of Hamilton comes to London to accuse Lauderdale a great deal.

1. The defending and securing of the true Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Government, founded upon the Word of God, and justly comprehended in our Confessions of Faith, and Catechisms, and established by the Laws of this Land, in which, King, Nobles, and People, are solemnly sworn and engaged, in our National and Solemn League and Covenant; and, more particularly, the defending and maintaining the single Authority of our Lord Jesus Christ over his Church, against all sinful Supremacies derogatory therein, and invading thereof.

2. The protecting and defending, the King's Majesty, his Person, and Authority in the Preservation and Defence of that true Religion, and Liberties of the Kingdom; that the World may see witness with our Conferences of our Loyalty; and that we have no Thought nor Intention to diminish his just Power and Greatness.

3. The obtaining of a free and unlimited Parliament, and a free General Assembly, in order to the redressing our forefend Grievances, for preventing the imminent Danger of Popery, and extirpating of Popery from amongst us.

This shortness being the Cause we appear for, and resolve in God's great Name to swear, hereby signifying all the Testimonies of faithful Sufferers for the Faith in Scotland these eighteen Years bygone: We humbly request the King's Majesty would revive all things as if found them, when God brought him home to his Crown and Kingdom; and if that cannot be obtained, then we heartily and humbly desire, inter, breach and obtain, in the Bowels of Jesus Christ, all who are under the same Bonds with us, to concur in the Defence of this common Cause and Interest: That that they will not stand still and see not only us oppressed, but this fortial Cause call'd; Adversaries highly and proudly inflat against God, and all good Men, Friends of the Truth discouraged; yea the Prominent Cause in Britain and Ireland, and even yourselves within a little time made a Prey of, or else forced, when we are broken (which the good Lord prevent) dreadfully to wrong your Conscience. Finally, because we desire no Man's Hurt or Blood, we request our Countrymen, now the bloody cover of this Kingdom, some of them being our Friends and Kinsmen, not to fight against us, left in doing they be found fighting against the Lord, whose Cause and Cause we are sure he will own, and finally conscience, being we fight under His Banner, who is the Lord of Hosts." [Out of the Collection of Lord Somers, &c.]

The same Gentleman also, in many of his Letters, more than hints, that there was some Management in the whole Affair: To some of these we shall refer in their Place; at present it will be sufficient to shew, that, June 9, speaking of the Doubts which had arisen, whether it was a laid Business, or a sudden Tumult, he throws a farther Light on the Passage before quoted in his Letter of May 5, by adding, "I know not the Truth of this; but the Discourses I have heard, very often of late, of those who, every Day, expected some such thing, persuade me to believe, it is not fallen out by chance."

Duke Hamilton, and other Scotch Lords, undertake to suppress the Disorders of Scotland, without Bloodshed. P. 95, 96.

Something may, also, be gather'd from the use that was made of it, when the News was brought to Court. On which Occasion, Mr. North writes, that a Council being call'd for the solemn Consideration thereof. Lord Russell stood up, and began a Speech, saying, "He was so far from wondering, that this Trouble happen'd now, that he rather wonder'd it did not happen long ago, since his Majesty thought fit to retain Incendiaries near his Person, and in his very Council."—He was going on, when the Duke of Lauderdale, supposing, he intended to urge to the King, the Matter of the Parliamentary Addresses against him, stood up, and said, "That he did not know but this Debate might terminate in him; therefore, if his Majesty pleas'd, he would withdraw." To which the King reply'd, with a Motion of his Hand, No, no; sit down my Lord; this is no Place for Addresses." 'Tis for the sake of this Point, that Mr. North relates this Occurrence: And if Lord Russell's Introduction shews the great Drift of running down Lauderdale, his Majesty's Refusal rather shews his Purpose to countenance him against all Opposition, than his (w) Conviction that he did not deserve it.

Sir William Temple is, moreover, express, That Lord Shaftsbury shew'd plainly at Council, and in other Places, that he was unwilling this Riving should be wholly, or soon suppress'd; or otherwise than by his Friends in Scotland, who might, thereby, be introduc'd into the Direction of Affairs there, with the Removal of the Duke of Lauderdale.

Who these Friends of Lord Shaftsbury's were, &c. is thus made clear by Mr. Algernon Sydney; who says, "The Scotch Lords, that are here, endeavour'd to persuade the King, that the Business might be done by far more certain, and less chargeable ways (than by raising Forces) inasmuch as those Men having been driven into a Necessity of taking Arms, by the extreme Pressures suffered from those that did abuse the Authority his Majesty had trusted them with, the People being eas'd of those Burthens, the Persons remov'd that had caus'd them, and such Men plac'd in the Government, as were acceptable to the Nation; they durst undertake that all might be compos'd without Blood."

But however plausible this Proposal was in itself, or agreeable to Lord Shaftsbury's Politics, as it met with no Countenance from the King, he was oblig'd to drop it; and this he did so much the more willingly, as his Majesty was inclin'd to trust the Duke of Monmouth with the chief Command of all the Forces, as well Scots as English that were to be employ'd in this Expedition: And as he knew all the Greatness or Popularity that his Grace might acquire, either by his Clemency or Valour, would be of equal Importance to their Common Cause. Like a true Politician, however, having gain'd this one Point for his Hero, and made a notable Push for (x) another, viz. The Establishment of a Body Guard for the King, to be compos'd of broken Officers and such other Persons as the Duke of Monmouth should recommend, under his Grace's own Command, he put in practice another notable Device to carry a third; which was to retard the military Preparations here, that the Covenanters might have more time to gather Strength and grow formidable; and that he himself might have a larger Field to scatter the Seeds of Discord, and propagate Confusion.

The Means he had Recourc'd to on this Occasion, was to start a Doubt, whether the marching a Military Force into Scotland was lawful. According to Mr. North, the Difficulty arose, as it was urg'd, from the Pacification Treaty made in the Reign of King James I. in which it is articul'd, "That neither Kingdom should hostilely invade the other." But Mr. Sydney, who mentions the same Scruple, finds it on the Acts pass'd in both Kingdoms in the Year 1641, which make it Treason for any Person belonging to either to make War upon, or invade the other, without the Consent of Parliament. He also intimates, That one or two of the Judges gave it as their Opinion, That the Acts being reciprocal, and the Scots having rescind'd theirs, ours fell of course; or if it did not, that the Act forbidding an Invasion, no ways affected such as by the King's Command, should march to subdue Rebels: But that others, on the contrary, said, That what the Scots did, might indeed, give the Parliament of England a just Ground of annulling their Act also; but not having done it, no Man could doubt but it remain'd in force; and that whatsoever march'd against Scotland, would incur the Penalties of Treason, denounced by it. He, moreover, adds, that some of those who were present when this Distinction between Involving and Subduing Rebels Rebels was made, were so far from being fitis'd with it, that they continu'd to urge, That the Parliament (of 41) finding they had, upon the like Pretence, been engag'd against Scotland in the Years 1638 and 39, made this Act expressly to hinder any such Business as that then depending; and to take care that England should not again be engag'd against Scotland, without the Consent of Parliament; which was also the Reason why the Act was continu'd in Force on our Side, tho' it was dissolved on theirs.

Many Prisons of Rank offer'd to serve. (ib. p. 95.)

Every body can see the vain Curiosity of these Allegations: The out-law'd Covenanters, could in no sense, be called the Kingdom of Scotland; and the Forces destin'd to march against them, went as Auxiliaries instead of Invaders. The Government of Scotland had call'd for them, and they had every kind of Authority for their Warrant: Notwithstanding which, the Lord Grey of Wark, who was to command the Horse, resign'd his Commission: Mr. Thyne refus'd to take any; Lord Cavendish declin'd raising any Men upon his; and the Lord Brandon-Gerrard, declar'd he would not serve, unless the Commissioners of the Treasury made his Levies for him, and provided Money for their Pay.

Duke of Monmouth sets out for Scotland.

So many Difficulties occurring in the forming an Army here against the Brethren of Scotland, a sudden Resolution was taken to send the Duke of Monmouth post to his Command, and to make Expedition supply the place of Strength. This disconcerted all Lord Shaftsbury's Measures again; and all that remain'd to be done, at least at the Council Board, was to procure such a Commission for the General, as should leave him at Liberty either to fight or treat, as he thought good. "By which," says Mr. North, it had been easy upon Pretence of treating, to have collud'd with the Enemy, and to kept the War on foot, till, perhaps, it had been seconded from England, and then he had had a notable Game to have play'd for himself." The same Author adds, upon this Occasion, the following remarkable Particulars:

Remarkable in Council relating to his Orders.

"Diverts of the good-natur'd (if not fearful) Persons at the Board, approv'd of such a Trust in the General; for why, said they, should so much Blood, and of those delid-ed Miserables, be spilt, if they are willing to lay down their Arms on fit Terms? Very few, if any, spoke to the contrary, and the Duke of Lauderdale, whose chief Care it was, said not one Word; and so the Orders were taken to be fixed, and the (y) Party-Advices to Friends abroad went forth accordingly. When the King rose from Council, the Duke of Lauderdale follow'd him into the Bedchamber, where, having him alone, he ask'd his Majesty, if he intend'd to follow his Father? Why, said the King? Because, Sir, said the Duke, you have given that General Orders to treat; the Consequence of which is encouraging and enlarging the Rebellion in Scotland, and raising another, by Consent, in England, and then you are lost. Therefore, if you do not change your Orders, and send them positive to fight, and not to treat, the Mischiefs that befall your Father-in-like Case, will overtake you. Why did you not, said the King, urge this in Council? The Duke answer'd suddenly, Were not your Enemies in the Room? This touch'd the King so sensibly, that, getting the better of his Propensity to favour, and (under that Notion) to trust the Duke of Monmouth, he caus'd the Orders to be altered, and made as the Lord Commissioner advis'd; and, withal, adding this Instruction, that the Orders were not to be open'd, but at a Council of War, and in Sight of the Enemy; and this was done so privately, that none of the Faction so much as smelt it out.

In following Party-Writers, tho' we may see Cause to adopt their Facts, we ought to be cautious as to their Inferences. According to Mr. North, the King had but one Friend in his whole Council; who was the very Man that by his Oppressions and Cruelties had kindled this Flame in his Dominions; and his Majesty is to be applauded for being directed by him singly against all the rest; for rushing from the Extreme of Credulity to the Extreme of Rigour; and for ordering thousands of ignorant Enthusiasts to be sacrific'd, when he had so lately valued himself upon his Tenderness in Matters of Blood, in the Case of the condemn'd Papish Priests: But, surely, if this only Friend of his had advis'd a middle Course, viz. To limit the Proffers of Grace and Pardon, on their returning to their Duty, to the short Space of twenty-four Hours; to accompany those Proffers, with an Intimation, that the Severities hitherto exercis'd upon them, should be softened for the future; and, in case of Non-acceptance only, to let loose the Sword, his Majesty had been equally secur'd; his Enemies had been equally disappointed; and such of his Subjects as refus'd his Mercy, had fallen under his Vengeance, and dy'd the Victims of their own Obstinacy.

To return. The Duke of Monmouth did not set out for Scotland till the 5th of June; and before the 23d (possibly the Secret relating to the Change of Orders having in that Interval transpir'd) a Petition was prepar'd in London, in order to be presented to the King; which, as we are told by Mr. Sydney, was to be sign'd by many Lords, Gentlemen, and all the principal Householders of the City; and which turn'd on the following strange Particulars: 1. It put his Majesty in mind, that an Army had been rais'd on Pretence of a War with France, which had been kept up by Lord Danby's Means, contrary to an Act of Parliament, as a standing Army. 2. It mention'd the English and Scottish Acts of Parliament, which made it Treason for the Subjects of either Kingdom to invade the other, other, or the Subjects thereof; and authoriz'd all other Subjects to fall upon and destroy such as should, in any time, attempt to do it, as Rebels and Traitors. 3. It undertook to shew the dangerous Consequences of forcing the Protestants of his Kingdoms to imbrue their Hands in each other's Blood, if, according to the Rumour spread of a War in Scotland, any Forces should, contrary to the Act, march against them. And 4. It desir'd his Majesty to put an end to their Fears in that Point, compose Matters in that Kingdom, suffer the Parliaments to meet the 14th of August, bring Dunby and others to their Trials, and order the disbanding of the Army and other new-raisd Forces.

Battle of Bothwellwell-Bridge.

Having thus mention'd this remarkable Incentive, which had to apparent a Tendency to blow the Flames already broke out in one Kingdom, and to kindle the like in the other; we are next to follow the Duke of Monmouth into Scotland; who finding now his Merits would be rated according to his Services, made such Speed, that he arriv'd at Edinburgh the 18th, and the next Day put himself at the Head of the King's Forces: It was not, however, till the 22d, about Day-break, that his Vanguard came in sight of the Enemy; who were already drawn up in two Bodies, and had posted themselves not unskillfully behind the River Clude; over which there was no Passage but by a Bridge, called Bothwell-Bridge; and that they had taken care to barricade up with Stones. And now the Conduct of the Covenanters themselves bore witness, that they had better Intelligence than is usual to be found among such a Rabble, tho' it serv'd only to lure them on to their Destruction: For having beat a Parley, and sent a (2) Petition to the Duke, requesting safe-conduct for some of their Number, to lay open their Hearts, &c. and his Grace having granted it, one of their Ministers of the Name of Hume, and another Person, came over as Deputies for the rest; and being call'd upon by the Duke to unfold their Commission, Hume said, "They were inform'd that his Grace was a merciful Man, and one that had Power to do them Good."

The Duke answer'd, "He should be glad to prevent the Effusion of Blood; and, to that End, was willing to hear what it was they desir'd." Hume then produced the (2) Declaration before-quoted, and having read it, by his Grace's Leave, said, "Their Demands were contained therein." The Duke's Reply was to this Effect, "That, in having Patience to hear such a Libel against the King's Person and Government read thro', he had given them a sufficient Proof of his Clemency and Forbearance; that he could not possibly agree to any one Article in it; and that he had a much shorter Proposal to make to them, which was, That if they would immediately lay down their Arms, and submit themselves to his Majesty's Mercy, his Majesty's Forces should not fall upon them." Hume reply'd, "It was impossible to be comply'd with, for that it was requiring them to lay their Heads upon the Block." His Grace then directed him to take a View of his Forces, and to reflect, whether such a Sight was not capable to make them alter their Resolutions. Hume, in his turn, refer'd the Duke to his Covenanters, and briskly said, "That every Man he saw there would die in the Place where he stood, in defence of the Covenant." His Grace then made this short Rejoinder, "That a few Minutes would show that: The other Deputy, who had hitherto kept silence, pleaded for a Cessation of Arms for one Day; and being told, that no such Favour could be granted by the King's Troops to Rebels, reduced his Demand to a Quarter of a Hour: But the Duke clos'd the Conference, by advising them to go and consider of what he had said, and send him their Proposal in Writing; adding, "That, when he heard their Drum, he would allow a Respite to read their Paper, tho' the Fight should be begun." Thus ended the Parley; after which, his Grace order'd his Cannon to advance to the high Ground opposite to the Bridge, and the necessary Dispositions to be made for opening the Attack: All which being completed, and the Gunners preparing to give fire, a second Parley was beat, and a second Pa-

The humble Supplication of the Nonconformists, in the Welch, and other Places of this Kingdom, now in Arms, in their own Names, and in the Name of all the rest of they who adhere unto as in this Church and Kingdom of Scotland,

Sheweth,

That we, the Presbyterians of the Church and Kingdom of Scotland, being, by a long-continued Tract of Violence and Oppression upon us, in our Lives, Liberties, Fortunes and Consciences, and without all Hope of Remedy; and being cut off from all Access of petitioning, and that by an Act of Parliament of yours, forth our just Grievances and Complaints; and our Lives being made to bitter by cruel Bondage, as that Death seem'd more eligible than Life (the Cause whereof we have partly mentioned in our Declarations) and being by unavoidable Necessity driven into the Field in Arms in our own innocent Self-defence, and now looking on it as a most favourable Providence, that your Grace is come amongst us at such a time (of whole princely Clemency, and natural Goodness, and Aversion from shedding Christian Blood we have to favour a Report) we accept with all Thankfulness to God of this Opportunity, to lay before your Grace our sad Grievances and humble Request: all which we know will be misrepresented to your Grace, by such as have seditiously, yet without any just Grounds except in the Matters of our God, been the principal Authors of our sad and deplorable Sufferings.

May it therefore please your Grace to grant Liberty under safe-conduct, to some of our Number, to address themselves to your Grace, to lay open our Hearts in this Matter, that some freely and effectual Redress may be by your Grace's Favour and Authority made, to the establishing of the Nation's Peace: In doing whereof your Grace will do that which is most agreeable to the Son, commendable Presence of all the Blessings and Rains that threaten the poor Land; yea, and we doubt not, shall bring upon you the Blessings of many Thousands, Men, Women, and Children, who not with us, yet sincere Lovers of us, sympathize with us, and Favourers of our righteous Cause: That the good Lord may incline your Grace's Heart to this, is the humble Request of per deliver'd; the Contents of which were to this Effect, "That they had considered what had been said, but could agree to nothing less than what was in their Declaration; that they understood his Grace had brought with him from England some TERMS of ACCOMMODATION; and that if he pleas'd to communicate them, he should have their Answer, if they were such as they could accept." The Duke's Reply was, "That he had expected a more satisfactory Answer; and that they might recal their Officers from the Bridge, who were come down thither on account of the Parley, and look to themselves, for now they should hear from him in another manner."

Your Grace's humble Supplicator,

R. HAMILTON,

In the Name of the Covenanted Army now in Arms.

The Cannon were soon after ordered to fire; which they did; and the Complement was return'd with so fierce a Volley from the Bridge, that the Gunners were, at first, driven from their Guns; and if that Advantage had been as discreetly follow'd, as it had been gallantly obtain'd, the Troubles of Scotland had, perhaps, not ended with that Day: But instead of this, they suffer'd the Gunners to return to their Posts again; as also Major Ogilthorpe to throw up a Trench on the Edge of the Hill, to cover his Men; and no sooner did the Cannon begin to play a second time, than they began to give ground: Upon which, his Grace commanded the said Major to take possession of the Bridge, which he did; and the Enemy continuing to retire, his Men could not be hinder'd from pursuing them up the rising Ground on the other Side; the Consequence of which was, that they, perceiving how slender a Party they had to deal with, faced about, and forced their Pursuers to take shelter in the Houses at the Foot of the Bridge: By which time, the Duke having seasonably reinforced the Major with 300 Foot, and following himself at the Head of his own Guards, the Covenanters turn'd their Backs once more; but drew up again on Hamilton-Heath, at a Quarter of a Mile's Distance, where they made such another Disposition to renew the Fight, as argued they were under the Direction of Men not unvers'd in the Art of War. In few Words, they renew'd the Charge, broke a Body of Highlanders appointed to receive their Onset, and seem'd resolv'd to answer the Character Hume had given of them: But the Duke's Cannon, which seems to have been of singular Service to him in this Day's Adventure, again got the better of their Bravery; and that so effectually, that they could rally no more. What followed, was Flight and Slaughter; seven or eight hundred were kill'd on the Spot, and twelve hundred more taken Prisoners; who, by the Duke's express Command, were treated with all the Humanity which good Men feel, and cunning Men affect; and which they had never had any Taste of from Power before. The rest of the Fugitives were so dispers'd over the Face of the Country, that scarce the Name of the Party was left.

Bishop Burnet's Account of this Action differs widely from (b) that publish'd by Authority, upon which this is founded. He says, the Covenanters had neither the Grace to submit, nor the Sense to march away, nor the Courage to fight it out; but threw down their Arms, at the first Charge, and ran away. He also adds, that, when the Duke of Monmouth gave Order for stopping the Execution, some mov'd that all Prisoners should be kill'd on the Spot; that the Duke of York afterwards talk'd of his Lenity, as if it was a Bait for Popularity, and a Neglect of the King's Service; that his Majesty himself told his Grace, That if he had been there, they should not have had the Trouble of Prisoners: And that the Duke reply'd, He could not kill Men in cold Blood; that was Work only for Butchers: Circumstances that have been swallow'd with all imaginable Credulity by one Party, and rejected with as much Indignation by the other; and which, if true, ought to reflect eternal Infamy on the King, and if false, on the Historian.

Thus speedily and effectually, however, was this popular Vapour dispers'd by the Breath of Power, and scarce left a Trace behind it: And what is equally remarkable, the News no sooner reach'd London, but the City (c) Petition, before spoken of, vanish'd with it. Those, who before testify'd such a Horror at shedding the Blood of their Fellow Protestants in Arms, growing, at once, as insensible, as if the Lives of those very Protestants, when at the Mercy of the Crown, were not worth their Compassion.

The great Difficulties incident to those Political Constitutions, which are calculated to set equal Bounds to Liberty, are Oppression and Faction. All the Sons of Adam grasp at what is forbid. Both Governors and Governed are, by Turns, Treipassers alike: And he that follows Truth and Justice, must spare neither.

While the Scottish Broil was yet in Suspence, it was thought adviseable to give Duke Hamilton and the rest of the Scottish Nobility a (d) Hearing; who had put themselves under the Patronage of the Lords Essex and Hollifax, and even stipulated, that they should be present at the Councils when the Cause came on. This the King agreed to; as also, that the Assistance of Lawyers should be called in on both Sides. Those for the Lords were Lockart and Cunningham; and his Majesty and his Minister Lauderdale, were content with the Crown-Advocate, Mackenzie. All this seem'd fair; but when it came to the Test, the King, by way of Foreclosure, was induc'd to say, "That the Duke Hamilton, and the Scottish Nobility, heard before the Council.

(b) Which concludes with these Expressions: "It was said by the Prisoners, that they had no Account from David Hume, of what his Grace had offer'd them; which they believe, would have been accepted by the Generality: So careful are their Ministers, that those poor, misguided People, should rather be destroy'd than undeciv'd."

(c) "The Petition I mention'd in my last, says Mr. Sydney, did meet with some Interruption; but the Defeat of the Scots put an end to it."

(d) Bishop Burnet treats of this Affair, as antecedent to the Rebellion: But the Fact was otherwise. See Burnet, vol. 1. p. 470.

the Points formerly spoken to, did relate to his Prerogative, which in three Points he would not suffer to be touch'd. 1. That he having a Right of disposing of all Places, might incapacitate such Persons as he should think fit. 2. That it belonging to him to prevent Conspiracies, he might secure and imprison suspected Persons; adding, That there was no such thing as a Habeas Corpus in Scotland, nor should be as long as he liv'd. 3. That it being his Part to prevent, or to quell Rebellions, he might raise such Forces as he pleas'd, quarter them where he thought fit, and employ them as Occasion should require. Lockart to this reply'd, That the Places in question, were those belonging to Counties and Corporations; which had ever been fill'd by the free Election of the People, according to their Charters: And as to what his Majesty had been pleas'd to assert relating to Conspiracies and Rebellions, he thought he could prove, that it was neither agreeable to the Laws of Scotland, nor any other Law, nor the Ends for which that, or any other Government was constituted.

These Passages being over, the Scottish Lords presented their (c) Charge against the Duke of Lauderdale, in writing, as the King himself had requir'd; enumerating, in few Words, the several Enormities, already set forth, in the Course of this Work; and which so effectually justify all the Severities to be used against that Nobleman in it. Every Article was fully prov'd; Mackenzie, himself, was forc'd to shelter his Client under the Royal Authority. The Lords Essex and Hallifax openly declar'd, that the Complainants had made out their Allegations. And the last, in particular, made no Scruple to tell the King, "That the Scottish Nation was even more free than the English." Notwithstanding all which, it was upon the Issue, pronounc'd, (*) That Lauderdale had done nothing but what his Majesty had command'd, and what he would uphold by Virtue of his Prerogative, which was above the Law.

It was not, however, till after the Covenants were subdu'd, that this absolute Decision was made; nor, perhaps, had it been made then, if the two Lords, just mention'd, had been as much in earnest for the Scottish Petitioners, as they seem'd. But whatever contributed to favour the Duke of Monmouth's Views, interfer'd with their own: And if Lauderdale had fallen into Disgrace upon this Occasion, the Affairs of Scotland would have naturally fallen into his Hands, and thereby have made an Addition both to his Power and Popularity, as the late Victory had made an Addition to his Glory. As it was, when he made his first Appearance at Court, after his (f) Return from Scotland, the King, at his Intercession, was pleas'd to grant an Indemnity for what was past, and that the Meetings of the Non-Conformists should be conniv'd at for the future. Unfortunately, this Indemnity was to pass thro' Lauderdale's Office, who was Secretary for Scotland; and he took care to manage P. 473.] the Matter so, that it became rather an Act of Grace to (g) himself and his Partizans, than to those in whose Name it was issued: All Gentlemen, Officers, and Preachers, being excepted out of it: So that when the Account came to be ballanc'd, it stood thus: Two Preachers were hang'd (whether the intrepid David Hume was one of them, is not mention'd:) Two hundred were embark'd for Virginia, and perish'd in their Passage; and the rest were oblig'd to enter into Bonds for their good Behaviour. Besides all which, he, Lauderdale, not only maintain'd his Credit at Court, and his Power in the State, but carry'd a greater Sway than ever, gave it the same Scope as ever, and became more terrible than ever. And as to the Scottish Lords who had for many ways contriv'd his Downfall, and who expected nothing less than to divide the Spoils of his Vicegerency among themselves, they were either so weary of to vain a Toil, or so apprehensive of being involv'd as (b) Abettors, if not Parties, in the late Broil, that they were glad to give over the Pursuit, and to compound for their own Quiet and Safety.

It is now time to reassume the Prosecution of the Plot; which we find was handled, according to Lord Halifax's Politics, as if it were true, whether it were so or not. Oates and Bellie, the leading Witnesses, countenanc'd as they had been in Parliament and protected, as they found themselves to be by so many great Men, and follow'd by so large a Body of the People, grew bold in proportion as they grew considerable: And the first, in particular, had early in the Year, gave the Lords of the Council to understand, That if they did not help him to more Money, he must help himself. The People were as apprehensive as ever of Popery, and consequently as intent on running it down; and no Endeavours were wanting to keep alive that savage Spirit, which seduc'd Men to worship, and devour one another.

(*) Bishop Burnet adds, vol. I. p. 470. "When May, the Master of the Privy Turke ask'd him (the King) in his familiar Way, What he thought now of his Lauderdale? he answer'd, as May himself told me, That they had objected many damny'd Things that he had done against them, but there was nothing objected that was against his Service."

(f) Mr. Staley only says, "Left his Power in Scotland should not be sufficient to protect him here, if the Parliament were; he doth not dispute a Pardon; and, as I hear, one is preparing for him." P. 145.

(g) Which was put in like manner, as he went thither. See John Roofs, adds, "Sir Thomas Armstrong was with him, and told me, the King had heard some Falshoods concerning the Duke, and had in all haste sent for him out of Scotland: And, indeed, it happen'd to be understood, that, after his Victory, he was about laying a Foundation, whereas to succeed in that Kingdom; and, by the Industry of his Agents, making himself popular." P. 97.

(b) Some think the great Lords will be found to have incited the poor People, and then endeavour'd to value themselves at Court upon the Power they had of appealing them: And, if that prove true, they may have the Fortune that ordinarily accompanies those that do too much or too little; and my Lord Lauderdale's Boors (an Instrument of Torture) will be a powerful Means of discovering, whether this be so or not." Sydney's Letters, p. 129, 130.

wick, Harcourt, Gavau, and Turner, were try'd at the Old Bailey, for being of the treasonable Consult to kill the King, held April the 24th, Sc. Oates, Bedloe, Prance, and Dugdale were Witnesses; and, Tho' the two first very shrewdly pleaded, That having been indicted for the same Fact before (with Ireland, Grove, and Pickering) and not proceeded against, because the second Witness, Bedloe, had nothing to urge against them, it follow'd, that his Silence ought to have discharg'd them, since his Evidence would certainly have condemn'd them; Tho' the said Bedloe had now better bethought himself, and became very explicit against both; Tho', in answer to a Circumstance sworn by Oates against Fenwick, viz. That he took his leave of Ireland in London, between the 8th and 12th of August, Sir John Sautbeet and his Lady, their Son and Daughter, and a Cloud of other Witnesses, all of Credit and Character, made it appear, that Ireland was either at Lord Aston's Seat at Hertfordshire, or at Wolverhampton, or Boscombe, from the third of August to the second of September (on which very Day Oates had positively sworn, he, Ireland, had given him twenty Shillings in London;) And, tho' fourteen (i) Witnesses from St. Omers, testify'd, that the said Oates had never been absent but one Night from the Jesuits College, at that Place, during the whole Interval between Christmas 1677, and the June following, and consequently, could never officiate, as he had sworn, at Consults held at London in April and May; the Jury brought them in guilty, the Court pronounc'd Sentence upon them, and on the 20th of June next ensuing, they were executed at Tyburn, All, in the most solemn, express, and fervent Manner, asserting their (k) Innocence, and calling upon God to deal with them accordingly.

Dugdale's Residence.]

Great Streets was laid on Dugdale's Evidence, who, except in Parliament, and at the Council-Board, had never made his Appearance before. He charg'd Whitebread with writing a Letter to Ewers (but address'd to Dugdale) by the common Post, at Lord Aston's, directing him, Ewers, to chuse desperate, hardy, courageous and stout Fellows to kill the King (the Odium of which horrid Fact was to be thrown on the Presbyterians.) He also charg'd Harcourt with sending another to the same Person, which was dated the Saturday that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was first missing; and which was received by the said Ewers, at Tixball, the Monday following; and in which were these Words; (l) "This very Night Sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatch'd." And by way of Confirmation of this last Circumstance, one Mr. Chetwynd attested, that on the next Day, Tuesday, one Mr. Sawbridge a Kinsman of Lord Aston's, brought word to the said Mr. Chetwynd, that the Girl at a neighbouring Ale-house, had told him, as News, that Dugdale had that Morning reported there, "That a Justice of Peace of Westminster was kill'd." But what weigh'd more with the Court than all the rest, were two Letters taken in Harcourt's Papers, and produc'd by Sir Thomas Doleman (one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council) the first being a Summons to a Congregation to be held at London, the 24th of April, accompany'd with a Caution, "not to hasten to London, long before the time appointed, nor to appear much about the Town till the Meeting be over, lest Occasion should be given to suspect the Design; as also much recommending Secrecy as to Time and Place, as it would appear of its own Nature necessary." And the second, dated from Hilton, or Rome, February 5, 1676, containing these Words; "We are all here very glad of the Promotion of Mr. Thomas Harcourt." When I writ that the Patents were sent, although I guess for whom they were, yet I knew not for certain, because our Patrons do not use to discover Things or Resolutions till they know they have effect." The Interpretation put upon those Letters by the Court, was, That this Congregation was the Consult sworn to by Oates, the Design, the Plot to kill the King, &c. and the Patents, the Commissions to the several Lords, &c. engag'd in it. On the other hand the Prisoners labour'd hard to shew, That the sole End of that (†) Congregation was to chuse a Procurator to be

(i) These were all of them young Students, many of them the Sons of People of Condition; and three of 'em having fallen into the Hands of Sir William Waller, a very busy Patriot Justice, as Papini, and avow'd the Business they were come upon; Oates was ready against the Trial, with seven or eight Persons, who depos'd, on the contrary, that they saw him in London, about the Beginning of May.

(k) Part of Gavau's remarkable Speech was in these Words: "Dearly-belov'd Countrymen! I am come to the last Scene of Mortality, to the Hour of my Death; an Hour which is the Horizon between Time and Eternity; an Hour which must either make me a Star to Shine for ever in Heaven above, or a Firebrand to burn everlasting among the damn'd Souls in Hell below; an Hour, in which, if I deal sincerely, and with a hearty Sorrow acknowledge my Crimes, I may hope for Mercy; But if I fallily deny them, I must expect nothing but eternal Damnation: And, therefore, what I shall say in this great Hour, I hope, you'll believe. And now, in this Hour, I do most solemnly swear, protest and vow, by all that is sacred in Heaven, and on Earth, and as I hope to see the Face of God in Glory, that I am as innocent as the Child unborn of those treasonable Crimes, which Mr. Oates and Mr. Dugdale have sworn against me at my Trial, and for which Sentence of Death was pronounced against me the Day after my Trial. And, that you may be assur'd that what I say is true, I do in like manner protest, vow and swear, as I hope to see the Face of God in Glory, that I do not, in what I say unto you, make use of any Evocation, or mental Reservation, or martial Privation, or any such like Way, to palliate Truth. Neither do I make use of any Dispensations from the Pope, or any body else; or of any Oath of Secrecy, or any Absolution, in Confession or out of Confession, to deny the Truth. But I speak in the plain Sense which the Words will bear: And if I do speak in any other Sense, or palliate, or hide the Truth, I wish with all my Soul, that God may exclude me from his heavenly Glory, and condemn me to the lowest Place in Hell-Fire."

(l) Harcourt, when he came to die, declaring he was innocent as the Child unborn, of every thing laid to his Charge, the Sheriff (HOW) interjected:

Sher. How. O! of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Death?

Har. Or Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Death.

How. Did not you write that Letter concerning the Dispatch of Sir Ed. Godfrey?

Har. No Sir. These are the Words of a dying Man: I would not do it for a thousand Worlds.

How. How have you liv'd?

Har. I have liv'd like a Man of Repute all my Life; and never was before the Face of a Judge, till my Trial: No Man can accuse me, I have, from my Youth, been bred up in the Education of my Duty towards God and Man.

We have a Testimony, that, for promoting your Cause, you would not stick at the Protestants Blood. You began with Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, but who knows where you would have made an End? It was this one Man you kill'd in his Person, but in Effigie the whole Nation: It was in one Man's Blood, your Hands were embred, but your Souls were dipt in the Bloods of us all. This was a Handfull only of what was to follow; and so long as we are convinc'd you kill'd him, we cannot but believe you would also kill the King: We cannot but believe you would make all of us away that stand in the way of your Religion: A Religion, which, according to what it is, you would bring in upon us, by a Conversion of us with Blood, and by a Baptism with Fire. God keep our Land from the one, and our City from the other!

The next Day, but under the same Commission, Langborn was brought to his Trial: Oates and Bedloe were the principal Evidences against him: The first swore he brought him Minutes of what had pass'd at the Consult; Langborn, as he read them over, praying for their good Success: That he acknowledg'd to Oates he had receiv'd fifty Commissions from Rome, and shew'd him six of them, viz. for the Lords Arundel, Powis, Stafford, Bellasis, Petre, and himself; he being to be Judge in the Army, or Advocate-General: That Langborn sollicit-ed 6000*l.* of the Benedictine Monks for carrying on the Design, which he heard had been paid: That he, Langborn, call'd Sir George Wakeman Narrow-soul'd Physician, for not being content with 10000*l.* to poison the King, &c. The second, Bedloe, depos'd, That he had seen Langborn register several treasonable

A. D. 1679. Letters of Coleman's to Father la Chaife: That there was not a Penny of Money receiv'd or paid, or the least thing done in Relation to the Plot, that was not register'd by Langborn: That Pritchard had told him, Bedloe, that Langborn had receiv'd the Commissions, and that Sir Henry Tibborn had shewn him three of them at Paris. He added also several other less material Circumstances; but, unluckily disgrac'd them all, by saying, That Coleman writ a curious, fine, small Hand; whereas the contrary was the Truth; and that he saw Langborn register Coleman's Letters in his Study, while he, Bedloe, and Coleman, were walking in his Chamber; whereas, we are told by Langborn himself, in his Memoirs, and others, that it was impossible for any one in his Chamber to see what was doing in his Study. Oates was also as unlucky in some other respects, for tho' his Memory was, sometimes, so circumstantially good, he was now at a loss to answer positively, whether, in his way home from France, he came from Dover in a Coach or on Horseback; or whether he lay the first Night after his Arrival at Grove's or not: But Mrs. Grove and her Maid both testify'd, he had never lain there at all: And he, Oates, having reduc'd the Number of his Consult at the White Horse Tavern, from fifty, which he had sworn to in Coleman's Trial, to eighteen or twenty, the Mistress of the said Tavern declar'd, 1st. That she had never seen Oates before that Day in Court: And 2dly. That she had never but once had so large a Company in her House, which was a Parish Jury, and who were forc'd to separate into three Rooms for want of one (w) large enough to contain them all together. Langborn, himself, also objected to Oates, That in Coleman's Trial he had sworn, that, after he, Oates, had communicated to him the Result of the Consult in April or May, he never saw him afterwards; whereas now he swore, that in July or August, Langborn had own'd to him, he had distributed the Commissions before spoken of: And farther, that whereas he swore he came over in company with Sir T. Preston, Sir W. Warner, Mr. Peole, &c. It was prov'd that the two last were then at St. Omers, and the other at Liege. He also objected to Bedloe, that he had sworn before the House of Lords, viz. That he had no other Person to charge either in the House or out of the House; whereas, he, Langborn, was not one of the Persons he had, at that time, mention'd: But the Court would not suffer a Copy of the Record to be read; and upon the whole directed the Jury to find him guilty, if they thought the Witnesses which appear'd to support Oates's Testimony deserv'd more Credit than those brought from abroad to destroy it; which, it seems, happen'd

"That, indeed, there had been a Meeting of the Jesuits that Day; and that all the Scholars of St. Omers knew of it: But that it was well Dr. Oates knew no better where it was to be; for, says his Majesty, they met in St. James's, where I then liv'd; which if Oates had but known, he would have cut out a fine Spot of Work for me." Rev. Mem. p. 125.

(w) This was contradicted by other Evidences, who said, there were Rooms in the House which had held twenty, twenty-five, or thirty: But the Author of the Compendium affirms, that, after the Trial was over, several Persons went to view this so-much-talk'd-of Tavern; and, tho' the lock Part had been rebuilt since the Year 78, the Jesuits famous Room still remain'd, being about four Yards and a half square; and, consequently, not able, with any Convenience, to contain above a Dozen.

happen'd to be their Opinion: Their Verdict was consequently against the Prisoner; who had the additional Mortification to hear it applauded by a loud Shout.—So much did the Zeal of the Audience surpass their Charity! Insult, Uproar, and Violence, should never be permitted to approach the Seat of Justice, yet all had now such a Loofe, to the Prejudice of this unhappy Man, that the Earl of Colchmain complain'd to the Court, that the Witnesses for him were so abus'd by the Mob without, that it was with the Danger of their Lives they came to discharge their Consciences: One, in particular, his Lordship affirm'd, was beaten and bruis'd to such a degree, that there was Reason to think the Blows would be his Death: And another, a Woman, declar'd she durst not speak, unless the Court would give her Protection against the Rabble; and, that not being in their Power, Langborn himself had the Goodness to waive her Testimony: Indeed, his whole Behaviour partook of the same Moderation: He defended his Life with much Sagacity; and, tho' he shew'd a Sense of Hardships, betray'd no indecent Reluctance: When he was to suffer, which was July 14, he shew'd an equal Mixture of Devotion and Resignation; and he left a Paper behind, in which, under thirteen several Heads, and in the plainest and most significant Terms that could be us'd, he disown'd and deny'd the whole, and every Title of the Charge brought against him by Oates and Bedloe; whom he nevertheless pray'd for, as he did also, for all those who had any way contributed to his End, or rejoic'd either at his Condemnation or Execution.

There is yet another Trial, which took place soon after this of Langborn, July 18th, which is of too much Consequence to be pass'd over in silence; namely, that of Sir George Wakeman, Cork, Marsh or Marshall, and Rumley; Benedictines, who, tho' charg'd in two several Indictments, were try'd by the same Jury, and involv'd in the same Issue.

As the great Point in this Case, was the Poisoning of the King, at the Instance and by the Encouragement of the Queen herself; and as all the other main Particulars of the Plot have either occur'd in the former Trials, or must occur in that of Lord Stafford; no more of this need be repeated, than serves to clear up that Point only.

Oates was again the leading Evidence, and depos'd, That Albby, alias Thimbleby, one of the Society (of Jesuits) coming sick to Town, Wakeman was his Physician: And, in a Letter of Instructions relating to the Regiment he was to observe at Bath, in order to his Recovery, viz. That he should drink Milk Night and Morning, &c. takes occasion to add, that the Queen would assist in poisoning the King: That Oates came to know Wakeman's Hand, by seeing him afterwards sitting in Company with Albby, who was lame of both Hands, in a Writing-posture, having just laid down his Pen, and having a written Paper before him, in the very same Hand with the Letter just mention'd, the Ink of which was not yet dry: And that Albby then talk'd to Wakeman of the Commission he had receiv'd to be Physician General to the Army. Then follow'd the Somerset-house Story of the Queen's meeting with the Fathers; the angry Words relating to the King, deliver'd in a Woman's Voice; the gracious Smile, &c. as before recounted, Page 397, out of his Narrative to the House of Lords: And, again, That he heard Albby, in express Terms, offer Wakeman 10,000*l.* to poison the King; which he refus'd, as too little for so great a Work: That Whitebread was sent to offer him 5000*l.* more; which he accepted and receiv'd; for he saw it enter'd in the Jesuits Entry-Book (which he could not be positive who kept) That such a Day in August, such a Sum was propos'd to Sir G. Wakeman, who accepted and receiv'd it; and underneath was a Receipt in form, in the said Wakeman's Hand, for 5000*l.* in part.

Bedloe then testify'd, That being at Harcourt's, in the Beginning of August, Wakeman came in, full of seeming Anger and Discontent, and ask'd the said Harcourt, If he had any thing for him? who reply'd, by asking in his turn, How he, Wakeman, proceeded? That Wakeman then said, He did not know whether he should proceed or not; as not understanding for what Reason he was drill'd on in such a Concern: That Harcourt answer'd, he was to blame to be so hasty, for they were better provided than he thought for: That he then gave him, Wakeman, a Bill of 2000*l.* which he had receiv'd from a Gentleman (whose Name Bedloe had forgot) who had also receiv'd it from somebody, who receiv'd it from the Queen; by whose Order it was to be deliver'd to Wakeman; that this Bill was charg'd on a Goldsmith, whose Name he had forgot; and that Sir George, on reading it, said, "He found more Encouragement from his good Mistress than all the rest." That Sir George, AFTER all this, ask'd, Who Bedloe was? and, upon receiving Satisfaction, went to get his Bill accepted: That immediately after, he, Bedloe, leaving Harcourt also, met Sir George near the Temple; who acknowledg'd to him, that the Bill was accepted, and that it was to be paid in the Afternoon: And that Harcourt, at another time, told him, Bedloe, the former Sum of 2000*l.* had been made up 5000*l.* and that it was for the old Buffneis; adding what he had before discours'd to Sir G. Wakeman. [This, Bedloe slips in by way of Parenthesis.] "For, if we should fail of it at Windor, then this Way was to be taken; and if this fail too, we will make sure of it at Newmarket."

It happen'd, in the Course of the Trial, that the Lord Chief Justice (Serjeant) took occasion to observe, That, in Bedloe's Evidence, there was not any material Thing against any one of the Prisoners; and that, in particular, what he urg'd against Wakeman, relating to the Bill given him for the old Buffneis, was in doubtful Words. Sir Robert Sawyer, one of the King's Council, undertook to shew the contrary; and, in particular, connect'd the Windor and Newmarket Circumstances with the Conference

Bill was produc'd, as Bedloe, by Parenthesis, had done before. Bedloe was then call'd upon to go over his Story a second time: Which he did; and took so much care, to follow the Receipt of the Bill with a Charge of Harcourt's, which he had omitted in his former Recital; namely, But, Sir George, this must be well follow'd, and closely observ'd, because so much depends upon it; or if we should fail, &c. that Wakeman, in a Half-Whisper, said to his Fellow-Prisoners, THERE IS MY BUSINESS DONE. This, however, produc'd a sort of Division in the Bench; the Lord Chief Justice (Scruggs) saying, He says now quite a different thing than he said before; and the Lord Chief Justice North, and the Recorder, as well as Sir Robert Sawyer, replying, No, he said the same before. And so he had, in effect, that Charge of Harcourt to Wakeman excepted, which he had not made the least mention of: But that made a very material Difference; and it is very remarkable, that, tho' the Lord Chief Justice had observ'd that Difference, either his Memory or his Presence of Mind fail'd him, that he was not able to point it out to the Court.

P. 48. Wakeman, in his Defence, said, The Letter of Directions he sent to Abby was written by his Servant, an Apothecary, and not by himself; and that there was no other Mention of King or Queen in it, than of the

P. 49. King's and Queen's Bath. Chapman, an Apothecary, at that time Mayor of Bath, testify'd the same, and produced the physical Part of the Letter, in which these Directions were contain'd, in open Court, together with Bills of Sir George's own Writing, to shew they were not in the same Hand. He also declar'd, that he had seen and read the rest of the Letter, as his Son had likewise, and that, upon the Faith of a Christian, there was not one Word relating to the King or Queen in it, except, as before mention'd by Wakeman himself, to the Baths distinguish'd by those Names. Both Sir George, and Mr. Chapman, moreover, shew'd, That the prescribing

P. 50. Milk with a Barb-Course, was ridiculous, and never practis'd. Oates reply'd, That the Milk was prescrib'd as the Course he was to observe in Town: But Wakeman rejoin'd, That Abby went out of Town, two Days after he had receiv'd his Directions: And it being surmisd, that he might have written two Papers of Directions, he would not allow there was any ground to suppose that he should repeat the same Circumstance twice, or write two Letters about one thing.

P. 51. Wakeman's Servant, and also one Mrs. Hemmingham attested, that the first wrote the Directions for Abby, by his Master's Order, in which there was no Mention made of Milk; and the last, that she was present when he did so. Then Wakeman himself inform'd the Court, that Oates, at his first Examination, before the King and Council, declar'd, he had never seen him, consequently, he could never have seen him write; and that he had charg'd him so slightly, that the Board did not think fit to commit him: That he was left at Liberty twenty-four Days after: That, when Oates had accus'd him again before the House of Commons, which produc'd their Message of Astonishment to the Lords, and the Lords examin'd him also in their Turn, the Chancellor ask'd him if he knew Sir George's Hand; and he answer'd No; and that he only knew it to be his Letter by its being subscrib'd George Wakeman; which was directly contrary to his present Charge. Sir Philip Lloyd being then call'd upon, stood up, and said, That Oates, at that time alledg'd only, that Fenwick had wrote to St. Omers, that Sir George had undertaken to poison the King for 15,000*l.* five thousand of which had been paid by Coleman: That Sir George not only deny'd all, but with some Heat demanded Reparation; and thereby, so offended the King and Council, that the Chancellor ask'd, if he had nothing to charge him with, beyond Hearsay, as desiring Ground for a Commitment: That Oates, lifting up his Hands, answer'd, No; and added these remarkable Words, before quoted, God forbid I should say any thing against Sir George; for I know nothing more against him: And that for the Truth of this, he appeal'd to the whole Board. Oates here incorpor'd: That he did not remember a Word of all this. And immediately after, "If he did make such answer; the whole Board knew he was not in a Condition to answer at all; as being, thro' Weariness, scarce Compos Mentis". The Lord Chief Justice then ask'd, if he was so spent, that he could not say, I have seen a Letter under Wakeman's own Hand? and again added, "That Sir George urg'd it right, that he should not have been permitted to have his Liberty to long, if Oates had charg'd him to home then." Upon which Oates had the Audaciousness to say; "To speak the Truth, they were such a Council as would commit no-body." Which either gave the Lye to his own Weariness, contracted by the Fatigue of taking Prisoners by the Warrant of this very Counsellor; or that Weariness, so contracted, gaveth the Lye to the Reflection which drew from the Chief Justice the following severe Reprimand; "You have taken a great Confidence, I know not by what Authority, to say any thing of any body."

There is no Need of pursuing this Affair any farther: Enough has been said of the Charge and Defence to make the Merits of both sufficiently intelligible, as also to throw some additional Light on the Plot in general, which is the great End of touching on these Tryals at all. To close the Account, therefore, the Lord Chief Justice, in his Address to the Jury, accompany'd his State of Bedloe's Evidence, with an, If you believe this,— Hung heavy on the Inconsistencies made apparent in that of Oates; and upon the whole, express'd himself to this Effect,—"Let us not be so amazed and frighted with the Noise of Plots, as to take away any Man's Life, without any reasonable Evidence:—These Men's Bloods are at stake, and your Souls and mine, and our Oaths and Consciences are at stake; and therefore never care what others; more particularly, that he had disparag'd the King's Witnesses (Oates and Bedloe) by saying, that after Wakeman's Trial, they were no longer to be believ'd: That he thought they had always an Accusation ready against any body, and that he believ'd in his Conscience Langborn dy'd wrongfully, &c. but not a Word as to any Corruption relating to Wakeman's Acquittal. The Lord Chief Justice was, hereupon, oblig'd to put in an Answer, and defended himself with so much spirit (not without a due Mixture of Disdain to be call'd upon to enter the Lists, with such contemptible Adversaries) against such an unbecom'g Attempt, as his Lordship was pleas'd to call it; that upon a full Hearing of both Sides, Oates and Bedloe were (p) left to be proceeded against according to Law.

P. 152.

It cannot, however, be deny'd, that the Temper of the Court appear'd to be different in the Trial of Wakeman, from what it had been in those of Langborn, and all before. Mr. North, with his usual Freedom of Expression, says, that till then, the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs had taken in with the Tide, and ranted for the Plot, hewing down Popery as Scanderberg did the Turk. And, in his Life of the Lord Keeper North, accounts for his (g) Conversion in these Words: "It fell out, that when the Earl of Shaftsbury had sat some short time in Council, and seem'd to rule the Roast; yet Scroggs had some Quails in his political Conscience; and coming from Windsor in the Lord Chief Justice North's Coach, he took the Opportunity, and desir'd his Lordship to tell him seriously, if my Lord Shaftsbury had really so great Power with the King, as he was thought to have. His Lordship answer'd quick, No, my Lord, no more than your Footman bath with you. Upon that the other hung his Head, and considering the Matter, said nothing for a good while, and then pass'd to other Discourse. After this time he turn'd as fierce against Oates and his Plot as ever before he had ranted for it." Now, whether it may be presum'd that the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, was really thus suddenly whin'd about by a single Breath of his Brother North, or whether the obvious Consideration, that the Queen was deeply concern'd in the Issue of Wakeman's Trial, and more remotely the Duke, in case it should make way for any Alteration in the Succession, did not dispose him to use more Moderation, than he had hitherto done, let the Man of Sense and Candour determine.

A. D. 1679.

The same Gentleman (Mr. North) further says (in his Examen) "The other Judges were passive (in the Trials of the Plotters) and meddled little, except some that were Takers-in also; and particularly the good Recorder (*) Treby, who eas'd the Attorney-General; for he seldom ask'd a Question, but one might guess he foresaw the Answer." And again, in the Lord-Keeper's Life, "During this Time, his Lordship (the Keeper) sat in holy Peace, under his old Oak, the Court of Common-Pleas, which had nothing to do with Criminals: And in the grand Commission of Oyer, &c. where the Oatesian Storms were most impetuous, the Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench steer'd the Vessel; and the other Judges had little or no Share in the Conduct: Whereby his Lordship, in the main, was rather an Observer, than an Actor, in those Proceedings, to which hung the Issues of Life and Death." He, moreover, bestows an express mitigating Paragraph on this (r) passive Behaviour of the Judges: But, surely, those who connive at Injustice, having Power and Authority to hinder it, are equally criminal with those who enact it. The King's Commission allow'd of no such Distinction as Observers and Actors; or if it did, it could be only for one Reason, That those who observ'd should thereby be enabled to give such Caution to the others, as might prevent them from acting amiss. Mr. North adds, in another Place, that his Brother, the Lord Chief-Justice, had the Conduct of the many Plot-Trials to MANAGE; and that was of (s) Reading, for Subornation in these Trials, and Tampering.—In all the rest, his Lordship scarce spoke; but Chief-Justice Scroggs led the Van. But if he MANAGED but that one, he assisted in those of the free Jesuits, Langborn, and Wakeman; often distinguishing himself, according to his Rank, as second in the Commission, and scarce once in behalf of the Prisoners. In the Trial of the five Jesuits, when Ferriack undertook to prove by Evidence, that Bedloe had liv'd in the Marshallsa out of the Alms-hatchet, his Lordship says, He was guilty of the same Treason that you ARE guilty of; There is his Fault. And when he was farther charg'd with stealing a silver-bilit

Life of Lord Keeper North, p. 156.

The Conduct of the Chief Justice North, in these Trials, p. 75.

(p) Mr. North, in his Examen, p. 80, has a Passage to this Effect: "It was long after this, (that is to say, when the Check was given to the Lord Rafal by the King, for making a Puff against Landedale) that Oates and Bedloe were heard against the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs; and the Articles being dismiss'd, the Lord Rafal, as also, his Fellow-Commoner, Mr. Henry Ponds (as he thought) and some others, as if Crashaw had their Proposition there, and good Provenience did not prevail, desir'd his Majesty's Leave to absent themselves from Council; and the King answer'd immediately, No, my Lord, with all my Heart." Now Lord Rafal receiv'd this Check before the Middle of June, and the Hearing of Scroggs's Case was not till the 21st of January following. We have, besides, Authority as well as Reason to show, that Lord Rafal left the Council on a very different Account, as in its proper Place shall be explain'd.

(q) Mr. North, who is excellent at a Postscript after the Life, has given that of the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, after the following bold Manner:

"He was of a mean Extract, having been a Butcher's Son; but wrought himself into the Business of the Law, was made a Sergeant, and practis'd under his Lordship (North). His Person was large, Visage comely, and Speech witty and bold. He was a great Voluntary, and Companion of the high Court-Rakes, as Ken, Gay, &c. whose Merits, for aught I know, might prefer him. His Debaucheries were egregious, and his Life loose; which made the Lord Chief-Justice Hale detest him. — He had a true Libertine-Principle. He was preferred for professing Popularity. — He liv'd well, and featur'd his Neck; for he purchas'd the Manor of Brandwood in Essex."

(*) Treby was not Recorder then, but Jessels, so famous for his mild Administration of Justice in the subsequent Reign; as appears by Mr. North's own Testimony, in his Life of the Lord Keeper, p. 211; and more particularly in his Examen, p. 550.

(r) An Expression of Mr. North's; which is thus explain'd by him, in his Life of the Lord Keeper, p. 156: "That is, without interposing their Opinion of the Evidence, and the Credibility of their Story."

(s) Of which, proper Notice will be taken in the Sequel.

bilited Sword, his Lordship again pleaded for him, That he had the King's Pardon for all that. In the same Trial, he will not allow, that the Credit of Gates was impeach'd by the Privy when the Jesuits had brought out of their own Schools. Again, in the Close of Langburn's Trial, speaking of the same Witnesses, he says, They are all Papists, and speak in a general Cause. What a Lift he gave to Bealbe's Evidence, in concert with the good Recorder, and Sir Robert Sawyer, in opposition to the Lord Chief-Justice, we have already seen.

P. 58.

After the Chief, Scroggs, had summ'd up the Merits of the Case of the five Jesuits, we find him giving his Sanction to all, in these express Words, Gentlemen, (to the Jury) My Lord hath repeated it so fully to you, that I shall not need to add any thing to it: And, tho' Mr. North acknowledges, that he finds his Lordship saying, As for the Plot, that is as clear as the Sun, he would have his Readers to understand it to be no more than fishing Irony: But this none can do, who, without Prejudice, reflect on the Circumstances above-recounted; which are not Starts and Sallies, but fair Influences of his general Conduct; and also on the solemn Words, which he made use of, when pronouncing Sentence on Reading, to this Effect, That if the Conspiracy had not been, by the Mercy of God, detected, God knows what might have befallen us all by this time. Thus we find, that even the Lord Chief-Justice North himself, tho' a Man of the greatest Sagacity and Penetration, could not escape the Epidemic of the Times; but was one of the Takers-in, which his own Brother, and Idolater, both so vainly endeavours to excuse in some, and so justly exposes in others.

Having thus made a shift to find our Way thro' this perplex'd and unentertaining Labyrinth of the Law, we are now to take Sir William Temple for our principal Guide, and use our Endeavours to get as happily through that of the Court.

While these Trials and Executions were thus suffer'd to go on, to gratify and amuse the savage Humour of the People, the Term of the Prodigion drew near a Close; and it became necessary to consider what Use should be made of the Prerogative next. The Triumvirate, who were in possession of the King, as they believ'd; who had broken with Lord Shaftsbury, and the Duke of Monmouth, that they might continue so; and who knew the Threats which the First had threaten'd were levelled at them; could not bear to think, that this Parliament, in which their Enemies were so powerful, should ever meet again. All their Opinions, therefore, being governed by their Fears, center'd in a Dissolution: And it became, in the next Place, their Endeavour to make the Interest of the Minister, the Pleasure of the King; which it was, perhaps, neither a very hard Task to accomplish, nor to find such Colours for, as should induce his Majesty to believe, that their sole View in it was his Service. The Commons, besides fine Words, had given him nothing but Trouble. It was scarce to be suppos'd that they would not begin again where they left off; and nobody car'd to believe, that the parting with this Parliament in Displeasure, would excite a more turbulent Spirit in the next. Possibly the Interest of the absent Duke made also a Part in the Consideration; and thus by one Master-Stroke, these notable Intriguers persuaded themselves, they should obtain Favour and Confidence, as well as provide for their Safety. However this may be, the King clos'd with them entirely in this dubious Measure, as did also Sir William Temple: And after it had been thus digested by the Cabal, it was for Form's Sake resolv'd, that it should have the Sanction of the Privy Council. No Opposition was expected from the old Members; and of the fifteen new, all but six were look'd upon as sure Men, who would obey the Word of Command. But, however confident they were of a Majority, it was held expedient to prepare the several Members for such a Proposal; and the Triumvirate engag'd to do so: But, whether they really forgot it, as they alledg'd; or whether they willfully neglected it, in the Persuasion that the Weight of the King's own Determination would carry it thro'; or that, if it should meet with Opposition, that very Opposition would serve to render their own Merits, Services, and Compliances more acceptable, the Council met without any such previous Notice of the Business to be propounded, as had been at first agreed upon; the King propos'd his Question, viz. Whether it were best of his Affairs to prorogue the present Parliament till October, or to dissolve it and call another at that time, and desir'd the Opinion of their Lordships upon it.—The whole Board, it seems, was so much surpriz'd at this unexpected Proposal, that a long Pause ensued; every Man being at a loss to speak on a Topic, that nobody had ever thought of before. At last the Lord Chancellor broke the way, and declam'd long and violently against the Dissolution. He was follow'd in the same Track by the Lord President Shaftsbury, and he again by the Lord Privy Seal, Angelsey; after whom appear'd the Lord Chamberlain, Arlington, who had in his Train the whole Council, except the four who had so carefully kept the Secret. The Weight of all now lay upon his Majesty; who was forc'd to enlarge on his utter Despair of coming to any Agreement with the present Parliament, and the reasonable Hopes he had of more Complaisance from another; and finally to order the Lord Chancellor to draw up a Proclamation for dissolving the Parliament and calling another: Upon which the Council broke up; Lord Shaftsbury, Lord Ruffel, and two or three more, discovering the greatest Rage, and all the rest of the Board, the greatest Dissatisfaction, imaginable.

Thus in less than three Months after his Majesty had publicly and solemnly promised to act no more by the Advice of Favourites and Cabals, or without that of his Privy Council, was he twice induc'd to trespass as publicly on that Engagement; first, by proroguing the Parliament without the Knowledge

Knowledge of his Council; and now, by dissolving it without their Concurrence. And that this was the Matter of Fact, the very Proclamation itself bore witness: In which, the King stands alone, and declares the Dissolution in his own Name; and by his own Authority, without the Mention of any Council at all; being refused, to meet his People, and have their Advice in (t) frequent Parliaments [these very Words are in the Proclamation.] And thus it is manifest, that the same Dissolve will have the same Effect, both on King and People; and each, in turn, will have recourse to the same Remedy.

And now the Nation fell into a new Ferment: The furious Party-men without-doors were as much enrag'd as those within: And no sooner was it generally known, that the Triumvirate were answerable for this Measure, than they were every-where talk'd of with as much Bitterness, as Lord Danby had been before them; and, together with him, were devoted to parliamentary Justice. As it was, moreover, easily divin'd, for what Ends the King had been induced to adopt this Advice; all imaginable Artifices were us'd, and Precautions were taken, to defeat them. It was his Hope to have a Parliament more to his Mind: It was the Resolution of his Opposers to convince him, that they had more Interest among his Subjects than he.

Court and Country were now the leading Party-Words; great Pains were taken to shew, that the two Services were as opposite and irreconcilable as those of God and Mammon. In the Standards of the one were to be seen Liberty and Property; and in those of the other, Loyalty and Obedience. The Crafty led, the Credulous follow'd: And when two such mighty Factions encounter'd each other, it is no Wonder that, in the Shock, the whole Nation reel'd. The Press was equally a Prostitute on both sides: Every Day produc'd Strings of Queries, Papers of Advice, Caricats against one Set of Men, Recommendations of another (u); and every other insidious Art, that had a Tendency to infatuate,

(r) About this time, a single Sheet in Folio was publish'd, under the Title of The Recommendations of the King, Contain'd in the late Parliament; in which are the following remarkable Passages:

"The Dissolution or Prorogation of a Parliament hath been of late look'd upon to be a high Violation of Right, and so great a Point of Misgovernment, as if thereby our Liberties were lost, and our Lives and Estates subjected to the arbitrary Power and Will of our King; or else we fully conclude it impossible, that the King can be so wise as to govern without their Councils. To remove which Mis-takes, and to quiet the Minds of Men, we hold, that following Considerations, and Collections out of English History, are offer'd to public View; whereby it will be most apparent, that not only the Prorogation, but the frequent Dissolving of Parliaments, is absolutely necessary for the Preservation of Monarchy, our now establish'd Government, and the best Sort of Government for the People of England, and most suitable to their Temper; in preservation of which our own Preservation consisteth. But the long Continuance of one and the same Parliament, and the long Continuance of the same Members in Parliament, which are both alike, is the most pernicious thing imaginable, both to King and People.

It is necessary for the Preservation of Monarchy that Parliaments be often dissolved, because nothing makes it more manifest in whom the Sovereign Power resides; for it puts them in mind by what Authority they have their Being; whereas, by a long Continuance, they are apt to plead Prescription to their Seats, and think themselves secure, if removed thence, though by the same Power that plac'd them there.

A Parliament of the modern Condition is without Controversy very necessary and useful, if they insist that which properly belongs to them; the Business of both Houses be to consult with and advise the King, in such things as he shall require their Advice in, and to represent to him public Grievances, such as are real Grievances, and not such as every whimsical party takes citizens to; but they are not to think to compel the King, under the plausible Form of Advice, to exercise any Power of Government, or to make any new Laws that he likes not of. And it is proper and peculiar to himself only, to judge what Advice is fit to be follow'd, and what to be rejected; for there may be some private Reason for State for his to do, which might be inconvenient to be publicly known. This hath been the ancient settled Practice, and under which this Kingdom hath long flourish'd, and it is not safe to alter it for to bring any the declining Age of the World, such Changes, (which ever especially are from good to bad, and from bad to worse, and from worse to that, which is.)

It is not the Advantage of Monarchy, above the Government of many, appear'd at this time to any single Man; for if his Majesty, like the Master-mind of a Ship, had not been the Stay of all, and had not, as it were, paid the Fray, by the late Dissolution of the Parliament, all the antioctical Rigging and Tackle of both Houses, if it deserves to be so call'd, had been torn in pieces by Faction amongst themselves; and the poor Kingdom thereby, e'er this, might have been a second time, in our Misery, blown up by currow-inbred Division. And it is not without Precedent, that Parliaments are since dissolv'd as the Pope, or his College of Cardinals; and have given as ill Advice, and done as ill things, and of late been more troublesome than ever.

If it should be so, that the Advice of either or both Houses of Parliament must of necessity be follow'd by the King; then would it not be properly an Advice, but a Command in effect: And where, in a Commonwealth, the sovereign Power or Command is in more than one, that Commonwealth is no longer a Monarchy, but is degenerated, as well into an Aristocracy, the Sovereignty being shor'dly divided amongst many; and, if we judge impartially, it must be acknowledge'd, that they that endeavor after that (say) that the Votes and Ordinances of the House of Commons might have the Force of Laws, are no less Enemies to the State, than they that would introduce Popery; for, in both Cases, it is but endeavouring to alter the Government: To prevent which fond and dangerous Attempt, the frequent Dissolving of Parliaments is very necessary.

Others other Inconveniences will be prevented by frequent Prorogation and Dissolving of Parliaments; for, by that means, the Privilege of Parliament will not ever long justify the Members thereof, to delay and defeat the fellow-Subjects of their just and due Debts; which sort of Practice, for many Years past, hath been a killing Opposition; when not only the Members themselves made ill Use of that Privilege, but many of them gave their Clerks Liberty to sell blank Provisions by the Dozen, as the Pope does his Indulgences. And, moreover, if any such, or other his ridiculous Mist, should, by Flattery and Bribery, get into the Parliament, a Dissolution gives Opportunity of discharging such, from having had in so high a Trust. And great Reason such should be discharged; for how can it be expected, that Men upon in their private Concerns should be otherwise in public Administration, which they will always strive to make subservient to their Bye-Interests? &c.

(s) It is not to be understood that all these were the Words of the same Party, or that every body who agreed in Opposition, agreed in the same Means of carrying it on: On the contrary, in a Paper call'd Mr. Eschiers, containing a Narrative of what pass'd at the Election of Knights for that County, we find a Complaint, That as the Liberty of England had been endanger'd by long Parliaments, they were now threaten'd with great an Evil, by hardning the Council with too frequent Elections. And in another call'd the Country's Petition, is the following Paragraph: "The next Danger is, left frequent Parliaments, besides the Trouble, will bring on a frequent, insupportable Charge, which those honest Gentlemen who desire to great a 3rd rank, cannot but charge the Burden of, and so will be forc'd to desert you."

The Votes of the Church was heard to give Advice to the Nobility, Gentry and Commonalty, as follows: "Fallon in all Ages has been such, and ever had her Tricks, and play'd them generally in the Fear of God, and with strange Success; but had she the ill Luck, in Ferry right, to lose her Mind, in that Pious Tragedy; and cannot again to soon recover her Confidence in her Religious Duty, because the Holy Ghost is no well known, to take twice in one Age; as Abraham, the Good Builders began a new Course [Look about you, Gentlemen!] and not as before in Nemur Design, but Peas; and make the Interest of the People their still more, as they did plead the Fear of God before."

infatuate, milled, and betray, the Simple and Unwary; unaccompany'd with any one honest Endeavour to heal those dreadful Divisions, which have ever render'd this otherwise

A. D. 1679.

One while we knew two Parties; that did well in its Generation; after, it was the Godly; and then the Seby Party: But because true Sobriety and Godliness were at last a scarce Commodity among the god Brothers, as well as the wicked, these Distinctions, by degrees, began to wear away, and almost quite to be lay'd by; and now they have a new Stil-habit, tho' but that same Cause: And now it is Country-Men and Couriers; and in at this Country-Man's Door all Mischief is like to creep: For though the Word in its natural Signification, notes nothing but abundance of Plainness and Honesty; yet being got into the Saints Dictionary, it now begins to be of the same Import with any of the other godly Names and Phrases they use to file themselves and Party by. And now 'tis a Word, that, like the Trigon Horic, is Mis-Placed, full of Wild-Fire and Mischief; or like Flint, the Sorcerer, full of Subtlety and Craft: For, let a Man be the bitterest Enemy to King and Church, yet if he can but obtain this Title of Country-Man; and let him declare at the Head of any Faction whatever, That he will stand up for the good of the Country, in opposition to the Court-Interests; and his Business is effectually done, he shall most certainly be chosen for any Place he stands for; and the most sober, prudent, and worthy Person, whatever, may not be fit to be a Competitor with him. And this I, and many more, can speak upon too full Experience: For in a late Election in our Parts, I saw a most incomparable Person thrown by, with Shame and Disgrace, merely by this Stratagem.

I cannot therefore chuse but give the Country a Question and a full Sense of this new Artifice; and how ridiculous it is like to be to King and Church, if not in some degree rectified. And this, perhaps, may be a good Hint for others to describe it better.

The Word Courier, in its primitive Sense, did note one that did attend on the Person of the King, or was employ'd by him in any considerable Office as Guard, and that did his faithful Service in those Trufts. And originally, it was never any Shame or Disgrace to the best of Men in any of our Provs and Counties, to serve at Court, and attend the Person of their Prince, all the Saints made it for; nay, it was always thought an Honour to be admitted to this courtly Attendance; and the Country thought they could not do themselves a greater Service, than to chuse such (neither indeed can they) for their Representatives in Parliament; that were near the King; that to they might have an occasion to make known the State of the Country, and the Wants and Grievances of the People, when need required; and to have an Opportunity to redress them. But how Couriers in our Days should come to be degenerate a Senile, as to denote (if some may expound it) an Enemy to Law and Liberty, and Propriety, and every thing that is dear to the People, is strange; and how Country-Men, which is a Word of great Beauty, Integrity, and Lightness, is become Mean, may any one see; I; and how, I say, this ancient Name shall denote every thing that is mischievous to his Majesty, and directly opposite to the Interest of Whit-hall, is more strange. But the truth of it, is the Case now is come to this, That no Man whatever, can attend the Person of the King, or serve him in any of the most honourable Offices at Court, and that some time with the Expense of his own Estate and Fortune; but he must be look'd upon as a dangerous Person to the People, and as the worst of Men; that is, a Courier. And on the other side, let a Man be what he will, as bad as twenty Years Rebellion, and Conversation with blood and War could make him; yet if no Courier, he shall be the Darling, and the Delight of the People, and shall command their Votes and Suffrages. Let him be a Man of Sacrilege and Violence to God and his Church; let him be a Man of Blasphemy and other Mean Leads, by the strength of two Acts of Indemnity. Let him be for Rebellion, Schism, Excommunication, Contumelious, or whatsoever else is dear and precious to the Saints Effem; if he write but Country-Man, he is sure to carry the Day. So that in a very short time, 'tis like to come to this, That none must be accounted Lovers of the Country, but the Enemies of the King. For the People are taught to believe, that neither the King, nor any about him, are indeed any that are likely for him, have any true Love for the Country; but that they design to enslave them and their Estates, and to bring all under an Arbitrary Power and Despotic. And those Persons, for Instance, that declare for this one thing, viz. Against giving away the Country's Mines (as the Occasions of State what they will except by it, they can hope to recover) and great Inconveniences upon the Parliament, shall be accounted the Country's Friends for ever, and ever want their Vote at any time.

So that you see it is a very licentious, cunning, and mighty obliging Distinction; and is the likeliest to pull down Whit-hall of any yet; and principally for this Reason, Because it obtains its most among the Royal Party: For as they were always a sort of good-natur'd Person and innocent. themselves, so were apt ever to believe well of others too; and to be caught with fine Names, till they had believed themselves into the Saints Yoke, and their Families into want, and their Estates into Villainage; and so will do again if they be not very wary.

Causes therefore of the Country-men for your Representatives, Men of Religion and Loyalty, that love the Church and King; and be sure there is no Danger in such; but all others whatever, let them pretend what they will, are hollow within, and mean no good to either God or Church, to King or Country, but are, by their old, Old Tricks and new Artifices, seeking an Opportunity of destroying a Glorious Church a second time, and of acting the second part of the famous Tragedy; and of infamating your craftily into the good Opinions of the People, by the Pretence of Love and Zeal to their God and Welfare. Of these beware, and take this as a certain Truth, that a House of Commons made up of such Country-men as the pretended Godly Party cry up, will be the most antimonarchical, seditious, and fractious Assembly in the Christian World. From which, god Lord deliver us.

The Nonconformists, in their turn, let forth two Papers; one Formal, modest and patient, call'd Excuse; the other Aspers in the Chair of the Honourable in the first Paragraph of which, they speak with Acknowledgments of the Country's being refer'd to its ancient Right of Frequent Parliaments; and the other a profoud Inveective against the Clergy, in a Letter of Advice, as follows:

J. R.

I received yours of the sixth Instant, and am fully of your mind, that our Representatives cannot be suffered to make Laws to regulate Elections, we must supply that Defect by some Contract enough ourselves, whereby all unnecessary Charge may be prevented, as of late has been done in usual Custom in the Case of Sherrifs; for otherwise the present Design of such Frequent Changes of Parliaments, may prove dangerous to the Peoples Interest, as the representing of us. Our Grants do not for fear of our own People, but of themselves, and are full of Reproaches for their rash and lousy Dissolution of the late sessions opening Parliament, and are therefore attempting to retrieve that Error by tying on the People with Frequent Changes, till they can get some for their Tooth, as manageable and necessary as the former. And therefore to obviate this Mischief, we must make Elections easy both to the Chiefs and the Chosen. To consider of which, is also to consider the Mismanagement, as a public Charge, of all Abuses by Mayers, Bishops, and Sheriffs, in making double and false Returns, and all other undue and illegal Practices; I shall, with the rest of the Gentlemen in these Parts, give you the Meeting you desire.

I had all Persons very forward to condescendence this public Work, except the high-bred Ritualists and Ceremonious Members of the Clergy, who being the Country's Enemies did our People, lay out themselves to accommodate their Masters with the worst Villains that can be pickt up in all the Country, that so they may fall into the Hands again of a treacherous and lewd Parliament, as the Widow of God and Folly of Man has not innocently freed as from. To which end they reduce all worthy Men for Passions, Schismatics or Favourers of them; may do but pitch upon a Gracious fair believes: it is my Duty to love his God, his King and Country faithfully, they cry him down as a Person dangerous and dissatisfied to the Government, thinking hereby to free the People from the Freedom of their Choice, and then suppose their hair-brain'd Journey-men and half-witted Fops upon them.

Wherefore I think it no less than a Duty incumbent on us, in this time of public Danger, to exert the best of our Leaders of the House with their delegat Conscience, to the Peoples View, and to wipe off that little Point that is upon them, that the whole Nation seeing them in their proper Colours, may have that Contempt and Scorn for them which they deserve.

For as no Love nor Kindness from Christing, can be too much to such Ministers of the Gospel as shall diligently and faithfully discharge their Duties, without officiously involving and tumbling themselves in secular Affairs; so when they shall desert their own Station, and prove cruel Instruments in the Hands of their Managers, of Cruelty, Rapine, and Oppression of a People, instead of preaching up the good Tidings of Peace and Happiness to Mankind, they thus become a Den of Thieves, and ought to be esteemed by all Lovers of their Country, as unnatural and public-Defamers of its Peace and Welfare.

By their Office, indeed, they are the Sale of the Earth, but having lost their Savour, they are henceforth good for nothing but to be cut out and trodden underfoot of Men, as our Saviour teaches. For, pray now, because we ought to honour and most tenderly affect those that lay out themselves and Talents for the Salvation of our Souls; does it therefore follow that we must bear the same Respect to such an endeavour the Destruction of our Bodies and Estates? God forbid that to brutal an Intereſt ſhould infect the Minds of Men! A great Sympathy that adminiſters wholeſome and found Medicines, ought to be rewarded; a but an ignorant or knaviſh Queſt, that gives us Poſion inſtead of Phyſic, deſerves an Halber, though he has the College Licence.

St. James put a pertinent and honeſt Queſtion to the Chriſtians of his time. From whence come Wars and Fightings amongſt you? And were he now alive to repeat it, all Europe would ſwift him with one Voice, From knaves and timeſerving Priests, who conſidering their own ſecular Advantages, and as they go to ſhewſtraps, a worldly blaſt of Wealth, of Grandeur, and of Power, have ſet their hearts all People ſlaves to their Princes, and Priests ſlaves to their Priests.

Theſe Traitors of the Gobel have deſerted the plain Paths of Righteouſneſs, and betaken themſelves to a ſerpentine Courſe of creeping into Courts, and there have created and fomented Miſunderſtandings and Jealouſies betwixt governing Powers and their Subjects, that thereby they might ſeemingly become neceſſary to the one, and have an Opportunity of pilſaging, oppreſſing, and ſubverting over the other. 'Tis theſe of Beſtial, who in all Ages have endeavoured to corrupt and Rain the generous Minds of Princes with arbitrary and unmanly Maxims of Government and State, and have fram'd for them the weak Pollicy of Cruelty, Craft, Treachery, and formal Devotion, inſtead of Protection, Wiſdom, Juſtice, and Righteouſneſs, which alone can eſtabliſh a Nation; inſomuch that Magiſtracy, which ought to watch for the Good of the People, is ſain to be watch'd by the People, ſuch it rain and ſhale them. 'Tis theſe who live in Sheep Clothing, who have eaten up the People of God like Bread, and in all Parts of the Chriſtian World have ſpirited the making, and edg'd the Execution of perſecuting and tanguiſary Laws: Wherefore I believe good Father Jacob had a Foreſight of theſe Sons of Levi, when in his laſt Will and Teſtament he left them a Curſe for a Legacy, inſtead of a Bleſſing. And if the whole World were ſo to make their Will, all but Knaves and Fool would do the like.

You may eafily call to mind a late Inſtance of the Humanity and Confidence of the Race of Men here in England: For when his Majeſty not long ſince attempted to follow his own Inclinations, and attempt a Declaration of Indulgence to tender Conſciences, the whole Papal Court ſeem'd to be raiſed againſt him: Jeſus Reader and Geſuites of the Church could then talk as freely of their King, as they do now of the late Honourable Parliament; ſay, they begin to find upon their Terms, and deliver'd out as Orthodox Doctrines, that the King was to be ſubordinate to Law, and therefore could not ſuſtain a Formal Statute, that the Subjects Obedience was a Legal Obedience; and therefore if the King commanded any thing contrary to Law, the Subject was not bound to obey; with ſo many other honeſt Poſitions, that Men wonder'd in God how ſuch Knaves ſhould come by them. But wherefore was all this Wrath, and all this Doctrine? Merely becauſe his Majeſty was pleas'd for a time to remove the ſore ſack'd Differences from under the Poſſeſſion of the ſacred Eſtate of which, is never denied to Holy Church, but the Magiſtracy immediately allied with the Noſe and Clamour of Democritus and his Craftsmen.

But now the Tables being turn'd, the ſame mercenary Tongues are again all Silence and Maſmaring: not a bit of Law nor Confidence either is now to be ſaid for Love or Money, nor any Limits to be put to the King's Commands, or our Obedience. 'Tis a Gospel-Truth with theſe Men, That all which we have is the King's; and if he ſhould command our Estates, our Wives and Children, yea, and our Religion too, we ought to reſign them up, ſubmit, and be ſilent. And therefore in the approaching Meditations of all Men, I would avoid ſuch as are recomended by theſe Speophants, till ſuch damnable Doctrine ſhould crawl from the Pulpit, into the Parliament Houſe, to the Destruction of Religion, and utter Ruin of the State.

The Party-hater ſpoke out in the following broad Queſtions; but which are call'd in the Title ſable and ſuſtainable:
1. Whether the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, are not ſubject to the ſole Dominion by the ſole Conſtitution of the bloody Papacy, as hath been declar'd by two Parliaments, and ſufficiently prov'd by the King's Witneſſes, before the Judges of this Kingdom?

2. What Poſture of Defence extraordinary is the City of London and Nation in, at the Diſcovery of ſo heinous a Plot, to defend themſelves from the Inſultation of Papuſts at home, and Inſultion from Papuſts abroad, ſuitable to the Deſires of a loyal Parliament?

3. Whether Proteſtation and Dilſolution of Parliaments, at ſuch a Time as this, doth not hit the Hearts of Proteſtant Subjects with evident Fears of Deſtruction, and gives the curſed Plotters too much Ground to believe (as they ſhould) that yet their Day is coming?

4. Whether have we not great Reason to fear, that the Papuſts will not heaſily take Reaſonment to proceed in their heinous Deſign to murder the King; who they know is ſworn at his Coronation to maintain and defend the Proceſtant Religion (and ſo is ſolemnly engag'd againſt them) where-by they may ſubvert the Government, by bringing in a popuſh Succeſſor, in whom is all their Help and Hope?

5. Whether any Speeches to be in Parliament, in favour of a popuſh Succeſſor, is not of direcd Tendency to prepare the Nation to make Trial of it again; as if the deſcal'd Likeneſs of Queen Mary's Reign were, or were not, forgotten, whole great Poſitives were ſeal'd with Fire and Eggot?

6. If ſo, what are we to think of them that have or ſhall diſcountenance, or endeavour to corrupt, the King's Witneſſes; or that do indulge arragant Traitors, impudently to aſperſe the Juſtice of the Land?

7. Whether it is not the indispensible Duty of all Proteſtant Magiſtrates whatſoever, with the People of England, to conſider with themſelves, and conſult the Learned in the Laws, what Power God, and the King, and the Laws, have put into their Hands, for the Preſervation of Popery and Slavery, both from themſelves and Pellerity; left their Ignorance and Security bring Deſtruction without Recovery?

8. Whether it will not be the perpetual Honour of the Magiſtrates of London to be firſt in this Work, inſomuch as that famous City hath world Experience, in theſe many dreadful Burnings, that the tender Mercies of the Papuſts towards them is popuſh Cruelty?

9. Whether that costly Monument, erected near London Bridge, is not to be a perpetual Land mark for all English and Foreign Proteſtants, for ever, to remember 1656, September 2, when thoſe curſed Plotters began to ſet fire to a Baker's Hoſie in Pallding-lane; which by their Emulſions was conducted on, for four Days together, till it had in Adhes thirteen thousand two hundred Houſes, having waſt three hundred ſeventy-three Acres of Land within the Walls, and above ſixty-three Acres without the Walls, with eighty-nine Paruſh Churches?

10. Whether the Spanish Inſurrection, 1588, and the Gunpowder-Treſon, 1605, together with the cruel Murders and Maſſacres of ſome hundred modified Proteſtants, Men, Women, and Children, in the Netherlands, Ireland, Edinburgh, and the Algeries, be not a ſufficient Warning to England, that they believe their God, and their King, and their Parliament, muſt not ſuffer, of ſuch deſtructive Principles, may dwell in our Land?

11. Whether ſuch a Day as this doth not loudly call for Repentance, that Proteſtants have been perſecuting each other; and for Unity in Affection among all Proteſtant Subjects, whether conforming, or diſſenting in ſome leſs Points; and that as Brethren they unite in ſuch a Combination, or Conjunction, as was in Queen Elizabeth's Time, with good Succels to defend the Crown, Religion and Kingdom, againſt the common Enemy of Mankind; inſomuch as the epuſcal Proteſtants, as well as others, muſt lie down in the ſame bed of Flames together, if the Pope and his Party get the upper Hand?

12. Whether it be not the Duty of all good Proteſtants, to pray for the long Life of the King, that he may live ſo, as becometh the Lume Religion; it being an Eſſay to all Vice, and the Maintenance of all Virtue: Forasmuch alſo, that the removing of the King (as the Papuſt call it) is the moſt likely Way to let in Popery, and a thouſand other Miſeries, upon this poor Kingdom?

13. Whether it be not his Duty for all the Proteſtants in England to reſolve as one Man, that they will ſtand by and maintain the Power and Privileges of Parliament; together with the Power and juſt Rights of the King, according to the Laws of the Kingdom, ſo as the one may not inſult upon the other?

14. Whether it be not the Duty of all good Proteſtants to be heartily thankful to God for the timely Discoveries of this heinous Plot; and alſo to pray, that God would preferve the King and Kingdom's Witneſſes, that they may fulfil their Teſtimony, to the well-becoming to ſignal a Work, and be of a humble Behaviour before Almighty God, the King and Kingdom; that they may obtain Mercy at the Hand of God, and not be Caſt away to themſelves, while they are of ſuch public Uſe and Benefit to theſe bleeding Nations?

15. Whether all the Counties, Cities, and Corporations in England, are not at this time more highly concern'd than ever, to make choice of ſuch for Parliament-men, as may not fell but ſave them, to the happy Settlement of our preſent Proteſtant King and Government?

16. Whether therefore it be not the Duty of the People to chooſe ſuch as are well known to be Men of good Conſcience, and Courage, thoroughly grounded in the Proceſtant Religion

Were it as easy to disarm Power, as to expose Craft; it would be as laudable to unmake the false Patriot, as to disarm the avow'd Oppressor: Both are of the Cannibal-kind, and consider their Fellow-Creatures only as their Prey. Now of all the Patriots, that, in the distracted Times we treat of, stood forth as Guardians and Saviours of the Commonwealth, few or none seem to have thought the public Peace worth their Concern. On the contrary, they made it their Business to enflame the Passions of the People, not to appease them: They magnify'd visible Dangers; they dress'd up imaginary ones; they created new ones: They never testify'd so much Satisfaction, as when declaiming on national Grievances; and they never were more sensibly mortify'd, than when any Prospect was open'd of their Removal. In a word, they rais'd the Storm, that they might have the Plunder of the Wreck.

This is a heavy Charge; and he that has a prejudic'd Eye will read it with Indignation: But it is fit the Truth should be told, whoever is dispos'd,--- And were there no other Evidence remaining than a Pamphlet called, An Appeal from the Country to the City, which has been preserv'd in the Collection of State-Tracts, and which was publish'd immediately after the Elections were clos'd, that alone would be sufficient to shew, that our Censures are not uncharitable. It begins with an Address to the Passions; places the Reader on the Top of the Monument; bids him fancy the City in Flames, all round him; the Streets at the same time flowing with Blood: And that he saw Popery acting the double Part of Slayer and Incendiary: For all these horrid Spectacles were infallibly to take place, if ever Popery prevail'd. The next Inflammatory is the Plot; and, close coupled with that, the Duke is brought forward, and set forth as the Dupe of France, and Slave of Rome. The King is next, by Craft, represented as in the Plot against himself: An Italian Poisoner is called a Wake- man; and, again, Agrippina had her Wake-man. The several Discouragements the Plot had labour'd under are then enumerated. The Danger of the King's Person from the Papists for the sake of a Papish Successor, introduces the next Consideration (for in these several Topics are call'd.) And here such a Variety of Matter occurs, and of so remarkable a kind, that instead of a Copy in Miniature, we must give this Part of our Draught in their own Words at large:---"Let us, in the next Place, examine their Interest (that of the Papists) at this time; where we shall find, that their Interest does unavoidably excite them to murder his Sacred Majesty: For, first, they know he cannot long subsist without a considerable Sum of Money, which he must receive either from their Party, or from the Parliament. Now for them to supply him with so vast a Sum, is a Charge, that, you may well imagine, they would desire to get rid of, if they could, tho' by the King's Death. On the other Side, for the Parliament to supply him with Money that they know cannot be done, but by taking off the Heads of their Faction, excluding their Succession, and consenting to such Laws as must of necessity ruin them: Besides, his Majesty hath already permitted the Execution of so many of their Party, as they never can nor will forgive it. All which put together, with the great Expectation they have from a Papish Successor, will make them vigorously and speedily attempt the King's Ruin, unless he speedily prevents it by adhering to his Parliament, and ruining them first. If his Majesty would be pleas'd for one Month, to think himself Henry VIII. and we his Subjects, for the same time forgetting we are Protestants, do by the Papists, as they would do by us were they in our Condition, what would become of Portugal (the QUEEN) and Brassils (the DUKE). Even Rome itself would tremble at us. Something must speedily be done, and if we will not begin with them, they will begin with us: For all the Power

Religion, and of high Resolution to maintain it with their Lives and Fortunes?

17. Whether all true Englishmen ought not seriously to consider, what they trust the Parliament who, on their Estates, Liberties, Religion, and Lives; And should they be unwise in any of these, when it is too late they may lament themselves, that they are unwise, by making such a Choice as has undone them by Law?

18. Whether it should not be the great Care of all Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, to consider who have been formerly Favourers or Favourers of Popery: And whether they are fit again to be entrusted with their Religion, Lives, and Liberties?

19. Whether you are not bound to consider those worthy Members of the late Parliament, who have already faithfully serv'd you and the whole Kingdom, with their Persons and Estates; and now show your Esteem of them, and Acceptance of their former Services, by an unanimous choosing of them again, forasmuch as they are best acquainted with the deplorable State of this Kingdom?

20. Whether it be not your indispensable Duty to endeavour to make these Elections easy, by bearing your own Charges, and the Charges of the meaner Sort of Freeholders, lest such as would heartily serve you be in time discouraged to undertake that great Work of preserving you and your Posterity in your lawful and undoubted Rights?

21. Whether any we not, without Breach of Chastity, conclude, that if known Favourers do now by Secret, in Parliament they do not intend again to make Merchandise of all that is dear to us? And whether will not all Freeholders and Esquires be deservedly accounted infamous, and the Betrayers of their Country, who shall resolutely, after such Discoveries of our Dangers, and such Opportunities of being, by God's Blessing, deliver'd from them by honest English Parliaments, sell themselves, their Wives, Children, and Estates, for one of Esau's Morsels?

22. Whether it be not the hearty Prayer of all good Protestants, That the King would be pleas'd to hearken unto, and rely upon, the Advice of his Parliament; and avoid all such, who seek to make themselves rich, by making the King and Kingdom poor: Forasmuch as the Parliament are the true great Council of the King and Kingdom; and by them the King is supply'd, out of the Purse of the Kingdom; and they command and encourage the People to venture the shedding of their dearest Blood, in any just and righteous Cause, to maintain the King and Kingdom's Power and Greatness?

23. Whether, if you will believe the Johns and Frises, in St. Omers, that there was never any such Man as Sir Edmund Godfrey; and if you will believe what his Murderers said at their Death, that they did not murder Man, then you must not believe there was any such Man as Sir Edmund Godfrey in England?

24. Lastly, Whether, if Papish Treasons and Murders render the Papists, at their Death, as innocent as the Child unborn; who would not be a Murderer, and Papish Traitor? All these, and many more Pieces publish'd at the same Time, are taken out of Lord Sunderland's Collection; and serve to give a more lively Image of these troubled Times, than can be receiv'd from any Description whatsoever.

his Majesty can shew them will not satisfy that greater Expectation which they have from a declar'd popish King.

Thus we see the King is not only call'd upon to play the Tyrant for the Sake of Liberty, and to persecute for God's Sake; but is bluntly told, that unless he will do so, he shall have no Supply. This is such plain Dealing, that it needs no Comment.

Nor is this all: A Transition is made to the City of London: Fire is the Visitation they are taught to apprehend, and from the Jesuits Hands, who, it seems, desir'd the burning of London above all things, for these Reasons: "First, Because it was the only united Force able to withstand Arbitrary Government, and without that Popery could never prevail. Secondly, It was the only Place, where, by reason of that excellent Preaching and daily Instruction in the Protestant Religion, the People had a lively Sense thereof, and, doubtless, will not part with it to please a Prince, but, perhaps, rather lose their Lives by the Sword in the Wars, than by Faggots in Smithfield. And thirdly, It was too powerful for any Prince that govern'd not by the Love of his People, which no Popish Successor could expect to do."

Again, the Citizens are farther told, "That the greatest Danger occurring to their Persons, as well as to the whole Kingdom, upon the King's untimely Death, will proceed from a Confusion and Want of some eminent and interested Person, whom they may trust to lead them up against a French Popish Army: For which Purpose, no Person was fitter than his Grace the Duke of Monmouth, as well for Quality, Courage, and Conduct, as for that his Life and Fortune depended on the same Bottom with theirs. He will stand by you, proceeds the Pamphlet, THEREFORE YOU OUGHT TO STAND BY HIM. And remember the old Rule is, He who hath the worst Title, always makes the best King, as being constrain'd by a gracious Government to supply what he wants in Title: That instead of God and my Right, his Motto may be, God and my People." In the Conclusion, the Reasons given for addressing these Considerations to the Citizens of London, are said to be, Because on the Death of any King, the Lord-Mayor, then in being, would be the only Magistrate in the Kingdom, that retain'd any Office of Power capable of serving the Subject; and because They were the Persons who must revenge their Sovereign's violent Death." The last Sentence is an ejaculatory Prayer for the Preservation of the King and the Prosperity of the City: And to shew the great Sincerity of the first of these Clauses, it is subscrib'd with the Name of Junius Brutus; so famous for his cordial Attachment to the Kings of Rome.

Perhaps there never was a Paper publicly distributed, in which a King is so confidently told how much he was in the Power of his Subjects; in which the Murder of that King is so familiarly discours'd of; in which Provision is so openly made to dispose of the Succession by Force of Arms, in case that Event should take place; and in which a Nobleman so frankly offers himself by name to lead an Insurrection, that a Crown may be his Reward; and that not because he had a right to it, but because he had none, as in This.

No Party, 'tis be presum'd, will now attempt to justify or palliate so barefac'd an Attempt to throw the Nation into Confusion. If it was reasonable to dread the Approaches of Popery; and therefore to contend for the Exclusion preferable to all the Advantages offered in Lieu of it, it was far from being so, to make an Appeal to the People by Sound of Trumpet; and when they had just chosen a Representative, to bid them stand to their Arms, and make ready to decide all Difficulties by the Sword. All that Charity can do then in favour of the leading Patriots of those times, is to suppose, That it was the Work of some Desperado, and that they neither join'd in the Project, nor countenanc'd the Publication.

But, unluckily, when Harris the Publisher of it was brought to his Trial at Guild-Hall for being so, he was follow'd into Court by such Multitudes as gave the Recorder Occasion to say, He hop'd they were rather come to blush for him than to give him Encouragement. It was also made appear in the Course of the Trial, that he had boasted, He had Thousands to stand by him; and that, tho' the Lord Chief Justice did not fail to set forth the pernicious Tendency of the Piece, the Jury would give in no other Verdict, than, Guilty of filling the Book; which was receiv'd by all present with loud and vehement Shouts of Applause: At which his Lordship very justly took great Offence, and express'd great Indignation. Yet farther, it no where appears that his Grace of Monmouth took the least Umbrage at the free Use that had been made in it of his Name and Pretensions. And what is worst of all, we shall find in the Course of this Work, that no one Item is there advanc'd which does not correspond in all respects with the subsequent Transactions of the Party.

It would be a Matter of some Curiosity, if not Use, to state the exact time when this Train was fir'd; for, either just before, or soon after, the King, being at Windsor, took Cold towards the latter End of August, which brought on a (w) Fever, and struck such violent Apprehensions both through the Court and Kingdom, that, according to Sir William Temple's Expressions, "People look'd upon any thing at this time that should happen to the King, as an End of the World." But Terror, it seems, was not their only Agitation; for Sydney declares, "Mens Minds were

(w) Soon after this Incident took place, a scandalous Paper was set forth, containing twenty-two Articles of Impeachment against the Duchess of Portsmouth; some of which were apparently groundless, many improbable, and all malicious; as may be gather'd from the 18th, which charged her with being the Cause of his Majesty's Illness, by persuading him to take a Melt of Broth, prepared by some of her Popish Servants.

more disturb'd on that Occasion, than ever he had remember'd them to have been; so that there was no Extremity of Disorder to be imagin'd, that the Nation might not have probably fallen into, in case the King had dy'd, or that was not to be dreaded, in case he had even relaps'd.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Duke of Monmouth now set up his Pretensions to the Crown with little or no Reserve; and scarce could hope for a fairer Opportunity to make them good: He was countenanc'd by a numerous Faction in the City; he had the military Men under his Command; he had his Partizans all over the Kingdom; the Hople of Commons were such as his own Heart could wish; he had no contemptible Interest in the House of Peers; he was of the Privy Council himself; not only the President, but a Handful of the other Lords were at his Devotion; and he was in his Person dear to the King himself.

On the other hand, his great Rival the Duke was an Exile; a Bill to disable him was in every body's Hand, tho' it had not receiv'd the Sanction of the Legislature; all who presum'd to let a Whimper escape in his Favour, were branded with the Name of the Conspirators; he himself was loaded with all the Odium and Ignominy of the Plot; and those who had the Credit of managing all things at Court were understood to be sworn Enemies to his Interest.

But under all these Difficulties and Distresses, he had one Happiness which preserv'd him from all the disagreeable Consequences which he had so much Reason to fear. By refusing to go all Lord Shaftsbury's Lengths, that they might not be his Tools and Properties, and by advising the Prorogation of the Parliament, that he might not be able to carry his Point without their Assistance, the Triumvirate, as we have seen, became as obnoxious to his Lordship's Reluctments, as the Duke of York himself: And this Community of Danger, for a while at least, produc'd a Community of Interest. When, therefore, they were in Pain for the King's Life, from the Effects of his Indisposition, not the Plot, (x) they prevail'd with his Majesty to send an Express for the Duke, that, in Return for this signal Service, they might be entitl'd not only to his Protection, but to a Place in his Favour.

No Measure was ever resolv'd upon, or executed with more Secrecy than this. The Duke (y) arriv'd before his Adversaries had the least Apprehension that he was sent for: Mr. Carte lays, that he had the Felicity to be known by no body on the Road, except by two Men at Dover; who, seeing him in Disguise, kept the Secret: And the King being now in a fair Way of Recovery, it was agreed on all Hands, that it should pass for a Journey of his own: and that, to render the Blind more effectual, both his Majesty and the Triumvirate should receive him with all the Tokens of Surprize; which, it seems, they perform'd so very well, that poor Sir William Temple not only fell into the Snare, but, in his Audience of the Duke, made it his Business to remove his Prejudices against the Lords Effex and Hallifax, by saying all the fine things he could of their Attachment to his Royal Highness, and his Interests.

But however exquisitely the Farce was play'd, it could not deceive those it was principally intended to deceive. The Lords Monmouth and Shaftsbury saw to the very Bottom of the Artifice immediately; and, of course, were as much engag'd on one hand, as mortify'd on the other: But the Resentment they shew'd serv'd only to furnish the Duke with fresh Arguments against themselves; Their Intrigues were no Secret; they struck at the Root of his unquestionable Right, and he must have been more or less than Man, not to meditate the Ruin of those, who made it their sole Study to ruin him.

At the same time that the two Factions were thus trying their Skill at Court, they also try'd their Strength in the City. As Care had been early taken to reconcile the Citizens to the Duke's Attendance on his Brother, by an Intimation to the Magistracy, that it was unexpell'd; the next Practice that was try'd was, to spirit them up to countenance it by an Address of Congratulation: On the other hand, to blait the whole Proceeding, and to represent his Royal Highness in the Light of a public Enemy, Sir Thomas Poyer, the City Chamberlain, follow'd by a large Posse of Citizens, or such as called themselves so, made their Appearance in Guildhall, the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen sitting; and, in a set Speech, in his own Name, and in the (z) Names of those with him, first expatiated on the Advantage and Encouragement which the Duke of York's being a Passy had given to the Rise and Progress of the Plot; which was still carrying on, and still levelled at the Life of his Majesty; and then requested, that the City-guards might be doubled; and that, instead of two, four Companies might do Duty every Night: Alleging, for a Reason, that the Necessity to strengthen their Hands was then greater than when eight Companies kept guard, because the Danger was greater. The Lord Mayor reply'd to this Effect, viz. That this could not be comply'd with, without the Consent of the Licentiency: That he would assemble them on the Thursday following (this was Saturday) for that Purpose: That, for the future, he hop'd Sir Thomas Poyer would not think it expedient to make his Applications at the Head of so numerous a Body; since it might possibly give Offence: And that there was Reason to think the Cause

(x) Sir Tobias Knollys affirms, p. 98, this Revocation of the Duke was principally owing to the Intervention of the Lord Essex, who afterwards told him the whole Story: But, tho' the Lord Essex was the Duke's Favourite, it no where appears, that he had any remarkable Attendance over the King.

(y) It is fit the Reader should be acquainted, that Colonel Clarendon, who makes such a Figure in the Sequel of our History, was of the Duke's Party at Brussels, and accompany'd him in this important Journey to Court.

(z) The printed Account lays, In the Names of all the Inhabitants of the City.

A. D. 1679. Cause of their present Fears would soon be remov'd; since he was well assur'd, the Duke of York was making Preparations for his Departure in three or four Days. Sir Thomas, by way of Rejoinder, then threw out some minatory Expressions against those who said, There was no Plot, but a Protestant Plot on the Papists, calling them Practisants in Masquerade; promised to meet the Lieutenant with a few of his Friends, on the Day appointed, with additional Reasons for his Demand; and withdrew with his Corps.

These were Times, in which every bold Man pass'd for a great Man; and in which, both the Magistracy and Ministry were forc'd to consult the Humour, as well as the Welfare, of the People: And so strongly did this Piece of Patriot-Extravagance operate, that, tho' the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen went with unusual Pomp to Windſor; they confin'd their Compliments to the Recovery of the King; and, to avoid Clamour, avoided any formal Mention of his Royal Brother.

On the other hand, when the Lieutenant met, according to the Lord Mayor's Summons, in expectation of Sir Thomas Pleyer and his Friends, neither they nor he appear'd; fearing, perhaps, that, without further Explanation, their Demand would be treated with Contempt; and that, by explaining it too far, it might become a Snare to themselves. The Lieutenant, however, took it into Consideration, and resolv'd, upon the Question, "That they did not think it fit to put any further Charge on their Fellow-Citizens, at present." &c.

While these Counter-practices excited the Attention, and alarm'd, if not disturb'd, the Peace of the City, the Scenes shuffl'd at Court, in the most sudden and surprisng Manner, and exhibited one of those striking Spectacles that Moralists refer to, to illustrate the Instability of human Grandeur. The Duke of Monmouth, who had of late been worshipp'd as the Day-Star of the State, and who had shone forth with more than natural Glory, faded at the Return of the Duke of York; and, almost at once, disappear'd; the Revolution, however extraordinary, coming on with such Rapidity, that the most curious Observers had scarce Leisure to mark its several Stages: And hence, the Minutes they have left us shew more of Wonder at the Effect, than Knowledge of the Cause and Manner of Operation: All that we know of certain being, That the Duke arriv'd at Windſor September 2; that his Friends and Partizans recover'd their Spirits immediately upon it; that he gain'd ground on his Rival every Day, and almost every Hour; inasmuch, that, by the 12th, his Grace of Monmouth was depriv'd of his Command in the Army; and, by the 24th, was on his Way to Holland, having receiv'd his Majesty's express Commands to quit the Kingdom: Which he very unwillingly submitted to.

It is true, the next Day after, the Duke of York set out also, on his Return to Brussels: But the Difference of their Train shew'd the Difference of their Circumstances. His Royal Highness, when he took his Leave of the King, was attended to his Lodgings by such a Concourse of People, as had never been seen since his Majesty's Restoration; and from thence on board his Yacht, by a great Number of the Nobility: Whereas the Duke of Monmouth had not the Countenance of any one Man of Quality, except the Lord Brandon-Gerrard, to lend any Lustre to his Exile; and, by taking out his Pardon before he went, tacitly acknowledg'd, that he had offended the Laws, as well as the King. It, moreover, became soon apparent, that the Duke of Monmouth was sent away in a State of Humiliation; and that nothing less than Repentance and Acknowledgment would entitle him again to Grace and Favour: Whereas his Royal Highness departed only to return with his Family in Triumph, as after a Victory over his Rival; and had Seotland assign'd for the Place of his Residence; seemingly, in compliance with the Clamours of his Enemies; but, in reality, that he might be arm'd with the Power of that Kingdom, and thereby enabled to make good his Title to it: He also carry'd another important Point, before his Departure, which shew'd that his Interest with the King was all-sufficient, namely, the putting off the Session: All the remaining Strength of his Enemies lay in the House of Commons, and he was resolv'd they should derive no Benefit from it; at least, till Time had somewhat qualify'd their Fury, and proper Endeavours had been used to loosen their Hold upon the People.

But, according to Sir William Temple, however artificially this Matter was laid by those of the Cabal, they fell into the very same Mistake which had occur'd at the Dissolution of the last Parliament, in the Manner of communicating it to the Council: All was laid upon the King, as before, who said,

"That, upon many Considerations, which he could not then communicate, he found it necessary to make a longer Prorogation of the Parliament than he had intended: That he had considered all the Consequences, so far as to be absolutely resolv'd, and nor to hear any thing against it: That he would have it prorog'd till that Time Twelve-month: And that he gave it in charge to the Lord Chancellor to proceed accordingly." The Majority of the Council were again astonish'd at so abrupt a Declaration: Several rose up to reason upon it; but were oblig'd to desist; the King continuing positive to admit of no Opposition, and, in effect, signifying thereby, That he did not require Advice, but Obedience.

Care was, however, taken to prepare the Public for this Alteration of Measures, by due Degrees. The first Prorogation was only from the 17th to the 30th of October; which was follow'd soon after with public Notice in the Gazette, "That his Royal Highness having represent'd to his Majesty, that he conceiv'd it would be more convenient, in many Respects, to be in his Majesty's own Dominions, than those of any other Prince; and made it his humble Request, to go into Scotland; his Majesty had granted it." This Notice was dated October 7: The 12th, their Lord Shaftsbury removed from the Council-board.

Royal Highnesses arriv'd at Whitehall, in their Way, as the Gazette phrases it, to Scotland: The 15th, the Parliament was yet farther prorogu'd: And, the same Day, Lord (a) Shaftsbury was dismiss'd from his Place at the Council-board.

These Proceedings have been hitherto treated with the Extremes of Applause or Censure; not as they were wrong or right, but as they pleas'd or displeas'd the different Palates of different Parties: What they really were will become apparent by their Fruits.

About the same time, a new Expedient was made use of, to shew, that the Duke had likewise an Interest in the City; and which was thought the more necessary, in as much as the Majority of the Citizens, at the late Election, had chosen the same Members, who had voted for the Exclusion-Bill, in the preceding Parliament. This Expedient was for the Artillery Company (who had already paid their Respects to his Majesty, and declar'd they neither had, nor would abuse the great Trust his Majesty had reposed in them) to send a solemn Invitation to his Royal Highness (whom some Years before they had chosen for their Captain, to honour them with his Company at Dinner; which he was graciously pleas'd to accept of. This was accordingly done; his Royal Highness made this politic Visit with great Pomp, and was received with great Respect; and the Gazette gave public Notice of the great Satisfaction that appear'd on both Sides, that the rest of the Kingdom might profit by the Example.

Passages of this nature in troublesome Times, are by one Party made to appear the spontaneous Effects of Love, Zeal and Duty, without the least Mixture of Artifice or Design; and by the other to be the Effect of Brigade and Cabal, Servility and Prostitution: And thus the very Incident we are now speaking of, which made an Article of such Importance in the Gazette, was by the Exclusionists set forth as a Prop for a sinking Cause. According to them, the Invitation arose principally from the Stewards of the Company (who, said they, were half (b) Cour-tiers, and half courtly Citizens.) And the Sense of the People, or rather the Mob, ran the quite contrary way: For his Royal Highness was receiv'd with Hisses when he came within Temple Bar in the Morning, and was saluted with the Cry of, No Pope! no Papist! at his Return in the Evening.

As there is no Reign from William the Norman better worth the Study of the Politician than this, so there is none that can possibly be more fatiguing to the Historian. Every Fact, how trifling and minute soever, is represented in quite opposite Lights by the opposite Factions: What one asserts, the other denies; and according to each other's Evidence, Truth has little to do with either: Hence every new Circumstance produces new Difficulties; and instead of Certainties, which ought to be the only Ingredients of History, we are forc'd to compound for Possibilities and Conjectures.

The State of the two Factions at the time immediately before us, was equally critical on both Sides. The Terror of the Parliament hung over one; the Return of his Royal Highness; the Exile of his Grace of Monmouth, and the utter Loss of the King, equally mortify'd the other. Thus the Scales were still in Suffiance; but as Politicians are not satisfy'd with a mere Balance, it became the Business of each to procure more Weight to make their own heavier.

The Plot had been the mighty Engine, by which the Exclusionists had been enabled to perform such notable Feats, and of this the main Springs began to fail: The Blood that had been shed; the dying Protestations of those that suffer'd; the Acquittal of Wakerman; and the ignominious Characters of the Witnesses, on whose Credit all depended, had open'd the Eyes and soften'd the Hearts of many; Some Repairs and Additions were therefore necessary to give it new Powers and Virtues. On the other Hand, it was the Business of all those who had already fallen within its Reach, and who had Reason to dread its farther Efficacy, to discover all its Weaknesses and Defects, in order to pull it to Pieces.

Things were in this Situation when the Intrigue, distinguish'd by the Name of the Meal-Tub Plot broke out, and of which we find the following (c) Compendium in Mr. North's Examen:

"One Dangerfield (who had been a Companion with Bodley upon the Road, and in Prison for Debt) seeing his Comrade in such Plenty and Esteem by his Testimony against the Papists in the Plot, knew not better how to introduce himself to be a Witness, than by offering his Service to the Papists, that he might have some Conversation with them to put a Colour upon his Testimony. And it happen'd, that the Lady Powell made it her Business to collect Money for diverse who were thrown into Goal on account of this Plot, or the Popish Religion; wherein Mrs. Celior, the Midwife, was her Agent, who was a notable, pragmatical Woman, and, by her Profession, was acquainted with many great Ladies at Court. Mrs. Celior, taking a Liking to this Dangerfield, and his Debt being but small, for which he was in Goal, recommended him to Lady Powell's Stock, and took him out, and he turn'd Papist by boot, and promised to be very officious to serve the Papists by soliciting for them, by taking Notes at Trials, and by going to Coffee-houses and other fanatical Clubs, and discover-vering Designs. His Forwardness begat great Confidence in him, and he was carried to Lady Povis to thank her for her Charity, and gave her many Assurances.

Dangerfield introduced to the Duke of York.

I make no Doubt but, all this while, he had some Friends, among the contrary Party; that were able to help him, and to let him pass amongst them, and be in some Cabals for the entitling him to some Credit. After a little time he comes big to Mrs. Colier, with a Discovery that the Fanatics were hatching a Rebellion, and that there was to be a sudden Rising in Arms, and that himself was to have a Commission and be a Captain; that new Counsellors of State were appointed, and a Model of an Army made affecting the Design; that, if he might find Credit, he would discover it to the King, and be a Spy upon them, and, in time, get so far into their Councils, as to know where their treasonable Papers lay, which he would reveal, that they might be seized; and at last he would get from them a Commission, which he would produce to detect their Villanies, and preserve the King. Mrs. Colier knew not any fitter Person to introduce him than my Lady Povis, who, by reason of her Nephew's Marriage with the Earl of Peterborough's Daughter, might bring him to the said Earl, in order to be brought to the Duke, to whom he had a great mind to apply himself, and whose Protection he desired.

The Duke presents him to the King, and he to the Secretary.

His Passage was very easy to the Duke; for these great Persons (Lord Peterborough and Lady Povis) not imagining the Villanies of the World, nor being used to Business, were very greedy of it when it was offered, and thought to appear very serviceable to the King as well as to the Duke by it. But the Duke, who had always lived regularly and carefully, as soon as the Captain was brought to him (for so he would be called, saying, that he missed his Employment among the Fanatics; he knew the King would repair him by a Commission of that Quality at least; and the Earl of Peterborough failed not to treat him in that Style) gave him Encouragement to serve the King, and told him he would inform the King of it, and he should suddenly know the King's Pleasure. The Captain was startled at this, and desired the King might not be acquainted with the Business, till it was more ripe for Discovery; but the Duke professed he would retain no Secret from the King, and bid him wait on the Earl of Peterborough, and he should have an Account of the King's Pleasure. The Captain was a little troubled at this; for he had a mind to transact with, and have frequent Access to, his Royal Highness, and expressed a Discontent. But there was no Remedy, and so he was to attend the King's Pleasure; which was, that Colonel Halsby should carry him to Secretary Coventry, to whom he should declare his Business, and receive Directions from him as there should be Occasion.

He was fain to play his Game as well as he could, and desired once to be brought to the King, to whom he declared what Confidence the Earl of Shaftsbury had in him; and, to make it appear, he produced to the King two Letters of Sir Richard Bulstrode, directed to the Earl (how he could come by them is very considerable, he said it was by Accident, they lying in a loose Drawer in the Earl's House.) The King made no Question but that he had been with the said Earl, but would give him no other Directions, but that he should wait upon the Secretary, and follow his Orders. Then he pretended want of Money, and obtain'd (d) some (being in Service of this Importance; and indeed it is the only fit Reward for Spies) whereupon he transforms himself into a genteel Habit, and presseth for more Money. But the Secretary began to grow suspicious, and told him all his Discoveries lay in his own Talk; for there was no manner of concurrent Testimony, nor any Commissions or Papers produced, whereof he had so often talked, and in plain Terms told him, he had more Money than he deserved.

He puts for-Money, and at last by the Secretary.

Then he pressed for a Warrant to search for Papers, and would have had the Duke procure it; but he, having been a Means to put this Affair into the Management of the King's Ministers, would not any way further concern himself in it. The Captain then would have had the King command Mr. Secretary to grant him his Warrant. But the King asking the Lord Chief Justice North, that casually stood by, it was told that, unless there was Oath to ground a Search, or some Circumstances of pregnant Suspicion, it could not be done. This Answer being given, the Captain saw there was no way to entrap these Men that walk by Rule; he must take some other course to bring himself fairly upon the Stage, for the time of Parliament was at Hand, which was to be his Harvest. Hereupon he gets a Warrant of Court to search for uncustomed Goods; and searched Colonel Mansel's Chamber in such a way, as it was plain he took care there should not want Demonstration that the (e) Papers were of his own laying, by the clear Testimony of the Constables and Officers that were with him. These Papers he brings to the Secretary's, who now thought him in earnest; and the Earl of Essex put a great Value on the Discovery, saying he believed there was something in it, for Mansel had been his Servant, and he was as ill a Man as could be, and very like to engage in that Kind.

mittee of Council, perceiv'd, at the Council-Stairs, Dosy, an Officer of the Mint, and this Dangerfield quarreling, Dosy saying he was a Coiner, and the Captain saying he was employ'd about the King's Business, and vouch'd Secretary Coveney, and this with great Earnestness for some time, stopping his Lordship's Passage up Stairs, and Dosy said he had Proof against him. The Lord—told him he would inform the Lords of it, and he was confident they would not permit any Man to shelter himself in Whitehall from the Law, especially in so great and so ignominious a Crime; and so went up and sat in the Committee, but did not interrupt the present Business with a Matter of such small Consequence, as that Quarrel was. But Sir Thomas Delemah, a Clerk of the Council, came to his Lordship, and told him Dosy had sent to put him in mind of the Coiner that was below, and thereupon shew'd a false Guinea, and undertook to prove that Piece was of that Fellow's coming. Thereupon his Lordship mov'd that a Messenger, by their Order, might seize him and put him into a Justice of Peace's Hand, to be examined, and ordered according to Law. The Order was given, and the thing presently done, and Secretary Coveney, coming afterwards, said, smiling, that his Intelligencer was apprehended for a Coiner, but was told, that his Intelligencer must answer the Law; and so the Captain was carried away and committed.

Colonel Manfel complain'd of the Abuse upon him, and, thereupon the Captain was sent for to answer, and pretended to make a Defence, but with so much Affectedness, and ridiculous Confidence against the plainest Proofs that ever were, that he was committed by the Council for this false Accusation of Colonel Manfel, and forging the Papers; and he was not wanting too, in his Defence, to shew how he was admitted into the King's Presence, and affirmed some Things contrary to the King's own Remembrance. During his being hurried to and fro, Mrs. Celzer was not wanting to place herself in his way, to hearten him, and promise him his Part should be taken; and he, to rid himself of some (g) Papers, gave them to her, advising her to hide

Major Allyp's Promise to me for a Commission. Mr. Goodley's Promise to support D. M. if banish'd.

Friday Night, the 12th of Septemb. D. M. went to the Sam-Towers, to converse with Playe (Sir Yonah) and Towks (another notable City English) for the setting Affairs, and also a Supply for himself, if banish'd. The Manner of the Meeting of four several Clubs, viz. At the King's Head Towers, at the Green-Dragon Towers, at the Sam-Towers, and one at a Chandler's-Shop in Wellminster; which are at present employ'd, as Writers and Messengers, into the Country; but, when Occasion shall require, they are to be Field-Officers. The Manner of sending those Messengers. The Manner of their Meeting, for the better Concurrence of all Matters. Their Way of contributing, how often, and for what Purpose it is done. The Papers they were in for a Rising in the City, if his Majesty had shew'd. The Design of rising in the North, to join with the Scotts; and what shall occasion that Rising there. Goodley's Account of the Chief Persons and Commanders there among them, viz. Lord Shoppshire, Lord Hallifax, Lord Raisin, Lord Essex, Lord Wharfe, D. Burkingham, Counsellor; D. Mannebach, General; Lord Grey, Lord Greyhound, and his Son, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Lieutenant-General; Blod, and Waller, to be Major-General. The Field, and other Officers, most of them meet at the several Clubs, together with some that are in the Country. The considerable Parties would come from his Majesty's Horse and Foot-guards, to join them, when Occasion should require. Allyp and Goodley promise to introduce me to Lord Shoppshire, to be employ'd as a Spy, and to have the Promise for a Commission. That only the Consent of Sir J. P. D. B. Sir W. W. Sir R. P. was wanting to give the Book; but if they would not comply, it should be done otherwise, as at the Parliament, &c.

A Parchment was seen in the Hatbox of Captain England, by Bel on Monday the 21st of Sept. 79, which was written on in indented Letters, They are authorized, &c. and thirteen Label-lets to it. This at Wood's Club. On the same Night was a secret Cabal held at Bled's House.

The next, being Friday Night, was one at Sir H. W.'s. Goodley told me, a Colonel of his acquaintance, was going to be killed, to discipline Men.

Friday the 10th of September, a Person was sent from Bled's Club to Hawkingdon, about weighty Business, and it was not return'd, which causes some Fear of Misfortune.

Sept. 30th, the Messenger return'd from Hawkingdon, who said, he had find'd the Business he went about, and that all that Part of the Country was in good Rendition.

Saturday, the 5th of October, a Cabal met at Waller's, to enquire about the Affairs of other Countries, but particularly, for the present, the County of Derbet, Devon, and Cornwall; and, in order thereto, two Persons were sent away with good Paquets; and, in one of them, were divers Papers, like printed Warrens; and Names and Seals to the same; but the Person who saw them could not come to read one. My Answer is Allyp.

Monday, the 7th, a Cabal met at Waller's, in order to the Dispatch of seven Persons into the North, and to 17.

City, to a Club there, at one Lee's House, a Tallow-Chandler. These go into some Part of Scotland too, before they return; and yet are oblig'd to return before the 30th of this Month. Sir W. W. Promise to B. for a Commission. Lord S. Promise of a Commission to, &c. Goodley's Promise to me of the List of 30000.

Sept. 6. Brown produced a Paper to the Company; who all approved of it, but especially one Dosy, who said, Goodley let the Men, whose Mind is not judicious in this Paper. One Majors, at the same Place, said, after some Discourse of Affairs, That all, within twenty Miles round London, were ready to rise, whenever they should be commanded, and that against the King's Interest too; and said, it was not the French King's pretended Invasion should put them in fear of any Army the King now had, or could raise. 'Tis also resolv'd, that, when any Commissioners are given out for the raising an Army for the King, that some of the Faction shall privately put in for Employments, in order to the better serving that Party, by corrupting his Majesty's Soldiers. Wit. Carter.

Wednesday, the 5th of October, I was with Lord S. Saturday, 19, B. told me, Sir W. W. said he had 300 Horse at his Command, to oppose an Army that the D. and Landwehr were going to raise in the North; and that, if they made not too much haire, he should have more.

But that the Reader may be more fully satisfy'd of the Matter of the Informations given to the King (says Colonel Manfel, out of whose Narrative this Copy is taken) I shall give him the true Copy of a Letter sent by Mr. Willoughby to his Majesty:

S I R,

May it please your most Sacred Majesty,

On Friday, the 24th of this Instant September, was sent by a Person whom I employ, in the Title of one England, a Paper, like a List of Men Names; and a Parchment, in the Liberties of a Commission, with thirteen Label-lets, and as many Names thereto, and at the Top, was in great Indenture-Letters (viz.) They are authorized, &c.

I myself was inform'd, that a Colonel, now in your Majesty's Foot-guards, was, to be sent into the North, to discipline a considerable Number of Men. My Author for this was one Goodley, a Nonconformist Parson.

Friday, the 26th, was a Person sent with a Packet, very considerable, (suppos'd to be so by my Friend, who saw the Outside thereof) to Hawkingdon: The said Person is not yet returned, nor to be heard of, which much amazes the Gang he was sent by, and at present puts a Stop to their Party.

It was spoken publicly in a Club, that all things were in a ready Posture, and they only expect your Majesty's Command to make the Order; but, if that be not, 'tis design'd at the Sitting of the Parliament, if your Majesty please not their Expectation.

I have also discover'd a great Correspondence between the same Party and the Dutch; and believe, as your Majesty's Return, to give a good Account of the late by God's Blessing: Till what time I shall use my utmost Endeavour to make myself

Your Majesty's most faithful and obedient Subject,

WILLOUGHBY.

A. D. 1679. hide them in the Meal-Tub. And he held a Correspondence with him in Newgate; and to the Mistress of Secrets and Intrigues was fast in the Trap, and suffered by standing in the Pillory. And the Captain was not long in Newgate, but desired one Day to be brought before Sir (b) Robert Clouston, then Lord Mayor, where he made Affidavit of a long Narrative, and was, from that time, taken to be one of the principal Discoverers of the Popish Plot. He accused the Lady Pewis and the Earl of Peterborough, and, afterwards the Duke of York, of High Treason. The King, being so long a Narrative so soon produced, concluded it had been meditated and prepared long before; and that all his Interchange at Court was only that he might be admitted into the Presence of those Persons whom he design'd to accuse; and that it was but an Introduction to his being a Witness to accompany the rest.

How the Earl of Essex was accused.

But it happened that he had stood in the Pillory, and could be no legal Witness, and the King would, by no Address or Application, be induced to (c) capacitate him to testify. So all his Projects failed, tho' he was as much careful, and as much Weight laid on his Testimony by the Anti-court Party, but to no Purpose. It was observed there was no Man so eager as the Earl of Essex, to prosecute the Lady Pewis, and to make use of him as well as Colonel Manfel, who appeared to be of his Side, to accuse and tax the Court of a Spain Plot; which was wondered at, when he had been so forward to affirm that he believed there was Reality in it.

This Dangerfield was bred a Clerk, being an Attorney's Son, and his Father deeply engaged in the late Times. He could write well, and was a handsome, proper young Fellow, of a versatile Wit; so that if he should have been accepted to testify, by Probability, he would have far outgone all the former Witnesses.

The Turn here given to this Affair, we see, is, That Dangerfield was a Decoy for the Exclusionists, and that they themselves were at the Bottom of the very Intrigue they afterwards so loudly clamour'd against. On the other hand, according to Bishop Barnet, he was a Tool of the Papists; and the great drift of the Device was, to fasten a Plot upon those who had fasten'd a Plot upon them: Whence his Lordship takes Occasion to say, "This was a great Disgrace to the Popish Party, and the King suer'd much by the Countenance he had given him."

Vol. 1. p. 476.

This is certain, that Dangerfield, Rogue, as he was known to be, was subsist'd at Celior's, at the Expence of the Countess of Pewis: This the Lady herself own'd at the Council-Board; as also, that he had told her of treasonable Papers laid at Westminster; and that on the Secretary's refusing to grant a Warrant to search for them without an Af- fidavit, Mrs. Celior had, in her Presence, given the Advice of seizing them by Custom-house Officers. 'Tis moreover certain, that the very Gazette, No. 1458, sets forth, that three several Persons, one no Friend to Dangerfield, had acknowledg'd several Circumstantial Matters which strengthen'd his Evidence: And as certain it is, that the Earl of Castlemain, the Countess of Pewis, and others, were committed on the Credit that was given to it by the Council. On the other hand 'tis certain, likewise, that Dangerfield confess'd at the Council-Board, that he had several times discours'd with Lord Shaftsbury: And if it is not equally certain, it is extremely probable that there was an Understanding between them; there being no other satisfactory way to account for his having those two Letters from Sir Richard Bullstrode to that Lord, in his Possession: So that the most natural Conclusion that can be drawn upon the whole, is, That both Parties were equally dispos'd by any means whatever, to ruin each other: And that Dangerfield, with all the Dexterity of a Master-Genius, apply'd himself to raise Contributions from both. Agreeable to which, the Lord-Chancellor observ'd to him, when before the Council, "That he was a fine Fellow, first to come to his Majesty with one Story, then to the Lord Pewis, and from him to Lord Shaftsbury, discovering to one what Discourse he held to another."

Manfel's Narrative, p. 40.

To pass from this controverted Story of Dangerfield, to a Survey of the Oeconomics of the Exclusionists, or Anti-courtiers, as far as they related to the Management of the People, can scarce be call'd a Transition: For, in Dangerfield's own Narrative, we meet with a Reference to Four grand political Clubs, consisting of two hundred Persons each; the most considerable Members of which had a Place in his List, as concern'd in the Presbyterian Plot against his Majesty. Now the principal of these Clubs was kept at the King's-Head Tavern in Fleet-Street, and was call'd from thence the King's-Head Club; and also the Green-Ribbon Club, because, on extraordinary Occasions, they wore green Ribbons in their Hats: As to the exact Time of its Establishment, it is hard to be fix'd; but there is Reason to think it was the Growth of this very Year: For, in a Tract call'd, The present great Intercourse of the King and People, by way of Letter, dated September 26, 1679, Mention is made of it as a Novelty: And, as to the Characters of the Persons it was compos'd of, they were represented as the whitest of Patriots, by some Men; they were condemn'd as the blackest of Incendiaries by others. Mr. North is clearly of the last Opinion; and draws such a Picture of them, as would almost countenance the worst of those Desperadoes, that, together with Cataline, devoted themselves to Infamy, and Account of the Green-Ribbon Club.

(b) Essex asserts, "That, by this Discovery, he made himself plainly appear, who let him in to frame this detestable Piece of Villany; which he settled the Conspirators, that they knew not what to do; yet procur'd, that the Mayor, instead of having Thanks return'd him for his Service to King and Country, met with a Check at Whitehall, for meddling with what concern'd him not. Growth of Papers, Part II. p. 205.

(c) The Gazette, No. 1458, says, his Majesty had granted him a Pardon; but under what Restrictions, is not explain'd.

and their Country to Perdition.— Some of his masterly Touches are as follow: "Their Seat was in a sort of Carfour at Chancery-lane End; a Center of Buiness and Company most proper for such Anglers for Fools! The House was double-balconied to the Front, as may be yet seen, for the Clubbers to issue forth in Fretco, with Hats, and no Perukes, Pipes in their Mouths, merry Faces, and dilated Throats, for vocal Encouragement of the Canoghis below, on usual and unusual Occasions. They admitted all Strangers, that were confidently introduced; for it was a main End of their Constitution to make Profelytes, especially of the raw, citated Youth, newly come to Town. This copious Society was, to the Faction in and about London, a sort of Executive Power; and, by Correspondence, all over England. The Resolves of the most retired Councils in, and Ministry of, the Faction were brought here, and orally insinuated to the Company, whether it were Lies, Defamations, Commendations, Projects, &c.— There it was known, in half an Hour, what any Member said at the Committee of Elections, or in the Houle, if it fat late: And every Post convey'd the News and Tales, legitimated there, as also the malign Constructions of all the good Actions of the Government; especially to Places where Elections were depending, to shape Mens Characters into fit Qualifications to be chosen or rejected. The Pope himself could not make Saints so readily, as they Papists; and so Half and Three-quarter Papists; as Belief was prompt or difficult.— And these, besides tutoring, were Carriers up and down, or Dispersers of seditious Talk, at proper Times, as Blood from the Heart, to publish Sedition all over the Town, to the Exchange, Witchinyster, Coffee-houses and Sub-Coffee-houses, in a wonderful Harmony of Discovery; So that a puiſne Politician, not aware of the Trick, from a universal Conformity of Discourte, would think the grossest Fallhoods to be Truth in Perfection. Their ordinary Discourse was chiefly on the Subject of Bravure in defending the Cause of Liberty and Property; and what every true Protestant and Englishman ought to venture and do, rather than be over-run with Popery and Slavery. There was much Recommendation of Silk Armour, which was suppoed to be Pittol-Proof, and the Prudence of being provided with it against the time that Protestants were to be mafficred. In which, says our Author, the Wearer was as safe as in an House; it being impossible to strike him for laughing.— This was Armour of Defence; and for Offence, they had a certain Pocket Weapon, call'd a Protestant Flail; the Handle of which resembled a Farrier's Blood-Stick, and the Fall was join'd at the End with a strong nervous Ligature, that in its Swing fell just short of the Hand, and was made of Liguan Vita, or rather, as the Poet term'd it, Mortis."

But the great thing for which this notable Confederacy became most eminent, was an Annual Pope Burning on the 17th of November, being the Anniversary of Q. Elizabeth's Coronation-Day, which was perform'd at great Expence, with much Pomp, and more Noise; and which, under the Pretence of inspiring the People with a proper Ardour against Popery, was calculated wholly and solely to enflame them against the Government, and season them for Sedition. "Faction, says Mr. North, always sustains their Project of destroying the Government, by enflaming the Rabble, or at least by making an Appearance as if they were enflamed; which is done by a military Disposition of Mob-Masters about in Corners, that upon the Watch-word, are to bring forward some hair-brain'd Rout, which they call'd the People. It was acted in those times to perfection, and the whole Party join'd in it, taking their Parts as regularly as Comedians upon the Stage: For they had also their Connection of Scenes, Entries, Exits, Poetry and Decorations, all design'd to conclude in Mischief." The Place of Prompter-General, or Manager of the whole, the same Writer insinuates, was fill'd by Lord Staffbury. But whether his Lordship acted in it by his own single Authority, or whether by Deputation from any superior Power, he does not take upon him to ascertain.

That Gentleman is, however, mistaken in fixing the first of these remarkable Pope Burnings in 1680; for, in a Folio Sheet, call'd LONDON'S Defiance to ROME, we have a circumstantial Narrative of one of those Processions, which is said to have been prepar'd by a Number of worthy, true Protestant Gentlemen, to express their own, the City's, and indeed the whole Nation's Defiance, and just Detestation of Papish Idolators, for the Celebration of that Anti-papal Jubilee-Day in 1679. The (k) Particulars, as a Matter of no small Curiosity, are inserted in the Notes below. Much

(k) On the said 17th of November, the Bells generally about the Town began to ring at Three a Clock in the Morning. At the Approach of the Evening (all things being in readiness) the solemn Procession began, setting forth from Moorgate, and so pass'd first to aldgate, and thence through Londonball-street, by the Royal Exchange, through Chancery-lane, and so to Temple-Bar, in the ensuing Order, &c.

1. Came six Whittlers, to clear the Way, in Pioneer Caps, and red Waistcoats.

2. A Bellman ringing, and with a loud (but dolefull) Voice, crying out all the Way, Remember Justice Godfrey!

3. A dead Body, representing Justice Godfrey, in a decent, black Habit, carry'd before a Jesuit in Black, on Horseback, in like manner as he was carry'd by the Assassins to Peirce-Hill.

4. Next after Sir Edmundbury, so mouned, came a Priest in a Surplice, with a Cope embroider'd with dead Bones, Skeletons, Skulls, and the like, giving Pardons very plentifully to all those that should murder Protestants; and proclaiming it meritorious.

5. Then a Priest in Black alone, with a great Silver Cross.

6. Four Carmelites, in white-and-black Habits.

7. Four Grey-Friars, in the proper Habits of their Order.

8. Six Jesuits, with bloody Daggers.

9. A Concert of Wind-Music.

10. Four Bishops, in Purple, and Lawn-sleeves, with a golden Crozier on their Breast, and Crozier-slaves in their Hands.

11. Four other Bishops, in Pastichalibus, with Surplices, and rich embroider'd Copes, and golden Mitres on their Heads.

12. Six Cardinals, in scarlet Robes and Caps.

A. D. 1679.

Much more remains to be said of the Practices of both Parties to bring the People to their Lure: But as the new Privy Council, which had rais'd such great Expectations, was now on the point of Dissolution, in Fact, if not in Form, it is necessary first to touch on some of their Proceedings that remain as yet unnoticed, in order to clear our way.

And what is most to be lamented in this Walk, we have little better than Twilight either to direct our Footsteps, or to enable us to guess at the Objects we make if our Business to explore.

Variety of Cabals in the Privy Council.

In all Privy Councils there will be Rivalships for Favour, Importance, and Reputation; and those thwarting Interests will often produce Oppositions and Cabals. But this boasted new Constitution of Sir William Temple's resembled the War of Atoms, almost from its first Establishment. Sir William, himself, acknowledges, that a Party of four undertook to manage for the rest, as altho' that nothing less would satisfy the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Shaftsbury, than to have the Management of them. It appears, moreover, on his Evidence, that in the great Points relating to the Parliament, such as the dissolving of one, and proroguing another, all the old Members join'd with the Majority of the new, against those four and the King himself; by whom they were, nevertheless, over-ruled, against his own express Engagement: And that there was yet another Spring of Action, distinct from all these, which was occasionally paramount to all, appears not only from the Instance of the Counter-Orders given to the Duke of Monmouth, when going into Scotland, and indeed from the whole Direction of the Scottish Affairs; but also from the Particulars that follow. "THEY," says Mr. North, meaning the new Part of the Council, open'd their Campaign by turning out of all Commissions and Trusts the King's known Friends, that were call'd the Church and Loyal Party, which was to be done under the Pretence of reforming the Commissions of the Peace and Lieutenantcy, so as none but known Protestants be left therein; which, they said must be done to satisfy the People.—And the like was to have been done as to other Commissions of Trust and Profit, and Places at Court, and even about the King's Person. Divers of the Council appear'd against these Doings, saying, it was utterly inconsistent with the King's Service, to displace Men without some Mischance on their Parts. And then the Lord (1) Sunderland, who, upon the Regulation,

13. The Pope's Doctor, i. e. Walsome, with Jesuit-Powder in one Hand, and an Urinal in the other.

14. Two Priests in Surplices, with two golden Crosses.

Leahy, The Pope, in a lofty, glorious Pageant, representing a Chair of State, cover'd with Scarlet, richly embroider'd and fringed, and bedeck'd with golden Balls and Crosses: At his Feet a Cushion of State, and two Boys in Surplices, with white Silk Banners, and Moody Cuckoos and Doggers, with an incense-pot before them, casting his Holiness, who was array'd in a splendid Gasquet Gown, fin'd through with Ermin, and richly dash'd with Gold and Silver-lace: on his Head a triple Crown of Gold, and a glorious Collar of Gold and precious Stones, St. Peter's Keys, a Number of Beads, Agnus Dei's, and other catholic Trumpery. At his Back, his Holiness's Privy-counsellor (the degraded Seraphim, scilicet the Devil) frequently cussing, hugging, and whipping him, and oft times instructing him about to destroy his Majesty, to forge a Protestant Plot, and to fire the City again, to which Purpose he held an infernal Torch in his Hand.

The whole Procession was attended with 150 Flambeaux and Lights, by Order: but for many more came in Volunteers, as made up these thousands.

Never were the Barons, Windowes, and Houses, more numerous in'd, or the Streets closer throng'd with Multitudes of People, all expressing their Abhorrence of Papery, with continual Shouts and Exclamations; so that 'tis modestly computed, that, in the whole Progress, there could not be fewer than two hundred thousand Spectators.

This with a slow and solemn Stee, they proceeded to Temple-Bar; where, with immense Swarms, the Houses seem'd to be converted into Heaps of Men, and Women, and Children; for whose Diversion there were provided great Variety of excellent Fireworks.

Temple-Bar being done in Rebuilding, adorn'd with four stately Towers, etc. Those of Queen Elizabeth and King James, on the inward or eastern Side, fronting the City; and those of King Charles I. of blessed Memory, and our present gracious Sovereign (whom God, in mercy to these Nations, long preserve) on the Outside, facing towards Westminster; and the Statue of Queen Elizabeth, in regard to the Day, having on a Crown of gilded Laurel, and in her Hand a golden Shield, with this Motto inscrib'd.—The Protestant Religion, and August Charles.—and Flambeaux plac'd before it, the Pope being brought up near the same, the following Song, alluding to the Posture of those Statues, was sung in Parts, between one representing the English Cardinal (Howard) and others acting the People.

Cardinal NORFOLK.

From York to London Town you came,
To talk of Popish Tre,
To reconcile you all to Rome,
And prevent Smithfield Fire.

PEERS:

Ceasi, cease, thou Norfolk Cardinal,
See yonder hands Queen Bets!
Who would our Suits from Popish Thrall.
O Queen Bets, Queen Bets, Queen Bets!

Your Popish Plot, and Smithfield Threat,

We do not fear at all;
For 't is honest Queen Bets's Feat
You fall, you fall, you fall.

"'Tis true, our King's an 't'other Side,

" A looking too red Whitehall:

" But could we bring him round about,

" He'd counterplot you all.

" Then down with James, and set up Charles,

" On good Queen Bets's Side!

" That all true Commons, Lords, and Earls,

" May wish him a fruitful Bride."

Now God preserve Great CHARLES our King,

And the all honest Men;

And Tyrants all to Justice bring:

Amen, Amen, Amen.

Then having entertain'd the thronging Spectators for some time, with the ingenious Fireworks, a vast Bonfire being prepared full over against the Inner-Temple Gate, his Holiness, after some Compliments and Reluctancies, was decently topp'd from all his Grandeur into the impartial Flames; the craty Devil leaving his infallibilityship in the breach, and laughing as heartily at his deserved ignominious End, as subtle Jesuits do at the Rain of baptiz'd Lay-Catholics, whom themselves have drawn in; or, as credulous Calcasias's Aberration did, when, with Pretences of a Reprieve at last Gasp, they had made him vomit up his Soul with a Lye, and seal'd his dangerous Chops with a Halber. This Justice was attended with a prodigious Shout, that might be heard far beyond Smarter-haus; and 'twas believ'd the Echo, by continued Reverberations, before it ceas'd, reach'd Scotland [the Duke was then there] France, and even Rome itself, damping them all with a dreadful Admiration. [Out of the Galilæan of Lord Somers, vol. ix.]

It is fit the Reader should know, that a Blank was left in the Print for the two Stanzas of the Song distinguish'd by inverted Commas; which I find supply'd, as above, in my Lord Somers's own Hand-writing.

(1) Our Author is here a little mistaken; for that Lord was made Secretary before the Earl of Dashy reign'd his Staff; that is to say, February 8, 1678-9: And the Regulation did not take place till April 21.

came in as Secretary, in his Court Turn (for which he was very particular, and in speaking, had made it almost a fashion to distend the vocal Letters) What, said he, if his Majesty learn out saarty of us, may not he have saarty attors to saarve him us well? And what matters sovs saarvs his Majesty, so long as his Majesty is saarved? But in good earnest, the Rolls of the Justices were order'd to be laid before the Council in order to be reform'd. And, as some present relate, it was pleasant to see with how much Wit and good Humour, the King order'd Affairs to disappoint these Reformers. He would not suffer the Roll, that was begun with, to be out of his own hand, but pretended to mark the Alterations upon it himself. Then, as many of the Council mov'd for Alterations upon the account of good or bad Men (Terms of Art, which, for Brevity, they us'd, to signify such as the Party lik'd or would have put out or not) if the King was content a Man should out, he made a Mark of his Name; but if he would not part with him, he found some jocular Reason to let him stand; as, that he was a good Cocker, underfoot hunting, kept a good Horse, had good Chines of Beef, kept good Fox Hounds, or some such indifferent Matter, which it was ridiculous to contradict or dispute upon. And in this manner, he frustrated all their Intent as to Removes, and by crossing and puzling the Work, made a plain Demonstration to his factious Counsellors, that they should not have their Will of him in what they intended, viz. To dash the best Friends he had, all over England, in the Face with such Affronts. In short, finding they could not prevail, they let the Business drop; and I do not know, that any one Roll was in this manner thoroughly perused.

And another to reform the Government of Ireland. Life of the Duke of Ormond. vol. II. p. 494, 495.

And again, says Mr. Carte, "The Peace and Quiet in Ireland, was a great Disappointment to Lord Shaftsbury and his Party, whose Designs could not be advantaged by any thing so much as by an Insurrection there; of which the Experience of their Predecessors in 1643, whose Steps and Measures they copied, was an undoubted Evidence. This was imputed to the Moderation of the Lord Lieutenant and Council, and for the producing a different Face of things, a change of Counsellors was necessary. They wanted to have the Council of that Kingdom dissolved, and a new one form'd of Persons for their Purpose, as had been done lately in (n) England. This was the View in ordering the Lord Lieutenant to send over a List of the present Privy Council, and an Account of what Officers us'd or ought to be of it successively. He was told the Design was to reduce the Number, but was not requir'd to give any Character of the Persons. The Party resolv'd to leave none in the Council, but such as were thorough-pac'd for the Protestant Interest, which the Lieutenant, they said, could not well be, because of his Roman Catholic Relations, and the Chancellor and most of the other Counsellors were not at present. Lord Howard of Esherich they thought the fittest Man to be Chancellor; and the Lords Orvery, Conway, Grenard, Maffarene, Jones Bishop of Meath, and eight other Persons were design'd for Counsellors, as being most zealous for the Protestant Interest. These Regulations, it seems, were the Fruits of a Consult about Irish Affairs, held at Lord Howard's; of which the Earl of Longford, who found Means to get Intelligence of it, giving the King an Account, his Majesty answer'd, "That, by their good Leave, he would chuse his own Governor and Council for that Kingdom; that he would never be prevail'd with to alter the Government, and that he knew to part with the Duke of Ormond was to part with Ireland, and to give it up to the Parliament."

The King seeming fix'd in this Resolution, the Party was forc'd to take an indirect way of carrying their Point, by putting Difficulties upon the Government, and laying a Foundation for Disturbances in the Kingdom. Accordingly, it was propos'd now to introduce the Test-Act; and all the English penal Laws into Ireland; and Orders were given in Council, on November 28, for Mr. Secretary Covertry to draw up a Letter, "requiring the Lord Lieutenant and Council to prepare such Laws for excluding Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament, or bearing any Office in Ireland, and under the like Tests as had pass'd and were practis'd in England; and also such other necessary Bills for suppressing Popery, as might consist with that Government and the State of the Kingdom; and that a Proclamation should be forthwith issued for encouraging all Persons that could make any further Discovery of the horrid Popish Plot to come in and declare the same by a certain Day, to be prefix'd, otherwise not to expect his Majesty's Pardon."

It is observable, that, in this last Account, the Lord Shaftsbury is made principal in all the factious Designs; and that the Relative rney, in the former, as already explain'd, stands for all the new Counsellors in a Body. But we learn from Sir William Temple, that the new Counsellors fell into a Schism almost as soon as they were call'd to the Board: That Lord Shaftsbury and Lord Essex became declar'd Enemies: That Lord Shaftsbury had not above five of the new Lords under his Direction: That Lord Essex, from his own particular Views, as the sequel will make manifest, busied himself most in the Irish Affairs: And even the very Gazette bears witness, that Lord Shaftsbury was remov'd October the 15th, which was almost six Weeks before the Date of the Order of Council above quoted. Hence, in part, arises the Obscurity and Uncertainty before complain'd of: And hence it is, nevertheless, apparent, parent, that his Majesty, however beset, had both an Understanding and a Will of his own.

One Point, it seems there was, and one only, in which Lord Shaftsbury and his Pupil (Monmouth) as well as the Triumvirate, and Sir William Temple agreed; and a brief Explanation of this will furnish us with an Idea of our foreign Affairs, at this Crisis, which have been so long overlook'd.

Foreign Affairs.

At the same time that Sir William Temple undertook to render his Majesty happy at home, he undertook likewise to render him significant abroad; and both these great Effects were to flow from one and the same Cause, viz. his new Constitution. And to show that he reason'd upon right Principles, he tells us, not only that both Town and Country receiv'd the News of its Establishment with Applause, but that the States appointed Mr. Van Leven to come over Minister into England upon the Occasion. Whence we are to understand, that both the Prince of Orange and their High Mightinesses concluded, that our Court was at last to be depos'd upon, and that Sir William and the new Councillors would be Security for his Majesty's good Behaviour. It is to be lamented that Sir William did not think proper to enlarge upon this Affair; and, perhaps, it is not fair to suppose, that there was any Concert between his Highness and him during the Month that this great Expedient was in Agitation, since he himself has not made any such Acknowledgment. This, however, is apparent, that the Acquisitions made by France in the last War, and her Encroachments since the Peace, together with the manifest Superiority she had acquir'd by both, made it more than ever the Interest of the Princes on the Continent to look round on all Sides, for an Arm strong enough to save and deliver them. The Prince of Orange's Eyes were ever fix'd in England; Sir William Temple had ever a strong Inclination to adopt almost every thing his Highness propos'd, as being firmly of Opinion, that he was one of the honestest and wisest of Men; and while he was perpetually inculcating the Expediency of the closest Union between England and Holland, Mr. Van Brunningen (Van Leven's Predecessor at Whitehall) took Advantage of the popular Fears of a French Invasion, to establish a Belief, that France had Thoughts of adding England to its other Conquests. Thus it is highly probable, that in Holland this new Constitution was look'd upon as extremely favourable to the Prince and his Schemes; and that the States were inclin'd to make their Dispositions accordingly: But tho' Mr. Van Leven was nominated Ambassador to England soon after this remarkable Change in the English Council took place, he did not arrive here till about the time of the Prorogation; when it was become notorious that it had fail'd in one of the great Ends propos'd by it; which was to restore a good Understanding between the King and his Parliament, and remove the Evil of Parties by an Equal Gratification of both: Nor when he did arrive, did there appear to be any thing extraordinary in his Commission: He reliev'd Mr. Van Brunningen; He fell into the common Round of Business; He endeavour'd to kindle a Spirit against France, by talking in very tragical Terms of the Demands made by the French Court of the Contribution-Money due from the Country about Breda, accompany'd with Menaces to levy it by Force; and if he discour'd of a new Guarantee to be given upon the late general Peace, by his Majesty, particularly to Spain in the Business of Flanders, as it is intimated by Sir William Temple, he did no more: For nothing is more certain, than that the Proposal in Form was sent from us, by Mr. Henry Sydney, Brother to the Earl of Leicester, and Uncle to the Earl of Sunderland. This was his important Errand to the Hague towards the latter End of July; and it was in this Measure, which, we are further told by Sir William, seem'd necessary for the Satisfaction of the States, that the several Cabals of the Triumvirate, and Lord Shaftsbury agreed.

A. D. 1679.

Mr. Henry Sydney sent to Holland, with the Offer of a new Guarantee.

Mr. Algernon Sydney calls it one of Sir W. Temple's Projects; and that the great Drift of it was, under the Pretence of a Guaranty, to draw Holland and Spain into a League with England, that should help the Prince of Orange to an Occasion of breaking the Peace so lately made: That, to induce the Council to embrace it, Sir William, who was taken to be the Oracle of these Parts, assur'd them, there was no such thing as a Party in Holland, inclin'd to oppose the Prince of Orange: That all was submitted to his Authority, and united in desiring such an Alliance with us: That it would necessarily be accepted, as soon as offer'd: That the French, who had made the Peace for fear of us, would, by a Parity of Reason, more exactly keep it, when it appear'd, that we were of the Party against them: And that it would make the Government as popular at home, as formidable abroad.

P. 127, 128, 150, 151.

No Pains, it seems, were spar'd, to convince Lord Sunderland, that this was no better than a political Dream; but to no Purpose: The Pursuit was pleasing, and therefore it was follow'd: But neither he that gave the Advice, nor those that follow'd it, had any Reason to plume themselves on the Success: For no sooner had Mr. Sydney open'd his Commission, and the States had taken it into Consideration, than Mr. d'Acoux, the French Minister at the Hague, set all his Engines at work, to render the whole Proceeding abortive. The States were not only told, with much Freedom, in a Letter anonymous, that the ill Posture of their Affairs had lain them open to the Menaces of Spain, Denmark, and Brandenburg; and that the only Way to recover their former Significancy was, to return to their former Adherence to France, &c. but Mr. d'Acoux in Person deliver'd in a Memorial, demanding a Renewal of the Alliance of 1662; and containing a Representation of the Inconveniences that would, in all Probability, attend their Refusal.

The French make a Counter-Proposal.

Sydney's Letters, p. 14.

Temp. Mem. P. III. p. 335.

A. D. 1679.

These Counter-Projects reviv'd the War of Parties in Holland: The Lowvolein as greedily fasten'd on This of France, as the Orange did on That of England: Each, in turn, came necessarily before the States; and each, in turn, was so warmly oppos'd, that neither could be accepted. They were not, however, immediately rejected: Such a Proceeding would have equally offended both Crowns; and the sad Effects of having Both united against them, the States had but too lately felt, and still too sorely remember'd.

But France had now been so accusom'd to give the Law, that they would not suffer their High and Mighty Lordships even to demur, without giving time to know (by the Dutch Ambassador at Paris) how much the Grand Monarque was offended at it. The King was much surpriz'd, they were told, to find they plac'd so little Value on his Friendship, as to hesitate whether they should close with his Offers, or those of England: That he should take any further Delay for a Refusal: And that, tho' he would maintain the Peace with them, he should no longer look upon them as worthy of his Favour, as they would soon feel by the Effects his Displeasure would have on their Commerce.

*Hist of Eng-land registr'd.

This touch'd the States in their most sensible Part; and the Lowvolein Faction made do dextrous a Use of their Apprehensions on that Head, that Mr. Sydney's Offers were first dismiss'd, tho' in the softest Manner imaginable, by their High and Mighty Lordships, way of Qualifier, directing Mr. Van Leeuwen to return his Majesty their most humble and hearty Thanks for having, by his Mediation, procur'd a general Peace: And to assure his Majesty, that they would have a perpetual Remembrance of his Kindness, and Good-will towards them: And that they would, on all Occasions, shew their Acknowledgment thereof.

Sir William Temple, with more Policy than Candour, has slid over this whole Negotiation: But Mr. Alg. Sydney, who had declar'd his Opinion to freely of it, while it was yet in Suspence, declares, upon the Issue, That our Disappointment was more for our Advantage than what we sought. His Words, which are remarkable enough to deserve both Notice and Remembrance, are as follow: "And, as it is said in Religion, that nothing is more terrible than the Return of ill-conceiv'd Prayers; nothing is more to be fear'd in Politics, than the Success of unreasonable and ill-grounded Councils: And tho' the Proposition that was made, being rejected, will certainly raise the Party in Holland that is least for the Prince of Orange, and cast it into a Dependence upon France; that is less mortal than a League, that certainly would have produc'd a Rupture of the Peace, renew'd the War all over Europe, expos'd Flanders to be lost the first Year, which this must have done: It being as certain, that the Assistances from hence would have fail'd, as that it hath not in itself that which is necessary for its Defence."

A. D. 1679.

It was about the latter End of October, that Mr. Sydney return'd with the Confirmation of his own ill Success, and found the Court in too great a Ferment to enter immediately on the proper Measures to repair it. The re-establishing the Interest of the Duke of York, and the humbling the Exclusionists, were now the great Objects of Attention and Deliberation; and, what with Endeavours on one hand, and Opposition on the other, the new Constitution was on the Point of falling to Pieces; or, at least, of undergoing almost as thorough a Reform, as that which first gave Life to it. Under the same Weight that crush'd the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Shaftsbury had just fallen, as before-specified; and, in his Place, succeeded the Lord Roberts (a Man equally eminent for his Humours and his Virtues, and lately made Earl of Radnor) who had serv'd as Lord Privy-Seal, under Lord Clarendon's Administration; and as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, under Part of that of the CAROL; but being recalled from his Government, and depriv'd of the Privy-Seal, grew malcontent, and so continued, till he saw Reason to conclude, that there was more of Faction than Patriotism in the Proceedings of those who undertook the Reformation of the State; at which time he again went over to the Court; And, says Mr. A. Sydney, with more Bitterness than Candour, in appearing for the King, and Bishops, thought himself of Merit to succeed once more to the Government of Ireland, when it was presum'd that the Duke of Ormond was once more to be displaced. And this Alteration in the Council was soon after follow'd by another as remarkable, tho' of a different Kind: The Lords Effex and Hollifax were nam'd in Dangerfield's Lists, and yet, according to Sir William Temple, were left out in the (u) secret Examinations about it; which either offended them so thoroughly, or furnish'd them with such a Pretence to be offended, that the Duke was no sooner gone, than they openly declar'd themselves disgust'd with the Court, and declar'd a Resolution to retire from it. To their nearer Friends, indeed, they told another Tale: Namely, That they had no sound Part either in the King's Confidence or the Duke's: That they were but other Mens Dupes, and did other Mens Work; and that finding no Measures would be taken for satisfying and uniting the Kingdom, they would have no more Concern in public Affairs. Accordingly Lord Hollifax went to his Country-seat; and Lord Effex resign'd the Direction of the Treasury: And for fear it should be apprehended without-doors, that the latter of these Lords had taken this Step to reflect any Lustre on Lord Shaftsbury's Disgrace, Care was taken to signify in the Gazette, that his Lordship Earl of Radnor made Lord President.

Mr. Hyde and Mr. Godolphin made Privy Counsellors.

Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, p. 250.

Mr. Hyde succeeded him in the Treasury; and, of course, became of the Privy-Council; and was soon after follow'd to the left of those Boards by Mr. Sebury Godolphin, of which two Gentlemen, the Lord Keeper North has transmitted to Posterity the following Memorials: " Lawrence Hyde, one of the younger Sons of the Earl of Clarendon, was a Person adroit in all Matters of Wit and Business, being observ'd to be always early plodding at the Scrutiny of Accounts and Estimates before the other Lordscame. His Infirmities were Passion, in which he would swear like a Cutter, and the indulging himself in Wine. But his Party was that of the Church of England, of whom he had the Honour for many Years to be accounted the Head. For all Men that aim to become great, espouse a Party, and, if possible, get to be trusted as the Head of it; for then they have somewhat wherewith to terrify, and on the other Side, for their own Interest to sell or betray.

Mr. Godolphin was a Courtier at large, bred a Page of Honour: He had by his Study and Diligence master'd not only all the classical Learning, but all the Arts and Entertainments of the Court; and being naturally dark and reserved, he became an Adept in Court Politics. But his Talent of unravelling intricate Matters, and exposing them to an easy View, was incomparable. He was an expert Gambler, and capable of all Business in which Caution might be employ'd. All which join'd with a Felicity of Wit, and the communicative Part of Business, made him be always accounted, as he really was, a rising Man at Court".

The Model of the Council being thus altered, it was thought advisable in the next Place, to humble the Malcontents yet more effectually, by making it known by Proclamation, That the King, for many weighty Reasons, had thought fit and resolv'd to prorogue the Parliament (it) again, from the 26th of January, to the 11th of November next ensuing. On the said 26th of January, however, as many Members of each House attending as were required by their respective Rules, his Majesty gave them a Meeting, and from the Throne signify'd, " That when he declar'd in Council his Intention of putting off the Parliament to a time so remote, it was not without mature Consideration: That he could not be persuaded from any thing that had happen'd since, in Reference to Affairs within the Kingdom, to alter or repent of that Resolution: That, notwithstanding, considering the present Danger, which threatened some of our Neighbours and Allies (the Dutch) he thought fit to appoint a Day for their Meeting again in April: That the Distractions and Jealousies at home, were of such a nature, and so heightened and improv'd by the Malice and Industry of ill Men, that he was unalterably of Opinion, That a longer Interval of Parliament would be absolutely necessary for the composing and quieting Mens Minds, and that, therefore, at the said Meeting in April, there should be a further Prorogation unless the Condition of our Allies abroad did then require our immediate Assistance."

Two Days after this, his Majesty was farther pleas'd to declare in Council, " That he had sent for his Royal Highness, not having found such an Effect from his Absence, as should incline him to keep him longer from him. That some Questions had been started, of late, of such a nature, and of so great Concern to the Duke, as made it reasonable to have him present at the next Session of Parliament; and that tho' his Majesty would take care to procure his Right, yet it might be for his Satisfaction to be here himself; and that his Majesty was so well assured of the Duke's Compliance, that he could answer his Return should have no Influence upon the Public."

It is observable, that in all these several Acts of State, the King is left by his two Councils to act as if he had none at all. The Malcontents could not be expected to lend their Countenance to Measures they did not approve: And it seems the others stood in too much Awe of the Parliament to abide by their own Advice: And thus, as the King could do no Wrong, all that was done was right.

About this time, the Lords Ruffell and Carwenshif, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Pease (Sir William Temple expressly says, disgusted at the late Prorogation, as well as at the manner of it, and pretending to despair of being able to serve the King any longer, in a Conduct of Affairs so disagreeable

(c) Ferguson takes occasion to state the following strange Coincidences to this Partion of our History.

" The Conspirators, say he, being thus strangely frustrated, all of a sudden (by the blowing up of the Med-Tob Pipe) found immediately for Ireland, both to silence of that Mischievous, and to advise with the Duke upon new Measures; who resolv'd, not to give off the Game so, but to get the Parliament again prorog'd for a longer time; which they effected: But the Duke was now forced to part with a small Sum of Money, to get the thing done: And a greater Sum was prest'd from France; which to enrich some of the Conspirators made three Journeys to Paris; where the French Ministers understood, if the Parliament were to be put off, their Master would lend 200,000 l. Which being sent in England, notwithstanding the Conspirators acted privately, the Duke of Bucks plants himself in Paris, PRIVATELY; and, like an heroic Engishman, resolv'd to defeat the Conspirators of that Sum of Money: For he will know, if that Avenue were stopp'd, a Parliament would be permitted to sit, even for the Hopes of Money, which they wanted exceedingly: For tho' the Duke of York had a Treaty, which he travelled with; yet he was unwilling to part with it, as not knowing what Occasions he might have for it, in case the Confinement took no effect: The Duke of Bucks lying privately for some time, work'd himself so far into the Secret of the French King, and some of his Ministers, that, with his restoring the Cause, and laying open our Policy; and that the Money given to us would certainly be a Loss to the French King; and making appear to him the Weakness of the Conspirators Party, that he wholly turn'd the Scale, and the Money sum'd as to be paid to us from France came to nothing; which most desirably engag'd our Courtiers, and the Conspirators, &c." Genral of Piety, Part II. p. 166.

I shall make but one Remark on this confid' Passage; which is this, That, privately as the Duke of Bucks lay at Paris, we had publick Mention made of it in the Lady Gazette, N° 1457.

A. D. 1679. So disagreeable to the general Humour of the People) went to the King together, and desired his Majesty to excuse their Attendance any more upon him at Council; which the King very easily consented to. Sir William also mentions Lord Salisbury as having taken the same Resolution, tho' not in the same Form: And this it must be understood, was the Catastrophe of that Gentleman's new Constitution.

Sir W. Jones, the Attorney-General, resigns.

This Event was preceded by another, on many accounts too remarkable to be pass'd over in Silence. Sir William Jones, the Attorney-General, who had always inclin'd to the discontented Party (out of Picque, according to Mr. North, because Sir Francis, his Brother, was prefer'd to the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas, according to his Rank, before him) and whose great Skill in the Practice of the Law, had been as serviceable to the Credit of the Plot, as fatal to the Prisoners, desir'd Leave of his Majesty to resign; which was granted with an Assurance, says the Gazette, of his being very well satisfy'd with his good and faithful Services. And to account for this Transaction, Mr. North insinuates, That he had laid his political Principles, which were not of the Court Complexion, too open to the King, and by so doing, had lost his Majesty's Favour: That finding his Error by the Alteration of the King's Behaviour, and that the Door of Preferment was shut against him on that Side, he sought to repair his Loss by going over avowedly to the Exclusionists: And that the Earl of Essex, it was verily believ'd, had persuaded him to this Course on this very Principle; as also to countenance his own Retreat, and for the Service of the Party, who could not fail to derive a great Degree of Credit from the Access of so great a Man.

We are now to return to the Ferments of the People, and the Practices of their Leaders; than which nothing better deserves our Notice, not only by way of Instruction, but Warning to Posterity.

The Duke of Monmouth returns without Leave.

The Duke of Monmouth, growing impatient of his Exile, having been also inform'd that the King had put his Prerogative to the stretch in banishing a Man without the Concurrence of the Laws, and preferring his Interest in the People to his Duty to his Majesty, return'd without Licence, towards the latter End of November; and tho' he did not make his Entrance into London till late at Night, the Signal was soon given from one End of the City to the other: The Bells rung, the Streets blaz'd with Bonfires, and the whole Pöple of Malcontents receiv'd him with such Acclamations, as more than made him amend for the Obscurity of his Departure.

The Party being thus once more in Possession of their Leader, and growing fearful that as long as his Royal Highness continued Lord of the Ascendant at Court, the Parliament would not be permitted to sit, had Recourse to a new Device to carry their Point; which was to put up Petitions from every Corner of the Kingdom for a Session, that by the Dirt of Importunity, Noise and Terror, his Majesty might be compell'd to give way, or come to a sort of Rupture with his whole People.

To clear the way, and throw a sort of Lustre on their Proceedings, the Earls of Kent, Huntington, Bedford, Clare, Stamford, and Shaftesbury, and the Lords Say and Seal, Eure, North and Grey, Chandos, Grey, Howard, Herbert, Rockingham, Townshend, Holles and Delamer, join'd in a Petition to his Majesty, humbly requesting that he would consider the great Danger his Royal Person was in, as also the Protestant Religion, and the Government of these Nations; and that at a time when all these were so highly concern'd, his Majesty would effectually use his great Council the Parliament: And offering it as their humble Advice as well as earnest Prayer, that there might be a Session at the time appointed, and that his Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to give public Notice and Assurance thereof, that the Minds of his Subjects might be settled and their Fears remov'd.

This Petition was usher'd to Court, December the 9th, by four of the Earls, and five of the Lords (the Act of Parliament for the regulating of Petitions, allowing no more than ten Persons to attend the Delivery.) Prince Rupert introduc'd them; the Earl of Huntington presented it in the Name of the rest: And his Majesty was pleas'd to answer, "That he would consider of what they had offer'd; and could heartily wish, that all other People were as solicitous for the Good and Peace of the Nation, as he would ever be."

It appears the Court was thoroughly alarm'd at this Proceeding, and thought it of the utmost Importance to interrupt the Progress, as well as defeat the Intentions of it: And to carry both these Points, was indeed a Matter of much Difficulty. Mr. North assures us, with rather more Zeal than Justice, That it was a firm Maxim at that time to do nothing violent or contrivable against Law: That the People had a Right to petition, he adds also, was the Cry of one Party, and was not deny'd by the other; And that even the Resentment of the Parliament itself, when it should be allow'd to sit, was apprehended, in Case of any over-Rigour against those, who, at their own Peril, appear'd in their Cause. And the Sense of this Difficulty, was at first so exquisite, continues he, that the King's best Friends durst not meddle; although the very Neutrality was term'd, the being against petitioning.

At length a Resolution was taken to send for the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, and by intimidating them from countenance of the Practice by their Example, to strike the like Awe through all the Corporations of England. Accordingly, his Lordship (Sir Robert Clayton) with his Brethren, and the Recorder Sir George Jeffries, making their Appearance before the Privy Council, the Lord Chancellor, by his Majesty's Command, acquainted them, "That his Majesty was more than ordinarily concern'd, at present, for the Peace of the Kingdom, which there were Endeavours using to disturb, by procuring Hands to tumultuous Petitions tending

The Lord Mayor directed to discountenance and punish those who presented the like Petitions.

A.D. 1679-80 to Sedition and Rebellion, which were fram'd, and sent for that Purpose, likewise, into the Country; and that Letters had been intercepted, wherein the Persons to whom they were address'd, were bid to get as (p) many Hands as they could to the said Petitions, saying, That it matter'd not, though they were neither Gentlemen nor Freeholders. Which illegal and seditious Practices, his Majesty was resolv'd by no Means to suffer; and that, therefore, his Majesty expected, that they, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, would in their several Stations, take care of his Majesty's Honour, and of the Peace and Safety of the City; and not suffer such Persons as should strow such Petitions, or go about to procure Hands to them to go unpunish'd; but that they should proceed against them, or cause them to be brought before the Council-Board, to be punish'd as they deserv'd, according to a Judgment of all the Judges of England, 24th Jacob.

Examens,
P. 545, 546.

But to this the Lord Mayor reply'd, That they knew of no Course they might by Law take to suppress this Inconvenience; for the People took it for a Right in them to petition his Majesty upon Grievances they were sensible of; and they acted upon that Principle only, and were very earnest in their Adherence to it: Therefore he humbly desired that his Majesty would be pleas'd to direct what they were to do. The Recorder, Jessies, then mov'd, That his Majesty would by Proclamation prohibit the framing and presenting any such Petitions, and command all the Peace Officers to punish every Person acting to the contrary. This, said he, would oblige all Mayors and Justices to be diligent and active in their Stations to punish; and Men being fearful of Punishment, would fear to offend. Upon this Hint of the Recorder's, the Lord C. Justice North resolv'd, by saying, That the Proclamation ought, by no means, to prohibit the petitioning his Majesty in any Case; much less in the Case of the Parliament: But it might take notice of certain ill People, who, upon the specious Pretence of petitioning, went about in a seditious and tumultuous manner, gathering Hands to certain Papers, &c. And then forbid all such tumultuous and seditious Proceedings, and enjoin all Magistrates to punish all Offenders. This Scheme was adopted; and the new Attorney General, Sir Creswell Lewins, receiv'd Orders to draw up such a Proclamation: But he declin'd it, objecting, That he did not well understand what the Lord Chief Justice meant; and desiring of his Majesty, that his Lordship might draw up his Proclamation himself. But this was against Form, so the Burden rested upon the Attorney, or rather it seem'd to do so, for the Chief lent his Shoulder in private, tho' he excus'd himself in public: And the Result of their joint Labours was as follows:

“CHARLES R.

Whereas his Majesty hath been informed, That divers evil-dispos'd Persons at this time endeavour, in several Parts of this Kingdom, to frame Petitions to his Majesty, for specious Ends and Purposes relating to the Public; and thereupon to collect and procure to the same the Hands or Subscriptions of Multitudes of his Majesty's Subjects: Which Proceedings are contrary to the common and known Laws of this Land; for that it tends to promote Discontents among the People, and to raise Sedition and Rebellion. His Majesty, considering the evil Consequences that may happen, if such Offences should go unpunish'd; and lest that any of his good Subjects should be inveigled, by plausible Pretences, or should, through Inadvertency or Ignorance, be engaged to a Breach of the Laws, in any of the Particulars aforesaid; his Majesty hath therefore thought fit (by the Advice of his Privy-Council) to declare and make the same known, by this his Royal Proclamation, and doth hereby strictly charge and command all and every his loving Subjects, of what Rank or Degree soever, that they presume not to agitate or promote any such Subscriptions, nor in anywise join in any Petition of that Manner to be presented to his Majesty, upon peril of the utmost Rigour of the Law, that may be inflicted for the same. And his Majesty doth further command all Magistrates, and other Officers to whom it shall appertain, to take effectual Care, that all such Offenders against the Laws be prosecuted, and punished according to their Demerits.

This, which was published on the very Day that the long Prorogation was also publish'd, is call'd by Mr. North, a Master Stroke, for the Art and Caution of the Draught; and that because the Word Public is substituted instead of Parliament; Subscriptions, for Petition; and that the whole is declaratory not against petitioning, but the Manner of petitioning: And a Master-stroke in Law, it must be acknowledg'd. But if more Regard had been shewn to Common Sense, the Court might possibly have been induc'd to allow half'd the Right of petitioning in the utmost Latitude, and to have condemn'd the Abuse of it with the utmost Freedom: To have prov'd, that these Petitions had no Tendency to redress the Grievances of the People, but were apparently calculated to distress the Court: That Government was here on the Defensive only, against the Insults as well as Clamours of a Faction: And that to submit to their Demands, was, in truth, to resign the Scepter into their Hands; or, at least, to hold it only at their Courtesy.—Possibly this would have been the Dictate of Common Sense: For to admit that Men have a Right to petition, but not to subscribe their Petitions; to express their Grievs, and not to procure them all the Sanctions that can be deriv'd from Number as well as Matter; or to suppose, that what was legal in its own Nature, could be render'd punishable by the MANNER, at the Pleasure of the Privy Council, is no better than setting Truth and Falacy together by the Ears, Ears, with a Pre-determination to declare the latter, at all Hazards, victorious.

In Eign.

We come now to the Event; which, says Mr. North, in the main, shew'd, that the Proclamation was not less wisely advis'd, than carefully prepar'd; "For, as soon as it came down (these are his Words) into the Counties and Places where the Agitators were at Work, the loyal Party took a new Life from it, and strongly exerted themselves in opposition to the whole Design; and, without puzzling upon nice Distinctions, they laid on with the King's Pleasure, signify'd by his Proclamation, That he would have no such Petitions come to him; and so, without farther Distinction or Ceremony, without the Agents, in the Face of the People; and, in most Places, drove them and their Ware quite away: And, out of the Lines of a factious Guard, they scarce durst shew their Heads: And the Practices of Forty-one, with many Epithets relating to them, were liberally bestow'd."

Right of the Subject is protected asserted.

It was to order'd, that not only the Proclamation, but the Lord Chancellor's Speech to the Lord Mayor, above-recited, was inserted in the Gazette; upon which the Exclusionists ever vigilant, and ever ready with Expedients, either to surmount Difficulties, or make the most of every Advantage, immediately put forth a Comment on the Speech; tho' they had the Modesty or Discretion to spare the Proclamation. They began with explaining the Judgment of the Judges 2do Jacobi, therein refer'd to: They shew'd, it was a Star-Chamber-Decision: That the King had propounded Three Questions to the Judges; the last of which was as follows: "Whether it was an Offence punishable; or what Punishment they deserv'd, who fram'd Petitions, and collected a Multitude of Hands thereto, to prefer to the King, in a public Cause, as the Paritani had done, with an Intimation to the King, that if he deny'd their Suit, many Thousands of his Subjects would be discontented?" To which all the Judges reply'd, "That it was an Offence punishable at Discretion, and very near to Treason and Felony in the Punishment: For they tended to the raising Sedition, Rebellion, and Discontent, among the People." Concerning this Decision, they affirm'd, that not one Lawyer then living in England would be the wiser for it: That it would rather confound them, as not knowing whether it was Misprision of Treason, which seem'd the Offence nearest to Treason son or petty Larceny, which seem'd nearest to Felony. They, however, allow'd, that the Point on which this Question turn'd was utterly indefensible; for that when Men arriv'd at such Insolence; as to threaten their Prince, it would prove but a very slender Excuse to call their Menaces by the soft and gentle Name of Petitions. In the next place, they laid down the Statute 13 Car. II. c. 5. as the Basis of the present Petitioning; which was expressly calculated to obviate all the Inconveniences of tumultuous Petitioning, and enact, That not above Twenty Persons shall join in any Petition, Complaint, &c. for Alteration of Matters Establish'd by Law in Church or State, unless first consented to by Three or more Justices of the Peace, or the major Part of the Grand Jury, where the Matter shall arise; and that not above Ten shall attend the Delivery of such Petition, on the Pain of incurring a Penalty not exceeding 100 l. and Three Months Imprisonment: And hence they argued, that, provided the Subject comply'd with the Limitations here prescrib'd, he had the Law on his Side, and might petition without Fear or Danger. The next Topic was, the Reasonableness of this Method of Appeal to the King by Petition: Under which they observe, That it was the Doctrine of our Church, that the only Arms of Subjects were Prayers, Petitions, Supplications, and Tears; and that those were no Friends, either to the King or Church, who would disarm them of these. A Variety of Precedents were then quoted, to shew, that this Claim of Petitioning was warrant'd by Custom, as well as Reason; and that it was an Indulgence, which had been extended even to Ireland, tho' a conquer'd Nation: Upon the whole (9) they concluded, from the Opinions of Lawyers, the Doctrine of the Church, and the Declarations of Kings, as well as Custom and Reason, that it was the Subject's undoubted Right to petition; and that as to the Manner, nothing could be more absurd than to say, that the Number of the Supplicants made an innocent Petition an Offence: But that, on the contrary, if, in a thing of public Concernment, a few only should address themselves to the King, it would be a thing in itself ridiculous; the great End of such Addresses being to acquaint him with the general Desires of his People; which could never be done, unless Multitudes join'd.

These Reasonings, it seems, had all their Effect, as well as the Proclamation: For, in Petition in the Name of several thousand

(9) These Particulars are taken from a Folio Sheet, call'd, An Answer to a Letter written by a Member, upon the Division of his reading the Gazette of December 11, 1679, which has for its last Paragraph the following Case; which illustrates the whole Argument.

"Give me leave, since the Gazette runs so much in your Mind, to tell you (as I may modestly enough do, since the Statute directs me) what Answer the Judges would now give, if such another Case were put to them, as was put to the Judges 2 Jacobi."

"Suppose the Non-compliants at this Day (as the Paritani then did) should solicit the getting of the Hands of Multitudes to a Petition to the King, for suspending the Execution of the penal Laws against themselves; the present Judges would not tell you, that this was an Offence next to Treason or Felony; nor that the Offenders were to be brought to the Commons, to be punished: But they would tell you plainly and distinctly, That if the Hands of more Persons than Twenty were solicited or procur'd to such a Petition, and the Offenders were convicted, upon the Evidence of two or more credible Witnesses, upon a Proclamation in the King's Bench, or at the Assizes, or Quarter-Sessions, within six Months, they would incur a Penalty not exceeding a hundred Pounds, and three Months Imprisonment, because their Petition was to charge a Manner Establish'd by Law. But if an issue you are a better Logician, than not to see the Difference which the Statute makes between such a Petition, which is to alter a thing establish'd by Law, and an innocent and humble Petition, that a Parliament may not according to Law, in a Time when the greatest Dangers hang over the King, the Church, and the State.

the Beginning of January. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, and one Mr. Smith, a Benchor of the Middle Temple, accompany'd by eight other Gentlemen, presented a Petition to his Majesty, for the sitting of the Parliament, in the Name of some Thousands of his Subjects, Inhabitants of London, Westminster, and the Places adjacent; but met with a very ungracious Reception; his Majesty declaring, "That he look'd upon himself to be the Head of the Government, and the only Judge of what was fit to be done in such Cases; and that he would do what he thought most for the Good of himself and his People." His Majesty likewise express'd his Concern to find one of Sir Gilbert Gerrard's Name, and particularly Sir Gilbert himself, in such a thing; and when Sir Gilbert would have reply'd, turn'd away in Displeasure. But this mortifying Reception did not deter others from treading the same Path. They were now sensible, that the Laws had no Hold of them; and Frowns they did not fear. Thomas Towne, Esq. accompany'd by Sir Walter St. John, and Sir Edward Hungerford, presented a Petition in the Name of the County of Wiltz: Sir Robert Barrington, Colonel Mildmay, Mr. Honeywood, &c. another for Essex: And certain other Gentlemen a third, for Berkshire. All were alike discourteas'd: Except that the King made a Jest of the Berkshire Application: Whereas he treated that of Wiltz as coming from a Company of loose, disaffected People, because it had not the Sanction of the Grand Jury: And as to that of Essex, he took occasion to reproach Colonel Mildmay, tho' indirectly, with the Mercy he had receiv'd by the Act of Oblivion; to which he added a Caution, That such as had fled in need of that Act would do well, not to take such Courts as might need another. But, notwithstanding all this Severity, still several other (r) Petitions were presented, tho' from Persons of less Eminence; and, in particular, one from Taunton, as the King was coming out of the House of Lords, the Day he had in Person declar'd to both Houses his Resolution to postpone the session; and his Majesty asking the Presenter, How he dar'd do that? Sir, said he, my Name is (s) DARE.

And now the Courtyers finding, that neither the Terrors of the Proclamation, nor the Discouragements heap'd on the Petitioners, by the King himself, was sufficient to put a stop to this troublesome Practice, had recourse to a Counter-Stratagem, that not only answer'd the immediate End propos'd by it, but gave a very sensible and reasonable List to their Cause: The first Experiment of which was made on the City of London; where the Spirit of Faction was most predominant, and from whence the worst Effects were apprehended.

The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, being assembled, January 21; Notice was taken of the ill Practices of many disaffected Persons, who endeavour'd to procure Hands to a Petition about the Sitting of Parliament; which gave rise to a long Debate; in the Conclusion of which it was declar'd to be the Sense of that Court, That it was a thing not proper for them to meddle with; and that, in case any such Application should be made, it might prove dangerous to the Government: Upon which Grounds they came to a Vote, that they would not suffer any such Petition to be presented, in the Name of their Court.

To follow this Blow, the King command'd the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to attend him at Whitehall; and they attending accordingly, his Majesty was pleas'd to declare to them, his Dislike of any such Debates, on any such Subject, which was not proper for them to meddle with: But added, by way of Softener, that he believ'd it was occasion'd by some ill-affected Persons from without, who misinform'd those who might otherwise mean well: He then gave his particular Thanks to all those who had endeavour'd to prevent the Attendance: And, for a Cloze, assur'd them, he would always be ready to give his loyal City of London Proofs of his Affection and Kindness.

Those who resist the Storm melt in the Sunshine: All this Grace and Goodness was set forth properly in the next Gazette, and had a wonderful Effect all over the Kingdom: The Mayor and Aldermen of Bridgewater, and the Justices at the several Quarter-Sessions of Wiltz, Oxford, Salisbury, and Canterbury, rejected

(s) A most humorous Description of which is thus given by Mr. North, in his Examen, p. 344:

"But, for the effecting to great a Work as this, it was necessary to invent a Method of Proceeding, and to retrench the laborious Part as much as they could. And thus it was done. Petitions in Form, as had been authentically prepared for the sake of the Unlearned, were written, or, as I take it, printed upon Parchments of a prescribed Width, with large Margins underneath; and shewd more pos. into the Hand, of Agitators and Sub-agitators in the Country about, branching thro' it into hundreds, Towns, and Villages, if any thing populous, or affording consulting Persons to negotiate. And these Agitators, being chosen Party-Men, and well instructed, went to every free Voter, and indeed every one, as they came in their Way, demanding their Hands to the Petition; and did it in such a Manner, as a plain Man knows not well whether it was lawful for him to refuse or no. And when the Hand-tax was gather'd, the Parliament petition was sent up to a select Assembly or Club, who had this Administration in charge. And there the Roll of Hands the Margis was cut off the several Petitions out of one County, except one; and to that all the rest were plac'd. So there appeared a fine Petition, intailed, from all the Freeholders, &c. And, the Roll being open'd and extended, there appeared more shapen than ever Dreams presented, looking as if they were alive, and, like Infants, crawling about, or as the half-form'd equivocal Vermin in the Mould of Milz; but looking clear, they all shew'd themselves no other than Hieroglyphics of Cloasms. And, rather than want a due Number of these Monsters, it was common for the Agitator, or their Masters, on large Markets and Nomes, as they would have, and to buy a good deal of rotten stony, without so much as seeing the Parties, or caring whether they approved it or no. But, for certain, the Work was carried on with such pragmatical Impertinence and Impetuosity, as well as Insolence and Scandal to the Government, that Words can scarce represent the true Genius of the Proceeding."

(r) This Person was a Goldsmith of that Town, and was oblig'd to be made an Example of: Not for petitioning, tho' in spite of the Proclamation; that could not be done: But for speaking saturnally of it: For which he was first sent for up to Conscil, in Custody; and afterwards prosecuted, and kill'd good. And the Town of Taunton, protesting by his Example, took occasion soon after, to shew his Petition publicly in the Gazette, No. 3574.

jected the Petitions, and those of Wells carry'd their Zeal so far, as to issue several Warrants against the Promoters of it.

But, it seems, the mere rejecting these obnoxious Petitions did not sufficiently fluster the Resentments of the Court: The popular Current was at a stand, or rather seem'd to be on the turn; and it was thought right to use all Endeavours to force it as violently the other Way.

The Scotch Privy-Council declare their Abhorrence of tumultuous Petitions.

When the Duke had receiv'd his Majesty's gracious Letter of Revocation from Scotland, and communicated it to the Privy-Council of that Kingdom, he took the Opportunity to declare, "That he would acquaint his Majesty, at his Return, that he had in Scotland a brave and loyal Nobility and Gentry, a regular Privy-Council, and Judicatories filled with able Persons, well-affected to his Majesty's Service and Interest. He also desir'd them, against their next Meeting, to prepare any thing they desir'd he might represent to his Majesty, that might conduce to the Good of the Kingdom in general, or that might promote any of its true Interests; with which, he said, he would charge himself very cheerfully, and would not fail to give them a satisfactory Account." And, in return for all these obliging Expressions, they not only furnish'd his Royal Highness with the amplest Testimonials of his good Behaviour while amongst them, but, by way of Preamble, signify'd "a just ANNOYANCE of those seditious Persons, and pernicious Principles, which would lead us back, said they, to those dreadful Confusions, which grew up by degrees from tumultuary Petition for Reformation and Parliament to a Rebellion that in the last Age destroy'd Both; and which must do so still; since all, who thought that Subjects should direct their King, design'd nothing in effect but to be Kings themselves." And afterwards declar'd, "That with their Hearts, their Lives, and Fortunes, they would maintain his Sacred Majesty, and his Royal Succession, in the ordinary Degrees of Succession, according to their unalterable Right of Blood, which He and They derived only from God-Almighty, whom he represented," &c.

The London-Gazette was immediately made the Echo to this Strain of Court-melody; in the Presumption, that, as the Minds of the People were now tun'd, it would have serj'd as a Pitch-pipe to the Voice of the Kingdom: But tho' it was made public February 26, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen that very Day waited first on his Majesty with their Thanks, for having releas'd a Judgment obtain'd upon a Warranto against the City, concerning the Duty of Water-Banage, and afterwards on their Royal Highnesses, with Assurances of the Affection of their Court, and the Loyalty of the City of London towards him, not a Word escap'd, as we find, of (1) Abhorrence: On the contrary, thro' every Article of that Kind was most officiously glean'd up, and gazetted, all in Silence till April the 18, and then the Grand Jury of Essex, as also the Justices for the said County, take occasion to disclaim and renounce, as also to express their Detestation of, the Petition deliver'd in the Name of the County, as before-mention'd: And, on the 17th following, the Grand Jury and Justices of Westminster did the (u) same, and more; for, to the Word Detestation, they added Dislike and Abhorrence; and, yet farther, undertook to defend his Majesty's most Sacred Person, his Heirs, and lawful Successors, and the true Protestant Religion, as now establish'd by Law, against all Opposers.

The President followed by the Grand Jurors of Essex, Westminster, &c.

And now the several Benches of Justice and Juries, at the several Quarter-Sessions, made haste to overtake the Zeal of those of Westminster and Essex. Those of Middlesex unanimously declared, they would lay their Lives and Fortunes at his Majesty's Feet, in defence of his Majesty's most Sacred Person and Royal Authority, his Heirs, and lawful Successors, &c. Those of Berks, who in the preceding Quarter-Sessions had petition'd, now eat their Words, call'd it a Sin against the Prerogative, ordered it to be expung'd out of their Records, and declar'd their abhorrent Dislike and Abhorrence. Those of Norfolk, in Duty to God as well as the King, declar'd their utter Detestation and Dislike of all tumultuous Petitions, acknowledg'd his Majesty had done mighty Things for the Kingdom, and had been ever careful of its Rights and Liberties; thank'd his Majesty, in the deepest Resentment of their Souls, for his steady and resolute Support of the Protestant Religion; and most heartily and highly congratulated his Majesty on the Return of his Royal Brother. The Borough of King's-Lynn gave his Majesty an Oblation of their Duty and Thankfulness, in his person and resolute Support of the Church, in his Courageousness, conferring the Regalities of his Crown against insolent Petitions, &c. The City of Norwich not only utterly disown'd, and declar'd their Dislike against all tumultuous Petitions, imposing on his Majesty, against his Royal Prerogative, and congratulated the Return of his Royal Brother, but dismiss'd their Recorder for opposing this Address, and hindering his Majesty's Service. Even the poor Lord Chandos, who was one of the seventeen petitioning Lords, had his Eyes open'd, acknowledg'd his Mistake, and declar'd his Abhorrence of it, as a Peace-Offering for his Majesty's Leave to go Ambassador to Turky. In short, the whole Nation was divided into Petitioner and Abhorrer, and almost every Day produc'd some mortifying Instance,

(1) Mr. North, however, makes mention of an Address of Abhorrence, presented to the King by Sir George Jeffries from the loyal Citizens of London; wherein they declar'd this Way of petitioning to be the Method of Forty-two, and intended to bring his Majesty to the Block, as his Father was. It is certain there now grew up, of a sudden, a close Correspondence between the Magistracy of London and the Court; his Majesty and the Duke confederating to dine with the Lord Mayor at his House, and afterwards with Sir Jonathan Raymond, one of the Sheriffs.

(u) This Westminster Address was presented by Francis Withers, Esq. Deputy-Sheriff, who was knighted by his Majesty for this acceptable Service.

Instance, that the Grofs of the People had no Sentiment of their own, but only play'd over the Tricks they had been taught by their Leaders.

The Court of Appeals in Spirit of Zeal against Popery.

During this whole Interval, a very uncommon Zeal appear'd at Court against Popery: Proclamation upon Proclamation was issued against Papists: The Lists which had been return'd into the House of Commons, of Recusants, were given to the Judges, when preparing to go the (v) Circuits, with Instructions to make Presentments of all the Persons therein contain'd: A formal Account of their Proceedings thereon was requir'd of them at their Return: And They signifying, that the Laws were every where put in force, his Majesty in Council express'd his thorough Approbation; as also declar'd, that they should be supply'd with all such Orders and Directions as should be farther necessary; that especial Care should be taken for the Prosecution of those who had evaded the Laws, by shifting the Places of their Abode; that proper Agents and Solicitors should be appointed for that Service; and that it was his Majesty's Intention to have the said Laws against Popish Recusants duly and effectually executed. All these meritorious Articles were from time to time published in the Gazette; and, no doubt, contributed not a little to revive the Flames of Loyalty, which the Dread of Popery had almost extinguish'd.

Order and Connection now call upon us to resume our Consideration of Foreign Affairs.

Foreign Affairs.

Whether Ferguson was in the Right in asserting, that France had first engag'd to assist the Court of England with 200,000 l. to enable it to wrestle with the Parliament, and afterwards declar'd off, at the Intigation of the Duke of Buckingham, or not; the Outside of Things furnishes abundant Reason to conclude, that a Misunderstanding of some kind or other had taken place, and now subsist'd, between the two Powers: For, about the Middle of November, Mr. Henry Sydney was, all of a sudden, remanded to his Post at the Hague, to watch the Motions of the Court of Amoy; and his very Arrival at that Place, as we are told even in the Gazette, dispell'd all those false Reports, which had of late been so common there. 'Tis also notorious, that the said Mr. d'Amoy had no sooner renew'd his Negotiations with the States, to enter into a defensive Alliance with his most Christian Majesty, than Mr. Sydney appear'd, in the most open and avowed Manner, his Oppos't; Declaring, as the King himself had before done to the Dutch Minister at Whitehall, in plain Terms, That his Majesty would look on such a defensive Alliance as a League against him; and, in case it took effect, would be oblig'd to frame his Measures accordingly; and that, on the contrary, in case they rejected the Proposal, his Majesty would not only punctually comply with what was stipulated and agreed in the defensive Treaty of 1678, but also stand by them to the utmost, in case they were attack'd by France." And we find the States, at this time, thought themselves so well authoriz'd to depend on these Professions, that they rather seem'd to deliberate on the Offers of France for Form's sake, than with any Disposition to accept them; and, in the mean time, gradually prepar'd Mr. d'Amoy to expect the like Refusal that, at his Instance, they had before given to those of England.

Shock'd and enrag'd as the French Court certainly was upon this Occasion, they could not persuade themselves to give over their Pursuit; or to think that Menaces would not succeed, tho' Solicitations had fail'd; Repeated Orders were therefore sent to Mr. d'Amoy, to awake their old Terrors; which he fail'd not to obey, in a thundering Memorial to the States, setting forth, That the King his Master was extremely astonish'd at their Manner of proceeding in the Matter of the Alliance by him propos'd, and highly resent'd it: That he, d'Amoy, had his Majesty's Command to wait yet a few Days longer for their final Decision on that Affair; after which he should mention it no more, nor accept of any Act relating to it: That, in case they should omit this last Opportunity, they must expect his Majesty would alter his Conduct, so as should be most conducive

(v) Mr. North hath a Passage in his Examiner, p. 364, call'd in his Margin, cautiously enough, a fallacious List to entrap the Judges in the Western Circuit, which deserves a Place here.

At about the Time when the Whigs were threaten'd, which was the Summer before the Meeting of the Westminster Parliament 1682, which Parliament made such ado about that Matter, the Judges design'd for the Western Circuit, that is, the Lord Chief Justice North and Mr. Justice Jones, attended the Secretary of State, who was the Earl of Sunderland, to know if his Majesty had any Commands in particular for them, relating to the Circuit. His Lordship made a short Discourse to them, and, among other Matters (some of which I must needs in another Place) told them, that it was his Majesty's Pleasure they should declare to the Country, in their Charge, that his Majesty would have a Regard to tender Conscience; and that the penal Laws should not be executed upon Protestant Dissenters, but upon Papists only. The Judges went no Reply, but, with a civil Congee, turn'd their Backs, and went away. But, notwithstanding this Charge, their Lordships the Judges, in all the Shires, declar'd the Laws to the Country, as they were in Use, without any Distinction at all; for they did not think their Obedience depended on any such Circumstances.

Our Author adds, That one of the Protestant Dissenters, as they were call'd, in his News from Town, call'd by him a Metropolis of the Factions in the West, said, notwithstanding, That the Lord Chief Justice North, in the Place of Mr. Justice Jones, had given the Charge, and declar'd the King's Pleasure, as to tender Conscience, as he is before; which had given some Satisfaction: And that his Lordship, in concert with Mr. Justice Jones, set forth a Counter-Declaration, in the Gazette of April 12, 1681, signifying, That the said Report was false and groundless. Upon which I shall only remark, That, however right Mr. North may be in his Facts, he is wrong in the Time: For the Judges had their Charge in February 1679-80. Before, before-mention'd, was in'd at Town, March 20, and the Counter-Declaration is to be found in the Gazette of April 12, 1681.

The other Matter, which Mr. North chus'd to pass upon, and which Lord Sunderland gave also in charge to the Judges, we find also in the Examiner, p. 148, as follows: "That they should give public Discomfence to all Petitioners, and to encourage the Anti-petitioners; which, he says, was no better than a Seize for them. For, according to him, if they had done any thing pursuant to their Charge, they had been expos'd to be question'd in Parliament, upon what Sense the Faction would have pleas'd to represent it: And no Wonder, for what had Judges to do with Parliament sitting or not, or petitioning list it?"

ductive to the Good of his Kingdom, and advantageous to the Commerce of his Subjects; That his Majesty did not threaten them with his Indignation; but they would find, perhaps, that his Dissatisfaction would be more prejudicial to them, than the Indignation of others: And that they would do well to recollect what had happen'd to them within these eight or ten Years; and that his Majesty had then less Reason to be displeas'd with their Department than now."

This was no sooner presented, than it was follow'd by another from Mr. Sydney, fill'd with artful Disfluatives, under the Pretence of leaving their Lordships to be guided by their own Interests; and at the same time, urging, That the Intuances of the FRENCH KING were rather too pressing for a free Republic. It is not to be presum'd that these alternate Batteries of Words, made any farther Impression than as they were play'd by the two Factions against each other: And, on the Issue, it appear'd, that the Orange had now the best Engineers: For the States of Holland (the Province, not the Republic) at last, unanimously resolv'd to reject the French Proposals, and order'd their Deputies to declare the same to the States General, from whom Mr. d'Avoux, was to receive his Answer in form; and who, immediately upon this, gave out, That he should very suddenly be call'd home: That the King his Master would order all his Subjects to quit the Service of the States, &c. On the other hand, that these intimidating Expressions might not answer the Ends they were calculated for, a Letter from the King of England to the Prince of Orange was read in the General Assembly of the States; not only overflowing with Assurances of his Majesty's unalterable Resolution to assist the Republic in Case of need; but also of his Intention to give his Parliament a Meeting in April, if their Lordships Interest requir'd it. And these Promises, it seems, supported with the whole Weight and Influence of his Highness, wholly turn'd the Scale against the Threats of France. Guelderland, Utrecht and Zealand, immediately follow'd the Example of Holland, as did also soon after Overyssel: And tho' Groningen and Friesland adher'd to France, after their usual Custom, the Majority of the Provinces, in the Case of a Negative, had a Right to decide for all. Accordingly, about the Middle of March, the Prince of Orange having first visited the Frontier, and made the necessary Dispositions for its Defence in Case of an Attack, and the States having also made a grand Regulation of their Finances, a formal Answer was prepar'd, in the most courtly Expressions that could be us'd, to the several Memorials of Mr. d'Avoux; importing, in effect, That the States found themselves oblig'd to decline the Defensive Alliance which his most Christian Majesty had done them the Honour to propose to them: Nor did they fail to return their Acknowledgments to his Majesty of England for the many Testimonies he had given them of his great Kindness to their State; in particular, for his repeated Assurances of Assistance as their Occasions should require, and the Regard shewn to their Interest in his late Speech to his Parliament.

And thus the Public was to understand, that a Hook was once more put into the Nostrils of the French Leviathan, and that the Interests of the Court of England, and the House of Orange, were the same. But how deceitful these Appearances on both Sides were, the Sequel will demonstrate.

All this while, the Strivings of the two Factions for and against the Duke of York, were kept up with all the Art, as well as Fury imaginable: And if the open Violence of these Petitioners and Abhorers had created most Noise, the Snares and Pitfalls spread in the Dark by their respective Leaders, were productive of the most Mischief.

While Dangerfield was yet the Penfioner of Lady Powis, Mrs. Celier and the Court, and was laying in his Ingredients for the Meal-Tub Discovery, Sir Robert Peyton, the (as) second Name in the King's Head of Green Ribbon List, who, by the Means of one Gadbury, a Pretender to Astrology, was fallen also into an Intimacy with Mrs. Celier, dropt some Intimations to these Confidants of his, That if he might be forgiven what was past, he would quit his Party, and go over to the Court; but withal signify'd his Fears, That the Duke was of an unrelenting Disposition, and consequently would not accept of his Repentance. Mrs. Celier, who, it seems, had Claims upon the Duke, which she wanted to have satisfied, immediately poited with this Discovery to Lord Peterborough, who desir'd her to bring about an Interview between himself and Sir Robert. This she plausibly undertook; Gadbury's House was the Place assign'd; and when they met, his Lordship, on the one hand, undertook for the Duke; and Sir Robert, after some Complaints of hard Usage, declar'd he would come unto the King's Service to all Purposes. His Royal Highness, soon after, confirm'd in Person, all that Lord Peterborough had thought fit to say in his Behalf; and Sir Robert devoted himself Body and Soul to his Service.

Sir Robert Peyton quits the Exclusionists, and goes over to the Court.

Thus much Lord Peterborough, himself, acknowledg'd in his Examinations before the Council, about the Meal-Tub Affair, in November. And in the Talk of Sir Robert's Apostacy, it was presum'd, that the whole Intrigue was at an end. But early in the January following, Gadbury informs the Committee of Council for Examinations, That he had Matters of Moment to discover, They send for him to make his Discoveries; but to much sooner, it seems, than he fore-saw, that he was unprepar'd, and desir'd longer time to recollect himself; which was not only granted him, but he had leave to put what he had to say, tho' with all Speed, into Writing. On the Strength of which Indulgence, duelgence, he came with his Notes the very next Day to the said Committee; and, after an introductory Reference to the Conversion of Sir Robert, before recited, depos'd, That while that Affair was in Agitation, the said Sir Robert had told him, "That in closing with the Court, he should certainly part with a very great Interest; an Interest which had twice compass'd his Election of Member of Parliament; which could put him at the Head of 20,000 Men in two Days time; and which could raise 60,000 Men in a Week or Eight Days. That this Interest, in case the King had dy'd the Summer before at Windsor, was ready to have seiz'd the Tower, Dover Castle, Portsmouth, &c. That they resolv'd to secure the Lord Mayor of London, and such of the Lords of the Privy Council, as should offer to proclaim his Royal Highness, or set up any single Person against their Resolutions, and put them to Death; being resolv'd to advance a Commonwealth-Government: And that this Interest could root all the Royalists and Episcopists out of the Nation."

Mrs. Celler was also brought from Newcastle to give a supplemental Evidence, and testify'd, That, on the same Occasion, Sir Robert Peyton told her, the Lord Mayor was to have been knock'd o' the Head; that such others, as the Party thought fit, were to have been seiz'd and secur'd: That their Resolution was not to have suffer'd the Duke to be proclaim'd King: That they had so possed themselves, as to be able to prevent it: That they allow'd Pensions to several old Officers of the Rump, as to one Allop and others; and that Money had been collected for that End. And all these several Particulars, they deposted upon Oath, not only before the Committee, but the next Day before the King in Council. Sir Robert, on the contrary, deny'd all; but against two positive Witnesses in a capital Case, that signify'd nothing: So by a Warrant of Council, dated January the 9th, he was committed Prisoner to the Tower for High Treason, in conspiring to levy War against the King; where he remain'd till February the 10th; at which time he was admitted to Bail, and on the 24th of May finally discharged. It is observable that both Gadbury and Celler, were at this time under Confinement, on Account of the Meal-Tub Plot; and that Mr. North says, Gadbury got his Pardon upon Terms to swear against Celler: But if he was under the Influence of the Exclusionists, as this Minute seems to insinuate, how is it possible to account for his voluntary Evidence against Sir Robert Peyton, which is made up of Circumstances that struck at the very Root of all their Popularity, and which were also made public in the Gazette, that they might operate on the Public accordingly? Gadbury, it is certain, was discharge'd two Days after Sir Robert Peyton was bailed, but gave in no material Evidence against Celler, who was, also, upon Trial, acquitted: So that, upon the whole, it seems natural to conclude, That Gadbury's Merit lay in his Discoveries with regard to Sir Robert Peyton; and that the great End of all, was, thro' him, to blait the whole Party.

The Distractions and Confusions of the late calamitous Times, had left such a Horror on the Minds of the People; and this had from time to time been so artfully refresh'd and improv'd, that the Majority were, if possible, more prejudic'd against a Commonwealth, than even against Popery itself: And a proper Celebration of the 30th of January, would have enflam'd their Passions as dangerously for the Republicans, as that of the 17th of November for the Papists.

This deep Designers among the Exclusionists soon became sensible of; as also of the Magic of those bewitching Words in the several Addresses of Abhorrence; the ordinary Degrees of Succession; the unalterable Right of Blood, &c. and found it highly expedient, if not absolutely necessary, to reform their Plan of Management accordingly.

In the Appeal from the Country to the City, as before observ'd, the Duke of Monmouth was recommended by Name, to be the Saviour of the People, because he who had the worst Title, was like to make the best King. But now to repair that Error, a Report was industriously propagated, That a Marriage had been solemniz'd, or, at least, a Contract had pass'd, between his Majesty, while abroad, and Mrs. Walters, otherwise Barlow, his Grace of Monmouth's Mother: That the late Bishop of Durham had consign'd a Writing in a Black Box, relating thereto, into the Custody of Sir Gilbert Gerrard; and that the said Writing having been communicated to several Persons of Distinction, had fully satisfy'd them, that the Fact was so. About the same time also that this shameless Story was thus artfully circulated, creating Doubt in some, gaining Credit with others, and exciting Surprise and Astonishment in all; the Duke of Monmouth himself, like the favourite Son of David, whom he has been so frequently compar'd to, by the Advice of Lord Stafford, his Archibishop, set out with a Train and Equipage, little less than royal, to progress it thro' the Kingdom he aspir'd to rule, in order first to take Possession of the Hearts of the People; and afterwards, when time should serve, by their Assistance, to take Possession of the Throne. As his Person was fine, his Manner captivating, his Reputation high, his Pretensions dazzling, and his Faction potent, the very Fame of his Arrival bespoke such a Reception, as shew'd he was no common Guest; and when arriv'd, his Presence proclaim'd a Jubilee; the whole Country (x) came in, either out of Curiosity or Devotion, to welcome or wonder at him; and every Scene at every Place made it manifest, that he now stood forth as a Candidate for the Crown, and that he took this Method to solicit the Votes of the People.

Against a Proceeding of so dangerous a Tendency, back'd with a Report that seem'd to render it so justifiable, his Royal Highness and his Partizans thought it of the last Consequence to take all imaginable Precautions. Tho' more Strefs was laid on the Prerogative in these Days than at present, it had less of real Power for its Support. The Public Peace had not the Awe of a Riot-Act for its Security: The Succession was not fortify'd by Acts of Parliament: The Influence of Place and Office on the Nobility and Gentry was little more than nominal: The Dominion arising from Money, tho' known, could not be acquir'd, for want of the Means: The King was not surrounded with a standing Army; and tho' he had the sole Command of the Militia, he durst not have Recourse to it, for fear of drawing the Sword against himself. For all these Reasons Government, in those Days, was a more difficult Science than it has prov'd since; and a sudden Revolution was more to be dreaded, because more easy to take effect. Had the King, himself, at this time, shewn the least Countenance to the Duke of Monmouth's Pretensions, his way to the Throne had, perhaps, been smooth and easy; and, in all Probability, neither the Name of his Royal Highness, nor of him that afterwards supplanted him, had ever been enroll'd among our Kings: And that his Majesty, who was so over-fond of Ease, did not chuse to make Peace with his Parliament in favour of a Son that he lov'd, and at the Expence of a Brother that he fear'd, must either argue, that he had a Principle of Justice within him, which no Consideration could induce him to violate; or that he look'd upon his own Safety as involv'd in that of his Brother, and that in sacrificing him, he should, at the same time, make a Sacrifice of himself.

However this may be, April the 16th the Council being extraordinarily assembled, the King and his Royal Highness both present, and all the Judges attending as Assistants; his Majesty first took notice of the Rumour concerning the Black Box, and a Marriage, or Marriage Contract between himself and the Duke of Monmouth's Mother; which he positively affirm'd to be altogether false: And farther, that, thinking himself oblig'd in Honour and Conscience to have the Matter thoroughly examin'd, he had sent for Sir Gilbert Gerrard to declare what he knew concerning it. Sir Gilbert was then call'd in, and by his Majesty's Command, supported with the Advice of his Privy Council, and the Opinion of all the Judges, was ask'd, upon Oath, Whether he knew of, or had seen, any Writing imparting a Marriage or Contract of Marriage between his Majesty and the Duke of Monmouth's Mother? To which he reply'd, That he had never seen any such Writing: That none such had ever been committed to his Custody; nor did he know of any such.

It was natural to think, that when so full, so clear, and decisive an Answer had been so solemnly given to so plain a Question, and had, also, been made public in the next Gazette, by Authority, the whole Faction would have lost all Credit at once; and that no body would again have dar'd to lend the least Countenance to any Part of a Tale that had been so effectually exploded: But the Authors of it were, it seems, too fond of their Work to let it be dispers'd with a single Breath, like a Cattle in the Clouds; and too great Masters of their Art, not to be ready with Devices of all sorts to make good the Foundation, whatever Alterations the Superstructure might be liable to.

Thus, before the End of the next following Month, May, a Paper was set forth, call'd, A Letter to a Person of Honour concerning the BLACK BOX; in the first Page of which it is asserted, "That the whole Story of the Black Box was a mere Romance, purposely invented to sham and ridicule the Business of the Marriage, which, indeed, had no Relation to it; and that they who judg'd it conducible to their present Interest to have the Duke of Monmouth's Title to the Crown, not only discredit, but expos'd, thought it necessary, instead of nakedly enquiring whether he was the King's legitimate or only natural Son, to bring upon the Stage a Circumstance no way annex'd to it; supposing that this being found a Fable, the Marriage itself of the King with the said Duke's Mother, would have undergone the same Censure." Immediately after, The starting this Business is explicitly ascrib'd to the Duke of York. And farther on, Occasion is taken to insinuate the Legitimacy of his Grace of Monmouth, by Circumstance, namely, by referring, 1. To the Assurances given to the Countess of Wemyss concerning it, before the dispos'd of her Daughter in Marriage to him. 2. To the Talk of the Times; among the Standing Topics of which, this Marriage was said to be one. 3. To an intercepted Letter from the King to Mrs. Walters, then in the Tower, address'd To his Wife. And 4. To the Homage at that time paid her by the King's Party; who, by serving her on the Knee, &c. declar'd they esteem'd her for no less than the lawful Wife of their King and Master.

Thus the Ball was taken at the Rebound, and those Fallacies were boldly communicated to Print, which till then had been broach'd only in private Conversation: But, unfortunately for those who administer'd the Poison, they, in the very same Vehicle, administer'd the Antidote: For, after these Endeavours to establish a Belief of their Hero's Legitimacy, they ridiculously acknowledge, "Tis of no great Concernment, who is the Her apparent in the Regal Line, if we do but consider, that the Parliament of England hath often provided a Successor to the Government, when the Interest of the Public hath requir'd it, without the least Regard to such Puntillos; which they would never have done, if there had been the remotest Possibility of making out his legal Title to the Crown. And again, "Many Kings have endeavoured endeavour'd the Advancement of his Bastard-Children, to the Exclusion of their nearest Relations, of the right Blood: Only Charles the Second will be first on the File of History, that when nothing but his bare Word was needful to the settling his Dominions on his Son, as legitimately born, would inflame him, in the Face of strong Suspicions to the contrary, to be only his natural Son; and for no other Reason, but that he would gratify his greatest Enemies."

The King in Council justly declares, he never was marry'd to the Duke of Monmouth's Mother. [Gazette, Nov. 15 17]

This Letter was dated May the 15th, and dispers'd immediately after; it is reasonable to think, with some Effect: For, on June the 8th following, his Majesty was pleas'd to set forth a Declaration (which contain'd also two others to the same Effect, dated January the 6th and March the 3d, 1679) calling Almighty God to witness, and declaring on the Word of a King, and the Faith of a Catholic, that there never was any Marriage, or Contract of Marriage had or made between him and Mrs. Walters, alias Barlow, or between him and any other Woman whatsoever, his Royal Consort Queen Catherine only excepted: As also strictly commanding all his Subjects, not to utter or publish any thing to the contrary, on pain of being proceeded against, according to the utmost Severity and Rigour of the Law.

The Abuse of the Press, and the Insolence of Libellers, have, in almost all Reigns, afforded Matter of Complaint to those in Power; but perhaps never with so much Reason as in this; For scarce had this Declaration of his Majesty found its way to the Borders of his Dominions, before a second Letter to a Person of Honour was made public, which, both for Artifice and Malignity, far exceeded the foregoing.

Which gives occasion to a second Libel.

The (y) Letter-Writer sets out with an Intimation, That the Duke of York, having gain'd the ascendant of the King, had hector'd him into, or at least extorted from him, the said Declaration. And that, considering how loth he was to acknowledge his own Wife, (the Lord-Chancellor's Daughter) it was no wonder he should impertune the King to disown Mrs. Walters. He then proceeds to make this Difference in the Conduct of the two Brothers, viz. That the Duke's was an Act of Inclination, the King's of Constraint; and asserts, that there were his Majesty's own Expressions, That he was barrell'd out of his Life by the Importunity of his Brother; and that he had rather die than live so uneasy, as he had done while he withheld his daily Salutations in this Matter: Adding, "That thro' his Majesty was a Prince of that Cleareness of Understanding, that they could not baffle him by false Reasoning; yet he had so much of James's Timidness, that they could huff and over-awe him to things most opposite to his Judgment as well as cross to his Interest." (z) In another Place he says, "There are those in the Nation, who, preferring their Duty to God, their Country, themselves, and an injur'd Gentleman, before a Reverence to ONE MAN, especially acting under the Influence of a Popish Brother, will bring the whole Business into an impartial (*) Examination, before such, where a single Negative would not be allow'd as a sufficient Proof to invalidate affirmative Testimonies, provided such can be had." And that this might not be understood to be a vain Threat, he adds yet other Circumstances of Proof, that his first Epistle had not been furnish'd with, viz. "That Mrs. Walters, both in the time of her Travel with the said Duke, and at the Hour of her Death, insisted on her said Marriage: That Dr. Fidler, the late Bishop of Lincoln, had often declar'd to divers worthy Persons, in Verbo Saccerdotis, That he had marry'd them: That an Inn-Keeper of Liege, never fail'd to assure his English Guests, that the Marriage was celebrated and consummated at his House; and that both he and his Wife were Eye and Ear-Witnesses of it: That when some of the Persons examin'd by the Council about the Black Box, signify'd that they had heard of such a Marriage, they were told that was not the Business they were to speak to, and were order'd to withdraw: That the late Queen, his Majesty's Mother, had actually given her Consent to that Marriage; and that when the Lord Chancellor Hyde was in danger of an Impeachment in Parliament for advising and persuading the King to a Marriage with Queen Catherine, he excus'd himself from all smaller Ends in that Affair, by alleging, That his Majesty had a lawful Son of his own by a former Marriage; specifying by name, the Duke of Monmouth, to succeed to his Crown and Dignity." His next Point is to shew, that the King had so often broken his Royal Word, that it deserv'd no Credit from his Subjects; instancing the Breach of his Declaration from Breda: That no Man should be disquieted or called in Question for Differences in Matters of Religion, provided they did not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. 2. Of that of January the 2d, 1671, promising that the Restraint on the Exchequer should continue no longer than the last of December, 1672: And 3. Of that made in Council, April 20, importing, That he would lay aside the Use of private Advices, and thereafter govern his Kingdom by the Advice of his whole Privy Council, together with the frequent Assistance

(y) Ferguson, it may be remark'd: For, in the Appendix to Beauchamp's History of the Royal's Conspiracy, we find a Prince's Libel, in which these Letters were set on foot, at the Bottom, as an Acknowledgment, that the said Ferguson had paid him eight Guineas, towards the Balance of the fine.

(z) The Letter-Writer, in this Place, takes occasion to insert the following Paragraph:

"And let me, upon this Occasion, remind your Lordship of a Story of a Scottish Nobleman to my Lord Burleigh, upon that wise Statesman's dening a Character of King James, long before he ascended the English Throne: "If your Lordship, said the said Scottish, know a Tackleship, you cannot but understand, that, if I have him in my Hands, I can make him bite you; whereas, if you can get him into your Hands, you may make him bite me." (*) See John Royley, in his Memoirs, p. 100, 101, "That he acquainted the Duke (of York) with a Design, in agitation with some People, to prove the King's Marriage with the Duke of Monmouth's Mother, and inform'd him how he might obviate it."

ance of his great Council of Parliament. And as to the King's solemn Appeal to Almighty God, on the Faith of a Christian, &c. he takes upon him to deliver the Apprehensions of the wisest Heads concerning it, in the following audacious Expressions: "If, say they, neither the Eye nor Dread of God, nor the Faith of a Christian, are effectual to restrain a Person from Adulteries and promiscuous Scatterings, can we have any Security that they will prevent such a one from the Guilt of other Crimes? He who neither trembleth nor bluneth to proclaim his Uncleanness to all the World, will he forbear Sins of any Kind, or Hue, out of Principle, tho' he may possibly omit them by Accident, and in Compliance with Interest?" And again, "Besides, say others, Who knoweth but that the King, thro' the like Impressions of Fear, under which he lifted up his Hand to the most High God, at Scots, when crown'd in Scotland, may have been influenc'd and overaw'd to make this late Appeal and Protestation? He who hath done one such thing, and especially, with that Solemnity and Profession of Sincerity wherewith he took the Covenant, can it be otherwise apprehended, but that he may do the like again, if there be sufficient Cause for the same Passion which bias'd him against Knowledge and Conscience then? Nay, the utmost Influencement that sway'd and determin'd him, contrary to his Judgment and Light, to swear by the Great God, in Terms so august and awful in Scotland, was merely an Apprehension of being otherwise secluded from his Right over that one Kingdom: But it is more than probable, that no less than a Dread of losing his Life as well as three Kingdoms, hath necessitated him to this which he hath done now." He then endeavours to shew from the then Posture of things, "That the several Declarations set forth in the Gazette, were writted from the King; who, poor Gentleman! says he, was willing to buy his Pence at any rate; and hath here stak'd his Honour, not to say his Conscience, for it." And for a Conclusion of all, makes two Proposals, namely, "That the Parliament, being admitted to sit, may examine this Affair (of the Marriage) whereof they alone were competent Judges; and that the Duke of York might be legally try'd for his manifold (a) Treasons and Conspiracies against the King and Kingdom."

These

(a) The several Particulars of which, under the Notion of shewing what a gracious and desirable Prince this beloved Brother was lik'd to prove, he took care to enumerate, is followeth:

1. He is a Gentleman that hath renounced the Religion, wherein he was not only educated, and which these Nations profess, but which he had convey'd into him, sealed with the Blood of his Father, and entail'd upon him and the whole Line by no less than his Grandfather's Curse, in case any of said James's Offspring should depart from it.

2. He hath made it his Business to seduce his Majesty's Subjects to the popish Faith, and to enslave them to a foreign Jurisdiction. And by his Addresses, Solicitations, and Persuasions, wherewith he is able to reward such mercenary Souls as are ready to make sale of their Religion, he hath made more Converts to the Church of Rome than all the English Millionaires have been able to do.

3. Through the Power which he hath obtain'd over the King, he hath procur'd the chief Places of Strength in the Nation, and some of the greatest Trusts as well Civil and Religious as Military, to be confer'd upon known Papists, and sworn Enemies to the Protestant Cause, and English Liberties.

4. He hath been the principal Promoter of arbitrary Government, and of making the King's Interest both distinct from and opposite to that of his People. And this he hath done in pursuance of papal Advice, and in Subservience to the Romish Interest. For where the Monarch is absolute, and the Lives and Fortunes of whole Nations are entail'd to the Will and Pleasure of one Person, the meer Whoredom of a lustful, weak, or inconsiderate Prince, will go a great length in the gaining vast Multitudes to adore the triple Crown. And for such as shall prove stubborn and refractory, it is but mercifulness to kill them, and then convert their Lands to the Use of the Holy See.

5. It was this darling and beloved One, that authorized the Burning of London, and not only made his own Palace a Sanctuary to the Villains who were suspected as Instruments of that dreadful Conflagration, but retained and discharged divers who were apprehended in the very Fact. And this he did partly in Revenge, for as much as London had been the Magazine both of Strength and Treasures, during the War with the late King; and partly to gratify his popish Friends, by destroying the Bulwark of the Protestant Religion, and the chief Repository of the Heretics.

6. It was this presumptive Heir, that all along oblig'd his Majesty to neglect the concealing himself in favour of the Protestants abroad; and did, to order it, through his Power over the King, that never any foreign Alliance was made but what was aimed to the betraying of them. And does yet sit call over a Story, and perhaps a more tragical one, and accompany'd with base Treachery, than any History is able to acquaint you with: One Monsieur Robes, a French Gentleman, coming into England, to treat with the King concerning an Alliance between his Majesty and foreign Protestants, merely for the Preservation of their Religion; and having acquainted the Duke of York with his Demand, after he had in a private Conference or two transacted with the King about it, this Royal Prince, out of his wretched Kindness to the Protestant and the reformed Religion, caus'd Robes (Liege Ambassador from France at this Court) to stand behind the Hangings at St. James's, while he made this innocent Gentleman discourse over the whole Business: Upon which, Monsieur Robes being oblig'd to acquaint his Master with it, Monsieur Robes, who (upon some Intimation that the Duke had betray'd him) had withdrawn hence to Brussels, was there seized by a Party of French Horse, and brought to the Duquesne, whence, after some Time's Imprisonment, he was carried to the Place of Execution, and hrown upon the Wheel.

7. It was through the Duke of York's Means, that both the first and second Wars were commenced against the Dutch; and that, in order not only to weaken the Protestants by their mutual destroying of each other, but in hope to have turn'd the victorious Arms of the King upon the Heretics at home, and the Patron of English Liberty.

8. It was this zealous Prince, for the Honour and Safety of Britain, that advised the breaking the Triple League; which was the wisest Conjunction, and most for the Glory of the King's Reign, and the Preservation of his Dominions, that ever he enter'd into. And this he did not only to gratify Spain, whose Pensioner as well as whose Confederates he hath been, but to leave the Protestants here naked to the Attempts of the Papist. For we know, that while that League continued firm, the King of Sweden and the States of Holland would have continued all Duquesne upon the Protestants in England, as done against those of the same Religion with themselves, and in favour of whose Protestation they had entered into this Alliance.

9. He hath not only maintained Correspondence with foreign Princes, to the betraying the King's Councils, but hath concertated with them for the Extirpation of our Religion, and overthrowing our legal Government. And besides, many other Evidences of this, which it is not convenient to mention at present, the Depositions which arriv'd with the Commisary of Secy, during the Session of the late Parliament, together with Cassius's Letters, and that which he wrote in the Duke's Nause, and indeed by his Command, do uncontrollably demonstrate it.

10. He was consenting to, and hath co-operated in, the whole popish Plot (as Oates, in his Testimony has declared) the contrary to the whole House of Lords; for both his Confessor and Secretary did, with his Knowledge and Approbation, lead the Resolves for the King's Death.

11. It was the Duke, who, when the King had revealed the first Discovery of the heinous Rochester Plot to him, immediately communicated it to Father Bedingfield, that to the Conspirators might know how to secure their Papers, and abscond themselves.

* 12. It was he, who, thro' his Command over the Post-Office,

These Impurities, it must be own'd, fully the Course of History. But to come at the whole of Truth, we must turn up the Bottom, as well as admire the Surface. And to shew the Vanity of attempting to gag the Press, it is necessary to observe, That while so important a Matter as the Succession was thus licentiously agitated, in Detraction of the King's express Command to the Contrary, it was under the Tyranny of a Licence; and that neither Menaces nor Punishments were wanting to keep the Luft of Scandal and Diffamation from violating the Public Peace.

The Parliament since previous.

In this Interval, however, all things continuing quiet on the Continent, because France was not, as yet, prepar'd to take that Vengeance she had vow'd, the Court had it in their Power, without any Breach of Faith, to prosecute their own Views by a farther Protraction of the Parliament to the 17th of May: And again from that time, to the first, and afterwards to the 22d, of July. Mr. Henry Sydney also made a short Visit to England, full fraught with Instructions from the Prince of Orange, to whose Interest he was wholly and solely devoted, as well as his Uncle Sunderland, to make the most of the Credit he had acquir'd, by the Defeat of his Antagonist Mr. de Louvois, and contributing to give the King his Master once more an Air of Significance abroad.

But whatever Appearance there was of mutual Satisfaction between the King, and the States, they rather agreed to countenance than chose to depend on each other. His Majesty in his present embarras'd Circumstances at home, had no great reason to be over-zealous to embroil himself with France in Support of their Interests. And the States were too well acquainted both with his Majesty's Circumstances and real Inclinations, to put more Weight on his Friendship than it would bear. They, however, took care not to offend him with the least Shew of Distrust: On the contrary, they affect'd to consider him as their Guardian Angel, to rely on him, and esteem the Assurances he had given them of Assistance in case of Need, as the Sheet-Anchor of their Commonwealth. And of this artificial Behaviour, we shall find they also made the most artificial Use imaginable, by granting their own Cause on that of the Exclusionists; who having the Ascendency in Parliament, were thought able to serve them more effectually than the King himself.

His Majesty, also, had his Reserves, as well as his High and Mighty Allies; and rather acted from plausible than solid Motives. Thus Office, prevented the Interspersion the Letters from St. Omer, and other foreign Seminars, whereby that wretched damnable Conspiracy would have been more fully detected.

11. He employ'd his own Doublets in transport several of the Trustees to Holland, &c. did make a Voyage thither, when the Plot was first discovered, that they might escape the Search that was made for them, and the Punishment which they had deserved.

12. It was he who favoured, encouraged, and rewarded the violent Measures to frame and secure a Bill against the Protestants, and that he did to bring a Bill of the right Liberties, and in order to deliver such of the Nobility and Gentry as were the chief Abettors of the Reformed Religion and English Liberty.

13. It was he who advised the several Protraction and Dissolution of Parliaments, whenever they were either considered the better Condition of the Protestant Interest, or of facilitating the King to an Alliance with Protestant Princes for his Protection and Preservation.

14. It was he who, in whole, having the Dissolution of the last Parliament was proposed, and who both prevented the fixing of this, after eight several times, appeared for their Dissolution, and to hinder the Trial of the notorious Lords in the Tower, for which rather have said the Provisions of the Exclusion Bill, and to oblige the further Search into the many Bill, Papers, wherein limited, and the relief of the Papist suggesting the Submission of our Religion and Laws, and the Detraction of the Lives of his Majesty and People, and how much he had pleas'd his Majesty's Interest in the Hearts of his Subjects, and swallow'd their Contentions in his Royal Word, by obliging him to treat the Parliament as he had done a being, his Speech to both Houses, March 6, 1678, had so famously declared his Resolutions to meet his People frequently in Parliaments; and into what Strength and Weight they have thereby also reduced him, I shall rather leave your Excellency freely to consider, than take upon me at this time to unfold.

15. It was he who, after he had for so many Years promoted the aiding and favouring of France with English Forces, all that assisting Prince was offered to a Power and Greatness not to be in any Probability without or controlled, did at last suggest his Majesty in making the general Peace, which is a thing so highly prejudicial to all Europe, in the unaccountable Clauses of it.

16. It was he who, by commandment and enjoin'd the late treasonous Combination of Apparitors and Ruffians, and who, together with the Lords in the Tower, raised out the Money, both for the Expenses of their Entertainments, and for the providing them with Arms to disturb the Peace of the City and Kingdom, and assault the Houses and Lives of his Majesty's loyal People.

17. It is he who hath enrolled and secretly instructed Men, in all Counties of England, and who, besides the Exclu-

Papists, whom at this time he hath called from all Parts of the Nation to London, is also provided of a great Number of Irish, who secretly sold their Hands in the Blood of Protestants, or are the genuine Offspring of those that did. Now, being thus furnished and equipped, he is resolved (unless God in his Providence miraculously interpose) to put all to a Venture, and play over the same Game in England that was heretofore acted in Ireland.

18. It is he who cherish'd in his Bosom, and caulk'd to the highest Truth, such as Col. Gardon, who betrayed his Majesty's Secrets to the usurping Potentate, particularly to Mr. de Louvois, may himself may be charged with many things in those Times, whereby we may secretly discover both his Treachery to his Majesty, and his Ambition to have seized the Crown from him. For when a loyal Party of the English Subject had espous'd his Majesty's Right and Title, against the Enemies of his Crown and Person, the Duke, who being then abroad, should have encouraged and ventured his Life in conjunction with them, did, instead thereof, by a most shameful and dilatory deserting of them, both discourage them in their Duty, and, so far as in him lay, oblige them to conspire for themselves, with a Section of his Majesty's Interest. Yes, besides this, when the Scots were treating with the King at Breda, in order to the establishing him in the Throne of that Kingdom, the Duke of York was at that very time meddling with such a treasonable faithfulness in the King's Title here, that they would renounce his elder Brother, and chuse him for their sovereign. Nor do I believe that his Majesty can forget the Overture and Design upon which the Duke insist'd him at Breda, and withdrew to Holland, so that the King was necessitated not only to command him upon his Allegiance to return, but was forced to send the Duke of Ormond, and some other Persons of Quality, to threaten, as well as persuade, him, before he would comply.

19. It is he who, not thinking the Declaration enough to facilitate his Attention to the Throne, or to secure him from Resistance in the Attempt he purposeth upon, our Lives and Liberties, hath been, and still is, endeavouring to be admitted and let further into the Government; and accordingly hath received the King, by my Lord Ormond, in that Matter.

This is the more surprising, inasmuch as one would think, that it is not possible he should be further let into the Government, having Boswell's Bill, Long's Bill, Sherriff's Petition, and the Migration of the Crown (Leg being now Matter of the Obedience) in the Hands of his sworn Vassals and Creatures; and having also the Superintendency of all Civil Affairs in him, unless by taking the Scepter actually into his Hand, he should reduce the King to a Country-house, and so usual Person. And his Particulars about the Towns talk of no less than the having the Duke crown'd during the King's Life, as Henry II. (tho' upon very different Reasons) was crown'd in conjunction with King Stephen.

Alliance with Spain.

This care was taken to set forth in the Gazette, That his Majesty, having already taken Measures with the States for their mutual Defence and Safety, and the common Preservation of Christendom, had, in pursuance of the same Ends, concluded a defensive Alliance with the King of Spain, &c. But Sir William Temple, who had been complimented out of the Promise he had receiv'd from the King, to be made one of the (b) Secretaries of State, and who, from his repeated Disappointments, had learn'd to be less credulous, and more cautious, tells us, that, being call'd upon by Lord Sunderland and Mr. Hylk, to serve in the quality of Ambassador-Extraordinary to his Catholic Majesty. He started Scruples instead of receiving it with Acknowledgments; representing, That he had no Relish for the Fatigue it would expose him to, nor ear'd to run the Hazard of being undone by the Expence of it: That he did not see what Affairs the King could have in Spain, while his own were so disorder'd: That he could see no Use of Leagues or Alliances, while there was no Union at home to support them. He adds, That at last, he found out, that to prepare for a good Session of Parliament, next Winter, the Ministers were resolv'd upon all Measures that might conduce towards it during the Summer; and, as one of the Chief, to send Ministers to Spain, Denmark, and other of the Confederates, and enter with them into the strictest Measures for the common Defence, against the Power of France: That the Ministers were so earnest with him to engage in it, from a Belief, that it would cause a general Opinion, both at home and abroad, of our Sincerity in the thing: That tho' the King himself spake to him concerning it, he detested himself for a good while, as thinking it neither had a good Root, nor would have the Effect upon the Parliament that was expected from it; and that his final Answer was, That he would not charge himself with going to make the intended Alliance in Spain; but if the King thought proper to conclude it here, upon Terms of mutual Satisfaction with the Spanish Ambassador, he would be content to go and cultivate it with the Spanish Court.

Intrigues of the Malcontents with respect to Sheriffs, and Juries.

But while the Court were busying themselves with these and the like sly Devices to amuse the Nation, and derive Popularity from their falling in with the old popular Cry against France, the Malcontent Faction sunk their Mines much deeper, and projected by one Blow, to level all Opposition, and render themselves Masters of the Government. They had already made several bold Attacks upon it, in relation to the Duke of Monmouth; and they purpos'd to make many more. In order therefore, to encrease Courage, they thought it, in the first Place, advisable to lessen Danger: The Laws were in their way. Harris, who publish'd that virulent Libel, call'd the Appeal from the Country, and others, had felt the Weight of them. This shew'd the Necessity of securing a Retreat in the Courts of Justice, and overbalancing the Authority of the Bench, by the absolute and uncontrollable Decisions of the Jury. "Nothing," says Mr. North, was so much laid to Heart, and labour'd by the Faction, as to secure the Law. That it might run partially, or rather friendly, on their Side, and against the Court in every thing. It would have been an useful Crisis of Power all over England; but, in London and Middlesex, where the Government resided, and, consequently, Faction must plant their Batteries, it was absolutely necessary to be brought about. For it would be hard for the Commanders in Chief to pull the forward Actors upon the desperate Danger of the Law, and to see them mortified, as well as run the Risk of being discovered themselves. Besides, the very Grinning of that Iron Enemy kept back the Process strangely.

But, as Matters stood, this whole Work, with Advantage, was practicable by one single Operation; which was the gaining, to their Party, a Majority of the Voters of the Common Hall of the City of London. For, that Interest once secur'd, there follow'd a Succession of factious Lord Mayors, and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, as well as Members of Parliament, and (by Means of the Sheriffs) the whole Nomination of Jury-Men would also fall within their Faction. It will not be strange if under this Security, after it was gain'd, the Party took Courage and followed their Game full Cry, like Hounds in View, without much Trouble about Precautions and Evasives; they stuck at nothing. And this Dispensation extended, not only to Means of Defence, but equally offended the Adversary, and had that Influence, that it seem'd to be the Interest of any common Man, within those Limits, to enter into the Party for Security of his Interest, as well as Protection of his Person; for wo to an Adversary that came to a Trial, upon any Account, under this Reglement of Jury>Returns. And no less Comfort flow'd for Friends, who were encouraged by such Advantages as Folks expect from Juries favourable to them."

But this Engine, mighty as it was, could not be brought into play, till the Party had made sure of the two Sheriffs of London, who were the Weights and Springs that put all in Motion. And here arose a Difficulty which gave rise to one of the greatest and fiercest Controversies that the later Times have produc'd; which is too voluminous to be abridg'd, and too remarkable to be slip'd over without Notice.

It had been a Custom of long standing for the Lord Mayor to put one or more Persons in Nomination for Sheriff at the Bridge House Feast, by the Ceremonial of Drinking to him out of a large gilt Cup; And the Person so drunk to, by the same Custom, was either oblig'd to serve or pay a large Fine for being

A. D. 1680. being excus'd. This was interpreted by one Party as an uncontrollable Right in the Lord Mayor to appoint one of the Sheriffs; who also insisted, that the Sheriff, so by him appointed, was return'd to the Common Hall, on the Day of Election, for Confirmation only, in virtue of an ancient Compromise, according to Mr. North, between the Lord Mayor and the Common Hall, to prevent the ill Effects of any such Disagreement between them as might endanger the Seizure of their Franchises. On the other Hand, those who were for vesting the Right of electing both Sheriffs in the Common Hall, affirm'd, that the Person or Persons, so drunk to by the Lord Mayor, were merely put in Nomination, by him; and when return'd to the Common Hall, might either be chose or rejected at their Pleasure. In support of these several Opinions, both Parties had recourse to Authorities of all Kinds: And, according to the laudable Usage of all Disputants, where the Truth did not favour, they made use of Fallacy to perplex the Cause. This Matter, however, was not brought to a Crisis till the Year 1682: For tho' the Malcontents made their great Push this Miltsummer, and the Court, admittin'd of their Purpose, prepar'd for an Opposition, it prov'd an ineffectual one. Sir Robert Clayton, the Lord Mayor, did indeed put in practice the old Ceremonial of drinking, to one Mr. Heckenbal, who was put up first alone, as the Lord Mayor's Sheriff: But the Common Hall would not allow it; and insisted on having the whole List declared, before they proceeded to Election; which, after some Dispute, was agreed to; and it appear'd that Singly Betbel, and Henry Cornish, Esqrs, had the greatest Number of Hands. And here began the Dispute, for the Common Serjeant gave it as his Opinion, That the Business of the Common Hall was first to confirm the Lord Mayor's Sheriff, and then to elect their own. And the Common Hall, on the other hand, would allow of no such Prerogative in the Lord Mayor; so that his Nomination was any thing more than a Matter of Ceremony, which it was in their Power to confirm or not. The Common Serjeant reply'd: The Sheriffs supported him: Mr. Heckenbal was put up again, and was again refus'd; the whole Passé persisting in their own Choice, and roaring out without Intermission, Declare! Declare! The Sheriffs and Common Serjeant then retir'd to make their Report to the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen; and were follow'd by three of the Livery by way of Deputies for the rest. And here began a new Debate, which lasted for above an Hour; and as it appears, came to no regular Decision at last. For when the Sheriff return'd, they put up Mr. Heckenbal a third time, but with no better Success than before. The Hall rung with a clamorous Negative, and by the Dint of Noise and Persistence, if not of Right, the Many for far carry'd their Point, that Betbel and Cornish were again declar'd to have the greatest Number of Hands; and Heckenbal stood wholly excluded: But still the adverse Party had another Expedient in Reserve; which was to proceed to a new Nomination on July 14; at which time Sir William Russell, Ralph Box, and Humphry Nicholson, Esqrs, together with Betbel and Cornish, were put up, and the Choice fell once more on the two last: And for a last Stake, a Poll was demanded in favour of Nicholas and Box. This could not be refus'd; so both Parties again founded to Arms, made their Mufters, and left no kind of Practice untry'd, either to enforce or force Men into their respective Services. The whole Dispute lasted a Month or five Weeks; during all which time, the City was in a continual Ferment; the Progress of the Poll, was the grand Enquiry of the Day: Echard and Oldmixon affirm the King himself came into the City, and supped with Sir Simon Lewis, one of the Sheriffs, to countenance his Corps: And that one Osborn, a Draper was prosecuted for a Riot, only for taking upon him to check the said Sheriff (c) for some unwarrantable Proceedings. At last the Day of (d) Decision came (July 29) and upon casting up the Numbers, it appear'd, that Mr. Cornish and Betbel were full victorious.

Bishop Burnet never writes fairer than on this

(c) It is by this unwarrantable Proceeding of the Sheriff, and the Check he receiv'd first from Mr. Osborn, may grow intelligible from the following Passage, which was one of the Remonstrances of Mitchamers-day: "A Petition was deliver'd to the Sheriffs from the Common Hall, to be by them presented to his Majesty, for the sitting of the Parliament: at the same time the Sheriff, into whose Hands it was deliver'd, was call'd upon to read it; and he excus'd himself by saying, They were those for the benefit of the Day, and so more; one of the Common-hall cry'd out aloud, Upon the Reading of it as your Petition." Vide the true Account of the Proceedings at the Common-hall of 1680.

The same Day, a like Petition was presented by the Grand Jury for one of the Hundred of Middlesex, to the Ld. Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Town, at the Sessions-house in the Old-Baily; who, after Reading, rejected it, as a Matter improper for them to meddle with. And, soon after, another of the Middlesex Grand Jurors presented a Paper, signifying their Dissale of the Force, and humbly begging the Court to take particular Notice of these Difficulties to such irregular Proceedings. Gentles, No. 1174.

(d) Upon this Occasion, Mr. Peplius presented the following Address to the Lord Mayor, in the Name of the Common-hall:

"May it please your Lordship,
We the Commoners of this City, now in Common-hall assembled, cannot but take notice, how our last Meeting here on this Occasion hath by some of this City been misrepresented to his Majesty, as tumultuous and disorderly; and tho' we did not observe any thing of that kind, but what may happen in such great Assemblies on like Occasions; yet not knowing how far the Indifference of the Commons may have carried that Scandal in prejudice of us, we hold our selves bound in duty to declare (as hereby we do) that the Hertz, which then appear'd amongst us, was so other than the Effect of Simulation for his Majesty's Service, and the Preservation of our own just Rights. And, therefore, as we do strictly detest any Thought of violating our Allegiance to our Sovereign, or of doing the least thing that may bear the Interpretation of an Affront to his Government, or Disaffection to his Royal Person; we pray your Lordship to represent us as such to the King, that he may not be longer deceived in that Matter; nor his gracious Intentions towards us be in any fort diverted. And withal, humbly to assure his Majesty, that we will, with one Heart and one Mind (to the utmost Part of all that is dear to us) join in the Defence of his Royal Person, and the Protestant Religion, against all Attempts and Plots to the contrary, tho' never so often repeated upon us."

Here follow'd another Clause, desiring his Lordship to beseech his Majesty, in their Names, that the Parliament might sit. To which his Lordship reply'd, in these Words:

"Gentles,

A. D. 1688.

this Topic: "All Juries, says his Lordship, were return'd by the Sheriffs: But they commonly left that wholly in the Hands of their Under-Sheriffs: So it was now pretended, that it was necessary to look a little more carefully after this Matter. The Under-Sheriffs were generally Attornies, and might be easily brought under the Management of the Court: So it was propos'd, that the Sheriffs should be chosen with more Care, not so much that they might keep good Tables, as that they should return good Juries." Again: "The Court was very jealous of this, and understood it to be done on design to pack Juries: So that the Party should always be safe, whatever they might engage in." And yet again, speaking of Bethel and Cornish, he says, "These two Persons had never before received the Sacrament in the Church, being Independents: But they did it now, to qualify themselves for this Office; which gave great Advantage against the whole Party: It was said, that the serving an End was a good Resolver of all Cases of Conscience, and purg'd all Scruples."

Exam. p. 94

Mr. North, also, yet more boldy and circumstantially, writes as follows: "Bethel and Cornish first broke the Ice; for they took the Business of the settling the Panels of Jurymen, out of the Compters, into their own Hands, and left to the Secondaries of the Compters, who were the proper Officers, no more but to return, to the Courts of Justice, what they had prepared. It seems those Officers were Men of Value, and uncorrupt; and, left to themselves, would not be made Propriety to serve the Ends of Faction. But, for the Business of Middlesex, a choice Under-sheriff perform'd all at once: And they found one exquisitely fit for the Purpose, being Doctor-Standing in Treason. His Name was Goodenough, and really so he was for the Turn to be serv'd; for once he himself escap'd narrowly the Noose, for Guilt of High-Treason, for which he stood Debtor to his Friend's Secrecy and his own Expedition.

Now the Result, or Consequences of all this Cookery may readily be apprehended, viz. That all grand Inquests were compact of Party-men, Opiniators, and self-willed;

if not real Traitors, little better, and assuredly guided by Faction in all they did. And so also the petty Juries, for Crown-causes; and, which was more extraordinary, even the common Panels, as had been formerly returned almost of course at the Nisi Prius Courts, for Civil Trials, were gabbled, altho' consisting of Persons that had, for many Years, serv'd, and were willing to attend, and were known and trusted by the Citizens, almost as Arbitrators, and approv'd of by the Judges, as Men fair and indifferent. Yet there must be a Reform of these also; and, at least, in every one of them, some rank Party-men prick'd in, to procure in Party-Causes. But, upon special Returns made in Causes of Consequence, if Faction interpos'd, the whole String was of the same. And, upon all Occasions of this Nature, the Nomination was consult'd at choice Clubs and Cabals, where the Runners to and fro came in and out with Intelligence, and could inform who were good and who had Men. And so, in their Places near the Court, where all public Business was transacted, the Law was become a perfect Captive of the Faction, like a Dog in a String, to snarl and bite only as they encouraged. It was a fine Retrenchment for the Forlorn Hope of the Party to be enforced behind, and, from thence, to fall out upon Adventurers of Sedition and High Treason; and all with Assurance of Impunity, whatever else happen'd.

To close on this Head: At the same time that the two Factions had their Bickering for the Sheriffs, as it was to the Citizens, that they had those for their Leaders, who would, in person, go all Lengths, and run all Hazards, for the Good of the Cause; or, according to Sir William Temple, because Boldness looks like Strength, Lord Shaftsbury engag'd the Lords Huntington; Grey of Wark, Ruffel, Corwallis, Brandon, Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir Henry Coe, Sir William Cooper, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir Scep. Peto, Thomas Thynn, Thomas Forrester, John Trinchard, and Thomas Wharton, Esquires, to go with him into Westminster-Hall; and there, to the Grand Jury for Middlesex, all of them in a Body publicly presented (s) Reasons for indicting the Duke of York as a Reculant;

A Proceeding

Lord Shaftsbury, &c. present the Duke of York as a Reculant.

Guidance.

I must confess, I have always had this Apprehension, that nothing could contribute more to the Safety of his Majesty's Person, and the Welfare of his People, than a right Understanding between the King and his People, and more immediately between the King and this his great City. If there have been any such Misrepresentations as you seem to intimate in your Petition, I call God to witness, I am free from it; and I do not easily believe any body else would be guilty of such a thing: However, as to that Matter, Gentlemen, I shall readily comply with your Request, and inform the King truly of the Fact. For the other Matter, I am oblig'd to say so much to you, that I had the Honour, not long since, to wait upon his Majesty, when he was pleas'd to declare to me, and assure me, that this Parliament should sit in November next; and I am inform'd likewise, that he hath accompanied all his Judges with the same thing, for them to satisfy the Country in their several Circuits. If that be so, I have your great Concern for that Matter might have been surpris'd, being anticipated by his Majesty's gracious Intention. However, I shall not be wanting, with all Humility, to lay the whole Matter before him."

(s) As follow.

1. Because the 25th Car. II. when an Act was made to draw Popish Recusants out of all Offices and Places fit Trust, the Duke of York did lay down several great Offices and Places (as Lord High Admiral of England, General of all his Majesty's Forces both by Land and Sea, Governor of the Cinque Ports; and divers others) thereby to avoid the Punishment of that Law against Popish.

2. 30th Car. II. When an Act was made to disable Popish from sitting in either House of Parliament, there was a Privilege inserted in that Act, That it should not extend to the Duke of York; on purpose to save his Right of sitting in the Lords House; tho' he refused to take those Oaths which the Protestant Peers ought to do.

3. That his Majesty, in his Speech March 6, the 31st Year of his Reign, doth give for a Reason to the Parliament, why he set his Brother out of England; because he would leave his Man Room to lay, that he had not removed all Causes which might influence him to Popish Council.

4. That there have been divers Letters read in both Houses of Parliament, and at the secret Committees of both Houses, from several Cardinals, and others, at Rome; and also, from other Popish Bishops, and Agents of the Pope, in other Parts of France, which do apparently show the great Correspondencies

A Proceeding wholly of the inflammatory kind; and therefore not more unbecoming a peaceable Subject than worthy of the Head of a Faction, whose first Business it was to create a Confidence in his Followers; which could no otherwise be done, than by thus throwing away the Scabbard, and manifesting to the whole World, that he would neither give nor receive Quarter!

The immediate Effect of this daring Action in Whinistler Hall, was not so great as was expected; for while the Jury were yet deliberating on the Presentment, the Court had the Address to send for them up and discharge them. "Yet," says Sir William Temple, it had a general one on the Minds of the People, and a strong one upon the Passions of all those Persons that were so publicly engag'd in this bold Pace against the Duke; which was breaking all Measures with him, and entering into the desperate Resolution of either receiving his Highness, or themselves; and I found it had a great Effect upon the small Circle of my Acquaintance or Observation."

Another Rebellion in Scotland.

While England was labouring with these inward Convulsions, the Remnant of those miserably deluded and persecuted Wretches who had made their Escape after the Rout of Bathoch-Bridge, in Scotland, the Year before, consisting of the most desperate and most enthusiastic of the whole Party, tho' inconsiderable for their Number, became so lost to Reason and Common Sense, as by a formal Declaration, which they fix'd to the Cross of Sanquhar, the 22d of June, to disown Charles Stuart; who by his Perjury and Breach of Covenant, said they, with God and his Church; by his Tyranny and Breach of the very Leyes Regnandi, in Matters civil, had fore faulted the Throne of Scotland, in which he rather tyranniz'd than reign'd: To declare that, several Years before, he should have been denod'd of being King, Ruler, or Magistrate, or having any Power to act, or Right to be obey'd as such: As also, under the Standard of Christ, Captain of Salvation, to declare War against such a Tyrant and Usurper, and all his Abettors, as Enemies to Christ, his Cause and Covenant; and finally to disown the Duke of Tork a profest'd Papist, as repugnant to their Principles and Vows to the most High God, &c. The Number of these Desperadoes, were upon this Occasion, no more than twenty-one: And for their Leaders, they had one Cargill, and one Cameron; after whose Names they were sometimes call'd

Cargill, and sometimes Camerons. Cargill was taken before this Exploit at Sanquhar; and Cameron had the Honour to dye in his Command, about a Month after, in an Engagement with the King's Troops, near a Place call'd Cunobock; which put an End to this little Rebellion almost before it was broke out. Their Numbers, even then, amounted to no more than an hundred Foot and forty Horse; and yet they refus'd Quarter till Cameron himself, and about twenty-six of his bravest Followers were kill'd: But if these Men were possess'd with a Spirit of Zeal, which drove them into Phrenzy, those by whom they were overpower'd suffer'd the Transports of their Loyalty to degenerate into Savageness: For, after the Fight was over, they cut off the Head and Hands of Cameron, and the Head of one Pooler, who had the Command of the Foot under him, as they lay dead on the Field, and made use of them to adorn their triumphal Entry into Edinburgh; which was so conducted, as to excite more of Horror in the Spectators, than Approbation: Haxton, who was so deeply concern'd in the Murder of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and three more of the Rebels being taken Prisoners, Haxton, as the Chief, was receiv'd out of one of the City Gates by the Common Hangman, and set, bare-headed, on a Carriage-Horse, with his Face towards the Tail, his Hands ty'd behind his Back, and his Legs under the Horse's Belly: In which Equipage, the Hangman, bearing aloft Cameron's Head on the Top of a Halberd, led him thro' the Streets (the other three, chain'd to a Bar of Iron, and bareheaded likewise, following on Foot behind) to the Council-Chamber; where the Privy Council sat to receive him; and before whom he behaved like a Lion in the Toils, overpower'd, but not subdu'd; Lord of his own Mind, insensible of Pain, incapable of Fear, and wanting nothing of the consummate Hero; if Heroism consists in mere Fortitude and Magnanimity, without any regard to Cause or Consequence. Being examin'd upon several Particulars concerning the late Archbishop's Murder, he said, he was not oblig'd to answer or to be his own Accuser. Being ask'd, if he own'd the King's Authority, his Answer was, That when Authority disown'd the Interest of God, in Opposition to Jesus Christ, it ought likewise to be disown'd; and that he fear'd the King's Authority was such. Being farther ask'd, if he thought the killing the late Archbishop was a Murder, He said, it was no Murder; and if he own'd the referendecies between the Duke of Tork and the Pope: And how the Pope could not chuse but weep for Joy, at the reading of some of the Duke's Letters, and what great Satisfaction it was to the Pope to hear the Duke was advanced to the Catholic Religion. That the Pope has granted Briefs to the Duke, for sin Remission, ample Indulgences, with much more to this Purpose.

That the whole House of Commons hath declared him to be a Papist, in their Votes, Sunday April the 6th, 1679: "Resolved, contra contra, That the Duke of Tork's being a Papist, and the Hope of his coming such to the Crown, has given the greatest Countenance and Encouragement to the present Conspiracy and Designs of the Papists, against the King and Protestant Religion."—What this Conspiracy and Design is, will appear by a Declaration of both Houses of Parliament, March 25, 1679: "Resolved, contra contra, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, That they do declare, that they are fully satisfy'd, by the Proofs they have heard, there now is, and for divers Years last past hath been, a horrid and reasonable Plot and Conspiracy, contrived and carried on by those of the Popish Religion, for the murdering of his Majesty's sacred Person, and for the subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient, well-establisht Government of this Realm."

6. That, besides all this Proof, and much more to this Purpose, it is most notorious and evident, he hath for many Years abstain'd himself from Protestant Churches, during religious Worship.

the (f) New Covenant lately taken from Cargil? He reply'd in the Affirmative, adding, That he would fain know what any Person had to say against it. Being also ask'd, if he were at Liberty and had Power to murder any of the King's Council, as he had murder'd the late Archbishop, whether he would make the like Use of it? He said, he was not free to give any Answer to that Question. The Lord Chancellor then saying, That if he were not more ingenuous in his Answers with respect to that Murder, he should immediately be put to the Torture. His Answer was, it would be but an Addition to their former Cruelties against the People of God. And being yet further urg'd with several other Questions; he, at first, refus'd to answer; but after a short Pause, said, That if he might have Liberty of Speech, he would give an Answer: Which being freely granted him, he made a short Speech, in which he said, "That he stood there as a Prisoner for Jesus Christ, and for adhering to his Cause and Interest, which had been seal'd by the Blood of many Persons, who had suffered lately in that Land, and that he own'd all the Testimonies given by them." Being then ask'd what he could answer to that Article of the Confession of Faith, which he pretended to own, which says, That infidelity and Difference in Religion, do not vacate the Magistrate's Right; he reply'd, That that Article was expung'd by the Solemn League and Covenant; the Obligation of which was only to maintain the King in Maintenance of Religion. And all this being read to him, he, openly and without any Reserve, confirm'd every Particular anew; only he refus'd to sign his Examination; which is the only Reason that can be given for Bishop Burnet's Assertion, "That he would not own the Authority of the Council, nor make any Answer to their Questions." For the last Scenes of this extraordinary Man's Life, we may, however, depend, in a good degree, upon his Lordship's Authority, because it is corroborated by his whole Story, and all the Traces that are left of it.

And at his Execution.

"He was so low, by reason of his Wounds, says that Prelate, that it was thought he would dye in the Question if tortur'd: So he was, in a very summary Way, condemn'd to have both his Hands cut off, and then hang'd. All this he suffer'd with a Constancy that amaz'd all People. He seem'd to be, all the while, as in an enthusiastic Rapture, and insensible of what was done to him. When his Hands were cut off, he ask'd, like one unconcern'd, if his Feet must be cut off likewise: And he had so strong a Heart, that, notwithstanding all the Loss of Blood by his Wounds, and the cutting off his Hands, yet when he was hang'd up, and his Heart cut out, it continued to palpitate some time after it was on the Hangman's Knife, as some Eye-Witnesses assur'd me. Cargil, and many others of that mad Sect, both Men and Women, suffer'd with an Obstinacy that was so particular, that tho' the Duke of York sent the Offer of Pardon to them on the Scaffold, if they would only say, God bless the King; it was refus'd with great Neglect. One of them, a Woman, said very calmly, She was sure God would not bless him, and that therefore, she would not take God's Name in vain. Another said, more fully, that she would not worship that Idol nor acknowledge any other King but Christ: And so both were hang'd."

Thus it appears that Error has its Martyrs as well as Truth; and that the Effects of a strong Conviction, and a strong Delusion are the same. It ought also, in this Place, to be observ'd, that all the virulent Party-Writers on the Side of the Prerogative and the Hierarchy, endeavour to fix the Guilt and Madnes of these Enthusiasts on the whole Body of Protestant Nonconformists: But very unfairly; for no Species of the like Insatiation appear'd on this Side of the Tweed: Nor, indeed, do the extravagant Doctrines in Cargil's New Covenant, bear any Resemblance to those set forth even by the Scottish Presbyters, on the Day of his Majesty's Coronation at Scene.

That we may not incur the Censure of being too minute and circumstantial in our Narration, we are now to pass over some, and postpone other, (g) Occurrences, which were the Product of this Summer; and proceed, forth-

A. D. 1650.

(f) It consisted of Seven Articles, besides the Preamble, which had an equal Relation to Religion and Government; and were drawn up in very opposite and significant Terms. The first was relative to Matters of Faith only: The second declar'd equally against Prelacy and Episcopacy; and that, according to their Power (Power being God's Call to us Gods) they would relieve the Church and Kingdom from all Oppression: The third was a Declaration of War against the Kingdom of Dartree, and the Supporters of it, Idolatry, Papery, &c. that being this zealors for God, he might delight to dwell among them: The fourth was express against the King, and his Commissioner Lauderdale, for abjuring the Covenant; calling their Administration of Power, not Government, but lawful Rape; and themselves not Governors, but public Grassladders, and public Judgements, which all Men ought assentually to labour to be free from, as from Scourge, Famine, Pestilence, &c.; and that because they had taken away Christ's Church, and chang'd the Civil Government (which was by King and free Parliaments) into Tyranny; so that none could look upon them as bound in Allegiance to them, unless they would also say, they were bound in Allegiance to Devils: They being His Vicegerents, and not Clas: The fifth Equally'd their Opinion, That Government was not an Inheritance, but an Office, which must be squar'd, not to the Interest and Loss of one Man, but to the Good of the Commonwealth; for which Reason they disdain'd the Government of a single Person, as apt to degenerate into Tyranny; and declar'd their Purpose to provide for their Governour able Men, out of all the People; such as fear'd God, lov'd his Truth, and hated Covetousness; And the res lest turn'd on the Power, Duty, Office, and Abuse of a Gospel Ministry, &c.

(g) It is ought not, however, to be forgot, that Plaiting was now become a Trade; and that every Villain had Recourse to it, as both a safer and safer Way to thrive, than by taking to the Road: Of which Ferguson gives the following extraordinary Instance.

Having first told us, that the Conspirators were so estrag'd against the Duke of Beck, for his Proceedings at the Court of France, to their Prejudice, before-mention'd, that they resolv'd to have his Head at any rate; he proceeds to say, that a certain Nobleman, who own'd all his Greatness to the Duke's Patronage, was now the principal Instrument to destroy him: The Minister this: They find out a common Strumpet, one Mrs. de Mar, who had a Boy call'd Philip de Mar, bred about the Court, and, after the Court Fashion, one of the most impudent Villains that ever was heard of; and this Boy's Mother being a Procurer to the Court, is heretofore it may be to the Duke, and using the Duke's Houle; the now growing very poor, and out of date both at Court with to those more important Incidents which, at last, necessitated those in Power to give way to the Meeting of the Parliament.

The carrying the Sheriffs with to high a hand in the City, the desperate Attack on the Duke in Westminster Hall, the Popularity of his Grace of Monmouth, the deep and dangerous Intrigues of the Earl of Shaftsbury, and the violent Humours that rag'd among the People were all Circumstances, that not only created very melancholly Reflections at Whitehall, but actually contributed to some material Alterations: In particular, the Earl of Essex (who, if Sir William Temple's Authority is to be rely'd on, had his Eye and Heart ever bent on his Return to the Government of Ireland; which made him steer wholly by that Compass, and pursue court or popular Humour as he thought either likeliest to gain his End) having endeavour'd to carry that favourite Point, by all the (B) Tricks and Refinements; that and every where else, is first for the E- of — a House, and the Lady — with Christian, a Servant of the Earl of Derby's, and this infamous Creature, contrive to lay to his Grace's Charge a Vice too false to name; supposing he committed on her Boy; but they could not tell how well to do that neither, in regard the Boy had not lived with the Duke for above six Years before; however, they concluded That time would well enough; and so, with the Help of Mr. Clarendon, who was afterwards convicted for this Conspiracy, and flood in the Pillory with divers others, they settled the Point to well, that the Boy and Mother are taken into present Pay, and introduced to the Duke's Presence, who instantly get's a Justice, so left that Sir George Jeffes, the Recorder of London, to take the Deposition of the Boy and the Mother against the Duke: But to give Sir George his Due, he did not at all relish the Business, but was so far from it, that he plainly told the E- when he had done it, that it was an odd, idle thing, and it look'd too like Malice; and advis'd his Lordship not to meddle farther in such a dirty Business: But Sir George's Advice did but little prevail; for his Lordship perceiving he was committed by the King to do what he did; and therefore told Sir George he must take the Deposition: It was his Majesty's Pleasure; which Sir George did take the Head of, but did not finish it till another Day; which being done, and the Boy and the Mother sworn, his Lordship made a Shift to get a Warrant to apprehend the Duke, sign'd by Baron Bertie and Mellengers were out to way-lay the Duke at his coming over, both at Dover and elsewhere; and the Conspirators once motion'd a Proclamation for the calling home his Grace; but that was diverted by some means or other; and, notwithstanding all the Means and Power of the Court, and Conspirators, to take him, and do his Work that way, yet, by the Care and Industry of Mr. Jeph and Whiteaker, the Roguery was still discover'd as fast as acted: Yet the Conspirators had so far prevail'd, that to put a better Glóse upon their Villanies, they had obtain'd the Council-board to take cognizance of the Fact; and that Board not only examined the pretended Evidence of the Boy and his Mother against the Duke, but also made Orders for the then Attorney-General to hold the Duke upon the Testimony given; and, to encourage the Business, the E- Mar had been so bold as to say, the best Man in England for him to work, and promis'd him 300 l. for answer out of the Duke's Estate for his Pains (which was prov'd by undeniable Witnesses in the Council-chamber) yet, instead of repaying the Villain that had spent such a Man, the Council, so soon as the Duke's Back was turn'd, who complain'd of the Conspiracy against her Lord, allow'd that very Villain the 300 l. for Work, (a Circumstance hardly imaginable) to keep him in Prison, where he was put by the Duke's Agents, in order to be indicted for the Conspiracy. And to show that there were as well great as little Villains in the Design against the Duke, this very Creature, the Mar, before he was seiz'd by the Duke of Barb's Agents, and apprehended, had been kept at a Westmore's House, near White by Name, and that by Order obtain'd by the Treasurer from one of the Secretaries, on purpose that he might not be out of the way when they were ready; and the Money for keeping him was paid to White by Bridgman, belonging to Sunderland's Office: And to confirm were the Conspirators of erecting this Device on the Duke, and getting his Head, that it appear'd, upon the Discovery, that the Duke's Estate was shar'd, before his Head was off.

This is the Person's manner of telling the Story; and, considering the Spirit he wrote with, the Reader may fairly conclude, that, with some Truth, there is also a Mixture of Falshood in it. In the Gazette of April 3, 1680, there is, moreover, the following Article:

"Whitehall, April 7. Mr. Attorney-General being, by Order from the Council-board, directed to take the Examinations of all the Witnesses concerned in the Matter of the Accusation against the Duke of Buckingham, as well those sign'd as for the said Duke, did this Day make his Report accordingly: In which he took notice, that he had Reason to believe that there had been several other Persons assist. And the Right Honourable the Earl of Sunderland finding that his Name was mention'd in one of the said Examinations, his Lordship mov'd his Majesty, that Mr. the Mar, and Philip le Mar her Son, might be immediately sent for; which being order'd, Mrs. le Mar declar'd, That she was given to understand, that her Son Philip le Mar, who is now a Prisoner in the Tower, had been a great time for to be Question'd by several Persons, and made drunk; and being drunk, had been sworn to several Informations relating to the Duke of Buckingham: And the said Mrs. le Mar nam'd one Edward Esqly, who could testify the Truth hereof; the said Edward Esqly declar'd upon Oath, That the said Philip le Mar, at the said Tavern, come down-stairs drunk; and that he had told her, he was made to swear when he was drunk, and that his Hand four times to a Paper; and that Mr. Berkeley, Esqly a Justice of Peace, and one Cadman, were then present: Whereupon the said Philip le Mar, being call'd in and examined, said upon Oath, That he was made drunk at the said Tavern, as aforesaid, and had then sign'd and sworn to some Informations, which were brought ready written, and which he does not remember were read to him, he not being able to read himself: And the said Examinations being read at the Board, the said Philip le Mar did deny the Whole: And whereas it was said in one of them, That several great Persons had encouraged and instructed him in a Design against the said Duke, and that the Earl of Sunderland also knew of the said Design; the said Philip le Mar upon Oath declar'd, That he never had said any thing concerning the said Earl; and that he neither knows, nor can say, any thing of his Lordship as to that Matter: And it appearing further to the Board, that several other illegal and ill Practices had been used in this whole Business, his Majesty thought fit to order, That Mr. Burghley, who had taken the said Examination, should be put out of the Commission for the Peace; and that, for preventing the like Practices for the future upon the said Philip le Mar, no Person should be suffer'd to come to, or converse with him, during his Imprisonment, without Order from the Board.

Five Days afterwards, Sir William Waller was, also, put out of the Commission of the Peace, for being too idle in this Matter; the particular Offence sign'd for it, being for illegally taking one Hichy, alias Higgins, one of the Parties in this Affair, out of the Custody, and detaining him all Night at a Tavern.

It is, however, certain, that Colonel Blood, before-spoken of, for his desperate Attempts to steal the Crown, and to carry off the Duke of Ormond's son also Christiana, a Creature of Lord Danby's, one Orlan, and one Curtis, were convicted of a Conspiracy against the said Duke, June 28; that is to say, to suborn Philipens Colles and Sam. Ryler, two of his Grace's Servants, to swear against him the detestable Crime before intimated, at several Times, with several Persons, &c.

As another of the Remarkables of this Summer, it ought also to be remember'd, That, in the Cloze of the Month of July, a violent Fever put a Period to the valuable Life of the pillar Earl of Ossory; who had the Felicity to live long enough to acquire into the Light that goodly be deriv'd from the joint Succession of all the Virtues and Graces, and to die before the Rite of Age, and Industry had marr'd the trail of them.

(8) "Whenever the Irish Acts came into Council, he was sure to be there; not raising only Difficulties in the particular Acts, and arranging not the only Precedent but common Sense of the Lord Lieutenant and Council there: Then arguing against the sending a Parliament in that Kingdom: And, at last, introducing Sir James Shea to make Proposal of increasing the King's Revenue there near 80,000 l. a Year, upon a new Farm to himself and the Company he offer'd to be join'd with him: A Farm, indeed, as it was drawn up, not of the Revenue, but of the Crown of Ireland!

This Scheme was ever oppos'd by Lord Essex, says Temple, and ever oppos'd by me, with more Sharpness than was usual to me upon any Debate; because I had found out the Cheat of the whole; and, which the Lord Essex had set forth as a great Matter piece of that Cunning which his Friends us'd to say was his Talent; and was one for which, of all other Talents, I had ever the greatest Aversion. The Short of the Story was, Lord Essex had a mind to be Lieutenant of Ireland, and to hinder any Parliament from being call'd till he he or his Friends could put in Practice; and having been defeated in all, fell at this time into new Commerce with Lord Shaftsbury, who, continues Sir William, told him in those shameful Words, My Lord, if you will come in to us, never trouble yourself; we'll make you Lieutenant of Ireland. The way to this Return was, to oppose the Duke's Stay here upon the several Passages, He (Shaftsbury) made; but chiefly upon that (the Prisentment) before the Session of Parliament. Lord Hallifax, tho' he fell not in with Lord Shaftsbury, yet was glad to make fair Weather against the Parliament met by his Oppositions to the Duke. The Lord Sunderland was struck with the Boldness of the Lords Presentment in Westminster Hall; and the Consequence of such Men being so desperately engag'd in an Attempt wherein they were likely to be seconded by the Humour of the Nation, upon the Alarms of Popery; which made him conclude the King would not be able to support the Duke any longer; but would be forc'd to separate his Interests from him at Court: And he believ'd the King himself was of the same Mind. Mr. Godolphin fell into the same Thoughts with Lord Sunderland, both of the thing itself and of the King's Mind in it: So as, upon the Debate in Council, concerning the Duke's Stay, or going back into Scotland before the Parliament met, these four join'd absolutely in the Reasons and Advices for his going away: And tho' the rest of the Council were generally of the contrary Opinion, yet the King fell in with these four, and concluded the thing against the Duke's Will and his Friends, as Sir William Temple was told; on whose Credit this whole Account is to be taken.

The King him-

Duke's Return

the Duchess of Portsmouth.

There is Reason to think that there was yet a fifth Person, the Duchess of Portsmouth, who had more Power over the King than all the rest; and that she made use of it all, to help the Duke on his way. That Lady had her Reasons, at this time, to be on good Terms with the Opposition; and possibly either bought her Peace with this notable Service, or was brib'd into it with the tempting Assurance, that, in case she co-operated in the Exclusion-Bill, her own Descendants should not be the worse for it. Ferguson expressly charges her with having an Eye to the Succession; and makes no Difficulty to affirm, that the Earl of Sunderland was of her Cabal: But if he was, it could be only to delude her; since it is a known thing, that his Attachments were elsewhere. The same Writer, also, says, That Mrs. Wall, her Popery, P. II.

Grace's Woman, who was deeply in the Interest of his Royal Highness, appriz'd him from time to time of all that pass'd, and thereby enabled him to take his Precautions accordingly.

But whether his Majesty was overcome by the Charms of the Lady, or gave way to the Authority of his wife Men, or took his Resolution, with respect to the Duke, from his own Sense of Things, and a thorough Conviction, that what he did he was oblig'd to do, he took all imaginable Care to make his Royal Highness believe the last was the Truth, and to reconcile him to the Thing by the Manner. He delay'd his Departure till the very Day before the Parliament was to meet: He accompany'd him as far as Wobwich, where he was to embark for Scotland; and he took his Leave of him with all the seeming Tokens of an Affection without Reserve.

But the Duke and his whole Party were, however, too grievously mortify'd with this Wound, to be over-sensible of the Balm, which his Majesty so officiously pour'd into it: Which is the less to be wondered at, if what Sir J. Revelley says is true, viz. That the Papists, presuming on Support from the Duke, had lifted up their Crests with great Arrogance; and that his Royal Highness had till now, reign'd absolute in the King's Affairs.

We have now the Session so long expected, and so violently contended for, in sight: But for the better understanding the principal Points it turn'd upon, it is necessary to take a transient View of the Progress of the Plot; as also, by way of Preparatory for our taking leave of that wearisome Labyrinth, for good and all.

It seems, as the Credit of the Plot rose or fell, the Credit, and consequently the Power, of the two Parties rose or fell with the People: When Reading was convicted of suborning Bedlow to soften his Evidence, with respect to the (i) five Popish Lords; and Price and Tashborough, for attempting to do the same by (k) Dugdale, in favour of Harcourt; it may be pretum'd the King's Witness, as they were called, stood highest in the Esteem of the Public; because it was more natural, from the Prejudices at that time reigning, to conclude, that these dangerous Practices of the Prisoners rather imply'd a Consciousness of Guilt, than that, from a Consciousness of their own Innocence, and Dread of the Fury of the Times, they thought it their wisest Course to treat Prostitutes as Prostitutes; and to submit to a Composition came to the Government. He saw himself out at Court, and the Hopes of getting in by his Interest in Parliament, now delay'd by the Prorogation longer than he could stay; he projects this Farm with Sir James Sheen, and by him offers it to Mr. Hyle (First Comptroller of the Treasury) with the Advantage mention'd to the King's Revenue; but agrees with Sir James, that, if the Bait were swallow'd, he should, upon the Conclusion of all, declare, That he, and his Company, were ready to perform all the Conditions agreed upon; but could not do it, unless my Lord Essex might be first ever Lieutenant of Ireland; without which the Condition of that Kingdom could never be settled enough for such Advantage to the King's Service and Revenue. This I knew, under Secrecy, from a Confidant of Sir James Sheen, who had told himself this whole Project, and the Pass intended.*

Temp. Mem. Part III. P. 145.
(i) But more particularly of the Lords Perre, Francis, Stafford, and Sir Henry Tushnet. The Consideration offer'd for this Job was to be made both in Money and Lands: Fifty-six Guineas, at several times, Bedlow receiv'd from Reading. All the several Circumstances laid in the Indictment, were very clearly prov'd; and Reading was sentenced to stand in the Pillory, and pay a Fine of 1000*l*.

(k) She offer'd Dugdale 1000*l*; and, if Dugdale himself deserves Belief, not only made frequent Use of the Duke of York's Name, to give a Sanction to what he said, but told him he should have a Place in the Duke's Court. The Proof in that Case was, likewise, flagrant: So the Jury had no Difficulty to bring them both in Guilty.

A. D. 1680. position with Villany, rather than become the Martyrs of it.

On the other hand, when Wakeman, &c. were acquitted, not all the Libels on the Integrity of the Court, nor the shameless Reflections on the Lord Chief-Justice, could keep the Witnesses in Countenance, nor uphold the Credit of the Plot; till the Practices upon Dangerfield, which were calculated to ruin it entirely, furnish'd the Party with Materials to raise it once more as high as ever. But still it had no Stability; Dangerfield's Character was so excessively rotten, that nothing could be built upon it. Mrs. Ceffer prov'd in open Court, by Record upon Record, that he had been burnt in the Hand, whipp'd, transported, pillor'd four times, outlaw'd for Felony, fin'd for Cheats, and suffer'd public Infamy over and over again for repeated Crimes; so that his Evidence was not only over-ru'd, but he himself was committed as a Rogue almost beyond the Reach of Pardon: And, before, when the Bill against the Countess of Powis, who had been committed and held to Bail for high Treason on his Evidence, came to be examin'd by the Grand Jury, and was found to be no otherwise supported, they made no Difficulty to bring it in Ignoramus.

Sir Thomas Gascoigne's Case.

During the Interval of Parliament, the Plot had been yet farther dignify'd by the Prosecution of one Sir Thomas Gascoigne, a Gentleman of the North, in the last Stage of Life, who had almost totally lost his Sight, his Hearing, and his Memory; and who had for little concern'd himself with public Business, that he had been in London but once, for thirty Years before. His Accusers were two of his own discarded Domesticks, infamous for their dishonest Practices while yet in his Service. The Charge against him was for conspiring the Death of his Majesty; but for abounding with Improbabilities and Inconsistencies, that on the Counter-Evidence of no fewer than twelve Protestants, he was acquitted. The Lady Tempest, the Daughter of this Sir Thomas, who had been robb'd by one of these Fellows to the value of 60*l*. and one Mrs. Preswick, Sir Miles Stratton, and one Mr. Thwing, a Priest, were also prosecuted for their Lives, for being concern'd in the same Conspiracy, on the Credit of the same exploded Witnesses: And tho' the two Ladies and (1) Sir Miles escap'd the Snare, the Priest was caught, and suffer'd at York after having been tantaliz'd with the Hopes of Life from the End of July to the End of October, by way of Assurance to the Parliament, that the King's Heart was now as entirely Protestant as theirs.

No Cause could reap any solid Advantage from such Mea or such Proceedings as these; and yet these Men had Patrons, and these Proceedings (no) Advocates; but not beyond the Limits of the Faction whose Interests they undertook to serve. All of the other took sufficient care to expose their Wickedness, and sufficiently found their Account in it; for an Impositive demonstrative, is, or ought to be, a Specific for Credulity.

The Plot, moreover, and the Plot-Wrights, receiv'd yet another stunning Blow this Summer, by the Deliverance of Roger Palmer, Earl of Castlemain, Husband to the famous Duchess of Cleveland. He was indicted for his Share of the grand Plot, to kill the King and re-establish Popery. The two main Witnesses against him were Oates and Dangerfield. Oates swore that the Prisoner was made acquainted with the Result of the Consultation, so often spoke of, at Ferriack's Chamber, and with'd it good Success; in which Case he said, he should be revenged: And Dangerfield, that his Lordship had been very angry with him because he had not done the Business he was taken out of Prison for, viz. The killing of the King. The whole Issue was put on the Credit of the Witnesses. The Lord Chief Justice (Scruggs) in his Charge to the Jury, caution'd them to weigh the Nature of Things in themselves, as they carry'd Probability or not; or else the Confidence of a Swearer would take away any Man's Life; enlarg'd on the Infamy of Dangerfield's Character; allow'd that Oates was the more reputable Person of the two, and left them to consider whether the turning Witnes made a Sinner a Saint.

These were the Weights against the Plot: And in the other Scale, two Incidents, which were both the Growth of this Summer, were thrown together with all the Trappings they would bear, by way of Counterpoise.

One Mr. Arnold, a Justice of Peace in Monmouthshire, who had distinguish'd himself by his Zeal against Papists Recusants, and in particular, had been eminently instrumental in prosecuting one Captain, otherwise Father, for exercising the Office of a Priest, of which he was convicted, and for which he underwent the Law, was, about the Middle of April, way-laid in Bell Yard, Fleetstreet, by two Persons in disguise, who gave him four or five Wounds in his Body, and several Cuts in his Face; and, as it was given in Evidence, would certainly have dispatch'd him, if it had not been for a Pair of Whalebone Bodice, which, it seems, hinder'd the Thrusts from being mortal; saying, at the same time: Now, you Dogs, pray for the Soul of Captain (n) Evans; as also, D—me, he has Armour on, cut his Throat. Another Circumstance that render'd the Affair more remarkable, was this: Mr. Arnold had a (2) Controversy Lord Castlemain's Trial and Acquittal.

The attempt on Justice Arnold.

(1) But Sir Miles not till the next Year.

(2) Mr. Agness says, in particular, says, That Robert told his story so discreetly, that every body believ'd him. Letters to Saville, p. 112.

(3) He was at Tewkesbury, as Mr. Arnold assur'd the Court, when the Sheriff came to give him Notice, that he had a Warrant for his speedy Execution; and said on that Occasion, God do-a-me, I'll play out my last first.

(4) Of what Nature this Controversy was; and what Connection Mr. Herbert had with Giles, may be gather'd, in part, from the following Particulars, which are annex'd, by way of Supplement to the said Giles's Trial:

"Then Mr. Herbert appear'd, and pray'd to be discharged from his Recognizance to appear at the Old Bailey; but being accus'd by a Woman for calling her Whore, Jude, and every ill Name, and holding up his Staff at her, and

A. D. 1680.

Controversy with Mr. Herbert, another Monmouthshire Justice, which was to have been argued before the Privy Council, at four o'Clock, the very Day he was assassinated, but was unexpectedly postpon'd till the next Morning at ten: At which time it was now impossible for Mr. Arnold to attend, by reason of his Wounds. Thus the Affair came as of course before the Council, who thought it advisable to give public Notice in the Gazette, That whoever would discover any of the Assassins should have 100*l.* for a Reward. Several Persons were, upon this, taken up on Suspicion, and at last, one Giles (of Monmouthshire likewise) without the Privy or Knowledge, as it is said, of Mr. Arnold, who, upon being sent for to confront him upon his Examination, charg'd him, at first Sight, with being one of the Assassins. And Giles, on the other hand, instead of denying it, said, The Matter would amount to no more than an Assault and Battery. He was hereupon committed to Newgate. In the July following, he was solemnly try'd at the Old Baily, Jeffreys the Recorder presiding as Judge Assistant to the Lord-Mayor, and, upon as full Proof as the nature of the thing would bear, was brought in guilty; his Sentence being, to stand in the Pillory three times; to pay 500*l.* to the King; to be committed in Execution till that was paid, and to find Sureties for his good Behaviour during Life. The Use that was made by the Party of all this, was to refresh the faded Story of Godfrey's Murder, to give it additional Credit, to excite new Repentments against the Papists, to make new Profelytes to the Plot, and to stigmatize all Unbelievers; as appears from the Preface to the Trial itself; in which, besides several other remarkable Passages, we find that which follows: "The Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and the Assassination upon Mr. Arnold, will be always at Hand, if not to stop the Mouths, yet to curb the Influence of unbelieving Bigots."

Bellows's dying Declaration of the Truth of the Plot.

The other Incident which help'd to keep the Plot-Balance even, was the Death of Bellows, or rather the last Scene of his Life, which was remarkable enough to challenge a Place in Story. The Judges were on their Circuits; and Sir Francis North had that of the West for his Province, when the Captain, for so he was call'd, took it into his Head to ride Post down to Bristol; where he fell immediately into a violent Fever; in which

Condition he lay when the Lord Chief Justice made his first Entrance into that Town to hold the Assize: And no sooner had his Lordship taken Possession of his Lodgings, but he receiv'd a Message from him by one Sir John Knight, desiring, that his Lordship would give him a Visit; he having something of great Importance to impart to him before his Death. His Lordship comply'd, but with his usual Precaution took care to have the two Sheriffs, his own Brother, Mr. Roger North, and his Marshal, one Jones, as his Attendants, and that he might be sufficiently guarded against all Hazards in such dangerous Company. Being come into the sick Man's Chamber with his whole Company, which had also been reinforce'd on the Way by a Clergyman of the City, at the Instance of the Captain; he (the Captain) laid, in the Presence of all, That he look'd upon himself as a dying Man; that he was shortly to appear before the Lord of Hosts, and that, because many Persons had made it their Business to baffle and deride the Plot, he did, for the Satisfaction of the World, declare, upon the Faith of a dying Man, and as he hop'd for Salvation, That whatever he testify'd concerning the Plot, was true; that he had wrong'd no Man by his Testimony, but had rather testify'd under than over the Truth; that his Conscience was clear on that Account; that he should appear cheerfully before the Lord of Hosts; that he had many Witnesses to produce, who would make the Plot as clear as the Sun; and that he had many other things to discover, which were of great Importance both to the King and the Country.—— Here pausing, the Lord Chief Justice took occasion to interject, That the Plot was so evidently made out that no reasonable Man, no Protestant, he was sure, could doubt the Truth of it. Adding withal, That he ought not to have conceal'd any thing that concern'd the King so highly. The Captain reply'd, That much of what he had now discover'd was to corroborate his former Testimony; that he had conceal'd nothing that was absolutely necessary to the King's Preservation; and that he thought it not fit to accuse more Persons, till he had ended with those whom he had already accus'd.—— He then fell into a Fit of passionate Concern for his poor King, and his poor Country; both of which, it seems, he dearly lov'd, and were still in imminent Danger threatening to bear her for being a Witness against his Part in Giles; as also for taking away her Harve as he was going to the Mill, and the Reason was because she was to be a Witness in London against Giles. But the being a marry'd Woman, and none appearing that would be bound to prosecute him for it, he was not bound over to answer it, till another Complaint came in against him, which was immediately made by Mr. Ballard, and another Gentleman; who charg'd Mr. Herbert, That, in Windsor Week last, upon a Discourse for causing Knights of the Garter for Monmouth, and the Spying of one in the Company, that it was thought Mr. Arnold would stand for it, Mr. Herbert should make answer, I will circumvent the other Side of his Clock jest, on, He must have the other Side of his Clock circumvented jest. Upon which, the Court ordered he should not be discharged, but remain bound, upon the former Recognizance, to appear there next Session. And the Recorder gave him several sharp Reprehensions, for his malicious and unmanly Words and Proceedings. This being the second of the King's Witnesses, and a Woman that he had barbarously treated; fill passionately giving for the Reason, that they were Witnesses against his Part in Giles, as it was prov'd on Oath before the Court, by several Witnesses.

Then Sir Thomas Allen acquainted the Court, that a Gentleman had inform'd him the Day before, that Mr. Herbert told him that Mr. Arnold wounded himself, and cut his own Throat; which the Court look'd upon as an high Effect of a malicious Ingratitude, Mr. Arnold having becomg his Majesty, when Mr. Herbert was in Newgate, to engrave his Resentment, Mr. Arnold reply'd, "That Mr. Herbert had been more injurious to his Majesty, who had graciously pardon'd him several Offences, and lately for he had given wound of his Majesty's Person and Government than he had done of him, as it had been prov'd before his Majesty, and of which he believ'd his Majesty was well satisfy'd." The Court told Mr. Herbert he was a Shame to all Englishmen; and bound him by Recognizance to appear, and answer this Offence, at the King's Bench Bar, the 25th Day of the next Term."

Danger from the Jesuits, who had resolv'd to spare the King no longer than he continued to be kind to them: And by way of Proof, said, he was privy to all their Consultations at Salamanca and Valladolid, where they us'd to observe the favourable Conjunction they had to introduce their Religion into England, which consisted in their having a Head, who was to be set up, whatever came of it: For if they let slip that Opportunity, they never should have such another; and without a Head they could do nothing.

Thus far all was public: After which, the Room being clear'd of all but the Lord Chief Justice and his Officer, the Captain proceeded to make certain perplexed Depositions, upon Oath; involving the Duke in the Guilt of the Plot, but not of the Design on the King's Life; charging that wholly on the Jesuits; insisting, that they had undertaken for the Job; as also, that they had settled on some who were to bear the Odium of the Action, and on whom the Duke, when set upon the Throne, was to fly with the Sword of Revenge: And concluding, remarkably enough, with an Absolution of the Queen from all Concern in the King's Murder, as far as ever he could find out; and even in the Plot, except by contributing what Money she could for the Introduction of the Catholic Religion: Nay, said he, it was a great while, and it made her weep, before she could be brought to that.

Essex, p. 253.

Mr. North is of Opinion, that this Expedition of Bedlow's to Bristol was with no other View than to trapan the Lord Chief Justice: "Somewhat, surely, said he, was intended here, (p) more than ever appear'd: But the Regularity and Precaution of the Chief Justice dash'd it. He took care to have the Captain's Depositions upon Oath, made his Clerk take all down in Writing, read over distinctly the several Items to him again himself, ask'd him If that was all? and, upon the Captain's answering It was, call'd upon him to sign the Paper; which he made a shift to do on his Pillow: And thus, proceeds our Author, it was impossible to set up any Fiction touching this Examination."

But perhaps this is an Over-refinement: That great Magistrate was rather (q) too apprehensive of the wicked Practices of those Times; and stood aloof when there was no Danger: The last Request of the Captain's, which was, That his Lordship would have the Goodness to obtain some Money for him from the King, seems clearly to explain his first Intention: And, apparently, these mitigating Touches, with respect to the Queen and the Duke, were calculated to shew that he was willing to deserre it.

Certain, however, it is, that, on the fourth Day after this Death-bed Examination, the Captain departed to his Audit: And the solemn Confirmation he had given, before so many Persons, of the Truth of the Plot in the general, and his own Evidence in particular, soon taking air, the Party spread it on all Sides, insisted strongly on the Credit that was due to the Words of a dying Man (forgetting how uncharitably they had treated the persecuted Catholics) and plum'd it themselves more than ever on the Authority of so conscientious a Witness. The City of Bristol rung with his Applauds; and Numbers of the Inhabitants carry'd their Zeal and Veneration so far, as to solemnize his Funeral with much vain Pomp and Expende: They follow'd his Body to the Grave as Mourners, and they adorn'd his Hearse with Devices to his Honour, accompany'd with Mottos, signifying, That what he living attested, dying he confirm'd.

We have now before us a general Prospect of Affairs, both abroad and at home, at the time that the King was pleas'd to meet his People in Parliament; which was upon the 21st of October; and, upon which Occasion, his Majesty, in a Manner extremely plausible, if not truly gracious, endeavour'd once more to wipe out the Memory of past Offences, and made all the Advances that could be expected from him, to come to a thorough good Understanding with all his Subjects. He set out with giving a very artful Turn to the several Prorogations, which had postpon'd the Session, so much to the Displeasure of the Malcontents, saying, he had made a good Use of them, by the Measures he had taken with Spain and Holland, for mutual Defence and Succour: And that they could not fail to attain that End, and to spread and improve themselves further, if our Divisions at home did not render our Friendship less considerable abroad. "To prevent these as much as may be, continued his Majesty, I think fit to renew to you all the Assurances which can be desired, that nothing shall be wanting on my Part to give you the fullest Satisfaction your Hearts can wish, for the Security of the Protestant Religion; which I am fully resolv'd to maintain against all the Conspiracies of our Enemies; and to concur with you in any new Remedies which shall be

The King's Speech at the Meeting of the Parliament.

(p) On the other hand, Perpallia writes thus: "Mr. Bedlow's dying at Bristol, and taking it upon his Death, the Truth of what he had before depos'd, was a great Heart-breaking to the Conspirators; for they hop'd and did attempt to have call out a second Repentation of Mr. Bedlow to his former Evidence: But that was prevented by Mr. Richardson, who first for the Mayor of Bristol, [rather] and he for Judge North, and gave him his Testimony, before he dy'd, that all was true, and something farther, Part of which has been recital'd to this Day." [Growth of Popery, Part II. p. 277.]

(q) In his Lordship's Life (written by his Brother Mr. Regis North) p. 149, we have the following Story: "Once, after Dinner, a Servant told him, a Gentleman waited, in the next Room (which he us'd as a Closet) to speak with him; and his Lordship, as he pass'd by, saw a Couple of Fellows stand in the Passage, which made him think of Eyes-droppers: And being enter'd, the Gentleman came up to him, and, My Lord, said he, my Name is Clypeus. His Lordship instantly knew him to be (as he was) a Defendant of the once Lord Clypeus, one of Cromwell's Sons-in-law; and then turn'd round upon his Heel, pulling his two Eyes-droppers, who were come nearer the Door, went to his Company, and merrily told them what a Witton he had met: What his counterfeited Lordship's Business was, could neither be known, nor guess'd at. But, in such Cases, being alone with any Person, that Person is Master, and may swear his Pleasure."

be propos'd, that may consist with the preserving the Succession of the Crown in its due and legal Course of Descent: And, in order to this, I do recommend it to you to pursue the farther Examination of the Plot, with a strict and an impartial Enquiry. I do not think myself safe, nor you neither, till that Matter be gone thro' with; and, therefore, it will be necessary, that the Lords in the Tower be brought to their speedy Trial, that Justice may be done." His Majesty then made a Transition to the State of Tanger (then, and for a long time before, closely besieged by the Moor) and said, the Expence of it amounted to so vast a Sum, that, without their Support, it would be impossible for him to undergo it: Adding, however, that he valued a perfect Union among ourselves, above all the Treasure in the World: And that nothing but such a Union could restore the Kingdom to that Strength and Vigor, which it seem'd to have lost, and raise it to that Consideration, which England us'd to have. His Majesty then proceeded thus: "All Europe have their Eyes on this Assembly; and think their own Happiness or Misery, as well as ours, depends upon it. If we should be so unhappy, as to fall into such a Misunderstanding among ourselves, as should render our Friendship unsafe to trust to, it will not be to be wonder'd at, if our Neighbours should begin to take new Resolutions, and, perhaps, such as may be fatal to us. Let us, therefore, take care, that we do not gratify our Enemies, and discourage our Friends, by any unreasonable Disputes: If any such do happen, the World will see it was no Fault of mine; for I have done all that was possible for me to do, to keep you in Peace while I live, and to leave you so when I dye." His Majesty added by way of Compliment to both Houses, That from so great Prudence, and good Affection as theirs, he had nothing to fear: And then the Lord Chancellor directed the Commons, by his Majesty's Command, to return to their House, and proceed to the Choice of a Speaker. They did so, and William Williams, Esq. was unanimously chosen; who, in his Speech of Acknowledgment, most heroically devoted his Estate, Health, and Life to their Service; declaring, also, in Terms singular enough, That he was their own Minister, their own only, their own entirely; and that he expected no Boon, but by their Grace and Favour to depart as he came, when they should please to command him. But, resign'd and devoted as he was to the House, he shew'd a more than ordinary Stiffness when presented for his Majesty's Approbation; making use of no disqualifying Expressions, but standing before the Throne, with the Air of one, who expected, but who disdain'd to court, his Majesty's Ratification.

But Hast address the King for Pardon for all Plot-officers &c.

The first public Business of both Houses was to apply, by Address, to his Majesty for his gracious Pardon, to all such Persons as should, within four Months, come in and give Evidence of any Treason or Conspiracy against his Majesty's Person and Government. It is remarkable, that the Commons adjourn'd from Friday the 22d to Monday the 25th; and that, thro' the Lords in this Interval, not only forwarded their Address relating to these Pardons, and procur'd his Majesty's Answer thereto, but, by Message, communicated both to the Commons, on the said Monday, before the House had time to enter on any other Business, the Commons notwithstanding all this proceeded to draw up an Address of their own to the same Purpose, altho' with a different Preamble; for whereas, the Lords contented themselves with saying simply, That the horrid Plot and Conspiracy by the Papists against his Majesty's Person and Government, of which Discovery had been made, still continued, the Commons, from a Superabundance of Zeal, took Occasion to assert, "That the said Plot had been carry'd on by potent and restless Practices and Machinations, especially during the late Recesses of Parliament, whereby several Persons had been terrify'd and discourag'd from declaring their Knowledge thereof."

To which his Majesty was pleas'd to answer, "That he did intend to direct such a Proclamation: That he was resolv'd not only to prosecute the Plot, but Popery also, and to take care of the Protestant Religion establish'd by Law. Adding, "If we join, and the House goes on calmly in their Debates without Heats, I do not doubt but to beat down Popery and all that belongs to it."

While this Affair was yet depending, Mr. Dangerfield had the Honour to be examin'd before them, and having taken care to mention Sir Robert Peyton in his Narrative, a Committee was immediately appointed to sift his Conduct to the Bottom: And the same Day it was resolv'd, Nemo Contradictante, "to proceed effectually to suppress Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor."

They also resolv'd, Nem. Con. That it is, and ever hath been, the undoubted Right of the Subjects of England to petition the King for the calling and sitting of Parliament, and redressing of Grievances: That to traduce such Petitioning as a Violation of Duty, and to represent it to his Majesty as tumultuous and seditious, is to betray the Liberty of the Subject, and contribute to the DESIGN of subverting the ancient, legal Constitution of this Kingdom, and introducing Arbitrary Power. And a Committee was appointed to enquire after all such Persons as had offend'd against these Rights of the Subject. And thus having given the Out-Line of their Session, they bethought themselves of an Address to his Majesty; in which, after a Preface of hearty Thanks for his Majesty's several Royal Declarations in favour of the Protestant Religion, they close with his Majesty's great Judgment, "That without a strict and impartial Prosecution of all the Popish Plot, neither his Person nor his Government, nor his Protestant Subjects could be safe."

And as, say they, the Eyes of all the Protestant Kingdoms and States abroad are upon us, and looking upon your Majesty as the Royal

Royal Head of so many Protestant Countries, we cannot but hope, upon a happy and solid Security in our Religion at home, that your Majesty will be the greatest Protection to them, from whom we may expect a mutual Assistance, as being involv'd in the same Common Danger: So we do humbly assure your Majesty, That we shall be always ready to preserve your Majesty's Person and Government, and to support the Protestant Religion, both at home and abroad: And do humbly beseech your Majesty to esteem all Persons whatsoever who shall otherwise represent us to your Majesty, as those who design to divide between the King and his People, and to defeat the Meeting and Sitting of Parliaments, that those Popish Designs may succeed, which they well know cannot otherwise prosper. And this they have made more undeniably evident in the Interval of Parliaments, by contriving, with unparalleled Insolence, a most damnable and wicked Design, to transfer their own Crimes upon so many of your Majesty's Loyal Protestant Nobility and Gentry, hoping thereby to destroy those who with the greatest Zeal and Integrity endeavour to prosecute them.*

This Address was presented by the whole House; and his Majesty was pleas'd to answer to these Words: "Gentlemen, I thank you very heartily for your Zeal for the Protestant Religion: And I assure you there shall nothing be wanting, on my Part, either abroad or at home to preserve it."

The Terrors the House had scatter'd abroad, were now to be follow'd with Examples: Sir Francis Wittens, one of the Members for Wiltshire, stood foremost on the List of Abhorers; and therefore it was resolv'd to begin with him first. Mr. North speaks of him as one of a moderate Capacity in the Law; but a Voluptuary, and as those commonly are, very timid, and, in great Difficulties, abject. The same Writer says, that some cunning Persons who had found out his Faible, frighted him out of all the little Courage he had; insomuch, that, instead of struggling with the Resentments, he was induc'd to submit in the meanest manner, to the Pleasure of the House; taking Shame to himself, and acknowledging, That he did promote and carry up that Abhorrence: That he knew he was in the wrong: That he did it only because he thought it would please the King: That it was against Law;—and concluding, with an humble Request, That the House would grant him Forgiveness. Now, says Mr. North, there were a great many gallant Gentlemen in the House, of great Estates and Interests in their Countries, who were Friends to these Abhorers; and who would have done him, in particular, all the Service they could, if he had not lost himself by his Behaviour; that is, if he had stood manfully to what he had done, and declar'd, That he knew no Law he had broken; whereas, by sneaking, he so disgust-ed even these, that they join'd with the Country Party, and he was expell'd Nemine Contradictente.

But it does not appear from the Journals of the House, that these gallant Gentlemen, made any very remarkable Stand in Defence of those who behav'd more cavalierly. Sir Robert Cann, and Sir Robert Toomans, were accus'd by Sir John Knight (all three of Bristol) for saying, There was no Popish Plot, but a Presbyterian Plot; and tho' Sir Robert Cann, who happen'd to be present, not only defended himself with Warmth and Spirit, but even with Outrage against his Accuser; he was reprehended on his Knees at the Bar of the House by the Speaker; and both expell'd, and committed to the Tower: Nor could he recover his Liberty, at a less Price, than by the explicit Acknowledgment of his Fault, and an humble Petition for his Discharge: And as to Toomans, he thought it his wisest Course to yield to the Storm: And so he kiss'd the Rod upon his Knees at the Bar of the House, and was discharg'd.

One Mr. Thompson, also of Bristol, a Clergyman, having offended by making use of the same Expressions, in a Sermon which had more of a Party Spirit than a Spirit of Christianity in it, they sent for him up in Custody, and so kept him a long while, without bringing him to an Examination: Order'd his Petition to be heard to lye on the Table: And when the Committee, to whom his Case was refer'd, made their Report, resolv'd, Nemine Contradictente, "That he had publicly desam'd his Sacred Majesty, preach'd Sedition, willify'd the Reformation, promoted Popery, by asserting Popish Principles, decrying the Popish Plot, and turning the same upon the Protestants, and endeavour'd to subvert the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the Rights and Privileges of Parliament; and that he was a Scandal and Reproach to his Function." To justify these bitter Expressions, they order'd the Report of the Committee to be printed: And to strike a Terror into the rest of his Brethren, they also order'd Articles of (r) Impeachment to be prefer'd against him. But it does not appear, that ever they were perfected.

And now Mr. Arnold took Advantage of Mr. Herbert, this Disposition of the House to bring Mr. Herbert, his old Antagonist, before the Commons. And from the Proceedings of the House on this Occasion, we learn the Residue of their Story. Mr. Arnold, it seems (while in the Commission of the Peace) had been active in soliciting Hands to a Petition for the sitting of the Parliament: And Mr. Herbert, together with four other Justices, not only oppos'd him, but receiv'd Depositions against him upon Oath; which they sent up to the Council Board, in the nature of a Charge; and Mr. Herbert undertook to prosecute it. This, it seems, was the Hearing that Mr. Arnold

(*) It appears, that what was criminal in the Sight of the Commons was held meritorious at Court: For not long after, this very Thompson was rewarded with the Deanery of Bristol.

A. D. 1680. nold was to have attended the Day before he was assassinated. And for this Offence, Mr. Herbert was sent for in Custody; and after a due time of Humiliation, was brought on his Knees at the Bar of the House; and having been reprimanded by the Speaker by Order of the House, was discharged.

Dr. Tonge. Even Dr. Tonge himself, who had been so instrumental in saving the King and Nation, by bringing to Light Oates and his Evidence, and who by way of Acknowledgment, was, by this very House of Commons, recommended to his Majesty, for the first considerable ecclesiastical Preferment which fell; having, in a Pamphlet of his, dropt some Reflections on Sir Edward Deering, a Member, they voted the said Reflections to be false, scandalous, and libellous, and order'd the Doctor to attend the House the next Day, as if they were determin'd to exercise the Discipline of it without respect of Persons: But, so, when the next Day came, they order'd the Name of Sir Francis Wilmers to be raz'd out of the Westminster Return, and that of Sir William Waller to be inserted in its stead, and adjourn'd; whereby Appearances were sav'd, and the favourite Doctor escap'd.

Sir Robert Peyton,

On the other hand, again, they fell on Sir Robert Peyton without Mercy: He was an Apostate avow'd, and therefore had nothing to expect but Excommunication: Not only Dangerfield had accus'd him, but Mansel was call'd upon to alledge what he could against him. The Committee, also, to whom his Case was refer'd, deliver'd in a Report, which was by no means favourable to him: And, upon the Issue of all, tho' he was heard for Form's sake, in his Place, it was order'd, That he should be expell'd; and that he should receive the Censure of the House upon his Knees: And upon his absconding, the Sergeant at Arms had Orders to ferret him out, and bring him before the House in Custody; which being obey'd, and the Delinquent on his Knees, the Speaker perform'd his Office in such (s) Coarse Terms; and thereby to highly exasperated him, that the Session was no sooner over, than he challeng'd him; but, instead of answering it, Mr. Williams, with more Propriety than Gallantry, made his Complaint to the Privy Council; and Sir Robert was in Consequence thereof, again committed to the Tower.

Sir George Jeffreys,

Sir George Jeffreys the Recorder of London, who had been equally active in discouraging Petitions and forwarding Absences, stood next upon the Black-list after Wilmers, and, like him, was to be made an Example: In order, to which, they first took Examinations as to the Fact, and then proceeded with an Address to his Majesty, setting forth, "That the said Sir George Jeffreys had, on purpose to serve his own private Ends, and to create a Misunderstanding between his Majesty and his good Subjects, tho' under the Disguise of Service to his Majesty, maliciously declar'd such Petitioning sometimes to be tumultuous, seditious, and illegal; and, at other times, had presum'd publicly to insinuate and assert, as if his Majesty would deprive his Citizens of London of their Charters and other Immunities, and also of his Royal Favour, in case they should petition; and further, that, in the like Case, that there should not be any Session of Parliament; thereby traducing his Majesty, as if he would not pursue his own gracious Intentions, because they were grateful to his good Subjects; and for these Reasons, most humbly beseeching his Majesty to remove the said Sir George Jeffreys from his Chief-Justiceship of Chesler, and all other public Offices and Employments under his Majesty."

A. D. 1680.

The King's Answer was, That he would consider of it: But while the Matter stuck at Court, the Party try'd on Sir George the same intimidating Process, according to Mr. North, which had answer'd so well on Wilmers. They had a mind to have Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Treby, a Person deep in their Confidences, to be Recorder; and, in order to induce Jeffreys to resign in his favour, talk'd of nothing less than pursuing him with an Impeachment. Sir George, it seems, being terrify'd at that formidable Sound, came to the Compromise they aim'd at; and submitted to receive a Reprimand on his Knees, at the Bar of the House, into the Bargain: The great Difficulty that lay upon him, was, to come well off with the King; and so to manage his Matters, that his compounding with the Commons should not undo him at Court: He, therefore, apply'd to the King for Leave to surrender his Place, which his Majesty, it seems, was unwilling to grant, as holding his boistrous, domineering Department, to be an excellent Qualification for his Service, in over-awing the Infulence of the Citizens, and of little Use any where else: But the King's Backwardness could not get the better of his Importunity; and he never ceas'd plying his Suit, till he obtain'd it: Which gave his Majesty occasion to say, That Sir George was not Parliament-proof; and, for this Reason, he never had any real Value for him afterwards.

[Examen. p. 550.]

There

(s) Sir Robert took care to have the most offensive Part of his Speech printed, under the following Title:

A Specimen of the Rhetoric, Candour, Sincerity, and Integrity of William Williams, Speaker of the last House of Commons, or Westminster, in his Speech to Sir Robert Peyton, when he expell'd him from the House, &c.

You are absolutely the worst of Men, and have committed the greatest of Offences, for which you deserve to be obliterated from the Knowledge of all; being of a base and timorous Spirit: You have endeavour'd to catch the damnable Plot upon the most innocent of his Majesty's Subjects; even those Friends, who chose you to sit in this Honourable House. You have forsaken God and your Country; and Satan being your Director, you have imagined, contrived, and endeavour'd to bring Popery into this Kingdom, by the vile Ways the Devil and the Pope could still you wishal.

You have been out of measure ungrateful, and fled from the Principles of all honest Men. I cannot call you a fallen Angel; for you have been a Devil from the Beginning; and to bring your diabolical Purpos to pass, you have consulted the Devil Guilford, and hugg'd the Witch Colver; and have been a true Hypocrite, and play'd a Prank with Religion for Advantage. But why should I say Railings, when you never held any, but were ever a profane, polling Hero; having nothing now left you, but the Shape of a Man; whereby you are become useless to this House, and therefore they now spew you out." [Out of Sir Thomas Wobden's Collation.

A. D. 1688.

There was still another Name upon the List, at once more obnoxious, and more considerable, than all the rest; viz. That of the Lord Chief-Justice North. It was no Secret, it seems, in the House, that he had been the first Mover in the Proclamation against Petitioning: But the Information was not perfect nor regular enough to be proceeded upon: It was, therefore, necessary to supply that Defect; which was done by calling on Sir Creswell Lewins, the Attorney-General, not to answer for his having drawn up the said Proclamation (for, according to the common Forms of Business, it was to be plac'd to his Account, and to his only;) but to inform the House, who assisted him in it. The Attorney was shock'd with the Demand, and modestly said, "He hop'd the House would not compel him to discover Persons, to whom he was oblig'd for any Assistance in his Office." After which, he was order'd to withdraw; being soon after follow'd by Sir William Jones, who, says Mr. North, headed this Proceeding: His Business was, to dispose the Attorney to comply with the Pleasure of the House; who, upon his, Jones's, Return, was call'd in again, and told, That the House expected to be obey'd. He, nevertheless, stood his Ground, and withdrew a second time; being followed by Sir William, as before. This Dance, says our Author, was renew'd at least four times; and, at last, had the desir'd Effect; The Attorney had no mind to a Lodging in the Tower, which he apprehended would be the Effect of his Obstinacy; and so prevail'd on himself to give Utterance to the Thing desir'd, by naming his Friend, the Lord Chief-Justice North.

The House being now enabled to proceed, no farther Notice was taken of the Attorney; every Mouth was open'd against the Chief-Justice only; and all took upon them to shew, how highly necessary it was to make the Offence exemplary: The main Point in view, as we are told, being to give his Lordship a List out of his Place, that Sir William Jones might enter. For this, the Party were prepar'd; and Sir Francis was to have been address'd against, as Sir George had been before him: At least, this is what Mr. North affirms; tho' it seems somewhat strange, that so wise a Man as Sir William Jones, should chuse to build on a Foundation that had fall'd so often already. However this may be, as soon as the several Speakers on that Side had pretty well exhauisted themselves, those on the other took occasion to urge, "That the Censure of that House was a grievous Punishment, and ought not to be inflict'd upon any Person, without first hearing his Defence; for he might either deny the Fact, or shew somewhat fit for the House to be inform'd of, which might possibly clear him: That no Man could foresee what might be alleg'd in all Cases; that natural Justice requir'd Hearing before Condemnation; and that, by all Laws, such Sentence was void." Sir Francis Winnington, upon this, rose up, and, as if in an arch Way of joining Issue with the Adversary, proceeded to say, "That since those Gentlemen were so much for Hearing (tho' the Person nam'd was convict by Mr. Attorney's express Discovery at the Bar) by his Consent, he should be heard; and therefore he mov'd, That he might be impeach'd of high Crimes and Misdemeanors." Accordingly it was resolv'd, namine contradicente, That the Evidence that Day given to the House against Sir Francis North, was a sufficient Ground for an Impeachment, &c. And to account for the Unanimity of the House on this Occasion, Mr. North takes care to inform Posterity, that those who travers'd the first Motion clos'd with the second; not because they adopted the Sentiment contain'd in the Vote, but because they clearly perceiv'd that Winnington's Forwardness would entirely defeat the Designs of his Party, and quit the Chief-Justice of all farther Trouble.

Accordingly, a select Committee being appointed, to draw up Articles against him, (of which Sir William Jones was Chairman, tho' it was Winnington's Right) it soon became manifest, that they had no Ground for the Fabric they were directed to rear; and that, however the Proclamation was tortur'd, it could not be brought to accuse his Lordship. That therefore the Bulk might not operate too strongly, either within-doors or without, it was contriv'd, that the Committee should make no Report, but be kept on foot: And so the Matter dy'd gradually, and the Expectation it had rais'd, with it.

The Wrath of the House fell next on the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, Sir Allo Jones one of the pious Judges of the King's Bench, and Sir Richard Wilson one of the Barons of the Exchequer: Against the last, indeed, but two Articles were brought; the first, for decrying the Reformation; and the second, for magnifying the Prerogative; which, according to some, was no more than every honest, learned Lawyer finds himself oblig'd to do; but, according to others, was prostituting the Authority of the Judgment-seat, to the arbitrary Purposes of a Court. The Particulars were taken from a Charge, by him deliver'd at the Kingston Assizes; in which he very freely condemn'd the first Reformers, for having introduced their Novelty, against the Inclination of their respective Princes (forgetting the same might have been affirm'd, with equal Truth, of Christ himself;) saying, "Zuinglius set up his Fanaticism; and Calvin built on that blessed Foundation: And, to speak Truth, all his Disciples are season'd with such a Sharpness of Spirit, that it much concerns the Magistrates to keep a strict Hand over them. And now they are restless; amusing us with Fears; and nothing will serve them but a Parliament: For my Part, I know no Representative of the Nation, but the King; all Power centers in him. 'Tis true, he does entrust it with his Ministers; but he is the sole Representative: And, i' faith! he has Wisdom enough to trust it no more in these Men, who have given us such late Examples of their Wisdom and Faithfulness." Upon the Report of which, the House resolv'd, That the said Expressions Expressions were a Scandal to the Reformation, and tending to raise Discord between his Majesty and his Subjects; as also to the ancient Constitution of Parliaments, and the Government of this Kingdom.

The rejecting a Petition for the fitting of the Parliament, was the only Crime imputed, immediately and personally, to Sir Thomas Jones; but then he having given his Sanction to the several Treipsasses of the Bench where he had his Seat, it was thought advisable to bring him in for his Share of the Censure belonging to them.

But it was on Sir William Scroggs, that the whole Weight of their Fury fell: Impeachments were only voted against the two others; but against him eight several Articles were actually prepar'd, agreed to, and left with the Lords, to the Effect following: "That he had traitorously endeavour'd to subvert the Fundamental Laws, and the establish'd Religion and Government of this Kingdom of England; and, instead thereof, to introduce Popery and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government. 2. That contrary to his Oath, duly to administer Justice according to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, he had, maliciously, designedly, and illegally discharg'd a Grand Jury, by which many Presentments against Papists and other Offenders; and in particular, a Bill of Indictment against the Duke of York, were frustrated. 3. That in making a Rule of Court to forbid and prevent the farther Publication of a certain News-paper, call'd, A Weekly Packet from Rome, he had acted most apparently against Justice, had countenanc'd Popery, discourag'd Protestants, openly invaded the Right of the Subject, and encroach'd and assum'd a Legislative Power and Authority. 4. That he had shewn great Partiality in setting Fines, having amerced one Person 500*l.* for the same Offence for which he had amerced another but 100*l.* and in particular, one Jesse 100*l.* for publishing false News; and one Hewitt, the Author of it, but five Marks. That Papists and Persons Popishly affected, had enjoy'd all his Clemency, and his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, all his Rigour. That in imposing these Fines, he had neither regarded the Nature of Offences, nor the Ability of Offenders. By which arbitrary, unjust, and partial Proceedings, many had been ruin'd: Popery had been countenanc'd under Colour of Justice, and all the Mischief and Excesses of the Star-Chamber-Court, by Act of Parliament suppress'd, had, in direct Opposition to the said Law, been renew'd. 5. That, designing to subject the Persons as well as Properties of his Majesty's Liege People to his lawless Will and Pleasure, he had often refus'd sufficient Bail, legally tender'd; declaring at the same time, That he refus'd Bail, and had committed them to Goal, only to put them to Charges; using such furious Threats and scandalous Expressions, as were a Dishonour to Government, and the Dignity of his Office. All which Proceedings were a high Breach of the Liberty of the Subject, destructive to the Fundamental Laws of this Realm, contrary to the Petition of Right and other Statutes, and manifestly tending to the Introduction of Arbitrary Power. 6. That in farther Oppression of his Majesty's liege People, he had granted divers general Warrants for attaching Persons, and seizing Goods, not nam'd nor describ'd in the said Warrants; by Means whereof, many had been vex'd, their Houses enter'd into, and themselves grievously oppress'd, contrary to Law. 7. That he had at divers Times and Places, as well sitting in Court, as otherwise, openly defam'd and scandaliz'd several of the Witnesses of the horrid and damnable Plot; that he had endeavour'd to disperse their Evidence, and take off their Credit, with a Design to suppress and stifle the Discovery of the said Plot, and to encourage the Conspirators to proceed with the same, to the great and apparent Danger of his Majesty's sacred Life, &c. 8. That instead of giving a good Example to his Majesty's liege People, by a sober, grave, and virtuous Conversation, he did by his frequent and notorious Excesses, and Debaucheries, as well as his profane and atheistical Discourses affront Almighty God, &c.

The Commons, it seems, either through Examen, Passion or Discretion (for it is easy to conceive how those very different Causes might have produced the same Effect) never summon'd any of these reverend Men, as they are call'd by Mr. North, to a Hearing, nor to put in their Answers, before they proceeded to pass such terrible Censures upon them: And, according to the same Writer, the Cause was thought to be, "That they were stout Men, and would have justify'd all they had done; which was not thought seasonable." He describes Baron Weldon, in particular, "As only sorry that he had not an Opportunity of talking in the House of Commons; and as willing to compound for a moderate Punishment, to have had his full Scope of arguing his Case before them: And yet he never put himself in the Way of obtaining what he so impatiently long'd for, by requesting to be heard; which has been often done by Persons in the like Circumstances, and was scarce ever refused by the House. That Gentleman (Mr. North) is, indeed, as anxious to vindicate these reverend Men, as earnest to condemn the House of Commons: But tho' an Abuse of Liberty on the Side of the People may provoke an Abuse of Power on the Side of Government, it will hardly justify it; and the only fair and rational Way is, to condemn both Parties alike.

It cannot however, be deny'd, but that the Judges could not possibly commit greater Treipsasses on the Liberty of the Subject, in support of the Prerogative, than this House of Commons did in support of their Privileges: Scarce a Day pass'd, but some Abhorror was dragg'd before them, and committed to the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, at the Pleasure of the House, and this strange Despotism they exercis'd with so much Wantonness, as well as Cruelty, that Mr. Treby was pleas'd to say, They kept an Hawk, (meaning the said Serjeant) and they they must every Day provide Flesh for him: And the Quantity he was this Session gorged with, gave rise to this proverbial Expression, Take him (t) Topham! in all Discourse of peremptory Commitments. But in this, as it appear'd by the Event, they acted as impolitically as unjustly: It had not been usual to force Gentlemen from their Habitations in the Country, to answer for their Conduct on Juries, at the Bar of their own Representatives; and it began at last to grow into a common Question, Shall They take away the Liberties of the People, who are entrusted to defend them against all arbitrary Powers whatever? Thus, at the same time that they grew terrible, they grew odious: And no sooner did they lose the Affections of the Public, than the Prerogative grew too strong for them; and a general Disposition appear'd to submit rather to the Will and Pleasure of ONE, than the Tyranny of MANY.

One Stowel
refus'd to obey the Serjeant at Arms.

Two Circumstances help'd on this Change, which deserve to be particularis'd: One Mr. Stowel, who had serv'd as Foreman of the Exeter Grand-Jury, at the time that they complimented the Crown with an Abhorrence, was order'd into the Custody of the Serjeant; who sent down his Deputy to seize and bring up his Prey: But Stowel refus'd to submit; bid the Officer take his Course; and alleg'd, that he knew of no Law for the taking away his Liberty, on account of what he had done as a Jury-man. This convinced the Party of their Error; and, to conceal the Blow that was hereby given to their Authority, they order'd it to be insert'd in the Votes, which were now regularly printed, That the Party was indispos'd; and that he was allow'd a Month for his Recovery. The second Circumstance was this: A Paper was set forth, under the Title of A List of Abhorers; containing the Names of those Persons who had been taken into Custody, and confin'd, by Order of the House. After which follow'd these Three Paragraphs:

Their Proceedings shew'd to be against Law.

1. Magna Charta, cap. 29. No Freeman shall be taken, or imprison'd, or be disseiz'd of his Freehold, or Liberties, or free Customs, or be outlaw'd, exil'd, or any otherwise destroy'd: Nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land, &c.

2. 5 Edwardi III. cap. 9. Item. It is enacted, That no Man, from henceforth, shall be attach'd by any Accusation, nor forejudg'd of Life or Limb; nor his Lands, Tenements, Goods, or Chattels, seiz'd into the King's Hands, against the Form of the Great Charter, and the Law of the Land: That is, according to the Statute of 25 Edwardi III. cap. 24. by Indictment, or Presentment of good and lawful People of the same Neighbourhood where such Deeds be done, in due Manner; or by Process made by Writ original, at the Common-law.

3. 28 Edwardi III. cap. 2. Item. That no Man, of what Estate or Condition that he be, shall be put out of Land or Tenement; nor taken nor imprison'd, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought in Answer, by due Process of the Law.

Thus the Peoples Eyes were open'd, and the Patriots of the House of Commons found it highly necessary to put in practice their own Lesson to the Court; namely, That it was better to found their Dominion on Love than Fear.

There were yet other Persons who fell, about this time, under the Displeasure of the House, tho' not on the Account of Abhorring: Among whom was Mr. Seymour (afterwards Sir Edward). Sir Gilbert Gerrard was his Accuser; who exhibited four Articles against him, under the Denomination of high Crimes, Misdemeanours, and Offences, by him committed as Treasurer of the Navy; to the following Effect: 1. That out of a Sum of 584,978 l. granted by Parliament for the speedy building of thirty Men of War, and appropriated to that Use only; he, the said Mr. Seymour, had, contrary to the said Act, and the Duty of his Office, lent 90,000 l. at eight per Cent. Part of the said 584,978 l. then in his Hands, towards the Support and Continuance of the Army, after such time as, by an Act of Parliament, the said Army ought to have been disbanded; whereby the Nation was afterwards put to the additional Charge of 200,000 l. for the disbanning the said Army. 2. That, whereas his Majesty had been enabled by Parliament to raise Money by a Poll-tax, for an actual War with the French King, and certain East-land Merchants had furnish'd Stores on the Credit of that Bill, having been assur'd that the Sum of 40,000 l. was then in the said Mr. Seymour's Hands, and which he also acknowledg'd so to be, for their Payment and Satisfaction, he the said Mr. Seymour did issue out and pay the said Sum to the Victuallers of the Navy, by way of Advance for Provisions not then brought in, contrary to the Meaning of the said Act, and to the Prejudice of the Rights and Claims of the said Merchants, who in the last Parliament had put in their Complaints thereof. 3. That tho' the said Mr. Seymour had a clear yearly Salary of 3000 l. a Year, as Treasurer of the Navy, he had also accepted 3000 l. a Year more, while Speaker of the House of Commons, out of the Monies appointed for Secret-service; and which he received as well during the Intervals as the Sessions of Parliament; and, in particular, during the long Prorogation of fifteen Months. 4. That, in the Eighteenth of the King, and during a War with the States-General, he, the said Mr. Seymour, being one of the Commissioners of Prizes, did, fraudulently and illegally, and in deceit of his Majesty, unlade a Prize-Ship, and dispose of the Cargo, pretending the same to be Mucovado Sugars, and did account with his Majesty for the same as such;

Whether Sir Gilbert Gerrard had any particular Quarrel to Mr. Seymour, or Affection to his Place, is no where specify'd: And why, just at this Crisis, Matters which had lain so long dormant were brought forward, and made the Basis for an Impeachment, will probably be best understood, when Mr. Seymour's Conduct with respect to the Exclusion Bill comes to be explain'd. But whether private spleen or Party Views, or both, were the Cause of his Prosecution, the House was unanimous against him upon every Article: And an Order was made that he should be taken into the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and so continue, till he had given sufficient Security for his forth-coming to answer to the said Impeachment.

The Case of
Mr. Norris.

Even Mr. Secretary Jenkins, for the Sins of his Office, became also obnoxious to the Heat of the Times. One Norris, a Taylor, had been dispatch'd to France to bring over one Dowdall, a Priest, who was suppos'd to be in the whole Secret of the Plot; and a Description of his Person, and an Account of his Errand (Part written by one Dr. Day, and Part by one Mr. Sheridan) having been given, about three Weeks or a Month after Norris's Departure, to the Secretary; a Letter was written by his Order to the Mayor of Dover, enjoining him to take some handsome Course to detain the said Norris in his Return, as also the Person or Persons he should bring over with him, till he should receive farther Persecution concerning him. Accordingly, Norris, after having met with some Difficulties abroad, and also on his coming on board the Packet Boat, no sooner landed at Dover, than he was seiz'd, and thrown into the common Prison; but finding means to get free, presents himself before the Bar of the House of Commons with his Complaint, is refer'd to a Committee, who incorporate all these several Circumstances in their Report to the House; with these Additions, That an Order of Council, dated July 18, 1679, was obtain'd for Dowdall to come to Dover for a Month: That before the said Order could take Effect Dowdall dy'd, and not without a Suspicion of a violent Death; but that it did not appear to them that this was known in England, till after Norris's Return; who was not sent on this Errand till about ten Months after the Date of the said Order. The Result was, that Sheridan, who had carry'd the Description to the Secretary, was order'd into Custody; where he was kept (according to his own Account, in his Speech at the Bar of the House, which was afterwards publish'd) after such a manner, as neither Felon, nor Traitor, not only accus'd, but convicted, could suffer a closer Confinement: And as to the Secretary's Concern in it, they contented themselves with voting, That the late Imprisonment of Peter Norris at Dover, was illegal; and that the Proceedings of Sir Leslie Jenkins, by describing the Person of the said Norris, and directing such his Imprisonment, were illegal and arbitrary; and an Obstruction to the Evidence for the Discovery of the Popish Plot.

But if the Conduct of the House was all Storms on one Side, it was all Sunshine on the other. On the Receipt of a Petition from the Taunton Hero, Mr. Thomas Dare, and another from Mr. Benjamin Harris, each of whom was in Durance for a Fine of 500*l.* the first for Seditious Words, and the second for publishing that scandalous Pamphlet, call'd An Appeal from the Country to the City, they had the Goodness to interpose with his Majesty, by Address, for the Release of their Fines, and the Discharge of their Persons: And his Majesty not being over hasty to comply with their Requests, they renew'd their Instances in favour of Harris; that no Encouragement might be wanting for those who ventur'd farthest for the Cause. They also gave it as their Opinion, that one Brown ought to be restor'd to all the Offices and Places which had been taken from him, in consequence of a Judgment given against him in the King's-Bench, for publishing an unlicensed Book, call'd, The long Parliament dissolved. Dangerfield, with all the accumulated Infamy, he was loaded with, appears to have been in a very particular manner their Favourite: They not only address'd for his Pardon, and that some Provision might be made for him, but when he complain'd to the House, that his Pardon when granted was defective, they made a second Application in his Favour, requiring, not only that a full and general Pardon might be granted him, but that even particular Crimes might be specify'd: Nay, when the said Pardon was again amended, agreeable to his Majesty's Assurance that it should extend to all Miscellaneous offences, it was thought expedient to appoint a Committee, to examine whether it was such as the House requir'd; not for the sake of the Man, it may be presum'd, but for the sake of his Testimony.

Indeed the whole Gang of Witnesses, of all Ranks, Kinds, and Conditions, they countenanced, encouraged, and protect'd; and, if they did not reward them, they made no scruple to solicit his Majesty to provide for them out of his Revenue: They also, in some sort, quarter'd them on the Public, by authorizing them to print their several Narratives: Thus Dangerfield, Turberville, Jenkinson, Dugdale, de Paria, &c. &c. successively found their Way to the Press, with a parliamentary Recommendation: And, if so many additional Evidences did not afford any additional Conviction to the Wife and Knowing, they at least serv'd to amuse and puzzle the Vulgar; to keep up the Cry of a Plot; and to countenance those violent Proceedings, that were set on foot, and carry'd on, under the plausible Pretence of providing for the Safety of the King and the Protestant Religion.

But the great Push of the Session was, for the Exclusion-Bill: And every material Effort

A. D. 1686.

(s) It is fit Posterity should know, that this Affair of the Exclusion gave rise to a Controversy, that employ'd the most learned and military Pens of the Age. Mr. Somers (afterwards Lord Somers) led the Way, in a Treat, call'd, A Brief History of the Succession; written for the Satisfaction of the Earl of H. and which was answer'd by Dr. Beane, Sir William Dugdale, and others. In his Collection are to be found all the Papers on both Sides; and, among the rest, his own Performances, with a great Variety of Alterations and Improvements, in his own Hand-writing; out of which I have subjoin'd the following Passages, together with his Lordship's Manuscript Notes thereon, not only as a Matter of Curiosity, but of Information: As also Part of Sir William Dugdale's Reply.

"In the First Year of Queen Elizabeth, the Parliament recogniz'd her Title to the Crown, with express Relation to the Statute 35 Hen. VIII. which inserteth in (s*) her, and the Heirs of her Body; and do enact, That the Limitation made by that Statute shall stand and remain as Law for ever; and all Sentences, Judgments and Decrees to the contrary, are declared to be void, and appointed to be cancelled: And the several Officers which are made Treason by another Statute, in the same Year, are all retained to the Queen, and the Heirs of her Body only; the Parliament intending to extend that Security no further than her Estate in the Crown (which the took by that parliamentary Limitation) did extend.

"In her Thirteenth Year it was enacted, That if any Person claim Title to the Crown, for himself, or any other, during her Life, or shall not upon Demand acknowledge her Right, he shall be liable during his Life to have the Crown to Succession, as if he were naturally dead. And to affirm the Right of Succession in such Claimer or Usurper (after Proclamation made of such Claim or Usurpation) is made Treason, Nor does the Statute stop there, but makes it Treason, during the Life of the Queen, and Forfeiture of all Goods and Chattels after her Decese, to affirm that the Queen, with and by the Authority of Parliament, is not able to make Laws and Statutes of sufficient Force and Validity to limit and bind the Crown of this Realm, and the Descendants, Inheritance and Government thereof; or that this or any other Statute made by Parliament, with the Queen's Assent, is not or ought not to be ever of sufficient Force to bind and govern all Persons, their Rights and Titles, that may claim any Interest or Possibility in or to the Crown, in Possession, Remainder, Inheritance, Succession, or otherwise. If were well if some Injust Men, who presume in their Discretion to infringe the Power of the Parliament (that the King, Lords, and Commons) in the great Business of the Succession, would be in-wise to remember this Act (which is still in force,) and the Penalty to which they subject themselves by such faulty Talk. That incomparable Statesman the Lord Berkeley had another kind of Opinion of the Security which an Act of Parliament could give his Royal Mistress, by making the English Queen (the English Successor of that time) unable and unworthy of the Succession; as appears in a Letter which he wrote about this time to Sir Francis Basset, then Ambassador in France.

"In the Twelfth-seventh Year of Queen Elizabeth, it was enacted, That if any Invasion was made, or Rebellion, or other thing tending to the Hurt of her Person, by, or for, or with, the Privy of any one who should in right pretend Title to the Crown, and the same should be accomplish'd in such manner as that Law appoints; then every Person against whom such Judgment should be given, should be excluded and disabled for ever to have or claim the Crown; And that the Subjects of this Realm lawfully might by all forcible and possible Means, pursue all such Offenders to Death; And then Heirs following or privy thereto are in like manner disabled, and to be pursued. And that Act was made in pursuance of an Affidavit enter'd into by the People, in the Vacancy of Parliament, out of their great Zeal for the Preservation of the Life of that excellent Princess.

"By virtue of this Statute, Mary (1) Queen of Scotland was afterwards executed, as appears by the Commission for her Trial.

King James her Son, who was a wiser Prince, and not wholly govern'd by Priests; as his Mother was, though he had the same Presences that she had; yet never dispos'd his Right, or set on foot any Title during the Life of the ever-renewed Queen; though he would never suffer him to be declared her Successor. He was too wise to incur the like Disability as his Mother had done, and to contest a Title establish'd by Parliament.

"After Queen Elizabeth's Death, the Act of Recognition, made upon King James's coming to the Crown, doth particularly intill upon that Title (1) which was rais'd by Act of Parliament to Henry the Seventh, and the Heirs of his Body; and that, immediately upon the Queen's Decese, the Crown descended and came to King James: So that you see the Title of Queen Elizabeth is again (1) acknowledg'd by Parliament; and the Royal maid by the Statute of 35 Hen. VIII. being spent, upon her Death without Issue, King James comes in as next Heir to the old Realm made the First Year of Henry the Seventh." [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, Vol. xx.

"On the other hand, faith Sir William Dugdale, "If we consider how much, if not altogether, her Title to the Crown depended upon Statute-Law, and how questionable her birth-right was generally reputed to be; no Man can much wonder if his own Advantages and Safety, the attributed more to an Act of Parliament than otherwise he would have done. She was recollect'd to take this Course to establish herself against the Pretenses of the Queen of Scots, when her Birth-right could not do it, it being very doubtful whether she were legitimate, considering the Proceedings in the Divorce of Queen Catharine, Marriage of her Mother, and her Mother's Confession to Archbishop Cammer, when this Statute was made for the declaring the Marriage null and void, between Henry VIII. and Jane Bolton, by which Statute she was also solemnly bastardiz'd.

"And although Queen Elizabeth, at the Entrance upon her Government, was acknowledg'd to be rightly, legally, and lawfully descended from the Blood Royal of this Realm, which, if true, had been a sufficient Title; she being then the only remaining Issue of Henry VIII. yet her Right was reckon'd as depending upon the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, and by express Mention of, and Reference to, the thirty-sixth of Henry VIII. by which Statute the Crown was sett'd upon her, and the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten (1) in several Places whereof, the 1st by the King her Father, implicitly repudiated and declar'd illegitimate, and the Settlement in this Act is made so here, as not being lawfully begotten, or having right to inherit.

"In the first of her Reign, before cited, when the Crown was declar'd to be vested in her, that Declaration and Recognition, as also the Limitation and Declaration of the Succession of the Imperial Crown of this Realm, mention'd and contain'd in the Act of 26 Henry VIII. were to stand, remain, and be the Law of this Land for ever. Which, notwithstanding, when Mary Queen of Scots had claim'd the Crown by Right of Inheritance, and had spread abroad that Title unto us, and also the Title of the House of York, and other Titles were whisper'd up and down; the Act of 26 Henry VIII. (or this Act of Recognition, were not thought sufficient to secure the Queen Elizabeth. Then was this Act in the thirteenth of her Reign made merely either to create or strengthen her Title, and not to exclude the Queen of Scots from the Succession, unless she attempted any thing against her, or had Claim to the Crown; which was also in its own nature a securing Clause to Queen Elizabeth. But the great Clause of Security to Q. Elizabeth in this Act, was that Clause by which it was made Treason for any Man to affirm, that she by Authority of Parliament could not make Laws and Statutes to bind the Succession of the Crown, or that this Act or other Laws to be made by the Parliament of England by her Royal Assent for limiting the Crown, and recognizing the Right to be lawfully and justly in her Person, is not, are not, or shall not, or ought not to be for ever, of good and sufficient Force. This Clause was levelled against the Opinion, That the Queen of Scots had the best Title; which began to spread, and gain much Credit, as well amongst the Nobility as Commons. By all which it is manifest, this whole Act was but temporary; and therefore we may note with

(*) The Privy-Council, amongst other things which they proposed to Q. Mary of Scotland, in the Condition upon which she might have her Liberty, reckon'd this as one, That she should claim no Right in herself to the Kingdom of England, until the Heirs of that Kingdom should be lawfully elected to the Throne of England. Hist. of Mary of Scots, p. 200, 201.

cession was radically in the Duke, and could not be transfer'd by any Rule or Ordinance of any Power or Authority whatever, they taught, after the Court Maxim of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth, that the Succession was wholly in the Power of King and Parliament; that they, being the Legislature, might model it as they pleas'd; and that the English Story was full of Instances that they had done so. They also taught, that a Roman Catholic, who acknowledg'd, that the Roman Pontiff was Christ's Vicegerent on Earth, must of necessity be the Betrayer, instead of the Defender of the Protestant Faith; and could accept of the Supremacy of the Church with no other View than to hold it in Trust for his Holiness: That, to admit a Popish Successor was to admit the Papal Tyranny with him; and that the very Act of Parliament which made it so highly criminal to say the present King was a Popish, sufficiently shew'd how pernicious it would be to the Nation to have a Sovereign that was avowedly such.

Heated with these Doctrines which were far from being without a Foundation in the Reason and Nature of Things, and work'd up almost to a political Phrensy, by all the Artifices that could either affect the Reason, or enslave the Passions of Man, the People by their Clamours without Doors, countenanced the Violence of those within; who, from the very Beginning, had shewn no Disposition to regard the Cautions given by his Majesty, in his Speech from the Throne; but, on the contrary, appear'd determin'd to admit of no Medium; and either to steer the Bark according to their own Humour, or leave it at the Mercy of the Winds and Waves.

Sir William Temple observes, that those who presented the Duke in Westminster Hall, fell immediately into the Cabals of the Lords and Commons who fram'd the Bill; wherein, says he, they were desperately engag'd, not only, as they profess'd, upon Opinion of national Ends; but, likewise, upon that of Self-preservation; having broken irreparably with the Duke. The Generality of the House of Commons were carry'd away partly with the Plausibleness of the thing, calculated, in Appearance only against Popery, without any private Ends, as was pretended; and partly with the Opinion of the King's Resolution to fall into it, upon the Observation of such Lords of the Court, having engag'd so far in sending away his Royal Highness. All the Duke of Monmouth's Friends, drove it on violently; not doubting he would lye in the Duke's Place, tho' no Provision seem'd to be made for it in the Forms of the Draught. And if the Author of Two Treatises call'd Cof. sandra, is to be rely'd on, the Dutch Minister here had Instructions to enter into the Cabals of the (v) Exclusionists, and with all his Power to promote the passing of the Bill. All these Circumstances concurring, made so violent a Torrent for its Passage thro' the House of Commons, as nothing could resist, or any ways divert: And as it happens on all Occasions, the feeble Opposition it met with, only serv'd to make the Violence the greater.

Sir William Temple farther observes, that, besides these general Circumstances, there were two more particular, and personal, that seem'd to him to have great Influence upon the House. One was Lord Russell, setting himself, almost with Affectation, at the Head of this Affair, who was generally reputed an honest, worthy Gentleman, without Tricks or private Ambition, and who was known to venture as great a Stake, perhaps, as any Subject of England. The other arose from the Conduct and Character of Sir William Jones, the late Attorney General; who, at his first Entrance into the House, espous'd the Bill with a Warmth and Vehemence which were not natural to him. And this Person having the Fame of being the greatest Lawyer in England, and a very wise Man; being also known to be very rich, and of a wary, or rather timorous, Nature, made People generally conclude, That the thing was safe and certain; and would, at last, be agreed on all Hands, whatever Countenance was made at Court.

This being the general State of Things with respect to the Leaders and the Led, and with respect to the general Bent and Humour of the Times; the Commons, on the seventh Day of their Sitting, as a House, after the Appointment of their Speaker, resum'd the Consideration of this grand Affair; the Way being clear'd, by a general Recapitulation, made by Mr. Treby, of all the Matters, by him reported in the last Parliament, relating to the horrid Popish-Plot: As also, by a Repetition of those famous Resolutions (nemine contradicente) That the Duke of York's being a Popish, &c. had given the greatest Encouragement to the present Conspiracies with Falsen, that it expi'd with Queen Elizabeth; and it was no Act of Exclusion, but a Law only to secure her Person, and to make and confirm unto her a Title, which without Statute-Law, was in itself at least doubtful. And the new Clause which was added, That it should be High Treason, during her Life, for any Person to affirm, the by Authority of Parliament had not Power to bind the Crown and Succession thereof; or, that the Right of the Crown and Succession was not justly and lawfully in her Royal Person; cannot affect the Title of a lawful Successor by Inheritance, nor be brought or made use of as a Precedent to exclude him from the Succession.

But it may be said, There is a great Forfeiture inflicted upon every Person holding and affirming, after her Decese, That Queen Elizabeth and a Parliament could not limit the Succession, and fix the Crown upon her own Head.

This Clause could take no Effect after her Death, and therefore was added to preserve her Memory from being defam'd after her Death, or slandorously charg'd with the heinous Crime of usurping the Crown, which must have been the inevitable Consequence of affirming the said her Parliament could not limit the Succession.

For she valued much her Credit and Reputation, and would seem to maintain still, that she acted nothing against the Queen of Scots; and therefore the Law is made in general Words, against every Person or Persons whatsoever, of what Degree, Place, Nation, or Condition whatsoever, that should affirm she was not a Right true and lawful Queen, or that should claim the Crown, &c. [True and genuine History of the Succession, p. 40, 41, 42.

(v) This is, in part, confirm'd by Burnet; who says, vol. i. p. 42, That the Prince of Orange declar'd his Desire, that the King would fully satisfy his Parliament.

spiracies against the King and the Protestant Religion; and that, if the King should come to a violent Death, they would revenge it to the utmost on the Papists.

Arguments
pro and con.

Colonel Titus then mov'd, that a Committee be appointed to draw up a Bill, to disinherit James Duke of York from inheriting the Imperial Crown of these Realms, and was seconded by Lord Ruffel. Mr. William Flarboard ascrib'd every Instance of Mis-administration he could recollect, to the Duke's Influence, and therefore he was for going to the Root, by agreeing to the Motion. Mr. William Gee recommended the Expedient propos'd by his Majesty in his Speech; advis'd Moderation; hinted, that it was unfair to condemn and punish the Duke unheard; and mov'd for the appointing a Day to consider of some other Method for the Security of Religion, in a Committee of the whole House. This was oppos'd by Sir Henry Capel, who declar'd, That every other Expedient besides the Bill would leave them in the unhappy Condition of contesting with the Influence of a Popish Successor during the King's Life, and the Power of a Popish King hereafter. He was supported by Colonel Titus, who compar'd the Cautions given to them in his Majesty's Speech, to a Physician's prohibiting his Patient to be bled, tho' his Disease was a Pleurisy; and to be cured no other way. Another Member, not only ascrib'd the Death of Lord Sandwich, the discharging the Persons taken up for being concern'd in the Fire of London, the Death of Gadrey, &c. but took occasion to ascribe all the present Terrors and Dangers of the Nation to the Portugal Match; for which he said the late Lord Clarendon was answerable. Mr. Hild here rose up both in Defence of his Father, and the Duke; in Behalf of the first, saying, among other things, That there had been worse Ministers since: And for the last, That he was of Opinion, the bringing on this Bill would be a great Hindrance to the Business, without answering the Ends, of the House: Contest'd, that the Duke deserv'd great Mortifications, because he had given to great a Suspicion of his being a Papist: Hinted, that he would submit to Limitations; but made a Question, whether the Law contend'd for would be binding; And again stippel'd for a Day to consider of Expedients. Sir Leslie Jenkins said many things to the same Purpose. It was answer'd by Colonel Birch, That, as to the Legality of the Bill, it was quite out of the Question; for all Power was lodg'd in King, Lords, and Commons: And, as to Expedients, he thought they might as well think of catching a Lion in a Mouse-trap, as to keep out Popery by any other Means than the Exclusion-Bill. Sir Thomas Player said, He had lately heard the Duke to cry'd up, and the King to slighted, that he was afraid the Scene which had lately been acted in Portugal was on the point of being copy'd here. Mr. (or) Seymour was earnest for having the Affair canvass'd in a general Committee: Said, however, that he was much against the bringing in any such Bill at all: Lamented, that the House should fasten on the only thing his Majesty should forbid: Affected to be clearly of Opinion, that the Protestant Religion was so secur'd by Law, that it had nothing to fear from a Popish Head: Asserted, the Bill in question would not be held binding by all in England, nor by any in Scotland; and, possibly, would be disputed in Ireland: As also, that it was not to be conceiv'd, that the Duke would submit to it; so that, without a Standing-Army, it could not operate; from which more Danger was to be apprehended, than from a popish Successor, or a popish King. Sir Richard Grabur trod in the same Track with Mr. Seymour; and concluded for a Debate upon Expedients. Sir William Pultney, on the contrary, compar'd Expedients in Politics to Mountebank-tricks in Physic; and was positive, that a Popish King and the Protestant Religion were irreconcilable. Mr. Daniel Finch could not open his Mouth in the Debate without Fear and Trembling; and yet found Assurance enough to say, "This Nation has been so unfortunate as to cut off one King already; let us have a care how we cut off the Right of another." Mr. Boscawen took much Pains to enlarge on the Cruelties of the Papists, in this and other Kingdoms; as also to shew from the Records, that the Succession had been frequently alter'd by Acts of Parliament: Upon the Whole, the Sense of the Majority appear'd to be for the Bill: A Committee was, of course, appointed to prepare it; and, the next Day but one, it was read the first time, according to Form: Upon which Occasion, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, having first undertaken to prove, that the Scope of it was contrary to natural Justice, the Principles of our Religion, and the Oath of Allegiance; as also, that the Kings of England had their Right from God only, mov'd, that it might be thrown out. Mr. Montagu, on the other Side, made a Counter-motion, for reading it a second time; and was seconded by Mr. Hampden: The First insisting, that it was as much for the Credit of the House to provide for the Preservation of the King, now, as it had been, before, to provide for his Restoration: And the Last, that the Protestants of England did no more than take the same Precautions that the Papists of France and Spain would do in the same Case. Mr. Montagu's Motion receiving the Sanction of the House, it was order'd, that the Bill should be read a second time on the 6th: Which was done accordingly.

And now the Courtiers chang'd their Method of proceeding; and, instead of a direct Opposition to the Bill, confin'd their Objections to the Manner in which it was drawn up. Sir Richard Temple, in particular, undertook dertook to shew, that the Tenor of it did not answer the Intention of the House; and that, by disabling the Duke, without nominating a Successor in his room, the Nation fell into the Danger of an Inter-regnum: Mr. Secretary Jenkins adopted this Refinement, and further insisted, that the Arguments of those who were for the Bill, if they proved any thing, proved too much: "If, said he, we may thus disinheret the presumptive Heir, not only the Royal Family, but the whole Nation, would be subject, by such a Precedent, to many Inconveniences: For, by the same Reasons, the like might be done, hereafter, upon any other Pretence. Whence it follows, that Pretences may always be found to disturb the Succession; and thence to keep the Body-politic in a sudy continual Ferment, as may bring on a speedy Dissolution." Mr. Booth (afterwards Earl of Warrington) on the contrary, would not allow these Objections to be of Weight sufficient to retard the Progress of the Bill: And Sir Roger Hill quoted the Authority of Queen Elizabeth, who said, That the naming her Successor would be doing a Grace for her; and very artfully added, That, in his poor Opinion, some Persons shew'd so much Zeal for the Duke's Interest, that he was afraid they had forgot their Allegiance to the King.

The Bill committed.

The Result of this Day's Debate was, the committing of the Bill: And, on the 8th, after a thorough Winnowing, it underwent several Alterations and Amendments; which, on the Report, were agreed to by the House; and, on the same Day, it was Resolved, That the Bill &c. be engross'd.

So great a Progress, in so short a Time, threw the Court into mortal Agonies: It now plainly appear'd, that their Attornies in the House had neither Credit enough to carry their Cause, nor even Address to bring the Adversary to a Compromise: As a last Resource, therefore, on that Side, it was resolv'd, that the King should again take upon him to be his Brother's Advocate; and make one Effort more to do his Business, without laying himself under the cruel Necessity of sacrificing his own. Accordingly, on the 9th, Mr. Secretary Jenkins deliver'd the following Message to the House, viz.

CHARLES R.

A Message from the King.

His Majesty desires the House, as well for the Satisfaction of his People, as of himself, to expedite such Matters as are depending before them, relating to Popery and the Plot: And would have them rest assur'd, that all Remedies they can tender to his Majesty, conducive to those Ends, shall be very acceptable to him; provided they be such as may consist with preserving the Crown in its ancient and legal Course of Descent.

Debate continues.

Nothing can be plainer than the Drift of this Message; and yet Mr. Booth could find no better Way to comply with the Letter of it, than by moving, that a Message should be sent to the Lords, desiring them to appoint a Day for the Trial of the Lord Viscount Stafford. This willful Perverision, which favours very strongly of a Practice at this time of Day very well understood, by the Name of Parliament-Craft, was no sooner broach'd in the House, than it was greedily epous'd by the whole Party. Mr. Hampden took the Hint first, and did not fail to point out the glaring Absurdity which appear'd in the Conduct of the Court, from this two-fold Consideration: That they had for a long time together put a stop to the Prosecution of the Plot, by dissolving one Parliament, and so many successive Prorogations of another: And that now they were all of a sudden as hasty for dispatching it as fast as possible. Mr. Harbord was willing to understand the first Part of his Majesty's Message, as the Effect of his Goodness; but the latter Part, concerning the Succession, he thought put the House under the like Difficulty with that impos'd by Pharaoh on the Israelites, viz. The making Brick without Straw. He was, however, for giving their Enemies no Advantage to misrepresent their Proceedings; and, therefore, mov'd for the drawing up an Address, in Answer to his Majesty's Message. Colonel Titus enlarg'd on the ill Effects of the late Prorogations and Dissolution, with respect to the Plot, the Trial of the Lords, &c. insinuated his Doubts, that some Persons were already at work to render them odious, both to his Majesty and his People, and to prevail with his Majesty for their Dismissal; declar'd, that he took such Persons to be Enemies both to the King and Kingdom; hop'd the House would take a Time to find them out, and proceed against them according to their Merits; and, for a Close, join'd in both Motions, for the Address, and the Message. Sir Francis Winnington prophesied, that every succeeding Parliament would prosecute Popery like the past; pray'd, that this Temper of the People might not be a Cause for the Dissolve of Parliaments for good and all; and compar'd the Policy of those in Power (in stopping or smothering all Proceedings against Popery for the last two Years, and then indirectly reprehending the House of Commons for not bringing all to Perfection in two Weeks) to the killing of Justice Goffrey. He also was for the Message, and the Address; and, the House in general being of the same Mind, both were voted, nemine contradicente.

Address of the Commons.

Of the Effect of the Message, we shall treat in its Place: And as to the Address (which was drawn up under the Direction of Sir William Jones, who was that very Day introduced into the House, as also appointed of the (x) Committee, and by them plac'd in the Chair, out of a peculiar Compliment) it was founded on the Thought first started by Mr. Booth; and affected gravely to convince his Majesty, That his faithful Commons had made a considerable Progress in the Prosecution of Popery and the Plot; and even attempted to turn turn the Table, upon him, by insinuating, not over complaiantly, that the Difficulties in their Way to the Trials of the Lords had been much increas'd by the pernicious Councils of those who had advis'd the Prorogation, and Dissolution of the last Parliament, &c. Some of those who might have come in as Witnesses, having in that Interval, possibly, either dy'd, as Hedder, who is instanced as a material Witness against all the five Lords, or having been taken off, or discourag'd from giving their Evidence. And the Use and Application of all was contain'd in the following Words: "To prevent the like or greater Inconveniencies for the future, we make it our most humble Request to your most excellent Majesty, that as you tender the Safety of your Royal Person, the Security of your loyal Subjects, and the Preservation of the true Protestant Religion, you will not suffer yourself to be prevail'd upon by the like Councils to do any thing which may occasion in Consequence (tho' we are assur'd never with your Majesty's Intention) either the deferring of a full and perfect Discovery and Examination of this most wicked and detestable Plot, or the preventing the Conspirators therein from being brought to speedy and exemplary Justice and Punishment. And (for a Sweetener in the Cloze) we humbly beseech your Majesty to rest assur'd (notwithstanding any Suggestions which may be made by Persons, who, for their own wicked Purposes, contrive to create a Distrust in your Majesty of your People) that nothing is more in the Desires, and shall be more the Endeavours of us your faithful and loyal Commons, than the promoting and advancing of your Majesty's true Happiness and Greatness."

The English Bill read a third time.

This Address being reported and agreed to, and the House appearing in a fit Temper to prosecute the grand Affairs, Mr. George Vernon mov'd, That the engros'd Bill for dishonouring the Duke of York might be read: And the same being read accordingly, Mr. Secretary Wynkin rose up once more in opposition to it, declaring it to be still his Opinion, That the House ought not to chastise his Royal Highness by a new Law, without any Hearing: That having taken the Oath of Allegiance, he look'd upon himself as bound to the Heir as well as the Possessor: That he knew no Power on Earth, which could absolve him from that Oath: That to dishonour a Prince merely for a Difference of Opinion in Points of Faith, was contrary to the Principles of the Religion we profess; and that if such an Act, when made, should be of any Validity, it would change the Constitution of this Monarchy, and make it in a manner elective. Sir Richard Mason contended for a Proviso to be added to the Bill: That if the Duke should turn Protestant, the Bill should be void; as likewise for a second, That in case the Duke should have a Son, after the Crown in virtue of this Act should have descended to his Daughters, it might revert to him; making use of these memorable Words: As there is no Design to exaltise the Daughter for the Father's sake, so I suppose not the Son. Mr. Walden launch'd into such Personal Invectives against the Duke, that he was not suffered to proceed. Mr. Hyde gave it as his Opinion, That it would consist more with the Justice of the House to impeach the Duke and try him in a regular way; and then cut off his Head, if he was found to deserve it; than thus; unheard, to exclude him from his Birthright: Talk'd of a loyal Party that would not obey this Law when made, which would unavoidably occasion a Civil War: Complain'd that the Proviso for the Security of the Duke's Children was not sufficiently expressive, and more particularly, that the Words presumptive Heir, were industriously left out, and concluded for rejecting the Bill. Sir William Jones, on the other hand, took it for granted, That it was impossible for a Papist to come to the Possession and quiet Enjoyment of the Crown, without wading thro' a Sea of Blood: Said, that he saw no way to prevent the Miseries which had been made to it; and took upon him to answer them all: Affirming the Bill was not intended as a Condemnation of the Duke, but as a Security for the Nation: That instead of being against natural Justice, it was agreeable to all the Rules both of Justice and Religion, since the Safety both of the King and Kingdom depended thereon: And no one Man's Interest could be brought in Competition with that of the whole Community. That as to the Oath of Allegiance, it was the first time he had ever heard it pleaded in favour of Popery: That it did not extend to the Successor, during the King's Life, and, therefore, there was no need of a Dispensation in that Point: That he could not understand how it could be a Scandal to the Church for them to secure it from the Danger of Popery. That as to the Argument drawn from the Assertion, that there was a loyal Party who would not obey this Law, it was new and strange to him: "For, said he, to doubt that the whole Legislature cannot make Laws that shall bind any, or all the Subjects of this Nation, is to suppose there is such a Weakness in Government, as must infallibly occasion its Ruin; and therefore I am of opinion, that what Laws you make in this Case, will carry as much Right and Strength with them, not only now, but after the King's Death, as any Law whatsoever. And how then can those be a loyal Party that will not acquiesce therein, unless the Word Loyal have some other Signification than I know of? I take it to be a Distinction that can only be given to such as obey Laws: And, I think, we need not doubt, but if once this Law was pass'd, there would be Protestants enough, whose Interest it will be to defend it, that would compel an Obedience. And we have much more reason to fear a Civil War without it, than with it; for if we can get this Bill, we may be, thereby, so united and enabled to defend ourselves, as that the Popish Party may never have the Confidence to attempt us; but without it we shall not be in any Capacity to defend ourselves; which which above all things may encourage a Civil War." As to the Proviso relating to the Duke's Children, he further said, "That if it was not strong enough, he was ready to give his Vote that it should be stronger. That as to the leaving out the Words, presumptive Heir, there was no such Term in their Law Books relating to the Succession; and therefore, he hop'd, they would be careful how they made a Precedent in such Cases. That, as there were no Objections of any Weight against the Bill, so there were many unanswerable things to be urg'd for it: For, continued he, altho' the Malignity of Men cannot erase his Majesty's Goodness, yet, by assisting the Popish Faction, they have spoil'd the beautiful Face of the best Government in the World, by breaking that good Correspondence that there ought to be between the King and his People, by dividing us in Points of Religion, and by being the Cause of Jealousies and Fears: By which his Majesty is reduc'd to great Difficulty and Trouble in the Administration of his regal Authority, and the Credit, Peace, and Tranquillity of the Nation are almost incurably lost. As to all which, the Art of Man cannot find out any Remedy as long as there is a Popish Successor, and the Fears of a Popish King."

These were the first Fruits of this great Lawyer's great Abilities, in the House of Commons. He was follow'd by Sir F. Wmington, who enlarg'd on the same Topics; and in particular quoted a Variety of Precedents to shew it was no Novelty for the Parliament to divert the Course of Succession into what Channel they pleas'd. Colonel Leg then submitted it to the Consideration of the House, on the Credit of History, whether the Precedents quoted by Sir Francis were not accompany'd with Blood and Misery: Intimated that this disinheriting Bill would have no better Success, and concluded with expressing his Sorrow, that no Successor was nam'd; because it left him in the dark, as to the Petition for whom he was to draw his Sword. Sir Henry Capel rose next, and took occasion to drop a Hint, That if the Colonel would take the Pains to read the Histories of England, he would find cause to change his Opinion. He also signify'd, That the Barbarities of the short Reign of Queen Mary more than balanc'd all the Inconveniences resulting from any Exclusion-Act: That the removing one Person in the order of Succession would make no material Alteration in the Government; and that the most material Observation he could make on the Arguments against the Bill, was, That it was thought too good for them: That it was fear'd it would prove effectual. And this Observation he further illustrated as follows: "If we consider how all the Laws which have, hitherto, been made against the Duke have been defeated, we may, with some reason, fear the like Success of all other that shall be made; unless you can do something that may tend to changing of the Interest; which can never be done without this Bill. We have a great many old Laws against Papists; but I did never hear that any thing was done by virtue of them, that ever prejudic'd the Duke: It was once attempted by a Presentment made by a Grand Jury: The Success was, That a known material Law of the Land must be broken by an extrajudicial Discharge of the said Jury, rather than the Law against him should have any Effect. There was a Law, not long since made, obliging all Persons that held or executed any Office to take the Transubstantiation-Test. It is true the Duke was so brave-spirited, as not to dissent and take it, tho' haply he was earnestly press'd with a Dispensation; yet had not that Law had any Effect in favour of the Protestant Religion; for tho' the Duke hath not since acted in his Office by himself, he put in, as his Deputies, Persons of so much Gratitude, as have in all things, follow'd his Directions; so that as to himself, the Act hath not prov'd of any force. There was another Act, lately made, which was intended chiefly against him, I mean that of excluding Papists from sitting in either House; and there he fairly got himself excepted by name. Now we would secure our Religion by another Bill against him. I had it meets with Opposition here; what it may meet with elsewhere, I cannot tell: But if such be his Power under a Protestant King, what may we not justly fear, if he should come to be King himself? I think nothing less than Popery, Slavery and Misery."

We have here the Sum of what was said on both Sides, on this very important Occasion: And on the Issue of all it was resolv'd, that the Bill do pass, under the Title of, An Act for securing the Protestant Religion, by disabling James Duke of York, &c. And that the Lord Russell do carry up the said Bill to the Lords for their Concurrence.

This was the great Work of November the Eleventh; and, to give it all the additional Strength and Lustre imaginable, as also to shew how close and intimate a Connection there was between the House of Commons and the City of London, the Lord Mayor the very next Day held a Common Council; in which it was agreed and order'd, veniant contentisente, that the following Petition and Address, should be presented to his Majesty as soon as conveniently might be:

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, being deeply sensible and apprehensive of the great Danger your Royal Person, the Protestant Religion, and the good Constitution of this Kingdom, have been, and, as we have reason to fear, are still in, do with all humble Thankfulness acknowledge your Majesty's great Grace and Goodness in causing the Parliament to meet, and sit, to the great Satisfaction of this City, and of all your good Subjects at home, and the Comfort and Encouragement of all your Protestant Neighbours abroad, and for your most gracious Speech at the Opening thereof, in those Assurances you were pleas'd to renew for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and in recommending to their Care the Suppression of Popery, and the Prosecution of the horrid Popish Plot, with a strict and impartial Inquiry; without which, neither your Royal Person, nor your good Subjects, can be in any Safety.

And we being also sensible how much the happy Conclusion of this Session of Parliament will conduce to those Ends; do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that you would be graciously pleas'd to hearken and incline to the humble Advice of that your great Council, for the Safety of your Royal Person, the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, the quieting and uniting the Minds of all your good Subjects; and for securing the Peace of this your GREAT CITY, and the whole Kingdom.

And we do in the most dutiful manner, and with unanimous Consent, humbly assure your Majesty, that in Pursuit of those Councils, your GREAT CITY of London will be ready at all times to promote your Majesty's Ease and Prosperity, and stand by your Majesty against all Dangers and Hazards whatsoever.

What Reception this extraordinary Piece met with from his Majesty, may be easily conjectur'd; and what Effect it had, the Sequel will inform us.

It is worthy Remark, that tho' the Exclusion-Bill was pass'd by the Commons, and order'd to the Lords on Tuesday, November 11, it was not carry'd up till Monday the 15th following: And there is no other way to account for that Demur, after it had been hurry'd thro' all the Forms of the House with such Rapidity before, than by supposing, that this Interval was employ'd by the Party Leaders on both Sides in endeavouring to bring the Matter to a Compromise. Bishop Burnet is express as to the Fact, but not as to the Time. Many Meetings, says he, were appointed between Lord Halifax and some leading Men; in which, as he try'd to divert them from the Exclusion, so they study'd to persuade him to it, but without effect. He also says, that Lord Halifax's Hatred of the Earl of Shaftsbury, and his Vanity in desiring to have his own Motion prefer'd, sharpen'd him, at that time, to much Indecency in his whole Deportment: And that, on the other Hand, the Party depended on the Hopes that Lady Portsmouth and Lord Sunderland gave them. It is, however, most strange, that the Party should be deluded by such Hopes, if what that Prelate yet farther affirms, on the Authority of Lord Halifax, be true; That any Limitation whatever, that should leave the Title of King to the Duke, tho' it should be little more than the mere Title, might be obtain'd of the King, tho' he was positive and fix'd against the Exclusion.

But wherever the Fault lay, the Treaty broke up; both Parties became more exasperated against each other than ever; and Lord Russell, attended by the whole Faction in a Body, carry'd up the Bill and left it with the Lords; who, resolving to rid their Hands of it as expeditiously as possible, gave it a Reading the next Day; and tho' by a meager Majority of two, it was committed, it was only to reject it with the greater Appearance of Candour and Impartiality: All the Bishops except three, throwing their Weight in the Court-Scale as usual; and, thereby shewing, that they piqu'd themselves more on their Loyalty than their Religion. The Course of the Debate was extremely violent, and came to an Issue at last, rather thro' Weariness than Conviction. Till 11 o'Clock at Night the Rage of Altercation and the Lust of Superiority kept up the Contest, the King being present all the while, and the whole House of Commons attending, who had adjourn'd their own Proceedings, to indulge their Curiosity in observing the Progress and Event of this. The Lord Shaftsbury, supported not only by the Lord Essex, who had resign'd his Places, but the Lord Sunderland, who was still in Possession, headed one Party, and the Lord Halifax the other: And to the superior Talents of the last, as far as superior Talents can be thought to influence in such Cases as these, the Honour of this Day's important Victory ought in Justice to be ascrib'd, on the joint Evidence of both Friends and Enemies. The King, on the one hand, in acknowledgment of his Merits, took him into his Bosom, and rely'd on him as the Man of his whole Court, that could serve him most: And on the other hand, the House of Commons, adopting the Resentments of his defeated Adversary, Shaftsbury, resolv'd to set a Mark of their Displeasure on him, tho' not only in Violation of all Forms, but even of Decency and Justice; a Motion being the next Day made and (y) carry'd for an Address, humbly to desire his Majesty to remove George, (z) Earl of Halifax, from his Presence and Council for ever: It is remarkable, that in the Vote, no Cause is assign'd for this severe Proceeding; but in the Address, which was not reported till the 22d, the late Prerogatives and Dissolutions were plac'd to his Account, and made the Foundation of their Request, that he might be remov'd. His Majesty could not, however, be induc'd to consider the Affair in that (a) light, or to give way to their Importunity. On the contrary, in his Answer, he signify'd, "That their Address was liable to many Exceptions; and tho' to avoid all Occasions of Dispute, he forebore to enter into Particulars: That the Grounds they went upon were not sufficient to warrant a Compliance; and that whenever they should, in a regular way, prove any Crime either against the Earl of Halifax or any other Person who either was or should be of his Councils, he would leave them to their own own legal Defence without interposing to protect them."

On the Day the Exclusion-Bill had been left with the Lords, his Majesty had by Message, demanded a Supply for Tanger; without which it was urg'd, that Place could not be much longer preserv'd. There was some Truth in this and some Falacy, as there is generally, in all Demands of the like nature. Tanger was, indeed, in some Distress; but the King was in more: And whatever was given in Relief of the first, would, also, have contributed to the Relief of the last. But, on the other hand, the Commons very well knew they had not been assembled to make fine Speeches in the House, or render themselves popular at the Expence of the Royal Family. Like the fine Lady in the Comedy, they knew, there was but one thing they could do to please the Court, which was giving Money; and that being once done, they also knew, that an instant Dissolution would follow: There was, therefore, no Pretence, how plausible soever, that the King could use, to shew the Necessity and Reasonableness of his having Recourse to the Benevolence of his Subjects, but what they were prepar'd with Pretences as plausible, to evade and refuse.

Debate thereon.

Thus, on the Day that this Message was taken into Consideration, Sir William Jones rose up foremost to oppose it, on the following Maxim: "That it was a Duty incumbent on the House to secure things at home, on which our All depended, before we enter'd into an Expence of Time about securing things abroad." And in the Course of his Speech he farther said, in plain Terms, That Tanger was a Nursery of popish Soldiers; and that the Consideration of it came unseasonably before them; because, said he, it must end in Money, and not a little Sum; and before that was granted, he was of Opinion, they ought to know into whose Hands it was to go; whether to Persons in the Protestant or Popish Interest; and whether, instead of being employ'd for the Defence of Tanger, it might not be diverted to the Destruction of the Protestant Religion: Concluding with a Motion for an Address to his Majesty, containing their Reasons for not complying with his Message, &c. After him, Mr. Hampden urg'd the Almightyness of the Duke's Interest and Power in the Government, as a Reason why no Money ought to be given. Mr. Harbord very explicitly declar'd for the Address, but with a Caveat, that it might be drawn with the Duty and Humility that became Subjects, tho' with the Truth and Plainness that became an English House of Commons. Sir Edward Deering very rationally propos'd, That a State of Tanger might be laid before the House, to be consider'd at leisure, and when they were assur'd of some Equivalent in lieu of the Exclusion-Bill: Colonel Birch was for knowing, whether they had any thing to give, or no, before they consider'd the State of Tanger; and, if the Duke and the Popish Interest was strong enough to wrestle with the King and the Protestant Interest, he concluded they had not. He also said, they could neither answer to God nor Man the giving of Money, until there was a great and general Reformation, as to Petitions in Trust and Command: That there were Eleven to Seven in the Popish Interest; in some Places; and All in others; and that in such as were of great Importance too: For a Close, he declar'd for the Address; and desir'd it might be full and plain. Mr. Vernon was of Opinion, that our Religion was of more Value than our Trade; and, therefore, he was for providing for the Security of the former, before the latter: Colonel Titus reason'd on the same Proposition; recapitulated past Misapplications; and, coming down to the present Times, proceeded in these Words: "For, tho' we had never more (b) Treasurers, we had never less Money; never more Admirals, yet never a worse Fleet; and tho' never more Counsellors, never less Safety. Lord Russell was expre's for making the Disinheriting the Duke, and the Removal of his Friends the Condition sine qua non of giving Money. Mr. Lenthal, from his own Knowledge, undertook to shew, that unless the Mole of Tanger was completed, which he was afraid would never be, the Place itself was of little Value, unless in the Case of a War with Spain. But if, continu'd he, it must cost 100,000*l.* per ann. and if a War with Spain be not like to happen one Year in twenty, I am of Opinion the certain Charge will amount to more than the uncertain Inconvenience. Mr. Lucy, on the contrary, was of opinion, that if we once fell into the way of sending good Governours thither, it might be made to maintain itself; and that it was worth all the Charge, if only to keep it out of the Hands of the French, Turki, Moors, and Spaniards. Mr. Secretary Jenkins and Mr. Hyle adventur'd also to oppose the Current of the House, but after such a manner as argu'd their Despair of getting the better of it. The whole Burden of the Day, indeed, on the Court Side, seem'd to be rested on the Shoulders of (c) Sir William Temple; who agreed with Mr. Lenthal, that if the Town and Mole could be blown up into the Air, or any otherwise destroy'd, it would not be worth the Charge of keeping it,

(b) Alluding to the Treasury and Admiralty being in Commission: Which, in those Days, was unusual; though Custom has familiariz'd it to us.

(c) Of Sir William's Conduct with respect to the Exclusion-Bill, and his Covert-Opinion with respect to the Address, he gives the following Account, in his own Memoirs, Part lii. p. 352: "In the Business of the Bill I never meddled, nor to much as reason'd, either in or out of the House; having declar'd my Opinion to the King and his Ministers, that it was to no purpose to oppose it there; nor for the King to take notice of the Commons Address upon it, farther than to let them know, that whenever any Bills, or any Addresses, upon Things of that Nature, were brought to him from both Houses, he would suffer them: By this means, I thought the King was sure of his Bed; for the Bill would certainly fall, as often as it came into the House of Lords; and if he should be forc'd to break the Parliament, it would be better done upon an inevitable Difference between the two Houses, than upon any between his Majesty and the House of Commons. But this Opinion was not agreed to by the chief Ministers."

it, but contended for the Support of it to prevent the Mischief that would arise from its falling into other Hands; enlarg'd on its immediate Danger from the Moors, and the Necessity of an immediate Supply; such, however, as might be precisely necessary for the Defence and Protection of the Place; a small Sum, he said, in comparison of what the House had formerly given, might be sufficient: And, to shew of what Importance it was to give that, he took occasion to represent the deplorable State of the Protestants abroad; how much they were concern'd in the good or ill Success of the Parliament; and how grievously they would be perplex'd to hear any ill News thereof: Caution'd them, therefore, not to do any thing that might bring on a Breach with his Majesty: Advis'd, above all things, that, in their Address, they would take no notice of the Lords having thrown out the Exclusion-Bill, since it was not to be presum'd, that his Majesty had any Concern in it: Acknowledg'd, that it was strange and unusual to do so, without a previous Conference: Said very wisely, "That tho' a King alone could not save a Kingdom, yet a King alone could do very much to ruin it: And that tho' Parliaments alone could not save this Kingdom, yet Parliaments alone might do much to run it." Put them in mind, that the King in his Message had requir'd their Advice as well as Money: Insinuated, that if the Address was ground'd on that Expression, many good things might be grafted upon it; and begg'd them not to give any Advantage to those who it was justly to be fear'd were endeavouring to put off the Parliament; that thro' his Majesty's Care and Goodness, all Difficulties might be overcome, and the Session brought to a happy Conclusion. What Effect all this was like to have on the House, Sir William could not but foresee; since he himself takes notice, in his Memoirs, "That the House met with such a Bent, on what they thought the chief of their Home Concerns, that the Name of any thing foreign would not be allow'd among them: Nay, that the Mention of Spanish Leagues, Alliances with Holland, and Measures intended by the King with other Confederates, were laugh'd at, as Court-Tricks, and too stale to pass any more." And, agreeable to this Disposition, it was resolv'd upon the Question, That a Committee be appointed to draw up an Address, Sr. humbly representing to his Majesty the dangerous State and Condition of the Kingdom, in answer to his Majesty's Message: Which Representation was to the following Purpose: That they look'd on the present Condition of Tanger not only as one Infelicity more added to the afflicted State of his Subjects, but as one Result also of the same Councils and Designs, which had brought his Majesty's Person, Crown and Kingdoms into those great and imminent Dangers, with which they were then surrounded; and that they were the less surpris'd at the Exigencies of the Place, because it had been several times under the Command of Papists, and that a great Part of the Garrison was compos'd of Papish Officers and Soldiers. That to that Part of his Majesty's Message relating to his Dependence on that House for the Support of the said Place, they, with all Humility and Reverence, answer'd, That while the Cloud which had long threaten'd this Land, was ready to break on their Heads in a Storm of Ruin and Confusion, and till they were effectually secur'd from the imminent and apparent Dangers, arising from the Power of Popish Persons and Councils, it would neither be consistent with their Duty to his Majesty, or the Trust repos'd in them by their Constituents, to come to any Resolutions concerning it. Descending then to Particulars, they proceeded to say, That it was not unknown to his Majesty how restless and bold the Endeavours of the Popish Party had been of late Years to introduce the Romish, and utterly to extirpate the true Protestant Religion. That by the treacherous Assistance of perfidious Protestants, the several Approaches they had made towards compassing their Designs, had been so strangely unsuccessful, that it was Matter of Admiration to them; and what they could only ascribe to an over-riding Providence, that his Majesty's Reign was still continued over them, and that they were yet assembled to consult the Means of their Preservation. That they had not only been conniv'd at, but countenanc'd in an open and avowed Practice of their Idolatry, without Controul, in several Parts of the Kingdom: That Swarms of Priests and Jesuits had resorted hither, had exercis'd their Jurisdiction, had made Profelytes, had found Means to disgrace their Opposers; and, if they were Judges, Justices, or other Magistrates, to get them turn'd out of their Commissions. That in Process of Time, they became able to influence Matters of State and Government, and thereby to destroy those they could not corrupt. That the Continuance or Separations of Parliaments had been accommodated to their Purposes: That Money rais'd upon the People to supply his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions, had by the Prevalence of their Councils been employ'd to make War on a Protestant State (the Dutch) and to aggrandize the dreadful Power of the French King. That Numbers of his Majesty's Subjects had been employ'd and continu'd in the French Service, notwithstanding the apparent Interest and Calls of the Nation to the contrary: And that English Ministers had been made Instruments to press upon that State as the Price of a Peace with France, the Admission of the public Exercise of the Catholic Religion into the United Provinces, with a farther Demand, That the Churches should be divided between them and the Protestants, and that the Romish Priests should be maintain'd out of the public Revenue. That when his Majesty, by the Advice of his Council, or at the Instance of Parliament, had given Command to put the Laws in force against the Papists, even from thence they gain'd Advantage to their Party, while the Edge of those Laws was turn'd against Protestant Dissenters, and the Papists escap'd, in a manner, untouch'd. That even the very Tests had either been render'd ineffectual by Dispensations, or those who refus'd were succeeded by Persons so favourable to the same Interests, that Popery itself had rather gain'd than lost ground. Hence they pass'd on to Coleman's Correspondence, the damnable and bellifio Plot, Godfrey's Murder, Commissions granted to Popish Officers, Attempts to corrupt Witnesses, the Meal-Tub Plot, the Discharge of the Grand Jury, &c. And upon the whole signify'd, That upon mature Deliberation, they had lately propos'd one Remedy of these great Evils, without which all others would prove vain and fruitless, and rather expose his Majesty's Person to the greatest Hazard, and the People, together with all that was valuable to them as Men and Christians, to utter Ruin and Destruction; and that if by his Majesty's great Wisdom and Goodness they might be effectually secur'd from Popery, and that none but Persons of known Fidelity to his Majesty, and sincere Affection to the Protestant Religion might be put into any Employment civil or military, they should not only be ready to assist his Majesty in Defence of Tanger, but to do whatsoever else should be in their Power to enable his Majesty to protect the Protestant Religion and Interest at home and abroad, &c.

This Address was represent'd November the 20th: But either his Majesty return'd no Answer, or it was of such a nature that the Commons did not think proper to publish it. And here we must leave this great Affair in Suspence, in order to dispatch the last Scenes of the Plot, and drop the Curtain upon it for good and all.

It is shrewdly observ'd by Mr. Carter, "That it was a terrible Slur upon the Credit of the Popish Plot in England, that, atter it had made such an horrible Noise, and frighted People out of their Senses, in a Nation where there was scarce one Papist to an hundred Protestants, there should not, for above a Year together, appear no such as one Witness from Ireland (a Country otherwise fruitful enough in producing them) to give any Information of any Conspiracy of the like Nature in that Kingdom, where there were fifteen Papists to one Protestant, as that charg'd upon the Papists of England, whose Weakness would naturally make them apply for Assistance from their more powerful Brethren in Ireland." To remedy this Defect, a Proclamation was set forth in 1679, while the Malcontents held their Influence at the Council-board, to notify all over the Kingdom the Encouragement that would be given to all Persons that should offer themselves as Witnesses. All the Correspondents of the Party in Ireland were, besides, indefatigably vigilant in laying out for Intelligence, with the double View of furthering the Cause in England, and of blating the Lord Lieutenant as a Favourer of Papists, in case he did not keep pace with their Zeal and Activity: And what was still more extraordinary, Persons of bad Characters were empower'd and authoris'd to go in search of worse than themselves, if such could be found, who were to give Credit and Countenance to all the Extravagances they thought fit to depose; as also to play the Part of travelling Inquisitors, and lay the Country under Terror and Contribution, by holding farms in Custody, by making others pay for their Discharge, and by committing such open Acts of (d) Rapine and Violence, as called aloud for public Vengeance, instead of public Rewards.

It would be endless to enter into all the particular

Account of the Irish Plot. Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 495.

(2) For instance, thus writes Mr. Carter:

"Another Fellow employ'd to pick up Witnesses for the Plot, and to bring them over to England to be tutor'd and instructed there (for the Men taken up, when they appeared before the Council, generally professed they knew nothing of the Matter) was one James Goughan, alias Dolan, of whom I find this Account, in a Letter of the Lord Lieutenant and Council to the Earl of Sunderland, dated Jan. 3: This Man came to Ireland in Nov. 1680, with an Order of the Council of England, requiring the Government and Magistrates of Ireland to give him Assistance in the Business he came about, especially for the apprehending of any of those who had engaged themselves to kill the King. "He landed at Youghall and, "after several very extraordinary Proceedings in the Country, " (mention'd in a former Letter to the said Secretary) came to Waterford, where he was committed, upon an Information, for treasonable Words. Upon Application to the Lord Lieutenant, he was releas'd, and brought up under a Convey of Horle for his Safety to Dublin. He gave an satisfactory Account to his Grace why he did not apply to him sooner for Assistance in the Prosecution of his Undertaking. But his Demands were, first an Order from the Lord Lieutenant to take up and imprison whoever he should see fit, and requiring all Officers civil and military to assist him; next a Guard of six Horsemen, to be taken from Garrison to Garrison, as he should call for them; and in the last place Money, to buy or hire him an Horse, and to bear his Charges. Within the first of these, it was not thought safe fully to comply, in regard he already had charg'd with a Design of raising Profit of his Employment, by compounding with some Persons he propos'd to accuse; but he had as ample Power as was necessary, as appears by the Order sent inclosed. His other two Requests were granted.

"Thus authorized, guarded, and provided, (by the Words of the Letter) he set forth from Dublin; but as his setting forth began to give ill Signs of his Temper and "Conduct, having in the open Street (his Guard of Horse "about him) not only whipp'd and beaten a Butcher about "the Price or Hire of an Horse, but rode away with the "Horse, without making any Agreement with the Owner. "In prosecution of the Circuit he intended to make, he "committed many other Outrages nothing appearing to "the Work he had in hand; of which several Complaints "were made to us, and yet we forbore to restrain his Irregularities, in regard to the Importance of the Service he "was upon, from which we were loth to recall him. But "at length his Violence, Excesses, Debaucheries, and in "effect his plain Robberies committed on Irish and English, "Protestants and Papists, were so manifest, and rais'd to great "a Disturbance in all Places where he pass'd, that we began "to suspect he could not be guilty of so extravagant a Design, "but with design thereby to call a Blessing upon "other substantial Discoveries and Witnesses. Wherein we "were in some measure confirm'd by his apprehending, and "carrying Prisoner about with him one Mr. Pope, a Justice "of Peace, and a known, constant, and zealous Protestant; "and by his breaking open the Chest, and taking out of it "about 30*l.* of one Bilbois; also a Protestant, and Horseman "man in the Earl of Longford's Troop; and also by his "accusing one Carroll of Treason, and after having apprehended him, and having obtain'd a Writings of a Justice "of Peace to carry him to Goal, he took the Writings from "the Constable, and retain'd Carroll, upon a Composition "of twenty Pieces of Eight, and kept the Writings in his "Pocket, which was found about him. The Depositions "and Complaints against him the said Goughan, "herewith sent, will show what it laid to his Charge. Upon "so clear Proof whereof, we are of Opinion, the Justice of "the Government and the Reality of the Popish Plot could "not be sufficiently vindicated, but by the Commitment of "the said Goughan to safe Custody, where he now remains, "and concerning whom we humbly desire to receive his "Majesty's further Pleasure."

particular Villanies that arose from these strange Proceedings: And all that is necessary to be said in this place, is, That certain low Fellows of infamous Characters, viz. one Burch, one Maekinnara, one Conyns, one Foy, and one Sanson; as also a Gentleman of the Name of Fitzgerald (who had himself, been committed for treasonable Words) enrol'd themselves as Witnesses, and undertook to prove, that Ireland had its Share of the Plot as well as England. All these and many more were sent for over to England, were countenanc'd and maintain'd; and before they were produc'd in Public, the Earl of Stafford was (e) indiscreet enough to avow himself to be their Patron, and declare that they had great things to discover. But when it came to the issue, instead of supporting the Truth and Validity of the English Plot by this of Ireland, the Buttreff pull'd down the Building, and the Architects had like to have perish'd under the Ruins. Fitzgerald's Information consist'd of the Discourses of some Irish Officers in the French Service, who had come in 1674 and 1676, into Ireland, to raise Recruits, but had return'd, and were then abroad: Whence he infer'd, that a Design had been laid for an Insurrection, and that several Gentlemen of the Country were concern'd, who were taken up, examin'd, discharg'd; and then prosecuted again by fresh Orders from England, whether Fitzgerald had been summon'd; and from whence he, after a while, endeavour'd to make his Escape, from a Court-martial, that he had advanc'd more than he could make good. Burch, Maekinnara, and Conyns gave in their respective Affirmations to the House of Commons, in effect as follows:

Burch depos'd, That being by the Kindness of one Major Baker admitted to the Knowledge of the Earl of Tyrone, and by that means frequently keeping his Lordship company in his Passages both at home and abroad, he observ'd that the said Earl and the Major would be always extolling the French King, and praying for his Prosperity. That he further observ'd a continual Refort of Papists and suspicious Persons to the said Earl's House: That being one Morning private with his Lordship, his Lordship told him, That he had Intelligence out of France, that the French were very powerful, and that Parlez Français, would be plentifully heard in Ireland ere long.

That in farther Discourie, his Lordship drew out of his Pocket a great Quantity of Papers roll'd up and deliver'd him to subscribe his Name in one of them; and that upon a sudden Glance he could read the Names of some that he knew to be Persons ill affected to his Majesty and his Government. That upon his Refusal to subscribe, his Lordship call'd him Coward, and drew his Sword half out of his Scabbard to have kill'd him, but was prevented by the unexpected coming in of another Gentleman. That from that time forward his Lordship us'd several Means to ruin him; and, in particular, threw him into (f) Waterford Gaol; from whence he wrote five Letters to the Lord Lieutenant of his hard Usage, and what he had to say as to the Conspiracy; but could have no Answer. That being got out of Waterford Gaol, he gave in his Informations against the said Earl at Dublin; where, though his Lordship were bound over to answer the Informant at Waterford Assizes, yet such was his Power over the Judges and the Jury, that he easily got himself acquitted: So that finding Ireland then too hot for him, the Informant

(e) For which he is treated after the following Manner, even by the own French.

The Conspirators, having now got off the Parliament, and all other things according to will in England and Scotland, resolve upon labelling the Earl of Stafford, and some others, in a sudden time; for now they had gotten good Footing every where, and, in order thereto, conceive how to inveigle the Earl of Stafford, the Earl of Essex, and others, into the Belief of a most dangerous English Plot in Ireland, join'd with, and in Nature the same, with this in England, which was design'd only to abuse these Lords, and others; but if they succeeded as what they aim'd at, it would overthrow the Belief of the Plot in England. The Design and Aim was this: The Conspirators, having observ'd in some of Mr. Oster's Depositions, Mention had been made of raising of Moony and Men in Ireland, and for the introducing the French, by the Earl of Tyrone thence, into that Kingdom, resolve to carry on the Story, and make this laborious to their Purpose, by making the Lord Stafford, and others, who were great Soldiers to find out the English Plot, believe a Plot in Ireland, though there was none in; in hope that when it appear'd to all the World, that all the Hunting of an Irish Plot was on a false Scent, the English Plot might meet with a Bluffe by that means, or, at least, a Jealousy would be rais'd, that it was of no other Metal than the Irish Plot was: And therefore the Conspirators, as well as their Agents, and Correspondents in Ireland and elsewhere, having provided a Parcel of pretious Wares, Gene-Buttons, Hibonnyes, and such like Villains, to tempt to themselves an Irish Plot, carry'd on there in Copartnership with this in England; some of the cunningest of the Conspirators Crew, easily got them a, and had the Story of this Irish Plot, and got both their ready 1. and as a principal Agent and Instrument for the Management of the Evidence, they made use of one Hetherington, who was escap'd out of Prison for Debt in Dublin, and sent him with their Instructions, and bid him apply himself to the Lord —, who then was President here: He comes accordingly and tells the Council of his being a Justice of Peace, and a great Man in the Queen's County, and discovers a perfect Irish Plot, made to his Hand by his Employers; but by this time the Lord Stafford is turn'd out of the Council: However the whole Discovery is offer'd, or was really made, to him; which his Lordship liked well of, and look'd upon as a mighty Discovery, and of great Service to the Nation; and tho' his Lordship was now out of the Council, yet he gave notice to the Council, and to the Lord Roberts (his Successor in this Matter; and Hetherington he sets by himself for a mighty Discoverer, and, by degrees, brings over the Under-high-Vermis, to prove what he had declar'd: Which Plot appear'd to great noise, that, in effect, the whole English Plot was drawn'd: And these Creatures, whom the Conspirators had sent over to be Witnesses, were so miserably poor, that many other People, being affected with their Condition, and glad of a Discovery of the Plot, taking all for Truth that these Villains had related, gave them their Charity; which was the thing aim'd at by the Conspirators: And it was so order'd here, that, whenever they came over, and had given in their Depositions, they had no Subsistence allow'd them by the Court, but were put to Shift for themselves. In short, to were things order'd, that, if there had been any real Plot, as it is very probable there was, at least to come to the Knowledge of such Shrews and Tary-Deputations as these; yet the Usage these Creatures met with from the Court was enough to discourage much better Men than they ever were; which was principally design'd from the Beginning. But however, by the Charity of several Persons, these high Cattle were kept together all of a Side, in hope that when the Parliament next came, Provision would be made." Growth of Depry, Part II. p. 212.

(f) Mr. Corse says, he was committed for a dangerous Assault on one McDaniel, after having been allow'd four Days time to find Bail, without being able to procure any.

was forc'd to retire into England, to make his Appeal.

Accusation depos'd. That one William Bradley, Esq; a Justice of the Peace in the County of Waterford, having first made him take an Oath of Secrecy, gave him to understand, That the Earl of Tyrone had receiv'd a Commission from the French King to be a Colonel of Horse in the County of Waterford, and that the said Bradley was to be his Lieutenant-Colonel, and therefore desir'd him to provide himself of Horse and Arms, and get away as many as he could trust, promising him a Captain's Place.

That after Bradley had unfolded to him the aforesaid Treason, he met with the Earl of Tyrone, who ask'd him privately, whether Bradley had said any thing to him; who answering, he had; the Earl bid him be very private, and then shew'd him a List of several that were to be Superior Officers in several Counties of Ireland, which he took special notice of, as knowing several of the Persons.

That the said Earl, at the same time told him, that he had a Commission from the French King under his Hand and Seal, to be a Colonel of Horse in the County of Waterford; and that there was hardly a County in Ireland, where Persons were not appointed by the French King for the same Purpose, with other Discourse of the same nature.

And Comyns, That, living with one Keadeagh Magher, his Relation, in Karigginisurie in the County of Tipperary, Treasurer for the Confederates in Ireland, he was privy to the Payment of several considerable Sums to several considerable Persons upon the Account of the Plot, by the Directions of Plunket, titular Primate of Ireland, Brenand titular Archbishop of Cashel, and Powes Dean of Waterford, who had the Disposal of the said Money.

That there was a Meeting of the Irish Clergy, with the titular Primate, at John Wallis's Houfe, who was Lawyer for the Duke of Ormond in the County of Tipperary, where they agreed to give every Judge that would go the Circuit, and befriend them upon Occasion, 200*l.* a-piece.

That the Sum of 200*l.* was secur'd to Sir John Davis upon the same Account, he being then a Judge at Clanmel, of which he was an Eye Witness.

Lastly, after the Recital of many other Circumstances, of his being pursu'd and imprison'd by Sir John Davis, and several other Justices of the Peace, contrary to their Duty, for his Discovery; he affirm'd, that the Papists had barbarously murder'd the said Keadeagh Magher, their Treasurer, when they found that he detested their Design, and was turn'd Protestant.

The Result of all this, besides the Noise and Clamour it furnish'd the Party with Pretences to raise, was the Impeachment of the Earl of Tyrone, and the Trial and Execution of Plunket, the titular Primate of Ireland, on a most extravagant Charge of having form'd a Design to reduce the Kingdom of Ireland under the Dominion of France; Circumstances, indeed, that afforded them very little Cause of Triumph, since they were accompany'd with plain and evident Proofs, that the Practices laid to the Charge of the Papists in Ireland could not, by any kind of Torture, be made to coincide with the Discoveries made in England.

We now come to the Message before-spoken of from the Commons to the Lords, relating to the Trial of Lord Stafford; and which took place under the Pretence of conforming to his Majesty's Pleasure, contained in his Request; "That they would expedite such Matters as were depending before them, relating to Popery and the Plot."

Many Writers, and, in particular, Mr. Trotter of the North and Sir John Royston, are of Opinion, That this Nobleman was selected by the Commons to bear the Sins of the whole Five, on the Presumption that he was least capable of defending himself; and that his very Spirits, as well as his Parts, would fail him, under the Weight of such a Prosecution. He was old and infirm; he had been under Confinement for above two Years; he was timorous by Nature; he had the popular Tide against him; he had the ablest and most zealous Members of the House of Commons for his Prosecutors; a large and considerable Body of his Judges, the Peers, were Parties on the same Side; and his Majesty, tho' he pity'd the Victim, he had Reason to believe, had not Resolution enough to prevent the Sacrifice.

Under all these Disadvantages, his Lordship was brought to the Bar of the Peers in Westminster-hall, upon November 30, the Lord-Chancellor presiding in quality of High-Steward; and, having been charg'd in the Names of all the Commons of England, with having imagin'd and contriv'd to murder the King, to introduce Popery, and subvert the good Government of Church and State, established by Law, pleaded Not Guilty. The Charge was open'd by Serjeant Maynard; seconded by Sir Francis Winnington; and Mr. Treby had the Management of the Witnesses; who were divided into two Classes; such as were to prove the Plot in general, and such as had Matter to urge against the Prisoner in particular, which last were Oates, Dugdale, Bedwin and one Turberville: Dugdale swore, That his Lordship, at a certain Meeting held at Tixshill in Staffordshire, about the latter End of August, or early in September, 1678, had given his deliberate, full Consent, to take away the King's Life, and introduce the Papist Religion; and had expressly offer'd him 500*l.* to murder his Majesty; and, as a farther Inducement, that he should have a free Pardon of all his Sins, and be fitted for the Job. Oates swore, That he had seen several Letters, sign'd Stafford, to the Jesuits, containing Assurances of his Lordship's Fidelity and Zeal in promoting the Catholic Design: That his Lordship (in 78) receiv'd a Commission from Ferwick to be Paymaster-General of the Army, in his Oates's Presence; and that, in Discourse with the said Ferwick, he said, He was of necessity to go down into the Country, to take account how Affairs stood there, and did not doubt but, at his Return, Groce should do the Business; with this Addition, speaking of the King, He hath deceiv'd in a great while, and we can bear no longer. And lastly Turberville, a fresh Witness, swore, That after a Fortnight's Acquaintance with the Prisoner at Paris, in the Year 75, and a Promise of Secrecy, he propos'd to him, in direct Terms, to take away the King of England's Life, who was a Heretic, and a Rebel against God, Ambley; and, for circumstantial Proofs, that this was true, added, That in his Fortnight's Acquaintance he had frequent Access to his Lordship; that when he took his Leave, his Lordship, having the Gout, had his Foot on a Stool: That his Lordship appointed him to wait at Diappe, in order to his coming over with him in a Yacht: That he did so; but while there he receiv'd a Letter from his Lordship, signifying, that he had alter'd his Resolution, and should take his Journey by the way of Calais.

His Lordship's Defence.

To all this his Lordship reply'd, 1. As to Dugdale, That he was an infamous Person, having defraud'd his Master Lord Alton, as also both his Workmen and Servants of their Wages: That by his Extravagances he had run himself into debt; and that being thrown into Gaol for the same, he had no Way to get out, but by making pretended Discoveries: That he had directly and palpably perjur'd himself, in many Parts of his Depositions: That he now swore he had a deep Concern in the Plot; whereas he had formerly, in the Presence of Sir Walter Bagot, Mr. Kimmerly, and Mr. Whitegrove, declar'd, as he hop'd for Salvation, he knew nothing of it: As also, that in Waken's Trial he swore, point-blank, that the Meeting or Consult at Tixhall was in August; whereas his Lordship was not there till the 12th of September, as was made evident by the Marquis of Worcester, the Marchioness of Winchelsea, and several Persons in the Service of the said Marquis: That whereas he had sworn, that the Prisoner had sent for him when at Tixhall, September, the 26th or 27th, into his Chamber, either by his Gentleman or Page, and that they were left alone together; both of them testify, that their Lord was never alone with him on either of those Days (or at any other time, to their Knowledge) nor had seen him, but in their Presence, and thro' his own Goodness, Dugdale having desir'd his Lordship's Intercession with his Master, for Leave to go to certain Races in the Neighbourhood: That, whereas, in the Trial of the said Waken, he had sworn, that, having receiv'd a Letter on the 14th of October, which mention'd the Death of a Justice of Peace, he had imparted the Contents to Mr. Sambidge a Kinsman to Lord Alton, and Mr. Phillips Minister of Tixhall; and that they answer'd, They heard nothing of it before, both the said Phillips and Sambidge, in the most solemn Manner, deny'd every Title of the said Evidences; and declar'd, that neither from Dugdale, nor from any body else, had they ever heard any Circumstance relating to Goffroy's Death; all it was the public Talk, and the Body was found: That, in an Information upon Oath, he had depos'd, That, presently after Howard the Queen's Almoner went beyond Sea, he was told by George Hobson, then Servant to Lord Alton, that there was a Design intended for the Reformation of the Government to the Popish Religion; whereas it was prov'd, that the said Hobson was not Servant to Lord Alton, nor known by Dugdale, till three Years after the Departure of the said Almoner. Three several Persons moreover stood forth, and charg'd Dugdale with endeavouring to suborn them to countenance his Testimony, by swearing such things as they were taught: And finally his Lordship most pertinently observ'd, that Dugdale, not only for his Kniveries and Perjuries deserv'd no Credit; but also because he had sworn, that whole Packets of Letters to and from several Persons, in several Places, at several Times, all fill'd with the most horrid Treasons, had pass'd thro' his Hands, and had been open'd and read by him, and yet he had not one Line or Scrup to produce in support of his Evidence, or to clear himself from the manifold Forgeries laid to his Charge.

2dly, Against Oates his Lordship objected the Unlikelihood, that so many and so great Persons should place such an unreserved Confidence in him, and yet leave him in so wretched and forlorn a State that he begg'd at Doors for Six-pence, as his Lordship undertook to prove: His Lordship then charg'd him with Perjury, in having before the whole House of Lords declar'd upon Oath, that he had no more Persons to accuse in relation to England; and yet, afterwards, expressly accus'd the Queen, as before-mention'd; as also, in super-inducing the Circumstance of his Lordship's having receiv'd a Commission from Fenwick, after he had so often affirm'd upon Oath, both at the Council-Board and Lords-Bar, that he had given in a full and entire Account of all he knew, which, with respect to the Prisoner, consisted in the Letters that he had seen, sign'd Stafford: And his Lordship further inferr'd, that a Man who, for three Years together had feign'd himself to be a Roman Catholic; and who had solemnly renounced one Religion, and embraced another, in order to be a Witness against the Professors of it; was so far from being worthy of Credit in a Court of Justice, that he did not so much as deserve the Name of a Christian.

And, 3dly, as to Turberville, his Lordship prov'd, that he had to two several Persons, with Oaths and Execrations, deny'd, That he knew any thing of a Plot, either directly or indirectly, either against the King's sacred Person, or for the Subversion of the Government: And both his Lordship's Gentleman and Page; who constantly waited upon him, attest'd, that they never once saw Turberville at their Master's Lodgings; and that he never had the Gout. His Lordship, also, charg'd him with Perjury, in the following Instance: That in the Information he deliver'd upon Oath to the House of Commons, he depos'd, That he went to live with Lord Powel in the Year 73, and that he came into England in the Year 76, but that the next Day he alter'd both these Dates, the first to 72, the second to 75. 2. That in the said Information, he peremptorily swore, That the Prisoner came over from France in Company with Count Grammont by way of Calais; whereas, as his Lordship prov'd, he did not leave France till about a Month after Count Grammont; and that he then came by way of Dieppe. 3. That in the said Information he also swore, That the Earl of Castlemain was several times present at certain traitorous Consults at Poyais Castle, in the Years 72, and 73; whereas, the contrary was prov'd by Notes out of the Journal Book of Mr. Lidcut, a Protestant, who had liv'd with the said Earl nine Years.

Year

The Trial is almost immeasurably long, and yet in the whole Course of it we find this ancient Nobleman defending himself against all the Art of all the able Managers for the Commons (and, perhaps, as to Matters of Fact, and certainly as to Matters of Law, they were the ablest that ever appear'd on the like Occasion) with more Spirit, Sense, Presence of Mind, and Firmness of Resolution, than it was before imagin'd that he was Master of. Sometimes, indeed, he was fretted into Peevishness, sometimes provok'd into (2) Anger: Once, recollecting his Lady and Children, he melted into Tears; as also when his Sentence was pronounc'd: And more than once the Noises and Shouts of the People threw him into some Confusion; nevertheless, on the fifth Day, notwithstanding all the Fatigues and Mortifications he had undergone, he so far got the better of them all, as to be able to sum up the whole Cause, as to Fact and Argument; which he did, after the Manner, and to the Purpose following:

First, He pleaded his Age, his want of Endowments, his exhausted Spirits and Strength in his long Trial: In Consideration of which, he hop'd their Lordships (who were both his Judges and Council) would pardon the many Defects he must needs commit in summing up his Defence. Then he recapitulated the whole Evidence, as well as his weak Memory and discomposed Condition would permit. He reminded their Lordships of the several Points wherein he had prov'd the Witnesses forsworn. He recounted their Sayings and Unsayings to the same Things. The various Contradictions, the moral Impossibilities and Absurdities as to divers (tho' before-hand studied) Parts of their Evidence: Inferring from hence, That he who will forswear himself in one thing, is not to be credited in any. He insisted upon the Infamy of the Witnesses, and Wickedness of their Lives, especially the more than atheistical Sacrilege of some of them, acknowledged in open Court. He inculcated their former Beggary, compar'd to the present Encouragement, Careless, and Alurements of Gain, and Applause, they find in their new Employment. He alledged their Subornation of others, to make good their Forgeries, their false Oaths without any corroborating Circumstances, but what depended on the same Oath; concluding, that such as will swear Lies, will never stick at swearing of false Circumstances, to solder those Lies together.

And having thus summed up his Defence, as well as a weak, old Man, harass'd and spent with five Days Pleading; and, as he said, depriv'd of Sleep, could do on a sudden, he cast himself into their Lordships's Hands, desiring them to remember how faithfully he had served the King in the late Wars; how much himself, his Wife, and Family had suffered on that Account; how easily he might have prevented those Miseries, if he would, as others did; have turn'd a Rebel; and consequently, how unlikely it was, that he should now in his old Age, and settled, contented State, be guilty of so horrid a Crime, proved only against him by the incredible Stories of three infamous Men.

Then he proceeded to propose certain Points or Doubts in Law, which occurred in his Case, concerning the Manner of his Impeachment; the Continuance of it from Parliament to Parliament; whether the Indictment contain'd an Overt Act, necessary to a Conviction of Treason? Whether Men, who swear for Money, ought to be credited, or admitted for Witnesses? Whether the Plot, being supposed a Plot of the Papists, was as yet legally proved so? Lastly, Whether there being but one particular Witness to any one particular Point, such an Evidence be sufficient in Law.

Sir William Jones, prodigiously to the Honour of his Abilities, but not at all to his Virtues, summ'd up (b) the whole Evidence with such amazing Art and Address, that all the Pity which the unfortunate Prisoner had before excited, was for a while turn'd into Indignation against him; and instead of appearing as he had hitherto done, an innocent, ensheathed, persecuted, reverend old Noble, he stood array'd in all the Colours of a bold, deluging, desperate, ignominious Malefactor. But while they yet dazzled the Eye, they faded away; and Relentment once again gave place to Commiseration.

As to the Points of Law started by his Lordship, at least, that which seem'd to be of the highest Importance, viz. Whether the Law requir'd two Witnesses to every Overt Act; the Lords call'd upon the Judges for their over-ruled.

(a) In the Course of the Evidence, Sir William Jones having said, Oh! I desire that may be allow'd; the Prisoner broke out in these Exclamations, "Oh! Oh! will not condemn me, for Law and Justice. I am not to be run down with Oh! Oh! or what such impudent Villains as these say." Trial, p. 116. And again, Mr. Baron Ashurst, in giving his Opinion on a Point of Law, having urg'd, to enforce it, "That the Evidence of one Witness to one Overt Act ought to be deem'd sufficient in his Lordship's Case; because if it were not, it would prove, that those Persons who had already suffer'd had suffer'd illegally; his Lordship passionately exclaim'd against it, saying, I am sorry to hear a Judge say any such thing: And tho' I am in such a weak and debarr'd Condition, I assure your Lordships, that my Blood rises at it." Ibid. p. 137.

(b) He was assist'd also by Mr. Poulter and Sir Francis Wilmot.

A. D. 1686. their Opinions. Ten of them attended, and all ten in open Court gave it against the Prisoner; the Lord Chief Justice North, in the Absence of Serjeys, leading the way, by declaring, "That if there be several Overt-Acts, which are Evidences of the same Treason, if there be one Witness to prove one such Overt-Act, at one time, and another Witness to prove another Overt-Act at another time; both the Acts, being Evidences of the same Measure, there are two sufficient Witnesses of that Treason, and will maintain an Indictment or Impeachment."

He is found guilty.

All his Lordship's other Objections were also over-ru'd (on the Debate of the House, not by the Decision of the Court) on the 6th Day of his Trial; and on the 7th, the Commons attending in their Places, but the Prisoner absent according to common Usage, the Suffrages of the Peers were taken by the Lord High Steward; who upon calling up the Numbers under the several Heads of guilty and not guilty, pronounc'd, that the last were (i) thirty-one, and the first, fifty-five. The Lieutenant of the Tower was then summon'd by Proclamation; to bring his Prisoner into Court; which being done accordingly, his Lordship was made acquainted with the fatal News, by the Lord High Steward, and express'd his Resignation by saying, God shalby Name be prais'd! And being ask'd what he had to say, why Judgment of Death should not be pronounc'd against him? after signifying some Surprise at what he had heard, as being what he did not expect to hear, he submitted two Points to their Lordships Consideration, viz. Whether his Trial was not defective in point of Form, since he had not been call'd upon to hold up his Hand at the Bar. 2. Whether by the last Proviso in the Act of the 13th of the King (Charles II.) tho' he was try'd on that of the 25th of Edward III. the Extent of his Punishment, as a Peer, was not to be the Loss of his Seat in Parliament?

Not to dwell on Matters of Form, the Lords withdrew to debate these Queries; and being reunit'd, the Lord High Steward declar'd the Sense of the House to be, That neither the Omission of the Ceremonial of holding up the Hand; nor the Proviso his Lordship had refer'd to, authoriz'd any Conclusion in his Favour. After which he proceeded to close the melancholy Scene, by saying several things to justify the Reality of the Plot, as also to manifest his Lordship's particular Concern in it; and then pronouncing Sentence after the usual Forms, which was, however, qualify'd by a Signification, "That the Lords would be humble Suitors to the King, that he would remit all the Sentence pronounced on him by the Lord High Steward.

Punishment but the taking off his Head."— Here the unfortunate Prisoner could not restrain his Tears, but withal intimated, That they show'd in Acknowledgment of their Lordships Goodness, not from a Sense of what he was to suffer. The Lords did accordingly intercede with his Majesty for this Remission; which they obtain'd; and a Writ was issued under the Great Seal for his Execution on Tower-Hill, by the cutting off his Head. But even this Grain of Mercy was thought too much; and the Sheriffs not only started their Doubts, whether the King had Authority to alter the Sentence of the Lords, but apply'd to both Houses, by Petition, for a Solution. That of the Lords contain'd also a sort of Reprimand. "Their Serjeants, said the Sheriffs, were found by this House to be unnecessary; and this House doth declare, That the King's Writ ought to be void." But the Commons resolv'd in these remarkable Words, "That this House is content, that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex do execute William, late Viscount Stafford, by severing his Head from his Body ONLY."

Scraps of the Sheriff's relating to his Execution.

There is yet another Circumstance in this Nobleman's Story, which, for many Reasons, deserves a Place in our Annals before we wait on him to the Scaffold: It was this: While he lay under Sentence, being daily urg'd by his Friends and Relations to make Discoveries of all he knew; as the only remaining way to save his Life to, regain the King's Favour, and merit the Acknowledgments of the whole Nation; his constant Reply was, That he was most willing and ready, out of a mere Sense of Duty and Conscience, independent of any temporal Advantage to himself, to discover, with all imaginable Sincerity, the utmost of what he knew, either to the King or House of Lords, whenever they requir'd it. The Lords being inform'd hereof, order'd his Appearance before them; and his Acknowledgments were to this effect, "That he thought it no Crime in any Man to wish his Neighbour might be of the same Religion wherein he himself hop'd to be sav'd; nay, to seek and promote it by such Ways and Means, as the Laws of God and the Nation allow. That there had been at divers Times, and on sundry Occasions, Endeavours used, and Overtures made, to obtain an Abrogation, or at least a Mitigation, of Severities against Catholics; but this to be procur'd no otherwise than by legal and parliamentary Means. That he himself went to Breda, whilst the King was there, and propounded 100,000*l.* in behalf of the Catholics, to take off the penal Laws. That after the King came in, there

His Confession to the Lords.

(1) These were the Lords Bales, Arundel of Teerick, Holt, Weston, Lucas, Ward, Byss, Hatton, Delacour, Norry, Wroth, Ferris, Morley, and Mordaunt; the Earls of Berkeley, Halifax, Torrington, Ashburnham, Leveson, Bath, Clarendon, St. Albans, Thames, Clarendon, Courtenay, Ferrers, Dorset, Rutland, and Lord Chamberlain, Arundel; the Marquis of Worcester; and the Duke of Newcastle. And those of the other List were, the Lords Crew, Cornwallis, Rushdown, Ashley, Long, Herbert of Cheshire, Howard of Effingham, Maynard, Lovelace, Grey of War, Brak, Chester, North and Grey, Foxe, Wharton, Essex, Cromwell, Cowley; the Viscounts Newport, Falkenberg; the Earls of Cowart, Macclesfield, Suffolk, Gainsford, Shaftsbury, Harrington, Cosby, Essex, Southampton, Winterton, Stanhope, Rivers, Malpas, Northampton, Manchester, Wyndham, Carew, Bristol, Northampton, Leitch, Bridgewater, Salisbury, Suffolk, Bedford, Hastings, Kent, Oxford; the Duke of Monmouth, Albemarle, and Buckingham; the Lord Privy Seal, Lord President, the Lord High Steward, and Prince Rupert.

there was a Bill brought into the House, in favour of Catholics, but it was oppos'd by my Lord Chancellor Hyde. That there had likewise been fram'd by the Lord Briſtol and others (in order to the proposing of them in Parliament) several Forms of Oaths contain'd in such Terms as might fully expreſs all Duty and Allegiance to the King, yet not entangle tender Conſciences with Clauses and Proviſoes, diſagreeable to Faith, and no wife appertaining to Loyalty; but neither did this ſucceed. That afterwards he had offer'd ſome Propoſals, as well to the Lord Chancellor at his Houſe at Kenſington, as to the Duke of York, concerning ſome lawful Expedients, conducing to the Good, as he thought, both of Catholics and the whole Nation. And alſo about diſſolving the long Parliament; the Subſtance of which he likewiſe communicated to my Lord Shaſtbury; who ſaid, He doubted not, but that there would come great Advantages to the King by it. Theſe he avouch'd were the chief, and only Deſigns he ever had or knew of amongſt Catholics, for promoting their Religion. Of more than theſe he proteſted before Almighty God and their Lordſhips, he was wholly ignorant. But this Declaration not being ſatisfactory towards the detecting any damnable Conſpiracy, the Lords thought fit, without any further Examination, to remand him back to the Tower (K).

All Hope and Expectation, on both Sides, being thus at an End, nothing remain'd but for one to ſuffe, and the other to ſuffer the Law. On the 19th his Lordſhip had Notice given him to prepare for his Death on the 20th following, which he receiv'd as a Philoſopher would, and as a Chriſtian ſhould, not only with Compoſure, but Elevation. And in this Frame of Mind he continu'd to the laſt. On the Morning of his Execution he even expreſs'd ſome Impatience for the Arrival of the Lieutenant; and being adviſ'd to put on a Cloak to defend himſelf from the Rigour of the Weather, he did ſo; for, ſaid he, I perhaps may ſhake with Cold, but I truſt in God, not for Fear. Thro' the Prevalence of a ſavage Curioſity, thouſands of Perſons were aſſembled on the Hill, to be the Spectators of that Day's Sacrifice; and among them all, no Face was to be ſeen ſo ſerene or cheerful as that of the Victim; not a Feature, not a Muſcle, not a Line, not a Glance witness'd the leaſt Perturbation or Diſmay. He walk'd to the Scaffold by the Side of the Lieutenant, who, being indiſpos'd of the Gout, was carry'd in a Chair; and, when upon it, finding the People were all Attention to what he ſhould deliver, made his laſt Speech, with ſuch an Air, and in ſuch a Manner, as commanded the Eſteem and Admiration, as well as the Compaſſion of thoſe that heard him. He began with proteſting, upon his Salvation, in the Preſence of the Eternal, Omnipotent, and All-knowing God, that he was innocent as it was poſſible for any Man to be, even to a Thought, of the Crimes laid to his Charge. He renounc'd and declar'd his Detestation of that Doctrine, that heretical Princes might be depos'd and murder'd by their Subjects. He diſavow'd all Inſubordination, Diſpenſations and Pardons to murder, rebel, lye, forſwear, &c. And declar'd he did ſo, without any Equivocation or Reſervation whatſoever. He ſaid he had good Grounds to believe, that tho' he was the laſt of the Lords impeach'd, he had been the firſt proceeded againſt, on the Belief, that to ſave his Life, he would make ſome great Diſcovery; and that he would have done ſo, if it had been in his Power: But, added he, had I a thouſand Lives, I would loſe them all, rather than falſely accuſe either myſelf or any other whatſoever. He pray'd for the King: He declar'd it to be illegal to liſt up a Hand againſt him or his legal Authority. He declar'd, that on the Preſervation of the Conſtitution of this Kingdom depended the Preſervation of its Peace. He proteſt'd his Abhorrence of Murder next to Treason; and that neither to ſave his own Life, nor to make himſelf as great as he could wiſh, nor to eſtablish what Religion or Government he thought beſt or ſhould affect moſt, he would not, by any way, be the Death even of one of thoſe Fellows, who by their Perjuries had been the Cauſe of his. He then begg'd Forgiveneſs of God and Man; declar'd he forgave all Men without Exception: After which he proceeded in theſe remarkable Words: "I do now, upon my Death and Salvation, ſwear, That I never ſpoke one Word either to Oates or Torber-ville, nor to my Knowledge, ever ſaw them till my Trial. And for Dugdale, I never ſpoke to him of any thing, but about a Foot-Boy, or Foot-Man or Foot-Race, and never was then alone with him. All the Punishment I wiſh them, is, that they may repent, and acknowledge the Wrong that they have done me; then it will appear how innocent I am. God forgive them! I have a great Confidence that it will pleaſe Almighty God, and that he will, in a ſhort time, bring Truth to light: Then you and all the World will ſee and know what Injury they have done me." The reſt of his Speech conſiſted of a Strain of Chriſtian Devotion and Chriſtian Charity; and for a Cloſe had the following fervent Expreſſions: "I beſeech God not to revenge my innocent Blood upon the Nation, nor on thoſe who were the Cauſe of it, with my laſt Breath. I do, with my laſt Breath, truly aſſert my Innocency; and hope the Omnipotent, All-ſeeing, Juſt God, will deal with me accordingly."

Several written Copies of this Speech he deliver'd

"On this Occaſion, there run about both Town and Country an univerſal Rumour, That the Lord Shaſtbury had now made a full and perfect Diſcovery of the whole Plot; and that the Purſuits could not for the future have the Impu-gence to deny it, after the Confeſſion (tho' to ſave his Life) of to be ſervant to a Papiſt. But this proſtrated Miſtake; And by the way, it was very observable, my Lord's Adventure, took this falſe Alarm with ſo much Eagerneſs and Joy, as Juſtly deſerv'd they were not well ſuſpected of the Truth of the former Evidence given againſt him."

delivered to the Sheriffs, and others near him; and one, written with his own Hand, he sent to the King: He then knelt down, and continu'd for some time at his Devotions: After which, he again address'd himself to the People, to the same Purpose as before; and had the Satisfaction to find, that he touch'd his Hearers to the Quick; most of them either pulling off their Hats, and bowing to him, in testimony of their Assent to what he said; or, by distinct Exclamations, answering, We believe you, my Lord! God bless you, my Lord! &c. When he fitted himself to the Block, it was observ'd, that his Countenance underwent no Change, nor did any Joint of his Body tremble. It was also observ'd, that the very Headman was struck with Remorse, for, having twice lifted up his Ax, as if to strike the fatal Blow; he twice desist'd, and the second time, sighing: And when, at last, he had made a shift to perform his dreadful Office, and expos'd the bleeding Head at the four Corners of the Scaffold, with the usual warning Cry, This is the Head of a Traitor! no Acclamations follow'd, all was melancholy Silence; and, in that Pause of severe and solemn Reflection, all the Virtues of the humane Mind had ample Exercise.

Maxims on which he was condemn'd.

Trial, p. 199.

As it was a surprize to this noble Lord himself, for it was to many others, that his Peers should find him Guilty. According to Mr. North, it was talk'd abroad, that certain Opinions then prevail'd, which wanted Time to be digested, and better understood, or else that Sentence had not prevail'd, one was, That the House of Commons must not be baffled: In which case, it was an obvious Conclusion, that a Trial was a mere Matter of Form, that the Accus'd acted virtually the Part of the Judge, and that the Lords were only Delegates for the Commons. Another reigning Opinion was, That the Peers, in judging, were not free; they must determine secundum allegata & probata: Of which Opinion, daring his Trial at least, was Lord Stafford himself: Whence it was concluded, that there being positive Oath, as to the material Facts, they were to be directed by it: Whereas it is the Office of the Triers of the Fact, to try the Testimony also, and the very Credibility of the Witnesses. And as to the noted Plot-drivers in the House of Lords, the Prisoner had in Equity a much better Title to except to them as Judges, than a Commoner indicted capitally, has to except to a certain Number of Jurors, without Cause shown, and to as many more besides, as he can prove are under any such Influence as may ever so remotely affect the Rectitude of their Proceedings.

Remarkable in the Division of the King.

Some Things are also remarkable in the Division of the House: Four of his Lordship's own Family, viz. the Lord Howard of Esherick, and the Earls of Carlisle, Berkshire, and Suffolk, condemn'd him: And, on the other hand, he was absolv'd by the Lords Lucas and Helke, who were eminent for their Zeal against Popery. Even the very Ministry divid'd upon this Point, as they had before done, on the Exclusion: The Earls of Halifax and Arlington took the merciful Side of the Question, and were follow'd by all the Lords of the Duke's Party: But the Earl of Sunderland was for the Edge of the Ax, and was countenanced by the Duke of Lauderdale as Lord Guilford, the Lord Privy-Seal Anglesey, the Lord President Radnor, and even the Lord High-Steward Nottingham, who, moreover, declar'd his Faith in the Plot, in the strongest Terms he could use.

And that the King should not exert the most amiable Privilege of his Prerogative, in favour of this unfortunate Lord, is so much the more to be wonder'd at, since Sir John Reresby attests, that in the very Month before he was executed, he was present at the Duchies of Portsmouth's, when his Majesty, lying aside all Reserve, took occasion to discourse of the Plot, and the Witnesses on whose Credit it rely'd; and prov'd to a Demonstration, that many Articles they had given in Evidence were not only improbable, but impossible.

P. 103.

Plots are, indeed, such mysterious things, have been so often forg'd, and so often produc'd such a Variety of Mischiefs, that Infidelity, in such Cases, is almost the only Sign of Grace: A Man may be allow'd to exercise his Forecast in the midst of Security, and to take the necessary Precautions on the first Appearance of Danger, tho' the Cloud be never so remote, and to human Sight no bigger than a Man's Hand; But as, on the one Side, to adopt Fears and Fancies as incontestable Facts is the Extreme of Weakness; so, on the other, to graft deliberate Falshoods on the Fancies and Fears of others, with a Design to make Credulity the Tool of Knavery, and to gratify every bad Passion at the Expence of every thing holy and righteous, is the Extreme of Wickedness.

Some general Reflections on the Plot.

That the Traces both of this Wickedness, and this Weakness, may be found on the very Surface, thro' the whole Course of the complicated Affair which we are now approaching to the Close of, will scarce admit of Contest: But then it is also incontestable, that neither could the Crafty have impos'd, nor would the Credulous have so believ'd, if the Completion of the Times had not help'd to create and aggravate the Prejudices of the one, and to countenance the Artifices of the other. Some few supplemental Thoughts, and Circumstances, may probably render these several Truths as apparent as Sunshine.

And first, as to the Completion of the Times. The King had no legitimate Issue, was abandon'd to his Pleasures, had given Proofs that he was no Enemy to Popery, had not only favour'd all the ambitious Views of France, but had actually enter'd into a Concert with her to lop off a Limb of the Protestant Interest, by the Ruin of the States-General, had discovered a very strong Inclination to lay aside the Use of Parliaments, the very Moment that they hesitated to feed his Extravagancies, and to govern by Will and Pleasure; and in his most relenting Fits, seem'd to have it more at Heart to amuse than to satisfy his People. Again, his Brother, the Duke, was a known Papist, and of a Temper which created more Fear than Love; appear'd to have a remarkable Ascendancy over his Majesty, and made as remarkable a Use of it, as we have seen in the Disposition of Power, the Management of Parliaments, and the Maintenance of the Succession. Both the Brothers had marry'd Roman Catholics, and by their respective Marriage Contracts the Romish Religion was to be openly celebrated in the Royal Palaces of England, where the Queen and Duchefs resided. This gave Protection to their Family-Priests, and afforded Pretences for whole Swarms of them to frequent the Metropoles, and disperse themselves all over the Kingdom, where they were indefatigable in the great Work of Conversion; which they carry'd on so openly and successfully, and with such seeming Assurance of Countenance as well as Indemnity, that those of the establish'd Church, as most concern'd in the Issue, were the first to take the Alarm; to give Utterance to their Fears, and to put the Nation on their Guard against the impending Danger.

And yet all the Danger was not apparent; for, over and above what was visible at Court, and the Practices perpetually try'd upon the People, the Duke's principal Engineer, Coleman, and all his other Emisseries were in the mean while at work Under-ground; and the Courts of Rome and Paris were perpetually ply'd with Remonstrances, setting forth how favourable the Crisis was to root out the pestilent Northern Heresy, and how much it import'd them to aid and assist in improving it to the utmost.

Nor was even this all; the Jesuits had taken Possession of the Souls had canton'd out the Kingdom amongst them; had their regular Correspondences with all the rest of the Brotherhood all over Europe, had their Headquarters and Commander in Chief in Rome; under whose Authority, and by whose Direction, they proceeded in all things; had their stated Times and Places of Rendezvous; and in particular, held their general Assembly, agreeable to the Summons, in the Letter produc'd at Harcourt's Trial, on the very same Day in April, mention'd by Oates, under the Duke's own Roof, as hath been already notic'd, on the Credit of Sir John Reresby. From all which it may be fairly concluded, that Measures were actually taking in Favour of Popery, and to give such a Turn to all our Councils, as might render them most servicable to that great End. Mr. Norby, indeed, is express, that all these Efforts of theirs had no other Center; than to obtain a Toleration of all dissenting Sects, and thereby to destroy the establish'd Church. But if they had Recourse to a Toleration as the Means, it is acknowledg'd even by him that it was not the End; and having attain'd the first Round of the Ladder, it may be presum'd they would never have rested till they had also attain'd the last. Besides, that the Duchefs made a Voyage to Holland soon after Oates had made his Discoveries, cannot be deny'd, and no tolerable Reason can be assign'd for it, but the covering the Retreat of those Priests and Jesuits who were deepest in the Secret, and consequently were most liable to the Laws: And of these it is affirm'd, in one of the Trials of the Plotters, that Oates; so often mention'd in Dugdale's Evidence, was one: Nor can it be conceiv'd why a Secretary of State should order the Mayor of Dover to arrest and detain Norris, together with his Companion, unless it was apprehended, that there was still something material to be made known.

Upon the Whole, then, it must be allow'd, that the People had Reason for their Fears; and, consequently, that it was high Time to provide for their Security. But then it must be allow'd also, that the Merit of Oates's Discoveries consisted more in the timing of them, than the Items they were compos'd of; more in the accidental Light they gave, than the Knowledge they were founded upon: He fir'd the Beacon, 'tis true, and cry'd out, The Enemy! But disgrac'd his own Intelligence, by a Detail of such things as had little or no Agreement with the Truth. He likewise gave the Hint of Coleman's Correspondence, to the Privy-Council, which occasion'd the seizing his Papers; but he neither knew of what Nature it was, nor did the Designs carry'd on by Coleman, and those he undertook to reveal, hold any Relation to, or any way tally with, each other. That there was a secret Intercourse of some kind or another among the Jesuits, relating to England, by his Residence with them he had an Opportunity to know; as also the Names of many, or most, of those thro' whose Hands it pass'd: But as to the particular Points upon which it turn'd, it is apparent he was an utter Stranger to them, or else he had never fix'd the Place of Consult at the White-Horse in the Strand, when in truth it was held at St. James's.

But there were Persons ready, it seems, to adopt his Intelligence, imperfect, chimerical, or fictitious, as it was, and to make use of it as a Firebrand, to light up such a Flame of Dissention, as had like to have laid waste the Kingdom: And of these, according to the Distinction already made, some were weak, and some were wicked. The Weak were those who thought Popery the great Mischief that comprehended all others; who mistook Prejudice for Conviction, Credulity for Candour, and Rigour for Righteousness: These, however, meant well, tho' they acted ill; and, while doing the Drudgery of a Party, persuaded themselves they were saving the Nation. The Wicked were the Master-Politicians of the Times; who considered Things not as they were good or ill in themselves, but as they were ill or good with respect to their own immediate Views: Now the Plot, whether true or false, was form'd of the happiest Ingredients imaginable to advance their Interest; for, if the King's Life was thought to be in danger from the Designs of the Papists, nothing could be more meritorious than to persecute the one, in order to preserve the other. It was against Nature, for his Majesty to discountenance those those who were zealous for his Safety; and it was against Law to punish them. If he fell roundly in with them, under the broad Umbrae that the Belief of so horrid a Conspiracy afforded, Popery was sure to fall at their Feet, like Dagon before the Ark of God: As a powerful Inducement, they were, moreover, ready to promote a favourite Son into the Place of a too formidable Brother. And if he stood aloof, affected to be incredulous, and took upon him to detect and expose the Forgery, it was only enlarging the Drama, and introducing him as a new Personage in the Plot; and the same Reasons that conduc'd against the Heir, would have rais'd as violent a Spirit against the Possessor.

From this extraordinary Connection between the Plot and the Purposes of the Party who press'd it into their Service, some Persons have been dispos'd to think, that the Papists were no otherwise concern'd than as Sufferers in it; and that those who were so dextrous in the Application, were only in the Secret of the Contrivance. In particular, Mr. North, in one Place, is certain, that Tonge was Oates's Pilot, but very uncertain, who gave the Word of Command to Tonge. He takes care, however, to introduce one Smith, a Barrister at Law, find'd for standing Practice in Causes of Forgery, as Oates's learn'd Council in the Plot, for so it seems he was call'd; saying, of him, moreover, That he understood the Statute of Treasons, and knew to an Hair, what would come up to an Overt-Act, and what not. And in another Place, treating of Lord Shaftsbury, tho' he acknowledges, that he found nothing of his Lordship's Midwifery in bringing forth that Discovery, he insinuates, notwithstanding, that he was behind the Curtain, and in the Depth of the Contrivance; is positive, that after the Throws were over, he became the Dry-nurse, and took the Charge of the monstrous Birth, till it could stilt for itself. This he farther explains, by saying in express Terms, That after the Parliament came to be possess'd of the Matter, the Management was visibly his, or what was much the same thing, he was the first Mover of the Machine, and took upon him the Direction of all its Powers. He also justifies his Opinion, That this Lord was in the Depths of the Contrivance, by asserting, That he was too cunning ever to work in a Wheel of which the active Principle was not perfectly understood, if not entirely commanded by him: And yet farther by the following remarkable Passage: "A certain Lord of his Confidence in Parliament, once ask'd him, What he intended to do with the Plot, which was so full of Non-sense as would scarce go down with Tantamount Idiots? what then could he propose by pressing the Belief of it upon Men of Common Sense, and especially in Parliament? It's no matter for that, said he, the more nonsensical the better: If we cannot bring them to swallow worse Nonsense than that, we shall never do any good with them. This, continues Mr. North, was a true political Thought: For when the Design is to drive Men upon Changes that are to terminate in their own Confusion and Perdition, it is not to be attempted without an extreme Insanity of Mind, or Insatiation in the generality of the People, by way of Populatum, to be well establish'd by previous Experiments upon them."

But to leave these Conjectures and Refinements, and return to Facts; Godfrey was no sooner missing, than a Report was officiously circulated the Kingdom over, that he was murder'd by the Papists: And the whole Party taught as with one Voice, that the Truth of the Plot was demonstrated by the Murder: Whereas no one Circumstance has hitherto appear'd to warrant any such Conclusion; and no sort of Argumentation, whatever, can be made use of to shew, that because Godfrey was murder'd, he was therefore murder'd by the Papists. France and Belgium's Stories are irreconcilable. All the several Scenes said to have been acted at Somerfet House, are liable to unanswerable Objections. The Papists had no Interest to serve by removing him out of the way; neither could those foreboding Expressions of his to Mr. Robinson the Prothonotary, and (1) others; such as, I shall have no Thanks for my Pains; I shall be the first Martyr, &c. have any Reference to his Apprehensions from that Quarter: For he was apparently upon good Terms with them, and had acted rather partially in their favour, than zealously against them. This appears by his acquainting Coleman with Oates's Discoveries, that he might acquaint the Duke. And it further appears that in Consequence of this Piece of Friendship, he was sent for by Lord Darby, who menac'd him on that Account. From all which it is obvious that the Papists were charg'd with the Guilt of this Murder, not so much because there was Matter of Evidence against them, as because it answer'd the Party-Views of those Times, to render them as black and odious as possible.

There are those who carry their Conclusions from these Premises a great way farther. Mr. North, among the rest, is pleas'd to say, "That, considering how Godfrey was circum-

(1) One Mr. Wymot depos'd upon Oath, as follows:

"That going towards Mr. Casham's in Countess at Law with Sir B. G. Godfrey, about the Time of the Lords Commitment to the Tower; the Informant was telling Sir Edmond, that the said Lords could not be such Fools as to think of such a thing; or, What Power had the Pope in such or such a Case; Sir Edmond replying, No, he has none; The Lord says at present as you or I; Casham will die, but not the Lords. To which the Informant said, If so, where are we then? Sir Edmond replying, Oates's is a snare, and is perjur'd. This Informant bid him then speak the Truth, and tell the Meaning as it. Why says Sir Edmond Countess about a Toleration; nothing against the King; but there is a Design upon the Duke of York; and this will come to a Dispute among them. You may live to see an End on't, but I shall not.

Mr. Wymot says further; That, upon his seeing Sir E. B. Godfrey sometimes, why he was so melancholy, his Answer has been, That he was Master of a dangerous Secret, that would be fatal to him: That his Security was Oates's Deposition, &c. that he the said Oates had first declar'd it to a public Minister: And truly, That he came to Sir Edmond by his Direction." *Leopold's Brief Hist. fland'd in relation to this Affair, it is easier to conceive he was look'd upon by the Plotters as their Enemy, than that the Papists should chuse him, who had done friendly Offices to the Head of their Interest, to make a Martyr of. Common Sense will not entertain a different Construction; who then should kill Godfrey, the Friends of the Duke, or the Plot? And again, in another Place, he declares, peremptorily, That the Generation, or rather Procreation of the Plot, was the Destruction of poor Godfrey (n). But then Sir Roger L'Estrange, who writes on the same Side, who enlarges on the same (n) Facts, and who publish'd his Book not only in the Reign, but under the immediate Patronage of King James, makes all his Inferences center in this one Point, That he was his own (s) Murderer. Both these Gentlemen cannot be in the Right; but if either is, the Papists are to be reputed innocent; and no Censures can be too severe for those who loaded them with so horrid a Calumny; and who made use of all their Powers and Faculties to put three Innocents to Death, that it might be the more effectually believ'd.

There is still another Scene of Wickedness which ought to be display'd, namely, the Conduct and Practices of the Inquirers (for so the Secret Committee of Lords, Buckingham

Shaftsbury, the Bishop of London, &c. who sat upon Godfrey's Murder, at Wallingford House, most righteously deserve to be call'd, on the Hopes and Fears of the several Persons, who, during the Rage of the Plot, were summon'd before them. All that could be done by Threats or by Promises, by Circumvention, and even in some sort, by Torture, to find or make Evidence, they did; without any Dread of Shame, or Sense of Remorse. To recount all the Particulars would be endless; but some, by way of Instance, are necessary:

As 1. The Case of Ashkin, who was Clerk to Mr. Secretary Pepys, and had been nam'd as an Accessary by Bedloe; This Person on his first Appearance before the Lords, was invit- ed with all the soothing Language imaginable, not only to confess all he knew, but to adopt what he did not, according to Mr. North, with a View, thro' him to reach his Master, Pepys, and thro' Mr. Pepys, the Duke; but, proving intractable, that is to say, resolute, not to forfeit his Integrity for any Consideration whatever, was committed close Prisoner to Nesogate, deny'd Bail, and secluded from all Resort of Company, unless such as were commission'd to ply the Batteries against his Firmness; and to carry Intelligence of their Success: Nor was this all, for, still refusing to learn the Lesson they would

(n) He also fills in his Marginal Index, that the Architects of the Plot, and the Patrons of Oates, were the Authors of the Murder.

(o) As follows:

"Upon taking Tonge's and Oates's Depositions, upon Sept. 28, 1678. (though very unwillingly, as appears over and over again) Sir E. Godfrey reflected upon it, that he had made no formal Discovery of the pretended Treason; and finding now that the Business was come to be public, the Matter being then brought before the Council, he came to be every day more and more sensible of the Danger of that Situation, and not without great Fears, by the by, that he was like to be called to an Account for it: there being near a Month past, from his first Information, Sept. 6, without any regular or effectual Notification of the Matter: And he was the more frighten'd upon it, for the Difficuity that did to the Duke of making a Plot on; for he never believ'd one Word of the story, at least till People at such, where he thought he might safely declare himself. So that the Martyrdom he fear'd was, the being made a Sacrifice to the Faction. He was sufficiently sensible, how readily the Multitude swallow'd this Bait of a Plot; what Labour was us'd to make a Parliament Cause on't; and how heartily dispos'd the Majority, even of that Parliament, were to entertain all colourable Suggestions, under so popular a Pretence. It must be added now, that this terrible Parliament itself was to meet upon the 28th of that October: so that Sir Edward had but a matter of three Weeks time to consider on't. There was an unlucky Circumstance more too, in the King's going to Newcastle upon the second of that October, when the Faction had effectually the Shuffling, Carriage, and Dealing of their own Game; and all things working towards a common Trust. There never was a Conjunction of more critical, and most Accidents toward the Ruin of one poor Justice of Peace, than met upon this single Occasion; adding to all the rest an hereditary, and an insuperable Melancholy to work upon a Melancholy that he complain'd of long before these Depositions came into the World; as is set forth already in the Depositions of Mr. Chard: But upon the whole Matter, however, the last Day of his Life was the 28th of October, the 17th Day from the beginning of the Plot before the King and Council; and the 9th from the Meeting of the Parliament.

This was the Pinch of his Condition: His Cafe lay open to the world of Construction, and he was morally sure that his Enemies would make the most of any Advantage against him. The Man was no Fool; and his Friend, as well as his Enemy, by the by, had been Bedloe; and who knows, if he had liv'd till the Meeting of the Parliament, whether he should not have been brought in as a Party to the Conspiracy, rather than for a bare Mispinion? For his Royal Highness was made the Cause vis a vis one of the Plot itself; and the communicating of their Informations to the Duke of Tork would never have been forgiven him. To conclude, if he had surviv'd, he should, in all likelihood, have suffer'd the same as a Papiſt Francis; whereas, by this intervening Disappointment, he was put off from these several Years, and a Pious Martyr: So that, in truth, the Parliament were the Papists that he fear'd; which agrees with an Information of Mrs. Gibbon, deliver'd upon Oath to a Secretary of State, long before ever I saw the Face of her, as follows:

"Mary the Wife of Captain Thomas Gibbon deposed, That there was a long and particular Intimacy and Friendship betwixt the two Families of Sir Edmund Gibbon and the Informant; and that the said Sir Edmund had frequent Visits at her House in Old St. Andrew's Church, acquainting her many times with things that troubled him; and, for some time before his Death, he came to her, at least, once a Week; and, upon the Tuesday was Saturday, before the Saturday when he never fell away from his House, he came on this Informant's, and desired to speak with her alone, he being then in her Mother's Chamber with her Husband and her Brother (Colony William Raw) her Mother lying at that time upon her Death-bed. He went with Sir Edmund into another Chamber: When being enter'd, the said Sir Edmund bolted the Door, and, appearing to be much troubled, and out of order, ask'd her, if she had not heard that he was to be hang'd; for (says she) all the Town is in an Disorder about me. She then ask'd him, For what? To which he reply'd, That he having taken Oates and Tonge's Examination, a Month ago, and that he had been often at Dinner since as my Lord Chancellor's, and Sir William Justice, yet he had never discover'd the Plot they had sworn to: She ask'd him, What Plot? And he said, That Oates had known himself, and it would come to nothing. Just upon this, Colony Raw call'd the Informant away; and thereupon Sir Edmund went his way; so, saying, he was parting, that he would come to her again the next Day, and would tell her more. Sir Edmund came accordingly; when the Informant, being here bound, told him she would wait upon him immediately; but before she could put on her Hood, and come back, he was gone his Way. He sent to the Informant in the last Week, when he went away, (so the both of her Memory) to come to him; but her Mother being dead, she could not leave her; that the Informant however desired her Daughter to go to him early upon Saturday Morning, and invite him to Dinner; who brought word back, that he was there by Eight, but Pamphill (a Servant of Sir E. Godfrey's) told her he was gone out an Hour before." Lectura. Brief Hist. Part. iii. 185, 186, 187, 328, 329.

(p) In the Title-page of the Trial of Berry, and in the Lectura in Lord Sancho's Collection, the following Sentence remains in his Lordship's own Hand-writing: "Sir Edmund Gibbon, I judge, I judge, was a Party to the Conspiracy. There is also, in the same Page, Part of another Sentence, which seems to charge the Dead on the Roman Catholics: But one half being cut off by the Binder; the Sense remains imperfect.

would have taught him, he was loaded with Irons, and in that Condition brought again before the Lords; and, as before has been mention'd, was finally try'd for his Life; because he had too much Spirit to earn his Deliverance at the Expence of his Honour and Virtue.

2. The Case of Prance, a Man who had neither the Sense nor Courage of Athins, and who underwent much harder Usage: When first apprehended and examin'd he had deny'd all Concern in, or Knowledge of, the Murder; but, soon after, was induc'd by those Practices which fail'd with Athins, to acknowledge both, and to turn Accuser. He says, himself, that, when he was first put into Newgate, and lodg'd in the condemn'd Hole, and left to ruminate on all the Horrors of the Place, Darkness, Solitude, Cold, Hunger, Chains, Nailines, &c. a Person, to him wholly unknown, laid a Paper on a Form near him, and went his way; that a second brought him a Candle, and did the same; and that this Paper contain'd the Substance of the following Minutes: "So many Popish Lords mention'd by Name, fifty thousand Men to be rais'd, Commissions given out, Officers appointed, Treland, (the Man not the Kingdom) acquainted with the Design, an Abstract of Bellin's Evidence; with Suggestions that Prance, himself, was, undoubtedly privy to the Plot; and by way of Use and Application of all, YOU HAD BETTER CONFESS THAN BE HANG'D." This turn'd the Scale; Prance could hold out no longer, but desir'd to be carry'd to Lord Stafford, to whom he confes'd all that was requir'd. Unfortunately, however, his Heart fail'd him before the King and Council, and he deny'd all again; saying, I had all he had before deliver'd was out of the Paper of Instructions, just now spoken of. This expos'd him to worse Treatment than ever. He was again thrown into the condemn'd Hole; and from the End of December to the 10th of January, lay in such miserable Torment both of Body and Mind; that he spent that dreadful Interval in Groans and Lamentings, &c. which being overheard, it was advisable to give out that he was mad; that the Comission they exacted might not do more Mischief to the Cause; that his Testimony could do it Service. For a last Experiment, the Lords of the Comission apply'd to his Majesty for a Pardon for him, which was put into the Hands of Dr. Lloyd, then Dean of Bangor, and afterwards Bishop of St. Asaph, with Directions to shew it him, in order to settle his Doubts; and if he appear'd dispos'd to embrace and defend it, to have his Irons knock'd off, and himself remov'd to better Quarters; which had the desired Effect; and Prance, once more, became (p) a staunch Evidence.

3. The Case of one Corral, a Hackney-Coachman. Biddis had provided a Hackney-Coach to carry off the Body of Godfrey; tho' Prance, afterwards, thought proper to remove it on Horseback; and this Man was unfortunately fix'd upon for the Driver. The Questions put to him by the Lords, according to his own Depositions, were, Whether he carry'd the said Body to Princes Hill; or whether he knew who carry'd him? And his Answers to both were flat Negatives. He was then told he should have 500*l.* if he would swear the Truth, and a Guard to secure

(p) After all which, he again refus'd; and, in a Letter to his Excellency, wrote in his Brief History, set forth the Course of his own Proceedings, as follows:

"From the time of taking off my Irons, and changing my Lodging, which was upon my yielding barely to Leffrange, myself spent those innocent Persons, Brown, Berry, and Hill, that I had upon my wicked Evidence; Mr. Brown was the Man that asked for me a new suit of many things, which I copy'd after him; I found by his Discourse, that he had been several times with my Lord Stafford, and with Bellin; and he told me, that I would be certainly hang'd, and that if I did not agree with Bellin's Evidence, and own the Ferriole, the Men would not be hang'd. I would not yield to it, in he yielded to mine, and the Ferriole was made so, more on; and holding me aside what a Conclusion I should be in, if any of them should come forth. He got me out of Newgate, some few Days after the Trial of Green, &c. But, betwixt any of them were executed, Mr. Brown told me, how much some of St. Edmund's Relations were troubled that I was out to join, for fear I should deny all again; and to Mr. Brown took me to his own House, and watched me, and went with me whatsoever wrong, till that innocent Man were executed. I would not join, but Berry for it; but Mr. Brown laid he was guilty of the Murder, and could not be lov'd; and that if the King had a mind to pardon him he might do it, without my troubling myself.

It was purely the Fear of Death, and the Misery of my Condition, that wrought upon me to forsake myself, without any Thought of Reward; a while I was told several times, that great Things would be done for me. My Lord Stafford told me the only Trade should be better than were it was, and brought some Plate of me himself, Fast afterward was for Getic. This brings to my Mind, that, in the Time while I deny'd the Murder, or my Knowledge of it, I was taken out of Newgate, and carry'd to two eminent Lawyers; where I was oblig'd for departing from my Evidence; one of them wondering much what should make me do so, and speaking to me to this Effect: "You are afraid, perhaps, of being your Trade, that lies mostly among the Popes; or else, perhaps, you did not think yourself damn'd of your Pardon, &c." Which Words were spoken in fact a Way, that I took them for Hints to me, what Benefit I might make upon going off again; and, as I am a Christian, this was it that first put that Excuse into my Head. My Lord Stafford gave me two Guinea's piece, to help off a Man that I had sworn against the dangerous Words against the King; I receiv'd thirty Pounds by his Majesty's Order, and five Pounds of London.

My Accusation of Mr. Eggle, for saying, that the King was a great Heretic; but the Lord Bellin, Arnold, Powis, and Peter, would have a gallant Army for deposing the King; and that they had already given out Commissions to divers Gentlemen, as St. Henry, Bolton, Mr. Tolan, and Mr. Storer, as was suggest'd to me by my first Paper of Instructions, but made much more in drawing up the Information and Narrative.

My Charge, Mr. J., against England, for saying, in the Presence of Fowell and Grove, that there would be shortly fifty thousand Men in Arms; and Fowell laying thereupon, that they should be commanded by the Lords Bellin, Arnold, Powis, and others; a false in every Part of it; And so in the following Article of Green's saying, that the Lords Bellin, Arnold, Powis, and Peter, was to command the intended Army, and had Commissions for that Purpose, I took Hint towards their Accusations from my first Paper of Instructions; and they that shew up the Informations made the rest.

I did fully accuse Le Phaux also, for a Discourse about the Catholics providing Weapons, Vol. 6. and likewise Mr. Brown, that, for speaking of ten thousand Horse to be shortly rais'd for the Catholic Cause. It was all false, likewise, and of my own Contrivance.

I shall now speak to the pretended Murder of St. Edmund's Godfrey, whom I charg'd Gerald, Kelly, Green, Berry, Hill, Leffrange, and Verriote, to be either Authors or Accessories. I am desirous, for my part, I know nothing of such a Conspiracy; neither do I believe there was any such; but that the whole Presence of the Murder, as well for the Persons, as for the Place, was all false.

The Particulars above written are all true, as I hope for Salvation.

cure him against the Releasements of those who had employ'd him; and reply'd, that he had nothing to swear, that he had been employ'd by nobody. The Lords then chang'd their Tone, and ply'd him with Threats; Staffbury, in particular, saying, That the Papists had hir'd him not to confess; that he should die; that he should be roll'd in a Barrel of Nails down a Hill; and in the Afternoon of the same Day (on his being confronted by another Person, who said he saw him whipping his Horses by Tottenhams-Court, and his persisting in the Denial of all) That he should be starv'd to Death. After this he was remanded to Newgate, thrown into the Condemn'd Hole, where he was kept without Victuals from Thursday till Sunday Noon; and for six Weeks and three Days lay under the Pressure of such heavy Irons, that he had great Holes worn in his Legs, which disabled him from driving for eight Weeks after he was discharged; and the Marks of which he carry'd to his Grave.

Nothing can be more affecting than these Influences, and nothing would be more conclusive against this dreadful Committee, if

France had not so often vary'd his Testimony, or Corral had not been prevail'd upon to set forth a Counter Deposition in the Case of Mrs. Celler; in which, after disavowing several of the Particulars, by her too forwardly specify'd, he concludes with saying, That he had been civilly treated during the time of his Imprisonment, by the Keeper and his Servants. But the very Fact of his Imprisonment was in itself a Cruelty; for if there was any Truth in France's Evidence, that the Body was carry'd off on Horseback, this Tellow and his Coach were entirely out of the Question: Besides, the Earl of Clarendon view'd his Ulcers himself, and in Compassion of his Sufferings, gave him Money; and their whole Conduct was of a Piece; as appears by their committing one (g) Bramwell, and one Walters, who first discover'd Godfrey's Body, the former to Newgate, and the latter to the Gatehouse, because they would not discover what GREAT ROMAN CATHOLIC had employ'd them to do so.

Had the Proofs of the Plot, and its Connection with the Murder, been ever so apparent; and had the Character of these Lords-Committees

A. D. 1639.

(g) Whole respective Depositions were as follow:

William Bramwell deposes, That this Informant, together with one John Walters, passing by Princes-hill toward the White-horse, about three or four in the Afternoon of that Thursday, when the Body of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was found, saw a Cane and a Pair of Gloves lying within a Thicket, upon a green Bank near the Ditch. This Informant, and the said Walters, went forward to the White-horse; where, as they were drinking together, speaking of the said Gloves and Stick, and likewise of a Belt lying with them (as this Informant remembers) it was propos'd, and agreed, to go down to the Place, to see whether they were there still. And being come thither, the Master of the White-horse's Flopping to take them up, started back on the sudden, saying, 'Lord bless us! There's a Man murder'd!' This Informant, and the Company, stoop'd a very little; stoop'd without touching the Body, or meddling with the Gloves and Stick that lay by, went away presently to Mr. Brown, who was then Conduable, and upon this Informant's, and the others, Description of the Person to Mr. Brown, he said to this Effect, 'I wish it be not Sir Edmundbury Godfrey'.

And that, in the Way from Princes-hill to Mr. Brown's, this Informant, with his Company, met one Jennings, a Cow-keeper at Chisbury Hall, and told him, that they had found a Man dead in such a Place, naming the Place, and considering what was best to do in it: The said Jennings replying, 'You had best let it alone, and take no further Notice, for fear you should come into Trouble about it; Besides rebuking the said Jennings for talking at that rate; and to they parted from the said Jennings.

And thus likewise, That, about the latter End of October 1678, this Informant, and John Walters above-said, were taken up, and brought before the Lords Committees at Whitehall, where, the Earl of Staffbury being in the Chair, where they were examin'd, and this Informant severely threaten'd by the Earl of Staffbury, and committed to Newgate. And, about ten Days after, this Informant was set free again; where the Lord Staffbury declar'd, That the Informant was set on by some great Roman Catholic to find out the Body of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; and, if any Man ever was hang'd, he should be hang'd, if he did not discover it.

And farther, that after these Minutes of the Lord Staffbury, Major Wilmot took this Informant into a bye Place, and there ask'd this Informant, Why he would not discover what he knew of; for he should have good Rewards, his Life fear'd, &c. Still pressing this Informant, as aforesaid, this Informant telling him, that he had spoke what he knew, already; and that he could say no more, nor would he receive any Man's offer.

And moreover, That this Informant was kept about nine Weeks a Prisoner in Newgate, without suffering any body to come to him; saying only, that this Informant's Wife had an Order from the Duke of Beaufort twice to visit him.

John Walters deposes, that he this Informant, walking with William Bramwell toward the White-horse upon the Day when Justice Godfrey's Body was found, saw a Cane and a Pair of Gloves upon a Bank near Princes-hill about three or four in the Afternoon. And as they were drinking afterwards at the White-horse, speaking of the said Gloves and Stick, they went down to the Place to see if they were there still, the Master of the House going along with them; who being come to the Place, and stooping to take up the Gloves, started back; and cry'd, Lord bless us! there's a Man murder'd. This Informant and Company made very little stay after this, but left things as they found them, and went away to see for a Conduable, and were directed to one Mr. Brown; who, upon describing the Body, said to this Effect, 'I wish it be not Sir Edmundbury Godfrey'.

And that as they were upon the way to get a Conduable, they met one Jennings, and told him of a Body they had found in such a Place, naming the Place, whose Name was, 'I take you for Newington and Princes-hill, do not advise you to say nothing of it, but let friendship be find it out for you may bring yourselves into a great deal of Trouble.' This Informant and the Company blaming Jennings for talking so, and then they parted.

And farther, that about the latter End of October 1678, this Informant was taken up by one that belonged to the Duke of Beaufort, as he told his Informant, and carried to the Lords Committees at Whitehall, the Day that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Body was buried. The late Earl of Staffbury being in the Chair, and Vices Count appointed to see if he knew this Informant; the said Earl threatening this Informant very severely; and this Informant was committed thereupon to the Gatehouse, where he was fetter'd and handcuff'd, and kept in the Dungeon for three Days and three Nights.

Fifty about eight or ten Days after his Commitment, this Informant was sent for again to the Lords Committees, when the said Lord Staffbury took this Informant aside into a bye Place, speaking to him to this Effect, 'Honor me the Smith, thou look'st like an honest Fellow, thou dost know my Horse, and I'll make a Man of thee.' Saying further, 'Tell me who assur'd this Man, and who bid thee to find it out? What Papist dost thou work for?' And so the said Earl went on, pressing this Informant to the same Effect; this Informant making Answer, 'My Lord, if I know your self had murder'd him, I would discover it, though I dy'd for it.' This Informant telling the said Earl, as well as he could remember, he went Chisbury he brought; after which, the Informant was deliver'd up to the Keeper, but presently call'd back and discover'd.

Mrs. Giffon, the Person who gave the Information before-quoted to Mr. Jennings also deposed, That the Lord Staffbury call'd to her, saying, You damn'd Woman, what devilish Paper is this you have given us in? putting her upon her Oath to declare who wrote it, calling her Stitch and other vile Names, and threatening her, that if she would not confess, that Sir John Bampfylde, Mr. Poyne, and Master de Poy let her on to write that Paper, she should be torn to Pieces by the Multitude; threatening her to have her worry'd by the Dogs, worry Cats, inasmuch that she fell into Fits upon it, and thought she should never have got home.

Committees been ever so clear and unexceptionable, such violent and unjust Proceedings as these would have admitted no Excuse or Palliation; But if, on the contrary, under plausible and popular Practices, they sought only the Gratification of their own Passions and Interests, if there was neither visibly nor probably any Connection between the Murder and the Plot; and if the Plot, itself, as it was set forth by Oates, was, in the gross, a self-evident Forgery, it must ever bring a Horror over the Mind, as often as it is recollected, that Law and Liberty, Justice and Mercy, were thus audaciously trampled under Foot by those who affected to be so zealous for their Preservation.

And that it was a Forgery, Numbers of Authors, both Protestants and Papists, make no Scruple to affirm; as also, that, such as it was, it was wholly unsupported either by credible Witnesses, or probable Circumstances; both of which are absolutely necessary to enforce Conviction, and authorize Punishment. That as to the Credibility of the Witnesses, how notoriously infamous they were for all sorts of Felonies, Forgeries, Cheats, Debaucheries and Wickednesses, not only the Records gave public Testimony, but they themselves, in open Court, were frequently forc'd to acknowledge: And that as to Probability of Circumstances, there was not the least Shadow of it: In support of which Assertions, they assign the following Reasons: viz. That the Papists, though they wish'd for a Toleration, were yet content with the Indulgence, which, under the King, they had all along enjoy'd: That it would have been Madness in this their quiet Condition to trouble the Waters they were to drink of, and to rush thro' Difficulties and Dangers in Pursuit of an uncertain Liberty, which might have eluded their Grasp, and instead of an Establishment, expos'd them to Extirpation: That it was indeed necessary to have great Men at the Head of such an Enterprize; but that it was utterly inconceivable, that any such as were great enough to give it either Strength or Countenance, should be also desperate enough to run the Risques that must unavoidably attend it, that is to say, of Estate, Life, Honour; all they had to enjoy, and all their Posterity had to hope for: That it surpasses all the Wonders of Fable and Romance, that a Secret of so deep and black a nature, which had been spread thro' so many different Nations, England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Italy, Spain, Germany, &c. and communicated to so many thousands of both Sexes, of different Interests, of all Ranks, Circumstances and Conditions should be kept for so many Years together; without permitting the least Whimper of Discovery to escape; without giving the least Room for Suspicion: That not one of all that vast Number should have any Remorse for being concern'd in so bloody a Treason: That none should have the Merit, Wit, or Grace to divulge it: That no intervening Accident, no Levity, no Disagreement of Parties should happen to detect it; and that the last and worst of Men should, out of mere Tenderness of Conscience, be the sole Discoverers: That, tho' these Discoverers agreed in testifying, that huge Armies of Papists, according to Dugdale's Muster-Roll, two hundred thousand, were to be rais'd, arm'd, and provided, so as to be in a Readiness for a general Massacre of all Protestants, at an Hour's Warning; and tho' the said Discoverers affirm'd, they were in the deepest and most secret Intrigues, the Papists had of this nature, they could not in thirty Months, with all the Assistance that the whole Power of the Legislature could give them, authenticate their Evidence, by pointing out the least Trace of any Magazine or any other military Preparative, necessary to so mighty an Enterprize; especially as it was utterly impossible that they could be invisibly dispers'd or convey'd away on so sudden and unexpected a Discovery, and that in the very Instant too, when they were to have been made use of: That tho' so many hundreds of seal'd Commissions, of all sorts, were said to have been given out, and so vast a Quantity of treasonable Letters, circulated, as well by the common Post, as by the Hands of those very Discoverers, not one of these Letters, nor one of these Commissions, nor a Scrap of any one of them could be produc'd in Confirmation of the many things advanc'd, and which could be demonstrat'd no other way; nay, that tho' Oates himself, had a Patent to be of the Consult, he never thought fit to make it visible; which he would scarce have fail'd to have done, if it had been in his Power, or if it had contain'd any one Circumstance, that by any kind of Interpretation, could have been made to favour his Testimony: And, finally, that Oates, himself, destroy'd all his own Pretensions to Conscience, or Abhorrence of Treason, to Love and Loyalty to his Majesty, and Concern for his Fellow Subjects, by owning, that he was confessions, for above a Year together, of the daily Attempts made by Grove and Pickering to SHOOT THE KING; that he hourly expected, for several Months, the horrid Effects of Sir George Wakeman's Poison; that he was privy to the design'd Assassination of the King at Windsor; that he knew the Russians were actually upon the Spot, and ready for the Villany; that he saw the Money paid for their Encouragement, and every Moment waited to hear the fatal Stroke was given; and that, nevertheless, tho' he was convinc'd the Pilots were already aim'd at his Majesty's Head, the Cup of Poison at his Lips, and the Dagger almost at his very Heart, this Man of Conscience made no Discovery, never cry'd out Murder! against the Lord's Anointed; never call'd for immediate Succour, never diverted the impending Mischief; never warn'd him of the imminent Danger; but brooded over the manifold Treason; but gave the Traitors all the time they could wish or want, to complete their Catastrophe.

Lelrange, the celebrated Advocate for the establish'd Church, goes yet farther, and not only affirms, but undertakes to prove, that the Plot was the Fabric of Tonge, on the Model of another Forgery, set on foot in the preceding Reign by one (s) Habersfield. "He took a Copy of it, (says he, in his Brief History of the Times) in his Royal Martyr (a Book so called); he shew'd it to Oates to consider of; he wish'd for a Plot; he did all that he could to make People believe there was a Plot; he design'd a Plot; he fram'd and put together the Heads of a Plot; he contributed with Purse, Council, Heart, Hand, and Good-will, toward the Execution of it. It was by his Means, that Oates was maintain'd; by his Advice, that Oates was sent over; by his Direction, that Oates got Jesuits Names and Acquaintances, to build so much as a Pretext upon. He did not only pass over Oates's execrable Hypocrisies, blasphemous Perjuries, and mock Sacraments; but he was privy to, advis'd, approv'd, and encourag'd them: He bids Oates go over, and gives him his Directions, not to much what to look for, as what to find: Upon Oates's Return; he sends him back again upon the same Commission. Oates wanted Bread; Tonge stops his Mouth, and takes upon him to put him in a Way: Do but discover a Plot, says Tonge, and you are a made Man for ever. Make the People jealous of Popery, and your Work is done. Oates undertakes the Task, and, without any more Words, a Bargain's a Bargain.

During this Manage of Oates, Tonge was not idle otherwise neither: Witness his searching out Evidence, soliciting, promoting, and expediting, to his very great Expence, as he sets forth in his Cause and Request, the paying of above forty Clerks to write for him; his Undertakings and Disbursements to divers Irish, as well as the English, Witnesses, as appears upon several Bills and Discharges under his own Hand; his restless Scribbling, to provoke Fears and Jealousies; the indefatigable Pains he took to assist false Witnesses, and to help forward scandalous Informations.

Oates neither saw with his own Eyes, nor heard with his own Ears; he stirr'd neither Hand nor Foot, and his Tongue hardly wagg'd in his Mouth, but by Tonge's Direction. His Way was still chalk'd out before him; and all that he had to do was, to swear to Tonge's Words and Matter. Where Oates made a Stumble, was about his lying so close in Town at the Time of the Confute; that he could get no Witnesses; who but Tonge to cover the Perjury; and, upon all other Occasions, to palliate his Folleries? Who was it but Tonge that made the Plot, that wrote the Story of it, that hunted out Knights of the Post to second it, that expos'd all sorts of Impollures for the colouring of that Cheat? And it cost him more Trouble at last to defend and to execute the false Oaths, than to procure them.

Who was it again that put Oates upon swearing his Informations before Sir Edmond-bury Godfrey? Who was it that carry'd him thither, and supported him there with an Oath, that the Contents of those Papers had been shewn to the King already? Who was it that counsell'd Oates to have several Copies of them transferib'd; and that help'd both in the writing, and in the recommending, of them himself? Who but Dr. Tonge, that guided and influenced this whole Affair? And Oates, all this while, not so much as seen or heard of, till the 2d of September at Vaux-hall: Only the plenipotentiary Doctor, with full Powers and Authorities, was his own Principal and Commissioner, both under one.

It must be further said, for the (s) Doctor's Credit, that he shew'd as much Steadiness in his Perseverance, as Boldness and Resolution in the Attempt: For he gain'd his Point at last, in despite of all the Bug-bears of Honour and Conscience, and in defiance of all the Oppositions of Law, Reason, and common Sense.

In the same Book, the same Author more-over inserts the following Clause, out of a Petition of Tonge's Son to the King, viz. "Your Petitioner doth protest, in the Presence of Almighty God, that it is very true, that the Plot was contriv'd by my Father and Titus Oates, when he return'd the second time beyond the Seas." He also adds other (s) Passages, out of certain Letters from the said Tonge, junior, to himself, more circumstantially, to the same Effect. 'Tis true, this Tonge swore all this again; and, as Mr. North bears witness, was a Wretch most profligate and despicable. But if his Evidence

(s) "I have yet one Paper more of his (Tonge's), says Lehew (writing Date April 30, 1629, Tristram).

He takes upon him, with his usual Confidence, to advise his Majesty to deliver up all Priests and Jesuits to the Severity of the Laws in that Case provided: For, says he, they are not to be consider'd as men, Priests, but as professed and known Enemies to our King and Kingdom, Spies, Assassins, and Secularists.

To this Discourse the King shew'd great Dislike, and changed his Countenance with Displeasure, and said, That Blood became not the Doctor, nor his Cause; and He must preach other Doctrine to him, and that, on the account of Conscience, and appeal to the Doctor's own Conscience, whether he would be contented to be so persecuted (saying that see People) and God, other as essential Means might be used.

The Doctor answer'd, That he spoke this only for his Majesty's Information, and that he might know that he was not oblig'd, neither in Honour, Promise, nor Confidence, to interpose for them as Priests; if his Affairs press'd him, and requir'd him to do otherwise.

(t) See. "When I came from the University, in the Year 77, I found Oates with my Father, in a very poor Condition, who complain'd he knew not what to do to get Bread; who went under the Name of Amberg. My Father took him home, and gave him Cloaths, Lodging, and Diet, saying he would just benefit of it."

And then he perswaded him to get acquainted among the Popish; and when he had done so, then my Father told him, there had been many Plots in England to bring in Popery; and if he would go over among the Popish, and observe their Way, it was possible there might be one now; and if he could make it out, it would be his Perseverance for ever. But, however, if he could get their Names, and a little Acquaintance with the Popish, it would be an easy Matter to stir up the People to see Popery. And again, "My Father and he (Dr. Oates) went and lodg'd at Vaux-hall, in one Leahurst, a Bull-quarrier (which House was call'd by the Neighbour the Popish) and there Oates's Narratives were written; whereof several Copies were written, very different from the other: And the four Tyburn Letters (wherein Oates profess'd he was the whole Discoverer) were Contempts, &c. See Hist. Parl. p. 38.

dence is, for this Reason, the less to be regarded now; it might have been the easier exploded then: And yet, the Party suffer'd themselves to be publicly challeng'd (u) by Sir Roger to do so, without putting in any Reply. And to bring the whole Affair to a Period, Dr. Lloyd the Dean of Buzer, before quoted, in a Letter to Leffange, dated April 16, 1686, is frank enough to say, "I never saw how Prance's Evidence could stand, and I never went about to support it; and as for Oates and Bellin's Informations, they would make one renounce any thing that depends on their Credit." Even Sir William Jones, himself, who was so remarkably active in the Prosecution of the Plot, having been order'd, when Attorney-General, to give in a State of the Evidence to the Council-Board, towards the Conclusion of his Report, makes use of the following Expressions: "Some Objections have been made as to the Credit of Mr. Oates against some Particulars of his Testimony, which relate to the general Design; wherein he is suppos'd to be mistaken: But because those Objections are many, and some of them not made by these Prisoners, nor, perhaps, will be; and because I am not certain what Answer he can make to them, when they shall be objected against him: I think it not fit to mention them in particular." Whence it is pretty obvious that he thought they would be fatal to the Plot, because he thought them unanswerable. And finally, at the Close of a Book, call'd, A Vindication of the English Catholics from the pretended Conspiracy against the Life and Government of his sacred Majesty, discovering the deep Falshies and Contradictions contain'd in the Narrative of St. Omer's, we find no fewer than twenty solemn Attestations to that very Purpose; the Originals of which, or authentic Copies of them, were deposited in the English Seminary at St. Omer's; for the farther Satisfaction of Mankind: The whole ending with this remarkable Passage out of Tacitus, Lib. 4. Annal. Delatores, Genus Humanum, publico scilicet resortum & poenis nunquam satis coercitum, per pernoia abutuntur, that is to say, "Informers, a sort of Men found out to procure the public Ruin, whom no Punishments could sufficiently restrain, were invited and encourag'd by Rewards."

And now, upon the whole Matter, let every Man lay his Hand on his Heart, and pronounce for himself.

Our way being thus clear'd, we are, in the next Place, to resume the Business of the Session, which we left in Suspence, and which we are now to dispatch without any further Interruption.

And first we are to cast an Eye on a remarkable Proceeding in the House of Lords: The Makontents were there weakly; and it was beyond the Compass of Invention to bring about any material Change. An Effort was there made to remedy this Defect, as also, to compel the King to speak out in favour to the Remembrance of BOTH Houses, by calling in Assistance from the Commons: In order to which, an artful Question was propounded, whether a Committee should be appointed to join with a Committee of the Commons to debate Matters concerning the State of the Nation. But the Draft being discover'd, it was over-ruled; and the only legitimate Conference, was a Protest, sign'd by eighteen Peers, of whom the Part of Sunderland was one; for the following Reason: Because they were convinc'd in their Judgments, that the having Recourse to such a joint Committee, was the most likely way to produce a good Understanding between the two Houses; which they took to be most necessary at this time, for the Safety of the King's Person, and the Security of the Protestant Religion against the bloody Designs of the Papists; as also for the Redress of other Grievances which the Nation, at that time, labour'd under."

On the other hand, the House of Commons had no sooner dispatch'd the Trial of the Lord Stafford, than still, by way of expediting such Matters as were before them relative to Popery and the Plot, they pass'd a Vote, nemine contradicente, to resolve themselves into a general Committee, in order to resume the Consideration of Ways and Means to secure the Kingdom against Popery and Arbitrary Power. This was done on Monday, December 13; and on the Wednesday following, which was the Day appointed for this Debate, the King order'd their Attendance upon him in the House of Peers; and, after a Reference to that Part of his Speech, at the opening of the Session, which related to the State of Christendom, and the Expectations of his Allies, proceeded to say, "That our Allies could not but see how little had been done since their Meeting to encourage their Dependence upon us. That he found by them, that, unless we could be so united at home, so as to make our Alliance valuable to them, it would not be possible to hinder them from seeking some other Refuge, and making such new Friendships, as would not be consistent with our Safety." Adding: Consider that a Neglect of this Opportunity can never be repair'd. He then said, that he must tell them plainly, That without their Assistance, Tanger could not be preserv'd. And concluded in these Words: "I did promise you the fullest Satisfaction your Hearts could wish, for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and to concur with you in any Remedies, which might consist with preserving the Succession of the Crown in its due and legal Course of Descent. I do again, the said Doctor, and his Evidence, by scandalous Reflections upon both; Roger Leffange does hereby offer himself, out of a Zeal to the public Good, to furnish authentic Papers, and Memorials, towards the Protection of the Work." Observes vol. 1. p. 134.

with the same Reservations, renew the same Promises to you: And being thus ready on my Part to do all that can be reasonably expected from me, I should be glad to know from you, as soon as may be, how far I shall be assisted by you, and what it is you desire from me."

Here was another Opening from the Throne, to pacify the Fears, by removing the Dangers, of the People. But those who found their Account in the Tempest, could not be induced to hearken to a Calm. Thus, when the Speech was reported by the Speaker to the House, Mr. Gee openly declar'd, that as almost every Paragraph had tended to Money, and that the Paragraph relating to Religion contained the old Reserve, it would be to little Purpose even to appoint a Day to take it into Consideration; referred to the Contents of the late Representation as a sufficient Answer to it; complain'd, that the Bill they had already perfected against Popery had been thrown out as hastily, as if it had carry'd a Fire-ball with it; and concluded with giving it as his Opinion, that they should keep their Money till they had got Laws.

But the Patriots, it seems, were not unanimous on this Occasion; and, in particular, Colonel Titus declar'd, That he thought the Speech was a fair Step towards coming to a right Understanding; and, for that Reason, deserv'd the most respectful Consideration they could give it: And, the House being also of the same Sentiment, a Day was appointed accordingly.

A Day appointed to take it into Consideration.

In compliance with the Order of the Day, the House then resolv'd itself into the general Committee for securing the Kingdom against Popery; of which Mr. Povey had the Chair. The Debate was open'd by Lord Cavendish; who, by way of Preamble, enlarg'd on the Dangers arising to the Nation from the Perversion of the Duke of York to the Romish Religion; insisted on the Expediency of the Bill of Exclusion, notwithstanding the Lords had thrown it out; presum'd, that when their Lordships, especially the Bishops, on whom he pass'd some ironical Compliments, were convinced there was no other effectual Way to answer the great End in View, they would still find a Time to adopt it; and concluded with a Motion, That a Bill might be brought in for associating all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects. Mr. Montagu rose up next, neither to second nor oppose the Motion, but to offer a new Proposal of his own, namely, That a Bill might be brought in for securing frequent Parliaments; in support of which, he very artfully urg'd, "That, next to the Exclusion-Bill, to secure their own Sitting was the Matter of most Moment." For, said he, offer at what you will, if it be any thing that is like to prove strong enough to secure us against Popery, you will see the House put off, before it comes to any Perfection: And that, in time, will be made use of to arraign the Proceedings of Parliament, and to persuade the People, that this House did attempt to alter the Government by such and such Bills; and so, by degrees, possess the People, that Parliaments are either dangerous, or inconsistent with the Government, that, if possible, they may be well content without them." As also, "That if, at the same time that we endeavour to secure ourselves against Popery, we do not also do something to prevent arbitrary Power, it will be to little Purpose." It happen'd that he had, in the Course of his Speech, dropt a Hint, that a Bill to banish the most considerable Papists out of the Kingdom might be of use; and this Sir E. Hungerford gather'd up, and enforced, together with Mr. Montagu's Motion in form; relating to the Frequency of Parliaments; and, moreover, threw in a wholesome Caution against future Intermarriages of the Royal Family with Papists. Mr. Harbord clos'd only with the Bill of Banishment: Several other Members were as express for the Association: And this Variety of Opinions seems to indicate, that the House was either split into a Variety of Parties, or that the several Speakers brought their several Projects crude to the House, without coming to any previous Explanation, or entering into any preparatory Concert with each other. Either, therefore, for fear of the Distraction which, on such Occasions, is likely to ensue; or else, by keeping the House in the Pursuit of what it was impossible for them to obtain, to divert them from pursuing what was; Sir Nicholas Crew brought back their Attention to the Affair of the Succession: Said, That as long as there was a Popish Successor, there would be Papists in Masquerade, whom neither their associating nor banishing Bills would reach: And, therefore, concluded with a Motion, That, in the first place, they would pass a Vote, "That, as long as the Papists had any Hopes of the Duke of York's succeeding to the Crown, the King's Person, the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of the People, were in apparent Danger." Colonel Titus, who spoke next, on the contrary, insinuated, that it was rather their Business to pursue what was practicable, than what was best. Sir Francis Winnington gave it as his Opinion, That all Measures, that were like to prove serviceable against Popery, would prove alike impracticable: That he was afraid this Parliament would sooner be dissolv'd, than any such Measure would be permitted to take place: That, in such case, the very Mention of these Bills would, hereafter, rise in Judgment against them: That, however, he thought they must adventure: That the several Motions which had been made met with no Opposition: And, that, therefore, their first Concern ought to be to save Time, by putting the several Questions. The Motion for the Banishing-Bill was then agreed to at the Instance of Sir Richard Temple. After which, Mr. Montagu took occasion to urge, that the Association-Bill was now become more necessary than ever; for that, as well as the Duke of York, by the Exclusion-Bill, they had made the whole Party, by the Banishing-Bill, their Enemies. Mr. Gee was for hastening the Bill for the uniting the Protestant Protestant Dissenters, which was already before the House. Mr. Paul Poley made a long Discourse to shew, that the Papists, by their Interest in the Government, were too strong both for Parliament and People; and, adopting the Sentiments of Sir Francis Winnington, said, these Bills would furnish those who were dissatisfied to Parliaments with Arguments for their Dissolution; and, withal, to persuade the People, that they struck at the very Foundation of the Government; for which Reason, he expected no good Effects from them. Sir Francis Roll then called for the Question, on Sir Nicholas Crew's Motion, above-mention'd; which was agreed to by the Committee, and carry'd in the Affirmative. Sir Gilbert Gerrard then renew'd the Motion for the Association-Bill; and was seconded by Sir Henry Capel, who levelled the Main of his Discourse, which was long, at the Duke of York, but in his Way let fly a Shaft or two at the King himself. He said, The Wheel within the Wheel, which had been so often complain'd of, still continued: That tho' his Majesty had once declar'd, how sensible he was of the Inconvenience of being advis'd by private Cabals, and had seem'd resolv'd to dismiss them, he had been prevail'd upon to recede from that Resolution: Whence he concluded, that, till some Alteration was made in Council, the Parliament would find their Labours both endless and useless. Another Member, in the Fury of his Zeal, was mad enough to say, "That Popery was so clencht and rivetted, that it did not lie in the Power of God nor Man to prevent the setting of it in this Nation." Defending, however, at last to common Sense, he was pleas'd to add, That he found in Coke's Reports, that, when the Nation was in apparent Danger, the People might go directly to the King with their Grievances, and make their Complaints and Petitions known: As also, that they had a Precedent for their Association-Bill in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, which was set on foot by the Gentry, and afterwards receiv'd the Sanction of Parliament. Mr. Lawson Gower was of Opinion, that the Popish Interest was too weighty to be remov'd by such little Bills as these; yet advis'd, that what was defective in the Foundation might, if possible, be remedied by the Goodness of the Building. Another Member made no doubt, that the King was willing to secure the Protestant Religion, both to them and their Posterities; and, therefore, hop'd he would, at last, either concur in the Expedients propos'd to him by his Commons, or propose better of his own. Sir William Jones was for trying to get something in lieu of the Exclusion-Bill; which, tho' not of Force enough to remove the Enemy, might be sufficient for their own Preservation; but affect'd to be perswaded, that, if the Association-Bill was drawn as it should be, it would have no better Success than the other; "For, said he, I am afraid that, altho' we are permitted to brandish our Weapons, we shall not be allow'd to wound Popery." He also added, that the Bill in dispute ought to be much stronger than that in Queen Elizabeth's Days: That was for an Association only after her Death; "but, continued he, I cannot tell, if such a Bill will secure us now; the Circumstances we are under being very different. In Queen Elizabeth's Days, the Privy-Councillors were all for the Queen's Interest, and none for the Successor's; now, most of the Privy-Councillors are for the Successor's, and few for the King's: Then, Ministers were unanimously agreed to keep out Popery; now, we have too much Reason to fear, that there are many that are for bringing it in: In those Days, they all agreed to keep the popish Successor in Scotland; now, the major Part agree to keep the Successor here: All which must be considered in drawing the Bill."

What was urg'd in reply to all these bitter Things, we are left to conjecture: Those who were so careful to preserve their own Sentiments, did not think themselves oblig'd to preserve any more of the Debate than answer'd their own immediate Purposes; and what weigh'd within-doors, was thought sufficient to satisfy all without. In conclusion of all, it was resolv'd, "That a Bill be brought in for an Association of all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, for the Safety of his Majesty's Person, the Defence of the Protestant Religion, and the Preservation of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, against all Invasions and Oppositions whatsoever; and for preventing the Duke of York, or any Papist, from succeeding to the Crown. And, two Days after, three Bills more, all tending to the same Point, were further agreed upon, viz. one for the more effectual securing of the Meeting and Sitting of Parliament, as one Means to prevent arbitrary Power: A second, that the Judges, hereafter to be made and appointed, might hold their Places and Salaries quum ibi se bene gesserint; as also to prevent the arbitrary Proceedings of the Judges: And a third, against illegal Exaction of Money upon the People; and to make it High Treason.

The 18th was the Day appointed for taking his Majesty's Speech into Consideration, and these previous Votes had very sufficiently indicated what Reception it was like to meet with. Mr. Hampden open'd the Debate upon this Occasion; and set out with observing, That, by the Tenor of the Speech, it was obvious the Success of this Parliament depended upon their Answer to it; and, consequently, the Safety of the Protestant Religion, both at home and abroad: He then pass'd on at once to the latter Part of it, as the most proper to be consider'd first: Said, that the Reservations contain'd in it look'd like a perfect Design to save the whole Popish Party, accompany'd with a Power and a Presence sufficient to enable them to accomplish their End; which End, he made no Difficulty to affirm, was the Destruction of the Protestant Religion. In former Times, he further said, the Interest of no one Man could bear up against the Interest of the Nation; whereas the Religion, Lives, and Liberties, of all the Protestants of the three Nations, were now to be sacrificed, rather than one Man should be disposse'd of his Right; tho', by his own Act, he had made himself incapable of enjoying it: Appeal'd to the House, whether the French Agents, Male and Female, as well as the Duke's, were not as busy, and in as great Credit, at Court as ever: And concluded, upon the Whole, That, till Things were settled at home, on a true Protestant Bottom, it could not be imagin'd that any Protestant Prince would depend upon us, or make Alliances with us: And therefore it would be in vain to treat either of those Alliances, or Money for the Support of them: "For, till the Interest chang'd at Court (these were his Words) that so there might be a better Understanding between the King and his People, such a Treaty could not produce any thing for our Advantage." In order to which, he humbly mov'd, That a Committee might be appointed, to draw up an Address to assure his Majesty, that when his Majesty should be pleas'd to grant them such Laws as were necessary for the Security of their Religion, which might be particulariz'd in the Address, his Commons would be ready to give him what Money his Occasions might require; not only for the Support of Tanger, and Alliances, but to enable him to have a good Fleet at Sea, &c. Lord Ruffel rose up next, and gave it as his Opinion, That it was impossible Affairs should ever be settled on a good Protestant Bottom, as long as there was a Popish Successor, which Bar could never be remov'd, but by the Exclusion-Bill; and that, therefore, to avoid Misconstruction, the Supply might be offer'd to the King in exchange for that Bill only. Sir William Jones introduced what he had to say with an Observation, That the little Success their Endeavours had hitherto met with, made it reasonable to suspect, they were permitted to fit there rather to destroy themselves, than to save their Country. He then proceeded to admire, that those about the King, who were so fond of Expedients, should chuse to saddle them always with the Burthen of contriving them: Said, that, according to the Opinion of three successive Parliaments, the Limitation in favour of the Popish Interest was plain, intelligible, and practicable: Hop'd, therefore, that his Majesty would call upon them who had given him such clear Advice to provide for the Security and Preservation of Popery, to provide such Expedients to secure and preserve the Protestant Religion also, as were equally clear, plain, and practicable: Those already propos'd, he asserted, were self-contradictory, because they left the People under the miserable Necessity of having, first or last, a Contest with their lawful King: And added, "There can be no such thing as setting up a Power to oppose him, but by putting a kind of supreme Authority in the Parliament; with a Power to oppose, as well by making War as Laws, which might grow destructive to the monarchical Government: The said Trust or Power, without the Exclusion-Bill, being not to be repos'd in the next Heir, or any single Person, lest he should die before he should come to have the Power in him, or utterly refuse to act, if he should live to have a Right, by virtue of such a Settlement, to administer the Government. In such a Case, there would be no lawful Power lodg'd any where else to oppose such a King, and there must not be an Interregnum." His Conclusion from all this was, That those who advis'd the King to make the Limitation mention'd in his Speech, did intend it as an Expedient to make the Endeavours of Parliament ineffectual, and to bring in Popery: And that, on the other hand, if the House was to adopt the Expedient discours'd of (for Argument's sake) by himself, it would follow, that as the last House of Commons was arraign'd for omnipotent and ambitious, this would be laid under a worse Reproach, namely, that of having attempted to destroy the monarchical Government, in hope to render Parliaments odious thereby, both to Prince and People. He then gave it as his Sentiment, that such an Answer should be return'd to his Majesty, as might, if possible, create in him a good Opinion of the House; as might satisfy him of the Necessity of the Bill contend'd for; and convince him, that all other Acts of Grace would only serve to fatten them as Sheep for the Slaughter: In particular, as a proper Return to the last Part of the Speech, which he affect'd to consider as his Majesty's own, and which he acknowledg'd to be a fair Proposition to come to an Understanding, he was for driving a Bargain with his Majesty, and plainly specifying in their Address, that, in exchange for their favourite Bill, he might have what Money he wanted; but otherwise none at all. Mr. Gee was for enumerating all the national Grievances; wonder'd that no body took notice of the Standing-Army; insist'd, that it ought to consist of no more than were barely sufficient for Guards; declar'd, that, unless a Provision was made to prevent any Augmentation, unless in the Case of an Invasion, or a Rebellion, all Laws would signify nothing: As also, that he was unsatisfy'd with general Offers of Money; and concluded with saying, that he was either for demanding more, or promising less. Sir Eliah Harvey seem'd to be of the same Mind as to the Exclusion-Bill; intimating, that he could not agree to offer so much, and demand so little: But then he was for offering Money in general Terms, without specifying for what; or enumerating Bills. Mr. G. Vernon, on the other hand, was against particularizing any Sum of Money in the Address; signify'd, that any Sum of Money would be well bestow'd for the Exclusion-Bill only; and that, as the said Bill was so precisely necessary for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, all the World would justify them for insisting upon it as the Consideration. — Here, likewise, our Minutes of this Debate fail; being as deficient as to the other Side as the last: And, upon the Issue, a Committee was appointed to draw up the Sentiments of the House, in an humble Address to his Majesty, which was in Substance as follows:

A. D. 1680.
The Commons
Address.

The Preamble was all Acknowledgment of his Majesty's great Goodness, in renewing his Assurances to concur with them in any means for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and for his gracious Invitation to make their Desires known. But the second Paragraph set forth their Grievous Heart, that these princely Offers were render'd, by the Reservation annex'd to them, wholly fruitless. The Words of this Reservation are then repeated; and by way of Answer it is urg'd, That no Interruption of the Descent had been endeavour'd, except in the Person of the Duke of York, who had suffered himself to be perverted by the wicked Instruments of the Church of Rome to the Romish Religion: And for the Papists to have their Hopes continued, that a Prince of that Religion, should succeed to the Throne of these Kingdoms, they gave it as the Issue of their most deliberate Thoughts and Consultations, was utterly inconsistent with the Safety of his Majesty's Person, the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the Prosperity, Peace, and Welfare of his Protestant Subjects. This they further undertook to illustrate, by endeavouring to shew from the Principles of the Church of Rome, and the Testimonies of the Plot, That his Majesty's Sacred Person was in continual Danger under the Prospect of a Popish Successor: That it was to the Expectation of this Succession, that the great Increase of Papists in his Majesty's Dominions was to be ascrib'd; and, that it was the same Expectation which had harden'd the Papists of this Kingdom, and animated them to make a common Purse, to provide Arms, and solicit the Aid of foreign Princes, to impose Popery upon us. They then proceed to set forth, that it was his Majesty's Glory and true Interest to be the Head and Protector of all Protestants; but stop short to ask, "If these Hopes remain, what Alliances can be made for the Advantage of the Protestant Cause? or what Confidence can be plac'd in them, as long as this Protestant Kingdom is in so much Danger of a Popish Successor; by whom, at present, all their Councils and Designs may be eluded, as they have hitherto been; and by whom, if He succeeded, they are sure to be destroy'd?" Having thus expatiated on the Dangers, that accompany'd the Expectation of a Popish Successor, they went on to give a Specimen of the Mischiefs that would follow, in case such a one should inherit: Their Religion, which was already dangerously shaken, would then, they said, be totally overthrow'd. Nothing would be left, or could be found to protect or defend it. The Execution of old Laws would cease, and it would be vain to expect new ones. The most Sacred Obligations of Conscience and Prudence, if any such should be given, that were against the Interest of the Romish Religion, would be violated. The Pope would be acknowledged supreme, and all Causes either as spiritual, or in order to spiritual things, would be brought under his Jurisdiction. The Lives, Liberties, and Estates of all such Protestants as valu'd their Souls more than their secular Concernments, would be adjudg'd forfeited. And such foreign Princes who had been invited to assist in securing the Crown to the Duke of York, with Arguments drawn from his great Zeal to establish Popery and to extirpate Protestants out of his Dominions, would expect Performance. They, farther, humbly besought his Majesty to consider, whether, in case the Crown should descend to the Duke of York, the Opposition which might possibly be made to his possessing it, might not endanger not only the farther Descent in the Royal Line, but even Monarchy itself. And for all these Reasons, they declar'd themselves humble Petitioners to his most Sacred Majesty, that, in tender Commiseration of his poor Protestant People, he would be graciously pleas'd to depart from the Reservation in his Speech; and when a Bill should be tender'd to his Majesty in a Parliamentary way, to intitle the Duke of York from inheriting the Crown, his Majesty would give the Royal Assent thereto: And moreover, as what was necessary to fortify and defend the same, that he would be farther pleas'd to assent to the Association Bill. "These Requests, said they, we are constrain'd humbly to make to your Majesty as of absolute Necessity, for the safe and peaceable Enjoyment of our Religion. Without these things, the Alliances of England will not be valuable, nor the People encourag'd to contribute to your Majesty's Service." Nor was this all; they were humble Suitors also to his Majesty, that, from thenceforth, such Persons only might be Judges as were Men of Ability, Integrity, and known Affection to the Protestant Religion; and that they might hold their Offices and Salaries, quam diu se bene gesserint. That several Deputy Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace, fitly qualify'd for those Employments, having been of late displac'd, and others put in their Room, who were Men of arbitrary Principles and Countenancers of Papists and Popery, such only as were to qualify'd, might serve in those Offices, or as Lord Lieutenants, &c. and finally, that none but Men of known Experience, Courage, and Affection to the Protestant Religion, might be employ'd either in the Army or the Fleet. All which their humble Requests being granted, they declar'd themselves ready, on their Parts, to assist his Majesty in all things. And to wind up all, they presum'd to hope, that after this their humble Answer to his Majesty's gracious Speech, no evil Instruments, whatsoever, would be able to lessen his Majesty's Esteem of the Fidelity and Affection which they bore to his Service; that he would always retain, in his Royal Breast, the same favourable Opinion of them, his loyal Commons; and that those other good Bills which they had then under Consideration, conducing to the great Ends, before mention'd; as also all Laws for the Benefit and Comfort of his People, as should, from time to time, be tender'd for his Royal Assent, would find Acceptance with his Majesty.

gers arising from a Popish Successor were very obvious; that there would be no Peace and Tranquillity in the Nation, as long as there was one; and that the Protestant Religion would be lost under a Popish King; gave it as his Opinion, nevertheless, That it was not convenient, at that time, to press hard for the Exclusion Bill, because it could not be had without a Prorogation, which he declar'd himself to be as apprehensive of, as of a Popish Successor: For I do believe, said he, in that Case, you will sooner see the Duke at Whitehall, than this Assembly met together again between these Walls; and, in Consequence of a Dissolution, the Protestant Interest, both at home and abroad, would be ruin'd. He declar'd also against any Mention of the Association-Bill, because it was not as yet before them; urging, that it was equally unreasonable to recommend, and to expect the King should approve, what neither knew any thing of. Those things about the Judges, for so he express'd himself, he also thought too minute to be insisted on, in comparison with others, which might be demanded. But then he added, That Queen Elizabeth's Counsellors never thought her safe, until the Popish Successor was inclin'd in a Tower; and that he was afraid they should never be safe, until some such Course was taken as might bring things to an Issue. He also seem'd to espouse the Banishing Bill: And upon the whole, mov'd, That the Address might be recommitted, in order to a farther and better Consideration.

As the Court had now the Labouring Oar of Opposition to manage, and all the Strength lay on the other Side, their Business was to get the Helm into their Hands, if possible, and by skilful Steering, to weather those Points which lay full in their Way, and which were no otherwise to be avoided. It is reasonable to think that this Motion of Mr. Vaughan's was a Refinement of this Nature, and was calculated rather to amuse, divide, or distract the House, than to facilitate any one of the popular Points it seem'd to favour: And it is apparent that Sir W. Jones, who rose up to answer it, consider'd it accordingly: For in his Reply we find him speaking to this Effect, viz. That he was glad that worthy Member agreed with him in the Apprehensions of Danger from a Popish Successor, and the Necessity of the Exclusion-Bill; and sorry that he was forc'd to differ with him in every thing he had said besides: That he could not think to ill of his Majesty as to fear he would agree to a Prorogation, for two or three Days, under a Pretence of gratifying them with the Exclusion Bill, only to bring on a Dissolution: That for his Part, he fear'd a Prorogation, unaccompani'd with any such Concession; but that if the King agreed to the Proposal, he should make no doubt of the Effect: That as to the Objection, with regard to the Association-Bill, it was wholly groundless; the Word being very well understood, and the Ends very clearly express'd: That if, when drawn, it should appear different from the Conception of the House, it was reasonable to suppose the House would take care to mend it; or if not, the King's Promise would be no further binding, than the Bill answer'd the Representation given of it: That he could not but admire to hear the having good Judges, Justices, and Commanders by Sea and Land treated as a trivial thing; for without that, all other Regulations would signify nothing, since it was not to be conceiv'd, that while the whole executive Power was lodg'd in the Hands of Persons Popishly inclin'd, it would be exerted for the Security of the Protestant Interest: That as to the new way propos'd of securing the Popish Successor, as had been done in Queen Elizabeth's Time, it was first necessary to have such a Council as hers; since it was manifestly impracticable, as long as there were eleven to seven in the Interest of that Popish Successor: And finally, that, seeing these Proposals had no Appearance of operating for the public Service, he saw no Reason the House had to be diverted from the way they were going. Upon the whole, the Address was agreed to; and on the 21th of December presented to his Majesty, who was now so embarras'd with his Wants and Necessities, so unresolv'd, perhaps, in his own Judgment, to select with Impertinencies on both Sides, for and against the Duke, both to comply with the Offers of the Commons, and to reject them, that it was not till the fourth of January following, that he return'd his Answers.

At, or about, this Crisis it was, that the States-General deliver'd that remarkable Memorial to Mr. Sully at the Hague, to be by him transmitted to England, which Sir William Temple (to clear Lord Sunderland's of the Imputation, or, as it may be understood, tho' it is not express'd, the Prince of Orange) concludes, was drawn up by the Pensioner Fagel, and which was, in Effect, as follows: "That the States-General had heard with extreme Sorrow, that the Misunderstanding between his Majesty and his Parliament, was not in so fair a way to be compos'd, as they heartily wish'd, and the Exigencies of Christianity requir'd: That they would neither take upon them to judge of the Cause of Dispute, nor of the Means to put an End to it: That they had wait'd, with an extreme Sorrow, yet with a respectful Silence, the Issue that God and his Majesty should please to give it; nor had ever interier'd, if their own Danger had not oblig'd them to speak; and if they were not sensible that they neither could nor ought to address themselves to any but his Majesty: That nobody was better acquainted than his Majesty with the Injuries they had sustain'd since the Conclusion of the Peace, nor with the Endeavours that had been us'd to engage them in Measures which his Majesty could not approve, because because he apprehended them to be as prejudicial to his own Interest as to theirs: That when threaten'd for refusing to enter into those Measures, his Majesty had assur'd them of his Protection, and that he would venture all for their Preservation: That the States, resting upon his Royal Promises, to call his Parliament as soon as he thought Affairs requir'd it, had waited for the Performance, if not without Impatience, at least with as much Resignation as his Majesty could expect from his own Subjects: That the Misunderstanding between his Majesty and his People, which seem'd to increase every Day, reduc'd them almost to Despair; and that more especially, because it turn'd on a Point, so peculiarly delicate, because so peculiarly domestic, as left them no Room to meddle in it: That, in the mean time, his Majesty might be assur'd by Eye-witnesses, that those foreign Powers with whom he had no Tye, were making extraordinary Preparations: That nothing but their Apprehensions of his Majesty had hitherto preserv'd the Republic from the Effects of their Menaces: But that the same untoward Disposition of things, which kept his Majesty at Variance with his People, would also give them full Opportunity to execute their Designs; since they well knew his Majesty's Power, separate from his People, would not be sufficient to prevent them: That his Majesty was sensible of the Prevalence of their Arts in his own Kingdom to facilitate those Designs: That the Spaniards, by their own ill Conduct, had left the Spanish Netherlands wholly expos'd: That his Catholic Majesty was not able to provide for their Defence: That the States were so exhausted by their late Wars, that they were not in a Condition to help him: That if the Republic and the Residue of those Provinces were swallow'd up, his Majesty would vainly endeavour to withstand the Progress of a victorious King, at leisure to employ all his Forces against him, and extremely formidable by Sea as well as by Land: That they had not the necessary Means to save themselves; nor could they hope for any Help from his Majesty, as long as he was divided from his People; nor even from Time itself, since Delays had only serv'd to make their Enemies stronger and themselves weaker: That his Majesty had found by Experience, that the Dissolutions and Prorogations of Parliaments had only serv'd to encrease the Discontents of his People; and that subsequent Parliaments or Sessions had always trod in the same Track with their Predecessors, only with greater Animosity: That they could not but lament, that the Interest of their own Republic, as well as of all the Protestant Powers of Europe, and indeed of Europe in general, should all be sacrific'd for so uncertain a Matter, as a future Succession: That his Majesty could not but recollect, that even Acts of Parliament to exclude particular Persons from the Succession, as in the Cases of the two Queens, Mary and Elizabeth, had not answer'd the Ends for which they were made: That it was much to be fear'd that a Parliament compos'd of Persons skill'd in the Laws of this Country, arm'd with considerable Precedents, and animated with the Concurrence of the great Cities, and the Bulk of the Nation, would be able to keep their Ground, and thereby continue the Disunion, in which Case, all the Mitcheifs now apprehended, would have Opportunity to take place, and his Majesty's Concessions, if, at last, he should condescend to make such as were necessary, come too late: That they did not, in the least, pretend to offer any Directions to the Will and Pleasure of his Majesty; but, on the contrary, submitted themselves entirely to it; only desiring, That, if they must be so unfortunate, as to see his Majesty proceed to sacrifice his Kingdoms, his Royal Person, and the Union of his People for so uncertain a Matter; and that, consequently, his Majesty cannot engage himself in the Troubles of, or communicate his Assistance to, his Neighbours, his Majesty would give them leave to use their Endeavours to find out some other Means to save their Commonwealth, and the poor People committed to their Charge: That they would always gratefully remember his Majesty's good Intentions towards them: But that it would be with extreme Regret, and even with Tears of Blood, that they should find themselves abandon'd to Perdition, for the sake of an Interest depending on a Contingence that might never have a Being; and, if it should, might bring along with it as many and grievous Calamities, as it was likely to inflict on them."

These were the Contents of this notable Piece; and to countenance the States in so unusual a Proceeding, Don Pedro de Riquillo, the Spanish Minister, presented also another, as nearly of the same Nature, as the different Circumstances and Connections of the two Powers would allow. The Dangers of Europe, from the encroaching Spirit, and overgrown Power of France, afforded the Pretence for both: But these Dangers were set forth more circumstantially in the Memorial of Spain; and the several Facts therein contain'd were, indeed, such, as could not be read without the highest Indignation. In particular, it specify'd the Excesses and Violences committed by the French on the Inhabitants of Puerta-Rabia, in the midst of a Conference held there for settling the Claims and Pretensions on both Sides; as also, that, since the perfecting the Treaty of Nimeguen, they had, under one Pretence or another, taken Possession of almost the whole Counties of Namur and Luxemburg: That the fortifying Boisguen, situated upon the Maas, being held the most likely Expedient to secure the Remainder, the Work was no sooner undertaken, than the Governor of Tournay sent word to the Prince of Parma, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, that not one Pallisado should be erected there, altho' the Place had been incontestably a separate State, and was still comprehended in the County of Namur: That when these several Facts were complain'd of at Paris by the Marquis de Fuente, the Spanish Minister there, that Complaint gave rise to a violent Contest, which which was clos'd on the Side of France with this dictatorial Answer, "That his most Christian Majesty did not doubt but that the Catholic King would give Orders to his Commissioner at Fuenta-Rabia, to proceed in the Treaty, leaving each in Possession of what they held at present (as if a violent Usurpation, under the Surety of the good Faith of the Conference, could in one Day be converted into an actual Possession)." That for what related to the Low Countries, he could not forbear taking Possession of what he presu'd belong'd to him, agreeable to what he should declare at the Conference of Courtray. That the Marquis de la Fuente objecting to this Answer, on account of the Injustice and Indecency of it; declaring, he could not receive the same, as not knowing how to impart it to the King his Master; and beseeching his most Christian Majesty, to shew more regard to the Justice of his Demands; his Answer was, That he would consider of it: But that, at the same time, he order'd his Forces to march into the Spanish Territories to hinder the fortifying of Bowigen: That tho' he thus arbitrarily depriv'd his Catholic Majesty of the Benefit of the late Treaty, he claim'd, and made use of the whole Benefit of it himself, by lowering the Waters of the River Lisse, to facilitate the new Works he was raising at Mennin; which, till then, had been wholly open: That these were not mere Infractions, but open Acts of Hostility: That the French made no Secret of their Designs, but even affected to give out, that they intended to lay Siege to Luxembourg, and after that was reduc'd, to proceed to Namur: That this Application was made to his Majesty, as a common Mediator, who, in that quality, was concern'd to see the Peace preserv'd; and, who, as an Ally, was also under Obligations to defend it: That tho' the Frontiers of Spain itself, by Cantabria and Catalonia, were infested, the Spanish Dominions in Italy, by the Treaty between France and the Duke of Mantua, in apparent Danger; and the Indies expos'd to the Insults of the French Fleet, under the Command of the Count d'Estrees, his Catholic Majesty possess'd these his greatest Concerns, and attended principally, if not solely, to the Preservation of the Little that was left in Flanders; and which he should have been better able to have done, if the successive Usurpations of the French, since the Peace, had not successively, broken his Measures, and driven him in Pursuit of new: That he had, however, sent considerable Supplies into Flanders, and persever'd in his Resolution to defend it to the utmost: And that all this he had done, in the Hope, that the Union of Interests between Spain and England, would have been productive of mutual Assistance, and by Consequence, mutual Safety: That all good Englishmen must be sensible, that if an immediate Opposition was not made to the growing Power of France, the Residue of the Low Countries must, almost instantly, fall into their Hands: That the States General would then find themselves unable to resist the Torrent, whatever Reason they might have to fear it: That England was the sole Power that could stand in the Breach; and that now was the only time for her to interpose, with any Hope of Success: That the Divisions which, at present, rag'd in this Kingdom, encourag'd the most Christian King to prosecute his vast and pernicious Designs: That even he, as well as all the other Princes and Powers of Europe, had their Eyes and Hearts fix'd on the Issue of the present Parliament: That the Latter had plac'd their sole Trust and Confidence in the happy and speedy Agreement of the King and his People; and that the former, had, for a while, given a Check to his own Ambition, from the bare Possibility, that such an Event might take place: That he was on the point of bestirring himself again, which he also took care to publish every where, for an Assurance, that the said Division would not be heal'd: That these very Divisions were maintain'd and cherish'd by him, with vast Promises tho' at small Charge: That the Fruits he expected from them, was Leisure to complete his Conquest of the Low Countries, which was the Master-Key to Universal Monarchy: That as a farther Proof of the Advantages he reaps from the Dissension of those, whose Interest it apparently was to put a Stop to his Career, it was fit his Majesty should be made acquainted with a late Fact, viz. That tho' the most Christian King had, hitherto, given such fierce and haughty Answers to the several Complaints of the several Princes of the Empire, who had groan'd under his (s) Insults and Oppressions; yet, finding now, that the Emperor, the Electors of Saxony, Bavaria, and Brandenburg, &c. were making considerable Levies, and had declar'd, they would no longer suffer his arbitrary Proceedings in the Empire, but that they would, to the utmost of their Power, oppose the same, he had, all at once, contended to agree to a Conference in one of the Imperial Cities, to decide and explain the ambiguous Points in the Treaty

A. D. 1680.

(s) So long ago as the preceding July, the Diet of the Empire had, in a solemn Letter to the King of Great Britain, as the common Mediator, represented, that the French had so many Ways infring'd the Treaty of Nimwegen, that nothing but the precious Name of Peace remain'd, and call'd upon him, in the most earnest and pathetic Manner, to interpose with his good Offices in their Behalf; that the Outrages they complain'd of might cease, and that the public Tranquillity might be indeed restor'd. The Imperial Ministers at the Hague made also the like Representation to the States, and, in the several Letters and Memorials from the Emperor to the Dutch, and the several Conventions laid to their Charge there, enumerated, scilicet, 1. By continuing their Troops in the Empire. 2. Holding Possession of all the Places they ought to evacuate. 3. Exacting Contributions. 4. Obliging the Ten Towns of Alsace to take a new Oath, that thereby usurping a Sovereignty over them; creating a new Court of Appeals (at Metz) and forbidding any future Additions to the Imperial Chamber at Spires. 5. Requiring an Oath from the Vassals and Nobles of Alsace. 6. Setting up Pretensions on the Vassalage of Metz, Toul, and Verdun; as also on other Imperial States and Countries. 7. Confining the Rents and Revenues of the Chapter of Strasbourg. 8. Raising new Fortifications at Schoffels and Haningen. 9. In not restoring Almshausen. 10. In fighting of Duisburg. 11. In taking of Homburg and Bielefeld. 12. In starting several new Pretensions on the City of Strasbourg.

A. D. 1680. Treaty of Nimwegen, concerning the French Conquests in Alsace; and also, that as soon as the Commissioners were met, the Chamber of Metz should suspend its Proceedings; that all Innovations should be superseeded; and that even a Person should be admitted to treat in favour of the Duke of Lorraine. What follow'd next was to shew, that, tho' the Fate of Germany was thus respited by the Strength and Resolution of its confederated Princes, Flanders, by that very Incident, became more and more expos'd; and that a like Exertion of the Strength and Resolution of England alone could save it.

For a Conclusion of the whole Piece, the Embassador, who penn'd and presented it, proceeded to say, in his own Person, That he very well knew, that the Agitations of the Kingdom were great, and that the Pretensions seem'd to be distant: That it made his Heart bleed to see, that there was no Way open'd to a Union: And that, as there was nothing impossible in human Things, he was so much the more afflicted to see so little Concern appear to accomplish this: That if England was not so nearly and intimately concern'd in the Fate of the Low Countries, the Pretensions on both Sides might be ligated to the utmost: But that, as Flanders was manifestly the Barrier of England, as Spain and the Indies were the great Support of its Commerce and Source of its Wealth, there was no Time, no Room, no Excuse, for carrying on this obstinately a fruitless Contest, and thereby giving the common Enemy Time and Opportunity to effect the common Ruin: That, from all these interesting Considerations, the said Embassador promis'd himself, that England would once more be at Peace with itself: And that his Majesty would effectually apply himself to prevent the Loss of the Low Countries, by such Ways and Means, as to his great Prudence should seem meet.

Such was the Countenance the Exclusionists receiv'd from abroad; and such were the Impertinencies which his Majesty was expos'd to from foreign Considerations: Nor is it to be presum'd, that these were all: His most Christian Majesty could not but see how nearly his Interest was concern'd in these Memorials, nor how much it behov'd him to throw his whole Weight and Interest into the Scale of the Duke of York, both to fulfil his Obligations, and for his own immediate Service.

The Duchesse of Portsmouth, however, who is said to have been his Proxy, and to have acted in all things by his Direction, openly took the other Side of the Question; and appear'd as strenuous for the Exclusion, as if the whole Benefit of it had been to defend on her own Offspring. According to Bishop Burnet, who affirms it on the Credit of Mr. Montagu, she was induc'd to act this Part from that very Consideration; it having been propos'd to her, "That if she could bring the King to the Exclusion, and some other popular Things, the Parliament would go next to prepare a Bill for securing the King's Person, in which a Clause might be carry'd, that the King might declare the Successor to the Crown, as had been done in Henry the Eighth's Time;" which left an Opening for her to make use of her Ascendancy over him, in favour of her own Children. But then the same Prelate also adds, on the same Authority, that she had actually drawn the King to consent to it, and that she was to have 600,000 l. for the Jobb; which latter Story seems to destroy the former; for there is no Necessity to bribe People to serve their own Ends. It has also a fairer Face of Probability to recommend it; for, whereas his Lordship observes, in the first Instance, that the Duke of Monmouth and she were brought to an Agreement with respect to the Exclusion, and thought they were making Tools of one another: It is plain, that by the last, both might have been gratify'd; he in his Ambition, she in her Avarice; as also the King in his Ease; and all at the Expence of his Royal Highness: And this being presum'd and allow'd, the Sequel is most natural and probable, viz: That the several Parties to the Agreement so thoroughly distrust'd each other, that neither durst, or would, fulfill the Conditions of it first; and so the Whole became impracticable.

In the midst of all these Cabals, Intrigues, and Solicitations, and while to every way shroudd with Difficulties and Perplexities, it would be but reasonable to suppose, that the King was far from being the happiest Man in his Kingdom; and yet Sir John Reresby, who has taken his Portrait after the Life, affirms, that, at this very Crisis, he seem'd to be wholly free from Care and Trouble; and the (5) Detail he gives of his Majesty's Conversation and Behaviour, when undressing for Bed, very sufficiently proves, that either he had less Sensibility of Pain, or more Skill to conceal it, than Princes usually have.

It appears, however, from the same Author, that many were of Opinion, That his own pressing Wants, and the fair Offers of the Commons, join'd to the known Fickleness

"I was at the King's Couch, when there were but four present: His Majesty was in a very good Humour, and took up some time in displaying to us the Pallacy and Emptiness of those who pretend to a fuller Measure of Sanctity than their Neighbours; and pronounced them to be, for the most part, abominable Hypocrites, and the most earnest Knaves: An Instance of which, he mention'd several eminent Men of our own Times; not 'twas to introduce some mirrored Heads among the rest, which he pretended to be none of the best, tho' their devout Exterior gave them the Character of Saints with the Crowd. However, there were, of the Men so pointed out, some whom the King had no Reason to love, upon a political Account; which may be pleas'd in Abatement of the Acrimony of his Censure. He was that Night two full Hours in putting off his Cloaths, and it was half an Hour past One before he went to Bed. He seem'd to be quite free from Care and Trouble, tho' one would have thought, at this time, he should have been overwhelmed therewith; for every body now imagin'd, he must either dissolve the Parliament in a few Days, or deliver himself up to their pressing Desires; but the Straight he was in seem'd no way to embarrass him. Fickleness and Indulgence of his natural Disposition, would have induced him to abandon the Duke: And that he did not, was probably more owing to the Indifference of the Exclusionists, than to his Attachment to his Brother. They had driven too furiously: They had behav'd, as if they had had the Court at their Mercy: And were too secure of carrying, in the long run, what Points they pleas'd. This made the King soon apprehensive, that his Brother's Case was, at the Bottom, his own; and made him as soon resolve to espouse it accordingly; as is evident by his saying, about this time, to Sir John Kersey, If I do not stick by my old Friends, I shall have no body to stick by me: And again, from Lord Hallifax's assuring the same Gentleman, that there was not the least Probability of his Majesty's complying with the Proposals of the Commons; which he compar'd to the offering a Man Money to cut off his Nose. Bishop Barnet also takes notice, that when Lord Essex had made a Motion in the House of Lords for a Bill of Association, in support of certain Limitations (sc.) discuss'd of by Lord Hallifax, and that some cautionary Towns should be put into the Hands of the Associates, during the King's Life, to make them good after his Death, his Majesty look'd upon it as a Design to make him instrumental to his own Deposition; and concluded, that he himself was chiefly levelled at, tho', for Decency's sake, his Brother was only nam'd. As we proceed, we shall meet with yet other Circumstances, that sufficiently justify his Majesty's Suspicions, and account for his Behaviour.

The 4th of January was the Day appointed for returning his Majesty's Answer to the Commons Address; which, it was foreseen, would give so much Disgust to the House, that no body car'd to be the Bearer: It was properly the Business of the Secretary, Sir Leoline Jenkins, but he was already on ill Terms with the House, and for that Reason was excus'd; Sir Robert Carr and Mr. Godolphin, who were next pitch'd upon, excus'd themselves; and the Druggery was at last impos'd upon Sir William Temple (not by the Choice or Direction of the Council-board, but at the Influence of the King himself) who, indeed, submitted to it, but with so ill a (a) Grace, that the Merit of the Service was lost by the Manner of undertaking it: And, what was still worse, without obliging his Majesty, he moreover incurred the Displeasure of the House; and Sir William Jones, in particular, took an Opportunity to let him know, how sorry he was to see him employ'd in the Delivery of so unacceptable a Message; saying, in effect, That, for himself, he was old and infirm, and expected to die soon; but that he (Temple) would, in all Probability, live to see the whole Kingdom lament the Consequences of it.

The Message itself was as follows:

Swift's Appendix to Temp. Mem. p. 308.

(a) Sir William Temple says (in his Memoirs, Part iii. p. 252.) That, tho' they were daily talk'd of, they never appear'd.

" CHARLES Rex,

His Majesty received the Address of this House with all the Disposition they could wish, to comply with their reasonable Desires: But, upon perusing it, he is sorry to see their Thoughts so wholly fix'd upon the Bill of Exclusion, as to determine, that all other Remedies for the suppressing of Popery will be ineffectual. His Majesty is confirm'd in his Opinion against that Bill, by the Judgment of the House of Lords, who reject'd it. He therefore thinks, there remains nothing more for him to say, in answer to the Address of this House, but to recommend to them the Consideration of all other Means for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion; in which they have no Reason to doubt his Concurrence, whenever they shall be presented to him in a parliamentary Way: And that they would consider the present State of the Kingdom, as well as the Condition of Christendom, in such a manner as may enable him to preserve Tangor, and secure his Alliances abroad, and the Peace and Settlement at home.

As to the Effect of this Message, it was exactly conformable to the Expectations entertain'd of it at Court; that is to say, it set the House in a Flame, and every leading Patriot gave vent to his Resentments, in the freest Terms he could use: Mr. Henry Booth led the Way, with a sort of Half-Compliment to the King, signifying, That no body doubted his Concurrence in any other Means to secure the Protestant Religion, when he should be pleas'd to follow the Dictates of his own Judgment: But that while he was surrounded with the known Creatures of the Duke, scarce any thing of that kind was to be expected from him. He then made a Transition to the House of Lords, concerning whom he was pleas'd to say, "It is well known how many of that House came to their Honours, and by whose Interest; and it is not strange, that those who are as Servants should obey their Master: But strange, indeed, it is, proceeded he, that those who have prevailed with the King to reject the Bill, if Protestants, should be so unconcern'd for the Protestant Religion, as not to offer what Expedients they have, to secure it any other Way; especially, since the last Parliament, as well as this, found it a Talk too hard for them." Hence he concluded, that the rejecting the Exclusion-Bill, which was the Expedient the House had propos'd, without making any Proposal of their own in lieu of it, was a Demonstration, that the Duke's Interest was more considered than the People's: That, as long as that was the Case, nothing was to be obtain'd against Popery: And that, since they were not permitted to proceed by Bill, they ought to pass such Votes as might convince their Constituents, that they had done all they could for the Service of their Country, &c. 1. That neither the King's Person, nor the Protestant Religion could be secur'd without the Exclusion-Bill. 2. That they could give no Money, without endangering the King's Person, and Protestant Religion, till that Bill was allow'd to pass. 3. That there should be no Anticipations of the Revenue. And, 4. That such Persons as had advis'd the Dissolution of the present Parliament, should undergo the Censure of the House. Mr. Montagu rose next, and without seconding Mr. Beath in form, observ'd, That the House had committed a great Error in the Beginning of the Session, in going about to look for the Popish Plot in the Tower; whereas they ought to have search'd for it among the Duke's Friends at Court. Sir Henry Capel, at his very rising, declar'd for the Votes propos'd by Mr. Beath; expressly call'd upon the King's Servants in the House, to propose their Expedients in Lieu of the Exclusion-Bill, if they had any to offer, and pass'd in the midst of his Speech to give them an Opportunity——But they having no such Commission, continued silent in their Places; and he went on to say, among a Variety of other things, That as long as there was a Popish-Successor, there would be a Popish-Interest; that as long as there was a Popish-Interest, the Nation would be divid'd at home, and for that reason usel'ss to their Allies abroad: That they were now, thro' the Prevalency of jesuitical Councils, and jesuitical Policy, reduc'd to this Dilemma: If they gave Money, there was reason to fear it would be employ'd to their own Destruction; if not, there was equal reason to fear that Flanders, if not Holland, would be lost: That he spoke so largely and earnestly, because he was doubtful, whether he should ever have an Opportunity to speak in that Place again: That such Endeavours had been us'd to unsettle things, that he was afraid not only of our Religion, but of the very Government and Being of the English Nation: That if Blood should be drawn, while the French King was so powerful, he might easily have the calling Voice: That if he should not interpose, God only knew what might be the End of such Confusions, as some Men endeavour'd to canic: That tho' all Projects for settling the Affairs of this Nation without Parliaments had hitherto prov'd unsuccessful, and been attended with ill Consequences, he fear'd the Experiment would be try'd again; and that because he was of opinion the Use of Parliaments must be destroy'd, before Popery could be establish'd in this Nation. Mr. Hyde was the next Speaker, who artfully waving all Notice of the Call which had been made by Sir Henry Capel on the Court, plant'd all his Batteries against any farther Proceedings with respect to the Exclusion-Bill; and said it would be much better to follow his Majesty's Directions in his Message, and to try some other way to prevent any farther Disagreement; that so the Parliament might have a happy Conclusion. Lord Caversham declar'd for proceeding with those other Bills they had on foot, since they were not like to have that; and for clotting with the first of the Votes mov'd for, provided it was not meant to preclude the House from trying what could be done by other Laws, lest Advantage should be taken to break the present Parliament; which, he said, he trembled to think of; because of the great Ruin it would bring upon our Affairs both abroad and at home. Sir Robert Markham, had, by this time, bethought himself of an Expedient to answer the Purposes of the Exclusion-Bill, viz. That the Prince of Orange might be appointed to administer the Government jointly with the Duke, under such Restrictions as the House should think fit: But, like all other unconcerned things, it met with little Attention, and less Countenance. Sir William Jones saying upon it, That it did not become the Gravity of the House to be put out of their Method, unless the Court had made their Proposal (as they had been challeng'd to do) Asalto, that crown'd Heads and Lovers could not bear Rivals, nor were at Ease till they were remov'd: And yet farther of Expedients in general, that if any could be found, which were, really and effectually like to prejudice the Duke's Interest, he saw no Reason why the same Arguments should not be urg'd against them as against the Bill, since it was not the Name, but the Thing, that was the Matter of Contest on both Sides. "But, added he, the Truth is, that all other Bills, in this Case, would be no more for the Security of our Religion, than a great many Leases, Releases, and other Writings, are, in many Cases of Estates, without Fines and Recoveries." Mr. Finch trod in the Footsteps of Mr. Hyde, and advis'd the passing on to other Bills, to prevent the breaking up of the Parliament, which he intimated would be the Consequence of prosecuting that Bill. Another Member then declar'd, That he was not for cheating those who sent him: That he thought it more for the Interest of the Nation to have no Laws, than such as would prove but a Snare; and that he had rather lose both his Religion and his Life, for want of Power to defend them, than be fool'd out of them by trusting to such Laws: That if a Popish King should succeed, it could not be doubted, but that those who were so loyal as to bring him in, would likewise be loyal, as it would be call'd, to obey him in all things. And the same Argument which Queen Mary us'd, viz. That the Execution of all Ecclesiastical Laws might be suspended by Force, but could never be repeal'd by Acts of Parliament, would be made the same Use of, to authorize a new Persecution; and that unless they could prevail with the King to come over to their Side, it would be impossible for the Protestant Interest to subsist long. According to Mr. George Vernon, all their Difficulty was to satisfy his Majesty, That nothing but the Exclusion-Bill could save his People from Popish Bondage; for that being done, he made no doubt of his passing it, to save three Nations from perishing. He also insinuated, That tho' his Majesty now seem'd to rely on the Judgment of the Lords, he would possibly find, upon Enquiry, that they had rejected the Bill; because it was known he desir'd fir'd they should do so; and because they were aw'd by his Presence: That there was room to think they had now more favourable Thoughts of it; and that a Conference would even bring them to an Agreement: For which reason he advis'd, That they should, by a Vote, declare their Resolution to adhere to the Bill. Sir William Pulteney, in answer to those who had urg'd, that a Popish King would be content with the Crown, and for that Reason think it his Interest to make no Attempt to change our Religion, was pleas'd to say, That a Popish Head on a Protestant Body, would be such a Monster in Nature, as would neither be fit to preserve or be preferred; and that it would follow as naturally as Night follows Day, that either the Head would change the Body, or the Body the Head. Sir Francis Winnington admir'd how the King should know the Sense of the Lords in a parliamentary way, so as to authorize the Mention of it to them; and that he should take that unparalleled Trouble of attending them daily for the good of the Protestant Religion with so little Success: And, that for the better Regulation of their Proceedings for the future, it would be advisable to consider why a Bill of that Consequence had met with such unprecedented Treatment; and resolv'd all into the Prevalence of the Popish Interest at the Council-Board. Mr. Secretary Jenkins repeated his old Maxim, That the Bill, if pass'd, would be void of itself; was clear, that tho' such Laws might not be obtain'd, as would prevent the Duke from succeeding, there would be no Difficulty in obtaining such as would secure the Protestant Religion, after he had succeeded; and clos'd with putting this Alternative to the House; Whether it were not better so to provide for that Security, than to prosecute a Matter that the King and Lords had declar'd against; more especially the King, who would never give his Consent to it, because he thought it illegal and unjust? Colonel Titus undertook to answer the Secretary, and had recourse to the Omnipotence of Parliaments to batter down his Maxim as to the Illegality of the Bill; but allow'd he was right enough in one thing, the Impossibility of carrying it: Said the same Objections lay against the Association-Bill, as the Exclusion-Bill; Signify'd that the Retrievation in the King's Messages, Speeches, &c. imply'd a clear Denial of all Laws against Popery; That all Laws against Popery, if once they had a Popish King, would signify nothing; That he would either evade or over-rule them; That an Access of Power to the Parliament which seem'd the only reasonable way to render such Laws effectual, would create mutual Jealousies, and soon end in such a Breach as would endanger the Government; and upon the whole he concluded, that to accept of such Expedients as had been offer'd, A. D. 1689-1. would be as strange, as if, in case there was a Lion in the Lobby, they should vote, that it would be more for their Security to let him in and chain him, than to keep the Door fast against him. Mr. L. Gower observ'd, That all those who argu'd against the Bill, talk'd out of Coleman's Declaration, and that except by the Exclusion-Bill there was no way to provide for the Security of Religion, but at the Expence of Monarchy, which neither the House ought to propose, nor the King to grant.

Upon the Issue, a Question was stated on the first of Mr. Boyle's Motions, and with an (b) Amendment in point of Expression (which had been offer'd by Sir William Juxon to prevent any Misconstruction, that the House assum'd a Legislative Power) pass'd: Two other Questions were, moreover, stated on the second and fourth of the said Motions, which were also agreed in the following Terms: "Resolv'd, That his Majesty, in his last Message, having assur'd this House of his Readiness to concur in all other Means for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion; that this House doth declare, that until a Bill be likewise pass'd for excluding the Duke of York, this House cannot give any Supply to his Majesty without Danger to his Majesty's Person, extreme Hazard of the Protestant Religion, and Unfaithfulness to those by whom this House is intrusted. Resolv'd, That all Persons who advis'd his Majesty in his last Message to this House, to persist in his Opinion against the Bill for excluding the Duke of York, have given pernicious Councils to his Majesty, and are Promoters of Popery, and Enemies to the King and Kingdom."

But this Vote of Censure not being held sufficient, particular Persons were nam'd, as the reputed Authors of those pernicious Councils: And, after a long and warm Debate, it appear'd to be the Sense of the House, that Common Fame, or universal Agreement, reduc'd a Charge to moral Certainty, and authoriz'd the House to address the King for the Removal of such Counsellors or Officers as were generally thought Enemies to the Public: That it was the ancient Right, and had been the constant Practice, of the House to proceed in that manner, on such Grounds: That it was the only way to reach great Ministers who abus'd their Power or Influence, and to secure the Government against their evil Practices: That there was now as great Occasion as ever to make use of this only way; the Influence of Popish Councils having reduc'd the Nation, not only to the Mercy of the Popish Party at home, but of a Foreign Power: That the Danger on all Sides impending, could no otherwise be prevented, than by establishing such a mutual Confidence between the King and his People, as might give Encouragement for the raising a consider-

(b) Fin. Instead of these Words, That the Duke's being a Popish King would be content with the Crown, the Vote was made to run thus: "That it is the Opinion of this House, that there is no Security nor Safety for the Protestant Religion, the King's Life, or Government of the Nation, without passing a Bill for disabling James Duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm, &c. And to rely upon any other Means and Remedies, without such a Bill, is not only insufficient, but dangerous."

considerable Sum of Money to be employ'd for the Preservation of the Public; which was never like to be done till the King was serv'd by Persons more in the Interest of his Majesty and the Protestant Religion, and less in that of the Duke and Popery. The Result of all were several Votes, ordering several Addresses to be prepar'd and presented to his Majesty, viz. against the Earl of Hallifax, the Marquis of Worcester, and the Earl of Clarendon, as being the Advisers of his Majesty's last Message, Promoters of Popery, and Enemies to the King and Kingdom; against the Earl of Feversham, as a Promoter of Popery and of the French Interest, and a dangerous Enemy to the King and Kingdom; and against Mr. Hyde and Mr. Seymour, without aligning any Cause; but, however, requesting that his Majesty would remove them both from his Council and Preference for ever.

and the Advance of Money on the Revenue.

And, finally, that the King himself might feel the Smart of their Resentments, as well as his Ministers, the House enter'd farther into a Consideration of the great Charge brought upon the Kingdom, by Interest and Advance-money paid to Goldsmiths and others: And the Majority being of opinion, that, by coming to an Understanding with his Parliament, his Majesty might regain the Affections of his People, and be supply'd with Money for the necessary Support of Government, and his other Occasions; that the several Offers already made by the House, on condition such Bills were pass'd as were precisely necessary for the Security of the Protestant Religion, were sufficient Proofs that such Supplies were really and cordially at his Devotion; and that all other Ways of supplying his Occasions not only tended to bring Parliaments into Disuse, to exhaust the public Treasury, and contract Debts, but to endanger both the King and Kingdom, by undermining the Constitution; it was resolv'd, "That whosoever should, thereafter, lend, or cause to be lent, by way of Advance, any Money upon the Branches of the King's Revenue arising by Custom, Excise, or Hearth-money, should be judg'd a Hinderer of the Sitting of Parliaments, and be responsible for the same in Parliament. That whosoever shall accept or buy any Tally, or Anticipation, upon any Part of the King's Revenue; or whosoever shall pay such Tally, hereafter to be struck, shall be judg'd, &c. as before."

Thus the Siege carry'd on by the Commons against the Court was turn'd into a Blockade; and the proper Dispositions were made, either to starve them into a Surrender, or furnish Pretences to make Preparations for a Storm.

Vol. I. p. 186.

As to the House of Lords, Bishop Burnet assures, they did nothing very material, after the rejecting the Exclusion-Bill: But in such flitting Times, it is utterly inconceivable, that so stirring a Spirit as Lord Shaftsbury should leave them without Employment.

Heads of a Speech in the House of Peers, which I do not find in Shaftsbury.

A Speech is extant in the State Tracts, temp. Car. II. intitled, The Speech of a noble Peer, and by the general Voice ascrib'd to that Nobleman, which very clearly shews there was yet another great Day in that House; and that even there the Exclusionists were not quell'd with one Repulse: For, in the Preamble, the general Topics of that Day's Debate (viz. Dec. 23.) are set forth under these several Heads: The King's Speech (of the 15th) the sad State and Condition of the Nation, and the Remedies thereof: And as to the particular Drift of it, there is Reason to conclude it was for an Address against evil Counsellors, and possibly against some Persons of the King's own Family: For in one of the first Paragraphs of this notable Speech, we find a Reference to the Conduct of Henry IV. who put away a great Part of his Family and Council at one time; because the People spoke ill of them. Immediately after, mention is made of the chargeable Ladies at Court; and an arch Question is ask'd, in the Words of Samuel to Saul, "What means the Bleating of this kind of Cattle?" for the sake of an arch Answer, "That the King reserves them for Sacrifice, and means to deliver them up to please his People: And the next Passage pretumes to give the Law, as follows: "For there must be, in plain English, my Lords, a Change; we must neither have popish Wife, nor popish Favourite, nor popish Mistress, nor popish Counsellor, at Court, nor any new Convert." A Lady out of Court is then spoken of (perhaps the Duchess of Mazarine) as equally obnoxious; because, like Sempronius in Cataline's Conspiracy, she did more mischief than Catibogus: Some Expressions, which Lord Hallifax had let fall in the Course of the Debate, are repeated, viz. "That the House of Commons had lately made Offers to the King: That he wonder'd their Lordships did not expect his Majesty's Answer to them, before they enter'd into such hot and high Debates: That if the King could be assur'd of Supplies, no doubt could be made of his Compliance with all they should think fit to ask: And that, if those were refus'd, it would throw his Majesty into the worst Condition of a Prince; That of having lost the Confidence of his People." And occasion is taken to retort, in Substance, That such a Gratification of the King would be the Ruin of the Nation: That it was a hard thing to say, they could not trust the King: That they had been deceiv'd too often already: That the Apprehensions of Discontent among the People had no Weight at Court: That his Majesty was a Prince that had not his Parallel in Story: That, in the midst of so many Proofs of a Design to murder him, he seem'd little apprehensive of it: That the Transactions between him and his Brother were admirable, and incomprehensible: That, tho' the Duke had aspir'd to the Crown, before his Majesty's Restoration; had given out the Queen was never like to have Children, as soon as his Father-in-law had made the Match, and, in consequence thereof, had declar'd himself the indubitable Heir, the King had allow'd him Guards, lodg'd him on the same Floor, lay within his Reach, and in his Power every Night, and in a manner divided the Sovereignty with with him, by making him the Dispenser of all the Trusts, Offices, and Dignities, both secular and ecclesiastic, in the Gift of the Crown: That, tho' he had chang'd his Religion, had form'd a Party to support him in spite of his Apostacy (such a Party as made it necessary for the King to out-bid his Brother in Favours to them, for his own Security) and had even headed the Plot, his Majesty had so behav'd, since it broke out, as made it every Day apprehended the Court would join with his Highness against the People; and more had evidently been done to make the Plot esteem'd a Propheterian Plot, than to prosecute the Discovery of it: That the several Prorogations and Dissolutions of Parliament shew'd, what Reason there was to place a Confidence in the Court: And that, above all, while the Duke had his Residence in Scotland, while he was raising Forces on the Terra firma, that could make their Entrance dry-foot, without Hazard of Winds and Seas, as soon as he should have Notice, there was no room for Trust: That, on the contrary, it was thought the Business was now so ripe, They having the Garrisons, the Arms, the Ammunition, the Seas, and Soldiery, all in their Hands, nothing was wanting but a good Sum of Money to set up and crown the Work: That, afterwards, the Good-will of the People would be of little Use, and consequently the Want of it would be little lamented.— For what remains, we must have recourse to the very Words of the Speech, that the unprecedented Licence of these Times may bear witness against itself:

“ My Lords, I hear of a Bargain in the House of Commons, and an Address made to the King; but this I know, and must boldly say it, and plainly, that the Nation is betray'd, if upon any Terms we part with our Money, till we are sure the King is ours: Have what Laws you will, and what Conditions you will, they will be of no use but waste Paper, before Easter, if the Court have Money to set up for Popery and arbitrary Designs in the mean while.

On the other hand, give me leave to tell you, my Lords, the King hath no Reason to distrust his People; no Man can go home and say, that if the King comply with his People they will do nothing for him, but tear all up from him: We want a Government, and we want a Prince that we may trust, even with the spending of half our annual Revenues, for some time, for the Preservation of these Nations.

The growing Greatness of the French cannot be stop't with a little Expence, nor without a real and hearty Union of the King and his People. It was never known in England that our Princes wanted Supplies, either for their foreign Designs, or for their Pleasures; nothing ever stut the English Parties, but the Fears of having their Money us'd against them.

The Hour that the King shall satisfy the People, that what we give is not to make us Slaves and Papists, he may have what he will: And this your Lordships know, and all Mankind that know us. Therefore, let me plainly tell your Lordships, the Arguments that the present Ministry use are to destroy the King, and not preserve him: For, if the King will first see what we will do for him, it is impossible, if we are in our Senses, we should do any thing.

But if he will first heed, that he is entirely ours; that he weds the Interest and the Religion of the Nation; 'tis impossible he should want any thing that we can give.

But I see how the Argument will be us'd: Sir, they will do nothing for you, what should you do with these Men? But, on the other hand, I am bold to say,

Sir, You may have any thing of this Parliament; put away these Men, change your Principles, change your Court, and be your self; for the King himself may have any thing of us.

My Lords, If I have been too plain, I beg your Pardon: I thought it was the Duty of an English Nobleman at this time to speak plain, or never.

I am sure I mean well; and if any Man can answer or oppose Reason to what I say, I beg they would do it; for I do not desire or propose any Question.

I beg this Debate may last for some Days, and that we may go to the Bottom of the Matter, and see if these things are so or no, and what Cure there is of the Evil we are in; and then the Result of your Debates may produce some proper Question.

However, we know who bears; and I am glad of this, that your Lordships have dealt so honourably and so clearly in the King's Presence, and in the King's Hearing, that he cannot say he wants a right State of Things: He hath it before him, and may take Counsel as he thinks fit.

Now, though it does not appear that the King shew'd any Disposition to obey the Dictates of this Master in Politics; or, that they produced any Vote or Resolution, that might flatter the Views of his Party; it is certain, the Complexion of the House had undergone such a Change since the Rejection of the Exclusion-Bill, that for thirty-three which appear'd against the Court then, no less than fifty-five stood forth as Patriots now. And that all Defects of Strength and Spirit within-doors might be made good by the Clamours and Strivings of those without, the Ingredients of this Speech, with such Additions and Alterations as were proper to insatiate, mislead, and influence, were spread on a (c) Half-sheet, and dispensed as a reasonable

(c) The Publishing of this Piece afterwards gave rise to another remarkable Paper, called, The Character of a Resolute Courtier, which is here inserted for the Reader's further Satisfaction.

sonable Dose thro' the Kingdom. One of these printed Copies, it seems, reached the Duke of Ormond at his Government in Ireland: And his Sentiments of it we find thus express'd, in a Letter from his Grace to his Son, the Earl of Arran, dated January the 9th, 1680-1. "If the Speech we have here in Print was spoke in the Lords House, as it is printed, and shall pass without any Reprehension, or so much as an Explanation, I know not why any Subject should wonder at any thing said of him or to him. It is plain out of whose Shop the Articles you mark'd come: And it is visible here, that the Merchant has fill great Credit with his Partners."—But, as it happen'd, it did not pass without Reprehension. The King was personally attack'd in it; and wiald to openly and indecently, that tho' many complain'd of the Outrage, none were found hardy enough to justify it: Even the Lord Shaftsbury, himself, to whom it was imputed, had the Grace to disown it, and thereby escap'd the Censure of the House. And as to the Paper, it was order'd to be burnt by the Common Hangman; which was perform'd accordingly in the Old-Palace-Yard, at the Royal Exchange, &c. on the 4th of January.

During all these Bickerings with Relation to the Succession, the Churchmen and all their implicit Followers, as before observ'd, had prefer'd the Interest of the Monarchy to that of their Religion; and shew'd themselves more apprehensive of a Gap in the Succession, than of the Introduction of Popery; while, on the other hand, the Protestant Nonconformists, of all Denominations, had clos'd with the Exclusionists, and work'd against Popery with Might and Main; some, honestly, out of mere Zeal, but more, hypocritically, with a View to their own Establishment.

It is a Fundamental in Politics, that all Men are govern'd by their Interest; and that whatever Pretences varnish over the Outside of things, God, himself, would not be serv'd without a Consideration. Thus Care was taken to quicken the Righteousness of their over-righteous Sects, with the Shew of a Reward: And several Bills were accordingly brought in to give them a Prospect of, if not an Opening to, the Promis'd Land. In particular, two were of Ease and Indulgence, and Proceedings in Favour of the Nonconformists.

So he was prefer'd, for his Ability, to the highest Places of Honour and Office; admitted into the Cabinet Council; made acquainted with all the secret Wheels; and could tell how many Cogs there were in each Wheel, upon which the great Engine of State was turn'd, and kept in motion.

By the Favour of his Prince, he acquired sufficient Riches to support the Splendor of a Family, use-ful to the Degree of Nobility.

His City was once so eminently conspicuous, that there were but a few Factions below the Crown steerd above him; and nothing was wanting to render his Felicity as falling in Nature intended his Life, but a Heart that knew how to be grateful to a successful Benefactor.

He thought all the Favours and Honours he enjoy'd were less than the Reward of his Merit: That Thought paid him up with Pride, such a Sort of Pride as is closely attended with an irreparable Fall, which was his Fortune; and as his Fall (like that of Lucifer, his Protestant might very well have been proclaim'd, How to see the Inhabitants of the Earth, for the Devil is come down among you.

Open Revenge against his Sovereign being too dangerous to attempt, he presently resolv'd upon foibles; he espous'd all the Weakness and Inconveniences of the Court (from which no Court, or City, or Country, is or will ever be free) and where he can find no real Faults, he seizes imaginary ones, and persecutes out for Convent.

By his new made Office, he represent every Mite full of Millions in the public Administration, for a Minister is call'd Country, and so degrades to the Top of Class a City, he multiplied and multiplied the very Misfortunes which were the Effect of his own evil Council.

He makes the Irish Nation in the Unlawful, with wild Rumours, and extravagant Apprehensions of Slavery; makes the Government of a Prince, who in Acts of Favour, and Mercy, and Clemency, has exceed'd all his Predecessors.

He sets the Head of the People with whizzing Fears, of Genial Devils, Chamberlains, which only his Malice had invent'd, on purpose to frighten them out of their Loyalty, and their Wives, and possess and open them for Edwards, of Rebellion.

He makes the Pretences of Liberty the Snare to get up, and Religion the Snare he slides in, pursuit of his monstrous Designs.

With these Pretences, he chews the Innocent (after tickling their Fancies with the Leather of Religion) and, promising to open their Eyes, turn'd them as the poor Angel did our Parents in Paradise, only blow into them the Dull of Disbelief, and then rebids them of those Jewels he undertook to bestow, viz. Liberty and Religion, which are both as much talk'd of, and both so little understood.

Being a Gentleman of no Religion himself, he seems, for all that, to espouse every Division and Sub-division of it, every Faction and Person, who are bold enough to stand him in opposition to the ancient and well settled Government.

If he be by Inclination covetous, and temperate by Nature and Habit, he rather chuses to invert Nature itself, than suffer a Disappointment in his Designs of Revenge; to which he makes a Sacrifice at once, both of his Virtues and his Vices.

He keeps open House for Entertainment of all State-Malcontents, without Consideration of Quality or Qualification.

He accompanies, and carouses, and contrains Intimacy, and Amity, with the lewdest Debauchees in all the Nation, that he thinks will any ways help to forward his private Intrigues.

He becomes all Things to all Men, in the very word of Seneca; perverting the Design of St. Paul, that he may at last prevail upon some to be as bad as himself.

Nor are still and easy Men by him only deluded, he is too cunning for the very Lawyers themselves (tho' they are too cunning for all the rest of Mankind) a most eminent Attorney, and a famous Solicitor, and a reversed Judge, are not free from the Force of his Incantations.

By the Subtlety of his Insinuation, he bewitches to alliance with him great Part of the new, and of the Sons of the old, Nobility; the Sons of such Fathers as dy'd in the faithful Defence of their suffering Sovereign.

He deceives (besides a Number of other great Men, and great Counsellors) a General of an Army, a Viceroy of a Kingdom, a Darling of the People, and a Son to the greatest and the best of Fathers upon Earth.

He would fain be reputed as constant as the Sun; and yet his Appals produced nothing beneath the Moon more fickle and variable; for he never was, and 'tis his never will be true to any thing; saw only the eternal Revelation of doing Mischief.

Having lost his Honour with his Prince, and the good Opinion of the best Subjects and best Men; he cringes, and creeps, and fawns, to the meanest and basest of the People, to procure himself, among them, an empty and vain-glorious, because undeserv'd, Name; the Patron of his Country.

And hoping to be shortly made the First Head of the great Rabble: He would persuade them to believe that they are all betray'd, and that the King himself is in the Plot against himself, as well as in the Plot against them.

He encourages them to strike home, against those whom he calls the Enemies of the King and Kingdom (pointing at the faithfulllest and most affectionate Servants to both) well knowing, that the mighty Public can never be shaken, till its main Pillars and Supports be, by cunning and by Stratagem, most deliberately, and undermined.

At last, thro' his Divine Providence, the magical Milt he had call'd before Mens Eyes dissipates, and totally vanishes.

The hypocritical Veil falls off of its own accord, leaving his Deceit and naked, and openly exposed.

His dearly beloved Mistress, popular Applause, forsakes him; and to complete his Undoing, he lives to see the Efflux and Burial of his Fame; even the very Fame of his Politics.

So that nothing remains to yield him Consolation, after such feeble and being Disgraces, but only the Liberty he has left him to follow the great Example of King David's defeated Politician. (Out of Lord Somers's, Coll. 2. c. 22.) and one contain'd the Project of a Comprehension; and was call'd (A) A Bill for uniting his Majesty's Protestant Subjects: But this bill was not introduc'd till towards the latter End of December, when the Close of the Session was in-View. And hence it may be concluded, that it was one of those parliamentary Fireworks, that are occasionally let off, only to make a Noise, and expire. It was, however, both oppos'd on one hand, and defended on the other, by those who were not in the Secret of Things, with as much Eagerness, as if it had been a Measure seriously pursu'd, and in a fair way of becoming a Law. The Danger of the Church was the common Topic of both Sides: Even the Advocates for it granted, that Papist and Fanatic were alike Enemies to the Church: But then they urg'd that the Papist was the most dangerous, because he had the most Power; and that by making Peace with the one, they should be the better able to subdue the other. This way of Reasoning, however, did not weigh with the Opposers: They laid hold on the Concession, that the Fanatics were Enemies to the Church; and insisted, That the pulling down the Pales of the Church was no way to preserve it; and that instead of being invited, they ought to be compell'd to come in. To this it was reply'd, That Experience had shewn, that Penal Laws had often serv'd the worst Purposes of Government, but never once the great End of making all Men of one Mind: That the chief Sticklers for these Laws had been Sir Thomas Clifford, Sir Salomon Staalé, and Sir Roger Strickland, then conceal'd, and afterwards avow'd Papists: And that Oppressions had been multiply'd only to raise the greater Clamour for a general Toleration. Upon the whole, the Bill was committed, on the Question; but afterwards dropt; no doubt, on the same political Principle which first made way for its Admission: For tho' it was expedient to humour the Nonconformists, it was not safe to wage War with the Church.

The Bill of (E) Ease or Toleration, as the like Bill is now call'd, however, went thro' all the

A. D. 1680.

(A) About this Time, William Pass, the celebrated Quaker, set forth a Paper, call'd, One Project for the Good of England; that is, our civil Union is our civil Safety: In which we find the following truly rational and politic Passages.

"Thus the incontestable Answer Christ made to the blasphemy of that Power which he wrought Miracles; A Kingdom divided against itself shall stand: What he said then, let us, on another Occasion, lay now, As interests divided against itself must fall."

"I know some Men will take fire at this, and by crying, The Church, The Church, hope to silence all Arguments of this Nature: but they must excuse me, if I pay no manner of regard to their Zeal, and hold their Devotion both ignorant and dangerous at this time. It is not the Way to fill the Church, to destroy the People. A Church without People is a Contradiction, especially when the Scripture tells us, first in the People that make the Church.

And this is not without an Appearance of Reason, that good and wise Men are apprehensive, that the greatest Sticklers for persecuting Protestant Dissenters, in England, are Men addicted and devoted to the Church of Rome, or at least animated by such as are, who, despairing of doing any great Feats, if known, hide themselves under this Pretence: But the Meaning of it is, to debilitate the Protestant Cause in general, by excluding the Church of England, in destroy all more Protestant Islands in their Kingdoms, that no room may remain for Popery to contend with, but the few zealous Adherers of that Church.

And that this may not look insignificant, or like a Trick of mine, I will inform it by a Demonstration. It is plain fact, that the Church of Rome hath ever since the Reformation practis'd the Restoration of her Religion and Power to these Kingdoms. It is as evident, that Religion is with her a Word for civil Interest; that is, that she may have the Rule over Men, both Body and Soul. For us Government she aims at, to have the Reins of Power in her Hand, to give Laws, and wield the Scepter.

To do this, she must either have a greater Interest than the Protestants that are now in possession, or else divide their Interest, and to weaken them by themselves, and make them Instruments to her Ends. That her own Force is considerable is clear. She has nothing within doors to give her Hope, but the Dissect of Protestants. It follows then, that the mark of necessity betwixt herself, and she her Arts to influence the Reasoning among Protestants, and carry their Dissents about religious Matters to a Division in the civil Interest. And it is the more to be fear'd, because, whatever she has been to others, she has been true to herself.

If this then be the only domestic Suggestion left her, we are sure she will use it, and, if too, it shall prove to be of great Importance, with all Protestants, to see how they pursue Ambition, and take all possible Care, that their Dissents about Faith or Worship which regard the civil World, divide not their Affection and Judgment about the common and civil Interest of their Country: Because, if that be kept entire, it will frustrate the Design of Rome, as if you were of one Religion. For since, as I said before, Religion, with the great Men of that Church, is nothing else, but a civil Word, for civil Interest preserve you but a sin but a sinner from Faction, and you are in that Sense of one Religion too; and that both as men, as you tend not first the Temptation of Smithfield, if you will be true to it.

This being the Case, I would take leave to ask the serious Gentlemen of the English Church, if Consistency to the Fashion of their Worship be dearer to them than England's Interest and the Cause of Protestantism? If their Love to Church Government be greater than to the Church and her Religion, and to their Country and her Laws? Or, lastly, Whether, in case they are sincere in their Allegations for the Church (which I doubt not) I could ingenuously I am sure to say, if it be to be supposed, that the present Churchmen (Commonists I mean) are better able of themselves to secure Possession, and our civil Interest, against the Attempts of Rome, than in conjunction with the civil Interest of all Protestant Dissenters? If they say Yes, I would have them at the same time, for the same Reason, to give it under their Hands, that 'tis a standing Rule in Antiquity, that Omne ius in aere captum, and that hitherto we have been all mistaken in the Art of Numbers.

Being brought to this Point, I conceive they may say, that they had rather deliver up their Church to the Power and Degree of Popery, than suffer Dissenters to be free among them, or Protestants, or of any nature Religion, and of the same civil Interest, or else follow to break those Bonds, that are laid upon Dissenters of their order, and (by Experience) of peaceable Conscience; and by Law establish the free Exercise of their Worship to Almighty God, that the Zeal, Jealousy, Distraction and Division, that now affect the one common Interest of Protestantism, may be removed; for it seems impossible to preserve a distant Interest from both. But with choice of these they may incline, I need not determine; and yet, I hope, they will not be of the Mind of a late Monk of Calice, that, in his public Exercise, rebuked the civil Magistrate to chide to have their Gay poor and catholic (that is, popish) rather than great and opulent, by the Admission of tending Heretics; but, if they could, may on Magistrates have, at least, their Prudence; for his Colloquia gave him the Hearing, but were in vain to the Interest, as the Monk to his Superstition. [Out of the Collection of Lord Somers.

(E) The Heads of which are as follow:

1. That all Persons convicted or professed by virtue of an Act made in the 24th Year of Queen Elizabeth, and another Act made in the 3d of King James, for Recusancy, that shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; and make and do by such Declarations to be made in the Court of Exchequer, Assize, or Oath-Sitting, shall be declared of all Penalties, Forfeitures, and Disabilities, by force of the said Statutes, without Composition or Fine.

2. That no Person taking the Oaths aforesaid, and subscribing the Declaration aforesaid, shall be prosecuted upon the said Acts in any ecclesiastical Court, by reason of their non-conformity to the Church of England: Provided that no Person dissenting from the Church of England, and meeting in any Place for religious Worship, with the Doors lock'd and Bars if shut, shall be deemed together, shall receive any Benefit from the Law: neither shall any of the Persons aforesaid be exempted from paying Tithes, or other parochial Duties.

3. That if any Person, dissenting from the Church of England, shall be chosen into any Parish Office, it shall be law-the Forms of the House, and was sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence: And the Lords themselves actually did concur in another Bill prepar'd by the Commons to repeal the sanguinary Statute of the 25th of Queen Elizabeth against the Brownists and Barrovists of those Days, as well as Papists; by which Recusancy, or the not coming to Church for a Month (which constituted a Recusant) was on Conviction to be expiated by public Abjuration, or punish'd by Death.

We are now come to the last Stage of this enterprising Parliament: By the Votes they had pass'd in the Close of their Debate on the King's Message, it was become notorious, that nothing short of the Exclusion-Bill would satisfy them; and that they were resolv'd to keep his Majesty in continual Distresses and Uneasiness, and the Nation in continual Ferments, till they had carry'd it. On the other hand, the King, difficult as he found it to maintain his Hold, resolv'd never to quit it, while he had any Strength or Power remaining. The Disposition he had shewn to bring Matters to a Compromise, had only serv'd to damp the Ardour of his Friends, and redouble the Confidence of his Opposers: This he was fully sensible of; as also, that a farther Manifestation of Fear on his Side, would create farther Presumption on theirs: And that if he was once at the Mercy of the Torrent, he must drive on with it, perhaps to Perdition. This desperate Situation of Things made a Prorogation necessary; and for fear of inflammatory Votes, all imaginable Precautions were taken, after the Measure was resolv'd on, to keep the Secret till the very Moment that it was to take effect. But it was of too volatile a nature to endure a total Restraint: And tho' the King came privately to the House (January 10.) the Commons had a Quarter of an Hour's previous Notice; in which short Interval, in a loose and disorderly manner, they made a shift to pass the following extraordinary Resolutions, &c.

Resolv'd, That whosoever advi'd his Majesty to prorogue this Parliament, to any other Purpose than in order to the passing of a Bill for the Exclusion of James Duke of York, is a Betrayer of the King, the Protestant Religion, and of the Kingdom of England, a Promoter of the French Interest, and a Pensioner to France.

That the Thanks of this House be given to the City of London (by the Members serving for the said City) for their manifest Loyalty to the King, their Care, Charge, and Vigilancy for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person and of the Protestant Religion.

That it is the Opinion of this House, That the City of London was burnt in the Year 1666, by the Papists, designing thereby to introduce Arbitrary Power and Popery into this Kingdom.

That the Commissioners of the Customs, and other Officers of the Custom-House, have wilfully broken the Law, prohibiting the Importation of French Wines, and other Commodities: And that if they shall hereafter wilfully or negligently break that Law, they shall be question'd, therefore, in Parliament.

That it is the Opinion of this House, That James Duke of Monmouth hath been remov'd from his Offices and Commands, by the Influence of the Duke of York.

That an humble Application be made to his Majesty from this House, &c. to restore the said James Duke of Monmouth to his said Offices and Commands.

That it is the Opinion of this House, That the Prosecution of Protestant Dissenters upon the Penal Laws, is at this time grievous to the Subject, a weakening of the Protestant Interest, an Encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the Peace of the Kingdom.

They had not time to proceed any farther, if they had any farther Matter to proceed upon. While the last Vote was yet passing, Sir Edward Carteret, Officer of the Black Rod, came to the Door, and order'd their Attendance on his Majesty above; They obey'd. The King pass'd such Bills as he thought proper, &c. A Bill to prohibit the Importation of Irish Cattle, and some private Bills: And the Lord Chancellor prorog'd the Parliament till the 20th following. The Bill to repeal the persecuting LAW, 35 of Queen Elizabeth, before spoken of, by a Court Judge, or as some say, by the express Command of his Majesty to the Clerk of the House, was not presented for the Royal Assent; and ful for him to execute the same by a sufficient Deputy: Provided the said Deputy be allow'd by two or more of the Judges of the Peace.

3. That no Dissenter in Holy Orders, or pretending thereby, that shall take the said Oath, and make and subscribe the aforesaid Declaration, together with his Assent and Consent to the Articles of Religion, mention'd in the 17th Year of the Queen, except only the 14th, 25th, and 26th, and these Words in the 20th Article, &c. That the Church has Power to depose Bishops and Clergymen, and actually in Contravention of Faith, shall be liable to the Pains and Penalties of either of the Acts made in the 13th or 21st Years of his present Majesty's Reign: Provided they do not present in any Place with the Deputy lock'd or bur'd.

4. That all Persons pretending to Holy Orders, that shall subscribe the Articles aforesaid, except before excepted, together with Part of the 27th Article concerning Infant-Baptism, and take the Oath, and make the Declaration aforesaid, shall enjoy all the Benefits and Advantages of this Act.

5. The Judges of the Peace are requir'd to tender the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy to any Person or Persons that go to private Meetings; and, upon Refusal to take them, and make the Declaration aforesaid, to commit them to Prison, without Bail or Mainprize; and, being so committed, if they shall refuse, upon a second Tender, to take the said Oath, or to make Declaration of their Allegiance, they shall be thenceforth taken for popish Recusants, considered, and suffer accordingly.

For those that scruple the taking of any Oath, the following Declaration shall be sufficient, being by them made and subscribed.

I acknowledge and declare, &c. That King Charles II. is a lawful King of the Realm, &c. and that the Pope, neither by himself, nor any Authority of the Church of Rome, or by any other Means, hath any Power to depose the King, or dispose of his Dominion, or to authorize any foreign Prince to invade or assay his Country, or to discharge any of his Subjects of their Allegiance or Obedience to him, &c.

6. Such Persons as shall conform to this Act are empower'd to keep Schools.

7. This Act not to extend to any Papist, or popish Recusant; or to any that shall deny the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

A. D. 1680-1. fo the Nonconformists had no more than the bare Opinion of the Commons to flatter them from the Indignation of the Crown.

Those who are pleas'd to assume the venerable Title of Patrist, have given large Scope to their Resentments against the King for this anti-constitutional Proceeding: And those who value themselves as much on the Glory of being Loyalists, have shew'd their Gall as freely on the Commons for their licentious Votes. And it may serve as a general Key to the modern History of England, That Parties have never to good a Title to be believ'd, as when they expose each other.

Disparagement on the Conduct of the Commons.

It is, however, impossible to turn our Backs on this Parliament without making two Observations, viz. 1. That, omnipotent as the Exclusionists were in the House of Commons, they never made one Step towards an Enquiry into the Legitimacy of the Duke of Monmouth; tho' in the Pamphlet, call'd, A Letter to a Person of Honour, before quoted, they had so loudly threaten'd to do his Grace that Justice, and to give the Nation that Satisfaction: And tho' any Proofs of the Facts they had so confidently advanc'd therein, had render'd the Exclusion Bill unnecessary. And, 2. That their parting Votes, which were apparently calculated to connect and unite themselves, the City, the Duke of Monmouth, and the whole dissenting Interest; that is to say, the Authority of one Branch of the Legislature, the Influence, Power, and Wealth of the Metropolis, the Popularity, Pretensions and military Skill of his Grace, and the Numbers, Strength, Zeal, and Resentments of so large a Party, in the common Eye of one common Interest, had very much the Aspect of making Provision for a Civil War.

Men. p. 112.

That the Court, also, were not without some such Apprehensions, is apparent from certain Passages in Sir John Kersey, who intimates in one Place, that, dining with Lord Hallifax, with whom we are to understand, he had the Honour of being particularly intimate, on the Day Lord Stafford was be-headed, his Lordship was pleas'd to say, Well, if it comes to a War, you and I must go together. And, again, in the next Page, (f) "That, waiting on the same Nobleman, on the Day the Parliament was prorog'd, he added farther, That if he, Kersey, would repose a Confidence in him, he would let him know when it was time to appear for the King's Service, and that he should share For- A. D. 1680-1.

It is further remarkable, that, on the very Day the Parliament was prorog'd, as if to shew, that, the Vote of Thanks from the Commons to the City, was the deliberate Result of a settled good Correspondence between the Leaders of both; a Body of Citizens waited on the Lord-Mayor (Sir Patterson Ward) with an Address, setting forth their Apprehensions of the great and imminent Dangers which that Metropolis, and the whole Protestant Interest were expos'd to, from the horrid and devilish Designs of the Papists, and others their Adherents; as also, their Sensibility that those Dangers were increas'd and heighten'd by the surprising Prorogation of the Parliament, and recommending the following Particulars to his Lordship, viz.

Address to the
call a Common Council.

I. That his Lordship would be pleas'd to cause the several Watches of the City to be doubled that Night, and so to continue; and cause some Housekeepers to watch in Person, and a sufficient Ward by Day.

II. To cause the several Chains in the several Streets of this City to be put up that Night, and so to continue.

III. To keep the Keys of the several Gates of the City that Night, and so to continue.

IV. To cause the several Gates of the City to be kept locked up every Lord's Day, and permit the several Wicket Doors only to be opened.

V. That his Lordship would not permit any Body of armed Soldiers, great or less, other than the Trained Bands of the City, to march through any part of the same.

VI. That his Lordship will forthwith order a Meeting of the Common Council of this City, January the 10th, 1680.

His Lordship's Answer was, not only satisfactory, but he figur'd his Conduct accordingly; a Common-Council was summon'd forthwith; an Address to his Majesty was propos'd, agreed to, and presented the same Evening, signifying, "That, whereas the Parliament had convicted one of the Popish Lords, and were about to convict the others; had impeach'd the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, and were about to impeach other Judges; all in order to the Preservation of his Majesty's Life, the Protestant Religion and Government, they were greatly surpris'd to see the Parliament prorog'd in the Height of very complex and fit.

City Address to the King, that the Parties must wait till fit.

(f) The whole of this Passage deserves a Place, as serving to give some Idea of what was then passing behind the Scenes.

"Waiting this Day on Lord Hallifax, he complain'd much of the Severity of the Commons in their Vote, That he was a Friend of Peace; and a Benefactor of the People; which, said he, were a Man near to innocency, yet coming from the representative Body of the People, is too heavy for the Shoulders of any one single Person; that he had these, or some other Thoughts of retiring from Court; but that, however, he would go on his own Peace, and not be kick'd out in their Pleasure. That if for the future his King should have occasion for him, in any thing that was just, he should be ready to serve him; That if I would repose a Confidence in him, he would let me know when it was Time to appear for the King's Service, and that I should share Fortunes with him, and so on. But, at the same time, he complain'd of the Fickleness and Inconstancy of the King's Temper; and observ'd, that, while he seem'd perfectly in approve of the Council you gave him, he sometimes shew'd a Reluctance, which made him wavering of Mind, and slow to resolve. The next Day I waited on Lord Dorset in the Tower, and he spoke of the King's Unanimity on the very last time (Strain) and particularly observ'd, that tho' the Duke of York had but little Influence with him, as to what purely regard'd himself, the Minister would find him an Overmatch with his Majesty, as to any other Person or Concern. The same Day the Duke of Beaufort, told me he was to wait on the King the next, and that he intended he would offer him some Employment; but that, as his Majesty had not done it in better Times, he would excuse himself now that they were so dangerous; which recall'd to my Mind what Lord Hallifax had observ'd a few Days before, That the King's Uncertainty and Silence, as to what he propos'd to himself, made men afraid to serve him." Recess. of their Business; and humbly praying that his Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to let his said Parliament sit at the Day appointed, and so continue till they had dispatch'd the great Affairs before them." But his Majesty, it seems, was not in a Humour to make the Will and Pleasure of the City, the Rule of his Government; and not only reply'd somewhat roughly, That the Sitting of Parliament was none of their Business; but five Days after, dissolv'd it by Proclamation without assigning any other Cause, than that it was his Resolution to meet his People, and to have their Advice in frequent Parliaments; and without any Mention of his Privy Council. And yet farther to shew his particular Repentment to the City of London, as also to deprive the Faction of the more immediate Countenance and Support of so rich and powerful a Body; he gave Notice, in the same Proclamation, that he had order'd Writs to be issued for the assembling of a new Parliament, to be held at Oxford, the 21st Day of March then next ensuing.

Rever. Mem. p. 114.

The Parliament dissolved.

and a new one summons'd to meet at Oxford.

This important Notice was no sooner given, than both Parties prepar'd for another Trial of Strength and Skill; and behav'd towards each other, as if persuas'd it was to be the last: Over and above the Frauds and Contentions usual on the like Occasion, filling into such Extravagancies, as had never till then been practis'd; nor, perhaps, have ever since been imitated.

But, however triumphant the Exclusionists were like to carry their Elections in most Parts of England, the appointing Oxford for the Place of Meeting, was a most mortifying Blow to them; as became sufficiently apparent by the many Artifices they try'd to divert the King from his Purpose. The Proclamation was but a Week old, when sixteen Peers, viz. the Duke of Monmouth, the Earls of Kent, Huntingdon, Bedford, Salisbury, Clare, Stamford, Essex and Shaftsbury; and the Lords Mordaunt, Eure, Gray, Fogel, Howard, Herbert and Delamere, waited upon his Majesty with a solemn Dissuasive; call'd by them their humble Petition and Advice. The Earl of Essex undertook to be the Presenter, and introduc'd it with a Speech of his own, tending to shew, That, as many of the Parliaments which had been held at Places remote from the Capital, had prov'd fatal to the Kings who had assembled them; and that as the many Jealousies and Discontents prevailing among the People, furnish'd Cause to apprehend, that the sitting of a Parliament at Oxford might prove as fatal to his Majesty and the Kingdom, they, as Peers, could not answer it to God, his Majesty, or the People, if they did not endeavour to prevail with his Majesty to alter his (to their Apprehensions) unseasonable Resolutions. The Petition itself had for its Basis the great Points at several times admitted in the King's own Speeches and Messages, That the Dangers which threaten'd his Majesty's Person and the whole Kingdom, from the wicked Plots of the Papists, and the too sudden Growth of a Foreign Power, could no otherwise be stop'd or remedied than by Parliament, and the Union of all his Subjects in one Mind and Interest. It set forth, that, in Contradiction to these Propositions, and to his Majesty's declar'd Purpose to make the general Advice of his Privy Council, with the frequent Assistance of his great Council the Parliament, the Measure of his Government, Parliament after Parliament had been prorog'd and dissolv'd, to the total Overthrow of all their just and pious Endeavours to save the Nation. And thus in Consequence, those foreign Kingdoms and States, which, in Conjunction with England, might have given a Check to the Progress of the French, were reduc'd to Despair; the Strength and Courage of our Enemies, both abroad and at home, were increas'd, and the whole Country stood on the Verge of Desolation: That, in the midst of these Extremities, their only Comfort, under God, was the Hope they had entertain'd, that his Majesty, tenderly touch'd with the Groans of his perishing People, would have suffer'd his Parliament to reassemble on the Day, to which it had been prorog'd, and that no farther Interruptions would have been given to their Proceedings, in order to the saving the Nation: That even this last Comfort had fail'd them, when they heard, that, thro' the private Suggestions of some wicked Persons, Favourers of Popery, Promoters of French Designs, and Enemies to his Majesty and the Kingdom, without the Advice, and as they had good reason to believe, against the Opinion, of his Privy Council, his Majesty had been prevail'd upon to dissolve it, and to call another at Oxford, where neither Lords nor Commons could be in Safety; but would be daily expos'd to the Swords of the Papists and their Adherents, of whom too many had crept into his Majesty's (g) Guards: In consequence of which, the Liberty of speaking according to their Consciences, would be destroy'd, the Validity of their Acts for want of it become disputable, and the Witnesses against the Popish Lords, Judges, &c. would be afraid to trust themselves under the Protection of a Parliament, that was itself under the Power of Guards and Soldiers; And, finally, that the Premises consider'd, they, the Petitioners, out of a just Abhorrence of such a dangerous and pernicious Council, which the Authors had not dar'd to avow, and the direful Apprehensions of the Calamities and Miseries that might ensue thereupon, did make it their most humble Prayer and Advice that the Parliament might sit at Westminster as usual.

The Particulars of their Lordships Reception are no where specify'd. It is only said, the the King, frow'd upon them: And he must have no Gall in his Composition to have done otherwise. The Charge fasten'd upon his Guards, was sufficiently shocking when deliver'd to his Face, since it must be presumed that they were to receive the Word of Command from him: And the scattering this Petition in Print all over the Kingdom, immediately afterwards, they did. That their Intention was not so much to convince as to expose his Majesty.

A Message to the King by a Specter.

They had, also, Recourse to yet meaner Devices than these to keep up the national Ferment, and enflame the Spirits of their Party. A Relation was publish'd in the Name of one Elizabeth Freeman, afterwards call'd the Maid of Hatfield, setting forth, That, on the 24th of January, the Appearance of a (b) Woman all in white, with a white Veil over her Face, accompany'd her with these Words: Sweetheart, The 15th of May is appointed for the Royal Blood to be poison'd. Be not afraid, for I am sent to tell thee. That on the 25th, the same Appearance stood before her again; and she having then acquir'd Courage enough to lay it under the usual Adjuration, In the Name, &c. it assum'd a more glorious Shape, and said in a harsher Tone of Voice: Tell King Charles from me, and bid him not REMOVE HIS PARLIAMENT, and stand to his Covenant: Adding, Do as I bid you. That on the 26th it appear'd to her a third-time, but said only, Do your Message. And that on the next Night, when she saw it for the last time, it said nothing at all; and it was in this manner.

Those who depend upon the People for Support, must try all manner of Practices upon them; and such Fables as these sometimes operate more forcibly than Expedients of a more rational kind. Care was, besides, taken, to have this Relation attested by Sir Joseph Jordan, a Justice of the Peace, and the Rector of Hatfield; Dr. Lee, who was one of the King's Chaplains: Nay, the Message was actually sent to his Majesty; and the whole Forgery very officiously circulated all over the Kingdom. By way of Antidote to the Poison, therefore, the other Party press'd the same Apparition into their Service, and made a much more Sarcastic, tho' perhaps a much less politic, Use of it. Scandal had given out that there was a more than ordinary Familiarity between the Duke of Monmouth and the Lady Grey; To her, therefore, the Specter was address'd; and in the (i) Account that is given of the several Conferences that pass between them, no Opportunity is taken to expose his Grace's private Life, as well as his public Pretensions.

The same Apparition turn'd on the contrary Party.

peared to her a third-time, but said only, Do your Message. And that on the next Night, when she saw it for the last time, it said nothing at all; and it was in this manner.

II. That on Saturday January the 26th, between the Hours of Seven and Eight, it again appear'd to her in the same Manner, and said; Do you remember what I said? And the answer'd, Yes. When the Spirit said, Do you believe it? And he answer'd, Yes. Then the Apparition said, what have you to do now? And the answer'd, Yes. Then immediately it appear'd in a more terrible Shape, and with a more harsh Voice said, Tell Sir James Duke of Monmouth from me, and bid him not go to Wapping: And then it vanish'd through the Key-hole.

III. That on January the 28th (being the Day kept in Remembrance of the late King's Martyrdom) about the Hour of Three in the Afternoon, it again appear'd, and said a few Words, Have you faith to-day? And the answer'd, No. The Spirit said, You shall see it again.

But Opposition of any kind, serv'd only as Wind to the Flame, to make it blaze the higher, and rise the higher. On the first of February came on the Election for London; and it was in this manner.

IV. That on February the 1st, about the Hour of Eleven at Night, it appear'd again, and said to her, Tell James Duke of Monmouth, that he interrupted the Spirit, and said, He is here a dead man. He said, I will give you my leave. The Spirit thought it unwell to be interrupted, and took part, and vanish'd.

V. That on February the 2d, about Two of the Clock in the Afternoon, he heard the same Spirit, but suppos'd, that he being interrupted, that he was the Reason of it, he not appearing any more; But he talk'd privately to her a great while, making several Speeches and with boasting again very incoherently. The Words chiefly her Language (say) the words down, which are these, viz. Bill James a Duke of Massachusett's got the Voters, and venant's wife a Duke of Charles won't hurt him. Tell him, that he has discover'd the Whore of his Party, he persecuting me with Fifteen other men. He has many Followers, I am sure, and a good Company attend him to Hedge Lane, from a City, or a Town at the Sea-side. Bid all the Lord's who know have a care of poisoning, unless they are a faithful Persons. Tell my Lord Strangle, his Wife keeps her Bed. Bid Secretary have a care of his Spirit; for, if he is true, all the Parliament run out. The Whiting's will again appear the 21st of March next. Detractional, Damnation is near. If Settlement does not hold, and if we have not Peace, we shall be in danger of War. I am the Hatfield Specter, and return to haunting the old House of my Lordlord the Earl of Suffolk. (I said) it vanish'd, and was never heard of more. Out of Lord Somers's Questions, vol. xxi.

and the Exclusionists resolved to make such a use of their Ascendancy there, as should, at once, strike a Terror into the Court, and encourage the rest of the Kingdom to follow their Example. Accordingly, the four Members, who had served for the two last Parliaments, viz. Clayton, Pilkington, Popham, and Lovel, were not only unanimously rechosen (Ward), the Mayor, making it his own Request not to be put in Nomination) but received the Thanks of the Common-Hall, in the following remarkable Words:

"We the Citizens of this City in Common-Hall assembled, having experienc'd the great and manifold Services of you our Representatives in the two last Parliaments, by your most faithful and unwearied Endeavours to search into, and discover the Depth of the horrid and hellish Popish Plots: To preserve his Majesty's Royal Person, the Protestant Religion, and the well establish'd Government of this Realm: To secure the meeting and sitting of frequent Parliaments: To assert our undoubted Rights of Petitioning: And to punish such who would have betray'd those Rights: To promote the happy and long-wish'd for Union amongst all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects: To repeal the thirty-fifth of Queen Elizabeth, and the Corporation Act; and especially for what Progress has been made towards the Exclusion of all Popish Successors, and particularly of James Duke of York, whom the Commons of England, in the two last Parliaments have declar'd, and we are greatly sensible is, the principal Cause of all the Ruin and Misery impending these Kingdoms in general, and this City in particular. For all which, and other your constant and faithful Management of our Affairs in Parliament, we offer and return to you our most hearty Thanks, being confidently assur'd that you will not consent to the granting any Money Supply, until you have effectually secur'd us against Popery and Arbitrary Power; relying, by Divine Assistance, in Pursuance of the same Ends, to stand by you with our Lives and Fortunes."

Nor was this all; for this Paper was not sooner presented and read, than another was deliver'd to the Sheriffs, intimating, "That the said Citizens, having diligently perus'd the late Petition and Advice of the Peers, and finding it, as they humbly conceiv'd, highly reasonable in that unhappy Conjunction, and greatly tending to the Safety of these Kingdoms, did make it their most earnest Request, that they, the Sheriffs, would, in the Name of the Common-Hall, return their grateful Acknowledgments to the Earl of Essex, and by him to the rest of those noble Peers: And a circumstantial Account of all their Proceedings was immediately committed to the Press, that the Contagion of Patriotism, as it was esteem'd on one Hand, or Sedition, as it was stigmatiz'd on the other, might be caught and communicated, by all that could read or hear, from one End of the Realm to the other."

In the mean while, such Alterations were made at Court, as very clearly evinc'd, that his Majesty was in no Disposition to adopt the Sentiments which had been so greedily embrac'd, and were so tenaciously held by his People. Lord Sunderland, who, contrary to his Majesty's known Pleasure and express Command, had join'd with Lord Sheffield in promoting the Exclusion-Bill, was deprived of the Secretary's Office, and, together with the Lords Essex and Salisbury, who had render'd themselves obnoxious by Petitioning as well as Voting (as also Sir William Temple) dismiss'd from the Council-Board. But his Lordship, it seems, had offered more ways than one: The Memorial of the States to Mr. Sydney, before quoted, was impudently to his Direction; and tho' he had given it as his Opinion in Council, that the King ought not to comply with the Commons Address against Lord Halifax, he had incur'd that Lord's Displeasure by saying, after the Debate was over, That if such an Address should ever be made, against him, he would certainly desire the King's Leave to retire, as a thing that would be for his Majesty's Service. As to Sir William Temple's Crime, he professes himself to be wholly ignorant of it; unless it were, what was commonly guess'd, his Attachment to the Prince of Orange (which, however, considering how little his Highness, at least to his Knowledge, wedded with his Majesty's domestic Concerns, he would not allow to be criminal) or his Friendship with Lord Sunderland, or the Declaration he had caus'd to be made to the King by his Son, that he desir'd to meddle no more in public Affairs. Which Declaration, it is observable, was not made till he had first desir'd to know whether it was his Majesty's Pleasure, that he should again take a Seat in Parliament; and had receiv'd for answer, "That, considering, how things then stood, little Good was to be expected from it, and therefore he might let it alone." And it is further observable, that from this Opening of the King's, both Lord Sunderland, and Sir William Temple concluded, that his Majesty had left off all Thoughts of agreeing with his Parliaments, and had taken his Measures another way for the Supply of his Treasures.

Thus Lord Halifax was left sole Manager at Court; at least he was so esteem'd: And Sir William Temple insinuates, that the Resisters of those Times, made no Scruple to conclude, that he had, all at once, alter'd the Stream of his Conduct, and let himself to oppose the Exclusion Bill, as the only way to engross the King to himself, and become his Favourite without a Rival.

But if Sir John Evelyn, who had, or would be thought to have had, so large a Share in his Confidence, is to be rely'd on, the Removal of Lord Sunderland did not remove all his Lordship's Jealousies. "He was now become fearful that the Earl of Danby would be taken out of the Tower, and receiv'd again into Council: In which Case, his Resolution was to retire; and he gave it as his Advice to that Gentleman, not to press for Employment, till Things were establish'd upon a more solid Foundation."

Sir

A. D. 1680-1.

Sir John also adds, "That he found him absolutely resolv'd to retire; not because he was at all diffusid'd with the King, but because he was afraid the Duke's superior Prevalency with him might, peradventure, carry Things too far. In short, every thing now, and for some time to come, was in the most unsettled, dark, and perplexing Suspence; so that a Man scarce knew what to think, or how to behave."

Mr. Algermon Spukey, also, in his Letters to Mr. Saville, has some Passages, that seem to confirm these Sentiments of Rereby's. "The Lord Hallifax, says he, is gone to ruminate upon these Matters at Rufford; and says (j) he will not return Southward, until the Parliament meet at Oxford. The Fruits expected from the last Parliament having been lost by little, under-hand Bargains; and, as some say, the King and Parliament equally betray'd by those that were trusted by them. Mens Minds seem to be fill'd with various Conceits, and many Jealousies. Some think the Writs for calling the Parliament are in themselves void, as being without Advice of Council; and that the Law takes notice of nothing done by the King, sine Sapientum & Magnatum Consilio: Or that, if it should meet at Oxford, its Acts would be void, or subject to be vacated, for want of the Freedom of voting, which is essential unto it. Others say, the Validity of the Writs depends solely upon the Person of the King; and that others ought to think themselves safe, when he is safe, tho' their Danger be from him. I know not what this will produce; but I never saw Mens Minds more heated than at present, and cannot think it portends less Evil than the Comet."

The Intrigue of Fitzbarris's Libel.

Things being in this distracted State, both Parties equally exasperated against, and apprehensive of, each other; lying in wait for, and resolv'd to improve to the utmost, all Advantages; one Fitzbarris, the Son of an Irish Knight, and a professed Papist, (who had been retain'd as a Spy on the Anti-court Party, by the Duchefs of Portsmouth and Mrs. Wall her Woman, and who, for the early Intelligence he had given of certain (k) Libels, both on her Grace and the King, had been rewarded with 250*l.*) enter'd into a Concert with one Everard a Scotsman, to write one of the grossest Injunctives against his Majesty and the Duke, and with the most avow'd Design to kindle a War between the Government and People, that ever the World saw.

Both these Persons had been in the French Service, where their Acquaintance first commenc'd, and were known to each other to be Adventurers; or, in other Words, Vernin, who prey'd on the Filth of the Times. If Fitzbarris was a Spy, Everard had been a Discoverer and Evidence; and after having been confin'd four Years in the Tower, set forth a Narrative, tending to prove that he had underwent that severe Treatment for endeavouring to give the very first Informations relating to the Plot.

Fitzbarris was the Proposer of the Libel, and undertook to furnish Matter, and Everard was to give it Fashion and Ornament. The first, from the very Opening, acted wholly like a Fool, and the last like a Knave. Fitzbarris, after some preliminary Discourses on their present sad Circumstances, and in favour of the French Service, preferable to the English, comes to the Point; avows that he was acquainted with the French Ambassador and his Confessor, who would give an ample Reward for the Service requir'd, and that he was sent by divers Lords and Gentlemen, who were in Confederacy with them. The great Drift being, as Everard depos'd, to keep the People together by the Ears, while the French King reduc'd the rest of Hlanders, and to lay the Guilt of the Libel at the Door of the Nonconformists. Everard listens, seems to approve; undertakes, and receives some verbal Hints to enable him to make a Beginning; but all this while thought only of a buck Game, and of sacrificing his Employer. In short, Fitzbarris was no sooner gone, than he set himself to work at once to write the Libel, and to betray his Friend; communicating all to one Mr. Smith and Sir William Waller; whom he took care to station in his own Chamber, the first at the next Interview, and both afterwards, so as that they might hear and see all that was done and said.

The Snare being thus spread, Fitzbarris rushes

(j) The Letter from whence this is taken, and the next that follows it, are mislaid by the Editor in Feb. 1678-9; whereas they ought to have been dated 1680-1. I have added the Conclusion of the first, as one of the most fault'd Pieces of Irony in our Language:

"Notwithstanding that was said, we good Subjects hope all will go perfectly well. His Majesty, as is said, resolves to go to reform his Court, that all shall be of one Mind. Mr. Secretary, being now look'd upon as the greatest Man, brings his two Friends Comyns and Randolph into the Management of Business; and the best of these being an eminent for Fisticke of Wit, Quibblers and Estuaries in state-affairs, as the other in the Excellency of all moral Virtues, Things cannot but go well; and we particularly hope, that England will keep up its Reputation of being, as the Cardinal Pallavicini says, the Mother and Nurse of the best Wits in the World, when all foreign Ministers shall come to treat with England and Comyns [said Secretary in the room of Sunderland] who will be taken for Patterns of the Genius of the Nation, and not thought the only Men it produceth, that deserve the highest Praises; and let any thing should be wanting, Mr. Hale is join'd unto these. It is true, that we have not of our Nation a Man to put at the Head of the Soldiers, as admirable in military Skill and Virtue, as those above-mentioned are in Civils and Morals; But the Knowledge of our own Defects, the Sagacity of discovering in the Earl of Perth the Qualities which we have want, and the prudent Humility of consulting unto him that is blest with them, though a Stranger, deserves some Commendations! And I am confident, that when Things shall be brought into such Order, that a Papist may appear open-faced, we shall then as great Respect unto the Lord Dunbarren, France and Germany, that are full of their Trophies, cannot but admire this; whilst we rest secure under their Shadows. For Men may more easily be found for less eminent Places, and the Earl of Towne, as is said, shall succeed Mr. Ruffell in the Command of the Foot-guardia. Civil and military Affairs being thus settled, Treasures flowing in unto us on all Sides, and all foreign Princes, concerned in our Affairs, being sure unto us; we need not fear a few discontented Lords, a mutinous City, or assuming Countess; and perceiving, that the vast Hoopazars of Arms made at Brussel, and found that with a good Quantity of Ammunition were lately sent into Ireland, are in pursuance of Agreements made with you, we cannot but think all will tend to our Good."

ruffles into the midst of it, full to Business at once, reads what had been written; and, as one having Authority, alters all to his own Mind. Everard artfully turns the Conversation to the Danger and the Reward. Fitzharris promises forty Guinea down, and a monthly Pension from the French Embassador; and for his Security against the Danger, leaves with him a Paper of Instructions for his further Proceeding, in his own Hand-Writing.

Thus fortify'd against all Hazards, Everard finishes the (1) Work, gives a Copy to Fitzharris, and secures one for himself; with which

A. D. 1680-1

(1) The Whole of which was as follows:

"The true Englishman speaking plain English, in a Letter from a Friend to a Friend.

I thank you for the Character of a popish Successor which you sent me; wherein you just Fear, and the Grounds of those, are justly set out. But I am in greater Fear of the present Position. Why do you frighten ourselves about the Evil that is to come, not looking to that which is at hand? We would cut off the budding Weed, and let the poisonous Root lie still: We would stop the Channel of our Evils, and let the Fountain still run. My Meaning is this: Can Charles know and act all these bloody Conspiracies, and not impart them to his dear Overseer? If James be conscious and guilty, Charles is to too. Believe me, these two Brethren in Inquiry are in Conspiracy with Pope and France to introduce Popery and arbitrary Government, as all their Actions demonstrate: The Parliament, Magna Charta, and Liberty of the Subject, are as heavy Voices, which they would call off, to be as absolute as their Brother of France; And, if this can be prov'd to be their only Aim and Endeavour, why should not every true British be a Quaker thus far? Let the English rise, and move as one Man, to Self-defence, to open Action, and bring off their intolerable Rulers. Blow the Commons, stand on your Guard, and withstand them as Bears and Tigers. And first there can be no Trust given to this godly Couple of popish Brethren, not to Rebel expelled from a Parliament: true to your Swords, in defence of your Lives, Laws, Religion, and Properties, like the stout Lord of old, who told a King, that, if he could not be defended by Magna Charta, he would be relieved by Longa Spada.

Yet to convince the World that this Scottish Race is corrupt, Root and Branch, and popish from the very Beginning, let us first consider their Reason, following.

The Grandfather of their Men, James the first, was of no Religion at the Bottom, but enter'd by a Pretence of a sham Plot of the Papists against his Life, which really he colligated with the popish Party under-hand, his Mother, his Ancestors, with great Submission; yet afterwards thinking it for his Purposes to enjoin the Parliament, and write against the Pope and Cardinals, he sent his Secretary to bind the Eyes of the Printer, Keeper with Money, and to send his Letters from off the Roman File; and then he crown'd, as boldly as an unsuspected Historian, for the Protestant Religion and Interest.

That Man's Son Charles I. held a secret Correspondency with the Pope, calling him his dear and Holy Father; as is to be seen in his Letters recorded in Engelworth's Collections. Were not his Wife and Courtiers Popish? Did he not countenance and promote the Rebellion in Ireland? as the English Grandees, and his very Commissioners, testify and declare. Was there not a popish Plot, and an universal Conspiracy of the Papists, ally'd to him and his Confessor Leard? and did they not plainly shew it, yet they should have discovered the Necessities of their Mother-Church? While that godly Protestant Prince pretended to relieve the poor beleaguer'd Protestants at Richmond by his Confident Backingham, did he not hold Correspondency with the French Cardinal how to betray them for a Sum of Money (which his Obsequity with his Parliament made him stand in need of)? But they who for so approved themselves to be Heads of the Protestant Church, Charles and Leard, did they not lose their own Heads, by a manifest Judgment of God? And was not the false Head of their Laudian Backingham found out by an Allen's Knife?

But, to come nearer to our Purpose: These two godly Jews, at our Days are dark enough, arriv'd at the Heights of Witchcraft, and of professed Antichristian and Popery.

As for James, he was a Papist while he had a Regiment in the French, and afterwards in the Spanish, Service beyond Seas. And as for Charles, he was reported, 'ere he came into England, to have been reconcil'd to the Church of Rome, in one of the French King's Country-houses: And, since they came in, how have they wheel'd, and play'd Edmund and Isabella, in their Passion of Religion, as Orpheus and their Affairs require? Have they not all along maintained secret Correspondency with France and Rome? In Charles's Letters may frequently be met such words as have not seen more secret Ministers.

But let us come to examine their Actions, which are a better Proof of their Hearts. Were not the Duke's Servants and Command all Papists? witness his Talbots, Patricks, and other High Tempers. Were not the Duke, and such of his Creatures as were known Papists, promoted to all public Offices of Trust, both at Sea and Land? witness Belleisle now a Traitor in the Tower. Did not James, by Calown, Thurston, and others, hold open Correspondency with the Pope and Cardinals? and could Charles be ignorant of all this? Nay he fill'd all so well, that he hardly employ'd any about him but Papists, as Gifford, whom he made Treasurer; or employ'd any abroad, but Persons of the same Stamp; witness Godolphin, whom he first Ambassador into Spain; who he did others elsewhere. What more obvious, than that the Duke's Treachery against the Kingdom and Protestant Religion be fully made out, and the People and Parliament seek to bring him to a legal Trial, yet Charles obstructs Justice, and will not suffer it? How can this be, but that he is join'd in Will and Deed in all the Duke's Villanies, and that he is afraid to be discovered and found out to be a Papist, and a Betrayer of his People and the Protestant Religion? If he was heartily concern'd for our Religion, would he not oppose a popish Successor, who will infallibly overthrow it? Can there be any thing more evident, than that he continues the Duke's Adherents, and those who were advanced by him, in all Offices of Trust? And hath he not turn'd out of his Council the most zealous Protestants, such as Shaftesbury, Eyles, and others, and introduced in their Rooms other more Popish, or those that are popishly and abominably affected? Hath he not modelled all the Sheriffs and Justices throughout England, in subserviency to a popish Design? Was not Sir William Waller and Dr. Chamberlain, and divers others turn'd out of the Commission in and about London, merely for being zealous Professors of Priests and Papists? Doth not Charles all he can to hinder the further Detection of the popish Plot? And doth he not in his utmost discomfite the Discoverers of it, and suffer them to want firm? And doth he not in the mean time plentifully encourage and reward Fitzgerald and all the Sham-plotters? Whereas Denzil had 8 l. a Week, whilst a Forger of Plots against the Protestants, he is call'd off with Scorn, and in danger of his Life, since he laid open the popish Engineers. Is not Charles so much in love with his popish Irish Rebels (therein trading in his Father's Steps) that he promotes Montgomery, Georgeloff, Fitzpatrick, and others, who were the Heads of the Rebellion, to Honours and Preferment, though Charles took the Commons, and a Coronation, Oath to prefer the Protestant Religion; yet hath he not palpably broken them? He made large Promises and Protections at Breda, for the allowing a perpetual Liberty of Conscience to nonconforming Protestants; but he soon forgot them all. To what End was the Act, which was made soon after his Restoration, prohibiting any to call him Papist, or to try he was popishly inclin'd, and reading such as should offend guilty of a Penance, but to stop the People's Mouths, whenever he should act any thing in favour of Popery, as he was then resolv'd to do?

Is it not manifest therefore, that Scottish Oaths, Breda Promises, Protestant Profession, Liberty of Conscience, War with France, Saving of Flanders, is all in jest, to delude Protestant Subjects? Is it not apparent, that breaking of Leagues, Dutch Wars, Spanish Plots, French Measures to favour their Cause, Loss of Ships, War in Christendom, Blood of Protestants, reviving of Popish Trainers, is all in earnest, and done in favour of Popery? And are not his fair Speeches, his true Protestant Love to Parliaments just Rights and English Liberties, his pretended Ignorance of the Plot, and his hanging of Traitors to serve a Turn, but in mere jest? Are not his great Debaucheries, his whoring Courtiers, popish Council, clearing Rogues, heathen Plottings, his favouring of Traitors, his French Pensioners, his Nets of Whores and Swarms of Ballads, his Masses, his Carthouses, his horrid Murders, his burning of Lambeth and the Provd's House, his Sham-plottings, his infamous Villains, his popish Officers by Sea and Land, his Strugglings for a popish Successor, his Agreements with France, his frequent Dissolutions of Parliaments, his buying of Votes, his false Returns, all of them Designs to ruin as in good earnest, and in favour of arbitrary Government? And is it not in order to the blessed End, that you see now transmitted by Charles and James, but Charles Papists, licensing Bishops, tithing Abbeys, burning Towns, popish Scholars, to destroy the People, and kill the popish Successor's Legal Title. Are not James Councils, French Alliance to conquer Ireland, Irish Scottish, French Alliance to conquer Ireland, Irish Scottish, French Alliance, bent the Dutch, yet their Stoppage, the Masters of the Seas? and are not Charles buying a Rebellion, the letting the Plot go on, the endeavouring to retrieve the popish Cause by getting a popish Pensionary, abhorring Parliament, which Sir William Waller, immediately and directly, hies to the King; while Fitzbarris, with his, went round about to Mrs. Wall, desiring with much Earnestness to be brought to his Majesty, as having something of vast Importance to communicate; but met with a Repulse; was ask'd, why he did not apply to the Secretary; and advi'd to resort with it to the Lord Clarendon or Hyde: And while he was on this Pursuit, was taken up by a Warrant from the Council, examin'd, and committed to the Gatehouse; the whole Intrigue between him and Everard having taken up no more than eight Days; viz. from the 21st of February, to the 28th: March the 2d, having been re-examin'd, he was committed to Newgate; where, as Dangerfield had done before, he turn'd short on the Court, which he had hitherto profert to serve, and put in for the Merit of out-discovering all the Discoverers who had preceded him; whether of his own mere Motion, or by the Persuasion of others, is the question. Bishop Burnet says, "Cornish the Sheriff going to see him, he desir'd he would bring him a Justice of Peace, for he could make a Discovery of the Plot, far beyond all that was yet known. Cornish, in the Simplicity of his Heart, went and acquainted the King with this; for which he was much blam'd; for it was said, by this means, that Discovery might have been stop't: But his going first with it to the Court, prov'd afterwards a great Happiness both to himself and many others. The Secretaries, and some Privy Counsellors were, upon that, sent to examine Fitzbarris, to whom he gave a long Relation of a Project to kill the King, in which the Duke was concern'd; with many other Particulars, which need not be mention'd, for it was all a Fiction. The Secretaries came to him a second time to examine him farther; he boldly stood to all he had said, and he desir'd, that some Justices of the City might be brought to him. So Clayton and Treby went to him; and he made the same pretended Discovery to them over again; and insinuated, that he was glad it was now in safe Hands that would not flit it. The King was highly offended with this, since it plainly shew'd a Distrust of his Ministers: And so Fitzbarris was remov'd to the Tower, which the Court resolv'd to make the Prison for all Offenders, till there should be Sheriffs chosen more at the King's Devotion. Yet the Deposition made to Clayton and Treby, was, in all Points, the same that he had made to the Secretaries. So that A.D. 1682. there was no Colour for the Pretence, afterward put on this, as if they had praesid'd on him."

Mr. North, on the other hand, in this, as in most other Matters, differs from the Bishop, into Celo; and affirms, on what Authority will appear hereafter, that Babel accompany'd Cornish in his Visit to Fitzbarris in Newgate. His Words are these: "The Examen, two Sheriffs went together first, to give the Physic, and then the Alderman (Clayton) and the Recorder (Treby) in Couples, to see the working of it: And, in the End, the whole Pharmacy, that is, Management of the Subornation, devolv'd upon the good Recorder, who had the Patient, sola cum solo, for two Hours." Nor has he thought fit to make any mention of the Secretary's Visit at all.

After all that has been written on this Affair, we shall find, and perhaps leave it, one of the most mysterious Parts of our Story. This, however, is certain, that the Libel, the Commitment, and the pretended Discoveries of Fitzbarris, were all made serviceable to the Cause of the Exclusionists; and that they, all along, acted the Part of Defendants for him, with as much Zeal and Assiduity, as if his Cause had been their own.

But, however openly and avowedly they adopted this Incident, or however carefully they nurs'd it up, they did not hold it advisable to place the whole of their Expectations upon it. The Current of the General Election had flow'd as strongly as ever in their favour: They had fill the Gale of Popularity to fill their Sails; the King had Wind and Tide to struggle with, and was thought to be on the Point of giving way to their joint Violence, and his own Necessities. If he had ungraciously dismiss'd one Parliament, he had made some Amends, by calling another: And if he persisted in obliging them to desert their Head Quarter at London, and to follow him to Oxford, they flatter'd themselves, that a Manifestation of the same Strength, would produce the same Effects in one Place as another.

Prosperity, even in Individuals, too often generates Insolence; but in Herds and Parties it scarce ever fails to do so. Every Man in a Crowd thinks he is obnoxious'd, and consequently at Liberty to say and do things, that, single and alone, he would be ashamed of: And where all are equal, it may be also thought that superior Boldness is the best Qualification banes, who shall betray their Country, enslave Posterity, and destroy themselves at last, Means only to save a popish, traitorous, Successor, and a pretent popish Possessor? James and Charles are Brethren in Iniquity, corrupt both in Root and Branch, and who study to enslave England to a French and Romish Yoke, is not all this plain? Have you not Eyes, Sense, or Feeling? Where is the old English noble Spirit? Are you become French Allies, to suffer any Lord to be laid upon you? And therefore, if you can get no Remedy from this next Parliament, (as certainly you will not) and if Charles doth not repent, and comply with it, then up, all at one Min. O brave Englishmen, look to your own Defence, ere it be too late; rouse up your Spirit, remember your Predecessors; remember how that the altering of their Liberties justifi'd, both by Success and Law, the War of the Breves against wicked Counsellors, who misled the King, And will you now let that go which cost them so dear?

How many oppressing Kings have been depos'd in this Nation? as appears in Records referred unto, in that worthy Parliament's History of the Succession. Were not Richard II. and Henry VI. both laid aside? not to mention others: And was there ever such a Kedge as this of ours? Was not King Jahn depos'd for going about to embrace the Mahometan Religion, and for entering into a League with the King of Morocco to that Purpose? the Mahometan and the King of Morocco were no such Enemies to our Rights and Liberties, as Papery and the French King are. Is it not Time then, that all should be ready? Let the City of London stand by the Parliament, for the maintaining of their Liberties and Religion in an extreme Way, if Parliamentary Ways be not improv'd unto by the King. Let the Counties be ready to enter into an Association, as the County of York did in Henry VIII.'s Time. Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xxii.

A. D. 1680. Qualification, for a Leader; whence Men may be induc'd to bid against each other for Pre-eminence, at the Expence of Discretion and Decorum; and what is worse, Justice and Humanity.

Thus the Exclusionists, believing that they had now the Game in their own Hands, and that the King must submit to their Terms, first or last, gave a Locus to all that wicked Wantonness of Behaviour, which has been acknowledg'd natural; but which, however, cannot be too severely condemn'd.

To be more particular; we are told, that, as the time of the Session drew on, the Roads to Oxford swarm'd with their Parties. Every Member had his little Following of Friends and Servants; and every Leader his Band of Com-Patriots, arm'd as well as mount-ed: And as to the four City Representatives, they came attended with a Troop; wearing Ribbands in their Hats, with these Words woven in them; NO POPERY! NO SLAVERY!

The City of Oxford, says Mr. North, in his peculiar Style, and with his peculiar Acrimony, was a Redundance of all the active Party-Traders and Jobbers that us'd to be busy in the Treason-Trade in London. And it was notorious they all look'd four and rough; and in their ordinary Discourse breath-ed nothing that was easy and moderate. In another Place, he adds; "As in all States there is a civil, as well as a military, Admi-nistration; so in this Oxford Oeconomy, the Faction had another Order regimented, namely, the Writers, Talkers, and Disposers of News and Libels by Directions of wiser Heads than their own. Most Places of re-sort were full of these Sparks, to argue Mat-ters and Questions depending, to furnish Members with Colours, call'd Reasons, to take notice of Objections, and to answer or ridicule them; to rally every thing that look'd loyal and quiet; to be always forth-coming at the Times of notable Debates, and to hunt the Party-Members into the Quest-ion." &c. And again; "I know very few of them were Lords of many Mannors, or had any visible Stock to maintain that Course of Life. By that, and divers other Indications, it appear'd there was some Fund of Money laid up for Incidents, and the current Charges of the Party. But whence it came, I will not pretend to divine. There was, besides, a Magazine provided of Ammunition, Libels, Lampons, Satires, Pictures, and Sing-Songs, for the Service of Oxford; some adapted to deceive Men of Fortune and Education, well penn'd, and, perhaps, in Heroic Verse; others for the Rabble, and drunken, sottish Clubs, in Ballad Doggerel, with witty Picture af-fix'd, in dainty Conceit and Proportion. Notable Eloquence for the Eye! One was the King (with two Faces, one towards Popery, the other towards Protestantism) for a (m) Racee-Show, with his Box of Parliament-Motions at his Back, and the Saints pulling him down into a Ditch. Another was call'd Mac Ninny, which went for the Duke of York; where he was ex-press'd half Jesuit, half Devil; the former half with a Brand in his Hand firing of London, and about half a Dozen of the Tantivies (the Clergy) were mounted upon the Church of England, booted, spur'd, and riding it like an old Hack Tantivy to Rome. And the famous Writer of Pamphlets on the Court Side, LeStrange, was a Dog, with a Broom (the Rebus of his Bookseller, whose Name was Broom) ty'd to his Neck, and a Fiddle (to note one of his Qualities) at his Tail, running away from a Whip. And the two Universities, in square Caps, standing by, cry'd: This is our Towzer." And yet once more. "But to conclude; this Oxford-Expedition was a general Rendezvous of all the Desperadoes of the Party. They had the famous three M's, Men, Method and Money; with which a great Architect us'd to say, he could do any thing, and so these Men thought of their Provisions."

This is the Account of the Oxford-Meet-ting given by one Party, and which they farther say, was without Example, since that of Rumney Mead, which produc'd Magna Char-ta: Whereas, some of the other, affirm as ex-predly, *That some of the Members were so ill attended, as that they were not in a Con-dition to secure themselves from being robb'd by the way: That diverse of the most mar-tial Persons in the Oxford House of Com-mons, went thither in Hackney Coaches, with scarce a Servant a-piece to wait upon them: That, in particular, the Earl of Shaftsbury travell'd thither in a hir'd Coach; and that the Concourse of People there, was much smaller than was expected, considering the Greatness and Solemnity. But these Words, Some, Diverse, and the particular Instance of Lord Shaftsbury, serve only to shew, that those who made this Parade of their Strength and Interest among the People, purposely avoided any personal Connection with them, for fear their own Engine should recoil on themselves; for, in the very next Paragraph, the Fact, thus extenuated, is in part allow'd, as follows: "It cannot be thought, that the Peers of England, and the principal Gentry of the Kingdom, should go to so august and solemn an Assembly, without some menial Servants to attend them: And, if the hav-ing Supernumeraries in a Retinue, be Founda-tion to raise a just Suspicion of a Plot, the Lords and Commons to whom some give the*

P. 301.

The Scope of one of their Pamphlets, called, Reason for his Majesty's passing the Exclusion-Bill.

The Truth is, that both Parties made their Mufters, and came prepar'd alike, to awe and frighten, if not to attack and destroy, one another. Mr. North acknowledges, that, as others did, he follow'd the Camp, nor the Court, to Oxford: That his Majesty had his Guards in order, some in the City, and some quarter'd about: So that, according to the Representation on both Sides, the Meeting rather resembled that of a Poll'd Dyet, than an English Parliament: And that, whether any sanguinary Designs were intended by either or not, it is little less than a Miracle, that, where such a Train of Combustibles was laid, some accidental Spark had not given fire to it, and cover'd the whole Land with Ruins.

The Press, in the mean time, was not wholly engros'd by the Lampons before spoken of, nor by the Exclusionists only: Appeals were solemnly made to the Reason, as well as the Passions, of Men; and the Courtiers confedered to do this, as well as their Adversaries: The chief Efforts of this Sort, made by the Latter, are to be found in a Pamphlet, called, Reasons for his Majesty's passing the Bill of Exclusion; the great Artifice of which lies in the Introduction: In this the angry Proceedings of the last House of Commons, and even the very Men who had occasion'd them, are treated with much (a) Bitterness, that the Discourse itself might have the greater Weight, both with the King and People: After which, the Writer propoies, as a Refinement on their Conduct, to shew, That, instead of such Votes and Addresses as carry'd the least Shew of Menace, and which could only serve to divide his Majesty yet farther from his People, their Proceedings and Remonstrances ought to have no other Tendency, than to convince him, by unanswerable Reasons, that it was his own particular Interest to pass the Bill: That, to clear their Way, they ought to demonstrate, That it had its Foundation in Justice and Reason; that Government had no other Basis than the Good of the Governed, and that their Good, in the most important Branch, that of Religion, the Duke, by his Apostasy, was not only in a moral Incapacity to pursue, but lay under a positive Obligation to destroy; that he had thus vacated his Right, by his own Act and Deed; and that this

A. D. 1689-1) Bill was no more than the bare levying of the Forfeiture: That, by the Confusion of this Government, the King, while in possession of the Hearts of his People, was one of the most considerable Princes in Europe; and, when at Variance with them, was of little Consequence, either abroad or at home, as it might be supposed the Case then was: And if nothing could more contribute to the widening the Breach, than his refusing to pass the Bill, his Majesty's own Interest apparently consisted in gratifying his People: That by so doing, he would for ever stop the Mouths of his Adversaries, leave them no Colour to refuse his just and necessary Demands, and put an End to all seditious Practices, by cutting off all Pretences for their Justification: That, supposing the worst that could be supposed, a Promise made to the Duke never to give the Royal Assent to the Bill, such a Promise was void in itself, because inconsistent with the Coronation-Oath, by which his Majesty oblig'd himself to maintain the Establish'd Church; and that could no otherwise be done, than by excluding a popish Prince from the Throne: And finally, that all Promises are understood to be either for the Advantage of him that makes them, or of him they are made to, or both: But that the performing this would not only be ruinous to his Majesty, but of no Advantage to his Royal Highness; for that, however great his Merits and Virtues were acknowledged to be, he lay under a Circumstance that made it impossible for him to come to the Crown, THO' THE BILL SHOULD NEVER PASS, BUT BY CONQUEST.

On the other hand, the Court set forth their Packet, under the Title of a Seasonable Address (before referred to in a Note); the main Direction of which was to shew, That the Public had been alarm'd with an Outcry against Popery; not because there was any real Danger from that Quarter; but because the Protestant, while Guard was kept only at one Gate, against one Enemy, might, unobserv'd and undisturb'd, make their Entrance at the other: That the Artifice had already too far succeeded, that no Man could be held loyal, unless he was factious; nor Protestant, if not a Presbyterian: That those who first rais'd this (a) Out-cry were either the Offspring of those seduced or concerned in the late Rebellion, or such as had been turn'd out of, or wanted to force themselves into, great Employments; Men of much

And of a Court Piece, call'd, a Seasonable Address.

(a) As follows:

"I must confess, I have had no great Veneration for late for some Men, who, thro' extreme zeal in appearance for Things of public Concern, and particularly for the Bill for excluding the Duke of York from the Succession to the Crown, have yet taken such Methods for the obtaining that Bill, as (with respect to their Popularity) look'd to me, as if they had rather wish'd it should be deny'd, than granted.

I mean a sort of Men that pass with the Vulgar for very public Spirits, yet are no otherwise for the public Good, than as they think it may conduce to their own private Designs. It matters not how they are disposed for them to leap into a great Place, so as to be restor'd to some Office they have formerly enjoy'd, and in which they have discover'd Principles far different from what they now profess; if every one they have a Pretence to be not immediately remov'd; or, perhaps, if they fancy themselves the most likely to heal the Rabble, should Things fall into Confusion; they will be sure, with great Appearance of Zeal, to press Things of less Moment, and which they think will be deny'd, but any thing that really tends to Settlement should be granted: And they are for the most part insatiable by this; for their Vehemence, which proceeds from dark and hidden Causes, seldom fails of being mistaken by the Vulgar for a true and hearty Love of their Country. I believe his Majesty will not think Mea surer, I am far less necessary, to be study'd, than the Nation: And therefore I hope you will not wonder, if I, who care not much for a great Office if the Bill of Exclusion do pass, or to be popular with the Rabble if it do not, cannot heartily concur with all that seems to be aim'd at by that Sort of People. Out of Lord Somers's Calculus, s. v.

(c) We have already seen, that the legitimate Sons of the Church were so active in raising and spreading this Alarm, as by Sect or Party whatever.

A. D. 1680-1. Ambition, or desperate Fortunes; all of them such as had their private Views; and who made a Pretence to serve the Public, in order to serve themselves: That all knew Sir William Jones, Sir Francis Winnington, Colonel Titus, &c. were discontented, because disoblige'd; and that, on condition of being plac'd according to their several Cravings, they would go as far in the Court-Service, as now in that of the Faction: That, during the late Parliament, Bargains were actually driving between Patriot and Courtier: That the Envy of some produced the self-denying Vote, That whatever Member accepted an Office of Trust or Profit, without Leave of the House, should be expelled, to spoil the Market of others: That, after such a flagrant Acknowledgement that the accursed thing was among them, it must argue the last Stage of Blindness and Folly in those who should place any Confidence in their Professors of Zeal and public Spirit: That, in order to retrieve their Credit, and serve the Public indeed, they ought to secure the Constitution against Papist and Presbyter alike: And that those who now gloried in being the King-leaders of the Faction would do well to consider, how precarious the Tenure of Popularity was; and how liable they were to lose it, as others had done before them: That as to the protesting Peers, their Patriotism was to the full as rotten at Heart as that of the Commons: That the Passion of Lord Essex was either to be Lord High Treasurer, or once more Lord Lieutenant; and that, in Power and out, he had been directed by no other Motive: That, after a whole Life of Shifts, Turns, and Doubles, Lord Shaftsbury had solicited a Reconciliation with the Duke; and offer'd to be his Servant to all Intents and Purposes, in case he might be reinstated in his former Power and Greatness: That he whose Son was the great Tribune of the People in the Lower-house, meaning the Earl of Bedford, had demanded the Title of Duke in addition to the Garter, as the Price of himself and that Son: That a fourth, not nam'd, insist'd on being a Privy-Counsellor: That a fifth would have been Master of the Horse to the Duke, at any Rate of Purchase: That a sixth, the Earl of Nulgrave, had own'd himself disoblige'd to the King, because his Expedition to Tanger had not been rewarded with the Command of a Regiment: And that the Duke of Monmouth was led away with the Hopes of a Crown; but that it would be much better for him to be content with the second Place in the Kingdom, than by aspiring to the first, against all the Obligations of Reason, Justice, Law, and Religion, to forfeit his Fortune, Life, and Honour: That, tho' the Bill of Exclusion was the only thing the Party seem'd to insist upon, it was not all they thought requisite for their Security and Satisfaction: That they, moreover, expected all the King's

Friends to be remov'd, and their own to be establish'd in their Places; on the Presumption, that, having his Majesty in their Power, it would be no hard Matter to make him act according to their Pleasure: That, from their Books, call'd, Plato redivivus, and the History of the Succession; the one tending to prove, That the Crown was rather elective than hereditary; and the other expressly contending for a Commonwealth; as also, from a notable Passage in a certain Lord's Speech in the last Parliament, That the People of Athens were so fond of their good King Codrus, that they would have none after him, there was Reason to think the very Monarchy was in danger: That the frequent Mention which had been made of the tragic Fates of Edward II. Richard II. and Henry VI. could not but deter his Majesty from ever putting himself into such Hands, as would probably force him into the like Calamities; or from entertaining any Thoughts of sacrificing his only Brother to oblige his Enemies: That the trying Practices on the Constitution was more likely to destroy than mend it: That it was only the Work of a God to strike Order out of Confusion: That, in all Probability, a forcible Attempt to enlarge, would be the Means to efface, our Liberties: That the Monarchy was now become an Over-match for any Faction whatever: That the King had the sole Power of the Sword, and had the very (p) Being of the Parliament in a manner at his Mercy: That, as Rebellion had no longer such Helps as in the last Reign to give Success to its Purposes, so neither could any reasonable Plea be urg'd in its Justification: That the very Danger of Popery, which had been set forth in such hideous Colours, was no more than the Rose-head and Bloody-bones of the Faction: That, in fact, no such thing exist'd, or could exist: That the Number of Papists in England was but as One to Two hundred and Thirty: That their Number in the three Kingdoms was but as One to Two hundred and Five: That their Proportion of Property was but as One to Three hundred: That Men really honest, and public-spirited, would rather strive to bind up the bleeding Wounds of their Mother-Country, than take pleasure to tear them open: That the Point, so obstinately stickled for, was never like to be granted: That, if the King was to give way to it, which was not to be imagin'd, the Duke never would: That being treated as an Enemy to his Country, his Royal Highness would become one: That what was so unjustly enacted could no otherwise be defended than by a Standing-Army: That the Remedy would then become worse than the Disease: That, therefore, Recourse ought to be had to other Expedients, that should secure the Government equally against both Papist and Presbyter: That such might now be had, as would effectually provide for the Security

(p) The Words of the Pamphlet are these: "And, above all, he has the Parliament in his own Power, to let them sit or not sit, at his Pleasure, and their good Behaviour."

A. D. 1580. Security of Religion, against the Successor so much, tho' so causelessly, dreaded: That the very State of his Revenue, at his Accession to the Throne, would be a Sort of Security for his good Behaviour: That not above a Fourth of what was necessary for his Support would devolve to him, together with the Scepter: That hence he would find himself oblig'd to call a Parliament, and to comply with the just and reasonable Demands of his People: That it was the highest Degree of Imprudence to rush into real, present, to avoid possible, future, Evils: That it was worthy Consideration, whether the unquiet Apprehensions rais'd by the Plot might not be laid by a speedy Trial of all the Accus'd, and a speedy Execution of all the Convicted, follow'd by a general Act of Grace: And that, in fine, if the Parliament, by whatever Means, would apply themselves, with all their Powers and Faculties, to re-establish a right Understanding between the King and his People, to defeat the Artifices of those who were Enemies to both, to restore and maintain Peace and Unity at home, and to rescue the Nation from Contempt abroad; they would be as deservedly honour'd and belov'd, as odious and infamous by conforming to the libellous Doctrines of the Times.

We have already had Occasion to observe, that, tho' the Courtiers thought the Exclusion-Bill abundantly too much for the King to grant, they also thought, that their Adversaries would not be satisfy'd without a great deal more. This we find also makes a Part of the Charge against them in the Piece just quoted. Mr. North, in many Passages of his Examen, moreover, affirms the same thing: And Sir John Reresby, treating of the Oxford Parliament, is express, that the Question was now become not so much, Whether the Duke should succeed or not? as, Whether the Government should be Monarchical or Republican? Some of the adverse Side, says he, having blabbed out, in the House, That the Bill of Exclusion was not the only material Bill they intended to get pass'd that Session, in order to secure the People of England from falling a Prey to Popery and arbitrary Power: That it was necessary the military and civil Power should be lodg'd in other Hands; and that the present Officers of both should be called to an Account, and chang'd.

The same Writer yet farther intimates, That, from these Eitapes of the Party, and the Remonstrances that were founded upon them, the King was convinced, that the abandoning his Brother would prove but a Step to the immediate Ruin of his Friends and Servants, and the exposing himself to the Will of his Enemies: And that his Majesty, dreading the Consequences, took his Resolutions accordingly.

But we have seen, that the King had taken his Resolutions before the Oxford Parliament was call'd, or the last Westminster Parliament had been dissolv'd: And there is very sufficient Reason to conclude, That he had recourse to a House of Commons once more, not so much with a view to an Accommodation of any sort, as in a Dependence, that they would ruin themselves with the People, by their own Extravagancies: And how madly and desperately they rush'd into the Snare, we are now to shew from the Course of their own Proceedings.

March the 21st, the Session was open'd by his Majesty, with a Speech to both Houses, to the following Effect:

"That the unwarrantable Proceedings of the last House of Commons, were the reason of his parting with them; for that he, who would never use Arbitrary Government himself, would not suffer it in others. That whoever calmly consider'd the Assurances he had renew'd to that last Parliament, and what he had recommended to them, his Foreign Alliances, the Examination of the Plot, and the Preservation of Tanger, and reflect upon the strange unsuitable Returns made to such Propositions by Men assembled to consult, might rather wonder at his Patience, than that he grew weary of their Proceedings: That he had thought it necessary to say thus much, that he might not have any new Occasion to recollect more of the late Miscarriages: That it was his Interest, and should be as much his Cause as theirs to preserve the Liberty of the Subject; the Crown not being late when that is in Danger: That by calling this Parliament so soon, he let them see, that no Irregularities of Parliament should make him out of love with them: By which means he gave them another Opportunity to provide for the Public Security, and had given one Evidence more, that he had not neglected his Part.

That he hop'd the ill Success of former Heats, would dispose them to a better Temper.

That as for the farther Prosecution of the Plot, Trial of the Lords, &c. he omitted to press them, as being obvious to Consideration, and so necessary for the Public Safety: But desired them not to lay so much Weight upon any one Expedient against Popery, as to determine that all other were ineffectual.

That as to what he had so often declared, touching the Succession, he should not depart from it: But that to remove all reasonable Fears of what might arise from the Possibility of a Popish Successor, if Means could be found that, in such a Case, the Administration should remain in Protestant Hands, he should be ready to hearken to any such Expedient, by which Religion might be secur'd and Monarchy not destroy'd.

Lastly, he advis'd them to make the known and establish'd Laws of the Land the Rules and Measures of their Votes, which neither could nor ought to be departed from, nor chang'd, but by Act of Parliament: And for a Conclusion of all, he made use of these Words:

"And I may the more reasonably require, That you make the Laws of the Land your Rule, because I am resolv'd they shall be mine."

Having in this high-spirited manner declar'd his Mind, he directed the Commons to proceed to the Choice of their Speaker. They did so. Williams, the late Speaker,

A. D. 1580. 4.
Speech at opening the Oxford Parliament.

A. D. 1680-1. was rechofen unanimously; who being led to the Chair by two of the Members, according to Form, took occasion to say, "That he apprehended they had pitch'd on the same Speaker, because the Country had, in general, endeavour'd to return the same (k) Members as had serv'd them before: That the just Sense he had of the Honour, was sufficient to oblige him to do and suffer all that Flesh and Blood could do and suffer in their Service: That it was a time not to speak much, but to act well; and that he made it his Request, that their Debates might be regular and orderly, without Reflections or Passion; and that his Behaviour might have their kind and candid Construction."

His Bravado to the King.

And the next Day, being presented to the King for the Royal Approbation, as if it shew'd that the House was rather rouz'd than aw'd by the lofty Tone of his Majesty's Speech, he declar'd before the Throne, That the Commons, in Obedience, &c. had, with one Voice, elected him to be their Speaker, to manifest to his Majesty and the World, That they were not inclinable to Changes; and that he stood before him, to receive his Pleasure, with a Head and Heart full of Loyalty to his sacred Person, and arm'd with a settled Resolution, never to depart from his ancient and well establish'd Government."

It is not to be suppos'd, that this Bravado, which favour'd more of the Herald, than the Speaker, could be any otherwis agreeable to the Court than as it favour'd their Expectations, that the Commons would so behave as to leave themselves without Excuse; And Ferguson intimates, that some of the Peers were seen to bite their Lips on hearing it. But no Displeasure was shewn: On the contrary, the Words of the Lord Chancellor's Reply, were, That his Majesty did very much approve the Election which the Commons had made. After which, the Speaker again display'd his Eloquence, such as it was; made the usual Petitions, receiv'd the usual Confirmation, and return'd with the House.

(Growth of Papers, P. II. P. 292.)

He is approv'd notwithstanding.

These Ceremonies consum'd two Days; a third was spent in taking the Oaths; and on the fourth, if an Account is to be depend'd on, which Mr. North, after all the Recollection he could make, admits for literal Truth, the Lord Shaftsbury pretended to have receiv'd a Letter written in an unknown Hand, containing a Proposal for settling and composing all Differences between the King and Parliament, that was of Consequence enough to demand and deserve his Majesty's immediate Consideration; for so his Lordship, it seems, officiously gave out, on every Side; perhaps, that his Majesty might be the better prepar'd to give it a proper Reception. Hence it follow'd, that, while he was endeavouring to make his way to the King, the Letter was every where discours'd of; every body discover'd an Eagerness to be let into the Contents; and, in particular, the Lord Chamberlain Arlington, meeting with the Duke of Monmouth, could not forbear applying to his Grace for Information: But his Grace chose to be on the Reserve, because it had a Relation to himself: Adding, That my Lord Shaftsbury was pleas'd to be more forward in his Concerns than he desir'd he should be. In the mean time the Earl, himself, had fallen into the Way of Lord Everingham, or Lord Feverham had made it his Business to fall into his, and undertook to introduce him to the King; prefacing his Offer, with a Signification, That he heard he had some Business of great Importance to communicate to his Majesty: To which Lord Shaftsbury, ironically, reply'd, That he should be glad to be introduced by so long a Man as his Lordship. Being, at last, admitted, his Lordship pretends the important Paper, which contain'd the grand Secret of securing the Protestant Religion, and public Peace. The King reads, finds it to be a Project to settle the Crown on the Duke of Monmouth, in lieu of the Bill of Exclusion: And with some Indications of Surprise, answers: "That he wonder'd that, after so many Declarations to the contrary, he should press him upon that Subject: That, if, either with Conscience, or Justice, or Nature, he could have done such a thing, he would have done it before; it being reasonable that, if he ever had a Child of his own, legitimate, he should much rather have him reign than his Brother, or any of his Brother's Children: That he was none of those that grew more timorous with Age; but that, rather, he grew more resolute, the nearer he was to his Grave." At that Word, the loyal Earl seem'd mightily concern'd, and cry'd out, "That it chill'd his Blood to hear such an Expression; telling the King how earnest the whole Nation was for his Preservation; and that in him were compriz'd their Safeties, Lives, Liberties, and Religion, and their All." "Yes, answer'd his Majesty, and yet, my Lord, I am the only arbitrary Man in the Kingdom. But, assure yourselves, I intend to take a greater care of my own Preservation, and that of my People, than any of you all, that pretend to so much Concern for the Security of my Person: And yet, as careful as I am of my own Preservation, I would much sooner lose this Life, of which you pretend to be such watchful Preservers, than ever part with any of my Prerogatives, or betray this Place, the Laws, or the Religion, or alter the true Succession of the Crown; it being repugnant both to Conscience and Law."

A. D. 1680-1.

"For that Matter, replied the Earl, let us alone, we will make a Law for it." But the King told him, "My Lord, if this is your Conscience, it is far from being mine, for this cannot be done without overthrowing all Religion and Law. And, in fine, assure yourselves that, as I love my Life so well as to take all the Care in the World to keep it with Honour, so I do not think it of so great Value, after fifty, to be preferred with the Forfeiture of my Honour, Conscience, and the Laws of the Land."

A.D. 1680.

The Moderation of the House which it was in 1680.

It is universally understood, That very little Regard is shewn to Letters from unknown Hands, even in private Affairs. If, therefore, any Credit is due to this Narrative, it must be presum'd, that the Earl was not the Patron, but the Projector, of this Expedition; and that, by his Influence over the Party, he prevail'd with them not to ply their grand Parliamentary Batteries, till the Success of it was known. No less than twenty-five Petitions, complaining of undue Elections, were received this Day, the fourth of the Session, before they proceeded to any other Business. The printing the Votes came next before them, and gave rise to a short Debate (Mr. Secretary Jenkins opposing it, because it was against the Gravity of that Assembly, and a sort of Appeal to the People). And when another Motion was made to enquire into the Mis carriage of the Bill for the Repeal of the 35th of Elizabeth, because it was a Breach of the Constitution, Sir Francis Winnington desir'd, that the Debate might be adjourn'd; as being a Matter too big to be debated that Day. Nay, when Sir Nicholas Carew mov'd for bringing in the Bill of Exclusion, which had pass'd, nemine contradicente, before, and was regularly seconded by Mr. Gower; even Colonel Birch, himself, was for giving the King's Proposal in his Speech, as to other Means, the Honour of a Day's Consideration, before the said Bill should be again admitted. And of the same Opinion were Harbord, Musgrave, Worwood, Poude, Hampden, Winnington, Trenchard, and all the other Leaders of the Party. Whence it seems natural to conclude, that a Word of Expectation had been given out; that those who had tow'r'd highest condescended to stoop to the Lure; and that, if they were not in the Secret of the Contrivance, they thought themselves concern'd in the Event.

And this Opinion derives some additional Authority from the different Spirit which prevail'd in the House the next Day, and which discover'd itself almost as soon as the House was set. The first material Business which had engag'd the Attention of the Lords was, a Petition from the Earl of Danby in the Tower, praying that he might be admitted to Bail. This had been supported by several Lords, who offer'd to be his Security; and has been represented as a Design to create a Misunderstanding between the two Houses, and thereby furnish an early Pretence to break up the Parliament: But Lord Hallifax himself, and several other Courtiers, who dreaded the Return of his Credit with the Restoration of his Liberty, opposing it, the Debate was adjourn'd; and, for fear it should be resum'd, the Commons let loose their Terrors against him once more, by appointing a Committee to inspect the former Proceedings relating to his Impeachment; who enter'd upon their Charge with so much Zeal, and went thro' it with so much Dispatch, that they made their Report the same Day, and the House issued the following Order upon it, "That a Message be sent (by Lord Cavendish) to the Lords, to mind their Lordships, that the Commons in Parliament had formerly, by their Speaker, demanded Judgment at the Bar of the Lords House, upon the Impeachment of the Commons, against Thomas Earl of Danby, of High Treason; and to desire their Lordships to appoint a Day to give Judgment against the said Thomas Earl of Danby," &c.

This was the Opening of the fifth Day's Business: And while the Committee were making their Inspection, and digesting their Report, it was represented by several Members, That many Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, had freely, and without Charge, elected their Representatives, according to the ancient Practice: And a Motion was made, that they might be honour'd with the Thanks of the House; which was agreed to, and an Order was made accordingly.

The Debate relating to the Bill for the Repeal of the Statute 35 Eliz. was, in this Interval, also resum'd, and many of the Party-Leaders, who had the Day before shewn such a Backwardness to engage in so weighty a Matter, now enter'd upon the Consideration of it with all the Alacrity, and dispatch'd it with all the Facility, imaginable. Sir William Jones observ'd upon it, "That the Bill itself was of great Moment: That it was a Security even for the Lives of the Subjects, in the Time of a popish Successor: That the Manner of losing it shook the very Constitution of Parliament: That the Precedent might be fatal: That tho' the King had one Negative, he never knew that the Clerk of the Parliament had another: That to Bills grateful and popular, as every body vers'd in Law and History was sensible, the King gave his Consent as of Course: That this was a Way to frustrate the Intentions of Parliament, without a Possibility of knowing at whose Door the Fault ought to be laid: That their Deliberations and Resolutions would be useless: That a new Grievance would arise, which it would be extremely difficult to surmount: And that, upon the Whole, it was his Motion, that a Message should be sent to the Lords, to demand a Conference; in order that some Way might be found out to give the House Satisfaction in so great a Matter." Many other Members enlarg'd on the same Topics; and, upon the Issue, the Message for a Conference was agreed upon, with the Addition of these Words, on Matters relating to the Constitution of Parliaments in passing of Bills.

From this Affair they pass'd on, at a Heat, to Fitzbarris's Case; and Sir George Treby produced the Depositions taken by him and Sir George Clayton in Newgate; which he read in his Place, and which were in Substance as follows:

"That Father Gough told him, that, in two Years, he should see the Roman Catholic Religion settled in England, as it was in France: That, if the King would not comply, Things were so ordered, that he should be taken off, and killed: That the Declaration of Indulgence was made for that End, viz. to introduce the Catholic Religion: That the War was made with Holland for the

the same End; for that Nest of Heretics being once destroy'd, the English Protestants would have no Assistance from abroad. That Madam came over to Dover on the same Design. That he, Fitzbarris, was an Officer in the Army encamp'd at Blackheath, and knew many other Papist Officers there; and who, upon the Test-Act taking place, all laid down. That it was the common Intelligence and Opinion among them, that the said Army was rais'd to bring in the Roman Catholic Religion. That Father Parry, on the Disappointment by Peace, told him the Catholics who were engag'd in this Council resolv'd to destroy the King; and, if they fail'd, the Queen would do it; and in the Year 1678 assur'd him the Business was near. That the Modena Envoy offer'd him 10,000*l.* to kill the King; which he refusing, the Envoy said, the Duchess of Mazarine understood poisoning as well as her Sister, and a little Phial, when the King came there, should do it. That, upon killing the King, the Soldiers of the Army in Flanders, and those of France, that were near, were to come over to destroy the Protestant Party. That Money was raising in Italy for Recruits and Supplies. That after this there should be no more Parliaments. That the Duke of York was privy to all this. That Kelly, at Calais, own'd himself to have been one of the Murderers of Godfrey; and that it was done much in manner as France had sworn. That Du Puy, the Duke's Servant, told the Murder was consulted at Windsor; as also that the Duke was desirous to come to the Crown; for the King was uncertain, and did not keep touch; and farther, that he, Du Puy, said it was necessary to take off the King. That Father Patrick said the King of France was to send over and take in Ireland, to be subject to the former Owners, the French; and that libelling the King and the Government was necessary to distaste the King and make him jealous of his People: And that the Opinion of Patrick encourag'd him to correspond and concur with Everard in the Label.

It may be recollected, that in a Quotation, before taken from Bishop Burnet, this whole Detail, is, by that Right Reverend Prelate, fill'd a Fifteen: And yet we find it solemnly adopted by these Oxford Patriots, not only as Gospel Truth in itself, but what clearly confirm'd all those other Informations which the House had receiv'd before. These are the very Words of their Great Oracle, Sir William Jones, and contain his Reason for seconding a Motion, which had been made by Sir John Harrop, for laying it before the Public in Print. But this political Use of Fitzbarris's Confession was not sufficient for Sir Francis Winnington, who, tho' so moderate the Day before, was for rising on his Brother Jones; and, accordingly, set forth in very tragic Terms, That it was the Talk of the Country, that Fitzbarris's Label, was to have been distributed to several Gentlemen, who, upon its being found in their Custody, were to have been committed as Traitors: That their All was at Stake: That whether the Term of their Sitting was to be long or short (here he throw in a Parenthesis, signifying, That a certain Trooper, one Horsifon, had given out there would be other Guards at Oxford) their Courage ought not to fall them: That, therefore, they ought to go to the Bottom of the Business: That, in order thereto, he mov'd Fitzbarris might be sent for and impeach'd: That they knew by Experience, that when an Accusation was once upon Record in Parliament, which was the highest Court in the Kingdom, Malefactors had been found to be within the Reach of Justice; and that Fitzbarris, while under the Awe of such a Prosecution, might, possibly, relent and tell all. And to shew there was yet more to be told, Sir Robert Clayton took the Hint to say, That when Fitzbarris had made the Confession already before the House, he ask'd, Whether he had said enough to save his Life? That he, Sir Robert, reply'd, That he should not think him ingenuous, unless he would also specify what Council he had for drawing and modelling the Paper: To which he added, That he had left him, with a parting Addition, to be ingenuous in the whole Matter, which he promis'd him to be, and an Assurance, That he would come again to take his farther Examination: But that he was, the next Day, remov'd to the Tower, out of Reach. An Impeachment was then order'd; and to shew in what Contempt they held the Court and the Ministers, a Motion was made and agreed to, That Mr. Secretary Jenkins should carry up the said Impeachment to the Lords. It seems the Gravity of the House was lost on this Occasion. The Motion was made and carry'd on with an Air of Derision. The Secretary perceiv'd it, and so far forgot himself in his Resentment, "That he declar'd the Message was put upon him for the Character he bore: That he valu'd neither his Life nor Liberty; and that, let them do what they would, he would not go." This threw the House into much Disorder. To the Bar! To the Bar! was the Cry on all Sides. Even Sir Thomas Littleton, who was now one of the Moderators between the two Parties, declar'd against him. Sir William Jones said many inflammatory things upon the Occasion: In particular, that the Secretary's Words seem'd to import, That the King would not have the Plot prosecuted; and if so, it was to no purpose to sit there; it was time to go home, &c. Sir Henry Capel, on the contrary, was for admitting the Secretary's Excuses, if he thought fit to make any: And, at last, by the Persuasions of Sir John Fenley, Mr. Secretary thought fit to qualify his Words to the Palate of the House; and submitted to go on the Message, according to order. After which, at the Instance of Colonel Bireb, Sir William Waller had the Thanks of the House for the Discovery he had made of Fitzbarris's Intrigues; which was represent'd as the greatest Service which had been done the Nation, next to that of the Popish Plot.

Thus the Calm ended in a Ruffle, accompany'd with all the Prognosticks of a Storm to ensue.

The Exclusion of Sergeant and Maurice.

Accordingly, the next Morning, as a proper Introduction to the Order of the Day for the House to enter into a Consideration of the Means for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and for the Safety of the King's Person, Sir George Treby reported the (1) Examinations of one John Sergeant, and David Maurice; both of which had been taken on the same Day, viz. February 11, 1679-80, tho' not made a Part of the Patriot System till now. That of Sergeant's was to this Effect, That Gowan or Gowson, one of the five Jesuits which were hang'd, contrary to his solemn Affeurations in his Dying-Speech, had maintain'd to one Mrs. Shipweith, against a Scruple of Conscience by her put, That the Queen might not only lawfully kill the King for violating her Bed, but was bound to do it; for that in continuing to connive at the Sin, she was accessary to his greater Damnation. To which was added his Confirmation of the same before the King; as also, his Reasons, address'd to his Majesty, for persevering to assert, that all he had advanc'd was true. That of Maurice contain'd nothing new, and was brought forward, merely as an additional Prop to the Credit of Sergeant: He deposing, that Sergeant had introduc'd him to Mrs. Shipweith, on purpose that he might hear the same Story from her own Mouth.

The Exclusion-
Bill upon Maurice's Story.

Having thus prepar'd the Way, Sir Robert Clayton open'd the Debate, artfully enough, under the Umbrage of his Constituents the Citizens of London. "I have, said he, been full of Expectation of some other Expedient to secure the Life of the King, and the Protestant Religion, than that of the Bill to exclude the Duke.— All I have yet heard of tend to make a Breach in the Constitution, and to throw us into Confusion. I have heard it has been ancient Usage for Members to consult the Sense of those they represent, in any thing of Weight; and to be govern'd by it.— The City of London has call'd upon me for the Bill of Exclusion.— I heartily wish some other Expedient could be found: But I must fulfil my Trust; and therefore move for a Bill to exclude all popish Successors, and in particular James Duke of York." He was seconded by Lord Russel, who declar'd he lay under the same Obligations to the County of Bedford. Here it must be suppos'd, that some Court Member stood up, and endeavour'd to dissuade the House from proceeding on that Bill, the King having declar'd against it, and recommended other Means, &c. for we find Mr. Ralph Montagu saying, That he was sorry to hear such Language: That to prescribe to the House what they should do, and what they should forbear, was using the House more like a French than an English Parliament: That no greater Instance of arbitrary Power could be given, than the endeavouring to overawe the Parliament: That possibly this was the Design of bringing them to Oxford: That it was to be hop'd notwithstanding that, wherever they were call'd, they should approve themselves to be the same Men: That Lord Danby, when he dissolv'd the long Parliament, had boast'd, He had spoil'd the old Rooks of their false Dies: That the new Ministers were for playing the same Tricks, and shuffling again and again, till a Card turn'd up to their Mind: That as to the Disinheriting the Duke, he presum'd, that no Master would scruple to dismiss a Servant, nor Father to disinherite a Son, that would ruin him: That, in truth, neither Bishops nor Counsellors could answer the deferring our Security so long: But that, hitherto, neither Ministers of the Gospel had endeavour'd the Preservation of Religion, nor Ministers of State the Government: That the one had acted against the King's Safety, and the other against the establish'd Church: And that, upon the Whole, no Expedient would answer, but the Bill. Mr. Henry Coventry then rose up, and took notice, That the Order of the Day was not made the Rule of the Debate: That several Gentlemen had declar'd against Expedients: That those who had declar'd for them had offer'd none: That all agreed the Duke's Religion was fatal to the Nation: That if the Exclusion was the best Remedy, and that best Remedy could not be had, they could not answer it to their Country to reject all: That whoever had any Expedient to propose would find it necessary to speak often, perhaps, to make that Expedient good: That this could only be done in a Committee of the whole House: That, in such Case, if one Question was rejected, another might be substituted in its place: That the Motion for the Bill of Exclusion excluded all other Motions: That the Order was general, to find out Means against Popery, and to preserve the King: That, when Persons put on too fast, they come late to their Inn, by jading their Horses: And that, without a grand Committee, it would not be consultare, but dicere. Sir John Evelyn seconded this Motion for a grand Committee, on Expedients: But another Member observ'd, that the general Turn of the Order left the House free, either to admit the Bill, or any other Expedient: That all other Expedients, hitherto, had only serv'd to increase their Fears (m) of the King, and to hasten our Undoing: That the Dissolution of Parliaments was one of those ill Expedients: That those near the King, who had seen Cause to come over to the Bill, were all put away: That those now near him were all for Expedients: That the Councils of the Jesuits would have their desir'd Success, either by practising on the Fears of the People, so as should induce them to take up with a false Security, which might serve as a Blind to cover its Approaches, rather than as a Means to prevent them; or by throwing the Kingdom into Disorder: That as to the Motion for a grand Committee, it brought the

the House under an ugly Dilemma; for if it was deny'd, it would look like denying Freedom of Debate; and if it was accepted, it would render their Proceedings dilatory, when no body knew whether they had another Day to sit: That the Affair of the Exclusion, having been depending two Parliaments, was very well understood: That, during all that Time, no other Expedient was thought worth hearkening to: And that therefore he was for keeping up to the Letter of the Order. After this, Mr. L. Gower calling upon those who had Expedients, to offer them; Sir John Ernley declar'd he had something of that kind to communicate, provided the House thought proper to resolve itself into a Committee, according to Mr. Coomtry's Motion: But this was fiercely oppos'd by another Member, who said, That our Disease was a Pleurisy, and that we must let Blood: That they ought to proceed to what would do their Business: That if the Bill was carry'd, possibly they should want yet other Expedients to fortify it: That he would have the House understand, that those who were against the Committee were for excluding the Duke; that those who were for it were against the Exclusion; and that, upon this Issue, they might put the Question, if they pleas'd. Two other Members then stood up for the Committee, urging, that those who were for proposing Expedients ought to receive all the Encouragement that the House could give. These were answer'd by Mr. Hampden; who, after insisting on the Merits and Virtues of the Bill contended for, and the Sanctions it had already receiv'd, challeng'd those who had these Expedients in petto to open them, that the House might judge whether they were worth the Consideration of a Committee; and that if Gentlemen insisted on carrying their own Points their own Way, it might be fairly concluded, they were summing one way, and nothing another. This provok'd Sir John Ernley to unfold his Secret, namely, (1.) That the Title of King might remain in the Duke, but the Power be veiled in the next Heir, as Regent, with Authority, upon the Death of the King, to resemble the Parliament which sat last, who should have Time to confirm the Bill: And that the said Regent should be disabled, by Proviso, from resigning in favour of the Duke. The first Objector was Sir Nicholas Carew; who desir'd to be inform'd, whether, in case the Duke refused to submit to this Decision, those who undertook to compel him would not be reckon'd Traitors by the Law? But Sir William Pulteney, in plain Terms, call'd it a crude Project; and made no scruple to declare, That he could not imagine it would ever be an effectual one: That it render'd the King a Shadow: That our Laws would never endure the dividing the Person from the Power: That who the next Heir would be, nobody could ascertain: That the King recommended such Expedients as prefer'd the Monarchy: That this, on the contrary, supposes two Kings, at the same time; one by Law, and another by Right: That nothing could be more dangerous, than to admit the Duke, and then make a question whether Allegiance be due to him: That most of the Members had express Directions from their Constituents to pursue the Bill: That, unless they acted agreeable to those Directions, it was to be doubted whether their Proceedings would be avow'd by them: That the Bill had been under the Consideration of all the People of England, perhaps all the Protestants in Europe: That all the Wit and Learning of those who oppos'd it had been exercised in Objections against it; and yet all the People still adher'd to it: That the Expedient was the most mishapen of all things which was recommended in lieu of it: That it might be two or three Years before it would be understood: That when it was to operate, no body could calculate: And, finally, That, unless it was greatly amended, he saw no Reason to entertain it. This Hint of Amendment call'd up Sir Thomas Littleton; who, having decry'd the Plea which several Gentlemen had urg'd, of being directed by their Principals, as an uncertain thing in itself, and not sufficiently warranted by proper Credentials, from those they pretended to obey, proceeded to build on Sir John Ernley's Plan, to remove the Prejudices which the House had already conceiv'd against it, and to shew that it bid fairer to establish the public Peace, than the Bill itself. He said, the Regency propos'd, came the nearest of any thing imaginable to the King's Proposal; for it secur'd the Administration of Power in a Protestant Hand, without making any Interruption in the Monarchy:—The Duke might be banish'd 500 Miles from England:—The next Heir, the Prince of Orange, and after her the Lady Anne, for Example, might be nam'd in the Bill:—An Oath might be prepar'd and insert'd to oblige them, in case they accepted the Regency, to execute the Conditions of it:—It would be a less Violence to govern in a Father's Name, than take the Kingdom from him:—When the Law was made, that the King and Parliament might dispose of the Succession, it was a Maxim among the Lawyers that the Crown was unalienable, and yet that Law was obey'd:—The Precedent and Success of that might very well warrant this:—It was the best and safest Expedient that could be propos'd:—It was to be fear'd, that after so great an Affair had been started, if nothing was done, the Yesuits and Commonwealth-Men would have the shuffling the Cards again:—But if some Medium was agreed upon, both would be undone:—He added much more: But the Minutes that are left of his Speech, (and indeed all the other Speeches taken at this time) are so perplex'd and incoherent, rate, that nothing very material can, with Confidence and Certainty, be further extract- ed from it. Sir William Jones undertook to answer him, and set out with expressing his Amazement, that so learned and able a Gentleman should not see thro' the Expedient he propos'd. What does he mean, said he, by the next Heir? for any thing I know and believe, it is the Duke's Daughter.---- But suppose the Duke should have a Son, and the King should die while he was in his Infancy, or the Princess of Orange should leave an Infant Heir, must that Infant, as next Heir, be Regent? If so, that Infant must have a Protector; and so there would be a Protector of a Protector. But if the Duke is left in Possession of the Name, it will imply a Right to the thing: If he is not depriv'd of the Title, he cannot be depriv'd of the Power. Learned Lawyers will tell you, That all Incapacity is taken away by the Possession of the Crown. If he has the Right, and is debar'd from the Administration, I doubt whether I shall fight against him.----The Papists will say, you have got a Law to separate what is inseparable.----If I was the Duke, I would have had such a Bill as this to puzzle and perplex my Opposers.----If one Army should be necessary to maintain the Exclusion, four would be as necessary to maintain this Expedient: And those who propose it will have the same Power to let the Duke in, as to keep him out.---- Sir Tho. Mompesson, on the other hand, to obviate the Law-Maxim, That Dominion must accompany the Name of King, appeal'd to the Lawyers, whether they who could disinherit the King, could not make this Expedient Law; and argu'd, that as there was no likelihood of obtaining their own Bill, it would be advisable to accept of this: That in his Opinion, the Expedient was a kind of Exclusion; and that if Gentlemen were of a different Mind, they would do well to manage so, that the Country might have the Benefit of one Bill, or the other. Sir Francis Wilmington, as in his Profession, undertook to solve this Gentleman's Query; and, yet allow'd, at the very Entrance of his Discourse, That the same Power that could make a Descent of the Crown, might modify it; which was, in Effect, admitting the very Principle he pretended to confute: But then he said, That Lawyers were aptest to take on with the strongest Side, and to resolve all into Prerogative: That an Act of Parliament against Common Sense was void: That to make a Man a King, and not to suffer him to exercise kingly Power, was a Contradiction: That the Clause relative to the Succession, before refer'd to by Sir Thomas Littleton, was a flattering Clause to satisfy the People, not put them in Possession of the thing: That if this Expedient was to become an Act it would be found Nonsense, because impracticable; and then it would be said the House of Commons were outwitted: That, therefore, it was rather an Expedient to dazzle the Eyes of the People, than give them any solid Security: That he discern'd, during the last

Parliament, That by the Management of the Papists and the Ministers, in case the Exclusion-Bill did not take place, our King would be irresistible: That even the King, in his Speech, when recommending Expedients, seem'd to doubt whether any were practicable: That in the Expedient then under Consideration, there would be no legal Security: That he hop'd Reason, and not great Offices, would have most Weight with the House: That nothing short of the Exclusion-Bill would answer the Ends propos'd; and that he spake all as dying Man: Sir Thomas Mompesson reply'd pathetically, "Pray let us have the Law on our Sides, that if the King dye, we may know whether we are to go.----I think the King's Speech is penn'd as it ought to be penn'd.----Should a King declare positively what Laws he would have, we should resemble an Irish more than an English Parliament.---- But the King's Words are tender Words: The Thing lies fairly before you: If any Expedient can be thought of, not to destroy the Monarchy, embrace it; And, if the best cannot be had, do not refuse that which may." Mr. Edward Vaughan rose up next, but with a very different Spirit: He was of Opinion, the Regency-Bill would entail a War on the Nation, as well as that of the Exclusion; and farther express'd himself to this Effect: "Tho' Endeavours have been us'd to frighten us out of that Bill, by Prerogatives and Dissolutions, they will have no Effect on those whose Reasons go along with it. I am for that Bill, because all Men are for it, and have sent up the same Parliament again that pass'd it: But if you lead People into Uncertainties as to Government, as this Project of the Regency undoubtedly will, both Court and Country will agree to lay aside Parliaments, because they are useless. Colonel Legg endeavour'd then to turn the Current of the House, by setting before their Eyes the Terrors of a Republic. Such Attempts, he said, had already been made; and if the Duke was excluded, considering how much the Revenue depended on the People, there was much Danger of the like Attempt again. To confirm this, he told a Story of an eminent and powerful Man, in the late troubled Times, who had given his Father, then in Prison, this Caution, I have oblig'd you; and if the King come in, as I believe he will, then think of me. Look to yourselves when you are in the Saddle again: If once you divide, adieu to Monarchy for ever." Adding, "If you keep out the Duke, what must follow? An Act of Association. I speak now for England, for my Posterity, (I have seven Children) not as the Duke's Servant; nor would I out of a Pique of Honour, do any thing to destroy my Posterity." Possibly these and the like things, deliver'd with more Passion than Art, began to fasten the House; and it was thought advisable to efface every such Impression as fast as possible. For tho' Sir William Courtenay rose up to speak for the Exclusion, he was not suffer'd to proceed; and Colonel Birch undertook to work upon the Passions (69).----<sup>9</sup> This is the Day

Day of England's Distress, said he: On this Day's Debate depends the Fate of the Protestant Religion all the World over.—Nothing but a Miracle from Heaven can save the Protestant Religion, without the Exclusion-Bill.—As to the Point of Law spoken of, that will be interpreted according to the Strength of the Party.— We are in a Condition of Conquest or Compact; and so small Government.— Interest must defend this Bill, and not an Army.— We are the Army: I have a Family, as well as others; and, rather than my Children should breathe in an Air tainted with Idolatry, I had rather see them bury'd.— Without this Bill, you may fit down, take a Popish Successor, and renounce the Protestant Religion.— I would break this popish Interest, and then Interest will maintain this Bill.— If once the Bill is pass'd, and, as in Queen Elizabeth's Time, Protestants are put in Places of Trust, you need not fear the Disturbance spoken of.— Where Ten were once of this Mind, there are now a Hundred, that will bleed for the Bill. In plain English, let the World see, that the Protestant Religion is dear to us, and we shall have the Law on our Side." Sir Thomas Lyttleton here offer'd an (e) Explanation of the Expedient he had recommended, namely, That the Lady Mary's Regency obviated an Absurdity in the Exclusion-Bill: In that, no Provision was or could be made, in case the Duke should have a Son, after his Daughter had ascended the Throne; for she could not be dispossest'd: Whereas, in this, the two Princesses might respectively succeed to the Regency during the Minority of the Son, as well as the Life of the Father, without any Violation of Right, or Prejudice to Monarchy. Mr. Booth, upon this, took upon him to close the Debate, by observing, that if, on the Supposition of a Regency, all Commissions were to be issued in the King's Name, Obedience would be due only to him: That the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy could be taken to none but him; and by them it was declar'd unlawful to take up Arms against the King, or those commission'd by him: That, on the contrary, if the great Privileges of the Crown, such as making War and Peace, disposing of Money, &c. were lodg'd in the Regent, the Monarchy would be violated, if not destroy'd: That, upon the Whole, he saw no Remedy but the Exclusion-Bill; and, therefore, he thought it reasonable to call for the Question: Which was put, and carry'd for the said Bill: And a Committee was appointed to prepare and bring it in accordingly.

This was the Work of the Morning: And while the Debate lasted, Sir Leoline Jenkins, in obedience to the Commands of the House, lodg'd the Impeachment against Fitzharris with the Lords; which he had no sooner done, than Mr. Attorney-General, Sir Robert Sawyer, gave their Lordships an Account of the Case; and farther signify'd, that he had his Majesty's Order, dated the 9th of March instant, for prosecuting the said Fitzharris at Law; and that, in obedience thereto, he had already prepar'd an Indictment against him: Thereby tacitly intimating, that there was no need of their Lordship's Help, to bring a Delinquent to Justice, who was already in the Clutches of the Law.

These Counter-proceedings of the King and the Commons immediately gave rise to a long and warm Debate; the Court-Lords urging, That Fitzharris was beneath the Notice of Parliament: That he was already under Protection: And that it was in the Option of the House either to accept or reject Impeachments, when preferr'd against Commoners; as, in particular, the Lord-Chancellor endeavour'd to shew, by citing the Case of the (p) six Murderers of Edward II. who

(a) Edward says, "The business of the Day is opened with reading a Paper of Exhortation, but whatever concerns the Progress of the Debate must be convinced, that the Paper was otherwise; and that the Paper was drawn up after the Debate was over. The said Paper, containing the whole Project in form, is of importance, and therefore deserves a Place here as follows:

It was intitled, Heads of the Expedient proposed in form of the former Bill, for excluding James Duke of York &c. 1. That the Duke of York be banish'd, during his Life, five hundred Miles from England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories to them belonging. 2. That the whole Government, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, shall, upon the Death of the King, be vested in a Regent, for such time as the Duke of York shall survive. 3. That the Regent be the Princess of Orange; and in case of her Decease without Issue, or with Issue in Minority, then the Lady Anne. 4. That if the Duke have a Son, educated a Protestant, then the said Princess respectively shall succeed in the Regency, during the Minority of such Son, and no longer: Which obtains an inseparable & fixed in the former Bill of Exclusion. 5. That the Regent do nominate the Privy-Council, and they to be, or not to be, approv'd in Parliament, as shall be judg'd fittest, upon directing the drawing up of this intitled Act. 6. That, notwithstanding these Kingdoms (that of Respect to the Royal Family, and Majesty itself) may be govern'd by the said Regent, in the Name and Style of James the Second, &c. yet it shall, by this intitled Act, be made capital, for any to take up Arms on his behalf, or by his Commission, not sign'd by the said Regent, or granted by lawful Authority deriv'd from and under his Regency; or to maintain an Opinion, that the retaining for said Name and Style shall, in this Case, purge the Duties impos'd by this Act, or elude the Force thereof. 7. That Commissioners be forthwith sent to the Prince and Princess of Orange, to take their Oaths, that they will take upon them the Execution of this Act, and that their Oaths be here recorded. 8. That all Officers, civil and military, forthwith take Oaths to observe this Act, from time to time, as in the Act for the 7th. 9. That his Majesty would graciously declare to call a Parliament in Scotland, in order to passing the like Act there; and recommend the same; and the like to be done in Ireland, if thought necessary. 10. That, in case the said Duke shall come into any of these Kingdoms, then shall he be ipso facto excluded, and shall forfeit, as in the former Bill; and the Sovereignty shall be forthwith invested in the Regent, upon such his coming into any of these Kingdoms. 11. That all considerable Papists be banish'd by Name. 12. That all their fraudulent Conveyances be defunct. 13. That their Children be educated in the Protestant Religion. By this means, these three Kingdoms will be united in the Defence of the Protestant Religion, his Majesty's Person and Government; and a sure Foundation laid of an effectual League with Holland, and consequently with the rest of Christendom, in opposition to the growing Greivance of France.

(b) In the 4th of Edward the Third, in Parliament, Simon Buregh, Thomas Grey, and John Mowbray, Knights, Hugo de Lincoll, John Dremar, William Ogle, all Commoners, were arraign'd to Death by the Lords, for murdering King Edward the Second: And afterwards, in the same Parliament, when the Lords had given Judgment against them, a Privy Seal Agreement was recorded in these Words: Et of oxford &c. &c. And it is intitled and recorded by one Lord the King, and all the Guards, in full Parliament, That, when the said Peers, as Judges of being all Commoners, and having been condemn'd by the Lords, it was thereupon expressly enacted, That the Thing should not be brought into Precedent or Example for the Time to come. Those in the Opposition reply'd, That the Case was not in Point; and consequently was of no Authority: That this Record was made at the Instance of the Commons, who had just Reasons to dread Impeachments at the King's Suit, as this was; but never meant to preclude themselves from the Privilege of prosecuting them at their own: That Judges, Secretaries of State, and Lord-Keepers, were often Commoners; and, if this was to be receiv'd as Law, it was in the Power of the Lords, whenever they pleas'd, to put a stop to the Course of parliamentary Justice: That, however, the Matter of Fact was otherwise: That, as it was the Right of the Commons to impeach; so it was the Duty of the Lords, and had ever been their Custom, to receive such Impeachments: And that they could not reject them, without a manifest Violation of the Law and Usage of Parliaments. A Question being at last stated, Whether Edward Fitzbarris should be proceeded with according to the Course of the common Law, and not by way of Impeachment, at this time, it pass'd in the Affirmative.

The said Impeachment re- judic'd.

[North's Examen, p. 116.]

And here began a new Debate; the vanquish'd Party not only desir'd Leave to enter their Dissent, But also their Reasons for dissenting. Leave to protest was granted of course; but to specify Motives and Causes was a Novelty, and apparently demanded with a View to the Service without-doors: For this Reason it was earnestly oppos'd by those who were most likely to be affected by it; who said, It was not equal for the Reasons on one Side to appear on Record, and not those on the other; nor, that Provision should be made to seduce Posterity into an Opinion, that the Proceedings of the House were warranted by Numbers only. But, in this Instance, the peculiar Interest of the Peerage got the better of Court-attachment: The Majority of the Lords were pleas'd with the Thought, and glad of an Opportunity to enlarge their Privilege: In consequence of which, the Protesters carry'd their Point, and enter'd their Reasons; which were in substance as follows: viz. 1. Because that, in all Ages, it hath been the undoubted Right of the Commons to impeach before the Lords any Subject, for Treach, or any Crime whatsoever: And the Reason is, because great Offences, that influence the Parliament, are most effectually determin'd in Parliament. 2. The Impeachment of Fitzbarris could not be rejected, because THAT Suit or Complaint could not be determin'd any where else. 3. Such a Rejection, for that very Reason, would be an absolute Denial of Justice; the House of Peers, as to Impeachments, proceeding by their judicial Power, and not by their legislative: Whence it follow'd, that, as a Court of Record, they could no more deny Suitors (especially the Commons of England) that brought legal Complaints before them, than the Justices of Westminster-hall. 4. The Law says, in the Person of the King, Nulli negabimus Justitiam, We will deny Justice to no single Person: yet here, according to their Apprehensions, Justice was deny'd to the Body of the People; which might be interpreted an exercising of arbitrary Power, and would, it was to be fear'd, have an Influence upon the Constitution, by encouraging all inferior Courts to exercise the same arbitrary Power; as in denying the Presentments of Grand-Juries, &c. for which at this time the Chief-Justice stands impeach'd in the House of Peers. And, lastly, these Proceedings of the House of Peers may misrepresent the House of Peers to the King and People, especially at this Time, and more especially in the Case of Edward Fitzbarris, who is publicly known to be concern'd in vile and horrid Treasons against his Majesty, and a great Conspirator in the Popish Plot, to murder the King, and destroy and subvert the Protestant Religion. This Protest was sign'd by the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Kent, Huntington, Bedford, Salisbury, Clare, Stamford, Sunderland, Essex, Stafford, and Macclesfield; and the Lords Murdant, Wharton, Paget, Grey of Wark, Herbert of Cheshire, Cornewallis, Loveclace, and Cress; and by the Means of the Press, for which it was originally calculated, became the Subject-Matter of political (q) Controversy all over the Kingdom.

the first time, in this Court.

The

Parliament, took upon them, in the Presence of our Lord the King, to make and render the said Judgment, &c. yea, that the said Peers who now are, or the Peers who shall be in time to come, be not bound or charg'd to render Judgment upon other than their Peers. For that the Peers of the Land have Power to do this, but thereof for ever to be discharg'd and acquitted: And the aforesaid Judgment now render'd be not drawn into Example or Consequence, in time to come; whereby the said Peers may be oblig'd and charged hereafter to judge other than their Peers, contrary to the Law of the Land, if the like Case happen, which God forbid. Fit. Parl. N. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

[g] An Answer to this Protest was also printed: the most material Parts of which are here inserted, that the Reader may be the better Judge of the Merits on both Sides.

To the 5th Article, it was answer'd, "The Parliament is certainly the most high Court of the Nation; and, by the Writ, the Members of both Houses are called to treat, de quibusdam articulis, certain difficult Matters, or Things of a high Nature, which concern the King, Kingdom, and Church; and therefore 'tis rational to think, that any Crime whatsoever doth not properly fall under the Cognizance of this high Court; nor can any Crime whatsoever be such a great Offence, as (to sit the same Phrase) may influence the Parliament, and be most effectually determin'd in it. If this were admitted, in a short time the Jurisdiction of all inferior Courts would fall to the Ground; and, it may be supposed, it would be thought necessary, by these noble Lords, to have a perpetual Parliament for Good-Governance, and the determining Crimes and Misdemeanors of the lowest Nature.

The great Offence, in this particular Case, is High-Treason; and, if what hath been said above be a valid and convincing Reason against the Lords for rejecting the Impeachment, it doth seem to infer a Necessity or Right of trying all Treasons by Impeachment in Parliament; because they influence Parliament, and are most effectually determin'd in them. [Here followed Numbers of Instances to show the Fallacy thereof.]

By Alagna Charta, no Man is to be condemn'd, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers; which hath been confirm'd, and declared to be the common Law of the Land, by many Acts of Parliament. The House of Commons were never chosen, intrusted, or empower'd, by the People, they repre-

The Commons highly censur'd at the Proceedings of the Lords.

The Commons had adjourn'd till the Afternoon; and in that Interval, became acquainted with all the Particulars of this Affair; at which, it appears, they were so highly incens'd, that, as soon as the Houle was reassembled, they took Cognizance of it, with more Rage and Fury than ever they had witness'd on any Occasion before: Even Sir Thomas Lyttleton, who had that very Day acted the Part of a Mediator between the two Factions, lost all Temper, declar'd the Lords would be a Court or not, as best suited their present Purposes; and that by the dismissing of the Impeachment, he saw no further Use of a Parliament. According to Sir William Jones, the Lords were so flagrantly in the wrong, that all Reasonings upon the Case were unnecessary; And yet he proceeded to shew, That if an Action was brought in the lower Courts, it did not hinder the same Action from being brought likewise into Westminster-Hall: That the same Practice held in their Case: That tho' the Popish Lords were indicted at Common Law, it was thought no Impediment to their being impeach'd in Parliament: That if it should be objected that no Indictment was laid, nor Prosecution commenc'd, against Fitzbarris, Lord Chief Justice Streeggs was in the same Circumstances; and yet the Lords, without any Scruple, accepted his Impeachment: That as the Lords spiritual, who had no right to vote on this Occasion, had help'd to decide so great a Point, the Injustice was double: That sent, to do any thing which is not according to the common Law; nay, the whole Parliament cannot do any such thing, unless they make a Statute first, to make void that Law.

'Tis further the common Opinion of Lawyers, That all Acts of Parliament are void in themselves, or not binding, which are made against the fundamental Law, of which, if this Trial by Peers be not one, there is none in England.

He knows not the Value of Trial by Jury, that desires to be try'd any other Way. 'Tis dangerous, and against the Liberty of free Englishmen, to admit of, and have Precedents made to warrant Trial without Jury: Innocents may be hurried to death by their Prosecutors, and the vile Criminals saved by the same Means; the Speeches, passionate Expostulations, and Inclinations of such Men prevailing much upon, and influencing, the Witnesses, either to conceal or dilate their Evidence against the Person impeach'd; especially when they know they may do it freely, with Impunity, and by Approbation of potent Persons.

But, it may be said, What if the Commons desire to impeach a Compeer before the Lords, for Treason, may it not be done?

Yes, if the Lords be willing to receive the Impeachment; for they cannot be forced, or oblig'd against their Wills, to hear and pass Judgment in criminal capital Cases, upon any but their own Peers. There follows the Case of the six Compeers before-quoted.

Of the second it was said, 'This is all artificial Reason, or rather a mere Quibble, if duly examined; for, whether this Criminal's Trial be by Indictment in the King's-Bench, or by Impeachment, 'tis the same Accusation, namely, for Treason; and the Prosecution in both Courts (which is really and truly the Suit) is for the same End and Purpose: that is, that the Delinquent be punish'd according to Law; for 'tis to be suppos'd that was the Intent of the Impeachment, and this may be done most effectually and legally, by the Trial of his Peers, in an inferior Court, according to the Course of the common Law.

The Ground of this wonderful Reason is, the different Use of the two Words impeachment and indictment, both which signify an Accusation; and the End and Design of this Accusation is the same; and 'tis no matter, whether this black Criminal recover the Sentence of being hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd, for his vile Treason, from the Lords in Parliament, the Judges of the King's-Bench, or by special Commission of Oyer and Terminer: But, most certainly, the most legal Way of Trial is by his Peers, by whom he may have the most equal Condemnation or Acquittal, there being not one Precedent to be found, that comes up to, or is parallel with, this Case.

'Tis the Third, the Answer proceeded thus: 'These Lords interpret this Rejection of the Impeachment to be an absolute Denial of Justice, because they say, as before, the same Suit cannot be try'd any where else: it hath been shew'd before, that this Reason is a mere Quibble of a fond groundless Nicety. Nor can any Man, tho' but of a weak Capacity, think it to be a Denial of Justice to refuse the Trial of a Crime to an inferior Court, where it is most properly try'd by the Laws of the Land. Nor was it certainly a Denial of Justice in the Lords, in Drake's Case, which they desire to be try'd in the King's-Bench: The Words of the Oath are this.

The Houle taking into consideration the Impeachment, brought up from the Houle of Commons in the Name of all the Commons of England, against William Drake, Merchant and Citizen of London; and their Lordships approving they may not have time before their Dissolution to proceed in judicature against him: It is therefore ordered and declared by the Lords in Parliament, That the King's Attorney-General do, in his Majesty's Name, proceed against the said William Drake in the Court of King's-Bench, upon the said Offence, according to the ordinary Course of Law. Lords Journ. Merc. Dec. 19. 1660.

This Reference of this Case to the King's-Bench was not protected against by any of the Houle of Peers, nor so much as question'd, nor thought to be arbitrary, illegal, or against the Constitution of Parliament: His Crime was, for publishing a Pamphlet, in the Name of one Phillips, call'd, The Long Parliament reviv'd: The Impeachment was in this Form, 'The Knight, Citizen, and Burgess, of the Houle of Commons, in the Name of themselves, and all the Commons of England, do hereby declare, complain, and shew, against William Drake, Merchant and Citizen of London, that, in contempt of his Majesty's Crown and Dignity, and of the Laws and Government of this Kingdom, and out of a malicious Intention to raise and stir up Sedition and Division in this Kingdom, and against the Person of our Sovereign Lord the King, &c. Cons. Journal, Merc. Dec. 21. 1660.

By this Proceeding of the Lords, it seems, they thought not then, that one and the same Impeachment might continue from Parliament to Parliament, without being reviv'd; or a new one brought up; and a Man would think they had Reason on their Side; for 'tis hardly conceivable, when a Court is dissolv'd, and not in being, how any thing depending in that Court should have a Being, and remain: What can support it? What can give it a Being or Existence! In the Privileges of Parliaments, all Business ceaseth, and begins anew, much more it ought to do so, when the Court itself falleth, and ceaseth in Being.

Lastly, as to the fourth, it was urg'd, 'As to the Denial of Justice in this Case, it hath been clearly made appear before, there neither is, nor can be, any such thing, by rejecting this Impeachment, and referring the Treason contained in it to be determined and try'd by the common Law; and therefore what is not, nor can be, cannot be interpreted an exercising of arbitrary Power, nor have any Influence upon the Constitution of the English Government.

This whole Paragraph is indeed a needless Reflection, rather than Reason (to what End 'tis fellows to tell the World) for this very Action of waving this Impeachment is so far from encouraging inferior Courts to exercise an arbitrary Power, by denying the Privileges of Grand Jurors, as manifestly it hath a contrary Operation and Effect in Law; for by this means, the great Caspitor in the popish Plot to murder the King, and destroy and subvert the Protestant Religion, will receive his Trial in the Law direct, by Pointment and Verdict of a Grand Jury and Petty Jury, one or both of whom are his Peers.

Having done with the Prosecution itself, it may not be impertinent to make a Query or two about the Subject-matter of the Indictment, and Impeachment. 'What if there be several and different Treasons, for which Mr. Fitzbarris may stand accus'd; shall not the King proceed to try him according to the due Course of Law? The Treason for which he is prosecuted at Law may not be the same, and in all Probability it is not, for which he was impeach'd: The Houle of Commons declar'd not what the Treason was in particular, and the King had the first Possession of the Case, having first examin'd the Criminal. 'Shall the Course of the common Law be obstructed or delay'd by the Impeachment? When, if he receives not Sentence of Death upon his first Indictment at Law, he may be remanded to Prison, and afterwards prosecuted by Impeachment, or upon new Indictments at the common Law, for his other Treasons, if the Gentlemen of the late Houle of Commons, who have so received the Information against him, shall think it expedient. 'Have not all the heretick, damnable popish Plot-ars, which were Commoners, been try'd by the common Law, notwithstanding the sitting Parliaments? What Necessity is there then of an extraordinary Way by Impeachment? One of Lord Somers's Collections, p. 321.

A. D. 1681.

That it was his Opinion they ought to resolve, That the Commons had a Right to vote in capital Cases; and that the Lords had deny'd them Justice, in refusing the Impeachment: That after they had thus asserted their Privileges, they ought to draw up Reasons to justify these Votes, and convince the Lords in a parliamentary way, at a Conference, how unwarrantably they had acted; and that in case a Dissolution should follow, the Blame might fall in the right Place. Sir Francis Wilmington even out-form'd Sir William: He said; "This is no Common Case: Both Religion and Property are concerned in it; and how the Bishops came to stifle it, let God and the World judge.----- The Attorney-General tells the Lords, he has had Directions from the King to prosecute the Man; but no Indictment is laid, no Record appears. Is this sufficient Ground for the Lords to deny our Impeachment? If the Lords will vote that the Commons shall not impeach, they may as well vote that we shall not be Prosecutors:-----But yet we will be so.-----Fitzbarris is accus'd of being concern'd in a new Plot against the Protestants; and we must not impeach him; which is as much as to say, That they must not bear it.-----If this be the Case: If our Time be but short, as I believe it is, pray come to a Vote to assert your Right.-----A little while ago, when the Duke was presented for being a Papist, the Grand Jury was dismiss'd. One would almost conclude, That the Lords thought themselves bound in honour to justify the Proceedings of the Judges by their own, &c. Sir Robert Howard thought it strange that Fitzbarris should be hurry'd to the Tower, as soon as he began to confess in Newgate, that when the Terror of his Condition inclin'd him to confess the whole Plot, he should be taken out of their Hands.----- "The Concern of the French Ambassador in this Plot, said he, a Jury will never enquire into: Their Business is only to decide whether the Evidence makes out the Indictment.-----Unusual Practices will occasion unusual Suspicions.----- What Provocation does our Impeachment carry along with it?----- Secretary Jenkins would not present it: The Lords will not accept it.----- Must we give over the Prosecution of the Plot? Must the Protestant Religion be shewn no Mercy?-----Fitzbarris may merit Pavour by Confession; and if his Breath be stop'd by the Lords, I am sorry that People will have room to say, If it were not for the Lords, Fitzbarris might have discover'd all the Conspiracy, and the Protestant Religion might have been sav'd." For a Conclusion of this Rhapsody, he was pleas'd to move, that the House would come to a Resolution, That the Rejecting the Impeachment, had not only a Tendency to subvert the Constitution of Parliaments, but also of the Protestant Religion. Sergeant Meynard was bold enough to assert, "That all knew there had been a Plot in England; that he was also sure it had extended to Ireland: That all Arts and Crafts had been us'd to hide it: That it began with Murder, Perjury, and Subornation:

A. D. 1681.

That this was a second Part of that: That in refusing the Impeachment, the Lords had, in effect, destroy'd the Essence of Parliaments: That, if this be so, Holland and Flanders must submit to the French, and they must overrun all: That this was a strange Breach of Privilege, and that it tended to the Danger of the King's Person, and the Destruction of the Protestant Religion. Sir Thomas Playter reserv'd himself for the Close of the Debate, possibly to put in for the Merit and Glory of saying greater Things than any of the Worthies who had preceded him: For, according to him, the Confessions of Fitzbarris were a Confirmation of the Truth of the Plot: That the King was to be murder'd: That the Duke had given his Consent to it: That Justice Godfrey was murder'd: That the Army at Blackheath was to destroy the Protestants in Holland, and awe the City of London, &c. &c.

As the Print, from whence these Minutes are taken, was set forth by the Exclusionists, not only as the Sense, but the very Expressions of the Party, there is no Room to imagine, they intended to ridicule and expose themselves. And yet their Adversaries could not have hurt them more, than by informing the Public, on what a Mixture of extravagant Assertions, and forc'd Inferences, their Resolutions were founded. Sir Henry Capel was, indeed, pleas'd to confess to Sir Francis North, when urg'd in a private Conversation, for some better Reasons than appear'd, for so violent a Prosecution of the Exclusion-Bill, That they did not use to give the true Reasons that sway'd them in Debates in the House: And herein consists the main Craft of Faction, To make the World adopt those Arguments that they do not believe themselves. But this cannot be done always; Mens Minds must be previously tun'd to the right Key, or there will be no Response. Conviction against the Grain, will not operate so strongly as Persuasion with it. And thus in the Case before us, the Tone of those that spoke was suited to the Ears of those that heard: Every Man either supply'd or forgave all Defects: And on the whole it was resolv'd, That it was the undoubted Right of the Commons to impeach any Peer or Commoner for Treason, or any other Crime or Misdemeanor; and that the Refusal of the Lords to proceed upon such Impeachment, was a Denial of Justice, and a Violation of the Constitution of Parliaments: That in the Case of Fitzbarris, for the Lords to resolve, that the said Fitzbarris should be proceeded with according to the Common Course of Law, and not by way of Impeachment, at this Time, is a Denial of Justice, a Violation of the Constitution of Parliaments, an Obstruction to the further Discovery of the Plot, and of great Danger to his Majesty's Person and the Protestant Religion: That for any inferior Court to proceed against Fitzbarris, or any other Person lying under an Impeachment in Parliament, for which he or they stand impeach'd in Parliament, is an high Breach of the Privileges of Parliament. And for a Close of this busy Day, they order'd in a Bill

Their angry Vote.

A. D. 1681. to associate his Majesty's Protestant Subjects; and another, to banish the most considerable Papists, by their Names.

This was Saturday, and, tho' the House had often sat on Sundays during the Heat of the Plot, they now adjourn'd till Monday; probably, that the first Movers might have Leisure to revolve the present System, and give it some new Direction. But, if such was the Design, it does not appear that it was brought to any Issue: For, on Monday, when the House met again, the Exclusion-Bill was (7) receiv'd, read once, and order'd to be read a second time; after which, Sir William Jones undertook to offer such Considerations as should satisfy the Public, that, in their late Votes relating to Fitzbarris's Affair, which it seems had already occasion'd much Discourse, they had the Right on their Sides: But he had scarce dispatch'd the introductory Part of his Speech, before he was interrupted by the Usher of the Black-rod; who commanded the House to attend his Majesty in the House of Peers, who was come thither to put a Period to their Proceedings.

[The Exclusion-Bill again brought in.]

Ferguson asserts, That the Conspirators, meaning the Court, having receiv'd Intelligence that Fitzbarris's Wife and Maid were come to Oxford, in order to discover what they knew, resolv'd to put a stop to the Career of the Commons early on Monday Morning, by a Dissolution; which was resolv'd on late the Night before, in the Cabinet-council at Christ-Church: And Mr. North gives the following Detail, both of the Cause and Manner of this extraordinary Event:

[Examens, p. 294.]

"The Commons complain'd, that the Convocation-house was too strait for them to sit and transact in; and, at their Desire, Orders were given for the immediate fitting up the Theatre for their Use. The King concern'd himself much about the Disposition of it, view'd the Design, gave his Judgment, and came in Person among the Workmen; and, particularly on Saturday, 26 March, 1681, I had the Honour of seeing him there, and observ'd his taking notice of every thing. Upon Sunday next his Majesty was pleas'd, especially towards the Evening, to entertain himself and his Court with Discourse of the wonderful Accommodation the House of Commons would find in that Place; and, by his Observations and Descriptions, shew'd how it was to be. All this while the Spies and Eves-droppers could find no Symptom of a Dissolution, but rather of the contrary, that the Parliament was like to make a long Session of it. The next Morning, which was Monday, the King came to the House of Lords, as he was wont, in a Chair, and another Chair follow'd with the Curtains drawn; but, instead of a Lord, as was thought to be in it, there was only the King's Robes. Thus they went and sat down in a Withdrawing-room. When the Robe Chair was open'd, a gross Mistake appear'd, for the Garter-ropes were put up instead of the Robes of State; so the Chair must go back, with an Officer, to bring the right. A Lord happen'd to be in the room, who, upon this Discovery, was stepping out (as they thought) to give the Alarm: Upon which those with the King prevail'd to continue his Lordship in the Room till the Chair return'd, and Matters were fix'd, and then he had his Liberty. The Reason of this Privacy was to prevent bad Language, or worse, in parting Votes; as had happen'd upon the Dissolution of the former Parliament. And the Precaution was more reasonable, because, if any Evil was ripe, it might prevent the Execution of it: Or, perhaps, his Majesty had no mind to be troubled with too many Interposers, with their dark Objections; as, Sire, what do you mean? Does your Majesty consider? First, think what will be the Consequence; and the like. And, I guess, besides weightier Considerations, the King desired to free himself from such kind of Importunities."

Mr. North also says, that the Appearance of the Black-Rod at the Door of the House gave the first Cause of Suspicion, that a Dissolution was at hand: But the contrary of this appears in the Debates already quoted; in which the Apprehensions of what happen'd are very strongly specify'd!

However this may be, the Commons sooner presented themselves at the Lords Bar, than his Majesty express'd himself to this Effect: "That he perceiv'd there were Heats between the two Houses: That from such Beginnings nothing good could be expected; and that therefore he thought fit to dissolve them." After which, by his Majesty's Command, the Lord Chancellor declar'd the Parliament to be dissolved accordingly.

This sudden and surprising Exertion of the Prerogative had all the Effect that the most sanguine of the King's Advisers could have expected from it. Those who were so formidable in a Body, as the Representative of the Commons of England, were all at once become so insignificant, as scarce to be distinguish'd from the Herd: Eye-witnesses of this remarkable Scene report, that the King's Breath scatter'd them like Leaves in Autumn: That, instead of those lordly Looks, and menacing Speeches, which they had us'd and worn till then, they appear'd crest-fallen, dismay'd, reserv'd, and pensive; as if, in the Moment of Projection, all their Hopes had blown up, and they were undone by the Experiment. "It is not to be express'd, says Mr. North, what Clutter there was in Town about getting off; the Price of Coaches mounted Cent. per Cent. in a Quarter of an Hour. It was the Conceit of a foreign Minister, that the Town look'd as if it had been besieg'd, and was just surrender'd, upon condition that all the Inhabitants should immediately remove." Other Writers affirm, that the Terror was on the King's Side; that he took Coach the Moment he had silenced the the Parliament, and drove full speed to Windfor, as one who flew from Danger, and was overjoy'd with Deliverance. Possibly the two Parties were equally afraid of, and made equal Haste to fly from, each other: And, if that was the Case, it may be presum'd, that both these Pictures are after the Life.

The King sets forth a Declaration.

The King now believing the Advantage to be on his Side, thought that he might venture to turn the Tables on his Opponents: And, in order thereto, most politely began with an Attempt to recover the good Opinion of his People: In a few Days after his Majesty's Return to Whitehall, which was the second after his Departure from Oxford, a Royal Declaration was made public, not only by the Press, but by the Official in every Parish-Church in England; wherein, after his Majesty had set forth with what exceeding great Trouble he was brought to dissolve the two last Parliaments, without more Benefit to the People; and how absolute his Intentions were to have comply'd, as far as would have consist'd with the very Being of the Government, with any thing that could have been propos'd to him for preserving the establish'd Religion, the Liberty and Property of the Subject at home, and supporting the foreign Alliances, he took notice of the unsuitable Returns of the House of Commons; their Addresses in the Nature of Remonstrances; their arbitrary Orders for taking Persons into Custody, for Matters that had no relation to their Privileges; and their strange, illegal Votes, declaring divers eminent Persons Enemies to the King and Kingdom, without any Order or Process of Law, or hearing their Defence.

That, besides these Proceedings, they had voted, That whoever should lend any Money upon the Branches of the Revenue, or buy any Tally, should be adjudg'd to hinder the Sitting of Parliaments, and be answerable to the same in Parliament. Which Votes, instead of giving him Assistance, tended rather to disable him, and to expose him to all Dangers that might happen at home or abroad, and to deprive him of the Possibility of supporting the Government itself, and to reduce him to a more helpless Condition than the meanest of his Subjects.

That they had voted the Prosecution of Protestant Dissenters, upon the penal Laws, a Grievance to the Subject, a Weakening to the Protestant Interest, an Encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the Peace of the Kingdom: Whereby they assumed to themselves a Power of suspending Acts of Parliament. Which unwarrantable Proceedings were the Occasion of his parting with the first Parliament. That having assembled another at Oxford, he gave them Warning of the Errors of the former, and required them to make the Law of the Land their Rule, as he resolv'd it should be his. Adding withal, that though he could not depart from what he had so often declar'd touching the Succession; yet, to remove all reasonable Fears that might arise from a popish Successor, 18 Means could be found, that, in such a Case, the Administration of the Government might remain in Protestant Hands, he was ready to hearken to any Expedient for the Preservation of the establish'd Religion, without the Destruction of Monarchy.

Notwithstanding all which, no Expedient could be found, but that of a total Exclusion; which he was so nearly concern'd in Honour, Justice, and Conscience, not to consent to. Nor did he believe, as he had Reason so to do, but that if he had, in the last Parliament at Westminster, consented to a Bill of Exclusion; that the Intent was not to have rested there, but to have attempted some other great and important Changes.

That the Business of Fitzharris, impeach'd by the Commons of High Treason, and by the Lords referred to the ordinary Course of Law, was on a sudden carried to that Extremity by the Votes of the House of Commons, March 26, That there was no Possibility left of a Reconciliation.

Whereby an Impeachment was made use of to delay a Trial directed against a professed Papist, charg'd with Treasons of an extraordinary Nature.

That, nevertheless, he would not have the restless Malice of ill Men persuade his Subjects that he intended to lay aside the Use of Parliaments; for that he did declare, that no Irregularities in Parliament should make him out of love with them; and that, by the Blessing of God, he was resolv'd to have frequent Parliaments; and, both in and out of Parliament, to use all his utmost Endeavours to extirpate Popery, and to redress the Grievances of his good Subjects, and in all things to govern according to the Laws of the Kingdom.

How well the Allegations in this artful Piece are founded, the Reader is already enabled to judge: With what Sincerity so many fair Promises were made, the Sequel will explain: And, by way of Anticipation, Sir John Reresby makes no Scruple to declare, "That from this abrupt Dissolution, and what he had heard from Lord Hallifax and others (he might have added, the notable Disposition that now appear'd to husband the Revenue, especially in the Retrenchments which had been made in the Household; and which a certain Exclusionist-Member, took the Liberty, even in the House, to call scandalous) his Conclusion was, That the King was determin'd never to relinquish his Brother; as also, to call no other Parliament for a long time."

The Virtue and Value of political Pieces may very well be estimat'd by the Care that is taken to answer them.—The Declaration was encounter'd, if Fame ever tells Truth, by Sir William Jones, himself, in a Pamphlet, call'd, A Just and Modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments; some Account of which will be necessary, for the sake of Information, as well as Impartiality.

It set forth with an Assertion, that all good Men were equally amaz'd at the unlook'd-for Dissolutions of two Parliaments; and that an Attempt should be made to justify such extraordinary extraordinary Proceedings. It acknowledg'd that our Kings were entrusted, in a great measure, with the Power of calling and dismissing Parliaments; but then it also suggest'd, That, by the Wisdom of our Ancestors, it was provided, That Parliaments should be annual, and that they should not be dissolv'd till all the Petitions and Bills before them were answer'd; that these Privileges were secur'd to the Nation by the same sacred Tie, by which the King, at his Coronation, does oblige himself to administer Justice, and to preserve inviolably all the Rights and Liberties of his Subjects: That the late abrupt Dissolutions, at a time when only the Legislative Power could relieve the just Fears of the Public, were, therefore, very unsuitable to the great Trust repos'd in the Prince: That the manner of these Dissolutions was as unwarrantable as the Facts: That by the Writ of Summons they were taught, and by the Usage of all Ages confirm'd, that Parliaments should neither be assembled nor discharg'd without the Advice of the Council: That by forsaking this safe Method, the King became personally expos'd to the Reflections and Censures which accompany'd ungrateful Actions; and the Provision which the Laws had made that those who gave irregular Advice, or obey'd illegal Commands, should be answerable for them, was evaded: That this last Dissolution was so much a Work of Darkness, that even the Privy Council was as much surpriz'd at it as the Nation: That the Author or Adviser of the late printed Paper, call'd, His Majesty's Declaration, was out of the Reach of any future Parliament; because his Majesty never speaks to his People, as a King, but, personally in Parliament, or under his Seals, by which his Officers become responsible for what they deliver; whereas that Piece had no other Sanction than that of the King's Printer to vouch for it: That Declarations like this, were always needless or ineffectual: That good Actions requir'd no Apology; that bad would admit of none: That after Coleman's Masterpiece in this way, which unluckily shew'd how little Sincerity there was in such kinds of Writing, it was generally believ'd that nothing of the same Kind would have appear'd in this Age; and that the present Ministers might well be out of Countenance to see their Copy fall so very short of the Original: That tho' the real Authors of it hop'd to conceal themselves by prevailing with his Majesty to take it wholly on himself, they had, nevertheless, answer'd to their Names, when they number'd among the Crimes of the House of Commons, their having voted diverse eminent Persons to be Enemies to the King and Kingdom: That, tho' to the Dishonour of the Country, it was thus apparent, that some Englishmen were both concern'd in advising the Dissolutions and the Defence of them; it was yet evident, that the Writer of the Paper, was either a Frenchman, or so devoted to the Interests of France, that he could express himself in the Idiom of no other Language, or else he could never have introduc'd the King saying, That it was a Matter extremely sensible to us. A Form of Speech peculiar to the French. And that from the number of Gaspichius, apparent through the whole Paper, it was doubtful whether that which was publish'd in French, or the English one, was the Original. That tho' the Peers at Oxford were so totally ignorant of the Counsel, that they never once thought of a Dissolution, till they heard it pronounc'd, the Duchess of Mazarine had better Intelligence, and publish'd the News at St. James's, many Hours before it was done: That, tho' the Declaration was not communicated to the Privy Council till April the 8th, when his Majesty, according to the late Method, did graciously declare to them his Pleasure to have it set forth, without desiring any Advice upon it, the French Embassador, Mr. Barillon, did not only read it to a Gentleman on the fifth, but demanded his Opinion of it, who took the Liberty to ridicule it to his Face: That the Reason which had been assign'd for dissolving three several Parliaments successively, namely, That the King was resolv'd to have the Advice of his People in frequent Parliaments, was grown ridiculous; for that, as soon as the Ministers began to suspect that his Majesty was inclin'd to accept and pursue their Advice, those very Parliaments were presently dissolv'd. That surely the Declaration would make but few Converts, not only because it had represented those things as highly criminal, which the whole Kingdom had been celebrating as highly meritorious, but because the People had been so often deceiv'd by former Declarations, that nothing bearing that Name, would have any Credit with them for the future.

That as to his Majesty's exceeding great Trouble, it ought to be plac'd to the Account of a few desperate Men; for whose sake he had been prevail'd upon not only to disappoint his own People, but almost all Europe: That the Blame could not be imputed to the Over-violence of either of those Parliaments: That if they had gone too far in any thing, they had been misled by his Majesty's own Speeches and Declarations: That he had not only often recommended the Prosecution of the Plot, but declar'd, that he thought neither himself, nor them, safe, till it was completed: That he had also declar'd it was his constant care to secure our Religion for the future in all Events: That in all things which concern'd the Public Security, he would not follow the Zeal of his Parliament, but lead it: That he had often shewn himself desirous of a dispensing Power in favour of Nonconforming Protestants: That he had even promis'd to make it his special Care to incline the Wisdom of Parliament to concur with him in making an Act for that Purpose: That, as if to manifest that these gracious Intimations did not terminate with the Possibility of extending to Papists the same Toleration, his Majesty had, (r) since the Discovery covery of the Plot, when there was no Hope of even procuring a Conivance for them, express'd his Zeal for a Union among all sorts of Protestants; and that the Lord Chancellor, by his Command, had told both Houses at the same time, That it was necessary to distinguish between Popish and other Reculants; between them that would destroy the whole Flock, and them that only consider from it. And that over and above these Encouragements from the Throne, the Behaviour of the Papists themselves had been such as would have excus'd an English Parliament, if they had been hurry'd into some Excess: But that no Provocations had driven them into any thing not justifiable by the Laws of Parliament, or unbecoming the Wisdom and Gravity of an English Senate.

That as to his Majesty's gracious Expressions at the opening his last Westminster Parliament, they had lost their Force and Weight for want of a Correspondence of Actions: That whatsoever the House of Commons address'd for, was certainly deny'd, tho' it was only for that Reason: And that there was no surer way to Favour at Court, than the receiving a Censure from the Representative Body of the People: That supposing some of the things detur'd by the Parliament were exorbitant, or even inconsistent with the very Being of Government, all were not so: That the Government might have subsisted, tho' some of the Gentlemen put out of the Commission of the Peace for their Zeal against Popery, had been restor'd; or Sir George Jeffries had been remov'd, or the Statute of the 5th of Elizabeth had been repeal'd.

That further, as to the gracious Things said by his Majesty, it was to be wish'd, that his Majesty had added to his gracious Asking of Money in support of Alliances, a gracious Communication of those Alliances, since there was no Precedent to be shewn, that ever a Parliament, not even the late long Parliament, tho' fill'd with Pensioners, did ever give Money in Maintenance of Leagues, till they were first made acquainted with the Particulars of them: That in the King's Speech no Mention was made of any new Ally, except the Spaniards, whose Affairs at that time, thro' the Defects of his own Government, and the Treachery of our own Ministers, were reduc'd to so desperate a State, that he might well be a Burden to us, but nothing could be hop'd from a Friendship with him, unless, by the Name of a League to recommend our Ministers to a new Parliament, and help them to couzen Country Gentlemen out of their Money: That the League was in itself pernicious: Since it tended to embroil us in every Quarrel or Disturbance, that internally or externally might affect any Part of the Spanish Monarchy: And that this Obligation being reciprocal, in case of any Commotion in England, arising from any Attempt to change our Religion or Government, his Catholic Majesty was to give Aid in so pious a Design, and make War upon the People with all his Forces by Sea and Land: That on the other hand, instead of contributing to the Conservation of the general Peace, or the Security of Flanders, the French might become Masters of it in a Month; and our Successors were not to be sent till three Months after the Invasion had taken place: That, therefore, upon the whole, it was reasonable to suspect, that the main End of the League was to furnish a handsome Pretence to raise an Army in England; and in case that Measure had given rise to any Disorders, to call in the Spaniards to assist in suppressing them: That as to another of his Majesty's gracious Things, the Prosecution of the Plot, the Parliament had so behaved as to leave no room for Censure on that Head: That as to the Assistance demanded for the Preservation of Tanger, they had given his Majesty to understand they were ready to grant it on a reasonable Security, That it should not be unemploy'd to augment the Strength of their Popish Adversaries, and to increase their Dangers at home: And that to leave the Consideration of England to provide for Tanger, would be to act like a Man that should lend his Servants to mend a Gap in his Hedge when he saw his House was on Fire, and his Family like to be consum'd in it: And that as to his Majesty's Offers, to concur in any Remedy that could be propos'd for the Security of the Protestant Religion, they were no more than Offers; for those Remedies which the Commons had tender'd were rejected; and those they were preparing were prevented by a Dissolution.

That for the unjustable Returns of the Commons, viz. 1. Their presenting Remonstrances rather than Addresses, no English Reader had any criminal Idea to affix to that Word: That if they meant by a Remonstrance a Declaration of Causes and Reasons of what was done, it stood justify'd by his Majesty's own Example, who had vouchsafed to declare the Causes and Reasons of his Actions to his People: And that if they had not shewn upon what Grounds they proceeded, they had been accus'd of acting peccatorily or giving the Law. 2. Their arbitrary Orders for taking Persons into Custody for Matters not relating to Privilege:—The Fact was mis-stated; for if the Privilege of Parliament was concern'd, when an Injury was done to any particular Member, it was concern'd much more when Men (alluding to the Abhorers) struck at Parliaments themselves, and endeavour'd to wound the very Constitution: That, however, there were Precedents innumerable of Commitments by the Commons, in Matters not relating to Privilege: That the Cases of Crockerell, 4th Ed. VI. committed for confederating in an Escape; of Sir Francis Mabeck, and others, for Misdemeanours, 15th Jas. in procuring a Patent for the Forfeitures of Recognizances; Dr. Harris, 20 Jas. for misbehaving himself in preaching; Burgess, 2d Car. I. for Faults in Catechising, and Love for pretending to exercise a Patent, which had been adjudg'd a Grievance by a Committee of Commons in a former Parliament, might serve for their present Justification; and that the Commons had betray'd their Trust, if they had asserted the Right of petitioning, which had been before taken by such a strange, illegal, and arbitrary Proclamation. 2. Their strange, illegal Votes, declaring several Persons to be Enemies to the King and Kingdom:—The Commons, in Parliament, had ever us'd two ways in delivering their Country from pernicious and powerful Favourites: viz. By Impeachment, when it is thought needful to make them public Examples by capital Punishments: And by immediate Address to the King to remove them, as unfaithful, or unprofitable Servants: That the Records and Histories, Ed. I. Ed. II. Ed. III. and Hen. IV. and indeed all other succeeding Kings were full of such Addresses as these. But no History or Record could shew that ever they were call'd illegal or unparliamentary before: That former Ministers durst not appeal to the People against their own Representatives; and that the best of our Princes, such as Ed. I. Hen. II. Hen. IV. Hen. V. and Queen Eliz. had, with Thanks, acknowledg'd the Care and Duty of their Parliaments in telling them of the Corruption and Folly of their Favourites; while the disorderly, troublesome; and unfortunate Reigns of Hen. III. Ed. II. Rich. II. and Hen. VI. ought to serve as Land Marks to warn succeeding Kings from preferring secret Councils to the Wisdom of their Parliaments. 4. Their Votes against Anticipations of several Branches of the Revenue.

The very objecting to which, must imply a total Ignorance of public Treasure, which was ever esteem'd sacred and unalienable: That it was on this Maxim, the Parliament declar'd King John's Grant of 1000 Marks per ann. out of the Inheritance of the Crown to be null: That Acts of Resumption had been made in the Reigns of Hen. IV. and Hen. VI. And that it was the best Excuse which could be made for those who advis'd the postponing all Payments to the Bankers out of the Exchequer in 1672; that they judg'd all Securities by way of Anticipation of the Revenue, illegal and void in themselves: That tho' the present Courtiers speak of the Revenue of the Crown as if it were a private Patrimony, design'd only for domestic Uses, and the Pleasures of the Prince, the Fact was quite otherwise: That it was in its own Nature appropriated to public Service; and, consequently, could not, without Injustice, be diverted or anticipated: For either the public Revenue was sufficient to answer the public Occasions; and then there could be no Colour for Anticipations; or if by any extraordinary Accident the King stood in need of an extraordinary Supply, he ought to resort to the Parliament for it: That if the King borrow'd and never repay'd, the Honour of the Crown would suffer both abroad and at home; and if the Load was to devolve on the People, it would open a way for Taxes without end, and to be given whether they would or not: That for this Reason, the Professors, mercenary as they were, would never discharge the Revenue, of the Bankers Debt: That by the Express Words of the Statutes, the King, without common Consent, cannot supply his most pressing Necessities, either by Loans or Benevolence, which are deem'd annul'd forever: That the Commons, instead of committing any Trespas by their Votes, had restrain'd them more than they needed to have done: That they had specify'd only three Branches of the Revenue, which had been given by Parliament to the present King; and that they were authoriz'd to do what they had done, by the very Acts themselves; if it be understood, as it ought to be, that when the King receives a Gift from his People, he receives it under such Conditions, and ought to employ it to such Purposes only as they direct: That the Words of the Statute, 12th Car. II. c. iv. are, "That the Commons, reposing Trust in his Majesty, for guarding the Seas against all Persons intending the Disturbance of Trade, and the invading of the Realm, to that Intent, do give him the Tonnage and Poundage, &c. which is as direct an Appropriation as Words can make: And by consequence, for the King either to divert or anticipate any Part of this Branch, would have a manifest Tendency to disable himself from fulfilling the Trust reposit'd in him. And the late long Parliament thought this Matter so clear, that they pass'd a Vote, with relation to the Customs, almost in the same Words: That the Parliament which gave the Excise, were so far from thinking the King had any Power to charge or dispose of it as his own, that by a special Clause in the Act, whereby they gave it, they took care to empower him to dispose of it, or any Part of it, by way of Farm; and to enact, that such Contracts should be effectual in Law, so, as they be not for a longer Term than three Years." That the Act whereby the Hearth-Money was given, declares, That it was done, That the public Revenue might be proportion'd to the public Charges, which it could never be, if it were liable to be preingard'd and anticipated: That the Parliament was even so careful to preserve this Tax always clear, that they made it penal for any body to accept of any Grant of any kind upon it: That if the Peners of the Declaration had not been so totally ignorant of the Laws, they would not have had the Face to say, that the King was expos'd to Danger by the said Votes, &c. And that, if the inviolable Observance of the Statutes would reduce his Majesty to a more helpless Condition than the meanest of his Subjects, he would, notwithstanding, be left in a better Condition than the richest and greatest of his Ancestors; none of which were ever Masters of such a Revenue. 5. Their assuming to themselves a Power to suspend Acts of Parliament, in relation to the prosecuting Protestant Dissenters upon the Penal Laws.—The Ministers remember'd that, not many Years ago, the whole Nation was alarm'd with the arbitrary Assumption of such a Power, and therefore thought it would be popular to charge the like Attempt on the Commons: But nothing could be more disingenuous than their Interpretation of that Vote, nor, without the Help of a second Declaration, would it be conceivable how the declaring an Opinion could be understood to be the pretend-pretending to a Power of repealing Laws. That, however, they had sufficient Reasons to warrant that Opinion, drawn from Observations of the Designs of the Papists against all Protestants; the Countenance they met with, the Power they were supported by, having the Duke for their Head, who had Scotland already deliver'd into his Hands, &c. the partial Execution of these Laws in contempt of repealed Proclamation; so as that dissenting Protestants snarled only under the Edge of them; and the manifest Necessity arising from all these Circumstances of an Union of all the Protestants, which it was not rational to expect as long as one Part were treated as Enemies by the other: That a long and sad Experience had shewn how vainly Parliaments had endeavour'd by Compulsion to make all Men of one Mind: That, therefore, the Commons had Recourse to a surer Method, namely, the taking away all Occasions of provoking or being provok'd, by a general Repeal of all the Penal Laws that were made the Instruments to persecute our Protestant Brethren: That this Vote declaratory of the Necessity of such a Repeal, was admitted without one Negative, and was meant not to operate as a Law, but to serve as the Basis of a Law; which had, infallibly, been superinduc'd, if the Dissolution had not prevented it: That this Proceeding of theirs had been countenanc'd by (1) those of the Lords, who had also Bills before them in favour of Dissenters; and, as above observ'd, the King had often wish'd it was in his Power to ease them: So that tho' no formal Repeal had pass'd, all the several Branches of the Legislative Power had severally express'd their Approbation of, and Inclinations for, such a Repeal: That after all, whether the Vote was justifiable or not, the Ministers had strangely forgot themselves, in assigning it for one of the Causes of the Dissolution of the Parliament, when it was notorious the King was putting on his Robes, and the Black Rod was actually at the Door, before it was pass'd: That it was also most surprizing that they should object to the Commons their strange, illegal Votes against several eminent Persons, at the same time, they should arrogate to themselves an unheard of Authority to arraign one of the three Estates in the Face of the World, and deliver them over to the Clergy to be villify'd from every Reading Desk in the Kingdom.

6. Proceeding now to the Oxford Parliament: The unpardonable Disobedience of not submitting to the royal Command, not to touch on the Business of the Succession.—The Command itself was irregular; two or three unknown Minions are not to take upon them like the Lords of the Articles in Scotland to prescribe unto an English Parliament what things they should treat; nor are they to be plac'd inter Instrumenta Servitutis, as the Romans had Kings in this Island. Should this but once be allow'd, every Parliament would be open'd with Directions, which again would be quicken'd with Menaces, in case of Disobedience: And Restraints on the Freedom of Debate would speedily and certainly end in a general Loss of Liberty. If it was lawful in itself to propose a Bill to exclude the Duke of York, such an unwarrantable Signification of the King's Pleasure could not make it otherwise, &c. But his Majesty never once seems to doubt, whether it was not in the Power of the Legislature to exclude his Brother: He only objects his own private Sense of Honour, Justice, and Conscience, which ought to give way to his public Obligations: And if Gratitude contains the Sum of all Obligations whatever, what did not his Majesty owe to his Protestant Subjects, who had recalled him from a miserable, helpless, Banishment, placed him in the Throne, enlarged his Revenues above what any of his Predecessors had enjoy'd; and given him vast Sums of Money in twenty Years, than had been bestow'd on all the Kings since William I? That the Return expected from him was in no respect inconsistent with the Fundamentals of the English Monarchy, nor unauthor'd even by the Examples of other Nations; particularly the States of France and Sweden; the first of whom declar'd Henry of Bourbon incapable to succeed, because a Protestant; and the last actually depriv'd Stigismund, and disinherited his Children, for being a Papist: That if ever Difference of Religion was to be held a Disqualification, it was peculiarly so in the Person of the Duke of York; because of the natural Violence of his Temper; because, even in his Brother's Life-time, he had discover'd such an Eagerness to exalt the Prerogative beyond its due Bounds; and because, when such a Disposition was under the Direction of so bloody a Religion, all Excesses of Cruelty were to be apprehended from him: That, therefore, they had prefer'd an absolute Exclusion to any other Expedient; as well knowing he would never bear the Shackles of a Regency, or remain contented with the Title of King without the Power: That the Objection started by the Ministers, that even the Exclusion could no otherwise be maintain'd, than by a standing Army, was groundless: The whole People would be an Army to support it; and where there was no Enemy, there could be no Opposition: That if there must be a War, let it be under the Authority of a Law; let it be against a banish'd, excluded Pretender; there was no Fear of the Consequence of such a War: That, however, nothing could be more ridiculous, than such an Argument in their Mouths, who had often endeavour'd to establish a standing Army;

(1) Concerning which, Mr. Sydney writes to Mr. Saville as follows.

"The Lord Halifax brought in a Bill for the speedy Discovery and Conviction of Episcopi, and Fate of Nonconformists, but to contrived, that both Parties are almost equally incensed against him for it. The House of Lords was on Thursday turn'd into a Committee, and, as I hear, will be to every Day, to consider of it, and try whether it can be so amended, as to be useful unto the Ends intended. I know not whether that can be done or no; but I could have wish'd, that, intending to oblige above a Million of Men, that go under the Name of Nonconformity, he had been pleas'd to consult with one of that Number, concerning the Ways of doing it."

Army, who had actually rais'd two, with no other Design; and who, since the Disbanding of them by Act of Parliament, had increas'd the Guards to such a formidable Degree, that they were become a standing Army.

7. As to the other Ways (than the Exclusion) which were darkly and dubiously intimated in the King's Speech, and afterwards repeated in the Declaration, his Majesty, in his Wisdom, could not but know they signify'd nothing: Those who more openly propos'd a Regency, at the same time, declar'd publicly as well as privately, that the Duke would not consent to it, nor to any unusual Restriction of the Royal Power: Nay, one of his own profess'd Vassals was so sham'd of the Cheat, that he openly renounc'd it. All, therefore, that could be meant by it, was to delude both the Parliament and People.

8. The other great and important Changes, which it was presum'd the Parliament would attempt.—If by those Expressions any Change of the Constitution was to be understood, the Suggestion was malicious, since not warranted by any Vote or Proposition in either House: To arraign the whole Body of his People on the ill-grounded and malevolent Surmises of evil and corrupt Men, who hated Parliaments, because they had Reason to fear them, did not become the Justice of a Prince: And if he suffer'd his Royal Mind to admit such Impressions, there would never want perpetual Pretences for perpetual Dissolutions. But if these Expressions mean, That they would have besought his Majesty to take the Government out of the Hands of the Duke and his Dependants, and no longer suffer the Characters of Favour and Honour to be plac'd on such as the Nation had judg'd to be Promoters of Popery, and Pensioners of France; these were indeed great and important Changes, but such as it became Engishmen to believe were design'd by the Parliament; such as would be design'd and press'd by every Parliament; and such as the People would ever pay might at last find Success with the King. Without such Changes as these, the Bill of Exclusion would only have provok'd, without disarming the Enemy; and the very Money paid for it, would have been made use of to hasten the Duke's Return.

9. The Business of Fitzharris.—The Commons had Cause to think his Treasons of such an extraordinary Nature, that they well deserv'd an Examination in Parliament: That he had been made use of by some very great Persons to set up a counterfeit Protestant Conspiracy; and, thereby, not only to drown the Noise of the Popish Plot, but to take off the Heads of the most eminent of those who still refus'd to bow their Knees to Beel: That there had been divers of such honest Contrivances before: That his Libel, fill'd with the most subtle Insinuations, and sharp Expressions against his Majesty, and with direct and passionate Incitements to Rebellion, was to have been convey'd, by unknown Messengers, to those Hands who were to be betray'd: That the finding those Libels upon them was to be held a Confirm-
