THE

TO HIS

S U B S C R I B E R S.

GENTLEMEN,

AS I owe no Compliment to those who have given me no Encouragement, and as I have all the Sensibility imaginable of your Perseverance in countenancing a Work which has come out under so many Disadvantages, I shall address what I have to say concerning it to You only: You have a Right to all the Satisfaction I can give; and if You will dispense with one ocular Objection, I mean the overgrown Size of this preparatory Volume, I shall not despair of the Continuance of your Favour.

The two great Principles I set out upon, were, 1. To follow Truth as close as possible, without that slavish Fear of her Heels, which has deterr'd so many from keeping up with her; And 2. To detect, in order to eradicate, if possible, the Evil of Parties, which has so long divided the Sons of one common Mother, and made them the Instruments of one another's Ruin.

That this was an honest Undertaking, no body can dispute; and that it was a dangerous one to myself, I both foresaw and foretold; for tho' we call out for Impartiality, we are too much concern'd in the Operation to bear it; and when we find ourselves hurt, we seldom fail to decry the Instrument. Party-Attachment may atone for the Sins of a bad Writer; but Disinterestedness will not save a good one. The Readers of our Country are almost all regimented; they are Whigs or Tories, Jacobites or Republicans, Churchmen or Dissenters, who espouse Truth no longer than she espouses them, and who turn their Backs upon her, when she sets her Face against them.

To hear, therefore, that the Zealots of all those several Factions had thrown my Book into the Fire, would neither disappoint nor mortify me, any otherwise, than I should be sorry to find my Fears so well-grounded; to find by Experience, that Prejudice and Perverseness are such inseparable Companions; and that they have taken such hold of the Soil, that they are never to be weeded out.

But how tenacious soever I have been of the main Purposes which I set out with, I must own I have been induc'd to depart from the Rules I had prescrib'd to myself in the Pursuit of them. It was then my Opinion, that the Business of an Historian was merely to state Matters of Fact in Order of Time, without any Intermixture of Conjectures, Colourings, Reflections, or Inferences of his own. But when I took a nearer Survey of the Period before me, I found it so ill understood by some, and so much misrepresented by others, that I was forc'd to consult and relate together. Kennet, Echard, Oldmixon, North, Burnet, &c. &c. had each his Followers and Admirers: Something was to be glean'd from every one of them, and much was to be rejected; and to establish any thing like Historical Certainty, Reasons were to be given in both Cases, or those who had made up their Minds, as the modern Phrase is, after this or that particular Mode, would have apply'd their own Prejudices and Mistakes as the Standard of Decision, and condemn'd me arbitrarily as often as I presum'd to differ from their respective Oracles.

And what I have said in Excuse for this Alteration of my original Plan, will also serve to shew, how ill grounded the prevalent Opinion is, that the Reigns of Charles and James have been already sufficiently explain'd, and are therefore sufficiently understood: Mr. Rapin who has given a Sketch of both, it is true, came after several of those Writers; but then he trod in the same Track; he saw things in the same Light; his Representations partake of the same Partiality; and he has nothing new in Matter or Manner to atone either for his own or their Imperfections: But even since his Book was translated into English, with such astonishing Success to the Undertakers, Sydney's Letters, Kersley's Memoirs, North's Examen, &c. which contain many curious Particulars, till then unknown, have been made public. Those therefore who fancy him to be the very Corymbus of Historians, and that his Work contains all that is worth knowing in the English Story, most egregiously deceive themselves, and over-value him. For we have leave to add, that in the noble Collection of Tracts made by Lord Seymour, which has fallen into my Hands, and that other which I have had the Use of thro' the Favour of Sir Thomas Walsley, I have met with a great Variety of valuable Pieces, which none of our Writers, or even Commenters, seem to have had any Acquaintance with; and that of all I have examin'd to make the best and surest Use imaginable.

If I have happen'd to tire the Patience of any of my Readers by being solicitous to convince their Understandings, I ought, in good Manners, to impute the Fault to Tediouiness on my Side, rather than to Indolence on theirs. But Assertions ought to be made good by Authorities; and the favourable Reception which Collections of State-Tracts have ever met with, is, I think, sufficient to justify the Use I have made of them; for if they are of Importance when separated from the Grain they were calculated to answer, they are of ten times as much Importance when connected with it: Besides; Numbers that I have had Recourſe to are no where elſe to be found, and could not have been purchas'd for ten times the Price of this whole Work: And what holds thus good with reſpect to State Controversies, does the ſame with reſpect to State Papers and State Trials. State Papers are the very Chart and Compaſs of Hiſtory; while we ſail by their Direction, we ſail with Certainty as well as Safety; and when thoſe Lights fail us, we are forc'd in a great Degree to grope and gueſs our Way, and to content ourſelves with Probability only. Then as to State Trials, there is, perhaps, no one Walk of Hiſtory that is of ſo much Conſequence to the Subject; for when the Bench is under the Direction of the Cabinet, Trials are Conſpiracies, and Executions are Murders. I have, therefore, taken the Liberty to expatiate as largely on the Abufe of Law and Juſtice, as of Power and Patriotiſm; and, upon the whole, have endeavour'd to form a Body of all ſuch Matters as regard the Exerciſe or Ends of Government, that thoſe who are not Lawyers or Stateſmen, or Writers by Profeſſion, might not be under a Neceſſity to cumber themſelves with a whole Library, in order to be acquainted with the ſeveral Branches of their own Story.

After all, perhaps, by ſo much the more Pains that I have taken, the more unlikely I am to pleaſe; for tho' the preſent Age is not averſe to Knowledge, I am afraid it is too frolic and libertine to purſue any thing further than the Road is pleaſant, or the Chace profitable: And perhaps we may ſafely conclude with Mr. North, That the Bulk of Readers in all Ages, require no more than a ſmooth, even, flowery Tale; and that they are never more diſgaſted than when their Courſe is interrupted by a Labyrinth of twaiſing Facts and Arguments, which it equally puzzles them either to intellige or to follow. — But ſurely ſuch Readers are not qualified to ſit in Judgment on the Hiſtory of England; and it is my humble Advice to them, that, when they ſet up for Critics, they would confine the Exerciſe of their Talents to the Tales of the Fairies, and ſuch other pretty Pieces as are of a Size with their Underſtandings.

Then for thoſe who, having fir'd their Imaginations with the ſplendid Actions of the Greek and Roman Heroes, or who, prompted by their own Honesty, Credulity, or Inexperience in the great World, exped in the Annals of their own Country to caſt their Virtues or their Vanity with a Succeſſion of Characters to delight in, and of Exploits to be proud of, and who, on the contrary, are thock'd with ſucceſſive Diſappointments in almoſt every Page; I muſt beſeech them not to ſuppoſe, that I take any Pleaſure in aggravating the forbidding Features that I find, or in making Deformity more deform'd: The Poet, who is a Creator, may people his World with Angels inſtead of Men if he pleaſes; but the Hiſtorian muſt keep as ſtrictly to the Life as poſſible; and if he has Monſters to copy, he muſt not forego the Likeneſs, out of a fooliſh Tendernels either to the Dead or the Living.

Laſtly, if there are any, who, from the Poornels of their own Spirits, or the Narrowneſs of their Capacities, find it impoſſible to imagine, how any one of their Cotemporaries, undiſtinguiſh'd with a Title, or undignify'd with a great Office, ſhould be able to ſit in Judgment on the Actions of Miniſters, Kings, and States; or ſhould preſume to exert ſuch Abilities, even if endow'd with them; from their low, dirty Prejudices, I appeal to the Candour and Juſtice of Poſterity, who will diſdain to judge by ſo absurd and chimerical a Standard; And who, if they find a Work to be

Sterling,

Sterling, will pronounce it to be such, whether made sacred by the Image and Supercription of Cæsar or not.— That this has a full Proportion of Alloy, I am sadly sensible: Some things have been omitted, and some have been mistaken:— But none wilfully: And, if it pleases God to prolong my Life and Health, I will spare no Pains to rectify all: For I again protest, that Truth was the great End I had in View, and I will follow Friend or Foe till I find it out.

A REVIEW of the REIGNS of King CHARLES II. and King JAMES II.

Introduction.

WHILE the great Movements of State are passing, they fill too large a Space, and form too mighty an Object, for every common Eye to take in: But when they are pass'd, and fallen into Perspective, though we cannot discern every Particular minutely, we are enabled to form a general Idea of the Whole; at least, if we endeavour in earnest to remove the Films of Prejudice from our Eyes, and suffer Truth to find an open and ready Entrance to our Hearts.

But here lies our great, our National Difficulty.

It is the Misfortune of almost every Englishman to be attach'd to some one Party or Faction, and to have adopted the Political Creed, which he found already established by his Leaders; whence all the Extravagances of that Party become his own; and if a second Solomon was to sit in Judgment upon them, it would give him as much Pain as an Inquisition into his favourite Sins.

Thus, should an Historian arise, who had Application to collect the best Materials, Capacity to comprehend, and Skill to digest them, Genius to animate his Work, and Integrity and Resolution to decide upon every Character and every Fact, as Equity should prompt, as Truth should authorize, instead of making Converts, by the honest Exercise of his Talents, he would possibly make Enemies; and all the Sars among the Livings would clamour in Behalf of the guilty Dead.

But should so valuable a Man ever arise among us, I hope he would venture upon the Task, however difficult and discouraging, of reducing our shapeless Annals into Form and Comeliness, with a Spirit superior to any such ungrateful Consequence.

As Fame is the only Reward which, in evil Times, Virtue hath to hope for; and Infamy is the only Punishment that Wick- edness in High-places hath to apprehend, both ought to be distributed with an un- sparing, as well as impartial Hand: The Historian then sits in the Seat of Justice: Before his Tribunal not only Ministers, but Kings and Senates must make their Appearance; and if his Doom is righteous, it is also irrepeatable.

This venerable Seat hath continued empty for so long a time, that the Awe which used to attend it is, in a manner, lost, and the Great are become as insensible of Fame, as the Vulgar of Liberty.

Till it shall be fill'd as it ought to be, let me, therefore, be suffer'd to seat myself on the Footstool at least; to put overgrown indemnity'd Criminals in mind, that, though they derive their Titles from the Favour of the Crown, their Characters depend on their Behaviour to the People.

It is usual to consider the great Revolution, which took place in the Year 1688, as a single Act, or Interlude, which was complete in itself, and needed neither Prologue nor Clerus by way of Illustration.

But to me it appears rather as the grand Catastrope of several Acts, consisting of a Multiplicity of Scenes, which began to open soon after the Restoration of King Charles II.; and which, through a great Variety of Incidents, in a perplexed and irregular manner, made way almost continually, though insensibly, for that important Event.

Notwithstanding, therefore, so many different Writers have treated so amply on the Reigns of the Two Royal Brothers, as All have been, more or less, possess'd with a Party-Spirit, it is still, perhaps, requisite to give such a Review of our public Transactions, during that Interval, as may serve to shew, how naturally and necessarily, Oppression from above, created Faction below; and Outrage begat Outrage, till Government itself became a second time dissolved, and the People had a second Opportunity to secure both themselves and their Posterity from a Return of the like Calamities.

A. D. 1659.

Cromwell and Monk equally Displeas'd.

As Cromwell, by the Dint of Artifice and Diffimulation, had the singular Glory of triumphing over his Sovereign; so Monk, by the like Means, had the singular Happiness to be the Instrument of restoring him to the Possession of his Royalty.

Nor did he find the Talk extremely difficult: For being at the Head of the Army, he was likewise at the Head of the Commonwealth; and the People had neither Power nor Inclination to withstand him. They had fought for Liberty, but still found themselves Slaves; and, being weary of their military Yoke, were easily induc'd to submit once more to that of Monarchy, as the least Evil.

People.Contention of the King.

But if the People were thus tractable, the King was yet more so: His Title was his All. He had neither Revenue, nor even the Countenance of foreign Powers. His Party at home, though animated with fresh Hopes, had, at first, very little ground for Confidence. If Monk had restored the (a) fe- A. D. 1659.

cluded Members, he qualified that Measure, Monk offers by sending a circular (b) Letter to all the for a free Regiments in the three Kingdoms, signify- State or Coming, That nothing was intended for Alteration monwealth.

And, in a written (c) Paper, which was read by his Secretary in his Name, to those very Members at Whitehall, he declared, That restoring of the kingly Power would put an End to the People's Liberty; that moderate Presbyterian Government would contribute most to the Settlement of the Church; and that a Provision should be made for governing the Kingdom by a Succession of Parliaments, without a King, single Person, or House of Lords.

When, therefore, such was the Circumstance of the King abroad, and such the seeming Disposition of Affairs at home, it is no wonder his Majesty almost despaired of being able to bow to any Terms.

(a) So call'd from their having been forc'd out of the House by the Army, Ann 1648; on account of their being dispos'd to come to an Accommodation with the King.

(b) In which were the following Expressions: "And, to take away all just Doubts from you, we do assure you, that we have no Intention or Purpose to return to our old Bondage: But, since the Providence of God hath made us free, at the Loss of so much Blood, we hope we shall never be found so unfaithful to God, and his People, as to lose so glorious a Cause. But we do resolve, with the Assistance of God, to adhere to you in the continuing of our dear-purchased Liberties, both Spiritual and Civil, in a free State, and Commonwealth, and to use our utmost Endeavour that no Occasion may be made Disturbance of the Peace of the Commonwealth, either in favour of Charles Stuart, or any other pretended Authority, we desire you to secure them till the Pleasure of Parliament, or Council of State, be known in their Behalf." Phillips's Supplement to Baker, p. 710.

(c) The whole of this Paper deserves to be transmitted to Posterity.

GENTLEMEN,

"It appears unto me, by what I have heard from you and the whole Nation, that the Peace and happy Settlement of these bleeding Nations, next under God, lieth in your kind and hearty Consideration of Widow's Plea, and Self-Defence, which, I have Reason to be confident, judgeth in you, a and how great a Share of the Nation's Suffering will fall upon you, in case the Lord deny us now a Settlement. I am in very good Hopes, there will be found in you all, such melting Bowels towards these poor Nations, and towards one another, that you will become Helpers and Masters of all us woful Brethren. And that such an Opportunity may clearly appear to you in your Hearts, I thought good to assure you, and that in this Parliament of God, that I have nothing before my Eyes but God's Glory, and the Settlement of these Nations upon Commonwealth Foundation. In pursuit whereof, I shall throw things too dear; and for my own particular, I shall throw myself down at your Feet, to be any thing or nothing, in order to their great and just Way of Justice and Liberty, as he is from me to impose any thing; I desire you may be in perfect Freedom; only give me leave to mind you, that the old Foundations are, by God's Providence, broken, that, in the Eye of Reason, they cannot be restored, but upon the Ruins of the People of these Nations, that have engaged for their Rights in Defence of the Parliament. And the great and chief End of the Government, for settling and raising the Lord's Name and in the three Nations, and also the Liberty of the People's Representatives in Parliament, will be certainly lost: For if the People find that, after so long and bloody a War against the King, for breaking in upon their Liberties, yet, at last, he must be taken in again, it will be out of Question, and is most manifest, he may, for the future, govern by his Will, despite of Parliaments and Parliaments may be pleas'd, and yet the People will never more rise for their Alliance.

"And as to the Interest of this famous City (which hath been, in all Ages, the Bulwark of Parliaments, and unto whom I am, for their great Affection, so deeply engaged) certainly it must lie in a Commonwealth; that Government only being capable to make them, through the Lord's blessing, the Metropolis and Head of Trade for all Christen- dom, whereunto God and Nature hath fitted them above all others.

"And as to the Government in the Church, the West Church hath been so small Cause of these Nations Disturbance, it is most manifest, that if it be unassailable in the State, the Church may follow, and Prejudice may be brought in, which these Nations, I know, cannot bear, and against which they have so solemnly sworn.

"And indeed, moderate, not rigid Presbyterian Government, with a sufficient Liberty for Conscience, truly tender, appear, at present, to be the most indifferent and acceptable Way to the Church's Settlement. And the Interest of the Lords, even of those Lords who have thought themselves noble indeed, by joining with the People, and in Defence of those just Rights, have advanced their dear-est Blood and large Estates. To that I shall only say, That though the State of these Nations be such, as cannot bear their sitting in a divided House, yet certainly the Will of Parliament will find out such Arbitrary Means of Honour for them, as may make them more noble in After-ages.

"Gentlemen, Upon the whole Matter, the best Relief that I can make, at present, for the Peace of these Nations, will be, in my Opinion, that you forthwith go to sit together in Parliaments in order.

"1. To the settling of the Command of the Armies of the three Nations, in that manner, as they may be servicable to the Peace and Safety of these Nations, and to the Nation's Ruin, by the Force of Arms.

"2. To the providing of such Maintenance for them; that is, for the Forces of Foot, and for the Navy by Sea, and all the Armed Parts, and the necessary Charge of the Government.

"3. To the appointing a Law and Justice, by the Authority in settle the Civil Government, and the settling of Scotland and Ireland; and to the settling of the Parliament of Writs for the summing up of Parliaments, and the elections united, to meet at Westminster, in the Month of April, next, with such Qualifications, as may be thought fit.

"4. To a legal Dissolution of this Parliament, to make way for a Succession of Parliaments.

"And, in order to these good Ends, the Grants will not only willingly admit you, but faithfully, bona fide, and every the Officers under my Commission, and, I believe, the Officers and Soldiers of the three Nations, will spend their Blood for you, and Justice Parliaments.

"If your Commission be directed to this End, you may part honourably, having made a fair Step to the Settlement of these Nations, by making a Way for successful Parliaments. But I must needs say, that if any different Countenance should be taken, which I have no Reason to fear, these Nations would presently be thrown back into Force and Violence, and all Hopes of this much desired Establishment buried in Disorder; which the Lord, in his great Mercy, I hope, will prevent. And so God speed you well together, and unite your Hearts for the Preservation of Peace, and Settlement of these Nations, to his own Glory, and yours, and all our Conspires!"

A. D. 1659. Genius than Monk might have been as long as a Lois how to gratify his own private Views, without exposing himself to the Re- fement of the Public; and to strike Peace and Order out of such a vast Confusion.

Monk offer'd the Kingship by Halbergh and Card. Mazarine. Gumble's Life of Monk. Phillips.

Sir Arthur Haslerig solicited him to assume the Crown himself, and engaged to find him one hundred thousand Hands to subscribe to his Title.

Monsieur (g) de Bourdeaux, the French Embassador, offer'd him the best Services of the Crown of France, in the Name of Cardinal Mazarine, either to assist in restoring the King, or in enabling him (the General) to set the Crown upon his own Head.

Army Officers urge him to oblige the Parliament to engage for a free State. Phillips. Skinner's Life of Monk.

On the other hand, the Republican Officers of the Army attended him in a Body, to express their Apprehensions, that Charles Stuart would be restored; and to recommend, by way of Prevention, that he would oblige the Parliament to engage for a free State and Commonwealth, without a King or House of Lords.

Again, such of the Royalists as had Access to him, lost no Opportunity of engaging him in the Interest of his Majesty. The Grandees, and leading Ministers of the Presbyterians, likewise, threw their Weight into the same Scale, and challenge the Merit of convincing him, That a Commonwealth to which he still pretended an inviolable Attachment was impracticable.

Presbyterians solicit him to declare for the King. Sharp's Letter to Mr. Douglas, in Woodrow's Introduction to the History of the Church of Scotland.

Upon the whole, whether he was actuated by a Principle of Honesty or Policy, whether a Crown was above the General, or the General was above the Crown, he fix'd, at last, upon a Resolution to pave the Way for the King's Return; which, by a Series of dextrous Measures, he had the Happiness to accomplish.

With respect to the avow'd Terms upon which he first treated with his Majesty, we find them calculated only to quiet the Minds of the Nation for the present, in order to facilitate the King's Introduction: For his principal Instructions to (h) Sir John Greenville recommended little more than a general Pardon, liable to parliamentary Exceptions; the continuing Property in its present State, by a Ratification of all public Sales; a proper Care to humour and pay the Army, and a general Liberty of Conscience.

(i) Conditions and Limitations had, however, been thought of by others of great Eminence, nay, had been propos'd to the General, who, even according to his own Apologists, listened to them not only with a seeming Approbation, but hinted, it would be the utmost Line that he could or would advance to, in favour of the King; and how necessary some were, however unpalatable any would have been thought, the Sequel of our History will too fatally explain.

Conditions and Limitations.

The King, as it was natural he should, was charmed to find his Way so open, and the Conveyance so easy; and therefore not only (k) seem'd to make no Difficulty of embracing

Monk made Cession-General by the King.

"—and out the Ropes at Stern. What Folly's't to think we can safely ferry, while the Fleet's Fanatic! This being done, let our Cavalry miscify if it can. Men (Mazars) perhaps met War, and gave him found Advice.— Got Arms, but buy them not in suspicious Numbers; that, if all fails, we may repair to them, and out our Passage to the Throne, through Traitors Blood. Farewell. Bristol, S. V. March 10. 1659."

An Answer to this Piece was publish'd about a Week after, by Mr. Evans, intitled, The last News of Mr. Monk from Bourdeaux &c. &c. But this I have never met with, and therefore can give no Account of.

(g) Mr. Locke, on the Authority of Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterwards Earl of Shaftsbury, insists, that Monk had actually agreed with Mr. Bourdeaux, the French Embassador, to assume the supreme Government himself; of which the said Sir Anthony having received Intelligence, procur'd the Council of State, whereof he was a Member, to be summon'd immediately; and Monk attending as usual, Sir Anthony charg'd him, in an ambiguous and indirect Manner, with playing false with them, and not doing as he had promis'd; which the other not only deny'd, but offer'd to give them all manner of Satisfaction of which Sir Anthony taking the Advantage, insist'd on his new regulating the Command of the Army, upon the Spot, as it should then be requir'd of him: This Monk, not knowing how to avoid it, was oblig'd to comply with; by which mean he disarm'd himself, and had no other Game to play than to close with the King's Officers by Sir John Greenville, for restoring the Royal Family. But this whole Story is disput'd by Knox; and not without Reason, if it is true, as he affirms, that the Regulations made in the Army were all by Monk's Direction, and in favour of his own Partisan only. Besides, Phillips, who wrote his Book under the Eye of Clarendon, affirms, that Dr. Burrows's Offer was made to the said Charles, and that Monk refus'd to give the Embassador an Audience, but under the express Condition, That he should not propose any thing to him in reference to the public Affairs of Government.

(h) The King's Agent, afterwards made Earl of Bath.

(i) The General having before sent away Sir John Greenville privately to his Majesty, with Assurance of his Allegiance, and Resolutions for his Service, without the Mention of any Limitations; was somewhat concern'd how to make good Work with these Gentlemen (of the Presbyterian Faction) who were for Limitations: Not were they ordinary People, but some of them Persons of Quality, and all of them Men of Parts and Eminency among the Parties where they sway'd. So that the General thought it most safe, at present, to entertain them with some Appearance of his Consent; and having (as they thought) thus plac'd the Trick upon him, their next Contrivance was to perfect this Juggle with the King. To that Purpose a Letter was sent to him, relating their several Desires and Endeavours for his Return; and that to that End they had sold several Treaties with General Monk, who could not be prevail'd with to consent to his Restoration, otherwise than upon his Father's Condition in the Isle of Wight; requesting his Majesty to accept thereof, rather than, by his further Delay, to hazard a total Exclusion from his Crown and Kingdom. This Letter was deliver'd to his Majesty whilst Sir John Greenville was attending upon him, to whom it was also shewn. But, upon farther deliberating among themselves, the Artifice was quickly discover'd; so that his Majesty instantly reply'd, I perceive these People do not intend to do me good, but find upon much better Terms, and that I am generally oblig'd to me, and Sir John Greenville is a man of a good mind, and faithfully received me the Oath of a true Person, when they came afterwards to me, that I should play with Sir John Greenville, and that I should endeavour to conceal their Discontent, yet were, even afterwards, some and implacable Enemies to him. This he did deliver to his Majesty, who has since firm'd in his mind, as a certain Proof of his Hero's Diligence, and how determin'd he was to make a Service of the public Liberty.

(k) After great Deliberation upon all the Particulars, and weighing the Importance of complying with the General's Advice in all Things which his Conscience and Honour would permit, his Majesty directed such Letters and Declarations to be prepar'd, as should be, as a good Deed, suitable to the Will and Council of the General, and yet make the Transfation of those Things which he did not like, the Effect of the Power of the Parliament, rather than of his Majesty's Approbation. And the Confidence he had upon the general Election of honest and prudent Men, and in some particular Persons, who he heard were already chosen, dispos'd him to make a general Reference of all things which he could not referre to himself, to the Wisdom of the Parliament, upon Presumption that they would see each more from him than he was willing to confest to; since he well knew, that, whatever Title they call'd Monk, or he gave them, they must have another kind of Parliament to confirm all that was done by them; without which they could not be safe and contented, nor his Majesty oblig'd. Ed. CLARENDON, Fol. Vol. III. P. 575.

bracing the General's Proposals with relation to the Public, but immediately (1) gratified him with a Commission to be Captain-General of all the Forces in the three Kingdoms; and likewise made his Kinsman, and Bosom Favourite, Morris, by whose Advice he had been govern'd in every thing, Secretary of State.

Meeting of the Convention

March 17. the long Parliament was dissolved, by an Act of their own, April 25, the (2) new Parliament met. And, in the Interval, the King had for forth his Declaration, from Breda; which, though so often printed, cannot here be omitted; because it was then received and understood to be the Basis of the ensuing Reign.

His Majesty's Declaration from Breda.

The King's Declaration

" If the general Distracted and Confusion, which is spread over the whole Kingdom, doth not awaken all Men to a Desire, and Longing, that these Wounds, which have so many Years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all We can say will be to no Purpose. However, after this long Silence, We have thought it our Duty to declare how much We desire to contribute thereunto: And that, as we can never give over the Hope, in good Time, to obtain the Possession of that Right, which God and Nature hath made our Due; so We make it our daily Suit to the Divine Providence, that He will, in Compassion to us and our Subjects, after so long Miserie and Sufferings, remit, and put Us into a quiet and peaceable Possession of that our Right, with as little Blood and Damage to our People as is possible; nor do We desire more to enjoy what is Ours, than that all our Subjects may enjoy what by Law is theirs, by a full and entire Administration of Justice throughout the Land, and by extending our Mercy where it is wanted and desired. And to the end that Fear of Punishment may not engage any, conscious to themselves of what is past, to a Perseverance in Guilt for the future, by opposing the Quiet and Happiness of their Country, in the Restoration both of King, and Peers, and People, to their just, ancient and fundamental Rights; We do by these Presents declare, That We do grant a free and general Pardon, which We are ready, upon Demand, to pass under our Great Seal of England, to all our Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, who, within Forty Days after the Publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our Grace and Favour, and shall by any public Act declare their doing so, and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects, excepting only such Persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament. Those only excepted, let all our Subjects, born English, who, upon the Word of a King, solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no Crime whatsoever committed against Us, or our Royal Family, before the Publication of this, shall ever rise in Judgment, or be brought in Question, against any of them, to the least Indamagement of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates, or (as far forth as lies in our Power) to much as to the Prejudice of their Reputations, by any Reproach or Terms of Distinction from the rest of our best Subjects; We desiring and ordaining, that, benevolently, all Nites of Discord, Separation, and Difference of Parties, be utterly abolished among all our Subjects; whom We invite and conjure to a perfect Union among themselves, under our Protection, for the Restitution of our just Rights and theirs, in a free Parliament; by which, upon the Word of a King, We will be advised. And because the Passion and Uncharitableness of the Times have produced several Opinions in RELIGION, by which Men are engag'd in Parties and Animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a Freedom of Conversation, will be composed, or better understood; We do declare a Liberty to tender Conferences; and that no Man shall be disturbed, or called in Question, for Difference of Opinion in Matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom; and that We shall be ready to consent to such an Act of Parliament, as, upon mature Deliberation, shall be offer'd unto Us, for the full granting that Indulgence. And because, in the continued Distractions of so many Years, and so many and great Revolutions, many Grants and Purchases of Estates have been made to and by many Officers, Soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to Actions at Law, upon several Titles; We are likewise willing, That all such Differences, and all things relating to such Grants, Sales, and Purchases, shall be determined in PARLIAMENT; which can best provide for the just Satisfaction of all Men who are concern'd. And we do further declare, That We will be ready to consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament to the Purposes aforesaid, and for the full Satisfaction of all Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers of the Army under the Command of General Monk; and that they shall be receiv'd into our Service upon as good Pay and Conditions as they now enjoy."

Together with this artful Piece, came a Letter to each House of Parliament; two others, to Monk, and Admiral Montagu, to be

King sends Letters to both Houses of Parliament.

(1) Philips, in his Supplement to Baker, assures us, that when George, Monk's Brother-in-law, was dispatch'd by him to the King, he gave him no other Instructions than to give the King all manner of Assurance of his Fidelity; and that he desired him to ask for nothing, either for Monk himself, or any body with him. But Dr. Stowe, in his Life of Monk, p. 184. assures us, that the General, deliberating with Sir John Greenville about the Disposal of his Majesty's Seal and Signet, it was agreed, that, in regard Mr. Morris was the only Person that had been privy to his Correspondence with the King, and had so faithfully assist'd therein, they would recommend him to the Trust. He likewise adds, that the General was, at the same time, offer'd ten thousand Pounds to procure the Piece for another.

by them communicated to the Soldiers and Seamen; and a fifth to the City of London: Besides all which, Care was officiously taken by the Presbyterians to publish a Collection of (n) Epistles from several foreign Divines, to clear up a (o) Suspicion, which began already to prevail (p), that the King was a Papiſt (q).

The King suspected of being a Papiſt.

But there was scarce any Necessity to set such a Variety of Engines to work, in his Majesty's Favour. As Enthusiasm ebb'd apace, Loyalty flow'd in as fast. Example, on such Occasions, operates instead of Reason; and when the Leader leaps, the Herd follows.

Nor was this sudden and surprizing Revulsion of popular Humours to be seen only without-doors: The new Parliament consisting now, as formerly, of (r) two Houses, not only declar'd, that, according to the ancient and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, in KING, LORDS, and COMMONS; but, under the Awe and Influence of the Captain General, invited his Majesty to the Exercise of his Kingly Office, without any other (s) Conditions or Stipulations than he himself had thought it fit to lay down in his Declaration before-quoted.

The King, who had been of late the Bugbear of the three Nations, was now become their Idol: He was address'd, complimented, (o) One of which declares, That he the King, had a sanctify'd Heart, and spake the Language of Canaan. Let this serve as a Sample of the rest.

(p) Dr. Meric, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, in a Letter to the Doctors of Yor., gives us to understand, that he was sent over into England, about two Months before the Restoration, to justify the King on this Head, and that accordingly he spent most of his Time in undeceiving all he was with, especially the Heads and Leaders of the Presbyterians and Independent Parties.

(q) But the Ground of our Misfortunes, next to the vowed Revenge for the Death of the Father, was, That he had renounced the Christian Religion abroad. The Proof of which is but too manifestly evident.

Sir Allen Broucker, who was with that King beyond Sea at the time of his first professing the Papiſt Religion, has been often heard to lament the burning of his Journal, wherein the very Day and Circumstances of it were extrod. And I am assur'd that one of his present Majesty's Chaplains, (Minister of the Place where Sir Allen died, can assure us as much of the true and correct recitation of what he knew in it; with this additional Circumstance, that it was done in the Absence of the old Lord Calverley, who, knowing it at his Return, fell into great Passion, and told the King, he must never expect to see England again, if it should be known there.

That Lord knew too much for a Protestant; and it was thought fatal to him to have had no more jealousy of a Verisif-Papist, than he had entertained of his Master. (His dy'd July 14, 1660.)

The Lord Bristol, who pretended, not to be of the Cour of Rome, though he professed himself of that Cloak, it may be believed in what he procecded to the House of Commons, had given King Charles the same Advice which had been given to Henry the Fourth, If he would be truly Great, to be ever a Protestant than he was. And perhaps, this kept that Lord from receiving those Advantages, which otherwise his Religion and great Parts would have intitled him to.

But I never heard that it faged the worse with Cardinal de Rois, for advising that Any in point of Prudence to keep to the Religion of his Country.

However Mazarin's forgine Counsel prevailed, and how secret forever it was kept, many had got the Hint of it, which occasioned that Act, which made it so highly penal to say, That the King was a Papiſt. State-Tracts, Will. III. vol. iii. p. 83.

But tho' this was the Matter of Fact, the Orthodox Clergy made his Majesty's unshakeable Attachment to the Church of England, the perpetual Subject of their Papiſt Oratory. In particular one Dr. Walsby, in a Sermon on the 27th of May, 1661, sets forth his heroic Perseverance in the following super-sublime Manner:

" His Majesty lived long in the Courts and Territories of Foreign Princes of different Religion from his, yet with Job he held fast his Integrity, stood like a Calve, or Rock immovable against all Surges of Temptations, nor was raised to change his Faith, to alter his Religion; nor made the fiery Assaſin, as we have heard of Miscar; Militars and others he met with beyond Sea. Like Ulyſſes he bound himself to the Mast of a well grounded Resolution, that no Rushy Syces could draw him out of the Ship of the Church of England, in which he was baptized and educated, tho' that Ship were like the other wherein Christ and his Disciples sailed, is all Appearance ready to sink; when he had no Power, visible to defend himself, he would still be the Defender of the Faith once delivered to the Saints, whom following the great Example of the best of Kings, his Royal Father, who to his Death maintained the Religion of the Church of England, and died a Martyr for the same.

(r) About this Time a bold Paper was published, call'd Plain English, which had the following spirited Introduction:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" It is written the Prophet Joel shall sit in an oval Time, and 'tis like we also might hold our Peace, but that we fear a Knife is at the very Throat, not only of our Liberty, but of our Protestantism. In this Condition we hope it will be no Offense, if we cry out to you for Help; you that through God's Goodness have helped us so often, and strenuously maintained the same Cause with us against the Return of that Family which pretends to the Government of these Nations. It is the public Interest and yours that we hitherto fought for, and for which we now plead; therefore we insist upon it with the greater Confidence before you, because we are all equally concerned in the Good or Ill of your Transitions. We cannot yet be persuaded, though our Fears and Jealousies are strong, and the Grounds of them many, that you can so far abuse your Confidence, or forget the public Interest and your own, as to be returning back with the Multitude to Episcop, or that you should so much shame yourselves, as to cease the Lords and Owners of our Becklage. Though it were possible you should forget, yet certainly God will not, all the Injuries and Oppressions done by that Family, to his Church and People in these and other Nations. Though the Inscription Exit Tyranny, which was fixed over the Place where the Statue of the late King formerly stood at the Exchange, has been blotted out by the Rabbie, yet it is written with the Pen of a Diamond in the Hearts of many Thousands. Dated March 22, 1659.

(s) The upper House consisted at first but of ten Members, viz. the Earls of Manchester, Northumberland, Lincoln, Beaufort, Dunblow, Viscount Say and Seal, and the Lords Barnton, Langford, Gray of Wilton, and Mansfield. We are told by Mr. Cole in his Dedication, That the Presbyterians complaining to Mack of their Meeting; he answered, Now they were so, he had no Power to turn them out.

" Such Unanimity appeared in their Proceeding, that there was not the least Dispute among them, but upon our single Point? Yet that was a very important one. Halt, afterwards the Chief Justice, moved that a Committee might be appointed to look into the Proposition, but had been made, and the Concurrence that has been offered by the Upper House of the War, particularly as the Treaty of Nemours, that from thence they might digest such Propositions as they should think fit to be sent over to the King. This was recommended, but I do not remember by whom. It was foreseen, that such a Motion might be fit on Foot. Mr. Mack was instructed how to answer it, whenever it should be proposed. He told the House, that there was yet, beyond all Mens Hope, an universal Quare all over the Nation; but there were many Incendiaries fill on the Watch, trying where they could first raise the Flame. He said, he had such copious Informations sent him of these Things, that it was not in their Power to be generally known; He could not however for the Peace, either of the Nation or of the Army, if any Delay was put to the sending for the King: What need was there of sending Propositions to him? Might they not as well prepare them and offer them to him, when he should come over? He was to bring neither Army nor Treasure with him, either to fight them or to corrupt them. So he moved, that they would immediately send Commissioners to bring over the King: And said, that he must by the Blessing of all the Blood or Michael that might follow on the Heads of those, who should still insist on any Motion that might delay the present Settlement of the Nation. This was echoed of with such a Shout over the House, that the Motion was no more insisted on. To the King's coming in without Conditions, may be well intimated all the Retors of his Reign."

ed, and presented, by all Sects and Parties; Breda swarm'd with Courtiers; some to procure their Pardons, and others to worm themselves into Favour and Preferment; Presbyterian Ministers to make the most of their late Services; orthodox Sons of the Church to plead the Merit of their long Sufferings; and Roman Catholics to bid for a (r) Toleration.

and by France and Spain.

Hither likewise resorted the several Committees of the City of London, the House of Commons, and the House of Lords; the two first laden with Gifts; and all offering up a Cloud of Court Incense at the Royal Footstool. The King had now a fresh Proof, that Power is the Substance of Royalty, and Title but the Shadow: For here he had the Glory to see the two great Crowns of France and Spain vying with each other in Compliments and Civilities to him, which had both, so lately, without Compassion, beheld him a miserable Exile; and the whole Seven Provinces almost as much at his Devotion, as if they had been his own Inheritance.

As all had been Wretchedness before, all was Splendor and Triumph now: He that had been driven out like a Fugitive from his own Dominions, now return'd to take Possession of them with the full Glory of a Sovereign. A Royal Navy, under the Command of Admiral Montagu, (who had kept pace with Monk in forwarding the Restoration) was sent to be his Convoy; the States General in Perion attended him on board; and his own Subjects see World here as it is he had been their (u) SAVIOUR; at the Head of whom appear'd MONK the RESTORER, to receive the (v) Acknowledgments, HONOURS, and Rewards, he had earn'd with unexampled Loyalty to his Prince, but with unexampled Perfidy to the Commonwealth; to which he had so expressly, openly, and solemnly devoted his Life, and all his Powers.

The People of England, at this Period, like the Israelites of old, who had so long been left to do what was right in their own Eyes, seem to have placed the Sum of their Felicity in having a King; and to have thought, that, under the Shadow of his Wing, the Commonwealth could only be safe: And this loyal Infatuation will the less be wonder'd at, when it is consider'd, how natural it was for those, who had so often been disappointed of Liberty, to compound for Quiet. But alas! the (w) Transports of those Times were too violent to be lasting; and if the Nation wore a more florid Face, it had still a distemper'd Heart.

Tho' all Sects and Parties appear'd to be reconcil'd to the King, none were reconcil'd to each other; and it became soon visible, that the Court had no real Desire to bring about a national Union.

His Majesty had resided long in France, had been an Eye-witness of the Struggle between the most Christian King and his Parliament, had seen the latter subdu'd, and Will and Pleasure victorious: The Precedent pleas'd him, and tho' he was in full Possession

A. D. 1666. His triumphant Return.

(1) As it was afterwards collected by the Lord Viscount Stafford upon his Tryal, declaring that he had been their Agent upon this Occasion; that he had offered a hundred Thousand Pound for that Indulgence; and that, after the King's Restoration, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons for that Purpose, but drop, upon the Opposition of Lord Chancellor Hyde.

(2) Sir Philip Warwick, and after him the Author of the Complete History, affirm, that the Night his Majesty came to Whitehall, he made his Prayers-Chamber his Oratory, wherein he said his Devotions and Thanks to God. On the other Hand, according to Mr. Oldmixon, it was credibly reported, that he took Barbara Villiers (afterwards made Duchess of Cleveland) that very Night from her Husband. Which of these Accounts is most probable, the Reader is left to gather from the King's after Life and Conversation.

(3) He was made Duke of Almondey, Knight of the Garter, &c. &c. whom he had a Grant of 2000 l. per An. to support his Grandeur which Honour Mr. Oldmixon is of Opinion he became as ill as a Bear would a Resolutive.

(4) His Majesty was received into the House of Peers by the Earl of Montague (his Speech) with the following Speech:

"That this Day may prove happy to your Majesty, is the Hope, the Expectation, and the earnest Desire of my Lords the Peers, whose Commands are upon me to make this humble Tender to your Majesty, of their loyal Joy for your Majesty's safe Return to your native Kingdom; and for the happy Restoration of your Majesty to your Crown and Dignity, after so long, and so severe a Suppression of your just Right and Title."

"I shall not reflect upon Your Majesty's Sufferings, which have been your People's Miseries; yet I cannot omit to say, That as the Nation in general, so the Peers with a more personal and particular Sense have felt the Stroke that cut the Gordian Knot which fasten'd your Majesty to your Kingdom, and your Kingdom to your Majesty."

"For, first these strange and various Fluctuations and Discompartures in Government, since those horrid and unparalleled Violations of all Order and Justice, Swearers have ruled over us, even with a Rod of Iron: But now, with Satisfaction of Heart, we own and see your Majesty our native King, a Son of the Wise, a Son of the ancient Kings, whose Hands hold forth a golden Scepter."

"Great King! Give me leave to speak the Confidence, as well as the Desire, of the Peers of England: Be you the powerful Defender of the true Protestant Faith, the just Assertor and Maintainer of the Laws and Liberties of your Subjects; so shall Judgment run Down like a River, and Justice like a mighty Stream; and God, the God of your Mercy, who hath so miraculously preferred you, will establish your Throne in Righteousness and in Peace."

"Dead Sovereign! I offer no flattering Titles, but I speak the Words of Truth: You are the Desire of three Kingdoms, the Strength and Stay of the Tribes of the People, for the moderating of Extremities, the reconciling of Differences, the justifies of all Tribes, and for the rearing of the collapsed Honour of these Nations. Their Eyes are toward your Majesty, their Tongues with loud Acclamations of Joy, speak the Thought and loyal Intention of their Hearts, their Hands are lifted up to Heaven with Prayers and Praises: And what oral Triumph can equal this your Pomp and Glory?"

"Long may your Majesty live and reign, a Support to your Friends, a Terror to your Enemies, an Honour to your Nation, and an Example to Kings, of Piety, Justice, Prudence and Power; that this Prosperous Expedition may be verified in your Majesty, King Charles the Second, shall be greater than ever was the greatness of that Name."

His Majesty's Gracious Answer.

"My Lord, I am so disorder'd by my Journey, and with the Noise still sounding in my Ears which I confess was pleasing to me, because it expressed the Affection of my People, as I am unapt, at the present, to make such a Reply as I desire; yet thus much I shall say unto you, That I take no greater Satisfaction to myself in this my Change, than that I find my Heart ready to endeavor by all Means for the restoring of this Nation to their Freedom and Happiness; and I hope, by the Advice of my Parliament, to effect it. Of this also you may be confident, That, next to the Honour of God, from whom principally I fall ever own this Restoration to my Crown, I shall study the Welfare of my People; and shall not only be a just Defender of the Faith, but a just Assertor of the Laws and Liberties of my Subjects."

In Commemoration of this great Event, the following MEDAL was struck,

A. D. 1660.

Possession of the Affections of his People, he thought the Tenure precarious, and choic'd rather to govern by Fear than Love.

When therefore his Popularity began to wear off, and it became evident, that he entertain'd Designs, which struck at the Root of the Constitution; it is scarce to be wonder'd, that the Spirit of Liberty again broke forth, and that our national Divisions rag'd almost as violently as ever.

In all Parties, there is something both right and wrong: The right is oftent' to be found in their Doctrines, and the wrong in their Practice. One is commonly the Dictate of Passion, the other of Reason; but both, by degrees, are apt to degenerate into Extravagance. Thus the high-flying Loyalty of the Cavalier, and the over-heated Enthusiasm of the Roundhead, equally border'd upon Phrenzy: Both pleaded Patriotism and public Spirit, and both aim'd at Power and Dominion; only with this Difference in the Means; the Former aspir'd to it in the Right of the King, the Latter in their own.

Something right and wrong in all Parties.

To a Prince of King Charles's Turn, or indeed to any Prince, it is easy to guess, which of these two Parties would be most agreeable: Accordingly, we find his Gratitude to the Presbyterians soon giving way to his Interest; and tho' he tamper'd with them for a while, to serve his own Ends, he took the first Opportunity to make them a Sacrifice; and was at length induc'd to use such Severities against them, that, in treating them as Sectaries, he forgot they were Englishmen.

A. D. 1660
King offers to the Presbyterians;

And in this unkingly Partiality he seems to have been unhappily confirm'd by his Chancellor Clarendon; who, from rather too quick and warm a Sense of the Evil of one Party, was induc'd to place himself at the Head of another; and, instead of endeavouring to reconcile, made it his Business to subdue.

and the Lord Chancellor liberal.

Equally apprehensive of Tyranny from the Papists, and (x) Anarchy from the Parliament, he became equally embittered against Both; and fondly imagin'd, that in the Episcopal Church of England was to be found the

(6) The political Principles of the Presbyterians may be gather'd from the following extracts out of the Sermon preached by Master Robert Douglas, Moderator of the Scots General Assembly, before the King the Day of his Coronation at Stones; which is to be met with entire in Sir Thomas Wellesley's Collection.

“ 5. I come now to the fifth and last Particular, and that is the Covenant made between the King and the People: “ When a King is crowned, and received by the People; “ there is a Covenant or mutual Contract, between him “ and them, containing Conditions, mutually to be observed: Time will not suffer to insist upon many Particulars; I shall only lay before you three. 1. It is clear from this Covenant, that a King hath not absolute Power to do what he pleases; He is tyed to Conditions, by Virtue of a Covenant. 2. It is clear from this Covenant, that a People are bound to obey their King “ in the Lord. 3. I shall present the King with some “ Directions for the right Government of the People, who are bound to obey.

“ 1. It is clear, that the King's Power is not absolute, as Kings and flattering Courtiers apprehend; a King's Power is a limited Power, by this Covenant. And there is a threefold Limitation of the King's Power.

“ 1. In regard of Subordination, there is a Power above his, even God's Power, whom he is obliged to obey; and to whom he must give an Account of his Administration. Ye heard Yesterday, that Text, By one King reigns, Prov. viii. 15. Kings have not only their Crowns from God, but they must reign according to his Will; which is clear from Rom. xiii. 4. He is called the Minister of God; he is but God's Servant. I need not say upon this; Kings and all others will acknowledge this Limitation.

“ 2. In regard of Laws, a King is sworn at his Coronation, to rule according to the standing, received Laws of the Kingdom. The Laws that he is sworn to, limit him that he cannot do against them, without a sinful Breach of this Covenant, between the King and the People.

“ 3. In regard of Government, the total Government is not upon a King; he hath a Council, a Parliament, or Estates, in the Land, who have in the Burthen of the Government. No King should have the sole Government. It was never the mind of God, who created a King to rule them, to lay all the Government upon him; to do what he pleases, without Controulment; nor is no Man able alone to govern all the Kingdom; nor not lay that upon one Man, and leave the Parliament, the Estates of the Land, are bound in this Contract, to bear a Burthen with him.

“ These Men who have flattered Kings, to take upon themselves an absolute Power, to do what they please, have wronged Kings, and Kingdoms. It had been good that Kings, of late, had carried themselves so, as in this Question of King's Power, might never have come in Debate, for they have been great Losers thereby. Kings are very desirous to have things spoken and written to hold up their arbitrary and unlimited Power, but that way doth exceedingly wrong them. There is one, a learned Man, I confess, who hath written a Book, for the Maintenance of the absolute Power of Kings, called De Regie, whereby he hath wronged himself in his Reputation, and the King in his Government. As for the Fact in taking away the Life of the late King (what ever was God's Justice in it) I do agree with him to condemn it, as a most unjust and horrid Fact upon Abie Per who did it: But when he cometh to speak of the Power of Kings in giving unto them an absolute and unlimited Power, using the damnable Maxim, Quod Libet licet, he will have a King to do what he pleases, and, without Controulment. In this I cannot but dissent from him.

“ In

A. D. 1666. the due Medium between those two Extremes.

Thus, either from Principle, or that Kind of Prejudice, arising from Education and Habit, which passes for Principle, this least exceptionable of English Ministers was led to believe, that, next to the restoring the King, it was his Duty, as well as his Interest, to restore the Church to all that Power, Splendor and Dignity, which it had been so long deprived of, by those who had introduced Cant and Hypocrisy, in the Places of Pomp and Luxury, and thereby brought Reformation itself into Contempt.

It is scarce necessary to insinuate, that the Reverend and Right Reverend Fathers very gladly embraced his Lordship's Patronage, and follow'd him like another Moses, who was to lead them out of the Desert into the Land of Canaan: For it is evident from their whole Story, that when Profit and Preference are in view, there is no need to compel them to come in.

But, if the Chancellor was necessary to them, it must be own'd likewise, that they were of Consequence to him: Of the two Parties he had to struggle with, one was in Favour at Court, and the other had still an Interest in the Army and the People: One he was secretly endeavouring to ruin, and the other was, as secretly, endeavouring to ruin him; and, by the Strength of the Church, he hop'd to master both.

Tho' the King was too much a Libertine to encroach any Scruples about Religion, that of Rome had such a Variety of Opinions for a troubled Conscience, and was, besides, so favourable to his darling Schemes of Government, that he found it the most convenient for him of any, on this Side Turkey. The Roman Catholics, therefore, had very good Reason to expect Favour and Indulgence at least, under his Dominion; more especially, supported as they were by the Duke of York, the Queen Mother, and the Earl of Bristol, who was a Man of quick Parts, but violent Passions; much in Favour with the King, tho' an avowed Enemy to the Lord Clarendon; and more capable, perhaps, to embroil than serve a State.

But Princes are directed rather by Policy

A. D. 1666. than Inclination; and Charles could not prevail upon himself to risk his present Kingdom here on Earth, for that of Heaven in Reversion.

Thus we find him very gracious to the Presbyterian Ministers at Breda, who were then thought to have the greatest Influence on the People; restoring the Common Prayer at Canterbury, to gratify the Cavaliers; and, at Whitehall taking the Papists into his Bosom.

But, tho' outside Shew serves to dazzle those who regard Outside only, it will not convince those who carry their Enquiries to the Heart. Thus we learn, that, even in these early Days, the King's Professions did not impose upon all his Subjects: On the contrary, it appears, that the prophetic (y) Inscription, which was plac'd under the Statue of the Duke of York, the Day of the King's triumphant Entry into London, was by some as shrewdly commented upon then, as it hath been clearly illustrated since.

Those Times, indeed, would scarce suffer Truth either to be spoke or heard; intemperate Loyalty made way for unreasonable Credulity: Till the Court thought fit to lay aside the Mask, the Herd would not be persuaded it had any ill Designs to cover. And yet, so much Awe and Terror had the late Efforts of the People left both on the King and his Ministers, that they thought it their safest and wisest Course to undermine the Constitution by Degrees, rather than attempt to carry it by Storm.

By the Quotation, already made from Lord Clarendon, we are authorized to conclude, that, instead of any longer contending with Parliaments, it was, for the present, resolv'd to enter into a Confederacy with them, and to carry Court Points by the Authority of the People. As therefore the present Parliament was still necessary, it was found necessary likewise, to suit the Ministry to the Parliament, till the Parliament could be made to suit the Ministry.

Accordingly, as the Convention was compos'd of Presbyterians, as well as Episcopalian, it was found expedient to admit the Leaders of that Party into the (z) Privy Council, and make them Sharers with his Majesty in the (a) Emoluments of his Restoration.

Some

" In regard of Subordination, some say, that a King is comble to none but God. Do what he will, the God take Order with it: this teacheth Kings to Absolm
" Let them do what they please, and take God to their own Hand. In regard of Laws, they teach nothing to King but Tyranny: And in regard of Government, they teach a King to take an arbitrary Power to himself to do what he pleaseth without Contrivement. How dangerous this hath been to Kings, is clear by sad Experience.
" Abuse of Power, and arbitrary Government, hath been one of God's great Controversies with our King's Predecessors; God in his Justice, because Power hath been abus'd, hath thrown it out of their Hands:—And I may confidently say, That God's Controversy with the Kings of the Earth, is for their arbitrary and tyrannical Government.

" It is good for our King to learn to be wise in this Time, and know that he repossess this Day a Power to govern; but a Power limited by Contract; and their Conditions in it bound by Oath to stand to. Kings are deceived, who think that the People are ordained for the King, and not the King for the People: The Scripture sheweth the contrary, Rom. xiii. 4. The King is the Minister of God for the People's Good. God will not have " a King in an arbitrary Way, to encroach upon the Possessions of Subjects, Ezek. xv. 7, 8. A Parton supplanteth the King for the Prince. And it is said, My Prince shall be as more against my People: And the rest of the Land shall be given unto the House of Israel, according to their Tribes.

" The King hath his distinct Possessions and Revenues from the People; he must not oppress and do what he pleaseth. There must be no Tyranny upon the Throne, &c."

A. D. 1660.

Some of their (b) Ministers were likewise nominated to be Chaplains in ordinary to his Majesty: But this Part of the State-Farce was play'd foill, that (c) Sharp, (then the Agent here for the Brethren of Scotland, and who afterwards apostatiz'd for the Sake of the Archbishopric of St. Andrews) in three Days after the King's Return, saw Room to conclude, that the Presbyterian Cause was wholly given up and lost: Which will serve to shew, that when the Bell-weather of a Party have made their own Market, they leave the Flock to shift for themselves.

The same Day that the Privy Council was settled, viz. May 30. a Proclamation was set forth, against vicious, debauched and profane Persons; which is not here taken Notice of on Account of the Reproaches it contains against the drunken Roarers for Church and King of those Times, but for the following Passage, in which we have a modest Hint, that his Majesty had something farther in View, than the mere Possession of his Throne:

"We hope, that this extraordinary Way
"of delivering us all from all we fear'd, and "ALMOST bringing us to all we can reason"ably hope, hath and will work upon the "Hearts." &c.

By the Word ALMOST, not only the two Houses, but the whole Nation was given to understand, that the King had still other Points to carry; and we shall be made sensible, in due time, that he was not only well understood, but as well obey'd.

Proceedings of Parliament.

The House of Commons ought to be purely and entirely the Representative of the People, Undertakers for the Crown have long had Seats among them; who act uniformly and avowedly in their last Capacity, and never in their first; and, instead of thinking this Sort of Behaviour inconsistent with the Duty of a Representative, or dangerous to Privilege, the House appears to have conniv'd at it, for Time immemorial.

Thus, even in this Parliament, which was return'd by the People, by virtue of their own Power, and in their own Right, without the Ceremonial of a Writ from the Crown, these foen shew'd themselves, and were often permitted to give what Bias to the House they pleas'd.

To sum up the whole State of Things in few Words: The King made Pleasure his Business, and lent his Ear to all who had a Share in his Heart. Tho' Hyde presided in his Cabinet (where he had the Marquis of Ormond, the Earl of Southampton, and Secretary Nicholas for his firm Supports) he was not always able to manage it: Of both Parliament and Army Mont was still in a manner the Master: And, in all, Cavalier and Presbyterian united to fetter the People, and let loose the Prerogative; the Lust not being as yet aware, that, by the same Methods they took to strengthen and oblige the King, they were doing their best to destroy themselves.

The first joint Act of the whole Legislature, after his Majesty's Return, was to declare, by Bill, that the Great Parliament, begun November 3. 16 Car. I. was fully dissolved and determined; and that the Lords and Commons, then sitting, were the Two Houses of Parliament; with these two remarkable Provisions, That this present Parliament may be dissolved by his Majesty, after the usual Manner; and, That his Majesty's Royal Assent to this Bill shall not determine this present Session.

If this Instrument gave Ease to the King, and Authority to the Parliament, it likewise shew'd they had still some Diffidence of each other: Which is further manifested by the scanty Supply first granted by the Commons, consisting of no more than Seventy thousand Pounds a Month, for three Months.

In managing and bridling the Army, however, they co-operated with the Court very sincerely; for they made an Order, that the Lord General be desired to take effectual Care to administer the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all the Officers and Soldiers: Which was punctually comply'd with, and, at the same time, Advantage was taken to remove several Colonels and others, and to assign their Commands to such of the Nobility and Gentry as were more thoroughly devoted to the new Establishment.

Having thus provided for his Majesty's Safety, these Guardians and Keepers of the Liberties of England thought it advisable in the next Place to take care of their own: Accordingly, the whole (d) House, with the Speaker at their Head, proceeded in Person to Whitehall; where, at a Postchamber of the Throne, both for them, and in the Name and on the Behalf of the whole Nation, they made Confession of the Crime and Guilt they had contracted by the late unnatural Rebellion; and most cautiously held hold of his Majesty's most graciously (e) Pardon.

Sir Edward Hyde (afterwards Earl of Clerkenwell) was continued Lord High Chancellor of England. The Earl of Southampton, Lord High Treasurer of England. Sir Edward Nicholas and Sir William Morris, chief Secretaries of State. The Marquis of Ormond was appointed Lord Steward, and the Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain to his Majesty's Household. Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treasurer to the Household; and Sir Charles Barkley, Comptroller; and Sir George Goring, Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, and afterwards Treasurer of the Navy.

(e) It is, however, to be observed, that when one Mr. Lenthall (perhaps he that was Speaker to the great Parliament) going to sit into the new-raid Spirit of Loyalty, as to try in the House, He that first drew his Sword against the late King, committed to great an Offence, as he that cut off his Head, it kindled such a Flame of Retentment, that he was immediately ordered into Custody of the Sergeant at Arms, and by Order of the House, received at the Bar, the following Reprimand from the Speaker:

"Sir, The House has taken very great Offence at some Words you have let fall upon the Debate of this Bill of Indemnity which in the Judgment of the House, contain as high a Reflection on the Justice and Precedence of the Lords and Commons of the last Parliament, as their acting before 1648, as could be expressed. They apprehend there is much of Poison in the said Words; and that they were spoken out of design to inflame, and to render them who draw the Sword to bring Believers to Punishment, and to vindicate their just Liberty."

A.D. 1660.

What a Spectacle! what a Triumph to the Prince! what a Humiliation to the People! who had drawn the Sword in defence of their Liberties; and, who, when made sensible they had only chang'd the Mode of Tyranny, by an Act of their own, restor'd the Constitution?

But all this Incense to this new Divinity would not appease him, without a Sacrifice. Tho' the King had Mercy on his Lips, he had a Reserve of Rigour in his Heart: And no doubt it was a Stroke of true Policy, to make the Parliament earn their own Pardon, by passing Sentence on their Confederates.

The Commons, however, at first did not appear to be over eager to shed Blood; but seemingly contented themselves with expecting Seven of the late King's Judges out of the (f) Act of Indemnity; together with Coke the Solicitor, Broughton the Clerk, and Dundy the Sergeant at Arms, to the High Court of Justice. Which Shew of Lenity, being also accompanied with a Proclamation, set forth at the Instance of both Houses, requiring all the Persons who either had acted in that Capacity, or assisted at the Trial, to surrender in Fourteen Days, had such an Effect, that Nineteen of those Delinquents came in voluntarily, on the Presumption, That the Bitterness of Death was past: But (g) Nineteen more, who distrust'd the Snare, made their Escape.

The Court, having now so many of these obnoxious Men at their Heels, they appointed up their Agents in the House of Commons, to make their Sin-offering somewhat more ample, in order to make it more acceptable: Which they had the Complaisance to do, under this extraordinary Form (i):

" Resolved,
 " That no more than Twenty, besides such " as are already excepted, or who late as
 " Judges upon the late King, shall be ex" cepted out of the general Act of Pardon
 " and Oblivion, to suffer such Penalties and " Forfeitures, not extending to Life, as shall " be thought fit to be inflicted on them, by " an Act to pass for that Purpose."

After which, having receiv'd a Message from his Majesty, signifying, That he could neither dislike what they had done, nor complain of what they had left (k) UNDONE, and recommending to them the passing that most necessary Act with all imaginable Expedition; they made short Work with the Bill, and sent it up to the Lords.

Tho' the tender Mercies of the Wicked are said to be Cruelty, it must be acknowledg'd, the Commons acted with rather more Moderation than the Lords; who being newly restor'd to the Exercise of their Authority, seem'd dispos'd to make it felt, and to avenge their own Quarrel in that of the King's.

Accordingly, they proceeded first to (l) except one of the King's Judges for every Lord they had put to death; the Nomination of the Person to be excepted being left to the Lord who was nearest in Blood to the Person who had suffer'd: They next discover'd an Intention to except all the King's Judges; and the Earl of Beiliff in particular, in a Speech, which he afterwards caus'd to be printed, desir'd, that the Act might pass with the Exception only of those who had a Hand in the Death of the King, who, he mov'd, might be more particularly describ'd in another Bill, to be drawn for that Purpose.

But this exciting an universal Apprehension without-doors, that so wide an Exception as this would defeat the Intent and Meaning of the Act itself, it did not take Effect; on the contrary, the King was advis'd to address their Lordships in Person, to contract their Views to the immediate Murderers of his Father, and dispatch the Bill. Accordingly he made a Speech to that Effect in the House of Peers, in which perhaps he trespass'd on the Privilege of Parliament, by taking notice of Matters yet depending in the House, and suffer'd the following (m) Paragraph to escape, which is liable to an (n) Interpretation, that does very little Honour to the Throne:

" If any Persons appear of such dangerous
 " and obstinate Principles, that the Peace of " Disaffection appealing to God, and their Consciences

 " Person, much less against his Life. I therefore I am " commanded to let you know, that had these Words
 " fallen out at any other Time in this Parliament, but " when they had Considerations of Mercy, Pardon and In" demnity, you might have expected a sharper and feverer
 " Sentence than I am now to pronounce. But the Dispo" sition of his Majesty is to Mercy: he hath invited his " People to accept of it: and it is the Disposition of the " Body of this House to be Hearers of Beaches, and to " hold forth Mercy to Men of all Conditions, so far as may " stand with Justice and Justification of themselves before
 " God and Man. I am therefore commanded to let you know,

 " fore take of Mercy: Yet I am according to Command,
 " to give you a sharp Reprehension, and I do as sharply, and
 " severely as I can, reprimand you for it."

(f) In preparing this Bill, the Commons proceeded with all " Tenderness and Caution, especially with relation to the late Civil " War; in which they were very unwilling totally to condemn " the Parliament's Part in it. This particularly appeared in the " Treatment they gave to Mr. Lechford as mentioned in the " Note immediately preceding: Richard.

(m) This Paragraph is quoted partially by Ladlow, and in " some Copies of this Speech, is wholly omitted. There is " likewise another Paragraph in this Speech (the 12th) which is
 " blur'd over by Richard, but must not be omitted here. It " was this:

" I hope I need by nothing of Ireland, and that they " shall not be without the Benefit of my Mercy: They " have shew'd much Affection to me abroad: And you " will have a Care of my Honour, and of what I have pro" mised to them." Thus expressing, says Ladlow, the same
 " Zeal, in the latter Part of his Speech, for the bloody Irish " Rebels, as he had done in the former, against those who had
 " dar'd to defend the Liberties of England. And by this " means the Irish grew to that Confidence, that one Frazer
 " publicly affirmed in Westminster-hall, That they were the " best Subjects the King had; and for that Reason should be " soon restor'd to the Possession of their Lands: of which the " House being informed, they committed him to the Garret
 " house; but after two Days, he was by the Prevalency of the " Court restor'd from his Imprisonment.

(n) That his Intentions were not to be guided by the " Directions of the Law, but that he had some secret Re" serves to render the Act of Indemnity insignificant. Lad-
 " low, vol. iii. p. 39.

A. D. 1660.

"the Kingdom cannot be preserv'd while they are in it, some other Course may be taken, that they shall not be able to do Hurt. And, I assure you, there is nothing can enable them to do so much Harm, as the deferring the passing this ACT."

But, however earnest the King seem'd in this Affair, their Lordships chose to act as if what he had said was rather the Dictate of Policy than Inclination: Accordingly they gave his Majesty to understand, that the (6) Bill, as fram'd by the Commons, was injurious to the Rights and Demands of the Crown; of which both a dextrous and truly Royal Use was made, in (p) a Message from the King, by way of Answer, signifying, that his Majesty very well knew the Value of the Concessions he was to make; but that he was satisfi'd the Commons would not let him be a Sufferer on account of his Generosity. Their Lordships next insisted, that none of the King's Judges ought to be spar'd. This drew on a Conference between the two Houses, in which the Commons endeavour'd to make a Difference in favour of those who surrender'd themselves on the Faith of the Proclamation: But the (q) Lords were strenuous to shew no Mercy; and, after several Free (r) Conferences, the tender-hearted Commons suffer'd them to have their Way.

Nor, after all, were the Exceptions con-find to the King's Judges only: For Vane, Lambert, and Peters, tho' not of that Number, were nevertheless wholly and expressly excepted and surpris'd.

We have here a (s) Brief of this complicated Affair, and from thence may gather, how admirably well advis'd the King was, to leave his Vengeance in the Hands of the Parliament.

When therefore his Majesty plac'd such a Confidence in the House of Commons, with regard to his Revenue, it might be presum'd he had very good Grounds for that Proceeding; nor was he wholly deceiv'd; for, while the Act of Indemnity was yet depending, they made some Progress in that acceptable Work, by a Grant of the (t) Tonnage and Poundage Gift of Tonnage and Poundage for Life, and a Continuation of the (u) Excise till August, the 20th 1660; which two Bills receiv'd the Royal Assent July 28; having been presented to his Majesty by the Speaker, Sir Harbottle Grimston, with a short Speech to this Effect, which deserves the Consideration of Posterity:

"(v) That it was NEVER the Course of Parliaments to charge the People with Payments, until their Liberties and Grievances were FIRST confirm'd and redress'd; yet, out of the greatest Trust and Confidence that ever Subjects had in a Prince, the House of Commons do now go out of their OLD WAY, and have now supply'd

(s) Alluding to the 5th Clause, in which all Persons are discharged against the King and his Heirs of all Sums of Money, Intensions, mean Profits, Wardships, Marriages, Reliefs, Liveries, Ouster le Main, mean Rates, Respite of Homage, Fines and Seizures for Alienations without License, Arrests of Rents, of Tenth and first Fruits, &c.

(t) The Message itself was as follows: "His Majesty is very well inform'd in these Concessions which are to make in the Act of Indemnity. He knows very well that the Arrests of the Wards, the Licenses of Alienation, and Alienations without License, Parveyance, Respite of Homage, the Arrears of Rent, still in the Hands of the Tenants, and the other Particulars, amount to a great and vast Sum, all which are released and discharged by this Act. But his Majesty is so well satisfied of the good Affections of the House of Commons, and of their Intentions and Resolutions to settle such a Revenue upon his Majesty, as may preserve the Crown from Want, and from being undervalued by his Neighbours, that he is resolv'd not to insist upon the Particulars which the House of Commons have desired his Majesty should release." To this Message the Author of the full Account of the Revolution, has added the following Remarks: "The Arrears of these and other Parts of this Revenue given up in that Act, amounted in the Course of so many Years, (according to the Estimate made of King Charles I's Revenue, which descended to his Son, in Sir Henning Field's Report from the Committee appointed to enquire into it by this Parliament, as it appears on the Journal of Sept. 4.) to above twelve Millions Sterling, an immense Sum, which few Princes but King Charles II. could desire for the Ease and Satisfaction of their People. P. 66, 67.

(u) Yet the East of Southampton had the Courage to move, That since it was not thought fit to secure the Lives of those who had been induc'd to surrender their Persons upon the Faith of the Proclamation, they ought, at least, to give them the like Number of Days for saving themselves, as were appointed by that Paper for their coming in; But Finch, who had formerly shewn the Justice of the Parliament, oppos'd that Motion, and said, That by such Means they might be enabled to do more Mischief (as he knew had happened in his own Case). Ladlow, vol. iii. p. 43.

(v) In the last of which the Lord Chancellor took Occasion to speak of the King's Affection to his People, by a very remarkable Instance, saying, that he being employ'd in an Embassy to Spain, had W. BERTIE given him in Charge by his Majesty, to serve and advise, that the Lord Marble, of his Royal Father's was one of the Act of the Parliament of People of England, but of a very servile and little Company of Ministers in the Kingdom. Which was to pleading to the House of Commons, that upon the Report of it to them, they order'd such of the Privy Council, as were Members of that House, to present to his Majesty the humble and thankful Sense they had of his Justice and Favour, for that just Defence he had been graciously pleas'd to make in Behalf of the Parliament and People of England. Philips, Kennet.

(s) Sir Henry Pass, and Major General Lambert, were excus'd for Life and Estate, with this Reserve, That if, upon Trial, they should be found guilty, the two Houses were then to join in a Petition to the King for the Pardon of their Lives. Ladlow.

A. D. 1660. "ply'd his Majesty's Necessities with the "GREATEST GIFT that ever Prince of this
"Kingdom had given by his People."

But this Concession, however considerable in itself, or pompously set forth by the Speaker, did not come up to the Expectations, nor perhaps the Necessities, of the Court. They were therefore put in mind of the Prerogative, and prepar'd to expect a speedy Prorogation: But his Majesty being made sensible by the (w) House, that if he put an end to the Session, he would thereby lose several important Bills, especially that for disbanding the still formidable Army, he was prevail'd upon to compromise the Matter, and accept of a Receipt by the old Way of Adjournment.

This Hint of the Royal Pleasure was however receiv'd with all imaginable Complaisance by the House; and on the 29th of August following, the Fruits of it became manifest; for these important Bills being then perfected, and the King seated upon his Throne, the Speakers, at the Head of the Commons, presented them for the Royal Assent, with the following introductory Speech, which very sufficiently shews, what an Alteration the Times had already undergone:

"(x) Most Gracious Sovereign,

"Not many Months since, England was
"but a great Prison, where the worst of Men
"were our Governors, and their vilest Laws
"the Laws by which they governed.
"The great and most wise God, convey"ed divine Intelligence into your patient and
"pious Soul, and taught you how, by suf"fering for us, to deliver us from our Suf"ferings, to knock off our Shackles, and set
"your People at Liberty, when neither "Power, nor Policy could effect it. So "soon as your Majesty set your Foot upon "your English Shore, our Prison was turn"ed into a Paradise of Pleasure, and the "whole Nation fill'd with Joy, and Love,
"and Peace.

"Sir, This great Blessing is already regi-
"stred in your People's thankful Hearts;
"and they desire that the Memory thereof
"might be perpetuated; and therefore they "have laid it up amongst their choicest Jew"els, and annex it to their Magna Charta;
"which they are willing to pawn unto your "Majesty, upon Condition, when they for"get this, to forfeit that and all.

"Sir, among your many illustrious Titles,
"which like fair and beautiful Flowers, do
"adorn and bedeck your Royal Crown,
"there's one exceeds and excels all the rest,
"as well in Virtue as in Beauty, and that is
"your Title of Defender of the Faith. Sir,
"As that Title is your Honour, so the "Truth of it, is our Happiness. Neither

"the highest Provocations, nor the strongest "Temptations that ever Prince met withal,
"have been able to shake your victorious
"Faith, nor abate your holy Zeal; witness
"your first Act, after your Return to the "Exercise of your regal Power, in your early "and timely suppressing Prophaneness, and "discourteous debauched Persons, who "know not how to express their Thankful-
"ness unto God for Mercies, but by a sinful
"drinking them away; a Practice your
"(y) Soul abhors.

"And as it is your highest Honour, to be
"the Defender of that Faith which we pos"sess, so it is the greatest Interest, Prero"gative and Privilege your Majesty can be en"dowed and invested withal in this World,
"and will be your most lasting Comfort in
"the World to come, That God, who hath "hitherto been a Sun to direct you, will be "a Shield to protect you; and that Faith
"which you defend, will defend you against "all your Enemies, maugre the Malice of the "Devil, and all his wicked Instruments.

"Royal Sir, Your eminent Virtues, and "those excellent Qualifications that God hath "bestowed upon you, to make you every "way worthy and fit for Government, invites "us at this Time with joyful Hearts, to "make our humble Address unto your Ma"jesty, and to give you a cheerful Account of "our Proceedings this Parliament, wherein
"we have spent our whole Time upon Public
"Bills; Some, we must confess, of very great
"Concernment to your Majesty, and all "your People, are not yet ripe, nor brought "to Perfection: But though like an After-

"Some Bills are pass'd both Houses, and "already lodged here, which attend and "wait for your Majesty's Royal Assent, and "I shall humbly beg the Favour only but
"to touch upon some of those of most pub-“ pray, That not only we, (for there would “ need no Act for that so long as we live)

 “ but that our Posterity, and the Ages that “ shall succeed us, might for ever be obliged “ to set a-part that Day, as a Holy-day, to “ dedicate their Praises and Thanksgivings
 “ up unto Almighty God for his miraculous “ Deliverance of this poor Nation, when
 “ it lay in Dust and Ashes, in a most miser“ able, desperate, forlorn, and deplorable “ Condition.*

“ There is another Bill, entituled, An Act “ of Free and General Pardon, (a) Indem“ nity, and Oblivion. It may well be called “ a Free Pardon; for your Majesty was “ pleased to offer it before we had Confide“ nce enough to ask it, and at a Time
 “ when your People had most need of it.
 “ And it may as truly be called a General
 “ Pardon, in respect of the Extensiveness of it.
 “ But looking over a long, black, prodigious,
 “ dismal Roll and Catalogue of Mal-factors,
 “ we there meet not with Men, but Mon“ sters, guilty of Blood, precious Blood, “ precious royal Blood, never to be remembered “ without Tears; incomparable in all the “ kinds of Villany that ever were acted by
 “ the worst of Miscreants, Perverters of Reli“ gion, Subverters of Government, false to “ God, disloyal to the best of Kings, and per-“ fidious to their Country; and therefore we “ found an absolute and indispensable Nec“ cessity incumbent upon us, to except and “ set some apart for Treacle, to expel the “ Poison of Sin and Rebellion out of others,
 “ and that they might be made Sacrifices to “ appease God’s Wrath, and satisfy Divine “ Justice.

“ And now I am come to that Bill here
 “ in my Hand, which I am commanded “ humbly to present your Majesty withal.”

“ Royal Sir, Your Commons, the Knights, “ Citizens and Burgeesses, now assembled in “ Parliament, taking into Consideration the “ great and unupportable Burden of the Ar“ mies and Navy, that your People do now “ groan under; and knowing, as Money is
 “ the Sinews of War, so, as the State of Af“ fairs now stand, that ‘tis likewise the best “ Medium that can be us’d, in order to the “ attaining that End we have all so much “ desir’d, and so long pray’d for, The Set“ tlement of a happy Peace; and there“ fore they have pass’d this Bill, entituled,
 “ An Act for a speedy (b) Provision “ of Money, to pay off and disband all the “ Forces of this Kingdom, both by Sea and “ Land: Upon which they hope such a “ Sum will be advanced and brought in, as “ may be sufficient fully to discharge and dis“ patch that Work. And they humbly pray
 “ your Majesty’s gracious Acceptance there-
 “ of, and your royal Assent thereunto.

“ I am further to inform and assure your “ Majesty, that your People have pass’d “ another Supply and Revenue unto your “ Majesty, which far surmounteth all they “ have done in Value, and that is, their “ Hearts and Affections; having their “ Hearts, your Majesty may command their “ Purse.

“ Most Royal Sovereign, We have nothing “ more to offer, or to ask at this Time, but “ your Majesty’s gracious Favour, so soon as “ your Service, and the Public Affairs will “ permit, that we might have leave to go “ into our Countries, where we shall make “ our People sensible of their Happiness, in “ having such a King to govern and rule
 “ over them; and as we praise your Ma“ jesty, so likewise to pray for your Ma“ jesty, that you may live long, and reign pro“ sperously.”

“ But if the House was all Loyalty, the King
 “ was all Grace; and if the first again stood
 “ in awe of the Prerogative, the last, as yet, “ esteem’d it his Interest to be well with his “ Parliament and People; so may be gathered “ from the following gracious Speech, which “ deserves a Place, that the Character of the “ King, and the Spirit of his Reign, may be
 “ the more thoroughly understood.

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of “ Commons,

“ I have been here sometimes before with “ you, but never with more Willingness,
 “ than

(a) Being the most memorable Birth-Day, not only of his Majesty, both as a Man and a Prince, but likewise as an actual King, of this and other his Majesty’s Kingdoms; all in a great Measure new-born, and raised from the Dead, on this most joyful Day, wherein many Thousands of the Nobility, Gentry, Citizens, and other his Leiges of this Realm, conducted his Majesty unto his Royal Cities of London and Westminster, with all possible Expressions of their public Joy and loyal Affection, in far greater Triumph, than any of his most illustrious Predecessors Kings of England, returned thither from their Foreign Conquests: And both his Majesty’s Houses of Parliament, with all dutiful and loyal Demonstrations of their Allegiance, publicly received, and cordially congratulated his Majesty’s most happy Arrival and Investiture in his Royal Throne at his Palace at Whitehall. Bill, for observing the Twenty-ninth of May.

(b) Which was wittily call’d by the suffering Cavaliers, A Bill of Oblivion for the King’s Friends, and of Indemnity for his Enemies.

A. D. 1660.

" that I am at this Time. And there be " few Men in the Kingdom, who have " longed more impatiently to have those
 " Bills passed, than I have done to pass
 " them; and I hope they will be the Founda" tion of much Security and Happiness to " us all.

" I do very willingly pardon all that is " pardoned by this Act of Indemnity, to
 " that Time which is mentioned in the Bill:
 " Nay, I will tell you, that from that Time
 " to this Day, I will not use great Severity,
 " except in such Cases where the Malice is " notorious, and the public Peace exceed" ingly concerned: But for the Time to " come, the same Discretion and Conscience
 " which disposed me to the Clemency I " have expressed, which is most agreeable
 " to my Nature, will oblige me to all Ri-" gour and Severity, how contrary soever it
 " be to my Nature, towards those who shall " not now acquiesce, but continue to mani" fest Sedition and Dislike of the Govern" ment either by Action or Words.

" And I must conjure you all, (*my Lords
 " and Gentlemen*) to concur with me in this
 " just and necessary Severity; and that you " will in your several Stations be so jealous
 " of the public Peace, and of my particular " Honour, that you will cause exemplary " Justice to be done upon those who are " guilty of seditious Speeches or Writings, as " well as those who break out into seditious
 " Actions: And that you will believe those " who delight in reproaching and traducing
 " my Person, not to be well affected to you " and the public Peace.

" Never King valued himself more upon
 " the Affections of his People than I do;
 " nor do I know a better Way to make my " self sure of your Affections, than by being
 " just and kind to you all: and whilst I am
 " so, I pray let the World see that I am pos" sessed of your Affections.

" For your Poll Bill, I do thank you as " much as if the Money were to come into
 " my own Coffers: And I wish with all my " Heart that it may amount to as great a " Sum as you reckon upon. If the Work
 " be well and orderly done to which it is " designed, I am sure I shall be richer by
 " it in the end; and upon my Word, if " I had where-withal, I would myself help you;
 " so much I desire the Business done.

" I pray very earnestly, as fast as Money " comes in, discharge that great Burthen of " the Navy, and disband the Army as fast as " you can; and till you can disband the rest,
 " make a Provision for their Support. I do
 " conjure you, as you love me, let me not " hear the Noise of free Quarter, which will " be imputed to my Want of Care and Go" vernment, how innocent soever I am; and

 " therefore be sure you prevent it.

" I am so confident of your Affections,
 " that I will not move you in any Thing that " immediately relates to myself; and yet I " must tell you, that I am not richer, than is,
 " I have not so much Money in my Purse,
 " as when I came to you: The Truth is,
 " I have lived principally ever since, upon
 " what I brought with me; which was in" deed your Money, for you sent it to me, and " I thank you for it. The weekly Expence
 " of the Navy eats up all you have given me
 " by the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage:
 " Nor have I been able to give my (e) Bro" thers one Shilling since I came into Eng" land, nor to keep any Table in my Houle,
 " but what I eat at myself: And that which
 " troubles me most is, to see so many of you " come to me at Whitehall, and to think
 " you must go somewhere else to seek your " Dinner.

" I do not mention this to you as any " Thing that troubles me; do but take care " of the Public, and for what is necessary " for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom,
 " and take your own Time for my own Partic" ular, which I am sure you will provide " for with as much Affection and Frankness
 " as I can desire.

We are now to look back to the Concerns of Religion; which, however independent of those of the State, have been so crassly and fatally intermingled, that it is scarce possible to treat of the one, without touching upon the other.

The King, in his Declaration from Breda, had expressly promis'd Liberty to tender Con-sciences: But, though this Toleration was sufficient to humour the inferior Sectaries, the Episcopalians and Presbyterians aspir'd at an Establishment, which Both equally thought their Due. The First had been once in Possession, had the Laws for their Foundation, and the King for their Head: The Last were in Possession, which they were very desirous to keep, had Friends in the Court, the Army, and the Parliament; and had, beside, the Merit of their late Services to plead, which had contributed greatly to the King's Restoration. Both (d) had, in turn, abus'd the Power which had fallen into their Hands; and therefore neither in Policy or Equity ought to have been trusted with any again.

But tho' the Presbyterians were still too mighty to be openly disobligh'd, they were not mighty enough to continue their Superiority: As the King was apparently against them,

A. D. 1660.

(d) This serv'd as a Hint to the House, to compliment the Duke of York with Ten Thousand Pounds, and the Duke of Gloucester (who dyed upon the 13th of the next Month, September, of the Small Pox), with Seven Thousand Pounds.

(e) See, among other incontestable Proofs of this fatal Truth, the shocking Cases of Peys, Bapwick, and Barrow under the Tyranny of Archbishop Laud: And with respect to the Conduct of the Presbyterians, when uppermost; not only the Episcopalians and Papists, but the Sectaries of all sorts, as with one Voice, complain'd of their severe and unjust Proceedings. A Writer of the Church of England, in a Discourse of Toleration, particularly charges them "with

 " Sequestering, Plundering and Imprisonment in the nastiest
 " Prison and Holds of Ships, those Ministers and Fellows
 " of Colleges that were the Adherents of the Liturgy, &c."
 And George Fox the Quaker, in his Journal, speaking of the Execution of the Repetitor, saith, "There was a secret
 " Hand in bringing this Day upon that hypocritical Gene" ration of Pretorsion, who being got into Power, grew " haughty and cruel beyond others, and persecuteth the " People of God without Pity."

them, they found it difficult to make their Friends act heartily for them. On the House of Commons they had plac'd their principal Dependence; and even there, the Ground sunk from under them: For tho' the Majority would not then suffer Episcopacy to be restor'd in Form, they would not undertake the full and entire Settlement of the Church; but, after long and warm (e) Debates, July (f) 23, deferred the further Consideration of Religious Matters till the 23d of October; which was, in effect, betraying the Cause they pretended to defend; and leaving the Decision in those Hands, which, they were sure, waited only for an Opportunity to give another Lift to Monarchy, by adding the Influence of the Mitre to the Power of the Crown.

Accordingly, while the two Houses were yet sitting, the King, by his Royal Authority, restor'd the nine surviving Bishops to their several Sees, and came to a Resolution to fill up the Vacancies.

Nor, in taking this large Stride, did his Majesty run any great Risk of coming to a Breach with the Commons; for they had already given him such Proofs of their Ductility, and Submission to his good Pleasure, as were sufficient to remove all reasonable Apprehensions of that Nature.

But while they conniv'd at this notable Proceeding of the King's, they had however the Address to sweeten their own Party, by preparing and passing a Bill for confirming and restoring all such Ministers who had been ordained by any ecclesiastical Person, before the preceding Christmas, or who had not renounced their Ordination, or who stood possessed of any Living at that time, to which they had been nam'd or admitted in any manner since Jan. 1. 1642; with Proviso against such as had petition'd to bring the late King to Trial, or by Preaching or Writing justifi'd his Murder, or had declar'd their Judgment to be against Infant Baptism.

His Majesty, on the other hand, was pleas'd to signify, by (g) Message, his "gracious Intentions to take in and provide for such Ministers as were worthy, and every way qualified for the Work of the Ministry, who should be remov'd from their Livings by this Act." And Mr. Amsley, afterwards Earl of Anglesea, and Lord Privy Seal, was appointed by the House to carry up this Bill to the Lords, with Direction to intimate to their Lordships, "(b) That they look'd upon it as a Bill of public Concernment, for quieting Men in their Possessions, and for preventing of Suits." And the Lords not making the Expedition which was thought necessary, a further Message was, a few Days after, sent by the Commons, to let their Lordships know, "That the Counties were much disquieted, by reason of so many good Ministers, who had been ejected; and, therefore, desiring their Lordships to give Dispatch to the Bill," &c.

There is no need to trace the Particulars of this Affair any further: Their Lordships soon after gave their Sanction to it; and the Commons having put the last Hand to the Business immediately before them, the King came propos'd by the Commons.

Bill for confirming and restoring Ministers.

(r) While the Hopes and Fears of these holy Men on both Sides, were thus in Suspence, one Doctor Crofts, preaching before the King, took the License to say, That for the Guilt he had contracted in Wars, and the Injuries he was brought to do against the Church of England, God had deserv'd him at Worcester, and punish'd his Controversy with a nine Years Exile; and he would yet further punish him, if he did close with his Enemies; meaning those of the Presbyterian Persuasion, who were of the Privy Council. Rev. Reg.

On the other Hand, the following strange Stuff was published by some enthusiastic Presbyterians:

"I shall now acquaint you with some remarkable Things fallen out here with us. As first, the first Man that read Prayers in this University since this Change, the Lord hath cut him off; and also he was the last that read Prayers in the University in the Time of War. The first Man also that read Prayers at Wadham College, is also cut off: A very notorious Man.

"Also there was a Play acted by Scholars, wherein one called the Old Puritan: he that acted that Part, came in with a narrow Band, short Hair, and a broad Hat: a boisterous Fellow comes after him, and tips up his Heels, calling him Puritan Regus: at which Words he flook off the Dirt off his Feet against him. Two of these Actors were also cut off; and he that acted the Old Puritan, broke a Vein, and vomited so much Blood in the Place, that they thought he would have died in the Room; but he now lieth desperately sick. A Woman that joined with them in the Play, is also dead.

"Also a Scholar of Pembroke College, who had become paralytic to Town to see Dr. Large outed, and then he would give a Plate to the College: He was invited to Dinner by a Scholar, and never went out of the Room more, but died there.

"Also from another in Oxford it was thus written July 30. We had a Play acted in the University against the Puritans, the chief Actors therein, were Mr. Dall of Wadham, who died yesterday, and one Glandall of Braurton, who is now dead, &c. Ibid.

Neither, in the mean while, were the Papists unmindful of the Interests of their Church, as we find by the following Piece:

The Letter of Advice and Injunctions given to Father Young, an English Missionary, by Signor Bellarmin, an Italian Minister, concerning the best Way of ministering and promoting the Catholic Interest in England upon his Majesty's Request.

"I. To make the Obstruction of Settlement their great Design, especially upon the fundamental Constitutions of the Kingdom, whereunto, if Things should fall, they would be more firm than ever.

"II. To remove the Jealousies raised by Prie, Baxter, &c. of the Catholic's Design upon the two Factions, and to set up the prosperous Way of Fear and Jealousy to the King and Bishops.

"III. To make it appear undeniable, how near the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Church of England comes to us: at how little Distance the Common Prayer is from our Mass; and that the shill not be so far from the Way are to moderate, that they would willingly come down to us, or at least meet us half way. Hereby the more seditious Men will become more odious, and others will run out of all Religion for Fear of Popery.

"IV. Let there be an Intelligence promoted by the Faction, and seconded by you.

"V. That the Trade and Treasure of the Nation may be engrossed between themselves, and other discontented Parties.

"VI. That the Bishops and Ministers of the Church of England be asper'd, as either worldly and careless on the one hand, or so faithless on the other, that it were well they were removed.

N. B. This Letter was found in Father Young's Study after his Death, and was translated out of Italian, and printed in a Collection, &c. These (saith Dr. Stillingfleet) were some of those excellent Advices then given, and how well they have been followed, we all know, &c. Stillingfleet's Unreasonableness of Separation.

(s) Previous to this, they had however, pass'd a Vote which was presented to the King by Mr. D. Hilditch, in which they desired his Majesty to call in a Number of Dissidents as he should think fit to advise with in Affairs of Religion.

came to the House of Peers, to give the Royal Assent to such (i) Bills as were presented to him; which were thus introduc'd by the (k) Speaker:

" Sir,

Your Royal Favour and Fatherly Kindness unto your People hath naturaliz'd their Affections to your Person, and their Obedience to your Precepts: And as it is their Duty, so it is their Desire to manifest the Truth and Reality thereof, by supporting and upholding that Grandeur and Splendor which is due to the Majesty of so meritorious a Prince as yourself. And therefore they have resolv'd, uno flatu and remine contradicente, to make up your Majesty's constant and ordinary Revenue Twelve hundred thousand Pounds per Annum."

He then proceeded with an Account of the several Bills, and concluded as follows:

" Sir, There is another Bill, intituled, An Act for retaining some Ministers into their Places, out of which they have been long and injuriously ejected and expos'd; and for confirming others in vacant Places. Crazy Titles need your Majesty's Help, as much as crazy Bodies need the Help of a Physician. And (by) what your Majesty hath already done of that kind to this Parliament, and what you are now about to do, and what you have ever express'd your Resolutions in, if we could be ready (to take) as your Majesty is to give hope to himself all Errors and Jealousies out of Mens Minds for the future, and teach them with much Confidence and Contentedness to rest and wholly rely upon your Majesty's Grace and Goodness, for what may be thought further necessary to be done hereafter, when a fitting Opportunity shall be offer'd at the next Meeting of your Houses of Parliament, &c."

His Majesty's (l) Speech was as follows:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

If my Presence here, had not been requisite for the Passing of these many Bills, I did always intend to see you together before your Adjournment, that I might again thank you for the many good Things you have done for me and the Kingdom; and in truth I do thank you more for what you have done for the Public, than what you have done for my own Particular; and yet I do thank you too for that with all my Heart: But I confess to you, I do thank you more for the Provision you have made to prevent free Quarter, during the Time the Army shall be disbanding, which I take to be given for my Satisfaction, than I do for the other Present you have made me for my own particular Occasions; and I do promise you, which is the best Way I can take to gratify you, I will not apply one Penny of that Money to my own particular Occasions, what Shift soever I make, till it is evident to me, that the Public will not stand in need of it; and if it do, every Penny of it shall be disburs'd that Way; and I dare say I shall not be the poorer for it.

I cannot but take notice of one particular Bill I have pass'd, which may seem of an extraordinary Nature; that concerning the Duke of Somerset; but you all know it is for an extraordinary Person, who hath merited as much of the King my Father and myself, as a Subject can do; and I am none of those who think, that Subjects, by performing their Duties in an extraordinary Manner, do not oblige their Princes to reward them in an extraordinary Manner; there can be no Danger from such a Precedent; and I hope no Man will envy him, because I have done what a good Master should do to such a Servant:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

I will not deny to you, that I had some Inclination, when I consented, upon your Desire, to your Request, to have made a Session, which I thought most agreeable to the ancient Order of Parliaments; and I hope you will all join with me in reducing the Proceedings of Parliaments to the ancient Rules and Orders of Parliaments, the Deviation from which has done us no Good; and I think there were never so many Bills pass'd together, as I have this Day given my Assent to, without a Session: But upon the Desire and Reasons given by the House of Commons, for an Adjournment without a Session, I did very willingly depart from that Inclination, and do as willingly give you Leave, and direct you, that you adjourn yourselves till the sixth Day of November, when I hope you will all meet again; and, in the mean time, that you will be all welcome to your Countries, and do me much Service there.

I have many other Particulars to say and recommend to you, in which I cannot

King's Speech.

(i) I. An Act for the speedy disbanding the Army and Garrisons of this Kingdom, with Instructions for the same.

II. An Act for enabling the Soldiers of the Army now to be disbanded to exercise Trade.

III. An Act for raising seven score thousand Pounds for the compleat disbanding of the Army.

IV. An Act for the speedy raising of seventy thousand Pounds for the present Supply of his Majesty. Note, The Speaker, in his Speech, calls the present Supply an Hundred thousand Pounds.

V. An Act for Confirming and Restoring of Ministers.

[Preamble] Forasmuch as the confirming of some ecclesiastical Persons and Ministers in Possession, and restoring of others who have been sequestered or ejected, and are fit to be so, to their several ecclesiastical Benefices, Livings, and Promotions, without Force or Suit of Law, will much conduce to the Peace and Welfare of this Church and Kingdom.]

VI. An Act for Encouraging and Increasing of Shipping and Navigation.

VII. An Act to prevent Frauds and Concomitants in his Majesty's Customs and Subsidies.

And to 14 private Acts; one of which was, An Act for the Restoring the Marquis of Hertford to the Dukedom of Somerset.

(l) I am very sensible that Speeches and Records are not the most entertaining Parts of History; but Trash must be prefer'd to Amusement. Chancellor's Speech.

" enough trust my (m) Memory, and therefore I shall command the Chancellor to say the rest to you."

As to the Chancellor's Speech, it was long, labour'd, and artificial; but contains some Particulars, which deserve to be remembered. In speaking of the Army, he mentions a Jealousy which had been entertain'd, that the King did not design to disband them, and from thence takes Occasion to say many fine Things, both of his Majesty and the Troops.

Upon the Minister's Bill, he was pleas'd to make the following broad Comment:

" The King having pass'd this Act very willingly, and done much to the End of this Act before; yet hath willingly admitted you to be Sharers and Partners with him in the Obligation: I may say confidently, his Majesty hath never denied his Confirmation to any Man in Possession who hath asked it, and they have all had the Effect of it, except such, who, upon Examination and Enquiry, appear'd not worthy of it; and such, who, though they are pardoned, cannot yet think themselves worthy to be prefer'd. His Majesty well knows, that by this Act he hath gratify'd and oblig'd many worthy and pious Men, who have contributed much to his Restoration, and who shall always receive fresh Evidence of his Majesty's Favour and Kindness; but he is not sure that he may not likewise have gratify'd some who did neither contribute to his coming in, nor are yet glad that he is in: How comes it else to pass, that he receives such frequent Information of seditious Sermons in the City and in the Country, in which all Industry is us'd to alienate the Affections of the People, and to insufe Jealousies into them of the King and his Government? They talk of introducing Papery, of evil Counsellors, and such other old Calumnies as are pardoned by this Act of Indemnity.

" His Majesty told you when he was last here, what Rigour and Severity he will hereafter use, how contrary forever it is to his Nature, in these Cases; and conjur'd you, My Lords and Gentlemen, to concur with him in this just and necessary Severity, which I am sure you will do with your utmost Vigilance, and that you will believe that too much Ill cannot befall those who do the best they can to corrupt his Majesty's Nature, and to extinguish his Mercy.

He then signified his Majesty's Intention to settle a Council for Trade, and another for the Plantations; as also to find out proper Expedients for the Confirmation of Sales, or Recompence for Purchasers: And concluded with some (n) affecting Particulars concerning the then deplorable State of Religion, which deserv'd abundantly more Notice and Regard than they seem to have met with.

Having thus seen the State in a fair way to be settled, we must now attend the farther Progress of the Settlement of the Church: The Seeds of Mischief never take so deep Root, nor thrive so full, as in Holy Ground: And in this Research we shall be able to detect, who were the Labourers that slept, and by whose wicked Hands the Tares were scatter'd, which have pester'd the Soil, and choak'd the Growth of every public Benefit, and every private Virtue.

Though the Presbyterian-Cause had been dropt by the House of Commons, into the Hands of the Court, it was not as yet thought advisable to shut up every Door of Hope against them at once, for fear of creating fresh Troubles.

Both the King and the Chancellor, therefore, put on the Guise of Moderation, and seem'd desirous, by the Means of some happy Medium, to remove all Difficulties, and heal all Divisions.

The Presbyterians receiv'd Directions to make their Proposals for a Union; which they did, upon a Plan of Archbishop Ussher's, which at the same time admitts of the Fatherhood of Episcopacy, and the Brotherhood of Presbyterians.

Upon these Proposals there was to have been a Meeting of the Divines of both Persuasions; but the Bishops declin'd it, and contented themselves with putting in written Objections, which tend'd, it seems, rather to provoke than reconcile, and to which they receiv'd as bitter an Answer.

The King was then advis'd to take the Affair into his own Hands, and to make that Settlement, by way of Declaration, as Head of the Church, which these spiritual Rivals, not for the Love of God, but Power and Popularity, had not either Temper, Sense, or Integrity to compass by mutual Forbearance and mutual Charity.

He had, however, the Consideration of the Policy to communicate this Declaration, to both Parties, before it was put in its Form, at the Earl of Manchester's House, and many Things to which the (e) Presbyterian Divines objected, tho' then maintain'd, were afterwards amended.

It is observable, that, towards the Close of this (f) Conference, (at which the King himself

(m) By this it appears, that Princes then did not read their Speeches.

(n) It is a Consideration that must make every religious Heart to bleed, to see Religion, which should be the strongest Obligation and Cement of Affection, and brotherly Kindness and Compassion, made now, by the perverse Wranglings of passionate and froward Men, the Ground of all Animosity, Hatred, Malice and Revenge: And this unrelax'd and unshakable Passion (which no question the divine Nature exceedingly abhor) functions, and I fear too frequently, transports those who are in the Right, as well as those who are in the Wrong, and leaves the latter more excusable than the former, when Men, who find their Manners and Dispositions very conformable in all the necessary Obligations of human Nature, avoid one another's Conversation and grow first unsociable, and then uncharitable to each other, because one cannot think as the other doth: And from this Separation we insufe God to the Patronage of, and Government in, our Fancies and Dispositions; and purely for his Sake hate one another heartily.

(f) In this Conference, the Presbyterian Divines contending, that the Bishops should exercise their Church-Power with Consent and Consent of Presbyters, Dr. Cole, then Preb. of Dorham said: If your Majesty will grant this, you will undid your Bishops. Upon which Reynolds quoted a Passage himself assisted, and several Lay Lords of both Persuasions) the Chancellor produced another Paper, and, at the same time, signify'd, that the King had receiv'd a Petition also from the Anabaptists and Independants; and that tho' he, the Chancellor, did not very well like it, yet something had been drawn up, which he not only read, but desir'd the Divines then present to give their Opinion of. This Something was an additional Clause to the Declaration, specifying, That OTHERS also be permitted to meet for religious Worship, so be it they do not to the Disturbance of the Peace, and that no Justice of Peace, or Officer, disturb them.

Upon this there ensued a profound Silence; under the Word OTHERS, it was generally suppos'd that Papists were included: The Bishops, however, did not declare themselves; but Mr. Baxter, fearing that even Silence, on their Side, would be made to interpret an Approbation, at last (as he himself bears Witness in his own Life) thought proper to put in the following Caveat: "That this

"Reverend Brother, Doctor Gunning, even now speaking against Sects, had nam'd the Papists and Sacramentals: For their Parts, they desir'd not Favour to themselves alone; and rigorous Severity they desir'd against none. As they humbly thank'd his Majesty for his Indulgence to themselves, so they distinguish'd the tolerable Parties from the intolerable: For the Former, they humbly crav'd just Lenity and Favour; But for the Latter, such as the Two Sorts named before by that Reverend Brother, for their Parts, they cannot make their Toleration their Request." To which his Majesty said, "That there were Laws enough against Papists." And Baxter reply'd, "That they understood the Question to be, Whether those Laws should be executed or not? And to his Majesty, adds he, broke up the Meeting of that Day."

Disapproved of by the Presbyterians.

October 25, this healing (9) Declaration was made public, and contain'd so many (r) Abatements of the high Terms, which had been insisted upon by the Bishops at the Conference, out of the Portmanteau of his father's Majesty (King Charles I.) in his Solitude and Sufferings, in which the King expressly honours that Proposition, and declares he had offer'd to restore it. But the King bless'd him with saying, All that is in this Book is not Gospel. Dr. Sate's Farewell Sermon for Mr. Baxter.

A Clause, however, to that Purpose, was afterwards inserted in the Declaration, at the Instance of the Chancellors, tho' more out of Policy than Principle, as is evident by the Sequel.

(g) In the Parliament see also all the following remarkable Clauses, &c.

"When we were in Holland, we were attended by many grave and learned Ministers from hence, who were look'd upon as the most able and principal Assistants of the Presbyterian Opinions, with whom we had as much Conference as the Multitude of Affairs which were then upon us would permit us to have: and to our great Satisfaction and Comfort found them Persons full of Affection to us, of Zeal for the Peace of the Church and State, and neither Enemies (as they have been taken out to be) to Episcopacy or Liturgy, but modestly to desire such Alterations in either, as without shaking Foundations might best ally the present Discontents, which the Indispositions of the Times, and the Prejudice of some Men's Consciences had contriv'd. For the better doing whereof we did intend, upon our first Arrival within Kingdom, to call a Synod of Divines, as the most proper Expedient to provide a proper Remedy for all those Differences and Dissatisfactions, which had or should arise in Matters of Religion. And in the same Time we published in our Declaration from Brussels, a Liberty to tender Consciences, and that no Man should be disparaged or called in question for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, and that we shall be ready to confer in such an All of Parties, as, upon mature Deliberation, should be offer'd to us for the full granting that Indulgence.

And we are the rather induced to take this upon us, by finding, upon the Conference we have had with the learned Men of several Persuasions, that the Mischief under which the Church and State do at present suffer, do not result from any formal Doctrines or Conclusions, which either Party maintains or avows; but from the Passion, and Aprentice, and Interest of particular Persons, who contrail greater Prejudice to each other from those Affections, than would naturally rise from their Opinions. And those Differences must be in some Degree lay'd, before the Meeting in a Synod can be attended with better Success than their Meetings in other Places, and their Discourses in Pulpits have hitherto been: And till all Thoughts of Vindicty are laid aside, the humble and necessary Thoughts for the Vindication of Truth cannot be enough entertain'd.

We must, for the Honour of all those of either Persuasion, with whom we have confer'd, declare, that the Professions and Oaths of all for the Advancement of Piety and true Goodness, are the same; their Profession of Zeal for the Peace of the Church, the same; their Affection and Duty to us, the same; they all approve Episcopacy: they all approve a set Form of Liturgy; and they all disapprove and dislike the Sin of Sacrilege, and the Alienation of the Revenues of the Church; and it upon their excellent Foundations, in Submission to which there is such a Harmony of Reverend, any Superfluities should be strik'd in the shaking those Foundations, and to the contrary and lessening the blessed Gift of Charity, which is a vital Part of Christians Religion, we shall think ourselves very unfortunate, and even suspect that we are defective in that Administration of Government with which God hath entrusted us.

(r) As may be seen in the Articles themselves; which, having been partially repaired by Mr. Edward, is necessary to give the following Extracts from them, for the Reader's better Information.

I. We shall expect, and provide, the best we can; that the Bishops be frequent Preachers, and that they do very often preach themselves in some Church of their Diocese, except they be hinder'd by Sickness, or other bodily Infirmities, or some other justifiable Occasion, which shall not be thought justifiable if it be frequent.

II. Because the Dioceses, especially some of them, are thought to be of too large Extent; we will appoint such a Number of suffragan Bishops in every Diocese, as shall be sufficient for the due Performance of their Work.

III. No Bishop shall ordain, or exercise any Part of Jurisdiction which appertains to the Censures of the Church, without the Advice and Assistance of the Presbytery; and no Chancellor, Commissary, or Official, shall exercise any Part of spiritual Jurisdiction in these Cases, (scilicet) Excommunication, Absolution, or wherein any of the Ministry are concern'd, with Reference to their pastoral Charge. Nor shall the Archdeacon exercise any Jurisdiction without the Advice and Assistance of six Ministers of his Archdeaconry, whereof three to be nominated by the Bishop, and three by the Election of the major Part of the Presbytery within the Archdeaconry.

IV. To the End that the Drans and Chapters may be the better tried to afford Counsel and Assistance to the Bishops, both in Ordination and the other Offices mentioned before: We will take Care that their Preference be given to the most learned and pious Professors of the Diocese; and moreover that an equal Number (so that of the Chapter) of the most learned, pious, and discreet Professors of the same Diocese, annually chosen by the major Voice of all the Presbytery of that Diocese present at such Elections, shall be always advising and assisting, together with those of the Chapter, in all Ordinations, and in every Part of Jurisdiction which appertains to the Censures of the Church, and at all other solemn and important Actions in the Exercise of the ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, wherein any of the Ministry are concern'd: Provided that, at all such Meetings, the Number of the Ministers so elected, and those present of the Chapter shall be equal, and not exceed one the other, and that to make the Numbers equal, the Juniors of the exceeding Number be withdrawn that the most ancient may take Place: Nor shall any suffragan Bishop ordain, or exercise the fore-mentioned Offices and Acts of spiritual Jurisdiction, but with the Advice and Assistance of a sufficient Number of the most judicious and pious Professors annually chosen, as aforesaid, within his Precincts: And our Will is, that the great Work of Ordination be constantly and solemnly performed by the Bishop and his aforesaid Professors, at the four first Terms and Seasons appointed by the Church for his Parole. V. We ference, that even Mr. Baxter, as he himself declares, was overjoy'd; and, waiting immediately upon the Chancellor, not only gave him many Thanks for the Concessions which had therein been made to the Brotherhood; but added, that if the Liturgy might be but alter'd, as the Declaration promis'd, and the Declaration itself made a Law, he should think it his Duty to promote a general Union, &c.

Had there been any Sincerity therefore in these plausible Proceedings, it is probable a general Union might then have been obtain'd; and the English Nation, for the future, would have been distinguish'd by the English Name. But as the Presbyterians would not admit the Papists to share with them in the Indulgence which was thus solemnly granted, it is more than probable, that the Court, at this very Instant, laid the politic Plan of letting loose Episcopal Tyranny upon Dissenters of all Sorts, that the Suffering in common might force them to some Sort of Agreement, for their common Safety. For the present, those in Power contented themselves with endeavouring to mollify the Spirit they could not break, and by the Lure of Honours and Preferments to bring those over to the Church, who wanted the Church to come to them; as well knowing, that, in proportion as they became reconcil'd to the Court, they would lose Ground with the People; and that where Division enters, Destruction follows. To this End, Bishops were offer'd to Baxter, Calamy, and Reynolds; and Deanries to several more of their Brethren; but, of the First, Reynolds only took the Bait, (and He, on the Terms desir'd in the King's Declaration): And the principal Reason why the Others refus'd, was, because they saw there was little Likelihood of the said Declaration's being put into a Law.

But of this, more in its proper Place. The King, having try'd his Strength with the Parliament, and found it in a great degree, answerable to his own Wishes, had, immediately upon the Receipt, the Pleasure to see the other great Work, of Disbanding the still formidable (3) Army, go on with all possible Speed and Success: This Office was perform'd

A. D. 1660.

Army disband'd.

V. We will take Care that Confirmation be rightly and solemnly perform'd, by the Information and with the Consent of the Ministry.

VI. No Bishop shall exercise any arbitrary Power, or do or impede any Thing upon the Clergy, or to the People, but what is according to the known Law of the Land.

VII. And though we do esteem the Liturgy of the Church of England, contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and by Law established, to be the best we have seen. Yet since we find some Exceptions made against several Things therein, we will appoint an equal Number of learned Divines of both Parties, to review the same, and to make such Alterations as shall be thought most Necessary; and some additional Forms (in the Scripture Phrase, as near as may be) suited unto the Nature of the several Parts of Worship, and that it be left to the Minister's Choice to use one or other at his Discretion. In the mean Time, and till the same be done, although we do heartily wish and desire, that the Ministers in their several Churches, because they dislike some Clauses and Expressions, would not totally lay aside the Use of the Book of Common Prayer, but read those Parts against which there can be no Exception; which would be the best Instance of declining those Marks of Dissension, which we do much labour and desire to remove; yet, in Comparison to divers of our good Subjects, who desire the Use of it as now it is, our Will and Pleasure is, that none be punished or troubled for not using it, until it be received, and effectually reformed, as aforesaid.

VIII. Lastly, concerning Ceremonies, &c. we shall leave all Decisions and Determinations of that kind, if they shall be thought necessary for a perfect and entire Unity and Uniformity throughout the Nation, to the Advice of a new Synod, which shall be duly call'd, after a little Time, and a mutual Conversation between Persons of different Persuasions, hath mollified those Differences, blunted those Sharpnesses, and extinguish'd those Jealousies which make Men unfit for those Consultations: And upon such Advice, we shall use our best Endeavour that such Laws may be established, as may best provide for the Peace of the Church and State. As provided that now shall be denied the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though they do not use the Gesture of kneeling in the Act of Receiving. In the mean time, out of Compassion and Compliance towards those who would forgo the Cross in Baptism, we are content that no Man shall be compelled to use the same, or suffer for not doing it.

No Man shall be compelled to bow at the Name of Jesus, or suffer in any Degree for not doing it, without reproaching those who, out of their Devotion, continue that ancient Ceremony of the Church.

For the Use of the Surplice, we are content that all Men be left to their Liberty to do as they shall think fit, without suffering in the least Degree for wearing or not wearing it; provided, that this Liberty do not extend to our own Chapel, Cathedral, or Collegiate Churches, or to any Church in either of our Universities; but that the several Statutes and Customs for the Use thereof in the said Places, be there observed as formerly.

And because some Men, otherwise pious and learned, say, they cannot conform unto the Subscription required by the Canon, nor take the Oath of Canonical Obedience; we are content, and it is our Will and Pleasure (so they take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy) that they shall receive Ordination, Institution and Induction, and shall be permitted to exercise their Function, and to enjoy the Profits of their Livings, without the said Subscription or Oath of Canonical Obedience.

In a Word, we do again renew what we have formerly said in our Declaration from Probo, for the Liberty of Tenure. Consuetudines, Præter that be appointed or called in question for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom; and if any have been disturbed in that kind since our Arrival here, it hath not proceeded from any Direction of ours.

Next, These Limitations, still the Liturgy shall be reviewed by Persons of both Parties; till a national Synod shall be duly call'd, as by Mr. J. Goodwin in the Paralel. For was Parsley, and by Mr. Repsie, after him, in that other singular Paralel. At Parley, Dr. Quaker, Bishop-elect of Baxter, in his Considerations touching the Liturgy published soon after the Declaration, is pleas'd to call it a temporary Condemnation; so indeed it prov'd; but then it was to pacify his malicious Brethren, who could ill digest any Condemnation to their fearful and hated Rites.

(3) There were disbanded in England and Hollis, eighteen Regiments of Foot, consisting of a thousand Soldiers in each Regiment, besides Officers, and thirteen Regiments of Horse, having six hundred in each Regiment, besides Officers; together with the General's Life-Guard of Horse, consisting of two hundred; and about fifty Companies, which had not in them less than five thousand Soldiers, besides Officers and in Scotland three Regiments, and two Companies of Foot, and two Regiments, except one Troop of Horse, and about thirteen Garrisons. Philips.

"The Army that had for long stood in the way of the Court, was now wholly disbanded, except only Mead's Regiment of Foot; and that was balanced by a Regiment of Horse raised under colour of being a Guard to the King. Army was now wholly disbanded, except only Mead's Regiment of Foot; and that was balanced by a Regiment of Horse raised under colour of being a Guard to the King. This, together with the Payment of their Arrears, and a Liberty of trailing in Corporations, was the Reward they receiv'd for their Service, notwithstanding all the fair Promises both of Mead and the King. And thus these Men who had accumulated Treachery upon Treachery, were dismiss'd with Infamy; for the very Acknowledgment that was made by the King, that they had been the chief Instruments of his Return, reproach'd them with Infidelity to the Parliament, and their own Oaths to be deliver'd from the Guilt of their former Actions, was a Confession that they had been Rebels to the King. However, the Dismissal of these Men was not caus'd by the King's Aversion to a standing Army; for the whole Course of his Life demonstrates the contrary; but being persuaded they who had already made so many Changes in England, were able to bring about another, and to turn him out again with as little Constancy as they had brought him in, he thought it most safe and necessary to free himself at once from such dangerous Companions."

The General's horse was wholly disbanded.

perform'd by Twelve Commissioners, Six Lords, and Six Commoners, under the Authority of an Act of Parliament which was contriv'd with all the Caution and Circumspection imaginable; for the several Regiments were to be broke by Lots; the full Arrears of all, to the very Day of their Disbanding, were discharg'd; and, over-and-above this, the King, by way of Largess, complimented every Officer and Soldier with a Week's Pay; with which, and the fine things said of them in the Chancellor's Speech before-quoted, they were so transported, that they declar'd, as it were with one Voice, They would willingly disband, and as willingly take up Arms, or do whatsoever should best redound to his Majesty's Service.

Kennet.

Nor was his Majesty unmindful of cultivating and establishing a proper Interest in the City of London; to which he took the shortest Way, by a Letter to the Lord Mayor, signifying his Desire, that the Citizens would fill up the Vacancies, made in the Court of Aldermen, by the Removal of such as were render'd incapable, by the late Act of Indemnity, with those who had been displac'd during the late Troubles: Which they most loyally and obsequiously comply'd with.

We are now come to that Portion of this Reign which the Royalists treat of with Rapture, and the Republicans never mention without Horror. I mean, the (z) Trial of the (u) Regicides; from whence Posterity will be taught, how much more liberally the Law has its Course when the King is Judge in his own Cause, than when he is call'd upon to use the Sword of Justice in behalf of the People.

Regicides.

But, before the Curtain is drawn up, it is necessary to attend the Prologue, which is contain'd in the following Resolutions of the Lord Chief Baron Bridgman, Mr. Justice Foster, and Mr. Justice Hyde, of the Common-Pleas; and Mr. Justice Mallett of the King's-Bench; Sir Jeffery Palmer the King's Attorney, Sir Henry Finch the King's Solicitor, Sir Edward Turner Attorney to the Duke of York; Mr. Wadham Windham of Lincoln's-Inn, and Mr. John Keyling, who by special Order were appointed to attend that Service as Council for the King:

II. That all the Prisoners should be arraigned the first Day, before any of them were brought to Trial, &c.

III. That any of the King's Council might privately manage the Evidence to the Grand Inquest, in order to the finding of the Bill of Indictment, &c.

IV. That the Indictments should be, for compassing the Death of the late King (with-in the Statute 25 Edward III.) and then to lay Overt Acts to prove the compassing of his Death, and the actual Murder of the King to be made use of as one of the Overt Acts, to prove the compassing of his Death.

V. That if any one Overt Act tending to the compassing the King's Death be laid in the Indictment, then any other Act may be given in Evidence, together with that which is laid in the Indictment.

VI. That there need not be Two Witnesses to prove every Overt Act tending to the compassing of the King's Death, but one Witness to prove one Overt Act and another Witness to prove another Act tending to the same End are sufficient, &c.

Agreeable to the first of these Resolutions, by special Commission was issued to (x)

(b) The Sum of his Charge ran thus: "I must deliver for plain and true Law. That no Authority, no single Person, no Community of Persons, nor the People

A. D. 1666. representatively, had any coercive Power over the King of England: And this (c) Maxim being admitted, it follow'd, that the High Court of Justice had no legal Foundation; and consequently every Member thereof was, in the Eye of the Law, a Felon, Traytor, Murderer, &c.

When such a Doctrine had been thus establish'd, it was easy to foresee, that the Trial of these Men was but a Matter of Form; and that a Jury was call'd in only to give a Sanction to the Decision of the Court: Accordingly, every Plea of every Prisoner was overru'd; they were deny'd the Benefit of Counsel; and the Jurors, as they were directed, brought in every Verdict, Guiltily!

It hath been the common Practice to treat these Men as the worst of Villains; and it is not my Business to undertake their Apology: Most certain it is, that the Junto, under which they acted, were Tyrants and Usurpers, who, by a Series of Frauds, Perjuries, and Violences, enslav'd their Fellow-Citizens, and ruin'd the Constitution. On the other hand, that the Government had undergone a Dissolution, may be easily prov'd; that they receiv'd their Authority from the then supreme Power cannot be disput'd; that from Principle, they acted a Roman, if not an English Part, is manifest, both from what they had dar'd to do, and the undaunted Manner in which they suffer'd. But had they been the most contemptible, as well as the most notorious of Malefactors, they were entitl'd to the full Benefit of the Laws: The King's Commissioners, by putting their own Power to the Stretch, should not have countenanced the Iniquity of those they condemn'd; nor should any one Feature of Malice or Revenge ever deform the Face of Justice.

Major General Harrison was insulted upon his Trial, with the Sight of the Executioner, who was purposely plac'd beside him, in an ugly Dress, with a Halter in his Hand. [Ladlow.]

"It was the Treason of the Speenars in King Edward the Second's Time, in Calvein's Case, in the 7th Report. The Speenars had an Opinion, that by Homage and Allegiance was due to the King by reason of the Crown, as they call'd it; and thereupon (by the Books and Records) they drew out this execrable Inference, among others, That if the King did not demean himself according to Right, because he could not be reformed by Law, he might per Aljerie, that is, by his Imparliament."

"But this was adjudg'd horrid Treason by two Acts of Parliament. Let me tell you what our Law Books say for there is the Ground, out of which, and the Statutes together, we must draw all our Conclusions for Matter of Government. How do they stile the King? They call him the Liegeant of God, and many other such like Expressions. In the Book of 1 Hen. VII. says that Book there, The King is immediately from God, and hath no Superior. The Statute says, That the Crown of England is immediately subject to God, and to no other Power. The King, say our Books, He is not only Caput Populi, the Head of the People, but Caput Reipublice, the Head of the Commonwealth, the three Estates: And truly thus our Statutes speak very fully. Common Experience tells you, when we speak of the King, and so the Statutes of Edward the Third, we call the King, Our Sovereign Lord the King: Sovereign, that is, Supreme. And when the Lords and Commons in Parliament apply themselves to the King, they say this Expression, Your Lords and Commons, Your Faithful Subjects, Humily We do not speak any Words of my own, but the Words of the Law. In the Statute 24 Hen. VIII. c. 21. 'tis thus express'd, Wherby by divers, falsely, and untrue Histories and Chronicles, it is manifestly declared, That this Realm of England is an Empire, and is hitherto been accepted in the World, govern'd by our supreme Lord and King, bearing the Dignity and regal Estate of the Imperial Crown. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21. there it is, the People speaking of themselves, That they do recognize no Superior under God but only the King's Grace. Gentlemen, you see if the King be immediately under God, he derives his Authority from nobody else; if the King have an imperial Power, if the King be Head of the Commonwealth, Head of the Body Politic; if the Body Politic owe him Obedience, truly I think it is an unchristian Conference, He shall needs be supreme over them. The Imperial Crown, it is a Word that is figurative; you shall find in all Statutes, 1 Edm. and 1 Jacob. say even in the Act of judicial Proceeding of this Parliament, it is call'd an Imperial Crown. They that take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, they swear, That they will to their Power, assist and defend all Jurisdictions, Privileges, Preeminences, and Authorities granted or belonging to the King, his Heirs and Successors, or annexed to the Imperial Crown of this Realm. What is an Imperial Crown? That, which, as to the coercive Part, is subject to no Man under God; it is not subject to any human Tribunal or Judicature whatsoever."

"Gentlemen, since this is so, consider the Oath of Supremacy, which most Men have taken, or should take. All Men that enter into the Parliament House, swear expressly enjoin'd by Statute to take the Oath of Supremacy."

"What says the Oath? We swear, That the King is the only supreme Governour within this Realm and Dominion. He is Supreme, and the only Supreme; and truly if he be Supreme, there is neither Major nor Superior."

"I declare this to you, to let you know, that the King is immediately subject to God, and so is not punishable by any Person. He is the Supreme Head, he is not punishable by any coercive Power; the Laws provide for that; The King can do no Wrong; it is a Rule of Law, it is in our Law-Books very frequent, as Ed. IV. Lord Coke and many others. He can do Wrong, he cannot be punished for any Wrong. The King hath the Infirmities and Weakness of a Man, but he cannot do any Injury, at least not considerable in Person; he must do it by Ministers, Agents, and Instruments. Now the Law, though it provide for the King, yet if any of his Ministers do Wrong, though by his Command, they are punishable. He is not touch'd, Touch me mine Assistant."

"(c) Not to carry any Readers too far back into Antiquity, we have upon Record a Message from the Parliament to Richard II. in which is the following remarkable Passage:

Habent enim ex antiquo statuto, & de facto non longe retroactis temporibus experienter quod delictum est habere, si res, ex maliguo consilio quocunque, vel incepta contumacia, aut contemptu, seu proterva, violante singulari, aut quovis modo irregulari, se alienaverit a populo suo, nec valuerit per juria regni & statuta ac laudabiles Ordinationes cum salubri consilio dominarum & praeorum regum gubernari & regulari, sed capite in sui infanti consilio propriam voluntatem suam singulariter proterva exercere, extra licitum est, cum communi assensu & consensu populi regni ipsam regem de regalibus abrogare, & precipuosorem aliquem de stirpe regia legitime in regni sui substatuere.

"They had in an ancient Statute, and it has been done in fact, not long ago, That if the King, through any evil Counsel, or foolish Contumacy, or out of Scorn, or some singular petulant Will of his own, or by any other irregular Means, shall alienate himself from his People, and shall refuse to be govern'd and guided by the Laws of the Realm, and the Statutes and laudable Ordinances thereof, together with the wholesome Advice of the Lords and great Men of his Realm, but persisting headstrong in his own barren brain'd Councils, shall pertinently prosecute his own singular Humour, That then it shall be lawful for them, with the common Assent and Consent of the People of the Realm, to depose that same King from his regal Throne, and to raise up some other of the royal Blood in his Room."

H. Kington, Coll. 268A.

"(d) Who had not only surrender'd himself upon the Proclamation, but received such Favour from the House of Commons, that upon his Petition, an Order had been made, that, upon Payment of a Year's Value of his Estate, he should not be excepted in the general Act of Pardon. He had likewise been discharge'd from his Commitment.

(e) a private Conversation, in which Brown having acerb'd the ruinous Condition of the Nation to the Murder of the King, Scrope reply'd, That Men had different Opinions touching that Matter; but, tho' requir'd by the said Brown, refused to give any farther Explanation.

Mr. T. Scot.

Mr. Thomas Scot was charg'd by (f) Leathball, the Speaker to the late obnoxious Parliament, and others, with having said in the House, (g) That he desir'd the following Inscription might be engrav'd upon his Monument; Here lies THOMAS SCOT, who adjudg'd the late King to dye.

Call John Jones, and Mr. Gregory Clement:

Colonel John Jones, and Mr. Gregory Clement, either seeking how mainly their Colleagues had endeavour'd to defend themselves, or in Hope of Mercy, confess'd the Fact.

Their Examinations.

Tho' all of the King's Judges who were try'd were (h) call'd, none but these Six were executed; Harrison led the Way; Charing-Cross was the Scene; and his Sentence was so barbarously executed, says Ludlow, that he was cut down alive, and saw his Bowels thrown into the Fire. Neither he, nor (i) any of the rest, shew'd the least Remorse or Concern; but, on the contrary, glory'd in the Cause they dy'd for, and even seem'd to rejoice, that they had been call'd to seal it with their Blood.

I shall close the first Scene of this State-Tragedy with a remarkable Minute, given by

Ludlow, relating to Sir John Bourchier (one of the Nineteen that had surrender'd themselves in Obedience to the Proclamation) who, being old and infirm, was permitted to lodge at the House of one of his Daughters; where falling dangerously ill, his nearest Relations, who despair'd of his Recovery, and who thought an Acknowledgment of his Guilt would procure Favour to them, earnestly press'd him to give them that Satisfaction, with which he was highly displeas'd, that he rose suddenly from his Chair, which, for some Days before, he had not been able to do without Assistance, and, receiving fresh Vigour from the Memory of that Action, said, I tell you, it was a just Act; God, and all good Men, will own it. And having thus express'd himself, he sat down again, and, soon after, quietly ended his Life.

A. D. 1660.

We are now to attend the Victims of a Second Clasp, which were to be offer'd to the Manes of the Royal Martyr; viz. Such as were active in bringing him to his End, tho' scarce to be number'd among his immediate Murderers; which only, as his Majesty had assur'd the House of Lords, he desir'd might be excepted out of the Act of Indemnity: And these were, one Lawyer, one Divine, and two Officers of the Army.

Trial of Coke, Peters, and Hacker.

The Lawyer was Coke, the Solicitor to the High Court of Justice, and afterwards Chief Justice of Ireland, who, tho' neither

Witnes,

(e) It was owing to this Treachery of Brown's that he was executed out of the Act, notwithstanding the former Order.

(f) When the late King enter'd the House of Commons and a Demand of the five obnoxious Members, of whom Daniel Hall, one of the Commissioners, was one. Leathball had then the Spirit to answer, That he had neither Eyes to see nor Mouth to speak, except what the House gave. Whitlock, Ludlow, &c. &c.

(g) Mr. Scot said in his Defence, that whatever had been spoken in the House, ought not to be given in Evidence against him, not falling under the Cognizance of any inferior Court, as all Men knew: That for what he had done in relation to the King, he had the Authority of the Parliament for his Justification: That the Court had no right to declare whether that Authority were a Parliament or not; and being demanded to produce one Instance to show that the House of Commons was ever possess'd of such an Authority, he assur'd them he could produce many. But having begun with the Barons Times, he was interrupted by the Court, and told that the Things of those Ages were obscure, finding he might not be permitted to proceed in that way, he took the Liberty to tell them, That he could not rest for what Reason it was not as lawful for that House of Commons, in which he had sat as a Member, to make Laws, as for the present Convention, which had been call'd by the Authority of the Keepers of the Liberties of England. I had the Authority of Parliament, the Legislative Authority to justify me. — Here the Court interrupted him; but having no Reason to give, Faulx said, in a Passion, Sir, if you speak to this Purpose again, I protest for my own Part I dare not hear any more: 'Tis a Doctrine so poisonous and blasphemous, that if you proceed upon this Point, I shall (and I hope my Lords will be of the same Opinion) desire that the Jury may be immediately directed. Mr. Scot replied, My Lord, I thought you would rather have been my Council, as I think 'tis the Duty of your Place. But in this Matter I am not alone, neither is it my single Opinion: Even the seceded Members owned us to be a Parliament, else why did they, supported by an armed Force, intrude themselves contrary to the Resolutions of the House, in order to procure the Major Vote for our Dissolution? To which Mr. Austley answer'd, That if the seceded Members had not appeared in Parliament, and by that Means put an End to all Proceedings, the People had not so soon arriv'd at their Happiness. These, with many other Things of equal Force being said by Mr. Scot in his Defence, rather to justify himself to his Country, than from any Hopes of Consideration from those with whom he had to do; the Jury as directed, found him guilty also. Ludlow, vol. iii. p. 67, 68.

(h) Henry Morris, in his Plea, urg'd, That what he did, he thought at that Time he might do. There was, said he, a House of Commons, as I understood it to be, tho' perhaps your Lordships think them not to have been a House of Commons: However, they were then the supreme Authority in England, and acknowledged and reputed to be both at Home and Abroad; I suppose he gives Obedience to the Authority de facto in being, sufficiently shews himself to be of a peaceable Temper, and far from a Traytor: There was a Statute made in the time of Henry VII. to indemnify all those who should take Arms for a King de facto, tho' he were not to de jure; And if a supreme Officer de facto can justify a War, I presume the supreme Authority in England, tho' de facto only, may justify a Court of Judicature. If it should be said, That the Authority by which we acted was only one Estate of three, and not Part of that; I answer, It was all that was then existing: And I have heard Lawyers say, That if there be Commons apparent to a Tenement, and that the Tenement be all burnt down except one small Stick, the Commons still belong to that small Piece as much as when the Tenement was all standing. I shall also humbly offer it to Consideration, whether the late King for some time before his Trial, could truly and properly be called a King, who was not in the Execution of his Office, but made a Prisoner, and no way concern'd in the Administration of Public Affairs. Ludlow, vol. iii. p. 92, 93.

(i) According to the first Edition of a very loyal, but virtuous Book, call'd Rehels or Saints, Mr. Clement express'd a great Deal of Surrows and Penitence; and says he was justly suffer'd both from God and Man; and that his Judge had done nothing but according to Law; and Colonel Jones express'd very much Sorrow of the Horror of the Fact. But according to the Second, Colonel Jones, having heard a Report, that he had acknowledged himself guilty of Murder in the King's Death, took care to deny this Confession, saying, It is no Use, really, that I acknowledge myself guilty of Murder; I had no Job doing in my Heart. And Mr. Clement express'd his Trypable to some Friends, for yielding to fit to the Imparity of his Relations, as to plead guilty to the Indifference. Note, This last Account agrees with Ludlow's. See he had surrender'd himself within the Time limited by the Proclamation. And tho' he was that assur'd, yet he was not unwilling to confirm what he had done, with the Testimony of his Blood, which he fill'd with the greatest Demonstrations of Christianlike and Sacrificable of Mind. — He attempted several times to speak to the People at the Place of Execution, in Justification of that Cause for which he was to dye; but those who feared nothing so much as Truth, interrupted him so often, that he found himself oblig'd to say, This surely it must be a very bad Cause which cannot suffer the Words of a Dying Man. Ludlow, vol. iii. p. 78, 79.

State Trials.
Ladlow.

Witness, Jury, Judge, nor Executioner, but acting in his Vocation, under an Order from the only Power then in the Nation, was found guilty.

As was likewise the Divine, Hugh Peters, whose Crimes were, his Intimacy with Cromwell, his preaching against the King, his calling upon the Soldiers to demand Justice, and his declaring, That the Levites, Lords, and Laws, must be taken away, in order to establish a Commonwealth; that the King was a Tyrant; and that the Office itself was chargeable, unjust, and dangerous.

The two Officers were, Colonel Daniel Astell, and Colonel Francis Hacker.

The Charge against (J) Astell was, That he commanded the Guards, both at the Trial and Execution of the King, that he had order'd the Soldiers to cry out Justice! and, afterwards, Execution! &c. His Defence argued him a Man of Sense as well as Spirit: He pleaded the Command of his Superiors on pain of Death; the Duty of a Soldier; the Example of the Earls of Essex and Mancaster, the Lord Fairfax, and Monk himself; and the (R) Authority of a Parliament, call'd by the King's Writ, chosen by the People, obey'd at home, acknowledg'd abroad, and by Bill render'd indissoluble, except by their own Consent. But all in vain: Loyalty was too mighty, if not for Justice, at least for Humanity, and Subjects destroy'd Subjects, that the Throne might be guarded with Terrors as well as Laws.

In the Reply of the King's Council to Astell's Defence, it is observable, that they ground the Proof of their Charge on those savage Outrages of his, of calling upon the Soldiers for Justice and Execution: But in (H) Hacker's Case, no such peculiar Malignancy appear'd; he only obey'd the Warrant for seeing the King executed; and his Defence, accordingly, turn'd on the Obedience due by martial Law to his Superiors, which, as in the former Case, was over-ru'd.

(m) Coke and Peters were, by Order, appointed to dye on the same Day; and Two Circumstances, attending their Execution, ought never to be forgot: The ghastly Head of Major General Harrison was plac'd on Coke's Sledge, with the Face directed towards him, in order to shock and dismay him; tho' it serv'd only to excite the just Abhorrence and Repentment of the Spectators. And, at the Instance of one Colonel Turner, the Sheriff's Men oblig'd Peters to be an Eye-witness of Coke's Execution; which being over, the Hangman came to him, and, rubbing his bloody Hands together, ask'd him, How he lik'd that Work? To which Peters reply'd, I am not terrify'd. Do your worst. And, being on the Ladder, he said to the Sheriff, "Sir, you have butcher'd one of the Servants of God before my Eyes, and have forc'd me to see it, in order to terrify and discourage me: But God has permitted it, for my Support and Encouragement."

I shall close the Account of these shocking Inhumanities, with observing, that tho' William Hewitt, who was indicted for being the King's Executioner, offer'd to prove by Forty Witnesses, that another Person perform'd that odious Office, and several Persons actually depos'd, ~~that~~ they had heard the common Hangman confess, it was he who had cut off the King's Head; nay, tho' no one Evidence for the King could produce any single Fact in Support of the Indictment, the Jury had either the Weakness or Impudence to bring him in (n) guilty.

The

(l) The principal Evidence against him was one Hercules Harbo, one of the forty Halberdiers, attending the Court of Justice, and one of the three to whom the Warrant for the Execution was directed, who had oppos'd with more than ordinary Violence all those who were for the King. Ibid. vol. iii.

(k) He cited the Declaration of the Lords and Commons, published when they engag'd the People to take Arms, in which they asserted, That it was repugnant to Reason, that the Judgment and Action of the Parliament might not be a Rule and Guide to the Nation in their Duty; and declared that the Persons who should act under their Authority ought not to be question'd for so doing: He therefore presumed that an inferior Court would not expound the Law contrary to the Judgment of the High Court of Parliament; adding, That if the House of Commons, who are the Representatives of the whole Nation, may be guilty of Treason, it will follow that all the People of England, who chose them, are guilty also, and then wishes us Jury be bound to say this Cause; by Commission, in dated the 27th of March, 1649, ten Months before the King's Death. The Commission by which General Fairfax was authorized to give mine to me, he received from the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament. I did nothing but my Duty in going to my Regiment: For if the General says, go to such a Place and stay there, if I refuse, by the Law of Arms I am to dye; but if I obey, it seems I am in Danger also. The Question therefore in Law, I humbly conceive, will be this, and I desire it may be truly and fully stated, whether a Man, who is call'd by the Judgment of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, acting only according to that Judgment of Parliament, and under their Authority, can be question'd for Treason? Ibid. p. 84, 85.

(l) Hacker had continued in the Command of his Regiment till he was taken a Prisoner, having had Abstracts from Milk, that he should be fully indemnify'd. So that when he came to London, he made a Visit to Wolfe, and was received with all the Appearances of Friendship and Affection. But the next Day after he had been thus treated, he was seized, examined, and sent to the Tower. Ibid. p. 89.

(m) At the Place of Execution, among other things, he declar'd, that he had used the utmost of his Endeavours that the Practice of the Law might be requir'd; and that the public Justice might be administered with as much Expedition and as little Expence as possible; and that he had suffer'd a more than ordinary Persecution from those of his own Profession on that account. He said he understood not the Meaning of the Court, when they affirm'd, that if the Lords and Commons had brought the King to the Bar, it had been Treason in them; and as to the Part he had done, the Action with which he was charg'd, he was so far from repenting of what he had done, that he was most ready to seal it with his Blood: Here the Sheriff rudely interrupting him, he reply'd, that it had not been the Custom in the most barbarous Nations, much less in England, to insult over a dying Man; adding, that he thought he was the first who had ever suffer'd Death for demanding Justice. Ibid. vol. iii. page 75, 76.

He carried himself at his Execution, as well as at his Trial, much better than could be expected from one that had suffer'd such a Part in that horrid Arrangement of our late Sovereigns. For he express'd exceeding much Penitence, and heartily pray'd for his Majesty that now is: And taking notice of Hugh Peters, that was executed next after him, with'd he might be repriev'd, because, at present, as he conceiv'd, he was not prepar'd to dye. Reprieve no Saints, p. 85.

It is commonly said, that Peters was drunk: And Bishop Burns writes of him as follows:

"It was remarkable that Peters, a sort of an ecclesiastical, ill-favour'd Preacher, tho' a very vicious Man, who had been of great Use to Cromwell, and had been outrageous in profaning the King's Death with the Cruelty and Rudeness of an Iniquitous, was the Man of them all that was the most frank in his Spirit, and could not in any way bear his Strictures. He had nothing the Honestly to repent of, nor the Penitence of Mind so far as for it as all the rest of them did. He was observed all the while to be drinking some cordial Liquors, to keep him from fainting." P. 162.

(n) He was afterwards pardon'd.

Parliament
Nov. 6.

As soon as the Trials and Executions of these unhappy Men were over, the Parliament reassembled; and on the first Day of their Meeting, the House of Commons, nomine contradicente, passed a Vote of Humble and hearty Acknowledgment and Thanks to the King, for his late gracious Declaration, which was presented to the King by the (e) whole House; and introduc'd by the Speaker with the following Harangue; which, beside Compliments, contains a material Fact, that none of our Reverend Historians have thought proper to make mention of:

Most Gracious and Royal Sovereign,

Speaker's

"If I had the Command of as many Tongues, as your Majesty hath of Hearts, I could not express the great Joy and Thankfulness of your Commons now assembled in Parliament, for your continual and indefatigable Labour and Pains in repairing and making up our sad Breaches; and composing our unhappy Differences; and in particular, for your late most gracious Declaration concerning ecclesiastical Affairs, wherein your Majesty hath provided wholesome Food for all clean Stomachs, strong Meat for such as are able to bear it, allowing them the Use of our Church Liberty, together with comely Vestments, Ornaments, and Ceremonies in the Service and Worship of God; as likewise Milk for tender Babes, dispensing with their Conformity in such Matters and Things, as are not so much of the Substance and Essence of Faith and Religion, as of Decency and Becomingness; which giveth abundant Satisfaction to all peaceable, sober-minded Men, and such as are truly religious: For those that are really and truly so, will find themselves bound ever in Confidence to the Observation and Practice of that excellent Lesson taught us by the Apostle, which is, Sapere ad temperantiam, & Sparum ornare, with a Vultu & facie simplici. As for those that have foul Stomachs, or rather foul Hearts, and will be pleas'd with nothing, unless they may have a licentious Liberty, Libertatem perditionis, a Liberty Legem ponere Oculis, minime cogitantis quod sunt Pedes: Men of turbulent Spirits, and Disturbers of the Peace and Civil Government of your Nation, your Declaration takes no Care of them; for they will indeed better deserve your Majesty's Penance and Punishment, than your Piety and Indulgence.

"Royal Sir, The End of this humble Address at this time is, to assure your Majesty, that your gracious Declaration doth give general Satisfaction; and I am commanded by your Commons now assembled in Parliament, to present your Majesty with as general Thanks, in which they were all unanimous, nomine contradicente: And, in Pursuance of your Majesty's Directions therein, they have ordered a Bill to be drawn for * THAT PURPOSE, which, after it hath passed the Scrutiny of both your Houses of Parliament, they will then humbly beg your Favour and Leave, to tender it unto your Majesty for your Royal Assent.

"Sir, That gracious and pious Disposition, which God hath put into your Royal Heart, of doing your People good, is the greatest temporal Blessing we are capable of here in this World. We must confess your Majesty hath not only Jacob's Voice, but you have likewise Jacob's Hands: You have spoken kindly unto the People, and you have handled them gently; and therefore we must for ever make it our humble Requests, in our daily Prayers, unto his Throne of Grace, to bestow upon your Majesty Jacob's Blessing, De rore caeli variisque pinguedine terra; that you may have for your Portion of the Dew of Heaven and of the Fattness of the Earth. Serviant tibi populi, & incurvant se tibi nationes, honorum cultibentes; let your People serve you, and let the Nations of the Earth bow down before you: Those that curse you, let them be curst, and they that bless you, let them be blessed!"

But, while the two Houses were giving, and the King receiving, these Thanks and Compliments, for his mild and gracious Proceedings (p), and even for two Months before, the Justices of the Peace, within their several Divisions, had been intrusted to give out Orders for restoring the Use and public Reading of the Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the Laws in being (q); which they did not fail to obey, to the great Disturbance of many, who, from the King's Declaration, had Reason to expect milder Usage.

Moreover, when the very Bill, (for making the King's Majesty's Declaration concerning ecclesiastical Affairs effectual) which his Majesty binds himself to pass, in the said Declaration, and which the Speaker assures his Majesty the House had already order'd, agreeable to his Majesty's Directions, had been read once, and a Motion was made for its being read a Second time, one of the Secretaries of State, it was presump'd by Command, oppos'd it; upon which a Negative ensu'd, and it was heard of no more.

The natural Tendency of these things, says Ludlow, was so visible, that Mr. Pryn, who had manifested a more than ordinary Zeal for disbanding the Army, finding his Expectations defeated, and the Presbyterian Party so miserably deluded, after he had made Report of the Number of Regiments that had been disbanded, desired the House, that they would be mindful not to do these things that might bring them together again. Upon which, the adverse Party fell upon him with that Fury, that if the House had not risen immediately diately in great Disorder; he had been obliged to explain himself at the Bar.

But however easily Engagements to the People are broke thro', those to the King meet with a more religious Observance: Thus the Commons, before their Adjournment, having promis'd to augment his Majesty's (r) Revenue to (s) Twelve hundred thousand Pounds per annum, they now address'd themselves to make that Promise good.

One Half of the Excise given to the King for Life.

Accordingly, to the (t) Tonnage and Poundage, which they had already granted for Life, they made the magnificent Addition of one Half of the Produce of the Excise; as an Instance of Gratitude (for so runs the Preamble of the Bill) and an humble Acknowledgment of his Majesty's great Grace and Favour to them, his Commons, beyond Example of any of his Royal Progenitors, express'd in many public Acts and Declarations, to the great Rejoicing and general Satisfaction of all his People.

Lord's Journal.

It is true, when this Affair was first propos'd, it appear'd to the Majority as an unprecedented Instance of Prodigality (u) and therefore had a Negative put upon it; which was so ill relish'd at Court, that, the next Day, they were given to understand, by a Message from the King to the Lords, that his Majesty intended to dissolve them in a Month. The Face of the House was, upon this, immediately alter'd; every Man's principal Concern was now, to secure his Election; and this, as the Pulse of the People then beat, they knew could be no otherwise effected, than by falling in with the Views of the Court. Accordingly, the Excise was again brought upon the Carpet; and that which had been rejected as Poison before, was now swallow'd as wholesome Food.

Having thus acknowledg'd their Fears, and how much they were to be govern'd by them, the Court resolv'd to pursue the Blow, and insist upon the whole Excise.

During their former Sitting, the House had come to a wise and laudable Resolution, to take away the Court of Wards, and to give the King (w) 100,000 l. per ann. by way of Recompence for it; which they agreed to levy upon the Land, by an equal Rate upon every County: Accordingly they appointed a Committee to form the said (x) Rate, which was completed and enter'd in the Journals by Order.

A. D. 1660.

But tho' 100,000 per Ann. had been held an Equivalent then, different Notions prevail'd now; in Consequence of which (y) the other Half of the Excise was demanded in Lieu of it; and the House being still under the same Influence as before, were prevail'd upon to act with the same Complaisance. If therefore, as the Apologists for this Reign, endeavour to shew, the King was no great Gainer by this Bargain, he certainly was by the procuring the last Confederation, instead of the first; for the Excise was then known to be capable of vast (z) Improvements, which it gradually received; and, at the same time, it enlarged the Power and Influence of the Crown as much, one way, as the parting with the Court of Wards had reduc'd them, another.

And the other Half, in Exchange for the Court of Wards.

We are indeed (a) assur'd, that when the first Moiety of the Excise was under Consideration, it was declared to be the Sense of the House, that 60000 l. per Ann. out of it, should be allotted to the support of the Garrison and Fortifications of Dunkirk, which is not extremely improbable, because they prepared and sent up a Bill to the (b) Lords, for the annexing that important Place to the Crown of England for ever; and it is scarce to be supposed, that in this Spirit, Tide of Loyalty, they would encounter the King with such a Trust, without making some Provision for the Discharge of it; more especially as, in the first Clause of the Act for granting the other Moiety in exchange for the Wards and Liveries, Provision is actually made for the Payment of 3450 l. which had been disburs'd, in virtue of an Order of the House, dated November 26, 1660, for the use of that Port.

60,000 l. per annum to be given out of it, for the Support of Dunkirk.

Bill to annex that Part to the Crown.

But whatever was intended in the Grant, it is certain nothing of this kind is express'd in the Bill: And in Consequence of such Omissions, which are never made but in Flattery to the Court, those in Power have always pleaded the Letter of the Law in Excuse for their breaking thro' the imply'd Obligation.

Great, substantial, and extensive as these Concessions

(r) That of the late King, as it appear'd upon Enquiry, amounted comparative Acies, but to 407,819 l. whereof 210,493 l. arose partly by illegal Exactions, and partly by Taxes, which were now expir'd. And Mr. Archdeacon Eard is so ingenious as to own, that the House came to this Resolution of augmenting the King's Revenue, from a just Consideration, That the Misfortune of the late King, and the consequent Misfortunes, were originally owing to his want of Money.

(s) Note, This was to defray the Expence of a Sea-Guard, and to answer all the other Charges of Government.
(t) To render this Bill more effectual, they put it another to prevent Frauds and Concoctions in the Customs and Subsidies, by which the Customhouse-Officers were authoriz'd to search suspected Houses; but then the Search was to be made by the Boys, with the Assistance of the Sheriff, Justice of Peace, or Constable; and if upon false Information, the injur'd Party to recover full Costs and Damages, by Action of Treason.

(u) Plain English, by Mr. Hampden. Vide State Truths, Temp. Guil. III.

(w) The Parliament had offer'd the same Sum to the late King on the same Condition, when he was at the Ill of White. And we are told by Mr. C., in his late Controversy with the Bye-Bander, they would have given 200,000 l. rather than have broke off on that Article.

(x) This Rate is to be found in Dr. Downam's Essay upon Wages and Mould, p. 70.

(y) It ought to be acknowledged, That when the House came first to a Resolution to advance the Revenue to 1,200,000 l. per ann. they address'd his Majesty, not to grant us more out of his Treasures, till they had settled his Revenue, &c.

(z) Mr. C. allows, that from Michaelmas 1668 to Michaelmas 1688, the nett Produce of the Excise was 268,072 l. 15 s. 7 d. That from 1685 to 1688, it was 307,986 l. 4 s. 3 d. and from 1668 to 1693, 322,307 l. 3 s. 3 d. (and this is the Truth). During all which Time it was in Farm, but that the Farmers, as often as any public Calamity afforded them a Pretext, came to the King for Defalcations. Parliamentary Proceedings, p. 112.

(a) Yet the Parliament, in the Hereditary Excise, allow'd him 60000 l. per Ann. for the Support of it: I do not find this mentioned in the Body of the Act, yet several Members assur'd me, it was so intended in passing the said Coxe's Dictum, vol. ii. p. 106.

(b) Among whom it was Lord. The Lord Chancellor, in his Speech, at the opening of the next Parliament, acknowledg'd that Bill had the most universal Consent and Approbation from the whole Nation, that ever any Bill could be assented with.

A. D. 1656. Concessions to the Demands of the Court were, they did not operate immediately: The Poll Bill had not answered to pay off all the Levies, both by Sea and Land, and the Parliament having taken the Affair into their own Hands, it was incumbent on them to make good the Deficiency.

Accordingly, one Bill was brought in and pass'd, for the levying of the Arrears of the twelve Months Assessment, commencing June 24, 1659, and the six Months Assesment, commencing December 25, 1659; another for granting (c) 420000 l. by an Assesment of 70000 l. per Month, for six Months, for disbanding the Remainder of the Army, and paying off the Navy; and a third for the speedy raising of 70000 l. for the present Supply of his Majesty.

They likewise threw in (d) a Bill of Attainder, in which the ten Persons already executed, are not only said to have most deservedly inflicted the Pains of Death, but (e) Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride, tho' in their Graves, were attaind, and the Estate, Goods, Chattels and Debts of them, and many others, were declar'd forfeit to his (f) Majesty.

We must, however, take notice of their national as well as loyal Proceedings. They established the Post-house; they prohibited the planting and sowing of Tobacco in England or Ireland; they made certain wholesome Regulations in the Trade of Bay-making at Calcester. In the Act for establishing the Wine-Licence-Office, they provided against the Adulteration of Wines, and ascertain'd the (g) retail Prices thereof, which were, nevertheless, liable to be raised or lowered by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord President, &c. They prohibited the Exportation of Wool, Woolfells, Fullers Earth, or any kind of scowering Earth. They laid a Restraint on the taking of excessive Uriury, and they had the Honour to frame the great Act for the encouraging and increasing of Shipping and Navigation.

But neither their Merits, nor their Services, could defend them from a Dissolution. The Sentence was gone forth, and a Week's Reprieve was the utmost Favour they could obtain. According to the King's Message, their last Day was to have been the 20th of December; but, for the sake of winding up their Bottom, they were endur'd till the 29th; when the Speaker introduc'd the Bills, which were ready for the Royal Assent, with an (h) Harangue, in many Places, so overflowing with Flattery, that even in these courtly Times, Speaker's Speech.

(1) They had before pass'd a Bill for the raising 140,000 l. for the complete disbanding of the Army, and paying part of the Navy.

(2) In which there is the following remarkable Passage:

"We therefore your Majesty's said dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, do hereby renounce, disown, and protest against that Impious Fact, the execrable Murder, and separation of Treason committed against the sacred Person and Life of our said late Sovereign, your Majesty's most Royal Father, and all Proceedings tending thereunto, and do beseech your most Excellent Majesty, that it may be declared, and be it hereby declared, that by the unobscured and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, neither in the Person of this Realm, nor the Commons, nor both together, in Parliament or out of Parliament, nor the People collectively or representatively, nor any other Person whatsoever, ever had, have, or ought to have, any coercive Power over the Persons of the Kings of this Realm."

(3) And by the joint Order of both Houses, their Bodies were drawn upon Handles to Tyburn, where they were first hang'd, and then bury'd under the Gallows.

(4) Who below'd those of the most value on the Duke of York.

(5) Which, as a matter of some Curiosity, are inserted as follows:

Canary, Alicante, and other sweet Wines, 1 s. 6 d. }
French Wines of any sort, 8 d. } per Quart.
Rhenish, 1 s. }

(6) It runs thus:

"Most Gracious Dread Sovereigns,

"The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses now assembled in Parliament, being the representative Body of your Commons of England, are as Conduits Pipes or Quills to convey the Streams of your People's dutiful Affections and humble Desires into your Royal Presence; and that being done, they need no other Speaker but yourself, for they know your Will, and they have had Experience of your Will."

"And yet, Royal Sir, though they have no Cause to complain, they cannot but take Notice of your Partiality; for when any thing in Point of Right, or but Consequence, hath fallen out to be, as we said to say, a meddling Call, a disputable Case between yourself and your People, without any Regard or Respect had unto your own Right, or the Advantage that might accrue to yourself by asserting the same, if the Good of your People hath come in Competition with it, you have call'd it against yourself, and given it on your People's Side."

"Royal Sir, thus to undo yourself to do your People Good, is not to do as you would be done unto; and what can we do less, than by way of a grateful Remission, cheerfully to pay your Majesty the just Tribute of our dutiful Obedience unto all your royal Commands, and upon all Occasions readily to service &c. &c. All that we have or can, Lives and Fortunes, in the Service of an Inalienable Sovereign."

"But, Royal Sir, it becomes not me to fill your Majesty's Ears with Air; Loquax, ut se videtur, is the only Phrenetic People ought to use to such a King of Kindness, and a Prince so full of good Works; and therefore, as I am commanded, I must humbly assure your Majesty, that the many healing Expedients proposed by yourself in your several most gracious Declarations, have been the Subject Matter upon which your Commons have wrought all this Parliament: And in the first Place, they took into Consideration, the great and growing Charges which then lay upon your People, for the Support of your Army and Navy; and they consider'd it necessary, to begin with that Part thereof next at Hand, wherein your People would receive the most Ease, and the greatest Security and Satisfaction, which was the Disbanding your Majesty's Army by Land, and the paying off five and twenty of your Ships then in the Harbour, and of no use: And this led them to the Consideration of such Ways and Means, as were to be used to raise Money for that Purpose: And that for Poll-Money being propos'd and pass'd, some were of Opinion, that that alone would have perform'd the Work: Others having had Experience of a former Bill of the same Nature, and upon the like Occasion, fearing it might not answer Expectation; and being not willing to be deceiv'd the second time, especially in such a Business as this, wherein a Minute was like to prove to penal, mov'd for a further Supply, which after some Debate was agreed upon, of two Months Assesment at 70,000 Pounds a Month, and both have not yet fully done the Work for which they were design'd, but with the Help of two other Bills here in my Hand; the one entitl'd, An Act for the levying of the Arrears of the twelve Months Assesment, commencing the four and twentieth of June, 1659, and for raising the four commencing the five and twentieth of December, 1659.

"And the other entitl'd, An Act for the further raising and explaining certain Deficits in an Act for the speedy Provision of Money for disbanding and paying off the Forces of this Kingdom both by Land and Sea. They hope this Account will be fully cleared off at last."

"Sir, your Commons have likewise taken into their Consideration, the Change of your Summer Fines, which besides that Part thereof your Majesty is pleas'd to take upon yourself, for your ordinary Guard of the Seas, will amount unto a very great Sum. And as it is a great Debt, so also it is a growing Debt; in a few Months it doubles. There is a Saying, Qui cito dat, cito dat; I am sure it is most true in this Case, Qui cito solvit, cito solvit; to pay this Debt readily, is the way to pay it but once; and to take time to pay it, is the sure way to pay it twice."

Times, it cannot be read without Loathing. The King, on the other hand, in his Speech of Thanks, had these and the like Expressions:

King's Speech.

"You have outdone all the good and obliging Acts of your Predecessors towards (1) the Crown; and therefore you cannot but believe my Heart is exceedingly enlarg'd with the Acknowledgment.

"Many former Parliaments have had particular Denominations from what they have done; they have been styled Learned and Unlearned, and sometimes have had worse Epithets; I pray let us all resolve, that this be for ever called, The Healing and the Blessed Parliaments. . . .
"I shall not more propose any one Rule to

"And therefore your Commons, laying aside the sad Thoughts of their long Sufferings, and those miserable Devolutions and Perjuries they have laid under for many Years last past, and looking upon the Necessity of Affairs, which call importunately, and must be answered effectually, have passed another Bill here in my Hand, entitled, An Act for the Main's Allowance at 70,000 l. per Month, to begin the first of January, and to be paid in the one Moiety thereof before the first of February, and the other Moiety, being the remaining Part, by the first of April next ensuing, which is to be apply'd wholly to the paying of the Arrears of your Majesty's Navy and Army.

"I have three other Bills in my Hand, which have Relation to your Majesty's Revenue, and are Branches thereof; the one entitled, An Act for the better Ordering the Selling of Wines by Retail, and for preventing Abuse in the Buying, Carrying, and Retailing of Wines, and for fixing and limiting the Prices of the same. And this Bill is tendered unto your Majesty, for preventing all Invasive Disputes touching the Legality thereof. For we know it is your Majesty's Desire, that nothing might be done, by any of your Officers or Ministers that shall under you, Sine Regis Jussu, & contra Regis Legem.

"Another is entitled, An Act for settling and establishing a Right of Sale, as likewise legally settled, and to be of very great Use to all your Majesty's People, and especially your Merchants, for holding Intelligence with their Correspondents, Factors, and Agents in foreign Parts; Likewise Just Judges Adami; and without the same and speedy Dispatch and Conveyance of their Letters, they will never be able to give time their Business, nor carry on their Trades to an equal Advantage with the Merchants of other Countries. The other Bill provides for the increasing of your Majesty's ordinary and constant Revenue, by the Grant of an Impoll to be taken upon Ale, Beer, and other Beveridges therein particularly mentioned and expressed; to hold to your Majesty for Life, which God long continue: And as it is the Desire of your Commons, that your Majesty might never be necessitated to resort to any extraordinary or extraordinary Ways and Means, for the raising of Money upon your People; so likewise they acknowledged it to be their Duty, to impart and uphold, to the utmost of their Powers, the Honour and Grandeur of your Majesty's Royal State and Dignity. And for a further Evidence of your Commons' dutiful Affection to your Majesty's most dear and royal Person, they have passed another Bill, for the raising of 70,000 l. for your Majesty's further Supply; all which Bills I am commanded humbly to present your Majesty withal, and to pray your gracious Acceptance thereof, and your Royal Assent thereunto.

"There are other Bills likewise of public Concernment which have passed both Houses, and do now attend upon your Majesty, waiting for your Royal Assent. The one is intitled, An Act for the Attainder of several Persons guilty of the late Murder of his late father Majesty, your Royal Father, of ever blessed Memory. There is another Bill, intitled, An Act for Confirmation of Letters and Grants from Colleges and Hospitals. This will tend much to the quieting of many Mens Estates, that in the late unhappy Times were enforced to renew, and change their Estates much for the worse, were it not for the Favour your Majesty intends them in this Bill.

"There is another Bill to prohibit the Exportation of Wool, Wool-Fells, Fallers's Wark, or any other following Wares. Woolen Manufactures, beside the Duties they pay your Majesty for your Customs here at home, have great Impressions laid upon them in foreign Parts where they are vented: In the Low-Countries 16 or 17 per Cent, and in Portugal 20 per Cent, at the least. But those who for their own private, base, fishy Lucre sake, having no Regard or Respect unto the public Good, that shall over the Materials of which those Manufactures are made, pay not one Penny either here or there, and by that Means Strangers do make these Manufactures of our Wool upon such easy Terms, that they can afford, and do undersell your Merchants, which is the Cause of a double Loss: First to your Majesty in your Customs, and in the rest due to your People, who are thereby distressed and discouraged, and in a short Time, if not prevented, will be surely beaten out of that ancient native staple Trade, upon which many thousands of Families do wholly depend for all their Livelhood and Subsistence.

"There is another Bill, intitled, An Act for prohibiting the Pleating, Selling or Sending of Tobacco in England and Ireland. This Clause is to hold that in never comes to any Maturity or Perfection: For we find by Experience, though it is never to well healed, made up with the greatest Art and Skill that possible can be, yet it is impossible, after it is made up into the Roll, to keep it and preserve it from putrifying above three or four Months at the most; and therefore Physicians, even those that love it best, and use it most, conclude generally, that it is unwholesome for Men's Bodies: Besides many other great Damages and Inconveniences will follow upon it, if it should be permitted. The Abatement of your Majesty's Custom, the Destruction of your Plantations abroad, the diminishing of Navigation, and to consequently the Decay of Shipping, which are the Walls and Bulwarks of your Majesty's Kingdom.

"There is another Bill, intitled, An Act for the bettering away the Court of Wards and Liveries, together with Tenants in Capite, Knights-Service, Tenants and Parsonages. This Bill, ex re nata, may properly be called a Bill of Exchange: For, as Care is therein taken for the Ease of your People, so the Supply of that Part of your Majesty's Revenue, which formerly came into your Treasury by means of Tenants, and for your People, is to be likewise fully provided for by the Grant of a new Impollition to be taken upon Ale, Beer, and other Liquors, to hold to your Majesty, your Heirs and Successors for ever: And yet they should not look upon the Considerations mentioned in this Bill, as a full Compensation and Recompence for your Majesty's parting with so much Royal Prerogatives, and ancient Privileges of your Crown, if more were not imply'd in that is expell'd. For, Royal Sir, your Tenures in Capite are not only turned into a Tenure in Socage, (tho' that alone will for ever give your Majesty a just Right and Title to the Labour of our Ploughs, and the Sweat of our Brows) but they are likewise turned into a Tenure in Copyhold. What your Majesty had before in your Court of Wards, you will be forc'd to find it hereafter in the Exchequer of your People's Hearts. The King of Spain's Mines will sooner deceive him, than this Revenue will fail you: For his Mines have Bottoms, but the deeper your Majesty sinks yourself into the Hearts and Affection of your People, the greater you will find your Wealth to be, and the more invincible your Strength.

"Royal Sir, We have nothing more to offer or to ask; but most conclude all our Work this Parliament, with an humble and thankful Acknowledgment of God's infinite Goodness and Mercy in referring your Majesty to your Royal and Imperial Crown, Throne, and Dignity: And for making you the Restorer of that which is dearer unto us than our Lives, our Religion; in which, thro' God's Blessing and gracious Assistance, we are restored to live and die: As likewise, for referring us to our Magna Charta Libertatis, having taken the Charge and Care of them into your own Heart, which is our greatest Security, and more than a thousand Confederations.

"Royal Sir, you have denied us nothing we have desired this Parliament; indeed you have outdone your Parliament, by doing much more for us, than we could agree among ourselves to ask; and therefore that must needs be a happy Parliament: This is making Parliament, with an ending, peace-making Parliament, a blessed Parliament, a Parliament, propter excellentiam, that may truly be called Parliamentum Parthenonum: No Man can say, that hath made the most curious Search into Books or Records, that there ever was such a Parliament as this; and 'tis our unpardonable Joy and Comfort, that no Man can say, so long as your Majesty lives, but we may have such another: So you have for your Royal Heart spent it to do your People good. And as we have nothing more to say, so we have nothing more to do, but that which will be a doing as long as we have a Being; the pouring out our Souls unto Almighty God for your Majesty's long, long, long, and most happy, blessed, glorious and prosperous Reign over us."

(1) And yet they were not offer'd to sit above Eight Months upon the whole. The Chancellor indeed, notwithstanding the Message concerning their speedy Dissolution, before treated of, signifies in his Speech, that they were dissolved agreeable to their own Wishes and Desires.

A. D. 1666. "to myself, in my Actions add my Counsels, than this, What is a Parliament like to think of this Action or this Counsel? And it shall be Want of Understanding in me, if it will not bear the Test." - - -

He then spoke of the good Effects of the Act of Oblivion, of which he said, "I will not only observe it religiously and inviolably myself, but also exact the Observation of it from others: And if ever any Person shall have the Boldness to attempt to persuade me to the contrary, he will find such an Acceptation from me, as he would have, who should persuade me to burn Magna Charta, cancel all the old Laws, and to erect a new Government after my own Invention and Appetite."

We have already had a Proof, that it was the Custom of these Times, for the King to give the Text, and the Chancellor the Comment: It is therefore necessary to make use of both; for the said Pieces are fram'd to put the best Glois on the Outside of Government, that it will bear, they generally betray the Defects within.

Lord Chancellor's Speech.

His Lordship having touch'd on the complete Harmony, which had subsisted between the King and his Parliament, he took occasion to recantulate the great Things his Majesty had done for his People, more especially in composing the unhappy Differences in Matters of Religion; in which, as he assures us, Constantine himself had hardly spent more Time: But then, he hinted, these Contentions of his had not reap'd their full Harvest: That some Men, by their Writings and Preachings, rashly and unconscientiously kept open the old Breaches, and maintain'd what had been done amiss: And therefore he hop'd, that all pious and practicable Men would be well contented to see them reduc'd by Law, to the Obedience they owe to Law. - - Having then weigh'd in a Compliment to the City of London, by calling it his Majesty's beloved City, his Lordship proceeded to the following remarkable Particulars:

"This Discourse puts me in mind to say to you, that though the King wonders much more at the many great Things you have done, than that you have left any thing undone, yet he could have wish'd, and would have been glad, that your other weighty Affairs had given you Time to have publish'd your Opinion and Advice in the Business of the Militia; that the People, after so many Disputes upon that Argument, might have discern'd, that the King and his two Houses of Parliament are as much of the same Mind in that as in all other things, as no doubt they are. But since that could not be done, you may all assure yourselves, that the King will proceed therein with all imaginable Care and Circumspection, for the Ease, and Quiet, and Security of his People: And as he did before the last Recess, by the unanimous Advice of his Privy Council, issue out his Commissions of Lieutenancy for the setting the Militia in the several Counties, to prevent any Disorders which many apprehended might arise upon the Disbanding the Army; so he will now again recom-mend it to them, not keep themselves in such a Posture, as may disappoint any serious Designs, which are now on foot; and there cannot be too much Circumspection and Vigilance to frustrate those Designs: You have heard of many suspected and dangerous Persons; which have been lately clapp'd up; and it was high Time to look about: His Majesty hath spent many Hours himself in the Examination of this Business; and some of the principal Officers, who before they came to his Majesty's Presence, could not be brought to acknowledge any thing, after the King himself had spoken to them, confessed, that their Spirits were insensibly prevail'd upon, and subdu'd; and that it was not in their Power to conceal their Guilt from him. They have confessed, that there is a Party of the late disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and others, full of Discontent, and seditious Purposes, and a Resolution to attempt the Change of the present Government, and to erect the Republic. They acknowledge, that they did purpose to have made their Attempt for the Rescue of those Wretches, [Kenner, &c.] who were so justly condemn'd at Newgate, and so worthily execut'd; and that Ludlow should then have appear'd in the Head of them; that they made themselves sure, at the same time, by Parties and Confederacy to have surpris'd the Tower of London, and the Castle of Windsor, but that they found, or at least apprehended, that their Design was discover'd; which so brast their Spirits, that they concluded they must acquiesce for the present, and stay till the Army should be disbanded, which they said was generally debauch'd, that is, returned to an honest and just Obedience to the King; and that it was evident they were betray'd by those who were most entirely trust'd by them: And they were in the right: The King had Notice of all their Design, what Progress it made, and the Night they intended to surprize the Tower and Windsor, and gave Notice to the several Governors; and so, without any Noise, that Mischief was by God's Goodness prevented. They acknowledge, that they have since recover'd their Courage and Resolution, and were about this time to make their full Attempt: They have been promis'd some considerable Rising in the West under Ludlow, and in the North under others; but this Place was the Scene of greatest Hope: They made sure of a Body here, I think they say, of two thousand five hundred Men, with which they resolv'd, in the first place, to secure [you know what that Security is] the Person of the General, the Duke of Albemarle, with whom they have so much Reason to be angry, and at the same time to possess themselves of Whitehall; you know the Method used in such Possessing, KILL, and take Possessions; and this inopportable Calamity God hath again diverted from us; though I must tell you, the free Men, who

“ seem to speak honestly, and upon the Impulsion of Conscience, are very far from being confident, that there will not be some desperate Insurrections and Attempts in several Parts of the Kingdom within a short time, which all possible Care will be taken to prevent.”

Here follow'd another Compliment to the very good City of London, after which his Lordship added,

“ The King doth not believe, that all these Persons who at present are apprehended, and in Custody, will be found guilty of this Treason: It is a vulgar and known Artifice, to corrupt inferior Persons, by persuading them, that better Men are engaged in the same Enterprize, and the King will make as much Haite as he can to set those at Liberty, against whom the Evidence or Suspicion is not too reasonable: In the mean time, they who are in truth innocent must confest, that the Proceeding towards them hath been very natural, and full of Clemency; and no Man will wonder, if his Majesty be very desirous, that in this Conjunction, and in order to prevent or suppress these too visible Distempers and Machinations, his Militia, in all Places, be in good Order and Preparation.”

Again afterwards,
“ And you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, you are now returning to your Country, laden with a Trust not inferior, or less weighty, than that you brought with you from thence; you came up their Deputies to the King, and he returns you now his Deputies to them, his Plenipotentiaries, to inform and assure them, that he thinks himself the happiest and the greatest Prince of the World, not from the Situation of his Dominions, and the Power of his great Navy, with which he can visit his Neighbours, and keep them from visiting him, or from the noble Revenue you have settled upon him, which he will improve with all good Husbandry, but from being possessed of the Hearts and Affections of such Subjects; that he doth so entirely love them, and depend upon them, that all his Actions, and all his Counsels, shall tend to no other End, but to make them happy and prosperous; that he thinks his Honour and his Interest principally to consist, in providing for, and advancing, the Honour and Interest of the Nation. That you may have the more Credit in what you say, he will not take it unkindly, if you publish his Defects and Infirmities. You may tell them, that he is so confident in the Multitude of his very good and faithful Subjects, that he is very hard to be persuaded, that

“ his few ill and unfaithful Subjects can do him much Harm; that he so much depends upon the Affection of honest Men, and their Zeal for his Security, that he is not so solicitous and vigilant for his own Safety as he ought to be, amidst so many Combinations, of which he is so well inform'd, that his Servants, who wish Orief and Anguish importune him not to take so little Care of his own Safety, can obtain no other Answer from him, that what Cæsar heretofore gave to his jealous Friends, Mori se mille quam timere, or timere; he will die any Death, rather than live in Fear of his own Subjects, or that they should live in Fear of him. You may tell them, as a great Infirmity, that a troubled and discontented Countenance so afflicts him, that he would remove it from them at his own Charge, as if he himself were in Fault; and when he hath been inform'd of any less kind, or jealous Thing said among you, as your Windows are never so close shut, but that the Sound of your Words goes to the several Corners of the Town, his Majesty hath been heard to say no more, but, What have I done? I wish that Gentleman and I were acquainted; that he knew me better. Oh, Gentlemen, you cannot be yourselves, nor you cannot make your Friends, too zealous or too jealous for such a Prince's Safety, or so solicitous for such a Prince's Satisfaction and Content, to whom we may very justly say, as the King of Tyre writ to Solomon, Because God hath loved his People, he hath made thee King over them: Even his Defects and Infirmities are very necessary towards the full Measure of our Prosperity.”

Of the many Combinations among so few ill and unfaithful Subjects, mention'd by his Lordship, we shall have Occasion to speak more at large hereafter. But first it is proper to take our Leave of this wonder-working Parliament, which was now dissolv'd, the Breath of the King dispersing, what the Keepers of the Liberties of England had gather'd together; for which the Chancellor has already favour'd us with one Reason; Their omitting to settle the Militia to the King's Mind: And we shall soon be furnish'd with another: The Restoring the Bishops to their Seats in Parliament. Neither of these favourite Points seems to have been palatable to them: They had perhaps also offended, by leaving the King under a (k) Necessity to have Recourse to Parliaments, for the Removal of present and future Difficulties; and, by their Officiousness with regard to Dunkirk: It was not likely that they would soon be reconcil'd to the Sale of a Port, which they had taken such Precautions to keep. On all Remarks on the Convention-Parliament.

(2) The Public hath been lately amus'd with a Controversy on this Subject, between Mr. C—— and the Author of a Piece call'd the Eye-Standers. One of which Gentlemen accuses the Parliament of being sub-liberal, and the other of having the King, robbed and incens'd in every Part of his Government: But both have in some Degree, either deceiv'd themselves, or would deceive their Readers. It was not thus the Fashion to impoverish the People, in order to gratify the Court; their Supplies were given in Aid; they did not undertake to saddle the People with the subtle Load of Government: And whatever other Powers the Convention-Parliament suffer'd the King to exercise, they, in the main, took care to continue that of the Purse in their own. But on the contrary, if they did not gorge the King, they gave him far greater Supplies, than any of our Kings had ever receiv'd before; such as with a little Oeconomy, would have put him above Want, or Difficulties; and it was never their Design to put him above Dependence.

all Accounts, therefore, it was necessary they should give place to Men of more fashionable Principles. Upon the Whole, it has been their peculiar Fate to be obnoxious to the Royalists, for not having given into all the Measures of the Court; and to the Republicans, for having made too free with the Truff, which they receiv'd from the People.

Their Leaders.

Those who seem to have had the greatest Affecancy among them, were, Haller, Abby-Coper, and Amesley, who were Presbyterians, and, under Munk, had been the principal Agents in bringing about the Restoration; for which they were all rewarded with Places and Honours, to the no small Discontent of the Cavalier Party, and the Envy of their own.

A Spirit of Frenzy first discover'd at Court.

It is worth remarking in this Place, that a Spirit of Venality had very soon discover'd itself at Court: Even at Brida, not only the House of Commons, and City of London, made their Peace with large Offerings of Money, but private Delinquents had Recourc to the same Method of purchasing Pardon. We have already mention'd the Sum, which was there bid by the Papists for a Toleration: And when the Presbyterians, and other Dis- fenters, found Reason to conclude, that the

(1) Commission, issued by the King, for the adjusting of those Sales, and other Alienations of the Crown and Bishops Lands, which had been made during his Exile, would not operate in their Favour, they, likewise, indirectly, attempted to compromise the Affair, by an Offer of Five hundred thousand Pounds, for an Act of Parliament to confirm them in their several Grants and Purchases, for the Term of Ninety-nine Years. But what is still more material, Mr. Alexander Popham, to oblige the King, as it is delicately phras'd by Mr. Echard, undertook, by proper Management of the House of Commons, to procure an Act for settling on him and his Successors above Two Millions a Year by way of Subsidy; which, together with his late Acquisitions of the Excise, would have enabled him to have shook off the Restraint of Parliaments in the Beginning, as he actually did towards the latter End of his Reign.

Project to make the King absolute.

And to this lumping Proposal, as we are told by the same Authority, not only the King, to whom it was most agreeable, but the Lord Treasurer (m) Soubhampton, lent an Ear: And we are farther assur'd, it was owing

(1) The like Method (that is to say, Shew of Malversation) was observ'd by those sheep who had purchased the Church-Lands, and who promised themselves full Satisfaction, according to the Message from Breda: Commissioners being appointed to that End. But after they had sat once or twice, and heard their Invections against the late Sales, as scandalous, the Purchasers finding them for the most part to be of the same Opinion, were quite discouraged from any further Prosecution of the Matter. Ladlow, vol. iii. p. 58.

Some of the most remarkable Particulars in this Commission, were as follow:

" And albeit by the Vote of our Commons, as by the Order of the Parliament assembled, we have been directed to the immediate Possession of our Lands, and might in Justice, as well as divers of our Subjects, have entered and claim the Profits thereof, from the four and twentieth Day of June last yet that it may appear how really we intend to perform all our gracious Promises and Professions made to the Officers and Soldiers of our Army, who did correspond or join with our said General, or Sir George Ruth, in their Design towards our happy Restoration, and to such other of our Subjects, as have been induced to purchase and to possess any of our said Lands, or the Use of the Joynure of our dear Monarch, our Queen, or any of the Lords and Possessors of any Arch-bishop, Bishop, Dean and Chapter, Prebend, or other ecclesiastical Person: We were graciously pleas'd to accept the humble Petition of the said Officers and Soldiers, presented unto us in July last, and to commend the same to the Commissioners of our Treasury, as we have since done to our High Treasurer of England, who have authorized our Surveyor-General to receive such Particulars of our Lands purchased and claimed by the said Officers and Soldiers, in their own Ours, and not in trust for others, as they should tender under their Hands, and thereupon to keep them in the quiet Possession of the same without Account (which hath been daily observ'd) until we should be inform'd of the true States of their several Interests, and should thereupon declare our further Pleasies touching their said Part. And we were also graciously pleas'd to accept of another Petition, presented unto us in the names of all the Purchasers of our Lands, together with certain Proposals touching the same, which by Advice of our Privy Council, we did refer to the Consideration of our Chief Baron, and other the Barons of our Court of Exchequer, and our Surveyor-General, who by taking the same into their serious Consideration, did represent unto us, and our said Council, the various Natures of the said Purchasers, and that it will require much Time and Industry to examine and consider the Particular Interests of the several Purchasers, before it will be possible to make any Report upon their said Petition and Proposals. It for our Judgment thereon. Whereupon we were pleas'd, and did command, that our said Surveyor-General should allow unto them all their Arrears of Rents due before

" the four and twentieth Day of June last to their own Use without Account, and the Mortgages Rent also since due, upon such Security as he should think reasonable to be answerable for the same, which hath been accordingly perform'd by him as we commanded, and we do hereby ratify and confirm the same. Now to the End that we may leave nothing undone, which Honour and Justice may require at our Hands, for the establishment of the just Rights and Interests of all Persons, and quiet their Minds, and reconcile their Affections, which the Injury of the late times of Change, and absolute, arbitrary Power, had corrupted and alienated from us, and divided amongst themselves: we have thought fit to issue this our Commission."

Here follows a List of the Names of the Commissioners: after which they are directed to summon the Purchasers before them, to enquire into the true, honest, and Conditions of all Grants, Sales, &c. what Writs and Damages had been made in Falls of Wood; which had relinquish'd, or offer'd to relinquish, &c. After which it proceeds thus:

" And thereupon you are to proceed and compose all Differences arising between the said Archbishops, Bishops, Deans and Chapters, Prebends and other Ecclesiastical Persons, and the said Purchasers or pretended Owners, and thereupon to make Orders and Agreements betwixt them in Writing under your Hands and Seals, and in such manner as you in your Discretion shall find just and reasonable with their Consents. And in case of Refusal or Disagreement on either Part, then you are, forthwith, to certify the same unto us, and our Council: whereupon you shall receive such further Order therein as shall be meet; and you are then also to propose unto the said Officers and Soldiers, and other Purchasers of our own Lands, such Satisfaction for and in respect of their several pretended Interests in the same, as upon Consideration of their several Interests, you shall think fit to advise in that behalf, and therefore you shall certify us with all convenient Speed.

(2) Philip's Account of this Affair is worth the Reader's Attention. While the King's Revenue, says he, was settling in Parliament, a remarkable Accident happen'd. Some Persons, whether over-conscientious Loyallists, or servile Buzarians, had laid a Project to settle, by Parliament, such a Revenue on the King, during Life, as should make it needless for him to depend upon a Parliament for more. The King and all the unthinking or ill-designing Courtiers came into it; and even the good Earl of Soubhampton, out of perfect Affection to the King, join'd in the Project. But Chancellor Hild oppos'd it, which produc'd a Conference between himself and the Earl. The Chancellor being earnest to bring the Earl to his Opinion, told him, that his long and intimate Acquaintance with the King, made him better acquainted with his Temper, than the Earl could be; that he knew the King to well, that, if such a Revenue were once settled, they were would become useless, and few Sessions of Parliament were ing solely to the (n) Chancellor's Weight and Authority, that it was not embrac'd, who diverted his Majesty from it, by assuring him, that his best Revenue would be the Hearts of his People; and thereby laid the Foundation of his own Ruin.

The King was now fix'd in his Throne; the Army was disbanded; the Parliament was dissolved; his Revenue was settled; his Enemies were under his Feet; the Church was on the point of being restor'd; the Storms and Tempests, which had so long beat upon the Court, seem'd to have spent their Fury, and scarce one threatening Cloud remain'd, to fully the Sky, or overcast the Landkip.

And here it is that our Reverend and Right Reverend Historians pause, to wonder how so fair a Morning could be follow'd with so foul a Day, and so black an Evening; and make no Scruple to ascribe the Change to the ill Humours of the People; in order to disculpate the King and his Ministers.

All Humours, it must be confess'd, there still remain'd among the People's. It cannot be suppos'd, that the Spirit which had attempted and performed such great Things, in order to raise up a Republic on the Ruins of Monarchy, was wholly subdued; that the Presbyterian Faction, which had such Claims upon the Court, would submit, without murmuring, to the Dominion of their Episcopal Brethren; that the Hatred, which all the other Secularies, not without Reason, bore to the Presbyterians, together with their own different and opposite Qualities, would not increase the general Ferment of the Nation; that the Papists would not lie in wait, to make use of every Incident to their own particular Advantage; and that the Disobliged and Discontented of all Sorts, would not scatter their Seeds on all Sides, which propagate Confusion.

These ill Humours, however, would soon have evaporated, if the King had establish'd his Throne in Righteousness, if he had govern'd with the Scepter of Mercy, instead of the Rod of Power; and had approv'd himself the common Father of all his People.

But Princes chuse rather to break than bend; and the Maxim generally predominant in their Councils is, to disable the People from resenting Injuries, instead of endeavouring to attach them by the Ties of Gratitude and Affection.

Beside, as the present King, as well as his Father, had suffer'd much by the Overpoize of Power, which had been thrown into the Scale of the People; it was perhaps but natural for him to think, in the first place, of taking out all that Weight, and adding it to his own: But then it was as natural, likewise, for a People, who had discover'd to warm a Sense of Liberty, and gone such Lengths to preserve it, to keep a strict and jealous Eye on their new Monarch, and to be strongly alarm'd at any sudden and manifest Designs to precipitate them into Slavery.

And that some Designs were on foot, which could not fail of giving Umbrage to a great Part of the Nation, the Evidence already before us, has render'd undeniable.

The Instructions before spoken of, which had been given to the Judges, to put the Laws in Force for the Re-establishment of the (e) Liturgy, had shaken the Credit of the King's Declarations, and render'd his Promises in the First, and his Concessions in the Last, ineffectual; the said Judges overruling all Pleas drawn from either of them, and openly insisting, that the King's (p) Declaration was no Error.

But tho' the King's Authority was not allow'd to operate in Mitigation of the Law, by way of Indulgence to certain Classes of his Protestant Subjects; it was blindly submitted to, when exerted in the Case of the Militia, which he undertook to regulate by virtue of his own Prerogative, in Contempt of the Power and Privilege of that very Parliament, to which he stood indebted for his Crown.

The Prerogative was yet farther let loose against the Liberty of the Subject: So early to be expected afterwards. This brought over that heavy and unwhol'd Patriot.

Bishop Barnet likewise tells us, that this great Lord, Southampton, when better acquainted with the King's Designs and Intentions, reproach'd his Friend Gloucester with having been the Cause of all that the Nation then suffer'd or fear'd, by his having given such advantageous Impediments of the King, in his Letters, as induc'd the Parliament to admit him without Terms.

(4) Either clearly foreseeing the fatal Consequences which must attend so pernicious a Project, or jealous that, in such a Case, the General would be of more Consequence than the Chancellor.

(5) If any say, that the Ministers of England are bound by the Laws of England to use the Common Prayer-Book, beside that it is a great Question, how far the Laws of a Nation can oblige the Conscience in Matters of divine Worship.—We make it a great Question, whether the Common-Prayer-Book be established by Law or no; and believe the contrary: That the Common-Prayer-Book 5 and 6 Edw. VI. with some Alterations made 1 Edw. viii. was established we know; but what that Book was, or where it is, we cannot tell: It is apparent, that the Books ordinarily walking up and down are not to be establish'd.

We conclude, that we judge our Brethren very uneven in their censuring of us for Disobedience to Laws, in this Case of the Common Prayer, when they do the same thing themselves, for which they charge us, singing Antiphons and Songs, &c. and using Rites and Books of Prayer in Cathedrals expressly contrary to the Statute of 1 Edw. viii. 2. and whilst the present Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, without any Laws of England, or Statute of the University, or Canon, or any other Colour of Law, and expressly contrary to his Majesty's Declaration, and contrary to all Conscience and Reason, could dispense with his Conscience, in usurping an arbitrary Power, to the open Prejudice of so many of his Majesty's Subjects, in their Children, in their first Communion, from commencing; because, at twenty-four Hours Warning, they could not read in their Conferences to subscribe to the Laws of the Common Prayer, and the Book of Constitutions, and to the thirty-nine articles, which none can with a good Conscience subscribe, but he who hath diligently read over the Books of Common Prayer, and both the Books of Homilies, and is well studied in the Points of Conscience, and in the Controversy of Church Government; yea, and indeed in the whole Body of Divinity; which none can profess of Boys of sixteen or seventeen Years of Age: Nay, how many Bachelors and Dollers in Divinity never read them? Yet all these must the Qualifications subscribe, and be forced to do so, by the arbitrary Power of the Vice-Chancellor, expressly contrary to his Majesty's Declaration. What Authority he hath since procur'd for the Future, and by what Acts we know only here we are forc'd when he did thing he had no such. Interrogatory Words in Process: A Presbyterian Piece, quoted by Br. Kennet, in his Register.

(6) Nay, to little regard was given to those infamous Promises, that even Mr. Baxter, who had been offer'd and had refus'd a Bishopric, thought himself under a Necessity to solicit the Bishop of London's Licence to preach, that, if possible, he might escape Persecution. Life of Baxter, fol. as July 18, an Order of Council was made for setting forth a Proclamation against the licentious (q) Liberty of printing and exposing factious, seditious, and libellous Papers to Sale: A Sort of Inquiritors were appointed to suppress such Papers, and to secure the Publishers, Printers, and Authors; who did not fail to answer the Ends of their Commission.

But going into his own Country of Cheshire, he was imprisoned there; and when he procured his Liberty he was fain to let to a Gross's Shop to get a Maintenance for his Family. Life of Baxter, Part II. p. 283.

Upon this Passage, Leigh's, in a Tract of his call'd Interrog. Mystical, is pleas'd to observe, That only Severity can work upon this Faction. The single Imprisonment of Croftone hath quieted that Party more than all the multiplied and transcendent Mercies of his Majesty.

(r) And yet the King, soon after his Arrival in England, had given this Answer to one Richard Holberton, who had writted upon him in the Name, and on the Behalf of the Quakers. "Well, of this you may be assured, that you shall not be any longer your self, but your Opinions, or Religion, so long as you live peacefully; and you have the Word of a King for it: And I also have given forth a Declaration to the same Purpose, that none shall wrong or abuse you." George Fox's Journal, p. 557.

The Proclamation herein alluded to, was as follows:

By the King, A Proclamation prohibiting all unlawful and seditious Meetings and Conventions, under Pretence of religious Worship.

CHARLES R.

" Although nothing can be more unwelcome to us, than " the Necessity of restraining some Part of that Liberty
" which was indulged to tender Conscience by our late " gracious Declaration: Yet since divers Persons (known by " the Name of Anabaptists, Quakers, and Fifth-Monarchy
" Men or some such like Appellation, as a Mark of Dis" tinction and Separation) under Pretence of serving God,
" do daily meet in great Numbers in secret-Places, and at " unusual Times, by Reason whereof they begin to boast of " their Multitude, and to increase in their Confidences, as " having frequent Opportunities to settle a perfect Corre-
" spondency and Concordancy between themselves, of which
" some evil Effects have already ensued, even to the Distur" bance of the public Peace by Insurrections and Murder,
" for which the Offenders must answer to the Law, and for
" worse may still be expelled, unless some speedy Course
" be taken to prevent their further Growth.

" To the intent therefore that none of those Persons who " have presumed to make so ill a Use of our Indulgence,
" may be strengthened in such their Proceedings; by any " general Words or Expressions in our late Declaration; we " have thought fit by these Presents to publish and declare
" our Royal Will and Pleasure, that no Meeting whatso" ever of the Persons aforesaid under Pretence of worship" ping God, shall at any Time hereafter be permitted or
" allowed, unless it be in some parochial Church or Chap-
" pel in this Realm, or in private Houses by the Persons
" there inhabiting. And that all Meetings and Assemblies
" whatsoever, in order to any spiritual Exercise, or serving
" of God by the Persons aforesaid, which in the Places " aforesaid, shall be esteemed, and are hereby declared to " be unlawful Assemblies, and shall be prosecuted accord" ingly, and the Persons therein assembled shall be pro" ceeded against as Persons riotously and unlawfully as" sembled.

" And for the better Execution of this our Proclama" tion, and the Prevention of all illegal and seditious Meet" ings and Conventions, we do hereby strictly charge and " command all Mayors, Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, Con" stables, Headboroughs, Commanders, and other our chief " Officers and Ministers whom it may concern, that they " cause diligent Search to be made from Time to Time,
" in all and every the Places, where any such Meetings or
" Conventions, as aforesaid, shall or may be suspected.
" And that they cause all and every the Persons therein " assembled, to be apprehended and brought before one " or more Justices of the Peace, and to be bound over to " appear at the next Session within the respective Precincts, " and in the mean Time to find Sureties for the good Be" haviour, or in Default thereof so be committed to the " next Goal.

" And further, we do will and command our Justices of " the Peace, that they cause the Oath of Allegiance to be " tender'd to every Person so brought before them, and to
" upon his or their Refusal to proceed according, as by the " Statute made in the seventh Year of the Reign of our " Royal Grandfather of ever Blessed Memory, they are di" rectly and command'd. Given at our Court at Whitehall
" the ninth Day of January, in the twelfth Year of our " Reign, 1666.

The Order of Council upon which this Proclamation was founded, was made January 20, in the following Terms:

Whitehall, Council-Board.

" Whereas divers seditious Persons, under Pretence of the " Liberty indulged by his Majesty's late gracious Declara" tions, in Reference unto tender Conscience, do meet in " great Numbers, and at unusual Times, whereby it may " be justly apprehended, that many of them enter into Plots " and Conspiracies to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. It " was therefore ordered by his Majesty in Council, That " Mr. Solicitor-General should forthwith prepare a Proclama" tion, commanding all such Persons going under the No" tion of Anabaptists, Quakers, and other heretics, to " forward

A. D. 1660. Addresses of these unhappy Enthusiasts to the King, in a very lively and affecting Manner set forth.

It is however proper to observe, that the Infurrection of about Fifty or Sixty frantic (t) Fifth-monarchy-men, under one Venner, a Wine-cooper, (to set up King Jesus against the Powers of the Earth) furnish'd the Pretence for these (u) severe Proceedings; and great Industry was then and hath since been used, to charge the Guilt and Folly of their Enterprize upon the Nonconformists in general.

And this brings us back to the Consideration of those Plots, which the Chancellor had so eloquently enlarg'd upon, in his Speech, at the Close of the last Parliament.

Oppression not only creates Discontent, but Indignation: That Men therefore, made desperate by ill Usage, should have Recourse to desperate Remedies, is not only not improbable, but extremely natural. But the Use of Plots to those who want to enlarge their own Power, at the Expence of the People's Liberty, is now so well known, and the Trick has been so often practis'd, that the Assertions of Ministers, on this Head, are no farther credited, than they are supported by Facts.

What the Design of these Conspirators was said to be, we have already seen in the Chancellor's Speech before quoted; which, he says, some of their Accomplishers, overcome by his Majesty's Royal Eloquence, confess'd: But this Confession of theirs he doth not confirm by any other Proof.

The Public Intelligences, or Gazettes, of these Times, intimate, that the Discovery was made by several Persons in several Places, who were Strangers to each others Evidence: But of these several Persons, but one is mention'd, viz. Richard Warren, a Trooper in Colonel Rassiter's Regiment.

It must be own'd, our Records are very defective on this Head: Not only Raphin and Oldmixon, but Echard himself, treats all the Stories of Plots, which were propagated at this Time, as no better than Rumours: We have various Accounts of the seizing several obnoxious Persons; but no one Circumstance is mention'd to prove that any of them were guilty.

Lord Clarendon, in his Speech, expressly affirm'd, that Ludlow was to be the Commander in chief of the Conspiracy: But he had, long before that time, fought and found an Asylum in Switzerland; and had, besides, too much good Sense to countenance any such foolish Project; which, at that Time, had not only the King and the Laws to grapple with, but the general Bent and Inclinations of the People.

Venner's Madneſs serv'd, however, to countenance all the fine Things which the Chancellor had said, and all the violent Things which had been done: Among which it ought not to be forgot, that all disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and all disolate and distressed Persons, were, by Proclamation, commanded to depart Twenty Miles from London, and not return without Leave: And the Lords Lieutenant of the several Counties were directed by Order of Council, to disarm all factious and turbulent Persons, who still retain'd their sworn and rebellious Principles, and to administer to them the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance. Advantage was likewise taken, by some of the Court Sycophants, of this Incident, to propose, that a Number of standing Forces should be continued, to preserve the King's Person, and quell any sudden Tumults; but the ill Effects of this being too apparent, we are told the Chancellor influenced the King to lay aside any such Design; or rather, he was forc'd to connive at the Foundation, tho' he made a shift to put off the immediate Raising forward not to meet (under Pretence of serving God) at usual Hours, or in great Numbers; and particularly that some of them go out of the Prescinds of his or their Habitation to any spiritual Exercise, or serving of God after their own Way; but that they do the same in their own Parishes. And if any shall be found so offend therein, the next Justices of the Peace are to cause them and every of them to be proceeded against according to the Laws provided against riotous and unlawful Assemblies.

In George Fox's Journal, Part 1. p. 560, there is also this farther Evidence of the extreme Rigour of these Times.

Now were the Prisons every where filled with Friends, and others, in City and Country; and the Poles were to bid for the searching of Letters, that none could pass unsearch'd: Yet we heard of several thousands of our Friends, that were call'd in Prison in several Places throughout the Nation; and Margaret Fell complain'd Account of them to the King and Council. The next Week we had an Account of several Thousands more that were call'd into Prison, and the next day led all them before the King and his Council. They wondered how we could have such Inintelligence, seeing they had given such full Charge for the searching of all Letters: But the Lord said to order it, that we had an Account, notwithstanding all their Stopplings. For in the deep Sense I had of the grievous Sufferings Friends underwent, and of their Innocency towards God and Man, I was mov'd to send the following Epistle to them, as a Word of Consolation, and to put them upon sending up their Sufferings.

(1) About five or six of whom, who refus'd Quarters, were kill'd upon the Spot; and about sixteen or seventeen more were executed, among whom was Frazer himself.

(2) In Switzerland a Proclamation was published to disperse the Meetings of Quakers, Anabaptists, and Fifth-monarchy- men ONLY; but in Ireland such a Loose was given to this persecuting Spirit, that the Meetings of Dissenters of all Denominations were expressly forbidden: and the Edict set forth by the Lords Justices and Council for that Purpose, had the following remarkable Preamble.

Whereas we are given to understand by the Informations of many Persons well deserving Credit, that of late Times there have been sundry unlawful Assemblies in many Parts of this Kingdom held by Papists, by Presbyterians, by Independents, by Anabaptists, by Quakers, and other Sects: Persons meeting in great Numbers, divers hundreds and sometimes thousands at an Assembly convened and congregated, some by a foreign pretended Jurisdiction, others under a pretended domestic Authority, first a Preliminary, others under a Pretence of congregational Churches, and all of them contrary to and in Contempt of his Majesty's Royal Authority and the established Laws of the Land, and if not seasonably prevented, the same the Disturbance of the good Government, Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom, &c.

(3) In the Mrs. Public of Sarisvald, December 15th, 1660, is the following Article.

This Night every many Prisons, according to Order, were by that loyal Gentleman Sir Gilbert Gerard, who then commanded the Guard, seized and committed to Custody, Col. Robert Overton, formerly called Major-General Overton, is sent to the Tower. It cannot but delight all Good Men to see how strangely favoured both City and Country are so fly in the Face of my, that are but desirous to harbour the least ill Thought against his Majesty, thinking themselves (as in Truth they are) earnestly concern'd in his Majesty's (that is the Kingdom's) Happiness and Security.

(4) He had Thoughts, at first, of raising up the Parliament Army, which was several Times in Debate: But of the Edifice: For when Monk's Regiment of Foot was disbanded according to Act of Parliament, they were taken into his Majesty's Pay; as was likewise a Regiment of Horse, by way of an extraordinary (x) Guard. And here we have the Root of our present standing Army: The Kings of England till then having had no other Guards, than the Affections of their People.

Thus, if it cannot be deny'd, that a turbulent and enthusiastic Spirit still possess'd a Part of the Nation; it is pretty apparent, that the Court had arbitrary Views from the Beginning, which it sought all Opportunities to indulge; insomuch that, if Sedition was the Pretext, Oppression was always the Consequence; as will appear yet more undeniably, from a View of the Affairs of Scotland.

In the Year 1650, when the Commonwealth of England was in the Fulness of its Power and Glory, that Nation had acknowledged the King, had invited him from abroad to take Possession of the Throne, and set the Crown upon his Head. But then, all this was done upon (y) Covenant Terms, and under the Tyranny of the Kirk; which so highly incens'd his Majesty, that he never forgot the Affront, nor remember'd the Obligation.

It was owing, however, to these loyal Measures of theirs, and their raising an Army against England, in consequence thereof, that they lost their own Liberties, and became a Province of the English Commonwealth. Cromwell subdu'd them, Monk continu'd that Subjection, and the King took advantage of the helpless Condition he found them in, and to which they had been reduc'd in his Service, to fashion their Yoke as he pleas'd. Many had offended; all were at Mercy: In the Declaration from Breda, Scotland had not been mention'd, nor was then perhaps thought of; and while the King resided in that Kingdom, he had pass'd a very full Act of Indemnity, in the Form, and under the Title, of an Act of Approbation: But this was now out of Date, as well as the Covenant; and it was held expedient to strike a Terror into Scotland, by some such Examples as had been made in England. Accordingly, the Marquis of (z) Argyle was pitch'd upon to

Barnet, vol. i. p. 105.

Chancellor Hale prevail'd upon him by this Argument, that they were a Body of Men that had cut off his Father's Head; that they had let up and pull'd down Ten sorts of Governments; and that it might be his own Turn next: so that his Yearning after his Ambition, he consented to disband them. Treatise of the History of Standing Armies.

(x) According to Mr. Compton, who quotes the Authority of Dr. Comber's first Edition of The State of Great Britain, in King's Forces, in 1655, consisted of three Troops; the first of 100, the others of 180 each; the blue Regiment of Horse, 100 Men, in eight Troops; the first Regiment of Foot Guards, call'd the King's Regiment, of 1700 Men, in 24 Companies; the Coldstream, the Duke of Torb's, and another Regiment; besides the Companies necessary for Guards and Garrison in England, Italy, Spain, Germany, and the Plantations. The Charge of all these, that Parliament estimates at 200,000 per Annum, which he mentions as one Article of those Disbursements, which, according to him, he far exceeded the King's Receipts; but then he forgets to mention at the same Time, that this chargeable military Establishment was the King's own, that it was unconstitutional, and that the Parliament was so far from thinking the measure under any Obligation to provide for them, that they look'd upon them with Terror, and in Prospect of time, voted them a Grievance.

(y) Upon this Occasion he set forth his Declaration dated from Dunfermline, August 16, 1650, in which are the following remarkable Particulars:

"I, III. And his Majesty, having, upon full Persuasion of the Justice and Equity of all the Heads and Articles thereof, now in and published the National Covenant of the Kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and the three Kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland, doth declare, that he hath set sworn and subscribed these Covenants, and entered into the Oath of God with his People, upon any sinful Intention and crooked Designe, for attaining his own Ends, but, so far as his human Weakness will permit, in the Truth and Sincerity of his Heart: And that he is firmly resolv'd, in the Lord's Assistance, to adhere thereto, and to prosecute to the utmost of his Power all the Ends thereof, in his Station and Calling, really, constantly, and sincerely all the Days of his Life. In order to which, he doth in the first Place profess and declare, that he will have no Enemies but the Enemies of the Covenant; and that he will have no Friends but the Friends of the Covenant.

"His Majesty being griev'd in Conscience of the exceeding great Injustices and Unlawfulness of that Treaty and Peace made with the bloody Irish Rebels, who treacherously find the Blood of so many of his faithful and loyal Subjects in Ireland, and of allowing unto them the Liberty of the Popish Religion; For the which he doth from his Heart desire to be deeply humbled before the Lord; and likewise considering how many Branches have been upon their Part, doth declare the same to be void, and that his Majesty is absolv'd therefrom: being truly sorry that he should have thought meet to disband his Help of retaining him to his Throne, and resolving for the time to come, rather to shake Affection than be."

"Sec. IV. And as his Majesty hath given Satisfaction to the just and necessary Desires of the Kirk and Kingdoms of Scotland, he doth he hereby give and declare, that he is so well willing and desirous to give Satisfaction to the just and necessary Desires of his good Subjects in England and Ireland; and in Toleration thereof, if the Houses of Parliament of England, sitting in Freedom, shall think fit to present unto him the Propositions of Peace, agreed upon by both Kingdoms, he will not only second to the same, and such Alterations thereunto, as the Houses of Parliament, in regard of the Constitution of Affairs, and the good of his Majesty and his Kingdoms, shall judge necessary, but do what is further necessary for prosecuting the Ends of the Solemn League and Covenant, especially in those things which concern the Reformation of the Church of England, in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government.

This Declaration was reprinted in London, while the Settlement of the Church was under Consideration. Upon which Occasion, his Majesty, in his Answer Declaration relating to Ecclesiastical Affairs, before quoted, is pleas'd to express himself as follows:

"While we continue in this Temper of Mind and Reflection, and have so far complied with the Persuasion of particular Persons, and the Dissembler of the Time, as to be contented with the Exercise of our Religion in our own Chapel according to the constant Practice and Laws established, without enjoining that Practice, and the Observation of those Laws in the Churches of this Kingdom (of which we have undergone the Censure of many, as if we were without that Zeal for the Church which we ought to have, and which by God's Grace we shall always retain) we have found ourselves not so candidly dealt with as we have deserved; and that there are some quiet and restless Spirits, who (without showing any Thing of their own Dissembler, in Recompence of the Moderation they and in us) continue their Bitterness against the Church and endeavour to raise Jealousies of us, and to inflame our Reprobation by their Reproaches, as if we were not true to the Progress we have made. And in order thereto, they have very unjustly endeavoured to be printed, published, and dispersed throughout the Kingdom, a Declaration hereafter printed in our Name in Scotland, of which we shall say no more, than that the Circumstances by which we were enforced to sign that Declaration are enough known to the World; and that the worst and greatest Part of that Nation did even then deride and abhor the ill Usage of us in that Particular, when the same Tyranny was exercised there by the Power of a few ill Men, which at this Time had spread itself over this Kingdom; and therefore we had no Reason to expect, that we should at this Session (when we are doing all we can to wipe out the Memory of all that hath been done amiss by other Men, and we thank God, have much wiped it out of our own Remembrance) have been unjustly associated with their Reproaches which we will likewise forget."

(z) Ladies take notice, that the Earl of Arden in Irish Affairs, and principally concern'd in the Rebellion of that Country, had been found at the same time with the Marquis to be the Scape-goat of the Nobility; Warrifson, and the Laird of Saintowen, of the Gentry; (a) Gatry, of the Clergy; and one Gouan, of the Soldiery.

It was likewise resolv'd, to re-establish the Prerogative there, in its fullest Extent, and revive (b) Episcopacy, that the Government of both Kingdoms might be, as near as possible, of a Piece: And to make all sure, the Revenue was to be augmented, and a small standing Force was to be maintain'd. To be the Agent of the Court, in envailing their Country, the Earls of Middleton and Lauderdale had the Honour to be Rival-Candidates. Both were equally well qualified, for both were Men of Capacity, and neither had any Scruples; only Lauderdale, from political Views, was a Favourer of Profligetry; for which Reason, he was for the present employ'd in the under Part of Secretary only, but afterwards came into Play as Principal, and became the Terror of one, and the Abhorrence of both Kingdoms.

For about two Months after the King was restor'd, the Government of Scotland receiv'd no (c) Alteration: But in August, the Earl of Glencairn (Lord Chancellor) was commission'd to assemble the Committee of Estates; which he did accordingly; and immediately thereupon, Numbers of Delinquents were summon'd, and oblig'd to give Security for their Appearance at the Opening of the Parliament, many of whom were soon let into the Secret, and, by the Means of Prefers, prefer'd themselves from any farther Persecution.

In December the Parliament met, having been summon'd by Royal Proclamation; in which his Majesty was pleas'd to set forth, That his own Honour once vindicated, and the ancient Prerogatives of the Crown once assert'd, he would grant a full and free Pardon.

Of the Transactions of this and the next remarkable Session, the Earl of Middleton himself, the King's Commissioner, sent a (d) Detail to his Majesty, as so many Proofs of his own Merits and Services: And from thence the following Sketch is taken; which so plainly manifests the Spirit of his Administration, that it is scarce necessary to add Bishop Burnet's Characteristic of it; which calls it, a mad, rearing Time, full of Extravagance, the Men of Affairs being almost perpetually drunk.

The Lord Commissioner, in the first Meeting of the Parliament, having, in his Majesty's Name, given Assurance of his Majesty's constant Affection to that his ancient Kingdom, and of his Royal Resolution to preserve it in its Freedom, and to maintain the just Liberties of his People; and that he expected, that, in a due Sense of his Royal Grace and Favour, they would be ready to assert the ancient Royal Prerogative, desired, that, for a present Testimony thereof, they would presently take the Oath of Allegiance, in those Terms it was conceived before the Troubles; which was presently done by all the Members of Parliament, save one; and a public Act was pass'd, discharging all those new Oaths, which, during the Rebellion, had been used in place thereof.

In the next place, for the better Constitution of the Parliament, and establishing his Majesty's negative Voice therein, public Laws were presently made, by which his Majesty's Royal Prerogative, in the Election of his Officers of State, Councilors, and Judges, and in the calling and dissolving of Parliaments, and making of Laws, was assert'd, and the impugning or questioning thereof for the future, declared treasonable; and all Laws, Acts, and Constitutions to the contrary, were repealed.

His Majesty's Prerogative in Parliament being thus settled, the next Care was to assert it, as to the Power of Arms, raising and commanding of Forces, making of Peace and War, or Treaties

Marquis of Archie, tho' for a different Reason, the latter for his Services in the Cause of Liberty and Religion, the former for unseasonably asserting, That the Irish were authorized by the late King to act as they had done. Vol. iii. p. 41.

(d) Minister of Stirling, while the King resided there, his Crimes were, the making too free with his Majesty in his Sermons, and preparing a severe and unseasonable Remonstrance, in which he reproach'd him with a Breach of the Covenant; by admitting the Use of the Common Prayer in his Chapel, and visiting Episcopacy.

(1) According to Bishop Burnet, at the Instance of Lord Carleton. The same Pretence, in another Place, inform us notwithstanding: "That Shay (who had been Agent for the Kirk at Leith, in the late unquiet Times) being pres'd by those who employ'd him to procure some what from the King, that might look like a Confirmation of their Government, and not to silence all Dissenters; of an intended Change, obtained by the Earl of Lauderdale's Means, that a Letter should be writ by the King to the Prelate of Edinburgh, to be communicated by them to all the other Protestants in Scotland, in which he desired the General Assent that it shou'd be done, and Daily when he was in Scotland, and that had concern'd the Public Resolutions; in which he order'd them to proceed to venture all those who had then professed against them, and would not now submit to them. The King did also confer this Protestant Government as it was by Law established." And a little after.

"It seem'd that Shay thought it not enough to cheat the Party himself, but would have the King to share with him in the Fraud. This was no honourable way to be made by a King and to be contriv'd by a Clergyman. The Letter was receiv'd with Transport of Joy." The "Protestants resolv'd they were false, and began to proceed severely against Protestants. Vol. I. part 100.

(2) Not represent'd to his Majesty the Necessity of preserving the Form and Omissions in Scotland, in the Condition in which his Majesty would find them. The Original of the Trouble, began there, but by the Precaution which had been taken by his Enemies, it was no more in their Power to play the same Game again: That as he found this ready done to his Hand, he might take the Advantage of it without Murther or Reproach, as not being his own Act.

But the Earl of Lauderdale had before the King, that the Cocquet Cromwell had made of Scotland was for their adhering to him: He might then judge what they would think, who had suffered so much, and so long on his Account. If the same Thraldom should be kept up by his Means, it would meet an universal Dislike. He told the King, that the Time might come, in which he would wish rather to have Swiss Garrison in England. It would become a national Quarrel, and lose the Affections of the Country to such a degree, that, perhaps, they would join with the Garrison, in any Dissentions happen'd in England: Whereas, without any such Hedge of Slavery, Scotland might be so managed, that they might be made entirely his. The Earl of Middleton and his Party dur'd not appear for so unpopular a Thing. So it was agreed on, that the Citadels should be evacuated and slighted as soon as the Money could be rais'd in England for paying and Disbanding the Army. Ibid. vol. I. p. 107.

(3) This Paper of his seems to have been occasion'd by Lauderdale's Opposition, who gave in a formal Charge against Middleton, in which he would not show the Commissioners the Merit of the Services he therein enumerates; but ascribes them all to the Authority of the King, and the Loyalty of the Parliament.

Treaties and Leagues with foreign Princes and at home; and as to Assemblies, Meetings, and Conventions of the People: And accordingly, public Acts were pass'd in Parliament for the Prerogative in all these, and declaring it Treason to offend against the same.

And, that their Expressions of Duty might not be confin'd within the Walls of the Parliament-house, it was by another Law enacted, That all Persons, who should hereafter be admitted to any public Trust within the Kingdom, should, before their Admission thereto, take the Oath of Allegiance, and, under their Hand-writings, give a full Acknowledgment of the Royal Prerogative, as it has been asserted in this Parliament: Which is more fully to be seen in the printed Records thereof.

And seeing the Covenant, which was the great Isis of the Times, was not yet fully rooted out of all the Hearts of the People, it was thought fittest at first to assault it in all its Parts; and therefore, an Act was pass'd, declaring the Obligation of the Covenant, in relation to the Affairs in England and Ireland, void and null: And divers Acts and Meetings of pretended Parliaments and Conventions of Estates, wherein the Covenant was approv'd, were retin'd.

The Parliament, being now in a right Way of its Duty, were so sensible of their own and the Kingdom's Happiness in it, and in his Majesty's Government, that, for an Expression of their Thankfulness, they, notwithstanding all their great Sufferings during these Troubles, made a free, cheerful, and hearty Offer to his Majesty, of a yearly Annuity of Forty thousand Pounds Sterling, (a Sum far above whatever was given in that Kingdom formerly) and by public Statute engag'd for, and secur'd the Payment of it.

By this time, the Members of the Parliament, having had Occasion of recollecting their own Thoughts, and communicating them with their Relations and Acquaintances in the Country, and finding the general Inclinations of the People growing every Day more affectionate and zealous towards his Majesty, they thought it not fit any longer to measure out the Expressions of their Duty to their King by Parcels, but, once for all, to give unto his Majesty, and the whole World, an unquestionable Evidence of their Loyalty, by pulling up the Roots of the Rebellion, and eradicating the very Foundations of it, that there might not remain any SEEDS OF NEW TROUBLES: And therefore it was propos'd, that a general Act revisory should be pass'd, rescinding and annulling those (c.) pretended Parliaments, Conventions, Committees, and other Meetings flowing from them, which had been kept in that Kingdom since the Beginning of the Troubles.

But this (f.) Act (tho' the very Touchstone of Loyalty, without which, neither his Majesty's Authority, nor the public Peace, could be well secur'd) met with Opposition from such, whose Hearts were still hankering after the Covenant, and the rebellious Ways of it: And this Opposition appear'd the more discouraging to honest Men, that some Persons, who were eminently trust'd by his Majesty, and had shair'd most largely in his Bounty, appear'd in it. Yet this being an Act of so great Necessity and Importance to his Majesty's Establishment, was, against all Difficulties, offer'd to a Determination in Parliament, and was most cheerfully concluded and approv'd; there being in that numerous Meeting only about Thirty Dissenters; and some of these very inconsiderable.

And now this being done, the Kingdom and the Government of it, both in Church and State, were thereby entirely given up to his Majesty, and left as fully and freely to him, as ever any of his Royal Predecessors enjoy'd the same. And this Act was not the less considerable, that by it Discoveries were made, both of those who were for rooting out the Seeds of Rebellion, and also of those who were for having a Stock of it still remaining, and the Covenant to lie still as a Ground of After-work, if Need were.

This being over, and some Acts of Justice being done against (g.) one or two of the most eminent and malicious Promoters of the late Rebellion; it was the Parliament's next Care to enact such Laws as were necessary for promoting of Virtue, depressing of Vice, and for the right ordering the Civil Interests of the People, in the due Administration of Justice among them: But seeing that during these Troubles, such were the unupportable Sufferings of all Sorts of People, that neither those of the Nobility or Gentry, who owed Sums of Money, were able to pay the same, at the precise Times prescribed by the Law, nor yet those, to whom the Monies were owing, were able long to spare them, being the Means of their Livelyhood; and that hereby some Grudges and Animosities were like to rise in several Corners of the Kingdom; and most of the Members of Parliament being interest'd, either in the one Side or other, and the Settlement thereof being thereby render'd the more difficult, the Lord Commissioner, for the Good of his Master's Service, made it his Work to interpose between them, and was so happy in it, that in few Days a public Act was fram'd in relation to, and for securing the Interest both of Creditor and Debtor, and, being presented to the Consideration of the Parliament, was unanimously pass'd and approv'd, without one dissenting Voice of either Party.

And

(a) The first had been summons'd by the late King, John Decr. 1637, and was held in his Presence: And the second in 1643, by the present King.

(f) This was a most extravagant Act, and only fit to be executed after a drunken Boat. It took all possible Security for the future, and laid down a most pernicious Precedent. The Earl of Leicester aggravated this Matter too vily to the King. It shew'd the Earl of Madison did not understand the first Principles of Government, since he had, without any Warrant for it, given the King's Assent to a Law that nullify'd ever take away all the Security the Law can give. Barnes, vol. 1. p. 110.

(g) The Marquis of Argyle, Guthrie, and Gowan.

A. D. 1660.

And now, the King being thus secured in his Authority, Prerogative, and Government, the Kingdom in its Peace, and the People in their Rights, the Lord Commissioner was, according to his Majesty's Call, to return with an Account of his Proceedings to his Majesty; and therefore (b) adjourn'd the Parliament for some Months: During which time; his Majesty having publish'd his (i) Resolution for restoring the Church to its ancient Government by Bishops, this was so (k) acceptable to the Kingdom, that the Parliament, at their first Meeting after their Adjournment, did commissionate Three Noblemen, Three Barons, and Three Burgesses, Members of the House, in their Name, to invite the Archbishops, and Bishops, to come and take their Places, and vote in Parliament, conformable to their ancient Rights: Which being accordingly done, such public Laws and Acts were made, as were thought fittest for their Re-establishment in their Offices, and their Restitution to their Dignities, Possessions, Privileges, and Rights duly belonging to them.

And because, during the Rebellion, great Art had been used by the Preachers in their Sermons, and otherwise, to possess the People with most wicked Principles, That it was lawful to rise in Arms, and to join in Covenant, for Reformation of Religion; and, upon Pretence of being for his Majesty's Authority, to oppose his personal Commands; and that, by their Covenant, they were obliged to the same; it was judg'd necessary, and accordingly an Act was pass'd in Parliament, for Preservation of his Majesty's Person, Authority, and Government, wherein these Positions were condemn'd, and declared treasonable, and the Covenants declared unlawful, and the Obligations thereof void.

And seeing the late Troubles, for the most part, were begun and carried on by the Unfaithfulness of some Ministers of State, the Parliament conceiv'd they could not be answerable to their Duty, if they did not, so far as they were able, provide against the like Prejudices for the future: And considering that such Persons, who own'd the Covenant to be lawful, and the Obligation of it to be still in Force, were not fit to be entrusted in the public Administrations of his Majesty's Government at this time: It was therefore enacted, that all such who enjoyed, or should be called to any public Trust, should express their Sense of the Covenant, by signing the Declaration of Parliament, against the Unlawfulness and Nullity thereof.

His Majesty's Authority and Government being now secured, it was thought fit, that the Administration of it should be temper'd with that Moderation, which might endear all good Subjects to it: And considering that, since the Year 1648, many Ministers had been thrust in upon their Parishes, without any Presentation or Right from the lawful Patrons, and, according to the Laws of the Kingdom, had no Title to the Benefices and Stipends; the Parliament obliged all the Patrons

A. D. 1660.

(4) The Session of Parliament was now brought to a Conclusion, without any Motion for an Act of Indemnity. The Secret of this was, that, since Episcopacy was to be set up, and that those who were most likely to oppose it were on other Accounts obnoxious, it was thought best to keep them under that Fear, till the Change should be made. Barnes, vol. 3, p. 128.

(5) This Proclamation was as follows:

CHARLES II.

"Right truly and well-beloved Cousins and Counsellors, we greet you well. Whereas in the Month of Sept. 1660, we did by our Letter to the Preliminary of Edinburgh declare our Purpose to maintain the Government of the Church of Scotland settled by Law, and our Parliament having, since that Time, not only renews'd all the Acts since the Troubles began, referring to that Government, but also declared all those pretended Parliaments null and void, and left to us the settling and securing of Church Government: Therefore, in Compliance with that Act referring, according to our late Proclamation dated at Whitehall, the 10th of June, and in Contemplation of the Inconveniences from the Church Government, as it hath been exercised these twenty three Years past, of the Unstability and thereof to our several Estates, of the faulty execution of Conclusions which have been entered during the late Troubles by the Violence done to our royal Prerogative, and to the Government Civil and Ecclesiastical, sent by unquestionable Authority, we, from our Respect to the Glory of God, and the Good and Interest of the Protestant Religion, from our pious Care and princely Zeal for the Order, Unity, Peace, and Stability of that Church, and its better Harmony with the Government of the Churches of England and Ireland, having after mature Deliberation, declared to those of our Council here, our firm Resolution to interpose our Royal Authority for restoring of that Church to its right Government by Bishops, as it was by Law before the late Troubles, during the Reigns of our Royal Father and Grandfather of blessed Memory, and as it now is established by Law. Of this our Royal Pleasure concerning Church Government you are to take Notice, and to make Intimation thereof in such a Way and Manner as you shall judge most expedient and essential.

"And we require you and every one of you, and do expect, according to the Faith and Confidence we have in your Affection and Duty to our Service, that you will be careful to use your best Endeavours for curing the Distempers contracted during those late evil Times, for uniting our good Subjects among themselves, and bringing them all to a cheerful Acquiescing and Obedience to our Sovereign Authority, which we will employ by the Help of God for the maintaining and defending the true reformed Religion, Increase of Piety, and the Settlement and Security of that Church in her Rights and Liberties, according to ancient Law and Custom. And in Order therunto, our Will is, that you forthwith take such Course with the Rents belonging to the several Bishopsricks and Dueseries, that they may be restor'd and made useful to the Church, and that according to Justice and the standing Law. And moreover you are to inhibit the assembling of Ministers in their several synodical Meetings through the Kingdom, until our further Pleasure, and to keep a watchful Eye over all, who, upon any pretence whatsoever, shall, by Discouraging, Preaching, Reviling, or any irregular or unlawful Way, endeavour to alienate the Affections of our People, or dispose them to an ill Opinion of us and our Government, to the Disturbance of the Peace of the Kingdom. So, expeding your cheerful Obedience, and a speedy Account of your Proceedings herein, we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 14th, 1661, and of our Royal Command, signed with our own Hand, By His Majesty's Command.

LAURENCE.

This was follow'd by an Order of the Secret Privy Council, peremptorily discharging all Ecclesiastical Meetings, as Synods, Presbyteries, &c. till they should be warrant'd by Archbishops, Bishops, &c. And this Proceeding of the King, the Parliament confirm'd, and ratify'd by our Act, and by another, not only enjoy'd Obedience from the inferior Clergy to their Bishops, but prohibited all Meetings or Conventicles in Houses for Religious Exercises.

(6) The Synod in several Places resolv'd to prepare Addresses both to King and Parliament, for an Act establishing their Government. Barnes, vol. 1, p. 120.

The Bishop further tells us in the same Page, that the Synod of Fife having agreed on Heads for that Purpose, which his Majesty was pleas'd to give notice of to Middlers, a sponch which the Bishop of Rotten was sent to inspect their Behaviour; and as soon as the Ministers deliver'd upon that Subject, he, in the King's Name, dissolved the Synod, and commanded the Ministers, under pain of Treason, to return to their several Habitations. Such Care was taken that no Application should be made in favour of Presbytery.

trons to grant Presentations unto them, and the several Bishops to give Collation thereupon; provided the Ministers required and accepted the same within Three Months after. And albeit many of them slighted this Favour, yet his Majesty's Council, to make them inexcusable, was pleased, after the expiring of those Three Months, to indulge unto them a further Time: By which it may appear, how tenderly they have been dealt with, and what is to be expected from Persons contemning such Favours.

The Affairs of the Church and Kingdom being thus settled, his Majesty's gracious Pardon and Indemnity was then to be pass'd in Parliament; but because, during these Troubles, many Persons of Honour, and others of all Degrees, for their Adherence to and acting for his Majesty, had been robb'd of their Fortunes, and their Families thereby brought so low, that they were not able to subsist, it was, by his Majesty's Allowance, conceived just; that, towards their Reparation, some small (1) Fines, to the Value of one Year's Rent, or thereabouts, should be imposed upon such who had been eminent and active in those Troubles, by which their Sufferings were occasioned: And that some few Persons, not exceeding the Number of Twelve, should be declared incapable of public Trust. And, it being his Majesty's gracious Resolution, that all Animosities among his Subjects should

[4] In the Earl of Middleton's Charge against the Earl of Middleton, are the following remarkable Particulars:

I shall not now insist on many Acts of general Concern pass'd without your Majesty's Knowledge, though some of them were of great Importance to you and your People. A thing contrary to the Duty and Practice of all former Commissioners, contrary to Law and right Reason, which is the Soul of Law. I shall not insist on my consenting to the putting the Power of a Man's Life into his Hand; to the disposing of public Money; to the empowering himself, to name a Receiver of the Tithes, which belong to your Majesty; to the leaving it in his Power to put your Officers of State to a Test in things, which do import the losing of their Places, or the not putting them to it at his Pleasure. All which had become his will, in my Opinion, to have declared, to be only fit for your Majesty, and too unworthy to be in the Mouth of any Subject. Now I would not on any Act [The Act against the Collusion and Poling of Traders, of which the Earl of Middleton, in his Address, declares, I was of my own Accord, that it extendeth not only to your Majesty, but also to the Duke and several Peers against his Majesty's Person, and to such as rise in Arms and in open Rebellion against his Majesty's Person, Authority, and Government, as if you were his Majesty's Council. M. F. An. 22. a. 1. touch'd; by your Royal Scepter, which takes from your Majesty the Power of pardoning the Sins of those forfeitall'd by this Parliament, yea, and declaring your Pardon (if you sign any) to be null and void. Some foolish thing hath been done in former times, but was in the King's Presence, and by his Direction; and well might this Parliament have concluded, that this had at least your Majesty's Approbation. It is far from my Thought to blame the Parliament; but it is strange your Commissioner should have made it your Act, without your Knowledge.

These Things I mentioned by Transcription, and hasten'd to the Work of the Day, by comparing the Act of Fines with your Instructions, with your Majesty shall think fit to examine it; and insidiously mainly upon your Commissioners Charge in the Act of Billings, and the Consequences of it, which shall appear to have been done not only without Precedent, without your Majesty's Knowledge, but, as I conceive, expressly contrary to your declared Pleasure and Instructions.

Here I mentioned your gracious Instructions. As to the Act of Pardon and Oblivion, I repeated your Limitations as to the Persons unable (which I need not here transcribe) and hinted at the Imposition of the Proportions; and told your Majesty that when you should be pleas'd to take the List of the fined Persons into your Consideration; when you shall examine how, and by whom it was managed, I think it will clearly appear, how palpably the Earl of Middleton hath broke your Limitations besides the underhand Dealing of others, for fixing Men full as guilty as many of the eight hundred and odd contain'd in that List; this I left to Examination, and then came to that which I mainly insid'd on, and spake as follows:

But this eminent Clemency of your Majesty, this truly royal Virtue, for which all Europe admires you; this your fatherly Care in exalting with so much Mercy; this, Sir, insid'd not with other Men's Malice, but a greater Punishment must be found. You would only have chastis'd with gentle Stripes, they must be allowed to whip with scourges. Flurs reach'd only Men's Money, but a Punishment must be invented to rob Men of their Honour, to lay a lasting Stain on them and their Posterity. Now, Sir, be pleas'd to observe, how grossly you and your Parliament have been abused, and for what I shall positively affirm, I do appeal to your royal self, and many of my Lords here. What I shall say upon other Experiences more than credible, shall, I think, be enough, when your Majesty shall examine the Matter to the Bottom at which, I humbly conceive, much concerns your Honour, and the Honour of your Parliament. Be pleas'd, Sir, to remember you expressly commanded, that the Act of Oblivion should be transmitted to your Majesty, before it pass'd. You again call'd for it, but it was long, ere it was sent. At last, Sir George Mackenzie of Tarbes was sent up by your Commissioner. After a fortnight's Delay he brought in his Power to your Majesty; and by your Command he delivered them to me, with a general Letter from your Commissioner referring to him. Next Day your Majesty call'd for all your Scots Privy-Council as were at Hampden Court; and in Council you commanded me to give you an Account of the Papers I had got. Be pleas'd, Sir, to remember, I did make bold there to tell you, that he had given me first one Copy of an Act of Oblivion, and then another different from the former, that one of them behav'd to be false; and at that rate he might bring in more. He would have laid something to have made me believe they were both one, but it prov'd not so; for here there was a most material Difference; the one only excepted in the last Clause, as to Fines; the other excepted from public Trust. As to Fines, such as are express'd in another Act, entitled, An Act for giving and clearing from public Trust. You would not believe it, but I said he would answer for it. I objected that by the Words it appear'd, that all who were to be fined were to be re-appoint'd. Tarbes answer'd, that the Parliament intended only to incapacitate a small Number of the most guilty, not exceeding twelve. I opened to your Majesty how heinous a Punishment incapacitating was; a Punishment worse than Death, and much beyond what you had allowed by your Majesty's most gracious Instructions. Then was again urg'd the Desire of your Parliament; and who could doubt it proceeded from your Parliament, when it was so boldly carried to your Majesty in your Council, by one employ'd with a Letter of Credit from your Commissioner. Thus you contented upon that Information. And mark, Sir, you did only consent, not command it, as appears by your Letter. Now be graciously pleas'd to observe, how fitly you, next your Parliament, and then both you and your Parliament [Perhaps this Passage gave the Duke of Buckingham the Hint, for that unbecom'g Stroke in his Rehearsal, Act II. Scene I. vers. Fifth, you, Secondly, they, Thirdly and Lastly, both he and they] have been abused in this Particular. This Paper was never so much as communicated to your Parliament; and never was incapacitating mentioned in that House, until Sir George Mackenzie's Return. A Draught of an Act of Oblivion was indeed framed in private by some eminent Lawyers, and other Members of Parliament, but that was the first Draught, not that second which Sir George Mackenzie owned with such Impudence; yet this your Consent, to obtain, reach'd not their Ends who desired it. It was indeed Colour enough to have forc'dly that it was your Pleasure Twelve should be incapacitated, but it seems their Designs reach'd Others, whose Places were their Crimes, who could not possibly by Malice itself, nor by the Author of Malice, be brought within the Limits prescribed for the smaller Punishment of Fines. Therefore a new Way must be invented, and that was by Billings; this is a new way indeed, and an effectual one; by Billings, any Man's Honour, his Life, his Posterity, may be destroyed, without the Trouble of calling him, leaving his Answer, nor, without the Trouble of accusing him. Billings hath the wonderful Power to destroy any Man; and yet the collective Body of that Judicature, who sit it, shall never be troubled with his Name, till it come to be executed. This is a stranger Engine than white Gunpowder, which some fancy; for sure this broods without any Noise at all; but, blessed be God, this dreadful Engine was never known as to Punishments among any People, Heathen or Christian, who had the Blessing to live under Monarchy. Some Republics use the Ballot, or the ballot, in giving Places, but I never in much as read of any thing like it as to Punishment, except the Ostracism among the Athenians, who were persecuted by that curst Sovereign Lord, the People, and by their Oyster-shell Billings.

should be taken away, and that all of them might live in Peace and Unity under his Government, it was thought most suitable to that End, and for preventing all Prejudice and Rancour that might arise, by a public Vote in Parliament, to provide, that the excepting of the Twelve Persons should be by Billeting, yet so, that the Billets should not at all be made known, but represented close to his Majesty, and left entirely to his Royal Disposal.

By all which it appears, that a Rebellion, begun and carried on upon Pretence of Religion and Reformation, strengthen'd by twenty Years Success, confirm'd by solemn and renewed Oaths and Covenants, and in which his Majesty's Authority and Government, both in Church and State, the Liberties of the Kingdom, and the Rights of the People, were destroy'd, is now, within the Space of Twenty Months, rooted up, and, in lieu thereof, his Majesty's Authority, and Royal Prerogative, more fully asserted and established by Law than formerly.

We need not stay to enlarge on the State of (m) Ireland; that Kingdom being but a Satellite to this, it, in a manner, necessarily obey'd the Impulse of the First Mover.

Equally immaterial is it, to enlarge on the Situation of the Royal Family. The Marriage of the (n) Duke of York with a Daughter of the Lord Chancellor Hyde's, is now very well understood: And the real Motive of the Queen Mother's (o) Visit, continues Matter of Conjecture to this Day.

Some assure us, it was to procure the Disgrace of Lord Clarendon, on account of his Opposition to the Papists; and others insinuate, it was to negotiate a Marriage between the King her Son and Eleonora Mancini, one of the Nieces of Cardinal Mazarine: But the Majority are of Opinion, it was to forward his Majesty's Alliance with Portugal, on the one hand, and that of her Daughter Henrietta with the Duke of Orleans, on the other.

By whatever Means, scarce any Doubt can be made, that her main Business was to fix the King in the Interests of France, which it is very probable she had the Merit to accomplish.

And this naturally brings us to the State of the Kingdom at this Time, with respect to foreign Affairs: In treating of which, we shall endeavour to reconcile Brevity with Perspicuity.

Like most other Princes, the Protector Cromwell, in siding with France against Spain, had sacrific'd the Interest of the Public to his own: And the King had all the Motives of Passion and Policy to observe a (p) different Conduct, and thereby set the Balance even.

But tho' he came to an Accommodation with Spain (with which Cromwell had till then been at War) and (q) drop'd the very advantageous Treaty, in point of (r) Commerce,

[a] As to the Kingdom of Ireland, the King very early issued his Proclamation against all Disturbances of the Peace in those Parts, and with good Effect; and Col. Eyes, who had endeavour'd to raise a Party there, was soon reduc'd by Sir Charles Coote. The Convention that had assembled in that Kingdom, upon the Change of Government, as soon as they had taken Order for the settling of the Public Affairs, and had appointed certain Commissioners to wait upon the King with their Complimentary Address, thought fit to dissolve themselves in Execution of the King's Pleasure for the calling a full Parliament, and to make way for the ancient Constitution of the Government, by a Lord Lieutenant, as had been determin'd by the King and his Council. But in the mean Time, for the better Government of that Kingdom, the King made Sir Maurice Eglar, Kt. Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Roger, Earl of Orerry, Lord President of Munster, and Charles, Earl of Montague, Lord President of Ulster, to be Lords Justices, who manage'd and govern'd there with great Candour and Moderation; so that there were now a general Quiet throughout the King's Dominions. Phillip's Supplication to James, p. 623.

[b] The Ceremony of which was celebrated September 21, 1660. October 22, their first Child was born; and on the 17th of February following, his Highness receiv'd the following Declaration in the Council Books:

"I James Duke of York, do testify and declare, that, after I had for many Months sollicit Ann, my now Wife, in the Way of Marriage, I was contract'd to her on the 24th of November, 1659, at Breda in Brabant, and after that Time, and many Months before I came into England, I lived with her (through all just possible Secrecy) as my Wife. And after my coming into this Kingdom, and that we might observe all that is enjoyn'd by the Church of England, I married her on the third of September in the Night, between eleven and two at Westminster, my Chaplain Dr. Grew after performing that Office according as it is directed by the Book of Common-Prayers, the Last Offices being then review'd and say'd; say her in Marriage. Of the Truth of all which I do take this my corporal Oath the 28th of February, 1660."

JAMES.

The like Declarations made by Ann Duchess, John Countess, D. D. Thomas Butler Lord Officer, and Ellen Shroud.

Many, perhaps, may not unreasonably believe, that the Marriage of the Duke with the Daughter of the Chancellor might have been on great Occasion, if not the Foundation of his Fall; and tho' it may be undoubtedly true, that this very unequal Alliance was brought to pass entirely without the Knowledge or Privy of the Chancellor, but so much the Contrary, that when the King, at that Time, made him more than ordinary Respects of his Grace to him, with Assurances that this Accident should not lessen the Esteem and Favour his Majesty had for him, yet his own good Judgment made him immediately sensible, and declare it too, to those he was intimate with, that this must certainly be the Occasion of the Diminution of his Credit. Earl of Rochester's Preface to the first Volume of Lord Clarendon's History, Vol. p. xxii.

[c] She arriv'd at Whitehall, Nov. 2. Soon after which, she was complimented by the House of Commons who likewise presented her two Daughters, the Princess of Orange, who was 12 years old, and the Princess Henrietta Maria, with 10000*l*. a piece.

[d] The late Lord Lansdown, in his Vindication of Monk, assures us, that when the old Army was review'd by the King and Monk upon Black Heath, the General made his Majesty the following Proposal:

"That, as the full beginning of the Rebellion was fomented by France, where his Majesty had likewise receiv'd personal Affronts, he would give him leave to lead that Body of Veterans, in which every common Man had the Experience of an Officer, into that Kingdom to which his Majesty had as good a Right as to the Tire of which he was now taking Possession: That there could not be a properer juncture, considering the Discontents prevailing at that time against the Ministers, who had been his greatest Enemy: That by thus employing these Men, who were but now Converters to Monarchy; they might in Time wear out their old Principles, and become as zealous for him, as they had been against him; especially by being engag'd in an Expedition so agreeable to their Nature as England, and in a Cause so like what they had been fighting for in England: That this would be faster than disbanding them all at once, and dispersing them here and there at home, to remain back perhaps to the rebellious Notions in which they had been bred: And therefore if his Majesty would permit the Attempt, he made no Doubt but to give him as good an Account of his Friends, as of his French Dominions; all then he should think he had done but half his Work."

[e] Mr. W. Eversdr, in a Letter to the King his Master, dated July 18, 1660, informs us, that the Chancellor offer'd to receive and confirm it with an Exception to those Articles relating to the King's Crown and the House of Orange.

[f] He induced the French to lay Impositions upon all our Goods, which amounted to a Prohibition; inso much that they got a Milling a Year from us in the over Balance of Trade. Trenchard's Hist. of standing Armies.

merce, which he found subsisting between France and us, he neither shew'd a proper Repentment for the open Injuries he had suffer'd from the one Court, nor a proper Sense of such Civilities as he had receiv'd from the other.

Embassadors from both Spain and France very early made their Addresses to him; and if the Offers of the First had been listen'd to, in all human Probability, the Flatterers of Lewis XIV. had never had a Presence to style him the Great, the Invincible, and the Immortal.

France, even at that time, discover'd all the Symptoms of a growing Greatness. She had subdu'd all her own Factions, extended her Dominions, improv'd her Revenue, advanc'd her Glory, and, by the Pyrenean Treaty, in a manner given the Law to her ancient Enemy, Spain, on the contrary, was but the Shadow of what she had been. She had a weak King at her Head; a divided Ministry; all the Riches of her Mines were not equal to her Expences; what France had got, she had lost; and Portugal, tho' under the Government of a Woman, still maintain'd the Independency it had so miraculously recover'd: And this was the Thorn she wanted most to remove: Nor, perhaps, had Maria II. out-negotiated De Haro, if it had not been for those express Stipulations, that France should no longer assist or countenance the Portuguese.

But, instead of performing, France study'd only how to evade these Engagements: In order to which, the Viscount (afterwards Marquis) Turenne was permitted to take the Affairs of Portugal under his Protection; who engag'd Count Schomberg to enter into the Service of that Kingdom, and furnish'd him with certain experienc'd Officers, and a small Body of disciplin'd Forces: These were sent over into England, from whence they were to embark for Lisbon; and hither Count Schomberg follow'd them; not merely to put himself at their Head, but to solicit the necessary Reinforcements from the English Court; upon what Pretensions, and with what Success, will soon be explain'd.

A Treaty of Marriage between the King, and the Infanta Catharina of Portugal, had been set on foot soon after the Restoration; and the Spaniards, being as soon aware of the Consequences, endeavour'd to traverse it by all the Expedients they could devise: They offer'd the King his Choice of the Protestant Princesses of Europe, with a Royal Dowry; and their proving disagreeable to his Majesty, they recommended the Princess of Parma, but in the End, with no better Success.

What agreed with the Interest of Spain clash'd with the Interest of France; and rather than not oblige the Last, the Court resolv'd to run the Risk of a Quarrel with the First.

Thus, instead of rejecting the only false Principle in Cromwell's Plan of Politics, the King unhappily made it the Basis of his own; and thereby enabled that aspiring Power to give the Law to Europe.

From what Quarter this ill-fated Match with Portugal first arose, hath been Matter of much Controversy; some ascribing it to (1) Monk, and some to Clarendon; but History

court's Me-
mairs.

(1) Bishop Burnet and Mr. Archbishop Eborac. According to the first it was originally propos'd to the General by a Portuguese Jew according to the last, by Don Francisco de Melis the Portuguese Ambassador. Mr. Coke expressly disputes the Charge on this Head, and Mr. A. Wood, on the contrary, as expressly declares, that the Earl of Bristol being charg'd with negotiating a Match with the Princess of Parma, the Earl of Clarendon brook'd his Measure, by contriving the Match with Catharina, the Infanta of Portugal. Witch Fudge of Wood is confirm'd by the Memorial of the Spanish Ambassador of May 3, 1661, in which are the following Expressions:

The Ambassador find himself oblig'd to demonstrate to your Majesty according to the last Order he had received from the King his Master, that, over and above the Officers which he hath already made for the Princess of Denmark, and for the Princess of Saxony, or any other Princess, that may be pleasing to your Majesty, he doth now propose the Princess of Orange, whom his Catholic Majesty will adopt, and follow with the same Advantages, which have been propos'd with the Princess of Denmark and Saxony, in case that the same be more pleasing to your Majesty, and with those very fine Advantages and Conditions, which your Majesty desired with the Princess of Parma, when your Majesty thought that Marriage would be convenient for you, &c.

Lord Lauderston says, it is plain, that without the Chancellor's Privy and Approbation, nothing of this nature could either have been propos'd or mention'd. The General might possibly be the first Person to mention it, and that was all. No Treaty or Negotiation follow'd upon it, till it came propos'd in form from the Court of Portugal, directly to the Chancellor himself. Mr. Carter, on the Credit of Dr. Hugh the late excellent Bishop of Worcester, asserts, it was first communicated to the Chancellor by the King himself; that the Chancellor, in Concert with the Duke of Ormond and the Earl of Northampton, oppos'd it; but that the King over-ru'd all his Arguments, refus'd to marry any one of the Protestant Princesses; and concluded with saying, that the King, at the Instance of the Queen his Mother and those who were in the Secret of his Religion, was predetermined to marry a Catholic. It is plain, that what all Parties disown, all Parties condemn. I shall close this Topic, therefore, with a Quotation from D'Abbanourt's Memoirs, and some Passages from the Count D'Estrade's Letters, which will serve to throw some additional Lights on this part of our Story.

The Portuguese, says D'Abbanourt, understanding that the English had called home their King, they sent Francisco de Melis the French Count of Porto, and afterwards Blainvis de Sandoz, in quality of extraordinary Ambassador to congratulate his Return; and the Queen gave him in charge to confer with Chancellor Hale, and to engage him to dispose the King his Master to espouse the Infanta of Portugal.

At this time France had, in a manner, abandon'd the Portuguese, and oppos'd their Ambassador the Count de Suarez, at his Departure from Havre de Grace, inasmuch that it seem'd the most expedient Course for Portugal, to enter into a fresh Alliance with England. The Portuguese, in this Conjunction, rightly consider'd, that a British King returning to take Possession of his Dominions, would have need of Money to reward such as had done him Service, with which, if they would supply him, it would be easy for him to assist them with Men and Ships: Wherefore the Marquis of Sandoz propos'd to the King, to marry the Infanta of Portugal, putting him in Hopes of some Millions of Money with her: And he so managed Matters, that, by the Means of Chancellor Hale, he persuad'd the King, in spite of all the Opposition of the Spaniards.

The King therefore declar'd to his Parliament, that after having advis'd with his Council, he had come to a Conclusion with his Chancellor and the Marquis of Sandoz, to espouse the Infanta of Portugal. After this, the Chancellor express'd at great Length, that the Portuguese, upon his Majesty's Return, had demand'd to cross their Alliance; but that his Majesty had refus'd it, however advantageous it might be to England, till such time as he had the Advice of his Parliament what should be done as to the 10000 Men that had been promis'd by the Emperor. That to grant that Aid, would make a Breach with Spain, and to refuse it, would ruin the Commerce with Portugal, and also occasion the Detraction of that Kingdom.

The Ambassador of Portugal hearing of this Speech, and fearing what might be the Sequel, came to give Notice. The Spaniards for his Part promis'd to give as much as Portugal, if King Charles would marry a Protestant Princess: And that, if neither a Daughter of Saxony nor of Denmark would please him, he might have the Princess of Orange upon the same Conditions that formerly he had desired: but he might story is to be govern'd by Facts, not by Opinions; and, as 'tis a known thing, that those two great Men were no very (r) good Friends to each other, 'tis scarce to be imagin'd, that the Laſt would have taken Pains to extol a Measure to both Houses of Parliament, which, it is said, he had not only oppos'd himself, but which had been carried against his Opinion, by one, whom he always consider'd as his Rival, both in Power and Favour.

We shall presently fee the Chancellor's own Account of this important Affair; and, in the mean time, it is necessary just to signify, that a Conference was held, during the Reces, between the Bishopal and Presbyterian

Divines, at the Savoy, on certain (u) Alterations in the Liturgy; which, as foreseen, serv'd rather to exasperate than reconcile the two Parties: And that, on April 23, the King was crown'd at Westminster, with great Magnificence; which Ceremonial is very circumstantially set forth in the Chronicles of those Times.

With respect to the Elections and Returns of the new Members, either the Crown- Influence was so great, or the Humour of the People so surprizingly alter'd, that very (v) few of the Presbyterian or Republican Leaven could find Admittance.

upon the Princess of Parma, to whom the King of Spain, have that very Account, had given a considerable Dowry: But if his Majesty, in lieu of Money, would rather have something else, that might be more for his Convenience, he need not explain his Mind, and he should receive that Satisfaction, which could not be affected by the Princess.

This Matter was debated in the King's Council, where it was agreed, That seeing the Spaniards would undoubtedly fall in their Promises touching the Marriage, it was most expedient to embrace the Proposals of Peruigal, who with the Infanta, would give the Towns of Tangier in Africa, and that of Bombay in the East-Indies, with three Millions of Livres, and Jewels to a great Value, &c. Our Author concludes with the following Reflection:

Those who wear imperial Eyes, looked on these Intrigues, could not but observe, that a Presbyterian Christian should perceive the King his Master to espouse a Catholic Princess, when at the same time a Catholic King proposed to that Prince a Protestant Consort.

With regard to the Passages in D'Espada's Letters, the first taken from Tom. i. which, it is worth observing, our Translators did not think proper to set off the Public with, in English, is from one of that Minister to the King his Master, dated from Madrid, July 25, 1661.

It seems to me, says he, by his (King Charles's) Conduct, in treating, conjunctively with the Chancellor, for the Infanta of Peruigal, at the same time that he listen'd to the Proposals of the Spanish Ambassador, relating to a Marriage with the Princess of Parma, he purposely meant to drive him into the wrong Measures the said Ambassador has taken; that he might be furnished with a Pretence for breaking of the Treaty with Spain, and find his Account in it, either on the side of Dunkirk or the High-Indies. At the same time, the Chancellor, who grew jealous, that the Earl of Bristol made too great a Progress in his Master's Favour, contriv'd to remove him from Court, by sending him to Parma; and has profited to greatly by his Absence, that he is become the Master, and the Earl now finds himself entirely worm'd out of all Credit and Consideration. The Chancellor has, at last, made no Scruple to declare himself his open Enemy; the immediate Consequence of which has been, that all his Opposers no longer meet with either Preference or Countenance in the Court of England.

Again, in his Letter to the King, of Feb. 1, 1662, among other public Declarations of the Spanish Ambassador in Holland, which he enumerates, he places the following:

"That Chancellor Hyde, as at present, as much for the Interest of Spain, as he had formerly been against them: "That the Treaty of Dunkirk, and the Marriage with the Infanta of Peruigal, had got him the ill Will of the Parliament and the People, which he hop'd to regain by proposing a glorious and advantageous Peace for Peruigal, and to ease the King his Master of the Burden of the Indies peace, in the Alliance he was oblig'd to give his Brother-in-law."

To this the King answers, Feb. 9.

"All that Don Eſpava de Guzman told the Bargamoſter relating to England, and the Attrition of Chancellor Hyde's Sentiments, is no less false than the rest. The King of Spain has made no Proposals, of an Accommodation with the King of England, nor he has no Minister at London, that can be trusted with an Affair of so much Weight. I know, on the contrary, from very good Hands, that the Spaniards, believing that Bastwick's Embassy, to which the English returned no Answer, was already more than they ought to have done in Honour, are resolv'd not to take any Step of that nature, before the King of England has demerited, that he desire that Union, by sending an Ambassador to Madrid, to which the said King is not at all dispos'd. And you know better than any one, what he told you, when you left London of his Passion, and the Interest he thought he had, to be clearly allied to me.

(1) Mr. Archdeacon Echard was very ill inform'd of the Administration of Affairs at that time, to imagine, that any thing of any Nature, could be done without the Chancellor's Privy and Approbation. The King had been long accustomed to be totally resign'd to his Advice, during his Exile, and continued so, for the first Years of his Return: A more absolute Minister could not be. The General was the very first Man he attempted to mortify, by undervaluing his Services, and magnifying the Merit of the Presbyterians, [This may be understood of the Leaders of that Party] to whom the Preference was given in all Rewards and Honours. When it was under Consideration in what manner to distinguish the General himself, the Chancellor propos'd to make him only Earl of Essex, with a Pension of three thousand Pounds a Year. The King was pleas'd of the Motion, he acquainted Sir John Graville with it, and order'd him to discourse with the General himself, and let what might satisfy his Ambition: The General, who would make no Terms before he had got his Will, tho' he had had Carr Blanche sent him, continu'd in the same Resolution of desiring nothing now it was done. It was then left to Sir John Graville's Management. It was not for the King's Honour to appear ungrateful in the Face of the World, to a Man, from whom he had just received three Kingdoms in so generous and so distinguished a manner; and that he was created Duke of Albemarle, with a very moderate Grant to support his Dignity, if compar'd with what we have seen since for much less Services.

In the Creations which followed, there were but two, who were intimately the General's Friends, and they were oppos'd the last in Rank and Precedence. Colonel Charles Howard, in whom he had always plac'd a particular Confidence, was upon the List for an Earlship. He apply'd to the Chancellor about his Rank, and demand'd it next to Sir John Graville, whom, for many Reasons, he took for granted, would be the first. The Chancellor readily complied with his Request. When the Creations were made, Sir John Graville Earl of Bath, found himself the last but one; and Colonel Howard Earl of Carlisle, was the last of all: When he would have expostulated, the Chancellor told him he had no Reason to complain, he had what he desired. Lapsford's Works, vol. ii. p. 166, 167, 168.

(2) It was then most notoriously evident, that their [the Bishopal Party's] Business, was not to consult the Interest of Religion, but at once to cover and serve a political Design, that was too bad to appear barefaced at first; nor did they mean to heal the Church's Wounds, so much as to revenge their own. Hence it was, that all the use they made of the Savoy Conference, was only to learn what the Presbyterians, then so called, did most scruple: not that they might ease them of it, but know what to bind the more strongly upon them. They made no Secret of their true Design. Also they knew their Minds, they would have Matters to pass, as that not one of that Sort, should be able to keep his Tongue. Dr. Bate himself (a Person of utmost Candour, as well as undoubted Integrity) assures us, that when the Lord Chamberlain Manchester told the King, He was afraid the Terms of Conformity were so rigid, that many of the Ministers would not comply; Dr. Sheldon (then Bishop of London, and the great Leader of the ruling Clergy at that Time) reply'd, I am afraid they will. Their Compliance was then, what the dominating Clergy did not desire, but fear; and their Non-compliance, against which there have been such dreadful Outrages ever since made, was what they were resolv'd to force them to. Bishop's Answer to Bonnet of Lisbon.

(3) According to Mr. C., in his Answer to the By-stander, p. 59, but FIFTY-IX.

The Lord Chancellor, in his Answer to the new Speakers second Speech, hath this Paragraph: "The King did his Part, by publishing the very Day he intended the Parliament should meet, a good time before the Writs were sent; by sending out the writs much longer than was necessary before the Day of Meeting, so that the Country might not be surpris'd in their Elections, and

A. D. 1661. the King's Proclamation, was, for good Luck's sake, appointed for the Opening of the Parliament: His Majesty, in his Speech upon that Occasion, acknowledges, that "The Memory of the great Affection the whole Kingdom shew'd to him that Day Twelvemonth, made him desirous to meet them again this Day; when, I dare swear, said he, you are full of the same Spirit."

And as to the Sequel, it turn'd upon a Confirmation of the Proceedings of the last Parliament, especially with regard to the (w) Act of Oblivion and Indemnity; and his intended Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal.

Chancellor's Speech.

The Lord Chancellor expatiated largely on these Heads; but set out, with extolling the Super-excellency of a Parliament summon'd by the King's Writ; and the Happiness of those who had lived to see their King anointed and crown'd, by the Hands of an Archbishop.

Tho' the late Parliament was not call'd by the King's Writ, said he, it may be reasonably thought to have been called by God himself: But then he promised, that though it acted under so sublime an Authority, a great Part of the Business of this, was to confirm and re-enact all, that had been done by them.

A little farther on, having saluted the King (x) Emperor, in his Way, he gave the House to understand, "That they would find the Revenue, which their Predecessors intended to raise for the King, very much short of what they promis'd: That they would find the public Debts, for the Discharge of the Army and the Navy, which they thought they had provided for sufficiently, to be still in Arrear, and unpaid."

He then recommended Tenderness to tender Constitutions, but the utmost Vigilance over, and the utmost Severity against, seditious Preachers; and taking Occasion to speak of Fenner's Insurrection, he added,

"Let no Man undervalue the Treason, because of the Contemptibleness of the Number engag'd in it; no Man knows the Number; but, by the Multitude of intercepted Letters, from and to all the Counties of England, in which the Time was set down wherein the Work of the Lord was to be done, by the desperate Carriage of the Traytors themselves, and their bragging of their Friends, we may conclude the Combination reached far."

A. D. 1660. He concluded with the Affair of Portugal; of which he gave the following Detail:

"Within a very short time after his landing in this Kingdom, he was mov'd by the Embassador of Portugal to renew a Treaty, lately made between that Crown and the Usurper; a Treaty, in very many Respects, the most advantageous to this Nation, that ever was entred into with any Prince or People; a Treaty, by which, at this time, that Crown is paying the Penalty (which the Usurper exacted from it) for the most heroic and noble Act of Honour and Friendship, perform'd by that King to our Master, that ever was perform'd by any Prince towards another Prince in Distress; and yet the King was nothing forward to ratify this Treaty, tho' it is very true, every Article in it, but one, was entirely for the Benefit of this Nation, for the extraordinary Advancement of Trade, for the Good of Religion, and for the Honour of the Crown; yet there was one, one single Article, that must oblige the King, as it did oblige the Usurper, to supply Portugal with an Army for his Assistance, when he should require it; that is, that Portugal should have Power to make Levies of ten thousand Men for their Service: This the King foresaw might produce a War with Spain, which he was very unwilling to undergo for that Engagement; and yet his Council represented unto him, how heart-breaking a thing it would be to his People to lose the Possession of so great a Trade, and those other immense Advantages they had by that Treaty; and that would be judged an irrecoverable Error in Policy, if Portugal should be suffer'd again to be swallowed up by Spain. However, the King was resolv'd not precipitately to engage himself in such a Treaty, as might be attended with such an Inconvenience, but to take Time fully to consider of it; and this Delay the Portuguese could not be pleas'd with, and so the Embassador returned home to his Master.

"About this Time the House of Commons sent up a Bill to the Lords for the annexing Dunkirk and Jamaica to the Crown of England, which seem'd to have the most universal Consent and Approbation from the whole Nation, that ever any Bill could be attended with; yet the same that they might send up such a Representative unto him, as he might make a clear View and Prospect of the Affections and Desires of his People: And he is perswaded, that the Commons of England were never more exactly represented, than they are at present."

Again, Mr. Hampden, in the Pamphlet call'd Plain English, before quoted from the State Tracts, Will. III. observes, That the King's Message signifying his Design to dissolve the Parliament in a Month, put Men throughout the Kingdom in supplanting them.

(w) On this Subject his Majesty was pleas'd to say: "In God's Name provide full Remedies for any future Mischief, be as severe as you will against new Offenders, especially if they be to upon old Principles, and pull up those Principles by the Roots."

And upon the Marriage:

"When I had, as well as I could, weigh'd all that occurred to me, the first Resolution I took was to state the whole Overture, which had been made to me, and in truth, all that had been said against it, to my Privy Council, without hearing whose Advice, I never did, nor ever will resolve any thing of public Importance: And I tell you with great Satisfaction and Comfort to myself that, after many Hours Debate in a full Council, (for I think there was not above one absent) and truly I believe, upon weighing all that can be said upon that Subject for or against it, my Lords, without one dissenting Voice, (yet there were very few that dissent) advis'd me with all imaginable Cheerfulness to this Marriage, which I looked upon as very wonderful, and even as some Instance of the Approbation of God himself.

(x) Of whom, we may very justly say, as a very good Historian said of a very great Emperor, and, I am sure, it could never be so truly said as of Owa, Facere recte Civis, &c. Vide Speech.

 “ rarely admitted to Princes) it was not in “ his Majesty’s Power to be without some “ Approbation and Inclination to this Ali-

 “ pends: But they were very apprehensive
 “ that the first Protestant Daughter that ever
 “ any King of Spain had, would not prob“ ably bring so great Advantages to it, as “ was pretended. They have no Mind to “ encourage the King to a War; we have “ had War enough; but they do not think “ he should so much fear a War, as, out of “ Spanish Ambassador threatens War, if the “ King marries with Portugal, he presseth

 “ very earnestly the delivering up of Dun- “ kirk and Jamaica; and it is plain enough
 “ he would have that Recompence for the “ Portion he would give; and, in truth, “ whoever is against the Match with Portu- “ gal, is for the Delivery of Dunkirk and “ Jamaica, a War being as sure to follow “ from the latter, as from the former; and
 “ from neither, till the King of Spain finds
 “ it convenient for himself; which I hope
 “ he will not yet do. I will not enlarge “ upon the many Reasons; the King hath “ told you the Conclusion: There was ne“ ver a more unanimous Advice from any “ Council; not one dissenting Voice in the be“ seeching his Majesty to make this Mar“ riage, and to finish it with all the Expe“ dition imaginable. Upon this he sent for
 “ the Portugal Ambassador, declared his “ Resolution to him, hath writ himself to “ Portugal, and is preparing his Fleet to this Affair was the very next Day taken into Consideration, and met with as cordial a (z) Reception, as either the King or his Chancellor could desire.

This Step prov'd them loyal, their next prov'd them orthodox; for they made an Order for every Member to take the Sacrament by a certain Day, according to the Form prescribed in the Liturgy of the Church of England; and those who suffer'd that Day to elapse, without taking it, were not permitted to sit in the House, till they produced a Certificate, properly testify'd, that they had obey'd it.

They likewise prepar'd a Bill, "To prevent the ill Consequences to the Government, by the Quakers, Anabaptists, and other Schismatics, refusing to take Oaths, and numerously and unlawfully convening together, with such Penalties as may first Quarrel; but levelling Party and Confusion followed; then Tyranny and Usurpation was the Conclusion.

We read of the Emperor Adrian, when he lay a dying, he complain'd, that many Physicians had deserv'd him; meaning, that his contrary Concepts, and different Directions for his Recovery, had hinder'd his Death.

So it was with us; we were sick of Reformation; our Reformers were of all Ages, Sexes, and Degrees, of all Professions and Trades: They every Good went beyond his Last.

The last Meeting here in Parliament was happy, in healing the bleeding Wounds of this Nation; they were Heal'd also, even for their Works sake; your sacred Majesty did bless them; and therefore they shall be blessed to all Posterity.

But, Sir, we hope you have a Blessing left for us too: That was your Parliament by Adoption, but this is yours by Birthright; this Parliament is free-born: I hope this Honour will beget in us an Emulation to exceed the Actions of our Predecessors, and not only to meet your Majesty as our Sovereigns, with the Duty of Subjects, but with the Love of Sons to a most indulgent Father.

"When the Famine of Solomon's Wisdom had fill'd the neighbouring Nations, the Queen of Sheba could not contain herself at home, but with many Camels laden with Spices, with Gold and precious Stones in abundance, she comes to Solomon, to converse with him of all that was in her Heart. Great Sir, while this your native Country was scarcely of you, foreign Nations were made happy in the Knowledge of your Person, your Piety, and your Wisdom: And now the Lords and Gosh hath brought you home, and set you in your Throne, your Subjects long to see you.

What Striving and Rejoicing was there at your first Landing, to see our Rising Sun!

What Striving was there at your Coronation, to see the Imperial Crown set upon your Royal Head!

What Striving hath there lately been, in all the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs of this Nation, who should be sent up to hear your Wisdom, and confer with you in Parliament!

"If the Abilities of all Englishmen can make you happy; if the Riches of this Nation can make you great; if the Strength of this warlike People can make you considerable at home and abroad; be assured you are the greatest Monarch in the World. Give me leave, I beseech you, to double my Words, and say it again; I with my Voice could reach to Spain, and to the India too, you are the greatest Monarch in the World."

THE CHANCELLOR.

"You have made, Mr. Speaker, a very lively Description of the Extrangency of that Confusion, which this poor Nation groan'd under, when they would throw off a Government they had lived and prosper'd under so many Ages; indeed from the time of being a Nation, and which is as natural to them as their Food or their Raiment, to model a new one for themselves; which they know no more how to do, than the naked Indians know how to dress themselves in the French Fashion."

"The confounding the Commons of England, which is that noble Republicative, with the common People of England, was the last Ingredient in that accursed Dole, which intoxicated the Brains of Men with that Imagination of a Commonwealth; a Commonwealth, Mr. Speaker: A Government as impossible for the Spirit, and Temper, and Genius of the English Nation to submit to, as it is to persuade them to give their Cattle and their Corn to other Men, and to live themselves upon Herbs and Roots."

"You have done well, Mr. Speaker, in taking notice of the great Efficacy the King hath of the Memory of the last Parliament; he takes all Occasions himself to do it; and it deserv'd it at his Hands. But, as the wisest Father takes Joy in the Hopes his Heir will be wiser than he; and the greatest Monarch, in the Hopes that his Successor will be greater than he; and, if the Souls departed feel any Joy upon what is done in this World, it is in the Case of such an Heir, such a Successor; so you may be confident the Ghost of the deceased Parliament will be much delighted, much exalted, to see your Actions excel theirs, and your Fame exceed theirs.

It was a Bless'd Parliament, but there are other and greater Blessings reserved for you. They began many Things, which you may have the Happiness to finish; they had not Time nor Opportunity to begin many Things, which you may have the Honour to begin and finish. They invited his Majesty home, restored him to his Throne, and Monarchy to the Nation. It will be your Glory to establish him in his Power and Greatness; to avenue Monarchy to the Nation, that he nor his Pottery shall be ever again forced to be abroad, that they be invited home, not in danger to be restored; so to river Monarchy to the Hearts, and to the Understanding of all Men, that no Man may ever presume to conspire against it. Let it not suffice that we have our King again, and our Laws again, and Parliaments again; but let us provide, that neither King nor Law, nor Parliaments, may be so used again. Let not our Monarchy be undermined by a Fifth Monarchy, nor Men fail'd to have the Protection of a Government they profess to hate. Root out all Anti-monarchical Principles: At least, let not the same Stratagems prevail against us; let us remember how we were deceived, and let not the same Artifices over-reach us again; let King, and Church, and Country, receive more and greater Advantages, by the Wisdom and Industry of this Parliament." What followed was equally worthy of the Patriot and Politician, and not only deserv'd Acknowledgment then, but Imitation since.

Let Trade abroad and at home, be encouraged and enlarged; all Vices and Excesses be reformed and abolished, by new Laws and Provisions; let profitable Arts and Industry and so great Encouragement; that all thriving Inventions may be brought from all Parts of the World to enrich this Kingdom, and that the Inventors may grow rich in this Kingdom. And upon this Argument of encouraging Industry, I have a Command from the King to recommend to you, the Encouragement or Preservation of a great Work of Industry, in which the Honour and Interest of the Nation is more concerned, than in any Work this Age hath brought out; it may be in any Nation; and that is, all the Drawings in England which have given our Companies upon our own Continent, and brought an insupportable Burden to King and People by an Art of Creation; making Earth and mending Air, by Wit and Industry: Let no Waywardness in particular Persons, or Consideration of private and particular Advantage, give Disturbance to Works of so public a nature, much less to destroy such Works; but provide out of hand for the upholding and supporting them by some good Law, in which, due Care may be taken for all particular Interests, when the Public is out of Danger."

"Resolved by the Commons, that since his Majesty had been graciously pleas'd to acquaint them with his Resolutions concerning his Marriage and other Matters of Importance (which manifested his extraordinary Faith and affection for that House) they would attend his Majesty to pay him their most humble and hearty Thanks, as to the best and wisest Prince in the World; for which Purpose they further ordered, that his Majesty's Council, as were of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council, be desired to go to his Majesty to know his Pleasure concerning the Time, when they should attend him.

There was besides, a joint Address of both Houses on this remarkable Occasion, which deserves a Place here.

"We the Lords and Commons do humbly tender our Acknowledgments and Thanks unto your Majesty for that free and gracious Communication of your Resolutions to marry with the Infanta of Portugal, which we conceive to be of so high Concernment to this Nation, as that we receive it with great Joy and Satisfaction; and so with all Earnestness beg a Blessing upon, and a speedy Accomplishment of it. And we cannot but express our own unanimous Resolution, which we are confident will have a general Influence upon the Hearts of all your Subjects, that we shall upon all Occasions be ready to assist your Majesty in the Pursuance of your Intentions against all Oppositions whatsoever."

"To which the King return'd his special Thanks, declaring, that he did in the Matter of the intended Marriage, as much rely upon God as his own Power.

A. D. 1661.

" may be suitable to the Nature of those Offences, and may be profitable to work upon the Humours of such Fanatics."

It ought to be observ'd, that, just before this Bill was order'd by the Commons, there had been a general Gaol-Delivery of all the Quakers thro' the Kingdom, by Proclamation; with this merciful Circumstance, of being excus'd all their Fees.

But tho' the King could shew Favour without-doors, he could not, as yet, give the Law within; where the Church was mightier than He.

The poor Quakers were, therefore, forc'd to petition the Lords to allay the persecuting Spirit that was gone forth against them; who, considering them as Extravagants rather than Delinquents, contented themselves for the present, with directing the Attorney General to proceed against them by Proclamation, instead of laying them open to the Terrors of any new Law.

(*) Knox affirms that the King gave open Countenance and express Honour to some of the Roman Priests, who had been helpful and servicable to him abroad, and came over with him or soon follow'd him. Of these he names two, Henry Starkey and Lissel Corderfer, alias Munten. Knox. Rep. p. 479.

His Majesty having been pleas'd in his most gracious Declaration from Breda (which hath been since confirm'd upon other Occasions) to declare a Liberty to tender Consciences, and that no Man shall be disturb'd or call'd in question for Difference of Opinion in Matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. These are his Majesty's own Words: We his Roman Catholic Subjects do humbly lay hold on this Grace and Favour, and are Petitioners to the Right Honourable the Lords and Commons assembled in this present Parliament, that we may by their Mediation receive the Benefit of his gracious Promise, not being content to ourselves of the least Guilt, that may render us incapable of this gracious and general Indulgence.

That we differ from those that profess the Religion established in this Kingdom, even in Matters of Religion, is no question; and whether our Opinions are grounded upon Truth and Reason, is not pertinent to our Business, since we do not pretend to justify our Doctrine, but to submit both it and ourselves to his Majesty's Mercy. But the only material Question, as we humbly conceive, is this, whether our Opinions are consistent with our Obedience to the King and the Peace of the Kingdom, to which we take the boldness to make this Answer.

We have not heard, that there hath been any Objection to any of our Opinions, concerning our Fidelity to his Majesty, and our peaceable Comportment with our fellow Subjects, but only in our owning of a spiritual Jurisdiction in the Pope incompatible, as it is conceived, with the Power and Authority of the King, and such as set only over us our Allegiance, but by that depending on a foreign Power, endangers the Peace and Quiet of the Nation.

Though the Confidence of the Opinions of the Roman Catholics with the strict Duty of Subjects to their Sovereign may be sufficiently evinc'd by the constant Practice of Roman Catholics in all Countries where they are permitted to live, yet we will not content ourselves with a Proof from the Effect, but endeavour to give the Parliament a more exact Satisfaction, by a short Declaration of what we believe in that Particular, in which, we humbly conceive, we have hitherto been misunderstood.

In the first Place, we do declare that our Obedience to our Prince is an Article of our Faith grounded upon the unalterable Word of God, and not only to Princes of our own Religion, but even to those who are Enemies of it.

We do in the next Place declare, that it is no Article of our Faith, that, by virtue of that spiritual Jurisdiction acknowledged by us in the Pope, he had any Authority to depose a King, or absolve his Subjects from their Allegiance; and the Truth of both these we are ready to confirm by Oath; and further, that if at any Time the Pope shall attempt to execute that pretended Power, we are ready with our Lives and Fortunes to oppose him.

Now whether there is any reasonable Ground to imagine, that, contrary to an Article of our Faith, and so sworn to be by us, we should espouse an Opinion that is only Prejudicial, to the Prejudice of our Duties, and contrary to Perfection for Conscience Sake can never be defended; and yet King Charles has obtain'd little Honour by his Endeavours to set it aside: It has always been apprehended, and not without Reason, that he never shew'd any Favour to Nonconformists of any Class, but for the Sake of the (*) Papists: And it is extremely remarkable, that while the Episcopalian was permitted to set his Foot on the Neck of the Presbyterian, the Papists (a) petition'd the Lords to have the sanguinary Laws repeal'd; and, according to (b) some foreign Authors, would have carry'd their Point, if there had not been an Exception thrown in against the (c) Jesuits, who, in Revenge, overset the whole Scheme; or, according to (d) others, if the Lord Clarendon had not carry'd a greater Sway than the King himself.

The Commons in particular, upon all Occasions, made the Church their first Consideration, and the King but their second: Hence it our Oath, is humbly offered to the Christian Consideration of the honourable Members of both Houses.

We do not know what Inconveniences such a spiritual Jurisdiction can create in the Minds of those Subjects, as to the lessening their Obedience to the temporal Magistrature, who are so fortified against the irregular Execution of it, and which in its own Nature is so absolutely distinct from that Jurisdiction which Princes justly challenge over all their Subjects.

It is the Wisdom (as well as the Will) of the divine Providence, with such Harmony to dispose of these Powers, by which the whole Man is to be governed, that they no way clash one with another; that of the Seal, which properly belongs to God, nor interfering with that which belongs to Caesar.

To conclude, what greater Security can be given by a Subject to his Prince of his Fidelity and Obedience, than the Pawns of his Religion delivered by his Doctrine; and the Sacrifice of his Will declared by an Oath, and confirm'd by his Practice? We acknowledge ourselves bound by the Articles of our Religion to obey our Sovereign; and we swear that we will; and that in Opposition to all foreign and domestic Power whatsoever, without Restriction.

(b) The King was inclinable to the Papists, that he was willing to consent to any thing in favour of them. His Temper was not unknown to the Papists, a Design was on him to procure a Toleration for them. The King had a Privy-Council fit for the Purpose, and hoped to have the Parliament as pliable, if Money could be command'd from a neighbouring Prince, as the Jesuits had promised him; but when their good Men understood, that a Clause was to be inserted in the Act of Toleration, that no Jesuit should be suffered to live in England, there was no Money to be had; the Lords who were to bring it about were desired to let it drop; the King was fool'd, and the general Interest of Popey sacrificed to the private Interest of the Jesuits. Hist. of the College of Douay.

(c) July 16, The House of Lords proceeded to finish the Report concerning Penal Laws against Roman Catholics, and appointed a Committee to consider of, and prepare a Bill to be offered to this House upon their particular Heads.

Their Lordships to peruse the whole Statute of 5 Edw. Cap. I. and to consider what Part thereof is fit to be repealed.

The Clauses of the Statute 27 Edw. Cap. II. concerning the receiving of Jesuits and seminary Priests, to be repealed.

The Clauses of the Statute 35 Edw. Cap. II. concerning Nonconformists, to be repealed.

The Clauses 1 Jas. Cap. IV. concerning putting former Laws against Recusants and Jesuits into Execution, to be repealed.

The Clauses 3 Jas. Cap. IV. concerning going out of the Realm, and not taking the Oath of Allegiance, and giving Bond for those that seduce others, to be repealed.

The Writ De Hæretico comburendo, to be repealed.

In the Preamble of the Bill to set forth the Reasons and Grounds of the Alterations, and also to consider of fit and proper Remedies to preserve the Protestant Religion from the Inconveniences which the repealing of these Laws may otherwise produce. But this Indulgence not to be extended to Jesuits. Of this Committee were the Duke of York, Lord Treasurer, Lord Privy Seal, &c. Lord's JOURNAL.

(d) There were great Debates in this Assembly about Liberty of Conscience, between the Protestants and the Catholics, it follow'd, that they acted more like the Representatives of the Clergy than of the People; and that all Concern for the Liberty of the Subject was, in a manner, devoured by their Zeal for the Sanctuary.

Not content with restoring ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, they repealed the Act by which Ecclesiastics were disabled from exercising any Authority in Temporals: And, in a word, to them the Nation stands oblig'd, for the abrogating that Law, by which, my Lords, the Bishops, were depriv'd of their Seats in Parliament; the happy Effects of which we have Reason to feel, and acknowledge at this Day.

On the other hand, being willing to convince his Majesty, that the Supporters of the Church were the surest Supporters of the Monarchy, they ordered the national League and Covenant, the Act for erecting the High Court of Justice, the Act for subscribing the Engagement, the Act for declaring and constituting the People of England to be a Commonwealth, and free State, &c. to be burnt by the common Hangman; which was accordingly perform'd, as much to the Satisfaction of the Populace, as they had been at first instituted.

They likewise prepar'd and pass'd an Act for the Security of the King's Person and Government, by which it was made capital Treason to devise the King's Death, or Imprisonment, or bodily Harm, or to deprive and depote him from his Kingly Name, &c. It enact'd likewise, that whoever affirm'd the King to be an Heretic, or a Papist, or should by Writings, Printing, Preaching, or other Speaking, stir up the People to Hatred or Dislike of his Majesty, or the establish'd Government, should be render'd incapable of holding any Employment in Church or State. It also declar'd the Long Parliament to be dissolved, the Solemn League and Covenant to be illegal; and that there was no Legislative Power in either, or both Houses of Parliament, without the King; and whoever asserted the contrary, were made liable to the Penalty of a Preamble.

Recollecting further the Abuse of Petitioning, in the preceding Reign, they prepar'd a Bill, by which it was enacted, that no more than Twenty Hands should be subscrib'd to any Petition, or Remonstrance, unless with the Sanction of Three Justices, or the major Part of the Grand Jury; and that such Petition should not be presented to the King, or either House, by above Ten Persons, on the Penalty of a Hundred Pounds, and Three Months Imprisonment.

A. D. 1661.

Militia given up to the King.

They likewise gratify'd his Majesty, in his favourite Point of the (e) Militia; the whole Right in, and Power over which, they declar'd to be solely in the King; and that both, or either, of the Houses of Parliament, cannot, nor ought, to pretend to the same.

Nor did they stop here, but in the same Act authorized all the Trespassers which had been committed on this Head, in virtue of Powers deriv'd only from the Prerogative.

But this Clause ought to bear Witness against itself; since it serves to demonstrate, that Oppression prevail'd in the Government, as well as Faction among the People.

And whereas, since the 24th of June 1660, there have been Insurrections; by occasion whereof, divers of his Majesty's good Subjects have been murder'd; and for the securing the Peace of the Nation, and preventing farther Disorders, divers Persons, suspected to be Fanatics, Sectaries, or Disturbers of the Peace, have been assaulted, arrested, and detain'd, or imprison'd, and divers Arms have been seized, and Houses searched for Arms, or suspected Persons; Be it therefore further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, that all and every Person and Persons, who have, or shall have acted or done any thing in Execution of any Commission or Commissions of Lieutenancy, issued by the King's Majesty, that now is, or by Colour of them, or any of them, or touching or concerning the same, or any of them, or relating thereto, shall be, and are hereby sav'd harmless, and indemnify'd in this Behalf. And also, all Magistrates, Justices of the Peace, Officers and Ministers of Justice, and all Persons that shall have acted by or under them, or by their or any of their Command, since the said 24th of June, as to any Assaulting, Arresting, Detaining, and Imprisoning any Person suspected to be Fanatic, Sectary, or Disturber of the Peace; or seizing of Arms, or searching of Houses for Arms, or for suspected Persons, shall be, and are hereby sav'd harmless and indemnify'd in that behalf.

They, however, took care not to render themselves useless. The Supplies granted by the former Parliament had not left the King in a State of Independency of this; and they also found it expedient to be frugal in their Grants, that there might be a Necessity for frequent Applications.

In their (*) Money-proceedings, it must therefore be allow'd, that they acted with an Oeconomy, which very justly reproaches the Profusion of later Times.

tholies, the Church of England and the Protestants. The Catholic Party was supported by the Earl of Bristol, a Man in great Repute, and Head of a potent Faction. The Protestant Party by Chancellor Hyde, chief of an opposite Faction, and a Person of no less Consideration; who, putting himself at the Head of the prevailing Church of England Party in that Parliament, declar'd not only against the Catholics, but against the Presbyterians, and all those the Church of England calls Non-conformists. The King, who was no good Christian in his Affections, but a Catholic in his Heart, and all that could be expected from his easy Temper, to maintain the Common Liberty, that so the Catholic Church might have a share in it. But the Church of England prevail'd, and Chancellor Hyde was so hot upon that Point, that his Majesty was oblig'd to yield rather to his Impetuosity, than to his Reason. P. Orleans, p. 236.

(*) This Bill was but a temporary one, and to authorize the King to do by Law, what he had hitherto done by his Prerogative till a more explicit Settlement could be made.

(*) Upon this Head Mr. Eichelard has the following Passage:

But first they resolv'd to do something for the King in the Matter of his Revenge, and to consider of settling so much as might maintain the Splendor and Grandeur of his

By one Act, they complimented his Majesty with all the Monies, and other Valuables, which were outstanding in the Hands of the Receivers, and which had been levied by the Authority of the late Governments.

By another, they did the same by the Arrers of the Excise.

By another, they vested all the Lands, Goods, and Chattels of Twenty-seven of the Regicides, therein-nam'd, in his Majesty.

And by another, they authoris'd and enabled his Majesty to receive a free and voluntary Present from his People; declaring, at the same time, that no Commissions or Aids of this Nature can be issu'd out, or levied, but by Authority of Parliament; and providing, that this Act, and Supply, hereby granted, shall not be drawn into Example for the Time to come.

It ought further to be mention'd to their Honour, that, tho' they prepar'd and perfected the military Establishment of the Navy, by an express Law, they left the King to regulate his Soldiers, as well as pay them, in the best Manner he could; very rightly avoiding to give the least Sanction to so dangerous an (f) Innovation.

I shall take Leave of this Session with observing, that, tho' they renew'd and confirm'd the (g) Act of Oblivion, and all the

“ his Kingly Office, and preserve the Crown from Want, and “ from being undervalued of his Neighbours.” In order to which Sir Philip Warwick made a Report, That upon a full Examination he found the Customs, estimated at 50000 Pounds per Annum, would fall short 100000; that the Crown Lands, valued at 120000 Pounds per Annum would fall short 40000; that the Excise, val'd at 300000 Pounds per Annum, would fall short 20000; that the Estimate upon the Advantages of the Queen's Joynture, at 50000 Pounds, would fall short 40000; that the Estates forfeited, estimated at 38000 Pounds, would fall short 25000; and that the Wine Licence, estimated at 25000 Pounds, would fall short 10000. The Total of the Defect was 265000 Pounds. But that no Time might be lost, in the Point of the King's Revenues, the Commons are order'd, “ That forthwith might be provided “ a plentiful Supply for his Majesty's present unavoidable “ great Occasions, as well as a Settlement of a constant and “ standing Revenue.”

(f) Of which, even Lebrange, in his Moments touching Seditions, expresses himself in the following remarkable manner:

“ Our Seven Kings contented themselves with a Law, What Arms every Man of Estate should have, and a Rate upon just as did Detract the Militia.

Edmond Ironside, after his Duel with Canutus the Dane, and a Competition, to divide the English and Danish Kingdoms betwixt them and their Heirs, kept no Army on Foot to guard the Agreement; neither did the Danes (who after his Death, treacherously seiz'd the Kingdom) to maintain their Conquest.

William the Conqueror, that subdu'd both English and Danes, thought himself safe enough in creating Tenants by Knight-Service, and permitting Proprietors, too; at that Time under such Jealousies, that he took divers of his English Prisoners, into Normandy with him, for fear of a Commotion in his Realm.

William Rufus, and, after him, his Brother Henry the First, (tho' the Urpurses of the Senior Rights of their elder Brother Robert) set up his Reign upon the same Terms; and so did Henry II. after a long Contest with King Stephen and notwithstanding the Unrulings of most of his Sons.

Henry III. and then Edward I. after the Barons Wars, employ'd no standing Army to secure themselves; neither did Edward or Richard II. notwithstanding a potent Faction of the Nobility bandying against the latter of them.

Neither did the Heinric IV., V., VI. in the grand Schism of York, and Lancaster, ever approve of it. Nor Henry VII. (as Wife and Jealous as any of his Predecessors).

If any thing could have warranted the Adventure, methinks the Tight-tarty and Bravillory which Henry VIII. introduced, might have persuaded, or provok'd it. But neither there, nor in the following Toits and Tumble of Religion, from Edward VI. to Queen Mary, and then back again to Queen Elizabeth, was it put in Practice.

King James had no Temptation to it. King Charles the Martyr, was indeed charg'd with the Invention of it, and so he was with being Englishly affect'd (in truth, with what not), and the one as true as the other. But who were they that laid this to his Charge? Even tho' very Persons (some of them) that advis'd Oliver to keep a standing Army of 10000 Horse, and 20000 Foot, to awe and scourge the Nation. A Count unknown to our Forefathers; and by the best and worst of former Princes, equally disallow'd; the bad judging it safe, nor the good, expedient!

But other more convenient, and as effectual, means they had, either to prevent Dangers, or suppress them; as their Customs of Friarage, or Frank-almoyns, Imprison, Oath, and Penalties, Tenants by Knight-Service, Commissary of Arms, &c. Which being of approv'd Benefit, and Equality, were much more suitable to the Genius and Interest of the People, than a Standing Army, which to allow, had been no other than to deliver up the Strength of the Nation into the Hands of a Favourite.

Nor was it less against the Government, than against the Honour of the Nation. Put a Parliament over the Nation, and an Army over the Parliament. Who governs? But all Oliver's Gifts over Swains; and his Soldiers, Saints. Did they not take what they would, give what they would, raise and plack down at Plasures? Nay, effectually, did even my standing Army others, if they had nothing else to do? Had they not already got the Trick of calling the People together, to get Money of them, and then sending them away like Bowards when they had gotten it; of packing, and qualifying, engrossing of Peasants and Officers, containing the Nation?

But why do I discourse the Mischief of a Standing Army? They are too many, great, and obvious, to admit a Question. What are the Benefits of it rather? Is it either use to any Purpose, or useful to the common and pretended End of it, even under a lawful and hereditary Monarch?

It is true, a Prince may deal with his Dominions as the Gentleman did with his Estate, that turn'd an inheritance into an Annuity, because he would rather have it Large, than Long; and that's the fate of a Feudal Government. Suppose he save himself for his own Time, what will become then of his successors? But that we'll waive too, and consider what's the Fruit of it to himself.

It is the richer for't! Alas, the contrary. The Nation bears a double Burthen, and the Army feels the better Half of the Advantage. Is he the safer? Neither; for a Mutiny in his Army, is both more likely, and more dangerous, than a Tumult among his People. In fine, a Standing Army may promote a Faction, but 'tis the Law preserves the Public, and consequently the King.

That Monarch, that secures himself from Private Practices by a choice, full, and honourable Guard, well paid, and disciplin'd, about his Royal Person, as to the rest, shall find the strict and timely Execution of good Laws the best Public Security against Sedition.

There may be temporary Occasions indeed, for temporary and extraordinary Levies; but the Word temporary, is commonly attended with such a Train of Reasons for Perpetuity, that if the Occasion be not very manifest, the Word is apt to haunt of the Necessity.

To conclude. That Prince is great, safe, and happy, that commands by his Arms abroad, and governs by his Laws at home. The Apprehension of Conspiracies and Plots, in my Opinion, weighs not much; or, if there be any Danger, the Failing is rather in the Constitution or Administration than in the Want of Power to keep the People quiet. Good Laws and good Officers, will do the Business without an Army; and if the Instruments be bad, the Hazard is ten times greater with it.

(g) Upon passing this Act, the King made a Speech, which was spoken with gratitude, and which sufficiently shew'd, that whatever his Faults were, they did not arise from a Defect of Understanding.

“ The last Parliament, laid his Majesty, by God's Blessing, and the Foundation of the Happiness we all enjoy; therefore I thought it but Justice to the Memory of it, to send you Bills for the Confirmation of what was then enacted; and I cannot doubt, but you will dispatch what remains of that kind with all convenient Speed; and that you will think, that what was then thought necessary for the public Peace, ought not to be taken now, or my good Man left secure of what he possesses, than he was when you came together. It is to put myself in mind, as well as you, that I do often mention to you my Declarations from Breda: And let me put you in mind of another Declaration, published by your votes about the same time; and which I am persuaded made mine the more effectual; an honest, generous, and Christian Declaration, sign'd by the most eminent Persons, who had been the most eminent Sufferers; in which you renounced all former Antiquities, all Memory of former Unkindnesses, swore all inimaginable Good-will to, and all Confidence in, each other. There-

1661. other Acts of the Convention-Parliament, relating to the Revenue, &c. they took no notice of that for confirming and restoring Ministers, which was the only legislative Hold that the Presbyterians had left.

Upon the 20th of (b) July, Mr. Secretary Morris had given the House to understand, that it was the King's Pleasure, that they should prepare for a speedy Adjournment; and accordingly, in ten Days after, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and, having given his Assent to the Bills which were presented to him, the principal of which were severally embellish'd with all the Rhetoric the Speaker was Matter of, put an End to the (i) Session, by Adjournment, as before; Things being not as yet ripe for a Prorogation.

We are now to resume the Consideration of foreign Affairs.

Notwithstanding the King had been so magnificently receiv'd and entertain'd by the States General, in his Way from Brada to take Possession of his Throne, and seem'd to have for cordial a Sense of their Compliments and Civilities, he was very far from laying it down as a Maxim of his Government, to keep up a good Correspondence with that Republic.

But, tho' he did not design to live with them as Friends, he design'd to avail himself of their Power: In order to which he took a Resolution to espouse the Claims of his Nephew the young Prince of Orange, and to use his utmost Efforts to put him at the Head of that People, in quality of Stadtholder.

With this View he reconcil'd himself to the Princess Dowager of Orange, with whom he had been at Variance, and enter'd into a proper Concert with the Elector of Brandenburg: He likewise undertook to subdue the Opposition which he expected from Mr. De Witt on that Head, by threatening to produce the Proofs, which were in his (k) Possession, of his endeavouring, while Embassador at London from the States to the Protector Cromwell, to irritate his Highness against the House of Orange; and of either causing or increasing all the Misfortunes it was then afflicted with: And, flattering himself that France would be induced to join with him in this Measure, he depended upon carrying his Point.

But however freely his Brother Lewis offer'd him his Services, he never intended that should prejudice his own Interests: Soon perceiving, therefore, that, tho' he assisted the Prince of Orange, he should never gain him; that, on the contrary, the Prince would think his first Obligations due to the King his Uncle, and that consequently, by advancing the Designs of England, he should weaken his own, he gave Instructions to Mr. d'Elstrades, to amuse his Majesty of England with good Words, and, if press'd, to excuse him on that Head,

"fore let it be in no Man's Power to charge me or you with
"Breach of our Word or Promise. Let us look forwards,
"and not backwards, and never think of what is past,
"except Men put us in mind of it by repeated Faults we "had forgot, and then let us remember no more than what "concerns those very Persons. God hath wrought a won"derful Miracle in settling us as he hath done. I pray let "us do all we can to get the Reputation at home and "abroad of being well contented. We have Enemies and En-
"sues enough, who labour to have it thought otherwise;
"and if we would indeed have our Enemies fear us, and
"our Neighbours love and respect us, and fear us enough
"to love us, let us take all the Ways we can, that, as the "World cannot but take notice of your extraordinary Af"fection to me, and of the Comfort I take in that Af"fection, so that it may likewise take notice of your Af"fection to, and Confidence in each other, which will dis"appoint all Designs against the public Peace, and fully "establish our joint Security.

(4) In this Month, Mr. d'Elstrades took up his Residence here as Minister from the most Christian King, and in his second Discourse to his Majesty, we find the following Passage:
"I observe there are many Malecontents in this Court,
"and yet more among the People. The Presbyterians,
"who are those that rebuked the King, hold themselves
"injured by the Resolutions which he has taken to restore "the Bishops. He asks much Advice to bring them into
"his Measures, and, hitherto with Success."

(7) With a Speech, which shews so much of the Spirit and Bias of his Religion, that it would be an inexcusable Fault to omit any Part of it.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I perceive by the thin Appearance of the Members of "both Houses this Day, that it is high Time to adjourn.
"In truth the Season of the Year, as well as your particu"lar Affairs require it, and therefore I do willingly con"sent to it. I thank you for the many Bills you have "presented me with this Day, of which I hope the Bene"fit will redound to the whole Kingdom. I thank you "for the Care you have taken for the Safety of my Person,
"which (till me) is the most valuable to me, for the Con"sequence I think it is of to you: And upon my Confi"dence, there is no Body willing till to me, but they would "quickly revenge the Lives of you, if they could. I "thank you for the Care you have taken of yourselves, of "your own Safety and Honour in the Act against Tumults
"and Disorders, upon Presence of Parliament, to which "Licence we owe much of the Calmities we have under"gone. But I thank you with all my Heart, indeed as "much as I can do for any thing, for the Removal of that "Act, which excluded the Bishops from Parliament; it was "an unhappy Act, in an unhappy Time, pass'd with many "unhappy Circumstances, and attended with miserable

"Events, and therefore I do again thank you for repeal"ing it. You have thereby related Parliaments to their "primitive Institutions; and I hope, my Lords and Gentle"men, you will, in a short time, restore them to their "ancient Order and Gravity of Debates and Determina"tions, which the Licences of the late dissolved Times had
"so much corrupted, which is the only way to restore Par"liaments to their primitive Veneration with the People,
"which I heartily wish they should always have.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"You are now going to your several Countries, where "you cannot but be welcome for the Services you have
"perform'd here: I do very earnestly recommend the good "Government and Peace of your Countries to your Care,
"and your Council and your Vigilance. There are still
"impur'd Spirits enough, which lie in wait to do Mis"chief; by laying Reproaches upon the Court, upon the "Government, Reproaches upon me, and Reproaches upon "you. Your Wisdoms, and Reputations, and Authority,
"I will do but not weigh down their light Credit; and
"the old and new good Laws will, I hope, prevent any "Mischiefs they intend. However, you have done very "well, and I do heartily thank you for it, in declaring my "sole Right over the Militia, the questioning of which, was "the Fountain from which all our bitter Waters flowed. I "pray make haste to put the whole Kingdom in such a "Posture, that evil Men who will not be converted may "yet chuse to be quiet, because they find they shall not be "able to do the Harm they desire to do. I know you "have begun many Bills in both Houses which cannot be "finished till your Meeting again; and that they may be "finished then, I forbear to make a Session now, but am
"contented that you adjourn till the twentieth of November,
"when I hope, by God's Blessing, we shall come happily
"together again.

"In a Word, my Lords and Gentlemen, I thank you
"for what you have done, and am confident that what you "have left undone, you will dispatch with all Alacrity and "to all our Satisfaction, at our next Meeting. And to you
"make adjourn till the twentieth of November."

(4) Which, according to Mr. d'Elstrades, had been communi"cated to him by Sir John, Cromwell's Secretary.

A. D. 1661.

Head, on account of the Attachments of the Elector of Brandenbourg and the Princesses of Orange to the Crown of Spain, which hinder'd him from placing any Confidence in their Affection.

The King had already piqued the States, in the most sensible Manner, by placing his Nephew under the Tutition of the Electors and Princes Dowager before-mention'd, with an Exclusion to them: He had likewise embroil'd himself with De Witt in particular, who was the leading Man in the Cabal of Amsterdam, which gave the Law to the whole Seven Provinces; and over and above all this, when it was most his Interest to be well with the Populace of Holland, he made a Point of distressing them in their Fisheries on the British Coasts. He did indeed assert his Right of Sovereignty over the Seas, against all Nations, and, in particular, caus'd the Nets of certain French Fishermen of Dieppe to be seiz'd, in hopes his most Christian Brother would connive at the Example, for the sake of humbling the Dutch; especially, as the said Nets were restor'd, and the Owners were left at Liberty to carry on the Trade without Molestation, for the Time to come. But, unfortunately, the Court of France consider'd it as a Trespas, and the Manner of restoring the Nets gave more Offence than Satisfaction: for in the Instrument, which was sign'd for that Purpose by the Duke of York, as Lord High Admiral, it was made a Matter of Grace, and not of Justice. This was what Lewis could not bear; and accordingly, as it was a Breach of the Treaty between the late Protector and him, he immediately sent Orders, by way of Reprizal, to the Duke de St. Simon, Governour of Blaye, to set aside the (1) Article in that Treaty, relating to the English Ships, in their Passage up the River Garonne to Beardcaux.

not only made her own Advances of them.

Thus he made it necessary for the States and People of Holland to court the Friendship of France, and gave France an Opportunity to form a joint Interest with them; Each, of course made Advances to the other, mutual Negotiations were commenc'd; a mutual Confidence was establish'd; and the only Difficulty which retarded the Signing of a Treaty in form between them, was a Demand of the States for an express Guaranty of the Fishery, and his most Christian Majesty's Offer of a Guaranty in general Terms, which was an Expedient he chose, in order to avoid a Breach with England: For tho' it was manifestly his Interest for the Two great Maritime Powers to be at Variance, that his Friendship might become of more Importance to either, it was equally his Interest to keep up a good Correspondence with both.

nisters at London, with Instructions to renew the Alliance between the two Powers; and Conferences were held upon the Terms: (m) Two of which, on the behalf of England, were, That all the Jewels and Furniture, belonging to the Crown, which had been sold in Holland, during the late Troubles, should be restor'd; and, That all those who had any Concern in the Death of the late King, and who should take Refuge in the Dominions of the States, were to be deliver'd up: But, even while these Affairs were under Deliberation, the States, on one hand, took all Opportunities to enter into the closest Unity with France, and the King, on the other, was ever remonstrating to Mr. D'Esprades, how easy it would be for him, and his most Christian Brother, to compel them to come into what Measures they pleas'd.

A. D. 1661.

With respect to the farther Intercourse of Negotiations with France. England and France, it appears, that the Earl of St. Albans, who was then the King's Ambassador at Paris, had Orders to receive the Proposals of the French Court, without making any himself: But the most Christian King had laid it down for a Maxim, to take Advantage of his present Situation, and oblige England, as well as Holland, to make the first Advances to him: In vain, therefore, did his Majesty, in Mr. d'Esprades's first private Audience, declare, that he never so much courted the Friendship of any Prince, as that of his most Christian Majesty; that he esteem'd himself happy in seeing his Wishes accomplish'd; and that if the Emperor, and all the Princes of the Barth, were to solicit his Sister in Marriage, he would refuse them all, in order to dispose of her to (n) Monseigneur, on the sole Consideration of being thereby more closely ally'd to his Brother of France.

Mr. d'Esprades, who was a Minister of great Ability and Address, return'd Compliments for Compliments; but dextrously avoided advancing any thing, that might give either his Majesty or his Ministers the least Advantage. Finding, therefore, there was a Necessity to open first, the Chancellor gave Mr. d'Esprades to understand, That the Court of Spain had propos'd a Truce with Portugal, which the Majority of the English Council were for embracing: This d'Esprades undertook to dissuade the Chancellor from accepting; which being the very Thing he waited for, he seem'd to fall in with his Opinion; but withal added, That it was impossible for the King his Master to follow it, unless his Brother of France would assist him with a considerable Sum, to support the Expence of a War.

In a very few Days after this, the King himself sent for d'Esprades; and, after a Preface, signifying his entire Satisfaction in him, and that he was determin'd to undertake nothing

(1) Art. XI. That the Merchants Ships of this Commonwealth, and the People, and Inhabitants thereof, which shall go up to Beardcaux, or enter into the River of Garonne, shall not be compell'd in their Passage, by the Castle of Blaye, to take out their Ordnance, Arms, and Ammunition.

(m) In the defective Alliance which the King had enter'd into with Denmark, both these Articles were admitted; and if Holland had allow'd them likewise, the same would have been insisted on with France: But to the first, the Dutch artfully reply'd, That if the King would reimburse the Perchians, they were at his Service: And with the last, tho' to a lucky Rebellion, they ow'd their own Liberty, they made no Difficulty to comply.

(n) The Duke of Orleans, Brother to the most Christian King, always so call'd.

A. D. 1661.

thing without the Advice and Participation of his most Christian Majesty, he propos'd to him the following Questions, viz.

Whether, for the common Interest of the two Crowns, Portugal ought not to be succour'd, so as to hinder it from falling again into the Hands of Spain?

Money demanded of that Court, for the Assistance of Portugal,

Whether the most Christian King would enable him to undertake this Service, by furnishing him with the (v) necessary Sums?

Or, Whether, if that was not in his Power, he would advise the King of England to accept the Mediation offer'd him by Spain, in order to the Conclusion of a Truce?

With these Proposals, which were treated of as a Secret of the last Importance, because the Majority, both of the Court and the Parliament, were in the Interest of Spain, his Majesty, together with the Chancellor (who was the sole Minister present at this Conference) would have induc'd Mr. d'Esstrades to have taken a Journey to the King his Master: But he excus'd himself, as having no such Warrant in his Instructions. He dispatch'd them nevertheless, by an express Courier, and very adroitly advis'd his Majesty to take the same Measures, in the mean while, for the speedy Assistance of Portugal, as if there was a Certainty that they would be accepted.

It happen'd however, that the King and his Chancellor built on a false Bottom: His most Christian Majesty had Reasons, which convinc'd him, that no such Truce had been offer'd; and that, consequently, he ran no Risque in not answering these pecuniary Demands of England: He therefore order'd Mr. d'Esstrades, in case the Necessity of accepting such Truce should again be urg'd, to reply, in his Name, That, tho' he was sorry for it, he could not help it; and that it must be submitted to as an Evil, which could not be avoided.

Thus of the Two grand Points, which the King propos'd to obtain by his preferring the Friendship of France to that of Spain, he could, as yet, carry neither: On the contrary, France, on the one hand, embroil'd him in the War of Portugal; and, on the other, establish'd its own Ascendency in the Councils of Holland, by the means of De Wit, which he aspir'd to by the House of Orange.

A. D. 1661.

In this Situation stood our Affairs abroad, at the Clois of this Year; and, agreeable to Order of Time, we must now resume the Deduction of our Transactions at home:

And first, of the War of Parties.

Tho' the Presbyterians had receiv'd many grievous Mortifications, they were not yet subdu'd: And, as they had discover'd a Sense of Ill-usage, it was thought advisable to disable them effectually, if not from resenting, at least from avenging it.

But this could not be effected, without doing Violence to all his Majesty's Declarations; unless it could be made appear, that they had forfeited the Benefit of them, by disturbing the Peace of the Kingdom: And it could scarce be imagin'd, that those who had just endeavour'd to shew the Vanity of Commonwealth-Principles, and had been so instrumental in restoring the King, would either co-operate in a Cause they had condemn'd, or be trusted by those they had undone.

Advantage however had been already taken of Vennir's Insurrection, to exercise great Rigours upon Separatists of all Sorts, as if the Guilt of One had extended to all: And, from what follows, it appears, that all manner of (p) Artifices were us'd to render the Presbyterians, in particular, obnoxious, that the Effects of Hatred and Animosity might be thought the Dictates of Justice; and that what they suffer'd was but what they deserv'd.

John James, a Small-coal-man, one of Vennir's frantic Crew, who had escap'd the Gallows, for his Concern in that horrid Sedition, had in October deliver'd a Discourse, equally treasonable and enthusiastic; in which, among other desperate Rants, he declar'd, that the Death and Destruction of the King grew very near; and for which he was immediately apprehended, and soon after (q) try'd, condemn'd, and executed. From hence

Seditious Discourse of one John James,

(p) Which, as the King affirm'd, had been promisd by the late Cardinal, to the Portuguese Ambassador; and for the Truth of which he refer'd to Mr. le Tellier.

(q) Mr. Andrew Parson had been Minister of Wren in Shropshire, till 1660, at the latter End of which, he was brought into Trouble, on the Account of seditious Words, which were sworn against him, which were these, That the Devil was like a King, that covered the Seal, and spake fair till he was cuttin into the Throat, and then play'd Pranks. The Witness deposed contrary to the Coherence of the Discourse, that he said, the King was like the Devil: He was try'd at Shropshire before my Lord Newport. Mr. Serjeant Turner, and others, May 28 and 29, 1661. It was also charged upon him, that he said, There was more Sin committed now in England in a Month, than was heretofore in seven Years: And that there had been more and better Preaching in England for thirty Years past, than was ever since the Apostles Days. He had Council assign'd him, who pleaded that the Time limited by the Statute on which he was indicted, was expired: The Court yielded it was so, allowing twenty-eight Days to a Month, but they would understand it of thirty Days in a Month. So he was found Guilty, and fin'd two hundred Pounds, and order'd to be imprison'd till it should be paid. He continued near three Months in Prison, till the Lord Newport, without his Knowledge, procur'd the King's Pardon for his Fine. This Tryal made a great Noise. Dr. Calamy's Account, p. 536. Contin. p. 722.

(q) The Indictment set forth, that the said John James, being assembled with other false Traytors in Balls- Alley in the Parish of White-Chapel in the County of Middlesex, did speak and publish these treasonable Words following, viz. That the King was a bloody Tyrant, and a bloody Ship's Man, and his Nobles the same; that the King and his Nobles had shed the Blood of the Saints at Charing-Cross, and the Blood of the Covenanters in Scotland; that the King was brought into this End, to fill up the Measure of his Iniquity; and that the King's Cap of Justice had filled more within this last Year than in many Years before, and bewail'd that they had not improv'd their Opportunity, when they had Power in their Hands; that it would not be long before they had Power again, and then they would improve it better; and he remonstrated the Apathy of the People, saying, and said, they had not fought the Lord's Battles thoroughly, but when the Lord should give his Work into their Hands again, they would do it better; and that the Death and Destruction of the King grew very near.

When brought to receive Sentence, being demanded what he had to say, why Judgment of Death should not pass against him according to Law, he answered out of the Prophet Jeremiah, that if they put him to Death, they should surely bring innocent Blood upon themselves and upon this City; and added, that, prout in the Sight of the Lord is the Death of his Saints. After which, Sentence was pronounc'd against him as a Traytor.

Nation propagators of a general Plot:

[Heath's Chronicle.]

The Conspirators, Fanatics and Republicans.

Act of Uniformity,

owing to the Church, not the Court.

[Yarranton's Discovery.]

Independents and Anabaptists forwarded it, out of Spite to the Presbyterians.

hence an Apprehension arose, or a Hint was taken, to propagate the Notion of a general Plot against the King and Government; which soon gather'd Strength, and obtain'd Credit; for Vane, Harrington, Lambert, Waller, and several other Prisoners in the Tower, were remov'd to distant Places, Castles, and Islands, to cut off all Possibility of Correspondence with them, or Danger from them: And many more, of those who were thought to be their Confederates, were also seiz'd, and committed to close Custody. The very taking such Precautions as these prepares the Minds of the People to conclude, as their Betters would have them, that they proceed upon Evidence, and that, without a Saviour, all would perish.

Unfortunately indeed, all these either real or suppos'd Conspirators were Republicans and Fanatics, with whom the Presbyterians were at Variance; and, consequently, it was scarce to be suppos'd, that these Opposites would mingle in Cabals, which gave each an Opportunity to sacrifice the other.

But the late Troubles, and the present Fears, dispos'd the Multitude to believe anything: Advantage therefore was taken of the Crisis to involve the Presbyterians in the Odium of Plotting, as well as their Adversaries; for, as an extraordinary End was in View, it was necessary to make use of extraordinary Means.

To be more explicit:

Instead of an Act of Union, which the Presbyterians aspir'd to, an Act of Uniformity had been introduc'd in the preceding Session, with a premeditated Design to lay the Act to the Root of their Establishment, as they had before done to that of Episcopacy. It doth not appear, that this was wholly a Court-Contrivance: On the contrary, the Advisers of it may be trac'd, from the Sanctuary to the House of Commons, where it was adopted by those, who mistook Zeal for Righteousness; or who, under the Pretence of establishing the Church, utterly lost Sight of that Meekness, Benevolence, and Charity, which are the very Fundamentals of Religion.

It has been affirm'd, that some of the leading Churchmen had been heard to say, That they would have an Act so fram'd, as should reach every Puritan in the Kingdom; and that, if they thought any of them would so stretch their Consciences, as to be comprehended in it, they would infer yet other Conditions and Subscriptions; in order to prevent their having any Benefit by it.

Nor was the Church, on account of old Grudges, the sole Promoter of this Bill: The Independents and Anabaptists were aggrieved by the King's Declaration, touching Ecclesiastical Affairs, which contain'd a Comprehension for the Presbyterians; and an Exclusion for them: Both these Sects, therefore, being already in a State of Perdition, forwarded a Bill, which was likely to reduce all Nonconformists to the same Circumstance: And, concerning their Share in this Transaction, we have been lately furnish'd with the following remarkable Anecdote:

Both were fill'd, says our Author, with Repentment and Fury, not so much to see themselves outed, as to see the Presbyterians, who (they thought) had been as deep in Rebellion as themselves, confirm'd in the Possession of what they had got in the Iniquity of the late Times. They clamour'd in all Places against the Difference that had been made between them: And Dr. Owen, the Head of the first Sect, and who knew the last well, went to the Lord Chancellor, and represented to him, "That there was no manner of Reason for such a Distinction between the Presbyterians and the Independents; the former being full as dangerous as the latter; that if the Church of England and her Clergy, whose Merits to the King were so exceeding great, and who had been turn'd out of all for their Loyalty to him and his Father, were restor'd to all their Rights, as he had been to his Crown, there would be no Room to complain, were it but done out of a Principle of Justice, i. e. indifferently, and without any Distinction of Parties; that the keeping in of the Presbyterians was a Distinction in their Favour, infinitely odious to the other Sects, and utterly inconsistent with the Safety of the Government; for being too restless and aspiring to be content with what they had, and too proud of their Merits to be oblig'd by any Favours shewn them, they would still go on in their old Ways, propagate their seditious Doctrines, inflame the Nation, and soon throw it into the same Disorders and Confusions, as they had done formerly; that leaving them the Parish-Pulpits, was leaving it in their Power to execute their Schemes; and tho' it was difficult to find out a Tell, which they would not take, rather than quit that Advantage, yet there was one Way to get rid of them, and he believ'd no other would do it, which was to require them to renounce the Solemn League and Covenant."

We are hence taught to conclude, that all these different Sects made it their Business to bite and devour one another; and therefore it is no Wonder, that they were bitten and devoured one of another.

But, notwithstanding this odd Confederacy against the Presbyterians, and the bitter Spirit which prevail'd in the House of Commons against them, it was not thought advisable to carry the Bill into Execution, the first Session it was brought in; and, against the Opening of the next, when the Repentment of the Public was in its full Heat against the

the Enthusiast James, for his execrable Discourse, the whole Party was blasted not only with a Charge of Disaffection, but with a Design to renew the Civil War, and with having taken their Measures accordingly.

Unhappily for them, some of the warmest and foolishest of their Partizans had us'd such Discourses, and set forth such (*) Writings, as, when compar'd with their former Conduct, induc'd the too credulous Multitude to believe whatever was alleg'd against them to be true: But even Bishop Parker, their most virulent Enemy, who is more particular than any other Writer in the Detail of every Circumstance, that could contribute to blacken the Nonconformists, has not been able to furnish out any Proof against the Presbyterians, or that they had the least Correspondence either with James, or any of the disbanded Officers, suppos'd to be of his Party. On the other hand, Captain Andrew Yarranton, in the Year 1681, publish'd a (r) Piece, with his

(*) The Spirit of Mr. Baxter shew'd it self in the penning of the Sassy Papers, wherein there were some indecent Threats and Insuendos. Their very Petition for Peace had somewhat of this Trumpet in it, p. 5. Take heed how ye drive Men by Penalties on that which they judge doth tend to their Damnation, and p. 14. The Devil of this Design would renew all our Trouble (i. e. would throw us into another Civil War). And in the Close of the second Paper, they tell the King, if he grants those Favours, it will receive their Hearts to pray for his Prosperity. — But p. 12. Should we lose the Opportunity of our desired Reconciliation, it should be as justly, what dismal Effects our Disunion would produce, which we will not mention in particular, lest our Words should be misunderstood. Bp. of Worcester's Vindication, June, 1662.

(r) This Piece is, at once so remarkable, and so extremely false, that the Reader, I am persuaded, will not be displeas'd with the following Extracts from it:

This Sham Plot was lay'd in about 16 Counties of England; but I shall write principally that Part of it which was executed in Worcestershire, in the Month of November, in the Year 1661. Several Letters were drawn up and delivered by Sir John P. — to one Richard N. — his Neighbour, — to one — Cole of Marbury about five Miles from Worcester, who at one living. This — Cole, according to Informations, believ'd a Packet of Letters to one — Charles of Witchesford, who also is, or lately was alive, and dwelt near Marbury. This Plot of Letters was executed by Cole and Charles unto Sir John P. — (from whom it first came). And before him Charles makes an Affidavit, that going early in the Morning to his Labour, he struck his Bill upon a Hedge to cut a Thorn, and by and by, on the other Side of the Hedge, he spy'd a Scotch Pedlar putting up Letters hastily into his Puck, and being affrighted, as he suppos'd, he left that Packet behind in the Ditch, and went down a Lane leading to Colonel John Birch's House.

This Oath being made, and the Packet delivered, as aforesaid, and open'd, it presently appeared that there was a Conspiracy on foot to stir up Rebellion in the Kingdom, and to raise an Army for that Purpose; and that Capt. Andrew Yarranton was to command a Party in those Parts; for which Purpose there were several Letters directed to him from some Ministers and others, particularly, one from Mr. Richard Baxter, Minister of Redditch, intimating, that he had provided a considerable Body of Men, well armed, which should be in Readiness against the time appointed. Another from Mr. Andrew Sparry the then Minister of Marley, intimating, that he had order'd him 500 l. which was lodg'd in a Friend's Hand, not nam'd, and should be ready for him whenever he sent for it. Several other Letters, and treasonable Papers, were pretended to be in that Packet; all which occasioned the raising the Militia of that Country, and the City of Worcester was fill'd that Night with Horse and Foot. Early the next Morning, about two of the Clock, an Officer, with a Troop comes to Mr. Yarranton's House, and seeing Lights in most of the Windows, for a Season he made a Halt; but soon he drew near to the House and demanded Entrance; Mrs. Yarranton told him she would open the Doors, provided he would come in with no more than two Persons besides himself, to which he assented. And when he was come into the House, he demanded of Mrs. Yarranton, where her Husband was? She answered, He was not at home. The Officer reply'd, He was at home the Evening before (he told him); he was not; but he is now gone to one Mr. Mitchell's House at Hiliton. But to let you see that he knows the Design you come about, he hath left his Man with a Horse ready saddled to conduct you to him. Some of the Party being Volunteers out of Worcester, observing the Woods and Department of Mrs. Yarranton, went privately home again; among whom was Mr. Winter Hains an Apothecary, and since Mayor of Worcester, and still alive, who hath often said, that very instant he smelt the Design. The Officer, with his Party was brought by Henry Conwell, Mr. Yarranton's Servant, to the House of Mr. Mitchell; where finding the said Yarranton, the Officer told him, He was his Prisoner, and must go along with him to Worcester; and about 10 o'Clock, the same Day, they all entered the City, where all the Trained Bands of the County were up in Arms.

The same Day several other Persons were seized, as Mr. Andrew Sparry, Minister of Marley, near which Place the Sham Packet was pretended to be found. Mr. Henry Osham, Minister of Beadly; Mr. Edward Osham of the Rocks; Dr. Jackson of Redditch; Mr. Moore, Minister of Worcester; Mr. Brown, Minister of Old Sarum; Mr. Capt. Wells; Mr. Henry Baldwin, Mr. George Wilson, Mr. John Fiers; Mr. Mohine, all four of Worcester, with some more more which I forbear to mention; all which Persons were dispos'd of into several Prisons or Places of Confinement, so that they could not speak one with another, having Sentinels always standing at their several Doors. Among the Common People there was a great Noise of a horrid Plot, a Presbyterian Plot, and they were to confirm'd in the Belief of it, that the several Prisoners, as they march'd with their Guards through the Streets, were greatly reviled and affronted.

All things continued in this Posture for the Space of ten Days, after which time the Trained Bands would continue no longer, they were grown a little sensible of the Shame. And upon their Departure, the Deputy Lieutenants, out of their great Clemency, discharged all the Prisoners then in Custody, except Dr. Jackson, Mr. Sparry, Mr. Henry and Mrs. Edward Osham, Capt. Wells, and — Yarranton; so that they must pay their Fees, and find good Security, not to go five Miles from their Habitations, without leave first obtain'd from the Lord Lieutenant, or two Deputy Lieutenants, to appear when they were sent for; and in the meantime to keep all the King's Laws Ecclesiastical and Civil. This done, Mr. Sparry, Dr. Jackson, the two Oshams, and Mr. Yarranton, were order'd to be kept close Prisoners in several Chambers of the George Inn in Worcester; so that no Person whatsoever must come or speak to either of them, but in the Presence of the Marshal. The Trained Bands being gone, as was said before, to their several Homes, Care was taken for the securing of these Criminals, by the dignified Clergy of Worcester, together with some of the best Clergymen of the County, who provided about 60 Foot Soldiers, which they arm'd, and paid, as some of them said, with double Pay; which Soldiers were to attend, as Sentinels, in their turns, upon each of the Prisoners, and the rest were a Court of Guard in the Town-Hall of Worcester. These were commonly call'd the Clergy-Bands, and they had for their Captain one Mr. William Shotton of Sinks-Pear, who hath, of a long time, as it is said, belong'd to the Rake in Southwark.

I can't omit the acquainting you with one renown'd Act of Chivalry, that was done in this Church-Court-Guard. It happen'd that there came to Worcester a poor old Man, to enquire after the Welfare of Mr. Henry Osham his Minister, and speaking with one of these Soldiers, the Soldier liberally charg'd Mr. Osham with being a Traitor, a Rebel, a Plotter against the Government, with some other bad Names; he stoutly defended his Minister, and said he was an honest, peaceable Man, and he could never believe he was concerned in any Treason, or Plot against the Government. The Church-Militiaman great Wrath had hold of this poor, old Zealot, and carried him to the Court of Guard; He that they pretended in that Court-Martial was also a Church-Officer, and no meaner Man than an Apparitor. He commanded the old Man to be ty'd Neck and Heels together, charg'd him with having a hand in this Presbyterian Plot, and threaten'd him with severe Usage unless he would make a Confession. The old Man bore all this with great Patience, answering him never a Word, which so enrag'd this Man in Authority, that he put lighted Matches betwix his Fingers, and burnt them to the very Bone; and all this was done to force a Confession from him of a Presbyterian Plot. The Name of the Person thus tortur'd is Roger Walden of Beadly, who (for ought I have heard to the contrary) is still alive, and carrieth about him the shriv'd Skin, which was caus'd by those burning Matches betwix his Fingers; and so are many others alive, which saw him in his Misery, and contributed their Help to the healing his Hands. Now if so small an Officer of the Church as an Apparitor, durst be so hardy as to set such a Piece of Barbarity, contrary to all Law and Conscience, what may we fear an excess from those of a greater Figure, if once they come to have Power in their Hands? But this is a Digression.

This feign'd Plot was not only laid in Worcestershire, but late Pope of that Party, has declar'd to the World, was never in public contradicted.

in other Shires and Counties of England, as I hinted before; I could fill many Sheets of Paper, if I pleas'd, with Particulars: But give me leave to inform you only of some Passages in Oxfordshire with respect to this Plot, which fell out about the same time. There dwelt in Oxford one Mr. Martins, who was then Town-Clerk there; he is now a Brewer in London, and in good Reputation both for Estate and Integrity. There came one Evening to his Houfe in Oxford, a Stranger with a Letter, who had no sooner deliver'd it, but he withdrew and went his way. When Mr. Martins had open'd it, and a little consider'd the Contents, he took a prudent Course to carry it to the Mayor, as you'll hear by and by, and to do it immediately; for had he tarried a Night or an Hour, it might have been found about him, and then Oxford had quickly been as full, or fuller of Plotters and Prisoners than Worcester. The Copy of this memorable Letter I here insert Word for Word.

“ MR. MARTIN,
“ I pray you will warn all these Men to be all in their
“ their Arms upon Wednesday next in the Night; you “ know already where they must meet. There will come “ into Oxford two hundred Men all in their Arms, you “ know who doth command them. Dr. Greenwood has “ sent to Mr. Cromb the Barber, to get his Party of Schol“ lars ready that Night; and I have sent to Mr. Hickman
“ to get his Men ready at the same time; and Dr. Owen
“ has sent to Mr. Fogge to get his Men ready at the same time;
“ and Dr. Gawite has sent to Mr. Dale the Barber, to get “ his Men ready at the same time; and I have sent to Mr.
“ Carrish to get his ready at the same time; and I have “ sent to Dr. Cosmash to get his Men ready; and all the “ Scholars are to meet in Dr. Roger's Garden: And pray “ send the Blunderbusses together, for I intend to be there my “ self: And I pray give the Bearer hereof five Pounds out “ of the Stock: And I pray remember me to the six Men “ unnam'd. Five Counties are to rise that Night without “ fail. I need write no more to you. The Word is, God
“ is in the Word, and pray tell them all so.”

In this Letter was a List of the Persons Names he was to warn, amounting to one hundred and eleven.

The Mayor of Oxford immediately dispatcheth a Messenger, with an Account of these Transactions to the Lord Falshand, who was then a Member of Parliament, and, I think, Lord Lieutenant of the County. [He was particularly active in persecuting of Quakers and Anabaptists, &c. for which behind the Thanks of the Privy Council.] The Copy of the Mayor's Letter, I think meet also to be here inserted.

“ MY LORD,
“ I do not love to give your Lordship any unnecessary “ Trouble; yet in regard, I perceive that, by Occasion of a “ Letter left with Mr. Martins our Town-Clerk, on Monday “ Night last, there is a great Noise made as if there “ were an intended rising and meeting of armed Men in “ this City this last Night, which I thought might possibly “ come to your Lordship's Ear. I thought it therefore my “ Duty, for the preventing of Misreports (the first Discov-
“ very of it being made to myself) to give your Lordship
“ this fall and true Account of the whole Matter. On “ Monday Night last, about eight or nine of the Clock,
“ there comes a young Man to the Town-Clerk's Houfe,
“ and desiring to speak with him, delivers him a Letter,
“ which he said one gave him on the Road between Tet“ worth and Oxford: the Town-Clerk desired him to say “ till he look'd to whom it came; the young Man pre“ tended great haste, and when he was come to the Coach to “ open the Letter, your young Man flipt out of his Doors,
“ The Town-Clerk no sooner read the two first Lines of it,
“ but said, somebody had design'd Evil towards him;
“ and while he read on his Letter, call'd for his Man and “ a Lanthorn, and so soon as it came, went to Capt. Griffin, “ to shew to him what he received: Not finding him at “ home, he repaired to me, told me how the Letter was “ left with him (shewing it to me) desiring me to send so“ me to your Lordship, that he might see the Contents
“ of it; which accordingly I did, and he coming to me,
“ we together perus'd the Letter, and the List of Names
“ inclos'd; and considering them both with the Circum“ stances, we presumed it to be, at the worst, but a Design “ to try or to intrap the Town-Clerk; we could not but “ commend his Discretion in the so timely a Discovery for “ the clearing of himself. I have inclos'd a Copy of the “ Letter in such English as it is written, and a Copy of the “ List of Names; and because divers of them may be un“ known to your Lordship, I take leave to tell you that “ some of them bear Arms in your Lordship's Company of “ Foot, and others of them are Persons of known Fidelity
“ to his Majesty, and far from what this strange Letter

“ would suppose; tho' there is a Mixture also of some “ others with them.

The Town-Clerk had made proof
“ of the manner of his receiving the Letter, and his imme“ diate Discovery, which I hope will acquit him in your “ Lordship's Judgment, as it doth in ours. My Lord, I “ was in myself fully perswaded, that there is nothing of “ such weight in this business, as that it was worthy giving “ your Lordship any particular account of it: Yet, upon “ further Thoughts, I conceiv'd it safer to err by over“ doing, than to adventure on your Lordship's Censure for “ coming short of my Duty. If I have made the Relation “ too tedious to your Lordship, I humbly crave and hope “ for Pardon. For I am, My Lord,
“ Your Lordship's most humble and faithful Servant.

A like Letter and Account was also sent to the Recorder of Oxford, one of their Members in Parliament, who immediately shew'd it to one of the Secretaries. And thus this pretty Project miscarried in Oxford, through the Providence of God, and the prudent Management of the Discoverers, to the great Regret, no doubt, of those who had cunningly enough contriv'd it. I can't learn they made any farther Progress in it, save only that two Deputy Lieutenants met next Day for Mr. Martins, and threaten'd at first to commit him to Custody, but by and by they dismiss'd him, with this Intjunction, Not to go out of the City within fourty Days without special Licence. And that very Night came into the Town many of the Militia, who kept Guard for two Days in the City.

“ The high time now that I return to Worcester, and give you an Account of the forementioned Plotters, in close Confinement there. Dr. Jackson, by the Assistance of Sir J. C. gets his Engagement, Spangy, and one of the Oghads, mov'd, that they might be banish'd, or brought to Trial, but could obtain neither. Yarranton, and the other Oghads, were altogether passive and silent, and waiting to see what issue God in his Providence would put to their arbitrary and unjust Proceedings; and it was not long ere they were thoughtly deliver'd. The manner was thus: On the second of April, 1661, the Person that was employ'd (as I have shew'd you before) to carry the Packet of Sham-Letters from Sir J. P. to one Cole of Marley, acquaints his Brother how he came by the said Packet. His Brother, immediately upon this Discovery, repairs to Mr. Yarranton, and informs her of it. She went to Worcester, and prevails with the Marshal's Maid to deliver a Paper to her Husband, wherein was a Relation of the whole Matter. This being done, Mr. Yarranton having perus'd this Paper, and being thereby let into the Knowledge of this malicious Design, he ordered six Actions to be immediately enter'd against some of those that brought him to Prison. And the next Day, being Saturday, in the time of high Market, he took two Bed-Stuff, in his Hands, and broke all the Windows in the Chamber where he was confin'd, and which look'd towards the Street: Upon which the Town was in an Uproar, and a Multitude of People crowded before the Chamber in the broad Street, to know what the Matter was. He told them, how he and others were maliciously and wrongfully imprison'd, that he could give an Account of the Contrivance of this Plot, and who were the Contrivers of it. On the Wednesday following, the Lord Lieutenant and six of his Deputies, came to the Town, and sent one Fulk Figier, an Officer of theirs, to Mr. Yarranton, to know the Reason of his misbehaving himself in the Place of his Confinement: He sent them word, He did it on purpose, that he might be brought the sooner before them, to make a Discovery of the Protestation Plot which was so much talk'd of, of which he was ready and willing to do. After some Debate between the Lord Lieutenant and his Deputies about this Matter, it was at last resolv'd, that Yarranton should be brought before them, which was done. There he offer'd to discover to them the whole Plot, how it was laid, and by whom, and for what Ends. He desired that the Doors might be set open, for he had many Friends and Witnesses without: He pray'd also that he might have Pen, Ink, and Paper, and he would write down the whole Matter, for Words might be wrested to other Inten than they are spoken. This was a while debated, but in Reason it could not be denied; and Mr. Yarranton no sooner began to write, but the Lord Lieutenant and Sir J. P. left the Room, and went down the back Stairs, and after following the rest of the Deputy Lieutenants; only Squire Bremy of Halt field behind. He, it seems, was in no way privy to this Design, and told Mr. Yarranton, that he was sorry with all his Heart to see such things practis'd, to the Dishonour of honest Men, and the Dishonour of the Government. The Enemy having thus fairly quitted the Field, Mr. Yarranton demanded of the Marshal what he had farther to say to him; the Marshal only made it his Request, that he would not trouble

Parliament met in all its (s) Glory; that is to say, with the Addition of the Holiness of the Bishops, to the Majesty of the King, and the Authority of the People: Upon which extraordinary Occasion, his Majesty made a Visit extraordinary to his Parliament; not merely to congratulate with them for that Day, as (s) he was pleas'd to express himself, but to lay before them his Wants and Necessities, Difficulties and Incumbrances, which arose from his Engagements with Portugal; and which, it is probable, had not now been discover'd, if the French Court had comply'd with those pecuniary Demands of his, before specify'd. These are his own Words:

King's Speech.

"I do heartily congratulate with you for this Day. But, my Lords and Gentlemen, as my coming hither at this time is somewhat extraordinary, so the Truth is, the Occasion of my coming is more extraordinary: It is to say something to you on my own Behalf, to ask something of you for myself; which is more than I have done of you, or of those that met here before you, since my coming into England. I need not have done it to them; and, upon my Conscience, I need not do it now. They did, and you do, upon all Occasions, express so great an Affection and Care of all that concerns me, that I "may very well refer both the Matter and Manner of your doing any thing for me, to your own Widdoms and Kindness: And indeed, if I did think, that what I am to say to you now did alone, or did most, concern myself; if the uneasy Condition I am in, if the Strights and Necessities I am to struggle with, did not manifestly relate to the public Peace and Safety, more than to my own particular, otherwise than I am concern'd in the Public, I should not give you this Trouble this Day. I can bear my Necessities, which merely relate to myself, with Patience enough.

"Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I do not now impertune you to make more Hastie in the Settling the constant (u) Revenue of the Crown, than is agreeable to the Method you propose to yourselves: I desire you seriously to consider the insupportable Weight that lies upon it, the Obligations it lieth under to provide for the Interest, Honour, and Security of the Nation, in another Proportion than in any former Times it hath been oblig'd to. I know very well, you have very affectionately and worthily taken all this into your Thoughts, and will proceed in trouble him for holding him so long in Restraint, forasmuch as he was a poor Man, and had many Children, and did only follow the Orders of his Superiors in what he had done. Mr. Tarranton told him, he did freely forgive him.

I have done with the first Part of this Protestation Sham Plot, when I have add'd a Passage or two more concerning Mr. Tarranton. As soon as he was discharged, as before, he goes up to London, and prevails with the Lord of Bristol, to acquaint the King with the great Wrong he had receiv'd, and with the wicked Contrivance of some of his Ministers by Sham Plots, to divide the King from his People, and his People from one another. Hereupon an Order of Council was directed to the Deputy Lieutenants of Worcestershire, that were then in and about London, to appear before the Council, and to give an Account of this Matter. They seem'd to clear themselves from being concern'd therein, and desired such as were in the Country might be consulted. The next Post they inform their Brethren in the Country how Matters stood before the Council, and that the Lord of Bristol did patronise Mr. Tarranton. Upon this Sir J. W. one of the Deputy Lieutenants, hastens up to London, and brings with him one Hales, now living in Tisbury (an Attorney, his Kinsman and Nephew) which Hales, with the Constable of St. Mary Overie, and one Halborne a Waterman (now living in Pepper-Ally in Southwark) arrested Mr. Tarranton (when he was bowling in Wicksteer Park) for High Treason; and being further assisted by some of the Horde-Guards then in Southwark, convey'd the said Tarranton in Halborne's Boat to White-hall, where he was kept Night in Custody; but on the Morrow, the Earl of Bristol sent the King's Privy-Seal to a Friend of Mr. Tarranton's, who brought it to him, wherein it was declared, that it was the King's Pleasure he should travel where he listed, and not be molested by any Person whatsoever, without a special Warrant from the King. A little after Sir Kensal Digby (Chancellor to the Queen-Mother) sends for Mr. Tarranton, and was very earnest to know from him the Bottom of this pretended Plot. He relates the whole Matter from the Beginning to the End to Sir Kensal Digby, upon which Sir Kensal produced two Letters from Paris, signifying, that he was of Opinion in France, that we in England were taking one another by the Throat again, which inclined that King to join with the Dutch against the English, which, after a little time, came to pass. These two Letters are to be seen, as being lodged in a safe Hand, after the Death of Sir Kensal by his Executor. Mr. Tarranton seeing how Matters went in London, resolv'd to return again into the Country, where he prosecuted Major Wild, and others, for imprisoning him wrongfully; but within six Months after, a Deputy is laid by some of the Criminals in the former Sham-Plot, to furnish Persons to swear against him, that he had spoken treasonable Words against the King and Government: The Witnesses were one Daisy (a Mountebank, formerly an Apothecary in Derby) who afterwards acknowledged that he had 5 l. for his Pains; the other Witnesses lived in Wales, and went by two Names: This was shown to the Officers in Worcester; the Bill being found by the Grand Jury; Mr. Tarranton put himself upon his Trial, and tho' he did not except against any one of his Jury, yet upon a full hearing of the Case, they presently acquitted him, which was a great Disappointment to the designing Gentlemen. The Clerk of the Peace (Mr. Parkin) and the Officers belonging to the Ecclesiastical Court were not a little surpris'd; for now the Sham Plot was discover'd, which had brought a great deal of Grief to their Mills; for though the Insouciant People were convinc'd at, the turbulent Fanatics were punished by wholesale, both in the Civil and Ecclesiastical Court. From Sir Thomas Webber's Collection.

(s) Upon the Restoration of Episcopacy in Ireland, the following Poetical Flight was perform'd by way of Anthem, in the Cathedral of St. Patrick's at Dublin, which will equally serve to manifest the truly Orthodox Spirit of the Prelates of both Kingdoms:

Now that the Lord hath re-advanc'd the Crown,
Which Thirst of Spoil and frantic Zeal threw down;
Now that the Lord the Mitre hath restor'd,
Which with the Crown lay in the Dust abhor'd.
Praise him ye KINGS!
Praise him ye PRESTERS!
May Judas's Royal Scepter fill thine clear,
May Aaron's holy Rod his Blossoms bear.
Egypt and Red rate fill and guide our Land,
And those whom God anoints feel no rude Hand!
May Love, Peace, Plenty, wait on Crown and Chair,
And may BOTH SHAKE IN BLESSINGS IN CARE.
Angels look down and joy to see
Like that above a Monarchy!
Angels look down and joy to see
Like that above an Hierarchy!

(t) During the Recess, his Majesty had received a free Gift from his Clergy of 37745 l.

(u) Mr. D'Ejordan, in a Letter to the King his Master, dated July 25, 1661, computes the Revenue of the English Crown to have been no more than twelve Millions of Livres, or 900,000 l. Sterling; which he presumes did not answer the King's annual Expenses by two Millions, or 150,000 l. Mr. C—— in his Full vindication of the Full Assever to the By-stander, moreover, endeavours to prove, that the Government came into his Majesty's Hands encumber'd with Debts, to the Amount of above two Millions. On the other hand, we remember the Chancellor to have spoke of the Revenue which the Commons had granted, as a noble one; which, if so insignificant, was both a Violence to Truth, and an Error in Policy. We are besides to recollect once more, that the King's military Adventures in Portugal were of his own seeking; and that a Sea-guard was all that the Nation undertook to provide for.

A. D. 1661.

“ in it with as much Expedition as I can reasonably wish; but I come to put you in mind of the crying Debts, which do every day call upon me for some necessary Provisions, which are to be made without Delay, for the very Safety of the Kingdom; of the great Sums of Money that should be ready to discharge the <sup>(u)</sup> several Fleets, when they come home, and for the necessary Preparations that are to be made for the setting out new Fleets to Sea against the Spring; that Revenue being already anticipated to as important Services, which should be assign'd to those Preparations. These are the pressing Occasions, which I am forced to recommend to you with all possible Earnestness, and do conjure you to provide for, as speedily as possible, in such a Manner, as may give us Security at home, and some Reputation abroad. I make this Discourse to you with some Confidence; because I am very willing and desirous, that you should thoroughly examine whether these Necessities I mention be real or imaginary; or whether they be fallen upon us by my Fault, or my own Managery, or Excesses; and provide for them accordingly. I am very willing that you make a <sup>(x)</sup> full Inspection into my Revenue, as well the Disbursements as Receipts; and, if you find it hath been ill-managed by any Corruption in the Officers I trust, or by my own Unthriftiness, I shall take the Information and Advice you shall give me very kindly: I say, if you find it; for I would not have you believe any loose Discourses, how confidently soever urged, of giving away eighty thousand Pounds in a Morning, and many other Extravagances of that kind. I have much more Reason to be sorry, that I have not to reward those who have ever faithfully served the King my Father and myself, than ashamed of any Bounty I have exercised towards any Man.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ I am sorry to find, that the general Temper and Affections of the Nation are not so well composed, as I hoped they would have been, after such signal Blessings from God Almighty upon us all, and after so great Indulgence and Condescensions from me towards all Interests. There are many wicked Instruments still as active as ever, who labour Night and Day to disturb the public Peace, and to make all People jealous of each other. It will be worthy of your Care and Vigilance to provide proper Remedies for the Diseases of that kind; and, if you find new Diseases, you must study new Remedies. Let us not be discouraged; if we help one another, we shall by God's Blessing, master all our Difficulties: These which concern Matters of Religion, I confess to you are too hard for me; and therefore I do recom“ mend them to your Care and Deliberation, which can best provide for them: I shall not need to recommend, or put you in mind, of the good Correspondence that ought to be kept between you for the Good of yourselves, and me, and the whole Kingdom; and I may tell you, it is very necessary for us all. You will find, whosoever doth not believe me, doth not love you; and they who have no Reverence for you, have little Kindness for me; therefore I pray let us adhere fast to each other, and then we shall, with the Help of God, in a short time, persuade or oblige all Men to that Submission and Obedience to the Law, as may constitute a full Measure of Happiness to Prince and People, and persuade our Neighbours to that Esteem and Value they formerly had for us.”

The Commons were no sooner return'd to their House, than Sir John Packington, Knight of the Shire for Worcester, gave Information of a dangerous Presbyterian Plot on foot; and that many of the chief of the Conspirators were in Prison at Worcester: The Members also who serv'd for Oxfordshire, Herefordshire, Staffordshire, and the rest of the Sixteen Counties mention'd in Tarranton's Discovery, severally gave in the like Informations. But tho' the Presbyterians were thus particularly levelled at, it is remarkable, the House did not come to any Resolution against that Party, by Names, which is manifest by their next Day's Message to the Lords, by Mr. Secretary Morris, and others; which was, to let their Lordships know, that divers Malecontents, Fanatics, cashier'd and disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and others, have some Design amongst them, tending to the Breach of the Peace of this Kingdom: For which Reason, they desired their Lordships to join with them to move his Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to issue out a Proclamation, that all suspicious and loose Persons may be sent out of London and Westminster.

To strike an additional Terror into the Seditious, they caus'd a Bill to be brought in, for the executing certain Persons attainted for High Treason; and mov'd his Majesty to remand Lambert and Vane to the Tower, in order to their Trials.

A few Days after, they likewise deputed some of their Members to wait upon the King with Complaints, that they had receiv'd Letters and Messages from almost every County, concerning a great, or rather an universal, Conspiracy against the Kingdom, and to beseech him to defend the public Peace, against all the Attempts of the Rebels.

And to give the more Credit and Authority to these alarming Stories, the Lord Chancellor deliver'd a Message from the King to the Lords, signifying, that, besides the Apprehensions and Fears that are generally abroad, his Majesty had receiv'd Letters from several Conference between the two Houses.

This brought on a Conference between the two Houses; which was open'd by the Chancellor, who declar'd, That the same did concern Things of a high and dangerous Nature; and that there had been a real Design, which had been forming ever since March last, to disturb the Union and Peace of this Kingdom: And so, we are told, proceeded to name several of the Parties engag'd, with the Manner and Contrivance of their barbarous Designs, and the Progress they had from time to time made therein; adding, that altho' their Designs were at present disorder'd, as to the effecting of them in this Town, to which End they had made a general Invitation of disbanded Soldiers, and disaffected Persons to resort hither about the Eleventh of this Month; yet they were still practising to put the same in Execution in the Country: And that the Lords, to provide a Remedy against these Evils, had appointed a Committee of Twelve of their House, and desired, that an answerable Number of the other House be join'd with the Lords, who might, during the Recess, examine the said traitorous Designs, and find out such Expedients, as they should perceive necessary for the preventing and suppressing them, and securing the Peace of the Kingdom.

To this Proposal of the Lords the Commons agreed; and a joint Committee was accordingly establish'd, who continu'd to sit, for the Dispatch of this critical Business, during the Christmas Holidays, notwithstanding the Adjournment of both Houses; and the Fruits of this Inquest appear'd in the Chancellor's Report, which was to the following Effect: That the Names of such as were engag'd were Prause God Barebone, Samuel Meyer, Colonel Salmon, Major Wildman, late Alderman Ireton, Major Hains, and others: That there was found with Salmon a List of a hundred and Sixty Officers of the late Army: That it was further discover'd, that there should have been a Meeting in London about the Tenth of December; and that they intended about the End of January, to have made sure of Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Bristol; and that they should rise in several Parts at once: That where they were prevalent, they should begin with Assassination; which mov'd one of them to relate, that some of the late King's Judges were entertain'd in France, Holland, and Germany, and held constant Correspondence with those, and were fomented by some foreign Princes: That many Arms were bought, in order to this Design; and that they brag'd, if they once got Footing, they should not want Means to carry on their Work: That they were discover'd by one of their Party, and his Relation confirm'd by such Intelligence from ABROAD, as never fail'd. He further told them, that at Huntingdon, many there met under the Name of Quakers, that were not so; and rode there in Multitudes by Night, to the great Terror of his Majesty's good Subjects. That it might be wonder'd at, that some Proposals were not made to remedy this impending Evil: But the King had advis'd with the Duke of Albemarle, now present at this Committee, and has put two Troops into Shrewsbury, and as many into Coventry, who by the Way had broken a great Knot of Thieves, and taken twenty. That a Rumour was spread, that the appointing of this Committee was only a Plot to govern by an Army; but the Committee was very sensible of the real Danger, and hop'd the Houses would be so too; and that, since all their Adversaries were united to destroy them, so they should unite to preserve themselves.

It is observable, that all the Names here mention'd are of known Republicans, who equally hated and despised the Presbyterians; and that not one single Circumstance arises in Confirmation of Sir John Packington's Intelligence: Notwithstanding which, the zealous Commons were not ashamed to derive Reasons from this very Report, for hastening those rigid Laws against them, of which we are now to treat.

As well as the Uniformity Bill, of which we have already spoke, the Corporation Bill had been under Deliberation the last Session: And as, by the first, the Presbyterians were to be depriv'd of all Ecclesiastic Power; so, by the last, they were to be thrown out of all Civil. Both had met with much Opposition, within-doors and without: In particular, Mr. Prynne had prepar'd a Paper, intitled, Sundry Reasons, humbly tendered to the most Honourable House of Peers, by some Citizens and Members of London and other Cities, &c. against the now-intended Bill for Governing and Reforming Corporations; which having been seiz'd at the Press, and discover'd to be his, was voted to be illegal, false, scandalous, and seditious; and he himself was reprimanded, by Order of the House, in the severest Manner: The Speaker, upon that Occasion, not only reproaching him with his former Sufferings, under the Tyranny of Laud, by Imprisonment, Pillory, &c. but telling him, he deserv'd to suffer all his Punishments over again. Tho' this Man's (y) Spirit had sup-

Public Intelligence by Authority, Nov. 28.

(y) In the foregoing Year he had republished a Treatise of his, entitled, The Unbelief of Timothy and Titus, and of the Angel of the Church of Ephesus: for which, in an Appendix, he assign'd the following Reasons:

First, The Boldness of a Popish Priest (under the Disguise of a Sectary) in reprinting a pernicious Pamphlet, entitled, Evastus Janier, London, 1660, fitting this Parliament, with his Name prefixed to it, printed without a Name some ported him on many Occasions, it fail'd him on this: He sunk under the (x) Weight of the Times, and took Shame to himself, when, by his Firmness and Courage, he should have reflected Honour on his whole Party. With him, sunk the Cause: What he had so publicly and shamefully given up, no body dar'd afterwards to defend; unless in their legislative Capacity; which, against a sure Majority, prov'd to be of no other Use, than to keep up the Shew of a Party, after the Substance was gone.

Sensible of their Victory, therefore, and resolv'd to make the most of it, this orthodox House of Commons remov'd all remaining Difficulties, subdued all Opposition, and, in their very first Session, sent up these two decisive Bills to the House of Lords. But there they stuck: The Papists had then the Repeal of the sanguinary Laws in View; and the more Power was given to the Church, the less Hope remain'd for them. Thus Presbyterian and Papist had in this the same political Interest; nor can either be justly reproach'd for acting in concert with the other, as it is said they did, for their common Preservation.

Nonconformity, p. 55.

As there had been no Prorogation, the Business of the Parliament had only stood suspended; and any Branch of it might be resumed, at the Pleasure of either House. Upon the sixteenth of December, therefore, the Commons return'd to their Charge, by putting the Lords in mind of these two Bills, and that with so good Effect, that by the

The Corporation Bill pass'd.

The Uniformity Bill oppos'd in the House of Lords.

The Uniformity-Bill had neither so rapid nor smooth a Progress through the House of Lords, notwithstanding it had the dead Weight of the Bishops in its Favour. It was long before the Book, which was to be the Standard of Orthodoxy, could be so manufactur'd by the Convocations of both Provinces, and by the several Bishops to whom it had been referred by the King, as to stand the Test of Parliament: And when it came thither, tho' with his Majesty's Royal Recommendation, it met with a very strong (b) Opposition: The Lords still shew'd some Concern for tender Consciences: Upon receiving a Proviso from the King, they made an Attempt to put in a Salvo, for their own Privileges; but it was over-ruled. In treating of Forms and Ceremonies, they added the Words, although indifferent in their own Nature. Some of their Lordships labour'd hard to reject first, and then to qualify, the Clause, which oblig'd Ministers to declare against the Covenant, but in vain; and they added a Proviso, whereby those Ministers, who should be ejected from their Livings by this Act, were entitled to the Fifths of their late Livings.

But these Mitigations were so highly displeasing to the Commons, that, when the Bill came again before them, they rejected them all; for which Mr. Serjeant Carlton, according to Order, at a Conference, deliver'd the few Months before) wherein he endeavours to prove, the Ministers of the Church of England, whether Episcopal or Presbyterian, to be no Ministers, and their Ordination no legal Ordination, and thence infers our Church to be no Church, our Sacraments to be no Sacraments, because our Ministers are not lawfully ordained Ministers.

Secondly, The Extravagancies of some of our reviving English Bishops and episcopal Clergymen, who shaking Hands with the Council of Trent, Bellarmin, Tanfanini, Epifus Jovius, and our Romish Adversaries, disown all Ordinations made by Presbyters, during our long-lasting Troubles, pronouncing them void and void, and refusing to admit Ministers ordained by Presbyters to Benefices or Fellowship, unless they will renounce their Orders, and receive a Re-ordination by Bishops; whereby they un-church all Presbyterian Protestant Churches both at home and abroad.

Thirdly, The late unreasonable Motions of some Members in the Commons House itself (August 15 and 17, 1660) that all Ministers ordained by Presbyters during our late Troubles, should be put from their Livings, and Ministry, unless they were re-ordained by Bishops within one Month. Since all Serjants at Law made in those Times were read, and made Serjants by new Writs from the King. He adds, — I have ever readily conform'd to that Church Government, which the King and Parliament have established, so far forth as it was warranted by our Laws, never opposing our Bishops ecclesiastical Jurisdiction so far as it was justly claimed and exercised by Regal and Legal Authority.

But among the Books of re-publishing this Discourse, the chief is, patiently to expect and cheerfully to submit to that Model of Church-Government (with just Liberty to truly tender Consciences, in Points not fundamental, and consistent with public Peace) which we all hope, will ere long be found by his Majesty's pious Endeavours and Divine Authority (according to the Ministers and Commons House address'd to his Majesty, in pursuance of his own royal Letters and Declarations sent from Breda) with the Advice of moderate, learned, and pious Divines of all formerly-distinguishing Parties, and both Houses of Parliament, for the future Peace and Prosperity both of our Churches and Kingdoms, over which God long preserve and prosper his Majesty's most gracious and pious Reign.

WIL. PEYNE.

(a) Instead of being made one of the Barons of the Exchequer, as he expected, he was appointed Keeper of the Records, with a Salary of 500 l. per Annum. (which was afterwards much diminished) purposely, says Wood, to employ his Head from scribbling against the State and Bishop.

(b) Chap. 1. It is called an Act for the well-governing and regulating of Corporations, and begins thus:

Whereas Questions are likely to arise concerning the Validity of Elections of Magistrates and other Officers and Members in Corporations, as well in respect of removing some, as placing others, during the late Troubles, contrary to the true Intent and Meaning of their Charters and Liberties. And to the End, that the Succession in such Corporations may be more probably perpetuated in the Hands of Persons well affected to his Majesty and the established Government, it being too well known, that notwithstanding all his Majesty's Endeavours and unparalleled Indulgence in pardoning all that is past, nevertheless many evil Spirits are still working.

Wherefore for Prevention of the like Mischief for the time to come, and for Preservation of the public Peace both in Church and State: Be it enacted, &c. that all Mayors, Aldermen, Recorders, Bailiffs, Town-Clerks, Common-Council-Men, and other Persons bearing any Office, — shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and this Oath following:

I A. B. do declare and believe, that it is not lawful upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous Paganism of taking Arms by his Authority against his Person, or against those that are commissioned by him. So help me God.

And also at the same Time shall publicly subscribe before the said Commissioners, or any three of them this following Declaration:

I A. B. do declare, that I hold there lies no Obligation upon me, or any other Person, from the Oath commonly called the Solemn League and Covenant, and that the same was in itself an unlawful Oath, and imposed upon the Subjects of this Realm against the known Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom.

Those who declin'd this Subscription, and refused this Oath, were to be remov'd. And what is still more remarkable, the Commissioners appointed to put this Act in Execution were authoriz'd to remove likewise those who did comply both with the Subscription and the Oath, if they swore; which corroborates what was before advanc'd, that no Compliances whatever were to screen obnoxious Persons.

the following Reasons, as the Sense of the House:

1. It is a Proviso without Precedent.
2. That it would establish Schism.
3. That it would not gratify such, for whom it was intended.

*Lord Journal.

To the first, he said, that it was very apparent in England, that it was without Precedent, and, as he thought, in the World also. For they never heard, that ever any National Church did the like. It was one thing he said, to allow a different Religion in a Nation, another thing to allow Men to receive Profits from that Church unto which Men would not conform.

Secondly, Tho' they were Dissenters in the Particulars of the Proviso in the Time of Queen Elizabeth and King James, yet, in those Days, those Opinions staid there, and went no further.

To the second Head, That it would unavoidably establish Schism, for all Persons of different Inclinations would apply to such as should have this Liberty; and that would necessarily make Parties, especially in great Cities. He did observe, these two Ceremonies of the Cross and Surplice were long in the Church; and he found a high Commendation of the Use of the Cross in Baptism, in the Book sent to the Commons from the Lords, wherein it was so clearly explain'd, as there can be no Suspicion of Popery in it. It was used, he said, to quicken the Memory as to the Benefits of Baptism; and if it were omitted, much of the Service belonging to Baptism must be omitted also, many Passages depending on the Use of that Ceremony.

The Gentleman added, that he thought it better to impose no Ceremonies, than to dispense with any; and he thought it very incongruous, at the same time when you are settling Conformity, to establish Schism.

To the third Head, It would not satisfy those for whom it was intended: For they chiefly reject it upon these Grounds, that Things indifferent ought not to be enjoined; which Opinion, he said, took away all the Right of human Authority, which consists in commanding Things otherwise indifferent. So as, when this shall be yielded, you give them nothing; they opposing for the Imposition's Sake. He added, there were Reasons as to the Nature of the Things; and as to the Reasons given by their Lordships to the Commons, he answered as followeth:

I. The King's Engagements at Breda as to tender Consciences; unto which he said, that his Majesty could not understand the Misleaders of the People, but the Milled. It would be very strange to call a schismatical Conscience a tender Conscience. He said, a tender Conscience denoted an Impression from without, received from another, and that upon which another strikes.

Secondly, Suppose these had been meant, yet he said there could be no Inference of any Breach of Promise in his Majesty, because that Declaration had these two Limitations; first, a Reference to Parliament; secondly, such Liberties to be granted only, as are consistent with the Peace of the Kingdom.

Then he came to the second Proviso, touching allowing Fifths to such Incumbents as should be excluded their Livings; which, he observed, was no reasonable Proviso, at least at this time; and if it were, yet not fit to allow such Persons any thing out of ecclesiastical Livings. He said, what would be more repugnant, than at the same time to enact Uniformity, and to allow the Fifth of an ecclesiastical Living to a Nonconformist for not conforming? Which, he said, join'd with the Pity of the Party, would amount to the Value of more than the whole Living. He said, such a Course was too much a Reflection upon the Act, when you say, some godly People would not submit; and it can signify nothing but Fear in making such a Concession.

He added, this would make the Act contradictory, to say in one Part of the Bill, that it was an equal Act, and in another Part to allow Dissenters to it.

There was another Reason of the Commons Dissent; That divers Wives and Children of orthodox Ministers were made miserable by some of these Men: It may be, for not paying unto them those Fifths which were allowed unto them in the late Times.

He added, That none that make Laws ought to suppose, that any would break them.

He said further, That it was not reasonable to allow the Fifths of ecclesiastical Livings, because generally such Livings were too small, and not able to maintain a learned Man with Books. And by lessening Livings thus, it would gratify unconformable Men, who desire Livings in such Hands should be made small, whereby the Reputation of the conformable Clergy would be lessened.

Secondly, he said, Such a Concession is not only against Reason, but Justice also: It was a Divine Canon which said, He that serveth at the Altar should live of the Altar. Therefore the Profit of the Living ought to go to the Labourer.

He said, That Unity was so precious, that it serv'd not only for the Peace of the Church, but of the Kingdom also. For to give Occasions for Multitudes to meet (which would certainly follow the Dissenters) what Danger that might carry with it, was worthy their Lordships Consideration.

Nor were the Commons content with having thus cavalierly treated the Lords, but seiz'd on this fresh Opportunity to extend the Penalties of the Act to all Tutors and School-masters: And whereas those Ministers, who had no Livings, could not forfeit them, they provided, by a new Clause, that whatever unbenedicted Minister offended against the Act, should be punish'd with three Months Imprisonment.

Before we come to the final passing of this Bill, it is necessary to take a Review of the Money-Matters of this Session; with which this Bill seems, however strangely, to have a manifest Connection.

Tho' the Commons had put the Lords in mind of this Bill, so early as December 16, it was not till the Tenth of April that their Lordships Lordships return'd it to the Commons, with their Amendments and Alterations. Hence arose a Jealousy, that this long Delay was owing to the Practices of the Court; and, as Loyalty was now but the Handmaid of Zeal, the Establishment of the Church was made the Condition sine qua non of supplying the Necessities of the State. The House of Commons had indeed, on the Second Day of the Session, nemine contradicente, "Resolved, That the Sum of twelve hundred thousand Pounds, (a whole Year's Revenue!) should be speedily rais'd, for Supply of the King's Majesty's present Occasions." And on the very Day that the Corporation-Bill receiv'd the Royal Assent, the Subsidy-Bill did the same; as if it was intended, that the one should keep Pace with the other.

At the passing of this Money-Bill, the King, in a short Speech, gave very hearty Thanks to the House for their great Present, and declar'd, that he had receiv'd the Benefit of it before he had it; the Reputation thereof having given him Credit both at home and abroad: And that he was not more willing to give his Royal Assent to that Bill, than he should be to pass any Bills whatsoever, which that House should present to him for his People's Good.

But, however great this Present was, or with whatever Acknowledgments it was receiv'd, it did not replenish his Majesty's Coffers immediately; and the Prospect of a Supply at a Distance did not remove present Necessities. In those Times, such as had Money employ'd it in Trade; and the modern Method of lending it to the Public, in order to make a Liveliness of the public Necessities, was found impracticable.

Indeed the Undertakers for Ways and Means, even in those Times, saw the Opening, and made a Push to set up that mysterious Traffic, by mortgaging the public Faith. But those, who were most willing to oblige the King, dislike'd the Experiment, and thought the Danger far outweigh'd the Benefit.

Finding, therefore, that this Doctrine of Anticipation was too unpalatable to be easily swallow'd, the King himself interpos'd, and as a Matter of Grace chose to wave it, in order to avoid an ungrateful Negative; which he had Reason to foresee would be the infallible Consequence, in case he had suffer'd the Contest to proceed any farther.

The Message by Mr. Secretary Morris, on this Occasion, deserves to be inserted, if it was only for the Precedent's Sake.

It was this:

"That he had Directions from his Majesty to desire the House, that they would put a Superseas to any further Debate upon the Bill for Permission to such Persons as should advance Money for his Majesty's present Occasions, to take Interest at Ten per Cent. That his Majesty, finding the Bill might have some ungrateful Relish in it, resolv'd to put himself upon the greatest Streights, rather than adventure upon any Course, that might in the least seem to disgust this House, or preju"dice his good Subjects; and therefore would endeavour to find some other Means to supply his present urgent Occasions; and desir'd the Bill might be laid aside."

As this Message was founded upon those Maxims of true Policy, which no King of England ought ever to depart from, it was receiv'd with all the apparent Signs of Duty and Affection: The House voted their humble Thanks to the King for his Tenderness to his People, and order'd, "That his Majesty be made acquainted, that this House would leave no Means unattempted to advance his Majesty's Revenue, and supply his present urgent Occasions."

But, notwithstanding these plausible Expressions, the House, by this time, seems to have entertain'd some little Distrust of his Majesty; for they suffer'd Nine Days to elapse after this, without taking any Step towards the Relief of the Crown, or making the Additions, which the King thought necessary, to his Revenue.

His Majesty, therefore, at last growing impatient, sent for the Commons, March 1, to the Banqueting-house; where he harangu'd them with the following free, artful, and captivating Expressions.

"Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"Finding it necessary to say somewhat to you, I thought once of doing it by a Message, which hath been the most usual Way; but when I consider'd, that speaking to you myself, with that Plainness and Freedom I use to do, hath more of Kindness in it, and with what Affection you used to receive what I say to you; I resolv'd to deliver my Message to you myself, and have therefore sent for you hither, which hath been done frequently heretofore, tho' it be the first time I have done so.

"I do speak my Heart to you, when I tell you, that I do believe, that, from the first Institution of Parliaments to this Hour, there was never a House of Commons fuller of Affection and Duty to their King, than you are to me; never any that was more desirous and sollicitous to gratify their King, than you are to oblige me; never a House of Commons, in which there were fewer Persons without a full Measure of Zeal, for the Honour and Welfare of the King and Country, than there are in this: The wonderful Alacrity that you shew'd at your first coming together, in giving me so liberal a Supply, was an unquestionable Instance of this; and, I assure you, made our Neighbours abroad look upon me and you with much the more Respect and Esteem; and, I am persuaded, even broke the Heart of some desperate and seditious Designs at home. In a word, I know most of your Faces and Names, and can never hope to find better Men in your Places.

"You will wonder now, after I have willingly made this just Acknowledgment to you, that I should lament, and even complain, that I, and you, and the Kingdom, are “ yet without that present Fruit and Advantage, which we might reasonably promise ourselves from such a Harmony of Affections, and a Unity in Resolutions to advance the public Service, and to provide for the Peace and Security of the Kingdom, that you do not expedite those good Counsels, which are most necessary for both.”

“ I know not how it comes to pass, but for these many Weeks past, even since your last Adjournment, private and particular Business have almost thrust the Consideration of the Public out of Doors; and in truth I do not know that you are nearer settling my Revenue, than you were at Christmas: I am sure I have communicated my Condition to you without Reserve, what I have coming in, and what my necessary Disbursements are; and I am exceedingly deceived, if whatever you give me be any otherwise given to me, than to be issued out for your own Use and Benefit; trust me it shall be so; and, if you consider it well, you will find, that you are the richer for what you give, since it is all to be laid out, that you may enjoy the rest in Peace and Security.

“ Gentlemen, I need not put you in mind of the miserable Effects which have attended the Wants and Necessities of the Crown; I need not tell you, that there is a Republican Party still in the Kingdom, which hath the Courage to promise themselves another Revolution; and methinks I should as little need to tell you, that the only Way, with God's Blessings, to disappoint their Hopes, and indeed to reduce them from those extravagant Hopes and Desires, is to let them see, that you have so provided for the Crown, that it hath wherewithal to support itself, and to secure you; which I am sure is all I desire, and desire only for your Preservation.

“ Therefore I do conjure you, by all the Professions of Affection you have made to me, by all the Kindness I know you have for me, after all your Deliberations, betake yourselves to some speedy Resolutions, and settle such a real and substantial Revenue upon me, as may hold some Proportion with the necessary Expenses I am at for the Peace, and Benefit, and Honour of the Kingdom; that they who look for Troubles at home, may despair of their Wishes, and that our Neighbours abroad, by seeing that all is well at home, may have that Esteem and Value of us, as may secure the Interest and Honour of the Nation, and make the Happiness of this Kingdom, and of this City, once more the Admiration and Envy of the World.

“ Gentlemen, I hear you are very zealous for the Church, and very solicitous, and even zealous, that there is not Expedition enough used in that Affair: I thank you for it, since I presume it proceeds from a good Root of Piety and Devotion; but I must tell you, I have the worst Luck in the World, if, after all the Reproaches of being a Papist whilst I was abroad, I am suspected of being a Presbyterian now I am come home: I know

NUMB. VI.

“ you will not take it unkindly, if I tell you, that I am as zealous for the Church of England, as any of you can be, and am enough acquainted with the Enemies of it, on all Sides; that I am as much in love with the Book of Common Prayer, as you can wish, and have Prejudice enough to those who do not love it; who I hope in time will be better inform'd, and change their Minds; and you may be confident, I do as much desire to see a Uniformity settled, as any amongst you. I pray trust me in that Affair, I promise you to hasten the Dispatch of it with all convenient Speed, you may rely upon me in it.

“ I have transmitted the Book of Common Prayer, with those Alterations and Additions which have been presented to me by the Convocation, to the House of Peers, with my Approbation, that the Act of Uniformity may relate to it; so that I presume it will be shortly dispatch'd there: And when we have done all we can, the well-settling that Affair will require great Prudence and Discretion, and the Abstinence of all Passion and Precipitation.

“ I will conclude with putting you in mind, that the Season of the Year, the Convenience of your being in the Country, in many respects, for the Good and Welfare of it; for you will find much Tares have been sowed there in your Absence; the Arrival of my Wife, who I expect some time this Month, and the Necessity of my own being out of Town to meet her, and to stay some time before she comes hither, makes it very necessary that the Parliament be adjourn'd before Easter, to meet again in the Winter: And, that it may do so, I pray lay aside private Businesses, that you may in that time dispatch the public. And there are few things I reckon more public, than your providing for the Security of the Fen-Lands, which I have so often recommended to you, and do it now very earnestly. I pray let no private Animosities or Contentions endanger a Work of so great a Benefit and Honour to the Nation; but first provide for the Support of the Work, and then let Justice be done for Determination of particular Interests.”

Here we have the Confirmation of what was before insinuated, that the King made the Uniformity Bill the Pledge for an Additional Revenue; and that the Commons made use of the King's Wants and Necessities to secure the Establishment of the Church.

These Assurances of his Majesty, had their desired Effect. The Commons now thought they were sure of their Point, and, therefore, made no Difficulty to pay the Price. A Bill to lay a Duty upon every Chimney Hearth, in each House of above twenty Shillings a Year, for ever, was forthwith agreed upon; and his Majesty was moreover enabled to raise, for the three next ensuing Months, one Months Tax in each Year, after the rate of seventy thousand Pounds a Month, if Necessity should so require.

Nor did they rest here: The Press had offended offended as well as the Pulpit; the Parliament had been treated with the same Freedom as the King, and both seem'd more dispos'd to silence Clamours, than remove the Cause. As therefore the Pulpit was to be purged by the Uniformity Act, Care was taken to bridle the Press, and put the Reins into the Hands of a Licensor; who was generally so careful to seal the Lips of Falshood and Abuse, that even Truth and Justice could rarely obtain a Hearing.

To convince his Majesty yet farther, how extremely desirous they were, that the Republican Spirit should be entirely subdued, they took the Affair of the Militia again into Consideration, and prepared that Bill, which has put the Power of the Sword in the King's Hand for good and all: With what Reason and Equity, will best appear from a Comparison of the great Revolution in 1688, with the Preamble to the said (b) Bill; which is drawn up in the following remarkable Terms:

Forasmuch as within all his Majesty's Realms and Dominions, the sole and supreme Power, Government, Command and Disposition of the Militia, and of all Forces by Sea and Land, and of all Forts and Places of Strength, is, and by the Laws of England ever was, the undoubted Right of his Majesty and his Royal Predecessors, Kings and Queens of England: And that both, or either of the Houses of Parliament, cannot, nor ought to pretend to the same; nor can, nor lawfully may raise or levy any War offensive or defensive against his Majesty, his Heirs, or lawful Successors; and yet the Contrary thereof hath of late Years been practis'd, almost to the Ruin and Destruction of this Kingdom; and during the late usurped Governments, many evil and rebellious Principles have been infilled into the People of this Kingdom, which may break forth, unless prevented, to the Disturbance of the Peace and Quiet thereof. Be it therefore declared and enacted, &c.

There was yet another Bill, which had hung in the House of Lords ever since last Session, and which was now to be pass'd into a Law: And this was the (c) Bill to oblige the Quakers to take the Oaths.

Favourable as the Crisis was to every rigorous and penal Measure, the Lords, as we have already remark'd, had not Stomachs strong enough to digest quite so fast, as the Commons furnished them with this sort of Food.

Thus, with regard to the Bill now before us, finding the Title had relation only to the Quakers, and that in the Body of it, a Provision was made for extending the Penalties to others, they started Exceptions, treated it as an Inconfinity at least, and order'd, That it should be limited to the Quakers only. (d) A free Conference ensued between the two Houses, the Commons adher'd to the Letter of their Bill, and upon the Report thereof, their Lordships (e) qualify'd their Alterations, that all Objections were removed Quaker's Bill.

(b) Lieutenants, Officers and Soldiers, to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and also this Oath following: I, A. B. do declare and believe, that it is not lawful, upon Pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous Position, that Arms may be taken by his Authority against his Person, or against those that are committed by him, in Pursuance of such military Commissions. So help me God.

(c) In the late Debates upon the Quakers Bill, &c. Reference was made to the horrid Impulses of what they call'd the Spirit, not only dictating the most extravagant Opinions, but driving to the most abominable Practices.—Many of that Party had their Brains deluged and displaced. Some whereof have taken their Children, and gone and sacrificed them, pretending a particular Command, like that God gave to Abraham: As a Woman of Dover cut off her Child's Head, and alleged this Scripture. Others have shut themselves up with a Bible, and resolv'd to eat nothing, because it is written, that Man shall not live by Bread alone, but by every Word that proceedeth out of the Mouth of God. Some have killed their Cows, because the had taken a Witch on Sunday, but deserr'd the Execution till Monday. Each of Essex near Strawbury, kill'd his own Mother and Brother in cold Blood; having no other Quarrel against them but that they loved the Liturgy, &c. His of the English and Scotch Presbyterians.

On the other hand, to discourage these strange Stories, we find the following affecting Petition in G. Fox's Journal:

"There being very many Friends in Prison in the Nation, Richard Hakeworth, call'd George Fox, drew up a Paper concerning them, and I deliver'd to the King, that he might understand how we were dealt with by his Officers. It was thus directed:

For the KING.

"Friend, who art the chief Ruler of these Dominions, here stand in O of some of the Sufferings of the People of Essex, in South, call'd Quakers, that have suffered under the chargeable and Power before thee, by whom they have been imprisoned, and under whom there have suffered for good Conscience sake, and for bearing Testimony to the Truth as it is in Jesus, three thousand one hundred seventy three Persons: And there lye yet in Prison in the name of the Commonwealth seventy-three Persons that we know of. And there have used in Prison in the time of the Commonwealth, and of Oliver and Richard the Protector, through cruel and hard Imprisonments upon daily

"Straw and in Dungeons, thirty-two Persons. There have been also imprisoned in thy Name, since thy Arrival, by such as thought to ingratiate themselves thereby to thee, three thousand sixty and eight Persons. Besides this, our Meetings are daily broken up by Men with Clubs and Arms (though we meet peaceably, according to the Practice of God's People in the primitive Times) and our Friends are thrown into Waters, and trod upon, till the very Blood gusheth out of them: The Number of which Abuses can hardly be uttered. Now this we would have of thee, to set them at Liberty, that lye in Prison in the Names of the Commonwealth, and of the two Protectors, and them that lye in thy own Name, for speaking the Truth, and for good Conscience, &c. G. Fox's Journal. p. 532.

(d) Die Mercurii 19. Februar. 1661-2.

In the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor reported the Effect of the Conference with the Commons, which was, that their Lordships making some Alterations in the Bill against Quakers, and sending down the same to the House of Commons, they, upon Consideration thereof, do agree to come, and to others they do not, but adhere to the Bill as it came from them.

They adhere to the Word others in the Title of the Bill, to meet with all others who refuse Oaths, besides the Quakers, such as are some Anabaptists; and to leave out the Word others would frustrate the End of the Bill. And besides, it is not easy to define what a Quaker is, if so restrained; and it is not possible to enumerate all the Names by which several Sects would call themselves to evade this Bill: And it were great Partiality to single out the Quakers, and permit others as dangerous, if not more.

They likewise disagree to the Amendment [any ten or more] because the Mischief may be great when but five meet, but the Remedy is not so easy when ten shall meet.

They also disagree to the Proviso concerning Peers, because it is indecent and unfit to the Penalties imposed; and the like Offence is provided against by the 35 Eliz. Cap. 1. and yet no Provision for Peers.

The Commons lately desired, that the Words [for any Offence] may be made, for every third Offence. Lord's Journ.

The House of Lords took into Consideration the Matter of the late Conference with the House of Commons concerning the Bill against Quakers. The Alterations brought from the House of Commons were read, and compared with those Alterations sent down by the Lords; and after some Debate, remov'd, and the Church became again (f) victorious.

The Clergy being thus restor'd to their Dominion, the Crown enrich'd and aggrandiz'd, and the People in a fair way to be subdu'd both in Body and Soul, by their own Act and Deed, the Business of the Session was at an End, and the King, very gladly, came to make his Acknowledgments and take his leave: Upon which Occasion, the Speaker, with his usual Eloquence, compar'd his Majesty's Return to the Overflow of the Nile, and promis'd the Nation as many Blessings from his fourteenth Year, as Egypt is said to receive from that River, when it rose to the fourteenth Degree.

His Majesty having then given the Royal Assent to the several Bills, was pleas'd to assure both Houses, and to authorise them to assure others, that he would employ all they had given him to the utmost Improvement of the Peace and Happiness of the Kingdom: And that with the best Advice and Husbandry he could, he would bring his Experience within a narrower Compass.

The King's Speech was short, but the Chancellor's was long, and contains so much Information, with regard to the Revenue, our foreign Concerns, and the State of the Nation, that our History cannot be thoroughly understood, without making the following Extracts from it.

To the Commons he said:

"You have, like the richest and noblest Soil, a Soil manur'd and enriched by the bountiful Hearts of the best Subjects in the World, yielded the King two full Harvests in one Year; and therefore it is but good Husbandry to lye fallow for some time. You have not only supply'd the Crown to a good Degree for discharging many Debts and Prefures, under which it even groaned, and enabled it to struggle with the present Streights and Necessities, Debts not contracted, and Necessities not run into by Improvidence and Excess; you may, when you please, receive such an Account as will clear all such Reproaches; but you have wisely, very wisely, provided such a constant, growing Revenue, as may, with God's Blessing, preserve the Crown from those scandalous Wants and Necessities, as have heretofore expos'd it and the Kingdom to those dismal Miseries, from which they are but even now buoyed up; for whatsoever other human Causes may be assign'd, according to the several Fancies and Imginations of Men, of our late miserable Distractions, they cannot be so reasonably imputed to any one Cause, as to the extreme Poverty of the Crown. The want of Power could never have appear'd, if it had not been for the Want of Money." He then addresses himself to both Houses thus.

"You have, my Lords and Gentlemen, worthily provided for the Vindication and Manifestation of the one by the Bill of the Militia; and for the Supply of the other by the Act for the additional Revenue; and I am confident, both the present and succeeding Ages will bless God, and celebrate your Memories for those two Bills, as the Foundation of their Peace, Quiet and Security, how froward and indispos'd soever many are at present, who, finding such Obstructions laid in their Way to Mutiny and Sedition, use all the Artifice they can to persuade the People, that you have not been solicitous enough for their Liberty, nor tenacious enough for their Profit, and wickedly labour to lessen that Reverence towards you, which sure was never more due to any Parliament.

"Men are in no Degree dispos'd to imitate or remember the general excellent Temper of the Time of Queen Elizabeth, the blessed Condescension and Resignation of the People then to the Crown, the awful Reverence they then had to the Government, and to the Governors, both in Church and State.

This good and happy Spirit was in a Time beyond our Memory; but they remember, as if it were but Yesterday, how few Subsidies Parliaments then gave to that Queen, how small Supplies the Crown then had from the People, and wonder that the same Measures should not fill fill the Coffers, and give the same Reputation, and make the same Noise in Christendom.

"But, my Lords and Gentlemen, how bold soever some unquiet Spirits are with you, upon this Argument, you are much superior to those Reproaches. You know well, and you can make others know, without breaking the Act of Indemnity, how the Crown hath been since us'd; how our Sovereign Lord the King found it at his blessed Return to it; you can tell the World, that as soon as he came hither, besides the Infinite that he forgave, he gave more, more Money to the People, than he hath since received from them; That at least two Parts of three, that they have since given him, have been issu'd for the disbanning Armies, never raised by

Debate, it is order'd to be recomitted to the same Committee as was first appointed, to consider of this Bill, to add the Word others and explain the Word such, so as to make the Body of the Bill extend to the Intent of the Preamble of the Bill, and to extend to those that shall maintain that all Oaths are unlawful. And the said Committee also to consider of the Matter of the Conference concerning the Privilege of the Peers. Ibid.

(f) The Bill was pass'd by Commission, May 2, and the Reasons given for the enacting Clause are to be found in the Preamble, which is as follows:

Whereas of late times certain Persons under the Names of Separers and other Names of Separation, have taken up and maintained sundry dangerous Opinions and Tenets, and amongst others, That the taking of an Oath in any Case whatsoever, although before a lawful Magistrate, is altogether unlawful and contrary to the Word of God: And the said Persons do daily refuse to take an Oath though lawfully tendered, whereby it often happens, that the Truth is wholly suppress'd, and the Administration of Justice much obstructed. And whereas the said Persons, under a Pretence of religious Worship, do often assemble themselves in great Numbers in several Parts of this Realm, to the great endangering of the public Peace and Safety, and to the Terror of the People, by maintaining a secret and strict Correspondence amongst themselves, and in the mean time separating and dividing themselves from the rest of his Majesty's good and loyal Subjects, and from the Public Congregations and usual Places of divine Worship. For we redressing therefore and do better preventing the many Mischiefes and Dangers that do and may arise by such dangerous Tenets and such unlawful Assemblies, Be it Enacted, &c.

A. D. 1662. by him, and for Payments of Fleets never sent out by him, and of Debts never incurred by him. You will put them in Mind of the vast Disparity between the former Times, and these in which we live, and consequently of the Disproportion in the Expence the Crown is now at, for the Protection and Benefit of the Subject, to what it formerly underwent. How great a Difference there is in the present Greatness and Power of the two Crowns, and what they were then possess'd of, is evident to all Men; and if the Greatness and Power of the Crown of England be not in some Proportion improved too, it may be liable to Inconveniences it will not undergo alone. How our Neighbours and our Rivals, [the Dutch] who court one and the same Mistress, Trade and Commerce, with all the World, are advanced in Shipping, Power, and an immoderate Desire to engross the whole Traffic of the Universe, is notorious enough; and this unwrly Appetite will not be restrained or disappointed, nor the Trade of this Nation supported and maintained, with the same Fleets and Forces which were maintained in the happy Times of Queen Elizabeth. Not to speak of the naval Power of the Turks, who, instead of sculking abroad in poor single Ships as they were wont to do, domineer now on the Ocean in strong Fleets, make naval Fights, and have brought some Christians to a better Correspondence, and another kind of Commerce and Traffic with them than was expected; inasmuch as they apprehend no Enemey upon the Sea, but what they find in the King of England's Ships, which hath, indeed, brought no small Damage upon them, with no small Charge to the King, but a great Reputation to the Nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen, You may with a very good Conscience assure yourselves, and your Friends and Neighbours, that the Charge the Crown is now at by Sea and Land, for the Peace and Security, and Wealth and Honour of the Nation, amounts to no less than 800000 l. a Year; all which did not cost the Crown before these Troubles 80000 l. the Year; and therefore they will never blame you for any Supply you have given, or Addition you have made to the Revenue of the Crown; and whosoever unskilfully murmurs at the Expence of Dunkirk, and the other new Acquisitions, which ought to be look'd upon as Jewels of an immense Magnitude in the Royal Diadem, do not enough remember what we have lost by Dunkirk, and should always do, if it were in an Enemy's Hands; nor duly consider the vast Advantages those other Dominions are like, by God's Blessing, in a short time, to bring to the Trade, Navigation, Wealth and Honour of the King and Kingdom. His Majesty hath enough expressed his Desire to live in a perfect Peace and Amity with all his Neighbours; nor is it an ill Ingredient towards the Firmness and Stability of that Peace and Amity, which his Royal Ancestors have held and maintained with them, that he hath some Advantages in case of a War, which they were without.

A. D. 1662. You have, my Lords and Gentlemen, likewise Patriots, upon your Observation, that the most signal Indulgence and Condescensions, the temporary Suspension of the Rigour of former Laws, hath not produced that Effect which was expected, that the Humours and Spirits of Men are too rough and boisterous for those soft Remedies, you have prepared sharper Laws and Penalties, to contend with those refractory Persons, and to break that Stubborness which will not bend to gentler Applications: And it is great Reason, that they, upon whom Clemency cannot prevail, should feel that Severity they have provoked.

There is an Enemy amongst us, of whom I doubt, we are not jealous enough, and towards whom we cannot be too vigilant; and in Truth, in Comparison of whom we may reasonably undervalue all other Enemies; that is, the Republicans, the Commonwealth-Men, who are every Day calling in Aid of the Law, that they may overthrow and abolish the Law, which they know to be their irreconcilable Enemy. Indeed, my Lords and Gentlemen, there is a very great Party of those Men in every Faction of Religion, who truly have no Religion, but as the Pretence serves to advance that Faction. You cannot be too solicitous, too inquisitive after these Men, who are restless in their Councils, and wonderfully punctual and industrious in their Correspondences, which they maintain abroad as well as at home: And you cannot doubt they have Encouragement enough from abroad; few of our Neighbours love us so exceedingly well, but that they would be glad to see us entangled in domestic Broils. These Men are worthy of your Care and Diligence in your speedy settling the Militia, which the King hath even now so particularly recommended to you.

I shall conclude with only putting you in mind, that there was scarce ever a more dangerous Sedition in the Republic of Rome, than in a Time of full Peace, when the Citizens were fallen, when there was no Noise but in Whispers, when Men neglected their Trades, and stayed idle in their own Houses, as if they cared not which way the World went; from whence alone their Neighbours the Etrurians were encouraged to make a War upon them. Novum seditiois genus (says Livy) silentium atinque inter civis.

Thus, whether the Discontented are in Motion or at Rest, they are still made use of to terrify the Public, and to give a Sanction, both to the Claims and Acquisitions of the Crown.

As soon as the Chancellor had ended his Speech, that Branch of the Prerogative, to Parliament prorogue Parliaments, which had been first prorog'd. assum'd by King Henry VIII. and which had slept for so many Years, was again brought into Play, and was again, without the least Difficulty, submitted to.

By this time the Queen was landed at The King's Portsmouth, and his Majesty made haste to receive her. They were married first by the Lord Aubigny, after the Roman Ritual, in the Presence Presence of the Duke of York, and then by the Bishop of London, after the Form of the Church of England.

See the Lord
Chancellor's

It is remarkable, that the principal Reason given by those, who prefer'd the Offers of Portugal to those of Spain, was, the Improbability of the Letter's performing the great Things it propos'd.

Thus, not to insist on the Queen's Sterility, which some Writers assure us there were no Grounds to suspect, the Court of Portugal prov'd as ill at performing, as that of Spain was represented; tho', at the same time, depending upon England for Preservation; which cost us more in Fleets and Armies, than the whole Marriage Portion could recompence.

Foreign Affairs.

We are now to resume the Thread of our Foreign Affairs.

Dispute with France about the Flag.

His Majesty of France continuing still to take advantage of our impolitic Proceedings with the Dutch, and, for the sake of his own Views and Interests, inclining to favour their Pretensions on the Fishery; King Charles and his Ministry thought no Expedient so proper to bring him to Reason, as the asserting the Sovereignty of the Seas, in the utmost Latitude, and insisting on the Honour of the Flag, against every Power, without Exception.

W<sup>est</sup>Indies.

Affairs were in this Situation when Mr. d'Esgrades arriv'd here in the Beginning of the Year, to resume the Functions of his Ministry; and immediately learnt, from the Talk of the whole Court, that France was principally concern'd in this Measure; that the first Experiment would be try'd on the French Fleet; and that every body was dispos'd to enter into a Quarrel of this gallant Nature with the utmost Alacrity. He was likewise given to understand, that Two several Persons of the Cabinet, who were sent to visit him, not only that Madam had written to King Charles her Brother, upon that Subject, but even with his most Christian Majesty's Participation: That his Majesty, on that Presumption, had writ her an Answer, signifying, That, rather than depart from his Right, he would risk his Crown: And that his Admiral had Orders to make every Vessel of every other Nation strike, which he should meet at Sea. Mr. d'Esgrades gave this formidable Intelligence such a Reception, as argued him to be a Minister of consummate Prudence and Address: For he took upon him to affirm, that Madam had writ without any Authority from the King his Master; that it was easy to see, by his whole Manner of acting, that he never consulted her: She may perhaps, added he, out of her tender Regard for the King her Brother, have made Advances of her own Head, to prevent his giving Umbrage to his most Christian Majesty, by making such Claims, as have belong'd to the Crown of France from all Antiquity. He then express'd his Astonishment to hear it reported on all Sides, that the two Crowns were on the point of coming to a Rupture, upon this Article; declar'd, that all he knew of the Matter was, that the King his Master had given Orders to his Admiral, to make all foreign Vessels strike to his: For which Purpose he had caus'd Twenty Men of War, and Twenty Fireships, to be got ready, under the Command of the bravest and most experienced Officers in his Dominions: Too few perhaps, continu'd he, to encounter the numerous Fleets, which possibly may be sent against them; but not less resolv'd to abide all Extremities, rather than surrender the Honours of their Royal Master. He concluded with saying, that he had deliver'd his own Sentiments only on this Matter; and that merely because they had begun the Discourse, he having nothing upon that Head to propose to the King of England.

Our two Courtiers, who could not conceal their Surprize at this unexpected Declaration, then insinuating, that quite different Advices had been receiv'd from France; the Ambassador coolly reply'd, "You will find by the Event, that I speak nothing but Truth; and that, if the King of England says nothing to me upon this Subject, I shall say nothing to him. Indeed, I foresee, that Mitchief is at hand, and that it is too late to look out for a Remedy.— But it belongs to those, whose Affairs are the most embarrass'd, and who are least able to set them right, to be in Pain for the Consequences."

With this the Conference ended; and the next Day the Ambassador had an Audience of the King, who not only gave him a gracious Reception, but took some Pains to obviate a Complaint, which his Brother of France had made against the English Resident in Holland, who had either spoken of the most Christian King with too much Freedom, or had been accus'd of doing so, by some of the States, who very cordially desir'd to set the two Monarchs at Variance. His Majesty then made a Transition to the Affairs of Portugal: And here we have the first Hint, that France had, at length, comply'd with the King's Demands, of a Sum of Money to enable him to support the Burthen of that War. This Sum was Two hundred thousand Crowns; and his Majesty now thought proper to contend for the speedy Payment of it: The wary Ambassador, on the other hand, signify'd, that he would write concerning it to the King his Master; and withal, to prepare his Majesty for Delays, if not for Disappointments, gave him to understand, that it requir'd Time to collect that Quantity of Specie in Gold.

A. D. 1662.

Hitherto, not one Syllable relating to the Flag had escap'd on either Side; but Mr. d'Esstrades having taken his Leave, and being on the point of quitting the Presence, his Majesty call'd him back, and intimated he had till then forgot to mention, that Madam, fearing some Misunderstanding would arise between the two Courts, on that critical Point, had writ to him concerning it: That he could not conceive, that an established Right, which Henry IV. had expressly given up to Queen Elizabeth, when she lent him her Fleet, and which he was still in Possession of, would now be called in Question: That it would be very injurious in the most Christian King, upon whose Friendship he had so securely rely'd, to insist on retrenching the fairest Mark of his Sovereignty: And that there was nothing in the World he would leave undone to maintain it, as he was bound in Honour to do, wherever Ship could sail.

To this Mr. d'Esstrades, like a true Frenchman, reply'd, That the Example of Henry IV. could neither establish Right, nor authorize Possession: That the ill Circumstances of that Prince compelled him to accept the Assistance of Queen Elizabeth, on what Terms she thought proper to impose: That he was assur'd the King his Master was too generous to assist his Allies upon such mercenary Terms: That, if they needed his good Offices, they might command them without Price or Consideration: That, consequently, his Friendship was of too delicate a Nature, to submit to be articul'd with: And that, if it was to be thus forfeit by a Pretension, which could not be supported against a Monarch so powerful by Land and Sea, (who became more and more so every Day, without the Assistance of any other Power whatever; who directed both his own Affairs, and those of his Neighbours, by his own Sagacity; and who understood the Interests of both to the very Bottom;) it would be difficult to recover it.

To this the King, appearing to be somewhat rous'd, made Answer, That when his Affairs should put him upon the Offensive, he should find Friends, who, till then, had not been known to have offer'd him their Services, on whom he could depend for a proper Support.

Mr. d'Esstrades rejoin'd, That, for his part, he could not see, what Reason his Majesty had to take offence, nor against whom: That he had neither demanded nor propos'd any thing on the Behalf of the King his Master: That as to the Friends his Majesty had alluded to, he did not esteem them to be of equal Weight with those he seem'd dispos'd to relinquish: And that he doubted whether they would enter into an Alliance with England against France, in case the good Intelligence that now subsisted between the two Crowns should be broken, which he ardently wish'd might never happen.

Upon the Conclusion (if Mr. d'Esstrades's Account is to be depended upon) his Majesty, finding he could make no Impression upon the Ambassador, soften'd his Voice and Manner, and by asking him, whether he did not design to see the Chancellor, sufficiently shew'd, that he thought of nothing less than a Rupture.

The Chancellor, however, the next Day took up the Dispute, in as high a Tone as the King had left it, as, no doubt, had been preconcerted; which gave Mr. d'Esstrades the Hint to say, (upon what Grounds must, perhaps, be for ever a Secret) That it ought to be his (the Chancellor's) Endeavours, so to employ his Credit and Power, that the two Kings should not come to Extremities. To which his Lordship reply'd, that he would give his Blood to prevent it; that he was so much oblig'd to his most Christian Majesty, for the many Favours he had bestow'd upon him, and the Honour he had done to his Son, that, exclusive of his Duty to the King his Master, he would sacrifice all things to serve him, as a Proof of his Acknowledgment.— But his Concessions went no farther. He talk'd of the Flag, as the King had done the Day before, nor seem'd dispos'd to abate a Scruple; declaring, that the Parliament would never consent to any Expedient, and that the People would give all they were worth to support the King in his Right. To this Mr. d'Esstrades answer'd, That he very well knew it was not the Custom of the Kings of England, to communicate the Orders they gave their Admirals to the Parliament: That, indeed, when they declar'd War against any Power, there was a Necessity to do it by their Advice, in order to have their Assistance in carrying it on: And that as to Expedients, he neither demanded nor expected any.— You are for a War then, reply'd the Chancellor.— Not, if it can be avoided, return'd the Ambassador: But, continu'd he, rather than submit to what is unjust, the King my Master would embrace it cheerfully, and maintain it both long and vigorously. The Chancellor then took Occasion to say, That having Reason to believe that the French Court were bent upon a War, it would be to no Purpose to offer any Expedient: That he was confirm'd in this Opinion, by the Advices which had been receiv'd from all Parts, that his most Christian Majesty had resolv'd upon a Treaty with the Dutch, in which he had taken upon him the Guaranty of the Fisbery: That Mr. de Tbou was arriv'd at the Hague, in order to give the States the necessary Assurances upon that Head: That this Step was by no means agreeable to the strict Union between the two Crowns, which Mr. d'Esstrades had, in the King his Master's Name, profess'd to cultivate, at his Arrival: That, as to the sole Concern of England in this Affair, the Liberty of the Fisbery, it had been expressly granted, contrary to ancient Treaties: That this was to encourage our Enemies to fly in our Face, who, without such Protection, would never presume to do so: And that therefore, before any Attempt was made to accommodate Matters, the King his Master desir'd to know, upon what Footing his most Christian Majesty was inclin'd to grant the said Guaranty: By which he gave the Ambassador to understand, that, if that Difficulty ficulty was once remov'd, the Affair of the Flag would be easily adjusted.

Of all these Particulars, Mr. d'Esstrades did not fail to send a full Information to his Court; and, in the mean while, very dextrously, communicated to King Charles, a circumstantial Account of the complete Triumph of France over Spain, as to the Point of (g) Precedency, which the latter had been obliged to surrender in form. This his Majesty affected not to believe; but withal added: If true, it is a Mark of great Weakness in the Spaniards. Rather, reply'd the Ambassador, of the Passion of his Catholic Majesty to cultivate the closest Amity with the King my Master, whose Sincerity he has experienced, and by whom he can never be deceiv'd.

France, in Reality, was already become exceedingly great and formidable; and how thoroughly King Lewis knew his own Strength, may be gathered from his Reply to that Dispatch of Mr. d'Esstrades, which informs him of the seeming intractable Humour of the Court of London.

"Neither the King my Brother, says he, nor his Advisers, are as yet sufficiently acquainted with me, or they would hardly treat me with that Air of Haughtiness and Inflexibility, which falls very little short of menacing. I know no Power under Heaven that is able to make me advance a Step thro' such a Road. I may suffer but I cannot fear. I thought I had given the whole World a more favourable Impression of me; nay, I still flatter myself that 'tis only at London that I am so much mistaken and so little known. Nor shall it be long my Fault that I am not, even there, as well understood, as any where else.

Sure I am that, neither at Madrid, nor at any other Place upon the Globe, such Expressions would have escap'd from the Lips of any Minister, in Conference with my Ambassador, as those which Chancellor Hyde has been pleas'd to use, when declaring, That the Affair of the Flag could not be accommodated with the King his Master, if I should guaranty the Fishery to the Hollanders. To hear the Chancellor talk in this Strain, one would think that I was undone, in this Dispute was not adjusted according to his good Pleasure; and yet there is nothing I regard with more Indifference; for I design to put my Sea-forces in such a Condition, that the English shall think it a Favour, if I will hearken to any Terms touching a Claim, to which I have so much more a legitimate Title than they. The King of England and his Chancellor may be acquainted with my Strength, but not with my Heart; but I who am equally familiar with both, desire that, for the sole Answer they are to expect to so haughty a Declaration, they may hear from your Mouth, That I neither demand nor seek any Accomodation with regard to the Flag; because I know how to maintain my Right at all Events; and as to the Guaranty of the Fishery, I shall act in it, as I think proper, without allowing it to have the least Relation to the Flag, because I know how to maintain my Right, and to act as I shall see Cause; according as the Pretensions of the Hollanders are well or ill founded. I would not have you come to the least Explanation, whether I have already given into that Guaranty or not; tho', for your own particular Information, which you are not to divulge, you are to understand, that hitherto, I have come to no Agreement with the Hollanders at all.

With Princes, like me, who prefer Honour and Glory to all other Considerations, the Chancellor should have taken different Measures, to carry his Point. Affairs prosper or miscarry as they are manag'd; and as to this before us of the Fishery, however I am press'd upon it by the States, if the Chancellor instead of treating you so cavalierly, had frankly declared, That your Masters ought, at no rate, to come to a Rupture; if he had in earnest fought some Expedient to prevent it; and had signify'd, that his Master, depending on the Friendship I had so often assur'd him of, hop'd, I would not agree to a Guaranty, that would be prejudicial to the English, which had been saying the same things in a civiler way, I almost fancy I could not have refus'd him. But after I have been treated with such Arrogance, I am not sure, that the very first thing I shall do, will not be to enter into the very Engagement, which has drawn such Menaces upon me.

I make no Doubt, but the Chancellor will be at some Pains to point out the Inconveniences of this Step, in case I should take it; will tell you the Fate of Portugal depends upon it; that the Court of England is on the Point of abandoning its Interest; of breaking off the Marriage; and will talk even of co-operating with the Catholic King, in facilitating his Conquest.

Possibly all this may happen; and I see as well as they, how much it is my own Interest, it never should. But all this is nothing in comparison to a Point of Honour, which so intimately affects the Reputation of my Crown: For in such a Case, far from being under any Concern for the Dominions of another, I shall be always ready to endanger my own, rather than give into the smallest Weakness that might tarnish the Glory which I seek in all things, which is the principal Motive of all my Actions.

The Chancellor is then most grievously mistaken in his Opinion; and I must tell you farther, that however this Affair may end, he may possibly find himself as much mistaken in his Conduct; for if I am oblig'd to come to Extremities with his Master for a Point of Honour, I hope, without menacing nancing any body, and that with Facility enough, to take such Measures, that, modestly speaking, my Part shall not be the weakest. I might even say this, if I stood alone; but I have reason to believe, that, in case of Need, I should be well supported from many Quarters, of which the King of England has not, at present, the least Suspicion.

His most Christian Majesty's Letter upon that Subject.

(g) The Dispute between the two Crowns, upon this Head, arose from the terrible Fray which happen'd in London, between the French and Spanish Ambassadors, Sept. 30.

As soon as I received your Dispatch, I gave immediate Orders for the putting my Fleet in such a Condition, that it should have little to fear from any other Fleet whatever. But I believe I may say, with Truth, and without Presumption, that, in case it should meet with any Misfortune, it would prove the worst Business in every shape, that ever the King of England had upon his Hands. But I leave the Event to God. It is sufficient for me to have done nothing that is base, or with which I could reproach myself."

I have inserted this remarkable Letter thus at length, not only because it gives us so lively an Idea of the Manners and Character of this high-spirited Prince, but because it serves to throw so strong and clear a Light upon our foreign Affairs, which have been hitherto so lamely represented and so ill understood.

Soon after Mr. d'Estrades had received this Dispatch, he had an Audience of the King at Whitehall; which, with his usual Address, he opened with the Affairs of Portugal, representing their ill Situation, and pressing his Majesty to send speedy Succours, before the Spaniards could take Advantage of the Ignorance and Disunion of those in the Administration there. The King replied, That he was already inform'd of all, and had resolv'd to send thither 3000 Foot and 1000 Horse, with a Convoy of ten Men of War of 60 Guns each by the Middle of March: That he had done his utmost to remove the Jealousies which embroil'd the Portuguese Councils, and consequently was not answerable for the many vexatious Events, which had happen'd in that Kingdom; adding, that it would not be in his Power to prevent many more, unless he was furnish'd with the Supply which his most Christian Majesty had promis'd; and whose Sentiments on that Head, he desired to know.

Mr. d'Estrades then assur'd his Majesty, that the King his Master had given his Orders for the Payment of it, and that the Reason why they were not obey'd, was no other than a Difficulty of collecting together Gold enough to make up such a Sum; that he himself had taken upon him to press for it, and that he had, at the same time, appriz'd his most Christian Majesty, in plain Terms, of the Resolution taken here, to make the Affair of the Flag, the Pledge of continuing the good Intelligence between the two Crowns; which had been already a little shock'd by the Chancellor's manner of treating the Guaranty of the Fishery, demanded by the Hollanders.

The Effect it produces.

The King then took the Word, and said, That he could not tell how to believe, that the Chancellor would breathe a Syllable either against that good Intelligence, or against the Respect which was due to his most Christian Majesty; and that he should make his Acknowledgments, if he had: That, knowing the Interest of England, he might possibly assure him, as he himself then did, that he could never imagine the most Christian King would grant any Guaranty to the Dutch; which, in the End, would prove prejudicial to him, tho' such Advices were received from all Parts; nay, tho' the Dutch still boasted of being sure of it: That he depended more upon his Friendship, and upon the Professions which Mr. d'Estrades had made him, on his Majesty's Behalf: That he was convinced his Majesty held the Dutch and him at least in equal Consideration: That he had always submitted his Interests to his Decision: And that he made it his Request to the Ambassador, that he would inform his Majesty from him, that when he gave the Turn of the Scale to his Disadvantage, he might have Cause to complain, but not to withdraw himself from that good Intelligence, which he should never think advisable to break through, for any such Reason: That he had never had any Design to make a Matter of Compromise of the Flag; nor to exact any thing from his Majesty, for all the Concessions he propos'd to make on that Subject: That he did not believe his Majesty made any Pretensions in the Four Seas, which border'd on England; because, in these, the Sovereignty had never been disput'd by any Prince; but that, from Cape Finisterre to the Straits, from the Straits to the Mediterranean, and in every other Sea, for the preserving a good Intelligence between the two Crowns, when the Two Fleets met, neither should claim any Superiority, but both should keep their Flags flying; tho' former Times afforded no such Precedent; and tho', in all Seas alike, the Fleets had, till then, insisted on the Honour of the Flag, from all other Fleets of all Nations whatever.

King Charles retreats.

How variable is Court-Weather? and how soon the Climate alters from hot to cold! The King of England here holds the very Language which his most Christian Majesty had prescribed. And how is this to be accounted for? Why, before Mr. d'Estrades made this last Visit to Whitehall, one of those Court-Emissaries above spoken of, fell in his Way, to whom he communicated the Heads of the King his Master's thundering Dispatch before recited, who immediately echo'd all he had heard to the Cabinet, where it produc'd the strange and sudden Effects before related.

The Chancellor of England was next to be mortify'd, for having talk'd in so peremptory a Style to the Ambassador of France: Accordingly Mr. d'Estrades paid him a Visit for that Purpose, and found him already appriz'd of his having incurred the high Displeasure of his most Christian Majesty. His Excellency however did not fail to follow his his Instructions to the full, by letting him into all his Royal Master's heroic Sentiments concerning Glory; and his fix'd Resolution, never to suffer any Prince in Europe to barter Conditions with him; as, in their late Conference on the Fishery and the Flag, he had seem'd inclin'd to do: That he might suffer himself to be prevail'd upon by gentle Means, and by a Dependence on his Word: But that he became inflexible, when treated with any thing like an Air of Superiority, &c.

The Chancellor appear'd confounded at this Reprimand, and meekly reply'd, That, after the King his Master, there was no Prince in the World he had so great a Veneration for, as his Majesty of France, nor did he know any Prince who deserv'd it more: That he was not aware, that he had ever us'd any Expressions inconsistent with these his Sentiments: That the Modes of Speech in his (b) Language, which was not (i) so civil and courtly as the French, might have caus'd him to be misunderstood; but that his Thoughts were ever filled with Respect, and wholly free from the least Mixture of that criminal Haughtiness, which had been imputed to him. He threw in so many more obliging Things upon the Occasion, that, in spite of the Rudeness of the English Language, and the Delicacy of a French Ear, Mr. d'Esstrades became sully convinc'd that he was a sincere Penitent, and thereupon recommended him as worthy of being admitted into Grace again.

Upon the Affairs of the Fishery and the Flag, the Chancellor moreover repeated all that the King had said before, and even added, That a Vessel should be dispatched after the Fleet, with Orders to the Earl of Sandwich and Vice Admiral Jennings, who commanded the Lisbon and Levant Squadrons, to avoid, if possible, any Meeting with those of his most Christian Majesty; as likewise, in case such Meeting should prove unavoidable, that then the Salute, by which as to the Flag and Number of Guns, should be on equal Terms: That this was all that Mr. de Beaufort had ever pretended to, as he had been by the Letters of the Queen and Madame: That this was all which could be done to satisfy his most Christian Majesty: That, if the King his Master should make any farther Concessions, it would be his Ruin: That if he was to advise him to it, he should be order'd to the Bar in Twenty-four Hours: And that he could not tell how to think his most Christian Majesty would expose him to Ruin, for the Sake of a Pretension, which could never be allow'd, and which was, at present, of no manner of Use to him.

Let the Reader make his own Reflections; mine are unnecessary.

But notwithstanding all this Acknowledgment and Submission, the Ambassador still stood aloof; maintain'd stilly his Master's Right of Superiority; admitted neither Reasons nor Examples, which were urg'd against it; declar'd he had no Orders to accept of any Expedient; enlarg'd on the Inconveniences which would flow from a Rupture; signify'd, that England had at least as much Reason to avoid it, as France: And concluded with saying, he should recount all that had pass'd to his Master, who, no doubt, would give what Orders he thought proper to his Admirals. To the King, indeed, he afterwards design'd to add, on the Subject of the Guaranty, That he had no Intelligence of any thing as yet concluded with the Hollanders; and that he did not doubt, but his Master would have a proper Regard for the Interest of his Majesty of England, in that Affair; in consideration of the Request which he had desired him to make concerning it.

The Reflections made by Mr. d'Esstrades on this remarkable Occasion, in one of his Dispatches to his most Christian Majesty, are, That, since the King of England had given such Orders in relation to the Salute, without having received any previous Satisfaction as to the Guaranty, it was plainly with a View to avoid a Rupture; and that tho' he was already arm'd, which France was not, and in a Condition to strike the first Blow, it was equally plain, he had no thought of taking the Advantage. That according to the usual Course of the French Fleet from Rochelle to the Levant, it was impossible for them to fall in with the English on this Side Cape Fimijerre; so that all Matter of Dispute being thereby for the present avoided, his most Christian Majesty would have Leisure to make such Preparations, as would enable him to force the King of England into all the Submissions, which he now refus'd; and which indeed, he had not as yet Authority enough with his People to make good: The Parliament, however otherwise devoted to him, having already taken the Alarm from the Whippers, which had escap'd of this Dispute, and address'd him for a State of the whole Affair; and at the same time, offer'd to enable his Majesty to maintain his Pretensions. "But these Offers, continues Mr. d'Esstrades, the King has declin'd; as chusing rather to accommodate the Difference in an amicable way: And I must do him the Justice to acknowledge, that in all the Conferences I have held with him, he has shewn all possible Marks of Esteem and Consideration for your Majesty; and that he has even almost made me apprehend more from the Obstinacy of his People, and the Eagerness of his Parliament on that Affair, than from his own particular Interest to be supported in it."

To conclude upon this Head, which I have treated of more at large, because no other English Historian seems to have thought it worth mentioning; King Lewis, in his next Dispatch to Mr. d'Esstrades most graciously condescends to acknowledge, that he is extremely well satisfy'd with the obliging Expressions of the King his Brother; that he shall send the like Orders to the Commanders ders of his Fleet, with respect to the Salute, which were to be sent to the Earl of Sandwich and Vice Admiral Jennings; that the 600000 Livres, or 200000 Crowns, before spoken of, were already at Havre, and should be deliver'd without Delay, to whatever Person should bring the Counter-Token, which had been agreed upon, to authorize the Payment and Receipt.---That is to say, when Mr. d'Estrades was satisfy'd the Vessel was actually dispatch'd with the Orders relating to the Flag; till when he was not to make any Mention of the Money at all.

by France to England, for the Service of Portugal.

But these Orders were actually sent, and consequently the Money was (k) paid on the imply'd Condition, that it should be all expended in the Service of Portugal.

But if the Court of England made a Shift to carry this one Point, it could carry no more: Tho' the Guaranty of the Fishery by France to the Dutch, was what the King made use of all his Strength, Credit, and Policy to prevent, he found the Dutch were at last too mighty for him; and his most Christian Brother not only comply'd with their Demands in general Terms, but expressly gave his Sanction to their Pretensions to the Fishery by name; which manifest Contempt of the King and his Ministers, was so dextrously gilded over by the Address of Mr. d'Estrades, and the rein'd Policy of the French Court, that his Majesty declar'd, he thought himself more oblig'd to return Thanks than to prefer Complaints. What I am most sensibly touch'd with, said he, being to see de Wit and his Cabal prefer'd to me. Nay, so dispos'd was he to humour France in whatever it requir'd, that when it appear'd (l) Sir Henry Bennet's having been nominated his Embassador to that Court, was not agreeable to his most Christian Majesty, because he was suppos'd to be retain'd in the Interest of Spain, he set him aside, at the Instance of that Monarch, and appointed Lord Holles in his Room; who, as Mr. d'Estrades, in many of his Dispatches, assures us, was wholly at the Devotion of the Chancellor; which he seems to mention as the highest Recommendation.

A. D. 1662.

But however meek and resign'd the Spirit of the Court appear'd with relation to the Powers abroad, it still took care to array itself with Terrors at home.

Tho' almost two Years were elaps'd, since the Restoration, and the Legislature had prepar'd and pass'd fo many Acts to re-establish and perpetuate the Regal Authority, still fresh Examples were thought necessary to be made, to deter the People from ever daring again to vindicate their Liberties by Force of Arms.

Barkhead, Okey and Corbet, three of the Regicides had taken Refuge in Holland, as a Land of Freedom, and at that time, on no very good Terms with England. (m) Downing, then Agent there for the King, and formerly a Preacher and Chaplain to Okey's Regiment, hearing of it, obtain'd an Order from the States for their Seizure, which having been executed, they were put on board a Man of War, and sent to England, where they were soon after try'd, condemn'd and (n) executed.

These, indeed, were to be number'd among

(l) To one Fax no doubt the Person, afterwards so well known by the Title of Sir Stephen. The Secret, however, escap'd; and gave rise to a Notion, that it was a Consideration for Dunkirk, as will be hereafter explain'd.

(m) Two Things seem'd especially remarkable in this Action; the Treachery of Downing, after he had given assurance to a Person lent to him by Colonel Okey to that end, that he had no Orders to look after him; but chiefly the barbarous part acted by the States in this Conjunction, who, tho' they had themselves shaken off the Yoke of Tyranny, and to that Time had made it a fundamental Maxim to receive and protect all those who should come among them; yet contrary to the Principles of their Government, and the Interest of their Commonwealth, to say nothing of the Laws of God, Nature and Nations, without any previous Engagement of the Court of England, contributed, as much as in them lay, to the Destruction of these Gentlemen. But a Treaty was to be made with England, and their Trade secur'd at any rate, tho' the Foundations should be laid in Blood. Ludlow, vol. iii. p. 100, 101.

(n) Of these Men, Ludlow gives the following Account: Mr. Miles Corbet was a Gentleman of an ancient Family in the County of Norfolk. He had applied himself with Diligence to the Study of the Laws of England in the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and for the Space of thirty-seven Years had been chosen to serve his Country in the several Parliaments that were called. Being appointed one of the High Court of Justice for the Trial of the late King, he appear'd not among the Judges, by reason of some Scruples he had entertain'd, all the Day that Sentence was pronounced. But upon more mature Deliberation, finding them to be of no weight, he durst no longer absent himself, coming early on that Day into the Court, that he might give a public Testimony of his Satisfaction and Concurrence with their Proceedings. He was afterwards by the Parliament made one of their Commissioners for the Civil Government of Ireland, in which Employment he manifested such Integrity, that tho' he was continu'd for many Years in that Station, yet he impair'd his own Estate for the Public Service, whilst he was the greatest Husband of the Treasure of the Commonwealth. The Day before his Death, he assured his Friends, That he was so thoroughly convinced of the Justice and Necessity of that Action for which he was to die, that if the Things had been yet intire, and to do, he could not refuse to act as he had done, without affronting his Reason, and opposing himself to the Dictates of his Conscience; adding, that the Immoralities, Lewdens and Corruptions of all sorts, which had been introduced and encouraged since the late Revolution, were no inconsiderable Justification of those Proceedings.

Colonel John Barkhead was a Citizen and Goldsmith of London, who being sensible of the Invasions that had been made upon the Liberties of the Nation, took Arms among the first for their Defence, in the quality of Captain to a Foot Company in the Regiment of Colonel Pease. He had not been long in this Employment, before his Merit advanced him to the degree of a Major, in which Station he was made Governor of Reading; and afterwards being prefer'd to the Command of a Regiment, he was consulted by the Parliament, in Consideration of his Services, Lieutenant of the Tower of London. When he was brought to confirm with the Testimony of his Blood that Cause, for which he had fought, he perform'd that part with Cheerfulness and Courage, no way derogating from the Character of a Soldier and a true Englishman.

Colonel Okey was also a Citizen of London, and one of those who appear'd early in the Service of the Parliament. He had been first a Captain of Foot, then a Captain of Horse, and afterwards Major in the Regiment of Sir Arthur Haslerig. In the Year 1645, at the time when the Army was new modell'd, he was made Colonel of a Regiment of Dragoons, which was afterwards converted into a Regiment of Horse. In these Employments he distinguish'd himself by his Courage, Conduct and Fidelity; and during the Usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, was dismiss'd from his Command in the Army, on account of his Affection to the Commonwealth. He was chosen by the County of Bedford to represent and serve them in the Convention that was call'd by Richard's; and after the Restitution of the Great Parliament, they restored him to his Command in the Army. Being ready to suffer for that Cause which he had strenuously defend'd, he said in the Presence of many Witnesses, That if he had as many Lives as he had Hairs in his Head, among the immediate Murderers of the late King, and therefore stood within the King's Exception, as well as that of the Parliament; but General Lambert and Sir Henry Vane had none of that immediate Guilt to answer for. They were, however, to be serv'd up next, tho' not both in the same way; the last, as the most dangerous Man, was condemn'd to dye, and the first was permitted to live; that the Life of the one, and the Death of the other, might equally admonish and terrify those who had imbib'd their Principles, not to copy their Actions, if they desir'd to avoid their Fate.

But, of the Proceedings against these two eminent Men, more particular Notice ought to be taken: To show how the Current of Justice ran, whether free and clear, or foul and interrupted, in every Reign, being one of the main Branches of this Undertaking.

Sir Henry Vane was indicted, That he, as a false Traitor, did compass and imagine the Death of our Sovereign Lord the King, and the ancient Frame of the Government of this Realm totally to subvert, and keep our said Sovereign Lord from the Exercise of his Regal Government, &c. by levying War against his Majesty, &c.

State Trials.

The Proof of this Charge was confin'd to such Facts, as had been committed since the Death of the Father, and the nominal Accession of the Son: Which Facts were said to consist in his acting as President of the Council of State, signing several Orders for delivering out Arms for Soldiers, fitting out Ships, &c. and also proposing a new Model of Government, in which he asserted, It was destructive to the People's Liberties to admit an earthly King, or single Person, to the legislative or executive Power in this Nation.

In Answer to which Sir Henry pleaded, that by KING, in the Statute of 25 Ed. III. was to be understood a King regnant, in actual Possession, and not a King de Jure, out of Possession: That an Interregnum had been admitted by the Indictment: That all Ensigns of Authority, and Badges of Government, were visibly in another Name and Style: That the King's best Friends prosecuted their Suits in the Name, and by the Authority, of the Powers then in being: That the Council, in which he acted, was establish'd by Authority of Parliament; that this Parliament was a Power co-ordinate with the King; that what he had done, by their Authority, could not amount to High Treason, because, by Ordinance of Parliament, it was declar'd to be Treason to lay any Imputation of Treason on either or both Houses. That in a Crisis without Precedent, when the Three Estates were at Variance, it was impossible to act according to the strict Rules of Law; that, therefore, he thought it the best Policy to preserve the Government in its ROOT the COMMONS, by whom it was preserv'd, and at length restor'd to its former Course. That by the 11 Hen. VII. whoever serv'd a King de facto ought not to be question'd for it by a King de Jure: That whoever were possess'd of the Powers of Sovereignty, were Sovereigns, &c. That the Statute just mention'd was made, that the Subject might pay Allegiance where he receiv'd Protection, without running the Risk of being destroy'd, either for obeying, or refusing Obedience.

These and many more pointed Things are upon Record in the printed Trials: Tho' it appears, from his own Memorandums, publish'd after his Death by his Friends, that he propos'd, first, To lay before the Court the Impossibility of his having any such indifferent and equal Trial, as the Law intended him, and doth require and command, on the Behalf of all the free People of England, &c.

Ken. Reg.

That the Judges ought not to deliver their Opinion before-hand, as Cook expressly, in the Chapter of Petty-Treason, fol. 29. but here the Judges being assisitant in the Lords House, when all Acts of Parliament pass, and whose Advice is taken in them (as appears by what is declar'd in the said Acts) prejudg'd, by their (o) Opinions, and the Opinions of the Parliament, beforehand, the Merit of the Cause that now appears to be put upon the Issue in my Trial. Hereby the Judges are rendred ex parte, and the Indifferency the Law requires, impossible to be afforded.—

he would willingly hazard them all on the same Account. The Sentence against these three Gentlemen having been executed on the 19th of April 1662, the King bestowed the Body of Colonel Okey upon his Wife, to dispose as she thought fit; upon which the order'd him to be interred at Stepney where his first Wife lay in a Vault, that he had purchased for himself and Family. But the Report of this Funeral being spread among the People, several thousands of them assembled themselves in and about Newgate Market, where the Body lay, resolving to attend it to the Grave. And tho' they behaved themselves with Decency and Modesty, yet the King, upon Notice of this Appearance, was so alarm'd, that he revok'd his Grant to the Colonel's Wife, dispatch'd Orders to the Sheriff to disperse the Company, and commanded the Body to be interred in the Tower.

(6) viz. I. Resolv'd, That by the Death of King Charles I. that long Parliament was actually determined, notwithstanding the Act, that it should not be dissolved but by the Consent of both Houses.

II. Resolv'd, that tho' King Charles II. was de facto kept out of the Exercise of the kingly Office by Traytors and Rebels, yet he was King both de facto and de jure, and all the Acts which were done to the keeping him out were High-Treason.

III. Resolv'd, that the very Consultation and advising together of the Means to destroy the King and his Government, was an Overt Act to prove the compassing of the King's Death,

IV. Resolv'd, that in this Case the Treason laid in the Indictment, being the compassing of the King's Death, and the levying War being laid only as one of the Overt Acts to prove the compassing of the King's Death, tho' this levying of War be laid in the Indictment to be in Middlesex, yet a War levied by him in Starry might be given in Evidence, for being not laid as the Treason, but only as the Overt Act to prove the compassing, it is a transitory thing which may be proved in another Country.

V. Resolv'd, that the Statute of Wil. II. cap. 31. which giveth the Bill of Exception, extends only to Civil Causes, not to Criminal.

VI. Altho' the Treason of compassing the King's Death was laid in the Indictment to be 30 May, 11 Car. II. yet upon the Evidence it appear'd, that Sir Henry Vane, the very Day the late King was murder'd, did sit in Council for ordering the Force of the Nation against the King, that now is, and so continued on all along, until a little before the King's coming in. It was resolv'd, that the Day laid in the Indictment is not material, and the Jury are not bound to find him Guilty of that Day, but may find the Treason (as it was in Truth) either before or after the time laid in the Indictment, &c. See Kelby's Reports, fol. p. 14.

A. D. 1662.

That it is farther observable, how early hard Measure appear'd, in the Way wherein the Prisoner became excepted out of the Act of Indemnity. When the Commons, his proper Judges, declar'd him in their Thoughts not fit to be endanger'd in the Point of Life; yet unto the Judgment of the Lords (that ought not to judge Commoners, unbrought before them by the Commons, much less in opposite Judgment to the Commons) the Commons were necessitated to yield, left otherwise the Act of Indemnity to the whole Nation should stop upon this Dispute, and cause an essential Difference between the two Houses, &c.

That, without any seeking of his, he was chosen, by Writ under the great Seal, to serve as Burgess for the Town of Kingston upon Hull, in the Parliament that sat down on the third of November 1640; and having, in pursuance thereof, taken his Seat in the said Parliament, he was oblig'd by Law to give his Attendance upon the said Trust, as well as upon Grounds of Duty and Conscience.—As to the War,——— this Matter was not done in a Corner, the Appeals were solemn, and the Decision by the Sword was given by that God, who, being the Judge of the whole World, does right, and cannot do otherwise.— If either or both Houses cannot commit Treason, then those that act by their Authority cannot, &c. &c.

Upon what Principles all and every one of these Pleas were over-ru'd, may be gather'd not only from the Resolutions of the Judges, inserted in a preceding Note, but from the Behaviour of the Court, when the Prisoner was brought to the Bar to receive Sentence.

Being ask'd, as usual on that melancholy Occasion, what he had to say, he alleg'd, first, that he had not as yet heard the Indictment read in Latin; and desir'd, that Council might be assign'd him to make Exceptions thereto: But this was over-ru'd by the (p) Court. The next thing he offer'd was the Bill of Exceptions, which he brought with him ready drawn, and offer'd it to the Judges, desiring them, according to the Statute of Westm. 2. made 13 Ed. I. to sign it; but this likewise the Judges over-ru'd, saying it was not allowable in criminal Cases for Life. The Third thing he desir'd was, that the Petition of both Houses, with his Majesty's Answer thereunto, might be read in Court; which, after some Dispute, was concluded to be a thing they were not bound to take notice of, not being an Act of Parliament. At length they confederated to read it, and that was all. The Fourth and last thing (q) Sir Henry offer'd to the Consideration of the Bench was, that Council might be assign'd him to argue these Points: 1. Whether a Parliament were accountable to any inferior Court? 2. Whether the King being out of Possession, and the Power regent in others— Here they stop'd him, not suffering him to proceed, nor admitting that the King was ever out of Possession, &c.

And after Sentence was given, Chief Justice Forsler endeavour'd to take off the King from any Obligation by his former Grant to the Petition of both Houses; saying, that God, tho' full of Mercy, yet intended his Mercy only to the Penitent.

The Day before his Death, his Friends having receiv'd Permission to visit him, and persuading him to make some Submission to the King, and to endeavour the obtaining of his Life, he said, "If the King did not think himself more concern'd for his Honour and Word, than he did for his Life, he was very willing they should take it. Nay, I declare (said he) that I value my Life less in a good Cause, than the King can do his Promise." And when some others were speaking to him of giving some thousands of Pounds for his Life, he said, "If a thousand Farthings would gain it, he would not give it; and if any should attempt to make such a Bargain, he would spoil their Market," &c.

In his very Prayers he spoke of the Part he had acted, as meritorious; and seem'd to rejoice, that his Testimony was to be written in Characters of Blood.

Upon the Scaffold, he address'd himself to the People, as follows:

"Gentlemen, Fellow-Countrymen, and Christians,

"When Mr. Sheriff came to me this Morning, and told me he had receiv'd a Command from the King, that I should
"fly

A. D. 1662.

(p) The Resolutions of the Court upon this Occasion are as follow:

I. That as Indictments are writ in Latin, it is not necessary they should be read in English to the Prisoner, or in such Language as he understands, because it is the Matter of the Indictment, and not the Form to which he ought to answer. [For the seeming Inconsequence of this Passage, the Lawyers who drew it up are to answer.]

II. That such Prisoners should not have Copies of their Indictments nor Council assign'd to them, unless there should ensue Matter of Law, and in such Case they should have a Copy of so much of their Indictment, as concern'd that Matter; and not of the whole Indictment.

III. That the Statute of Westm. 2. cap. 31. which grants a Bill of Exceptions, did not extend to the Criminal Case of the Prisoners indicted at the Suit of the King, that Statute intending only to remedy the over-ruling of Evidence in Civil Pleas between Party and Party.

IV. That the Prisoner could not offer any thing in Arrest of Judgment, but Matters which arose upon the Indictment, and not any thing foreign to it, as what was now offer'd by Vane, namely that the King then was King de jure only, and not de facto, and that the Long-Parliament was yet in being: And therefore the Court proceeded to Sentence. Siderfin's Reports, fol. Term 4. 114. Car. II. B. R.

(q) In the Reasons for an Arrest of Judgment, writ by the Prisoner, but refused to be heard by the Court, is the following Passage:

—Had nothing been in it, but the Care of preserving my own Life, I need not have stayed in England, but might have taken my Opportunity to have withdrawn myself into foreign Parts, to provide for my own Safety. Nor needed I to have been put upon pleading, as now I am, for an Arrest of Judgment, but might have watch'd my Advantages that were visible enough to me in the managing of my Trial, if I had consulted only the Preservation of my Life or Estate. No, my Lords, I have otherwise learned Christ, than to fear them that can but kill the Body, and have no more that they can do. I have also taken Notice, in the little reading that I have had of History, how glorious the very Heathens have render'd their Names to Posterity, in the Contempt they have shew'd of Death (when the laying down their Life has appeared to be their Duty) from the Love, which they have owed to their Country. Two remarkable Examples give me leave to mention, — Socrates, — and a chief Governor of a City of Greece, — with whom his Life was little in Esteem, when the Good and Safety of his Country required the laying of it down.

Sir H. Vane's Speech on the Scaffold.

say nothing reflecting on his Majesty, or the Government, I answer'd, I should confine and order my Speech, as near as I could, so as to be least offensive, saving my Faithfulness to the Trust reposed in me.— I suppose you may wonder when I tell you, that I am not brought hither according to any known Law of England. It is true I have been before a Court of Justice; yet, when I was before them, I could not have the Liberty and Privilege of an Englishman; the Grounds, Reasons, and Causes of the Actings I was charg'd with, duly consider'd. I therefore desir'd the Judges, that they would set their Seals to my Bill of Exceptions. I press'd hard for it again and again, as the Right of myself, and every free-born Englishman, by the Law of the Land, but was finally denied it.

Trisal, printed by his Friends.

Here Sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of the Tower, interrupted him, saying, You must not go on thus to rail against the Judges, &c.—The Trumpets sounded—and again, several times, in his Face.—They then endeavour'd to snatch the Paper out of his Hand; but he kept it for a while, now and then reading Part of it; afterwards, tearing it in Pieces, he deliver'd it to a Friend behind him, who was presently forc'd to deliver it to the Sheriffs, &c.

Before the Stroke, he spake to this Effect: "I bless the Lord, who hath accounted me worthy to suffer for his Name: Blessed be the Lord, that I have kept a Conscience void of Offence to this Day. I bless the Lord, that I have not deserted the righteous Cause for which I suffer."

But his very last Words of all at the Block were as follow: "Father, glorify thy Servant in the Sight of Men, that he may glorify thee in the Discharge of his Duty to thee and to his Country."

An ancient Traveller observ'd, that his Countenance did not in the least change; and whereas the Heads of all he had before seen thus executed, did, some way or other move, after severing; which argued some Reluctancy and Unwillingness to submit to that parting Blow, the Head of this Sufferer lay perfectly still, immediately upon the Separation.

Thus fell (r) Sir Henry Vane, a Man of such extraordinary Parts, that 'tis Matter of Astonishment, that Enthusiasm should be one of his Frailties. It is held by some, that he was sacrific'd to the Memory of Lord Strafford; and, possibly, it was thought politic, to deter Men from making Examples of Ministers, as well as Kings: But it is more reasonable to conclude that he was remov'd, because he could neither be terrify'd, nor corrupted; because he was the Head and Heart of the Republican Party; and because, while he liv'd, Monarchy itself, however seemingly establish'd and secur'd, was not safe.

Most certain it is, that the extraordinary Methods which were taken to bring him to his End, and the savage Insults he underwent in his last Moments, do very little Honour to this Reign: And that if any Outrage, under Pretence of Liberty, deserves to be punish'd, any Outrage, under Pretence of Law, can never be excus'd.

But if the Statesman, (s) Vane, behav'd with Consistency and Magnanimity, the Soldier, Lambert, on the contrary, chose rather to give up his Principles than his Life. Tho' declar'd Guilty, by the Jury, "He was, says Mr. Echard, by the King's Favour, repriev'd at the Bar, upon the Report that the Judges had given of his Submission and handsome Deportment, at his Trial." But the tender Mercies of the Wicked are Cruelty. The Archdeacon adds, "The Colonel was confin'd, during Life, in the Isle of Guernsey, where he continued a patient and discreet Prisoner, for above Thirty Years."

Impatient as the Reader may be to quit these beaten Paths, and to have more recent and therefore more interesting, Scenes display'd, we are still under a Necessity to enlarge

A. D. 1664.

Burnet. Echard.

(r) He dy'd in the very same Place on Tower Hill, (says that great Dealer in Judgments, Mr. Echard) with the famous Earl of Strafford.—And it is farther observ'd, that, as he was the first Man that open'd the Fountain of Blood, that over-ran the English Nation, so he was the last that clos'd it up, in his own Execution.

(s) A Brief of Sir Henry Vane's Life by Lewis.
Sir Henry Vane was a Gentleman of an ancient Family in the County of Down, eldest Son to Sir Henry Vane, who had been Secretary of State and Comptroller of the Household to the late King. Being scandalized with the Innovations dropp'd into the public Worship, he went to New England, and remained there for the Space of five or six Years; the two last which he was consecutively chosen Governor of that Country, (tho' not exceeding the Age of twenty-four Years. In the Beginning of the Great Parliament, he was desired to leave his Country among them, without the least Apprehension made on his Part to that End. And in this Station he soon made appear how capable he was of managing great Affairs, possessing in the highest Perfection a quick and ready Apprehension, a strong and tenacious Memory, a profound and penetrating Judgment, a just and noble Eloquence, with an easy and graceful manner of speaking. To these were added, a singular Zeal and Affection for the good of the Commonwealth, and a Resolution and Courage, not to be shaken or diverted from the Public Service. He had been removed by the late King from being Treasurer of the Navy, for performing his Duty in the House of Common; and being restored to that Employment by the Parliament, he freely contributed one half of the Profits, amounting to the Sum of two thousand Pounds yearly, towards carrying on the War for the Liberties of England. When that War was ended, he put the Receipt for the Navy in such a way, that by order of the Parliament, the whole Expence of that Office exceeded not one thousand Pounds by Year; Men being brought by this means to understand, that they were not placed in Employments to serve themselves but to serve the Public. And that this Conduct was not mistaken, the Success of our Arms by Sea against Portugal, France, Holland, and other Enemies, did abundantly manifest. When Conswell had treacherously advanced himself upon the Ruins of the Commonwealth, he would not be induced by any means to favour or countenance his Usurpation, chusing rather to suffer Imprisonment or other Hardships, than to comply with Tyranny under any form. Upon the Return of King Charles, being conscious to himself of having done nothing in relation to Public Affairs, for which he could not willingly and cheerfully suffer, he continued at his House in Hamstead near London; where, under false and unworthy Pretences, that he had engaged in Councils with some of the Army to drive him out of England again, he was seized and imprisoned in the Tower; from whence he was carried from one Place to another, for the Space of about two Years; after the Expiration of which, they who feared, his Abilities, and knew his Integrity, thought convenient to violate the public Faith, and under a Form of Law to put him to death.

A. D. 1662.

enlarge on such leading Points, as gave Rise to the melancholy Incidents of this Reign, and the tragical Conclusion of the next: For, if the Foundation is slight, the Building must be the same.

Effects of the Uniformity-Act.

Bartholomew-Tide now approach'd, when the Act of Uniformity came in Force: Both Parties were in a Ferment: Those in Possession were loth to relinquish; those who wanted Preferment rather wish'd to see a Schism in the Church, than to meet with a Disappointment in their own peculiar Expectations; and all the Laity, who had foolishly embroil'd themselves in these ecclesiastical Feuds, anxiously attended the Issue of an Affair, in which they had no material Concern.

Enabling Clauses.

By the Act, all Ministers were oblig'd, 1. To be re-ordin'd, if not episcopally ordain'd before. 2. They must declare their Assent and Consent to every thing contain'd in the Book of Common Prayer, &c. 3. They must take the Oath of canonical Obedience. 4. They must abjure the Solemn League and Covenant. And 5. They must abjure the taking Arms, upon any Pretence whatsoever, against the King, &c.

The Propbet's Roll was not more bitter in the Stomach, than these Ingredients were to the Palate of those qualmish Ecclesiastics. Some, we are told, were for a Compliance: But the Majority were against it; and, to keep their Corps together, they sent circular Letters round the Kingdom, admonishing every Man to abide by his Principles, in hope to prevail either with his Majesty for an Indulgence against, or with the Parliament for a Repeal of the said Act. Baxter had felt the (t) Example, so early as May 25. Some of their Leaders among the Peers are said to have encouraged them (u) to stand out. The Papists, likewise, had their Reasons to do the same: And even the King himself, as we are told by their own Rabbies, was greatly dispos'd to shew them (w) Favour; though not from any (x) Motive either of Gratitude or Affection.

As, on the one hand, it cannot be deny'd, that Scruples of Conscience have often been made use of hypocritically, to cover very different Motives; so, on the other, it would be highly injurious to suppose, that none but Hypocrites have scrupled to conform to the Laws of the Land, on the Presumption, that they were inconsistent with the Law of God.

But whether the Presbyterians, at this time, were Worshippers of God or Mammon, we find one of their best Writers setting forth one particular Hardship attending the Act, which, if true, would be alone sufficient to shew, that there could not be more Obtinacy and Self-sufficiency on one Side, than there was Malice and Tyranny on the other.

" All

(t) The Reasons why I gave over sooner than most others, were, 1. Because Lawyers did interpret a doubtful Clause in the Act, as ending the Liberty of Lecturers at that time. 2. Because I would let Authority soon know, that I intend to obey them in all that was lawful. 3. Because I would let all Ministers in England understand in Time, whether I intend to conform or not: For had I say'd to the last Day, some would have conform'd the sooner, upon a Supposition that I intended it.

(u) Of which, however, no better Proofs are given than the following:

Mr. Benjamin Agas, Minister of Choysey in Bucks, gave this Relation: A little before the Black-Bartholomew, a certain noble Lord (suppos'd to be Lord Wharton) in Discourse, enquir'd of me what my Intentions were, and whether I would conform or not: I answer'd his Lordship, that such things were requir'd and enjoyn'd, as I could not swallow, and therefore should be necessitated to march off, and found a Retreat. His Lordship seem'd much concern'd for me, and us'd many Arguments to reconcile me to a Compliance. But perceiving me not mov'd, at last he said with a Sigh, I wish it had been otherwise, but they are resolv'd stiffer to reproach you, or undo you. And about a Year after, another great Peer ordering me to wait on his Lordship, propos'd something with reference to the Liturgy, which I was not free to, and therefore crav'd to be excus'd: And speaking about the hard Terms of Conformity, his Lordship reply'd, I confess, I should fainly do so much for the Bible as they require for the Common-Prayer. Which shews, says he, how little the Nobility were pleas'd with the high and rigorous Proceedings of the Clergy, and how they were rather the Advocates than the Accusers of the Nonconformists. Dr. Calamy's Controversy, p. 145.

(w) Above all others, the King was favourable to them, and much inclin'd to grant an Indulgence to them, and the Parliament would have gone into some Temper upon it, if they had not strongly suspected, that his Majesty's Disposition towards them did not proceed purely from his natural Clemency and Lenity, but from his Affection to the Papists, and his Hopes of bringing them into equal Liberty and Toleration. However many Instances are given of the King's singular Benevolence to several of them. For Instance, Mr. Edmund Calamy was imprison'd in Towerham, for Preaching occasionally after Bartholomew Day; but soon released, when it was seen what a Resort of Persons of all Qualities there was to him in Newgate, and how generally the Severity was resent'd. — When he had continu'd there for a few Days, he was discharged by his Majesty's express Order. This being afterwards complain'd of in the House of Commons, it was signify'd in that House that his Release from Imprisonment was not owing to the sole Command of the King, but to a Deficiency in the Act of Parliament, that had not provided for his longer Retraint. Whereupon there was this Entry made in their Journal: Die Jovis Feb. 19. Upon Complaint made to this House, that Mr. Calamy being committed to Prison, upon Breach of the Act of Uniformity, was discharged upon Pretence of some Defect in the said Act. Resolv'd, That it be refer'd to a Committee to look into the Act of Uniformity, as to the Matter in Question, and to serue whether the same be defective, and otherwise.

Again, Mr. Samuel Deughy, after his Ejection from Sibton Con. Lic. liv'd at Abby de la Zouch, and had the King's Licence to preach in his own House there; and yet was convicted by the Lord B. and Lord S. 40 l. was levy'd upon him, 20 l. for himself, and 20 l. for preaching in it. He made his Appeal to the Quarter Sessions, and pleas'd his Licence from the King, and that there was neither Sedition, nor Breach of Peace, but he found no Relief. Afterwards he complain'd to the King and Council: The Lords were sent for up to Council: The King was pleas'd to give him his Part; but he could never get it. Calamy's Cont.

(x) Dr. Tho. Tenison, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, did observe in his Dissertation concerning the Ecclesiastical Commission in 1689, that the Spirit of Popery had been already moving at Court, and obtruding Reformation and Union. His Words are, Our Constitution was review'd in 61; and yet, notwithstanding that Review, is capable of another; and the Commissioners of that time did not add the last Hand to that Work, so as to render it incapable ever after of being corrected and improv'd: Some who have well consider'd all the Alterations and Additions then made by them (which amount to the Number of about six hundred) are sufficiently convinc'd, that if they had Reason for those Changes, there is equal, if not greater Reason for some further Improvements. If they had foreseen what is since come to pass, I charitably believe, they would not have done all that they did, and just as much, and no more. And yet I also believe, that if they had offer'd to move much further, a Stone would have been laid under their Wheel by a secret, but powerful Hand. The Mystery of Popery did even then work, and a Remains has very frankly inform'd us, of the Expectation rais'd in that Party in the Beginning of the Summer 61. They had some Hopes cherish'd in them, of Liberty of Conscience, of the Removal of the Sanguinary and other Penal Laws, and of forty Chapels to be open'd for them, in and about the City of London. Much more is understood by those who have penetrated into the Design of a certain Paper, call'd commonly The Declaration of Somerset House [where the Queen-Mother was resid'd]. *Complete Hist. of Eng. Dignity of that the time
prohibited.

"All the unprejudiced World will, without doubt, agree, that it was an insufferable Hardship to be oblig'd to assent and consent to, and declare their Approbation of, they know not what. And this was the Case of the Clergy in general, when this National Liturgy was so rigorously impos'd. I do not at all enter in the History of the Act of Uniformity; I do not tell the World, that it was chiefly at the Instigation of some furious High-flying Clergymen, that it was first mov'd; that all the severest and most unaccountable Passages in it, were what they suggested; that they had also a principal Hand in the Jeam Plois, and other indirect and unjustifiable Methods, by which (tho' with great Difficulty) they gain'd their Point at last: A just and impartial Account of which Things, would at once entertain and amaze all the considering Part of Mankind. But that single Circumstance, to which I confine myself at present, is, the Time appointed and limited by the Act for their Compliance: Which was before it was possible for them to know what they were to conform to.

To make this appear with the most convincing Evidence, it should be remember'd, first, that there were various Additions and Alterations made by the Convocation; whereupon the Book of Common-Prayer became another Book, and not the same with that they were before acquainted with. Of this they had frequent Intimations in the Act of Uniformity itself, in the Preamble to which they were inform'd, that his Majesty had been pleas'd to authorize and require the Presidents of the Convocations, [then sitting] and other the Bishops and Clergy of the same, to review the Book of Common-Prayer, &c.

Secondly, It was to this Book, with all those Alterations and Additions, that the Clergy were oblig'd to assent and consent; and all these they must declare their Approbation of; and not the old Book, that had been in use before the Alterations and Additions were made. And consequently, tho' they had never so carefully consider'd the old Common-Prayer-Book, and were able unfeignedly to profess their Assent and Consent to, and Approbation of all and every thing in the old Book, yet they could not therefore also agree to all the Alterations and Additions, with which they were then unacquainted.

And thirdly, The Time allow'd was not sufficient to satisfy themselves what were the Alterations and Additions, now so severely bound upon them; much less to enable them (as they were requir'd) to declare their unfeign'd Assent and Consent to them, to all and every thing contain'd in and prescrib'd by them. This they must do, every Minister in England that had any Benefice, upon some Lord's-Day before Bartholomew Day, or from that Day be ipso facto depriv'd of their Livings. Yet when this was the utmost Time allow'd them, those who had the Management in their Hands, took effectual Care, that they should not (within that time) be so much as able to know, what they were requir'd to assent and consent to.

'Tis well known, and what has oft been complain'd of, that this new Liturgy (to every Part of which they must declare their unfeign'd Assent and Consent on some Lord's-Day before Bartholomew Day) did not itself come out of the Press till about Bartholomew Eve. So that tho' the printed Books had been (as not any of them, either then, or ever since were) true and perfect Copies of that Liturgy the Act refers to, 'tis the Admiration of all the unprejudic'd World, that the whole Body of the English Ministry were not thereupon silenc'd at once."

Bishop Kennet indeed, in Contradiction to this Author, assures us, from the Act itself, that a lawful Impediment was to be allow'd by the Ordinary. But if the Book was publish'd some Weeks before Bartholomew-Tide, as his Lordship likewise asserts, how are we to account for his Predecessor, the Bishop of Peterborough's (y) testifying, as a lawful Impediment, that his Dean and Chapter could not

(y) A Certificate given by the Lord Bishop of Peterborough, allowing a lawful Impediment for Persons not reading the Book of Common-Prayer, &c. within the time prescribed by the late Act of Uniformity.

"Whereas by an Act of Parliament made and printed this present Year 1662, for the Uniformity of publick Prayers, &c. it is enacted among other things, &c. that every such Person, who shall (without some lawful Impediment) be allowed and approv'd of by the Ordinary of the Place) neglect or refuse to do the same within the time aforesaid, shall ipso facto be deprived of his spiritual Promotions. And inasmuch as the Bishop of the Common-Prayer appointed by the said Act to be read, could not be gotten by the Dean and Prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of Peterborough (so as they might read the same in the said Cathedral) before the 17th of August, being the Sunday immediately preceding the Feast of St. Bartholomew, upon which Day it is not possible, that all the Members of the said Cathedral Church should read the said Service in Manner and Form as is by the said Act directed: We therefore by the Power given to us by the said Act, do allow and approve of the said Impediment, and do hereby declare it to be for the not reading of the said Service as directed, and for not doing of their Consents as required in and by the said Act."

Sealed and sign'd this 17th of August, 1662.

R. PETERBOROUGH.

Again, the Common-Prayer-Book, says Dr. Calamy, with the Alterations and Amendments (for so they are called, how deservedly I enquire not) made by the Convocation, did not come out of the Press till a few Days before the 24th of August. So that of the seven thousand Ministers in England who kept their Livings, few, except those who were in or near London, could possibly have a Sight of the Book with its Alterations, 'till after they had declar'd their Assent and Consent to it. Life of Baxter, p. 201.

Mr. Ollive in his Defence of Ministerial Conformity to take this off, reports, from an aged Minister in their Parts, that he and his Neighbour sent to London and had the Amendments and Alterations copied out; and adds, that it is to be hoped, that the Charge here brought is groundless against many thousand Ministers, &c.

The Return made by Dr. Calamy in his Defence of Non-conformity, Part II. p. 100, 101, is this, that perhaps that might be a peculiar Favour, because I have it under the Hand of another worthy ejected Minister (who is since dead) that this was true in Fact; and that several Ministers, even in London, never read it before they gave their Assent and Consent; and that in Middlesex few Parishes had the Book, till a Week, Fortnight, three Weeks, or a Month after. But as for written Copies of the Amendments, they were so liable to Abuse and Mistakes, that 'tis dubious how far they might be safely depended on. And being he is so willing to suppose there might be a Mistake, I'll give him one of his own Church for a confirming Witness, viz. the worthy Author of the Conformity's Plea for the Nonconformists, who, Plea II. p. 55. be provided with the Books time enough to make their Conformity strictly agreeable to the Letter of the Law?

But we shall presently have the most glaring Evidence imaginable, even from the very Writings of the high-flying Prelates, that the Act was rather contriv'd to cut off the Member, than heal the Wound.

It was the Policy of the Court to carry Prerogative-Points, by the Assistance of the Ortodoxes, and to make use of the Sectaries, for obtaining an Indulgence to Papists.

Thus tho', in order to procure an Addition to his Revenue, the King had declar'd himself sufficiently prejudic'd against the Presbyterians, and determin'd to establish Uniformity, he was as much bent to dispense with the Law, as to pass it.

The first Proof of this which occurs, is the Grant which his Majesty thought himself authoriz'd to make of Letters Patent to the Walloons settled at Thorney in the Isle of Ely, to exercise their Protestant Religion and Discipline, in the French Tongue.

The dispensing Power, it seems, did not then appear so full of Terrors as afterwards; and even the Presbyterians thought it no Disgrace to their political Principles, to solicit the Exercise of it in their own Favour.

Thus we find a Body of their Ministers waiting upon his Majesty with a (z) Petition, requesting to be reliev'd from the Penalties of the Act, and to be continu'd in the Exercise of their Ministry, &c.

This Petition was presented to his Majesty Aug. 27, says Dr. Calamy, three Days after the Act took place, by Mr. Calamy, Dr. Manton, Dr. Bates, and others; and Mr. Calamy made a Speech upon the Occasion, intimating, that those of his Persuasion were ready to enter the List with any, for their Fidelity to his Majesty, and did little expect to be dealt with as they had been. And they were now come to his Majesty's Feet, as the last Application they should make, &c.

The next Day this Matter was fully debated in Council, his Majesty himself being present, who was pleas'd to declare, that he intended an Indulgence, if it were at all feasible. The great Friends of the silenced Ministers, who had encourag'd their Hopes by a Variety of specious Promises, were allow'd, upon this Occasion, freely to suggest their Reasons against putting the Act in Execution, and they argued very strenuously."

Thus far the Doctor. The Sequel shall be recounted in the Words of Bishop Parker, which, tho' abounding with all the Zeal the Church militant and Triumphant could inspire, give a more lively Idea of the Spirit of the Prelates of those Times, than all the Invectives of their Adversaries.

"When the King was in some measure mov'd with these Suggestions, says his Lordship, they at length, with Difficulty, obtain'd from him, that the Matter should be suspended for a little time; and therefore, whereas the Law ought to be in Force the next Sunday, they prevail'd to have the Council called but three Days before, for the effecting their Purpose, left, perhaps, any one should unseasonably step in before the Time to prevent their Designs; which yet unexpectedly happen'd, through the Prudence and Fortitude of one Man; namely, that great Prelate (a) Gilbert Sheldon, then Bishop of London, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. For the Council being held, he came of his own accord (for he was not yet called to the Privy Council) and pleaded for the Law, with that Sharpness of Wit, that copious Elegance, and that Weight of Reason, that he did not so much persuade as command the Assent of the King, the Duke, the Council, and all that were present, and almost even the Petitioners themselves to his Opinion. He told them, that the Suspension of the Law came almost too late; that, by the Command of that Law, he had ejected all who had not obey'd it in his Diocese the Sunday before; by which he had provok'd their Anger and Hatred, that if they were again restor'd, he should not live henceforward in a Society of Clergy, but in the Jaws of his Enemies; neither could he dare to contradict a Law, that was pass'd with so great Approbation of all good Men, so general a Consent of Parliament, and with so much Deliberation. And further, that if at that time so sacred a Law should be repealed, it son in his Farewell Sermon, that he was to be silenced by Law, for not subscribing and assenting to a Book which he had not seen. And he adds, that it was the Case of many more in that Diocese: And that Mr. B. of W. in the County of L. was ejected by Sir Edward Lake, altho' he gave that Reason, that the Book was not brought him before the 24th of August, nor before he was declar'd depriv'd by the Commissary.

(z) When I was absent, saith Mr. Baxter, after Bartholomew Day, Mr. Calamy and the other Ministers of London, who had Acquaintance at the Court, were put in hope that the King would grant that by way of Indulgence, which was before denied them (by the Act of Uniformity.) And that before the Act was pass'd it might be provided, that the King should have Power to dispense with such as deserved well of him in his Reformation, or whom he pleas'd: But that was frustrate. And after that they were told that the King had Power in himself to dispense in such Cases, as he did with the Dutch and French Churches. And some kind of Petition (I have not a Copy of it) they drew up to offer the King: But when they had done it, they were so far from procuring their Desires, that there fell abroad grievous Threatnings against them, that they should incur a Premiure for such a bold Attempt. When they were drawn to it at first, they did it with much Hesitancy (through former Experience) and they worded it to cau-ously, that it extended not to the Papists. Some of the Independents presumed to say, that the Reason why all our Addresses for Liberty had not succeed'd, was because we did not extend it to the Papists; and that, for their Parts, they saw no Reason why the Papists should not have Liberty to worship, as well as others; and that it was better for them to have it, than for all to go without it. But the Presbyterians fill'd against the Motion, that the King might himself do what he pleas'd; and if his Wisdom thought meet to give Liberty to the Papists, let the Papists petition for it, as they did for theirs: But if it be expected by any that it shall be forced upon them to become Petitioners for Liberty for the Papists, they should never do it, whatever be the Issue, nor shall it be said to be their Work.

Mr. Baxter puts in the Margin these Words: "If I should at length recite the Story of this Business, and what peremptory Promises they had, and how all was cur'd to their Rebuke and Scorn, it would more increase the Reader's Astonishment." Life of Baxter, fol. 4, lib. i. Part ii. p. 426.

(a) This Right Reverend Father in God, when the Lord Chamberlain Manchester told the King, at the Time the Act of Uniformity was under debate, That he was afraid the Terms of it were so rigid, that many of the Ministers would not comply with it, reply'd, I am afraid they will. Baxter's Fas. Sermon for Baxter.

A. D. 1662.

A. D. 1665. it would expose the Lawgivers to the Sport and Scorn of the Faction. And lastly, that the State and Church would never be free from Disorders and Disturbances, if factious Men could extort whatever they desir'd, by their Impudence and Importunity.

They that were present at the Council, being overcome by these and the like Reasons, did with great Alacrity and Earnestness consent to the immediate Execution of the Law. Whence it happily came to pass, that whereas there was but one Day to intervene between the Change of Counsel and the Event of the Matter, almost all the (b) Presbyterians, who feared no such thing, and on the contrary were joyfully secure, did on a sudden, almost in the Twinking of an Eye, perceive themselves defeated by one Stroke, and turn'd out of their Parishes, to their great Surprise and Astonishment.

By this seasonable Interposition, the Bishop freed the Church of England from these Plagues for many Years. For thus it happen'd luckily, happily, and prosperously, and indeed very providentially, that the Schismatics intangled themselves in their Schism by Covenant and Agreement, entering into a new Association; being deceived by the large Promises of the London Teachers, that they would not obey the Law, and thence imagining that they should defend themselves by their Multitude.

A. D. 1662. And whereas the Courtiers would have persuaded the King, that there would be Preachers wanted in the City of London upon that Sunday, the very prudent Bishop of that Diocese, who had computed the Number of the Faction, had ready at hand an equal Number of orthodox Divines, and those elegant and learned, who, at the Sign given, did, as it were, come out of Ambush, and take Possession of the Pulpits."

Thus, in this one Event, we are furnish'd with two signal Instances of the Self-Inconsistency of Parties. The Dissenters calling upon the King to exercise a dispensing Power; and a Bishop disputing the Will of his Sovereign, and contending for the Supremacy of the Law. Such a Loadstone is Interest!

Upon the Whole, Experience has shewn us, that a Toleration of many Modes of public Worship doth no essential Injury to That, which hath receiv'd the Sanction of the Legislature: And that those who strain at a Gnat, can, occasionally, swallow a Camel.

To take Leave for the present of the Ecclesiastical Part of our History, which rather excites Loathing than affords Entertainment, we are only to mention, that, soon after this mighty Change in Church-Affairs had been made, his Majesty thought fit to set Bounds to Preaching as well as Praying, by a mandatory (c) Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, accompany'd with Directions, specifying

(b) With respect to the Hardship of this Proceeding, the Author of the Full Answer to the By-Stander, makes the following Reflection:

They had been the Authors of the Precedent, non lex est jussum illa. They had pulled on the Covenant with a Fury unknown to former Ages; all their Assemblies of learned Divines, could not answer the Reasons given against it by the University of Oxford; and yet (such was their Piety) they imposed it on the Consciences of all the World, Consciences; perhaps, as tender as their own. They had turned out 7 or 8000 Church of England Divines, who were legally and justly possessed of their Livings and Preferments, to make Rooms for themselves, and whilst they were thriving with their Families, had fastened themselves for 19 Years together with their Spoils: And if that fatal Engine of theirs for subverting the Constitution, their darling Covenant; proved by Turn of Times the Occasion of their own being dispossessed of Benefices, into which it had been the Means of their Intrusion, serious and impartial Minds will not be so biased by their natural Compassion, as not to reflect, at the same Time, upon the Justice of Providence.

Thus far Mr. C. - who, I hope, will excuse me for observing, that this Reference of his to the Justice of Providence, may be made with as much Propriety by the Republicans as the Royalist. Nothing being more natural than for those who had the Presumption to think they were sure of having God for their Lord of Hosts, to cry out, Our Prayers are heard: The Wicked have fallen into their own Snare, &c. Or, to defend to common Sense, that they should call upon all future Ages to bear witness, that those were most instrumental in restoring Monarchy, were among the first, who felt the Weight of it.

(c) To the most Reverend Father in God William Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

CHARLES R.

"Most Reverend Father in God, we greet you well. Whereas the bold Affects and Extravagances of Preachers in the Pulpit, have not only, by the Experience of former Ages, been found to tend to the Dishonour of God, the Scandal of Religion, and the Disparagement of the Peace both of Church and State, but have also (through the Licentiousness of the late Times) much increased, to the inflaming, fomenting, and heightning of the said Dissensions and Contentions that were among us. And whereas even at this present (withstanding the merciful Providence of God, so signally manifested in restoring us to our Crown, and our pious Care and Endeavours to govern our Realm in Peace and Tranquillity) the said Abuses do yet continue in a very high Men-sure in sundry Parts of this Realm, through the busy Diligence of some unquiet and factious Spirits, who instead of preaching the pure Word of God, and building up the People in Faith and Holiness, have made it a great Part of their Business to beget in the Minds of their Hearers an evil Opinion of their Governours, by insinuating Fears and Jealousies, to dispose them to Discontent, and to sedition them with such unfound and dangerous Principles, as may lead them into Disobedience, Schism and Rebellion. And whereas also sundry young Divines and Ministers, either out of a Spirit of Contention and Contradiction, or in a vain Ostentation of their Learning, take upon them in their popular Sermons to handle the deep Points of God's eternal Councils and Decrees, or to meddle with the Affairs of State and Government, or to wrangle about Forms and Ceremonies, and other fruitless Disputes and Controversies, serving rather to amuse than profit the Hearers; which is done for the most Part and with the greatest Conscience, by such Persons as least understand them. We out of our princely Care and Zeal for the Honour of God, the Advancement of Piety, Peace, and true Religion, and for the preventing for the future, as much as lieth in us, the many and great Inconveniences and Mischiefs that will unavoidably ensue, if a timely Stop be not given to these and the like growing Abuses, do, according to the Examples of several of our Predecessors of blessed Memory, by these our special Letters, freightly charge and command you, to use your utmost Care and Diligence, that these Directions, which, upon long and various Consideration, we have thought good to give concerning Preachers, and which we have caused to be printed and herewith sent unto you, be from henceforth duly and strictly observed by all the Bishops within your Province. And to this End, our Will and Pleasure is, That you forthwith send them Copies of these our Directions, to be by them speedily communicated to every Parson, Vicar, Curate, Lecturer, and Minister in every Cathedral, Collegiate, and Parish Church within their several Dioceses: And that you earnestly require them to employ their utmost Endeavour for the due Observation of the same, whereof we shall expect a strict Account both of you, and every one of them: And these our Letters shall be your sufficient Warrant and Discharge in that Behalf.

Given at our Court at Whitehall the fourteenth Day of October, in the fourth Year of our Reign, 1662.

By his Majesty's Command, EDW. NICHOLAS."

The Directions were:

- I. Not to meddle with Matters of State.
- II. Not to spend their Time in speculative Notions.

A. D. 1662.

cifying what Points the Clergy should discontinue upon, and what they should forbear: Whence it became manifest, that the Mode of Religion, at least, was, to all Intents and Purposes, the Creature of the State.

While these (*) domestic Passages were in Progress, a very important Negotiation was carrying on between the Courts of England and France, relating to the Sale of Dunkirk; a Transaction which has made a great Noise in the World; and which all the Writers, who treat expressly of this Reign, have either very partially and defectively, or not fully, stated.

It appears, that neither (d) France nor Spain, at that time, had any Views about Dunkirk. England was safe and quiet in the Possession; nor could there have been a more agreeable Surprise to the King of France, than to receive an Overture for the Purchase: The first Motion came from the (e) Chancellor himself, which (f) Monsieur d'Esstrades has given to the Public, under that Minister's own Hand, inviting him to pass into England, that they might confer together upon some Matter of Importance. This first Letter is dated from Hampton-Court, June 29, 1662, sign'd Clarendon, and was follow'd by another, from the King himself, pressing the same Interview to settle an Affair that his Chancellor had propos'd to him, &c. Which is also accompanied by a third, of the same Date, July 27, 1662, repeating the same earnest Desire of a Conference, sign'd Clarendon. There seems to be no great Hasten on the Part of France to answer these pressing Instances from the King of England and his Minister: The French King's Letter, in which he permits Mr. d'Esstrades to comply with their Desire, bearing Date from St. Germain en Laye, not till August the 22d; expressing, however, at the same time great Impatience to know what his Brother of England has to propose to him; so little did he dream of any Proposal about Dunkirk. The Count, thus authoriz'd, comes over with full Power to treat, whatever the Subject might be; and this Matter of great Importance proves to be no less than an Offer of the Sale of Dunkirk.

Of the first Communication of this Affair to the King his Master, we have no Account: But, in his Dispatch of August 17, we are inform'd, that the King of England, and his Chancellor, had demanded Twelve Millions (of Livres) for that important Place, which, on account of the Sums it had cost, the Fortifications, Guns, Ammunition, &c. it was provided with, they insisted it was worth. That he, the Ambassador, had receiv'd the Proposal with so much Coldness, as threw them into the utmost Astonishment. That the Chancellor had confess'd, that the Project of this Treaty came from himself; that the Necessity of the King's Affairs had driven him to it, but should not compel him to make a bad Market; that he alone was in the Secret with the King and the Duke of York;

III. Not to treat of other Controversies with Bitterness or Railing.

IV. To instruct the younger sort in the Catechism of the Church; and to preach on catechetical Doctrines, and Moral Duties. The Afternoon's Exercise in explaining the Catechism, &c. The Minister to read the Prayers himself, with Gravity, Diligence, and Devotion. To shorten the Sermon rather than the Prayers.

V. To read over the Canons in Force once a Year, and the Articles twice.

VI. The Bishops only to license Preachers.

VII. Better Observance of the Lord's Day.

(*) About this Time died William Lenthall, Esq; who had been Speaker of the great Parliament. His Death-Bed Confession was soon after publish'd, with the Attestation of one Dr. Dickson, his Physician, who added to it a very observable Passage, which, says he, I had from Mr. Lenthall's own Mouth in his last Sickness; which was, That General Monk did assure King Charles II. that had it not been for Mr. Lenthall's secret Conscience and Assistance, he could not have brought about the Restoration. Ken. Reg. p. 762.

(d) As with regard to the first of those Powers, it manifest by a Letter from his most Christian Majesty, dated March 4, to Mr. d'Esstrades, in which are these remarkable Words: "You may tell the King of England that what is known here of the Money of Hoovers the 200,000 Crowns, before spoken of came from himself, who has not been very careful to keep the Secret. This was purely the Cause of all the senseless Noise made in Paris, which, I doubtless must have reach'd London, that I am treating for Dunkirk with the said King, for a Sum of Money, in order to exchange it with the King of Spain for Cambray, Aire and St. Omer. You know better than any Man, whether I had ever such a Thought."

(e) The Countrey is unfairly affirm'd by Cole, Etchard, Bacon, &c. whose Words it will not be improper to quote. "Scandalous and false, in Opposition to all this, that the King should keep it; for considering the Naval Power of England, it could not be taken. He knew that though France spoke big, as if they would break with England unless that was deliver'd up, yet they were far from the Thoughts of it. He had consider'd the Place well, and he was sure it could never be taken, as long as England was Master of the Sea. The holding it would keep both France and Spain in a Dependence upon the King. But he was singular in that Opinion; so it was sold: And all the Money that was paid for it, was immediately squander'd away among the Misbegotten Creatures." BURNET'S Hist. of his own Times. vol. 1. p. 173.

"The Earl of Clarendon said, he understood not these Matters, but appeal'd to Monk's Judgment, who did positively advise the letting it go for the Sum that France offer'd. To make the Business go the easier, the King promis'd, that he would lay out all the Money in the Tower, and that it should not be touch'd, but upon extraordinary Occasions.

Many Reasons were arg'd for the parting with this important Place; and the first Motive to the King, as I am assur'd by a knowing Man, was the great Expence in the keeping of it, which Katharine the Governor had increas'd to an exorbitant Degree, since the Diminution of Sir Edward Hoby. And the Earl of Sandwich particularly alleg'd to his Majesty, That the Coast was generally so tempestuous, and the Grounds so revolting upon every Storm, that there would never remain a certain Storeage to that Port. These and other Reasons being alleg'd in Council, tho' oppos'd by Chancellor Clarendon, and Treasurer Southampton, the King was content to deliver up the Town and Port of Dunkirk, with all the Ordnance and Ammunition, for the Sum of five hundred thousand Pounds Sterling; one half to be paid down, and the other in a short time after. Several Books were written in Vindication of this Sale, shewing how useless the Place was to England, unless Millions of Money were expended upon it; and at this Time we do not find many Complaints against either him, or the Parliament: But when the ill Effects of both began afterwards to appear, as the increasing Power of France, and the frequent want of Hire, great Overtures were made, and Chancellor was unreasonably charg'd with the Scandal of such a sale, when he was really free from the Guilt, or rather the Fortune of either." Ecc. p. 801.

"Yet here I take leave, so well as I can, to vindicate the Memory of my Lord Chancellor Hoby, from an Assertion, that he was the Author of the giving up Dunkirk to the French; I was assur'd by a certain Person (though a Confident of my Lord Chancellor) that he was so far from advising the King to give up Dunkirk to the French, that only he and my Lord Treasurer Southampton upon whose Honour my Lord Chancellor rely'd more than any other) of all the Council, enter'd their Protestations against it. The Truth of this may be resolv'd by inspecting the Privy-Council Books." [No such Thing appears upon the Council Book.] COKE'S Detection, Vol. II. p. 107.

It deserves some Notice that the Earl of Rocheſter, in the Vindication of his Father, passes over this Affair of Dunkirk. (f) Of whole Letters the late Lord Loughborough affirms, That a greater Authority cannot be.

Dunkirk; that he was still to manage General Monk, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Sandwich, whom he could not hope to gain over, without urging the great Profit and Advantage to arise from it to the King himself; for that, upon intimating to them that the Necessities of the State might be thus relieved, they had propos'd an Expedient for keeping the Place without putting the King to the Expence of it; which was to put it under the immediate Authority of the Parliament, who would charge themselves with the whole Burthen of it, and yet leave the King the Master: That, if this Expedient was accepted, there could never more be any such Treaty for the Sale of it; for the carrying on of which there was no more Time, than till the Meeting of the Parliament, who would never listen to the least Proposal of this Nature: And that he did not mention the Offers of Spain, because the King had rejected them, in order to unite himself yet more closely with his most Christian Majesty, with whom also he thought his Interests were the best establish'd.

In a second Letter, dated Aug. 21. 1662, we are inform'd, that whatever had lately pass'd in the three Conferences, he (Mr. d'Esstrades) had held with the King and the Chancellor, had been since communicated to the Duke of York, General Monk, Lord Treasurer, and Earl of Sandwich; and that they had, all together, had two Conferences upon it;— since which, the Chancellor had sent for him by his Servant Mr. Bealing, to tell him, That nothing but Necessity could induce the King his Master to part with Dunkirk; that he could treat with the Spaniards, who would offer any thing for that Place; or, secondly, with Holland, who would, no doubt, give an immense Sum for it; or even, thirdly, put it into the Hands of the Parliament:— But that they had rather come to an Agreement with his most Christian Majesty;— yet not for a less Sum,—left he, the Chancellor, should fall under the Censure of Parliament, and be in danger of losing his Head; and therefore, rather than depart from their first Demand, he should think it better to make a Present of it to his most Christian Majesty, and depend upon a Return from his Liberality:— But that he was not Master; that having so deep a Concern in this delicate Affair, it behov'd him to conceal his real Sentiments, and to seem of the Opinion of others, that he might not be understood to be the principal Promoter of it: That the most pressing Reason he could use to bring them into his Measures was to shew, what Service the Sale would be to their Master, by enabling him to discharge the Debts which he had incur'd by keeping it: But that the Little that was offer'd for it invalidated even that Reason, and dispos'd them to think, that France either did not desire the Possession of Dunkirk, or too much undervalued it.

The Chancellor then reduced the Price to Seven Millions, to shew how much the King his Master was dispos'd to agree with his most Christian Majesty; and added, that all he had been able to obtain of the Lord Treasurer and the rest, was their Consent to this Reduction.

Mr. d'Esstrades then proceeds with the Detail of his own Artifices to lower the Market, by depreciating the Value of the Commodity; and, towards the Close of his Letter, adds,

"The Chancellor having been oblig'd to communicate this Affair to many Persons, it has given Rise to such Reports and Conjectures, both in Court and City, concerning my Business here, as have induced me to believe, that it is of Consequence to hasten the Issue, if we desire it to be successful."

In Answer to this, his most Christian Majesty is pleas'd to direct, that, if the Court of England persisted in the Demand of Seven Millions, Mr. d'Esstrades was to take his Leave, in order to proceed to Holland without Delay; first making his Acknowledgments both to the King and the Chancellor; and assuring the last, most expressly, of his Benevolence and Protection, upon every Incident that can arise.

In another Place, he says,

"It was a Misfortune, that the Chancellor was oblig'd to communicate the Affair to General Monk, the Lord High Treasurer, and the Earl of Sandwich, but he supposes a Necessity for it, that their Concurrence, if it could be obtain'd, might, in all Events, be a Screen for himself." &c.

It appears likewise in the same Letter, that the Earl of Sandwich had propos'd the Demolition of Dunkirk, preferably to the Sale; and his Majesty frankly declares to his Minister, with an Injunction however to keep the Secret, that he had rather the Place were in the Hands of the Spaniards, or the Dutch, or even demolish'd, as the Lord Sandwich had propos'd, than that it should remain in the Hands of the English, &c.

The whole Negotiation lasted till towards the End of October; and, in the Course of it, all the Artifices and Refinements, which constitute a Politician, were practis'd on both Sides. At last, however, mutual Interest produc'd mutual Concessions. The French wanted to buy, and the English to sell; one receded from their peremptory Demand of Seven Millions, and the other came up to Five: And here the Bargain was struck; one Half was to be paid down, and the other at two several Payments.

The Letter of Mr. d'Esstrades to the King his Master, on closing this memorable Treaty, so very particularly explains the Motives which gave Rise to it, and points out the Person principally concern'd in it, as also the Parties and Cabals, which then divided the English Court, as well as the Passions and Resentments of the People, that we cannot forbear making use of its Authority. It began thus:

London, October 27, 1662.

"At last, after abundance of Delays and Difficulties which are now removed, I have signed the Treaty of Dunkirk, and send

A. D. 1662.

“ send it to you Majesty by this Express. I “ must not forget to observe, That the Chan- “ cellor is the Man who has suffer'd most of “ any body, in the Disputes which were “ rais'd by all the Council upon this Affair.
 “ The Commissioners are the very Persons “ who have labour'd most to break it off;
 “ and one must own that the Reasons al-“ ledg'd for it were so strong, that the King “ of England and the Duke of York would “ have been shaken by them, if he (the “ Chancellor) had not taken care to keep “ them up to their first Resolution.

“ This has appear'd so plain to the whole “ Court, that occasion has been taken from “ thence to fall upon him as the sole Author “ of the Treaty. His Enemies and the Spa- “ nish Party proclaim loudly——That as he “ committed an egregious Blunder with re“ gard to the Portugal Match, in having “ made it without being first assur'd of the “ Protection of France, so he had been guilty
 “ of as great an Imprudence on this Occa“ sion; in that he was giving up Dunkirk
 “ without being assur'd of the strict Union “ which he pretended this Treaty would “ produce with your Majesty, who, when “ you saw yourself Master of the Place, “ without any Stipulation of particular Ad“ vantages to England, might only think “ yourself oblig'd to such Civilities as might “ embark you in nothing. That as nothing
 “ but his private Interest had engag'd him
 “ in the Marriage, to be reveng'd of the ill “ Treatment he had receiv'd from the Spa- “ niards, and out of Fear of being supplanted
 “ by their Party; so the single Considera“ tion and Interest he had in being sup“ ported by France, made him forget the “ true Interests of the King his Master, and “ sacrifice for it a Place, which was of more “ Consequence for the Reputation of Eng- “ land, and for its Consideration with regard “ to Foreigners, than the whole Kingdom
 “ of Ireland, &c.”

In another Place it proceeds thus:

“ I ought ever to acknowledge, that their “ manner of treating has been the frankest
 “ I ever knew; nor do I believe that His“ tory can shew a Precedent of a Treaty for “ five Millions, or even a much less Sum;
 “ wherein a Prince, but newly established
 “ in his Throne, whose Authority was feeble
 “ and held in Partnership with a Parlia“ ment, contented himself with the bare “ Word of another.

“ This extraordinary Proceeding makes “ me believe the King of England is resolv'd
 “ at any rate to have your Majesty's Friend“ ship: That the Chancellor puts him upon “ it for his own private Interest; and that “ this is the main Reason why the Duke of “ York meets your Majesty at Dunkirk, to “ give you the strongest Assurances of it. I “ fancy too that the Chancellor will send by “ him some Advices which may be of ser“ vice to any Designs you may form in time “ upon Flanders; so that you ought not to “ be discouraged by the latencies of the Sea“ son from coming thither, as you have re“ solv'd.” &c.

Again:

“ Mr. Rutherford, [made Governor of “ Dunkirk, in the room of Sir Ed. Harley]
 “ is here; to whom the King of England
 “ has given Orders for the withdrawing of “ two English Regiments from Dunkirk, “ which began to murmur, on the Report
 “ of the Treaty.”

Again, towards the (g) Conclusion:

“ After the Treaty was sign'd, the Chan- “ cellor gave me to understand, that the “ Cry, both at Court and among the Peo“ ple, was become louder than ever, that “ your Majesty would forget the Passion the “ King of England had shewn to oblige you,
 “ as soon as you were in Possession of Dun- “ kirk; which had already excited Clam“ ours against him: That he had been “ assur'd, he could expect no Support, nei“ ther from the Parliament nor the People,
 “ in case that Affair should produce any “ Disturbance in the Nation; and that, as he “ was more concern'd than any body in it,
 “ he should incur the most Censure; and,
 “ perhaps, first of all from the King his “ Master: That, in order to be made easy
 “ on that Head, he should be infinitely ob“ lig'd to your Majesty, if you would signify
 “ by Letter, your gracious Sense of the ob“ liging Manner in which you have been “ us'd, and, at the same time, make him
 “ some civil Offers, against all the trouble“ some Consequences likely to arise from “ his Concern therein; which, tho' they “ bind you to nothing, will produce a very “ good Effect. If your Majesty should be
 “ of this Opinion, and think proper to send “ such a (b) Letter by the Return of the “ Courier, I foresee the King of England “ will reap great Advantages from it, and “ the Chancellor find a Support against his “ Cabals, which are forming against him.
 “ He has, this Morning, farther inform'd
 “ me, that the greatest Part of the Mer“ chants of London have been at Whiteball,
 “ to complain of this Treaty, which is now
 “ public; and among the Grievances, which “ they affect to apprehend from it, the prin“ cipal is, That Dunkirk will from hence“ forth become a Nest of Heretics; and that “ their Commerce will thereby be ruin'd.
 “ To which the King reply'd, That he had “ treated with a Prince who was both his “ Kinsman and his friend, who would “ think it his own Interest to keep a good “ Correspondence, in every Point, both with “ him and his Subjects; and that he could “ assure them, their Fears were without “ Foundation.”

How

(g) In this Letter also, Bealing, a Servant of the Chancellor's, who had officiated as Interpreter, between him and Mr. d'Esbrades, during this Negotiation, was recommended to the King, for some Mark of his Royal Bounty, which, as we find by his most Christian Majesty's Answer, was afterwards bestow'd upon him.

(b) Such a Letter was actually sent by the Return of the Courier.

A. D. 1662.

How this Affair was consider'd at (i) home, may be gather'd from the following Paragraphs, which contain the Reasons for, and Objections against it:

The Reasons pleaded for it, were, I. The great Charge of maintaining the Garrison of Dunkirk, and the little Benefit arising from it. II. The Jealousy of some Part of the Parliament, that so near a Garrison might help to the raising of a Standing Army. III. The great Occasions the King had for Money; greater than he could hope for by the ordinary Supplies in Parliament. IV. The ill Understanding between the Crowns of England and Spain; and the latter demanding the Surrender of Jamaica, Dunkirk, and Tangier. V. The King's own Inclination to oblige his Brother of France, and to court his rising Power. VI. Some added by way of Surmise, tho' without the least Authority, that by secret Articles at the Pyrenean Treaty, King Charles in his great Exigencies at that Time, had promised to give up Jamaica to the Spaniards, and Dunkirk to the French, upon Condition of their joint Assistance towards the Recovery of his Kingdoms. VII. The King inclining to sell the Place, could have no other Purchaser but the French King; for by a former Treaty with Portugal, he was obliged not to part with it to Spain; and Holland had no Money for it.

The Objections, on the other Hand, were these; I. The French had set their Hearts upon this Purchase; and, upon the first taking of the Place from the Spaniards, Mazarine would have cheated Cromwell of his Bargain for it, if Cromwell had not threaten'd to demand the Keys of Dunkirk at the Gates of Paris: And therefore a Place of such Importance to the French should not have been easily surrendered to them. II. A much greater Price should have been taken for it; the first Demand was more reasonable, ten Millions; to fall so low as five Millions, was too great an Abatement; especially when most believed that the French King would have given the first Sum, if insisted on. III. Not only the Town, Citadel, and Forts were sold at that low Rate, but all the Artillery and Ammunition of War, Magazines, and Stores were thrown into the Bargain, which were thought equivalent to the whole Purchase Money; so that the Town cost them nothing. IV. The Purchase Money should have been paid before the Surrender of the Estate, or at least a Mortgage of the Premises for it; whereas the Town was given up, before any Part of the Money was paid in; and there appear'd no real Security for it. V. It was thought enough for the King to give Possession, and renounce his Claim and Title to it; whereas he was now oblig'd to defend it for two Years against Spain; nay, and to help to retake it, if seiz'd within that Time; which Preparations of War might have cost more, than the whole Purchase Money; and, in such Case, the Foot of the Account must have been, Dunkirk given away for nothing. VI. The Payment should have been made in London, and the Money brought to the Seller; whereas the first and all following Payments were agreed to be made at Dunkirk, when in the Hands of the French. VII. The English Merchants and other British Subjects were not suffered to carry away with them any Corn, or other Provisions and Ammunitions of War, but were oblig'd to sell them at the Market Price, i. e. What the new Tenants of the Purchaser would please to give them. VIII. That no Liberty of the Protestant Religion was reserv'd to those of the English Subjects who would there remain.

It is remarkable, that, neither in this Treaty, nor in the Affair of the 200,000 Crowns, before spoken of, the Queen-Mother was consulted: And we are expressly told by Mr. d'Esbrades, that (k) an Intrigue was purposely fram'd to baffle her Suspicions, and

(i) And how abroad, may be gathered from the following Quotations:

As for the Purchase Money paid by France for Dunkirk, tho' Mr. le Clerc quotes an Author of undoubted Credit (the Abbot Desmarais) I shall add, that there was a Medal struck upon that Occasion in France, and the same is plac'd among the great Events of the French King's Reign. I forget the Motto of the Medal. The Book which I saw, belong'd to a Person truly noble. I was inform'd, it was presented by the French King to a foreign Minister at his Court. It is the Histoire de Louis the Fourth, by way of Medals, and come down to the Year 1700. The Book is full of the gross Flattery and Vanity. What it says about the Sale of Dunkirk, is perhaps one of the truest Things in it. I remember it boasts, that their august Monarch got Possession of one of the strongest Fortresses in the World at the cheap Price of five Millions of Livres. Advertisement prepar'd to the Translation of Clarendon's History.

The said Abbot Desmarais, likewise, writes as follows: Whilst the Affairs of the (he speaks of the Duke of Crey) Expedition) were thus managing without Success, the King had concluded a very important one with the King of England, which was what he had in View, when, in his Letter written in Cypher of the 15th of September, he told the Duke of Crey, That one Reason which made him the more desirous to have Things accommodated, was the Fear, lest his Quarrel with Rome might cross the Measures he was taking for Designs of quite another Consideration. He had got out of the Hands of the English, for five Millions of Livres (prompt Payment) Dunkirk, Mardick, and the Port of Burgoe, which the Conjunction of the Times had formerly oblig'd him to deliver up to them: And thereby (besides the Advantage of sending away the English, who might in a Tide throw ten Thousand Men into the Kingdom, and of removing this Prospect from the Hugonot Party, and such a Refuge from all Sorts of Malecontents, and of acquiring a considerable Port on a Coast, (where France had not properly any) he advantageously repair'd the Damage, which the Benefit of a Peace had, as it were, forc'd him to do at that Time to Religion.

There is not, perhaps, any Example, that one State did ever gain from another, without a War, a Place so important; so, that five Millions of Livres should be paid down on the Nail all at once; [this was not true.] And yet, perhaps, these were not the most remarkable Circumstances of that Acquisition. The Count d'Esbrades, who had managed the Treaty in England, where he was Ambassador, and afterwards Marschal of France, had stipulated that the Payment should not be made, till the Day after the Evacuation of the Places; and for the Security of the same, he offer'd to remain in Hostage, and to procure to be sent into England such other Hostages as should be desired. But the King of England declared, He would take none, and that he would the Word of the most Christian King more than all the Hostages in the World. The Treaty was afterwards punctually and faithfully executed on both Sides. The Court of Rome would, perhaps, at another Time, have given Signs of Joy, to see a Place of that Consequence returned into the Hands of a Catholic Prince; but as Angels then flood, the two Courts being fallen out, they looked upon that Acquisition, as it was, advantageous to France, and consequently receiv'd the News not without some sort of Disaffection.

(k) Viz. It was first given out, That Mr. d'Esbrades had

and put her on a wrong Scent: For, as she was the Chancellor's bitter Enemy, he dreaded above all things, that she should have any Reason to conclude it was first propos'd by him.

It is remarkable, that the (1) Treaty had two Preambles: In that sign'd by the French, it is said, "The King of Great Britain, being desirous more and more to increase the Friendship already contracted with his most Christian Majesty, has thought himself oblig'd to give Ear to the Proposals made to him by France." In that sign'd by the English, it is said, "His most Christian Majesty thought himself oblig'd to give Ear to the Proposals made to him, on his Part, by England." And to this his Majesty of France makes no Difficulty to consent, "provided, says he, in his Letter to Mr. d'Esprades, dated Oct. 30, 1662, you preserve your Rank, as I make no doubt you will, in being nam'd before the Commissioners of England."

But what is most remarkable of all, is, that the Chancellor had no sooner drawn upon himself the Odium and Repentment of his Fellow-Subjects, by advising this impolitic Measure, in order to establish his Credit with the King, but (m) Sir Edward Nicholas, his fast Friend, was oblig'd to resign the Secretary's Office to (n) Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington; his known Enemy, a conceal'd Papist, and who ow'd his Preferment to the Interest and Intrigues of that Party.

Till this time, the Chancellor must be consider'd as the First Mover at Court, and therefore answerable, in the general, for the Direction of the Machine: But now, that latent Interest, which had only obstructed his Measures hitherto, began to over-rule them; and he found himself frequently under a Necessity to follow those, whom he had us'd to lead.

As the whole Nation was at this Period in a high Ferment, on account of the Sale of Dunkirk; and so large a Body as the Presbyterians then were, thought themselves particularly injur'd by the Act of Uniformity; it is possible the Republicans might imagine the Crisis favourable to their Designs, and that those, who had the most Zeal and least Knowledge, might fall into such Discourses as had a Tendency to alarm the Government. Alarm'd the Government certainly were; but whether upon good Grounds, or only from their own Fears, will best appear from the following Facts.

It was not till November, that the Talk of an Insurrection began first to prevail; and tho' the Reform had taken place in all Corporations, and all the strong Towns, which had refus'd to admit the King in the late Civil Wars, were dismantled, so strongly did the Court and Church Pannic operate upon this Occasion, that the Disaffected were every where seized, and in many Places the Country was up in Arms, as if the Enemy had already taken the Field: And yet Sir Henry Bennet, writing to the Duke of Ormond, on the (o) 23<sup>d</sup> of that Month, concerning the Demands of Money, which his Grace had made for compounding the Debts of Ireland, only takes Occasion to say, "The little Reserve his Majesty hath kept out of the Sale of Dunkirk, being not to be touch'd for a less Occasion, than an Insurrection here at home, which the foolish and discontented People are apt every Day to threaten and apprehend."

But, tho' Threats on one hand, and Credulity on the other, were all the Secretary had as yet to complain of; by the Beginning of December, a full-grown Conspiracy was discover'd: The principal Agents in it were detected and seiz'd; and such full and satisfactory Evidence against them arose, that they were brought to their (p) Trial on the

been sent for, in order to induce him to prevail with the King his Master, to send a Sum of Money to her Son. The Chancellor was then to tell the Queen, as if in Confidence, that he was much deceiv'd, if that Minister would not demand some Place by way of Pledge for the Money, as had been formerly done by England, in the like Case, &c. All which was done, says Mr. d'Esprades, that her Majesty might be led to believe, in case the Treaty came to a Conclusion, that she was in the Secret, and that the Money could be had on no other Terms.

How then can it be said, that there is good Reason to think, the Queen Mother, when she came over into England, was charg'd with this Affair of Dunkirk, as well as the Portugal Match? Or, that the Chancellor, in this Point, acted ministerially, that is to say, obey'd what he did not approve? See Additions to Bayle, vol. vi. p. 357.

(1) A Brief of this Treaty is as follows:

Dunkirk, in the Condition it now is, to be put into the Hands of his most Christian Majesty, for the Sum of seven Millions of Livres; two Millions to be paid on the Place, two Millions to be supp'd for England, and the other three Millions to be paid in two Years following at Dunkirk. The King of England to warrant the Place for two Years against the King of Spain. And if it should be taken by Spain, the King of England to furnish a Fleet for the retaking of it. And the English Commissioners by name to be Guarantees of this Treaty.

(m) It appears, by the Articles prefer'd by the Earl of Bristol against the Chancellor, and other Authorities, that he had receiv'd by way of Commutation.

October 17, 1662.

"Yesterday the Chevalier Bennet was declared Secretary of State: The King of England has commanded him to visit the Chancellor, and to live well with him; but I believe there will be a very indifferent Friendship between these two Persons. I will explain to your Majesty all the Intrigues of this Court, when I shall have the Honour to see you, &c."

In a Paper published by Authority, at this Time, the following Article was insert'd:

His Majesty, being sensible of the eminent Merit of that ancient and faithful Servant of the Crown, Sir Edward Nicholas, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State, and how his great Age and last Sickness had impair'd his Health and Strength, that his Majesty excus'd those Floods of Business which daily break in upon so great an Officer, would tire out his Spirits, and make his Employment far less comfortable than it had been formerly, was therefore (in Consideration of his many great Services and former Sufferings for his Loyalty to the Crown) graciously pleas'd to grant him leave to retire and enjoy some Rest from the Pressure of so walking in his Office. And though his Majesty well knows the Value of a Bravery of England, and is unwilling to increase the Penury, yet as an eternal Mark of the Loyalty and Integrity of so many deserving and ancient a Servant, freely offer'd to make him a Baron; but Sir Edward Nicholas (according to his wonted Candour and Modesty) after he had most humbly render'd his Thanks, besought his Majesty therein to spare him.

(o) Notwithstanding which the Raising was to have been made, as was given out, upon All-Saints Eve, which is the last of October.

(p) The following Minutes of which have been preserv'd by Bishop Kennet, out of the Trial print by Hill the Informer:

The Indictment set forth, that the Prisoners not weighing the Duty of their Allegiance, &c. did compass and imagine

Eleventh, at the Old Bailey; where they were charg'd with no less a Design, than to surprize the Tower, and Windsor Castle, to secure and depose the King, and restore the Commonwealth; all which mighty Things were to be perform'd by Six of the meanest of the People, unaided and uncounsell'd, either by the Grandees at home, or any Sovereign State abroad.

It is remarkable, that the whole Six were brought to the Bar together, and lump'd in the same Indictment: That the two principal Witnesses (q) Hill and Riggs, had been made use of, as Decoy-Ducks, to inveigle the imagine the Death of the King, the Subversion of the Government, &c. And to that End, they, together with other Eminent Traitors, did on the thirty-first of October last, at the Parish and Ward of St. Michael's Cornhill, London, assemble, consult, and agree to depose the King, and alter the Government, and to surprize the King's Person, his Palace of Whitehall, &c. against the King's Peace, his Crown, and Dignity.

Mr. William Hill deposed, that all Interests were agreed in this Matter. First-monarchy-men, Anabaptists, Independents, and Fighting Quakers, and the Congregational Churches were consenting, and were resolv'd to endeavour their Deliverance from their Adversities at Whitehall, — by surprizing Windsor Castle, — taking the Tower of London, — and preparing Arms and Men under Ladlow, Commander in Chief, by Direction of a Council of Six, of which Council Colonel Dawson, Phillips, Nye the Minister, Lachier, and one Cole, were five, &c.

Edward Riggs deposed to the like Effect, and that he had heard of a Design of surprizing the King at Cambray, when he was come from Hampden-Court to see the Queen-Mother at Greenwich.

Mr. Bradley and Mr. Tjler swore to the like Purpose; and that at several Meetings it was debated and thought Expedient, that the old Parliament should be chosen again, i. e. so many of them as had approved themselves faithful from first to last to a Commonwealth Interest, especially in the Times of Debarthens; that none should be capable of electing or being elected, but such as had so approved themselves: Provided that this intended Parliament should have no Power in Things of an Ecclesiastical Nature, to impose any thing upon the Conscience of the People: And that it should be High-Treason to assist the Interest of a King, House of Lords, or a single Person.

And it was much urg'd, that there should be an uniting of all Interests, viz. Quakers, First-monarchy-men, Anabaptists, Independents, Presbyterians, and Levellers; and at one Consult, every one oblig'd themselves to fee what Interest he could make among the Presbyterians, because they look'd upon them as the Persons who had most Money and Strength. — And that the Risings were intended in several Counties of England, while they were in dread of a Massacre by the Papists on All Saints-Eve.

To the last Point, Sir William Morrice and Sir Henry Bourn, Secretaries of State, deposed, that they had received Letters from several Counties, that a Report was spread about, that the Protestants were to have their Throats cut by the Papists on such a Day, and that these Rumours were in order to incite People to join with the Dissatisfied.

Sir John Talbot deposed, that these Reports occasion'd great Disturbance in Warwickshire and Worcestershire. And Mr. Hodges and Sir John Wald deposed, that the same Reports were in Derbyshire and at Shrewsbury, and that several Persons were taken up about it.

Sir John Maynard observed, about five thousand Letters were to be dispersed through the Nation, to possess the People that the Papists would about that Time massacre the Protestants, which was done, says he, to raise a Fear and Discontent in the Nation, to induce them to join in the Design, which was to kill the King and alter the Government.

Part of the Letter was as follows:

S I R,

" Out of the Respect which I bear to you in particular, and to the Protestant Party in general, I give you Notice of this Passage. About a Fortnight since, a Woman, which you must be ignorant of, had it from a Correspondent to the Papists, that they intend to make use of their Army (which all the World sees they have provided) against us on Evil next. It was thought good therefore, as a present way as may be, to give Notice to our Friends in remote Parts, that they may do what Piety to God, Loyalty to their Prince, Love to their Country, and Self-Preservation shall direct them.

" Sir, I call the eternal God to witness, that 'tis not to betray, to put a Trick upon you, but a sober Truth, and also communicated to a Justice of Peace, and by him to the Privy-Council, &c."

The Prisoners, in their Defence, denied that they had been engaged in any formed Design against the Government: They said they had heard indeed some such Discourses as had been mention'd, but they heard them only as common News, and had no ill Intention: And that Hill and Riggs, two of the Witnesses had confes'd themselves guilty of the Crimes they charg'd on them, and therefore they supposed they were not competent Witnesses against them.

The Lord Chief Justice having directed the Jury, they withdrew, and within an Hour brought in their Verdict, that Tague, Phillips, Stables, Sellers, and Gibbs were guilty, who being set to the Bar with Hind (who confes'd the Fact, and would not abide his Trial) the Chief Justice proceeded to pronounce Sentence against them as Traitors.

Note, In this case it was resolv'd by all the Judges 1. That the Meeting together of Persons, and consulting to depose the King, was itself an Overt-Act, to prove the compassing of the King's Death.

II. Resolv'd, That where a Person, knowing of the Design, does meet with them, and hear them discourse of their traitorous Designs, tho' he say or do nothing, this is High-Treason in that Party, for it is more than a bare Concomitant, which is a Misprision, because it sheweth his liking and approving of their Design, &c.

III. It was resolv'd, that some of those Persons who are equally culpable with the rest, may be made use of as Witnesses against their Fellows, and they are lawful Witnesses within the Statutes of 1 Ed. VI. c. 5, 6 Ed. VI. c. 11. and 1 Mar. I. c. 5. Kelph's Reports, fol. p. 17.

Ladlow's Account of this Affair, is as follows:

" In the mean time the English Court knowing themselves to be fallen under the Hatred and Contempt of the People for their Cruelty, Immorality and Corruptions, aggravated by the late Sale of Dunbarton, resolved by the Conspiration of a Plot to disarm their Enemies, and provide for their present Safety. To this End, by the Means of General Broun and others, Money was advanced and Arms put into the Hands of some Persons, among whom one Bradley, who had formerly belonged to Cromwell, was the Principal, that by giving small Sums to indigent Officers of the late Army, and by having the Arms they had ready, they might engage them and others in this pretended Design. An Account of this Plot was printed and published, affirming, That divers thousand of ill-affected Persons were ready, under my Command, to seize the Tower and the City of London; then to march directly to Whitehall, in order to kill the King and Munk, with a Resolution to give no Quarter to any that opposed to them; and after that to declare for a Commonwealth. By this means one Burley, who had been of the Guard to Cromwell, and since the disbanding of the Army, had been reduced to grind Knives for a poor Living, having received half a Crown from Bradley, and promised his Assistance when there should be Occasion, was executed with some others for this Conspiracy. However, this served the Court for a Pretence to seize five or six hundred Persons; to disarm all those they suspected; to require those they had taken to give Bonds of 200 l. each, not to take up Arms against the King, and to increase the standing Guards. They were not ashamed also to give out, that their Messengers had been so near to seize my Person, that they had taken my Cloak and Slippers, and committed two Gentlemen to the Tower for accompanying me, as they said, to the Sea-Side, in order to my escape; tho' at the same time they know full well where I was, that they had employed Instruments to procure me to be assassinated in Switzerland, which was discovered to a Merchant of Lausanne by a Person of Quality living in these Parts, who had refused ten thousand Crowns offer'd to him on the Part of the Dutchess of Orleans (it should have been Sister to his Gracious Majesty, if he would undertake that Province."

The General further adds, That " The Earl of Artrim, an Irish Papist, and one who had been concern'd among the first in the Rebellion of that Country, having been seized at London, as I mention'd before, and afterwards sent Prisoner to Ireland, was ordered, by a Letter under the King's Hand and Seal, to be clear'd and set at Liberty, charging the Guilt of that Rebellion upon his Father, and affirming in the said Letter, That the Earl of Artrim had not done any thing, without Warrant and Authority from the King his Father; tho' it was well known, that he had his Head and Hands deeply and early engag'd in that bloody Work. Thus the Mask was openly taken off, in confidence, that a People depriv'd of their Leaders, dispers'd by the late Executions, and aw'd by a compulsory and compulsory House of Commons, would not be able to shew their Reluctance."

(q) These Things (the Particulars of the Plot) being freely imparted to him (Hill) by one or more of the said Fanatics, knowing that he and his Father had been Villains in the Time of Urrupation, he secretly betray'd all to the said Sir Richard Brown. Whereupon the said Sir Richard putting the rest; and that Two of the Six, viz. Phillips and Hind, who confess'd themselves guilty, were pardon'd.

The Trials and Executions of these Offenders were scarce over, but the King was advis'd to publish a (r) Declaration, which was calculated, at once to remove the false and malicious Scandals, which, it is said, had been fix'd upon his Government, and likewise to pave the Way for a general Indulgence.

These false and malicious Scandals are said to be of Four Sorts; which, in the said Declaration, are thus exemplify'd:

"The First, by suggesting unto them, That, having attained our Ends, in re-establiſhing our Regal Authority, and gaining the Power into our own Hands, by a specious Condeſcenſion to a general Act of Indemnity, we intend nothing leſs than the Obſervation of it; but, on the contrary, by degrees to ſubject the Perſons and Eſtates of all ſuch who ſtood in need of that Law to future Revenge, and to give them up to the Spoil of thoſe, who had loſt their Fortunes in our Service.

"Secondly, That, upon Pretence of Plots and Practices againſt us, we intend to introduce a military Way of Government in this Kingdom.

"Thirdly, That having made uſe of ſuch ſolemn Promiſes from Breda, and in ſeveral Declarations ſince, of Eaſe and Liberty to tender Conſciences, inſtead of performing any Part of them, we have added ſtreighter Fetters than ever, and new Rocks of Scandal to the Scrupulous, by the Act of Uniformity.

"Fourthly and laſtly, we find it as artiſially as maliciously divulged throughout the whole Kingdom, That, at the ſame time we deny a fitting Liberty to thoſe other Sects of our Subjects, whole Conſciences will not allow them to conform to the Religion eſtabliſhed by Law, we are highly indulgent to Papiſts, not only in exempting them from the Penalties of the Law, but even to ſuch a Degree of Countenance and Encouragement, as may even endanger the Proteſtant Religion."

Thiſe his Majesty calls wicked and malicious Suggeltions; and thence takes Occaſion to declare, 1. That, as the paſſing the Act of Indemnity was owing to the Clemency of his Nature; ſo he engag'd, upon the Word of a King, that he would never decline from the religious Obſervance of it. 2. As to the introducing a military Power, his Majesty took notice of the Neceſſity of having ſufficient Guards, from the Uſe of them in Vener's Caſe: That indeed, by the Advice of Council, merely upon Motives of public Safety, thoſe Guards had been increaſed.

"But, the Reaſons of ſuch Precautions once ceaſing, we are very free, ſaith his Majesty, that, what Guards ſoever may be found neceſſary for us to continue, as in former Times, for the Dignity and Honour of our Crown, the ſole Strength and Security we ſhall ever conſide in, ſhall be the Hearts and Affections of our Subjects, increaſed and confirmed to us by our gracious and ſteady Manner of Government, according to the ancient and known Laws of the Land; there being not any one of our Subjects, who doth more from his Heart abhor than we ourſelves, all Sort of military and arbitrary Rule.

"As for the Third, concerning the Non-performance of our Promiſes, we remember well the very Words of thoſe from Breda, viz. We declare a Liberty to tender Conſciences, &c.

"We remember well the Confirmations we have made of them ſince, upon ſeveral Occaſions, in Parliament; and, as all theſe things are ſtill freſh in our Memory, ſo are we ſtill firm in the Reſolution of performing them to the full. But it muſt not be wonder'd at (ſince that Parliament, to which thoſe Promiſes were made, in relation to an Act, never thought fit to offer us any for that Purpose) that being ſo zealous as we are (and by the Grace of God ſhall ever be) for the Maintenance of the true Proteſtant Religion, finding it ſo ſhaken (not to ſay overthrow) as we did, we ſhould give its Eſtabliſhment the putting him into a Way of getting more Intelligence, which he accordingly did, draw'd them on till almoſt the Time they were to riſe and be in Arms, Wood's Ath. Oxon. vol. ii. c. 291.

This Hill, as we are told by the ſame Author, was the Son of a Committee-Man, who had provided him a Parſonage, which was the Right of another Man; out of which being ejected at the Reſtauration, he was put to his Shifts. Afterwards, for a Reward of his Loyalty, he had a conſiderable Benefice beſtow'd upon him in Glouceſhire; but being hated by one Party for his Faſtneſs, and by another for his Faſtiousneſs, did enjoy it but few Years.

"On the 26th of December 1662, the King ſent forth a general Declaration, expreſſing his Purpoſe to grant ſome Indulgence, or Liberty in Religion, with other Matters, not excluding the Papiſts, many of whom had deſerved ſo well. When this came out, the ejected Miniſters began to think more conſiderably of ſome Indulgence to themſelves: Mr. Nye alſo, and ſome others of the Independents, were encouraged to go to the King; and, when they came back, told us, that he was now reſolv'd to give them Liberty. On the 2d of January, Mr. Nye came to me, to treat about our owning the King's Declaration, by returning him Thanks for it; and I perceiv'd, that it was deſign'd that we muſt be the Deſires or Promoters of it: But I told him my Reſolutions to meddle no more in ſuch Matters, having incurred already ſo much Hatred and Diſpleaſure, by endeavouring Unity: And the reſt of the Miniſters alſo had enough of it, and reſolv'd that they would not meddle: So that Mr. Nye and his Brethren thought it paſſing long of us, that they muſt'd of their intended Liberty. But all were averr'd to have any thing to do with the Indulgence or Toleration of the Papiſts; thinking it at leaſt unſit for them.

The Independent Brethren alſo told me, That the Lord Chancellor had told them, that their Liberty was motion'd before, when the King's Declaration came out; and that we ſpoke againſt it, even I by Name. But when I told them what Words I ſpoke (before reſolv'd) they had no more to ſay. But now they grew great Enemies to the E. of B. [Briſtol] a Papiſt, thinking that the King's Declaration was procur'd by him, and that he and the Papiſts muſt be the Means (for their own Ends) to procure this Liberty: But the Declaration took root at all with the Parliament or People."

"Such was the Policy of the Court, that they (the Non-conformiſts) muſt either be cruſh'd by their Fellow Proteſtants, to the ſtrengthening of the Romish Interests; or if favour'd with any Convivance, they muſt have the Papiſts Partners with them, that ſo the Proteſtant Interests might be that Way weakened. This was a great Hardſhip, that attended their Circumſtances: But it was altogether their Unhappineſs, and very remote from being their Choice, and therefore no Matter of juſt Reflection. Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Life, 8vo. p. 305.

the Precedency before Matters of Indulgence to Dissenters from it. But that once done, (as we hope it is sufficiently by the Bill of Uniformity) we are glad to lay hold on this Occasion to renew, unto all our Subjects concerned in those Promises of Indulgence by a true Tenderness of Conscience, this Assurance:

"That, as in the first place we have been zealous to settle the Uniformity of the Church of England, in Discipline, Ceremony, and Government, and shall ever constantly maintain it;

"So, as for what concerns the Penalties upon those who (living peaceably) do not conform thereunto, thro' Scruple, and Tenderness of misguided Conscience, we shall make it our special Care, so far as in us lies, without invading the Freedom of Parliament, to incline their Wisdom, at this next approaching Sessions, to concur with us in the making some such Act for that Purpose, as may enable us to exercise, with a more universal Satisfaction, that Power of Dispensing, which we conceive to be inherent in us.

"In the last place, as to that most pernicious and injurious Scandal, so artificially spread and fomented, of our Favour to Papists; as it is but a Repetition of the same detestable Arts, by which all the late Calamities have been brought upon this Kingdom in the Time of our Royal Father of blessed Memory, We conceive all our Subjects should be sufficiently prepar'd against that Poison, by Memory of those Disasters. 'Tis true, that as we shall always, according to Justice, retain, so we think it may become us to avow to the World, the due Sense we have of the greatest Part of our Roman-Catholic Subjects of this Kingdom, having deserved well from our Royal Father of blessed Memory, and from us, and even from the Protestant Religion itself, in adhering to us with their Lives and Fortunes, for the Maintenance of our Crown in the Religion establish'd, against those, who, under the Name of zealous Protestants, employ'd both Fire and Sword to overthrow them both: We shall wish as much Freedom profess'd unto the World, that it is not in our Intent, to exclude our Roman-Catholic Subjects, who have so demeaned themselves, from all Share in the Benefit of such an Act, as, in pursuance of our Promises, the Wisdom of our Parliament should think fit to offer unto us for the Ease of tender Consciences. It might appear no less than Injustice, that those who deserved well, and continued to do so, should be denied some Part of that Mercy, which we have oblig'd ourself to afford to ten times the Number of such who have not done so."

(*) It was politely hinted, That if they should presume to hope for a Toleration of their Profession, or Priests should take the Boldness to appear and show themselves, they should quickly find, his Majesty knew as well to be severe, as indulgent.

(†) About this Time the following very remarkable Piece was published under the whimsical Title of N<sup>o</sup>. VIII.

A. D. 1663.

"We cannot forbear hinting here unto our good Subjects four Particulars, wherein we think to give them the most important Marks of our Care. First, in punishing by severe Laws that Licentiousness and Impiety; which, since the Dissolution of Government, we find, to our great Grief, hath overpread the Nation.

"Secondly, As well by sumptuary Laws; as by our own Example of Frugality, to restrain the Excess in Mens Expences, which is grown so general, and so exorbitant, beyond all Bounds, either of their Qualities or Fortunes.

"Thirdly, So to perfect what we have already industriously begun, in the retrenching of all our own ordinary and extraordinary Charges in Navy, Garrisons, Household, and all their Dependants, as to bring them within the Compass of our settled Revenue, that thereby our Subjects may have little Cause to apprehend our frequent pressing them for new Affluences.

"And lastly, So to improve the good Consequences of these three Particulars to the Advancement of Trade, that all our Subjects finding (as well as other Nations envying) the Advantage this hath of them in that prime Foundation of Plenty, they may all, with Minds happily compos'd by our Clemency and Indulgence (instead of taking up Thoughts of deserting their Professions, or transplanting) apply themselves comfortably, and with redoubled Industry, to their several Vocations, in such Manner, as the private Interest of every one in particular may encourage him to contribute cheerfully to the general Prosperity."

If the Republicans and Fanatics from Principle, and the Presbyterians thro' Repentment, were before the only Malecontents in the Kingdom, even the Royalists themselves now became liable to be rank'd under the same Denomination: For seeing this Postern thus unexpectedly set open to those, whom they had taken such a Variety of Precautions to exclude, they began to apprehend their Idol was in Danger, and made no Scruple to oppose the King, in order to preserve the Church. They were taught to believe, that this Declaration flow'd from the Advice of the Papists, and in particular the Earl of Bristol, who was at their Head: And, as it may be presum'd, they were spirited up against this favourite Measure of the Court, by the Chancellor, it is scarce to be wonder'd, that the public Attention was so much engross'd by this Controversy, that the Sale of Dunkirk seems to have been already, in a manner, forgot.

(‡) Feb. 18, the Parliament met for the Third time, and the King, in his Speech, neither made any Mention of that delicate Affair, nor dropp'd the least Hint in relation to a Supply; on the contrary, all he said tended ers more Dangerous than all, Blind Zeal and Golly Ignorance, Oh, may they never enter your Assemblies, nor defile your Councils; may they never come near your Habitations.

Like Cain they slay their Brother in the Field, because Abel's Deeds are more righteous. The Instruments of Cruelty are in their Habitations: Like Simon and Levi, they enter the City boldly and murder all the Males whom they had never profelyted in their Communion.

Persecution is their High Priest. Slanders and Imprisonments and Perjuries, are their Mercies. O! the Mercies of the Wicked are cruel.

Fly, fly from their Tents, O noble Senators. Let them never taint the Nobility and Gentry of England. Take first an Antidote against the Poison you are warn'd of; and you all know him that made it, to have been a wife Man; The wife Solomon. Believe his Prognostic; He that troubleth his own House shall inherit the Wind. And take the Prognostic of a wife than Solomon, who is King of Kings; That a Hoop or Kingdom divided against itself, cannot stand. But if you bite and devour one another, take heed you be not consumed one of another.

What is the End of Strife? And why should wife Men attempt Impossibleities? The Angel Uriel presents a pertinent Moral in the Parable of Woods and Waters. The Forest would make War with the Seas to make Room for the Trees, and the Seas with the Forest to enlarge the vast Dominions of their Waves. But the Fire consumed the Woods, and numerous Sands withstood the Waters; and both their Attempts were vain.

Your Honours are yet in Peace, God be praised; yet every Man hath not forgotten the late War. The French Councillor (President Gouin) was not mad when he told the King, Il Valoit mieux avoir une paix ou il y avoit Deux Religions, qu'une Guerre ou il ny en avoit point. [It is better to have Peace with two Religions, than a War with none.]

The Lord deliver us from the Tyrant that measured all Men by his own Bed; and from such Fools as will make every Man as wise as themselves; or, from wife Men that will convert by Club Law, and convince Men with the unanswerable Arguments of Saintsfield or Sturme. This will hardly come within the compass of, Do as you would be done by.

An illiterate Priest, in his Passage by Sea from Amiana to Yenic, with a Yew in the same Bark, would profelyte the Yew, whether he would or no: And when he could not form him with his Legion of Saints, resolv'd, (as the Spaniards did to the Indians) to baptize him perforce, by throwing him over-board; at which time it had been no hard Matter to have pronounced the Sacramental Words of Baptism, and afterwards a Dirge for his Soul, and so enable him to take, or go to, Heaven by Violence. But the obstinate Jew doted on Moses and the World too well, to be so converted; so that being stronger of the two, he had almost man fluss him with Moses Law the same way: endeavouring to do to the Priest as he had thought to have done to him. What might not the Zeal of this Priest have done, had he had but as much Power as Zeal?

My Lord High Chancellor hit the Bird in the Eye, when he found out the Cause of all our Distempers to arise from the Clergy; which the Parliament also reflected on, and the King's Council in some of their late Pleasings. For they that should be the Messengers of the Gospel of Peace, have too too often used the Pulpit as a Drum, and lifted up their Voice as a Trumpet of War. And some Histories have recorded the Tribe of Levi for the grand Incendiaries of the World. Fire and Sword being the chief Instruments of their legal Sacrifice; yet to woud they them as not to enter into the Judgment-Hall for fear of defiling, nor put any Man to Death; they said it was not lawful. But if Pilate would not Crucify their own King to satisfy (not their Reason) but their Tantal and Malice, they cried out, He was none of Caesar's Friends; they would lay Treason to his Charge.

The Gospel of Peace is not proclaimed by Cannon Law with Drum and Trumpet. The way to save Men is not to beat nor kill them; the way to make them believe as they believe, is not to deprive them of the Use of Sense, Reason and Conscience. Balaam's Ass will rise up in Judgment against such Bible-hil'd Preachers, such Wood and Iron Men; for he convinced his Master by Reason, whilst the Malice of the Prophet used all his Force to cudgel his Ass to go on, to both their Destructions. They that will live in Peace must suffer others to live in Peace also. How like an Angel of God did our King speak, when his Majesty profel his singular Moderation by a Parable,

Why should I be angry with another Man for eating Veal, because I love Mutton?

The 27th of July, 1660, p. 2. His Majesty was pleased to acknowledge, that he owed his being there to God's Blessing upon the Intentions and Resolutions he then express'd to have at Breda. And the Lord Chancellor, Sept. 13, 1660, notes how Gravins laments the violent Contentions in the Debates of Christian Religion, whilst every one pretends to all the Marks of the true Church, except that which is inseparable from it, Charity to one another.

How do these Speeches call Shame upon some late Transgressions? Do not the Prisons cry out? Do not many faithful Subjects flink in Holes and Corners, for no other Cause, but because they are so?

When my Lord High Chancellor mentions the Whirlwind that blew those out of the World, that counted Bishops; that they might be out of Capacity of doing more mischief; he adds an Exception; unless we practice their Vices, and do that ourselves, which we pretend to detest from.

It is not fit for me to turn Informer to your Honours. You have Argus's Eyes, and Briarion's Hands.

All Animosities of Subjects point at his Majesty. The Peculiarities of one Sort against another, contracts the Royal Interest, if it incline to either Party, and makes it extantive; and when 'tis so, the Balance overturns.

The Body Politic suffers Pain when Members are out of joint, when Servants ride on horseback, and Princes go on foot; when private Spirits are in public Places, and public in private; when the Unlearned preach, and the Learned are bid to hold their tongues.

I would not neglect nor provoke any Party to try their Strength. A Captain of all Beggars, Knaves and Fools, might soon be formidable to greater Kings, especially when they can lay claim to Salus Populi and Liberty of Conscience, which, when Cromwell had principled his Soldiers with, he bodied he never lost a Battle after. Liberty of Conscience is a Weapon of many Points and one Handle, which when Magistrates let go, he that first catches hold of it unites all Interests against that single One that is oppos'd, and cuts all Oaths and human Obligations in Pieces.

'Tis as possible to contract a wife Man into the Capacity of a Fool, as to sublime a Fool into the Understanding of a wife Man. And as in a multitude of Councillors there is Safety, so in a Hubub of Fools there is nothing but Danger and Confusion.

Charity mistakes, trust no greatness Cruelty, and misgrounded Love, to mortal Hatred. When they cannot judge, they'll kill.

I would have no Plea for Liberty of Sin; for to the Sword of the Magistrate would be lance in vain, and there were an End of all Human Society. But if your Honours grant Liberty of Conscience, you yourselves know what you give.

The King hath summoned you for his Grand Council. It concerns your Honours to epouise the King's Interest, not to be King of this or that Party, but to be King of all. It concerns your Honours to take in all Interests of the People; for you are not supposed a Representative of some of his Majesty's Subjects, but of all.

If Parliaments should thus flatter his Majesty's Interest and their own into the Mirage of Single Parties, might not his Majesty find it as necessary, to have (so to many Parliaments as Kingdoms) but as many Parliaments as Religions, and as Professions? And would not Parliaments in time grow a Grievance? and the People find it more convenient to cast themselves at his Majesty's Feet, desiring him to do with them what he pleased, rather than bind up his Majesty by a Law to that which the Goodness of his own Nature, and Greatness of his Office would else never incline to, but abhor?

I do but reason the Case. None will be angry with Reason, unless he be angry that God made him a Man; but your Honours are call'd to greater Things. Be as large as your Trust, expansive as Heaven over all; and if your Honours think good to meddle with Matters of Religion, do somewhat worthy his Majesty, and great a Senate, to amaze the World; to awaken all the (like the Leff Trump) from the Lethargy of Lazarus; and bid the Deadness of spiritual Ignorance: Do that, which never yet was attempted!

Call a univocal Assembly; not Birds of a Feather! we have had too much of that already. An Assembly of Turks, would make us all Turks. An Assembly of Isidors, all Isidors. — It leaves all Men distressed, and injures all but themselves, not having heard all Parties. Quicquid iudicis (parta) iudicabitur; equum licet iudicet, Iniquis censeat op.

— Nor can they benefit themselves beyond their own low Principles; and so return, not better informed, but more hardened in Unbelief; self-will'd, self-concerned, and thereby necessitated to stir up such Magistrates as they can allure and delude to their Party, to maintain and promote that by the Sword, which they could not do by Reason, or Divine Authority.

Call therefore a free and universal Assembly (by what Name your Wisdoms shall best like of.) All that will come, let them come, and drink of the Waters of Life freely: For all Men have some Reason, no Man all. So may you translate the Proverb of, Asking Councils is as of Babel; and Men ember, in which you may see I am willing to set Bounds to the Hopes of some, and to the Fears of others; of which when you shall have examin'd well the Grounds, I doubt not but I shall have your Concurrence therein. The Truth is, I am in my Nature an Enemy to all Severity for Religion and Conscience, how mistaken soever it be, when it extends to capital and sanguinary Punishments, which I am told were begun in Papist Times.

But let me explain myself, lest some mistake me herein, as I hear they did in my Declaration: I am far from meaning by this a Toleration, or qualifying them thereby to hold any Offices or Places in the Government; nay further, I desire some Laws may be made to hinder the Growth and Progress of their Doctrines. I hope you have all good an Opinion of my Zeal for the Protestant Religion, as I need not tell you I will not yield to any therein, not to the Bishops themselves, nor in my liking the Uniformity of it, as it is now establish'd; which, being the Standard of our Religion, must be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from all other Mixtures: And yet, if the Dissenters will demean themselves peaceably and modestly under the Government, I could heartily wish I had such a Power of Indulgence, to use upon Occasions, as might not needlessly force them out of the Kingdom, or staying here, give them Cause to conspire against the Peace of it."

But, on this Head, they were deaf to the Voice of the Charmer. The Cry of Popery was gone forth, and that Spirit was now rais'd, which no Counter-Spell could ever lay, while either of the two Royal Brothers sat upon the Throne.

This Spirit first appear'd in the House of Commons; where an (u) Address was present'd will come from far, to hear Wisdom as of Solomon. Newly will invite some, Ambition others, Fear many, and Truth all. And all the World will own themselves oblig'd to his Majesty and this Parliament for so universal and so good a Design.

Truth seeks no Coroners. Truth cannot be afraid of Falshood; nor will she be brib'd by any Mahomet, nor equivocate for the Pope; she will not be partial for Luther, nor subscribe to Calvin. Episcopacy and Presbytery may safely appeal, the will do them both Right and Wrong.

My Lords and Gentlemen. You have heard the Mind of God, you have heard the Mind of legals, you have heard the Mind of Kings and good Men; and you have in print his Majesty's Gracious Speech, recorded by my Lord High Chancellor, for Peace and Liberty.

God and the King have seated you in the supreme Place of Judicature of this Nation. You are among the Gods. The Scripture saith also, you are Gods. You judge for God. Be so; do so. Do not die like Men. Give forth your Sentence freely as Gods: For it is not Government can establish Righteousness; but Righteousness establisheth the Throne of Government. [Out of the Harleian Collection.]

[1] Which was founded upon the following previous Resolutions:

Resolved, upon the Question, semice contradietis,

That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to the King's Majesty, for his Condescension in the Observation of the Act of Indemnity.

That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to the King's Majesty, for his Profession against introducing a Government by a military Power.

That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to his Majesty for his gracious Invitation to this House to prepare some Laws against Licentiousness and Impiety; and also to provide sumptuous Laws, and Laws for the Advance of Trade, and for his Majesty's gracious Expressions to retrench the Charge and Expenses of his own Family.

That it be presented to the King's Majesty as the humble Advice of this House, That no Indulgence be granted to the Dissenters from the Act of Uniformity.

That a Committee be appointed to collect and bring in the Reasons of this House for this Vote upon the present Debate, to be presented to his Majesty; and that the nominating of the Committee be adjourn'd till to-morrow Morning.

Resolved, That, in the Case of the said Resolves it be added, That this House will assist his Majesty with their Lives and Fortunes.

The Address itself was as follows:

"It is with extreme Unwillingness and Reluctancy of Heart, that we are brought to differ from any thing which your Majesty has thought fit to propose: And tho' we do no way doubt, but that the unreasonable Dissemblers of Men's Spirits, and the many Scandals and Conspiracies which were carried on, during the late Intervals of Parliament, did necessarily incline your Majesty to endeavour by your Declaration to give some Ally to those ill Humour, till the Parliament assembled; and the Hopes of Indulgence, if the Parliament should consent to it; especially seeing the Pretenders to this Indulgence did seem to make some Title to it, by virtue of your Majesty's Declaration from Breda: Nevertheless, we your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, who are now return'd to serve in Parliament, from those several Parts and Places of your Kingdom, for which we are chosen, do humbly offer to your Majesty's great Wisdom, That it is in no sort advisable that there be any Indulgence to such Persons, who presume to dissent from the Act of Uniformity, and the Religion established. For these Reasons: We have considered the Nature of your Majesty's Declaration from Breda, and are humbly of Opinion, That your Majesty ought not to be prevail'd with it any further; 1. Because it is not a Promise in it itself, but only a gracious Declaration of your Majesty's Intentions, to do what in you lay, and what a Parliament should advise your Majesty to do; and no such Advice was ever given or thought fit to be offered; nor would it be otherwise understood, because there were Laws of Uniformity then in being, which could not be dispens'd with, but by Act of Parliament. 2. That you do pretend a Right to that supposed Promise, put the Right into the Hands of their Representatives, whom they chose to serve for them in this Parliament, who have rais'd, and your Majesty consented to, the Act of Uniformity: If any shall presume to say, That a Right to the Benefit of this Declaration doth still remain after this Act passed. 3. It tends to dissolve the very Bonds of Government, and to suppose a Disability in your Majesty and the Houses of Parliament, to make a Law contrary to any Part of your Majesty's Declaration, tho' both Houses should advise your Majesty to it.

We have also consider'd the Nature of the Indulgence propos'd, with reference to those Consequences which must necessarily attend it. 1. It will establish Schisms by a Law, and make the whole Government of the Church precarious, and the Centres of it of no Moment or Consideration at all. 2. It will no way become the Gravity or Wisdom of a Parliament to pass a Law at one Session for Uniformity, and at the next Session [the Reason of Uniformity consisting still the same] to pass another Law to frustrate or weaken the Execution of it. 3. It will expose your Majesty to the restless Importunity of every Sect or Opinion, and of every single Person also, who shall presume to dissent from the Church of England. 4. It will be a cause of increasing Sects and Scandalous, whose Numbers will weaken the true Protestant Profession so far, that it will at last be difficult for it to defend itself against them: And, which is yet farther considerable, those Numbers, which by being troublesome to the Government, and those can arrive to an Indulgence, will, as their Numbers increase, be yet more troublesome, that so at length they may arrive to a general Toleration, which your Majesty hath declared against; and in time, some prevalent Sect will at last contend for an Establishment; which, for ought can be foreseen, may end in Popery. 5. It is a thing altogether without Precedent, and it will take away all means of convicting Recusants, and be inconsistent with the Method and Proceedings of the Laws of England. Lastly, It is humbly conceiv'd, that the Indulgence propos'd will be so far from tending to the Peace of the Kingdom, that it is rather likely to occasion great Disturbance: And on the contrary, That the asserting of the Laws, and the Religion established, according to the par'd and agreed to, which very clearly intimated, that they were of a very different Opinion from his Majesty, with respect to the dispensing Power, and that he was never likely to be authoris'd by them to grant an Indulgence upon any Occasion, nor to any Sect whatever.

Representation of both Houses.

This Address was follow'd with a joint Representation of both Houses, in which they express'd their Apprehensions of the Growth of Popery, from the great Refort of Jesuits and Popish Priests into this Kingdom; and became humble Suitors to his Majesty, for a Proclamation to command all Jesuits, and all English, Irish and Scots Popish Priests, and all such other Priests as had taken Orders from the See of Rome, or by Authority thereof, except such (v) FOREIGN Priests, as by Contract of Marriage were to attend the two Queens, or by the Law of Nations to attend foreign Ministers, to depart the Kingdom by a certain Day, or undergo the Penalties of the Laws.

The King's two Answers.

To this the King was pleas'd to return Two Answers; one by Word of Mouth, and one in Writing. In the first, having said, "It may be, the general Jealousy of the Nation hath made this Address necessary." He adds, "I confess, My Lords, and Gentlemen, I have heard of one Jealousy, which I will never forgive the Authors of; That I was offended with the Parliament to that Degree, that I intended to dissolve it." And again, to the Commons, "I am willing to take this Occasion to give you my particular Thanks, for your great Kindness in taking hold upon an easy Intimation, rather than an Invitation, from me, to enter upon the Consideration of my Revenue. It was kindly done, and I shall never forget it."

In the written one, he declares himself to be not a little troubled, that his Lenity and Condescensions towards many of the Popish Persuasion (which were but natural Effects of his Generosity and Good-nature, after having liv'd so many Years in the Dominions of Roman-Catholic Princes; and out of a just Memory of what many of them had done and suffer'd in the Service of his Royal Father of blessed Memory, and of some eminent Services perform'd by others of them, towards his Majesty himself in the time of his greatest Affliction) have been made so ill Use of, and so ill deserv'd, that the Refort of Jesuits and Priests into this Kingdom hath been thereby increas'd: with which his Majesty is, and hath long been, highly offended. And therefore his Majesty readily concurs with the Advice of his two Houses of Parliament; and hath given Order for the preparing and issuing out such a Proclamation, as is desired.

And now the Door being again shut upon the Nonconformists, the House resum'd the Consideration of the Revenue, which, notwithstanding the Addition, granted last Session, the Money arising from the Sale of Dunkirk, and the 200,000 Crowns receiv'd from France, for the Portugal Service, was still found (w) wanting. But the Business mov'd

The Revenue again taken into Consideration.

All of Uniformity, is the most probable means to produce a settled Peace and Obedience throughout your Kingdom: Because the Variety of Professions in Religion, when openly indulg'd, doth directly distinguish Men into Parties, and withal gives them Opportunity to count their Numbers; which, considering the Animosities that out of a religious Pride will be kept on Foot by the several Factions, doth tend directly and inevitably to open Disturbance. Nor can your Majesty have any Security, that the Doctrine or Worship of the several Factions, which are all govern'd by a several Rule, shall be consistent with the Peace of your Kingdom. And if any Person shall presume to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, we do in all Humility declare,

That we will for ever, and on all Occasions, be ready with our utmost Endeavours and Assistance to adhere to, and serve your Majesty, according to our bounden Duty and Allegiance."

In his Answer to this Address the King signified, That he had been much misanderstood.

(r) Such a Proclamation was accordingly published; only the Word Foreign, was omitted, where the Queens were left at Liberty to protect all those Priests of his Majesty's Subjects, which the Parliament design'd to banish. This came them out of Humour. Life of James the first Duke of Ormond, by T. Carte, A. M. p. 271.

mov'd heavily. The Attempt upon the Uniformity Bill, the placing Sir Henry Bennet a (suspected Papist) in the Secretary's Office, and the removing the Earl of Middleton, in Scotland, in order to make Room for the Earl of Rothes, who was govern'd in all things by Lauderdale, a known Presbyterian, had put the House out of Humour. They desir'd the King to make no Grant nor Contract, with relation to the Post-office, till they should have inspected the same; that no Impositions should be laid, or continu'd in Scotland or Ireland, on the woollen or other Manufactures of England, to discourage the Vent of them; that he would recal his Proclamation, which forbid the Exportation of Geldings; that no Consuls should be any where appointed, but at the Desire of the Merchants, nor unless supported at their Expence; and that he would issue his Proclamation for the punctual and effectual Execution and Observance of the Act of Navigation, without any Dispensation or Contrivance whatever; and to recal such Dispensations as had been already granted, &c.

They likewise resolv'd, That the undue Execution of the Commissions issued for the Discovery of Lands gained from the Sea, was a Grievance; and that his Majesty be humbly (x) desir'd to forbear to pass any farther Grants upon the Commissions so unduly executed.

The King's Affection to Parliaments did not arise from the Pleasur he took in hearing their Complaints. It was then no more a Secret than it is at present, that the giving Money was abundantly the most acceptable of all their Services: In order therefore to give the Session its proper Bias, the King summon'd his Friends, the Commons, to the Banqueting-house, where, after a great many sweetening Expressions, by way of Introduction, he came to the Point as follows:

"You cannot take it amiss (you shall see as much Freedom with me) that I tell you, there hath not appear'd that Warmth in you of late, in the Consideration of my Revenue, as I expected, as well from some of your Messages, as my own Confidence in your

Care and Kindness. It hath been said to myself, that it is usual for the Parliament to give the Crown extraordinary Supplies, upon emergent Occasions; but not to improve the constant Revenue of the Crown. I wish, and so do you, that nothing had lately been done in and by Parliaments, but what is usual: But, if ill Parliaments contrive the Ruin and Disinheritance of the Crown, God forbid but good Parliaments should repair it, how unusual soever it is. If you yourselves had not, in an extraordinary Manner, improv'd my Revenue, the Government could not have been supported; and if it be not yet improv'd to the Proportion you have design'd, I cannot doubt but you will proceed in it with your old Alacrity. I am very well contented that you proceed in your Inspection; I know it will be to my Advantage, and that you will neither find my Receipts so great, nor my Expences so exorbitant, as you imagine: And for an Evidence of the last, I will give you an Account of the Issues of the Twelve hundred thousand Pounds you so liberally gave me; one Penny whereof was not dispos'd, but upon full Deliberation with myself, and by my own Order, and, I think you will all say, for the public Service. But, Gentlemen, this Inquisition cannot be finish'd in the short time we can now conveniently stay together: And yet if you do not provide, before we part, for the better paying and collecting what you have already given me, you can hardly presume what it will amount to. I must deal plainly with you (and I do but discharge my Conscience in that Plainness) if you do not, besides the improving my Revenue in the Manner I have recommended to you, give me some present Supply of Money to enable me to struggle with those Difficulties I am press'd with, I shall have a very melancholic Summer, and shall much apprehend the public Quiet.

You have heard, I presume, of the late (y) Design in Ireland, for the Surprize of the Castle of Dublin, which was spread all over that Kingdom, and many Parliament-Men were engag'd in it. There is an absolute Necessity that I forthwith send over a (z) Sum

(x) His Majesty's Answer was as follows:

CHARLES II.

"His Majesty believes, that all Commissions which have been used since his Return, for Discovery of Lands gained from the Sea, have been well deliberated upon by the Ministers of the Revenue, and that the same are issued out regularly; but if there has been any Irregularity or Mischarge in the Execution thereof, his Majesty is well content, that all such, who have been guilty of the same, should be strictly prosecuted, and severely punished. And as his Majesty doth not believe, that many, if any, Grants have been pass'd by his Majesty upon such Commissions, in the Consideration whereof, his Majesty hath taken some Pains, and heard any Persons who have objected against the same, to be well not pass any such Grants, but upon very good Deliberation, and Assurance from his his Council at Law, that such Grants are very Legal.

(y) Of all the Plots of these Times, this seems to deserve the most Credit, as being supported with the most clear, explicit, and concurring Evidence. It took its rise from the Discontents which arose in that Kingdom, as well from the Act of Uniformity, as from the Decisions of the Commissioners, who were appointed by the King, to execute the Act of Settlement; and who were thought to favor too much Invoice to the Claimants, who were Irish Papists, and too much Prejudice against the Possessors, who were English Protestants, tho' not all after the Mode of the Church of England. See a circumstantial Account of this intricate Affair, in the Life of James the first Duke of Ormond, by Thomas Carte, M. A.

(z) However embarrass'd the King is here pleas'd to represent his Circumstances to be, we find the following Passage in a Letter from Mr. Secretary Bennet, to the Duke of Ormond, dated June 27, 1663, which likewise serves to confirm that Passage of B. Burnet's, before quoted, which says, that all the Money arising from the Sale was immediately squander'd on the Mistress's Creatures.

"His Majesty, at a Meeting Yesterday at my Lord Treasurer's, declar'd his Intention to take out of his retir'd Money in the Tower 60000*l*. and to send it presently to you in specie, if you shall think fit: to that, by the next, very contrary to my Desires. I do pray heartily, that the Effect of this Day's Conversation may be the renewing of our Confidence in each other, and raising our joint Reputation, which will be our strongest Security, with God's Blessing, the Kingdom can have for its Peace, Plenty, and full Prosperity: And, upon my Word, you shall have great Comfort in what you shall do for me, upon this very earnest and hearty Recommendation."

Fair Words, in this Reign, appear to have had the same Effect, that more weighty Considerations have produced since. The Commons had no sooner given Ear to this inveigling Discourse, than they open'd their Purse, tho' not so liberally as before, and gratify'd his Majesty with Four Subsidies, for his present Supply: They likewise prepar'd an Act for the better Ordering and Collecting the Duty of Excise, and preventing the Abuses therein; a second, for the Recovery of the Arrears of Excise; and a third, for the better Ordering and Collecting the Hearth-Money Duty. They likewise yet farther strengthen'd his Majesty's Hands with respect to the (b) Militia, subject however to the following wholesome Restriction, That any Troop, Company, or Soldiers, may be kept upon Duty Fourteen Days, and no longer, in any one Year; and they oblig'd all Scholar-Vestrymen to make and subscribe the Declaration and Acknowledgment enjoin'd in the (c) Act of Uniformity: They likewise made their Court to the presumptive Heir, by complimenting him with the Entail of the Post-Office, and Wine-Licenses, and thereby rendering him independent of his Brother: And what was most of all to their Honour, they set themselves in earnest to improve Tillage, promote Industry, and extend Commerce. But tho' they were on a right Pursuit, they sometimes mis'd their Way. In particular, the Clause, in the Bill for the Encouragement of Trade, which prohibited the Importation of Cattle from Ireland, was inexorable; for it was equally selfish, oppressive, and impolitic; selfish, in that it arose from a Notion, that the Introduction of Irish Cattle lower'd the Price of their own; oppressive, in that it reduc'd the Inhabitants of that Kingdom to the most calamitous Condition, by foreclosing their only Market for their only Wealth; and impolitic, since it destroy'd the Spring of all the Commerce between the two Nations: For, without the Profits upon their Cattle, the Irish could not supply themselves with the Manufactures of England.

While these Things were transacting in one House, the Cabal against the Chancellor, which consisted of the Queen Mother, the favourite Milzels (Cleveland), the Earl of Bristol, and (d) probably of Secretary Bennet, came to a Resolution to attack him openly in the other. No doubt the Motive was their own particular Interests and Resentments; but the Pretence was Male-administration, under the following Heads:

1. That being in Place of highest Trust and Articles against the Earl of Cleveland by the Earl of Bristol.

Mr. Speaker, I am a Catholic of the Church of Rome, but not of the Court of Rome; no Negotiator there of Cardinals Caps for his Majesty's Subjects and Domestics, a true Roman-Catholic as to the other World, but a true Englishman as to this: Such a one, as had we a King inclin'd to that Profession, as, on the contrary, we have one the most firm and constant to the Protestant Religion, that ever sat upon the Throne) I would tell him as freely as the D. of Sully, being a Protestant, told his Grandfather Henry IV. That, if he meant to be a King, he must be a constant Professor and Maintainer of the Religion established in his Dominions. Believe me, Gentlemen, Roman-Catholic as I am, there is no Man among you all more thoroughly persuaded than I am, that the true Pillars that can uphold this Monarchy must ever be the Maintenance of the Subjects just Rights and Liberties, and the careful Preservation of that State Ecclesiastical, whereof his Majesty is the supreme Governor; and I do clearly profess, that should the Pope himself invade that Ecclesiastical Right of his, I should as readily draw my Sword against him, as against the late Ufurper.

Mr. Speaker, one Prejudice more I am under, which ought to have great Weight added with this Honorable House, if there were real Ground for it; and that is, that the Earl of Bristol is one of those, who, by the vast Gifts that he hath got of the King, hath, in part, contributed to the Greas of the People, to find their King in such Necessity, after such unexampled Charges laid upon the Subjects for his Supplies. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that tho' I have neither Offices to keep, nor Offices to sell, his Majesty's Gifts to me have been great, in proportion to my Merit, which is none. For in serving and suffering for him with Faithfulness, I did but my Duty, which carries a Reward with itself, enough to raise a Comfort to me, from the very Ruin of my Fortune. It is also true, I have had the Satisfaction from his Majesty, that he never refus'd me any thing I ask'd him for myself. But I hope I shall make it appear also, that I have not only been a very modest Asker, but also a most careful one, to ask nothing considerable, but what carried Advantage with it, as well to his Majesty's Interest as my own. I know well, Mr. Speaker, that with so kind and so generous a Nature as our King is, there may be an ill Proposition of Bounty to Merit, and consequently the Languages and Kindness of his Royal Heart that way, may have contributed much to the present Straghts he is in. Happy is the Nation that hath nothing to fear for the Public, but from the Virtues of their Prince. It is your proper Work, Gentlemen, to reduce the Effects of them to a right Temperament, by your prudent Inspection; and may you begin it with all my Concomitants, which I most readily lay at your Feet, humbly begging of you to appoint a Time, when I may display them all faithfully before you; in hopes that so Man, who hath been a Parraker of his Majesty's Bounty, will prove himself unworthy of it, as not to follow the Example."

(8) In this supplemental Act is the following strange Provision: Provided, and be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That one Clause contain'd in a certain Act, entitled [an Act for declaring the sole Right of the Militia to be in the King, and for the present ordering and disposing the same] and made for the indemnifying of all Persons acting in the Militia, from the 22th of June, 1660, to the 20th of July, 1661, as touching the seizing, detaining, or imprisoning any Person suspected to be a Fanatick, Sedition, or Disturber of the Peace, or seizing of Arms, or searching of Houses for Arms, or for suspected Persons, shall be construed to take Effect; and shall be good and effectual in Law for the indemnifying all Persons whatsoever acting in the Militia of this Kingdom for any of the Matters aforesaid, except the second of February, 1659, and the 20th of June, 1660, inclusive, by virtue or colour of any Authority or Command whatsoever, any thing in the said Act, or any other Act to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

(c) Relating to the traitorous Position, as 'tis called, of taking Arms against the King, upon any Pretence whatsoever; and the renouncing the Solemn League and Covenant.

(d) In a Letter from Mr. Secretary Bennet to the Duke of Ormond, dated July 18, 1665, we have the following Passage:

"This unhappy Attack of my Lord of Bristol upon my Lord Chancellor, hath delay'd the Reces of the Parliament, and, however it ends, will, I fear, be follow'd by all Accidents." Miscellaneous vol. p. 297. Now from hence it might be conjectured that Bennet was not concern'd in this unhappy Attack. But the contrary can scarce be doubted, when it is recollected that he ow'd his Preference to the Importunities of this Cabal in his Favour; and that he had no other Support than their Interest; as likewise, that the Duke of Ormond was the Chancellor's best Friend; and that therefore it would have been to the last degree impolitic in the Secretary, to have explain'd his own concern in that Affair.

A. D. 1665.

and Confidence with his Majesty, and having arrogated a supreme Direction in all his Majesty's Affairs, both at home and abroad, he had traitorously and maliciously endeavour'd to alienate the Hearts of his Majesty's Subjects from him, by Words of his own, and by artificial Insinuations of his Creatures and Dependants, that his Majesty was inclin'd to Popery, and had a Design to alter the Religion establish'd in this Kingdom; and by upholding Discourses with several Persons of his Majesty's Privy Council, to this Effect, viz.

That his Majesty was dangerously corrupted in his Religion, and inclin'd to Popery.

That Persons of that Religion had such Access, and such Credit with him, that, unless there were a careful Eye had unto it, the Protestant Religion would be overthrown in this Kingdom.

That his Majesty had given Ten thousand Pounds to remove a zealous Protestant (Secretary Nicholas) that he might bring into that Place of high Trust a concealed Papist (Sir Henry Bennet); notwithstanding, that the said Sir Henry Bennet is known to have ever been, both in his Profession and Practice, constant to the Protestant Religion.

That several near Friends, and known Dependants of his, have said aloud, That were it not for my Lord Chancellor's standing in the Gap, Popery would be introduced in this Kingdom, or Words to that Effect.

That he hath not only advised and persuaded the King to do such Things, contrary to his own Reason and Resolutions, as might confirm and increase the Scandal, which he had endeavour'd to raise upon his Majesty as aforesaid, of his Favour to Popery, but more particularly to allow his Name to be used to the Pope and several Cardinals, in the Solicitation of a (c) Cardinal's Cap for the Lord Aubigny, one of his own Subjects, and great Almoner at present to his Royal Consort the Queen.

That he had recommended to be employ'd to the Pope one of his Domesticks, Mr. Richard Bealing, a Person (tho' an avow'd Papist) known to be trusted and employ'd by him in Dispatches and Negotiations, concerning Affairs of the greatest Concernment to the Nation.

That he hath promised to several Papists, he would do his Endeavour, and said he hoped to compass the taking away all penal Laws against them; which he did in pursuance of the traitorous Design aforesaid, to the End they may presume and grow vain upon his Patronage, and by their publishing their Hopes of a Toleration, increase the Scandal endeavour'd by him, and by his Emisaries, to be raised upon his Majesty throughout the Kingdom.

That being intrusted with the Treaty between his Majesty and his Royal Consort the Queen, he concluded it upon Articles scandalous and dangerous to the Protestant Religion.

That he brought the King and Queen together, without any settled Agreement in what Manner the Rites of Marriage should be performed, whereby the Queen refusing to be married by a Protestant Priest, in case of her being with Child, either the Succession should be made uncertain for want of the due Rites of Matrimony, or else his Majesty to be exposed to a Suspicion of having been married in his own Dominions by a Romish Priest; whereby all the former Scandals endeavour'd to be raised upon his Majesty by the said Earl, as to point of Popery, might be confirmed and heighten'd.

That having thus traitorously endeavour'd to alienate the Affections of his Majesty's Subjects from him, upon the score of Religion, he endeavour'd to raise unto himself the popular Applause of being the zealous Upholder of the Protestant Religion, and a Promoter of new Severities against Papists.

That he had vented, in his own Discourse, and by the Speeches of his nearest Relations and Emisaries, opprobrious Scandals against his Majesty's Person and Course of Life; such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless Necessity, in the way of Proof, shall require it.

That he had traitorously endeavour'd to alienate the Affections of his Highness the Duke of York from his Majesty, by suggesting to him Jealousies, as far as in him lay, and publishing abroad by his Emisaries, that his Majesty intended to legitimate the Duke of Monmouth.

That he had wickedly and maliciously, contrary to the Duty of a Privy Counsellor, of England, and contrary to the perpetual and most important Interest of this Nation, persuaded his Majesty, against the Advice of the Lord General, to withdraw the English Garrisons out of Scotland, and to demolish all the Forts built there at so vast Charge to this Kingdom.

That his Majesty having been graciously pleas'd to communicate the Desires of the Parliament of Scotland, for the Removal of the said Garrisons, to the Parliament of England, and to ask their Advice therein, the said Earl of Clarendon not only persuaded his Majesty actually to remove those Garrisons, without expecting the Advice of his Parliament of England concerning it, but did, by Menaces of his Majesty's Displeasure, deter several Members of Parliament from moving the House, as they intended, to enter upon Consideration of that Matter.

That he had traitorously and maliciously endeavour'd to alienate his Majesty's Affections and Esteem from his Parliament, by telling his Majesty, that there was never so weak and inconsiderable a House of Lords, nor never so weak and so heady a House of Commons, or Words to that Effect; and particularly, that it was better to sell Dunkirk, than to be at their Mercy for Wants of Money, or Words to that Effect.

That he hath wickedly and maliciously, contrary to his Duty of Counsellor, and to a known Law made last Sessions, by which Money was given, and particularly applied, for

(c) There were two other Articles in Aggravation of this Proceeding.

for the maintaining of Dunkirk, advised and effected the Sale of the same to the French King.

That he hath, contrary to Law, enriched himself and his Treasurers by the Sale of Offices.

That, contrary to his Duty, he hath wickedly and corruptly converted to his own Use, great and vast Sums of public Money raised in Ireland by way of Subsidy, private and public Benevolences, and otherwise given and intended to defray the Charge of Government in that Kingdom. By which means, a supernumerary and disaffected Army hath been kept up there, for want of Money to pay them off; occasion'd, it seems to be, because of the late and present Distempers of that Kingdom.

That having arrogated to himself a supreme Direction of all his Majesty's Affairs, he hath, with a malicious and corrupt Intention, prevail'd to have his Majesty's Customs farm'd, at a far lower Rate than others do offer, and that by Persons, with some of whom he goes a Share, in that, and other Parts of Money resulting from his Majesty's Revenue."

These Articles, which contain'd much Truth, and more Malice, were presented to the Peers by the Earl of Bristol, who seem to have countenanced it no farther, than to refer it to the Judges; with Directions, that they should consider, Whether the said Charge had been brought in regularly and legally, and whether it might be proceeded in, and how; and whether there was any Treason in it or no?

Accordingly, the Word Misdemeanour having been omitted, both in the Earl's Charge, and in the Order of the House to the Judges, their Lordships, in Three Days time, gave it as their Opinion, That a Charge of High Treason could not be originally exhibited by one Peer against another, unto the House of Peers; that therefore the said Charge had not been regularly and legally brought in; and that, if the Matters alledged in it were admitted to be true, yet there was no Treason in it, tho' alledg'd to be traiterously done. With this Opinion of the Judges, the Lords, not excepting the Accuser himself, unanimously concurring, Two Resolutions were form'd thereupon, and enter'd by express Order, nemine contradicente.

It appears the Earl was aware of this Decision, and endeavour'd to evade it, by repairing to the Judges at Serjeants Inn, while they had the Affair under Deliberation; and making Enquiry, if they were inform'd, whether he meant it as a Charge, or no? But in this he was disappointed; for, when he offer'd to explain himself, one of them cut him short with saying, They were ty'd up by their Order. As his last Resource, therefore, he endeavour'd to divide the House of Peers, on a previous Question, Whether he had deliver'd these Articles as a Charge, or only as an Information, for the Matter of a Charge, if their Lordships thought fit to proceed in it; but with no better Success, than before, with the Judges. The Chancellor, as yet, continu'd Lord of the Ascendant in both Houses; and a deeper Sense was entertain'd of his Virtues, than his Faults.

It might perhaps be moreover apprehended, that it was not the Chancellor who was struck at, but the Protestant Religion, and that, to remove one of the chief Pillars might endanger the whole Building.

With respect to the Grounds of the Earl of Bristol's peculiar Animosity, most Authors ascribe it to the Chancellor's refusing to put the Seal to a Grant in favour of a certain Court Lady, Cleveland it may be presum'd, whose Interest the Earl had warmly espous'd. But they lay much deeper: These two Lords had been Rival-Candidates for the King's Favour, and the Power and Influence which are inseparable from it: And if the Reader recollects, that, while the Earl, who was of the Spanish Faction, was negotiating a Marriage for the King at the Court of Parma, he was supplanted by the Chancellor (who fell in with the Interests of France, in the Affair of Portugal, in order to establish his own) he cannot be at a Loss for a Reason why these two great Men, from fast Friends, became such bitter and irreconcilable Enemies: The Rage of disappointed Ambition being to the full as violent, and much more lasting, than that of disappointed Love.

Upon the Whole, tho' the King did not love the Chancellor, he seem'd, as yet, not only concern'd for his Preservation, but displeas'd with the Lord Bristol, for endeavouring to conjure up this Storm against him; who thereupon thought it advisable to abscond for a while; either, that he might not have the Mortification of being an Eye-Witness of his Adversary's Triumph, or also, to avoid the Effects of his Resentment.

With this Affair ended the Business of the Session, and the gracious (f) Speech at the Prorogation serves to shew, that either the King Lord Chief Justice Waler's Report.

(f) My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I thank you for the Present you have made me this Day: I hope your Countries will thank you, when you come home, for having done it. I am not conscious of having brought the Straitness and Necessities I am in upon myself, by any Imprudence or Ill-husbandry of my own: I know the Contrary, and I assure you, I would not have desir'd, or receiv'd the Supply you have given me, if it were not absolutely necessary for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom, as well as mine: And I must tell you, it will do me very little good, if I do not improve it by very good Husbandry of my own: and by retrenching those very Expenses, (which in many respects may be thought necessary enough.) But you shall see I will make rather impose upon myself, than you, my Subjects: and if

"all Men will follow my Example in retrenching their Expenses (which it may be they may do with much more Convenience than I can do mine) the Kingdom will in a very short time gain what you have given me this Day. I am very glad you are now going into your several Countries, where your Presence will do much Good: And I hope your Vigilance and Authority will prevent those Disturbances, which the restless Spirits of ill and unquiet Men will be always contriving, and of which, I assure you, they promise themselves some Effects this Summer. There have been more Pains and unusual Ways taken to kindle the old fatal Fevers and Jealousies, than I thought I should ever have liv'd to have seen, at least to have seen to counteract'd. I do desire you, and conjure you, my Lords and Gentlemen, to watch this evil

A. D. 1663. King had very good Intelligence, or that those who induced him to make Prophecies, took care to have them fulfilled; as also, that his Majesty was not above offering some Violence to his Sentiments, in order to gratify the Inclinations of his People.

Foreign Affairs.

With regard to the Foreign Affairs of this Year, those of Portugal had taken a very happy Turn: For when the Spaniards had made themselves Masters of Ebora, and struck a Terror into Lisbon itself, the Count de Schomberg, who commanded the Portuguese, gave them Battle, and, by the invincible Valour of the English Auxiliaries, who, having been bred under Cromwell, look'd upon Victory as their Inheritance, entirely defeated them. But, in the Court of England, Glory was not thought worth the Money it cost; and, in that of Portugal, there was not Address enough to make use of the Advantages which were thus gain'd for them in the Field: Weary therefore of the (g) Expence of building what the Folly of the Portuguese Ministers from time to time threw down, and perhaps influenced by his new Secretary Bennet, who had receiv'd sufficient Provocation to prefer the Interest of his Catholic to that of his most Christian Majesty, King Charles began at last to depend less on his Brother of France, and to shew himself more dispos'd to listen to the Offers of Spain.

It was indeed but natural, that, as the Chancellor's Credit was already in the Wane, and as Lord Holles, who was so deep in his Confidence, had been prefer'd to Bennet, in the Embassy to Paris, the Secret of Affairs should be diverted into a new Channel.

But, in relation to France, tho' his Majesty no longer submitted all things to her Decision, as before, he, for a while, took all imaginable Care to seem as much at her Devotion as ever: Lord Holles had it in Charge to negotiate the Renewal of the Treaty made by Cromwell, and to make all the necessary Advances towards it: And his Majesty was farther pleas'd to decide the Affair of Precedency in favour of his most Christian, against the Pretensions of his most Catholic, Brother; which was very carefully made public by the Ministers of the Court, in all the Courts of Europe.

King Lewis had however too much Penetration to be long deceiv'd: The Chancellor, sensible that he was no longer the sole Mover, affected a Coldness in the French Concerns; possibly to conceal the Loss of his Power and Credit; and Pretences were made to put off the Conferences with the Sieur de Cominge, his Minister at London, till he had made his Entry. From these and the like Circumstances, that Prince very rightly conjectur'd, the English Court had its Reserves; nor was it long before he made himself Master of the Secret.

The Court of Spain, persuaded, no doubt, that the Admission of Sir Henry Bennet into the Secretary's Office would operate in its Favour, had privately dispatch'd an Emisary to that of England, with Proposals for a close and intimate Union between the two Crowns; which were so favourably receiv'd, that, before the End of the Year, the Basis of a good Correspondence was laid between the two Courts, and Sir Richard Fanshawe, newly return'd from Portugal, was appointed Ambassador to his Catholic Majesty.

This Incident made it necessary for England once more to think of the States-General. Even in the Beginning of the Year, his Majesty had shewn a Disposition to come to a good Understanding with Mr. de Wit; and of this he had made him all the Professions imaginable; but without Effect: That Minister communicated every thing to Mr. d'Estades, who was then Ambassador to the Republic, and took occasion to make his Court to the most Christian King, at his Expence, by declaring, He would rely on the King of France always, on the King of England never.

These Professions of his Majesty were likewise follow'd with a joint Request, both from him and the Princess Dowager, that the States would once again accept of the Tuition of the young Prince of Orange: But it met with a very cold Reception; and Mr. de Wit in particular took occasion to say, That, as the States had been once depriv'd of that Trust, he would never advise them to accept of it again.

France and Holland appear, at this time, to have been under the Direction of the same Spirit, and to have co-operated in the same Views. There was almost a thorough Confidence

" Spirit and Temper with your utmost Care and Prudence, and secure the Persons of those whom you find possess'd with it, That the Peace of the Kingdom may not be sacrificed to their Pride, Humour and Madnes.

" I did expect to have had some Bills presented unto me against the several Distempers in Religion, against schismatical Ceremonies, and against the Graveyard of Popery: But it may be, you have been in some fear of reconciling those Contradictions in Religion in some Conspiracy against the public Peace, to which I doubt Men of the most contrary Motives in Conscience are inclinable enough. I do promise you to lay this Business, and the Mischief which must flow from their Licences, to heart; and if I live

" to meet with you again, as I hope I shall, I will, myself, take care to present new Bills to you to that End. And as I have already given it in charge to the Judges, in their several Circuits, to use their utmost Endeavours to prevent and punish the scandalous and schismatical Meetings of Sectaries, and to visit the Papists; so I will be as watchful, and take all the Pains I can, that neither the one nor the other shall disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. I shall not need to desire you to use all Diligence in levying and collecting the Subsidies you have given me, and heartily wish

" the Distribution may be made with all Equality and Justice, and without any Animosity or Faction, or remembering any thing that hath been done in the late ill Times; which you know we are all oblig'd to forget, as well as to forgive. And indeed, till we have done so, we can never be in perfect Peace; and therefore I can never put you too much in mind of it. I think it necessary to make this a Session, that to the Current of Justice may run the next year Term, without any Obstruction by Privilege of Parliaments: And therefore I shall prorogue you till March, when I doubt not, but by God's Blessing we shall meet again, to our joint Satisfaction; and that you shall have cause to thank me for what I shall have done in the Interval."

(g) From the following Passage out of d'Abzac's Memoirs, it seems natural to conclude, that the English Troops were in the Pay of the King of Portugal. " Upon the fourteenth they departed in order to besiege Ebora, with the Joy and Approbation of all, except the English, who refused to march, pretending they had not receiv'd their Pay; and, indeed, much was due to them, because their Pay was great, and it was difficult, every Month, to raise such a considerable Sum.

A. D. 1663. fidence between Mr. de Wit and the Count d'Esprades; the Letters of his most Christian Majesty are full of Acknowledgments of the Pensioner's Zeal for his Service; and, in particular, speaking of the Treaty then to be renew'd between France and England, he expressly declares, That nothing should be concluded in it, contrary to the Interest of the States General.

This intimate Union was not however either concerted or continu'd without great Opposition, while under Deliberation, and great Clamour afterwards: The English and Spaniards had each their Faction in Holland; and both these join'd with that of Orange to distress and embarrass the Pensioner; who was thus in a manner forc'd into a Dependance upon France, and thereby became too mighty for all his Adversaries.

The Court of Spain, ever fearful of the Power and Ambition of France, and never without Cause, now labour'd to form a federal Union between the Republic and the other Ten Provinces of the Netherlands, for their common Preservation. But, as this struck at the very Root of the French Designs, Mr. d'Esprades had Orders to make use of all his Address, and Interest with the Pensioner, to traverse it; and the Pensioner not only came, or seem'd to come, very heartily into his Measures, but dress'd up a (b) Counter-Project, which, tho' in Appearance tending only to graft a new Republic on the old, could scarce have fail'd in the

(b) Which was as follows:

"First, That from this time Endeavours should be us'd to prepare the Minds of the People of the Provinces, which are now under the Dominion of Spain, to censure themselves, and set up a free Republic; and to induce them to it, and forward the Execution of this Project, they should under-hand be inform'd, and that too with sufficient Assurance, that France and the United-Provinces would powerfully protect them in it, and the things they should think fit to enterprize for the Re-establishment of their Liberty, each entering into a close Alliance with them, to defend and support them against all those that should attack or trouble them, and that for ever, let whatever will happen.

"That in case this Project cannot be executed during the King of Spain's Life, tho' the Obstacles or Oppositions that may be met with, it shall be prosecuted with double Vigour after his Death, tho' the Prince of Spain should be then alive, and all convenient ways be made use of to accomplish it. Nevertheless, no Arms shall be brought into the said Provinces, or any of them, in case the Magistrates of the Cities cannot be induc'd to resolve upon the said Cantonment during the Life of the King or the Prince of Spain: It being the Intention of the most Christian King, and the Lords the States of the said United-Provinces, religiously to observe the Treaty of Peace made respectively by them with Spain.

"In case the King and Prince of Spain happen to decease, then the said Provinces shall be canton'd by main Force; and Arms, if need be, be employ'd, as well to make them resolve upon it, as to repel all such as shall oppose it.

"And lastly, such as it will be very difficult for the said United-Provinces to defend their Frontiers against Foreign Powers, all possible Efforts shall be us'd, in this latter Case, to put into the most Christian King's Hands, for the Security of his, the Cities and Places of Cambray, St. Omer, Aire, Newport, Furnes, Bergues and Lincel, with the Lordships and Counties depending on them, and into the Hands of the Lords the States, Osnod, Plaffendal, Bruges, Damme, Bismacquerque, with what Spain now enjoys of the Province of Guelderland, and the four Quarters of Outremont, and the Castles of Navarise and Argentan, with their Dependencies. That if the said Cantonment exceeds the first or second way, both Sides shall heartily labour that the said Places may be put into the Hands of the most Christian King and the States respectively, as well for the Considerations before alludg'd, as several other important Reasons, for the common Welfare and Peace of both States.

"The said Project, as alter'd by France:

"The King, and the Lords the States, &c. considering, as Affairs of the World now stand, that, by the singular Effect of divine Mercy, the greatest Part of the Kingdom and States of Europe enjoy profound Peace, and that 'tis to be fear'd the Succession to the Crown of Spain coming to be disputed, the Nations of Christendom may be again plung'd into the same Disorders, Misfortunes and Calamities, out of which they were with so much Trouble deliver'd by the late famous Treaty of Westphalia, and the Pyrenies, his Majesty and the said Lords the States, by a Foresight and Precaution worthy their great Prudence, have thought fit to unite themselves again into a closer Union, and that their Friendship may not be alter'd by any Accident, at this time to regulate together, and consist of, what here is to be given to the Affairs of the ten Provinces of the Low Countries under the Dominion of Spain, in which his Majesty and the said States are so essentially concern'd. The Succession to the Crown of Spain would, when it falls, undoubtedly with all Right and Justice defend to his Majesty in Right of the Queen his Wife, through the Inevitability and Necessity of the Renunciation extorted from her at Fontenabris, before she came to France, and for want of performing several Conditions on the Spaniards Side, which were expressly stipulated by the Marriage Contract, and to which the pretended Renunciation was not relative. These are Treaties so evident, and so well known to the People of Flanders themselves, that several of their principal Members have jointly debated of Means to defend themselves against the Evils they see they are threaten'd with, and the most prudent among them have thought there's no Way for them to take, as now to resolve to censure themselves into a free Republic ally'd to this State, and under the King's Protection, having found by 150 Years past Experience, ever since they came under the Domination of the House of Austria, that their Country has been nothing but a bloody Scene of War, Misery and Desolation. The sincere Affection the King has for the said Lords the States, and his Desire, as has been said, to make their Friendship and Union eternal, so that no Jealousy of Neighbourhood, or of too great Power, may alter it, have engag'd him to condescend in Consideration of the said Lords the States, that in case the Succession to the Crown of Spain falls, he will not make use of his simple Rights as to what relates to the Low-Countries, but, out of his singular Moderation, be contented, that the People who ought naturally to be subject to his Government, shall then become free, and form a new Republic ally'd to the said Lords the States, under his Majesty's Protection, excepting only some Places of the said Provinces which lie commodious for his Majesty, the better to cover the Frontiers of his Kingdom, and for his greater Safety. Excepting also some other Places, which notwithstanding his Rights, he condescends to yield up entirely to the States, for the same Reasons, of Commodiousness and greater Safety, as is hereafter mentioned: In Consideration of which, and to correspond answerably to so great a Sign of Disinterest in his Majesty, the said Lords the States voluntarily engage by the present Treaty to concur with him, and second with all their Might, his good and gracious Designs in the Manner following:

"In the first Place, his Majesty and the said Lords the States, declare their Intention is religiously to observe the late Treaties made with Spain, without carrying the War into the Netherlands, only in case of his Majesty's Preterition in Right of the Queen his Wife. If before the People of Flanders have taken the Resolution, to which they seem dispos'd, to form a Free Republic, for preventing the Miseries with which they see they are threaten'd, the Succession to the Crown of Spain falls in favour of the Queen. Then as all the Rights to the said Crown will belong to his Majesty, and he may do as he Pleaseth, without infringing in any wise the late Treaties of Peace, the said ten Provinces shall be canton'd and crech'd into a Free-Republic, and his Majesty and the said Lords the States make use of Force and Arms, if need be, as well to oblige them to do so, as against all that shall oppose them. And furthermore as for the Reasons herein before touch'd upon, it not only imports his Majesty and the said Lords the States, in this Alteration and new Face of Affairs in the Low-Countries, to cover their Frontiers well against Foreign Powers which may meddle with, and concern themselves against them, they shall, on both Sides, do their utmost to put into his Majesty's Hands the Cities and Places of Cambray, Aire, Newport, Furnes and Lincel, and the Lordships of Coiffel, Baltes, Popingue; and into the Hands of the said Lords the States, Osnod, Plaffendal, Bruges, Damme, Bismacquerque, with what Spain now possesses of the Province of Guelderland, and her four Quarters of Outremont, and the Castles of Navarise and Argentan with their Dependencies.

the End to put France into the (i) quiet Possession of the said Ten Provinces, without the Noise, Expence, or Hazard of a War.

But, tho' his most Christian Majesty was abundantly more inclin'd to take up with a distant Prospect, than to suffer any new Obstructions to be laid in his Way, he did not care to be put off with a bare Possibility of obtaining, some time or another, what he was even now contriving to take Possession of. For this Reason, he made it his Business to continue the Negotiation, and yet found out Pretences to avoid bringing it to an Issue. And, when this could be done no longer, because the States grew jealous of his real Designs, and even Mr. de Wit himself, who was known to be more devoted to his (k) Interest than he ought, could no longer assist in the Delusion, he laid aside his Mask, and the Project together.

While this Affair was in Agitation, Downing had Orders from England to act in Concert with Gamarre, the Minister of Spain: And accordingly Gamarre, in soliciting the League of the Seventeen Provinces, before-spoken of, undertook that England should support it; which Downing confirm'd. Mr. d'Esbrades likewise makes mention of a Letter of Chancellor Hyde's to Downing, to be by him communicated to the Penfioner, conceiv'd in general Terms, proposing something, yet specifying nothing precisely. Of this the Penfioner gave a Copy to Mr. d'Esbrades, to be communicated to the King his Master, and made use of all his Art and Address beside, to bring Downing to an Explanation; but to no Purpose: He either was not in the Secret, or had no Orders to be more explicit; so contented himself with hinting, That it was for the Interest of the States, as well as England, to provide against what was to come; but left him in the dark, with respect to whom. France however, who best knew her own Designs, very well understood this Text, without a Commentary; and made so notable a Use of her Power over the States, that, tho' there was now a wonderful Concurrence of Interests against her, they could not be prevail'd upon to take one Step towards the establishing such a Confederacy, as alone could have set Bounds to her Ambition.

Of this Coldness, or rather Aversion, of theirs to enter into Measures with England and Spain, there is Reason to think Advantage was taken, to kindle the first Dutch War: For, towards the Close of the Year, when the Influences and Intrigues of Downing and Gamarre had prov'd ineffectual, the former chang'd his Manner of Address, and, from soliciting an Union, made it his Business to promote a Rupture, of which the first public Proof was a Memorial to the States, complaining of the Depredations committed on the English Commerce in Guinea, and demanded Satisfaction.

But, before we proceed any farther with the Current of our foreign Affairs, we must keep pace with those at home.

And first of Scotland. If the Earl of Middleton had the Honour to render the King absolute in that Realm, the Earl of Lauderdale render'd him formidable; for, under his Influence, the Parliament was not only induc'd, by an Act of their own, to delegate all their Power to the Lords of Articles, but, by another, most complaisantly intitled His humble Tender to his Sacred Majesty of the Duty and Loyalty of his ancient Kingdom of Scotland, Affairs of Scotland.

(i) As seems highly probable from the following Discourse of Mr. d'Wit, in Conference with the Count d'Esbrades:

He began, (says that Minister in a Letter to the King his Master, dated December 30, 1665.) with your Majesty's Right to the Low-Countries, and did his utmost to convince me, that, even after the Death of the Prince of Spain, as 'twas contain'd in the Marriage Contract and the Renunciation fo often declar'd in it, it could not be maintain'd; that 'twas the Opinion of all who had examin'd the Matter, that, supposing the Renunciation to be null, the Queen, as born of the first Wife, could never exclude the Prince; that ever since there were Counts and Dukes of Brabant, there were no Examples where the Males, by a second Venture, were not prefer'd to the Females of a first; and to justify it, he gave me an Extract taken from History on this Subject, which I send your Majesty: That, to prevent his Friends seeing thro' this Matter, he had spoken of it as a doubtful Business, and which might bear a Decision to your Majesty's Advantage, in order to engage them in the Design of the Project, and that tho' he seem'd by it to have prov'd to the States, they were in some manner secure against their Fears of your Majesty's aggrandizing your self, yet they saw that Security was ill enough ground'd, because it depended on the setting up a Republic, which appear'd to be a Work almost impossible; and tho' by the Concurrence of all the Accidents which cause a Revolution in a State, there may be some certainty in this, they were very well satisfy'd it could not be of long Duration, for want of Chiefs, and thro' the Levy of the People of which the Government is compos'd, as also on account of the different Interests of Trade and Religion in the ten and the seven Provinces, which render'd them almost incompatible in the same Union, like that which the propos'd partition would produce; and that through this Incompatibility, and the very Inclination of several Cities which are already French, 'tis but too plain that in a little Time they would be very willing to yield themselves up to France, or would be oblig'd to do it by Arms, or for Peace sake. Thus your Majesty might easily become Master of the Netherlands, without infringing this last Treaty.

(k) To shew with what a high Hand, this aspiring Prince now lorded it in Europe, we need only turn our Eyes towards Italy, where we find him seizing Boynas, and imposing the following severe Conditions on his most holy Father the Pope.

First, That Cardinal Imperiale should be confin'd to Geneva, during the King's Pleasure.

That Don Maria, the Pope's Brother, should be banish'd to Siena for three Years, not to return to Rome, upon any Pretence whatsoever.

That Cardinal Chigi, the Pope's Nephew, should be sent into France; where at his first Audience, he should desire the French King's Pardon, for himself and his whole Family: And in his second Audience, in the Name of the Pope, supplicate the Christian King's Excuse, for the affront given to the Duke of Croqui.

That the said Duke, in his Return to Rome by Land, should be met at the Frontiers of the State Ecclesiastic, by Don Augusto, another of the Pope's Nephews; if by Sea, at a proportionate Distance, by the Galleys of the Church. And the Dutchess of Croqui to be receiv'd at a League's distance from Rome, by the Wife of Don Maria.

That the Duke of Croqui being return'd to Rome, shall be there treated with all the Honours due and customary to the Ministers of France.

That the Duke of Cesarsse be restor'd to his Goods and Honours, and indemnify'd for the future; and all others who had suffer'd in the King of France's Quarrel.

The Dutchy of Castro to the Duke of Medina, paying 120000 Livres, at such and such Payments.

The Valley of Comatilis to the Duke of Medina, paying 50000 Livres, in Consideration of the Charge of Garrisons.

That there be a Pillar rais'd in the Palace of the Cors, with an Inscription bearing the Substance of their Condemnation.

A. D. 1663. Scotland, they devoted their very Liberties and Persons to his Majesty's Service: For, therein, in Acknowledgment of their Duty, they make an humble and hearty Offer to him of 20,000 Foot and 2000 Horse, sufficiently arm'd, and furnish'd with forty Days Provision, to be in Readiness, upon his Majesty's Demand, to march to any Part of his Dominions of Scotland, England, or Ireland, for suppressing any foreign Invasion, intestine Trouble, or Insurrection, or for any other Service, wherein his Majesty's Honour, Authority, or Greatness was concerned. And, by the same Act, they farther declare, That if his Majesty should have farther Use of their Service, the Kingdom would be ready, every Man between Sixty and Sixteen, to join and hazard their Lives and Fortunes, as they shall be call'd for by his Majesty, for the Safety and Preservation of his Sacred Person, Authority and Government.

It has been already observ'd, that Lord Lauderdale was a staunch Presbyterian, and that his being employ'd in Scotland had given great Uneasiness to the Royalists in England: But all Prejudices were now remov'd; he had espous'd the (1) Church with as much Zeal as the Prerogative, and in every Action made it manifest, that no Man, of any Party whatsoever, was more a Slave to the Court, or would go greater Lengths in enslaving the People.

When therefore he return'd to give an Account of his Administration, he was (m) receiv'd in such a Manner, as argued, that a blind Devotion to the Measures of the Crown, was held to be the Sum of all political Virtue.

Nothing more alarming or provoking to the People of England could have happen'd, than this Measure of the Scots Parliament, which put the Sword in the King's Hand, and enabled him to use it as he pleas'd: But as all Resistance was not only preach'd but voted down, and the popular Current ran a quite different Way, the undiscerning Multitude were not sensible of their own Danger, but rather glory'd in the King's Strength, than entertain'd any Apprehensions from their own Weakness.

All indeed were not yet reconcil'd to this political Quietism; nor, under the Notion of preventive Measures, could submit to be deprived of all their Liberties: There was still

A. D. 1663. a Remnant of the Republican Party, who, though overpower'd, were not subdu'd, and who, no doubt, would have been glad to recover the Opportunity they had lost.

Whether they contented themselves with Wishes and Prayers only, for the Re-establishment of the good old Cause; or whether they actually enter'd into Measures, at this time, for the obtaining that End; will best appear from a Consideration of the Plot of this Year; which was carry'd on in the North of England, by the Zealots for Separation, and the Republican Party, says Mr. Echard; by the Bigots for Schism and a Commonwealth, says Bishop Kennet: According to the (n) Account given of this Affair by both those Reverend Divines, there was an Understanding between the Brethren of Scotland and England, who were held together by an Oath of Secrecy, the 12th of October was appointed for the Rising (by Orders from the Secret Committee at London) which was to be general; that is to say, in Ireland, England and Scotland; Ludlow, or Lambert, was to have the Command; Whitehall was to be secur'd; Nottingham, Gloucester, and Newcastle, were to be seiz'd, as being the most convenient Passes over the Tyne, Severn, and Trent; and Boston in Lincolnshire was to serve the Conspirators for a Port of Communication with their Friends abroad. The Pretences of these Men, they moreover tell us, were to redeem themselves from the Excise, and all Subsidies; to re-establish a Gospel Magistracy and Ministry; to restore the long Parliament; and lastly, to curb the Gentry, the Lawyers, and the Clergy: Nay, they were so frantic, if these Accounts are to be depended upon, as to put forth such a (o) Summons to this great Work, as argued they had neither Power nor Discretion. Notwithstanding which, (p) a good Number of them, says Bishop Kennet; a considerable Number, says Mr. Echard; appear'd in Arms, at Farnley Wood: And this appears to be all the Treason that was laid to their Charge.

According as these Plots were real or fictitious, or as they appear to have been contemptible or formidable, we must acquit or condemn this Reign.

It is necessary therefore to have recourse to a higher Authority than that of these Reverend Historians, and to bring forward what additional Evidence it affords.

In

(1) A National Synod was instituted by Act of Parliament. The ordering and disposing of the external Government of the Church, was declar'd to be in the King, by virtue of his Prerogative Royal in Causes Ecclesiastical. The said Synod was to meet at such Times and Places as his Majesty should appoint by Proclamation, and to debate of such Matters, relating to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, as his Majesty should deliver to the President, and no Assent was to be held, but in the Presence of his Majesty or his Commissioner.

By Sentence of this Parliament likewise, the Laird Warffhouse, a Member of the Committee of Safety, was executed at the Market Cross of Edinburgh, as it is with Pleasure remember'd by the Royal Apologists, on a Gibbet two-and-twenty Foot high. He had to his surpris'd his Vigour and Abilities, that he was an Object of Compassion to all, but such as had falsified Loyalty in the Place of Charity and every Christian Duty and moral Virtue.

(m) Mr. Secretary Bennet, in a Letter to the Duke of Ormond, dated November, 1663, hath the following Paragraph:

"My Lord Lauderdale came last Night hither. The great things that are done in Scotland, the Vindication of his Majesty's Authority in all Points, have made him very welcome to those, who care not much for him before. I confess ingenuously, for my part, he has converted me, which I am glad to be, so it is to his Majesty's Advantage. Miscel. Anal. p. 320."

A. D. 1663.
Miscellaneous
Anals.

In a Letter from Mr. Secretary Bennet to the Duke of Ormond, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, dated October 10th 1663, we have the following Paragraph:

"We are hourly expecting what our Alarm will signify out of the North. On the 12th or 15th, we were without any great Apprehension from it, the County being in a greater Readiness to prevent the Disorders than perhaps were to be wis'd; but it being the Effect of their own Care, rather than his Majesty's Commands, it is the less to be censur'd."

Again, in a Second, dated October 17, 1663.

"The Alarms are not yet ceased in the North, but the Country hath so readily and cheerfully put itself into a Posture of preventing any Trouble, that we fear little of that kind; besides, all our Intelligence in the City assures us, that the disaffected Party here is very quiet, and tho' they may wish well to their Friends in the Country, yet they do not seem to be in any Disposition of seconding them by any Stirs here, but apprehend they do very rashly expose themselves, and will only give Occasion to sharpen the Persecution against them."

In a Letter, dated Oct. 20, to the Duke of Buckingham, who, as Lord Lieutenant of the County of York, was entrusted with the Care of the public Peace, the said Secretary enlarges as follows:

"In the next Place his Majesty desires your Grace should proceed with the Assistance of the High Sheriff, and Deputy Lieutenants, to cause strict Examination to be made of all Persons whom you know or suspect to be guilty or contributing to the intended rising, that they may be punished by such ordinary or extraordinary Course of Law, as his Majesty shall appoint, and they shall appear to have deserved."

After all this, how certain soever we morally are of the intended rising, of which we had many concurring Informations here from several Hands that could not conspire to abuse us, it is very possible you may not be able to produce such convincing Proofs as will come home to the Enquiry of the Law. We ourselves know how many Designs of this nature were set on Foot in the times of the Usurper, which could not be made punishable, even by their extrajudicial Proceedings, which I say for the Qualification of the second Point; tho' upon the whole Matter, it will conduce much to his Majesty's Service, that what can be made clear, may be made so; not only to vindicate us from the Malice that may probably accuse us of having been afraid without Cause, but also keep the Country in a Disposition to secure themselves, and the Public, when're they shall be called upon again, which, for my part, I look will befall us often."

Again, to the Duke of Ormond, October, 27:

"The great Alarm we had of late, ended in a weak Attempt of the discontented Party in the North to rise, in which they were much discouraged by the Preparations of the Country to suppress them. Many of them are taken, and have confess'd enough to hang one another."

Again to his Grace of Buckingham, October 31:

"The King desires your Grace would cause the Examinations of all suspected Persons to be continued; and even of those he sends for up, as long as they are in your Hands; and that you would successively use Threats and Promises towards them for the utmost Discovery of what they know. Mr. Nevil hath been before me, but denies flatly to have had any direct or indirect Knowledge of this Matter; and so desires to stand or fall in his Majesty's Opinion, as this is true."

Again, November 5th.

"We have here in the Tower Nevil, Salway, and Hutchinson; the two former I have examin'd, but got nothing from them, except large Protestations of their Innocency, by what I hear of the latter, I suppose I shall have the like when he is brought to me."

And finally, Mr. Secretary, in a Letter to the Duke of Ormond, dated Jan. 20, 1664, thus closes this Scene:

"Our Letters from York tell us the Judges have found Fifteen guilty, and this by the Proof of Two Witnesses against each of them, as well as their own Confessions. Is that by the next, I suppose, we shall find your Grace the Sentence and Execution of at least so many."

Upon the Whole, it is pretty clear from these Letters, that a (q) Rising had been concerted; but then it is as clear, that it ought rather to have excited the Scorn than the Apprehensions of the Government; that, like all the rest of these wretched Projects, it had been countenanced by none but (r) Levellers, disbanded Officers, and desperate Enthusiasts; all of them Persons of mean Condition, without Parts, Power, Credit, or Interest; and that the very Zeal of the People was sufficient to secure the Peace of the Government, without the Assistance of mercenary Foreigners, or additional penal Laws.

There remains no other Remarkable of this Year to be spoken of, but the Suspension of the King's Household Establishment, which took place at Michaelmas, by his Majesty's express Command; who had before promis'd his Parliament to use such Husbandry, as should

(q) Ludlow himself acknowledges, That about this time, Summer 1663, their Friends in all Parts began to entertain Hopes they might be again employ'd to relieve their Country from Servitude; and that in the Posture of Affairs Colonel Algernon Sidney, who had for some time resided in Italy, thought convenient to draw nearer home, that if any Opportunity should offer, he might not be wanting in his Duty and the Public Service, and to resolv'd to winter in Flouders: And passing through Switzerland, he made a Visit to Ludlow and his Friends then harbour'd there; and staying with them three Weeks, he assur'd them of his Affection and Friendship, and no ways inclin'd to own them, and the Cause for which they suffer'd.

should render his Charge more proportionable to his Income.

Upon this Occasion, Mr. Secretary Bennet had Orders to write to the Duke of Ormond, who was Lord Steward as well as Lord Lieutenant, for a List of the Monies, which, according to Custom, had been given for the Places below Stairs; that they who were to be cut off, by the new Establishment, might be indemnify'd. But this was an Affair, in which his Grace was above having any Concern, and consequently could give no Information: And those who were next apply'd to, possibly apprehending, that the Persons who had receiv'd the said Monies, might be call'd upon to make the intended Restitution, thought it advisable to know nothing of the Matter: So that whether his Majesty's laudable Purpose was founded on a Principle of Oeconomy, to make the intended Reduction the cheapest Way; or Justice, that the Purchasers might be sav'd harmless; or Policy, to abolish a Sort of Traffic, that was a Dishonour to his Court; it does not appear, that he was able to carry his Point: For, when Ministers enter into Confederacy to connive at each other, it is not easy for Kings themselves, even in their own Concerns, either to detect Abuse, or set a Mark on Corruption.

The Rise of the first Dutch War.

As Sir George Downing's Memorial to the States, demanding Satisfaction for the Depredations committed by their Subjects on the English Commerce, &c. was the Prelude to a Rupture, and all things now seem'd to have a Tendency that Way; it would be very improper to close our Review of the Transactions of this Year, without touching on such Particulars, as may serve to throw the necessary Lights on those of the next.

That the Court of England had no very good Disposition towards the States, we have already had very sufficient Evidence; and as to the Temper of the Two Nations, with respect to each other, it is scarce to be wonder'd, that they were as prone to quarrel as their Masters. They were Rivals in Commerce, and therefore, in every Part on the Globe, were natural Enemies. Hence it was scarce possible, but that, sometimes by Fraud, and sometimes by Violence, Injuries should be committed, and each in turn become the Aggressor. Some Writers, indeed, were at no small Pains to lay the whole Load on the Dutch, others on the English. Some affirm the Court of England was only answerable for the War; and others again are as positive, that the Court was forced into it by the Resentments of the Parliament and People. But Experience shews, that nothing is more easy, than for a Prince to avoid a War he does not like; and, on the other hand, there is no Reason to think, that, in these frugal Times, the Parliament would have given such liberal Supplies to support a Quarrel, which they did not approve. It must therefore be suppos'd and allow'd, that there was a Coincidence of Interests and Humours on both Sides; and that Court and Country were, for once, of a Mind.

This, however, must be understood under some Limitations; for when the Dutch East India Company offer'd to carry on the War, in those Parts, at their own Expence, the East India Company of England was struck with terrible Apprehensions, and made no Scruple to give out, That it was a Court War, which was set on foot solely for the Interest of the Duke of York, and some other great Persons, who were engag'd with him; that it was not just to break with Allies, who were willing to submit to an Accommodation, and thereby ruin an infinite Number of Families, for the sake of a new Company, and a few Courtiers, who were at the Head of it, and who made Merchandize of their Protection.

But even the East India Company, at the Commencement of this Broil, in a Paper which they publish'd to purge themselves from a Charge brought against them by the Hollanders, declar'd, That the said Charge was a deliberate Mass of frivolous, insolent, and unjust Demands, built upon Conclusions made without the Leave of any Premises of Truth, Reason, or Law of Nations.

It is necessary, however, to observe, that the new Company just spoken of was the African, of which the Duke of York was Governor, and who apparently made it a Point to put them in Possession of the whole Trade to Guiney. This was the real Ground of the War; at least it was the principal: The Demands contain'd in Downing's several Memorials, relating to the two India Ships, called the Banadventure and Good Hope, as likewise the several other Ships contained in the English (s) Catalogue of Damages, are rather to be

look'd

(1) Mr. Rejon having declar'd [Finsler's Translation, p. 637] that, after the most diligent Search, he had not been able to discover the particular Articles of these Damages, they are here join'd for the better Information of Posterity.

A Catalogue of the Damages for which the English demand'd Reparation. And first, of the Damages which the English East India Company has sustain'd by the East Indian Company of the United Provinces.

Concerning the Ship call'd the Mayflower, whereof one William Curtis was the Commander, who (being Agent also for the English Company, having obtain'd Liberty from the Queen of Acheen to traffic there, was about the Month of August, 1658, O. S. debar'd of all Commerce, by one Balhasar, who at that time commanded three Ships belonging to the East India Company of the Netherlands; and seiz'd three Thousand eight Hundred seventy and eight Pounds of Pepper, which the said Ship had begun to load with, forcing the said Curtis to depart empty; and nothing of this was known at London upon the tenth of January following, 1658-9.

2. Touching the Ship the Dragon, one Nicholas Budsford Commander, which came before Bantam about the Month of October, 1658, O. S. which was forbidden, and hinder'd to traffic there by certain Netherland Ships then upon the Place, and by the General of Batavia, by whom the said Ship was constrain'd to depart without her Lading, and also oblig'd to stay in the Indies till her Provision was spent, and forced at last to return in the Winter, and so the way was lost. Of this likewise, nothing was known at London upon the tenth of January following, 1658-9.

3. Touching the Ship the Advise, Robert Mayne Commander, which being arriv'd at Bantam about the Month of October, 1658, O. S. was in like manner, as the Dragon, forbidden all Commerce there, and forc'd to depart. And neither was this known at London upon the tenth of January following, 1658-9.

4. Concerning the Ship Morigold, John Cooris Commander, which arriv'd at Batavia about the Month of Febrary, 1658, O. S. one Kofler, who commanded at that time five Ships before the Place, shot at the said Ship, and hinder'd her either to enter or traffic there, so that he was necessitated to go her way.

5. Touching the Factory of Jambes in the Isle of Somatra, upon the 9th of August, 1659, O. S. when Peter de Coper, Principal of the Dutch Company at Jambes, and Jacobus Clasi his Second, with about 40 Dutch Men, and 150 Slaves all arm'd, and in form of an Enemy, enter'd by Force into the Magazine of the English, in which Ostrage the English were very much damm'd.

6. The Ship call'd the Merchants Delight, Thomas Bell Commander, arriving at Bantam in 1659, O. S. was hinder'd from either entering or trading there, by certain Ships of the Dutch Company who were there at that time: and so he was forc'd to depart thence.

7. The Ship the Merchant of Constantinople, Robert Brown Commander, in the Month of September, 1659, O. S. falling betwixt Fiugla and Goa, upon the Coast of India, was attacked by seven Ships in the Service of the Dutch East India Company, whereof Peter de Beter was Vice Admiral, who took by Force out of the said Ships, one Thousand nine Hundred seventy and eight Granaides, fifty nine Iron Guns, and three Brass Morter-pieces.

8. For Monies disburs'd about 1661-2, to make a Provision of Ships, Victuals, and all other Necessaries for the Peysling, planning, and fortifying of the Isle of Penlaros.

Damages sustain'd by the Dutch West India Company.

1. The House and English Factory of Cape-Corfe, was upon the first of May, 1659, O. S. burnt and ruin'd, together with all the Merchandize and Moveables therein, by the Dutch, who were then in the Castle of Cape-Corfe, and in the Service of the Dutch West India Company.

2. The House and Factory of Cape-Corfe, after that the same was re-buill, and well furnished with several sorts of Merchandizes, for the Trade of that Place, was burnt again upon the 22d of May, 1661, O. S. with all the Merchandize, and Moveables in the same, by some whom those of the Netherland East India Company had hired for that Purpose.

Damages sustain'd by the English Turkey Company.

1. The Ship Reformation, belonging to the Company of London, laden at Scanderon in November, 1659, as she was quietly falling in the Mediterranean, was there seized upon the 15th of May, 1660, by a certain Ship which came from Holland, call'd the Holy Martyr, whereof Lawrence Andrus was Commander.

2. The Ship Free Trade, design'd from London to Scanderon, by some Merchants belonging to the said Company, in the Year 1660, was seiz'd upon the 15th of May, 1660, by the said Holy Martyr.

Damages sustain'd by other English.

1. The Ship the Experience of London, John Kingman Commander, was seiz'd upon the Coast of Portugal, by one Quares and others of Zeland, in the Year 1660.

2. Concerning a French Ship, call'd the Golden Sun, Nicholas de Breton de Pr Commander; Edward Adams Merchant of London, as well for himself as for other English Merchants, demands to have Satisfaction for the Merchandizes belonging to them, which were taken in the said Ship, in the Year 1660, upon the Coast of Portugal by four Zeland Men of War, commanded by Phillip Res, Toussain de Sage, Albert Tolohan, and the Master's Mate of the Ship of Matthias Quares.

3. The Ship Falcon, Hendrick Hogher Commander, was seiz'd upon the Coast of Portugal upon the 21th Day of May, 1660, by one Class Reur, and another of Zeland.

4. The Ship St. John Baptist (Emmanuel Hart Commander, who had taken aboard some Negrees upon the Coast of Guinea, and burter'd them for Sugars and other Commodities at Baytia in Brasil) was seiz'd in his return in June, 1661, by a Zeland Man of War, call'd the Golden Peri of Middelburg, whereof Cornelius Thranap was Commander.

5. The Ship the Merchants Delight, belonging to one John Young and Company of English Merchants, John Bower Commander, having let fall from Dover in the County of Kent, was seiz'd upon near Cape Corfe in Guinea, about August 1661, by a Ship call'd the Amsterdam, belonging to the Netherland West India Company.

6. The Ship Paragon, belonging to Bernard Spark, John Cook and Company, of English Merchants, whereof one John Barford was Master, laden at Tajlam near to Exeter in Dress, and bound for Guinea, was seiz'd about the 15th of October, 1661, by two Ships belonging to the Netherland West India Company; the one call'd the Amsterdam of Amsterdam whereof Jacobus Coen was Master, and the other call'd the Arm of Amsterdam, whereof Nicholas Tyle was Commander.)

7. The Ship the Daniel, belonging to John Knight, Thomas Knight, Henry Oaks and Company, of English Merchants, and commanded by the said Henry Oaks, let fall from London about May, 1661, to go for the Coast of Guinea, and was seiz'd in a hostile manner by a Ship of Amsterdam, belonging to the Netherland West India Company, call'd the Amsterdam, whereof one Arden Coen was Commander.

8. The Ship the Brotherhood of London, belonging to Peter Coetier, Bartholomew Coetier, Abraham Coetier, and John Beverley and Company, of English Merchants, was seiz'd upon the Coast of Guinea, in February, 1655, O. S. by one Cas, Commander of the Frigate call'd Gat, and one Toppens, Commander of a Ship call'd the Kater, both of them commissioned by the Netherland West India Company.

9. The Ship call'd the Royne Hancock, belonging to one John Jeffries and Company of English Merchants, laden at London, and design'd for the Coast of Guinea, was seiz'd near to Cape Lopez, about the 11th of September, 1656, by two Netherland Ships; the one call'd the Mary of Amsterdam, and the other the Union of Middelburg, commanded by one John Sraet of Middelburg.

10. The Ship Sarab, belonging to one Ann Leulin, Administratrix of one Robert Leulin, Merchant, Hamphrey Bone and Company, of English Merchants, whereof Arthur Perkins was Commander, was seized upon the Coast of Guinea in August, 1656, near to Cape Lopez by two Ships of those Countries, call'd the Mary of Amsterdam, and the other the Union of Middelburg, commanded by the aforesaid Sraet of Middelburg.

11. The Ship Furrow, belonging to one Cornelius Sijffers and Company, of English Merchants, was seiz'd about August, 1656, near to Cape Lopez, upon the Coast of Guinea, by the said Mary of Amsterdam, and the Union of Middelburg, whereof the said John Sraet of Middelburg was Commander.

12. The Ship Black Boy of Dover, belonging to one Arnold Broomer and Company, of English Merchants, whereof Ralph Wood was Commander, laden at Dover in January, 1660, was seiz'd upon the thirteenth of April, 1661, near to Comado, upon the Coast of Guinea, by a Ship of those Countries, call'd the Grafsmen, which came from the Castle of Missa, and carried thither the said English Ship.

13. The Ship Speckswell, belonging to Mr. John Taylor and Company, of English Merchants of London, whereof Robert Cook was Master, putting her Voyage from Geticeburgh for London, was seiz'd in May, 1657, by a Man of War of Opden, commanded by Peter Tyfen, who carried the said Ship to Amsterdam, and there sold her, together with her entire Lading, to one William Heaton, Merchant of Amsterdam, without any legal Proceeding or Sentence against her.

14. The Ship Labeck, whereof Dinnar Pieterfen was Master, being laden in May, by Thomas Nijst, and Richard Metcalf of the City of York, with 1838 Tun of Rye, at Strale-Sand in Flanders, to be transported for Hull in England, was seiz'd upon by five Netherland Men of War, one commanded by Edward Embryfen, another by Laurens Dredcamp of Groningen, a third by one Cornelius Sraet, another call'd the Black Eagle, and the fifth the Golden Lion, which carried the said Ship to Copenhagen, and there dispos'd of her Lading.

15. The Ship Anne and Margaret, belonging to Richard Wjcmbe, Nicholas Warren and Company, Merchants of London, having taken in her Lading at Tanis, with some Merchandize, in the Year 1658, for the Service of the said Proprietors, was seized in her Voyage to Leghorn, by a Ship of those Countries call'd the Vigilant, whereof John Jacobus Zoni was Master.

16. The Ship St. John, Cornelius Van Ringen Master, belonging to one Vincent de la Barre and Company, of English Merchants, being bought by their Order at Middelburg, in April 1658, and there laden, on design to go for Calbarne to trade for Negrees, was taken near to the Port of Calbarne by a Ship belonging by the Netherland West India Company, and confiscated at Calbarne aforesaid, notwithstanding that the said Company had given Permission to the said Vessel to the end aforesaid.

17. The Ship the Affida Merchant, being employed by Mr. Nicholas Backridge to go to Bantam to take in Focus Goods as the said Backridge had prepar'd there in July 1657, was hinder'd by a Ship of the Netherland West India Company, which was sent expressly from Batavia: and this was not known at London the 15th of January 1658-9, as will be made to appear.

18. The Ship Anne Pirry, belonging to David Peiferfen, John Dirick and Company, of English Merchants, as the said her Voyage from England in March, 1656, to go to Pontillera, between Leghorn and Smyrna; and being design'd ent Items of this Catalogue, which amount in the Whole to Forty-five, were not comprehended in any one Article of it; and as to the two India Ships, the English were left by the Treaty to prosecute their Claim, and the States deposited Eighty thousand Florins, by way of Indemnification, in case the Affair was decided against them.

The Pretence urg'd by Mr. de Wit to the Count d'Esbrades, that Downing push'd on the Rupture, because he had purchas'd the pretended Rights of the Owners of these Ships for a Trifle, deserves Mention, perhaps, but no Consideration; it not being conceivable, that the Concerns of Downing had the Weight of a Feather in the Scale: But that his Majesty was neither influenc'd by his Animosity to de Wit, nor his Fear that the Republic of Holland might one Day act in Concert with the persecuted Republicans of England, nor his Hopes of a plentiful Supply from his People, scarce anybody, who has carefully attended to the general Bias of his Reign, can say.

Hitherto, exasperated as the two Nations were against each other, they had avoided national Hostilities: The Dutch, because they were unwilling to come to Extremities; and the English, that they might not furnish France with a Pretence to take Part with the States, and declare against them.

But tho' the Sovereign Name was not always made use of, the Sovereign Power was employ'd on both Sides. In particular, Valckenburg, Director-General for the Dutch West India Company, upon the Coast of Guiney, had not only in the Name of the said Company, but even of the States General, set forth a Claim to the whole Coast, and warn'd all other Nations to be gone out of all those Quarters.

On the other hand, as this Declaration was levelled particularly at the English, (t) Sir Robert Holmes was sent with a Squadron of 21 Men of War, to assert the Rights of Great Britain, and put a stop to the Encroachments of the Dutch: Which he did for that time, very effectually, first by dispossessing them design'd for Surry, was seized by a Ship of Amsterdam, call'd the Arcton, whereof one Bar Moris, a Hollander, was Commander, who burnt and sunk her with all her Lading.

19. The Ship the Chibspan, belonging to John Allen, and Matthew Bubb, English Merchants, whereof Peter Blake was Commander, being sent to the Bowen upon the Coast of Guiney, with design to trade for Negres, was seiz'd in a hostile manner in the Month of January, 1661, by a Ship belonging to the West India Company of the United Netherlands, call'd the Pop Hero, which carried her to the Coast of Mina.

20. The Ship the Los Providence of London, belonging to Sir William Thompson and Company, of English Merchants, who load'd the said Ship at London, for Guiney, was seiz'd on in August, 1656, near to Cape Lopez in Guiney, by two Ships belonging to the Netherlands West India Company; the one call'd the Mary of Amsterdam, the other the Uicern of Middburgh, whereof John Strael of Menckuden was Commander.

21. The Ship call'd the Brasil Frigate of London, belonging to John Bight, Edward Russell and Company, of English Merchants, was seiz'd between Angola and Formosambick, in the Year 1657, by a Ship of Fishing call'd the Blues, whereof one Quarts was Commander.

22. The Ship Charis, whereof Captain Sprag was Commander, was seiz'd in the Road of St. Marins in France, in July, 1660, by three Men of War in the Service of the States General, and commanded by Captain Eens Doudhars.

23. The Ship Covent of London, whereof William Jurdan was Commander, as she sail'd from the Duven in October, 1661, on design to trade upon the Coast of Guiney, was seiz'd there by a Ship belonging to the Netherlands West India Company, call'd the Holy Barbara, which carried the said English Ship to a certain Island call'd the file of Gna.

24. The Ship, True Love, belonging to Sir Drooper, and other English Merchants, Edward Nicholas Commander, for certain Goods taken out of her belonging to English, and for the Freight of such Merchandizes as were taken out belonging to Portuguese, sent to St. Micbell, one of the Western Islands, by Azoborn Dominicus, Commander of the Ship the Dolphin of Fishing, in 1659. As likewise for Merchandizes taken out of the same in her Voyage between Lisbon and New England, in the Year 1660, by the Ships the St. John Baptist, whereof John Lopez was Commander, the Catharine, Captain Overzee Commander, and the Gulden Balg, Captain Thronway Commander.

25. The Ship Charles, belonging to Mr. James Barlow and Company, of English Merchants, whereof one John Blackler was Commander, being laden for their Particular upon the Coast of Guiney, was seiz'd upon the said Coast, in August 1661, by a Ship belonging to the Netherlands West India Company, call'd the Amsterdammer of Amsterdam, one Aaron Canaris Commander, and carried him to Castle Mina.

26. The Ship Pachet Frigate, whereof Edward Harvison was Master, belonging to one James Drawster and Company, of English Merchants, being laden at Genoa and Fisal, and design'd for London, was seiz'd in her Voyage at the Straits Mouth by a Netherlands Ship, call'd the Gulden Dak, commanded by Captain Albert Cook, about the 17th of May, 1654, O. S. and carried to Cozin in Spain, where the said English Ship, with part of her Lading was releas'd; and Satisfaction is now demanded for the rest, and for the Costage of the said Ship.

27. The Ship the Coastal Mary, belonging to Francis Bilton, Thomas Pezold, Richard Grove and Company, of English Merchants, whereof one David Lester was Master, being laden at London, and design'd for Guiney, was seiz'd upon the eighth of May, 1654, O. S. about 20 Leagues from the Cape Saint Vincent, by a Netherlands Man of War, call'd the Holy Gailis, whereof one Hayle Allurge was Commander, being, as he testified, in the Service of the States of the United Netherlands.

28. The Ship Nefra Nijssen of Romeida, having taken Merchandizes aboard in the Port of Massifer, upon the Island of Celebes, in the Great India, in the Year 1660, O. S. was seiz'd the 29th of May of the same Year, by two Ships of War in the Service of the Netherlands West India Company, which carried the said Ship to Batavia.

29. The Ship Leopard, belonging to Nicholas Banchart of London and Company, of English Merchants, was seiz'd near to Cape Blanc, in October, 1656, by the Chaloup of a Holland Man of War, both belonging to the Netherlands West India Company, and carried to the Coast of Angresey, at Cape Blanc.

30. The Ship the Golden Sow of Lubeck, having aboard her 110 Tons of Rye, and being freighted at Rost, upon the Baltic Sea, by one Thomas Bennett, Merchant of London, and for his Account in the Year 1659, was seiz'd by some Netherlands Men of War, belonging to the States General, and commanded by Admiral Opdam, who sent the said Ship to the Admiralty of Amsterdam.

31. The Ship call'd the Devo of London, belonging to one Jacob Grogger, John Warner and Company, of English Merchants, John Jackson Master, was seiz'd near to Stotland, on the North Side of Scotland, by a Netherlands Man of War, and sent to Encheyfen.

32. The Ship call'd the Rebecca of Spainish, George Baskerton Master, was seiz'd by a Man of War of Opdam, commanded by one Dorcelly, and carried into Zealand, and there they unladed a part of her Goods before any Trial in the Admiralty; and notwithstanding all the Affidavits and Applications which were made to the Admiralty of Zealand, the said Ship of War was forc'd to return to Sea and escape.

33. Seized by Admiral Opdam and other Vessels under his Command, upon the Coast of Portugal, in the Year 1660, the Fleet, or Portuguese Ships, a Quantity of Sugars and other Merchandizes belonging to the English, and carried away to Amsterdam and other parts of the United Provinces. (This Carriage was taken out of the Harlem Library.)

(t) Who, likewise in his turn, as the Dutch gave out, sent three Persons of condition to one Henry H. Williamson Cap. then commanded at Cape Verde for the West India Company, to certify, that he had express Orders from the King his Master to let all know, that the Right of trading upon the Coast of Africa, from Cape Verde to the Cape of Good Hope, was belong'd to him only, to the Exclusion of all other Nations.

them of Cape Verd, then of Cape Corfe, and afterwards of Nova Belgia, or, as it is now call'd, New York. And here occurs the grand Question, Whether the War, or this Expedition, which could scarce fail to render a War unavoidable, was the Dictate of Policy, or Justice? Mr. Rapin makes no Difficulty to decide this Question to the Disadvantage of the English, tho' he acknowledges he had never seen the Catalogue of Damages above alluded to. It is, however, indisputable, that, even in Drewing's Memorial to the States, dated April 7, 1665, the (u) Attack on Cape Verd, is in a manner given up, tho' in the very same Piece, that upon Cape Corfe is very circumstantially (v) justify'd. To say the Truth, when the States complain'd of Holmes, the King deny'd, that he had acted by his Commission; and yet did not punish him for having pretum'd to exercise

(u) The Clamours of the Dutch upon this Occasion, making a great Impression on the People, an Account of Holmes's Expedition was made public, from whence the following Abstracts were taken by Philips.

That Captain Robert Holmes, who was commanded for the Coast of Guinea, in October, 1663, coming thither, all People complain'd, as if the Dutch had treated the English; how they had engag'd the King of Barra to assault the English Factories; which Dutch failing, how they had endeavour'd to corrupt the Officers of the Charles and James Islands, to deliver up their Forts. How they had converted the King of England's Sign-Manual and Signet, to commence their Entry into the River, had they not been frustrated by the Notice which the King of Barra gave of the whole Design.

After this, Captain Holmes, for the better Security of some English Ships daily expected, sail'd to Cabo Verde, fearing one Jabalón, that was sail'd in the way; where without any Provocation, they fired from the Fort, killing his Master, and wounding divers of the Company; notwithstanding all which, the Governour surrendering the Place next Morning, he and all his Company were treated with all possible Respect and Civility by the Captain.

As Major they had been dealing with the King of that Place to throw out the English, inveigling the People abroad, and then abusing them under English Colours, the better to attain their Ends.

The like was done upon the Coast of Calle de Mina, where Falkenburgh offered a Betsy of Gold for every English Head.

At another time they had shot at a Convoy of Captain Holmes from a Fort of theirs which he call'd the Bliss, that they fell upon the Fort and took it, and would have put all the Hollanders to the Sword, had not the Captain prevented them.

Lastly, Captain Holmes having sent a Drum to Ariannoa, with honourable Proposals; contrary to the Rule of War, they mangled, strip, and left him dead upon the Place. Exploitatio in Heuta, p. 535, 536.

Note, Rapin affirms, that no Mention is made of the Cape Verd or Guinea Transactions, by any English Historian.

(v) The whole Passage is as follows: Concerning the Business of Cabo Corfe, they (the Dutch) say,

First, That it was attacked and taken, not by any Revenuers that happened in those Parts, and which might have provoked Captain Holmes to those Violences; but by express Order of the King of Great Britain, according to his own Confession and Declaration. Secondly, That the English have not pretended that Cabo Corfe did belong unto them; but since that, they had carried their Arms thither; and since that, they have taken it.

Concerning the first, he hath express and positive Orders from the King his Master to declare, That his Majesty did never avow or say that he had given Orders to Holmes for the taking of that Place. That in his Answer of the fifth of August last, given in writing to the Ambassador of this State, there is the following Clause: Concerning Captain Holmes, we have with great Sincerity assured the said Ambassador, that he had no Commission to take Cape Verd, nor any other Place belonging to the Dutch, or to do any Act of Hostility upon any of the Subjects of the United Provinces, that was not for the Defence of our Subjects, and their Trade in those Parts. That all he ever said to the said Ambassador concerning Cabo Corfe, was, that he looked upon the Case as to that Place, to be very much differing from that of Cabo Verde. And so much, as that if he had given Order for the taking thereof, very much might have been said for the Justification thereof. And to the like Effect doth he the said Envoy Extraordinary speak in his Memorial: That suppose his Majesty had permitted his Subjects to endeavour to recover the Possession thereof, it could not be thought strange, nor could this State have had any just Cause of Complaint or Grievance thereat; for the English had not only a bare Liberty of trading, or of having a Factory at that Place (as at several others upon that Coast) but one Thomas Crisp, chief Agent for the English Guinea Company, at the earnest Invitation of the King of Futa, whose Land that was, went thither about the End of the Year 1649, and purchased the Lands of the said King, and paid for it. And after all these things were concluded, the King's Officers summon'd all the Natives thereof by the best of Drum, both Men, Women and Children, to a very great Number; and when they were all come together, public and solemn Proclamation was then and there made, That the King of Futa, with the Consent of his Officers and great Men, had sold the Land of Cabo Corfe to him the said Crisp. Whereupon the People gave several great shouts, throwing the Dust up into the Air, and cry'd, That that was Crisp's Land. And the said Crisp is yet alive, and now at London, and hath by special Order of the King his Master sent to him the said Envoy the Contents hereof under his own Hand, with the Testimony of others that were then in those Parts, and know the same to be true. And some time after, a Party of the Natives of that Country falling upon the English House there, and robbing and plundering the same, and to the English retiring for the present, the Swedes came thither, demolished what had been there built by them, and built a Fort upon the Ground which the English had purchased. Afterwards the Danes drove out the Swedes, during the late War between those Crowns; and then the Dutch got the Place from the Danes. And so the Dutch derive from the Danes, can have no better Title than the Danes; and the Danes deriving from the Swedes, can have no better Title than that of the Swedes, who are the true Proprietors; and having built upon the Land of another without their Consent; and so the Question is fully, Whether the Land should follow the Fort or House, or the House the Land; and whether a Possession of so late a Date, can create a Title against a clear and undoubted Purchase.

And whereas they say, Page 26, That they had bought that Fort from the Danes. It is very well known, that the Ministers of Dronck do say and maintain, that the West India Company of this Country did never buy them out, but only that during the late Siege of Capebergen, and in the time of the low estate of that Kingdom, that the Governour-General for the Dutch West India Company, call'd Van Heften, did debauch and corrupt one Samuel Smith (who then commanded the said Place for the King of Dronck) to put the same into his Hands for a Price of seven or eight thousand Guilders; and that this was without the Knowledge, Permission, or Order of the said King. And this is their Title to this Place, about which they make so much ado. Nor did they content themselves with the said Fort, but, as in all other places, having once got footing, they fell immediately to the utter expelling of the English from all Share or Interest there. And whereas they had rebuilt themselves a House or Factory there, some belonging to the Dutch West India Company, and in their Service, did on the first of May, 1670, attack the same, and burn it, with all the Moveables and Merchandises. And it being afterwards rebuilt by the English, they hired others to set upon it, and burnt it again, with all the Merchandises therein; nor would so much as permit them to come and trade there with their Shipping. And the said Deputy's Rule is, Page 7, That we may retake by Arms, that which hath been gained by Arms. But this Case had been otherwise; for the Dutch having got into the said Fort, in manner aforesaid, were a little after driven out by one Jan Claes, who was General for the Natives; and the said Claes having driven them out, and knowing well that the undoubted Right of that Place did belong to the English, made a Tender to their Agent in those Parts to restore the same to them; but he was neither provided at that time with Men, nor other Necessaries for the restoring thereof; and before they came to him from London, the said Jan Claes died. Afterwards (and while the Dutch were still out of the Possession thereof) the Government of that Country sent a public Minister to Cornwallis, to treat with the English Agent there, about putting of the said Place again into their Hands: And a Treaty was perfolied and completed between the Governour of Futa, and Commissioners sent thither by the said Agent, and a Sum of Money paid in Hand according to the said Conditions. Nor was there so much as any certain Knowledge in England that the Dutch had repurchased themselves thereof, at the time when Holmes's Orders and Instructions were made, nor other News thereof than a Report which came about that time out of this Country. And, supposing it to be true, yet that could not alter such a Treaty made whole out of their Hands; and that Case being thus, if his Majesty had given him such Orders. [Drewing's Memorial, p. 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60.

A.D. 1663. exercise Hostilities on an Ally, without proper Authority for so doing. He was indeed sent to the Tower, for Form's Sake, and examin'd as a Delinquent, but in a very short time honourably discharged; having pleaded, as his Majesty inform'd the States, in 1666, "That, searching a Dutch Ship, in his Way to Guiney, he found Orders on board him, from the Dutch West India Company, to Valchenburg, to seize the English Fort Comantain; which induc'd him to trespass on his own: So that by this we are to understand, they were limited to Cape Carfe only."

Upon the Whole, it cannot be deny'd, that the English eagerly provok'd a War, and the Dutch at first, studiously sought an Accommodation, as will be farther explain'd in the Sequel; and therefore it may be fairly presum'd, in this, as in most other State Affairs, Policy advis'd what Justice was made to espouse, and that the Resolution was taken, before the Pretence was thought of.

We have already observ'd, that Downing had acted in Concert with Gamarra, the Spanish Minister at the Hague, and that the Court of England began to think the Friendship of Spain might be useful: But still we had sent no Minister to Madrid, nor even return'd his Catholic Majesty's congratulatory Embassy on the King's Restoration.

In the Beginning of the Year 1664, however, when the Dutch War was in Prospect, when it was uncertain what Part the French would take in it, and when the African Trade was thought a Matter of such prodigious Moment, Sir Richard Fanshawe was appointed Embassador Extraordinary to the King of Spain, with Instructions to excuse all Omissions, to cultivate a firm and lasting Union between the two Crowns, to feel the Pulse of those in Power, with respect to an Accommodation with Portugal, to solicit a free Trade into the West Indies, at least for a certain Number of Ships, in consideration of their being supply'd by England, at stated Times of the Year, with Negroes, at such Prices as should be agreed thereon, and to endeavour to procure an Appropriation of that Trade to England alone; disowning however his having any Authority to prosecute this particular Article, as a POINT OF STATE, unless a good Occasion should warrant it.

Affairs were now ripe for the Meeting of the Parliament; the People were sufficiently enflam'd against the Dutch, the Merchants were ready with their Complaints, and the Members to espouse them; notwithstanding which, the King, in his Speech to both Houses, forbore to make the least Mention of any Misunderstanding between him and the States, and thereby, most artificially, left the Parliament to make the War their own Act and Deed. On the contrary, he confin'd himself wholly to domestic Points; took occasion to open with some Bitterness against certain Whisperers, who had inspir'd into the Minds of the People, That the Parliament should meet no more, that it should either be presently dissolv'd, or so continu'd by Prorogation, that they should be kept without a Parliament; made a Transition to the late Conspiracy in the North; declar'd, they were not yet at the Bottom of that Business; that it was a Branch of one he had discover'd to them, as well as he could, two Years before; that there were still those, who pursu'd the same Consultations, &c. and having thus alarm'd their Fears, he proceeded as follows:

"Some would still insist upon the Authority of the Long Parliament, of which they say they have Members enough willing to meet: Others have fancied to themselves, by some Computation of their own, upon some (w) Clause in the Triennial Bill, That this present Parliament was at End some Months since; and that for want of new Writs, they may assemble themselves; and chuse Members for Parliament: And this is the best Expedient to bring themselves together, for their own Purposes. For the Long Parliament, you and I can do no more to inform and compose the Minds of all Men; let them proceed upon their Peril. But methinks there is nothing done to disabuse them in respect of the Triennial Bill. I confess, My Lords and Gentlemen, I have often myself read over that Bill; and tho' there is no Colour for the Fancy of the Determination of this Parliament, yet I will not deny to you, that I have always expected you wou'd, and even admired you have not consider'd the wonderful Clauses in that Bill, which pass'd in a Time very uncared for the Dignity of the Crown, or Security of the People. I pray, Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, give that Triennial Bill once a Reading in your House; and then, in God's Name, do what you think fit for me, and yourselves, and the whole Kingdom. I need not tell you how much I love Parliaments: Never King was so much beholden to Parliaments as I have been; nor do I think the Crown can ever be happy without frequent Parliaments. But, assure yourselves, if I did think otherwise, I wou'd never suffer a Parliament to come together by the Means prescribed by that Bill."

He then complain'd, that the Subsidies did not arise to half the Proportion they did in the Time of Queen Elizabeth: That the Merchants had Shifts to steal his Customs, and the Brewers his Excise; and that even the Heart-money did not produce so much this Year as the last. He therefore pray'd them to review that Bill, and to let him have the collecting and husbanding of it by his own Officers.

It is observable, that tho' his Majesty in this Speech so freely declar'd, that it de-

(w) It is provided, That a Parliament should be held in England every Third Year, and that the Lord Keeper and Chancellor of the Duchy should be sworn to issue the Writs, or in Default to issue their Places.

pended upon himself, whether he would comply with a positive Law, and thereby offer'd a very sensible Affront to the Constitution, no Notice seems to have been taken of it, in either House; on the contrary, his Will and Pleasure had the Force of a Command; that obnoxious Act was (x) repealed, with all imaginable Expedition; and, to qualify this excessive Resignation, without-doors, another was introduced, which provided, That Parliaments should not be interrupted, nor discontinued, above Three Years at the most; and this was no sooner ready, tho' the only one, but his Majesty went to the House, on purpose to give the Royal Assent to it, which he accompany'd with a (y) Speech, at once admirably adapted to inspire a high Idea of Monarchy, and captivate the Affections of the People.

At the same time that the House thus obsequiously remov'd the Corner-stone of their own Significance and Importance, they likewise adopted that other Court Job, of nursing the Quarrel against the Dutch. A Committee was appointed to invite Evidence, and search out Complaints, against them: And, Matter enough having been found, to furnish out a plausible Pretence to demand Satisfaction, and authorise a Rupture, the following Resolutions were agreed upon:

Resolutions against the Dutch.

That the Wrongs, Dishonours, and Indignities, done to his Majesty, by the Subjects of the United Provinces, by invading of his Right in India, Africa, and elsewhere; and the Damages, Affronts, and Injuries, done by them to our Merchants, were the greatest Obstructions to all foreign (z) Trade: And therefore, that his Majesty should be mov'd to take a speedy and effectual Course for the Redress thereof; and that they would assist him with their Lives and Fortunes, against all Opposition whatsoever.

With these the Lords also concurred, and both Houses presented them to the King, as the Sense of the Nation; who, in return, declar'd his high Esteem of their Care and Tenderneſs for the Honour and Good of the Nation; express'd his own Royal Sense of preserving the Freedom of Trade, and the Dominion of the Seas; signify'd, he would examine and prove the particular Complaints, that he would demand Satisfaction, by a public Minister, and do his utmost Endeavours to secure his Subjects from the like Violences for the future, depending upon the Promise of both Houses to supply him. In which last Particular, the judicious Reader will find a Clue to the whole Intrigue.

Having thus gratify'd the Court, and reliev'd the Prerogative, their next Care was to make another Sacrifice to the Church. It was not enough, that the Nonconformists were ejected, and branded as Schismatics; they were still follow'd, still careſ'd, still admir'd by the Multitude: And this was what their domineering Adversaries could neither endure nor forgive. As therefore the Shepherd had already felt their Fury, the Flock was now to be scatter'd: And it is extremely worthy of Remark, that, in the Act to prevent and suppress seditious Conventicles, which was made the Instrument of their Vengeance, Diligence and Schism are blended together, and it is presum'd, that no Man can be a Sectary, without being a Traitor.

The Words in the second Clause of the Act are these:

“ For providing therefore further and more speedy Remedies against the growing and dangerous Practices of seditious Sectaries, and other disloyal Persons, who, under pretence of tender Conſciences, do, at their Meetings, contrive Insurrections, as late Experience has shew'd.”

By this severe and unchristian (a) Act, any Five Persons, over and above those of the same Household, assembled to worship God, after a different Mode from that of the establish'd Church, constitute an unlawful Conventicle, every one of which, if above Sixteen,

(s) Of which the Speaker, Sir Edward Turner, took occasion, in his Speech to the King, at the End of the Session, thus frankly to enlarge:

“ The first Thing we took into Consideration, was the Act made in the Sixteenth of the late King, of glorious Memory, for Triennial Parliaments: When we had given it a Reading, we found it derogatory to the essential Prerogative of the Crown, of Calling, Holding, and Dissolving Parliaments: We found it unpracticable, and only useful to learn the People how to rebel; therefore we melted it down, extracted the pure Metal from the counterfeit and drossy Alloys, and then presented it to your Majesty to be new stamp'd, and made current Coin for the Use of the Nation.”

(t) My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ You will easily believe, that I have come very willingly to give my Assent to this Bill. I do thank you very heartily for your so unanimous Concurrence in it, and for your desiring me specially to finish it. And, if I understand any thing that concerns the Peace and Security of the Kingdom, and the Welfare of my Subjects (all which I study more than my Prerogative, and indeed I consider my Prerogative in order only to preserving the other) every good Englishman will thank you for it: For the Act you have repealed could only serve to discredit Parliaments, and to make the Crown jealous of Parliaments, and Parliaments of the Crown, and perſuade neighbour Princes, that England was not govern'd under a Monarch. It could never have been the Occasion of frequent Parliaments. I do promise you, I will not be an Hour the less without one for this Act of Repeal; nor, I am sure, will you be the less kind to me in Parliament. I do again

“ thank you for your excellent Temper, and Respect to me, and desire you so to proceed, that the Session may be within the Time I propos'd to you last. And I do assure you, upon my Word, and I pray believe me, that I will have no other Thoughts or Designs in my Heart, but to make you all happy, in the Support of the Religion and Laws established: And, if my own Wants and Necessities are at any time grievous to me, it is only as I apprehend I may not be able sufficiently to provide for those, and for the Peace and Security of the Kingdom. And therefore I am confident, that you and I, who agree in the End, shall never differ in the Way.”

(u) See a Letter of Mr. Secretary Bretvil to the Duke of Ormond, expressing the secret Sentiments of the Court at this Juncture, dated April 25, 1664.

“ The Houses have agreed to the Vote of Trade, with that complimentary Addition, which your Grace fees in the inclosed Paper, and which, if it have no further Effect, would at least be a Point of just Reputation to his Majesty's Government: And in so short a Session the World shall see, the Triennial Bill be repealed, and such a Vote as this, after they had been prepared to expect nothing but Contentions and Disputes with the Crown, in the most jealous Points belonging to it.”

(a) Phillips affirms, that it was the whole Employ of the Magistrates, this Year, to apprehend and try the Offenders against this Statute, p. 577; and, that the Nonconformist Teachers might, if possible, be starv'd out of their Hierarchy, a Proclamation was let forth, to prohibit, all Persons to seek, demand, receive, or deliver, any Contributions or Supplies, but what were publicly allow'd and granted, without allowance of the Lords of the Privy Council.

A. D. 1664. teen, was liable, for the first Offence, to be imprison'd three Months, or pay five Pounds; for the second, to be imprison'd six Months, or pay ten Pounds; and, for the third, to be transported for seven Years, or pay one hundred Pounds. And, by the tenth Clause, the Lieutenants, or Deputy Lieutenants, or any commission'd Officers of the Militia, or ANY OTHER OF HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES, as well as the Sheriffs and Judges of the Peace, &c. with such Troops or Companies of Horſe or Foot, as they should think meet, or could be got in Readiness, on receiving a Certificate under the Hand and Seal of any Justice of Peace, were commission'd to put the Act in Force.

These were the principal Transactions of this Session: For, as to Money-matters, which have since been the annual, if not the sole, Business of Parliament, as no new Demand was made by the Court, no new Imposition was laid upon the People. Indeed, the House gratify'd the King with an Act to levy the Heart's-money by Officers of his own, who were thereby authoris'd to visit every House, once a Year; and hence that Duty became the most odious and burthenſome of any that had been laid upon the Subject.

May 17, the King came to the House of Peers, to close the Session; upon which Occasion having acknowledg'd, that the Parliament had gratify'd him in all he desir'd, his Majesty was pleas'd to add,

"You will watch those unquiet Spirits, which are still lurking, and ready to embrace all Opportunities to involve the Nation in new Divisions, under what specious Pretences soever; and you will carefully inform the People, how much it is in their own Power to be as happy as they can wish to be. Indeed, if they are truly sensible of their present Happiness, it will quickly be improv'd."

He concluded with giving both Houses to understand, that, because something extraordinary might fall out (alluding to the intended Rupture with the Dutch) he should prorogue them but till August; but withal signify'd, that, unless there was Occasion, he should not summon them till November.

We have here the King's own Evidence, that the Parliament had answer'd all his Expectations; and yet his Secretary, Bennet, in a Letter to the Duke of Ormond, dated May 14, 1664, could not help declaring, (b) that the Court was most at Ease, when fairly rid of them.

Progress of the Quarrel with the Dutch.
Notwithstanding the Cry of the People, the Zeal of the Parliament, and the Disposition of the Court, the great Affair of a Rupture with the Dutch remain'd still in Suspence; for, as the States continued to seek an Accommodation, it could not as yet be handsomely refus'd them.

But tho' they chose to avoid a War, if possible, they resolv'd not to be unprovided, in case it should happen; either to defend themselves at home, or avenge themselves abroad. Their Conduct indeed was rather cunning than honest. In the Beginning of the Year, they had invited the King to act in concert with them, against the Algerines; his Majesty comply'd: Sir John Lawson was sent into the Mediterranean, on the Behalf of England, and de Ruyster of Holland. Upon the Meeting of the two Squadrons, the Dutch made no Difficulty of paying the English all the Honours of the Sea, which the Last, with inexcusable Incivility, neglected to acknowledge: With this Affront de Ruyster did not fail to make his Masters acquainted: And, in the September following, he receiv'd Orders to quit the Mediterranean, without taking Leave, and sail for Guiney; where he reduc'd all the Places, lately taken by the English, except Cape Corſe and Cbema; and, over and above, made himself Master of Fort Cormantin, which had always been in the Possession of the English.

Sir George Downing, in his Memorial of April 7, 1665, asserts, That there were laid up beforehand in Readiness, about Cadix, all manner of Provisions and Necessaries for such a Voyage. And we have a Minute, in a Letter from Mr. d'Estrades to the King his Master, dated October 30, 1664, that de Ruyster had actually taken in six Months Provisions at that Port, under Colour of an Expedition against the Moors of Salley; that it was then known, he had receiv'd Orders to make for the Coast of Guiney; and that Sir John Lawson, who was return'd to England, gave out, that he, de Ruyster, had 13 large Men of War, and 3500 Soldiers, and was in a Condition to accomplish whatever he should undertake.

It is likewise observable, that Van Beuningen, Embassador from the States to the most Christian King, in the said Month of September, signify'd to that Prince, That the States had sent a Fleet to Guiney, not to attack reciprocally the Forts, Ships, and Goods, of the Subjects of England, but to retake what had been unjustly taken from them. Whereas no sooner was he arriv'd there, but finding (c) eight English Merchant-ships, which were but just come upon the Coast, he seiz'd upon them all, and appropriated their Cargoes to the Use of the Dutch West India Company. Nay, to render this invidious Proceeding still more unsuspected, the States, in the same Month of September, came to a Resolution to communicate to the Court of England their Purpose to send Van Campen with a small Squadron to (d) Guiney, That his Majesty

(a) The whole Passage ran thus:

"We hoped his Majesty would have been this Day at the Parliament to prorogue it, but the Difficulties that offer'd themselves in passing the Conventicle Bill, spun out the time till it was too late; but what was done this Day, will be on Monday, by the Grace of God. Altho' there be Safety, as Salomon says, in a Multitude of Counsellors, yet we cannot but think ourselves at Ease when we are fairly rid of them."

(c) According to Mr. d'Estrades, it was known in Holland in July, that the English had taken four Ships in Guiney, belonging to the West India Company, which was there look'd upon as the first Treason: But not till October, that they had taken Cape Corſe.

(d) It ought here to be remember'd, "That his Majesty gave the States to understand, that if they sent such Force to Guiney as to give a just Cause of Jealousy to him "in the Behalf of his Possessions there, that he should find himself

A. D. 1664. might be entirely assur'd of the Sincerity of their Intention for their Conservation of Peace, and of all good Understanding with him. Whence his Majesty was to conclude, that they neither had, nor would, without farther Provocation, have recourse to the Sword.

Fearing however, that his Majesty was too well acquainted with them to be so easily deluded, they resolv'd to be in a Condition to repel Force by Force, and not merely depend on the Courtesy of England. Accordingly, Opdam, with Twenty-seven Men of War, was appointed to convoy this Reinforcement thro' the Channel, as far as the Coast of Spain; with Orders not to omit any of the usual Compliments to the English Fleet, in case of a Rencontre; but to sink, burn, and destroy, any Ships whatever, that should attempt to interrupt his Passage.

Lord Arlington's Letters, Vol. II.

So early as May, Intelligence had been receiv'd here, that the Dutch were working Night and Day, to set out a Fleet of Thirty Sail at least: As, therefore, the Parliament had granted no extraordinary Supply, it was thought advisable to borrow at first 100,000 Pounds, and afterwards as much more, of the City of London, to enable his Majesty to keep pace with the Dutch, in his military Preparations, and be as forward to face the Enemy, as they to fall in his Way.

What the City cheerfully supply'd, the King so effectually employ'd, (in his own Person journeying from Port to Port, to animate his Subjects, and forward the Work) that, by the Beginning of November, a gallant Navy, under the Command of the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, and the Earl of Sandwich, was assembled at Portsmouth, and ready to put to Sea. However no Action follow'd; the Dutch continu'd in their Ports, either out of Fear, as we flatter'd ourselves, or for want of favourable Winds and Weather, which is perhaps the Matter of Fact.

Conduct of France at this Time.

Most of our Historians ascribe the Original of this Quarrel between the two maritime Powers to the Intrigues of France; but not the least Shadow of a Proof appears in support of this Opinion: On the contrary, as soon as it began to wear a serious Face, we find the most Christian King, in a Letter, dated July 11, 1664, to his Ambassador Esbrades, declaring, that his sincere Affection for the Welfare and Quiet of both States would not permit him to be any longer silent; that he would have him demand an express Audience of the States, to represent to them, in the most lively manner, how much they ought in Prudence to avoid a War; how much their Trade would suffer by it; to exhort them, out of pure and sincere Friendship, to forward an Accommodation, by their Readiness to shew a Compliance on their Part; and to offer his Mediation with the King of England, to bring it about.

To the King of England, on the other hand, he resolv'd to send an extraordinary Embassy, consisting of the Duke de Verneuil, Mr. Comingses, and Mr. Courtin, with an Offer of his said Mediation: But he soon found, that it would be no very easy Matter to get it accepted. Tho' the States so passionately desired to avoid a War, that they shew'd a Disposition to comply with many (e) things, which they held to be disputable, no Consideration could prevail with them to part with their Hold on the Coast of Guiney: And nothing less would satisfy England; who, as before observ'd, had solicited the Rupture with no other View.

When therefore it became manifest that the Mediation was like to be fruitless, each Party address'd itself to secure the Interest and Power of the Mediator.

The Dutch call'd upon him loudly to fulfil his Obligations by the late Treaty with the States, and take a Part in the War; he being, at that time, under no Engagement with England to the contrary: And, as a farther Inducement, Mr. de Wit gave the Count d'Esbrades to understand, that it was very easy to involve the King of England in Troubles at home: That the different Sects, who were all malecontent, might without Difficulty be induced to make an Insurrection, when the Forces of the Kingdom were employ'd at a Distance: That the Presbyterians, of both England and Scotland, had already (f) open'd themselves on this Head

"himself oblig'd to stand aloof. The Consequence whereof would inevitably be a Breach between him and them." Lord Arlington's Letters, vol. li. p. 46.

(e) They authori'd the most Christian King to declare to his Brother of England, That, in case he, the King of England, would secure to the States the Restitution of the Ports and Ships, his most Christian Majesty would secure to England Satisfaction from the States, as to their Pretensions for Damages. They endeavour'd, likewise, to have the War confin'd to Africa and the East and West Indies; but both these Proposals were rejected.

(f) This is confirm'd by General Ludlow himself in his Memoirs. It will insert the whole Passage as it serves to show how impolitically the Court had acted, in driving these Men to Despair; and by imposing fresh Grievances, provoking, and in a manner authorizing, fresh Troubles.

In this Posture of Affairs, the Court of England thought fit to declare War against the States General of the United Provinces; by means of which, some of our Friends conceiving great Hopes of the Restitution of the Commonwealth, enter'd into a Treaty with divers principal Ministers of that Country, for procuring some Forces to join with our oppressed Party in England, against the Common Enemy. Having received Information of this Treaty, and being presented by a Person of Honour and Integrity to declare my Concurrence in the thing, I acquainted him, That tho' I should be ready to embrace any good Occasion of serving the Commonwealth, and relieving my Country from Oppression; and that I had no great Reason to be a Friend to the present Establishment, yet the Treachery of the Dutch, in delivering up three Friends, Okey, Corbet, and Starbuck, into the Hands of their Enemies, made me fear the same Treatment from them in case of an Accommodation with England. For if they had purchased their former Agreement with the Price of that Blood, I could see no Reason to persuade me that they would not purchase another with ours: I told him, That all Men knew they prefer'd the Profits of Trade before any other thing in the World; and how dangerous it might prove to engage with such a sort of Men, I left to his Judgment to determine; that being convinc'd in Conscience that they had contracted the Guilt of the Blood of our Friends upon themselves, my Duty would not permit me to act in Conjunction with them, till they should make Satisfaction for that Injustice: However, I offer'd that if they might be brought to disown that Action, as done by the Influence of a particular Faction, and promise, at a more convenient time, to punish the immediate Authors, I would freely hazard my Life in the Expedition.

A. D. 1664. Head to some Ministers of the States: And, that his Masters would do their utmost to embroil the King of England as much as possible, in case he persisted in refusing all Offers of an Accommodation: The States also assur'd his most Christian Majesty, that they would hearken to no Proposals against his Interest; from which they moreover promis'd never to depart. But this not coming up to that Monarch's Expectations, he found In the men time I received a Letter from Mr. Say, who was then at Amsterdam; in which, among other things, I found these Expressions;

"Believe me, Sir, things are so well prepared here to answer the good Ends we all desire, that nothing seems to be wanting but Hands to set the Wheels going. Invitations and Encouragements are not only offered, but prest upon you; and there is no ground to fear their Retreat, of which you seem to doubt. The Ruin of the present Government in England is certainly intended, and I have Cause to believe will be effected; the States being unanimously for this War, and at last brought to see that their Commonwealth cannot long subsist, if Monarchy continue in England. Of this they will give the clearest Evidence, as well of their Resolution to assist the Commonwealth Interest as far as shall be desired; in which they seem to be no less zealous, than how to defend themselves. As to the Usage our three Friends met with in this Country, I have examined the Particulars, and find the thing to have passed in a different manner than has been represented: They are able here to give you, or any Person, Satisfaction, that the Matter does not lie so foul upon them, as is generally conceived; and would, if it might be any way conducing to the Advantage of our Affairs, set that Business in its true Light. But this is not thought advisable at present by many of our Friends, who think such a Course may too much alarm the Court of England, and put them upon Measures of procuring Peace at any rate. The King of England is never mentioned without the utmost Contempt, and Writings every Day published to expose his Person and Government. You may propose what you please for your Safety, and I dare answer it shall be granted; only I must take leave to tell you, that the most private manner of treating, is best approved by our Friends. The Offers they make here are very great, and yet no Promises exacted from us for their Security. Therefore I beg of you to think of seeing this Place, and quitting the Quarters where you are, that you may be instrumental in the Service of your Country at this time. I am certainly informed, That considerable Numbers in England, Scotland and Ireland, sensible of their present Servitude, will appear for us; and such Measures will be taken here for their Assistance, that I have great Hopes of Success. Nothing seems now so much wanting as fixed Councils both here and in England, and no one can be more serviceable than yourself in this important Matter; I beseech you therefore let us have your Help, for we cannot be without it, and I am persuaded the Work will prosper in our Hands. Make all the Expedition you can in your Journey; for tho' this be not the Conjunction of Action, yet I am persuaded 'tis in high time to be preparing, and 'will be to our Shame if we neglect it."

About eight Days after this, I received another from the same Person; in which, having desired me to give credit to the Contents of his last, he added, "That the Herr Niesperer had, at a Conference, assured him, That the Intentions of the Government of Holland were to relieve the good People in England; and that he should be glad of any Overtures to that purpose from me or any other Persons; That there was more in the Design of this War than was commonly understood, and that the Destruction of the whole Protestant Party was intended: That some of the most eminent of that Religion in France, had sent Messengers into Holland to give Information of this Matter; advising, That the States would make the best Preparations they could for their Defence, and assuring, That if they should be borne down in this War, the Reformed Religion would soon be extinguished in France: That the Dutch had thirty thousand Men ready to put on board their Fleet, of which Number ten thousand were Land Soldiers, and to be disposed as we should advise and direct; That a great Sum of Money was prepared for this Service, and that the whole Fleet should be commanded to favour our Enterprise: That if it should be thought necessary to transport Horse into England, the States would willingly comply in that also, having resolv'd to endeavour a perfect Friendship with the good People of England, which he said, he hoped should never be broken. At the bottom of the Letter were these Words: "I beg of you to lay aside all former Prejudices, and as you love the Cause in which you have engag'd, come speedily, and let your Heart and Hand to this Work. I can certainly assure you, That the most considerable Minister of this State, has lately very much inquired for you, and having received some account of you, has given us reason to hope, That if you will come to them in this Conjunction, they will place you at the Head of such a Number of Men, as should, by the Blessing of God, and the Concurrence of our Friends in England, be sufficient to redore the monarchy. I dare assure you from the best Information I can get, that on such an Occasion there would be a greater Appearance for us, than at the beginning of the late War. Let me therefore not hear from you, but see you."

The'se Offers were very advantageous, especially to one in my Condition, and the Honour I received more than I could expect, yet these things, I thank God, were no Temptation to me. The Cause of my Country, which is dearer to me than my Life, was that alone which made me earnestly wish, That I could have persuaded my self to lay hold of this Opportunity, and to join with my Friends in this Enterprise for our common Deliverance. But the Reason, before mentioned, fat so close upon me, that I was constrained, not without great Regret, to acquit my Friends with my Intentions to persist in my former Resolution, not to enter into a Conjunction of Councils and Interests with the Dutch, all they had given Satisfaction touching the Business of the three Gentlemen they had so insidiously delivered into the Hands of our Enemies, together with some reasonable Assurances that they would not abandon the Commitments of such an Oath, join with them.

In the mean time, a Person of Honour and Quality of the English Nation whom I had never seen, being then at Paris, took care to let me know by a third Hand, that the King of England suspecting I would join with the Dutch against him, had caus'd the Allegiance to double their Diligence, and that the Person who had murder'd Mr. Life was come to Paris, accompany'd with others of the same Trade, and had undertaken either to carry me off alive, or to dispatch me upon the Place. St. Du, another of this Tribe, endeavoured also to engage one Monsieur Tornius, a Gentleman of Secy, and my Friend, in the Design against me, promising him a great Recompence if it proved successful. He dated his Letter from Paris, and desir'd the Answer to be directed to one at Lyons. But Monsieur Tornius suspecting him to be nearer to us than he would have it believed, and being desirous to penetrate farther into their Secrets, told him in his Answer, that Money was not to be refused; but that I kept myself so much upon my Guard, that nothing could be attempted without previous Consultation. This Gentleman did me the favour to give me a sight of the Letter and Answer, with Assurances of his Service, and a Promise to send me St. Du's Reply as soon as it should come to his Hands.

These things made me resolve upon withdrawing from my Lodgings at Feuoy, and lying privately for some time, that my Enemies might be amused, and uncertain how to lay their Designs; which having done, it produced the Effect I desired. For no sooner had I withdrawa my self from the public View, but it was generally concluded that I was gone for Holland, which, I conjecture, might put a stop to the Designs against me for that time, and render'd my Countrymen at Feuoy more safe and undisturb'd than they had formerly been.

During this Retirement, I received Letters from my Friends in England, with Advice, that four Persons had been dispatch'd by the King for our Parts with the accustomed Instructions; but hearing no more concerning them, I concluded they were either the Villains of whom I was formerly inform'd from Paris, or Part of those who had been sent to Amberg, with Orders from the same Hands to assist one Colonel Algeron Sidney; and probably being ten in number might have effected their Design, if having undertaken a Journey to Holland upon Business relating to the Public, he had not removed from that Place before their Arrival. Thus far Mr. Ludlow.

With regard to the References to the assassinating Projects, so often mentioned in this Quotation, the Death of Mr. Life, who had been Lord Keeper to the Protector, and who was then Summer thro' the Back at Langport, gives them but too much Authority: It being scarce possible to conceive that any Man's Zeal would prompt him to expose himself to the Danger and Disgrace inseparable from so wicked and desperate an Undertaking, unless he was both countenanced and rewarded by his Superiors. It may be added that the King's Ministers, as well as the Cavalier Party, spoke of the Fact with a sort of Approbation; and as is plain from the following Paragraph of a Letter from Mr. Secretary Benner, to Sir Richard Fanshawe. "The New Books will tell you Excellency a strange Story of Life, the Diener's Keeper, which is every Word true; and the Observation of it very well made, that God Almighty's Justice, would not let these Villains go quietly to their Graves." Lord Arlington's Letters, vol. ii. p. 43.

found Expedients to excuse himself from returning an explicit Answer; and, in the mean time gave Mr. d'Esfrades to understand, in Confidence, that, before he should undertake to assist them in earnest, he should insist on a new Assurance, in the Form he should prescribe, for his entire Security, that they would never any more enter into any Confederacy against him.

d'Esfrades.

The Court of England, on the other hand, now thinking the Interest of Commerce to be more nearly and intimately their Concern than the Balance of Europe, endeavour'd to win over the most Christian King to their Party, by offering him a Carte blanche, for every thing he could desire in the Netherlands, without pretending to an Inch of Ground in Return: And, that this extravagant Proposal was not accepted of, can be no otherwise accounted for, than by his most Christian Majesty's Letter to Mr. d'Esfrades, of January 2, 1665, in which he declares, "That, whatever he should resolve on, it very much import'd him, that the States should not be crush'd; because, by that means, the Power of England at Sea would become too formidable."

A little embarrass'd he confesses himself to have been, and at a Loss with which Party to close; not from the Difficulty to decide which was in the Right: He had no such Scruples; but which it was most his Interest to oblige. According to him, both were in the wrong: For, in his Letter of June 27, 1664, he declares, "The more he considers Mr. de Wit's Memorials relating to the Ships Good Hope and Bonadventure, the less he was able to conceive, what the English could ground their Pretensions upon." And, in that of December 26, of the same Year, it is his Opinion, "That the States had drawn the Quarrel on themselves, by endeavouring to engross all the Trade of Africa". What an Image have we here of the Principles and Practices of Princes!

We have had no Occasion as yet, to mention the Emperor, because he had not as yet seem'd to know, that there was any such Prince in Europe as King Charles: This Year however he condescended to dispatch an Envoy to the English Court, to solicit Aid against the Turk; which was civilly refus'd, and which, as it happen'd, his Imperial Majesty did not stand in need of: For, having made a successful Campaign, a Cessation of Arms was first agreed upon; and that, in the End, made way for a Peace.

But the Empire had scarce taken Breath on that Side, before it was again embroil'd on the other: For the French, under Pretence of taking the Elector of Mentz into their Protection, invaded Germany, took Erford, and struck a Terror into all the neighbouring Princes.

Hence, it may be presum'd, arose the Proposal, which, about this time, was made by the Bishop of Munster to the States, to enter into a League with the Emperor, the Duke of Saxony, and other Princes of the Empire. But this, in their present Disaffections, the States could scarce give Ear to; and, at the Instance of the French Ambassador, found themselves oblig'd to reject: Which coming to the Knowledge of Downing, he took the Advantage to enter into a Conference with Friguet, an Agent of the Imperial Court, in which he told him, It was time for the Emperor to open his Eyes, and take Vengeance on the States, for all the Injuries and Oppressions they had committed on the neighbouring Princes, who were Vassals of the Empire: And that he had now a fair Opportunity to do it; since he had Orders from the King his Master to negotiate a League with the Emperor, on the express Condition, of never coming to an Accommodation with the said States, till his Imperial Majesty, and every Member of the Empire, had obtain'd full Satisfaction.

Whether any Progress was made in this Affair, does not appear; but this one Circumstance is sufficient to shew, that every Measure which might contribute to the Ruin of the Republic, was eagerly embrac'd by the Court of England.

Indeed, Sir John Lawson's well-founded Opinion, that de Ruyter was slip'd away to Guiney, had now so extirpated both Ministers and People, that they no longer thought themselves oblig'd to preserve any Temper with the States. All that Sir Robert Holmes had done, they foresaw would be undone. They could not bear the Thought, of having the African Trade again forc'd out of their Hands; nor could they forgive themselves for having been thus over-reach'd. That, however, they were over-reach'd, ought probably to be put to Downing's Account; for Mr. d'Esfrades not only hints, that he had been reprimand'd for being defective in his Intelligence with respect to de Ruyter's Orders; but in one of Downing's own (g) Letters to Sir Richard Fanshawe, dated October 20, 1664, O. S. he seems to give no Credit to Sir John Lawson's Opinion, concerning the Expedition to Guiney.

There is, indeed, something very unaccountable in our whole Conduct at this time: When the Dutch first threaten'd to send their Guiney Fleet thro' the Channel, the Earl of Sandwich with a strong Squadron was station'd at the Downs to dispute their Passage, and Prince Rupert with another was appointed to sail for Guiney, September 30th. Again, so early as the 15th of that Month, it appears by a Letter from Mr. Godolphin to Sir Richard Fanshawe, that de Ruyter's intended Enterprize had alarm'd the Court: And in the same Letter, it is added, That Sir John Lawson hath Order from the Duke to do his Part. And yet Sir John Lawson and de Ruyter were both in the Bay of Cadiz together: De Ruyter sail'd from thence for Guiney October 5; N. S.: Sir John quitted the same Port

(g) His Words are these:

hensions that de Ruyter is gone to Guiney; but put not yourself to Pain thereof." Fanshawe's Letters, p. 302.

two Days after, and arriv'd at Portsmouth the 11th, O. S. and Prince Rupert never proceeded to Guiney at all.

While Affairs were thus circumstanc'd, a general Council was held, wherein it was resolv'd to begin Hostilities without Delay; which it was understood, de Ruyter's Behaviour in Guiney would justify. Accordingly, without any previous Declaration of War or public Issue of Letters of Mart and Reprizal, all the Vessels belonging to the Dutch, which as yet confided in the Public Faith, were seiz'd in our Ports: Our Men of War, likewise, fell upon their homeward bound Trade, from the North, in the Channel, in the Mediterranean: And the Number of Captures before the End of the Year, we are told, amounted to (b) one Hundred and thirty-five.

There was now a Necessity for the King to summon his Parliament, that they might make good their Engagements of assisting him with their Lives and Fortunes.

Accordingly, November 24, both Houses being assembled, his Majesty was pleas'd to signify "How unkindly he had been treated by his Neighbours the Dutch; how much he thought it his Duty to vindicate the Rights of his Subjects, and the Honour of himself and his Kingdoms; how, to this end, he had, upon the Stock of his own Credit, set forth a Navy that would guard his Seas, and would not decline meeting with all the Naval Power of the United Provinces; that he had almost emptied his own Stores, and had very liberally borrowed of the City of London; so that to discharge the one, and replenish the other, would require little less than eight hundred thousand Pounds; that he had reason to expect from them a speedy and substantial Supply, and must desire them to frame their Resolutions with all necessary Expedition."

He then proceeded as follows: "Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, I know not whether it be worth my Pains to endeavour to remove a vile Jealousy which some ill Men scatter abroad, and which, I am sure, will never sink into the Breat-

"of any Man who is worthy to sit upon your Benches. That when you have given me a noble and proportionable Supply for the Support of a War, I may be induced by some evil Counsellors (for they will be thought to think very respectfully of my Person) to make a sudden Peace, and get all the Money for my own private Occasions. But let me tell you, and you may be confident of it, that when I am compell'd to enter into a War for the Protection, Honour, and Benefit of my Subjects; I will (God willing) not make a Peace, but upon the obtaining and securing those Ends for which the War is enter'd into; and when that can be done, no good Man will be sorry for the Determination of it."

Cautious as the Parliament had hitherto been, of not parting entirely with the Power of the Purse, their Indignation against the Dutch was now become so much stronger than their Distrust of the Court, that, the very second Day of their Sitting, they gratify'd his Majesty with a Supply of Twenty-four hundred thousand Pounds, to be rais'd in three Years. But, though they were unanimous in their Grant, they had (i) warm Debates on the Ways and Means of raising it; in so much that the Bill was not ready for the Royal Assent till the Eleventh of February.

This was the only Remarkable of the Session; except the Variation that was made in the Manner of taxing the Clergy: For whereas, before, they had tax'd themselves in Consecration, it was now thought their Interest to waive this Privilege, and to submit to the Assessments of Parliament, in common with their Fellow-subjects; but not without a Consideration: Two of the Subsidies, they had before granted to his Majesty, were remitted to them; and they were enabled, for the future, to give their Votes in the Choice of Members of Parliament.

In this Interval, the most Christian King, and the States, began to entertain some Suspicions of each other: Van Gooch, the Dutch Minister in England, gave his Masters Advice, that there seem'd to be a secret Intelligence between France and England: And his most Christian Majesty assur'd Mr. d'Estrades,

(b) The Lord Chancellor in his Speech to both Houses, by the King's Command, October 10th, 1665, affirms, The Loading of our Ship was not sold or disposed of, till his Majesty had receiv'd full Information of de Ruyter's having begun the War upon the Coast of Africa. The same thing was, likewise, inserted in the Declaration of War against the States, as follows:

"We thereupon gave Order for the detaining the Ships belonging to the States of the United Provinces, their Subjects and Inhabitants; yet notwithstanding we did not give any Commission for Letters of Mart, nor were there any Proceedings against the Ships detained, until we had a clear and undeniable Evidence that de Ruyter had put the said Orders in Execution, by seizing several of our Subjects Ships and Goods."

(i) My last told your Excellency of the opening of the Parliament by his Majesty's Speech, and the next Day to justify all the fair Hopes we had of their supporting cheerfully this War, the House of Commons voted the raising to his Majesty, in three Years, two Millions five Hundred Thousand Pounds Sterling: But coming the next Day to debate the manner of raising it, they did not agree to well, but parted late in the Evening with great Heat: Notwithstanding which, they have this Day concluded very peaceably, that the Committee of the whole House do proceed to consider of the raising of the 2,500,000 l. (the exact Sum was 2,477,500 l.) in a regulated, subsidiary way, reducing the same to a Certainty in all Counties, so as no Person for his real or personal Estate be exempted. The great Strife hath betwixt them Subsidies and Land-Tax: The first will make a great Noise, and one of uncertain Value; the last was the Child of these ill Times, hath been reason'd for since the King came home, and, at the best, is unequally laid upon all the Counties: so that your Excellency must not be surpris'd, if you hear some Days have been spent in making the manner effective, since all agree in the Quarant. Mr. Secretary Berner to Lord Holles at Paris.

(k) Van Renswighers at Paris, likewise discovered, that another great Charge of Money had been sent to Holland under the Guard of 100 Horses. This the States suspected was for the use of the King of England. But his most Christian Majesty, in his Letter of January 30, 1665, on the contrary declares, That it was neither to be sent to England, nor any other County where England could be the better for it.

d'Esprades, that the States had order'd their Minister at Madrid to give Ear to such Proposals as should be made him, touching a League for the Defence of the Netherlands; which, according to him, was doing him the greatest Prejudice imaginable. Again; Mr. de Wit stood on a Precipice; by having connect'd himself so closely with France, who now left the Republic to shift for itself: Several French Ships, under various Pretences, had been detain'd in the Ports of Holland; in particular, Five bought there, for the Service of the French East India Company, which the States made bold to fit up for their own Use. These Mr. d'Esprades had, in several Memorials, earnestly, but vainly, reclaim'd; the States alledging, that the Embargo ought to extend to the Ships of Forreigners, as well as of their own Subjects: That they stood in need of those Ships, which would not be the least in their Fleet: And even insinuating, that they were better us'd by his Catholic than his most Christian Majesty; for that He had suffer'd them to detain and make use of a Galleon of his, of Seventy-six Guns, which he had caus'd to be built in Amsterdam. His most Christian Majesty, however, was not satisfy'd with these Pretences; but, on the contrary, issued a Decree to stop and seize all the Dutch Ships, in all the Ports and Roads of his Kingdom. This was a Thunderclap to the States: They had already complain'd, that the most Christian King intended to (m) ruin them; they began to apprehend the fatal Moment was now at hand; and therefore, to qualify the Indignation, they were not in a Condition to contend with, they, in the most respectful and submissive Manner, resign'd the Ships in Dispute, "In the Persuasion, say they, that we shall soon see them fighting under the Flag of France, for the Justice of our Cause, and for the common Interest, and not only of his most Christian Majesty and the States, but of all Europe."

Nor did the Misunderstanding between the two Powers terminate here. Tho' England had by this time declar'd War, and issu'd Letters of Mart and Reprizal, France proceeded with her Mediation, at the Instance of Holland, and England affect'd to give Ear to it: But though the States had given the Negotiation this new Turn, they stuck to their old Terms; of which his most Christian Majesty complain'd in the most lively Manner; Declaring, the said Terms were such as the King of England had a hundred times refus'd: That, in the present State of Affairs, they were not sufficient to raise the least Hope of an Accommodation: And that, if they did not offer some reasonable Conditions, for the future Settlement of Trade, he should have Reason to tell them, it would not be very just for them to draw him into a War against his own Interest, that they might have the whole Trade of the World, and all the Profits arising from it, to the Exclusion of all other Nations.

But in this, their Lordships were not to be mov'd: And those of de Wit's Faction, who govern'd the Cities of Holland, and the States Deputies, gallantly reply'd, They would never consent to an Accommodation, by giving up the Rights of their Country; nor even treat, but with Equality, Justice, and Reason: And that nothing but Necessity should oblige them to submit to the English: In which Case, they should have both the Glory and Consolation to reflect, that they had done their utmost for the Preservation of their Liberties.

Both Parties continuing thus obstinately bent to leave their Cause to the Decision of the Sword, the most Christian Mediator, who had expostulated so warmly with the States, for not making greater Concessions to the Demands of the English, took occasion to advise their Lordships to weary out their Adversaries, by keeping within their Ports, and avoiding a Battle; and when it appear'd his Counsel was not follow'd, not only express'd a sensible Pleasure to find their Fleet in a better Condition than he had heard it represented; but, with a seeming Cordiality, wish'd them good Success.

Tho' we have been thus large and full in treating of the Rise and Progress of this Rupture, we shall not stay to particularise all the Incidents which follow'd it: Military Exploits are more striking Objects than Negotiations, and are generally more notic'd, tho' perhaps as little understood.

It shall suffice then to observe, that while the French Ambassadors continued to mediate at London, a grand Battle was fought between the English and Dutch Fleets; in which the former, animated with the Presence of the Duke of York, and conducted by the experienced and intrepid Earl of Sandwich, obtain'd a complete Victory (n); which, if properly follow'd, might, perhaps, at one Blow, have finish'd the War: But, while the Enemy was flying in Confusion, only Van Trump's Division continuing to make any Defence, we are (o) told, the Earl of Sandwich receiv'd Orders from one Captain Brunker, in the Duke of York's Name, to slacken Sail, for fear of disturbing his Royal Highness's Repose.

The Dread of seeing the English sole Sovereigns of the Sea, now operated more forcibly on the Court of France, than the Offer which had been made by England, to countenance

(m) Even Mr. de Wit had signify'd to one of his Friends, that the Mediation of France was not in their Favour. He, said he, had intended to do us any Kindness, he would have plac'd more Confidence in us. We have now no other Resource, but the Sword; and, therefore a Battle must be ventur'd as soon as possible. We must wait till the King will execute the Treaty of his own accord, for Remonstrances signify nothing. d'Esprades.

(n) According to our Accounts the Dutch had eighteen Ships taken, and fourteen sunk. According to theirs, but eight Ships were taken, one (their Admiral) blown up, and eight burnt. They had six thousand kill'd and taken Prisoners. The Loss of the English was one Ship of 50 Guns. The Slain 283. The Wounded 440.

(o) It is but Justice to observe, That this does not agree with the Account of this Action sent by Mr. d'Esprades to the most Christian King; for therein he asserts, that the English continued the Chase for two Days; during which time, according to him, Van Trump with twelve Ships only, defended himself against the whole English Fleet.

A. D. 1665. tenance their Designs in Flanders. The most Christian King immediately sent a Dispatch to Mr. d'Esbrades, expressing how greatly he was troubled (you may imagine, said he, for what Reasons) at the Misfortune which had befallen the States; blaming them for not having taken his Advice, to avoid a Battle; and certifying, that the first thing he did, after he had receiv'd the News of the Event, was to send an Express to England, with Orders to his Embassadors to press the King of England more earnestly than ever to a Peace, and to set before him the Mischiefs that would happen, if, by continuing the War, or making immoderate Demands, he should drive a State to Despair, which had great Resources, could never want Money, and which had powerful Friends; who stood already engag'd to defend her, in case she should not be able to defend herself. In the same Letter he farther signify'd his Purpose to engage the Kings of Sweden and Denmark to co-operate with him in his Endeavours to prevail with the King of England to grant a Peace to the States; or, in case they should still refuse, to concert such other Measures, as should force him into a Compliance.

Mention has already been made of several Princes of the Empire, in the Neighbourhood of Holland, who had Claims on the Republic, and who now thought they had a fair Opportunity to demand Satisfaction.

Of this favourable Circumstance the Court of England thought it advisable to take Advantage, by sending Mr. Temple to induce the Bishop of Munster, who was one of the Princes aggrieved, by subsidiary Arguments, to declare against the States, and make a Diversion by Land, while England attack'd them, with its whole Strength, by Sea.

Of this Negotiation the most Christian King had no sooner procur'd (p) Intelligence, than he endeavour'd to traverse it, both by Threats and Promises: But finding both were like to be ineffectual, he gave his Brother of England to understand, that, in case the Bishop of Munster made any Attempt on the Dutch, he should find his Forces at their Head, to defend them: In order to which, he caus'd the Marquis de la Fuentes to be told, he should have Occasion for Passage through the King his Master's Territories, to send an Army to the Assistance of the United Provinces.

But tho' France appear'd thus, in earnest, dispos'd to succour the States, the Part the Bishop of Munster had taken against them so thoroughly alarm'd their Lordships, that they came to a Resolution to adjust all Differences, as fast as possible, with the Electors of Brandenburg and Cologne, the Bishop of Strasburgh, the two Northern Crowns, &c. that their Enemies might not multiply on their Hands, nor gather Strength by confederating with each other.

In the mean time, the late Defeat, and the Practices of the different Cabals who oppos'd de Wit, threw the States into the utmost Disorder: Van Trump laid down his Command; several Captains follow'd his Example; the insatiate Populace thought of nothing but the Prince of Orange, and a Stadtholder: The Pensioner was talk'd of as a public Enemy; the very Government itself seem'd to have lost both Dignity and Authority; a Revolt was every Day fear'd if not expected; and their whole Hope was plac'd on the Return of de Ruyter from Guiney, the safe Arrival of their Levant and Indian Fleets, and a second, but more successful, Battle with the English.

But these very Hopes had the Face of Despair: Mr. d'Esbrades therefore advis'd his Friend de Wit to try one Expedient more in the Way of Negotiation; which was for the King his Master to make Proposals to England, in his own Name, consisting of the utmost Concessions which the States could be prevail'd on to make. With this the Pensioner comply'd; and, without a previous Consultation with his Masters, took the Liberty to name the following Terms:

The Cession of Fort St. Andrew and the Isle of Bonavilla, two Places from whence the Amsterdam Company fetch'd a great deal of Gold, both very considerable for Commerce: That Fort Cormantin, which de Ruyter has taken, should be given in Exchange for Cape Corse; and tho' General Valkenburg should have retaken Cape Corse, they would nevertheless surrender Cormantin: That they would yield up the Forts, Towns, and Habitations of Nova Belgia, provided the Isle of Paleron were yielded to the States, of which they were still in Possession; and this they demanded only to have a Pretext to get the Company's Consent; the rather because the Isle of Paleron was quite grubb'd up, the Cinamon and Nutmeg Trees being all cut down; so that the Isle would never be worth any thing, of which the English were very well inform'd, having been often on the Spot; so that, properly speaking, it was to yield up Nova Belgia (now New York) for nothing; a Place which had cost them so much Money to attain; a cultivated Country, where a great Trade was driven in all Sorts of Plenty, and, being contiguous with New England, would be of great Advantage to them.

But if the King of England should farther demand the Tenth of the Fishery, or any other Contribution in Europe, or that the States should take English Passes to go thro' the Channel, or any other Mark of his being King of the Sea, or the restoring the Prince of Orange to his Predecessor's Offices, their Lordships would never consent to any of these Conditions, but, in such Case, would rather resolve to hazard all.

When these Particulars came to be debated in the French Cabinet, it may be presum'd, they were held insufficient to satisfy the English; for, in order to render them more palatable, the most Christian King was pleas'd

A new Plan of Peace offer'd by de Wit.

(p) When the French Embassadors in England expostulated with the King on this Head, it appear'd he had not Firmness enough to avow this Measure, nor Address to conceal it; but with some Confusion mix'd with Displeasure, declar'd, He had no Knowledge of the said Bishop, nor had any Alliance or Correspondence with him. d'Esbrades.

to add, by his own Authority, that Cape Corfe Castle should be ras'd and demolish'd; and that Commissioners should be appointed, to agree forthwith on a Regulation of Trade, on both Sides.

How receiv'd in England.

Thus modell'd, this new Plan was dispatch'd to the French Embassadors Extraordinary in England; who laying it before the King, his Majesty was pleas'd to declare, That he did not desire a War; that when it began; he had other Affairs to manage with his Parliament, for his own Interest, and the settling his Revenue; that the Warmth he observ'd in the main Body oblig'd him to follow its Motions; that it was still in the same Temper, and ready to supply him with a considerable Sum, for the Continuation of the War; so that he could not agree to a Peace, unless upon such Terms as might shew, he knew how to profit by a Victory, without losing his Reputation with his People; that he would rather perish, than forfeit the Goodwill of those, whom it concern'd so much to manage, in order to secure Peace at home, and render himself considerable abroad; that he did not pretend to be reimburs'd the whole Charge he had been at, for that would be both rigid and unjust; but that some Consideration he was resolv'd to have; and this, said he, my Brother of France can easily procure me, and I shall be (g) oblig'd to him for it.

The French Embassadors having taken Time to deliberate on a Demand which so widely differ'd from the Ultimatum which they had presented on Behalf of the States, gave the Chancellor to understand, that they foresaw it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to carry this Point. To which his Lordship reply'd, that the King his Master, having resolv'd to make a Peace, by the Interposition of France, would thereby expose himself to much Censure, and many Complaints; for which Reason it would be absolutely necessary for his Security, and to preserve him from falling into the Calamities which were the Ruin of his Father, that he should not be left destitute of Money. The French Ministers then pressing to know the Sum, the Chancellor refus'd to come to Particulars; but, in general, gave them Room to conclude, that, on the Part of England, it would be left to the Arbitration of his most Christian Majesty.

In another Conference with the King himself, his Majesty was pleas'd to recollect the Demands of his Subjects on the Dutch, for the Ships Bonadventure and Good Hope, as also all the other Ships mention'd in the English Catalogue; adding, the States had offer'd him Satisfaction thereon; and intimating, that the Embassadors had forgot this Point in their Proposal. Their Excellencies defended themselves by alledging, that, as his Majesty had not thought fit to explain himself thereon, the King their Master had thought of other Means to give him Satisfaction. To which he answer'd, 'Tis of great Importance; 'tis the Foundation of the War; 'tis what must justify me, and prove I was not the Aggressor.

Upon the Whole, he reduc'd his Pretensions to the holding of Neuva Belgia, the Restoration of Pleron and Fort Cormantin, the Possession of Cape Corfe, Damages for the Bonadventure and Good Hope, and the rest of the Ships, as should be settled by Commissioners; a Sum of Money towards the Charge of the War; and a just and reasonable Regulation of Trade, in all Parts of the World.

When this Account was remitted to the most Christian King, he took it for (r) granted, that the Sum of Money in question, which would be the grand Difficulty in Holland, would solve all Difficulties in England; as, therefore, he was really afraid that the States were likely to be overpower'd, he took no small Pains to furnish Mr. d'Esbrades with Arguments to convince their Lordships, that they ought to be at some Expence for a Peace; since a War would cost them ten times as much more (s). But their Lordships were of a very different Opinion: They suffered the English Demands to lye before them some time, without deigning to give them an Examination, and when they did, it was only to reject them; as making a Jest (for so they call'd it) of the States, and having no Tendency towards Peace; which they again resolv'd never to propose or accept of, but upon equal Terms. Some of them went so far as to complain of the French Court for having made Alterations in the Proposals communicated by de Wit: Van Beauninghen their Minister at Paris, gave Mr. (t) de Lionne to understand, That if the King of England should now incline to accept the Proposals of Peace as made by the Embassadors

(g) This particular Circumstance was communicated to Mr. d'Esbrades in Confidence, by the King his Master, with a Charge to keep the Secret.

(s) With what Reason, may be gather'd from what follows:

"What I have chiefly respect'd in all this Negotiation (says his Majesty to Mr. d'Esbrades) is, that tho' the King of England's Answer appear a little harsh, and dry, and haughty (which is probably done to satisfy his People, in case it comes to their Knowledge, or he should acquaint them with it) yet he and his Ministers seem to have been so careful to soften it in Secret, and to explain their Intentions so fully, that, methinks, one may conclude, the said King sincerely desires Peace, and to get out of these Troubles as soon as he can, either thro' Fear of my Declaration, or the Judgment (the Plague) with which his Kingdom is afflicted, or from both of these Motives together: For he is very far from having certain Propositions, as was at first apprehended, as if the only Object he propos'd to himself in this War, was to bring down the Power of the Dutch, entirely destroy their Fishery, and make himself absolute Master of the Sea, and of all the Commerce of the World. Excepting the Demand only of a Sum of Money towards the Charge of the War, which is a little extraordinary, he pretends to nothing more than what a Prince, who has just gain'd a Victory, may honourably require; and perhaps justly, when his Forces are besides, and always will be, superior to those of his Enemies.

(r) Mr. de Lionne, in a Letter to Mr. d'Esbrades, speaking of the Possibility that the States would refuse to purchase a Peace, takes occasion to say, Their Consider'd, in that Case, would resemble that of a Man, who to hinder his Enemy from taking ten Crowns out of a Bag of ten thousand, throws Bag and all into the River.

(s) Mr. de Lionne remarks on this Occasion, "That if there had been any Policy in England (as I am apt to think there was none) they would have accepted purely "and simply the Proposal, which the King had made at "Mr. d'Wit's Request: For then the States would not "have been able to excuse themselves from consenting to "it, unless they had been hardy enough to avow the making a Jest of two great Kings.

A. D. 1665.

Embassadors of France, the States would be under no Obligation to observe them; they having been made by a particular Man, and not in the Name, or by the Authority of the Republic. To which Mr. de Lionne reply'd, that the States left the whole Management of their Affairs to that particular Man; that the King plac'd a Confidence in him, which he deserv'd; and that, as this Advance towards a Pacification had been made at their own Request, it was not very just, that they should pretend to draw France into a War, for a greater or less Advantage to themselves, out of Europe, when his Majesty was engag'd to nothing beyond the Line.

The Spirit of the States seems to have rose and fell with their Circumstances: While they were uncertain what would become of de Ruyter, and in pain for their homeward-bound Ships, they behav'd as if they expected the English Navy to visit them by the next Tide: But now, when the Texel was crowded with their trading Fleets, safe arriv'd from every Part of the Globe, and de Ruyter was return'd with Glory, after having again reinstated his Countrymen in the Commerce of Guiney, they talk'd as if they had never known what Fear was; and even the Populace, who had been before so clamorous for a Peace, offer'd their Lives and Fortunes to continue the War.

Avarice is, to the full, as intractable as Ambition; and, in this Dispute, private Interest, on both Sides, was oftentimes the Rudder that directed the Commonwealth. The Duke of York was not only at the Head of the African Company, and violently bent to support its Interests, but had purchas'd a Title to (u) Nova Belgia, of the Heirs of the Earl of Sterling, to whom it had been granted by Patent from King James I. Neither he, nor his Dependents, would therefore hear of any thing which would affect their Pretensions in either of these Places: And, on the other hand, the greatest Part of the States were personally concern'd in the Rights and Possessions he laid claim to, and consequently lay under equal Temptation to endanger the Republic, rather than make the least Sacrifice to preserve it in Peace and Safety.

It appears however, that there was one great national Point in View, on the Side of England, which seems to argue that their Heads were not very bad whatever may be said of their Hearts; For when a Jealousy obtain'd in Holland, that the Court of France had dispatch'd a Courier to know if the King of England would assist his most Christian Majesty in the Conquest of Flanders. Mr. de Lionne convinc'd Van Beurminghen, that there was no Necessity for them to send any such Message; for that the said King of England had for six Months together made Offers to abandon all the Land to his Brother of France, and assist him with all his Forces to put him in Possession, provided all the Sea might be left to him.

But France apprehending the Sea would in the End prove too mighty for the Land, did not now relish the Proposal; and thought only of Expedients to prevent the English from carrying their Point without her Help, and against her Will. This, as before observ'd, was the principal Motive of her being so anxious for the Preservation of the Dutch: And no sooner was she convinc'd, that their Defeat at Sea had rather provok'd than disabled the States, and that the safe Arrival of their Ships had furnish'd them with the Means of making a long and obstinate Defence, than she came to a Resolution to take more vigorous Measures in their Favour, in order to preserve the Balance of Power at Sea, and become a maritime Power herself.

There were yet indeed two other Considerations, which help'd to quicken her Determinations: The first of which was the perplex'd Situation of her Friend de Wit, assail'd on all Sides by the several Factions, who took Advantage of the public Calamities to redouble their Opposition; obnoxious to the Rabble, and on the point of giving (v) way to the Torrent which he began to think it was impossible to stem; and it was manifest, if he either quitted, or was forc'd from, the Helm, that the Prince of Orange must be immediately put in possession of the Offices of his Ancestors; in which Case, it was presum'd England would have given the Law to the States, and the Pensioner of Holland would no longer have been a Dependent on France.

The second had a more complicated Origin, and therefore requires more Time to explain it.

The States pretended, the Proposals made by England argu'd, that the real Intentions of that Court were only to prolong the War, and find an Excuse to rid themselves of the French Mediation. On the other hand, the King of England, in compliment to his Brother of France, receded from his Demand of a Sum of Money towards the Charge of the War, declar'd himself willing to admit of any equitable Compromise, insist'd only on having Security for the Performance of Articles, and very willingly agreed to the naming Commissioners for the future Regulation of Trade. But now the Dutch stood aloof, and would not even agree to the Terms propos'd by Mr. de Wit before, alledging, that the Face of Affairs was alter'd, and that they were not bound to make good an Offer, which was extorted from them by their Fears. This double Behaviour of the States gave Occasion to very lively Representations from Mr. de Lionne to Van Beurminghen; but to no Purpose: Nothing would satisfy the States, but a Compliance with the Treaty of

(u) The Deputies of Amsterdam also declar'd, "It was not in the Power of the States to give up this Country. That City having purchas'd it of the West India Company for 700000 Livres, having besides been at two Millions Expence upon it, and getting 60000 Livres a Year by it, all Charges despay'd. & Esgraves."

(v) Speaking once of this Irresolution of the Prinse, Mr. d'Esgraves could not help dropping a Reflection to the following Effect, "That he knew no other way to advise, for them by considering the Difference between an abundance of Dirt and a Man of Quality."

A. D. 1665.

1662, and a Declaration against the English, which France was not yet in a Condition, or rather Disposition, to make. It is true, under the Pretence of rendering the Dutch more eager, and for fear Mr. de Wit should be call'd to account for making such large Advances, without Authority from the States, his most Christian Majesty did not think fit to communicate all the Concessions made by England, at once, nor press the States over warmly to agree to an Accommodation: But Van Goech, their Ambassador in England, took care to let them into the whole Secret, no doubt by particular Direction from thence: The Consequence of which was, that, while they publicly refus'd the Mediation of Spain, and affected to take no one Step, without the Participation of France, one of the most considerable of their Body privately sent Proposals to England, with an express Injunction, that the whole Affair should be conceal'd, with the utmost Caution, from the French Embassadors: And England, on the other had, discover'd an (x) Inclination to embrace them, by opening at the first Time, and in the same Manner, a Negotiation at the Hague. Thus fallen (x) into Suspicion with both Parties, and fearful they would strike up an Union, on the alarming Condition of dividing the Commerce of the World between them, France found herself under a Necessity of closing with one or the other. At this Instant, Mr. de Wit, who had acted with great Reputation on board the Dutch Fleet, ever since it put a second time to Sea, arriv'd at the Hague; and lying under great Obligations to his most Christian Majesty, took such Measures, in Concert with Mr. d' Estrades, that an Union with England was no longer thought of; and all the Cities of Holland made a Protestation in Form, which was afterwards confirm'd by the States General, That they would listen to no Proposals of Peace, but in Concert with France. His most Christian Majesty had, before this, granted his (y) Guaranty to the States,

(u) The Sieur Van Goech has written the Lords the States, that the King of England told him, he should speak plainly, and say whether he had any Orders to talk to him of Peace: He reply'd, No; but only about the Exchange of Prisoners. Then he will talk to you (said the King of Great Britain) You have Losses, and so have I; the War is ruinous to both of us; I desire an Accommodation, and it lies at the States Door that it is not concluded on Honourable Conditions; we have no need of Mediators to accomplish it. Monsieur Van Goech reply'd, He would give his Masters an account of it. The said King added also, That the Army of the Bishop of Munster was his, raised with his Money, and the Officers in his Pay; that the said Bishop was his Lieutenant General, and when they were about accommodating, 'twould be all one Affair. d' Estrades to Mr. Linnæ, Oct. 26, 1665.

(x) It ought to be for ever remembered, that while Mr. d' Estrades was, in his Majesty's Name, making such Proffessions to the States, he writ as follows to Mr. de Linnæ, Oct. 22, 1665:

"I begin to discover great Divisions; all the Provinces are for uniting against Holland, whose Power they are afraid of. There are a great many Measures to be taken for the King's Service in such a Conjunction. I can't write you all my Thoughts thereon, because there's too much time to be lost before Answers that are decisive enough can come; that one may sit without fear of failing: But can't you, Sir, have leave from the King to come to Peronne, and for me to meet you there? 'Twould be a Journey but of eight Days going and coming, and may be done under pretence of getting order about my Affairs, I having been absent a long time.

Perhaps there never was a Conjunction so favourable for the King's Interest, if the present Occasion be manag'd with Address and Secrecy. To tell you only something of it, no less than securing the Provinces of Grainevin and Frisland, and the Town of Overorden, the best and most considerable of all the Provinces, and that by a way that would create no Jealousy, and those who govern in these Provinces, should keep their Credit, without seeming to be under any Engagements with the King. This may go farther than I tell you, and should be thoroughly mull'd; and to have Masnick and Jalors, to keep an Army near to support those that shall declare for us when the Case happens, and also to bring Holland to herself again, whenever she strays from her Duty. I have to my many things to say to you thereon, that Volumes of Paper would not suffice. What seems best to me, is, that if what I think of succeeds, the Republic will remain as it is, but the Government be chang'd, in as much as 'twould follow the King's Council. This will be the sole Means to make the States execute the Treaties his Majesty shall have with them, and keep 'em steady in the Performance of what they promise, nor need we fear the Events which may happen by their Changes."

And again, in another Letter: "I conclude, if the King thinks it proper to gain these two Provinces [Overzell and Gueldersland] entirely at this Conjunction, it may be easily done by giving the Chiefs, who are already almost rais'd (by the Bishop of Munster's Forces) or their Children, both in the new Levies of Horle. But for the greater Security, it were to be wish'd we could get Masnick or Jalors, to have an Army always there, to keep them in fear of being chang'd, if they fail in the Execution of Treaties, which would be easily done in such a Case, considering the Correspondence we might have in the said Provinces, and the Persons the King would have in his Service to facilitate the Passage. This would oblige those, that should be contrary to his Majesty's Pleasure, to be conformable to whatever he would have them. In the mean time, I shall keep Affairs at a Balance till I have the King's Answer, letting them hope what they desire, and gaining thus the Return of the Fleet, and the Arrival of Monsieur de Wit, who will certainly retire their Anty Vigour to the Cause of Holland."

(y) The said Guaranty was thus express'd:

"The Count d' Estrades, Ambassador extraordinary of France, has receiv'd Orders from the King his Master, to acquaint your Lordships from him, that In the Peace cannot be made between the two Nations on the last Proposals, his Majesty order'd his Ambassadors to make the King of England some Days since, his Resolution is to be Guaranty to the States, as he has himself given Monsieur Van Brouncker to understand. Your Lordships may by this judge how great and sincere his Majesty's Affection for your Interest has always been; and if he has made any Delay to explain his Intention (which have always been the same at the bottom) 'twas with no other Aim nor View, but that of your greater Good; having with a great deal of Probability thought and hop'd, by his simple Mediation, to have the sooner procur'd a Peace, which he knows you truly desire. Your Lordships may also observe his Majesty makes this Step in your favour, and prefers even your Interests to his own, without having beforehand stipulated any thing with you for his Security or Advantage, as other Princes would, on the like Occurrence, have doubtless done. He also promises himself, that, behaving himself with respect to you, so frankly and generously, you will, on your part, correspond with it, and that he shall find the same Security in your reciprocal Friendship and Union, and never have occasion to repent his having thus oblig'd you, without Condition or Reserve.

The same Ambassador extraordinary acquits himself of this Order from the King his Master, with the more Joy, since he receiv'd your Lordships Satisfaction and Advantage, which his Majesty has always had chiefly in view; and this Declaration had not been retard'd, but by the juncture of Affairs, which did not permit it to be done sooner for the same End, the Good of your Lordships Interests. Neither can you now doubt of the Purity of his Majesty's Intentions towards you, since all the abovemention'd Circumstances are such evident Proofs of it." Given at the Hague, Aug. 24, 1665.

Of the Effect of the Offers of France to the States, about this time, Mr. d' Estrades writes to the King his Master, September 24, 1665, as follows:

"As to the first Article, which says, if the States don't keep to the Proposals your Majesty has made the King of England, you cannot guaranty the Treaty.

"And to the second, That this State would do well to make a Peace; but if the oppos'd entirely in the Interests of France, he should not be abandon'd."

The Chabot report in the Closets, 'tis to amuse 'em with Hopes of Peace, and not to declare, and explain it thus:

That he threatening not to give the Guaranty, if the Terms of Peace are not accepted, is another Amusement, in as much as the King of England has refus'd all the Propo-

States, against the Bishop of Munster, and had likewise dispatch'd his Contingent of Troops to their Assistance. And now, to keep pace with this vigorous Resolve of theirs, he was farther pleas'd to recal his Embassadors from London, and to signify, that, as soon as their Lordships should do the same, he was ready to become a Party in the War against England, according to their repeated Desire.

A. D. 1665.

There was now such a Confidence establish'd between France and the Republick, that, in little more than three Weeks after this Assurance was given to their Lordships, Van Goeb receiv'd Letters of (2) Revocation, and all the Hopes of a Pacification were at an End.

Proposals

falls made by your Majesty, and gives others the States cannot accept of.

And for the last Article, 'tis easy to see your Majesty's Design, which is to engage them in a War with the King of Spain, and not to guarantee them without any Condition, as I have assur'd them on your Part.

What is said hereon, tho' far from any Appearance of Truth, makes however a great Impression on their Minds, and causes them not to put their former Trust in me."

(2) At the same time, the States sent the following Letter to his Majesty:

" S I R,

" We have till this time continu'd, ever since the Rapture, our Ambassador's Residence in your Court to shew our Disposition to Peace; for tho' we had given Satisfaction either by invincible Reasons, or by just Offers to all the Complaints the Sieur Deusing made here, when we could not yet believe nor apprehend what we find now, we did something more in leaving our Ambassador in England, after Places and whole Countries had been taken from this State, both in Africa and America, and the Ships of the Inhabitants of these Provinces had been seiz'd and confiscated, in the Sight of all Christendom, without any preceding Declaration: Nay, we did not recall our Ambassador after your Majesty had sent your Minister here to come away, leaving you void, in the Sea, he says, with the Ministers, which offend both Nations, and the Calamities with which all Europe is threaten'd. We desire no other Witness but your Majesty, to the Advances we have made, or can't be made, out of Conditions, upon which a good and equitable Peace may be concluded. We have offer'd to do what you would have us in it, either on condition, that whatever had been taken, on either Side, should be restor'd; or else if England did not find her Account in this, that whatever had been taken, on either Side, should be kept, and that even before it could be known here what was taken on our Side in distant Parts; so that it cannot also be said that we sought after our own Advantage no more than in the Compensation of Charges and Losses which are without Comparison much greater on our Side than on the other. Nevertheless not only your Majesty would not agree to these Offers, and Advances which left you no room to doubt of our Inclination to Peace, and was not finish'd with the Advances of the Ambassador's Mediators made of themselves, of Conditions more advantageous to England, and prejudicial to the Interests of this State, to which also we never gave our Consent, but also hitherto neither your Majesty, nor any one on your Part, has made any Overture, nor declar'd on what Conditions you would have the Peace made on your Side; and tho' you have been pleas'd to protest to our Ambassador, that you desire it, yet you have always made use of nothing but general Terms, and could never be brought to tell either him or the Mediators, on what Conditions you were willing to make a Peace. We believe that all Christian Princes would prefer the Swiftness of Peace to the Miseries of War, however just it might be; and we have particularly that Opinion of your Majesty, who makes Profession of the same Religion we do. But after the manner you have been pleas'd to carry your self, in not agreeing to Proposals even so advantageous to the English, and so prejudicial to this State, as those, made by the Mediators, were, and in not making the least Proposal on which we may only enter upon a Negotiation, we have thought our Ambassador could no longer stay in England without doing a great Injury to the Reputation of this State, and have thought necessary to order him to return; since also your Majesty by recalling your Minister, shew'd plainly you desir'd we should desist. However, we still preserve an entire and perfect Inclination for a reasonable Accommodation, which we may make in Concert with our Allies, and we hope the good God will soon inspire your Majesty with the same Motions, and that you will let us know the Conditions on which you desire it, that by this Means may be prevented the Effusion of so much Blood with which a good part of Christendom is about to be overflow'd. We cannot be answerable for it, because, before and since the Rapture, we have done all that could lawfully be desir'd of us, and are still ready to agree to it, whereas we have not hitherto been able to learn your Majesty's real Intentions on this Subject. We wait for the time when you shall have the same peaceable Sentiments; but we with you may have them before they be suggest'd to you by the imminent Public Calamities with which we see all Christendom threaten'd. We pray God that he'll be pleas'd to avert them, and have your Majesty's Person, Sir, in his Holy and Worthy Keeping. Given at the Hague, Dec. 11, 1665. The Superscription was, To the King of Great Britain.

The King of Great Britain's Answer.

" High and Mighty Lords,
" All the World knows with what Repugnance we engag'd in this War with you, and making Reflection on the Christian Blood it has cost, we protest before God the Searcher of Hearts, that we desire nothing more than to see the Conclusion of it by a good and just Peace, which we would not have embarrass'd by repeating such things that can serve for nothing but confuse Men's Minds on both sides, and make the Wounds bleed which both Nations have felt too much already, if the Particulars of your Letter did not oblige us to justify ourself against the Insinuations contain'd in it to our Prejudice.
" 'Tis with a great deal of Regret that we complain here of a total Want of Satisfaction to so many Complaints made in vain by our Minister, when at the Hague, for the Venizations and Depressions committed against our Subjects in the East and West Indies, and for the Public Declarations either by you or your Officers, forbidding them the Liberty of Trade in such vast Countries free to the Industry and Traffic of the whole World; for the Necessity impos'd on us to send several Fleets to take Possession of the Life of Patzen, promis'd by the Articles of the last Treaty, so often mislead, to our great Expence and Dishonour, and what was the height of all, an open Hostility on our Subjects, for which the Sieur de Ruyter had Order, without any preceding Declaration, and before any of your Ships were seiz'd or confiscated here.
" On the other hand, we say, there never was any Advantage made to us tending to a good and just Peace, nor to convince us that you so much as desir'd it.
" The Proposals given by the Ambassadors Extraordinary of France, tho' little proportionable to our Honour and the Interest of our Subjects, were never reject'd by us; and on the contrary, persisting to desire Peace, we declar'd to the said Ambassadors we were willing Commissioners should be appointed on both Sides to treat of it, and never refus'd their Mediation, but with Reason their Arbitrement for Damages sustain'd, and a Regulation of Trade for the future, after they had render'd themselves suspected by a Declaration entirely partial against us.
" As to recalling our Minister from the Hague, 'tis to enquire, he remain'd as long as our Honour and the Safety of his Person would permit; but when we saw that contrary to the Public Security you gave for himself and his Domesticks, the States of Holland (who are indeed the Authors of the War) had dar'd, by their particular Order, to take his Secretary before his Door, and send him to Prison, where he remain'd still with all Circumstances of Contempt and Cruelty, without any Reason for it even to this Hour, or Reparation done by you, we could be no longer expos'd to Caprice, that might encrease every Day by Accidents.
" Notwithstanding all which, we are freely touch'd with the Miseries that happen by the Continuation of the War, and the Consequences it may have to the Prejudice of the Protestant Religion, which is infinitely more dear to us than any Interest of State; and we with you had the same peaceable Sentiments, that we might unite and strengthen each other by indissoluble Bonds, knowing well, you would get more by it than by Allies, which will make you pay for their Success by rigorous Conditions prejudicial to the Interest of the State, and such as your Enemies can never desire in a World, we protest before God, we have nothing more at Heart than a just Accommodation that may be agreeable to you, with Assurance of making our Allies enter into it in concert with us; and at Honour requires you should make the first Advances towards it, we promise always to receive them

A. D. 1665.

Proposals for settling the Manner in which this joint War against England should be carried on, had been made on the Part of France so early as August 21; tho', perhaps, for Amusement only: They were now renew'd, with such Alterations as the Alterations of Circumstances had made necessary: And it is most observable, that one of the principal Objects, which both France and Holland had in view, was to increase the Divisions, and widen the Divisions, of the English; that domestic Disorders and Commotions might render them the easier Prey to their foreign Enemies.

This wicked Undertaking that Prince, who was so nearly related to King Charles, who had affected to live with him in such cordial Amity, and had declar'd himself in such forcible Terms against those who had sentenc'd his Royal Father, was the (a) first to propose to the States. This wicked Proposal the States, who had perfidiously violated the Laws of Hospitality, in giving up Okey, Corbet, and Barkstead, who had taken Sanctuary under their Protection, and had, by express Treaty, engag'd to do the same by every obnoxious English Subject that should be found in their Dominions, freely and gladly embrac'd. And, in this wicked Confederacy, those, who glory'd in being call'd Republican, as desiring to have it thought the Characteristic of every public Virtue, seduc'd by their Passions and Remorsements, as readily and gladly (b) join'd; As if France could ever be the Patron of Liberty; as if a Foe to the Kingdom could be a Friend to the Constitution; or as if those, who were only engag'd to be the Instruments of national Confusion, would be suffer'd to take any one Step, which might contribute to the national Welfare.

A Proceeding on all Hands, which not only reflects Dishonour on Kings and Nations, but on human Nature itself!

And this naturally leads us to another of the military Operations of this Year. The King of Denmark (another near Relation to King Charles, and whom his Majesty, tho' perhaps

" them with open Arms, and will look on the Peace that " shall follow, as the greatest Blessing which can happen to " us in this World, praying God that he will have you,
" High and Mighty Lords, in his holy Keeping. Written
" at our Court at Oxford, December 16, 1665.

Your very good FRIEND.

CHARLES REX."

(a) While these Measures are taking out of England, Care should be taken to give the King of England Trouble in his Dominions.

To that end Information should be got either by Holland, or by means of French Merchants, of the State of Affairs in Scotland and Ireland.

In Scotland 'tis certain that the Presbyterians and Presbyterian are much more numerous than the Episcopals.

Information should also be got of the chief Lords and Ministers of both Religions; and as they are the same in Holland, and Scotland is nearer that Country than France, so it is most proper for Monsieur d'Estrades to carry on that Negotiation in concert with Monsieur de Wit, or some other of the States; however with such Secrecy as none may be able to discover it.

These chief Lords or Ministers may be told they shall be assisted with Arms, Warlike Stores, and Money.

This Negotiation may be begun by sending thither some Person who understands the Language, or by way of Merchants, or by the Ministers who keep a Correspondence with each other.

The same thing may be done on the Side of Ireland by Bretagne, the Catholics being strongest there.

Information should be got of the principal Catholic Lords and Bishops, by some Irish Refugees in France.

To get such Information in Bretagne of the State of Ireland, by the Merchants there, writing from all Parts to their Correspondents, to know the Detail of any thing.

All the Irish Catholics at Paris, in Bretagne, and other Parts of the Kingdom should be examined, to know whether there are any of them that may be made use of.

To get Information of the State of the Presbyterians, Presbyterian and Crownell's Friends. His most Christian Majesty's Memorial to Mr. d'Estrades of May 21, 1665.

Again, in a Letter to the said Mr. d'Estrades, dated Nov. 28, 1665, his most Christian Majesty proceeds thus, You inform'd me, in one of your former Dispatches, that the States held a Correspondence with the Misconductors of England and Scotland, who offer'd to rise as soon as I declar'd, believing they could not do it with Success, and that they should run too great a Risk, while the King of England had only the States to contend with. The time is now come to take them at their Word, and press them as much as may be to effect what they offer'd, to which you must give a continual and particular Application; nor shall I be unmindful of the same Design, of which however you must speak to no body, unless you think fit to open yourself to the Secret de Wit, who will, without doubt, have in this Matter the same Scruples as others who are against having any thing attempted, from which might result an Advantage to the Catholics, to the Prejudice of those of their own Belief.

Twoold perhaps be advantageous also, in this great Affair, to make the King of England apprehensive of a Defeat in England, Scotland or Ireland; and to that End the States should always have a Body of Horse and Foot on their Coasts near to England, as I will have one at Cape la Hague; because we may not only make use of them in such a Defeat, but it would oblige the King of England to keep up a Body of Troops in his three Kingdoms, to the great Diminution of his Treasury, in which his Fleet would suffer, or would be very much weakened; at least these Troops lying so ready would encourage the English Malecontents, and make them the more easily revolt. Nevertheless I find it will not be easy for the States to keep such a Body on their Coasts useles, while the Bishop of Munster's Soldiers are in their Bowels; but as I hope they will soon be deliver'd from them, so 'tis proper to think of it in time.

Of the Conferences which ensued between Mr. d'Estrades and Mr. de Wit, Mr. d'Estrades gives the following Account to the King his Master, December 3d.

He (Mr. de Wit) has also begun a Negotiation with two Lords of Newcastle, who propose to take the Town, and make themselves Masters of the Country, and have an Army in a little time together, if the States will furnish them with 30000 Livres, 10000 Muskets, and 6000 Pikes, and come with their Fleet to the Mouth of the River of Newcastle, in the Spring, that they may be supported at the same time as they shall sit, which they propose on Condition the King declares, and see otherwise. The said de Wit will not push on this Negotiation, without knowing his Majesty's Sentiments thereon; as also what share the King would be of the Expence, as well for Tangier as Newcastle.

To which I answer'd, that these two Things being propos'd to him, and easier for the States to execute than the King, I thought they should be at all the Charge, and his Majesty also be at all that of the Proposals made him on the Side of Ireland; which I did not have time to be inform'd of the King's Pleasure thereon, in case the thing should go farther, and to know how I should govern myself in this Matter, if the said de Wit did not approve of this Reason.

The said de Wit told me Tangier was of no use to them, but is to the English to pirate on the States Subjects, so that all they aim at, is to dislodge them from thence. That England having no Maritime Forces, will be always glad of the States Friendship to keep the said Tangier, when he has taken it.

Monsieur de Wit is not of opinion to give any Apprehension of a Defeat in England, Scotland, or Ireland. He is satisfy'd it would ruin all; that the Divisions there should only be fomented, and the Kingdoms be inflamed to rise, after which the Party that takes Arms should be assisted powerfully, but they should come to Action before we openly succour them.

(b) Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to declare, That there was better Reason than perhaps the late of Oxford the Court, and Parliament were then there; as to Bishop Pinder's saying the States. He then proceeds to mention Agnes Sidney, as the Agent for the Republican Cause in Holland; but adds, that de Wit rejected his Proposals, which is quite of the Truth; as is manifest from the Evidence just quoted.

perhaps in Spleen to the Dutch, had taken into his Protection) being greatly in debt (c) to the States, and desiring to balance Accounts in the most advantageous and expeditious Manner to himself, enter'd into a Treaty with Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English Envoy, for the seizing all the Dutch Vessels in all his Ports, on condition of being enabled to do it by England; and of dividing the Booty between the two Crowns.

This being agreed to, his Danish Majesty, on the one hand, most kindly invited the Republic to make the same free use of all his Harbours, as of their own; and, on the other, gave Information to the English Squadrons, both where and upon what Terms, they might make sure of their common Prey.

(c) According to Sir Gilbert Talbot's Narrative quoted both by Edward and Burnet, the Dutch had artificially drawn his Danish Majesty into a War with Sweden, which had oblig'd him to mortgage all his Revenues of Norway and the Sound to them, by way of Security for the Summ that he had borrow'd of them to enable him to carry it on.

(d) As much of this Account or Dissertation (which is one of the most curious in our whole History) as immediately relates to this Occurrence, is here inserted, for the Readers better Instruction.

"About the Month of June, 1665, the King of Denmark (in a casual Discourse with his Majesty's Envoy) lamented the ill Condition that he was involved in by the treacherous proceeding of the States General, who had been the Cause of all his Calamities, and yet were possess'd of a good Branch of his Revenues; alleging he was ill indebted a great Sum of Money to them, upon which Argument he took all Occasions to enlarge himself.

His Majesty's Envoy told him, he might have frequent Opportunities to quit that score, and reimburse himself the Monies they had already taken from him; and that Discourse being with some Earnestness drawn on by that King, he at length concluded, That if he had Strength and Power enough, he would do it by seizing and possessing himself of all the Ships or Vessels belonging to any of the Subjects of the said States that at present were in any of his Ports, or should afterwards come in thither. And when it was reply'd by the Envoy, That the King his Master's Ships might assist him in that Enterprise, he said he would be very willing the Booty should be divided between his Majesty and him; and farther desired him to make the Proposition to his Majesty; who till this Overture that and then made, never had entertain'd any Thought of pressing the King of Denmark to such a Resolution.

His Majesty's Envoy's Letter giving a full Account of the said Overture, his Majesty easily consented to it, and return'd his Approbation with all Speed.

On the tenth of July his Majesty's Envoy inform'd that King of his Majesty accepting the Proposition, and that he would give order to his Fleet to go to the Execution of it; which that King received as cheerfully, and withal told the Envoy, That to make this Agreement the more profitable, he had directed his Governour in Norway to invite all Dutch Ships into their Ports, and to use all Means for the detaining in Harbour such as were already there, and that they should speedily understand the reason of it by an Express, and receive farther Directions how they were to proceed.

Upon the 20th of the same Month, July, that King receiving Advice from Norway, that de Ruyter was upon the Coast, he immediately sent for his Majesty's Envoy, told him the News with Joy, and wish'd him to lose no time in giving the Advertisement thereof to his Majesty's Fleet, which he did forthwith by a Galliot.

Upon the 24th of the same Month, the King of Denmark dispatched his Express with Orders to the Viceroys at Christiania, and to the General Assize at Bergen, viz. That they should permit the English to visit any Holland Ships, though within their Ports and under their Cables, and to carry them away as their Prize; but that a full Account was to be kept of the whole, in regard that he the King of Denmark was to have an equal Share; further directing them to acquaint therewith the Commanders in Chief of any English Frigates, as soon as they should arrive upon the Coast.

And in Pursuance of this, Gildenlo, the Viceroys of Norway sent out two Gallions to find the English Fleet, and advertise them of the said Agreement, with this Limitation only, That for the saving the King their Master's Honour

The Dutch East India Fleet, relying most securely on the good Faith of Denmark, took Sanctuary in Bergen; Whither, according to the Invitation he had receiv'd from Copenhagen, the Earl of Sandwich follow'd them; fully perswaded that, by the Connivance of the Danish Governour, he should easily take or destroy them all: But such was either the Misconduct of the Earl, and the Rapaciousness of the English in general, (according to Burnet and Ecard, on the Authority of Sir Gilbert Talbot) who would not stay till Assize the Governour had receiv'd the proper Orders from the King his Master; or such the Greediness of the Danes, who now insisted on the whole Booty, as it is infer'd in the (d) Account publish'd by

The Attempts on the Dutch Ships in Bergen, to the World, they should seemingly pretend to be highly offended at any Assault, when made by the English.

The Dutchess being thus laid, and some of the Commanders of his Majesty's Fleet made acquainted with it upon the thirtieth of the said Month July, the Earl of Sandwich order'd a Squadron of Ships to sail to the Port of Bergen in Pursuance of the said Agreement, having receiv'd certain Intelligence of the Dutch East India Ships being newly put in there, and presuming that before that time all Governours would have received Notice of the Agreement, since his Majesty had sent his Approbation of it, and Resolution of executing it accordingly upon the 30th of June, which was likewise received by the King of Denmark the 10th of July.

Upon the 31st, fifteen of the said Squadron of Ships arriv'd at Back of Ra, and anchored there that Night, which is within the Ricken of Norway, but at least eight Leagues distant from Bergen.

Early in the Morning upon the first of August Sir Thomas Tyldeman commanding the said Squadron of Ships, sent a Gentleman of Quality in a Pinnace to the Governour of the Cattle, to give him notice of our coming, that he might not be surpris'd, carrying all with him for the said Governour two Letters, one from the Earl of Sandwich, the other from Sir Thomas Tyldeman, both importing, That the design of their coming was only to annoy the Dutch, and that strict Caution should be taken, that none of the Ships should offer any Violence, or do any Injury to any of the Subjects of the King of Denmark.

Between six and seven of the Clock in the Evening of the first of August, the said Squadron of Ships arriv'd within the Booy of the Haven, and when they were drawing themselves nearer into their Stations, toward the Dutch Ships, the Cattle shot their Charge to them, as a Warning to keep off, and with small Shot broke one of the Englishmen's Legs as they were in their Boats carrying out their Anchors; all which was endur'd on their Part without making any Return of Hostility; and yet all this same time the Dutch were permitted without the least Interruption, to draw their Ships of force into a Line, and form themselves for their own better Defence, and to oppose the English, planting their Guns upon the Shore; above seventy of which were fix'd in the Cattle for the greater Annoyance of the English.

However the English proceeded to form themselves in the best manner they could for their Advantage, in which they spent the whole Night, till four of the Clock next Morning, being forced to tow their Ships with Hawser, the Wind being directly contrary.

But during all this time, hoping yet for better Usage, they treated also with the General, the Lord Assize, and they inform'd him of the secret Agreement between the two Kings; but he would not own to have had then any Notice of it, insinuating upon having the whole Booty for the King of Denmark, his Master, and alleging for it, That he had for that Purpose sent out Gallions to the Northward, to invite and draw in those Dutch Ships thither, under Pretence of their Safety: That his Master was to send 22 Men of War to secure them for his own use; and that it would seem a strange thing to the World, that such great Friends and Allies as the two Kings were, should have a Difference about the Mowery of a few Prizes, since his Master also had the more need of them, and would probably employ the Riches against the Common Enemy; adding, That the Hollanders would be equally Losers, whether the King of Denmark had the whole, or his Majesty of England had half of it.

But at length the Lord Assize leaving the English insinuating, desired Propositions in writing, in order to an equal Division of the Prizes, which were accordingly given him, tho' he still seem'd to desire to defer the attacking of by Order of Council, that the Event did not answer his Expectation; Alfeldt, instead of continuing passive, admitting the Dutch to bring their Guns on shore, and make such a Disposition, that, tho' the Attack, under the Direction of Sir Thomas Tyddeman, was made with all the Bravery and Resolution that either the Thrift of Glory, or Gain, could inspire, it was ineffectual: The gallant Affiliants were as gallantly repuls'd; the Dutch continu'd in Possession; the English were ( $\epsilon$ ) glad to retire, to repair their Damages; and the Danes made a Merit of defending that Treasure, which they had form'd a righteous a Project to seize.

As this Disappointment was grievously felt, so it was highly resent'd in England. We had not only been actual Sufferers by the Experiment, but might have been much more so by the Consequences: De Wit was now making his utmost Efforts, in Person, to put the whole Force of the Republic to Sea, in order to re-establish his own Credit; and, instead of making it a Point to face him with the whole Force of England, this great Detachment under Tyddeman was sent to Bergen;

the Hollanders some Days, which at a Council of War of all the Sea Captains was understood, as a Truth it appear'd, to be to no other End, but to give the Hollanders time; and therefore concluded upon a present Assault, which was accordingly begun by five of the best Cooks that Morning, the second of August, when all Expectation of the General's Agreement was quite taken off; besides, that by delaying it any longer, the Hollanders would not only have strengthened themselves there, but the English should have been in danger also of their Fleet of War's Arrival, and falling in upon them.

At this Council of War Sir Thomas Tyddeman gave all his Captains strictly in Charge, That they should not fire against the Castles or Forts, and should also be very careful to direct all their Shot low at the Hulls of the Dutch Ships, to prevent what they could say Damage to the Town, that lay behind the Ships: Both which Directions all the Seamen do unanimously agree were performed, according as in the treating with the General all those Directions were promised to be given.

The Dispute continued till near eight of the Clock, during which time, it is true, the Castle hung out a white Flag, but to what Intent the English could not guess; for all the Seamen, whose Station was nearest the Castle, agree also in this Point, That the Castle never left firing from some Quarter or other of it; imagining then that Dutchmen who might have been taken in for the strengthening of the Castle, had still fired against the General's Order during the time of hanging out the white Flag, as indeed it was, for they had at least 300 of them there.

The greatest Damage that the English received, was from the Castle, which by accidental Shots eat some Hawfers that kept the first Line together; and so to avoid the falling foul with one another, they were forced from their Stations, and when they were out of the Reach of the Dutch Guns, the Port upon the outward Point on the Starboard Side, shut at them afresh, whose Guns the English had silenced during the Engagement, and in their going off, had many of their Men killed by them.

Notwithstanding which, the English came that Day to an Anchor within the Rocks of Norway, five Leagues distant from Bergen, having no Pilots that could show them Anchoring-hold nearer for so many Ships together.

Whilst his Majesty's Ships were here repairing and stopping Leaks, several Civilities and Compliments were interchanged again between the Governor and Sir Thomas Tyddeman. And upon the seventh of August Mr. Tolson, a Gentleman who came, in the Confidence of the Treaty, the Night before the Engagement, to his Majesty's Ships, was sent again from Mr. Lord Alfeldt, declaring, That his Lordship had now received his Orders from the King of Denmark his Master to permit the English to make Attempts upon the Dutch in his Port, and withal, brought his Majesty's Envoy's Letter from the Court of Denmark, for the Admiral of the English Fleet, that improved the same thing.

The Lord Alfeldt also then sent a Letter all writ in his own Hand, to Sir Thomas Clifford, to desire that he would give him a Meeting the Night following, that there might be some proper way concluded upon for the second Attack, in which Letter are these Expressions:

I have now received an Order from my Master, &c. If it had pleased God that you might have had your Orders before, all that is past would have been suppressed: I do long heartily to have the Honour to see you; but I beg it of you, it be by Night, and in Disguise, since it highly concerns the Interest of both our Kings.

This Meeting was readily agreed unto, at which the Lord Alfeldt produced several Articles and Conditions to be agreed upon, to this effect: That he would have the Booty equally divided; but out of which there should be taken, first, one hundred thousand Pound Sterling in Cash, half of it for the Squadron of Ships, and half for himself and Soldiers: The Dutch that should be taken Prisoners, should be sent away to Holland in some empty Ind Ships, and none of them to remain at Bergen, that they might not be Witnesses of the Division of the Booty. That four of the English Frigates should remain in the Port of Bergen at least six Weeks, pretending to be there on their own Account, for securing the other Moiety of the Booty that should be left behind, and for bringing it safe to England; when notwithstanding, that Money should be the King of Denmark, and those said four English Frigates to be absolutely in the King of Denmark's Service, during the said time of the said six Weeks. Which Propositions, written with his own Hand, General Alfeldt gave to Sir Thomas Clifford.

But they were also clogg'd with other Articles, that made a second Attempt unpracticable, for they bound up the English from taking all their Advantages upon the Dutch, as particularly, They should not come farther than the Boom; so that if they should have beaten the Dutch from the Holds of their Ships, they had had no means of taking Possession of them. Besides, they were forbidden to land any of their Men, and to come in upon their Ships on the Backs of them; and all this deny'd to them under the Pretence of securing the Town from Fire, which might happen in grappling together; when notwithstanding this great Caution against the English, the Dutch had been permitted to fit a Fire-Ship to be set out upon them, if the Wind should favour their turn.

At this Conference between the Lord Alfeldt and Sir Thomas Clifford, his Lordship propos'd the fitting for two or three fresh English Frigates more, to give the Baltic better Colour; however, rather advis'd the whole Squadron to return to the Earl of Sandwich, plainly declaring the Power and Ability he had to keep the Dutch Ships in the Harbour, though the whole Holland Fleet should endeavour to fetch them off: And intimated, that he would do it for some time, saying, Though the English Fleet should be drawn away upon their own Coast for Refreshment, yet he had Occasion and Reason enough to hold the Dutch some time in Parley for the Damages the Town and Castle had received in their Protection. His Excellency was also pleas'd to express a great Affection for the English Interest, and that he would be glad of Opportunities to do something that might merit from them in some sort to recompense so many brave Men's Lives that fell there.

Sir Tho. Clifford returning to the Squadron of the English Fleet, and these representing to Sir Tho. Tyddeman, and the Captains with whom he advis'd, That by these Restrictions, and disadvantageous Proposals pretended to be made for the Preservation of the Town from Fire, his Majesty's Ships would be hinder'd from taking their Advantages upon the Dutch, by boarding of them, or to come on the back of them by Land, as they should see Cause, and were to be left to the Comptrol of the Forts and Castles, whether they should possess themselves, or not, of the Enemies Ships, after beaten from their Guns; all which he had likewise before told the Governor. It was, upon good Consideration, resolv'd to return to the whole Fleet; but before they went off, Sir Thomas Tyddeman sent a civil Letter to the Lord Alfeldt, intimating Injunctions of returning. The General Alfeldt distracted with his former Resolutions, and perhaps too greedy Desire of Profit, was so far from getting time by capitulating upon his Master's Account (as he promis'd he would in the last Conference) for Damages to the Town and Castle, occasioned by defending them, that upon Recompassing only to his own Particular, perhaps authorized by some Change of Council from Copenhagen, he permitted them to set sail upon the very first Notice given them by a single Galliot, that their Fleet was come out to convey them home, assisting them with the ablest Pilots in that Harbour, which were owing to his Majesty's Ships. [This Deduction was prefer'd in Lord Somers's Collection.]

( $\epsilon$ ) We are told by Mr. d'Estrees, That this affair occasion'd as much Joy in Holland, as Displeasure here. There were at that Time, in Bergen, ten *Ind*ia Ships, seventeen from Savoy, and twenty-eight from other Parts; all of which were valued at twenty-five Millions of Livres. He adds, that the English had two Ships sent in this Attempt, seven disabled, and 800 Men killed or wounded.

gen; whereby the Earl of Sandwich, with the Remainder, was left expos'd to the Possibility of being forc'd to engage with an Enemy superior in Strength, and determin'd to die or conquer.

Sir Thomas Clifford first expostulates the Matter at the Court of Denmark.

Equally sensible, therefore, both of the Loss and the Hazard, the King thought fit to send Sir Thomas Clifford to Denmark, with Instructions to expostulate the Matter, and demand Reparation; and, in case that was not comply'd with, to negotiate a League offensive and defensive, in which Sweden was to be included.

[Dissolution by Majesty.]

In Conference with him, his Danish Majesty seem'd afraid of what had pass'd at Bergen, lay'd the Blame on his Officers, excus'd the Delay of his Orders for Fourteen Days, for want of a Method of putting them into Cypher, affected to be ignorant of the sudden and easy Diffusion of the Dutch from Bergen, and seem'd very solicitous to compose all Matters of Complaint between the two Crowns, to the Content of his Brother of England.

Accordingly Count Hamibal (g) Sebestedt, upon the twentieth Day of September, returns to his Majesty's Envoys (Talbot was still at Copenhagen) in the King his Master's Name, the former Proposition of seizing the Dutch Ships in any of that King's Ports, upon the former Terms; there being yet seven of their Men of War, and one East India-man, in the Sound; two of their East India-men more at Yansberg; and many rich laden Ships more in other Ports in Norway, which had been dispersed and driven in by the Storm, and English Fleet; and, to be sure not to miscarry, as formerly, or to leave any Ground for Suspicion of their Sincerity, Count Hamibal told the said Envoys, he would bring to them the said original Orders and Letters, for their respective Governors, and they themselves should send them away by Expresses, and also should have Gallies in the Sound, to send the Advice of it to the English Fleet, that it might be the sooner executed: But in the very Evening of the said twenty-first Day of September, when the Envoys expected the Performance of Count Hamibal's Promises, instead of the said Orders, he brought certain News of the Return of the English Fleet to their own Ports; upon the Knowledge of which, the Dutch Ships in the Sound had weigh'd Anchor, and were bound homeward; and that it was probable the rest of their Ships, lately put into Norway, had done the like.

From this time forward the Envoys of England observ'd a great Coldness and Reservedness in all the Proceedings of the Danish Ministers with them, which oblig'd them, pursuant to their first Instructions, to present an expostulating (h) Memorial to the King; which produc'd fresh Overtures of Treating: Both the King and his Commissioners, Count Hamibal Sebestedt, Lord High Treasurer and Prime Minister, and Mr. Gabell, the second in Denmark in Power and Credit to him, and all the rest seeming fond of a speedy Conclusion, resolv'd upon meeting daily, which was accordingly done; and the Result of all was, that, on the eighteenth of October, a League offensive and defensive between England and Denmark against the Dutch, to be prosecuted by Sea and Land, was sign'd and seal'd; the said Commissioners having a full Power from his Danish Majesty for that End, under that King's Hand and Seal, in which he promises, on the Word of a King and a Christian, to ratify whatsoever should be agreed unto.

And it is worth the observing, That the Danish Ministers insisting particularly, that the Business of Bergen should be for ever forgotten, and neither Claim nor Expostulation upon it ever rais'd in the future; it was thereon agreed to, and formally made a fundamental Article of the said Treaty.

And to make this League the more useful to both the Crowns, Provision was likewise made in it, not only for the Swed to enter and declare it a triple Union, but an Article was insert'd in it, to make the Whole void and ineffectual, unless the King and Kingdom of Sweden did openly embrace and join in it.

This Treaty was no sooner finish'd in Copenhagen, but, within a Day or two, Sir Thomas Clifford, empowered for that Purpose, began his Journey to Stockholm, where it was promis'd him by the Danish Ministers, that their Resident should confer with him upon it, with full Powers to join in the Conclusion of it in that Court.

But, within a short time after the said Envoy's Arrival and Audience at Stockholm, there came certain Intelligence from England to the said Envoy, that Klunenberg, who was privately

The double Behaviour of the Danes.

(f) And that this did not actually happen, was possibly owing to the Storm which dispers'd the Fleet of both Nations, and, in which two Java Ships, eight Men of War, four Pinks with Provision, and two Fire Ships, all valued at nine Millions of Livres, fell into the Earl of Sandwich's Hands without striking a Blow.

(g) He is commonly call'd Ester in Mr. d'Eftrades's Memoirs.

(h) Which was conceived in the following remarkable Terms.

"The subscribed Extraordinary Envoys of England, in their Memorial of the sixteenth last, acquainted your Majesty with the Dissatisfaction of the King their Master, in the Delays which he hath found in his Treaties with your Majesty, and in the late unchristianlike Usage of his Ships at Bergen, contrary to your Majesty's Agreement, and indeed Proposal to the King their Master, by which means the English suffer'd not only the Dishonour of a Republic, and Loss of many brave Men, but it hath given Occasion also to the Christian World, to censure, that in truth very unjustly, the King their Master, as guilty of the Violation of such a Friend's and Ally's

Port, and to say, that none can be secure of his Friendship, when either Interest, or other Temptation of Profit, offers itself; by which, his Majesty is most justly wounded in Honour: For the Reparation of which, they made several Proposals to your Majesty's Commissioners, (which they also propos'd neither dishonourable nor disadvantageous to your Majesty's Interest) but being still delay'd and put off, without having any Satisfaction therein, they are commended by the King their Master, to profess an entire Dissatisfaction of your Majesty's Proceedings with him; and wishal, to acquaint your Majesty, that he will take all lawful Ways and Means for the just Vindication of himself. And, to that Purpose, one of them hath Order to take a speedy Leave, and hasten to the Court of Sweden, rightly to inform that King of the Motives which led him to the Action at Bergen; and therefore they are forc'd to press your Majesty to a final Resolution; which they humbly desire your Majesty to vouchsafe them, that they may pursue their Master's Orders accordingly.

Copenhagen, Octob. 2, 1665.

TALBOT, CLIFFORD.

privately sent away from Copenhagen the twenty-fourth Day of September, when they were in the Midst of their Treaty with the said Envoys, was very far advanced at the Hague, in a Treaty offensive against England. At which very time, Jewel, the Danish Resident in Sweden, came to the Great Chancellor of Sweden, and other Ministers, pressing earnestly their speedy Entrance into the offensive League with England against Holland: And, by exact Computation of the Time, it was afterwards found, that, on that very numerical Day, Klunenbergh acquainted the Swedish Envoy at the Hague with their other offensive Treaty sign'd in Holland against England, using many Arguments to him, to persuade the King of Sweden to enter into the said offensive Alliance.

It is further observable, That the said Treaty offensive and defensive against Holland was sign'd and seal'd at Copenhagen, the Court of the said King; so as no Room is left to excuse what was afterwards done in Holland, by the Pretence of Ministers mistaking their Master's Orders. Immediately, upon which, it was imparted to the English Envoys, that Count Hanibal Sebestien should go in the Quality of Embassador Extraordinary, seemingly, into Holland, but indeed, into England, the better to amuse the States, and gain Time, whilst their naval Preparations were making ready for the Defence of the Sound, against the Attempts that might probably be early made by the said States, if they should suspect such a triple Union; the said Count declaring, it was his Opinion Denmark should stick to England, tho' Sweden should not come in; adding, he would use all his Endeavours accordingly: And this was so far carried on, as to cause one of his Majesty's Vessels to be written for from England, to come to Ostend to carry him thither; instead of which, he went directly from Holland to France: About which time, the Danish Treaty with Holland was made public; the very first Article of which was to this Effect: "Whereas it is found, that the English Ships of War did, in the last Year, 1665, commit several undue Facts, in the very Currents and Havens themselves of his Majesty (of Denmark) and assail'd his Ports and Castles in a hostile Manner: Therefore no English Ships of any Sort shall be permitted to come into his Ports or Currents, or Cattigut, or the Sound or Belt."

They seize upon all English Ships.

The Consequences, upon the Whole, were, that, without any more Notice, or other Formality used towards England, all English Ships and Merchandize within that King's Power were seiz'd, and in such a rigorous Manner, as had been scarce practis'd by any other King or State in any time. The English Factors in Norway, and other Places of his Dominions, were all imprison'd; and if any Persons were but suspected of having Trade and Dealing with his Majesty's Subjects, their Goods were first seiz'd, and then they were put to their Oaths, to declare whether the said Goods did belong to Englishmen.

It must be confess'd, this Treaty was exceedingly (i) advantageous to the Danes: But it was withal esteem'd such a Reproach to them, that, when their Minister at Stockholm, in a set Speech, endeavour'd to excuse it to the Queen and Regency, he was told, in pretty plain Terms, "That the Proceeding of his Master was so unfair and dishonourable, that they knew not how any Prince, for the future, could treat with him."

It appears however, that the Swedes themselves were both envious of the lucrative Bargain which the Danes had made, and desirous to find as good a Market for themselves: It is true, they redoubled their Professions to England; nay made Preparations in all their Ports, gave out, that they would not suffer Denmark to make a Property of the Sound, and threaten'd to attack the Danes, in case they presum'd to arm in Aid of the Dutch: But then all was calculated only to obtain the higher Terms; and, accordingly, a Negotiation was open'd; in which, making such Demands as the States either could not or would not comply with, all this Bustle of theirs ended in a Proposal of a Mediation.

But these Matters running far into the next Year, it is our present Business to finish with that before us.

Tho' the French Court persisted in their Designs upon Flanders, and only waited for a proper Opportunity to bring them into Execution; and tho' so fair an Occasion now offer'd to establish the most close and intimate Union between the Crowns of Great Britain and Spain, the latter appear'd almost as insensible of our Advances now, as we had been formerly of theirs. The Alliance with Portugal, the Support derived to that Kingdom thereby, and the parting with Dunkirk to France, were Affronts, which that haughty Nation could not yet recollect without Indignation, and which nothing but their Weakness hinder'd them from resenting.

Translation with Spain.

If therefore they receiv'd our Offers with Civility, it was, at the same time, with the most freezing Coldness: When Sir Richard Fanshawe had been above a Year at Madrid, he complain'd, that he had not been able to carry one Point which had been recommended to him in his Instructions; and therefore desir'd to be recalled: And even when a Second was almost expir'd, though many things had been negotiated, nothing was accomplish'd: And, in the midst of this Suspence, his Catholic Majesty dy'd, leaving left the Regency in the Hands of his Queen, and six Assistants, which were to compose her Council.

out in London, and carry'd along with it Terror and Destruction. The King and Court took the Alarm, and remov'd; as did likewise all those, whose Circumstances enabled them to reside elsewhere. The Care of the City, in the mean time, was left to the Duke of Albemarle; and that he might not have two Enemies to struggle with together, a Proclamation was publish'd, "requiring all disbanded Officers and Soldiers, who had serv'd in Arms under any of the late usurped Powers, to depart the Cities of London and Westminster, and not to return within twenty Miles of the same, till the November following."

Sixth Session.

Substance of the King's Speech:

But, tho' the destroying Angel was abroad, it was nevertheless necessary for the King to meet his People in Parliament: Oxford was the Place appointed; and October the 10th the Session was open'd with a gracious Speech to both Houses; in which his Majesty, having made some Excuse for calling them together during the Sicknefs, was pleas'd to put both Houses in mind, that he had enter'd into a War with the States, by their Advice and Encouragement; that he was desirous they should receive Information of the Progress of it, as frequently as possible, to the End that he might have the Continuance of their chearful Supply: That it had prov'd more chargeable, than he could have imagin'd: That, as the Dutch had increas'd their Preparations, he was oblig'd to do the same: That his Alliance with the Bishop of Maastricht, who was then in the Bowels of their Country, had cost him a very great Sum of Money: That his Issues had been made with all possible good Husbandry; but that nevertheless, the great Supply, which they had given him, was, upon the Matter, already spent: That he not only expected farther Assistance, but such as might enable him to defend himself against a more powerful Neighbour: That he was not averse to Peace, but that nothing had been offered worthy his Acceptance, nor were the Dutch less insolent, tho' he knew of no Advantage they had had, but the Continuance of the Contagion.

And of the Chancellor's.

For Particulars, his Majesty then refer'd them to the Chancellor, who, tho' represent'd, both by himself and others, as an Enemy to the War, and as having industriously avoided all Concern in it, upon this Occasion, at least, espous'd it with as much Warmth, as could have been expected from the most pliant Courtier. His Lordship began his Narrative as high as the Respiration; enumerated the Difficulties the King had to struggle with, upon his Accession to the Government; the Expence of the Fleets and Armies he found on foot; the Debts he was forced to contract, that they might be discharged; and the Necessity he was under, by all imaginable Shifts, to supply his Magazines, which, he asserted, had not Arms for 5000 Men, nor Provisions to fet out ten (k) new Ships. His Lordship then enlarg'd on his Majesty's Care to suppress the Pirates of Algier, the Charge it put him to, the Peace he forc'd them into, their fraudulent Practices to evade it, and their being compell'd a second time to make their Submission, on Conditions more advantageous than the former. From hence he made a Transition to the Behaviour of the Dutch, in the Mediterranean, under de Ruyter, when the King was embark'd, at their Instance, and jointly with them, in a new War with the said Pirates, "Who, said he, were so far from any (1) Conjunction with us, that, when our Ships chaced any Algier-men, near them, they never offer'd to obstruct their Flight; but quickly made it manifest, that they rather brought Money with them, to buy a dishonourable and disadvantageous Peace, than to make War upon them."

A. D. 1666.

His Lordship next enlarg'd on the Depredations and Insolences of the Dutch, both in the East Indies, and on the Coast of Africa; the Repentment it kindled at home, the Parliament's Tender of their Lives and Fortunes, his Majesty's demurring to examine Particulars, and demand Justice and Reparation; the Behaviour of the Dutch thereon, which, he tells us, was accompany'd with many insolent Expressions, suitable to the Manners of a Commonwealth; their Complaints against Holme's Behaviour at Cape Verde, with the Squadron which the King had lent the ROYAL COMPANY; his Majesty's disowning the said Holme therein, and Promise to punish him according to his Merits.

He then proceeded to a Repetition of every Circumstance, from de Ruyter's Voyage to Guiney, to the Attempt at Bergen; in the Close of which, he represented the Dutch as still resolute against any Peace, but on such Terms, as his Majesty would be oblig'd to acquit his People with; insumch, that even the Release of Polerun, and the Demolishment of Cape Corfe, "Which, says his Lordship, would be, upon the Matter, to be content with a very vile Trade in the East Indies, under their Controul, and none in Guiney" were not Propositions unreasonable enough to please them. To which he added, "That they loaded us with such Reproaches, as the Civility of no other Language would admit the Relation: The Truth is, they have a Dialect of Rudeness so peculiar to their Language and their People, that it is high Time for all Kings and Princes to oblige them to some Reformation, if they intend to hold Correspondence or Commerce with them."

His Lordship next signify'd, That they were making greater Preparations than ever, consisting of greater Ships, furnished with greater Artillery: And, for the Use and Application of all, having mention'd again, that their former noble, unparalleled Supply was, upon the Matter, spent; he added, "What

(1) His Lordship must certainly mean by this, Provisions for ten more Ships, and Arms for five thousand more Men than were already upon the Establishment: For it could not be supposed that the great Fleets and Armies, which the King had to support till they were disbanded, were destitute of either.

(2) His Lordship chose to forget the Affront put on them by Lawson at their first Meeting, by refusing to return their Salute.

A. D. 1665.

“ is more to be done, he (the King) leaves entirely to your own generous Understandings; being not more assured of any thing that is to come in this World, than that the same noble Indignation for the Honour of the King and the Nation, that first provok'd you to inflame the King himself, will continue the same Passion boiling in your loyal Hearts, &c.

His Lordship's Commission, however, did not end here: The Disaffected were to feel the Weight of his Rhetoric, as well as the Dutch. In order to which, he took upon him to assert, “ That the horrid Murderers of their late Royal Master were received into the most secret Councils of Holland: That other infamous, prostituted Persons, of our Nation, were trusted in their Affairs, and enabled to maintain a Correspondence by their Liberality: That their Friends at home, impatient of longer Delays for the Successes they had promised themselves, and for the Succours which others had promised to send them, made no doubt of doing the Business themselves, if they could appoint a lucky Day to begin the Work. And you had heard of them in all Places, upon the third of the last Month (their so much celebrated Third of September) if the great Vigilance and indefatigable Industry of the Good General, who is always awake for the King's Safety, and the Peace of the Kingdom, had not, two Days before, apprehended the seditious Leaders, and given Advertisements for the securing others, in most Parts of the Kingdom; by the Confessions of many of whom, their wicked Design is enough manifested, and ready for Justice.—

“ Let not those Scorpions be kept warm in our Bosoms, till they sting us to Death; let not those who hate the Government, who would destroy the Government, be shelter'd under the Shadow and Protection of the Government.”

His Lordship indeed allow'd a bare Possibility, that some Men, who were not Friends to this or that Part of the Government, might not incline to buy those Alterations they most desired, at the Price of a Civil War: “ They would, continued he, bring it fairly about, wait for a godly Parliament, and do all by their Content. But those Persons cannot take it ill, that we cannot desire they should ever have it in their Power to bring those Alterations to pass, by those Means they now seem to abhor.— The only Way to preserve themselves innocent, is to keep their Minds from being vitiated by the first Impressions; by Jealousies, Murmurings, and Repinings; and, above all, by their Conversations with those Men, or Indulgences towards them, who would sacrifice the Peace of the Kingdom to their own Ambition, Pride, and even to their Humour.” His Lordship finish'd in the following remarkable Manner:

“ If you carefully provide for the suppressing your Enemies at home, which will put you to little other Expence than Courage, Constancy, and Circumspection, you will find your Enemies abroad less exalted; and, in a short time, more inclin'd to live in Amity with you, than to make War upon you.”

The whole of this (m) Harangue, as first publish'd, contain'd Nineteen Pages in Folio: So necessary was it then thought to persuade the People, that their Money was well laid out!

But, amazing as it might well seem, that so vast a Sum was already exhausted, the Commons waited upon his Majesty with another Compliment of their Lives and Fortunes; which was follow'd with a very cheerful and unanimous Grant of One Million Two hundred and Fifty thousand Pounds more, to be levied in two Years, by monthly Assessments. They did not however wholly forget, that they were to inspect as well as grant; and that the Money they gave freely, was to be punctually accounted for: Thus, on the last Day of the Session, we find them voting an Address, that his Majesty be humbly desired to give Command to the Officers of his Navy, Ordnance, and Stores, to prepare an Account of their Disbursements, against the next. The Power of the Purse they rightly thought was their only Power; and tho' they employ'd it both frequently and liberally, in the King's Favour, it was never their Intention to part with it entirely.

It may even be urg'd, and perhaps not unreasonably, that, warm as they were against the Dutch, they stood upon Terms with the Crown; and barter'd the Supply, for a new penal Law against the Nonconformists:

That these were the domestic Enemies the Chancellor pointed out, as fit Objects of their Indignation, and whom it was so necessary to suppress, in order to render those abroad less exalted.

For, having laid it down as a Fundamental (as the Preamble of the Act bears Witness) “ That their Teachers had settled themselves in divers Corporations, sometimes Three, or more, in a Place, and took Opportunity to distil the poisonous Principles of Schism and (n) Rebellion, to the great

(n) In the Year 1667, one Evon Price set forth a Paper, with his Name prefix'd to the Title Page, call'd Eye Sales for England, or the Grand Trappan Detrib'd, which I have thought necessary to insert in this Place, verbatim; that the Reader, having all the material Evidence before him, may be enabled to make his own Conclusions; whether the Persecuted had most Reason to complain, or Persecutors to punish.

Upon the twenty-second of February, 1667, Mr. Nicholas Melly, one of the Justices of Peace for the County of Lancaster, came to me, Evon Price, as I was at work with my Master, Rige Martland, Clothworker in Manchester; and desired me to go and drink my Morning-draught at Mr. Jehosaph's the King's Head Tavern; where, after some talk with me alone, he told me, that he came to me by Authority from the King; and that if I would take the Countess to do the King a Piece of Service, it was now in his Power to make me whilst he lived; which was in brief, to be a Witness, and swear against such Men, as were to him discovered to be in a Plot against the King; and for which I should have, as a Reward, either a thousand Pounds in Money, or the tenth part of such Mens Estates as I should evidence against; and that further Evidence would be procured to join with me herein. Which Motion I utterly rejected, having (as I told him) to take Bribes to shed Blood. Whereupon his Countenance changed, and being very wrathful, he threatened, with many Protestations, that he would hang me if I so withstood his Motion and Authority; and then upon laid Hands upon me, searching my Pockets, and sent for a Constable, charging him to bring me to Justice Light-bounds's House, where they examined me upon a pretended Plot; but finding nothing, charged the Constable to secure me that Night in the Dungeon, and bring me the next Day to Berry before the Deputy-Lieutenant, sending for my Master with whom I wrought, to find something against me; but he declared me upon his Oath, that I had kept constantly to my Work with him for divers Months before.

Being brought the next Day to Berry, before the Deputy-Lieutenant, and examined four several Times before them, no Accus appearing against me, all departing away but Sir Robert Brotherton, Mr. Hall and Mr. Mealy, they made my Mitimus, and sent me to Lancaster Gaol, without Bail or Mainprize.

Being at Lancaster, Mr. Mealy, at the Assizes following, came to me several times with his former Temptations, enlarging his Proffers, and would told me that, I should find, the Judges themselves would conform the same to me. Thereupon forthwith bringing me to the Judges in their Chamber, viz. Judge Turner and Twissler, who told me they had received several Letters and Papers, which Mr. Mealy, as they said, had given them, mentioning a Combination of five thousand Persons (of the Independants, Presbyterians, Anabaptists and Fifth-Monarchy-men) in Lancashire and Cheshire, to make Insurrection against the King and his Government, and the Names of forty or fifty of the principal Contrivers thereof, against whom my Evidence was required, the Judges naming most of them by name, and amongst the rest, the Lord Delamere, as chief; affirming me that what Mr. Mealy had promised should be made good, if I would serve the King therein, as desired; which I still refusing, was returned to Prison again, and continued there above a Twelve-month after. The Letters and Papers above mentioned, by the Judges Direction, were put into the Hands of Justice Harry to be transferred, which he did at the Shire Tavern in Lancaster, that Affairs and his Copies thereof were spread abroad into many Hands in both Counties, the Extract of which Letters, and the whole of the Trappanning Declaration, as Providence brought to hand, take as followeth.

The first Letter is directed from Walsfield, by an unknown Hand, no Name therein, dated Feb. 6, 1665, and therein said, "That though Cheshire and Lancashire, like Pileas, will wash their Hands in Innocency from the Plot, yet it may be found otherwise. In as they were guilty first against his Father in that Rebellion, so may they be in the last, that now in our Sovereign Lord and King; for it may not be doubted but the Presbyterians, Independants and Anabaptists in those Countries to the number of five thousand, were leavened with the Fifth-Monarchy Spirit; and about Manchester, Warrington and Stoddard, five hundred. The chiefest Agents and Trustees in both Counties (as his first Letter mentions) were these, viz. The Lord Delamere, Mr. Eaton, Colonel Chapman, Colonel Dugdale, Col. Cromwell, Colonel Vandenke, Major Trowers, Lieutenant Smyth, Mr. John Crox of Uthinton, Mr. Henry Broadbent, Mr. James Marpole, the late Mr. Samuel Eaton, Mr. Bruton, James Titton, and Hugh Gandy. These fourteen for Cheshire were the chief Engagers and Agents for the rest with Purle and Persons to their Power. And in Lancashire nineteen, viz. Colonel Birch, Colonel Wagh, Colonel Sowers, the late Major Tiggan, Major Blyde, Major Foster, Major Edge, Mr. Thomas Birch, Mr. Edward Galloway, Mr. Jervis, Mr. Newcomb, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Jones, Mr. Robert Birch, Mr. Gains, (all his old pretended Preschers) Mr. Ditchfield, Mr. Grewant in an Apothecary in Lancaster, Mr. Jolly, and Sergeant William Booth. These were all that were named in the first Letter, the one Evon Price that was a Messenger between them, to carry Letters and Intelligence, against whom the Informer would appear at the Assize, if the said Evon, being secured, did refuse to discover the forenamed Persons; but if the said Evon would be shown by any Reward to exceed such Men, then give and grant him the tenth Part of each Mans Estate that he should be accuse; but if he would not, then threaten and fright him to it."

The second Letter was dated at Lancaster, without name, with some Reasons why yet he would not be known to him, conforming the first, and adding the Names following, viz. In Cheshire, William Barret, Thomas Partridge, Major Bannal, Lieutenant Beccoff, and William Brown. In Lancashire, Major Robinson, Captain James Hoveworth near Chorley, Mr. Skarphill, Sir Richard Haughton of Haughton Tower, and Dr. Fife, made privy to it, but unwilling to engage in Action; but the Lady Sarah (Mr. Eaton's chief Disciple) did engage to supply with Monies; Mr. Harrison of the Field-Country, Mr. Hookstead Shopkeeper in Manchester. And moreover, that the Fanatics in Yorkshire were grown more numerous and unanimous in their Designs and Resolutions, to avenge their Brethrens Blood; or be hang'd after them; many who formerly defided, now comply'd. Add that it required Diligence in him, and all his Majesty's faithful Subjects, to sit themselves to prevent the Danger. And that he knew no way better to get a Discovery of them both in Lancashire and Cheshire, than to labour with the said Evon Price, who being poor, might, by a good Reward, be brought to discover these, and more, having been to employ'd amongst them; which if he would, then get the Judges to assure him of Pardon, and any Reward he would desire. If by this means they prevailed not, then get some truly Friend who could act with Part with a Fanatic's Tongue, to go to him as from his Captain Haggins's Wife, Mr. Marples's Wife, his Brother Gamwell, and David Lamie's Wife, and Mr. Row's Wife, and Yfews Bally and his Wife, with Description of the Place of their Habitation; and in case they could not get one that knew them and the Place of their Abode, with certain Tokens from them, then to console and lament his Condition, and persuade him to endure, and so get what he could from him that way; I leave this following Declaration with him, and yet will seize him therewith, and so procure him to make a Discovery to save his own Neck. The Declaration, Word for Word, was as followeth:

A Dear of Hope spend in the Valley of Achor, for the Mourners of Sion out of the North; first abroad to revive the Priests of Hope, and awaken the dead Witnesses of the Lamb, to prepare themselves to meet him in his Kingdom on Mount Zion, in Judgment against the Blood of Esaus and mystical Babylon, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth.

Whereas several thousands of us, poor low Worms, and despised Servants of our Lord, King James, after earnest seeking of the Face of our God by Prayer, Supplications and Confessions, together with the Word and Prophecies of the Scripture as we were able (in an obscure manner) to understand the Lords Mind, and our own Duties, especially the Work of our Day and Generation; we are by inward Compulsion of the Spirit of God, we trust, carried on to declare and make known our Hearts (so far as at present we are able) to the Lords People, and all others in the three Nations that love the Name of God, Truth, Peace, their own Politeity, and the Welfare of their Country.

That we are deeply afflicted with, and grieved at, the daily Blasphemies which we hear against the Name of God, his Son, Gospel, Tabernacle, and they who worship therein.

At the most horrid Wickedness (whereof of it) openly committed in the Land, and countenanced by those in Authority (if not tolerated by Law) you much of it openly in Stage-Plays acted; besides the common Sin of Adultery, Drunkenness, Swearing, Straling, and what not.

At the common superstition and idolatrous Ways of Worship set up in the Nations, with Compulsion of the free-born Nations in Conscience therewith, and the sad Sacrifices of such as for Conscience sake tender a God, cannot, by Imprisonment, Excommunication, Confiscation of Goods, and Banishment from Countries and Relations.

At the bad Cry, we only of the Saints in most Prisons of the Nation, but also of the innocent Blood of our dear Christian Brethren and Natural Friends, Neighbourhood and Relations, unjustly taken away under Pretence of Plots, and Treason (like Naboth) restrained by the like trappanning Spirit, as Jewels sold so that they, as the Sould under the Altar, do cry for Vengeance in our Ears to revenge their Blood, that the Violence done to their Flesh may be upon Babylon.

At the lamentable Cry of the Poor of the Land for want of Employment, through the Decay of Trading, by means of Excess, Customs, Manly-Taxes, Poll-money, Chimney-money, Gift-money, and Subsidy money; all which is laid out in abundance, but nothing brought in, as if the Cask, which the Prophet speaks of, were open it, as we've put into Bags with Holes, Hag. i. 6. Mal. ii. 2.

At the favouring in of Jesuits, Priests, and unlearned Papists, to infect the Minds of our People, and to put out our Firebrands (of the Lord in Mercy do timely prevent them) so wounding our Country with false Liberty as call the Nation to much Blood and Treachery to extinguish; and keeping the Mouths of (almost all) gaily Protestants while Ministers, especially such as cannot in Conscience comply with the Pope's Canons in our Episcopal Ordinations, thereby making way for Antichrist the Pope (if not as high to bring in the Turks upon us) yet to bring us back into Rome's Jurisdiction, thus to meet him, and make the Lord Jesus that gave himself for us.

And now, tho' we cannot say that we are sufficiently sensible and humbled for our own Sins, which made way for these Abominations, yet in measure we desire to take Shame to ourselves, especially such of us as have defiled our Garments in chusing of us new Gods, by being instrumental to bring these Things to pass by our Backslidings and Revolts from the Lord, to help the Wicked and Ungodly, as Jezebel did Ahab, 2. Chron. xix. 2. and weaken the Hands of our godly Brethren, who in the Witness of the Spirit forefaw the Event, and gave us Warning betimes; but now we desire no longer to abound in sinful Compliance, as to stand by and behold our Brethren carried Captives, lest we ourselves be the first that may justly follow after, Obad. x. 11. But we beg the Lord to abound in pardoning Grace, and give us Hearts to manifest Repentance by our Returns to, and Zeal for, the Lord, and to help the Poor and Needy against the Mighty, and not delight ourselves in our own Paineth and their Miseries any longer, but quit ourselves like Men, feeling there is no Kennedy but Death and Destruction threatened, or at least to live in a worse Condition than Slavery, for such as desire to live morally in the Nation, much more goodly in Christ Jesus. And we being taught by Grace and Nature, to use all lawful means to defend our Lives, Liberties, Relations and Estates; also satisfied from the Word of God, that the Use of temporal Weapons of War is a lawful Means of God's own Institution in its own time, and that the Use thereof in the Hands of Saints, as one Means, the Kingdoms of this World must fall, before they become the Kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; and having seen the Lord own them to be evidently already, We declare ourselves of a ready mind (when the Lord shall form and call us out thereby) to hazard our Lives, and all that is or may be dear or near unto us, for the reviving of the good old Cause. And tho' we be persuaded we need not use Arguments to our Brethren (who are called, chosen, and faithful) in the Nation for Assistance herein, for we know they love not their Lives unto the Death, but will follow the Lamb through the greatest Difficulties; yet to our civil Neighbours and dear Countrymen, that would rather die like Men, than live worse than Slaves in their own native Land, as many do who want Food and Raiment (which Slaves have in strange Lands) We say, Break your Plowshares into Swords, Joel iii. 10. and fight for your Lives, your Wives, Children and Houses, Neh. iv. 11, 12. and come forth to help the Lord against the Mighty with us; who for Satisfaction to all do declare, That we thus are resolved, and shall, as much as in us lieth, labour to remove the aforesaid Grievances.

We shall to our Power press after Purity of Life, Doctrine, and Reformation of Church Discipline according to the Word of God, and the Example of best reformed Churches, as some of us long time have entered, and as the rest of us now enter into a solemn League and Covenant to pursue.

We are ready to stand up with Lives and Estates to maintain, uphold and defend both Magistracy and Ministry, for perfecting the lawful Work of Reformation, whether Miscellaneous or Comprehensive.

We declare, That we shall secure the Lives and Estates of all that oppose us not herein, as we own; and that as well those who shall be passive as active herein, to accomplish the aforesaid good Ends.

We declare ourselves void of a Spirit of revenge for any Wrong done us, we seek not the Blood of any, but such as in an hostile way stand to oppose us, and such as are guilty of innocent Blood in the Land; nor shall any other Damage come by us to those who have been our created Persecutors, provided they manifest due and timely Repentance.

We declare in the Sight of God, Angels and Men, That having obtained our Ends in these Islands, we desire not to rest or sit still, but be, till we die, sitting for the Destruction of Gog and Magog, Pope and Turk, with all their Allies; preparing for Christ's Kingdom, to be set up at his coming, by magnifying him as King and Lover of Sinners and Nations; the conversion of the Jews, with the fall of the Papal Empire, which we pray God for, did and shall strive to, and let all that love the Lord Jesus Christ, say, Amen. Even to come quickly Rev. xxii. 20. And they heard a great Voice from Heaven, saying, Come up hither, Rev. xi. 12. And they heard a great Voice from Heaven, saying, The Kingdoms of this World are become the Kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever, Ver. 15.

About a Fortnight after the Alliance, Mr. Spencer, the then present High Sheriff, came to the Gaoler's House, and sent for me from the Prison, assuring me of the Reward Mr. Moly's and the Judges had promised me, viz. a thousand Pound in Money, or the tenth Part of their Estates against whom I should swear. And in further Confirmation thereof showed me two Letters, one from the Duke of Gloucester, the other from Sir Henry Blount, whose Names he bore me, and my own Name also mentioned in the said Letters (telling me writ that the Lord Delaware and Sir Richard Horton were in the List.) But when he saw Rewards and Promises would not work with me, he forcibly threatened what he said, would certainly befall me.

Many forged and indirect ways were used to take away my Life, at least my Ears, in Revenge: For when Mr. Moly saw all other ways fail, the better to uphold his own Credit, would at last (transcribing those two Letters he gave to the Judges, like my Hand, having got some Letters of mine) persuade the Deputy Licentiate and others to whom he showed them, that I was the Writer and Forger of those Letters, and to would have handed the Villany upon me; but being compelled with my Faith-writing, cleared my Innocency the more to many that before suspected me.

Also there was one Enoch Eller of Manchester, a Barber, who by Justice Moly was forced to swear with me, (and I understand it) against any of the Persons designed for Destruction, as himself confessed; who had also sworn against me, but God prevented him by detecting the like villainous Contrivance and Perjury against eight innocent Persons, who by Mr. Moly's Instigation he swore against, but was convicted of his Perjury before Judge Tenter the Summer Assizes, 1664, being constrained to flee the Country to save his Ears.

These my Sufferings, and the Grounds thereof, being made public, and coming to the Ears of some principally designed against, the Lord Delaware sent particularly to receive Information of the Truth thereof from me, which I did give him under my Hand Seal, attested before Justice Peter and transcribed by his Clerk; and particularly of the Proceedings aforesaid with Mr. Moly's, the Deputy Licentiate and the Judges; and of their summing him to me in the Chamber in particular, amongst the rest that were designed against. Which Information, as I was informed, the Lord Delaware transferred, with a Complaint, to London; and that the Return he had from thence thereupon was to this Purpose, viz. That the Judges denied they either mentioned, or to much as heard his Name mentioned at that time, or that ever they saw his Name in any List or Relation to this Business. Thereupon the Lord Delaware, and others concerned in the Report, demanded my further Evidence, feeling the Judges denied it. But not being able to make out what was spoken by them to me in private before Justice Moly, I was threatened of all Sides, both by the Judges and others, to be set upon the Pillory; which probably had befallen me, had not God, by his Providences, brought it to light by Mr. Moly's own Confession to Dr. Effe, at Mr. Coeca's Tavern in Manchester, four or five Perform being present, who did there acknowledge to them that the Lord Delaware was named to me by the Judges in their Chamber.

This further Confirmation coming to the Lord Delaware, he was pleased, the better to vindicate himself, and to detect such vile Practices, to enter his Motion in some of the Courts of Justice against Mr. Moly; but (as I was informed) had his Proceedings stopp'd by Letters from London, Mr. Moly being enjoined to make his Submission, and ask him Forgiveness: Thereupon the Lord Delaware enjoined Justice Justice Harris and Mr. Hovenden, before Judge Trenton, in his Chamber, the Last Assizes 64. following.

But afterwards, Act. 65. Sir Roger Bradshaw, one of my former malicious Adversaries, meeting me near Wigmore, Hayed me, and told me he would send me to Gray's Inn, without any Cause showed, to be kept in an Alehouse, and commanded six or seven of his Men to strip me, under pretence of searching me for Letters, tho' before, in his Presence, I opened my Cloaths, emptied and turned my Pockets; his said Men used me very barbarously, and robbed me of about twenty Shillings; and tho' they could find nothing they pretended to seek for, yet did Sir Roger detain me there, as a Prisoner, about fourteen Days, without any legal Proceeding by Examination, Warrant, or Mittimus, &c. Afterwards Sir Roger, with Mr. Holt, resolved the Oath of Allegiance to me; and, upon the refusing thereof, sent me to the common Gaol at Manchester; where I was kept, in most cruel sort, for several Months, lying in a cold, open Room, all Winter long, and four Locks turned upon me; neither could I, by any Means, procure a Floor to lie in. Hereupon, on the 16th of March, 65, I drew up a Narrative of my former Sufferings, and the Grounds of them, by Mr. Moly's Means; then my Letter, by Sir Roger Bradshaw's craft and barbarous Usage; with a Petition to Judge Ranfoc, the then Judge of the Assizes, beseeching him to consider the time to the King, so extremely concerned therein; which was read to the Judge, and the principal Heads con-

the famous nonresisting Oath before-quoted, and declar'd, that they would not at any time endeavour any Alteration of Government, either in Church or State, on the Penalty of Forty Pounds, and Six Months Imprisonment, unless they took the said Oath before Commitment.

In the House of Peers, however, this Act met with some Opposition; and that not only from the Lords Ashley and Wharton, who were more than Half-Nonconformists themselves; but even from the Lord Treasurer Soubhampton, who, tho' so long and intimate a Friend of the Chancellor's, could not be prevail'd upon to countenance a Measure that was equally repugnant to Liberty and Christianity. But either the Authority of the one, nor the Arguments of the other, had any Weight: On the contrary, a Hint was taken, from those very Arguments, to bring in another Bill in the House of Commons, by which the said Oath, and Declaration, were to have been impos'd on the whole Nation. But, on the Question, it was happily rejected, by (a) Three Voices; who had the Merit of saving their Country from the greatest Injomy which could have befallen it; That of reviving as well as forging its own Chains.

These two Bills, with an Act to attain Thomas Doelman, Joseph Bamfield, and Thomas Scot, Three Fugitives, then in the Service of the States, in case they did not return and take their Trials, by a certain Day; and a free Gift of a Month's Assesment, by way of Acknowledgment of the Heroism of the Duke of York, in the late Engagement with the Dutch, were the principal Transactions of the Session; which was clos'd on the 31st of October; having lasted but three Weeks.

As scarce any Pretence can justify a Man for co-operating with an open and avowed Enemy, against his native Country; so Government is never more abus'd, than when Oppression goes forth under the Sanction of Law: The very Condition of Obedience is Protection; and he that is treated as an En-my, lies under a strong Temptation to act as one.

Grievances are the Food of Faction: Remove them, it starves and dies.

Had this been the main Endeavour of the Reign before us, the Current of it had been more easy and undisturbed. As it was not; a corrupt, factious, and arbitrary Court, begot a presuming, factious, and corrupt Opposition. The Honest saw Reason to interpose in Behalf of the Public: The Designing saw an Opportunity to advantage themselves: As the Last had the most Industry and Ability, they became the Leaders; and, being govern'd by Self-Interest only, fell into Extravagancies as inexcusable as those they pretended to remove. Of this, the Advocates for this Reign avail themselves; and, while they set forth the Patriots of these Times, as the worst of bad Men, would thence have us conclude, that those in Power were the best of all good.

He that prefers Truth to Party Prejudice, will find frequent Cause to condemn Both: And he that hesitates to do so, must be afraid of condemning himself at the same time.

Not satisfi'd with having one War upon their Hands already, and another in Prospect, so infatuated, or so presumptuous, were our Court and Church Politicians, that they still made a Point of subduing the Nonconformists at home. If they complain'd of one Hardship, it afforded a Pretence to afflict them with another: Tho' fear'd, they were provok'd; tho' suspected of a Disposition to rebel, Care was taken to furnish them with Reasons to justify them for so doing; and, tho' accus'd of corresponding with the Enemy, they were made desperate by ill Usage; as if on purpose to drive them into their Bosoms.

Nor was this absurd Conduct observ'd only in England, where the establish'd Church had the People, as well as the Law, on its Side: Even in Scotland, where the Presbyterians were the Majority, and where Episcopacy had been restor'd rather by Fraud and Violence, firm'd by some Persons of Quality (as I was told) which the Judge gave to Sir Roger, to make his Exceptions against either me or it; which, tho' I after urged him to, in open Court (where, in the Face of the Country, I laid open their wicked Carriages, he could not do) only, he said, I had refused to take the Oath, and that Mr. Mesly (whom he set forth to be a very worthy Gentleman) was, for the present, absent, whom I had greatly abused in my Narrative; and therefore desired I might be bound over to the next Assizes, to answer Mr. Mesly for the Injury I had done him; which was done accordingly, and I continued Prisoner till the next Assizes; when, with much ado, I procur'd Liberty to appear in the Court, by a Petition to Judge Turner, Mr. Mesly being present, making no Reply at all. Hereupon the Judge ordered me to be set at Liberty. This was the Suare broken, and I escaped."

There is likewise a Preface to this Piece, in which are the following remarkable Particulars:

After asserting, that there was nothing in his Relation, but what he had already declared in open Court, as also in his Cafe, given to Judge Ramsford, March 1, 1665; earnestly desiring it might be by him deliver'd to the King, he goes on thus: "Many remarkable Passages there are omitted in the Narrative; one thing worthy noting is, That Mr. Mesly was put into an Office of Trust and Profit, though he brought nothing of his Design to Perfection: So was Major Greenhead, that was the chiefest Man in drawing forth some Thirty Persons to rise with him in Arms in the Yorkshire pretended Plot; whereby many desolate Widows and Fatherless were made; and he received a great Sum of Money for his Pain: And Joseph Cromber, hired to tuzpan Men, came to Manchypip, and went in a seeming desolate Condition, and faint-like Shape and Language, with sighing and weeping to some honest Men, to seek Succour, as a Person escaping the Hands of his Enemies, and guilty in that Yorkshire Feud; and, notwithstanding they made Discovery of him, yet he was let go, and two of them [Mr. Edw. Gatham and Mr. Isaac Mest] bound over to the Sessions, thence to the Assizes, where they were set free by Judge Turner and Judge Tousden: This Man also hath a beneficial Office conferred on him since.

Ends, If thus doubtless the Truth of what I say, make but Enquiry among any knowing and impartial Persons inhabiting the Places herein named, and thou mayest easily be confirm'd, and further inform'd that I am willing here to relate to thee: Nor had this come forth by me, but that I was restless Night and Day, when I saw no Court was taken all this time to stop this Spirit of Wickedness, but that it spreads thro' the Nation, and threatens its Ruin."

Note, This remarkable Piece was preserved in the HARLEIAN COLLECTION.

(b) "The Providence by which it was thrown out was very remarkable: For Mr. Perregius Borris, being newly chosen, was that Morning introduced into the House by his Brother, the now Earl of Lindsay, and Sir Thomas Osborne, now Lord Treasurer, who all Three gave their Votes against the Bill; and the Numbers were so even upon that Division, that their Three Voices carried the Question against it." Violence, than by the Consent of the People, a Proclamation was issued, "Com-manding all Ministers, who had entred before the Year 1649, and since the Re-stitution of Church Government by Arch-bishops and Bishops had relinquish'd their Ministry, or had been depos'd by their Ordinary, to remove themselves, within forty Days after their Relinquishment, or Deposal out of the Parishes where they were Incumbents, and not to reside within Twenty Miles of the same, nor within Six Miles of Edinburgh, nor within Three Miles of any Cathedral, nor to inhabit Two in one Parish, upon Penalty of in-curring the Laws made against Movers of Sedition."

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to determine, how far the King was concern'd in these violent Measures. There is some Reason to think he gave into them, partly to oblige his Parliament; who were never in a better Humour to gratify him with their Money, than when some new Severity was let loose against Nonconformists; and partly, to compel those Nonconformists, by the Smart of ill Usage, to co-operate with the Papists, in their Endeavours to obtain a general Toleration. But then, neither of these Reasons affected Scotland; where Grievances multiply'd faster than in England; and Lairdendale, into whose Hands that Kingdom was given, and who had been himself an old Covenanter, could have no Inducement to persecute his Brethren, unless it was a Conviction, that he could no way make his Court so well as at their Expence. So that the only general Conclusions we can make from the Whole are, That the (p) Cabinet Undertakers at this Crisis, very artfully incorporated the Designs of the Church with those of the State; and that the King had Reason to believe, that, unless he abandon'd the Consciences of his Subjects to the Clergy, the Crown could never be able to do what it would with their Liberties and Estates.

However this may be; the Measure was not only blameable in itself, but ill-tim'd: Instead of putting a Stop to the Progress of Discontent, it gave it Wings: And, while we were embroil'd more than ever abroad, it help'd to distract and divide us more than ever at home.

Give a Politician but a Foot of Conscience, and, like Archimedes, he will move the World.

We have already mention'd the recalling of the French and Dutch Ambassadors from England, which, being here understood as the previous Step to a French War; Lord Holles, the King's Ambassador in France, presented a (q) Memorial to his most Christian Majesty, expressing the great Zeal and Unanimity of the People of England against the Dutch, recapitulating the Scope and Endeavour of his own Negotiations, and to remove all Difficulties between the two Courts, offering to admit the Liberty which France contended for, to assist the States; tho' not without a Note of Admiration, that his Majesty should prefer the Alliance of the said States to that of England!

This Memorial was presented January the 20th: On the 26th, his most Christian Majesty France declares War against England.

(p) Lord Chancellor Hyde and Archbishop Solemnus.
"I come to tell your Majesty, That the King my Master has order'd me to attend you, seeing your Majesty has been pleas'd to recall the Ambassadors you sent to him. 'Tis not his Fault if the Mediation you offer'd, to accommodate the Differences between him and Holland, has not succeeded. He is of himself so great Lover of Peace, as to receive with Joy all the Proposals that are made to him: But certainly, Sir, those presented to him by your Embassadors were not such as he could accept. He verily believes your Majesty could not obtain better of the Dutch, knowing they are bent on all sorts of Injustice and Violence against him and his Subjects, and very far from hearkening to Reason and what they owe to the Friendship and Good-will my Master has always shew'd towards them, and the Obligations they have receiv'd as well from so many Kings and Queens his Predecessors, as from the English Nation. They would, on the contrary, blot out the Memory of them by a Continuation of Injuries and Hostilities. He does not wonder therefore that they will not yield to any thing that's reasonable, to put an End to their unjust Proceedings, and establish Peace on such Conditions that they may have no Opportunity to carry on their unjustifiable Design of making themselves Masters of Navigation and Commerce, and usurp the Rights of all Kings, Princes, and States, their Neighbours, especially those of the King my Master."

They at first hop'd to make their Advantage of some Disorders they imagin'd would happen in England, or that the King would not be able to carry on the War for want of Money, which embolden'd them to injure and insult us, to prepare for a War, and actually began one with us in Guiney: But, Thanks be to God, they are so out in their Calculation, that the People of England, were never better united than they are now; and as to Money, the King will never want any to carry on his War. I can say this, perhaps, with more Assurance than another, having been conversant with Parliamentary Affairs these forty Years, from the Time of King James of happy Memory, great Grandfather to the King my Master. And I will affirm, that the two Houses are so zealous for their Prince's Glory, and the public Interest of the Nation, they will not suffer any Want to be of what is necessary to go through with this War. If what they have already given will not suffice, they will give him even half of the Kingdom's Revenue; and if that will not do, they will give him three Quarters, and reserve for themselves only what is just necessary to keep them alive. This, Sir, is what I am sure the King my Master will meet with in the Affection of his People, for the Support of his Rights against the Insults and Violences of his Enemies.

'Tis now two Years and a half since he sent me hither to give your Majesty all imaginable Assurances of his Affection to enter into a stricter Alliance with you than that which was made in former Treaties, and to add to those Treaties whatever should be necessary to render the good Understanding between the Kings and Kingdoms eternal, those Treaties remaining in force; for they have been continued according to the third Article of that of the Year 1610, by which 'tis declar'd, that that League and Alliance should be perpetual between the two Kings at that time, and their Successors; provided, in a Year after the Decese of one of those Princes, his Successors signify'd to the Survivor that he accepted the same Conditions, and the same Alliance; which was done by the Earl of St. Albans, in the Name of the King my Master, the 23d of June in the Year 1659, the same in which he was sett in his Kingdom; and this has been before observed by the late King, and renew'd afterwards in the Year 1644, by my Lord Goring his Ambassador in this Court.

When I came here I gave in a Project for another Treaty, to regulate the Trade between the two Kingdoms; to every Article of which, two or three excepted, his Majesty agreed: But ever since the 20th of December last, I have heard no more Talk of it, it having lain in the Hands of Monseur de Lionne. I remember your Majesty inclin'd very much on adding to the third Article, which contain'd a Prohibition to assist Enemies; a Clause importing that it was however not to prejudice preceding Treaties, to be thereby at Liberty to assist the Dutch; to which the King my Master answers, He consents that the whole Article be left out, to leave your Majesty at full Liberty to act as you shall think fit; tho' he was a little surpris'd to see your Majesty prefer that made with the Dutch in 1662, to the ancient Treaty between the two Crowns, which have lasted so many Years, which have so lately been renewed, and confirm'd in form, and were so necessary for the common Good of both Kingdoms, and so congruous to both Kings, allow'd and us'd by such strong Consideration."

jeſty declar'd (r) War with England, notwithstanding the great Conceſſion here made to prevent it; and, on the 29th, writing to Mr. d'Eftrades, who had before inform'd his Maſter, that Lord Arlington had marry'd a Dutch Lady, in whom he had an Intereſt, and deſired his Commands, in caſe he thought fit to have it employ'd in his Service, he takes Occaſion to conclude in the following dictatorial Manner:

"I commend your Zeal, and take it well from you. But I have nothing to deſire, nor expect of my Lord Arlington: And all I require from you is, to inſinuate without Affectation to the Bride, when taking Leave, That, having been highly honour'd with the good Graces of the King of Great Britain, during the Courſe of your Embaſſy to him, you are ſorry he has nothing to ſee but Enemies Coaſts, from the Extremity of Norway to Bayonne; and that you believe, the ſooner he can get out of this Condition, it will be the more to his Advantage."

At the very ſame time, however, that this haughty Style was made uſe of in Holland, thoſe of the French Court, who held Correſpondence with England, were inſtructed to ſignify to their Friends here, that this Declaration was iſſued, merely on a Point of Honour to the States, and not out of any Rancour or Animolity to us. To render which more credible, when Lord Holles had preferred a Remonſtrance, complaining, that according to the Letter of the ſaid Declaration, the Goods and Lives of all the Engliſh reſiding in France were brought into Danger, another was forthwith publiſh'd in the ſame Form, ſetting forth, That all Engliſhmen were free, during the Space of three Months, to diſpoſe of their Perſons and Goods as they thought fit.

It is likewiſe remarkable, that tho' France declar'd againſt England on the 26th N. S. England did not follow her Example till the 10th of February O. S. during all which time, and long after, Lord Holles was detain'd at Paris, by a Pſt of the Gout. Of this Delay Advantage was taken to open a Conference; which was held in the Queen Mother's Apartment, towards the latter End of April, and at which aſſiſted his Lordſhip, Mr. de Launne, and Mr. Van Beuvingen. Peace was the Subject. De Lionne declar'd, the Intereſt of France ſhould not delay the Negotiation a Moment. Lord Holles affirm'd, the King his Maſter was ſincerely diſpoſed to hearken to Reaſon: But then Van Beuvingen's (1) Propoſitions were ſuch, as, in Lord Arlington's Opinion, his Maſteſty might only have expected, after the Loſs of a Battle: Theſe therefore were no ſooner communicated to the Court of England, but Orders were immediately diſpatch'd to Lord Holles, to return without any further Delay, without bearing or uttering one Word more, in that Court, relating to any public Buſineſs. This his moſt Chriſtian Maſteſty, in a Letter to Mr. d'Eftrades, is pleas'd to call a very bold Proceeding; apparently becauſe it was unexpected; and partook of a Spirit ſo widely different from that which uſually prevail'd in this Reign.

However, when Lord Holles took his Leave, the French Court beſtow'd on him all the Civilities which they had till then omitted; aſſuring him moreover, that they with'd the Declaration againſt us unmade; and that they would embrace any Occaſion to put Things in their former Poſture. Upon which his Lordſhip, at his Return, reported, that he took it all for Diſſimulation, and to divert the Court of Spain from placing any Dependence upon the Officers of England.

In this Interval, Attempts had been likewiſe made by Lord Arlington, to ſet on foot a ſeparate Negotiation in Holland; but to no Purpoſe; de Wit was too deeply engag'd with the French Court to countenance any thing of that Kind: On the contrary, he not only communicated every ſuch Advance to Mr. d'Eftrades, without Reſerve, but, when it was known that the King of England refus'd to treat on the Propoſitions made by Van Beuvingen in the Queen Mother's Apartment, and had recalled Lord Holles, he made uſe of theſe two Circumſtances to perſuade the Cities, that the ſole Intention of England was to ſow Diviſions between France and them; and thereby render'd all Proſpect of an Accommodation more deſperate than ever.

As to the mighty Performances expected from the Biſhop of Muſter, the Alarm was greater than the Miſchief: He had many fine Opportunities, but was not Soldier enough to improve them; his Conduſt rather reſembling that of a Captain of Huſſars, than the General of an Army; and tending rather to lay waſte, than ſubdue a Country. But, if his Troops were ill commanded, they were as ill paid: Four thouſand revolted at once, upon that Account; and he was oblig'd to ſend his whole Stock of ready Caſh to appeaſe them. England, who engag'd him in the Attempt, had (1) fail'd him in the Subſidies, which were to enable him to go thro' with it: France, on the other hand, ſent Troops to oppoſe him: Beſides which, the neighbouring Princes of the Empire, fearing their Country would become the Seat of War, enter'd into a Confederacy; at the Head of which appear'd the Elector of Brandenburg, who was now gain'd over by the French, to compel him to abandon his Deſign, and withdraw his Forces. Thus beſet and abandon'd, he was oblig'd to ſubmit to a private Treaty, under the Mediation of the ſaid Elector: The Alarm of which no ſooner reach'd England, than Sir William Temple

But it was now too late; the Treaty was already sign'd at Cleves; the States were set free from this Inmate-Enemy; and England alone was to make her Party good, against all the naval Power of France, Denmark, and Holland.

Lord Carlingford's Negotiations with the Princes of Westphalia, and the Emperor,

It ought not to be forgot, that, when the Munster Project was first in Agitation, the Earl of Carlingford had been sent with a Commission-General to the Marquis de Castel Rodrigo, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, the Duke de Nienburg, the Elector of Brandenburg, the Elector of Mentz, and the Emperor, to solicit, in his Master's Name, their Countenance and Assistance to the Bishop, in his Attempt upon the Hollanders; as affording a proper Opportunity of reducing them to such a Condition as should oblige them to live well with their Neighbours for the future. But, except with the Marquis de Castel Rodrigo, his Lordship had every where a cold Reception: Every one of these German Princes, as before-mention'd, embracing the other Side, and the Emperor himself joining with France in the Guaranty of the Treaty, which bereft England of the Bishop's Assistance, and restor'd the Peace between him and the States General.

Fruitlefs.

Proceedings with Spain.

All this while, our Negotiations with Spain, which had taken a new Turn, upon the Death of his Catholic Majesty, and were carried on rather more in earnest than before, proceeded nevertheless in a very slow and languid Manner. Sir Richard Fanshawe had made a shift, in the Close of the Year 1665, to bring them to the Conclusion of a Treaty, which was however chiefly commercial, and admitted of four Months Delay for Ratification: The great Points of a Peace or Truce with Portugal, and the entering into a League offensive and defensive with England, remain'd in suspense as before. Indeed, the Demand, which his most Christian Majesty had now formally made, of the Duchy of Brabant, and the County of Hainault, in the Right of his Wife, gave the Spaniards the most sensible Provocation: But then they declar'd, on the other hand, that, whatever Reason they had to be displeas'd, till the Portugal Thorn was out of their Foot, it would not be prudent to shew their Resentment; tho', in Aggravation of the Grievance, the French Minister at Madrid every Day threaten'd them with a Rupture, in his Master's Name, in case they embark'd in the same Bottom with England. In order, therefore, that the sole Difficulty which deterred them from embracing the Offers of England, which were at present of the highest Consequence to both Nations, might be remov'd, Sir Richard Fanshawe undertook a Journey from Madrid to Lisbon, in hope to induce that Court to accommodate Matters, on the Plan before propos'd, of a Truce for Thirty Years: But, tho' the whole Dispute now turn'd upon a single Word, the Spaniards agreeing to treat with the Crown of Portugal, and the Portuguese insisting on the Title of KING, a Pacification seem'd as remote as ever; for each Party thought the Continuance of the War a more supportable Evil, than a Submission to the Demands of the other; during which deperate Situation of Affairs, Sir Richard Fanshawe return'd to his Post at Madrid, where he soon after dy'd.

A. D. 1665. 6.

Death of Sir Richard Fanshawe.

We are now to make a short Transition to the Circumstances and Situation of the young Prince of Orange, which had undergone a surprizing Alteration.

Circumstances and Situation of the Prince of Orange.

Hitherto, thro' the Intrigues of the Princess his Mother, in concert with the King of England, and Elector of Brandenburg, his Interest, Power and Credit had been set up in Opposition to those of Mr. de Wit; and the whole Seven Provinces had taken Part on one Side, or the other.

Hence it was with Reason conjectured, that, as the Prince grew up, the Breach would have widen'd, and the Quarrel grown more irreconcilable.

But de Wit derived such additional Strength from the Assistance of France, that he became an over Match for his Adversaries. Upon which the Princess thought it advisable to reconcile herself to France likewise, which in some Degree she did, by making use of her Interest with the Elector of Brandenburg, agreeable to the Directions of the French Court.

She did not however, as yet, give over the Struggle; on the contrary, by the Dint of Money, as well as every other Means in her Power, she endeavour'd to procure an extraordinary Embassy to be sent to England, in order to negotiate a Pacification, of which her Son, the Prince, was to be Head. But tho' she was supported in this Project by the united Strength of the English and Spanish Factions, it came to nothing. Such being the Vigilance and Address of the Penioner and his Coadjutor, Mr. d' Esbrades, that they every where countermin'd and defeated her; spiring up ever her own Daughter the Princess of Nassau against her, who enter'd with such Warmth into the Views of France, against those of her own Family, that she sold her Jewels at Amsterdam, and together with her young Son, flung herself into Greeningen, then besieg'd by the Bishop of Munster, in order to shew her Affection for the Province (of which and Overysel, she was Governess) and animate her People to make the braver Defence.

Finding it therefore a vain thing to continue the Contest any longer, during the present Conjuncture, the Princess Dowager thought it advisable to solicit the Province of Holland to accept the Guardianship of her Son, which nevertheless they would have declin'd, if Mr. d' Esbrades had not induc'd the

The Princess surrenders the Guardianship of him to the Province of Holland.

(u) These are Sir William Temple's Words to his Father, May 10, who farther says, They had been long intermitted; and yet Lord Arlington writing to Lord Sandwich, then upon his way to Madrid, March 22, affirms, The King had almost completed the Bishop's Payment.

Penfioner to wave his own particular Animosity, and accept the Trust; that his Highness might be wean'd from his Attachment to England, and receive such Impressions as might dispose him, for the future, to rely only on the Friendship and Protection of France.

Thus fell his Highness into the Hands of the very Man who had made it the great Point of his Life to oppose and defeat the Pretensions of his House; but who, nevertheless, discharged his Trust, with more Integrity, than could have been expected from so consummate a Politician: At once taking all possible care that his Country should never stand in need of the Assistance of an occasional Sovereign, and providing that his Pupil should be able to fill that high Office worthily, and honourably, in case it should.

His Domestic change'd.

The first Effect of this great Change which his Highness felt, was an Order for the Dismission of all his Tutors and Domestic, some of whom were natural-born Subjects of England, and all suspected of being attach'd to the English Interest; and for the Substituting as many of Mr. de Wit's Friends and Deputies in their stead. This was a Blow which affected him deeply; and, judging rightly that it was owing to the Influence of France, he made a Visit to Mr. d'Esfrades, whom he desir'd, with Tears in his Eyes, to make use of his Power over the Penfioner, that Mr. de Zuylsheyn, his Governor, might be left him; upon which Occasion he represented, That he, Mr. de Zuylsheyn, was one of the College of Nobles, and one of the States of Utrecht; That he would send Madam de Zuylsheyn, who was an English Lady, to one of his Country Seats, and would not see her till the Peace was made with England; and that he would be bound, that Mr. Zuylsheyn should act entirely according to the Sentiments of the Province of Holland. That for himself, he would in all things be govern'd by Mr. de Wit, whom he should look upon as his Father: That he should follow the Example of his Predecessors in attaching himself wholly to France: That if he was suspected of being under any Engagements to the King of England, on the Account of his near Relation to that Prince, he was wrong'd in it; and that, being the States Child, he would have no Friends but theirs.

But Mr. d'Esfrades was not to be mov'd; and the only Concession he could obtain, was the Continuance of Mr. de Zuylsheyn's Pension with a Promise of the next vacant Government; which, he was given to understand, was a peculiar Compliment to himself; since the Penfioner did not believe the said Mr. de Zuylsheyn to be his Friend. In short, (v) Van Ghent, who was wholly at the Devotion of Mr. de Wit, had the Preference; and the new Establishment was in every Article confirm'd. The Prince was almost sick with Sorrow and Vexation, and took occasion to remonstrate to his new Tutors, That, since they had made such a Reform in his Household, they would do well to do the same by his Estates. That it was high time to call his Treasurer and Council to account for their Administration; for, that his Lands were every day sold at under Rates: That none of his Debts were paid; and, that tho' his own Expences, in Proportion to his Rank, were inconsiderable, his very Butcher and Baker had not been paid for Years together.

His Retirement.

But tho' he shew'd this Spirit to the Creatures more immediately about him, he had the Address to receive Mr. de Wit himself with all the Respect imaginable, nay affected to enter into such Confidence with him, that the Princess his Mother not only began to be alarm'd, but actually chid him for it, tho' with little Advantage to herself. His Highness replying with Boldness, That since she had thought fit to put him into the Hands of the Province of Holland, as well for his Education, as other Advantages, he thought it his Duty to consider them, as those on whom his Fortune depended; that, consequently he was oblig'd to treat both them and Mr. de Wit with the utmost Deference and Cordiality; and that if she had the Concern for him, which a Mother ought to have, the would rather commend than blame him for it.

And Dismission.

His Address to the French Ambassador thereon.

It is upon this Occasion that Mr. d'Esfrades, in a Letter to Mr. de Lionne, takes Occasion to say, That the Prince has Capacity, and will have Merit: But adds, He is a great Dissenbler, and emits nothing to gain his Ends.

Mr. d'Esfrades' Character of him.

It is certain, that nothing more happy could have befallen the United Provinces, than this Disposition of the Prince of Orange to adopt the Sentiments, and conform himself to the Directions of Mr. de Wit: For, under him, he receiv'd such Impressions, as continued him a firm Friend to his Country, to his last Breath.

We are now to resume the Prosecution of the War: And, upon this Head, the first Object which comes forward to our View is the general Battle between the Fleets of England and Holland, which continu'd for four Days successively.

Sea Fight of four Days, between the English and Dutch.

The Dutch Fleet consisted of Eighty Sail, according to Mr. d'Esfrades, and of (w) Eighty-four, according to the Narrative, publish'd here by Authority. The English, when entire, consisted of no more than Seventy-four, and Nine Fireships: But Twenty of the First, and Five of the Last, were detach'd, under the Command of Prince Rupert, in order to join ten Men of War more at Phymouth; which, together, were to way-lay the French, then suppos'd to be on the Point of entering the Channel, under the Duke of Beaufort: The Duke of Albemarle, who commanded the Residue, being confident, that, with a Part of the Navy of England, he should be able to defeat the whole Force of Holland.

On the 29th of May, the Prince set sail Westward; and, on the 1st of June, the Duke did the same Northward: Upon which very Day, he came in Sight of the Enemy, and made his Advances with such Impetuosity, that the Dutch, who were at Anchor, had not Time to weigh, but were forc'd to cut their Cables, and form their Line with the utmost Precipitation: For the English had the Weather-gage, and the Wind blew so fresh, that they could make no Use of their lower Teer; on which account, Sir Thomas Tyddiman refus'd to engage.

The first Day.

Not to enter too minutely into Particulars, as the Battle was begun with inexcusable Rashness, it was maintain'd with unexampled Bravery. Sir William (x) Berkley, in the Van, endeavouring to fight his Way thro' the Enemy, who were Five to One, was kill'd, and his Ship, the Swiff-sure, a second Rate, taken. The Duke himself fought more like a Soldier of Fortune, than a Man who was in Possession of the highest Honours; and Sir * John Harman, in the Henry, thro' bet with the whole Zealand Squadron, and three Fireships, (y) two of which, with all their Terrors flaming round them, had fasten'd on his Ship's Side, not only disdain'd to accept the Quarter which was offer'd him, but, with another Broadside, kill'd Vice Admiral Evertzen, and afterwards made good his Retreat to Harwich. Till Ten at Night the Battle lasted; and then the Darknes parted the two Fleets.

The second Day.

The next Morning, after a Contest of Seamanship for the Benefit of the Wind, the Engagement was renew'd with as much Fury, and continued with as much Obstinacy, as ever. Van Tromp desperately crowded into the midst of the English, attacking and attack'd on all Sides; and being reduced to the last Extremity, was reliev'd by de Ruyster; who, tho' his mortal Enemy, rush'd in to his Deliverance, with a Generosity that cannot be too much applauded. The English, on the other hand, still behav'd like Men who deserv'd to be Sovereigns of the Sea, again fought thro' the whole Dutch Line, and, by the Confession of their very Enemies, were rather overpower'd than overcome. The Duke, however, seeing his Strength every where diminishing, and, of his whole Fleet, but twenty-eight fighting Ships left, at last found it necessary to make the best of his Way for England, and was follow'd by the Enemy (who, during the Engagement, had been reinforced with sixteen fresh Ships) with sixty-six; and who, having a large Wind, and full Sail, gain'd upon him every Moment. By Seven in the Evening he saw them in his (z) Wake; by Nine close aboard; elate with Success, and promising themselves the Empire of the Ocean. But, soon after, it fell calm; which put an End to the Horrors of the second Day.

The third Day.

Between Three and Four the next Morning, a Breeze springing up at North-east, a Council of Flag-officers was held; when it was resolv'd to throw the Fleet into a Rear-Line of Battle, and make the best Retreat they could. Accordingly, all the shatter'd Ships, which, during the Night, had been as well repair'd as the present Circumstances would permit, were order'd to stretch a-head: Behind these were rang'd sixteen of the ablest and largest Ships, that were yet in a Condition to endure the Enemy: In the Center of which, and nearest the Pursuers, the Duke placed his own; as if nobly determin'd, by his Valour, to make amends for his Indiscretion.

By Two o' Clock, the two Fleets were again within Gun-shot of each other, and the Glory of a desperate Defence seem'd to be all that the English had to fight for; when a new Fleet was discover'd from the Top-mast Head, crouching all their Sails, either to assist the Vanquish'd, or share in the Triumph of the Victor.

Both were equally surpris'd at this unexpected Discovery. The Dutch, at least all but their Commanders, had some Reason to hope it was the Duke of Beaufort: The English were willing to persuade themselves it was Prince Rupert: And therefore, as in their present desperate Condition they had nothing new to fear, so alter'd their Steerage, as to edge down towards the new Comers: But, in their Passage, unfortunately fell in with a Sand call'd the Galloper, upon which the Royal Prince, the largest Ship in the Navy, having Admiral Ayscough (or Ayscove) on board, struck, and was taken by the Enemy, who soon after set her on fire.

To the infinite Joy of the English, and the no less Terror of the Dutch, it now appear'd, that the Fleet in View was the White Squadron of England, commanded by Prince Rupert. A Discovery, that very much alter'd the Face of Things: The Pursuers tack'd

(x) Among other remarkable Passages in the Fight, the undaunted Resolution of Vice-Admiral Berkley was particularly admir'd: who having had forty Men kill'd on board him, and being no longer able to make Resistance, yet was so obstinately bent to fight, that he would take no Quarter; and would have kill'd with his own Hand three or four of his Enemies that had boarded his Ship: But at last being shot into the Throat with a Musket Bullet, he retir'd into his Cabin, where laying himself at length on the Table, he was in that Posture found dead by the Victors, all cover'd with the Blood that flow'd out of his Wounds. (y) One of these was extinguish'd by the Postfires of the Henry, who sing'd himself on board the Fireship, in the midst of Smoke and Flame, as if incapable of Fear, discover'd and dispos'd her Hold, and return'd safe on board: The second set fire to the Rigging and Sails, upon which the Chaplain and fifty of the Crew jump'd over-board; but on Sir John's threatening to kill those who did not assist in quenching the Fire, the rest return'd to their Duty and got the better of the Danger. In this last Adventure, Sir John had his Leg broke by the fall of a Yard; notwithstanding which, he got his Ship reliev'd the next Day, and set sail again in search of the Enemy. These and many more Particulars are to be met with in an Account attrib'd to Sir John Harman by Dr. Keenan: but from the Use of the Word Carriage for Rigging, and Crest for Yard, I very much doubt the Authority.

tack'd about, and became the Pursued: And the Vanquish'd, who just before would have compounded for an Escape, now aspir'd to nothing less than Victory; when Night once more dropt the Curtain, and clos'd the Scene.

The Duke then made a Visit to the Prince; another Council of Flag-officers was held; by whom it was resolv'd to renew the Attack next Morning; and that the Prince, with his fresh Squadron, should make the first Impression.

The fourth Day.

But when Day broke, there was no Enemy to be seen. However, as Men who were more concern'd at missing an Opportunity to fight, than pleas'd with an Opportunity to make off with Safety, they stood the same Course, and made sail after them.

On the other hand, as the Dutch were rather aw'd than terrify'd, and had only retreated, to be within Reach of their own Ports, not fled from the Face of their Enemy, they were soon found. By Eight o' Clock, both Fleets once more fronted each other; and, having made their respective Dispositions, the Attack was begun by Sir Christopher (a) Myngs (or Myms) seconded by Prince Rupert, who led the whole Line thro' the Enemy's Fleet, and was closely follow'd by the General, and those other gallant Men, who had fought so amazingly in the other three Engagements.

Never did War put on a more dreadful Face than now; never did the Sun shine upon Men who fear'd Death less, or deserv'd Conquest more. The Commanders on both Sides were Heroes; and, of the two Nations, one would admit of no Equal, and the other would allow no Superior. The Dutch were animated with a Taste of Victory; the English enrag'd that they should, tho' but for once, be foil'd. Hence the Efforts on both Sides were such as shew'd, that none but these could be a Match for each other.

Four times did our intrepid Countrymen charge thro' the Enemy, and were preparing to do the same a fifth, when the two Admirals found themselves disabled, by the many dreadful Shocks they had receiv'd; and knowing all the other Ships of their respective Divisions had suffer'd in Proportion, concluded it would be downright Frenzy to persist in so unequal a Conflict any longer.

To recount the precise Issue (b) of this unparallel'd Engagement, and ascertain the

(a) Who having received a Shot in the Neck, remained upon Deck and gave Orders, keeping the Blood from flowing with his Fingers above an Hour, till another Shot pierc'd his Heart, and put an end to his Pain. Lives of the Admirals, vol. ii. p. 257.

(b) This Account is principally taken from the Narrative publish'd by Authority, which, bys Lord Arlington to Sir William Temple, was carefully laid together, when we were at the Fleet, wherein you will find the Truth.

The said Narrative concludes thus:

But the fourth time, we plying them very sharply with our Leeward Guns in passing, their windward Ships bore up to the Leeward, to relieve their Leeward Party, upon which his Highness tack'd the fifth time, and with eight or ten Frigates got to the Windward of the Enemy's whole Fleet, and thinking to bear in upon them, his Main-mast, and Main-top-mast, being terribly shaken, came all by the Board.

His Grace then, with that Part of the Fleet with him, having received in his last Pass two Shots in his Powder-Room, and several other in his Main-top-mast, and Fore-mast, that disabled him from tackling, made up towards the Prince, and he bearing down likewise towards him, seeing the Enemy made what Sail they could, as if they meant to come betwixt us, but they having made that Counterfeit, their Admiral on a sudden fired a Gun, to call in the straggling Remains of his tatter'd Fleet (who were at this time reduced from eighty-four, to under the number of forty Sail) and bore away before the Wind towards Floresing. If now those unhappy Shots, formerly mentioned, had not disabled in this last Tack, his Highness, and his Grace's Ships, wherein they were in Person, from the Pursuit of them, and oblig'd us to return to our Ports, though (as it is plain) Matters of the Sea in this Engagement, we had, in all human Probability, had a total Victory over the Enemy, with the Loss, on our Side, only of his Majesty's Ship the Prince, unhappily sucking upon the Sands, called the Goldiger; that of the Sveviflers, separating from our Fleet in the beginning of the Fight, and the Agre intangling herself with the Bull, where she bore up bravely to her Rescue, and five or six small Ships more, two of which we sunk ourselves (as was likewise said before) which makes ten in Number, small and great; when as we are confidently assur'd from our own Observations, and from Letters, that the Enemy lost as many more, three of which were Flag-Ships, their Men all sunk and burnt with them. And it is certain, they must every where have suffered a much greater Loss of Men, than we, from the Difference in our Manner of fighting; for they shooting high, and at a great Distance, damaged us most in our Rigging; and we, on the other hand, forbearing to shoot but when we came near, and then levelling most at the Hulls, must needs have done more Execution upon their Men, the Particulars whereof we shall quickly learn. In the mean time, we know they went much flatter'd and torn into their first Ports they could make, and concluded themselves entirely beaten, till from the Hague they were told the contrary by those who could know it less.

On the other Hand, Mr. d'Espada writing to the King his Master, sums up the Affair thus:

News came Yesterday of the Victory obtain'd by the Dutch Fleet over the English. The Battle lasted four Days and Monday Morning, which was the last Day, the English were reinforced with 22 Ships while Admiral de Ruyter was pursuing them, which oblig'd him to halt, and to draw his Ships together, to fight with more Order. The English, on their Side, having received this Reinforcement, prepar'd to renew the Combat, which lasted six Hours with equal Advantage: But Admiral de Ruyter seeing the Victory was doubtful, hung out the Red Flag, which is the Signal of a general Attack, and fell upon the Enemies Fleet with much Vigour, that he broke through them twice, took six great Ships, and sunk four. Upon which the English fled; and in the Evening a great Mist arising, Admiral de Ruyter fearing the Sands, being near the Coast of England, put out to Sea with his victorious Fleet.

During the four Days of the Battle, he took eleven great Ships, and burnt or sunk ten. All the White Squadron is destroyed. Admiral Ascue is taken, and his Ship, call'd the Royal Prince, which was Cannon Proof, mounted with a hundred Guns, was burn'd. The Vice-Admiral, command'd by Berkley, Governor of Portsmouth, mounted with seventy Guns, is brought into the Marsk, with five others of the same Strength. The said Berkley, and another Vice-Admiral, were kill'd in their Ships with Misquet Shots. There are three thousand Prisoners, and as many perill'd.

On the States Side, Cornelius Everstein, Admiral of Zweland, was kill'd in boarding the Vice-Admiral of the White. The Vice-Admiral of Amsterdam was also kill'd. They had three Ships burnt, and four sunk, and not one taken; but above twenty disabled. Trump chang'd his Ship six times, and de Ruyter twice, their own being to often disabled. Never was so obstinate a Battle, on both Sides, heard of.

With this Representations of Mr. d'Espada, Mr. Epkins makes no Difficulty to close: But Phillip, Keuzend and Eckerd, give the Advantage of the last Day's Fight entirely to the English; of which Dr. Bonnet lays no more, than that the Dutch firing so great a Force came up, for'd off.

The Account ascrib'd by Dr. Keuzend to Sir John Harman, concludes thus: Yet next Day (the fourth) the Fleet fought again, and by the Help of the White Squadron, with much advantage (ours) got into Harbour.

Agins Lord Arlington, writing to Sir William Temple, June 11, expresses himself as follows: "Neither do I take a Pleasure in repeating any thing of this last Engagement. This Advantage, I am sure, they had of us, That they "have carried home their Troop Mr. Whans was not "one; what they lost being all down'd or burn'd."

On the 14th also writing to Lord Sandwich, the same Lord begins thus:

Both claim'd the Honour of a Victory; and both affronted the COMMON FATHER of the Universe with their impious Acknowledgments; when they ought to have approach'd him in Sackcloth and Ashes, for having wantonly sacrific'd so many thousand innocent, gallant, and meritorious Men, in a Dispute, that common Sense and common Honesty might have adjusted in half an Hour!

French Court Justify'd from the Cresures
of our Historians.

On this Battle, almost all our Historians, blindly following one another, have taken the Hint to be very severe on the French Court, for not sending their Fleet to the Assistance of their Allies; as if they had purposely avoided it, to disappoint the Dutch, and divide the English. But however general the Accusation, it seems to have little or no Support. The most Christian King certainly took the Advantage of this Quarrel to increase his own (c) naval Strength; but as yet he had not entertain'd any Thought of suffering that of the States to be destroy'd. This is manifest by the (d) Letter which he sent express to Mr. d'Esstrades, to dissuade them from risking an Engagement, or even permitting their Fleet to set sail, till a fair Occasion should offer for the Duke de Beaufort to join them. Besides, even the States themselves did not as yet complain of any Neglect; but, on the contrary, were so well satisfy'd with the happy Effect, which the very Apprehension of this Junction caus'd, that they acknowledg'd to Mr. d'Esstrades, the Obligation they had to the King his Master, on that Account. And, as to the Division of the English Fleet, it was purely and simply the Result of English Councils, fatally over-rul'd by the too great Influence of the Duke of Albemarle, as is manifest from the following Passage out of a Letter from Mr. d'Esstrades to the King his Master:

"Admiral Ayscough has made a Pro-"testation, before Notaries, that he was "against the Resolution taken in the Coun"cil of War for dividing the Fleet: That,
"knowing Admiral de Ruyter's Merit and "Experience, his Opinion was, to fight the "Dutch with the whole naval Strength of "England; which having been taken, he "made no doubt of the Victory: But that "General Monk carry'd it, and catch'd
"Prince Rupert; who was the Occasion
"of their Loss."

But, however great the Loss was on either Side, in Ships, Men, or Money, the Action was far from being decisive. Tho' neither the English nor Dutch were able to keep the Sea, both had great Resources; and both resolv'd to make all possible Use of them.

In England, the King again made his Application to the City for Money; and was cheerfully furnish'd with a Loan of 100,000 Pounds more: And, by this Help, he had form another Royal Navy in a Condition to put to Sea.

But his Majesty found it easier to refit his Ships, than replace his Men; for, tho' it appears that injurious Method of forcing them into the Service was not spar'd, the Dutch, who made use of more just and gentle, and therefore more successful Methods, were able to appear on our Coasts, long before we could venture out of our Harbours.

"our own Confidence foretold it would be; nor yet, in "any Degree, so bad as the Enemy relates."

What Bishop Burnet affirms of Mr. de Wit's being "about the Dutch, is void of all Foundation; for in Mr.
"d'Esstrades's Memoirs, we have Accounts of Conferences held "with him at the Hague, during the very time that both
"Fleets were at Sea.

As little Dependence is to be placed on what he pleas'd
"to say on the Subject of Chain'd-Shot, as if it was then
"first used, and peculiar to the Dutch; for in the Account at-
"tribut'd to Sir John Harman, before quoted, we are told,
"that the third Fireship with which the Henry was threaten'd,
"was disabled by four Pieces of Cannon loaded with Chain-
"Shot.

In the Lives of the Admirals, we find the following Pas"sage, said to be quoted from a MS. History of the United "Provinces by Mr. Wicquifort, which contains Mr. de Wit's "Sentiments, at this time, of British Bravery to the following
"Effect; "If the English were best, their Defeat did them
"more Honour than all their former Victories: No Fleet
"but theirs could, after the first Day's Fight, have been "brought to engage again. Englishmen may be kill'd,
"English Ships may be burn'd; but English Courage is in"vincible."

(c) Which he did by furnishing himself with Ships and "Naval Stores from Denmark and Holland.

(d) Which is here infer'd, viz. "I thought it necessary "to send you this Dispatch by an Express, on the Sieur Van
"Beuningen's giving us Information here, which is confirm'd
"by your last Letters, of the Resolution taken by Messieurs
"the States to put their Fleet to Sea to fight that of England;
"upon which, I desire you to let the Sieur de Wit know, That "this Resolution appears to me to be of so great Importance,
"and so distant from what you might have known of my Sen"timents by my two last Memorials, that methinks the Execu"tion of it should have been deferr'd till I had been made "acquainted with their Reasons for it; and Messieurs the "States will have much Difficulty to pass for prudent, unless "they have such particular Reasons for it, that no body but
"themselves know of.

Those upon which all the World will argue, and which I "desire you will impart to the Sieur de Wit, are, That Mes-
"sieurs the States having join'd me with them, and the King "of Denmark, in the same War, being deliver'd as they are "from the War with Monsieur, their State quiet at home,
"and having nothing to fear from the English on that Score,
"my Fleet not being yet arriv'd in the West, that of Denmark
"not yet ready, Money not being wanted either by me or
"the States to maintain our Fleets; on the contrary, the King "of Denmark having made extraordinary Efforts to put his
"to Sea, all Advices from England tell us, their Fleet is vic"tull'd but for six Weeks, and that 'twill scarcely be able to "put to Sea again when once it has cast Anchor, which may "be concluded from the adjourning the Parliament to the "Month of September.

All these Reasons being very strong, and there being few
"to the contrary, it seems to me to be by much the best, not "to let the Fleet put to Sea and hazard a Battle, at least to "wait for a favourable Opportunity to join my Fleet to the "States, and attack the English together. If, on the con"trary, the Misfortunes that may happen by the Loss of a "Battle are consider'd, that will render the English more "haughty, and give them the Means of choosing which of "the three Powers they would attack, 'twill be a hard Matter
"to conclude, that there is no wavering between the two "Parties that might be taken, but that to keep in the Port
"ready to sail, and put it off till a fair Occasion offers for
"the Fleets to join, is by much the best.

I desire therefore that you will acquaint the said Sieur
"de Wit with all these Reasons; and if 'tis yet possible, that "you do whatever you can to hinder the Fleet's going out "of the Texel, that in the course of Time all Opportunities
"may be improv'd to join our Fleets this Campaign.

You may, in the mean time, assure the said Sieur de Wit,
"that I shall give the necessary Orders for my Fleet's coming
"to Brill, and for all my Ships, as well those of the Lan-ginsing of July N. S. de Ruyter, with his Fleet, consisting of Eighty-nine Men of War and Five Fireships, took possession of the Mouth of the Thames. On the 19th following, and not before, the English, with Eighty (e) Men of War and Nineteen Fireships, under the same Command as before, weigh'd from the Buoy in the Nore; and on the 25th, about Noon, came up with the Enemy, lying off the North Foreland, in Line of Battle, whom they immediately engaged, with all the Spirit and Eagerness of Men who had a Disgrace to wipe off, who had an Affront to avenge, who had Glory to acquire, who had their Country in Sight. The White Squadron, which came last into the former Engagement, began the Attack in this, under the Command of Sir Thomas Allen, Prince Rupert and the Duke, who this Day commanded on board the same Ship, with the Red Squadron attack'd de Ruyter; and Sir Jeremy Smith, with the Blue, Van Tromp. The Combat lasted the whole Day, with various Success. As Van Tromp was passionately belov'd by the Seamen, his Squadron was the best mann'd of the whole Dutch Fleet: Under him therefore the Enemy fought with the most Vigour, and to most (f) Advantage, tho' not without some Loss; his Vice Admiral's Ship being disabled, and his Rear Admiral kill'd.
"guet as of the West to meet there.

In the mean while, Sir Thomas Allen entirely routed the Dutch Van; all the three Admirals, Evertsen, de Vries, and Koenders, being kill'd; the Vice Admiral's Ship being taken; and another of fifty Guns burnt: After which he join'd the Red in the Center, where the Fight was still more obstinate, and the Event more dubious. For three Hours together, the English and Dutch Admirals were engag'd Side to Side; during which dreadful Encounter the first was so terribly shatter'd, that the Prince and Duke were forc'd to remove into another Ship; in which returning again to the Charge, with more Fury than ever, de Ruyter could no longer withstand them; but, seeing two hundred of his Men kill'd, the rest fainting with Wounds and Weariness, and all but seven of his Squadron drove out of the Line, with infinite Regret was forced to give way; and, without waiting for the usual Signals, the rest of the Fleet follow'd his Example.

All Night long, and all the next Day, the Dutch continu'd to fly, and the English to pursue: And, had the Wind freshen'd, it was presum'd but few of the Former had been able to make their Escape. The English frequently renewing their Fire, and de Ruyter himself expressing all the Signs of (g) Agony and Despair; tho', at the same time, defending himself with all imaginable Bravery and good Conduct.

Having at last recover'd the Shallows of his own dangerous Coast, where it was difficult if not impossible for the Enemy to follow him, he had the additional Mortification to see a Shallop sent after him in Derision; which continu'd to ply her two little Guns upon him for two Hours together.

In this (h) Engagement, the English lost no more than three Captains, and one Ship, viz. the Resolution: But the Dutch several, (some Authors say twenty) and 4000 Seamen, twelve Captains, and four Admirals.

Both the Certainty and Value of Victories are only to be known by their Consequences: And that this was clearly of the English Side, was now self-evident; for the Dutch had taken Sanctuary in their Ports; in the Sight of which the Enemy rode in Triumph, terrifying their Coasts, and interrupting their Commerce; insomuch, that Mr. d'Espades himself is forc'd to confess, that the Victory of the English could not be disputed, because they were (i) Masters of the Sea.

The late Transports of the Dutch were now turn'd into Mourning; and, as the Expectations of the Populace had been rais'd too high, their Clamours and Discontents rose in Proportion. To embroil the States yet more, the Animosity between their two great Commanders de Ruyter and Van Tromp now broke out into an open Flame: The Seamen, likewise, entering into the Quarrel of their Chiefs, form'd two opposite Factions, came to Blows, and threaten'd to throw the Republic into a very dangerous Disorder. (e) Rapin says, above an hundred; but the Fireships must be included to make up this Number.

(f) Rapin affirms that Smith was routed; and insinuates that Van Tromp's Eagerness in pursuing the flying Enemy, contributed to the loss of the Battle. But Skinner, in his Life of Monk, is express, that the Engagement continued till Night, when the first made Sail Northward, Smith pursuing, and the same the next Day, till he drove him into the Wellings.

(h) The Account of it sent by Mr. d'Espades to the King his Master, was as follows:

"I thought it proper to dispatch away this Gentleman to your Majesty, to inform you of what has pass'd in the late Battle. The Sieur de Wit sent me a Memorial on the Letters he receiv'd from Admiral de Ruyter and Vice-Admiral Tromp, who are now near Flushing to repair their Losses. De Ruyter had two hundred Men kill'd on board his Ship, having been three Hours between the Admirals of the Red and White, where he had perish'd by a Fireship the Enemies had detach'd against him, without the Assistance of Messieurs the Chevaliers de Lorraine and Caulin, de Coveis and the Baron de Besja, who offer'd to meet it with two Shallops and forty Musketeers, which succeeded so well, that the Captain of the Fireship seeing them approaching with so much Resolution, leas'd into his Boat with his Men, and set Fire to his Ship, which was contain'd fifty Pieces off Admiral de Ruyter's Ship. We have lost two Ships, that were sunk; the Admiral of Zeland, John Evertsen, the Admiral of Frisland, and the Vice-Admiral kill'd, and three other Captains very much esteem'd.

The Enemies, on their Side, had four stout Ships sunk and burnt. The Officers Names are not known.

Admiral de Ruyter so spoil'd the Admiral of the Red, where the Duke of Albemarle was, that he was forc'd to put himself into his Shallop with his Flag, and go aboard another Ship.

The States Fleet cannot be refitted in a Month, and they will be hard put to it to supply the Places of so many great Officers as they have lost.

I thought it highly necessary to give your Majesty Notice of this with all possible Speed, that your Majesty may give Orders to your Fleet to stop in some of your Majesty's Ports till that of Holland be ready to go out again.

The Sieur de Wit will depart in an Hour for Zeland, with Orders from the States, and full Power to remedy ev'ry thing.

Lord Arlington's Letter to the Duke of Ormond.
Miscellanea
Aulica. p. 415.

Mr. Buat, one of the Prince of Orange's discarded Domesticks, had moreover, at this time, by the Intigation of the Earl of Arlington, enter'd into secret Measures for concluding a Peace, separating the States from France, and changing the Government in favour of the Prince of Orange. Of this the States had the first Intelligence from my Lord Arlington's own Letter, which Mr. de Buat himself, by Mistake, deliver'd to the Postmaster, instead of another; and it was afterwards confirm'd by his own Confession. He nam'd sixty of the principal Persons of Holland, as his Accomplices; whether with a View to save his Life, or as the naked Truth, we have not Evidence to determine; but, if the first, he was fatally disappointed; for either his bold Undertaking at first, or his bolder Experiment afterwards, cost him his Head.

d'Eftrades.

To fill up the Measure of the Dutch Calamities, a Detachment from the English Fleet, commanded by Sir Robert Holmes, enter'd the Road of Vlie, piloted by a Dutch Captain, who had been broke the Year before for not doing his Duty, and burnt a hundred and (k) forty Merchantmen, two Men of War, and a Village on the Coast; the whole Damage amounting to (l) six Millions: And Numbers of Merchants, on whom this immense Loss fell, join'd in the Clamour against the States, and endeavour'd to stir up the People to a Revolt.

One hundred and forty Sail of Dutch Merchant Ships burnt.

State of Holland.

Overwhelm'd with such a Variety of Misfortunes, it was natural to expect the Republic would now have humbled itself, and sought for Peace: Instead of which, so invincible was the Spirit of Mr. de Wit, that no such Thought seems to have been entertain'd either by him or his Faction: On the contrary, Ways and Means of quieting the Seditions without Doors, and counterminding the Factions within, in order to continue the War with as much Vigour as ever, were the sole Object of every Deliberation. It is true, Utrecht, Guelderland, Friesland, Greeningen, and Overssel, which were poor, found the War too heavy for them, and therefore wanted to have it over: But Holland and Zealand, which had all the Wealth, and consequently all the Power, continued resolute against every Proposition to treat; except on the Terms which had been before refus'd.

The Prevalence of Money was not the Discovery of Yesterday: Nor has it continued more a Secret to other Countries than our own.

Mr. de Wit was a Master in the Art of governing by Parties. With the proper Distribution of 1,300,000 Livres, in the Shape of Pay, Gratitudes, &c. he undertook to pacify the Fleet, and succeeded in it; and, in the mean time, Mr. d'Eftrades bestir'd himself to manage the States Deputies; whether with the like Means, or no, is uncertain; but certainly with, almost, the like Success.

If France had now desir'd the Ruin of the States, she need'd only to have withdrawn her Assistance, to have render'd it unavoidable: Instead of which, the most Christian King had no sooner receiv'd Intimation of their (m) Danger, than he resolv'd to risk in earnest the youngest Child of his Power and Policy, his daring Fleet, for their Preservation.

If the Dutch had hitherto fought without his

(l) According to the Account published here by Authority, the whole Number of Ships amounted to 170, of which not above nine or ten escap'd; and the Village was a Fair Town consisting of 1000 Houses.

(k) Rapin affirms that this Enterprize was but a Part of that Conspiracy for which Buat was executed.

(m) His first Dispatch to Mr. d'Eftrades, after the Defeat of the Dutch, was as follows:

"As soon as I receiv'd the sad News of the Disgrace that has befallen the Arms of my Allies, I resolv'd to lend this Express to you for several Reasons:

The first, That you may declare to the States, in my Name, how much I am concern'd in their Trouble for the ill Success of this second Battle, and that my Grief is not less than what they feel themselves: But we must by our Steadiness, and by new vigorous Resolutions, not only lessen all the Prejudices of it, but soon reduce the English to desire Peace in earnest.

The second, That you may also assure them from me, that I will contribute heartily, and with Application, every thing that depends on me and my Forces to procure what I have mention'd; and, that it seems to me to be very easy, England not being in a Condition, for the small Advantage she has gain'd, to support the great Expence she has hitherto been at, nor in the End to resist alone the Efforts of three such Powers as are those of France, Denmark, and the United-Provinces, since the latter only has always fought against her with equal Forces, that she has always made the Danger equal, and that the may, for the future, be seconded and supported by a hundred Ships of her Allies, which unfortunately have not hitherto been able to join with her, and which will compose a new Fleet, equal in Strength and Number to the English.

The third, That you may forthwith inform me of the Condition of all the Affairs of the States-General, what they have heard of the English Fleet since the Battle, that is, what a Blow and what Loss is receiv'd in the Combat, and what Resolution they took, whether to return to the River of London, or pursue Tromp's Squadron; if it did not get into the Texel, as 'tis reported, or keep to sea and cruise in the Channel; and with what Number of Ships.

The fourth, That if the States have it in their Power and their Will, as I doubt not they have both, to put their Fleet again to Sea as soon as it is repair'd, to act as long as the Season shall last, to which you shall, from me, earnestly exhort them; you may, in my Name, propose to them the Junction of my Fleet: And since it can't fail of arriving in a few Days at Rochelle, or Belle Isle, if 'tis not there already, you may now consult with the Sieur de Wit and the other Commissioners, of the most proper and safe Ways for their Junction, and give me an Account with all convenient Speed, that not a Minute of useful Time may be lost, but Orders for the Execution of what shall be resolv'd on be immediately given on both Sides. You shall moreover tell the States, That I this Day writeto the Chevalier de Terlon, whom I have lately sent to Copenhagen in the same Quality of my Ambassador as he had in Sweden, to use his utmost Endeavours and most pressing Instances, in my Name, with the King of Denmark, to incline him to come presently to a Resolution to join Part of his Fleet to mine and that of the said States, when it shall be given him to understand that it will be necessary for the Good and Advantage of the Common Cause, and Opportunity and Means shall be put into his Hands to make that Junction with Safety.

I would not close this Letter without telling you, you should again recommend from me to the States, to accommodate Matters with Sweden, who seeing herself despis'd or us'd hardly, may in this juncture take Resolutions which may be very prejudicial to us: We know the Swedes never want Pretences to do whatever they think to be for their Interest. This Point deserves, as much as any other, all the Reflections and Applications of the Sieur de Wit, and afterwards good Orders for the Sieur d'Eftrades.

When I order you here to speak or act with the States, you will know how to distinguish what should or may be said in their Assembly from what should be retir'd for their Commissioners only.

his Assistance, it was contrary to his express Desire, over and over again repeated: The Duke (n) de Beaufort had actually set sail for the Streights early in the Summer, had pass'd by Lisbon in July, and would have repair'd to whatever Place the States should have sent a proper Force to join him. The Truth is, neither the States car'd to venture their Navy out of Reach of their Coasts, nor were the French forward to enter the Channel, without being sure of Assistance from those they came to serve. However, when it was apprehended the Dutch must either be overpowered by their Enemies, or compelled to accept such Terms as they should think fit to impose, the Duke de Beaufort no sooner arriv'd at Roebel, which was the 7th of August, than he receiv'd Orders to advance to Belle Isle, or even Conquest Point, there to continue, till the Place and Manner of the Junction should be thoroughly agreed upon. In order to which, the Marquis de Bellefonte was dispatch'd Post to the Hague, to concert with the Penfioner and Mr. d'Esfrades the most probable Means to accomplish this delicate and important Measure, with the most Expedition and Safety.

Accordingly, the Dutch Fleet, which, thro' the indefatigable Diligence of Mr. de Wit, was again refitted, and in a Condition to put to Sea, had Orders to cruise between the Streights of Dover, and the Mouth of the Thames, under the Command of de Ruyter, and to attend every Motion of the English, till the Duke de Beaufort should come up. September the 10th, de Ruyter set sail; soon after which, Prince Rupert, his now dread'd and dreadful Enemy, came in Sight, stronger than ever, favour'd by the Wind, and bearing down full Sail to engage. And now, for the first time, the Dutch fled without striking a Blow; and, a Storm coming on, took Sanctuary in St. John's Road, near Bulloigne; while the English were forced into St. Helens, at once to repair the Damages they had receiv'd from the bad Weather, and to hinder the Junction of the two Fleets. At this very time, as near as can be guess'd, the Duke de Beaufort was entering into the Channel, and, by the very same Gale which sent the Prince into Harbour, was driven back to Belle Isle: Whence he never theless set sail again, two Days after; and having pass'd the Isle of Wight, undiscov'rd by the English, cast Anchor at Dieppe, the 17th.

But, in this Interval, a violent Fever had seiz'd upon de Ruyter; the Dutch Mariners likewise grew sickly; and the States, thinking it their wisest Way to recal their Fleet, sent Orders accordingly. With this Resolution, and the Reasons upon which it was founded, their Lordships however took care to make his most Christian Majesty immediately (g) acquainted; who, almost in Agonies, at the same Instant sent Expresses to Mr. d'Esfrades, and Mr. de Ruyter, to remonstrate the Dangers his Cousin de Beaufort was expos'd to, and the Necessity of the States Assistance, and Advices to all his Ports, of de Ruyter's Return, that the said Duke might take the best Precautions in his Power, for his own Preservation.

No sooner, therefore, had the Fleet of France cast Anchor at Dieppe, but, having receiv'd this Intelligence, they weigh'd again, and, with the same good Fortune which had conducted them up the Channel, regain'd the Port of Brest in Safety: Of their whole Fleet, which consisted of Forty-three Sail, but three falling into the Way of the English; and, of those three, but one, the Ruby, a Ship of 54 Guns, being taken, by Sir William Allen.

Where we lie the most open to Prejudice, our Writers in general have not been over-candid to the French; and in treating of their Conduct to the Dutch, during this War, they have fallen into (p) Mistakes, almost inexcusable. There was therefore a Necessity to be the more circumstantial in correcting them: For in suffering our Enemies to be censur'd

Junction of the French and Dutch Fleets concerted,

[Lord Arlington's Letters to the Duke of Ormond, Sir W. Temple, and Lord Sandwich. d'Esfrades.]

(n) In his Way he detach'd part of his Fleet to convey the Queen of Portugal to Lisbon, and another to dispossess the English of St. Christophers, which they perform'd.

(g) About the same time Mr. d'Esfrades writ to his Master as follows:

"I received the Dispatch your Majesty did me the Honour to write to me the 17th instant; and 'tis with great Reason your Majesty is to concern'd for your Fleet, which may be in great Danger if Monsieur the Duke de Beaufort enters the Channel. I hope the Advice-Boats that were sent to him will meet him, that he may vary his Course, after what has been resolv'd in a Council of War held in Presence of Monsieur the Count de la Feuillade. The States are in great Trouble at what they have heard from Monsieur de Newport, Secretary to the Fleet, that a continued Fever has reduced Admiral de Ruyter to Extremity, that it increases so, he is light-headed, he being thus in no Condition to act. The Admiral of Zealand is also very ill, and a great Number of Seamen. They resolv'd to recal their Fleet, not daring to confide in any one of the Chiefs that remain. They express'd themselves to me, as if they were extremely troubled, that such an Accident should hinder the Execution of what had been agreed upon at the Consultation between Monsieur de Bellefonte and the States Deputies at Flushing; that the loss of your Majesty's Fleet would receive no Damage by it, and that more just Measures might be taken against next Campaign, as well for the Mediterranean, as the Junction of the King of Denmark's twenty Ships. The Seur de Wit told me privately, he was unexpectedly troubled at the little Hopes there were of Monsieur de Ruyter's Life; and that besides the Loss the States would have of his Person, his own, in particular, would be irreparable; that he hop'd your Majesty would not disapprove of their Retreat, since there was no Chief that could command that Fleet; and further, that such a Storm, as had happen'd six Days ago, would so intirely ruin them, that they could never be able to recit them.

(p) "The Dutch put to Sea again——and made for the Coast of France, still pursuing the mistaken Hopes of being join'd by the French Admiral——who lay at Rochele." KENNEY and EDWARD.

"The Dutch forsook their own Coast and sail'd towards the Coast of France, for which no other Reason could be given, but that the French King, (who equally loved the Dutch and English) had decoy'd the Dutch to join that invisible Fleet which we divided once to fight with." Cole's Detraction, vol. II. p. 115.

This Passage of Cole's is transcribed with Approbation by Oldmixon, and even Rapin writes as follows:

"It is very surprising that the English, who lay at the Isle of Wight to prevent the Junction of the two Enemies Fleets, should suffer that of France to pass and repass without Misculation. This may give Occasion to suspect there was some Intelligence between France and England; but as I can't trace it, I ha'n't insist upon it." Tindal's Translation of Rapin, fol. p. 645.

If the curious Reader will consult the Gazette of September 24, 1666 N<sup>o</sup>. 89, he will find that upon hearing the Guns, when Sir Thomas Allen was engag'd with the Ruby off Daggerschell, Prince Rupert set sail from the Downs, in hopes of falling in with and destroying the whole French Fleet.

cenfur'd in the wrong Place, we only reproach ourselves.

The whole Series of Mr. d' Estrades's Negotiations, during this Period, furnishes abundant Proof, that France was really so much alarm'd at the Project of England to monopolize the Powers and Profits of the Sea, that she thought it her Interest to oppose it, and assist the States in earnest: And, if this very hazardous Adventure of sending the Duke de Beaufort up the Channel in Search of the Dutch, and her expensive Negotiations with Denmark, Sweden, and the Princes of Lower Saxony, should not have the Weight with the Reader which they deserve; when it is farther consider'd, how solicitous she was to revive our Troubles at home, what a Variety of Projects she listen'd to for that Purpose, and that she actually did enter into Treaty with (q) Ludlow, and (r) Sydney, and made Proposals to Lambert, it is impossible that any Doubt should remain.

The Fire of London.

We are now to cast our Eyes on one of the most striking Objects in our whole Story; the Fire of London: The Particulars of which terrible Calamity it is needless to recount; they are already well known; and, as to the Horror and Confusion attending upon them, they are easier imagin'd than describ'd.

An Enquiry into the Cause.

Both the King and the (s) Duke, in Person, beheld from time to time the amazing Progress of the Flames, and contributed all in their Power to put a stop to their Fury. For three whole Days, however, they continued irresistible; and on the fourth, as if fatigued with Destruction, left the whole Space from the Temple westward, to the Tower Dock, and from Pye-corner northward, to the Water-side, a desolate Chain of smouldering Ruins.

But, as nothing is better understood than the Fact, nothing is more controverted than the Cause.

In the preceding April, the Nation had been alarm'd with a new Republican Plot; of which, and the Execution of those concern'd in it, the following Account was published in the Gazette of April 30:

Republicans bang'd in April for plotting the Fire in September.

"At the Sessions in the Old Baily, John Ratbone, an old Army Colonel, William Sanders, Henry Tucker, Thomas Flint, Thomas Evans, John Myles, William West, and John Cole, formerly Officers or Soldiers in the late Rebellion, were indicted for conspiring the Death of his Majesty, and the Overtthrow of the Government; having laid

"their Plot and Contrivance for the Surprizal of the Tower, the killing his Grace the Lord General Monk, Sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of his Majesty's Tower of London, and Sir Richard Brown, and then to have declared for an equal Division of Lands, &c. The better to effect this helieth Design, the City was to have been fired, and the Portcullis's to have been let down, to keep out all Assistance; the Horse Guards to have been surpriz'd in the Inns where they were quarter'd, several Officers having been gain'd for that Purpose: The Tower was accordingly view'd, and its Surprize order'd by Boats over the Mote, and from thence to scale the Wall. One Alexander, who is not yet taken, had likewise distributed Sums of Money to these Conspirators; and for the carrying on of the Design more effectually, they were told of a Council of the Great Ones, that sat frequently in London, from whom issued all Orders; which Council receiv'd their Directions from another in Holland, who fate with the States; and that the Third of September was pitch'd on for the Attempt, as being found by Lilly's Almanac, and a Scheme erected for that Purpose, to be a lucky Day; a Planet then ruling, which prognosticated the Downfall of Monarchy. The Evidence against these Persons was very full and clear, and they accordingly were found guilty of High-Treason, and suffer'd accordingly."

Of this Circumstance, Advantage has been taken by Mr. Eberard and others, to insinuate, that this enormous Mischief took its Rise from that Quarter: But how unreasonably, and unjustly, appears from the very Event itself; since no other Part of the Plot took Effect; and, according to the very Letter of this Paragraph, the City was not to have been fir'd, merely for the sake of perpetrating so prodigious a Piece of Villany, but to facilitate a Change of the Government.

Besides: In July, Lord Arlington, writing to Sir William Temple, declares, That no discontented Party shew'd itself. And again, in August (the 23d) to Lord Sandwich: "I can assure you, with all Truth, that, since you left us, we have had less Trouble and Alarms from the discontented Party than ever we had in any Year, since it hath pleas'd God to restore his Majesty: On the contrary, upon the Noise of the Intentions of Holland and France to invade us, his

(q) Ludlow having acquainted us with the Answer which he had given to two of his Friends who came to him with Proposals from Holland, proceeds as follows:

"With this Answer my two Friends returned to Holland, and being on their way, sent me Word, That the Person who refused for the King of France at Metz, and his Brother to his Ambassador at Ratibonne, had been at Frankfort on purpose to meet Colonel Sidney and me, supposing we had both been at that Place; where, in a Conference with the Colonel, he had communicated to him a Letter from Monsieur de Lyona, Secretary of State, written in Cipher by order of the King of France, in which he was commanded to acquaint us, That if we would go to Paris, we should have all the Security the Government could give, or we could desire for the Safety of our Persons. Vol. iii. p. 188.

(r) This Matter is thus related by Phillips. In Guardsy the Governour of Chouisy in France, together with the Pilot or Master that brought him, were apprehended for bringing a Letter to Major General Lambert there in Prison, and offering a Contrivance by his Escape to engage him against the Public Peace. At first, though the Design was fully proved against him, he denied all; but the next Day confiding the whole Matter, and retracting what he had said the Day before, he and the Pilot were both executed upon the common Gallows for Spies.

(s) Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to give us his Word, That the Citizens were not well pleas'd with the Duke's Behaviour: They thought, says he, they had lost too good and so little concern'd. But the Account publish'd by Authority, affirms, That his Royal Highness, as well as his Majesty, took indefinable and personal Pains to apply all possible Remedies. And again, that the Fires breaking out first at the Temple, he watch'd there the whole Night in Person.

Gentle,

his Majesty had the Offer of having twenty thousand Men rais'd in Fifteen Days, by his own Party, without a Penny of Expence to himself; and had the Satisfaction of seeing the Effect of those Promises, by four Troops, that he thought fit to call for in the like Manner: The suspected Party, concurring avowedly in the same Resolution, have as frankly offer'd their Estates and Persons, in opposition to any Invasion from abroad, or Insurrection at home, as if they did not differ in any degree from us, in their Zeal to serve the King. And what is still more conclusive, the Account of the Fire, publish'd by Authority, concludes in the following remarkable Manner:

And we cannot but observe, to the Confusion of all his Majesty's Enemies, who endeavour to persuade the World abroad, of great Parties, and Disaffection, here at home, against his Majesty's Government, that a greater Instance of the Affections of this City could never be given, than hath now been given, in this sad and deplorable Accident; when, if at any time, Disorder might have been expected from the Losses, Distraction, and almost Desperation, of some Persons in their private Fortunes; Thousands of People not having had Habitations to cover them. And yet, in all this time, it hath been so far from any Appearance of Designs or Attempts against his Majesty's Government, that his Majesty and his Royal Brother, out of their Care to stop and prevent the Fire, frequently exposing their Persons with very small Attendance, in all Parts of the Town, sometimes even to be intermix'd with those who labour'd in the Business; yet, nevertheless, there hath not been observ'd so much as a murmuring Word to fall from any; but, on the contrary, even those Persons, whose Losses render'd their Conditions most desperate, and to be fit Objects of others Prayers, beholding those frequent Instances of his Majesty's Care of his People, forgot their own Misery, and filled the Streets with their Prayers for his Majesty, whose Trouble they seem'd to compassionate before their own.

We have here, therefore, the most full and authentic (1) Testimonials, that neither the hated Nonconformists, nor even the more hated Republicans (if we may take Leave to separate those, whom Church-Policy hath always so carefully and artificially join'd) are answerable for, nor chargeable with, so heinous a Wickedness: And it may be yet further urg'd, that, dispos'd as their Adversaries were to accuse them of criminal Designs, neither the (2) Ministers, in their Letters to each other, nor the public Writings of those Times, ever so remotely intimate, that they were even suspected of being concern'd in it.

On the other hand, the State-Narrative, just quoted, declares, that divers Strangers, Dutch and French, were, during the Fire, apprehended upon Suspicion that they contributed mischievously to it; and were all committed, in order to further Examination: But, in the very same Paragraph, these Strangers are in a manner disculpated: For the said Narrative proceeds thus: "Notwithstanding which Suspitions, the Manner of burning all along in a Train, and so blown forward, in all its Way, by strong Winds, makes us conclude, the Whole was an Effect of an unhappy Chance, or, to speak better, the heavy Hand of God upon us for our Sins."

Bishop Burnet, indeed, tells us, without specifying his Authority, that, in Resentment of the Burning of the (v) Island Vlie, on the 7th of August, by the English, a Project for the burning of London was communicated to Mr. de Wit, by whom it was rejected; notwithstanding which, so immediately after as the 2d of September, that very Event took place.

And, in Mr. d'Esstrades's Memoirs, we have a Letter to him from the King his Master, concerning the joint Operations of the two Powers during the Winter, which contains the following Passage:

However, as there is no Room to think of a Junction, the Opportunity being slip'd, for which I am the more sorry, on occasion of the FIRE of LONDON, which, had our Forces been join'd, might have been a Means of our putting a glorious End to the War, I give Orders for disarming my Ships, &c.

This is all the Evidence which occurs with Respect to the Concern of any foreign Power in this dreadful Visitation; and out of this, even a Decyberer could scarce torture any solid Conclusion either against France or Holland. Of these Strangers, it is moreover remarkable, that the Gazette never makes any farther Mention: And, had any Circumstances arose upon their Examination, tending to inflame the national Resentment at that time, it is not to be imagin'd, that those at the Helm would have let slip so favourable an Opportunity.

The Populace, however, whether influenc'd by their own Credulity, or misled by the Artifices of their Betters, were strongly persuaded, that the Papists were the Incendiaries: And this Conjecture took so deep a Root, and spread so far, that when the Parliament met, a Committee was appointed by the House of Commons to take Examinations; who finding it unsupported with rational, sober, and consistent Evidence, suffer'd it to drop, as a vulgar Error.

(2) Lord Arlington, writing to the Duke of Ormond, Sept. 25, contains himself with saying, "This Day, the Accounts of the Mooney, laid out in this War, were laid before the House of Commons, but not entered upon;

most of the Time being spent in discoursing, whether this unhappy Fire in London was the Effect of Chance or Design?"

(v) For this Expression of burning an Island, instead of a Fleet of Ships and a Village, the Bishop is answerable.

A. D. 1666.

It is true, the Committee presented their Report, but without an Opinion of the Particulars it contain'd: Nor did the House countenance it with any Vote; nor, when the Torrent ran highest against the Papists, does it appear that this Report was (w) printed;

A. D. 1666.

[w] It was not printed till the Year 1689, and the Particulars it contain'd, were as follow:

The Report of Sir Robert Broock, Chairman to the Committee (which consisted of several Persons) that was appointed by the House of Commons to enquire into the Firing of the City of London, made the two-and-twentieth of January, 1666.

In a Letter from Alonzo of the 23<sup>d</sup> of August 1666, N. S. written from one Dural, to a Gentleman lodging in the House of one of the Ministers of the French Church in London, called Monsieur Haucault, there were these Expressions: "Pray acquaint me with the Truth of certain News which is common in this Country, That a Fire from Heaven is fallen upon a City called Belle, situated on the Side of the River of Thames, where a World of People have been killed and burnt, and Houses also consumed." Which seem'd a Word of Cabal, cut out by some that were knowing, and others that might be ignorant of the Signification of it. Mrs. Elizabeth Syles, informs, That in April last, in an eager Discourse he had with a French Servant of Sir Vere Feas, he haughty reply'd, You English Maids will like the Frenchmen better, whose lives is not a Hoop left between Temple-Bar and London-Bridge. To which he answered, I hope your Eyes will never see that. He reply'd, This will come to pass between June and October.

William J. J. J. J. informs, That he being about the Beginning of July at the Gypphoad in St. Martin's, with one Fire-Harris an Irish Papist, heard him say, It would be a great Defolation in November's week; in a December all would be waded into sea. Whereupon he asked him, where this Defolation would be? He answered, in London.

Mr. Light of Ratisf, having come Discourte with Mr. Longshore of the Middle-Temple, Barrister (reputed a zealous Papist) about February 15 last, after some Discourte in Disputation about Religion, he took him by the Hand, and said to him, You expect great things in July, for, and think that Rome will be destroyed, but what of it is London?

Mr. Kately of Berkley in Essex informs, That one Mrs. Tandy, a Papist, of Essex in the said Country, came unto his House, August the 13th, and being in Discourte with his Mother, said, They say that next Thursday will be the hottest Day that ever was in England. She reply'd, I hope the hottest Days of the Year is now past. To which she answered, I know not whether it will be the hottest for Weather or for Adversity. Mrs. Tandy coming to him the next Week after the Fire, Mr. Kately said to her with some Trouble, I have often thought of your Hot Thursday; to which she reply'd, It was not indeed upon the Thursday, but it happened upon the Sunday next seven weeks after. Mrs. Tandy hearing this Evidence produced against her, endeavoured to avoid the Words, saying, *That upon the 13th of August she did tell Mrs. Kately, that they say the next Thursday will be the hottest Thursday that ever was in England, but not otherwise; which she affirms to have received from one Flackman, an old Woman of Essex, who being examined by a Justice of Peace to discover the Truth thereof, denied that ever she said any such Words to Mrs. Tandy, or that she had discoureted with her about any such Matter; and as to the subsequent Words, she saith Mrs. Tandy denies ever to have spoken them: But Mr. Kately offered in her Presence (if it should be demanded) to bring his Mother and Wife to testify the same.*

William Daxter, Esq; a Member of the House, informs, That one Henry Baker of Chippesham in the County of Wilt, coming from Market with one Jahn Woodman of Kilvey, in the same County; the Thursday before the Fire began in London, they had some Discourte about the buying of a Yoke of fat Bullocks, wherein they differed, because Woodman, who was to sell them, was desired to keep them a while in his Hands; but the said Woodman denied so to do, for that, as he alleged, he could not stay in the Country all that time which Baker would have them delivered to him in; and being asked whether he was going, he refused to tell, asking what he had to do to make that Question: But rading a little further, the said Woodman exprest these Words, You have loose Blades at Chippesham, you made Bonfires lately for beating the Dutch; but since you delight in Bonfires, you shall have your Belles full of them ere its the long: Adding, *That if he lived now in Windsor he would fly to London as fast as London, as ever it was since the World began; and before that time ever, he should see as bloody a time as ever was, since England was England*. This Discourte was not much taken notice of at that time it was spoken; but when the City of London was burnt, the said Henry Baker gave this Information to the said Mr. Daxter; whereupon he issued out his Warrant to apprehend Woodman, but he was gone out of the Country, and could not be heard of since.

Robert Haport of Rouen in Normandy, who acknowledged that he was one of those that fired the House of Mr. Forryer a Baker in Padding Lane, from whence the Fire had its Beginning, confessed, That he came out of France with one Stephan Peidler, about four Months before the Fire, and went into Sweden with him, where he also did with him as his Companion four Months, and then they came together into England in a Swedish Ship called the Slipper, where he staid on board with the said Peidler till that Saturday Night in which the Fire broke out. When Peidler taking him out of the Ship, carried him into Padding Lane; and he being earnest to know whether he would carry the Fire, he would not satisfy him till he had brought him to the Place; and then he told him, that he had brought three Balls, and gave him one of them to throw into the House. And he would have been further satisfied in the Design, as he said, before he would execute it: But Peidler was so impatient that he would not hear him, and then he did the Fact, which was, That he put a Fireball at the End of a long Pole, and lighted it with a piece of Match, after which he put it in at a Window, and said till he saw the House in a Flame. He confessed, that there were three or two-and-twenty Accomplices, whereof Peidler was the Chief.

Mr. Grouse, a French Merchant, living in St. Mary Axt, informed this Committee, that he had known Habert ever since he was four Years old, and hath ever observed him to be a Person of a malicious Inclination, and therefore fit for any villainous Enterprise; and because of his Knowledge he had of him, he went to visit him in Prison, where, when he saw him, he could not but commiserate the Condition whereunto he had brought himself. And for his better Discovery of the Fact, he told him, the said Habert, that he did not believe he had done that of which he confessed himself guilty. To which Habert reply'd, *Yes, Sir, I am guilty of it, and have been brought to it, by the Instigation of Magister Peidloe; but not out of any Malice in the English Nation, but from a Desire of Reward which he promised me upon my Return into France*.

It is observable, that this miserable Creature who confessed himself to the Committee to be a Prattler, was a Papist, and died so. And as for the aforesaid Peidler, the said Mr. Grouse informed, that he had had a full Knowledge of him, and knew him to be a very debauch'd Person, and apt to any wicked Design. Moreover, for a clear Conviction of the Guilt of the aforesaid Habert, Mr. Loumas, the Keeper of the White-Lane Prison, was appointed to set him upon a Horse, and to go with him, and see if he could find out the Place where he threw the Fireball. Upon which, Habert with more Readiness than they that were well acquainted with the Place, went to Padding Lane, into the very Place where the House that was first fired stood, saying, Here stood the House. The Jailor endeavoured to draw him from that Belief, and putting him upon feeling another Place; but he positively persisted in what he had first said, and affirmed that to have been the said House. It being intimated to the Committee, That notwithstanding the Confession of the said Habert, it was confidently reported, the Fire in the aforesaid Forryer's House began by Accident: The Committee therefore sent for him the said Forryer before them, who being examined, said, That it was impossible any Fire should happen in his House by Accident; for he had, after twelve of the Clock that Night, gone through every Room thereof, and found no Fire, but in one Chimney, where the Room was packed with Bricks, which Fire he diligently raked up in Embers. He was then asked, Whether no Window or Door might let in Wind to disturb those Coals? He affirmed there was no Possibility for any Wind to disturb them; and that it was absolutely set on fire of purpose.

Dawson Waymans, Esq; one of his Majesty's Judges of the Peace, informed, That he saw a Man apprehended in the time of the Fire, near the Temple, with his Pockets full with combustible Matter, made of Wax, Tow, and such like Materials.

Dokter Jahn Pecker informs, That he saw a Person in the time of the Fire, throw some combustible Matter into a Shop in the Old Bailey, which he thinks was the Shop of an Apothecary; and that immediately thereupon he saw a great Swook, and smelt a Smell of Brimstone. The Person that did this, immediately ran away, but upon the Out-cry of the People, he was taken by the Guards.

Mr. Randall, Mr. Hilditch, and Henry Brewer, do all agree, That they saw a Person throw something into a House near St. Andrew's Church; and that thereupon the House was on fire, and the flames thereof infested the adjacent Houses. And when they were asked, there was no Fire near the Place.

Mr. Michael March, an Officer in the Trained Bands in a Company of Sir Richard Broun, apprehended a Walton in the time of the Fire, at the Nag's Head in London-bail Street, with an Instrument like a Dark-Lantern, made

A. D. 1666. the Lord Mayor, and the other Magistrates of the City of London, in their several Limits, to be very watchful in such Cases, and speedily to pull down whatsoever such Men shall presume to set up, so much to the Disturbance of public Order and Decency; and that they forthwith give Notice to Us, or our Privy Council, of such their Proceedings, and return the Names of such refractory Persons, who presume to contemn this our Injunction; and We shall give Order for their exemplary Punishment, without the Violation of the public Justice."

Again, proceeding to Particulars;

"In the first place, the woeful Experience, in this late heavy Visitation, hath sufficiently convinced all Men of the pernicious Consequences which have attended the building with Timber, and even with Stone itself, and the notable Benefit of Brick, which in so many Places hath resisted, and even extinguished, the Fire. And We do therefore hereby declare our express Will and Pleasure, That no Man whatsoever shall presume to erect any House or Building, great or small, but of Brick or Stone: And, if any Man shall do the contrary, the next Magistrate shall forthwith cause it to be pulled down; and such further Course shall be taken for his Punishment, as he deserves."

It must however be acknowledg'd, that this discretionary Power was exerted by the King, at the Instance of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; that, if ever such a Strain of the Prerogative would admit of Palliation, it was now, when the City lay in Ruins, when all were in Haste to rebuild, and the Mistakes, Trespases, and Injuries, which were like to follow thereupon, would probably create as much Confusion as the Fire had left: And that the King (x) sweeten'd the Harshness of this Decree, with a Signification of his Intention to part with any thing of his own, which might render the City more commodious or beautiful, and to remit the Hearth-money Duty to all those who should conform to the Terms prescrib'd by it.

Till the 30th of October, however, it did not appear, that any Persons seem'd dispos'd to submit their Property to be thus modell'd after the King's Good-will and Pleasure; and, by the Manner in which the first Act of Conformity to it was made (a) public, there is good Reason to conclude, that it was not without much Difficulty submitted to at all.

It is now time to attend the Opening of the Parliament: But, previous thereto, it is necessary to observe, that, tho' the Aspect of the War was in general favourable to the English, the Dutch were as far as ever from submitting to receive the Law from them, and the contrary, de Ruyter having been oblig'd by Sickness to quit his Post, de Wit himself took the Command of the Fleet in his Stead, flood over once more towards England, and the Enemy twice; and, when they declin'd the Engagement, follow'd them, and continued upon their Coasts, till his Scouts brought him Advice that they were entering the Thames, and he receiv'd Orders to return; which he did, without the Loss of a Ship.

In this Interval, however, some Advances had been made towards a Peace: The Swedes had offer'd their Mediation; which had been accepted by France and Holland in Form, and England in Effect. His Majesty had likewise, by Letter, demand'd of the States the Body of (b) Sir William Berkeley, in which he had moreover signify'd his Readiness to lend a helping Hand to close the Breach between the two Nations, as soon as he should be invited thereto by just and honourable Conditions. The States return'd a respectful Answer in general; but adher'd to the Terms, which had been propos'd by Van Beuninghen to Lord Hills; in the Queen-Mother's Apartment at Paris; which they insist'd were both just and honourable, and all that ought to be expected from them. They nevertheless invited his Majesty to propose his own Conditions, without Reserve, that they might be the better able to judge of his true Intention; and that he would be pleas'd to renew the Conference, which had been so abruptly broken off, either at the same, or any other neutral Place.

This Letter of the States, which was dat'd the 8th of September, appears to have had little Effect, at least at that time; for, on the (c) 19th following O.S. the Declaration, before quoted, and the Declaration of War against Denmark annex'd to it, was order'd to be forthwith printed and publish'd: And, two Days after, viz. the 21st, the King, in his Speech to both Houses, was pleas'd to declare,

That we had two very great and powerful Enemies, who us'd all the Means they could, fair and foul, to make all the World concur with them; and that the War was more chargeable by that Conjunction, than any body thought

(x) The following Article was likewise published in the Gazette of October 1.

Whitehall, October 29. "This Day, by a Warrant from one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Person of Valentine Knight was committed to the Custody of one of his Majesty's Messengers in ordinary, for having presum'd to publish in Print, certain Propositions for the rebuilding the City of London, with considerable Advantages to his Majesty's Revenue, as if his Majesty would draw a Benefit to himself from so public a Calumny of his People, of which his Majesty is known to have so deep a Sense, as that he is pleas'd to seek rather, by all means, to give them ease under it."

(a) Whitehall, October 30. "Sir George Moore, with some other Proprietors of Houses lately demolished by the Fire in Fleet-street, having pray'd Liberty to rebuild the same, according to such Model, Form and Scantling, as should be set them, by the Committee appointed by his Majesty for the Advancement of that great Work (to which they shew'd, with all Hillogogues, proposals, and confusion themselves) it was this Day order'd by his Majesty in Council, that the said Proprietors should have Liberty to rebuild their Buildings accordingly." Gazette, November 1.

(b) Who was kill'd during the late Day's Engagement.

(c) The Council that day consisted of the King, the Duke, the Archbishop of Canterbury (Sheldon) the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Roby), the Duke of Albmarle, Earl of Offord (son of the Duke of Bucks), Lord Chamberlain (Earl of Mordaunt), Earl of Down, Earl of Lonsdale, Lord Viscount Ferriars, Bishop of London (Dr. Hovhman), Lord Arundell, Lord Hills, Lord Ashley, Mr. Secretary Morris, Chancellor of the Duchy (Lord Seymour) and Sir William Coventry.

thought it would have been.— He then acknowledged the large Supplies he had receiv'd: But added, he had been oblig'd to anticipate his own Revenues notwithstanding; left them to consider what was next to be done; and, without expressly asking a Supply, made it appear he expected one, by intimating, Their Wisdoms would find out the best Expedients for carrying on the War, with as little Burthen to the People as possible.

His Majesty then concluded in these Words:

" I shall add no more, but, that our Enemies are very insent; and if they were able this last Year to persuade this miserable People, whom they so misled, That the Contagion had so wasted the Nation, and impoverished us, that we could not be able to set out any Fleet, how will they be exalted with this last Impoverishment of this City, and condemn all reasonable Conditions of Peace? And therefore I cannot doubt but you will provide accordingly."

It does not appear that his Majesty condemned, by any (d) Channel, to make either House undertake, wherein the Infolence of our Enemies consisted; or that he was ingenuous enough to communicate the Terms upon which a Peace was to be had; or consult the Wisdom of the Nation upon a Point, that the Wealth and Blood of the Nation was to support.

But, whether the Commons had as yet no Diffidence of his Majesty; or whether, if they had, it was thought advisable by their Leaders, for their own Ends, to keep it concealed till a more favourable Opportunity, they unanimously resolved, That the humble and hearty Thanks of the House be returned to his Majesty, for his great Care in the Management of the present War; that this House will supply his Majesty, proportionably to his present Occasions; and that the Lords Concurrence should be desired to this Vote.

The Lords accordingly concurred; both Houses waited on the King, with this acceptable Vote, on the 25th; and for as much Loyalty as appeared on one Side, as much Grace was vouchsafed on the other.

On the first of October, the Commons, having discuss'd the great Question of the Fire of London, again voted the Thanks of the House to his Majesty, for the great Care and Endeavour which his Majesty had taken to prevent it: And, on the 12th, appointed a Committee to consider of the most effectual Means of raising Eighteen hundred thousand Pounds for the Supply.

These were the First-fruits of the Session; and all of them, such as seemed to indicate a thorough good Understanding between the King and his People.

But however smooth the Surface, the Bottom was foul, and the Current violent. As the Chancellor's Interest and Power visibly declin'd, his Credit and Influence did the same.

This, the two Parties, whom he had oppos'd and prosecuted, saw with no small Pleasure, and took care to improve to their own Advantage.

The Roman Catholics, in particular, had Reason to expect great Things from his Fall; and began already to build upon his Ruins.

The Secretary (Arlington) who was most in the Secret of Affairs, was already their own: And (e) Sir Thomas Clifford, another of their Profelytes, who had been so violent for the Dutch War, was making large Advances, both into Trust and Favour: They had both the Queens to countenance and support them. And, what was more than all, they had the Duke for their Champion, and the King for their Friend.

The Chancellor, on the other hand, could not be ignorant, that, as their Scale arose, his must descend; it is highly probable, therefore, that he did not discourage, if he did not promote, the Cry which began now to grow violent against the Growth of Popery.

And as to the Nonconformists of all Persuasions, they join'd in this Cry with their orthodox Adversaries, in order to distress and disgrace the Court; and with the Papists, in order to revenge their own Sufferings on the Chancellor: No doubt with a farther View, of forcing the Power out of their Hands, when Time should come, which they now help'd to force out of his.

Thus the Spirit of Faction was every where at work; and, by degrees took Possession of Court, Senate, and People.

But though all Objects, which are to be brought upon the public Stage, are generally drawn larger than the Life, they are seldom so outrageously caricatur'd, as to be wholly unlike the Original.

Thus, in relation to the Progress of Popery, it was not merely an ugly Spectre, conjur'd up to terrify the Populace; but a Matter of Fact, which, as it afterwards appear'd, had very substantial Evidence to support it.

It was not however so much on a Principle of Conscience perhaps, as Policy, that a Committee was, about this Time, appointed to receive and certify Informations of the Infolence of Popish Priests and Jesuits, and of the Increase of Popery. When it is known, that Men have private Ends to serve, their public Pretences will always be called in question; and it is but natural to suspect, that the Last are made use of only for the sake of the First.

Of this Committee, Mr. Haugerford was Chairman: They sat till the latter End of October, examin'd a Cloud of Witnesses, deliver'd in a Variety of (f) Informations, some of which were contemptibly trifling, and, at last

(d) By a Letter of Lord Arlington's to the Duke of Ormond, dated December 8, 1665, we learn, that it was not thought proper to make the States Letter public.

(e) He was, during this Session, made Comptroller of the Household.

(f) Some of which were as follow:

As to the Increase of Popery, Mr. Hancock, Minister of Chelmsch in Wilts, informs, That meeting with one Mr. Thomson, about a Month since, coming from Maid, out of last agreed upon a Resolution, which had the Approbation of the Houfe, as follows:

“Resolved, That, in order to the suppressing the Infolency of the Papists, his Majesty

Some of his Chapell, and discoursing to him about his Religion, asked him, if there were many lately turn'd to it? Thomson answered, That there was; and being demanded, what Encouragement there was to it? Reply'd, There would be a Change suddenly.

Report of his Carriage to the Committee.

Mr. Thomson being summoned before the Committee, did behave himself very infolently: They have commended me to report it. Being asked, Whether he had not a Shop in St. Dunstons Church, where Popish Books and Popish Knacks were sold? He said, he had; and that his Man sold fish Books and Breads, and other Things; and said, There was one Crucifix, no Relics, but wifhed he had some good ones. He said, that he was a Roman Catholic, and thanks God for it. He said, he was no Priest, but wifhed he were in a Capacity to be one. He said, he had not taken the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, nor would do it. He said, he would take any Oath any Christian Prince should require, but not the Oath of Allegiance, intimating some Mixture in it. He said, he had taken the Oath of Allegiance to the King of Spain, and was a Subject to the King of Spain.

One Mr. Abu, a Minister, late of Capel in Surrey, informed, That being at Canfield in Lancashire this last Summer, he saw a great Retort on Sundays to Canfield Houfe, the Houfe of a Papist; and adding some that were going thither, what the Occasion was of their Retort thither, they told him they were going to Mass, and that one Mr. Robinson a Priest did say Mass.

Mr. Abu did likewise inform, that he thought the Number of those that resort to Mass to that Houfe on Sundays, was as great as the Protestants that went to the Parish Church.

One Mr. Widdes, Deputy Ordinary for Middlesex, did inform, That in his accustomed Attendance on the Prisoners at Newgate, about the time of Execution, Romish Priests, and particularly one Mr. Harvey a Jesuit, hath constantly used to resort to the Prison at those times; and does persuade the Prisoners to become Papists; and that divers have been altered in their Religion by them, and turned to Popery.

Mr. Wootton informeth, That on October 16, he went to Newgate, and meeting with one Hoswood an Under-keeper at the Door, desired to speak with Mr. Habert the Prisoner who was then condemned: Hoswood told him that he could not speak with him yet, for Mr. Harvey the Queen Mother's Confessor was in private with him; and said, this Harvey used frequently to come to the Prison, after Condemnation; and that when one Prisoner died a Protestant, many did Papists. Mr. Wootton said, that after some Stay, he saw Mr. Harvey come out from Mr. Habert, and then he was admitted to have Speech with him.

Mr. Cowdrey, Keeper of Newgate, did inform, That Mr. Harvey the Jesuit did frequent the Prison at Newgate, about the Times of the Execution, upon the Presence of the Queen's Charity, and did spend much time with the Prisoners in private, and particularly, did go before the last Execution, Night after Night. Mr. Cowdrey said likewise, of the nine that suffered, eight died Papists, whereof some he knew were Protestants when they came into the Prison.

It appeared upon several Informations, that Mr. Harvey, and other Priests, did not only resort to Newgate at times of Execution, but likewise to the White Lion in Southwark; and other Places in the Country, and used their Endeavours to convert dying Prisoners.

Thomas Barnet, late a Papist, informed, That when he was a Papist, and resorted to Geoffreyes Houfe in Berkshire; that were Papists, there was almost in every Gentleman's Houfe a Priest, and influenced in divers private Gentleman in that Country. Others inform the like in Surrey.

As to their Industry, Thomas Bower of Bingfield in Berkshire informed, That being at one Mr. Young's Houfe in Bingfield, at Bartholomew-tide last, Mr. Young had to the Brother of this Thomas, in his Hearing, That within two Years there should not be a Protestant in England. Thomas Bower informed further, That being at Mr. Dunckerly's Houfe in Bingfield, one Mr. Trawl, Son-in-law to Mr. Dunckerly (and both Papists) said to this Informer (who was then likewise a Papist) The People take us for a poor Fellow, but I shall find a thousand or two thousand Pounds to raise a Party of Horse, to make Mr. Hastings's and Mr. Ballock's Party Gas lie on the Ground, for it is no more Sin to kill an Heretic, than to kill a Grasheep; and that it was happy for him that he was a Catholic, for by that means he shall be one that shall be mounted.

Mr. Lionsard, Surveyor, in White-Chapel informed, That about the twentieth of October last, meeting with one Mr. Bink a Papist, and discoursing with him, Bink told him, That there was amongst the Papists, at great a Design as ever was in England, and he thought it would be carried successfully. Being asked how many Papists were about London, he answered, About seven thousand; and in England an hundred thousand were armed.

Mr. Oake, a Physician, dwelling in Chesham, informed, That a little after the burning of London, one Mr. Corpenter a Minister, came to his Houfe in Tower-ward, and spake to him to this Purpose: I will not say that I am a Papist, but this I will say, that I had rather die the Death of the Papists, and that my Soul should be raised with their Resurrections, than sit in the Prefbytery, Independent, or Ambassadors; and I wish the Papists were better to their last Majesty; his Majesty's for whose Prefbytery, Independent, and Ambassadors, he sought and begged him, then they did to him, and helped him; and he is now resolved to commit himself into their Hands. And take it upon my Word, in a short time the Papists will lay you as low as that Houfe (pointing to an Houfe that was demolished) for they are able to raise forty thousand Men, and I believe, the next Week will be cutting of Throats. This was sworn by Mr. Oake, before Sir John Pender, a Member of the Houfe.

Milston Pilkington, being present when the Words were spoken, doth affirm them all, save only those, That the King is resolved to commit himself into the Papists Hands. Thole he doth not remember.

Henry Young, a Distiller of hot Waters, informed, That about April, 1661, being in the Jesuit College in Arzwerp, one Poussin, an English Jesuit, persuaded him to turn a Roman Catholic; and said, That if he intended to lose his Life and Estate, he had best turn so, for within seven Years he should see all England of that Religion. Young replied, That the City of London would never submit to it. Poussin answered, That within five or six Years they would breach the Power and Strength of London in pieces, and that they had been carrying it thirty Years; and that if Young did live, he should see it done. The said Young did likewise inform, That shortly after his coming into England, one Thomson and Casperool, both Papists, did several times say to him, That within seven or eight Years at the furthest, the Roman Catholic Religion should be all over in this Kingdom.

Jasper Godwin of Dorset, in the County of Surrey, informed, That about a Month since, one Edmond Caspary, a Papist, said to him, You may call by Popish words; and then may be over not ashamed to own yourself a Roman Catholic, and to give his Priest (naming two that were in Dorset, in the Honies of two Papists) and likewise said, That in twenty five Hours morning, the Roman Catholics could raise thirty thousand Men, as well armed, as any Men in Christendom. Mr. Nassau Catman of the Millit-Temple, Burrit, informed, That about two Years since, one Mr. Jessey, a Papist Priest, and called by the Name of Father Gaurde, did persuade him to turn Papist, and he should want neither Profit nor Preferment. Mr. Catman objected, that he intended to practise the Law, which he could not do if he turned Papist, because he must take the Oath of Supremacy at his being called to the Bar; and if he were a Papist, he must not take it. Mr. Jessey replied, Why not take the Oath? It is an universal Oath, and said only factio. And after some Paufe, said further, First take the Oath, and then I will convert you. He said further, The King will not own himself to be the Head of the Church, and said further, You in England that set up the Dutch to destroy our Religion, shall find that they shall by the Men to rule over you.

Mr. Stanley, an Officer to the Duke of Ormond in Ireland, informed, That coming out of Ireland with one Ordel (who owned himself of the Order of the Jesuits, and commissioned from the Pope to be Lord Primate over Ireland, and Archbishop of Armagh) and falling into some Discourse with him, he told him, That there had been a Difference between him and some other of the Jesuits in Ireland; and that Part of the Occasion was, that one Father Walsh, and some other of the Jesuits there, did dispute with the Papists in Ireland, to take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, by virtue of a handling Commission from the Pope which he had to do it, during this King's Life; and said Ordel therefore they ought not to do it by virtue of the handling Commission, but should take a new Commission from the Pope, and then to do it. And likewise, That he had been told by one of Ireland, whom he intended to carry to England, to be used up in some of the Colleges there, that in taking Shipping to go for Flanders, he sailed with a woman, England, turning it Egypt, and said, That she would return into England, till she came with fifty thousand Men at her Heels.

A French Merchant being at the time lying in St. Michael's Lane, London, written an Letter to his Friend, That a great Number of Men and Arms were being sent to France to serve ready there. The British Consul, in intercepting of this Letter, searched a Party of Men, who were found in his Houfe ready loaded; which were carried to Fishmonger's Hall, “ jesty be humbly desired forthwith to issue out his Royal Proclamation, for the Banishment of all Priests and Jesuits out of this Kingdom, within Thirty Days to be therein limited, other than such (not being his Majesty's natural born Subjects) who are obliged to attend upon the Queen-Comfart, or the Queen-Mother: And that, if any Priest or Jesuit shall happen to be taken in England, after the said Days, that the Laws be put in due Execution against them.”

The House moreover resolv'd, That, in the said Proclamation, proper Orders should be given for the putting the Laws in Execution against popish Recusants, and such as were suspected of being so:

“ That his Majesty be humbly moved, that, considering the present Juncture of Affairs, all popish Recusants, and such as, being suspected so to be, shall refuse to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, being tendered to them, may be forthwith so disarm'd, as to remove all Apprehensions from the People, of their Possibilities to disturb the public Peace of the Nation: And that all Officers, military and civil, and Soldiers, as shall not within twenty Days take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, may be disbanded and displaced.”

“ That the Commissaries of the Mustres be commanded and enjoined, upon Penalty of losing their Places, not to permit any Officer or Soldier to be muster'd in the Service and Pay of his Majesty, till he or they shall have taken the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the Laws and Usage of the Church of England.”

As if also convinced, that this Court-Leprosy stuck to their own Walls, they farther resolv'd, That his Majesty be humbly desired to issue out a new Commission, for tendering and administering the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to the Members of both Houses.

To the Four first of these Resolutions, the Concurrence of the Lords was desired and obtain'd; as likewise to another for a Proclamation, strictly to prohibit the Importation of all Sorts of Manufactures, and Commodities whatsoever, of the Growth, Product, or Manufacture of France, and of all other Lands and Places in the Possession of the French King, &c. and all being presented to the King, his Majesty, as we are told, gave them a cheerful Acceptance, and, in about a Fortnight afterwards, set forth his (g) Proclamations accordingly.

But, if this Prohibition of French Manufactures was necessary for the Encouragement of our Commerce; or these Severities against

Papists were a seasonable Preservative of our Religion; the Bill to prohibit the Exportation of Irish Cattle, which was now again brought in, would admit of scarce any reasonable Pretence, Excuse, or Palliation.

It had been introduced in the preceding Session at Oxford, and hurry'd through the House of Commons in five Days; with such peculiar Circumstances of Prejudice and Party Rage, as would have sully'd and disgrac'd the purest and whitest Cause; With the Lords however it hung, both the Chancellor and Duke of York had spoke against it; even the King declar'd publicly, more than once, that he could not pass it with a safe Conscience: Which appears to have had so much Weight with the House, that Ways and Means were found to put a Stop to the Progress of it till the Parliament was prorogued.

Thus Ireland was reviv'd: But the fatal Sentence still hung over her as before. The House of Commons continued under the same Influence and Prepossession; and, if possible, grew more enrag'd by their late Disappointment. The Bill was extremely popular; the insatuated Landholders, believing, that all their Gains by the breeding of Cattle depended upon it. This gave Confidence to those who press'd it with so much Warmth and Eagerness, and no doubt help'd to intimidate those who were in their Consciences for rejecting it.

Sir Robert Carr, Brother-in-law to Lord Arlington, was the Person who introduced it; and, if we may credit his Lordship, much to his Surprise and Amazement. Those in Place and Power were then neither so thoroughly regimented, nor disciplin'd, as they have been since. Thus we find the Cabinet Ministers divided on the very Point before us: The Duke of Buckingham, the Lords Abley and Lauderdale, were violently for it; the first out of spleen to the Chancellor and the Duke of Ormond, who appear to have been from Principle against it; and the two last, on account of a Combination between them to engross the Trade of Cattle between Scotland and England. It was on this Account that the Bill pass'd the Commons, with an express Proviso, allowing Scotland to do, what Ireland was forbid: But this Partiality appear'd so unreasonable in itself, and so destructive of every Fundamental, upon which the Bill was presum'd to be built, that it was rejected by the Lords.

So early as the 13th of October, it came under their Lordships Consideration, having been pass'd in the House of Commons, by a Majority of sixty-one Voices.

The very Preamble partook of the violent Spirit of the Times; for it declar'd, That the Importation of lean or fat Cattle tending Hall, a Month or two more before the Fire, and he committed to Prison, but since released.

A poor Woman retaining to one Bishop's House, a Papist about Darling in Surrey, was solicited, that she and her Husband would turn Roman Catholics; which, if they did voluntarily No, they would be accepted of; but if they said a little longer, they would be forced whether they would or no, and they would not be creem'd. This was depos'd before Sir Adam Brown, a Member of Parliament. London's Flames Reviv'd.

[g.] Together with these, another Proclamation was agreed upon in Council, and order'd to be made public, prohibiting the farther Importation of Canary Wines, and the carrying on any further Commerce with the Canary Islands, on the Penalty of his Majesty's high Displeasure, and the Forfeiture of all such Wines, &c.

A. D. 1666.

to lower Rents, and lessen the Value of Lands, was not only unnecessary, but very destructive to the Welfare of this Kingdom. And having establish'd these invidious Premises, they proceeded to enact, That such Importation, after the 2d of the next ensuing February, is a public and common (b) Nuisance. They also extended the like Prohibition to all foreign Fish, and enforced all with the Penalty of Forfeiture.

But the Temper of the Lords, at this time, was very different from that of the Commons; whether from a Regard to Justice, or from Court Complaisance, will best be seen by the Issue. They began with the Preamble; to which as many Objections were rais'd, as took up ten Days to answer: And, as to the favourite Word Nuisance, they rejected it without a Division, substituting Detriment and Mischief in its stead. At the Instance of the City of London, they likewise inserted a Proviso for admitting between 20 and 30,000 Bees, which had been subscribed by the Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, as a (i) Charity to the Poor of that City, who had been reduced by the late Fire: And another, for the Importation of Horses.

Thus qualify'd, the Bill was return'd to the Commons; where it was suffer'd to sleep for a while, as we are told, on account of the (k) Insurrection at Dumfries in Scotland, and several Discontents and Disturbances, which, at the same time, began to shew themselves in Hereford, Coventry, and other Places, and which took their Rise from the Collection of Heart-money, and other Taxes. But surely, if this Bill was espous'd by Ashley, Buckingham, and the rest of that Faction, merely to distress, embroil and ruin Ireland, and embarrass the King's Affairs in general, as we are likewise told, nothing could be more favourable to their Designs, than these concurring Circumstances.

However this may be, when the Consideration of the Bill was resum'd, the Commons rejected some of the Lords Amendments, and resolv'd to adhere to the Word Nuisance. This produc'd a free Conference between the Committees of the two Houses; at which, the Lord Ashley proposing to substitute the Word Felony, or Premature, as a Softer, instead of it, the Lord Chancellor jocosely recommended the Word Adultery, as being to the full as proper. Both Houses continuing tenacious of their different Sentiments, and the King having Reason to conclude, that if the Commons had not their Way, the Supply they had voted would not be made good, it was at length resolv'd, in a Sort of Cabinet Council, contrary to the Chancellor's Opinion, that his Majesty's Servants in the House of Lords should eat their Words, and agree with the Commons; Lord (l) Arlington taking upon him to engage in Return, that they should comply with the King, in all his other Affairs: Accordingly, his Majesty's good Pleasure was no sooner made known by the Duke of York, but so many Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, withdrew, that, on the putting the Question of agreeing with the Commons, the Majority were for the Affirmative; and but (m) eight had the Courage to protest against a Law, which if so many had openly condemn'd, as highly (n) injurious to one Kingdom, and productive of no material Benefit to the other.

(i) According to Mr. Carter, Lord Ashley and his Party, ran down this Charity as a Matter of Reproach to the Nation, and done out of Hypocrisy and Design, and fit to be abominated as a Cheat. Ibid. p. 333.

(k) Of certain Enthusiasts, who, made desperate by the Rigour of the Government, had Recourse to Arms, stood a Battle, and were immediately dispersed.

(l) In a Letter to the Duke of Ormond, January 10, 1667, his Lordship, affirms, That without the Hazard of a Rebellion, his Majesty could not put a Stop to this Bill; nor without the Loss of his so much valued Supply, he could not take out the Word Nuisance.

(m) Which were the Lords Cardigan, Anglessey, Berkeley, Burlington, Bridgewater, Ashley, Coventry, and La War. The second Reason in this Protest, was as follows: "Because the Word Nuisance was professedly design'd by the House of Commons to restrain and limit a just, necessary, and ancient Prerogative, inherent in the Crown for the Good and Safety of his Majesty's People, upon Accidents and Emergencies, which cannot be foreseen, upon the making of new Laws."

The Reader will observe, that the dispensing Power challeng'd by the Crown, is here allow'd in its full Latitude, for the Good and Safety of his Majesty's Subjects; and if always to exercis'd, would never be complain'd of. But Kings are Men; and when they happen to be bad Men, by the Abuse of this one Privilege, it would lie in their Power to unshie the Constitution.

(n) That the State of Ireland at this Time, and the Miseries already felt, and farther apprehended from this Law, might be sufficiently known and understood here, the Duke of Ormond and Council of that Kingdom laid before his Majesty the Reasons which offered themselves against a Prohibition of their Cattle, and at the same time assured him, that all Inconveniences and Miseries, which upon the late Restrinct had by the Deputy and Council been foggel'd to his Majesty, had since actually fallen upon the Kingdom; that the Progress they had made towards putting it into a Condition of subsisting of itself, without being a Burden to England, was utterly frustrated; in all Persons of all Qualities and Professions reduced to great Difficulties and Distress; the whole People discontented and reduced to Poverty and Despair, and the Army, however necessary in a time of War, impossible to be maintain'd.

The Reasons which they now urg'd (omitting such as had been represented in their former Address to the King) were, "The Union between the two Kingdoms, and that his Majesty's Subjects of Ireland were by the Laws of both Countries, natural Englishmen in all Intents and Purposes; that it was not suitable to the usual Course of Parliaments, after laying in one Session a temporary and partial Restrinct, not thought fit to be continued longer than the End of the first Session of the next Parliament, to proceed in another Session of the same to a total Prohibition of Cattle, after a Discovery of the Rain which that Restrinct had brought upon one Kingdom, and before the time of Probation, for the other was expired; that Ireland being a Country generally proper only for breeding and grazing of Cattle, these with what Commodities proceeded from them, were their chief Merchandise, and by a reasonable Estimate might be account'd nine Parts in ten of their Trade, by which they might Money and year by year; so that the Prohibition of their Cattle, and the same would reduce them to such a Condition as they were unable to subsist, or pay their Taxes, or to continue a regular Correspondence and Traffic with England, and their Youth thither to be trained up in their Universities or Inns of Court; the Wast whereof might beget the relapsing of too many of the People to Starvation, and bring the whole Kingdom to Desolation; that England had bound a tender Regard to Ireland in former Times, when Ireland was less

A. D. 1666.

But the Misunderstanding between the two Houses did not turn upon this single Point only: On the contrary, Both seem to have taken hold of every Circumstance which offer'd thro' the whole Session, to shew their Animosity to each other.

The Commons having thought proper to make good Part of the Supply by means of a Pole-Bill, in which the Lords were included, and to appoint Commissioners for putting it in Force, their Lordships, when it came before them, took the Advantage to interfere in a Money-Bill, as if in regard to their own Privileges only, and to add other Commissioners for themselves: But, fearful of the Precedent, and yet not willing the Dispute should turn on that Hinge, the Commons, at a free Conference, protested against this Amendment of the Lords, for this Reason only: "That it hath been observ'd, that in all Acts of Subsidies, and of Pole-money, the greater Number of Commissioners, the less Money hath been rais'd; for many Commissioners incurber one another, and rather procure the Ease of themselves, and their many Friends, than the Advance of the King's Service, and the public Benefit."

On the other hand, Lord Mordaunt had been accus'd by one Mr. Talour, of executing his Office of Constable of Windsor Castle in a very arbitrary and cruel Manner. The Commons preferred (6) Articles of Impeachment against him; and demanded that he might be oblig'd to quit his Seat, and remain without the Bar, while they proceeded in their Charge against him: The Lords refus'd: The Commons desired a free Conference: The Lords refus'd that likewise; alleging they might do so, in a Point of Judicature; which, according to them, belong'd only to the King and themselves: And thus a Dispute of Privilege defeated the Pursuit of Justice; whereby, at this Distance, we find ourselves unable to decide,

"let's English than at present, and had no Notion then of keeping Ireland free, for fear of abating their own Revenue."
 "the Statutes of 17 E. 2. & 24 E. 3. cap. 18. & 3 E. 4. cap. 2. allowing the free Importation of Corn and other Irish Commodities into England; and the Statute 3 E. 4. cap. 4. restraining the bringing of certain Merchandises ready wrought into England, did yet except the Manufactures of Ireland, and the small Customs laid upon their Customs for the Majesty's Revenue, was an Encouragement to traffic from Ireland; and that it was against common Right to hinder the English (as the Subjects of Ireland were) the Freedom of English Markets, nor was it a very equal Treatment to deny them a Liberty which was indulg'd to Scotland; that it would put a stop to their fetching of fine Cloths, Stuffs, Stockings, Hats, all Necessarys for wearing Apparel, Eggs, Indes and other Commodities, which they used to have from England upon the Credit and Produce of their Cattle; that it was evident, Ireland drew no Money from England by their Trade, because they had little or no English Money; all their Coins (except what was returned yearly into England for Coins) being foreign Species, and even of this they had but little, that they could pay but a few Troops of the Army at a Time, and were forced to defer the Payment of the rest, till that Pay had circulated; that the Condition of Ireland, after a long and wasting War, horrid Miseries of the People, and confused and uncertain Settlements under the Variety of Usurpations, which prevented Improvements, and hindered Men from knowing their Properties, was such as required all just and honourable Means to be used for bringing Money into the Kingdom; that Ireland was bound up, by several Statutes, made for the Good of England, from transporting Wool, Sheep, and other of their Commodities to any other Part of the World, so that if they were debarred from transporting them into England, as they could not possibly come thence at home, they must be forced to drive Trade elsewhere, and to transfer their Commerce to foreign Parts, which might occasion a Dependence of many of the People upon such Foreigners, and lessen their Dependence upon England, a Matter of dangerous Consequence to the English Interest; that it had been a long Complaint that Ireland would never be civilized, nor indeed could it be, till the Irish grew indolent; but the turning of all their Cattle upon their Hands, would necessarily make them idle, their Food would be so dear, as no Man needed to labour for it, and to his Majesty would fall the Virrow and Idleness of a whole Kingdom; that the Prohibition and Destruction of their Trade, would defeat the Intent and Benefit of a late Act for encouraging Protestant Strangers to settle in Ireland; that it would give the Common Enemy of both Kingdoms an Opportunity of working on the Dissatisfaction of the Irish, and that his Majesty's Revenue was affected by it, the said Parliament which sat in London, having, in a Series of the extreme Poverty of the Kingdom on Occasion of the Restraining upon Cattle, when they granted the four fifth of the twenty-four Subsidies which they had given since the Restoration, provided in an express Clause, that in case the Prohibition of transporting Cattle into England, was not taken off before December 25, 1666, the levying of the two last Subsidies should be respited and suspended." Life of the Duke of Queensberry, Vol. II. p. 320, 321.

NUMB. XIII.

"1. That the said Lord Mordaunt, being Constable of the Castle of Windsor, as Commander of the Garrison there, understanding that one William Talour, Esq; a loyal Person in Office in the said Castle, and possessor of certain Lodgings there, appertaining to his Offices, did intend to stand for one of the Burgesses of Windsor to serve in this present Parliament that met in 1661; some Weeks before the Election, to displace and prevent the said William Talour, as in so broke a Taylor into those of the Borough, by means of a Warrant from his Majesty, on the 17th of March, did by Soldiers forcibly eject the said William Talour, together with his big-belly'd Wife, Family and Goods out of the said Lodgings and Cattle; the rude Carriage of which Soldiers, frighted a young Child out of its Wits, whereof it died soon after. 2. On the 23d of the said Month, the said Lord Mordaunt did command William Talour to be forcibly seized upon by his Soldiers in the Prison of the Borough, out of the Precincts of the Castle, where he was a Prisoner for Debt, carried him out of the Prison to the Castle, without any Warrant, and detain'd him Prisoner eleven Hours in a cold, low Room, notwithstanding the Order of two thousand Pound Bail. 3. That the said Lord Mordaunt, during the time of Mr. Talour's Imprisonment, being told that he was the King's Servant, and had the great Seal for his Place as well as he, in high Contempt of the King's Authority, reply'd, He would dispose of his Places, and break the great Seal, and justify it when he had done. 4. That the said Lord Mordaunt, in March, 1664, by Letters and otherwise, made sundry secret Addresses to a Daughter of Mr. Talour's which the rejecting, and threatening to accuse his Lady with them, he wore a most dreadful Oath and Impræcation he would prosecute her and her Family to all Extremity. 5. That on the 23d of November 1665, Mr. Talour was by the Lord Mordaunt's Command forcibly dispos'd of certain Rooms in the Timber Yard belonging to the Castle, without the Walls, belonging to his Office of Paymaster and Surveyor of the Castle. 6. That a Warrant surreptitiously obtain'd from his Majesty, dated November 30, 1665, but not produc'd till some Months after, for restraining Mr. Talour from going out of the Castle, was directed to the said Lord Mordaunt, who, without mentioning the King's Warrant, caus'd him again forcibly to be apprehended in the Borough of Windsor, and carried to the Castle, where he was detain'd Prisoner twenty Weeks, five of which in close Durance, contrary to the King's Warrant, which only restrain'd him to the Castle. 7. That during his Imprisonment, the said Lord refused to obey a Habeas Corpus brought by Mr. Talour; and when he was serv'd with another, he gave the Messenger reproachful Language, calling him Rogue, for delivering the said Writ, and saying, That was all the Answer he would give to it. 8. That Mr. Talour, when he was enlarg'd by an Order from the King's Bench, being he should be again illegally imprison'd, did thereupon make Application to his Lordship by Friends for a Reconciliation; who answer'd, He would never be reconcil'd to him, and threatn'd to imprison him again; and if he brought another Habeas Corpus, he would imprison him again and again, and keep him Prisoner as long as he liv'd, and likewise turn him out of all his Offices. By reason of which Menace, Mr. Talour was forced to desert his Wife, Family and Employments at Windsor, and to absent himself till this present Session of Parliament. For all which high Crimes and Misdemeanors, the Commons of England demanded Justice, consign Punishment, &c.

Proceedings of the Commons, relating to the public Accounts, disagreeable to the Lords who address the King in little more by a Commission of his own.

[Lord Arling-ton's Letter to the Duke of Ormond, Decemb. 8, 1666.]

The Commons reject it.

Carte.

Ill Temper of the Seigns shew'd in the Duke of Buckingham, and Lord Ashley.

Again; agreeable to an Address of the Commons, in the Cloze of the last Session, the Accounts of the Money granted for and expended in the Service of the War, had been laid before the House, at the Beginning of this (Sept. 25): But so little Satisfaction did they give, that a Motion was made Dec. 7, and carry'd by thirty-six Voices, for a Proviso in the Pole-Bill, authorising the House to appoint Four Commissioners to audit the Accounts of all Moneys receiv'd since the Beginning of the War; that is to say, upon the two Royal Aids, Money arising by Prizes, the Three Months Assessment upon the Militia Bill, &c. But this Method proving very unacceptable at Court, another Expedient was propos'd and agreed to; which was, to bring in a separate Bill for appointing Commissioners, viz. Twelve Commons, and Six Lords, to take and examine the public Accounts. To this no reasonable Objection could be made in the House of Commons; and therefore, the Lords were prevail'd upon, out of a Regard to the Royal Dignity, to address his Majesty to issue out a Commission for that Purpose, by his own Authority.

The Consequence of which was, that the Commons, in some Heat, resolv'd, "That this Proceeding of the Lords, in going by Petition to the King for a Commission for taking the public Accounts, while there was a Bill sent up by this House, and depending before them, for taking the Accounts another Way, is unparliamentary, and of dangerous Consequence." Within two or three Days they likewise declar'd, "That, according to the right and settled Course of Parliament upon Bills, neither a Bill, nor any Part thereof, is to be communicated to his Majesty, by either House, until the Whole be agreed unto by both Houses."

They were likewise so enrag'd against the Chancellor, that they threaten'd to impeach him immediately, for putting the great Seal to the said Commission.

For all these Heats and Animosities, in the Course of which it is easy to see both Parties were alternately in the Wrong, the Lord Ashley, and Duke of Buckingham, are made particularly answerable. The First was already of the Cabinet, tho' not in the Place to which his Ambition aspir'd; and the Last had been over active in suppressing the Yorkshire Conspiracy, before spoken of; but, being disappointed of the Presidentship of the North, which he had claim'd as a Reward; from endeavouring to be servicable, he made it his Business to be troublesome; that Fear might stand him in the Stead of Favour.

Both appear to have been Men, whom it was equally dangerous to trust, or disoblige: When in Power, daring; desperate, when out; restless always. To a virtuous Court, and an upright Ministry, they could not have been formidable; to an abus'd and endanger'd People, they could but rarely be useful: For, when the Crisis of Service approach'd, the Zeal they vow'd to the Public they diverted to themselves. And yet these Men were alternately in Possession of Power and Popularity. So apt are we to sacrifice our Judgments to our Interest; and, provided we are ferv'd, so indifferent by whom! To return:

Together with the popular Cattle-Bill, the Court Pole-Bill was made ready for the Royal Assent: But the one did not pacify the Displeasure, which his Majesty had conceiv'd against the other; and which was not at all diminish'd by the little Respect which had been paid to his Message by Mr. Secretary Morrice; not to complain, but to express his Sorrow, that the Difficulty the House had met with had so long hinder'd them from perceiving the Supply. For this Message had been sent the 15th of December, and it was not till the 18th of January that they dispatch'd the Pole-Bill; which provided but for a Part of it: A Delay, which, considering the State of the Nation at that time, singly at War with three potent Enemies, no Recitment of past Miscarriages, nor scarce any Distrust of future Mismanagement, could excuse.

Full of Indignation, therefore, to be thus embarrass'd at home, at a Time when his Affairs wore such a Face of Prosperity abroad, his Majesty came to the House of Lords January 18, to give the Royal Assent to the (p) two Bills: And, in his Speech to both Houses, took occasion to animadvert, with some Bitterness, on their Conduct, and to justify his own: Depending on their Vote, he declar'd, he had anticipated his whole Revenue; and that, thro' their dilatory Proceedings, he was come to the End of his Credit. Of the Pole-Bill, he spoke slightly, as being of an uncertain Value: Left them to judge what Time he had to make the proper Preparations against three such Enemies: Declar'd that he was in any Treaty, as it seems had been given out: Protested, that he was as resolute as ever, to defend both himself and the Nation: Signify'd his Intention to put an End to the Session, the Monday Se'night after: Press'd them therefore to have all things ready by that time: Complain'd, that he had been dealt unkindly with, in a Bill which he had then pass'd (meaning the (q) Cattle-Bill) and in which they had manifested more Distrust of him than he deserv'd: Said, he did not pretend

(p) And three more, viz. For encouraging the Coinage; To continue a former Act, to prevent Theft and Rapine on the Northern Borders; and for the burying in Woollen only.

(q) To make the Irish amends for this severe Bill, the King by a Letter on March 23d, pursuant to the Advice of his Council, gave Directions, "That all Restraints upon the

"Exportation of Commodities of the Growth or Manufacture of Ireland to Foreign Parts, should be taken off; and that this should be, by a Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant and Council, notify'd to all his Subjects of that Kingdom, provided that nothing was done therein for Trade to or with the English for the Portuguese, further, or otherwise, than the Laws allow'd, nor in Prejudice to Subsequent Proceedings of Parliament.

What Effect this chiding Speech had upon the Commons no otherwise appears, than by their subsequent Transactions; which, in few Words, were the Maintenance of their Contest with the Lords, in the Affair of Lord Mordaunt; the Progress of the Bill to take and settle the public Accounts, in lieu of the Proviso design'd to be inserted in the Pole-Bill, which was nevertheless dropt (tho' we are told by Lord Arlington, in a Letter to the Earl of Sandwich, dated Feb. 7, that it might be finish'd in an Hour); a Bill to erect a Court of Judicature, for determining Differences touching Houses demolish'd by the late Fire; another, to regulate the Rebuilding of the City, which, it seems, they were of Opinion, was a Work which belong'd rather to the Legislative than the Executive Power; and another, to perfect the Supply, by an Aid of 1,236,343 l. 13 s. to be levied by Eleven Months Assessment upon Land; which, it was presum'd, would fully make up the Sum of One Million Eight hundred thousand Pounds, first voted for the Service of the Year.

King's Speech at the End of the Session.

On the very Day specify'd in the former Speech, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and having given the Royal Assent to the several Bills before him, return'd the usual Thanks for the Bill of Supply; but withal signify'd his Hopes, to have Bills of that Kind for the future in the old Style, with fewer Provisos. He then seem'd to wonder, that the Bill relating to the public Accounts was not presented to him; and, as if desirous, that, after so much Noise, the Enquiry should not be stifled, very artfully took upon himself to issue out Commissions for that Purpose. He then remark'd upon the Advance of the Season, and promis'd to make all the Preparations he could, and as fast as he could; but withal signify'd his Intention to listen to any good Overtures for an honourable Peace. His next Transition was to the unquiet Spirits of the Times: Upon which Topic he very earnestly recommended to them, to use their utmost Endeavours to remove all those false Imaginations out of the Hearts of the People, which the Malice of ill Men had infused into them: Again insisted, that the People had never so little Reason to complain; pleaded in Alleviation of the Weight of the Taxes, that the War made them necessary; declar'd, that none of the Moneys so rais'd came into his Purse; and concluded with hoping, that they should all meet again of one Mind, for his Honour, and the Good of the Kingdom.

The Lord Chancellor not attending that Day, the Parliament was then prorog'd by the Lord Privy-Seal, to the 10th of October.

Good-natur'd to a Fault, as King Charles is usually represented to be, he was not insensible of Provocations: On the contrary, his Resentments were sometimes sufficiently violent, and his Vengeance sufficiently heavy.

The more fond a Man is of his Ease, the more angry he is to be depriv'd of it. The Practices of the Duke of Buckingham upon the House of Commons had given the King more Trouble and Pain, than he had felt since he took Possession of the Throne; and to shew how sensible he was of it, he resolv'd to make him an Example.

Accordingly, on Feb. 25, he was depriv'd of all his (s) Places, and struck out of all Commissions: But as this was not sufficient to gratify the King's Indignation, one Heydon, a Creature of the Duke's, was taken up, for having confess'd to his Intimates, that, at his Grace's Instance, he had cast both his and the King's Nativity, and had been employ'd by him, together with others, to stir up the Seamen to mutiny. Being furnish'd with this Evidence, Part of which, if true, contain'd Matter of rather a ridiculous than a dangerous Nature, a Warrant was issued to a Serjeant at Arms to take the Duke himself into Custody: But his Domestic's defended his House, till he found Means to make his Escape. Of this, public Notice was given, in the Gazette of March 8; and a Proclamation was the same Day set forth, charging him

Order'd to be taken into Custody.

"the Charters of the Royal (African) East India, Turkey, or Canary Companies." His Majesty, likewise, gave leave to the State of Ireland to retaliate the Usage they had received from the Scots, who, copying after England, had, by an Act of Council, prohibited their Cattle, Corn, and Beef. Accordingly, in April, the Lord Lieutenant and Council published a Proclamation, notifying the Allowance of a free Trade to all foreign Countries, either in Peace or War with his Majesty, and prohibiting the Importation of all the Scotch Manufactures. Carver's Life of the Duke of Ormond. Vol. II. p. 344.

Mr. Carver adds, That tho' these Concessions were not granted without some Heat and strong Opposition in the Council, from those very Men who had been most zealous for the Act against the Irish Cattle, yet in the Lease which was given to the Irish to export their Commodities, even Wool, were not excepted: Hence he concludes, that, as those Men were declar'd Enemies to the Duke of Ormond, this last Article was left as a Bait to his Grace, and to make his Acting pursuant to it a Matter of the Impachment, which, at that time, they meditated against him. — But it seems if they had any such Design, his Grace had the Wisdom to avoid it.

Together with the King's Displeasur which contain'd this Expedient for the Relief of Ireland, Lord Arlington, Licen-

t, sent a Letter to his Grace the Lord Lieutenant, in which is the following Paragraph:

"Here inclined goes his Majesty's ——— to recommend the Damage that Kingdom hath sustain'd by passing of the Cattle Bill, which I do not hear any body say his Majesty to support by any Act from him: But if the Trade goes forward of bringing Cattle over, as I hear it hath succeed, the Clamour will be doubled upon us, when they do effectually so; and yet his Majesty gratifies the Kingdom, as if they did not; and because the malicious Reflections which will be made thereupon, will inevitably touch your Grace, I thought it my Duty to suggest to your Grace this Hint, for the better Consideration thereupon. Myself. Vol. II. p. 458.

(r) Both to this Bill and the next, the Earl of Down enter'd his Protest. To the first, because of the unlimited Power it gave to the Judges without Appeal; and to the last, because of the unlimited Power it gave to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to dispose of Property. The House of Commons had, however, imposed a Tax of Twelve-pence on every Chalders and Ton of Coals imported into London, to indemnify all who should be Sufferers by their Decisions.

(r) He was a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, Lord Lieutenant of York, and a Pray-Counsellor.

A. D. 1666-7. him with maintaining secret Correspondencies, tending to raise Mutinies in some of his Majesty's Forces, and stir up Sedition among his People: as likewise, summoning him to surrender himself, and commanding all Persons to be diligent in their Endeavours to apprehend him.

This was the Colour that was put on the Duke's Disgrace; and how far his Majesty's private and personal Charge against him (That he had been the Cause of the Continuance of the War; for that the Dutch would have made an early and very low Submission, if he had not spirited up the Commons to delay the Supply) is warrantable; by tracing Step by Step the Progress of the Negotiations for a Peace, we shall best be able to ascertain.

We have already mentioned his Majesty's Letter, dated August 14th to the States, demanding the Body of Sir William Berkeley, and expressing an Inclination for Peace, with their Lordships Reply; offering to renew the Negotiation upon the old Terms, at any neutral Place. October 1/2 his Majesty wrote again to the States, by their own Trumpet, but in a very haughty Style; among a variety of other Things, insisting on their sending their Deputies to London, and refusing to treat with Denmark at all; but withal assuring them, that he had accepted the Mediation of Sweden. Of this Letter the States made no public Acknowledgment till November 1/2, when they as positively declin'd all Treaty, except in Common with their Allies, France and Denmark; and unless it was carried on at some neutral Place. This last Letter was presented to his Majesty by the Swedish Embassador, who endeavour'd to qualify the Harshness of it, by declaring, that, if the States were single in the Quarrel, they should think themselves oblig'd to submit to his Majesty's Terms: But as France and Denmark were joint Parties, and crown'd Heads as well as England, they could not make a Compliment on one Side, which would be refuted on the other.

Agreeable to this Representation of the mediating Minister, their Lordships dispatch'd yet another Letter to his Britannic Majesty, on the 17th of January following, declaring, that, for themselves, they would make no Difficulty of waving all Formalities of that Nature, and were ready to treat any where, even in England, in order to perfect a Peace, upon Conditions safe and honourable: And that their Instances were made only in behalf of the two Kings their Allies, who were now become equally Principals with them in the War.

This was the Outside of Things; but this Concession did not flow so freely from the States, as may, at first Sight, be imagin'd: France believ'd she had now sufficiently establish'd her Influence in Holland, and disappointed the extensive Projects of England: Having therefore other Game in View, and growing jealous of Lord Sandwich's Negotiations at Madrid, she was become as desirous as England or Holland could be, to bring about an Accommodation; and, in order thereto, not only recommended, but in a manner exacted, this Expedient from the States, to enable the King of England to recede with Honour from his frequent Protestations to admit of no Treaty with the States, unless they would send their Deputies to London.

In order, likewise, that this Expedient might operate more effectually, Authority was given by Mr. de Ruvigny, to make use of his Correspondence with the Earl of (r) St. Albans to bring the English Court into a more favourable Disposition for Peace; and to this End such a (u) Billet was concerted as might naturally enough be expected from one Friend to another, and might as naturally make way for a Negotiation.

That the States might however, at the same time, have all imaginable Reason to depend on the Good-faith of France, this Billet was first communicated to Mr. de Wit, and received his (v) Approbation; when, likewise, the Earl of St. Albans had, on the Receipt of it, signify'd to the Queen-Mother, that the King was not against treating in a neutral Place, provided France would first come to an understanding with him, with respect to the Conditions, Monsieur

(r) Who was in the Service of the Queen-Mother: or, according to Sir John Reresby, marry'd to her. See RERESBY'S MEMOIRS, p. 5.

(u) This Billet was as follows:

A Billet Monsieur de Ruvigny may write to the Earl of St. Albans.

" If what you write the Queen is true, that you are more " difficult and nice for your Honour about the first Formalities
" than you will be in the Main, the Peace may be " made in an Instant: For you need but to accept the second " of the two Alternatives offer'd you by the Dutch,
" which is, first all things be left on one Side and Father
" in the State Heaven has put them in; and in such Case
" it would not be necessary (as you have nevertheless said
" in your Reply to the States) to know, nor discuss, when
" the War began; for if it was fifty Years, or only two " Months ago, 'twould be all one to each of the Parties " who would abide by its Loss and its Gain. It cannot be " dishonourable for you to accept the Proposal, since 'tis for " your Advantage, because you have gain'd more than you " have lost; and perhaps you don't perceive, that by rejecting
" it you seem to declare you expect greater Advantages
" in the Continuation of the War. If that be so, you " are in the right to continue it, and to impose severer
" Laws on them, as to the Conditions of the Peace, than " that of leaving Things in the State they are: But as " it would, on your part, be to treat us as if you had con-

" quer'd us, so we are not willing to be look'd on as van-
" quish'd; and it does not appear to me, that Means can " be found out to make an Assembly of Men agree to more " than has been offer'd you, may, that there is any other " Way of putting an End to the War. Do therefore, with " a good Grace, in order to Peace, a Thing whereby you'll " gain more than the Dutch: Send a Power to the Queen
" to sign this single Article, or come and sign it yourself.
" The same Power shall be sent to Monsieur Van Braunings,
" and the Minister of Denmark; and then Peace will be " made in an Instant. And after it should be ratify'd on " all Sides, it would be, perhaps, to satisfy you, on your " Niceties of Honour, for that I'll persuade the Dutch " would make no Complaint of having Embassadors to " England to settle the Terms of Trade. But as long " as you let the Cause be in his Hands, as they say, you'll " get no Ground. Can it ever be said, we don't sincerely " desire Peace; or can it be said, we don't put " us to the Way to it with our Hands, and a Way to ad" vantageous and honourable Terms to conclude it?

(v) We learn, nevertheless, from the Memoirs of Mr. d'Eftrades, That both the French and Mr. de Lionne were of Opinion, that the King of England's Desire to have the Money, which his Parliament had promised him, would induce him to defer his Answer. Mr. d'Eftrades to Mr. de Lionne, Dec. 16, 1666.

A.D. 1666-7. d' Estrades was directed by Mr. de Lionne to make the Penſionary acquainted with it; as likewise with the Anſwer return'd to the Queen Mother; which was in Effect, that the King her Son was never to hope that his moſt Chriſtian Majesty would be induc'd to force his Allies to any thing, which did not correſpond with their Intereſt or Inclination.

But, tho' the Court of France, at this time, appears to have dealt ſo openly and ingenuouſly with the States, that of England, having taken Advantage of this ſeemingly-underhand Intercourſe, to ſpread Reports in Holland and Flanders, that the moſt Chriſtian King was treating without the Participation of his Allies, a Jealouſy aroſe among the Cities, that the Republic would at laſt be ſacrific'd; which was no ſooner communicated by Mr. d' Estrades to the King his Maſter, than he endeavour'd to confute it, by not only giving the States the moſt ſolemn (x) Affurances of his Sincerity, but, as one would imagine, the moſt effectual Security for his good Behaviour.

In the mean time, his Britannic Majesty, who had been hitherto ſo determin'd to treat no where but at London, as if, all at once, entirely ſatisfy'd with the late Apology of the States for not ſubmitting to his Demands, of his own mere Motion (x) offers to treat at the Hague, where the Miniſters of the Allies then were, or might be very ſpeedily, and, upon receiving the proper Paſſports for his Embaſſadors within a reaſonable Time, declares they ſhould be upon the Spot before the End of February.

A complete Victory obtain'd by the Engliſh over the ally'd Fleet could ſcarce have given a greater Alarm to the Court of France, or to Mr. de Wit and his Party in Holland, than of great, ſudden, and unexpected an Advance; who both immediately concluded, that tho' Peace, like Oil, floated on the Surface, ſome ſharp Corroſive lurk'd at the Bottom: Or, in other Words, that it was a Maſterpiece of Policy, to divide the Dutch among themſelves, and thereby diſſolve the whole Confederacy.

To fence therefore againſt ſo dangerous a Puſh (which began to create Diſorders as ſoon as it was made, no leſs than four Provinces, and ſeveral of the Towns of Holland, immediately taking Occaſion to ſhew their Animofity to Mr. de Wit) it was neceſſary to make uſe of all the Addreſs, that both the Dutch and French Miniſters in Conjunction could furniſh out; which was manifeſted firſt in a Letter from the States to the King of England, dated February 22; wherein, having thank'd his Majesty for the Honour he intended them, and aſſur'd him, that they would uſe all their Intereſt with their Allies to get it accepted, they proceed to recommend the Choice of Maeſtricht, Boſſeduc, or Breda, as being more convenient and ſafe than the Hague; alledging for a Reaſon, that the Laſt, being an open Place, afforded no Protection to the Miniſters of the different Powers; and, conſequently, while thoſe Powers were yet at Variance with each other, left them expoſ'd to many unhappy and fatal Accidents, of which too many melancholy (y) Inſtances had already happen'd, in Deſiance of Government, and Violation of Juſtice.

This Letter from the States to his Britannic Majesty was follow'd by another from the moſt Chriſtian King to the States, dated, February 24, the very next Day after that of their Lordſhips; in which he gives it as his Opinion, that it would be very hazardous for a popular State to admit the Miniſter of

Letter from the States to his Britannic Majesty.

The moſt Chriſtian King's Letter to the States.

The King offers to treat at the Hague.

(x) This Diſpatch to Mr. d' Estrades, upon this Occaſion, was as follows:

"I have given your Diſpatch of the 16th of this Month. If I was capable of making a ſeparate Accommodation with the King of England, to the Exclusion of my Allies, I ſhould have taken care how I wrote to the States General (without any Neceſſity, ſince the Matter was not in diſpute) in the Terms I did in my laſt Letter, to give my Royal Word, and all Alliance, that they ſhould never have any thing to fear on my Side, as to that; much more ſhould I have taken care not to have enter'd into a War for the Intereſts of the ſaid States: And to excuſe myſelf, I need only have urg'd the Reaſons the King of England made uſe of, which appear'd plauſible enough to prove he was not the Aggreſſor in this War. This had been a more ſafe Courſe, is more convenient, and leſs chargeable one for me, than to ſpoil now, by an Infidelity I ſhould very much detest in another, all the Fruit of the Obligation I have acquir'd of the States on this Occaſion: And I cannot ſufficiently expreſs to you, with what Indignation I write to you any thing on this Matter; and to ſee that the laſt Note ſome wretched Giver of Advice thinks fit to write, ſhould cauſe ſuch Frights and Alarms in the United Provinces. I don't believe that the Sieur de Wit, nor the Principal of the States, do me ſo much Wrong, as to have the leaſt Apprehenſion or Jealouſy of ſuch a thing, as I do not do them to much Injury as to have my like Suſpicion of them. There's no Need of doing more, in order to Conviction of the contrary, than to conſider in what Shops thoſe ſorts of Machines are wrought to divide us, and that at Brussels or London; and, in Truth, we ſhould be very Weak to fall into ſuch Snares. As for me, I ſhall never give into them; and methinks my Circumſpection in my whole Conduſt has been even ſcrupulous to a Nicety. Nothing, in my Opinion, can be better, than the Billet I have cauſed to be written by Ruisigny to the Earl of St. Alban, to ſhew him he had no Foundation but a Propoſal made by the States General themſelves: However, I would not do it without firſt communicating it to the Sieur de Wit, and learning his Sentiments. The Sieur Van Bewincken ſaw, or might have ſeen if he would, Ruisigny's Billets to St. Alban, and the Anſwers; and he ſhall always have ſuch Liberty. Advice from England informs us, That the King of England, the Chancellor, and Arlingſton, have been often that up with St. Alban; perhaps it has been to give him Inſtructions for the Voyage he is to make; but I doubt not there was ſome Affection in it; and I Deſire that the Spaniards ſhould conceive a Jealouſy of this Conduſt, and miſtill it into the States General. That Earl ſeeming to have no Relation to any Court but this, by means of the Queen his Miſtreſs. But neither the Engliſh nor the Spaniards, know that the ſaid Sieur de Wit, and the chief of the States, had Notice given of all before-hand. In the mean while, the ſaid Earl of St. Alban being ſuddenly to be here, and the Conſurers of ſuch Machines having thereby a Proſpect of playing the like Tricks: 'tis very neceſſary the States once for all put themſelves above any ſuch Reports; and for that, I don't know what to ſay to them, after having once given them, and ſo often confirm'd, my Royal Word.

But if by engaging your Honour, and your own Life; by offering, to that End, to ſtrip yourſelf of your Character of Ambaſſador and my Miniſter, in caſe they find I ever enter into any Peace and Friendſhip with the King of England, but jointly with the States of the United Provinces, and King of Denmark, ſuch Expreſſions, and ſuch an Offer, may with the People have any further Weight beſides my Word; you may ſafely do it without running any Risk. In the mean time, if they enquire what's doing by my Order at Breſt and Rechel, they'll know I have no other Thought, but to continue the War, if a good and ſafe Peace is not to be obtain'd."

(x) January 31, O. S. (February 10. N. S.) Four Days after which the Earl of St. Alban arriv'd at Paris.

(y) Alluding, perhaps, to the barbarous Murder of Doctor Durſſaus, Miniſter from the Commonwealth of England to the States, by twelve Cavaliers, May 3, 1649.

A. D. 1666-7. of a Prince, their Enemy, as having a Tendency to create Cabals, raise Jealousies, and foment Divisions, among a People who were as liable to false Impressions as true: Declares, that this Opinion of his had no other Foundation than their own solid and essential Interest; which he look'd upon as so interwoven with his own, as to be incapable of Separation: And that he had as cordial an Affection for them, as a Father for his Children: Having then qualify'd what he had said thus far, by a personal Compliment to the Honour and Integrity of the King of Great Britain, and took Occasion to insinuate, as if in Acknowledgment of his Majesty's Condescension, that he had sent the Earl of St. Albans to Paris, with sufficient Powers to treat there, he proceeded to recommend Dover, instead of the Hague: But in a Manner so artificial, as if it was only to demonstrate, that he would not be outdone in Civility by his Britannic Majesty.

How this Letter would be relish'd at Whitehall, was very clearly foreseen by the French Cabinet; for Mr. de Lionne, writing to Mr. d'Esprades, Feb. 27. N. S. is pleas'd to say, "The King of England will have no Reason to complain of the Expressions in his Majesty's Letter to the States; and yet the Substance will touch him to the Quick." And accordingly Lord Arlington, in his Dispatch to the Earl of Sandwich, of Feb. 28. O. S. takes notice, that "the said Letter is full of so many malicious Reflections on his Majesty, that we can by no means like it. And, among them, one, a notorious Untruth, where they say, my Lord St. Albans was in that Court with a full Power to treat the Peace there. For which they give a curvy Excuse, that if they had thought of it, they would not have put it in."

As it was by this time visible to all Europe, that the French would very speedily endeavour to bring their Designs upon Flanders into Execution; and the Emperor, by the Will of the late King, had a reverberatory Right to that fine Country, his Imperial Majesty began to think it his Interest to interpose in the Quarrel of the two Maritime Powers; and, as the Dutch, by the Means of de Wit, were so inseparably attach'd to France, to throw his Weight into the Scale of England.

Emperor offers his Mediation.

To this End he sent the Baron de Isola to the Court of London, whose public Errand was to offer his Majesty's Mediation, but whose private Instructions were probably to continue the Broil; since, in that Case, France would be less at leisure to pursue her ambitious Projects, and He better assur'd of the Aid of the English to defeat them.

To this Minister, who in the Imperial Court, had the Reputation of being a most consummate Politician, and in that of France was consider'd as a downright Trickster, Mr. de Lionne, at first, ascrib'd the Nomination of the Hague for the Place of Treaty; it being, according to him, a Refinement which the English Court was incapable of. In Support of which Opinion he quotes an Information he had receiv'd of a Boast of Isola's, That, under the Pretence of waving a Point of Honour, he had given a mortal Blow to the Union between France and Holland.

But he afterwards gave Mr. d'Esprades to (2) understand that his most Christian Majesty was assured the King of England was advis'd to propose the Hague, by one of the very States in the Interest of the Prince of Orange; and that he was sensible that all was level'd at Monsieur de Wit's Credit and Authority, whom his Majesty was resolv'd to maintain to the utmost.

To whomsoever it was owing, it had certainly a marvellous Effect. All the Superficial, who are the Majority of Mankind, look'd upon it as the highest Compliment the States had ever received: And it was the Talk of the whole Seven Provinces, that the Glory of bringing three Kings to treat at the Hague, was upon no Consideration to be refus'd.

The Provinces of Holland and Friesland were not only positive for embracing it, but refus'd to furnish their Contingent of Ships, which was thirty, Sail, a Case it was reject'd. Overysel, Groningen and Gelders, were in the Point of doing the same; and it requir'd all the Art, Interest and Application of the Pensioner and Mr. d'Esprades, to stem the Torrent which threaten'd to carry all before it.

At length, however, they succeeded, and the Court of England had the Mortification to understand, that even Isola's boasted Project had fail'd.

In this Interval the Earl of St. Albans had enter'd upon his Ministry at Paris, which was founded upon the following Proposition:

The Earl of St. Albans's Negotiations at Paris.

That upon Monsieur Reugny's Letter of the twenty-fourth of November, the King his Master accepted of the Overture contain'd in it; that is, that all things should continue in the same Condition the Fortune of the War had left them; that the States should observe the Treaty of 1654, and that they should send their Embassadors into England to regulate and settle the Trade; with this Proviso, however, and not otherwise, that the King should restore every thing in America to the same Condition it was in before the War; meaning that his Majesty must yield up to the English the Island of St. Christophers, and the three other Islands his Forces had depriv'd them of.

This

(2) In the same Dispatch, he adds the following stockish Paragraph:

A Man, who understands the English (Court) perfectly well, and knows what they are capable of doing, told me this Morning, that in case their Embassadors were admitted to the Hague, Monsieur de Wit's Person would be in Danger: As he is seldom upon his Guard, I'm of Opinion 'tis a thing not unlikely; for the English may sensible such an Action would shock the State, so that they might make themselves Masters, by the Interest of those who are of the Prince of Orange's Party; in the Reason, I am of Opinion, that if Breeds of Dissolut should be shown, 'tis not late for Monsieur de Wit to go thither, and should the English prefer either of those Towns to Dover, that would increase my Suspensions.

This was first communicated to the Queen Mother, who took upon her to answer for the Sincerity of the French Court, as to their Intentions concerning a Peace: But as the Demand relating to St. Christophers was wholly new, would not venture to say any thing decisive upon it. (a) Mr. Ruvigny was, therefore, sent for, and made acquainted with it, in order, by his Means, to clear the way, and open the Negotiation: For unless this Demand was admitted, the Earl was to assume no Character, but to remain at Paris merely as a Servant of her Majesty's.

Accordingly Mr. Ruvigny, having receiv'd his Commission, which was to deliver all he had to say in his own Name only, went to Court, was fully heard, return'd back the next Day with Difficulties and Queries of several sorts; which being as well answer'd as the Earl's Instructions would allow, his Lordship was surpris'd on the Morrow with a familiar Visit from Mr. de Lionne; who immediately began to expatiate upon the Inequality of the Demand of the Restitution of St. Christophers, when, in order to make up with Holland, England was willing to leave all things in the Condition the Fortune of War had plac'd them; and concluded with a Declaration, that it was what the King could never comply with. To this the Earl reply'd, That he was sorry to find this was the Disposition of the French Court; for if it did not change, his Commission was at an end; nothing being more certain, than that the King his Master, insisted on having all which had been taken in America restor'd. De Lionne then very artfully hinted, That the Friendship of England might be a great Inducement either one way or the other: But that possibly while his most Christian Majesty descended to do what could not be reasonably ask'd of him, England might enter into Alliances opposite to the Interest of France. The Earl innocently answer'd, He did not very well understand him, but if he refer'd to the Treaty of Madrid, he could assure him nothing was as yet concluded. De Lionne then ask'd, if he could assure him likewise that nothing would? And, the Earl not caring to go far, proceeded to acknowledge very frankly, that they would not part with such Acquisitions for nothing; but upon Assurances of the King of England's Friendship, they would make no Difficulty. St. Albans, then said, That if by the King's Friendship, he meant a Conjunction against the House of Austria, he would find him in no Disposition to grant it; but if without that Consequence, he would find Inclinations as favourable as he could desire. And now, having brought the Conference to the very Point he aim'd at from the Beginning, and seeming to lay aside all Reserve, de Lionne gave his Lordship to understand, That, as a Fundamental, they desired to be attach'd to Eng- land by the closest Ties, which the common Interest of both Kingdoms now render'd necessary: That they were then ready to enter upon that desirable Work; but as it required time to bring it to Perfection, they would content themselves, for the present, with a mutual Promise, or Engagement, not to contract, during the Space of a Year, any League, with any Prince, State, or Potentate, contrary to the Interest of each other.

The rest of the Conference was employ'd in adjusting the Exchange of the Ratifications of which Mr. de Lionne drew up three several Forms to be submitted to the Choice of the King of England; all being alike indifferent to France, and all having one essential, and indispensibly-necessary Article for their Basis, Viz. That whatever was transacted, should be in Concert with France, Denmark and the States, and that Powers should be given accordingly.

It ought here to be remember'd, that in Lord St. Albans's Instructions, no Mention was made of Denmark; a Neglect, which, no doubt, was wilful; tho', perhaps, not merely, to throw an additional Affront on his Danish Majesty; but either to gain time, while all possible Endeavours were continued, to oblige Mr. de Wit to admit of the Hague as the Place of Treaty, or till the several Instances of the Imperial, Spanish, and Swedish Ministers, which were all employ'd upon that Occasion, should obtain a Suspension of Arms.

But France and Holland were equally resolv'd never to yield to either of these Points. The first, they openly refus'd; to the last they artfully denurr'd. Thus, Mr. de Wit, when apply'd to on that Head, by Don Estevan de Gamarra, and Mr. Friquet, insidiously, gave them Reason to hope, that the States would agree to it; on the Presumption, that the English Court would easily believe what they wish'd; and in Consequence neglect the fitting out their Fleet, in order to save their Money. And Mr. de Lionne, who very well knew what was doing at the Hague, declar'd at Paris, that his most Christian Majesty would make no Difficulty to agree to a Cessation, provided the States would do the same.

In the mean time, Lord St. Albans took care to dispatch an Express to England with a Detail of all the Particulars already recount'd; and tho' they were accompany'd with no other positive Engagement on the Part of France for the Restitution of what had been taken in America, and the consenting to every thing besides insisted on in the said Earl's Instructions, than was contain'd in a Postscript of his Excellency's Letter; signifying, that such a Resolution had been taken in the French Council, at which Mr. Ruvigny assist'd, they met with such a Reception as immediately produced the following (b) Letter, writ with the King's own Hand, to the Queen-Mother.

“ If

(a) It is fit the Reader should know, that Mr. d'Esperdes was not let into this Secret at first; and accordingly a very different Account of this Affair is to be found in a Letter to him from Mr. de Lionne, dated Feb. 18, 1687.

(b) Here I cannot help expressing my Surprise, that neither this Letter, nor the previous Conference between de Lionne and St. Albans's, nor many other Particulars which flow'd from it, have been ever mentioned either by Rapin, or any of our own Historians.

A Suspension of Arms demanded in behalf of England.

Faults given by de Wit.

A.D. 1666-7.

King's Letter to the Queen-Mother.

" If I do understand the Proposition made to me by my Lord St. Albans, as the Foundation upon which the Peace must be made, the Answer and Declaration I now send your Majesty will be satisfactory, and such as is expected.

I must first tell your Majesty, that I expect every Day to hear that my Lord Sandwich hath sign'd the Treaty at Madrid; which is only a Treaty of Commerce, and not, in the least degree, with Prejudice to France, from which I restrain'd him, against all Temptations.

And I do hereby declare and promise, on the Word of a King, that I yet have not, nor will, for the Space of a Year to come, enter into any Treaty, or make any new Tye with any Prince or Potentate, that may be contrary, or in which I will be engaged against the Interest of France.

And in that time I shall be willing to enter into such a Treaty with France, as may produce a Union, that may prove most advantageous and beneficial for all our Dominions. And I am sure your Majesty will pass your Word, that I will not fail in any thing I propose."

This sudden, and seemingly sincere, Disposition in the two Courts to embrace each others Offers thus readily and cheerfully, as we are told in a Letter from the Earl of Arlington, dated Feb. 28, 1667, to Lord Sandwich at Madrid, arose from the following Circumstances: France had taken a Resolution to break with Spain, and seize on Flanders; but was apprehensive, that the Jealousy of Holland would induce her, thereupon, to clap up a Peace at any rate with England; and that both those Powers together would then unite with Spain, and make the Defence of the Netherlands a common Cause. On the other hand, France being so powerfully arm'd, England thought it advisable, not to make the Quarrel desperate, for fear she should strike up a Compromise with Spain, and fall with all her Forces upon her.

No doubt there is something of Truth in this: But it doth not seem to contain the whole Truth. His Majesty had received some Trouble in the last Session, apprehended more in the next, and was bent to punish the Duke of Buckingham, who was the Author of it. It is probable, therefore, he was desirous to be at Peace abroad, in order to render himself Master at home: And it is remarkable, that those violent Steps before-mention'd were taken against his Grace, immediately after the Earl of St. Albans had sent over the Proposal, which his Majesty so soon and so cordially accepted.

It is moreover manifest, that our whole Court-System took a new Bias from this Project of a Reunion with France: For the very Letter of Lord Arlington's, just quoted, acknowledges, that the State of the Negotiation at Madrid was very well understood by our Cabinet; as also what retarded its Progress: And that it lay upon them to furnish his Excellency with new Directions how to proceed: But, withal, gives him to understand, that the Prospect of a Peace with Holland, by the Concurrence of France, had so alter'd the Face of Affairs, that they could not think it fell out very unhappily for them, to be so naturally and unaffectedly brought into such a Delay; advises, that it was now become his Excellency's Business to improve it, by expostulating on the ill Consequences of pressing so hard in the Point of Portugal, who might be thrown thereby irrecoverably into the Arms of France; and by keeping to his own former Resolution of dividing the Treaty into two Parts; of which, the commercial he was empower'd to sign readily and positively; the other, conditionally, that the Portuguese would accept of it, but without obliging his Majesty to abandon them.

But while the Good-will of France became the Sheet-anchor of England, that active and politic Court was making its Efforts, as well as extending its Views, on all Sides: Having, by the Contract with the Earl of St. Albans, deprived Spain of all Assistance from hence, their next Endeavour was to make sure of Portugal; which, with their usual Address, they speedily and effectually (c) accomplish'd.

It might now be presum'd, that, as France and England were in so fair a Way of being once

(c) Of this Proceeding Sir Robert Southwell the English Minister at Lisbon, gave the following Account to the Earl of Sandwich at Madrid, the very Day the Treaty was sign'd: Lisbon, March 31, S.N. 67.

May it please your Excellency,
" On the 25th Instant, being Friday, I writ unto your " Excellency, and therein declared how far this Court ap" peared to be from the Conclusion of their League with " France. And it is most certain, that the Comte de Castell
" Mellor, between a constant Belief that Spain would at " length yield the Title, and some Dissatisfaction he had " received from the French Side, he very lately manifested " rather an Aversion, than any Desire for it. But, having on " a sudden quite chang'd his Resolution, there was called " a full Council of the 24th Instant, where it was order'd
" that a League should be concluded with France, and that
" the Marquis Marisouan, the Marquis de Noifet, the Mar- " quis Goveat, the Marquis de Saude and the Comte de Castell
" Mellor should be the Commissioners to treat thereof.
" Which they the next Day accordingly did, and so on " the Saturday, in which time, they having before them
" the Proposals of Monsieur St. Remain, and only once his " Company, all the Articles were agreed unto, and pre" sently deliver'd to be put into Form, and so translat" ed into Latin.

" The Business was carried so private until Sunday, that " one of the Commissioners told me, I knew nothing of it.
" But then I presently drew a Memorial, and, attending the " Comde next Day, I press'd him to suspend the concluding " of this Treaty for a time; or at least that some such Ar" ticle of Reservation might be made therein, as that the " Peace from Spain might be accepted, whenever his Ma" jesty's Meditation could procure it. Less than which his " Majesty could not expect, considering his Labours past,
" and yet continuing, and the great Peril he had for this " End expos'd his Own Affairs unto.
" But, finding the Comde irresistibly bent upon the thing,
" I desired of him a Passport, that I might by an Express " acquaint your Excellency of these Proceedings. But he
" answer'd me very short, that if I hoped thereby to in" cline the Spaniards to any thing, the Treaty would be in " vain, for that they here had been already too long de-
" lay'd, and abused by them, and that now they were con-
" strained to the thing, it should have a very short Illus-
" however, that he would present my Memorial to his Ma" jesty the next Day, and procure me an Answer: But as " yet I have not received any, altho' the Articles were thus
" Day interchangeably sign'd." The Treaty it to be found " in St. Albans's Memoirs.

once more embark'd in the same Bottom, the Peace was in a manner at hand; and that, on the very Spot where it was first entered upon, it would be finish'd: But vast Machines, tho' not easily put in Motion, are easily stop'd. The Assertion in the most Christian King's Letter to the States, That his Britannic Majesty had sent the Earl of St. Albans to Paris with full Powers to treat there, had given his Excellency the utmost Uneasiness: He complain'd to Mr. de Lionne, that it even endanger'd his Head, as it argued he had departed from his Instructions: The Queen-Mother espous'd his Quarrel; and those about her interpreted the whole Clause, as a Diminution of her own Honour, and a Reflection upon the King her Son; as insinuating, that he had been to mean as to solicit a Peace from the Court of France. This Ruffle took up four or five Days to compose; and, in the mean while, a very essential Difference arose between the Earl and Mr. Van Beuninghen, about the Island of Poleiron; the First alledging, that it belong'd to England, in virtue of several former Treaties, which were now to be renew'd and confirm'd; and the Last insinuating, that this Claim was a Departure from the very Foundation of the present, which provided, That all things should remain as they were. The French Ministers were alarm'd at this new Difficulty; and, upon a private Application to St. Albans, finding that the King his Master could not drop his Pretensions, without exasperating the whole English Nation, they next undertook to soften Mr. de Wit, alledging, as he had done before to them, in the Case of St. Christophers, that it would be inexcusable to hinder the Conclusion of a Peace, for the Sake of a desolate Island, which they themselves had purposely ruin'd.

Earl of St. Albans complains of a Clause in the most Christian King's Letter to the States.

A Difference arising between the English and Dutch Ministers, about the Isle of Poleiron; de Wit resolves to resign it.

But Mr. de Wit was inexorable: He urg'd, the Island had been already surrender'd; that it had been retaken during the War; and that the States would expend the last Penny, and hazard the last Drop of Blood, rather than resign it. He was in truth violently bent to carry on the War, at least for one Summer more: He had made great Preparations, form'd great Designs, and saw great Opportunities, which he was resolv'd to improve, of doing Honour to himself, and Mischief to his Enemies.

This Obstinacy on both Sides, of course excited such Difficulties and Delays, as made it absolutely necessary to remove the Treaty from Paris to some neutral Place, according to the original Plan. The King of England was complimented with the Choice; and, at the Instance of Monsieur, the Queen-Mother was prevail'd upon to overlook the Affront she had before complain'd of, and once more put her Hand to forward this great Work.

In a Word, the King, who was now weary of a War, which was not like to answer the Ends for which it was begun, thought it advisable, or found it necessary, to chuse Breda, of which, to the infinite Surprize, Perplexity, and Disappointment of d'Isola, he sent Notice to the States, March 18, and demanded Passports for his Embassadors, Lord Holles and Mr. Henry Coventry; which, immediately after, they granted, and dispatch'd accordingly.

On the very Day, May 5, N. S. that the States sent their Compliments to these Gentlemen, declaring, at the same time, their cordial Disposition towards a Peace, they sign'd the Agreement with France, for the Junction of the Fleets of both Nations; and, while they affected to accommodate Matters at Breda, redoubled their Efforts to carry on the War with more Eagerness and Animosity than ever.

Of this the Court of England could not be unappris'd: But King Charles and King Lewis being now sworn Brothers again, they ridiculously trusted to the good Offices of France to divert the Storm, instead of resolving to meet it mid-way, and thereby manifesting, that they were equally prepar'd to be Friends or Foes.

It must indeed be acknowledg'd, that his most Christian Majesty, when press'd by Van Beuninghen to hasten the sailing of his Fleet, in order to the intended Junction, advis'd the deferring it for some time, for fear of either provoking the English, or rendering them desperate; and that Mr. d'Estades, when he found (d) de Wit more dispos'd to fight than treat, and resolute to put to Sea, whether assist'd by the French or no, actually dealt underhand with the chief of the Admiralty there, to delay the victualling of Admiral de Ruyter's Ship, and seven more First-rates, then in their Harbour, till the End of May; which would make it impossible for all their Squadrons to assemble in the Texel, sooner than the 10th of June; in hope, by that time, the Treaty would be in a manner finish'd. And, with respect to the sailing of the Dutch Fleet, the Event was answerable; for de Ruyter did not make for the Texel till the 29th of May; and it was not Junction of French and Dutch Fleets concerted.

Mr. d'Estades influences the Admiralty of Rotterdam to retard the sailing of the Dutch.

[d] 'Twill be very difficult to make them [the States] sensible (says Mr. d'Estades) of what your Majesty has so rightly judg'd, that it is very improper to run the Hazard of an Engagement, at a time when we are in a fair way of obtaining a Peace; for which Reason, instead of trusting to Uncertainties, the Fleets ought to continue in their Harbours, till we see what our Negotiations are likely to produce: But both the Sieur de Wit and the States are deaf to this way of arguing, and are firmly of Opinion, that it is better to conclude the Peace with our Swords in our Hands, than our Enemies may see we are in a Capacity of renewing the War, in case they don't think fit to agree to reasonable Terms. 'Twill be to no Purpose to repeat to your Majesty what I have urg'd upon this Subject, since I have omitted nothing I thought proper to convince them, which I have still found impossible to be done. All the Hopes I have, are, That contrary to their Opinion the Peace may be sign'd before 'tis possible for the Fleets to put to Sea, provided your Majesty can prevail with the King of England to have the Treaty of Commerce concluded with the States at London; because I am very well assur'd, Monsieur de Wit proposes, by the help of some Points in that Treaty, to lengthen out the Negotiation to the End of the Summer, since there are some Matters in it that will require a long Discussion, and will unavoidably keep us backward a great while.

not till the 15th of June, that he made his Entrance into the Mouth of the Thames.

But, tho' so much Time was thus artificially gain'd, the intended Use was not made of it by our Ministers at Breda: Which was owing to a very extraordinary Measure now taken by the French Court, and which we are, in this Place, to explain.

Inferiority of France.

As the Councils of France were never more vigorous than at this Crisis, they were never less sincere. They had concerted a (c) Junction of the two Fleets; which they never in earnest intended to execute: They had flatter'd England with the Hopes of a Suspension of Arms; which they expressly advis'd the Dutch never to agree to: Tho' professing to conceal nothing from the States; they had made a Secret of the fundamental Article of Lord St. Albans's Negotiation: And tho' they had, in the most solemn Manner, declar'd, they would make no Attempt on Flanders, without giving previous Notice to the States; they gave Notice of this Design, and in Effect put it in Execution, at the same time: For, tho' the most Christian King's Memorial is dated (f) May 9, it was address'd Teresa Christina King's underhand Plan.

(e) It is true, in a Letter from the most Christian King to Mr. d'Estrades, dated June 8, there are the following Particulars:

"All that I have further to say, relates to my Fleets going out, for which they have there so earnestly press'd you, and upon which the Sieur Van Beuningen is not here silent. You may thereon positively assure the Sieur de Wit, and give my Promise, and the Word of a King, that I have no Communication with the King of England: for it seems he has some Distrust of it, and that it was that which made me keep my Fleet at this time in Port. But you may tell him, I have sent Orders to the Duke of Beaufort to be ready to sail when I shall command him, and that indeed my Intention is, he shall immediately join the States Fleet, which I shall do when I discover that the English do not take right Steps in the Negotiation of Peace."

But this Text, plain as it is, cannot be so well understood as with the following Comment, which is taken from Mr. d'Estrades's Answer of June 21.

"We are but too much suspected already, and Mr. Fan Beuningen's Advices and all those they receive from other Hands, have so perswaded them of your Majesty's taking Measures with the English, that 'tis not possible to efface this Impression out of their Minds."

"There will remain no Room for them to doubt it, when they find your Majesty's Fleet does not join theirs. As to this, Sir, with Monsieur Fan Beuningen could not penetrate into any thing where he is; because the French Squadron nor being yet join'd, the States Fleet is still also on the Coast of Zealand: so that the Case of the Junction will not soon happen, and by this Means we shall avoid telling them the Contents of your Majesty's Dispatch. For if we make that Junction depend on the Proceedings of the English Embassadors, the States Plenipotentiaries would be sure to oppose us, by alleging, That your Majesty having understood that all Pretensions should be extinguish'd on both Sides, and Monsieur Fan Beuningen having acquainted them Monsieur de Lieuss had assur'd him of it, the said Embassadors did not do fair, to insist on the restoring the Demands of the English, and abolishing those of the United Provinces."

(f) Which was to this Effect:
From the most Christian King to the States General, May 9, 1667.

"Most dear high Friends, Allies and Confederates: By a Messenger which we have sent Express to the Count d'Estrades, our Embassador Extraordinary at the Hague, we have commended him to acquaint you in our Name, as our very good Friends and Allies, with our Resolution of having a Recourse to Arms, which our Honour and Interest, after a long and open Denial of Justice, have at length oblig'd us to in Vindication of the Rights of our dearly beloved Consort the Queen, and our most dear Son the Dauphin. To this end we have appointed our said Embassador to communicate to you a Writing we have ordered to be compiled, and published, that all Christendom may see the Reasonableness of our Pretensions, together with the Copy of a Letter we have this Day written to our most dear Sister the Queen of Spain. You will observe in the first Piece the Equity of our Conduct, and that without an Intention of breaking the Peace, or claiming what belongs to another, our Desire is only to secure our selves from Oppression, either by the Force of Arms, or by a reasonable Accommodation, to which they shall always find us well dispos'd. Referring ourself for further Particulars to our said Embassador, we pray God, &c."

Dated at St. Germain, May 9, 1667.

On the very same Day his most Christian Majesty address'd the following Letter to the Queen of Spain:
"Most high, most excellent, and most potent Princess, our very dear and beloved Sister: The sincere Desire we have always had to procure, and preserve the publick Tranquillity, of which the Treasuries of Hispallia and the Pyrenees are sufficient Demonstrations to the whole World, oblig'd us yet farther, towards the Close of the Year 1665, in a very earnest Instance, which, however, met not with a due Reception at Madrid, so to provide, that nothing for the future should be able to destroy that good Understanding and Amity, that had been so happily established between the two Crowns, and even cemented by our august Marriage.

'Twas by these Motives the late Queen, our ever honour'd Lady and Mother, did at our Request charge the Marquis de Franca to write in her Behalf to your Majesty, that being fully informed of the Queen our dearest Consort's Pretensions to several Dominions in the Low Countries, and having found the same solid, just, and incontestible, far excellently conjur'd your Majesty, by the tender Affection he had for you, to suffer yourself to be informed of the Equity of the said Pretensions, and take a particular Cognizance thereof; to the end that being equally sensible of the Justice of them, your Goodness might, in the End, incline you to give us Satisfaction by some reasonable Accommodation, that might root out all Grounds of a Misunderstanding between our two Monarchies. She was so fully acquainted with our Sentiments, as to be able to answer for us, that we would be very reasonable in our Demands; and finding herself near her End, next to her own Satisfaction, the desir'd nothing in this World more earnestly than the Satisfaction of having been a Means of establishing between our two Houses that Unity and Affection, which the fore-said would be weaken'd by these Disputes. These Particulars cannot have escap'd your Majesty's Memory, nor can the Ministers of Spain forget the Answer they oblig'd your Majesty to return, by contrary to her late Majesty's Affection and Piety, and so remote without doubt to your own Inclinations for the publick Tranquillity. Your Majesty's Answer was, That you would in no manner, nor upon any Consideration whatsoever, enter upon a Discussion of that Affair, nor treat or agree upon any thing relating to those Claims, which you said you knew had no Foundation; and immediately thereupon your Majesty sent your Orders to the Government in Flanders, to require the Oath of Fidelity from the States of the Country, and all the People in general, which 'till then had been omitted ever since the Decesse of the late King our Father-in-law. This your Majesty's absolute Denial of doing as Justice, and your Resolution of securing to your Majesty, by an Oath of Fidelity, a People that are effectually our Subjects in Claim of the Queen our Consort, having reduc'd us unwillingly to the indispensable Necessity of either being wanting to our own Honour, to ourself, to the Queen, and our Son the Dauphin, or of endeavoring to right ourself by the Force of Arms, we have chosen that Part to which common Honour and Justice have directed us, and by this Course which we have dispatch'd Express to the Archbishop of Salamanca, our Embassador at Madrid, we have appointed him the said Embassador to acquaint your Majesty with the Resolutions we have taken of marching in Person towards the End of this Month at the Head of our Army, to endeavour to put ourself in Possession of what belongs to us in the Low Countries in Right of our Wife, or of an Equivalent thereto; and at the same time to present to your Majesty a Writing we have had prepar'd, declaring the Validity of our Demands, and effectually answering the frivolous Objections contain'd in some Libels published by the Governor of Flanders. In the mean time, we hope much from your Majesty's Equity, and that as soon as you shall have read and examined the said Writing, you will highly condemn those that advised your Majesty to refuse and oppose a Demand so evident and reasonable, and that your Majesty will be easily perswaded to accept of those Means we have offer'd to you, and do now offer, in order to put an end to the present Dispute by an amicable Agreement. In this Case your Majesty may be assur'd of two Things; the first is, That we will insist upon nothing but what is just and reasonable, when compar'd to the Quality and Importance of our Claims; and secondly, That should our Arms have the Success we may reasonably promise ourself from the Justice of our Cause, our Intention is not to seize on more than what of Right belongs to us, or may be thought an Equivalent to it, whatsoever we can obtain it; and that dress'd to Mr. d'Esprades at Breda, and was not communicated till the 16th; and on the 25th his Majesty set forward from Amiens, upon his Expedition into Brabant.

Tho' the Dutch had long expected and fear'd this Event, they were astonish'd when it took place: Even the Penſionary expostulated warmly with Mr. d'Esprades upon it; the States avow'd their Surprise; the Partizans of France could not open their Mouths in Vindication of it; and the whole Republic concluded, that where the Ties of Blood had no Hold, those of Friendship would last no longer than Convenience lent them Force and Efficacy.

As to the rest of the Dominions of our most dearly beloved Brother the King of Spain, having first receiv'd or fear'd what is justly due to us, we shall be always ready to protect and secure them to himself, and his Posterity, which we pray may be numberless, and without end; and we shall moreover most religiously observe the Peace, as we shou'd the Marquis de Fuentes at his Audience of Leave, having no Design on our Part of infringing it by our marching into the Low Countries in the Head of our Army, which is intended only to put us in Possession of what belongs to us of Right. We pray God, most high and mighty, &c."

The Queen of Spain's Answer, dated at Madrid the 21st of May 1667.

"Most high, most excellent, and most potent Prince, our most dear good Brother; the Archbishop of Ambrus, your Majesty's Ambassador at this Court, has deliver'd me your Majesty's Letter of the 9th Current, accompanied with a Book and a Writing of yours representing largely the Motives that induced your Majesty to take up Arms, by virtue of the Rights which are said to belong to you upon the Provinces of the Low Countries; as to which, you will be satisfi'd more particularly, Before the mean time, I have not been willing to defer answering the aforementioned Letter, which has caus'd in me a great Admiration by the Novelty of such a Design: And tho' your Majesty intimates that the most Christian Queen my Sister, (who is in Glory) acquainted the Marquis de la Fuentes with it; and I well remember that he wrote to me upon this Affair, I always believed that it was nothing but domestic Discourse, and in Confidence, since this was not done with the Formalities of an Ambassador, or of your Majesty's Minister, or in your Royal Name: and I am so much the more confirm'd in the Truth of this, because having answered the Marquis a small Part of the many Things I was able to say, no more was said of it; and the being silent after it, must be become Information had been given of the Right of the King, my Son, and 'twas plainly acknowledg'd. Besides that this Intimation was not made at all with the requisite Formalities by the Articles of Peace, in order to prevent the Rupture, principally having regard to what is certain was stipulated in the 9th Article of the Pyrennean Treaty. That Demands of this Nature, tho' they had not been remou'd, ought not to be prosecuted by Arms, but by an amicable Way and Course of Justice: And since your Majesty says now that you are ready to make an amicable Accommodation, I agree to it also most willingly, being, as I am, dispos'd to enter into a Conference upon the said Rights; and that they examine the Justice of them, or the Means of Agreement; to effect which, we will receive Persons and a Place of Meeting; but it is nevertheless necessary that in the Interim, both Parties should forbear all manner of Ways of Hostility and Arms, hoping that your Majesty will be satisfi'd with this Offer, since, if it shall not be found convenient, I am oblig'd in Confidence, and by the Royal Office of Guardianship of the King, my Son, to defend his lawful Right by the same Ways.

On the 14th the Marquis de Capel Rodrigo, had published the following Manifesto, which he fully expresses the Conduct of France at this Time, that it would be inexcusable to omit it.

"The Informations we have received from all Parts so confidently assuring us, That the great Preparations your Majesty is now making, are intended against these Countries, that it is now no longer made a Doubt: And there appearing to the World no just Reasons, why your Majesty should violate a Peace, in which the Crown of Spain was content to sit down with Proſperity, leaving the Advantages of it to your Majesty; its principal Aim being only to restore Peace to Christendom, and put an End to a War, which had involv'd the poor and innocent Subjects of each Party in so much Misery and Ruin; and being desirous to prevent a Relapse into a greater, in which all Europe will have a Share, should the Rupture rather be founded upon Will than

But what gave this Alarm to Holland seems to have excited no Uneasiness in England; on the contrary, it was here esteem'd the most favourable Circumstance which could have happen'd. The Dutch, which now imagin'd, would entertain such a Dread of France, especially as they had Reason to apprehend some Trouble from Sweden at this Juncture, and find it so necessary to be well with us, that we thought ourselves in a manner sure of a Peace, upon our own Terms. This induced us to rise in our Demands; at least, to persist in that of Pohron, which we ourselves had (g) wav'd at Paris, and which had been always for peremptorily refus'd by the Court of England takes the Advantage a Stand upon higher Terms with the States:

Reason. I have thought it an Incumbency both upon my Place and Duty, to present to your Majesty the Scandal that will be given to all the World, when they shall see your Majesty engaged against a Brother of only six Years of Age; and against a Regency subordinated to the Laws of a Tyrant, without any Form of Justice, or Observance of the Rule of first demanding Satisfaction. If your Majesty hath any Pretension or Dissatisfaction, Reason and Justice require your Majesty should first declare and justify them, not only in particular to the Parties interested, but also to the neighbouring Princes, to the Countries in Dispute, and to your Majesty's own Subjects; since by the Law of Nature, nothing can be exacted or forcibly taken away from one's own Subjects or Slaves, much less from one that is wholly innocent, where the Government is ty'd up by a Regency, to the Prejudice of the Subjects of both Parties, and of the Roman Empire, by virtue of whose Laws, and without whose Knowledge, to noble a Member as the Circle of Burgundy, cannot be taken away. This Proceeding violates the Peace of Maaſtricht, by which (as also by our Peace which was since concluded) it was capitulated, that, in Case of a Rupture, the Parties concern'd should have six Months Notice of it, and infringes the Peace of our Neighbours, whose Commitments will oblige them to Interest themselves in a Common Danger. Besides this, your Majesty was pleas'd to tell the Marquis de la Fuentes, at his Audience of Conſe, that he was a Witness with what Earnestness you intended to preserve the good Correspondency and Peace between both Crowns; and that he should in your Majesty's Name, assure the Queen my Mistress, that you would continue it in the same manner, and with the same Good-will; giving likewise your Ambassador at Madrid the very same Charge.

I leave it, Sir, to the Consideration of your Majesty, how remote it will be from the Justice, Christianity and Generosity of your Majesty, to attempt an Invasion without any of those Formalities and Interpositions, which all Christian Princes have always observed: that to your Majesty, as the most Christian, may not introduce an Example, which, as it is contrary to all former ones, so it may prove prejudicial to yourself, and your Posterity.

I do not desire your Majesty to prejudice your own Rights, (if any such you have) only that you would declare them, if you pursue them; nor that you should suspend the Use of Force, if Satisfaction be deny'd you; but that before you begin your March, or any Hostility, which may render an Accommodation impossible, you would prevent the Mischief that may ensue upon it to all Christendom, by giving place to a Negotiation. I am firmly perswaded, that the Queen my Mistress, will give your Majesty all reasonable Satisfaction; and that she will not refuse to refer the Cause, wherein both Parties are interested, to the Cognizance, Mediation, and even the Decision of any of those, that may be concern'd in the Mischief the Rupture will occasion; obliging myself, (as soon as I know the Cause and Pretensions of your Majesty) to give account of it to the Queen my Mistress, who, I doubt not (to let the World see her good Intention, and the Justice of her Proceedings) will not refuse to refer herself to the Judgment not of one Country only, but of the whole World, and in particular, of all the Princes of the Sacred Roman Empire, of the Crown of England (supposing that your Majesty is very near a Peace with it) and of the United Provinces our Neighbours; to the end, that their joint Pleinpotentiaries may see the Reasons, and justify those that have Reason on their Side, before any Advance be made by the Force of Arms; considering there is nothing that so far preſseth you, nor any Danger in Suspension that should be preferred before the Common Interest; by which each Party may justify to the World the Events which may happen.

(g) "The Earl of St. Albans came Yesterday, to assure the King, in his Master's Name, that the life of Polignac should be no Obstruction to the Peace's desire, however, that we would do all we could to obtain a Reſtitution, or an Equivalent." Memorial from the King to Mr. d'Esprades, of May 9.

the States; and to renew the old Claim, relating to the Ships Bonaventure and Goodhope. For these Reasons, it was in vain that the French Plenipotentiaries, d'Esbrades and Coartín, us'd the most pressing Instances with those of England to hasten the Conclusion of the Peace, and offer'd to retard the sailing of the Dutch Fleet a whole Month, upon that Condition. Mr. Coventry had repeated Orders from the (b) Chancellor, not to recede. Both he and his Colleague, being ty'd up by these Orders, would listen to no other Terms; and expected to obtain by Treaty, what their Master was not in a Condition to exact by the Sword.

But fatally deceive themselves.

One Mistake in Fundamentals produces a Thousand more. The Resentment of the States against England was, at this time, infinitely stronger than their Fear of France; they suspended their Concern for Flanders till To-morrow, but they resolv'd to be aveng'd To-day. In short, de Wit, who was now at the (i) Height of his Power and Credit, made the Humbling of his own peculiar Enemies his first, if not his sole Concern; inasmuch, that when Don Estevan de Gamarra, by Orders from the Marquis de Castell Rodrigo press'd him to have a due Sense of the instant and imminent Danger to which Flanders was expos'd, from the affecting Consideration, that the Republic would be swallow'd next; and would have persuaded him to assist them but with 6000 Foot and 2000 Horse; for the Payment of whom, a Fund was already provided at Antwerp; he was so far from complying, that he answer'd, It would be Prudence in the Emperor and King of Spain to prevent the Storm which threaten'd them, by giving a due Satisfaction to the most Christian King; that both he and his Masters were in the Interests of his Majesty, and consequently, had nothing to apprehend from his Arms, which, he was thoroughly convinced, would not be directed to the Prejudice of the Republic.

With these Thoughts, and in this Disposition, as if careless and fearless of what might happen by Land, the Peninsular apply'd all his Powers and Faculties to the fitting out the Fleet, and the making use of the present favourable Opportunity to give the Law by Sea: Such being his extreme Ardour and Impatience to bring this favourite Project of his into Execution, that, as soon as fifty Ships were ready, he sent his Brother on board, in Quality of the States Deputy, with Orders to set sail, tho' twenty more capital Ships, allotted for this Service, were not yet in a Condition to join him.

And now it was that England was to suffer the greatest Disgrace that ever befel her: The once poor and distressed States, who had sworn Allegiance to a (*) Subject of England, and had grown up under the Shadow of the English Throne; who had sunk under the superior Genius of the English

(b) His Lordship, likewise, writ the following Letter to Mr. Rovinsky:

"I could wish, Sir, with all my Heart you were at Court, or, at least, I wish you could accompany the Earl of St. Albans to support what he has Orders to represent; for very far from drawing any Advantage from the Preliminaries already adjust'd, and so many Assurances of the King, your Master's Friendship, his Embassadors at Bruxels seem to approve of whatever the Dutch and Dutchess advance; whose Proposals are so extravagant, and so little conformable to what we have Reason to expect, that 'tis impossible for them to have any good Effect. I confess, so strange a Proceeding, and so contrary to the Assurances given us, has extremely surpris'd me; and I assure myself, you will no less wonder at it, and will as well as I, think it impossible to re-establish mutual Confidence, if the Ministers of France continue to act quite contrary to what was promis'd us."

To this, among other things, Mr. Rovinsky reply'd as follows: "You cannot but remember, that, pursuant to your Council, the King my Master deferred the Execution of his Design; and that in one of your Letters you wrote me, that such a small Matter, speaking of Palermo, which is without Comparison of more Importance than those two Ships, should never hinder the Conclusion of the Peace. However, since the King entered Bruxels, it seems as if there was nothing to be done but to break with the Dutch, or force them to consent to the propos'd Pretensions. They may be compell'd to observe the Treaty of 1662, if you agree to the abolishing of all Pretensions on both Sides, before and after that War, as has been often offer'd with great Resistance. This was the Reason that the States General were given to hope for, and expect it, no Doubting being made 'twixt you and your Intention. If this Pretension continues, 'twill extremely pleas'd Monsieur de Wit, if giving him a Colour to continue arm'd; the War is for his Interest, tho' not for his Masters. Methinks the English are very much concern'd to separate us from the Dutch, and to unite closely with France, who passionately desires it. It is possible that a Trifle can hinder a Peace so far advanc'd, and so advantageous to the two Crowns! I cannot so much as imagine it, when I consider the King, your Master, knows what's for his Honour and Interest better than any one: God direct the Councils!"

In the mean while, my Lord, I tell you with Confidence, That the King my Master can continue this War, and end it when he pleases; permit us not to go any farther. 'Tis time to close, and adieu you I am, my Lord, &c.

(i) In a Letter from Mr. d'Esbrades to the King his Master, dated June 21, he speaks of the Peninsular, and his present Views, in the following Manner:

"Monsieur de Wit is full of Ambition, and would have all things preserve the Authority he has acquir'd. He fees plainly, if the War continues, the Province of Holland cannot be without him; and that, as long as it lasts, he will not re-establish the Prince of Orange in his Father's Offices; he fears if a Peace was concluded, because he should not then be wanted so much, and would become a private Man; nay, that he may be oblig'd to give an Account of his Actions, and try him for several things he has done, perhaps with a good Design, against the Forms of the Government. This is the Reason he has made use of his Interest to hinder each Province's sending a Deputy to this Assembly, thinking he may more easily govern a small Number than a greater; and that having here a Man of his Cabal of great Capacity and Resolution, he should be Master of the Negotiation. It has happen'd well for him, that the English have started a Difficulty on a Point all the Provinces thought to be regulated, and which your Majesty look'd on as such, he cunningly makes use of this Occasion to break with them, and would be forty their Embassadors did not talk as they do. Beverning pretends to be gone, the Deputies of Zeland and Frisland, who have not by their Instructions Liberty to charge a Thing which passes for certain in their Provinces, dare not speak of it; and as long as this Difficulty shall subsist, they cannot declare for the Peace."

That Monsieur de Wit, who has already engag'd his Country and your Majesty in this War, by sending d'Royter to Galley, without saying according to the Dispositions of the Fourteenth Article of 1662, till the Term was laps'd, in which the King of Great Britain should have given Satisfaction for the Damage done by Sir Robert Holmes, thinks he shall still be able to keep your Majesty and his Country in it; and without examining if the Difficulty the English term be important enough to deserve to break off a Negotiation, rather than get over it; he is satisfy'd he has so well manag'd the Cities of the Provinces, that all the Fault of the Rupture will not fall upon him, but be imputed to the Enemies of the State.

To this End, he has been in all the Cities; and, as soon as the Assembly of the Province was to meet, we knew what would be said, that we would oblige them to make a shameful Peace. This is what he has spread up and down in his Journey to prepare the Minds of the Deputies not to agree to the Proposal of referring the Affair of the two Ships to the Admiralty of Amsterdam, or suffer that the Demands of the English should be reliev'd, in a Treaty, in which all those of the Dutch would be extinguish'd quite."

(*) The Earl of Leicester.

A. D. 1667.

Commonwealth; and humbly sued for Mercy, at the great Prateſtor's Foot-ſtool; now rode Sovereigns of the Sea; inſulted the Coaſts and Harbours of England; filled the (k) Thames with their Fleets; attack'd, and half-deſtroy'd, the Royal Navy at Chatham; advanced up the River, almoſt as far as Tilbury; laid the Country under Contribution; ſtruck Terror and Diſmay into London itſelf, and more expoſed the Nakedneſs of the Government, than all the Invectives of all its Enemies.

Let our Enemies recount the Particulars.— It ſhall be ſufficient for us to obſerve, that, tho' the Nation, after having granted ſuch mighty Sums for the carrying on the War with Vigour, found itſelf, as it were, abandon'd to the Enemy, and was provok'd beyond Meaſure at an Inſult, which had no Precedent in our Story, ſo exemplary was its Loyalty, that, when the King made a Speech to the Citizens on Tower-Hill, to perſuade them not to deſert him, not one diſreſpectful Whiſper eſcap'd againſt his Conduct: Nor, of all the Numbers which had been ſo often accus'd of Sedition and Diſaffection, and ſo ſeverely puniſh'd upon Suſpicion only, does it appear, that any one Man attempted to make a Diſerſion in favour of the Enemy, tho' the Parties they ſent on ſhore were commanded by one Doleman, a preſcrib'd Republican.

Some of our Writers aſſert, that our Court was led into this inexcusable Negligence and Security by a Letter from the Queen-Mother to the King her Son; aſſuring him, the Dutch would have no Fleet at Sea that Year. But, as no Authority appears to juſtify this Aſſertion, it deſerves no Credit, and therefore ought not to have been made.

Others again, ſpeaking of the Delay of the Money-Bills in the Houſe of Commons, make no Difficulty to conclude, that from thence it became impracticable to fit out a Fleet, to be as early at Sea as the Dutch. But there is much Diſingenuity in this Way of Reaſoning; for, before Chriſtmas, the Commons had ſat twice a Day, to perfect the Peace-Bill; which receiv'd the Royal Aſſent Jan. 18; as did likewiſe the Subſidy-Bill Feb. 8; and it was not till the 1<sup>ſt</sup> of June, that the Enemy came to Anchor in the Gulfſtret; a Space of Time ſufficient, under an able, honeſt, and active Government, to have prepar'd and put in Motion the whole naval Force of the Kingdom; as is apparent from what was done by the great Parliament, or Commonwealth. For, after Van Tromp had fail'd thro' the Channel, with a Broom at his Maſt-head (a Dutch Conceit, to ſignify he had ſweep'd it clean of Enemies) in ſix Weeks Time, a Fleet of full ſixty Men of War were put to Sea; which, in a few Days after, met this vaunting Hero in open Sea, and, after a three Days deſperate Engagement, chas'd him into his own Ports.

The naked Truth is, the King apprehending, with Reaſon, that he ſhould find ſome Difficulty in the Affair of the Supply next Seſſion, reſolv'd to part with as little as poſſible of that which he was already in Poſſeſſion of: In order to which, a Project had been, early in the Year, agreed upon, to diſcontinue the Manner of carrying on the War, which had been, till then, in uſe, of fitting out huge Fleets, and putting the Iſſue upon general Engagements; and to turn over the Men into the Merchants Service; as what would, at once, leſſen the Charge upon the Revenue, and increaſe the Receipts of the Custom-houſe; with the Reſerve, however, of two ſmall Squadrons; one of which was ſent to the West Indies, under the Command of Sir John Harman; who there behav'd in ſo gallant a Manner, as was ſufficient to ſhew, that the Diſgrace at Chatham was not to be imputed to the Body of the English Nation.

We muſt now return to the Treaty of Breda: But not to tread the perplexed Labyrinth of thwarting Demands, ſly Eviſions, counterfeit Menaces, and real Difficulties, which make up the Detail of that Proceeding; for that would be an uſeleſs, and almoſt endleſs Work.

When Meffieurs Holles and (1) Coventry were moſt peremptory in their Demands, and affected to be moſt indifferent as to the Succeſs, came Advice of the Clatban Affair; as likewiſe, that the States had made two Demands upon France; one of which was, That, while their Fleets cruiz'd off the Coaſts of Scotland, and block'd up the River Thames, and the Danes ſecured the Norway Seas, his Majesty ſhould ſend a Squadron to take Poſſeſſion of the Mouth of the Channel; whereby England would be inveſted on all Sides, and its Commerce entirely broken: And the other, to equip them with a Supply of Fireſhips, their own being entirely conſum'd, to enable de Ruyster to finiſh at Portsmouth, what he had begun in the Medway.

As the Government of England was not now animated with ſuch a Spirit as roſe under Calamities, and was ſuperior to Miſfortune, this dreadful Circumſtance of Affairs carry'd along with it more of Diſmay than Indignation. Inſtead therefore of awakening the Reſentment, and collecting the Strength, of ſo great and brave a People, to make one noble Effort to be aveng'd of a proud, inſulting Enemy, they choſe to put up the Aſ-front, and ſwallow the Terms which had been ſo long and ſo haughtily refus'd.

Tho' the Dutch could not make it fairly appear, that they had reſtor'd the Iſland of Paleron,

The extreme Danger of the Kingdom.

Lord Arlington's Letters.

(1) Lord Arlington, in a Letter to Sir William Temple, informing him of the Dutch Fleet's being upon the Coast, adds, If they have ſome known Exploit to do upon us, their Undertakings are very juſtifiable.

(2) More eſpecially the laſt; for which the Reader will find a Reaſon in the following Paragraph, taken from a Letter of Mr. de Lionne's to Mr. d'Eftrades, dated from Doway, July 16.

"Into ſuch Inconveniencies has the Intereſt of private Perſons brought them [the English Court]: And if Mr. Coventry and others, had not a Share in the pretended Satisfaction for the two ſhips, the Peace had been made, and the beſt Ships in England had not been burnt."

A. D. 1667.

Poleron, before the War broke out, as they pretended, they were suffer'd to keep Possession of it: The very (m) Claims on account of the Ships Bonaventure and Goodhope, which were the leading Pretence for commencing the War, were given up: And tho' Sir Johu Harman had, by this time, recovered the Islands in the West Indies, which had been taken from England during the War, and defeated both the French and Dutch Squadrons in those Parts, Acadia was surrendered to the French, by way of Exchange for St. Christophers, &c.

It must, however, be acknowledg'd, that England was now at the (y) Mercy of France. The King, in his Distress, had been oblig'd to dissipate a great Part of those Sums, which perhaps for a much worse Purpose had been sav'd. To retrieve the Navy, in a Time of such Confusion and Necessity, without the Assistance of Parliament, was impossible. Besides, de Ruyter still scour'd the Channel, from End to End; and had the Duke de Beaufort receiv'd Orders to join him at this Crisis, in all human Probability, it would have been an Age, at least, before England had been again a Maritime Power, and in a Condition to assert the Sovereignty of the Seas.

But, for the same Reason, that his Majesty's Christian Majesty first sided with the Dutch, he now thought it his Interest to interpose for the Preservation of the English; for not being able to subdue Both, it became necessary for him, that Neither should obtain too great a Superiority over the Other: And thus, as we pretend to hold the Balance of Power by Land, he had the unquestionable Happiness and Glory to hold it by Sea.

The English Ministers, however, thought it convenient for them to lay the Blame of (o) the whole Year's Misfortunes on the French; who, as they daily complain'd to the Spanish Ambassador, had safely bubbled them. So natural is it, says Mr. de Lionne, on that Occasion, when blameable ourselves, to recriminate upon others.

To turn our Backs, for good and all, on this shocking Scene: The Peace was concluded at Breda, June 29. The Ratifications were exchange'd, August 14, and ten Days after, it was proclaim'd in Form.

While the Dutch were yet in the River, and no body knew what a Day or an Hour might produce, a very close Correspondence was struck up between the Court and the City: For, after the King had made his Speech

(m) Of the State of this Affair, before the War began, Sir William Temple gives the following Account to his Brother, from the Mouth of the Pensionary de Wit.

By the Treaty between Cromwell and the States, their Claim was left as it was, that is to say, depending by way of Law Suit, before the Magistrates of Amsterdam:

"That Mr. Cary, who was employ'd to pursue it, in the Name of Cromwell's Executors, had brought it very near a Composition, demanding forty-thousand Pounds, and the Dutch offering thirty. That he, [Mr. de Wit] to end this Affair, had appointed a Meeting with Mr. Cary, who had since confessed to his Friends, that he was resolv'd to end it at that Meeting, and rather to take the Dutch Offer, than let the Suit run on. But that very Morning, Sir George Downing sent for him, told him it was a Matter of State between the two Nations, and not a Concern of private Life only, and therefore, absolutely forbid him to go on with any Treaty about it, otherwise, than by his Communication and Consent. That he would put in a Memorial to the States upon it; and instead of forty-thousand Pounds, which he demand'd, would undertake to get him fourscore; and that he was sure the Dutch would give a great deal more, rather than venture a Quarrel with his Majesty.

"This Course he pursued, made extravagant Demands, and, with great Insolence, made the same Representations to our Court, and possessed some of the Ministers, that he could get great Sums of Money, both for his Majesty and them, if they would suffer him to treat this Affair after his own Manner: For he was sure the Dutch would go very far in that kind, if they saw there was no other way to avoid a War with England."

That Mr. de Wit, for his Part, thought they were a free State no longer, if they should yield a Point that they not only knew we had no Ground for, but were sure we knew it as well as they; and that whatever the States should give upon this Occasion, might be demanded at any time, by our Court upon any other, since none could have less Pretence.

(n) If the Reader thinks I make use of too strong an Expression in this Place, let him read what follows, which is Part of a Dispatch from Mr. de Bylander to the most Christian King, dated from Breda, June 30, 1667.

"We did not think fit to trust our Thoughts of the States Demand of your Majesty's Fire-ships, in the Letter we gave their Courier. But we take the Liberty to represent them here, and that in, that if you don't agree to what they desire, under Colour you have not Fire-ships for your Fleet, it may hinder some new Enterprise. The States have done enough to render the English discontent. Your Majesty has no Part in it, and will judge better than we can, whether 'tis for your Interest to make use of your Forces to complete the Ruin of the King of Great Britain, when he is dispos'd to almost whatever is required of him.

The Ambassadors of England are by what we have said to them so far convinced, that your Majesty can no longer defer the Departure of your Fleet from Brussel, that they being not to be in any Doubt of Monsieur de Beaufort's being put to Sea; and they are perswaid your Majesty has no long delay'd sending him your Orders with all reasonable Regards to the King of Great Britain's Interests, to give him an Opportunity to coincide the Peace. Upon which we believe, if your Majesty, refusing your Fire-ships to the States thro' this Consideration that you are about to send it to cruise at the Mouth of the Channel as they desire, should order Monsieur de Beaufort to sail, your Majesty would content your Allies, avoid the Occasion of doing the English a greater Mischief, and reduce them, however, by this Step, to a greater Necessity of finishing their Affairs here. Experience has shewn us that the Misfortune which has happened to them, has already render'd them more tractable, which gives us Reason to believe they will become wise at last, and determine to take good Measures."

(o) Of the Peace itself, we have the following dependant Account, in a Letter from Mr. Covey to Sir William Temple.

That between the States and us consists in absolute Abolition of all Pretences on either Side; each to remain Masters of what they were in Possession of the 1st of May, 1667; what since taken to be restored. As to Land, Forts and Ships, are yet liable till after Publication, when all Hostilities are to cease, within twelve Days in the Channel, and so proportionably in other Seas; then the whole Treaty of 1662 renew'd, and we both to make use of the Articles between France and this State, for Contraband Goods, till such time as we can agree of one between ourselves. The rest is a Restoring of the Treaty in 1662, as to all its Articles, except the several, wherein our Pretensions are contain'd. As to the Act of Navigation, you will hear much Noise that it is renew'd. I here there is no such thing; neither doth the Article about that Matter, give the States any more Advantage, than, as I conceive, the Act gave them before. As to the French, we restore all to each other that each hath taken, and all things done put in Oblivion. As to Denmark, the Debt he owed the Hamburg Company, France standing very firm to him upon the Point, and their greatest Argument was, that it was not a Debt contracted by him or his Father; but, on the contrary, imposed on his Father for having assisted the late King: And besides, they gave us our Choice either to agree thus or to account for what had been taken on each Side, and render: The latter was thought the more prejudicial to the King our Master, and so this hath pass'd, and there is, I think, the Substance of the three Treaties.

Sir William had likewise a Letter from Lord Hellou, after the Peace was sign'd; but he reserves what he has to say till they might at Leisure discourse of the present Posture of Affairs, and make those same Reflections which they desire; and which, said he, could be much better for a Conference than to be set down on Paper.

D. 1667. Speech on Tower-Hill, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen waited upon him at Whitehall, with an Address, expressing their Loyalty and Devotion to his Service, and desiring his Majesty's Interposition, for preserving the Peace of the City, &c. His Majesty, on the other hand, most complacently left all to their Prudence; promis'd not to be wanting in any thing that might demonstrate his unwearied Care and Concernment for them; of which they should hourly find the Effects: And desir'd to hear from them on every Emergency, as they should from him, on every necessary Occasion.

Gazette,
Numb. 165.

Public Credit
stock'd.

But all these fine Things did not remove the Panic, which was gone forth among the People. The public Creditors, in particular, who had advanced the necessary Sums for the public Service, pour'd in their Demands on the respective Goldsmiths, who were Agents for the Loans; all insisting on present Payment, and thereby demonstrating, that they had parted with their Money, not so much to assist, as to prey upon, their Country. Hence, a thousand new Difficulties arose; a thousand new Dangers were fear'd; a general Stagnation threaten'd to make way for a general Bankruptcy; and, consequently, all the Wheels of Government, as well as Commerce, would stand still.

A Proclamation
thereon.

Gazette,
Numb. 166.

To prevent, therefore, as much as possible, the very Approach of so overwhelming a Calamity, a Proclamation was issued, signifying, That, as the Course of Payments in the Exchequer, had, hitherto, been punctual, and according to the Order, even in that Time of Disturbance, and Interruption of Payments, among his Subjects; so his Majesty's steadfast Resolution was, to preserve inviolably to all his good Subjects the Securities and Assignments made for their Repayment; and that his Majesty would not, upon any Occasion whatever, permit or suffer any Alteration, Anticipation, or Interruption, to be made of his said Subjects Securities. This Engagement was, likewise, in the most explicit Manner, extended to all future Loans and Assignments; and all his Majesty's Ministers were required to observe it, at their utmost Perils.

Another, to pacify the Discontents of Seamen and Soldiers.

Gazette,
Numb. 168.

Another Proclamation was likewise published, to pacify the Discontents of the Seamen and Soldiers, who had complain'd, that they were forced to give Money or lose some Part of their Wages to recover the rest; and a very illustrious (p) Committee was appointed to hear and redress the Grievances.

An Army
rais'd, and the Parliament call'd.

It had, likewise, been warmly debated in Council whether the best Expedient to rectify all Disorders would be, by assembling the Parliament, or raising an Army. The Chancellor, now dreading that very Parliament, which he had, heretofore, been so intimately united with, declar'd for the last, while the opposite Party contended for the first. The King had his Reasons for closing with both; and accordingly, Commissions were given out on one Hand for raising of Forces, and on the other a Proclamation was publish'd, signifying, That his Majesty, esteeming himself ever most safe in the Advice and Assistance of his People in Parliament, had thought fit, by the Advice of his Council, to summon the Lords and Commons to meet him at Whitehall, on the 25th of July following.

June 26.

Accordingly, on that Day both Houses met; but when the Commons were proceeding to Business (q), the Speaker gave them to understand, that the King had sent for him the Night before, and, taking it for granted the House would be thin, had signified his Pleasure, that they should adjourn till the next Monday following. Whether the House was disgusted with this Usage, or met in an ill Humour from the ill Situation of the public Affairs, or wanted to make their own Advantage of the public Calamities, they did not obey his Majesty's Injunction, till they had first voted an Address, That as soon as the Peace was made, he would (r) disband the new-raisd Army, which, according to Lord Arlington, would have been done without their Interposition.

However this may be, when they met again, the King himself condescended to make an Excuse for giving them the Trouble of this extraordinary Attendance, intimated the Occasion of their Meeting was now less urgent, declared his Intention to dismiss them till the time before prescrib'd [Oct. 10.] and that, in the mean while, he should take an Opportunity to do some things, which he hop'd would not be unwelcome to them.

rogued.

When Princes are in the most Distress, their Subjects find the best Chance to have their Complaints heard, and their Grievances remov'd. It may seem ungenerous to take the Advantage, but nothing can be more foolish than to let it slip. Experience shews that mere Motion and free Grace are but Words of court; and that if Men would possess their Freedom or Happiness, they must take care, while Occasion offers, to put both in their Power.

The King was now upon ill Terms with his People, when he stood most in need of them. In gaining time, therefore, to take off the Edge of their Animosities, he acted wisely; and in removing many of those Provocations which had given rise to them, he acted honestly.

Nevertheless, in making Provision to gratify the Passions of his Subject, he did not forget (q) Fin. his Royal Highness the Duke, his Highness Prince Rupert, the Duke of Albany, Earl of Archie, Earl of Lauderdale, Lord Arlington, Lord Berkley, Lord Ashley, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Vice Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary Morris, Sir William Coventry, and Sir John Danvers.

(r) So says Sir William Coventry's Letter to his Brother at Breda, quoted by Kenes; but according to others, the Speaker received this Message from the other House; where it was first communicated from the King to the Lord Chancellor, and that their Vote relating to the Army had been made, before it was deliver'd.

(s) Which he comply'd with immediately, say some, who think rather too favourably of this Reign, tho' he never fill in a State of War with France. But now could this be, when the Peace was sign'd June 29. and the Parliament was not prorogued till July 29.

A. D. 1667. forget his own. The Duke of Buckingham, he found it his Interest to forgive: The Earl of Clarendon, an old Servant, tho' never a Bosom-Favourite, he thought it his Interest to punish.

Lord Clarendon made a Sacrifice.

Because the Chancellor held the chief Place in the Ministry, he was held the first Mover of the Cabinet. On him, therefore, all the Odium, arising from every bad Measure had fallen. Papist and Puritan, disobligh'd Cavalier, and persecuted Republican all join'd in Confederacy against him; and the King himself not only gave way to the Torrent, but contributed to render it irresistible.

Mistakes, if not Crimes, he had many, and those capital ones, to answer for. It was during his sole Ministry, that the King was diverted from embracing the Offers of Spain, and confirm'd in his Inclinations to close with France; which gave the second Lift to that aspiring Power, and so soon enabled it to be the Terror of Europe: It was he who connected England so closely and fatally with Portugal, tho' perhaps not for the Family-Views which have been so often and so confidently laid to his Charge. It was he who had been both the Adviser and the Manager of the Sale of Dunkirk; and it was he who, in concert with a domineering Metropolitan, had set on one Part of the good People of England to worry the rest; had made the Laws of the Land irreconcilable with those of God; and to establish the Power of the Crown, had almost extinguish'd the Liberty of the Subject.

On the other hand, the rushing into a War with Holland, in Defiance of the Resentment of France, and without entering into any previous Concert with Spain, he had neither advis'd nor approv'd; nor does it appear that he was answerable for any of the Miscarriages which were committed in the Conduct of it. It was indeed a Measure which defeated all his own. He had warmly espous'd the Views of the French Court, and courted its Protection. But when the King made Preparations against the States, and sent Sir Richard Fanshawe to Madrid, it became apparent, that either he had lost his Power, or departed from his Professions: Whence it became likewise apparent, that either no Credit was due to them, or that they were of little or no Significancy. But tho' he had neither advis'd nor approv'd this War; nay, tho' it was thus diametrically oppositeto his fundamental Interests, he had been most unhappily prevail'd upon to countenance it in his Speech to the Oxford Parliament; this Speech was in every body's Hand: And the Vulgar, whom it was calculated to captivate, were unskill'd in those Refinements, by which great Ministers think themselves authoris'd to recommend in public, what they privately condemn.

But, in discriminating between the Errors he was really guilty of, and the Crimes that were imputed to him, we do too much Honour to those who join'd in the Cry against him. They were Enemies to his Greatness, not his Guilt; they were afraid of his Authority, not alarm'd at his Abuse of it; they wanted to remove a great Obstruction to their several Designs, not to correct the Presumption of Ministers, by a wholesome and reasonable Example.

And as to the King's own Concern, in the eager Prosecution of a Man who had, too fondly, set Loyalty in the Place of every public Virtue, it doth not appear that he was furnish'd with a tolerable Pretence to excuse it. If the Rigour of the Chancellor's Manners, and the Gravity of his Deportment, were a tacit Reproach to the Levity and Licence of his own, he might have easily remov'd the obnoxious Example, and made his Court of a Piece. And if, from whatever View, he had found him thwarting his Passions, and interfering in his most, (1) darling Pursuits, tho' it might give him Disgust, tho' it might excite his Indignation, he could not think it a Crime in the Chancellor to use his Endeavours to save him from being criminal: And if, as some affirm, this was one of the principal Causes of his Disgrace, it farther enforces what has been before insinuated, that his Majesty was not only capable of Repentment, but fond of Revenge.

While the Consternation yet lasted, which was the Result of the Dutch Attempt on Chatham, the Duke of Buckingham surrender'd himself, and was sent to the Tower. July 8, he was examined before the Council, deny'd the (1) Charge against him, was remanded to the Tower, but released the Sunday following; and, soon after, readmitted into Place and Favour; by an Express Compromise, as we are told, that the Duke should do the King's Business in the House of Commons, and get him divorc'd from the Queen by the Help of the House of Lords, and that the King should sacrifice the Earl of Clarendon.

Duke of Buckingham, renders himself, and is again admitted into Favour. Carte.

But,

(1) This Repentment had broke out a little before in a manner unusual to the King, upon Occasion of the private Marriage which had been contracted between the Duke of Richmond and Mrs. Stewart, and was made public in April this Year. This young Lady was the Daughter of Captain Walter Stewart, a Scots Gentleman of the Blantyre Family. From her first Appearance at Court, she was universally admired, eclipsed the Countess of Castlemain, and was certainly a Person of exquisite Beauty, if justly represented in a Fuchean by Rosvire his Majesty's Engraver of the Mint, in order to strike a Medal of her, which exhibits the finest Face that perhaps was ever seen. The King was supposed to be desperately in love with her, and it became common Discourse that there was a Design on Foot to get him divorc'd from the Queen, in order to marry Mrs. Stewart. Lord Clarendon was thought to have promoted the Match with the Duke of Richmond, thereby to prevent the other Design, which he thought would hurt the King's Character, embroil his Affairs at present, and entail all the Evils of a disputed Succession on the Nation. Whether he actually encouraged the Duke of Richmond's Marriage doth not appear, but I find that he was so strongly possess'd of the King's Inclination to a Divorce, that even after his Disgrace he was perswaded the Duke of Buckingham had undertaken to carry that Matter through the Parliament. It is certain too, that the King consider'd him as the chief Promoter of that Marriage, and resented it in the highest Degree. Thus affected towards the Chancellor, he easily elys'd with the Duke of Buckingham, to give him up to the Mercy of his Enemies. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 351.

This Incident of the Duke of Richmond and Mrs. Stewart is likewise related by Lullow.

(1) According to Mr. Carte, his Accuser was now dead.

A.D. 1667.

But, if there is good Reason to believe, that some such Bargain as this was really struck, it is not altogether demonstrable that it was struck so soon. We have already observ'd, that the Chancellor presided in the House of Lords, as usual, at the Meeting of the Parliament, July 25; and, tho', on the 29th, the King dismiss'd them with a Promise to do something, during the Recess, which would not be unwelcome to them, and which perhaps had a Relation to his Lordship, he was not depriv'd of the Great Seal till August the 31st; nor was the Duke publicly readmitted to kiss the King's Hand, and take his Place at the Council-board, till the 23d of September following.

Genette, Numb. 187.

Ed. N. 194.

In this Interval, however, the Chancellor's Case was truly deplorable. Of his two great Friends, the Duke of Ormond and Earl of Southampton, the first was absent, and the last lately dead; as were likewise his Grandsons, the Dukes of Cambridge and Kendal, and his own excellent Lady. He had lost all Countenance, as well as Interest, at Court; and the People in general were his Enemies. In the Duke of York was placed his only Confidence; who firmly and nobly supported him, almost to the Hazard of a Rupture with his Royal Brother: But, tho' he had Weight enough to shake his Majesty's Resolution, he had not enough to change it. The King continued wavering for some time; had a long (u) Conference with the Chancellor, on the Subject of his Dismissal, in the Presence of his Royal Highness; parted with him in a relenting Manner; and, five Days after, depriv'd him of the Seals; which were bestow'd on Sir Orlando Bridgeman, with the Title of Lord Keeper.

Lord Clarendon disgrac'd.

Carte.

But the Duke of Buckingham was not Lord Clarendon's only Enemy: Lord Arlington likewise lent a helping Hand towards his Disgrace; and even the Duke of Albemarle threw his Weight into the same Scale.

A.D. 1667.

The Chancellor and the General had ever been Court Rivals, and consequently Enemies, tho' both were equally devoted to the Service of their Sovereign. Clarendon was for courting the Power of France; Albemarle for destroying it: Clarendon was for adjusting all Difficulties by Negotiation; Albemarle for cutting them through with the Sword. When Albemarle, thro' a too great Contempt of the Dutch, had engag'd them with a Part of the Fleet only, and thereby brought the Whole into Danger, Clarendon took care to enlarge both on the Mistake, and the Mischief it produced: And, in Revenge, when Clarendon was to be set aside, Albemarle chose to give him the additional Mortification of demanding the Seal in Person: But of this Pleasure his Grace was nevertheless disappointed; for the Earl refused to obey the Mandate he brought, and resign'd it into the King's own Hand the next Day.

Ladlow.

As the People were taught to believe, that all the Calamities, brought upon them by the Dutch War, were derived from him; and saw him erecting a Palace, while the City lay in Ruins, it is no great Wonder that they were overjoy'd at his Fall. Had his own Measures been right, or had he not remain'd in Place, to countenance the wrong Measures of those who were more in the Secret of Affairs, and less expos'd to the Attention of the Public, so strong a Prejudice could not have prevail'd against him; and the Esteem and Commiseration of his Fellow-Subjects had pour'd Balm into the Wounds which he had receiv'd at Court.

It must, however, be own'd, that his Suppliants did not think the bare Removal of an obnoxious Minister sufficient to pacify the

(u) The Lord Arlington writing to the Duke of Ormond the next Day after the Conference, but before he knew the Result of it, acquaints his Grace, "That the King was perswaded his Affairs would be much embarrassed, and the Lord Chancellor much expos'd in the next Session, and therefore had recommended it to the Duke of York to prepare the Chancellor to retire; that his Royal Highness brought his Majesty such an Answer back again, as he believed the thing would be easily done. But since that Answer, the Duke and all Lord Clarendon's Friends being living that such a Step would be highly to his Prejudice, had been very earnest with the King to change his Mind, and the Lord Chancellor had been with him yesterday; that he could not really tell what his Majesty had finally determin'd, but was afraid he would be prevail'd with to change his Mind; for in that case the next would prove a very troublesome Session of Parliament, and those things whereof the Government stood most essentially in need, would very hardly be obtained; and even the Chancellor himself would suffer more than he would have done, if he had retired." Concluding his Sense of that Matter in these Words, "I heartily pray it may be otherwise; but I fear I shall be a true Prophet, and then not be expos'd to so much Censure as I am for my Opinion now." This Letter was carried with great Expedition to Dublin; for on September 3, the Duke of Ormond returned an Answer, in which he thus expresses his Sense of that Matter, which he wished might be reprised to his Majesty: "I am able to make no Judgment on the Expedient his Majesty found to give himself Esteem, and my Lord Chancellor Security, at the next Meeting of the Parliament, if my Lord Chancellor could persuade himself, that the Demission of his Charge would facilitate a good Intelligence between the King and his Subjects, and gain those Affiliations from them to support the Government, which are so evidently necessary, he is not so good a Servant, or so wise a Man, as I hope he will be found, if he would not on his Knees lay the Seals at his Majesty's Feet, and beseech him to take them from him. But if there remain any Doubt of the Success of forcing him to retire, or if he is not chargeable with some Crime, such as put in the Bullance with many Years faithful, painful and comfortable Service, full out-weight, I know the King is too good a Master to lay him aside (which, in effect, is to condemn him unheard) upon popular Clamour, and for uncertain Advantage; whereas of the one will always stand Men of Business will rise by it; and the other, should never be brought in Competition with Honour and Justice, which are the only lasting Supports to Greatness, and can hardly fail, since they can as hardly be found without the Assistance of Steadiness and Courage."

Lord Arlington received this Letter on the 13th at Night, and read it the next Day to his Majesty; who thereupon said, he would write that Night to the Lord Lieutenant, and give him an Account of what the Lord Clarendon had done to displeas'd him, besides the Dissatisfaction of the World on his Account. The King, in that Letter to the Duke of Ormond, does not offer to charge the Chancellor with any Crime, but only with a certain perverseness of Temper, which gave him Offence, and concludes in these Words, "This is an Argument too big for a Letter; so that I will add but this Word, to assure you, that your former Friendship to the Chancellor shall not do you any Prejudice with me, and that I have not in the least Degree diminished that Value and Kindness I ever had for you; which I thought fit to say to you upon this Occasion, because it is very possible malicious People may suggest the Contrary to you." CARLE's Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. ii. p. 352, 353.

A. D. 1667.

the Discontents of an abused and exasperated People: On the contrary, they proceeded, by many popular Acts, to bespeak an Opinion, at least, that they meant to redress all Grievances, and to establish the Throne in Righteousness.

Grievances redress'd.

To manifest their Zeal for the Protestant Religion, they began with a Proclamation, for putting the Laws in force against Papish Recusants; to advance the Price of Corn, which was then, it seems, too low to make proper Returns to the Husbandman, a general Liberty was given of Exportation; the Canary Patent was revok'd, the Company dissolv'd, and the Trade laid open; Orders were given to the Attorney-General, to proceed by a Quo Warranto against the Charter of the Woodmongers Company, because they had committed many Abuses in the Sale of Fuel, to the great Oppression of the Poor. It having appear'd, that many fraudulent Practices had been made use of to elude the Cattle-Act, the due Execution thereof was farther enforced by Proclamation. All Orders of Council, which had been given for dispensing with the Act of Navigation, were vacated. In order to lessen his Majesty's Necessities, his Expences were lessen'd by a Reform of the Household. The Condition of the State-Prisoners, in several Parts of the Kingdom, was taken into Consideration; and several of those unhappy Persons, by his Majesty's gracious Directions, discharged. And, to make a Shew of Justice, as well as Mercy, Commissioner Pett was committed to the Tower, as solely chargeable with, and answerable for, the Damage at Chatham, which Peace itself could not efface out of the Hearts of the People.

Such Lenitives having been thus gradually prepar'd, to take off the Eagerness of Mens Minds without-doors, the Duke of Buckingham, who was now Lord of the Ascendant, thought he might suffer the two Houses to meet, without the Dread of any very dangerous Fermentation within. The Merit of his last Year's Opposition was now enobled with his Majesty's Grace and Favour: None of the former Miscarriages could be imputed to him; and of all the late plausible Measures he had the Credit, almost without a Rival; for Lord Arlington had condescended to list under his Banner; the Duke of (v) Albemarle had his Reasons for lending him his Countenance; Lord Ashley was in all his Secrets; those busy Spirits, Sir Thomas Clifford and Sir Thomas Osborne, seem'd to be, Body and Soul, at his Devotion; and the Earl of Lauderdale was sure to be with whoever was uppermost.

In this promising Situation, all he had to fear was from the Faction of the late Chancellor; at the Head of which were the Duke of York, the Duke of Ormond, and Archbishop Seldon: And for all these, great and powerful as they were; he thought himself an Overmatch.

On the 10th Day of October, therefore, according to the Time prefix'd by the first Prorogation, both Houses met: And, in the gracious Speech upon that Occasion, his Majesty very wisely avoided touching on the Miscarriages of the War, or assuming any Merit on the Conclusion of the Peace; but, in a few Words, glanc'd at the Time he had taken to do those things, which he had before intimated would not be unwelcome to them, and which were to serve, he hop'd, as a Foundation for a greater Confidence between them for the future.

King's Speech

The new Lord Keeper Bridgman then took the Word; and, to excuse the extraordinary Summons, which both Houses had receiv'd in the Summer, declar'd there was Reason to suspect, from the near Neighbourhood of the French Army to the Sea-coast, that some Design was in Agitation, either against England, or some other of his Majesty's Dominions: An Assertion, which, however, seems to be wholly unauthoris'd; since the Designs of the French Court were then levelled solely at Flanders; which was very well understood in England.

His Lordship next enlarg'd on the Expediency of keeping to the Day prefix'd by the first Prorogation, about which there could be no Dispute. After which, as if by way of Apology for the late Peace, he proceeded to say, That his Majesty supposed, that no Man would expect, that, during the Receipt, his Majesty should have refus'd Offers of Peace, considering the Vicinity and Potency of his united Enemies, the great Expences of the War, with the concurrent Calamities of Pestilence and Fire. He then, in his Majesty's Name, recommended the settling a Balance of Trade with Scotland, which he found too hard a Task for him, without their Assistance.

And, as to the Accounts of the Money given towards the War, which his Majesty formerly promised should be laid before them, his Lordship added, that his Majesty had commanded his Officers to make them ready; and, since that Way of Commission, wherein he put the Examination of them, had been ineffectual, his Majesty was willing the Parliament should follow their own Method to examine them in what Way, and as strictly, as they pleas'd; assuring them, he will leave every one concerned to stand or fall according to his own Innocency or Guilt. That his Majesty having Reason to believe, that some disaffected Persons, taking Advantage of the public Necessity, had spread abroad Discourses and Rumours reflecting upon the Government; yet his Majesty promised himself, from the good Affections of his Parliament, that every one of them, in their several Places, would endeavour to preserve a good Understanding betwixt him and his People; adding, that if any just Grievances shall have happen'd, his Majesty will be as willing and ready to redress them for the future, as they to have them

Thoughts.

So many plausible Things said, and so many popular Things done, put the Majority of both Houses, for the present at least, into the best Humour imaginable. An Address was prepar'd by the Commons, in which, not the least Mixture of Discontent appear'd, either for the ill Conduct of the War, or the indifferent Conditions of Peace: On the contrary, they thank'd his Majesty for the several Acts of Grace which he had lately vouchsafed to his People, and more especially for the Removal of Lord Clarendon. To this Address the Lords gave their Concurrence. It was presented to the King by both Houses; and his Majesty finding their Pulse beat so conformably to his own, not only thank'd them for their Thanks, but took occasion to throw yet more Weight on the Chancellor, by assuring them he would never employ him any more.

This was, in effect, declaring him to be free Game, and setting the whole Pack at full Cry upon him. Accordingly the Chace was begun with all imaginable Eagerness; and if they had not the Satisfaction of tearing him to Pieces, they oblig'd him to leap the Pale.

Proceedings against Lord Clarendon.

In plain English, all the Disobliged, headed by Mr. Edward Seymour, who, according to Mr. Carte, had been retus'd the Privy Seal, resolv'd, under the Pretence of doing Justice to the Nation, to revenge their own particular Quarrel. The Charge against him was contain'd in Seventeen Articles, some of which had their Foundation in Truth, but all in Malice. That he might, in Confidence, have declar'd the King was a Popish, which was a certain Fact, is not improbable: That he was concern'd in the Canary Patent, and had some underhand Concern with the Vintners Company, is not wholly unsupported with Proof, if what Mr. Echard says be true, That his fine House was chiefly built at their Charge, with a View to monopolize his Favour: Then, as to the advising the Imprisonment of obnoxious Persons, in remote Places, to deprive them of the Benefit of the Laws, that such Persons were so imprison'd, under his Administration, was notorious: That, in some Plantation Cases, he did strain the Power of the Privy Council to the Prejudice of the Rights of the Subject, and the Laws of the Land, under his favourite Notion of supporting the Prerogative, both Sir Thomas Littleton and Sir Thomas Osborne took upon them to prove, by the Instance of one Farmer, and others, who came from Barbados to present their Grievances to the House of Commons, but, having lodg'd a Petition, were imprison'd, that they might not be heard. About Quo Warrantos to Corporations, according to Sir T. L. the thing was too public to need any Proof: And, as to the Sale of Dunkirk, the Memoirs of Mr. d'Eftrades have fix'd the Fact upon him undeniably; tho' he was then accus'd upon no better than hearsay Evidence; Sir T. Osborne declaring, that a great Lord had told him, that the Earl had made a Bargain for it three Quarters of a Year before it was known: Which, however, as to that Circumstance, was not true: And, as to those three great Articles, viz. the First, which charg'd him with a Design of subverting the Constitution, by introducing a military Government; and the two Last, which accus'd him of betraying the King's Councils, and advising the fatal Measure of dividing the Fleet, in June 1666; nothing could be more frivolous than the Pretences upon which they were founded. Sir Ro. Howard and Lord Vaughan had been told by Persons of Quality, that his Designs upon the Constitution would be prov'd: The same Persons likewise undertook to prove the betraying of the King's Councils: And, concerning the fatal Division of the Fleet, Sir Thomas Littleton told the following Story: Sir Edward Spragge desires Money to give an Intelligencer, and has it; Spragge brings the Intelligencer to the King; the King commands him to meet him at the Chancellor's: There he met the King, and then Order was given to divide the Fleet.

A. D. 1667.

As it was the Earl's hard Fate to be equally obnoxious to Prince and People, the worst Impressions of his Conduct were received the most favourably: Presumptions were receiv'd for Proofs; neither his Merits nor Services were once thought of; and it was more meritorious to accuse him falsely than acquit him fairly: Both the new Minister, and most of the old were in a Combination to ruin him; the Spanish and Imperial Agents, likewise, thought it would be for the Interest of their Masters to lend their Assistance, because of the Chancellor's known Attachments to France; and even the King himself laid his Commands upon Sir Henage Finch to be active in the Prosecution against him; which, it seems, he had neither the Courage to refuse absolutely, nor the Ductility to obey without Relieve.

Life of the
mond.

Upon the whole, the Tempest carried all before it; what was urg'd in his (w) Favour could not be heard, or was little regarded. Mr. Seymour was ordered to impeach him at the Bar of the House of Lords, which he, accordingly did, November 12, in the Name of the Commons of England; and at the same time, demanded that he might be sequester'd from Parliament and committed to safe Custody.

But

(w) It ought not to be forgot that Sergeant Maynard, who, Mr. Echard says, was one of those most violent against the Chancellor, spoke in the following candid Manner, in the Debate of October 30:

"No Man can do what is just, but he must have what is true before him; where Life is concern'd, you ought to have a moral Certainty of the thing, and every one be able to say upon this Proof in my Conscience, This Man is Guilty. Common Fame is no Ground to accuse [condemne, he should have said] a Man, where Matter of Fact is not clear: To say an Evil is done, therefore this Man hath done it, is strange in Morality, more in Logic.

A. D. 1667.

But tho' the Lords could not reject the Impachment, they evaded the Commitment by a Message, signifying they had not committed the Earl, because the Accusation was of Treason in general, without specifying Particulars. This threw the Commons into a great Ferment, which a free Conference rather increased than allay'd. The Lords continued firm to their first Resolution, and the Commons voted this Conduct of theirs, to be an Obstruction to the public Justice of the Kingdom, and a Precedent of evil and dangerous Consequence; and also appointed a Committee to draw up a Vindication of their Proceedings.

What was the secret Motive of the Lords for refusing to commit one of their Members, accus'd thus solemnly, by the Representatives of the People, whose Life was in their own Hands, has not yet been explain'd: But we are told, the Leaders of the Commons made a Handle of this Refusal to stop Proceedings, that the Tryal might be withdrawn from before the whole House, and submitted to a Junto of twenty-four, to be appointed by special Commission, and, consequently chosen, as they, or their Party should direct.

However this may be, the Earl, rather from a Dread of the Violence of the Times, than a Consciousness of having offended the Laws, thought it his wisest Course to take Sanctuary in France; where if the Gratitude of Kings was to be depended upon, he had Reason to expect, at least, a very hospitable Reception.

In the Paper left behind him, by way of Petition to the House of Lords, which is to be look'd upon as his Defence, he reduc'd the Charge brought against him to two Heads, Viz. That the largeness of his Estate, argued, that it had been acquired corruptly; and that having been sole Minister, ever since the King's Return, till August, he was answerable for all Miscarriages in that Interval.

To which he answered, in effect, That what he had got, arose from the honest Profits of his Office, according to former Precedents. That the Favours he had procured for others, had not been worth to him five Pounds. That the several Sums of Money and Parcels of Land, which his Majesty had bestow'd on him, were of greater Value, than all he was worth besides, who had, nevertheless, been as bountiful to others, who as little deserv'd it.

This is the Sum of his Answer to the Head of Profit.

And as to that of Power, and the Abuse of it, his Lordship made the Duke of Ormond, the Lord Culpeper, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas, in particular, and the whole Committee for Foreign Affairs in general, equally answerable with himself for the Measures which were pursued during the two first Years of his Administration; which was as long as his Credit lasted. After which time, he affirms not above one or two Persons were brought into Council, or prefer'd to any considerable Office who were not of different Judgment and Principles from him both in Church and State.

He then proceeded to place all the present Misfortunes of the Kingdom to the Account the War; declaring that he was not only averse to the Measure, but that he had foretold the Mischiefs it would produce; that he never concern'd himself in the Prosecution of it, unless to oppose the ill Advices of others; and that he had never meddled in Foreign Affairs but by the Advice of the Council and in Participation with the Secretaries.

Lastly, he more than insinuated that the Cry against him was owing to his Integrity, to his refusing to set the Seal to many Pardons and Grants which would have been profitable to those who procured them; and to his frequent Concurrence with the late Lord Treasurer, in remonstrating against Excesses and Exorbitances, while the yearly Issues so far exceeded the Revenue.

As it was plain this Paper was calculated as much to blacken Lord Arlington, as to clear himself, that Minister was infinitely provok'd at it; he called it a Libel, in the House of Lords; and by that Name it was communicated to the House of Commons, by the Duke of Bucks, who adopting the Resentment of their Leaders, sentenc'd it, in Concurrence with their Lordships, to be burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman; which was accordingly perform'd.

But the Censure of the Paper did not put a Stop to their Animosity against the Man: The Lords, who would not commit him because he was not charg'd with any express Circumstance of Guilt, now taking his Guilt for granted, and proceeding against him by Pains and Penalties, even without a Hearing; and the Commons voting an Address for a Proclamation to force him to appear by a certain Day, in order to take his Trial, to which they desir'd the Concurrence of the Lords. This last Expedient had been frequently made use of, without any Difficulty, against Men of less Note, under the Earl's own Administration, but was now rejected by their Lordships, as ineffectual; who chose to punish him in a legislative Way; and therefore, to (x) adhere to their Bill of Banishment and Incapacity.

This created new Broils among the Commons; among whom it was well said by Mr. Swinford, That the Lords would neither secure nor summon him, and yet would condemn him unheard: That this was against Honour and Justice: That the Precedent was dangerous: That, upon Reasons of State, Lords might be banish'd by Dozens: Concluding, As you proceed justly, so will you be justify'd.

Finding, however, that they could not make an Example of him in a judicial Way, they

they clos'd at last with this Expedient of the Lords; the (y) Bill being pass'd in a thin House, December 18, by a Majority of 23; and Yeas Sixty-five, Noes Forty-two; and the very next Day receiv'd the Royal Assent.

Thus fell the great Earl of Clarendon, by the Violence of a Parliament, which, under his (z) own Influence, had committed to many Violences on the Liberties of the People; and, thro' the Malevolence and Ingratitude of a Prince, whom the most exceptionable of his Actions had been calculated to serve and oblige.

The Apologists for these Times are equally anxious to vindicate the King and the Minister. But, surely, both could not be in the right; and it must be acknowledg'd, when the King divided from his Minister, and clos'd with his Parliament against him, that either the Earl was a bad Servant, or the King a bad Master.

We shall take our Leave of this illustrious Exile with observing, that, as well as the new Favourite, Buckingham, his Collegue in Power, Arlington, the good General, Albemarle, and his old Enemy Bristol, all appear'd with the utmost Bitterness against him, in the House of Lords; and all sign'd the Protest, which was enter'd in the Journals, on their Lordships refusing to sequester and commit him, upon the Demand of the Commons; as did likewise two Bishops, Dr. Lucy of St. David's, and Dr. Cotes of Durham.

(y) Against which see Lords enter'd their Protests, viz. Strafford, with Reason; and Berkeley, Haller, Lexington and Calceper, without.

(z) The Author of the Life of the Duke of Ormond undertaking to account for the Chancellor's losing his Interest in the House of Commons, is pleas'd to say, "He always gave the King prudent and honest Advice; but if it was over-rul'd (as was too often the Case) he did not care to intermeddle, but left it to wiser Men, as he fill'd them, to follow their own Measures, and to perform what they had consentedly undertaken for the King's Service. This manner of Conduct made him neglect his Interest (of which few Ministers have ever had a greater, and yet founded upon Virtue) in the House of Commons, till at last it was utterly rais'd. Archbishop Sheldon saw early what would be the Issue of this way of Proceeding, and did not fail to represent it to the Chancellor; but he was not to be remov'd from the Plan of Counsel which he had laid down to himself; so that Sheldon could not forbear complaining in his Letters to the Duke of Ormond, that Clarendon had by that Means ruin'd himself, and suffer'd the Church to fall into that Danger, wherein it was at the time that the Seals were taken from him."

In the Language of Politicians, this is as much as to say, That he left the Friends of the Ministry, to those who had the Power; and that when his own immediate Interest was out of the Question, the Interest of the Idol which he himself had set up, had no Weight with him.

(a) Some Light is thrown upon this Affair by the Part of a Letter from Lord Arlington to Lord Sandwich, which follows:

"There are two Occasions in Town, which beget much Discourse here, and 'tis probable will do the like in Madrid; wherefore I thought fit your Excellency should be entertain'd with the Truth of them. They are the Return of the Scotch Regiment into France, and the carrying over thither some reformed Roman Catholics under the Conduct of Mr. George Hamilton; there being lately a severe Order from his Majesty for the purging all the Troops both Officers and Soldiers, from those of that Profession.

The Story of the former is this, When the King of France declared War against his Majesty, his Majesty call'd home the Scotch Regiment, which had served in France for many Years. They accordingly came, and served in a Body on the several Occasions to which they were apply'd. The People murmuring at them, and complaining of the Government for employing Papists, made my Lord Douglas, as soon as the Peace was made, beseech his Majesty he might return with them into France; accordingly they are this Tho' this Prosecution of the late Chancellor was the principal Object of the public Attention, many other Matters were, at the same time, transacting, which ought not to be pass'd over in Silence. In particular, the House of Commons being inform'd, that some Soldiers, together with their Hories and Arms, were in Readiness to be (a) transported to foreign Parts, a Resolution was taken to address his Majesty to refrain the said Transportation. By another Address, they likewise pray'd his Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to encourage the wearing of the English Manufactures: And they moreover embrac'd his Majesty's Permission, or rather asserted their own Privilege, to perfect a Bill for taking and stating the public Accounts; which receiv'd the Royal Assent at the same time with that for banishing the Earl of Clarendon, and another (b) for settling Freedom and Intercourse of Trade between England and Scotland.

And now all the Business having been dispatch'd which the Court had ready digested, the King, by Message, on Thursday December 19, signify'd his Willingness that the House should adjourn to February the 6th following; with which the House as willingly comply'd.

It is now necessary to shift the Scene to foreign Affairs.

The French had so well concerted their Affairs, and had choic'd so lucky an Opportunity,

Week going thither. Your Excellency sees they could not well be satisfied here. That in Flanders, for the long Education they have had in France, they could be of no more Use than to many French Men. Now your Excellency may judge what his Majesty could otherwise do with them.

Concerning the Reformado's of the Guards of Horse, his Majesty thought fit the other Day to have them dismiss, according to his Promise made to the Parliament at the last Session. Mr. Hamilton had a secret Overture made him, that he, with these Men, should be welcome to the French Service; his Majesty, in their Dismission, having declared they should have leave to go abroad whither they pleas'd; they accepted of Mr. Hamilton's Offer to carry them into France. The Spanish Ambassador bearing this, complained thereof to his Majesty, who order'd to know nothing more of it, than that he had given them leave to seek their Fortune where they could find it; that, having turned them out of his Guard, he was unwilling to proceed with any further Severity towards them, by contradicting them to serve against their liking; that if he (the Spanish Ambassador) could prevail with them to go into Flanders, they should have Passports accordingly given them.

Thus your Excellency sees, that the Particulars being known, the Offense, that is taken, is not so well grounded, and that it will not be hard for you to give Satisfaction thereupon, if it be required."

This serves to show how well dispos'd our Ministers were to oblige the French Court. It is, however probable, that these very Soldiers were afterwards sent to Flanders; for in another Letter from Lord Arlington to Sir William Fanshawe, we have the following Paragraph which will scarce admit of any other Interpretation:

"I am sorry to see the Trouble coming upon you by following the Payment of the Earl's Troops, because you will not be able to satisfy the Minister. You may say, that if they will have more Men, they must write to their Friends in England that they are well off. Here is a Report that Mr. Hamilton hath lost forty or fifty Men; and how the Spanish Ambassador hath promised to express it favourably to the Marquis. If the Addition of your good Offices can add any thing to this, I pray be no Niggard: For the King of France loath'd little, is the only Difficulty will be upon their Hories."

(b) The Commissioners appointed by this Act were the Lord Brexton, William Pierpont, Esq; Sir George Saville, Bart. Giles Dainger, Esq; Sir James Laughan, Kt. Henry Osborne, Esq; Sir William Turner, Alderman of London, George Tomlin, Esq; and John Gregory, Esq;

tunity, that their Attempt on Flanders had succeeded to their own Hearts Desire. The Spaniards were unprovided for a Defence; the Emperor look'd on, as if he had no Concern in the Event; and England and Holland had the Sword at each other's Throat.

Fearful, however, that, if he should carry his Conquests beyond his Claims, the neighbouring Powers would, at last, take the Alarm, and declare in Favour of Spain; and, in particular, that the Dutch would not forget the Fraud which he had practis'd towards them, by challenging, and securing Possession at the same Instant, his most Christian Majesty to shew his great Moderation, such was the Pretence, thought it advisable to mark out his own Bounds, and to let the States know upon what Conditions he was willing to restore Peace to Spain, and to put a stop to the Apprehensions of Europe. But these (c) Con-

French Majesty.

(c) What these Conditions were, and how the Affair hung, will best be understood from the following Memorial from the most Christian King to Mr. d'Eftrades:

"The Sieur de Wit having instantly intreated the King by the said Count d'Eftrades, in the beginning of last July, to explain the Satisfaction which his Majesty might desire in order to accommodating with Spain the Differences which had for some Months disturb'd the Public Peace, the said Sieur de Wit giving to understand, that if his said Majesty and the States might agree together the Conditions of the said Accommodation, the States would oblige the Spaniards to clothe with it, either by their very efficacious Offices, or even by Force of Arms, if necessary to make use of them; his said Majesty having found Monsieur de Wit's Design to be very good, being what may establish for ever a perfect Union between this Crown and their State, which cannot then any longer conceive any unjust Unburden at the Grandeur of his Majesty's Designs and Power, charg'd the said Sieur d'Eftrades to tell the said Sieur de Wit, that after having maturely consider'd and deliberated on this important Affair, he was at last come to a Resolution, for Peace sake, to content himself with an Accommodation on the following Conditions, in case that they brought the Spaniards to comply with them.

That the said Spaniards yield to him for his present Pretensions, the French Compts, the Dutchy of Luxemburg, Charleroy, Cambrai and the Cambresis, Tournay, Duay, Arras and St. Omer, Burgoyne and Furnes; and even in that his Majesty has regard to give great Moderation, in Consideration of what Spain is to do at the same time for the Satisfaction of the King of Portugal, his said Majesty not being able, nor will he conclude any Accommodation, without the said King, and to speak truly, his said Majesty having Rights over all the Provinces of his Low Countries under the Dominion of Spain, except some part of the Barldoms of Flanders; and being in a Condition able to reduce it to Reason by Force of Arms, no disinterested Person can deny, that what he pretends for his Satisfaction is very moderate, in which, as he has already said, his End is the Contentment of the King of Portugal, whom the Spaniards are also to satisfy on the Title of King, which is the sole Difference remaining betwixt them.

The said Count d'Eftrades advises the King by his Dispatch of the 21st of July, that the Sieur de Wit told him, after he had discours'd as from himself with the abled Deputies of the States of Holland on the Conditions of the Accommodation above-mention'd, they all concluded, after several Discourses which they frequently had on that Affair with the Spaniards Ambassador Frigate, and other Persons affected to the House of Austria, that the Spaniards would very near as soon quit the whole Spanish Netherlands, as yield to his Majesty the Places and Countries above-mention'd.

But that if his said Majesty would refrain himself to a more moderate Pretension, he the said Sieur de Wit, and the Deputies his Friends with whom he had confer'd as of his own accord, believ'd that they might induce the Spaniards to give his Majesty Satisfaction on the following Conditions.

To yield the French Compts, Cambrai and the Cambresis, Duay, St. Omer, Arras, Burgoyne and Furnes, with their Bailiwicks, Castellanes and Dependences, that Charleroy should be rest'd, and Tournay and all the other Places which his Majesty had taken restor'd; that his Majesty should consent to a Suspension of Arms for ——— Months, that the States would cause Instances to be made at Madrid and at Vienne, to oblige the Spaniards to consent to this, and in case the said Spaniards did not incline to satisfy his said Majesty on the Conditions immediately before specified, the French States would take Arms to constrain them by Force, at the same Moment that the said States should engage themselves by a Treaty with his Majesty.

The said Sieur de Wit added, that 'twould be necessary at the same time to take Measures together on the Case of the Decease of the King of Spain without Children, and these Measures should be to make a secret Treaty separate from the former, which should import, that in the Case above-mention'd of the Decease of the King of Spain, then was to be resum'd the same Project, which was made some time past, with the same Partition, and that his Majesty and the States should take Arms to drive the Spaniards out of the Low Countries, and canton the great Cities, and oblige them to turn themselves into Republics; which should be done before the Emperor was in Condition to assist them; and by this Means his said Majesty would be at Liberty to reap the Succession in the whole Extent of his Kingdoms that the Spaniards possess'd; and that the said Sieur de Wit esteem'd it to be no small thing to have nothing to fear on the Side of Germany, since the States and their Allies could raise a potent Army to oppose whatever could come from the Empire. This was the Sieur de Wit's Answer, and his Offers on the King's first Declaration; on which his Majesty having shew'd very maturely deliberated after his Return from the Army, and being willing to convince all the World, by very testible and palpable Effects, of the Truth of all whatever he has always said and written of his reasonable and very moderate Disposition, considering the Quality and Importance of his Rights, and how far he is from the Thoughts of an Universal Monarchy, which his Enemies maliciously and falsely ascribe to him, or from forming an unalterable Design of an entire Conquest of the Netherlands; and being willing to evince to the States General of the United Provinces, his Allies, the Complaisance which he has for their Satisfaction, and how much Defiance he pays to their Counsels or their Desires, his said Majesty will have that the said Sieur d'Eftrades do in Consequence give the said Sieur de Wit to understand,

In the first Place, That on the future and very essential Case of the Death of the King of Spain without Children, he agrees and entirely accepts the Proposal of the said Sieur de Wit, in the same Terms, that 'is here just before express'd, and will put and sign at present the Treaties which they propose.

In the second Place, regarding the reciprocal Conditions which the Sieur de Wit offers on the Part of the States in manner above express'd, touching the Accommodation of the present Differences, his Majesty will consent to content himself for his Satisfaction with the Dutchy of Luxemburg, Cambrai and the Cambresis, Duay, Arras and St. Omer, Burgoyne and Furnes, with their Bailiwicks, Castellanes and Dependences, to raise Charleroy, and render to the King of Spain all the other Places and Countries which his Arms had conquer'd since their Entry into Flanders; and in Consideration that the said King shall agree to treat with the King of Portugal not from Crown to Crown, as has been done by the Interposition of the English, but shall make Peace with him directly from King to King, his said Majesty will for that single Point of Honour depart from the French Compts, Charleroy and Tournay, which he demanded by his first Proposal.

The said Sieur d'Eftrades is also to observe to the said Sieur de Wit, that the Affairs of Portugal ought not to prove any Obstacle to a general Accommodation, since the Spanish Ministers residing in all Courts have for some time given out, that 'twas at last resolv'd at Madrid to make Peace with Portugal, and to treat from King to King, which is the sole Difficulty.

The said Sieur d'Eftrades will also observe to the said Sieur de Wit, with regard to the Alteration made in the Proposal, by substituting instead of the French Compts, the Dutchy of Luxemburg, that the Sieur de Wit himself has frequently testify'd his great Joy, speaking of the Conference which he had with the Ministers of the House of Austria, that Spain would easier yield the Dutchy of Luxemburg, where it possess'd but one Place, and where his Majesty has three which are fortify'd, than part with the French Compts, which is a larger Extent of Land, and which it sets a greater Value on, for being the ancient Patrimony of the House of Burgoyne; so that the Charge of one for the other in the Offer of the said Sieur de Wit, which his Majesty has done, tends rather to facilitate than to obstruct the Treaty.

And also the said Sieur d'Eftrades shall acquaint the Sieur de Wit, that if the Spaniards had rather part with the French Compts, than the Dutchy of Luxemburg, his Majesty will clothe with them.

As for the Suspension of Arms, he is to tell him, that before it is possible to have any Answer from Spain, the Winter Season, which is now approach'd, will naturally occasion the said Cession of Arms; the Conditions of which, if the Conclusion of a Treaty be resolv'd on, will probably be very difficult to adjust.

But yet in either Case, if the States persist in that Re-

Conditions being thought too exorbitant, and more adapted to put the rest of Flanders in his Power, when he should think proper to make a second Attempt, than to remove the Umbrage occasion'd by the first, tho' their Lordships seem'd dispos'd to yield their Concurrence, they resolv'd to defer it as long as possible: And even Mr. de Wit himself, tho' he still declar'd himself to be as much at the Devotion of France as ever, could not help looking round for Ways and Means to free himself from a Dependence, which began to grow uneasy to him, and his Country, from the too near Neighbourhood of a Power, which could neither be trusted, nor controlled.

All this while, the Spanish Embassadors were extremely sollicitous to engage the maritime Powers in their Quarrel; in Holland, urging the Proximity of the Danger; and in England, the Glory of holding the Balance of Power, and the extreme Generosity, as well as good Policy, of throwing our Weight into the Scale, in order to set it once more even.

But our Ministers were not to be mov'd by any such airy Considerations: To keep themselves easy in their Posts, by keeping things easy at home was the Root of their Policy. They were, therefore, for driving a Bargain, for obtaining an Equivalent, for making Merchandise of their Assistance. Their Mediation, indeed, which cost them nothing, they freely offer'd; and, as it was worth nothing, so it produced nothing.

What Correspondence they carry'd on with France, at this time, what Offers were made from thence, or what Disposition they shew'd to accept them, cannot be exactly specify'd: But, from a (e) Variety of Circumstances, quod, his Majesty will grant the whole Principal and sole Effect which they can think of for their Interests: that is to say, that he will make no Difficulty to promise to attempt nothing on any fortify'd Place of the Spaniards in the Low Countries, if they will respectively oblige themselves to attempt nothing on his Majesty's strong Places, either which he before possess'd on that Side, or which he has conquer'd in the last Campaign; and at the same time, instead of three Months what the Sieur de Wit asks, his Majesty will consent to what has been said 'till next Month, which will be his entire Month, on Condition that the States will promise from this present, that if betwixt this and that time the Accommodation, as above projected, be not concluded for want of the Spaniards' Consent, the States shall not on any Pretence, whatsoever may happen, make any such Influence as his Majesty has the Prerogative beyond the said Month of March of the said Concert, to make no Attempt in the Netherlands on the strong Places on either Side.

Yet, that all Christendom, and particularly the States, may be yet more evidently convinc'd how much the real Dispositions of his Majesty are inclin'd to a quick Accommodation, and how moderate his Sentiments on that regard are, the said Sieur de Ebrades shall also declare on his part to the said Sieur de Wit, that if the Spaniards show too great a Repugnance to satisfy his Majesty on the Conditions already mention'd, he will consent from this present to lay down his Arms, and also sacrifice to the Public all the Hopes which he might reasonably conceive of pulling his Success considerably forwards the next Campaign; provided that the Spaniards, besides satisfying the King of Portugal, will yield to his Majesty in due Form by a Treaty of Peace, which may be made this Winter, all the strong Places and Posts and their Castellies and Dependencies which his Arms have and shall conquer, possess or fortify during this Year's Campaign; and by Means of this Alternative, which his Majesty will be content that the States shall offer to the King of Spain, the reciprocal Conditions on their Part above specify'd, and offer'd by the Sieur de Wit, always provided, in case the Spaniards refuse to consent to the Accommodation: 'Tis easy to see that his Majesty puts into the Hands of the said King of Spain the Peace of Christendom, by the Cession of certain Places which he has already lost, and which probably other Princes will think he is in a Condition to reconquer, than to lose yet more, by the Advantages which those afford to his Majesty's Arms to pursue their Success; after which his Majesty leaves all disinterested Persons to judge whether he can make greater Advances and contribute more than his Majesty has done to the Re-establishment of the public Peace; and if after this any Prince or Potentate can, with the least Appearance of Reason or Justice, think of forming Leagues against his Majesty's Design, as tending to Universal Monarchy, or even only to the Conquest of the Low Countries.

(d) 'Tis it is a vain thing, in the Condition we are in, to attempt the moving us by Considerations of Generosity and Honour; in prosperous Times they have much Weight. And, the Truth is, they are improperly alleg'd to us by Neighbour, that sine securely looking upon us, whilst we held a War with Three great Potentates. This is the Effect of my Discourse to the States. After all, I have assured him, his Majesty and his Ministers have all possible Consideration for the Condition of Flanders, and with they were in a Condition of securing it. Concluding with him, that he shall do well to drive his Arguments as far as they will go, and to get them authorized from Spain also. And not to wonder at the Want of Success, as long as the Emperor appears no farther concerned in the Cause of his own House." Lord Arlington to Sir W. Temple.

"It cannot but so happen, that the Pressures the Spanish Embassadors makes upon us here will be apply'd likewise to your Excellency there: In which Case, all his Majesty yet allows you to say is, that you are sure the King our Master would willingly glad them if he could. That you shall represent better to him what they desire; but that, whilst, you would be glad to know what Equivalent you may offer with the Proposition, since it carries much Charge and Hazard with it, at a time that this Crown is not in a very good Condition to support either: That France must needs receive a sensible Provocation by our embracing it; and, having such an Influence upon Holland, may, upon an Accommodation of this Quarrel, call to them to be their Seconds in a new one with us, as they were before to them. These Considerations, and many more that may easily occur to your Excellency, make it hard for us, who have them, to run so easily to the Opinion, that his Majesty shall succeed Flanders, whatever it cost him." Lord Arlington to Lord Sandwich.

(e) Mr. de Lionne, writing to Mr. de Ebrades, Nov. 4. 1667, N. S. expresses himself to the following Effect:

"I cannot conclude without telling you, beawixt you and I, for your private Satisfaction, that I, after the King has put into the Hands of the States the Certainty of Peace, on the Conditions which Monsieur de Wit propos'd, provided that they would but exert themselves as they ought to the Spaniards, the said States, instead of that, take up the Cards, and make Alliances, contrary to the Interests of his Majesty; we shall not be so much surpris'd at it here, as they may think. I know what I say, and on what Foundation I say it. Those, who would do us a Mischief, will do more to themselves, and perhaps better advance the Advantages of his Majesty; wherefore I say merrily, whenever you see happen."

And again, Jan. 12: "We agree with you here on the Truth of what you write, that at London there are secret Endeavours to engage the States to a League for the Defence of the Low Countries: And if there should be more but . . . [Rome] only, who lov'd the Spaniards, he will never fail trumping up such Propositions. But the King knows, beyond Possibility of a Doubt, that whatever the English will do on this Occasion, results only from their Jealousy and Fear, that the States should enter into stricter Alliances with his Majesty; and, perhaps, to engage them to Measures which may entirely disable France. And I may add, that if the Negotiations of this League should advance at London, in such manner as to render the King apprehensive of the Conclusion of it, he has in readiness some sure Methods to stop it, almost at once, and, at the same time, do the English the greatest Pleasure in the World. I cannot explain myself farther; but Monsieur de Wit has too much Penetration, not easily to know and judge, that what I say is true."

And again, from Mr. de Ebrades to Mr. de Lionne, January 11:

"The Spaniards had, at that time, dispersed thro' the Cities and Provinces a Letter from England, which contain'd, that Monsieur de Ruvigny propos'd to the King of England a League offensive and defensive, against all, and particularly the States; that the two Kings should divide Flanders; and that Zealand should be allotted to England, and Brabant to the King, pre-supposing by this League the declaring War against the States. It contain'd, besides, some other important Articles."

A. D. 1667.
Lord Arlington's Letters.

A. D. 1667. cumstances, it may be gather'd, that the most Christian King did not depend solely on his Majesty's Letter to the Queen Mother, before-quoted, tho' still in Force; but, on the contrary, continued to make such Instances by Mr. Ruvigny, who was now his Resident at London, as he knew could not fail of being agreeable to the Palate of the Court, however they might relish with the People.

The Bent of the People was, indeed, quite the other Way. Nothing founds so disagreeably in England, as the Acquisitions of France. If we are not afraid of her Strength, we are jealous of her Glory: And hence we so greedily snatch at every Opportunity to humble her: It is, in truth, the Foible of the English Nation; and no sooner was it thoroughly found out, than we were indulg'd in the Gratification of it, to our own Ruin.

Our new First-Mover, therefore, whose Favour was, in a great degree, owing to his Popularity, could not venture, at first, to embrace those Proposals openly, which he entertain'd in private. A Supply was, however, necessary: His Majesty's Coffers rung hollow; and tho' the Spaniards did not refuse to replenish them, they were willing to see us embark'd in the Service, before they made us any Advances of Pay: Without some Measure, which kept time with the Pulse of the Public, there was no Hope of an Aid from the Public, nor Colour to demand one: And here we have the true Motive of the famous Triple League; to gain Time for which, the late long Adjournment was made.

As the Writings of Sir William Temple, who was, on our Side, the great Instrument of bringing this Point to bear, are in every body's Hand, there is the less Reason to enlarge upon it here.

We shall only observe, therefore, that his Instructions were, at first, confin'd to the States only: That the Proposal, of making Sweden a Party, came originally from de Wit; and that the utmost Scope of the whole Measure was only to oblige France to be content with her own Proposals; that is to say, of laying down her Arms; provided the Spaniard would either yield up all those Places, which she had conquer'd last Year; or the Duchy of Luxembourg, or County of Burgundy, TOGETHER with Cambrey, and the

Cambresis, Doway, Aire, St. Omer, Wimox. A. D. 1667. bergen, Furnes, and Lincken, with their Dependencies.

As France, by this Treaty, was liable to no Danger, and could receive no Detriment, in case she fulfilled her own Offers; so, in case Spain refused to make the Cession requir'd, she was to be compelled to do it by the joint Forces of the League. At the same time, therefore, that the saving the Residue of Flanders was so much magnify'd here at home, Mr. de Wit was enabled to baffle all the Complaints of his old Friend d'Esbrades, on the Occasion of signing the League, without the Participation of France, by insisting, that it had for its Basis the (f) Interest of the most Christian King; that he had entered into it for his Majesty's Service; and that he did not himself believe he could have brought the King of England to have made that Step in his Favour.

But if it was only the Manner which France had Reason to object to, Spain was dissatisfied to the last degree with the Matter of the said Treaty: Security for the Remainder of her Possessions was not the Point she aim'd at: She wanted to recover her Losses, to chastise the Perfidy of her Enemy; and, for want of Power to do that, was on the Point of turning the Tables on her Half-Friends, England and Holland, by throwing all Flanders into the Hands of France, in Exchange for an Equivalent on the Borders of Spain.

However, being thus cruelly beset, with the French Arms on one Hand, and the overbearing Instances of the Maritime Powers on the other; she was, however, at last, compelled to come in. But then it was on the Alternative, of giving up the new Conquests, instead of Burgundy; which, she thought, would leave Flanders most expos'd to the Designs of France, and consequently would oblige the said Maritime Powers to be more anxious for its future Safety.

Objects are as indistinct when placed too near the Eye, as when too far from it. Thus the Triple League appear'd to the Patriots of those Times to be rather a more advantageous Measure than perhaps it really was: It had, indeed, a fair and plausible Outside; but was not found at Heart: It was of the Expedient-Kind: It staunch'd the Blood; but did not heal the Wound. And again, from Lord Allington to Lord Sandwich:
"As the Receipt of this, I suppose your Excellency will think it fit to acquaint the Queen, or the Ministers here at least, of his Majesty's Intentions to recd you speedily; and accordingly dispose them to put into your Hands their last Offers of the Terms they will give and take from his Majesty, in a stricter Union betwixt the two Crowns. It may obviously occur to them to suppose, that France, in the Prosecution of the War in Flanders, will give his Majesty soon Counters, even to forbear assisting against them. It is true, the popular Opinion here is opposite to this; but when the Necessities of the Kingdom, after such a War, and so faulty a Government as we are suppos'd to have liv'd under, shall go into the other Balance, it is not likely to be long so, nor cannot be maintain'd, but by the Parliament's giving his Majesty yet more Money than they are either able or willing to do. The present Game of France is, to take off us from the Help of Spain, by shewing the Likelihood of their making the Peace, by assuring Holland, that they shall have the Profit and Honour of making it: And yet, in the mean time, to prepare to vigorously for the next Year's War, as if they never meant indeed to make the Peace. The Game of Holland is, to effect it indeed; and, in the mean time, Spain doth nothing to invite their Neighbours to concur in their Alliance, but by telling them, that they must oppose this growing Greatness of France, because at last it will be prejudicial to them."

(f) In a Letter from his most Christian Majesty to Mr. d'Esbrades, dated January 27, there is the following Passage:

"'Tis above twenty Days since I receiv'd News from England, the Storms at Sea having hindered the Packet-Boats coming to Calais; so that I cannot yet know any thing from London, even what pass'd with Sir William Temple when he arriv'd, and was sent to the Hague; but I will venture to say, that 'twill be a Push towards the Peace, which will render it infallible and expeditious, if the King of Great Britain enters into the same Sentiment with the States-General, to oblige the Spaniards to the Acceptance of the two Alternatives. In the Interim, 'twould be well if the Sieur de Wit would write to the Embassadors Merian and Boute, to carry themselves less reliev'd to the Sieur de Ruvigny."

Treaty of Commerce ratify'd with Spain.

Peace between Spain and Portugal.

New Regulations of the Privy Council.

Num. 232.

To put a stop to the Progress of the French Arms, was, however, a Matter of Moment, and met with a Reception accordingly: The Court glory'd in it; and the People, if not their Representatives, talk'd of it with Rapture. To crown the Felicity of the new Minister, soon after this boasted Measure took place, the long-dependant Treaty of Commerce, between the two Crowns of England and Spain, was ratify'd; and, on the 19th of February, Sir Robert Southwell arriv'd from Lisbon with the grateful News, that Spain, in many Ways distress'd and embarrass'd, had been, at last, oblig'd to treat (g) with Portugal, King to King, under the Mediation of the Earl of Sandwich, in the Name of Great Britain; whereby the Independency of that Kingdom, which had been recover'd by the Address and Resolution of her own Nobility, the Intrigues of the French, and the (h) Bravery of the English, much to her own particular Honour and Advantage, but more to the Detriment of Europe in general, was confirm'd and established.

And that the Public might have as much Reason to be satisfi'd with the Management at home, as abroad, Notice was given in the Gazette, That his Majesty, continuing to pursue what he had so happily begun, for the better regulating his Affairs for the future, had establish'd a Committee for foreign Affairs; to which also all Justices of the Peace, and all other his Majesty's Officers and Ministers were to apply: A Committee for such Matters as concern'd the Admiralty, Navy, Fortifications, and all military Affairs, without intermeddling in what concerns the A. D. 1667-8. proper Officers, unless by them desired: A Committee for Trade and Navigation: And, a Committee for Complaints and Grievances, under the express Restriction of not meddling with Property, or what relates to meum or tuum: To render which Constitution (so it is call'd) more effectual, it was further declar'd, in his Majesty's Name, that, for the future, nothing was to be resolv'd in Council, till the Matter had been first examined by, and receiv'd the Opinion of, some Committee or other; and that nothing should be referred to any Committee, which had not first been read at the Board.

Profligate and abandon'd as the Duke of Buckingham certainly was, it ought to be allow'd, that this Constitution had no Relish of his Vices: On the contrary, had it been suffer'd to operate as uninterrupted, as it was wisely fram'd, in all human Probability, the Government had been rever'd, and the People happy.

It is but seldom that so laudable a Disposition appears in Courts; and, whenever it does, it ought to be receiv'd with Respect and Gratitude. During this whole Reign, so many, and such remarkable, Concessions had never been made to the People; nor had our foreign Affairs ever worn so flattering an Aspect: Hence it was natural to imagine, that the good Humour of the House of Commons would have return'd with the Happiness of the Public; and that those who had gone such Lengths in gratifying the King's unjustifiable Relentments against an obnoxious Minister, would have gladly countenanced those Measures of his, that seem'd, at least, to have no other Tendency than the common Good.

But all these unexceptionable Regulations

(g) The Articles of the Peace were to this Effect:

That there be a sincere and perpetual Peace between his Catholic Majesty and the King of Portugal. That all Places taken in the War, shall, on either Side, be restor'd within two Months, together with such Artillery as they had at the time of Seizure; only the City of Costa to remain unto his Catholic Majesty. That in Point of Traffic, Portugal shall enjoy all the Benefits lately granted by his Catholic Majesty unto the English, and whatever other Privileges they themselves formerly enjoyed in the time of King Sebastian. That the Peace shall commence within a Year in the Indies, and sooner, if Advice thereof can be sent into those distant Parts; but, if after that time any Hostilities be committed, the Damage shall on either Side be repaired. That all Prisoners of War shall forthwith be set at Liberty, without any Ransom or Impediment on either Side. That all Confiscation of Estates upon the Account of War, be declared null, and all Persons be restor'd unto these Possessions, which they might have enjoyed, in case the War had never been. That if any particular Outrage be committed on either Side, the same shall be no Pretext to return to the War, but according to Custom, Letters of Marque and Reprisals shall be granted, if in such Cases Justice be denied. That Portugal may freely enter and partake in any League which England shall make with its Confederates. And that in Virtue of this Treaty, all the Articles of any such League shall be valid, and of the same Force, as if express'd herein. That as well the Catholic King as the King of Portugal, each for themselves, do promise an inviolable Observation of this Treaty. And they also do the same jointly with his Majesty of Great Britain, as the Mediator and Guaranty of this Peace. That the Peace shall be ratify'd in fifteen Days after the Signing, and being then published with all Expedition, the Articles shall afterwards be acknowledged and ratify'd by his Majesty of Great Britain in the Space of four Months next ensuing.

the Portuguese were of the Faterans which, under Cromwell, were the Admiration and Terror of Europe; nor in this foreign Service, did they show any Abatement of Spirit, or suffer their Glory to diminish; on the contrary, it appears, even in the partial Writings of Ablancourt (but in our own there remains no Memorial of their Valour) that to their amazing Efforts, and the admirable Conduct of Count Schomberg, Portugal owed her repeated Triumphs over the whole Force of Spain.

Of this let the following remarkable Incident, taken from the Memoirs of that very Ablancourt, bear eternal Testimony.

Towards the End of the Month of June, the Duke of Osuna, taking Advantage of the Absence of the Troops of Osuna, which were in Alentejo, went with 8000 Men and lay down before Castle Rodrigs (strong only by its Situation upon a high Mountain, surrounded with pleasant and fertile Valleys) which he batter'd with nine Pieces of Cannon, there being only 250 Men in Garrison.

Pedro James de Magalhães (of the Race of the famous Magellan, who draws his Origin from France) who commanded the Portuguese in that Country, having assembled 4000 Foot and 600 Horse at Alentejo, marching in the Night with that little Army, and two Field-Pieces, with a Design to relieve the Place, which was but three Leagues distant, most of his Men having red and blue Caps of the English Fashion, which they had made of little Mantles they had taken from the Country-Women; and appearing in the Morning betwixt the Castle and the Besieger, the latter perceiving their colour'd Caps, were so surpris'd, that, crying out, San English (they are English) they all immediately took themselves to Flight. And tho' some of the Casilians hallo'd at the River of Aguires, the Portuguese still pursuing them, took all their Baggage and Cannon, with 1700 Prisoners, many of which were of no Note; That Victory having cost the Portuguese only twenty Men kill'd, and six wounded.

A.D. 1667-B. at home, tho' accompany'd with such applauded Measures, crown'd with such happy Events abroad, had not the Effect which might have been reasonably expected; for what Reason, we are now to explain.

The Duke of Buckingham, whether from good or bad Motives, had taken a Resolution to make use of his present Power and Greatness to put a Period to the Sufferings of those, who, either for Conscience or Humour sake, had dissent'd from the Religion established by Law; and to (i) restore them to the Privileges of Englishmen: In which he had the Honour to be assisted by the Lord Keeper Bridgeman, and the irreproachable Lord Chief Justice Hale.

This alarm'd the Church; which, orthodox as it is, has always thought itself in Danger, whenever a Christian Government made use of Christian Charity. His Grace, in the Distribution of Places, had, moreover, not look'd upon those who had been formerly for a Commonwealth as unqualify'd for the public Service; but, on the contrary, had endeavour'd to attach several of those Persons to the Interest of the Crown, by making their own Interest depend upon it. This displeas'd the Parliament; who, dreading the Repentments of those they had so long persecuted, could not forgive a Proceeding so much to their own Prejudice.

It is not for nought, that the Words Church and State are so often coupled together; and that the First has so insolently usurp'd the Precedency of the Last. The Disobliged and Discontented in both soon found out each other's Grievance, and as soon resolv'd, by each other's Help, to find out a Remedy.

The two Houses met on Thursday Feb. 6, but were directed to adjourn till the Monday following, when his Majesty, having acquainted them with the new League he had made with Holland, in order to the effectual Mediation of a Peace between France and Spain, and desired of them a Supply to fit out a considerable Fleet pursuant to that Alliance, concluded in these Words: "And, for the settling of a firm Peace, as well at home as abroad, one thing more I hold myself oblig'd to recommend to you at this present, which is, that you would seriously think of some Course to beget a better Union and Composure in the Minds of my Protestant Subjects, in Matter of Religion; whereby they may be induced, not only to submit quietly to the Government, but also faithfully give their Assistance to the Support of it."

And now it was, that those who, at the Opening of the former Meeting, had so many Thanks to offer to the Throne, could not be induc'd to make his Majesty the least Acknowledgment for taking those Measures, which have been esteem'd the Glory of his Reign. The Mercy shewn to Dissenters, and the Favour shewn to the Friends of Liberty, had spoil'd all: He met with the worst Usage, when he deserv'd the best; and even the Champions for the Prerogative preposterously glory in an Opposition to the Crown, because inspired by the Fathers of the Church.

Let us be allow'd to make use of their own Words, in recounting this Part of our Story:

"In the two last Sessions, there had been strange Divisions among them, scarce two Persons agreeing together, or daring to trust one another; the best Things were oppos'd, purely because this or that Man propos'd them, and every body that wish'd well to the Church and Crown were under terrible Apprehensions of Measures being taken that would be prejudicial, and perhaps in the End prove fatal to both. Never were there more melancholy Descriptions of Confusions and Distractions, than were given of those in this House of Commons, in the Letters of the Members for two Years together; and never was there seen a more sudden Turn than was now produc'd in an Hour, when many honourable and wise Persons thought it was scarce possible to produce it in an Age.

The Seculars had been exceedingly elated at the Situation of Affairs, and the Disposition of the Court in their Favour; and had made too early and open Discoveries of their Expectations of coming soon into Power, which did not pass unobserved. As soon as the House met, and before his Majesty came, a Motion was made, upon divers Informations from several Counties and Cities of new Swarms of Conventicles, and that Persons, generally disaffected to Church-government, had boldly taken upon themselves to summon all of their own Principles, and to promisc them an Act of Comprehension to pass that Session for a general Toleration, the Heads of which were offer'd in Writing by one of the Members. This reunited at once all the Friends to the Constitution in Church and State; and a Vote immediately pass'd, that such of the Members as were of the Privy-Council should attend his Majesty with a Request,

(1) Of this Affair, Dr. Calamy, who is follow'd both by Bishop Kennet and Mr. Archdeacon Eborac, gives the following Account, That Dr. Manton sent a Letter to Mr. Baxter, intimating that Sir John Baker, who belong'd to the Lord-Keeper Bridgeman, told him that his Lordship desired to confer with them two about a Comprehension and Toleration. And thus waiting upon the Keeper accordingly, he freely told them, "That he had sent for them to think of a Way of their Restoration; and to that End he had some Proposals to offer to them, which was for a Comprehension for the Presbyterians, and an Indulgence for the Independents, and the rest." After some Debate it was agreed to go first upon the Business of Comprehension; upon which Occasion Dr. Wilkins, and the Keeper's Chaplain, Dr. Barton, were consult'd. The Point they most disfered about was Re-Ordination; but at last Chief-Justice Hale suggest'd an Expedient to adjust the Difference; which was, That those Nonconformists that had been ordain'd before, should be admitted into the Ministry of the Church of England with this Form of Words, Take thou Legal Authority to preach the Word of God, and administer the Holy Sacraments in any Congregation of England, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed to exercise. It was likewise agreed, That Ceremonies should be left indifferent, and the Liturgy alter'd; and that those who could not be comprehended should be indulg'd, and for Security to the Government, the Names of the Teachers, and all the Members of the Congregations, were to be register'd. Accordingly a Bill was drawn up by the said Chief-Justice, against the Meeting of the Parliament,

An Opposition form'd by the Church against the Court.

Life of the Duke of Ormond.

Request, in the Name of the House, "that he would issue out a Proclamation for putting in present Execution the Laws in force concerning Religion and Church-government now established, according to the Act of Uniformity." The Duke of Buckingham's Party pressed, but in vain, that the Vote might be repited, because his Majesty might possibly say something to them in his Speech concerning that Matter. After the Speech was made, the same Party pressed more earnestly than before, that the Address might not be tendered, till they had fully debated the Particulars in his Majesty's Speech; which, as soon as it was read, was carried back to his Majesty, and the Vote, being again affirmed, was delivered into the Hands of a Privy-Counsellor, to be presented to the King in the Afternoon.

Thus was defeated the Scheme of a Comprehension, which had the Honour of having the Duke of Buckingham for its Author, and no doubt tallied with the other Schemes which he had formed at this time; a Circumstance which will raise no advantageous Opinion of its being calculated for the Benefit of either Church or State. His Grace met with other Mortifications the same Day, which fully shewed the Vanity of his confident Undertakings for the Parliament: For, when his Friends mov'd to return his Majesty Thanks for his Speech, and for the (k) new Alliance, it was opposed, and, after some Debate, was laid aside, without a Question. The King's present Supply was then pressed; but the House resolved, That the Committee for the Miscarriages of the War should make their Report, and receive Directions from the House for their farther Enquiry, and the Reasons and Causes of the present Want and Poverty of the Kingdom should likewise be debated, before the Supply should be taken into Consideration."

Here we have, indeed, the Church triumphant over the Crown: But then a very unlucky Reflection arises to damp the Exultation expressed thereon, viz. That this Want and Poverty, and these Miscarriages, cannot be laid to the Charge of either Republican or Fanatic: Both King and Parliament, it is apparent, were in other Hands; and, according to the Evidence of this very Enquiry, could not have been in worse.

In the List of Miscarriages, voted by the House, we find, particularly mention'd, The Orders given by Brunkard to slacken Sail, after the first Battle with the Dutch, that the Duke of York might not be disturb'd in his Repose; to which was imputed the Escape of the Enemy's Fleet: The Disappointment of Berghen: The plundering two Dutch East-India Ships in September 1665, in which Interval an Opportunity was lost of engaging the Dutch Fleet to Advantage: The dividing of the Fleet, in the second Year of the War: The Want of Provision and Ammunition in the Navy and Ports: The Payment of Seamen by Tickets: The Want of Intelligence: The not fitting out a sufficient Fleet last Year: The Separation of those Ships that were set out, so that they became useless: And the Affair at Chatham.

It is very easy to see, that almost all the great Men at Court were affected by one or other of these Articles. The Earl of Sandwich was included in that of Berghen, and the plundering the East-India Ships; for which last Job, express Orders had been given by him to Sir William Pen. That relating to Intelligence was levelled at Lord (i) Arlington. The Division of the Fleet brought the Duke of Albemarle into Question. For the defenceless Condition of Chatham, and the Ships lying there, both his Grace as General, and his Royal Highness as Admiral, were equally accountable. In Brunkard's Affair, his Royal Highness alone was deeply concern'd. And even his Majesty had countenanced the plundering Job, by granting a Warrant for the Distribution of the Goods.

When the Judge is the Delinquent, Justice herself is sure to be non-suited. Thus, when the Commons took their Aim so high, it was pretty manifest, they rather meant to terrify, than do Execution: And the Event was answerable; for their Indignation fell at last on Commissioner Pett, Sir William Pen, Brunkard, and Brunkard, only; who, though impeach'd, were never punish'd.

They had Leisure, likewise, to pry into other Abuses, and finding the Timber of the Forest of Dean very lavishly granted away, not only prefer'd their humble Desire to his Majesty, to restrain the selling of any more, and the carrying off what was already sell'd, notwithstanding any Grants in being, but brought in a Bill (which afterwards receiv'd the Royal Assent) for the Increase and Preservation of Timber in the said Forest, which, in the Preamble, declar'd, That the Wood and Timber of the Crown, which of late Years was of very great Quantity and Value in that Forest, except in one Woodwardship, was become totally destroyed.

It is farther remarkable, that notwithstanding the Address before mentioned for enforcing the Laws concerning the establish'd Religion and Church-government, on March 4th, they resolv'd, that the House in a Body should address themselves to his Majesty, to desire him to issue forth his Proclamation for enforcing the Laws against Conventicles, and that Care may be taken for the Preservation of the Peace against unlawful Assemblies of Papists and Nonconformists; as likewise, that the latter Part of his Majesty's Speech

Thanks for the Speech rejected.

Miscarriages voted:

A.D. 1667-8.

Crown Timber wasteful.

Ad to prevent it.

Address for a Proclamation against Conventicles.

(1) Bishop Parker affirms, that the Triple Alliance was readily embraced by the House.

(2) As we learn by his own Letters; in one of which to Sir William Temple, dated February 17, we had the following Passage:

The House of Commons are yet in their Enquiry after Miscarriages; I leave it to your Correspondents to tell you what Votes they have pass'd therein. But cannot forbear letting you know that Mr. Norwel hath strook hard at me, upon the Point of Intelligence, tho' hitherto unsuccessfully, as to the doing of me any Harm thereby. This Day he hath given me cause to forgive him, by being the first Man, that, in the midst of this Enquiry, mov'd the taking into Consideration the Matter of his Majesty's Speech, which begot the Resolution of doing it on Wednesday Morning.

A.D. 1667-5. Speech be taken into Consideration that Day Fortnight.

The next Day this Vote was, accordingly presented to the King, who was pleased to answer to this Effect:

King's Answer.

" Gentlemen, I will issue forth my Proclamation, according to your Desire, and I do not doubt, but you will take the second Part of my Speech into Consideration, according to your Vote."

Gazette, Numb. 242.

Upon the 10th the King made good his Promise by setting forth the said Proclamation, but withal took Advantage of their Vote to specify in it, That the better Union of his Protestant Subjects was actually under Consideration; which was however so wide of their Intention, that when the Matter came into Debate it was carry'd, That no Man should bring an Act of that Nature into the House.

A Supply out of, but not made good.

Four Messages thereon.

(m) Before the End of February the House had voted his Majesty a Supply of 310,000*l.* but no Ways and Means had been thought of to make it good. By the 6th of March therefore, his Majesty thought proper to send them a quickening Message, in which he told them, it was absolutely necessary in respect of the Safety, as well as the Honour of the Nation, that a Fleet be set out with all Speed; that his Forts should be fortify'd, and that more Ships should be built; adding, " Because they had not yet had Satisfaction (upon the Bill of Accompts) of the former Supplies, he was very willing that this should be collected and issued for these Purposes, by such Persons, as the House should think fit."

1668.

But notwithstanding such pressing Reasons were urg'd in Support of this Demand, and such a condescending Circumstance was connected with it, the House continued still intractable. On the 30th following, his Majesty was therefore induc'd to summon them to Whitehall, and accost them in Person; where, in few Words, he conjur'd them to furnish his Supply, and dispatch the Business before them, in order to a Recess by Whitsuntide: But another Fortnight pass'd over as before, which produc'd another Message (April 13) tho' to no better Purpose, in a more peremptory Style, to let them know, that his Majesty was resolv'd to put a Period to the Session by the 4th of May; and that he earnestly minded them to dispatch the Supply, and other public Concerns by that time. The Smooth had no Effect; the Rough had an ill one: Of which his Majesty becoming sensible, he was forc'd to qualify all again by yet another Message, signifying, that to prevent the Loss of the Bills, then under Deliberation (one of which was to enforce, and enlarge the former Bill for suppressing Conventicles) he would be content with an Adjournment only for about three Months, and therefore desired them to perfect the Bill of Supplies, &c. by the said 4th of May.

Thus the Church was too mighty for the King; and when his Measures appear'd most innocent and laudable, this loyal House of Commons refus'd to part with a Shilling, till they had the Nonconformists again at their Mercy.

During this Litigation of the Supply, the great Misunderstanding arose between the two Houses concerning Skinner's Affair, which, according to Bishop Parker, and those who tread the same Track, was a concerted thing, in order to necessitate a Dissolution.

Misunderstanding between the two Houses, in Skinner's Case.

Skinner the Plaintiff was a considerable Merchant of London; the Defendants were the East-India Company, and in their Right, Sir Samuel Bernardiston, as their Governor. The Matter of Complaint was, that the said Company had seiz'd a Ship and Cargo of Skinner's, and assaulted his Person. Skinner, instead of commencing his Suit in Westminster Hall, has Recourse at once to the House of Lords, who give him a Hearing, and allot him 5000*l.* Damages. Sir Samuel and the Company on the other Hand, knowing no Ballance for the Power of one House, but that of the other, appeal to the Commons, who vote Skinner's Complaint, and the Lords Proceeding thereon, illegal. The Lords did the same by the Company's Appeal. The Commons order Skinner into the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms; and the Lords did the same by Sir Samuel, as likewise Sir Andrew Riccard, Mr. Rowland Gayme and Mr. Christopher Boone.

This is a Brief of the Case; and to prove that a Matter of such great Concern between an interloping Merchant, and a great privileg'd Company, was a deep, factious Intrigue, we are told, that Skinner was a Dependant of Lord Shaftsbury's; and Sir Samuel in 1641, when very young, was one of those who had cry'd out, Justice! Justice! against the Earl of Strafford.

Now, that two such Men should risque their Property, and forfeit their Liberty to forward the Schemes of State-Projectors, appears, at this Distance of Time, a little romantic; especially when 'tis further considered; that either a Dissolution would not have answer'd the Ends of those who are said to have desir'd it, because the Temper of the Lords could not have been alter'd by that Expedient; and the present House of Commons could not be more at the Devotion of the Church, than the Majority of their Constituents; or if it would, the Prerogative need no Excuse for bringing it into Play.

To Common Sense it seems more natural to conclude, that the Lords, recollecting the then recent Precedent of their having been voted useless; and being alarm'd at the manifest Superiority which the Commons had over them as to Grants and Supplies, had Recourse to this Method of entering the whole Judicature in themselves, that the absolute as well as ultimate Decision of Property, might reduce the Power, and with that

(m) By a Letter of Lord Arlington's, we are inform'd, that one Reason why they granted no more was, a Belief that his Majesty had yet 500,000*l.* of his old Money in Bank.

A. D. 1668. that, the Importance of the two Houses, nearer to an Equality.

But, whatever Glorify this Matter may reasonably bear, none seems easy to be found for the many underhand Practices, which were now made use of to run down the Duke of Ormond; a Nobleman, whose Accomplishments made him the Delight, and whose Virtues the Admiration, of his Country; who had a Soul, that neither Place, Power, nor Example, could corrupt; equally incapable of Guilt or Fear; and who, thro' the various Current of his Life, seems to have had nothing to answer for, but the Prejudices of the Times he liv'd in, and the Party he espous'd; which led him to think, that more Regard was due to the Prerogative than to the Claims of the People; and to act, for the general, as if the Sum of Patriotism consisted in an almost unrestrained Obedience to the Will and Pleasure of the Sovereign.

(n) This over-zealous Attachment of his to the Crown was, however, laudable, because it was founded on Principle; whereas Buckingham's Concessions to the democratic Part of the Constitution were void of Merit, because void of Virtue: To see a Man of so much Dignity as Ormond bow, with such unfeigned Respect, to the Throne, made it appear not only the Duty of common Men to do the same, but what they ought to glory in: Whereas, the Sentiments of Brutus, in the Mouth of Buckingham, had neither Weight nor Value, because they were utterly inconsistent with his own profligate, scandalous Life and Actions.

The Duke of Ormond held, at once, the high Offices of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lord High Steward of the Household:

(o) The best Comment upon what is here said of these two Dukes, we are furnish'd with, in a Letter from his Grace of Ormond to his gallant Son the Earl of Offory, dated Feb. 25, 1667, as follows:

"I will venture to tell you, that while the Duke of Bucks governs the Affairs, I conceive I cannot be there with Ease to the King, or Satisfaction to myself. Certain it is, I cannot concur in such Expedients, as are found out to gratify the worst Part of the Parliament and Nation, at the irreparable Charge of the Crown and Church; and if I should oppose or not acquiesce in them, the King's wanting what is said at might be imputed to me, and I should be forced to do what I never yet did, that is, refuse actually to serve the King his own way. If the Necessity of my own Vindication shall compel me over, I shall find Work enough in that, and may apply myself only to it. Either the Duke of Bucks and his Undertakers will succeed, or fail; if the first, I am well pleas'd to have no Part in the Honour; if the last, his and their Credit with the King and the World will soon vanish. I am sure, it ought to do; for if no Recompense shall be had for all the Indulgences (to say no worse) offered at the Price of a Supply, it would put more Prudence and Innocence, than they are possess'd of, out of Countenance, and out of Favour."

(p) Of which the following may serve for a Specimen, as well as to justify the ill Opinion which has been entertain'd of this Reign.

The Earl of Orrey, when he was ready to embark from Ireland, was seized with an Ague, which ended in a Fit of the Gout, which delayed his Journey. He did not arrive in England till about the Middle of June, but had sent over before him a Narrative of his Affairs to Sir Charles Wheeler, which was made public enough before his Arrival. As soon as he came to Court, he undertook to the King to show him, that there was Revenue, and other Help, enough in Ireland, to pay both the military and civil Lists; and that, if it had been rightly manag'd, his Majesty would not have been in debt; that the Receipts had been greater than the Issues, and vast Sums, sufficient to do the King's Business, still remained to be accounted for; and that there was no need of Aids from the People, either for Support of the growing Charge, or for paying the Debt of the Crown. This Un-

The Duke of Buckingham aspir'd to both: A. D. 1668. But so firmly establish'd was his Rival, tho' a Man of Integrity, in the good Graces of the King, that he had no Ground to assure himself of either, unless he could find Proofs against him of Mal-Administration.

This, therefore, was his great Endeavour, and two Petitions were forwarded to the House of Commons, relative to the Affairs of Ireland; on the Presumption, that such Lights would occur in the Hearing, as would furnish Matter for an Impeachment: But both fail'd; and it became necessary to have recourse to other (e) Expedients; all of which were equally base, and equally fruitless.

To take Leave of this Session: On the 8th of May, four Days beyond the Time prescribed by the King in his Messages, his Majesty came to the House; and, having given the Royal Assent to such (p) Bills as were ready, declar'd it to be his Pleasure, that both Houses should adjourn till August 11; withal signifying, as if by way of Grace, that, if possible, he would even then dispense with their Attendance; tho' he had before enter'd into a sort of an Engagement, that the Receipts should last no longer than three Months.

Why the Commons shew'd no more Countenance to so popular a Measure as the Triple Alliance, is already sufficiently understood: But why the King and his Ministers grew so extremely urgent for the Dispatch of the Supply, will admit of a little farther Illustration.

Our Ministers had no sooner receiv'd Advice from (q) Sir John Trevor, his Majesty's Envoy at Paris, that the Provisional Treaty between deraking put a stop to the Thoughts of a Parliament; and the Duke of Ormond was desirous to encourage it (though not made in the most obliging Manner to him) in hopes of finding Ireland to be in a better Condition than he imagin'd. He had a very good Opinion of Lord Orrey's Talents for Calculation, and of his Knowledge of the Revenue; but was afraid, that the King's own Warrants would be found at last to be the Misapppliers of his Revenues; and so all the Noise made about the Disposition of his Treasure would, after all, produce nothing recoverable to answer the present Necessity, which was the chief thing at first undertaken. Part of the Blame might possibly be laid upon him for obeying such Warrants, and upon Lord Anglesey for enjoining them, before the Lists of the Establishment were fully furnish'd. But he had the Satisfaction of knowing, that he had never recommended above two Sums of Money to be paid to any Persons, one to the Earls of Anglesey and Orrey, and the other to Mr. Robert Fitzgibbon, and neither of those he had been actually paid in any Part. A Commission was issued to the Dukes of Duch and Albemarle, the Lord Roberts, Sir Tho. Osborne and Sir F. Littleton to enquire into the Mal-Administration of the Revenue of Ireland. The World generally imagin'd this Commission to be aimed at the Lord Lieutenant, and considering the Persons appointed for Commissioners, there was Room enough for that Notion; yet he forwarded it all he could, as well to convince the World that it did not affect his Administration, as to convince the King, who could not otherwise be cured of the Surpluses he had poured into him of the Mismanagement of his Revenue. The Enquiry ended, as the Duke of Ormond apprehended, in discovering that the Earl of Anglesey's Accounts were just, and that the King's Warrants had chiefly contributed to the large Debt due to the Establishment. List of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. ii. p. 308, 309.

(q) The Aid of 310,000 l. was rais'd by an Imposition on Wines and other Liquors.

(r) John Van Brounckeren, who had negotiated the provisional Treaty on Behalf of the States, had the Modesty to croud a Medal to be struck upon the Occasion, which had for its Device the Story of Jehoshaphat stopping the Saw; the Allusion of which it is obvious, that it tends no Explanation. The States themselves were, likewise, guilty of similar In-between the Maritime Powers and France (which contain'd the Essentials of the definitive one, to be concluded at Alix la Chapelle) had been sign'd at St. Germain (April the 7th) than they took it for granted they had the Peace in their Pockets: Of this we have a Confirmation in a Letter from Lord Arlington to Sir William Temple, dated April 13, 1668. His Lordship therein supposing, the rest would be dispatched in an Hour's time: And that, if the Marquis (de Castel Roderigo) had not sent a Gentleman to Aix, in Pomp, he would direct him to sign it in his Boots. In proportion as the public Danger lessen'd, the Court had less Reason to insist on a Supply; and the House more to evade or refuse it: That, therefore, their own Measures might not defeat their own Ends, they gave into all that Importunity; which, nevertheless, was not attended with the desired Effect, till after Sir William Temple and Mr. Beverning had forced the Spaniards to submit to the hard Terms which their Friends and Enemies had jointly impos'd upon them.

But, whatever Pretences were made use of to blind the House of Commons, either the good Faith of France, or the Awe of the Triple Alliance was now so entirely depended upon, that, even before the Treaty was confirm'd in all its Formalities, Sir William Temple receiv'd Letters of Revocation (from his Residence at Brussels); which were accompany'd with discretionary Instructions for him to take Holland in his Way, to assure Mr. de Wit, "That his Majesty was so well satisfy'd with the late Transactions which had pass'd between them, as to be very glad to have more to do with his Masters, in the full Persuasion, that it would serve the Turns of both States to be very good Friends, the Sufficiencies and Insufficiencies of their Neighbours were so notorious."

The States, however, on their Sides, shew'd no great Forwardness to have any more to do with us. They had gladly made use of us, to prevent the total Loss of Flanders: But that being done, Mr. de Wit, their Head, forthwith return'd to his old Attachment to France, which he had never in the main departed from; and finding he had given Disgust, by closing with us thus far, he made use of all the Expedients in his Power to remove it.

The Count de Molina and Baron de Isola, with the Concurrence of the Lord Arlington, had fram'd the Project of a Defensive Alliance between England, Spain, Sweden and the States, which having been communicated to Mr. de Wit, he made a Merit, to Mr. d'Esfrades of causing the States to reject it.

By the Triple Alliance it was provided that any other Prince and Potentate might be admitted as a Party in it, with the Consent and Approbation of the rest: But when the Emperor and Spain would have taken the Advantage, the States absolutely refused it.

Some Time in February, Mr. de la Roche, who commanded a French Squadron in the Channel, coming to Anchor in Torbay, had the Insolence, not only to take an Offend Ship from the Key, but to land a Party of armed Men, who seiz'd the Effects belonging to the said Ship, which, for their greater Security, had been put on Shore. After which coming to the Drains, he repeated the Insult, by carrying off four Offenders in a hostile Manner from Deal itself. He then fell down the Channel again, and put into St. Helens, where he was found by Sir Thomas Allen with a Squadron of English Men of War; who, by express Order from Court, not only demanded the Offend Ship, Tackle, and Cargo, together with the Four Men, but all the English Mariners, amounting to above an hundred, which de la Roche had on Board: All which was instantly comply'd with, and Mr. de la Roche the French Resident was farther told, in the King's Name, that his Majesty had proceeded with no more Rigour against the said de la Roche, because he expected his Master would punish him for his Fault.

While the Hearts of the French Court were yet warm with this Correction, Mr. de Wit, took the Advantage, to propose a new Alliance to Mr. d'Esfrades, between the most Christian King and the States, jointly to oppose the Pretensions of his Britannic Majesty to be King of the Sea, and to oblige all Ships to strike to his, as an Acknowledgment of that usurp'd Superiority: And either to force him to renounce that Pretension, or fight his Ships wherever they found them: To facilitate this Measure, which must have inevitably kindled a new War with England, he mention'd the Proceeding of Sir Thomas Allen to de la Roche at St. Helens, not as an Act of Justice, but an Indignity, which if conniv'd at, would encourage the English to do worse. And finding the French Minister had then no Instructions on this Head, he renew'd his Instances again and again, which were also back'd by those of Mr. d'Esfrades to the French Court: The first urging, that nothing could better shew how little they meant to separate from France by their Engagement with England, since by this Measure that Engagement would be destroyed: And the (r) Last, that nothing but the King's embracing this Proposal, could hinder Mr. de Wit's being forc'd into English Measures by the English Faction, however disagreeable to his Sentiments and Inclinations, or contrary to his Resolutions.

How far Mr. de Wit was in earnest in this Proposal, is hard to say; perhaps he had already Reason to suspect that the Court of England was again revolting to its old Bias of cultivating the closest Union with France, and made use of this Expedient either to outbid us at the French Court; or, in case the stances of Vanity, which they had afterwards very sufficient Reasons to repent of.

(r) Mr. d'Esfrades, upon this Occasion, is pleas'd to say, That Mr. de Wit had but little Esteem for the English Council, a great Contempt of that of Spain, and of their Ministers, and had no Stress on the Resolutions of the States, which he found very much self-interested, and on the contrary he had a high Value for the Person of the King, of his Valour, of his great Mind, and of his Conduct, to that Degree, that he said boldly in the Assembly, that he must own, that the first and most foolish Council that there was in Christendom, was that of the King, of which he is the Chief, which does not appear in other Countries.

Sir William Temple rec. called.

[Lord Arlington's Letters, v. 1. p. 337.]

Mr. de Wit's Expedients to revive the good Graces of France.

d'Esfrades.

the Bible was refus'd, that from thence he might the better collect what he had to depend upon, and be enabled to take Precautions accordingly.

However this may be; instead of entering into a Negotiation with the States upon this delicate Point, which, considering what we have already seen of the Proceedings between our Ministers and theirs of France in Relation to the Flag, it was natural to think his most Christian Majesty would have readily and cheerfully done, he sent Mr. Colbert de Creilly, Brother to the famous Minister of that Name his Ambassador Extraordinary into England, in August, and recall'd Mr. d'Estades in September.

In the Interval, indeed, between the Revocation of Mr. d'Estades from the Hague, and the Arrival of Mr. Colbert in London, Sir William Temple was sent to the States with a higher Character, but on a far less important Errand than before (the first being given him to qualify the last) which by (1) Circumstance, we find, he was not over fond of, nor pleas'd with. It was to give general Assurances of the Continuance of his Majesty's good Intentions towards the States; to labour at an Adjustment of our Commercial Claims and Interests, and to concert a Treaty of Guarantee, on the Basis of the Triple Alliance: But all was in Effect mere Matter of Amusement, both to the Powers abroad, and the People at home; nothing more being intended by it, than to draw in both Spain and France to bid for us, and to carry the Kingdom to the best Market.

But the ill Humour in which Spain had been left, by the Treaty of Aix, still continuing, she continu'd for almost two Years wrangling for the Fruits she expected from the Triple Alliance; but refusing either to pay the Swedish Subsidies on one hand, or gratify the pecuniary Demands of England on the other: In Excuse for which it was, however, well urg'd, that they had been dealt with rather too roughly, in imposing not only the Laws of a hard Peace upon them, but the said Swedish Subsidies, at the same time; and even refusing them the Satisfaction of a Guaranty, till it was paid.

France was Eagle-ey'd at spying out Advantages; and prepar'd to make use of all. The Acquisitions she had made in Flanders render'd her only more greedy for the rest; and, unless she could dissolve the Triple Alliance, she could scarce hope to accomplish her Wishes.

This was a great Part of Mr. Colbert's Business in England; tho', perhaps, not all: But, tho' he arriv'd here August 8, Lord Arlington instructs Sir William Temple, October 23, to take from Mr. de Wit, Sec. all Suspicion of Treason in us, in our Union and Triple Alliance, or hanging towards France; wherein, he did assure him, there had not been the least Step made, since he left the Court. On February the 16th, 1668-9, his Lordship further informs that Minister, That Mr. Montagu, Master of Horse to the Queen, was just on his Departure for Paris, whither, says he, he goes instructed to concur entirely with the Dutch Minister (whatsoever be he) in all Matters relating to the Triple Alliance, and the Guaranty of it; as likewise the disposing that Court to a friendly Composure of all Differences between them and Spain, or remitting them to an Arbitration. And Sir William Temple himself, in his Letter to his Father, after his Return from the Hague, affirms, that both Lord Arlington and Sir John Trevor continued to the last of his Stay in Holland, to assure him, that the King still remain'd firm in his Measures to the States.

But the Secrets of State are sometimes as ill kept, as those of Families: In the Beginning of the Year 1669, Lord Arlington acknowledges a Rumour prevail'd in the Court of London, that the Swedes were gain'd by France, and would fall from the Triple Alliance: And, in the April following, Mr. Puffendorf, a Swedish Minister, in his Way from Paris, assures Mr. de Wit at the Hague, that England was already chang'd, in the Course of all those Councils they had taken with Holland and Sweden, tho' they did not think fit to let any thing of it appear, and the Secret was yet in few Hands: And that Mr. Turenne had shew'd him a Letter from Mr. Colbert, wherein, giving an Account of the happy Successes he had met with in his Negotiations at our Court, of the good Dispositions there, and especially those of our chief Ministers, he makes use of these Words: And I have at last made them sensible of the whole Extent of his Majesty's Liberality. Again, in the Month of August following, a new Minister arriving here from Denmark, and being ask'd, what Opinion the King his Master had of coming into the Triple Alliance; he answer'd, That he thought it was not long liv'd; and that Sweden would go near to fall from it, as soon as they had receiv'd their Subsidies.

Our foreign Affairs wore this ambiguous Aspect towards the Close of the Year 1669; and, till that time, the Parliament was twice adjourn'd, and then prorogued, by his Majesty's Will and Pleasure, as express'd by Proclamation. The Duke of Buckingham was now as much out of Love with the Parliament as his Royal Master. In order, therefore, that their Meeting might be deferr'd the longer, the Civil List was put under a new Regulation according to the following thrifty Scheme, which deserves to be insert'd, not only as a Matter of Curiosity, but that the Nation may know how much less costly a thing Government was, even in the faulty Reign of King Charles II. than it has proved under the more virtuous Administrations since:

(1) In a Letter to the Lord-Keeper Bridgman, to Sir William Temple, dated July 26, 1668, we have the following Passage:

"Ready, Sir, I do not think there is any Intention in pressing your Departure for Holland, but just and honourable towards you, and with respect to the Greatness of the Employment, and Urgency of the King's Affairs at this time to leave you at the Hague; and (if you will take my Opinion) I would not have you take other Measures of it, even for your own Sake.

Mr. d'Estades recall'd, and Mr. Colbert sent into England.

"All that by Office, or otherwise, have Houses or Lodgings of the King's, out of the Court, or his Houses of Residence, to be obliged to keep them, at their own Charge, in Repair; and the Surveyor is to look to it."

The Court itself, likewise, in this long Interval underwent some Alterations. Sir Thomas Clifford was made Treasurer of the Houhold, in the Room of Lord Fitzharding deceased, being succeeded by Lord Newport, as Comptroller, and Sir John Trevor, Secretary of State (in the Room of Sir William Morrice, who had a Donative of 10000 l. to dispose him to resign) but was no further admitted into the Secret of Affairs, than was indispensibly necessary from the Nature of his Office.

The Duke of Ormond, whose Administration of the Lieutenantancy of Ireland had been so severely inspected, and found so faultless, at a time when he thought himself best established in the King's Favour, was also (t) remov'd from that envy'd Post, and Lord Roberts, then Lord Privy Seal, was appointed to be his Successor. The King, however, could not be prevail'd upon to deprive him of his White Staff; nor did he dimitt him him from the Government of Ireland without the most particular Acknowledgment of His Grace's thirty Years Services: And what is yet more remarkable, the Gazette was not suffered to take any Notice of an Event, which no good Man could be pleased with.

Economy was an Exotic at Court, and by no Art or Culture could be made to thrive. Extravagance, which was natural to the Soil, on the contrary, ran wild every where, and took such hold, that it was impossible to be weeded out.

Hence the Sitting of Parliament came to be look'd upon, even there, as a necessary Evil, and as such, was at last given way to; on the Presumption that there were Chemists at Court who could extract Gold out of Evil; and convert a temporary Trouble into a lasting Satisfaction.

Accordingly, October 1691, the King once more put himself upon his People, and in a laconic Speech first recommended the Payment of his Debts, and then the Union of the two Kingdoms. Both these Items were enlarg'd upon by the Lord Keeper, but only the last was enforce'd: For as to the first, his Lordship had no more to say than that the securing of the Peace, depended upon the Fondness of the Parliament to his Majesty, and certain other equally insipid things all drawn from the Credit of the Treaty of Aix, and the Triple Alliance.

The Reception which the House of Commons gave his Majesty's Demand, was as cold as the Keeper's Recommendation: But on the other Hand, their Zeal against Nonconformists was as hot as ever. They address'd against them again, and the King put forth his Proclamation again, for which he had the Thanks of the House; as had, likewise, the Lord General for an Information of their Meetings and of their Endeavours to disturb the Public Peace, and of his own great Care to prevent their Attempts (which either went no farther than to worship God, after their own fantastic ways, or our Records are strangely deficient as to their particular Offences.) They even proceeded so far as to appoint a Committee to enquire into the Behaviour of Dissenters, who made a wonderful Discovery of divers Conventicles, and other seditious Meetings near the Parliament, which gave the Hint for a Vote, That they would adhere to his Majesty in the Maintenance of the Government of the Church and State as then establish'd, against all Enemies whatsoever.

But this Proof of their Devotion was none of their Good-humour; on the contrary, they had no sooner receiv'd the (u) Report

Report of the Brook-house Committee.

(u) An Abstract of that Report is now, for the first time, made public from the Collection of the Lord Halifax, just quoted as follows:

 of the Committee for inspecting the Receipts and Disbursements of the War, commonly called the Brook-house Committee, from the Name of the House where they sat; in which so vast a Sum was unaccounted for, and so vast a Sum was ill accounted for, but they complain'd aloud of Mismanagements, and expelled Sir George Carteret, the Vice-Chamberlain, for being deeply concern'd in them. They complain'd to the King of Sir John (v) Griffith, the Governor of Tilbury Fort, for exacting Eighteen-pence, and other Sums, of the Hoys, and other little Vessels, navigating the Thames. They likewise reviv'd the Dispute which arose from Skinner's Affair, with the Lords; and came to several home Resolutions against the Proceedings of that House. Nor did they wholly lose Sight of the Supply; but voting 400,000*l.* and no more, for his Majesty's special Occasions, and being on the point of adjourning till Febru- ary, the Court found Undertakers bold enough to advise the breaking up the Session, which was accordingly done, by Prorogation to the 14th of February, in a very Cavalier Manner, without the passing of any one Act, on the receiving proper Assurance, that they should find their Account much better in beginning all again.

In this Interval, all was Cabal and Intrigue; forming of Schemes, and driving of Bargains: The poor Commissioners of Accounts were examin'd before the Council; by whom they were continually discountenanced, and treated more as Offenders than Judges; and were at last obliged to put in a Sort of Apology for having fulfilled their Commission, and acted like Men of Integrity and Honour; tho' even that very (v) Apology is more than sufficient to shew, that they had no Reason to make any at all.

Sir Thomas Clifford, who was now the grand 1669-70.

 Tenth Session.

(v) He was run'd out by the King's Order; of which his Majesty can'd the House to be inform'd; and had their Thanks for it.

(w) It runs in the following Terms:

Copy of the Papers presented to his Majesty by the Commissioners of Accounts, sitting at Brook-house, and sign'd 28. January, 1669.

May it please your most Excellent Majesty, We have revised that Part of our Report which concerns Moneys paid to other Uses than the War; in the Preamble of which Report we did, in all Humility, represent to your Majesty, that we had drawn out the Accounts therein comprised, as they did at that time appear to us: And also, an Account of what Moneys were received for the War, and what disbursed for the same, with the Balance thereupon; which, by Order of the Honourable House of Commons, was presented to them the 3d of November last; which we likewise, most humbly presented to your Majesty; we did, both in the Title and Close thereof, mention the said Account to be only as it then appeared to us: And, as they did appear to us, we did conceive, that the Sums mentioned to be paid for other Uses than the War, were so paid.

Upon farther Inspection therein, we do, in all Humility, represent to your Majesty as follows:

1. That the first Sum of 192,128*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* remaining in the Surplusage upon the Balance of Sir Geo. Carteret's Account, ended the 31 of September 1664, exclusive, we did conceive it to be for other Uses than the War; because it ariseth for Payments made for Provisions deliver'd, and Services perform'd, before the said first Day of September, 1664; from which Day, our Authority to raise Moneys for the War doth, as we in all Humility conceive, take its Commencement.

2. As to the second Sum of 65,053*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* brought to Account by Sir Geo. Carteret, as paid in the Year 1665, and 1666, and Part of 1667, we did conceive it to be for other Uses than for the War; it appearing to be for Provisions deliver'd, and Services performed before the said sixth of September 1664, and some of them in the Years 65, 66, 67, and 68.

3. As to the third Sum of 65,009*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* comprehended in the Account of Sir Geo. Carteret, paid in our Report to be paid for Interest of Moneys, which, at our signing thereof, did not appear to be borrowed since the first of September, 1664; we having not then before us the Accounts thereof, though we had used all Means to obtain them sooner: But, having since received the same, do find, upon Examination thereof, that some of the said Moneys were borrowed since the said first of September, 1664; the Interest whereof we do compute at 15,270*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* which, if we deduct from the said 65,009*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* and thence, make the Determination of the Account, charge it as paid for the War.

4. As to the fourth Sum of 1,304*l.* paid to be repaid to your Majesty's Exchequer, we do not find that the Exchequer owes the Receipt thereof.

5. As to the fifth and last Sum relating to Sir Geo. Carteret's Account being for the ordinary Charge of your Majesty's Navy, we did compute the same by an Estimate, made by the present Officers and Commissioners of your Majesty's Navy, of the Charge of your Majesty's Navy in Harbour for one Year, beginning the 24th of June, 1664, and ending the 24th of June following; according to which Charge, your Navy in Harbour would have amounted, for two Years and ten Months, ending the last of June, 1667, in Time of Peace, to the said Sum of 190,932*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* in case all your Majesty's Ships had, during all the whole time, continued in Harbour.

And as to the several Sums of 54,947*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* and 210,673*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* which are mentioned in our Reports of the respective Sums of Colonel William Legg, and Sir Stephen Fox, to be for other Uses than the War, the same arising from the several Particulars, sheweth ready, in all Humility, to be presented to your Majesty.

And, upon the whole Matter, concerning Moneys so reported to be paid for other Uses than the War, we do, in all Humility, tender to your Majesty the following Considerations:

1. That we were commanded by your Majesty, in that Act of Parliament which constituteth us Commissioners, to enquire, whether any, and how much, of the Moneys given for the Maintenance of the War by Act of Parliament, had been bestowed or disposed of, to or for any other Use or Purpose; and to what other Uses and Purposes the same are, or any Part thereof was, so disposed or bestowed.

2. That upon the three several Accounts wherein Notice is taken of the Moneys so paid, we did at our signing of the Report, in all Humility, conceive, that the Sums therein mentioned, were paid for other Uses than the War; but we did particularly specify the Sums, and the Uses for which, so as by the Sense thereof it might appear, that the same were paid for other Uses but the public Service of your Majesty's Navy, your Office of the Ordnance, and your Land Forces and Garrisons, except the Sum 1304*l.* in Sir Geo. Carteret's Account, said to be repaid by Tally in your Majesty's Exchequer.

3. That in those Accounts, under which we specify'd Payments, there were charg'd several Sums as supply'd by your Majesty, besides those which were given for Maintenance of the War by Act of Parliament.

4. That the same being contriv'd to be paid for other Uses than the War, are not express'd in our Report to be out of the Moneys given for the War, but out of the whole Moneys, so charg'd in respective Accounts, which consist not only of the Moneys so given, for the War, but also of other Moneys so apply'd by your Majesty.

As touching the Moneys advanced by your Majesty in Preparation for the War, although, in our own private Opinion, we think it most reasonable and just that all your Majesty's Expenses and Charges for Provisions, and other Matters preparatory to the War, should be charg'd, as well as any other Monies on the Account of the War; yet consulting the Act which constituteth us Commissioners, and seriously debating it amongst ourselves, that we are hereby authorized and empowered, as Commissioners, to take the Accounts of any Moneys, Provisions or Things whatsoever, raised or assign'd for or towards the fitting, furnishing, or setting out to sea, any of the Navies or Ships employ'd in the late War, or for touching the Management or Maintenance thereof, which were so raised or assign'd before the first of September, 1664.

But what Moneys, Provisions, and other things have been raised, assign'd, and employ'd towards the War, since the 1st of Sept. 1664, we have now under our Examination.

And if any Person, by not having, perhaps, fully enough weigh'd and considered our Report, may have drawn any Conclusion from it which may seem to tend to the Prejudice of your Majesty's Affairs. We, in all Humility, hope it may be look'd upon as our Unhappy, and not our Fault;

grand Mediator between the Court and the Representatives of the People, having taken the most effectual Care to secure a Majority, on the 14th of February, the King, not in the Guise of Difficulty and Distress, but with unusual Pomp and State, being attended to the House with his new Guards, which is the first Instance we meet with in History, of the Sovereign's entering upon the Exercise of his legislative Power, under the Awe and Influence of the Sword, open'd the Session with a Speech, which had more the Air of the Master, than the Servant of the Commonwealth.

May it live to shew, how Kings, when in bad Hands, can prostitute their own Honour, and affront the common Sense of the Nation.

King's Speech. " My Lords and Gentlemen, I sent forth my Proclamation that there might be a good Appearance at this Meeting, having most Confidence in full Houses, where the WELL-BEING of the CHURCH, and all other Interests of the Crown and Nation are best secured. When we last met, I asked you a Supply; and I ask it now again, with greater Instance: The Uneasiness and Straitness of my Affairs cannot continue, without very ill Effects to the whole Kingdom. Consider this seriously, and speedily, it is your and the Kingdom's Interest, as well as mine: And the ill Consequence of a Want of an effectual Supply must not lie at my Door. And, that no Misapprehensions or Mistakes, touching the Expences of the last War, may remain with you, I think fit to let you know, That I have fully informed myself in that Matter, and do affirm to you, that no Part of those Monies that you gave to me have been diverted to other Uses; but, on the contrary, besides all those Supplies, a very great Sum hath been raised out of my standing Revenue and Credit, and a very great Debt contracted, and ALL FOR THE WAR. One thing I must earnestly recommend to the Prudence of both Houses, That you will not suffer any Occasion of Difference between yourselves to be revived; since nothing but the Unity of your Minds and Councils can make this Meeting happy, either to me, or to the Nation. I did recommend to you, at our last Meeting, the Union of the Two Kingdoms; and I did the same to my Parliament in Scotland: They have made a great Step towards it; and I do again seriously recommend that Matter to you."

The Lord Keeper bore his Under-part as usual: But, though he spoke much longer, added nothing to the Purpose, except by asserting, That the Loss which the King had sustain'd in the Customs, Excise, and Heart-money, by the War, Plague, and Fire, amounted to Six hundred thousand Pounds.

And now the happy Effects of keeping up a good Understanding with the House of Commons, became apparent: The Well-being of the Church, so artificially recommended in the gracious Speech, pacify'd all the Discontents without-doors, which the Scheme to unite his Majesty's Protestant Subjects had rais'd; and other effectual Expedients had as effectually controuled, if not subdued, all Opposition within. They might have very justly complain'd of their being made to lose so much Time in the former Session; of their being so abruptly dismiss'd, and so soon after called upon to give their Attendance again; and this, in aggravation of every Misfortune which deserv'd Censure, and every Grievance which demanded Redress. But all Offences were now done away. Notwithstanding the Royal Summons, in which his Majesty signify'd, that he expected a ready Conformity to his Royal Will and Pleasure, many Members absented themselves; and, of those who attended, it appear'd, on the first Question, that the Court had made sure of a Majority.

It is no Wonder, therefore, that the Supply was readily and cheerfully voted: For the making good of which, an (x) Imposition was laid of EIGHT-PENCE upon every Ton of FRENCH Wine, or Vinegar, that should be imported between the 24th of June, 1670, and the 24th of June 1678; and TWELVE POUNDS upon every Ton of SPANISH Wine: By which flagrant Instance of Partiality to the Commerce of France, it is easy to see how closely the two Courts were already connected, and how strongly the Influence of Whitehall operated on the Proceedings in St. Stephen's Chapel.

The House of Lords, likewise, took occasion to shew how gladly they would oblige the King in his own favourite Way of Grants and Supplies, if it was in their Power, by preparing a Bill to enable his Majesty to part with his (y) Fee-Farm and Quit-Rents, and to encourage his Subjects to purchase them.

In Marcell's Letters, we meet with the following Paragraph, concerning the Conduct

Fault; or if they have made any such Inference for our not having expell'd ourselves more fully than we have done, since it was wholly contrary to our Intention to give any seeming Occasion for any such Misinterpretation, and shall be always ready, to the best of our Power, to clear any thing which may have been understood otherwise than by us intended; for we call God to Witness (who knows the Sincerity of our Hearts) that we have had nothing before our Eyes in our whole Management of the Trust committed to us, but the Service of your Majesty, according to our Oaths. All which we do, in all Humility, submit to your Majesty's Consideration. Breadstreet, 25 Jan. 1669.

(x) Amounting in Value, according to Mr. Marcell, in his Growth of Popery, to 500,000 l. who is followed, I should say copy'd, by Mr. Carte.

(y) By which the King rais'd, if the said Mr. Marcell is to be depended on, 1,800,000 l. Mr. Carte says 1,500,000 l. but he still copies the very Expression of Marcell; therefore the Figure 3, instead of 8, must be held the Printer's Mistake. Mr. Carte, indeed, who, as well as Bishop Parker, always calls Marcell a Libeller, reduces that Sum to less as 400,000 l. It appears by a Letter from Sir William Temple to the Lord Keeper, dated November 3, N.S. 1668, that this Expedient had been thought of some time before it was put in Practice. His Words are these, " Methinks, two Proposals which have been already a-foot, are very comfortable towards this End (raising a Supply without any additional Burthen to the People) as the selling of small, inconsiderable Quit Rents, where the Sum is hardly worth the Charge of raising; and yet by Reason of the Trouble to the Tenant, by them, they will

A.D. 1669-70 duct of their Lordships, in another Instance, which deserves particular Notice and Remembrance, since the Dose must have been exceedingly strong, which could have turn'd the Stomachs of the Commons, during these equally fertile and prostitute Times:

"In this Session, says he, the Lords sent (x) us down a (a) Prorogatio for the King, that would have restor'd him to all Civil and Ecclesiastical Prerogatives, which his Ancestors had enjoy'd at any time since the Conquest. There never was so compendious a Piece of absolute, universal Tyranny. But the Commons made them ashamed of it, and retrench'd it." He adds, notwithstanding, "The Parliament was never so embarrass'd beyond Recovery. We are all equal Cowards, except some few."

The King was, moreover, enabled to put Money in his Pocket, or, at least, in those of his Favourites, by an Act for making and renewing of Leases, Grants, and Copies of Offices in the County of Cornwall.

And all these several Gratifications his Majesty receiv'd, in recompence of his Return to the Church, and the additional Act against Conventicles, which was drawn up with great Pains, and stands foremost in our Statute Books, as the leading (b) Institute of the Session.

In truth, all things were made to give way to the great Ends of persecuting the Dissenters, and removing the Necessities of the Court: When the perplex'd Dispute about Skinner's Affair was again reviv'd, at the King's Instance a general Rature was made of the Proceeding on all Sides: An Expedient which the (c) Commons had in effect before recommended, tho' without Success, to the Lords; and, tho' their Commissioners of Accounts were sometimes heard pro Forma, the general Issue was, by good Management, let fall, as quietly as possible, to the Ground.

As long as the King was in the Hands of Buckingham, and the rest of his motley Cabal, he was upon ill Terms with his Subjects; and made no Difficulty to hearken to Projects, to disappoint him of the Succession Lauderdale or Buckingham, his own Son, which, one while recommended the Legitimizing of the Duke of Monmouth; and then a Divorce; that his Majesty might have unquestionable Heirs of his own. The last of these Projects seems to have been relish'd most; and, in order to reconcile the Public to it, the Bill which Lord (d) Ross had brought in against his Wife, for Adultery, was forwarded by the King, with as much Zeal as if the Case was his own: The Duke, on the other hand, oppos'd it as violently, having all the Baron Lords, and all the Bishops except John Russell, and Wilkins, on his Side. When it was first read, the Debate lasted till near a Clock at Night: When a Question for a second Reading being put, it appear'd, there were forty-two fitting Members and Six Proxies against it, and Forty-one fitting Members and Fifteen Proxies for it. Marvel affirms, Lord Arlington had a Power in his Pocket to annul the Proxies, if there had been a Necessity for it. The Duke and his Party, however, entered their Protest.

On the second Reading it was carry'd for a Committee, by a round Dozen. The King, afterwards, by the Advice of (e) Lauderdale, attended the Debates in Person, to the great Surprize of the House, and Dismay of the Duke of York, who could not conceal his Sense of it. Having seated himself on the Throne, he told them it was a Privilege he had from his Ancestors, to be present at their Deliberations; and, therefore, directed to proceed and be cover'd. This, at some Periods, would have been thought a flagrant Breach of Privilege, as tending to overawe the House; but now it was interpreted into an Honour; and the Lords with White Stoves were order'd to wait upon him with the Thanks will yield five or six, if not ten Years Purchase, more than greater Rent."

The other Proposal, here alluded to, by Sir William, was the Sale of the Chimney Money, which was never follow'd.

(x) He was Member for Kingston upon Hull, I think for twenty Years; during all which time he received an honourable Pension from his Constituents, according to the ancient laudable Institution, which provided that those who were employ'd in the Service of their Country, should from their Country only receive their Wages. Bishop Parker, however, is pleas'd to call this a vile Stipend, which Gualtero de Spira, as resembling Alms to the Poor. In the same Place, his Lordship, utterly forgetting the Gospel and its Tenets, together with the wretched Circumstances of Jesus and his Apostles, upbraids Mr. Marvel with his Poverty, and speaks of him in a Style unbecoming a Gentleman. He charges him, likewise, with being one of forty who had bound themselves by Oath, never to vote for granting any Taxes: And yet we have before quoted Lord Arlington's Evidence, That Mr. Marvel, in the Session preceding this, when the Court was most embarrass'd both by Want and Opposition, was the first who mov'd for taking the Supply into Consideration. Upon the whole, it may be imagin'd, that the Bishop had a particular Pique to Marvel for leaving, as Bishop Barnet says, not only humbled him by his Religious Transgressions, but the whole Party; besides there was a Market open of Marvel's Abilities made him of Confidence: Men of much less Eminence were purchas'd; and yet, notwithstanding his Poverty, we do not find that he ever set himself to Sale.

(a) Perhaps this Prorogatio was the last in the Conventicle Act, which, as it now stands, stipulates only, That the King's Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs, may not be affected by any Clause in the said Act.

(b) Marvel expressly calls it the Price of Money, adding, "The King told some ancient Citizens, who apply'd to him against it, That they must address themselves to the House, that he must not disclose his Friends; and if it had been in the Power of their Friends, he had gone without Money. The Substance of this Act was, that if any Persons, upwards of sixteen, should be present at any Assembly, Conventicle or Meeting, under Colour or Pretence of any Exercise of Religion, in any other Manner than according to the Liturgy and Practice of the Church of England, where there was five Persons or more, besides those of the said Household; in such Cases the Offenders were to pay five Shillings for the first Offence, and ten Shillings for the second. And the Preachers and Teachers in any such Meetings were to forfeit twenty Shillings for the first, and forty for the second Offence. Those who knowingly suffer'd any such Conventicles in their Houses, Bars, Yards, &c. were likewise to forfeit twenty Pounds."

(c) The whole House, however, waited upon Marvel with their Thanks, for adopting it; and it is recorded down from the Presence, a pretty ridiculous thing! (as Marvel says) Sir James Clifford carry'd Speaker and Members there, into the King's Cellar to drink his Health.

(d) He had been already divorc'd in the Spiritual-Court, and his Wife's Children declar'd illegitimate by Act of Parliament.

(e) With whom he had that Morning taken Water, with two common Attendants, and set out as if for the Bridge, but soon altering his Mind, and his Orders, landed at Parliament-Street. MARVEL.

A. D. 1669-70. Thanks of the House for it. This kind Reception induc'd him to make his Attendance there his daily Practice; and he declar'd, it was better than going to a Play.

But tho' the Bill was finally carry'd by a few Voices, and the King had said publicly, That he knew no Reason why a Woman should not be as well divorc'd for Barrenness, as a Man for Impotency, he made no Use of the Precedent. Bishop Burnet, indeed, says, That Mr. Baptist May, of the Privy Purse, had told him, that a Day was appointed for making the Motion in the House of Commons, that the King had engag'd himself far in the laying of the thing, and in managing those who were to undertake the Debates. But then we are assur'd, by the same Authority, that his Majesty had given Directions to the said Mr. May, to cause that Matter to be let alone, for it would not do.

1670. These were the principal Transactions of this Session; which was clos'd April 11, and in which all things had been carry'd with so high a Hand by the Court, that it gave Occasion to Mr. Marvell to conclude, "That no King, since the Conquest, was so absolutely powerful at home, as King Charles then was; nor any Parliament, or Places, so certainly and constantly supply'd with Men of the same Temper."

It is now necessary to make a short Transition to the Affairs of Scotland, that the Circumstance of England may be the better understood.

The State of Scotland.

To keep pace with the Proceedings in England, a Stop had been put, for some time, to the Rage of Persecution in that Kingdom; and the whole Administration of Affairs, in the Hands of the Earl of Tweeddale, and Sir Robert Murray, had been extremely just to the King, and mild to the People.

But this was only a Breathing-time. Lauderdale was still in Possession of the whole Power of the Kingdom, and continu'd at all this Indulgence, only to render himself the more formidable.

There was an annual Saving upon the Revenue of 10,000 l. which was laid out in the filling of Magazines; and Advantage was taken of the Act, which enabled the King to raise the Country Militia, consisting of two thousand Horse, and sixteen thousand Foot, upon extraordinary Occasions, to constitute a standing Army, which were not only regimented and regularly train'd and exercis'd, but maintain'd at the public Charge.

Bishop Burnet, who, from his own Intimacy with Lauderdale, may very well be suppos'd to be acquainted with his Designs, adds, that the true Secret of all this was, "That Lord Lauderdale, was pressing to get into the Management of Affairs in England." And he saw what the Court was aiming at; and he had a Mind to make himself considerable, &c.

To endeavor himself yet farther at Court, he procur'd himself to be nam'd the King's Commissioner to the Scots Parliament, where he so manag'd Matters, that he procur'd two Acts to be pass'd, which, in a manner, render'd the Government absolute, both in Spirituals and Temporals.

By the (f) first it was declar'd, That the settling all things relating to the external Government of the Church was a Right of the Crown: That all things relating to ecclesiastical Meetings, Matters, and Persons, were to be order'd according to such Directions as the King should send to his Privy Council; and that these, being publish'd by them, should have the Force of Laws.

The second concern'd the Militia, and authoris'd

Bornet.

(f) In a Paper call'd, Some further Matters of Faith, relating to the Administration of Affairs in Scotland, under the Duke of Lauderdale, humbly offer'd to his Majesty's Consideration, in Obedience to his Royal Commands, the last Article of which is as follows:

First, in Anno 1666, when he knew that the Duke had chang'd his Religion, he procur'd an Act in Scotland for Altering the King's Supremacy; which he made the Presbyterian Party believe was to impower the King to put down Episcopacy, and set up Presbytery (the very Words of it). The Disposal of the external Government of the Church, is put absolutely in the King's Power; as also all Ecclesiastical Meetings and Meetings are to be order'd by the King.

Now the Acknowledgment of the Pope is a great Part of the Ecclesiastical Government; besides, the other Words are so comprehensive, that all Papers may be brought in at that Door. Soon after this, he enter'd into a firm Friendship with the Head of the Popish Party. [Out of the Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xx.]

In the same Paper, Article v, and vii, the same Lord is charg'd as follows:

Whereas there are but few Papists in Scotland, he hath given these all the Encouragement he could. The Earl of Argyll, who was of complac'd of to the Council by the Bishop for keeping many Priests in his House, and being a most stickler for Popery, he made a Privy Councillor, and gave him a Pension, though he has never since gone to Church, nor received the Sacrament. The Earl of Northdale, another famous Papist, in Command of the new Forces he rais'd (and is Lord and King) and both those two were his yearly employ'd by him in plundering the West of Scotland, &c. And there being in Scotland, but few Noblemen that are Papists, four of them have been supported and maintained by him, &c.

He became a Pensioner to France, from whom he receiv'd rich Presents, and great Sums: Out of one of the Jewels which Monsieur Colbert gave him, he made his rich George. He always belov'd the French Levies in Scotland, against the Treaties the King had made, and gave the French Officers the public Prisons; yea, and the King's own Castle of Edinburgh, of which he is Governor, to keep their Levies in, till the Ships are ready for their Transportation. He gave Order to his Brother to keep the Levies forward, and to press Men by Force into their Service; which being inform'd to the House of Commons, he corrupted one of the Witnesses by Money to forewarn it; and this he did, after the House of Commons had voted that any who assisted those Levies, should be look'd upon as public Enemies to the Nation. So much did he contribute to serve the French King's Designs, and particularly in the Year 1667, when Complaints were made to the King by Spanish Ministers, that Scotland's Levies for France were a Breach of Treaty, his Majesty's Commissioners order'd a Proclamation to be sent down immediately for the discharging of them; but the Duke of Lauderdale dispatch'd an Express to his Brother Halton, secretly, to acquaint him that the Proclamation was coming, and that it should be kept up, until the Levied Soldiers should be ship'd and sent away, and then publish'd, which was accordingly performed. Not for all the Haile they made to fill, the Wield desir'd some of their Vassals in the Road after the Proclamation; and did not care others, which had been a good Way gone, yet none dur'd stir or trouble them for fear of Halton, who had always promoted those Levies, and signed particular Warrants to several Prison Keepers for delivering their Prisons to the French Officers. He liv'd at that time in such Intimacy with the French Ambassador, that they were never asunder. He sent his Notice to make the Campaign in the French Army, and wrote to the English Ambassador to protect him to the King, and tell him, That he had seen the death thing he had to his Service; and if he had any thing to do, he would have sent it.

authoris'd the Establishment of it as above-mention'd; which was before illegal: It likewise further enacted, That the Army should not only be still kept up, but held in Readiness to march into England, Ireland, or any Part of the King's Dominions, for any Cause, in which his Majesty's Authority, Power, or Greatness, was concern'd; on receiving Orders, not from the King, but the Council-Board; which was compos'd of Lauderdale's Creatures.

Burnet says, the Earl of Lauderdale valued himself upon these Acts, as if he had conquer'd Kingdoms by them. He wrote a Letter to the King upon it; in which he said, all Scotland was now in his Power: The Church of Scotland was now more subject to him than the Church of England was: That the Scotch Militia was now an Army, ready upon Call: And that every Man in Scotland was ready to march, whensoever he should order it: With several very ill Insinuations in it.

But, tho' these were the great things done by the Scotch Parliament, the Pretence for calling them together was solely to set on foot a Treaty of Union between the two Kingdoms. In the King's Letter, this is avow'd: And, in the Parliament's Answer, they most complacently authorise his Majesty to name Commissioners, propound Terms, and fix the Place of Negotiation; reserving only to themselves the Power of allowing or disallowing the same, as they should think fit.

The Earl of Tweeddale had first propos'd this Measure; and it was espous'd by his Majesty, as we are told by the Right Reverend just quoted, because he reckon'd himself sure of all the Members that should be sent up from Scotland: But tho' his Commissioner, Lauderdale, at first countenanced it, in Subservency to his own Views, he had no Intention to suffer it to be carried into Execution.

England, he knew, was not yet prepar'd to adopt his arbitrary System; and consequently Union, on one hand, would produce Dissolution on the other. No sooner, therefore, were both Nations sufficiently amus'd with the Talk and Expectation of so great an Event, than he set himself in opposition to it; alleging, That it was rather the King's Interest to keep the Kingdoms distant, and to hold England under the Fear of the Scotch Army, which he had then establish'd. And the Issue of all was, that, after the Commissioners of both Kingdoms had several times met, the Scots prov'd intractable, according to their Instructions, and the whole Affair came to nothing.

Tho' his Majesty had so lately caus'd his Lord Keeper to assure both Houses, that the Interest of the King, and that of his People, were the same; it now appear'd, that they were opposite, and irreconcilable: And, in exact Proportion, as his Affairs grew more flourishing, theirs grew desperate. To have his Wants so freely and liberally supply'd in England, to have an Army at his Beck in Scotland, and to be upon good Terms with France, were all Circumstances alike most desirable to him, and, when consider'd together, most alarming to the Public.

With regard to our foreign Affairs: They were, at the Beginning of the Year, the double Aspect of Janus himself: Notwithstanding Mr. Puffendorf's Discovery at the Hague, and the Suspicion that both Mr. de Wit and Sir William Temple must necessarily entertain thereon, we still affected to make the Triple League our North Pole, and to shape our political Course only as that directed. January, Lord Arlington assures Sir William Temple, That he is perswaded the preventing a Breach in the Spring can only be done, by proposing the Triple League yet in Vigour. In the same Letter, he farther informs him of the Attempts his Majesty resolv'd to make upon the King of France, to refer the Arbitrament of the Disputes upon the (g) Dependencies, upon the conquer'd Places, to some amicable and fair Decision; as a Means of barring the Door, thro' which the War can only enter. Adding, If we can succeed herein, it is the best and cheapest Way we have of discharging ourselves of our Obligations to the Triple Alliance. In another, of the 28th of the same Month, to the same Minister, we find, that France had referred that Arbitration to England and Sweden; Which, says he, has given us most completely the Peace, for one Year longer; and, in such Terms, as we could have found no fault with it, if the States had been made a Party too. February 4, he writes again to him, as follows:

"The Year of Peace, promis'd us, may perhaps keep us in quiet; but I cannot believe the Court of Sweden will endure any longer Amusements, upon these Payments; and I am sorry you oblige me to a Repetition of it again, that you must, by all means, take from them (the Spanish and Dutch Ministers) an Opinion that his Majesty will be, for any Considerations, induced to answer to the Sweedes for 15,000 Crowns a Month, his own Quota, in the Condition we are; and the Silence of Spain, upon their old Promises, are like to be burthenfome, that any Propositon of Augmentation will never go down here: And this is the true Reason why we ought to be fonder of any Truce, or Peace, rather than never so strong a Party of Confederates towards the War. And, upon this Foundation, you may easily infer, what our Opinion is like to be concerning the Baron of Hild's Project of bringing the Emperor into the Triple Alliance: With his Favour, till I see more and better Evidences of it than I have yet, I will not believe the Emperor very fond of embracing the Propositon, so as to give Offence to France. And if he be thus shy with all his Concernments, and Dependencies upon Spain; what ought our Matter to be with his Necessities, and little Security of being reliev'd in them by the the Parliament? If that goes over happily, you may perhaps hear us speak more boldly; but, till then, it must be a great Part of your Prudence to keep his Majesty from being ask'd Questions, which are hard to grant, and as unfit to deny. From what I say, you may easily infer my Mind, without alledging, to the Ministers there, my Reasons for it; and to take heed of suffering his Majesty, or yourself, to be praised into Measures, which his Strength will not support. It is visible the Interest of Spain, of Holland, and of Sweden, not only to put themselves into a State of supporting the War against France, but even to provoke it; and perhaps it would be our Master's Honour to do so too; But, without Vigour to support that Honour, it would have a contrary Effect upon us, not only abroad, but at home too."

Swedish Subsidies paid to Spain.

At last, March 11, his Lordship, in his Dispatch to Sir William Godolphin at Madrid, acknowledges, that the Swedish Money was paid fully, and to the Content of those Ministers; so that, says he, the Ratifications of the Guaranty, Concert, (of Arms to support the said Guaranty) and other Pieces, accompanying this Negotiation, are likewise gone from his Majesty, and that difficult Matter happily ended; giving a new Life to our Triple League.

As the Delay of the Subsidy to Sweden had been hitherto the great Excuse for our acting with so much Indifference on the behalf of Spain, and the reaping so little Benefit from a Measure which had been so much applauded, it was now reasonable to think, that, as the Triple League had receiv'd new Life, by the Removal of that Obstruction, it would operate with new Vigour; more especially, as the Session was now happily over, and the Parliament had gratify'd the Court in all things.

But our Ministers had been long upon another Scent: The Success of their old Measures interfer'd with their new; and, therefore, it became necessary to substitute new Difficulties in the room of the old. Thus, in the very Instant that his Lordship felicitates Sir William Temple on the happy Conclusion of the Swedish Payments, he adds, "Tho' I will not dispute with you, I was sorry to see the Instruments run so near the two Points that were positively forbidden, to wit, the ascertaining a Time for the Preparation, and furnishing of the King's Quota, in case a War break out; and the answering for a Part of the Swedish future Subsidies. I am further to complain to you of yourself, that, notwithstanding what I wrote to you upon the Receipt of Baron d'Isola's Project, you have not prevail'd with him to forbear writing, and offering the same to me; whereas I, in my own Opinion, furnish'd you with some Reasons, both public and private, against the said Project; and told you, as I remember, this would be one of those embarrassing Questions, which are equally hard to deny, or grant. But my Way to be reveng'd of you for this shall be, to send him to you; therefore provide yourself to answer his Questions, as skilfully as you can, from what my Letter suggests to you, and from what may better occur to yourself upon the Argument. For, in a word, tho' his Majesty's Condition, as to his Debts, is much amended since I wrote, yet is he not enabled thereby, or willing, as Affairs of Christendom stand, to enter into great Schemes, which may have prejudicial Consequences, how honourable soever they are in the Noise of the World."

A.D. 1670

But however artificially Lord Arlington endeavour'd to put the Difficulty on Sir William Temple, he had the Address to avoid it, and wrote to Mr. Secretary Trevor for explicit Instructions: Upon which Occasion, his Lordship, March 22, expresses himself as follows:

"We have been oblig'd to such Attendance, all this Parliament-time, that I hope your Excellency will give yourself my Excuse from it, if you find me less punctual in answering your Letters than I was in the Vacation; and help me to prevail with the Baron d'Isola to accept of the same Reason, that I have delayed so long to answer his long and elegant Letter, proposing a farther Progress and Liaison amongst the Confederates of the Triple League, in conjunction with the Emperor. Against which, (I mean, in the Manner he proposes it) as I remember, I gave you many public and private Reasons; and therefore wonder much to find you calling, in a late Letter to Mr. Secretary Trevor, for an Answer to his Proposition: The Effect of which, having been debated before his Majesty, Mr. Secretary is now sufficiently instructed to answer it; viz. That his Majesty, in pursuance of an Article in our confederate Treaty, admits not only, with much Joy and Satisfaction, his Imperial Majesty into it, but is ready to join in any Entreaties or Sollicitations, that shall be thought fit to apply to him, for the same End. On the other side, his Majesty is as unwilling, as indeed unready, as can be imagin'd, to enter into any such defensive Union, as the Baron d'Isola proposes; which may, for aught we know, oblige our Armies to march against the Turk, if he should invade the Empire. I am sure it must against the King of France, if he should attack Brisack, or the remotest Part of it from us. And so, in like manner, against any Princes of the Empire, who, coming into the Confederation, should be after that molested by any of his Neighbours. Besides this, there is something to be given to the Time, in which this is proposed to us. How ill a Grace it will have to France, to make such a League, in effect against them, when they have offered to refer themselves to his Majesty's Arbitration, upon all the Points in dispute, relating to the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle: The Conservation of which must be the Foundation of such a Union, if it be made."

A defensive Union with the Emperor rejected.

Such was the Situation of Affairs on our Side, in the Months of March and April, with respect to the Triple League: And, as to the Arbitration, Spain profess'd to accept it, with the proviso, that the most Christian King would submit to the same Arbitrage all the Contraventions of the Peace, whereof Spain complain'd at the Conference of Liffle, meaning the dismantling all the strong Places of Burgundy, the exacting severe Contributions from the Duchies of Lymburg and Luxemburg, the carrying off all the Magazines, in manifest Breach of the Treaty of Aix. But however justly and pertinently Spain insisted on this Condition, it only serv'd to excite more Amazement at Whitehall, than any thing they ever did. (These are the Words of Lord Arlington to Sir William Godolphin, May 9.) "As it happen'd to be given, continued his Lordship, in a Season, that, if the Intentions of France had been as warlike as the World apprehends them to be, his most Christian Majesty, with his Foot in the Stirrup, might fairly have declared himself disengaged from the Promise he gave the King our Master, to keep Peace for twelve Months, and open the War again; I cannot say, applauded by the World, but, at least, absolved by them; who will now see, the Difficulty of keeping the Peace is much greater on the Spanish Side, than on the French: And we, that hold ourselves more engaged in that Interest, than any other Member in the Triple League, have, I assure you, our Heads to turn'd at this Behaviour of Spain, that we cannot but conclude they have a mind to the War again, and are content we should be involved with them in it, without so much as a Probability of seeing any of our Expence defrayed: Nay, we sometimes think they have rather a mind to lose Flanders, than give it up: And then we say, to what purpose will all our Cost be, if it beget us only an inevitable Hatred in France, with the Waste of our own Blood and Treasure, and without any Benefit to Spain?"

His Majesty hath commanded me to complain in worse Terms than these; but your last of the 6th gives me some Hopes, that upon second Thoughts, that Court may reply better to the Overture of the Arbitration, and not seek for better Friends than England and Swedenland in it; since they stood by them in the making of the Peace, when the Emperor moved not a Finger to that, or their Defence by War: But say 'twere Art in the French to name us; what Art could have defeated that, like their naming Us also, and destroying their precedent Confidence in France, by a subsequent one in Spain? When I have told you thus much of his Majesty's Resentments, it is fit I add also, that he hath commanded Sir William Temple to suspend all his further Negotiation, concerning the admitting the Emperor, or any OTHER Princes, into the Guaranty of the Peace, till some better Answer comes from Spain concerning the Arbitration. In the mean time, he hath employ'd the utmost of his Credit with the most Christian King, not to change his pacific Intentions, assuring him he cannot do a thing of more Satisfaction to his Neighbours, nor of Honour to those that live farther from him."

In the Close of this very remarkable Dispatch, we find yet another important Article, which deserves to be inserted, as follows:

"Within fifteen Days, we hope to be at Dover; where his Majesty will expect the Arrival of Madam; and, for aught I see, is not likely to enjoy that Pleasure many Days, since Monsieur will not consent to her coming up to London."

We are now come to one of the most ignominious Portions of the British Story. But, before we rush into the dark Scene, thro' which we are now to grope our Way, it is requisite to premise, that, soon after the Raising of the Parliament, the several excellent Regulations, which had been establish'd in the Privy Council in the Beginning of the Duke of Buckingham's Ministry, and afterwards made a Merit of in the Gazette, were in effect set aside, by the excluding Prince Rupert, the Duke of Ormond, the Lord-Keeper, and Mr. Secretary Trevor, from the Committee of foreign Affairs, and the transacting all things by the well-known Cabal, which consisted of (b) Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale.

When Honour and Integrity are Disqualifications, the Service must be vile and infamous. No sooner, therefore, was it known, that the Persons just nam'd were out of the Secret, but all concluded the Secret was such as they could never approve. The Public was indeed, from day to day, alarm'd with the manifest Symptoms of a growing Intimacy between France and us: We find it insinuated, that we sent them Vice-Admirals, and other considerable Sea-officers, to encourage and promote the setting out their Fleets; that we took their raw Seamen by the Hand, train'd them up in our Fleets, and, among the best of our Seamen, taught them the Skill we had learnt by long and dear-bought Experience. We find it asserted, that even the King himself communicated to his Brother of France his own Discoveries and Experiments in naval Affairs, as well as those of the most skillful Persons in his Service: And Dr. Welwood has left it upon Record, that he had seen the Doubles of several Letters to the most Christian King, on these Subjects, under-written with his Majesty's own Hand to this Effect, The Original, with my own Hand, sent such a Day.

In Procees of Time, the Tree was known by the Fruits: But the exact Period, when this dangerous Intimacy began, it may be hard to fix: The Author of the Appeal from the CABAL at Whitehall, which was first published in 1673, takes notice of the Whippers which had prevail'd almost four Years before, concerning the wonderful Enlargement of the French King's Liberality, in converting the strongest Opposers of his Interest, into who set forth the Lives of the two in 1670.

Which amazes and displeases the Court of England.

Intimacy between England and France. [Ibid.]

(b) The Duke of Almonde was dead; and though the Duke of Monmouth was not of an Age to mix in Business, he had nevertheless the Honour of a Place at the Board.

is moreover express, that the French Ambassador had a Remittance of a hundred thousand Pistoles, to distribute among the Cabal: And, by the said Ambassador's Letter to Mr. de Turenne, communicated to Mr. Puffendorf, as before-quoted, it appears, he went to the full Extent of his Orders: The whole Kingdom, it seems, were scandalis'd at the open and unrefer'd Familiarity between the Ministry and the said Ambassador; who was in a manner free of their Houses, both in Town and Country; and, at Court, might have been easily mistaken for the leading Card of the Pack.

However, what had pass'd hitherto seems to have been no more than Courtship on one Side, and Coquettry on the other: The French had treated us like a wanton Dame, who needed only to be courted to be won; and we had taken Pains enough to convince them they were not mistaken. They had shewn a Disposition to oblige us in all things, and we to disoblige them in nothing. But we had not as yet put our Honour absolutely in their Power: Time, Place, and Circumstance, were still to be adjust'd, and none could do this either so safely or satisfactorily as the Principals themselves.

The Interview at Dover.

Of many different Motives that gave rise to the mysterious Medley of Politics and Pleasure acted at Dover, this might be one: (i) Madame de France arriv'd there May 16, and was met the same Day by her Brother of England, attended by the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, the Dukes of Buckingham and Monmouth, and the whole Cabal; while his most Christian Majesty, under the Pretence of visiting his new Conquests, remain'd in the Neighbourhood of the other Shore. The Measures to be treated of were of the most delicate and dangerous Nature: And, though Ministers were found wicked enough to advise them, none were rash enough to take them wholly upon themselves: The King was therefore to countenance what he could not authorise, and to stand between his Ministers and the Executioner.

How deep the Projects of these Times were laid, and how far they extended, can never, perhaps, be ascertain'd, till the last Day: It does not appear, that any Articles were sign'd at Dover, whatever might be agreed upon; and all the Accounts hitherto given are, in many Instances, inconsistent with each other. Father Orleans not only ridiculously calls the Triple Alliance an audacious Encroachment upon the Prerogative, and says the King was forced into it by the Republican Cabal, but that the Dutch War was set on foot at the Instance of the Ministry, to favour the righteous Schemes they had form'd to render the King absolute, and the Parliament a Cypher: On the other hand, according to the famous Account of (k) Priami, in his History of the Dutch War, Mr. Colbert, the French Ambassador at London, had the Honour of convincing the King and his Council, that the Time was come for him to be aveng'd of the Dutch, &c. Again, Bishop Burnet puts almost the same Expressions into the Mouth of the Duke of Buckingham, with the Addition of a Word of Advice to his Master, to subdue his Parliament; and asserts, that Sir Ellis Leighton boasted to him, of being the first Man employ'd in bringing France into those black and fatal Designs: But unluckily there is a Letter of his Grace's extant, dated from Paris Aug. 15, to Lord Arlington, in which he says, "You will receive, in a few Days, a Proposition from this Court, concerning the making War upon Holland ONLY; which you may enlarge as you please. Mr. de Lionne shew'd me the Model of it last Night."

State Treats, temp. Gul. III.

Eclat.

In truth, King Charles's Point was, to free himself from the Trouble of Parliaments, by the Assistance of France; King Lewis's to master Holland, by the Assistance of England: Probably, both these Projects had been canvass'd before the Interview at Dover; but neither, perhaps, was finally resolv'd upon till then. The only Difficulty between the two Kings seems to have been, who should be serv'd first. Lewis was for beginning with the Dutch; Charles, with the English. Madame sided with her Brother-in-law against her Brother; and, by her Zeal for the Country she was marry'd into, became the Instrument of faving that which gave her Birth.

It is highly reasonable to think, that Madame had yet another Affair to negotiate; which, though not mention'd by any Writer whatever, was of very great Importance to that Article of her Instructions relating to the Re-establishment of the Catholic Religion in the British Dominions; and that was, the Reconciliation of his Majesty and the Duke. It is not to be suppos'd, that the Project of a Divorce,

(i) The Queen-Mother died August 31, 1669.

(k) Colbert de Croissy, Ambassador from France to the Court of England, after having set forth to the King of England all the Reasons he had to be dissatisfy'd with the Dutch, after reminding him of the Medals in which they had distributed to themselves all the Honour of the Peace of the late Charles, and treated the Mediation of England with so much Contempt. He at last gave him to know, that the same was come of being receiv'd upon a Nation that had a little Respect for King; and he could never meet a more favourable Opportunity, for several German Princes had already enter'd into the Confederacy; and the King of France was strong and powerful enough to be able to spare his Allies, that all due Satisfaction should be made to their Glory and Interest in the sequel of this War. Upon this Representation the King of England sign'd a private Treaty with France. And to give him further Assurance from the latter, Henrietta of England, Duchess of Orleans, a Princess whose Wit and Capacity was equal to her Beauty, Sister to the King of England, and Sister-in-law to the King of France, call'd over to England in 1670; and in the Name of the most Christian King, made a Proposal for her Royal Brother, of insuring him an ABSOLUTE AUTHORITY over his PARLIAMENT, and re-establishing the Catholic Religion in the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland. But he said, that in order to compass that End, there was a Necessity above all things of leaving the Peace and Power of the Dutch, who plac'd their whole Trust in being and forming Divisions among their Neighbours; and of reducing that State to the narrow Compass of the Province of Holland, of which the Prince of Orange should be Sovereign, or at least perpetual Stadtholder: That the Execution of this Project might be easily accomplish'd by two powerful Princes, jointly ally'd; that by this Scheme the King of England should have Zealand for a Retreat in Case of Need, and the rest of the Netherlands should remain in the Hands of the King of France, if he could make himself Master of it.

A. D. 1670. a Divorce, whether justifiable or not, could be set on foot by the King's Ministers, and countenanced by the King himself, without giving Umbrage to the Duke; nor that the Duke could so openly and vehemently oppose it, without giving Offence to the King: And, on the other hand, that Project was to the full as alarming to the Roman Catholics in general, as to his Royal Highness in particular. It may be fairly presumed, therefore, that, as the Duke was one of this mysterious Party, and as deep in the Secret as any, the King was here prevail'd upon to give over any such Pursuit for the future; and that his Royal Highness, on that Condition, admitted of the Submission of Buckingham, and was himself admitted into the Cabal; whose Views and Designs were now become of a Piece with his own.

To make all sure, a French Favourite, Madam Querqualle (afterwards Duchess of Portsmouth) was left in the King's Bosom, whose Interest it was to keep his Majesty steady; and Lady Cleveland was made a Duchess, to recompense in Dignity what she lost in Favour.

Of all the Persons engag'd in this traitorous Conspiracy against their Country, there is most Reason to condemn Lord Arlington; not for being the Author or Contriver of it, but for rushing without Reserve into the Measures of France; which he had for so many Years oppos'd; and for doing Violence to his own Notions of Virtue.

The Letters of Ministers of State are commonly so filled with Business, that they have no Room for Sentiment: But, in his, we now and then meet with a Thought, which seems to argue, that his Preference had not wholly diverted him of his Humanity.

In the Year 1667, while the Wounds we had receiv'd from the Dutch yet smarted, taking occasion to reflect on the Mischief of War, he says, It is Pity, that no Morality nor Christianity can raise this out of human Nature. In the Year 1688, speaking of the Ravagings and Plunderings committed by the French in the Spanish Territories, he says, We are fallen into a strange Age, wherein even the Appearance of good Morality is become ridiculous. And, in the following Year, 69, having receiv'd a List of the French Fleet from Sir William Temple, he takes notice, in his Reply, That, if their Greatness improve every Year, to the Proportion it hath done of late, they will be troublesome Neighbours; and I do not see a Spirit in Europe to contradict it, otherwise, than by every one's endeavouring to save its own Stake.

Thus it appears he sins with his Eyes open; and, to preserve his Power, abandons his Conscience: Whereas Buckingham had no Principle at all; nor Virtue, but the Immodesty of not affecting any. Clifford was by Constitution violent; and seems to have inspir'd Ashley with his Maxim, That the Dutch ought to be destroy'd. Ashley aspir'd to Power for its own sake: And, provided Lauderdale had leave to play the Balkaw in Scotland, he could very easily submit to be a Slave at Whitehall.

The Time allotted for Madame's Stay at Dover being complete, and all things put in the desired Train, her Royal Highness return'd to France; where she was received by the King in the most affectionate Manner, and by Monsieur, her Husband, without any apparent Dissatisfaction.

She was now at the Top of the Wheel; her Beauty at the full; and, tho' second to the Queen in Point of Rank, was more consider'd, follow'd, courted, and admir'd. In many an Age, not one of her Sex is seen in so dazzling a Light: She was the Pride and Glory of two splendid Courts: She had an equal Ascendant over two great Kings; And the Eyes of all Europe were upon her, as if the Fate of Nations had been in her Disposal.

But while the fair Meteor blaz'd the brightest, a Glass of Succory Water extinguish'd it for ever. She had no sooner drank it, but mortal Agonies seiz'd her; and, in a few Hours, all that remain'd of her was the Story of what she had been.

That she was poison'd by the Direction of her Husband, in a Fit of Jealousy, will scarce admit of Question: But on whose account is rather Matter of Scandal than History; because we find nothing advanced on that Head, but what seems rather to be deriv'd from Conjecture, than Information: Ludlow talks of a too great Familiarity with her Brother: Sir John Royston, that she was said to have fallen in love with the Duke of Monmouth, at Dover: Burnet, that her Husband had heard such Histories of her Behaviour, that he order'd her a Dose, &c. And where Evidences differ, especially upon Hear-says, no Bill ought to be found.

Sir Thomas Armstrong brought the News first, by riding Post, to Whitehall. The King melted into Tears, gave Monsieur a hard Name, and directed Sir Thomas to keep the Secret. Mr. Montague, the English Ambassador, likewise sent (1) several Dispatches, with so circumstantial an Account of her Death, as left no Room to doubt of the Murder: But nothing could rouse us; and

(1) All of which are so curious and important, that we cannot excuse ourselves from inserting them here by way of Comment on this very interesting Story.

Paris, June 30, N. S. 1670. 4 in the Morning.

My LORD,

I am sorry to be oblig'd, by my Employment, to give you an Account of the saddest Story in the World, and which I have hardly the Courage to write. Madame, on Sunday the 29th of this Instant, being at St. Cloud, with a great deal of Company, about five o'Clock in the Afternoon call'd for a Glass of Succory Water, that was prescrib'd her to drink, she having for two or three Days after bathing, found herself indispos'd; she had no sooner drank this, but she cry'd out she was dead, and fell into Madam de Montespan's Arms, and desired to be put to bed, and have a Glass of Wine. She continued in the greatest Torments imaginable till three o'Clock in the Morning, when she died; the King, the Queen, and all the Court being there till about six Hours before.

God send the King our Master Patience and Constancy to bear so great an Affliction. Madame desired she had no Reluctancy to die, but out of the Grief she thought it would be to the King her Brother; and when she was in any Ease from the Torture she was in, which the Physicians

French called Calique Bileaf, she ask'd for me, and it was to charge me to say all the kind things from her to her Brothers, the King and Duke. I did not leave her till she expired, and happened to come to St. Clem an Hour after she fell ill. Never any body died with that Piety and Resolution, and kept her Senses to the last. Excuse this imperfect Relation for the Grif I am in, I am sure all that had the Honour to know her, will have their Share for so great and general a Loss. I am, my Lord,

Years," &amp;c.

My Lord,

"This acknowledgeth two of your Lordships, the one of June the 17th, by Sir Henry Jones, the other of the 27th, by the Post. I suppose, by this time, you may have with you the Marshall de Billifant, who, besides his Condolance, will endeavour, I believe, to dissolve our Court of what the Court and People here will never be dissatisfied, which is Madame's being poisoned: which, having so good an Authority as her own saying it several times in her great Pains, makes the Report much more credited. But to me in particular, when I asked her several times, whether she thought herself poisoned, she would answer nothing: I believe being willing to spare the Addition of so great a Trouble to the King our Master, which was the Reason why, in my first Letter I made no Mention of it; neither am I Physician good enough to say he was poisoned, or the way said. They are willing, in this Country, to make me the Author of the Report, I mean Mesieur, and says, I do it to break the good Intelligence between the two Crowns.

The King and Ministers here, seem extremely affected with the Loss of Madame, and I do not doubt but they are, for they hoped upon her Consideration to bring the King our Master to consider of things, and enter into a Friendship with this Crown, British, perhaps, than they think he will now, the is to more. What was begun, or what was intended, I do not pretend to search into, since your Lordship did not think fit to communicate the last Part of it to me; but I cannot help knowing the Town Talk, and I dare answer that all that the King our Master can propose, will be granted here to have his Friendship, and there is nothing on the other Side the Dutch will not do to hinder our joining with the French. All I desire to know, my Lord, is that would I am here, I may know what Language to hold in Conversation with the other Ministers, that I may not be ridiculous with the Character I have upon me. Whilst Madame was alive, she did me the Honour to trust me enough to hinder me from being exposed to that Misfortune.

I am here for the little time you know her in England, you could not but know her enough to regret her as long as you live, as I am sure you have Reason to for I never knew any body kinder, nor have a better Opinion of another, in all kinds, than the hind of you. And I believe the love'd the King her Brother too well, if he had not been perwaded how well and faithfully you serv'd him, to have been so really concern'd for you, as I have observed her to be upon all Occasions, since there has been a good Understanding between you. As for my own particular, I have had so great a Loss, that I have no Joy in this Country, nor Hopes of any in another. Madame, after several Discourses with me in her Illness, which was all nothing but kind Expressions of the King our Master, at last told me she was extremely sorry she had done nothing for me, before she died, in return of all the Zeal and Affection with which I had serv'd her, since my being here. She told me that there were six hundred Pilots of hers in several Places; she bid me take them for her sake. I told her she had many poor Servants that wanted more than I, that I never serv'd her out of Interest, and that absolutely I would not take it; but if she pleas'd to tell me which of them I should give it to, I would dispose of it according to her Pleasure: She had so much Presence of Mind as to name them to me by their Names; but the Breath was no sooner out of her Body, but Mesieur seiz'd all her Keys and Chests. I enquir'd next Day where the Money was; one of her Women said it was in such a Place, which happen'd to be the first thousand Pilots the King our Master sent her. For just as that Money came it was design'd to purchase some Jewels, upon which she had already taken up the Money; but two Days before the King of France gave her a Box, with which she purchas'd them, and so the Money came clear in to her.

I demand'd the Money upon this from Mesieur, as Money of mine, that was borrow'd for Madame, it having been deliver'd by my Servant to two of her Women, who ask'd him, as they could not do otherwise, that that Money came from me, for they never knew that the King our Master had sent it her. Mesieur had in this time got away above half of the Money, she tell I had deliver'd me; which I did, as the uttermost Farthing, in the Presence of my Lord Abbot Montague, and two other Witnesses, dispose of to

Madame's Servants equally, as she directed. Mesieur has promised me the rest, which they are to have in the same manner, but if they are not wise enough to keep their Council, he will certainly take it from them: I could not have got it for the poor People any other way, and I believe the King will be gladder they should have it, than Mesieur. I desire you will let the King know this for my Discharge, and let it go no farther. Sir George Hamilton was a Witness of the thing with my Lord Abbot Montague. I thought fit to trouble your Lordship with this Account, which is all at present from, my Lord,

Years, &amp;c.

P. S. Since the writing of this I am told, from very good Hands, and one that Mesieur trusts, that he, being desired by the King to deliver up all Madame's Papers, before he would do it, he first sent for my Lord Abbot Montague to read them, and interpret them to him; but not trusting enough to him, he employ'd other Persons, that understood the Language, to do it, among which Madam de Fieau was one; so that most of the private things, between the King and Madame, are and will be very public, there were some things in Cyprus, which trouble him extremely; but yet he pretends to guess at it, and complains extremely of the King our Master for having a Conversation with Madame, and treating herself with her, without his Knowledge. My Lord Abbot Montague will, I hope, give you a larger Account of this Matter than I can; for tho' Mesieur enjoind him Secrecy to all the World, it cannot extend to you, if there be any thing that concerns the King our Master's Affairs."

To the King.

Paris, July 15, 1670.

SIR,

"I ought to begin with begging your Majesty's Pardon for saying any thing to you upon so sad a Subject, and where I had the Misfortune to be a Witness of the cruellest, and most generous End any Person in the World ever made. I had the Honour, on the Saturday, which was the Day before Madame dy'd, to entertain her a great while; the most of her Discourse being concerning Mesieur, and how impossible she was for her to live happily with him, for he was fallen out with her worse than ever, because that two Days before she had been at Perfaits, and there he found her talking privately with the King, about Affairs which were not fit to be communicated to him. She told me your Majesty and the King were both resolv'd upon a War with Holland, as soon as you could be agreed on the Matter of it. These were the last Words I had the Honour to have from her till she fell ill, for Mesieur came in and interrupted her, and I returned to Paris the next Day. When she fell ill, she call'd for me two or three times. Madam de Mithulburg sent for me, as soon as I came in, she told me, You see the sad Condition I am in; I am going to die; How I pity the King my Brother? For I am sure, he will be the Person for the World that loves him best. A little while after, she call'd me again, bidding me be care to say all the kind things in the World from her to the King my Brother, and thank him for all his Kindness and Care of me. Then she asked me if I remember what she had said to me the Night before, of your Majesty's Intentions to join with France against Holland; I told her yes; I pray then, said she, tell my Brother I never resolv'd him to it out of my own Interest, so he must consider in this Country, but because I thought it for his Honour and Advantage; for I always lov'd him above all things in the World, and have no Regret to leave it, but heartily leave him. She call'd to me several times to be sure to say this to you, and spoke to me in English. I ask'd her then, if she believ'd herself poisoned: Her Confessors that was by, understood that Word, and told her, Madam, you must receive nobody but offer up your Death to God as a Sacrifice; so he would never answer me to that Question, tho' I asked her several times, but would only shrink up her Shoulders.

I asked her for her Cabinet, where all her Letters were, to send them to your Majesty; she bid me take it from Madam de Borde that she was swooning dead dying, to see her Mistress in that Condition; and before she came to herself, Mesieur had seiz'd on them. She recommended to you to help, as much as you could, all her poor Servants: She bid me write to my Lord Aringford, to put you in mind of it (so tell the King my Brother) I hope he will for my sake, do for him what he promis'd; Car c'est un homme qui aime à se faire le bien [for he is a Person that both loves him, and serves him faithfully]. She spoke afterwards a great deal in French aloud, benouncing and lamenting the Condition she knew your Majesty would be in when you heard the News of her Death. I humbly again beg your Majesty's Pardon, for having been the unfortunate Teller of so sad News;

A. D. 1670. Business to palliate their Wickedness in all the Courts of Europe: Of which the following Passages out of the Letters of Lord Arlington to Sir William Temple and Sir William Godolphin, afford us very sufficient Evidence:

To Sir W. T.

"And in this I send you all the News I can of him, or this Place, except that unhappy one of the Loss of Madame; which hath infinitely afflicted the King, and particularly all those that had the Honour to know her at Dover. The Embroilments that were in her Domestic, and the Suddenness of her Death, made the Opinion easily take place with us, that she was poison'd. But the Knowledge we have had since of the Care taken to examine her Body, and the Persuasion we understand his most Christian Majesty is in (whom it behoves to know this Matter to the Bottom) that she did not die of a violent Death, had taken off the greatest Part of our Suspicions. And Monsieur le Marechal de Bellefonds, who I hear is arriv'd this Evening, and is charg'd with giving the King a more particular Account of this unhappy Accident, and brings a complete Narrative, underwritten by the ablest Physicians and Surgeons of Paris, of her Death, and of the Dissection of her Body, will, as we suppose, entirely convince us, that we have nothing to lament herein, but the Loss of this admirable Princess, without any odious Circumstances, to make our Grief more insupportable."

To Sir W. G.

"Here inclosed I send you his Majesty's Letter to the King and Queen of Spain, notifying Madame's Death; which, happening as it did, doubled his Majesty's Grief for her; and it would have been hardly borne by him, had it appear'd less natural; so tenderly he lov'd her."

When Men are already resolv'd to do what they are ashamed of, and only lay out for a Pretence to keep themselves in Countenance, any will serve: Thus the Marshal Bellefonds found very little Difficulty to get his Court-Varnish admitted as the true Complexion of the Fact, and his Condolences kindly receiv'd; Advantage was even taken of this Ceremonial-Embassy to send over the Duke of Buckingham to Paris, at once to return the (m) Compliment, and to forward the Negotiations, which Madame had begun.

His most Christian Majesty had now a very great Game to play, which he could scarce hope to win, unless in Partnership with his Brother of England: Overjoy'd, therefore, to find the ugly Business of Madame's Death had blown so happily over; and that the Cabal very honestly resolv'd to deserve the Continuance of his Bounties, he receiv'd his Grace of Buckingham, as the Duke himself boasted, with more Honour than ever was given to any Subject before; and, during his Residence there, the only Controversy between them seems to have been, who should out-flatter the other: The King was the greatest Prince, that ever sat in the French Throne: The Duke was almost the only English Gentleman his Majesty had ever seen.

We have no regular Memoirs of his Grace's Negotiations; the Gentleman who publish'd Lord Arlington's Letters, either was not permitted, or did not think proper to publish his Correspondence with his Grace; so that instead of a Harvest, we must be content with the Gleanings.

By one Paragraph in Mr. Montagu's Letters, we find that the two Kings were agreed as to a War with Holland, but not as to the Manner: Possibly France was for breaking thro' the very Letter, as well as the Substance of the Treaty of Aix, by declaring against Spain as well as the States, which England, at once willing to save Appearances, and to avail herself of the Profits of the Spanish Trade, declin'd. This, perhaps, accounts for the Proposition beforemention'd, made to the Duke of Buckingham by Mr. de Lionne for a War with Holland only; which can be understood

Marshal de Bellefonds comes with a Compliment of Condolence:

News; there being none of your Servants that wishes your Content and Happiness with more Zeal and Truth, than,
SIR,
Your Majesty's, &c.

My Lord,
Paris, July 15. 70.
"I have, according to your Lordship's Direction, sent you here inclosed, the Ring, which Madame had on her Finger when she dy'd; which your Lordship will be pleas'd to present to his Majesty. I have taken the Liberty myself to give him an Account of some things, that Madame gave me in charge, presuming your Lordship would, out of Modesty, be glad to be spared the telling his Majesty them yourself; there being some things that concern you. There have been, ever since Madame's Death, as you may imagine, upon these Occasions, various Reports; that of her being poison'd prevailing above all the rest; which has disorder'd the Ministers here, as well as the King, to the greatest degree that can be. For my own particular, I have been so struck with it, that I have hardly had the Heart to stir out since; which, join'd with the Reports of the Town, how much the King our Master resenteth so horrid a Fact, that he would not receive Madame's Letter; and that he had commended me home; made them conclude, that the King our Master was dissatisfy'd with this Court, to the degree it was reported. So that to-day, when I was at St. Germain, from whence I am newly returned, to make those Compliments you order'd me to do, I am not able to express the Satisfaction that the King, and every body, had to know, that the King our Master was a little appeas'd, and that these Reports had made no Impression in his Mind to the Disadvantage of the French. I give you this Account, my Lord, that you may judge how much, in this Conjunction, they value the Friendship of England, and how necessary our Master's Kindness is to all their Designs. I do not doubt but there will be that Use made of it, as may be most for the Honour of the King, and the Good of the Nation; which is the chief Desire of him who is, with all Truth and Sincerity, Yours, &c.

My Lord,

"I am not well able to write to you in my own Hand, being so lame, with a Fall I had in coming, that I can very hardly stir either Hand or Arm; however, I hope in a day or two to go St. Germain.

This is only to give your Lordship an Account of what I believe you know already, of the Chevalier de Lozain's being permitted to come to Court, and to sit in the Army, as a Marshal de Camp to the King.

If Madame were poison'd, as few People doubt, he is look'd upon by all France, to have done it; and it is wonder'd at, by all France, that that King should have so little regard to the King of England's our Master, considering how infinitely he always carried himself to her when she was alive, as to permit his Return. It is my Duty to let you know this, to tell his Majesty; and if he thinks fit to speak to the French Ambassador of it, to do it vigorously, for I assure you it is best here made upon him to justify it.

(m) Mr. de Wit, to intimate his Apprehensions of the Concert now carrying on between England and Spain, having told Sir William Temple, that the Duke's Journey to Paris was neither to see the Country nor learn the Language; Mr. Ropin has most lately assur'd his Resident, that the Presence made use of by the Duke himself for his said Journey, was his Desire to see the Country and learn the Language.

understood no otherwise than as an Abatement upon their original Project. It farther appears from these and the like Expressions of the Dukes, Nothing but our being nearly-mouth'd, combinder us from finding our Accounts in this Matter; for you may almost ask what you please, that no formal Treaty had as yet pass between the Courts. And, upon the whole, we may conclude, that, during his Grace's Stay at Paris, Things went no farther than a Sort of Compramis; they, on their Side, suffering their Claims upon Spain to lie dormant, that our Ministers might still make their Market of the Triple League; and we, by way of Amends, refusing to strengthen that League by the Admission of other Princes, and conniving at their Seizure of the noble Duchy of Lorraine.

Lord Arlington's Letters.

The French King seizes Lorraine. Ludlow.

In the Beginning of August the (n) Duke set out for Paris; and, early in September, the Marshal de Crequi, at the Head of 25,000 Men, enter'd the Dukedom of Lorraine, seiz'd Nancy, and all the Places that lay in his Way, and was within half an Hour of surprizing the Duke's Person at Espinal.

For the Reason of this sudden Invasion, the French King pretended, "That the Duke of Lorraine had, contrary to a late Treaty, fortify'd some of his own Towns; and had endeavour'd, in a (o) clandestine Manner, to be admitted into the Triple Alliance; declaring, that he intended not to retain the Duchy in his Possession, but design'd to put it into the Hands of some other Person of the Lorraine Family, who should be more worthy of it."

Accordingly the Marshal de Crequi, having driven the Duke out of his Territories, publish'd an Order, forbidding his Subjects to yield him Obedience; commanding those in Arms for him to quit his Service, and put themselves into that of the King, and requiring all Orders of Men there to do Homage, and swear Allegiance, to him, under pain of Death, and Confiscation of Estate.

The Duke of Lorraine, being thus dispossest of his Dominions, without any preceding Declaration of War, fill'd all Europe with his Complaints, and, in particular, dispatch'd a Minister to the King of England, to desire his good Offices with the French King in this Conjunction; which he cou'd not easily doubt of, on the account of the Obligations he had formerly laid upon him, in offering to serve him with his Person and Troops, during the time of his Exile.

The States, likewise, as Lord Arlington himself expresses it, supposing the Duke's Calamities would, in the End, prove contagious to them, back'd his Remonstrances with their own, by representing, that this Step more immediately threaten'd the Residue of Flanders, as not only tending to frighten the neighbouring Powers from entering into any Confederacy for each other's Succour, but actually cutting off the Communication between them.

A. D. 1670.

But, tho' his Lordship acknowledges this was the very Reflection his Majesty himself made of it, tho' the Dutch were willing to come into vigorous Resolutions in conjunction with his Majesty, and though it was obviously as much the Interest of England to put a stop to the Encroachments of France in Lorraine, as the Spanish Netherlands, for the Preservation of which, the boasted Triple Alliance was made; his Majesty was numb'd all over, nor had the least Feeling for a Prince, whose Calamities were not much unlike his own: And this the States had the less Reason to wonder at; because the Court of England had before refused to let them into any Part of the Duke of Buckingham's Negotiations at Paris, and betray'd no Uncertainty at those Preparations, which alarmed all Europe besides.

But to no Part.

The Answer made to the Duke's Minister was, That his Majesty lamented the Condition of that unfortunate Prince, both for his own and his Neighbours Sake; and that he should be glad to give him any Ease in it, that was in his Power: But that he knew not how to go about it, with a Probability of Effect, till he hears what Spain and the Emperor say to it. His Majesty, however, wrote to the Duke, and promis'd him all the good Offices in his Power; but reserv'd to himself the Manner and Time of performing them.

Lord Arlington's Letters.

But to let us see with how little Sincerity even these comfortless Professions were made, in the very same Page where they remain upon Record, in Lord Arlington's Words to Sir William Godolphin, we are farther told, that the French Ambassador had taken a great deal of Pains to possess his Majesty and the Court here, with the many Provocations his Master had receiv'd from this Prince, the notorious Infringements of all his Treaties with him, and the many Practices he was now actually in against his Service and the public Peace; which, continues his Lordship, the Evidences the Ambassador produces, and the ill Reputation this Prince hath in the World, render very CREDIBLE.

His Lordship then proceeds to say, that his Majesty, to make himself capable of truer Measures in this Conjunction, with relation to the Affair of Lorraine, the Inclinations of the Emperor in the Triple Alliance, and the professed Fears of Holland, has thought fit to call over to him privately Sir William Temple: But with what Truth this was said, may be gather'd from Sir William's own Account of his Return and Reception; which was the most mortifying imaginable.

Sir W. Temple recalled, and ill received.

(u) Mr. Oldmixon is pleas'd to affirm, Vol. i. p. 553, That Arlington and Clifford were in the Depth of this rancorous Intrigue, but that Buckingham and Ashley were not admitted to far into it: And yet we find his Grace thus writing to Arlington from Paris; I have written more at large to you by my Lord Ashley; and when you have discovered whether, if you think my Story will be of any use to his Majesty, let me know it.

(s) By the Treaty of Aix, all Princes were invited into the Guaranty for the greater securing and strengthening of the Agreement then made between Spain and France. Pursuant to this, his Majesty (of England) sent a Minister to the Protestant Princes in Germany, to invite them into the Guaranty of the said Treaty, or in other Words, into the Triple League. (England's Appeal, p. 12, 13.)

Of the first, in a Letter to his Father, he says, "Soon after my coming over, my Wife wrote me word, that Mr. Gioe, the Danish Envoy there in Holland, had told her in Confidence, and out of Kindness to me, that Mr. Pomponne, the French Ambassador at the Hague, had acquainted him, that new Measures were taken between our Court and that of France, among which one was, that I should be recalled, and return no more."

And, as to the last, he complains of having been oblig'd to wait an Hour and a half before he could have an Audience of his FRIEND Arlington; who, at last, entertain'd him only with common Discourse; and, the next Day, introduced him to kiss the King's Hand in the Mall, as a Person who had no Account to give, nor Commands to receive.

The following Circumstances, which are taken from a Dispatch of Lord Arlington's to Sir William Godolphin, likewise serve to shew, how little Credit was due to any thing our Ministers said:

"Immediately after the Departure of mine, came the (p) Original long-look'd for (q) Letter from the Emperor to his Majesty, accompanied with the Project of a Treaty for his Imperial Majesty's Accession (as it is called) with his Friends and Confederates into the Triple League. Copies of which Letter and Project go here inclos'd; upon the Subject of which his Majesty had several and very serious Debates; on the one Hand he considered what a Disreputation it would be to him here at Home, and to the Triple League Abroad, if we should reject this Offer of the Emperor's, how unreasonable soever the Conditions appear on his Plenipotentiary's Part, in their Proposal of his Accession. On the other Side, he weighed the Burthen of the Reciprocal, the little Countenance the Emperor's Letter gave to it, and what intervened in the Middle of the Debate, his most Christian Majesty's Promise of another Year for the Determination of the Controversies by the Arbitrage of the two Kings, and, in the Issue, resolv'd upon writing the inclosed Letter to the Emperor, commanding me to accompany it, with one to the Baron à Sola, of which you have here likewise a Copy; by all which you will clearly see what was theirs, and what is our present Mind upon this great Matter. The Spanish and Dutch Embassadors are not well pleased with it, and will not fail undoubtedly to infect all their Correspondents with the same Opinion, as they have endeavoured to do with their Acquaintance amongst us, which we easily forelaw, and yet it could not prevail upon us to make a Conclusion that would inevitably have drawn upon us such burthenome Consequences, and if we can judge any thing aright of the Mind of Swedenland, it will not differ at all from ours, whose Necessities not being fewer, they cannot but apprehend how many Wars this Reciprocal would involve them in.

Holland, whose Fears are stronger, and perhaps not without good Grounds, will not, we fear, approve our Proceedings; and yet to this Day, neither they nor Spain take much care to charge us with any Propositions that may either better our present Condition, or alleviate the future one of the War. The Conde de Molina, upon the Sight of these Papers, and the Promise of another Years Treaty, which you will see in the Paper from Monsieur de Lionne, begins to declare openly that he sees plainly we are breaking the Triple League, and that he will be too quick for us; for without Delay he will be gone into France, and there offer to them the abandoning the Spanish Low Countries, which he says he has Power to do.

Monsieur de Risjacourt seeing what ill Success the Emperor's Envoy had at Paris, in favour of his Master the Duke of Lorraine, is likewise taking Leave here, despairing, as he says, of seeing our Master concerning himself, as he wishes he should, in favour of his; but perhaps upon another Ground to make a better way for the Duke's Negotiation in France, by suspending his Solicitations in other Courts, since that King hath declared, That he will not restore him his Country by the Mediation of any Prince, who from a Mediator may naturally become a Guarantee for the Peace he shall make in his Behalf."

To close on this Head: It appears from all these unquestionable Authorities, that the Triple League was negotiated to preserve the Balance of Europe, not for the particular Con-

(p) A Copy of it had been presented before.

(q) "Upon the receiving of the Letter, his Majesty (upon whose Goodness some of our great Men had not had Time to yet) assured the Spanish Ambassador (who had delivered the Letter) he was glad his Imperial Majesty was so ready to come into the League; and told him, he would cause an Instrument to be prepared, in order to the said Admission. But when the Resolution was taken, and Orders given for preparing the said Instrument, it was first moved, That Mr. Secretary Treasurer (who was not initiated in their holy Mysteries) might not have the drawing of it, though it was his proper Province: And then, having made themselves the sole Masters of the Thing, a tolerable and reasonable honest Draught was first brought in; but, before it was perfected, they added their Part to ingeniously, (with the Help of Mr. Collier) that, in the end, they possessed his Majesty with the Opinion, "That the admitting of the Emperor would be attended with very dangerous Consequences; and that, in case he came into the League, his Majesty would be engaged in all his Quarrels, and bound to make his Forces march into the furthest Part of Germany, as often as it should happen to be invaded by the Great Turk." The late Secretary Treasurer opposed this as much as he was able, and endeavoured to satisfy his Majesty, that the Guaranty of the Triple League, as well as of the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, related only to the Aggression, and other Hostilities, from either France or Spain: From whence (saith the Treaty) by reason of the said Alliance. But the wary, cautious Men (as well as of the greater Number) carried it, and the Emperor's Proposal was rejected.

We have gone yet further than all this, and the civil Applications of the French, and their kind Intreaties, did prevail with us, that, loathing the very Thoughts of the Triple League, and hating almost any thing that related unto it, we suffer'd an Agent of ours, one Mynsilly, whom we had sent to the Switzers, to invite them into the Guaranty of Aix laud who was intercepted and taken Prisoner by the French, while he was very busy in the Execution of what Commands he received, not many Months before, from our great Men) to be broken upon the Wheel at Paris, altho' one single Word from us would have sav'd his Life. Neither did we take it ill, (such is our Good-nature) that, upon the very Scaffold, twenty Questions were put to him, relating to his Majesty's Person; and (in that public and infamous Place) a strict Enquiry made into the Particulars of what had passed between him and the King of England; for that was his Majesty after mentioned and named." [England's Appeal, p. 19, 20.]

Treaty of the Triple League made to the South Netherlands.

Convenience of Spain, it was not allow'd to operate beyond the Spanish Netherlands; and that the whole Year produced no one Incident which did not reflect eternal Infamy on the Cabal, except the Ratification of the Treaty with his Catholic Majesty, which extended the Peace between the two Nations to the Coasts and Seas of America, and put a stop to those execrable Piracies and Plunderings, which had not only been countenanced, but authorized, by our Plantation-Governors, to the lasting Dishonour of the Nation.

Whatever Care is taken to conceal bad Measures, they make themselves apparent by their bad Consequences. It was very soon apprehended, that this extraordinary Intimacy with France boded no good to England; and the very Suspicion of what might follow dispos'd the Public to entertain no very favourable Opinion of the Court.

There was, however, a Squirrel at hand to throw out to the Whale; and, while the Monster was amus'd, our State-Pilots held themselves to be safe.

The Hope of a Comprehension, which the Nonconformists had been promis'd by the Duke of Buckingham, or else the Assurances which they might have receiv'd on the Disappointment of it, had encouraged them to meet in great Numbers, and to worship God openly their own Way, without any Apprehensions of the Government, and, as it were, in contempt of the Laws. Of this, the Licutenancy of London made strong Complaints to the King and Council, who equip'd them, according to their Desire, with strict and large Powers to disperse them. Upon this, the Train'd-bands were let loose upon them; all were harass'd and abus'd, many were wounded, and some Quakers kill'd. The penal Laws were likewise let loose, as well as the Sword. Hays and Jehly, two Presbyterians, and the most inoffensive of the Party, were taken up, for offering Money to certain busy Constables, who were hurrying some of their persecuted Fellow-subjects to Gaol, and offer'd illegal Bonds of 5000 l. each; which they were either to sign, or go to Prison: They refus'd, were committed, but at last enlarg'd. Pen and Mead, two eminent Quakers, were try'd at the Old Bailey, and fin'd forty Merks apiece for standing in the Court with their Hats on: The Indictment against them was for a Riot and Conspiracy: Their Defence was rational, free, and brave: The Behaviour of the Court brutish and absurd, beyond Expression: The Recorder of London, who acted the Part of a Judge, by way of Coadjutor to Sterling the Mayor, taking occasion to commend the Spanish Inquisition, and to say, It would never be well, till we had something like it, brow-beating the Jury, and endeavouring to harve them out of their Integrity, and oblige them to perjure themselves, by falsifying their Verdict: Three Days were these honest Men kept without Meat or Drink, by way of Torture; and yet continued immovably firm to their Consciences, and their Country, for which, though they deserv'd public Ho- nours, they were fin'd and imprison'd, by an arbitrary Sentence of the Court.— Such a Monster is ecclesiastical Tyranny!

It happen'd that while these Severities were on Foot, the King had Occasion for sixty thousand Pounds, and apply'd to his Friends in the City to furnish him. Sterling and his Party undertook it; but at the End of several Weeks could make up but ten thousand. The Fanatics, of all Sorts, hearing of his Majesty's Distresses, made a Tender of forty thousand; their Adversaries alarm'd, would have dissuaded the King from accepting it; but the Money being welcome, his Majesty turned a deaf Ear, and Ways and Means were found to patch up the rest.

This it became notorious, that those People could no longer be reproach'd with having Designs against the Government; for it is, at this Day, extremely well understood, that those who advance Money to Kings, give a much better Security than any Oath for their good Behaviour.

However surprizing it may be to the Reader, that, after such extraordinary Grants, without any extraordinary Issues to exhaust them, the King should so soon be in Necessity, it will scarce be surprizing, that, after such an Intimacy, his Majesty should again have Recourse to his Parliament.

The two Houses had only been adjourn'd, so that the Session was rather to be resum'd than open'd. This was done October the 24th; the King attended, and tho' he did not enter into Particulars himself, lent his Countenance to what was delivered in his Name by the Lord Keeper, who, if he was not in the Secret, enlarg'd on the present Situation of Things with more Zeal than Knowledge, and if he was, with more Artifice than Truth. He began with setting forth the great military Preparations of our Neighbours, France and Holland: Declar'd that since the Beginning of the last Dutch War, the French had increased the Greatness and Number of their Ships so much, that their STRENGTH BY SEA, WAS THRICE AS MUCH AS IT WAS BEFORE, and that the Dutch were also augmenting their Fleets. Hence his Lordship infer'd, that in Prudence we ought to arm likewise; and that his Majesty had already given Orders to fit out a Fleet of fifty Sail of the greatest Ships, exclusive of those for the Mediterranean Service, that over Security might not expose us to Danger. But least this Consideration should not have Weight enough, he threw in the Claims of Aid and Assistance our Neighbours had upon us, by the Leagues we had made for the common Peace of Christendom. Of these Leagues his Lordship then oblig'd both Houses with a curious Detail, wisely setting the Triple League, and Treaty of Aix in Front, and ending with the Treaties then depending between his Majesty and France, and even between his Majesty and the States of the United Provinces. By the former Part of his Speech, Danger was to be fear'd from every body; by the latter from no body. His Lordship then came to the greatest Point of all, the Difficulties of the Government; declar'd the ordinary Charge of the Fleet communibus Annis, came to (r) five hundred thousand Pounds a Year; and that the setting out the Fleet in Question, could not cost less than eight hundred Thousand; complain'd that the new Duty laid upon Wines, lately given, was likely to fall short of the Value set upon it; demanded such a Supply as might enable his Majesty to take off his Debts upon Interest, as well as set out this Fleet against the Spring, and concluded all with a modest Hint drawn from his Majesty's Speech, that all their Business was to be dispatch'd before Christmas.

There were fo many gross Fallacies and Inconsistencies in this Speech that even the Cabal were ashamed of it: Contrary to usual Custom it was not suffered to be printed; and Mr. Marvel in his Growth of Popery, tells us, that it was not without Difficulty that he was able to procure a Copy of it.

It was, nevertheless, swallowed whole by the Commons. The House was thin and obsequious, and resolv'd to supply him according to his Occasions. But tho' there was not one dissenting Voice, there were few Affirmatives. Tho' they had not the Courage to oppose, they had too much Modesty to approve; at once acquiescing, and by their Silence acknowledging how much they were ashamed of doing so.

This was the Aspect of the Session at the Beginning; but this Baseness soon wore off: Sir Robert Howard, Sir Robert Car, Sir Richard Temple and others, openly took leave of their former Party, and became Undertakers for the Court; and such was the Number of constant Courtiers, increased by apostate Patriots, who were bought off, says Marvel, some at six, others at ten, and one at fifteen Thousand Pounds in Money, besides the Offices, Lands, and Reversions distributed among others, that it is a Mercy they gave not away the whole Land and Liberty of England.

Thus the Interest of the King and the Interest of the House of Commons, being the same, the Business of the Session went on as (r) smoothly as could be wish'd. Tho' the Ministers refused to give in the Particulars of the King's (t) Debts, the House made Provision towards the Discharge of them, and tho' no Rupture appear'd to be in Sight, they made no Scruple to compliment his Majesty with his fifty Ships.

The Ways and Means they had recourse to for making good the Supply, were, by a Bill to lay a Tax of one Shilling in the Pound on Land, two Shillings on two Thirds of the Salaries of Offices, and fifteen Shillings for every hundred Pound of Bankers Money and Stock; by an additional Excise upon Beer, Ale, &c. for six Years; and certain Impositions on Law-Proceedings for nine Years.

According to the Preambles of these several Bills, the Tax on Lands, &c. was a free Gift to supply the extraordinary Occasions which oblig'd his Majesty to a great and present Expence for the necessary Defence of his Realms; the Excise, an Aid to his Majesty, whose weighty and urgent Affairs required an extraordinary Supply towards the Discharge of his great Debts; and the Law Bill arose from a serious Consideration both of his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions and great Debts.

They had moreover prepared and pass'd another Bill, for laying an Impost on Tobacco, Scotch Salt, Glasses, &c. But against this Bill the Merchants of London appear'd at the Bar of the House of Lords, who had already express'd their Apprehensions of the prodigal (u) Spirit which had taken Possession of the House of Commons; and their

Lordships

(r) In the Regulation of the Revenue, p. 176. the Reader will find the Navy Orders estimated at 200,000 l. In an Estimate of the public Charge, laid before the House of Commons in 1672, the Ordinary of the Navy is again estimated at 200,000 l. and the Ordinance at 40,000 l. And, in a third, laid before the King and Council in 1675, by the Lord Treasurer Dunby, the Navy is charg'd at 240,000 l. and the Ordinance at 60,000 l.

(s) Of this Lord delington bears Witness to Sir William Gudolphin, as follows:

"The common Occurrences of the Court will tell you how happily the House of Commons proceed, towards the making good to his Majesty their Promise of supplying him proportionally to his Occasions; they have gone through all those foreign Commodities, upon which they will settle an Excise, for so many Years, towards the Discharge of the King's Debts; and, on Tuesday, will probably order a Bill for the effecting of it. After this is finished, their Purpose is to find out a Fund to supply his Majesty with ready Money, towards the equipping those fifty Ships he hath resolv'd to set out this Spring, which cannot be but by a Land-tax, a Poll-tax, a Twentieth Part, or the like; they may disagree in the Way, but in the End they seem unanimous to a Wonder.

(t) Those bearing Interest were said to amount to one Million, three hundred thousand Pounds.

(u) The Subsidy-Bill came first before them; upon which Occasion Lord Lanes is said to have spoke as follows:

"In the times of the late usurping Power, altho' great Taxes were exacted from us, we had then Means to pay them, we could sell our Lands, our Cows and Cattle, and there was plenty of Money throughout the Nation; now there is nothing of this; Brick is require'd of us, and no Straw allow'd to make it with. For that our Lands are thrown up, and Cows and Cattle are of little Value, is notorious to all the World.

And it is evident there is a Scarcity of Money; for all that Money call'd Brackets (as fit for the Coin of the Realm) is wholly vanished; the King's Proclamation and the Dutch have swept it all away; and of his now Majesty's Coin, there appears but very little; so that in effect, we have none left for common Use, but a little, old, lean coined Money of the three former Princes; and what Supply is preparing for it, my Lords? I hear of none, unless it be of Copper Farthings [call'd the Lean Farthing to this Day] and this the Metal that is to vindicate, according to the Inscription on it, the Dominion of the four Seas [Quatuor Maria circum].

And yet, if amidst this Scarcity, the vast Sums given are all employ'd for the King and Kingdom, it would not so much trouble us; but we cannot without infinite Regret of Heart, see so great a part of it pound'd up in the Purser of other private Men; and see them flourish in Estates, who, in the time of his Majesty's most happy Reignation, were worth very little or nothing; and now the same Men purchase Lands, and keep their Coaches and fix Horset, their Pages and their Lacquies, while in the mean time, those that have faithfully served the King are expost to Penury and Want, and have scarce sufficient left to buy their Bread.

But suppose all the Money given were employ'd for the Use of his Majesty, and his Majesty were not contented (as without Doubt he is) there no Bounds to, or Moderation in giving? Will you say, that if we shall not plentifully supply his Majesty, he will not be able to defend us, or maintain the Triple League? And we shall thereby run the Hazard of being conquer'd?

'Tis true, say Lords, that this may be a Reason for giving something; but it is so far from being an Argument for giving

A. D. 1670.

Lordships not only very gladly lent an Ear, but warmly supported their Cause; not so much perhaps out of Tenderness to the Subject, as to shew themselves into some Part of this great Privilege of giving away the People's Money. This drew on a very memorable Controversy between the two Houses, which grew so warm, and lasted so long, that the Court found it necessary to close the Session, and drop the Bill.

We must now go back, to speak of a very remarkable Incident, which took place in the Course of the Session, and which serves to illustrate yet farther that Ingredient in his Majesty's Disposition, which has been more than once touch'd upon already.

While the House was in a Committee on Ways and Means, a Motion was made for laying a Tax on Playhouses; which was opposed by the Courtiers, who gave for a Reason, That the Players were the King's Servants, and a Part of his Pleasure. To this Sir John Coventry, by way of Reply, ask'd, If the King's Pleasure lay among the Men or Women Players? This was reported at Court, where it was so highly resent'd, that a Resolution was taken to set a Mark on Sir John, to deter others from taking the like Liberties for the future.

Sir John Coventry, for Words spoken in the House of Commons, is convey'd and wounded. Marvel.

Accordingly on the House adjourning till after Christmas, on the very Night of the Adjournalment, twenty six of the Duke of Monmouth's Troop, and some few Foot, lay in wait from Ten at Night till Two in the Morning, by St. Dunstons, and as he return'd from the Tavern where he sup'd, to his own House, they threw him down, and, with a Knife, cut the End of his Nose almost off; but Company coming made them fearful to finish it; so they made off. Sir Thomas Sande, Lieutenant of the Troop, commanded the Party; and Obrian, the Earl of Inchiquin's Son, was a principal Actor. The Court hereupon sometimes thought to carry it with an high Hand, to question Sir John for his Words, and maintain the Action. Sometimes again they flagged in their Councils. One while the King commanded Sir Theo. Clarges and Sir William Pulteney to release Wrest and Lake, who were two of the Actors, and taken; but, the Night before the House met, surrendered them again. The House being thin and fullen the next Day, the Court did not oppose adjourning for some Days longer, till it was filled; when they fell immediately upon Coventry's Business, and voted, that they would go upon nothing else whatever, till they had pass'd a Bill, as they did, for Sande, Obrian, Parry, and Reeves, to come in by the 16th of February, (which was alter'd by the Lords to the 10th of March) or else be condemn'd, and never to be pardon'd, but by an express Act of Parliament, and their Names therein insert'd, for fear of their being included in some general Act of Grace. Yet farther, it was provided, that all such Actions, for the future, on any Man, should be Felony, without Clergy; and that whoever should otherwise strike or wound any Parliament-man, during his Attendance, or going or coming, should be liable to Imprisonment for a Year, treble Damages, and Incapacity.

As soon as this angry Affair was blown over, the House recover'd their former good Temper, and became as tractable as ever: It is therefore so much the more remarkable, that they should mix so much Honey with the Gall of a Disquisition into the Growth of *Poper*y; the several (v) Causes and Remedies for which, they enumerated in a solemn Address to the King; and, to give it the more Weight, giving so much, that it may be clearly made out to your Lordships, that it is the direct and ready Way to be conquer'd by a Foreigner. And it may be the Policy of the French King, by those often Alarms of Armies and Fleets, to induce us to consume our Treasure in vain Preparations against him; And after he has by this means made us poor and weak enough, he may then come upon us and destroy us.

It is not, my Lords, the giving of a great deal, but the well managing of the Money given, that must keep us safe from our Enemies. If we shall preserve and husband well our Treasure, wherein our Strength and the Sinews of War lie, and apply it to the right Uses, we shall still be superior to all our Enemies; but if we shall vainly and imprudently mispend it, we shall become an easy Prey to them.

Besides, my Lords, what is this but, ex mortuis nati, and for Fear of being conquer'd by a Foreigner, put ourselves in a Condition almost as bad; pardon me, my Lords, if I say in some Respects a great deal worse; for when we are under the Power of the Victor, we know we can fall no lower; and the Certainties of our Miseries are some kind of Diminution of them: But in this wild way we have no Certainty at all, for if you give this much to-day, you may give at to-morrow, and never leave giving till we have given all that ever we have away; and the Anxiety of Mind which arises from this doubtful Estate, is an high Addition to our Afflictions.

All that I beg, my Lords, is, that we may be able to make some Estimate of ourselves: Would his Majesty be pleas'd to have a Quarter of our Estates? for my Part, he shall have it: Would his Majesty be pleas'd to have half? for my Part, upon a good Occasion, he shall have it: But I beseech your Lordships then, that we may have some Assurance of the quiet Enjoyment of the Remainder, and know what we have to trust to.

It is proper to add in this Place, that the By-Stander has quoted this Speech as really Lord Lucas's, and that Mr. Certe treats it as a Libel, which a Printer was punished for publishing, about four Years after. Mr. Marvel in his Letters writes thus:

DEAR WILL,

"I think I have not told you, that on our Bill of Subsidy, the Lord Lucas made a fervent, bold Speech against our Prodigality in giving, and the weak Locomotion of the Government, the King being present. Copies going about every where, one of them was brought into the Lord's House, and Lord Lucas was asser'd whether it was his: He said, Part was, and Part was not. Thereupon they took Advantage, and said it was a Libel even against Lucas himself. On this they voted it a Libel, and to be burn'd by the Hangman, which was done; but the Sport was, the Hangman burn'd the Lord's Order with it."

(v) As follows: Cause of the Growth of Popery.

"That there are great Numbers of Priests and Jesuits frequenting the Cities of London and Westminster, and most of the Counties of this Kingdom, more than formerly, seducing your Majesty's good Subjects. 2. That there are several Chapels and Places used for living of Mass in the great Towns, and many other Parts of the Kingdom, besides those in Embassadors Houses, whether great Numbers of your Majesty's Subjects constantly resort and repair without Control; and especially in the Cities of London and Westminster, contrary to the Laws established. 3. That there are Fraternities or Convents of English Popish Priests, and Jesuits at St. James's, and at the Convent in Harford, and other Parts of the Kingdom; besides, several Schools are kept in divers Parts of the Kingdom for the corrupt educating of Youth in the Principles of Popery. 4. The common and public selling of Popish Catechisms, and other seditious Books, even in the Time of Parliament. 5. The general Reminiscence of the Magistrates and other Officers, Clerks of the Assize, and Clerks of the Peace, in not convicting of Popery according to Law. 6. That suspected Recusants are free from all Offices chargeable and trouble-

Weight, they requested the Concurrence of the Lords: Who, having received Satisfaction as to the several Matters and Facts therein contained, very readily join'd in it; and both Houses, in concert, presented it to his Majesty at Whitehall.

His Majesty's Answer was:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,
 " I will take care of all these things: I will cause a Proclamation to be issued out against the Priests; I will cause the Judges, and all other Officers, to put the Laws against Papists in execution; and all other things, that may conduce to the Prevention of the Growth of Popery. But I suppose no Man will wonder, if I make a Difference between those that have newly changed their Religion, and those that were bred up in that Religion, and serv'd my Father and me faithfully in the late Wars."

And as the House was in no Disposition to come to Extremities with his Majesty, they took no notice of the Distinction which he was pleas'd to make between old Professors and new Converts; but, on the contrary, voted the Answer to be most gracious, and return'd Thanks accordingly.

Of all the Measures that were taken to embarrass the Court, thro' this whole Reign, none had so strong an Effect as the Cry against Popery. It is fit, therefore, that the Reader should be put in mind, that those who had the Honour to raise it first, and who reviv'd it so often, were those who were yet more furious against Protestant Nonconformity; as may be gather'd from the violent Proceedings against Conventicles, already treated of; and especially from the Votes of this very Session, when, the famous Case of Hays and Jekyll being brought before the Commons, it was resolv'd, That this House doth give Approbation to what was done by the late Lord Mayor Sir Samuel Sterling, and the Lieutenant of London, in committing Mr. Hays and Mr. Jekyll; and that it was done in order to the Preservation of the King, and Peace of the Kingdom.

It may, however, be presum'd, that these Instances of the Zeal of the Commons, against the Fanatics and Papists, were to serve, instead of Righteousness, to keep up some Credit with their Constituents: The Duke's Religion was now no Secret; and yet his Interest in the House was so good, that an Act was prepar'd and pass'd, this Session, for affixing him 20,000 l. a Year out of the Excise, in lieu of the Wine Licences (estimated by Lord Dunby afterwards but at 10,000 l. a Year) which were invest'd in the King; because the Prices of Wines had been much rais'd by the new Imposition, (so it is express'd in the Preamble) and the Retailers much discourag'd from taking Licence.

Upon the 22d of (w) April, both Houses waited upon his Majesty at Whitehall, with an Address, That his Majesty would be pleas'd, by his own Example, to encourage the constant wearing of the Manufactures of his own Kingdom, and discountenance all those of foreign Countries: To which his Majesty was pleas'd to reply, That he would comply with their Desire, that he had, in his own Person, as little us'd them as any, and would discountenance those that should:

some, and do enjoy the Advantage of Offices and Places beneficial, executed either by themselves, or Persons entrusted for them. 7. That the Avoidance of Churches, and Presentations to Livings be dispos'd by Papish Recusants, or by others entrusted by them as they direct; whereby most of those Livings and Benefices are fill'd with scandalous and unfit Ministers. 8. That many Persons take the Liberty to send their Children beyond the Seas to be educated in the Papish Religion: and that several young Persons are sent beyond the Seas, upon the Notion of their better Education, under Tutors and Guardians who are not pay to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and finally corrupt the Youth under their Tuition, into Popery. 9. That there have been few Exchequer Processes issu'd forth since the Act of Parliament against Papish Recusants Convict, tho' many have been certify'd thither. 10. The great Inolencies of Papists in Ireland (where do publicly appear Archbishops and Bishops reputed to be made so by the Pope, in Opposition to those made under his Majesty's Authority, according to the Religion establish'd in England and Ireland) and the open Exercise of Mass in Dublin, and other Parts of that Kingdom, is further a great Cause of the present Growth of Popery. That Peter Talbot, the reputed Archbishop of Dublin, was publicly consecrated at Sarum with great Solemnity; from whence he came to London, where he exercised his Function; and was all along in his Journey to Chesler treated with the Character of his Grace by the Papish Recusants whom he visited: And at his landing at Dublin was received with very great Solemnity by those of the Papish Religion there, where also he exercised his Function publicly, great Multitudes then flocking to him, and still continue to do the same. His present Residence is within three Miles of Dublin, at his Brother's, Colonel Richard Talbot's, who is now here soliciting your Majesty as public Agent on the Behalf of the Papish of that Kingdom."

Remedia against those growing Mischief.

" We the Lords and Commons assembled in this present Parliament, do in all Humility repretent unto your sacred Majesty in their own Petitions following: 1. That your Majesty by your Proclamation would be most graciously pleas'd to command, that all Papish Priests and Jesuits do depart this Realm, and all other your Majesty's Dominions, on or before the next Day to be prescrib'd, at their Parts; except only such Foreign Priests as attend his Majesty's Person by the Contract of Marriage, and Embassadors, according to the Law of Nations: And all Judges, &c. do cause the Laws now in Force against Papish Recusants Convict, to be put in due Execution: And in the first Place, for the speedy convicting such Papish Recusants, that all Judges and Justices aforesaid do strictly give the said Laws in Charge unto the Juries at all Assizes and Sessions, under the Penalty of incurring your Majesty's highest Displeasure. 2. That your Majesty would be pleas'd to retain and hinder the great Concurrence of your Native Subjects from bearing of Mass, and other Exercises of the Romish Religion, in the Houses of Foreign Embassadors or Agents, and in all other Churches and Places of this Kingdom. 3. That your Majesty would be pleas'd to take care, and cause, That no Office or Employment of Public Authority, Trust, or Command in Civil or Military Affairs, be committed to, or exercis'd in, the Hands of any Papish Recusant, or justly reputed so to be. 4. That your Majesty would be pleas'd to take notice of all Fraternities or Convents of English, and other Papish Priests, Jesuits or Friars, and Schools for the educating of Youth in the Principles of Popery, erected within your Majesty's Dominions, and to cause the same to be abolish'd, and the said Priests, Jesuits, Friars and School-masters to be duly punished for such their Inolencies. 5. That your Majesty would be pleas'd from time to time to require and cause, that all the Officers of, or relating to, the Exchequer, issue forth Processes effectually against Papish Recusants Convict certify'd thither. And that such Officers as shall refuse or neglect to do their Duty, as aforesaid, be severely punished for such their Failures. 6. That your Majesty would be pleas'd to give Order for apprehending, and bringing over into England one Plowden, who goes under the Name of Primate of Ireland, and one Peter Talbot, who takes on him the Name of Archbishop of Dublin, to answer such Matters as shall be objected against them."

clos'd, by a (x) long Prorogation, till April the 16th, 1672, without a Speech, or any Expression of Thanks, for the Aids it had produc'd: Whence it may be gather'd, that the King was more disoblig'd by the Loss of the Bill for laying a Duty on Tobacco, &c. than oblig'd by the rest.

The State of the Nation, at and about this time, is thus summ'd up by Marvel, in his Epistles: The Court is at the highest Pitch of Want and Luxury; and the House of Commons are grown extremely chargeable to the King, and odious to the People, who are full of Discontent.

Prince of Orange's first Visit to England.

Before we resume our Pursuit of foreign Affairs, it is necessary to mention, that, towards the End of the last Year, the Prince of Orange made his first Visit to England: He had made the Proposal some time before, and receiv'd sufficient Encouragement; but it appears by Lord Arlington's Letters, that the Talk at Court of his coming grew more cool, after the Dover Interview, than it had been before. He was, nevertheless, receiv'd with much Affection by the King, and, by the Nation, with all the Honours they could bestow. His avow'd Business was to solicit the Payment of the great Debt due to him from his Majesty, who amus'd him with the Promise of assigning him some good Fund for the gradual Discharge of it; and did in earnest espouse his Claims on the Court of Spain: But it does not appear, that either his good Offices took effect, or that his Promise was made good.

Blood's Attempt on the Duke of Or-
mond,

The Day his Highness was entertain'd by the City of London, the Duke of Ormond, who accompany'd him, was seiz'd in his Return by Five desperate Ruffians, headed by the famous Blood, who dragg'd him out of his Coach, mounted him behind one of the Gang on Horseback, to whom also they bound him fast, and rode off with him towards Tyburn, with a Design to hang him there, to revenge the Deaths of Blood's Fellow-Conspirators, who were executed for a Plot to surprize the Castle of Dublin in 1663: But in the Way thither, his Grace made a shift to dismount his Man; and, while they lay struggling together on the Ground, his Domestic, who had been alarm'd by his Coachman, as also the neighbouring Inhabitants, came in to his Deliverance; which the Villain perceiving, he thought it advisable to quit his Hold, and make off; first firing his Pistols at the Duke, as did also one of his Accomplishes, who came up to his Assistance, tho' without doing any Execution.

So villainous an Attempt, on so great and popular a Man, excited alike the Concern and Indignation of the whole Kingdom: Even the Court seem'd to be as highly incensed as the Public; and a Proclamation

[Gazette,
Nov. 5:8.]

was set forth, offering a Thousand Pounds Reward to any Man who should discover any one of the Assassins; and the like Sum, and a Pardon, to any one of the Band, who should betray the rest.

A. D. 1671.

But no Discovery was made, till Blood and Crown himself was afterwards taken in another daring Enterprize, to carry off the Crown of England out of the Tower of London. The King had thus the Curiosity to see a Villain of a Size and Complexion so extraordinary; and the Duke of Ormond remark'd upon it, That the Man need not despair; for surely no King should wish to see a Malefactor, but with Intention to pardon him.

[Carter's Lett. of the Duke of Ormond, vol.
ii.]

His Behaviour before the King was, however, as uncommon as his Exploits: He not only avow'd his Crimes, but seem'd to glory in them. His Attempt on the Crown he could not deny, and that on the Duke he would not. Being ask'd who were his Associates, he reply'd, that he would never betray a Friend's Life, nor ever deny a Guilt in defence of his own. He even confess'd he had been engag'd in a Design to kill the King with a Carabine, when his Majesty went to swim in the Thames, above Battersea, for his Severities to the Godly: But that his Heart misgave him, out of an Awe of Majesty; and he not only gave over the Design, but oblig'd his Associates to do the same. He added, that he was under no Concern for his own Safety; but that it would not prove a Matter of such Indifferency to his Majesty; for there were Hundreds of his Friends yet undiscover'd, who were all bound to each other, by the indispensable Oaths of Conspirators, to revenge the Death of any of the Fraternity, &c.

Taken, and
the King

The King was struck, and thought it more advisable to be Friends with, than make an Example of, such a Desperado: He was, therefore, dismiss'd with the Hopes of a Pardon, which was, however to depend on the Duke of Ormond's Consent, who gave it in the most gallant manner, on the first Application. What is stranger still, his Pardon was accompany'd with the Grant of an Estate of 500 l. per Ann. in Ireland, and he was moreover admitted into all the Privacy and Intimacy of the Court; in the Royal Apartments of which he was perpetually seen, and by a particular Affection, officin'd in the very Room, where the Duke of Ormond was.

Pardon'd and provided for.

Thus, within the Compass of a Year, the tragical Death of a Sister tenderly belov'd, was forgiven, the Royal Guards were put upon the Office of Brawls, to set a Mark on a Senator, for Words spoken in Parliament, and the Assassin of the King's best Friend, was (y) pardon'd, rewarded, and taken into Grace and Favour.

We

(x) Which is so much the more remarkable, if it be true, what Mercul affirms in his Letters, That the Duke of Buckingham was again 140,000 l. in Debt, and that by this Prorogation, his Creditors would have time to tear all his Lands to Pieces.

(y) Upon this remarkable Event Mr. Carter enlarges as follows:

All the World stood amazed at his Mercy, Countenance and Favour shew'd to so atrocious a Malefactor, the Reasons and Meaning of which they could not see nor comprehend. The general Opinion was, that Blood was put upon this Assassination by the Duke of Buckingham and the Duchess of Cleveland, who both hated the Duke of Ormond mortally, and

Foreign Affairs.

We are now to turn our Eyes abroad.

Early in the Spring his most Christian Majesty had made the necessary Preparations for another Military Progress to Dunkirk, &c. which again struck a Panic thro' the United Provinces; where an Opinion began to prevail that every Motion of that Monarch threaten'd the Repose of Europe. This immediately produced fresh Overtures from the States to the Court of England, for an offensive and defensive Alliance, which for a while were urg'd with great Importunity on one Side, and receiv'd with much Coldness on the other. At last, however, an Opportunity was taken to demand what Reciprocation they would offer his Majesty upon it; it being understood, or at least represented by us, as a Matter that regarded their single Convenience only. To which they reply'd, None; presuming it was as much our Interest to embrace the Offer, as theirs to make it.

The States solicit an Alliance offensive and defensive with England;

[Lord Arlington's Letters.]

with Success.

Thus between their Stiffness and our Selfishness, all Negotiation between England and the States was again at a Stand; and the most Christian King soon after returning to Paris without making any new Attempts, their high and mighty Lordships did not think it worth while to press us any further.

What follow'd, was, the Recall of Sir William Temple in Form, and a Resolution to send another Person with a rougher Hand (Lord Arlington's Words to Sir William Godolphin, July 6, 1671) "who might incline those People to give his Majesty Satisfaction in many Points relating to the Commerce, instead of putting themselves to the Pains of inventing new ways of entangling him in politic Ties, to his Disadvantage."

We have here a broad Hint that our Ministers were in Search of a Pretence to fasten a Quarrel upon the Dutch: But the Orders soon after publicly given to the Captain of the Yacht, which was sent to bring over the Lady Temple, to sail thro' the Dutch Fleet, then in the Channel, and fire at the Ships next him, till they either struck their Topmasts, or return'd his Shot, put the Matter out of all question. But even this Expedient did not wholly answer; for the Dutch Admiral saluted the Yatch with his Guns, but did not lower his Sails; and the Captain did not care to enter the Lifts with a Cock-boat against a whole Squadron: So having fir'd a few Shot and pleaded his Orders for so doing, he made the best of his way; and upon his Arrival, was sent to the Tower by his Majesty's Command, for not having sufficiently respected his Majesty's Rights.

Of this Incident, Lord Arlington takes Occasion to make Mention in his Dispatch of September 7, but speaks of it rather as a Rencontre, than a Sure for a Rupture, as it really was: Adding, "His Majesty expects the States should give him Satisfaction for this Affront; and accordingly purposes to demand it by the Embassador he intends to send thither."

In another Letter from the same Lord to the same Minister, dated October 9th, the Progress of the growing ill Humour between England and the States, is thus farther intimated:

"It is an unpleasant Reflection we make to observe our Netherlands and Allies in Holland so little concern'd in them [Differences between France and Spain] as if they car'd not how soon the War broke out, whilst they multiply his Majesty's Dissatisfactions towards themselves, by thus denying us what the Treaty of Breda gave and were powerful Advocates to solicit and obtain his Pardon.

Again, if we look out for the first Author and Contriver of so black a Design, no body was so likely to put Blood upon it, or so fit to encourage him to undertake it, as the Duke of Buckingham. He was certainly the most profligate Person of the Age, and capable of any Iniquity, however mean or enormous; and it is not easy to find another Person, to whose Character the Design fit well suited, or who could be under a Temptation to remove the Duke of Ormond out of the way in such a manner. All the Arts and Suggestions which he and his Instruments could use had not yet woked his Grace so much out of the King's good Opinion and Favour, but that his Majesty still gave him upon occasion Marks of his Esteem and Confidence. The Duke had not by the Resentment which disgrac'd Ministers are apt to shew in their Conduct, given the finishing Stroke to his Credit with the King, which they had begun, by removing him from the Government of Ireland. He was still capable of serving his Majesty, and by being again employ'd, might be able to defeat the Measures which Buckingham and his Cabal had formed for subverting the Constitution of the Kingdom, to which he was in the mean time a considerable Instrument. It was undoubtedly Buckingham's Interest, and very convenient for his Purpose, to have the Duke of Ormond dispatched out of the way; and those who let Assassinations dwell upon their Thoughts for some time, may possibly at last give them Admittance into their Hearts. It was not long before this Attempt of Blood's, that the Duke of Buckingham and some of his Friends had given out, that the Duke of Ormond and Ossey had set on two Persons to murder him; that these two Persons were poisoned, and before their Death own'd the Subordination. It would be impertinent to offer to vindicate those two honorable Noblemen from a Charge which no Man on Earth could possibly believe. But to what Purpose could such a Calumny be invented and spread, unless to prepare the World to receive an Apology for another Assassination (in case the true Author should be discovered) as if it were perpetrated purely in Revenge for the Joke intended against himself, or made necessary for his own Defence? No body does odious things, but for some End or other, of a Piece with the Means which they make use of to bring it about. The Duke of Buckingham was not so sensless a Mortal, or knew Men so little as to believe this Story, which he took care to have published; or if he did, as a Masking judge of others by themselves, he could not suspect those Men of Virtue and Honour of such a Design without being capable of it himself. That there were Reasons to think him the Person who put Blood upon the Attempt on the Duke of Ormond, cannot well be question'd after the following Relation, which I had from a Gentleman, whose Veracity and Memory none that know him will ever doubt, who receiv'd it from the Mouth of Dr. Turner, Bishop of Elp. The Bishop was the King's Chaplain in waiting, and present when the Earl of Ossey came in one Day not long after the Affair, and seeing the Duke of Buckingham standing by the King, his Colour red, and he spoke so this Effect, "My Lord, I know well that you are at the Bottom of this late Attempt of Blood's upon my Father; and therefore I give you this Warning, if my Father comes to a violent End by Sword or Pistol, if he dies by the Hand of a Ruffian, or by the more secret way of Poison, I shall not be at a Loss to know the first Author of it, I shall consider you as the Assassin, I shall treat you as such, and you shall ever I meet you, I shall punish you, though you stood behind the King's Chair; and I tell it you in his Majesty's Presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my Word." I know not whether this will be deem'd my Breach of Decorum to the King, in whose Presence it was said; for it was an Act of Spirit and Resentment, worthy of a Son when his Father's Life was at stake; and when the Assassin who failed in the Attempt was so much courted, caressed, and in high Favour at Court immediately afterwards, it was perhaps necessary to prevent a fiercer Blow. Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. “ the King for the bringing his Subjects from

 “ and now, of late, refusing to do the Ho“ nour to his Flag, which they perform’d “ Time out of Mind, and promis’d a-new
 “ by the same Treaty.”

In October it appear’d the rougher Hand that was to manage the States, was Sir George Downing; and in the Beginning of December he was dispatch’d to the Hague, as it is reasonable to think, to complete what the Captain of the Yacht had left unfinished.

In this Interval Mr. Henry Coventry was sent to Sweden, in effect, to dissolve the Triple League; as it is said, he himself gave out at his Departure, and as will be made sufficiently clear by the Event. And as to our Conduct with Spain, in some of Lord Arlington’s Dispatches to Sir William Golphin, it appears we made a Merit, not only of letting on Foot and countenancing the Triple League against all the Temptations of Interest which we had to the contrary, but of temporising with France, as if it was the only Expedient that could so long have preserv’d the Peace of Christendom. In September, and October, we continue to assure that Court that his Majesty’s Intention is punctually and religiously to observe his Treaties with his Catholic Majesty; and a new Minister, the Earl of Sunderland, is appointed to carry Overtures, which, as our Ministers thought, would be grateful to that Court; and also his Majesty’s new Declaration of his firm Resolution to maintain the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, according to his Engagement in the Triple Alliance.

in concert with France.

All this while we were in so close an Intimacy with France, that the Measures of both Nations seem to have been taken in Concert. In the very same Letter of Lord Arlington’s, in which this new Declaration of his Majesty’s is mention’d, we find the following remarkable Postscript:

“ Since I wrote my Letter, the French Embassador, who is HERE in THE HOUSE, hath shewn me two Papers; the one, dated in April last (as I remember); the other, in September, directed by way of Infructions to the Sieur du Pie, the French Secretary at Madrid; wherein he is directed to renew his most Christian Majesty’s Assurance to that Court, that he will, for no Occasion whatsoever, break into War with that Crown, during the King’s Minority, PROVIDING they do not entertain any new Overtures from the Hollander to the Prejudice of France, upon pretence of France’s desiring them to renew the League 1635, for the Division of the Spanish Netherlands.”

Again, two Days after, his Lordship thus enlarges, by way of Supplement to his last:

“ I forgot to add, in my Letter, his Majesty’s Resolution to send speedily Sir Robert Southwell to the Comte de Monterey, (Governor of the Spanish Netherlands) to repeat to him what new Assurances his Majesty receives daily from the most Christian King, of his keeping the Peace with Spain inviolable, to lament the frequent small Occasions, that offer themselves every day to endanger it: In a word, to conjure him to give no Countenance to any of them, and more particularly (if it will consist with the Good of the Spanish Netherlands) NOT to follow the Example of the States of the United Provinces in the Prohibition of Wines, Brandy, and MANUFACTURES of FRANCE, they alledging it to be a professed Contravention to an Article of the Pyrenean Treaty.”

And, yet again, in his next, we are given to understand, that his Majesty himself had condescended to mention this intended Errand of Sir Robert Southwell, in favour of the French Manufactures, to the Spanish Embassador; and, at the same time, inform’d him, “ That he had obtain’d a new Promise from the most Christian King, of giving one Year more to the Arbitration: For which time he himself undertook to be answerable, as well as for his other Engagements, to his Catholic Majesty.”

But all these Sweeteners did not answer the End for which they were brought into Play. The Spanish Ministers saw very clearly the Storm that was ready to burst upon Holland,

(z) From this Affair of Surinam, the Author of England’s Appeal, before quoted, takes the Hint to write as follows:

But to take off somewhat of the Wonder and Strangeness of our neglecting and forsaking our Leagued Friends for the most Christian King’s sake, we soon shew’d as much Self-denial in our own Concerns, and grew civil’d to Admiration, by our inward Conversation with the Monieurs, whereof we’ll give only three Influences.

The first is, That which we deserv’d against the Dutch for being promoting as far as they were bound the coming away of some Families, that would not leave Surinam, we found no Fault with the French for their keeping us above four Years out of St. Christophers; no more than with their destroying, in the mean while, that Part of the Island which belonged to his Majesty’s Subjects. And we would have thought it a Right in us to have press’d too hard on his most Christian Majesty for a speedy or punctual Performance of his Articles.

Next, if the French Commanders in those Parts are to be believ’d, there was a very good Understanding in relation to the Island, between some of our Grandees in the French Court, as doth appear by the Narrative my Lord Willoughby delivered to the Council of Plantations, and which is enter’d in their Books.

The next is, That by an Ordinance of the French Privy-Council (which is now the Statute Law of that Kingdom) all their Sea and Land Officers, and Commanders in the Islands of America, being strictly enjoyn’d and requir’d to secure their Master’s Sovereignty of those Seas; the said Ordinance having been brought in by a Person of Quality to the Cabinet Council, it was at first to be declaim’d against, but soon buried in Oblivion, and put up amongst the useless Papers; though the French, perusant to it, have since much interrupted our Trade, and have prov’d infinitely vexatious, inasmuch, as I am credibly inform’d, that the present Governor of Jamaica hath sent word, since his being there, that notwithstanding their old Quarrel with the Spaniards, it would be much easier to keep a good Correspondence with them, than with the French, our dear Allies.

And for a last Instance of our more than ordinary Civility to the French, several Traders in London have prepar’d a Petition to his Majesty in Council, to complain of the Oppression their Factors and Agents lay under in France, with a true State of their Case, and a short Account of their Grievances. This came to the Knowledge of some of our Great Ministers, and they, having had the Consent of them before the Delivery of it, stoop by their Authority all further Prosecution of the Matter, and put off the said Merchants, with a Promise they would acquaint the French Embassador with their Complaints, and see it should be redress’d through his Means. How far they have been encouraged in their Treaty since that Promise, they are best able to judge; but however it was not fit the Nakedness of our dear Friends should be thus expos’d to the View of the whole Council-board.

A. D. 1671. Holland, and knew they were thus courted, only that it might have the freer Passage, and, in the end, fall with irresistible Violence upon themselves.

At the same time that the States solicited a League offensive and defensive with England, they did the same with Spain, by whom they were more favourably receiv'd; tho' it does not appear, that any great Progress was made in it, till towards the Decline of the Year; when the joint Views of France and England growing at once more apparent and more formidable, Don Manuel de Lira, the Spanish Embassador at the Hague, by Orders from his Court, and in Concert with the Count de Monterey, enter'd into an Engagement with the States, by which the two Powers, in case of an Attack, were mutually bound to succour each other.

This was not known in England, till after Lord Sunderland was on his Way to the Court of Spain; and the Concert was then understood to be of so slight a Nature, that our Ministers did not despair of getting it set aside.

But they were never more deceiv'd. The Queen and Council of Spain were directed in this Affair solely by de Monterey and de Lira, who were declar'd Enemies to France; the last, because France was an Enemy to the World; because his Spirit was invincible, his Sentiments great and noble; and, agreeable to the ancient Generosity of his Country, because he disdain'd to forsake a Friend in Distress: and the first, not only because he, likewise, was a true Spaniard, but because he was the Son of Don Lewis d' Haro, and could never forgive the Advantages which Cardinal Mazarine had taken of his Father, in the Pyrenean Treaty.

What the grateful Overtures were, which Lord Sunderland was to make, is no where circumstantially clear'd up in the English History: Nor is it an easy Matter to supply the Defect: The Lights that offer rather falling, by Reflection, from foreign Accounts, than directly from our own.

November the 25th N. S. the Marquis de Villars, Embassador from his most Christian Majesty, arriv'd at Madrid, and was immediately follow'd by Lord Sunderland, who arriv'd there early in December.

What the French Minister had in charge was, to avow his Master's Design to humble, not (a) subdue, the Hollanders, and to negotiate a Treaty with the Queen Regent, by which the French Troops should be allow'd a free Passage thro' the Spanish Territories, and be furnish'd with Forrage, on paying for it: Offering, on the one hand, by way of Consideration, to put all the late Conquests in Flanders into her Majesty's Hands, till the King her Son came of Age; and, on the other, by way of Menace, declaring, that, in case of Refusal, his Majesty was in a Condition to force his Way, having sixty thousand Men ready in Flanders, and twenty thousand to make a Diversion in Catalonia.

Now by the Time of Lord Sunderland's Departure for Madrid, as well as from certain Passages out of Lord Arlington's Letters, it can scarce be doubted, that the English and French Ministers were to act in Conjunction: But then the same Passages leave as little Room to doubt, that the Court of England had both Views and Reserves of their own.

The said Passages are as follow:

"France is so fearful that they will do it, (ratify de Lira's Treaty with Holland) that they call upon us to quicken you in your Threats to Spain, that if they join with Holland, or give them Assistance, we shall break with Spain; and indeed England concurs thus far with them, as to command you to give Spain the last Flight upon this Subject, shewing them plainly, that how partial soever their Intention are to Spain, their Assistance of Holland, as we are now allied with France, must of necessity beget a Quarrel between England and Spain. Besides the Remonstrance, you must, in a word, threaten them so as to make them fear a Quarrel with England. Tomorrow, the French Ambassador must know you use this Language." Again:

"There is but too much Ground to fear, that that Court will adhere to their Resolutions of assisting the Hollanders; to which all Kings of England can furnish you to oppose it, the keeping them in full Apprehension that England will break with them as well as France; and yet you must temper your Threats, as not to oblige them to break with us: His Majesty's Resolutions being not to fall out with Spain, if he can avoid it, and yet to keep his Union with France in a War against Holland. But you must remember, not only to conceal this his Mind from Spain, but from Marquis de Villars, Embassador, frighting the former, and telling Marquis de Villars, you do so."

And yet again, to Lord Sunderland: "I see you can get no ground of that Court, in your Propositions; either of Offensiveness or Neutrality; and consequently, I have no new Instructions to give you."

But neither the Artifice of England, nor the Insolence of France, had any Effect: The Court of Spain despis'd the one, and saw thro' the other: And to shew their Sense of both, order'd the Count de Monterey and de Lira, to proceed as they had begun, and to make the Case of the Hollanders their own.

By this time, it may be presum'd, that the most inattentive Reader is fully sensible, that every Measure of the English Court, since the Interview at Dever, had tended to bring on a Rupture with Holland, and to justify the Words, tho' not the Conduct of Sir Thomas Clifford, who, in the midst of our Triumphs on account of the Triple League,

(a) Mr. de Mont is in this Affair somewhat inconsistent with himself; for in the same Tome, p. 58. he intimates, that the Marquis de Villars tempted the Court of Spain, with an Offer of dividing the United Provinces between the three Princes. But I chuse to follow his subsequent Account, because it agrees with the following Passage in Lord Arlington's Letters:

"And whereas I laid before the Marquis de Provo what they owe the King our Master in this Conjunction, he very inquisitively asks me how far our Esperance goes with France: I assured him it goes no farther than the marrying of Holland in Conjunction with them, and further assur'd to him, that in all other Points, our Treaty might have been made by a Son of the House of Austria. could not help blabbing, that it would not be long before we should have another Dutch War.

Upon the 2d of January, probably before Sir George Downing had his Audience of the States, certainly before we could know the Success of it, the said (b) Sir Thomas Clifford propos'd in Council the shutting up of the Exchequer, without other Circumstance than saying, That 'twas necessary the King must have Money, for carrying on THE WAR with Holland; that he knew no other Way than this; and desired none would speak against it, without proposing some better and easier Way.

The thing being thus communicated, rather with the Air of a Resolution than an Advice, not a Man had the Courage to rise up in opposition to it, or, except by his Silence, to express his Disapprobation; much less to lay down his Commission, or declare against giving his Attendance any more, in a Place where Honour and Integrity seem'd to be unsafe.

What was thus abruptly propos'd was carry'd into Execution so suddenly, that none but the very (c) few in the Secret had time to recal their Cash into their own Hands. The Astonishment and Confusion it caus'd, and the Indignation it kindled, are inexpresible: While the first Surprize lasted, it affected the Credit and Commerce of the whole Kingdom; the Bankers stopping Payment as well as the Exchequer, and the Merchants not daring or being able to accept or pay any Bills of Exchange, drive their Trade abroad, or clear their Ships at the Customhouse at home.

On the 6th, to pacify these Disorders, a (d) Declaration was published, by Order of the King in Council, in which, as in the Lord Keeper's Speech, the Preparations of his Neighbours, are again brought into Play, as obliging his Majesty, for the Safety of his Government and People, to make such Preparations, likewise, as might be proportionable for the Intention both of the one and the other: And the Public is gravely told, That, by this inevitable Necessity, his Majesty was necessitated, (contrary to his own Inclinations) upon these Emergencies, and for the public Safety, at the present, to cause a Stop, &c.

Where there is no Truth there is no Dignity. It is undeniable, that the War was a Matter

Lord Arling-
ton's Letters,
v. ii. p. 349.The King's Declaration
thereupon.

(a) Mr. Archdeacon Edward, from a MS. of Sir Joseph Taylor's scribbles this Project originally to Lord Arling, out of whom it seems it had leaked when he was drunk, which Sir Thomas had taken care to erase him for that Purpose. The Story goes on, That Clifford had the Treasurer's Staff for this Job; and that Arling being settled at the Abuse which had been put upon him, who to pacify him, made Earl of Shaftesbury, and afterwards Chancellor, Bishop Burnett gave him Sir Joseph's Part the Honourable Mr. Norris, who in the Title Page of his Examen, calls the Reign of King Charles II. happy; speaking of this Incident, only says, "That Counsel, supposed to be the Invention of the Earl of Shaftesbury, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was as happily given as desperately taken and executed by the Lord Treasurer Clifford." Examen, p. 37.

The same Gentleman in the same Page, endeavours to qualify this Story, by saying, Sect. xiii. "In 1671 the King had declar'd a War against Holland," and Sect. xiv. "Then the Charge of the War was excessive great, and the King not having a timely Supply from the Parliament, could not let out a Fleet by Means of the ordinary Revenue." In answer to which it is proper to observe, That the Order of Council for publishing the King's Declaration of War against the States was not made till March 17, 1671-2, whereas the Exchequer was shut up January 2. That the Parliament, at their last Meeting, had given 800,000 l. to fit out a Fleet, besides their Grants in Discharge of the King's Debts: And a further Supply, however necessary, it was impossible for them to give, if they were not permitted to meet again.

As to Bishop Parker, he makes no Scruple to call this Job one of the foen deadly Sins of the Cabal; and by way of Aggravation, quotes the King's Proclamation, after the Charleston Affair; in which his Majesty, to quiet the Fears of his Subjects, promises that he would never delay the Payment of his Assignments, upon any account, for one Day.

(c) Sir William Temple gives us to understand, that all the Money he had, was sunk in Alderman Backwell's Hands; and even Lord Arling's confesses that the Disorders among the Bankers, had to discompos'd Mr. Montagu's Money Matters, that he could not for some time return to his Residence, as the King's Minister, at Paris.

(d) The whole of this curious Piece is here inserted for the Reader's farther Satisfaction.

On Twelfth the 2d Instant, his Majesty being present in Council, was pleas'd to Declare, That seeing all the Princes and States, his Neighbours, were making great Preparations for War, both by Sea and Land; his Majesty, for the Safety of his Government and People, look'd upon himself as oblig'd to make such Preparations, as might be proportionable for the Protection both of the one and the other; and to that End had already given Orders for the fitting and preparing a very considerable Fleet, to be ready against the Spring. That by this inevitable Necessity his Majesty, considering the great Charges that must attend such Preparations, and after his serious Debates and well Consideration, not finding any Possibility to defray such unusual Expenses, by the usual Ways and Means of borrowing Money, by reason his Revenues were so intercepted and engag'd, he was necessitated, contrary to his own Inclinations, upon these Emergencies, and for the public Safety at the present, to cause a Stop to be made of the Payment of any Moneys, now being, or to be brought into his Exchequer for the Space of one whole Year, ending the last Day of December next, unto any Person or Persons whatsoever, by virtue of any Warrant, Securities or Orders, whether register'd or not register'd therein, and payable within that time; excepting only such Payments as shall grow due upon Orders on the Subsidy, according to the Act of Parliament, and Orders and Securities upon the Fee-Farm Rents, both which are to be proceeded upon as if such a Stop had never been made.

And that his Majesty's Pleasure and Declaration, might be speedily and effectually put in Execution, his Majesty did order Sir Hovage Frook Knight and Baronet, his Attorney General, forthwith to prepare a Bill for his Royal Signature, and so to pass the great Seal, thereby requiring and commanding the Lords Commissioners of his Treasury, immediately to order and direct all every the Officers of his Majesty's Exchequer, to possess all Warrants and Orders, whether register'd or not register'd, and other Securities and Payments whatsoever (except as before excepted) until the last Day of December next.

And that in the mean time, the Lords Commissioners of his Treasury be required and authoriz'd, to cause Payment to be made of the Interest that is or shall grow due, at the rate of six Pounds per Cent, unto every Person that shall have Money due to him or them upon such Warrants, Orders or Securities, to possess'd and deliver'd; and that the Payment of such Interest may be justly made, the Lords Commissioners of his Treasury, are to be authorized and required, to cause the Debt of every particular Person, and the said Interest thereof, to be truly paid.

And the Lords of his Majesty's Treasury, being further to be ordered to employ and dispose of all the said Moneys, so stopp'd and detain'd, for the preparing, letting forth, and Payment of his Majesty's Fleet, and other public Services, in order to the Preservation and Safety of his Majesty's Government, and Defence of his People, as his Majesty shall from time to time order and direct.

His Majesty, as far as in him lies, to take away all Apprehensions or Fears that might possibly arise of his Subjects Spirit, declaring, That no Person whatsoever, shall be defrauded of any thing that is justly due to him, nor shall this Refraining, which his Majesty had been compell'd (not being able for the present, to find any other Expedient) to lay upon such Moneys, as are, or shall be paid into his Exchequer, continue longer, than the aforesaid last Day of December; and that then, no new Warrants, Orders or Securities shall intervene, to break the Course of such Payments.

And his Majesty was farther graciously pleas'd to declare, That nothing could have urg'd his Majesty to an Act of this nature, but such a Conjunction of Affairs, when all the neighbouring Princes and States were making like threatening Preparations, that his Government could not be safe, without appearing to the same Posture.

A.D. 1671-2. Matter of (e) Choice, and not Necessity. This the Public, from a Thousand concurrent Testimonies, could not be ignorant of. They likewise knew, that the fifty great Ships, talk'd of in the said Speech, had never yet put to Sea; that there had been neither Call nor Use for them; that, if the Court could, in the least, justify their Demands, the Parliament would make no Scruple to answer them; that this was a notable Advance towards the Dissolve of Parliaments; and that, if the King usurp'd a discretionary Power over Property, they were no longer a free People.

For these, and such like Reasons, his Majesty's Declaration had not the desired Effect. The People continued as angry and distemper'd as ever; insomuch, that the King himself was forc'd to convene the Bankers before him at the Treasury, in order to give them Assurances from his own Mouth that he would punctually satisfy his Debt to them, either out of the next parliamentary Grants, or his own Revenue; and to require them to make their Payments to the Merchants, and their other Creditors as before.

While the War was thus manifestly resolved upon, and this desperate Measure was taken to support it, Sir George Downing presented his Complaints to the States, which were prefaced with Assurances of the King his Master's Desires and Designs to live in Amity with their Lordships; and turned principally on the Affair of Surinam, and the Right of the Flag, that the People might be misled into a Belief that the War had no other Foundation than his Majesty's great Zeal for the Interest of his Subjects and the Honour of his Crown.

Tho' the Dutch were equally alarm'd with the Revocation of Sir William Temple, and the Arrival of Sir George Downing in his stead, they still flatter'd themselves that he was sent only to fright them into some great Payments, and that when things came to the worst they might purchase a Peace.

On this Presumption they took time to deliberate on the Demands of England, and were quite amaz'd to find Sir George so little dispos'd to spin out a Negotiation, or drive a Bargain, that in a few Days, he began to pack up his Goods, and apply'd for a Pass to come away.

The Answer they had prepar'd for Sir George, was then sent express to their own Ambassador in England, to be by him presented to the King; and Lord Arlington himself owns, That in Appearance, and by the Report of those who saw it but cursorily, it seem'd to be a fair one, tho' according to his own Opinion, it was conceiv'd in very captious and ambiguous Terms, and such as would leave Room for the same Disputes, upon the striking to his Majesty's Flag if we had acquiesced in it.

His Lordship's Opinion was that of the Court; a Reply was calculated and dispatch'd accordingly, February 2, with additional Orders to Downing; but he, who did not care to act the same Part on Shore, which the Captain of the Yacht had done at Sea, very wisely withdrew without waiting for Letters of Revocation or taking leave, and arriv'd in London the 6th, and was the next Day sent to the Tower, for not caring to be made a (f) Sacrifice, to furnish the Court with a better Pretence to begin the War.

All this while the United Provinces were so torn with intestine Divisions, that they were call'd, with more Propriety, the Dis-united Provinces. The Orange Faction openly espous'd the Claims of England, and insisted on giving Satisfaction to his Majesty, in hopes it would not only divert all Danger from that Quarter, but make way for a more close and intimate Alliance between the two Nations than ever. On the other hand, the States, under the Influence of de Wit, and his Party, sought to pacify the Indignation of the most Christian King, by the most abject Submissions. They disown'd the Medals which had given him Offence, and caus'd the several Dyes to be broken; they protested they had examin'd their own Conduct towards him, in the most rigid Manner, and found nothing to reproach themselves with on his Account: and they offer'd to redress immediately whatever he had to complain of, even thro' their Inadvertency.

By this opposite Conduct, these opposite Cabals only meant to subdue one another: Of preserving the Republic, by bringing about an Union among themselves, neither seem'd to have any Thought; perhaps from a Conviction that it was impossible: And while they hesitated to make those Submissions to one Monarch, which the Other refus'd, the Alliance which had so long subsisted verbally between both, and which had their Ruin for its principal Object, was sign'd and seal'd in form.

There is a Passage in one of Lord Arlington's Letters, dated January the 25th, which says, Tomorrow we shall sign the Treaty with France, and a Concert for joining our naval Forces: It was not, however, sign'd till February 2, the very Day that the Orders were sent to Downing to continue his Residence at the Hague; and provided, among other things, that the two Kings should respectively declare against the States, that they would never agree to any Peace or Truce, unless by reciprocal Consent: That England should raise and maintain 6000 Land-forces: That there should be a Junction of the two Fleets; and that France should furnish three Millions

(1) Lord Arlington, in his Dispatch to Sir William Golphin, dated January 8, takes notice, "That in consequence of the Order to that up the Exchequer, his Majesty would find himself in a Condition of arming out his Fleet with ready Money, and supporting whatever shall HAPPEN TO BE HIS GAME, with Relation to the Affairs abroad this Summer."

And even before this Order took place, the Duke of York, by the King's Command, had given out his Commissions to the Sea Officers, who were to be employ'd in the War.

(f) When the King nam'd him for that Employment, one of the Council said, The Rabble will tear him to Pieces. Upon which the King smiled and said, Will I venture him. See William Temple's Letters, vol. ii. p. 250.

A.D. 1671-2. Millions of Livres (g) (240,000 l. Sterling) to England, as long as the War should last. Mr. Du Mont adds, that, as this Sum bore no Proportion to the Charge of the English Fleet, it was further agreed between the two Kings, that England should open the War by falling upon the Smyrna Fleet, in its Return; where, it was presum'd, such a Treasure would be found, as would answer all Demands, and make good all Deficiencies.

The Concert being thus settled, Money was remitted from Paris, to shew his most Christian Majesty's Sincerity, on one hand; and we, to shew our Gallantry, became the Aggressors, on the other. The first Blow was given by the Seizure of certain Dutch Ships on the Coasts, against an express Article in the Treaty of Breda; and Requisition being demanded, as likewise the Punishment of the Captain; Answer was made, that his Majesty, having long demanded Satisfaction for the Wrongs and Indignities done to him and his Kingdoms, and despairing of it, in such a Conjunction of Affairs, and a Season so advanced, had commanded this Detention of their Ships; but had strictly forbidden Confiscations, Embezzlement, or ill Treatment, either to the Men or Ships.

This was follow'd by the perfidious and pyrratical Attempt on the Smyrna Fleet, which, tho' perform'd with the utmost Bravery and Resolution, by Sir Robert Holmes and the Earl of Ossory, miscarried: The Dutch defended themselves, for two Days together, with unexpected and amazing Obstinacy; and at last got off, with the Loss of their Rear Admiral, and five only of their Merchant-ships. Their Escape was look'd upon as little less than miraculous; nor could they have escap'd at all, if Sir Robert Holmes had condescended to impart his Design to Sir Edward Spragge, (whom he met at Sea, in his Return from the Mediterranean, where he had made a Peace with the Algerines, that we might have but one Enemy to deal with at a time) and desir'd his Assistance: But, tho' Sir Robert apply'd to him for Intelligence concerning the Game he sought, he kept the Secret, that he might engross the whole Honour and Profit to himself; and thereby fell into the Disgrace of undertaking a bad thing, without having the Glitter of good Success to gild it over.

To reconcile the Public to this inexcusable Action, it was represented in the Gazette (like the Affair of the Yacht) as a mere (b) Rencontre, occasion'd solely by the Dutch ill Manners, in refusing to strike, and lower their Top-sails: But it is scarce credible, that Men, who love Money above all things, should expose so vast a Treasure for the sake of such a Vanity: Besides, Bishop Burnet affirms, that Holmes himself, tho' pres'd to do it, had not the Impudence to affirm any such thing; and the Gazette acknowledges they did lower their Top-sails.

After we had thus committed the Violence, we thought it advisable to give Warning: Accordingly, on the very Day (March 17) that the Court receiv'd the mortifying Intelligence of this Disappointment, Orders were given for the publishing his Majesty's Declaration of War, which it seems was ready prepar'd, in order to be issued, as soon as the Blow was struck.

In the Preamble to this vain Piece of Paper, the World is desired to believe, that nothing but inevitable Necessity had driven his Majesty into the War. The Reasons given were, the undecided Claims of the East-India Company; the Affair of Surinam, abusive Pictures, Medals, and Pillars; and the popular Pretence of the Flag, which had no better Grounds than the Incident of the Yacht, before spoken of.

Two things were suffer'd to slip into it, which were very remarkable, viz. That the States had, in this Conjunction, made an Offer to strike to us, in case we would join with them against the French, and with a Provision, that it should never be taken for a Precedent, to their Disadvantage: 2. That they had sent over an Ambassador Extraordinary (to know our Demands must be understood) who, in a most extraordinary Manner, had intimated, that he could give us no Satisfaction, till he had sent back to his Masters. And, that it might leave a grateful Relish at parting, his Majesty further declar'd, that, notwithstanding the Prosecution of the War, he would maintain the true End and Scope of the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, unless provok'd to the contrary.

But, whatever was pretended, 'tis fit Posterity should know, That when Sir George Downing was sent over, he was bound by his Instructions not to accept of any Satisfaction from the Dutch, after a certain Number of Days, which were prescrib'd to him; though a very irregular and unusual Way of proceeding in Embassies, and much less practicable in Holland than any where else; it being impossible to have the Resolutions of their Towns, and afterwards of their Provinces, without a considerable Time: That this was made so much the more difficult, by our demanding not only the usual Striking, which (though ever practis'd, and due to England) was first nationally agreed upon in 1654, and confirmed by the two Treaties with his Majesty in 1662, and 1667, but also a new kind of Acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of the Seas, which is not mention'd in the said Treaties: So that by joining them both in a Memorial, if the Dutch did demur upon the Second, and so delay'd the granting of the First, it was a ready Way for us to clamour, and possess the whole Nation that the Dutch had broken their Treaty, and refused to strike to the English Flag: That, after the Dutch had given their Answer to the said Sir George Downing's Memorial, he refus'd to receive it, and came away without it, against a second Order he had receiv'd under his Majesty's own Hand: Lastly, it is very observable, that the Dutch having sent by an Express, as before observ'd, the Answer Sir George Downing would not receive, ceive, we first reply'd it was dark, obscure, and insufficient: Upon which they sent an Extraordinary Ambassador, who, jointly with the Leiger Ambassador, told our Ministers, that his Masters Intentions and Desire to give his Majesty all possible Satisfaction in the Business of the Flag, they both ordered and empowered him to clear what might be obscure or dark in their Answer, and supply what was insufficient; and therefore desired them to instance in what they did not approve of, or did think amiss; or else, that they would be pleased to draw up themselves, after their own Method and Way, what Article they thought necessary for the preventing of the like Inconvenience. It was answered, The States, with their Ministers, knew best how to frame and word their own Answers; neither could it be expected that we should draw up Papers for them. Whereupon the Dutch Ambassadors brought a Project of an Article to be agreed upon, concerning the Flag; and asked our Ministers whether it was worded to their Mind, and if that would satisfy them? To which they gravely answered, That when they had sign'd and deliver'd it, they would tell them their Mind concerning it. And the Ambassadors refusing still to sign it, unless they knew before-hand it was satisfactory, their Conference thus broke off; yet, upon second Thoughts, the Ambassadors having resolv'd to sign the said Paper, and to deliver it at a venture, they demanded a new Conference; which was promis'd them, and Seven of the Clock at Night appointed, on the Sunday after the Engagement with the Smyrna Fleet. But, on the very same Day, left the Dutch might comply further with us than we desired, our Grandes prevail'd with his Majesty to call an extraordinary Council, and to have, without farther Delay, the Declaration of War read and approved. So that when the Ambassadors came at their appointed Time, with their Paper ready sign'd, they were told in short, they came too late. To proceed.

But in vain.

Lord Arlington,
Sir William
Temple.

Spain, it seems, did not believe we either would or could come to these Extremities with the States: Even France could scarce depend on our Promises and Engagements, till they saw them thus fulfilled: Even the Dutch themselves did not dream, that their Calamities were so nigh; and all Europe stood astonish'd at this State-Thunderclap; which was so much the more dreadful, by being so sudden and unexpected.

It was now time for his most Christian Majesty to make his Entrance, and play his Part: Which he did without a Mask, and with such a superior Air, that Charles seem'd only to have been a Harbinger, who had cross'd the Stage to prepare his Way.

His (1) Declaration against the Dutch was publish'd April 6, N. S. under the superb Style of An Ordinance, BY THE KING; as if there was no other; and assign'd no Reasons, but his Majesty's Dissatisfaction at the Carriage of the States-General towards him, for some Years past; which, it seems, was risen to such a Height, that his Majesty could no longer, without a Diminution of his GLORY, dissemble the Indignation rais'd in him by a Treatment so unfitable to the great Obligations which he and his Predecessors had heap'd upon them. In a word, it was his Pleasure to make War upon the States, and to (k) ALLOO his Subjects to worry the Hollanders, whenever they fell in their Way.

His Ambassadors had Orders to make use of the same Language in all the Courts of Europe. In particular Mr. de Gremoville, his Minister at Vienna, gave the Emperor to understand, That the Pride and insolent Prosperity of the Dutch had made the King his Master resolve to chastise them; which he hop'd would give no Umbrage to his Imperial Majesty; and that he would not interpose, either directly or indirectly, in the Cause of his Enemies.

To all the Roman-Catholic Princes he moreover, made no scruple to declare most impiously, That he had enter'd into this War for the Propagation of the Catholic Faith: And the said de Gremoville, in a set Speech to the Imperial Council, which was afterwards printed in French, farther signify'd, That the Hollanders being Heretics, who had forsaken their God, all good Christians were bound to unite, in order to extirpate them; and to impose God's Blessing on so good a Work.

For fear, however, that religious Motives should weigh no more in the Court of Vienna than at that of his most Christian Majesty, Care was taken to make sure of Sweden, by a Subsidy-Treaty of 400,000 Crowns a Year, for holding a Body of Troops in a Readiness either against the Emperor or Empire, if either should presume to interrupt the Designs of France; and 600,000, in case they took the Field.

At the same time that this Treaty, which consisted of thirty-three public Articles, and seventeen private, was negotiated at Stockholm by Mr. de Pomponne, another between the Crowns of England and Sweden was perfected by Mr. Coventry; the Scope of which was a Neutrality as to the Rupture between us and Holland, and a Repetition of the former Engagement with France, to enter into an offensive War with the Emperor or Princes of the Empire, in case he or they should declare for the Hollanders.

Thus, however punctually the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle was observ'd, the Triple Alliance was effectually broke; England, one of the Parties, co-operating with France, against whom it was made, to ruin the Republic of Holland, another, and Sweden, the third, standing Guard, that none of the German Princes, from a Sense of the Common Danger, should come into their Deliverance.

Scarce any thing can give us a higher Idea of the Power, Wealth and Importance of the United Provinces, than a Consideration of the Variety of Precautions which the two Crowns of France and England found it necessary

But what serves to exemplify their Greatness, serves likewise to exemplify their Danger. They had the most potent Prince in Europe by Land, and the most potent Prince in Europe by Sea, at once to struggle with. The two Factions had thrown them into Convulsions at Home, and they had scarce Time to form any solid Measure to procure Succour from abroad.

Mr. de Wit, who had hitherto been esteem'd the good Genius of his Country, together with the Countenance and Protection of France, had lost his Authority. The Populace would have no Saviour but the Prince of Orange; and on the Virtues and Abilities of a Youth of twenty-one, depended the Fate of the Republic.

In Proportion as the Distresses of the State multiply'd, the Partizans of his Highness redoubled their Efforts in his Favour, so that it became necessary to submit to a Dictator within, or a Conqueror without. Things being at this Extremity, the Prince, in February, was made Captain and Admiral-General, had Guards appointed him, and took Possession of his Command. About the same time, the States order'd a Fleet of seventy-five Men of War to be equip'd with all possible Expedition, and began to make the necessary Dispositions for augmenting their Army, and putting their Frontiers in a Posture of Defence.

But their Preparations did not keep pace with the Approach of their Calamities. The most Christian King had oblig'd Mr. de Groot their Embassador at Paris, to take his final Leave, and return home; and de Romf his Secretary, who was suffer'd to continue there, merely to take care of his Effects, was charg'd in the strictest manner not to send any Advices to the States at his Peril. Such Orders were likewise given to all the Post-Offices thro' France, and were so well observ'd, that not a Letter was suffer'd to pass, which contain'd the least Hint, relative to the Enterprize in Hand.

Hence it follow'd, that tho' the States were convinc'd the Storm was at Hand, they knew not where to expect its fall, nor consequently what Defence to make against it. It was the most general Persuasion, that his most Christian Majesty would first lay Siege to Maftricht, in order to clear his Way and open a Passage into the Heart of the Country. This was the Advice which had been given by the Majority of the Council. But Mr. de Turenne foreseeing it would be a Work of time, was of another Opinion, and press'd his Majesty rather to take Advantage of the present forlorn and dispirited Condition of the Enemy, by making one great Effort, before they had Leisure to recollect their Spirits, or form a Resolution to oppose him.

And this was the Plan which his Majesty chose to follow. He had fate down before Maftricht: But this Measure was no sooner taken, than he decamp'd again, and, dividing his Army into three Columns, march'd as far as Cleves. Every one of these Divisions met with Success answerable to Mr. de Turenne's Expectations. The Towns on all Sides open'd their Gates; and it seem'd to be the Business of the Invaders rather to take Possession, than make Conquests. At the same time the joint Armies of the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster, both which Princes were Stipendiaries to France, penetrated into the Provinces of Overyffel, Friezland, and Groeningen, and with equal Rapidity carry'd all before them. All Europe stood amaz'd at the irrefutable Progress of the French Arms, and gave the Republic for lost.

It had indeed no Prospect, and scarce a Hope of Deliverance: The Forces under the Prince of Orange did not exceed 12000 Men. The Auxiliaries which the States had received from Flanders, tho' numerous enough to draw Complaints on the Court of Spain from the two ally'd Kings, were yet too few to give them any material Assistance. Tho' they were negotiating an Alliance offensive and defensive with the Emperor and his Catholic Majesty, it was much to be fear'd that the good Effects of it would arrive too late. They were, besides, travers'd in every Step of it, by their Enemies; as also in their Applications to the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Princes of Lunenburg, that they might be left without Resource.

But tho' such was their deplorable Situation a shore, at Sea they were still as mighty as ever: Their Ships were as numerous, their Stores as full, their Mariners as plenty, and their Commanders as experienc'd and brave; and they resolv'd to employ them all in the most vigorous manner, for the Preservation of the last Remains of the Commonwealth.

The Command was given to de Ruyter; and Cornelius de Wit once more serv'd on board, in Quality of the States Deputy. Their first Design was to prevent the Junction of the English and French Squadrons; but not being able to effect it, they next resolv'd to fall upon both together.

The united Fleet lay at Anchor in Solebay under the Command of the Duke of York, the Earl of Sandwich and the Count d'Estrees: And more Attention being given to Feasting than Fighting, the Earl took occasion to observe to the Duke, "That, as the Wind then stood, the Fleet stood in Danger of being surpriz'd by the Dutch, at their Moorings; and that it would be advisable, for that Reason, to weigh and put to Sea." His Royal Highness, however, not only slighted the Advice, but, as we are told, affronted the Giver, by insinuating, that it proceeded rather from Fear than Discretion. The next Day, what his Lordship so wisely foresaw, really happen'd. Early in the Morning the Scouts gave the Signal of their Approach, with the Wind in their Favour; upon which the Allies, in some Confusion, prepar'd for the Engagement, the Earl with the Blue Squadron, being in the Van, the Red with the Duke in the Center, and the French with the White, in the Rear. The Dutch began

The Earl of Sandwich, like a practis'd Seaman, endeavour'd principally to get the Weather-Gage; the Duke to rid himself of de Ruyter, Van-Esse another of the Dutch Admirals, and two other great Ships, which attack'd him altogether; the Earl of Offory, to oppose every Enemy and succour every Friend; and the (1) Count de Estrees, very prudently to save the Squadron committed to his Charge, which his Master had been so solicitous to form, and would find it so hard to replace. In this Action Lord Offory obtain'd the truly noble Title of Preserver of the Fleet, and the gallant Lord Sandwich chose to dye to wipe off the Asperision which had been cast upon his Honour; having seen Admiral Van Gbent fall before him; having sunk a Man of War which ventur'd to lay him aboard, and destroy'd two Fireships before he was himself destroyed by a third. His Country had, however, the Benefit of the Disposition which he had form'd, and did not live to accomplish; for Sir Joseph Jordan his Vice-Admiral, still follow'd the same Orders which he had first receiv'd, to get the Wind of the Enemy, and at last succeeded; whereby he was enabled to come in to the Assistance of the Duke, who had been twice oblig'd to change his Ship; the Consequence of which was, that de Ruyter, who had been hitherto irresistible, was oblig'd to give way; and his whole Squadron was thrown into Disorder. The Approach of Night then put an End to the Engagement, with which both Parties had more Reason to be satisfy'd, than with the Triumphs of the Day. De Ruyter retir'd, and the Allies did not think proper to pursue him. The English lost one Ship, viz. the Royal James, the French two, and the Dutch four, of which one, the Stevoren, was taken, and three were sunk. — At the Expence of how many gallant Lives was this single Trophy purchas'd? And how little did so bloody a Battle contribute towards finishing the War? Besides the illustrious Earl of Sandwich, there fell the French Rear-Admiral de la Rabiniere, nine English Captains, two French, several Volunteers of Distinction, and 2500 private Men, besides as many more wounded.

To have lost so few Ships, to have approach'd to near a Victory, as Affairs were then circumstanc'd, neither satisfy'd nor serv'd the de Witts, who had no Hope to stand their Ground, or Prospect of qualifying the growing Greatness of the Orange Faction, except by some signal Success at Sea. Not to have gain'd a complete and manifest Victory, was to them, therefore, a total Defeat. They knew it would be impossible for them to put their Fleet again to Sea time enough to remedy the Mischief which arose every Hour from the present Disappointment. They had Reason to fear, that the Enemy, who, rather from the Weakness of the States, than their own Strength, were become Masters of the Sea, would soon insult their Coasts, if not make a Descent. They saw the Prince retiring before the Enemy by Land, together with themselves to Amsterdam, as the sole Place of Safety. They saw the most Christian King extend his Conquests on all Sides, and with every march, making (m) Additions to his Dominions. They saw Nimwegen and Muffricht, which were almost the only Places that dar'd to withstand him, forc'd to surrender, and Utrecht make a voluntary Submission. They saw him not only exercise the Power of a Conqueror, but assume the Authority of a Sovereign, by changing Constitutions, giving Laws, publishing Edicts, creating Magistrates, receiving Homages, and in a Word, transferring to himself the Allegiance that had been sworn to the States.

Believing it, therefore, a vain thing to resist any longer, or perhaps dreading more to become Vassals to the Prince of Orange than Tributaries to the ailed Kings, they prevail'd with the States to nominate four Deputies to each of them, with a View to pacify both, if possible, by their submissions and Concessions; or, at least, to prevail with one to abandon the other; or, while the Treaty should last, to scatter such Seeds of Jealousy, as might in the End divide them.

Of the four, but two came to England; where they were to be join'd by Borel, the States Resident at London, who had not as yet left the Kingdom: And no sooner was it known that they were come to supplicate a Peace, but the People every where discover'd a tender, generous, and noble Sense of their Oppressions and Misfortunes: On the other hand, the Cabal was surpriz'd at their Arrival, and alarm'd at the Effect it produc'd: As, therefore, they had ventured to come without Leave, Notification, or Passport, a Resolution was taken to remove them out of the View of the Public, that the Public Concern might not operate too strongly in their Favour.

Accordingly, they were met upon their way as far as Gravesend, forbid to come to London, and convey'd to Hampton Court, where they were kept in a sort of honourable able Confinement, till the good Pleasure of France was known; whether they should be favour'd with an Audience, and upon what Terms it would be advisable to treat of an Accommodation.

Bishop Burnet intimates, that Borel was left at large; that he was suffer'd to confer with his Collegues at Hampton Court; that he gave Lord Arlington to understand, the States were, at last, dispos'd to advance the Prince of Orange to the Offices and Dignities which had been held by his Ancestors; provided they might have Peace with England: And that no Regard was paid to it. On the other hand, the Gazette (Numb. 688.) expressly declares, That his Majesty having sent the Duke of Bucks, the (m) Earl of Arlington, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Clifford, to the States Deputies, to know what Proposals they had to offer; they reply'd, They had no Power or Instructions to make any Offer, but to bear what his Majesty would demand; adding, that his Majesty had notwithstanding been pleas'd, for the sake of Peace, to appoint the said Duke of Bucks, and Earl of Arlington, his Embassadors and Plenipotentiaries, to treat jointly thereon with those of the most Christian King.

England's Appeal.

In the mean time, the other Deputies came no sooner to the French Court, but two Secretaries of State were sent to them, who, without further Delay, desired to know first, if they had full Power to treat; and, in the next place, what the States could propose in order to a speedy Peace. The Deputies answer'd, as the two in England had done, They were only sent to know his most Christian Majesty's Pleasure; and that their Masters had thought it a greater Respect to him to receive his Proposals, than to offer any Conditions themselves. With this Answer the French Ministers went to their Master, and came back immediately to the Deputies, to let them know, it was expected the States should make the Proposals; and that the most Christian King could not enter upon any Treaty, unless they had full Power; telling them withal (to quicken them, and to hasten the Conclusion of the Work) that they were to consider, that whatever his most Christian Majesty had conquer'd was already his own; and therefore he could no ways part with it, unless they gave him an Equivalent, as well for what he might conquer farther before the Conclusion of the Treaty, as for what he possess'd at that time: Whereupon Monsieur de Groot, one of the Deputies, being gone to the Hague, he was sent back with all Speed, and authoris'd in a very ample manner, together with his Collegues, to treat and conclude a Peace with the French.

Upon the Return of the said de Groot with the Powers, after some Conferences (Part of them held with de Groot alone) Monsieur de Lowoy (one of the Secretaries of State) gave the Dutch Deputies a Project of a Treaty, or rather the Pretensions of the King his Master; upon the granting of which, he was both willing and ready to return to his former Amity with the States, and conclude a firm Peace with them.

In this Project two things were remarkable; the one, that the Conditions were such, as, if granted, would have made the French King as perfectly Master of the Country, as if he had conquer'd all by the Sword; and the other, that they contain'd not the least Word relating to England, as if no way connected with France, or concern'd in the War.

And to demonstrate further, that the Intention of the French Court was, that England should be no Gainer by the Rupture, Mr. de Groot declared at his second Coming to the Hague, with the above-mention'd Articles, that the French Ministers had answer'd him, The States his Masters might deal as they pleas'd with England, and come off as cheap as they would; because, as they pretended, they were not bound or engaged by their Treaty, to procure them any Advantages.

While England was thus treated as the Dupe, and Holland was on the point of being render'd irredeemably the Bond-slave of France, it became manifest, that in Fact as well as Theory, Protection was the Condition of Obedience.

In exact Proportion as the States grew less formidable abroad, they grew more contemptible at home: In their most prosperous Condition, the Dutch Populace painted for a Stadtholder, as the Jews of old for a King, that they might have their Chains of a similar Fashion with those of their Neighbours. But tho' they were thus desirous of a Master, they were too proud to submit to one of themselves. De Wit inherited no glittering Titles from his Ancestors, had no Royal Blood in his Veins, was no otherwise ennobled than by his Virtues and Abilities, nor elevated, than as he rode on the Neck of the Commonwealth. While in his Meridian, he was consequently envy'd and hated; when in his Decline, every Evil and every Misfortune was plac'd to his Account: That their Commerce was the Prey of the English, that their Towns were swallow'd up by the French, was suppos'd to be all owing to his Treachery, to his Ambition; for so the Knave taught, and the Fool believ'd: When therefore it appear'd, that he could not save his Country from the Ruin which threaten'd it on every Side, and that he was rather making Terms for himself and his Party, than the Commonwealth, all his Merit was disregarded, all his former Services were forgot: He was presum'd to be the Janus of the Republic, and it was believ'd, that, if he

The perpetual Edict revok'd, and the Prince of Orange made Stadtholder.

From this strong Prejudice against him, and as strong a Disposition in favour of the Prince of Orange, almost all the Towns in all the Provinces fell into the most violent Ferment imaginable; in which the Dregs of the People rose up to the Surface, and gave the Law to their Masters: In Dort, where Cornelius de Wit was Ancient Burgomaster, this strange Reverse of Things was first made manifest: A Stadtholder! was the Cry: The Burghers took to their Arms, sent a Deputation to the Prince of Orange to invite him thither, and, upon his Arrival, by downright Violence, oblig'd their Magistrates to revoke the perpetual Edict, abolish his Highness from the Oath he had taken, never to accept the Stadtholdership, and invest him with all the Powers, Dignities, and Authorities, which his Ancestors had enjoy'd. This was done June the 30th, N. S. and by the 5th of July, the same Scene was play'd at Rotterdam, Middleburgh, Amsterdam, the Hague, and generally through all the Provinces: Nor did the Fury of the Populace stop here: They purg'd the Magistracy of such Persons as they did not like; they call'd upon the Prince to nominate and appoint others in their stead; they insist'd on having their own Deputies admitted to have Seats and Voices in the Administration: At Middleburgh, they demand'd to have the Inspection of the public Accounts; At Amsterdam, they were in continual Tumults; in one of which, their High-Sheriff was wounded with a Musquet-shot; and a Burgomaster was extremely ill treated, and carried Prisoner to the Town-house: And at Dort, they cut to pieces several Pictures, which had been, some time before, put up in honour of Cornelius de Wit. Their Rage against the two Brothers of that Name was indeed inexpressible, and inconceivable: Cornelius had given them the most sensible Provocation, by refusing to sign the Instrument for making the Prince Stadtholder; and Johan, between Repentment and Despair, had resign'd the Office of Penfionary: The Life of the Latter had been attempted on the 11th of June, by four Ruffians, who pretended it was for the sake of their Country and their Religion: And in August, a Barber accus'd the Former of having offer'd him 32000 Guilders to poison his Highness: The false Witness prov'd to be a more dangerous Enemy than the Assassin: The Times favour'd the Accuser, and deterr'd the Magistrates from doing Justice to the Accused: Notwithstanding he had held so high a Rank in the Commonwealth, he was put to the Torture; which he endured most heroically; and sentenced to have forfeited all his Dignities and Employments, and to be banish'd for Life. His Brother, the late Penfionary, with more Constancy and Affection than Prudence, not only countenanced him thro' the whole Proceeding, but fatally resolv'd to conduct him out of Town in his own Coach, as if to share in his Disgrace. The Barber, in the mean time, persist'd in the Truth of his Charge; urged, that the Criminal had been too mercifully dealt with; and did his utmost to exasperate the People against him: The (n) Event was most deplorable. The two Brothers no sooner appear'd, but the Roar was up: Blood was the Pursuit, and a thousand impious Hands, in a Moment, tore to pieces those venerable Senators, who had been so long, and so often, the Guardians and Preservers of their Country.

A. D. 1672.

Such a Monster is the Herd, when let loose; and so dreadful a thing it is to fall into their Power!

It is the common Opinion, that with this Sacrifice the Rage of the People was appeas'd, and that Peace and Order were at once restor'd: But this common Opinion is a common Mistake. When the Sheriff at the Hague had desir'd and obtain'd Leave of the Stadtholder to enquire who were the principal Actors in this Tragedy, and to that End had put the Question to the Captains of the Burghers; they reply'd, WE ALL; adding, If you're dissatisfy'd with it, we'll dispatch

The de Wit murder'd.

August 20.

(e) The following natural and affecting Account, in a Letter from the Hogers, was published in the Gazette, N<sup>o</sup> 704:

"I tremble when I take my Pen into my Hand, to acquaint you with the sad Spectacle we have seen here in the Hague on Saturday the 20th Instant, in the Persons of the Rewoort: was Patten [Cornelius de Wit] and the late Penfionary de Wit; the former having that Morning receiv'd his Sentence, by which he was declar'd incapable of holding any Employments in the State, and banish'd for ever: It thereupon follow'd, that the Barber who had accus'd him, being set at liberty, every where as he pass'd in the Streets told the People, that the said Rewoort was guilty, and deserv'd a severer Sentence than that which was given against him; and it happening that the said Penfionary de Wit, going in his Coach to the Poort where the said Rewoort was Prisoner, to fetch away his Brother, they were both, as they were coming away, stop'd by the Watch; who would have discharged their Muskets upon them, had they not presently retired into the Poort again: In the mean time, the People being very much dissatisfied with the aforesaid Sentence, and it being reported that the Doors were coming with no good Intention to the Hogers, the Drums were beat for bringing the Burghers in Arms; which was presently done: They, being in all six Companies, posted themselves on the Esplanade before the Poort; where they continued till almost Five in the Afternoon: About which time, they broke open the Prison Doors, notwithstanding three Troops of Horse were drawn out to prevent any Disorder, whom the Burghers kept off with their Pikes, and afterwards forced to retire, and fetch'd down the said Rewoort, and his Brother the late Penfionary; the former being in his Night-gown, having been pull'd out of Bed, and the other in a black Velvet Coat; who were soon thrown under foot by the People, after having received several Wounds, as well by Musquet-shots as otherwise: But this not sufficing, the dead Bodies were trampled upon, and dragg'd up and down the Streets: First their two Fingers, which they had held up at the swearing to the perpetual Edict, were cut off; and then their Ears; which were taken up by some Boys, and presented as a great Present to the first Person of Quality they met: After which, they hung the dead Bodies by the Heels on a Gallows, their Cloaths being torn all off, and the Flesh mangled in a most miserable Manner, every one striving to get a Piece; which they afterwards fold up and down the Town; one Joint of a Finger for twelve Stivers, a whole one for fifteen Stivers, a Piece of an Ear for twenty-five Stivers, and a Toe for ten Stivers, and so proportionably: In this manner the Bodies remain'd hanging on the Gallows, now made naked, and in this manner mangled, and expos'd to the Scorn and Mockery of the People, till about Midnight; when several Persons, in disguise, came and privately removed the same: So that certainly a fadder Spectacle hath hardly ever been seen. It is said, a certain Woman coming from Schiedam, being informed of what had pass'd, fell upon her Knees, and heartily thank'd God for it: So strangely were the People enraged against these two Brothers, who thus miserably ended their Lives!"

patch you the same Way. Nay, they actually did turn him out of his Office, upon the spot, as thinking his Concern for the Fate of those unhappy Victims was a Disqualification: And at Dort, the Mob rose on the Son of Cornelius, because he appear'd in Mourning for his Father. Scarce could the gallant de Ruyter escape their Fury; more than once they assembled to plunder his House, on the bare Suspicion of his corresponding privately with the degraded Party. At Amsterdam, the following Demands were put up on the Exchange:

1. That the Colonels, Captains, and other Officers of the Burghers, being either Caumjellors, Scheepen, or Vroetschappen, shall be immediately cashier'd; and that these Commands shall be conferred on so many Persons to be elected out of the Burghers.

2. That, for the future, none of the Burghers may be Governors of the East-India Company; those that are at present to be cashier'd.

3. The Burghers to have an Account of Moneys, what hath been received, and how laid out.

4. The Burghers desire all their former Privileges concerning fishing in the several Waters about the Town, &c.

5. They that refuse to consent hereunto to be treated as the de Wits were at the Hague.

6. He that dares take this Paper down, from the Place where it is affixed, to be punished with present Death.

In short, the Power of the Nobles was every where struck at; and the general Drift was, to divide the Commonwealth for the future between the Stadtholder and the People: Whatever Demands were made by the Last the First comply'd with: All Authority was now lodg'd in his Highness; the States were scarce ever nam'd; and both the Laws, and the legislative Power, were wholly at his Mercy.

Our English Historians affect to speak of this extraordinary Promotion of his Highness as a Matter of Triumph; but with what Reason, may best be gather'd from the Circumstances it was attended with: It did indeed operate like wholesome Physic to the Commonwealth; but it might have prov'd its Bane. The first good Effect which it produced was, an immediate Stop to the Treaty with France; The Power was departed from those who had set it on foot, and that so suddenly, that the French Ministry were not prepar'd with Expedients to substitute in the place of that which had fail'd.

While Affairs were in this critical Situation, the Plenipotentiaries from England, Buckingham and Arlington, set out for Holland in two of the Royal Yachts, carrying each the Union Flag at their Topmast Head, and a White Flag at their Poops. Off Domburg in Zealand, they discover'd the Dutch Fleet, consisting of seventy or seventy-five Sail; three of which being come up with them, each Yacht fir'd a Gun to Leeward; in Token they were Friends. The Dutch did the same and STRUCK THEIR TOPSAILS. The Captain of the biggest Ship then came on board the Yachts, and having paid his Compliments to their Excellencies, return'd to his own Ship; and at parting all the three saluted them with almost all their Guns.

These minute Circumstances are here mention'd to shew the present Disposition of the Dutch towards England, and how little Reason we now had, even by our own Accounts to make a Quarrel of the Flag.

When their Excellencies landed at Maesland Sluice, they received the first News, that to the Misfortunes of his Country, the Prince had owed his Elevation. Here, on the Presumption that they were the Messengers of Peace, they were received with all the Joy and Respect, that Gratitude could inspire, or Transport give Utterance to. And when they made their Approaches towards the Hague, they were met a Mile out of Town by Men Women and Children, who gave Signs of the Epidemical Madnes which had seiz'd upon them, by crying out incessantly, God bless the King of England! God bless the Prince of Orange! And the Devil take the States!

Concerning the Negotiations of these great Men, much Care seems to have been taken, that the World should never be furnished with a Key to the whole Mystery. The London Gazette confesses no more than that they were entertain'd with a noble Supper by the States one Night, and that they were to set out, on their Way to the French Camp, the next Morning. That they were nobly treated by the Prince of Orange at Supper, as also at Dinner the next Day, after which they continued their Journey. That they had their public Audience of his most Christian Majesty, together with the Duke of Monmouth, who was nam'd with them in the (o) Commission, on July the 7th. That the same Evening they were join'd by the Lord Vilcount Halifax, who, according to Bishop Burnet, was sent over afterwards, to give the Nation Satisfaction, without being in the Secret. That the said Lord Halifax had his Audience of Ceremony, the next Day. That all three had been lodg'd in the French Camp, and accompany'd the King in his March. That on July the 21st, O. S. they returned, after having expected fourteen Days the Return of the Dutch Deputies, and some time after, an Answer to their Propositions. And that it was commonly guess'd, this great Silence of the States proceeded from the Promises they had receiv'd of Succour from the Empire, which gave them Hopes of more Ease that way than by Treaty; so that all their Excellencies could effect, for the present, was to compose a promissory Act between the two Kings not to treat or conclude without mutual Participation, and Inclusion of each others Pretences.

Our noble Letter Writers, Lord Arlington, and Lord Clifford who officiated as Secretary in his Absence, are even less communicative than the Gazette. According to Bishop Burnet's Account of their Proceedings in Holland,

Vol. i. p. 327.

tho' the Duke of Bucks was once in the Humour to sign a Peace with the Prince of Orange, for the general, both he and his Colleague acted more like the Agents of France, than the Embassadors of England. And according to others, they gave the States to understand, they would oblige the French King to give up all his Conquests but Mosricht; or if not, they would enter into new Measures with the States, for which they had Powers, to prevent the Destruction of that Commonwealth.

Oldmixon, &amp;c.

Upon the whole, what Sir William Temple calls the common Belief of those Times, seems to be the best founded, viz. That this Embassy was owing to our Jealousy of the French Conquests going on so fast, while ours were so lame. It is extremely plain, that their Address was to France, not Holland; that they only took the last in their Way; and that the Issue of their Voyage was perfectly agreeable to this Presumption.

As to the Manner of their Reception, some of our Writers make no scruple to affirm, it was extremely ungracious; his most Christian Majesty taking the liberty to tell their Excellencies, that the King of England might treat as he pleas'd: That what he had got was his own; and that what he should get he would not restore without an Equivalent. But this is apparently the Language which he is said to have us'd to the States Deputies, before the Arrival of these Lords: While he had any Hopes of making the Dutch submit to his Yoke, it was his Interest to throw England out of the Question; but when the Treaty was broken off, when his Britannic Majesty's Nephew was at the Head of the Republic, with an almost unlimited Power; when the English Embassadors had been so lately Eye and Ear Witnesses of the Readiness both of the Prince and the States to buy his Friendship almost at any Rate; when, in case of a Breach with England, six thousand of the best Troops in the French Army would have gone over to the Enemy; and their favourite Fleet would probably never have found its Way back to its own Ports again; and when the Invader saw the Residue of the Country snatch out of his Power, by letting go all the Sluices, and laying it under Water; it was become as much his Interest to keep England in good Humour, and draw its Ministers into a second Engagement (for the first he had broke himself) not to accommodate with the Dutch, without mutual Participation, and mutual Consent.

For these Reasons, it is not to be presum'd, that he would venture to disoblige the Persons he was under a Necessity to bribe: For those who say they were insulted, say also they were brib'd: And it is notorious, that those who had boasted they were good Dutchmen, in Holland, became, in the French Camp, as arrant Frenchmen; as if they had lifted under their Banners, and subsisted on their Pay.

Of this no Question can be made, when 'tis consider'd, that the following Conditions were drawn up in Concert, by the Ministers of both Kings, and deliver'd to the States Deputies, as a joint Act, tho' contain'd in two separate Papers.

Those of France stood foremost, and contain'd, among other things,

That the Prohibition against the Commodities and Manufactures of France should be taken off.

That full Liberty should be given for the Exercise of the Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Religion, through all the United Provinces: So that where there should be more than one Church, the Catholics should be allow'd another: Where there was none, they should be allow'd to build one: The States-General to provide Maintenance for the Priests, &c.

That, by way of Equivalent for what the Conqueror was to restore, the States should surrender to his Majesty all the Provinces, Towns, and Places, which they hold either in Flanders or Brabant, except Sluise and Cassant; as also Nimeguen, the Ports of Cadissenbourg and Skin; and all of Guelderland on the Side of the Rbine next France; the Isle of Bommel; the Isle and Fort of Vorne; the Fort of St. Andre; the Castle of Leuvesteyn; the Fort of Crevecœur; the City of Grave, and its Dependencies; the City and County of Meurs; (for which two last Places the States were to indemnify the Prince of Orange) together with all the Rights, Powers, Privileges, &c. belonging to them.

That the Subjects of his most Christian Majesty should have free Passage thro' all the Dominions of the States, to the Places and Towns thus surrendered, without being liable to any Toll or Imposition; nor their Merchandises, Provisions, or Ammunition, to be visited.

That the States should restore to the Order of Malta the Commanderies which belong'd to them in the United Provinces.

That they should engage to pay twenty Millions towards the excessive Charge of the War; in Consideration of which, his Majesty would forgive them the Principal and Interest of three Millions, lent in the Year 1651, to the States, by his Majesty's Father.

That, in Acknowledgment of the Peace which his Majesty thus vouchsafed to the said States, when he had it in his Power to extend his Conquests, they should every Year present him, by the Hands of an Embassador Extraordinary, a golden Medal weighing a Mark; which should specify, that they owed to his Majesty the Preservation of that Liberty which the Kings his Ancestors had help'd them to acquire.

Those of England, tho' not quite so long, were to the full as reasonable, viz.

That the Hollanders should give up the Honour

Du Most.

Honour of the Flag without the least Contradiction. That whole Fleets should strike their Colours and lower their Topmasts to any single Ship, carrying his Majesty's Flag in the British Seas, even to the Coasts of Holland.

That all the English resident at Surinam, should have free Leave during the Space of one Year to remove to any other Place, with their Effects of whatever kind, according to the Treaty of Breda.

That all Persons guilty of treasonable Practices, or of writing seditious Libels against his Majesty, or of any otherwise conspiring against the Tranquillity of his Realms, should, on Complaint, be for ever banished out of the Dominions of the States.

That his Majesty should be paid a Million Sterling towards the Charge of the War, 400,000 l. down, and 100,000 l. per an. till the whole was discharged.

That in Acknowledgment of his Majesty's Permission to the Hollanders to fish upon the Coasts, the States should annually pay (ƒ) 10000 l. Sterling for ever.

That both the present Prince of Orange and his Descendants should have the Sovereignty of the United Provinces, except of such Part as should be divided between the two Kings; or, at least, that they should enjoy the Dignities of Governor and Admiral General, for ever, in as ample a Manner, as they had been ever enjoy'd by the Princes his Predecessors.

That, in three Months after the Peace was made, a Treaty of Commerce should be set on foot, as well for regulating the East-India Trade, according to the Demands formerly made, as for the Convenience of his Majesty's Subjects, either trafficking or residing in the Dominions of the States; and that on such Conditions as have been granted to the most favour'd Nations; and that the Isle of Walcheren, the City and Castle of Sluis, with their Dependencies, together with the Isles of Casant, Gerés, and Voorne, should be put into his Majesty's Hands, by way of Security for the Performance of Articles.

What was yet more grievous and tyrannical than all the rest: The States were allow'd but Ten Days by the two Kings to take the Benefit of these (q) generous Offers. It was likewise provided, that, unless they gave full Satisfaction to both, as also to the Princes of Germany, who were embark'd with them in the same Cause, they were not to hope for any Treaty, Peace, or Truce, with either.

And now it was that the young Prince of Orange made a much more illustrious Figure, than when the two Houses of Parliament afterwards waited upon him with a solemn Tender of the Imperial Crown of England. Tho' the Offers of the two Kings were made to the States, all Power was now devolv'd on the Stadtholder; and it depended principally, if not solely, on him, whether they should be accepted or refus'd. This the English and French Ministers very well knew, and therefore to him their Applications were principally made. The Sovereignty of the Provinces, which had been expressly demanded for him in the English Proposals, was what they most rely'd on. They knew Ambition was his predominant Passion; and therefore they ply'd him on that Side, with all the Batteries in their Power; firmly persuaded, that in the End they would be irresistible. But, quite contrary to their Imaginations, the Prince look'd down on what they thought he would have aspir'd to: To betray his Trust, and sacrifice his Integrity and Honour, to be only a tributary Prince to France, was in his Opinion a bad Bargain: He had the Fate of the Duke of Lorraine before his Eyes; which very sufficiently evinc'd, that he who was not strong enough to set her Power at defiance, would only be a nominal Sovereign, and a real Slave. This led him to declare, That he had rather pass his Life in hunting on his Lands in Germany, than submit to sell his Liberty at any Price: And that noble and generous Zeal for what is brave and honest, which flames out so gloriously in young Men, and which a long Commerce with the selfish World is so apt to destroy, inspir'd him with that heroic Expression, That, rather than see his Country lost, he would die in the last Dyke.

Full of these gallant and wise Sentiments, he conven'd a general Assembly of the States, and, instead of intriguing and bribing to make a separate Interest for himself, at the Expence of the Commonwealth, took upon him to shew, that the Proposals which had been made them merited their Attention only to excite their Indignation and Contempt: That to their Wisdom and Valour only they ought to have recourse for their Preservation: That the Means were yet in their Power: That their Allies were, on all hands, coming to their Assistance: That a resolute Stand might probably

(q) Concerning this Translation, the Author of England's Appeal takes occasion to write as follows:

"It is to be observ'd, first, That the French Demands were in substance the same as they had made at first in their Negotiation with Mr. de Grays, and since they were so unjust, and so enormous, that the best Friends they had then among the States could hardly swallow them themselves, much less to bring the Generality to give their Consent, without some Modification, it was not to be expected that the Government, being since the late Change much more averse to the French than before, the same Proposals again should be better entertain'd; which was render'd the more improbable by the Addition of the English Demands.

Secondly, The French, by the excessive Height of their Demands, seem'd to have encouraged (if not persuaded by some more effectual Means) the said Plenipotentiaries not to come much short of these, which was attended with two favil Consequences; the one, That the War was certainly, by it, entail'd upon his Majesty; and the other, That it was a Means to alienate the Minds and Affections of the Dutch, who were then inclin'd to give those Advantages to England, which cannot rationally be expected hereafter.

Thirdly, Tho' the respective Claims of the two Kings had been singly tolerable, yet the joining of them together made it impossible for the Dutch to grant either. From whence the French (and very rationally) conceiv'd Hopes, that the Dutch finding themselves over-balance'd by the joint Power of their Enemies, and seeing no Way to come out of so destructive a War, and to have Peace (and not a firm nor a durable one neither) without dividing their Country into an hundred Pieces, and cutting off all their Sines, had rather cast themselves into the Arms of their Conqueror, and, laying aside all Thoughts of Sovereignty, live in an entire Body, under the French Dominion."

probably recover what was lost, and would certainly secure the Remainder.

While he spoke, Despair quitted the Assembly, Hope kindled in every Eye, and Courage retook Possession of every Heart: Wise Deliberations made way for vigorous Resolutions: They rejected the Proposals of the two Kings, recalled their Deputies, made all the necessary Dispositions for defending themselves to the last Extremity, and determin'd, rather than submit to the French Yoke, to transport their Families and Effects to the East-Indies.

[Lord Arlington's Letter.]

Advice of this unexpected Event soon reach'd the French Camp; where it was receiv'd with outward Scorn, and inward Uneasiness: Lord Arlington calls it a Feu de Paille, a Blaze of Straw; but adds, that Sir Gabriel Syllivius had been sent to the Prince of Orange, with an Intimation, that if the States would treat in earnest, both Kings would be prevail'd with to moderate their Conditions: In the mean time, however, the English Plenipotentiaries had nothing left to do, but to sign their new (r) Agreement with France in form; which they did on 16th of July, with Circumstances no less dishonourable to themselves than to their Master; for, in the Preamble, they suffer'd his most Christian Majesty to be styl'd King of FRANCE; and, thro' the whole Piece, yielded him the Precedency, which OLIVER, the PROTECTOR, disdain'd to do: For being the

New Treaty between France and England.

Head of the English Commonwealth, tho' not a King, he insisted on the first Place for himself, and carry'd it.

There are certain Queries extant, which serve to illustrate this Embassy yet farther: By Coke and Oldmixon, they are ascrib'd to Secretary Treacor; but erroneously: For Sir John Treacor dy'd May the 28th, which was long before the said Embassy took place: By Bishop Kenner they are ascrib'd to Mr. Secretary Coventry; But neither doth this seem very reasonable; for he was the Instrument of the Cabal, at Sweden, to dissolve the Triple League; and, for that Service, was rewarded with the Seals, on the Death of Sir John Treacor: We are, besides, left as much in the dark as to the Occasion upon which these Queries were made, as to the Author; and so become the Bubbles of our own Conjectures. Upon a Research, however, the Reader will find them in the Paper, so often refer'd to, by the Name of England's Appeal; which, tho' perhaps rank'd by some Men among the Libels of these Times, contains more Facts, and better Reasoning, than most of those Performances, which assume the more solemn Stile of History. The Queries are these:

I. Whether they (the Plenipotentiaries, Buckingham and Arlington) were set to promote the French Conquests? If nor, why, by making the Peace impossible, as far as in them lay, would they force the Dutch to submit to the French Dominion?

II. Whether they did not know that the Queries relating to the Conduct of the English Plenipotentiaries.

(r) This very remarkable Piece, concerning which our Historians are generally silent, is as follows:

"The favourable Success with which God has been pleas'd, both by Land and Sea, to bless the just War which the Kings of France and Great Britain were oblig'd to enter into against the States General of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, having inclin'd the said States to send Deputies at the same time towards both of the said Kings, to make them Proposals of Peace, and to know on what equitable Terms they were willing to grant it to them; his most Christian, and his Britannick Majesty, being both touch'd with the same Affection for the public Tranquillity; and being sway'd by this Motive, so worthy of good and great Princes, to prefer an honourable Peace to a War so happily begun that it promis'd as glorious an Issue, were not averse to hearken to the Proposals which were made to them by the said States. But as the first Amity betwixt their said Majesties, as well as the Bands of the Treaties which have united them in this Undertaking, gives them but one Mind, in the Resolutions which they may form, either to put an End to the War, or to continue it, they immediately communicated to each other the Deputations which were made to them by the said States, in order to agree by common Consent in the manner of admitting them, and regulating their Proposals. And because at a Juncture of such Importance, the King of Great Britain thought it for the Good of the Cause to impart his Sentiments forthwith to his most Christian Majesty, and to inform himself likewise of the Sentiments of his Majesty, by Persons in whom he had an entire Confidence, he therefore nominated his Ambassador Extraordinary, viz. the Duke of Buckingham, his Master of the Horse, the Earl of Arlington, his principal Secretary of State, and the Lord Viscount Halifax, a Member of his Privy Council, by his full Powers dated the 21st of June last, and the Duke of Monmouth by a like full Power of the 22d of the same Month; who after having assur'd his most Christian Majesty of the sincere and constant Affection of the King their Master, to continue united in their first Engagements, and found altogether as strong a Disposition in his most Christian Majesty not to separate their Interests in the Treaty of Peace which might be made, agreed on the following Articles with the Marquis de Louvois, one of the Privy Counsellors of the said most Christian King, Commander, Cancellor, Grand Matter and Superintendent General of the Poils in France, Secretary of State, and of his Orders; and the Sieur Arnault Lord of Pomposse, Counsellor in ordinary in all his Councils, also Secretary of State, and of his Orders, who were appointed Commissioners and Plenipotentiaries in this Affair by his said Majesty, and furnish'd in like manner with his full Powers.

I. Tho' the Faith of the two Kings is such, that after the Promises they made to one another by their Treaty of the 12th of February, to make no Peace nor Truce with the States General without the reciprocal Consent of both their Majesties, and till they are fully satisfy'd; yet that their common Enemy may have no Hopes left, how ill grounded soever, to separate them in Interest, they again engage themselves severally by the present Article to hearken to no Proposal of Peace, without communicating the same to each other speedily, to enter into none that may be made to either separately for his Advantage, and to accept of no Satisfaction till the other King is fully contented with the Satisfaction given to him.

II. For this End the said Kings promise to agree together on the Conditions, upon which they shall think fit to conclude a Peace that may be safe and honourable to both; and not to consent to any Accommodation with the said States General, till the said Conditions be granted to them.

III. And to the End that the Concert of Amity, Union, and mutual Interest may not only be confirm'd by the present Articles, but may be made known to the said States General, their said Majesties shall give the necessary Orders for requiring the Deputies of the said States at their Court, or by some other Method which they shall judge more publick, that neither their Interests nor Satisfaction can be separate; and by the present Treaty the said two Kings confirm whatever was agreed upon and sign'd by them on the 12th of February last, which they again promise to observe and maintain in every Article.

And the said Commissioners of his most Christian Majesty have promis'd on the one Part, as the said Ambassadors Extraordinary of his Majesty of Great Britain have on the other, by virtue of their full Powers, to cause the present Articles to be accepted and ratify'd by the Kings their Masters, and to procure the Ratifications thereof respectively in a Month's time. Done and concluded at the Camp of Heurick the 16th of July, 1672.

French Demands alone had been rejected by the States, and that the granting of them would make it impossible for the Dutch to give the King any Satisfaction?

III. Whether having received, from the Prince and States, all imaginable Assurances of their Designs to return to the King's Amity, and to purchase it at any Rate they could, they could faithfully neglect these, and enter into a new Engagement so prejudicial to England?

IV. How far those who were join'd in Commission did concur in their Judgment; and whether these Considerations, with many others, were not represented to them, and urged by some who desired to serve the King faithfully?

V. Whether or no it was for that Reason they oppos'd so fiercely my Lord Viscount Hallifax's (who came a Day or two after them) appearing and acting jointly with them, tho' in the same Commission with them, in as ample a Manner as themselves?

VI. Who were those who (after my Lord Hallifax could be kept out no longer) went privately to the French Camp, under Pretences, and had Negotiations of their own on foot?

VII. Whether they had Order to call the French King, King of France, and to name him before their Master, as well in the French Demands as of his Majesty's, in all their Agreements which they sent to the Prince of Orange?

VIII. Whether they had Instructions to stand in behalf of the French, upon the public Exercise of the Roman Catholic Religion in the United Provinces, the Churches to be divided to the Roman Priests to be maintain'd out of the public Revenues?

To resume the Thread of our History. Upon the 18th of July N. S. our Embassadors took their Leave of the French Court and Camp, at a Place called Bastel, in the Neighbourhood of Beisleduc, and took the Road of Antwerp, in the King's Coach, attended by the Officers of the Household, who were to make provision for their Diet and Entertainment, and escorted by 500 Horse. And it is, upon this Occasion, expressly declar'd, That the Whole of their Treatment, for the Respect and Obedience which had been shewn them in all Circumstances, as well as the Cost of their Entertainment, had far surpass'd what was usual on the like Occasions.

Sir Bernard Gascoyne was at this time soliciting a Marriage for the Duke of York with the Archduchess of Inspruck, at the Court of Vienna; and to him Lord Clifford thus explains the present Situation of things:

"Our Plenipotentiaries return without making Peace. The Prince of Orange and the Hollanders think both our Demands and the King of France's too high for their consenting to them yet; so that the War goes vigorously on both by Sea and Land, though his most Christian Majesty be returning to Paris. The great Artifice of the Hollanders was to cause Jealousies, and then to divide the two Kings; and they have used great Art in it, but have been so far from prevailing, that they have been the Cause of uniting more and more the Affections of them; and I do assure you, there was never so much Confidence in one and the other of each others Proceedings, as at this present."

And how sincere this Attachment was, on the Side of England, becomes apparent from the following important Particulars, which are contain'd in the Dispatches of Lord Arlington to the said Sir Bernard:

"Being abroad, says his Lordship, I know not how handed to me, I received two of your Letters, the latter of which bore Date the 14th, S. N. as likewise a single Paper, bearing Date the 7th, all in Cypher; this containing an Overture to his Majesty of the Advantages he might have in uniting himself to the Emperor, the Elector of Brandenburg, &c. in assisting the Hollanders to a good Peace; which is so inconsistent with all our present Measures, that he can make no Use of it: The other two mention'd the Arrival of the Prince of Ansbault, and his Propositions to the Emperor's Court; the latter assured us of their being accepted of, notwithstanding their first Difficulties; and finally, his Imperial Majesty's Resolution to join 18,000 Horse and Foot to the said Elector's Troops, now marching to the Assistance of the Hollanders; and that the Conde of Monterey would likewise add a Body therunto, for the same Purpose; which we are sorry to hear: Not that we fear the reviving of the Hollander thereby, from their desperate Condition; but that, in all Probability, unless a Peace speedily follows, this will open a War between the two Crowns of France and Spain, and infinitely embarrass us, who are more streightly than ever united with the former, and would not willingly break with the latter."

Again, in another Place:

"As for us, be assured our Kings will not part in this Business till both be pleas'd; and we are deceiv'd, if the Swede will recede from his Obligation."

In a Third, when it appear'd, that the Draught of the (s) Marriage Articles was accompany'd with Articles of State, which had a Tendency to shock his Majesty's present Engagements:

"Now I am to tell you, his Majesty, in a second Debate, reflecting upon the three Conditions in the said Project [of the Articles of Marriage] relating to Matters of State only, and foreign to the Marriage, viz. the ratifying a-new the Peace of Aix la Chapelle, the including his Imperial Majesty in any Peace that should be made with the States-General, and the promising him Assistance, in case he should be attack'd by any Prince or State, being more expressly examin'd by his Majesty's Command, we resorted to your Instructions, to see whether there were any thing therein to warrant them, and finding nothing there of that Nature, it was further remembered, that his Majesty hath ever declared through this whole Negotiation, that he would never make this Marriage of his Royal Highness a Matter of State, it being held unreasonable to change any of these Measures, wherein we are, for the Advantage of this Match how desirable otherwise soever; and that this hath not only been told you, but often repeated to the Spanish Ambassador here."

And, in a Fourth:

"This last Week his Majesty resolv'd in Council a further Prorogation of the Parliament to the 4th of February next, by which a great Measure of the Hollanders is broken, having fancied to themselves, that they should prevail with many of the Members of it, to make them clamorous upon his Majesty for a separate Treaty upon easy Terms, and with Exclusion of France; so that they seeing this Thrust broken, and finding no great Ease to their present Calamity from the auxiliary Forces of Germany, we persuade ourselves, we shall find them very reasonable in a short time."

England the Tool of France.

Thus all our Measures were made subservient to the Views of France; Charles had the Name, and Lewis the Power; and, while the Former was called King of France, the Latter was virtually Lord Paramount of England.

It is scarce necessary to take Notice, that the Negotiations at Utrecht were as far from putting a Stop to the Progress of the War, as from putting an End to it. The Extracts already made from the State-Papers of those Times, very plainly indicate the contrary. And even, while the States had the Proposals of the allied Kings under Consideration, it was owing to little less than a Miracle, that the Ruin of the Republic had not been seal'd.

Three of the Seven Provinces, the most Christian King was already in Possession of; and with the Assistance of the Elector of Cologne and Bishop of Munster, who early in July, sat down before Groningen, he bid fair to master the rest.

A Descent on
 jected.

At this very time, the English and French Fleets, being completely refitted, and having on board a large Body of Land Forces, came on the Coast of Zealand, with a Design to make a Descent, for which all the necessary Dispositions had been made, and with the Return of the Flood it was to have been put in Execution.

Never did any Project bid fairer for Success than this; never was any Country in more imminent Danger; by Sea no Fleet to interrupt the Enemy, Ashore no Troops to oppose them. The Prince of Orange had his Hands full already, and from his little Army could make no Detachment. According to some, de Ruyter had positive Orders not to hazard an Engagement; according to others, he did not come in Sight, till the Danger was over.

In this dreadful Crisis when a few Hours were to determine whether the Dutch should be any longer a People, Nature itself declar'd in their Favour, and came in to their Rescue. The Ebb instead of six, continued twelve Hours; and this extraordinary Incident was follow'd by such a Tempest as made the Invaders glad to quit the Coast that time, and provide as well as they could for their own Safety. Nor was this all, the whole Season afterwards prov'd one of the most stormy in the Memory of Man: Lord Arlington bears Witness from the Mouth of the Duke of York, that it afforded not one fair Day. So early as the latter End of August, his Royal Highness found himself oblig'd to return with his weather-beaten Fleet into the Thames, having first dismiss'd the French. And what is farther remarkable, tho' the Allies were Masters of the Sea, the Dutch East India and Spanish Fleets slip'd thro' their Hands; and, at the Year's End, it appear'd, that instead of maintaining the War with the Treasures of Holland, his Majesty had only exhausted his own.

When the most Christian King took Possession of Utrecht, which was about the Middle of June, his Successes were at their highest Flow: And as it has been Matter of Astonishment to the whole World, that he should in so short a Space of Time penetrate so far, so it became equal Matter of Astonishment that he penetrated no farther.

No sooner, however, did it appear, that his Current was at a stand, and that the very Genius of the Country held him at Bay, than he grew sick of the Undertaking; and immediately after the English Plenipotentiaries had taken their Leave, made the rest of his way back to St. Germain's, which gave his old Enemy the Prince of Conde Occasion to say, That he had not the Soul of a Conqueror.

Upon the 12th of August the fighting Bishop of Munster was oblig'd to raise the Siege of Groningen, which he had carry'd on at a vast Expence, and with all imaginable Vigour, from the 19th of July. This was another happy Incident which gave Ease to the Apprehensions of the States on that Side, and inspir'd them with Hopes that by their own extraordinary Efforts, and the Assistance of their Allies, they might be able, not only to maintain the Residue of their Country, but to face the Enemy upon more equal Terms, at the Opening of the next Campaign.

We must now return to the Domestic Concerns of our own Island; and first, it is observable, that tho' the English Parliament was not permitted to meet, that of Scotland was: For what Views and Ends, we shall presently have recourse to Bishop Burvet to explain.

The Duke of Lauderdale was again appointed Commissioner, and the King in his Letter declar'd, that the principal Design in calling them together, was, that they might consider

A Session of Parliament in Scotland.

A. D. 1672. consider their own Security as well as his Honour and Interest, now while he was engag'd in a very just and necessary War with the States; and that they might provide fitting Remedies against all Accidents that might befall, through this Occasion.

His Grace the Lord Commissioner, likewise, in his Speech, enlarg'd on the Provocation his Majesty had receiv'd from the States, by way of Proof of the Justice and Necessity of the War. After which he proceeded to infer from the uncertain Event of it how absolutely necessary it was to provide against foreign Invasion, or intestine Commotion; adding, "I am, therefore, commanded most seriously to recommend to this Parliament the Safety of this Kingdom, in either of these Cases."— And again, "Although he hath no Occasion to lay any Burthen upon you, upon his own Account; yet he is most assured, you will provide such effectual Means, as the FORCES of this Kingdom may, upon occasion, serve for his Majesty's Honour and Interest, and may be a TERROR TO HIS ENEMIES, and a Security to this Kingdom."

What Effect these fine things had upon the Parliament appears by their Answer to their MOST SACRED SOVEREIGN; in which they were particularly careful to echo back those important Words, just and necessary War, as also, "with all humble Duty to declare, That, as his Majesty's Safety, Honour, and Interest, were near and dear to them above all things in this World, so they would be ready on all Occasions, with Cheerfulness, to offer their Lives and Fortunes, in that, and every Cause wherein they or any of them might be concerned: And, in order thereunto, that they would be careful to provide effectually for the Security of that his Kingdom against Invasion and intestine Comotions, which the Enemy might endeavour to raise and foment; and so settle the Militia, as that the Forces of that Kingdom might be in readiness, whenever his Majesty should be pleas'd to make use of them for his Honour and Interest."

The Prelate above-mention'd assures us, that the Tax demanded to make the Militia thus useful was a whole Year's Assessment; and that many of the Nobility were so concern'd at the haughty Carriage of the Commissioner, that they resolv'd to oppose it, with the Duke of Hamilton at their Head; who, tho' he had promis'd not to oppose Taxes in general, thought this so exorbitant, it seems, that he no longer held himself oblig'd to keep his Word.

His Lordship speaks thus:

"Upon this, I proceeded to Duke Lauderdale, to shew him the Inclinations many had to an Opposition to that Demand, and the Danger of it. He rejected it in a brutal Manner, saying, They durst as soon be damn'd as oppose him. Yet I made him so sensible of it, that he appointed the Marquis of Athol to go and talk in his Name to Duke Hamilton, who would that I might be present; and that was easily admitted. Lord Athol press'd Duke Hamilton to come into an entire Confidence with Duke Lauderdale, and promis'd, that he should have the chief Direction of all Affairs in Scotland under the other. Duke Hamilton ask'd, how stood the Parliament of England affected towards the War? Lord Athol assur'd him, there was a settled Design of having no more Parliaments in England; the King would be Master, and would be no longer curb'd by a House of Commons. He also laid out the great Advantages that Scotland, more particularly the great Nobility, might find by striking in heartily with the King's Designs, and in making him absolute in England. Duke Hamilton answer'd very honestly, that he would never engage in such Designs: He would always be a good and faithful Subject; but he would likewise be a good Countryman. He was very unwilling to concur in the Land-tax. He said, Scotland had no Reason to engage in the War, since, as they might suffer much by it, so they could gain nothing, neither by the present War, nor by any Peace that could be made. Yet he was prevail'd on in conclusion to agree to it: And upon that, the Business of the Session of Parliament went on smoothly, without any Opposition."

We have here the Word of a Bishop, that, in his Hearing, a Court Lord made no Scruple to avow, that the Ax was now laid to the Root of the Constitution: And how far it may be depended upon, let the Reader judge for himself, from a Recollection of all the Facts already before him, as well as from those which are still to be specify'd.

At the same time that his Majesty gave that broad Intimation to his People, of his Design to prosecute his own Measures, without either the Advice or Assistance of Parliament, by refusing his Assignations, and possessing himself of all his current Revenue (as it is tenderly worded by Lord Arlington, to Sir William Godolphin) he likewise began to make use of a Style, and to exert his Prerogative in a Manner, which authorized the worst Suspicions, and denoted Will and Pleasure were at hand.

For Instance:

March the 6th, 1671-2, an Order of Council was publish'd, signifying, that it should and might be LAWFUL for any of his Majesty's Subjects, having a Pass from his Royal Highness the Duke, Lord High Admiral, to navigate their Ships with one Third Foreigners, notwithstanding the Acts for Encouragement and Increase of Shipping and Navigation.

March the 24th was publish'd an Order for a national Fast, to implore God's Blessing on his Majesty's naval Forces, in which are these Words: "And his Majesty doth expressly charge and command, that the said Fasting and Prayers be soberly, reverently, and decently perform'd, by all his Majesty's loving Subjects, as they tender the Favour of Almighty God, and upon pain of such Punishments as his Majesty can justly inflict upon all such as contemn so religious a Work."

March the 31st, a Proclamation was order'd, charging and commanding all Seamen and Mariners, who had absconded to avoid being impress'd into the Service, forthwith to render themselves, on pain of being proceeded against, upon Discovery, with all possible Severity. All Mayors, Justices, Constables, &c. were, by the same Proclamation, enjoyn'd to make diligent Search for the said Absconders, to seize them when found, and consign them over to the Navy; of which they were not to fail, as they would answer the contrary at their Peril.

Gazette, Numb. 667.

April 8, a Proclamation was ordered to recall all Protections, to declare it should be lawful for any Merchant-ship, or Privateer, to be navigated by foreign Seamen; to authorise the taking out of all such Privateer and Merchant Ships all Seamen, who were his Majesty's natural-born Subjects; and to lay an Embargo on all Ships not navigated with Foreigners; as also to command all Innkeepers, Victuallers, or other Persons receiving Lodgers, to discover all Seamen, who should lie conceal'd in their Houses, on pain either of suffering the utmost Penalties of the Law, for such his Contempt; or, if it should be found more expedient for his Majesty's Service, of being press'd HIMSELF to serve in his Majesty's Fleet, instead of the Person so by him conceal'd.

N. 676.

May 11, his Majesty was pleas'd in Council to order and declare, That the Act of the 12th of his Reign, for the encouraging and increasing of Shipping and Navigation, and all the Proceedings, therein or thereby directed, should be totally suspended, as to several Particulars in the said Orders specify'd: As also to declare, That the Merchants of any Nation might import, from any Parts whatsoever, Hemp, Pitch, Tar, Malts, Salt-petre, and Copper, liable only to the same Duties, as by the Tonnage and Poundage Act were to be paid by his Majesty's natural-born Subjects: That the said Order should continue, and be in force, during his Majesty's PLEASURE: And that, when his Majesty should think fit to determine the said Dispensation, he would, by his Royal Proclamation, give six Months Notice thereof.

N. 686.

June 14, a Proclamation was issued, in which, after Reference to certain ancient Statutes, against Spreaders of false News, and Promoters of malicious Slanders and Calumnies; as likewise to a late (t) Statute of the 13th of his Majesty's Reign, Notice is taken, "That there had been of late more bold and licentious Discourses than formerly; and that Men had assum'd to themselves a Liberty, not only in Coffee-houses, but in other Places and Meetings, both public and private, to censure and defame the Proceedings of State, by speaking evil of things they understood not, and endeavouring to create and nourish an universal Jealousy and Dissatisfaction in the Minds of all his Majesty's good Subjects: For which Reasons, his Majesty, "by the Advice of his Council, did, by the said Proclamation, forewarn, and straitly command, all his loving Subjects, of what State or Condition soever they be, from the Highest to the Lowest, that they presume not henceforth, by writing or speaking, to utter or publish any false News or Reports, or to intermeddle with the Affairs of State and Government, or with the Persons of any of his Majesty's Counsellors or Ministers, as they will answer the contrary at their utmost Peril." Even the Hearers of such Discourses were declar'd equally punishable with the Speakers, unless they became Informers, and had equal Vengeance denounced against them: His Majesty further declaring, "That he would proceed with all manner of Severity against all manner of Persons, who should use any bold or unlawful Speeches of this Nature, or be present at any Coffee-house, or other public or private Meeting, where such Speeches were used, without revealing the same in due time:" And again, "That he was resolv'd to suppress this unlawful and undutiful Kind of Discourse, by a most strict and exemplary Punishment of all such Offenders as should be hereafter discover'd."

July the 22d, the importing or vending any Sort of painted Earthen-wares, except those of China, and Stone Bottles and Jugs, was prohibited by the King's Proclamation, "upon pain of being grievously fin'd, and suffering the utmost Punishments, which might be lawfully inflicted upon the Contemners of his Majesty's Royal Authority."

And, even before the Declaration of War against the Dutch was made public, his Majesty, notwithstanding the solemn Address he had so few Months before receiv'd from both Houses, concerning the dangerous Growth of Popery, was pleas'd to suspend the Execution of all and all manner of penal Laws, in Matters ecclesiastical, against whatever Sort of Nonconformists or Recusants: In Justification of which his Majesty, however, took occasion to urge, how ineffectually the many and frequent Ways of Corruption had been made use of to establish an Uniformity of Opinion: And that he also understood himself to be sufficiently authorised to take this notable Step, by virtue of his supreme Power in Matters ecclesiastical, which, according to the Words of the (x) Declaration,

(t) In which is a Clause, That whoever utter or publish any Words or Things to incite and stir up the People to Hatred or Dilike of his Majesty's Person or the established Government, if thereby made incapable of holding any Office or Employ whatsoever, either in Church or State.

(x) Mr. Locke, in his famous Pamphlet, call'd, A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend in the Country, undertaking to account for the Grounds and Reasons which inclin'd Lord Shaftesbury and Lord Clifford to join in this Measure, advances the following Particulars, which will serve to shew the Inconscience of Parties, and that the Dispensing Power was not held so much a Bugbear at one time as at another.

"My Lord Clifford did in express Terms tell me one Day, in private Discourse, "That the King, if he would be firm to himself, might settle what Religion he pleas'd, and carry the Government to what Height he would; for if Men were assur'd of the Liberty of their Conscience, might establish'd in their Properties, able and upright Judges made in Westminster-Hall, to judge the Causes of men and tans; and so, on the other hand, the Fort of Tilbury was finish'd to bridge the City, the Fort of Plymouth to secure the West, and Arms for 20,000 Men in each of these, and in Hall for the Northern Parts, with some Addition which might be easily and undifferably made to the Forces now on foot, there were none that would have either Will, Opportunity, or Power to resist." But he added withal, "He was so fix'd in the Maintenance of Property and Liberty of Conscience, that was not only inherent in him, but had been declared and recogniz'd to be so, by several Statutes and Acts of Parliament.

All these several Acts of State, had taken Place within the short Compass of eight Months, and there remain'd still others behind, which were equally abhorrent to our Constitution, and which had actually been brought into Play among the rest, if the Lord Keeper Bridgman, could have been induced to let them pass the Seals.

Besides the Land Forces which had been sent into the Service of France, under the Command of the Duke of Monmouth, a Body of between five and six thousand more, were levy'd and encamp'd on Black Heath to be ready at Hand as Occasion should offer. But there could be no Military Discipline without Military Laws; and with those the Kingdom was then happily unprovided. However ductile the Parliament had prov'd in some things, there was no Hope of their lending the least Countenance to an Army. There remain'd, therefore, no other Expedient than for the King to supply the Defect by his own Royal Authority.

Another Difficulty arose in Westminster Hall; the Money which the Bankers had advanc'd to the Government, and the Re- payment of which, was stop'd at the Exchequer, was none of their own: They had borrow'd on one Hand what they lent on the other; the Inducement for which was the receiving a larger Interest than they paid. The fine Words given by his Majesty to them, did not satisfy their Creditors, who grew importunate for their Debts, and at length had recourse to Law. The Ministers thought themselves oblig'd to stand by the Bankers, and the Means they had recourse to, was to procure Injunctions in Chancery to be issued to stop Proceeding at Law against the said Bankers, on the Equity of Public Necessity.

On both these Points the Lord Keeper had been importun'd, but he had too much Integrity, to give his Sanction to either. And what is yet more remarkable, advising with the Attorney and Solicitor-General upon them, as also with some of the King's Council, they ALL agreed, They were Rocks (says Mr. North) upon which they must split, if they could not otherwise decline them; for they lay directly in the Way, and would not be surmounted.

And now it was that his Majesty, reflecting on the old Age, and continual Indisposition of the Lord Keeper, thought fit to admit of his Resignation of the Great Seal, and to gratify the uninterrupted Services of the Earl of Shaftsbury with the Custody thereof, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England. This is the Language of the Gazette of November 18.

If he had his Will, though he should introduce a Bishop of Dorset (which was the Intention he then made, that See being then vacant) of another Religion, yet he would not disturb any of the Church beside, but suffer them to die away, and not by his Change (how happy forever he was in it) overthrow either of these Principles, and therefore desired he might be thought an honest Man, as to his Part of the Declaration, for he meant it really. The Lord Shaftsbury (with whom I had more Freedom) I with great Alliance asked what he meant by the Declaration? for it seem'd to me (as I then told him) that it assum'd a Power to repeal and suspend all our Laws, to destroy the Church, to overthrow the Protestant Religion, and to tolerate Popery. He reply'd all angry, That he wonder'd at my Objection, there being not one of these in the Case; for the King assum'd no Power of repealing Laws, or suspending them contrary to the Will of his Parliament or People; and not to argue with me at that time the Power of the King's Supremacy, which was of another Nature than that he had in Civils, and had been exercised without Exception in this Case, by his Father, Grandfather, and Queen Elizabeth, under the Great Seal, to foreign Protestants, become Subjects of England; not to influence in the suspending the Execution of the two Acts of Navigation and Trade, during both this and the last Dutch War, in the same Words, and upon the same Necessity, and as yet without Clamour that ever we heard. But to pass by all that, this is certain, a Government could not be supported, whether monarchical, or of any other sort, without a standing, supreme, executive Power, fully enabled to visitate, or wholly to suspend any Penal Laws, in the Intervals of the Legislative Power; which, when assembled, there was no Doubt, but wherever there lies a Negative for passing of a Law, there the Address or Sense known of either of them to the Contrary (as for Instance, of either of the two Houses of Parliament in England) ought to determine that Indulgence, and restore the Law to its full Execution; for without this the Laws are to no Purpose made, if the Prince could annul them at Pleasure; and so, on the other hand, without a Power always in being of dispensing upon Occasion, was to suppose a Constitution extremely imperfect and impracticable; and to cure this with a Legislative Power always in being, is, when considered, no other than a perfect Tyranny. As to the Church, he conceived the Declaration was extremely their Interest; for the narrow Bottom they had plac'd themselves upon, and the Measures they had proceeded by, for contrary to the Properties and Liberties of the Nation, must needs in a short time prove fatal to them; whereas this led them into another Way to live peaceably with the dissenting and dissenting Protestants, both at home and abroad, and so by necessary and unavoidable Consequence, to become the Head of them all, for that Place is due to the Church of England, being in Favour, and of near Approach to the most powerful Prince of that Religion, and so always had it in their Heads to be the Interlocutors and Procurers of the greatest Good and Protection that Party throughout all Christendom can receive. And thus the Archbishop of Canterbury might come, not only alteris Orbis, but alteris Regibus Papa, and all the Addition of Honour and Power attain'd, without the Loss or Diminution of the Church; it not being intended that one Living, Dignity, or Preference should be given to any but those who were freely conformable. As to the Protestant Religion, he told me plainly, it was for the preserving of that, and that only, that he heartily join'd in the Declaration; for, besides that, he thought it his Duty to have Care in his Place and Station of those he was convinced were the People of God, and fear'd him, tho' of different Persecutions; he also knew nothing else but Liberty and Indulgence, that could possibly (as our Case stood) secure the Protestant Religion in England; and he begged me to consider, if the Church of England should attain to a rigid, blind and unqualified Conformity, and that Power of our Church should come into the Hands of a Papish Prince, which was not a Thing so impossible or remote, as not to be apprehended; whether in such a Case, would not all the Arms, Artillery and Government of the Church, be turn'd against the present Religion of it? And should not all good Protestants tremble to think what Bishops such a Prince was like to make, and whom those Bishops would condemn for Heretics, and that Prince might be? Whereas, if this, which is now but a Declaration, might ever by the Experience of it gain the Advantage of becoming an established Law, the true Protestant Religion would still be kept up amongst the Cities, Towns, and trading Places, and the worthiest and soberest (if not the greatest) Part of the Nobility, Gentry, and People.

As for the Toleration of Popery, he said, It was a pleasant Objection, since he could confidently say, that the Papists had an Advantage in the least by this Declaration, that they did not as fully enjoy, and with less Noise, by the Favour of all the Bishops. It was the Vanity of the Lord-Keeper that they were nam'd as all, for the whole Advantage was to the dissenting Protestants, which were the only Men disturb'd before; and yet he confess'd to me that it was his Opinion, and always had been, that the Papists ought to have no other Preferece laid upon them, but to be made incapable of Office, Court, or Arms, and to pay so much as might bring them at least to a Balance with the Protestants for those chargeable Offices they are liable unto; and conclude it with this, that he desired me seriously to weigh, whether Liberty and Property were likely to be maintain'd long in a Country like ours, where Trade is so absolutely necessary to the very Being as well as the Prosperity of it; and in this Age of the World, if Articles and Matters of Religion should become the only accessible Ways to our Civil Rights.

ber 18. Ten Days after, the Lord Clifford was made Lord (w) High Treasurer: On the 4th of December, following, a Scheme was agreed upon in Council, for keeping the Army in Obedience, and reconciling the People to the Army; by which the King took upon himself the Punishment of Offenders; and the present Keeper of the Seal was very artfully prefer'd from the Difficulty which had ruin'd his Predecessor: And, possibly to give an additional Terror to the (w) Proclamation publish'd upon this Occasion, several Scamens were soon after put to death, for deserting the Service.

In his Majesty's Apology for shutting up the Exchequer, of January the 8th, he had declar'd, That the Restraint should continue no longer than the last Day of December: That Day was now at hand: The Dutch were still unsubdu'd: The growing Revenue was as little able as ever to support the growing Charge: And, as to the French Subsidy, it bore so little Proportion to the extraordinary Expence of their Service, that Marvell takes occasion to say, That the Royal Navy of England serv'd his most Christian Majesty, like so many Privateers, No Purchase, no Pay! There was, therefore, as much Necessity to repeat, as, at first, to perform the Trick: And it was accordingly done, with a Repetition of the old Apology, "That the Continuance of those inevitable Necessities which first enforced his Majesty, contrary to his own Inclinations, to cause a stop to be made of Payment of Moneys, compell'd him to continue the same (x) Stop of Payments till the 1st of May next ensuing." And towards the Conclusion his Majesty was pleas'd to add, "That he did not doubt, but that all his Subjects had such Trust and Confidence in his Justice, that it would take away all Apprehensions of their being in the least defrauded of any thing that was justly due to them."

When the public Faith was thus violated a second time, the Court had still a strong Persuasion that the Ruin of the Dutch was at hand. True it was, that the Court of Spain labour'd in earnest for their Preservation; and that the Emperor and Elector of Brandenburg had enter'd into an Alliance offensive and defensive with them (October 17, N. S.);

(v) His Lordship was to take the Oath in the Court of Chancery; upon which Occasion the new Lord Chancellor was pleas'd to display his Eloquence, and to make his Court to the King, in the following manner:

"My Lord, 'Tis a great Honour, much beyond even the Place itself, that you are chosen to it by this King, who, without Flattery, I may say, is as great a Master in the Knowledge of Men and Things, as this, or any other Age hath produced. And let me say farther, it is not only your Honour, that you are chosen by him, but it is your Safety too, that you have him to serve; with whom no subtil Insinuations of any near him, nor the aspiring Interest of a Favourite, shall ever prevail against those that serve him well. Nor can his Servants fear to be sacrific'd to the Malice, Fury, or Mistake of a more swelling, popular Greatness. A Prince under whom the Unfortunate fall gently. A Prince, in a Word, that, best of all Mankind, deserves the Title of Delicium Humanæ generis."

And upon Mr. Sergeant Thurland's taking the Oath as a Baron of the Exchequer, his Lordship thus took care to secure an Interest in the People.

"In the third Place, let me recommend to you, so to manage the King's Justice and Revenue, as the King may have most Profit, and the Subject least Vexation. Raking for old Debts, the Number of Informations, Projects upon Conscience, I could not find in the eleven Years Experience I have had in this Court, ever to advantage the Crown. But such Proceedings issue for the most Part deliver'd up the King's good Subjects into the Hands of the worst of Men. There is another thing I have observ'd in this Court, that I shall mind you of, which is, When the Court bestows too much to the Clerks and Officers of it; and are too apt to send out Process, when the Money may be raised by other Ways more easy to the People. I do not say, That the King's Duty should be less, or that the strict Course should not be taken, rather than that be: But when you consider, how much the Officers of this Court and the Under Sheriffs get by Process upon small Sums, more than the King's Duty comes to, and upon what sort of People this falls to wit, The Farmer, Husbandman and Clothier in the Country, that is generally the Collector, Constable and Tithingman; and so disturbs the industrious Part of the Nation, you will think it fit to make that the last way, when to other will serve."

(c) Which was to the Effect following:

"That his Majesty having found it necessary during the present War, to raise more Soldiers, and to turn them into Regiments, and dispose of them in several Quarters until there should be Occasion for their Service against the Enemy; and being desirous, that, during their Continuance in their Quarters, no kind of Rudeness or Misdemeanor should be committed by any of his Soldiers to the Grievance or Disturbance of any of his Subjects: doth hereby charge and command all and every the Officers in any Troop or Regiments, that they forthwith repair into their several and respective Quarters, and continue and abide there without promising to depart from thence, unless his Majesty's Licence is that Behold under his Royal Sign Manual, shall be first obtained. That all Officers and Soldiers do take strict care that no Violence nor Injury be offered to any of his Majesty's Subjects, either in their Persons or Estates, nor any kind of Disturbance committed or suffered within the several Quarters, his Majesty requiring all and every his loving Subjects, when, and as often as they shall receive any kind of Injury or Abuse from any of the Soldiers under his Majesty's Pay, forthwith to make their Complaints unto the Officer or Officers, under whom such Soldiers shall serve; which Officer upon such Complaint made, shall immediately relieve the Complainant, or otherwise, wherein the Case shall require, deliver up the Offender to the Civil Magistrate, to be proceeded against according to Law. And if upon such Complaint made, the Complainant shall not find a present Satisfaction and Redress, or a Delivery of the Offender as aforesaid; that then they cause Information thereof to be given to some Justice of the Peace, who shall take the same upon Oath, and certify it into one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State; to the End the same may be brought before his Majesty, who will graciously vouchsafe to hear the Matter humbly, and not only give the Petitioner a full and ample Relief, but likewise severely punish the Officer who shall be found to have been negligent in his Duty, or shall suffer any just Complaint to pass without a due and timely Redress.

Besides, the Duke of Luxemburg, who had the Command of the French Army in the Dutch Territories, waited only for the usual Frosts to set in, for an Opportunity to pass over the Ice, with a Design to make himself Master of the Hague, Leyden, and even Amsterdam itself. Accordingly, no sooner did it appear that all was fast, and the Communication open, than he set out from Utrecht, with about 14,000 (Bishop Barnet says 16,000) of his best Troops; full of Confidence, that this one sudden and unexpected Blow would put an End to the War: But scarce had he turn'd his Back on Utrecht, before the Weather chang'd; a Thaw came on, and all his ideal Trophies melted away with the Ice, on which they were rais'd. To proceed was impossible; to return was little less: Causeways indeed there were, which afforded a Passage for Travellers; but no Convenience for an Army: These were, besides, under the Awe of a Fort, furnish'd with Cannon, and garrison'd with two Regiments, which it was certain Destruction to approach. What a Situation for a Marshal of France, who had the Day before promis'd himself the total Reduction of the Seven Provinces! But, almost, before he could reflect on his Danger, he was deliver'd from it: The Commander of the Fort no sooner saw the French Engins, than he gave all for lost, and made the best of his way off; leaving the Enemy equally astonish'd at his infamous Cowardice, and their own unparalleled good Fortune.

In this Interval two extraordinary Embassadors arriv'd in London from Sweden, with Instructions to persuade his Majesty to entertain Overtures of Peace, to accept of their Master's Mediation therein, to assign a Place for the Treaty, and to admit of a Cessation of Arms. To the two first of these Points his Majesty thought himself at liberty to agree; but for an Answer to the two last, he refer'd the Embassadors to what should be concert'd between him and the most Christian King: Of whom it appears we stood in some Awe; for the Elector of Brandenburg having likewise sent hither a Minister, probably on a more exceptionable (z) Errand, together with his Majesty's Answer to his Memorial and his Master's Letter, Notice was given him, "That his Majesty would be glad he would depart with it; since, as Affairs stood, there was no Use of his continuing longer here: And that his Majesty conceiv'd, his Enemies might receive Benefit by it, as well as his Friends Umbrage."

From England, the Swedish Embassadors went over to Holland, with the same Propositions: And, tho' they had Reason to complain of their Reception at first, before the End of the Year, inform'd our Ministers, that they found a reasonable Disposition in the States towards a Treaty; that their Mediation was accepted; that Dunkirk, nam'd by England for the Place of Negotiation, was not refus'd; but that, for Decency's sake, they must communicate it to their Allies; that, as to the Suspension of Arms, they did not seem ready to come into it, but had not refus'd it, objecting only the Prejudice they should receive by it, but that they would communicate that Point also to their Principals.

But notwithstanding all the sanguine Expectations of our Ministers, with respect to the Fate of Holland, and the indecent Satisfaction they publicly testify'd at every Disaster which befall the Prince of Orange, they seem, at this time, to have been pretty near their Wits-end: For, if they were cautious of giving Umbrage to France, they were, likewise, uneasy at the Conduct of Spain: From endeavouring to make them afraid of us, we began to be afraid of them: It appear'd by every Step they had taken in behalf of the Dutch, that, rather than suffer them to be swallow'd up, they would come to an open Breach with France; and it was natural to think, that the Rupture would by degrees extend to us, at the Expence not only of all our Merchants Effects in the several Spanish Ports, but attend'd with the insupportable Loss of the whole Spanish Trade.

The Prince of Orange, assist'd by all the Force which the Count de Montrevy could raise, had made an unsuccessful Attempt upon Charleroy, one of the Places ceded to France by the Treaty of Aix, and afterwards fell upon Binche, another of the said Places; which he dismantled. Upon this Occasion, France made very lively Representations to the Court of Madrid, and called upon us to support them. This we could not refuse to do; but then it was in such a manner, as shew'd we were more inclin'd to oblige than exasperate; by offering his Majesty's good Offices to make up the Breach: Sir William Godolphin

A. D. 1672.

(z) Lord Arlington informs Sir Bernard Gascoyer, that it was of so ambiguous a Nature, that they could not tell what to make of it.

A. D. 1672. Godolphin being, at the same time, inform'd of the Sveedish Mediation, and required to contribute all his utmost Endeavours, at that Court, towards a Peace; upon whose Resolution, it was suppos'd, the Hollanders would much depend.

But even the Apprehension of a Rupture with Spain, however detrimental to our Commerce, did not create so much Perplexity in the Cabinet, as the Thoughts of a Session of Parliament. So long a Recess, while such a Variety of pernicious Measures had been in pursuit, had very much sharpen'd the Minds of all Men: And it was scarce conceivable, that the violent Humours, which had put the Nation into such a Ferment, should not shew themselves in the House of Commons. The Necessity, however, that was pretended for the shutting up the Exchequer, was now become real: And the Cabal were oblig'd to put themselves upon their Country, tho' they could not help being in pain for the Issue.

The new Lord Chancellor, indeed, affected in all things to be above Apprehension: As his Undertakings were great, his Expedients were bold, his Declarations open, and his whole Demeanour such, as if he took it for granted, that he could awe the two Houses into an Approbation of all his past, and a Submission to all his future, Proceedings.

In particular, during the Recess, several Vacancies had occurred in the House of Commons, by the Deaths of some Members, and the Promotion of others to the House of Peers; and these his Lordship took upon him to get supply'd, by causing the Writs for the new Elections to issue, without staying for the Meeting of the Parliament, or having the Speaker's Warrant, as was usual: By which he endeavour'd to establish a Precedent, that, by proper Management, would have put all the Elections of the Kingdom in the Power of the Crown, and render'd the House of Commons, by one Master-stroke, what they may one day gradually become, the Creatures of a Minister, and a Court of Assistants to the Treasury.

His Lordship had, it seems, an immediate Purpose of his own to serve, by this daring Expedient, as well as the common Cause: Colonel Strangerways had a better Interest in Dorsetshire, where both their Estates lay, than he; and his Lordship had no Way to carry the Elections in that County against him, but this; for the Writs being issued thus irregularly, his own Creatures had the sole Advantage of the Secret; and the Colonel was routed, before he expected, or was prepar'd for, a Charge.

What was then the Colonel's peculiar Case, it was plain, might in time be every body's. The Western Gentlemen, therefore, were no longer assur'd of the Fact, than they espous'd his Quarrel, and determin'd to abide by their Privileges.

When the House met, on February the 24th, they had no Speaker: It had been discover'd, that Sir Edward Turner, who had held the Chair for so many Sessions, had taken a small Present from the East-India Company; which had so far lessen'd him in the Opinion of the House, and lost him so much of his Credit and Authority, that it was thought advisable to remove him, which was done by making him Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer. The Chair was, therefore, to be fill'd before the House could proceed to Business: Sir Job Charlton was pitch'd upon, on the Merit of having been recommended by the Court; and when he had received his Majesty's Approbation, and accepted the Office in form, in answer to a Speech of Thanks, the Chancellor took occasion to express himself as follows:

"His Majesty doth well accept of all those dutiful and affectionate Expressions in which you have delivered your Submission to his Royal Pleasure; and looks upon it as a good Omen to his Affairs, and as an Evidence, that the House of Commons have still the same Heart, that have chosen such a Month. The Conjunction of Time, and the King and Kingdoms Affairs, require such a House of Commons, such a Speaker; for, with Reverence to the Holy Scripture, upon this Occasion, the King may say, He that is not with me is against me; for he that doth not now put his Hand and Heart to support the King, in the common Cause of this Kingdom, can hardly ever hope for such another Opportunity, or find a Time to make Satisfaction for the Omission of this."

This Ceremony being over, his Majesty proceeded to open the Business of the Session with a Speech, in which are the following remarkable Particulars:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,
"I am glad to see you here this Day; I would have called you together sooner, but that I was willing to ease you and the Country, till there was an absolute Necessity. Since you were last here, I have been forc'd to a most important, necessary and expensive War; and I make no doubt but you will give me suitable and effectual Assistance to go through with it.
"You will find the last Supply you gave me did not answer the Expectation for the End you gave it, the Payment of my Debts. Therefore I must in the next Place recommend them again to your especial Care.

"Some few Days before I declared the War, I put forth my Declaration for Indulgence to Dissenters, and have hitherto found a good Effect of it, by securing Peace at home, when I had War abroad.
"There is one Part in it that hath been subject to Misconstruction, which is that concerning the Papists; as if more Liberty were granted them, than to the other Reculants, when it is plain there is less.

"Having said this, I shall take it very ill to receive Contradiction in what I have done. And I will deal plainly with you, I am resolv'd to stick to my Declaration.
"There is one Jealousy more that is maliciously spread abroad, and yet so weak and frivolous, that I once thought it not of Moment

Miscellaneous
 Aulica. P. 95.

According to Lord Arlington, his Majesty never spoke better, or more to the Applause of those that heard him. The Lord Chancellor (who was next to display his Talent, and who was resolv'd to let his Royal Master see, that how far soever He was inclin'd to go, his Lordship had the Spirit to follow him) open'd his Harangue with Words to the like Effect:

Lord Council-for Shaftes-bury's Speech.

" The King hath spoken so fully, so ex" cellently well, and so like himself, that " you are not to expect much from me.
 " There is not a Word in his Speech that
 " hath not its full Weight: And, I dare
 " with Assurance say, will have its Effect
 " with you."

His Lordship then proceeding in his Majesty's Footsteps, asserted that the two Houses had been call'd together, if the King had not been resolv'd to give the People as much Respite from the Payment of Taxes, as the Necessity of his Affairs would permit. He then made a Transition to the desperate Rumours which had prevail'd; and which, according to him their meeting that Day prov'd to be malicious and false. The War was his Lordship's next Topic; he talk'd over the Pictures and Medals, Breaches of Treaties in the Surinam and East India Business, and the Height of Insolence the Dutch had shewn us, by not only denying the Honour and Right of the Flag, but disputing our Title to it in all the Courts of Christendom; and making great Offers to the French King, if he would stand by them against us; adding, " But the " most Christian King too well remember'd
 " what they did at Munster, contrary to so
 " many Treaties and solemn Engagements,
 " and how dangerous a Neighbourhood they " were to all Crowned Heads."

And again, " Both Kings knowing their " Interest, resolv'd to join against them; who " were the common Enemies to all Monar-
 " chies, and I may say especially to ours,
 " their only Competitor for Trade and " Power at Sea, and who only stand in their " way to an Universal Empire, as great as " Rome. This the States understood so well,
 " and had swallow'd so deep, that, under
 " all their present Distress and Danger, they " are so intoxicated with that vast Ambition,
 " that they slight a Treaty, and refuse a " Cessation. All this, you and the whole " Nation saw before the last War; but it " could not then be so well timed or our " Alliances so well made. But you judg'd

 " aright, That at any rate, Deianda est Car" thago; that Government was to be brought " down. And therefore the King may well " say to you, It is your War! He took his " Measures from you, and they were just and " right ones: And he expects a suitable Af" filiance to so necessary and expensive an " Action, which he has hitherto maintain'd
 " at his own Charge, and was unwilling
 " either to trouble you, or burden the Coun" try, until it came to an inevitable Necessi" ty. And his Majesty commands me to " tell you, that unless it be a certain Sum,
 " and speedily rais'd, it can never answer
 " the Occasion.

A.D. 1672-3.

" My Lords and Gentlemen, Reputation
 " is the great Support of War or Peace.
 " This War had never begun, nor had the " States ever slighted the King, or ever re" fused him the Satisfaction, neither had
 " this War continu'd to this Day, or substi-
 " ted now, but that the States were deceiv'd
 " in their Measures, and apprehended that " his Majesty, in that great Want of Mo" ney, must sit down under many Affronts,
 " and was not able to begin or carry on a " War. Nay, at this Day the States sup" port themselves amongst their People by
 " this only Fallhood, *That they are assured
 " of the Temper of England, and of the Par" liament, and that you will supply the " King in this War; and that if they can " hold out till your Meeting, they will have
 " new Life, and take new Measures.* There " are lately taken two of their principal
 " Agents with their Credentials and Instruc" tions, to this Purpose, who are now in " the Tower, and shall be proceeded against
 " according to the Law of Nations. But the " King is sufficiently assured of his People;
 " knows you better, and can never doubt
 " his Parliament. This had not been men-
 " tion'd, but to shew you of what Import" ance the Frankness and Seasonableness of " this Supply is, as well as the Falseness of it.
 " Let me say, the King has brought the States
 " to that Condition, that your hearty Junc" tion, at this time, in supplying his Ma" jesty, will make them never more formid" able to Kings, or dangerous to England.
 " And if after this you suffer them to get " up, let this be remember'd: *The States of " Holland are England's eternal Enemy, both
 " by Interest and Inclination.* In the next " place, to the Supply for carrying on the " War, his Majesty recommends to you the " taking care of his Debts. What you gave
 " the last Session did not near answer your own
 " Expectation. Besides, another considerable
 " Aid you design'd his Majesty, was unfor" tunately lost in the Birth, so that the King
 " was forc'd, for the carrying on his Affairs,
 " much against his Will, to put a Stop to
 " the Payments out of the Exchequer. He " saw the Pressures upon himself, and grow" ing Inconveniences to his People by great " Interest; and the Difference, through all
 " his Business, between ready Money, and " Orders. This gave the King the Necessity " of that Proceeding; to make use of his own Revenue, which hath been of so great Effect in this War. But tho' he hath put a Stop to the Trade and Gain of the Bankers, yet he would be unwilling to ruin them, and oppress to many Families as are concern'd in those Debts: Besides, it were too disproportionable a Burden upon many of his good Subjects. But neither the Bankers, nor they, have Reason to complain, if you now take them into your Care, and they have paid them what was due to them, when the Stop was made, with six per Cent. Interest from that time. The King is very much concern'd both in Honour and Interest, to see this done. And yet he desires you not to mis-time it; but that it may have only the second Place, and that you will first settle, what you intend about the Supply."

As to the Declaration, his Lordship was pleas'd to say, the King had sufficiently justified it by the time it was publish'd in, and the Effects he hath had from it; and might have done it more from the Agreeableness of it to his own natural Disposition, which no good Englishman can with other than it was. That he loved not Blood or rigorous Severities; but where mild or gentle Ways might be used by a wise Prince, he was certain to chuse them. That the Church of England and all good Protestants had Reason to rejoice in such a Head, and such a Defender. That his Majesty did declare his Care and Concerns for the Church, and would maintain them in all their Rights and Privileges, equal, if not beyond any of his Predecessors. That he was born and bred up in it. That it was what his Father died for. That all knew how great Temptations and Offers he resisted abroad, and when he was in his lowest Condition. That he thought it the Honour of his Reign, that he had been the Restorer of the Church. That he would ever maintain it, and hoped to leave it to Posterity in greater Lustre, and upon surer Grounds than our Ancestors ever saw it.

His Lordship then proceeded thus:

"There is one thing more, that I am commanded to speak to you of, which is the Jealousy that hath been foolishly spread abroad, of the Forces the King hath rais'd in this War. Wherein the King hath open'd himself freely to you, and confess'd the Fault of the other hand. For if this last Summer had not prov'd a Miracle of Storms and Tempests, such as secur'd the East India Fleet, and protect'd their Sea-Coast from a Descent, nothing but the true Reason, Want of Money, could have justified the Defect in the Number of our Forces. 'Tis that his Majesty is providing for against the next Spring, having given out Orders for raising of seven or eight Regiments more of Foot, under the Command of Persons of the greatest Fortunes and Quality. And I am earnestly to recommend to you, that, in your Supplies, you will take into your Consideration on this necessary Addition of Charges."

The Residue of the Speech, for there was more of it, consisting chiefly of rhetorical Flourishes, had other strange Passages: As That the King had made the Councils of his Parliament the Foundations of all his Proceedings: That he had endeavour'd, in Tenderships to his People, to support even foreign Wars upon his own Revenue and Credit: And that it was as impossible for him to part with that Parliament, as it was for them to depart from their Loyalty, Affection, and dutiful Behaviour.

His Lordship's Eloquence did not, however, prove so irresistible as he expected: His Antagonist Colonel Strangways had already possess'd the House of Commons with such a Concern for their Privileges, that they resolv'd to postpone the Consideration of the Speech, till they were first vindicated. Accordingly, the new Speaker was scarce in the Chair, before a Member, standing up, and looking about him, said, he observ'd several new Faces in the House, and did not remember that, before their last Rising, the House had been mov'd for the filling so many Places; so he doubted the Regularity of the Sitting of those Persons, and mov'd their Titles might be examin'd: Another Member, seconding, said, he supposed those Gentlemen would have the Modesty to withdraw, while their Case was under Debate, and not wait for the Order of the House. So this whole (a) Set of new Elects, tho' mostly Loyalists, sh'd out, and came in no more upon that Choice. For, although it was shewn, such Writs had formerly issued, during such Prorogations, yet the late Practice being otherwise, and the Current strong that way, and the Court-party not able to hinder, all the Elections, on that foot, were voted irregular, and null; and, in consequence, new Writs were issued.

The Debates upon this Occasion, it seems, were warm and angry; but attended with Miscel. Ant. no Censure; possibly because the King had, p. 98. in a manner, taken the Affair upon himself, by declaring, That the Lord Chancellor had issued these Writs by his Direction; he having seen Precedents for it: Adding, if any Scruples or Doubts should arise about it, he left it to the House to debate, as soon as they could.

But, however rough the Proceedings of this Day were, nothing could have a more smooth and easy Passage than the Vote of the next; when the House, taking his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions into Consideration, (for, tho' they would not wholly desert the King, they would not avowedly countenance the War) in two Hours time, unanimously resolv'd, That a Supply be given to his Majesty of Eighteen Months Assesment, according to the Proportion of the last Royal Aid, not exceeding Seventy thousand Pounds a Month; amounting, in the Whole, to

(a) Of these, Sir Francis North, then Solicitor General, and afterwards Land Keeper was one. He did not approve, we are told by his Brother, in his Life, of this speaking Novelty with the Parliament, and was afraid of what happened; but conform to him.

A Supply of 1,260,000*l.* granted.

A. D. 1672-3.

(b) 1,260,000 l. or, in bon François, as Lord Arlington chose to represent it to Sir Bernard Gascoyne, Sixteen Millions. How much our Ministers plumb'd themselves on this Day's Success may be gather'd from the Expressions which immediately follow this Calculation a la François, of his Lordship's, which were these: " Thus you see, how a few Hours have blasted all our Enemies vain Hopes of seeing the War disown'd by a Parliament, and his Majesty oblig'd to make a dishonourable Peace, separate from France."

Tempe of the Siege.

But, it seems, they triumph'd before they had gain'd the Victory: The Country-party was now become the Majority: The Devotees were in pain for the Church; the Patriots for the State; the Intriguers affect'd to sympathise with Both: Some were for making Conditions for the Nation; some for themselves: All had their Views, all were uneasy: And, tho' the Supply was voted, much was to be done, before it could take effect: It was, indeed, only display'd before his Majesty, to give him Credit and Countenance; while the House proceeded to the Redress of Grievances; and to humble those aspiring Ministers, who had undertaken to make his Majesty a great King, by making him absolute Master of the Laws and Liberties of their Country.

Declaration of Indulgence taken into Consideration.

The Declaration of Indulgence was what had given the most Offence, and therefore was first taken into Consideration: Three Days after the Supply had been voted, it was order'd to be read in form; and gave rise to a long and solemn Debate, in the Conclusion of which it was resolv'd, That penal Statutes in Matters ecclesiastical cannot be suspend'd but by Act of Parliament. Instead, therefore, of being aw'd by the high Words in the King's Speech from contradicting his Majesty's Will, they openly oppos'd it, and determin'd to make him sensible, That his Office was to execute, not to dispense with, the Laws. A dangerous Controversy seem'd to be now impending between the King and the Commons: The Vote and the Speech were utterly irreconcilable: A Compromise was impracticable: There was a Necessity that one Party should give way, and the Nation was extremely attentive to the Issue.

Vote against the Declaration.

In the very Entrance of it, the new Speaker, Charlton, fell sick, (as some insinuate, of his Poil) and the House adjourn'd for Three Days, in expectation of his Recovery: But finding his Indisposition continue, and having the King's Leave to chuse another, they appointed Mr. Edward Seymour in his room.

Mr. E. Seymour chosen Speaker.

And now it was that the Spirit of Opposition grew abundantly fiercer than ever. It was openly declar'd, That Redress of Grievances should go hand-in-hand with the Supply: And an Address was order'd against the Declaration of Indulgence. Bishop Burnet affirms, that an Endeavour was made to divert this, by setting them on to enquire into the issuing out of the Writs: And that the Court seem'd willing, that the Storm should break on Lord Shaftsbury, and would have gladly compounded the Matter, by making him the Sacrifice; which, according to his Lordship, he perceiv'd, and so resolv'd to change Sides by the first Opportunity.

A. D. 1672-3.

Vol. 1. p. 347.

However this may be, the Address was carry'd, and on the 19th of February presented to the King at the Banqueting-house. Tho' firm, it was respectful: It contain'd hearty Thanks for the King's gracious Promises and Assurances in favour of the true reform'd Protestant Religion, Liberty, and Property: It contain'd the very Words of the Vote; and concluded with an humble Request, That the Laws might have their free Course, until it should be otherwise provided by Act of Parliament.

Address against the Declaration.

The King reply'd, their Address was of Importance, and he would give them an Answer in Writing: Accordingly four Days after, it came, and import'd,

" That his Majesty was much troubled that that Declaration, which he put out for Ends so necessary to the Quiet of this Kingdom, especially in that Conjunction, should prove the Cause of Disquiet, and give Occasion to the questioning of his Power in Ecclesiasticals, which he finds not done in the Reigns of any of his Ancestors. He was sure he never had Thoughts of using it otherwise, than as it hath been entrusted in him, to the Peace and Establishment of the Church of England, and the Ease of all his Subjects in general: Neither did he pretend to suspend any Laws, wherein the Properties, Rights or Liberties of any of his Subjects are concern'd, nor to alter any thing in the establish'd Doctrine or Discipline of the Church of England. But his only Design in this was to take off the Penalties the Statutes inflict upon the Dissenters, and which he believ'd, when well consider'd of, they themselves would not wish executed according to the Rigour and Letter of the Law. Neither hath he done this with any Thought of avoiding or precluding the Advice of his Parliament; and if any Bill shall be offer'd him, which should appear more proper to attain the aforesaid Ends, and secure the Peace of the Church and Kingdom, when tender'd in due Manner to him, he would shew how readily he would concur

The King's Answer.

[8 Upon this Matter of the Supply, Bishop Burnet writes as follows:

" The Court desir'd at least 1,200,000 l. for that Sum was necessary to the carrying on the War. The great Body of those who oppos'd the Court had resolv'd to give only 500,000 l. which was enough to procure a Peace, but not continue the War. Garraway and Lee had led the Opposition of the Court all this Session in the House of Commons. [The Supply was granted the third Day of the Session, and Wife Goddard had been at the Head of the Opposition long before.] So they were thought the properer to name the Sum. Above eighty of the chief of that Party had met over Night, and had agreed to name 600,000 l. But Garraway nam'd 1,100,000 l. and was seconded in it by Lee. So this Surprize gain'd that great Sum, which enabled the Court to carry on the War.—They had good Rewards from the Court, and yet continu'd sitting on the other Side.—I never knew a thing of this Nature carry'd on so suddenly, and so artificially in the House of Commons, as this was, to the great Contentment of the Dutch, who rely'd on the Parliament, and did not doubt, but that a Peace with England would be procur'd by their Interposition."

A.D. 1671. concur in all ways, that should appear good for the Good of the Kingdom."

The Commons immediately voted their Thanks; which they seem'd to be surpriz'd into: For, afterwards, they took the Message again into Consideration, and propos'd a second Address; in which, after more Thanks, they proceeded to say, "That upon a serious Consideration thereof, they found, that the said Answer was not sufficient to clear the Apprehensions which might justly remain in the Minds of the People, by his Majesty's having claim'd a Power to suspend Penal Statutes in Matters Ecclesiastical; and which his Majesty did still seem to assert in the said Answer, to be entitled in the Crown, and never question'd in any of the Reigns of your Ancestors: Wherein they humbly conceive, That his Majesty had been much misinform'd, since no such Power had been ever claim'd, or exercis'd by any of his Majesty's Predecessors: And, if it should be admitted, might tend to the interrupting the free Course of the Laws, and altering the Legislative Power, which had always been acknowledg'd to reside in his Majesty, and his two Houses of Parliament. That, therefore, with unanimous Consent, they were become again most humble Suitors to his Sacred Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to give them a full and satisfactory Answer to their Petition and Address; and that his Majesty would take such effectual Order, That the Proceedings in this Matter might not, for the future, be drawn into Consequence, or Example."

Upon the Receipt of this second Address, the King demur'd upon his Answer as before; and, in the mean time, the House took yet other Steps, which increas'd the Alarm at Court, and with it the Confusion.

The King appear'd shock'd at the Proceedings of the Commons; and irresolute, whether to give them Satisfaction, or to let them at Defiance. The very Thought of a Compliance struck his Ministers with Terror; for to retract imply'd an Acknowledgment of Misdemeanours; Misdemeanours call'd for Censures, if not Punishments; and, tho' the King's Name and Power had been made use of, his Advisers only were answerable for the Abuse. Instead of his Majesty's Difficulties, therefore, they thought only of their own; and, provided he could be induced to screen them, they were careless how much he expos'd himself. All were equally criminal, all were equally obnoxious, all equally fought their own Ends; but as they were at variance among themselves, they were not all unanimous as to the Means. According to Burnet's Account, Buckingham,

The Ministers alarm'd.

Lauderdale, and Clifford, press'd the King to stand his Ground: Lauderdale was for bringing up the Scottish Army, to secure Newcastle; Buckingham, the Langsh, to force the Members out of both Houses who made the Opposition; and Clifford was express, that the People now saw thro' the King's Designs; and, therefore, he must resolve to make himself Master at once, or be for ever subject to much Jealousy and Contempt. But Shaftsbury and Arlington, says the same (c) Prelate, press'd the King, on the other hand, to give the Parliament full Content; and that they undertook to procure him Money for carrying on the War; urging, that, if he was successful in that, he might easily recover what he must in this Extremity part with. But the Money was already voted; all that remain'd was, to carry the Bill thro' the House: And, if Shaftsbury was prepar'd to (d) pass, with the first Opportunity, as had been before asserted by the Bishop, it was every way his Interest to push the King to Extremities; for, if it appear'd his Majesty was able to maintain his Declaration, it would strengthen his Lordship's Credit with him, for having advis'd it; if it appear'd otherwise, there would be the more Merit in his Conversion on one side, and the greater Weight of his Vengeance on the other. Burnet indeed affirms, that, while he made a bale, complying Speech, in favour of the Court and the War, he was in a secret Engagement with the other Party. And Mr. North, in his Essays, (e) veryly believes, "That, from the very Restoration of the Royal Family, while he was in Office, especially in conjunction with Clifford, he was in close League with the most desperate of the King's Enemies, and had projected a Scheme, which he wrought steadily upon, for destroying the King, the Duke of York, Royal Family, and probably the monarchic Government of England."

Truth seems to be as much assur'd of her Nakedness, as our First Parents after their Fall, and as industrious to hide herself. Father Orlean is positive the Earl was sincere in his Endeavours to render the King absolute; and that he deserted his Majesty, because his Majesty had not Firmness enough to prosecute his own Views, or to protect those who had oppos'd them. This, Mr. North not only contradicts, as above, but censures Orlean as a superficial Writer, for asserting it. We have here Opinion against Opinion; and we are oblig'd to the last of these Authors, at least, for leaving the Reader free to decide as he pleases: He has, however, mention'd a Fact, that very much weakens

That of Lord Shaftsbury is particular.

Vol. II. p. 345.

(c) In another Place he fixes the Matter thus:

The Ministry was all broke to Pieces. The Duke of Buckingham was almost hated by all, as he hated all the rest. But he went so intirely into all their Designs, that the King consider'd him, and enterlov'd or fear'd him so much, that he had a deep Root with him. Lord Clifford stuck firm to the Duke, and was leas'd with the Design of bringing in Popery, even to Extremity. It was believ'd, if the Design had succeeded, he had agreed with his Wife, to take Orders, and to aspire to a Cardinal's Hat. He grew violent, and could scarce speak with Presence of the Church of England and the Clergy. The Earl of Arlington thought that the Design was now lost, and that it was necessary for the King to make up with his People in the best manner he could: The Earl of Shaftsbury was resolv'd to serve himself on my Terms. Vol. I. p. 346.

(d) He was afterwards called Lord Shaftsbury, by the Way of those Times.

(e) It is fit the Reader should know that the great Design of Mr. North's Works, as he declares himself, is to furnish Libertin History, and that no Critic was ever more levere on such vague Expressions, as it seem'd, it was thought, and the like, than He.

A. D. 1672-3 weakens his own; which is, that most of the Members brought in by the Chancellor's irregular Writs, Sir Francis North himself being one, were Loyalists; which would scarce have been the Case, if the Chancellor had then been upon Terms with those in the Opposition, or engag'd in a Design to destroy the King and Monarchy. But Mr. North further intimates, that, before the Opening of the Session, he set his Face against the House of Commons; that he utter'd desperate bigb Flights against them, at Court; that he made no scruple to declare openly, that he did not understand by what Reason or Right Men should sit and vote themselves Privileges; and that, when all the Discourse was of the Chancellor's being (f) impeach'd, he began his new Game of turning in. It is pretended, indeed, that he put the King on doing bad things, to render him odious; that he treated the Commons with Contempt, to make the Breach wider, &c. But surely these Experiments were rather of too dangerous a Nature for a Politician, especially such a one as Lord Shaftsbury, to meddle with: And if he had acted as he did, in concert with the opposing Members, the very Talk of an Impeachment against him had never prevail'd. As Mahomet taught there was but one God, and he was that God's Prophet; so Shaftsbury push'd only to have but one King, and to be himself his sole Minister, or rather Master; but when he apprehended the King to be yielding, and saw the Commons driving, he thought it advisable to get out of the way as fast as possible; which he did in a Manner that has no Precedent in History, as we shall see in its due Place.

While the Fate of the Declaration was yet undetermin'd, the Commons follow'd their Blow; by bringing in a Qualifying-Bill, which made it essential "That all Persons bearing any Office, or Place of Trust or Profit, should take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, in public and open Court; and should also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, according to the Usage of the Church of England, in some Parish-Church, on some Lord's-Day, immediately after Divine Service and Sermon; and deliver a Certificate of having so receiv'd the Sacrament, under the Hands of the respective Minister and Church-Wardens, prov'd by two credible Witnesses upon Oath, and put upon Record in Court: And that all Persons taking the said Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance should likewise make and subscribe this following Declaration;

I A. B. do declare, that I do believe there is not any Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, at, or after the Consecration thereof, by any Person whatever."

This was call'd the Test-Act; and was calculated not only to throw all Papists out of Office, but to concenter all Employments in those who profess'd the establish'd Religion of their Country: Eborard insinuates, it was the Contrivance of Shaftsbury; with a View to distress the Duke and his Friends: 'Tis certain he promoted it with great Zeal, when it came before the Lords; and that Lord Clifford, as itenuously, endeavour'd, though in vain, to get it set aside, before it could find its Way thither.

Till this Session, the Reader must remember, the Protestant Dissenters had been treated by their elder Brethren of the Church, with rather more Severity and Malignity than the Papists: But now, a common Sense of their common Danger had brought them into some Charity with each other: The Dissenters had affected to speak of the Indulgence with as much Bitterness, as if the Danger it was accompanied with, more than counterbalanced the Ease: And Mr. Alderman Lovv, in particular, one of the City Members, took occasion to declare in the House, That he had rather be still depriv'd of his desired Liberty, than have it in a Way that would prove so detrimental to the Nation.

In order, therefore, to fix a new Fire-brand between the Tails of these two Foxes, Lord Clifford procur'd a Motion to be made, That some Favour might be shewn to Protestant Dissenters; and that their Meetings might

The Dissenters join with the Church against Popery.

Barnet, Eborard.

(f) Concerning this, Obituary tells the following strange story.

One of the most active Members of the House of Commons, Sir Robert Howard, was for several Years in an Impeachment. The Lord Chancellor had good Intelligence of every Step taken against him, and knew well how to improve it. He was inform'd, that there was a great Club to be such a Night at a certain Tavern near Charing-Cross, where 70 or 80 Members of Parliament were to meet, and to come to a Determination on the Affairs of the Impeachment. The Lord Chancellor employ'd a Friend of his to go to that Tavern and procure a Room next to that where the Meeting was to be. The Gentleman gave the Drawers a Guinea, and the Room was kept for him. At the Hour appointed the Party went thither in a Hackney Chair, and his Friend was there ready to show him up into the Room he had taken. He then left him, and the Lord Chancellor heard Sir Robert talk to the Members of the intended Impeachment; and having finish'd himself of their Intention, he call'd for the Drawers and made him whisper Sir Robert Howard, that a Gentleman would speak with him in the next Room: Sir Robert came immediately, and, to his great Surprise, found the Lord Chancellor, who receiv'd him with a very good Countenance, and taking no Notice of what was concerning against him, told him, He was as much surpris'd that he should see him living in such a Place, as that he should see him in any thing else then, or at any other Time, he should see ever find him ready. Sir Robert, agreeably pleas'd and surpris'd with this good Office, unsought for, after having paid the Debt his Company upon it, he said, *I will say freely even to you, my Lord, I have by no Means enjoy'd this Favour at your Hands in the contrary, I am now the main Contrivor and Actor in an Impeachment against you; but it is not too late to undo all that has been done, and if your Lordship will but have Patience to stay here but a Quarter of an Hour, you shall have been I will put an End to it. The Lord Chancellor thank'd him very graciously, and Sir Robert returning to his Company, receiv'd the Discourse against the Lord Chancellor with greater Vehemence than before, entering into the Particulars of the Charge, and aggravating them, to the great Mortification of the Earl: But at last, he in the Close made ample Amends for all, telling the Assembly, *That truly the Crimes were of a high Nature and dangerous; but he did not see what Effect such a Charge could have without Proof; and he must own he had not heard any tolerable Proof for any one of the Articles; and for some of them not so much as common Fame. That the Lord Chancellor was a Man of great Abilities and Integrity, and as he would soon discover the Weakness of the Charge against him, so he had Friends enough to have it rejected, and he did believe the House of Commons would never be brought to pass it. The Members finding how it was like to go, and that Sir Robert had left them, went away one after another, without saying a Word, and Sir Robert Howard enjoy'd many Years, the Reward of his Management, the Office of Justice. It is certain he was made Justice July the next following.

A. D. 1678. might be allow'd: But the Snare was discover'd, and avoided; Mr. Love again interposing with a Counter-Motion, That an effectual Security might be found out against Papery; and that nothing might interpose, till that was done: The whole Party declar'd themselves to be of the same Sentiments; and the Champions for the Church then thought their Behaviour upon this Occasion for meritorious, that they brought in a Bill (g), namine contradicente, to relieve them in Spirituals; which contain'd a tacit Acknowledgment, that different Modes of public Worship, with an Exclusion to the Pope's Supremacy, had no Tendency to create Seditions, and that all the rigorous Laws they had hitherto let loose against them were groundless and unjust.

The King brings the Declaration before the House of Lords.

The Court was, by this Time, furnish'd with an Expedient relating to the Declaration, which was for his Majesty to demand the Advice of the Lords, with a View to obtain the Support of that House, and to ratify what he had done by their Countenance and Authority; which to us, at this Distance, seems extremely strange; since it was known the Commons were determin'd not to proceed with the Supply, unless the said Declaration was recall'd: And it was scarce to be presum'd that those who had the Spirit to contradict the King, after he had in Person told them he should take it ill, would have been terrify'd out of their Money, by any Menaces from the Lords.

Mr. Ecard, indeed, has furnish'd us with a (b) Memoir from the MS. of Sir Joseph Tytle, which talks of a Speech of Lord Clifford's for the establishing a perpetual Fund, in order to advance the Prerogative, and render Parliaments inconsiderable. But Money-Matters do not come properly before the House of Lords, and any Attempt of that Nature, must immediately have put the whole Nation in a Flame. Rash that Minister always was, and desperate he was now become. He saw the Crisis was at once delicate and dangerous: He saw his Web on the Point of being unravell'd: He was more dispos'd to seize than sollicit: There was an Army at hand under the Command of Schwartzenberg, a foreign Mercenary, Fitzgerald an Irish Catholic, and many other Officers under the same Disqualification: And, therefore, it may be fairly presum'd, that it was not his Fault, that all things were not thrown into Confusion.

His Majesty, on this special Occasion, was induc'd to make his Application to the Lords in Person; which he did in the following Terms:

My Lords,

"You know that at the Opening of this Session, I spoke here to your Satisfaction; it hath, notwithstanding, begotten a greater Disquiet in the House of Commons, than I could imagine. I have receiv'd an Address from them, which I looked not for, and made them an Answer which ought to have contented them; but, on the contrary, they have made such a Reply, of such a Nature, that I cannot think fit to proceed any further in this Matter without your Advice.

His Speech on that Occasion.

"I have commanded my Lord Chancellor to acquaint you with all the Transactions wherein you will find me and yourselves highly concern'd. I am sensible of what relates to myself; and I assure you, my Lords, I am not less for your Privilege, and the Honour of this House."

It appears this Speech was taken into Consideration on the Spot, and both his Majesty and

(g) The Heads of it were as follow:

1. That Ease shall be given to his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, Dissenters in Matters of Religion, who shall subscribe the Articles of the Doctrine of the Church of England, and shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. 2. That the said Protestant-Subjects be eas'd from all Pains and Penalties for not coming to Church. 3. That the Clause in the late Act of Uniformity for declaring the Assent and Consent, be taken away by this Bill. 4. That the said Protestant Subjects be eas'd from all Pains and Penalties for meeting together for Performance of any religious Exercise. 5. That every Teacher shall first give Notice of the Place where he intends his Meeting, to the respective Quarter-Sessions; where in open Court he shall first make such Subscription, and take such Oaths as aforesaid, and receive from thence a Certificate thereof, where all such Proceedings shall remain upon Record. 6. That any such Teacher may exercise as aforesaid until the next respective Quarter-Sessions, and no longer, in Case he shall not first take the Oaths, and make such Subscription before two of the neighbouring Justices of the Peace; and shall first give them Notice of the Place of his intended Meeting, and take a Certificate thereof, under the said Justices Hand; a Duplicate whereof they are to return into the next Quarter-Sessions. 7. That the Doors and Passages of all Houses and Places where the said Dissenters do meet, shall be always open and free, during the time of such Exercise. 8. That if any Dissenter refuse to take Church-Wardens Oaths, that then he shall find some other fit Person, who is no Dissenter, to execute that Office, and shall pay him for his Pains."

(h) I have here inserted the whole of it; and by what follows in the Text, the Reader will see, that either Sir Joseph, or the Bishop, ascribed to one thing the Effect that was produced by another.

No sooner did the King begin to incline to the rescinding his said Declaration, but the Lord Shaftsbury perceived it: He lost no time, the Resolution was not taken till eleven at Night, and the next Morning he appear'd in the House of Lords, at the Head of the most zealous Peers, against the Catholic Religion, the War with Holland, and the Alliance with France. The Lord Clifford that Day had undertaken to open the Debate of the Lords House, for establishing a perpetual Fund, in order to advance the Prerogative, and render Parliaments inconsiderable, and prepar'd a set Speech to that Purpose, which he read to the Lord Chancellor; who desired to hear it again; and, upon the second reading, he charg'd his Memory with the Substance of it, promising he would likewise come roundly into the Debate. This gave him an Opportunity, he wou'd say, to be revenged of the Country; and the Lord Clifford, who, pursuant to the Determination of the Commons, began the Debate with the very Speech he had shew'd the Lord Chancellor; while his Majesty and his Royal Highness were then in the House to countenance the Design. The Country Lords, and those who were not in the Secret, stared at one another; the whole House, at the End of the Speech, meditating the Fate of England, remain'd in an awful Silence when Chancellor Shaftsbury stood up, and answer'd his Speech from the Beginning to the End, shewing, that his Propositions were extravagant; that what he said at would end in Confusion, and the Ruin of the Government: That it might perhaps send the Royal Family abroad again, to spend their Lives in Exile, without Hopes of a Return. All which he spoke with so much Spirit and Sharpness, that he confounded the Court-Councils.

While he was speaking, the Duke of Tork, enraged at him, whisper'd the King, What a Royal haec you of a Lord Chancellor! The King briskly reply'd, Call'st thou what a Fool thou art!

The Debate ended in a Ruffle, and the Lord Clifford narrowly escaped being sent to the Tower; and falling himself thus given up by the King, till his own Opponents, he declar'd, He would lose no Price in the World who had his Courage to answer his Principles, and support his Ministry in the Execution of his Commands.

A. D. 1672-3.

and the Duke chose to continue in the House, in Expectation of the Event.

Of the Debate, which ensued, there is no regular Account remaining, tho' it was one of the most important in our Annals. Bishop Burnet has, indeed, made a shift to glean up some Particulars concerning it, which he has favour'd the Public with, as also of the Intrigue which follow'd; and quotes for his Vouchers, the Duke of York, the Duke of Lauderdale and Colonel Titus.

Vol. I. p. 347.

According to him, Lord Clifford was the Hero for the Declaration, and had not only shew'd the Heads of his Speech to the King, but receiv'd Hints from him. He began the Debate, says his Lordship, with rough Words. He call'd the Vote of the Commons Manifrum horrendum Inquit, and ran on in a very high Strain. He said all that could be said, with great (i) Heat, and many indecent Expressions. When he had done, the Earl of Shaftsbury, to the Amazement of the whole House, said, He must differ from the Lord who spoke last to Carlo. He said, while those Matters were debated out of Doors, he might think with others, that the Supremacy, assert'd as it was by Law, did warrant the Declaration. But now that such a House of Commons, so loyal and affectionate to the King, were of another Mind, he submitted his Reason to them: They were the King's great Council: They must both advise and support him: They had done it, and would do to fill, if their Laws and Religion were secure to them.

The Bishop adds: The King was all in Fury to be thus forsaken by his Chancellor, and told Clifford how well he was pleas'd with his Speech, and how highly he was offended with the other. The Debate went on; and upon a Division, the Court had the Majority. But against that Vote, (his Lordship does not explain what Vote) about thirty of the most considerable of the House protested: So the Court saw, they had gain'd nothing in carrying on a Vote that drew after it such a Protestation.

A. D. 1672-3.

The Issue of all was, that, the same Day, they waited upon his Majesty with the following Address:

" We the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, do unanimously present your sacred Majesty our humble Thanks, for having pleased to communicate unto us, what hath pass'd between your Majesty and the House of Commons; whereby your Majesty hath graciously offer'd the Means of shewing our Duty to your Majesty, and of asserting the antient, just Rights and Privileges of the House of Peers."

Lord Address.

Whereunto the King return'd this Answer:

" My Lords,
" I take this Address of yours very kindly, and will always be affectionate to you; and I expect that you shall stand by me, as I will always by you."

His Majesty's Answer.

And now from this Alliance offensive and defensive, between the King and Lords, against the Commons, what was not to be fear'd? No doubt, all who were acquainted with the Proceedings of that Day dreaded the next: And yet, instead of a Storm, which was gathering over-night, it produced an unexpected Calm, the Lords voting, " That the King's Answer to the House of Commons, in referring the Points now controverted to a parliamentary Way, by BILL, is good and gracious; that being a good and natural Course for Satisfaction therein."

To

(i) His Defection is thus explain'd by Father Orleson, who is said to have had his Materials from King James II. after his Abdication:

Two things concurr'd to throw him into these Extremes: The one was, his despairing of being able to do any thing essential for a Prince he thought had not Retainers enough to carry on a great Undertaking. He already complain'd that the King had forsaken him in an Affair wherein he had promis'd to stand by him, and in which the Interest of the Crown was in such concern'd as this now mention'd. The Election of Members to fill up the Vacancies in the House of Commons had been so order'd for a long time, that the seditious Party generally prevail'd; because the House had assur'd the Authority of giving the Writ. This was an Abuse introduced during the Troubles of the last Reign, and continu'd to continue after the Restoration, through the Weakness or Ignorance of those who had been Chancellors before Shaftsbury. He says, the ancient Custom was, that when any Member dy'd, the Chancellor issu'd a Writ under the Great Seal for electing another; by which Means, tho' the Writ contain'd nothing to obstruct the Freedom of the Election, yet the King by this could at least use Means for denying the Choice from falling upon Persons that were against him. Shaftsbury had attempted to retrieve that Right, and brought it into Use during the last Interval of Parliament; having first obtain'd the King's Promise to stand firm by him as Opposition to all the Complaints he forelaw the Commons would make on that Account; but they promis'd to stand, and the King comply'd with them. Thus, contrary to his Majesty's Promise, the Chancellor had the Authorization of setting his Elections made void, and the old Abuse restor'd. From that time he foresew, that the Liberty of Conscience would sink, and freely declar'd, that in case it did, he would go over to the Parliament Party, and have no Regard for the Court; in which he was as good as his Word.

The same Author goes on, and tells us, His Majesty's giving up the Elections by act of His Majesty, when the Recalling of Liberty of Conscience put him quite out of Patience, and made him openly say, That that Man was for himself, as if he was not for himself.

to be forsaken; a false Maxim, when the Sovereign is concern'd, or that Party that cannot lawfully be forsaken. As turbulent a Man as Shaftsbury was, he perhaps had not cury'd his Retirement so far, had there been no other Motive but the King's Interest. He that commits an Error to his own Disadvantage; is rather to be pitied than hated; but the King's yielding the Point of Liberty of Conscience, concern'd his Majesty personally, because his Majesty, by that Means disclaiming their Advice given him, left them expos'd to the Rage of the Parliament; and the Earl, appearing to have had the greatest Share in all the Court Projects, had Cause to fear that the Commons would mark him out for an Example to others. This was the second Motive that cury'd this Man to such Extremes. It may be said, he resolv'd his pious Zeal for the Protestant Religion, and for the Parliament, should expiate for that other he had express'd for the Catholic Religion and Monarchy. After he had taken these Resolutions, the Author says, the Attack was sudden and unexpected: Never was any great Change so quick as that of this Minister. No sooner did the King begin to incline to the recalling his Declaration of Indulgence, but he perceiv'd it. He left no time; the Resolution was not taken till eleven at Night, and the next Morning he appear'd in the House of Lords, at the Head of the most zealous Peers against the Catholic Religion, the War with Holland, and the Alliance with France. This first Sally surpris'd the Parliament, as well as the Court, and rais'd an extraordinary Commotion in both; which Disorder was much heightened, when the Earl discovered the private Motions that had inclin'd the King to grant Liberty of Conscience, to join with France, and to declare War against Holland. It is a Crime in an English King to think of breaking Parliamentary Chains, and of confounding that Assembly within the Bounds prescrib'd by the Laws, to which it draws back the Sovereign, if he happens to make over to it little Execution. His Majesty's Design was before suspect'd; but no question was made of it after Shaftsbury had spok'd; so that they were upon their Guard against all future Projects of that Nature.

A.D. 1675. To account for this sudden and surprizing Reverse, we must have recourse again to Bishop Burnet; for no other Author pretends to be enough in the Secret to say any thing to the purpose upon it.

Vol. 1. p. 349. 350. "Lord Arlington possess'd Colbert, the French Ambassador here, with such an Apprehension of the Madnes of violent Councils; and that the least of the ill Effects they might have would be, the leaving the War wholly upon the French King; and that it would be impossible to carry it on, if the King should run to such Extremities, as some were driving him to at home; that he gain'd him both to perswade the King and his Brother to comply with the Parliament; and to send an Express to his own Master, representing the whole Matter in the Light in which Lord Arlington had set it before him.

In the Afternoon of the Day, in which the Matter had been agreed in the House of Lords, the Earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington got all those Members of the House of Commons on whom they had any Influence (and who had Money from the King and were his Spies, but had Leave to vote with the Party against the Court, for procuring them the more Credit) to go privately to him, and to tell him, that, upon Lord Clifford's Speech, the House was in such Fury, that probably they would have gone to some high Votes and Impeachments; But the Lord Shaftsbury, speaking on the other Side, restrain'd them: They believ'd he spoke the King's Sense, as the other did the Duke's: This calm'd them: So they made the King apprehend, that the Lord Chancellor's Speech, with which he had been so much offended, was really a great Service done him: And they perswaded him farther, that he might now save himself, and obtain an Indemnity for his Ministers, if he would part with the Declaration, and pass the Bill (for a Test). This was so dextrously managed by Lord Arlington, who got a great Number of the Members to go, one after another, to the King, who, by concert, spoke all the same Language, that, before Night, the King was quite changed, and said to his Brother, That Lord Clifford had undone himself, and spoil'd their Business, by his mad Speech; and that tho' Lord Shaftsbury had spoke like a Rogue, yet that he had stopt a Fury, which the Indiscretion of the other had kindled to such a Degree, that he could serve him no longer. He gave him leave to let him know all this. The Duke was struck with all this; and imputed it wholly to Lord Arlington's Management. In the Evening, he told Lord Clifford what the King said.

The Lord Clifford, who was naturally a (A) vehement Man, went upon that to the King, who scarce knew how to look him in the Face. Lord Clifford said, he knew how many Enemies he must needs make to himself, by his Speech in the House of Lords: But he hop'd, that, in it, he both serv'd and pleas'd the King; and was therefore the less concern'd in every thing else: But he was surpriz'd to find by the Duke, that the King was now of another Mind. The King was in some Confusion: He own'd all he said was right in itself; but he said, that he, who had sat so long in the House of Commons, should have consider'd better what they would bear, and what the Necessity of his Affairs requir'd. Lord Clifford, in his first Heat, was inclin'd to have laid down his Staff, and to have expostulated roundly with the King: But a cooler Thought stopp'd him. He reckon'd he must now retire; and, therefore, he best a mind to take some care of his Family in the way of doing it: So he restrain'd himself, and said he was sorry, that his best-meat Services were so ill understood. Soon after this, Letters came from the French King, pressing the King to do all that was necessary to procure Money of the Parliament; since He could not bear the Charge of the War alone. He also wrote to the Duke, and excus'd the Advice he gave, upon the Necessity of Affairs; but promis'd faithfully, to espouse his Concerns, as soon as he got out of the War, and that he would never be easy, till he recover'd that which he was now forced to let go.

The judicious Reader will probably find some Flaws in this Recital; and it is not our Business to defend them. We must either take up with this Evidence, or throw up the Cause.

Both Lords and Commons were now united against Popery; and a joint Address from both Houses was presented to his Majesty, complaining of the great Dangers and Mischiefs, which the Realm was liable to, from the Increase of Popish Recusants, and the great Resort of Priests and Jesuits in this Kingdom; setting forth, how much his loyal Subjects were dishearten'd to see such Popish Recusants admitted into Employments of great Trust and Profit, and especially into military Commands over the Forces now in his Majesty's Service; and humbly desiring, not only that his Majesty would issue his Proclamation, commanding all such Priests and Jesuits to depart the Kingdom, but that all such Officers and Soldiers as refused the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might Joint Address of both Houses concerning the Increase of Popish Recusants.

(A) Of him Sir John Tully tells the following remarkable Story: "While he had the Staff, it happen'd, that the King, the Duke of York, and himself, were shut up in a Room in Consultation, when Sir William Baskal, a Commissioner of the Excise, came to speak with the King, to whom he had free Access, as frequently accommodating his Majesty with Money. In Presumption of his usual Liberty, he went directly to the Room where he understood the King was, and having Discov'rd, had the Curiosity to listen close at the Door, to which he was excited by the King's speaking with some Earnestness; but he could only hear broken and imperfect Expressions. The Duke spoke so low he could not understand what he said, but Clifford spoke loud, as in public, and very audibly answer'd the King in these Words: Sir, if you are driven off upon Excess, you will never be just; the Work will do, if you declare your self with Resolution; there are enough to stand by you. The King reply'd, This Name of Popery will never be favour'd by the People. And upon saying this, he started from his Seat, crying, Some body is at the Door! Upon which Clifford ran hastily to it, and without speaking a Word, fell furiously upon Sir William Baskal, dragging him to a Pair of Stairs, from whence he kick'd him down; and soon after Sir William met with his Death, which was not improbably thought to have proceeded from that Misfortune.

to be disbanded, as the best Means for satisfying and composing the Minds of his loyal Subjects. The King's Answer was, That he heartily agreed to the Matter of the Address; and that he would give speedy Orders accordingly: Hoping, however, that they did not mean to have them extend to such of his Forces as were to be employ'd immediately beyond the Seas.

The next Day, March 8, his Majesty, in a Speech to both Houses, again signify'd, that he freely and readily agreed to the Prayer of the said Address: After which, applying himself particularly to the House of Commons, he called upon them to perform their Part; put them in mind, that it was Five Weeks since he had demanded a Supply, told them, that their unanimous Grant had given new Life to his Affairs at-home, and dishearten'd his Enemies abroad: But that the Delay since, had given them new Courage; and that, if it was not speedily dissipate'd, it would be ineffectual: Begg'd them to lay this to heart; and that they would not let the Fears and Jealousies of some draw inevitable Ruin upon all.

His Conclusion was:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"If there be any Scruple yet remaining with you concerning Suspension of penal Laws, I here faithfully promise you, that what hath been done in that particular shall not, for the future, be drawn into Example and Consequence. And, as I daily expect from you a Bill for my Supply, so I assure you, I shall as willingly receive and pass any other you shall offer me, that may tend to the giving you Satisfaction in all your just Grievances."

Notwithstanding the Volumes which have been writ in Justification of King Charles II. with so much Zeal, and so much Artifice, accompany'd with such severe Invectives against all those who have presum'd to enlarge on the Mis carriage of his Reign, every unprejudic'd Person must allow, from the Evidence before him, that he had entertain'd very dangerous and desperate Designs upon the Rights and Privileges of his Subjects.

That on the Detection of these Designs, Opposition became not only justifiable, but laudable: And that it was scarce possible, that a Prince who had given such Cause of Offence and Complaint, should not be obnoxious to Jealousy and Distrust for ever after.

It is, indeed, urg'd in his Excuse, that he was in the Hands of the (1) worst of Men, that he was indolent, that he was absorb'd in Pleasures, &c. But whether Evil makes its Entrance by Permission, or Commission, it is equally Evil, equally grievous to the Sense, and fatal in its Consequences. And if a King does not make it his Business to ward off that Evil, he is rather a Burthen, than an Advantage to the Commonwealth. Besides, we are assur'd by Mr. North, in his Examen, that the Word Ministry was not then in use; but Counsellors, or Courtiers. For the King himself took so much upon him, that the Ministers had not that aggregate Title, as if the Government had been but a Party, and the Ministers sway'd it, as they were dispos'd to favour or to frown: These are that Gentleman's Words: And all Writers, of all Parties, bear witness, that he had a better Capacity, and abundantly more Knowledge, than are generally to be found within the Circle of a Crown: That he had likewise a Will of his own is apparent, from numberless Instances, in which he rejected both the Advice and Impertunity of his Favourites, and acted according to his own Sense of Things. We may therefore dwell as fondly as we please on the Charms and Graces of his private Life; but they will not excuse or palliate his public Faults. The more amiable his Deportment was thought, the more dangerous he became: and it is notorious, that, tho' he lost the Esteem, he never lost the Affections of his People. On the contrary, they idoliz'd him to the last; and, even when they were enslav'd by him, kiss'd the Hand that put on their Chains.

Tho' the Opposition to his Measures in the House of Commons had been troublesome to him in former Sessions, it had never till now been formidable: In the last, by the means of (m) taking off (as the Phrase was, in plain

(1) These are included in the general Name of Schismatics; by Bishop Piercy, who, in order to blacken them, thus freely blackens his Favourite Reign. "The Parliament being at length prorog'd, they, now being without Fear of Parliament, flew out into all manner of Extravagance. But not to mention all their Outrages against their Country, there were seven deadly Sins, as we say, which they committed almost at the same time, with equal Treachery, and Impudence, against all the Laws of Nature and Nations and the Kingdom."

1. To, The very Patrimony of the Crown is exposed to Sale.

2. Secondly, The Triple Alliance is broken.

3. Thirdly, Another Alliance is made with the most Christian King.

4. Fourthly, A War is enter'd into against the Dutch, at that time our Allies, without any previous Declaration of War.

5. Fifthly, The Exchange is turn'd into a Place of Robbery.

6. Sixthly, Every one is allow'd a boundless Liberty in Religion.

7. Seventhly, By Writ issued at their own Pleasure, out of the Court of Chancery, Judgments are made into the lower House, contrary to the Customs, which, tho' not very ancient, had prevail'd for many Years. NEWLIN'S Treatise of Parliam's History, p. 138, 139.

(m) Concerning this Practice, Mr. North writes as follows: "There were abundance of Resolutions that confin'd to this Alteration (in the Temper of the Parliament) of which one, and not the least, was that which, in its time, was called taking off; that is, with Pleas or otherwise, plainly buying the visible Heads of the adverse Party. A Method the King was inclin'd to much rather than that of contending with them; for he always lean'd to Ways that tended to his Ease. Thus came Sir T. L., Mr. G., and Sir T. M., &c. who were the Bell-wethers of the Country Party, into the Commissions of the Customs, Admiralty, and Excise. And yet they held on their Party-Combination in the House of Commons. They eat, drank, and almost slept together, the better to understand all Things the same Way, and to manage with Art their Game in Parliament, which they took to be devolved into their Hands. And, by the Advantage they had of Popery and France, they took the Parliament to be the Stage of their most intestine Actions, and, to be wholly devoted to that, neglected all their other Concerns. And so, when hard-Working and Labour, for many Years, to get those Darling of Popery and France into the House all in vain, now they had Possession of them, they were not wanting in the utmost Application to Party Work for making the best of it. But, if one may judge by Consequences, the chief political Error of this Method consist'd in the not taking off enough: The Case being like that of St. James's Thievery, where

In short, he seems to have thought, that Parliaments were like to cost him more than they were worth; and to have resolv'd to engross the whole Fleece, without suffering his Shearers to come in for their Dividend.

In the long Interval between the two Sessions, perhaps, when it was believ'd, that the Eschequer Job, the French Subsidy, and the Dutch Spoils, would render all farther Aids unnecessary, this Secret, as it is reasonable to presume, in part escap'd; and that those concern'd resolv'd to make him smart for his ill-judg'd Frugality, if Necessity, which was their sole Dependence, should again oblige him to have recourse to their Assistance.

Certain it is, the Aspect of the present Session bore so little Resemblance to the last, that it is no easy Matter to suppose that the Business of it pass'd thro' the same Hands: And yet the House was still compos'd of Loyalists, in the Party Sense of the Word; that is to say, Persons alike devoted to the Church and the Prerogative: Of those called Fanatics and Republicans, no-doubt there were a few; but they were of no Consequence for Number, till join'd by such as the real Dread of (n) Papery and arbitrary Power had detach'd from their old Prejudices, and such as were in the Secret of making a Trade of Opposition, and who, under the most sacred Pretences, fought only to enrich and advance themselves.

It was under these Loyalists the Distinction of Court and Country Parties first arose, which were now of some Standing; it was they who first rais'd and propagated the Cry against Papery and arbitrary Power; and it was in their Mint the Opposition was forged, which made the King so uneasy, every time they sat, for the Residue of his Reign. If there was any Virtue or Glory in exposing and traversing the extravagant Designs of a profligate Court, it justly belongs to them: If any thing criminal, in laying the Foundation of so much Trouble to so good a King, as he is call'd by Mr. North, they ought to share in the Reproach.

It ought to be acknowledg'd, that a more absolute Concession to the Desires of his Subjects, could not have been made by any Prince, than was contain'd in his Majesty's last Speech: That Expressions more full, more gracious, more satisfactory, could not have been us'd. And as a Confirmation of

A.D. 1672-3. all he had said, Mr. Secretary Conventry declar'd to the House, that the King had recalled his Declaration; and that he had seen the Seals taken off.

The Consequence was, That, as both Houses had join'd in their Complaints, both Houses join'd in their Acknowledgments, and waited on his Majesty in a Body, with their Vote, which was, nemine contradicente. That the humble and hearty Thanks of these Houses be return'd to his Majesty for his gracious, full, and satisfactory Answer this Day given to their humble Petitions and Addresses. To which the King reply'd; My Lords and Gentlemen, I hope there will never be any Difference amongst us; I assure you there shall never be any Occasion on my Part.

But the Declaration was not the only stumbling Block they had to remove; and having the same Power in their Hands, viz. the Supply, which produced this sudden Change in the Measures of the Court, they resolv'd to make such farther Use of it, as should prepare the Way to get rid of the rest.

As soon, therefore, as they had complimented the King, on the Earnest he had given them of his good Intentions to live on better Terms with his People for the Time to come, they enter'd on a Consideration of the Grievances of England and Ireland.

This alarm'd both his Majesty and his Ministers again: The First wanted to be put in Possession of the Benevolence, which he was now only tantaliz'd with; and the Last to have the Jury dismiss'd, of whose Inquest they had so much Reason to be afraid. In order, therefore, to cut their Proceedings as short as possible, Mr. Secretary Conventry gave them to understand, by Command, that his Majesty intended them a Recess on the 28th of March: And this not having immediate Effect, the same Minister delivered a written Message to the House, in which they were told, that his Majesty intended they should rise before Easter, and therefore expected an Expedition of such Bills as were of most importance, particularly the Bill of Papery, and that of Supply; and that for such as could not be get ready, that they might not receive a Disappointment, his Majesty resolv'd to make this an Adjournment only, till the Beginning of October; in which Interval, his Majesty undertook to take such Care of the Protestant Religion, that they should have no Cause to complain.

It may be now fairly presum'd, that the Compromise between the Court and the House, for this Session, was fully made up, for this Message was deliver'd the 24th. The 25th they presented their Address concerning the Grievances of England; the 26th that concerning those of Ireland, and the where they say, A Thief delivers to be hang'd that steals not enough for himself and the Judge. King Charles I. did nothing, Charles II. went but a Step forwards. It is a Pity any, that go through Strich (if any such ever be) should thrive better. Leaune, p. 456.

It is, in this Passage, confess'd, that King Charles II. did take off; but his chief political Error was, that he did not take off enough. And yet it is a Pity that any, who should take off more, should thrive better:—How much we plain Men wonder at such Refinements as these?

(n) Which even Mr. North, who labours so hard to exculpate King Charles, allows, had been hitherto carry'd on, by uniting (p. 46.) That they never were given up to the Parliament; and yet he had before done his best to weaken the Notion of the King's being a Pupil, or that he had enter'd into any secret and dangerous Measure, of France.

A. D. 1673. 29th the King put an End to the Session; which was but one Day later than the Notice given in his first Message.

But before we hasten to that Period, it is fit that these Addresses, together with some other Facts should be explain'd; and first of that which concern'd Ireland.

The King had by his Letters of February 20, 1671-2, granted an Indulgence to Irish Roman Catholics to live in Corporations. By others of November 5, 1672, he had suspended the Execution of the Rules and Directions formerly made for regulating Corporations: And on January 14. following, had approv'd of the Election of nine or ten Roman Catholics by the Mayor of Dublin into the Common Council of that City, by the sole Nomination of that Magistrate. The King had likewise by his Letter of September 28, 1672, and an Order of Council thereupon, requir'd his Protestant Subjects of Ireland not to prosecute any Actions against the Irish, for any Wrongs or Injuries committed by them during the late Rebellion; and had likewise permitted Colonel Richard Talbot to have Access to his Person and Councils, as a profess'd Agent for the Roman Catholics of Ireland: All which Matters, and several others of the like Nature, coming before the House, and appearing to be so many Parts of the grand Scheme for propagating the Power and Interest of Popery; they thought it incumbent on them to lay a proper and seasonable Representation before his Majesty, both of the Evil and the (e) Remedies.

On the Subject of English Grievances, they desir'd, 1. That the Imposition of Twelvepence per Chaldron upon Coals, for providing of Convoys, by virtue of an Order of Council, dated the 15th of May 1672, might be recalled, and all Bonds taken by virtue thereof cancelled. 2. That his Majesty's Proclamation of the 4th of December 1672, for preventing Disorders which might be committed by Soldiers, and whereby the Soldiers then in his Majesty's Service were in a manner exempted from the ordinary Course of Justice, might likewise be recalled. 3. And whereas great Complaints had been made, out of the several Parts of this Kingdom, of divers Abuses committed in quartering of Soldiers, That his Majesty would be pleas'd to give Order to redress those Abuses; and, in particular, that no Soldiers be hereafter quarter'd in any private Houses; and that due Satisfaction might be given to the Inn-keepers and Victuallers where they lie, before they remove. 4. And, since the Continuance of Soldiers in this Realm would necessarily produce many Inconveniences to his Majesty's Subjects, they humbly presented it as their Petition and Advice, that when the present War is ended, all the Soldiers might be disbanded. 5. That his Majesty would likewise be pleas'd to consider of the Irregularities and Abuses in pressing Soldiers, and give Order for the Prevention thereof for the future. 6. And altho' it had been the Course of former Parliaments to desire Redress of Grievances, before they proceeded to give a Supply; yet they had so full Assurance of his Majesty's Tenderness and Compassion towards his People, that they humbly prostrated themselves at his Majesty's Feet with their Petitions, desiring his Majesty to take them into his princely Consideration, and to give such Orders for the Relief of his Subjects, and the removing those Pressures, as should seem best to his Royal Wisdom.

It is worthy Observation, that the grand Points, of the irregular Writs, the War, the Alliance with France, and the shutting up of the Exchequer instead of applying for the Advice and Assistance of Parliament, are not so much as mention'd: And that in the Introduction to these Articles are the following tender Expressions: "And tho' we are abundantly satisfi'd, that it has been always your Royal Will and Pleasure, that your Subjects should be govern'd according to the Laws and Customs of these Realms; yet finding, that, contrary to your Majesty's gracious Intentions, some Abuses and Grievances are crept in, we crave Leave humbly to represent them to your Majesty's Knowledge, &c."

Now, supposing it was necessary, for Decency's sake, to presume, that the King was ignorant of Measures transacted in his own Name, and well dispos'd to govern as he ought, it could not be presum'd, that these Measures whether on this of England.

The grand Points were look'd.

(e) As follow:

1. That, for the establishing and quieting the Possessions of your Majesty's Subjects in that Kingdom, your Majesty would be pleas'd to maintain the Act of Settlement, and Explanatory Act thereupon, and to recall the Commission of Enquiry into Irish Affairs, bearing date the 17th of January 1671, as containing many new and extraordinary Powers, set only to the Prejudice of particular Persons, whose Estates and Titles are thereby made liable to be question'd; but in a manner to the Overthrow of the Act of Settlement; and, if pursu'd, may be the Occasion of great Charge and Attendance to many of our Subjects in Ireland, and shake the Peace and Security of the whole. 2. That your Majesty would give Order, that no Papists be either continu'd, or hereafter admitted to be Judges, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, Coroners, or Mayors, Sovereigns or Port-Reeves in that Kingdom. 3. That the Titular Popish Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Vicar-Generals, Abbots, and all other exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction by the Pope's Authority, and in particular, Peter Talbot Pretended Archbishop of Dublin, for his notorious Disloyalty to your Majesty, and Disobedience and Contempt of your Laws, may be commanded by Proclamation forthwith to depart out of Ireland, and all other your Majesty's Dominions, or otherwise to be prosecuted according to Law. And that all Convents, Seminaries, and public Popish Schools may be dissolv'd and suppress'd, and the regular Priests commanded to depart under the like Penalties. 4. That no Irish Papist be admitted to inhabit in any Corporation of that Kingdom, unless duly licens'd according to the aforesaid Acts of Settlement; and that your Majesty would be pleas'd to recall your Letters of the 26th of February 1671, and your Proclamation thereupon, whereby general Licence is given such Papists to inhabit in Corporations there. 5. That your Majesty's Letters of the 28th of September, 1672, and the Order of Council thereupon, whereby your Subjects are required not to prosecute any Actions against the Irish for any Wrongs or Injuries committed during the late Rebellion, may likewise be recall'd. 6. That Colonel Richard Talbot, who hath notoriously assum'd to himself the Title of Agent for the Roman Catholics in Ireland, be immediately dismiss'd out of all Command, either civil or military, and forbid any Access to your Majesty's Court. 7. That your Majesty would be pleas'd, from Time to Time, out of your Princely Wisdom, to give such further Orders and Directions to the Lord-Lieutenant, as may best conduce to the Encouragement of the English Planters, and Protestant Interest, and the Suppression of the Intolerances and Disorders of the Irish Papists there.

A. D. 1673. Measures for no Author nor Adviser; and that these Abuses and Grievances had erupt in by chance: Notwithstanding which, instead of tracing the Evil to its Source, and making a wholesome Example of the wicked Ministers, who had so notoriously misled his Majesty, and aggriev'd and endanger'd his People, they suffer'd an Act of Grace (which was so worded as to contain an absolute Pardon of all Treasons, Misdemeanors of Treasons, and every other Offence against the State, before the 25th of March, 1673) to be brought in, and pass'd; which put them out of the Reach of Justice for ever.

An Act of Grace.

And yet, tho' the Parliament thought fit to overlook these Criminals of the first Magnitude, they stoop'd so low as to admit the following extraordinary Proviso: And also except out of this Pardon, all such Persons, who, upon the first Day of this present Session of Parliament, were in Prison within the Tower of London, or within the Prison of the Marshalsea, or within the Prison of the Fleet, or in the Prison of the Gatehouse or elsewhere, in any Part of his Majesty's Dominions, or otherwise restrain'd of Liberty, by express Commandment or Direction of his Majesty, or any of his Majesty's Privy Council.

King's Answer to the same Address.

To the two Addresses concerning Grievances, the King was pleas'd to answer, That he observ'd the Addresses consisted of many different Parts; and therefore it could not be expected, that there should be a present Answer: But for the several particular Things contained in them, he would, before the next Meeting, take such effectual Care, that no Man should have Reason to complain.

Thanks voted.

With which evasive Answer the House thought themselves and the Nation well secur'd, that they presently voted, That the humble Thanks of the House be presented to his Majesty, for the often Accesses they have been admitted to his Majesty's Person; and for his most gracious Answers to the several Addresses of this House; and particularly for the last gracious Message, and for the Care he hath declared he will take of the Protestant Religion.

And now the Ministers being indemnify'd, the King (p) supply'd, and the Church (by the (q) Tol-Act) effectually secur'd, all the necessary Business of the Session was suppos'd to be at an end: The Bill for the Esteem of Protestant Dissenters, which had pass'd the Commons, was laid to sleep with the Lords: The King gave the Royal Assent to such Bills as were presented to him: The two Houses adjourn'd themselves to the 20th of October: And the Right Reverend and Reverend Fathers gave out, on all sides, That the Danger of Popery was over.

Thus ended this remarkable Session, which, according to Bishop Burnet, was the best of this long Parliament.

From the Experience of the last Year's military Operations, the Court was now convinc'd, that the Republic of Holland was not likely to become so easy a Prey to the two Kings, as they had over fondly imagin'd: And, from their Experience of the present Temper of the House of Commons, they had no great Reason to expect, that they would much longer bear the Burthen of the Experiment.

On the Efforts of this Summer, therefore, all depended: And, while all possible Preparations were made for a vigorous Prosecution of the War, Encouragement was still given to the Sword, to proceed with the Mediation of a Peace.

But the Mediation and the War pursued.

On this last Work, however, both Parties seem'd to enter as if it was by Constraint, rather than Inclination; and as if by way of Provision against the worst, not as the Point they most desir'd. As the Hollanders had before made a Difficulty of agreeing to a Cessation, it was now refus'd them, and, at the very Instant that there was scarce any Difficulty to be settled, but the fixing upon a Place of Treaty, in order to open the Negotiation,

(p) It is assur'd by some, that the Bill of Supply a Proviso was tack'd, That no Papist should be capable of holding any public Employment; but I can find no such Clause in it; on the contrary, I find in the Preamble, an humble and thankful Acknowledgment of his Majesty's abundant Care for the Preservation of his Subjects, and a deep Sigh of the extraordinary Charge and Expence, with which his Majesty's present Occasions were to be supported.

(q) When this Bill was brought into the House of Lords, the famous Earl of Bristol, who saw no Opportunity of rectifying his former Grace and Favour, was pleas'd to express himself upon it as follows:

"My Lords, I shall not pretend to determine whether there have been any just Grounds given by any violent Men, or by the unseasonable Ambition of any Roman Catholics for such Fears and Jealousies; it suffices to exact the Necessity of a timely Remedy, since they have indeed most violently fear'd, and disturb'd at the Minds of the Major Part of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, which certainly no Man conversant in the World can deny. Now, my Lords, in popular Fears and Apprehensions, those usually prove most dangerous that we raise'd upon Grounds not well understood, and may rightly be remembered to the fatal Effects of panic Fears in Arms, where I have seldom seen great Disorder arise from Intelligence brought in by Parties and Sects, or by Advancements to Generals; but from Alarms upon groundless and capricious Fears of Danger, when we know not either how, or why. This no Man of moderate Experience in military Affairs, but hath found the dangerous Effects of, one time or other; in giving a Stop to which Mischiefs, the Skill of great Commanders is best seen. In like manner, my Lords, this great and judicious Assembly of the House of Commons, rightly sensible of the dangerous Effects which so general a Disturbance of Mens Minds in the Concernments of Religion, how groundless soever, might produce, have apply'd their Care to obviate them by this Bill: A Bill, in my Opinion, as full of Moderation towards Catholics, as of Prudence and Severity towards the Religion of the State. In this Bill, my Lords, notwithstanding all the Alarms of the Increase of Popery, and Designs of Papists, here is no Mention of barring them from private and modest Exercise of their Religion; no banishing them to such a Distance from Court, nor putting in Execution of Penal Laws, in force against them; all their Prejudices are reduc'd to this one Instant, natural to all Societies of Men, of hindering a lesser Opposite Party from growing too strong for the greater and more considerable One: And in this just Way of Prevention, is not the Moderation of the House of Commons to be admird, that they have retained it to this sole Point, of disbarring their Advertisers from Offices and Places, and from Testimonies of Wealth by Patrons of the Sovereign? — And after all, my Lords, how few do these sharp Trials and Tests of this Act regard? Only a few such Roman Catholics as would gain hold Offices, and Places at the Price of Hypocrisy, and Disimulation of their true Sentiments in Religion. My Lords, I am none of those Wherry-Men in Religion, who look one Way, and row another. — Upon the whole Matter, my Lords, however the Sentiments of a Catholic of the Church of Rome (I Bill say not of the Court of Rome) may oblige me, upon Scruple of Conscience, in some Particular of this Bill to give my Negative to it, when it comes to passing; yet as a Member of a Protestant Parliament, my Adverser prudently cannot but go along with the main Scope of it, the present Circumstances of Time, and Affairs consider'd, and the Necessity of composing the disturbed Minds of the People."

1673. tiation, the contending Parties seem'd in earnest only to decide all Differences by the Sword.

After making such high Pretensions, the two Kings were sham'd to desist; and after such miraculous Escapes, the States were incapable of Despair. Their Condition, indeed, was far from being mended: One Enemy was still in the Heart of their Country; and another was preparing to interrupt their Trade, and alarm their Coasts. Their Attempt on Charleroy had only serv'd to disgrace their Arms, instead of obtaining them any Advantage: The Imperialists were still on the other Side of the Rhine, and as incapable of giving them any effectual Assistance as ever:

Hanover ceases to be a Party.

Elector of Brandenburg abandons the States.

Du Mont.

The Duke of Hanover suffer'd himself to be debauch'd from the common Interest of Europe in general, and of the Empire in particular, and enter'd himself into the (r) Pay of his most Christian Majesty: And what was yet more extraordinary, the (s) Elector of Brandenburg was induc'd to withdraw his Assistance, and sign a Neutrality with France, in hope of dividing the Glory of the Mediation with Sweden; of which he was nevertheless disappointed at last. In almost all the other Courts of Germany, France was equally busy, and equally successful. Prince William of Furstenburg was their avowed Agent; and, together with Mr. de Creci Verjus, was perpetually posting from Prince to Prince to facilitate their Intrigues; and where it was not expedient to make open Applications, they had for their Emisaries the Ministers of Ofenbrug, Hanover, Neuburg, and Wolfenbuttle: With this Interest in the Empire, with the additional Credit of having detach'd Brandenburg from the common Cause; and while both the Emperor and the States were yet stunn'd with so desperate a Blow, the most Christian King order'd Mr. de Grenoville, his Minister at Vienna, to complain in the strongest Terms to his Imperial Majesty, that, in breach of the Promise he had made, not to interest himself in behalf of the Hollanders, he had sent his Troops the preceding Year to their Assistance upon the Rhine; which had oblig'd his most Christian Majesty to divide his Troops, and thereby hinder'd him from pushing his Conquests: And further to declare in form, That, if his Imperial Majesty should again this Year interpose in the same manner, the King his Master would hold himself authoris'd to invade his Hereditary Dominions, and repel Force by Force.

France accuses the Emperor, and Spain.

About the same time, he also dispatch'd an Express to Mr. de Villars, his Ambassador at Madrid, directing him to demand of the Queen, that she would recall all her Forces out of the Service of Holland, and totally and entirely forbear giving them any farther Assistance, either directly or indirectly: And withal to signify, that, according to the Resolution she should take on this Head, his Majesty would either continue the Peace, or declare War.

This kind of Language had long been expected in Spain; a Rupture was what they rather desir'd than fear'd. Instead of giving a satisfactory Answer to the Memorials of the two Kings, relating to the Infraction of the Treaty of Aix, by the Attempt on Charleroy, they studiously avoided every thing which had a Tendency that way; returning rather irritating than qualifying Answers: And whereas they had hitherto assist'd Holland only as Volunteers, from a thorough Conviction, that if the Seven Provinces sunk under the superior Force of France, the Residue of the other Ten would follow; Don Mameil de Lira, the Spanish Minister at the Hague, concert'd an Alliance with the Republic, in the very Preamble of which he allow'd the States to hope, that his Royal Master would oblige himself to enter into an open and declared War; to the end, that, by the Divine Assistance, they might be able to change the Troubles of Europe into a general Peace. The whole Treaty consisted of Nineteen Articles, and a separate Article. The first Seven of which provided for a reciprocal Guaranty, and reciprocal Assistance, in case of an Attack; as also specify'd in what Proportions, in what Time, and after what Manner, the said Assistance should be reciprocally given.

Treaty between Spain and Holland.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth Articles, provided, That in case the two Parties should be engag'd jointly in a declar'd War, no Cessation of Arms nor Negotiation for a Treaty or Truce, should be admitted without mutual Participation and mutual Consent, nor pursu'd without communicating whatever should offer during the Course of it, nor contract'd without the Inclusion of both Parties: As also, that neither should nor only not enter into any Engagement repugnant to the present Treaty, but not make any without including reciprocally one the other, if desired.

By the eleventh and twelfth the Emperor, and all the Kings and States, mutually approv'd of, were to be invited to become Parties; and Provision was made for the due Observance of the Treaty of Munster, that of the Marine, 1650, the Guaranty of the Treaty of Aix, and the Triple League, when the War with his Britannic Majesty should be ended.

The thirteenth and fourteenth, were as follow:

13. And, for that the States General are, at this Time engag'd in a great and dangerous War with the most Christian King and the King of Great Britain, and also with the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster, and that the Plenipotentiaries of all Parties are assembled at Cologne, to conclude there, if possible, a Treaty of Peace, for the Tranquillity of Europe, and the Deliverance of the States of the United Provinces from the Embarrassments they are under, his Catholic Majesty, to give the utmost Testimonies to the said States General, of his Royal Generosity, and the Affection he has honour'd nour'd them with, and the Diligence he uses for their Preservation, promises and obliges himself, to contribute all that lies in his Power towards the Conclusion of the Peace, without deferring any longer the Conditions to which it shall be thought fit for them to consent for the common Good and Deliverance from the Dangers and Ruin they are now under. Notwithstanding, if the good Intentions of the States, for concluding the Peace, cannot have the Success which is to be desir'd, his Catholic Majesty, jointly with the Emperor, will declare open War, immediately after the first Request shall be made by the said States General to the Governor General of his Majesty in the Low Countries and the County of Burgundy, that he may incontinently go to Work, for the common Good, and Ease of the oppressed States. The above-said Governor General shall act henceforward, until further Order, with all his Power and Forces, against the most Christian King, as his Catholic Majesty will also do himself, in the other Parts of Europe both by Land and Sea, as is above-said; and the Governor General, shall begin, even before the Ratification of the present Treaty shall be come from Spain; and then we will immediately send him that of the States General.

14. The War being made in that manner, between his Majesty and the said States General of the one Part, and the King of France of the other; his said Majesty and the States General do oblige one another, not to make any Cessation of Arms, but by common Consent; and not to continue the Assembly, at this time settled at Cologne, and not to enter hereafter a-new into any Negotiation of Peace, or Truce for Years, otherwise than under the exact Observation of what above is agreed in the 9th Article.

By the fifteenth and sixteenth, his Catholic Majesty stipulated not to make Peace till all the Towns, Places, and Countries which had or might be taken from the States, during the War, were recover'd or restor'd; and the States the same, in Acknowledgment of his said Majesty's Favours, Succours, &c. unless he was restored to the Possession of all the Places which had been taken from him since the Peace of the Pyrennees, unless, for the Good of the Peace, it could be effected by any other way.

The seventeenth contain'd a Reference to the ninth, as to the manner of obtaining Peace with the other Parties at War with his Majesty and the States.

By the eighteenth, the States were to surrender the Town of Mastricht, the Country of Ussonbois, and all that belong'd to them beyond the Muse to his Majesty, together with all the Pretensions they had to the Villages of Redemption, with the Provost, however, that at the Conclusion of the War, they were put in Possession of all they had lost.

By the nineteenth, it was agreed, that the present Treaty should subsist for twenty Years, that the Ratifications should be exchange'd in two Months; or if the Catholic King declar'd War within that time, the States were to dispatch their Ratification without waiting for that of his Majesty.

The separate Article, relating to England only, deserves to be inserted entire.

Altho' by the Treaty concluded and sign'd this Day between his Majesty and the States General of the United Provinces, his Majesty is only engag'd to break with France, in case the Peace cannot be concluded upon the Conditions which were thought reasonable; and his Majesty will be oblig'd with Regret to break the Friendship he has with the King of Great Britain, since every thing plainly shews us, that the King of Great Britain, avoids making the Peace with the said States General, we cannot expect from the Arms of his Catholic Majesty the Effect which could be wish'd for, unless they act jointly with those of the States General, and indistinctly against those who would continue the War with them, without admitting the Conditions of an equitable Peace: It is agreed that, if we cannot presently conclude a good Agreement with his said Majesty of Great Britain, and that all the Efforts which have been made to that Effect already, and all that will be made by the Mediation of his Catholic Majesty do prove ineffectual, his Catholic Majesty will declare War against the King of Great Britain, in the same manner he has done against his most Christian Majesty. Nevertheless, that nothing may be wanting to contribute to the Hindrance of this Breach, the said States General, to satisfy his Catholic Majesty's Desire, and the Inclination they have to establish their antient Friendship with the said King of Great Britain, are all agreed, that his Catholic Majesty shall try one LAST EFFORT, to bring the said King of Great Britain to a Peace, offering him the same Conditions which are already above expressed. Provided, that if the said Conditions are not accepted by the King of Great Britain, and that the Peace with the said King is not concluded, three Weeks after the Ratification of the present Treaty shall have been remitted; in this Case, his Catholic Majesty shall break with the King of Great Britain, as he already has with the King of France.

And as for what regards the Conditions which his Catholic Majesty may offer to the King of Great Britain, and which the States General will subscribe to, in case that by the Mediation of his afore-said Catholic Majesty the King of Great Britain is willing to make a Peace with them, it has been agreed, that altho' the afore-said States, neither by any Principle of Justice, nor by any Success of Arms, find themselves oblig'd to give their Assent to any disadvantageous Conditions, and that the great Expences and Perils wherein they have been engaged, and from which they happily defend themselves, by the Divine Assistance, leave them under no Necessity of buying a Peace by Conditions, to which they ought not to assent; yet, nevertheless, to end, if possible, the War with the King of Great Britain, his Catholic Majesty being of Opinion, that there is no other way to procure the Peace, he may offer to the King of Great Britain, for all the Pretensions he has hitherto made, or which he may hereafter

A. D. 1673. after make against the aforeſaid States General:

First, An Adjutment of the Affair of the Flag to the Satisfaction of his Britanic Majesty.

Secondly, A Restitution of all the Countries and Places, which the aforeſaid States General have taken, or may take by their Arms from the English during this War, out of Europe, provided there be a reciprocal Restitution.

Thirdly, A Sum of 4, 5, 6, 7 or 8 hundred thousand Patacoons payable at the following times: viz. A fourth part at the time when the Ratifications shall be delivered, and the rest at three times: The first in the first Year after the Conclusion of this present War, and another in the second, and so the third in equal Payments; and the aforeſaid States General will, to this effect, give a sufficient Caution (or Security) to the Satisfaction of the Ministers of the Catholic King.

This Treaty was sign'd at the Hague, April 30, but was not ratify'd till August 22: at which time also the Emperor became a Party, in Consideration of certain Sums of Money, which were remitted to him, both by Spain and Holland, to enable him to defray the Charge of the War.

With this Light before us, we shall now be the better able to trace the Progress, as well as better prepar'd for the Issue of the Congress at Cologne, which, as it is manifest by the above Articles, was not only agreed upon, but to be open'd without Delay.

But tho' it appears by Lord Arlington's Letters, that the Earl of Sunderland, Sir Leslie Jenkins, and Sir Joseph Williamson were nominated Plenipotentiaries for Great Britain in March, their full Powers were not sign'd till the 5th of May, nor their Instructions till the seventh: On that very Day, however, the (t) two last set sail, in so much Haste, that the Place of Treaty was not yet ascertain'd, but with such unfavourable Winds, that they were detain'd at Sbermsi till the 18th, when they thought it advisable to change their Course, and instead of Ostend, to make for Calais. And on the 14th of June, N.S. we find them writing from Antwerp to the Duke of Monmouth and Sir William Leckhart, his Majesty's Minister at the French Court, to be inform'd of the most Christian King's RESOLUTION, touching the Place where the Treaty was to be held, whether at Cologne or Aix la Chapelle, for Dunkirk had been dropt at the Instance of the States, that they might direct their Journey accordingly.

Not to be too circumstantial, the French Star guided them to Cologne, where they found the Mediating Ministers, together with those of France, waiting their Arrival; and the Duties were but a few Hours behind them.

As to the Points they were instructed to insist upon, they were so near akin to those of the preceding Year, sent from the French

Camp, that they do not deserve a Repetition; except that on the Head of Cautionary Towns, his Majesty reduc'd his Demands to the Town of Flushing, and the Port of Ramakins; or Helvoet Sloys and Gorée; or, finally, the Brill and Gorée: And as to the Reimbursement, he was content to accept of six hundred thousand Pounds Sterling instead of a Million; two hundred thousand Pounds to be paid in October, and the rest at fifty thousand Pounds per Annum, till all was paid. They were further required, in the first Paragraph of the second Article of their Instructions (which contains likewise the Demands of England) "above all things, to take care to live and to transact together, with a mutual and entire Confidence in all Things and Matters, to the effectual making the Peace, with the Plenipotentiaries of the most Christian King; which they were to declare to them at their first Meeting, apart of the rest, as his Majesty's express Command; as also to communicate together the Extent of their Demands, and mutually to support one another therein, so as to attain the Effect thereof, and by obviating and avoiding all Artifices that might, and probably would be set on foot to dissuade them."

In Article III, which related to the Care that was to be taken of the Allies of the War, "because his Majesty had accommodated himself to the Sentiments of the most Christian King, and that those Points did more properly touch him, they were enjoin'd to guide and direct themselves by the Mind of his Plenipotentiaries (unless in Points relating to the Protestant Religion): And with Relation to the Elector of Brandenburg, by the Disslates of the said Plenipotentiaries; the King having declar'd to the French Ambassador at London, that he would gratify his Master in making him the Mediator for re-establishing his Friendship with the said Elector: In Return whereof, they were to require all Facility in them, in Points relating to the Advantage of the Prince of Orange, pursuant to the seventh Article of the late Treaty of Confederation between the two Kings, by which it was particularly stipulated, "That both should do their utmost, that his Highness should find his Advantage in the Continuation, or the End of the War."

By Article V, they were to co-operate with the French Ministers, in procuring full Satisfaction of the States for the Crown of Sweden.

And because it was apprehended, that next to the Difficulty of inducing the States to give the Satisfaction to the two Kings, which they severally demanded, that of pacifying Spain, for the Disadvantages the would receive by it, would prove the most troublesome Part of their Commission; by Article VI, they were charg'd "to apply themselves not only to the alluring and convincing the Spanish Ministers of his Majesty's Disposition and Readiness to do all things, depending

Their Instructions.

(t) The first were officiated at all: For what Reason, I do not find any where explained.

A. D. 1673. depending on him, for the Advantage and Benefit of that Crown, but of using his utmost Credit with the most Christian King, in composing any Differences now subsisting between them, so as to obviate all future Breaches, or discomposing the Peace and Amity between them: Letting them know, how, beyond his Obligations in the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, he had, in his subsequent offensive Treaty against the States General, taken care to provide for the Maintenance of the said good Correspondence and Amity." To this also was added an obscure Hint, of their "entering easily into all Proposals of Accommodation, that may arise in the Exchange of Places, between the two Crowns, in case the Hollanders should find themselves oblig'd, for the Good of the Peace, to yield such to the Crown of France as were notoriously prejudicial to Spain: With the Reserve, of governing themselves so skilfully in this Matter, as not to give any just Cause of Jealousy or Umbrage to the Ministers of the Crown of France.

There were yet Seven Articles more in their Instructions; two of which relate to the Interests of Denmark and Portugal; one to Cologn, Hanover, and Munster; one to the Duke of Newburgh; one to forbid their coming to any Interview with the Count de Monterey, tho' he should require it of them; one directing them to give frequent and large Advertisements of the Progress of their Negotiations, and to apply for more Instructions, in case of new Difficulties; and two relating to a separate Treaty of Commerce with the States; in which, however, "they were to avoid giving the French Plenipotentiaries the least Umbrage, as if they were doing any thing therein to their Prejudice, or contrary to the perfect Concert between his Majesty and their Master; and ever making use of them for the composing any Differences, that should prove hard, betwixt them and the Ministers of the said States; that so they might see, that they did not decline their Assistance, even in those Matters.

Thus it appears, that, on our side, it was held a Matter of as much Moment not to disoblige France, as to effectuate a Peace with Holland; and on theirs, that, instead of any Thoughts of gratifying both Kings in Conjunction, their principal Aim was to bring about a Separation.

Instead, therefore, of making their Approaches towards each other, while the different Parties took such different Paths, it was improbable they should come in Sight, impossible they should join: And yet this was what the World, for so many Months, vainly expected from the Treaty of Cologn.

At the first Meeting of the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings, the Duke de Chaulnes, who was the Chief in the French Commission, gave those of England to understand, that their Orders were precise, not to stir a step, in any Article of Business, without their Concurrence: And Mr. Courtin, that they were commanded to labour the Service and Satisfaction of the King their Master, as much as that of their own: Adding, that tho' the Dutch should offer them more than the most Christian King could either pretend to, or hope for, yet they were not to hearken to them, unless the Satisfaction of his Britannic Majesty was, in the same Measure, provided for: But then, as if by way of Alternative, for so many fine things, they urg'd, there was no need to be pressing in their Demands; that they might leave it to the Dutch to make the first Advance; that a Month, or two, or three, at farthest, would ripen things very much, and dispose them (the Dutch) to conclude, that they were more in need of Peace, than they had been hitherto willing to believe: That, as yet, the Arms of both Kings had been prosperous, and that nothing press'd very hard upon either of them: That, as soon as Mistrust was taken, which hinder'd the Communication of their Conquests, and the combined Fleets had made a Descent (which was again intended) the Enemy would be more easily and effectually brought to Reason.

Thus it appear'd, at the very Threshold of the Temple of Concord, that one Party was in no haste to enter: Nor did the Dutch shew any greater Earnestness on their side: For they took the first Opportunity to lament, that their Allies, the Imperial and Spanish Ministers, were not arriv'd; which at once imply'd, that nothing could be agreed upon without their Participation; and, if so, that the Peace would be liable to an almost endless Litigation.

As to the Mediators, at their first-Interview with the Ministers of England, the Count de Tott, the Principal of them, enlarg'd upon the Interests and Vows of all Europe for a Peace; declaring, that now the War was not against Holland only, but began to involve every other State: That it would be for the Glory of the two Kings to remit of their Rigours, and suffer these People to live: That now they were sufficiently mortify'd; that they would not in a (2) hundred Years recover the Devastation of this War: That they would accept of any thing, but a ruinous Peace: That the King of Sweden had sufficient Cause to be dissatisfy'd with them, but that he had sacrific'd all to that Pity which he had for their present Miseries: Adding, that it was very much the Desire of the Mediators, that they should forthwith fall to the main Work; hoping it would be happily finish'd in a short time; the most Christian King having assur'd him (Mr. de Tott) that his Embassadors should have Orders to give all the Furtherance and Dispatch possible to the Affair.

This Discourse being communicated to the Ministers of France, according to Order, Mr. Courtin very artificially observ'd upon it, that the Swedes were very unwilling, as indeed all their Neighbours were, that Holland should be swallowed up, and the Government extirpated: That those private Leagues and Me-

A.D. 1673. nances of the Princes of Germany, now at Brunswick (such were then in Agitation, in order to form a third Party, to oblige both the others to put up the Sword, and close the Wounds of Europe) were carried on in view, and by the Contrivance of Sweden: That Sweden nevertheless dreaded to offend the two Kings, and would not attempt to save Holland, till it came to yet greater Extremities: From all which he concluded, that if the Swedes did stir, they were like to come too late, since all the French Forces would soon be at leisure to attend their Motions.

We have here a Comment on the former Text: The French first desired to delay the Peace; and here they let us into the Reason, without Reserve, viz. That Holland might be utterly swallow'd up by the War.

It is further remarkable, That, when they were first call'd upon for their Demands, they answer'd, they had nothing to ask, but that the Dutch would give Satisfaction to England; for, that being done, their Master would be content with his Conquests, and make up the Peace when they pleas'd: And yet, some Days after, it appear'd they had their Reserves; for they not only had avoided coming to an Explanation with the English Plenipotentiaries, on the main Point of the Cession of Places; but, when the Mediators undertook to digest the Claims of both Parties, in Writing, which both had in concert refus'd to do themselves, in order to lay them before the Dutch Embassadors, the Minutes they took of those of France were in these Terms: (w) Over and above what we have already discours'd upon, 1. The Religion of Malta; 2. A free Trade; 3. Re-imbargement of the Expence of the War; 4. The Establishment of the Roman-Catholic Religion.

The Dutch Ministers had been importunate to know the utmost that was expected from them; and, in order thereto, had signify'd, They had Orders to make a Peace, if they should find the Terms supportable; if otherwise, they would declare to continue the War: They had likewise, when the Cautionary Towns demanded by England, were first mention'd to them, very frankly confess'd, That they could not consent to give away any Part of their Country, for fear of the same Fate with the De Wits: And now being in the Secret of both Kings, and having in vain attempted to get rid of the Demand of the Cautionary Towns, by a Proposal for the Prince of Orange to take such an Oath as should satisfy his Majesty, Messieurs Bevering and Van Haren, set out for the Hague, as if to lay before their Masters a State of the Negotiation, and

A.D. 1673. to receive more favourable Instructions: But being accompanied by Don Manuel de Lira, Jenkins and Williamson very jolly look'd upon their Departure, as an ill Omen to the Peace.

It was the 4th of July, when these Ministers left the Place of Congress; and since the Meeting of it, the War had produced some Incidents, which demand our Notice, before we proceed with the Negotiation. And first, at Sea: The Fleets of the two Kings being (w) join'd, under the Command of Prince Rupert, the Count d'Essex, Sir Ed. Spragge, and the Earl of Ossory, made over to the Coast of Holland, in quest of the Enemy; whom they found lying at Anchor within the Sands at Shonevelt: An Attack being resolv'd upon, a Squadron of the lightest Ships were order'd to begin it: But the Dutch did not wait to receive it: On the contrary, Tromp, with the Van, weigh'd and set sail with such Expedition, that Prince Rupert, in his own Account, acknowledges, he was forced to engage sooner than he intended, for fear of losing the Weather-gage. As to the Particulars of the Fight, it is impossible to recount them, because it is impossible to reconcile the several Disagreements in the English and Dutch Accounts: As little Certainty is there in the Issue. Prince Rupert, writing to Lord Arlington, asserts, Van Tromp was so press'd by him, that he gave way; and that Sir Edward Spragge maintain'd the Fight with so much Courage and Resolution, that the whole Body of the Enemy gave way to such a degree, that, had it not been for fear of the Shoals, he would have driven them into their Harbours. Admiral (x) de Ruyter, on the other hand, in his Letter to the Prince of Orange, judges absolutely, that the Victory was on the Side of the States and his Highness. But whoever was the Pursuer, nothing was got by the Pursuit. The Allies kept their Station on the Coast; and the Dutch, tho' much inferior in Strength, being resist'd, forsook their Ports within a (y) Week, and fought the Enemy again. Another Engagement ensu'd, with the like doubtful Success: Both Parties put in their Claims to the Victory; but neither could make them good: The Dutch however deriv'd one undeniable Advantage from the two Battles, for whereas, before, the Allies thought of nothing less than making a Descent, they now found their Ammunition and Provisions so exhausted, to say nothing of their Losses and Damages, that they were glad to give over the Design for the present, and think only of seeking Repairs and Supplies in their own Harbours.

At or about the time that the two Fleets were

(w) As to this Passage, the English Ministers understood it to refer to the Article of Pinin to be ceded to France; but acknowledge they could not offer at any reasonable Guess why it should be so worded.

(x) This the Dutch had endeavour'd to prevent by lying at the Gun-Flot, to intercept the English; but by working thus a Passage, call'd the Nommes, against the Wind, they disappointed the Enemy.

(y) According to the London Gazette, N<sup>o</sup> 788, the Prince surpris'd the Conclusion of de Ruyter's Letter; which, as the Credit of the next Gazette, was as follows: "Five Ships, which were quite disabled, I have sent to Dilling to be repaired. Those of our Men of War are missing, and, I fear, lost. We have lost most of our Fire-ships, and a great many Men. I beseech your Highness to send the remaining Ships to us with all the Speed you can, for the Enemy, who lies not far from us, is much stronger than we."

(z) The first Engagement was on the 29th of May, and the second on the fourth of June.

A.D. 1673.

An Engage-ment at Sea.

(Gazette, Numb. 786.)

Answer.

Loss of the Admirals, &amp;c. II.

A. D. 1673. were thus engag'd, the French invested Mastricht, and carry'd on the Siege with so much Vigour and Success, that on the 14th of June, the Duke of Monmouth came on Duty, four several Attacks were ordered to be made, and his Grace was particularly commanded to make a Lodgment in the Counterſcarp, which he perform'd with so much Spirit and Gallantry, as render'd him deservedly famous; and six Days after, the Place was surrender'd upon Capitulation; the Garrison being allow'd to march out with all the Honours of War.

We must now return to Cologne, where we find our indifferent Successes at Sea, made no Abatement in our heavy Demands on the States; on the contrary, Orders were sent to our Ministers there, to persevere in rejecting all Offers of a Cessation, not to suffer the Demand of the Cautionary Places to be postpon'd, but to insist on it as fundamental to the rest of the Articles; and to press the French Embassadors to give in their Demands jointly with those of England; but withal to observe what Effect the taking of Mastricht seem'd to have produc'd in them with regard to the Peace; in answer to which last Particular, they write to Lord Arlington, That they had never observ'd any Haste or Concern in the said Embassadors to bring this Treaty to a quick Issue, which, they imagin'd was not suppos'd to be their Temper and Complexion when they (Jenkins and Williamson) set out from England. That before Mastricht was taken, they had talk'd as if the Loss of that Place was to bring the Dutch to Reason, and facilitate Peace; but now it was in their Hands, their Tone was alter'd, and the same good Effects were to be expected, when it should appear to the World, that the Emperor was so check'd by their Forces and Alliances, as not to dare to march in aid of the Dutch.

At the very time that the French thus dextrously endeavour'd to protract the Negotiations of the Peace, in order to obtain yet greater Advantages by Continuance of the War, the last Effort mention'd in the separate Article of the Treaty between Spain and the States, to be made by his Catholic Majesty on the King of England, was put in Practice; with what Effect, is thus explain'd in a Dispatch of Lord Arlington's to Sir William Godolphin at Madrid:

 "Don Bernardo de Salinas hath been many Days in this Court, with Letters of Credit from the Prince of Orange, and Conde de Monterey, which his Majesty refus'd to receive, the Spanish Embassador having told him, that the Subject of his Errand was, to propose our making a separate Agreement with the Dutch; he confidently averring, that the French were doing so. Although his Majesty was very little edified with his Proposition, yet he hath made very much of him, and carried him long to see the Fleet set sail, (the third time) containing him much with his Desires of a Peace, and demonstrating to him, how evidently the Interest of Spain, and the Prince of Orange would prosper, in the speedy ending of it. He, on his part, argued very strongly the Convenience his Majesty would have in making a separate Peace; for the composing all Humours here at Home, and the Ease of the Expence of the War; the Advantage the Prince of Orange would receive by it; and the Quiet of all Christendom; threatening, that without it, Conde de Monterey would find himself oblig'd to put in Execution the present Orders he hath from Spain, to declare the War. His Majesty reply'd, That he could neither in Prudence or Honour treat alone; that he believed better of the most Christian King, than to suppose he would do it. In a word, he is gone back again with better Thoughts of us and our Affairs than I think he brought hither."

Care was immediately taken to send an Account of this Incident, and the King's Behaviour upon it, to Cologne; which gave Mr. Courtin the Hint to say many fine things of his Majesty; as likewise to declare, "That France would either make no Peace at all, or else such a one, as should be fully and absolutely to his Satisfaction."

It is necessary to observe in this Place, that the French had begun to entertain some Suspicions of England. The two unsuccessful Engagements at Sea had been follow'd with some Changes at Court; in particular, Lord Clifford, the great and profess'd Enemy to the Dutch, had resign'd, and Sir (z) Thomas Osborne had been honour'd with the Treasurer's Staff in his Room. It was soon after this, that of this Preference of Sir Thomas Osborne, Sir John Ker gives the following Account.

 "Now it was that my Neighbour, Sir Thomas Osborne rose to the great Office of High Treasurer of England; my Lord Clifford resigning his Staff, and confiding himself a Papist. The Duke of Buckingham was chiefly instrumental in bringing that about for Sir Thomas, by a Bargain he made between Lord Gifford and him, namely, that Sir Thomas should estimate, and give him half the Salary." REASONS'S Memoirs, p. 21.

It may not be amiss to add, that this gave rise to the two following Articles in the Gazette:
 "Whitehall, June 19. The Right Honourable Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, having this Morning resign'd into his Majesty's Hands his Staff, as Lord Treasurer of England, his Majesty was pleas'd to deliver the same to Sir Thomas Osborne, Knight and Baronet."
 "Whitehall, June 23. In the last Gazette, there was an Omission of the Title of the Right Honourable Sir Thomas Osborne, who, for his great Merit and eminent Services, was, formerly, created Lord Viscount Dunblaine in Scotland; and, in further Confidence of his great Abilities, is now made Lord High Treasurer of England."

When his Lordship came to take the usual Oaths in the Court of Chancery, the Chancellor took the Opportunity to entertain him as follows:
 "My Lord,
 "Kings are as God, and bestow Honour, Riches and Power where they please; but in this they are as Men, that they can only choose, not make a Person adequate to their Employment; For, if their Choice be merely Favour, not Fitness, their Omnipotency is quickly fen through. There is no move to be asked of you in this Condition, but that you know your own Interest, and that will secure you to the King's and the Nation's. I repeat them thus together, because none but Minister's in State-Matters can think of them alunder. And let me say to your Lordship, that however happy you have been in arriving to this high Station, yet Fate has not one mine of Fortune. Many great Men have proved unfortunate, in not observing that the Address and Means to attain great Things, are sometimes very different from those that are necessary to maintain and establish a sure and long Possession of them." The new Treasurer gave the Chancellor his Thanks in public; but the next Day, when he had consider'd the Terms of the Speech, it is said, he sent to revoke them.

without Success.

A. D. 1673.

Don Bernard de Solinasariv dat London; where he had been receiv'd and entertain'd with so much Civility, that the French mistook it for Confidence; and from these several Circumstances put together, concluded we were dispos'd to leave them to shift for themselves: How caustly has been already shewn.

But the very Steps that were taken by England more and more to oblige and make sure of France, render'd the States desperate; and they resolv'd immediately thereupon to close with the Emperor upon any Terms. Accordingly, they made such vigorous and effectual Instances, both at the Imperial and Spanish Courts, that the latter ratify'd their Treaty; the former join'd with it; and such Remittances of Money, both from Spain and Holland, were made to Vinno, as enabled his Imperial Majesty not only to take the Field, but to provide for his Troops through the whole Campaign.

It was impossible such Motions as these should be long a Secret at Cologn; the Mediators, on the contrary, soon receiv'd sufficient Intelligence of what was in Agitation, to give the Alarm to the English, and French Ministers, and to warn them of the insuperable Obstacles that must necessarily arise to a general Peace, in case they neglected this great and important Crisis. This drew the Secret from the first, That their Master would be content with Goree and the Brill, which was the less, they then said, he would go: But as to the French, they so little thought of Abatements, that they were not as yet furnish'd with Instructions on that Head: And, when they were, it appear'd, that the Moderation of his most Christian Majesty consisted in waving his former Claim of Maffricht, Grove, Boisleduc, Breda, Bergen of Zoom, Lillo, &c. with their Dependences, being generally the whole Country between the Meuse and the Seldis; and, in lieu of what he then possess'd, condescending to take up with the Town and Isle of Bammell, the Fort of St. Audré, the Isle of Voorne, the Town of Nimeguen, and that Part of Guelderland which lies between the Waabl and the Meuse.

About this Time the two Dutch Ministers Beveren and Haren, rejoin'd their Collegues at Cologn; but no longer with any sincere Purpose to expedite a Peace: On the contrary, both the States and the Stadtbolder had determin'd not to listen to the Proposals of the two Kings jointly; and having endeavour'd, tho' in vain, to detach his Britannic Majesty, had taken their Measures to carry on the War to the last Extremity; chusing rather to be undone by an obstinate Defence, than by a tame Submission.

It is needless to observe, that this Resolution was worthy of a free Republic: Every body must feel the Force of it; and had they acted any other Part, they had justly deserv'd to be render'd infamous to all future Ages.

From this Period, it is obvious to every Reader, that nothing was to be expected from the Congress; and that the sole Business of the Dutch was so to behave, as, if possible, to leave the Odium of the Disappointment on the Allies.

We do not think ourselves oblig'd, therefore, to pursue every particular Winding of this endless Maze; but only to touch on such remarkable Particulars, as serve to illustrate the several Views of the several Parties.

As the States had now alter'd their Measures, their Embassadors alter'd their Department: They had been refer'd, gloomy, and ambiguous, before; they were become explicit, confident, and open, now: No longer under the Awe of Slavery, they talk'd and acted like Men who resolv'd to be free: At which the Ministers, not only of the Allies, but the Mediators, took offence; as if it was Insolence in the Members of a Republic, to claim an Equality with those who had the Honour to have Kings for their Masters.

To the Proposals of England and France, which they receiv'd at their Departure, they brought Answers from the States, which partook of the same Spirit; and which appear'd nearer akin to Manifestos, in Justification of themselves, than Concessions to forward an Accommodation.

In their Reply to the French Demands, they ascrib'd the War to the Ill-will, or rather Malignity, of the most Christian King to their Government: They reproach'd him with having assist'd them from time to time, rather in shew than fact; and more than insinuated, that he dealt fraudulently with them during the last War with the English: For Peace-sake, however, they offer'd to surrender a great Part of the County of Zutphen, and the Town of Hullst, with its Dependences; with the Proviso, that they were deposited in the Hands of the Spaniards, till an Equivalent was provided for them.

It may be taken for granted, that they were as free in their Invectives against the Conduct of England; for their Letter to the Mediators, concerning the English Pretensions, consisted of six Leaves in Folio, written on both Sides; and the Paragraphs immediately to the Point did not begin till towards the Bottom of the Fourth. But the English Plenipotentiaries had the Discretion to decline the Hearing of what they were ill prepar'd to answer, and so dextrously avoided a Difficulty, which the French Plenipotentiaries fell into, and had no other way to get rid of, than by-urging, It was beneath the Greatness of their Master to shew Resentment on any such Account.

As to the Claims made upon them, they began with the Flag; and agreed, that his Majesty should be suffer'd to explain the Article in the Treaty of Breda, relating thereto, in his own Sense.

For the Sum of Money, the Answer was express, They would not give one Penny.

To the Fishery, they were content nothing should be said of that Matter in the Treaty.

To the Regulation of Commerce: They were not against a Treaty for that Purpose; but then it should be free; the Terms reciprocal; and the Sword out of the question.

and that of England.

A. D. 1671.

The Matter of Surinam, they said, was perfectly settled by the Treaty of Breda, and executed beyond Exception, on their part.

As to the Prince of Orange, there was so perfect an Understanding between the States and him, that they had express Orders from his Highness, not to admit any such Article to be treated of.

For Cautionary Towns, they were surpris'd at the Demand: His Majesty had no Advantage over them by his Arms; the English had been three times, in three several Wars, the Aggressors; and, therefore, Security belong'd more properly to them.

This was the Brief of their Reply; and, as we have had the Secret in their Treaty with Spain, there is no occasion to be more circumstantial.

The Court of England was now become sensible, that Holland would never comply with the Article of Places; that the Mediators had express'd their Disgust at the very Demand; and even that France would not effectually support them in it, and had therefore sent Orders to the Plenipotentiaries to drop it, in case the Peace could no otherwise take effect.

Finding therefore the Dutch Ministers so intractable, and the Peace growing desperate, Jenkins and Williamson were convinced, they could not retract this ungrateful Clause too soon: And accordingly did retract it in form; with the Proviso, however, that some farther Sum of Money besides the whole Million, or some Places or Things in the Indies, might be granted in lieu of it, together with all the rest of the Conditions before enumerated, to show how sincerely his Majesty desired the Peace, and how little he ever sought or intended the Ruin or Destruction of Holland.

It was upon this Occasion that the Mediators, express'd themselves to be so overflowing with Veneration for his Majesty's wonderful Moderation, and Condescension; and complain'd of the Dutch Embassadors, as fierce, rude, and intractable; because still persisting in their Refusal of one Penny, by way of Indemnification for the Expence of the War.

For Men indeed, who affect'd to be in search of the Paths of Peace, it cannot be deny'd, that their Behaviour was liable to Exception. When the Mediators talk'd, that the two Kings would prefix a Time for their final Answer; they reply'd, with a Mixture of Scorn and Indignation, that in ten Days, or as soon as they pleas'd, they should receive one. When the French, after this, made yet farther Abatements, and the English receiv'd Orders to wave that Article relating to the Perpetuity of the Stadholdership in the Family of the Prince of Orange, they continued still immovable, nor would make the smallest Advance, while the Points yet insisted on, continued to be so exorbitant: But, on the contrary, the 9th of October, they sent a Paper to the Mediators, by their Secretary, in which they formally and generally refus'd the Propositions of the two Kings, as excessive, ruinous, and introductory of eternal Servitude; declar'd, they had enter'd into Measures, for a War, with the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Lorraine; and, in a manner, protest'd against any further Proceedings in the Negotiation, till their Allies, the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Lorraine, were admitted into it as Principals.

These Proceedings, and certain haughty and unpolish'd Expressions in their common Conversation, were the Crimes of which they were accus'd; for which they were publicly reproach'd with Arrogance, Rudeness, and Insolence; and for which the States themselves were made responsible, in all the Courts of Europe.

But those who were so severe in their Censures seem to give no Weight to the Propositions the Dutch had receiv'd; they do not carry their Reflections back to the Origin of the War; they do not take a Survey of the Calamities it had brought on their Country, or the ruinous and deplorable Condition in which it still continued; they do not recollect the dictatorial Air with which the Propositions of the two Kings had been made; and, least of all, do they attend to the Provision made in favour of England, by the separate Article of de Lira's Treaty, of April, between Spain and the States; and the Voyage and Reception of Don Bernard de Salinas to England in consequence of it; or care to know, that, after this last Effort, the States thought no more of Peace, unless upon such Terms as should equally consist with their Honour and their Interest.

It is further remarkable, that the Plenipotentiaries of England uniformly accuse their Brethren of France, as already has been instanced, of not being over-desirous of Peace, or solicitous to forward it; And, on the other hand, when it was apprehended the Congress was upon the point of breaking, and the English Ministers were for setting forth a Paper to justify themselves, and throw the Scandal of the Breach upon the Dutch, Mr. Courtin and his Followers took upon them to say, that, if they pretended to satisfy any Party with a Declaration, or Account in Writing, of their own, they would have a great Difficulty to calculate such Writing for the several and different Apprehensions of those concern'd in it: For tho' their own People at home, might be satisfy'd with the Demands they made, of Acknowledgment for the Fishery, the Settlement of their Commerce, and the Establishment of the Prince of Orange in the Place and Figure of his Ancestors, they would never be able to satisfy either the Mediators, or the uninterested Part of the World, in those their Pretensions; nay, that they, the Mediators, would have a plausible Pretence, very much to the Prejudice of the common Cause, not to execute their Treaty, or to declare against the Dutch (as they were oblig'd) while they should be able to say, That tho' France, and the two Bishops (of Cologn and Munster) had moderated themselves as much as could be desir'd, yet that they, the Swedes, could not declare, that Holland did refuse a Peace upon reasonable Terms, as long as England, one of the Allies, not to be separated in the Treaty, should stand upon things, that they

Upon the nulling of Treaties (such as that with the King of Macassar, in the East-Indies) which contain Advantages which the Dutch had purchased with the Expence of their Blood and Treasure. And 3. Upon the Change of the very Essence of their Government, into such an Establishment as was demanded for the Prince of Orange.

Thus stands the Record in the Letters of Sir Leoline Jenkins, and hence it is manifest, that not only the Dutch, but even the Allies condemned each other.

In this Interval, viz. on the 11th of August, the two Fleets had come to another general Engagement, which was more obstinately fought than either of the former. The Dutch had two apparent Advantages; (a) the Wind, and the near Neighbourhood of their own Coasts (which they wisely retreated to, before they would venture to face the Enemy) and a third Incidental, which prov'd of more Consequence to them than both the others. The French with the White Squadron, had the Van, in order to begin the Action with Admiral Bankert and the Zelanders, which they made a Feint of doing, but soon gave over: Whence it follow'd, that Rear Admiral Martel, who was not in the Secret, and resolv'd to fight in earnest, was surrounded with five Ships at once; against all whom he nevertheless defended himself so bravely, that he disabled one, struck a Terror into the rest, and rejoyn'd his Squadron in safety.

It is to be presum'd that the general Orders which the Prince had given, were for the whole Fleet to work, as to endeavour to recover the Wind of the Enemy; in which Disposition the Battle began: Sir Edward Spragge, and Admiral Van Tromp, were Commanders of the same Turn and Character; fearless of Danger, careless of Life, covetous of Glory, impatient of Rivalship; they had always fought out each other in every Battle, as if neither knew of any other Enemy that was worth a Controversy: In this they again did the same: Van Tromp was now the Challenger; and Spragge, instead of continuing his Course, and keeping the Line, according to the Prince's Orders, was so fir'd with Indignation, to be call'd upon to fight, that he back'd his Sails, and waited for his daring Opponent, who, fierce as he was, kept aloof, ply'd him at Distance, and having the Wind, made his Impressions almost where he pleas'd.

In this Interval, the Prince and de Ruyter with the Centers of both Fleets were hotly, but unequally, engag'd. The Rashness of Sir Edward Spragge had given the Dutch Opportunity to intercept his own Rear Admiral, Sir John Chickley with his Division: And the French, on the other hand, with inexcusable Tameness or Perfidy, suffer'd Bankert to join de Ruyter, and fall upon the English, without stirring to the Assistance of the one, or offering to give the least Interruption to the other; so that by Noon his Highness was wholly surrounded by the Dutch; being pres'd by de Ruyter and his Division on his Lee Quarter, an Admiral and two Flags more on his Weather Quarter, and the Zealand Squadron on his Broadside to Windward. On his own Magnanimity now depended both his Life and Glory; and so wisely did he give his Orders, and so bravely were they executed, both by Officers and Seamen, that in two Hours time, he made his Way through the Enemy, and rejoyn'd Sir John Chickley.

It was now he thought of the Blue Squadron, under Sir Edward Spragge, which was at three Leagues Distance, and of the Expediency of reuniting the whole Fleet. Accordingly he made all the Sail he could towards them; de Ruyter did the same to support Van Tromp; so both Fleets ran down Side by Side, within Cannon Shot, but not firing on either Side.

We left those Heroes, Tromp and Spragge, engag'd Ship to Ship, which last had fought for three Hours under the grievous Disadvantage of being to Leeward, and consequently blinded both with his own Smoke and that of the Enemy. Before one o'Clock, his Main, and Mizzen Masts, were carry'd by the Board; and Tromp thought of nothing less than boarding, or destroying him with his Fireships; but was prevented in both those Designs by the intrepid Earl of Offory, who not only supported Spragge, thro' the whole Engagement, but disabled his Enemy in the midst of his Triumph. Spragge took this Opportunity to leave his own Ship, the Royal Prince, and hoisted his Flag on board the St. George: Tromp did the same, quitting the Golden Lion for the Comet Star. And now to take or destroy the Royal Prince, became the greatest Enjeu of the Dutch, as it was the great Endeavour of the English to prevent it. This Trophy lost or gain'd, had put the Victory out of Dispute. All the Efforts, therefore, that Skill or Courage could make, were here exhausted; Tromp attack'd; Spragge defended. Fireships were let loose on one Side, and render'd ineffectual on the other. In the midst of this Variety of Horrors, the St. George lost her Main Mast; and as Spragge was going on board a third Ship, a Shot which had pass'd thro' the St. George, took his Boat, and he perish'd in the Ocean, over which he had so often triumph'd.

Such was the dreadful Scene, when Prince Rupert came up, who immediately order'd two Frigates to take the Royal Prince in tow; and then made a Signal for all the other Ships of the Blue Squadron to join him; but of those, only the two Flags, the Earl of Offory, and Sir John Kemphorne, were in a Condition to obey him: The rest were useless. His next Care, therefore, was to interpose between them and the Enemy: After which, he summon'd the French, who were all this while quiet Spectators of the Fray, to his Assistance, by hanging out the Signal for a general Attack, which they were pleas'd not to regard now, and pretended not to understand afterwards.

(14) Which were owing to the French, who by twice the Night before, tho' they received repeated Orders from the Prince to make Sail.

At this Juncture, de Ruyter, with the Residue of the Dutch Fleet, came up close with the Prince, and renewed the Attack with all possible Fury. Out of ninety, his Highness had but thirteen serviceable Ships, exclusive of the French, remaining; yet even with this wretched Remnant of a Fleet, did he not only make Head against the Enemy, but recover'd the Wind, and by the Help of two Fireships, put them into great Disorder: Upon this he again made the Signal for the French to engage; and had they even then, late as it was, obey'd it, without sharing the Danger of the Fight, they would have acquir'd the Honour of the Victory: But they continu'd still insensible, and the Prince found it expedient to give over the Contest, and make the best of his way to Port, whither he carry'd along with him the Name and Merit of a (b) Victory, without any of the Advantage.

It is but Justice to the People of England, to observe, that they fight to the last; that they deride Danger, that they despise Death, and that Despair, which freezes the Hearts of most other Nations, only serves to render them more terrible. Thus, in the Case immediately before us, they owed their Safety to their invincible Resolution. Had they been capable of Fear, they had been destroy'd; and yet even here, while we do Honour to those who disdain'd to be conquer'd, can we help a Retrospect to those, who scarce ever return'd, but indisputable Conquerors? Blake, Dean, &c. And who, at the End of our glorious War, gave Law to that very Commonwealth, which now could not be humbled by two, tho' in the last empowered with the united Arms of both England and France?

To return: Of the Behaviour of the French, something still remains to be said. In the first Engagement of this Summer, both Prince Rupert and de Ruyter, in their respective Accounts of the Battle, bear witness that they behaved bravely; and it is certain the Losses of that Day fell principally upon them. Hence a Jealousy arose that they were sacrific'd; and not only the French but the English, who were of that Faction, made no Scruple to declare as much. The Prince was charg'd with being averse to the War, and with betraying the Cause if it was his Duty to support; perhaps rather maliciously than truly: For what Man in his Series would prostitute his Interest, Importance and Glory, to gratify the Views of a Party? However this may be, in the Accounts of the second Engagement, no Mention is made of the French at all. And of the third, it does not appear that any Account was publish'd by Authority, tho' it is affirm'd in Gazette 149, that one was in the Press. It is notorious the Truth could not have been publish'd without creating a Quarrel between the two Nations; and we are told, the Prince in his Representations had not spar'd them: Their lying by twice, when they had express Orders to set sail; their quitting the Battle, almost

(b) The Accounts sent by the Admiral de Ruyter and Van Tromp, to the States, were as follow:

" My Lord,
" In my last of the 20th Instant, I gave you an Account that we that Day got Sight of the Enemies Fleet, which the Wind of us: We failed together that Night B. S. E. and when we supposed ourselves near enough to the Coast of Holland, we tack'd and stood W. N. W. when the Wind veer'd to the E. next morning by the Break of Day, we found ourselves within Sight of the Coast of Holland; and to Lewards of the Enemy, upon which, we gave the Signal to draw out into a Line, in order to attack the Enemy, who expect'd us with full Sail, so that between eight and nine we engag'd; we again Prince Rupert, the Heer Banckers against the Count d'Elzevir, and the Heer Tromp against Sir Edward Spragge. We engag'd through one another, so that sometimes the one, and sometimes the other had the Wind: The Enemy endeavour'd to do much with their Fireships, of which they had 28, and whereof they have just nine or ten, several of which our Shillips took, or forced to let themselves on fire: we likewise spent four or five. A Captain of an English Fireship brought on board me, reports that five or six Days since, the Enemy took a Forerunner of our East India Ships, who was separated from the rest. The Fight continu'd till after Sun-set, when the Enemy left us, and stood for their own Coast, being very much disabled. Sir Edward Spragge's Ship had lost all her Masts, and was tow'd off by several other Frigats. We know of one great English Man of War that is sunk. On the other Side we have not lost one Ship. Of our Commanders are Lieutenant Admiral de Leiffth, Vice-Admiral Souwerij, Captain Van Gelder, and Captain Souwerij; and others wounded. I shall hereafter give your Lordship a more particular Account. We thank almighty God that we can still keep at Sea.

MICHAEL DE RUYTER.

" My Lord,
" The Royal Fleets of England and France, having the 20th Instant had the Wind of us, the 21st by break of Day we found them to the Leeward of us, the Wind E. S. E. a fair Gale, and good Weather, we being about a Mile from Petion, we failed together Northwards; about eight the Enemy came on, and stood to the Southwards, and we did the like, their Fleet consisting of 150 Sail great and small; Lieutenant Admiral Banckers had the Vanguard against the French, the Heer de Ruyter attack'd the Squadron of Prince Rupert, and we that of Sir Edward Spragge. About nine our whole Fleet was engag'd, keeping our Course S. and by W. and S. S. W. We being come up with Sir Edward Spragge, did to entertain them with our Cannons, that we shot down the Main and Mizzen Masts, when we intended to have board'd him, or to have burnt him by one of our Fireships, but found for great Opposition from his Seconds, and other Ships of his Squadron, that we were wholly disabled, as well in our Sails as in our Rigging and Masts; whereupon we went over into the Cross Straits, and there put on the Admiral's Flag, which was about two in the Afternoon; in the mean time the Enemy had got the Wind of us, however, our Ships did not do the least their Duty, so that the Enemy have hardly five Ships but are so disabled, that they will long remember it. The Fight lasted till seven at Night, when we put them to flight. Lieutenant Admiral Souwerij being kill'd, I intend this Day to go on board his Ship the Elephant. We have not lost one Ship that I know of. What sail'd in de Ruyter and Banckers Squadrons, I refer you to them for an Account. I am, &c.

VAN TROMP.

(c) In North's Examen, p. 51, we find the following Passage, which the Author tells us was left by a Person of Honour who waited on King Charles II:

" XLIII. September 26, 1663. Upon Discourse with a Person well able to give an Account, I was told, that the last Dutch War, whilst the Duke of York commanded in Chief, the Earl of Shaftsbury advis'd in every thing, as if on purpose to ruin the Duke. And afterwards, when Prince Rupert commanded, who was apt to take the Advice of the Earl of Shaftsbury, the Prince carried every thing counter. And, when he had great Advantages of the Dutch, maliciously neglected them, to the Hazard of the Fleet; and acted in every thing as on purpose to ruin the French, who were still in Bella; and refused to lend Men in the Helles or Pelides, where it might have been in their Power, if Holland had refused a just Peace, to have drowned most of their Country. And when the Duke of York, in the Beginning of the Year, would have join in the Schwarze, the Earl of Shaftsbury was again in, and would not let it be; but, in September, would by all means have had it to do, till the Captains openly declared against it, because, as the Weather for the most part is then very casual, any Storm in the North-Weft would certainly have driven the Fleet upon the Coast, and lost all the great Ships."

moit at the very Onset; their leaving (d) Martel to be the Victim of his own Generosity, and their Neglect of the Prince's Signals, when first the Distresses of their Allies, and afterwards their own Glory call'd upon them not to earn, but accept of a Victory; were Circumstances which would admit of no Excuse nor Palliation: And if any had been attempted, it must have given rise to a Controversy, which would have let in more Light than the Times would bear: For it must have been prov'd, that either they had deserted their Friends, or were in concert with the Enemy; it being observable, the Dutch and French equally spared each other.

Nor were the Reflections of the Public confin'd to the French only: The Duke of Tyck had been oblig'd, by the T. H. Act, to avow himself a Papist, and quit his Employments, but was suffer'd to retain his Power over the Fleet: Hence, tho' the Prince had the Command, the Duke had the Influence; and it was alleg'd, that, in compliance to the last, all manner of Difficulties and Discouragements were thrown into the Way of the first, in order to furnish Pretences against his Conduct, and to disappoint his Views. These things were alleg'd, but with what Truth is uncertain. There were Factions in the Fleet, as well as at Court; and they made it their Business to asperse and blacken one another.

It has been already observ'd, that on the Success of this Summer depended the Continuance of the War: And it was more especially for this Reason, that nothing had been omitted, in the Way of Project or Preparation, to strike a decisive Blow, and compel the Dutch to comply with his Majesty's Demands. A Defeat was the great Object in view; and these several Engagements at Sea had been fought only to favour it: In the two first, Land-forces were actually sent on board the Fleet, on the Presumption, that they would be useful in the Action, and, without that they might be in readiness to disembark when it was over: But the Inconveniences attending them were found an Over-balance to their Usefulness: For which Reason, during the third Expedition, they were left encamp'd at (e) Yarmouth, to the Number of Six thousand, under the Command of Count Schomberg; whence it was understood they might easily and speedily be waisted over to Zeebad, as soon as the allied Fleet had clear'd the Sea of the Enemy.

But the French, who did not like our present Demands on the Dutch, had no Intention that we should have it in our Power both to enslave, and to exact the Performance of them; and therefore took care, as we have seen, to render this great Design abortive.

There was still one Enterprize more, which the King countenanced, and which promis'd fair to soften at least, if not atone for, the Miscarriages of the Year: It was a Design of the Earl of Ossory's upon Helvoetslooy; who, when he was last in Holland, had there seen with Indignation the Royal Charles, taken by the Dutch at Chatham, laid up, with all the Maest Squadron, as in a secure Harbour, and he had, from that time, been desirous of an Opportunity to revenge the Disgrace that this Nation suffer'd at Chatham, by returning another of the like kind upon Holland.

He received about this time Advice from a Correspondent in that Country, that this Place, where Twenty-two of the largest of the Dutch Men of War were laid up close by one another, and which for its great Importance, used to be well guarded, was then left with a small Garrison of only two Companies of Foot; and that the Batteries at the Entrance of the Port, were in no good Condition. His Lordship thereupon sent M. St. Paul, his Gentleman of the Horse, who, though a Frenchman, spoke very good Dutch, and having married a Dutchwoman of the Hague, had Acquaintance in that Town, and the Country about it, to take an exact Account of the Place, and bring him a Plan thereof. St. Paul executed his Commission with much Industry and Exactness, and great Hazard of his Life: And when he brought the Account to Whitehall, his Majesty was so pleas'd with it, that he promis'd him a considerable Reward for his Pains, tho' he never had it. The Execution of the Design appearing very feasible, the Earl obtain'd the King's Orders and Instructions to go with ten Frigates and two thousand Landmen, to make a Descent at Helvoetslooy, and to destroy the Royal Charles, and such other Ships as he found there. Every thing was ready; but on the same Night that he was to take his Leave, and to go on board, in order to execute his Design, he received the King's Countermand; which gave him much Trouble and Vexation. Sir John Narborough, who was to command next to his Lordship in this Expedition, knew the Coast of Holland and the Port of Helvoetslooy perfectly well, and was to discharge the Part of chief Pilot in the Action. When the King made Difficulties in the Matter, Sir

John

(d) When that Admiral reproach'd the Captain of his own Division for deserting him so basely, they told him plainly, they had Orders from the Admiral not to observe his Actions. [Lives of the Admirals, vol. II. p. 312.]

(e) At his Return to Paris, he was recomitted to the Bijlib; and the Relation of the Battle, which he had prepar'd, was suppress'd. The Author of the Lives of the Admirals has perceiv'd the Conclusion of it; which it seems had found its way to England, and was publish'd in a Piece call'd, An exact Relation of the Actions of the Fleet, under Prince Robert. London, printed An. 1673; and was to this Effect: "That if Count d'Effres would have fallen in with a fair Wind upon de Ruyter and Bunker, at their first engaging, when his Numbers they much exceeded the Prince, they must of necessity have been codin'd between his Highness and d'Effres; and so the Enemy would have been entirely defeated."

(f) The Author of the Lives of the Admirals, inverts the Order of these two Facts: According to him (vol. II. p. 306.) it was during the first Engagement these Forces, under the Command of Count Schomberg by company'd at Yarmouth: And (p. 309.) during the last, they were on board the Fleet. But in the Gazette, N. 807, there is the following Article:

"Yarmouth, Aug. 11. (The Day of the last Engagement) The Camp here continues very orderly and in good Condition, and the Soldiers very healthy. This Evening was bury'd one, who was accidentally kill'd by his Fellow-Soldier; and made up the Tenth that had dy'd since they came ashore here."

A. D. 1673. John told him, he would undertake, at the Peril of his Head, to carry in the Ships at Half-flood; and the Earl undertook to tell his Majesty, "that he would fire the Dutch Ships with a Half-penny Candle, or he should place his Head upon Westminster-Hall, by Cromwell's, for the greatest Traitor that ever breath'd." It was, in truth, the Easiness of executing a great Enterprize that caused it to be thwarted by a very great Man, who was jealous of the Glory that would thence redound to the Earl of Offory.

Vol. i. p. 335. Bishop Burnet makes no Difficulty to assure us, that this great Man was the Duke of Buckingham; and that he carry'd his Point by endeavouring to make the Design appear ridiculous, (g) impracticable, and tending to put things out of a Possibility of Treaty or Reconciliation.

According to Order of Time, we are now to resume the Consideration of our parliamentary Affairs: But some previous Reflections are necessary to clear our Way.

It was the great and noble Endeavour of our Saxon Ancestors, to find out the golden Mean of Government, by which, sufficient Power was lodg'd in the Crown, and sufficient Liberty was provided for the People: And as long as that just and happy Proportion is duly observ'd, no System whatever can be productive of more Ease to those who govern, or more Happiness to those who obey.

But there is in human Nature a rebellious Principle, that ever tends to Excess: And hence it has arisen, that even the very Limitations, which were set to the Subjects Privilege on one hand, and the Royal Prerogative on the other, have kept the Societies they were meant to temper into Quiet and Repose, in perpetual Tumults; which have, by turns, endanger'd and preserv'd the Constitution: Kings grew uneasy under the Restraint of Laws, and endeavour'd to substitute Will and Pleasure in their room: And, when the People got uppermost, they thought Self-preservation entitled them to make Reprisals on their Kings.

In the Course of the Reign before us, we have had abundant Proof, that the great Scope and Drift of it was, to subvert the Constitution; and either to lay aside Parliaments for good and all, or (suffer them to fit, like those of France; to give a Sanction to the Edicts of the Sovereign.

The Notoriety of this Design made it the Interest of one of the most ductile Parliaments, that, till this Period, the Nation had ever seen, to stop in their mid Career of Loyalty and Devotion, and oppose the Crown with as much Vehemence as they had ever serv'd it. By this means, Oppression was forced to quit her Hold, to disown her Purposes, and to make Professions of governing, for the Time to come, as the Laws should direct.

Thus far then Opposition, which is the first Stage of Resistance, was not only wholesome and useful, but indispensably necessary.

We are now to observe, whether the Demon of Faction, that other Pest of limited Governments, did not mix with the Sons of God, and dishonour the glorious Name of Patriotism, which it assum'd.

Bishop Burnet, speaking of the Dutch Embassadors, who were confin'd at White-Church-Court, asserts, "That they met secretly with many in England, and inform'd themselves by them of the State of the Nation: That they gave Money liberally, and gain'd some in the chief Offices to give them Intelligence."

It appears by Lord Arlington's Letters to Sir William Godolphin and Sir Bernard Gascoigne, that the States were confident, that the Parliament would neither countenance nor aid the King, in his War against them; which carries with it a shrewd Indication, that they had Reason to believe, they had a better Interest in the House of Commons, than the King himself.

In a Letter from Sir Lionel Jenkins and Sir Joseph Williamson to Lord Arlington, dated September 17, we are inform'd, that Mr. Owen, one of the Dutch Plenipotentiaries, had already a Secret, that the King would prorogue (in these said, adjourn) the Parliament from the 20th to the 30th of October; and he actually did prorogue the Parliament till the 27th, as we shall presently see.

And in another from the same Ministers, dated October 4, there is a Passage that says, "Holland and Spain have, for these three or four Months, in the most exprets and presumptuous Terms imaginable, undertaken, in a manner, to all this Part of the World, that

(f) It ought to be remember'd, to the Honour of this Nobleman, that, after the Sadley Fight on June 3, 1672, he sent one Mr. Mulvey to visit the sick and wounded Seamen in St. Thomas's Hospital in Southwark, and to relieve them according as he found their Necessities. Pursuant to his Orders, Mulvey gave to those he found most maim'd 4s. 6d. to such as had a left Hart 20s. and to those who had the slightest Wounds 10s. a piece. In September that Year he was elected Knight of the Garter, and install'd at Winster the 27th of the next Month: And that, in the November following, he was sent as Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of France, with Compliments of Condolence to that King, upon the Death of Louis Francis of France, Duke of Bourbon. He was highly cavil'd in that Court, and treated in some respects with the same Honours as a Prince of the Blood. The King press'd him to take a Command in his Army, and bidding him sit what Appointments he pleas'd, added, "as if in Frans au desle. I know I shall be) though you are born to a great Estate, yet whilst your Father lives, you are in

"the Condition of a Cader." His Lordship excusing himself, the King sent Mr. de Tournon the next Day to his Lordship, who told him, that the King was pleas'd to bestow a Command upon him, and desired him to sit what Command he would like of, and that in sitting he would be as bold as a Lion. His Lordship returned him a Conyolvement in answer 4 upon which he said, "Come, my Lord, I see you are not dead; let me speak for you. Will 20,000 Pistoles for Equipage, and 20,000 Pistoles a Year do? if not, say what will you have, and chuse what Command you please." The Earl Bill declined the Offer, saying, he was already engag'd in the Sea-service of his own Prince in the War against the Dutch. At his parting from the Court of France, he was presented with a Jewel of 2000 l. Value.

(g) Mr. Certe adds, That Mr. Ellis was afterwards upon the Place with his Lordship, who found the Plan St. Paul had brought him very exact, and the thing as easy to have been executed, as he had before imagin'd.

A. D. 1693. that the Parliament, at their Meeting, will not only peremptorily refuse all manner of Supplies to the King, but proceed to the obliging his Majesty, forthwith to change all his foreign Alliances and Interests."

No doubt the King's Interests, and that of the Nation, had hitherto appear'd to be widely different: And the Alliances he had fram'd, tho' favourable to himself, were ruinous to his People. It was therefore the Duty of the People's Representative to oppose them; but not in concert with an open Enemy: Such a Concert it appears there was; and it is scarce reasonable to suppose it had any other than a criminal Foundation. In a word, under the Shadow of Oppression and Corruption, Faction takes the surest Root, and spreads to the largest Growth: Remove the Plant, and you kill the Weed: And in an Age of Prostitution, those who cannot sell themselves at their own Price at home, if there is a foreign Market, will find their Way to it.

During the Recess, the Duke of York, to strengthen his Interest, had enter'd into a close Connection with France, and resolv'd upon a second Marriage, with the Daughter of the Duke of Modena. The Earl of Peterborough was his Agent at that Court; and found no other Difficulty in accomplishing the Match, than what arose from the Court of Rome, where a Resolution had been taken to insult on a PUBLIC CHAPEL, for the Exercise of the Roman Catholic Religion. This could not be comply'd with; the Court of Modena demurr'd; Time pass'd: It was foreseen, that the Parliament, at their next Meeting, would reform the Bill for preventing the Intermarriages of the Royal Family with Papists. It was levelled at the Duke, and he was under the greatest Concern to disappoint the Effects of it; which he call'd being expos'd to the Violence of Parliament. While he was thus perplex'd, the Court of Rome yielded: Lord Peterborough marry'd her, as the Duke's Proxy, and conducted her to Paris.

When the Affair had gone thus far, both Houses met, according to Adjournment; and, for fear the Commons should proceed on the Marriage, the Duke induced his Majesty to prorogue the Parliament for a Week: A Commission was granted for that Purpose; his Highness went early to the House, to press the calling up the Commons, before they could proceed to Business: Some Peers were that Day to be introduced; he urged the Chancellor to put that off, and to expedite the Prorogation: His Lordship coolly reply'd, There was no Hasten; and, in the mean time, the Commons resolv'd; That an Address be made to his Majesty, with the humble Desire of the House, that the intended Marriage of his Royal Highness with the Princess of Modena be not consummated; and that he may not be marry'd to any Person, but of the Protestant Religion. So much was the Temper of the House alter'd! They who had consiv'd at Sir Bernard Gascoigne's Treaty for the Roman Catholic Archduchess of Inspruck, tho' known to all Europe, now declar'd against the Princess of Modena, for no other apparent Reason, but because she was a Roman Catholic too! It was, however, owing to this fatal Spark, that so fierce a Fire was kindled in the Nation: The presumptive Heir to the Crown, by declaring himself a Papist, and by marrying a Papist, at a time, when the Growth of Popery was the Burden of every Session, alarm'd the Fearful, provok'd the Bold, and furnish'd the Designing with Pretences to render him obnoxious to the whole Nation: And, on the other hand, this personal Attack on the presumptive Heir exasperated him against Parliaments, and made him sonder than ever of those violent Councils, which, at the long run, completed his Ruin.

As to the Chancellor's Conduct, it was, to the last degree, mysterious: Tho' he had thus unpardonably offended the Duke, he still endeavour'd to make himself necessary to the King; and yet, with the Purse and Mace in his Eye, he talked with all the Warmth and Severity of Censure upon the Court, his Wit and Invention could suggest. Tho' out of Favour, he had been suffer'd hitherto to hold his Place, in Hope, that, by way of Return, he would manage the Session; as to procure a Supply for the Support of another Year's War; and how far he prostituted either his Credit, or Sincerity, as well as his Eloquence, in that Service, will be seen in his Speech to the two Houses.

Upon the 27th of October, his Majesty open'd the Session with a Speech, in which are the following Paragraphs:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,
"I thought to have welcomed you with an honourable Peace; but the Dutch have disappointed me in that Expectation, and have treated my Embassadors at Cologne with the Contempt of Conquerors, and not as might be expected from Men in their Condition. They have other Thoughts than Peace. This obligeth me to move you again for a Supply; the Safety and Honour of the Nation necessarily requiring it.
"The great Experience I have had of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, will not suffer me to believe, that the Artifices of our Enemies can possibly divert you from giving me this Supply, or that you can fail of adjusting the Proportion of it. I hope I need not use many Words to persuade you, that I am steady in maintaining all the Professions and Promises I have made you concerning Religion and Property: And I shall be very ready to give you fresh Instances of my Zeal, for preserving the establish'd Religion and Laws as often as any Occasion shall require."

His Majesty then recommended his Debt to the Goldsmiths to their Care and Consideration, and refer'd what was farther to be said to his Chancellor, who had now found cause to sink a Note in his Declaration against the Dutch; and instead of DELENDA EST CARTHAGO, contented himself with saying, That the King was oblig'd to see the House

King's Speech.

The Lord Chancellor's.

A. D. 1673.

House of Orange settled, and the (b) LOVES-TEIN, that CARTHAGINIAN PARTY, brought down; either forgetting or fancying the World had forgot, that the Populace of Holland had already sufficiently brought down the Loveslein Party, and sufficiently exalted the House of Orange. In this Outlet he affirm'd, "The King's Aims were not Conquell, unless by Obstinacy enforc'd, and that his Condescensions at the Treaty had been so great, that the very MEDIATORS had declar'd that (i) they were not reasonable to be refus'd." He then undertook to enumerate his Majesty's Demands, specifying the Flog, the Fishery, the Stadtholdership, and the East India Commerce; adding, These were all, of any moment, the King insisted on; so that the Million Sterling for the Charge of the War, was not worth mentioning. He then proceeded to say:

"In return to this candid, and fair proceeding on the King's Part, his Majesty assures you, he hath received nothing but the most scornful and contemptuous Treatment imaginable; Papers deliver'd in to the Mediators, own'd by them to be stuff'd with so unhandsome Language, that they were alarm'd and refus'd to shew them; never agreeing to any Article about the Flog, that was clear or plain; refusing any Article of the Fishing, but such a one, as might sell them the Right of Inheritance, for an inconsiderable Sum of Money, &c."

And in another Place.

"This being the true and natural State of Things, his Majesty doth with great Assurance throw himself into the Arms of you his Parliament, for a Supply suitable to this great Affair he is engag'd in. When you consider we are an Island, 'tis not Riches nor Greatness we contend for; yet those must attend the Success; but it is our very Beings are in question: We fight pro Aris & Focis in this War. We are no longer free-Men, being Islanders, and Neighbours, if they master us at Sea. There is not so lawful or commendable Jealousy in the World, as an Englishman's, of the growing Greatness of any Prince or State at Sea. If you permit the Sea, our British Wife, to be ravish'd, an eternal Mark of Infamy will stick upon us. As for the next Part of the King's Speech, I can add nothing to what his Majesty hath said. For as to Religion and Property, his Heart is with your Heart, perfectly with your Heart."

From the Circumstances already recounted, both of the War and the Negotiations at Cologn, the attentive Reader will easily discover the Disingenuity of this Harangue; and that the Word Artifices in that of the King may be understood, it is necessary to add, That the States had sent a Letter to his Majesty by a Trumpeter, dated October 14, which the Chancellor took occasion to call, An Appeal to his Majesty's People against himself. It contain'd a general Deduction of the Expedients they then had taken to prevent the Rupture, and their Advances towards an Accommodation; having a general Tendency to exculpate themselves, and throw all the Blame upon the evil-minded Persons who had exasperated his Majesty against them. In particular, it declar'd, that by the Minister of Brandenburg, those of Spain, and even by the Prince of Orange, they had represented their ardent Desire and Disposition to do any thing in their Power, to acquire again the Honour of his Majesty's good Correspondence; but that all had provid' in vain, and that his Majesty had not been induc'd by any Motive, to abate any thing of his first Rigour.

Unfortunately for the States, in their Conclusion they said too much, and in their Promises too little. The King, in his Answer, which, together with the Letter, was made (k) public, appeal'd to the Mediators themselves, to bear witness, that he had retrench'd at least one half of his first Demands, and very artificially drew his principal Interests from the Behaviour of the Dutch Ministers at Cologn, instead of the Advances made by the States, by the Interposition of Brandenburg, Spain, and the Prince of Orange in England. Of this Advantage was taken to affirm, that the Prince had never made his Majesty any Overtures of Peace; that the Brandenburg Minister had no other Commission, than to incline his Majesty, at the Recommendation of his Matter, to hearken to those that should be made; and that the Ministers of Spain never offer'd any Conditions, nor perform'd any other Office, than in general Terms, to incline the King to the Thoughts of Peace, which, it was said, he ever accept'd kindly of them.

How Dag Bernard de Solinas was receiv'd, who was sent with an express Commission to solicit the Peace, we have already seen even in Lord Arlington's own Words; and it is now necessary to add, That he was on the Point of setting out again on the same Errand, but was stopp'd at the Instance of our Court, as the same Minister farther acknowledges in his Dispatch of September 25 to Sir William Gabelphin. The Sum of the whole Controversy is this: The States were ready and willing to purchase a separate Peace with England; but were determined to put all to the Hazard, rather than make the Concessions requir'd to her, while she continu'd holding up the Train of Prussia, and bearing an under Part in the Ruin of the Republic.

But the King's Wants and the King's Supply, tho' forcibly recommended in the two

Speeches,

(k) The Party in Holland against a Stadtholder, so called from the Castle of Loveslein, where the Father of the Prince of Orange had inscribed certain of the States, when he had entertain'd Designs on the Liberties of his Country.

(l) The Dutch complain'd of this Passage to the Mediators at Cologn, and they excus'd themselves on the Difficulty of fixing the true Sense of the Expressions of another Language.

(m) Both are preserv'd in the Collection of Lord Somerset's from whence these Extracts are made. By the Words Loveslein's Party, which are us'd more than once in the Answer, it is reasonable to think, it was drawn up by the Chancellor.

Speeches, were no longer, it seems, to be the great Hinges of a Session: On the contrary, Petitions and Grievances were brought into play in their stead; and the Designs which had been entertain'd against Parliaments, now recoi'd in a most formidable manner on the Advisers. If the Nation was warm, the House of Commons was in a Flame, and such a Spirit of Opposition rag'd amongst them, as seem'd to argue, that the Struggle pro Aris & Focis, was rather with the King and his Ministers, than the States of the United Provinces, with whom we were at open War.

Order the 5th of November to be solemnly observ'd.

The first Alarm they thought proper to give the Public, was by an Order for the solemn Observance of the fifth of November; after which they adjourn'd for two Days; and in that Interval the Court thought it advisable to draw up an Answer to their former Address concerning the Duke's Marriage, in hope it would oblige them to waive any further Controversy on that Head; for, in it, they were told, That the Marriage was not barely intended, but completed, according to the Forms us'd among Princes, and by his Royal Consent and Authority; as likewise, That he could not suppose it would prove disagreeable to the House of Commons, since they had not taken the least Exception to the Treaty that had been carry'd on to the like End, in the View of the whole World, before. But it fill'd of the Effect desired; the Majority were still unsatisfy'd, and another Address was order'd against the said Marriage, with Reasons, tending to prove how much it would contribute to the Growth of Papery, as likewise to lessen the Affection of the People to his Royal Highness; and that Marriages by Proxy were dissolvable. On the receiving this Address, his Majesty said, That it was a Matter he would take into his present Consideration, and that he would speedily return an Answer.

Address against the Duke's Marriage, with Reasons.

Vote a general Test between Protestants and Papists.

In the mean time the House proceeded to vote, That a Bill should be prepared for a general Test between Protestants and Papists; by which, those who refus'd to take it, were to be render'd incapable of bearing any Office, military or civil, or to sit in Parliament, or to come within five Miles of the Court. They, likewise, endeavour'd to rouse the Passions of the Nation, by ordering an Address for a general Fast, and made their Court to the Clergy, by a Bill for the Repair of Churches, and for the better Recovery of small Tythes.

Address for a Fast; and court the Clergy.

They, likewise, made good the confident Declarations of the Spanish and Dutch Ministers before (spoken of, by a Vote, "That the House, considering the present Condition of the Nation, would not take into any further Debate the Consideration of any Aid or Supply, or Charge upon the Subject, before the Time of Payment of the eighteen Months Assessment, granted by a late Act of Parliament, entitled, An Act for raising the Sum of twelve hundred thirty-eight Thousand seven Hundred and fifty Pounds be expired; except it should appear that the Obtinancy of the Dutch should render it necessary; nor before this Kingdom be effectually secured from Papery and Papists Counsellors, and the other present Grievances be redress'd." And, either to deliver themselves from the Terrors of a standing Army, or to compel his Majesty to strike up a separate Peace with Holland, they prepar'd an Address, representing, that the standing Army was a Grievance, and a Burthen to the Nation. This was agreed to November 4, in the Forenoon, and was to have been presented to him in the Afternoon: But the King (1) disappointed all, by coming unexpectedly to the House of Lords, and ordering the Commons to attend him. It happen'd, that the Speaker and the Usher met both at the Door of the House of Commons; and the Speaker being got within the House, some of the Members suddenly shut the Door, and cry'd out, To the Chair! To the Chair! While others cry'd, The Black-Rod is at the Door! The Speaker was immediately hurry'd to the Chair, and then it was mov'd, 1. That our Alliance with France was a Grievance. 2. That the evil Counsellors about the King were a Grievance; and 3. That the Duke of Lauderdale was a Grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employ'd in any Office or Place of Trust. Upon which there was a general Cry, To the Question! To the Question! But the Black-Rod knocking earnestly at the Door, the Speaker leapt out of the Chair, and the House rose in great Confusion.

Other Grievances.

What a dreadful Picture have we here of the Disorders of these Times! It has been acknowledg'd there was sufficient Cause for a close Enquiry into the State of the Nation, and a firm Opposition to the favourite Views of the Court; as also, that the Alliance with France, and the Ruin of Holland, were equally inconsistent with the Interest and Safety of England: But surely such Violence and Fury, without any previous Remonstrances or Endeavours to bring the Court to Reason, more resembled the Turbulence of a Faction, than the Regularity and Decorum of a Senate.

Speaking of this short and angry Session, Bishop Kennet is pleas'd to say, That they, Palmer, p. 325. the Commons, did in effect declare for a speedy Peace, and encourage the States of Severin Carroll Holland to enter into a secret Correspondence with them on that Occasion. Bishop Burnet adds, That, after the Peace, Sir Joseph Williamson apply'd to Wiguesfort, who had been employ'd by the Dutch to translate their Intelligence from England, to betray his Trust, by giving up what Originals were left in his Hands; which he did: But his Discoveries reaching no higher than one du Maslin, a Clerk

End of it, and those of France on the other, with these Words in the Interval, Utrum horum movet occipit, was laid in the Parliament House, near the Speaker's Chair.

A. D. 1673. Clerk in Lord Arlington's Office, and Howard, afterwards Lord Howard of Efcrick, Sir William Temple, when sent again into Holland, was order'd to worm the Secret out of the Prince; and, after him, Lord Arlington himself. Sir William says, that it was believ'd Lord Shaftsbury himself was one of those, who, among many others, had trinkled, at least, with Holland, about raising Seditions, and perhaps Insurrections, in England, if the War continued. He adds, the Prince was staunch, and said, "He was sure the King would not press him to a thing so much against his Honour, as to betray Men, who professed to be his Friends."

Temple's Works, v. 1. p. 394.

He did, however confess to Sir William, "That during the War, neither the States nor he in particular, were without Applications made to them from several Persons, and considerable, in England, who would fain have engag'd him to head the Discontents that were rais'd by the Conduct of the Court in that whole War, which he knew was begun and carry'd on quite contrary to the Humour of the Nation, and might have prov'd very dangerous to the Crown, if it had not ended as it did."

We have here an Acknowledgment that such a Correspondence there was, tho' no Proof was sutler to appear against particular Persons: And hence we are authoris'd to express, that tho' the Measures of the Court were such as afforded very reasonable Grounds for an Opposition, yet the Opposition was form'd with such Views, was carry'd on by such Means, and was calculated to answer such Ends, as argued it was rather under the Direction of a Cataline, than a Brutus; and tended rather to gratify the Spleen or Ambition of private Persons, than to promote the true Interest of the Commonwealth.

The Commons faithful.

On the other hand, if the Commons were factious, the King was infatuated; and, hearkening to the Dictates of Passion more than Policy, inclin'd more than ever to persevere in his Connections with France, and to proceed with that insidious Power in reducing the Dutch: The more Interest they appear'd to have in his own Dominions, the more Reason he had to be exasperated against them: But, withal, it was the more necessary to make up with them. This, however, he either could not, or would not, see: And in his very Speech to both Houses, at the Prorogation, when he declar'd his Intention to make a short Recess, that all good Men might recollect themselves, he added, "And consider, whether the present Posture of Affairs would not rather require their Application to Matters of Religion, and Support against our only Competitors at Sea, than to things of less Importance."

Sketches for continuing the War, in his Speech at the Prorogation.

By this contending for the Continuance of the War with Holland, against the manifest Bent both of his Parliament and People, the Mention he was pleas'd to make of Religion was of no Force; or rather came to be consider'd as a Blind, behind which he design'd to execute his Purposes more securely. That very War was look'd upon as the great Engine of Popery; and as long as it was pursu'd, no Temperament of the Court could pacify the Fears of the People.

A. D. 1673.

For this Reason it was, that all the several Articles which were inserted, during the Recess, in the Gazette, to show how solicitous the Court was to discountenance Popery (by sending for the two Chief Justices and the Chief Baron to Council, and commanding them to consider of the most effectual Means to put the Laws in Execution against Papists Recusants; and by ordering, that no Roman Catholic, or reputed Roman Catholic, should presume to come into his Majesty's Presence, or to the Place where his Court should be, or into St. James's House, then the Residence of the Duke, or into St. James's Park) had no other Effect, than to excite the Scorn and Indignation of the Public, against those who could fancy they were to be impos'd upon by such flimsy Artifices.

Articles in the Gazette, to show the People.

An Expedient of a more rational and important Nature was, indeed, propos'd by the Duke of Ormond and Secretary Coventry (Bishop Burnet adds Lord Shaftsbury) supported by Lord Arlington; which was, for the King to remove the Duke wholly from Court and public Business, till the Fears and Jealousies of the People subsided: But it did not take effect: The Duke being founded upon it, by the King's Directions, profess'd a Readiness to obey his Majesty's Orders; but withal declar'd, he should look on those as his Enemies, who should give him any such Advice: This was enough to break the Measure: The King would not disoblige his Brother, to reconcile himself to his People; but continued to entangle himself in the Web, which he had neither Patience enough to struggle with, nor Courage to break thro'.

Proposal for the Duke of York to submit himself.

Temple's Memoirs, vol. 1. p. 395.

Burnet, v. 1. p. 305.

The Parliament had been prorogu'd till the 7th of January; and in the very next Gazette which was publish'd afterwards, Notice was given to the Public, that the King had been pleas'd to TAKE the Great Seal from Lord Shaftsbury, and to give it to Sir Henry Finch, with the Title of Lord Keeper.

Numb. 82.

The Seal taken from Lord Shaftsbury, and given to Sir H. Finch.

Thus the Duke was reveng'd on that Lord; for we are told, that it was at his Instance that he was remov'd, for the Displeasure he had given him: But how dear did that Revenge cost him! And what Reason had he afterwards to wish, that he had never enter'd the Lists with so desperate an Enemy!

Burnet, v. 1. p. 305.

His Lordship had taken equal Care to fill gently at Court, and to be receiv'd into the Arms of the People. He had been manifestly in the Depth of all the Wickedness, which gave such Strength and Credit to the Opposition; and now he took upon him avowedly to direct that Opposition, and open'd the Cry against the very Measures he had countenanced, if not advised. What is stranger still, the Opposition came forward to meet him, gave themselves up to his Conduct, consented to fight under his Banner, and avail'd themselves of the Goodness of his Head, tho' so well convinced of the Hollowiness of his Heart. Patriotism, like Charity, Lord Shaftsbury leads the Opposition.

A. D. 1673. cover'd all his Sins: He was politically regenerated; and, from being the Scourge, was look'd upon as the Saviour, of the People.

The great Business of detecting and exposing the ill Designs of the Court, of questioning the Malversation of Ministers, and of kindling a due Repentment in the People, was no longer pursued in the loose and desultory Manner it had hitherto been: Opposition became a Science, was reduced into a System, had a stated Point in view, was furnish'd with all imaginable Ways and Means to compass it, and, for a while, continued so to enlarge its Vortex, as almost to draw in the whole People.

Proceedings of the Scots Parliament.

Hitherto, all had been quiet in Scotland; tho' that Kingdom had scarce ever receiv'd so many, or such high Provocations, as under the Tyranny of Lauderdale. An Opposition had been talk'd of by Duke Hamilton; but his Grace was talk'd out of his Opposition. But now a Train of Communication was laid between the two Nations, and two Mines were sprung together.

In the Scottish Parliament of 1673, after the Nonconformists had been allow'd a breathing time from their Oppressions, it was thought proper to resume the Rod, and to use it more unmercifully than ever; It being then statuted, that no Nonconform Minister not licens'd by Council, or uber Person not authoris'd by the Bishop, should pray to God in any Meeting, except in their own Houses; and if there to more than four not being of their own Families, to be held guilty of Conventicle Keeping, and to be punish'd accordingly; And that whosoever, without Licence or Authority, as aforesaid, should preach or pray at any Field Meeting, or should convocate such Meetings, should be punish'd with DEATH and CONFISCATION OF THEIR GOODS; and the Seizures of such Persons, were not only indemnity'd for any Slaughter that should be committed in the Apprehension, but also assur'd of two hundred Marks Scots of Reward, for each Person by them seiz'd.

But notwithstanding this terrible Law, as if Danger enflam'd their Zeal, and redoubled their Devotion, these Enthusiasts still persever'd in whooping God their own way, which either to alarm'd or offended the Court, that another Session being to be held in November, 1673, in the King's (n) Letter upon that Occasion, it was thought proper to insert the following Paragraph: "You have made many good Laws, but still they have fail'd in the Execution against the Contemners of the Law. We must now, once for all, lay down such solid and effectual Courses, as the whole Kingdom may see, that we and you are both in earnest; and that if Fairness will not, FORCE may compel the Refractory to be peaceable and obey the Law."

Clause in the King's Letter against Field-Conventicles.

Such was the Face of the King towards his People, when his Commissioner Lauderdale took his leave of the Court; which, it ought to be remember'd, was after he had been voted a Grievance by the Commons of England. But when his Grace came to Edinburgh, he found that this Kind of Language was very ill suited to the Spirit of the Times. He found an Opposition form'd of the principal Nobility, with the Duke of Hamilton at their Head, who had enter'd into Measures to remove the Oppressions of their Country, as also to strike at the Root of his Vicegerency.

Accordingly, the King's Letter was no sooner receiv'd, and his own Speech made, than, instead of appointing a Committee, as a Matter of Course, to prepare an Answer to the King's Letter, Duke Hamilton mov'd, That the State of the Nation might be first consider'd, that their Grievances might be known, in order to their being redress'd. Several Members then pointed out what those Grievances were, and dwelt in particular on those of Salt, Brandy and Tobacco.

Grievances complain'd of.

The Commissioner was greatly amaz'd, if not confounded at this sudden Alteration. Hitherto the Parliament had testify'd so much Compliance with his Humours, as well as Deference to his Character, that he had fully assur'd himself of their eternal Submission. Neither was this Assurance groundless Flattery; for he knew he had put the matter to the Proof upon several Occasions: As first, when, upon a Vacancy falling out in the (n) Lords of Articles, the Parliament allow'd him to supply it by his Nomination. Secondly, When, contrary to Custom, he without Contradiction, suffer'd no more of that Body to attend than were summon'd. Thirdly, When a Motion had been formerly made, that the Summer Session might be discontinued, he passionately bluster'd out, That for this very Presumption, the thing should not be done, so long as he was Commissioner. Fourthly, It was notoriously known, That in Derogation of the late Commissioner Middleton's Services, he had said to his Majesty: Sir, if you had sent down a Dog with your Commission about his Neck, to your Scottish Parliament, he would have done all that Earl Middleton hath done. And Fifthly, He had condemn'd one Mr. William Moor, summarily to Prison, because he desired, that, after the Order of the English Parliament, Acts might be read three times before they were pass'd.

Influences of Lauderdale's Mal-administration.

Such Presumption on one Hand, and such Tameness on the other, was enough to inspire his Grace with a thorough Confidence, that he might proceed to what Lengths he pleas'd without Check or Controul.

The Grievance of Salt, was occasion'd by a Monopoly, which my Lord Lauderdale had procur'd to the Earl of Kinncaiden, his Friend,

(n) This Piece was not publish'd in England, but only the Commissioner's Speech to the Parliament, in which the Article relative to Field-Conventicles was express'd in much loose Terms, than those made use of by his Majesty.

eight Lords, chosen by the Bishops; and eight Commissioners of Shires, and eight Burgesses, chosen by the said eight Lords and eight Bishops: As also the King's Commissioner, and the Officers of State. Their Office was, during the Receipt, to prepare and digest the public Business, against the next Session.

Friend, by his Majesty's Gift, allowing the Preemption of inland, and Prohibition of foreign Salt, was worth to those concerned more than 4000 l. Sterling yearly; which was attended with not only twice as great a Diminution of his Majesty's Revenue, but the general and heavy Distress of the whole Country; it being most certain, that the Nation was thereby reduc'd to such Straits, that in many Places the poor People were necessitated to fend several Miles to Sea for Salt-Water, to supply their Indigence; and in other places were constrained to give 18 or 20 Shillings Sterling for the same Quantity of Salt, which, before the granting of this Gift, they used to buy for 3 s. and 6 d. or 2 s. so that in effect the Clamours of the People were ready to break out into Uproars and Tumults. And this Grievance was so much the more chargeable upon my Lord Lauderdale, because that when his Majesty's chief Officers, perceiving that the first Design of this Salt Project could not take, and that the Consequence of this Gift would be very hurtful, did by their Letter give full Information to the Court of the Prejudices and Dangers likely to ensue upon it; But instead of prevailing, they were rather chid and menaced for being so officious.

The second Grievance was thus occasioned: In the Parliament, 1663, there was an Act made, prohibiting the Importation of Strong Waters, and so of Brandy-Wine; whereupon in the Year 1672, my Lord Lauderdale obtains for the Lord Elphinstone, who had marry'd his Niece, a Gift of this Prohibition, and of the Seizure that should be made upon it, but the Contrivance was not to render the Law effectual, but indeed to circumvent it, for the Patentes Advantage; who in Place of hindering the Import, gave to the Merchants Licences upon Composition at the Rate of 15 or 16 l. Sterling per Tun, which would have mounted to at least 3000 l. Sterling yearly; and hereby vast Quantities were imported without the Payment of either Custom or Excise, and yet vented again in the Country at excessive Prices.

The third Grievance, was a Gift of 2 d. per Pound, upon all Tobacco imported. This Gift was granted in the Year 1673, to Sir John Nicolson for himself, and some other of my Lord Lauderdale's Friends, who were his Partakers, whereby they would have made a considerable Benefit; but with the Damage of, at least, 2 or 3000 l. Sterling yearly to his Majesty's Treasury, and the great Extortion of the People.

Opposition being what his Grace had not been us'd to, nor was provided for, he got rid of the present Difficulty by a short Adjournment; but finding the Spirit which prevail'd against him, could neither be mollify'd nor appeas'd; that a Variety of other Complaints came on, and fearing that if he should continue the Struggle, he might meet with a Fall, he thought it advisable to trust them but with five Meetings; and in them to endeavour to compromise the Dispute by removing the three Burdens before spoken of. But these Concessions were not held sufficient, and he was alarm'd more than ever, with a Proposal, That his Majesty should be inform'd by his Parliament of the true State and Condition of his Kingdom: And so strong did his Apprehensions operate upon this Occasion, that little more Liberty of Speech was allow'd, or Order observ'd. It was urg'd, That his Majesty's Prerogative was invaded, That nothing ought to be mov'd in Parliament, except by the Lords of Articles, That to them Complaints and Overtures should first be made; and that what was rejected by them, ought not to be resum'd nor proceeded with any more. And his Grace himself was pleas'd to certify the House, That if they should all agree to have Grievances other wise treated and considered, he would interpose and hinder it by his great Negative. By which the Lords of Articles, which were but a Committee of Parliament, were render'd paramount to their Constituents, and the whole Virtue of Parliaments was destroyed.

Before the Adjournment, however, three other Grievances were spoke to in Parliament, viz. The Corruption of the Mint and Coinage, by the Connivance, and for the Advantage of Lord Halson, the Commissioner's Brother: The filling the Courts of Judicature and Session, with ignorant and insufficient Men, and the general Gift of his Majesty's Casualties, such as Wards, Marriages, &c. to the Earl of Kincardin, contrary to express Acts of Parliament, to the great Prejudice of his Majesty, and Vexation of his Subjects; but without Effect. And there were still three more, viz. (a) The Accumulation of eminent Offices upon single Persons; the (b) Mal-admini-

He suffers the Parliament to sit but few times.

(1) On this Head, the plain Matter of Complaint, is stated in a Piece call'd An Account of Scotland's Grievances, (from whence the Particulars above recounted, are principally collected) was, That Lord Lauderdale had procur'd to himself, and the Lord Halson his Brother, and to the Lords of Ards and Kincardin, his particular Friends, not only the most considerable, but also the far greater Part of the most important Charters of the Kingdom, to the visible weakening of the Government, and to the Detriment of his Majesty's Service: That the Duke of Lauderdale himself was 1. President of his Majesty's Council. 2. Sole Secretary. 3. One of the Commissioners of the Treasury. 4. Captain of the Castle of Edinburgh. 5. Captain of the Lochs. 6. Agent at Court for the Boroughs. 7. One of the four extraordinary Lords of the Session. And, 8. His Majesty's High Commissioner, and all that it imports. The Lord Halson was, 1. Treasurer deputy. 2. General of the Mint. 3. One of the Lords of the Session. The Earl of Ards was, 1. Lord Privy Seal. 2. Lord Justice General. 3. Captain of the King's Guard. 4. One of the four extraordinary Lords of the Session. The Earl of Kincardin was, 1. one of the Commissioners of the Treasury. Vice-Admiral of Scotland. And, 3. One of the four extraordinary Lords of the Session.

Lord Lauderdale had also introduced the Abuse of Gifts of the Reversion or Survivorship of Places to Children and Boys, and such were the Gifts to Lord Halson and his Son, of the Mint-Office; to Sir Charles Eyles and his Son, of the Lynn's Office; and several others of that Nature: By which Connivance of Office, that, in most, us'd to be considered as vitium, his Majesty was depriv'd of that excellent Part of his Treasury, which, with no Expense, rewards Virtue best, and is indeed the only Fund of the most obliging Gratifications.

(2) Which, in the full delivery it thus explain'd: "The setting of this Head, in its full extent, would require a more prolix and accurate Computation, this is proper for my present Work; but, that I may give it to necessity

stration and Possession of his Majesty's Revenue, and the excessive Greatness of Lord Lauderdale, which should have been added to the Catalogue, but that his Grace discreetly shut the Door against them, by adjourning the Parliament on the ninth of December.

It may be easily supposed that such a Session as this broke up in a Ruffle, and that the Animosities which had shew'd themselves during the Continuance, did not end with it. In short, this new-raisd Opposition pursued their Blow; the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Tweedale, and several other Members, set out for London, to make that Representation to his Majesty, which the Parliament had deny'd: But as by the Scottish Law this was a dangerous Experiment, they were oblig'd to state the several Facts in a manner that suited more with their own peculiar Safety, than with the declar'd Sense of a whole Kingdom. It was to contriv'd, that an anonymous Letter was put into the King's Hands, containing the Sum of their Complaints, as also the following Proposals for the re-establishment of the public Peace:

1. That a new Commissioner be named and appointed to hold the next Session, and conclude the Parliament.

2. That the Duke of Lauderdale be confirm'd in his Places of President of the Council, and one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, and have your Majesty's Indemnity ratify'd in Parliament for all things past.

3. That there be two Secretaries named and appointed to reside at Court, pro vice, for your Majesty's impartial Information in all Affairs.

4. That the other eminent Offices be duly distributed and confer'd upon deserving Persons.

5. That the Commissioners of your Majesty's Treasury with such as you shall be pleas'd to add to them, be appointed to consider the Revenue, and its Charge, with the best Means of its Regulation and Improvement, and to report.

6. That Men knowing in the Law, and otherwise well qualified, be named to the Vacancies that are or may be in the Session, through the Removal of such as the Parliament, on trial, shall find to be insufficient.

7. That necessary Instructions be given to your Majesty's Commissioners for the due Redress of all other Grievances, and also for quieting and removing Dissatisfactions in Matters Ecclesiastic.

8. That there be pass'd in Parliament an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity for the establishing of the Minds of all your good Subjects.

These Proposals were modest enough to deserve more Regard than they met with. 'Tis true, the King gave the Remonstrants good Words and fair Promises, but continu'd the Duke of Lauderdale in the same Plenitude of Power as before.

It is now necessary to look abroad again. Till the Alliance between the Emperor, Spain, and the States was ratify'd, the Prince of Orange seems to have contented himself with standing upon the Defensive only: But scarce was that great Affair completed, before he began to bestir himself in earnest, and as the Season of Action was almost over, resolv'd to redeem time, by making the best Use he could of the Remainder.

He began with Naerden, which he took from the French in September, and thereby render'd Amsterdam easy; the two Places being but three Leagues asunder. In October he put in Execution his great Design of joining the Imperial Auxiliaries, under Count Montecuculi; who, on their Side, having made the proper Dispositions for the same End, both Armies met towards the latter End of October at Bonne, which Place they immediately invested, and in ten Days time carry'd; the French neither making any Attempt, or Motion towards raising the Siege, or taking any Advantage of the Absence of the Prince, to push their Conquests in the United Provinces.

The Honour of this Exploit his Highness could not be depriv'd of; for it was on his Side only the Place was distress'd; and as the principal Efforts had been made by, so the principal Loss fell upon, the Dutch: But neither they, nor he, had any Share of the Advantage;

Naerden taken by the Prince of Orange.

And Bonne, in conjunction with the Imperialists.

fary Evidence, and also discover more fully the Fruits and Effects of my Lord Lauderdale's Ministry, I shall only here set down in general, first, what he and his Three Friends have got in Donatives: And secondly, what Sums they receive yearly by their Places and Pensions, as hath been made appear on several Occasions, by a particular Consideration. My Lord Lauderdale then hath got in Donatives, within these few Years, no less than 26,000 l. s. and may be reckon'd to have yearly, since the Year 1666, that he was appointed Commissioner, 16,300 l. s.

My Lord Nelson hath got in Donatives to the Value of 15,000 l. s. and hath moreover yearly 14,000 l. s. Besides, he hath the Profits of the Mint and Ballows, which last did render in King James's Time 1000 Mark sterling weekly, amounting yearly to 25,000 l. s.

The Earl of Shaft got lately by Fines 1500 l. s. and possess'd yearly 14,700 l. s.

The Earl of Kingston's Estates, by reason of the Nature of his Gifts and Places, cannot be so easily comput'd; but that they must be very considerable, by his general Gift of Wards and Marriages, which he hath had above three Years, may be evidently gather'd, from the Benefit that he hath made by some of those particular Obligations, which have been compris'd for by him, at or above the rate of 1000 l. How much then may be reckon'd by all that fall out the whole Kingdom? He got also the Gift of a Shipwreck in Shetland. As for his yearly Incomes, besides his Pension as one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, he hath also all the Perquisites of the Admiralty, and yet, over and above, Scotts have had, by the Gift of the Salt, at least 2000 l. yearly.

I need not here say, how that, besides these abovemention'd Sums, almost all Pensions and Gifts have been bestow'd these Years by-pass, according to his Grace's Pleasure; his Power in our Affairs being an effect an Omnipotency; this Part of it not to be doubted, only it is to be regarded, that in all these exorbitant Giveings, no little Respect hath been had to those who have merited most of his Majesty, both by their Actions and Services: But the thing that I esteem more worthy to be noticed, is, that although, since his Majesty's Restoration, his Revenue in Scotland hath been much above the double of what it was before; and, tho' his Catholics have been enrich'd with abundance of Fines, and great and vast Sums otherwise levied by Duties, Taxes, and Assessments, without the least Burden, either of Money or expens'd for his Majesty's Use, on foreign War; yet, thro' a strange Misgovernment, hath all been walth and consumed at home, without any visible Improvement for the public Good; or so much as the Provision of one Frigate, for the Defence of our Coast, or Couv'oy of our Merchants, in these Times of War.

A. D. 1675. Advantage; for the Garrison absolutely refus'd to submit, except to Mr. de Montecuculi and the Imperialists, who took Possession of the Place accordingly.

This, it seems, was a great Mortification to the Prince, but not the only one he met with. Hence Misunderstanding arose upon Misunderstanding, which not only put a Stop to any farther Enterprizes, but occasioned their Separation in the latter End of November: The Prince, at parting, expressing his Disgust, aloud, in Words to this Effect to the Duke de Bourbonville, "They shall manage well, if ever they ensnare me again with the Imperialists."

While this was the Aspect of the War, the Marquis du Fresnois, the Spanish Minister in London, presented a Memorial, December 25, in the Name of the Queen Regent of Spain, containing an Offer to make up the Peace with the States, on the Conditions before express'd in the separate Article of the Treaty between Spain and the Republic, viz.

I. The Point of the Flag to be adjusted to his Majesty's Satisfaction. II. A reciprocal Restitution of Places and Prizes, that are or may have been taken by either Nation out of Europe, during this War. III. And lastly, The Sum of eight hundred thousand Pataccons. To which his Majesty was pleas'd to answer six Days after, "That if the States General would extinguish their Pretension to the Restitution of Prizes, as a thing impracticable, and never insisted on in any Treaty of Peace, and add to the abovementioned Offers these additional ones, which cannot well be denied, viz.

I. An equal and reciprocal Regulation of the Trade in the East-Indies, such as was often promised, and particularly in the late Treaty of Breda. II. Leave to his Subjects yet detain'd at Surinam, to depart from thence with their Estates and Effects, pursuant to the said Treaty, and their own reiterated Promises and Orders. III. And lastly, That the Subjects of the said States General shall, for the future, abstain from fishing upon the Coasts and Shores of any of his Majesty's Dominions, without Leave, and Passports first obtain'd.

His Majesty declared, That as to himself he would be content with these Conditions; adding: But because the wording of Articles thereupon is of equal Moment to the things that shall be contain'd in them, and that this cannot be effected but by Persons equally instructed and empower'd on both Sides. His Majesty further declares, That he will direct his Plenipotentiaries at Colagen, to apply themselves, together with the Deputies of the States General, without Delay thereunto, by the Help of the Mediation of the Crown of Sweden, which having been accepted, and authorized on both Sides, and the City of Colagen having been insisted on by the Dutch to the Mediators for the Place of Treaty, his Majesty conceives, that neither the Place nor the Mediation can be now declined without a notorious Offence to the Parties concerned; and more particularly to the Honour of the Crown of Sweden." A. D. 1675.

It is easy to see, that this Answer, tho' in Appearance only an Evasion, was in Effect, a Refusal. Our Ministers very well knew, that the States would not comply with these additional Demands; and that their own Advances were made, the Price of our quitting Prance; whereas the referring all to the Mediation of Sweden, and the Ministers at Colagen, sufficiently shew'd, that they would still do nothing but in Partnership with that obnoxious Power, tho' furnish'd with so many reasonable Pretexes, not only to desert, but to declare against her.

Possibly the States foresaw what sort of Reception their Offer would meet with; for on the 27, of the same Month, they dispatch'd a second Letter to his Majesty, in which they artfully avoided to make any Mention of the Money-Article, for Fear of the Precedent, and yet offer'd enough to make it appear his Interest to close with them. In particular, by way of Reply to his Majesty's Answer, by their Trumpeter, before spoken of, they took Occasion to lay before him the following Facts and Reasons.

"But, because your Majesty seems, above all, to complain, that we most highly offend you, in the Proposal we make, for separating you from your Allies, to whom you have promised, not to treat without them; when we, in the mean while, assume it for a fundamental Point, that we must pursue the Engagement that we have given to ours, without injuring our Honour, as if your Majesty ought less to respect yours. We beseech your Majesty to consider, that there is a vast Difference between your Engagement and ours, as well as in the Conduct of those with whom we are allied. And your Majesty may, with as much Rightcountness as Glory, extinguish a Fire, which is already spread much further than was at first believed: Whereas we cannot abandon our Allies without the greatest Unthankfulness, and without the Ruin of Europe, and therewithal ourselves. At the time your Majesty enter'd into an Union with our Enemies, they seem'd to have no other Aim than to LEVEL OUR COMMONWEALTH. At this Day is the War general; and the Spanish Netherlands (for the Preservation of which your Majesty hath always shewn so much Zeal) participates therein no less than we; as also doth the great Part of the Empire.

But without entering upon the Search of those Affairs, and not accounting it needful to serve ourselves with the several Arguments of that nature, your Majesty, Sir, hath but too much Cause to desert an Ally, who, in this War, hath sought nothing else save his particular Advantage; and who, in Cases of most Importance, hath laid nothing less to Heart, than the Interest of your Majesty, to say no worse; and, if your Majesty does yet in the least doubt thereof, let not your Majesty content yourself with what the French Partisans tell you; but let that be well examin'd which was done the last Year at Utrecht, between the French Ministers and our Deputies;

when he separates from us
Dignity.

Deputies; and you may see the Sincerity of the Proceedings of your Allies. It is certainly enough to convince you to read the Propositions which the French at that time made to us, wherein you cannot find one single Word that concern your Majesty; and, in the mean while that our other Deputies were detain'd at Hampton Court, without your being pleas'd to give them Audience, they at Utrecht would have had us enter into, and accomplish a Treaty without Participation with your Majesty. And to constrain us the more, they declared to us, that in case we agreed not to all that they then demanded of us, within the time of five Days, they should then make new Demands of us. We could, besides these, produce divers other Overtures, which have been made to us since that time, wherein your Majesty hath been as little consider'd: But because that kind of dealing hath not been to publick, tho' really such, we shall not insist thereon; and shall satisfy ourselves with the last Proof of that Obligation your Majesty hath from your Allies, in giving you to consider what is pass'd in the Sea-fight, of which we desire no other Testimony, nor Judges, than those who had the Command over the Fleets of your Majesty, with all the rest of the Officers and Soldiers.

To render this Letter yet more effectual, they caus'd it to be printed, and dispers'd over the Kingdom: The Consequence of which was, that the People became more disgusted with the War than ever, more jealous of the Court, and more incens'd against the Ministers. This was very well known at Whitehall; and we find Lord Arlington speaking of it almost in Agonies, in a Letter to Sir William Godolphin. And yet, at the second Opening of the Parliament, on the 7th of January, the King, in his Speech to both Houses, was pleas'd to declare, "That if he saw any Likelihood of a Peace, without Dishonour to himself, or Damage to them, he would soon embrace it: And that no Proposals of Peace had yet been offer'd, which could be imagin'd with an intent to conclude, but only to amuse." He was pleas'd to sticke for a Supply, not indeed in direct Terms, to continue the War, but that the Nation might be in a Posture of War, in order to obtain a good Peace: Adding still, by way of Qualification, that, if a Peace should follow, he was willing the Residue of the said Supply should be appointed for the building of more (7) Ships. But however artificially the Gilding was spread, the Continuance of the War was visible underneath it; more especially when it appear'd, that the great Drift of the new Lord Keeper's Harangue was to blacken the Dutch, by a long and labour'd Deduction of the Congress at Cologne, and the Intractability of their Ministers there; and, to exasperate his Hearers against them, he call'd their Letter to his Majesty by their Trumpeter, a Paper-Stragem. He said, their next Recourse was, to such Proposals as they could procure the Spanish Ambassador to deliver on their Behalfs. He took advantage of the Omission of the Money-Article, in their Reply to his Majesty's Answer, to affirm, that they had therein abated much of what the said Ambassador had offer'd, and sought to reduce things to the State they were in at Breda: Adding, So that 'tis hard to know by what kind of Proposals they intend to be bound. He could not deny their yielding the Honour of the Flag, on our own Terms: but he cavil'd, because they would not acknowledge it to be our Right: And he made no scruple to advance, "That, if they should yet send, during this Session, any new Proposal, what Form soever those Overtures might be dress'd in, we might justly suspect, that their End would be, if they could not divide, at least to amuse us, and lessen our Care in providing for the War."

For the rest of his Lordship's Speech, which took up little less than fourteen Pages in Folio, it abounded in Tropes and Figures, but was very sparing of Facts and Arguments. His Aim was to dazzle; he knew he could not convince: It was indeed, a Vanity to make any such Attempt, at least within-doors; and the Event was answerable: For tho' the Commons civilly voted the Thanks of the House to his Majesty, for the Measures he had taken to suppress and discountenance Peberry, since the last Prorogation, they still suppos'd the Dangers therefrom to be to great, and the Condition of the Kingdom, not only from the War, but from intestine Differences and Divisions, to be to calamitous, that they urg'd them as Reasons for a Fast; which, in concurrence with the (7) Lords, they address'd for. They likewise resolv'd, that, before they enter'd upon the Consideration of the King's Speech, they would proceed to have their Grievances effectually redress'd, the Protestant Religion, their Liberties and Properties effectually secured, and to suppress Peberry, and to remove all Perions and Counsellors, possibly affected: And, yet further, order'd an Address to his Majesty, That the Militia of the City of London and County of Middlesex might be in readines, at an Hour's Warning, for suppressing all tumultuous Insurrections, which might be occasion'd by Peberry, or any other malcontented Persons.

As it does not appear, that the Peberry, at this time, had any Design to make the Quarrel desperate, by having recourse to Violence, or could have the least Prospect of Success, in case they had; there is no understanding this last Step of the House of Commons, at this distance, unless it can be suppos'd, that it was merely an Artifice to inflame the People.

ple; or that the Ministers had push'd the King to make use of Force, for their own Security; or that the leading Patriots put his Majesty on raising an Army, which they intended to use themselves. Our Materials fail us; and every one must decide according to his own Bias. All that is certain is, that if the Majority meant to draw the King into Suspicion by it, he had the Address to turn the Tables upon themselves: For, in his Answer to their Address, he said, That he was always ready to preserve them in their Liberties and Properties, and to secure the Protestant Religion: And would take care the Militia should be in a readines, upon all occasions, to secure the Government.

Of the Members of the Cabal, but three remain'd; for Lord Clifford was dead, and Lord Shaftsbury had made his Peace: And against these Three, the whole Indignation of the House of Commons seem'd to be levelled: Not to any great Purpose, indeed, as might have been easily foreseen; for those who had suffer'd those overgrown Offenders to be screen'd with an Act of Grace last Session, could have little Hope to bring them to Justice now.

They began, however, with the Duke of Lauderdale; voting, nemine contradicente, "That an Address be presented to his Majesty, to remove him from all his Employments, and from his Presence and Councils, for ever, being a Person dangerous and obnoxious to Government."

The Duke of Buckingham's Conduct being call'd in question next, his Grace desired to be heard in his own Defence; which was granted: But, on this great Occasion, both his Spirit and Genius forsook him; he talk'd in a manner wholly unintelligible; and, at last, fell into such a Disorder, that he was forced to plead Indisposition; and withdrew in a strange Confusion.

The next Day, he made his Appearance before the House again; and, with more Composure, tho' still in a rambling Way, endeavour'd to disculpate himself, at the Expence of Lord Arlington: That he had negotiated the first Treaty with France, by which the Triple League was broken: That he had advis'd the Declaration of Indulgence, he acknowledg'd; that he had any Concern in raising the Army, he deny'd; the Scheme of altering the Constitution, and governing by a military Force, he divid'd between one that was dead, meaning Lord Clifford, and Lord Arlington: To the Last, solely, he ascrib'd the Attempt on the Smyrna Fleet; as likewise, the bringing the French Ships into the Harbours and Ports of England; and as to the shutting up of the Exchequer, he only purg'd himself from being the Adviser, without accusing any body else. It was in answer to several Questions put to him by the House, that he made these Discoveries; which highly disobligh'd the King, without doing himself any Service: For, upon the Issue, they dealt by him as they had before dealt by Lauderdale, with this Difference indeed, that their Vote was not unanimous. His Grace, about this time, seems to have been surrounded with Troubles: For, after falling thus under the Displeasure of the House of Commons, he was called to the Bar of the House of Lords, to answer for the Death of Lord Strensury, whom he had kill'd in a Duel, after he had debauch'd his (1) Wife. The Duchess of Portsmouth had likewise brought him into personal Disgrace with his Majesty: And, if Sir John Kersey is to be depended on; he met with very little, if any, Support from the new Lord Treasurer, who, tho' oblig'd to him for his Power, did not think himself oblig'd to employ it in his Service.

The whole Court was, at this time, in extreme Disorder; being not only on ill Terms with the Parliament, but embroiled among themselves. Lord Arlington was not only at Variance with the Duke of Bucks, but could not forgive the Treasurer (Danby) for having succeed'd to the Trust and Honour he had aspir'd to himself: And, on the other hand, Lord Arlington was fillen deeply into the Displeasure of his Royal Highness, for having advis'd his Removal from Court, in order to make his own Residence there more easy.

While this parliamentary Ordeal went on, there was, therefore, no regular, embodied Plabanx, as we have since seen, that mov'd all one Way, as one all-impiring Minister directed; but several Parties appear'd under several Standards, who were sometimes Allies, and sometimes Adversaries, as their Leaders quarrell'd or agreed.

Thus the very Persons, Sir Gilbert Gerard and Sir Charles Wheeler, who were one day the greatest Sticklers for his Grace of Buckingham, the very next day impeach'd Lord Arlington (2), of being a constant and vehement Charge of Sir Gilbert Gerard against Lord Arlington.

(1) Of this Intrigue, Mansel, in one of his Letters, has the following Passage: " Buckingham run out of all, with the Lady Strensury; by whom he believes he had a Son, to whom the King stood Godfather: It dy'd young, Earl of Overbury."

(2) The whole Charge was as follows: 1. The said Earl hath been a constant and vehement Promoter of Papery, and Papish Complots. 2. By procuring Commissions for all the Papish Priests in Communa, who made their Application to him only, as a known Favourer of that Faction; there being not one Commission sign'd by the other Secretary, many of which Commissions were procur'd and sign'd by him since the several Addresses of the two Houses of Parliament to his Majesty, and the passing the late Act against Papery. 3. By procuring his Majesty's Letters, commanding two Papists and Rebels to be set into Corporations, and admitted into the Commissions of the Peace, and other Offices of Trust, Military and Civil, contrary to the establish'd Laws and Constitutions of that Realm, to the great Terror of the King's Protestant Subjects there. 4. By not only setting up and supporting the aforesaid Papists there, but bringing the most violent and fierce of them to command Companies and Regiments of the King's English Subjects there, to the great Dishonour and Danger of the Kingdom. 5. By openly and avowedly entertaining and lodging in his Family a Papish Priest, contrary to the known Laws of the Land; which said Priest was a noted Soldier and Promoter of the Papish Faction, and hath since fled out of this Kingdom. 6. By procuring Pensions in other Mens Names for Papish Officers, contrary to, and in violation of, the late Act of Parliament. 7. By obtaining Grants of considerable Sums of Money to be charg'd upon the Revenue of Ireland, for the most violent and pernicious Papists there; particularly two thousand Pound for one Colonel Fitz-Patrick, a notorious Irish Rebel, whose Mother was hang'd in the late Wars for murdering several English, and making Castles

A.D. 1673-4 ment Promoter of Popery and Popish Councils; of embezzling and waiving the Treasure of the Nation; and of betraying his Trust, as Secretary.

No greater Mistake can be made by the Prosecutors of a bad Minister, than to charge him with any one Article which they cannot support with undeniable Proofs. If he has it in his Power to loosen any one Link of the Chain, he infallibly makes his Escape; and, instead of being punished himself, renders odious his Accusers.

This was the Circumstance in the Case before us: These two Gentlemen had suffer'd their Charge to outrun their Evidence, by dealing in Presumptions instead of Proofs: Lord Arlington saw the Opening, and improv'd it with all the Address imaginable: For, being admitted to be heard by the House, in his turn, he so far exploded, or evaded, all that the Duke had said the Day before, and set so plausible a Glois on his own Actions, that the Impeachment dy'd away, and he escap'd, even without the least Censure: He had been charg'd in particular with corresponding with the King's Enemies beyond the Seas: His Friends, who had taken heart on seeing him come off so triumphantly, called upon Sir Gilbert Gerrard for his Vouchers: He was unprovided, would have withdrawn that Article, was not allow'd, had recourse to the wretched Expedient of desiring Time; and, at last, took refuge in saying, that this treacherous Correspondence was carry'd on during the last Dutch War.

The King's Answer to the two Addresses was, That he would consider of them: And thus ended this remarkable Affair: And from hence we may date the Prevalence, tho' not the Establishment, of that Court Maxim, A.D. 1673-4

That no Minister ought to be punish'd on parliamentary Application. Marvel.

Still the House proceeded with the same Warmth as before: They return'd the Project of a general (a) Tolt-Bill, to distinguish Papists from Protestants: By which it was provided, that those who refus'd to take it should be made incapable of enjoying any Office military or civil, to sit in either House of Parliament, or to come within five Miles of the Court: And, by the whole Tenour of their Conduct, made both the King and his Ministers sufficiently sensible, that no Supply was to be expected for the Continuance of the War.

In this Situation of Things, came another Letter from the States to his Majesty, to refute what he had advanced in his Speech, That their Offers tend to amuse only, which they did very effectually, by sending a Draught of the Articles, in form, which they declar'd they were ready to execute, bona fide, if his Majesty would be pleas'd to conclude a Treaty of Peace with them, without dependence upon foreign Interests, which could only, they said, make this Negotiation ineffectual.

These Articles, which had for their Basis 17th Article the Treaty of Breda, and the Marine Treaty of 1668, were Five in number, viz. The Honour of the Flag, in its utmost Extent, whole Fleets being to strike to the least of his Majesty's Ships: A (x) Regulation of the East-India Trade, by an exact and reciprocal Rule, to be perpetually observ'd: All that his Majesty insisted on with respect to Sarinas: A (y) reciprocal Restitution of Places taken during the War: And the eight hundred Counties of their Pat: this Grant being procur'd for the said Fine Patrick, at a time when he was accus'd to the said Lord Indreux of high Crimes by the now Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. 7. By procuring his Majesty to refuse to reward Fifty Parols, some wharred were deeply engag'd in the heerd Rebellion of that Kingdom, the Châtelain, or Head-Rover, of the Crown, one of the forfeited Estates of English there, being a principal Part of his Majesty's Revenue to that Kingdom.

II. That the said Earl hath been guilty of many unlaue Practices to promote his own Greatness, and hath embezzled and waiv'd the Treasure of this Nation. 1. By procuring and waiv'd the Treasure of this Nation, both in England and Ireland, breaking into the Settlements of that Kingdom, and dispossessing several of the English Adventurers and Soldiers of the Properties and Free-Holds, in which they are duly, and legally, stand, without any Colour of Reason, or suggestion of Right. 2. By charging excessive, and almost incredible Sums for false and deceitful Intelligence. 3. By procuring his Majesty's Hand for the giving away, from his first Entrance into his Office, the Value of three Millions of sterling Money, at the least, to the several Grants whereof are extant, counterfeited by him, and by him only. 4. That the said Earl, presuming to trample upon all Estates and Degrees of the Subjects of this Realm, the better to subdue them to his Will and Pleasure, hath cruelly and illegally imprisoned many of his Majesty's Subjects. 5. That he did procure a principal Part of the Ruin (the Duke of Rachinchen) to be unjustly imputed, and to be proclaim'd a Traitor, without any legal proceeding to Trial, and did maliciously suborn false Witnesses, with Money to take away his Life, upon pretence of unreasonable Word.

III. That the said Earl hath felicitly and traitorously betray'd the greatest Trust reposed in him by his Majesty, as Counsellor and Principal Secretary of State. 1. By entertaining a more than usual Intimacy with the French Ambassador, not only lodging him in his House, but letting him into the King's most secret Councils. 2. By altering in private, and singly by himself, several solemn Determinations of his Majesty's Council. 3. By procuring a Stranger to have the chief Command of the late rais'd Army, for the Invasion of Holland, to the great Dishonour and Discouragement of all the legal Nobility and Gentry of this Nation. 4. By advising his Majesty to admit of a Squadron of French Ships to be join'd with our English Fleet (the sad Consequence whereof we have since felt) notwithstanding the King of France had agreed to send a Supply of Men, in order to have the Fleet wholly English. 5. Whereas the King was advis'd by several of the Counsellors to press the French King to desist from making any further Progress in the Conquest of the Island-Towns of Holland, whereof England was to have no Benefit, and to turn his Army upon those Maritime-Towns that were by the Treaty to be ours; his Lordship gave the King Council to desist, whereby that Part of our Expectation was wholly frustrated. 6. Whereas the King was advis'd by several of his Council not to enter into this War, till his Majesty was out of debt, and had advised with his Parliament; his Lordship was of Opinion to the contrary, and gave his Advice accordingly. 7. When the French Ships were dispers'd after the late Fight at Sea, and had lost all their Anchors and Cables by reason of the foul Weather that then ensued, he persuaded his Majesty to send them eighty Cables and Anchors, although it was then objected, and he knew it to be true, That his Majesty had not, at that time, any more in his Stores to supply his own Ships, in case of the like Necessity. 8. He hath traitorously corresponded with the King's Enemies beyond the Sea, and contrary to the Truth reposit'd in him, hath given Intelligence to them."

(x) It consisted in a Disavowal upon Oath, of the Universality of the Church of Rome, the Pope's Supremacy, Transubstantiation, and praying to Saints.

hundred thousand Patacoons: Which, except the Acknowledgment for the Fishery, was all that had been demanded by Lord Arlington, of the Marquis del Preſno.

But, at the ſame time, that they made theſe Conceſſions for the Advancement of the Peace, they ſtill perſever'd in affirming, "That they could not be accus'd, with Juſtice, of the leaſt Contravention againſt the Treaties between his Majesty and them; And, to let your Majesty ſee, ſaid they, how far we are perſuaded of our Innocence in this reſpect, we declare hereby again to your Majesty, that we are ready to enter into an Examination before your Majesty, about all the Infractiſons we are accus'd of; with a ſolemn Promiſe, to make Reparation for all the Wrongs and Injuries your Majesty and your Subjects may have receiv'd unknown to us, from us or our Officers, from the Treaty of Breda till the Beginning of the preſent War; offering further the Guaranty of our Allies, for the performing of this Promiſe; and confeſſing, that it may be infer'd in the Treaty, to make it more authentic."

Having ſtated the whole Caſe thus ſtrongly, clearly, and fairly, and bid ſo much more for Peace than could be obtain'd at Breda, tho' ſo much leſs than was demanded of them in Partnership with France at Utrecht, it was become impoſſible for his Majesty, in his preſent Circumſtances, to (x) hold out any longer. On the 24th of January, therefore, he came to the Houſe of Peers, with the States Letter and Propoſals in his Hand; and, after a ſhort introductory Speech, left them to the

Both Lords and Commons very gladly took him at his Word; and, in a joint Vote, gave for Peace, as the Senſe of both Houſes. But it was not merely theſe Offers of the States, nor this Promiſe of the King's, that carried the Peace into Execution: Upon the 2d of February, ſays Sir William Temple, his Majesty receiv'd the certain Advice of the States having paſs'd a (y) Reſolution, That the Charges and Dignities poſſeſs'd by the Prince of Orange and his Anceſtors ſhould become hereditary to his (z) Children: And, at the ſame time alſo, he receiv'd a Letter from the States, with the Deſire of Paſſports for their Embaſſadors, and the Offer of a Suſpenſion of Arms. And now it was, ſays the ſaid Sir William, that the Miniſters believ'd, that a Treaty could not be refus'd, without drawing too much Odium upon themſelves, and Reſolution upon the Government. They were, however, ſtill ſo fearful of the Practices of the States, that they choſe to ſend an Embaſſador to the Hague, rather than admit any from thence. Sir William Temple was appointed by the Junto to be the Man;

(y) Which for the many extraordinary things it contains, very well deserves to be inserted here.

The Lords, &c. have ſanction'd declar'd, That having maturely conſider'd the State and Conſtitution of this Government, as by God's Bleſſing it was in former times, under the moſt illuſtrious Prince of Orange, and particularly what has happen'd theſe 23 or 24 Years paſt, have found, that ſince the ſaid and unhappy Year of 1650, this State has been afflicted with many Calamities, both at Home and Abroad: That ſo far as concerns the Affairs abroad, it never had been without a War, or the Apprehenſion of a War: That in the Year 1653, a cruel War happen'd between the Kingdom of England and this State, which had very much ſhaken the Foundation of it: That after that War was ended, we had hardly ſetled Breath, when we were engag'd in a new one with Perſia in the Year 1663, and afterwards in the Years 1668 and 1670, this State fell again into an open War, an occaſion of the Northern Affairs: That in the Year 1664, a War happen'd a new between his Majesty of Great Britain and theſe Provinces, which was no ſooner ended, but we were preſently overſeen by the preſent Inſolent and unhappy War, and that between the times of theſe foreign Wars, that State had been forced to ſuſtain many Inſults from her Neighbourſhip, by whom it was formerly very much reſpected. For what concerns the Affairs at home, that the Commonwealth has been perplex'd with many Difficulties and Dilemmas: That from the Year 1650, to the Year 1660, many Members of this State had wholly taken off their Eyes from the preſent Prince of Orange, the only Heir Male of that illuſtrious Family, whiſt others with much Zeal maintain'd, that we ought not to neglect his Highneſs: That the King of Great Britain, in the Year 1660, invited to his Kingdom by the Parliament, taking his Journey thither through theſe Countries, the States had promiſed his Majesty, to ſuſtain the Princeſs Royal Dowager of Orange, to take care of the Education and Interests of his Highneſs, as ſuſtainingly deſigning him to all the Dignities poſſeſs'd in theſe Provinces by his illuſtrious Anceſtors: That after the Death of the Princeſs of Orange, this State began to cool again, and that Affair was laid aſide: That afterwards this State had taken again upon itself the Education of his Highneſs: And laſtly, in the Year 1671, and in the Beginning of the Year 1702, that great Troubles and Difficulties had riſen about choſing his Highneſs Captain General over the Forces of this State by Land: That ſaid Konink had thought, that the ſaid Dilemmas had given Occaſion to the Enemies of this State, to ſeize every one over it a new, knowing, that we were thereby render'd inſupportable (the Foundation of this Republic having been laid through the Unity of our Forefathers, and particularly ſubſcrib'd by God) to take Care of our Deſerces, and that the Differences which did ariſe concerning the choſing a Chief over the Forces of this State, and the Diffidence we had by that Means of each other, did retard and hold back the Reſolutions, which ought to neceſſarily to have been taken for the repelling a foreign Force: That thus in Diſputes the time was ſpent, which above all we ought to have been careful of: That the ſaid Differences were the Cauſe that in the latter End of the ſaid Year 1671, when the King of Spain did intirelyly declare his Intention of making War upon this State, many Months paſs'd in Deliberations about choſing his Highneſs Captain General, who ought them to have been employ'd in the ſuiting of Men, and bringing the Troops of this State together for the common Defence, by which Means it happen'd, that when, in the Year 1672, the ſaid King of Spain attack'd this State with his Arms, we were in the greateſt Danger of having been totally ruin'd and deſtroy'd: But perceiv'd that our Lovings had ſuſtained, that nothing could better be wiſhed or hoped for, than that on the one Side the Occaſion of theſe Differences ſhould be totally removed, that we might no more fall into the great Miſchiefs, we are preſent under; and that on the other Side might be acknowledged the great Services performed by the illuſtrious Prince of Orange, for the Preſervation of this State, &c.

(z) Into their Illuſtrations might very ſafely be, if any Credit is due to the following Miſtake, infer'd in North's Exam. p. 130. "That he, Mr. North, had heard from a Dutchman, a Friend to the Prince and his Family, that in his immature Age, ſome conſiderable Perſon took care, thro' the Means of a Pope, and an ill Woman or two, that the Prince ſhould not abound in Poſterity to claim the Stadtholderſhip, which had alſo an unfortunate Turn upon his Health and Length of Life." This Paſſage is further explain'd by a Note at the Bottom of the Page.

 But, before he could set out, the Marquis del Presio gave the Court to understand, that he had full Powers from the States, and was ready to enter upon the Negotiation immediately. He was thereupon referred to Sir William; and, at three Meetings, the whole Affair was ended. That Minister mentions two Difficulties he had to surmount; that of the Plag, and the English Troops in the French Service: But we can discover but one, which was the Last; for the First appears to have been entirely remov'd, by the voluntary Concession of the States, before-spoken of: And the Temperament found for the Troops was, to suffer those that were there, to wear out without any Recruits, and to permit no new ones to go over; but, at the same time, to give leave for such Levies as the States should think fit to make in his Majesty's Dominions.

In this Interval, the Commons proceeded with their Quest of Grievances; and, in particular, seem'd dispos'd to give no Quarter to the standing Army: Exceptions were even taken to the King's Guards; and (a) eight several Reasons were given in, to evince that they ought to be broken: And, upon the whole, they came to this memorable Resolution, That the Continuance of any STANDING FORCES in this Nation, other than the MILITIA, is a great Grievance and Vexation to the People; and that it is the humble Petition and Address of this House to his Majesty, that he will immediately cause to be dissolved that Part of them that were rais'd since the 1st Day of January 1663.

This Vote was pass'd on Sunday, February 7: On the 10th, it was presented to the King, at the Banqueting-house; and the next Day, his Majesty declar'd from the Throne, to both Houses, That, agreeable to their Advice, he had made a speedy, honourable, and, he hop'd, a lasting Peace: Adding, that, before he had receiv'd their Address relating to the Forces, he had given Order for the dissolving them, as soon as he should be sure of the Peace: That he should (b) reduce them to a less Number than they were in the Year 1663: That he should give Directions for the Forces he had brought over from Ireland to be sent back: But that, in proportion as our Land-forces were less'n'd, it would be necessary to build more great Ships, in order to equal the Strength of our Neighbours at Sea.

It must be acknowledg'd, that these were great Advances on the side of the King, towards recovering the Confidence of his People: And had he abandon'd his Ministers, as well as chang'd his Measures, all further Opposition would have been inexorable: But when he dismiss'd Buckingham, we are told, it was rather to gratify the Displeasure of his favourite Mistress, than to comply with the Advice of Parliament: And not to insist on the Continuance of Arlington's Credit with him, he continued to be as closely attach'd to Lauderdale as ever.

This countenance, if it did not cause, the further Consideration of the Grievances of the Nation; and, in particular, the Vote and Resolution of the Commons, That a Committee be appointed to inspect the Laws lately made in Scotland, whereby an Army was authorized to march into England and Ireland: And to peruse such other Laws as tended to the Breach of the Union between the two Nations.

But they did not confine their Scrutiny to Scotland only: They resolv'd also to examine the Bottom State of the three Kingdoms: Another Committee being appointed to inspect the State of Ireland; and more especially of the State of Religion, the Militia, and the Forces of that Kingdom; and examine the Matters of Fact relating thereto.

Great these Measures certainly were, as tending to manifest the Spirit, Power, and Importance of an English Parliament: How good, unless we could dissect the Hearts of Men, it is impossible to ascertain.

All Parties, however, have Reason to acknowledge, and, it is to be presum'd, all Ages will reap, the Benefit of their Care of the Liberty of the Subject, in appointing a third Committee, to inspect the Laws, and to consider how far it lay in the Breast of the King to commit any Subject by his immediate Warrant; and to report their Opinion: As also, to consider how the Law now stands touching the committing of Persons by the Council-table.

This gave rise to the famous Habeas Corpus Bill, which was calculated to set Bounds to the arbitrary Proceedings of Ministers, and preserve those who fell under their Displeasure from being sent into Banishment, or otherwise imprison'd, without Cause, Measure, or Relief: But tho' this invaluable Bill was now perfect'd by the Commons, and sent

(a) Which were as follow:

1. That, according to the Laws of the Land, the King hath no Guards but those called, Gentlemen-Peers, and Yeomen of the Guard. 2. That ever since this Parliament, although there have been in many Sessions, they never setled the Life-Guard by Act of Parliament; nay, they have been so far from it, that, whatsoever they have been so much as mention'd in the House of Common, they would never in the least take any favourable Notice of them, always looking upon them, as a Number of Men unworthily employ'd; and in no respect fit to be the least maintain'd by the Parliament of England. 3. That they are a vast Charge to the King and Kingdom. 4. That they are altogether useless to this Kingdom, as doth plainly appear by his Majesty's most happy and peaceable Reign since his blessed Restoration; there being to much real and mutual Love, Confidence and Trust between his Majesty and his good People, which is daily manifested by his Majesty's frequent treating and exposing his Sacred Person to his People without a Guard. 5. That Guards, or standing Armies, are only in use where Princes govern more by Fear, than by Love, as in France, where the Government is arbitrary. 6. That this Life-Guard is a Standing Army in Disguise, and that as long as they continue, the Roots of a Standing-Army will remain among us; and therefore it is impossible effectually to deliver this Nation from a standing Army, till these Guards are pull'd up by the Roots. 7. That the Life-Guard is a Place of Retire and Retreat for Papists and Men popishly affected, and a School and Nursery for Men of debauched and arbitrary Principles, and Eviscerators of the French Government, as doth too plainly appear in the Case of Sir John Coventry. 8. That if the Life-Guard were dissolved, the King would thereby save some hundred thousands of Pounds per Annum; which would in a few Years enable him to pay all his Debts, without burdening his good People with any further Taxes to that End.

Parliament prorogued.

up to the Lords, it did not receive the Royal Assent till some Years after.

From the whole Course of these Proceedings, and no doubt from more particular, tho' private, Evidence, the King was convinced, that what he had gain'd, by the Peace with the Dutch, was all he was like to gain by the Session. On the 24th of February, therefore, his Majesty came to the House of Peers, and, after a short Speech, signifying the Season was come, when it would be convenient for them to be in their Countries, both for their own Business and his; and a Word concerning his Steadfastness to secure the Protestant Religion, and their Properties; prorogued the Parliament to the 10th of November.

We cannot take leave of this remarkable Session, without observing, that if the Leaders of the Commons had no other Motives for their Measures, than the Necessity of espousing the Cause of Religion, of making an abandon'd Court feel the Weight and Efficacy of Parliament, and providing for the Security of the Subject; it ought to be acknowledged, that they had done their best to answer all those valuable Ends: And if, on the other hand, they began to entertain any Thoughts of making Reptials on the Court, for their ill Designs on them, that they had approv'd themselves to be as thorough Politicians in the one Case, as Patriots in the other: For, by the separate Peace with the Dutch, they had Reason to think they had effectually divided England from France; by withholding the Supply, and breaking the Army in England, and laying a Foundation for doing the same in Scotland, they disabled the King from making use of Force; and the Habeas Corpus Bill was both a wise and popular Expedient to put the Liberty of the Subject out of the Power of the Crown.

This is certain; the Distrust was mutual: The Commons dreaded a Tyranny, and the King the Return of Commonwealth. Hence, tho' he was forc'd to desert France, he made it his Business to soften the Stroke, that France should not desert him. And hence the Men of Intrigue split into two Parties, which we shall have Occasion to distinguish by their true Titles, FRENCH and DUTCH: For tho' the Name of England was press'd into the Service on both Sides, it will appear the Nation had no solid Interest with either.

The Men of Intrigue either in the

Who were at the Head of the Dutch, we shall soon see: Who were at the Head of the French, we partly know. But tho' the two Royal Brothers had embark'd in the same Bottom, their Conduct, like their Tempers, was extremely different. The King had waver'd, had relented, had comply'd, as perceiving the Ground began to sink under his Feet: But the Duke was irremediable: From the time he saw his Majesty begin to abate his Speed, he made use of his Spurs: He enter'd into a Concert of his own with his most Christian Majesty, and actually took Precautions at Paris, against the Intrigues of Whitehall.

It was proper to premise these Things here: They will be explain'd in the Sequel.

With respect to his Majesty's particular Behaviour, after the Peace with Holland, Bishop Burnet affirms, That he took Rouquigny the French Minister aside, as soon as he had sign'd it, and told him, That he had been doing a thing that went more against his Heart, than the losing his Right Hand. By the Desertion of England, and the strong Confederacy which had been made against France, the Balance seem'd to be now turn'd against the most Christian King. To qualify therefore this Desertion, his Majesty made an Offer of his good Offices to mediate a general Peace; and as this was manifestly for the Interest of France, it was accepted by that Court, not only without Upraidings for his past Conduct, but with the most sensible Acknowledgments.

But for the very same Reasons that this Offer was so well relish'd at France, it was distasteful every where else; and the Allies made no scruple to avow, "That the Court of England still retain'd the same (i) Affections it had in the Beginning of the War for the French Interest.

The King resolves to mediate a general Peace.

[Letter from the Embassy at Cologne, v. i. p. 229.]

(i) Of this, no greater Proof need be given, than the King's refusing the Dutch to make Levies in his Dominions, at the same time, that he gave the French that Liberty: Upon which Occasion the Prince of Orange, sent the following Complaint to his Majesty:

To the King of ENGLAND.

From the Camp at Dussel, May 25, 1674.

S I R,

"I have received both the Letters you was pleas'd to honour me with, and I had sooner returned you my most humble Thanks, if my hasty Departure from the Hague, together with the great Hurry I was in for the first Days of my March, had not prevented it. After paying my humble Thanks to your Majesty, for the new Marks of your Friendship, which you were pleas'd to shew me in your Letters, you must give me leave ingeniously to own, that I am not a little concern'd at the Refusal your Majesty has hitherto made me, of raising Troops in your Kingdoms, and that at a time when so many Reasons made me desire it. As for the Engagements your Majesty has with France, I know none that are contrary to the Interest of the State, much less to my own in particular, which you have not declar'd against by the Peace which hath been so happily concluded: And if your Majesty will give yourself the Trouble well to consider the Secret Article which has been so often mentioned, you will plainly see that you are so far from having any Right or Liberty reserved, to set any thing to our Prejudice in favour of France, that your Majesty has granted us great Advantages over our Enemy, and has put it in our Power to demand those Troops to be recall'd, which are in the Service of his most Christian Majesty, which is contrary to the Licence which both have given the Commanders of those Troops, to raise Recruits in some of your Majesty's Kingdoms, whilst the same thing is denied us, as well as making new Levies, altho' there appears no Treaty between your Majesty and France, which deprives us of that Liberty: And besides, the Professions which your Majesty express'd towards me, hath given me occasion to promise myself the same. I hope your Majesty will be pleas'd to reflect upon what I have taken the Liberty to represent here, and that your Majesty will defer no longer to grant me this new which you gave me Hopes you would do another time. In the mean while I beg your Majesty to believe that I am with a most profound Respect,

His Highness pleading the Engagement of the States to Spain, to see things refer'd to the Terms of the Pyrenean Treaty, and discovering an utter Distrust of the French Faith, by saying, That they had a great Quantity of Paper from the French King already to no Purpose.

This was the Amount of their first Audience; and at their second, which they followed by the Interposition of Sir Gabriel Sylvius for a whole Week together, before they could obtain it, the Prince laid down that Maxim, which has since cost this Nation such an Immenity of Blood and Treasure: That it was as much the Interest of England as Holland, to set Bounds to the Greatness of France; whence both his Highness and the Penjionary Fagel took occasion to urge, That the King should come to an actual Engagement in the War, in order to convince France, that his Majesty had the same Views with the rest of the Confederates, in the Peace; without which, he intimated, there would be no Hopes of a closer Union between Eng- land and the States: Concluding with a remarkable Assertion, which ought ever to be remembered, That, in all Cases, he was, and would be, a good HOLLANDER.

Early in May, these Ministers (d) return'd to London: And Sir Leoline being soon after call'd upon by the (e) Privy Council, to give his Opinion of the present Situation of Europe, with regard to a Peace, and the peculiar Interest of England; he first premis'd such things as serv'd to shew, that Holland was now too much exalted to hearken to any thing high; and that France was not reduced enough to hearken to any thing low, or to part with any thing that she could keep: Whence he infer'd, that things stood at the widest Distance possible, at the time when his Majesty undertook to mediate a general Peace.

This he further exemplify'd, by observing, That if the Court of Spain should accept his Majesty's Offers, they would notwithstanding endeavour to defeat his Intentions; because their fundamental Maxims were, That French Treaties were not to be rely'd upon; that a Restraint was to be laid on the French King by force; that he was to be compelled to quit all the Conquests he had made since the Pyrenean Treaty, and renounce

Sir Leoline
Jenkins called upon to give his Opinion of Things to the Council-board.

(d) In their way home, the following remarkable Adventure befel Sir Leoline Jenkins, which deserves to be recounted here in his own Words: not only to do Justice to his own excellent Conduct, but for the Relation it bears to the most tender Point of Honour which concerns this Nation; and so much the more as no Notice hath as yet been taken of it in any other History:

Sir L. Jenkins's Account of the Encounter with the Dutch about Striving.

"On Thursday, May 17, his Majesty's Yacht, the Cleaveland, being at Anchor before the Brill, over against the Banks call'd the Brill-Hoofd, a Yacht of the States pass'd about six of the Clock in the Evening between us and those Heads, without striking or giving any Gun. I being on Board Sir J. Williamson bore then on Shore, and our Captain (Felix) whether that Yacht ought not to have struck to his Majesty's Flag? The Captain desiring it ought, I desired one of the Gentlemen on Board us, Mr. Niphe, who spoke the Language, to go in our Captain's Name, and represent to the Dutch Captain (we not knowing who there was on board him) the Error he had committed, in not paying the Respect which was due to his Majesty's Flag: Captain Felix desiring he might be further told, he would have demanded that Due with a Shot a-thwart his Foretop, if it could have been done without Danger to the many People then walking on the Banks at the Brill-Head. To this Message the Dutch Captain brought his Shoulders, and answer'd me no more, but that the States Embassadors bound for England were then on board; and one of the Dutch Embassadors appearing, call'd Mr. Niphe in, and having shod him his Business, and understood from him the Message and Complaint he had delivered from our Captain to him, Mr. Van Benninghen answer'd, That they, for their Parts, did leave such things wholly to their Captain, who was an experienced Man, and that they were going in all haste for England, and had, upon Supposition that we were on board, got an Officer to compliment us in their Names.

This pass'd, we weighed Anchor, and after having sailed about a League from the Brill-Head to Sea-wards, we came up to the States Yacht, being then dock aboard a States Man of War, which was at Anchor there, the States Flag being struck out of the Yacht, and hoisted to the Mast of War's Top Mast-Head. We were then in a Place call'd the Pits, the Brill Single opening about three or four Ships Length to the Southward of the Light-House; and the Captain finding that the Man of War did not strike, told me, what he should do: I told him what I had heard of old Van Tromp's striking to the Earl of Arundel in Goer Road; as also of Prince Maurice's Yacht, that had the other Day struck to the Kitchen Yacht in the Canal of Delf Haven, between the Hoole; and the Captain's own Memory suggested to him, that a States Man of War had struck to him self in the very same Place we were then in, as he pass'd up to Rotterdam; and therefore that it was my Opinion, he should demand the Respect due to the Flag, in the same manner that the King's Men of War use and ought so demand it, seeing that he should avoid shooting at the Hull or Rigging, the Embassadors being at that time on board.

Whereupon the Gunner brought a Shot to bear under the Fore-foot of the Man of War, and when a convenient Space of time, a second over his Poop, and a third between his Masts. Then appear'd their Long Boat; and a Gentleman coming on board, told me the Embassadors were much inclin'd to find fault with our Yacht; that they desired to know if it were by my Order, adding, that they were not to strike to our Flag, being within their own Ports. My Answer was, That I was but little capable of giving Orders in Military Cases, that the Captain indeed had acquainted me that the Respect due to the King's Flag was not paid it, and that he was resolv'd to demand it; whereas I thought myself bound not to contradict the Captain, and the rather, in that I was assur'd this respect had been paid within their Ports long before the War, and even since the present Peace.

As soon as this Gentleman was gone, I dispatched my own Secretary to complain in my Name to the Embassadors of their Captain, for not answering the Demand which ours had made of the Respect due to the King's Flag; adding, that I hoped it was not by any Direction or Order from their Excellencies. Mr. Van Benninghen receiv'd him with all Protections of Respect to his Majesty, saying, that they disputed not the King's Right; that their Captain had failed in that River three 30 Years, and had known no such Encounter, shewing him how their own Land lay on both Sides the River. Before my Secretary was come back, we observed the Man of War had taken down his Flag, and then a Gentleman comes from the Embassadors on board us, to tell us, the Embassadors desired to come on board of us, to speak with us; whereupon we dropp'd Anchor, and lay'd for them; and at the same time Sir J. Williamson was come on board too.

Mr. Van Benninghen did partly excuse, partly justify what had pass'd; he conceiv'd our late Queen, his Majesty's Mother, had received this Respect in their Ports. We told him the Captain had gone upon other Precedents; but we did not enter into any long Discourses with them. Our Captain gave them Gun when they were off, which were answer'd by their Man of War when they came on board him.

This Embassadors might have avoided, if they had pleas'd to drop Anchor, and lay'd (as they might have done very well) but some few Cables Length before they came up to us. (Sir L. Jenkins's Letters, vol. ii. p. 697, 698.)

(e) Note, Bishop Burnet PROVOQUES (Vol. I. p. 531.) That Jenkins understood nothing. A Reflection that exceeds him that made it, than him it was intended to offend, as will become more manifest in the Course of this Work.

A. D. 1674. renounce all Pretensions of succeeding to Spain.

That though France, on the other hand, found herself overmatch'd, she would not be Hector'd into such Concessions as Spain purposed to exact; but knowing that Spain would come to no Peace, as long as she had the Support of the Empire and Holland, she would rather play the double Game, of offering very liberally, to detach those Allies; and very fairly to Spain, to mislead her from her true Interest.

But tho' the Allies were thus the Arbiters of the Peace, the Emperor would not be easily won; because he had a Prospect of establishing his Authority at home, by keeping an Army on foot, which he was not to pay: While the Dutch, on the contrary, whose principal Interest was Commerce, would go no farther in the War, than the Prince of Orange would carry them.

Hence he concluded, his Highness was the only Party to be taken off: But without dreading, there would be some Difficulty in doing it, for these Reasons: His Inclinations were to be at the Head of an Army: The Spaniards, and the young Men about him, encourag'd these Inclinations: He had some personal Resentments against the French King; and some Emulation for him: A State of War was besides a State of Security for him against the Loveheim Faction, who, though suppress'd, were not wholly subdu'd: He had a quick Sense of Honour, and was willing the Spaniards should find their Account in the Service they had done the States: He, however, hinted the Possibility of overcoming these Difficulties; 1. By taking the proper Measures to make him revere, and confide in, his Majesty. 2. By convincing him his Authority would be best establish'd in sparing the Purties of the Subject, and in having the King his Uncle firm to him and his Interests. 3. By marrying him with Lady Mary, the Duke's eldest Daughter.

Upon the whole, he thought the Question to be considered was, Whether it was the Interest of England to enter into a stricter Amity with Holland and Spain, tho' to the Dissatisfaction of France? and he humbly gave his Opinion for the Affirmative, as the safest Course we could take. First, because such a Confederacy would make a sufficient Counterpoise to France, already grown dreadful, and put an End to her Projects of embroiling the two Powers in order to weaken them. 2. Because it would deter France from any Offer to invade us, which would leave us in Security to promote and improve our Trade. And 3. Because there would be the less Danger of Disturbance at home: For in that Case, it would neither be the Interest of his Highness nor the States, to see us at Variance among ourselves; whereas, if we persisted in espousing the Interest of France, our Reward could only be, either Part of its Conquests abroad, or the Maintenance of our Quiet at home. But, as to the first, the Share of the weaker Ally was never so good in the Dividend, as the Designation; nor had we any Reason to affect new Acquisitions, while we continued so negligent of our present Possessions: And, as to the last, there was little Reason to expect, after the Disrelishes and Jealousies which had already taken effect, that either the Parliament or People would be reconcil'd to any Interposition from that Quarter; on the contrary, there would be much Reason to fear, that if we should enter into a closer Union with the French Court, the Parliament would again take upon them to enquire into, and judge of, that Proceeding.

These were the Sentiments of that able and experienced Minister; and they deserve to much the more Notice, as they flow'd from a Person, who, tho' no Friend to the French, had not the remotest Connection with the Dutch Party: But, on the contrary, dislike'd their Principles, suspected their Designs, and never, in any one Instance, oppos'd the Court, tho' he often saw Cause to differ in Opinion with those who had the Ascendency there.

This was undoubtedly the great Crisis to have reduced France to her ancient Bounds: And the additional Strength of England would have greatly contributed thereto. But the Transition appear'd over violent to his Majesty; and he thought it more for his Honour, and more agreeable to his Circumstances to act as a Mediator in the behalf of France, than to draw his Sword against her.

How far this Conduct of the King's was right, as to himself, it is hard to say; but as to the Nation, it is pretty evident, that, if he chose to avoid being a Party, it was their Interest that he should have observ'd an exact Neutrality, and left both Parties to worry and weaken one another: For it has already been made appear that the Dutch had form'd a Confederacy, that was held either an Overmatch for France; consequently they were no longer in Danger: And while they did their own Business of preserving the Balance of the Continent, the Commerce of the World flow'd into our Channel; and we had a glorious Opportunity of teaching it to hold that Course for ever.

This Tenderness of his Majesty for France was, however, very artificially cover'd; for he chose Sir William Temple to open the Scene, who could lie under no Suspicion of leaning to the French Interest: And when that Minister, before he enter'd upon his Commission, took the Liberty to expostulate very freely with his Majesty on his late Conduct, and in particular, laid before him that admirable Saying of Gourville's, That a King of England, who would be the MAN of his People, was the greatest King in the World; his Majesty join'd Issue with him, and declar'd, That he would be the MAN of his People: Which induc'd even Sir William himself to believe, that the King was a Convert, and intended to grow popular, by acting as he would have him.

Sir William's Instructions were, to offer his Majesty's Mediation to the States, and then to repair to the Prince of Orange, in order to engage him to second his Desires, in promoting a general Peace. His Embassy was declar'd in May, and in July he arriv'd at the Hague; where he found the States strongly dispos'd to Peace; and, consequently, to accept of the propos'd Mediation: But the Prince of Orange, to whom he was next address'd, so little lik'd his Errand, that he industriously avoided giving him an Audience: Sir William had follow'd him as far as Louvain, in Person; and from thence dispatch'd his Secretary after him to Tirkmont; who return'd with an Executic, instead of an Appointment. This was a Manner of Behaviour from a Prince of Orange to a King of England, which, tho' overlook'd at that time, keafely deserv'd to be forgiven; and very sufficiently shew'd, that Sir Leslie Jenkiss had not misrepresented his Highness to the Council.

The Prince of Orange would give his own Audience.

After this Defeat, Sir William return'd, not a little mortify'd, to the Hague, and renew'd his Conferences with the Pensionary; tho' fully sensible they serv'd only to fill up Time, and keep up the Face of a Negotiation: For the Pensionary, in effect, acknowledg'd, that, while the Prince and the several Allies bound their Account in the War, it was in vain that the States desir'd to be deliver'd from the Burthen of it.

Indeed Sir William could alledge no more in the way of Argument, than the Pensionary was willing to grant: The Business of the Republic was done: They had recover'd all the Places they had lost during the War, except Grave and Maftricht; the last of which was to be surrender'd to Spain; and the first they made no doubt of mastering, before the End of the Campaign. They were, therefore, in earnest, for sheathing the Sword, that they might retrieve their Commerce; that they might give some Relief to their Subjects; and, possibly, that they might disarm their Stadtholder; who was not more rever'd for his Services, than dreaded for his Power.

Battle of Senefc.

While the Mediation was thus suspended at the Hague, the Battle of Senefc was fought, between the French, under the Command of the Prince of Condé, and the Confederates, under the Prince of Orange, the Count de Monterey, and the Count de Soubise: It was expected, that this Action would have prov'd decisive, and oblig'd one Party to have accepted a Peace from the other: But the Event was not answerable. The Prince of Condé had the Advantage in the Outlet, the Prince of Orange in the Close. Of the Prince of Orange the Prince of Condé bore witness, That he had done like an old Captain in all, but only in venturing himself too much like a young Man. Of the Prince of Condé, an anonymous Writer pronounced, That, in the Beginning, he was a great Captain; in the Middle, more a Soldier than a Captain; and, in the End, neither Captain nor Soldier. The French retir'd to their Quarters; the Confederates pursu'd their March: Six or seven thousand Innocents fell on each Side: And both return'd Thanks to God, it may be presum'd, that they had lost no more; for, except a few Standards and Prisoners, neither had any Proofs to produce of a Victory.

It had been the great Purpose of the Confederates, to carry the War this Year into France, both on the Side of Flanders and Alsace; and the Prince of Orange was so confident of succeeding in it, that he openly promis'd Count (f) Starbemberg, to make him drink good Wine in Champagne before the Summer was over: But, against such Leaders as the Prince of Condé, and the Marshal de Turenne, who was at the Head of the French Forces in Germany, it was no easy Matter to succeed in so great an Undertaking.

Design of the Confederates to penetrate into France. Du Mont.

In the Beginning of the Year, the French had fallen into Franché Compté: The Prince of Vandemont, Son of the Duke of Lorraine, commanded there for the Spaniards, but was in no Condition to make head against the Enemy: This the Duke was but too well inform'd of, and therefore he thought himself oblig'd to try every Expedient in his Power to come in to his Rescue: He accordingly first list'd the Swiss Cantons (who would have procur'd a Neutrality for the Franché Compté, but the Spaniards declin'd it) to give him Passage with his little Army; but they had lately enter'd into a Treaty with France, and were thereby oblig'd to refuse him. He then join'd the Body of Imperialists under Count Caprara, and endeavour'd to draw him into an Engagement with the Marshal de Turenne; but he excus'd himself, by alldging, that he could not answer the expofing of the Emperor's Troops in so desperate an Enterprize. The Duke then turn'd himself to the Side of Rhinsfeld: But the Marshal had been beforehand with the Duke of Wirtemberg, and confirm'd him in his Resolution of observing a strict Neutrality. In vain he cast his Eyes towards Alsace, and his own Duchy of Lorraine; his vigilant Enemy had secur'd every Pass in both those Provinces: And when he apply'd in Person, as his last Resource, to the City of Straßburg, the very Neighbourhood of Turenne render'd all his Arguments and Remonstrances ineffectual.

Franché Compté invaded by the French.

In this melancholy Interval, Franché and Ispé Compté was lost; and all the Duke could now do was, with Caprara, to retreat to the Neckar, there to wait for the Arrival of the Duke de Bourgonville, with the Army under his Command; with which additional Supply, they made no question of overpowering the Marshal, and forcing their Way into Lorraine, according to the original Plan of the Campaign.

But they had to do with a Man, whose distinguishing Perfection was to disconcert the Designs of his Enemies. He had no sooner heard of the Duke's Retreat, but he guess'd the Reason, and resolv'd to attack him before the expected Junction could be made.

In

(f) Which was, in some sort, accomplish'd by that General's being taken by the French, at the Battle of Senefc, and sent Prisoner to Rivins.

A. D. 1674.

The Battle of Sinsheim.

In order to which, he made a forced March, of twelve French Leagues in one Day; and thereby came in sight of the Imperialists, before they had heard he was in motion: The Surprise they were in upon this Occasion, however, produced no Disorder: The Duke made the best Disposition imaginable to receive the Enemy; he shelter'd himself behind the little Town of Sinsheim, to which there was no Access but thro' a dangerous Defile; he posted his Cavalry on an Eminence, and drew up his Infantry in a Bottom, amongst the Hedges, which serv'd him for Intrenchments.

The Marshal very well understood the Difficulties in his Way; but resolv'd to surmount them: And so impatient was he to come to Action, that he would not suffer his Troops to take Breath, but made his first Impression at a heat. The Attack was gallant; the Defence obstinate; the Loss equal on both Sides; and all the Advantage he gain'd was, the Glory of forcing the Enemy from his Post.

He could not however hinder them from repassing the Necker, nor from joining the Duke de Bourneville some Days after.

But if this bold and hasty Expedition did not answer the Marshal's Expectation, neither did the Junction of the two Armies answer the Dependence of the Duke of Lorraine: Instead of being able to force the French out of the Field, the French were still able to attack them a second time, in the Neighbourhood of Heidelberg, with as much Success as before. The Imperialists were oblig'd to retire towards Frankfort, there to wait for yet farther Reinforcements; and the Marshal de Turenne distributed his Troops in the Palatinate, to refresh themselves after the Dangers they had dared, and the Fatigues they had undergone; and to encourage them to dare and suffer more.

The Electo-Palatine was dissatisfy'd with the Imperial Court, was nearly ally'd to the House of Bourlen, by the Marriage of his Daughter to Monseur; and had enter'd into a Neutrality with his most Christian Majesty; but notwithstanding all these Considerations, when he saw Germany invaded by the Arms of France, and became sensible of the Dangers that must arise from their Success, he made the necessary Dispositions to join the Confederates, and take part in the Preservation of the Empire.

This Conduct of his, the most Christian King deeply resenting; and now the time was come for him to let loose his Vengeance in all its Fury, and by one dreadful Example deter all the rest of his Minor Allies from presuming to desert his Cause.

So long ago as the Close of the preceding Year, the Garrison of Philippburg, which was in the Hands of the French, had haras'd the Country round, and committed horrible Devastations to the very Gates of Heidelberg: After which the Marshal de Turenne receiv'd Orders to march into the Palatinate with his Army, and to give him a Taste of what he was to expect, in case he persisted in his Attachment to the Emperor. What follow'd was military Execution; the Country was ravag'd, and some Villages were reduced to Ashes. The Electo maintain'd his Integrity notwithstanding; and instead of making Submission to France, as was expected, demanded Succours of the Emperor and Empire. The French, now more exasperated, for their next Exploit, surpriz'd Germersheim; and when the Electo demanded a Restor of the Commanding Officers in that Enterprise, for an Hostility so sudden and so long deterr'd; one of them refus'd to give any Answer; and the other fiercely declar'd, That he had the Honour to be born a Frenchman, and subject to the greatest King in the Universe, to whom only he was oblig'd to give an Account of his Actions. His Electo Highness then thought it high time to make his Levies, and prepare to make the best Defence he could. He likewise published a Manifesto, in which he charges the Garrison of Philippburg with having seiz'd his Towns, imprison'd his Subjects of all Ranks and Qualities, exacted Contributions, pillag'd, robb'd, kill'd, burn'd, and committed all kinds of Enormities; and in the Close, not only commands all his Troops and Auxiliaries to be upon their Guard against those Rapinners, to seize, and in case of Resistance, to put them to the Sword, but summons all the Neighbouring States to join in doing the same, as he promis'd to do in their Defence whenever he should be requir'd.

This, in particular, was the unpardonable Sin, which the Electo had committed, and which the Marshal was now to punish in a manner that has scarce any Precedent in modern History. The Soldier had Licence given him to live at Discretion, and made such use of it as shew'd that Man, set free from the Restraint of Laws, was the most savage Animal of the Creation: Luit, Rapine, Murder, Cruelty, and Oppression sent out their several Furies on every Side: Property was no more: Distinction was lost: That Leveler Calamity made all wretched alike. The Palace was made desolate, the City sunk in Flames: Not even the humblest Village escap'd: From the highest Hill, nothing was to be seen but smoking Ruins, and all the various Horrors of total Desolation.

The unhappy Electo felt for his Subjects all that a tender Father could feel for his Children. He saw his Country undone without Remedy: And with the deepest Resentment of so dire a Visitation, found himself in no Capacity of taking the Revenge it so loudly call'd for. The Imperial Armies which were to have penetrated into France, were driven back as far as Darmstadt; and tho' he sent the most pressing Dispatches to Vienne, Ratisbon, and all the Neighbouring Princes and States, in order to form an Association against the Common Enemy, he received only Condolences instead of Succours. Unable, therefore, to bear any longer his own bitter Reflections, he sent Mr. de Turenne a Challenge, in which he told him, that, if he had commanded an Army of Turks, instead of the Troops of his most Christian Majesty, he should not have wonder'd to see his Towns fir'd, and his Subjects butcher'd in cold Blood; and, after reproaching him with the Obligations that the Family of Bouillon (from which the Marthal was descended) had to his Ancestors, left him to chuse, the Time, Place, and Manner of Combat, and press'd him to solicit his Master's Leave, with the Influence of one who desir'd to obtain it. The whole Letter betrays a Mixture of Rage and Despair: And it appears, the Marthal himself was sensibly affected with so stirring a Representation of the Anguish he had caus'd. Not thinking himself at Liberty to accept this Defiance, without Permission, he did not fail to consult the Pleasure of the King his Master, who could not be prevail'd upon to expose so valuable a Life to oblige an exasperated Enemy. The Marthal was therefore constrain'd to wave the Honour the Elector design'd him, and this he did in the most gallant and respectful manner: At the same time, purging himself from having either wantonly or maliciously authoris'd the Evils he complain'd of; insinuating that they ought rather to be consider'd as the unavoidable Consequences of War; declaring he had done his utmost to prevent them, and that, even for Justice sake, he had punish'd those whom he had found most criminal.

Tho' the Elector was softened by this Apology of the Marthal's, he was not reliev'd: But when he heard the Imperial Army was augmented by the Troops of Lunenbourg, and the new Bishop of Munster, he repair'd to Mentz, to confer with the Dukes of Lorraine and Bourbonville, in the Persuasion that their first Attempt would be to set free the Palatinate by the Reduction of Philippsburg. Here he was again mortify'd, for neither of those Generals had any such Design in View: And when he made his Complaints to the Emperor, he was silenc'd with fair Words, and the Promise of being put in Possession of Alsace for ten Years, when it should be recover'd out of the Hands of France.

Confederates
post the Rhine.

It was now the Elector of Mentz, who had, hitherto, been afraid to shew the least Favour to the Imperialists, gave them Passage over his Bridge; and soon after the City of Straßburg did the same. This was a Thunder-Clap to Mr. de Turenne, who neither expected, nor was prepar'd for so alarming an Incident. He had plac'd his whole Dependence on Straßburg; and the Disappointment disconcerted him more than he had ever been in his whole Life before. The Enemy already outnumber'd him above a third Part. The Elector of (g) Brandenburg, with his Troops, was expected to join them every Day; and, after that, he resolv'd he should be forc'd to abandon both Alsace and Lorraine without striking a Blow. From this Consideration he was induc'd, for once, to lay aside all his usual Caution, and to take the two Provinces upon the Issue of an Action, which nothing but his present Extremity could execute. Having waited a few Days at Wentzenau, where he was intrench'd, for a Reinforcement which was drawn out of the Garrisons of Alsace, and admitt'd a new Oath of Courage and Fidelity to his Officers, he decamp'd of a sudden, and, marching up to the Enemy, gave them Battle at Entzheim: But, tho' the Action was hot and bloody, and lasted from Nine in the Morning till it was dark Night, it was neither general nor decisive: Only the Right of the French and the Left of the Confederates was fully and fairly engag'd: And tho' the Last are said to have given ground, the First did not venture to pursue. 'Tis certain a solemn Te Deum was sung at Paris (at which the King and all the Court assist'd) for no other visible Advantage, than the taking ten Pieces of Cannon, twelve Colours, and eight Standards, which the French Army dearly paid for.

Entzheim.

It to happen'd, however, that this Engagement, doubtful as it seem'd, was productive of Consequences equally advantageous to the French, and mischievous to the Confederates. The Shock of the Onset had fallen upon the Lunenburghers, under the Command of the Duke of Hollrin, who had been nobly supported by the Duke of Lorraine, with some of his own, and some of the Troops of Munster: These had maintain'd the Fight till Two in the Afternoon; and in all that time the Imperialists had either neglected, or found it impracticable, to come to their Assistance. The Lunenburghers, who had suffer'd grievously, were loud in their Complaints: The Duke of Bourbonville, the Imperial General, was as loud in his own Defence: Both Parties were equally exasperated against each other; and, while they were thus at variance among themselves, no Advantage could be taken of the Weakness of the Enemy. Things were in this untoward Situation, when the (h) Elector of Brandenburg join'd the confederate Army with 18,000 Men, and Forty-seven Pieces of Ordnance: But his Arrival rather widen'd than clos'd the Breach; for he took part with the Lunenburghers, and openly condemn'd the Imperialists for not coming up to their Relief. Hence it follow'd, that this Addition of Numbers made no Addition of Strength: A Diversity of Interests produced a Diversity of Opinions: All were equally fond of their own: Councils serv'd only to create Confusion: And if ever any thing like a Concert took place, it was divulg'd as soon as made. It might be said, that Mr. de Turenne was present at all their Consultations; for he was always inform'd of all that pass'd, and, of course, found it easier to disappoint the Measures of his Enemies, than they to form them: He had been reinforced by the Marshal de Crequi, with about six thousand Men; but still his Army bore no Proportion to that of the Confederates; and it will ever be Matter of Astonishment, that he not only kept the Field, but, against all their Efforts, effectually protected the greater Part of Alsace, which he had receiv'd Orders to evacuate, in the Belief that it was no longer tenable.

(g) Both he, and the Duke of Brunswick and Lunenbourg, had again deserted the French, and entered into the Confederacy, June 1st, 1674: But the Duke of Hesse continued staunch to his Neutrality, notwithstanding all the Princes of his House were come over to the Confederates.

Duke of Lorraine penetrates into his own Duchy.

Of all the confederate Generals, only the Duke of Lorraine eluded his Vigilance; and, by Ways till then believ'd impassable, flipp'd into his own Duchy, surpriz'd the Marquis de Sablé in his Bed, and entirely routed the Party he commanded, which were the Noblesse of Angou; after which he seiz'd upon Remiremont and d'Espinal, and thereby oblig'd the Marshal to move that Way with his whole Army, to put a stop to his farther Progress. The Duke now flatter'd himself that the Confederates would make use of this Opportunity to enter Lorraine likewise by the Pass of Oberbergen, which they might have easily done: But finding this great Advantage was overlook'd, and sensible, that, with the Handful of Men under his Command, it would be impossible to defend himself, he was forced to withdraw, having obtain'd no other Advantage by his Expedition, than a Booty of about three or four hundred thousand Livres, and the Pleasure of having shewn the Allies the Road, which they ought to have pursued.

In this Interval they had, however, carry'd the strong Castle of Hunningen, and so closely block'd up Brifac, that they made no doubt of reducing it before the End of the Year: But Lorraine being once more in a State of Tranquillity, Mr. de Turenne resolv'd to return into Alsace, and either oblige the Enemy to raise the Siege; or, at least, to throw sufficient Succours into the Place. The Crisis he knew was favourable to him: The Swedes were on the point of deserving the Subsidy they receiv'd from France, by invading Prussia, in order to oblige the Elector of Brandenburg to recall his Forces out of Alsace, for the Defence of his own Dominions: And so happily did all things coincide according to his Expectations, that, when he arriv'd at Besfort with his Army, he found the Confederates encamp'd in two separate Bodies; the Imperialists, &c. under the Duke of Beaumont, behind the River Ill; and the Elector of Brandenburg, with his own Troops and those of Lawenburg, near Colmar: This was the Opportunity he wish'd for; and he resolv'd to improve it to the utmost, by ordering his Troops to pass the Fords in the Neighbourhood of Mulhausen; which the Enemy had taken no other Precautions to secure, than by posting six Squadrons in the Meadow on the other Side; which were supported by five more: These were soon thrown into Disorder, by the Regiment of Orleans, and some other Troops, who at two different Places had pass'd the River, and began the Attack: The main Body of the Imperial, Lorraine, and Munster Cavalry, were drawn up behind a Hill, and continually pour'd in fresh Troops to sustain those who gave way. The French, likewise, made to good use of their Fords, that two Lieutenant Generals, and two Camp Marshals, with their respective Divisions, pass'd the River, and charg'd the Enemy with so much Vigour, that they turn'd their Back, and, Night coming on, retreated in great Confusion.

This Action happen'd so late in the Season as the 20th of December, N. S. and on the fourth of January, the Marshal, continuing to take Advantage of the Disorders of the Enemy, came up with them in the Neighbourhood of Colmar; but finding their Disposition too good (being drawn up in Battalia in a sort of triangular Island form'd by the Rivers of Colmar, Turkheim, and a Canal of Communication) that, tho' he charg'd them several times on the Canal Side with great Resolution, he could not force them from their Post. The Dispute, however, continued till it was dark; after which, he order'd his Troops to rest on their Arms all Night, and, his Cannon being now arriv'd, he made the necessary Preparations for renewing the Attack next Morning.

But when Day broke there was no Enemy in Sight: The Elector of Brandenburg had not only look'd on during both these Actions, without taking part in either, but for the farther Security of his Troops, took care to make an early Retreat to Schlesstadt. This put the Duke of Beaumont under a Necessity to do the same; and at a general Council of War, held in that Place, it was resolv'd to send back the Troops of the Circles which were marching towards them; to repair the Rhine at Strasbourg; and to break up the Army, some returning home, and the rest being dispers'd into Winter-Quarters; except about three thousand, who fell by whole Corps into the Enemies Hands.

Confederates dispers'd.

As on the one Hand, the Dissolution of so vast an Army, under the Command of so many Princes, struck a Damp thro' the Confederacy, and dissolv'd all Germany, so on the other, the Glory of Mr. de Turenne was at the full: He had by his own excellent and admirable Conduct, not only preserv'd France with a far inferior Force from the Menaces of the Confederates, but drove them out of Alsace with Ignominy. In the several Engagements of the Year, he had never once been foil'd; and when he return'd to Paris, to receive the Applauses of his King and Country, he left the Rhine for the Boundary of the Gaulic Empire.

It may be thought these Transactions do not immediately belong to the History of England; but they certainly do to our Politics; Nothing being more necessary to be known in this Island, than the Extent of the French Power, and the Weakness of a German Confederacy.

Even on the Side of Flanders, where Affairs wore a more florid Aspect than in the Empire, it appear'd that there could be no Mixture of jarring Interests without a Fermentation. The Imperialists desir'd no more than to hold the Prince of Conde at Bay, that he might not be able to send any Succours to Mr. de Turenne in Alsace. The Spaniards were for applying the whole Force of the League to the Recovery of the Places seiz'd by France before the Treaty of Aix; and the Dutch were all for reducing Grave and Mastricht, from whence the French levy'd Contributions as far as Buren and Cullenburg. The several Commanders had likewise their several Pretensions, which kept up perpetual Broils amongst them. The Count de Monterey, who was a Grandee of Spain, and Governor General of the Spanish Netherlands, would allow no Superiority to the Stadtholder of the Seven Provinces; for which Reason he address'd him always with the Title of Excellency instead of Highness; and the Prince of Orange would not rank with the Count de Monterey: And, tho' the Count de Souches could come into no Competition of Rank with either, he was first in Command, and therefore was for giving the Law to both. The ill Consequences of these Differences were felt even at the Battle of Senef, tho' Sir William Temple presumes that they did not break out till the Siege of Oudenarde.

Siege of Oudenarde.

Upon this Occasion, indeed, they became notorious to all Europe. The Prince of Orange passionately desired to come to another Engagement with the Prince of Condé, and for that Reason, principally, had advis'd the Enterprize on Oudenarde; as being fully persuaded that the French would hazard a Battle in order to raise the Siege. As he expected, the Prince of Condé came up within a League of the Confederate Camp: A Council of War was call'd: His Highness of Orange was of Opinion they ought immediately to quit their Lines and fight him, while his Troops were yet fatigu'd with their March: The Count de Souches, on the contrary, was for putting it off till the next Day; which was at last agreed to; and the Prince, on the Morrow, made his Dispositions accordingly: But de Souches broke all his Measures again: For, instead of passing the River to join the Prince, he march'd off another Way, and oblig'd his Highness to follow him: In this Interval, the Enemy got between the Town and them, and drew up on an Eminence; at the Bottom whereof was a hollow boggy Ground, which, tho' the two Armies continued in Sight of each other for twenty-four Hours together, furnished the Allies with an Excuse for avoiding the very thing they had affect'd to seek, and for making their Retreat towards Ghent; tho' it is pretty plain they had entertain'd some such Thought before; the Prince of Orange, as well as the Count de Souches, having sent thither their Baggage and Cannon, almost as soon as the French arriv'd.

Rais'd by the Prince of Condé.

However this may be, the Prince now quitted the Army, in Disguis; but was, at length, prevail'd upon by the Count de Man-tery to rejoin it; possibly on the Condition that he should be at Liberty to undertake the Siege of (i) Grave, the only Place which the French now held in the Territories of the Republic, and which after a gallant Defence, was surrender'd to his Highness before the End of October: With this Exploit ended the Campaign; his Highness soon after, dispersing his Troops into Winter Quarters, and returning to the Hague; where he was receiv'd as the Guardian Genius of his Country.

Grave taken.

The very Day of his Return the foreign Ministers came to compliment him on the Successes of the Campaign; and, among the foremost, Sir W. Temple, who had snatch'd the first Opportunity to fulfil his Instructions, by communicating his Majesty's Inclinations to forward a general Peace, in concert with his Highness; and by leading him to explain his Sentiments thereon.

Conference between the Prince of Orange and Sir W. Temple.

But the Ambassador could not be more warm in his Proposal, than the Prince was cold in his Answer. He did indeed acknowledge his Majesty's Kindness; but he shew'd no Disposition to embrace his Offers: Tho' disgust'd with his Colleagues, he was not weary of the War: The Obligations of the States to Spain furnish'd him with Arguments to shew the Dishonour they would incur by striking up a separate Peace: And the Sketch he conceiv'd to give of the Terms which the Spaniards would, or, according to him, ought to insist on, sufficiently shew'd, that a general one was scarce to be look'd for. Thus it appear'd, that, tho' the principal Powers engag'd in the War had, by this time, accepted his Majesty's Mediation, there was little Prospect of its being attended with the desired Success.

Sir William did not fail to impart this Conference, in detail, to his Majesty, almost as soon as it was over; and was surpris'd to receive no Returns or Orders upon it, except that, about eight or ten Days after, he was prepar'd to expect the Arrival of the Lords Arlington and Ossory, together with their Ladies and their Brother Mr. Odyke, at the Hague: No Mention however was made of Business; and he was left to suppose, what was very unlikely, that they came only to make a Visit to their Friends and Relations in Holland.

In a Letter from Sir William Temple to his Father, dated March 27, 1674, Notice is taken of a Bargain, which had been made between Lord Arlington and Sir Joseph Williamson, for the Secretary's Place: The Latter was to give six thousand Pounds for it; and the Former was to resign it, as soon as Lord St. Albans should be willing to part with the Chamberlain's Staff, for which Lord Arlington had agreed to pay him ten thousand.

Lord Arlington made Lord Chamberlain, and Sir J. Williamson Secretary of State.

On the first of September, this Bargain was executed; and on the 14th, the Public was inform'd

(i) In his Way thither, the Prince had like to have fallen into the Hands of a French Party, of 4000 Horse, and as many Musketeers, who were detach'd on purpose to intercept him, and who mist of him but by Three Hours March.

inform'd by the Gazette (N. 420.) that those two Removes were made in recompence of the long and faithful Services of Sir Joseph Williamson, as a Clerk of the Council; and of Lord Arlington, as Secretary of State.

But his Lordship, it seems, did not make over his Influence and Importance, with his Place. He only parted with the Fatigue, the Envy, and the Danger; and both in the Council, and the Closet, he was solicitous to maintain as great an Ascendancy as ever: He was, however, sensible, that he stood but on slippery Ground: The Duke was strongly prejudic'd against him; and Lord Danby every day gain'd ground of him with the King: It became his Business, therefore, to lie in wait for an Opportunity to do some notable Service, that should restore him to his former Significancy: And when this Dispatch of Sir William Temple's arriv'd, relating to the Disposition of the Prince of Orange, he thought he had found it.

Accordingly he is said to have insinuated into his Majesty the Necessity of his entering into the closest Union with the Prince of Orange, and the Expediency of making himself the Agent to effect it, on account of the Assurances he might hope from his Relations in Holland: Rutigny, the French Minister at London, was also at the Bottom of this Intrigue; the Lady Mary, the Duke's eldest Daughter, was made the Bait to draw his Highness in the Measures of the two Courts: To manage this Part of the Affair was Lord Offory's Business, who, on account of his distinguished Bravery, was very dear to the Prince: And tho' the Lord Treasurer had no Share in forming the Project, he was willing to put in for a Share of the Merit of it, by sending his Son to make his Compliments, and offer his Services, to his Highness: And as to the Duke, he had been induc'd to give his (4) Consent to the Negotiation, with the proviso, that the first Motion should come from his Highness.

Nothing is harder to repair, than Blunders in Politics, especially such as affect the Persons of Princes. Either to exemplify the King's Regard to the Prince of Orange, or his Influence in Holland, Lord Arlington had told Mr. Van Rheede, who had been sent over into England upon the first Motions of the late Peace, That his Majesty could make the Prince be serv'd as de Wit was, if he would set himself about it. This, it seems, his Highness never could digest; and when his Lordship came over on this important Errand, it contribut'd not at all to his better Reception, which, as he describ'd it himself to Sir William Temple, was dry and fullen; the Prince appearing uneasy while the Interview lasted, behaving himself as if he with'd it over, and complaining afterwards of the Arrogance and Insolence with which Lord Arlington had enter'd upon all his Expofulations.

They had, however, three long Conferences, of which Sir William gives no other Account, than that the Pensioner and Count Waldeck thought, "That the Bait of my Lord Arlington was to draw the Prince into such Measures of Peace, as France then so much desired; into a Discovery of those Persons who had made Advances to the Prince or the States of raising Commotions in England during the late War; into secret Measures with the King of assisting him against any Rebels at home, as well as Enemies abroad; and into the Hopes or Designs of a Match with the Duke's eldest Daughter. Though, THEY SAID, he found the Prince would not enter at all into the first, was obstinate against the second, treated the third as a Disrespect to the King, to think he could be so ill belov'd, or so imprudent to need it; and upon Mention made of the last, by my Lord Offory, he took no farther Hold of it, than saying, His Fortunes were not in a Condition for him to think of a Wife."

Sir William adds in his own Person, "That Lord Arlington, at his Return, was receiv'd coldly by the King, and ill by the Duke, who was angry that any Mention had been made of the Lady Mary, tho' it was done only by my Lord Offory, and whether with Order from the King, or not, was not known; so as never any Strain of Court-Skill and Contrivance succeeded so unfortunately as that had done, and so contrary to all the Ends the Author of it propos'd to himself. Instead of advancing the Peace, he left it desperate; instead of establishing a Confidence between the King and the Prince, he left all colder than he found it; instead of entering into great personal Confidence and Friendship with the Prince, he left (1) an Unkindness that lasted ever after. Instead of retrieving

(4) Bishop Burnet (vol. 1. p. 577) affirms the contrary, with the strange Circumstance of having it from the Duke's own Mouth.

(1) If this is true, the Prince of Orange was not the Man whom Sir William has represented him to be; for, after this Affair was over, his Highness was pleas'd to give to the Earl of Arlington, at different times, the following Expressions of his Friendship and Favour:

From the Camp at Duffel, June, 1675.

My Lord,

"I was very much pleas'd to see, by your Letter of the 17th of the last Month which I receiv'd but three Days ago, that our * Quarrel is at an end: I can assure you it is no small Satisfaction to me; and I hope that nothing for the future may interrupt that Friendship we have mutually promised each other. For my part, I will endeavour to let you see that I wish nothing so much as to have frequent Opportunities of effectually demonstrating how sincerely I am,

My Lord,

Your most Affectionate Servant,

W. Prince of ORANGE.

P. P. I desire you that our Compliments may end with our Quarrel; and when you will give yourself the Trouble to write, to send them to Baljaste at Brussels, who will take care to convey them to me sooner than by the Higgs."

Laken, June 5, 1677.

"Not long ago I found by one of your Letters to Overland, that some body has given you some very much Reports of me; which has oblig'd me to send Restorck EXPRESSLY to disabuse you, and to assure you from me to the contrary; being most sincerely your Servant, and desiring you to continue me in your Friendship; which I will endeavour to deserve, by showing you, on all Occasions, that I am entirely Yours,

W. Prince of ORANGE.

his own Credit at Court, which he found wanting upon the Increase of Lord Danby's, he made an End of all he had left with the King, who never after us'd him with any Confidence further than the Terms of his Place."

This is what Sir William calls uncovering this mystical Journey; but if it was attended with all these unlucky Consequences, it was more than it deserv'd; for it was evident from what Sir Leoline Jenkins had advanc'd at the Council Board, That this Alliance was the most natural and important Step which the King could take to establish his own Tranquility: And surely no Offer could have been made to the Prince of Orange, which more deserv'd his Acknowledgments. That therefore these concurring Interests did not unite, can no otherwise be accounted for, than by the Interposition of the Interests of France, which instead of cementing, hinder'd them from coming together.

But in truth, Sir William has rather obscur'd than uncover'd this mystical Journey; and we must have recourse to Lord Osborn's own Letter to the Duke of Ormond for a clear and candid State of it, as likewise that of the Prince himself to his Majesty, which are as follow.

The Earl of Osborn to the Duke of Ormond.

"When I have given you an Account of my late Commission, you will judge, who and what influences Affairs at present. The King judg'd an Alliance by the Duke's Daughter to the Prince of Orange to suit most with his Occasions; as also a right Understanding between them. My Lord Chamberlain was commissionated to handle the Eclaircissement on the King's Side, and my Part was that relating to the Duke. The Objection that the King made was, That the Prince of Orange during and since the War, had endeavour'd to raise up Seditious at home. His Answer was, That before the Peace, he us'd his best Endeavours to obtain, if not constrain the King to it; but not by any thing tending to a Rebellion; that afterwards he would own himself a Villain, if ever he had done the thing that might give any Suspicion thereof. My Lord Lauderdale had one Carhares seiz'd upon and examin'd, who said, that the Prince of Orange bid him compliment Duke Hamilton. This he own'd; for it was not unlawful, he thought, after Wars to be civil to Persons of Worth and Honour. This was all the Quarrel on our Side. Upon the King's desiring to know who he had treated with, and the King's Promise that the Persons named should not suffer, he desir'd to be excus'd; with this Promise, that if for the future, any thing came to his Knowledge that might disturb the Quiet of the Kingdoms, he would give Notice of it in time.

A. D. 1674.

The Prince of Orange's Complaints were, that the King, instead of helping him in his greatest Distress, had sent over Embassadors who made a stricter League with France; but that he forgot all things pass'd, which could not be helped. He said, that it was insinuated to him, that something was intended for the Duke of Monmouth to his Prejudice. To this we gave him Satisfaction by the King's reiterated Commands. That which most touch'd was, the King's conniving at Levies for France, and his Strictness against such as desired to serve under him; upon which he press'd extremely, that the Troops might be recalled, or that he might have Leave to raise some for the Service of the States. To this he receiv'd not the Satisfaction he wish'd. Upon which he several times said, That he was to expect little from us during our Partiality and fear of displeasing France; and that whilst those of my Lord Lauderdale's Principles had so much Credit, the French Interest would overbalance his. At our parting, he bid us not only thank the King, but assure him, that if Occasion were, he would venture for his Service, his Life and Fortune.

I come now to my Part. The King told me, his Nephew and his Niece's Marriage was the only thing capable of helping the Duke; and that for that, as well as other Reasons, he had spok'd to the Duke of it, who consented that, upon the Prince of Orange's desiring it, I should undertake the Proposition would be accepted. This Commission I had from BOTH, and upon its being mov'd to me by the Prince of Orange, I declar'd to him so much, and shew'd him the Account I gave of it to the Duke; from which Letter, by my making a Comma instead of a Full Stop, the Critics would infer, that I had made the Offer first. Upon this the Duke express'd all the Anger imaginable; but the Prince's Letter by me fully justified the contrary. The Duke will have the whole Letter to be a Civil Denial; to which I have nothing to say, but that I am sure the Prince thought it otherwise; for I shew'd it him, who approv'd thereof. During our Absence, the King's Mind hath been wrought upon in this Affair so much, as I believe those who with not a good Understanding between him and his Nephew, will have their Aim. I almost forgot to tell you, that the Duke before our going, said, he would not have his Daughter marry before a Peace were made. But this the King oppos'd, believing that when we had nothing to say on that Account, it would give a Jealousy, that other Ends were sought under this Negotiation, which he would not have any ways clogg'd. The Duke's Expostulation was mingled with much Kindness, but avowing

From the Camp at Soignes, Sept. 20, 1677.

"Since his Majesty has been pleas'd to give me leave to make a Tour into England, I hope quickly to have the Honour of seeing you there, and to dispel those Impressions, as my Lord Osborn tells me, some People have made upon you, That I was not so much your friend and Servant as I always have been. It will not be long before I shall have an Opportunity to assure you so the contrary by Word-of-Mouth; desiring you to excuse me till in your Friendship, and to be assur'd that I am entirely avowing, that he liked not the thing from the first, and accusing me of too much Haſte. His Carriage ſince to me is very fair and open. I find the Duke of Monmouth much of the ſame Mind; there being, beſides Croſſneſs of Interests, ſome private Piques between the Prince and him.

Moreover, I have promiſed the Earl of Offory and Arlington, That I am and will always be ready to acquaint your Maſteſty with all I can learn of the ill Practices and miſchievous Deſigns your Enemies may have againſt your Perſon, or the Quiet and Reſt of your Kingdoms; At preſent I can aſſure your Maſteſty I know none; but if I can learn any thing for the future, I will not fail immediately to give you an exact Account. In Return, I beg your Maſteſty will do me the Favour to ſhew ſome real Marks of your Friendſhip, not only to me, but the States General, whole Interests and mine are at preſent inſeparable; upon which Subject I have explain'd myſelf more at large to the Earls, who without doubt, will give your Maſteſty a faithful Account of all what paſſ'd in the Conferences which I had with them, having an intire Confidence in their Perſons. It does not appear from either of theſe Letters, that this Negotiation was ſo thoroughly unſucceſſful, as Sir W. Temple has repreſented it; for if it did not contribute to the general Peace of Europe, it bid fair to the rendering his Maſteſty more at eaſe at home (which perhaps was the great Drift of it) ſince his Highneſs had given it under his Hand, that inſtead of exciting Diſcontents, he would make it his Buſineſs to diſcover them. But Sir William was piqu'd at his having no Concern in it; and Lord Danby was undoubtedly alarm'd, at ſeeing ſo great a Measure ſet on foot, in which he had ſo little Concern: There was now a cloſe Connection between the Lord Treſurer and the Embaſſador, than between the Embaſſador and the Lord Chamberlain; and it may be eaſily ſeen, that his Attachment to the First led him to write with rather too much Bitterneſs of the Laſt.

As the Object appears to a common Eye, Lord Arlington ſeems rather to have taken a Method to make his Court to the Prince, at the Expence of the Duke, than to offend him; and that his Rival put his Interests and Credit to the ſtretch, ſoon after, to outbid him for his Highneſs's Favour: For in a Letter of his Highneſs's to Sir Gabriel Sylvius, dated March 25, 1675, we find the following Words: "The Lord Treſurer had no ſooner let me know his Maſteſty's Kindneſs in aſſigning me my Debt here, (as the eight hundred thouſand Patacons) but I writ to the King, to return him my moſt humble Acknowledgments, and ſent the Letter to the Lord Treſurer, becauſe it was he that gave me the fiſt Notice of his Maſteſty's favourable Reſolution." Adding; "I have alſo writ to his Maſteſty, to thank him that he would concern himſelf in the Affair of Gelderland."

We have here all the Marks of a perfect Reconciliation: Favours freely beſtow'd on one ſide, and gratefully acknowledg'd on the other: And as to the Rivalſhip of the two Miniſters, for the Prince as well as the King, it is further remarkable, that at the very time his Highneſs had choſen to return his Thanks to his Uncle, by the Danby Channel (tho' which, indeed, this whole (m) Affair had been tranſacted) Lord Arlington was either hurry'd by his own Reſentment, or betray'd by ſome falſe Friend, to charge the Prince with a Deſign of making a Journey to England, in order to engage the Parliament to tranſact the Meaſures of Prorogation. And with the Addition of ſaying, It was like to prove but an ill Friendſhip between the King and the Duke, if it was to be made with Blood: As alſo, That there were ſome Wounds among them, which would bleed aſreſh if they were open'd. This made the Quarrel mention'd by the Prince in his Letter of June 1675, and induced his Highneſs, after purging himſelf in the ſtrongeſt manner from the Imputation, to declare, with the higheſt Indignation,

Quarrel between his Highneſs and Lord Arling-ton.

Temple's Works, vo. 12. p. 330. &c.

(m) It was ſet on foot when Lord Danby's Son accompanied the Baſt of Offory and Arlington to the Marſhes who brought with him a Order of ſervants from his Maſteſty, the Prince made uſe of the Opportunity to apply for his Debt, and in his Letter of Thanks to that Miniſter, dated February 27, 1675, he thus expreſſes himſelf on the Accomplishment of it: "And as I know that I owe to yourſelf alſo the Stated which this Affair has met with, I give you many Thanks, and ſhall own the Obligation as long as I live."

And here we have the Foundation of all that Friendſhip and Confidence, which afterwards ſubſiſted between the Prince and the Treſurer.

The Title of Duke of Gelderland offered to his Highness by the States of that Province.

nation, That he would never bestow any thing more to do with him, beyond common Forms.

As to the Affairs of Gelderland: What his Majesty's Concern in it was, it is scarce possible to explain: But it shew'd such an aspiring Spirit in the Prince, as gave the Lowest Nation very great Advantages against him, and took off much of this mighty Popularity, which had been the Foundation of his present Greatness. His Highness had a Call into that Province, to settle the Magistracy, in the Right of his Office as Stadtholder; and, while he was there, the Deputies of the Province unanimously made him an Offer of the Sovereignty of their Country, under the ancient Title of Duke of Gelderland, which they pretended had been formerly in some of his Ancestors. No Affair of this Nature is the Product of Chance: And the Prince himself is said to have been deepest in the Intrigue which gave rise to this. He, however, demurred upon the Offer, and demanded the Advice of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht: The last temporis'd, and prompted him to accept it: The second openly dissuaded him: And before Holland came to a Resolution, he saw Reason to excuse himself from accepting, what would, in all likelihood, have cost him more than it was worth.

III. Consequences attending it.

Sir William Temple, in his Memoirs, has bestow'd a few Paragraphs in a sort of Endeavour to purge his Highness from any sinister Views in this Affair: But he seems to have forgot what he had said upon it in his Letter to Lord Arlington, dated February 26, 1674-5, viz. "The Business of Gelderland is now over; but the Smart of it will not wear off without farther time; and bending the Stick the contrary Way must set it right." And again a little after: "It was a common Voice of Amsterdam, That better be under the Subjection of that Crown [France] than of an absolute Sovereign at home. In those few Days the Noise lasted, there was above three hundred thousand Pounds drawn out of the Bank of Amsterdam. The East-India Actions fell above Thirty: And those upon the Centers of Holland fell from a Hundred to Seventy-five; which was Five lower, than at the most desperate Crisis of the last War: Which are Effects that might amaze such as do not either understand or consider, how much Trade, and indeed all Government depends upon Orison."

Two Projects for a Peace.

The Beginning of this Year produced also Two other Projects, relative to the Peace. One arose from France, and was carry'd on by the Marshall d'Esstrades, with one who had been Pensioner of Musgraves; and who communicated all to the Pensionary Fogel. It was calculated solely to effectuate a separate Peace between France and Holland; to break the Union of the States with the House of Austria; and to renew their ancient Dependence on France: As a Consideration for which, they offer'd all possible Advantages to the States, and all those personal ones that could be desired by a Prince of Orange.

The other was the Fabric of his Highness and his Pensionary Fogel; and propos'd, that a Match should be made between the young King of Spain and Madame Stile (the Daughter of the Duke of Orleans, by the Princess Henrietta of England): That France should give with her in Dowry the late conquer'd Places in Flanders: That his Britannic Majesty should make this Match, upon these Terms; and that he should have two hundred thousand Pounds for his good Offices in it.

Neither met with any Success. The Prince had too much Honour to quit his Allies: And the French had more Mind to the rest of Flanders, than to part with what was already in their Hands.

It is now time to return to the more immediate Affairs of these Kingdoms.

As the King and his Parliament now began to lead the Life of a Couple who were become mutually odious to each other, by their mutual ill Humours, a Notion arose, or was artfully inculcated, that a Divorce would ensue. And this becoming the Subject-matter of almost all Conversations, it gave occasion to the issuing another Proclamation, against those who should utter any false News, or Reports, or intermeddle with the Affairs of State and Government; as likewise against all those who listen'd to such Reports, without revealing the Authors: In which, however, it was in so many Words, affirm'd, That the Intention to dissolve the Parliament had never once been under Deliberation.

Proclamation against Uttering of false News.

Gazette, Num. 883.

This Edict was set forth in the Beginning of May: And, in the Beginning of July, a Letter from the Privy Council of Scotland to the King (signifying, that, in obedience to his Commands, they had to apply'd themselves to curb the Disorders which had lately broke out in that Kingdom; that the Influence of that Party was at a stand, and their seditious Practices, in a great measure, abated) was inserted in the Gazette, to confute divers False Reports, about that time spread abroad, as if that Kingdom was in danger of falling into some sudden Commotion.

Letters from the Scottish Privy Council.

Num. 902.

In the same Month, his Majesty was pleas'd to dismiss the Duke of Buckingham from all his Employments; and, by his Letters to the University of Cambridge, to declare their Chancellorship, which his Grace had held by Election, was vacant. The Duke of Monmouth succeeded him in every thing, but his Influence at the Council-board; which seems to have been, for a while, divided between the Earls of Arlington and Dumby, and in the End, to have rested on the latter only.

Date of Bucks's Disgrace.

[Gazette, Num. 904.]

As Apostate-Patriots become Thorough-pac'd Ministers, reprobate Ministers become itaunch Patriots; and, as Kings reward their Enemies, the People forgive them. Thus the Duke of Buckingham, who had been the Collegue of Lord Shaftsbury in abusing his Power, was not ashamed to become his Collegue again in exasperating the People; and no sooner did the People believe him to be their Friend, than they forgot he had ever been their Enemy.

Turns Patriot.

A. D. 1674-5.

Of the famous Cabal but two now remain'd at Court, and of those two but one, the Duke of Lauderdale had weather'd the Indignation of Parliament, without making Concessions on one Hand, or losing Ground on the other: But the firmer he seem'd to stand, the louder the Storm grew, and the more Eagerness and Impatience his Opponents shew'd for his Fall. In order to which those of Scotland furnish'd Complaints, which those of England were to make use of.

Mr. North's Character of the Duke of Lauderdale. Examen, p. 69.

Much has been said of this Minister already, but more remains. Mr. North is positive, That he was the best and wisest Statesman that ever England had: and the Reason he assigns, in effect, is, because he was the most arbitrary. His Words are, "By the prudent Conduct of the Duke of Lauderdale, Scotland was in a Posture, not only of Safety, but (if needed) of giving Assistance to the King." Again, "He was an expugnable Loyalist, and kept the Door of Scotland close shut. No Harm could get in or out there, while he was Commissioner; which in the Sense of the Earl of Shaftsbury, &c. was the worst of Offences.—And the same Reasons wrought as strong on the King's Side, who never could be prevail'd with to part with his Commissioner."

If the strengthening a Government was always a Receipt to shut the Door against Mischief, according to this Representation of Mr. North's, the Duke of Lauderdale would have deserv'd the Character he has bestow'd upon him: But, unfortunately, the People have more to fear from their Prince, than the Prince from his People, which that Gentleman never once supposes: And for one Instance that can be given of a Government having recourse to a Military Power merely in its own Defence, many may be found of their doing it with a View to compel their Subjects to kneel like Camels to be loaded, and to disable them from spurning at the Hand that imposes the Yoke.

It has been already prov'd that this was notoriously the Case with respect to this applauded Measure of the Duke of Lauderdale's, for arming his Majesty with the Power of Scotland: And, with respect to his own particular Conduct, it has likewise been already prov'd, that no Man could exercise a Vicegerency, over a brave and sensible People, more like a Bashee than he. It is necessary to add, from the Records of 1674, that, after the Remonstrating-Members had let the King into the Particulars of their Complaints, they were dismiss'd with much seeming Graciousness; and had Hopes given them, that all their Complaints should be left to the Judgment of Parliament: But when they expected a Session, and rode down to Scotland, in the most severe Weather that ever was known, the Commissioner, by his Majesty's express Command, adjourn'd it from March 2, to October 14, which created such universal Discontent, says Bishop Burnet, that many offer'd at very extravagant Propositions to destroy the Duke of Lauderdale, and all his Party.

Further Instance of his arbitrary Government.

At this Crisis, his Grace thought it advisable to make Friends with the Presbyterians, by taking their Leaders into his Confidence, and not only coniving at their Meetings, but suffering them to take possession of the vacant Churches of Edinburgh; which they held for some Months.

But this provok'd the Clergy out of measure: several of whom, in resentment, gave out, that all things were falling into Confusion: And, at their Diocesan-Meeting, endeavour'd to set on foot Petitions for a national Synod, in order to settle the Church. This gave such Offence, both to his Grace and the Archbishop of (n) St. Andrews, and was by them so represented at Court, that, pursuant to the Act of Supremacy, an Order was obtain'd, and directed to the Privy Council, for turning out the Bishop of Dumblaine, and four of the Ministers of Edinburgh; and for confining the four last in the Neighbourhood of that City, and removing the first eighty Miles off: All which was executed without citing, accusing, or hearing any of the Parties; on a private (s) Information only.

Among the angry Devices of the Opposition, which they had recourse to after the Disappointment they had receiv'd by the Prorogation, one was, to procure an Appeal to be made from a Decree of the supreme Court of Session to Parliament. This was done with a Design to necessitate frequent Sitzings, and was to underhoo'd: The Judges therefore required all the Advocates to condemn this Proceeding, as contrary to Law (Bishop Burnet acknowledges there lay no such Appeal): They refus'd: The King then interpos'd with his Commands, without effect: The next Step was to banish them by Proclamation (not Law) from Edinburgh, and twelve Miles round about, in case they did not submit to the King's Pleading in three Days. They went into Banishment. Another Proclamation was then issued, in which his Majesty declar'd, ON THE WORD OF A KING, that, if they did not resume their Employments before a certain Day in January, 1664-5; they never should be admitted again: This frighted back about Twenty-five; which were scarce a Third of the whole Number.

(n) What follows, and many other Particulars relative to the Scottish History, as far as the Year 1678, I deduce from a Manuscript in Lord Somers's Collection, Vol. XX. call'd, England's Looking-glass's or, A new Account how the Kingdom of Scotland was first subvert'd, and managed, by the Duke of Lauderdale, in their last three or four Years; which is authoriz'd, in many Places, not only by the concurrent Testimony of Bishop Burnet, and the Papers in the State Tracts in the Time of Charles II, on the Scottish Affairs; but several Royal Letters, and Proclamations, which will be quoted in their proper Places.

(s) Our Manuscript (A Looking-glass for England) has the following Paragraph, p. 3:

"The Information given against them, especially the four before-nam'd Ministers, was made by Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, who got that Bishopric by betraying the Presbyterians, which shew'd a great deal of Courtship, and a notable for his Persecutions, Represses, and Rogues; And he, knowing that a national Synod was to be his Judge, and hearing some of his enormous Crimes were come to light, did all he could to misrepresent the Design, and strike up a Friendship with Duke Lauderdale, on this Foot of Account."

A.D. 1674. Number. The Rest presented a Paper to the Privy Council, containing the Reasons for their Non-submission to these Rules; and offered to submit, in case the Judges would declare the said Rules were grounded upon Law. The Privy Council were next order'd to proceed against them, on this Paper: But it was drawn up with so much Caution, that it would not admit of a Charge. The Advocates then sent a Deputation of the most eminent of their Body to the King, with an humble Tender of submitting their Cause to the Decision of his Majesty. To parry this Push, Sir George Mackenzie was induced to desert his Brethren, and petition to be restor'd: And accordingly was, notwithstanding the (p) King's Word to the contrary: And, finally, his Majesty was prevail'd upon to certify, in a Letter to the (q) Judges, That, being resolv'd to cut off the (r) scilicet and frivolous Explications of any who thought to address to himself, he did devolve the Matter wholly on the Judges; ordering them to exclude all that had been main Sticklers, either here, or there; or Libellers of him and his Government.

Having thus shown, that no Professions, either Sacred or Civil, were out of the reach of his Power, this best and wisest Statesman, that ever England had, took occasion to show, likewise, that neither Virtue, nor Service, nor unblemish'd Loyalty, could screen the Possessor from his Persecutions, or entitle him to the Benefit of the Laws of his Country.

The Dutch were privileged, by the late Treaty, to make Levies in Scotland: One Carstairs, who had been employ'd by them, in 1672, on a more (s) exceptionable Errand, was sent to Scotland, as their Agent in this Affair; and was, moreover, intrusted to make a Compliment from the Prince of Orange to the Duke of Hamilton. This was his whole Commission, as his Highness afterwards declar'd. But the Duke of Lauderdale chose to consider it in another Light; and made use of it to bring his Adversaries into Suspicion with his Majesty: As if therefore he fear'd that an Infurrection was design'd, he procur'd a (t) Letter from the King to the Privy Council, commanding them to issue an Order to Lieutenant General Drummond to enter himself a Prisoner in Dunbarton Castle, within Forty-eight Hours. This Gentleman had serv'd the King and his Father Thirty-five Years; and had a Reputation, which Scandal itself had never foil'd. The Letter specify'd no Crime, nor the Suspicion of any; nor any other Reason for such a Severity, but

Our Will and Pleasure; nor had any other Sanction, than the Counter-sign of Lauderdale; tho' it contain'd a Violation of an express Statute (see VI. p. 10. cap. XIII.) which provided, That no Person should be liable to such Letter or Order, unless warrant'd under the Hands and Seals of Four of the great Officers of State: Nor then, unless in Matters of manifest Treason, or of immediate Importance to the King's Person and Government, which would admit of no Delay. But arbitrary, illegal, causeless, and unjust as the Order was, the General obey'd it; and late in the next Year, by Petition to the King, made a shift to obtain his Discharge; not the least Shadow of a Treason appearing against him.

It is farther remarkable, that, while the Bishop of Dunblaine, and the Four Ministers, were persecuted for their Zeal to the Church, the Lord and Lady Cardross were favour'd before the Council for keeping a Presbyterian Chaplain, who, in the Absence of his Lordship, had preach'd and pray'd before his Lady: This was the Charge; and his Lordship defended himself, by invalidating the Credit of the Witnesses; which he did so effectually, that both the President of the Session, and the King's Advocate, as well as the Judges, thought themselves oblig'd to declare in his Favour; But Lord Halton, as Paramount, taking upon him to pronounce, That what they said was neither agreeable to Law nor Sense; and putting the Board in mind of the King's Letter, which required them to proceed severely in the Case; the Majority chose to follow their Leader, and the Delinquent was fin'd 1100*l.* Sterling, and sent Prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh.

Since his Grace of Lauderdale had held Scotland in Farm, the Magistrates of the City of Edinburgh had endeavor'd to purchase his Favour, by Gifts and Presents to himself, his Duchies, and his Brother the Lord Halton, to the Value of upwards of 11,500*l.* Sterling, besides a Pension of 200*l.* a Year, which they paid his Grace as Agent for the Borough at Court. No sooner had they held their Hands, but the said Lord Halton, who was Undertaker-General for his Grace, took occasion to threaten them with removing the several Courts of Judicature from thence to Stirling; in hopes of raising new Contributions. But the Project not answering, he resolv'd to gratify his Relentment, as well as his Avarice; and Power very rarely wants Opportunity for either.

From Circumstances, it may be presum'd, that, while large Sums were issued from the City

(p) The time prescrib'd by the Parliament was shipp'd upon. But to make a King, under his Hand and Signet, call the Hopes his Subjects had of his Justice and Clemency, and their Address to, his Person, a scilicet and frivolous Explication, is a thing never done by any Prince, since the last King of the last Race of France.

(q) To know in what Disposition the People were, promising Arms and other Necessaries, if they were in a Condition to give the Government any Disobedience.

(r) Who were employ'd to admit all such as sign'd Sir George's Petition; except as before excepted.

(s) On Occasion of these Expeditions, our Manuscript proceeds as follows: "Now if you consider this Letter, you will see what a Mountain a Minister, as well as a Man, he (Lauderdale) is, who prescrib'd it at first. You see how he makes the King break his Word, and that in favour of a Man, whom he hath so oft publicly declar'd the greatest Rascal and K— in Nature, and whose Petition did, in plain Terms, assert Arbitrary Power: And to have that Paper made the Form that all must sign, before they be suffer'd to plead, are Things which no Man in his Wit his adventur'd upon. But to make a King, under his Hand and Signet, call the Hopes his Subjects had of his Justice and Clemency, and their Address to, his Person, a scilicet and frivolous Explication, is a thing never done by any Prince, since the last King of the last Race of France."

(t) De Cæcis, et la Mort de France.

A.D. 1674. City to the King's Vicegerent, the Magistrates were his Creatures; and that, when these were outed, the Tribute was withheld: Hence the Government of the City became a Matter of Moment; and what one Party struggled to recover, the other struggled to keep.

According to the original Instrument which constituted Edinburgh a City, their annual Magistrates were to be elected the next Tuesday after Michaelmas. In the Year 1674, Michaelmas-day was on a Tuesday; and, possibly to disappoint some Practice on the Court-side, the City resolv'd to make their Election that Day, instead of the Tuesday after: Of this Design the Lord Haltoun got such early Intelligence, that he was ready with a Letter from the King to the Privy Council, to command them to forbid the Magistrates from proceeding to Election, till his Majesty's farther Pleasure was known. The Magistrates obey'd. The Elections were postpon'd for Eleven Months together: And, in this Interval, the City was first threaten'd with a Resumption of all their Privileges; and then, great Pains were taken to prove they had none to be depriv'd of. Lord Haltoun, in searching the Records, had discover'd, that the City had made a Surrender of their Charter about a hundred Years before, to procure a Pardon for a Rebellion: Upon this, the Magistrates were summon'd before him and his Cabal, as if they had been the Privy Council, and challeng'd to shew Cause, why they should not be disfranchis'd: They reply'd, that their Charter had been restor'd, and confirm'd at full by the Three last Kings: But nothing would satisfy his Lordship, but a Sight of the very Charter itself; which being produced, both the King's Advocate and some of the Judges, who were present, could not help declaring, That there was no Colour to call their Franchises in question.

To fill the Measure of the Year, when the Corporation of Royal or Free-Boroughs met in August (as by Law they are authoris'd to do, when and where they please; as also, to make what By-laws they found necessary or expedient) the Duke of Lauderdale induc'd his Majesty to require them, by his Letter, to revive an old Law amongst them, That none might be chosen by any Borough, to serve in Parliament or Convention of States, but those who were of the Corporation: The Design of which was, to hinder any of the secluded Advocates from being chosen Burgesses, against whom his Grace had some Reason to be incens'd, and of whom he had more to be afraid: But the Honour of the King's Letter did not so much flatter the Corporation, as the Prescription it contain'd disgust'd them: They reply'd, in very free Terms, to his Majesty, That it was neither for his Advantage, nor theirs, that there should be any Restraint on the Elections, or Freedom of Parliaments: And, what was worst of all, they add'd some Reflections on the Duke of Lauderdale. The Consequence was, that tho' this Answer contain'd nothing that was cognizable by the Laws, another Letter was procur'd from the King to the Privy Council, commanding them to commit Four of the principal of these Burgesses to Prison; as also to enquire strictly, who were the Contrivers of that obnoxious Paper: Upon this, an Inquisition was set up; Men of all Ranks were summon'd, and some from Places a Hundred Miles off: But, tho' such Numbers were examin'd upon Oath, nothing could be discover'd; and, in the Issue, the Three Prisoners (the Fourth having escap'd by Death) after a Confinement of between three and four Months, in the common Goal of Edinburgh, were brought before the Council; and, tho' nothing more had been prov'd against them, than against the others who had sign'd the Letter, they were heavily fin'd, and declar'd incapable of public Employments: So thoroughly had his Grace of Lauderdale forgot what he had asserted, in his Paper to the King against the Administration of his Predecessor the Earl of Middleton, That to incapacitate was to whip with Scorpions: That it was a Punishment which robb'd Men of their Honours, and laid a lasting Stain upon them and their Posterity.

Such was the Conduct of this best and wisest Statesman that England ever had, in his own Country, during the Year 1674; and such the Spirit which possess'd his Administration: And when we find him honour'd with the Garret, introduc'd into the (the) English House of Peers, pension'd with 3000*l.* per ann. and suffer'd to bear a very considerable, tho' not an absolute Sway in the Councils of England; how is it possible to forbear suspecting, that the same Prince who chose to govern by such violent Measures in one Kingdom, had a very strong Inclination to do the same in both?

But little hath as yet been said of the Lord Treasurer; it is now time to supply that Defect. He had been called to the Helm, when the Vessel was in a Storm; and thence his Enemies expected that this very Prefectment would have smother'd the way for his Ruin. The King had then his Dutch War upon his Hands; the establish'd Revenue bore no Proportion to the Expence of it. The Parliament had granted but one scanty Aid, not much above a third of which fell under his Lordship's Direction, and ever since the Exchequer was shut up, the Government had very justly lost all Credit with the People. These were the apparent Difficulties which he had to struggle with, besides the Envy which accompany'd his Prefectment, and besides the unavoidable Troubles which arose from the Strivings of the two Factions, as well as the natural Distrust and Malevolence which from a Sense of ill Usage, had seiz'd almost on the whole Nation.

But, however weighty the Charge, or delicate the Crisis, it cannot be deny'd, that he enter'd upon it with equal Courage and Ability: Fully sensible what great Demands he had

Measure of the Lord Treasurer Danby.

Memoirs of the Earl of Danby, p. 5.

A.D. 1674 had to answer, and what little Assistance he was to expect from the Parliament, his first Endeavours were to restore Credit, and establish Oeconomy. And it appears he succeeded in both; for he found Means to borrow Money at Eight per Cent. which till this time had been usually done at Ten; to raise the Form of the Excise from 530,000 l. to 550,000 l. a Year; The Hearth-Money from 145,000 l. to 162,000 l. a Year; and the Revenue of Ireland from 190,000 l. to 220,000 l. a Year.

On the Conclusion of the Peace with Holland, he had a Land-Army, and a numerous Fleet to discharge: And within the Space of fifteen Months he paid above fifteen hundred thousand Pounds towards those great Demands, with this peculiar Circumstance, to his Honour, That he paid the Seamen with Ready Money, which had never been done before but with Tickets, or Part Tickets, Part Money. Certain Reports having prevail'd in the Beginning of the Year 1674, that new Steps would be put on the Excise, Public Notice was given in the Gazette, by his Majesty's special Command, and, it may be reasonably presum'd, by his Lordship's Advice, That the said Reports were false and scandalous. At his Entrance into the Treasury, he found the Government in Arrear to the Tiths 92,000 l. to Tungier 43,000 l. in old Tickets, and to sick and wounded Men, 93,000 l. All which, several Sums, he gradually discharged. Of the Household-Debts he also discharged 70,000 l. And so effectually did he bestir himself in behalf of the (w) suffering Bankers, that on July the 23d, 1674, a Grant pass'd the Great Seal, of 1,200,000 l. for two Years Interest on their Debt; and by several other Grants of perpetual Interest between Christmas, 1676, and Lady Day, 1679, they were intitled to 378,473 l. more; both which several Sums they were duly paid.

Numb. 547.

Memirs of the Earl of Danby, p. 137.

These are Circumstances, which, no doubt, shew the Administration of this Lord in a very advantageous Light; and which demonstrate what, that if the King had not rush'd into such desperate Projects, his Revenue would have been more than equal to his Necessities. But even as a Treasurer, his Conduct was not spotless, as will be made apparent in its proper Place; and what his Conduct was as a Minister of State, we are now to explore.

His Lordship had once been active in the Opposition, had put in for his Share of the Merit of running down the Earl of Clarendon, and had been introduc'd to the (x) Council-board by his Interest in, and Subserviency to, the Cabal. Experience had taught him of what Consequence it was to a Minister, not to run counter to the known Inclinations of the People, especially with respect to Papery and a French Interest; and, at the same time, how impossible it was to hold a Prince's Favour, without making some Compliment to his Passions. Hence it may be presum'd, that he form'd a Plan to reconcile these jarring Principles, by making some Advances to the King, and some Concessions to the Subject. Probably, he found his Majesty more than half convinc'd, that neither the Government nor Religion of France, could, in his time at least, be naturaliz'd in England; and inclinable to compound for the Insistence of the Substance he held, by giving up the Shadow he gras'd at: Probably this Insistence was what the Earl undertook to procure; and certainly, Papery was to be the Premium or Consideration.

A.D. 1674

In February, 1674-5, an Order of Council was published in the Gazette, for putting the Laws in Force against Papish Recusants, Seculars also for the (y) Suppression of Conventicles, which was farther enforc'd by a Proclamation on the 27th. It is true, no Distinction was here made between Protestant Dissenters and Papists; tho' the Services of the first had so lately given rise to a Bill in their Favour: But Policy now dictated, not Justice. The Orthodox were the Bulk of the People; a Majority was the Court Point; and unless Rome and Genoa had been equally in Disgrace, unless Church and State had been thoroughly united, the Snare had given way and the Bird escap'd.

Numb. 602.

Another Part of his Lordship's Scheme was to couple Loyalty with Religion, and to spirit up the long-neglected Cavaliers against their ancient Adversaries, the Republican and Fanatics: They were invited to stand by the Court, and fed with Hopes and Promises that they should have a Monopoly of all Places and Preferment for their Reward. A magnificent Funeral for the late King was talk'd of, however unseasonably, and his Statue was erected, at his Lordship's Expence; according to Marcol, That the able Party might be rewarded in Effigy.

Gravel of Popery, 410. p. 63.

For his Personal Support against the French Interest, which he found himself oblig'd to declare against, and unable to subdue, he made

(x) Upon this Occasion the Articles for this Lord's Conduct, specify himself as follows: "For that which is worth of so great Honour to his Lordship, as it ought to be of Honour to the Authors of that Agreement, "That by the Lord's Care, a Satisfaction was given to many starving Oppress'd and Creditors, who had been put in that Condition by the Stop of the Exchange, to the Sum of 1,200,000 l. or thereabouts; and that he did at that time, when the Crown was not ready in Want, but when the Parliament had never contributed one Farthing towards it, whereas those People had been oppress'd and ruin'd by the Stop of the Exchange, and that he was the first in France, when the Exchange had been so much ruin'd with Supervacuous of Aid from Parliament, as it was depriv'd of necessary Supplies in this Lord's Time."

(y) As here, Mercurio, in Annals, R. Mansfield, Esq; the Miraculous of Forbes, the Earl of Essex, and the Villainous Palatine and Hollifax.

(z) According to the Account given by the Disfranchis of this Affair, "His Majesty call'd the Bishops up to London to give him Advice what was to be done for the securing of Religion, &c. and they after divers Consideration sent the Masters of some, advis'd him to recall his Licences, and put the Laws against the Nonconformists in Execution."—Again, "No sooner was the Proclamation publish'd, but special Informers were let to work to promote the Execution. Kramer, Vol. III. p. 331.

The Disfranchis likewise say, That in the Year, 1673, Mr. Baxter had drawn up Proposals for an Union, at the Instance of Lord Overs, who assur'd him, that the New Lord Treasurer (Dowry) Dr. Atterbury, Bishop of Windsor, and several other great Men were ready for it, in order for their joint vigorous Proceedings against Papery. The like Treaty was renew'd in 1675 by Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Hooker, but to no purpose. Dr. Tillotson in the issue writing Mr. Baxter word, That, as Circumstances stood, neither the Concurrence of the Bishops, nor the Concurrence of his Majesty, was to be expected. Ibid. p. 332.

A. D. 1673-5. made sure of the Prince of Orange, as we have already seen. The Conversion he had brought about at Court, drew all the Bishops into his Train. In adding strength to the Prerogative, he thought he made an Atonement to the Duke of discountenancing his Religion. There was a mutual Necessity that his Grace of Lauderdale and he, should be mutual Props to each other. And, as to the Parliament, to complete his (a) Precautions (of which his Concert with the Prince of Orange was not the least) he not only took care to enlarge his Interest among the Members by all possible Means, but resolv'd not to flickle for a Supply, till he knew his Footing, and had Reason to think he might set Opposition at Defiance.

We have here the Idea of a great Minister, endeavouring to raise a Colossus of Power, of as different Materials as the Image in David's Dream, Gold, Brass, Iron, and Clay: And if Policy, if Expedient, and all the Arts of governing by a Party, could have made his Greatness permanent, all were here assembled with the greatest Care, and all were dispos'd with the greatest Skill, in order to consolidate his System and make the whole of a Piece.

But there may be Contact without Union. All that he undertook for the Crown, could not reconcile the Duke to his Proceedings against Popery; and all his Proceedings against Popery could not reconcile the Lovers of Liberty to his Practices in favour of the Prerogative. Arbitrary Power, when forc'd in by Popery, did not appear half so dreadful to them, as when introduc'd by the establish'd Church. In the first Instance, Tyranny appear'd barefac'd, and both Clergy and Laity had equal Reason to be alarm'd at her Approach: But in the last, she presented herself in a Mask, Religion was her Harbinger, and disarm'd all Resistance, by teaching in the awful Name of God, that it deserv'd, and would incur, Damnation.

All the Preparatory Steps that the Earl had taken to insure his Success, had rais'd a suitable Expectation that some Design of great Moment was at Hand; and from the past Measures of the Court, it was both natural to fear, and reasonable to guard against the worst. Hence the Intriguers took Occasion to render his Abilities formidable, and his Services odious; and in Proportion as he made it appear that the King could subsist without the Bounty of Parliaments, the more dangerous he was held to his Country, and the more necessary it was thought to remove him.

There were yet other Circumstances which contributed to disconcert his Measures, and make his Administration both uneasy and unsuccessful. Tho' Lord Arlington was still in the King's Service, and had been so obnoxious himself, he made no Difficulty to join with the Opposition in persecuting a Minister that serv'd his Majesty too well; and fomented those Jealousies and Practices which center'd in a measure agreed upon among the most considerable of them. Not to give the King any Money, while the present Lord Treasurer continu'd. And tho' the Duke of York was the Treasurer's Friend against Lord Arlington, it was not because he lov'd and esteem'd the first, but because he despis'd and hated the last. With the King it must be understood, that he was his constant, and irreconcilable Enemy. For setting aside the Business of Religion, the Treasurer could not be more closely attach'd to the Prince of Orange, than the Duke to his most Christian Majesty; and as those were eternal Opposites, it must necessarily follow, that the Advices of their several Solicitors must be eternally opposite too.

The unfolding another Intrigue of the Year 1674, will set this Affair in the clearest Light imaginable.

It has been already hinted, that when the King was prevail'd on to make up with the Dutch, as the first Step towards making up with his own People, the Duke seem'd to think his Majesty now not to be dependant upon, that he himself was like to be deserted, and that it was advisable to seek a Support elsewhere.

From the Time of his Alliance with the Family of Madona, which was one of the Jobs of France, the most Christian King had made his Highness more than ordinary Professions, and he had shewn a more than ordinary Sense of them. To improve that good Disposition of the Duke, therefore, and possibly to be aveng'd on the King, in the most unsuspected, as well as the most effectual manner for quitting his Interest; a secret Correspondence was open'd between his most Christian Majesty and the Duke, thro' the Hands of Father Ferris first, and afterwards Father le Chaise, Confessors to his said Majesty, and Sir William Vbrognation, the Duke's Agent at Paris, and Mr. Coleman, Secretary to the (a) Duchess at London; of which the following remarkable and circumstantial Account is extant, in a Letter from his Royal Highness, to the said Father le Chaise:

"The second of June last past, his most Christian Majesty offered me most generously his Friendship, and the Use of his Purse to assist against the Designs of my Enemies and his, and protect'd unto me, that his Interest and mine were so clearly linked together, that those that oppos'd the one, should be look'd upon as Enemies to the other; and told me moreover, his Opinion of my Lord Arlington and

(a) An Intercourse of Compliments and Kindnesses was this Year licenc'd to pass between the Court and City. Sir Robert Fevers, the Lord Mayor, invited the King to be his Guest at Guildhall, on his Show Day. His Majesty came, and condescending to accept the Freedom of the City, the Copy of it in a large Gold Box, with the Seal in another, set with large Diamonds, was presented to him at the Banqueting House, December 13 following.

(a) This Gentleman is commonly suppos'd to have been the Duke's Secretary: And indeed he was so at first, but was dismiss'd, as a seeming Parliament, for his having circulated seditious Letters through the Kingdom, tho' without losing the Confidence of his Majesty; as is plain, from his being afterwards placed in the service of her Royal Highness.

A.D. 1674 and the Parliament, which is, That he is of Opinion, that neither the one nor the other is in his Interest, or mine. And thereupon he desires me to make such Propositions as I should think fit in this Conjunction.

All was transacted by the means of Father Ferriers, who made use of Sir William Thorngorton, who is an honest Man, and of Truth, who was then at Paris, and hath held Correspondence with Coleman, one of my Family, in whom I have great Confidence. I was much satisfy'd to see his most Christian Majesty altogether of my Opinion, so I made him answer the 29th of June, by the same means he had made use of to write to me, that is, by (b) Coleman, who address'd himself to Father Ferriers (by the forementioned Knight) and entirely agreed with his most Christian Majesty, as well to what had respect to the Union of our Interests, as the Unfruitfulness of my Lord Arlington and the Parliament, in order to the Service of the King my Brother and his most Christian Majesty; and that it was necessary to make use of our joint and unnot Credits to prevent the Success of those evil Designs, resolv'd on by the Lord Arlington and the Parliament, against his most Christian Majesty and myself, which of my Side, I promise really to perform, of which since that time, I have given reasonable good Proof.

Moreover, I have made some Proposals, which I thought necessary to bring to pass what we were oblig'd to undertake, assuring him that nothing could so firmly establish our Interest with the King my Brother, as that very same Offer of the Help of his Purse; by which means I had much reason to hope, I should be enabled to persuade to the dissolving of the Parliament, and to make void the Designs of my Lord Arlington, who works incessantly to advance the Interest of the Prince of Orange and the Hollanders, and to lessen that of the King your Master, notwithstanding all the Protestations he hath made to this Hour to render him Service.

But as that which was proposed was of a hand, by reason of the Sickness of Father Ferriers, so our Affairs succeeded not according to our Design, only Father Ferriers wrote to me the 15th of the last Month,

That he had communicated those Propositions to A. D. 1674 his most Christian Majesty, and that they had been very well liked of, but as they contain'd things that had regard to the Catholic Religion, and to the Offer and Use of his Purse, he gave me to understand he did not desire I should treat with Monsieur Ruvigny upon the first, but as to the last. And at the same time acquainted me, That Monsieur Ruvigny had Order to grant me whatever the Conjunction of our Affairs did require. And I have expected the Effects of it to this very Hour, but nothing hath been done in it. And, seeing on the other Hand, that my Lord Arlington and several others, endeavour'd by a thousand Deceits to break the good Intelligence, which is between the King my Brother, his most Christian Majesty and myself, to the End they might deceive us all Three, I have thought fit to advertise you of all that is past, and desire of you your Assistance and Friendship, to prevent the Rogueries of those who have no other Design than to betray the Concerns of France and England also; and who, for their pretended Service, are the Occasion they succeed not.

As to any thing more, I refer you to Sir William Thorngorton and Coleman, who I have commanded to give an Account of the whole State of our Affairs, and of the true Condition of England, with many others; and principally my Lord Arlington's Endeavours to represent it to you quite otherwise than it is.

The two first I mentioned to you, are firm to my Interest, so that you may treat with them without any Apprehension."

To this, Father le Chaise return'd an Answer by Sir William Thorngorton: Mr. Coleman had Orders to reply; and the most material Passages of his Letter are as follow:

"For the rest, his Royal Highness does a little wonder, that he hears nothing from Monsieur Ruvigny touching the second Point of your Letter, since you have written so positively, that he had Order to confirm, and procure Execution of, what his most Christian Majesty propos'd to him, the second of June last, by your Mediation, and you, by that of Sir William Thorngorton's. He (his Royal Highness) has omitted, till this time, to acquaint you with the small Success that

(4) The Letter here alluded to was as follows: "I am commanded to tell you, that his Royal Highness my Master is very sensible of the Friendship of his most Christian Majesty; which he will endeavour to cultivate very carefully, and to give him all possible Assurance of it, to take away all Jealousies that his Enemies would raise to the contrary."

That his Royal Highness has done nothing, in any Manner whatsoever, nor in any Place, against the Interest of his most Christian Majesty; but hath render'd him all the good Offices he hath been capable of.

That as for reconciling the Parliament, and soothing my Lord Arlington, his Highness is altogether of the Opinion of his Majesty, that neither one nor other is useful, but quite contrary, very dangerous, as well for England as France; and that his most Christian Majesty is in great danger of losing the Neutrality of England, at the next Session (if the Parliament meet) as he is in the Alliance, by the Peace of Holland, at the last; because the Lower-house, and their Friends, on the House of Lords, have a Design to lessen his Royal Highness, and next to the Catholic Religion; and they think they cannot make use of any other sure Means to attain their End, than to raise the Dutch, and to perplex his most Christian Majesty as much as lies in their Power.

That his Highness doubts not but it is absolutely necessary for the Interest of his most Christian Majesty, and his Royal Highness, to use all Endeavours to hinder the Meeting of the Parliament, by persuading his Britannic Majesty, that his Government, his Honour, and his Quiet, are no less concerned therein than theirs; so that if his most Christian Majesty would write freely his Thoughts thereupon to his Britannic Majesty, to forewarn him of the Danger he apprehends from thence, and would wishal think fit to make him the same generous Offers of his Purse, to persuade him to dissolve the present Parliament, as he hath done to his Highness for the Election of another, perhaps he would succeed therein, by the Assistance we would give him here.

As for another Parliament, it would be easy enough to get such an one as we wish for; the Constitutions of our Parliament being of such a Nature, that, as there is nothing to be hop'd for by the King from an old one, so there is nothing to be fear'd from a new one; because such an one, at their first Meeting, must needs assist his Majesty, so far as to enable him to acknowledge his Obligations, both to his most Christian Majesty, and to all the World, &c.

he has had, as expecting daily that Monsieur Ruvigny would impart to him the Commission, of which you made mention to him in your Letter; but having heard nothing yet of that Matter, and being oblig'd to go out of Town for fifteen Days or three Weeks, he thinks fit to send you back Sir William Tregownen, to acquaint you with the Progress of this Business, and to pray you to inform yourself of what has been able to hinder it.

His most Christian Majesty made a very generous Offer to his Royal Highness of the Assistance of his Purse, to enable him to defend them both from the Evils that threaten'd them; and by good luck his Royal Highness has labour'd with so much Diligence and Success, that the Dangers which they apprehended are a little put off: But one thing more is necessary, for the perfect securing their Affairs; and without making one Step more, all that he has already done will signify nothing. For that the Assistance of his most Christian Majesty is no less necessary at present than heretofore, to subdue entirely those, who, being exasperated against his most Christian Majesty as much as against his Royal Highness, only because he is to unalterably addicted to the Interest of his most Christian Majesty, will exercise their Malice and their Rage with more Brutality than ever, if they find occasion for it hereafter.

If you can therefore, by your Credit, obtain from his most Christian Majesty the Accomplishment of the Offer of his Purse, for raising the Reputation of his Royal Highness in the Opinion of his Britannic Majesty, and for putting him in Condition to resist the sharpest Batteries of the Adversaries of his most Christian Majesty and Royal Highness; to wit, the Possibility they pretend to get Money from the Parliament, and the Impossibility of having any elsewhere, by which they often keep the Mind of his Britannic Majesty in suspense, and wherein they place the Hope they have to conquer him at last.

There will nothing more remain to be fear'd by his most Christian Majesty, or his Royal Highness; but his Royal Highness will be able to dissolve the Parliament with Ease, and afterwards, in recompence of the said Assistance, will perform on his part all that his most Christian Majesty shall ask of him; and will proceed with Sincerity, upon the Word of a Prince (that no Man can reproach him with the Violation of) for the Interest of his most Christian Majesty.

Thus we live in their (c) Letters Demonstration, that, as it grew more and more apparent, the Treasurer had adopted the same Sentiments with Lord Arlington in regard to the Parliament and Prince of Orange, he must grow equally obnoxious to his Royal Highness; and that the Prorogation from the 22d of September to the 13th of April, was the Effect of Evangel Councils; it being well foreseen, that, if the Commons should endeavour to force the King into the War, another Year must necessarily elapse, before it could be prosecuted to any purpose.

From all the Evidence that has yet been brought to the Light, we may venture to pronounce this was the Issue of Things, when the Fourteenth Session was open'd; and as to the Outside, the King, in his Speech to the two Houses, was pleas'd to declare, That to know what they thought might be yet wanting to the Security of Religion and Property; to give himself the Satisfaction of having us'd his utmost Endeavours to settle a right and lasting Understanding between him and them; and to recommend the Condition of the Fleet to their Consideration, were the principal Ends of his calling them together. His Majesty likewise threw in by the way, That it was high time to be watchful in preventing the Contrivances of ill Men; of which this was not their least. To make it impracticable, by all means they could devise, any longer to continue the present Parliament: That he would never depart from the Protestant Religion as it was established in the Church of England: That the Session of the Year would not permit of a long Session: That he intended to meet them again in Winter: And that Temper and Moderation would be necessary to disappoint the Expectations of those, who could hope only by violent and irregular Motions, to prevent the bringing the Session to a happy Conclusion.

Plain as this Text was, the Lord Keeper was order'd to add his Comment; which was in copious, that it takes up no less than sixteen Folio Pages, every one of which is garnish'd with the Flowers of Rhetoric, and

King's Speech.

(c) In a third Letter of Mr. Colman to the Pope's Instructions, dated September 22 1674, he tells him, "That the Duke's principal Design is, to use the Pope's Interposition, and by that means to establish himself in the Possession of his Estate, thro' the Assistance of France and Spain; and to exert all their Care for the Ease of the Pope's Friends, and particularly for the Catholics of the Church, against their great Enemy; and shew him his will, that the Pope never had an Opinion so favourable as at this Hour, to enrich those of his Family, and to augment the Number of his Friends; and if he less it slip, he will never find his like. So that if ever they propose to make use of the Jurisdiction of the Church, it is now they ought to do it, for they can depend upon that the Duke will not be capable to do for the Pope's Friends."

In another Letter, of October 23 1674, Mr. Colman to the Intercession, begins thus, "You agree with me, that Money is the only Means of bringing the King into the Duke's Interest, and of detaching him from the Parliament; and you must also agree with me, that nothing can more promote the Interest of the Catholic Party, which is the principal Object of the Duke's Love and Affection, and of the Hatred of the Parliament, and which must hope or fear, according to the side of them he takes in Power."

And again in another, to Sir William Tregownen, the Duke of York August at Paris, by Letter, dated in February 1674, he tells him,

"You know well, that, when the Duke comes to be Master of our Affairs, the King of France will have Reason to give us his best will, that we may have the Benefit of it, mounting to the Mind of the Duke, the Interest of the King of England, and the King of France, and his own, are to close bound up together, that it is impossible to separate the one from the other, without Ruin to all three; but, being join'd, they stand, notwithstanding all Opposition, become inviolable."

Mr. North, in his Essays, p. 135, 136, 136B, to consider the Duke's Interposition, as the Effect of Colman's Vanity and Folly only, without any Authority from the Duke's Malice: Some of his Expressions are, "All that Colman can do, and to lay hold on him (and his) Money, and to lay hold on his Word, that, as it were, from his Pen, a Drop of more Court Holy-Water." And again, "The Vanity of pumping for Money thro' a Passer not to be digested."

withal, to void of Matter, as scarce to afford Presence or Excuse for an Extract.

The Commons, for their Entrance on Business, voted their humble and hearty Thanks to his Majesty for his gracious Promises and Assurances contain'd in his Speech: (Marvell indeed affirms, that they were very difficultly brought to it.) And then, as if resolv'd to take the King at his Word, to obtain a further Security for Religion, propos'd a very severe Bill for the Detention and Prosecution of Popish Priests: They likewise prepar'd another (d) Bill to make it Treason to levy Money without, or longer than the Time prescribed by; Authority of Parliament: A Third, to vacate the Seats of such Members as accept'd of beneficial Offices: A Fourth, prescribing a new Test against Popery, to be taken by both Houses, on the Penalty of Incapacity. They moreover reviv'd the Hobbes-Corpus Bill, and that to prevent the sending Men Prisoners beyond Sea.

Almost every Transaction of the Session partook of the same uncourteous Bias. Having vot'd pro-pace, for building of Ships, they proceeded to appropriate the ancient Tonnage and Poundage to the Use of the Navy: They also presented an (e) Address, to prevent any further Anticipation or Charge upon the Customs of England or Ireland; declaring it to be a Disservice to the King and Kingdom: And, to shut the Door on all Projects from the ministerial Quarter, after they had gone thus far, they resolv'd to proceed to no more Bills, before the Receipt.

To make Repetals on the French Party for having, to long postpon'd the Session, they address'd his Majesty to recall his Forces out of the French Service: And his Majesty replying, That he could not do it, without Derogation to his Honour and Dignity, and Prejudice to the Peace he then enjoy'd, and resolv'd to maintain; and offering to compound the Matter, by renewing the Proclamation to prohibit the going over of any more, they took the same Matter again into Consideration, and follow'd it with another Address, in which they remonstrated, that considerable Numbers of his Majesty's Subjects, both before and since their late Application, had been, and daily were, transported out of several Parts of these Kingdoms, to recruit the standing Body in the Service of the most Christian King; which had contributed greatly to the Success and Reputation of his Arms, &c.

It is worthy Notice, that no Debates during this rough Session, were carry'd on with more Heat and Bitterness on both Sides, than those which arose on this Subject. One Day in particular, Marvell tells us, upon a Dispute of telling the Numbers upon a Division, both Parties grew so hot, that all Order was lost: The Members ran in Confusion up to the Table, grievously affronted one by the other; every Man's Hand upon his Hilt, and all ready to decide the Question by the Sword. But when the Tumult was loudest, the Speaker had the Honour to restore the Peace by maintaining the Dignity of the Chair, after that of the House was gone, and obliging every Man to stand up in his Place, and engage his Honour, not to relent any thing of that Days Proceedings.

From obnoxious Things proceeding to obnoxious Persons, the House resolv'd once more to give Vent to their Indignation against that good and wise Statesman the Duke of Lindsdale; and knowing he had broke with (f) Dr. Burnet, who was suppos'd to be deep in his Secrets, they order'd that Divine to attend the House; and having conquer'd his Scriptures, prevail'd with him, to confess, that he heard his Grace wish to God, That the Presbyterians of Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the Irish Papists to cut their Throats: And that in a Conversation with him in the Duke's own Lodging at Whitehall, the first Saturday in September, 1673, the following remarkable Dialogue had pass'd between him and his Grace:

Duke. If the King should need an Army from Scotland, to tame those in England, might the Scots be depended on?

Declar. Certainly not. The Commons in the Southern Parts are all Presbyterians. The Nobility, thought they had been ill used, were generally discontented, and only waited for an Occasion to shew it.

Duke. I am of another Mind. The Hope of the Spoil of England will bring them all in.

Declar. The King is ruin'd if he trusts to that; for even indifferent Persons, who might otherwise have been ready enough to push their Fortunes, without any anxious Enquiries into the Grounds they went on, will not now trust the King, since he has so lately said; He would stick to his Declaration, and yet has so soon given it up.

Duke. Hinc illa Lacryma.—The King was forsaken in that Matter, and none stuck to him but Lord Clifford and myself.

Upon this and other Informations, they writ upon his Majesty with an Address, in the Preamble of which, after a personal Compliment to his Majesty, they proceeded to say, "That, upon a serious Examination of the State of the Kingdom, they found, that a great Jealousy was arisen, from some late Proceedings, in the Hearts of his Subjects, that some Persons in great Employments had fomented Designs contrary to the Interest of his Majesty and People; intending to deprive them of their ancient Rights and Liberties, whereby they might the more easily introduce the Popish Religion and an arbitrary Form of Government, to the Ruin and Destruction of the whole Kingdom."

They then nam'd the Duke of Lindsdale

Proceedings against the Duke of Lindsdale.

A. D. 1675. dile as a Promoter of such Designs; and as a Proof, quoted the Testimony of several of their own Members, who, attending the Case of Mr. Peniston Whaley, before the Council, who had committed Mr. John James contrary to his Majesty's Declaration of Indulgence, had heard the said Duke publicly affirm, in the Presence of the King, That his Majesty's Edicts ought to be obey'd, for his Majesty's Edicts were equal with Lawes, and ought to be obey'd in the first Place; thereby, said they, justifying the said Declaration, and the Proceedings thereon, and declaring his Inclination to arbitrary Councils, in Terror of your Majesty's good Subjects.

They further refer'd, to the two Scottish Acts for settling a Militia of 20000 Foot and 2000 Horse to be ready to march into any Part of this Kingdom, for any Service, &c. adding, "By Colour of which general Words, we conceive this Kingdom may be liable to be invaded, under any Pretence whatsoever: And this has been done, as we conceive, principally by the Procurement of the said Duke; he having, all the time of these Transactions, been principal Secretary of State of that Kingdom, and chiefly entrusted with the Administration of Affairs of State there; and himself Commissioner for holding the Parliament, at the time of passing the letter of the said Acts; whereby the providing of the said Horse and Foot, is effectually impos'd upon the said Kingdom. And we conceive we have just Reason to apprehend the ill Consequences of so great and useful a Power, especially, while the Affairs of that Kingdom are manag'd by the said Duke, who hath manifested himself a Person of such pernicious Principles."

The Conclusion of all was, That for the Ease of the Heurs of his People, they, with all Humility, implor'd his Majesty to remove the said Duke from all his Employments, and from his Majesty's Presence and Councils for ever.

That there was a very close Connection between the discontented Parties of both Kingdoms, is very manifest from this Address; but that it was, nevertheless, founded on very sufficient Reasons, can scarce be deny'd. At Court, however, it met with no better Reception than the former Address; for, after a full (5) Fortnight's Consideration, his Majesty, without any Attempt to take the Duke from the pernicious Principles the Duke charg'd with, or Disavowal of the arbitrary Design he was accus'd of promoting, coldly answer'd, That the first of the Acts complain'd of, was in the Year 1665, which was long before the Duke of Leinsterdale was his Commissioner in that Kingdom; and the letter was in pursuance of the former: And as to the Words, by the Time of Mr. Whaley's Case, his Majesty perceiv'd that, if they had been spoken, they were spoken before the last Act of general Pardon; which was not to be violated, that the Subject might not have Cause to fear, that the great Act of Oblivion and Indemnity would be violated too.

In the most temperate Times such an Answer would scarce have prov'd satisfactory to such a Charge; but now it rais'd the Resentment of the House higher than ever, and brought Address upon Address, which were all alike ineffectual.

It was the Lord Treasurer's Turn next. A Charge of high Crimes and Misdemeanours was brought against him, which was branch'd into (6) Seven Articles: But, whether they were held trivialous, or malicious, whether sufficient Proof was wanting to make them good, or whether he had more Friends in the House than his Royal Master, on examining the Foundation, the whole building fell to the Ground. It must be own'd our Lights fall us in this Matter. Bishop Burnet contents himself with saying, The Majority were for him. Marvel is express, That he got off by high bribing. Nothing is easier to be said: Nothing is harder to be prov'd.

That Particular, however, in the Charge which related to his Lordship's endeavouring to lay aside the Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, receives not a little Countenance from the following Passage in a Pamphlet, call'd, An Examination of the Earl of Danby's Case.

A whole Branch of the King's Revenue, and no less than the Excise, was endeavour'd Proceedings against the Lord Treasurer.

Epi. Mar. p. 47.

(1) The Address was reported and agreed to April 25 and the Answer was not given till May the 7th.

(2) That the Earl had overturned the ancient Court and Administration of the Exchequer, by preventing the Method of Accounts in Payments and Receipts, contrary to Law; whereby the King's Revenue is put into Confusion, and a wretched Way of Expence, to the Destruction of his Credit, and sending his Treasury to private Bargains and Contrivances. And had usurp'd to himself the Power of disposing all the King's Revenues, having made the Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, whereby all Checks and Controls are destroy'd. III. That a Bill of Law was introduced about the Marriage of the Daughter of Sir Thomas Hyde, the said Bill was d. one Mr. Bransby, a principal Witness in the Cause, to be annul'd by an extraordinary Warrant from one of the Secretaries of State, and to be kept for some time in close Custody; during which the Earl's Agents borrow'd with Mr. Bransby, by Threats and Promises, not to disclose the Truth; and by this means he was brought and detain'd before the King, in the Presence of the Earl, whereas Mr. Bransby was induc'd to deliver in a Testimony against his own Knowledge and Confidence, he having then in his Hand: And all this was done with an Intent to procure the said Heurs to be marry'd to the Earl's second Son. IIII. That the Earl had receiv'd very great Sums of Money, besides the extraordinary Revenue, which had been unlawfully given; and the greater Sums than ever allow'd for secret Service, without Account; the King's Debt remaining unpaid, the House impeach'd, and the Navy supply'd with 110,000 l. The Earl had received the Rights and Properties of the People, by Force, without Authority, whole legal Payments due in the Exchequer. V. That the Office of a Lord Treasurer is always very full of security and great Employment; yet the Earl had also assum'd to himself the Management of the Exchequer, which before was always dispos'd by the Secretary, and he had assum'd a thereby enabling himself the better to receive great Sums of Money out of the King's Revenue to his own private Advantage. VI. That the Earl had procured great Grants from the Crown, which under great Debt; by Warrants counterfeited by himself. VII. That, on December 4, 1674, at the hearing of a Cause in the Treasury-Chamber, some Acts of Parliament, now in being, were arg'd against a Proclamation, and contrary to what his Lordship had arg'd, whereupon the Earl, in contempt of the Law, oppos'd this arbitrary Expulsion. That a new Parliament is bring'd in on the 10th. Upon his Lordship's Respon'd to the Privy-Council, the Petition in question being a Proclamation, and not obeying such Proclamation, but perverting the Right at Law, was deny'd the Kingdom.

A. D. 1675. endeavoured to be brought under the sole disposing of this Lord, out of all due Course of Common-Law (for to the Method of the Exchequer is taken to be) by a particular Patent under the Broad-Seal; wherein an Office of a general Cashier was erected, and one Mr. Kent put in; which Project, the Patent says, was seriously examin'd by the Lord Treasurer, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, &c.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was then Sir John Duncomb, who utterly renounced the Knowledge of it, and thought it a Patent of a most dangerous Consequence: Besides, in the same Patent, when it comes to the Disposition of the Money, it leaves out the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and says, it shall be paid into the Exchequer; or in such other Manner as the Lord Treasurer shall think fit. These are the very Words; and 'tis probable, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had approv'd this, and some other things, he had not been remov'd from an Employment, which he perform'd with so much Uprightness.

This Patent was question'd in Parliament; and being of so infamous a Nature, and a Question accordingly form'd, That this Patent is illegal, and of dangerous Consequence, this Lord found such open Friends (perhaps by secret Service) that though they granted themselves it was an ill Patent, yet, for fear it should be Part of the Charge made good against this Lord, and not being yet so hardy as to give their Negatives, found out an Invention to avoid the sure Blow, by the Orders of the House, which give a Freedom for any to move for the adding, or taking away, any Words to the stated Question: Upon which Privilege, they mov'd, and seconded one another, with private Zeal, in this public Cause, to leave these Words out of the Question, viz. illegal, and of dangerous Consequence; which they carry'd in the Affirmative: And then the Question only remain'd, This Patent is—

'Tis easy by this to judge, what Power an ambitious Man may arrive at, and what Jealousies Excess of Power in a Subject may justly give; since it could thus operate on the major Part of a House of Commons to leave such an incomparable Question upon their Books.

This Pamphlet was written in answer to another before-quoted, called, An impartial State of the Case of the Earl of Danby: And it is remarkable enough, that, tho' his Lordship consented to publish a (i) Reply, to which he prefix'd his Name, he slides over this Circumstance, without the least Notice.

While the Commons were employ'd as hath been said, the grand Push was made in the House of Lords, to disarm Disaffection and Republicanism, according to the Royalists; or, according to the Patriots, to extinguish the last Spark of English Liberty.

The Expedient which was to facilitate this mighty Event, and which was the joint Product of all the Subtlety that the Schools, the Bar, or the Court, could furnish, was contain'd in the following Oath:

"I A.B. do declare, That it is not lawful, upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take up Arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous Position, of taking up Arms, by his Authority, against his Person, or against those that are commission'd by him, in pursuance of such Commission: And I do swear, that I will not, at any time, endeavour the Alteration of the Government, either in Church or State. So help me God."

The Person who had the Honour of being the first Mover for the Court, upon this great Occasion, was the Earl of (k) Lindsey, Lord Great Chamberlain. One Party, who had for their Mouth the Lord Keeper, call'd it a moderate Security to the Church and Crown. The other declar'd, That no Conveyance could Marvel's Person of ever, in more compendious or binding Terms, Pajers, 410. have drawn a Disfranchisement of the whole Birth-right of England. p. 59.

The Penalty which the Peers became liable to, on refusing this Oath, being Incapacity to sit and vote in their own House, the first Stage of Opposition to it arose from the peculiar Rights of the Peerage; and all Objections on that Head being over-ruled by the major Vote, Twenty-four Lords enter'd their Protest; in which they gave it as their Opinion, that the Privilege they had of sitting and voting in Parliament was an Honour they had by Birth, and a Right to inherent in them, and inseparable from them, as that nothing could take it away, but what, by the Law of the Land, must, withal, take away their Lives, and corrupt their Blood.

After five Days Debate, the Bill was committed; but not without another Protest; in which it was urg'd, that the Bill struck at the very Root of Government, since it took away all Freedom of Votes and Debates: For he that swore never to alter, parted with all his legislative Power at once, and became perjurd by endeavouring to amend.

The Majority were so incensed at this second Protest, that some Thoughts were entertain'd of sending the Twelve Peers who sign'd it to the Tower: But the Lord Helles desiring Leave of the House to add his Name to it, that he might have the Honour to suffer with them, they did not think proper to carry their Resentment so far, but contented themselves with voting, That the Reasons given in the said Protest did reflect upon the Honour of the House, and were of dangerous

The former non-resisting Oath brought into the House of Lords.

(i) Sir Robert Howard, Auditor of the Exchequer, and who had been Secretary to this very Lord Treasurer, took up the Cause next against his Lordship; who not only defended himself with equal Temper and Ability, but has, fairly and ingeniously, oblig'd the Public with the whole Controversy, in a small Octavo Volume; as if conscious, that he had nothing to fear from Posterity.

(k) An Attempt was made in 1669, to impose this Oath upon the Nation; and it miscarry'd only by Three Voices; which were those of this very Earl of Lindsey, then of the House of Commons, his Brother, and the Lord Treasurer Danby, then Sir Thomas Osborn.

A. D. 1679. dangerous Consequence: Which Vote was also protested against by Twenty-one of their Lordships, as a great Discourtenancing of the very Liberty of Protesting.

To take off the Edge of so fierce an Opposition, the Penalty of forfeiting their Seats in Parliament, by refusing the Oath, was taken off by Order of the House; and, by another Order, a Proviso was added, to secure the Freedom of parliamentary Proceedings: But the House still persisting to subject every Member to the first Enacting-Clause of the Bill, whereby an Oath was to be impos'd on them, as Members of either House, and at the same time refusing to admit of a Proviso inserted in a late Act for preventing Dangers that might happen from Popish Recusants, whereby the Privilege of every Peer, and all their Privileges, would be as fully secur'd from this Act, as the other; a fourth Protestation was enter'd, which was sign'd by sixteen Peers, who thought their latter Proceedings of the House inconsistent with their two former Orders.

During the Course of the Debate on the Privileges of Parliament, the Earl of Belinbrooke observing, that, tho' the Proviso left the Business within-doors free, the Oath took away all private Conversation without, on Matters of State, even with one another; the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, and the Duke of Louisdale, told the Committee, in plain Terms, That they intended to prevent Caballing, and Conspiracies against the Government; and they knew no Reason why any of the King's Officers should consult with Parliament-Men, about Parliament-Business; and particularly mention'd those of the Army, Treasury, and Navy: And when the Marquis of Winchester propos'd an additional Oath, That every Man should swear to vote according to his Opinion and Conscience, independent of Threats or Promises, Rewards or Expectations, the Lord Keeper made no scruple to declare, in a very fine Speech, that it was an useless Oath; for all Gifts, Places, and Offices, were likeliest to come from the King: And no Member of Parliament, in either House, could do too much for the King, or be too much on his side: And that Men might, lawfully and worthily, have in their Prospect such Offices and Benefits from him.

Proceeding to those extravagant Words in the Oath, or against those commission'd by him, the House fell into yet greater Heats; the opposing Lords making no difficulty to declare, That if whatever is by the King's Commission be not oppos'd by the King's Authority, then a standing Army is Law, whenever the King pleases. This was illustrated in the following free Manner; If, in suit with a great Favourite, a Man recovers House and Land, and, by course of Law, be put into possession by the Sheriff, and afterwards a Warrant is obtain'd, by the Interest of the Person, to command some Soldiers of the standing Army to take the Possession, and deliver it back; in such case, the Man in possession may justify the defending himself, and killing those who shall violently endeavour to enter the House; yet the Party whose House is invaded takes up Arms, the King's Authority against those who are commission'd by him: And it is the same Case, if the Soldiers had been commission'd to defend the House against the Sheriff, when he first endeavour'd to take the Possession according to Law; neither could any Order or Commission of the King put a stop to the Sheriff, if he had done his Duty, in raising the whole Force of that County to put the Law in execution; neither can the Court, from whom that Order proceeds, (if they observe their Oath and Duty) put any stop to the Execution of the Law in such a Case, by any Command or Commission from the King whatsoever; nay, all the (1) Guards and Standing-forces in England cannot be secur'd by any Commission from being a direct Riot, and unlawful Assembly, unless in time of open War and Rebellion. And it is not out of the way to suppose, that if any King hereafter, contrary to the Petition of Right, demand and levy Money by Privy Seal, or otherwise, and cause Soldiers to enter and distrain for such-like illegal Taxes, that, in such a Case, any Man may by Law defend his House against them; and yet this is of the same Nature with the former, and against the Words of the Declaration. And these being called remote Instances by the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Saltbury reply'd, That they would not hereafter prove so, when this Declaration had made the Practice of them justifiable.

The next thing in course was the Oath itself: Against which the following Objection lay in plain and so strong, at the very Entrance, viz. That there was no Care taken of the Doctrine, but only of the Discipline, of the Church; or, in other Words, of its Power and Dominion. No Papist would scruple to take an Oath for the Maintenance of Episcopacy: And tho', by the Re-establishment of the Popish Religion, the King would lose his Supremacy, the Bishops would be secure of their Mitres, and all the Trappings of Wealth and Power they were enrich'd and adorn'd with. This Consideration, which was urg'd in its full Force, compell'd the Advocates for the Oath to give it a new Bias: And accordingly, the next Day, it was introduced again in these Words: I do swear, that I will not endeavour to alter the Protestant Religion, or the Government of either Church or State. By this the Ministers, and their Godfathers the Bishops, thought they had sav'd all; and now began to call their Oath a Security for the Protestant Religion, and the only good Preservative against Papery, in case the Throne should be fill'd by a Popish Prince: In which their Confidence was not a little wonder'd at, since it was notorious, that till now they had no such Point in view; that they had been sham'd into this Addition, by the Debates of the preceding Day;

(1) An Army had, as yet, received no Sanction from the Legislature.

A. D. 1675; Day; and that some of the Bishops had made their Court to some of the (m) Catholic Lords by saying, That Care had been taken it might be such an Oath as might not bear upon them.

When the Clause relating to the Church came under Deliberation, it was observ'd, That it was not agreeable to the King's Crown and Dignity to have his Subjects sworn to the Government of the Church equally as to himself: That it was necessary to understand thoroughly what this ecclesiastical System was, which the Subject was to swear Allegiance to: And the Bishops alledging, That the Præbend, and its Powers, were derived from Christ, but the Licence to exercise those Powers from the civil Magistrate, it was reply'd, That it was a dangerous thing to secure, by Oath or Act of Parliament, those in the Exercise of an Authority and Power in the King's Country, and over his Subjects, which being receiv'd, as they urg'd, from Christ himself, could not be alter'd nor limited by the King's Laws: That this was directly to set the Mitre above the Crown: And that this Oath was the greatest Attempt that had been made against the King's Supremacy since the Restoration.

And as to swearing not to make any Alterations in the State, it was said, That such an Oath overthrow'd all Parliaments, and left them capable of nothing but giving Money: For the very Business of Parliaments was Alterations, either by adding or taking away some Part of the executive Power in Church or State. Besides, it was well ask'd, What kind of Government must that be, which Men must swear not to endeavour to alter, upon any Alteration of Times, Emergency of Affairs, nor Variations of human Things whatever? Would it not be requisite, that such a Government should be communicated by God himself, visibly appearing, or denouncing his immediate Presence, by an Execution of all the Wonders of Omnipotence?

The Penalty of the Bill was consider'd in the last Place; and was made different, according to the different Qualifications of the Persons: All that were, or should be, Privy-Counsellors, Justices of the Peace, or Possessors of any beneficial Office, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, were to take the Oath, when summon'd, upon pain of forfeiting 500 l. and being made incapable of bearing Office: And though the Members of either House were not subject to Incapacity, they were to the 500 l. Penalty: Nay, it was mov'd, that those who did not come up and sit as Members should be oblig'd to take the Oath, or liable to the Penalty till they did so: And it was at last carry'd, that every (sitting) Member should either swear, or pay 500 l. every Parliament: The opposing Lords however took up several Hours in shewing

the many Hardships of this Clause; especially as it affected all the Members of the House of Commons, and all the acting Justices in England; the first of whom had it not in their Power to be unchosen; nor the last, to be left out of the Commission, before the Act came in force (which was to have been the first of September following) and both thereby became subject to an Imposition that neither of them thought of, when they undertook their respective Services: They likewise remonstrated, that the Lords themselves were subjected by it to the meanest Condition of Mankind, if they could not enjoy their Birthright, without being enforced to swear to every Fancy of the present Times, which appear'd to be the most variable in our Story; since, but Three Years before this, all was Liberty and Indulgence; and now nothing would serve but rigid Conformity. To all this no Reply was made, nor attempted to be made: Numbers were made to sanctify what Reason could not be made to countenance; and, on putting the Question, it appear'd, that Magna Charta itself was of no force against a Majority.

Thus, after sixteen or seventeen Days Debates, it appear'd, that it was not the Fault of Minister or Bishop, that the People of England were not declar'd into a new Government, more absolute and arbitrary than the Oath of Allegiance, or the old Law, knew; and then sworn to obey, what they had been compell'd to set up. In Contracts where both Parties are to be Gainers, there is no fear of Nonperformance of either Side: The King admitted the Bishops to share with him in the Allegiance of his People; and the Bishops, by way of Consideration, gave them up to the Will and Pleasure of the King.

Nothing can be urg'd in excuse of a Scheme, at once so treacherous and so wicked as this, but the Apprehensions of the Court, that the opposite Faction were forming Designs upon the Constitution, as ruinous in the opposite Extreme: But these were at that time, Apprehensions only; at least, nor one Fact had been prov'd to justify them: And if the Case had been otherwise, Why should the Iniquities of the Fathers be visited on their Children? Why should a whole Nation be enslav'd, because a few Malignants turn'd the Public for their own private Advantage?

The Laws in being were very sufficient to guard the Crown against any Violence from the People, as long as they were suffer'd to operate equally between the People and the Crown; but they would not authorize Oppression, which was the Thing in pursuit: Now it is only in case of Oppression, when Law itself is set aside, that the Right of Resistance has been contended for, as the last Refort of a free People: And we shall find in the Course of this History, even the very Bishops

(m) These Lords in a Body join'd the Opposition on this Question; which, according to Mr. North, they were inclin'd to do by the Earl of Shaftsbury's smiling in their Ears (the Expression of that very singular Writer) "That the 'Till tend to deprive Peers of their Right of sitting and

" voting in the House of Lords; which was a Right so " heretofore, and radically inherent in the Peerage, as was " not to be trampled on any account whatsoever; y<sup>e</sup> that, " if this Act passed, the next would be to turn them out of " the House."

Bishops themselves refusing to express their Abhorrence of an open Invasion, when they found their own Possessions in danger. Fundamentals ought to be held sacred on both Sides: But if a Government sets aside the Laws, the Governed may do the same: Let the Subject, however, always remember, that if he draws his Sword, under whatever Provocations, even at a time of day when the Doctrine of Passive Obedience has been ever so long and so effectually exploded, by Deeds as well as Words, it must be at his own Peril; and that he will find the great Statute of Treasons has more Power to condemn, than Magna Charta to absolve him.

To return: We left the Court-Party in possession of their (n) darling Test, tho' somewhat purg'd by the fiery Trial it had undergone: for now it was conceiv'd as follows:

I A. B. do declare, that it is not lawful, on any Pretence whatsoever, to take up Arms against the King: And I do abhor the traitorous Position of taking Arms by his Authority against his Person, or against those that are commission'd by him, according to Law, in Time of Rebellion and War, and acting in pursuance of such Commission. I A. B. do swear, that I will not endeavour any Alteration of the Protestant Religion, now established by Law in the Church of England; nor will I endeavour any Alteration in the Government in Church or State, as it is by Law established.

Nothing therefore remain'd, but to send it down to the Commons, and to prepare it a favourable Reception, and speedy Passage.

According to the seeming Temper of that House, the Business before them, and their manifest Distrust of the Court, this appear'd to be no easy Task; and it might be rather presum'd, that they would have rejected it at the first Reading, than inclin'd to strengthen such a King and such a Ministry, with such a Law. But, according to Sir John Reresby, who took his (o) Seat as a Member this Session, the two Parties were so equal, that neither durst stand the Issue of a Question; We have Evidence left us, that they had their Relentings in the Case of the Lord Treasurer: And in any Affair where the Church was concern'd, there was great Reason to fear they would make no Difficulty to abandon the People.

It is therefore reasonable to conclude, that Lord Shaftsbury, and those who were deeper in the Secrets of the Opposition, thought it more advisable to prevent its finding its Way into that House, than to run the risque of its passing thro'.

However this may be, while the Ferment occasion'd by the Test, was the most violent in the House of Lords, one Dr. Shirley prefers a Petition of Appeal against Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House of Commons: The Lords receive it, and summon Sir John Fagg to make his Appearance before them. Sir John informs the House of Commons, who espouse his Cause; make it a Matter of Privilege; send a Caution to the Lords on that Head; and order Dr. Shirley to be sent for in Custody. The Lords, on the other hand, declare, That no Privilege lies against Appeals. Conferences are demanded, and granted: Reasons are interchang'd; without effect: Four Lawyers are committed to the Tower by the Commons for pleading before the Lords, in Breach of an Order of the House of Commons. The Lords charge the Commons with a transcendent Invasion of Magna Charta by that Commitment. Command the Lieutenant of the Tower to set the said Lawyers free. He refuses. The Lords address the King to remove him for the Contempt; His Majesty replies, That he is not satisfy'd how it can be done with Justice, but summons both Houses to Whitehall, and makes them a Speech; hopes they were well convinc'd, that the Intent of all these Contrivances was only to procure a Dissolution; declares, he looked upon it as a most malicious Design of those who were Enemies to him and the Church: Makes no Doubt, but that if the (p) Contrivers were known, the Dislike of their Practices would soon bring the Houses to a good Understanding: Advises the Use of free Conferences, as the best Means to procure a Composure; and declares, That while they were in debate about their Privileges, he would not suffer his own to be invaded. The Commons thank the King for the (q) gracious Expressions in his Speech; but resolve, That

(n) After the Session broke up, a Pamphlet, intitled, A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend in the Country, was published by Mr. Locke, giving a large Account of this remarkable Transaction; and, by way of Answer to it, a Thing, call'd, A Packet of Advices and Animadversions, sent from London to the Marquis of Shaftsbury.

(o) Andrew Marvell, in his Greatness of Poetry, speaking of this remarkable Contest, says, "It was perhaps the greatest, which had perhaps ever been in Parliament; wherein those Lords that were against this Oath, being assur'd of their own Loyalty and Merit, stood up now for the English Liberties, with the same Genius, Virtue, and Courage, that their noble Ancestors had formerly defended the Great Charter of England; but with so much greater Commendation, in that they had here a fiercer Field, and the more civil Way of Decision; They fought it out, notwithstanding all the Disadvantages imaginable; They were overrid by Numbers: The Noise of the House, like the Wind, was against them; and, if not the Sea, the Firmness (the King generally stood there) was always in their Faces: Nor, being so few, could they, as their Adversaries, withdraw so retreat themselves in a whole Day's Engagement: Yet never was there a clearer Demonstration, how dull a thing it is human Eloquence, and Greatness how little, when the bright Truth discovers all things in their proper Colours and Dimension, and, shining, shoots its Beams through all their Fallacies."

(p) On the Country Interest, it may be presum'd; for he gives us no understanding, that he was introduced by the Lords Ruff and Capowale.

(q) Bishop Burnet affirms, Vol. I. p. 387. That Lord Shaftsbury acknowledg'd himself to be the Contriver; but that others assur'd him, the thing happened of Course. Marvell acknowledg'd very candidly the Lords Supremacy in Point of Judicature; gives it as his Opinion, that the Commons did not embark in earnest in that Affair, but that some crafty Members blew the Coals to prevent the Test coming among them.

(r) 'Tis necessary the Reader should know, that when Thanks were mov'd for in the House of Lords for the King's first Speech, at the opening of the session, the opposing Lords were for limiting the Vote to these very Words; and being detest'd, enter'd their Protest with this Remark, That they thought this manner of Proceeding not so suitable to the Liberty of Debate necessary in this House.

A. D. 1675. That it doth not appear to this House, that any Member thereof hath either embroider'd or promoted the Differences between the two Houses of Parliament; or in asserting the Rights of the Commons of England, and the Privileges of this House, hath done any thing inconsistent with his Duty, or the Trust reposed in him: Resolve, namque contradicunt, that if any Person shall be aiding or assisting in the Execution of any Sentence of the Lords upon the Appeal brought by Doctor Sturley against Sir Jean Faux, he shall be adjudg'd and taken to be a Betrayer of the Rights and Liberties of the Commons of England: Order their Votes to be made public, by setting them up in the Lobby of the House and Westminster Hall: Resolve, ven. con. that no Person committed by Order of the House, ought to be discharge'd during the Session, except by the like Order: Resolve that the Lieutenant of the Tower hath done his Duty in receiving and detaining the four Lawyers, and shall have the Protection of the House: That the said Lieutenant shall not yield any Obedience to any Writ, Warrant, Order, or Command to deliver the said Prisoners before he hath first acquainted the House therewith, and received their Directions thereon: Order the Thanks of the House to the said Lieutenant for conforming his Behaviour to the Pleasure of the House: Resolve that no Commoner, committed by Order of the House for Breach of Privilege, ought, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, or any other Authority whatever, be made to appear, or answer, or receive any Determination in the House of Peers, during that Session: That the Order of the House of Peers for issuing out Writs of Habeas Corpus, concerning the four Lawyers, is insufficient and illegal and that their Lordships be acquainted by Message, That the said four Lawyers were committed by their Order for manifest Breach of Privilege, and Contempt of the Authority of the House.

It was the fifth of June, when his Majesty made his Speech to the two Houses at Whitehall, and, on the eighth, finding how little his Interposition was regarded, he came to the House of Peers, and sending for the Commons, put an end to the session, as the only Expedient to put an end to the Broil.

For the sake of Order and Connection, we must now take a transient View of the Progress of the War between the Confederates and France, tho' England had no other Concern with the Continent, at present, than by the Tender of her good Offices to bring about a general Accommodation.

At the Close of the last Campaign, we left the Marshal de Turenne in full Possession of Alsace; the Confederates retreating before him, and, after they had repair'd the Rhine, dispersing themselves into their Winter Quarters.

But all his Successes were rather Monuments of his own superior Skill, than of the superior Strength of France: On the contrary, it was visible, that France was overmatch'd, and that nothing but the admirable Conduct of that great Man, prevented the Enemy from carrying the War to the very Gates of Paris. That, therefore, the Fate of his Kingdom might not depend on a single Life, and a continual Succession of Miracles, his most Christian Majesty thought it advisable to endeavour to make his own Scale heavier, by lightening that of the Confederates: And finding the Prince of Orange, however disaffected, was not to be detach'd from his Allies, he made his Applications successively to the King of Spain, the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Elector of Treves, without effect: Every one of those Powers rejected his Offers; he found himself oblig'd to stand singly against them all; and to show he was still able to do so, he gave out many hundreds of Commissions for new Levies; by a Treaty with the Swiss Cantons, he furnish'd himself with 20000 Horses to remount his Cavalry; and by another with Sweden, he had oblig'd that Crown to make a Diversion, as before mentioned, on the Side of Pomerania.

On the other hand, the Confederates took the proper Measures, not only to keep up their Strength, but make that Strength more considerable by a Union of Heads as well as Hands. The Command of the Imperial Army on the Rhine was given to Count Montecuccoli, under whom Mr. de Turenne had first study'd the Art of War. The Count de Montecuccoli was recall'd from the Government of Flanders, which was given to the Duke de Villa Hermosa, as a Person of a more tractable Disposition, and more likely for that Reason, to be acceptable to the Prince of Orange; and the Count de Saubech, who had given his Highness such Umbrage, in the last Campaign, was sent into a Government in Hungary.

Depending on the usual Backwardness of the Germans to take the Field, and hoping that some very considerable Blow might be struck in Flanders, before any thing was to be apprehended from them on the Side of Alsace, his most Christian Majesty, in Person, took the Field about the Middle of May, with an Army of sixty-five thousand Men, of which about twenty thousand Horses, were to be dispers'd in flying Camps, as Occasion should serve. But tho' his Majesty was present, it was only as a Volunteer; the Prince of Condé had still the supreme Command, and by the particular Direction of the King, enjoy'd all the Honours of his Post, at full, in the same manner, as if his Majesty had not been there. Of this, one remarkable Instance is preserv'd. The Army being to encamp in a Place where there was but one habitable House, the King expressly commanded, That it should be reserv'd for the General. And when the Prince made a Difficulty of accepting to high a Compliment, his Majesty reply'd, Ce n'est, I am but a Volunteer in your Army, and therefore, cannot suffer my General to keep the Field, while I repose myself within Doors.

But this Excess of Civility, neither arose from an Overflow of Affection to the Prince, nor a Desire to establish a perfect Discipline in his Army, but the Necessity he found himself under to mortify his Brother, who aspir'd to the Post of Generalissimo: And he chose to mortify his Brother.

As to the Business of the Campaign, it was open'd by the Reduction of Dinant, Huy, and Limbourg; and the Demolition of St. Tron and Tillemont: The Marshal de Crequi, also, made himself Master of Greux and Franchimont; and as the Citadel of Liege had been surrendered to the Count d'Esrades, in the Month of March, the greatest Part of that Bishopric fell of course into the Hands of the French.

Returns to Verulles.

Things were in this Situation when his most Christian Majesty, weary of a military Life, which did not correspond with his Genius, and having subdu'd his Brother, which was the principal Conquest he aspir'd to, return'd to Verulles, having first order'd the Marshal de Crequi, with the separate Corps under his Command, and five or six Regiments more, which were detach'd from the Prince's Army, to make the best of his way to the Assistance of Mr. de Turenne; who had not above twenty-five thousand Men, to make head with against Count Montecuculi, and to watch the Motions of the Duke of Lorraine, who was advanced up the Sarre, with a Design to make a Diverſion on that side: And never did Reinforcement arrive more seasonably; for without it, in all probability, not even Turenne himself could have hinder'd the Imperialists from passing the Rhein, and penetrating again into Alsace.

The Campaign to Germany.

This was indeed the great Point which Count Montecuculi had in view; but he endeavour'd, by all the Arts and Stratagems of War, to mislead Mr. de Turenne into a Belief, that his Purpose was to lay siege to Pöplisbourg. But the Marshal was too deeply practis'd in Refinements of all sorts to fall into the Snare. Almost two Months were thus wasted in perpetual Feints, and perpetual Disappointments; and it became necessary at last to aim directly at the Mark, in hopes that Truth itself would be taken for a Counterfeit; and that the guarding against false Projects would afford an Opportunity for the real one to take place.

The Count, to influence the Magistrates of Strasbourg once more to declare for the Emperor, had advanced as far as Lichtenew, and Reinshlach near Offenburg; and the Marshal, to traverse that Step, had pass'd the Rhein at Altenheim, and posited his Army between that City and the Imperialists; by which means he cut off all Communication between them, and oblig'd the *Strasbourg*ers, whether they would or not, to observe the Neutrality which they had accepted of some Months before, in a Manner so solemn, that they had even receiv'd six hundred Switzers for their Guard, and had taken their Oaths to defend them against all Invaders.

Above fifteen Days had pass'd since the two Armies had thus faced each other, and scarce one without a Skirmish; sometimes to the Advantage of the French, and sometimes of the Imperialists; when Mr. de Turenne observing, that the Enemy could maintain their Post for a long while, because they wanted for nothing; and that, on the contrary, his Provisions would soon be exhausted; he extended his Right to Friedstadt, and took possession of all the Isles of Wantzenow: He also threw a strong Party into the Isle of Hannau; and, in order to have always a free Passage at that Place, he order'd a Bridge of Boats, or rather several Bridges, from Isle to Isle, to be laid across the River; and another over the Remben, which he fortify'd with a good Intrenchment: And all this he did to cut off the Communication of the Imperialists with Offenburg, and reduce them to Wants and Difficulties in their turn: The Count was soon aware of his Design, and resolv'd, at any hazard, to defeat it: Accordingly he directed the Prince of Lorraine, with six thousand Horse, to attack the Party which had the Guard of the Bridge: The Marshal himself advanced to the Defence of it; and the Prince of Lorraine was yet further reinforced on his side: A smart Encounter ensu'd; in which both Parties were Sufferers: But the Marshal maintain'd his Bridge; and the next Day the Count, thinking it advisable to remove, in order to be more at large, he follow'd him close, as far as the Village of Salslach; behind which, the Imperialists drew up in a Plain, and made the necessary Disposition to give battle to their Pursuers. The Marshal seeing this, halted to do the same; and, with his usual Vigilance and Precaution, made the best Use of every Moment, in visiting every Post and Avenue, that he might be better able to make use of all.

There was, in particular, an Eminence in sight, which the Imperialists had quitted; some say, with a view to what followed; for the two Armies were so near, that they could distinguish each other's General-Officers: This Mr. de Turenne thought convenient for a Battery, and went up to it, accompanied by Mr. St. Hillaire, Lieutenant-General of the Artillery, to give his Orders accordingly: But scarce did they appear on the Top, before the Enemy discharg'd two small Field-pieces, which commanded the Ground; one of which wounded Mr. St. Hillaire, and the other kill'd the Great Turenne: He fell without a Groan; nor had time to regret the Loss of another Opportunity to be serviceable to his Country: His own Glory was at the full; nor could he receiv'd Addition: His Soldiers call'd him Father; and lamented his Death, as if their own Being had depended on his: All France was humbled at the News; and, instead of Victory and Conquest, sent up their Prayers for Safety: Even the invincible and immortal Leuis condescended to say, Alas! we have now lost All! Turenne is dead.

If France mourn'd, Germany triumph'd. Those who before dreaded an Engagement, for fear of a Defeat, now promis'd themselves an easy Victory; and thereby complimented the Dead, at the expense of the Living: But tho' the Grief and Astonishment of the French Army were unspeakable, they were not accompanied with Despair: The Count de Lorge, the Marshal's Nephew, took upon him the Command of the Army; and had the Honour of making a Retreat, that was worth a Victory. Two Regiments of English, who, on the Peace with the Dutch, were left to be worn out in the Service of his most Christian Majesty, had the Honour to bring up the Rear, and cover the Retreat of the whole French Army: And, in that dreadful Post, with astonishing Intrepidity, they sustain'd the Shock of the whole confederate Army, disputing every Inch of Ground, and often repulsing the Enemy, till such time as most of the French Corps were march'd off, and the greatest part of their own were cut to pieces. This, however, did not hinder the Imperialists from coming up with the Enemy at last; and a bloody Engagement ensued, which lasted from Ten in the Morning till Seven in the Evening, without any signal Advantage on either side; both Parties retiring, as if by Consent, and entrenching themselves, as well as they could, in the Field of Battle. The three following Days were spent in mutual consoiding: And thus they parted; neither daring to make any farther Attempt on the other: The French continuing their Rout towards Schiffstadt, and the Imperialists encamping in the Neighbourhood of Fort Kiel.

The Death of Mr. de Turenne, and the Retreat of Mr. de Lorge, were however productive of all the Advantages that could have been expected from the most complete Victory: Strasbourg immediately forgot her Neutrality, and again gave the Imperialist free Passage over their Bridge into Alsace; and advantage was taken of the present Conformation of the French, to divide the confederate Forces, and attack them in several Places at once. Count Montreucault undertook Alsace, for his Province; and a Concert was form'd among the several Princes of the League, for the Reduction of Troves, by a Junction of Imperial Troops under the *Marquis de (*) Grana*, of Spaniards under the Marquis de Louvoisy, of the Elector Palatine under the Count de la Lippe, of Munster under Major General Gravilliers, of Troves under the Baron de Leyen, and of Lorraine, Zell, and Osnabrug, under their respective Princes.

This was one of the greatest Enterprises that was undertaken by the Confederates during the War; and was so much the more remarkable, as it concentred the Interests of so many Princes. The Imperialists were bent upon it to open a Passage into France on this side, finding so many Obstacles in their way thro' Alsace. The Spaniards desir'd it for the sake of succouring Luxembourg, whenever it should be press'd, which was of the last Importance to them. The Duke of Lorraine, that he might once again have Entrance into his own Duchy. The Elector Palatine thought it the best Preparation for the Siege of Philisburg, which was the Thorn in his Side. And, we are told, the Thirst of Glory inflam'd the rest.

And now it was that the World saw with Astonishment, that the Germans, when united, were as capable as the French of forming great Designs, and could exert themselves with equal Vigour in the Execution. On the 5th of August, that is to say, in nine Days after the Death of Mr. de Turenne, the Confederates sat down before Troves, and in three Days more they were furnish'd with all the Requisites for a Siege, by the Care of the Elector Palatine and Troves: But, on the 9th, when they propos'd to open the Frenches in form, they receiv'd Advice, that the Marshal de Crequi, strengthen'd with a large Detachment from the Army of the Prince of Condé, and with several other Corps which he had drawn out of different Places in his way, was at hand, with a Resolution to succour the Place.

Immediately upon this, a Council of War was held; and, with the same Conformity of Sentiment which had given rise to the Siege, it was resolv'd to meet the Marshal mid-way, and give him Battle. Leaving, therefore, sufficient Troops to guard the Camp, the rest, under the Command of the Dukes of Zell and Osnabrug, march'd out in quest of the Enemy; whom they found on the 11th, near the Village of Tavernes, totally unprepar'd for any such Adventure, many of their Troops dispers'd on a Forage, and the rest either in disorder'd on their March, or surpris'd with the unexpected Appearance of the Allies, that the Marshal had neither Time nor Opportunity to make such a Disposition as the Ground would have admitted of; the River Sarre running between the two Armies: Confusion on one side begot Resolution on the other; the confederate Generals gave order to their Forces to pass the said River, under the Cover of their Cannon, which were brought to bear so effectually on the Plain, on the other Side, that the French durst not venture within their Reach. What follow'd was a vigorous Charge, and a total Rout. The right Wing of the French rally'd five times, and were as often broken, and at last irrecoverably: Most of the Foot and Dragoons were either killed, or taken Prisoners. All the Ensigns, Standards, Guns, and Baggage of all sorts, fell into the Enemy's Hands. Never was a more complete Victory, or more absolute Defeat. Scarce Mr. de Crequi himself made a shift to escape; and of his whole Army, he had but Three or Four to bear him company.

This was a pleasing Spectacle to the old Duke of Lorraine, who had been dispossest of his Duchy by this very General: An Indisposition had hinder'd him from being present at the beginning of the Action; but, before the Close of it, he came up, with four Squadrons; and had the Satisfaction to put in for a Share, both of the Success and Glory of the Day.

That Night the Confederates encamp'd on the Field of Battle; and the next Day return'd to the Prosecution of the Siege. Mr. de Crequi had thrown himself into the Place, He throws himself into Troves, and makes a desperate Defence.

with a desperate Resolution either to preserve it, or perish in the Ruins. On the 17th the Trenches were opened, and the several Parties took their Turns in carrying on the Works; and all behaved in such a manner, as if each had piqu'd himself on being the most instrumental in forwarding the Common Cause. But neither Emulation nor Valour itself, is a Match for Despair: The unhappy Marshal had all at stake, and thought himself oblig'd to do things almost exceeding human Ability, to regain the Figure and Importance he had lost. Hence, with the Assistance and Support of certain Scottish Battalions who were in Garrison there, and who accompanied him Night and Day in every Danger, he made an obstinate Defence till the fifth of September, in spite of the utmost Efforts of the Enemy without, and the perpetual Murmurs of a mutinous Garrison within; and even then, the Place was surrender'd against his Will; he himself retiring to a Church, endeavouring to spirit up the few that followed him to hold it out till the last Man, and chusing to be made a Prisoner of War, rather than sign the Articles of Capitulation, which his own Officers had drawn up without his Consent, and in Violation of his Authority.

France inclin'd.

It was now that France began to be sick of her ambitious Projects, and that by the vigorous Concurrence of England with the Allies, effectual Bounds might have been set to her Power. But when the Undertaking was not only practicable, but expedient, the Court could not be brought to relish it. The King himself had declar'd to Sir William Temple (whom he had sent for into England soon after the Receipt, to use his Endeavours to) reconcile the Lords Arlington and Dowry, whose perpetual Broils embarrass'd his Affairs) "That some of the warm Leaders of both Houses, had a mind to engage him in a War with France, which they should not do for many Reasons; and among the rest, because he was sure if they did, they would leave him in it, and make use of it to ruin his Ministers, and make him depend upon them more than he intended, or any King would desire." And when the War had taken a Turn so unpropitious to France, and it was in his Majesty's Power, by one and the same Measure, to recover the Confidence of his People at home, and settle the Balance abroad, for many an Age to come, he prefer'd his own personal Attachments to France, to the general Interest of Europe, and again endeavour'd to bring over the Prince of Orange to his Party, by ordering Sir William Temple, now return'd to the Hague, to use it as an Argument to his Highness to be easy in the Business of a Peace, "That it was now high time for him to apprehend again the Greatness of the House of Austria, instead of that of France."

England interposes with the Prince of Orange for a Peace.

Possibly the Advocates for this Reign may urge, that his Majesty was ty'd up by his Engagements to France, from taking Part with the Confederates; and that it redounds to his Honour that he observ'd the Dictates of Justice rather than Policy.—Had his Majesty been always thus scrupulous, this Plea might have been urg'd with a better Grace; but we cannot help remembering, that when the Vengeance of France was denounc'd against Holland by Land, and England was to do her Drudgery by Sea, as many Pretences were sought to force a Rupture, as now to avoid one: In particular, a Violation of the Honour of the Flag was represented as a thing never to be overlook'd, and scarce to be forgiven: And yet in the Month of June, this very Summer, the following Incident happen'd in the Channel, tho' the London Gazette was not suffer'd to take notice of it:
