tion of the Truth of a Rebellion, which they had provided Witnesses to swear was design'd by the Protestants, and had prepar'd Men, by private Whispers, to believe: That the heinous Nature of the Crime, and the Greatness of the Persons suppos'd to be concerned, made the Commons believe, that none but the Parliament was big enough to go thro' with it: That the Zeal and Courage of inferior Courts were already abated: That another Plot of the same Nature, discover'd by Dangerfield, and plainly prov'd to the Privy-Council, had been stifled by the great Diligence of the King's Bench: That the Mouths of Gadbury and others had been stop'd, as soon as they began to confess, with a Pardon: That there was the more Cause for Jealousy in this Case, because Fitzharris, when inclin'd to Repentance, and beginning to confess, was, without any visible Cause, taken out of the Sheriff's Custody, and sent to the Tower: That the Commons, therefore, had no other Way to be secure that the Prosecution should be effectual, the Judgment indifferent, and the Criminal out of all Hopes of a Pardon, (unless, by an ingenious Confession, he could engage both Houses in a powerful Mediation in his behalf) than by impeaching him: They were sure no Pardon could stop their Suit, though the King might release his own Prosecution by his Pardon: That, as to the Right of the Commons to impeach a Commoner, and of the Lords to receive such Impeachment, it had been admitted by the Lords themselves, in the recent Case of Seroggs: That this was such a Fundamental of Government, that there could be no Security without it: That otherwise, on a Supposition of a Ministry of Commoners, all manner of Treasons might be perpetrated with Impunity: That 'tis laid down as a Maxim, in the Mirror of Justice, That Parliaments were ordain'd to bear and determine all Complaints of wrongful Acts, done by the King, Queen, or their Children, and such others against whom common Right could not be had elsewhere: That whereas some would have it, that, by the Record relating to the Case of Matravers, &c. the Lords were discharg'd from judging Commoners, there was not the least Trace in the said Record to warrant any such Conclusion: But, on the contrary, the whole Druit of it was to defend the Lords from being ever press'd again into the Service of the King, to the Violation of the Laws: That this was further apparent, by a Writ issued in the 19th of Edward III. to suspend the Execution of the Judgment against Matravers; not because the Lords ought not to sit in Judgment on Commoners, but because it been illegally pass'd; as by an undoubted Act of Parliament for the Pardon of the said Matravers, in the 26th of the same King, is, both by Lords and Commons, expressly acknowledg'd: And that, to silence the most Malicious on this Head, whoever considers the famous Act of the 25th of Edward III. which hath ever since limited the Jurisdiction of all inferior Courts to the Trial of such Treasons only as are therein particularly specify'd,

A. D. 1681. city'd, and reserved all other Treasons to the Trial and Judgment of Parliament, must conclude, that, if any other Treasons are committed by Commoners, they must be so try'd, that is, by Parliament, or not at all: And if the last should be allow'd, it would follow, that the same Fact which in a Peer is Treason, and punishable with Death, in a Commoner is no Crime, and subject to no Punishment: That, moreover, Magna Charta doth not confine all Trials to common Juries; for it ordains, That they shall be try'd by the Judgment of Peers, or the Law of the Land; under which Words the Law of Parliament is comprehended: That, since the Parliament-Records are full of Impeachments of Commoners, and no one Instance can be given of the Rejection of any such Impeachment, the Commons have most Reason to cite Magna Charta, which provides expressly against the Denial of Justice; and such Denial of Justice might very well be charg'd on a Court, which, having undoubted Cognizance of a Cause regularly brought before them, should refuse to hear it; more especially in this Case, when the Lords could not judicially know whether any Prosecution would be carry'd on elsewhere: For, tho' the Declaration says, a Trial was directed, it is certain nothing was done in order to it, till a Month after the Dissolution: That as the Votes of the Commons had nothing in them unparliamentary, or tending to carry Things to Extremity, they could not desire a Conference, till they had first stat'd their own Case, and asserted by Votes the Matters they were to maintain at a Conference. These Votes were so far from putting the two Houses beyond a Possibility of a Reconciliation, that they were made in order to it: There was no other Way to attain it: And the House was actually preparing to send a Message for a Conference, to accommodate this Difference, at the very Instant that the Black-Rod call'd them to their Dissolution: That as the Ministers had taken upon them, in the Declaration, to decide this great Dispute between the two Houses, and to give Judgment on the Side of the Lords, it might well be demanded, What Person was by Law constituted a Judge of their Privileges, or had Authority to censure the Votes of one House, made with reference to Matters in contest with the other, as the greatest Violation of the Constitution of Parliaments? And it might be fairly pronounced, that the giving such a Judgment, and the publishing such a Charge, was not only the greatest Violation of the Constitution, but had a direct Tendency to the Destruction of it: That as to the Cautions given to the Public in the said Paper, concerning two sorts of ill Men, viz. Those of Commonwealth Principles, and those malcontent thro' Disappointments. If by the first they mean Lovers of Commonwealth Principles, Men passionately devoted to the public Good, and to the common Service of their Country, who believe that Kings were instituted for the Good of the People, that Government was obtain'd for the sake of the Governed, and who put forth their Complaints when it was us'd to contrary Ends, every honest Man would be proud to be rank'd in that Number: And if Commonwealth signifies common Good, as all good Authors of all Nations always use it, no good Man will be asham'd of it: That if the Declaration would insinuate, that there had been any Design to set up a democratical Government, in opposition to our legal Monarchy, it was one of the Calumnies which the Penmen of it had vented, in order to lay upon others the Blame of a Design to overthrow the Government, which belong'd only to themselves: And as to the Malcontent, if under that Distinction they rank'd those Men of Honour and Conscience, who, being qualify'd for the highest Employments of State, had either left, or refus'd, or been remov'd from them, because they would not accept or retain them at the Price of selling their Country, or enslaving their Posterity; the People would, notwithstanding their Caveats, persevere in having a Consideration for what they said; and therefore it would be Wisdom to give such Men as these no Occasion to say, that they intend to lay aside the Use of Parliaments.—But, in truth, the Behaviour of the Ministers had already given occasion to say, that the Use of Parliaments was already laid aside: For, tho' his Majesty had own'd, in so many Speeches and Declarations, the great Danger of the Kingdom, and the Necessity of the Aid and Counsel of Parliament, he had, nevertheless, been prevail'd upon to dissolve Four, in the Space of Twenty-six Months, without making any effectual Use of their Advice: And as, on the one hand, there was no Room to hope, that the Court would ever love any Parliament better than the first of those Four, in which they had so dearly purchas'd such a Number of fast Friends; so, on the other, there was good Reason to suspect their Designs were ill indeed, that could shock such a Parliament.

That the one Point gain'd by the Declaration was the express Acknowledgment it contain'd, That Parliaments were the best Method for healing the Distempers of the Kingdom, and the only one to preserve the Monarchy in Credit, both at home and abroad: That tho' they rejoic'd that his Majesty seem'd resolv'd to have frequent Parliaments; and hop'd he would continue just to himself and his People, by continuing constant to his Resolution, they could not but doubt, to some degree, when they recollect'd his Majesty's Speech of January 26, 1679, to both Houses, in which he told them, "That he was unalterably of Opinion, that long Intervals of Parliaments were absolutely necessary for composing and quieting the Minds of the People:" That which deserv'd most Credit, a Speech or Declaration; or which was likeliest to last longest, a Resolution, or an unalterable Opinion, none but a Court-Critic could decide: That nothing but the effectual Performance of the last Part of the Promise would give Assurance of the first: And, finally, That when the real Fruits of their utmost Endeavours to extirpate Popery, out of Parliament, became apparent; when the Duke of York was no longer First-Minister, or rather Protector, of these Kingdoms, and his Creatures no longer had the Direction of all things; when Love to Religion and the Laws was no longer a Crime at Court, nor a certain Forerunner of Dismission and Disgrace; when the Word loyal, that is faithful to the Law, should be restor'd to its old and true Meaning, and no longer signify one who was for subverting the Laws; when Commissions should be filled with hearty Protestants, the Laws executed in good earnest against the Papists; the Discoverers of the Plot countenanced, at least suffer'd to give their Evidence; the Courts of Justice steady, not avowing a Jurisdiction one Day, and disavowing it the next; no more grand Juries discharg'd when they should hear Witnesses, nor Witnesses hurry'd away when they should inform grand Juries; when Court Instruments no more labour'd to raise Jealousies of Protestants at home, and some Regard was shewn to Protestants abroad; when it was seen, that something else was meant by governing according to Law, than putting the Laws in force against Dissenters, that were meant against Papists, then the Nation might depend upon frequent Parliaments, with all the blessed Effects of pursuing parliamentary Councils, the Extirpation of Popery, the Redress of Grievances, the Flourishing of Laws, and the perfect Restoring the Monarchy to the Credit which it ought to have (but which the Authors of the Declaration confess it wants) both at home and abroad. There needed no Time to open the Eyes of the People; and their Hearts were ready prepared to meet his Majesty in Parliament, in order to perfect the good Settlement and restore the Peace wanting in Church and State. But that, while so many little Emisaries were employ'd to sow and increase Divisions, as if the Ministers had a mind to make his Majesty the Head of a Faction, who ought to be equally the Head of all his People (and which, Thuanus says, was the Folly and the Destruction of Mary Queen of Scots, his Great-Grand-Mother;) while the same Differences were promoted which gave rise to the late Troubles, and which were once thought fit to be bury'd in an Act of Oblivion; while the popish Interest was so plainly countenanced, which was then done with Caution; when every Pretence of Prerogative was strain'd to the utmost Height; when Parliaments were us'd with Contempt and Indignity, and their Judicature, and all their highest Privileges brought in question in inferior Courts; there would be but too good Cause to believe, that, whatever loyal and good Men did, yet the Ministers and Favourites very little consider'd the Rise and Progress of the late Troubles, and had but little Desire to prevent a Relapse: And that, as they had never yet shewn Regard to Religion, Liberty, and Property; so they would be little concern'd to see the Monarchy shaken off, if they might escape the Vengeance of public Justice, due to them for so long a Course of pernicious Councils.

This Abridgment, the Superficial and Impatient may possibly think too long, and the Cool and Deliberate as much too short. The (1) Pamphlet itself is certainly the most judicious and important of all that the Party ever set forth: Nor is the State of the Controversy between the two Factions to be understood without it. And, upon a Survey of the Whole, what is the Result? The King very shrewdly exposes his Adversaries: They more shrewdly defend themselves, and retort the Blame of all on him: Both emblazon each other's Faults, in the strongest Colours; and both endeavour to expunge their own: Both endeavour alike to captivate the People, and by their Means rather to have the Direction of the Storm, than the bespeaking a Calm. All is Menace and Reproach, Rancour and Bitterness. The sacred Name of Government is alledg'd on one Side; the sacred Name of Patriotism on the other; to excuse Turbulence in these, Malversation in those. The King called his Parliaments, not to aid and assist him with their Advice, but with their Pursets: They press the public Fears and Dangers into their Service, and refuse to give, but on their own Conditions: Each reveals the other's Secret, and brings such authentic Vouchers to support their Testimony, that nothing but the most amazing Insatiation could hinder Mankind from availing themselves of the mutual Discovery, and from deserting both, by common Consent: For as, on the one hand, by a corrupted Government, we are to understand the Craft of seducing the People by the Laws; so, by a corrupt Opposition, we are to understand the Craft of distressing that Government, within the Laws. In neither, the People have any solid Interest; and, consequently, as from the Collisions of these Bodies, Good is sometimes fortuitously struck out, their Part is only to put themselves in a Readiness to catch the happy Spark, and improve it to their own Advantage.

But, in the Case immediately before us, however glaring the Light, they continued still to grope for the Way, or to follow blindly the Guides who led them to Perdition.

In point of Success, on the apparent Face of Things, the King had the Advantage of the Dispute: His condescending to appeal to his People soften'd their Hearts, if it did not convince their Understandings. He appear'd to be an Object of Compassion; he appear'd to have been all this while on the Defensive: The Offers he had made were thought more weighty than his Adversaries Objections: In short, he was no sooner pity'd, than he was believ'd; and, above all, the artful Turn given, given, in his Declaration, to the Commons Vote in favour of the Nonconformists, drew in all the Clergy and their Followers to his Side, in a Body: The Cry of Church and King was again renew'd, was echo'd from one End of the Kingdom to the other; and, as if it was a Charm to debafe the Spirit and cloud the Understanding, produced such a Train of detestable Flatteries to the Throne, mingled with so many flagrant Proofs of a fordid Disposition to enter into a voluntary Vassalage, as might very reasonably make an Englishman blush for his Country while he read them; and would have made a Roman or a Spartan exclaim, The Gods created these Barbarians to be Slaves.

This deprav'd and servile Disposition did not however burst forth in its full Perfection of Prostitution and Ignominy all at once; on the contrary, it started up first under the Shadow of an Address of Thanks from the Middlesex Justices to his Majesty, for calling upon them to put the Statute 43. of Queen Elizabeth in force, for the Relief of the Poor. Their Worshipps, it seems, thought themselves oblig'd to lay hold of that reasonable Opportunity to make their humble Acknowledgments for the late gracious Declaration, in which his Majesty (forgetting his own Act of Oblivion) was pleas'd to put his People in mind of the Miseries they had endur'd under the Tyranny of the late usurping Powers, when the Monarchy was spoken off; and to give his Royal Word, that he would govern according to the Laws; which had made so deep an Impression on them, that they were unanimously resolv'd to devote their Lives and Fortunes to his Majesty's Service, for the Defence of his most sacred Person, the true Protestant Religion, and the Government, as by Law establish'd, in Church and State. And his Majesty, in his Answer, most graciously assur'd them, that he was an utter Enemy to all arbitrary Proceedings; and that he should do his utmost to maintain the legal Rights of his Subjects, which was the only Way for the preserving the public Peace.

Ten Days after the Declaration was made public, this political Intercourse between his Majesty and his Subjects was thus modestly opened; and, ten Days after that, certain of the most eminent Citizens, in the Name of themselves and many thousands more of the most eminent Citizens and Inhabitants of London, presented a Paper to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, which they call'd their Address, Declaration, and Resolution, humbly petitioning them to present it to his Majesty, signifying their deep Sense of the many Instances they had had the Honour to receive of his Majesty's princely Goodness and Bounty; particularly, of his Royal Assurances, &c. set forth with a most express Solemnity in his late Declaration; Declaring, in the Contemplation of a Goodness so ample and so effectual, that there was nothing further wanting to the composing of Mens Minds, &c. saving only the dutiful Return of Veneration and Obedience from the Subject, in acknowledgment of the fatherly Tenderness of so indulgent a Sovereign; and unanimously resolving to lay their Lives and Fortunes at his Majesty's Feet, in defence of his sacred Person, &c. against all Opposition whatsoever.

But the City, it seems, was not altogether so unanimous as their Worshipps of Middlesex; for, on the very Day this loyal Competition was presented to the City Magistrate, a Counter-Petition was also presented from other eminent Citizens, setting forth, That, according to their humble Conceptions, it was not his Majesty's Declaration to have frequent Parliaments, that could contribute any thing to the Security of their Religion, their Lives and Liberties, and the composing of Mens Minds, but the actual Sitting of a Parliament, to provide necessary Laws, and his Majesty giving Life to those Laws by his Royal Assent; and praying, that a Common-Council might be call'd, to present such an Address to his Majesty as the Necessity of the Case should be found to require.

As this latter Faction had either the most Strength or Interest, it was presum'd they had the most Reason on their Side: In consequence of which Way of arguing, the Lord Mayor, like the blind Patriarch, bestow'd his Blessing, rather according to the Dictates of his Palate, than the Convictions of his Judgment; and, while he rejected the Voice of Jacob, authenticated the Hands of Esau. In plain Terms, a Common-Council was call'd, according to the Prayer of the last of these Petitions; and, as it was clearly foreseen, the Result was likely to be little favourable to the Declaration and its Partisans, Care was taken to break the Force of the Blow, in a good degree, by making a proper Use of the Loyalty and Zeal of the Lieutenancy of London, and the Grand-jury of Southwark; who were severally prevail'd upon to wait upon his Majesty with their Compliments on his gracious Declaration, on the very Day that the Lord Mayor and City of London, under an opposite Direction, importun'd him to call a Parliament: And an Account of the very different Reception of those very different Papers was, by Authority, circulated in Print all over the Kingdom; at once to admonish and deter the rest of his Majesty's Lieges.

To the Lieutenancy, who after their humble and hearty Thanks, &c. had given his Majesty a perfect Assurance, That they were unanimously resolv'd to venture their Lives and Fortunes for the Preservation of his Majesty, and the Maintenance of the Government in Church and State, as by Law establish'd, in opposition to, and defiance of, all Enemies and Opposers, of what Sort or Sect whatever, the Lord Chancellor was command'd to answer, That his Majesty thought these Expressions of their Loyalty, &c. were, at this time, a very reasonable Piece of Duty and Service.

And to the Jurors of Southwark, who came with their most profuse Acknowledgments of the transcendent Obligation laid upon them by his Majesty's gracious Promises, and for his having reminded them of the late Rebellion, in a Manner so obliging, his Lordship signify'd, That his Majesty was extremely well pleas'd with the Form of their Address; and thought they proceeded on the surest Grounds imaginable, in laying it down for a Maxim, That steady Loyalty is the only Foundation of true Felicity.

Then, turning about to the (u) Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and Common-Council, of London, in the last Place, his Lordship chang'd his Honey into Gall, and proceeded as follows:

Lord Mayor of London,

"(u) As for that other Address, which styles itself, The humble Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, of the City of London, in Common-Council assembled; and which is very much discredited by these other Addresses which accompany it, I have many things in Command to say to it.

The King did expect that a Petition which seems to come from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London, should have consisted of such Matters only, as relate to the particular Concerns of the City; at least, he thought he should have found in it some due Acknowledgment of his continual Care in preserving and improving your Trade, and supporting your Liberties and Franchises.

But, contrary to his Expectation, and (as he thinks) to your Duty, he finds this Petition meddling with Matters of State and Government, Things which do in no sort appertain to you, but are quite out of your Sphere; And, if this should pass without Reproof, the meanest Corporation, nay the meanest Village, in England, will have as much Right to be meddling in these Matters, as you have.

The only End and Use of Common-Councils in London is for the Business of London; you are not the Common-Council of the Nation, and yet you behave yourselves so as if you thought you were.

But the King doth not look upon this Petition as proceeding from the unanimous Consent of the Common-Council; He is very well inform'd, that it pass'd there by an inconsiderable Majority, but fourteen Votes in the Whole, and against the Sense of the major Part of the Court of Aldermen: And his Majesty hath a great Value and Kindness for the Honesty and Discretion of those who dissent from it. And he looks upon the rest as misled by some ill Men, who make it their Business to begin that Confusion in the City, which they see no Hopes of beginning elsewhere.

And the King does not believe that the Matter of this Petition was ever well consider'd by you, because he finds in it so many Presumptuous and Mistakes.

It prays the Calling of a Parliament, at a Time when the King hath already declared to all the World, That there shall be frequent Parliaments; and so seems to doubt of that Assurance which all good Subjects give the King most humble Thanks for.

It prays a Continuation of that Parliament, till all their Business be dispatch'd; and so breaks in upon the highest Trust which is lodg'd in the King, to whom alone it belongs to appoint the Times and Seasons.

It deprives the King of the whole Honour of his Grace and Goodness in calling a Parliament, by making it seem to be the Effect of your Importunity.

So that nothing in the World could be more contrary to the seeming Ends of this Address, than the Address itself.

And, besides all this, the King takes notice of another Expression in your Address, wherein you pretend to be much troubled, that certain Pamphlets have lately come out, which speak very dishonourably of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments.

Now the King would have been glad you had mention'd what Pamphlets you mean; left otherwise the World suppose you to have a secret Meaning in this general Expression; such a Meaning as no honest Man, or good Subject, dares own.

And the King would have been glad too, that you had likewise taken notice of such other Pamphlets as defame his Majesty's Person and Government, and libel all the Orders and Constitutions both of Church and State.

But, it seems, your Curiosity hath been very great to look after some kind of Pamphlets; but your Diligence hath been very little when you should have look'd after the rest, and have punish'd the Seditious.

Notwithstanding all this, the King is still of Opinion, that there are but very few among you who deserve these Reproofs: He is not only confident of the Affections of the City in general, as knowing that no Prince ever deserved better of his People: But he believes the greatest Part of the Court of Aldermen, and of the Common-Council too, if they had all been present, to be very much addicted to his Service.

If therefore there be any among you who seek to make Divisions, he hopes you will mark them, and avoid them, and that you will study to be quiet, and to do your own Business; for the King hath set his Heart upon this City, to do them all the Good he can; and 'tis only the Peace of his Government which can bring you any Prosperity.

The King therefore recommends it to you, and requires it of you, to take effectual Care, that there be no kind of Disturbance or Disorder among you."

But London was not the only Place where the refractory Spirit, which the Lord Chancellor thus endeavour'd to lay, shew'd itself; for no sooner were the several Grand-juries of Middlesex for Easter Term settled, and proceeding as usual to their Business of the Sessions, than that for the Hundred of Oxtoupton was attended by a considerable Number of Knights, Gentlemen, and Freeholders, who laid before them the following Requests: 1. That they would present their and the County's Thanks to the Knights who represented sent them in the last Parliament, for their good Intentions to have serv'd them to the utmost; in these Times of imminent Danger, had they not been prevented by a sudden and surprizing Dissolution. 2. That they would make the same Compliment to those truly loyal Patriots and noble Peers, who had asserted the ancient and fundamental Rights of the Commons of England, by protesting against the Lords Rejection of the Commons Impeachment against Edw. Fitzbarris. And, 3. That they would in their, and the County's, Name, petition his Majesty for the speedy Calling, and effectual Sitting, of a Parliament, until the great and many Dangers and Grievances of this Kingdom be effectually prevented and redressed; which could not be done, but by the Wisdom and Authority of Parliament.

With all which, as it was foreseen, these notable Jurors unanimously clos'd: They gave their Thanks; they prepar'd and presented their (x) Petition to the Court of King's-Bench, to be by the Lord Chief Justice handed to the King: And a Print of the whole Process was immediately set forth, that other Grand-Juries might take the Hint, and do likewise.

Address'd against by the Middlesex Justices.

But this striking at the Root of the present Designs of the Court, the Middlesex Justices were again order'd upon Duty: And in a second Address to the King, which was immediately set forth in the Gazette, took care to specify, "That tho' the said Petition was prefer'd in the Name of the Grand Jury for the County, it was the Work but of one single hundred; that, therefore, it was not to be esteem'd the Sense of the County; that there being some Expressions in it not at all becoming the Duty of Loyal Subjects, the said Justices (seventeen of whom were of the Hundred of Oswalston) thought it their Duty to express their Dislike thereof; as also to declare, That the Time for calling and sitting of Parliaments is the King's Prerogative, and the Law of the Kingdom: That his Majesty is the only Judge when to call them, and how long they shall sit. That it is as unreasonable for his Majesty's Subjects to direct his Majesty in that Particular, as it would be for his Majesty to confine his Subjects when they should sow or reap their Corn: That his Majesty was troubled with this Paper to shew they were of a different Opinion from the Presenters of the said Petition; and that they acquiesc'd in his Majesty's Wisdom in the Administration and Exercise of his Majesty's Government; which they should be always ready to support with their Lives and Fortunes."

And now the Flood-Gates of Loyalty being open'd, almost every Day, to the End of the Year, brought in some additional Stream to swell the general Torrent: inasmuch, that the Gazettes from the Middle of May to the January following, are little more than a Collection of Testimonies, That the People were weary of all those Rights and Privileges that make Subjection safe and honourable; and that the King could not have oblig'd them more, than by taking such troublesome things out of their Custody for good and all. Quotations to shew the Folly of some, and the Prostitution of all, would be endless, and, indeed, beneath the Notice of History; for Mariners, Watermen, and even (y) Apprentice Boys were press'd into the Service, and tutor'd to vilify Parliaments, and place their sole Trust and Confidence in the All-sufficiency of his Majesty. The Materials they were compos'd of, being, in Universal Prostitution of the People.

Barnet, &amp;c. 1701. gave

(x) Which they follow'd, at the next General Sessions at Hick's-Hall, with a Presentation and Petition to the Bench of Justices, in these Words:

"The Protestants, &c. to the Honourable, &c. Justices, That we, the said Grand Jury, being by our Oaths oblig'd to enquire into the State of the Peace of the County, hold ourselves bound to shew unto this Court, what we find and apprehend concerning the same. Upon the most diligent Enquiry and Observation that we can make,

We find, That the Peace of this County, and the whole Kingdom, is in no Security, by reason of the continual Contrivance of the Papists and their Adherents against the Protestants, to shew their wicked Conspiracies upon them; and we have Reason to fear daily, that the Peace may be broken, by means of some of their wicked Designs to engage some inconsiderate People.

We find, That his Majesty's Person is in no Security, whilst the Papists have Hopes, and a visible Appearance, that there may be a popish Successor, to kind them, and destroy the Protestant Interest, if they can, by any wicked Means and heinous Villanies, procure his Majesty's Death; which God (in his Mercy) prevent.

We find the Minds of the People greatly disquieted and distracted, with Fears of what may happen to them, remembering the Distractions that have been made in the City of London, and elsewhere: And we perceive daily Endeavours, by seditious Councils, to distract and divide the Protestants into Parties, and to incense each of them against the other, to suggest ill and false Opinions of their Parliaments, and to vilify the Authority of the Common, and to misrepresent their Proceedings.

We find wicked Secrets, Endeavours to make Breaches between his Majesty and the Commons of England in Parliament, by printed Papers and otherwise, to bring the Commons in Parliament into the Hatred and Contempt of the Nation; which we conceive to be of most dangerous Consequence, tending even to the Dissolution of the Constitution of the Government.

And we find the Papists and their Adherents much encouraged by the frequent Dissolution of Parliaments, and the whole Kingdom put into a languishing Condition.

All which Evils, in our Apprehensions, can be only cured by the Sitting of annual Parliaments, until the Business of the Kingdom be done (as the Laws for holding Parliaments do intend) that being the only Means to keep the whole Administration of the Government in due Order, and therefore the Peace of the Kingdom inviolable; which Parliaments shall (as hath been said heretofore) constantly inspect the Effects of all Councils given to his Majesty: none will dare advise him against his own and the Kingdom's Interest, whereby only the People may enjoy what was left them by their Ancestors, and Justice may be done upon all dangerous Offenders and Conspirators, against his Majesty, and the Religion, Laws, and Liberties, of the Subjects.

We therefore humbly offer it as our Request, that your Worships, and this Court, will (in that most acceptable and effectual Way, which shall seem most to your Wisdom) make their most humble and earnest Desires and Prayers known to his Majesty, for the immediate Holding of a Parliament, which may sit for such time as the imminent Danger of his Majesty, and the whole Kingdom, hath made it necessary and indispensable; that so his Subjects may enjoy the Benefit of the Law, as the Constitution of the Government intends them in their Parliament; which is, to make sufficient Provision for the Safety of his Majesty, and the Security of the whole Kingdom, in their Religion, Laws, and Liberties.

And your Petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

(z) But if the Churchmen were thus forward with their Obituaries to the Throne, the Lawyers demurred; as may be learn'd from the following Paper, which excellently well sets forth the Intrigues and Ferment of the Times:

" The Transgression at the Middle-Temple, concerning an Address lately proposed by it made to his Majesty from thence, June the 16th, 1681.

Some Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple did some time since set on foot a Design of an Address to his Majesty, and having against the Form of it, at several Meetings at a Tavern, upon Thursday last the Promoters of it, being in Number Sixty-Eight, (whereof by far the greatest Part were young Gentlemen, who came to the House) brought it into the Common-Hall, and proposed the passing of it there, as the Act of the Society; but it not meeting with the desired Reception, they retir'd to the Tavern, leaving about Seventy-two of the Bar-riers, and a great Number of the Students, in the Hall; and after some time a Gentleman came from them to inform the Society, that the Gentlemen at the Droit-Tower had agreed upon an Address, and resolved upon one of their Number to carry it to Whinler: But the Gentlemen assembled in the Hall proceeded to consider the Proceedings of the Addressers, and after about two Hours Debate thereof, they agreed upon a Declaration relating to it, and appointed some of their Number to present it the Day following to the Bar; which being accordingly done, after the Debate thereof, it produced the following Orders, viz.

Resolved, by all the Masters of the Bench, with six Cases, that if any Person, Members of this Society, do take upon them to call a General Assembly in this House in Parliament, without the Leave of the Masters of the Bench, 'tis an Act unwarrantable, and contrary to the Orders and Government of this Society.

Resolved, That those Members of this Society, that took upon them to call a general Assembly of the Gentlemen of this House to meet in the Hall Yesterday, are guilty of the Breach of the Orders and Government of this House.

Resolved, That the Bar-riers and Gentlemen of this House, who opposed the disorderly and irregular Proceedings of the Assembly which met in the Hall Yesterday, and who disapproved the same, and declar'd their Dislike thereof, have the Thanks of the Masters of the Bench for so doing. And their Masterships do concur with the said Bar-riers and Gentlemen in every Part of the Declaration which they then made, and have since deliver'd in Writing to their Masterships.

Which Declaration, as it was subscribed by Seventy-two Bar-riers, and a great Number of Gentlemen under the Bar, follows in these Words, viz.

We the Bar-riers and Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple, being assembled in the Middle-Temple Hall, do declare, That there has been no Parliament of this Society regularly summoned or assembled this Day; nor that the Gentlemen of this Society have this Day conformed to any Address, or other Act whatsoever (except what is here declared); and therefore, if any Person whatsoever shall pretend that any Address, or other Act, was this Day made or done by the Consent of this Society, the same is altogether false and scandalous, and contrary to the Statute of the Bar-riers and Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple.

It having been said abroad, about the Beginning of the last Week, that some Gentlemen of Gray-Inn were endeavoring to procure Hands to an Address, by way of Thanks to his Majesty for his late Declaration, which they intended to offer to the Bar for their Approbation and Concurrence; a great Company of Gentlemen thereupon met in the Hall, on Tuesday last at Noon, to withstand and oppose such a Design, in case they should find any to proceed in it. Which, too, it thurted those who were the Promoters of the said Address; yet apprehending themselves to be engaged, that they could not handsomely retreat, they apply'd themselves to the Bar, which is the governing Part of the Society, for a Perpetuo, which is in some respect the same that a Parliament is in the Temple: But the Bar, upon mature Deliberation, humbly conceiving, that the Matters which the Address related unto so ways belong'd unto them to judge of, or pronounce concerning it, did unanimously resolve to grant a Perpetuo in order to say such Purpose. Yet those who were the Favourers of the Address, instead of being discouraged by the Entertainment which they met with from the Bar, continuing not only to make a Perpetuo in favour of what they intended, but giving out that they would cause the Bell to ring for assembling themselves together that were inclined to fabricate it, gave occasion to the Gentlemen of the Bar-Mess, on Wednesday at Noon, to desire the Bench, that nothing relating to the Society might be receiv'd; but what was, according to the Rules and Orders of the House, arriv'd with them thro' their Hands. Which the Bench readily agreed unto, as also to some other things, by way of Request, which were represented unto them, as appears by the Order of the Bench heretofore published. There being no other regular Way then left, for the Promoters of the Address to compass the Concurrence of the Society, but by applying themselves to those of the Bar-Mess, they accordingly made a faint Tender of the Paper unto them, which they were desirous to have pass under that Name; but why, as the same Session, they refused to allow those Gentlemen Time or Liberty to consider it, or examine the Tendency of it, they, as became Persons of Wisdom and Justice, instead of interceding themselves to hand or recommend it to the Bench, claim'd having any thing to do with it. All Men acquainted with this Affair, besides such as were too far inclin'd to withdraw, thought that hereby there was an Issue put to that Design: But it appears false, that what they could not proceed to be the Act of the Society, they carried on as their own. Nor doth the Society further concern themselves about it as their own; for only to let the World know, that all the Bench (save Sir William Scroggs alone, Son of the Lord Chief Justice) two Parts of three of the Bar-riers that are now in Town, and the Majority of the Students, refused giving the least Concurrence unto it, being persuaded, through the Knowledge which they have of the Laws, that it was not a Matter any ways proper for them to meddle with.

The before-mentioned Order of the Bench of the Society of Gray-Inn is as follows:

Upon the Complaint of many of the ancient Bar-riers and Members of this Society, made at this Perpetuo: That several Gentlemen of this Society, some of whose Names appear in Common, say as Defendants, and desire the Revocation of the House, and others have taken military Employments upon them, and others without Cause and with Contempt, for these two Days last past here, in a tumultuous Manner, assembled themselves in the Common-hall of this Society (being the House there) and in an irregular and disorderly Way recompos'd the Bar, and by getting upon the Cap-board and Tables in the said Hall, with loud Acclamations, and Singing up their Hats, did very much disturb the Peace, and infringe the ancient good Government of this Society, which, if not prevented, may prove of dangerous Consequence; and therefore did give that this Perpetuo would take into their Consideration, and provide some Way to redress the same for the future. This Perpetuo being greatly sensible of the same, and taking themselves oblig'd to do thereto, they thereunto unanimously declare, That if any Person or Persons, Members of this Society, shall do at any time hereafter promote or abet any Tumult, Insurrection, or outrageous Assembly, contrary to the Peace, Order, and good Government of this Society, such Person or Persons shall be justly esteemed traitors and unworthy to be and continue Members of this Society; and that they will proceed against them accordingly. And for the further Preservation of the Peace and Quiet of this Society, it is ordered, That, for the future, no Applications, upon any public Matter whatsoever, be made to the Bench, sitting in the Hall, from any Members of this Society, but by the Bar-Mess; the same being according to the ancient Custom and Usage of the House: And that this Order and Declaration be publicly forward once in every Term, as in like Cases.

As for Lincoln's-Inn, there has been none so hardy as to propose any such Address: And when it was set on foot in the Middle-Temple, it was rejected. So that we have the Sentiments of all the Inns of Court against it, whose Judgments are certainly as valuable in this Case as any of the Addressers: One of Lord Somers's Colleagues, vol. xxix.

first and best exprefs their Duty and Gratitude to their Sovereign, at this time especially, when the seditious Endeavours of unreasonable Men have made it necessary to assert the ancient Loyalty of the English Nation, &c. That we were not seen in those loyal Crouds, but rather chose to stand by and applaud their honest and religious Zeal, cannot be imputed to the Want of it in ourselves: For it is, at present, the great Honour of this your University to be eminently stedfast in our Duty, and to suffer for it, as much as the Calumnies and Reproaches of seditious and malicious Men can inflict upon us; and that they have hitherto been able to do no more, that they have not proceeded to Plunder, Sequestration, &c. as once they did; next to the over-ruling Providence of Almighty God, is only due to the Royal Care and Prudence of your most Sacred Majesty, who gave so seasonable a Check to their arbitrary and insensit Undertakings.

But no earthly Power, we hope, no Menaces, nor Misery, shall ever be able to make us renounce or forget our Duty. We will still believe and maintain, That our Kings derive not their Titles from the People, but from God; that to him only they are accountable, that it belongs not to Subjects, either to create or censure, but to honour and obey their Sovereign, who comes to be so by a fundamental hereditary Right of Succession, which no Religion, no Law, no Fault nor Forfeiture, can alter or diminish. Nor will we abate of our well-instructed Zeal for our most holy Religion, as it is profess'd, and by Law establish'd, in the Church of England; that Church, which hath so long stood, and still is, the Evoy and Terror of her Adversaries, as well as the Beauty and Strength of the Reformation.

It is thus, Dread Sir, that we have learn'd our own, and thus we teach others their, Duty to God and the King; in the conscientious Discharge of both which, we have been so long protected and encouraged by your Majesty's most just and gracious Government; that we neither need nor desire any other Declaration than that Experience, for our Assurance and Security for the future. In all which Grace and Goodness, Great Sir, we have nothing to return; we bring no Names and Seals, no Lives and Fortunes, well capable of your Majesty's Service, or at all worthy of your Acceptance; nothing but Hearts and Prayers, Vows of a zealous and lasting Loyalty; our Selves and Studies, all that we can, or ever shall be able to, perform, which we here most sincerely promise, and most humbly tender to your Majesty's Feet; a mean and a worthless Present; but such a one as we hope will not be disdain'd by the most gracious and indulgent Prince that Heaven ever bestow'd upon a People.

As Compliments are the Currency of the Court, and as in that Specie the King was rich enough to answer any Bills, that even the Clergy could draw upon him, his Majesty seem'd resolv'd, in his Reply, if possible, to outflatter the Flatterer: "He made no Doubt of the Loyalty of the University, nor that they would always act up to what they had declar'd.—There was no Church in the World, he said, that taught and practis'd Loyalty so conscientiously as that of England; and that for his Part, they might rest assur'd, That he would always be the Defender of that Church, whatever might be alledg'd to the contrary.

And now it was, that those who had laid such Stress on the Voice of the People, in the Article of Petitioning, finding their own Artillery thus turn'd upon them, took as much Pains to shew, that the Voice of the People was no more than common Air, passive under every Impulse: That the Offers of Lives and Fortunes to Charles the King, were worth no more than the like Offers to Richard the Protector: That out of the sixteen hundred thousand who vow'd to live and die with him, not one drew a Sword for him: That the most Noife at this time, was made by the most contemptible Boroughs: That the great Cities and Corporations had declin'd the Service, as had the Benchers of the Inns of Court: That the Muster-Roll of the Addressers would make but a very insignificant Figure against those who had either refus'd to join, or openly oppos'd them: That the most active Instruments upon this Occasion, were either Bankrupt Tradefmen, disgrac'd Attornies, or pragmatistical meddling Priests: That even where they had been obtain'd, not one in ten, in some Places, and scarce one in an hundred in others, had given their Concurrence: That if his Majesty plac'd any real Confidence in the unmeaning Professions of such an impotent Rabble, he would do well to call a Parliament, that they might shew the Greatness of their Power and Interest, by more solid Services: And that even of these, the most rational and substantial, when calmly shewn the natural but pernicious, Tendency of such Proceedings, had solemnly profess'd, That they would sooner be hang'd at their own Doors, than be intentionally necessary to the establishing a despotic Rule over a free Nation.

These and many more things of the like nature were set forth in a Pamphlet, call'd, An Impartial Account of the Nature and Tendency of the late Addresses. But the People were now deaf to the Voice of the Clamour. Addressing was now become the Fashion, as Petitioning had been before; and that bare Word was found to have more Authority than all other Considerations.

In short the Flow of Opposition was spent, and the downward Stream of Loyalty carry'd all before it; many were even sordid or frantic enough to forego, publicly, all the (*) Hold they had left of their Liberties, to quit

These who had magnify'd the Voice of the People in Petitioning, do try it in Addressing.

(*) One Fleaur, of Bristol, had been presented in the preceding Year by the Grand-Jury of that City, for saying, "The King is unwill to govern by a Parliament, and that he doth not raise an Army, and govern by the Sword: There are several Gentlemen in Stony-Strait ready to assist him, to my Knowledge; and the Bishop of Bath and Wells is gone up to acquaint him with it."

all the Protection they were entitled to by the Constitution, to declare in express Terms against Parliaments, to rush into voluntary Servitude, to call on the King in (a) Print to assume an absolute Power, to make his Will a Law, and to take off the Head of him, who should dare to murmur at it.

It is, perhaps, unfair, in the general, to make a whole Party answerable for all the Extravagances of all the Madmen that may belong to it. But when every Extravagance of almost every kind, is not only tolerated, but encourg'd and rewarded, no tolerable Reason can be assign'd for not placing every particular Article to the general Account; nor tolerable Excuse can be made for not doing so. Thus in the Case before us, he was esteem'd most loyal, who went farthest in giving up the Laws; and the best Citizen who was most assiduous to betray the Commonwealth. Whence it follows, that he who first directed the Bias of the Bowl, is answerable for the Cast.

But this Victory, however unexpected, or sudden, or complete, was to be made known to the Public by Facts as well as Noise. It was now resolv'd to make the Faction feel the Power they had desy'd, not only to mortify, but to subdue them; and all by Form of (b) Law.

And here begin the Lamentations of those Writers who side with the Exclusionists, and the Idolaters of those who idolize the Prerogative. All of whom, of the last that is to say, with Mr. North at their Head, justify the Proceeding by alluding to the Provocation; Acknowledging, indeed, That it was a dangerous Cafe to the Public, and in other Times might have had fatal Effects: But alledging withal, That ill Actions give Colour to mischievous Precedents; that Omnia dat qui iusta negat, quod remedia desituntur ipsa reculet; and that some Governments would have resorted to Force, and justify'd it on the bare Pretence of what in this Cafe was notorious: But chusing to forget, that summum jus est summa injuria; that in national Cafes, the Innocent are involved with the Guilty; and that whatever it may be in Religion, in Politics it is the unpardonable Sin to visit the Iniquities of the Fathers upon the Children.

Of these legal Persecutions we have already had some Taste in the Cafes of Harrington, (c) Darr, &c. But merely to run down Individuals did not come up to the Views of the Ministry, nor the great Use that was to be made of the Crisis: The whole Herd were now become Royal Game; and among these the Disenters were first singled out as being most obnoxious to the Government, for having aided and assisted the Faction with all their Might, and most at the Mercy of the Laws.

They, on the other hand, were soon aware of the Storm, and also that the Opinion of Resolutions of the Court to mortify the Faction, and to begin with the Dissectors.

(a) In a Piece call'd, An Apology from the Royal Party to the King's most Sacred Majesty's humble Petition, from the most Honble of Commons met, by Law, the 2<sup>d</sup> of 1st of disaffected Members; which contains the following Passages:

"Dread Sovereign, You are the Object on which all our Eyes are fix'd; you are the Center in which the Hopes and Desires of all loyal Hearts are lodg'd. Now is the Time to make yourself a King, and us a happy People, or never. If you put on an unlikeliest Resolution, you will encourage and strengthen your Enemies to stand by you to the last; which we are resolv'd to do, if you force us not from you: And this will not a little tame the Insolency of those bad Men, who brand all those who stand up for your Rights and Prerogatives with that scandalous Name Popish. All those honest Gentlemen, who had a Desire to serve their Country by being Parliament-men, because they oppos'd the Rump Faction, they and all their Friends were Popish, rank, inherited Popish. If these Men can make us Popish at this rate, we shall have Popery among us before we know where we are: And really I think we have no great Reason to be so much afraid on; for 'tis come to that, that you shall not hear of an honest Cavalier, say force an honest Man, but presently he is a Popish."

Sir, you have been silent too long; therefore, since you have given us your Royal Answer, that you Love and will defend your Right and Majority, by which you are resolv'd to govern, let us hear you roar like the King of Lions, when next you meet your Parliament cry Ho! to them, and Ho! again, till (like your Predecessor Henry VIII.) you make them tremble. Sir, remember you are as well King of France as England; therefore let not the French King be a greater Monarch than yourself! At least, for a time, shew yourself as valiant over your People as he is; and, since that Law is your Masthead, like him tell them Je suis le jehou, and take off the Head of that Man who shall dare to open his Lips to contradict it: And be assur'd that this Way of Governing shall gain you more Friends in one Day, than all your Compliance to the unreasonable Demands of your Parliament shall gain you in an Age.

Sir, the first thing you are to do is to know your Enemies, and then to arm yourself against them: You cannot have forgotten their Men by whom your Royal Father fell, and pardon you to Banishment: These are the Men, Sir, who like you to boldly at your Crown; and therefore beware your Head. You cannot therefore persuade yourself, that the Murderers of the Father can ever love the Son. But, lest your Majesty should mistake these Men, and think them to be your Friends, our famous Salomonian Doctor (Quint) hath nam'd them thus: For he says (and what he says with us is Gospel) They they are Popish in Masquerade, disguis'd in the Habit and Manners of the good Protestants. So that 'tis to be hop'd your Majesty will not trust some of them, nor any thing that looks like his kind of Cattle. We humbly therefore beg, that the next Parliament you will take a View of your House of Commons, that you may know the Members of which it is compos'd; and, if there be any of these disigu'd Popish there, that they may be tor'd out; that is not a Place for them; for the Law says, No Popish shall sit in the House. If therefore there be any there who have imbruid their Hands in your Father's Blood, they are disigu'd Popish, they must sit out. If there be any there who have imbruid their Swords against their lawful Sovereign, and appear'd in open Rebellion against him, they are the same, they must sit out; for they are all Popish in Masquerade. Or if there be any of the Sons or Trust Men, they are the same Pleth and Blood, and they'll prove themselves so: Instead I'll warrant you, they have suck'd in their Father's Disloyalty and bloody Nature with their Milk, which 'tis to be fear'd, they will never digest so long as they have an Hour to live; therefore they must sit out. And when the House is thus purg'd of their kind of Cattle, we may hope to see good times again; and not till then; for, believe it, Sir, they are so glutted with the Spoil and Sweet of their last Rebellion, that they will now be Cavaliers or nothing; which Heaven and your Majesty must prevent. Out of the Last Somers's Collection, vol. 24.

(b) Even Hawley, a Lawyer of these Times, of the Anti-Court Party, bears Witness, That a certain Nobleman, who had borne a considerable Character in the King's Councils, complaining to him, That his Majesty had been misled by the Advice of his Lawyers; he said his Lordship, whether the King put his Judges and Council upon doing what was done, without considering whether it was legal, according to the Common Yogues, or whether his Lawyers first said'd him, that what was to be done, was Law? To which his Lordship answer'd upon his Honour, That the King's Council at Law, first said'd, that the King might do by Law, what he would have done, before he command'd them to do it. Hawley's Remarks on the Trials of Vintners, &c. p. 18.

(c) Whose real Fault was, the presenting the Taxation Petition; but the Cavaliers found to punish him was, for fraying, softly and maliciously, said the Indictment, "That the Subjects had but two Means to redress their Grievances: One by Petitioning, the other by Rebelling." And this the Court was pleas'd to construe into Rebellion, tho' he made it plainly appear in his Defence he had no rebellious Intents (because he had said at the same time, "God forbid there should be a Rebellion: I would be the first Man to draw my Sword against a Rebel."

the Commons in their Favour, which had been represented as so criminal by the King's Declaration, would rather expose them more to the Fury of it, than afford them the least Shelter. They had, therefore, recourse to the Press, and set forth a Pamphlet, call'd, A short History of the Life and Death of the Act made 35 of Eliz. Cap. 1. to retain the Queen's Subjects in their due Obedience; attempting to prove, That the said Act was, to all Intents and Purposes, expir'd; for that it was temporary in its first Formation: That tho' it was several times reviv'd, the last, viz. 1. Jac. was, with this Restriction, ill the End of the first Session of the next Parliament. And in the said next Parliament, no Notice was taken of it: That, therefore, it appear'd to be the Intention of the Legislature to revive it on the 21st of King James, and also to continue it in other subsequent Parliaments. Yet, as it was absolutely dead before the time specify'd in the Act for adjudging it to be in force; and the Word, Reviv'd, was not made use of, all was deficient; and the said Act to be esteem'd, notwithstanding, a Nullity: And finally, that tho' in the 16th of the King, in the Act against Conventicles, it was again declar'd to be in Force; yet as the Act, itself, had long since expir'd, it must be concluded that the Virtue of the said declaratory Clause expir'd with it."

To this it was answer'd by the Voice of Authority in the Gazette, to undeceive his Majesty's loyal Subjects: That the next Parliament, 12 Jac. refer'd to as above, was held to be no Parliament, because nothing was done therein: That, indeed, there was yet another which sat, 18 Jac. and pass'd only a Bill of Subsidies. After which the Doubt arose whether the Act in question was not expir'd: That nine of the Judges were of Opinion it was; and that to remedy that Defect, the Parliament 21 Jac. not only reviv'd both that and fifty-seven other Laws, but adjudg'd them to have been in force ever since the last Session of King James's first Parliament: That in fact so they were, by virtue of 1 Jac. That the latter Continuance ran clear of the declaratory Law, 16 Car. 2. and that tho' the said Conventicle was expir'd, there was another of greater Force, 22d of the King, yet in being.

Whoever had the best of the Argument, the Dissenters no sooner saw this open Denunciation of the Wrath of the Court, than they knew it would be decided against them. As their last Resort, therefore, they endeavour'd to terrify and intimidate in their turn, by crying out, That before those in Power let loose the penal Laws against them, they would do well to consider (what they themselves forgot, when the Papists were sacrific'd for the Good of the Cause) the Temper of the English Nation in general, who were apt to be tenderly touch'd with Compassion, for those who suffer'd merely for Conscience Sake: That, even in the blind and bloody Reign of Queen Mary, when Cruelty had the Sanction of Devotion, and Superstition had still her Foot on the Necks of the People, the Horror conceiv'd at He-refy, soon gave way to the Horror arising from a just Sense of the Calamities of those who were punished for it: That even the long Parliament, who, under the Management and Directions of the Church had been the Authors of all the new Laws against Dissenting Protestants, found it reasonable, at last, to untwist their own Web, and to prepare a Bill for the Union of all Protestants in the Year 1672, which was to have been an Act of Mercy to those very Dissenters they had before so eagerly prosecuted: That as all these antichristian Proceedings would be imputed to the Duke, it would fill the Nation with astonishing Apprehensions of his Reign; and the general Conclusion would be, that Severities now were to serve as Precedents, to authorize his Cruelties hereafter: That three Parts in four of the Kingdom would mediately or immediately be involv'd in, or affected by, the Sufferings of the Dissenters: That, as the Fruits of their Industry and Commerce were an Access to the Commonwealth; so the Commonwealth would be proportionably impair'd by their Losses and Impoverishment: That, tho' Empton and Dudley took care to shelter their Oppressions under the Umbrage of the Law, they were nevertheless hang'd for being notorious Oppressors, to pacify the Clamours of an injur'd, exasperated People: That possibly the Fanatics, furr'd with their Sufferings might, by way of Retrial, indict many of his Majesty's conforming Subjects, upon other penal Statutes, to which, on one Account or another, all might be found liable: That, in case they should, it would shew too manifest Partiality in the Government, to grant Noli prosequi in favour of one half of the People, while it countenanced and encouraged Prosecution against the rest: That it would be little for the Reputation of those in Power, to see the whole Kingdom made to resemble a Cock-pit, and his Majesty's Lieges turn'd loose to peck out each other's Eyes: That if these Fanatics were thus inclin'd to retaliate on others the ill Treatment prepar'd for themselves, they wanted not considerable Advantages, even from the Statutes themselves, to lessen, if not wholly destroy, some considerable Branches of the Revenue: That, in particular, it would grievously affect the Excise, if Ale-house-keepers should be indicted on the Statute of the 21 Jac. cap. 7; which enacts, That whoever sells a Pot or Quart of Ale for above a Penny, should, for every such Offence, forfeit twenty Shillings; from which the King could no ways relieve them, seeing the Clause in that other Statute of the 22 & 23 of his Majesty, by which they were indemnified, was wholly expir'd: That even the important Act which settled the Excise was not so discreetly and cautiously pens'd, but that Occasion might be taken to question the Validity of it in some Particulars, which, if overthrown, would also overthrow the Act itself: That, according to the nice Distinction of the Sages in the Law, on the Prerogative Side, viz. That, tho' Petitioning was the Right of the Subject, the King might suppress tumultuous Petitioning, the Words of the Act did not extend to Conventicles, unless they were seditionis Conventicles: That if it should be found that the Parliament which met May 8, in the 13th of the King, had continued or sat beyond the Time prescrib'd by the 16 Car. I. cap. 1. For preventing of Inconveniences happening by the long Intermiſſion of Parliaments, before they once thought of repealing that Statute, which they did not till the Session that began March 16, in the 16th of the King, it would be found also, that the Laws against Dissenters had not the Force and Validity which it was now prescrib'd they had: And that, however difficult and dangerous it might be to wrestle with Power, or however, in the general, unbecoming the Duty of a Subject, a rich and courageous People, driven to Despair by ill Usage, might think themselves justify'd by that ill Usage for so doing; and more for their Honour to run the Risk of the Contest, than to submit like Slaves to unmerited Punishments.

Spaul of Fitzharris's Story.

It is now Time to pursue the Thread of Fitzharris's Story; whose Case, as a Malefactor, both in Process and Event, is too well known to need a minute Exemplification here: But to know what Knave he was, according to the Expression of Mr. North, and what political Use was made of him and his Intrigue, calls for all the Lights that either Facts or Reasonings can furnish.

We left him in the Tower, whither he had been hurry'd, say the Court, that the Hope of Life and Fear of Death might not induce him to confess, not what was true, but what would best answer the wicked Purposes of the Commons; say the Commons, that he might not tell all, that is, expose to the Bottom the wicked Practices of the Court.

The Commons, as we have seen, resolv'd to be Prosecutors; by which means they hop'd to rescue the Prisoner once more out of the Hands of the Court; and the Court thought it worth a Dissolution to disappoint them. Both had, therefore, their Views; and it is not reasonable to suppose, that when two incens'd Factions drove so desperately against each other, that either was wholly in the right, or wholly in the wrong.

Mr. North, in his Examen, bestows a Number of Pages to prove, that Fitzharris, a known Spy of the Court, was, by the Arts of the Faction, decoy'd into Everard's Snare, purposely that, having the Gallows in sight, he might be wrought up to any Pitch, and influenced to swear any thing against any Person. On the contrary, Ferguson, more briefly, but as explicitly, affirms, that Fitzharris had a like Commission from the Court to decoy Everard, a known Tool of the Faction; with like Intention to force him to earn a Pardon, by swearing against Shaftsbury, and such other Persons as they thought most in their Way.

It has been said of Montecuculi and Turenne, the Pupil and the Master, in the Art of War, that the one had reduced it to such a Certainty in point of Rule and Practice, and the other had profited so effectually by his Lessons and Examples, that when they came to be Opposites, both always took the same Measures to carry the same Points; and the only Struggle lay in who should make the Experiment first. If therefore it may be admitted, that the Statesman's Science is capable of as much Method and Exactness as the Soldier's, both these Writers may have Truth on their Side; and that the old Proficient Shaftsbury had no otherwise the Advantage of his Kinſman Hallifax, than as he was serv'd by Everard with more Expedition, than his Antagonist by Fitzharris.

Not to err into unwarrantable Refinements; It no sooner appear'd that Fitzharris was preparing to play the Part of Dangerfield, and the Party to make the like Use of him, than the Court resolv'd, at all Hazards, to prevent them, and to make an Example of Fitzharris, who had already confess'd enough to forfeit the King's Mercy, tho' not enough to answer the Expectations of his new Employers.

But a Chief-Justice was first to be appointed: Serjeant lay under an Impeachment, as well as Fitzharris; and it would have rais'd much Clamour, to see one Delinquent sit in Judgment on another. Pemberton, who had before been a pious Judge, and gain'd Credit, says Howles, by being turn'd out, was pitch'd upon to succeed him, on the Recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, as Ferguson writes; Care having first been taken to be sure of his Opinion, as to Fitzharris; and whether he would venture to try him, in defiance of the Vote of the Commons. (d) Boldness, it seems, was the Characteristic of the Man; and Boldness was, at this time, look'd upon as the best, if not the only, Qualification for the Place; and this was so well understood, even without doors, that it became a common Remark on this Preferment, "That Sir Francis Pemberton was made the Lord Chief-Justice Serjeant."

Pemberton made Lord Chief-Justice.

The Court made use also of another Piece of Management, of which Mr. North could not be ignorant, and yet has not thought proper to touch upon. There was no Possibility

(d) We find the following Character of him in Mr. North's Life of his Brother the Lord Keeper, p. 222:

"The Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton was a better Practitioner than a Judge; for being made Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, he had a towering Opinion of his own Sense and Wisdom, and rather made than declar'd Law. I have heard his Lordship say, that, in making Law, he had outdone the King, Lords, and Commons. His Morals were very indifferent; for his Beginnings were debauched, and his Study and first Practice in the Goal: For having been one of the forced Tower-Bakers, and spent more than he had of his own, his Case forced him upon that Expedient for a Lodging; and there he made so good use of his Leisure, and busied himself with the Cases of his Fellow-Colleagues, whom he inform'd and advis'd so fully, that he was reputed the most notable Fellow within those Walls; and, at length, he came out a Sheriff at the Law. After that, he proceeded to study and practise, till he was eminent, and made a Serjeant; and, when Chief, became a great Ruler, and suffer'd nothing to stand in the Way of his Authority.

To this Character two short Cases are annex'd, to show that he was neither a fair Practitioner, nor an upright Judge.

lity of taking off Fitzbarris (which was a thing resolv'd upon, not only by way of Vengeance on him, but to terrify all other Knaves of the same Class from presuming to fancy that there was any other Name under Heaven, but that of the King, by which they might be saved) except by the Evidence of Everard, and his two Evesdroppers, Waller and Smith, who were all Creatures of the Faction, and had given out, They would appear as Witnesses no where, but in Support of the Impeachment before the Lords. Waller, in particular, had many Pretences to excuse himself, as having been a Member of that very Parliament which sent up the Impeachment; and one of the Majority who had carry'd those minatory Votes after the said Impeachment had been rejected by the Lords. He was also so encumber'd with his Debts, that he durst not shew his Head. Ways and Means were, however, found to conquer all these Difficulties. Ferguson affirms he was drawn in with the Hopes of matching his Son to Chiffinches's Daughter, and that he had a (e) Protection bestow'd on him to screen him from his Creditors. And Huxley, without expressly naming Waller, only says, "He was prevail'd upon to give Evidence; but by what Means is best known to himself." Both Everard and Smith were, in like manner, prevail'd on to come in; and afterwards appear'd openly for the Court, as Mr. North, himself, acknowledges in his Examen, p. 301, and elsewhere, whether from an Impulse of Conscience, or less refin'd Motives, there is no certain Grounds to pronounce.

The way being thus smooch'd, Fitzbarris was indicted of High Treason for compassing and imagining the Death of the King; and the Libel, before quoted, was brought in Evidence against him, as the Overt-Act requir'd by the Law to convict the Prisoner capitally. Everard, Waller, and Smith, fallen'd this upon him, after the manner, and with the Circumstances above, perhaps, prematurely specify'd. In short, they went as far in support of the Indictment, as they could have done in the Impeachment: And what was farther remarkable, it is not improbable, that they mind their Evidence; that they said just enough to hang the Prisoner; that they suppress'd every Circumstance which might give Umbrage to those in Power; and that this was foreseen by the Party they had abandon'd: For after the Evidence for the King had been clos'd, Oates depos'd, in Behalf of the Prisoner, that Everard had acknowledg'd to him, that the Libel was of his own composing; that it was to have been sent in Penny-Post Letters to the Leaders of the Commons: That the Court had a hand in it: That he, the King, had given Fitzbarris Money, and would give him more, if he had Success; And was follow'd by Colonel Manfel and Mr. Hunt, who both testify'd, That Sir William Waller had told them, and others in Company with them, That, tho' when he made Fitzbarris's Affair first known to the King, his Majesty had given him a great many Thanks, and acknowledg'd it to be one of the greatest Services he had ever receiv'd, he had not long taken his Leave, before two worthy Gentlemen inform'd him, that the King had said, That he, Waller, had broken all his Measures, and that he would have him taken off one way or another.

Now Mr. North who has undertaken to answer one of the most negligent and inaccurate of all the Anti-Court Historians, possibly, that his own Apology might appear with the greater Force, labours much to expose the Inconsistency of their Heat-fay-Evidence, and finds much Cause of Triumph, in that Waller and Everard, who were both in Court, never open their Lips to confirm what Oates and his two Associates advanced. But Everard could not be expected to accuse himself. And Huxley, on the other hand, affirms, that Hunt, in a particular manner, appeal'd to Waller as to the Truth of what he said; and asks with a good deal of Reason, why the Court did not take upon them to oblige him to answer? If those things were vented upon the Trial maliciously and falsely, only for the sake of the Impression they might make, at the Rebound, on the People, as Mr. North would have it believ'd, why were they not confuted in open Court? And if Waller was still in the Bosom of the Faction, for the same Author insists he never was otherwise, why did not he give an additional Credit to the Story, by avowing it to be true? And if he was still obnoxious to those in Power, and had no such worthy Gentlemen to produce, why was not his Forgery detected and expos'd? The Weight of the Court was obviously in the Scale of the Government; and it every where appears, that all the Use was made of it that could be made.

To pass on to the Residue of the Prisoner's Defence; the great Drift of it was to shew, that he acted in the whole Affair as in his Vocation, that is to say, as of a Spy for the Court. He call'd upon his Cousin Mrs. Wall and her Lady, the Duchets of Portsmouth, to do him the Justice to own, that he had received two hundred and fifty Pounds from the King for his Services in that Capacity. But tho' they did not deny that Money had been given him, they would allow no other Motive than Charity; except that Mrs. Wall added, as if the Secret was extorted from her, that it was also for bringing in the Lord Howard of Essex. That Lord also avow'd, that he had visited the Duchets of Portsmouth, at the Instance of the Prisoner, in the Name of his Majesty; and that he had, in return, recommended him to her Grace, as a fit Object of his Majesty's Bounty. Sheriff Cornish depos'd,

(e) Which, according to Ferguson, was withdrawn as soon as the Trial of Fitzbarris was over; and being abandon'd also by his old Friends, whom he, it seems, had abandon'd first, he was forced to quit the Kingdom, and soon after dy'd.

pos'd, That when he waited on the King, to inform him, that Fitzbarris was inclin'd to make Discoveries; his Majesty acknowledg'd, that he, Fitzbarris, had offer'd him his Service, as a Discoverer; that, about three Months before, he had told him he was in pursuit of a Plot; and that he had countenanced him, and given him Money. The Secretaries of State, who were present, being demanded, whether the King had not own'd the Prisoner, as one entertain'd in his Service? Sir Leoline Jenkins reply'd, that he could not recollect that the King had ever made any use of him. Lord Conway admitted, that he had heard his Majesty say, he had formerly employ'd him in some trifling Things; but added, that he, the King, had never seen him, till the Day after he was taken up: And, for a Close of all, Fitzbarris himself alledg'd, that tho' the great Persons he had appeal'd to had thought fit to disown him, the Fact was notorious: That tho' Everard was now pleas'd to make a French Story of the Affair, he knew it was OTHERWISE: That he, Everard, then affirm'd he was well acquainted with the Lords Sbastian and Howard, and with all their Intrigues and Cabals in the City: That he, Fitzbarris, told him it would be of the greatest Consequence, to continue his Discoveries: That what he said to Everard was purely to draw him in to undertake and perfect the Libel: That all he had done was only to serve the King, by a Detection of the Designs against him: That he had no sooner got the Libel into his Possession, than he carry'd it to Whitehall: And that he was not ashamed to own, that he was employ'd by the King, though the Secretaries were so unkind to deny it.

Now the Article in his Plea which seem'd to conclude most in his Favour, namely, That he went with the Libel to Court as soon as he had receiv'd it, was in part confirm'd by Mrs. Wall; who acknowledg'd, that, on the Thursday before he was taken up, he came to her at Nine at Night, and desir'd to be introduced to his Majesty, as having something to communicate for his Service; and that she, dreading Mischief, it seems, referred him to the Secretary, and others. Thus far then it was clear, that, by what Person or Party soever insinuated to frame the Libel, in concert with Everard, or whatever Use was to be further made of it, he had no Design to publish it in order to stir up the People to a Rebellion; which was the Crime charg'd upon him by the Indictment. If it was a Trick of his own to make himself appear of Consequence at Court, and to authorise a Claim of more Money; or if, as the Faction gave out, it was a Conspiracy of the King against them, or if, as Mr. North so laboriously attempts to prove, it was a Conspiracy of the Faction against the King, still, there was no Shadow of Reason to convict him on the Statute of Treason; and in every one of these Cases, he was liable to the Laws as a Cheat. Hutcheson reasons to the same Point for several Folio Pages together: And North fancies he has answer'd him by an ironical Recapitulation of some Parts of the Libel, which was indeed prov'd to be written under Fitzbarris's Instructions; but, as Everard himself depos'd, (f) to be drawn in the Name of the Nonconformists, and put upon them; that is to expose them to the Fury of the Laws, not to let them in Arms against the King.

But, unfortunately for the Prisoner, Mrs. Fitzbarris's Wall depos'd, that he did not mention the Libel, when he press'd for Admittance to the King. It appear'd also, that he had loiter'd about, two Days afterwards with the Mischief in his Pocket: That he would have communicated it to the Earl of Arran, as a Matter of Curiosity; which his Lordship had, however, the Presence of Mind to divert, with some good Advice to Fitzbarris himself, not to busy himself with such dangerous things: And the Jury understanding the Proof of the Writing to contain the Proof of the Treason, entertain'd no other Scruple than such as related to themselves: They had the Votes of the Commons before their Eyes, and were afraid to judge a Parliamentary Cause. The Foreman call'd on the Bench for Advice, and receiv'd for Answer, That it was the unanimous Opinion of all the Judges of England, that the Prisoner was within the Jurisdiction of the Court. It is also affirm'd, that they had the Terrors of the People before their Eyes, as well as the Parliament; for the Hall was throng'd with the Anti-Court Party; and while the Hearing lasted, they, most unwarrantably, were ply'd with Papers, to dissuade them from finding the Prisoner guilty, as also with Threats, That, in case they did, they would have their Verdict to answer for to Parliament, and that the Nation would never desist till they had ruin'd them and their Families. And when withdrawing, some had the Insolence to say aloud, Find them guilty if you dare!

It has been already represented, that, by the Artifices of the Exclusionists, they had got the Gallows on their Side; or, at least, by their Power over Juries, they had gone a great Way towards it: In this they had acted cunningly, if not fairly: The labouring Oar was always on the Court-side; and all that the Witnesses could swear, or the Bench sanctify, was liable to be undone by a Verdict.

As well, therefore, as to appoint a proper Chief-Justice, and to work the Witnesses into a proper Temper, it was thought necessary also to try some Practices on the Jury. Ferguson asserts, that the Attorney-General (Sir Robert Sawyer) mov'd, that the Master of the Crown-Office might return the Panel, instead of the Sheriffs; and that, by way way of Authority, he produced a Statute of Henry VIII. no more to the Purpose, says he, than if he had produced a Sentence of the Bishop's-Court, pronouncing himself to be a good Lawyer. This was over-ruled by the Court: But, however, to qualify the Refusal, a Rule was made to take the Business out of the Under-Sheriff's Hands, who had hitherto been entrusted with it, and to oblige his Principals to take that Trouble on themselves. Howles adds farther, that, when the Trial came on, the Attorney-General challenged several without shewing Cause, and several for that they were no Freeholders; and his Challenges, of both Sorts, were allowed. Notwithstanding all which, Mr. North, having started an Objection, viz. that it looks a little oddly at first, that, in the Reign of Ignoramus, a Man should be convict of Treason, whether the Party who had the Issues of Life and Death in their Keeping would or no, ironically answers, that very good Men were found and return'd, and the Pannel was settled by due Advice, Care, and Consideration; who, but for a very odd Accident, had done what the Party expected from them. This Accident he explains as follows: "There were two Persons of the Name of Clew; one liv'd in the Country, and was of the Party; the other in Town, and abhor'd them: The Bailiff, thro' Mistake, or Laziness, or, what is more probable than either, Corruption, summons the latter; and, his Person not being known, he was sworn, and all the while taken for the good Man intended. But, after the Trial, when they were retir'd to consider their Verdict, and the ref began to chime in for acquitting, this false Brother insisted so strongly the other Way, that his Weight turn'd the Scale.

Thus, to the infinite Surprize both of the Faction who had resolv'd to save the Prisoner, and of him who had depended upon them, he was brought in Guilty."

It is fit, however, to observe, that, smoothly as this Story runs, it is liable to two Objections, which are easier to be started than solv'd: Namely, 1. If such previous Care was taken to settle the Pannel, and such Confidence was placed on the Return, what Occasion was there for either Importunities or Menaces, to force them on such a Verdict, as, it must be understood, they came pre-instructed and pre-engag'd to give, without any such additional Promptings? And, 2. If there were eleven sure Men against one, how is it to be accounted for, that That one should gain the Mastery, and those eleven submit to his Will and Pleasure, there being no Time for Argument, in half an Hour?

He is found Guilty.

For no longer, if the Record is to be depended upon, were they absent.

And now Fitzbarris, finding his Life was in the King's Hands, made another short Turn, and attempted to redeem it at the Expence of the Party. Indeed, from the Moment he was taken out of the Custody of the Sheriffs and lodg'd in the Tower, his Wife, who had a notable Concern in this whole mysterious Affair, had shewn a Disposition to play a double Part, as appear'd, upon the Trial, by the Evidence of Mr. Bullstrode. She had apply'd by Petition to the King, for Leave to visit her Husband; and his Majesty refer'd her to the Secretary of State: Saying he would have no Concern in it. She then made her Complaints to Mr. Bullstrode, who gave her to understand, there would be no Remedy, without a full Discovery of the Author of the Libel: Upon which she undertakes to prevail with her Husband to disclose the Secret, in case she might be permitted to see him. Mr. Bullstrode acquaints the King; who replies, If she will come and be examin'd, with all my Heart. Mr. Bullstrode lets her know his Majesty's Reply: She returns to Mr. Bullstrode at Midnight, pretending a Dread of having it known that she was taking any such Step; signifies a Willingness to obey his Majesty's Pleasure; and the next Day attends accordingly: But no sooner was she told that she was to appear before a Committee of Council, than she declar'd, Unless the King would speak with her alone, she would not open her Lips. And so ended this Negotiation.

This terrible Verdict, however, taught them to be less peremptory. Fitzbarris offers immediately to turn Evidence, and will all on the other Side: Names Lord Shaffsbury and Lord Howard. The Court think it worth their while to grant him a Hearing. He charges the latter with having given the Instructions on which the Libel was founded: This is confirm'd by his Wife and Maid, who alledge, the said Instructions were given in their Presence: Lord Howard was upon this taken up, examin'd, and committed to the Tower: But, notwithstanding the Merit of this notable Discovery, Sentence was pass'd on Fitzbarris, and no Regard was shewn to his Plea, "That it would be prejudicial to the King's Service to condemn him, before he had perfected his Evidence against Lord Howard." June the 9th was the Day of his Trial and Conviction: On the 12th Lord Howard was committed: On the 21st a Bill of Indictment was preferred against his Lordship, to the Grand-Jury of Edmonton; who finding the Evidence of the Mistress and the Maid (g) contradictory, says

(g) The whole Evidence on which the Bill was founded, was afterwards publish'd by the Direction of the Jury themselves, as follows:

Mr. Smith's Evidence:
He heard Mr. Fitzbarris say to Mr. Everard, That he could give no further Instructions that Night; for that he was to go that Night to Knightsbridge. And when Mr. Fitzbarris was gone, Smith and Everard, whether Mr. Fitzbarris was gone that Night? He said he was gone to the Lord Howard of Essex's House at Knightsbridge; and further said not.

Mr. Everard's Evidence saith, That he asked when he should complete his Instructions? Fitzbarris told him, That he could not do it that Night, nor the next Morning, for that he was to go to Knightsbridge that Night, or the Morrow Morning; and afterwards told him, he was to go to the Lord Howard of Essex's at Knightsbridge; and Fitzbarris came the next Day towards Night, and completed the said Libel, and corrected it in several Places. And Mr. Everard saith, at the Issuing of this Libel, Fitzbarris gave Everard Directions to take the Surries out of a printed

Ferguson, return'd it (b) Ignoramus; as a former Grand-Jury, under an opposite Influence, had done in the similar Case of the Countess of Peovis, accused by Dangerfield: And, on the very next Day, a Writ was issued out of the King's-Bench for the Execution of Fitzabarris on the first of July following.

After he was cast, it seems, a Rule had been made for Dr. Burnet to attend him, at his own Request; but he had no sooner declar'd against Lord Howard, than the Doctor turn'd his Back on him, and visited him no more: After which, he fell into the Hands of Doctor Hawkins, the Minister of the Tower, who made to good a Use of his Divinity, that he prevail'd with him to make and sign a Confession (which was the Authority of Mr. Norris, before-quoted) and which was in Substance as follows:

"That, as to himself, he was no farther concern'd in the Libel, than as employ'd to give the King Notice of such Matters: That this was his sole Motive in procuring it from Everard: That his Application to Mrs. Wall was, in order to discover it: And that the Money he had receiv'd from the King was really by way of Gratuity for his Services, and not as an Act of Charity: That Lord Howard had acquainted him of a Design to seize upon the King's Person, and to carry him into the City; where he was to be detain'd till he had conceded to the Desires of the Party: That one Hoyms and he were privy to this Design, and had several Meetings upon it with Lord Howard; who, for their Encouragement, had assur'd them, That the Settlement of Ireland was to be broken: That the additional Revenue of the Bishops was to be taken off, and, together with the Estates of Forty-nine other Persons, were to be shar'd among the Party.

That, while he was in Newgate, the Sheriffs Betted and Cornish came to him with a Token, which he knew to be a true one, from Lord Howard; and also the Heads of an Accusation from Everard against him, charging him to be a Court-Emiffary, or Tyrkish, put on by the King to put the Libel into Protestant Hands, to trapen them: That he declar'd upon his Death, he had no such Intent, nor was privy to any such Design: That the Sheriffs farther told him, the Parliament would impeach him; and that nothing would save his Life, but discovering the popish Plot: That they gave him great Encouragement, in the Name of Lord Howard, and said, that, if he would declare that he believ'd as much of the Plot as amounted to the introducing the (j) R. C., or if he could find out any that could criminate the Queen, R. H. [his Wife's] or make so much as a plausible Story to confirm the Plot, the Parliament would restore him to his Father's Estate, with the Profits thereof since the Restoration: That he, finding himself in Newgate, FETTER'D, moneyless, friendless, his Wife ready to lie in, and both her and his Children destitute of Subsistence, was, for their Relief and his own Preservation, not from any ambitious Motive, induced to comply: That the Sheriffs brought Instructions, which, they said, came from the Lords and Commons, who met that Day in order to address the King in his behalf, in case he thought proper to embrace their Proposals: That they nam'd Lord Shaftsbury, and others: That they dislike'd his formal Story of the Plot, Cornish saying, "Those were Things which had been cry'd about the Streets two Years before:" That he replying he could say no more, the Sheriff added, he was sorry for him; but nevertheless renew'd his Solicitations, and mention'd several Heads, which he was either to speak to, or to give up all Hopes of Life: That many of these Heads were the same with those afterwards taken in his Examination by a printed Pamphlet, call'd, The interested Letter in Roger L'Estrange, and to insert them into the said Libel.

Mrs. Fitzabarris saith, she saw the Lord Howard at her Husband's Lodgings (some short time before her Husband was made Prisoner) deliver a Paper to her Husband, and said, They were notable Heads; and would say, That when those things were put in order, the People would rise, and then they would seize the King, and keep him until he had pass'd the Bill of settling the Duke of York, and settling the Succession upon the Duke of Monmouth: And saith (reading the Paper left in her Husband's Chamber by the Lord Howard) she remembers these Expressions in that Paper: As it was the undoubted Right of the People to appoint a Popish Successor, so it was in their Power that would follow, and so on, and so on, in his Parliament. At which time Mr. Fitzabarris call'd for a Pen and Ink, and told his Wife that he had promised her to deliver that Paper in that hand; and she asking whether he was going to her Husband answer'd, He was going to Mr. Everard's Chamber to have that Paper drawn up: And before the Lord Howard went out of Mr. Fitzabarris's Chamber, Mr. Fitzabarris asked the Lord Howard what he should do for Money: To which the Lord Howard reply'd, Let me advise for that: And that within a Day or two her Husband brought her the Libel to his Wife, and read it to her: Upon the reading of which, she ask'd him whether Everard had drawn that Book out of those few Heads: Her Husband answer'd, Yes: for that Mr. Everard was a Man of Parts.

Mrs. Verrius French (Fitzabarris's Maid) saith, That being in her Master's Chamber, or Dining-room, she found the Lord Howard in the Drinking-room, and saw the Lord Howard give a Paper, and told him it was a notable thing, and bid him read it; and said, If they were ever published, the People would rise, and then we will seize upon the King, and keep him, until such time as he pass'd the Bill concerning the Exclusion of the Duke of York, and settle the Crown upon the Duke of Monmouth: And Mr. Fitzabarris asked him, what he should do for Money: The Lord Howard said, Mr. Verrius should have enough within a Week. And the said, he gave it for his Wife to read; and after she saw her Master copy it out; and asking, whether he would come in to Dinner? he answer'd, he had earnest Business at Gray's Inn, whether he was going.

Clayton and Treby, and the rest, which he did not speak to, related to the Queen, R. That when Clayton and Treby came to examine him, Clayton ask'd him, what he could say concerning Godfrey's Murder; and put him on recollecting himself: That what he had deposed concerning Father Patrick was forced out of him; and was not true: That Treby was with him Three Hours, or thereabouts: That he also press'd him on Godfrey's Death, saying, unless he could speak to that Murder, he said nothing: That he, Fitzbarris, then mentioning something which he had receiv'd from others, Treby ask'd him, if he could say no more: That he rejoin'd, Is not this enough to save my Life? am not I a Rogue enough? and Treby swore God's W—d! what were you ever but a Rogue? That Lord Shaftsbury said, You know more of these Matters than any Man: That Treby again would have him speak concerning the Confult, as that the Duke was at it, and also the Lords Bellois, Arundel, and Powis; you have seen them go to it at St. James's; without doubt they were there.—Do you but say it; we have those that will swear it.

That what he had said relating to the Queen and Duke, as to the Matter of Godfrey's Murder, he was put upon: That as to the threatening (k) Words he had sworn against Lord Danby, to the best of his Remembrance; he had really heard him utter such Words; but against whom, he had never Light enough to guess: That what de Puy had told him concerning that Nobleman, he had Reason to think was the Effect of Ill-will: That he was induc'd to charge his Lordship, as he had done; in hope to stave off his Trial till a Parliament should be summon'd: That they were the more desirous to fasten the Murder of Godfrey on Lord Danby, because the Crime of Murder was not infer'd in his Pardon: That he was heartily sorry for what he had said against the Queen, Duke, and Lord Danby; and heartily begg'd their Pardon.

That he had made this Confession and Declaration as a dying Man, and not to save his Life: That he called God and all his Angels to witness the Truth of it: That he renounced Mercy at the Hands of God Almighty, if it was not true: That he had made it freely, of his own voluntary Accord, without any manner of Promise made, or Hopes given him, of Life: And that he forgave all the World, (l) &c.

This Paper he sign'd in the Presence of three Persons (two of them Warders, and the third the Wife of one of them) who also attested it; and Dr. Hawkins threw in his Sanction by way of Postscript; in which he also declar'd, that he had more than once assur'd him, there was no Hope of his Life: that he knew of, nor of his Salvation, if he said any thing that he knew to be false: That, he continuing to admonish him in this manner, as he proceeded with his Narrative, Fitzbarris took occasion, at several Periods, to kneel down and solemnly to protest the Truth of every Word therein contain'd; and that all this he again declar'd upon the Faith of a Christian, and the Word of a Minister of the Gospel.

There

(k) According to Ferguson (Growth of Popery, Part II. p. 391) that he, Lord Danby, had sent him (Godfrey) of a long Errand. According to Bishop Burnet, vol. 1. p. 502, that he, Fitzbarris, had heard that Lord say in Windsor, that if (the Murder) might be done. The last of these Authors adds, That when the Court objected to the Jury, that what was said at Windsor did not lie before them, Fitzbarris reply'd, He had heard him say the same things at Whitehall. And again, "This was very gross; yet, upon to slight an Evidence, they found the Bill against the Lord Danby: And, when they were reproach'd with it, they said, a dubious Evidence was a sufficient Ground for a Grand-Jury. Yet another Doctrine was set up by the same Sort of Men, within a few Months." To illustrate this Matter yet farther, it is fit the Reader should know, that, in the Year 1690, a Paper was set forth with an Intent to fix the Guilt, Disgrace, and Punishment, of this Murder on Lord Danby; by insinuating, that Godfrey had highly incens'd his Lordship, by inspecting Danis's Discoveries to Coleman and the Duke; that he had even menac'd him for meddling with Things and Persons to much above him; that this was the Ground of Godfrey's Fears; that at one o'Clock on the Day he disappeared, he was known to have been at Lord Danby's; and that he took Water at Whitehall, with Mr. Christian, his Lordship's Gentleman; after which he was seen no more alive: And also, that Christian immediately publish'd an Answer to it; in which he asserts, That Lord Danby never had any Conference with Godfrey for several Months before his Death; and offer'd to submit to be hang'd, if any Man could prove he was within fifty Miles of London, on the Day mention'd, on condition the anonymous Author of the Charge would come forward, and expose himself to the like Suffering, in case he could not make good what he had said against Mr. Christian. Both these Tracts, and a frivolous Reply to the last, are to be found in Lord Somers's Collection, p. xx.

(l) This is a fair and impartial Brief of this Paper, as it was made public by Dr. Hawkins; and yet Mr. Edward, upon what Authority I am not able to guess, has been pleas'd to insert the following Things in his Book, p. 1010, 1011, as said by Fitzbarris, tho' not in that order his dying Narrative:

"That there was a Design laid by the Protestant Party to seize the Person of the King, and carry him into the City, and there detain him till he had consented to call a Parliament; which should be till the Exclusion-Bill against the Duke was pass'd, all civil Conventions remov'd, Men of their quality put into Prison of Trust, the Militia settled, the Navy put into good Hands, and all Grievances redress'd according to their liking: And, had this Design succeeded, the Bishops, and others of the Clergy, would have suffer'd severely, The Party engag'd in this Design, he said, were Men of Interest, and could have sixty thousand Men at Command, at a short Warning: That to his Knowledge HAYNES was surpris'd with to come in against the Queen, the Duke, and the Earl of Danby, who were the chief Persons aim'd at; and that a considerable Person said to him, 'I promise, Fitzbarris, find me out Men, that will swear the Murder of Godfrey against the Duke,' which he, to honour him, said, 'There are Men, if there were Money' to which the Person reply'd, 'Find me the Men, and the Money' shall not be wanting.' He moreover declar'd, that a Paper of Intrusions was put into his Pocket in Westminster-Hall, wherein he was bid so 'speak boldly, and not spare the Queen, the King himself; and if he did not speak against the Queen, his Royal Highness, the Lord Powis, and his Lady, Lord Arundel, Lord Bulloigne, Lord Peters, Lord Danby, and Lord Pembroke, all his Friends would forsake him.' At another time he assur'd him, 'That his Wife last Night had whisper'd to him, how a certain Person had been with her from a great Lord, to desire him, to say nothing when he came to die, and they did not value what he had said to Dr. Hawkins elsewhere; and if he could persuade him not to declare any thing against the Party, when he came to be executed, they had promis'd to continue their Allowance to her of three hundred a Week, and to make her the same Present of three hundred Guineas, on the Day of his Execution, which should have been made him on the Day of his Trial, had he been acquitted.' And when he reduc'd his Confession to Writing, he often said; 'His Confession would injure his poor Wife and Children; her Allowance would be withdrawn, and he would lose those who were now her best Friends.'

His Speech at
Execution.

There was also another Paper, a Half-Sheet, which Fitzbarris read at the Place of Execution by way of dying Speech; and which tallies with the third Paragraph of the former; for therein he solemnly disavows all Concern in the Libel, but as employ'd to discover to the King what Practices of that kind were against him (tho' the Persons who had so employ'd him, refus'd to do him Justice at his Trial) as also his having never receiv'd one Farthing from his Majesty but for such Services; Charges the Witnesses with having sworn most falsely against him, as to his Correspondence with the French Ambassador and his Confessor; and concludes thus, What I might farther declare, I have left with Dr. Hawkins: I forgive all the World, &c. I beg the Prayers of all good People, &c.

Both these Papers were immediately after his Death made public; and became Matter of much Exultation to the Court-Party. Mr. North, in particular, builds upon them as of unquestionable Authority; is very severe on Kennet for having suppress'd it; glories, that even the Lampoon Lawyer, Hawkes, so he characterizes him, says not a Word of it; and would have it thought that no better Answer could be given to it, than is to be met with in a Pamphlet of those Times, call'd a (m) Tory Plot; in which it is rather touch'd upon than formally answer'd.

Ascribed by Clayton, Treby, Bethel, and Cornish.

But in this he, himself, is guilty of almost as flagrant, and as execrable a Suppression, as the Author he arraigns; for an express Reply was immediately set forth by the City Magistrates, Clayton, Treby, Bethel, and Cornish, entitl'd; (n) Truth Vindicated, &c. with all their Names at length in the Title Page: In which, they insinuate, in the first Place, that Hawkins had not done his Duty conscientiously, like a Protestant Divine, in not having purg'd his Penitent of those odious, repeated Perjuries to the Secretaries of State, Sir Robert Clayton, &c. and the Judges of the King's Bench, of which he must have known himself to be guilty, if he had also known his Confession to be true; and that this was the more necessary to be done, inasmuch as those Perjuries had been publish'd to the whole World: That tho' he now swore the Treason of the Libel, whereof he was convicted, came from a Protestant Lord, his Conscience could not but bear witness within him, That he had often protested before God, that the said Lord had no concern in it; and that he had bitterly complain'd sometimes to Cornish, and sometimes to Bethel, in Newgate, that he was so earnestly press'd with the powerful Argument of saving his Life, to lay it to him and Lord Shaftsbury, that he had fallen on his Knees to be excus'd from any further Impunity; declaring, at the same time, the Lord Howard to be innocent; that the Lord Shaftsbury he had scarce ever spoke to; and that he had rather dye than be guilty of so base a Villany: That as to the Design of seizing the King, and detaining him till he had yielded to the Desires of those who should to have him in Ward; the thing was in itself impossible, without the Concurrence of Parliament, supported with the Force of the City: That not one Circumstance appear'd in Confirmation of so extravagant an Assertion; not the least Trace of either Preparations or Consultations; unless it could be suppos'd, that Lord Howard was mad enough to think he could master the Guards; and subdue all other Opposition by the Help of Fitzbarris and Hoyne only: That having thus endeavour'd to establish a Belief, that there was a Protestant Plot in Embrio, he is next induc'd to testify, that the Sheriffs, &c. would have suborn'd him to confirm the Popish Plot: That, however, the said Sheriffs were ready to depose, in answer to their coming with a Token from Lord Howard, That they never once saw or heard from his Lordship in any kind, while Fitzbarris was in Newgate: That, as Richardson and the Underkeepers could witness, they had never come together to Fitzbarris, or discours'd him together, or were in Newgate at the same time while he was there, save only that on the 10th of March, Bethel, as he was coming out, met Clayton, Treby, and Cornish going in; and that then they made no stay together, but separated forthwith: That Bethel had never seen Fitzbarris till the 9th, nor Cornish till the 6th; which was after the Secretaries had first examin'd him: That Cornish did no more than advise him to make an honest, true Confession, about the Libel, its Authors and Abettors: That Fitzbarris, of his own accord, offer'd, to make Discoveries concerning the popish Plot, and Godfrey's Murder: That he himself desir'd Cornish to take his Deposition; who declin'd it, because he was not in the Commission of the Peace: That then Fitzbarris made it his Prayer, that he would send one: That Cornish, instead of doing so, made all known to his Majesty the same Day; in consequence of which, the two Secretaries, accompany'd by the Attorney-General, came the next Day, the 7th that is to say, and examin'd him before Clayton and Treby had ever seen his Face; so that he had been three several times examin'd by the Secretaries, and had sworn to all the several Circumstances enter'd in his printed Confession, except that one relating to de Puy, as Mr. Secretary Jenkins acknowledged to the House of Commons, before these suborning Magistrates had ever put him a Question: That as to one of the afflicting Particulars, which he enumerates to account for his complying with the Solicitations of the Sheriffs, viz. his being FETTER'D; many Witnesses

(m) There were two Pamphlets with this Title; neither of which were publish'd till the Year 1682: Whereas several had been publish'd in the Year preceding, professedly treating of Fitzbarris's pretended Confession: And in one, call'd, No Protestant Plot, Part 1. Mr. North might have recollected, that more is said to confute it than in both the others.

(n) Concerning which, all our Historians are as silent as Mr. North: And this is so much the more to be wonder'd at, since it is to the full as remarkable a Piece as the Confession it answers; and there is no such thing as recounting this Part of our Story fairly without it.

A. D. 1681. were ready to depose, that he never was put in Iron, all the Time he was in Custody; and that, from Circumstances, it would also be made as evident, that no more Violence was offer'd to his Mind than to his Body: That, as to the Instructions said to be sent to him from the Lords and Commons, who were met that Day in order to address the King in his Behalf, in case he comply'd with them, it was a Forgery so gross, that it expos'd itself; for Addresses from the Lords and Commons to the King are never made, but when both are sitting in Parliament; whereas the Parliament did not sit till ten Days after Fitzbarris was taken out of the Sheriffs Custody; and then not at London, but at Oxford: That, in truth, no Instructions of any kind were ever brought him by the Sheriffs, or either of them; no Address for his Pardon was ever imagin'd or thought of, either by Lords or Commons, nor mention'd by the Sheriffs, or either of them; nor was there any Meeting for any such Intent; nor Discourse between the Sheriffs and any Man or Men under the Sun, about any such thing: That as to his Examination taken by Clayton and Treby, which he fully represents as extorted from him, or rather dictated to him, what has been already mention'd, viz. That he had thrice sworn to the same Confession in Substance before the Secretaries of State, previous to that Examination (which was taken at his own reiterated Request) was a sufficient Confutation; nor could it be enough admir'd, that while he appear'd so careful to retract the last, he should not once think of retracting, or even excusing the former: That whereas it was craftily insinuated, that Fitzbarris's Depositions concerning the Councils held at St. James's and Windsor, relating to Godfrey's Murder, were taken by Treby and Clayton, it was, on the contrary, most notoriously known, that by his own Motion to the Judges of the King's Bench, these Depositions were taken before that Court, in the Term, after the Dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, and above six Weeks after his most close Imprisonment in the Tower, where none of the City Magistrates were ever admitted to see him: That Clayton and Treby never did examine him about Lord Danby, and yet the Word They (who were the more desirous to accuse his Lordship of the said Murder, &c.) as it stands in the Confession, can be understood to relate to none but them: That as to the Words ascrib'd to Treby, in the Company of Clayton, and so plac'd to the Account of Both, Do you but say it, we have those that will swear it; they were too wicked to be believed of them, and too foolish to be believed of any Man whatever; since, if Treby had been so well furnished with Knights of the Post, it would have been the wiser, safer, and shorter Way, to have given them their Lesson from his own Mouth; and more especially as Fitzbarris's Word could have given no additional Authority to their Oaths: And that, upon the Whole, they were struck with Astonishment and Horror, that a Doctor of the English

Church should, under pretence of a private Conference with a Papist attainted of Treason, publish for Truth, that two Justices of the Peace, and two Ministers of Justice, had combin'd with certain Lords and Commons in Parliament, in a horrid Conspiracy against the Queen, Duke, and many Privy-Counsellors; as also to sorn the said attainted Papist to perjure himself, by forming a plausible Story to confirm the popish Plot; when the said Doctor KNEW, that every Tittle he so publish'd was contrary to the most solemn Oaths of the very Person whose Name he us'd, sworn before the King's Ministers, as well as before those Justices; and that all the Commons of England in Parliament had, by Order, caus'd what he had so sworn to be set forth in Print.

This we have not only a direct Denial, but in many Particulars, a clear Confutation of this last Sham of Fitzbarris (as it was call'd, in the Title-page of another Pamphlet which came out in Answer to it) under the Hands of those who, as they were the most concern'd to expose it, were also sure to be expos'd in their Turn, in case they advanced any one Item that would not bear all Lights, and all Reflections.

But neither is this the whole of the Case. The three Witnesses to Fitzbarris's Paper testify, that the Protestation it contains was made in their Presence and Hearing, the Morning of his Execution, between the Hours of Seven and Eight; and the Doctor, Hawkins, or Hawthorpe, (for, it seems, he had a Claim to either of these Names) throws into the same narrow Space of Time several solemn Admonitions on his Side, and several solemn Protestations on the Prisoner's: Whereas a very swift Writer could scarce copy the Paper in twice that time: And the four Defendants, Clayton, Treby, Betbel, and Cornish, undertake to prove, that it was making and forming at least a Week before the Execution; and thence find occasion to complain, that this very righteous Divine did not use the Means in his Power to satisfy himself by undoubted Evidence of the Falseness of several pretended Facts, which he thought proper to impose on the World for Truth.

Ferguson goes yet farther, and affirms, that Hawkins, who, according to him, was Chaplain to the Duchess of Perth, had it in Command to put him in hopes of a Pardon, if he would deserve it; that is, if he would retract his former Depositions, and accuse Clayton, Treby, &c. of extorting them from him: That he was admitted to the Prisoner, in the room of Dr. Burnet, purposely for this End: That he was allow'd to be in private with him for five or six Hours together: That when he had carry'd his Point, which it may be, not uncharitably, presum'd was no very difficult Matter, he posited to Windsor with the Paper: That he there signify'd upon what Terms he had obtain'd it: That he was receiv'd as one who had laid out his Talents to the best Advantage: That he was nevertheless told, there was no Possibility of saving his Penitent; for, unless he was hang'd, his Recantation would do no good; and farther instructed to keep him still in Expectation, for fear he should make one Turn more, and unfay all again: That Hawkins went thro' with his Commission, and carry'd on the Delusion to the last: That, when the Truth could no longer be conceal'd, and Fitzbarris in Agonies called for his Papers, he told him they were at Court; that if it should be whisper'd there that he had made any such Demand, he would not only lose his Life, but his Wife and Children would also lose their Maintenance: That his Wife asking if her Husband could be sav'd, going out of the World with such a Lye in his Mouth, and leaving behind him so groundless a Charge against so many innocent Men, the Doctor undertook to furnish him with an authentic Passport, by granting him Absolution: That the Paper sign'd by the Warders was the Half-sheet, which contain'd his Speech, and not the two or three Sheets, which contain'd his Confession, and which those Warders never saw: And that, even in the Cart, he kept up the Spirits of his pretended Convert, by giving him Assurances, from time to time, that Care would be taken of his Family.

As to this last Article, it is indeed asserted, in the (2) Account of his dying Behaviour, that Hawkins stepp'd into the Sledge to him, and discours'd privately with him for some time: But the four Defendants mention no such Circumstance; nor, if the Discourse between them was private, could any body give an Account of it. Those Gentlemen, however, farther say, that, as the Confession was modelled, they had Reason to think Fitzbarris understood many things in it as little as he did the Doctrine of the Four General Councils, which he was taught to own for his Faith: That the said Confession was kept secret till after his Death, for fear he should in his last Moments have expos'd the Fraud; which probably he would have done, had he been absolutely certain he had so few to write: That he had, on the contrary, receiv'd Assurances of Life from the Doctor, even but a few Hours before his Execution: That the Sheriffs reminding him at the Gallows of the Promise he had formerly made to each of them in Newgate, "That if THEY put him to death before he could discover to the Parliament what was yet undiscover'd of the popish Plot, which, he said, he reserv'd for them, he would leave it behind him in Writing." He answer'd, That he had left it with Dr. Hawkins: That they demanding of the Doctor that it might be read to the People, while the Man was yet living to own it; the Doctor only, not the Man, refus'd it: That they then demanding a Copy of the said Paper, as their Due; the Doctor, after a shuffling Manner, evaded it; by saying, it was already in the Hands of a great Man: That Time, they made no doubt, would bring to Light the whole Contrivance of obtruding upon the World this mock Confession, and make it appear that Hawkins knew that Fitzbarris never intended it should pass for a true and real one, in case he dy'd for the Treason: That probably it was for this Reason that, during all the Days which were spent in contriving of it, no one Person of Quality or Authority about the Tower was called in to bear witness of the Fairness of the Proceeding; which had certainly been done, for the Doctor's own Safety and Credit, in case there had been any such Fairness to make manifest; and that it was moreover probable, that those two obscure Men, and the Woman, whose Names are set to the printed Paper as Witnesses, knew no more what the Confession and Declaration was, which Fitzbarris protested to them he had made to Hawkins freely, than the Sheriffs knew what the further Discovery was of the popish Plot, which he also told them with his dying Breath, he had left with the said Hawkins; who, instead of denying the Fact then, or confirming it since by producing the said Discovery, had brought forward this odious, faam Confession, in its room.

And over and above all this, the Pamphlet, called, No Protestant Plot, Part i. affirms, that Fitzbarris himself, the very Night before his Execution, wrote a Paper, which he directed to be deliver'd to his Wife, in order to prevent the spilling of innocent Blood; wherein he tells by whom he was advis'd to accuse those noble Peers (Shaftsbury and Howard) of the Libel, and other Gentlemen of having put him on the Discovery of the popish Plot, by telling him, that he should be rewarded with a Pardon, adding, "That, as he was persuaded to accuse them upon the Assurance which was given him of saving his Life, so he thought, that what he then said would not be so prejudicial as his Life might be serviceable: But finding he was deluded, he declares, as before God, that they were innocent, that he had wrongfully accused them, that what he had deposed against the Papists was true, and that he had only been too sparing of accusing great People amongst them." The Author of this Pamphlet farther affirms, that the original Paper in Fitzbarris's own Hand-writing was then in the Custody of a certain Magistrate of London, who would be ready to produce it, when a proper Opportunity offer'd: And Bishop Burnet expressly declares, that he himself saw and read Letters from Fitzbarris to Vol. i. p. 504. his Wife, in which he told her how he was practis'd upon with the Hopes of Life, and charg'd her to swear falsely against none. His Lordship adds, that one of these Letters was written the very Morning in which he suffer'd.

A Memorial of the Lord Chief-Justice North, inserted in the Examen, p. 296, by his Lordship's Brother, will help yet farther to illustrate this cloudy Affair, as follows:

"After

“ After the great Surprise of the Verdict, the Memorial relates, says Mr. North, That presently Fitzbarris will turn Accuser, and discover the Conspiracy of the Lord Shaftsbury, Lord Howard, and others. This did somewhat fluster the Court, who thought it might be worth while, now Sedition was grown unto that height to be almost ready to break out into Force, to discover the Ways of it, or, at least Persons that knew them, and, in a real Danger, would be sure to do it. So Fitzbarris was relieved for a short time; and, left his Discovery should be useless, his Wife and his Maid pretended they could testify the same thing, and were very busy at the Secretary's Office to press for Fitzbarris's Pardon, upon the Shew what great Services might be done. But the Lord Chief Justice North, who came there sometimes, perceiving that they were always conducted by (p) Whiteacre, whom his Lordship knew to be of a most virulent and implacable Spirit against the Government, declar'd, That he thought there was no Regard to be had of any thing Fitzbarris should say. For what would not a Villain say, to save his Life, if he might surely do it by accusing another Man? And Whiteacre, who govern'd the Wife and Maid, might take care, by producing Papers under their Hands contradicting, to make all they should say to be of no Use or Signification. And therefore there must be no Overtures made; but if the Prisoner could make such Discoveries, as should receive Confirmation by other Circumstances and Persons, so that there might not be the Reproach upon the Government of taking these Ways that had been too much insisted on; to have Criminals receiv'd to accuse better Men than themselves; then there might be Reason to save his Life: But otherwise, his Discovery would have no Merit, but might be turned upon the Government. For those Villains would be as ready to accuse falsely the Court of Subornation, and would more heartily do it than what they now offer, and they would, in that manner, gain their Point both Ways; for the saving of Fitzbarris would preserve him to those Purposes for which the Faction design'd him at first. This afterwards proved true; for, Fitzbarris being executed, the Wife and Maid recanted, and pretended Subornation, and where they are now, God knows: But Fitzbarris made a full Discovery to Dr. Hawkins.”

And here (with an Exception to the last Item, which seems rather to be stuck on, than to be of a piece with the rest) we have the proper Clue to the Maze. Fitzbarris was a hungry Spy: His Converse with the Malcontents did not furnish him with sufficient Materials to make such Draughts on his Employers as his Necessities requir'd. Not finding Business, therefore, he resolv'd to make some. Hence arose the Project of the Libel: And when he was caught in his own Snare, and became sensible his Life was at stake, he resolv'd to take any Measures with any Party, that might contribute to his own Preservation. Both Parties saw the Use that might be made of him, and bid for him accordingly. Even this Memorial of the Lord Chief Justice's insinuates, That his Lordship's Advice was not rebely follow'd; that the Court did actually try Practices on Fitzbarris; and that the Event shew'd he had form'd a right Judgment both of the Man and the Proceeding. Next to his own Life, Fitzbarris lov'd his Wife; and when he found, that one Party could not procure him a Pardon; and that the other would not, he made it his chief Concern to secure a Provision for her. In order to which, after the same double manner that he had acted all along, he furnish'd (q) Hawkins with such a Confession, as should entitle her to Claims on the Court: And, for fear the Memory of the Service (should die with it, clandestinely supply'd her, at the same time, with such other Papers, as should enable her to make her own Terms with the Malcontents: And we have already seen, that she wanted neither Craft nor Spirit to act in all things, and upon all Occasions, as her Interest directed.

Upon the whole, it is every way, notorious, that Fitzbarris never once consulted his Conscience in this whole Affair; and, consequently, in no Part of it deserves any Credit from Posterity.

As to the Lord Howard, who had been committed to the Tower, as before notic'd, for having promoted the Libel, for which Fitzbarris (r) dy'd, he was still continu'd a Prisoner there, tho' the Grand Jury had recus'd

(q) Who also found his Account in it, being long after rewarded with the Deputy of Gloucester.

(r) Flower, the titular Prisoner of Ireland, before spoken of, was executed at the same time. Having had but little of this unfortunate Prelate, and his Case being remarkable, I have added the following Extract out of his last Speech; which I find preserv'd in Sir Thomas Webster's Collection:

“ I have some few Days past shaid my Trial at the King's Bench; and now very soon I shall hold up my Head at the King of King's Bench, and appear before a Judge who cannot be deceiv'd by false Witnesses, or corrupted Allegations, for he knoweth the Secrets of Hearts, &c. And I pray'd, upon the Word of a dying Man, and as I hope for Salvation at the Hands of the supreme Judge, that I will declare the naked Truth with all Candor and Sincerity: And, that my Affairs may be the better known to all the World,

“ I do to be allow'd, that I have been accus'd in Ireland of Treason and Perjury; and, that there, I was arraign'd and brought to my Trial; but the Prosecutors (Men of Bargains and infamous Lives) perceiving that I had Record and Witnesses who would evincely convince them, and clearly show my Innocency and their Wickedness, they voluntarily absconded themselves, and came to this City, to procure that, I should be brought to my Trial (before the Courts objected were not committal) where the Jury did not know me, or the Qualities of my Accusers, and were not inform'd of several other Circumstances conducing to a full Trial. Here, after six Months close Imprisonment (or Strabond) I was brought to the Bar the 2d of May, and arraign'd for a Crime, for which I was before arraign'd in Ireland: A strange Revolution, a rare Piece, of which you will hardly find a precedent these forty hundred Years past: But whereas my Witnesses and Records were in Ireland, the Lord Chief Justice gave me five Weeks time to get them brought hither: But by reason of the Uncertainty of the sea, of Wind and Weather, and of the Difficulty of getting Copies of Records, and bringing many Witnesses from several Counties in Ireland; and for many other Impediments (of which I do not make) I could not at the End of the five Weeks get the Records and Witnesses brought hither: I therefore besoug for twelve Days more, that I might be in a Readiness for refus'd to find the Bill, which had been presented against him by the Attorney-General; nor could his own solemn Protestation, previous to his receiving the Sacrament, that he had neither directly nor indirectly, mediately nor immediately, by himself or any other Hand, been concern'd in, or privy to, any Part of the said Label, &c. nor his humble Petition to the King, asserting his Innocence, and beseeching to be discharged either with, or without Bail, as his Majesty should direct, procure his Engagement.

The Faction in Power were now more intent than ever on subduing the Faction out of Power. This Paper of Fitzharris's, or Hopkins's was calculated to look forward as well as backward, to authorize all the Rigours of the Court, as well as condemn all the Proceedings of Parliament, and to blast the Characters of their most active Leaders; And we shall find cause to conclude, that the coupling the Name of Hopkins with that of Fitzharris, was a Reinement that far surpass'd the Reach of either.

Whoever maintains a long and obstinate Quarrel with an enrag'd and powerful Enemy, will be hurt in the Progress, and may be undone in the Conclusion of it: At the very instant that he makes a Pass, he may receive a Wound; and his own Skill may only serve to expose him to Danger. It was worthy, perhaps, of a Politician of the first Rank to establish a Belief, that the Popish Plot had taken Root in Ireland, as well as England, and to beat up for Witnesses to prove it: But then such a Politician could not help foreseeing, one would have thought, that unless his Proofs were of such a nature as left no Room for Controversy, unless his Witnesses were of unquestionable Credit, he would create Suspensions, instead of enforcing Conviction, and teach his Enemies the way to turn his own Artillery on himself.

It has been already shewn, that the Lord Shaftsbury had made himself the Patron of the Irish Plot, had taken the Witnesses under his Protection, and had shewn a more Irish Zeal to procure it the Sanction of Parliament; which whole Proceeding appears to have given equal Offence to his Friends, and Advantage to his Foes. Fer- Gravel of my Trial, which the Lord Chief Justice deny'd, and so I was brought on my Trial, and explain'd it with my own Hands to all the learned Judges, who did sit at my Table, by reading me of the following Points:

1. That I have sent Letters by one Niall O'Neill (who was my Page) to Monseigneur Ballechin the Pope's Secretary, to the Bishop of Down, and to Prebendary Malone, that they might solicit George Powers to invade Ireland; and also to have sent Letters to Cardinal Bullibus, to the same Effect.

2. To have employ'd Captain Charles to the French King for Secret.

3. To have levy'd and exacted Money from the Clergy of Ireland to bring in the French, and to maintain 20,000 Men.

4. To have had in a Residence 70,000 Men; and Lids made of them, and to have given Directions to our Crist Depts to make a List of 150 Men in the Parish of Engham in the County of Louth.

5. To have transported all the Arms and Matchlocks of Armagh, and to have set upon Charles in a fit Harbour for the French Landing.

6. To have had several Councils and Meetings, where there was Money allotted for introducing the French.

Finally, That a Meeting in the County of Monaghan, four or twelve Years past, where there were three hundred Gentlemen of several Counties, to wit, Monaghan, Carlow, and Armagh; whom I did exhort to plot Arms to recover their Liberty.

Every one of which Points being plainly, fully, and circumstantially deny'd; after which he proceeded thus:

"Now, to be brief, As I hope for Salvation, I never sent Letter or Letter, Agent or Agents, to Pope, King, Prince, or Prince, to assist in any Plot or Conspiracy against my King or Country; I never raised Sum or Sums of Money, great or small, to maintain a Soldier or Soldier, till the Days of my Life; I never knew or heard, (before I did consent to my Thoughts or Intention) that the French were to land at Carlingford; and I believe there is none who live in Ireland, even in a Map, but will think it a mere Romances; I never knew of any Plotters or Conspirators in Ireland, but such as were notorious and proclaimed (and usually called Tories) whom I did endeavour to suppress. And, as I hope for Salvation, I always have been, and am, entirely innocent of the Treason laid in my Charge, and of any other whatsoever.

And that I am not guilty of the Crime of which I am accused, yet I believe none can ever in this Place, who are in such a Condition as I am; for if I should ever acknowledge (which in Confidence I cannot do, because I should bely myself) the said Crime laid to my Charge, no wise Man that knows Ireland would believe me. If I should confess that I was able to raise 70,000 Men in the Districts of which I had Care, to wit, in Ulster, my error in Ireland; and to have levy'd and exacted Money from the Roman Clergy for their Maintenance, and to have employ'd Charles for the French's Landing, all would but laugh at me; it being well known, that all the Revenues of Ireland, both spiritual and temporal, possess'd by his Majesty's Subjects, are scarce able to raise and maintain an Army of 20,000 Men. If I will deny all those Crimes (as I did, and do) yet it may be that some, who are not acquainted with the Affairs of Ireland, will not believe that my Denials grounded upon Truth, tho' I assert it with my last Breath. I dare venture further, and affirm, that if these Points of 70,000 Men, &c. had been known before my Protestant Jury in Ireland, and had been even acknowledged by me at the Bar, they would not have believ'd me no more than if I had been deposed, and condemn'd by me, that I had sworn in the Air from Dublin to High-land.

You see therefore what a Condition I am in, and you have heard what Protestations I have made of Innocency, and I hope you will believe the Words of a dying Man: And that you may be the more induc'd to give me Credit, I shew you, that a great Part of me is gone, that he would save my Life, if I could in any manner. But I know it, that I never knew of any Conspiracy in Ireland, but that I did believe it was publicly known in London; and that, to save my Life, I would not fully avow any, nor justify my own sin. God grant I may live, &c. To raise any my Men's Life or Honour wholly or in part, as a Catholic, especially in case of my Calling, being a Clergyman of the Catholic Church, and also an unworthy Priest, which I do openly confess. Neither will I deny to have exercised in Ireland the Functions of a Catholic Priest, as long as there was any Continuance of Education; and by Preaching, and Teaching, and Scattering, to have endeavour'd to bring the Clergy (of which I had a Care) to a due Comportment, according to their Calling; and though thereby I did but my Duty, yet some, who would not understand, had a Prejudice for me, and especially my Accusers, to whom I did endeavour to do good; I mean the Clergy in (as for the last Laymen who opposed against me, and Peter Marston, the two Knights and Knights, I was never acquainted with them.) But you see how I am requir'd, and how, by false Oaths, they bring me to the untimely Death; which wicked Act, being a Deed of Violence, ought not to stand upon the Order of St. Francis, or upon the Roman Catholic Clergy; it being well known, that there was a Tutor among the Twelve Apostles, and a wicked Man called Nicholas among the Seven Deacons; And, even as one of the said Deacons, to wit, Silas, did deny for those who should him to Deny, to do in the same way, with Perjurers, and my Innocent Blood; Lying, as St. Stephen did, O Lord, lay not this Sin to them. I do humbly beseech thee, and also the Judges, who by denying me full Time to bring my Records and Witnesses from Ireland I did expose my Life to evident Danger. I do also forgive all those who had a Hand in bringing me from Ireland to be try'd here, where it was morally impossible for me to have a fair Trial. I do, finally, forgive all who did concern; directly or indirectly, to take away my Life. And I life Eternity of all those whom I ever offended, by Thought, Word, or Deed. &c.

Ferguson's
Lord Shaftsbury;

Ferguson's Character of this Nobleman, is, "That he had the Misfortune only to see and not the Gift to foresee, and that he lov'd to be ador'd for his Politics, tho' seldom right." But in this, he differs from the whole World besides, for all acknowledge his Lordship's great Abilities to embroil Matters, tho' many doubt whether he was equally able to compose them. And as to the Irish Plot is still pretended to be search'd into, and the Irish still buzz about the Lord Shaftsbury like Bees; egging him on to put them in a way how to preserve their Evidence, and to get him to intercede at the Court, that they might be provided for; which his Lordship was ready enough to do, not knowing the Snare that was laid for him by the Lord H——, and the rest of the Conspirators: For the Conspirators put the Irishmen upon complaining to him, and to get their Pardons (by his Intercession) that they might have the better Advantage, and some plausible Pretence hereafter, in producing these Irish Witnesses against him when the thing was ripe.

and Account of Court-Practises in Ireland.

We have here some Truth, but not the whole Truth; nor, indeed, are there sufficient Authorities extant to warrant the precise Adjudgment of these Counter-Intrigues, to the Satisfaction of a scrupulous Reader. Bishop Burnet only says, That Dugdale, Turberville and Smith, and the Irish Evidence, came under another Management; and tho' Bishop Kennet more particularly adds, That soon after the Lord Shaftsbury's Return from Oxford to London, Haynes came to him, and assur'd him he could give great Light in the Matter of Godfrey's Murder, if he might have his Pardon: That the Earl endeavour'd to get one, but it could not be obtain'd: That Haynes being taken and carry'd before the Council, hop'd to get Favour by accusing the Earl, &c. His Recital, if Mr. North is to be depended on, is neither fuller nor fairer than Ferguson's. But even Mr. North's own Account is in part so obscure, and in part so extravagant, that it requires much Faith, and much Illustration. "This Man (Haynes) says he, it seems, was once the Earl's Favourite, and honour'd by a Petition to his Majesty, which he and a Junto of Peers presented in his Behalf for obtaining his Pardon: In which Petition it was alleg'd, that he was a Man of Worth and Credit, and had many things to disclose for a farther Discovery of the Plot; and, in particular, relating to the Murder of Godfrey. The King was under a firm Resolve never to pardon a Man to make him a Witness: He saw enough the Evil of that way, and he had greater Reason to refuse this, because the Earl had told the King plainly, "That if he would not pass the Bill of EXCLUSION, they would LAY THE MURDER OF GOD-FREY UPON HIM; and at the same time, shew'd him an Affidavit of this Man of Worth and Honour, that tended that way: So their Lordship's humble Petition for qualifying and securing Haynes, in TESTIFYING AGAINST HIS MAJESTY HIMSELF (as was verily presum'd he would do) was refus'd, and the Matter came to nothing." There is no need to point out the Extravagance of this Story; it flares us in the Face. And as to the Obscurity, it follows, "perhaps, there has not been a piece of Roguery more infernal at the Bottom, than the Management of that Haynes before the Oxford Parliament; which indicates, that some Use was to have been made of him, if Fitzbarris's Case had gone so far as to let in the rest of the Protestant Rout of Villains, that waited without to be employ'd as Witnesses." Now there is no Trace of this infernal Management in any other Book: And Mr. North, himself, seems to acknowledge as much, by adding, he had Memoirs of this Matter, which were satisfactory to him; and that it needed no other Voucher than the Earl's own Petition. But Knowledge is not to be convey'd in the Lump; and to satisfy Posterity, both the Matter and Manner of this Management should have been circumstantially explain'd.

It is a Matter of Doubt, whether Party-Disputes contribute more to the discovering and realizing of Truth, or to the bringing all Truth into question: For, if on the one hand, Faction accuses Faction, and accumulates Proofs upon Proofs to support that Accusation, on the other, a peremptory Charge begets a peremptory Denial, and Reply begets Rejoinder, till Controversy grows a Wilderness, in which the very Footsteps of Certainty are in danger to be lost.

It is thus in the Case before us. According to Mr. North and his Royalists, the King had no sooner shewn himself to be Master by the Dissolution at Oxford, and setting the Exclusionists at Defiance, than the Witnesses which the last had kept in petto, like false Dies, to be us'd as occasion offer'd, grew sick of the Service; and all, at once, without any Practice upon them, or Application to them, began to open on the other Side: And the Court, as if by Inspiration, without entering into any Concert with these new Profelytes, or dreaming of the Advantages that might be drawn from them, prepar'd to let loose the Laws against their Adventurers, without knowing whether they had any thing criminal to allege against them.

And in the Papers call'd by these Royalists, The Labels of these Times (and which all Papers are esteem'd that are written against the strongest Side) we find it affirm'd as incontestable Truth, that one Wercup a Justice of Peace, who had for a long while co-operated with Waller for the good of the Cause, and Fitzgerald, the chief of the Irish Witnesses, before spoken of, had undertaken for those in Power, to turn the Plot-Engine on the the Exclusionists, and to find out such Persons as should do as good Execution, as the most notable Marksmen of them all: That

how long soever it was before they could bring Matters to bear, it was what those who had the Ascendancy at Court, had purpos'd from the Beginning; That Cleypole, Cromwell's Son-in-law, was sent to the Tower, under a Charge of having said, That he and two hundred more had enter'd into an Engagement to kill the King, to be there in Readiness to bear the Guilt, Shame, and Punishment of the Popish Plot then on the Point of being executed, thro' Oates's reasonable Discovery made way for his Deliverance: That another Effort of the same kind was the Practice set on foot by Dangerfield and Cellier, and happily defeated by Mansel: That the late villainous Project of Fitzbarris's was another Arrow out of the same Quiver: That the Paper procur'd by Harobin was calculated to be the Ground-work of their Subornation: That a Committee of Council sat at Whitehall to settle the Matter of the Depositions, and to give a proper Direction to the whole Proceeding: That this Committee was compos'd of the Lords Hallifax, Conway and Hyde, Secretary Jenkins, Mr. Seymour, and one more, whose Name is not reveal'd: That in this Committee, the Salaries of the several Emiffaries were appointed: That these Emiffaries were of both Nations, English and Irish: That Smith, Dagdale, and Turberville, all meritorious Names for their Services in the Popish Plot, were to have their old Stipends continued on a new Footing: That Warcup and Fitzgerald, were not only put on the Establishment in their own Persons, but with Credit to draw for such Sums as might be further necessary for the Encouragement of others to come in: That Fitzbarris's Wife was allow'd fifteen Pounds a Month, and her Maid twenty Shillings a Week: That Haynes, Denbit, two Macnamarras, and Esplance Cenny, were also taken care of in proportion to their different Capacities of being more or less useful: That the Scene was laid partly at Oxford and partly at London, that in case of a Disappointment at the latter Place, they might have recourse to the former; where the Lord-Lieutenant of the County, Lord Norris, the Sheriff, and, in general the People, were known to be at the Devotion of the Court: That to give the fairer Scope to the Design in hand, the Judges of Middlesex were put upon petitioning the King, That, for the future, his Majesty would be pleas'd to pick a Sheriff for Middlesex, as for other Counties, in order to deprive the City of London of a Privilege which had prov'd such a Thorn in the Sides of the Court: And that to shew equally what this Design was, and what were the Principles and Practices of those who were retain'd to support it, Sir George Treby had a Deposition upon Oath to present, &c. which had been made before him by Haynes, himself, March the 6th, 1680-1, to this effect: "That Fitzgerald had told him, they were resolv'd to sham the Popish Plot: That there was no other Plot than a Presbyterian one, invented by the Earl of Shaftsbury on purpose to extirpate the Stuart Family, dethrone the King, turn England into a Commonwealth, or else set the Crown on the Earl's own Head; which, he said, belong'd more to him, the said Earl, than his Majesty: That he (Fitzgerald) had several times tamper'd with him (Haynes) to suppress John Macnamarra's Evidence, promising, in such a Case, that the said Macnamarra should be provided for all the Days of his Life; and adding, That he wanted but the said Macnamarra to come in and join him, to be able to take off Shaftsbury's Head, and sham the whole Popish Plot. In Addition to all which, Hetherington, that Nobleman's Agent for Ireland, sets forth the (3) Articles of high Misdemeanors, which he had prefer'd

"Articles of High Misdemeanors preferred against David Fitzgerald, in the High of Common, and there proved fully by Mr. William Hetherington, and afterwards before the King and Council, but not shew brought to Hearing."

1. That the said Fitzgerald, at the first coming of the Witnesses out of Ireland, to prove the heathen Popish Plot, did seem to be very glad of their coming, to justify their Evidence, and in particular that of Esplance Cenny, saying that he was an honest Man, and was wrongfully shut up in Prison by the means of Sir William Davitt, for discovering the Plot, which he, the said Fitzgerald, saith he could by more than any of them all, and that he could charge the greatest Man of Ireland there with it, or in Words to that Effect: But after he saw Cenny's Narrative printed, and found that several of his Friends, as he pretended, were charged then, they began to rail and reflect upon him, and threaten to be the Death of him; and afterwards took occasion to abuse and revile the rest of the Witnesses.

2. That amongst other Matters that he pretended he could prove touching the Plot, he said he could prove the Day and Time that the Duke of Torb was to be proclaimed King in Ireland; and that he would tell the King of it; and that he did acquaint the Earl of Bartholomew, coming out from the Committee of the Lords, that he could and would help their he had accused, and bring Great oaths to prove his accusations he had charg'd them with.

3. That notwithstanding the said Fitzgerald hath since endeavour'd by many Ways and Means to bring this Information and the said Witnesses into his Majesty's Disfavour, and to call Reproaches upon them, the better to invalidate their Evidence; alleging, firstly, that they had receiv'd three thousand Pounds from the City of London, or some of the Witnesses thereof, or some others whom he would mention if he could.

4. That the said Fitzgerald hath, sometimes by Threats, other ways by Falses, Treas, Money, Promises, and other Ways of Vertuosity, labour'd to make off the said Witnesses from giving their Evidence on his Majesty's behalf, particularly in the Case of Sir John Denbit; and when all that would get prevail upon them, told them, that his Majesty was displeas'd with this Informant's Proceedings, and would be so with them, if they follow'd his Direction; and by these Devices so afflicted them, that he got them to sign a Petition to his Majesty (which he drew for the Purpose) intimating, that they were inform'd his Majesty did not look upon them as coming to do him Service; and that, if it were so, they should readily discharge themselves; tho' their Informations were ready to serve his Majesty.

5. That the said Fitzgerald, when he called the said Witnesses were to be called into either House of Parliament, or some Committee sitting to them, to give in their Evidence, hath endeavour'd to hinder them, or some of them, that they could not be found; and, when they have been found, he hath laid violent Hands on them, or some of them; and would not permit them to go, until they forced themselves from him; and then he threaten'd them, and those that call'd them, and with an Oath, God he would break Esplance Cenny's Neck; and the better to prevail with the Witnesses, acknowledg'd he had receiv'd for his Service an hundred Pounds of his Grace the Duke of Ormond, five hundred Pounds from the King, and a Commission to be a Captain; and that his Majesty had given him two blank Patents for Baronet, the one for his Father-in-law, and the other to be at his own Disposal; and a Grant of the Lands of Belah, and all the Commons of Keshgrove in the County of Lisnisk.

to the last Westminster Parliament against the said Fitzgerald, charging him with having departed from his own Evidence, with having menac'd, abus'd, and endeavour'd to corrupt the rest of the Witnesses; asserts that he had given the Committee of the Commons, to whom he was refer'd, full Satisfaction in all the several Particulars he had alleg'd; and that the Chairman was making his Report when a Period was put to the Session: And to prove all aforesaid attested Copies of several Affidavits, voluntarily sworn, says he, before the respective Magistrates, therein mention'd, by several of those very Injurers, who were now fallen under another Management, according to Bishop Burnet's Phrase, before they were totally debauch'd: And that Warcup might be as effectually expos'd as his Yoke-fellow, Fitzgerald, Care was taken to reprint an (2) Article from the London Gazette of July 21, 1666, setting forth, That the said Warcup had carry'd on a corrupt Negotiation in the Name of Lord Abington, had been detected in it, and had been committed to the Fleet for it, &c. as also to make public a Deposition of Everard's, now turn'd Patriot again, signifying, That Justice Warcup had dealt with him to swear something towards a Preliminary Plot; and particularly, That Lord Shaftsbury intended a Commonwealth; and that he, with others, were preparing Arms to alter the Government.

[No Precept-

Whoever, as a Man, is, from a laudable Selfishness, dispos'd to think highly of Human Nature, must be grievously mortify'd at the Exhibition of such shocking Scenes as these: For whether the two Parties were mutually guilty of these detestable Practices to destroy, or mutually forg'd these Calumnies to blacken, one another, human Nature is equally disgrac'd, and we have equal Reason to blush for the Species.

We are now to take notice of the Transactions of the City, during this violent Ferment. As the Court now wore a more threatening Aspect than ever, it was more than ever necessary for the Malcontents to entrench themselves behind the Power, Wealth, and Authority of the Metropolis, which was now become their only Bulwark. On the choice of Sheriffs in particular, all the Residue of their Hope depended. When, therefore, the Day of Election was come, the Hall was fill'd with their Party, and Pilkington and Stuës, who were put in nomination by them in opposition to Box and Nicholson, who had the Countenance of the Court, were declar'd to have the Majority of Hands: But a Poll was demanded in favour of the two last; and, being agreed to by the Sheriffs (Bethel and Cornish) declar'd they would close it that Night; and Pilkington, made his Court to the Hall, by declaring, That he would not serve, if he was not

6. That the said Fitzgerald had not only abus'd and threaten'd the said Cowley, but had also interr'd several of the Members of the House of Commons; that the said Cowley was a very Rogue, and that he could produce many Records against him, and that he was not fit to be credenc'd; and also threaten'd and threaten'd to kill him the said Cowley, so that he was forced for some time to keep himself in Obscurity: That the said Fitzgerald had not only abus'd and threaten'd him his Informant, and the Evidence which he was concern'd for, but also Mr. Thomas Sawyer, who came over upon his own accord to serve his Majesty in that Matter, and who, by his Testimony therein, hath given great Satisfaction to both Houses of Parliament.

7. That the said Fitzgerald, being examin'd by a Committee of the House of Commons against Sir John Fitzgerald, refus'd to give his Evidence, being his Relation, in that the Committee would promise to intercede to his Majesty for his the said Sir John's Pardon; and before a Committee of the Lords, in his Evidence, he charged Colonel John Fitzpatrick and Sir Edward Sea, to be Confederates in the Plot; but at the Lords Bar would not, tho' accus'd; and left their Names out in his Narrative published in Paris, of his own Knowledge in that Matter, his Mind being thro' stuck, upon what Consideration may well be judg'd: He also said before the said Committee, that he fear'd the worse, because they knew that the King had a Kindness for him.

8. That the said Fitzgerald accus'd the Witnesses, or some of them, Whether they retained the Rough Religion still; who reply'd they did; for which he the said Fitzgerald committed them for so doing; for that the Protestants would only rise for their own Purpose and Advantage, and afterwards would hang them.

9. That the said Fitzgerald also told the said Witnesses, or some of them, that the King was satisfy'd that the late Lord Stafford was innocent, denying the Fact at his Death; or Words to that Effect: And that his Majesty was resolv'd not to try any more of the Lords in the Tower: And, after the Parliament was prorog'd, he told the said Witnesses, or some of them, that he would remove their Nests.

10. That the said Fitzgerald had kept continual Correspondency and Familiarity with the four Witnesses, which were brought over by a Messenger from Ireland: And a Person of Quality perceiving it, told him, that he had not observ'd of the Orders the Committee gave him; which was, that he should not come near any of the Evidence, nor converse with them: The said Fitzgerald reply'd, that he was assur'd by the King to come there, and also gave the said Person of Quality very scurrilous and abusive Language.

11. That the said Fitzgerald also abus'd the said four Witnesses, or some of them, and accus'd them, if they came to hang poor Planters?

12. That the said Fitzgerald said he was abus'd, because he would not see the Duke of Ormond and the Chancellor of Ireland, which he knew to be a honest Men as any in the three Kingdoms. [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. 12.

Immediately after this the Poll was open'd: Eleven Writers were appointed to enter Votes: And such Expedition was us'd, that the whole Affair was clos'd in five or six Hours; Proclamation having first been made in the Hall, That if any Person, who had a Right to poll, had any Reason to offer, why the Books should not be shut, they were desir'd to speak. Three Days after, according to Custom, another Common-hall was call'd to declare the Election; which appear'd to be in favour of Pilington and Stude; by a vast (a) Majority; the Numbers standing thus: Pilington, 3144; Stude, 2244; Box, 1266; Nicholson, 84. A Petition was then presented from the Common-hall to the Lord Mayor; and also an Address to the Sheriffs: The first beginning, "Their Thankfulness to God, that, notwithstanding the daily Plots of the Papists and their Accessories, they still enjoy'd their ancient and undoubted Right of assembling, and choosing their own Officers; and that they remember'd, with all Gratitude, the faithful Endeavours of his Lordship, the Aldermen, and Common-council, in ordering and presenting a Petition to his Majesty, in which were set forth the manifold Dangers of both King and People, from the Designs and Conspiracies so long projected by the Councils of Rome, and their Adherents; in the Pursuit of which they were chiefly animated by the continual Hopes of a papish Successor; and also the general Apprehensions, that no effectual Remedy could be obtain'd against the impending Evils therein mention'd, but by the Wisdom and Advice of his Majesty's great Council the Parliament: And, that whereas it was come to their Knowledge, that Reports, by Mistake or Prejudice, had been rais'd, that the said Address contain'd only the Sense and Desires of a few Persons, and not of the Generality of that great City, most humbly praying, that his Lordship would, in such Manner as should seem best to his Lordship's Discretion, humbly represent to his Majesty, That the Subject-matter of the said Address did also contain the humble Desires and Resolutions of his true and loyal Subjects the Citizens of his City of London, in Common-hall assembled; and that his Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to esteem it as such." There was also another Paragraph, importing their Concurrence to the Vote of Thanks given by the Common-council to their worthy Representatives in the last Parliament, for their faithful Endeavours to serve the City, according to the Desires and Instructions they had receiv'd. And the Address to the Sheriffs specify'd, How sensible of, and greatly satisfy'd with, their faithful Endeavours to discharge those Offices which they had called them to, the Citizens of London were, particularly in maintaining and asserting their undoubted Rights and Privileges, as Citizens, and making continual Provision of faithful and able Juries; especially at such a Time as that, when Innocency itself was not flood from the Imputation of the blackest Crimes; and the best and most loyal Protestants were exposed to the utmost Hazards, by the Perjuries, Subornations, and Villanies, of the papish Party and their Adherents, &c.

These were the Transactions of June 24, and 27: And, as if the Party had now fill'd the Measure of their Offences, and had themselves given the Signal for the Court to let loose their Vengeance on them, John Rouse and Stephen College, two of their most active Agents, were apprehended by a Warrant from the Secretary's Office, or Council-board; and, after Examinations, committed to the Tower; the first, says Mr. North, because he was a thorough-pac'd Traitor, and look'd upon to be Paymaster to the Mob: A Whigginger [that is one of Lord Shaftsbury's Whiggish-friends] and good at mustering Seamen. And the second, according to the same Authority, because he was a pragmatist, fanatical Joiner, and had been set up as a prime Operator in the desperate Doings of the Party among the lower Order of Men; having, in particular, a great Charge incumbent on him, to conduct that which was dress'd up for the Oxford Parliament. But, according to Ferguson, because thro' these it was thought lay the easiest way to come at that Nobleman. College having been active in introducing the Irish Witnesses to his Lordship, and in detecting the Irish Plot, and Rouse having collected and distributed Money for their Support. The last of these Writers adds, That Rouse confess'd to the Council, that he had been guilty of giving Money to those Wretches to keep them from starving; but that the Crime he was charg'd with, viz. the disbursing Money to levy War, he utterly deny'd; and that College who was afterwards accus'd of being engag'd in a Plot, or Design to seize the King at Oxford, was press'd to accuse Shaftsbury, which is, however, utterly incredible; for the Times would not have borne open Subornation; nor was College a proper Person to trust with so dangerous a Secret. However this may be, the Lord Shaftsbury was apprehended next, July 2d, his House search'd, and all his Papers seiz'd and carry'd off, without permitting them to be mark'd, or any List to be taken of them, tho' his Lordship requir'd it as a reasonable Precaution both for the Court and himself. When brought before the King and Council, he was told of a Charge of High Treason sworn against him; and, by way of Reply, requested, that his Accusers might be brought Face to Face. But tho' all the Papists accus'd by Cates, &c. had met with this Indulgence, it was refus'd to him; and tho' when he made his Appeal to the Lords present, whether they thought he could be so void of Common Sense, as to treat with such Persons as the Witnesses were, cernment, as they had lay'd to his Charge, not one of them had the Confidence, says one of the (u) Pamphlets publish'd on this Occasion, to answer in the Affirmative, he was (s) committed to the Tower. And the Cause assign'd in the next Gazette, was for High Treason in compassing and imagining the Death of the King, and endeavouring to depose him from his Crown and Dignity, and to raise Arms to that Purpose.

The Sessions for London and Middlesex were either now beginning or begun; and Whitacre, before spoken of, as the Solicitor of the Party, and call'd by Mr. North, the most infernal, bloody Party-Man of the whole Pack, was employ'd to move the Bench in Behalf of the several Prisoners, for a speedy Trial, or to admit them to Bail: But the Attorney-General would hear of neither, urging, extravagantly enough, as we are told, that the Tower was a peculiar Precinct, neither in the Jurisdiction of London or Middlesex: That consequently no Commission of Oyer and Terminer for either, could reach it: That they should be ready enough with their Indictments, when they had an equal Jury to try it: And by way of Menace to Whitacre, giving him to understand, that he who was now so active for the Defence of his Clients, would speedily have enough to do to defend himself.

At length, however, it was resolv'd to begin with College, and that the Witnesses should give, and the Grand Jury receive their Evidence in open Court; in order, say one Party, that when such manifest Treasons should be thus publicly sworn to, the Jury might find themselves without Excuse, if they did not find the Bill: And, say the other, that they, the said Jury, might have the less Opportunity to cross-examine the Witnesses, and detect the Subornation. This, it seems, was a Novelty in Practice; but nevertheless the Bench gave way to it; and also to another Demand of the Attorney-General, That the Jury should ask no Question, but such as the Court approv'd.

And now the Wrath of the Court, which had been before denounc'd by the Attorney-General, fell on Whitacre: According to Ferguson, at the Instigation of Smith the Evidence; to remove a perpetual stumbling-block out of the way. The Day before College's Affair was to come on, a Warrant was issu'd against him (Whitacre) by Mr. Secretary Jenkins, at the Attorney's Instance, which was serv'd upon him by two Messengers the next Morning by five o'Clock. He demands a sight of the Warrant, insists on their calling in a Constable to their Assistance, as the Law requir'd; and also on being carry'd before a City Magistrate, according to the Privilege of a Citizen and Inhabitant of London. This could not be refus'd: The Lord-Mayor was the next day, and before him he complains, That he had been assaulted and seiz'd by two Men, calling themselves Messengers, under colour of a Warrant from one Leoline Jenkins, by them call'd Secretary of State; but, he was sure no Alderman of London: That the Pretence was High Treason: But, supposing that Pretence could be made good, the Secretary had no Jurisdiction there; the Charter of London providing, That neither the King nor his Ministers should execute any Warrant or judicial Process in the City, except by the Magistrates thereof: Adding, that for these Reasons, he chose to surrender himself into his Lordships Hands; that he claim'd the Protection of the City; and that if any thing appear'd against him not bailable, he might be sent to the Common Goal of Newgate, according to Law. — But the Lord-Mayor, it seems, had not altogether so much Spirit or Knowledge as the Appellant; and therefore chose to refer him to the Court to be held that Day at the Old Bailey, where his Lordship call'd in the Assistance of the Recorder: And before Both, in open Court, Whitacre made the same Plea as before. And now it appear'd that the Recorder was as much stunn'd as his Lordship; for, tho' he confess'd, that Whitacre had the Law on his Side, he did not care to allow him the Benefit of it without a previous Consultation with the Lord Chief Justice: But the deciding this Question being no Part of his Commission, his Lordship, more prudently than bravely, declin'd giving any Opinion upon it: And this Caution of his so far re-doubled the Doubts and Fears of the Lord Mayor and Recorder, that they sunk under them; and meanly resign'd the Prisoner to the Messengers, who carry'd him off in Triumph.

There are few Men but what think themselves authoris'd to desert their Friends, when deserted by them: Whitacre, on the contrary, show'd the same Firmness after this Incident as before it. Being brought before a Committee of the Council, he gave them to understand, That he well knew why he was, at that time, taken into Custody; that as to any Questions that might be put to him, he should answer none, unless they were stated stated in Writing, and unless they then appeared to be such as he thought reasonable: And that, in case they thought proper to commit him, the Place appointed by the Laws for the Reception of Prisoners of his Rank and Circumstances was the County Goal, and not the Tower. He was, however committed to the last of those Places; and kept a close Prisoner there for Five Months; notwithstanding several Petitions for his Removal: Which is one of those many Circumstances of the like Nature to be found in this Reign, that Mr. North, and those of his Faction, think it prudent to take no notice of.

A Bill of Indemnity preferred against College,

Under all these subtle Precautions, the Bill was preferred against College, July 8: But tho' the Jury were under some Surprize, they did not lose their Presence of Mind; on the contrary, they took shelter under their Oath to keep the King's Secrets and their own; and urg'd, that this was impossible, when the whole Court was as deep in these Secrets as themselves. This was rather the Refinement of Policy than a Scruple of Conscience: No one is oblig'd to keep a Secret he is not charg'd with; but then there is Reason to believe that the Objection was over-ruled, not for the sake of Truth, but Party. Justice, tho' pleaded on both Sides, had little to do with either; and, if at liberty to act dictatorially, would have made Examples of Both. The Witnesses, thus left at large to tell their own Stories, discharg'd themselves like Men of Ability in their Calling, and omitted no one Circumstance that could lend Authority to the Bill. Three of them, Dugdale, Turberville, and Smith, had been held and receiv'd as good Men and true, against the Papists, College himself had, in the Case of Lord Stafford, insisted that Dugdale was an honest Man; and all the rest had found Credit in the House of Commons, and indeed with the whole Faction. Here then lay the Strais of the Question, as it was afterwards stated, tho' in other Words, by Serjeant Jeffries, 'tis the Jury rejected the Bill, because the Witnesses were not to be believ'd, they shook the whole Fabric of the popish Plot, for the Conclusion was manifest, that if there were Subornation and Perjury in one Case, there was sufficient Room to suspect the like Ingredients in the other: And if they found the Bill, on the Presumption that the same Men deserv'd the same Credit still, they arm'd the Court against the whole Party, and enabled them to do Execution on whom they pleas'd.

To wind themselves out of this Difficulty, which might have bewilder'd very able Politicians, the Jury insisted on examining the Witnesses a second time, by themselves, and separate from each other; and, with some Difficulty, prevail'd. What truly and simply pass'd on that Occasion is not known; but the Party gave out, that some of the Witnesses ingenuously confess'd they were under a corrupt Influence; and others notoriously contradicted their former Evidence before the Court, that the Jury held themselves justifi'd for returning the Bill, indorced with an Ignoramus.

The Joy of the Party overflow'd on this Occasion, as it was natural it should; for the Net was now broke, and they were free again: But what was Matter of Triumph to them, as a Body, was fatal to the Prisoner, in particular: Though one Bill was thus frustrated, he was still liable to another. The treasonable Facts alleg'd against him lay in two Counties, Oxfordshire and Middlesex; and the King, by Law, might prosecute in either. It was determin'd thereupon, says Mr. North, "That, since the Justice of an Indictment was deny'd by the Middlesex Grand-Jury, to proceed upon it in Oxfordshire, and there being an Opportunity, by means of the Affizes then at hand, the Witnesses were sent down, and an Indictment preferred to the ordinary Grand-Jury, who found the Bill. This could not be unequal; for this Case was not thought of when that Grand-Jury was return'd." Contrary to which, Ferguson asserts, and, not without Reason, tho' perhaps without any other Authority, that the Bill was expedited at the Old Bailey, purposely that, in case of a Miscarriage, the Experiment might be renew'd with better Success at Oxford: And Echard adds these Words, "To make sure of the Bill of Indictment, we are told, (by Hawles in his Remarks, p. 20.) that the King's Council puffed thither with the several Witnesses, and was privately shut up with the Grand Jury, till they were prevail'd upon (Hawles adds, by what Arts is (y) unknown) to find the Bill: A Practice much (z) complain'd of afterwards."

In the midst of these violent Proceedings, the

(y) And farther, as follows:

"And I should wonder if he, who frequently, in the Hearing of those who understood better than himself, had Assurance enough to impose upon the Courts, should scruple, in private, to impose any thing on an ignorant Jury." Remarks, p. 20.

(z) By the same Hawles, in these Words:

"I know not how long the Practice of that Master, of administering Council, to a Grand-Jury, hath been; I am sure it is a very unjustifiable and unchristianable one. If the Grand-Jury have a Doubt in point of Law, they ought to have Recourse to the Court; and that publicly, and not privately; and not rely on the private Opinion of the Council, especially of the King's Council, who are, or at least behave themselves as if they were, Parties."

It is true, it is said, that they are upon their Oaths; and tho' it be not express'd in their Oaths, that they should do Right between the King and his Subjects; yet that is implied in the Oath, I agree: But have they know'd themselves as if they were under an Oath? Besides, all Men are not capable of giving Advice to be rely'd on, in so great a Matter as Life: But the Manner of doing it, being in private, can never be justifi'd. I know, in Fisher's Case, the King's Council were counselling the Grand-Jury in private for some Hours; but I did not think fit to take notice of it in that Trial; because I think both the Grand and Petty Jury did very well: They acted according to the best of their Understanding; which is all that God or Man requir'd of them: They us'd no pestilent Questions; they were prevail'd in none, nor falsly answer'd in others: Nor that I think either of them gave a Verdict according to Law upon the Facts, as it appear'd upon the Evidence. But that was not the Fault of the Jury, but of the King's Council, and of the Court, who mis-led the Jury. I thought it more proper to take notice of it in this Trial; wherein the first Bill was rejected by an understanding Jury; and all Men wonder'd how the second came to be found Billis verae: And, for that Reason, one of the King's Council dash'd at Cover's all his service, and causing Management, in that Matter. Id. p. 20, 21.

The Prince of Orange arrives in England.

State of foreign Affairs at that time.

the Prince of Orange arriv'd in England; and at Visits of Ceremony, or Parties of Pleasure, took up but a very little Part of his Life, it must be suppos'd, that his Voyage hither, at this time, was neither for the sake of Amusement, nor merely to pay his Court to the King his Uncle.

But of whatever Importance these extraordinary Motions of his always were, and however critical this more especially deserves to be thought, the Writers of his Life, and most of our general Historians, make no mention of it; and those who do, content themselves with scattering only such Scraps and Fragments of Intelligence, as suit their own immediate Purpose.

We can only therefore collect such Circumstances as may lead us to the Door of Truth, and help us to make probable Conjectures of what was doing within.

The Power and Perfidy of France, the Acquisitions she had already made, and the Designs she was still apparently pursuing, were the great Objects of his Highness's Attention: And every Day's Experience convinced him more and more, if possible, of the Necessity of finding out Expedients to set Bounds to her Encroachments, or of submitting to her Mercy.

Upon the slightest View of her pernicious Projects, it appear'd she had enter'd into a close Correspondence with the Malcontents of Hungary, (become so indeed by the tyrannical Government of the House of Austria, especially in Matters of Religion) and inspir'd them up to open Rebellion; that the Emperor, thus embarrass'd in his own hereditary Dominions, might be less able to interpose in the Protection of the Empire.

The Sovereign Chamber, as it was call'd, which he had injuriously and iniquitously establish'd at Metz, had just declar'd, that the far greatest Part of the Duchy of Luxemburg, and its Dependances, were a Part of the Bishopric of Metz; and having summon'd the City of Creutznach, and Frankendale, as belonging to the Bishopric of Verdun, his most Christian Majesty had, without any farther Ceremony, given them to the Prince of Birkenfeld: And, till the Surrender was actually made, a Body of French Troops, under the Command of M. de Boufflers, had Orders to march into the Baillage of Alzey, and live at Discretion. Nor was this all: So great were their military Preparations in Germany, and so alarming their Motions, at this time, that it was, thus early, fear'd they entertain'd Designs upon Strasbourg; that they would even become Masters of it; and that, thereby, having the Empire open to them, they would be in a Condition to crown all, by causing the Dauphin to be elected King of the Romans.

And, on the Side of Flanders, over and above the Pretensions of Lucemburg, before-mention'd, his most Christian Majesty was farther pleas'd to make a peremptory Demand of the County of Clinau, with all its Dependances, which was follow'd with a Declaration, That, if they were not deliver'd up forthwith, he should order the Count de Bisli to seize them by force; in which Case, all the Soldiers found on the Premises should be sent to the Gallies.

So notorious a Violation of Decency, as well as Justice, gave the Spaniards the most sensible Provocation. They forgot their own Weakness; they gave Orders for a vigorous Defence; they call'd upon the States to stand by them, and to make it a common Cause; and they not only importun'd the Court of England for their good Offices, but for solid Assistance, in virtue of the defensive League subsisting between the two Nations.

But, alas! there was Reason to believe, that his most Christian Majesty had made the same, or the like, Experiments in England, which he had practis'd in Hungary, and almost with the same Success: For when the People had no longer any Confidence in the King, and the King had broken all Measures with his People, the Power of these Islands was no longer of any Weight in the Scales of Europe, and consequently he had nothing to apprehend from it.

What was still worse, there seem'd to be a sort of Conformity in the domestic Proceedings of the two Courts: For while that of England set a new Edge on the penal Laws against Protestant Dissenters; that of France issued severe Edicts against the Hugonots; in particular, forbidding them to send their Children to be educated in foreign Countries; allowing those Children to change their Religion, and become Papists, at seven Years old: And when many of those persecuted People did leave the Kingdom on account of these Rigors, and many more prepared to follow their Example, forbidding them to take their Children with them.

It does not, however, follow from hence, that the two Kings were in the Plot to root out the popish Northern Heresy, according to Coleman's Phraze, and render Popey universal. At the same Instant that his most Christian Majesty appear'd thus zealous to introduce a Uniformity of Opinion and Worship in his Dominions; he was at Variance with the Pope, on many Accounts; and his Holiness, who was an Austrian, and who more dreaded the Power of France than he desir'd the Propagation of the Faith, would have gone any Lengths, consistent with the Safety of the Church, to get it reduced within a more manageable Bound; which Disposition on both Sides will serve also to shew, that the popish Plot was not in Truth what it was artificially represented.

This was the general State of Things, when the Prince of Orange came over; and about the same time, or soon after, an elaborate Performance was made public, containing some alarming and many pompous things concerning the growing Greatness of France; what England, in particular, had to apprehend from it; and how much it import'd the English Government to lay it in the Dust.

In this Discourse, the holding the Balance of Power, which has since cost this Nation such a Mine of Wealth and Sea of Blood, is laid down as the only salutary Maxim that those

D. 1661: those in Power had to pursue: And, to show how reasonable it then was to make use of it, Care is taken to inculcate, that his most Christian Majesty aim'd at no less than universal Monarchy; as also to manifest how great a Progress he had made towards it: Namely, that he had gotten Brisac and Friburg, to enter Germany; the French Comptee to awe the Switzers; Pignard to enter Italy; Perpignan to enter Spain; and almost all Flanders to enter England: That by Sea he was become so potent, that, if his Seamen and Officers were equal in Goodness to his Ships, it would be a Question, whether he might not contrait the whole maritime Power of Europe, and make the Strait between Calais and Dover a Ferry to pass over into England what Armies he pleas'd: That this naval Strength of his had been of so swift a Growth, that tho', in the Year 1665, he was not able to put to Sea twenty Men of War, he had now upwards of two hundred: That they were also grasping at universal Commerce, as well as universal Monarchy: That for one trading Ship which they had in the Year 1660, they had now forty: That, by the Encouragement given to Trade and Navigation, their Mariners were increas'd in proportion: That they had establish'd a Fishery at Newfoundland, tho' the Property of England, and never till of late occupi'd by any Power, without both Licence and Acknowledgment, as well for a Nursery of Seamen, as for the sake of the Gain arising from it: That his most Christian Majesty bore the Expence of supernumerary Hands on board every Ship: That he had open'd a Channel of Traffic both to the East and West Indies: That he had granted Privileges to such of his Nobles as would be prevail'd upon to engage in the List, in order that to contribute to the Wealth as well as the Fame of their Country might be thought honourable: That, as if he was already without a Rival by Sea, as well as by Land, he had given Orders to his Officers and Commanders to assert the Sovereignty of the Seas, circumjacent to his Colonies: That a great Part of the Wealth of Europe already center'd in France: That his Subjects were Gainers annually by the Trade of England 1,500,000 l: That for Wines, Brandies, Salt, Silks, Stuffs, Toys, &c. they exhaulted the Northern Regions of One hundred and twenty Millions of Florins: That wherever else they carry'd on any Commerce, it was on Terms proportionably advantageous to themselves; for that the French Merchants were consider'd only as Factors for the Commonwealth; and while Exportations of all sorts met with all imaginable Encouragement, Importations, unless of Indispensables, were so over-loaded with Duties and Customs, that the Profits did not countervail the Cost: That his most Christian Majesty, having a regular Revenue of Sixty Millions of Florins yearly, and having such inexhaustible Resources from the Riches of his Subjects, which, by virtue of his supreme Power, were always at his Devotion, was in a Condition to undertake whatever was possible to be accomplish'd; nor could less than the

A. D. 1681: united Force of all his Neighbours withstand him: That his very Motives and Devices (Solus contra Omnes, non pluribus impar, &c.) shew'd his aspiring Genius, and what was to be apprehended from it: That if he was already thus formidable, the Addition of the Dutch Commerce and Maritime Strength, which must fall in to him upon the Reduction of those Provinces, would lay the rest of Europe at his Feet: That England alone could prevent his making that mighty Seizure: That even no Power on the Continent was more interested to prevent it than England: For that the Netherlands were the Out-works of England, and that the Day of their Subjection would be the Eve of ours: That while France subdu'd any one Power, she weakened all: That, with regard to the Common Cause, there was little Difference between the Inactivity and total Ruin of any one Power, interested in the Common Defence: That the Loss of Seasons and Opportunities was the Loss of every thing: That, as France no longer thought herself bound by Leagues than they suited her Convenience, all her Neighbours were authori'd by the Law of Self-defence, to adopt the same Maxim, and to make their Efforts, when they had the fairest Occasion, not merely when they were the most sensibly provok'd: That the prime Policy of England should be to reestablish Union at home: That in the second Place a firm, sincere and lasting Friendship, founded on mutual Interest, should be establish'd between Great Britain and the States General: That his Britanic Majesty should avowedly take upon him the Protection of the Protestant Cause all over Europe; and, by that Tye, center in himself, as far as political Considerations would give leave, the Strength, Interest, and Credit of the whole Protestant Body: That, on this Basis, a general Association or Confederacy of all the Princes and Powers of Europe, who had either felt, or had reason to fear, the growing Greatness of France, should be form'd, on the great first Principle of common Preservation: That such a Confederacy being there form'd, the Maritime Powers, under which Denomination, Spain, Sweden, and Denmark, as well as England and the States were included, should make it their more immediate Business to cut the Nerves of the French Power, by destroying their Trade and naval Force: That, at the same time, all the Land Force of the League on the Continent should endeavour to put France on the defensive, by carrying the War into the Bowels of that Kingdom: And that the great Drift of the whole Scheme should be, not merely to humble that aspiring Power, but to disable her for ever, by cantoning it once more into the several Principalities it was once compos'd of; as had been endeavour'd by the French Grandees in the Reign of Henry the Third, and as would have been then effected, if the insatiable Ambition of Philip the Second of Spain would have given way to it.

Here we have the first rough Draught of a general Confederacy against France; and it is not improbable, that something of this nature ture was the important Business that brought over the Prince of Orange in Person, to found the Depths and Shallows of the Court of England.

Mr. North has recourse to his Brother's Memorials on this Occasion; and from them we are told, "That the public Pretence of his Highness's Visit was, to desire the King to declare War against France, and THEN Spain, Holland, and Germany, would be sure to come in: That, by way of Inducement, he told his Majesty this Step would put him to no considerable Expence; two thousand Men, and a few Ships, would be sufficient; the Charge of which might be easily defray'd out of his own Revenue: That his Majesty asking, How he could be sure, that, if he began the War, the States would come into it? the Prince reply'd, He was very confident of it; and he would persuade them so as they should not refuse: That his Majesty then said, That if the States would begin the War, he would follow them; and, in that case, they would be oblig'd not to leave him: That for him to enter first, with so small a Force, was irrational: That if the Prince could persuade the States to follow in the War, he might persuade them to lead in it, as they ought, as being in more immediate Danger: That, however, he would give his Ambassador in France Orders to join with the Dutch Ambassador, in any kind of Overtures to the French King."

If this Dialogue had not been handed down to us on the Authority of a Judge, Privy-Counsellor, and Politician, it would have little or no Consideration: And, as it has, we can only say, with due Reverence, That this is the first time that we find the Prince of Orange saying such inane and disingenuous Things to any Person, upon any Occasion whatever;— Things that he could not rationally hope would impose upon any body, much less on the King, who wanted nothing of the great Man, but Application and Resolution; and that seem to have no kind of Agreement, not only with the then Crisis, but even with the whole Current of Affairs, ever since the first Opening of the Negotiations at Nimeguen: There indeed we find one of the Dutch Ministers talking, not treating, on the Subject of England's becoming a Party in the War, and undertaking to shew at how small an Expence, and with how inconsiderable a Force, she could turn the Fate of the War: But, since that time, we had actually enter'd into a Concert with the States, and the Parliament had granted Supplies for an actual War with France, upon an Establishment widely different from what is here reported in the Prince's Name: And, again, since then, Mr. Sydney had found Means to prevail with the States to reject the Offers of France; not in consideration of any thing his Majesty could singly do, but on Assurances, that when their Distresses should demand it, he would summon a Parliament, that by their Help he might be able to suc-

cour them indeed. It is but reasonable, therefore, to presume, that, instead of coming over to seduce the King only into the Quarrel, his real Errand was to call upon his Majesty for an effectual Performance of his Engagements, by coming to an Agreement with those who had the Ascendency in Parliament; whether in concert with them, or purely and simply, for the Good of the common Cause, is not, perhaps, so easy to be decided.

The Right Honourable Memorialist is indeed pleas'd to acknowledge, "That his Highness press'd the King extremely to satisfy the Nation, and agree with his People: That his Majesty lent a favourable Ear, bidding him ask any of the discontented Party what would do it, and what were their whole Demands: That the Prince, hereupon, consent'd with some of them, and gave for Answer, That there was no undertaking for an Assembly, for they would do as they pleas'd: But there must be more than the Exclusion; for that was but Parchment, which was nothing.— That the King, thereupon, understood they must have the Militia (a) &c. and took occasion to start a new Question, which might have been put with more Propriety at first, viz. Who were the Nation's Suppôts, said his Majesty, as you have spoken with some who are for this, I should speak with thrice as many who are against it; would you call the growing Satisfaction to a few, a Way to satisfy all? My Friends are modest, quiet Men, who make no Noise, but are far more considerable than all the others." The Memorialist proceeds to say, "That his Highness wonder'd much at this Declaration; for he thought the Dissatisfy'd Party infinitely more numerous than the other. But he was farther told, That was because he convers'd with more ease: And that it was not in his Power to know the Temper and Opinion of the People, and the Value of Parties, better than the King."

To what Length this Conversation went, or how it terminated, our Memorialist has not thought proper to specify: The King we see is left in possession of the Argument, and the Prince utterly confounded: Which to a common Capacity appears strange enough: For, if the King had to clear a Majority of the People with him, why should he decline meeting them in Parliament, which was the great Point the Prince had to solicit? And, if he had not, his Majesty's Premises, and the Building he had rais'd upon them, apparently sunk together.

Our Memorialist, however, makes a Distinction between this latter Conference and the former, by representing a War with France, as the public Pretence of the Prince's Journey, and the Exclusion as his private Business; which, it seems, he thought the most wholesome Expedient to satisfy the People; because the Limitations were derogatory to the Monarchy. He also insinuates, That the Dutch rather sought to embroil the King, than to become Parties in the War themselves.

(a) For this unfair, &c. the Memorialist is answerable.

elves: For, says he, the next News receiv'd here, after the King had declar'd, that his Minister at Paris should join in the Remonstrances of the States, was, that they had order'd their Ambassador to take care, by all means, not to give any Provocation to France to occasion a War: And, upon the Whole, takes occasion to make the following Inferences: "By this I perceiv'd, how forward the Prince was to engage the King in a War, and to desire him to rely upon his Advice; and likewise, how mistaken in his Measures; and what Reason the King had to take care, before he was engag'd; and how far from having any Intrigue with France that was prejudicial; and how groundless the Obloquy of the People was."

Mr. North not only calls this a very important Memoir, as indeed it is, in some respects, but makes a most unmerciful Use of it. According to him, the Memorialist did not see far enough into this Intrigue: No Man's Wisdom, says he, is a Match for all Events: What is by the first call'd Mistake in the Prince, is by the last call'd Disguise: And, without Remorse, he prompts us to conclude, "That his Highness would have taken the like Advantage against his Uncle, as he afterwards did against his Father-in-law, if the Circumstances of the Times had afforded him the like Opportunity." Again, at the Distance of above 300 Quarto Pages, (for, after his singular Manner of treating this Reign, he has split this Memoir into two Parts, and placed them thus far asunder) he further pronounces, "That the Prince had too much Honour to say, that the Parliament would provide what was fit, because he knew the contrary; and also, that the King must know the same:— That the Dutch were in the right (politically speaking) to move by the Prince, upon the Strength of his Interest and Credit, and not by their own Ambassador; there being a direct Answer to them, Begin first, I'll follow: That their Stadtlieder might undertake any thing for them: And if the King had been drawn in by him, they would have excus'd themselves from following, by saying,— The Prince had no Authority from us:— He said what he thought;— you trusted him:— But that doth not oblige us: That what happen'd made good this Consequence; for not having Interest enough to hinder their Lordships from making Peace, how could he have induc'd them to make War?— That if the Action at Mons had been taken in France for a Rupture, and a War had ensu'd, the Dutch had taken the Volant, and done just enough to have kept the Fire alive, and to have secur'd to themselves the naval Import and Export Trade of all Europe:— That the King would have been put to Sea in an unprovided Vessel," &c. &c.

Notice has already been taken of this magisterial Writer's Inaccuracy, in treating of foreign Affairs; with what Justice, let the Reader decide, when he recollects, That the Prince came on this Visit to England, July 23, 1681, as in a Foot-note is acknowledg'd by Mr. North himself: That the Battle of Mons was fought August the 14th, 1678, almost Three Years before: That the King, instead of being thus miserably unprovided, had then been in full supply'd by his Parliament for an actual War: And that the English Forces, rais'd for that End, had a very eminent Share in the signal Glories of that remarkable Day.

But, over and above this flagrant Anachronism, and the Reasonings deduc'd from it, this whole Passage, as well as the Memorial itself, which gave rise to it, is liable to a Variety of Objections. Fan-Letters, the Dutch Ambassador to England, was actually sent over hither, as if to prepare the Way for the Prince of Orange. (says the London Gazette, [Nov. 1461.] to acquaint his Majesty with the Sentiments and Resolutions of the States, on the late Proceedings of the French in the Province of Luxembourg;) and, from the Nature of Things, it must be concluded, that he had Instructions from his Masters to support the Prince in all things; for any Difference in their Language must have defeated the whole Negotiation at once, and furnish'd the English Ministers with a reasonable Pretence for turning a deaf Ear to all their Proposals.

In Truth all Europe was, at this Time, equally alarm'd and provok'd at the daily Outrages of France; and there appear'd every where, a suitable Spirit of Relentment; which the Spaniards as well as the States, and the Prince of Orange, endeavour'd, by all the Arts of the Cabinet, to make the most of. Their Couriers were in continual Motion, their Ministers were in continual Conferences; and before the Close of the Year abundant Proofs broke out, that a general Confederacy was actually under Deliberation. Whence it must be presum'd, tho', perhaps, it cannot be circumstantially prov'd, That the Prince of Orange was neither the Cats Foot of the States, to draw the King of England singly and unprovided into a War with France, merely for the Furtherance of their Traffic; nor play'd the Incendiary himself, merely to gratify his own private Ambition. But that he came over to make his last Efforts to disengage his Majesty from France, and to prevail with him to give Life, Spirit, Motion, and Efficacy to that Association, which, alone, was able to set Europe free.

General Consideration of France under Deliberation.

Even before his Arrival here, he had spirited up the Elector of Brandenburg to signify to the French Minister, Resident at his Court, "That if the King his Master continued to treat the States of the Empire, and particularly the Elector Palatine, as he had lately done, he would find there were Princes enough in the Empire, that would not bear it, and that would take such Measures as might be necessary for their Common Peace and Security." And his most Christian Majesty having disobligh'd his old Stipendiary the King of Sweden, by giving the Duchy of Deux Ponts to the Prince of Birkenfeldt to his Prejudice, Care was immediately taken to improve that Incident, that he also had thus early shewn a Disposition to abandon the Alliance of France, and to enter into Engagement with the Emperor and Empire;

pire; by which he was to oblige himself to contribute 20000 Men to the Common Service, exclusive of his Contingent as Duke of Piedmont.

The like Disposition appear'd on all Sides; and nothing was wanting but the Countenance, Power, and Wealth of England, to make the great Experiment for the first time, whether France alone was a Match for all the rest of Europe.

French in the Netherlands.

But to sure was his most Christian Majesty that he had a better Interest in his Brother of England, than the Prince of Orange, that even while his Highness was here in Person, he caus'd the Prince of Parma, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands to be inform'd, That if the Count de Bissy was not put in Possession of the County of Chimay, in twice forty-eight Hours after he had receiv'd that Notice, the Count de Montber had Orders to enter with his Forces into the Spanish Territories; and, at the same time, Notice was also given to the Boors of that Districh, that if they presum'd to remove their Forage, or Cattle, or cut their Corn, their Villages should be fir'd about their Ears. And when the Country was actually surrendr'd, as upon this terrifying Summons it immediately was, the Use made of it by the French, was to shut up Loevenburg on every Side, and to cut off all Provisions sent to the Relief of the Garrison, who, by that means, in the midst of a nominal Peace, endur'd almost all the Extremities of an avow'd War.

In this same Interval, also, at the Conferences held at Courtray, with relation to the French Claims, under the Head of Dependencies, the Commissaries for his most Christian Majesty made a farther Demand of the Country of Alost, containing three Towns, and one hundred and eighty Villages; as also the Little Brabant, being Part of the County of Wais, and the four Ambachts near Ghent; and that not from any Pretence they could derive from the Treaty of Nimwegen; but the Right of Conquest only: So that the Will and Pleasure of his most Christian Majesty was now to be a Law, not only to his own Vassals, but to all who were within the Reach of his Power, tho' out of his Jurisdiction.

Nor, after the Prince of Orange's (b) Departure from the Court of England, which was on the tenth Day after his Arrival there, did the Grand Monarque shew any more Apprehensions of the German Princes, than he had before shewn of the Resentments of Spain, or the Intrigues of his Highness; as the Sequel will demonstrate.

Upon the Motions of the French Troops, in the Neighbourhood of Straßburg, the Court of Vienna had dispatch'd Mr. Mercy to reside in that City on his Behalf; or, as it was given out, to take care of his Imperial Majesty's Interest. And, no sooner had the Baron de Mandlare, the French Lieutenant-General in Alsace, received Intimation of it, than he gave the Magistrates of Straßburg to understand, That if the said Mr. Mercy did not immediately leave the Place, he would burn all the Villages that belong'd to them. Which Menace had such an Effect, That this Imperial Agent was immediately forc'd to leave this Imperial City accordingly.

Nothing could be more shocking than a Message at once so peremptory and so unprecedented, which was equally an Insult to the Emperor and Empire: And nothing can be alledg'd in Excuse of it, except the Politician will unmake at once and shamefully avow, That whatever is expedient is lawful.

His most Christian Majesty could not be satisfi'd with the Possession of Alsace, which had been ceded to him by the Treaty of Munster and Nimwegen, unless he was Master alio of Straßburg; which commanded the Passage of the Rhine, and might be call'd the Key of Germany.

To have attack'd this Place with open Force, would have immediately set the German Princes in Arms; in which Case the Enterprize would have been hazardous, and the Event dubious. It was thought more expedient, therefore, to have Recourse to Negotiation, or rather Corruption: And the Intrigue was esteem'd to be of so much Importance, that Mr. de Louvois undertook the Management of it himself, tho' we find the Glory of the Success, thro' an Excess of Flattery, ascrib'd in his political Testament, to the superior Wisdom and Address of the King his Master.

The Means he made use of was to open a Correspondence with the Magistrates themselves, and, in particular, to secure to his Interest the Burgonialsers of the Year, who were intrud'd to contend for the Reduction of the Garrison, under the Pretence of reducing the public Charge; which was so much the more plausible, inasmuch as the City was encumber'd with Debts; and in a time of Peace, as that was, it might be presum'd, there was no Enemy to guard against, or Danger to be fear'd.

Proposals of this kind are sure to be heard with Favour: The Advice was not only receiv'd, but applauded: The People were glad to be reliev'd: The Burgonialsers were honour'd as Patriots; and Part of the Garrison was discharg'd; which was no sooner done, than Mr. de Louvois had Notice, and in Person joining Mr. de Mandlare, appear'd on the 22<sup>d</sup> of September before the City, seiz'd on Fort Keil and the Bridge the same Day; and

and in the Empire.

(A) All that Bishop Burnet has thought fit to remember of this important Voyage of his Hero, we find under the Translations of the Year 1684, as follows:

"The Prince had come for a few Days to England, after the Oxford Parliament; and had much private Discourse with the King at Windsor. The King assur'd him, that he would keep things quiet, and not give way to the Duke's Engagement, as long as he liv'd; And added, he was confident, whenever the Duke came to reign, he would be so restless and violent, that he would not hold it for Years to an End. This I had from the Prince's own Mouth." The Bishop further says, "That the Earl of Portland (Boswell) told him, that his Majesty shew'd the Prince one of his Seals, and told him, that whatever he might write to him, if the Letter was not fir'd with that Seal, he was to look on it as only drawn from him by Impunity." and the next summon'd the Place to surrender, as belonging to his most Christian Majesty in virtue of the Treaties before mention'd: The honest Burgomasters now acted the Hero, as they had done the Patriot before: They were all for a desperate Defence, and for being bury'd under the Ruins: And, having given suitable Orders to the Reliques of the Garrison, assembled the Burgeses, and began their Harangues; which, as had been foreseen, were soon interrupted by the Clamours of the Populace, who, surrounding the Town-house, loudly and importunately demanded, that they would forthwith set open the Gates, and save the City from Destruction. These Outcries from without gave an immediate Turn to the Deliberations within: "If the People are resolv'd to submit, we must make a Virtue of Necessity, and those notable Burgomasters, and so behave to this great King, in the Person of his favourite Minister, that we may find in him a powerful Protector, instead of an exasperated Enemy." Fear had now taken such absolute Possession of the Assembly, that those who were not in the Secret became as tractable, as those who were. Orders were instantly given to beat a Parley; the Flag of Capitulation was, at the same time, spread; and, on the 30th, the French took Possession of the Place, on their own Terms, in effect; for they put the Roman Catholics in possession of the Cathedral Church, which had been held by the Protestants ever since the Reformation; they had all the Town Magazines, Cannon, &c. put into their Hands; they disarm'd the Inhabitants, with this mitigating Circumstance only, that their Weapons of all Sorts were to be lock'd up in a separate Apartment, of which the Magistrates were to keep the Keys. They took care to introduce a Mark of their new-acquir'd Sovereignty into the Civil Proceedings of the Town-Courts, by subjecting all Causes exceeding a thousand French Livres in Value to an Appeal to the Council of Brisac; and, to crown the whole Proceeding, his most Christian Majesty left his own Royal Residence on purpose to make his triumphal Entry into it; which he did with great Pomp (being attended by his whole Court) on October the 14d, having been met by the Magistrates as far as Schiffsst, where they made their Submission to their new Master on their Knees, and the next Day heard Mass at the Cathedral; which, to do him the greater Honour, was celebrated by the Bishop in Person.

The Emperor complains of the French King.

All Europe was astonish'd at this unexpected Incident; and the Emperor immediately dispatching Count Mansfield to complain of it as a Breach of the Peace, his most Christian Majesty was pleas'd to reply, "That he could not sufficiently admire, that his Imperial Majesty should interpose in an Affair which no ways concern'd him; That he had a Right to the Place, as being the Capital of Alsace, which had been ceded to him by Treaty, and that if he had not taken Possession of it sooner, it was for such Reasons, as he did not think himself oblig'd to explain to any body." The Count, expecting this Plea, was ready with his Answer, "That in the very Contest from whence his Majesty deriv'd his Right, the ten free Cities of Alsace, of which Strasbourg was the principal, were expressly excepted: That they were immediate Fiefs of the Empire, and in all other Respects independent, and therefore could not be dismember'd even by the Emperor himself." "Very well then, rejoins the King, that very Independency You urge is sufficient to warrant my Possession. If the Strasburghers were free, they had a right to chuse their own Master; and in taking them under my Protection I have done them no Injury."

Not without Effort.

The Electors and Princes of Germany, however, supported the Remonstrances of the Emperor, in such a manner, as sufficiently shew'd their Fears were equal to their Dangers and their Resentments to both; and tho' Mr. de Avoaux, in an artful Memorial endeavour'd to palliate the Matter to the States of Holland, their Lordships dispatch'd Mr. Van Beuninghen once more to England, in hope, that, mamb'd, and insensible as the King and his Ministers had, hitherto, appear'd, this heavy Blow would restore them to the Use of their Faculties, and beyond all Arguments convince them of the immediate Necessity of joining with the rest of Europe against such a perfidious Enemy.

The States send Mr. Van Beuninghen once more into England.

Sir John Kersey says, that being, a little before this, in Conversation with his Friend and Patron Lord Halifax, his Lordship had given him to understand, "That, were it [Mem. p. 124.] not for the Interest the King of France had here, he did not doubt but he should be able to put England into a very happy State and Condition in a very short time: That there was no Hope of doing any thing by way of Parliament, EXCEPT his most Christian Majesty should make some new Attempt on Flanders: And that such an Incident might be made use of as a Handle, whereby to reconcile all Differences." Sir John farther says, "That such an Opportunity offer'd itself soon after: That News came the French King had taken Strasbourg; whereby, becoming Master of the Rhine, he might intercept all Communication and Commerce between the Low-Countries and Germany; so that the former would be absolutely oblig'd to bend the Knee to France, if we did not enter into a League with them against the common Adversary; which they did most earnestly solicit."

But, however free the King was from having any prejudicial Intrigue with France, however groundless the Obloquy of the People was on that head, as Lord North teaches, however fair an Opportunity now offer'd to reconcile all Differences, however earnestly the States demanded our Assistance, and however reasonable it might be to grant it, the King turn'd a deaf Ear to their Solicitations, nor would be diverted from pursuing the great Point of subduing the Faction at home, for any foreign Consideration, how important, or interesting it were.

Who finds the King, as before, immovable.

And yet, though the Lord, last-quoted, so explicitly explicitly affirms, That the Dutch Embassador in France had positive Orders from his Masters not to give any such Provocation to the most Christian King as should occasion a War, after their Lordships had receiv'd abundant Reason to despair of England for ever (which Despair might very well justify their behaving with the utmost Caution in such dubious Circumstances) we find them, at this very Crisis, endeavouring to form the best Confederacy that could be form'd without our Assistance, and pursuing it openly and avowedly, in contempt of the repeated Memorials of France to divert them from it. Nay, when they had actually completed a particular Alliance with Sweden, in Maintenance of the Treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen; and Mr. d'Armaux, had, in the Name of his Master, particularly complain'd of it, they return'd such an Answer, as at once manifest their Prudence, and maintain'd their Dignity, viz. That they were very desirous of his Majesty's Friendship; That they would do nothing that might give him any just Occasion of Offence: That their Opinion of his Majesty's Equity, would not suffer them to think that their making any Alliances for the good and Preservation of their Subjects could be offensive to his Majesty, THEY BEING A FREE, SOVEREIGN STATE: And that they could not conceal from his Majesty the Treaty they had made with Sweden, nor believe he would dislike it, as long as they persuaded themselves, that his Majesty's Intentions were to preserve the Peace of Europe. And Mr. d'Armaux, still continuing to express his Master's Dissatisfaction with the said Alliance, their Lordships came to a Resolution to add ten, or, if there was Occasion, twenty Men to a Company, that the Republic, in case of a sudden Attack, might not, like Strasbourg, be found unprovided.

To make our leave of the Acquisitions of France for this Year, on the very Day that Mr. de Leucois took Possession of that City, Casal, the Capital of Montferrat, situated on the Po, admitted also a French Garrison; which was, at once, an additional Mortification to the House of Austria, and an additional Proof of the towering Aims of France. This Place was under the immediate Sovereignty of the Duke of Mantua: And it was in virtue of a Treaty with him, that his most Christian Majesty became Master of it. Here, therefore, there was neither Fraud nor Violence to complain of; but then it was a Fief of the Empire; and the Emperor, himself, was presumptive Heir to the Duke; and yet his Highness had never consulted him on the Occasion, nor would France, as it was rightly presum'd, descend to apply for, or submit to, the Ceremonial of an Investiture. These were, therefore, made the Pretences of Clamour against both the contracting Parties: But the true Ground of his Imperial Majesty's Uneasiness was his Dread of the Neighbourhood of the French in Italy; and that one Encroachment would make way for another, till it should become necessary either to resign the Sword, or throw away the Scabbard: And his Expostulations on the Subject with the Duke were so warm, and were so warmly resent'd, that it gave rise to a Report, That his Highness would make over the whole of his Dominions to France; and that he would take up his Residence for the future in that Kingdom, with a Reserve of such Titles, Honours, and Privileges, as should leave him in Possession of the Shadow of Sovereignty, tho' he had parted with the Substance.

We are now to follow the Duke of York into Scotland, and to give a brief State of that Kingdom under his Administration; that we may learn from his Conduct there, what Reason there was to fear his Succession to the Government here.

His Royal Highness was scarce arriv'd at Edinburgh, (viz. towards the End of the preceding Year) before he had Reason to apprehend that no Endeavours would be wanting to make his Residence as uneasy in the one Nation, as he had found it in the other; and he, in return, so behaved, as left no Room for either to doubt of what Faith he meant to be the Defender.

The annual Pope-burning, which had answer'd so well in London, &c. had never yet been imitated in any Part of Scotland: And now, all at once, a Disposition appear'd in the Students of the College of Edinburgh to try the Experiment on Christmas Day; which was judg'd fitter than any other for the Ceremonial of executing Antichrist in Effigy. Accordingly, the necessary Preparations were made; and it being apprehended from the unusual Resort of known Papists, about that time, to Town, that these young Adventurers would meet with some Opposition, they oblig'd themselves in Writing to go thro' with the Frolic, one and all, and to defend themselves against the said Papists in case of an Attack, under this notable Precaution in the Front of their Paper, That except the Pope, they had no Intention to put an Affront upon any body.

The Secret, however, was not so well kept, but the Lord Provost got notice of it; and, by him it was convey'd to the Duke and Lord Chancellor, who appear'd greatly incens'd, and also determin'd either to prevent the thing, or punish those who appear'd in it. In order to which the Principal of the College had Orders first to extort a contrary Obligation from the Students to that they had subscrib'd before; which being refus'd by all except some Novices, two English Gentlemen, and some few others, suppos'd to be the King-leaders, were the next Day apprehended, and by the City Magistrates committed to the Custody of the Soldiers. A Proclamation was also set forth, forbidding all Merchants, Tradesmen, &c. to suffer their Apprentices or Servants to go abroad on Christmas Day. And lastly, when the Day came, the Town was fill'd with Soldiers to deter the Students from prosecuting their Purpose: But they were not to be deterr'd it seems: On the contrary, issuing out in a Body, and being join'd in their way by Numbers of the Townsmen, &c. they made a shift to set Fire to their Pageant, with a loud Exclamation of, Pereat Papa! and then wisely dispers'd, leaving his Holiness to the Care of his Protestant Defenders. It happen'd that one of the English Students was of the name of Grey; and hence arose a Suspicion, that the Lord Grey was at the Bottom of all: But tho' they were examin'd very strictly on this head, and even threatened with the Boot, they would confess nothing to authorise it. Upon which, having given Security for their farther Appearance, when call'd upon by the Council, they were discharge'd.

Here it was presum'd, this ridiculous Bustle would have ended; but the Soldiers, whether of themselves, or by Direction, is uncertain, took all Occasions after this to insult the Students; and, in particular, cleft one of them thro' the Skull, before the very Gate of the College, as it is said, without the least Provocation. This rais'd the Ferment higher than ever: The Principal and Regents, fearful of the Consequence, would have thrown themselves at his Royal Highness's Feet; but were refus'd; and when they were, at last, admitted, the Students grew jealous, that they had made a Submission, and begg'd Pardon for burning the Pope: Upon which they all appear'd before the Provost's Houfe with blew Ribbands in their Hats, inscrib'd, No Pope! And in passing thro' the Streets, accompany'd with Numbers of the Populace be-ribbon'd after the same manner, the whole Possie shouted forth the same Words: Nor was this all; one of the Students had rashly said, That the Provost had deserv'd to have his Houfe burnt. And soon after his Houfe was burnt accordingly. The Scholars were immediately accus'd of the Fact, as it was natural they should; all Appearances were against them; and no Endearments were spar'd to saddle them with it. Several were taken up and examin'd before the Council: The Story went, that one of them was tortur'd, but would confess nothing. And upon the whole, no positive Proofs appearing, all ended in setting forth a Proclamation, in which it was declar'd, that the Houfe was wilfully burnt, by throwing in of Fireballs: That it could be imputed to none but them: And all and every of the said Students, who could not, nor would not, find (e) Security for their good Behaviour, were commanded to depart from Edinburgh fifteen Miles, at least, in twenty-four Hours.

The Schools were, likewise, by Order of the Council, shut up; and, tho' the Principal rais'd a Doubt whether a College, established by Parliament, could, without the Authority of Parliament, be dissolv'd; and desir'd to have the Matter argu'd by his Advocates before the Council, no regard was shewn to his Plea; and the College continu'd shut till February the 14; when, at the Instance of the Magistracy of Edinburgh, as well as the said Principal and Regents, it was again open'd; on Condition that all the Students who were re-admitted, should give the Security before requir'd, should take the Oath of Allegiance, and sign an Engagement to attend divine Worship as by Law establish'd.

The (d) Narrative, from whence these Particulars are extracted, concludes with a Prayer for the King's long Life, upon a Surmise, that his Successor might be one, who was resolv'd to look upon his People's expressing their Detestation of Popery, as a Crime next door to Rebellion, and every public Avowal of the Protestant Religion to be an intolerable affront to his Person.

Whether the turbulent Spirit which manifested itself on this Occasion was laid at once; or whether it continued to haunt the Public in any other shape, we have no Authority to decide: But if those in Power met with no new Provocations, they shew'd it was no easy Matter for them to forget the old: For when it was thought advisable to have recourse to a Parliament once more, not to remove the Complaints of the Scotts People, but to strengthen yet farther the Hands of the Government, Occasion was taken in the King's most gracious Letter to that Assembly (after a Repetition of that favourite Court-Maxim, That the Happiness of the People was best preserv'd, by preserving the Power of the Crown) to signify, "That his Majesty expected they would not connive at the smallest Appearance of those wicked and seditious Principles, which (how plausibly soever disguis'd, under the old Pretences and fallacious Masks of Liberty and Religion; ever least minded by the most clamorous Pretenders to them) yet, in the Issue, led to such monstrous Effects, and rebellious Extravagancies, as necessarily tended to the Dissolution of all Government and Order."

As this Parliament had been call'd at the Duke's Instance, and for his peculiar Service, nothing would satisfy him but to represent his Majesty in it: And so great was his Ascendancy, and of so little Consequence was it now held to save Appearances with the People, that he was indulg'd in all he requir'd; whether without Opposition, or whether with such Opposition as only serv'd to shew he was irresistible, is no where explain'd. In the King's Letter it is said, his Majesty had appointed him to be his Commissioner, as an eminent Expression of his Favour, to the Parliament: And, what was yet more emphatical, That his (the Duke's) Interest was inseparable from his Majesty's: And the Duke, on his part, in his Speech at the Opening of the Session, made it his Glory, that the King had chosen him for that Service, vice, Since, said he, it flows to all the World the Goodness be bath for us, as well as the Trust and Confidence he bath in me.

Papists were by the Law of Scotland, as well as England, render'd incapable of holding any Place of Trust or Profit. It seems reasonable to think, therefore, that the Scots might have legally refus'd to act under an illegal Commissioner: And Bishop Burnet bears witness, that above forty Members of Parliament were of this Opinion; and were actually for forming an Opposition on this Principle, in case the Duke of Hamilton would have taken the Lead: But his Grace being weary of striving, in vain, with the Torrent of Power; and finding his own Passage easy to a Place in the Council, in case he gave way to it, declin'd the Service: And, what is yet more strange, the Patriot-Advocates, Lockhart and Cunningham, pronounced, that the Words Places and Offices of Trust did not comprehend a Commission to represent the King's Person.

Thus his Royal Highness found all Incapacities as effectually remov'd, as if he was already in possession of the Crown: And, as if convinced by this Instance of Ductility, that the Parliament was in a Disposition to swallow any thing, proceeded to promise most royally, in the King's Name, That the Episcopal Government of the Church should be inviolably maintain'd: That the Laws should have their Course, &c. At the same time also, and under the same Authority, solemnly recommending such Courses as should most effectually suppress seditions and rebellious Conventicles; and signifying his Majesty's Expectations, "That they would not be short of the Loyalty of their Ancestors, in vigorously asserting and clearing his Royal Prerogative, and in declaring the Rights of his Crown in its natural and legal Course of Descent; as also, in taking care to settle and provide seasonable and necessary Supplies," &c.

The Duke, it seems, made a right Judgment of those he spoke to. In their whole Answer to his Majesty's Letter, there was but one Expression which seem'd to argue they durst entertain a Thought which would be displeasing to his Royal Highness, viz. "That they should with all Christian Care and Duty endeavour to confirm his Majesty's Concern for the Protestant Religion, so as it might become a solid and pious Support to his Royal Family, and Monarchy, and a sure Fence in this disturbed and divided Church, against all the Usurpations and Disorders of POPEY and FANATICISM."

Possibly, even this seeming-uncourtly Strain of Zeal may be accounted for. If the Kingdom was once secur'd, all Things might be added to it: And, as the Dread of Popery was the main Obstacle, whatever had the Force of providing for the Safety of the Protestant Religion, had a real Tendency to establish the Succession. Now the Business of the Scotch Parliament had, thro' the Corruptions and Encroachments of the Times, devolv'd upon, and been prepar'd and digested by, the Lords of Articles; and these, who were wholly under the Influence of the Court, had so order'd it, that the Session should be open'd by two Acts;

the first of which was apparently calculated to smooth the Passage for the other, viz. One for ratifying and approving all Laws then in being for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and against Popery: And the other declaring, That no Difference of Religion; nor no Act of Parliament, made or to be made, could alter or divert the Right of Succession, or lineal Descent of the Crown; or could stop or hinder them in the full, free, and actual Administration of the Government; and that it was High Treason in any of the Subjects of that Kingdom, by writing or acting, by Word or Deed, to endeavour the Alteration or Suspension of the said Right of Succession, &c.

Bishop Burnet says, that when these Bills [Hist. p. 510] were brought into the House, some mov'd, in relation to the first, that the Laws in question might be examin'd before they were confirm'd, some being too severe, and some having prov'd inefficual: That, however, no Regard was shewn to these Scruples, nor could any Delay be admitted of: And that the Bill itself was an Amusement, and no more; as indeed was in a manner self-evident; for nothing new was obtain'd in it; no not the Approbation of him who pass'd it; for he acted by Deputation, and could only renew the Sanction which his Brother had given already. And, of the second, the said Prelate adds, That the leading Patriots of all Ranks, particularly the Duke of Hamilton and Earl of Argyle, eipous'd it with Zeal:
That all others that intended to writ it made Harangues about it: And that the Lord Tweeddale was the only Person who ventur'd to move, That the Act might be made as strict as possible, with relation to the Duke (and his Family, must be understood) but no farther; since the Queen of Spain, who was his Majesty's Niece, stood to near the Succession; and it was no amiable thing for the Kingdom to become a Province of Spain. Upon the whole Matter, both Acts pass'd, without one dissenting Vote; and the Duke, when he gave the Royal Assent to them, took occasion to declare, That [Gazette, Numb. 164.] he did very heartily go along with them in providing for the Security of the Protestant Religion: At which the House appear'd as much overjoy'd, as it was possible for the Patriots of England to have been on obtaining their favourite Exclusion-Bill.

The next Sacrifice that these Court-Idolaters were call'd upon to make was a Free-will-offering of a new Supply, towards the Maintenance of the Forces; which, to shew they were cheerful Givers, was also dispatch'd without one Negative: And, with almost the same Generosity, they continu'd the Excise, which was devoted to the same Use; for,
upon the Question, but fix appear'd against it.

These were manifest Court-Jobs, and as such were manifestly agreed to; for, by the Death of the Lord Chancellor Rolles, at the very Opening of the Parliament, a great Place was become vacant; and those who had the best Pretensions by having the most Influence, vied with each other in Prostitutions, in the hope of being intitled by superior Merit to succeed him. And, that no Advantages which might be drawn from so yielding a Parliament might be lost, all the Addresses that these notable Candidates were Masters of was brought into play to annex new Powers to the Prerogative, by Acts seemingly calculated for the sake of Justice and Reformation. Thus, when Application was made in behalf of the Subject, against those little Tyrants who had a sort of Sovereignty in their own Lordships, it was promis'd, that there should be a Regulation of the Courts held by them, by subjecting their several Jurisdictions to the Review of the supreme Judicatories. "But the Act, says Burnet, was penn'd in such Words, as importeth, that the whole Course of Justice all over the Kingdom, was made subject to the King's Will and Pleasure. So that, instead of Appeals to the supreme Courts, all was made to end in a personal Appeal to the King: And by this Means, he was made Master of the whole Justice and Property of the Kingdom."

Proceedings against Lord Halton.

The same Prelate adds, "That, as they were going on in public Business, one stood up in Parliament, and accus'd the Lord Halton, the Duke of Lauderdale's Brother-in-law, so often mention'd, of Perjury, on the Account of Michel's (r) Business. He had in his Hands the two Letters that Lord Halton had written to the Earl of Kincardin, mentioning the Promise of Life that was made him: And, as was told formerly, Lord Halton swore at his Trial, that no Promise was made. The Lord Kincardin was dead before this: But his Lady had deliver'd those Letters to be made use of against Lord Halton. Upon the reading them the Matter appear'd plain: The Duke was not ill pleas'd to have both Duke Lauderdale and him thus at Mercy; yet he would not suffer the Matter to be determin'd in a parliamentary way; so he mov'd, that the whole thing might be refer'd to the King; which was immediately agreed to: So that infamous Business was made public, and yet stifled at the same time; and no Censure was ever put on that base Action."

How represented in the Gazette, Numb. 1651.

Thus the Bishop. And yet in the Account of the Scottish Transactions publish'd by Authority, we find the Fact stated as follows: "There having, soon after the Opening of the Parliament, been Articles presented by one Noble against the Lord Halton (there call'd Halton) Lord Treasurer Depute for a pretended Subornation of Perjury, in the Case of one Michel, who suffer'd Death as a Traitor: And the Lords of the Articles, having examin'd the same, and the Lord Halton's Answer, they were so little satisfy'd with the said Accusation, that they would have immediately rejected it, and would have caus'd the Accuser to have been exemplarily punish'd, had not the Lord Halton, press'd, in his own Vindication, that the Matter might be brought to the severest Trial: Which the Lords of the Articles, considering his Lordship is one of his Majesty's Officers of State, thought not fit to allow of, till his Royal Highness, as his Majesty's High Commissioner, shall have represented the Matter to his Majesty, as it lies before them; and that his Majesty shall have signify'd his Royal Pleasure therein."

The Bishop further writes, "That the Lord Bargeny, who was Nephew to Duke Hamilton, had been clapt up in Prison, as concern'd in the Rebellion of Bottwell-Bridge. Several Days were fix'd on for his Trial; but it was always put off: And at last he was let out, without having any one thing ever objected to him. When he was at liberty, he us'd all possible Endeavours to find out on what Grounds he had been committed: At last he discover'd a Conspiracy, in which Halton and some others of the Party were concern'd. They had practis'd on some who had been in that Rebellion to swear, That he (Bargeny) and several others were engag'd in it; and that they had sent them out to join in it. They promis'd these Witnesses a large Share in the confiscated Estates, if they went thro' in the Business. Depositions were prepar'd for them, and they promis'd to swear to them; upon which a Day was fix'd for the Trial: But the Hearts of these Witnesses fail'd them, or their Consciences rose upon them; so that, when the Day came on, they could not bring themselves to swear against an innocent Man, and plainly refus'd to do it: Yet, upon new Practices, and new Hopes, they again resolv'd to swear boldly: Upon which new Days had been set, twice or thrice; and, their Hears turning against it, they were still put off. Lord Bargeny had full Proofs of all this ready to be offer'd; but the Duke prevail'd to have this likewise refer'd to the King: And it was never more heard of."

The Gazette, on the other hand, only says, "That several Witnesses having been examin'd, at the Instance of the Lord Bargeny, against the Laird of Ardmillane, his Royal Highness, and the Lords of the Articles, did not find Ground to secure the Laird of Ardmillane, as was desir'd by the Lord Bargeny; but left it to him to consider, if he would insist on a Process against the Laird of Ardmillane, upon the Grounds of his Petition, and to chuse before what Judiciary he will bring it."

It is observable, that what these Grounds were is left to Conjecture; and that not the least Mention is made of the Lord Halton's Name, in this second Cause: But, if what follows be true, which we are to take on the Bishop's Authority, no question can be made, but that the Lord Halton's Conduct had been such, as no Privilege ought to have screen'd, as no Government ought to have pardon'd. His Lordship's Words are these: Vol. i. p. 523.

"The

All these Things, together with a Load of Age, and of a vast Bulk, sunk Duke (f) Lauderdale so that he died that Summer."

A new Test against Popery and Fanaticism.

We come now to that Affair, which, both in the Transaction and the Event, was the most important of the Session: Namely, the Act for imposing a new Test, which was to secure the Protestant Religion equally against Popery and Fanaticism.

The Right Reverend Historian, just quoted, introduces this Matter with observing, That a Promise had been given in the Beginning of the Session, that, as soon as the Act for maintaining the Succession was past, the Protestant Religion should be yet further secur'd, by any other Expedient that could be propos'd or desir'd. Accordingly that Act was no sooner pass'd, but those who had most Zeal call'd aloud for the Consideration; and the Cry was so popular, that there was no withstanding it. Such a Test was therefore propos'd, and consisted at first of no more than a Profession, upon Oath, of the Protestant Religion, as also a Resolution to maintain it, and an unreserv'd Acknowledgment of the King's Supremacy, which was to be made the Condition, sine qua non, of holding any Office of Trust or Profit, in Church or State. But on this Stock the Court-Party thought fit to graft several other Clauses: Such as the solemn Disavowal of Resistance, for any Cause, or under any Presence whatsoever; an Engagement, as solemn, never to join in any Endeavour to alter the Government in Church or State; a Renunciation of the Covenant; a Declaration, that it was unlawful for Subjects to enter into any Covenants or Leagues, or to hold any Meetings in order to deliberate or determine on Matters of State, Civil or Ecclesiastic; and an Obligation to maintain all the King's Rights and Prerogatives.

The Bishop asserts, the Test was thus loaded, to make the other Side grow weary of the Motion, and let it fall; which, it seems, they were willing enough to do, when they found how heavy it was like to prove. But no sooner did they discover that Inclination, than the Refiners about the Duke induced him to temporize once more, and to make this farther Sacrifice to the Protestant Religion, in regard of the Advantages arising from it to his temporal Interest.

The other Party, now finding themselves entangled in their own Noose, turn'd against the Bill they had before contended for, and some of them with more Warmth than Discretion: In particular, the Lord Belhaven, was rash enough to say, "That, tho' the Bill did abundantly secure the Protestant Religion, against Popery and Fanaticism, it made no Provision against a fanatical or popish Successor." Which Words were no sooner out of his Mouth, than three Parts in four of the House, cry'd out, To the Castle! To the Castle! And tho' his Lordship would have explain'd away the Offence, by pleading, That his Words related only to what might happen a hundred Years after, he was committed by order of the House, under a Charge of Treason, on the late Act, relating to the Succession; but was afterwards releas'd, on his humble Application to the House by Petition, and submitting to acknowledge his Fault, and ask Pardon on his Knees.

Lord Belhaven committed to the Castle of Edinburgh.

This Incident did not, however, put an End to the Opposition to the Bill; on the contrary, two or three Clauses in it gave rise to very warm Debates, viz. 1. That which provided that the Test should be taken, especially by all Members of Parliament, and Electors of Members of Parliament. Against which it was urg'd, That the Right of voting in Elections, and of sitting when elected, was the most essential of all the Privileges of the Subject, and therefore, ought, on no account, to be restrain'd: And on the other hand, the Bishops, who, above all things, dreaded a Presbyterian Parliament, contended as vehemently for it; on what Principle is not remember'd; and for what End, there is no necessity to explain. 2. That by which the King's LAWFUL BROTHERS and Sons were excepted. Against this the Earl of Argyle zealously and fatally distinguish'd himself: He said, the only Danger the Nation had to apprehend as to Popery, arose from a Possibility, that some of the Royal Family might be perverted; that, therefore, the principal Aim of the Bill, should be to shut the Door, if possible, against that Danger; and that it would be more advisable to have no Act at all, than one with such a Clause, as made express provision to leave the Nation obnoxious to it. 3. That which Bishop Burnet, not improperly, calls the great Point of all, namely, What Definition or Standard should be made, for fixing so general a Term as the Protestant Religion. The Confession of Faith then us'd in Scotland was that which had been set forth by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, in 1648, and which the Kirk had authoriz'd, and the Bishops hitherto continu'd at: But this, as Presbyterian, it may be presum'd, was willfully overlook'd; and another, which had been fram'd in 1559, and which had receiv'd the Sanction of a Law in 1567, but was now grown so obsolete, that scarce a Person in the House, and not

Rat. relas'd on his Submission.

(f) Ferguson asserts, That he had so incens'd the Duke, by saying, "That all his Royal Highness had done in Scotland was nothing, in regard the Oaths (of Qualification) were omitted; And that the Parliament he had held was but a Convention," that he durst not trust himself within his Reach. Growth of Popery, Part II. p. 310.

one of the Bishops had ever read it, was recommended in its stead. Our Right Reverend Historian declares, That he who propos'd it, and who was the only Person in the House who had read it, did so on a Presumption, that when certain Propositions in it came to be consider'd, it would induce those in Power not to put the Act in force: For whereas, according to the Test, it was unlawful for Subjects to take up Arms against the King, or those commission'd by him, on any pretence whatsoever; according to this Confession of Faith, &c. (which was fram'd to justify the deposing Mary Queen of Scots, and the obliging her afterwards to resign) it was not only held lawful, but meritorious, to repress Tyranny.

But, from whatever Motive it was propos'd, it was greedily embraced; and not more so by the Duke and his Courtiers, than the Right Reverend Fathers of the Church; who had neither the Ingenuity to acknowledge their Ignorance, nor the Grace to adjourn the Debate till they could procure Information; but, without Shame or Conscience, set the Example of implicit Faith, which they wanted the whole Nation to follow.

But one Day was allotted to the Consideration of an Affair of this very delicate Nature; in which short Space, all the Objections that were started by those who oppos'd it, were over-ru'd, and all the Scruples that must have unavoidably arisen in the Minds of those who appear'd for it, were stifled; and, to the Disgrace not only of the Protestant Religion, but even of Christianity itself, it was finally pass'd at Six o' Clock in the Evening, by a Majority of seven Voices: Which serves to shew, that, whatever Merit was made of it, it was look'd upon as the most iniquitous Job of this iniquitous Session.

With this enjoining Act, and one more for securing the Peace of the Country, the Business of the Session was clos'd; and soon after, the Parliament was (g) adjourn'd till the first of March.

Bishop Burnet (who, in the Scottish Affairs, and more especially in this particular Period, is upon the Whole our best Guide) asserts, that Lord Hyde, immediately on the Separation, was sent down from the King to the Duke, as it was given out, to press him, in his Majesty's Name, to return to the Church of England; that by such an Act of Grace he might have the Affections of the People to depend upon, as well as the Powers of the Government. "I was assured, says his Lordship, that Lord Halifax had prevail'd with the King to write to him to that Purpose: The Letter was written, but not sent. But Lord Hyde had it in charge to manage it as a Message. How much of this is true I cannot tell; one thing is certain, that, if it was true, it had no Effect."

While his Royal Highness was thus victorious and triumphant in Scotland, by the Help of a Parliament, the Ministers in England made it appear by their Actions, that they resolv'd to do as great Things without one.

We have already taken notice, that a Bill of Indictment had been found against Cellege at Oxford, though it had miscarry'd in London: And it being held neither fair nor expedient to hurry on his Trial during the same Affize, it was postpon'd till August the 17th; when a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer was issued for that Purpose, to the Lord Norreys, as Lord Lieutenant of the County, Lord Chief-Justice North, and the puisne Judges Jones, Raymond, and Leven. Mr. North, who, as Council for the King, was himself a Party in this Transaction, takes sufficient Care to shew how deeply the whole Faction engag'd in defence of the Prisoner, in order to discharge every Spot and Stain which the Ink of that Faction has scatter'd on the Justice of the Court. "It is not to be conceiv'd, says he, what a Thunderclap it was for the Faction to hear, that a prime Instrument of theirs should be brought to answer, much more to be attain'd, for Treason. They thought the whole Party safe enclos'd behind the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, with their Partizans of Ignoramus; and that the whole Law was enervous as to them. And now for one of them to be hal'd forth to an indifferent Trial, with the Consequences, was of the last Importance, and would render the most zealous of them less daring, and many, as had been found in divers Instances already, go over, and become Discoverers. This made the whole Party engage, as pro Aris & Focis, with all the Skill and Interest they had, to boom off this Fireship, and save their Friend.--- And the Attendance was accordingly; for there was scarce a pragmatical Town-party-man absent, and abundance of the vulgar Sort of them," &c.

The same Author also adds the following remarkable Incident: "When the Ld. Chief-Justice North and Mr. Justice Jones arriv'd (at Oxford,) just at his Lordship's alighting out of his Coach, a Servant put into his Hand a Letter, with only these Words in it, You are the Rogue the Court relies on for drawing the first innocent Blood; and this, it seems, his Lordship soon after shew'd to his Friends; under this Remark, These Men think me to be so poor-spirited, as to be frighted from my Duty by such silly Stuff as this."

But if one Party made it a Point to do all they could to save the Prisoner; it may also he said with equal Justice, that the other made it a Point to dispatch him: And however roughly Mr. North handles Bishop Ker, for insinuating, that the Man was singled out to die for the Sins of his Party, the Fact is as well warrant'd as any Fact of that Nature can be.

More than ordinary Care has, however, been taken to make the contrary believ'd: In the Front of the Trial, we find two Petitions

tions of College to the King: The first for Leave for his Children to have Access to him, as also Mr. Smith and Mr. Wol, and that he might have the Use of Pen, Ink, and Paper; all which was granted: And the second, That he might have a Copy of his Indictment; that his Council, naming eleven Persons, and Solicitor, might have free Access to him; and that he might have a Copy of the Jurors, to be return'd upon his Trial, some Days before it came on. Now tho' the first of these Petitions was fairly and fully granted, the second was cut short; and the Order of Council in answer to it, grants no more than, that his Friends and Relations should have Liberty of visiting and freely conversing with him, first giving in their Names to the Lieutenant of the Tower. Hawles, the Lampon-Lawyer, as he is, not over decently, call'd by Mr. North, enumerates the singular Favours of the Court to a Man of such low Degree: As, that he was lodg'd in the Tower, was allow'd the Assistance of Council, and was try'd by an extraordinary Commission: But adds, That all this was only to make sure Work of him: For, it seems, the King's Council had so order'd the Matter, that the Goaler and Messenger, who were to conduct College from Prison to Court, should run him into a House, in his Way thither, and take away all his Papers, which contain'd the Instructions given him by his Council in the Tower. This was done accordingly, and the said Papers were deliver'd to them: In consequence of which, the Favour shewn him in the Tower prov'd only a Snare for his Life; they were in the whole Secret of his Defence; and became enabled thereby to attack, with their whole Force, where he was least upon his Guard.

The other Party, it seems, had been guilty of the like Violence in the Case of Atkins, before-treated of; and therefore could not complain now, without condemning themselves: But, except in a State of open War, one savage Action cannot authorise another; nor can any reasonable Plea be urg'd, why the Injuries suffer'd by Atkins should be visited on College, who had no Concern in them.

Under the Confusion arising from this Incident was this fatally-distinguish'd Mechanic brought into Court, and put upon his Country for his Life: The Indictment against him being, as Hawles acknowledges, in part according to the common Form, for Treason; but circumstantially, for designing to seize the King's Person at Oxford, mix'd with Words he should say; as, That there was no Good to be expected from the King; that he minded nothing but Beastliness; and that he had endeavour'd to establish Popery and arbitrary Power.

The Prisoner, however, did not lose either his Spirit or Presence of Mind, under the ill Usage he had met with; but, for a long while together, refused to plead till his Papers were restor'd; urging, That they contain'd Directions for his Defence; that he understood the Indictment was faulty; that possibly legal Exceptions might be made to it, which, for want of Skill in the Law, he might lose the Advantage of; that this Design was not only against him, but against all the Protestants, &c.: But all he could say was over-ruled; tho' Council had been assign'd him, on his Petition, to prepare him for his Trial, he was to have no more Benefit of their Assistance than his own Memory could furnish: And as for a Solicitor, Mr. Serjeant Jeffreys crav'd Leave to put that Solicitor in mind, if such a one there was, that a Person acting in that Capacity for a Prisoner indicted of High Treason, was himself accus'd of High Treason. And, while this Controversy lasted, the very Papers in dispute were examin'd by the Attorney General and his Brethren, and finally handed up to the Bench, where Part of them were declar'd libellous (in these elegant Terms, by Mr. Justice Jones, One of them [the Papers] is a (b) Speech, and a most seditious, libellous Speech, to spit Venom upon the Government, in the face of the Country), and therefore to be suppress'd; and Part of them contain'd Instructions for the Prisoner as to Matters of Law; and those, it seems, he could have no Benefit of, because whatever he had of that kind to propose was to flow from himself. Lord Chief-Justice North, indeed, was more moderate; he was at one time for letting him have rather too much for his Defence than too little; at another, for letting him have a Transcript of his Instructions, leaving out what was scandalous; at a third, for granting a Copy of the Whole; but, in the End, finding his Brethren in a less relenting Mood than himself, reduced his Indulgence to the narrow Bounds of permitting him to make what Use he could of the Paper by perusing it, in the Custody of the Sheriff's Son, while the Court adjourn'd to dine: Concerning which last Circumstance Hawles affirms, it was only a Pretence to give the King's Council farther Opportunity to inspect the Prisoner's Papers, and to consider of the Method of his Prosecution by them; which, continues he, they did, and alter'd it from what they at first design'd it: And he farther intimates, That the Adjournment was made at the Instance of the King's Council; and that their Whispering with the Lord Chief-

The Prisoner's Approval of his Papers.

(b) Part of this we find profess'd by Mr. Edward as follows:

"Before you plead, speak to this Purpose: My Lord, I have been so that only make an Innocent to an Englishman, but I believe more barbarously than any civilised Villain under the Tyranny of Turkey or France. When I was first apprehended, I was, contrary to the Privilege of the City of London, carry'd out from thence before a Secretary of State. I might with as much Justice have been hang'd at Tyburn by the way, as to be brought hither to be murder'd with a little more Formality. If the Attorney-General, or any of the King's Council interrupt you, &c. answer thus, I will not be murder'd in His Majesty's Name. When you come to open your own Evidence, speak to this Purpose, so the Judges and Jury, I hope you will not bring in much Scandal upon yourselves, as to be the Pope's Druggist, and give the first Blow in the Protestant Cause, by awarding me upon such infamous Evidence.

and reflects in plain words upon them.

A. D. 1691. Chief-Justice, which he calls both an unjust and an indecent thing, was over-heard, &c. See p. 128.
 But even this small Concession was not made till the Prisoner had submitted to plead Not guilty, and put himself on God and his Country; which was, at once, admitting the Indictment, and forgoing all the (i) Advantages which his Instructions might have enabled him to take against it.

To proceed.— At Two in the Afternoon, the Ceremonial of the Trial was resum'd; when the Attorney-General, says our Law-Critic, insisted, That the King's Witnesses ought not to be examin'd out of the Hearing of each other: In which he was over-ru'd, but the Rule not observ'd; nor was it material, for the King's Council having the Prisoner's Writings, and by them observ'd how he intended to make the Witnesses against him contradict themselves, they did not produce such (A) Witnesses as were instructed to concur in the Evidence of the same Matter, but produced only such as were instructed to give Evidence of distinct Matters.

Dugdale began the Charge, who gave Evidence of vilifying Words spoken of the King, as that he was a Papist, and as deep in the Plot as any of them, &c. at several times, at Oxford and London, by the Prisoner, to himself alone; that he shew'd the Witness several scandalous Labels and Pictures, viz. the intercepted Letter to Roger Lestranger, a Character of a popish Successor, the Raree-screw, Mac-Ninny, &c. and said he was the Author of them; that he had a Silk-armor, a Brace of Horset-pistols, and a Pocket-pistol and Sword; that he said, he had several stout Men to stand by him, and that he would make use of them for the Defence of the Protestant Religion: That the King's Party was but a Handful to his Party. Stevens and Atterbury, Messengers, swore the finding of the Original of the Raree-screw (that is to say, a Drawing with black Lead; but this original Drawing was lost before the Trial came on; which is strange enough, considering the Importance it was of, and the great Circumspection that appear'd in all other Particulars) in the Prisoner's Chambers. John Smith, alias Harvey, swore his speaking scandalous Words of the King, and of his having Armour; and that, when he shew'd it the Witness, he said, These are Things that will destroy the pitiful Guards of Rowley: That he said, he expected the King would seize some of the Members of Parliament at Oxford; which if done, he would be one who should seize the King: That he said, Fitzgerald at Oxon had made his Nose bleed, but before long he hoped to see a great deal more Blood shed for the Cause: That if any, nay if Rowley himself, came to disarm the City, he would be the Death of him. Hoyne swore he said, Unless the King would let the Parliament sit at Oxon, they would seize him, and bring him to the Block; and that the City had one thousand five hundred Barrels of Powder, and one hundred thousand Men ready at an Hour's Warning. Turberville swore he said at Oxford, That he wish'd the King would begin; if he did not, they would begin with him, and seize him; and that he came to Oxford for that purpose.

Mr. Masters swore, That in Discourse between him and the Prisoner, he justify'd the Proceedings of the Parliament in 1640; at which the Witness wonder'd, and said, How could he justify that Parliament that raised the Rebellion, and cut off the King's Head? To which the Prisoner reply'd, That that Parliament had done nothing but what they had just Cause for; and that the Parliament which sat last at Westminster was of the same Opinion: That he called the Prisoner Colonel in mockery, who reply'd, Mock nor, I may be one in a little Time.

Sir William Jennings swore as to the fighting with Fitzgerald, and the Words about his bleeding; with some Difference of Expression, viz. I have lost the first Blood in the Cause, but it will not be long before more will be lost.

As to the Prisoner's Defence, it consisted in the most solemn and explicit Denials of every treasonable Circumstance sworn against him; and in endeavouring to destroy the Credit of the Witnesses, by fastening a very strong Suspicion, if not a positive Proof, of Subornation upon them; and he brought such Matters against them all, except Sir William Jennings, and Masters, (the first of whom he acknowledg'd to be a Gentleman and a Man of Honour) as shew'd them to be of the most (1) abandon'd of the human Species. It is in particular remarkable concerning

(1) Havelock affirms there was Matter in them for quashing the Indictment: Adding, And he hired to mock to the Court, as that the Indictment contain'd Crimes of a different nature, as Treason and Misdemeanour; and I think it was good Cause to quash the Indictment. In all Civil Matters, two Matters of different natures cannot be put in one Action, as Debt and Treason: Two capital Crimes of different natures cannot be join'd in one Indictment, as Murder and Robbery: And for the same, and another Reason, Treason and Misdemeanour cannot be join'd in one Indictment: For the Jury may observe, that one Part of the Indictment, which is itself is not Misdemeanour, as that he (the King) did, The King misdeed nothing but Beastliness, &c. two charg'd in the Indictment as Treason, was prov'd, and not the material Parts of the Indictment, as obliging to force the King's Person, &c. and finding some Part of the Indictment prov'd, might find him guilty generally; which extends to every Article of the Indictment; and so the Jury is deceiv'd, and the Prisoner in Danger. Remarks, p. 26, 27.

(2) That we find confirm'd by Colles himself on his Trial; for, when one of his Witnesses, who had declar'd of Hoyne, that he had heard him say, That he knew nothing of a Popish Plot nor a Presbyterian Plot neither, but if he were to be an Evidence, he should not care what he swore, but would swear or say any thing to get Money, would have gone on to expose the two Macnamers's equality; and was check'd by Sirgeant Jefferys, who said, They had nothing to say in this, Colles observ'd upon it, "They have been Evidence against me (meaning before the Grand Jury) tho' you do not now produce them: They are all in a String; but they are not now brought, because my Witnesses are prepar'd to answer them."

(3) A Truth which I find thus illustrated in the Remarks, is often already quoted, as follows:

"Who could believe any of those four Witnesses, Dugdale, Hoyne, Turberville, and Smith, if it were for no other Reason than the Improbability of the thing, that, as Colles said, was it probable he should trust things of that nature with Papists, who had broken their Faith with their own Party, who could lay greater Obligations of Secrecy upon them than he was able to do? That he, a Protestant, should trust People who had been employ'd to sue Protestants Themselves, and neither of them ever discovered any of the thing

cerning Dugdale, that having been charg'd by Oates, who upon this Occasion stood forth to testify the Evidence of those who had supported his, with having given out that he was poison'd, when his Malady was in truth a venereal Disorder, he put the whole Credit of his Testimony on the Proof of that single Article; and yet the Fact was prov'd upon him, before the King and Council, by Dr. Lower, who had prescrib'd to him on that Occasion; to whom the Author of No Protestant Plot, Part i. adds also Dr. Needham and Dr. Carey.

And as to Turberville and Haynes, Oates produced a (an) Petition, which they, together with one of the Macnamara's and others, had presented to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-council, of the City of London, praying, That they would contribute to their present Support and Maintenance; and, by way of Inducement, setting forth, That the Papists had not only far wrought upon the Necessities of some, as that, for a present Supply, they had shipwreck'd their Consciences; but that they were tampering with, and labouring to corrupt, others of the molt considerable Witnesses. It happen'd, or it was so managed, that, tho' this (n) Petition was read in Court, College did not hear it; which, it must be presum'd, was the Reason why he did not immediately draw such Conclusions as were natural and obvious from it, viz. That Turberville and Haynes themselves had now shipwreck'd their Consciences, and were become as corrupt as those they had before refer'd to. And as to the Bench, or the Lord Chief-Justice for them, they unfortunately could see nothing in it, which could be of use to the Prisoner: For, says his Lordship, most notably, "To say, as they do in that Petition, That they had been constant Witnesses for the King against the Papists, and that they have been tempted to UNSAY what they have said, does not contradict what they now say." And College replying, "I suppose they say they have been tempted to turn the Plot upon other People, and to make a Plot upon the Protestants." His Lordship iterates, with all the Simplicity in the World, They have been tempted, they say, by the Papists to UNSAY what they have said: Nor can that broad Comment of Oates's, things they swore, till after the Oxford Parliament, though most of them were pretended to be translated & spoken before?

A. D. 1681.

Who could believe Dugdale in any Part of his Evidence against the Prisoner, when Oates testify'd against him, that he said he knew nothing against any Protestant in England? And being testify'd by Oates, that he had gone against his Conscience, in his Evidence against College to the Grand Jury at London, he said; It was long of Colonel Watercup, for he could get no Money else; which was a plain Confession he had sworn wrong, and Confession of the Cause for which he did it; and of the Person by whom he was induc'd to do it: That he had given out that he was poison'd; whereas his Disease was a Clay, which was an ill thing in him, as it imply'd a Charge of poisoning him on other Persons: And when Elizabeth had testify'd against him, that he said, after College was in Prison, that he did not believe College had any more Hand in any Conspiracy against the King, than the Child unborn; and that he had as love have given a hundred Pound he had never spoken what he had; and that he had nothing to say against College, which could touch his Life: And when Teit testify'd against him, that when Faines said College was an honest Man, and stood up for the Good of the King and Government; yet, said Dugdale, I believe he lies, and I know nothing to the contrary.

Who could believe Haynes in any Part of his Evidence against the Prisoner, when Hall and Mrs. Richards said, he owned he was employ'd to put a Plot upon the Dissenting Protestants; when Haley testify'd against him that he was a Thief, and had John Winsley's Tunic; when Law testify'd that Hensh said the Parliament were a Company of Rogues, for not giving the King Money; but he would help the King to Money enough out of the Fanatics Estates; when Hickman testify'd against him, he heard him say, God damn him, he cared not what he swore, nor against whom he swore, for it was his Trade to get Money by swearing; when Mrs. Oliver said that he had written a Letter in her Father's Name, without her Father's Knowledge; when Roberts testify'd against him, that he said he knew nothing of a Popish or a Presbyterian Plot; but if he were to be an Evidence, he cared not what he swore, but would swear any thing to get Money; when Esward testify'd against him, that he said, Necessity and hard Pay drove him to say any thing against the Protestants: And being testify'd that his Evidence against College agreed not with what he had formerly said, he said, he could not repeat it, but his Freery and self preservation drove him to it; which was a plain Confession of the Falshood of his Evidence, and of the Reason of it; and add, it was a Jejurament upon the King or People, the Witnesses swearing against them, for owing the Truth of their Estates; which can have no other Sense, than the Witnesses swearing themselves against the King, was a Jejurament.

How could Turberville be believ'd in any Part of his Evidence against College, when Oates relatus against him, that he said a little before the Witnesses were sworn against College at the Old-Baily, that he was not a Witness against him, nor could give any Evidence against him: And yet afterwards at Oxford, Turberville told him he had sworn against College to the Grand Jury, and said the Protestant Citizens had seduced him, and God damn him he would not swear? Which Words, I think, need no Explanation.

And lastly, how could Smith be believ'd in any Part of his Evidence against the Prisoner, when it was testify'd against him by Blake, that he said Haynes's Discovery was a Sham-Plot, a Meal-Tub-Plot? The Meaning of these Words, I think, are well known. That he would have had Robins swear against Sir John Brink, the Lord Southey, and College, things of which he knew nothing, and told him what he should swear, lest they should disagree in their Evidence: When it was testify'd against him by Oates, that he said, God damn him, he would have College's Blood; when it was testify'd against him by Menckley, that he tempted Menckley to be a Witness against College and Sir John Brink, and was very inquisitive to know what Discourse he had with the Lord Faulcon, Sir John Hervey, and Mr. Stora on the Road to Oxford; and said, if the Parliament did not give the King Money, and flood on the Bill of Exclusion, that was Fit enough to fear a Draigo to lecture the King at Oxford; when Esward, and many others testify'd he said he knew of no Presbyterian or Protestant Plot? Now if College's Witnesses were credited, it was impossible the King's Witnesses could be credited, that was agreed by the Court to be true upon the Trial; it was the Answer on the Trial was, That the King's Witnesses were on their Oaths, the Prisoner's were not; which was a Reason not in Words, and not in Sense.

And lastly what College said on that Matter, without any Knowledge in the Law, cannot be answered. It is not fair dealing, said he, with a Man for his Life, because the Witnesses against him upon their Oaths say the things the Witnesses for him swear; therefore the Witnesses against him may be believ'd, and the Witnesses for him not believ'd, when yet the Witnesses for him were really on their Oaths to maintain what they said for him.

Not in the Law? for asking the Law to be that a Witness for the Prisoner does not be sworn, which is only made good by Practice, the same Law, that is to say Practice, is, that a Witness without Oath for the Prisoner, is of equal Credit with the Witness upon him upon Oath, and none can draw the contrary out of late Days.

(n) This Petition had been deliver'd by them to one Mr. Wilmot: Now this Mr. Wilmot had been Foreman of that Jury, which had brought the Bill against College, Haynes, at London, and was to have been one of the Witnesses at Oxford; but was prevented by a Charge of High Treason brought against himself; upon which he had been committed. College said, he had been inform'd, that when he had to try in his behalf, was very material: And the Lord Chief Justice cut him short with saying, It would be enough for him, Wilmot, to clear himself; for that he was charg'd with High Treason, and that by two Witnesses too.

(o) It is further remarkable, that tho' Mention is made of this petition in the Trial printed by the Author, and tho' it is Matter of Evidence, the Petition itself is not inserted.

A. D. 1681. That he (Oates) having upbraided Turberville with appearing against College before the Grand-Jury, contrary to his own express Declaration, That he had nothing to say against him; Turberville answer'd, Why the Protestant Citizens have deserted us, and, God damn me, I will not flatter; 'twere to give his Lordship any new Light. He appeals, indeed, to Turberville, whether he ever made use of any such Expression to Oates? but seems very well satisfy'd with his Negative; which Mr. Serjeant Jeffreys, who behaved with a very indecent Levity thro' the whole Trial, took care to support, by observing, That there was the Oath of the one against the Saying of the other.

There was, moreover, one Point of great Consequence, which College labour'd to prove, by the Evidence of Everard, namely, That the Papists design'd to make a Presbyterian or Protestant Plot, to turn off their own; and that Justice Warcup had endeavour'd to suborn Evidence in support of that Design: But he had no sooner laid down his first Proposition, than the Lord Chief-Justice, somewhat peevishly, interpos'd, There is nothing concerning a Presbyterian or Protestant Plot in the Case: From which hasty Concession, College very shrewdly infer'd, That if there was no Presbyterian, Protestant Plot, nor any other Persons in Confederacy with him, it was as impossible he should have a Design to seize the King, as it was improbable he should own it: Adding, Now, my Lord, this Man was sollicit to come in for an Evidence of such a Plot: And this Everard confirm'd, by saying, That Justice Warcup would have persuaded him to have sworn a Presbyterian (s) Plot against certain Lords; and that Haynes had also acknowledg'd to him, That Necessity had driven him to swear against Protestants.

His own personal Plot.

As to the personal Defence of the Prisoner; it was such as shew'd him to be a Man of uncommon Parts, and uncommon Spirit and Resolution. Tho' single and unsupported, with the Countenance of the whole Court against him, as well Spectators, as Council and Judges; frown'd on by these, revil'd by those, run down by all, he endur'd the Noise of the Crowd, he look'd down upon the Insult, withstood the Reason, and detected the Sophistry of the Bar and Bench, and he expos'd the Villany of the Witnesses; nor, in all the Length of Time which the Trial lasted, did he so far lose either his Temper, Understanding, Courage, or Presence of Mind, as to give his Adversaries any material Advantage: On the contrary, every thing he

A. D. 1681. said was sensible, firm, gallant, and had all the Air of Innocence to enforce it; inasmuch that he made his Party good against the whole Court, and was rather over-borne than out-argu'd at last; when the Chief-Justice directed the Jury to observe, in relation to Oates's Evidence, that there were the Oaths of three Men, viz. Dugdale, Turberville, and Haynes, against his single Affirmation, College obviou'd, in his turn, "That Oates charg'd each of them singly; and that there was but the single Denial of each of them to his Charge." When Everard declin'd speaking what he knew of Warcup, unless he had the Permission of the Court; he cry'd out, My Lord, this is fool Play! If I die for my Country's sake, I can do it freely, and the Will of God be done: But I would have the Truth out, for the sake of the Protestants: And, when he was to reply generally to the whole Charge against him, he made use of these elevated Thoughts and Expressions: "I have a Soul that must live to Eternity, either in Joy or Misery: I act according to these Principles; and I hope I have some Assurance of Salvation when I die. I would not call God to witness to a Lye, for a thousand Lives."— And again: "I have only Innocence to plead.— I declare, in the Presence of God Almighty, that as to whatsoever is sworn against me (enumerating the Particulars) I never had such a Thought.— They, (Dugdale, &c.) have sworn desperately against me; and it hath appeared, I think, by the Evidence of very credible Persons, that they have contradicted one another.— It hath been prov'd this was a Design, that they were tamper'd withal, that they complain'd they were in Poverty, that they wanted a Maintenance; and they did confess they were tempted to come over to swear against Protestants; and now the Lord knows they have clos'd with it, and begin with me."— He then transiently touch'd on the Improbability of his discovering treasonable Designs, if he had conceiv'd any such, at first Sight, to such a Fellow as Haynes; pleaded an Incapacity to enter into all the Particulars of the Evidence; and signify'd his Reliance on them to supply all Deficiencies; acknowledg'd, That, out of a Zeal for the Protestant Cause, he had been active for the Support of it; and that, thinking it a Shame, that the Irish Witnesses, who came over as they pretended to serve us, should want Bread, he had collected some small Charities for them: He also gave a circumstantial Account of his first Interview with Haynes, and what follow'd upon it, which has many (p) Things remarkable in

(s) Here Mr. Justice Tess who was of a warm Disposition, and kept his Zeal always kindled, took part against the Prisoner, by saying such qualities: "Now here is Mr. Justice Warcup's Fame traduc'd behind his Back in the Face of the Country; and it is nothing to this Cause before us." There is, moreover, a Note in the Trial, which says, That Warcup came into Court while this Matter was yet in Debate, and declar'd to vindicate himself; but that he was not permitted; the King's Council thinking it unnecessary.

(p) For which Reason it is here inserted: The Irish Witnesses would pretend they had something to discover of the Popish Plot, and so they would apply to me as a Man of some Acquaintance. And the first time I saw Haynes, was upon such an account: The Beginning of Harsh laid, and it was then: I was at Richards's Coffee-house at Temple-Bar, where Macnamara did desire me to go out, and I should hear such a Piece of Roguery I never did hear in my Life, against my Lord Sheffsbury. So I did go out with them, and I called Captain Brown, who is since dead, to go with me; and we went to the Hercules Pillars, and Haynes there discovered what I told your Lordship before, a Design to destroy the Parliament at Oxford, an Army that was to land in the North, and another in Ireland; and the Duke of York was to be at the Head of them. My Lord,

A. D. 1681. in it: He, fix'd a Fallhood on Dugdale, though he made a Shift, by the Connivance of the Court, to shuffle off the (9) Imputation; and, being call'd upon to proceed with a Comparison of the Evidence on both Sides, a Work which, we shall find, the Lord Chief-Justice himself either was not equal to, or did not care to meddle with, he again declar'd, That he did not well know what was said; that he could not hear Half, nor write a Quarter of it. My Life, and your Souls, lie at stake, said he, to do me Justice: Therefore I hope you will take notice of what I had not an Opportunity to write down: Addressing

Lord, after I had heard all this, he did desire us all to conceal what he had said till the Parliament sat, and then he would not only discover this, but much more. He at the same time told us, that there was a Design of Fitzgerald's against my Lord Shaftsbury to take away his Life; and he was employ'd to come to his Cousin Matsenarra, to get him over to join in the Design, and he should never want for Money, if he would but consent; and so they would have him. After he had discovered himself, Sir, said I, you are a Stranger to me; and I never saw him before in my Days; if he had seen me, I can't tell: But, Sir, said I, either this is true, or this is false. If it be true, said he, 'Tis all true, and much more. So he up and told us much of Colman, and of the Resurrection between the Duke of Ormond and the Duke of Tork, and how he came to be Lord Lieutenant of England, and how Plaster came to be Prisoner, and by Means of whom, and the Letters that pass'd, and how to much a Year was given to Phoedus, for carrying on the Correspondence: And he told us to much, that I did wonder to hear any Man talk after that rate. After I had heard what he had to say, I told him, Sir, said I, this is either true or false that you have said; if it be true, my Lord Shaftsbury shall know it to-night; for I will not conceal such a matter as this of the Duke's, and if it were a Colours, he should know of it. And I did lend him word that Night; and, said I, Sir, you ought to go, for your own Security and ours too, to swear it before a Magistrate. Said he, If I should, I should be discovered. Said I, I can't think you would be discovered; if you swore it before St. George's or Sir Robert Clayton, they will not discover you. So we agreed he would swear before Sir George Trevelyan, and he did so accordingly; but he being out of town, I cannot have him I shall visit to produce it. I wrote a Letter last Saturday-Night to Sir George to bring me, and I hoped he might have been here to-day. This was the last Acquaintance I ever had with Hoyne. The next time I heard of him, was upon this Occasion. Joy comes to me in Richard's Coffee-house, and, said he, You are the Man that made that Discovery, which I told you before that Hoyne had said to me; it was about a Month or three Weeks before the Parliament was at Oxford. After the Parliament was dissolv'd at Oxford, Joy comes to me, and I think it was betwixt the two Terms wherein Fitzbarris was arraign'd and tried; I know not the Names of them; but he comes to me and tells me, he had been with my Lord Shaftsbury, and that there was a Friend of his that would contain a great concernment concerning the Marriage of Sir Edmund's Goffrey; and, says he, My Lord Shaftsbury hath desired me to go to acquaint you with it. Where is your Friend, said I? He is without, said he. So we went out of the Coffee-house; and when we came out of Doors, there was this Hoyne: We went to the Crown-Tavern without Temple-Bar; it was in the Forenoon. When we came there into the Room, he enquired all the Names, and Galliards, and Fencers about the Room, to see that no body was there. When he thought all was secure, he began to tell me he had been to acquaint my Lord Shaftsbury that there was a Friend of his that would discover the whole Intrigue of the Murder of Sir Edmund's Goffrey, all that Fitzbarris had said, and much more: And he said he that I would intrust my Lord Shaftsbury to be instrumental to get him his Pardon before he discover'd particularly. Thus I told him; I think it is convenient, said I, that you discover something in Writing, and give under your Hand what you can say. He was not willing to do that. Can you believe, said I, that my Lord of Shaftsbury will betray you? Says he, I will not trust any body; I will be satisfied. Said I, if you will not give it to any body else, will you give it in Mr. Michael Goffrey, Sir Edmund's Goffrey's Brother; I can have no Jealousy of him, that he will ever discover you. Said he, If my Lord Shaftsbury will engage to get me a Pardon, I will tell the whole Truth. Said I, I will go to my Lord and acquaint him; so I went to both my Lord and Mr. Goffrey; and Sir Edmund's Goffrey's two Brothers both met me at my Lord of Shaftsbury's House. This is the thing that he tells me; he would have me get my Lord's Protection and a Pardon for Trent; but the real Truth is, he sent me upon this Errand. So I came to my Lord Shaftsbury, and the two Mr. Goffrey's were in the Room; and after I had told my Lord what Discourse I had with him, says my Lord, Collette, these Informers have confounded all our Business; and they said I must have a care they do not put a Trick upon us; this may be a Trick of the Papists to ruin us; and if they have such a Design, if they will not put it upon you and I, they are Fools. Upon your Lordship, said I, they may; but I am a poor Inconsiderable Fellow. Says my Lord, I'll tell you, Mr. Goffrey, Mr. Collette hath not only been an honest Man, but an useful and an active Man for the Protestant Interest. So I told my Lord how far I had gone with him, and that I desir'd it might be put in Writing. Says my Lord Shaftsbury, If he will put it in Writing, I will go once again; for I have been since I saw the Fellow, with my Lord Mansfield, and my Lord Chief Justice Pemberton, and my Lord Chancellor, and I have told them that there is such a Person in general, but I knew not the Man; as indeed my Lord did not, for only Joy was the Person between them that my Lord knew: And I told them, says my Lord, that he can confirm all that Fitzbarris has said concerning the Death of Sir Edmund's Goffrey; and that he would prove my Lord of Darby was in it, if he might have his Pardon: And my Lord said, They promis'd to speak to his Majesty that it might be granted. But some time the latter End of the Week I heard it would not be granted; and both of these Men follow'd me to know what they should do. Said I, My Lord Shaftsbury knows not but that it may be a Trick, and said I to Joy, I wonder why he should concern all this while, being a secretist Man, and so on; pruffed by the King in his Proclamation. Why, says Joy, do you think there is no Truth in it? Says I, 'Tis not my Judgment, but my Lord Shaftsbury's and Mr. Goffrey's Judgment too. He answered me again, Fitzbarris hath desired he may have a Pardon granted for himself and a Friend; and if it be these were offering in it, do you think he would move for a Pardon? Says I, Did Mr. Fitzbarris move for Hayne's Pardon? How do I know that, says Joy again; Fitzbarris's Wife told me so. Says I, Let me speak with Fitzbarris's Wife, let me hear her say so, and I will believe you. The next Day he did bring her to me to my House: And this was the Time and the Occasion that brought Fitzbarris's Wife, and Hoyne, and Joy, and Mr. Fitzbarris's Maid to my House; and I never saw Fitzbarris in my Days, till his Trial; he had any Communication with him. But, my Lord, he did talk with Hoyne, and confid'd in it to me. That her Husband had desired a Pardon for him. Why then, said I, he would do well to discover what he knows to my Lord Shaftsbury; for I was with my Lord, and he says he will pardon so many, unless he will give it under his Hand what he has to say. And he did consent to me in my own Yard, for there was were together. That he saw my Lord of Darby come into the Chamber at St. James's, when the Body of Sir Edmund's Goffrey lay under the Altar.

(2) Collette had ask'd of him upon what Occasion he had explain'd to him that the Name of Randy belonged to the King; Upon the account of the Picture, answer'd Dugdale. Collette replies, Upon what Picture was it? Dug, I am not certain. Col, Remember you have an Account to give as well as I. Dug, You have to many Pictures, that I can't remember them: You have shew'd me more than have been produc'd in Court. Col, Where had you the Picture from me, that they call Randy's Shew? Dug, Truly I receiv'd of them twice at Richard's Coffee-house. Col, Twice do you say? Dug, Yes; two of them, at two several times; for you having promis'd me one, you brought it accordingly to your Word. Col, When was that? Dug, I did not give an Account of the Day of the Month, and so I can't remember it: Col, Where was Richard's Tavern you shew'd into my Pocket, and Mr. Bolton was by at that time. Col, Then will I be willing to dye for it, if he and I and Mr. Bolton were at the Green Dragon Tavern together. When was it that I gave you this Picture? was it since the Parliament at Oxford? Dug, Do I charge you since the Parliament? Col, I never saw Richard's before the Parliament at Oxford. Dug, I do not say it was that; you give me one of the others. Col, 'Tis strange you will stick to nothing. Mr. Justice Trent, Mr. Collette, will you consider upon what Mr. Dugdale was call'd up about, the Exposition of the Name Randy? Col, I did examine him, and he hath committid himself; for he hath said, at the Green Dragon Tavern I gave him a Picture of Randy's Shew. Mr. Justice Trent, He said he never saw it; he said, he did not know which it was. Col, I am certain he meant that then, when he spoke it. Mr. Justice Trent, Mr. Collette, you were in the right way just now to manage your Evidence, in Opposition to the other Evidence: Go on in that way.

dressing himself to the Jury, he said, "Gentlemen, I do declare and protest, as I shall answer it at the Day of Judgment, that as to what these People have sworn against me, either as to Words, or as to any manner of Treason against the King, the Government, or the Laws establish'd, I take God to witness, I am as innocent as any Person upon Earth. And, therefore, I must beseech you, be not frighted, nor flatter'd. Do according to your Judgments, and your Consciences: You are to be my Judges, both in Law and Fact: You are to acquit me, or condemn me; and my Blood will be requir'd at your Hands." And when the Solicitor-General undertook to sum up the Evidence to refresh the Memories of the Jury, he made use of these Words: "The Crime charg'd upon Mr. College is High Treason, in imagining and compassing the Death of the King: The Proof of that, hath been by a Conspiracy to seize the King here at Oxford: Which Conspiracy he declar'd he was in, by shewing Arms for that Purpose, and by coming down to Oxon with that Intent; College vehemently deny'd, that the CONSPIRACY WAS PROV'D; and receiv'd a Reprimand from the Bench for speaking out of Turn: But tho' he committed a Trespas in point of Form, he had certainly the Right of his Side in point of Fact.

It is not consistent with the Nature of this Work, to trace all the Circumstances of this (re) tedious Trial too minutely: It shall therefore suffice to say, That Mr. Serjeant Jeffreys, towards the End of his Harangue to the Jury, threw in these remarkable Words, allud'd to before, "But know, Gentlemen, That the King is concern'd; your Religion is concern'd; that Plot, that is so much agreed to by all Protestants, is concern'd: For if Dugdale, Smith, and Turberville, be not to be believ'd, you trip up the Heels of all the Evidence and Discovery of that Plot." And that the Lord Chief-Justice, in the Close of all, laid down two Considerations, which, he said, were to be observ'd in all Cases of the like Nature, viz. The Force of the Evidence, and the Truth of the Evidence. Upon the first of which he observ'd, that it related to Matter of Law, and therefore was the Province of the Court (meaning the Bench); and upon the last, that it related to the Facts alleg'd, and the Credit of those who alleg'd them; which was the Province of the Jury. He then quoted the two Statutes relating to Treasons; namely, That of the 25th of Edward III. the Practice relating to which he gave a short Explication of; adding, That the Cases describ'd in that Statute were to be manifested by some Overt Act: And that of the 13th of the King (Charles II.) which provided, That, if the same treasonable Intentions were manifested by malicious and advised Speaking, it was sufficient: And, after this, his Lordship proceeded to illustrate the Force of the Evidence; and beginning with the Words sworn against the Prisoner, by Master and Sir William Jennings, declar'd, That they did not amount to Treason; but that however they shew'd he had some very extraordinary Thoughts in his Heart, concerning Divisions, Quarrels, and Fighting, that he expected should be.—Here College again interpos'd; first asking, Whether those Words would not bear a more favourable Interpretation? Then affirming, with a becoming Boldness, that he was the fittest to explain his own Thoughts; and, the Chief-Justice allowing no body could tell what those Thoughts were, insisting, That then the Interpretation should be made and taken in the best Sense.

The Chief-Justice made no Reply; but went on to shew, That if the four other Witnesses deserv'd Credit, they were full Witnesses to maintain the Indictment. His Lordship's next Transition was to the Truth of the Evidence: And here, at his very Outset, he refer'd the Jury to their own Notes, as not caring to speak by Memory: But, nevertheless, having pass'd over the declaratory Part of the Prisoner's Defence, as flourishing and popular Things merely, observ'd, That Dugdale and Turberville, who were the most material Witnesses relating to what was spoken in Oxfordshire, had the least fail against them; profess'd he did not remember that any material thing had been said against them, except by Oates; whose single Affirmation he also was of Opinion ought not to have any Weight against the Oaths of three Men. His Lordship, moreover, was pleas'd to say, "I must tell you, this Matter is VERY IMPROBABLE, that, after Witnesses had sworn a thing, they should voluntarily acknowledge themselves to be forsworn, &c." And then, having again intimated, That he remember'd nothing material against Dugdale and Turberville, and pronounced, that they were two Witnesses to the full Matter of the Indictment, and two Witnesses to what was done in Oxfordshire, which satisfy'd all the Considerations of the Law, his Lordship concluded his Discourse with another Reference of all the other Parts of the Evidence to the Consideration of the Jury.

Thus it happen'd most unfortunately for the Prisoner, that his Lordship remember'd just enough to convict him, and not one Title in his Favour; and that in his Reasonings he pointed out the Improbability of the Witnesses confessing themselves perjur'd, without bestowing a Thought on the Improbability, before urg'd by College, That he should expose himself to a capital Prosecution, by saying such things to such Persons: Nor was College so wanting himself, as not to take proper notice of these Omissions: On the contrary, Mr. Justice Jones having signify'd, "That he neither should nor could add any thing to what my Lord had said;" And the other two Judges having, by their Silence, testify'd the same implicit Acquiescence; he call'd upon his Lordship to examine his Notes, and affirm'd he would find much more Evidence against Dugdale and Turberville.

A. D. 1681. Tierberville than he had repeated: But his Appeal was to no Purpose, as his Lordship declar'd, he could remember no more: And the Jury, having been refresh'd at the Bar with two Bottles of Sack, by Direction of the Bench, withdrew to consider of their Verdict; and, in half an Hours time, dispatch'd a Cause which had lasted till two o' Clock in the Morning. Their Verdict was, GUILTY; which fatal Word was no sooner utter'd, than the Court rung with such barbarous Shouts, as would only have become a Crew of Executioners: And when the Prisoner was brought the next Morning to receive Sentence, the Lord Chief Justice seem'd to take it ill, that he should still persist, as he steadfastly did, in asserting his Innocence; and declar'd, without Remorse, "That the Court was very well satisfy'd with the Verdict; that there were sufficient Proofs to warrant it; and that the Jury had done according to Justice and Right, &c."

Mr. North has also pronounce'd, "That no Man that ever was try'd for High Treason, had, or could claim more Latitude or Scope of Defence than was allow'd to his Man; which, continues he, is sufficient in answer to all that ever was, or can be, alleg'd against this Trial." But if Forms are observ'd, a mere Lawyer is but too apt to be satisfy'd. Bishop Burnet, on the contrary, has these Words: "North's Behaviour, in that whole Matter, was such, that probably, if he had liv'd to see an impeaching Parliament, he might have felt the ill Effect of it."

Each of these Passages is, perhaps, liable to Exception: One Man may have full Latitude or Scope of Defence, without deriving any Advantage from it; and another may feel the ill Effects of disobliging a Party, without being guilty of the least Transgression. If the Bishop means, that the Lord Chief Justice had behaved so as to be obnoxious to the Justice of Parliament; it is hard to say wherein; for, however prejudic'd he was against the Prisoner, and, however strongly that Prejudice operated on his Deportment towards him, he was surely and safely trench'd behind the Law; and there is no Statute to punish a Man for want of Judgment or Memory. And if the Counsellor (North) would be understood, That neither College nor his Advocates had any thing to complain of, the contrary is manifest on the very Face of the Trial; and tho' the Prisoner had leave to talk, and many smooth things were said to him in the Course of his Trial, nothing is more certain, than that he had never been brought to the Bar, if it had not been for the sake of bringing him to the Gallows by way of Example; or else to make a worse use of him.

That he had drop'd certain treasonable Expressions, was sworn against him; and that he had worn Arms in his Journey to Oxford he confess'd; as also, that if the Papists had committed any Outrage on the Members, he would have us'd them. But neither this Intention thus avow'd, nor that Fact, appear to have any Relation to the Conspiracy charg'd upon him: And as to the treasonable

Expressions, if ever so incontestably prov'd, Death was too severe a Punishment for them: But when sworn to only by such Miscreants; and when the whole Prosecution was so manifestly an Act of State, they deserv'd no Credit at all. The Government might have had very good Grounds of Quarrel against College and his Party; might think themselves entitled, politically speaking, to remove him out of the way; but Reason of State is a Term unknown to our Courts of Justice, and if sufficiently understood, ought to have no authority there.

But these very Men were believ'd against the Papists, say the Apologists for this Reign; and with those, who on that Occasion, plac'd an implicit Confidence in them, this Plea ought to have some weight; but if there is a Man who thinks they were earning the Wages of Iniquity then, he will make no Scruple to draw the same Conclusion now, and lament alike the innocent Victim, whether Protestant or Papist.

Certain it is, that, while the red-hot Zealots for Church and King (who, till now, would not allow the Existence of any Plot but a Presbyterian Plot) became the public Champions for these Wretches and their Depositions, and, in their Writings insultingly apply'd the proverbial Saying, What is Sauce for a Goose, is Sauce for a Gander, to the Havock they had already made among Papists, and were like to make among the Protestant Dissenters, the most sensible of the Roman Catholics took Occasion to infer, not that College was guilty, but that Lord Stafford, and the other State Martyrs of their Church, were innocent; as also that God had sufficiently asserted and aveng'd their Quarrel, in causing those who had been most active and assiduous in setting the Snare for them, to be caught in it themselves.

As to the last Scenes of College's Life, Ferguson asserts, that, after he had receiv'd Sentence, a Message was sent him, importing, That if he would confess (that is, according to him, accuse Lord Shaftsbury, &c.) he should be pardon'd and flourish: And Howles, almost to the same Purpose, speaking of the long Time allow'd him to prepare for his Death, viz. from the 18th to the 31st of August, concludes, That his Execution was thus delay'd, to see how the Nation would digest the Matter; and whether the Man, by the Terror of Death, would be prevail'd upon to become a Tool to destroy other Innocents. And College himself, in the Paper he left with his Wife, makes use of these very Words: "I further declare, that Secretary Jenkins, Lord Killingworth (for Kenilworth) Hyde, and Mr. Seymour, when they committed me, interrogated me to many things, that I should be privy to, against the King: Mr. Seymour saying, I did know the Lord Shaftsbury, Lord Howard, and Mr. Ferguson, were engag'd also. To all which I answer'd, Were it to save my Life, I could not accuse a Man of them, or any other Person whatsoever. This Day also, Tuesday the 23d of August, the Messenger who brought me a Message of my Death told me, I might save

A. D. 1681. my Life, if I would confess who was the Cause of my coming to Oxon, and upon what Account: I answer'd him, I was glad the confessing the Truth of that would do it; and said; I came voluntarily of myself; I rode my own Horse, spent my own Money, and neither was invited, nor had Dependency on any Person whatsoever; and had only (1) one Case of Pistols, and my Sword; and had the Papists, or their Party, offer'd to have destroy'd the Parliament, as it was sworn and fear'd they would, I was there to have liv'd and dy'd with them: And I thought in this I had serv'd the King also. But when I had said this (although the very Truth) I found it was not what he wanted; and so, with a Curse, he left me." In the same Paper he however acknowledg'd, that, on some Occasions, and in the Heat of Talk, he had utter'd some Words of Indecency, not becoming his Duty, concerning the King and his Council; and, if so, he begg'd their Pardon: But he disown'd all Concern in, or Knowledge of, the Prints and Labels laid to his Charge; or that he had ever undertaken to decypher them.

Bishop's Speech. At the Place of Execution he also made a long Speech, tending to manifest his Innocence. He touch'd on the first Charge brought against him, viz. That he had avow'd a Design to pull the King out of Whitehall; and to serve him as the Logger-head his Father had been serv'd; and with the utmost Solemnity declar'd, both as to that and the latter, to seize his Majesty at Oxford, in the Presence of God, as a dying Man, and on the Terms of Salvation, that he never was engag'd in any such Design, nor knew any Person that was; or that, if he himself had been so wickedly disposed, would have stood by him in it: And how likely it was, that I should do such a thing by myself, said he, let the whole World judge! He moreover complain'd of hard Usage, and that his Faculties were impair'd by it: Declar'd it was his Belief, That he was as certainly murder'd by the Hands of the Papists, as Sir E. Godfrey had been, tho' the thing was not seen: Pray'd that his Blood might be the last they might be permitted to shed: Clear'd himself from the Imputation of being a Papist, in the most explicit Manner: Intermix'd all with animated Prayers, for his Country, for his King, for the Protestant Religion, for his Enemies, for those who had sworn away his Life, for his own Soul; and clos'd his Discourse, certain Farewells excepted, with this Sentence, Let my Blood speak the Justice of my Cause.

Thus dy'd the Protestant (1) Joiner; who, for his Zeal, Sense, Firmness, and public Spirit, deserves much Praise, and much Compassion: But, for leaving the safe and quiet Paths of humble Life, to mix in the Intrigues of the Great, without being able to fathom their Depths, or comprehend their Views, as much Censure. It is the Politician's chief Play to put the warm, conscientious Man in the Front of the Battle; he believes much, knows little, fears nothing, and undertakes to answer for all. This was poor College's Case. He thought he was in the right Road; and that his Guides were unerring; in which Persuasion, he look'd on Death without being terrify'd; and for which Cause, both his Faults and his Misfortunes must be imputed to the Times.

There is still a Circumstance growing out of this Man's Case, that deserves to be spoken of. Titus Oates, for his Merits and Services in revealing the Popish Plot, had hitherto been honour'd with an Apartment in Whitehall, as well as rewarded with a noble Pension: But now, all at once, the one was considerably reduced, and he was by express Order ejected out of the other; and also forbid the Council-Chamber. The Reverend Mr. Pointer, who mentions this Circumstance in his Chronological History, has assign'd no other Cause for it but his Impudence; of which he had no doubt an elder Brother's Portion. But Impudence is to indefinite a Term, that it rather serves to excite our Curiosity, than to satisfy it: And Mr. North, who, speaking of his Evidence in College's Trial, says, "He affected to pronounce Ore retundo the round Oaths, and ribald Stuff, that he charg'd the others (Witnesses for the King) to have utter'd: And that the Manner of his Behaviour shew'd the Genius of the Man, more than any Description can do," does not specify, that it was for this Species of Impudence he was turn'd out. Nor, indeed, can we suppose this was so much as pretended; for of all the shocking Testimonies, that ever put a Court of Justice to the Blush, that of Haynes, both for Matter and Manner, was the most shameful and abominable: And yet, instead of being check'd for his Impudence, he was countenanced in it, if not rewarded for it. We have no other Way, therefore, of ascertaining his Offence, than by considering the Time of his Punishment; which was almost immediately after this Trial was over: Whence it is natural to conclude, That, whatever was the Pretence, his Fault really consisted in his Attachment to his Party; and in his presuming to appear for the Prisoner, in a Cause where the King was Prosecutor; and that not only in Name, but in Truth.

The Court having again lost their Point in the Election of Sheriffs of London, as before explain'd, now resolv'd to retrieve all in the long Run, by so ordering Matters, that the City-Chair might be fill'd with a Lord Mayor after their own Hearts: The Person pitch'd upon was Sir John Moer, upon whose Character, says Mr. North, very much depended; and which Character the same Author has thus given us at large:

"He was a Person very grave, and of a Mr. North's retir'd

(1) Which, together with his Horse and himself, Forge calls the Whole of the Oxford Conspiracy.

(2) Mr. North bestows this ridiculous Conceit on him, That he was a good Workman at Dissolving, whereas said his Essay, p. 590.

retir'd and virtuous Course of Life; conformable, and constant at Church, of loyal Principles, and very just and honest in all his Dealings; all which his very Enemies could not deny: And although all the factious Party would have made him their Property, yet few intended him, personally, any Harm. He was by Nature, not only careful, but also, very fearful of Consequences; but, being once assur'd of the Justice in what concern'd him to do, he wanted no Resolution or Courage to perform it. In the mean time, his being suspicious, dubious, cautious, and not soon determin'd, but hesitating at unusual Occurrences in his Office, made him pass for a Person timorous, and of a fickle, irresolute Temper; otherwise he had not been Mayor at that time, as will be shew'd. He was forward in nothing, and, being sensible of his soft, unsteady Elocution, inclin'd to Silence: But his Behaviour was always modest and respectful to all, and, by his Words or Carriage, offending none, but to his Betters, extreme submits. His ordinary Discourse, as well as his Countenance, was faint, and tended to Dejection, so as one would think he always desponded; and that made Folks apt to guess he had no Firmness or Resolution at the Bottom, or at least not such as might sustain him upright under Difficulties. All which made it wonderful that, in so troublesome a Mayoralty, as he had, he should carry himself with such Firmness and Perseverance, in all the substantial Points of his Difficulties, as he did. Whereby it was plain that he carried in his Mind a Determination, that neither Public nor Private should suffer through him, whatever Men might think to extort from him, or whatever should happen to himself. Which Character was cut out for this Time and public Occasion; for nothing but such Firmness of Mind and manifest Goodness, with a seeming passive Disposition, could have protected him from those Rages of Violence as very often threaten'd him: Which, probably, had broke loose upon any one, in his Post, that had carried Matters with a stern and minatory Behaviour.

The loyal Citizens (proceeds the same Author) knowing this Person to be a just Man, and one who would not combine with Faction, and having a view of some Use to be made of such a one for settling the Affairs of the City right, applied themselves so effectually, that they carried the (a) Election of Lord-Mayor for him. This was some Surprise to the factious Party, though they did not think his Election of any mighty Consequence to them; and, his Course being next, many thought it not reasonable, nor creditable in the City, to put him by; and they looked upon him as one who, by Terror (in which the Faction traded much in those Days) if he had been, as they thought he was not, very averse to them, might be wrought into any Measures. And his Office did not affect the Return of Juries, which was their Palladium; therefore they did not unite as one to exclude him, as they did to carry the Choice of Sheriffs; else, as was seen in that Case, he would never have been chosen.

And now the Court, not only thought themselves in a Condition to carry Matters with a higher Hand than ever, but made no Secret of their Intentions to act accordingly; even the King himself being prevail'd upon to lay aside the Gentleness of Behaviour natural to him, and even to trespass on all the Laws of Decorum, to gratify one Party at the Expence of the other; as we learn from the following Incident. The City had come to a Resolution to invite his Majesty to their Lord-Mayor's Feast; the Message was sent, according to Form, by the Sheriffs, with the Recorder (Troby) for their Spokesman; and the Answer his Majesty was most graciously pleas'd to return, and which is upon record in the Gazette, was as follows: "Mr. Recorder, an Invitation from my Lord-Mayor and the City is very acceptable to me; and to shew that it is so, notwithstanding that it is brought by Messengers that are so unwelcome to me as these two Sheriffs are, yet I accept it."

We are now to follow the two Factions again into the Courts of Justice, or rather to the Theatre where Oppression on one Side, and Licentiousness on the other, maintain'd a desperate Struggle for the sole Property of the Laws; alike to the Disturbance of Society, the Reprach of Government, the Dishonour of the Kingdom, and the apparent Hazard of the Constitution.

College being dispatch'd, it was propos'd by those in Power, that Rouse, who had been taken up about the same time, should follow next. According to Ferguson (concerning whom it must, once for all, be observ'd, that he ever gives the worst Turn he can to the Proceedings of the Court) the Lieutenant of the Tower, by the Direction of Mr. Secretary Jenkins, had visited Rouse, and had caus'd him to be treated with more Kindness than at first, in hope, that he, being suppos'd a weak Man, and known to be in strait Circumstances,

The King invited to the Lord-Mayor's Feast; upon which Occasion he appoints the Sheriffs.

Went to court.

[a] Ferguson says, that the Folly of the Factionists; but does not say to explain wherein that Folly consisted. Bishop Berkeley however that supplies the Defect, vol. i. p. 525. "He (Moor) had been a Nonconformist himself, till he grew so rich that he had a mind to go thro' the Dignities of the City: But, tho' he conform'd to the Church, yet he was still look'd on as one that, in his Heart, favour'd the Seditious: And, upon this Occasion, he persuas'd some of their Frenchers to go among their Congregations to get Votes for him." Ferguson adds, That, upon carrying this Point, there was great Rejoicing among the Conspirators, not only in England, but even beyond the Seas: Even Rouse itself, continues ibid. 619. "A in this Enterprise: For tho' we knew not then the Effect of an honest and stout Lord Mayor in the Conquences; yet they could both see and foresee for the Year ensuing. And, at that very time, reckon'd the Day their own, both for Sheriffs and Lord-Mayor, for the future. Growth of Popery, Part II. p. 318.

The Bishop again observes, That some who knew Moor well, were for setting him aside; as one whom the Court would easily manage. Richard also takes notice, That he met with great and unusual Opposition: And, Palmer, in his Chronological History, has a Minute, That, after a long and tedious Trial, he was voted by a Majority of about 100 Voices. Which sufficiently shew, that the Anti-court Party was divided upon this Occasion: And the Consequence will further shew, that this Division made way for their Destruction.

stances, would have been wrought upon, countenance the Prosecution of Lord Jefferys, by joining in the Evidence against him: But the Bail not taking, and the Man continuing as intractable as ever, the manner of his Attack was, all of a sudden, chang'd; and it was hop'd that Terror would succeed where Indulgence had fail'd. With this View, he was remov'd from the Tower to Newgate; and the Attorney General had Directions to prepare for his speedy Trial: But something more was now to be done than merely to frame a Bill of Indictment: A Party Jury could do by Reufe, as they had before done by College. In order, therefore, to strike an Awe into both Sheriffs and Juries, Sir George Jefferys was prevail'd upon to neglect his Practice at the Bar, and act as an Implement of State, by attending as a Justice of Peace at the Quarter Sessions held at Hickes's-Hall, August 26; and being put into the Chair, undertook to reform the Panel, return'd by the under Sheriff, on the Authority of the Statute, 3 Henry VIII. of which Transaction an Account was given in the Gazette, N<sup>o</sup> 1647, in Substance as follows: The Sheriff had return'd a Panel of fifty-four Persons to serve of the Grand Jury for Middlesex, very few, if any, of which were known either to the Bench or the High Constables of the Hundreds: The Justices hereupon made Enquiry after the Persons so return'd; and most of them being Frequenters of Conventicles, and seldom or ever coming to Church, order'd the Under-Sheriff, then present to put out some of the Panel, and put in others in their stead; which he, after three several Commands, refus'd: Upon which their Worthships thought proper to make use of fifteen, those already return'd, that the Service of the Country might not be obstructed, having first tender'd them the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, which they all took." Here the Gazette stops; but Mr. Eschard adds, That, when the under-Sheriff had thus refus'd Obedience to the Order of the Bench, the two Sheriffs, Pilkington and Shute, were call'd upon, and not answering to their Names, were (as) fin'd fifty Pounds a Man, tho' the Recorder put in a Protest, signifying, That the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex were never found to attend in Person at Hickes's Hall.

Nor did the Affair terminate here; but upon a Representation of this undutiful Inference to the Sheriffs (says Mr. North) the King order'd, that all the Judges should attend at the Old-Baily; and the same Proceeding to be had there, where, perhaps, more Respect might be paid to the Judges, than had been to the Justices of the Peace; at least they knew, and were able, better to deal with them. This was done; and, to shew the Moderation and Tenderness of the Proceedings on the Crown Side in those Days (proceeds the same Author) I shall tobjoin a faithful Report of the Passage, as I had it, from a Hand of unquestionable Authority.

"At the Sessions at the Old-Baily before Michaelmas Term, 1681, the King commanded the Attendance of the Judges; they were all present, except Justice Chorleton and Baron Street. Mr. Solicitor General being present, and other Council for the King, he inform'd the Court that the Grand Jury, that was return'd, consisted of Persons disaffected to the Government, and criminal in not going to Church, and resorting to Conventicles, and desir'd that the Court would take Consideration thereof, and reform the Panel according to the Power in 3 Hen. VIII. The Court thereupon oppos'd some that were objected to; and one not giving a clear Answer to his not coming to Church, and another declaring he went sometimes to Church, and sometimes to other Places, which the Judges understood to be Conventicles, and he not denying it, the Court thought fit to enjoin the reforming the Panel; and it appear'd necessary to put in others, else there had not been twenty-four according to the Command of the Writ. The Sheriff (Pilkington) boggled at it, insinuating that it would reflect upon them and condemn their first Return, and also upon these Jury-Men that were put out, and desir'd that it might be made appear that the Panel was corruptly made, and within the Cases recited in the Preamble of the Statute, before they should be put to return the Panel. But the Court told them, that there were certain ill Cases recited in the Preamble, which, it may be, were the Occasion of making that Law; yet all ill Cases were not recited, and by the enacting Clause, Power was given to the Judges in all Cases to reform the Panel by putting out and putting in; and the Sheriffs were enjoin'd to make a Return accordingly. That the Court was not bound to shew any Cause, for they were entrusted to do it at their Discretions; but they had here proceeded upon a Cause, in as much as they thought Men, who were (x) Breakers of the King's Laws, not fit to serve upon Juries, as they that refus'd to go to Church, or frequented seditious Conventicles, were; and therefore they hop'd the Sheriffs would be candid in their Obedience; and, having taken an Oath to perform the Office of Sheriffs, they would not, in the Face of the Court, break their Oath in refusing. They desir'd to advise with Counsel, but the Court told them, that it was very indecent for them to ask to go to Counsel what the Law was, when all the Judges had declared it, or whether they should obey it, if it were so. Then they said, What need it, when there were enough besides, and the Court might forbear swearing those Men? But the Court persist'd to

(x) Mr. Eschard also writes, That the said time being stirr'd, the Common Council of London declar'd, "They would stand by their Sheriff, and defend them against any Sort of Law that should be brought touching that Matter, and that at the Charge and Expence of the City."

(*) Old Lawyers tell us, Dei Lex non diffinitur, nec est Augustus definitus; we could never to put a Difference where the Law puts none. Now if no Statute excludes Proceedings unprovoked any Crime, or Diffamers (see Talks) to serve on Juries, I should think we ought to wait, at least, till an Act of Parliament be made to that Purpose, before we deny them Inter Leges: And in all otherwise, in my silly Opinion, seems not only unreasonable, but a daring Usurpation of Legislative Power. Quereant Proluctus p. 2.

to require them to return the Panel, and said that those Men had brought a Suspicion upon the whole Panel, and it became the Court to make use of all the (y) Powers the Law gave them, to provide for impartial Returns of Juries; and, at last, the Sheriffs consented to return (that is to say reform) the Panel.

But even Mr. North who affects to write thus circumstantially, as well as authoritatively concerning these Proceedings, has even here his Inaccuracies to answer for; for he says, "That the amazing Refusal of the Grand Jury to the Bill against Shaftsbury, &c. occasion'd that Ostentation, rather than full Use of the Power by 3 Hen. VIII. mention'd before." Whereas his own Memorial, just recited, bears witness, that the Court was not satisfy'd with a bare Ostentation of the Power of this dormant Statute, but made the full Use of it: And this Controversy arose in the Case of Rouffe, against whom a Bill was prefer'd October 17; whereas, Lord Shaftsbury was not indicted till November 24.

A. D. 1651.

Instead also of shewing the Particulars of the Treason laid at this time to this Man's Charge, as he ought to have done, in order to leave these ignoramus Juries without Excuse, this egregious Writer very unfairly loads him with his after Concern in the Rye-Camp-spiracy, and leaves his Readers to conclude, that the very Facts he was then condemn'd for, were charg'd upon him now; which, however, was not his Case; for, of the whole String of Witnesses which appear'd against him now, the Trial shews, that but one appear'd against him then: And thence it may be

(1) None perhaps but the Sages of the Law are proper Judges of the Merits of the Dispute: To a common Capacity, indeed, it seems natural to conclude, that common Usage was of greater Authority than an obsolete Law. The Opinion of the Court we have seen above; and what was to be urg'd against it, we find set forth in a Half Sheet, publish'd at that time, as follows:

"None but the Sheriffs ought to name and return Jurors to serve in Inquests before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer."

The Statute of 11 H. IV. cap. ix. I find in Rafael's Collection, in these Words:

"Now, because that now late Inquests were taken at Wigmore of Persons named by the Justices, without the Return of the Sheriff, of which Persons some were outlawed before the said Justice of Record, and some fled to Sanctuary for Treason, and some for Felony, there to have Refuge; by whom as well many false Offenders were indicted, as other lawful Liege-people of the King, not guilty, by Conspiracy, Abetment, Imagination of other Persons, for their especial Advantage and Iniquity Laene, against the Course of the common Law used and accustomed before this time; Our Sovereign Lord the King, for the great Ease and Quietness of his People, willeth and granteth, That the same Indictment be made, with all the Appurtenances to the same, be revoked and annulled, for ever void, and holden for none. And that from henceforth no Indictment be made by any such Persons, but by Inquests of the King's lawful Liege-people, in the Manner as was used in time of his noble Progenitors, returned by the Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises, without any Demotion to the Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises before made, by any Person, of the Names which by him should be imposed, except it be by the Ministers of the said Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises, sworn and known to make the same, and other Ministers to whom it pertaineth to make the same, according to the Law of England. And if any Indictment be made hereafter in any Point to the contrary, that the same Indictment be also void, revoked, and for ever holden for none."

This Statute was made in Affirmance of the common Law, and by the Preamble appears to be enacted upon Complaint of the like Practices as are now attempted, viz. That Jurors to serve on Inquests may be nam'd by such as the Court shall appoint; which would overthrow the most beneficial and necessary Part of the Law.

After this Law was made, till 3 Hen. VIII. I presume Mr. Attorney himself will admit, that this Law of Hen. IV. ought to have been observ'd; Which if so, then if the Statute of 3 Hen. VIII. cap. xii. do not extend to reform Panels of Inquests to be taken before Courts of Oyer and Terminer, this Statute of Hen. IV. is in as full Force as ever it was, and so ought to be observ'd by the Sheriffs as well as others. And if the Sheriffs shall obey the Court to leave a Turn in a Matter of so great Consequence, they will be liable to answer for the same, and ought to be punish'd for betraying their Trust.

Now the Statute of 3 H. VIII. is in these Words:

"Whereas great Extortions and Oppressions be, and have been, within the more Part of all the Counties and Shires within this Realm of England, by the Subtilty and untrave Demerance of Sheriffs and their Ministers, committed and done unto many Persons in great Number of the King's Subjects, by means, and making, and returning at every Sessions holden within the said Counties and Shires for the Body of the Shire, in taking, and putting in, and returning of Names of such Persons, as for the singular Advantage, Benefit, and Gain of the said Sheriffs and their Ministers, will be wilfully sworn and perjur'd by the sinister Labour of the said Sheriffs and their Ministers; by reason whereof, many and divers substantial Persons (the King's true Subjects) contrary to good Equity and Rightness, have, divers times and many, wrongfully been indicted of divers Murders, Felonies, and other Misdemeanors, by their Covin and Falshood, to the utter Undoing of their Lives, Loss of their Goods and their Lands; by reason whereof, they, and every of them, in avoiding the untrue Treashe and Vexation, which to them might come and ensue by reason and occasion of the same false Indictments; and also, sometimes by Labour of the said Sheriffs, divers great Felonies and Murders concealed, and by the said Persons, also by the said Sheriffs and their Ministers partially returned, not prizur'd, be not have been compelled to make Fine, and give Rewards to the said Sheriffs and their Ministers: Wherefore, Be it enacted, ordained and established, by the King our Sovereign Lord, and by the Assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, of this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That all Panels to be returned, which be not at the Suit of any Party, that shall be made and put in by every Sheriff and their Ministers, above any Justice of Good-delivery, or Justice of Peace, whoseof one to be of the Quorum, in their open Sessions or require for the King, shall be returned, by putting in and taking out of the Names of the Persons which to be impeached by every Sheriff and their Ministers, by the Discretion of the same Justices, before whom such Panels shall be returned. And that the same Justice and Justices shall command every Sheriff, and their Ministers in his Absence, to put other Persons in the same Panel, by their Discretions; and that the same Panels, so returned by the said Justices, be good and lawful. And that if any Sheriff, or any their Minister, at any time do not return the same Panels so reformed, that then every such Sheriff or Minister be offending, for every such Offence, shall forfeit Twenty Pounds Sterling-money of England; the one half thereof to our Sovereign Lord the King or his Heirs, and the other half thereof to him or them of his Subjects that will sue for the same by Action of Debt at the common Law, or Bill, or Complaint, where it shall fortune any such to fall and be. And that none Effoin nor Procecion be allow'd for the Defendant or Defendants in that Action or Plaint, nor that the said Defendant nor Defendants therein be admitted to wage their Law. And that the King's Pardon shall be no Bar against the Party and Parties in the same, that any such Action shall sue.

By which it does not appear, that the Statute of H. IV. was observ'd in any thing, as to Inquests to be taken before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, which is that is at present extant for.

Now no Peer can be indicted legally for Treason or Felony, before any other than Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer; or in the King's Bench, as my Lord Coke, in his third Institution, p. 288, saith was adjudg'd in the Case of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, in 15 Edw. And then how can this Statute of 3 H. VIII. be of any use to carry on the prisoner Imprigoo? unless the Sheriffs (which no Man can believe) will be so far overcome as to join therein, and make a Present to the Ruin of themselves and the whole Nation, by permitting Inquests to be pannel'd to enquire before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, to hang the Peers, and hazard the Common.

I shall only add these Words, taken out of the Statute 1 and 2 P. cap. ix. and leave the Consideration thereof to the Reader's own Thoughts.

And it is further Enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That all Trials hereafter to be had, awarded or made, for any Treason, shall be had and used only according to the due Order and Course of the common Law of this Realm, and not otherwise." [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xxii.]

be reasonably inferr'd, that the Facts were different, as well as the Evidences.

To consider the whole Series of Commitments and Prosecutions, viz. of Lord Howard, Colledge, Roofs, Lord Shaftsbury, &c. could imagine all had been involv'd in the same Treason; that Fitzbarris's Confession had given Fire to the Train; and that all their several Indictments would have so far agreed, as to shew they were all Accomplices in the same Crimes.

But hitherto no such Connection has appear'd: Against Lord Howard, tho' continued a Prisoner for capital Matters, no Indictment had been prefer'd at all; Colledge was accus'd of being in a Conspiracy to seize the King at Oxford: And when the Indictment against Roofs came under Consideration, and the Evidence to be heard in support of it (which was at the Old-Baily, in Presence of the Judges, who, as before, in the Case of Colledge, attended to see fair Play) instead of a Charge, that he had acted as Pay-master to the Troops, in which Colledge was to command as Colonel, which it was reasonable to expect, two Clerks of the Exchequer Office, viz. Ferguson, stood forth, and accus'd him of uttering certain treasonable Words in his Cups, about seven or eight Months before, viz. Speaking of the Oxford Parliament, (z) "That he foresaw it would be but a very short Session: But these frequent Prorogations and Dissolutions of the Parliament would not avail; for whatever the King had, the Parliaments gave him, and might take away when they pleas'd: And that when one bid him have a care what he said, he reply'd, The King has forfeited his Crown, and has no more Right to it than I have." These were fresh Men who had never till then appear'd in the Service; and were introduc'd rather to clear the way, than to do Execution: For according to the old Statute of Treasons, Words were not capital; and according to the new, the Prosecution should have been made within six Months after the Offence had been committed: But even These, as we are farther told by Ferguson, contradicted each other: And, as to the remaining six, for, as the Gazette observes, there were no less than eight who swore Matter of Fact positively against him, they were on the Establishment of Messrs. Warcup and Fitzgerald, and had acquir'd no Credit in London, by their Success at Oxford; and who, besides, depos'd such Things, if Ferguson, (who is equally blameable with Mr. North for lumping his Account) detrays any Credit, as carry'd along with them their own Confutation: On which Preamption, the Grand Jury, without any regard to the notable Endeavours of the Bench, dismiss'd the Bill with an Ignoramus: And the next Night his Majesty being at the Duches of Portsmouth's, broke out into this Expression in the hearing of Sir John Reresby: "It is a hard Case that I am the last Man to have Law and Justice in the whole Kingdom."

But however incens'd the Court might be with these Disappointments, they were not so discourag'd as to give over their Prosecutions. The Earl of Shaftsbury was principally aim'd at, and his Turn was to be next.

But, before we enter on the immediate Consideration of the actual Proceedings against this great Protestant Peer, which was the popular Distinction, at this time bestow'd upon him by his Party, it is necessary to touch on certain previous Circumstances concerning him, which have escap'd the notice of our general Historians, and which, if true, seem'd to argue a Consciencefulness of some Guilt on his Side; and also on that of his Adversaries a settled Resolution, by any Means that had the Face of Law, to make him a Sacrifice to the public Peace.

Sir John Reresby writes, that on the 12th of October, Lord Halifax told him, "That Lord Shaftsbury had written to the King, that if he would be pleas'd to free him from his Confinement, he would engage to go to Carolina, never more to return into England; but that the King had rejected his Request, and determin'd to leave him to the Law." Now, if he was innocent, with the Country on his Side, as, in relation to Juries, Lord Shaftsbury notoriously had, why should he capitulate for his Enlargement at so dear a Price as perpetual Banishment? But the same Gentleman has also another Passage, which indicates, That Lord Halifax was not overpleas'd with this Determination of his Majesty's, for Lord Danby, who was still in the Tower, having complain'd to Reresby, That the King's Ministers, meaning the principal one, Halifax, was too favourably inclin'd to his Fellow-Prisoner, Shaftsbury; and he, Reresby, having echo'd it to his Lordship, his Answer was, "That People were mighty ready with their Judgments and Decisions; but if the Fact was even as suggest'd, what could the King do better than let him at Liberty? That he had as good be enlarg'd upon Terms, as by a Jury, which would most assuredly acquit him, were he brought to a Trial, tho' ever so deep in Guilt; and that, were he out, he could not do the King so much harm, as such an Act of Mercy and Popularity, would do him good."

It must, however, be understood, that this was rather the Voice of the Politician than of the Friend; and that Lord Shaftsbury was utterly ignorant, that Lord Halifax had ever discours'd in this manner concerning him: For, in the Writings about this time set forth, to shew the Injustice and Cruelty of the Proceedings against his Lordship, Lord Halifax is ever consider'd as one of the principal Promoters of them, and treated with much (z) Bitterness on that Account.

for no other End; that Prosecution offering a fair Opportunity to justify this.

There is also another Particular, which even Ferguson, himself, has thought proper to mention for an End of his own; and which raises and almost warrants a farther Suspicion, that Lord Howard, and, perhaps, Lord Shaftsbury, had ugly Apprehensions, and saw Cause to take his Precautions accordingly: For at the same time that he, Ferguson, asserts, That it was at first propos'd to proceed against those Noblemen at Oxford, as well as College, in case the last, on Conviction, should have been induc'd to come in as an Evidence against them, to save his own Life, he also asserts, That Fitzharris's Widow, who was to have been a principal Evidence, and to have had an Advance of 100 l. extraordinary, for her extraordinary Service, all at once left the Court, pretending Scruples of Conscience, foregoing her Reward; and in a Deposition upon Oath before the Lord-Mayor set forth all the indirect Practices which had induc'd her to falsify her Testimony. Of this Incident, Man, the Sword-Bearer, who, we are told, was a Spy for the Ministry on the Lord-Mayor and the City, gave immediate Information; whereupon, continues our Author, he was diligently search'd after, but not taken: And his Conclusion upon the whole is, That her Desertion wholly disconcerted the Design of indicting those Lords at Oxford. And this Desertion of hers, we are left to suppose, was of her own mere Motion, without any counter Practices to induce her to take a Step that not only deriv'd her of an immediate Advantage, but expos'd her to immediate Persecution.

On the other hand, as to the fitted Resolution, mention'd above, which had been taken by those in Power by any legal Management to remove those turbulent Lords out of the way, the same Author farther asserts, That Michaelmas-Term approaching, the Committee of Subornation (so he calls the Committee of Council which had this Business for their Province) met to settle the Methods of Prosecution; in order to which they previously order'd a View of the whole Evidence to be made by Quarles, an eminent Council; and that this being done, it was sent by Lord Fitzharris, to the Duke's Approbation: On which within the Affair being again taken into Consideration, and his Royal Highness's Sentiments (as is known, it was finally resolv'd to proceed against the Prisoners by the Court of King's Bench, in case the Judges would venture to speak in it. The next Step, therefore, was to know their Opinion upon it; and the result in Consequence being, that some of them thought the King might by Law, send those Lords by the Court of King's Bench: Lord Chief Justice Pemberton answer'd briefly and briskly, That no such thing could be done; and his Brethren, by their Silence, intimated, That he spoke for them all.

The Judges thus refusing to open this indirect Passage, and the Court not thinking it advisable at such a Crisis to contest the Matter, nothing remain'd to be done, but to proceed to find the Bill in open Court, as before, against Rouse, and by Strength of Evidence, if possible, to obviate the Intrigues of the Sheriffs, and subdue the Prejudices of the Jury.

But even here, it seems, arose a new Difficulty: Of those who had appear'd against College, Dugdale, who, till then, had made a Top-Figure, had fo expos'd himself, that no farther Use could be made of him; and the rest were so tarnish'd by repeated Use, that no great Strefs could be laid on the Effect of their Depositions; unless a fresh Glof could be set on their Characters by the Countenance of others who had some Reputation to lose.

It happen'd that there was, at this time, Practices on one Captain Wilkinson, an old Cavalier, who had been appointed of my Lord Shaftsbury much magnify their Wisdom, nor seem to have well consider'd their Interest in the doing of it. For however long it be since Wiz, who would be thought in earnest when he bewail'd against Popery, promoted or contriv'd at it, I am sure, a certain Person, within these few Years last past, declam'd against the Court and the Ministers, with as little Respect and Decorum in what he said, as he doth now against the two last Parliaments. And whereas my Lord of Shaftsbury never spoke of his Majesty, but with the utmost Deference; nor of his Ministers, but with that Regard which was due to their Character; there is a certain Gentleman in the World, that us'd to speak, both of his Prince and them, in another Style.

And if the Earl of Shaftsbury be guilty of any thing against his Majesty, it is in having been so unhappy as to have heard him spoken of with too much Disrespect and Undervaluation, by a certain Gentleman, that now glories in having the chief Superintendency of his Affairs. It is natural for some People, what Interest soever they espouse, to be always violent; and we can the more easily pardon their Intemperance against those from whom they have withdrawn, by remembering with what Choler and Acrimony they us'd to discourse of them in whose Councils they are now engaged.

It hath been long observ'd, that they who, in Matter of Religion, wheel off from one Party to another, are the greatest Haters, and most implacable Persecutors, of the Side which they relinquish'd; but I never heard till now, but Men might fee Reasons to change Measures in Politics, without being for sacrificing those that cannot shift about to the several Points of the State-compass, as the Wind of Court-favour may happen to sit. Besides, who knows but that the Witnesses, whom some Person do so tenderly embrace and cherish, in order to the ruining of my Lord Shaftsbury and others, may not, upon the Disappointment of the Expectation wherewith they flatter themselves, and a Frustration of the Hopes wherewith they have been incited, endeavour to atone and make Compensation for what they are doing, by accusing such as do at present manage and serve themselves upon them? For, whatsoever Men may think of the Steadiness of these Fellows who appear as Witnesses concerning a Presbyterian Plot, yet, when a Parliament comes thoroughly to inspect this Affair, and to discover the Wiliness that runs through it, the Courage of these Gentlemen of the Peel will fall them; and then, to make Expiation for their own Crimes, they will be sure to load others with Guilt.

Besides, were my Lord Shaftsbury and a few other Persons of Quality once destroy'd, how easy will it be for some, whom I forbear to name, to crush those that are now so instrumental in their Ruin? There is a certain Gentleman in the North, as well as we, if not more, in the Treasure, who have Memories tenacious of old Injuries, and who are not of a Temper very inclinable to forgive. For by how much they would be thought great and generous, by so much will they prove the more averse to pardon those as have allow'd themselves to speak of them with Contempt, and in a Language near to Ridiculous. And tho' I pretend not to any great Prospect of what is future, yet I dare undertake to foresee, that the Day the Earl of Shaftsbury falls, some, that do now flatter themselves in the Thoughts of it, will be found to have supplanted their own Stranding, and to have foreseer'd their Persons and Fortunes to the Courtesy and Discretion of such, whom they have had the Unhappinefs to provoke. However, they can never expect, that their Heads should lie easy upon their Pillows, who seek to purchase their own Indemnity at the Price of the Lives of their Fellow-subjects."

 pointed Governor of North Carolina, by the Lords Proprietors, among whom was the Lord Shaftsbury; but, before his Voyage could take effect, thro' a Variety of Difficulties and Disappointments, specify'd in the Preface to his Narrative, he was beset by his Creditors, and by their Rigor, to all Intents and Purposes, ruin'd.

To this Man, in these calamitous Circumstances, came first one Baines; who, entering into Discourse with him about Lord Shaftsbury, took occasion to say, that he could not but know much of his Lordship's Designs against the King; that he would do well to make the Discovery to him, he having an Interest in Lord Hyde; and that, for so doing, he should have a considerable Reward.

This was on the 8th of October; and on the 11th, one Booth (by Ferguson and others said to be a Clergyman, and by Wilkinson himself characteris'd as a Person of good Learning, very ingenious, but of a very ill Reputation; and who, by a Breach of his Engagements, had contributed to his, Wilkinson's Misfortunes) sent for him to a House in the Rules, he being just become a Prisoner too; and, after some preparatory Speeches, gave him to understand, that he might either have a Settlement of 500 l. per annum, on himself and his Heirs, or 10,000 l. in Money, if he would discover what he knew of Lord Shaftsbury, and his Design in changing the Government to a Commonwealth, and bear witness against him.

After this, Booth and Baines attack'd him together, and renew'd their Promises in the Names of the Lords Hallifax and Hyde: And Wilkinson (who had already discover'd all their Intrigue to one of his Fellow-Prisoners, at the same time solemnly swearing, that he knew nothing criminal against Lord Shaftsbury; declaring, that if he should ever swear any thing to the contrary, it would be for Reward; desiring him also to testify against him, in case he did, and to take note of every Passage, from time to time, as he should recount them to him) demanded two thousand Guineas, and a general Pardon, by way of Security for the Performance of the mighty Promises they had made in the Name of those Courtiers, and to which he was not willing to truit.

Graham, the Solicitor to the Treasury, ply'd him next; promising, in his Majesty's Name, that he should be rewarded for his former Services and Sufferings; and that he should have the same Assurances from the King's own Mouth; he having an Order to carry him to his Majesty for that purpose. But neither the Guineas nor the Pardon appearing, the Captain stood off, and refus'd to go.

And now the Affair took a new Turn; for tho' the Agents in this Affair would suborn by Promises, they would not run the risque of paying before-hand. Booth, therefore, the next Day, chang'd the Battery; told him, that Wilson, Lord Shaftsbury's Secretary, who was in the Gatehouse, had offer'd to declare all he knew, in case he might have a Pardon; advis'd him, therefore, to put in for the Honour of being the first Discoverer; and (Wilkinson still turning a deaf Ear) added, that, in case he persisted in his Refusal to go to Court, he would be compelled by the Lord Chief-Justice's Warrant to appear at his Chambers, where a Committee of Council would attend to take his Examination; but soften'd this again with a further Promise of 500 l. a Year more, out of the Duke of York's Lands in Ireland: All proving ineffectual, he then proceeded to ask him, if he did not ride with his Sword and Pistols out of Town with Lord Shaftsbury, when he went to Oxford? And Wilkinson frankly owning, that he did, as also saying that he could do no less, in acknowledgment of the Favour he had receiv'd from him, in contributing to make him Governor of Carolina, Booth infer'd, That then he must needs be privy to this, "That if his Majesty would not pass three Acts, one for excluding the Duke of York, the next for making void the Act of Queen Elizabeth against Recusancy, and the third for uniting Protestant Subjects; then, by force of Arms, he was to be compell'd; adding, That all the Council were satisfy'd he knew this, and as much as any Person; in regard both Lord Shaftsbury and himself were disgusted at the Court; and that they knew he was a Soldier, and was to act in that Concern."

The Captain had now a double Prospect, of Terrors as well as Rewards, before him; and, after having been allow'd one Night to ruminate upon it, both Booth and Baines return'd to the Charge, importuning him first, not to lose this great Opportunity: And when he ask'd, Why they were so urgent with him to become a Witness? Baines frankly answer'd, "To uphold the Credit of the Irish Witnesses: For, said he, tho' you have been unfortunate in your private Concerns, you are unblemish'd in your Character:" And, upon the Issue of all, told him, That if he would not go voluntarily to Whitehall, the Marshal had a Habeas Corpus from the Lord Chief-Justice to carry him.

This prov'd to be Fact. In the Afternoon of the same Day, October 15, the Marshal produced his Writ; and to Court he was carry'd: Where he was first examin'd by the two Secretaries; strictly, says he, but fairly and honestly; and great Arguments were us'd to induce him to confess; but without Effect: His Majesty himself then came into the Office, and was pleas'd to acknowledge, That he knew the Captain well: That he had serv'd both himself and his Father faithfully: And that he hop'd he would not decline in his Obedience. The Captain reply'd, That he had never deserv'd to be suspected. And his Majesty rejoin'd, That tho' he had not yet been able to serve his Friends,

(6) For Clipping and Coining, and even Murder, as the Captain afterwards explains: With this additional Circumstance, That he had his Majesty's Pardon, as he was inform'd.

Friends, he might: That, in particular, it was his Intention to consider him for his Sufferings: But withal specify'd, That he was not to understand these Expressions of his Majesty's Kindness to be made with a Design to invite him to speak a Word but Truth itself: And that, if he knew the Captain, or any other Person, did (speak any thing but Truth) he should never endure them. So that a Man who had never been rewarded for his Loyalty, and who could not have been an effectual Witness against Lord Shaftsbury, unless he had been a joint Traitor with him, was now to be rewarded for his Treason. Wilkinson himself farther declares (whether from a Principle of Candour or Policy, let the Reader judge) that the best Divine in England could not have exhorted him more effectually on this Head, than his Majesty: What follow'd was, Question upon Question relating to Lord Shaftsbury and his Designs, and the Captain's Concern in them. But he persisting to assert his own Innocence, and his total Ignorance of the Guilt imputed to Lord Shaftsbury, his Majesty was pleas'd in the Issue to signify, That if the Captain would say, As he hop'd to be first'd be knew nothing of any Design against his Person, he would believe him. The Captain did so; and the King seem'd to wonder at it.

Here, it was natural to think, the Pursuit was at an end: But the Fact was otherwise. His Majesty being withdrawn, Mr. Secretary Jenkins began his Interrogatories and Solicitations anew: Which provok'd the old Soldier to say, That tho' he knew his Duty to his Majesty, and would not draw a Sword against him, he could freely do it against some of the Court, who were Enemies to his Majesty and his Friends: And yet again after this, he was led into another Room, where he found his Majesty, the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Hollifax and Hyde, the two Secretaries of State, and the Lord Chief Justice Pemberton. Here being confronted by Graham, Booth and Baines, the Lord Chancellor took him in hand, and, changing the whole Method of Proceeding, ply'd him with Terrors instead of Hopes and Promises; saying, in particular, "I cannot believe but you must be guilty of knowing great Things against Lord Shaftsbury:" And, the Captain replying, That, if it was thought proper to bring that Nobleman to a Trial, he would declare upon Oath, in open Court, what that Knowledge was, without any View of Gain or Advancement; his Lordship added, with notable Shrewdness, "You need not give yourself any Trouble as to that; your own Trial is like to come on before his; and you would do well to consider, that there are two Sorts of Advancements. He then proceeded to inform the Captain, that Booth, then present, had sworn, that he had never seen him have had the Command of a Troop of Foot Men, of whom Booth himself was one: And that the Oxford-Explosion had not been the Work of all, Wilkinson declaring, That, if any other Man would be so willing to speak Truth, he would never apply for his Majesty's Reward; he was remanded to the King's Bench, and shortly after setting for a new Trial, was there by struck such a Leap into the Chancery, as says Ferguson, that they were not to be seen.

Now Bishop Compton is said to be one of the Writers of the King's Bench, who has inserted the Facts contain'd in the Narrative, as a Proof of Subornation on the side of the Court: And Mr. North, his proci'd<sup>l</sup> Antagonist, has for that Reason treated him with a more than usual Mixture of Scorn and Indignation. According to him, the Captain was invited to swear nothing but Truth; and all the Scandal of that Invitation, if any, falls on his Friend and Companion Booth; so he unfairly styles him, who was the only Person who told him of the great Things to be had by being a Witness. But unfortunately it appears, that tho' Booth was the only Person who descended to Particulars, both Baines and Graham assist'd him, and even the King himself promis'd, he should be rewarded for his Services and Sufferings: And how demonstrably this Reward was in fact a Bribe, is apparent from the Event: For, though the Man offer'd to swear the plain Truth, without any Consideration, when he refus'd to swear against Lord Shaftsbury, instead of being rewarded for acknowledged Services and Sufferings, he was treated as a Delinquent, for imaginary Offences: And if this does not come up to the full Idea of (e) Subornation, there is no Certainty in Words, nor Solidity in Things. But, says our diatribal Examiner, even the Captain himself has fully vindicated the King: He should have rather said, He has treated the King decently: And all that can be infer'd in favour of his Majesty is, That he preserv'd Appearances; and, from the whole Proceeding, That it was managed with as much Art, at once to suborn a Witness, and obviate the Proof of any such a Practice, as if it had been under the Direction of the Bench itself.

Our Examiner deserves, perhaps, rather more Notice, when he proceeds as follows: "I have somewhat very notable to observe upon this Narrative of Wilkinson's; and it is that, thro' all the Steps of this Business, he was a Rogue, and a manifest Trajan of the Earl's:

(*) Mr. North is, however, of another Opinion; and endeavours to explain away every Surmise of this Nature, with the following artful Examinative:

"As for the pressing this Wilkinson to testify what he knew, is there any thing extraordinary in it? If he had been taken up, as a pre-suppos'd Prostitute, out of the Goal, without any Discovery leading to him, it had been misconstruable; but not, when there was express Proof, that he was concerned. It is not done in every private Cause: As, for Instance, You know the Truth, Sir, pray testify it for me; and so they not add good Words, I will not be counting myself for Sir, as any Occasion in which I may; and this done without any express Gift, Reward, or unlawful Aid? Where is the Mountain so, had the Case been so, this Author (Kenner) would have to be imply'd? And, on the other side, was it not necessary to go to Wilkinson, to have out of him all he could say? And was not the Earl a Costumier, to let his Jailor get a Sum of Money if he could, and to teach him the Trick of a Box of perjur'd Wilkinson, charg'd and pleas'd in order to a Slave's Turn, and to fetch all about again with a Registral? And all this is so usual to me, that I cannot but fancy I hear them saying their Plot together; not without Merriment, when Spirit they should have, if they caught the Court." Examiner, p. 113.

Earl: And that he watch'd for, and only wanted a Bribe to be offer'd, or rather to be given him (for he held out his Dish, and would readily have taken it) and then he would have shown his noble Friend better Service than in dealing with him to Oxford: And the Frame was subtle, that I make no doubt but it was the Earl's own Contrivance; and lay in happening an Advantage of having a direct Proof of what had been called and gone for, Subornation. The Snare is manifest, and consists in the laying in those two Gentlemen Witnesses. It was to have wrought thus: The Captain, having that Advantage, should have sworn roundly against the Earl; and then, at the Examination, very opportunely to come in to confront him with his previous Declaration made to them; and then he, all-to-be-confounded, confesses all, and that he was bribed so and so to swear as he did: Then what a Cry had been raised? Here was plain Subornation, and the whole Cause no better; and his Lordship come off with Honour and wonderful Popularity, and the Infamy of Ignoramus sav'd. The Rage, as had happen'd upon such a Turn as this, is obvious to be conceiv'd by all that are acquainted with the Arts of Law, and false Dealing; which consist chiefly in drawing the Adversary to do some wicked thing, or such as is likely to be construed so, and the having indubitable Evidence of it. But now let me give the Imagination a Lift higher. Suppose the Court had been so weak, as to have given this FELLOW (he had call'd him THE GOALBIRD but just before) Wilkinson, a round Sum of Money to have been an Evidence, as they call'd it, against the Earl, and, between him and his two provisionary Gentlemen, and other real Tokens, perhaps, there was a clear Evidence of it; though, it may be, the harmless, unwary Court expected only from him to have sworn the Truth of the Oxford Plot, which they were sure he was privy to, and knew. Then the Ignoramus Friends had let the Indictment go Billa vera; and his Lordship had stood his Trial per Parei. He had run no Hazard, for this Discovery in Evidence, made before that vast Assembly, which must have been a Surprise, and unprovided of any Answer, had tainted the whole Prosecution, and brought him off with prodigious Vogue of Popularity."

These are Mr. North's own Words: None but his own can do him Justice: And it must be confess'd, in favour of this very notable Observation of his, that those who would have Recour'd to such wicked Artifices to take off an Enemy, might very well presume, that the same Enemy would be to the full as wickedly artificial in his Defence. Nor is it easy to conceive, why the Captain should stipulate for 2000 Guineas, and a Pardon, as an Earnest of the Sincerity of the Court, if he had not an Intention to deserve Both, by swearing up to the Court-Expectation, or if he had not some such Turn to make. But with whatever View, or from whatever Motive he acted, even Mr. North himself does not charge him with falsifying any of the Circumstances he treats of: But, on the contrary, acknowledges, almost in spite of himself, that he had been sufficiently cautious in that Particular; for he says, he was careful chiefly not to be expos'd for a Liar in Matters of Fact: And it is to be wish'd, that our great Examiner had been equally scrupulous; in which case he had not so often insisted on the Captain's Ambuscade of two Gentlemen; to confirm the Perjury and Subornation; since the Captain mentions but one, who was a Prisoner as well himself, and whom he selected out of the Herd, as he says himself, for appearing to be a sober and sensible Person: And whereas Mr. North farther asserts, That the Captain does not reveal who his two Friends in reserve were, that one, at the End of the Narrative testifies by Name, viz. Jarvis James, that the Informations given to him by the Captain, from day to day, tallied in all respects with it; as he was ready to make Oath, when requir'd.

It is, however, most true, that, in these desperate Party-struggles, all Considerations are equally on both Sides to give way to the Good of the Cause; and mutual Charges can no otherwise be answer'd, than by mutual Recriminations. Many a flagrant Exemplification of this fatal Truth has in the Course of this History already occurred, and many another is yet to occur. Even in the Portion at present before us, this Affair of Wilkinson's is not distinguish'd as the only one of the kind, but as that which made the most Noise. And, if the Accounts publish'd at the Time are to be depended on, the Treasons imputed to the several Persons under Prosecution, were scarcely more heinous in themselves, or of a worse Tendency with respect to the Welfare of Society, than the Methods taken to punish them. Thus, in the Tract call'd No Protestant Plot, Part i. p. 17, we find it suggested, that it was the Practice of the Papists, meaning the Creatures of the Duke of York, to intercept Letters directed to Lord Shaftsbury, and, after inserting Treason in them, to transmit them to such as would be sure to lay that Treason before the Ministry: And to convince the Public that this was true, a Letter from an English Gentleman in France to that Nobleman, containing a Regiment for relieving him in the Gout, is instanced; which was in this manner, we are told, intercepted; and, after the following Words had been fraudulently inserted, in a similar Hand to that of the Writer, viz. That he was able to furnish this Earl with forty thousand Men from France, to oppose the Duke of York, forwarded to the French Ministry, to be by them first improv'd to the Prejudice of the Person who wrote it, and then communicated to ours, that they might make the like malicious Use of it against the Person it was address'd to.

In the same Tract we are farther inform'd, that Fitzbarris's Widow, by a Deposition upon Oath, August 15, 1681, not only affirm'd, that her Husband, a little before his Execution, had told her of great Rewards at first offer'd him, in case he would charge his Libel on the Lords Shaftsbury and Howard;

Ill Practices charge'd upon the Court, in the Course of this Affair.

A. D. 1651. but that he had also advis'd her to do it, as the only Means to save his Life; tho' he acknowledg'd at the same time, that they were wholly innocent: As also, that the further depos'd, that a certain Gentleman (who, is not explain'd) assur'd her, she should have what Sums of Money she pleas'd, if the would accuse those two Lords of the said Libel.

[Hist. p. 12.] And, what is more immediately to our present Purpose, in the second of these Tracts, we find it asserted, That, to all the other Arts and Methods of obtaining Witnesses to support the Belief of a Presbyterian or Protestant Plot, the papal Factors had added one more, which, in a more especial manner, deserv'd the Abhorrence of all Mankind; because it left no Man safe, that they had the Boldness and Impudence to accost: For that, as in Wilkinson's Case, as soon as they discover'd that those they attempted to corrupt and suborn had more Uprightness than they apprehended, or were made to believe, and had either the Wisdom, or Virtue, or Grace, to scorn their Offers, and resist their Importunities, they immediately drove them into the Toils they refused to set for others, by swearing Treason or Subornation against them; inasmuch, that the Man of Conscience, who chose to expose himself, rather than injure his Neighbour, was immediately oppress'd with the whole Weight of Power, and became the Martyr of his own Integrity.

[Hist. p. 16.] Thus, knowing that the single Evidence of Booth would not be sufficient to dispatch Wilkinson, or to establish a Belief of the Plot, Endeavours were us'd to prevail with one Mande to swear, that Wilkinson had confes'd to him, "That Lord Shaftsbury, and the Members of the Oxford-Parliament, were engag'd against his Majesty." But Mande, instead of complying, solemnly protested to Twenty Gentlemen. That he neither was, nor could be, a Witness against any Protestants, tho' Warcup had spar'd neither Promises nor Threats, to terrify or seduce him into that detestable Service.

[Hist. p. 15.] Thus, when the said Warcup had also fail'd in corrupting Everard to swear, That Lord Shaftsbury intended to set up a Commonwealth; and that he, with others, were providing Arms, with a Design to alter the Constitution, Warrants were immediately issued to apprehend him, for capital Offences against his Majesty, his Crown and Dignity.

Thus, when one Mr. Puckle, a Person often employ'd in his Majesty's Service, and who had always acquitted himself with Diligence and Fidelity, refus'd, under the like Importunities, to accuse the Lords Shaftsbury and Howard of treasonable Designs against the King and Government, and of having corresponded with him in pursuance thereof, one Cor, infamous for having undergone the Pillory, and a whole Life of Enormities, was invited from Holland, whither he had fled from the farther Consequences of his Knaveries here, to bear witness against him, as being an Accomplice in the same Treason.

Thus, one Brownrigg, having been invited to become an Evidence against Lord Shaftsbury, and refusing, was sent a Prisoner to York-Castle, with this aggravating Circumstance, that there was no Specification of his Crime in the Warrant; nor any better Pretence than that of a Commitment, than that an Information was laid of a treasonable Nature, and being made against him: The Contents, which Widdowson, in Truth, were, That he had sent James de Dringer (in consequence of the Plot) to be try'd upon him, in relation to his turning Evidence, must be understood) who was in the possession of Lord Shaftsbury, and that he was a Design carrying on against the Liberty of Lord.

And as if this were not enough, by the same Party-writings, he is to be try'd for a Plot, and then suborn Witnesses to swear it, (P. 12. p. 16) the Managers of the Affair, as well to facilitate the Success of their Intrigues, as to secure them from being detected and expell'd, had recourse to one Trick more, namely, To cause all those to be accus'd of one Offence or another, who shew'd any Zeal or Activity in endeavouring to unmask their iniquitous Proceedings to the Public: Whence it follow'd, That, as Innocency was no Protection, against the Perjuries of corrupt and prostitute Men; so those who had the Courage to stand upon the Defensive, by labouring to discover the Means and Persons by whom such Villanies were propagated, and to whose Rain they were to be employ'd, did but expose themselves to new Difficulties and Dangers. For, as he, in the Roman Story, who would have kill'd his Neighbour, complain'd, on his being prevented, that the Person he attack'd did not assum Gladium recipere; so they who made it their Business to falsen a Conspiracy upon Protestants, against his Majesty's Person and Government, were angry that those they prosecuted would not abandon their own Innocency, and suffer their Adversaries, without Disturbance or Molestation, to swear them out of their Lives and Estates; The Truth of which appear'd by their causing Mr. John Harrington, for no other Crime, to be bound in a Recognizance of 1000*l.* to answer at the King's Bench to whatsoever Charge or Information should be brought against him; and by their giving out on every side, that Indictments and Precognitions were ready to be prefer'd against several Persons, who, like Mr. Harrington, had nothing to answer for, but their too bold and saucy prying into the secret Transactions of Warcup, to suborn the Willing on one hand, and to persecute the Obstinate on the other: The general Method of conducting which, we find thus compendiously set down, agreeable to what has [P. iii. p. 62.] been already suggested in the Case of Wilkinson, Sec. viz. That the first Expedient they made use of to prepare a Man for the Impression they design'd to make was, to bear him down with a strong Persuasion that he must needs know something of the Earl of Shaftsbury's Designs against his Majesty: That the next was, to take the Advantage of his Weakness or Wickedness, by insinuating, ating, that if he would be so ingenious as to confide, he had an Opportunity both to enrich himself and obtain the Favour of the Government; and that if the Person thus dangerously betwixt, prov'd so just to him self, and so tender of himself, as to declare in the Simplicity of his Heart, that he was altogether ignorant of any ill Design projected or promoted by that Nobleman, he was finally told, That an Information of a dangerous Nature was lodg'd against him; and that since by declining to inform against Lord Shaftsbury, he had render'd himself unworthy of the Favour and Mercy of his Prince, he must expect to undergo the utmost Severity of the Law.

And, to close for the present, on this scandalous Head, we have already seen, that the Names of such great Men as the Lords Halifax, Hyde, &c. were openly made use of to give Credit to the mighty Promises necessary to be made in a Traffic of this infamous nature; so, in the Writing before us, we find those Pillars of the State call'd upon to take signal Vengeance on Warcup, Booth, &c. for having prostituted their Characters to so vile a Purpose, if they had any Regard for the Opinion of the Public, or if these their known Agents had exceeded their Instructions, and said or done more than they could justify.

Having thus treated of the Allegations against one Party, it is but equal to treat also of those against the other: And this brings us to the grand Struggle between the Bench and the Jury in the Case of Lord Shaftsbury; not for the Palm of Justice, but to serve their respective Clients; as may be very fairly and candidly infer'd from the Proceedings on both Sides.

With what an Eye to Contests of this nature the Milcontents had been so extremely solicitous to have Sheriffs after their own Heart, has already been shewn; as also of what Advantage to their Cause this Solicitude of theirs had proved, in the Cases of College and Rowse: And with what Zeal those of the present Year, Pilkington and Slute had bettired themselves in behalf of their great Leader, became manifest to the whole Court, when the Jurors answer'd to their Names. (f) It is truly observ'd by Mr. North, that they were pick'd out from the very Center of the Party; and tho' Men of Eminence both for Ability and Circumstance, were so far gone in the Distempers of the Times, that it was next to impossible for them to see any political Object, but thro' a factious Medium.

Previous Care had also been taken to set forth in the Papers, just quoted, all the Circumstances, Arguments and Inferences that could help either to blacken the Prosecutors or to blanch the Prisoner: One of these (the second Part of No Protestant Plot) came out but the very Night before the Hearing; in which all the plausible things imaginable were said both to induce the Jurors to suppress the Bill, and to countenance them to the Public for so doing: In particular, they were told, That a Grand Jury was never to find a Bill, but either upon personal Knowledge of the Facts specify'd in it, or (g) credible Evidence: That if they did otherwise, they were perjur'd; for if they believ'd the Evidence to be false, they could not believe the Bill to be true: That when Jurors found a Bill on such Evidence, they were guilty of a threefold Injury to the Prisoner in relation to his Liberty, Estate, and Life; for, that upon finding the Bill, his Body became liable to a closer Restraint, his Goods to be inventory'd, and his Life was put into Hazard: That they were the sole Judges of the Matter of Fact; and therefore it was reasonable, and had been customary for the Witnesses to give their Depositions to them only, and that more especially as the Bench were not to give them any Directions as to their Decision thereon: That they were Judges of (h) Law as well as Fact, so far as it related to Fact, or was complicated with it: That they were not only to be guided by the Credibility or Incredibility of the Witnesses, but also by the (i) Probability or Improbability of what

(g) Under this Head it was further said; "They are, in the first place, and in a special Manner, to consider and weigh the Quality and Credibility of the Witnesses, who are brought to prove the Indictment. For there are some, whose Testimony the Law doth not admit, and consequently the Jurors are not to receive their Evidence, as in the last to be influenced by it. And whoever is so branded that he cannot be a Juror, he is also excluded, according to Law, from all Capacity of being a Witness. There are some whom the Law styles infamous, nor have such any Credit to support what they say. Yea, there are some whom the Law hath not branded with the Mark of Infamy, and yet Principles of natural Light instruct us not to give any Faith unto them. Perjurus est, Gith Civil Law, non facile creditur; a beggery or bold Person is not to be credited. Such a one, perjurus, magis quam Gith, iudicatur: ubi non Imperialis est non bene a gravitate. Perjurus non dicitur Responso in Reputatio, is not to be much hearken'd unto in what he says. Particularly, whoever is brib'd or suborn'd is both in the Sight of the Law, and according to the common Sense of Mankind, an infamous Person, to whom Jurors are to give no Belief. Yea, one Witness, of whose being suborned the Jury are fully'd, it is enough to bring a just Suspicion upon the Testimony of never so many other Witnesses, tho' there be no Evidence of their being corrupted." No Protestant Plot, Part II, p. 25.

(h) Which Maxim we find thus artificially enforced and explain'd: "For they do not, neither are they to find the Fact absolutely by itself, and leave the Law to the Court; but they find the Party guilty or not guilty, or a Bill to be Bills vera or Ignorantia, as the Indictment, or the Case in Issue, contain Law and Fact complicated together. For, though they may be convinc'd of the Fact, that the Party charged before them did it, yet they are not to find him guilty, which they be fully'd that he did it as it is laid in the Indictment; that is, that it be such a Crime as it is there styl'd, and done with that intention and malicious Intention as it is there laid. And were it otherwise, a Person might come to be condemn'd for the most innocent Fact in the World; provided that it were reprim'd in the Indictment as some mortal Offence, and then proved by the Witnesses to have been done. Thus, suppose a Person to be indicted for Words that are plainly Treason, according to the Statute of the 14th of Charles II. Yet, if the Party charged be not professed within the Time provided by that Act, he is not to be brought in as guilty, tho' it should appear by the Evidence, that such and such Words were spoken. And the Reason is plain, for as much as the Statute makes not Words treason, but without such a limited and prefixed Time; and therefore if the Time, thro' the Fault of the Informer, or Neglect of the Prosecutor, be suffered to elapse, no Jury is afterwards to find an Indictment, were the Words charged never so fully proved." Ibid.

(i) For, as a Witness is to swear nothing but what he hath heard or seen, and is not to be allow'd to make any Inferences or Deductions, but is merely to relate Matters, as they occurred and fell under his Sense; so Jurors are not to swallow it without chewing of it, and examining the Possibility

And, over and above all this, Mr. North takes notice, "That, at this Examination, according to Custom, the Wapping and Suburb Detachments were upon Duty, possess'd of the Yard and the Street, full of Insolence and Threats in their Bruit and Faces." So that nothing was omitted that could help either to convince, persuade, or overawe. And if all this Variety of Efforts for the Earl's Preservation was made purely and simply, out of Affection to his Person, or Zeal to the Cause, without any mercenary Mixture of any kind whatsoever, it must be acknowledg'd that he had a better Interest in the People, and was better serv'd than his Majesty.

November the 24th was the Day of hearing of this Important Cause; when the Bench was fill'd with the Oracles of the Law by special Commission, having in Front, for the more Ostentation, the two Chief Justices, and at their Feet the whole Royal posse of Attorney and Solicitor General, King's Council, &c. to assist in doing his Majesty Reason against the Obstinacy and Perverseness of a malapert, refractory Jury. But, notwithstanding this express Apparatus for this single Purpose, which is even acknowledg'd by the Lord Chief Justice Pemberton himself, we find his Lordship entering upon his Charge to the Jury, as if he was wholly unprovided with any set Discourse, on the Presumption that the (l) Recorder had already instructed them to his Hand.

The Lord
Chief-Justice's Charge.

As to his Lordship's extempore Harangue, the principal Drift of it was to explain, 1st, the two Statutes of Treason, particularly the last, already so often mention'd, which provided, That any malicious and advised speaking or writing, tending to the Death of the King, or laying him under Restraint, should be the same as the Capital Treason; And 2dly, To caution them not to be over Partious nor merciful. "You are not to judge the Persons, said his Lordship, nor to condemn; nor is it your Office to require any Bill made by you; but by others that are sworn to try a Fact or Cause, a reasonable Cause, or some Ground, that the King hath to call these Persons to answer for it, as enough, Gentlemen, for you to find a Bill, inasmuch as is by Law required. Gentlemen, you must consider this, that it is a Crime for you to condemn innocent Persons, so it is a Crime as great to acquit the Guilty.--- And let me tell you, if any of you shall be refractory, and will not find any Bill, where there is a probable Ground for an Accusation, you do therein undertake to intercept Justice.--- You thereby make yourselves Criminals, and the Fault will lye at your Door:--- Compassion or Pity is not your Province nor ours in this Case.--- Therefore I must require you to consider such Evidence as shall be given you, and to be impartial, &c.

A Bill being then offer'd against the Earl of Shaftsbury, Sir Francis Wither, the Parliament-Abhorrer, formerly spoken of, mov'd, that the Evidence might be heard in Court; which, after some Controversy between the Bench and the Jury, was allow'd: But this Concession on the King's Behalf, so far transported Mr. Sheriff Pilkington, that, forgetting he was the King's Officer, he made it his Request, that the Witnesses might be call'd one by one; for which he was reprimand'd by the Court, as having made himself a Party against his Majesty in a Cause which no way concern'd him.

Place, read; and in it the Earl was accus'd, with all the Plenitude of Law-Elouquence, of traitorously compassing, imagining, and intending the Death and final Destruction of our Sovereign Lord the King, and the ancient Government of his Kingdom of England to change, alter, and wholly to subvert; and him our said Sovereign Lord from the Title, Honour, and kingly Name of his Imperial Crown to depose and deprive; that is to say, by providing Arms, and armed Men to assist him therein, by holding traitorous Consults with

of the Whole, and the Consistency of one Part with another: For aliquis extraneus non est iudicandus; he who produceth Things which interfere with themselves, or with what any other hath said in the same Cause, overthrows both the Credit of his Fellow-witness, and destroys his own Testimony. Some things, tho' positively sworn, yet carry their Refutation along with them. For example, that there should be a Protestant Plot to seize the King and alter the Government, and not one of all those know it, who were most likely to have been made acquainted with it: And a Conspiracy to apprehend the King at Dayton, and yet no visible Force to effect it, nor any thing proportionate to such an Undertaking either taken care of before-hand, or brought to light since. It is impossible, that what my Lord Shaftsbury is charged with should be true, and yet that no Man should ever hear of it, but they from whom, if there had been any such thing, it would have been most industriously concealed." Ibid.

(k) "For where there is either Malice at the Bottom, or unseasonal and unbecoming Rigor and Violence in the Pursuit, it is just Ground admitt'd of a Suspicion, that the Party acted it not so much nocent as his Enemies out of Wrath and Revenge would have him thought to be. A Prince's Interest is to have the Lives of all his Subjects preferred, as far as the Law, his own Safety, and the Welfare of the Society, will admit; and therefore the Arguing out of a Person from the rest, as if it were of purpose to own him down, argues that some Inducements, which his Prosecutors do not think fit to mention, do influence unto it, and that it is the Interest of some secret Ministers, rather than the Party's own Guilt, that bring him under Ostracism. Besides, where all things have been carry'd with a Clash and Blow, which is neither justify'd by the Law, nor usual in other Cases, there Men may justly fear that there is some Play in that Man's Affair. Again, when a Si quis, as it were, hath been sent into all Parts to invite Witnesses, and when foreign Dominions have been sought into for Evidence, as well as our own Kingdoms, it gives impartial Men Cause to apprehend, that the Party pursued is not so criminal as his Adversaries endeavour to proclaim him." Ibid.

(l) His Lordship's Words are, "Truly I can hinder this Morning, with an Apprehension that you had your Directions given you before by the Recorder: for it is our usual Way not to come till the Juries are sworn, and their Directions given them."

A. D. 1651. with John Booth, and others; by saying to the said Booth, by way of Incentive, on the 18th of March. That the Parliament was speedily to sit at Oxford. That he had inspected the Elections, and consider'd the Inclinations and Dispositions of the Members elected; and was fully resolv'd to insist on three things, viz. (m) The Bill of Exclusion; the Abolishing the Act against Recusancy; and the passing a new Bill for uniting Protestant Dissenters: As also divers other good and wholesome Bills; to which he was certain the King's Majesty would refuse to give his Royal Assent: That therefore he did expect there would be a Division between the King's Majesty and the Parliament: That many noble Lords and worthy Members of the lower House did concur in the same Opinion: That they were resolv'd to insist on the passing of those Bills; and if the King's Majesty still refus'd, that they (meaning him the said Earl, and the said noble Lords and worthy Members) had provided Strength to compel the King's Majesty to concur also: That for his Part he had provided fifty stout Men to be commanded by Wilkinson, of whom Booth was to be one: That on the said 18th of March, in the Presence and Hearing of many of his Majesty's Lieges, he had moreover declar'd, That our said Lord the King was a Man of no Faith; that there was no Trust in him; and that he deserv'd to be depos'd as well as Richard II. That he, the said Earl, would never desist until he had brought this Kingdom of England into a Commonwealth, without a King, as Holland was: That many would assist him in this Design; and that our said Lord the King and all his Family should be rooted out: And finally, that he, the said Earl, had further declar'd, that the King was a Man of an unfaithful Heart, and not worthy to be trusted, nor fit to rule and govern, being false, unjust, and cruel to his People; and

A. D. 1651. that if he would not be govern'd by his People, that they, still meaning himself and his traitorous Associates of both Houses, before mention'd, our said Sovereign Lord would depose, &c.

Thus we have, at last, an Epitome of the Oxford-Conspiracy, and find, that tho' Lord Chief-Justice North, in College's Trial had fo explicitly declar'd, That he knew of no Protestant Plot in question; the Fulness of Time was now come, when a Protestant Plot was to be openly avow'd; when one Protestant Peer was indicted for being an Accomplice in it: And when a Foundation was laid for the like capital Proceeding against every other obnoxious Member in either House; whether justly or not, it is as yet too soon to determine.

The Indictment being thus read, it was natural to suppose that the next Step would have been to produce the Evidence on which it was founded: But by way of Preparatory, Mr. Blathwait, and Mr. Gwyn, both Clerks of the Council, and Mr. Secretary Jenkins, were call'd upon to give in the Testimony relating to a certain Paper found in the Earl's Closet, and now produc'd in Court: And first Blathwait swears, That the said Paper was put in his Custody by Gwyn, who seiz'd it among others in Lord Staffbury's House: Then Gwyn, himself, in a round-about way, confirms the same thing; by deposing, That he put certain loose Papers, which he found in Lord Staffbury's Closet, into a Velvet Bag; and, when press'd by the Bench, that the Paper then under Consideration was 'one of them. And after him Mr. Secretary Jenkins swears, that the said Paper was put into his Hands by Blathwait at the Council Board.

The Paper itself, thus authenticated, was read in Court, and contain'd the Draught of an (n) Association; the obligatory Part of which, was as follows:

"I A. B. do in the Presence of God solemnly

[n] See the Excerpts from Wilkinson's Narrative, before-mentioned.

[e] Thus introduced: "We the Knights, &c. finding, to the Grief of our Hearts, the popish Jesuits and Jesuits, with the Papists, and their Adherents and Abettors, have, for several Years last past, pursued a most pernicious and heinous Plot, to root out the true Protestant Religion as a pestilent Heresy, to take away the Life of our gracious King, to subvert our Laws and Liberties, and to set up arbitrary Power and Popery."

And it being notorious, that they have been highly encouraged by the Countenance and Protection given and procured for them by J. D. of Y. and by their Expectations of his succeeding to the Crown; and that, through crafty popish Counsels, his Designs have so far prevail'd, that he hath created many and great Dependents upon him, by his bestowing Offices and Preferments both in Church and State:

It appearing also to us, That, by his Incessant, mercenary Forces have been levied and kept on foot, for his secret Designs, contrary to our Laws; the Officers thereof having been named and appointed by him, to the apparent Hazard of his Majesty's Person, our Religion and Government, if the Danger had not been timely foreseen by several Parliaments, and Part of those Forces, with great Difficulty, caused by them to be disbanded, at the Kingdom's great Expence:

And it being evident, that, notwithstanding all the continual Endeavours of the Parliament to deliver his Majesty from the Council, and out of the Power, of the said J. D. yet his Interest in the Ministry of State and others have been so prevalent, that Parliaments have been unseasonably prorogued, and dissolved, when they have been in hot Pursuit of the popish Conspiracies, and all Ministers of State their Assis-

And that the said J. D. in order to reduce all into his own Power, hath procured the Garrison, the Army and Ammunition, and all the Power of the Seas, and Soldiers, and Lands, belonging to these three Kingdoms, to be put into the Hands of his Party and their Adherents, even in opposition to the Advice and Order of the last Parliament:

And as we considering with heavy Hearts, how greatly the Strength, Reputation, and Treasure of the Kingdoms, both at Sea and Land, is wasted, and consumed, and lost, by the intricate, expensive Management of these wicked, despicable Designs; and finding the same Councils, after exemplary Justice upon some of the Conspirators, to be still pursued with the utmost devilish Malice, and Desire of Revenge; whereby his Majesty is in continual Hazard of being murder'd, to make way for the said J. D.'s Advancement to the Crown; and the whole Kingdom, in such case, is destitute of all Security of the Kingdom, Laws, Estates, and Liberty; sad Experience, in the Case of Queen Mary, having prov'd the wicked Laws to be of little Force to keep out Popery, and Tyranny under a popish Prince:

We have therefore endeavour'd in a parliamentary Way, by a Bill for the Purpose, to bar and exclude the said Duke from the Succession to the Crown, and to banish him for ever out of these Kingdoms of England and Ireland. But the first Means of the King and Kingdom's Safety being utterly rejected, and we left almost in despair of obtaining any real and effectual Security, and knowing ourselves to be entrusted to advise and act for the Preservation of his Majesty and the Kingdom; and being perswaded in our Conscience, that the Dangers aforesaid are so eminent and pressing, that there ought to be no Delay of the best Means that are in our Power to secure the Kingdom against them: We have thought fit to propose to all true Protestants an Union among lemnly promise, vow, and protest to maintain and defend, to the utmost of my Power, with my Person and Estate, the true Protestant Religion against Popery and all Popish Superstition, Idolatry, or Innovation, and all those who do or shall endeavour to spread or advance it within this Kingdom.

I will also, as far as in me lies, maintain and defend his Majesty's Royal Person and Estate, as also the Power and Privilege of Parliaments, the lawful Rights and Liberties of the Subject, against all Incroachments and Usurpation of ARBITRARY POWER whatsoever, and endeavour indirectly to DISBAND all such mercenary Forces as, we have reason to believe, were raised to advance it, and are still kept up in and about the City of London to the great Amazement and Terror of all the good People of the Land.

Moreover J. D. of F. having publicly profess'd and own'd the Popish Religion, and notoriously given Life and Birth to the damnable and hellish Plots of the Papists against his Majesty's Person, the Protestant Religion, and the Government of this Kingdom. I will never consent that the said J. D. of F. or any other who is, or hath been, a Papist, or any ways adher'd to the Papists in their wicked Designs, be admitted to the Succession of the Crown of England: But by all lawful Means, and by Force of Arms, if Need so require, according to my Abilities, will oppose him, and endeavour to subdue, expel, and destroy him, if he come into England, or the Dominions thereof; and seek by Force to set up his pretended Title, and all such as shall adhere unto him, or raise any War, Tumult, or Sedition for him, or by his Command, as public Enemies of our Laws, Religion, and Country.

To this end we, and every one of us whose Hands are here under-written, do most willingly bind ourselves and every one of us unto the other, jointly and severally, in the Bond of one firm and loyal Society or Association; and do promise and vow before God, That with our joint and particular Forces, we will oppose and pursue unto Destruction all such, as, upon any Title whatsoever, shall oppose the just and righteous Ends of this Association; and maintain, protect and defend all such as shall enter into it in the just Performance of the true Intent and Meaning of it. And lest this just and pious Work should be any Ways obstructed or hindered for want of Discipline and Conduct, or any evil-minded Persons, under Pretence of raising Forces for the Service of this Association, should attempt or commit Disorders, we will follow such Orders as we shall from time to time receive from this present Parliament, whilst it shall be sitting, or the Major Part of the Members of both Houses subscribing this Association, when it shall be prorogued or dissolved, and obey such Officers as shall by them be set over us in several Counties, Cities, and Burroughs, till the next Meeting of this or any other Parliament; and will then themselves attend Obedience and Submission unto them, and shall be bound to it.

Neither will we be separated or separated ourselves from this Association, or in the Prosecution thereof during our Lives, upon Pain of being by the Lawes prosecuted, and suppress'd as persons and public Enemies to God, the King, and his native Country.

To which Pains and Punishments we do voluntarily submit ourselves, and every one of us, without Benefit of any Colour or Pretence to excuse us.

Mr. Secretary Jenkins, in his Deposition, makes mention of nine Papers more; and among these, there was one, "Which made more Noise in Town, says Mr. North, than this of the Association; but by reason the Title was enigmatic, it could not regularly be offer'd in Evidence.—It was a List of Counties, and Names under the Titles of worthy Men, and Men worthy, in two Columns; the first, by Interpretation, was of Preferment, and the other to be hang'd. But, continues the same Writer, in the Observation of the Public, the White and Black List was a notable Discovery; for it shew'd by what sanguinary, as well as partial Measures, the Party had proceeded, if their Designs had taken Effect, &c."

This Paper-Evidence being dispatch'd, which, by the way, had no immediate Relation to the Indictment, and was introduc'd, Mr. (s) North tells us, only as a Circumstance, that made the direct Evidence more credible, Booth's Evidence was call'd upon, who enlarg'd on all the Particulars mention'd in the indictment relative to Wilkinson and himself; adding, moreover, That he had been first introduc'd to the Earl by the Captain: That they had, both together, waited on him often: That upon those Occasions his Lordship did use to inveigh sharply against the Times, and complain of personal Neglects, &c. That, discoursing of the Oxford Parliament, he presum'd that a Breach would be unavoidable; in which case they were to repel Force by greater Force, to purge the Guards of Papists and Tories, remove (p) evil Counsellors, and bring the King to London, there to be detain'd till the new Establishment was made for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and the putting a Stop to the Growth of Arbitrary Power: That he, himself, had provided a good Stone-horse, and Arms for himself, and Arms for his Servant; and that the Conspiracy was only defeated by the sudden and unexpected Dissolution of the Parliament. Turberville follow'd next; the main Part of whose Deposition was, That Lord Shaftsbury had said to him, that little Good was to be expected themselves, by solemn and sacred Promise of mutual Defence and Assistance in the Preservation of the true Protestant Religion, his Majesty's Person and Royal State, and our Laws, Liberties, and Properties; and we hold it our bounden Duty to join ourselves, for the same Intent, in a Declaration of our united Affections and Resolutions, in the Form ensuing."

ex. Sed from the King, as long as his Guards were about him; for, were it not for those Guards, we would quickly go down to White-hall, and obtain what Terms we thought fit. Swift, alias Barry, made a long and purposely-extend'd Discourse, which he clos'd in these Words:

"Another thing that I have observ'd particularly: Before the Parliament went to Oxford, I went to see him, and we fell into some Discourse, and my Lord said there was great Preparations made, and a great many rais'd together upon the Road between London and Oxford. My Lord, said I, what is the Meaning of that? Any body may see, says he, that is only to terrify the Parliament to comply with the King's Desire, which I am sure the Parliament never will, for we are as resolute now as ever, and more resolute; for we see clearly what the King aims at, and that is to bring in Popery; which, I told several Years ago, and when I was last in the Tower: But, says he, we have this Advantage of him, if he offer any Violence to us (for we expect it) that we have the Nation for us, and we may lawfully oppose him, and he will meet with a very strong Opposition; for all that come out of the Country, shall be well hors'd and well arm'd, and so we shall be all; and here is the City which now has a Question in debate among them, whether they shall bear the Charge of their own Members or no; but they are willing to do it, and send so many Men to wait on them; and if we oppose the King, as we may do, for it hath been done in former Times, the whole Nation is to stand by us; and as I said when I was in the Tower, I would die before I would bring in Popery or any thing of that nature."

Here being call'd upon by the Jury to repeat these Particulars again, he did so, with some Variation of Expression, and the following Addition:

"My Lord, said I, we can expect nothing but Confusion from this Parliament in this nature, for then we shall be involved in another Civil War; nothing else can put an End to our Miseries, or make this Nation a settled Nation, but a Civil War. Then my Lord, said I, by this Means we shall make an end of Monarchy, or else enslave the Nation to Popery for ever. No doubt of one, says he, but we are sure of one; for the Nation is of our Side, and the City, you know how they are, and wherever they strike, I am sure the Nation will; and this I'll stand and die by."

Brian Haynes then stood up, and open'd his Evidence with a blunt Declaration, That he had heard Lord Shaftsbury vilify the King often; that is to say, discoursing with his Lordship once on the Subject of the Discoveries which he (Haynes) had to make concerning Goffrey's Death, the Earl encourag'd him to proceed in them, by putting him in hopes of a Pardon; that he, on the contrary, stood off, for fear of exposing his Person to the King's Anger; urging, that he was sure his Majesty would never grant a Pardon to any Man that impeach'd the Earl of Danby; and that hereupon ensu'd the following Parley (9) between them:

"Says he, (these are Haynes's own Words) do not fear; if he doth not grant you a Pardon, he makes himself the Author of the Plot; and, says he, the Earl of Essex, Lord Masfield, [for Macclesfield] and I, we do all resolve, if you put it in Writing, we will go to the King, and beg a Pardon of his Majesty for you; and, if he doth not grant it, we will raise the whole Kingdom against him; for, says he, he must not expect to live peaceably in his Throne, if he doth not do it; for he makes himself Author of the Plot.

My Lord, said I, he hath dissolv'd so many Parliaments for the sake of the Earl of Danby, and prorogued for many Parliaments, therefore he will never grant me this Pardon. Says he, do not fear, 'tis the best Pretence we can have in the World; and if you will but put it in Writing, and let me read it, that I may give my Opinion of it, the Work is done; and, if he doth not do it, we are prepar'd to raise Arms against him."

He then spoke of another Conference with the Earl, at ANOTHER TIME, and said, he was then inform'd by him, That the two Goffreys had been with the King at Windsor, to solicit his Pardon; and that the King had refus'd it: That, hereupon, he (Haynes) again expressing his Fears of what might befall him, from the King's Fury, in these Days, and desiring Money in order to enable him to leave the Kingdom, his Lordship reply'd, in effect, That these were the best Days or Times he could wish for: That, if the King did not grant him a Pardon, he could not expect to be long King of England: And that he durst as well be hang'd, as meddle with him.— And, to complete his Evidence, he mention'd a third close Conference with the Earl, in which he (Haynes) entertain'd him with so exact an Account of the public Transactions, from the Accession of K. Charles I. to that very Day, that his Lordship, finding also he was a Troscoller, as well as a Politician, was mightily satisfy'd, and mightily pleas'd, and free with him: Which encourag'd him to make as free with his Lordship, by putting to him the following home Question: Pray, my Lord, what Model do you take, or intend to do? Says he, (here again we copy Mr. Haynes's own Expressions) Do you not think but there are Families in England that have as great Pretences to the Crown as the King? Says he, there is the Duke of Bucks, in the Right of his Mother: She was descend'd from Edward— one of the Edwards— and, in her Right, he claims the Barony of Ros. He hath as great a Right to the Crown of England, as any Stuart of them all." Here the Jury calling upon him, likewise, to go over the latter Part of his Story a second time, he did so; but not without a very material Alteration in his leading Question to the communicative Earl: For, instead of saying, as before, before, that he only enquir'd in general, what his Model was, and what he intend'd to do; according to the second Edition, it was, What did THEY intend to do with the Government, if they pull'd the KING down?

John Macnamarra was the next Man upon the List; who swore, That the Earl, for himself, and those who were with him at Oxford, undertook to procure Money for the Witnesses in the Popish Plot; and that he had made Applications to him to be taken care of, as one of the Number: That, in particular, after his Lordship's Return to London from that Place, he going to him to see what was done (in relation to Money, must be presum'd) his Lordship was pleas'd to say, "That the King was popishly affected, and did adhere to Popery; and that he took the same Methods that his Father before him took, which brought his Father's Head to the Block; and we will also bring his to this." That he then spoke of the Money, as that a Collection had been made, and that he should hear farther in a Fortnight; and that he waiting again on his Lordship, at the Fortnight's End, he told him, the Money was deposited in Rouse's Hands: Adding, moreover, in the Presence of one Foy, and, he thought, of his Brother Macnamarra too, "That the King was a faithless Man; that there was no Credit to be given to him; and that the Duchess of Mazarine was his Cabinet-Council, who was the worst of Womankind."— Here he not only came to a full Stop, but unfortunately declar'd, This was all he had to say: And Sir Francis Withens asking, for what End need not be explain'd, if he remember'd nothing else; he answer'd, peremptorily, N O. Nevertheless Sir Francis, finding a Way to prompt as well as question, by proceeding to ask farther, Whether he had heard nothing about deposing the King? his Memory, all at once serv'd him to recollect, that his Lordship had, at the same time, declar'd, That the King deserv'd to be deposed, as much as King Richard the Second did.

The other Macnamarra being then call'd, swore to the same Words, and that Foy was also present when they were spoken. This was obviously Foy's Cue to come forward; which he did, and testify'd, That, soon after the Oxford Parliament, he was at the Earl's House, and heard him say of the King, "That he was an unjust Man, and not fit to reign: That he wonder'd he (the King) did not take Example by his Father before him: That he really believ'd he was a Papist in his Heart, and intended to introduce Popery." That, some time after, having been instrumental in introducing Haynes to the Earl, his Lordship desir'd Haynes to put what he had to say in Writing; promis'd him a Pardon, and said, moreover, That, if the King did deny it, as he dares not deny it, we will rise upon him, and force him: "That he was frequently with his Lordship, and that he carry'd Haynes's Examination to him; upon which Occasion his Lordship desir'd it might be explain'd, what he meant by the TALL BLACK MAN; and, says he, proceeds the notable Evidence, if he does mean the King, he must explain himself, and speak of the King, or the Duke of York, or the rest; and if he does, we will take care of him as long as he lives. But unless he does, we will do nothing for him. And yet, after all these promising Issues, being brought back to the first Part of his Testimony by Sir Francis Withens, and ask'd in particular, whether he remember'd the Circumstance relating to Richard the Second, which both the Macnamarra's had sworn was utter'd in his Presence, he declar'd he remember'd nothing of it.

In the Rear of all came one Richard Dennis; who depos'd, That from the Time he had commenced Witness he had been maintain'd by Lord Shaftesbury, by the Hands of Hetherington; and that being in Discourse with his Lordship in the GALLERY, at his Lordship's House, he, the Earl, told him, that, tho' what he had given in of the Plot in general was very good and sufficient, it would be better if he spoke more home and positive against the Queen and Duke of York; that he might be able, at least, to corroborate what others had sworn against them: But the Force of what he had to say, as he express'd himself, consisted in what follows, viz. That, after the Oxford-Parliament, he coming to wait on the Earl to solicit a Supply, found him in his Room, in the Company of one Major Manley, a Barber also waiting to shave him; before both whom, it seems, his Lordship not only refer'd him to Rouse for Money, but proceeded to ask how many of his Name or Clan there might be in the County from whence he came (Dennis was one of the Irish Corps)? and that he answering, by Conjecture, about three or four hundred able Men; says the Earl, (or at least to Mr. Dennis swore he said) "Mr. Dennis, I would very willingly have you to advise those of your Name, and those of your Friends, for to be in a Readiness, whenever Occasion shall serve, and to stand by, if Occasion should be, for to assist the Commonwealth of England; for we do really intend to have England under a Commonwealth, and no Crown; and we intend to live as we see Holland does, that is, to have a Commonwealth, and to have no supreme Head, particular Man, or King, nor owe Obedience to a Crown; and we will extirpate the King, and all his Family, as near as can be."

The Indictment was so well supported in every Instance, as far as Swearing could support it, that the King's Council here thought fit to close their Evidence; and the Lord Chief-Justice gave the Jury to understand, that, if they had any Questions to ask, the Witnesses should be brought into Court again, one by one, to answer to their Inquest. But the Jury, it seems, had two previous Questions to put to the Court, viz. 1. On what Statute the Indictment was founded, whether on that of the 25th of Edw. III. or that of the 13th of the King, or both? 2. Whether any of the Witnesses were themselves indicted? To the first, the Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton answer'd, That the Indictment was grounded on the Statute of the King, as being the most copious; but both were to be consider'd: And the Lord Chief-Justice North, to make their Foundation as broad as possible, took notice, as before in the Trial of Collige, That as the Words in the Judgment were contra Formam Statuti, with an Apostrophe, it might be understood Statutorum or Statuti; so that all the Statutes relative to Treason were in force upon this Occasion. And, as to the second, the Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton, with his usual Address of, Leak ye, Gentlemen, gave the Jury to understand, That it was not proper for them to examine or take Proofs concerning the Credibility of the Witnesses; and that on the contrary, they were only to examine whether the Statute was satisfi'd, in having Matter that was treasonable, and having it witness'd by two Men, who were, prima facie, credible. And yet the Bill of Indictment is drawn up in the Names of the Jurors, who are therein made to adopt the Depositions of the several Witnesses, and to give all in, not on the Oaths of the Witnesses, but their own; which is sufficient to startle any Man not vers'd in the Practice of the Law, and to authorize any Scruples of any kind whatever.

Examination of the Witnesses by the Jury.

These Points being thus decided, the Court adjourn'd till Three in the Afternoon; at which Time, the Jury came prepar'd with their several Queries: They began first with Mr. Gwyn; whom they question'd in relation to the Seizure of the Papers, and of the Association-Paper in particular, in such a manner as argued a Suspicion, that it was laid there by those that found it. Mr. Gwyn was, however, express, that the Paper was fairly found; tho' he confess'd he did not know the Hand, and was very hardly brought to own, that he had ever heard any Talk of a parliamentary Association: And when some Questions were put to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, relative to the same Point, even he appear'd to have the same (r) Gift of Forgetfulness: For, having said, that he did not remember to have heard this particular Association propos'd, and being ask'd by the Foreman, Sir Samuel Bernardson, whether he did not remember the Reading of it, on occasion of the Bill, he could recollect no more, than that such a thing had been talk'd of; not that he was present at the Reading: Tho' it is affirm'd he was on the Credit of several of his Fellow-Members; and moreover that he oppos'd the said Bill with all his Might.

The Questions they put to Booth, related to the Time, Manner, Place, and Circumstances, &c. of his being admitted to the Earl: But when they proceeded to ask him, Whether he had been indicted for Felony? and Whether he had ever had any Converse with one Marriot an Attorney, who had been concern'd in some Management of the Irish Witnesses, &c.? the Lord Chief-Justice interpos'd in the King's Behalf, with as much Earnestness as they had shewn in behalf of the Earl; saying, Such Questions were not to be suffer'd; those relating to Marriot being Trifles; and those which had a Tendency to make Booth accuse himself, unfair.

Of Turberville they ask'd, When he heard the Words he swore to? He answer'd, in February. Q. When he reveal'd them? A. About the fourth of July. Q. Whether, about the Beginning of July, after the Earl's Commitment, he did not declare to one Mr. Herbert who charg'd him with being retain'd as a Witness against his Lordship, That, as he was alive, he knew of no such thing? A. I do not remember that ever I spoke one Word to Mr. Herbert in my Life. Q. Were not you one who petition'd the Common-council? A. Yes. Q. And did not you then declare, that you were tempted to witness against your Conscience? A. I believe I never read the Petition. [Note, Mr. Bellamy, the Scrivener, who drew up this Petition, depos'd upon Oath, "That Mr. Turberville, Macnamarra, Haynes and others, came to his House (being near Guild-Hall) the Night before the Common-Council sat, to desire him to draw a Petition to the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and Common-Council, for their present Support and Maintenance: And that when they had given him Instructions, he drew a foul Draught thereof, which he read to them the next Morning as audibly and distinctly as he could; and that they all seem'd very well satisfi'd with it, desiring only that he would add to the last Clause of the Body of the Petition these Words, viz. That they could not be suppli'd out of his Majesty's Exchequer. And that when he had thus perfect'd the foul Draught to their Satisfaction, and engross'd it, he read it to them again with the same Plainness and Distinctness as before; and that all of them did very well approve of it, especially Mr. Turberville, who was pleas'd to give it a particular Character.] Q. Were you in a poor Condition? A. Truly, I was not very poor, tho' I was not over full of Money.

Of Smith they ask'd abundance of Questions; all tending manifestly to expose and ensnare him; which he discern'd, and kept so good a Guard, as shew'd he had many weak Places to cover.

The most material Questions put to Haynes were these: Namely, Q. Did you ever make any other Information to a Justice of the Peace? A. Not of my Lord Shaftsbury. Q. Did you not give in an Information of a Design (1) against the Earl of Shaftsbury? A. [after some Embarrassment] Yes, to Sir George Treby, in March last. Q. When did you give in your Information against the Earl? A. The 20th of June, the Day I was taken up by the Messenger. Q. When was it with the Discourse with him? A. I had several Conferences with him. Q. Did he ever among the Mercies which God had bestow'd on him, one was the Gift of Forgetfulness.

A. D. 1681. time say the same? A. The LAST was in Ironmonger-lane [this must be understood of the CLOSE CONFERENCE he had before spoken of] --He wanted me to explain what I did mean by the TALL MAN I mention'd in the Narrative. -- When we met, MY NAME IS HAYNES, my Lord, said I. -- I had, I believe, a whole Hour's Discourse with him: And, pray my Lord, said I, what Religion is the King of? Truly, says he, Mr. Haynes, he hath no more Religion than a Horse; for, says he, they say, Sir, he was inclin'd to Popery, when he came first to England: But since, he was degenerated from all the Principles of Christianity, for he is just like a perfect Beast. Q. Was it the same time he spoke about the Duke of Buckingham? A. No. Q. Did you ever hear any other Words? A. Yes; for, in Ironmonger-lane, I told him our only and best Way to have our ENDS of the King was, to raise a Rebellion in Ireland; that I had Relations and Friends, and could get discontented Persons enough; and his Lordship would do the like here. Q. Did you propound a Rebellion in Ireland? A. I offer'd to go beyond Sea, and that now was the best time to raise a Rebellion in Ireland. And he said it was not the best Way; for they had other Means to take; and so the Discourse was wad.

The Questions put to the two Macnamaras were all pretty much of the same Nature, as their Evidence was chiefly drawn from the same Conversation; only John Macnamarra was ask'd, Whether he had sign'd the Petition to the Common-council; and he acknowledged that he did; but withal declar'd, like Turberville before him, That he had not read it, neither did he know the Contents. Upon which Mr. Papillon observ'd, as follows: "My Lord, in that Petition, they say, they were tempted to swear against their Consciences; and that some of the Witnesses had made shipwreck of their Consciences. We ask them now, and they say, they do not know what was in the Petition: If we should ask them, who tempted them, and who those Witnesses were that made shipwreck of their Consciences, it would signify nothing: For since they do not know what was in the Petition, it is in vain to ask them any more." Dennis Macnamarra was moreover ask'd, Whether he had a Pardon? and Lord Chief-Justice North interposing, on the Maxim before made use of by Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton, That he might not be put on accusing himself, Mr. Papillon, the Querist, added, "If he hath a Pardon, he is in statu quo: Suppose, my Lord, some of them have been guilty of poisoning, some of Felony, some of Robbing on the Highway, we do but ask if they be pardon'd." And Icely having own'd, that the Words he swore to were spoken about the latter End of March, or Beginning of April; whereas the Earl was not committed till the Beginning of July; and being further ask'd, Why he conceal'd his Information so long? he answer'd, I will tell it as soon as I could.

The first Question put to Dennis was also in relation to the Time when the Earl used such Expressions to him; he was depos'd in the Morning; and Mr. Answer was had, on April 4, or five Days after the Dissolution of Parliament was dissolv'd: And Mr. Papillon, as if for greater Precision, asking, In the Beginning? He seem'd to correct himself, and said, in March. Q. It was in March, and where? A. In his own House, here in the Town, four or five Days after the Parliament was (t) dissolv'd at Oxford, immediately after he came home. I do not think he was at home three Days before. Q. Who was present? A. Mr. Shepherd, and some other of his Servants. Q. Did he whisper? A. No: I was just by him. Q. When did you make this Information? A. In June. Q. Why did you conceal it so long? A. Because I was in the City so long. Q. Did you go about to muster your 400 Men? A. Upon my Word, I did advise some of them to be ready. Q. Did you provide them with Arms? A. No, I was not able to do it. Q. In what Place of his House were the Words said? A. In his own Chamber, the great Chamber; I do not know whether you call it the Hall or Parlour. Q. Have you heard my Lord say any treasonable Words in any other Place, at any other Time? A. In the long Gallery, in his own House, at another time. Q. Why did you not say so before? A. I did say so before: In the long Gallery he told me he would have a Commonwealth in England, and extirpate the Crown of England, and the King of England.

Now here occurs one of the most flagrant Contradictions that ever branded Knight of the Post: For, in his former Deposition, he swore point blank, that the Words utter'd by the Earl in the Gallery related to his Evidence of what he had to say consisted in the Discourse which he had had with his Lordship in his Room; not in the Presence of Mr. Shepherd, but of Major Manley, and a Barber; and yet the Jury pass'd over it, apparently thro' Inadvertency; for if they had discover'd the Flaw, they would not have fail'd to expose it.

Indeed the very Bench itself seem'd to be greatly abash'd, that so mighty an Expectation should be rais'd; and that so little appear'd to satisfy it: For the Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton did not so much as attempt to give a Summary of the Evidence, but contented himself with saying, upon the Issue, "You had best go and consider what Evidence is deliver'd, and weigh well all those things that have been said to you; and you must consider your Duty, whether it be fitting for the King to call my Lord Staffbury to question, upon this account of treasonable Words: And even the Lord Chief-Justice North, whose Zeal for the Crown

Lord Chief-Justice Pemberton's Charge:

Lord Chief-Justice North's Charge:

(t) The Parliament was dissolv'd March 28; and we have already quoted a Passage out of No Protestant Plot, Part ii. p. 125. in which it is affirm'd, that the Earl was forced to stay at Oxford, after the Dissolution, till he had sent to London for Horses to convey him home.

no body can question, instead of laying the Stress of his Charge on the Depositions, which alone were brought in support of the Indictment, took notice of the Association only, which had no immediate Relation to it: His Words are these: "I would say one thing, because I observe that some of you ask'd the Question, Whether the Parliament did not debate about an Association? Whether it related to that Paper or no, I am not certain: I hope you will consider that Paper well: For my part, I must needs say for myself, I heard of it, but I never heard it read before, and never heard the Contents of it; but it seems to me to shew, what those Officers were to do for the Ends of this Association; and one of those Ends, as I remember, (Gentlemen, I refer you to the Paper, and hope you will consider it, you are Men of Understanding) I thought that one of those Ends was to destroy (his Lordship should have said dissolve) the mercenary Forces in and about the Cities of London and Westminster; and that the Government was to be by the major Part of the Members of Parliament in the sitting of Parliament, not with the King, but the Major Part of the Members of Parliament. Gentlemen, I may mistake, for I profess I speak only out of Memory; but it seems to me to be of great Consequence, and there is great Matter to be prosum'd upon it, it being found under Lock and Key in his Study: But I suppose my Lord Shaftsbury may give an Account of it; but there is great Presumption upon it, it doth not import to be an Association by Act of Parliament."

Upon the whole, the Jury having withdrawn to consider the Evidence, return'd the Bill Ignoramus; the Court immediately rung with Shouts and Clamours; the Acquittal of Lord Shaftsbury being a Matter of as much Triumph at London, as the Conviction of poor College at Oxford; and the Attorney General recorded his own Vexation, by desiring that those Shouts and Clamours might be recorded.

We have hitherto follow'd the Course of the Proceedings against this Nobleman as they were publish'd by the King's express Command, signify'd in the Title Page: And though the Intelligent Reader may think himself a sufficient Master of the whole Case, from the Lights already before him, some other Particulars remain still to be illustrated, that the Followers of neither Party may have Room to say, we have omitted any thing material either for their Justification, or the Information of Posterity.

Thus Mr. North in his Closet, more peremptorily than his Brother on the Bench, is pleas'd to pronounce as follows:

"The scandalous Perjury of these Ignoramus Returns, lay in this, that, upon an Indictment, the Examination is only an Inquest of Office to accuse, and not a Trial to condemn, or acquit, the Party. And therefore they hear only the Prosecutor, and never any Defendant; and, when divers Offences come to their Knowledge, they have not a Discretion to return to the Court one Information, and to withhold another, but they are to return every unlawful Fact, of which they have Knowledge either of themselves, or from lawful Testimony. If the Testimony be not lawful, as but one Witness in Treason (for the Statute says two lawful Accusers) or if the Testimony be not express to the Matter charg'd, or if that be frivolous or Nonsense, then there is no Information, and they return that they have no Knowledge of such Fact, which is Ignoramus. But if the Testimony be lawful and full, it is Billa Vera, so is the Form; and then the Defence upon Circumstances, such as Mistake of the Person, Perjury of the Witnesses, and the like, doth not belong to them, because it comes not in Examination before them; and for them to grow up, as they pretended, from mere Informers, to become Triers of the Fact, is contrary to Law, the Institution and Duty of their Offices, and no better than rank Perjury. They are not to return to the Court their private Opinion, as the Triers do that say, Not guilty; but they return (as I said) their Information only; which, being legal, is, to all the Intents of any Inquest, vera. And the setting up their Consciences, as to the Merits, which cannot be decided but by another Trial, and hearing both Sides, is a rank Usurpation, or, rather, an Obstruction of the common Course of Justice. But here was no Room, even for that, which made their Act the more impudent and scandalous; for there was not only a legal Testimony, but, as it appear'd, a convincing Evidence of High Treason; and yet, for the Sake of this Head of the Party, the Law must be laid aside (a)."

And,

(a) The same Author, in the Fury of his Zeal, proceeds as follows:

"This indeed was a singular Case, both for the Value of the Person, and the Necessity that fell upon the Faction, for saving of him, to stop the Law in the first Instance. If the Earl, precious as he was to them, had been attain'd by his Party, it was to be fear'd the Treasons of his Skin would not have stood long against a bloody Extirpation; but such Discoveries might have been made, by way of PAIN FOR HIS HEAD, [it was hop'd, it seem'd, that the Earl himself could have turn'd Evidence] as were terrible for the whole Party, and the Interests they serv'd, to think of. And they had not in their Hands his Trial, for that went up to the Peers, as they had of a Commoner, that would come to a Jury of the same Stamp; for then they might have let the Indictment go, and the Petty-Jury, with better Colour, had acquitted him; which had sav'd to the Party that mournful Scandal of Ignoramus: A Point they would have willingly given'd, for open Infamy doth no Party Service; and it is a Prejudice not to be incurred without the utmost Necessity; which Necessity fell out here, because they dar'd not trull the Trial of this noble Earl to his Peers. It is a manifest Evidence, that what the Jurymen did was against their Consciences; for if they had thought the Earl innocent, or that no fatal Consequences to the Party had hung to an Attainder of him, they would have tried the Peers, who, of all Jurymen in the World, are generally most indulgent to the Members of their own Body, of whom they are the only Triers capitally. And to say truth, this Party did not manage so cunningly as they might have done; for this stopping the Law, at the Grand-Jury, in plain Cases, as they did at first in the Cases of some Commoners, without letting them come to Trial, where it might, with much better Colour, have been done, made them more detestable, as having no Excuse. But yet, to do them Right, I guess, even in that, they had Reason; which was, to obviate all manner of Notice or Publication of the Fact; for, at petit Trials, the Jury are a sort of Judges of the Case and Testimony, and the Behaviour of all Persons that are concerned. And thus the Party really did, where the Examinations were per-

And, on the other hand, the Writer of No Protestant Plot, Part iii. not only arraigns the printed Account of the Proceedings, as set forth by Authority, of unwarrantable Additions, Subtractions, and Alterations; and enters into a large Discussion of the Characters of the Witnesses, and the Depositions they made; but has beslow'd some Remarks on the Conduct of the King's Council, and even the Bench itself.

H. p. 139.

According to him, things did not appear to have been carry'd with that Equality and Impartialness betwixt the King and so deserving a Subject, as the Law and common Usage directed and prescrib'd: And it is certain no kind of Procedure is any longer for the King's Honour and Interest, than it is according to Law; which is the Standard of the King's Prerogative, Glory and Safety, as well as the Rule by which the Subject is to be protected, if innocent, and condemn'd if guilty. Whatsoever Wrong is done against any of his Majesty's Lieges, is in the Sense of the Law, done against his Majesty himself, as being the common Spring and Fountain of Justice to all his People: Nor can the Throne be more dishonour'd, than to have Prosecutions to manag'd as to argue, that the King was more concern'd to condemn the Accus'd than acquit the Innocent. Those who testify in support of an Indictment, are no longer for the King, tho' call'd the King's Evidence, than they keep to the Letter of their Oath, and declare the whole Truth and nothing but the Truth: And the Moment any Proof appears, or there is just Reason to suspect that they are retain'd to swear falsely against his Majesty's Subjects, they are in Reality Witnesses against the King, by endeavouring to destroy his People, prevent his Justice, and bring Dishonour on his Royal Name: And when too much Tenderness is shewn to the Characters of Accusers, it follows, that too little is shewn to the Estate, Life, and Honour of the Accus'd.

The express Recommendation of the Statute, 13 of the King, to the Jury, because it was the more copious, seem'd to discover more of a Disposition to condemn than to acquit; And that Disposition became more manifest, when Advantage was taken of both the Statutes against the Earl: By the first, the Proof of some Overt-Act was necessary to constitute Treason; and by the last, which provided that Words should be held as criminal as Deeds, it was also provided that the Prosecution should be commenc'd within six Months after the Words were spoke or writ; and the Indictment laid within three more: But by proceeding in this complicated manner, the King had the Advantage of the Former in extending the Definition of Treason, and of the Latter, in prosecuting at what Distance of Time he pleas'd; whereas the Earl was render'd obnoxious to the Edge of both, at the same time, that he was depriv'd of the whole Benefit that the Subject had a Right to challenge either from the one or the other.

The Examination of the Witnesses in open Court, and the subjecting the Questions of the Jury to the Pleasure of the Bench, were also complain'd of, both as Innovations, and Proofs, that the whole Proceeding was rather a Matter of Revenge than Justice, rather a Piece of State Craft, than the fair Execution of the Laws: And tho' it was alleg'd by the Lord Chief Justice Pemberton, that the King might dispense with that Part of the Juror's Oath, touching the keeping the King's Secrets, and challenge the Privilege of making them public if he pleas'd, it was alleg'd on the other Side, That the Proceedings of our judicial Courts did not depend on the King's Pleasure: That the Power of Juries, and the Methods they were to follow in their Enquiries, were already establish'd by Law and Custom: Nor had the King any Right or Authority either to enlarge or lessen the first, nor to cause any Variation in the last: That, consequently, what the Lord Chief-Justice Norrib was pleas'd to urge, That when all the Judges had agreed that the Witnesses should be examin'd publicly, the Jurors ought to acquiesce, was of no Force; for if the King could not prescribe, neither could the Judges who were his Delegates; and, at this time, it may be remember'd, held their Places durante bene placito, instead of quandiu se bene gesserint.

But that which created the most Surprise, was the Appearance of the King's Council in Court, to lead the Witnesses, and not only open but enforce their Evidence: For a Person fairly indicted, stands in the Sense of the Law, probably innocent, till the Bill be found; and, therefore, no Man, till then, ought to countenance one Side more than the other: And that these avow'd Retainers to the Crown, so avowedly interested themselves in this Case, as to make the King a Party in it, seem'd yet farther to indicate, that there was something more at the Bottom of this Affair, than merely an Experiment to make Truth or Falshood, Guilt or Innocence apparent.

Then as to the Tenderness shewn to the Witnesses, over and above the great Care taken by the Bench to hinder their Villanies from being expos'd in open Court, these venerable Sages very well knew the Rule laid down by Bracton, (w) That he who doth not discover Treason with all the Expedition imaginable, after it once comes to his Knowledge, shall not be heard or allow'd as a Witness, if he comes to discover it afterwards, unless he shows very sufficient Cause: And yet they admitted these Desperados to swear thro' thick and thin against a great Lord, tho'

note, as in the Cases of College and Reyfe [Note, Mr. North himself, as we have seen, bears witness, that both these Examinations were public; but, as soon as the Court ordered the Examination to be public, that Measure was broken, and then they began to regard a little Reputation, and let Indictments go, depending on the Petit-Jury for the Acquittal, as in the Case of Fitzherbert [Note also, that Fitzherbert was executed the Day before Lord Shaftsbury was committed; but in that case they were muffled, as will appear.] Exam. p. 115.

(w) Lib. iii. cap. 5.

tho' none of them could deny their having suppress'd and conceal'd their Evidence for Months together, nor were able to assign the Shadow of an Excuse for their having done so then, or an honest Call for revealing it at last: So that if their Depositions had Truth for their Foundation, it must be allow'd they were under the Direction or Impulse of no good Motive when they made them: And if they were under a bad one, it is reasonable to presume, that they might, with as much Facility, have been induc'd to enter into a Conspiracy against the Life of a Subject, as to depose their King.

It further appears, as to their particular Evidence, that Boob, who is the principal Witness, in relation to the Oxford Design, acknowledges in one Place, that he did not come in till within six Weeks; and in another, till within seven or eight Weeks of this Hearing; which was about the very time that the Attempt was made on Captain Wilkinson: And whereas he swears that he was several times with the Earl, in Company with the Captain; the latter affirm'd, That he never was with him there but once, which was in the Company of Sir Peter Calliton; and that their whole Discourse was on the Subject of Carolina. Had there been any Truth in his Depositions, relating to the fifty stout Men whom the Captain was to have commanded, and of whom he, himself, was to have been one, he would certainly have been able to have discover'd some of his Comrades; whereas, when he was interrogated on that Head, his Answer, tho' calculated to conceal his Knavery, betray'd it, viz. He never DIRECTLY knew or convers'd with any of them. And what is yet more conclusive against him, when call'd upon to give the World an Account, where he bought the Stone-Horse, which, as he said, he had provided for the Design, or in what Stable he had kept him, he was utterly unprovided with an Answer.

Turberville's Evidence, as we have seen, consisted in a Declaration of Words only, viz. That as long as the King's Guards were about him, little Good was to be had from him, &c. And these Words, he depos'd, were spoke in the Beginning of February, and not reveal'd till the fourth of July, which was two Days AFTER the Earl's Commitment.

And if Smith swears, that he had reveal'd certain treasonable Expressions, which Lord Sbaffery had let fall to him in Discourse, to a select Club of Gentlemen, immediately after they had been utter'd, that whole Club, unanimously and solemnly, profess'd, he had never made any such Recital to them: And Major Manley, who was present at the same Discourse with the Earl, undertook to depose upon Oath, that no such treasonable Expressions, nor any one Syllable of a treasonable Tendency, were then utter'd by his Lordship. And it is farther remarkable that this Man's Information, by his own Confession, was also not given in till a LITTLE AFTER the Earl was committed.

As to Haynes, who had enter'd into so deep a Confidence with the Earl, he was, even according to his own Account upon Oath, so slightly known to him, that in his last close Conference with his Lordship, in Ironmonger-lane, he was forced to preface his Approaches to him with these Words, My Name is Haynes, my Lord; which Circumstance alone is sufficient to blast his whole Evidence: But the Earl himself insisted, that he had never seen Haynes; that he never would admit him to his Presence, (This p. 124.) and undertook to prove this, as far as a Negative would admit of Proof: All the Servants of the House in Ironmonger-lane, moreover, and all the noble Persons his Lordship was there in company with, were ready to testify, That he never came down-stairs out of the great Room where the Company was assembled, till he was going away; and that he took Coach immediately, without withdrawing into any Room below-stairs.

And as to Dennis (for of the two Macnamarras and Peey, tho' call'd by Mr. North material Witnesses, enough has been said already) Major Manley, whom he, Dennis, cites as being present at one of the Interviews he had with the Earl, and who acknowledg'd that to indeed he was, offer'd to swear, That his Lordship spoke not one Word to Dennis, except the asking him, with some seeming Passion and Heat, What his Business was?

It is yet further observ'd, that the Features of Forgery are to be traced over the whole Face of the Evidence in general: That, in the Expressions they ascribe to the Earl, they make him not only forget the Loyalty of a Subject, but the Civility and Breeding of a Gentleman: Or, in other Words, that, instead of putting into his Mouth such Words as became a Man of Sense and Quality, they charge him with using the coarse and rude Dialect that was familiar to Wretches like themselves.

That the Designs and Discourses they accus'd him of were, both in Matter and Manner, so improbable, so ridiculous and extravagant, that they confuted themselves. For Instance, 1. The Circumstance sworn by Haynes, That the Earl should say, That the Duke of Buckingham had, in the Right of his Mother, as good a Title to the Crown as any of the Stuarts: Whereas no body had, till then, ever heard of any such Right, Claim, or Pretence; nor was there so sublime a Friendship between the Duke and the Earl, as to oblige the latter to plunge himself into all the Hazards of so desperate an Affair, purely for the Duke's sake; when the inevitable Consequences must be the Loss of his best Friends, and his own irreparable Ruin. 2. That other Extravagance sworn by the same Haynes, namely, That in case the King would not vouchsafe a Pardon to the said Profligate, he, the Earl, would raise his Majesty's own Kingdom against him, and by involving him in the popish Plot pave the Way for his Ruin. 3. The notable Item sworn by Dennis, That the Earl propos'd to extirpate the King, and with him the popish Successor, and to establish a Commonwealth by the Assistance of Irish Papists; such as were the three or four hundred able Men of Dennis's Clan, which he, Dennis, undertook to raise. 4. The Conceit of the Oxford-Conspiracy, which had nothing to countenance it, but the extraordinary Attendance on the Members: Which extraordinary Attendance was rather a Matter of Ostentation and Parade than any thing else; and, tho' calculated no doubt to alarm the Public; and to draw the Government into Suspicion, far from being a Match for the whole Body of his Majesty's Guards, reinforced as they were with two Troops of the Militia, great Numbers of Volunteers from London, and in a manner all the Gentry of the County; inasmuch that, if a Design had really been form'd against his Majesty, that Time, that Place, and these Circumstances, render'd the Execution of it utterly impracticable. 5. The Manner in which the Witnesses recited the several Conferences which they had with the Earl: For, according to their Depositions, all was Caution and Circumspection, Decency and Loyalty, on their Side; and all was Phrensy, Rudeness, and Treason, on the Earl's: And it is a Sin against common Sense to suppose, that a Man of his acknowledged Abilities should be so far off his Guard, as to put his Fortune, Life, and Honour, in the Hands of such Banditti as these. Even Mr. North, who is professedly his Enemy, allows him to have been a consummate Politician; and declares he committed as few Errors as ever any Man did: And nothing could have been more inconsistent with this Character, than the placing so extravagant a Confidence in Ruffians that he knew were capable of all Enormities. It is besides notorious, that he was one of the most wary of all Men; never (x) admitting any Stranger, or suspicious Person, to an Audience, but when he was secur'd from their Designs of whatever kind, by the Presence of his Friends or Servants. And, lastly, it is urg'd, as to the great Point of his labouring to subvert the Constitution, and to superinduce a Commonwealth on the Ruins of the Monarchy: That he was too well acquainted with the Genius and Complexion of his Fellow-subjects, to amuse himself a Moment with any such Impracticability: That his own Interest in the Peerage, which was so essential a Part of the present System, forbid all such Thoughts: That those who look'd upwards, and yet despair'd to rise, might be for subverting all Orders and Distinctions, that none might seem higher than themselves; but no Man, who was already on an Eminence, could be suppos'd mad and desperate enough to cut the Ground from under his own Feet, that he might be lost among the Herd: That it was never known, that the People were twice in an Age deceived into the same Misfortune: That the Remembrance of the late calamitous Experiment rather struck them with Horror, than a Desire to renew it: That, from the very Depositions themselves, the Earl's Innocence was apparent; for if, as Booth depos'd, his Lordship only meant to restrain the King, till he had pass'd the Exclusion-Bill, &c. Or if, as Hoyne depos'd, he had a Purpose to make a Transfer of the Crown to the Duke of Buckingham, what Dennis depos'd in relation to a Commonwealth, was a palpable Forgery: And so, contra, if the Commonwealth Story was true, the other Stories were false: There is also an irreconcilable an Enmity between the Depositions of Booth and Hoyne, as between those of Booth and that of Dennis: And thus, in whatever Light they are consider'd, like the fabulous Brood of Cadmus, they destroy one another.

From this Incongruity of Matter, in the several Testimonies of these Fellows, it seems reasonable to conclude, however, that they were not furnish'd with their Lessons from Court, tho' the (y) contrary is asserted; for, if that had been the Case, they would have been taught to lye more plausibly, and to use better Language.—And yet, why should the Court adopt what they would have been asham'd to inspire? The Absurdity was almost as great the one way as the other; and they were sure to undergo the same Reproach.—But when Men shut their own Eyes, they persuade themselves that the rest of the World are blind; and that what they will not see, others cannot: Which is of all Mistakes the greatest, and most fatal.

Touching the Charge of Subornation, a Proof of Subornation at Variety of Particulars occurs; some few of which are as follow: John Macanarria acknowledged to five several Persons, that Worship had offer'd him several hundred Pounds, if he would recant his Evidence against the Papists, fall in with Fitzgerald, and swear Treason against the Earl of Shaftsbury, and other Protestant Lords and Gentlemen. Brownrigg depos'd, That he saw two of the Witnesses receive Money from a Servant of Marrist's, both for themselves and two others of the Evidence. Jenks depos'd, That Key had confest'd to him, that great Offers had been made to him, provided he would swear against Protestants. And one Mr. Ashlock affirm'd, that he (z) one Day told him, he had been with Lord Hyde; who had order'd him to send to him from time to time for Supplies of Money.

(x) That one Mr. Gandy depos'd upon Oath, That John Macanarria told him, how he and Key having been with the Earl of Shaftsbury, his Lordship had refus'd to discourse with them alone; saying, he never discours'd with any, but in the Presence of his Servants: And that Key being thereupon very greatly disgusted, contriv'd, by way of Revenge, to swear High Treason against him. No Protestant Plot, Part iii. p. 114.

(y) One Shenon swore, That being, on the 11th of August, in Company with Smith and John Macanarria, the said Macanarria told Smith, That the Reason why he could not flatter him upon him that Morning was, because he had been with Sir Leslie Jenks, who had given him a long Lesson; which he had nevertheless learn'd, tho' it was very long. No Protestant Plot, Part iii. p. 96.

(z) This Fellow was one of those who sign'd the Petition to the Common-council, and in Rose's Case had the Impudence to urge, That his former Allegations against the Papists were wholly false; and that he had made Oath of them, only because Rose would not, otherwise, furnish him with Money. Divers Persons also affirm'd, that whereas he had sworn, on the same Occasion, that the Earl of Shaftsbury did usually distate to him the Informations he drew up and depos'd concerning the Popish Plot, they had seen the said Informations in his Hand, before he was known to his Lordship.

A. D. 1681. Money. Aflock also affirm'd, that he had seen a Letter directed to the said Lords, which Jery said was for Money. Dennis, while soliciting the Benevolence of the City, had, himself, depos'd before Sir Patience Ward, That both Warcup and Fitzgerald had tempted him with great Offers of Gold and Silver if he would depart from his Evidence against the Papists and swear Treason against the Lords Shaftsbury, Howard, and other Protestants. And a Namesake of his, one George Dennis, depos'd, "That to his Knowledge the Witnesses who swore against the Earl of Shaftsbury had a hundred, or a hundred and fifty Pounds a Man for so doing: And that he might have had as much, if he would have sworn against the said Earl.

It was, indeed, manifest to the whole World, that their Circumstances were greatly mended: For no sooner had they taken this new Ply, which was as soon as it appear'd, that the over-bearing Power of Parliaments was at an end, than they appear'd in new Cloaths, had their Pockets full, and liv'd in all the Luxury imaginable; which very sufficiently indicated whose Implements they were, and from what Quarter they receiv'd their Wages.

It is farther allegd, that the Court had a much larger Band of these Mercenaries in petto, than they thought fit to produce; and that the Names of several of them were indors'd on the Bill; but on second Thoughts expung'd: Some of these are particulariz'd, as Fitzgerald, the Evidence-Broker so often mention'd, one Sir James Hays a noted Sharper of those Times, and Fitzbarri's Maid, whom we find represented as a more infamous (a) Prostitute than any in the Stews.

Reflections on the Association Paper.

The Paper call'd the Association, remains still to be spoke of; and in Abatement of all Conclusions that could be drawn from it, it is urg'd, That tho' Mr. Gwyn swore there were none present, he thought, when he put up the Earl's Papers, but himself and his Lordship's own Servants, it could be prov'd, that he brought five or six Persons more into the Closet, who were all as busy as he in putting up the said Papers: That an Inventory of the said Papers being refus'd to his Lordship, his Lordship refus'd to put his Seal on the Trunk in which they were contain'd; so that those who had them in their Possession, had it in their Power to insert among them what other Papers they pleas'd: That Blatvauit swore more than he could possibly know, when he depos'd that Gwyn had seiz'd that Paper in the Earl's Closet: That the Attorney-General had, in Discourse, been pleas'd to acknowledge, That there were two or three Bills of Association found in the said Closet, different from that exhibited in the House of Commons; which fem'd to argue that many things of that nature had been submitted to his Lordship's Consideration; and if he had rejected those, he might also have rejected this: So that upon the whole, the Lord Chief Justice North had no legal Warrant for saying, That there was a great Matter to be presum'd upon it, and was almost without Excuse for urging it in Conclusion to the Jury, when the Attorney-General had not thought it of Weight enough to deserve a Place in the Indictment.

It must, however, be acknowledg'd, that even these very Endeavours to weaken the Proofs, that this Paper was actually found in the Earl's Possession, and that the Earl had any Concern in it, imply a Confession, that the said Paper was in its Nature and Tendency criminal, and, however abandon'd and prostitute the Witnesses notoriously were, by whatever corrupt Motives they were induc'd to swear what they did, and however flagrant the Absurdities and Contradictions appear'd, which they perjurd themselves to authorize, it will be no Breach of Charity to conclude from the Disposition of the Man, and the Temper of the Times, that some such Project as this of an Association was really on foot; that the Leaders of the Party were all in the Secret of it, tho' not the Wretches who were brought to testify; and that the Effect of it was only by these sudden, and otherwise unjustifiable, Prosecutions prevented.

But Reasons of State, as before hinted, cannot come properly before a Court of Justice, nor ought to have any Influence on a Jury; when, therefore the Gentlemen who were impannell'd in Lord Shaftsbury's Case, dismiss'd the Bill with an Ignoramus, they took the gentlest way of dismissing it; and we find it well observ'd, that, instead of being justly obnoxious to the severe Persecution which was soon after let loose against some of them, and the heavy Censure which fell on all of them, they were rather to blame for not immediately indicting the perjurd Miscreants, who had appear'd before them, of a Conspiracy against the Life and Honour of the noble Person they had accus'd, and thro' him, against the Lives and Honours of his whole Party: For by Smith's Evidence, all his Partizans in the City were affected; and by Booth's and John Macnamara's, all the Malcontents of both Houses.

How the People, who attended the Trial, call'd by Mr. North, A SET RABBLE, were affected by it, we have already, in Part, seen, by the Joy they testify'd when the Jury brought in their Verdict: But this was not all, they made such Remarks in the Courfe

(a) It is upon this Occasion also, that we are let into the Particulars of the Contradictions which appear'd between her Evidence and that of her Mistress, when the Bill was press'd against Lord Howard, relating to the famous Libel before insert'd at large; which were as follow, viz. "The Maid being ask'd, how her Maid came to hear Lord Howard and speak the treacherable Words which were sworn, reply'd,

That the Wench had arriv'd at the Knowledge of them by standing and leaning behind the Door. But the same Question being propos'd to the Maid, she affirm'd she was as much trust'd by my Lord as Mrs. Finborough's berriest; and that he had said to and to her, in performance of the testimony which she had with him, and the Confidence he placed in her." Ne Prestitus Plea, Part iii. p. 211, 112.

of the Proceeding as gave frequent Offence to the Court: Bishop Kennet affirms, that the Judges afterwards complain'd that they had been affronted as they sat on the Bench; and most certain it is, that the Winesles dearly earn'd in that one Day's Service, the whole of their Pay; for they never pass'd in or out of the Court, but they were loudly and openly menac'd and revil'd, and, upon the Issue, had like to have been torn to Pieces.

The two Parties greatly exasperated against each other.

Indeed, both Parties were now thoroughly heated against each other; and no wonder; for each had been taught, that the other study'd their Destruction: Those detestable Names of Distinction, or rather of Reproach, (b) Whig and Tory, had now also been alternately given and glory'd in, which afforded a ready Vehicle for all the Bitterness that mutual Provocations could raise, or Malice accumulate. Henceforward, their Proceedings were such as shew'd, that Charity was alike extinguish'd on both Sides. If the persecuted Party complain'd against Informers, out of Taciturnitas, as now they did, in the very (c) Words formerly made use of by the Papists when persecuted by them, the Persecutors retorted their own Practices and Examples upon them. Thus, instead of being entitled to Justice, they were held unworthy of Compassion; and as the Quarrel grew every Day more and more desperate, Men were punish'd in their private Capacities for their public Faults; whoever sided with one Faction, had the other in a Body to grapple with: And even the Laws themselves were wrested out of the Hands of Justice, and instead of preserving the Peace of Society, were made the Engine to destroy it.

[No Protestant Plot, Part II. P. 14.]

(b) Of which Mr. North gives the following concise, novel, and lively History.

"The Terms of that Distinction were not cover'd in Practice, but the Party that is Tory had much the Start, and was indiffer'd about a Year before the other was thought on: But now Whigs has the Pre-eminence, for better Sound's sake. In the Whigs in Parliament 1679, the Bill of Exclusion of the Duke of Jork took place in the House of Commons; but was without Division, Heat, and Animosity, as a Matter of that high Name must needs cause. But, without doubt, the Debates among the People were more fierce, and agitated with Extremity of opposite Talk; and the lower Sort were generally on the Side of the Bill, who, but for some naughty Guards, which the King had always in good Order, had come down and assisted with their Noise (at least) about the Houses of Parliament. Tending the Debates, the factious Drives play'd the Coffee-houses, and all Places of promotion Resort, to incite a Mixture of them (instead of which) upon which the whole Machine run'd; it which was that hotting, or whetting, but the Exclusion, would do. The King had offer'd a necessary after him, little less than the Power of the Government still; but, in Substance, that would not do, and why? It was not to take place in his Time. It is easy to imagine how rampant these Prosecutors of Power, the Exclusioners, were under such Circumstances of Advantage, as it that time prevail'd: Every where inflicting and demanding the Loyalty, as was done, in all the Terms of common Conversation; and the latter had the Wind in their Face, the Votes of the House, and the Rabble into the bargain. The Tories, then not much opposed, naturally led to a common Use of fighting and opprobrious Words; such as Tories. That serv'd for many Distinctions, but did not scandalize or rile enough. Then they came to Tannoy, which imply'd whetting Play at Rome. Observe, all Whigs, the loyal Church Party, were passing, the Charge by wholly on the other Side. First, observing that the Duke's favo'r'd High Men, all his Friends, or those accounted such by appearing against the Exclusion, were brought become High, and to whet High, these Whetting, and, in the Copy of the famous Language, the Word Tory was entertain'd, which imply'd the most execrable Swages among the whet High; and, being a vocal, eleven-sounding Word, readily pro-

These are Scenes that disgrace our Annals; A. D. 1681. but 'tis fit they should be display'd at full, that the Pride of all Parties alike may be humbled; and that while we blush for our Fathers, we may set a fairer Example for the Imitation of our Posterity.

Still the Wrath of the Court hung over the Lord Shaftesbury and his Adherents: Tho' acquitted of the Indictment, he was refus'd his Discharge; which Mr. North will not allow to be any Hardship: "For, says he, [Examen. P. 115, 116.] the Ignoramus-Return clears only that Piece of Parchment, call'd the Indictment, prefer'd to the Grand Jury; but neither the Person nor the Offence; for those remain still indictable, as if nothing had been done. It is the Trial upon Plea and Issue join'd, that makes an Acquittal to clear a Man. But Grand Juries may enquire toties quoties of the same Offence; and if Proof be kept back, or Ignoramus return'd by Corruption, the Bill may be verified at any other time. Then the Case stands as at first: A Person charg'd with full Evidence of Treason, under Custody, can claim to be discharg'd no otherwise than by due Course of Law." This may possibly be true in Point of Law; the Lawyers will admit of no Interpretations of the Statutes but their own: But if it be, the Subject is in a great measure depriv'd of the Benefit of Juries; and may be kept under the Torture of a heavy and expensive Prosecution till the Experiment, by Repetition, has at last come up to the Expectation of the Court. Mr. North, indeed, adds, That as to the Remedy for Liberty, the Subject might have Recour'd to the Habeas-Corpus-Act; and, as I take it, says he, The Earl had, nounced, it kept its Hold, and took possession of the soul Mouth of the Faction; and every where, as their Men pass'd, we could observe them breathe little else but Tory, together with Oaths and Damnation. Tho' the Anti-exclusioners were Argu'd with Execution and Contempt, as a Parcel of damn'd Tories, for divers Months together; and force any devil to much as hiss, but most lay by under the Prejudice of being loyal; Fault enough at that time.

But as nothing violent is falling, in this raging, nick-naming, signifying sort of Men began to fall exceedingly in their Credits with the Community of the Nation, and apparently to lose Ground; the Cause and Steps of which will appear elsewhere: And the Loyallists began to cheer up, and to take Heartenances. And, in the Working of this Crisis, according to the common Laws of Scolding, they consider'd which way to make Payment for so much of Tory as they had been treated with, and to clear Scores. They began; and, one while, call'd the Adversaries High Men, because such were not satisfy'd to be Protestants, as the Churchmen were, but must be High Protestants, implying the others to be false ones, just not Papists. Then they went on, and call'd the Adversaries Burning Protestants, alluding to false Graces, counterfeited at that Place. This had a considerable Time; but the Word was not stout enough for lastly Repaire; and, after divers Changes, the Lot fell upon Whig, which was very significant, as well as truly, being vnderstand in Scotland (from whence it was borrow'd) for corrupt and low Whig. Immediately the Term took, and, upon the last Touch of the Experiment, it ran like Wild-fire, and became general. And for the Account of Tory was balance'd, and soon began to run up a fair Score on the other Side: For the Whigs were to fearfully perpe't'd, that they grew weary of Nicknames, and began to put on give Faces, and cry, why those whetting Distinctions? And, ever since, they have lately chang'd, the Tories to have been the Authors and Begunners of that Distinction, which was truly, by the Name of Tory, begun by themselves, and continued till Flesh and Blood could bear no longer; and then the Tories, re-animat, as I have shew'd, directly se defendenda. ball, in the End, his Liberty without it. But a Man can scarce be said to be at Liberty, who is held upon Bail; and surely, while obnoxious to a capital Prosecution, can be in no Condition to enjoy it: And, as to the Earl's being enlarged without claiming the Benefit of that Statute, the very Records themselves bear Witness to the contrary: For on the 28th of November, his Lordship, as also the Lord Howard of Effrick, Wilmore, Whitacre, &c. were all bail'd at the King's Bench; the two Lords in a Recognizance of 3000 l. apiece, and each of their four Sureties in half that Sum.

The Duke of
went and more in Exigent.

Sir John Reresby tells us, That, immediately after the Earl had thus obtain'd his Liberty, the King declar'd his Displeasure against the Duke of Monmouth on several (d) Accounts; one of which he specifies to have been, his having made an Offer to be Bail for Shaftsbury: And the next Day his Majesty appointed the Duke of Richmond, his natural Son by the Duchess of Portsmouth to be Master of the Horse, and gave one of the Regiments of Foot-guards to the Duke of Craven, another of his natural Sons by the Duchess of Cleveland; both which Commissions had been held by his Grace of Monmouth, and, probably, had been kept vacant till this time, as Lures to separate him from Lord Shaftsbury, and re-unite him with the Court.

On the Face of things it was reasonable to suppose, that this was an acceptable Service to the Duke of York; and that, in consequence, whoever was the Adviser of it, must have been dear to his Royal Highness. But the Great are not to be serv'd by Halves; and nineteen Performances will not atone for one Omission.

"Having been to visit the Duchess of Portsmouth (says Sir John Reresby) my Lord Halifax took me home with him from Whitehall. On the Way, I acquainted him that the general Report was, That his Lordship opposed the Duke of York's Interest with the King, and his Return from Scotland, which his Highness most urgently pressed. His Reply was, That it was well if the Duke's Over-hastiness did not turn to his Disadvantage; that his Highness had a sort of hungry-Servants about him, who were eternally pressing for his Return, nor would ever let him be at rest, till with a View to their own Interest, they put their Master upon what might prove much to his Prejudice. And true it is, that whilst his Highness was near the King's Person, every body believ'd his Majesty to be principally sway'd and actuated by his Advice; and consequently, that Popish Councils were then uppermost; whereas, he did a great deal of Good in Scotland, by keeping a watchful Eye over that mutinous Kingdom. But the Papists, and others, his Highness's Creatures, pretended he was kept in Scotland, that his Enemies might the more easily work him out of his Brother's good Opinion; and that the Ministers might have the King all to themselves, and guide him according to their own Will and Pleasure. Upon this Lord Halifax observ'd, there was great Partiality in the Judgment of Men; for that in common Justice they ought to take as much Notice of things that were manag'd for the Duke's Advantage, as of what seem'd to be otherwise: That, for Instance, no body had commended the Ministers for getting the Duke of Richmond to be Master of the Horse in prejudice to the Duke of Monmouth; tho' it must prove a great Obstacle to his Return to the King's Person; and tho' most evident it was, that no greater Service could be done to his Highness, than to keep the Duke of Monmouth from Court."

(d) Probably the following Paper was another:

"Whereas Nat. Thompson hath lately, in his Public Intelligencer of the 27th of October 1681, publish'd these Words following, as delivered by the Earl of Huntington to his Majesty, the said Earl being at that time admitted to the Honours of kissing his Majesty's Hand: That is to say, 'That the said Earl had by Experience found, that they who presented the Bill of Exclusion were for the Subversion of Monarchy itself: We, who will not deny ourselves interested in the Promotion of that Bill in Parliament, then judging it the best Means of uniting his Majesty and the Universality of his Subjects, and of calling back such Hearts (if any such were) as had in the last Revolt, turn'd from him, on his Royal Power, his Grace continued for that very Reason involved in his ignominious Sentence, held it expedient to refer to the Earl of Huntington, to know whether he own'd what Thompson had so intemperately and injudiciously in his Lordship's Name publish'd; which we accordingly did, and having demand'd the said Earl the Truth of this Matter, he positively deny'd the Utterance of any the said Words, either to his Majesty or any body else; with these Alterations, that he knew of no Person whatever so weakly disposed, as the Words publish'd by Thompson, in his Lordship's Name, imported."

However, since ill Designs frequently meet with Success, and the Trade of Inventing Mean Reputations is as really professed, as some Parting of great Ignorance and depraved Manners, would have the Behaviour of the Government believ'd to be; and likewise find comfort in Truth, published, and probably to have riden yet through the whole Kingdom, purfued with a reflective Character, which will well enough serve here to gratify the Revenge of some, and the Malice, Pride, Ignorance, and ill-humour of others: We think it highly to declare, That, whether the Lord Huntington hath, or any other Person shall hereafter affirm, that we who were for passing the Bill of Exclusion of the Duke of York (and with ourselves we may with Justice enough comprehend the Universality of that worthy Person of both Houses who concurred with us in Opinion) were for the Subversion of the Monarchy, or had any the least Thought or Intention tending to it, he is a Stranger, so contrary to common Sense, the Laws of this Kingdom, and we hope to the Will of the wise Disposer of all things, that such Assertion, by whomsoever made, should as well with Impudence and Falshood, as with Levity and Misconclusion; and we would remind such Traubers of the good Statutes of this Realm, which forbid any Man to be so hardy as to publish Falsely, (some Statute calls them false Lives) whereby Disquiet or Occasion of Discord or trouble may arise between the King and his People, or the great Men of the Realm; the Execution of which Laws we submit to his Majesty's Will and Pleasure, relying on his Royal Word in his late Declaration: For certainly nothing can more justly provoke the indignation of a Prince than High Treason; nor misapprehend the Mind of a loyal Subject, than to have his Innocence so verimously blaas'd. And we further declare, that we always were, and are still, ready and more heartily disposed to draw our Swords, and expose our Lives, for the Advancement of the King's Honour, Support of his Crown and Government, and safety of his Person, than such impudent Detractors (how greatsoever) either are, or perhaps could how to be: To whom we submit their dark Countenances, whose special Skill lies in piffing away the Credit of well-deserving Subjects, and privately insinuating such Reproaches, as either they themselves, or else should to fix a Name to.

This we think fit to publish under our Hands, to diffuse the World, which such dabling Politicians endeavour to thamelessly to impose on.

his Master's Business furnishes him with a plausible Pretence to do his own. The Duke's Abience, no doubt, help'd to countenance his Majesty's Proceedings: But then his Presence apparently lessen'd the Importance of his Majesty's Favourite. Now the Pride and Glory of being the First-Mover at Court, was, at present, Lord Hallifax's sole Reward; for, as yet, as far as appears, he had neither Place nor Pension: It was, therefore, his peculiar Interest to keep the Duke in Scotland, and to keep him as easy as possible, by serving him in all things, except that one, which was to his own immediate Prejudice. Nor even in disposing of these Preferments to the Prejudice of the Duke of Manmouth, did he make his Court to the Duke the sole Object of his Endeavours; for he both humour'd the King's own Inclination, and gratify'd the darling Duchess at the same time, who, as a Retainer to Fraunce, was no cordial Friend of his, and who, till very lately, had been at open Variance with him.

Effect of the Test in Scotland.

To keep Pace with the Year, we must now pursue the Course of the Duke's Administration in Scotland, at least as far as relates to the Test, which was enacted in the last Session; and which had already thrown the conscientious Part of that Nation into very great Difficulties. Bishop Burnet says, that the Confession of Faith which accompany'd it, was no sooner made public, than it created an universal Murmuring among the best of the Clergy; many of whom were against swearing to a System made up of such a Variety of Propositions. They were, also, proceeds the same Author, highly offended at the great Extent of the Prerogative in the Point of Supremacy; by which the King was authoris'd to turn out Bishops at Pleasure by a Letter. It was hard enough to bear this; but it seem'd intolerable to oblige Men by Oath to maintain it. The King might, by a Proclamation, put down even Episcopacy itself, as the Law then stood; and by this Oath they were bound not only to submit to, but maintain whatever Institution he should set up in its stead. All Meetings in A. D. 1681. Synods, or for Ordinations, were, hereafter, to be held only by Permission; so that all the visible ways of preserving Religion depended now wholly on the King's good Pleasure; and they saw that this would be a very feeble Tenure under a Popish King: And when a Church was yet in so imperfect a State, without Liturgy or Discipline, it seem'd to be a more peculiarly strange Imposition to make People swear never to endeavour any Alteration, before it could be said there was any regular Establishment.

This was the general State of Things with relation to this extravagant Law: But this is not all; it was made in so remarkable a manner a Snare to ruin the Earl of Argyle, who had so remarkably oppos'd it, that his Case deserves a more circumstantial Explanation, which will, of Necessity, oblige us to trace the Stream to the Fountain, in order to shew the Offence as well as the Punishment.

And first, we find it observ'd of him, That he was the only Man of Quality in Scotland, who, after the Discovery of the Plot, took out a Commission to disarm the Papists (whether out of public Zeal or private Animosity, is hard to decide) and that under the said Authority having summon'd the chief of the Mac Donalds to surrender his Arms, it drew upon him a little War: Mac Donald thereupon entering Argyleshire with an armed Force, and committing Hostilities on all Sides, on the Earl's Lands and Tenants: And when a Herald was sent to him from the Privy Council, requiring him to disband his Force, instead of obeying, he tore the Coat from off the Herald's Back, and sent him to Edinburgh with all the Marks of Contempt he could shew. And, as if in this whole Proceeding he had acted by Authority, not in Defiance of it, he was never call'd in Question either for his Insolence or his Treason.

This, however, happen'd before the Duke's Arrival in Scotland; and what more immediately drew down his Highness's Anger upon him, was his (e) Behaviour, with regard to the Bills relating to Religion, which had been

(e) Of which we have the following particular Account: "In the Beginning of the Parliament, the Earl was appointed one of the Lords of the Articles, to prepare Matters for the Parliament, and named by his Highness to be one of a Committee of the Articles for Religion, which, by the Custom of all East Parliaments, and his Majesty's Instructions to his Commissioners, at this time, was the first thing treated of: In this Committee there was an Act prepared, for securing the Protestant Religion; which Act did ratify the Act approving the Confession of Faith, and also the Act containing the Covenant Oath, appointed by several standing Acts of Parliament to be taken by all our Kings and Regents, before their Entry to the Exercise of the Government.

This Act was drawn somewhat less binding upon the Successor, as to his own Profession; but fell as strictly trying him to maintain the Protestant Religion in the public Profession thereof, and to put the Law concerning it in Execution, and also appointing a further Test, before the former, to exclude Papish Inimic Fines of public Trust: And became the Fines of such as should act, without taking the Test, appeared no better than discharged, if falling in the Hands of a popish Successor, and some accusing any Limitation worse than any Exclusion, and all being content to put no Limitation on the Crown, so it might consist with the Safety and Security of the Protestant Religion, it was ordain'd that all such Fines and Penalties should appertain the one half to the Informers, and the other half should be bestow'd on private Lives, according to certain Rules express'd in the Act.

But this Act being no ways pleasing to some, it was laid aside, and the Committee discharged any more to meet; and instead of this Act, there was brought into the Parliament, at the same time with the Act of Succession, a short Act, ratifying all former Acts made for the Security of the Protestant Religion, which is the first of the printed Acts of this Parliament.

At the passing of this Act, the Earl proposed, that these Words, and all Acts against Popery, might be added; which was opposed by the Advocates, and some of the Clergy, as unnecessary: But the Motion being seconded by Sir George Leibhart, and the then President of the Session, now turn'd out, it was yielded to, and added without a Vote. And this Act being full not thought sufficient, and several Members desiring other Additions, and other Acts, a Promiss was made by his Royal Highness, in open Parliament, that Time and Opportunity should be given to bring in any other Act, which should be thought necessary for further securing the Protestant Religion: But the several Persons, both before and after passing the Act for the Test (here before) did give in Memorials and Overtures, yet they were never suffer'd to be read, either in Articles or Parliament, but, in place of all, this Act for the Test was fill obtruded, and passing of that Nature suffer'd to be heard, after once that Act pass'd, tho' even so passing it the Promise was renew'd.

As for the Test, it was first brought into the Parliament without mentioning the Confession of Faith; and, after several Hours Debate, for adding the Confession of Faith, and agitated the last Session: For while that Session was yet depending, the Duke gave him to understand privately, "That he would do well to be upon his Guard; for that the Earl of Errol and others, were preparing a Bill to make his Estates answerable for the Debts, which, as they pretended, they were bound for, in Behalf of the late Marquis his Father; and that those who were most forward in his Majesty's Service, must be taken care of." The Earl reply'd, "That there was no Ground for any such Bill, and that he hop'd neither the Earl of Errol, nor any body else, would have any Advantage to claim over him in any thing relating to his Majesty's Service." His Highness, also, after this Conference, told others, That he had given the Earl good Advice.

Shortly after this, two Bills were actually prefer'd against the Earl; one by Lord (f) Errol, agreeable to what has been just mention'd; and the other by his Majesty's Advocate (who acknowledg'd he acted by Command, and that the Affair was beyond his Line) to deprive the Earl of his Heritable

Officers of Sheriff, &c. and especially that of Justice-General of Argyleshire, that he might no longer, say some, be enabled by the Authority arising from those Offices, to protect the Protestants, or over-awe the Papists. To these Bills the Earl reply'd with so much Art and Address, that it appear'd the Marquis of Huntley (a Papist, who was under the Duke's Patronage, and who was not only deep in Debt to the Argyl Estate, but enjoy'd a very large Revenue by Gift from the Crown out of the late Marquis's Forfeitures) would be more a Sufferer by the former of these Bills than he, and that the King would be equally a Sufferer in his Prerogative by the latter. The Consequence of which was, that the Proceeding was stop't for the present, and his Highness made the Earl an Excuse for having concern'd himself in it.

No sooner, however, was the Parliament adjourn'd, than a new Design was set on foot to apply to the King for a Commission to review all the Earl's Claims and Rights with the same Views, that is to say, to deprive him of his Offices, and to burden his Estate with more many other Additions and Alterations, it was put at the first printing, albeit it was exactly print by near half the Parliament, that it might be delay'd till next Morning, the Debate being so much chang'd and interlin'd, that many, even of the most engaged in the Debate, did not sufficiently understand it, and tho' they took Notes, knew not precisely how it stood. And this was indeed the Earl's Case in particular, and the Cause why, in voting, he did rather choose to approve or disapprove.

His Part in the Debate was, that, in the Entry of it, he said, that he thought, as few Oaths should be requir'd as could be, and that these as short and clear as possible: That it was his humble Opinion, that a very small Alteration in these Oaths, which had been used their twenty Years, might serve; for it was misappl'd, and he attested the whole Parliament upon it, that the Oath of Allegiance, and Declaration, had essentially chang'd all Passages from getting into the Oath of Treach' all that time: It was true, some Papists had swallow'd the Oath of Allegiance, and therefore a Word or two only of Addition, to guard against them, was all he judg'd necessary.

And thereafter, where in the Close of the Act, the King's Sons and Brothers were intended to be dispens'd with from taking the Oath, he oppos'd the Exception, and said, It was our Happiness, that King and People were of one Religion, and that they were so by Laws: That he hop'd the Parliament would do nothing to loose what was felt, nor open a Gap for the Royal Family to differ in Religion, their Example was of great Consequence, one of them was a thousand, and would draw the more Followers, if ones it appear'd to the People that it were honourable and a Privilege to be of another Religion: And therefore he wish'd, if any Exception were, it might be particular for his Royal Highness. But his Highness himself opposing this, the Earl concluded with his Fear, that if this Exception did pass, it would do more Hurt to the Protestant Religion than all the rest of that Act, and many other Acts, could do Good. Argyl's Case, p. 1, 2, 3.

(f) "The Earl of Errol's Claim was, That the Earl of Argyl might be declar'd liable to relieve him and others of a Debt, wherein they alleg'd they stood bound as Cautioners for the late Marquis of Argyl the Earl's Father. To which the Earl answer'd, That he had not got his Father's whole Estate, but only a Part of it, and that expressly burden'd with all the Debts he was liable to pay, whereof this pretended Debt was none; and that the Marquis of Huntley, who at that time was owing to the Marquis of Argyl 37,000 l. Sterl. had got 4000 l. Rent of yearly Rent, out of the Marquis of Argyl's Forfeiture, without the Burthen of any Debt; so that, both by Law and Equity, the Earl could not be liable; the Marquis of Huntley, and not he, having got that which should be his Burden, and which should indeed have paid the late Marquis's Part of the Marquis of Argyl's Debt, the same having been undertaken for Huntley by Argyl, either as Cautioner for Huntley, or to raise Money to pay his Debt: Besides, that the Earl of Errol had never made it appear, that he or his Predecessors were bound for the Marquis of Argyl's third Part of the Sums he claim'd. Yet some were much inclin'd to believe Errol on his bare Assertion.

His Majesty's Advocate's Claim was, to take from the Earl his Hereditary Office of Sheriff, &c. especially that of Justice-

General of Argyleshire, the Just, and other Places; which last it nevertheless only a Part of the general Jurisdiction of all Scotland, granted to his Predecessors some hundreds of Years ago, for honourable and onerous Causes, and constantly enjoy'd by them until expressly surrender'd into his late Majesty's Hands for a new Grant of the above-mention'd Jurisdiction of Argyl, &c. And this new Grant was also confirm'd by many Acts of Parliament, and particularly by his Majesty's Royal Father, of blessed Memory, in the Parliament holden by him Ann 1633; 22. Likewise by his Majesty that now is (whom God long preserve) his own Gift and Charter, after several Debates before him in Ann 1653, and 1672: Which new Gifts and Charters were again ratify'd by a special Instruction from his Majesty in the Parliament 1672. So that albeit several late Gifts of Regality, granted to the Marquis of Abol, Marquis of Sutherland, and others, may be question'd, because granted since the Acts of Parliament discharging all such Gifts to time coming; yet the Earl of Argyl's Rights are good, as being both of a far different Nature, and granted long before the said Acts of Parliament: And, in effect, the Earl's Rights are rather confirm'd by these prohibitive Acts, because both anterior to, and excepted from, them; as appears by the Act Salvo Jure, 1653, wherein the Earl's Rights are particularly and fully excepted, in the Body of the printed Act.

When these Things appear'd so plain as not to be answer'd, it was alleg'd, That upon the Forfeiture of the late Marquis of Argyl, his Estate was annex'd to the Crown, and so could not be given to the Earl by his Majesty, (whereto they soon discover'd a Design to forsake him, if any Precedence could be found.) But the Act of Forfeiture being read, and containing no such thing, but, on the contrary, a clear Power left to his Majesty to dispose of the Wishes and the Earl telling them plainly, that those that were most desirous to have his Father's Estate were very far from desiring his Estate to be annexed to the Crown, being it was in expectation of Gifts out of it they were so diligent, that Precedence of the Annexation was pass'd from; but yet the Design was no wife given over; for there was a Proposition made, and a Vote carry'd in the Articles, that a Committee should be appointed, with parliamentary Power, to meet in the Intervals of Parliament, to determine all Controversies could be mov'd against any of the Earl's Rights: Which was a very extraordinary Device, and plainly carry'd by extraordinary Influences.

Upon this, the Earl apply'd to the Parliament, where this Vote was to be brought in; and having observ'd that Members of his Right, and the Consequencers of such a new Judicature, he had good Hope to get the Vote reversed, when his Royal Highness, on second Thoughts, judg'd it fit to put a stop to it, and examin'd himself, saying, If it were his going against, and not lately in Affairs, had made him go along with it; for he found it did plainly impinge his Majesty's Prerogative, and might be of ill Consequence: And indeed it is plain enough. It would have expos'd the Marquis of Huntley's Gift, which proceeded on the same Forfeiture, as well as the Earl of Argyl's, to the same and far greater Hazard, as some came to be foolish, who they heard all. You see here at what rate the Earl was perswad, and on what Grounds, before his taking of the 3rd came in hand. Ibid. p. 3, 4.

more than it was worth. The Earl, upon this, waited upon his Highness, and undertook to make it appear, that his Estate was not subject to any such Review; intreated that if such a Process was resolv'd on, it might be refer'd to the Ordinary Judicatories; affirm'd, that, as to his Offices, he had an undoubted Right to them, but withal signify'd, that he was willing to resign them to his Majesty, either freely or for a valuable Consideration, tho' he could not give way to their being torn from him by any body else. The Result of all was, that he had Leave to go into the Country for the Vouchers he had refer'd to, with a Promise that no Commission should be issued till his Return.

This Favour, it seems, did not dispose him to rely wholly on the Justice and Goodness of his Highness; on the contrary, he apply'd by the Earl of Murray, Secretary of State for Scotland, for Leave to wait on the King.—But tho' it was granted at London, it was over-ruled at Edinburgh; for first, the Earl was told he could not have Access to his Majesty till he had taken the Test; then that he had given Offence by applying for that Leave: And at length it escap'd, That even if he did take the Test, it would not clear his way.

Thus he was reduc'd to the Necessity of repairing again to his Highness, and upon the way learn'd, That the late President of the Session and himself were turn'd out. No sooner, also, was he arriv'd at Edinburgh, than several Meetings of Council were appointed, only to lay him under a Necessity of explaining himself as to the Test: And he, on the other Hand, evaded it, by going a few Miles out of Town, as often as those Appointments were made. At last, a Meeting was order'd expressly for that End; and one of the Clerks was order'd to give the Earl particular warning to give his Attendance: But the Earl had such timely Notice of the Message, that he made a Shift to reach his Highness before it was deliver'd: And the Conference which pass'd upon this Occasion, was so remarkable; that it deserves to be repeated at large in the Scottish Dialect as we find it.

“The Earl told his Highness, He was now return'd to make good his Word, and to shew those Writs and Rights he had promised: But, Sir, said the Earl, I have heard by the way of Alterations, and that I am turn'd out of the Session. His Highness said it was so. The Earl ask'd, What next? His Highness said, he knew no more. The Earl said, he had never sought that, nor any Place; and he knew that Place was at his Majesty's Dispose, and it might soon be better fill'd: But, said the Earl, if it be to express a Frown, it is the first I have had from his Majesty this thirty Years; I know I have Enemies, but they shall never make me alter my Duty, and Resolution to serve his Majesty; I have serv'd his Majesty in Arms, and in his Judicatures, when I knew I had Enemies on my right Hand, and on my Left; and I will do so still: But if any have Power to render his Majesty or your Highness jealous of me, it will make my Service the more useless to both, and the less comfortable to myself. His Highness said, he knew no more than what he had said. The Earl then said, it was late, and he would wait on his Highness some other time, about these Matters:

But the thing that at present presses, says the Earl, is, That I hear one of the Clerks of Council is appointed to tell me to be at the Council To-morrow, I conceive, to take the Test: Pray, what is the Matter? May not I, with your Highness's Favour, have the Time allowed by the Act of Parliament? His Highness said, No. The Earl urged it again, but in vain; and all the Delay he could obtain was, till Thursday the third of November, the next Council-day in course. The Earl said, he was the less fond of the Test, that he found, that some that refus'd it were still in favour, and others that had taken it turn'd out, as the Register. At which his Highness only laugh'd. But, Sir, said the Earl, how comes your Highness to press the Test so hastily? Sure there are some things in it your Highness doth not over much-like. Then said his Highness, angrily, and in a Passion, Most true, that Test was brought into the Parliament, without the Confession of Faith: But the late President caus'd put in the Confession, which makes it such as no honest Man can take it. The Earl said, he had the more Reason to advise. Whereby you may see, whether his Highness then thought the Confession was to be sworn to in the Test, or not.

We are now to observe, that several of the Privy Counsellors having taken the Test on the 22d of September, and it coming to the Earl of Queensbury's Turn to do the same, he was allow'd to declare, in relation to that Part of the Test, which provides, That there can be no Obligation, &c. to endeavour any Change or Alteration in the Government: “That he did not understand himself to be oblig'd against Alterations, in case it should please his Majesty to make any either in Church or State.” The Bishop and Synod of Aberdeen, as also the Synod and Clergy of Perth, had taken the Liberty to give their own particular Explanations of the Test; and Remarks had been made, and Scruples publicly started in the Names of the conform'd Ministers, which, not only excited the Attention, but receiv'd the Approbation of the Public; insomuch that it was thought necessary to set forth such an explanatory Vindication, as might render it both more palatable and more easy of Digestion. This Task fell to the Lot of Paterjous, Bishop of Edinburgh, who actually prepar'd such a Piece, and laid it before the Duke and Council, who (g) rejected it because of its Length, and yet left the Bishop at liberty to print it if he thought proper.

Thus

(g) His Highness saying, That the first Chapter of John, with a Verse, would chuse wry a Day.

A. D. 1681.

Thus it appear'd on all hands, That the Earl of Argyll was not the only Person who had Doubts and Scruples with regard to the Test; and that, in the general, it was not held criminal to endeavour to make the Dictates of the State and those of the Conscience agree: And it is a Circumstance which greatly ennobs his Character, that, notwithstanding the Bishop of Edinburgh, when he communicated to him his Vindication of the Test, and all the several Palliatives which accompany'd it, let him into the fatal Secret, by bidding him, Have a care of a noble Family; and telling him, That the opposing the Exception of the King's Sons and Brothers from taking the Test, had fir'd the Kin; he persisted in maintaining his Integrity; and chose to hazard all things rather than abandon it.

That, however, he might stand justify'd to himself, in Point of Prudence, as well as Conscience, he several times waited on the Duke, particularly on the 2d of November; and made it his most humble and earnest Request to be indulg'd with longer time of Deliberation; or, in case a present Answer was insisted on, that he might be permitted to decline the Test in private; or that the Time prescrib'd by the Act might be suffer'd to elapse; in which Case, his Disqualification would become a thing of Course, and would take place without Noise: But all was refus'd; and after other Applications, and other Refusals, as a last Expedient, it being suggested to him, by the Bishop of Edinburgh, that his taking the Test with an Explanation, the shorter the better, would be allow'd, he immediately embrac'd it, and drew one upon the Spot accordingly; which, being objected to as too long, he made no Difficulty to shorten it, and then put it in his Pocket, with a Resolution not to make use of it after all, till he was assur'd it would not be displeasing to the Duke; nor to stir out of his Chamber, till he had his Approbation. As this Affair was now the great Object of Attention, his Highness was instantly appriz'd of this new Turn, and a Coach was lent for the Earl; and in the Lobby to the Council-Chamber, he was told that the Bishop of Edinburgh had given the Duke to understand, That he was willing to take the Test with an Explanation: And that the Bishop said, by the Duke's Authority, must be understood, That it would be very kindly accepted. These, we are told, were the very Words made use of on this critical Subject: Upon which the Earl went in, and pronounc'd his Explanation close by his Highness, and directly towards him, so loud and audible, that some in the farthest Corner of the Room acknowledg'd they heard it: Whereupon the Oath was administred, the Earl took it; and his Highness, with a well-satisfy'd Countenance, and a gracious Smile, commanded him to take his Place: And while he sat by his Highness, which he had the Honour to do that Day, his Highness spake several times in private to him, and always pleasantly.

It is remarkable, that, on this very Day, when the Earl's particular Explanation was thus admitted, a more general one was brought on the Carpet before the Council, under the Notion of removing the Scruples of the Clergy, but, in Reality, to leave a Door open to the Papists: On which Account, probably, it was then (b) the Opinion of the Board, That

The Earl takes the Test, with an Explanation of his own.

A general Explanation, the same Day, agreed upon in Council.

(b) This however they afterwards departed from; and, November 21, it was publish'd in the London Gazette as follows:

Forasmuch as some have entertained Jealousies and Prejudices against the Oath and Test appointed to be taken by all Persons in public Trust, civil, ecclesiastic, or military, in this Kingdom, by the sixth Act of his Majesty's third Parliament, and whereby they were to swear to every Proposition or Clause of the Confession of Faith therein mentioned; or that Invasion were by it made upon the intrinsic Spiritual-power of the Church, or Power of the Keys; or as it the present Episcopal Government of this national Church, by Law establish'd, were thereby expos'd to the Hazard of Alteration or Subversion: all which are far from the Intention or Design of the Parliament's imposing this Oath, and from the genuine Sense and Meaning thereof: Therefore his Royal Highness his Majesty's High-Commissioner, and the Lords of the Privy-Council, do allow, authorize, and empower the Archbishops and Bishops to administer this Oath and Test to the Ministers, in their respective Dioceses, in this express Sense, as the Sense of the Parliament:

1. That the Confession of Faith, ratify'd in Parliament 1567, was from'd in the Infancy of our Reformation, and declares its due Praise; yet by the Test we do not swear to every Proposition or Clause therein contain'd, but only to the true Protestant Religion founded upon the Word of God, contained in that Confession, as it is oppos'd to Popery and Fanaticism.

2. That by the Test, or any Clause therein contained, no Invasion or Infranchisement is made or intended upon the intrinsic Spiritual-power of the Church, or Power of the Keys, as it was extrins'd by the Apostles, and the most Pure and Primitive in the three first Centuries after Christ, and which is still retain'd entirely to the Church episcopal.

3. That the Oath and Test is without any Prejudice to the Government of this national Church, which is declar'd by the first Act of the second Session of his Majesty's fifth Parliament, to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most suitable to Monarchy, and which, upon all Occasions, his Majesty hath declared he will inviolably and unalterably preserve. LVI.

serve: And do appoint the Archbishops and Bishops to require the Ministers, in their respective Dioceses, with their full Conveyance, to obey the Law in swearing and subscribing the aforesaid Test; with Certification that the Refusers shall be esteemed Persons disaffected to the Protestant Religion, and to his Majesty's Government; and that the Fundament appointed, by the aforesaid sixth Act of his Majesty's third Parliament, shall be impartially, and without delay, inflicted upon them.

Now this Explanatory was no sooner publish'd, than it gave rise to abundance of Reflections; and, among the rest, those that ensue, viz.

1. That the very Preamble acknowledg'd, that others, besides the Earl of Argyll, had entertain'd Jealousies and Prejudices against the said Oath and Test.

2. That their Lordships were not ignorant of those Jealousies; nor that many of the King's good Subjects were in the Number of those who were prejudic'd against the aforesaid Oath and Test, whose Weakness their Lordships were willing to gratify by condescending to an Explanation.

3. That from the first Head it follow'd,

1. That they could be no Protestants, who scrupled the taking the Oath and Test upon that Account; since it was they who at first form'd and compos'd the Confession, and never question'd or scrupled subscribing to the Whole; for from the beginning of the Reformation, it was that which they contended for, and triumph'd in as their Glory, and procur'd it to be enacted, that whoever oppos'd it should not be taken for Members of their Church.

2. That they could be no other but Papists, that scrupled it upon this Account; since they always, from the beginning of the Reformation, did, and down to that time did, abhor it, and wrote subscriptions to it, except such only as had from their Conscience an Indulgence to subscribe any thing, whereby they might be render'd the more capable of serving the papal Interest.

And, 4. That in this Explanation there was large Provision made for Papist tender Consciences; first, by affirming, that by the Test they did not swear to every Proposition or Clause contained in the Confession, and yet not mentioning

A. D. 1681. That it ought not to be printed. Here the Earl had a fair Opportunity to perfect his Peace, if he would have conniv'd at the extending the Indulgence to others, which he found needful for himself: But he had no Mind to relax, where it was manifestly the Intention of the Legislature to bind: He, therefore, refus'd to give the Sanction of his Vote to this notable Device; and to avoid being press'd, took Occasion to quit the Council-Chamber.

There were some, it seems, who appear'd surpris'd and confounded when the Earl had thus happily broke thro' the Snare that was set for him; and these, it must be suppos'd, took the Advantage of the Earl's withdrawing himself, to renew the Duke's Prejudices against him; for when he waited upon his Highness the next Morning, and expected a Continuance of the same gracious Reception which he had been honour'd with the Day before, he found the Duke's Countenance chang'd; and going about to entertain him in private, his Highness interrupted him, by declaring bluntly, That he was not pleas'd with his Declaration. The Earl reply'd, That he should not have presum'd to make it without his Highness's Permission. The Duke did not deny that he had given him such Permission, but added, That he expected some short one like that of the Earl of Queensbury's. "Your Highness heard what I said, reply'd the Earl." "I did, resum'd the Duke; but I was surpris'd." "But, said the Earl again, I have express'd myself to the same Purpose in private to your Highness, and you seem'd satisfy'd with it." Here the Earl proceeding to justify himself, the Duke cut him short with these Words: Will, it is pass with you, but it shall pass so with no other.

It was now reasonable for the Earl to think with Agag, That the Bitterness of Death was pass.

But his Enemies had not yet given over the Chace. The Earl was still to take the Test, as one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, and expected, as every body assur'd, to do it in the Exchequer: In which, however, all were mistaken; for he had scarce left the Duke two Hours, before he receiv'd Information, That there was a further Design upon him, and that he would be oblig'd to swear, yet once more before the Council. Accordingly, at 12 o'Clock an extraordinary Council was summon'd, at which it was resolv'd, That the Commissioners of the Treasury, as Officers of the Crown, were to take the Test before the Council. The Earl was, also, told, That the Exchequer could not that Day sit, without him: And, to make the Matter yet more solemn, it was determin'd to reassemble the Council in the Afternoon in the Presence of his Highness.

All things being thus adjust'd, and the Council met at the time appointed, the Earl was call'd upon to take the Oath; which he made no Scruple to do, with the Addition of these Words, AS BEFORE; which he had no sooner utter'd, than the Earl of Roxburgh, who was purposely planted behind the Duke's Chair, and who had never till then spoke in Council, stood up, and with Clamour ask'd, What was said? His Highness, himself, had the Condescension to turn, and inform him. Lord Roxburgh then desir'd, that what the Earl of Argyl had said before, might be repeated; and the Earl, forewarn'd of Mischiefe intended him, declin'd it; but his Highness, on the other hand, peremptorily challenging his Obedience, he thought it the safest way to signify, That he had a Note of the Words in his Pocket. This his Highness very earnestly call'd for, and he very readily produc'd it. The Paper was then read, and some Difference of Opinion arising between the President of the Session and the Register, as to the Expediency of the Earl's signing it, he was order'd to withdraw: After which, being call'd in, he was requir'd to sign it: To which he answer'd, "That his Meaning being good, he saw no Reason to avoid it; adding, If the Words gave the same Satisfaction now as they did when they were first pronounc'd,

The Earl call'd upon to take the Oath again:

And to give in the Note which contained his Explanation: Which he did.

to how many, or to how few, they swore, or to which Clauses they were bound to swear, and to which they were not; and all Men might well imagine that the Papists, being thus left at their Liberty, would be indulgent enough to themselves, and swear to very few that touch'd their beloved Principles; but would have the Confidence to lay hold on this Explanation as their greatest Happiness, in making the Test, as easy as they could desire. Secondly, In that they were to swear to the true Protestant Religion therein contain'd, as it is founded on the Word of God, and as it is oppos'd to Popery and Fanaticism. Now this Affirmative left Things at as much Uncertainty as the former Negative. For first, some would make all things that agreed not with their Humour to be Popery, and others would have nothing to be so that agreed with theirs. Some would make all things Fanaticism, and some would make nothing so. And thus it necessarily follow'd, that to swear to the Confession so far only as it is oppos'd to these, was to swear to every thing or nothing. Secondly, To swear to the Confession, so far as it was founded on the Word of God, was no more than any Man would swear. A Papist would swear to Protestantism thus far; for he had a two-fold Word of God, a written and an unwritten Word, he had a scriptural and traditional Word of God; and he was not such a Fool, as to exclude himself from Honour, Office, and Preferments, for a silly Word called Protestantism; let him be oblig'd to swear to it no farther than as it was agreeable to the Word of God, and he would be content to do that without the least Heintenance whatsoever: And so would a Protestant subscribe to the Council of Trent, and a Nonconformist to the Liturgy, so far as they were agreeable to the Word of God. So that, thirdly, this Comment destroy'd the Test, and the Explanation overthrow'd the Design of the Test: For the Design, or the pretended Design, of the Test was, to secure the Protestant Religion; which Protestant Religion was contain'd in this Confession of Faith; and this Confession of Faith was supposed to be founded on the Word of God. But, by the Explanation, we are not oblig'd to subscribe to every Clause and Proposition therein, but only to the true Protestant Religion contain'd in the Confession, so far as it is founded on the Word of God, and oppos'd to Popery and Fanaticism; whereas there is nothing in the World more plain, than that the Confession was the Touch-stone, the Test, and Standard of the Protestant Religion in that Kingdom, and had been own'd as such ever since the Reformation of the Church of England. Fourthly, All that profess the Christian Religion do pretend, that their Principles are founded on the Scriptures, only they differ in the Explication thereof; to prevent which Divi, the First Reformers in Scotland (and so in England), and other Churches too) labour'd to reduce the Principles of Religion contain'd in the Scriptures to a Certainty, by drawing up the Heads of their Faith into certain Articles, which they own as their Belief from God's Word: But now comes this last Interpretation, which, not falling upon the Truth of the external Confession of Faith, exclaims Men to swear to it, not as consonant to God's Word, but so far as it is so; and Faith, they are not oblig'd to swear, that every Clause and Proposition thereof contains sound Doctrine, but such as are founded on the Word of God: And yet which they are it presently conceals.

nounce'd, I am ready to subscribe them; but if the least Matter of Displeasure is found in them, I chuse to forbear it." Here he was a second time order'd to withdraw; and, when again call'd in, was told, That not having given the Satisfaction requir'd by Parliament in relation to the Test, he could no longer sit in Council; and some dark Hints were moreover dropt to prepare him for something worse to follow: The Earl's Reply was to this Effect, "That all the Parliament meant was to exclude Refusers of the Test from Places of Trust; That if he was judg'd a Refuser, he had nothing to do but to submit: That as to any farther Danger, he could not apprehend it; for he had serv'd his Majesty faithfully within Doors, and meant to do so without: With which Words he made his Obedience and retir'd.

It is here proper to insert the Paper itself, which was as follows:

"I have considered the Test, and am willing to give Obedience so far as I can: I am confident the Parliament never intended to impose contrary Oaths; and therefore I think no Man can explain it but for himself, and reconcile it as it is genuine, and agree in its own Sense. And I take it in so far as it is consistent with itself and the Protestant Religion: And I declare I mean not to bind up myself in my Station, and in a lawful way to reach and endeavour any Alteration, I think, to the Advantage of Church or State, and repugnant to the Protestant Religion and my Loyalty: And this I understand as a Part of my Oath."

The next Morning the Earl waited once more on his Highness, and took the Liberty to expostulate with him on the Transactions of the preceding Day, saying, "That he was strangely surpris'd to find the very same Words which he had made use of in private to his Highness before, without Offence, and in public with his seeming Approbation, should now be interpreted into a Crime." And the Duke making no Reply, the Earl renew'd his Attack, by putting his Highness on-recollecting what he himself, the Duke, had said, when he had discours'd with him on the same Topic before: To no Purpose, indeed; for his Highness had forgot all; at least he said so: And the Earl reply'd, So much the worse for me; but, added he, "Sir, here are the same Words which I formerly us'd without Offence. What says your Highness now? What ill is in them? Let me know, and I will vindicate myself." His Highness was now driven against the Wall, and finding himself oblig'd to say something, urg'd, "That they were unnecessary Words: That the Earl scrupled needlessly: That he was not ty'd up by the Test as he imagin'd.—And after a Pause, That, however, he had cheated himself, for he had taken the Test, notwithstanding his Explanation." Here the Earl thought to close by saying, "Then I hope your Highness is satisfied." But to shew him the Contrary, his Highness proceeded to complain, "That the Earl, during the little time he had sat in Council, after he had taken the Oath, he had not thought fit to concur in the Explanation, before spoken of." The Earl answer'd, "He had not heard the Debate, and therefore it was but reasonable, that he should be excus'd from voting." And his Highness reparted a little warmly, "That he knew the Case well enough, notwithstanding."—Here ensued a Pause;—and then his Highness put a Period to the Conference in these remarkable Words: "That the Earl and others had design'd to bring Trouble on a Handful of poor Catholics, who would live peaceably, however they were us'd: But it should light on others."

Soon after this, the Earl receiv'd a Command from the Duke, not to leave the Town, till he had first waited on him; which was follow'd by a Message from the Council to the same Effect. And, on the 8th of November an Order was serv'd upon him, by one of their Clerks, to enter himself a Prisoner in the Castle before twelve o'Clock the next Day; which he obey'd with great Resignation, going all alone in a Hackney-Coach: And when some of his Relations and other Persons of Quality would have accompany'd him, he refus'd it, saying, "That if he were pursu'd by any of his Fellow-Subjects, he would accept of their Civility: But, seeing the Suit was in his Majesty's Name, he would go in the humblest manner, and suffer nobody to be concern'd but himself." And that he might not be wanting in any Instance of Respect or Submission, after he had been some Days under Confinement, he wrote a Letter to his Highness purporting, "That he had obey'd the Orders he had receiv'd, in entering himself a Prisoner: That he had not written sooner, lest it might be thought he was impatient of his Punishment, which appear'd to be the Effects of a high Displeasure, but which he hop'd he had no ways deserv'd: That he was resolv'd to continue in all Obedience to his Majesty and his Royal Highness, and never to fail in any Profession he had made; and finally that he begg'd to know what Satisfaction was expected, and where and how he might live with his Highness's Favour."

This Letter seem'd, at first, to have had some Effect; and a particular Message was sent from some of the Court-Cabal to the Earl, signifying, That no more was design'd than to humble him, by taking the heritable and other Offices from him and his Family: And when his Highness was told, It was hard Measure, by such a Process, and on such Pretensions, to threaten Life and Fortune, he reply'd, with some Emotion, Life and Fortune? God forbid!

How their Professions, and the Manner of conducting the Prosecution, agreed, we are now to specify.

The next Day after the Earl's Commitment, a Letter of Notification was sent from the Council to his Majesty; in which they say, "That it being provided, that the Test should be taken in the plain and genuine Sense and Meaning of the Words, they were careful not to suffer (j) ANY to take it with Glosses of their own; That the Earl of Argyl, coming to Council to take the said Oath, spoke some Things which were not HEARD or ADVERTED TO: That being a second time call'd upon to take it simply, he refus'd, and gave in a Paper, shewing the only Sense in which he would take it: That this Paper they all consider'd as that which had in it gross and scandalous Reflections on that excellent Act of Parliament, &c. and teaching the Subject to evacuate and disappoint all Laws and Securities that could be enacted for the Security of the Government, and by making that Paper a Part of his Oath, assuming a legislative Power, &c. And that, for the further Prosecution of all relating to this Affair, they waited for his Majesty's Commands."

This Letter was dated Novem. 8, and the King's Answer the 15th: But tho' they profess'd to wait his Majesty's Pleasure, they proceeded to indict the Earl, in that Interval, of Slandering and Depraving, and afterwards, the Design growing, of Treason and Perjury. It was now high time for the Earl to provide for his Defence: Accordingly he apply'd by Petition for an Advocate, Sir George Lockhart, to plead for him, which he was clearly entitled to by the Laws; but met with a Refusal: For tho' the Council condescended to allow him Advocates, they would not allow him that particular Advocate; his Highness openly threatening, that if Sir George should undertake for the Earl, he should never more plead for the King, or him: But the Earl persisting in his Claim, moreover taking an Instrument or Voucher, before a Notary-Public, That he had requir'd the said Sir George to plead for him, and that for his own Safety he had refused to do so, without express Authority from the Council, and giving out, that he would not utter one Word at the Bar by way of Defence, unless he had the Benefit of the Laws; he was at last indulg'd, and Sir George had Leave to undertake his Cause: And early in December, he, and the other Advocates concern'd with him, gave it as their Opinions, That, considering the Earl's Design and Meaning, in offering the Writing in question, was only to clear his own Conscience, not to propagate Faction or Sedition, the said Writing did not contain any of the Crimes charged in the Indictment: And that the Glosses and Inferences put upon it were altogether strained and unwarrantable, inconsistent with the Earl's true Design, and the Sincerity of his Meaning and Intention. For which they were question'd before the Council, and told, that their Fault was greater than the Earl's.

December the 12th was the Day of Trial, or rather of devoting a Victim; for scarcely were the Forms of Justice observ'd; and as to the Essence, it was wholly overlook'd. The Earl of Queensberry, who had himself taken the Test with a Court Reserve, officiated as Lord Justice-General; and had for his Assitants the Lords Nairn, Collingtoun, Forret, Newtoun, and Kirkbouse: And the Indictment having been read, the Earl himself made a Speech, asserting the Innocence of his Intentions, and setting forth at large the uniform Loyalty of his Life: After which the Lawyers enter'd into the Merits of the Cause, and affirm'd and deny'd, reply'd and rejoind'd, till they had exhausted their whole Art. The Hearing lasted from nine in the Morning till nine at Night; and then the Court was adjourn'd till twelve o'Clock the next Day; the Earl and the whole Auditory believing that a Stop was thereby put to the Proceedings of the Day: But the Lords of the Judiciary, it seems, were still unwearied, and resolv'd to go thro' with their Share of the Job at a Heat. One of them, indeed, Lord Nairn, who was superannuated, and who, on that Account, for a considerable time past, had not been suffer'd to weigh out Justice even in the Retale-Traffic of the Law, quitted the Bench almost in the Middle of the Pleadings: But when this Resolution was taken to drive Post to the Issue, even this incompetent Elder was expressly sent for, and rais'd out of his Bed to throw in his Voice at the Decision; which was all that was requir'd of him, and all that he could bestow.

The proper Business of a full and open Court being thus in the Hands of a dark Cabal, five or six Hours more were bestow'd in a Revival of the Pleas of the several Advocates; during a good Part of which time, the Lord, last mention'd, nodded in full Tranquility over the Cause; and in the Issue, the Libel was found relevant, according to the Scottish Phrase, by a Majority of three to two; the Lords Collingtoun, and Kirkbouse, dividing for the Prisoner, and the Lords Newtoun, Forret, and Nairn against him; the Lord Justice-General, according to the Constitution of the Court, not voting at all.

All Difficulties being thus removed, when the Court met again according to Adjournment, Sentence was pronounc'd in the Name of the whole Bench, to this Effect, "That the Prisoner was (j) guilty of the Treason, and of Leasing-making and Leasing-telling;" and

His Trial.

(i) The contrary of which is manifest, not only in the Case of the Earl of Queensberry, above-mention'd, but of the whole Clergy: And it is further affected, in the Earl's Case, p. 114, 25, a known Truth, That the President had permitted several Members of the College of Justice to promise, when they took it, some one Sense, some another, and some Non-sense; as one saying, he took it in jure Senes; another making a speech which no body understood; a third, all the time of the reading, repeating, Lord have Mercy upon me, miserable Sinner! Nay, even an Advocate, after being debarred a few Days, because, tho' no Clerk, he insisted on not taking it without the Benefit of the Clergy, viz. the Council's Explanation, was yet admitted afterwards, without the Council's Dispensation.

(j) On what Principle, may be gather'd from the following Glosses on the Earl's Explanation, which are taken from the very Words of the King's Advocate:

"Earl, I have considered the Test, Advocate, which ought not to be done. E. And am very desirous to give Obedience, as far as I can. A. But am not willing to give full Obedience. E. I am confident, the Parliament never intended to impose contradictory Oaths. A. That is, I am con-and that the Charge of Perjury was remitted to the Consideration of an Affize or Jury."

Nothing could equal the Surprise of the whole Court, that the Judges should come ready prepar'd with their Decision; that they should with one Breath set aside the Earl's whole Defence, and that they should discover Treason in (k) Words, which neither his Highness in private, nor all the Counsellors in public, nor the President of the Council, tho' he rose out of his Seat to hear them the more distinctly, nor any of the most learned Lawyers, or the general World had found, in any Respect, blameable. As to the Earl and his Advocates, they were struck dumb with Astonishment; and, clearly foreseeing that where the Disease was in the Will, it would be a vain thing to apply Remedies to the Understanding; and that where Innocence so pure and spotless had so little avail'd, the Tongues of Men and Angels would be employ'd in vain, they made no Objections to the Jurors, tho' liable to many (three of them being Privy Counsellors who had already foretold their Judgment; others having partially advis'd and sollicit'd against him, and all having been tamper'd with, both by Threats and Promises) nor to the Witnesses, who were the Governor of Edinburgh Castle, two Clerks of the Council, and one Sub-Clerk: Nor did they present to the Jurors, according to Custom, the favourable Side of the Case, nor attempt to shew, as they might have done, That even the (*) Depositions, instead of proving the Earl's Guilt, demonstrat'd his Innocency.—They gave way in Silence to the Torrent they could not stop. The Jurors were sworn, heard the Depositions, withdrew, and fell to their Business as roundly as the Judges before them. This much of Conscience, however, appear'd amongst them. Those who were Privy Counsellors did allow they had heard the Earl's Explanation, the first Day, and, therefore, acquitted him of the Perjury; and the Majority of the rest chose to be determin'd by their Authority. Yet some there were who knew nothing of the Fact, but by Hearsay; and yet, without any Regard to the Testimony of the said Counsellors, took it on their Consciences, that the Earl had said nothing, when he first took the Test, and voted him guilty: And the Clerk of the Affize was so forward to lend his helping Hand, that he twice mis-reckon'd the Votes, before he would admit that the Earl was even acquitted of the Perjury.

Having, at last, adjusted their Verdict, all that remain'd was to deliver it in the open Court; which was done by the Marquis of Montrose, as their Chancellor or Foreman, in these Words: "The Affize, all in one Voice, find the Earl of Argyl guilty AND culpable of the Treason, Leaving-making, and Leaving-telling; and find by Plurality of Votes the said Earl innocent, AND not guilty of the Perjury."

The Court was then adjourn'd; and the very same Day, that no Time might be lost, an Express was dispatch'd with a Letter from the Privy Council to his Majesty, not containing a particular Account of what the Earl should be found Guilty of, for his Majesty's full Information, as his Majesty had requir'd, and which could no otherwise have been done, than by accompanying the said Letter with a Copy of the whole Proceeding; but only a simple Declaration, That, after a full Debate and clear Probation, he had been found guilty of Treason; and urging, "That it was usual, and most fit for his Majesty's Service, and the Advantage of the Crown, that a Sentence be pronounc'd, upon the Verdict of Affize; without which, the Process would be still imperfect; after which, his Majesty might order all farther Execution to be fitted during Pleasure." This Letter was sign'd by the whole Council, not at Discretion, after the usual Form, but by special Command laid on every Member; the Clerk going about with the Letter from Man to Man, and extorting every Subscription, by pleading that Command, and making Complaint to the Duke if any scrupled to yield Obedience. Hence some Bishops (he of Edinburgh, who had been so deeply concern'd in explaining, the Test not excepted) thought themselves oblig'd to forget their Function and soil their Hands in this Cause of Blood; and even some of the Earl's own Friends and Relations had not the Firmness to decline, what they blush'd to perform.

About a Week or two before the Trial, the Earl had receiv'd Notice, that a close Cabal had been held of the Duke's Familiars; upon which Occasion, it was recollect'd by one of the Party, That in the Year 1663 the Earl had been pardon'd by his Majesty, after he had been found guilty by the Earl of Middleton and the Parliament, then sitting: That it was then esteem'd an Error in the Earl of Middleton, that he had not proceeded to Execution, tho' his Majesty had commanded to the contrary; for tho' it might have confident they did intend to impose contradictory Oaths. E. And therefore I think no Man can explain it, but for himself. A. That is to say, every Man may take it in any Sense he pleases to devise, and thereby render this Law, and also all other Laws, tho' not at all concern'd in this Affair, useless: And so make himself a Legislator, and usurp the Supreme Authority. E. And I take it, in so far as it is consistent with itself and the Protestant Religion. A. Whereby I suppose, that it is not at all consistent with either; nor was ever intended by the Parliament it should be consistent. E. And I declare, that, by taking this Test, I mean not to bind up myself, in any Station, and in a lawful Way, to wish, or endeavour, any Alteration I think to the Advantage of Church or State, nor to be repugnant to the Protestant Religion, and my Loyalty. A. Whereby I declare myself, and all others, free from all Obligation to the Government, either of Church or State, as by Law esta-blish'd, and from the Duty and Loyalty of good Subjects; resolving myself to alter all the Fundamentals, both of Law and Religion, as I shall think fit. E. And this I understand as a Part of my Oath. A. That is, as a Part of the Act of Parliament, by which I take upon me, and usurp, the Royal Legislative Power."

(k) A Scander-by, we are told, when the Sentence was pronounc'd, declar'd on the Spot, That he believ'd the Words were by some popish Magic transubstantiated; for, to his Eye, they appear'd the same as before. Another answer'd, That he was of the same Opinion; and moreover was confident, that some could discover Treason in the Words, who would not, when Time should serve, profess his Belief in Transubstantiation too.

(*) One of the Witnesses depos'd, that he heard the Earl make the same Explanation the Day before in Council; and that it was there accepted.

have cost him a Crown, it would have cost him no more: And infer'd, that if a Proceeding of that Nature would have been so lightly resent'd then, it would be over-look'd now, his Royal Highness being on the Throne: That the Stop of the Sentence would look like a Diffidence; whereas, the Execution would countenance, vindicate and secure the whole Proceeding. All this, it seems, was echo'd to the Earl; as also, That it was resolv'd that nothing but fair Weather should appear towards him, till his Doom was seal'd; and that the Council's Letter had been sent Post to Court, to cut off all Possibility of Application on his Side. And from all this, he thought it reasonable to conclude, That nothing short of his Life would satiate the Rage of his Enemies; and that he had no way to escape their Cruelty, but by not trusting to their Mercy.

That, however, he might leave them without Excuse, the Day after the News had been sent to Whitehall of his Conviction, he apply'd by a Friend to his Highness, for Leave to wait on him; whose Answer was, "That it was not usual to speak to Criminals, except with Rogues concern'd in a Plot, when Discoveries might be expected; but that he would consider of it." The Result of which Consideration was, that the next Day he refus'd it. The Earl, nevertheless, apply'd again, with an Intimation, That he had sent a Petition to his Majesty; and that he was desirous to owe some Part of the Favour he expected to his Highness. This only drew on another Refusal; and, at the same time, viz. Monday the 10th of December, he receiv'd further Intelligence, That the Return of the Council-Express was expected on the following Thursday, being the Council-Day; that the Justice-Court, which, according to Custom, had sat the same Monday, and, according to Custom, should have adjourn'd till Monday the 26th, or, because of Christmas, to the first Monday in January, was, for the Earl's sake, adjourn'd only till Friday, to be in Readiness to pass Sentence, as soon as his Majesty's Pleasure should be known: And that his Highness had been heard to say, That if the Express return'd not according to Expectation, he would take the Issue upon himself: Which Expressions being dark and general, left the more Room for Suspicion. The Earl now thought it more reasonable than ever to meditate an Escape, yet came to a Resolution on to postpone the Attempt till Wednesday: But the next Day, receiving a Confirmation that all Access to the Duke was debar'd; and being inform'd, That some Troops, and a Regiment of Foot were come to Town; as also, that on the Morrow, he was to be brought down from the Castle to the common Goal, from whence Criminals were usually carry'd to Execution, he concluded, that no farther time was to be lost; and, accordingly, either by good Fortune or good Management, or both, eluded the Guards, and got late out that Evening, and made the best of his way to London, where he lay conceal'd for some time after.

Within two Days, as had been expected, the King's Answer to the Council's Letter arriv'd, authorizing them to proceed to Sentence; but to suspend the Execution till his Majesty's farther Pleasure should be known. This Answer was read at the Board the Day it came to Hand; and the Court of Justice being to sit according to Adjournment, on the next following, there was a sort of Necessity to come to an immediate Determination; but the Earl having made his Escape, a Doubt was started whether the Judges could proceed to pass Sentence against him, he being absent. The Countess of Argyll had also presented a Petition in Behalf of her Lord, back'd by such Arguments as either Law or Reason could furnish, why Sentence ought not to pass, till he, himself, had clos'd his Defence; which, as yet, he had not done, and which he still might take an Opportunity to do. But the Petition was soon reject'd, and the Doubt over-rul'd; and instead of declaring him a Fugitive, and Out-law; which, according to the old Law and Custom, was the Extremity he had to apprehend, the Lords of the Judiciary decreed and adjudg'd, That as a Traitor Convict, he was liable to all the Penalties of Treason: That he should be put to Death when apprehended, at what Time, and in what Place and Manner his Majesty should think fit to ordain: That his Name, Memory, and Honours should be extinct: That his Posterity should be incapable of Honour, Place, or Office: And that his Estates, Goods, and Chattles should be forfeit.

The unprecedented Severity of this whole Proceeding astonish'd and terrify'd all Scotland, and deeply affected every British Subject in the three Kingdoms, who was not an Idolater of the Prerogative, and ambitious of being a Slave: Thro' every Exclusionist it struck a peculiar Horror; for, if such was the Viceregency of the Duke, what was not to be dreaded when he should hold the Scepter in his own Right? And if the Earl of Argyll had been thus hunted down, for only refusing to cabal with the Duke against the King, in case his Majesty should ever be induced to pass the Exclusion-Bill; what Mercy could they hope for, who had set that Bill on foot; and who had so openly and loudly declar'd, That they would never permit his Highness to take peaceable Possession of the Crown, nor live peaceably under him? These were Questions that perpetually arose, and drew on such Conclusions as had a manifest Tendency to draw on dangerous Conspiracies against both Brothers alike, and to involve the whole Land in Blood and Confusion. While the King continued to make the Duke's Cause his own, and to countenance whatever Extravagances he thought proper to commit, it was scarce possible to strike at the one, without endangering the other.

The same implacable Spirit had, moreover, shew'd itself at Whitehall that night in Scotland; and there seem'd to be no Want of Will to serve up Shaftesbury and others here, in the same manner that Argyll had been serv'd up there: Whence it follow'd naturally, rally, if not necessarily, that the Devoted in both Kingdoms should rush into each others Arms, and, under the Pretence of saving the Public, seek their own Preservation.

It is an up-hill Labour for a Number of Individuals, however wise, great, rich, popular, or provok'd, to wrestle with a Government: And, for that Reason, there must be a very extraordinary Assenblage of Circumstances to prompt any Man to embark in so dangerous an Enterprize: Till the Great are made desperate by Proscriptions, they are too fond of Ease, and too fearful of Dangers and Difficulties, to stake their present Possessions against any Prospect, how inviting soever: And till the Herd are driven into Madness by Oppressions, they never think of using their Horus: Both must be aggriev'd at the same Instant, in order to be sensible that they stand in need of each other's Assistance. And, in the Times before us, one would almost imagine, that those in Power had purposely firm'd the Malcontents with all the Requisites to try the Experiment against themselves; for they at once took care that there should be enough to lead, and enough to follow; and that both should be held together by the Smart of present Sufferings, and the Dread of worse to ensue.

While the Lords Shaftsbury and Argyl were yet fore with their late Persecutions, and many other Grandees had Reason to believe, that, as soon as plausible Pretences could be found, or a Set of more reputable Witnesses to countenance them, it would be their Turns next to pass thro' the Fire, as a Sacrifice to the Court-Molech, it was resolv'd to make the Body of Protestant-Dissenters, then far more numerous, opulent, and powerful, than they are at present, feel more sensibly than ever the Weight of the penal Laws: But, in order to put the fairer Mask on this Proceeding, the Justices of the Peace were first summon'd to Court to receive a Charge in relation to the Papists only. Sir John Kersey says, to receive a severe Reprimand, for having been too remiss in putting the Laws in force against them; tho', according to the same Author, it was shrewdly suspected, his Majesty was not in earnest: After which, the said Justices, as of their own accord, waited on the King with an humble Representation, signifying, "That an Intimation of his Pleasure was necessary, at that time, as to the putting the Laws in execution against Conventicles, in regard that when it was before given them in charge to prosecute popish Recusants, no Mention had been made of suppressing Conventicles; whence it had been pretended, that they were not to be disturb'd, or meddled with." And his Majesty was pleas'd to declare it to be his express Pleasure, that the Laws be effectually put in execution against them, both in City and Country.

Being thus arm'd with his Majesty's express Pleasure, which, it seems, was of more Weight with them than the express Letter of the Laws, they issued forth their Edicts to the Constables, Churchwardens, &c. of the several Parishes, to return the Names of all Preachers in Conventicles, and of the most considerable Frequenters of the same: And these Edicts of theirs finding but little Observance, they, in the next place, call'd upon the Church to aid and assist, by making it their Request to the Bishop of London, that he would cause all the Officers in his Diocese to use their utmost Diligence in excommunicating all such as were liable to that Censure; and that the said Excommunications might be publish'd in the Parishes where the said Persons liv'd, that they might be obvious to the Penalties they had incurred, viz. Not to be admitted for a Witness, or return'd upon Juries, or capable to sue for any Debt. Their Worship also farther order'd, "That the Statute of the first of Elizabeth, and the third of James, be put in due Execution, for the levying Twelve-pence per Sunday upon such Persons who repair'd not to Divine Service and Sermons, at their Parish or some other public Church." All which, even Mr. Archdeacon Eberd acknowledges, "made way for all sorts of Prosecutions, both in City and Country; which, in many Places, were carry'd on with great Spite and Severity, where they never wanted busy Agents and Informers, of which a few were sufficient to put the Laws in execution. So that for the most part the Dissenters, this Year, and much longer, met with cruel and unchristian (!) Usage, greater than any Subject had felt since the Reformation."

There are moreover two (m) Papers still extant, in the Name of these persecuted People; the one is called, The Case of present Distresses on Nonconformists examin'd; and the other, The Form of an Address expressing the true Case of the Dissenting Protestants of England. In the Preamble to the first, it is asserted, that their Conventicles did not come within the Description of the Act, as not being seditions; and that, under Cover of it, the following Practice had been taken up, viz. Upon the bare Oath of Informers, Convictions were clancularly made, and Executions granted on the Goods of those inform'd against,

(1) The Archdeacon, indeed, takes care to insinuate, that they deserv'd it, by saying, "For what they had done before that time was almost remember'd, and run'd such an Indignation and Prejudice against them, as the which Men could not easily conquer." He also adds, "That the Beginning of this Proceeding rais'd a mighty Noise and Discontent, and occasion'd some Reflections upon the King, which were very rude and violent; as particularly, Mr. Fredrick Horsey said, 'That the King's consenting to the tyrannical Proceedings of convicting Dissenters, he did not question but would make him the Head shorter; and that he did believe the City did not secure him the last Lord Mary's day, when they had him there?' For which Words he was committed Prisoner to Newgate for High Treason."

It is fit the Reader should know, that this Article is taken verbatim from the Gazette, No. 1669: That tho' these Words were sworn against this Mr. Horsey, it no where appears, that ever they were prov'd; and that, in such Times as these, no Office of his Nature would have gone unpunish'd. Insist therefore of drawing Conclusions against the Dissenters from this Instance, as this Reverend Divine seems to direct, it seems fairer to produce it as a new Proof of the arbitrary Spirit of the Government:

Gazette, Nov. 1677.

A. D. 1681-2. against, a first, second, and third time, without Notice, Warning, Summons, or any Intimation of Proceedings against them, or Allowance for them to make their Defence; contrary to the plain Sense and Intention of the very Law on which these Distresses were made: For therein it is provided, that there should be a Gradation in the Penalty, annex'd to the Continuance of the Offence; the first being for twenty Pounds, the second for forty, &c. apparently, that Warnings and Admonitions might accompany Prosecutions, and the first Stage of Punishment deter Men from sinning any more.

And as to the second Paper, it contain'd a modest and pathetic Address to the King, in the Names of his nonconforming Protestant Subjects; declaring their deep Sense of his Majesty's heavy Displeasure; presuming that, since it fell so peculiarly on them, it must arise from Causes peculiar to them; intimating, that those Causes could only be, either a Difference in the Practice of Religion, which was obvious, or a Notion that they were not duly affected to his Majesty's Authority and Government: And endeavouring to shew, 1. That their Scruples in religious Matters arose from a Conviction, that they ought to fear God more than the King. And, 2. That as to the Matter of their Loyalty, the same Conscience which oblig'd them to differ from the Laws, in the Rites and Modes of public Worship, oblig'd them also to be obedient in all things else.

There was also one particular Paragraph, in which they set forth the Injustice of reproaching them with the bloody Contest of former Days, which happen'd before most of them were of an Age to take any Part in them; insinuate, that considerable Numbers of them had some Merit to plead in the Restoration; and indirectly claim the Benefit of the Act of Oblivion.

It must be own'd, that in all this they had Truth and Reason on their Side, but in the Clamour of the Times both were lost; and nothing could be heard but what flatter'd the Rage of those that were uppermost. The Earl of Shaftsbury had been acquitted in November, and the Gazette had been taken up with loyal Addresses to his Majesty, on the seasonable Dissolution at Oxford, and the gracious Declaration that follow'd it, till the Beginning of January; and in all that time, which was almost two Months, no body on the Court-side had been ingenious enough to draw from their late Defeat at the Old Bailey all the Fruits of a Victory: At last the Grand-Jury of (n) Dorset, assembled at Blandford, and the Justices, Deputy-Lieutenants, Grand-Jury, &c. of Somersetshire, had the Honour and Good-fortune to light on the happy Expedient, on the same Day, viz. January 10, and to set a Precedent which was instantly follow'd, wherever the loyal Faction were the Majority.

The first of these Productions was in the Shape of a Presentment (to be remitted or not to the King, at the Pleasure of their A. D. 1681-2. Worthips, to whom it was made) and signify'd, "That they, the Grand-Jury, were credibly inform'd, that there were in that County SOME PERSONS, the obstinate Remains of the late horrid Rebellion, calling themselves PROTESTANTS, who had the Impudence to protest their Dissent from the Laws of his Majesty's Government, and who, they FEAR'D, were ready, on that Account, to unite themselves against the same, upon pretence of securing the Protestant Religion, &c. That they were further inform'd, that the said Persons much approv'd, as a proper Instrument of such Union, the Model of an impious Confederacy, call'd an ASSOCIATION, lately discover'd, &c. being in truth a more insidious Invasion of the Government than the late bloody and traitorous Solemn League and Covenant: And that they humbly hop'd, the honourable Court (of Justices) would use all Means which were by the Laws put into their Hands, at once for the further discovering and suppressing the same."

The second was an immediate Address to his Majesty, expressing how deeply and sadly sensible the Addressers were of those many desperate and wicked Designs, which had been of late laid against his Majesty's sacred Person and Government; and, amongst other abominable Machinations, carry'd on with great Secrecy, that of an Association; and declaring, That, as they should unanimously adhere to the Government of Church and State, as by Law establish'd; so they should oppose all Associations, which had not his Majesty's Royal Assent; and that they would, by due Course of Law, endeavour to bring the Contrivers and Promoters of all such Associations, of what Equality and Condition soever they were, to condign Punishment, as Traitors and seditious Persons."

Both these Papers were set forth in the Gazette of January the 16th; and in the next, viz. of the 19th, appear'd a third, from their Worthips of Middlesex; in which, after reminding the King, "That they were the first who had waited on him with their Offering of Thanks and Acknowledgments for his gracious Declaration, they confess, that they are asham'd that they were not also the first in expressing their Indignation against that most execrable and traitorous design'd Association, lately discover'd by his Majesty; and doubt not, that if any Persons should attempt, under Colour and Pretence of so horrid and damnable a Contrivance, to disturb the Peace and Quiet of his Majesty's Government, whatever Impunity they might meet with on Earth, yet they would not escape the Divine Justice."

To encourage others to follow these loyal Examples, Care was taken to let the whole Kingdom know how graciously they had been accepted; and immediately every Court-Implement every where put in for his Share of Merit, by taking the Hint, and endeavouring to surpass in Matter and Manner all those who had the Start in point of Time: And

A second Course of Addresses.

(n) The Earl of Shaftsbury was himself of Dorsetshire, as may be recollected from a former Passage.

A. D. 1681-9. And with such notable Success was the Work carry'd on, and so thick did Addresses crowd on the Heels of each other, that from the Outside of Things, it was natural to conclude, That all his Majesty's Subjects were become of one Mind; that there were none left to associate; and, consequently, that there was no solid Ground for the very Addresses which these outrageous Loyalists so absurdly glory'd in.

The (e) Mayor, &c. of the loyal City of Glocester declar'd before God and the whole World, "That they did abominate, detest, and from their Hearts abhor, that most impious, scilicet, and traitorous Association, hatch'd in Hull, and lodg'd in the Hands of known and most eminent Disturbers of the Peace of the Kingdom; an Association not to be mention'd among Christians without Amazement; that threaten'd Ruin both to Church and State, and had again involv'd us in Blood, had not God of his great Mercy detected it, &c. And that they would give their utmost Assistance and Compliance to whatever Methods his Majesty's princely Wisdom should propose and command them, for the Preservation of his sacred Person, the most happy establish'd Government in Church and State, and the legal Succession of the Crown, against all Pretences and Designs, of what Sort or Faction soever, to the total Expense of their Estates and Blood.

Even the Benchers and ancient Barristers of Gray's-Inn, who when the former Addresses were in agitation would not give the least (f) Countenance to any such Proceeding, "now look'd upon themselves, as they A. D. 1681-9. [Hist. 1699.] said, by their Allegiance, bound in Duty to declare their utmost Detestation of all Bands and Affiliations whatsoever, enter'd into without his Majesty's Authority and Allowance, as felonious Designs against his Sovereign Power; and more particularly, of that abominable Project of Association lately produced at the Old-Barley, being the very Model of a Change of Government, in the manifest Proposal of a Rebellion, under the Mask of asserting Liberty and Religion."

And some of the Middle Temple, headed by Mr. Saunders, one of the Council against Lord Shaftsbury, went so far as to declare, "That they thought themselves, by reason of their Profession, more oblig'd than others to declare it as their Opinion, That the execrable Paper produced against the Earl of Shaftsbury contain'd most gross and apparent Treasons, more manifestly tending to the Ruin of his Majesty's Dominions than the old hypocritical Solemn League and Covenant; And that whosoever promoted that rebellious Association, design'd by the said Paper, or countenanced the same, by refusing, upon (g) full Evidence, to find Bills of Indictment against the Authors and Promoters thereof, &c. had in a high measure perverted the Laws, and could have no other Design thereby, than to usurp to themselves an arbitrary and tyrannical Dominion, not only over his Majesty's Subjects, but over his Majesty also."

It is easy to conceive, that the King's open and avowed Approbation of such bitter and provoking Expressions as these could not but contribute to widen the Breach, to make the whole anti-court Party desperate, and to push them on dangerous Undertakings, whether they had before entertain'd any such Thoughts or not. Now, according to the common Rules of Policy, is there any other Way to account for his Majesty's Conduct, than by supposing

(a) An obsolete Repetition, if it be true what some say, who quote the Town-books for their Vouchers; wherein it is recorded, "That he was admitted into the Freedom of that City, for the good Service he had done in fighting against Charles Stuart at Worcester." Others again say, on the slender Authority of a Poem of good Credit, That he and all his Family were expelled the City, in those Times, for their Loyalty.

(b) See Page 597.

(c) This Reflection drew a Vindication of Lord Shaftsbury's Jury, it is probable, from some of themselves; in which are these Words:

"What a Court may call clear and plain Proof (as they have done in the late and unusual Way of Examination of Witnesses) may appear far otherwise to them the Jurors, and for Reason, weighty and convincing; and whosoever Men may say or write, yet, since they know not believe as they please, it is not in their Power to alter their Judgment according to another's Direction. So that there might be Motives strong enough to induce the Earl of Shaftsbury's Jury to acquit him, tho' there had been as many more such Witnesses, and had all as positively sworn the Treason as those that appeared; as the Consideration of the Evidence itself, how improbable some things were, and how irreconcilable others to common sense and Reason; how infamous the Witnesses were; and what Applications they had made to the City (and perhaps to some of them) for a Subornance, before they enter'd into the Conspiracy; the State of say Lord Shaftsbury, as he stood in the Way of popish Designs; and therefore necessary to be destroy'd, and by no Means to be adjudg'd to their Cause as under the Colour of a Protestant Plot to be prov'd by Popish Evidence. How unlikely a Man of his Prudence was to discover such a Design to Person that might betray, but could never give the least Advantage to it; how fatal the King's Death such Needs be to a Man of his Fortune, eminently unconcern'd to Popery and a popish Succession: The Jurors might have under their Consideration these or the like Circumstances, and from them conclude, that such thorough and improbable Swearing was not gratis; and, upon the same Reason, that such a Party as would be at the Charge of such and so many Witnesses would not spare for Price, nor want Opportunity to convey into his Closet the horrid Paper that was found there. It is worth Consideration, that every Witness comes to a Grand-Jury under the Obligation of this Oath, viz.

"The Evidence that you shall give to the Grand-Jury, upon this Bill of Indictment, shall be the Truth, tho' it witness Truth, and nothing but the Truth, as it help you God."

So that, having all that can be said against the Prisoner, it were very unreasonable if they should not be so tender of his Liberty as not to hazard it at a further Trial, if what is said on one Side be not to them sufficiently convictive; and here on a conscientious Jury are they that upon his Oath, the Truth whereof he is not likely to be in his Judgment; For the Oath of their Pretirement runs thus: The Jurors, upon their Oaths, do profess, that A. B. is guilty of Treason, Murder, or Felony; for they shall, upon their Oaths, ever the Truth, as well as the subsequent Jury, or else the Prisoner can never be convicted; and therefore ought to be as careful in their Verdicts, and not find a Bill upon that Evidence, though of the Grand-Jury, which they would not upon the same Evidence find, if of the other, the Prisoner nor ever declining upon his Trial."

A.D. 1681<sup>12</sup> it was calculated on purpose to drive them on Extremities, and to make their Relentsments a Snare for their Destruction; in which case, it might be clearly foreseen, that he would be absolute Master of the People, and that the whole Constitution would sink in Ruins at his Feet.

The immediate Effect of this second Round of Addresses, was one of the sharpest and rudest Controversies that ever disgrac'd the Press, or amus'd the People: For the Experiment had no sooner began to operate, than a Paper was publish'd under the Title of, A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend about ADDRESSERS and ABHORRERS; in the former Part of which, the Success it met with is ascrib'd solely to the Artifices of the Court, the Practices of the Clergy, and the Ambition, Servility, (r) Depravity, Corruption, and Prejudices of the Gentry; and in the latter, it is asserted, that the Paper call'd the Association, which was thus pelted at, was a Man of Straw of their own letting up: That Gwyn, who pretended to find it, was Steynour's Creature, and Shaftsbury's known Enemy; and that all the Papers reliev'd at Council, were mark'd by his Lordship's Agents, Wilson or Starkey; whereas this was mark'd by neither. The Drift of all was to dissuade Persons from shewing any Countenance to this Device, and concluded with these Words: "But you are not to set your helping Hand to these things: There is a God above, that will certainly enquire after such Matters: And, if you have PATIENCE but a while, the Wicked that thus prosper, their Place shall know them no more."

It happen'd unfortunately for the Party that this Paper was calculated to serve, that it abounded more with Repentment than Discretion. It charg'd the greatest Part of the Nobility and Gentry with having lost their Senses: It said, that many of them had been corrupted by a vile and fardid Education under the CLERGY: It said, that without the Help of University Learning, it was not possible to imagine how the Protestant Religion could be preserv'd under a Popish Prince; and it call'd upon the Person to whom it was address'd, to consider, when it should become notorious, that all Honours and Advantages were conferr'd upon none but the Duke's Creatures, how long the dissolute and drunken Part of our Nobility and Gentry would hold out as Confessors for the Protestant Church of England.—Whoever uses ill Language in a Controversy that regards great Numbers of Men, is sure to have the whole Hive about his Ears; and serves his Adversary more by his Indecency, than he hurts him by his Inferences. This was no Secret to those who undertook to answer this; and they accordingly brought forward all those broad and coarse Expressions, accompany'd with suitable Remarks, and thereby more advantag'd their Cause, than they could have done by ever so clear a Deduction of Facts, or ever so strong a Chain of Arguments.

This Reply occasion'd a second Paper against these mortifying Addresses, which, tho' better guarded in Point of Expression than the first, serves equally to shew how fearful the Party-driven were, that they had lost the Bulk of the Nation, and how angry they were with those who had rescu'd them out of their Hands. The Introduction insinuates, That the great Point in Power had in View, was to keep up the present Ferment of the Nation, for the Furtherance of the Papal Cause; and that this Ingredient of Addressing was again thrown in to intoxicate the People a-new, who were on the Point of returning to their Senses. Then follow certain Negatives; as, 1. That the Writer could not pronounce of these Addresses as LeStrange had done of those to Cromwell, viz. That they were no other than Leagues offensive and defensive between him and the Nation; and that while his Care was for engaging one Party, it was for destroying another. 2. Nor would pronounce, that the Addressers should have said to have seen the good Effects of his Majesty's former Promises, in relation to frequent Parliaments, before they had address'd him again. 3. Nor that it would have become them to be well assured that the Paper call'd the Association was really found in Shaftsbury's Closet, as Gwyn had suggest'd. 4. Nor that it would have been more for their Honour to testify their Abhorrence of Sham Plots, than Sham Associations. 5. Nor that it look'd ill that Addresses in Abhorrence of Parliaments should be countenanc'd and promoted, while Petitions for a Parliament were prohibited by Proclamation.

After this the Writer changes his Method to Positives; says, He is sure the Government has nothing to apprehend either from Phrenetic Preachers or People; seeing some of the most fam'd among them, after having been an hundred times deceiv'd and impos'd upon, were still ready to be brib'd by a Dinner, a Smile, or a fair Word, to co-operate with their Enemies to their own Destruction; and that it was to be wish'd, that some of the Dissenting Ecclesiastics would be content with Grace, and not pretend to civil Wisdom, which, it was evident to all the World, the great Dispenser had deny'd them. 2. That LeStrange, the principal Agent in modelling and remodelling the present Addresses, had chang'd his Sentiments in relation

(r) Which is illustrated by the Example of Sir William Parsons and Sir Nathaniel Nassau, &c. who having gone all Length in the Queen's Parliament, were no sooner got home, than they join'd in the Addresses of Thanks for their own Dissolution, and thereby acknowledg'd themselves to be little less than Rogues and Traitors. There is also the following Paragraph in this Piece, which was probably meant by way of Comment on the Trial of College.

"I would ask you, should a Popish Prince hereafter have a Design to hang any Man that was too busy in the Promitant Cause; whether he had more to do than to make a beggarly, necessitous, or bigot Gentleman Sheriff of that County, and send down his private Orders to the Lord Lieutenant, who shall return a Grand Jury of Lieutenants and Esquires, that shall never find Ignoramus; and a petty Jury of Serjeants and Corporals, before whom Ignoramus may be believ'd; especially if care be taken that the Lord Lieutenant be so good a Churchman as to take his Tutor in the University for Governor of his Affairs and Fortune ever after?"

tion to such Applications; having formerly declar'd, "That the same Expedient in the Hands of the late Protector, was no other than an Artifice to piece out his broken Power, and to set a false Gloſs on his Interest; and that Cromwell was too wise to place any farther Dependence upon it; for that having been gain'd by Contrivance, or Force, or at least, Importunity, half a Dozen pitiful Wretches, the Presenters, had still'd themselves, The People of such a County; which was the whole of the Reckoning. 3. That the Papists, in a Body, had chang'd their Sentiments as well as he; for whereas they now held the unpardonable Sin in Politics to be, the Exclusion of the Presumptive Heir; they had taught, towards the Close of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, when a Protestant Heir was in Sight, "That Succession to Government was neither establish'd by the Law of Nature, nor Revelation, but only by Human Sanction, which Men might alter or cancel as their Interest determin'd them." 4. That even the Protestants also were sick of the same fantastic Disease; for whereas in the same Reign, the whole Clergy, and most of the Nobility, Gentry, &c. deriv'd their main Arguments against Mary, Queen of Scots, from the Danger likely to befall the Reformation, in case she should survive Queen Elizabeth; it was now come to that Pass, That no Zeal had any Merit but that for a Papish Successor. 5. That as all Addresses of this Nature had a Tendency to render the King, who ought to reign equally in the Hearts of all his People, the Head of a Faction merely, so they also serv'd to make the Divisions of the Kingdom apparent, and consequently to expose the Weakness of the Government. 6. That the most fatal Effect of these Addresses consisted in the depriving his Majesty of that Security which the Wisdom of Parliament had provided for his Person against the Papists, viz. By an Association to avenge his Death on them, in case they should, by any Violence, remove him out of their Way; for, according to the general Scope of these Papers, all Associations were abolish'd, and ridicul'd alike. 7. That they, the Papists, by causing all Places Civil and Military, to be fill'd with such only, in whom they could entirely confide, had secur'd to themselves an Indemnity, in case they should think fit to carry their traitorous Purposes against the King's Life, now left open and expos'd, into Execution. 8. That it was worthy Remark, That the King of Portugal had lately been laid aside, and confin'd to the Terreira Islands, by the very Men whom he had admitted into Power, and who made no other Use of that Power than to supplant him, and impose his Brother on the Throne. And, 9. That the Addresses were so insinuated, that they never once reflected on the great Progress which the Papish Interest had lately made, nor of the Insolence it had already inspir'd them with, tho' so flagrantly manifested in Lancashire, where they had just risen on the King's Officers at Alton, and by main Force rescu'd the Goods and Persons they had taken in Execution out of their Hands.

It should have been observ'd, that the Reply which caus'd this second Paper was address'd by Implication, tho' not in Words at length, to the Earl of Shaftsbury, on a Presumption that he was the Author of the first; which is one of the unfair Artifices of Faction, to blacken an Adversary, by making him answerable for all the Extravagances of all his Followers. It was not however held prudent, to retort the Provocation, and draw the Attention of the Public to Persons instead of Things; which Forbearance on his Side seems to have encourag'd Licence on the other: For the second Return (as the Answer is call'd to this second Paper) to the Letter of a noble Peer concerning Addresses, rushes at once into personal Abuse, and lays on Inveective, as if the Author of it held the Scourge by Authority: According to him, it was downright Impudence in the Earl to surmise, that there was any Room to doubt of the Paper's being found in his Closet, since nothing was ever more exactly prov'd:—It was greatly to be lamented, that all those who, in the House, saw and promoted this damnable Association, and did not so discover it, as to have the Projectors and Forwarders of it rewarded with their worried Rope, should escape free from Punishment:—He, the Earl, had been rais'd by an Excess of Royal Goodness, not only from a mean Estate, but from such as deserv'd more of Severity than Favour.—His Wit, like Galba's, had very unseemly Lodgings.—Out of so ill-contriv'd a Frame, nothing was to be expected but what was mischievous and unlucky.—It was ador'd by the Mob for its excellent Deformity:—All honest and quiet Men were become now convinced, that the frightful Stories of popish Designs, which had thrown the Nation into Fits, were but the Tools of Pratishan Joynery.—It was great Pity the Masters of the Company were not hang'd for Company with the Journeyman.—Sec. &c.

These are some of the Flowers of this choice Piece of Court-Wit and Humour; and as to the Ground on which they were laid, it consisted more of Contradiction than Consistency; with the Addition of such Plausibilities as, under the Pretence of setting forth the Charms of Loyalty, might best reconcile Men to Slavery. Thus it is said, That the Addresses did, with a filial Respect, purge themselves of all sinister Designs or Intentions towards the Crown, either in the present Fruition, or future Inheritance: That out of the Ardency of honest Affection, they had express'd their Abhorrence of such rotten Members as he and others: That these seasonable Declarations of theirs would scatter to pieces all foreign Malignity, as well as domestic: That the Day of securing the Liberty of the Subject, by dissolving the late Parliament, deserv'd as well to be kept holy, as the Day of his Majesty's Restoration: That the things ascrib'd by him to the Whole of the Clergy, Nobility, &c. in Queen Elizabeth's

A. D. 1681. bed's Time, were wholly false: That they were, in truth, to be ascrib'd only to some of the Puritan Gang: That the Association in her Reign was not enter'd into without her Consent: That whereas it had been insinuated; that his Majesty's Consent was to have been solicited to this, it was proper to ask, Where and when those audacious Ruffians would have propos'd it? and whether on the Point of a Spear, at Holmbury House, the Isle of Wight, or Hurst Castle? That, instead of raising such a Din about the Protestant Religion, his Lordship should have shewn what it was: The Addressers had undertaken for the Security of that establish'd in the Church of England; and, if he comprehended all the various Sects in his political Ark, England, in the next Generation, would outdo Africa in Variety of Monsters: That the Instance of the Portugall King was introduced with no more Propriety, than if he, the Writer, should petition to have his Lordship sent to the House of Correction, as a Reward of his Oratory and Manners: That his Lordship was so great and fortunate a Statesman, that he was neither believ'd nor lov'd: That he never attain'd what he sought, nor spoke Truth but, as the Devil quoted Scripture, to pervert the Righteous: That the Duke of York's Loyalty and Fidelity could not be parallel'd, except by his Candour and Sincerity: And finally, That Popery, which thro' his false Optics appear'd a Giant, was in reality a Dwarf.

This Paper, it is necessary to observe, was dated from Newmarket, March the 16th, where not only the King and Court then were, but also the Duke; who had so far got the better of Lord Hallifax, as to obtain his Majesty's Permission to revisit England. It is, therefore, not unreasonable to suppose, that some Adventurer in his Highness's Train, whether by Direction or not can never be decided, took Advantage of the Crisis, to set forth this inflammatory Piece. That Lord Hallifax, himself, should ever descend to such dirty Work, can never be imagin'd; his Wit was of too pure a kind to flow thro' so foul a Channel; nor would his Sentiments concerning the Duke's Return permit him to take up the Pen at that time in his Service: And yet the peculiar Insolence and Malice of the Invective, as well as the injurious Direction of it to Lord Shaftsbury, so far provok'd the Latter, or some other Person in his Character and Behalf, that Lord Hallifax was personally attack'd in his turn; and not only made answerable for all the exceptionable Passages in the Production before us, but treated with all the Bitterness that could flow from the most envenom'd Hatred, and most implacable Resentment. The (2) Reply to this Second Return (to this other virulent Piece is call'd) opens with these Words:

"I received yours in Print by the Penny-Post, and expected the Date from (1) Ruford Abbey, and not from Newmarket: But

A. D. 1681. "I understand your Lordship has given your Agents in this Town the Lye, and not retird to your Country-house, upon the Duke's coming, but have rather pok'd down to Newmarket with the new Hespanna of, O Duke, live for ever! which was some Years since, O King, live for ever!" The Letter-writer then denies, that the Paper charg'd upon Lord Shaftsbury, was written by him, or that he stood in Debt for his Fortune to his Majesty's Bounty; it being well known that his Father's Estate in 1630, was between 8 and 9000 l. a Year; Professes not to understand the malicious Hint relating to the Severity he had deserv'd from the King, since no Man could be suppos'd obnoxious to Severity, who had acted a principal Part in restoring the King to his Throne: Affirms, that without his Courage and Dexterity some Men (meaning Mobs) the most highly rewarded, had acted otherwise than they did: That the Act of Obsequy was an Act of the King's Honour and Justice, not of his Mercy: That under the same Head, or a Comparison of the Promises, Declarations, and Engagements then made to the Protestant Dissenters, with their Sufferings, it might be said, that their Submission and Loyalty were without a Parallel: That, in order to keep his Lordship's Hounds in full Cry, a Red-Herring out of his own Kitchen was traid first, and hunted afterwards: That as to the Certainty of the Association-Paper's being found in Lord Shaftsbury's Closet, Gwyn himself does not expressly swear it: That if he had, no Man was, or could be made, answerable for a loose Paper; nor was there any Reason for such a Clamour as had been rais'd upon it, since there was no Proof, that ever any Attempt had been made to put it in force: That altho' he (Hallifax) was now so hot for advancing such Members to the House-top, as had promoted the Association; it could be prov'd, that the Association, and the banishing the Duke for ever, was his own Proposition in the House of Lords, during the last Westminster Parliament: That when the Nomination of Sheriffs for London and Middlesex should fall into his Lordship's Hands, like those of the rest of the Kingdom, the Masters of the Companies would indeed be hang'd with the Journymen: That none but a Fagitt, or a scold Enemy to the King and Kingdom, could have Reason to consider the Days of dissolving the last Parliaments, as Days of Deliverance; since they were flush to them only: That these Addresses, tho' so much glory'd in, were so far from being the Voice of the Nation, that they were only the Clamour of his own corrupt Faction: That Jurymen as well as Sheriffs were selected for this peculiar Service: That the whole Secret of procuring them was known: That eighteen such Men might possibly be found in every County, as would be induc'd to echo whatever the Court pleas'd: That, however, in some

some Counties, and those great ones, they had not been able to muster above thirteen; and that in others they had been wholly disappointed: That, on the contrary, the Voice of the Nation was only to be known by their Representatives; and what that was, might be learn'd from the last, which had been chosen against all the Opposition, Industry, Power, and Money of the Court: That when a way should be found to put the Nomination of Juries, as well as Sheriffs and Judges into the Hands of the Court, all would be in the Hands of the Court: That this System was already so complete in Scotland, that the palpable Effects had given rise to the following proverbial Saying, Shew me the Man, and I will tell you the Cause: That tho' it was unquestionably the Prerogative of the Crown to summon and dissolve Parliaments; it was as unquestionably the Birthright of the Subject to have the Use of them: That since the Religion by Law establish'd was the only one his Lordship was willing to acknowledge, he would do well to find and offer some Security, that, when Time should serve, he would not interpret that to be the Ranish Religion, which having the Sanction of Magna Charta, might be said to be likewise irrevocable: That his Lordship had either most egregiously mistaken or misrepresented the Matter of Fact, as to the Association in Queen Elizabeth's Time, for that she herself, in open Parliament, "had protested before God, she was wholly ignorant of it, till a great Number of Hands, with many Obligations, were shewn her at Hampton-Court, sign'd and subscribed with the Hands and Seals of the greatest in this Land:" That as to the Puritan Gang he spoke of, as the only Opposers of the Succession of Mary Queen of Scots, he had lump'd under that invidious Distinction several Parliaments, who not only oppos'd her Succession, but never rest'd till they had brought her to the Block; as thinking the Queen's Person was not safe, as long as a popish Successor was in being: That the two Cases were in some respects exactly parallel: That the Papists were as zealous and as bloody now as then, and the Duke as ambitious as his Great-grandmother: That, indeed, there was a wide Difference in their Circumstances; for the Queen was a Prisoner in the Hands of her Enemies; whereas the Duke, thro' his Majesty's Over-confidence and Credulity, was Master of the whole Power of the Kingdom; and, consequently, might put his Designs in Execution when he pleas'd: That his Highness's Loyalty, however extoll'd, was but a slender Guard against such mighty Temptations; and was the less to be trusted, since it had already given way: That the King himself knew of several Attempts he had formerly made to recover the Crown, to his Majesty's Prejudice: That the Transactions of the Duke of Buckingham and Colonel Banfield, in the Duke's Name, with that View, were only to be prov'd: That the King's Marriage to a Lady, whom the Spanish Ambassador, at that time undertook to shew could have no Children, ought to be plac'd principally to his Account, not only because it was negotiated by his Father-in-law; but because it had no sooner taken place, than his Highness assum'd all the Honours and Privileges of the Prince of Wales, except the Style and Title, as if confident the King would never have any legitimate Heirs to step between him and the Throne: That no King but his Majesty ever went such Lengths to establish the Title of his presumptive Successor: That he had even to far unking'd himself, that it might be said, he reign'd only at the Courtesy of his Brother: And that his Majesty was already visibly eclipsed, for while the whole Throng of Courtiers paraded it in the Duke's Train, the King walk'd the Streets with no other Attendants than two or three Pages of the Back-Stairs.

When the Breach between the Lords Shaftsbury and Hallifax first became apparent, it was foreseen it would be the Ruin of the anti-court Party; and that the Duke and his Creatures would gain ground in proportion as the other lost it. The immediate Consequence of their Division was their taking opposite Roads: The Lord Shaftsbury grew a fiercer Patriot, and the Lord Hallifax a more ductile Courtier, than ever: And both of the Concessions on one Side, and the Extravagances on the other, his Highness had the Advantage. But tho' Lord Shaftsbury, by driving Matters to Extremities, became of all Men the most hated at Court, Lord Hallifax could not by his Services, however eminent, attain the great End of his Ambition, to be the most favour'd and best belov'd. He had indeed the King's Ear; his Advice was always heard, and often taken; but then it was perhaps more out of Policy than Affection, that, according to the King's favourite Maxim, the Court Factions might balance each other. If the Duke was to be serv'd, he was also to be aw'd; and by a Man of less Weight and Ability than his Lordship, this could not be done. There was therefore a Necessity that he should have a large Share of the King's Countenance; and so much the more, as he had a Credit and Interest of his own with a great Part of the Nation; who look'd upon him as equally a Friend to Prerogative and Liberty, and equally an Enemy to Popery and Fanaticism: But if the Minister was to be play'd off occasionally against the Heir, the Heir was most consider'd and rely'd on in the main. Hence tho' he was not permitted to carry all Points, he was generally indulg'd in those that affected him most. If he had the Mortification to be sent to Scotland, he was permitted to model the Government there almost into what Shape he pleas'd; and no sooner did a favourable Crisis offer in England, than he was recalled.

To make his Administration popular, Lord Hallifax had, in the Beginning of February, contended for the summoning a new Parliament: He had urg'd that all Christendom, France excepted, was desirous of it; and that nothing could be offer'd in objection at home, but the Fear that they might begin where the former had left off; in which case, the King might either prorogue or dissolve them as he pleas'd; and at the same time convince the World, as before, That it was their own Faults; that he had kept up to his Promise of calling frequent Parliaments, &c. and that, on the other hand, if the Disposition of the Majority should prove more favourable to the Court, his Majesty would gain the grand Points of being united at home, and formidable abroad. But he was oppos'd by Seymour, Hyde, &c. who were the known Partizans of the Duke, and who, as well as their Patron, were too much concern'd in the Success of the Experiment, to abide the Hazard of it; which, beyond all Arguments, evinces, that the same Management which had procur'd Addresses, could not be depended on in the Choice of a Parliament.

But it is observ'd by the Duke's Party,

How this Advice call'd with the State of Europe.

What Connection there was between this Motion of Lord Hallifax's, and the Intrigues of the House of Austria and the Prince of Orange, we have not sufficient Light to ascertain; tho' from Circumstances it may be conjectur'd that such a Connection there was.

Luxemburg was still kept in Blockade by the French; and the Spaniards had made the most earnest Applications to their Allies on every Side, to co-operate for its Deliverance: With England and Holland they were, in a particular manner, importunate; but while the Former stood aloof, the Latter would proceed no farther than Complaints and Remonstrances; while the  Germans  at Ratisbon held perpetual Conferences on the Means of avenging their Injuries by renewing the War; and as it appear'd, wanted only the Wealth of the  Maritime Powers  to put them in Motion.

Now it was natural for all the Princes of Europe to conclude from the florid Outfide of the King of England's Affairs, that he had the Faction at his Mercy, and consequently might draw what Advantages he pleas'd from his Parliament. It was natural, therefore, for them to avail themselves of this Crisis, and to exert their utmost Endeavours to induce him to take Part in the Common Cause.

Holland had his Promise to urge, of calling a Parliament when that common Cause should require it: Spain had the Rights of an express Treaty to enforce: The  Germans  could join in the Invitation, tho' they had no Obligations to insist on; and the Prince of Orange, whose Element was War, and whose particular Ambition it was to be the Instrument of humbling the grand Monarch of France, had a Family Claim to plead, and the whole Streets of all his former Negotiations.

On the other hand, the very same Circumstances that encourag'd these several Powers to renew their Applications, convinc'd France of the Expediency, if not Necessity, of preventing them; and not only Mr. Montagu's Treaty, but the whole Course of their Dealings with us had shewn them an infallible way. The Power of Gold they had always found to be irresistible; and as it was never more wanted on our Side, nor could ever have been laid out to more Advantage on theirs, it is reasonable to think they were not backward in their Offers, nor we in our Acceptance.

Ferguson is express, that the Duchess of Portsmouth was the Agent between the two Courts on this Occasion; that she went over on Purpose, and that she was accompany'd by the Duke her Son, who, to flatter her Pride, was treated with all the Honours shewn to a Prince of the Blood; inasmuch, that his Royal Highness grew jealous that she was negotiating for herself, as well as the King his Brother.

Duchess of Portsmouth sent to France. (Growth of Papers, P. II. p. 322.)

This is certain, that no sooner did it appear that all was safe on the Side of England, than his most Christian Majesty caus'd the Heer Van Staremberg the Dutch Ambassador at Paris to be inform'd, in answer to his Memorials on the Affair of Luxemburg, "That his most Christian Majesty's Intentions were religiously to observe the Treaty of Nimwegen; but that the Crown of Spain refusing to yield him Alst, and other Places in Flanders belonging to him, in Pursuance of the said Peace, he had caus'd his Troops to block up Luxemburg; and that he should continue to do so, till he had obtain'd Satisfaction in full."

About the same time, rather to divide than pacify the  Germans , his most Christian Majesty also gave the Diet to understand on what Conditions he was willing to leave the Empire in Repose. And that they might be sensible he was in a Condition to exact their Compliance, he not only induc'd the Elector of Brandenburg, by the Dint of Subsidy, to become of his Party, but to act in a manner as his Agent, by causing him to order his Ministers at the Diet to declare in the Name of his Electoral Highness, "That as Things now stood in the Empire, no Opportunity ought to be neglected of coming to an Agreement; and that any tolerable Terms were preferable to the Hazards of another War."

The most Christian K. makes Proposals to the Diet, and promises the Elector of Brandenburg to assist them.

In the mean time the Spaniards, notwithstanding all the Variety of Discouragements they met with from every Quarter, still continu'd deaf to the Demands of France; and instead of growing more submissive, gave out they would raise the Blockade by Force, and made their Preparations accordingly. They also demanded of the States-General the 8000 Auxiliaries, which on the Faith of Treaties they were intitled to, in case of a Rupture; and that with such Earnestness, as laid their High and Mighty Lordships under the greatest Embarrassments: For being fully convinc'd of the fatal Acendency of the French Interest in England, and of their Power every where else, they justly dreaded to do what otherwise correspond'd alike with their Interests and Inclinations. This Perplexity, as it was natural, begot Delays, which the (a) Arrival Spain demands of the States the Auxiliaries they were oblig'd to furnish by Treaty.

(a) The Lord Viscount Priffin, another Creature of the Duke's, was about the same time sent to Paris, in the room of Mr. Montagu.

 rival of Mr. Claude, a new Minister from the British Court, offer'd them a Proteste to execute. And when it appear'd his Errand was at best Matter of Amusement only; and the Importunities of the Spaniards became so pressing as to be no longer evaded, they enter'd on the Debate with aching Hearts; afterwards, met again, and again separated, without coming to any other Resolution than barely to consult their Principals, tho' the Prince of Orange assist'd at their Deliberations, with his usual Ardour, to forward every Measure that any way interfer'd with the Views and Interests of France. Neither when they re-assembled did it appear that their Difficulties were surmounted. The Towns differ'd in Opinion as well as their Deputies; the two Factions had every where oppos'd each other during the Retreats; the Minister of France had put in his Caveat; and the Dread of his most Christian Majesty's Resentment struck an Awe through the whole Republick; which is even visible in their final Determinations: For, in answer to the Spanish Envoy, they declare, "That, according to the Treaty subsisting between his Catholic Majesty and the States, they are at Liberty to use their Endeavours to determine by Conference the Matters in Difference, before they are oblig'd to grant the Auxiliaries which he demanded; That they will do their utmost during the said Conference, to incline the most Christian King to allow, that Luxemburg shall be supply'd with Provisions; and that in case the said King should refuse to enter into the said Conference, or that they should prove unsuccessful, they would then, without Delay, fulfil their Obligations." And, at the same time, in answer to the Counter-Memorial of the French Ambassador, they set forth, "That they desir'd nothing more sincerely, than to preserve the Peace of Europe; That it would give them a very sensible Concern to see it disturb'd: That they would, if possible, induce the Court of Spain to submit the Matter in dispute to a Conference, in hope they might be amicably compos'd: That whereas Europe could not be in a thorough State of Tranquility, as long as there remain'd any Disputes on foot between his most Christian Majesty and the Empire; they made it their Request that the Conferences might be general: Declaring that they would use their Good Offices, jointly with the King of England for bringing the said Disputes to a happy Issue; and finally, praying, that the King would suffer Luxemburg to be reliev'd."

The Marquis de Gram made Governour of the Spanish Netherlands.

This Dilatory was, by no Means, pleasing to the Spaniards, who, by a Series of Indignities and Outrages, were now provok'd into more Vigour and Expedition than were natural to them; and labour'd in earnest to put their Affairs into a better Posture for the time to come. The Prince of Parma, their Governour in the Netherlands, had fallen under some Suspensions; and a Resolution was taken to remove him, and put the Marquis de Grana, a German, in his stead: But this Resolution was kept an inviolable Secret; and tho' the Marquis was expect'd at Brussels with some particular Instructions, nobody was able to guess either at their Contents, or in what Rank he was to appear. In his Way he landed at Portsmouth, and came as far as Witchell to expostulate with his Majesty on his Partiality on one hand, and his Neglect on the other. But hearing he was in the midst of his Recreations at Newmarket, and not caring to interrupt him, with so ungrateful a thing as Business, he set out for Flanders the very next Day, as if it was not worth his while to throw away another. Tho' Kings are sometimes obnoxious to Contempt, it is very rarely shewn them: And when it is, they have not Philosophy enough to bear it: Even King Charles himself was touch'd to the Quick with this Proceeding of M. de Grana's, and complain'd of it to the Court of Spain; but, for aught appears, with as little Effect as the Spanish Ministers had made their Complaints from time to time in the Court of England.

The Marquis in the mean time, careless and fearless of the Success of his cavalier Behaviour, arriv'd at Brussels; kept the Secret of his Commission yet a Day longer: then all of a sudden produced it, seiz'd the Prince of Parma's Papers, and confin'd his two Secretaries, as also several others, suppos'd to be concern'd in the same criminal (or) Intrigues: Upon this, his Highness the late Governour thought it prudent to make his Escape; which he did to Cologne, leaving his Instruments to answer both for his ill Conduct and their own.

This was the State of Affairs abroad; and from hence it must be presum'd, that Lord Hallifax had his Concerts, as well as Lord Danby before him: And, from all that has been said concerning him, it is manifest, that his Interest with the King went no farther than his Compliances with his Mother's Pleasure: While gratifying his own Passions, in assisting to run down Lord Stafford, he had the Credit of leading the Pack; but when he turn'd against France, or wrestled with the Duke, or propos'd any Measure that might serve to give him some Credit and Countenance with the Party he had abandon'd, he found himself without Consequence: And yet, tho' he repin'd like a jealous Lover, and expostulated like an angry one, he still serv'd on, and thought one Favour overpay'd a thousand Neglects. It further appears, that either he was not always in the Secret of Things; or that, even with his Intimates, he endeavour'd to keep up his Credit, at the Expence of Truth. Thus Sir John Kersey informs us, That having had a long Conversation with his good Friend the Lord Hallifax, he found him to be of Opinion, "That the Duke had gain'd no great Ascendency over the King by his Journey from Scotland:"

Whereas

Whereas it is demonstrable, that now it was that the Duke took his Measures to have the whole Administration in his Hands, and the King gave way to it; possibly not so much to gratify his Brother's Ambition, as that he might undergo the Odium of all the violent things now to be done, while His Majesty reap'd the Advantage. It is true his Highness, after having receiv'd the Compliments of the City of London, and his own particular Corps, the (x) Artillery Company, set out once more for Scotland, and the Lord Hallifax appear'd again to be the Morning-star of the Court: But his Lustré was of no long Duration. The Duke, as we shall see, went only to put the Government into safe Hands there; and, by previous Stipulation, was immediately after to return with his whole Family, to revisit the North no more.

1682.
The Duke con-plimented by the University of Cambridge
iii. p. 294.)

There was yet another Incident, which, during his Stay in England, serv'd to manifest the Greatness of his Ascendancy: Of all the Honours which the Duke of Monmouth had held, none remain'd to him but his Peerage and Garter, and the Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge. While his Royal Highness was yet at Newmarket with the King, he was waited upon by Dr. Coga the Vice-chancellor, to congratulate his Return, in the Name of that learned Body; who, treading in the Steps of Dr. Gower before-mention'd, made no Scruple to declare, "That as, by his Royal Highness's good Conduct, the Government of Scotland, both in Church and State, had been settled in Peace; so they made no doubt, but that, under his Majesty, his Presence would have a great Influence in effecting the same here." And the Duke, in return, most graciously signify'd, "That he would ever stand by the Church of England as now established, and countenance the Members of it; as having seen by Experience, that they were the best Supporters of the Crown," &c. This is the Amount of what pass'd in public on this Occasion: And, as to what pass'd in private, it may be guess'd by the Event; for, immediately after, the King signify'd his Royal Will and Pleasure to the University, that they should chuse another Chancellor in the room of the Duke of Monmouth: Which they not only comply'd with, but afterwards displaced his (y) Picture also, which had been hung up with great Ceremony in their public Schools, and, with many Insults, publicly burnt it: Nor was this all; for, having elected the Duke of Albemarle in his room, their whole Body came to Town to install him, with all the Honours they could devise, that the Affront to their former Head might be render'd the more notorious.

But Temporizing was now the Fashion; and even Lord Hallifax himself condescended to keep these Reverend Flatterers in countenance, by following their Example: "Waiting this Day, May 22, says Sir John Reresby, on my Lord Hallifax, he told me, that the Day before, being Sunday, the Duke of Monmouth came to him after Prayers, and ask'd him, if it was true that his Lordship, as was reported, had advis'd the King in Council to issue out a Proclamation to forbid every body from keeping him company: And that he had answer'd, That he was not oblig'd to satisfy him, whether he had so advis'd his Majesty or not: And that the Duke reply'd, There would be no need of a Proclamation to prevent him from keeping his Lordship company, and that in another Place he would have said more to him; and so went away." Our Author proceeds to say, "That he offer'd his Lordship his Service on this Occasion; which he thought fit to decline, saying, That if it came to a Necessity of that sort, he would make use of somebody he did not esteem so much as he did me; but that, however,

(x) The Entertainment, says Mr. Echard, was manag'd with more than ordinary Pomp and Splendor; and after Dinner, upon his returning into another Room, great Numbers of the Citizens crowded in, and were admitted to kiss his Royal Highness's Hand.

In Opposition, as it were, to this Invitation, the Party most colour against Popery and the Duke's Succession, to shew and improve their Strength, appointed a Public Meeting, with a Sermon and a Dinner, as usual among particular Bodies and Societies; and they invited their Guests, upon a Ticket in the following Words: It being His Majesty's Will, by his Majesty's Proclamation, to deliver and preach his Majesty's Perjury, his Protestant Religion, and English Liberties, his Majesty's Letters, his Majesty's frequent Attempts of their Enemies, the Papists: In Testimony of Thankfulness herein, and for the preserving and improving mutual Love and Charity, among such as are lovable themselves, you are desir'd to meet many of the loyal Protestant Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, and Citizens, on Friday the 21st Day of this Instant April, 1682, at ten o'Clock, at St. Michael's Church in Cornhill, there to hear a Sermon, and from thence to go to Haberdashers Hall to Dinner; and to bring this Ticket with you. The Court, which daily grew more vigilant and jealous, soon discover'd the Matter, and publish'd the following Order of Council, dated April 19th: "Whereas the appointing of Public Falls and Thanksgivings in Matters of State, and belongs only to his Majesty by his Proclamation: And his Majesty's being so form'd, that in the City of London, Invitations have been made of great and unusual Numbers, by printed Tickets, one of which is herewith annex'd; his Majesty looks upon the same as an insolent Attempt, in manifest Derogation of his Right, and of dangerous Consequence. The Matter of the said Invitation being of a public Nature, and Manner of carrying it on, tending to Sedition, and raising Dissensions and Confederacies amongst his Subjects, against the known Laws and Peace of the Kingdom; his Majesty therefore, by the Advice of his Council, hath thought fit, and doth hereby strictly charge and command the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, as they will answer the contrary at their Peril, to take immediate and effectual Care to prevent and hinder the said Meeting, as an Unlawful Assembly. And all Sheriffs, Constables, and other his Majesty's Officers in the said City, are hereby commanded to be aiding and assisting therein.

(y) Which may serve to humble those who are so outrageous in their Insults against the Person, who, a little before this, had cut his Royal Highness's Picture in Gold-ball; even if there is no Truth in the following Passage, which is taken from the Preface to a Tract before-mention'd, call'd, A True Plot, Part II.

"With how much very Zeal hath the cutting and degrading the Duke of York's Picture been approv'd, in the vilifying the Dissenting Protestants, as if they were, like Tories, of such epicurean and revengeful Natures, that rather than be frustrated of all Revenge, they would rub an innocent Picture? The next Day after it was done, there was a grave German-Knave, that wears a beard, and thinks himself answer'd to a Don as the bell, who enquir'd of some Gentleman, whether they heard the News? No, said they; what News, pray? He said he, the Game is begun; the Wigs have hit upon the Duke's Picture. For this canonical Baner was nullified, for it was not a Protestation, but a Paper, that did it, in hopes to exasperate the King and his Royal Highness against the City, as appears from the cutting of Brady's, a Papist who own'd, that he was the Man that did it, before-mentioned White-fist, that have roven the figure; and he now stands bound over to answer for it next Sessions."

however, he did not think himself oblig'd to fight upon that account; tho' he should ever be ready to defend himself, while he wore a Sword by his Side.

An Order of Council fortitude, all in the King's Service to keep Company with the Duke of Monmouth.

The next Day a Council was held at Hampton-court; where, as soon as it was up, his Lordship told me, an Order had been pass'd to this Effect: "That, Whereas the Duke of Monmouth had been guilty of some threatening Speeches to a Member of that Board, in relation to something offer'd to his Majesty in Council; his Majesty considered the same as an unmannerly Insolence towards himself; and did therefore charge all his Servants, and all such as had a Dependence on him, not to keep company with, or frequent the said Duke of Monmouth for the time to come."

*The Lord Shaft-bury brings his Bill in Middlesex, against Craddock, Graham, &c.
for a Conspiracy.*

We must now pursue the War of Factions, as it was carry'd on in the Courts of Justice, and under the Banners of the Laws. And first the Lord Shaftbury, (with a severful Assurance, says Mr. Carte) for the Malcontents, brought Actions against one Craddock, for having laid he was a Traitor, and against Graham the Solicitor of the Treasury, and others, for having enter'd into a Conspiracy against his Life, by means of Subornation, &c. the Barbarity of which Proceeding Mr. North is very solicitous to set forth; alleging, That they acted but ministerially in the Affair; and that the Action being laid in Middlesex, to be try'd before an Ignoramus Jury, the Damages would have ruin'd twenty Persons, in Circumstances like theirs. But then he does not also reflect, that, upon all such Occasions, the Defendant is sure to be borne up on the Shoulders of the Government, to have all the Indulgences that can possibly be shewn him, and to be indemnity'd in the Issue, that others may not be deterred from going the same Lengths in the Service. - This appear'd almost in the first Instance of the Prosecution; for Craddock having been advis'd to move for a Change of the Venue or Venire, as the Lawyers call the Writ of Summons for a Jury, from London to some other County, that the Return might be fair and equal; a Day was appointed for the Hearing, at which the Earl himself attended; the Merits of the Case were thoroughly litigated on both sides; and, upon the whole Matter, the Court gave it as their unanimous Opinion, That it was not likely to be an indifferent Trial in the City; and therefore left it to his Lordship to levy his Action in any other County: Who thereupon openly declar'd, "That so many Counties having reflected upon him in their Addresses, he would not expect any Justice from them; and therefore he should withdraw his Action." And the Lord Chief-Justice retorted, That his Lordship's Resolution did greatly confirm the Opinion of the Court: That it ought not to be try'd in London; seeing his Lordship would not trust any other Jury in England with his Cause. Thus each Party criminated the other, and both were in the Right.

*But is avoided

Suit in some

Wilmer's Case.

Their barbarous Proceedings were not peculiar to the Malcontents; on the contrary, they were rather Reprizals than Precedents.

A. D. 1682.

The Law had been the Tool of Court-Persecution almost from the very Opening of the Reign; and several Instances have already been particulariz'd, in which it was shewn, that Men suffer'd for the Faults of their Parties, not their own: And as Graham, Craddock, &c. were pursu'd by the Law for conspiring against Lord Shaftbury, Wilmer, the Foreman of College's London-Jury, was pursu'd with equal Violence, for setting the Ignoramus Precedent in that Case, which had been made use of to acquit him: It seems this Man, as we have already seen, was either so peculiarly obnoxious, or it was held so peculiarly necessary to make an Example of him, in order to strike a Terror into future Juries, that a Process had been commenc'd against him for High Treason; in Consequence of which he had been committed to the Tower: But the Witnesses being blasted, who were to have supported it, and Pretences failing to bring it to the desired Issue, it became expedient to change the Attack, and ruin him by some other way. Wilmer was a Merchant, and had sent a Boy who had apply'd to him, and said he had no Friends, beyond Sea, by Agreement; to which the Mayor of Gravefend, his Clerk, who was an Attorney, and the King's Searcher of that Place, were Witnesses. In all the nice and thorough Disquisition that was made into Wilmer's Life and Actions, this, it seems, was the most culpable that could be laid to his Charge. And when the Boy's Friends, who were miserably poor, first appear'd against him, which was not till two Years after, he had offer'd to refer the whole Dispute to the Decision of the Lord-Mayor, Moor, who declar'd it to be his Opinion, That Wilmer had acted honestly, and offer'd fairly: Notwithstanding all which, an obsolete Law was put in force against him, which requir'd Body for Body; or in other Words, that Wilmer should be imprison'd till the Boy was produc'd. He was, besides, indicted for an Assault on the said Boy: And tho' he urg'd in Court, that the whole Prosecution was malicious; that one Carlton Beaumont, who was a Principal in it, had threaten'd to COLLECT him before he had done: And tho' he had unquestionable Evidence to produce in Proof of all he advanc'd, a Verdict was brought against him; which he himself, in the State he has given of his own Case, endeavours to account for in part, by saying, That of twenty reputable Witnesses which appear'd for him, scarce half were sworn; and several of them were not heard: And that though six of the most eminent Council had taken his Fees, they said as little as they could for him; and by insinuating, that he was the Scape Goat of his Party. Nor were his Pursuers content with the Advantage which the Laws, or rather the Persecution of them, had given them, they also triumph'd over his good Name; the very Gazette giving out, That the thing, upon a full and positive Evidence, appear'd very foul against him; the other Court Vehicles treating him, on all Occasions, as a profest'd Kidnapper: And even Mr. North, who is so extremely

A. D. 1688. tremely tender and sensible on one Side of his Heart, when not only the Animofities of thofe Times were almoft forgot, but the Abufes of them had undergone the Cenfure of the Legiflature, gravely pronounces on this very Cafe, "That if a Man will affrontoufly break the facred Truft of Juftice, in a Matter of Treafon againft the State, more like a Partizan than a sworn Enquirer, he muft expect the State will lay hold of him, if he be found in any Refpect obnoxious to the Law; And that a Man had need be a (20) Saint indeed, that praiftifes barefacedly againft lawful Authority."—So that all Authority, it feems, was lodg'd in the Breath of the Bench, and none in the Confcience of the Jury: And while all was Righteoufnefs on the Behalf of the Crown, all was flat Perjury, fo he represents it, on the Behalf of the Subject.

The ill Effects of this Proteftion and Verdict were, however, fo feverely felt before the End of the Year, and became fuch a Grievance to the Merchants, that, on their repeated Complaints, his Majesty, fingly, without the Coadjutorfhip of his Council, affum'd the Legiflature; and, in Imitation of his Brother of France, put forth an (*) Edict, fpecifying after what manner the Exportation of Servants fhould be carry'd on for the future; and that he would caufe all Suits to be ftopt which fhould be commenc'd againft thofe Perfons who had govern'd themfelves thereby.

But, neither was Wilmer the only State Warning-Piece to deter Men from making ufe of their Privileges for the Protection of each other. Wiltacre, who had alfo been charg'd with High Treafon, Aaron Smith, one Beil, and others, were alfo profecuted for feditious Words, and all found guilty. For even before the Shrieverly of Pilkington and Slute expired, the Ofentation of the Statute of Henry the VIIIth. as 'tis call'd by Mr. North, for reforming the Pannel, and the Terrors which had been let loofe againft the Sheriffs themfelves, as well as refractory Jurymen, had operat'd fo ftrongly, that the King was, in many Cafes, as well forc'd by the Juries as even by the Bench itfelf.

And, as if to render thefe Partialities yet more notorious, while they were in their full Outrage, Mr. Teyn was affaffinated in Palomall by certain Foreigners, who being under the Influence and Direction of Count Ceningfmark a noble Sweede, then in London, both he and they were apprehended, examin'd, committed, and try'd finally for their Lives at the Old Bailey, before Lord-Chief Juftice Pemberton; who, as it is manifefth thro' the whole Courfe of the Trial, appear'd as Council for the Count, led him by the Hand, as it were, thro' all the Turns and Doubles of the Law, and never quitted his Hold till he had plac'd him out of their Reach; by urging to the Jury, "That it did not appear he had given any Command or Direction to have the Murder committed: And that if a Gentleman had receiv'd an Affront, which he feem'd to refent, and any of his Servants officioufly took his Quarrel upon themfelves, and murder'd the Aggreffor, without his Knowledge, he was not answerable for their Actions, and ought to be acquitted." Whereas, according to Sir John Herwelefs, had he alfd two of the Affaffins, viz. Lieutenant Stern, and Borski the Polander, what they had to fay for themfelves; which is a Queftion of Right as well as of Courfe to be put to all Prifoners, they would have urg'd, as they did before their Trials, and after their Condemnation, That they had acted by the Directions of the Count; which would probably have induc'd the Jury to have found him guilty. And for want of this neceffary Impartiality, which Herwelefs's farther intimates, was purpofely avoided by the Court, the Principal escap'd, and his unhappy Inftruments fell a Sacrifice for having ferv'd him but too faithfully (a).

(a) As the Reader will find Sir John Herwelefs's Account of the Affair, in many refpects, the moft interefting of any extant, I have here infer'd it.

Feb. 12. At this time was perpetrated the moft heinous and audacious Murder that had almoft ever been heard of in England. Mr. Teyn, a Gentleman of 5000 l. per ann. and lately married to Lady Ogle, who, repeating herfelf to the Church-yard from him into Holland, before they were bedded, was fet upon by three Ruffians, who that him as he was going along the Street in his Coach. This unhappy Gentleman being much engag'd in the Duke of Monmouth's Caufe, it was fear'd that Party might put fome violent Conftriction on this Accident, the Doctors therein making their Efcipe juft for the Time, and being unknown. They arriv'd to be at Court that Evening, when the King hearing the News feem'd greatly concern'd at it, not only for the Honour of the Action itfelf, which was fhocking to his natural Difpofition, but alfo for fear of the Turn the anti-court Party might give thereto. I left the Court, and was juft ftepping into Bed, when Mr. Teyn's Gentleman came to me, to grant him an Hup-and-Cry; and immediately at his Heel comes the Duke of Monmouth's Page, to desire me to come to him at Mr. Teyn's Lodging, faying his Coach for me, which I made ufe of accordingly. I there found his Grace furrounded with feveral Lords and Gentlemen, Mr. Teyn's Friends, and Mr. Teyn himfelf mortally wounded with five Shot from a Bombard. I on the fpot granted feveral Warrants againft Perfons fufpected to have had a hand therein; and that Night put fome Intelligence concerning the Actors themfelves. At length, by the Information of a Chairman, who had carried one of the Ruffians from his Lodging at Heff-walton to the Black Bull, thre to take Horfe, and by means of a loofe Woman, who us'd to visit the fame Perfon the Coachmen found out the Place of his Abode, and there took his Man, by Nation a Sweede, who being brought before me, confefled himfelf a Servant to a German Captain, who had told him he had a Quarrel with Mr. Teyn, and had offer'd him to watch his Coach; and that particularly that Day, the Captain no longer underftood the Coach to be gone by, than he loofed himfelf, and with two others, a Sweede, Lieutenant and a Pol, went on Herwick, as he fuppofed, in quest of Mr. Teyn. Feb. 13. By the fame Servant I alfo underftood where poffibly the Captain and his two Companions were to be found; and having with the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Mortimer and others, searched feveral Lodges, as he directed us, all fit in the Morning, and having been in clofe Purfuit all Night, I poffibly took the Captain in the Houfe of a Sweede's Dwelling in Leinfeld. I went firft into his Room, believed by Lord Monmouth, where I found him in Bed, with his Sword at fome diftance from him on the Table; his Weapon in the full place fecured, and then his Perfon, committing him to two Coachmen. I wonder'd he fhould make to me a Submillion, for he was certainly a Man of great Courage, and appear'd quite unconcern'd from the very Beginning, who he was very certain he fhould be found the chief Actor in the Tragedy. This Gentleman had, not long before, commanded the forlorn Hope, at the Siege of Alton, when but two, besides himfelf, of fifty under his Command, escap'd with Life; and, in confideration of this Service, the Prince of Orange made him a Lieutenant of his Guards; and, in reward for the fame, the King of Sweden gave him a Troop of Horfe. But, to dift

One Captain Ayres was his Pilot, who was esteem'd the ablest of his Profession in those Seas; tho' his Skill, it seems, fail'd him him on this great Occasion; for if the Gazette Account deserves Credit, after he had (b) confidently affirm'd, that they had past all the Sands and Shoals; and in particular that known by the Name of the Lemon and Oar, the Gloucester, on board which the Duke himself was, struck on that very Sand; and after losing her Rudder, fill'd so fast with Water, that his Highness was forc'd to take to the Long-boat, with such of his Train as he thought worth saving. Mr. Edwards says, on the Authority of the Gazette, That he took as many of the best Persons with him into the Pinnace, as he could carry. Bishop Burnet, on the contrary, affirms, That he took care of some of his Dogs. And some unknown Persons, who from the Care that was taken of them, were believ'd to be his Priests (Mr. Churchill, afterwards so famous in our Story, was one of these unknown Persons) and that the Vessel would have held above 80 more: And the Writer of the Life of King James the Second, yet farther specifies, That several Persons, being Passengers, as well as common Seamen, who could swim, made up to the Boat; and, endeavouring to save them-no further on this, his two Accomplishers also were taken, and brought to my House, where before I could finish the several Examinations I had to go through, the King sent for me to attend him in Council, for that Purpose, with the Prisoners and Papers. His Majesty order'd me to give him an Account of the Proceedings hitherto, as well with regard to the apprehending of the Prisoners, as their Examination, and then examin'd them himself; and when the Council vote, order'd not to put every thing into Writing, and in Form, Spanish the Trial, which took me up a great Part of the Day, tho' I had got one of the Clerks of the Council, and another Justice of the Peace to assist me, both for the sake of Dispatch and my own Security, the Nicety of the Affair requiring it, as will, in the Sequel, appear.

Feb. 15. the Council met again, among other things, to examine the Governor of young Count Coningsmark, a young Gentleman then in Mr. Fisher's Academy in London, and supposed to be privy to the Murder. Upon this Occasion, the King first for me to attend in Council, where the said Governor confess'd, That the eldest Count Coningsmark, who had been in England some Months before, and made his Addresses to the Lady who is unfortunately married Mr. Thyns, arriv'd in London ten Days before the said Murder, and lay disguised till it was committed, gave great Cause to suspect, that the Count was at the Bottom of this bloody Affair; and his Majesty order'd me thereupon to go and search his Lodgings; which I did with two Constables; but the Count was absent; he went away betimes in the Morning of the Day after the Deed was perpetrated; of which I immediately gave the King an Account.

I several Times afterwards attended on the King, both in private and in Council, from time to time, to give him Information, as fresh Matter occurred or appear'd; and upon the whole it was discover'd, partly by the Confession of the Parties concerned, and partly by the Information of others, That the German Captain had been for eight Years an Inhabitant with Count Coningsmark, one of the greatest Men in the Kingdom of Sweden, his Uncle being at that time Governor of Pomerania, and near upon marrying the King's Aunt; and moreover, that during the Time he was in England before, he had made his Addresses to Lady Orela, the only Daughter and Heiress of the Earl of Northumberland, who had been marry'd to the deceased Mr. Thyns, and that the said Count had retained something as an Affair from Mr. Thyns: That the Captain, mov'd thereupon of pure Friendship to the Count, tho' not at all with his Privy, as pretended, had determin'd within himself to revenge his Cause, and that in consequence of such his Resolution the Murder happen'd: It appear'd also, that such his crafty Design was further'd by the Assistance of the Swedish Lieutenant, and the Page, who had been by his oblig'd to discharge the Illustrious into the Coach. I was extremely glad, that in this whole Business there was an English Person directly or indirectly concern'd; for the Princes had been'd it about, that the Design was chiefly against the Duke of Monmouth: So that I had the King's Thanks more than once, the Thanks of my Lord Hallifax, and several others, for my Diligence in tracing out the true Springs and Motives of this horrid Action, as well as the Actors themselves. The Duke of Monmouth had been out of the Coach above an Hour; and, by the Continuation of the Crosswind, I found they were not to have made the Attempt, if his Grace had been with Mr. Thyns.

Soon while it was discover'd, that Count Coningsmark was still in the Kingdom; and Search being made after him, he was met with alone in disguise at Greenwich, by a Servant of the Duke of Monmouth, just as he was stepping out of a Sculler, intending the very next Day to embark on board of a Swedish Ship. Being brought up to Towrs, the King immediately call'd an extraordinary Council to examine him. I was present upon this Occasion, and observ'd, that he appear'd before the King with all the Assurance imaginable. He was a fine Person of a Man, and I think his Hair was the longest I ever saw. He was very quick of Parts, but his Examination was very superficial; for which reason he was by the King and Council order'd to be, the same Day, examin'd by the Lord Chief Justice, the Attorney General, and myself; but he confess'd nothing of the Murder, pretending the Reason why he lay at this time concern'd to be, that he was then under Oath for a small venereal Distemper, and did not care to appear in public, till the Course of his Prescription was over; and that his going away in disguise, after the Fact was committed, was by the Advice of Friends, who told him it would reflect on him should it be known he was in England, when an Intimate of his labour'd under so violent a Suspicion of having committed to block a Deed; and that he endeavour'd to make his Escape, not knowing how far the Laws of his Land might for that very Reason involve him in the Gallies. But being at the King's Coach the Night after (Feb. 21.) I perceiv'd by his Majesty's Discourse, that he was willing the Court should get off.

A few Days afterwards (Feb. 26.) afterwards, Monfr. Swbert, who kept the Academy in London, came and desired me to put him in a way how to save Count Coningsmark's Life, insinuating to me, that as he was a Man of vast Fortune, he could not make a letter Ubi of it, than to support his own Interest, and build himself from the Edge of the Law, in a Foreign Country. I told him, that, if the Count was really innocent, the Law would naturally acquit him, as much tho' a Foreigner as if he was a Native; but that he ought to be cautious how he made any Offer to pervert Justice; for that it were to make all Men of Honour his Enemies, instead of gaining them to be his Friends. This was one of the first Business of Value ever offer'd to me, which I might have accepted without any Danger of Discovery, and without doing much for it: But my Opinion has always been, that what is so acquire'd is no Addition to our Store, but rather the Cause of its Waste, according to the Saying, Mais parer n'est de l'abandonner; I therefore rejected this, as I had done others before, and as I hope I shall always do for the time to come.

Bill's being found at Hick's Hall spirit the three Murders of Mr. Thyns, as principal, and against the Count, as accessory; they the next Day made their Appearance at the Old Bailey, where, after a Trial which lasted from nine in the Morning to five in the Afternoon, and a very vigorous Prosecution on the Part of Mr. Thyns's Relations, the three were brought in guilty as Principals, and the Count by the same Jury acquitted as not accessory; it being per indubitanter lingua, according to the Privileges of Stangers. I was the first that carry'd the News of this to the King, who from that time on was all disposition for it; but the Duke of Monmouth's Party, who appear'd to add Weight to the Prosecution, were extremely desirous that the Count had been acquitted.

March 10. the Captain, and the other two his Accomplishers in the Murder of Mr. Thyns, were, pursuant to their Sentence, hang'd in the Street where they had perpetrated the Crime. The Captain dy'd without any the least Symptom of Fear, or offering at the least Glance of Reflection on Count Coningsmark; and being me in my Coach, as he pass'd by in the Court, he made a Bow to me with the most friendly Countenance, as he did to several of my Spectators he knew, before he was turn'd off. In short, his whole Carriage, from the first Moment he was apprehended to the last that he resign'd his Breath, favour'd much of Gallantry, but not at all of Religion. Mem. p. 235. & seq.

(b) The same Account says, That his Opinion had not been follow'd the Day before; and that the Court had been alter'd by the Duke's express Command.

themselves on board her, had their Hands cut off; which, if true, was a Barbarity, that even Self-Preservation would hardly justify. But the Gazette is express, That when the Barge lay a-long-Side the Wreck, not one Man attempted to rush into her; but while sinking themselves, all thank'd God for his Highness's Preservation. Other Accounts say, They mann'd the Side in form, as on other honorary Occasions, and gave his Highness three Huzzas in going off, as the last Compliment they could pay him. This, however, is certain, that the Earl of Roxburgh, Mr. Hyde, a Brother-in-Law of the Duke's, the Lord O Bryan, the Laird of Hoptoun, Sir Joseph Douglas, Col. Macnaghten, and above one hundred and thirty more Persons went to the Bottom, before his Eyes. (Mr. Carte says 300 Seamen, besides those of his Highness's Retinue). Even the Captain, Sir John Berry, who had first warn'd the Duke of his Danger, and made the necessary Provisions for his Safety, was not of the chosen Few, but was left to the Care of Providence; and by the Help of a Boat from one of the other Ships, made a shift to escape. The Duke and his Party got all safe on board the Mary Yacht; and the unlucky Pilot, himself, was taken up at Sea; but then he was immediately thrown into Irons, and afterwards try'd for his Life; with what Issue, can scarce be ascertain'd: For according to Father Orleans, he was banish'd: According to the Biographer, just quoted, he was only committed to the Marshalsea Prison: According to Mr. Carte, he was hang'd: And according to an improbable (c) Tradition that has obtain'd among a few, he had his Life given him to prevent the Licence of a Dying Speech.

As to the real Motive or Necessity of the Voyage, which produc'd this tragic Incident, we are wholly in the Dark. Mr. Edward says simply, He had occasion to go; BURNET, that He went for his Duties: And, as to his apparent Business, it was only to appoint the great Officers of State, who were to act as his Delegates; to give his (d) Instructions; and to take his leave of that Govern-ment

(c) Pls. That the Day preceding the Wreck was a Day of Rice; that he was importun'd to quit his Bed, and take his Share in it; that he refusing, the Duke himself order'd him to leave the Deck; that, instead of drinking, he took to his Cabin, and, by the Information of a Pocket Companion, found, that the Ship's Counters was chang'd immediately, and directed for the very Sand, upon which she afterwards wreck'd.

(d) To this Effect: To preserve the public Peace, support the Church, and oblige all Men to live regularly in obedience to the Law. The Persons to whom this was more particularly entrusted were, the Earl of Helds, President of the Sessions, as Chancellor: the Earl of Passbury, as Treasurer; and the Earl of Perth, as Lord Justice-General: And the Comment upon this Text appears to be, as Bishop Barnet tells us, That the Proceedings against Conventicles were to be firmer than ever; and that the Firm for Officers of that Nature, which had hitherto never been cry'd, except on extraordinary Occasions, because held too exorbitant, should be levy'd without Exception. In consequence of which laudable Interpretation, the Chancellor laid down a Method for proceeding against all Offenders punctually; and the Treasurer took care to reap the full Benefit from it. Our Right Reverend Hierarch proceeds as follows: "When the People live free, they come all to Church again; and that, in some Places, where all Sermons had been discontinued for many Years; But they come in so awkward a Manner, that it was visible they did not mean to worship God, but only to stay some time within the Church-Walls; and they were either talking or sleeping all the while. Yet most of the Clergy seem'd to be transported with this Change of their Condition, and sent up many Panegyrics of the pious Services that the Duke had done their Church. The Enemies of Religion observ'd the Ill-nature of the one Side, and the Cowardliness of the other, and pleas'd themselves in censuring them both. And by this means an impious and atheistical Leaven began to corrupt most of the younger Sort. This has since that time made a great Progress in that Kingdom, which was before the freest from it of any Nation in Christendom. The Beginnings of it were reckon'd from the Duke's Stay among them, and from his Courts, which have been cultivated since with much Care, and but too much Success.

About the End of the Year, two Trials gave all People sad Apprehensions of what they were to look for. One Hume was charg'd, by a Kinsman of his own, for having been at Bethwell-Briggs. All Gentlemen of Estates were excepted out of the Indemnity: So he, having an Estate, could have no Benefit by that. One swore, he saw him go into a Village, and seize on four Arms: Another swore, he saw him ride towards the Body of the Rebels: But none did force that they saw him there. He was indeed among them: But there was no Proof of it. And he prov'd, that he was not in the Company where the single Witnesses saw him seize on Arms, and did evidently discredit him: Yet he was convicted and condemn'd on that single Evidence, that was so manifestly prov'd to be infamous. Many were sensible of the Mischeworthiness of such a Precedent: And great Applications were made to the Duke for saving his Life: But he was not born under a pardoning Planet. Lord Aberdeen, the Chancellor, prosecuted Hume with the more Rigour, because his own Grandfather had suffer'd in the late Times for bearing Arms on the King's Side, and Hume's Father, was one of the Jury that condemn'd him. The Day of his Execution was fix'd to be on the same Day of the Year on which Lord Stafford had suffer'd; which was thought to be done in compliment to the Duke, as a Retaliation for his Blood: Yet Hume's infamous Kinsman, who had so basely betray'd him, liv'd not to see his Execution; for he dy'd before it, full of Horror for what he had done. Another that went much deeper; and the Consequences of it track a Terror into the whole Country.

One Wile of Blackwood, that managed the Marquis of Douglas's Concerns, was accus'd of Treason, for having kept company with one that had been in the Business of Bethwell-Briggs. Blackwood pleaded for himself, that the Person, on whose account he was now prosecuted as an Abettor of Treason, had never been mark'd out by the Government by Treason, or Proclamation. It did not so much appear that he had ever suspected him upon that account. He had liv'd in his own House quietly for some Years after that Rebellion, before he employ'd him: And if the Government seem'd to forget his Crime, it was no Wonder if others enter'd into common Dealings with him. All the Lawyers were of opinion, that nothing could be made of this Prosecution: So that Blackwood imagin'd it was no great Application, thinking he was in no danger. But the Court consented to a strange Sentence in this Matter, by these Steps: They judg'd, that all Men who suspected any to have been in the Rebellion were bound to discover such their Suspicion, and to give no Harbour to such Persons: That the bare Suspicion made it Treason to harbour the Person suspect'd, whether he was guilty or not: That if any Person was under such Suspicion, it was to be presum'd that all his Neighbours should know it: So that there was no need of proving that against any particular Person, since the Presumption of Law did prove it: And it being prov'd that the Person with whom Blackwood had convers'd lay under that Suspicion, Blackwood was upon that condemn'd as guilty of High Treason. This was such a constructive Treason, that went upon so many unreasonable Suppositions, that it threw the Shamefulness of a Sort of Men, who had been for sixty Years declaiming against a parliamentary Attainder for a constructive Treason in the Case of the Earl of Strafford, and did more, in a common Court of Justice, condemn a Man upon a Train of so many Inferences, that it was not possible to make it look even like a constructive Treason. The Day of his Execution was set: And tho' the Marquis of Douglas wrote earnestly to the Duke for his Pardon, that was denied. He only obtain'd two Months Reprieve for making up his Accounts. The Reprieve was renew'd once or twice for so. Blackwood was not executed. This put all the Tories in a great Fright: Many knew they were as obnoxious as Blackwood was: And none could have the Comfort to know that he was safe. This revived among them a Design, that Lockhart had set on foot ten Years before, of carrying over a Plantation to Graveland. All the Presbyterian Party lay they were now deliberated of a main Part of their Enterprise, of changing their Representatives in Parliament: And upon that they said they would now feel a Country where they might live undisturb'd, as Freemen, and as Christians. The Duke encourag'd the Motion: He was glad to have many stonewall People sent far away, who he reckon'd would be ready upon the first favourable Conjecture to break out into a new Rebellion.

ment in Form. These, therefore, must be understood to have been his Occasions, for no other are instanc'd; and merely to amuse, was no longer worth his while: When he left Scotland last, seven of the Scottish Bishops had sent over Testimonials of his Zeal for the establish'd Church, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which had been made public by Authority: In the City, his Faction was in a fair way to carry all before them, and at Court his Will and Pleasure seem'd to be a Law.

There is yet another Circumstance which shews what great things had been concerted during his Highness's Stay in England, and how deeply he was concern'd both in the Contrivance and the Execution. Ireland, we are told by Mr. Carte, was in so quiet and happy a Condition, that the Duke of Ormond's Absence could now be dispens'd with: And, it seems his Wisdom and Reputation, his Loyalty and Disinterestedness, were thought of Importance for restoring Union to the Cabinet (that is to say, to balance the Power and Credit of the Earl of Hallifax) and accomplishing the several other momentous Points in View. He was, therefore, call'd upon early this Year, to attend the King's Service at Court: And, as we are expressly told, at the Instance of his Royal Highness, who, it seems, had need of him to keep his Majesty steady in the Measures he had begun to take, and in which, if he relax'd, we are further told, he would fall into a worse Condition than what he had been in before. The same Historian adding, "That the Duke was entirely of Opinion, that his Majesty had better never have attempted to assert his Authority, than after having gone so far in that way, to desist before he had establish'd it, and that so unsteady a Proceeding would make him more contemptible than ever."

This Way that the King was in, was plainly to subdue the Liberties of his Subjects, in order to subdue the Faction, which, taking the Advantage of his own Miscarriages, had made his Reign uneasy, and invaded the Succession: And the Measures he had pursued to this End were, by bringing a Quo Warranto against the Charter of the City of London, and other refractory Places; and by inducing the Pliant or the Timorous to surrender theirs as of their own mere Motions. In consequence of which Proceeding, it was expected, that the Malcontents would be for ever dispossest of their strong Holds in Parliament; and that, for the future, the King would be represented as well as, if not instead of, the People. Even Mr. North, who is most particularly anxious to justify this Measure, acknowledges, "That the Crown had need of a better Interest at that time than it had in the Choice of

Members, to maintain a due Balance, that an adverse Party might not carry every thing in their Model against the Crown; and asserts, That it was better if it had, or could have, been done thus, than by setting up new Boroughs, which the King might do at Pleasure." But this Gentleman, who is no Piddler, is not content to deal merely in Palliatives; but affirms roundly, "That there never was a Piece of more necessary Justice in the English State, or more beneficial to the People in general, than the prosecuting those Quo Warranto's was: And to shew there was absolute Need of it, says he, (for it is fit to give his own Words) I affirm also, that the just Overture was not from the Court, nor from such black Designs, as Libellers have suggested, but from the Counties where the Abuses were a Grievance insufferable; And, for redress of them, the Gentlemen of the Counties apply'd to the King, by such Means as they had. The Mischief lay in Towns that had Justices of their own, with a Clause that the Justices of the Country ne intromittant; so, by excluding the Country Justices, they were become the ordinary Asylums for all Sorts of Rogues that fled from the Justice of the Sessions, and particularly those that were tumultuous and seditious, and there found Protection. And, particularly, the Town of Paul in Dorsetshire was of this Order; and, if I mistake not, Taunton Dean another. Others there were in the West of England complain'd of; and so much in earnest, that the Grand-Juries in Dorsetshire and Devonshire, or one of them (for I do but just recollect some Particulars) presented these Places as common Nuisances. And, upon the Application of the Gentlemen to the Judges of Assize, the Matter was laid before the King, and Quo Warranto's ordered to be prosecuted against the chief of them. And, upon that, some were reduced; others, knowing themselves to be obnoxious, submitted; and then their Charters came to be surrender'd, and new ones granted in lieu of them: In which no Alterations were made, but such as respected the Law, and the good Government of the Country; such as laying the Towns open to the Justices of the Counties, if they found Cause to interpose there, and to act with the Justices of the Place, and sometimes to be of the Body, and capable of the Offices of Authority in the Corporations. And if any honest Englishman can be of opinion that such Changes were not much for the better, especially as to divers factious, or rather mercenary, Corporations, I must crave leave to differ from him. And this Method was observ'd in most Instances of that Reign, without any of the hideous Characters which the Faction, now in our latter Times, have bestowed

Some Gentlemen were sent up to treat with the Patentees of Carolina: They did not like the Government of those Plantations, as they were call'd: Yet the Prospect of so great a Colony obtain'd to them all the Conditions they propos'd. I was made acquainted with all the Steps they made; for those who were sent up were particularly recommended to me.

In the Negotiation this Year there was no mixing with the Malcontents in England: Only they who were sent up went among them, and inform'd them of the Oppressions they lay under: in pursuance of the Tenure with which this Sentence against Blackwood had struck them all." Vol. I. p. 324, 325, 326.

stowed upon it. And I limit this Division of a laudable Proceeding, WITHOUT ANY ABUSE AT ALL, until the Time that Sir George Jeffreys was made Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and sworn of the Privy Council, which let him into the Means, as his Way was, to push things beyond their due Bounds."

It will at first Sight occur to every dispassionate Reader, that this is a partial State of the Case, and that Policy was abundantly more concern'd in it than Reformation. We have already seen, that Applications to Court were the Result of Applications FROM Court; and that Grand-Juries and Justices were no better than State Puppets, which articulated as they were inspir'd: And that the whole Affair should arise merely from an Abuse of Justice (which, by the way, means no more than the shewing mercy to the Persecuted) in minor Corporations, as Mr. North so peremptorily asserts, can never be admitted by those who consider, 1. That in the great Cause of the London Charter no such Precedence was, or could be, assign'd. 2. That Mr. North himself allows, This great City was among the earliest that were question'd at Law for Forfeiture. 3. That probably it was the first proceeded against; for these Reasons, viz. It was the most obnoxious Place in the Kingdom: It was the strong Hold of the Malcontents: The 2<sup>o</sup> Warrant was brought against it in Hilary Term, 1631; we meet with no Instance of any such Proceeding before that time. And, 4. That over and above the particular Case of London, or such other Prosecutions as were grounded generally on the Presentments before-specified, another Practice obtain'd; of inducing Corporations to surrender their Charters, either as a Manifestation of their unbounded Loyalty, or for fear a worse thing should befall them; for the Court-implements carry'd on their Work either by Blandishments, or Terrors, or both, according as both or either bid fairest to answer their Purpose.

It is moreover certain, that this Practice of enforcing the Merit of making his Majesty a free-will Offering, and the Dread of incurring his Vengeance, were brought into play at the very same Instant of Time that these Corporation-Suits were first commenced; and long before any one of them was brought to a Hearing, much less to a Decision.

To make this apparent by Facts: In the very Beginning of February 1631-2, the Mayor of Hereford, as we learn from a Paper call'd, The Proceedings of the Citizens of Hereford, set forth by themselves, convenes a Common-council, which consists in the whole of Thirty-one Persons: Nineteen of them met; and his Worship gives them to understand, That he was inform'd a 2<sup>o</sup> Warrant was issu'd against their Charter: That, for his part, he would not contend with the King: That if he should hear any more concerning it, he would let them know: And that, in the mean time, they would do well to consider of what he had said. Having then agreed on a thundering Abhorrence against Lord Shaftsbury's Association, they separated. On the 24th of the same Month, the Mayor convenes his worthy Associates again: Twenty-one obey the Summons, to whom his Worship communicates a Letter from a Person of Honour, (so he is call'd) signifying, "That a Charge was actually laid against their Charter; that several Breaches were specify'd; and that the King was urg'd to grant a 2<sup>o</sup> Warrant; but that his Majesty had refus'd to do so, till he had first been inform'd, whether the Citizens of Hereford would trust to his Beauty and Clemency, rather than stay till they were so attack'd. The Result was, that with one Voice, these worthy Elders resolve to renounce their Charter, as had been requir'd, and to throw themselves on his Majesty's Goodness for a new one. Accordingly the Mayor, by Deputation, accompany'd by four other Persons, takes a Journey to London, and upon his Knees, March 2, made the Surrender into the King's own Hand; who was pleas'd to accept it with particular Expressions of Pleasure and Acknowledgment. They had soon after a new Charter, but dock'd in some Particulars,

But whether these Gentlemen had the Honour of being the first Betrayers of their Trust, is out of our Power to determine: Whether they had, or not, their Zeal was far surpass'd in Circumstance, if not in Time, by the Mayor and a Part of the Corporation of Nottingham, as will appear from the following Brief of the Case.

It was a Part of the Common-Oath of the Mayor, Council, and Burgesses of this Place, That they the Franchises of the said Town would maintain and sustain with their Bodies, their Goods and their Chateles to their Power, without Regard of any Man. When, therefore, it became the common Discourse in the Beginning of the Year, that the Mayor and his Cabal had entertain'd a Design to compliment those in Power with their Franchises which they were sworn to defend, certain Burgesses of the opposite Party in Easter Term caus'd four Carrots to be enter'd against it, viz. two before the Lord Chancellor, and two before the Attorney-General: And thus the Matter rest'd till July the 25th, when the Mayor call'd a Council, without any Specification, unless to his own Partisans, of the Business to be agitated, but a Question for the Surrender of their several Charters. It seems there were six Aldermen present, who by a Decision of the Judges and Lords of the Privy Council, in 1605, were declar'd incapable of voting in Council, but who had however of late made a Shift to break thro' that Regulation. Among these Aldermen, there was also one de Facto who had been sworn in by the Mayor against another Person who had near twice as many Votes, and which had given rise to a Suit that was yet undecided. As soon, soon, therefore, as his Worship had put the Question, the opposite Party put in their Protest against the Votes of the Aldermen in general, and of this last in particular; but without Effect. The Mayor follow'd his Instructions, and proceeded to take the Poll; which appear'd on the Issue to be exactly equal in Numbers; the Mayor, four Aldermen, and nine Burgesses voting for the Surrender; one Alderman and thirteen Burgesses against it; and one Alderman refusing to vote at all. Thus, it was manifest, there could be no Decision on the Court Side; yet such was the Heroic Resolution of the Mayor, that he produc'd an Instrument, containing a formal Surrender of the said Charter, caus'd the Corporation Seal to be affix'd to it; and return'd it to the Earl of Hullifax, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, into whose Hands, it seems, it was, thereby, provided, that the said Surrender should be made. It fortun'd that, on a Review, this Instrument was deem'd insufficient; and another was order'd in its room. Of this Incident, the opposite Party took the Advantage, apply'd to Council, and, having collected their whole Possé, consisting of three hundred and sixty Burgesses, who all sign'd a Paper expressing their Dissent to, and Disapprobation of, what the Mayor had done, as also their Resolution by all lawful ways to defend their Privileges, solemnly deliver'd the same to his Worship on the 4th of August, in the Presence of several Gentlemen of Quality: Nor did they stop here, but enter'd other Caveats in the Lord Privy-Seal's and the Signet-Office; and also caus'd a Petition to be laid before the Lord Chancellor, setting forth their Case and praying to be heard before such a surreptitious Surrender should be accepted of. This Petition was presented August 10; and as if in contempt of it, on the 12th, the Mayor the second time affix'd the Town-Seal to the said Surrender, with this aggravating Circumstance, that it was done clandestinely, he having forc'd open a (J) Lock to get at it; and on the 14th it was presented to his Majesty, as we learn from a (G) Paper set forth by the said Burgesses, on the 21st following.

The Mayor of Nottingham does the like, contrary to the express Sense of the Burgesses.

These two Influences are sufficient to shew, that the Crown-Proceedings in this Matter, were not so LAUDABLE, and wholly free from Abuse, as Mr. North would have it believ'd: And to cut off all Cavils as to the Limitation of Time set by him, it is fit the Reader should, in this Place, be told, that Jessays was not made Lord Chief-Justice till September 29, 1683.

Yet farther, that this whole Affair took its Rise in the Cabinet, that it was prosecuted with the whole Weight of ministerial Power and Influence, and that the Courtiers made a Merit of diving it on for Ends of their own, the Mention that has just been made of the Earl of Hullifax, and Sir Leoline Jenkins in the Nottingham Job very sufficiently shews:

And Sir John Relfey, moreover, furnishes us with a Corollary that puts it out of Dispute: For, having given us to understand, that he had been appointed Governor of York, thro' the Interest of the Earl of Hullifax, he farther intimates, that, going to take Leave of his Patron, his Lordship gave him such Directions for his Behaviour in the North, as in common political Prudence, he thought fit to conceal; and then proceeds to say, "That the City of York had been more noted than most Places in England for the Height and Virulence of Faction; but that after I had been there some time, finding some of the Leaders willing to abate of their Warmth, I engaged myself in some private Discourse with Mr. Alderman Ramsden, one of the most extraordinary of the whole Fraternity, and so well explain'd to him the Danger they were in, if they did not shew some speedy Signs of Remorse and Repentance for their former Behaviour, That he confess'd himself sensible of Errors committed upon several Occasions, viz. in that they had so often perished in their Choice of such Members as they knew to be quite ungrateful to the King; in that they had so unhandomely receiv'd the Duke of York when he pass'd through their City, in his way to Scotland; and in that they had petition'd for a Parliament, but never address'd or obsequ'd. But that after all he was afraid their Offences were too enormous to be pardon'd, upon a Consideration less than the Surrender of their Charter, which they did not know how to think of. I then asked him what he thought the City might be persuaded to do by way of some Attonement: To which he answer'd, They might be brought to do three Things if they might be accepted. First, To lay aside Alderman Thompson, a peevish Antimonarchical Fellow, to whom it fell of Course to be Lord Mayor the next Year, provided his Majesty would, by Letter, command them so to do. Secondly, To chuse a new High Steward, and to offer the Honour to his Royal Highness, in lieu of the Duke of Buckingham, whom they would put out, or in case his Highness should refuse it, to his Lordship of Hullifax; and, Thirdly, to elect better Members for that City, when Occasion should offer. These three things, he said, were feasible, might they be thought sufficient.

I immediately gave notice of this our Conversation to my Lord, now Marquis of Hullifax, who in a few Days sent me for Answer, That tho' he approv'd of the setting aside of Thompson from being Lord Mayor, he could by no Means think it safe to venture the King's Letter upon it, to the Corporation; except the Success of the Attempt were actually certain; and especially as things were in so very fair a way above, particularly with regard to the Legis Warranto against the City Charter, which if it succeeded, every other Corporation would Practices in the City of York.

(J) Thus under the Custody of Three, it seems; which were never to be open'd but in Council.

(G) Concluding with these Words: "This is the true State of the Burgh of Nottingham, who are ready to make good every Matter of Fact as herein stated, wherever there shall be Occasion; and doubt not but to prove it, if they may either be heard upon their Petition, or Copied." Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xxi.

be oblig'd to truckle; and that should the King's Letter not meet with the propos'd Effect, it would rebound back again upon the Court, and be an Encouragement to the other Party. That as for their chusing his Highness to be their High Steward, he judg'd it improper and unfit upon many Accounts; and as for himself, he was willing to put himself upon the Issue of what they propos'd, provided it did not seem to be his own Request, and that it should appear he had a considerable Number of Friends and Wellwishers therein, tho' the Event itself should not answer."

These are Sir John Rivers's own Expressions, and from these it is impossible not to conclude, That Sir John's Conversation with the Alderman was in virtue of the Directions he had receiv'd from his Patron; more especially, as we shall find, that the same Purviuit was never given over till it became visible that the Citizens, by no kind of Practice would be prevail'd on to resign their Charter, and then a Quo Warranto was serv'd upon them, as will be again touch'd upon in its proper Place.

But the Over-Zeal, and Over-Activity of the great Men of these Times to put the whole Power of the Kingdom in the Hands of the King, which to us appears so highly blameable, were then, it seems, consider'd as the highest Merit of the Subject: And it is not without Amazement, that we see even the Duke of Ormond, himself, acting up to the full Expectations of his Royal Highness, by laying his Shoulder to the Work, and labouring with all his Powers and Faculties to put the King in a Condition to trample all Opposition under foot, without one Reflection, for aught that appears, That he withal put him in a Condition to trample both on Law and Justice too. His own Historian makes use of these Words,

"A Quo Warranto had been brought by the Attorney-General against the City-Charter, and though it appear'd plainly enough from the Pleas of the City, that the Charter would be overthrow'n, yet Judgment could not be obtain'd till after the City-Officers for another Year were choic'd; and what might be attempted in that time, was much to be apprehended. The Lord Lieutenant's (the Duke of Ormond) Reputation was of infinite Service to the Crown in this Juncture; and his (B) Return to Ireland was desir'd till this important Point was settled. He exerted all his Interest and Credit on this Occasion; and, as he says in one of his Letters, Never Man underwent a greater Fatigue than Mr. Goswold his Secretary did, for several Weeks together, on that Account. Sir John Moor, the Lord-Mayor at that time, was a very honest Man, but timorous in some Cases, and doubtful of exerting his Authority. The Duke of Ormond was the Person that inspir'd him with Courage; he generally din'd with him twice or thrice a Week during the Contests which now happen'd, and was (i) the only Person about Court employ'd on those Occasions."

It is remarkable, that both Parties agree, that the very Being of the Constitution was concern'd in the Issue of these Disputes: But then they differ d widely in the Application of that sacred Word; one meaning the Head, and the other the Body: Whereas, in truth, the Idea is never complete, but when both are understood; and the Constitution is equally affected by any Injury done to either. Which was the least mischievous of these Mistakes, it is hard to determine. The Loyalists urge, That every thing was to be dreaded from the City, under the Direction it had till then continu'd: The Malignants, That every thing that was to be dreaded actually took place, when the King, by the Help of one Part of his Subjects, maiter'd the other.

To proceed to the Facts themselves: The great Struggle was for the Magistracy of London: And the first remarkable Trial of Strength, to fill up the Vacancy of an Alderman in the very Ward where the Earl of Shaftsbury liv'd; which went in favour of the Court, against all the Efforts of the opposite Faction. But the main Point of all was, to recover the Lord Mayor's (A) Right of appointing one of the Sheriffs, by the Ceremonial of drinking to him; which had been faintly asserted by Clayton in 1680, and over-rul'd by the Spirit of the Times. We are told by Mr. North, that the Court was first admonish'd of that Expedient from the City:

"But, after it had been communicated to the King, says he, and well consider'd by those about him, it was well approv'd; and a Resolution was taken to put it in Execution, and, if possible, to carry it through. And the King was so sensible of his Safety and Interest in the Consequence, that he resolv'd by himself to prove my Lord-Mayor, (on whom all depended) and if he complied, to take care the Law should defend him in it, as all agreed they would do. And, for other Disorders, if any happen'd, that he would not be unprovided to assist the Government, and to keep Peace in the City. The Lord-Mayor had been before press'd by divers of the Citizens, to do it of himself; but he was scrupulous and doubtful, and would determine nothing. At length he was sent for by the King, and, in his Majesty's Presence, divers of the Council, and the Attorney-General, explain'd his Power to him, that he might nominate one Sheriff, as the Custom

(A) It should rather have been said, in my humble Opinion, that he was sent for blither to assist in settling it, as hath been hinted already.

(B) Fagun names Sir Leoline Jenkins, as a very busy Conductor in the same Cause: And it is proper to observe, in this Place, that tho' he is accus'd by the Courtiers of having inserted many Lies at Lines in his Book, he also affirms, that several of the Confessors were always at the Mayor's House, to keep him in heart: which is partly warranted by this very Passage. He also names Jessop, as another of the Court-Emulators; and in this he is warranted by Mr. North, who moreover makes the Lord Chief-Justice North one of those appointed to be in the City on the Day of Election.

(C) See p. 502, 503, where there is a Brief of the Pretensions on both Sides.

(68.) Custom of the City was, though some of his immediate Predecessors thought fit to waive it. And the King himself encourag'd him, with Expressions not only of Protection but Command; and, at last, after much Hesitation, he determin'd roundly to conform; and, all at once, promis'd the King to send his Cup to any Citizen his Majesty should nominate to him. He was slow, but sure; and what with his Judgment that the City was in such a State that a Regulation was become necessary, and what with the King's Promise to stand by him, together with the concurrent Advice of his Court of Aldermen, who were his regular Council, he contracted a Firmness of Mind to pursue his Point; and he made it good; but with many an hard Rub and Difficulty emerging, that Faction stirr'd up against him, as may be readily imagin'd by those who know the Humour of abused Popularity.

Difficulty to find a Person to hold.

This Difficulty over, another sprang, as hard to accommodate; and that was to find a wealthy and reputable Citizen, who, being drunk to, would not fine off, but hold under that Method of Appointment. The taking one of a low Senic, and to support him, would look treacherous; and, at that time, the Court would use no Means but what were legal, justifiable, and reputable. Divers Citizens were spoken to upon this account, with Assurance that nothing extraordinary would be required, but the Year would pass in the usual Forms and Feasting, and all Business of the Law would fall of course into the Hands of the Under-officers, as formerly had been the Usage. Many were not only willing, but desirous, to have stood, if it might have been, as they alleg'd, with Safety. But they were told, that my Lord Mayor had no Right to make a Sheriff, but the Common-hall only; and whoever should stand upon his Title would be involv'd in Law-suits, and moreover be complain'd of in Parliament; and what would come of that they could not tell; and, not caring to stand in hazard of so much Trouble, they desir'd to be excus'd. The Occasion of this Scrupulousity was the Behaviour of the Faction, who, in pursuit of their Designs, never breathe any thing moderate. For as soon as they found my Lord Mayor would exert his Power by drinking, and all their Applications to divert him fail'd, although us'd with all the Form, and in all the Shapes, of Menace as well as Flattery, whereby they were prodigiously surpris'd; then they wound up their whole Party and Interest in and about the City, and charged them with the most horrible and long-bear Denunciations they could invent and put in Words, to deter all Citizens from holding on that Foot. And, accordingly, they went bellying about into all Companies, and Places of promiscuous Resort, Persons, Estates, all rush'd to Perdition; Hanging was the mildest Word came out of their Mouths; Law, Parliament, knocking of Brains out, Hell and Damnation, (Mr. North's Words) if they might presume so far, were to be the certain Fate of any one who should dare to stand against the City, as they call'd it; but, distum factum, Ruin, in a word, was to follow: And, to do them Right, they honestly meant as they said.

While these Intimidations ran high, the Court at a loss for a good Man, the Citizens busy as Bees, some persuading others, but none inclin'd to stand, every one wanting Courage to bear the Brunt; Sir George Jefferys the Recorder, or, through him, some of the Citizens, insinuated, that the Lord Keeper North's Brother (he was so as yet) a Turky Merchant, lately arriv'd from Constantinople, and settled in London, rich, and a single Person, was every way qualify'd to be Sheriff at this time, in case he could be prevail'd with to stand, as they hop'd might be done by the Lord Keeper's Means, if he would endeavour to persuade him. This extremely took with the King, and soon set him at ease; for he found no formalising Scruples on the Lord Keeper's Part, and, as for the Citizen, he was made to (1) understand, that there was no hazard at all, and also, what an Advantage such an Opportunity was, to oblige a King, who had Power to gratify by Employments any fit Person, such as he was, to much greater Profit in consequence, than all his extraordinary Charges; as also, that it was not a small Matter to gain so much Honour and Repute with the Best of the City, as well as Court and Country, as the standing stoutly in this Gap would procure him.

These were Arguments of Weight, and had their full Effect: And Matters being thus concert'd, the Lord Mayor lent his (m) Cup in full Parade and Form to Mr. North. This was no sooner known, but all the (n) Artillery of the Faction was pointed at him, in order

Mr. Dudley North pitch'd upon, and how his Acquaintance and Qualifications.

(1) In the Lord Keeper North's Life, p. 160, 170, 171, we have a more circumstantial Account of the King's Application in the Family of the Norths, and of the Lord Chief Justice's Arguments for inducing his Brother to comply with it, in this Year: The King ask'd the Lord Chief Justice, with much Tenderness, Whether it would be too much to give him the Sheriff, Mr. Dudley North, to hold Sheriff on the Lord Mayor's Drinking? The Chief Justice undertook to propose the Matter to him; and, in fact, made it a Point to persuade him to Compliance: He said First of the Business, Is my Brother, was to make Sir Dudley North (to be plain) the most pretentious Justice of his Interest in complying with the King. His Lordship made use of many Arguments to show how fairly the Lord Mayor might nominate, and how honourably it might serve:— But still the Point was, What it would signify to him, to bear a tedious Feasting, and spend two or three thousand Pounds to purchase it? And thus the Affairs hang, we are told, for a Day Near. LVIII or two, till the Chief Justice vanish'd all his Scruples by saying, "Here, Brother, take a thousand Pounds to help make good your Decision; and if you never have Opportunity, by Accident or Employment, so to reimburse you and me, I will lend my Share; else I shall be content to receive this thousand Pounds out of one half of your Pocket, when they come in; and otherwise not at all." Thus the two Brothers became joint-adventurers; and we shall find they made us so small Adventurers.

(n) According to ancient Custom, when the Party pitch'd upon was chosen.

(14) Which is thus explain'd by Mr. North: "Most of the Eminent Men in the City that had Acquaintance with him, especially his Brother of the Turky Company, who were too much that Way, took their Opportunities, more or less, to expostulate in Discomfort with him, saying, Why would he be undone? For if you, and they, take this Office upon you, upon this (or that) delusive Title, you would order to testify him from serving, and to induce him to fine off. But all, it seems, had no Effect; he knew his Ground, and was resolv'd to make the most of it: And, as well to put off all farther Importunity, as to intimidate the Adversary Party, he not only gave Bond to serve, but occasion was taken to call him Sheriff-elect, in the Gazette, before the Day of Election was come.

However, instead of being intimidated, they became desperate, and resolv'd to abide all Extremities.

This appear'd on the first naming of Mr. North; who was droll'd upon, as being the more fit for the Court-purposes, because just arriv'd from Turkey; and yet more remarkably, on the Lord Mayor's issuing out his Precept for the Meeting of the Liveryes, for therein it was express'd, That the said Meeting was to be held, not for the Choice or Election of Sheriffs, but for Confirmation of the Person who hath been by me chosen to be one of the Sheriffs, (these are the very Words of the said Precept) and for the Election of the other of the said Sheriffs: Much warm Discourse immediately ensu'd; and some Divisions in the Companies; some issuing out their Summons to their Members, To meet and chuse Sheriffs, &c. as anciently; others, after the Court-fashion, For Confirmation and Election: and some only For electing City-officers: These various Proceedings, on the Lord Mayor's Precept sufficiently shew'd the Disorders like to follow: And, by way of Prevention, a Court of Aldermen was held on June the 22d; when, after some Debate, Sir George Treby, the Recorder, was call'd upon to give his Opinion; which was, That the Right of electing both the Sheriffs lay in the Livery; and that the Sheriffs pro tempore were Judges of the Poll, if any should arise, and in which (we find it expressly (e) asserted, that) The whole Court acquiesc'd: And, in consequence thereof, some of those Companies which had sent forth Summons for Confirmation, and Election, sent forth others for Election only.

Hence it was natural to think, that the Court-project had burst like a Bubble in their Hands; and that the Malcontents would have had the Benefit of Juries, as before: But whether this seeming Accordance to the Recorder's Opinion was only a Feint to lay the adverse Party asleep; or whether the Court-Agents again induced the Lord Mayor to go thro' with his first Engagement; both Parties made their Murmurs the next Day, as determin'd Opposites; and repair'd to the Place of Replezvous, equally resolv'd to carry their Points by any means whatever. The Court, not satisfied with setting up the Lord Mayor's Claim to appoint one Sheriff, were also come to a Resolution to push for both: With this View, Mr. Bank, formerly mention'd, was coupled with Mr. North; that is to say, the one for Election, and the other for Confirmation: And on the contrary, the Malcontents were resolv'd to admit of neither, and to chuse for themselves; having already been pre-engag'd by their Leaders for Popillon and Dubois, who had both distinguish'd themselves by a long, open, and violent Opposition to the Court, and more particularly by the Part they had taken against the King's Witnesses, when they serv'd on Lord Staffbury's Jury.

This was the Posture of things when Midsummer-day came, when, as we are told by Mr. North, the Malcontents, who took care to be first on the Spot, in a manner fill'd the Hall with their Numbers, inasmuch that the adverse Party were scarce able to wedge their Way in. The Difficulty produced violent Strivings, loud Clamours, and much Confusion: The Floor from the Hoopings seem'd pav'd with Faces, at once full of Expectation, convuls'd with Pain, and enflam'd with Rage. This was the Scene till the Lord Mayor and Court were seated: And then, the Question of Confirmation being first put, the Hall rung with a thundering Negative: Upon which his Lordship, and his Part of the Court, retir'd to deliberate what was to be done next, and came to a Resolution to try the Experiment again; but still with no better Success than before. All things being thus at a stand, the Mayor again withdrew; and the leading Citizens of both Sides follow'd, to lingate the Matter before him, which they had leave to do; but, instead of clearing, puzzled the Cause more than ever: His Lordship was then advis'd by one Side to adjourn the Hall; but was told by the other, in conformity to the Opinion of the preceding Day, That he had no Authority to do so, till the Business of the Day was clos'd. This rais'd a new Dispute: All the Aldermen but five or six (for no more, 'tis said, were factious) were now for adjourning: But a Motion being made to have the Matter argued by Council, it was agreed to; and till proper Persons could be found to Juncture the necessary Matter to authorize the L. Mayor's Decision, the Attention of the Court was taken up with the Complaints of the two Parties.

know an End of Lewin's, and by crush'd by the Parliament to last, and what Safety can you propose to yourself? His Answer w'd be, I am a Christian Jew, and if the Government of this City will not upon Oath, I'll stay, and never break my Head about Titles. He was flood with Penny-well Letters, and so were his nearest Friends and Relations. They came all out of pure Friendship and Respect, wishing those Persons would interpose to reduce him from inevitable Ruin. They were to malicious to find out Sir Robert Cross at Bristol, Father of the Lady Grey, whom for that counsel, and wrote to him, to let him know that his Daughter was going to show herself away upon a Man of a desperate Fortune, and that would certainly be hang'd; and he returned it, but the Lady knew better; so, by virtue of his good Stars, that blow mis'd its Effect. And what was most extraordinary was that, during all the Time of the Brigades in the City concerning him, and both Town and Country ring of his Name, which was still loudly about it, he profess'd to be quiet, he went about his Business, and disturb'd himself, just as he w'd in 1671, and mis'd the Shy for more than 1000. If they had not courted him. He was, by common Talk and Rumour, made to remarkable, that, whenever he went, People stirr'd out of the way, looking at him, and crying, That's he. All which did not hurt him within doors, or from his ordinary Walks. Which terming shortly, he had Letters and Intelligence, that he was dead, a dull news, and his Name should be blotted out of the Commons.

Parties, who mutually accus'd each other of Outrages and Irregularities. "This was Midsummer's Work indeed, says Mr. North, extreme hot and dusty, and the Partizans frangely disorder'd every way with crowding, bawling, sweating, and Dust: All full of Anger, Scandal and Filth in their Faces, they ran up and down Stairs; so that any one, not better inform'd, would have thought the Place rather a huge Bedlam, than a Meeting for civil Business: And yet, under such an awkward Face of Affairs as this was, the Fate of the English Government and Monarchy depending." — At last the Council arriv'd; Mr. Pollifson for the Malcontents, and the Attorney-General for the L. Mayor; the first of whom, according to the decisive Author just nam'd, talk'd nothing but obscure Nonfenses, and consequently stood self-confuted: But this, it seems, the Court could not discern, till the Attorney shew'd it to them; and then, as if inspir'd, the Lord Mayor rose up, suddenly and unexpectedly, his Discourse having been in vain us'd to deter him, order'd the Officer to take up the Sword, and go down into the Hall, laying most heroically as he went off, If I live, I die: Then passing through the Crowd, by whom a terrible Rage of Faces was made at him, he took his Seat on the Hutings, and directed the Common-Serjeant to adjourn the Court, which he did, but in the midst of such an Uproar, that scarce any body heard him: After this, his Lordship and his Party (p) quitted the Hall; and the Sheriffs, in contempt of the Adjournment, by themselves, and of their own Authority, which they presum'd was sufficient, held on the Assembly, and proceeded with the Election, by setting up a Poll; which, we are told, was the most vindictive Blunder that ever was known, and whar could be made good by nothing but Sword in Hand.

This is the Substance of Mr. North's State of this remarkable Transaction, with an Intermixture of his peculiar Expressions; and by this we are to understand, that the Lord Mayor never departed from the grand Point, That the Hall should confirm his Sheriff, before he would permit them to elect their own. But if there is any Truth in the several Papers publish'd in the midst of this famous Contest by the Leaders of the malcontent Party, which were of course to pass into every Hand, the Fact was very different from this Representation. They affirm, that on the Lord Mayor's first withdrawing, the Sheriffs proceeded with the Election, and first put up North and Box, and afterwards Popillon and Dubois; which last, the Common-Serjeant declar'd in the Name of the Sheriffs, had the greatest Number of Hands. A Poll was then demanded by the Friends of the first: To which it was answer'd, that after a Report had been made to the Lord Mayor, and the rest of the City-officers were chosen, it should be granted. Accordingly the Hall proceeded, in the next place, to the said Choice: Which being over, the Sheriffs left the Hall, to make their Report; and in a short time returning, declar'd the Allowance of a Poll. These Circumstances are specify'd in a Paper, call'd, Some Account of the Proceedings at Guildhall. Another, call'd, The Matters of Poll in the present Election, as faithfully reported, affirms, in express Terms, That his Lordship acquiesc'd in the Poll. And a third, call'd, An impartial Account, &c. is as express, That the City about Confirmation was relinquish'd. The first of these Papers again takes notice, that the Poll was open'd, at several Books, by two o'Clock, and continued without Interruption till between six and seven. Ferguson (Growth of Party, p. 24, p. 277.) alters, That the Reason for closing it then, and adjourning the Hall, was to hinder the Declaration; double the Number of Citizens appearing for Dubois and Popillon that appear'd for North and Box. And tho' Mr. Certe intimates, that the Mayor insist'd on his own Nomination, and gave his Vote for Mr. Box alone, he at the same time allows, that every body else on the same Side of the Question polled for Mr. North also; and by way of pretence for his Lordship's adjoining the Poll, says, "That the Clerks who took the Poll playing foul, the Lord Mayor adjourn'd the Court to another Day, in order to get true Lists of the Liveryes in the mean time; and went out with six hundred Voters of the loyal Party who had not yet polled." Not to insist on the Difficulty of making so exact a Muster, and with so much Precision as to be sure none of so large a Number had polled, in the midst of the Hurry and Confusion of so tempestuous a Day, every body knows, that the Manner of correcting a Poll is by Scrutiny, after it is over: So this Pretence rather serves to shew the Weakness than the Strength of the loyal Cause: And what is yet more material, it appears, even from this Passage, that a Poll was regularly admitted on both Sides; and that the Election of course depended on the Issue: And it may be fairly suppos'd, that if the Court could have carry'd the Sheriffs by the Poll, they would scarce have contended any longer for the Ceremonial of the Mayor's Nomination. In one of the (q) Papers before-quoted we have, moreover, an Account of the foul Play complain'd of by Mr. Certe, in these very Words:

"It was desired by some, that a distinct Column might be for such as were for Confirmation; but that being before resolv'd in the Negative, and the only Diffuse now not being for or against Confirmation, but which two of the four Gentlemen should be chosen by the Common-hall for Sheriffs, the same was refus'd as impracticable and impertinent; but all left at liberty to poll for which of the four Competitors they pleas'd. ing Trial of the Sheriffs, &c. something of the same Nature was depos'd. But Mr. North, who was present, and who would scarce have let any such an insubstantial Circumstance, which he mentions no such thing.

(q) See my official Account, &c.

A. D. 1682. few factious and troublesome Men, only to create Occasion for Cavil, demanded to be polled for Confirmation, as they called it, yet refused to declare whom they would confirm, or name any that they would poll for, and yet complain'd to the Court of Aldermen, and some of them (as particularly Mr. Malters in St. Paul's Church-yard) offered to make Oath that they were deny'd or refus'd to be poll'd.

And again:—"It appearing that the Suffrages were likely to fall upon Papillon and Dubois, several that were for North and Box apply themselves to my Lord Mayor, suggesting as if they were deny'd to poll, and that many of their Party were absent, and the like Complaints; which occasion'd his Lordship's coming to the Hall. His Honour sending for the Sheriffs into the Council-chamber, they excus'd themselves for the present, being busy in the Work of the Day, but promis'd to wait on his Lordship, as soon as the Poll concluded. His Lordship came to the Polling-place (that is to say, the Area without the Hall-gate) and seem'd to forbid the further proceeding in the Poll; but the Sheriffs offered several Reasons why they ought to go on, being in the legal Discharge of their Office; and so proceeded;" but, unfortunately for their Friends, did not persevere to the End; for, having continu'd the Poll till near nine at Night, and the other Party unreasonably, as it was then thought, pressing in, they return'd to the Hall, and adjourn'd the Court till Tuesday Morning nine o'Clock.

However this Proceeding, or audacious Blunder of theirs, as 'tis call'd by Mr. North, furnish'd the Court with a Pretence to interpose openly. Midsummer Day this Year fell on a Saturday; Sunday was spent in Deliberations; and on Monday Morning the Council being assembled extraordinarily, the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, were summon'd to appear before his Majesty, who was now to throw the whole Weight of the Prerogative into the Scales of a Party: For as to the Hearing, it was but a Formality; and what was to be the Issue, was already decided. The Lord-Mayor and his Associates were Plaintiffs; the Sheriffs were treated as Offenders. Several Persons deposed upon Oath, that they had continu'd the Poll after the Lord-Mayor had adjourn'd the Court. This, it was said, had occasion'd a very great Riot; and for this they were to be committed to the Tower; which was accordingly (7) done, tho' obviously for no other Ends, but to scatter Terrors thro' the City, and to hinder the closing the Poll on the next Day, since it could not but be foreseen that the Sheriffs would take the Benefit of the Habeas Corpus, and of Court be at Liberty again in a few Days; or as Ferguson suggests, in Hopes the Citizens would have risen to rescue them; which would have been interpreted Rebellion, and laid the whole Faction at the King's Mercy. And Mr. North, himself, gives some Sanction to this Surmise, by saying, "That if they (the Sheriffs) or their Party had made any Stir or Resistance, there was Force enough at hand to have executed the Warrants effectually; and for that Reason the Arrest was submitted to." The Cause specify'd in the Warrant for their Commitment, which the whole Council sign'd, was for promoting and encouraging a most enormous Riot, to the manifest endangering the Public Peace. Now these very Words seem to indicate, that the Peace was not actually broke, and consequently, that no riotous Alien was committed, unless the very taking the Poll should be so construed. But in bar of that Conclusion, those affected by it urge, That the Poll had been open'd by common Consent, that the Sheriffs, who were the proper Officers for conducting it, had been expressly empower'd by the Common Hall to do so; and consequently that there could be no Trespass in carrying it on after the usual Forms and Methods of such Proceedings. They withal urge, that the Mayor, himself, was more obnoxious to the Charge of a Riot than the Sheriffs: For that when he took upon him to adjourn the Poll, he was follow'd by a Company of Men, of whom many were not Freemen, many were arm'd with Swords, and several were known Papists. They yet further urge, that the Behaviour of these Men was very insolent: That they affronted the Citizens, particularly the Recorder and the Aldermen on the popular Side, to whom they gave insufferable Provocations: That it was believ'd these Insults were purposely offer'd to create a Disturbance; for which Reason the injur'd Persons made no other Returns than to reprove them for their Want of Respect to Authority: And, finally, they urge, that the committing the Sheriffs by an Act of Council for a pretended Offence, without hearing Council in their Behalf, was such an extrajudicial Proceed, as had not the Countenance of the Precedent in our whole Story.

But notwithstanding this vigorous Step of committing the Sheriffs, it does not appear that the L. Mayor and his Party adventur'd to proceed the next Day without them: His Lordship, indeed, gave the Common-hall a Meeting on Tuesday the 27th; and it must be pretium'd, the Ferment ran as high as ever; but nothing conclusive was done, but to adjourn the Common-Hall to July the 5th.

In this Interval the Sheriffs being admitted to Bail, return'd to the Charge with as much Ardour as ever: And on the Day of Meeting, appear'd in the Hall with the additional Merit of having suffer'd for the Cause. Both

(7) Mr. Attorney-General was also order'd forthwith to exhibit an Information in the King's Bench against Thomas Philpotts and Edward Stiles, Bishops, Sheriffs of London, and Henry Corneil Esquire, one of the Aldermen, and such others as, upon Examination, should be found to have been Promoters and Encouragers of the late enormous Riot; and Parties had made their Musters, as before; and nothing was wanting but the Lord-Mayor's Presence, to renew the Struggle with as much Violence as ever; when the Recorder appear'd on the Hustings, with News, that his Lordship was either really or politically indispos'd, and in his Name adjoining they would adjourn, say some, and ordering them to adjourn, say others. But whether this Message was a Command or a Request, it was not comply'd with: It was said he had no Authority over the Hall; that he was there but as a Fellow-citizen; that he had only a single Vote to bestow: And that, besides, the Recorder, not being a Freeman, was not a proper Substituted, nor could be received in that Capacity, and they were not in a Humour to do his Lordship any Favour. In this Disposition they refused to adjourn, or to be adjourn'd; but with one continued Roar called upon the Sheriffs to proceed with the Poll; who, as if pres'd into the Service, at last undertook it; and having carry'd it thro' without any Interruption, and given repeated Summons, by Proclamation, for all other Voters, if any such there were, to come in, declar'd Papillon and Dubois to have the Majority of Voices, and consequently to be duly elected.

And to have Papillon and Dubois

These Particulars are, in the main, taken from the Paper before-quoted, called, The Matters of Folly, &c. and are, in part, verifi'd by Mr. Echard; who says, That the Mayor being sick, sent his Order of Adjournment by the Recorder; which the Citizens refus'd to obey, but on the contrary proceeded to Election. Notwithstanding which, Mr. Noel is pleas'd to rotise this Transaction in these Words: "As soon as the Sheriffs were come out upon Bail, like Men federated to Folly, they took up the Game where they left, and, at a Day of Adjournment of the Common-hall, resum'd their Poll by themselves, at the other End of the Hall, apart from the Lord Mayor's Assembly: For he, with the Court of Aldermen, was sometimes upon the Hustings, and sometimes in the Court, puzzled with the Difficulties in settling this Matter of the Choice of Sheriffs." The Inferences that flow from hence flow so naturally, that they need no Help: And after this egregious Misrepresentation (for so it must be call'd, though something of that Nature afterwards took place) the same Author proceeds as follows: "But now there was a new Difficulty started, and my Lord Mayor was attack'd with new Doubts and Scruples, for, said they, 'Here are two Sheriffs declar'd, who are in possession of their Election; and, whatever you might have done before, you cannot now make a Super-election, and thereby set up Anti-Sheriffs of London.' And, in very sober earnest, most indifferent People, whose Heads did not lie for distinguishing Matters of Order and Constitution, thought that the City Sheriffs, in taking a Poll, were not Ministers but Judges of the Election, and believ'd that now the Lord Mayor's Case was much worse than before, and so was the current Consent of the Town."

We have here the Difficulty acknowledg'd; and as to the Means of removing it, we have an obscure Hint, both in Ferguson and the Papers just quoted, That an Attempt was made to get the present Sheriffs turn'd out, by the means of those Citizens who were of the Lord-Mayor's Faction, who alone were expected at the next Meeting and were to have acted as a Common-hall: But the Secret taking Air, the other Party gave their Attendance likewise; and thereby render'd that hopeful Project abortive.

Concerning this Circumstance, Mr. North is wholly silent; which is the less to be wonder'd at; since he is not so much to be consider'd as an Historian, as an Advocate for a Party. Nor is it mention'd quite fairly by those on the other Side of the Question: For whereas, according to them, it is natural to suppose, that the Lord-Mayor endeavour'd, by a particular Precept, to procure a partial Convention of the Citizens: The Truth unquestionably was, That his Lordship was advis'd to overlook this Act of the Sheriffs, or to esteem it an Illegality, as done without his Authority; to hold the Court on Friday the 7th, agreeable to his own Adjournment, and to take any Advantage that the Inadvertence of the Party, who presum'd they had already carry'd their Point, should offer him. With these opposite Views on that Mornning the two Factions fac'd each other, and, according to Mr. Echard, the Point in dispute was, the Validity of his Lordship's last Adjournment; but, according to the Papers before us, the great Struggle lay for the Lord-Mayor;

The Court knew their whole Hold consist'd in their Hold of him; and that if he gave them the slip, all Hope was at an end: And the Malcontents, tho' they affect'd to be in full Security and Tranquility, as having, or pretending to have, the Authority both of Law and Custom on their Side, were yet willing to have his Lordship's Sanction, to put an end to all farther Controversy. And, in the mean time, nothing can be imagin'd more perplexing than the Condition of the poor Man; expos'd to the Counter-importunities and Menaces of such fierce Opponents; who were encouraged by his own apparent Irresolution to continue their Efforts, and thereby to prolong his Misery: Sometimes he seem'd to be on the point of adjourning the Hall, that he might gain farther Time; and sometimes inclin'd to confirm the Election, in order to extricate himself from such a Variety of Difficulties: Nor could he be brought to any other Conclusion at last, than to consent, that Lawyers should again be call'd in to argue the Point; which was done upon the spot. Jeffrey and Saunders undertaking for the Court; Tredy, Pellessen, and William the late Speaker, for the Sheriffs. But neither did this Expedient produce any thing definitive: For whereas the popular Advocates offer'd to sign their Opinions, the Courtiers declin'd it; which help'd more to weaken his Lordship's Resolution, than their Arguments to convince his Judgment: In which Distraction he not only adjourn'd the Court to the 14th, after it had been kept in suspense from Nine in the Morning,

A. D. 1682. Morning, till after Six in the Evening; but afterwards, in private, came to the following Compromise, viz. That, in case the adverse Party would waive their late Return, and proceed to a new Election, he would waive his Nomination; the whole Four should be put up again, and the Choice left to the Citizens. And to this he not only adher'd a whole Night, but, as we are told, confirm'd it by fresh Assurances the next Morning. It is obvious, that this must have been a Thunderclap at Court; who knew that the trusting to an Election was, in effect, giving up the Cause: Sir Leoline Jenkins was therefore possest immediately into the City, by his Ascendancy over the Mayor to disconcert all again; and in order thereto, gave him to understand, That it was expected, that he should re-assert his Right of Nomination, tho' rueret Carolum, all things should run into Confusion. This Vint had its full Effect: His Lordship had more reason to believe the Opinion of the Lord Mayor, than Sir John North, judging his Power of Ascendancy.

For the next Step in this intricate Affair, we shall have recourse to Mr. North: Who says, "The Lord Mayor was sent for, or went of himself, to Court, and appeared before the King in Council; where an Account was given to his Majesty of the Trouble the City was in about the Election of Sheriffs, upon the Declaration these Men had made of an Election. All the Learned at the Board, and the King's Attorney, declared that the Proceeding of the Sheriffs was no Act of the Body, but, as to legal Effect, absolutely null; but yet criminal, as being done without and against lawful Authority: And that the Lord Mayor, the Head of the Body that was to elect, could alone direct and declare the Election: And that, at the next Meeting of the Common-hall, he ought to proceed de iure, as if nothing had been done; as their Use is when Sheriffs, chosen, fine-off. The Question depended wholly upon that of my Lord Mayor's Power to adjourn the Common-hall; and Sir John Moor was extremely dissatisfied and uneasy about that, being what divers Citizens had told him he could not do. The Lord Chief-Justice North, a Privy-Counsellor, was so far from making any doubt of that, that he said to my Lord Mayor, he need not be at all concerned; for

A. D. 1682. the Question was frivolous and impudent, or to that Effect." Thereupon Sir John Moor crept towards the Place where his Lordship sat, and, with a moist submiss Countenance, desired to know of his Lordship, if he would be pleas'd to give it under his Hand; and contrary to the Expectation of all present, his Lordship said Yes; and, taking the Pen and Paper before him, wrote his Opinion, That the Lord Mayor had Power to adjourn the Common-hall to what Time and Place in the City he thought fit, or to that Effect; and, setting his Hand to it, gave it Sir John Moor. Now the Courtiers, that were more us'd to Sneakers, than to Men of clear Courage in a clear Cause, expected his Lordship would have shuffled off this setting his Hand; but the Readiness of doing it very much confirm'd Sir John Moor, and exceedingly pleas'd the King.

And there remains the Opinion of the Lord Mayor, which Sir John North judging his Power of Ascendancy.

We must here stop a while, to observe, that as in this Passage the only Question decided is the Lord Mayor's Right to adjourn the Court; so, in the Paper-Controversies of this Time, the Point principally enforced is, his Lordship's Precedence to nominate a Sheriff, by the Ceremonial of drinking, &c. and the Obligation thereby laid on the Hall to confirm his Choice. And tho' Mr. North decides both these Questions in a Manner so peremptory, against the Liveries, it does not appear, that either the Arguments or Authorities he urges were, in those Times, held to unexceptionable as he would have Posterity believe: For as to the Latter, in the very Writings set forth by the Court-Party, we find it at the very Threshold acknowledg'd, (1) That the Charters are to the Citizens to elect their Sheriffs, but that by Usage, and particular By-laws, those Elections have been confin'd to the Liveries: And tho' they produced Variety of Precedents of the Lord Mayor's to appointing a Sheriff, and the Liveries confirming him, a Variety of Precedents were also produced to shew, that the Liveries had set aside the Person nominated by the Mayor, and elected both Sheriffs: Whence it was infer'd, that the Liveries had a Right to reject, as well as confirm; and that the Example of one Common-hall was no Law to another. And as to the Former, a (?) ruled Case is cited, of this very Reign, in which a Lord Mayor suspended a Common-

(1) See a Paper call'd, The Lord Mayor's Right of electing a Sheriff asserted, against all the Pretensions of a popular Election; to be found in Lord Barnard's Collection, vol. 231.

(2) As follows: "One Trotter dissenting Collopetter with another, in the Year 1679, for a Bridge-master's Place, and a Poll being appointed and general for the Decision of the Election between the two Persons that were named and put up; Sir Barnard Sterling being at that time Lord Mayor, and perceiving, after some Procedure in the Poll, that the Election was by the Votes of the Majority like to fall upon Trotter, did, from a Pique which he bore to the said Person, and in order to prevent his being elected to the Place of one of the Bridge-masters, assume and usurp the Power of dissolving the Court. Whereupon Trotter finding himself aggrieved, did, immediately after Trotter was out of his Magistracy, commence an Action of the Case against him, in one of the Law and Justice Courts at Goldball. And as it is very remarkable, that the Foundation of his Action was, That the Mayor had neither Power, nor ought to dissolve the Common-hall, without the Consent of the major Part of the Livery and there present; so, notwithstanding the Envoir and Interest which Sir Barnard was supposed to have in the Judge of the said Court where the Cause was try'd, he obtain'd a Verdict against him, and sent by a Jury of Citizens, who had known his Rights and Claims of the City, and being upon their Oathsworn that at a Time when there was more of their Remembrance and Remembrance which struck Men to Justice and Piety, are to be believed to have proceeded according to the Rules of Law, and the Duties of their Conscience: And whereas Trotter, not choosing to acquiesce in the said Verdict, moved for an Arrest of Judgment in the Common-Hall: We desire that all would take notice, how thin, after several Days hearing and arguing of the Cause before the Judge of the said Court, for whom Trotter, who had been Recorder of the City, and knew the Law, Privileges, and Customs thereof, as well as any Man alive, was once Judgment was given against him: which could no ways have been, provide my Lord Mayor had been before the Court, and the Poll or Court, being all well known, and well understood in the proper Judge, he may by better reason appear or dissolve the Court, mon-hall for Ends of his own; and after his Mayoralty was expir'd, being prosecuted by the injured Party for the same, was cast in all the Courts. The Lord Chief-Justice Hale, before whom it was finally brought, pronouncing, "That if my Lord Mayor should be allow'd such a Right, Privilege, and Prerogative, as to dissolve the Common-hall, without Consent and Leave of the greater Part of the Freemen, it would directly tend to the Subversion of all the Privileges of the City." Thus Authority encounters Authority, and Precedent: And to shew upon the Whole, that because the Lord Mayor was entituled with the summoning the Common-hall, was no Argument that he was authoris'd also to adjourn or dissolve it, before the Business in hand was dispatch'd: It was yet further urg'd, That this Office was ministerial only: That it devolv'd, as of course, on the Lord Mayor, for the sake of Order and Regularity only: And that it was as absurd for that Reason to suppose the Jurisdiction was in him, as that, when the Citizens were summon'd, as anciently, to the Falshote, by the ringing of a Bell, either the Bell or Bellman was to govern the whole Proceeding afterwards.

In short, both Parties alike, as in all other Contests of the like nature, made it their Business rather to say what would advantage their Cause, than to investigate the Truth; and the Rage of Controversy, and all the Rancour of Party Animosity, the Abuse of Claims, Privileges, &c. never appear'd more flagrant than on this important Occasion. The fourth of this, has in part appear'd already from the Quotations on both Sides: And to shew yet farther how deeply the Quarrel lay, and with what Malignity it was carry'd on, it is fit in this Place to bring forward one Passage more from the Malcontent Papers, which (as) affirms, how truly or falsely let the Reader judge for himself, that Lord Habitax had said, That he foresaw there would be hanging, and seas resolv'd to hang last: And that Duncomb the Banker, afterwards so eminent on many Accounts in the City; and one more, not nam'd, had, to the same purpose, given out, "That they wonder'd to many of the Citizens should take such Pains in this Affair, seeing they had nothing to apprehend from the Court: Their only Design, by obtaining Sheriffs to their Mind, being to hang about nine or ten Persons, who were obnoxious to those in Power."

But to proceed. For the better Countenance of Sir Joh'n Moor, says Mr. North, it was thought fit, that his Majesty in Council should order him to do his Duty in the City. And such an Order, by the Advice of Council, was accordingly assign'd in these Words:

"His Majesty having been inform'd by the Lord-Mayor and divers of the Aldermen of London, That the Disorders and Riots arisen in the City upon the Day appointed for the Election of Sheriffs, have been chiefly occasion'd by the Proceedings of the Common-hall in an irregular way, contrary to what hath been anciently accustom'd, his Majesty, by the Advice of his Council, hath thought fit, for the better keeping of the Peace of the City, to direct, and hereby to require the Lord-Mayor to maintain and preserve intire the ancient Customs of the City; and for the better doing thereof, to take effectual Order, that at the Common-hall to be held to-morrow, all Proceedings be begun a-new, and carry'd on in the usual Manner, as they ought to have been upon the 24th of June last."

Thus we see that it was not till the Day before the last Adjournment expir'd, that this Expedient was agreed upon: And, thus authoris'd, his Lordship appear'd a new Man; his Doubts were departed; his Purpose was fix'd; and from the very opening of the Hall he put on the Mien of one who was no longer to be disput'd with, but obey'd. As an Introduction to the Business of the Day, the Royal Mandate was read and heard, say the Malcontents, with the greatest Respect and profound Silence imaginable. Fact, p. 2. Says Mr. Echard, "It was oppos'd by the adverse Party with great Noise and Clamour, some crying for the reading of the 16th of Charles I. in which was a Clause declaratory, That the Privy Council had no Authority to examine, determine, or dispose of the Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods and Chattels of any of the Subjects of this Kingdom. But this, continues the same Author, being look'd upon as no ways pertinent to the present Case, they proceeded accordingly." No Doubt the Passage here quoted is impertinent enough: But it cannot be said that the Court could decide of the Impertinence of the Act till they had heard it read, which the Lord-Mayor actually refus'd, and thereby destroy'd the very Essence of a Common-hall; which, in its very Name, implies an Assembly of the Liverymen on an equal Footing, to act freely for themselves, as to the Business of the Day, and as far as the Law allow; and not according to the arbitrary Prescriptions of a Dictator. It was not, however, for the sake of the Clause above recited, that the Motion was made for this great Statute (for abolishing the Star Chamber, and setting Limits to the Power of the Privy Council) to be read, but for the Declaratory, which follows: "And so far as the Council hath, of late Times, assum'd unto itself a Power to intermeddle in Civil Causes, and Matters only of private Interest between Party, and have

Court, without the Leave and Approbation of any other Persons. And, which yet more essentially serves to the blotting of all Gallinies who have not renounc'd Sense and Modesty, it is worthy of our Observation, how that Stirling, not willing to hold himself condemn'd by a Judgment against him in the Court of Common-Place, brought the Cause, by a Writ of Error, into the Court of King's-Bench. But, instead of obtaining the Judgment to be there reversed, that he should, jail, and exclaim Perjury, my Lord Chief-Justice Hale, would not to much as suffer it to be argued, but immediately confirm'd the Judgment, saying, &c. as above. [The Privileges and Rights of the Freemen of London, &c. p. 7, 8. out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xxii.]

(3) See Rights of the City further unfolded, p. 4.

A. D. 1682. have adventur'd to determine of the Estates and Liberties of the Subject contrary to the Law of the Land, and the Rights and Privileges of the Subject; by which great and manifold Mischiefes and Inconveniencies have arisen, and much Incertainty, by Means of such Proceedings, hath been conceiv'd concerning Mens Rights and Estates, &c. Now it is here expressly declar'd, That the Interposition of the Council in civil Causes and Matters, was contrary to the Laws of the Land: Consequently, nothing could be more pertinently urg'd in Opposition to the present Order of Council, than this Statute. And hence it may be justly infer'd, that the reading of the Statute was refus'd, for the Reason directly opposite to that alleg'd by the Arch-deacon.

But his Lordship, it seems, was equally dictatorial in every other Circumstance that arose; for when several Citizens began to speak to the Point before them, and desir'd to be heard, he would not allow them that Liberty, tho' it was so notoriously their Right, but proceeded to insist on his former Nomination, and to signify, that all they had to do was to confirm Mr. North as his Sheriff, and to proceed to a new Election of their own. And here began a new Dispute; the Sheriffs and their Party were so far willing to obey the Order of Council, as to proceed to a new Election, with a Salvo jure to their former: But then they insisted, that, according to the ancient Customs of the City, the said Election was wholly in the Common-hall; and that tho' his Lordship might recommend a Person to serve, he had no Right nor Power to insist on his being chosen. The Lord-Mayor maintain'd the contrary; and to cut off all farther Contest, having receiv'd, it must be presum'd, what (a) Sanction to his Nomination a Minority could give, caus'd Books to be open'd, under the Inspection of the Common Sergeant, the Town Clerke, the two Secondaries, and the four Attornies of the Mayor's Court, with three Columns only, for Box, Papillon, and Dubois: And, contrary to all former Usage, took upon himself the Management of the Poll. Upon which the Sheriffs made their Appeal to the Hall; and having been expressly authoriz'd by the Majority, open'd other Books for all four, and carry'd on a counter Poll; which gave rise to all those various Motions of the Lord-Mayor from the Huffings to the Floors, and back again, in the wrong Place discours'd of by Mr. North; who falls into another Mistake yet greater than the former, by saying, Page 611, That at the Day to which the Common-hall was adjourn'd, the Faction threw up and made no Appearance.

Now it to happen'd, for want of better Directions, that many of the Partizans of Papillon and Dubois (x) voted in the Lord-

A. D. 1682. Mayor's Books, while the far greater Part follow'd the Sheriffs; of which Advantage was taken to put the Line on the Mayor's Books only, as the only legitimate Poll; and on their Authority, to pronounce Box duly elected by the Majority of Voices, while the Sheriffs on the other hand did the same by Papillon and Dubois; North in all the Books having but 107 Votes, Box 1357, and Papillon and Dubois 2700: And thus by a Complication of Tricks, tho' Mr. North (Enamen, p. 605.) allsidge, that nobody pretended to impose even one Sheriff on the City in the Mayor's Right, unless his Choice had the Confirmation of the Common-hall; and that the Right of the Citizens to elect the other was unquestionable, the Lord Mayor's Sheriff was declar'd, apparently without any such Confirmation, and the other without any such (y) Election. Even Box, himself, was so abus'd of the Methods which had been taken to force him into the Office, (Mr. North says, so frighted at the double Election) or so unwilling to undergo the Drudgery, that, in all Probability would be expected from him, that he rather chose to sine off than serve; insinuating to the Mortification of the Court; who, if Ferguson says true, most earnestly importun'd him to persevere; and offer'd him any Security he could desire to indemnify him from any Suits or Damages that might ensue.

Hitherto we have made use of all the Authorities extant; but in the Circumstance which follows, we must depend on Mr. Echard only, who says, That on the 27th following the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen assembled again, not without Apprehensions of a Disturbance from the contrary Party; therefore two Companies of Foot were order'd to be upon Duty at the Exchange that Day, and the Lieutenantcy plac'd themselves in the Gallery before the Room where the Court of Aldermen sit, to keep off the Multitude from pressing in upon them. Very great Numbers were gather'd into Guild-hall, requiring an Answer to a Petition, which they had formerly deliver'd to that Court, demanding that Mr. Papillon and Mr. Dubois should be call'd forth to give Bonds to serve for the next Year's Sheriffs: Some few of the Chief of this Party being at length call'd in, the Lord-Mayor caus'd the following Paper to be read to them, as a final Answer: "Gentlemen, this Court hath consider'd of your Petition, and will take care that such Persons shall take the Oath of Sheriffs upon them as are duly elected, according to Law, and the ancient Customs of this City; and in this, and in all other things, this Court will endeavour to maintain the Rights and Privileges of the Chair, and of the whole City; and wherein you think that we do otherwise, the Law shall judge."

(x) The N<sup>o</sup> Quarta in 1738 says, that Mr. North was actually confirm'd, which can be no otherwise understood, than by the Mayor's Partizan only.

(y) These were single Votes; for, as Bishop Bowser observes, none were admitted to vote, by the Mayor, who would not admit of his Nomination of Mr. North.

(z) Which was tacitly confess'd even by the Commons N<sup>o</sup> 1735: For after the Paragraph relating to the Lord Mayor's declaring Box elected by a Majority of Voices, follows these Words: "The other Proceedings, by way of polling in another Place, are so contrary to the ancient Usage of the City, and without any Warrant or Authority from any Lord Mayor."

A. D. 1682. "judge between us." With this Answer the Lord-Mayor commanded them, in the King's Name, to depart; and he also laid his Commands upon Sheriff Pilkington to go out, and cause them to depart; which Mr. Sheriff durst not disobey, tho' he, himself, and all that Party were highly dissatisfy'd with the Answer.

The only material thing which the Court had now to do, was to procure a proper Substitute in the Room of Box, and to get him as luckily declar'd; for to get him elected, was what they, with Reason, despair'd of. As to the Man, none was thought better qualify'd than one Rich, a Lieutenant Colonel of the Militia, who had been very active in taking Depositions during the late Prosecutions under Mr. Secretary Jenkins; whose Circumstances were low, and whose Zeal was high. Rich was accordingly pitch'd upon, and very gladly embrac'd the Opportunity of making himself useful at Court at the Expence of his Fellow-Citizens: And in order to put him in Possession of his Preferment, a Common-hall was held on the 19th of September; at which assisted the whole Herd of both Sorts, as before: But no sooner was the Court open'd by the Common-Cryer, than the general Roar was, No Norib! No Election! By which it was the declar'd Sense of the Hall, that they persisted in their former Choice, and would admit of no other: And so very dextrous were the Courtiers now become in solving Difficulties, that on this very Dissent they built the Success of their Experiment: For when the Mayor was (a) withdrawn, as usual, the Common-Sergeant put Rich, and one Griffith, in Nomination; but not as had been customary, by the Common-Cryer's making Proclamation: Contrarywise, taking advantage of the continual Clamour which deafen'd the whole Hall, on having barely nam'd those Persons, and that in such a manner as not above Ten heard what was said, says Ferguson, and not above Thirty applauded it, says Bishop Burnet, he, the Common-Sergeant, in the same unfair Manner, intimated, That the Choice was fallen on Rich; and posted to the Lord Mayor with the News, being follow'd by the Sheriff, not to authenticate his Report, as the Gazette would have us to believe, but to disprove it, though without Effect: His Lordship was deaf on that Side, and resolute to give up the City into the Hands of the Court: Accordingly, repairing once more to the Hall, he declar'd that Rich was Sheriff, and proceeded to dissolve the Assembly.

This, all Circumstances consider'd, is presum'd to be the truest State that can now be given of this remarkable Transaction: And yet the Gazette, without Remorse, pronounces, as also Mr. Eckard, That Rich was chosen by a Majority of Voices; by which the Public was to understand a Majority of the whole Hall: A Piece of Craft that disgraces the sacred Name of Authority; for in case of Controversy, it must have been acknowledg'd, that the true Meaning of those Words was, That Rich had more Voices than Griffith.

It must now be observ'd, That the Struggle of the Day did not end with my Lord Mayor's Act of dissolving the Hall; for the Sheriff, as before, dispos'd his Authority to do so, continu'd the Assembly, and not only put the Question to the Liveries, Whether they would abide by their former Choice of Papillon and Dubois? but on the Appearance of some Opposition, proceeded to a new Poll: Which the Lord Mayor being inform'd of, he first sent the Common-Cryer to the Sheriffs, to require them to disperse that unlawful Assembly; and they showing no regard to his Order, he return'd to the Hall himself, accompany'd with some Aldermen; and having dispers'd the People, by what Means is not explain'd, caus'd the Gates of the Hall to be shut up: Nor was this all; for the next Day his Lordship repair'd to Court with a Complaint against the Sheriffs; who were order'd to make their personal Appearance again before the Council; by whom, after they had been severely reprimanded, says Mr. Eckard, and told they had been guilty of a high Misdemeanour, they were call'd upon to enter into a Recognizance of 1000 l. each, as also to find Ten Securities of 500 l. each. "That they should appear the first Day of the next Term, to answer to such Information as the Attorney-General should bring against them on the King's Behalf; and in the mean time to be on their good Behaviour"; which the Dread of worse to ensue oblig'd them to submit to.

We are now come to the last Scene of this desperate Contest, which was indeed a proper Catastrophe to the whole Proceeding. September the 28th was the Day of swearing in the new Sheriffs; and it being apprehended the Minority of the Aldermen would assert the Right of the Majority of the Liveries, by adventuring to swear in the Sheriffs they had elected, in opposition to those forc'd upon the City by the Mayor and his Cabal; and that the Liveries would in Person attend, to insist on their Choice, Gouldball was early in the Morning possess'd by a Party of the Trained-bands, by Order of the Lieutenantancy, and when the said Aldermen, together with Papillon and Dubois, enter'd the Hall, the commanding Officer, one Lieutenant-Colonel Quincy, order'd his Men to surround them; which was done so effectually, that they had scarce six Foot square left them to stand upon: And while they were in this Plight, the said Officer gave them to know, That he had Orders to keep the Hall clear till the Lord Mayor came. The Aldermen then demanded

(a) Contradictory to the Doctrine taught by Mr. Norib, we find it asserted by the Malcontents, "That the Reason of the Lord Mayor's withdrawing is not because he has elected one Sheriff, when he leaves the Common only to confirm: But because having tear'd his Right of a Liveryman, in the Choice of the same Officers, by the Nomination of one to the Hall he allow'd or allow'd, as they see good, he would not sell the Grandeur and Dignity of his Place, by continuing in a Court where he was not to have the Direction."

demanded to see that Order; and signify'd, That they being Magistrates of the City, it could not be understood to affect them. Quiney reply'd, That the Order was with the Mayor of the Regiment; that he knew them well enough who they were; and that they must remove notwithstanding. The Aldermen pleaded, That they had the Lord Mayor's Summons to attend, and that they were there, in obedience to it. This stagger'd Quiney, and being utterly at a loss to reconcile Injunctions to opposite, he withdrew for new Instructions: And what those were, the Sequel will best explain: For being return'd he said, Gentlemen, you must withdraw, I have a Command to require it. And being again importun'd to shew that Command, he answer'd, in a great Heat, He should show none, so such as they. After which, laying his Hand on Sir Patience Ward's Shoulder, he said, Sir, you must remove; and at the same time call'd upon his Soldiers to interpose between them and the Bar, and force them away: Ward, upon this call'd on his Brethren, and even the Soldiers themselves, to bear witness to the Violence that was offer'd him: And Quiney reply'd, That he car'd not for Witnesses, but would justify what he did, by his Orders: And resolving to fulfil them, he laid hold on Sir John Lawrence, another of the Aldermen, who was leaning on the Bar; and with great and repeated Violence pull'd him from off the Step, and had like to have thrown him on the Floor: And so in Succession proceeded to the rest, till the Bar was clear'd, and remain'd wholly in possession of these military Loyalists; which, it seems, was the principal thing aim'd at; for the Aldermen were suffer'd to continue at the West End of the Hall in Peace; where were several of the opposite Party, who had look'd on while this Outrage was committed, not only with Composure, but Satisfaction; as preferring the narrow, dirty Service of their own particular Faction, to the Peace, Dignity, Freedom, and Independency of the City in general; which were all thus flagrantly violated, in the Persons of these Magistrates.

At length the Lord-Mayor and his Possessors arriv'd, and being immediately join'd by these his Brethren, his Lordship, at once, unfolded the Cause of all this Violence, by saying, Gentlemen, here are five Writings, to go and swear Sheriffs, and I not present. To which it was reply'd by one of the Aldermen, That he had been misinform'd:—That they had not the least Intention to attempt any such thing, but only to make good their Claim by presenting the Sheriffs, which the Liveries had chosen; Sir Robert Clayton adding, That his Lordship had frequently and publicly declar'd, That the Dispute should be determin'd by Law; and they had been told, that unless Mr. Papillon and Mr. Dubois presented themselves to be sworn, they would have no Claim to litigate.

This seem'd to pacify his Lordship; and the Court being late, Papillon and Dubois made a Tender of themselves to serve the Office of Sheriff for the Year ensuing, in Conformity to the Choice of their Fellow-Citizens. This was express'd in full, in a Paper which Papillon read, and would have deliver'd to the Lord-Mayor; but he refus'd to accept it. His Lordship was, however, press'd to take the Matter into Consideration, for that the Aldermen had been summon'd to a Court, his Answer was, There was no Business. To which it was reply'd, “We have much to say; for the Citizens seem to be thrown out of Possession of the Sheriffs, which they have enjoy'd so many Ages by free Election. We desire fairly to tender our Sheriffs, in order to have the Business more fairly determin'd at Law, according to your Lordship's Promise in Answer to the many Addresses made, That the Law should determine it. And it is the only way for us, tho' troublesome and chargeable. We also desire, that the Matter may be debated, in order that an Answer may be given to the Sheriffs, who have tender'd themselves.” But the Majority of the Aldermen were, it seems, for leaving the whole Merit of the Day to the Lord-Mayor; and, therefore, were, by no means, for giving way to any Debate. Upon which Sir Patience Ward mov'd, That the aforesaid Paper and his Lordship's Refusal of it, might be recorded. And, at the same time, Sir Robert Clayton, in a Whisper to the Lord-Mayor, intimated, “That if he brought the Affair into Dispute, and put the Issue on the Determination of the Court, he would either have the Authority of the Court to justify him, or they would have as much to answer for as himself; and that the Averseness which they had shewn to have any Concern in it, ought to make him the more diffident of undertaking in his own Person to be answerable for the whole Proceeding.—” This Suggestion seem'd to have some Weight with his Lordship; he hesitated a little, and seem'd to relapsing into his old Indolence: But being stirr'd up afresh by the Court Parties of all Sides, grew a Hero again; told the Misdemeanors, if they had any thing farther to say, they might deliver it on the Hustings; and, rising immediately up, call'd on North and Rich to follow him; which they did, as also Papillon and Dubois, and the Aldermen of both Factions; whither being come, those of the Minority prepar'd to renew the Dispute, and demand'd to be heard, agreeable to the Promise of the Mayor; but were peremptorily refus'd: Nor, indeed, could their Arguments have had any great Effect, if deliver'd; for the Court were of the same Mind below Stairs, as above: And as to the Liveries, so many of them were excluded by the Admission of the Trained Bands in their Room, and the rest were kept so remote from the Bar, by the said Trained Bands, that all Communication between the Hustings and the Floor, was, in a manner, cut off. His Lordship then calling his two Men to the Book to be sworn, Papillon press'd once more to be heard; but being refus'd, would have presented a Paper to his Lordship, sign'd by himself and Dubois, signifying, That they were ready to take the Sheriffs Oaths, and every other way to qualify themselves themselves as the Law requir'd, for the holding and discharging that Office; which was also refus'd by him, but accepted by Sir John Loveless as an Evidence of their Tender. The Lord-Mayor then proceeding to administer the Oath to North and Rich, Papillon and Dubois advanced likewise; and Papillon actually laid his Hand on the Book, and held it there for some time; still contending to be heard, as having something of Importance to say; but was at last oblig'd to desist, in Obedience to the positive Command of the Lord-Mayor and his Corps, accompany'd with a solemn Charge, to keep the Peace; which putting an end to the Contell, North and Rich were sworn in; how much to their Honour, let impartial Posterity judge: And the six defeated Aldermen, with the People's Sheriffs, withdrew; (a) protesting against such irregular and illegal Proceedings.

Both Parties being now convinc'd, by the Good and Ill resulting to their several Interests, from the notable Endeavours of Sir John Moor, of the Importance of having the City Chair fill'd with one after their own Hearts, prepar'd to dispute it as warmly and fiercely for a Mayor, as before for Sheriffs. In the last Bickering, Sir William Pickering had most distinguish'd himself by the Activity of his Zeal for the Court, and by shewing, on all Occasions, a remarkable Pliability to go all Lengths in the dirty Roads of Court-Prostitution. This was Merit enough to recommend him to all the Favour and Interest of his Party: And on the Strength of it he was set up, in Conjunction with Sir Henry Tiff, as a Person every way qualify'd to succeed the great Magistrate he had before both prompt and seconded on every Emergency: And, on the other hand, the adverse Party, who had been serv'd with as much Zeal, and probably as few Scruples by Sir Thomas Gould, and Alderman Cornish, set them up in Opposition to the two former, and prepar'd to support them with their whole Force.

A. D. 1682.

On the very Day, after the former Contest was decided, this new one began; which was conducted with as much Vigour, but it seems, with much more Decorum than the foregoing: For even the Gazette bears witness, that the Proceedings were very orderly: All the Aldermen beneath the Chair, according to Custom, having been nam'd, the Common-Serjeant declar'd Sir William Pritchard, and Sir Thomas Gould had the Majority of Hands: But which of these had the Advantage, was a Question not so easily decided. A Poll was therefore demanded, and granted; and the Sheriffs, that it is to lay the new ones, as well as the Common-Serjeant, were now thought fit to be trusted with the Management of it. This lasted till October the 30, when it appear'd, upon casting up the Books, thro' under the Inspection and Direction of the Courtiers only, that the Numbers for Pritchard were 2233, for Tiff, 226, for Gould 2289, and for Cornish 2259; so that even the latter had the Advantage of Pritchard by 26 Voices, and Gould by 26. Notwithstanding which, the Gazette, with a shameful Disingenuity, reported, that the Disparity between the two Parties was but 25 Voices.

And now the Court could have Recourse to a Scrutiny, as the proper Expedient to detect any foul Play, but after the most rigid Examination, finding none, or none that was not more than countenanc'd by their own, they had recourse to Disqualifications: Upon the Strength of which, thro' (b) thence to be wholly without Ground, the final Report made

(a) These Particulars are taken from a Paper, call'd, A true Account of the Proceedings at Guildhall, in relation both to the Election and Succession of Dudley North and Peter Rich, Esquires; which is to be found in Lord Sydenham's Collections, vol. xiv. And the Ld. relating to the Protest, we find was himself countervail'd by the Ld. Dubois North himself, according to the Evidence of his Brother.

(b) The State of the City, as made by Pritchard's Friends, and oppos'd by those of Gould and Cornish, was as follows.

"That several Persons of the Merchant-Taylor Company are not only qualify'd to poll, for that they have not taken the Liveryman's Oath of that Company, entered among the By-Laws, Oaths, and Orders of the same.

Whereunto we have given an Answer to this Effect: That the Master, Wardens, and Assistants of every Company, have Power to report, let aside, or suspend the Election and Oath of their By-Laws, Oaths and Orders, as often as they shall think convenient, at their own Wills and Pleasures.

That the 18 of October 1680, the then Master, and Wardens, and Assistants of Merchant-Taylor Company, did, by their Order, set aside the Imposition of the Oath, before that time actually admitted to such as were admitted Liverymen of that Company upon their Admissions; and that six several Persons had since been admitted of the Livery of the said Company, sans the making of the said Order last-mention'd: All which we are ready to prove.

They further make this Objection: That several Persons of the Company of Grocers have polled, and did not take the Liveryman's Oath, entered in their Books, upon their Admission; and therefore have no legal Vote.

Whereunto we have given this Answer: That this Oath is sometimes imposed, and sometimes omitted, according to the Pleasure of the Master, Wardens, and Assistants; this, or the like Oath being no way essential for making a Liveryman in any Company in London: And if the Masters, Wardens, and Assistants, have omitted to administer the usual Oath, the Liverymen are not to lose their Privileges or Franchises for the Omission of others: And therefore these Liverymen have legal Votes. And, moreover, we are ready to prove, that all the said Persons but Twelve have taken the said Oath.

They furthermore have made this Objection: That several Persons of the Company of Upholders, who have polled, are of other Companies, and were not fairly translated, according to the Customs of the City: They being Members of such Companies at the time of their respective Admissions into the Upholders Company; and therefore were ineligible of being Liverymen of the same.

Whereunto we have given this Answer: That any Citizen is capable to be at the same time a Member, and of the Livery of several Companies; and that the Use of Translation from one Company to another is for the Life of such Citizen, he being not liable, if once translated according to the Customs, to be put in any chargeable Offices by that Company from whence he is so translated; and the Want of such Translation shall not take away his Right of polling once, if he was of twenty Companies; and therefore these Persons have legal Votes.

They further object, that many Quakers, who were Freeman of this City, and of the Livery, have no legal Votes: Which Answer, as we apprehend, is very strange, seeing they have not hitherto been disabled by any Law whatsoever: Which Answer, of ours, we doubt not, will as well satisfy all indifferent and unconcerned Persons as ourselves, that the Objections shewmention'd, are of no weight or moment: And therefore we do farther Certify (not having any further regard to the said Objections) as follows.

That the Number of the Persons who have polled twice, _____ made to the Common-hall, was, That Pritchard had 2138 Votes, Gould 2124, and Cornith 2093: Whereby the Tables were wholly turn'd; Pritchard appear'd to have a Majority of 14; those who gav'd him immediately proceeded to make a proper use of it by declaring the Choice to have fallen upon him; the Hall rung with the Shouts of the triumphant Party; and the Malcontents had rather more than Foresight, that their Ruin was at hand. They did not, however, shew any Tokens of Despair; but, on the contrary, though Pritchard had been slavishly presented to the King, for his Appropriation in Person, and had publicly obtain'd it, they complain'd loudly of the repeated Injuries which had been done them; they even proceeded so far in their Endeavours to obtain Justice, as to appoint Mr. Williams and Mr. Walker to move the Court of King's Bench for a Mandamus to Sir John Moor, the present Lord-Mayor, and the Aldermen, to swear in either Gould or Cornith, who had demonstrably the Majority of Votes: And when the Court, under the Pretence, that a Mandamus in the disjunctive was a thing unprecedented and absurd, proceeded to reject that Motion, they refus'd to countenance Pritchard's Admission by paying the usual Attendance, either when he took the Oaths at Westminster, or when he caus'd the City afterwards.

"Some may think, (c) says Mr. North, that an Account of these City Squabbles are but low History; but if these are low, I am at a loss to know what is high." And thus far we may join Issue with him. The Struggles of contending Factions, both for Information and Warning, are the most important Portions of our Story. But when he proceeds to ask whether this immediate Contest was not a Battail rangée between the King and Council, with the Ministry and loyal Party on one Side, and the whole Antimonar-chical and rebellious Party on the other; and thro' his whole Book suggests, that if the King had not been victorious, his People must have been undone; we must take the Liberty to enter a Caveat against his Conclusions. As the King was before upon the defensive against the Parliament, and therefore had Reason and Justice on his Side, the Malcontents were on the Defensive now; and tho' labouring for their own particular Preservation, could no otherwise obtain it, than by preferring the democratic Part of the Constitution, in which consists the very Essence of English Liberty. And we shall soon find, that, under the Pretence of securing the Monarchy, that Liberty, which has hitherto been the Glory of every English Subject, no longer subsisted, but at the Courtesy of the Prince on the Throne.

It cannot be deny'd, that the Malcontents had fallen into many Excesses, which shew'd that the Leaven of Faction was among them; and that tho' their Leaders, or the greatest Part of them, avow'd the best Principles, they were actuated by the worst; pretending to reform; meaning to destroy. But then these Desperadoes had the Countenance of many brave, honest, disinterested, and therefore undesigning Persons, who were in earnest concern'd for their Rights and Privileges, Civil and Religious, and thought themselves oblig'd to stand in the Breach, tho' they were overcome by the Waves. Those who had been Couriers, such as Monmouth, Shaftesbury, Effes, &c. had their personal Considerations plainly in view: But the Citizens of London, Bathel and Cornith, Pilkington and Stude, how could they be advantaged by kindling Comotions in the State? Or, rather, What could induce them, in such dangerous Times, not only to take upon them the Office of Sheriff, at all times troublesome and expensive, but now apparently dangerous;

"He (Kennet) hath taken no Notice of the great Alteration in the Honour of the Citizens upon this Reform: One might discern it in their Spirits and Countenance. For as soon as the new-sworn Sheriffs entered upon their Office, in the Low Precinct, was refus'd to sit in the several Counters; and the Sheriffs open'd their Halls, and began the Course of Pushing the several Companies, which they carry'd on with great Plenty, Jollity, and Splendor. And the Fancy went further; for some Societies without the City, as the Temple, in particular, desir'd his Honours of Jin-

ing with Sheriff Beach, and made him a Present, as the way is. The Malcontents, who had been for a while excluded, were now return'd to their Feils, and, as if they had been lately return'd to Paradise, and come back inclin'd to Poetry, where no Neglect of their Vein in celebrating the Reformation of their Faculty. ring in all Companies. No Person was ever more popular and cried up in the City than he was, and his Health constantly dress'd in the charming Poet's Sense with Adoration. He that kill'd Wear, was not more celebrated for Courage and Constancy, than that great Magnanimous Charlestown appear'd in all Places, public and private, in the Room of the Building, bookbinding, and military Trade was driven before. It is not to be deny'd, but, at many Meetings, good Fellowship, in way of Health, run into some Intemperance and Noise, at such which they call Huzzing, an Usage, then at its Perfection. It was derived from the Mitras and the Shouts the Semites make when Friends come aboard, or go off. And the Use of it in Health was not unlike the Assemblies of the Levantine merchants, that, at every Health, cry'd Chalcedon! So at all the Tory Meetings, as they were call'd, the Cry was that of Heaven! which, at great and solemn Feasts, made up Little Noise, and gave advantage to the Whigs, who had not such Music, to change the Tories with Bravado and Extravagance; and the Antient Antient it upon their own Clubs and Sally which had, perhaps, seen Heaven, if there had been no Disorders made by those others, to occasion Rejoicing, as after a Recovery." Examen, p. 616.

D. 1681. dangerous; unless it can be suppos'd and allow'd, That they were Men of as much Integrity as Resolution; and that they, indeed, expos'd themselves for their Country's sake? But it may be urg'd that they fell into all the Extravagancies of the Party they serv'd, and many times acted so, as to leave themselves without Excuse. They did so. Of all the Virtues, Zeal is aptest to run into Riot, and degenerate into Vice, because it is grafted on Passion, and ever partakes of the Stock from whence it derives its Nourishment. Had not the Excellencies of these Persons been thus alloy'd, they would have deserv'd the Admiration, as they still do the Acknowledgments of Posterity. Men are much apter to melt in the Sun-shine of a Court, than to bear up against the Storms that issue from the same Quarter. And it must be confess'd, that the Spirit of these Times rather deserves the Imputation than the Censure of ours. How hard it was to be maintain'd, we begin already to be sensible. There were Numbers as docile as these were stubborn; and they, having the Wind and Tide to favour them, and the others both to struggle with, had soon the Herd for their Followers.

But if Stuarts and Pilkington more particularly suffer'd their Party-Prejudices to carry them beyond the Bounds of their Duty, it must also be confess'd, that they were as often over-rigorously punish'd for it. All the several Proofs of this Truth, it is scarce possible to enumerate: It shall therefore suffice to say, that when the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen had taken their Resolution to wait on his Royal Highness the Duke with their Compliments of Congratulation on his Return from Scotland, Pilkington, who was a warm, rash Man, not only refus'd to give his Attendance, but madly said, The Duke of York has fir'd the City, and is now come to cut our Throats. Two of his Brother Aldermen, Hooker and Tulfe, had the Honour of being Witnesses against him; and so forward were the (d) Juries now become, says Mr. Echard, that they found a Verdict for the Plaintiff, and in Defiance of Magna Charta, gave no less than a hundred thousand Pounds Damages; which shew'd that the utter Ruin both of the Man and his Family were aim'd at: And to prevent it, he was forc'd to surrender himself a Prisoner in Execution, in Discharge of his Bail, without a Prospect of Redemption; because he did not know how to submit, nor the Duke to pardon. And, as if this was not load enough, when the enor- mau Riot of continuing the Poll, after the Lord-Mayor had adjourn'd the Hall, came under Prosecution, he was put foremost in the Indictment, and saddled with an additional Fine of 500*l*.

Out of the first of these Trials arose another, which deserves also to be mention'd, as it serves to shew how apt Men are to extenuate or aggravate Matters, as they are prompted by their Party Attachments, instead of keeping invariably to the very Letter of the Truth. Sir Patience Ward had been call'd in as a palliating Evidence for Pilkington, and by his Over-zeal ensnar'd himself: For if any Evidence on either Side, in such Times as these were, is to be credited, he swore first, (e) That Pilkington was not in the Room when the Duke was kill'd; and afterwards, that when Hooker took Exceptions to Pilkington's Words, he, Ward, laid his Hand on Pilkington's Mouth, &c. Which latter Part of his Deposition falsify'd the former, and furnish'd Matter for a Charge of Perjury against him; that was pull'd on with such peculiar Malevolence, as manifested the Man was prosecuted, not the Fault; and that the Punishment alone was sought after, not the Example.

All that remains to be said of the Strivings of the two Factions for the Superiority in the City this Year, relates to the Common-Council, and to the Practices of the Court, to procure a Majority therein, in order to complete their System: For with Reason apprehending, that these tedious and vexatious Contentions would be annually renew'd, and that the Malcontents might again find an Opportunity to give the Law, they resolv'd to strike at the Root, and by Force, or Surrender, make way for its being to new-model'd, as should leave the King Master in Perpetuity of their Fundamental Privileges. The Lawyers had the first already under Consideration; and both in public and private, had pronounc'd, that the Issue would be as the Court would have it: But the very Observance of Forms was what the Impatience of those in Power could scarce submit to; and therefore a more expeditious way was thought of, which was to persuade the City, if possible, to adopt the last, and to become Felo de se.

The Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs were already at their Devotion; and while their Affairs had every where so florid an Aspect, it was believ'd the Common Council, also, might be made to keep pace with the

(d) Edw. Barret says roundly, "They were become the Shame of the Nation, as well as a Reproach to Religion; for they were pack'd and prepar'd to bring in Verdicts, as they were directed, and not as Matters appear'd on the Evidence." But, in these Cases, it does not appear that Evidence was wanting: And therefore the Jury are to be blam'd only for their Rigour, in assigning such unreasonable Damages, not for the Issue of their Verdicts.

(e) The Perjury had-quester states the Case thus: "Ward was indicted for Perjury, it being said that since he swore, that the Duke was not spoken; and that the Jury had given a Verdict upon the Evidence that they were spoken; by Consequence he was guilty of Perjury. It was said, on the other Side, That when Two swear one way, and a Third swears another way, a Jury may believe the Two better than the One; but it is not certain from thence that he is perjur'd. A Man's swearing to a Negative, that such Words were not spoken, did only amount to this, That he did not hear them: And it would be hard to prove, that he who swore so had heard them. But Ward prov'd, by him that took the Trial in short-hand, as he had done some others with great Approbation, that he had said, to the best of his Remembrance, these Words were not spoken by Pilkington; upon which Hooker had said, his Assertion was better than his Memory. And the Attorney-General, in summing up the Evidence to the Jury, had said, They ought to have no regard to Ward's Evidence, since he had only depon'd upon his Memory." Fol. l. p. 556.

the Times; and thereby render the whole Corporation of a Piece.

To effect this on one Side, and to prevent it on the other, was the great Business of both Parties till St. Thomas's Day, when the Elections were to be made as usual. And in order to facilitate the Experiment on the Court-Side, the Bishop and Clergy of London were call'd upon to let loose the Excommunications, before spoken of, against the Dissenters, in order to deprive them of their Votes: But, according to Bishop Burnet, that Prelate (London) beginning to apprehend, That Things were running too fast, he chose to venture the King's Displeasure, rather than be over-active in his Obedience. "The Clergy of the City, he expressly says, refus'd to make Presentments: The Law laid that on the Churchwardens; and so they would not meddle officiously." And, upon the whole, he tells us, "That, after all the Practices of the Court in the Returns of the Common-Council, they could not bring it to near an Equality for delivering up their Charter." With this Addition: (f) Jenkins manag'd the whole Business of the City with so many indirect Practices, that the Reputation he had for Probity, was much blenish'd by it: He seem'd to think it was necessary to bring the City to a Dependence on the Court in the surest Methods he could fall in; and, if these did not succeed, that then he was to take the most effectual ones; hoping, that a good Intention would excuse bad Practices."

From these repeated Mortifications, which fell so thick and fast on the Body of the Malcontent-Faction, we must now make a Transition to the Head. The (g) Order of Council forbidding all Persons in the King's Service to frequent the Company of the Duke of Monmouth, before spoken of, had scarce been made, before his Majesty was taken ill of a slight feverish Indisposition; and though it neither seiz'd him violently, nor was attend'd with any bad Symptoms, nor threaten'd to last long, we are told by Ferguson, it was held expedient to have Warrants ready for the seizing the Person of this dangerously popular Man, and also the chief of his Party; that, in case of a Demise, they might not be in a Condition to make good their Menaces by disturbing the Succession: And tho' the King's speedy Recovery preserv'd his Grace for a while from the Effects of this politic, tho' illegal Precaution, it was not long before he fell into the Hand of Power and the Subject was encourag'd to make a Merit of approaching with Addressees at his Expence.

He had this Summer made an ostentatious Parade into Cheshire, under the Pretence of a Horic-Race, as formerly into Somersetshire; and his Friends had contriv'd to give him a pompous Reception, by assembling all the Gentlemen of his Party through the whole County to do him Honour, and bid him welcome: And at Stafford, in his way back to London, he was entertain'd at Dinner by the Corporation. But the Feast was scarce over, it seems, before he was taken into the Custody of a Sergeant at Arms by virtue of a Warrant from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, in the midst of all his Grandeur, and when surrounded with such a Crowd of his Idolaters. He prudently submitting to the Arrest, and they conniving at it with as much Deference as could have been shewn by the most resig'd Loyalist; and, thereby, at once disarming the most pointed Suggestions of his Enemies. Notwithstanding which, the Grand Jury of Cheshire remitted an Address to his Majesty at New-Market, importing, "That they dislike'd and disown'd the Reception which the Duke had met with in the County, and the (b) Circumstances attending it: That they believ'd the greater Part of the Gentry were not concern'd in it; and that they declar'd, for their Parts, they would be far from countenancing any Endeavours to alter the Succession, or to allow of any armed Violence or other Designs to accomplish it, and that they further resolv'd and promis'd not to create or encourage any Person who should obstinately persist in Courses dislike'd by his Majesty, which might any way tend to the shaking the public Peace, &c."

This Address was inserted in the very next Gazette of October 16, possibly by way of Hint for another Round of Abhorrences: But either the Country was tir'd of preparing them, or the King of accepting them; for it does not appear that the Precedent was ever follow'd.

Ferguson affirms that the Ground of this Proceeding was a Fear, that the Duke might be made an Instrument of disappointing the pernicious Designs now entertain'd at Court, and a Help, that the seizing him so rudely and suddenly in the Face of such a Number of his Friends, might provoke some of them to make Resistance, and thereby furnish the Caval in Power with the Pretences they wanted, to authorize all the Severities they already prepar'd to pour out on the whole Party.

We have already met with Insinuations of the same nature, in Relation to the Commitment of the Sheriffs: And, over and above what was at the same time mention'd of the Forces at hand, to take the Advantage, Mr. Carte furnishes us with a Circumstance that has very much the Aspect of a Snare for some such Consequence, tho' introduc'd under a different Colour: Those Gentlemen, at the particular Instance of the Duke of Ormond (who oppos'd their being sent to the Tower

by

(G) Grantham of Papers, p. ii. p. 356.]

(f) Ferguson writes, (Grantham of Papers, Part II. p. 123.) That, during the Council for Sheriffs, he had written several Letters to Mear the Mayor, which, by a Wife, he waded out of his Hands, again: Which gives him Occasion to add, "Thus have they led this poor, dull Tool to dance after their Pipe; and now, at the last, dare not to touch a trail him with a Scrip of Paper; by which the World may know how it was manag'd, and what the Honesty and Justice of their Cause was."

(g) Which was occasion'd, as we learn from Mr. Carte, by his Grace's sending a Message to the King, signifying, "That he was ready to throw himself at his Majesty's Feet, but that he would rather dye than be receiv'd, or submit to the Duke of York."

(b) The Mob, recover'd by his Presence, says Mr. Carte, had broke the Windows of Gentlemen's Houses, forc'd open the Doors of the Church of Cheshire, and committed great Disorders. Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 530.

by Water, under a strong Guard, as had been divid'd) being conducted thither through Cheshill, and by the Exchange, the whole Length of the City, by four Beef-Eaters ONLY.

But the same Gentleman assigns a very different Motive for this Proceeding against the Duke of Monmouth, and probably on more rational Grounds. His Grace, according to him, was deeply interrested in the Proceedings at Guild-Hall. His Friend and Favourite, Sir Thomas Armstrong had been equally concern'd with the Lord Grey in the enormous Riot at that Place, before spoken of, tho', as it happen'd, he was not equally a Sufferer for it; and the Duke, himself, had not only engag'd to be at the Election which was to ensue on Box's refusing to serve, but had actually bespoken thirty Post Horses on the Road from Litchfield to London to enable him to be as good as his Word; tho', says our Author, He well knew of what Consequence it (that Election) was to the Security and Quiet of his Majesty's Regn.

Hence then it must be presum'd, that the Reason why he was put under this Arrest was, to prevent him from mingling among those refractory Citizens, who resolv'd neither to be aw'd nor blatter'd out of their Privileges; and to extenuate that Proceeding, which it does not appear that the Duke had as yet furnish'd any legal Pretence for. A Doubt is artfully thrown in our Way, "Whether any violent Attempt was to be made at that time, in which he might be useful as an Head; or whether Lord Shaftsbury had a mind to embark him in his Measures past all Hopes of a Reconciliation."

But, tho' in Cases of positive and immediate Danger, a Government may equitably deviate from the Letter of the Law, and take its Direction from Reasons of State; it is not to mistake the Spectres rais'd by its own Fears for those positive Dangers, and to proceed upon them as if they were Realities. The Law is not, or ought not to be, more tender of the King's Prerogative, than of the Subject's Liberty: And yet we find it represented as a new Crime in the Duke, that he took the Advantage of his Birthright. Our Author's Words are these: "When his Grace was brought up as far as St. Albans, Sir Thomas

Armstrong (who, upon his being arrested, had gone Post to London with a Copy of the Warrant) met him there with a Habeas Corpus, which he had got from Judge Raimond. This serv'd him for a Pretence not to go to the Secretary's Office, till he was sent for; and then refusing to give Security for keeping the Peace, he was committed to the Sergeant's Custody, by a new Warrant. He then demand'd another Writ of Habeas Corpus, and Judge Raimond taking time to consider of it till the Monday following, he was then brought before him, and giving the Lords Clare, Ruffel, and Grey, for his Bail, was set at liberty. This Behaviour of his was a new Provocation to the King, who expected he would have been more submissive." Now it appears, even from this very Passage, that the Duke, in point of Law, was the injured Party, that the Court proceeded arbitrarily against him, and that the Consequence to be expected from such an Experiment, in such a Disposition, were rather Rage and Resentment, than Submission and Resignation: It was but natural that he should be stung with the Affront, and that from such violent Treatment he should derive Pretences and Excuses for having recourse to Methods as violent to gratify his Revenge; which the angry Man is but too apt to call doing himself Justice.

It is indeed mention'd to the Honour of those in Power at this time, by Mr. Echard, that the Reins of Government were now held with a more strict and steady Hand than in several Years before; which he exemplifies in several Particulars: As, that the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs were very active and vigilant in suppressing the Clubs and Conventicles of the Malcontents: That the News-Papers in the Service of the same Party, were by Authority prohibited, and all the Hawkers silenc'd: That the Mob, on the 7th of November, having shouted forth a Monmouth! a Monmouth! and committed some Disorders with that obnoxious Name in their Mouths, the Trained-bands were let loose upon them, and several, being taken, were punished with Imprisonment, Fines, Pillories, &c. and that, in particular, an Order of the King and Council was issued, commanding, (1.) That no Person whatsoever should presume to make and admitted to Bail.

A Spirit of Severity prevails in the Government.

(1.) Of this Affair, Mr. North gives the following circumstantial Account, as tending to the particular Honour of his Brother the new Sheriff, as follows:

"Against the 7th of November, 1682, there were made the extraordinary Collections, and Engines set to work upon the Fabric of various Poppinies, and the whole Proceeding was to come out with many Alterations and Additions; and all People were alert in expectation of seeing this fine new Play.

The King was then resolv'd to hinder the Execution of that Design; and it was greatly deliberated which way to do it. The King was for that of the Magistracy of the City, who ought to do it, and were now willing, if they could, and so long they ought. Others, that had an Idea of popular Fury in Extremity, thought it was impossible to beset one so easily. Of which Number the Lord Chamberlain, Norton, was one; he thought the Rabble, what the Zeal, and what the Spirit, were set upon it, that it would be very hard to put them by. Some, as of course, were for Horic and Foot without more ado. But the King would speak with the Magistracy. So the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs attended; that is, Sir John Mow, and Sir Dudley North and Sir Peter Bult; which two latter, with several other had been chosen Sheriffs not long before. And, when the Occasion was told them, and that the King expected they should prevent the intended Riot on the 17th of November Instant, Sir Dudley North, the elder Sheriff, stipp'd forwards, and said, that, having his Majesty's Command, and a little Assistance in reference, if he wou'd if October were, they should not but to take away a Poppet from any one that should pretend to fight it. That was his *Leisur*ing Manner of expressing himself. The King heard this with the greatest Satisfaction imaginable; and, turning to the Lord Chancellor, ask'd him there, my Lord, said he. And his Lordship then ask'd Mr. Sheriff North, how he propos'd to do this? The Sheriff answer'd, that they would have a Company of the City Trained bands in the Exchange, to be ready to fight, if need were; and, if his Majesty is pleas'd, a Company of his Majesty's Guards might be employ'd; I ample that, that, in any Disturbance was considerable, might be set for to fight in the middle of it, (that he wou'd think there would be no such Occasion) he was ready to the contrary; but they wou'd do the Business with us by their ordinary Officers.

This frank and clear Declaration of the City Sheriff was so opposite to the usual Dealings of their Predecessors the former Year, and agreeable to the King's own Judgment and Expectation, make any Bonfire, and other Fireworks, without special Order fo to do from the Lord Mayor and other Magistrates." Which being enforced by the Magistrates of London, and the Justices of Westminster, Guards without the City, and the Militia within, had such an Effect, that, tho' great and notable Preparations had been this Year made for the annual Burnt-offering of a Pope, his Holiness was repriv'd, and the public Peace effectually preserv'd.

But though the Cabinet was thus absolute without-doors, it was not in repose within. If his Majesty had the Pleasure to see his Counsellors endeavour to outstrip each other in his Service, he had also the Mortification to see that they jostled each other for the Reward; and to find, that he was not in a Capacity either to satisfy their Cravings, or put an end to their Importunities. Death did not make Vacancies last enough: And every body was careful not to incur the Disgrace of being remov'd. Thus his Majesty's Difficulties rose from such a Circumstance as seem'd to argue him under no Difficulties at all; and it became finally necessary to sacrifice Gratitude to Policy, or, in other Words, oblige the Men of former Service to give place to those of present.

There were two great Officers who were within this Predicament, the Earl of Radnor Lord President of the Council, and the Earl of Anglesey Lord Privy Seal. If both could have been remov'd, the Peace of the Cabinet might have been effectually preserv'd, perhaps, by the Admission of the two principal Claimants into their Places, the Earl of Halifax, and Mr. Seymour. But the King had his Reasons why he would remove but one at a time; and at last determined that this one should be Anglesey; for what Reason, and under what Influence, the Sequel will explain. Nor was even he to be remov'd without some Pretence; and either that Noblemen's Conduct had been so faultless, or so circumpect, that no better could be found than certain Passages in a Book of his, which had been publish'd in the preceding Year, in answer to the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs of his own Conduct in the late Wars of Ireland. These Passages were deem'd to cast a Reflection on the Memory of the late King; no less a Man than the Duke of Ormond, was call'd upon; not merely to enter the Lists of Controversy with the Earl, but to prefer a Complaint against him at the Council-board; and tho' his Grace acknowledges, in that very Complaint, That there had been a Course of above Twenty Years free and friendly Acquaintance and Correspondence between them, he was prevail'd on to be the Court-Instrument in this Jobb, and to please the King and his Brother, at the Expence of his Friend. His Historian, indeed, insinuates, that the Task was disagreeable to him: And no doubt it was so; which increases the Wonder, how a Man of his gallant Turn could stoop to to mean an Office, unless it can be suppos'd that Obedience, without Reserve, is the Sum of all political Virtues.

A Controversy between the Duke of Ormond and the Earl of Anglesey.

This Complaint of the Duke's was prefer'd June 17, containing in Substance two (7) Articles. 1. That the Earl had injuriously reflected on the late King in his said Book. 2. That he had maliciously endeavour'd to calumniate and asperse the Duke of Ormond; and produc'd an Order of Council for the said Earl to attend the Board on the twenty-third, which he did (tho' not able to stand, because of the Gout, with which he was at that time afflicted to the last Extremity.) And Expectation, that it fill'd him with Content as to this Affair. And, when the Time came, it happen'd as was prognosticated; for there was nothing like the Noise of extraordinary Forces. The Faction found there was to be no Boy's Play now, nor any Conivance of the Magistrates, but, on the contrary, right down Resolution in earnest to suppress the Disorder; and the Faction not being economica'd for making a Push upon the Main at this time, they wholly withdrew, and gave up the tumultuous Game for lost. And the Sheriffs, mounted in a Caparison with their blue-coat Attendance, rode the Petrolvile about the City almost all Night, and no use attempted to make a Bonfire. Such is the Force of a regular Magistrate's Authority to keep the Peace, if he be resolv'd to execute it, and neither for Timidity or Perfidy fails of doing his Duty. About Three in the Morning, the Sheriffs were inform'd, that, in a back Building without Bishopgate, there were some Pigeons discover'd; if they went, and, upon Search, found a Parcel of equivocal Monsters, half-fowl'd, like those fabled of the Mind of Nilus. Legs and Arms by couplet above, Heads under'd, and Bodies un-headed, with the Windrose and Timber-work wherewith, if this Interposition had not come, and the Game turn'd from fell to Earnest, all the Shew was to have been compos'd. But woe! was the Case; for these mangled Beginnings of human Reformation, being hal'd forth into the street, made no small Sport among the very same Rabble as were to have been divert'd with some another Way in more Perfection. Thus ended this Discoloraria, never to appear again, till like Mithras's are hatching, and encourage'd to take another Tour in the same Form as was here intenc'd. Examen, p. 579. 580.

[2] It also contain'd the following Passage: "The Duke of Ormond humbly conceives, that, at least while the Lord Privy Seal and he have the Honour to be of your Majesty's Privy-Council, and in the Stations they are, it will not be fit for him to publish such an Answer to the Lord Privy Seal's Book and Letter, as might otherwise be necessary in vindication of Truth, in late Majesty's Justice and Honour, and his own Integrity." His Grace's own Historian also says, vol. II. p. 521, "That it was not till he had receiv'd repeated Orders from Court, that the Duke wrote and sent over an Answer to the Earl's said Book; which, continues he, I have read in Manuscript, but was never printed: Both which Passages seem to insinuate, that the Duke had never printed any thing against the Earl: Whereas the Earl, reflecting on the Passage in his Grace's Representation just quoted, says, "The Earl does not know what the Duke means by saying, That at least while the Lord Privy Seal and he, being, which he would insinuate it fit for the Earl to be dispos'd to make room for that long-threaten'd Answer, that he might have the more home and fuller Stroke at the Earl before your Majesty, when he hath endeavour'd but cannot hurt him before your People."

And it appears that it is but a new Fancy and Consideration taken up by the Duke; for when he was pleas'd not only to write, but publish his virulent Letter of the 12th of November, against the Earl, it had not, it seems, affected his Thoughts as of any Import; and still since then, that it is too late and dishonourable an Appeal to be made to your Majesty, after the Duke hath done it, without Notice, in Prise to the People, and would never, if possibility have been attempted, but that he thinks be hazardous in a more happy Conjunction, or hath entertain'd some groundless Hope of Favour by the Earl's Deposition, which he will never in the least apprehend from a just Master that he hath faithfully serv'd to long.

And therefore the Earl, conceiving that the Duke hath already in Print charged him with all he hath to say, and more than he can make good: And three being his Obligation of Honour lying upon him to publish an Answer to the Lord Privy Seal's Book, which (without Defence or Respect to him) would be necessary in vindication of Truth; and the said Earl, so ways apprehending the Danger of such an Answer, humbly beseecheth your Majesty, that the Duke may be at Liberty and encouraged in his worthy Design for Vindication of Truth by his Answer, without regard to the Earl, who is ready and willing to be arraign'd upon for the Truth's sake, and should much more what the Duke says with vain Hopes, whether or insinuate to your Majesty, than any thing he can or fall think fit to publish for that End."

And when the King came in fifth, in a personal Address to his Majesty, signify'd, that he should rather have expected the Duke of Ormond to have complain'd of the Earl of Castlehaven's Book, which aspers'd and scandaliz'd his Royal Father's Government, and represented his Protestant Subjects of Ireland as Rebels, and the confederate Irish Papists as Loyal Subjects; than against his, which was calculated to vindicate both; and which had done it so effectually, that the Earl of Castlehaven, himself, in his Preface to the second Edition of his Book, had confess'd, that himself, and the said Irish Confederates, were, indeed Rebels; and, that all the Water in the Sea could not wash that Rebellion off that Nation: And then refer'd himself to a written Vindication, which he then presented to the Board.

Not to enter too minutely into the Particulars of this Controversy, it shall suffice to say, that in the said Vindication, the Earl, having first reprehended the Duke for applying to his Majesty by Representative, when it was his Duty, as a Subject, to have done so by Petition, affirms, That the Book was intended as no more than a private Correction of the Lord Castlehaven, to whom it was accordingly sent, and thro' whose Hands, not the Lord Privy-Seal's, it found its way to the Press; and concludes with a Request, that his Grace of Ormond would in due Form of Law, and by legal and certain Articles charge the Earl with Particulars, to which he may answer by Advice of Council.

On the 13th of July, the Duke exhibited the (A) Particulars thus call'd for. On the 27th the Earl deliver'd in his Answer, and both the Lords having been respectively heard; and being withdrawn, it was resolv'd at the Board, "That the Lord Privy-Seal's Letter to the Earl of Castlehaven, was a scandalous Libel against his late Majesty, against his now Majesty, and against the Government." But no particulars were mention'd to ground that Censure upon. And when the Parties were call'd in again, the Lord Chancellor only told the Lord Privy-Seal, That the King conceiv'd him faulty in one particular Clause of his Letter, not made a Part of the Duke of Ormond's Charge, wherein the Committees of the Parliament of Ireland were mention'd as having been concern'd in the Intrigues of the Popish Faction at Court; but that the Council had appointed his Lordship to produce the Vouchers, mention'd in his Answer, in order to a further Hearing on the next Council Day, August 3. But in this Interval, the Earl, by the Entries in the Council-book, having found the Cause to be already prejudg'd, declin'd making any further Appearance; but, instead thereof, sent a warm, expostulatory (1) Letter to his Majesty under Cover to the Lord-Privy-Seal, on the visible Partiality of this Proceeding; not without some home Reflections on the Council-Board, for having usurp'd a Power to sit in Judgment on a Peer, for libelling, not warranted by the Laws. On the Day appointed for the Earl's further hearing, this Letter was read; and, if debated, produc'd no Revolution; only the Lord Castlehaven was examin'd in his Turn, and his Book was pronounc'd, A Scandalous Libel against the Government, as the Lord Privy-Seal's had been before. And thus the Controversy rested till the 9th, when it was brought to the intended Issue (m) by

(B) Some Colleges of which were as follow.

Speaking of the Council's Resolves against his Book, he says, "Your Majesty may imagine with what Annoyance, as well as Trouble, this came to my Knowledge; I should wish, less Concern had been a Dagger at my old, faithful Heart, than to have receiv'd the Wound I have from your Royal Hand, after three-and-twenty Years faithful and diligent service under your Majesty's rule."

After which he proceeds thus: "I do not know by what Right or Authority the Council-table, who are limited by the Law in those jurisdictions, take upon them the Trial of a Peer for pretended Libelling; tho' I should be glad to see their Zeal against real Libelling, which is the dangerous and unchristian'd Sin of the Age."

I am impartial, at present, under my Misfortune in this, thro' your Majesty, who hath so often declared to your People, that you will govern according to Law, will not deny your old Service a fair and legal Trial, to some one of your Courts of Justice, upon the Points whereof the Duke of Ormond hath accus'd me, before they take my Impression on your Majesty to my Prejudice; and then, I no ways doubt, by a due Administration of the Laws, I shall by Juries legally impartial and unsway'd with, which is the Right of every Subject, be restor'd to your Majesty in this Affair, under a Character more suitable to that unchristian'd Reputation and Honour, with which I am arriv'd at old Age. But if the Duke of Ormond, upon his Prosecution of me before those Judges who have Power to hear and determine, shall, by applying his Defect of Proof in Council, convict me for a Libeller, in any one Point of his Charge, I shall not only deserve your Majesty's Censure, but the utmost Severity of the Law in my Punishment, which may gratify the Ambition of those who promote, and wait for, my Surplusing."

Again: "And no longer as any fact shall dare to come to Court, and by their Factions spread Libels, to the Scandal of all legal Proceedings, and the expensating your People daily, in support of the wile Provision the Law of the Land have made against them, neither your Majesty nor your Kingdoms can be safe, but the Seeds of Sedition will grow up to Confusion."

(C) Possibility might farther to know, that this Controversy was no secret, tho' decid'd, than the most material Parts of it were made public; it may be prov'd, by the Earl's own Dictation: And in the Close of those Papers, care is taken to lead the Nation into a Belief, that the Ground of his Lordship's Displeasur was his Zeal against Popery, which was figur'd to be flowing in upon them: And that the only way of keeping it out, was, by laying about an Union of all his Majesty's Protestant Subjects. In support of which Opinion, a Letter from Dr. Merly, Bishop of Winchester, to his Lordship, dated July 28, 1679, is inserted entire, for the sake of the following remarkable Paragraph.

"You know what I was for in the late Session of Parliament: I mean not a Comprehension, but a Coalition or Incorporation of the Presbyterian Party, into the Church, as it is by Law established: And I am full of the same Opinion, that it is the one only essential Expedient, to hinder the Growth of Popery, and to secure both Parties: And I am very confident, that there are no Englishmen in the World (the Scotch only excepted) that would not conform to all that is required by our Church, especially in such a juncture of time as this is, which it ill I have to say as to that particular, at this Distance."

There is also a posthumous Paper in Print of this great and learned Latin, call'd, The Earl of Arundel's State of the Government and Kingdoms, perpetu'd and inveterat from his Majesty King Charles II. in his Year 1682; which contains or the best Information that may be had shall guide you, by your own private Mind, that others may not receive the Thanks and Dependence due to you first.

As for the other, which is Qualification, let your Majesty's Love and Clemency to your People make it appear to proceed from you unwillingly and of Necessity, for the Support and Strengthening of Government, and to be executed, that it may not seem or be such as is suspected to come from any Principle of Crashty, or Delight in the Prefecture or Fall of any Person. The known Clemency of a Prince and Indulgence to Mercy, doth not to oblige Subjects, than the known Ingratitude of David or King; it being natural in the worst Term to run aside, if he be unmercifully trod upon; and Debase to please, or secretly conceived Jealousy, many times exceed the Loss of most useful and honest Servants.

4. I know your Majesty to be a great Patron of the Church and Church-men, and therefore let their Sakes (who are seldom safe for themselves) I presume to propose, that you will never countenance any of those that shall busy themselves with Matters of State and Government out of their Sphere. In all my Reading and Experience I find, that in the most dangerous Disorders and Revolutions of the World, they have ever had a principal hand; whom their chief Work should be to pray for and promote the Peace of Church and State, in the Calling God both for them. And if never you come under any Opposition or Knowledge, that any Kingdom was happy or prosperous where they had not great an Influence, since the primitive Time and Zeal; nor that ever it succeeded well to themselves, or gain'd upon those under their Charge, when they shew'd themselves active in Temporal Affairs, leaving a Calling competent to employ the whole Man, and are to give themselves in all Diligence and Piety, wherein they are promised a Blessing, as their great Father hath written them. For his Kingdom is not of this World; and that they should not fight, nor strive, nor tempt themselves with the Affairs of this Life.

As a prime Foundation of your Majesty's Gracious and Honest, let the Settlement and Increase of your Majesty's Revenue be laid to heart. Have often solemnly consented to for your Majesty, who have the greatest and surest Revenue of any Potentate in Christendom; but our many times brought to lack great Strength, by the ill Management thereof, that I know not whether your Majesty did not enjoy yourself more in the time of your Exile, being deprived of all your own, than you do now; and your Servants and Followers better contented with Hopes and Expectations, than they are now with their lack Enjoyments, Retrenchments, and Suspensions.

Towards the Redress hereof, such should be sought out and encouraged, that are able and willing to improve your Revenue to the best Advantage, without greedy Purloin of their own private Gain. Such Men no doubt your Majesty's Kingdom doth stand, and may be found; and by a full Calculation of the vast Estates some have rais'd to themselves by a hoole, law, and despicable Way of ordering it, will appear how, and by what Means, your Majesty becomes poor, which others seldom as your Riches; and what a vast Treasure you are at, till this great Waste be vigorously taken in hand, and regulated; by which no doubt your Revenue may be rais'd at least hundred thousands of Pounds Sterling, above what it now amounts to. Let me bear the Disgrace of being accounted an Impudens, if I esteem not what I have said; and then your Majesty will be the best Judge how you have been ever since your Restoration; tho' I scarce note that have serv'd you otherwise, but desire all Honors and Favour may be retained and augmented, upon condition that they who have had the Misfortune to give it as words a Christian; or coming thof of doing your Majesty that Service which is now proposed, may with Patience, and without Envy or Strife, see you better serv'd by others for the future.

The thank Service of your Government being thus enlarged and strengthened, and the Design appearing certain to your Majesty, I sin humbly propose,

1. That the Greatest of your Household may be reduced to that of your most renowned Predecessors. This will add advance your Honour and Respect both at home and abroad.

2. That the Security of your Majesty and Government may be cared for, by a well established Provision for your two Guards, and the unanimous Love of your People, which I will not desire to see, may make your Majesty judge it a dangerous Charge, and for the old Guards your Majesty's Ancestors were serv'd, with the strict Attention of all your Subjects (which you will desire as well as any that ever enjoy'd the Succession of his Kingdom) sufficient.

3. To uphold your sovereignty of the Sea, and to preserve your Majesty's being serv'd and regulated abroad, and your Subjects accustoming themselves safe at home, and in their Trade and Commerce to all Parts of the World, whether they shall carry your Name and Fame, offering more countries more than a powerful Fleet; which the Great House of Assize, and the Charge thereof in that being all the World over, require should reach each choice of your Predecessors, tho' they ever claim'd the Dominion of the Sea; and that the best Use may be made thereof, and with best Husbandry and most Certainty, till your Successors, Yards and Wharfs, may be neatly replenish'd with all warlike Instruments and Necessaries whatsoever, for the speedy Service out of Ports to Sea, and your Ships kept always in good Repair for that end; which which each Subject may happen as we have formerly set, and Occasions for Service, never again to be recover'd, may be lost; both being equally disadvantageous and mischievous to your Majesty and Kingdom.

4. The next thing to assure the Obedience of your Subjects, and to advance your Majesty's Honours and Revenues among all, is to provide that the Course of Justice may run uninterrupted; this being the chief End that the chief Magistracy, or Kings, are advanced above their Brethren, and have a divine Stamp set upon their Authority, as a Seal of Awe and Obedience. In order hereunto, let your Majesty's principal Care be to chuse freely the most able and honest Men, and of the greatest Integrity, for Judges in all the Courts; they who youth others had stood by very unblameable themselves; and here it ought to be considered, whether of all Persons Judges should not hold by the strict Term, and enjoy their Place perpetua, a bene placito, at least, and never be discommodated or displaced, but upon good Proof of Crimes or Offences which render them unworthy that Trust and Dignity, and their Pardonment for which will rejoice your Subjects; they of all Men ought to be placed above the Temptations of Hope or Fear, as much as it is possible, in their Judgments will run down like a Stream, and Righteousness like mighty Waters.

And where Justice is to flow immediately from your Majesty, as towards all Officers and Domestic that hold by no Tenure but your Royal Pleasure, care would be taken of every Step leading therto. Pickthack Informers and Sycophants are the worst Instruments that can get into Princes Courts; but if they do, they are not to be admitted to the King's Ear. Nevertheless, if Informers happen, let your Majesty be so upon your Guard, that no Man be uninform'd, loose down, or raised by a Whistle.

Another main Branch of Justice is that you may be King of all your Subjects Hearts: To find out Ways to unite your People; and, for that happy End, to avoid countenancing divided and dividing Addresses, and Invasions upon the Liberties and Franchises of your People, granted by your Royal Predecessors or yourself; especially when the Trust and Design of them is void, or hath in it from your own Court, or tend to foment Hates and Discontents, and raise Jealousies.

The great Lord Baron Vilcoast St. Alban, who was not only a wise Statesman, but Lord Chancellor of England, advis'd the King to be no Faction or Party, but to make use of, and be above, all, if any be in his Kingdom; or they will much prejudice his Authority and Estate.

I could rejoice to see your People unanimously kind to your Majesty; but for any to pretend it in diminution of better Subjects than themselves, and in Ways provoking, offensive, and reproachful, tending to the Disquiet of your Majesty, and Disturbance of the Peace of the Kingdom, all good and wise Men from their very Souls abhor, as Time will show when this Land-Book of Commerce and Honor, if ever justly in Practice, hath been laid off which it will force us, if not ungenerously kept up and countenanced; In which case, as a Kingdom divided against itself cannot stand, so if my Tears upon such Intrigues traced out the Beach be wide as the Sea, I have deliver'd my own Soul by this timely Warning, which I hope you will graciously consider.

To conclude: Tho' your Majesty is in your own Prerogative above the Reach of Law, and Sovereign of all your People; yet the Law is your Master, and Justice due to him to govern: And your Subjects assure themselves you will never attempt the countering that Law by which you are King, and which you have not only by frequent Delinquencies, but by solemn Oath upon your Throne, been oblig'd, in a most glorious Presence of your People, to the Maintenance of; and that therefore you will look upon any that shall propose to advise to the contrary, as such Persons to be near you; and on those who shall persuade you it is lawful, as for'd Predecessors, and the word and milk of Goshawk's Enemies; you and your Kingdom have. What I say before your Majesty, I have written freely, and like a fervent, faithful Counsellor; perhaps not like a wise Man with regard to myself, as things stand; but I have discharged my Duty; and shall count it a Reward, if your Majesty vouchsafe to read what I shall not but write, and which I beseech God to give a Blessing to.

fax and Seymour, of whom the first had the most signal Services to urge; and also the best personal Interest in his Majesty; which was, perhaps, the Circumstance of most Weight in his Favour. Seymour, we learn, by an unexcusable Roughness of Manners, without the Sanction of an over-scrupulous Life to instance it, had made himself many Enemies, and among them the King, himself; to whom he had the Rashness to lay, upon what Occasion is not specify'd, Sir, how long will your Majesty prevaricate with yourself? But then he had Hyde, Lord Rochester, for his Friend, who, in Virtue of the Confidence repos'd in him by his Royal Highness, his Place in the Treasury, and his (n) Alliance with the Duke of Ormond, divided the Cabinet with Lord Halifax. The worst was, that these two Lords, instead of making use of their Power to dilate, had enter'd into mutual Engagements to forward and assist each other. This laid Lord Rochester under a Necessity to work with the utmost Caution in so nice an Affair, as that of favouring Seymour against the Pretensions of his Colleague: And, accordingly, he rather chose to divert Lord Halifax from pursuing them, than avowedly to oppose him. Thus he had been instrumental in causing him to be rais'd to the Dignity of a Marquis, which he had never sought, in Hope he would think such a Step in the Scale of Honour an Equivalent for the Office he had: And possibly, when it was found, that both the Claimants were alike resolute to have their Share of Profit as well as Honour, he also put in Practice that Stratagem to content both, which Ferguson speaks of, by worming out the Lord-President as well as the Privy-Seal: For according to him, a Message was sent to the old Man in the King's Name to compliment him out of his Place, by signifying, that on Account of his Age and Infirmities his Majesty was willing to dispense with his Service; it being presum'd, that, on the first Intimation of any thing tending that way, he would have thrown up in a Pet. But, contrary to his usual way, having, perhaps, been forewarn'd of the Share by those who had an Interest in rendering it fruitless, he took time to consider of the Message, and undertook to return the Answer to the King himself; who, upon that Occasion, testify'd such a Surprise, as shew'd that those who had usurp'd his Name, had not consulted his Pleasure; so that the Fraud being detected, the Purpose was defeated. And upon the Issue of all, Lord Halifax carry'd his Point, and Seymour, in Resentment left the Council-Board.

[Life of Lord Rochester, p. 228.]

Lord Halifax shew'd it to Seymour before the Council.

This was a double Mortification both to Lord Rochester and his Patron; For in Proportion to the Superiority of Power shewn by Lord Halifax on this Occasion, the Necessity appear'd of balancing it, and by losing in Seymour, a Voice in the Cabinet, they were become weaker when they most stood in need of Strength. Some other Person was therefore to be introduc'd on their Part, of such Talents, Abilities, and Practice in Business as might once more make the Scales even. No Person about the Court better answer'd this Demand in all Respects, than the Earl of Sunderland, who, tho' Brother-in-law to Lord Halifax, was thoroughly and heartily his Enemy, or at least endeavour'd to be thought so: And this was Merit sufficient to atone for his past Conduct with respect to the Exclusion-Bill, and all the other obnoxious Measures of the Malcontents, in which he had engag'd himself almost as deeply as any of them. Bishop Burnet estimates, that it was the general Conclusion of the Public at that time, That he had gone into the Opposition by the King's own Direction, "Who, says he, naturally lov'd Craft and a double Game, that so he might have proper Instruments to work by, which way soever he had turn'd himself in that Affair." And, if so, it must be presum'd his Reconciliation met with no other Obstruction, than what arose from the Animosity of Lord Halifax. The same Prelate farther adds, That the King had an entire Confidence in him; that he was deep in the good Graces of the favourite Duchesses, and that Lord Rochester dispos'd the (e) Duke, on his making great Submissions, to receive him into Favour. All which Particulars being also admitted, it follows, that the King, himself, was, in this Instance, of the Party against his Favourite, as in the Disposal of the Seal, he had chosen to declare for him: Nay, there is Reason to think, that the Admission of Lord Sunderland into the Cabinet was the Fine he paid to the Duke for Leave to make that Promotion; for the former took his Place at the Board, September the 20th; and the latter was not actually constituted Lord Privy-Seal till October 28. And on the other hand, as if to make the Lord Privy-Seal Amends for this Preference, tho' Lord Sunderland was taken into Confidence in September, he was not gratify'd with his old Place in the Secretary's Office, till the 28th of January following.

No sooner, however, did it appear, that Lord Rochester had taken Lord Sunderland by the Hand, than the Marquis look'd upon it as a Breach of the League offensive and defensive, till then subsisting between them, and there is Reason to believe, had express'd himself accordingly: For we find him at once acknowledging to Sir John Ker, that the King had bid his Commands on him to live upon good Terms with Lord Rochester, and declaring, that, however dutiful he was to obey his Majesty, that Minister should give him sufficient Assurance, that he was more a Friend to him than Sunderland, before he should think it advisable to place any Degree of Confidence in him: That, in the mean time, he would keep in his Corner, and be attentive to whatever might be for the King's Service, and not be afraid to acquaint his Majesty with whatever was transacted to his Disadvantage, whoever were concern'd in it: And in time, that as Opportunities offer'd, he should not fail to distinguish those that were his Friends, from those that were otherwise. The plain English of this was, that the Marquis, perceiving his own Ruin was meditated, resolv'd to prevent it, if possible, by ruining his Rival. And he very well knew that the Treasury was a Province, which, if not manag'd with as much Integrity as Ability, would furnish him with very tempting Opportunities.

Boards of Treasury were then held at stated times in the Sovereign's Presence; and thence it follow'd, that all the Lords of the Cabinet had an Insight into the Transactions of that Office; and consequently were in some Degree enabled, as well as enabled, to detect and expose Neglects and Abuses. Now, whether it was in this formal way, or by any more secret Counsel that the Lord Privy-Seal came by his Intelligence, we learn, that his Lordship, soon after this Misunderstanding broke out, made such Discoveries of Mal-Accumulation in the Treasury, as greatly affected the Credit of the first Commissioner, Lord Rocheſter, and made Injustice of them, as caus'd him to be much dreaded and hated within Doors, and as much reverenc'd without.

The Story is told two ways: According to Sir John Reresby, no less than 20,000 l. arising from the Church-Duty had been misapplied to some Use or Uses which Lord Rocheſter could not but be privy to; and was much suspected to have heard of. According to Bishop Burnet, a Branch of the Revenue had been firm'd for 20,000 l. less than might have been actually had for the same Bargain. And Mr. North is express, That the unhappy Difference, as he calls it, between the Lords Halsifax and Rocheſter, was about the Bargain made with the Farmers of the Excise. Which is in the Right, is hard at this Distance to say; for, if Sir John was the Lord Privy-Seal's Confidant, and had his Intelligence from his own Mouth, the Bishop derives his Knowledge from the same Spring: But if, with the collateral Authority of Mr. North, it should be admitted, that the Prelate's Hint, as to the Ground of the Difference, is most to be depended on; there is Reason to think, he is mistaken in the manner of conducting it; for he insinuates, the Lord Privy-Seal proceeded at first in a friendly manner with his Discovery, apprizing Lord Rocheſter of it, as inclining to believe him rather mistaken than guilty; and that he did not prefer his Complaint against him, till he found, that, instead of protesting, he protected those who were the Authors of the Abuse. Now all Contracts are made by the Treasury-Board, and consequently Lord Rocheſter, himself, must have been Principal in this; and if infinitum'd and mislead, might have disgrac'd, but could not prosecute those who had sav'd him to ill; And it is, besides, quite unreasonable and unnatural to suppose that he who was lying in wait for Revenge, would compliment it away. It must, therefore, be concluded, that, according to the usual Dictates of State-Rivalship, he proceeded to make use of the Advantage, as soon as it was found, and made all the Merit he could of the Discovery.

This is certain, that no sooner had he divulg'd it to the King, than the whole Court was divided into Factions; some applauding the Lord Privy-Seal, who alone had ventur'd to disclose the Fraud, and ascribing his Behaviour on this Occasion to his Courage, Fidelity, and Public Spirit, &c. when it was, perhaps, no better than a plausible way of gratifying a private Animosity; and others censuring him, as an officious Meddler, who, under the Pretence of his Majesty's Service, sought only to monopolize his Majesty's Favour.

As to the Result, the Charge was of such a nature, and the Accuser every way so important, that there was a Necessity of bringing it to a Hearing before the Council; tho' it may be gather'd from the Sequel, that the King had rather have been excus'd from the Trouble, since it only serv'd to shew, that he had not Power enough to do himself Justice. Sir John Reresby says, "It plainly appear'd that the King was so much a Loser; but such was the Interest, that Lord Rocheſter, supported, as he was, by the Duke of York, Duchess of Portsmouth, and Lord Sunderland, had with his Majesty, that little or no Notice of the Fraud was taken at this time." He should have added also, that such was the Management of the first Commissioner; for when the Treasury Books were refer'd to, as unquestionable Vouchers of what the Lord Privy-Seal had allegg'd, it appear'd that (p) Three Leaves which contain'd the

Particulars

(p) An honest Violation of the Earl of Rocheſter, in a single Half-year, was publish'd in the Reign of King William, possibly by the Misconduct of Halsifax, himself; in which we find the following Paterfamilias allusion to this Affair.

"The third Thing which the Reason of this noble Earl endeavour to find out, is his Possession (what did provoke me those all other things, because it seem'd to touch him as to his Justice and Integrity, for which he does so truly deserve, as to be honour'd) of the cutting of Three Leaves out of a Book containing the Account of the House-money, during the Administration of the Treasury in the Reign of King Charles II. together with other Scandalous Circumstances relating to this Affair.

But it pleases me infinitely to think I have the clearest Answer to give to this moving Sermon (but it is no more) which can possibly be imagin'd. No Man doubts of the noble Earl's Wisdom and Foresight, and therefore it is impossible for any Man to conceive, that, if he had been inclin'd to any indirect Practice in that Matter, he would not have made use of his Power (which all will agree was very great, after the time when this was supposed to be done) to have damn'd all Possibility of a future Enquiry. But on the contrary, which I urge as a Demonstration of his Innocence, this whole Account is open at this very Day. And if any of the Lords of this noble Earl have a mind to examine into it, they may do it as soon as they please; and I dare say he boldly challenges them to do so. I have heard it said to Discourse by his Maligners, that he may be so bold now, because Sir Ra. Traill, Mr. Argyler, and Mr. Shayle are dead, and that the Challenge was never heard of before. To this I say, Tho' there be no more of yecumour and evidence Insinuations, yet I think it an Answer; that there are two Particulars of the Transaction were cut out; so that whatever might be imply'd, nothing could be prov'd. And to keep Lord Hallifax, himself, from the ill Effects of the Maligency which this Business expos'd him to, the King, himself, found it necessary to say on the Day of hearing, "That his Lordship had done nothing in the whole Affair, but by his Order and Approbation." And as to the Duke, his Lordship gave Sir John Reresby to understand, That his Royal Highness had made it his Business to clear himself from having had any Concern on either Side; for the Fraud on the one hand, and the Discovery on the other, were the general Talk of the Town; but that his Highness should apply to him, before he would apply to his Highness. He told me also (proceeds the same Author) that he had, the Day before, been with the King, and that he was two Hours in private with him; and that he had observ'd to his Majesty, That a Report was spread, as if Lord Rochester was to have the Lord High Treasurer's Staff deliver'd to him; but that he was in Hopes there was no such Intention; for that it would be a great Reflection upon himself, and look as if his Majesty thought he had done wrong to the Man who he immediately so favour'd; and that his Majesty should say, The Man should not be Lord Treasurer the sooner for what he had lately done as Lord Rochester; and that his Majesty was angry with him for giving ear to so groundless a Rumour.

Within two Days afterwards, Lord Hallifax farther told his Confident, That the Duke had assur'd him, he was not in the least concern'd in the Difference between him and Lord Rochester; and that he had reply'd, he was sure his Highness could wish him so ill; and that, if he did, he should never do any thing to oppose him; but that, in such a Case, he should not be able to serve him with that Zeal he could wish; and that his Highness might possibly repent he had lost his Service, to the Degree he desired to use it for him: That he had done no more than he had been by the King commanded to do; and that there was no Man in the Kingdom so great, that he could be decently displeas'd with what was done at the King's Command: That he perceiv'd they, meaning Rochester, had a mind to rid their Hands of him; and that it was likely they might endeavour to make him uneasy in his Station, but that he would take care they should not remove him, First, Because he would stay with the King to be ready to serve him; and, Secondly, Because he had a mind to disappoint those who so earnestly long'd for his Absence: That his whole View had been to save the King Money; and that he knew no greater Service that could be done to his Highness, if he would but be pleas'd to look a little before him into Futurity: That the King indeed had made him a greater Man than he deserv'd to be; but that he had this to say for himself, He was a Gentleman, and that his Highness ought in Justice to have some Consideration for those that bore Escutcheons, as well as for those that had none (Some of the Duke's Creators were scarce Gentlemen); and that for his part he should never say any thing to his Highness but Truth, which though, at first Sight, it might look a little plain and homely, nothing at the Bottom carry'd with it a greater Fund of Respect; and much more to the same Effect. That to this his Highness made answer, that what his Lordship had said seem'd to be very rational, that he was sensible of great Obligations he had to him, and that he never would forget them, but serve him in all he was able, and that so his Lordship should find.

This Lordship, it seems, had also, the same Day, an Interview with the Duchess of Portsmouth, not to make his Court to her, but on the contrary to shew her that he was able to stand on his own Bottom: For he told her, he found that, in case he should stand in need of his Majesty's Favour, he was not to expect many Friends on that Side of Whitehall; and that he made answer, That some who had been very much his Friends, meaning Rochester, came thither sometimes, and that the hope they would be as much his Friends again: That to this he reply'd, He was in much Doubt as to her Intercession, and good Offices, in such a Straight; but hop'd he should avoid the Danger of depending on them. Upon which her Grace reddening, and seeming to be in some Confusion, his Lordship took the Advantage to add, That, were he quite as young as he had been, he might be as well with her as other.

From the Court, as usual, the Dispute created by this Affair made its way to the Publick, and was publicly canvass'd, with the Freedom usual on the like Occasions; the Litigants taking part as their Passions and Prejudices led them, rather than Truth and Information. Thus all the Intersted, that is to say, such who had Dependances on the Exchequer, made it their Business to say all they could in extenuation of the Facts imputed to Lord Rochester; and all the Maltcontents, who expected from the Broils of the Cabinet to derive some Advantage to themselves, now shew'd a Disposition to forgive Lord Hallifax his Apology, and all the Ministers it had occasion'd, and extoll'd him as the Censor of the Age; insomuch, that he himself, tho' not sensible of their Praises, grew fearful of the Consequences; as that it might create a Jealousy elsewhere, which might injure him more essentially than this transient Gale of Popularity could serve him.

was appointed to be his Successor, with the Title of Lord Keeper; but not till after some little Demur, which we find largely accounted for by his Brother and Historian; in Substance thus:—

While Lord Nottingham was on his Death-bed, the King had in Person intimated to Sir Francis North, that the Great Seal, on the Chancellor's Decease, would be put into his Hands; and many other Notices of the same kind from many other Quarters were given him; not from Affection, or to do him Honour, but to put him on solliciting the Place, that the obtaining it might be thought a sufficient Favour, without the additional Pension which had been enjoy'd by Lord Nottingham; But Sir Francis, it seems, saw the Hook underneath the Bait, and instead of applying for the Seal, waited till they were offer'd to him; nor would even then accept the Truitt, without the further Inducement of an annual Pension of 2000*l*. (his Predecessor had 4000*l*. the ordinary Profts of the Seal being held insufficient to support the Dignity; which, after some Difficulty shewn on the Side of Lord Rochester, and some Reluctance on his, was at last granted. The King, putting the Seal into his Hand, said, with some Humour, but more Truth, That he would find it heavy; and his Lordship, in his last Sickness, verily'd that Prediction by saying, That he had never enjoy'd one easy and contented Minute, from the time he was thus rais'd to the highest Honour of the Kingdom. This no doubt was the Overflowing of the Heart; and tho' in point of Time we ought rather to comment upon it at the Close of his Lordship's Administration, than at the Beginning, we shall, for this once, make Order give way to Use; and by the Help of this, and one or two Passages more which Mr. North has slip't into his Life, endeavour to fix the Character, and account for the Actions, of this great Man; of whom our general Historians have said little, and his own Biographer so much.

[Life of Lord Keeper North,
p. 241.]

We find it acknowledg'd by his Brother, or rather gloried in, that he seem'd the vulgar and insane Calumnies; that he was a Prerogative-man, and labour'd to set up arbitrary Power: That, in contempt of them, he labour'd as much as he could to set up the just Prerogatives of the Crown: That he had said, That a Man could not be a good Lawyer, and honest, but he must be a Prerogative-man: That he was sincerely of Opinion the Crown wanted Power, by Law; so far was it from exceeding! And these being his Principles, it is no wonder that his Practice was agreeable; and that the Court and he were so forward to embrace each other. But, if these were indeed his Lordship's Principles, it will follow, that either they were ill-founded, that is to say, That the King had Power enough by Law to extend Protection and exact Obedience; or that the Law, under his Lordship's Influence, was put to the Torture, and made to speak what the King would have it; for under legal Pretences only, without ever drawing a Sword, one of the mightiest and most aspiring Factions, that ever threaten'd the public Peace, was subdu'd, and the Weight of the Sceptre left a Bruise wher-ever it fell.

It is farther manifest, from the Death-bed Saying of his Lordship's just quoted, and will become yet more so, from the Particulars of his Conduct in the Cabinet, as they rise, that when he adopted these high Notions of the Prerogative, he thought only of the Use, and not of the Abuse, more especially in the Hands of a popish Successor: And that a great Part of his Discontent must have arisen from a Sense of the mischievous Effects of that very Power, which he himself had so eminently contributed to establish. While he was only upon the Ascend, and had not gain'd the Summit of Prerogative, the King had the labouring Oar to manage against his People, and it was no difficult Matter to persuade himself that what was his Interest was also his Duty. But when the King became Master, and a furious Court-Faction put his Majesty on arbitrary Measures, which his Lordship was either to authorize at his Peril, or at his Peril refuse, his Eyes were open'd, he saw immensurable a great way off, and nearer had not a little of steady Prerogative at Court: And yet we are farther told, that he never had the Remorse to have in the least disserv'd his Country, by serving the Crown: Which, if true, serves only to shew, that, being falsify'd with the Purity of his own Intentions, he did not think himself answerable for Contingences and Events.

In fine, Bishop Burnet says of him, "That he had not the Virtues of his Predecessor; but he had Parts far beyond him: They were turn'd to Craft; so that whereas the former seem'd to mean well even when he did ill, this Man was believ'd to mean ill even when he did well." And, on the other hand, Mr. North enters this general Protest, "That, to his own certain Knowledge, his Lordship's great Study and Labour was to convince and dispose his Company (in the Cabinet) so as they might heartily co-operate with him in the glorious Work of bringing the King into the foundest Measures of the English Government; which were, to rule wholly by Law, and to do nothing which, by any reasonable Construction, might argue the contrary." Adding, "In this Design he was, in one respect, singular, for he had no Self-Interest, no Boons to ask, no Party to head, no Means to sustain an Interest at Court; depended on nothing but merely the Character he bore, and his own personal Qualifications. Some had the Protection of the Duke of York, and of the French Ladies; others were of the Lord Hallifax's Party; and some of the Lord Rochester's. But he was in the midst of all the Court, solus cum solo; alone by himself; at least after Junkins withdrew. But yet he urg'd continually the same Doctrine, that holding the Law (wherein I always include the establish'd Church of England) his Majesty was not only safe, but growing in Power and Credit, which, if he forsok the Law, would all fall retrograde, and scarce ever be recover'd." And, in another Place, we learn from the same Author, That once in the King's Presence, the Discourse turning on the Subject of using Lenity or Severity in Cases of Tumult or Sedition; and some urging that Rigour, others that Pardon was most proper, his Lordship said, That his Majesty's defensive Weapons were his Guards, and his Offensive, the Laws; and that Enemies were to be resisted by opposing Force to Force; but to be punish'd only by Law.

Impartially speaking, as well from these Assertions for and against him, as from the Facts which are plac'd to his Account, it appears, that his Abilities were as eminent as his Places: That his Services to the Crown deserv'd the highest Reward the Crown had to bestow: That the Craft import'd to him arose from his Profession: That his Endeavours to advance the Prerogative, were not so much a Proof of slavish Complaisance, as that he was perswaded such Endeavours were then necessary to allay the Discontents of the Times; and that upon the whole, he was as (g) honour'd a Man, as the Habits of the Law, and his Attachments to a corrupt and factious Court, in a Licentious Age, would allow.

For the Lord-Keeper or Lord-Chancellor to have a Place in the Cabinet at all times, is almost a Matter of course; but in such times as these, when the great Business of the State was to set the Foot of the Sovereign on the Neck of a Faction, and the Law was the great Engine by which it was to be done, it was indispensable. But, as hinted above, Sir Francis North had a very considerable Footing there before, and was now only immo'd with a superior Title. And as to those who were his Associates there, we find them thus enumerated by himself: The Lord President, Nesbitt, the Lord Privy-Seal, Hallifax, the two Secretaries, Lord Gowen, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, the Duke of Ormond, and Mr. Sydney Godolphin. But Lord Cowley, who, it is agreed by all Parties, was rather a Man of great Interest, Fortitude, and Pleasure, than Business, soon gave place to Lord Sunderland, as already noted, much to the Mortification of the Lord-Keeper, who, we are told, had a thorough Aversion to him. And as to Sir Francis Penberton, and Sir Edward Saunders, the famous Abolisher, before spoken of, who fill'd the two other chief Offices in the Law, tho' they were of the Privy-Council, they had no Access to the Cabinet. This was also the Case of Prince Rupert, who dy'd about this time of a Pleuritic Fever, in the 63d Year of his Age. By the Countenance he had shew'd the Malcontents, he had forfeited the Favour of his Majesty, and of course stood excluded from his Confidence. The last Act relating to the Public that is remember'd of him, was his introducing the first Set of petitioning Lords to his Majesty: And if he afterwards continued to herd with that Party, it must be presumed he did not rest into all their Excellence: For Persons of high Rank have ever the Eyes of the World upon them; and a Behaviour so inconsistent with his Obligations to the King, must have drawn upon him such Reproaches as no Length of Time could have effac'd.

Having mention'd the two Lords Chief Justices, it is requisite to enlarge a little on the Promotion of the one, and the Removal of the other. The King's Bench which had been held by Penberton, was the Post of the most Honour, but, withal, the most Business and the least Profit. It was, therefore, no undesirable thing to descend from thence to the Common Pleas; and Penberton was complimented into it to make Room for Saunders on the King's Bench. "When the Court," says Mr. North, "fell into a steady Course of using the Law against all kinds of Offenders, this Man was taken into the King's Business, and had the Part of drawing and perusal of almost all Indictments and Informations that were then to be prosecuted, with the Pleadings therein, if any were special: And he had the settling of the large Pleadings in the Exchequer against London." Now this was the main Business at present in hand, and this, the same Author, with the utmost Frankness, acknowledge, could not be trusted to Men of doubtful Principles, or such as any thing might tempt to desert them. And yet again in another Place, "And the Truth is, it was not thought any way reasonable to trust this Cause, on which the Peace of the Government for much depended, in a Court where the Chief (meaning Penberton) near shew'd to much Regard to the Law as his Will; and notorious as he was for little Honesty, Boldness, Cunning, and unaccountable Opinions of himself."— And yet this Man, notorious as he was, was twice made a Judge, and as often set aside, besides this (a) Removal, by King Charles the Second, And the very same Notoriety which is urg'd in Excuse for his being now translated from one Bench to the other, was before his Qualification

Sir F. Penberton removed to the Common Pleas, to make Room for Saunders in the King's Bench: Life of Lord Keeper North, p. 223.

Dark of Prince Ka. part.

(*) As his Behaviour on the Chancery Bench almost alone, is sufficient to demonstrate which is as large a room as of Mr. North, in his Life; and who, by way of Introduction, thus expresses himself concerning those who had presided there, on the same Bench before him: "The Lord Pringle, who was a very good Common-Law Judge, made a very bad Chancellor: For his timorous Manner of creating and judging abundance of Points, some on one side, and some on another; and possibly concluding that each should have a competent share; made Work for Registers, Solicitors, and Counsel, who drubb'd up Causes to his Honour. Then came my Lord Godolphin, like the Mouth of Mary; as they say, is like a Lion, and not like a Lamb; for he fearg'd not to speak what Ailes he would make of all the Council at the Bar; but was soon rebuk'd.— The Lord Leining, formerly Attorney-General, came in, and for there a great many Years. During his (a) the British, I cannot say the Justice, of the Court shew'd exceedingly. For he was a Formalist, and took pleasure in hearing and deciding, and gave way to all kinds of Motions the Council would offer; imagining that if he left the Bar, and, with his Gold Salary, retir'd to his private house, the Justice was every day; and that speaking with Honour the People could not, who were more than his Law, and that not in a Respect. He then speaks of his Brother, the Lord Keeper North, "who, says he, coming after, and knowing how much the Suters crav'd by the Flourishing of the Court, and being no Concern in many things but the Flour of Justice, and Dispatch of the Suters; and ever regarding, that unreasonable Delay was the fault on the Suters, as Justice was in the End; and that if he were time, should not be in a Respect, rather than first upon the Bench, he put on his Thoughts to attempt a tolerable Regulation of the Court."

(a) Mr. North's testimony says on this Occasion, That Sir Francis Penberton returned to his Position in the Common Pleas, under Sir Francis North; which will be understood of his first Dismission from the Bench.

caution for Preferment. This was appointing Judges to serve a Turn, with a Vengeance: And, indeed, our Biographer makes no Difficulty to own it: But then he vindicates it at the same time with all the Art he is Master of. "This Question, says he, turns upon the supposed Integrity of the Government. They are, as all Governments must be, entrusted with Power; which Power may be used to good or ill Purpose. If it be to ill, it is no Objection to the Reasonableness of the Power, because Power must be. Here a Government is beset with Enemies, ever watching for Opportunities to destroy it; and having a Power to chuse whom to trust, the taking up of Men whose Principles are not known, is more than an even Chance that Enemies are taken into their Poison. Here the Government first consulted of the Justice of the Law against the City's Charter, and found by clear Advice, that it was forfeited, and ought to be accordingly condemn'd. And upon the Event, this Impudence pass'd; even the Peace of the Nation. Would any Government in the World trust that Justice to the Arbitrament of Enemies, or run the Hazard of having such? Or were it a Doubt of Opinion, would they not be sure of Men to judge whose Understandings and Principles were lock'd down? What is the Use of Power but to secure Justice? it may, it is true, protect the contrary, and so Men may kill one another." "The true Distinction is, when Governments use Powers that do not belong to them (as High Courts of Justice) and when they use only such Powers as are properly lawful, as the ordinary Courts of Common Law. It is a Maxim of Law, That Fraud is not to be allowed in Lawful Acts. If Governments secure their Peace by doing only what is lawful to be done, all is right."

When we use a Man's own Words, we cannot be accus'd of Misrepresentation: And these, it is obvious, contain a Mixture of Truth and Sophistry. All Governments must, indeed, have Power sufficient for their own Preservation; but then it is not merely for their own Sakes; nor to enable them to oppress; but to protect those they govern. In particular, Power is not the Creature of the English Government, to be us'd to Good or Ill; at the Discretion of those who possess it; on the contrary, as any Branch becomes a Nuisance, the Subject has a Right to insist on its being abolish'd: And it has ever been the Custom to insist on it accordingly. Not is even the Law itself, to be made the Terror and Veation of the Subject: Empson and Dudley took care to have it on their Side; and yet they were prosecuted and punish'd as Oppressors. And it is so far from being true, that all is rightly done that may be legally done, that, even to a Proverb, the Abuse of Law is reckon'd the worst of all Abuses. There is also another Maxim which has a broader Foundation, and has obtain'd more universally, than that above quoted by Mr. North, viz. The Public Good is to be consider'd above all Laws; nor ought it ever to be barr'd away on any Pretence whatever, to gratify the Cravings, or answer the Conveniencies of a Court. And as to the Arguments drawn from the Influence of a Government's being beset with Enemies, and the Necessity of finding out sure Men to dispatch them, it concludes, too much. Charles's Government was beset with Enemies. Every bad Government will be beset with Enemies, and may avail themselves of the same Pretence. In which Case, what was expedient would be call'd lawful, and a Nation must be undone, that a Government may be safe.

As to the Role and Character of Spencer's Life and Character of Spencer, Esq. on whom this great Tract of condemning the City Charter was thus obscurely report'd, it is thus in substance given by Mr. North. "He was at first no better than a poor Beggar-Boy, in a Pitiful Fowling, without known Parents or Relations; liv'd on the Scraps which were thrown to him by the Attorneys, Clerks of Chancery's Inn; taught himself to write in a Small-Cafe Window; became a Halcyon-Writer; then an exquisite entering Clerk, and at last an able Counsel." As to his Life, says our Author, he grew a mere Lump of morked Flesh by continual Sotifmetes. And as to his Practice, his great Dexterity was in the Art of special Pleading; in which he would lay Snare that often caught his Superiors who were not on their Guard: And he was not out of Success for his Clients, that, rather than fail, he would set the Court hard with a Trick; for which, he sometimes met with a Reprimand. Lord Chief-Justice Hale, in particular, could not bear his Irregularity of Life; and for that and a Suspicion of his Tricks, us'd to bear hard upon him in Court. And yet we are farther told, That the King observing him to be of a free Disposition, loyal, friendly, and without Greediness or Guile, thought of him to be Chief Justice of the King's Bench at that nice Time.

There are yet two other Persons who, about this time, had the Honour to be admitted into the Bourgeois of Buinefs at the Council-Board; and these were the famous petitioning and presenting Earl of Huntington, who had now turn'd his Back on his old Friends for good and all, and the Earl of Peterborough, who had in long been in the Service of his Royal Highness.

And it is, in general, observable of this Year, that, tho' his Majesty had no War upon his Hands either by Sea or Land, nor had any very material foreign Negotiations to manage, nor Parliamentary Difficulties to struggle with, and consequently thro' all the High Roads to Favour and Preferment, his Subjects had never less Opportunity to arrive at either, Titles and Honours were scarce ever bestow'd with a more liberal Hand; for, over and above the Compliment to the Lord Hollifield, already spoken of, we find the great Malcontent of Scotland, the Duke of Hamilton, elected a Knight of the Garter; the Duke of Ormond of Ireland created Duke of Ormond of England; the Marquis of Worcester, Duke of Beaufort; the Lord Norrey, Earl of Abington; the Viscount Camden, Earl of Gainsborough; Lord Dorcy, Earl

A. D. 1682. Earl of Holborn; Lord Windsor, Earl of Princetown; Lord Townsend, Viscount Townsend; Sir John Bennet, Lord Ossulton; Sir Thomas Thynne, Viscount Weymouth; Colonel Legg, Lord Dartmouth; Lord Alington, Baron of Wimondley; and Col. Churchill, Lord Churchill of Asynoth in Scotland.

No doubt the Heralds have done all these Noblemen Justice, in specifying their Merits and Services in the Preambles of their several Patents; but as yet they have not been made the Substance of History? Only of the Duke of Ormond we find it recorded,

[Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. II. p. 524.]

"That the Earl of Rocheſter, apprehending that the Marquis of Bath aspir'd to a still higher Title, and jealous of a Minister who was his Rival in Power, to prevent his getting the Part of the Duke of Ormond, propos'd to the King, and press'd him to honour his Grace with an English Dukedom; which his Majesty comply'd with, in consideration of his faithful Services as well in England as in Ireland; and particularly for his keeping this last Kingdom quiet all the time of the Plot, while England was in the utmost Distraction."

While the Court was thus in its full Flow of Prosperity, and distributing its Rewards among those who, it may be presum'd, had contributed to turn the Tide, those of the opposite Faction, seeing their Hopes blasted, their Strength broken, their very Popularity departing, and themselves on the point of being driven into the Toils on every side, fell into all that Confusion and Distress which great Disappointments bring on those who are not rather duly prepar'd by Reason and Philosophy for the worst that can befall them; or who have not Fortitude to bear it; or who have study'd more to act plausibly than wisely; or who have follow'd Ambition instead of Virtue? And among them all, the Earl of Shaftsbury, who had lost the Intelligence, who is accus'd of having boasted, that he would walk the King deſerv'dly out of his Domitour, and that he would make the Duke of York as great a Yacoub upon the Earth as Cain, sunk the lowest: On the very Night that the two new Sherrifs were admitted, as if the whole Magazine of Court-thunder was instantly to be discharge'd on him, he took his House, and sought a Hidden place in the City; where he staid for some time, as we are told, with a Mind so broken and disorder'd, that his very Dreams prompted him on rushing into the most desperate Dangers, by making an instant Appeal to the Sword:

[Bills of Secret Trade Accounts p. 9.]

But that, finding the Men of Action were not to be brought into his frantic Measures, he threw up the Game as lost, and with the utmost Privacy embark'd for Holland; being glad to seek an Asylum in that very Country which he had once so solemnly devoted to Destruction. Nor did his Mortifications end even here; for, upon his Arrival at Amsterdam, which he had chosen for the Place of his Residence, having solicited the Magistrates to be made one of the upper Burghers of that City, in order to be secure of its Protection, and the English Consul not only opposing it in the Name of the King his Master, but putting them in mind of his famous Dilemma est Caribages, as an unpardonable Sin against the State, his Suit was rejected; and, we are inform'd, he had not so much as a Compliment from the Burghers to countenance him. In this forlorn and despicable Condition he languish'd about six Weeks, surrounded with a few miserable Refugees; not one considerable Man of his own Party, unless Bengwin should be so call'd, chusing to do him Honour by following him into Exile; and then gave up the Ghost; under the Horror of what Compunctions, who shall say!

Here let the Man of eminent Rank, Title, Fortune, Capacity, Greatest and Importance, pause, and reflect one Moment, seriously and solemnly, on the eminent Vanity of all those coveted and envied Possessions, when they become the Prostitutes of Ambition. Ambition was Lord Shaftsbury's Idol; to Ambition he sacrific'd all things: Ambition made him a Courtier; Ambition made him a Patriot; and to Ambition, tho' not above the usual Forms, he dy'd a Martyr. Mr. Locke writes to him a noble Saying, viz. "That it is not the Want of Knowledge, but the Perverseness of the Will, that fill Mens Actions with Follies, and their Lives with Disorder." And it is greatly to be lamented, that he did not apply it to the Regulation of his own Life, in which case, it had probably prov'd one continued Scene of Happiness and Glory to himself, and had been measur'd by an uninterupted Series of Services to his Country: Whereas, by making all his Powers and Faculties the Slaves of his Passions, he was the Instrument of Tyranny when in Power, and of Confusion when out; was ever expos'd to Troubles and Disappointments; was more hated than rever'd by his Associates always; and when he left the World, furnish'd his old Adversary the Duke of Ormond with Occasion to observe, to the Mortification of all turbulent Spirits, "That those of his own Party extenuated the Loss of him by saying, he did them more Hurt than Good; and that the Court would not acknowledge it to be any Advantage to them, as being of Opinion he did them more Good than Hurt: So that his Departure was neither lamented by his Friends, nor rejoic'd at by his Enemies."

[Appendix to the Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. II. p. 101.]

As it may be suppos'd, his abandoning such a Damp on his City-Friends, it must be concluded, that his Flight, which could scarcely be conceal'd, communicated to them a Portion of his Despair: And this, no doubt, made Mr. Secretary Jenkins's Labours in the Elections of Common-Council-men, before-spoken of, the easier: And this, in the Passage already-quoted from Bishop Burnet, it is insinuated, that, after all his Practices, he could not procure Returns wholly to his Mind; it is certain he made a very considerable Alteration in that Body; as appears by their being induc'd, at their first Meeting, in conjunction with the Court of Aldermen, to compliment Sir John Mier with their Thanks, for the good Service by him perform'd last Year, when Lord Mayor.

It soon appear'd, however, that all the Spirit of the Faction was not departed with Lord Shaftsbury: For Papillon and Dubois having demanded of Pritchard, the present Lord Mayor, to be admitted to the Exercise of the Office of Sheriff, to which they had been elected by the Liveries, and receiving no Answer, caus'd him to be arrested April the 24th, in an Action upon the Case. Good enough the Under-Sheriff was the principal Promoter of this provoking Insult; Brome the Coroner granted the Warrant; and one Keeling, of whom we shall have Occasion to treat more largely, was made a special Bailiff to put it in Execution; Good enough telling him, the Party would take it amiss, if he refus'd to officiate on this Occasion; and Thirty or Forty of them being present when he receiv'd his Instructions. As to the Event, the Lord Mayor obey'd the Warrant, and was conducted to Stinner's-Hall, where Brome refused, and was there held in duress Six Hours: In which Interval one Fletcher, a Sergeant of the Poultry-Compter, hearing of what had been done, or possibly having been apply'd to, and having an Action of Debt against Brome for 100*l.* arrested him in his turn, and carry'd him off to the Compter: By which means the Lord Mayor and his Fellow-prisoners (for the Sheriffs North and Rich, and several of the Aldermen, were involved in the same Action) were left at liberty, and went home in peace.

Mr. North intimates, that it afterwards appear'd that Action was a Preparative to something very extraordinary, by way of Insurrection, which the Party was at this time to have undertaken, tho' it did not appear in what Manner or Order it was to have been executed. "The whole treasonable Society, says he, were but just now in Arms." Adding, "It seems the Train did not take; for the City-Militia took the Alarm, and Sir John Peake, an Alderman, and Colonel, with extraordinary Dispatch, had his Regiment under Arms in a few Hours; which being known, or rather some other Prattle about Whitebals, that set in the dark (for the Guards would have suffic'd to have crush'd them) that Party would venture no farther at this time."

But surely this is an Over-Refinement. If they had any rebellious Design, why were they not in Arms? Did they imagine, that by arresting the Lord Mayor a general Dissolution of Government would follow, and that they should have nothing to do but to divide the Spoils? The first Confusion caus'd by so surprising an Incident was the very Moment of Protection: And that the Party was not ready to make use of it, argues fairly enough, that no such deep Design had then been thought of; and that the whole Proceeding (if not calculated, as it may be perceiv'd it was, for the Service of those who were concern'd in the City-Riot before-speak'd of, and whose Trials were now at hand, and of whom Good enough was one) was no more than a Discharge of political Wild-fire, to make a Noise, and keep up the Spirit of the Party. Besides, the Desperate Shaftsbury was dead; and we shall find, that all the other Compeers had in a manner broke with him, because they would not be hurry'd into any Misadventure: Whence it is natural to conclude, that if any thing violent was then in agitation, it met with no Countenance beyond the City Walls. And, with whatever Intent, or for whatever Ends, the Experiment was made, it operated most unluckily, both to the Citizens in particular, and the whole Party in general. The King's Friends immediately took fire at it, and call'd it an Inference beyond Example; and even those who were dispos'd to allow the Rights of the Citizens could by no means digest the putting it in force, while Pritchard was yet in the City-chair; as deeming it a Wound to Authority in general, and which had a natural Tendency to inflame Matters, without the Power or Virtue of doing any solid Good: And this became immediately evident; for while the Rejoicement on account of this Outrage was yet glowing, the Trial of the Rioters came on; and the Juries, who were now all Jure Men of the other Side, and were, therefore, in vain excepted to by the Council for the Defendants, were too much incensed when they came into Court, to think of Mercy afterwards.

Papillon and Dubois having moreover, alledg'd in their own Justification, That the Action against the Lord Mayor was prosecuted at the Instance of the Citizens of London; Advantage was taken to insinuate, that, for the sake of the Charter, the Fate of which was now speedily to be decided, the representative Part of the City ought to purge themselves from having any Concern in it. Accordingly the Lord Mayor having call'd a Common-Council, it was resolv'd, "That the Members of this Court, to deliver themselves and the said Citizens from this undue Imputation, do declare, That they were not privy or consenting to the said Action or Arrest, and do disown and disapprove the same." To shew their Displeasure yet more effectually, they turn'd Brome out of his Office, and render'd him incapable of enjoying any Trust or Preferment in the City.

And as it yet farther to shew how successfully Stephen Jenkies had labour'd in the great Work of new-modelling the City, or how judiciously the Wind was chang'd from the Rage of Opposition to an obsequious Gale of Loyalty and Submission, the same Common-Council soon after reassembled in Form all the Proceedings of their Predecessors under the Usurpers, and pass'd a Bill for declaring and asserting the ancient Rights of the Chair; by which the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen were restor'd to their negative Voice. They also declar'd and enacted, That the Lord-Mayor had sufficient and lawful Power of choosing one Sheriff: And the next Day at the Bridge-House Feast the Lord-Mayor declar'd his Choice of a Sheriff accordingly. But tho' they went thus far in their Compliances, possibly with a View to make fair Weather at Court, and in hope it would be accepted as a Composition for their Charter, they had their Reerves, as hath already been hinted, and will be further explain'd, which they were resolv'd never to depart from.

Order of Time now demands that we should speak of the Prosecution of that momentous Affair; but first it is necessary to take our final leave of Sir William Jones: the great Lawyer, so often spoke of in the Course of this Work, who did not live to see the Issue of it; and who, having long given over Practice, had no other Concern in the Cause, than arose from his Attachments to the Party, which, it must be presum'd, took care to be stilted occasionally with his Advice.

Mr. North says that, after the Oxford Parliament he did not appear much abroad: That he hated Shaftesbury, and notwithstanding Party-work, would not willingly come into the Room where he was, for which he assigns this Reason: "His personal Gravity and Virtue was great, and he could not bear such a stirring Wit and Libertine as the other was." The same Gentleman insinuates he was in the Secret of Guise's Plot, as not caring to suppose that he could be deceiv'd like the common World; mentions certain Circumstances in support of his Supposition; as his being one of the first to propagate the Belief that Geoffrey was murder'd by the Jesuits; and his countenancing the popular Apprehensions, by sending an Order express from his Villa at Hampstead, to his House in Town to have his Billets remov'd from his fire, to his Back-Cellar, for fear of the Fire-Balls of the Jesuits; rethurs him deviously for using all the Arts of his Profession to procure the Conviction of so many good Men's Justice under such infamous Evidence, without once reflecting how soon the Tables were turn'd, and that the same Arts were as flagrantly us'd by the very Person he extols the most; and consequently, for having written in defence of Leveson's Justice, and the exorbitant Debts of the Westminst' House of Commons. He, however, does ample Justice to his Abilities and Virtues, which he acknowledges were almost unparalell'd and had no Alloy but his Party Principles; tells us, he had a great Value for the Lampson of this Reign, and that he us'd to magnify him of the last, as the greatest Man for Sense and Foresight that was concern'd against the King: And concerning his Death, which Bishop Burnet only says, happened in May this Year, more particularly recollects, that it happen'd at Mr. Lampson's House in Northampton, where several of the most consulting Men of the Faction assembled to consult of the common Affair; and, as it was said, occasion'd by an un-air'd Bed, which gave him a great Cold: Under which Influxion, having Leard at his Heart (that is, being no stranger to the more violent Projects, which the Malcontents had now on foot, for so Mr. North expressly intimates, tho' he at the same time clears Sir William from having given them the Sanction of his Approbation) Nature wanted Force to master the Distemper, so it turn'd to a malignant Fever which carry'd him off."

And now we are come to the great Attack on the Franchises of the City, which, however artificially represented as a mere Matter of Law and Right, by the Party, who drove it on, was a Matter of State: And tho' it should be admitted that the Shot was aim'd at Faction, nothing can be more undeniable, than that it had like to have been the Death of Liberty. Thus far a Man of common Sense may venture to pronounce; but when we enter into the Labyrinth of Controversy, which this Cause gave rise to, it will be expected that we should take the Lawyers for our Guides, and not presume to lose Sight of them a Moment for fear of being lost.

And first, as to the Law on which the Process was founded, says Mr. North, 1. Nothing is more trite in our Law-books, than that all Franchises whatever, deriv'd from the Crown, are forfeited by Abuse. 2. The Corporation in question was a Franchise deriv'd from the Crown. 3. The said Corporation had committed divers unlawful Facts, which fell within the Construction of Abuses. And, 4. Care was taken to select Two such from among these, to be assign'd for Forfeiture, which were unquestionably unlawful, and as unquestionably the proper Acts of the Corporation. The first of these was the Petition of the City to the King for the Sitting of the Parliament, before-quoted; and in this, more particularly, the following Clause: "Your Petitioners are greatly surpris'd at the Late Prerogation, whereby the Prosecution of the public Justice of the Kingdom, and the making necessary Provisions for the Preservation of your Majesty, and your Protestant Subjects, hath receiv'd Interruption." And the Second, an Order of Common-council for levying Money, by imposing certain Tolls on every Horse-load, Cart-load, &c. of Provisions, brought to the several Markets of the City. This is in substance what Mr. North is pleas'd to assign for the Basis of the Process; and, moreover, gives it as his cordial Opinion, That as the King can never do wrong; so, on this occasion, he did nothing but what was right. The Attorney-General, however, set out in a much higher Strain, perhaps being to oblig'd by the Form of his Profession. According to him, the City had usurp'd on the King all the Rights and Powers it had presum'd to exercise. It had no lawful Grant to be a Corporation: It had no Authority to constitute Sheriffs: Nor were its Magistrates entitl'd to be Justices of Peace. So on the Information: In answer to which, the Council for the City urg'd, That their Right to be a Corporation had been confirm'd by Magna Charta, and many subsequent Statutes: That they deriv'd their Privilege to elect Sheriffs in perpetuum from a Grant of King John: And that their Magistrates were constituted Justices of the Peace by the Letters Patents of his late Majesty Charles I. The Attorney, in his Reply, permits in the Negative, and pleads over, as the Phrase is, the Articles of Forfeiture above-recited. To which the City Council rejoin'd, 1. That the Mayor and Commonalty were seiz'd in Fee of the public Markets; that they had provided void Stalls, and other Accommodations, for the Market-people, at their own Costs; for which it had been usual to receive reasonable Tolls; and that the particular Tolls objected to were laid in the Year 1666, for retelling the said Markets, which had been consumed in the dreadful Fire of that fatal Year. 2. That the Petition complain'd of was founded on the very Points laid down in the King's own Speech, recommending to both Houses the farther Examination of the Plot; and declaring, he neither thought himself nor them safe, till that Matter was thoroughly examin'd, and till the Lords in the Tower were brought to their Trials, that Justice might be done: That the Parliament had also, in their Address to his Majesty, declared their deep Sense of the sad Condition of the Realm, and made it their Petition that a solemn Fast might be held thereon; which Fast was held accordingly: That several Bills were prepar'd for the Preservation of his Majesty's Subjects; which were all defeated by a sudden Prorogation; That the Citizens then, apprehending the Dangers which had been thus set forth by the King, and which the Parliament had set themselves to provide against, would immediately take effect, unless prevented by the Sitting of Parliament, had indeed petition'd his Majesty for that End, but then it was for that End only, and from a Conviction that it was the Right of the Subject to do so.

Here therefore the Facts were acknowledged; and consequently the essential Points to be debated were, 1. Whether these Facts were criminal; and, 2. Whether, if so, the Penalty would amount to a Forfeiture of the Charter? And here again, to the Man of common Sense, it appears, that the levying Tolls in the Years 1681, 1682, was no greater an Offence than the doing the same in the Year 1666, and those ensuing: That this Article would never have been us'd against the City as a Trespas, if the City had not been obnoxious on other Accounts to the Indignation of the Court. And it must be allow'd, that either, as Mr. Seymour took the Liberty to say, his Majesty had prevaricated with his Parliament, in admitting the Dangers arising to himself and his Subjects from the Plot to be real, which the Citizens perhaps did not, and certainly were not oblig'd to, understand; or that which is call'd the libellous Part of this Petition was, in a good degree justify'd by the Words of the Speech, as quoted by their Council. For if neither the King nor his People were safe, till the Plot was thoroughly examin'd; that thorough Examination could only be made in Parliament; and the People, on their own Behalf, had the Right of Self-preservation to urge in excuse for importuning him to summon his Parliament to sit: And, on the Behalf of his Majesty, the Duties of Affection and Loyalty, to render that Importunity meritorious.

But Mr. North is displeas'd that they should presume to justify themselves on this Point at all. "The learned Council, says he, could plead, in form, a Justification of a scandal upon the King, posted in Print, that knew by Law, that no Justification can be pleaded even in a Case of Scandalum Magnatum against a Peer. And, when the Law says expressly, that the King can do no wrong, how comes it to be lawful, or tolerable, to accuse him for having done it? But where Faction bids to do, every thing may give way, and all that is for them is regular and just, and nothing else?"

As to the latter Part of this Remark, we heartily join Issue: But then we also insist, that one Faction is as liable to the Force of it as another; and as the Eye does not see itself, so this Gentleman, who so clearly discerns the Prejudice of his Adversaries, is stone-blind to his own. And as to the former, the unchangeable Passage in the Petition will surely admit of a less offensive Construction than he is pleas'd to give it: For, according to the true Comment on the Maxim he alludes to, the King can do no wrong, because he is never suppos'd to act without Advice: And when Wrong is done, his Advisers, and not he, are answerable: And thus the Petition, in conformity to the general Permutation of the Malcontents of those Times, indirectly ascribes the Prorogation it complain'd of, not to the King personally, but those who had the Attendance over him; and treats of it as a Measure as dangerous to himself as his Subjects: According to the constitutional Sense of that Maxim, supposes the Prorogation, though the Act of the King, to have been made by the Advice of others; and that the said Advice was not only inconsistent with the Speech, but as much to the Prejudice of his Majesty, as his People. However arrogant, therefore, it might seem to a mere Lawyer, for the City to interpose in the Government of the State, or to question the Exercise of the Prerogative, had the Dangers really impended, which they had been taught to believe, the Necessity of the thing might have aton'd for the Indecorum: And, as it was, there was no condemning their factious Officer's, without condemning also the King's prevaricating Speech, and the Proceedings at both Houses, on which it was apparently founded.

To hasten to the Issue: The Court having taken due Care, as Mr. North has already inform'd us, to make sure of their Point, nothing was omitted to satisfy the Nation in point of Form: The Cause had two solemn Hearings in two several Terms; and in the Court of which Mr. Treby and Mr. Pollexfen, for the City, as we learn from Bishop P. l. p. 335. Burnett, pleaded for the City as follows:

"They laid it down for a Foundation, That trading Corporations were immortal Bodies, for the breeding a Succession of trading Men, and for perpetuating a Fund of public Charities (the Bishop's own Words) for the Estates of Orphans and Trusts, and for all pious Endowments; That Crimes committed by Persons entrusted in the Government of them were personal things, which were only chargeable on those who committed them, but could not affect the whole Body: The Treason of a Bishop, or a Clerk, only forfeited his Title, but did not dissolve the Bishopric, or Benefice: So the Magistrates only were to be punish'd for their own Crimes: An entail'd Estate, when a Tenant for Life was attainted, was not forfeited to the King, but went to the next in remainder upon his Death. The Government of a City, which was a temporary Administration, vested no Property in the Magistrates: And therefore they had nothing to forfeit, but what belong'd to themselves. There were also express Acts of Parliament made in favour of the City, that it should not be punish'd for the Misdemeanors of those who bore Office in it. They answer'd the great Objection that was brought from the Forfeitures of some Abbays on the Attainder of their Abbots in King Henry the Eighth's time, that there were peculiar Laws made at that time, upon which those Forfeitures were grounded, which had been repealed since that time; all those Forfeitures were confirm'd in Parliament; and that purg'd all Defects. The Common-council was a select'd Body, chosen for particular Ends; and if they went beyond these, they were liable to be punish'd for it: If the Petition they offer'd the King was seditious, the King might proceed against every Man that was concern'd in it: And those upon whom those Taxes had been levy'd might bring their Actions against those who had levy'd them; but it seem'd very strange, that when none of the Petitioners were proceeded against for any thing contain'd in that Petition, and when no Actions were brought on the account of those Taxes, that the whole Body should suffer in common for that, which none of those who were immediately concern'd in it had been so much as brought in question for in any Court of Law: If the Common-council petition'd more earnestly than was fitting for the Sitting of the Parliament, that ought to be ascrib'd to their Zeal for the King's Safety, and for the establish'd Religion; and it ought not to be strain'd to any other Sense than to that which they profess in the Body of their Petition, much less to be carried so far as to dissolve the whole Body on that account: And as for the Tolls and Taxes, these were things practis'd in all the Corporations of England, and seem'd to be exactly according to Law: The City, since the Fire, had a vast Charge made their Wharfs and Markets much more noble and convenient than they were before; and therefore they might well deny the Benefit of them to those who would not pay a new Rate, that they set on them for the Payment of the Debt contracted in building them: This was not the imposing a Tax, but the raising a Rent out of a Piece of Ground, which the City might as well do, as a Man who rebuilds his Houfe may raise the Rent of it. All the Precedents that were brought were examin'd and answer'd: Some Corporations were deferr'd, and so upon the Matter dissolv'd themselves: Judgments in such Cases did not fit this in hand: The seizing on the Liberties of a Corporation did not dissolve the Body; for a Bishop dies, the King seizes the Temporalities, but the Corporation still subsists, and they are restored to the next Incumbent. There were indeed some very strange Precedents made in Richard the Second's time; but they were follow'd by as strange a Reverse: The Judges were hang'd for the Judgments they gave. They also insisted on the Effects that would follow, on the forfeiting the Charter: The Custom of London was thereby broken: All the public Endowments and Charities, lodg'd with the City, must revert to the Heirs of the Donors.

On the other hand Mr. North treats all this, and all that was said besides, with downright Contempt, saying, in effect, "That the Council for the King at large, insisted, That a Corporation was a Franchise; that in all the Books and Lego Histroriae Cases, it pass'd under this Title; that whatever it was, it was capable of no Amendment but Seizure; that it must either be lawless or feizable; that the Notion of Immortality was a Chimera of Invention, absolutely a stranger to the Law and the Law-Books; that the Common-Council was the Representative Body of the City, Corporatione Congressiva, and the only Means by which the City, as a Corporation, can act extraordinarily, to bind themselves and all the Members: And that as for By-Laws, granting all that was urg'd in their Favour, they could extend only to the Citizens;" (Which is unquestionably true with respect to arbitrary Impositions: But surely the City might legally set a Price on the Conveniences of their own Markets; for in that Case, the Trader was free to take or refuse; and the Cost, as in all singular Cases, whether more or less fell in the End on the Consumers, who were the Inhabitants of London.) "That the City-Petition directly accus'd the King of Misgovernment, and stopping the Current of Public-Justice: That these Articles of Forfeiture were no Peccadillo-Trifles, and that small or great made no Difference in the Case, seeing it was not Value but Legality which made the Question."

The whole Dispute takes up a Folio. — But it is needless to pursue it any further: Enough has been said to shew the manner of conducting it. And as to the Event, upon the 12th of June Mr. Justice Jones presiding on the Bench in the Absence of the Lord Chief-Justice Saunders, who had been disabled by an Apoplectic Fit from finishing the Jobb for which he was prefer'd, and being countenanc'd, it cannot be said assist'd, by Wilsons only (1), another Abhorrer, say (2) some; and, say (3) others, by Raymond as well as Withiam, pronounc'd Sentence for the King against the City, That the Franchises should be seiz'd into the King's hands on the Authorities, and under the Pretences, Mr. North calls them

There was, however, an Air of Moderation shewn in the Use of this important Victory; for the Attorney-General waived the Entrance of this Judgment, till the King's Pleasure should be known; and this we are assur'd by Mr. Nort, on his own Knowledge, arose from a gracious Tenderness to the City, that certain Customs or Duties which depended on its Corporate Capacity, and which could not be reviv'd by a new Grant, might not create by the Dissolution of the old. But our two Right Reverend Historians, Burnet and Kennet, are of a contrary Opinion, and surmise it was done only to draw in the Citizens to make a Surrender, and thereby preserve the Court from the Odium and Clamour likely to follow a Derivation. Bishop Burnet expressly says, "That new Endeavours were us'd to bring the Common-council to deliver up their Charter; yet that could not be compass'd, tho' it was brought much nearer in the Numbers of the Voices than was imagin'd could ever be done." But, unfortunately, it does not appear that any Question of this nature was ever put to the Common-council: On the contrary we shall find, that the Court did not aim at a total Surrender; they only wanted to draw the Teeth and clip the Nails of the City; or in other Words, to deprive them of their Strength and leave them in Possession of their Forms: And all the Practices they us'd, was to bring the Citizens to submit to the Operation; which this Force-bearing of the Attorney-General furnish'd a handsome Pretence to bring about; For, as we are told by Mr. Edward, two Days after Judgment given, a Common-council was call'd to consult how to proceed in this Exigency; in which it was resolv'd to draw up a submissive and yielding Petition, acknowledging their hearty and unfeigned Sorrow for the Misgovernment of the City of late Years, whereby the Citizens had fallen under his Majesty's Displeasure, which had occasion'd a Res Warranti, and Judgment to be pronounc'd against them, declaring, that they were deeply and thankfully sensible of his Majesty's great Favour in not requiring Judgment to be immediately enter'd thereon: And in Consideration of this their distressed Condition, humbly casting themselves at his Royal Feet, imploring his Princely Compassion and Grace to be extended to this his ancient City; and most humbly begging his Majesty's Pardon for all their Offences, with most solemn Promises and Assurances of constant Loyalty and Obedience to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, and of a regular Administration of his Government in that City for the future, &c.

Such a Petition was, accordingly, drawn up, and on the Report, agreed to, almost unanimously; for only two Persons held up their Hands in Opposition to it; and the Result was, That the Lord-Mayor in Person, and such of the Aldermen and Common-Council as had most contributed to bring things to this mentorious Issue, were deputed to wait on his Majesty, now at Windsor, with it; which they did, possibly more pleas'd with an Opportunity of making their Court in so acceptable a manner to his Majesty, than affected with the deplorable Condition

It is also fit that Posterity should know that, to prevent the Possibility of a great Lapse to grant a Body, the Law Special pleaded with the Duke of York, on the King, which argues how truly, as well as lawfully, that celebrated W. M. Hall said, That the House of Commons only resolv'd that the Duke should not reign after the King, but that the King was resolv'd he should reign even during his Life; in behalf of the City, Mr. Ashurst did for St. John; and that the most affecting of his Arguments were as follow:

"I will know it is a Condition annex'd to all Bodies Politic, whether they be establish'd on account of Religion or Policy, That the Trust reposit in them be fully and faithfully discharged. If it be not, and the Intention of their Institution not comply'd with, they become rather public Grievances, And the Condition, tho' it is only imply'd by Law, yet is of as strict an Obligation, as if it had been literally express'd in their Charters or Foundations.

But there can be no little Doubt, that it is in the Election of the Crown, and in his Majesty's own Royal Beal, whether he will proceed for such Offences, or Obstacles of Trust, against the Bodies Politic, in their private, or in their public Capacities. I shall therefore, with your Royal Highness's Permission, next consider, which Method of the two is most advisable, in the present Situation of Affairs.

The Petition may indeed be call'd, in construction of Law, the Act of the whole Corporation, inasmuch as it was presented by the Common-council, who are chosen by, and consequently represent, the whole Community; and their Act may be, for what I know, of the same Force and Obligation in Law, as if done by every individual Member. But yet I am far from thinking it really was the Act or Assent of the Whole. There is abundant Reason to think, that this Act then pass'd, and still is, disapproved (my I can affirm upon my own Knowledge, is despis'd by every thousands of his Majesty's loyal Subjects in the City: and your Highness well knows who were the chief Promoters of this, as well as of some other late Acts of Dissolution.

Your Highness will also, I doubt not, consider, that all corporate Bodies determine their Acts by the Majority, and that Majority often not above one or two Votes; sometimes their Resolutions are carried by surprise, and under Misapprehension or Misrepresentations, as I doubt not but this was; and therefore I must humbly submit to your Highness, whether it be reasonable or just, in such a Case, for the whole Corporation to suffer, and more innocent Persons, who did not at all concur, to be involved in one and the same Measure of Punishment. But now your Highness be pleas'd, and I shall yet speak, that the Petitioners' conduct was more than greater Objection, but I take leave to suppose they might have committed they could not undergo a greater Degree of Punishment than what is now propos'd, viz. the entire Forfeiture of their Privileges, and of their very being as a Corporation.

Your Highness, I doubt not, will also consider the many Mischiefs and Inconveniences that must necessarily follow, if the great Body should be dissolv'd by vote to small a Number, tho' his Majesty or his Co-heirs should desire it only in reversum, and the whole Term into whose Sense of their Obedience, and upon that account Parliament obtain'd, should be pleas'd to return them to their former Privileges.

In a word, if such a rigorous Course should be taken, I fear it may give Room to malicious Suggestions, and Embolden the present Whigs and Discontents of the Nation, and may (tho' without just Reason) alarm all other Corporations. I cannot therefore conceive it advisable, or fit for his Majesty's present Service, till things counter'd to proceed to such Extremities against the whole Body, but rather to direct Proceedings against the most obnoxious Members in their private Capacities; but yet that submit with all Humility to his Majesty's next year Royal Highness's Will, as becomes, &c. Jenkins's Letters, vol. II. p. 685.

of the City, which now remain'd in Possession of that Name at his Courty only: And, as it had been preconcerted, the Lord-Keeper, in his Majesty's Name, return'd them the following Answer, which is here inserted at large, both because Mr. North is greatly offended with Bishop Kennet for having done otherwise, and because the Piece, itself, is one of the most remarkable in any History whatever:

" My Lord Mayor,

" I am, by the King's Command, to tell you, That he hath considered the humble Petition of the City of London, where so many of the present Magistrates, and other eminent Citizens, are of undoubted Loyalty and Affection to his Service, that, for their Sakes, his Majesty will shew the City all the Favour they can reasonably desire.

It was very long before his Majesty took a Resolution to question their Charter; it was not the tedious Discourses in Coffee-houses, the treasonable Pamphlets and Libels daily published and dispersed thence into all Part of the Kingdom, the outrageous Tumults in the streets, nor the Affronts of his Courts of Justice could make him do it. His Majesty had Patience till Disorders were grown to that Height, that nothing less seem'd to be design'd than a Ruin to the Government both in Church and State. For the factious Party were not content with the Practice of their Insolences, but endeavour'd to have them publicly countenanc'd by the Magistrates; and, for that End, in all Elections, they tickled to choose the most dissipated into Offices, and carried themselves with that Heat and Violence, that it was a Terror to all sober and discreet Citizens; and the City was so unhappily divided into Parties, that there was no Likelihood it could return into Order, so long as the factious retained any Hopes of procuring the Elections of Magistrates of their own Party, for their Impunity.

It was high time to put a Stop to this growing Evil; this made it necessary for his Majesty to enquire into their Abuse of Franchises, that it might be in his Power to make a Regulation sufficient to restore the City to its former good Government. It was not for the Punishment, but merely for the Good of the City that the King took this Course; and now he hath obtain'd Judgment in a Quis Warrantia, it is not his Intention to prejudice them either in their Properties or Customs. Nay, lest the Entry of the Judgment upon Record might have fatal Consequence to them, his Majesty was so tender of them, that he caus'd Mr. Attorney to forbear the same at present, that the City might have time to consider their Condition.

My Lord,

I must needs say the City hath not been so well advis'd to defer their Application to his Majesty so long, even till the Court hath pronounc'd Judgment; it had been done with a much better Grace if it had been more early. His Majesty's Affection for the City is too great to reject their Suit for that Cause.

But, for that Reason, you will have less time to deliberate upon the Particulars the King doth require of you: And indeed there will be little need of Deliberation; for his Majesty hath resolv'd to make the Alterations as few, and as easy, as may be consistent with the good Government of the City, and Peace of the Kingdom.

His Majesty requires your Submission to these Regulations:

1. That no Lord-Mayer, Sheriff, Recorder, Common-Sergeant, Town-Clerk, or Coroner of the City of London, or Steward of the Borough of Southwark, shall be capable of, or be admitted to, the Exercise of their respective Offices, before his Majesty shall have approv'd them under his Sign Manual.

2. That if his Majesty shall disapprove the Choice of any Person to be Lord-Mayer, and signify the same under his Sign Manual to the Lord-Mayer, or in Default of a Lord-Mayer, to the Recorder or senior Alderman, the City shall within one Week proceed to a new Choice; and if his Majesty shall, in like manner, disapprove of the second Choice, his Majesty may, if he so please, nominate a Person to be Lord-Mayer for the ensuing Year.

3. If his Majesty shall in like manner disapprove the Persons chosen to be Sheriffs, or either of them, his Majesty may appoint Persons to be Sheriffs for the ensuing Year by Commission, if he so please.

4. Nevertheless the Election of these Officers may be according to the ancient Usages of the City, with these Restrictions.

5. The Lord-Mayer and Court of Aldermen may, with leave of his Majesty, displace any Alderman, Recorder, Common-Sergeant, Town-Clerk, Coroner of the said City, and Steward of the said Borough.

6. Upon any Election of any Alderman, if any of the Persons, that shall be presented to the Court of Aldermen by the Ward, shall be adjudg'd unfit; upon such Declaration by the said Court, the Ward shall proceed to the Choice of other Persons in the Room of such; or so many of them as are so disapproved; and if the Court shall disapprove such second Choice, they may appoint in their Room.

7. The Justices of the Peace to be by the King's Commission, which his Majesty will grant according to the usual Method, unless upon extraordinary Occasions, when his Majesty shall think it necessary for his Service.

Their Matters are to be settled in such manner, as shall be approved by his Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor General and Council learn'd in the Law.

My Lord Mayor,

Their Regulations being made, his Majesty will not only pardon the Prosecution, but confirm the Charter in such manner as may be consistent with them.

The City ought to look upon this as a great Condescension on his Majesty's Part, it being but in the nature of a Reservation of a small Part of what is already in his Power by the Judgment, and of those things which conduce as much to their own Good and

If the City should look upon it with another Eye, and neglect a speedy Compliance, yet his Majesty hath done his Part, and demonstrated his Affection to the City by giving them this Opportunity. And if there shall be any heavy Consequence of this Judgment, which it will be to have you well to consider, the Fault will be at their Door in whole Power it now is to bring this Matter to a happy Conclusion.

Mr. Lord Mayor,

The Term draws near an End, and M. J. Summer-Day is at hand, when some of the Officers use to be chosen, whereof his Majesty will reserve the Approbation; therefore it is his Majesty's Pleasure that you return to the City and consult the Common-Council, that he may speedily know your Resolution hereupon, and accordingly give his Directions. That you may see the King is in earnest, and the Matter is not capable of Delay, I am commanded to let you know; that he hath given Order to his Attorney-General to enter up Judgment on Saturday next, unless you prevent it by your Compliance in all these Particulars.

Bishop Kennet, and after him Mr. Ebbard, has call'd this, An ORDER of Regulations, which Mr. North has complain'd of and says the proper wording should have been, An ORDER of Regulations; and it must be own'd it has the Air of a Proposal; but then it is a Proposal, accompany'd with such Terms, as give it all the Force of a Mandate. The City was entangled in the Snarles of the Law, and in case of any further Struggle, had Reason to expect a Dissolution.

At least, this was the Light in which it was consider'd by the Magistrates and Common-Council; by whom, on the Question, it was carry'd by Submission by a Majority of eighteen Voices, Yeas 102, Noes 86. It may, perhaps, be wonder'd at by some, that the Senate of a Common-Hall was not taken on this momentous Occasion; and that more especially, since it was at their Expense that all these Alterations were to be made. But when a Sacrifice is to be made, neither Butcher nor Priest consults the Disposition of the Victim: And it was easy enough to foresee, that the Liveries would never have been induc'd willingly to make a Surrender of their Rights; tho' they must have submitted to part with them in case of Forcefulty.

The next Day after this Point had been thus carry'd in the Common-Council, the two Sheriffs, wait'd again on his Majesty with the News, in Form; as also, with a Free-Will-Offering, as it must be understood, &c. That they had put off the Election of Sheriffs from the 24th of June, to the 6th of July. But still this was not satisfactory. A more verbal Declaration might in time, admit of Disputes, and leave Room for the Liveries to pour in again at the Breach, and give Disturbance to the Court as before. It was, therefore, expected and required, that the Citizens should sign their final Submission to the Regulations which had been requir'd by the King, as the Condition of their being entitl'd to a new Charter. But, however forward some of them had been to gratify the Court hitherto, they boggled at this; and the Affair rested in Sufpence so long, that the Court, at last, refus'd to enter their Judgment. After which the Government of the City, if London might still be call'd a City, was continu'd by Virtue of a Royal Commission, as before by a Royal Charter.

These last are the qualifying Expressions of Mr. North, who, in extantation of the whole Proceeding, says, in one Place, "It is not to be imagin'd, that the King intended the King's Hand to the City itself by the Judgment; and most of the Citizens of Credit were thereof satisfy'd, and ready to have trusted the King." And, in another, "It is to be noted, that all the Offices subject to the King's Approbation were those that belong'd to Government; other Offices, that belong'd to the City-Revenues, and private Oeconomy, as the Chamberlain, Sword-bearer, &c. were all left free and untouched." Again, more largely on the same Head, "No Citizen most acquainted with the publick Business, and Born of the City, much less Strangers, by any thing appearing or done after the Seizure, could possibly (not knowing what had pass'd) imagine that the Order and Model of the Government there was any way chang'd from what it was before the Seizure: For there was the Lord Mayor, Court of Aldermen, Sword-bearer, Town-clerk, Chamberlain, and all inferior Officers, just as before; and the Revenue of the City were collected and paid into the Chamber, and issued again to the proper Uses, without the Diversion of a Farthing.—The Sheriffs were appointed by Commission, as in other Counties, the Aldermen of the Wards were establish'd by Commission, like that of the Peace: And by these means, all the Authorities of the Law and Government, as well as the Disposition of the City-Revenues, subsist'd as effectually, as when the Corporation itself subsist'd; and the external Appearance was in all respects the same; which was an unspokeable Comfort to the good Citizens, and created such a Trust in the King, so far as his Person needed, that they would have trusted any thing in his Hands. They saw there was as much Care taken of the City, as a Father could take of a Child.—And all this, as was declar'd, for the sakes of those worthy Citizens as had been eminently loyal." And from these several Circumstances, he not only concludes, that all those Pretences against agreeing with the King, with which the Faction blinded the Dyes of, and dar'd the honest Citizens from appearing for it, were no better than Republican Fables; but that all this Lenity was an Intendment to the Renewal of the Charter, which might otherwise have been sued out in that Reign, and of course had prevented the Restoration of the old in the next.

This we are to understand, that Form's Resolves, or external Appearances, the Sword and Mace, Fur and Scarlet, were all that the good Citizens thought worth their Ambition:

The City made their Submission.

A. D. 1683. tion: That the Forfeiture of all the Offices relative to Government, into the Hands of the King, did them not the least Harm: That in having the Honour of being left in a Capacity of being the Tools of the Government, they were sufficiently recompens'd for losing the Power of opposing the Government: That they were us'd too well because they were us'd no worse: And that those who had been most instrumental in betraying their Trust, were the only good Men the City had to boast of.

But these slavish Doctrines, however dictatorially deliver'd, but ill agree with the Fundamentals of the British Constitution: If it is ever so undeniably the Voice of the Law, that the Subject shall not draw his Sword against his Prince, the same Authority pronounces as clearly and undeniably, that the Prince shall not oppress the Subject: And because Precepts are vain things without Power to make them good, the Wisdom of our Ancestors had recourse to all imaginable Precautions to put themselves in a Condition of Security from all such Oppressions, without being liable to the Necessity of making a criminal Appeal to the Sword. Among these the Election of their own Magistrates, and that annually, was one of the most valuable. They knew that Ministers of all sorts, would depend on their Masters: That consequently their own would be answerable only to themselves: That the only way to keep off the Encroachments of Will and Pleasure, was not to suffer them to approach: That without a continual Exercise of the whole Art of political Fortification this would be impossible; and that when the Breach was once made, the Tide would unavoidably run in.

Now in the Case before us, the Government of the City was wholly dismantled, and lay open to any Invasion of any kind. The Liveries, who had not been originally concern'd in framing the obnoxious Petition, which was made one of the Grounds of Forfeiture, were actually depriv'd of their Share in the Government of the City, which consisted in the annual Election of Magistrates: For there was no essential Difference between the King's Approbation and Nomination; and as the Event prov'd, even the Ceremonial of a Choice was lost aside. And tho' the City Revenue was collected and fill'd, as before, Mr. North himself, starts the following unlucky Question, which effectually destroys his own Triumph on that Account: Who could oppose the King's sitting up of an Exchequer for the Revenues, formerly of the City, on granting a Commission, as upon an Escheat to the Crown? It is to no Purpose to say, the King did not use his Power on this Occasion, or to make a Merit of his forbearing to do so. It was not his Interest to do all that he had a Power to do: Great Changes are to be introduc'd by Degrees, and never can be introduc'd so safely as when old Forms are preserv'd. As Pretences had been found to seize their Franchises, there was sufficient Reason to fear that, when Time should serve, other Pretences would also be found to seize their Revenues too: And the very Dread of this Day had a Tendency to force the good Citizens into all kinds of Vassalage, for fear of halting it. The Happiness of a free People consists in being secure from Violation: And the Moment that Security ceases, they cease to be free.

But it is urg'd, that they had abus'd their Privileges, and therefore had justly forfeited them. So had the King his Power, and his Ministers their Trust: as in the Course of this Reign has appear'd in a Variety of Instances: And yet this Gentleman, and those of his Party, who are so rigid in exacting Possessors in one Case, will not allow the same way of Reasoning in the other. Besides, we are over and over again assur'd, that the Numbers of the good Citizens far exceeded the ill: And yet by this Method of proceeding, both were punish'd alike. Neither was there any longer the same Pretence for carrying it into Effect, as for setting in on foot; for either the City was return'd to its Duty; and in Consequence thereof had already chosen such Magistrates as his Majesty approv'd; or such Magistrates had been impos'd upon them; in which Case, the Court had not more Reason to complain of the City-Faction, than the City-Faction had of them: And if there was a demonstrable Necessity to proceed desperately with a desperate Disease, it was but reasonable, that when the Cure was perform'd, the Regimen should be laid aside: That is, that when the Corporation was once purg'd, the Charter should have been restor'd in full; on the Presumption, that the Citizens thus severely dealt with on one hand, and mercifully on the other, would have thought themselves oblig'd to make a more modest Use of their Privileges for the future; by keeping on the Defensive, merely, without once thinking of invading the Crown.

To sum up the whole of the Matter in few Words: The Court-Faction in the City were among the Liveries, in whom the Power of Elections lay, the weaker; and rather than not subdue their Adversaries, chos to be subdu'd with them; which, as we have seen, was their common Case, when the King had seiz'd on their Franchises, and the Corporation subdu'd by Permission only. But tho' both were thus equally in a State of Subjection, both were not equally sensible of it; for but one Side was punish'd; and the other was enrich'd with their Spoils, as we shall see in its proper Place, and to become possess'd of the Superiority which they could have attain'd no other way.

It is but natural to suppose, that when the Charter of London was thus overborne, not a Charter in the whole Kingdom was secure. In a long Tract of Time, Abuses, either thro' Ignorance or Inadvertency, if not downright Perversion, will, almost unavoidably, creep in: And if neither the Kind nor Degree of Offence could be admitted as a Plea of Mitigation, it was almost a vain thing to plead at all; and the wisest Course seem'd to be, to surrender at the first Summons: Accordingly, many Corporations made a Virtue

A.D. 1683. of Necessity, and gave up their Franchises, because they found it impossible to keep them; and others, to make their Court, by shewing that their Backs were prepar'd for the Burthen: The Courtiers of all Kinds and Degrees making use of their whole Art, Power, and Interest, to call in these sacred Pledges of Liberty, and to have the Merit of laying them in Heaps at the King's Feet.

If the factious Malcontent was alarm'd for his own sake, to see the Nation thus madly rushing into Slavery, the disinterested Lover of his Country, who was equally solicitous for the Splendor of the Crown, and the Happiness of the People; and for Both, as the joint Result of Wisdom in the Head, and Unity in the Members; could not but draw very melancholy Inferences from the present Aspect of things: For if the Crown had been before on the Defensive against the Subject, and so long had a large Share of his Concerns, the Bulk of the Subjects were now so far from defending themselves against the Crown, that they help'd to undermine the very Ground they stood on, with their own Hands, and glory'd in the Advances they made to their own Ruin: So that if no Opposition was given to their frantic Endeavours, the Constitution would gradually moulder into Ruins; and if an intellectual Opposition was made, the Downfall would be more sudden and precipitate, and the Effects more deplorable.

Bishop Burnet, giving an Account of a Conversation which he had held with Lord Essex, expresses himself as follows: "I always said, that, when the Root of the Constitution was struck at, to be overturn'd, then I thought Subjects might defend themselves: But I thought Jealousies and Fears, and particular Acts of Injustice could not warrant this. He (Lord Essex) did agree with me in this: He thought the Obligation between Prince and Subject to be equally mutual, that, upon a Breach on one side, the other was free. But tho' he thought the late Injustice in London, and the End that was driven at by it, did set them at liberty to look to themselves; yet he confess'd Things were not ripe enough yet, and that an ill-timed and ill-manag'd Rising would be our Ruin." And the Bishop adds, by way of Reflection, that as yet he thought a Rising both impolitic and unwholesome: By unwholesome must be understood unjustifiable; for, whatever Countenance the Advocates for Resistance derive from Magna Charta, the Letter of the Law is expressly against it, at all times alike; for, never supposing that the Subject can be injur'd without legal Remedy, it never makes any Provision of Indemnity in case the Subject should put himself in Arms against his Prince.

But, whatever the Bishop's Scruples as to a Rising were, whether political, or moral, or both, whether it may be concluded, that the Government had now fill'd the Measure of their Iniquities, that the Contract understood between King and People was in Essentials broken, that the People were consequently absolv'd from their Allegiance, and that, agreeable to the Principles of the Roman and Spartan Worthies, the Brave and Great were authoris'd to stand in the Gap, and, however obnoxious they became to the Laws for so doing, would stand justify'd to Posterity, there were among the Malcontents those who were not altogether so tender in these Points, and who thought they had a Right to embroil the Public, for their own private Security.

Thus, agreeable to what has been already hinted, the Prelate just-quoted acknowledges, that Lord Shaftsbury had no sooner seen the new Sheriffs admitted, and thereby the Issues of the Law once more under the Influence and Direction of the Court, than he declar'd for an open Insurrection: He had already, it seems, made sure of an honest, high Party in the City, and fancy'd that by their Help he might make himself Master of the Tower; as also, that on the first Appearance of the least Disorder, they would have prevail'd on the King to yield every thing: He had even, thus early, enter'd into a Consult on this Head with the Duke of Monmouth, who had rejected his Proposals; not because no Abuse had as yet appear'd of the Power which the said Sheriffs had usurp'd; nor that the Fate of the Charter was as yet decided; nor because the Grounds of Complaint were not sufficient to make out a proper Manifesto; but because he understood what a Rabble was, and what Troops were, and look'd on such an Enterprise as a mad exposing of themselves and their Friends.

We find it also depos'd, more particularly, by one of Lord Shaftsbury's principal Co-adjutors, that the said Lord, in a Conference with him in the City, about two or three Days after he first absconded, gave him to understand, That he had made such Preparations, as he made no doubt would in a short time enable him to reduce things to a better Posture: That he had several thousands ready, upon notice, to betake themselves to Arms: That they were first to master the City, and then attack the Guards at Whitehall: And that they were to be assisted by a thousand or twelve hundred Horse, to be drawn insensibly to Town, from several adjacent Parts, under the Conduct of good Officers: And that nothing hinder'd the Execution, but the Backwardness of the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Russell, &c. who had unhandsonely fail'd him, after their Promise to be concurrent in the like Undertaking, at the same time, in Devonshire, Somersetshire, Cheshire, Lancashire, and other Counties; to give Variety of Diversion to the Standing-Force, &c.

There are yet several other corresponding Testimonies to this Point, viz. That a Rising was in agitation long before Christmas, 1682; and some, that such a thing was, at least, in view, before the Meeting of the Oxford-Parliament. Whence it is an obvious Inference, That the Justice of the Cause was never so much the Object of Deliberation, as the Expediency: So that however reasonable it may be held, when the Charter of London was seiz'd by the Crown, and all the other Corporations of the Kingdom were practis'd upon

A. D. 1683. upon to surrender theirs, to conclude, that the Constitution was in imminent Danger, and that it was become the Duty of every honest Man to venture his All for its Preservation; it is manifest, that the greatest Part of those who thus prematurely resolv'd to correct the Exorbitances of the Court, by committing greater themselves, had more of the Incendiary than the Patriot in their Compositions; and, in lieu of espousing the public Quarrel for the sake of the Public, only made use of public Pretences to satisfy the Scrupulous, seduce the Unwary, and to kindle the Flame which was to answer all the desperate Purposes of Ambition, Avarice, and Revenge.

But all, as we have seen, were not for rushing into Extremities, till they had the Warrant of good Policy, at least, for their Justification: And here, as well on the Bishop's Authority, as on that of the Depositions before alluded to, it appears the Faction broke. The Duke of Monmouth deny'd that ever any such Concert had been agreed on for an Insurrection, as Lord Shaftsbury had complain'd of the Breach of: Said, that both himself and Lord Russell, &c. were altogether ignorant of what was doing by the said Earl: And, on the other hand, complain'd himself, that his Lordship had, for some time past, withdrawn himself from his Friends, and acted on a separate Bottom: But propos'd a Meeting in order to a Re-union, and to prevent, if possible, the Mischief which he would infallibly bring on the whole Party, by too much Precipitation. When this was told Lord Shaftsbury, he fell into a Rage: Said he had long discover'd in the Duke a Backwardness to Action, by which they had lost great Opportunities: That he had Cause to suspect, that this artificial Dilatoriness of the Duke proceeded from a private Agreement between him and his Father, to save one another: That his People were impatient of Delays, as having already proceeded too far to retreat safely: That one of his Friends had drawn almost a hundred Horse into London, before Michaelmas-day: That the Duke's Motive of Action was to set up himself; but theirs to set up a Commonwealth; under which only their Liberties would be secure: That for these Reasons he was fully determin'd to depend on the Duke's Motions no longer: That he would pursue his former Intentions of attempting the Deliverance of his Country, by the Help of his honest, brisk Party in the City: That if the Lords would co-operate, they might share with him in the Glory of so honourable an Undertaking; and that if they would not, he hop'd he should be able to effect the Work without them. Thus far the Deposition: And the Bishop adds, That he also reflected on Lord Effex, as having made his Bargain with the Court: That he said, Lord Russell was deceiv'd among them; and that, with these Aspersions, he endeavour'd to blast them in the City. The Result, however, was a new Message from the Duke to request an Interview, in order to the removing all Jealousies and Misunderstandings on both sides: And with this he seemingly comply'd; engaging to meet his Grace and Lord Russell the next Day in the Evening; where, is not specify'd in the Deposition; but the Bishop allows that it was at one Shepberd's, a Wine-merchant in the City: But, according to both Accounts, he did not keep to his Appointment: And we shall find, that the very Meeting which was thus contended for, as the best Means of providing for the Security of the Party, prov'd a Snare for their utter Undoing. The Deposition says, his Lordship sent an Excuse for his Failure, by one Colonel Rumsey, the next Morning: The Bishop, that Rumsey and Ferguson attended at Shepberd's that very Night. The Deposition farther says, that Lord Shaftsbury on the Morrow remov'd to another Lodging, where he continued to secrete himself till the time of his Departure out of England: The Bishop, on the contrary, says, he had first one Meeting with the Earls of Effex and Salisbury; and that Lord Effex told him, the Bishop, Fear, Anger, and Disappointment had wrought so much on him, that he was much broken in his Thoughts. The Deposition again informs us, that, during the time of his Concealment, several Days were appointed for the Insurrection; one in particular, about the latter end of October, at which time the King's Return from Newmarket was expected; but that this was prevented by the Duke (of Monmouth) who prevail'd with him, by what Arguments, or by whose Interposition, is not particularis'd, to defer it for a Fortnight, in expectation of a Concurrence of the Country with them: And that the Returns from thence, at the Expiration of that Term, contain'd nothing but Discouragements.

Here we must stop to observe, That our Deposition grows both confus'd and inconsistent: Nothing being more strange and unaccountable than that, after the Earl had shewn such a Distrust of the Duke, both in Word and Action, he should be over-ru'd by him in so important a Point, as the postponing a Design of such inexpressible Importance, which could not be adjust'd without an Infinity of Precautions; nor delay'd without giving the whole Machine such a Shock, as must endanger the breaking it to pieces.

But this is not all. Tho' the Day appointed was in the latter End of October, though the Adjournment was for a Fortnight; and, instead of assisting, the Country discourag'd the Proceeding, the second of November, as the Deponent had been inform'd, was made a Day preperatory for the Execution, which are Circumstances that clash with one another, and consequently deserve Mention only to be expos'd. The Bishop, on the other hand, affirms, "That, as soon as the Earl was gone, the Lords, and all the chief Men of the Party, saw their Danger from forward Sheriffs, willing Juries, mercenary Judges, and bold Witnesses:" Adding, "So they resolv'd to go home and be silent, to speak and to meddle as little as might be in public Business, and to let the present Ill-temper the Nation was fallen into wear out: For they did not doubt but the

A. D. 1683. Court, especially as it was now manag'd by the Duke, would soon bring the Nation again into its Wits, by their ill Conduct and Proceedings: All that was to be done was, to keep up, as much as they could, a good Spirit with relation to Elections of Parliament, if one should be call'd.

Now, according to this Representation, the Party was no sooner rid of Shaftsbury, than, as if at once dispossest'd, they became all Submission and Reîgnation; and, like the most unexceptionable Loyalists, thought only of preserving themselves, by their behaving innocently and inoffensively; and the Nation, by such Remedies as the Law allow'd.

But even the Bishop, himself, takes care, that we shall not continue long under this Mistake; for, in the succeeding Paragraphs, we learn, that the Duke of Monmouth chose, for his Cabal, the Earl of Essex, the Lord Russel, Algernon Sydney, Lord Howard, and the younger Hampden; which are the very Persons laid to have constituted the Council of Six, in a farther Deposition of the same Person before cited. The said Prelate moreover acknowledges, "That with these Men the Duke of Monmouth met often: That he had many Conferences with the Earl of Argyle while he was in London, concerning the State of Scotland, and what might be done there, his Grace believing that Kingdom to be the proper Scene of Action: That the late Proclamation, which had been there issued (which provided, that Circuit-Courts, as they are call'd by (b) Bishop Burnet, should be held round the Western and Southern Counties, to enquire after all who had been guilty of harbouring or Converseing with those who had been in Rebellion, even tho' there had been neither Process nor Proclamation issued out against them; as also, that all who were found guilty of such Converse should be prosecuted as Traitors; that this Inquisition should last for three Years; at the End of which Terms, a full Indemnity was to take place to all but such as were already under Prosecution; and that those who took the Test should have the Benefit of the said Indemnity immediately) had dispos'd all those who were obnoxious to the Force of it, to look out for Remedies as soon as they could: That the Duke and his five Coadjutors had agreed to set on foot a Treaty with these Malcontents: That Aaron Smith, before spoken of, was dispatch'd into Scotland to desire that some Men of absolute Confidence might be sent hither for that End, under the Pretence of settling a Scottish Colony at Carolina: That Ballie and others did come up to London in the Beginning of April accordingly; and that Argyle ask'd, at first, (1) 20000*l.* for bringing a Stock of Arms and Ammunition which he afterwards brought down to 8000*l.* and a thousand Horse to be sent into Scotland."

Thus all those fine Images of Patience and Relinquishment to the good Will of Providence, until it should please his Majesty to open a way for Redress of Grievances in a Constitutional way, by the Interpolation of Parliament, before set forth by the Bishop in such delusive Colours, vanish at once; and we find ourselves surrounded with a Band of enterprising Patriots, who are labouring in earnest to strike out a shorter way to their Wishes, by throwing the Kingdom into the desperate Convulsions and Agonies of a Civil War.

And tho' the Bishop professes to have no more than general Hints of these Matters, and does not think fit to compare those general Hints with the more particular Account given by Bishop Sprat, we find them all confirm'd in our Deposition; which moreover specifies, 1. That the first Meeting of the Council of Six, had been held at Mr. Hampden's about the Middle of January: That the Points in Debate were, Where the INSURRECTION should first be made, whether in the City or Country, or both at once; what Counties were fittest for their Purpose; what Persons to be apply'd to; what Towns to be gain'd; what Arms were necessary to be got, and where and how to be dispos'd; what Sums of Money were to be rais'd; and above all, how Scotland was to be drawn into a Concert with England (whence it appears, that till now, these Points had never been regularly, if at all, discuss'd, except by Lord Shaftsbury and his separate Cabal; and consequently, no Resolutions could have been form'd upon them.) 2. That the next Meeting was held at Lord Russel's about ten Days after; in which, the Correspondence with Lord Argyle and the Scots was agreed upon; as also that a special Messenger should be sent to invite Lord McKuin, Sir John Cochran, &c. into England; till whose Return, it was resolv'd to have no other Meeting: And that after this, our Deponent, going out of Town, had no farther Concern in the Affair; which is also confirm'd by Bishop Burnet, who acknowledges, That during his Absence, his Associates thought they had plac'd more Confidence in him already, than he deserv'd; and that the best Way to repair their Error would be, to trust him no more.

It is beyond all dispute, that in this Interval Aaron Smith was dispatch'd to Scotland; that his Invitation was accepted; and that several Malcontent Gentlemen of that Nation did actually come up to London, and enter'd into a Treaty with those of England; where Face to Face, in a general Meeting, or by the Interposition of some one Person, or Persons, equally trusted on both Sides, is not altogether so demonstrable. The Points treated of, were the Ways and Means of redressing the Grievances of both Nations, and the Model of Settlement to be established when they had got the Power in their own Hands. According to Bishop Sprat, on the Credit of Wess, who quoted Ferguson for his Authority,

The Malcontents of both Kingdoms enter into a Treaty.

(1) Concerning this Proclamation, the Bishop further writes as follows: "This was, perhaps, such a Proclamation as the World had not seen since the Days of the Duke of Alva. Upon it, great Numbers ran in to take the Test, declaring, at the same time, That they took it against their Consciences; but they would do any thing to be safe. Such as resolv'd not to take it were trying how to settle or sell their Estates; and resolv'd to leave the Country, which was now in a very oppressed and desperate State."

Authority, the English Commissioners requir'd, They should presently declare for a Commonwealth and the Extirpation of Monarchy; which the Scots refus'd, protesting the Generality of their People would not hearken to that at first. But neither Major Holmes nor Castlars, who were both deep in the Confidence of Lord Argyle, and who confess'd all they knew, make mention of any such Difference. It appears, indeed, on the Evidence of the last of those two Persons, that there was a Variety of Jealousies and Antimosities among them, as there ever will be in the like Cases; since it seldom happens that any two Reformers are of the same Opinion, and yet seldom, that any one gives up his Sentiments in Compliment to another. Colonel Sydney, who was a Republican avow'd, thought Lord Argyle too much a Royalist at the Bottom to be trusted on this Occasion. Ferguson always blam'd Sydney for driving on Designs of his own, meaning, perhaps, for prescribing too much and consulting too little; for as to the Re-establishment of the Commonwealth on the Ruins of Monarchy, which was Sydney's favourite Point, they could have no Dispute. Lord Melvil again, and others of the Scots were for having no Concern at all with the English, as being only Fire-shoe Plotters, such as would talk, but not act; and for adventuring by themselves, or with the Duke of Monmouth for their Leader. And the Earl of Argyle was so far of the same Opinion, that in a Letter to Major Holmes, he intimated, that he would join with his Grace, and follow his Measures, or obey his Directions. But it is agreed on all hands, That Money was by the Scots held the one Thing needful, which they expected the English to furnish; that this Article underwent the longest Debates, and that more than once, the whole Project had like to have blown up, because the latter were either unable or unwilling to go all the Lengths expected by their Northern Brethren. And tho' the Sum at first demanded was so considerably reduc'd, it appears that even the small Pittance at last agreed upon, could no otherwise be rais'd than by the Mortgage of Lands; so low were these Conspirators in Purse, or so poor in Spirit; and, in either Case, so little provided to set on foot an Insurrection in June 1683: Whereas we find them charg'd with having all their Preparations complete in the Months of October and November, of the Year preceding.

We have already heard of an honest and brisk Party at Lord Shaftsbury's Devotion in the City, who, so long ago, were ready to rush into all Extremities whenever he should give the Word of Command: And under this Denomination it is natural to think of the malecontent Aldermen, the Sheriffs who had ventur'd so much for the Cause, and those who had offer'd to do as much more: But their Patriotism did not fly so high; and his Lordship was induc'd to stake his whole Trust in the City in the Hands of Godenough the famous Under-Sheriff, and his Brother, Shepherd a Wine-merchant, Hone a Joiner, Aaron Smith the Solicitor,

Rouse who had his chief Dependence on Playter the Chamberlain of London, one Bourne a Brewer, Lee a Dyer, and Keyling a Salter; with whom were confederated Ferguson, Colonel Rumsey, one Hollaway a Linnen Draper of Bristol, Lieutenant-Colonel Walcott, Major Holmes, one Rumbald a Malster, and his Brother, John Ayliffe, Joseph Tyles, Edw. Norton, Edw. Wade, Richard Nelthrop, and Robert West, Lawyers; who are all set forth by Bishop Sprat in his Dramatis Personae in the most odious Colours, as furious Anabaptists, Independents, Atheists, Republicans, Fifth-monarchy-men, Rebels by Principle, and almost by Instinct, in order to prepare his Readers for the worst Conclusions possible to be made against the Party in general.

But of all these it does not appear that any, besides Ferguson and Rumsey had any immediate Resort to, or Connection with, the Lords and Gentlemen who constituted the Cabal, or Council of Six, before-spoken of; or that either of these two ever receiv'd any Encouragement to treat with them on any other Subject than the Insurrection; in the Guilt of which it cannot be deny'd but all were alike involv'd: And consequently, neither the profligate Talk, nor profligate Designs, of those other Desperadoes, ought to be placed to the Account of their Superiors; tho' the Prelate, last-cited, has endeavour'd, with so much Art, to lump the whole Affair, and render the one as black as the other: On the contrary, it will appear, that when these minor Conspirators did not find their Projects adopted by the Grandees, nor that the great Business of Confusion was push'd on with the Violence they requir'd, they set up for themselves: That Ferguson, West, Godenough, Wade, Rumsey, &c. at several Meetings, discours'd over all the Means of Mischief, their wild Imaginations could suggest; and that when the Question was started, Whether, in case they should make a violent Attempt on the Persons of the King and his Brother, the Duke of Monmouth would countenance it? they were answer'd preemptorily in the Negative, even by Ferguson himself; which is sufficient to prove, that the Insurrection and Assassination were two different Plans; and that the noble Persons, who were forward enough to be concern'd in the First, abhor'd all Thoughts of the Last: Nay it will yet farther appear, that when this outrageous Villany was broach'd to those who were expected to join in it, the far greater Part of them, tho' ready to engage in any other desperate Design, started with Horror at this, and refus'd on any Conditions to be Accessories: So that the Guilt and Reproach of the Proposal rests principally, if not solely, on those who put in for the Merit of being Discoverers.

What was the general Situation of Things, at the Time the Discovery was made, will best appear from the several Informations; and all that seems necessary to premise is, That on the very Day that the Court of King's-Bench gave Judgement against the City of London, on the Quo Warranto, Keyling the Salter,

Keyling's

Salter, who had been the Instrument of the Party to arrest the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, now concluding that all was lost, and that he should find it more for his Interest to be a Witness than a Patriot, made his Application first to Lord Dartmouth, and by him was refer'd to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, as the Person who had found what the Court had so long lain in wait for, a Protestant Plot; the Particulars of which, as explain'd by him, were as follow, viz. That about a Fortnight or three Weeks before the King went LAST to Newmarket, which was in MARCH, RICHARD GOODENOUGH, the Under-Sheriff to Bethel and Cornish, took him aside, and, after some introductory Discourse, on the sad State of the Citizens in case they should lose their Charter, ask'd him, how many Men he could procure to take away the Lives of the King and the Duke of York? That he, Keyling, answer'd, He could not procure any to do that Work: That, while his Majesty was actually at Newmarket, meeting Goodenough a second time, he renew'd the same Question; which he now not only listen'd to, but actually clos'd with: That he afterwards met the said Goodenough often, and, by the Solicitation of him and others, did speak to several Persons (naming one Burton a Cheesemonger, one Thompson a Carver, and one Barber an Instrument-maker, all of Wapping:) That, at a Meeting by Appointment with Rumbald the Malster, at the Mitre Tavern without Aldgate, it was agreed, that the Party should go down to a Place call'd the Rye, near Hoddesten in Hertfordshire, being the Residence of the said Rumbald, on the Saturday before his Majesty was to return to London, and there effect their Design, by taking off the Two Brothers: That the Manner of doing it was propos'd to be thus: Rumbald's House being by the Highway-side, the Undertakers were to hide themselves under a Wall or Pale; and when his Majesty's Coach came opposite to them, Three or Four were to shoot with Blunderbusses at the Postilion and Horses; and if the latter did not drop, Two more of the Party, dress'd like Labourers, were to rush out of a Lane near the Place, with an empty Cart, athwart the Way, in order to stop the Horses, while several others of the Gang fir'd on the King and his Guards. Here we find Place and Manner regularly adjust'd, tho' without any Specification of Arms or Persons: And yet our Informant proceeds to say, That, in a subsequent Meeting with WEST the Council, Hene the Joiner, and Rumbald, at the Dolphin behind the Exchange, the Discourse turn'd on the TIME of the King's Return; which, it seems, they were equally uncertain of and unprepar'd for; Rumbald saying, He had heard that he would return that very Night, and WEST, that he would not come till Monday, adding, I hope he will not come till Saturday Se'nnight; to which Rumbald reply'd, I hope so too; which gave WEST occasion to proceed with these Words: "If he do not, how many Swam-Quills, how many Geese-Quills, and how many Pair of Crow-Quills, (meaning Blunderbusses, Muskets, and Cases of Pistols, as he explain'd himself to Keyling) will you, or must you, have?" And Rumbald answer'd, in effect, Six of the first, Twenty of the second, and Twenty or Thirty Pair of the third, with Ink and Sand, that is, Powder and Bullets, proportionable. By which it appears, That neither was the Time prefix'd, nor even the Arm provided; and consequently, from this Evidence, it must be concluded, that the Plot, of whatever kind, was much farther from the Birth, than Bishop Sprat and his Followers have represented; and possibly this Part of it was no more than a Discharge of disemper'd Humours, which, instead of endangering, had a Tendency to preserve the Constitution: For it has been of old observ'd, That when Men give a Licence to their Tongues, there is the less Reason to be afraid of their Swords. What is yet farther remarkable, our Informant, in the next place, gives us to understand, that while so important an Enterprize as this was in agitation, and in which Rumbald was to be so materially concern'd, the said Rumbald went down to his House, the Rye, without any of his Associates; and that, while he was there, the King and Duke pass'd by his House in their Way to London, with only Five of the Life-guards, as he himself afterwards reported to Keyling, with this additional Remark, "That if he had had but Five Men with him, he could have done their Business." Our Informant, in the next place, without staying to assign any Reasons for his making no farther mention of Goodenough in the Pursuit of this pernicious Project, nor for WEST's not furnishing the several Sorts of Quills demanded, nor for Rumbald's Journey to the Rye, in such an unprepared Condition, when the Uncertainty of the King's Return made it necessary for the whole Party, if they were in earnest, to be on continual Duty, proceeds to depote, That about a Fortnight before he made the Discovery, he had receiv'd a Paper from the said Goodenough, containing the Names of certain Streets and Alleys, in which, with the Assistance of Nine or Ten others, he was to make an Enquiry what Number of House-keepers, Journeymen and Apprentices, might be rais'd upon occasion, EITHER to justify the Assassination, in case it should take place; or, if not, to co-operate in case of an Insurrection or Rebellion: That the Informant being again in his cold Fit, and expressing some Dislike of throwing the Nation into Blood and Confusion, the said Goodenough, to reconcile him to the Jobb, said, That he was clearly for doing it, and then there would be quickly an End to it: That Goodenough farther declar'd, he had divided the City and Suburbs into Twenty Parts; and shew'd this Informant the Names of the said Divisions in Writing: That Rumbald's Brother was in Company at the same time; and being offer'd one of these Parts, as his District, he refus'd to meddle: That the Informant himself having offer'd another to one Hobby a Carver, he did the same: That in another accidental Conversation with Goodenough, accompany'd with Wade, Nelbrep, West, Waket, and one they call'd Colonel (Ramsay) at the Salutation Tavern in Lombard-Street, they gave him the Name of Gulick; and he demanding the Reason receiv'd for Answer, "That Gulick was a brave Fellow, who had headed the People of Cologne; and that they hoped to see this Informant do the same at Wapping." After this our Informant recurs to the Conversation with Rumbold, Burton, Thompson, and Barber, before treated of; seemingly only to blacken the said Rumbold; by charging him with saying on that Occasion, "That to take off the King and Duke would be a keeping of One of the Ten Commandments; since it would prevent a Rebellion, whereby abundance of Blood must be shed." He also recurred to the Conversation with Goodenough, West, &c. at the Salutation Tavern; and said, That having ask'd the said West and Goodenough, What Care was taken for Arms? it was answer'd, That he need not take care of that; for there was Provision already made: Adding, That West recommended Secrecy above all things, to this Deponent; on the Consideration, that, if the present Design miscarry'd, they should never be able to retrieve it: And, finally, that the said West farther told him, on Easter Eve, "That, since the Design to be executed upon the King's Return from New-Market had fail'd, they intended to take off the two Brothers between Windsor and Hampton-Court."

It is acknowledg'd on all Hands, that Mr. Secretary Jenkins set no great Value on this Discovery; alledging, says the Lord Keeper North, it would be but of little avail, because there was but one Witness: And this Sentiment of his is extremely remarkable; for if the Plot was real, and the King's Person in such apparent Danger, the Merit of the Service ought rather to have been placed in the King's Preservation, than the Punishment of the Criminals. However, Keyling was resolv'd to get the better even of that Objection too, and said, "That if Mr. Secretary would employ any Man, that was not known, to go with him, he would introduce him into their Company, where he should bear the Treason discours'd. But we are told it appear'd so incredible, that Persons conversant in the Law, as West and Goodenough were known to be, should so openly expose themselves to the Danger of it, as to enter into treasonable Conferences in the Presence of Strangers, that the Secretary was not over-forward to embrace his Proposal; which is as much as to say, that it was left to Keyling himself to find out an additional Evidence to authenticate his own. It is plain he so understood it; for, two Days after, viz. on the 14th, he introduced his own Brother, John Keyling, into the Company of Goodenough, at a Tavern behind the Exchange; and, by the Train of Questions he put, it is not unreasonable to conclude, that he was assisted by wiser Heads than his own; for, according to the joint Deposition of the two Brothers, Josiah, the DISCOVERER, first ask'd, What Account he, Goodenough, had receiv'd of his Twenty Divisions? and Goodenough readily

He makes use of his Brother to confirm his Evidence. [Sprax's Appendix, p. 45.]

answer'd, That Lee, the Dyer, had undertaken for five hundred Men. Keyling then demanded, Where these Men, &c. should have Arms and Ammunition? Goodenough reply'd, That twenty thousand Pound was promis'd, and would be issued on demand to the twenty Persons who undertook for the several Districts, in proportion to the Number of Men they brought in. It must be presum'd, that the next Interrogatory related to the Persons by whom this Money was to be rais'd; for we find Goodenough proceeding to say, That the Duke of Monmouth and all his Friends were concern'd in raising it: That his Grace was moreover to be at the Head of the Party, which was expected to be Four thousand strong. Descending then to Particulars, he farther said, That a certain Colonel, suppos'd to be Ramsay, would advance eight hundred or a thousand Pounds towards paying for Arms: That Wade of Bristol kept two or three hundred Pounds in Town; and that he himself had about sixty Pound in Plate, and about fifty or sixty Pounds of his own in Gold, for the same Service. Keyling then asking, What Provision of Horse was made? he, Goodenough, answer'd, That a hundred were ready, and Men to mount them; and that, if there was occasion, more should be provided. He also demanded in his turn, What Progress Josiah Keyling had made upon those Papers he had entrusted him with? who reply'd, All was well enough with them; only Arms and Ammunition were wanting: And to remove all Doubt on that Head, Goodenough reassur'd them, That, if there was Faith in Man, there should be no Want of Money for the procuring both; and that he was that very Night to have a Meeting with the Persons principally concern'd. Here Keyling (Josiah) in order to obtain farther Confidence, suggested a Stratagem to get possession of the Tower; which Goodenough having applauded, the said Keyling once more turn'd the Discourse to the Means of satisfying his People on the Subject of their being provided with Arms: And having received fresh Promises of Money, made a farther Push for Information, by asking, What Gunsmith it would be safest to deal with? Whether with West's? Whether some Arms were not already in hand? Whether those were dispos'd of, which were to have been sent to the Rye? And, upon being inform'd they were not, Whether they were lodg'd at West's House, or still remain'd in the Gunsmith's Hands? And Goodenough answering, that they were still in the said Gunsmith's Shop; Keyling clos'd his Enquiry, by asking, Whether they went on with their Design of killing the King and the Duke between Windsor and Hampton-Court? and Goodenough reply'd, No; because it was not usual for them to go together; but that they would do it at the Bull-feast in Red-Lion-fields.

Bishop Burnet, treating of this joint Information of the two Keylings, would have his Readers believe, that John was a Man of Probity, not inclin'd to ill Designs, and left to discover them; that he was seduced into the Affair by Josiah; that he found himself in the Secretary's-office, before he knew where he was going; that when he became sensible of the Snare, he was deeply struck with the Cheat and Surprise; that he could not avoid the making oath of all he had heard; and that he sent Advertisements to Goodenough, and all the other Persons that had been nam'd, to go out of the way. But if he was once trapp'd, how came he to go voluntarily the next Day, the 15th, into Goodenough's Company again, to draw him into fresh Discoveries? And afterwards to go, with his Eyes open, a second time, to Mr. Secretary Jenkins's Office, and join in a second Information? And either he did both, or the Informations annex'd to Bishop Sprat's True Account utterly destroy the Credit of the Work they are design'd to support: For there we find a second Paper, dated June 15, in the Name of the TWO KEYLINGS, signifying, That they had had another Meeting that Day, with Goodenough, at another Tavern behind the Exchange: That they all'd the said Goodenough, WHAT PERSONS OF QUALITY WOULD BE CONCERN'D? who answer'd, That William Lord Russell would be concern'd in it to his utmost: And that he would use all his Interest to accomplish the fore-said Design of KILLING the King and the Duke of York. There is yet a third Information of Josiah Keyling's, which, like the last, seems to be calculated to complete the Discovery; for therein, after an inflammatory Repetition of much idle Tavern-talk, he deposes, That Goodenough and Rumbald had told him, "There was a Remonstrance or Declaration ready drawn up, which would be printed against the Day that their design'd Commotion was to be; wherein they would ease the People of Chimney-money, which seem'd to be most grievous, especially to the common People; and that they would lay the King's Death upon the Papists, as a Continuation of the former Plot."

But tho' the second Keyling had confirm'd the Evidence of the first, as to the general Discovery of the Plot, in Law he could be admitted as a Witness only against Goodenough; and tho' the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Russell had been mention'd, there was nothing but Hearsay against them; and, from what yet appear'd, Goodenough, West, Ferguson, and others of the same Level, were the principal Conspirators. Still farther Lights, and other Witnesses, were therefore necessary, to come at the Bottom of the Secret, and to make the most of the Discovery: In order to which a Proclamation was issued June 23, for apprehending Rumsey, Rumbald, Nelbrop, Waide, Goodenough, Walcot, Thompson, Burton, and Hone, for High Treason. But we are told by the Lord Keeper North, as well as Dr. Burnet, That John Keyling "had most perfidiously, and to the Intent that his Discovery might be public, gone to divers of the Party, and told them what he had done.—So that it began to be discours'd in Town, that there was a Discovery of a Plot against the King's Life; whereby, continues his Lordship, the principal Conspirators came to be assur'd of it, and fled; and none could be apprehended but one Barber, a poor Instrument-maker at Wapping.—This poor Fellow discover'd the cable material Part of the Discovery, with very little Difficulty; whereby it was plainly understood, that there was a Reality in the Design, and Keyling an honest Man."

In all Affairs of State there is something left in the Dark, and that something is ever of more Importance than all that is reveal'd. Thus in the Case before us, it is natural to suppose that Barber was apprehended in virtue of the Proclamation; whereas his Name was not in it: And if he was brought by warrant before the Council, it was rather to make use of him as a Witness, than to proceed against him as a Criminal. On the very Day that the Proclamation, was set forth, this Man gave in his Information, which could refer only to the Meeting at the Mitre-Tavern within Aldgate, since he was never consult'd but that once; at which, as before specify'd, were present only Rumbald, Keyling, and the three which he, Keyling, had endeavour'd to enlist into the Service: And it appears strange enough, that when neither West, Goodenough, Rumsey nor Ferguson, who were the main Springs which gave Motion to the Machine, were present, two of their Understrappers, and three Novices should go farther in adjusting, directing, and ascertaining the Progress of it, (as the Word agreed, in Keyling's Information, intimates) at one Meeting, while they spent their Six-pence a-piece, for so Barber deposes, than all those other notable Undertakers, after so many Consultations and so much time wasted, before. Barber's Evidence, however, differs materially in many respects from Keyling's. Keyling speaks in the plural Number, THEY propos'd, &c. Barber talks of Rumbald as the leading Voice, and of Keyling, himself, as his Second. Keyling affirms the taking of the King and Duke was expressly discours'd of, Barber, on the contrary, uses these very Words, "I never heard that this was intended against the King; for he never was mention'd in any respect, that I did understand; but I did verily believe that it was meant by his Royal Highness." According to Keyling, it was agreed, on the Saturday, &c. to go down to the Rye. According to Barber, "It was NOT CONCLUDED ON, by Reason Rumbald did expect to have seen more at that Place." As to the other Circumstances of killing the Horles, Coachman and Postilion, &c. as also of driving a Cart across the Road, Barber agrees with Keyling, except that Keyling swears, That several were appointed to shoot into the Coach where his Majesty was to be: Whereas Barber only says, They were to shoot into the Coach, without specifying WHO.

Still, according to Mr. Secretary Jenkins's Notion, the Discovery was imperfect; for tho' Barber confirm'd some Parts of Keyling's Deposition, he destroy'd others; and, as an Evidence in Law, could be admitted only against Rumbald; for Keyling was no longer to be consider'd as a Traitor. But the Defect was scarce observ'd, before a Remedy was found: One of the Lords of the Council

Council declaring, That, a Friend of his had receiv'd Overtures from West, that he would render himself, if he might have Hopes of Pardon. This we are told by the Lord Keeper North, who adds, "That the Lords were very cautious not to assure him of Pardon, but only to answer, That, if he would yield up himself, and make a Discovery of all he knew, they would lay the Matter before the King, for him to do his Pleasure, as the Matter should deserve: But it was the only way to make him capable of the King's Mercy to do so."

formation.

On the very same Day that Barber was examin'd, Well came in, and depos'd, "1. That he had been inform'd by certain Persons (whom he could not then recollect, but afterwards nam'd Walcot, one Skute and Ferguson) that an Insurrection was intended in London in November last; the Particulars of which he was never made acquainted with: And that he heard soon after the Design had been wholly laid aside. 2. That about the time his Majesty came from Newmarket, in or about October last, he had also heard there was a Design to seize the King and Duke of York; but how, or by whom, he was wholly ignorant. 3. That about the same time, meeting with Ferguson, he, Ferguson, had told him, that two Ways had been thought of for the Relief of the People; one by a general Insurrection in several Parts of the Kingdom, and the other, the most compendious and safe, by taking away the King and Duke by some Surprize, in some Journey. 4. That after the said Ferguson's Return from Holland, they had several Discourses together, concerning the destroying the King and Duke; and in which it was concluded, by whom it is not said, that there would be an Opportunity, shortly, of doing it, either upon the King and Duke's going to, or coming from, Newmarket. 5. That the Examinant Well, Ferguson, Godenough, Rumbald, Rumsey, and Walcot (another Council of Six) met sometimes at the Examinant's Chambers, and sometimes at other Places, to consult on the Method of putting the Design of killing the King and Duke into Execution: That Rumbald was the only one of the Company who was to have acted in it personally; and that the said Rumbald, moreover, in concert with Ferguson and Godenough, undertook to find such Persons as would assist in the Attempt; the Number of whom was fix'd at forty at least, or fifty, if they could be procur'd. 6. That it was agreed the Arms to be made use of on this Occasion should be Blunderbusses, Mulkets, or Carabines, and Pistols; but that on the Question, whether the said Arms should be carry'd down (to what Place is not specify'd) beforehand, or by those who were to use them on Horse-back, he did not remember they came to any Resolution. 7. That Rumbald's Corps was to be divided into several Parties to fight the Guards, disable the Horses, and fire into the King's Coach, &c. as had been depos'd by Keyling and Barber. 8. That after the thing had been resolv'd upon, he was much troubled in his Mind, and endeavour'd by a Representation of the Difficulties attending it, to divert the Execution. 9. That after the (f) Fire at Newmarket, and before the King's Return from thence sooner than was expected, it was agreed, BECAUSE they had no CERTAIN INTELLIGENCE when his Majesty would set out, to the best of the Examinant's Remembrance, that the Attempt should be wholly laid aside. 10. That (k) after the King's Return, the said Examinant discoursing at a Tavern in the City with Rumbald and JOHN (by mistake for Josiah) Keyling, concerning the Disappointment of their said Attempt (l) IN NOT HAVING THE ARMS READY; and the said Keyling talking too openly of Blunderbusses, Mulkets, and Pistols, he advis'd him to call them Swan-quills, Goose-quills, and Crow-quills, that the Drawers might not take notice. 11. That at the same Tavern Rumbald told this Examinant how slyly the King was guarded (by SIX (m) only) when he pass'd by his House towards London, and how easily they might have succeeded in their Attempt. 12. That it was, some short time after, agreed by this Examinant, Ferguson, Rumbald, and Godenough, that some Arms should be bought, in readiness for any Occasion; which was made the Province of the said Examinant, who had accordingly bespoke 30 Cases of Pistols, 20 Carabines, with Belts and Swivels, and 10 Blunderbusses, of one Draft a Gunsmith in Sheer-Lane, besides Bullets and Flints, under Pretence of sending the same to America. 13. (f) Which is thus composedly set forth by Bishop Spear, in his True Account, p. 55. 261.

"But whilst they were thus wholly intent on this barbarous Work, and proceeded secretly in its Contrivance, without any the least Doubt of a prosperous Success; behold! on a sudden God miraculously disappointed all their Hopes and Designs, by the terrible Conflagration unexpectedly breaking out at Newmarket. In which extraordinary Event there was one most remarkable Passage, that is not to generally taken notice of, as, for the Glory of God and the Confusion of his Majesty's Enemies, it ought to be:

For after that the approaching Fury of the Flames had driven the King out of his own Palace, his Majesty at first remov'd into another Quarter of the Town, remote from the Fire, and as yet free from any Annoyance of Smoke and Ashes. There his Majesty, finding he might be tolerably well accommodated, had resolv'd to stay, and continue his Recreation as before, till the Day first nam'd for his Journey back to London. But his Majesty had no sooner made that Resolution, when the Wind, as conducted by an invisible Power from above, presently chang'd about, and blew the Smoke and Cinders directly on his new Lodgings, making them in a Moment as untenable as the other. Upon this, his Majesty being put to a new Shift, and not finding the like Convenience elsewhere, immediately declar'd he would speedily return to Whitehall; as he did: Which happening to be several Days before the Affairs expected him, or their Preparations for the Eye were in readiness, it may justly give occasion to all the World to acknowledge, what one of the very Conspirators could not but do; That it was a providential Fire.

(g) According to Josiah Keyling's first Deposition, this Discourse was before the King's Return; and did not arise from the Disappointment of the Design; but from a Cabal, to put it in execution: And whereas Well swears, that he made use of this Case to correct Keyling's Indiscretion, Keyling swears, that when Well first made use of it, he did not understand it, and demand'd an Explanation.

(h) In the Paragraph immediately preceding, another Cause is assign'd; and the two Keyling's swear, that Godenough acknowledg'd, Arms were actually provided for the Rye Affairs; whereas the contrary is here maintain'd.

(m) Rumsey said but Four; and Keyling, Five.

A. D. 1683. throp having call'd Keyling by the Name of Gulick, who had lately headed certain Tumults at Cologne, Keyling reply'd, "What think you, for all your Jestings, if I and some few more of my Friends should save the City-Charter and the Nation?" or Words to that Effect. And he, the said Examinant, enquiring, By what Means? the said Keyling reply'd, (1) That nobody should know it, till it was done, but he'd be should not be hang'd for it: Upon which Words the said Examinant, suspecting the said Keyling would rush into some Extravagance, bid him take care not to do a foolish thing and ruin the Protestants. 14. That certain Discourses had been held about Eastler last concerning some Attempt on the King and Duke, between Windsor and Hampton-Court, but no Resolution was taken thereon to this Examinant's Knowledge or Remembrance. And, 15. That it had been lately had in Consideration how to make an Estimate of the Strength of the Protestant Cause, in case they should be put on THEIR OWN DEFENCE; when it was agreed, that the City and Suburbs should be divided into twenty Parts, and that some Person, well acquainted in each Division, should enquire into, and make a Return of, the Number he should find; which Returns were not yet made to his the said Examinant's Knowledge."

[F. l. p. 545.]

This Gentleman deliver'd in no less than thirteen other Informations at so many several Times, which the Lord Keeper North accounts for, by saying, in Effect, That not being sure of his Pardon, he put his Memory to the Rack to deserve it: And, tho' Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to say, by way of authenticating his History, that he had seen all Woff's Narratives, by the Means of a Friend of his, who had borrow'd it of Lord Rochester, in whose Hands it was lodg'd; and that they were so wise at Court, as not to suffer it to be printed, all these several Informations are to be found in Bishop Sprat's Appendix, which, we are to understand, he was above consulting.

That which we have already given the Heads of, was the first: The second was deliver'd in the next Day, and consisted chiefly of Scraps of Conversation. In particular, it set forth, that he, the Examinant, once asking Ferguson, What Care was taken to justify the Attempt on the King, in case it took effect? and alleging, that without proper Precautions, the other Party might, in Revenge, shed a great deal of Blood, and immediately proclaim the Prince of Orange, which would overthrow the whole Design; the said Ferguson reply'd, "That Care would be taken about it: That the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and most of the Lieutenancy would be secur'd; and that if London was theirs, all England would fall in." That, pursuing his first Point, the said Examinant further enquir'd whether any Declaration was prepar'd to be publish'd upon such Occasion? And the said Ferguson in answer, affirm'd, "That it had been consider'd of, and was ready, and would be printed ready to be dispers'd." That the said Ferguson had about three Weeks or a Month ago, paid him ninety-three Guineas for the Arms he had bespoke, being Part of the 5 or 6000, which he said he had at Command: That the said Ferguson inform'd him the Scots intended to make some Insurrection, this Summer with the Assistance of 10,000, which he had Hopes of getting for them: That he hop'd, also, they would be seconded by a Party in England, both in London and the North and Western Parts: And that when this Examinant yet farther ask'd, What Persons of Note would engage in it, and what Method they would use? He answer'd, "First let us found our Strength; and if there be Encouragement from that, you will not want Men of Quality to take their Part; but you must excuse me from naming them till there be Occasion."

It would be an almost endless Labour to descend to all the Minuteneffes that fill these various Informations; for which Reason we shall content ourselves with selecting such Particulars, as seem to be of the most Importance.

In his Third, he says, he was refer'd, by Ferguson, to Major Wildman for the Money to pay for the Arms, but did not apply for it till the said Major was gone out of Town. In his Fourth, he recites a Project communicated to him by Lord Howard of Effersick, for making an Insurrection; which, it seems, had not the Honour of his Approbation. In his Fifth, which is of an immoderate Length, he gives a Recital of those vague Conferences held at different Times and Places, by himself, Ferguson, Ramsfey, Goodenough, &c. In which those Terms of Art were propos'd and adopted, which make such a Figure in our History, and which the whole Party have been so unmercifully loaded with, viz. The Lopping Point for the Assassination, and the General Point for the Insurrection; as also, for Variety's sake, The executing a Bargain and Sale, and Lease and Release: Says, That Ferguson was sent for home, by the joint Invitation of himself, Ramsfey, Walest, and Rumbald: That they consulted on a Model of Government: That Ramsfey, Wade, and himself, drew up some few Fundamentals, which were presented to Lord Ruffel, to be by him presented to the Duke of Monmouth and his Coadjutors, by whom they were rejected: That Ferguson had told him, that Colonel Sydney and Major Wildman had us'd the Scots ill and broken with them, after having made them attend two Months: That it had been propos'd to make an Attempt on the Persons of the King and Duke in their Return from the Duke's Playhouse, in the narrow Part of the Street; but the same

(1) Keyling's own Account, as the Reader will recollect, is very different from this: According to him, they consider'd him as the Head of the Wappingers; and he answer'd as in that Character, concluding they were priory to the Design: And, to draw no Inference from the Contradiction, it seems exceeding strange, that Persons who had talk'd so freely together, of Blunderbuss, &c. to be employ'd in the Eye Affair, should now seem so little acquainted with, and entertain such a Distrust of, each other.

fame was volubly rejected, as were also several other Projects of the like nature, by him enumerated: And that about five Weeks since, after the said Treaty with the Scots seem'd to be broken off, he, this Examinant, Rumsey, Walcot, Wade, Norton, Goodenough, and Holloway, met at the Devil-Tavern, where it was agreed to divide the City, as before mention'd; and if three thousand Men could be rais'd for the first Onset, it was thought sufficient Encouragement to venture upon an Insurrection: But no particular Method, as the said Examinant remember'd, was concluded upon to use these Men. In his Sixth, &c. after another long Account of abortive Proposals, he declares, that, to the best of his Remembrance, the Fundamentals, just mention'd, were as follow:

1. That the People should annually meet at a certain time to chuse Members of Parliament, without any Writ or particular Direction to do so.

2. That the Parliament should meet at, and sit for, a stated time, and not be dissolved, prorogued or adjourned, but by their own Consent; and that no Prorogation or Adjournment should hinder their Meeting before the Day, to which they were prorogued or adjourn'd, if there were Occasion.

3. That the Parliament should consist of a House of Lords, and a House of Commons, but the exact Number of both or either of them, this Examinant doth not remember.

4. That only such Nobility should be hereditary as were assisting in this Design; the rest should be only for Life; and upon their Death, the House of Lords be supply'd from time to time with new ones out of the House of Commons; but whether by the Election of the Lords, or of the Prince, this Examinant doth not remember.

5. The Militia should be in the Parliament, and the Parliament have the Nomination, if not the Election of all Judges, Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, and other greater or lesser Officers, civil or military.

6. That what Acts passed both Houses should be a Law for one Year without the Prince's Consent, and what Acts passed both Houses in two several Parliaments should be a perpetual Law without his Consent.

7. That a Council to the Prince should be elected out of the Parliament; a certain Number of the Lords to be elected by the Commons; and a certain Number of the Commons to be elected by the Lords; but the Number of the Council, or of either Lords or Commons to be of it, this Examinant doth not remember.

He then proceeds in the following remarkable manner:

"And this Examinant further saith, That before the said Ferguson went for Holland, this Examinant pressing him to know, whether the Duke of Monmouth were acquainted with the Design against the King and Duke, and would not hang all Persons concern'd in it if it succeeded; the said Ferguson, said, What if I get it under his Hand that be shall not? To which this Examinant answer'd, It would be sufficient Satisfaction. But when the said Ferguson return'd from Holland, and this Examinant press'd him again, to have Security fit to be rely'd on; he aik'd this Examinant, Whether that were fit to be propos'd to the Duke? And this Examinant saying, If be durst not propose it, be thought aber Men ought not to venture upon it. Whereupon the said Ferguson said, That he had mention'd something concerning the King, to the Duke of Monmouth, but not assuaging him. To which the Duke answer'd somewhat sternly, You must look upon me in the Capacity of a Son. Which Answer for some time damp't the Design, and always clogg'd it: But at length it was resolv'd, that if the Duke did prosecute the Actors in it, that the Duke himself should be kill'd, if it could be done.

And yet in this very same Paper he also says, "That about a Fortnight before the King's Return from Newmarket, when the Attempt was resolv'd on to be made, (these are his Words) Ferguson told him, that the Duke of Monmouth, and several Lords, should be invited into the City to a Dinner, the same Day that the King was to return; so that they might be ready to appear upon the Arrival of the News." And again, (notwithstanding all these desperate Resolutions) "That Goodenough reported, That he found most Persons insist upon Terms; and required to know, what Ease and Advantage they should have in Matters of Religion, their Liberties and Properties; and what Assurance they should have of their being perform'd, before they would actually engage in Arms: For they would not fight to change Persons only, but THINGS." And yet once more, "That the Examinant himself, perceiving that little or no Preparations were made for the Newmarket Attempt, made his Remonstrances thereon to Ferguson; who answer'd, That he should have a Sum of Money for it, when Things were fixt, but not else." And it is notorious, by West's own Confession, that he did not receive the 100 l. for Arms, till within three Weeks or a Month before Keyling's Discovery.

In his Seventh, he enlarges on the different Proposals for conveying the Arms that were not yet purchas'd to the Rye; and confesses, no particular Way was resolv'd on; and for seizing the Tower, but concludes, that no Resolution was taken.

In his Eighth he deposes, that Ferguson inform'd him, That certain (e) Nonconforming Ministers had told the said Ferguson, "They suspected he was driving on a Design to assassinate the King and Duke; and begg'd of him to desist; for that it would bring a Reproach on the Protestant Religion, whatsoever the Event might be." And that

Ferguson

(e) Notwithstanding which, in his Fourteenth Information, he says, that the same Ferguson told him, that Osborn, Collins, and Mead, all Nonconformist Ministers, were in the Secret: That the two first had declared the Assassination to be both lawful and necessary: And that the Last was zealous in the Business of the Insurrection. He also brings a like Charge against one Lobb, in his Fourteenth.

A. D. 1683. Ferguson was forc'd to assure them, there was no such thing intended: As also, that the said Ferguson, in confidence, proceeded to say to him, "Alas! they are weak, silly Men, and not fit for these things, who cannot distinguish between destroying a Prince merely for his Opinion in Religion, and destroying Tyrants, who design to overthrow the Laws, Religion, and all civil Rights. It is a pious, glorious Action; and such as will teach all Princes to use their Subjects kindly."

In his Tenth and Eleventh he charges his Associates with a thousand intended Cruelties: As that Moor and Pritchard, the present and late Lord-Mayors, and North and Rich, the present Sheriffs, should be kill'd: That the Skin of the First should be stuff'd, and hung up in Guilddall: That if Clayton and Ward, who had behav'd themselves like Trimmers in their Mayoralty, did not make a public Submission, they should be knock'd o'the Head: That Gold or Cornish should be appointed Lord-Mayor; and if they refus'd to serve, they should be knock'd o'the Head: That most of the Judges should be kill'd, and their Skins stuff'd, and hung up in Westminster-hall: That some of the principal reputed Pensioners should be put to death, and their Skins stuff'd, and hung up in the Parliament-house: That some of the principal Addressers and Abhorers should be taken off; as also the Lords Hallifax and Rocheſter: And that Goodenough was for hanging the Lord-Keeper on the same Post on which College was hang'd. In his Tenth he also says, That he believes he acquainted Mr. Carleton Whitlock, and Mr. (p) Edmund Waller, of the intended Assassination and Insurrection, in November; but not till the time of Execution was past. And, in Bishop Sprat's Appendix, we find two Papers in the Names of those two Gentlemen; one of which is call'd, The Information of Carleton Whitlock; and the other, Mr. Edmund Waller's Confession: The first of which imported, That West had, in Easter-Term last, told him, That some desperate Fellows had design'd to have kill'd the King, or would have kill'd the King, as he came last from Newmarket, if they had not been afraid the Duke of Monmouth would have hang'd them: And afterwards, That there was a Design of raising a considerable Sum of Money to buy Arms, as he remember'd, in Holland, &c. And as to Mr. Waller's Confession, it was to this Effect, That being once in Company with the said West, West rail'd so much at those he call'd Protestant Lords, that he, Waller, ask'd him, Whether he would have them to be Rebels? adding, That such Men as he, and nothing else, could ruin the Kingdom. And that, another time, walking with him in the Temple Cloisters, the said West told him, That some People, not naming himself as one, had had a Design to set upon the King; but it was over: And that he, Waller, reply'd, "I don't believe it.— These things will hang you, and undo a great many other People."

And, lastly, the Fourteenth Paper of the said West concludes with the following remarkable Paragraph:

"And this Examinant further saith, that Colonel Rumsfy, discoursing with this Examinant further, concerning the Duke of Monmouth, told this Examinant, the Duke was inclinable to answer the People's Expectations, and submit to be little more than a Duke of Venice; but the Lords about him, and Armstrong, design great Offices to themselves, and will not endure to hear of Terms, but cry, all shall be left to a Parliament: Whereupon this Examinant saying to him, It were but just to discover all their Intrigues; but the being an Informer is an ugly thing, Colonel Rumsfy reply'd, It is true our People are not worth venturing for, and the other People are not worth saving; besides it would give a great Blow to the Protestant Interest all the World over."

Concerning these two Persons, Rumsfy and West, Bishop Burnet writes as follows: [P. i. p. 549.]

"Rumsfy and West were at this time perpetually together: And apprehending that they had trusted themselves to too many Persons, who might discover them, they laid a Story, in which they resolv'd to agree so well together, that they should not contradict one another." And the Lord-Keeper North also suggests, That, "upon West's Example, Rumsfy render'd himself, who was thought a Man of that Circumspection, continue his Lordship, that he would not venture in such a Design, without very considerable Persons, and great Probability of Success." Rumsfy was an old Soldier, and had so distinguish'd himself in Portugal, under Count Schemberg, that he return'd with a high Character for Valour; on which account he had been thought worthy of Royal-Favour: And, according to Mr. Carte, it was rather from a Sense of that Favour, and a Dread of being held infamous for his Ingratitude, than any Concern for his Life, that he was induc'd to give in his Evidence. The same Author also intimates, that he reserv'd his Discoveries for the King's own Ear; and that his Majesty came to Town from Windſor, June 26, on purpose to receive them. And the Lord-Keeper North yet more particularly says, "That he at first propos'd to yield himself to my Lord Hanslow, but my Lord being a Papist, it was not thought fit; and it was wonder'd he should chuse him. He then made Overtures to the Duke of Albemarle, to yield himself to him; but would have Assurance of his Pardon. It was plainly told, that, for that, he must rely on the King's Pleasure, who would do as he should deserve. He, thereupon, yielded himself; and desir'd he might first be admitted to speak with the King and the Duke: And this the King was pleas'd to condescend to, after he had been search'd.— It was thought his desiring to speak with the King and the Duke was was to draw from them Assurances of Pardon; or to find whether the King was willing the Duke of Monmouth should be accus'd." But, unfortunately, in Bishop Sprat's Appendix, p. 12, we find a Copy of Colonel Ramsay's first Examination, dated June 25: And also a Signification that it was taken by the Duke of Albemarle and Mr. Secretary Jenkins. So that he was brought to Confession, it seems, before his Majesty condescended to see him. He set out with acknowledging, that Lord Shaftsbury had projected an Insurrection in October or November last; and had assign'd Bristol for his Post. And being ask'd, What Persons of Quality or Capacity were to have the Command? he answer'd, That he had heard my Lord Ruffel nam'd, and complain'd of; as also Mr. Trenchard. He then went on to repeat what he had also heard from one Roe, the Sword-bearer of Bristol; and from West: Said, that he came acquainted with West towards the End of the last Year: That at his, West's Instance, he had a Meeting with Goodenough, and others, in West's Chambers, about February last, to concert the Means of assassinating the King, in his Way from Newmarket: That Goodenough and West brought him and the said Rumbald together, as the Man who would undertake to command the Party who were to make the said Attempt: That Rumbald acquainted him how the Ground lay, and would have had him gone down to see it; which he declin'd: That they had afterwards several Meetings, to try if they could make up the Number of forty or fifty Men for that Purpose; under which Number, Rumbald would not undertake it: That, at their next Meeting, two or three Days before or after the King's coming from Newmarket, in March last, they did resolve that Arms should be bought against the next Journey in Autumn, or any other Opportunity: That West undertook this Service: And though, according to West and Keyling, the Disposition for the Attack was made before the King's Return, and when it was actually resolv'd to make the said Attack, when his Majesty should be on his Return, this noble Colonel treats of that Disposition, in almost the same Words, as agreed upon at the very Meeting, when the Arms were ordered to be purchas'd for the next Opportunity. He then proceeds to mention Rumbald's Account of the King's passing by his House with so thin a Guard; and adds, That Walcut was then present: That about three Weeks or a Month since, there was a Meeting at West's Chambers, of Goodenough, West, Walcut, Norton, Wade, and Holloway, when it was resolv'd to try what Men could be rais'd in London and the Liberties: That then the Division of the City into twenty Parts was made: That for the first Fortnight little was done: That then Goodenough brought in an Account of seven Divisions, which amounted to three thousand nine hundred Men, or thereabouts; and that it was further resolv'd, That the Design in Hand should be kept secret until such time as the Return of all the Divisions should be brought in. Being then ask'd whether he did hear any Commanders or Commission-Officers nam'd to command these Forces, he said, That he had heard no particular Names, but in general, that there were an hundred old Officers about the Town: That, after they had completed the Levies, it was resolv'd that the Examinant should make an Offer of the Command of the Duke of Monmouth; but the said Levies never having been completed, he had said nothing to his Grace: That the Pretences for their rising were to assert Religion and Liberty: That a DECLARATION was to be publish'd when these Forces were up, but he never saw or heard it: And, to wind up his Bottom, he mention'd the Incident of Keyling's being call'd Gulick at the Salutation-Tavern; but speaks of him as an utter Stranger to himself; and ascribes that saying to West; whereas West ascribes it to Nellthrop; and whereas West swears, June the 23d, that the Meeting at the said Tavern was about three Weeks or a Month past. Ramsay fixes it to the best of his Remembrance, on the Tuesday Se'nnight before his Examination; and Keyling, himself, on the Thursday before his, which was on the 12th of June, and his own, as we have seen, was on the 25th.

We have here a Discourse which relates to the whole Time, from Lord Shaftsbury's first Undertakings, to Keyling's Discovery; and consequently one would imagine the Colonel had told all he knew: But it seems he, as well as West, had his Recollections and Amplifications to make; and these, we are to suppose, are the Matters which he kept in Reserve for the King's own Ear, and which we also find in Bishop Sprat's Appendix, under the the Head of, Further Informations of Colonel Ramsay; but, except one, without any Dates or Intimations to whom they were made. In the first of these, we are told, that when Ferguson and others did, in several Meetings, since the Beginning of February, press for the getting ready the Men who were to dispatch the two Brothers, and it was urg'd in answer, That several of them were poor, and could not furnish themselves with Horses or Arms, the said Ferguson undertook to provide the Money; and in two Meetings afterwards, said, he had 600*l.* in Gold ready: That when Rumbald, &c. ask'd him at the first Meeting, whether he thought the Duke of Monmouth would not avenge the King's Death, he, Ferguson, undertook to have it under his Grace's Hand, That he would not, against the next Meeting: But when that time came, told his Associates, There was no saying any such thing to the Duke; but added, We must all be ruin'd if it is not done. And being farther ask'd, If the Duke would appear when it was? he made answer, That a Person would be there; but he must be excus'd from naming Names, and desir'd not to be press'd: That he, the Examinant, had always given it as his Opinion, That no Trust was to be put in what Ferguson said, because he would say any thing to promote the most barbarous Murder: That others made no Scruple to say, That when their Swords were in their Hands, if he, the Duke, would

A. D. 1683.

A. D. 1685. would not protect them, he should be cut off too: That when the News of the firing of Newmarket came to Town, Ferguson sent for most of the Conspirators, and was earnest with Rumbald and Godemough to make the Attempt with what Men they had; saying, he himself could help them to six; but that it was given over for that time, because neither Arms nor Horses were ready: That Ferguson then promis'd, he would immediately get the 600*l.* into his own Hands to provide all things in a Readiness against the first Opportunity: That about fourteen Days since, the said Ferguson had told the Examinant and Woff, That 3000*l.* was ready to buy Horses and to maintain them and the Men in a Readiness; but did not say from whom he was to have the Money.—Here our Examinant breaks off again, and goes back to January, not to add any thing new of his own Knowledge, but what he had heard from others in relation to the Treaty with the Scotts, &c. and concludes with saying, That to the best of his Memory, he hath here set down every thing that was said or transacted in the Debates when he was there.

And yet this was so far from being every thing he had to say, that in a third Information, he proceeded to depose as follows.

“That being sent by the Earl of Shaftsbury about the Beginning of November last to Mr. Shepherd's a Merchant near Lombard-street, where was the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Russell, Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Mr. Ferguson; this Examinant told them, my Lord Shaftsbury had sent him to tell them it was high time to come to some Resolution about the Raising, they made him this Answer by Mr. Ferguson (and afterwards my Lord Grey said Words to the same effect) that Mr. John Frenchard had promised and assured them, at his first coming to Town that Term, That he could in four Hours time have a thousand Foot, and two or three hundred Horses; but now they had sent to him to know the Certainty, he had return'd to them this following Answer: “That Men would not be got from home on two or three Days Warning, but that when such a thing as a Raising should be, he must know it sooner, that he might acquaint Men to make Provision of Settlements for their Families; so they could not go on at this time any further: And for this Reason, and that they heard Sir William Courtney would not stir, my Lord must be contented.” This Message I return'd to my Lord. On this my Lord resolv'd to leave England.”

This Third Information contains also several Particulars relating to the Proceedings of the Under-Cabal, which had been told him by others; and which, for that Reason, scarce deserve Notice. There are, moreover, two Letters of his in the Bishop's Appendix, to the Earl of Rocheſter: The first A. D. 1685. specifying, That Ferguson had said, he could promise for three hundred Scots, who were in this Town, and who would be ready at a Day's Warning; (and yet, when he was pressing to set Rumbald on the Assassination, he could furnish but six Men towards his Corps) That there were in England twelve hundred, who could be depended on; some of whom were Gentlemen's Sons, tho' now transform'd to Pedlars, for a Subſtitance; and all of them had been at Batſwell-Bridge: And the second, that Roe, the Bristol Sword-Bearer, had told the Examinant, that Gibbons, the Duke of Monmouth's Footman, had told him, that nothing but taking off the two Brothers would do the Business; and that, if he would go with him, he would shew him the Place to effect it; which was from a Mount in the Earl of Beſford's (y) Garden, looking into Covent-garden: That the said Gibbons had communicated this Project to Sir Thomas Armstrong, in the Name of Roe; that Sir Thomas had thereupon come to the Examinant in a great Passion, and enjoind him to warn the said Roe from (r) talking of any such thing; and that when the said Examinant did accordingly speak to the said Roe, he confess'd the thing, but insisted that the Motion came from Gibbons. Mention is also made of this Circumſtance again, in yet another Information of the Colonel's, (dated, by Miſtake, June 11, 1684, for July 11, 1683) which is levelled wholly at Armstrong and Monmouth, and which we shall have occasion to cite again hereafter: But therein he acknowledges, that Sir Thomas had made use of other Terms, than those then us'd by him, which he had forgot. And in the Conclusion of this second Letter, he uses these Words: “This was to be done as the King came from the Play. I cannot recollect whether I was twice at Mr. Shepherd's with the Duke of Monmouth, &c. or but once; but if I was but once, then I heard Mr. Ferguson relate to my Lord of Shaftsbury some Part of their Debates at another time; as that they had resolv'd on the 19th of November for the Raising, and some Heads of a Declaration. Whether I heard this Debate at Mr. Shepherd's, or at my Lord Shaftsbury's Lodging, I cannot be positive in, but Mr. Shepherd, I believe, may remember.”

Now the Lord Keeper North affirms, that he presently declar'd the Meeting at Shepherd's; [Examen, p. 390.] But we have seen that the Fact was otherwise: And if his Lordship had not also affirm'd, “That in all these Examinations there never was a leading Question made, but such as naturally arose from the Matter confess'd, it might have been furmish'd, that the Colonel was led to this Point, as the only way to deserve his Pardon. It is certainly strange, that he should first deliberately declare, that he had recollected every thing that had been said

(y) Where Tavistock-street, &c. now stand.

(r) This is no doubt infer'd by Rensſe as a blackening Circumſtance: But if we consider it in another Light, that Sir Thomas's Anger arose from his Abhorrence of any such Proposal; and that his Intention was not only to discourage the Talk, but the very Imagination of any such thing; it will then take a different Turn, and serve to shew, that the Designs of the Party were not so wicked as they have been represented.

said or transacted when he, himself, was present, and that he should soon afterwards recollect so much more: And it is as strange, that he should believe Shepherd would remember more of his own Conversations than himself. Shepherd, however, prov'd a notable Support to his crazy Testimony: For being brought before the King in Council, June 27th, he depos'd, "That, sometime before Lord Shaftsbury went for Holland, the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, Lord Ruffel, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Colonel Rumsey, and Ferguson met at his House; where the Subject of the Discourse was, how to secure his Majesty's Guards; and that, in order thereto, as he was afterwards inform'd at their next Meeting, the Duke, Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, walk'd about that End of the Town one Night; and gave an Account, that they found them very remiss in their Places, not like Soldiers; as also, that the thing, provided they could have a sufficient Strength, was feasible enough: But that finding such sufficient Strength was not to be had, the Project was wholly laid aside, so far as he knew." He added also many other Particulars relating to Ferguson, Bailey, and the Scottish Negotiation, which it is needless to repeat. The Merit of his Evidence consisted in the first Paragraph; which was so express against the Grandees of the Party: And tho' he swore Rumsey was present at this Conference concerning seizing the Guards, which the said Rumsey had, as yet made no Mention of, and Rumsey swore that his Business there was an Errand from Lord Shaftsbury, which Shepherd had made no mention of, this Disagreement was overlook'd; and a Proclamation was issued the next Day for the apprehending Monmouth, Grey, Ruffel, &c. Monmouth immediately absconded, but Grey and Ruffel were taken: With regard to the latter, Bishop Burnet intimates, That a Messenger was planted at his Door, the Day before the King came to Town, to have stop'd him if he had offer'd to go out: But his Back-door was not watch'd: Whence it was infer'd, that this was done to fright him away: But not having trusted Rumsey, and having forgot the Discourse at Shepherd's, he did not care to think himself in Danger, or that he ought to give the Courtiers an Opportunity to urge, That his Flight was a Confession of his Guilt. Thus he was induc'd to stand his Ground; and when the Messenger, for but one was employ'd on this Errand, arrested him in his own House, he made no Effort of any kind to escape, but obey'd the Warrant as implicitly, as if it had been back'd by an Army. As to his Behaviour before the King and Council, the Lord Keeper North pronounces, that he appear'd in very great Confusion; Mr. Corte, that it was very foolish; and in Bishop Spreal's Appendix, p. 131, we have certain Minutes of the Questions put to him, and his Answers; which are in Substance as follows: Being ask'd, whether he knew of any Consultations tending towards an Inturrection or to surprize the Guards; and if so, by whom? He reply'd, He knew of no such Consultations. Q. Whether he had ever been at Shepherd's? how often? and when last? A. (r) Frequently; but I cannot set down when I was there last. Q. Whether any Lords were in his Company, and who? Whether Monmouth, &c. A. I went thither with the Duke of Monmouth; but as to the rest of the Persons then present, as I conceive, I ought not to answer, ill Constructions having been put on that Meeting: Nor can I positively (for precisely) remember. Q. Was there any Discourse concerning a Rising in the West, or any Parts of the West, or at Taunton? What was that Discourse, and with whom? A. There was no Discourse, as I remember, concerning any Rising in the West, or any Part of the West, or at Taunton; nor particularly of Mr. John Trenchard's Undertaking; nor about Mr. John Trenchard, as I remember. Q. Was there any Discourse concerning the surprizing the King's Guards at any time? Did the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong undertake to view the Guards, to see if it might be done, and in what Posture they were? And did they afterwards make any Report on that Head? A. There was no such Discourse; nor did those Persons undertake to make any such View; nor did they make any such Report; nor was there any such Undertaking elsewhere that I know of. Q. Was Ferguson at any of those Meetings? and by whom was he directed? A. I cannot tell by whom he was directed at any of those Meetings; nor do I know he was there. Q. Do you know of any Design for a Rising in Scotland? Did you ever assist at any Consultation for that End, and with whom? What Money did the Scotts demand at first? Did they consent to take 10,000 l.? By whom, or how, was that Sum, or any Part of it, to be rais'd? A. I have heard general Discourses of many distressed People, Ministers and others of the Scottish Nation; and that it would be great Charity to relieve them.

Nothing is more amazing, than that any Man, who knows himself to be obnoxious to the Government, and who is determin'd not to throw himself upon the Mercy of it, should submit to these dangerous Parleys. Every one of these Questions was a Snare; and the Folly to be imputed to this unfortunate Nobleman on this Occasion, seems rather to arise from his answering at all, than from his answering in such a manner as oblig'd the Court: And as to his Confusion, it was but the natural Consequence of his Indiscretion. It is, however, apparent, that he was not even suspected of being privy to the Assassination-Conferences: And Bishop Burnet affirms, that the King, himself, expressly declar'd, That nobody suspected him of any Design against his Person. Upon the Issue he was sent to the Tower; and Lord Grey was brought under Examination next; who, says our Lord Keeper, "Did not at all decline answering, but, with the greatest Clearness in the World, made Professions of Loyalty, and deny'd all Practice against the King: But when Ramsfey was produc'd Face to Face, he was dash'd, but presently recollecting his Spirits said, He knew well enough he must be committed, as the Testimony against him was upon Oath, tho' never so false; and desir'd he might be permitted to lye in his own Lodgings, instead of being sent to Prison so late: And tho' this was refus'd, he was so far gratify'd, as to be permitted to lye in the (r) Serjeant's Houfe. This Liberty, continues our noble Author, he made use of so, that he confer'd with his Friends; and, it is likely, provid'd for his Escape: For the Serjeant was made drunk, or pretended to be so: And just as he should have enter'd into the Tower, he left the Serjeant asleep, and walk'd away, took Boat, and cross'd the Thames, and from thence escap'd to his own Houfe at Hastings, and afterwards found a Vessel that carry'd him into Holland; and the Serjeant was committed to the Tower in his stead."

p. 381.]

His Lordship soon after taking occasion to speak of Ramsfey and West, proceeds as follows: "West and Ramsfey having render'd themselves without Assurance of Pardon, but as the Discoverer they made should deserve it: And Ramsfey having been sworn in order to the issuing out Proclamations against Monmouth, &c. his Testimony shew'd he was not to be prosecuted: But West, as he said himself, knew too much to plead, Not guilty, and too little to deserve his Pardon; and some of the Council were averfe to Mercy towards him, because he had not only been earnest to press others to this Villany, but had bought the Arms wherewith the Assassination was to be perform'd; the King, whose Nature always inclin'd to Mercy, said, That if the Lords were satisfy'd that West had told all he knew, there was no Reason to hang him because he knew no more: And if Men were to be sav'd for the Weight of their Discoverer, and not for the Ingenuity of it, it might be a Means to make a Man invent false Accusations, which would be mischievous and wicked. Whereupon West was to be us'd as a Witness, tho' there was little need of his Testimony. One Accident contributed to the saving of West, viz. the taking of Walcot, who wrote a Letter to Secretary Jenkins, and appointed a Place; but his Heart fail'd and he was taken in his Lodgings."

Walcot takes;

This Letter of Walcot's is inserted in Bishop Sprent's Appendix, and contains an Offer to discover all he knew; which he presum'd by his Intimacy with a Scottish Minister, thro' whose Hands much of the Business went, might be something more than the Original Discoverer was able to acquaint his Majesty with, as also to follow the Lords and Gentlemen, who were fled into Holland, and to act the Part of a Spy upon them; in which Capacity, from the Confidence they plac'd in him, he thought himself ten times able to serve his Majesty, than Freeman or Carr, whom he said, they would never trust: And that the Court might be the easier induced to admit him into this Employment, he further said, That the Business was laid very broad, or he was misinform'd. On such ignominious Terms was this once gallant Man desirous to accept of Life! And yet, after he had furnish'd this Piece of Evidence against himself, in case he was taken, and against his Party, in case he made his Escape, so little was he acquainted with his own Heart, that he again shifted his Sails, as we have seen, and thereby show'd himself wholly unfit to go thro' with any great Design, whether Good or Evil. And, as if to shew the whole Effects of Infatuation, he, after all this, trusted the Secret of his Lodging to Sleep;

herd; who, as the Lord Keeper North gives us to understand, had likewise offer'd his Service as a Spy, and who to shew how much in earnest he was to make himself useful, immediately betray'd it. Being brought before the King, July the 8th, and call'd upon to confess the great things which he had before propos'd to make such a Merit of, He set out with the Rising, projected by Lord Shaftsbury, but neither nam'd Place, Time, nor Persons, from whom, when, or where, he receiv'd his Information; said, that Lord Shaftsbury was to have had the Command in London, Lord Ruffel in Devonshire, Lord Branden in Cheshire, and the Duke of Monmouth in Taunton and Bristol: That as to the last Business, he had no Conference about it with any Lord; but Lord Howard of Essex: That Ferguson had oblig'd him to bring him, the said Ferguson, and Lord Howard together: At which Interview, they had discours'd of the Ways and Means to surprize the Tower: That the said Lord was concern'd in the grand Consultation, and that Ferguson had told him about a Quarter of a Year before, that the Earl of Essex was in this Affair.

It was now recollected, that Lord Howard had been peremptorily charg'd by West; Walcot was another positive Witness against him; And Ramsfey had intimat'd, that his Lordship had been left out of the Consultations, because he had discover'd the Subject-matter of them to the said Walcot and West; so that nothing could be clearer than that his Life was at the King's Mercy; and no doubt was made, but, that worthless as it was, he would do any thing to save it. He had all this while, says Bishop Burnet, gone

(1) This Story is thus told by Bishop Burnet, vol. 1. p. 343. "He, Lord Grey, was sent to the Tower; but the Gates were shut: So he laid in the Messenger's Hands all Night, whence he turn'd to liberally with Wine, that he was dead drunk." Next Morning he went with him to the Tower-gate, the Messenger being again fast asleep. He himself call'd at the Tower-gate, to bring the Lieutenant of the Tower to receive a Prisoner. But he began to think he might be in danger: He found Ramsfey was one Witness; and if another should come in, he was gone: So he call'd for a Pair of Oars, and went away, leaving the drunken Messenger fast asleep."

A. D. 1681.] about protesting to every body, that there was no Plot, and that he knew of none; but he always appear'd in Agonies, when it was nam'd; and tho' advis'd by Hampden to go out of the way, if he knew there was any thing against him, or if he had not Strength of Mind to suffer any thing that might happen to him, he yet continu'd to stand his Ground: The Consequence of which was, that the very next Day after Walcot had been examin'd, the Sergeant at Arms, accompany'd by a Party of Horie, was sent to his House at Knightsbridge to apprehend him; and apprehended he was accordingly; tho' not till after a long and curious Search; for he had hid himself in a Chimney, which was cover'd from the Eye by a tall Cupboard or Press, which stood before it; and probably he had not been found at all, if the Warmth of his Bed, and all his wearing Clothes round about it, had not made it evident, that the Place of his Concealment was not far off. He was taken in his Shirt, and Bishop Burnet says, that he fell a-crying. When brought before the King, he at first declin'd answering; but being shewn, perhaps, the Desperateness of his own Condition, he desir'd to speak with his Majesty and his Royal Highness, and to them pour'd out all he knew; the Amount of which the Reader has already before him in the (1) Depositions, said to have been made by one of Lord Shaftsbury's principal Co-adjutors.

[His third Deposition.]
[Spart's Appendix, p. 72.]
There is, however, a supplemental Deposition of this noble Lord's, for which we are oblig'd, it seems, to his Recollection, that has not yet been touch'd upon; and that deserves to much the more Notice, because Bishop Burnet says, "His Majesty told them (viz. the several Witnesses) that he would not have a growing Evidence: And so he charg'd them to tell out at once all that they knew." And because there seems to have been a strong Disposition, at this time, in whom it is hard to say, to involve the Duke of Monmouth, either mediately, or immediately, in the blackest Part of the Conspiracy.

These Recollections of his Lordship's are as follow, viz. 1. That the Earl of Shaftsbury had complain'd to him, that one Mr. Carleton who had promis'd, and was able, to bring in great Assistance, had fallen off from him, and gone wholly over to the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Russel. 2. That the said Earl had told him, that Major Wildman was very forward and active in the Work; and that when he, the Deponent, once said, that great Guns would be one of their greatest Wants in it, the said Earl reply'd, That a Friend of his had undertaken to furnish him with two Drakes; which two Drakes the said Deponent since thought might be the two small Pieces (u) found with Major Wildman. 3. That Mr. John Ayliffe having offer'd to kill the Duke with his own Hands, the said Earl reply'd, No Jack, thou shalt not kill him, till we have an arm'd Force to justify it. 4. That about the 10th or 12th of October (these are his Lordship's own Words) after a stop put to the then intended Insurrection, the Duke of Monmouth told me, that he had seriously thought of it (meaning the Insurrection) and that after divers ways propos'd, and seriously consider'd of, he was clearly of Opinion, that there was nothing so easy to be accomplish'd, nor so probable to do the Work effectually as to fall in upon the King at Newmarket with a small Party of Horie of about forty or fifty; which he said he could soon have in Readiness. To which I answer'd, That I was of the same Opinion; but whether or not it would be decent for him to appear in Person in an Attack to be made when the King was in Person, deserv'd his Consideration. Two Days after I spoke to him of it again, and ask'd him what Thought he had of it? he answer'd me, That it could not be brought about soon enough. After which I never discour'd more with him about it; but, upon Reflection, I am apt to think, that from this time, and not before, the Design of way-laying the King, in his Return to London, was first meditated; and I am the more confirm'd in this Opinion from the Consideration of the Behaviour of the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Grey who seem'd to be very big of Expectation of some great thing to be attempt'd upon the Day of the King's coming from Newmarket: Upon which Day Sir Thomas Armstrong was not to be found till the King's Coaches were come into Town; and I do verily believe he was to have headed the Party. To this also may be added, That the Duke of Monmouth within few Days after, told me, that he had that Day given Orders to have his Horie carry'd into London to have been in a Readiness to have mounted, upon any Emergency.

It is to be regretted, that this remarkable Paper is without Date; but the very next after it is that farther Recollection of Colonel Rumsey's, mention'd above, and which, besides two other Items relating to Sir Tho. Armstrong, contains the following Article:

"Sir Thomas Armstrong did come to me [Ibid. p. 74.] the Sunday Night after the Fire at Newmarket, and told me, that he just came from Ferguson, and that, notwithstanding THEY return'd so soon, Ferguson did not doubt to have Men ready by that time to do the Business, and desir'd me to go with him to Ferguson's

(1) In Page 720, 731, 732.

(2) Concerning Wildman, and his Artillery, Bishop Burnet writes as follows:

"Among those clap up Wildman was one, who had been an Artillery in General's Army, and had oppos'd his Protection. After the Restoration, he being look'd on as a high Republican, was kept long in Prison; where he had study'd Law and Physics, so much, that he pass'd as a Man very knowing in these Matters. He had a Way of creating in others a great Opinion of his Sagacity; and had great Credit with the Duke of Buckingham; and was now very active under Spaul's Conduct. He was seiz'd on, and his House was search'd: In his Cellars there happen'd to be two small Field-pieces, that belong'd to the Duke of Buckingham, and that by in York-shire, when that was sold, and was to be pull'd down. Wildman carry'd these two Pieces, which were finely wrought, but of little Use, into his Cellars; where they were laid on ordinary wooden Carriages, and so very fit for any Service: Yet these were carry'd to Whitehall, and expos'd to view, as an undeniable Proof of a Rebellion design'd, since here was their Cannon."

*Ferguson's Lodgings in his Coach, which I did. When I came there Ferguson told me the same, but that they wanted Money (which is exceeding strange, if he had 600*l.* in Hand, as the Colonel had already sav'd) Mr. Carleton not being to be found; upon which Sir Thomas desir'd me to lend some, and he would see me repaid; and said, if he had been in Stock he would have done it himself. Upon their Persuasion I went to my House, I think, in Sir Thomas's Coach, and brought forty Guineas. He again repeated, that he would see me repaid. Several times after he told me, Ferguson had my Money, and wonder'd I would not go to him to receive it.'*

Now that these two Persons, without any Concert with each other, or Direction from any other Quarter, should, about the same time, make it their joint Study to recollect such things as should affect Sir Thomas Armstrong and the Duke of Monmouth in so capital a Manner, is scarce reasonable to suppose; and, therefore the strong Disposition, just spoken of, to ruin those two Persons every way, may without Breach of Charity be insisted on.

The Earl of Essex, Sydney, and Hampden, apprehended, and committed to the Tower.

The immediate, visible Consequence of Lord Howard's Discoveries, was an Order of Council for apprehending the Earl of Essex, Mr. Hampden, and, as it may be present'd, Colonel Algernon Sydney, since there was no direct Evidence against the Colonel, till that Lord turned Informer: But Bishop Burnet is positive, that he was taken into Custody, before there was any sort of Evidence against him; which, however, is not true, because he had been several times mention'd in the Course of the Examinations; tho', indeed, never but on Hearsay only. As to his Behaviour, when question'd by the Council, it was worthy of his heroic Character and exalted Sentiments: He said, he must make the best Defence he could, if they had any Evidence against him; but he would not give them an Opportunity to fortify that Evidence by any Inadvertency of his own. The more Firmness he shew'd, the more dangerous he appear'd: And because he was a Lion, it was resolv'd he should be chain'd. In a Word, he was sent to the Tower; and, however his Commitment might be justify'd by Reasons of State, it was undeniably, as Bishop Burnet remarks, against Law.

The Statesman, Essex, was far from keeping up to this noble Example set him by the Patriot Sydney. He had, all this while, kept at his Country-Seat; and when solicited by his Lady to provide for his Security by absconding, refus'd it, out of Tenderness to Lord Russell, as we are told by the Prelate, last quoted, left the Jury should be more dispos'd to credit the Evidence against the one, from the Flight of the other. A Party of Horse being sent to apprehend him, accompany'd by a Serjeant at Arms, and Sir Philip Lloyd a Clerk of the Council, to seize his Papers, he appear'd in some Confusion, and chang'd his Mind twice or thrice; one while saying, he would go on Horseback; and another while, that he would go in his Coach.

A. D. 1685.

When before the Council, his Enemies had also the Pleasure to see he was much dejected; and tho' he made no Confessions, but on the contrary seem'd to wonder that any Man should swear falsely against him, his whole Deportment bore witness against him. It was plain he was not at peace within; and that he was not enough prepar'd for an Event, which all Conspirators should first prepare for, the bursting of their own Mine upon themselves. Bishop Burnet farther says, That when he was sent to the Tower he fell under a great Depression of Spirit: That he could not sleep at all: That having twice before fallen under great Fits of the Spleen, the same Disorder now return'd upon him with more Violence than ever: That he sent a very melancholy Message to his Lady, signifying, That what he was charged with was true: That he was sorry he had ruin'd her and her Children; and that he had sent for the Earl of Clarendon, to talk freely with him (meaning no doubt to make his Confession): But that she prevented it, by desiring him to keep his own Secret, till she saw him: And that taking heart from this gallant Behaviour on her side, when Lord Clarendon came to him, he made that Nobleman believe, that he had sent for him only to rectify certain Mistakes he had fallen into before the Council.

As to Mr. Hampden, he trod in the Paths of Sydney; and refusing to answer, like him, was sent to bear him company in the Tower.

The Discovery of this twofold Conspiracy, and the several Commitments which follow'd it, had no sooner taken air, than every Corner of the Kingdom rang with the News: The Whigs, as the dapsr'd Party, were now familiarly call'd, seem'd to sink under the Disgrace of those busy Men who had taken upon them to be their Leaders; and while the Assassination was set before their Eyes in such odious Colours, durst not breathe a Syllable in Extenuation of the intended Rising: And the Tories, taking Advantage of their Silence and Dejection, with all the Insolence and Injustice which are inseparable from Faction when back'd by Power and clate with Success, made no Conscience to impute the Sins of those few, as usual, to the whole Party. A new Round of Addresses was immediately set on foot; the City of London had the Honour to lead the way; and almost every Corporation in the Kingdom took their Turn to manifest the Extravagance of their Loyalty, by an unreserv'd Tender of all they held dear; Fortune, Life and Liberty; and by loading their Adversaries with all the Reproaches that their Imaginations could furnish them with. Known dissenting Conventicles, atheistical Persons, factious, tumultuous, rebellious Spirits, seditious Dissenters, infamous Miscreants, Monsters, worth of Men, &c. &c. &c. were the Flowers that perpetually garnish'd these Court-Offerings, as the authentic Gazette bears witness to this Day; (Num. 1541.) and in particular, the Middlesex Justices of those times laid hold on this Opportunity, not only to inform his Majesty, 'That his Life was worth a hundred Million of theirs, but that he might now see out of what Quiver these venomous shafts were drawn," as also to signify their humble Opinion, "That those dangerous Meetings, the Conventicles, were not to be suffer'd, nor the Persons who frequented them, to be trusted either with Employments or Arms, by which they might disturb the Peace: And, yet farther, to caution him to have a care of his sacred Person, and to permit his Wisdom to controul his Mercy, that Justice might take Place, and bring those most execrable Villains and Traitors to condign Punishment."

Walcot's Trial.

And indeed their Worthips were not suffer'd to languish long in Expectation of the Severities which they deem'd so necessary. July the 12th, Walcot was brought on his Trial at the Sessions House in the Old-Bailey; possibly, that the Assassination being first prov'd, the Horror arising from the Conspiracy might make the deeper Impression; that the undistinguishing Herd might be the more easily led to confound the two Designs; and consequently that when those of higher Rank and Character should be put on the Justice of their Country, they might find the less Compassion. The Indictment was in the usual Forms, and enforc'd after the usual manner by the King's Council and the Attorney General. The Witnesses against the Prisoner, were Runsey, Keyling, Bourn the Brewer, and Wesl. Runsey was call'd upon first, and clear'd the way by giving the Court a Detail of the Plot in general; in the Course of which, he acknowledg'd, That the Assassination Project was form'd while the Prisoner was abroad; and that the Conspirators met two, or three, or four times without him: But then he came, and was resolv'd, said he, to join in the Matter, with this Distinction, that he would not have a Hand in attacking the Coach, but would command a Party that should charge the Guards. Here he was call'd upon by the Court to explain the whole Design; which he did, agreeable to the Account given by him in his first Information: But being ask'd when this Design was reduc'd into Form, he not only fix'd upon Ash-Wednesday, in the preceding February, but adds, it was the first time the Prisoner had assist'd: Whereas in the said Information, he fixes the said Adjustment at the Meeting held two or three Days BEFORE AFTER the King's Return, which was on March the 26th: Adding, that, at the next Meeting, Rumbald told his Story of the King's Manner of passing by his House; and that at this last Meeting, Captain Walcot was present; which implies, that he had never been present before; and if so, it is plain the Colonel was, in this Instance, forsworn: And that he actually was so, is so much the more probable, forasmuch, as, in all the Meetings previous to this last, when he, in so remarkable a Manner, specifies, that Walcot was present, he mentions none but Wesl, Good-enough, and Rumbald: And whereas in Court he swore, that Walcot was present, when the said Rumbald and Good-enough brought in their Notes of Names (of such as were to assist), and moreover undertook to go down to Rumbald's House (to see how the Ground lay, must be understood) in the said Information, he speaks of Rumbald as making the same Motion to himself; which he refus'd to comply with, and never once mentions Walcot on the Occasion. It is yet farther observable, that, whereas in Court he moreover swore, that Walcot was present, when it was resolv'd to buy Arms against the next Opportunity, in his said Information he treats of that Meeting as prior to the other, in which he so particularly certifies, that Walcot was present. So that if Want of Consistency is to be held a Proof that Truth is wanting, Runsey's Evidence will find little Credit with Posterity. In a Word, as to what regards Walcot's Case, his Depositions in Court agree with his Depositions before the Duke of Albemarle, and Mr. Secretary Jenkins, only in the Particulars of the Meeting at the Salutation-Tavern, when Keyling was call'd Gulick, and when the Buffets, as he affirm'd, on both Occasions, was to know what Progress had been made in the other thirteen Divisions of the City.

Keyling, tho' the first Discoverer, was the second Evidence; and, after going thro' the Generals of the Plot, as Runsey had done before him, summ'd up all he had to say, in particular, against the Prisoner, by alleging, That he, Walcot, was in Company at the said Tavern, when Wesl call'd him Gulick. And as to the Discourse at the same Place concerning the thirteen Divisions, he was wholly silent.

(w) Bourn was set up next, who depos'd, that he was at a Meeting at the Green Dragon Tavern

(w) Concerning this Man, the Lord-Keeper North writes as follows:

"The King was so gracious, that he deny'd Mercy to no Man that appear'd ingenuously, and told his whole Knowledge; which appear'd in the Case of Bourn, who was a young Man, a Brewer, at whose House Ferguson lodg'd; and, there being no great a Resort to Ferguson, it was necessary to make him privy to that Part of the Design, and they being almost ready for the Execution about London, he was to be engag'd, and met the Conspirators in several Places. Upon the Discovery he fled, and was about to take a Boat in St. Dunstons, to go with Neal and some Swissers into Holland, but was taken upon the Coast. And when he was brought before the King, and admonish'd to tell truth, he fell down upon his Knees, and desired the King's Pardon, and would tell all he knew. The King bid him speak, and he made a plain Narrative how at first he was engag'd, and what Transactions he was privy to; which agreed so perfectly with the Testimony of others, that the King declared he thought him at first the most ingenuous of all that had come in. It was remarkable in Mr. Bourn, that he spoke with a clear and constant Countenance, and smiling, as if he was not concern'd: Whether it was his Manner, or that his Resolution to be clear gave him Assurance; but it was a Wonder to me, that the Remembrance of such a Design should not create as Horror in him." Examen, p. 382, 383.

And yet as perfectly as the Narrative of this very ingenuous Creature is said to agree with the Testimony of others, there is not one Syllable in it relating to the Newmarket Affair, but what is contain'd in the following Passage: "Another time meeting Row, after the Fire at Newmarket, a great while, he began to talk of the Design at Newmarket, which he declin'd, when he found I was privous of it; but by him and others I understood afterwards, that there was a Consult several times, at Wesl's Chamber, against the Life of his Majesty."

On the contrary, the whole Piece turns on the Infernettes; and, concerning that, he even out-does all his Fellow-Discoverers, Tavern at Snow-Hill (when, or how often, is not specify'd) with Walcot and several others; where the Business in Agitation was, a Design to raise Men and divide the City into twenty Parts, in order to the SECURING his Majesty and the Duke of York, and setting up the Duke of Monmouth. Killing them, as he thought, was never mention'd at these Meetings: That, as he thought, Walcot was there every time: That he was also once at the Salutation Tavern with him and others, when it was press'd, that all Expedition should be us'd for the raising Men out of the twenty Divisions, but that the Agitators were not to disclose the Business, but only to pretend, that it was to know their Strength, if there should be Occasion, or if the Papists should rise: He moreover depos'd, that Goodenough brought an Account of between three and four thousand Men out of those Divisions he had in Charge: And that after the Discovery, there was a Meeting at one Colonel or Captain Tracy's, where the Prisoner lodg'd, of himself, Walcot, Goodenough, Woff, Norton, Rumsey and one Pottle; and that he left them debating about killing Keyling, because he had turn'd Informer: Adding, that there was also some Discourse of its being more advisable to stand to it with their Swords in their Hands, than to be hang'd. Here he clos'd his Evidence. And being ask'd by the Prisoner, whether he had ever heard him utter a Syllable concerning the assassinating the King? he reply'd, He never had: But that while he was present the securing the King was discours'd of: That, at several Meetings it had been said, There was no way like toppling, by which was understood the taking off the two Brothers: That it was the usual Phrase, and that he suppos'd the Prisoner heard it.

Mr. Woff set out with a Detail of many Designs against the King and Duke, under the Direction of Lord Shaftsbury, which had been communicated to him by the Prisoner, but withal acknowledg'd, that he had express'd ers, as may be gather'd from the following Passages: which are taken from it word for word:

"That Fragosus told him, there was not a County in England, but had prepar'd for the Business, less or more, but especially in the North and West; and that they were sure of most Places of Strength throughout the Kingdom; but especially Bristol and Newcastle: And that they were then considering how to secure Parliament; but were afraid they should not, the Garrison was to be remov'd.

And that the Army were to rise at the same time we were; and that we were to lend them 10,000*l.* to be remitted into Holland to buy Arms for them; and that he was to go over with the Bills of Exchange: That he found out a Person who could deposit the Money, upon good Security; which the Lords had promised should be given: That there was a Dutch Merchant or two, that he had got to provide the Arms; for the English could not do it without Suspicion.

Then I ask'd him, who the Lords were? He told me, there was the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, Lord Ruffel, and Major Widdow, and Colonel Sydney. I told him, I wonder'd the Duke would be persuaded to take up Arms against his Father: for my part, I should be very unwilling to trust him. He answer'd me, that he had the greatest Assurance in the World of him; and that I need no more be afraid of the Duke, than of him.

He told me, the Lord Argyle, who was to command the  Scots, was of my Opinion too; for he had, a few Days before, sent a Letter to him, to be well satisfy'd in the Point; and that he had sent him such an Answer, as he did not doubt would satisfy him.

He told me, the Duke of York had 14,000 Men in Half-pay about the Town; and, for his part, he thought we ought to defend ourselves; for we could not sell, but our Throats might be cut every Night. I ask'd him, how he could tell all this? He told me, that they had a great deal of Intelligence from the York Party, for there were some, that were willing to play a safe Game, and to keep in with both Sides.

That on Friday, being the 8th of June, towards Evening, Wade came and fetch'd me out, and carry'd me to the Dragon Tavern on St. Dunstons; where I met Colonel Rumsey, Mr. Robert Woff, Captain Walker, Mr. Norton, Mr. Wade, Richard and Francis Goodenough. Then I was ask'd, if I could not do what Mr. Goodenough had spoken to me about? and was desired not to say any thing about the Business in private, in direct Terms, but especially to any of the Ministers; for Woff said, they were a Parcel of Rogues, that had ruin'd the People ever since Cromwell's. I told them, I thought Mr. Beard and Mr. Lobb might be trull'd; and that they were, if they would, capable of serving them very much. But they would not hear it then; but the next Meeting, which was on Monday the 11th Inst., at the Salutation in Lambard street, he did think it was necessary Mr. Lobb should be spoke to, but not directly; which I did: For the next Day I went to him, and, talking of the Business of the Times, I said, there was but one Way to help ourselves, and that was by Arms; and if we should have occasion to do so, I ask'd him, where he could find a good Parcel amongst his People, that he thought would rise? He told me, that the Spirit of the People were low; but he did believe there was a pretty many of them that would make use of an Opportunity, if it was put into their Hands: But he could see no Hopes of such an Opportunity as yet; we were too great Cowards. But I bid him not be out of Hopes: And so our Discourse ended; for his Wife came in.

The next Meeting, which was on Thursday the 14th Inst., at the Dragon on Snow-hill, Richard Goodenough brought in an Account of the Divisions he was concern'd in: which was all the Town almost, but where I was; and at Woff's, where Mr. Grange, a Brewer, was concern'd; but he us'd me with us; but Goodenough said, he promis'd two hundred Men, and would be free of his Party. At this Meeting they resolv'd on This, which had been consider'd before, (for now they began to be sure of the Design; for they had a Probability of eight or nine thousand Men, from the Account Goodenough gave in, and others) That Whitehall should be secured, and the Manner thus: That the Men in Whitehall should be ready to make an Attack on that Side; that they would get about a hundred Seamen that should come up in Long-Boats with Hand-grenades, and should attack that Part next the Water; and that a Party of about five hundred should come down by Charing-cross, Part of which should secure the Mint, and the rest march down and surprise the Guards in their Sleep (for it was to have been about one or two in the Morning); and that all the chief Ministers of State were to be secured, the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs, and some of the Aldermen; another Party to secure the Seignior and Successors; and that in Convent garden and Lincoln's-Inn were to be Bolins of Men to be ready to give assistance, if need were: And that all the Expedition imaginable was to be made; for now it was put into the Hands of a great many, and there was danger of a Discovery. Mr. Goodenough told us that Day, that he had met with an Engageer that would do strange things about taking the Tower; and that he had six or seven Mortar-guns that belong'd to the Towers; and that he would take care to keep them this Month or six Weeks. At that time Mr. Woff said, he thought I must secure my Neighbour, meaning the Lord Keyser; but I told him, I would do no such thing as to fall on a Neighbour: Truly, he said, he should be very willing to come to Account with him; and, if he did, he should put him in mind of College. At this time Goodenough said, the People that he had spoke of the Matters to desired they might know what they must trust to; for if the Design was only to change Persons, they had as good have the Father as the Son; and therefore desired some Heads might be thought on and carried to the Duke to be sign'd by him the Night before the Design began; and these five things were resolv'd on:

1. That the Militia should be in the Hands of the People.
2. That they should chuse their own Sheriffs in every County.
3. That we should have a Parliament once a Year; and that they should sit as long as they had any thing to do.
4. That they should have Liberty of Conscience.
5. That all the Nobility of England, that had acted contrary to the Interest of the People, should be degraded.

Mr. Wade was to put these in Writing, and to carry them the next Morning to Colonel Rumsey, who was to go to the Duke with them; which he did; and on Saturday the 15th Inst., at the George and Fishers on Long-street, he brought us this Account, That he was to wait on the Duke twice before he could speak with him, but at last did; that the Duke's Answer was, That all of them were Things of Moment, and that they could not be done without a Parliament, but must be left to them; that he would do what lay in his Power towards the obtaining them.

preſ'd his Abhorrence of them as ungenerous; and that he had declar'd he would only be concern'd in a general Inſurrection. He alſo ſpoke of ſeveral Meetings preparatory to the Aſſaſſination, without any Mention of Walcot, as Rumſey at firſt had done when examin'd by the Duke of Albemarle and Sir Leoline Jenkins; and when he does mention him, it is in the miſt of things, when the Cabal ſat on the Manner of putting the Deſign in Execution: On which Occaſion the Priſoner, it ſeems, forgetting the Abhorrence he had formerly expreſs'd of ſuch ungenerous Deſigns, undertook to command the Party that were to attack the Guards, and were to lye perdue at Rumbald's Houſe till the King came down juſt upon them: And farther propos'd, inſtead of making their Eſcapes acroſs the Meadows towards Hackney Marſh, as Rumbald advis'd, that they ſhould retire within the Wall of the Houſe, and there keep cloſe till Night; as being a Place that was tenable for a Day againſt any Force: And this Cabal was held, and this Reſolution was taken, he, Weſt, inſiſted, at his own Chambers; at what time, he forgot to expreſs, and Walcot to enquire. He alſo, upon Recollection, inform'd the Court, That in his firſt Diſcourſe with the Priſoner, he, the Priſoner, told him, that the Lord Shaftsbury was preparing a Declaration to be publiſh'd in caſe either of an Aſſaſſination or an Inſurrection: That, nevertheleſs, he not only apply'd to him to draw up a Piece of the ſame nature, but actually offer'd him certain Helps towards it; being a Collection of all the Paſſages in the Reigns of James, Charles I. and the preſent King, which he call'd, Attempts to introduce Popery and Arbitrary Government: Charging theſe Princes alſo with their perſonal Vices, and concluding with this bold Aſſertion, That the Government was diſſolv'd, and that the People were free to ſettle another: And that he, Weſt, declining the Talk, becauſe it requir'd an exact Knowledge of Hiſtory, the Priſoner deſir'd him to burn the Paper, which he did.— He alſo urg'd, that the Priſoner was preſent at the Meeting, when it was reſolv'd to have Arms in Readineſs for any Occaſion; tho' in his Information (Numb. 1.) he names only himſelf, Ferriſon, Rumbald and Goodenough.— Proceeding to enumerate the intended Cruelties of the Party, before ſpoke of, and being aſk'd by the Court, whether the Priſoner was preſent at thoſe ſhocking Diſcourſes? he answer'd, that, tho' he was not at his Chambers ſo often as the reſt, he was preſent at ſome of them: Adding, that upon the News of the Fire at Newmarket, he, the Priſoner, ſaid, That he believ'd God ſhew'd his Diſapprobation of the thing. Weſt, after this, rambled into many other Particulars, which ſerv'd to enſnare the Court; but which no otherwiſe concern'd the Priſoner: And at laſt reſuming the immediate Buſineſs of his Evidence, charg'd Walcot with being preſent at the Devil Tavern, when Holloway of Briſtol propos'd, That ſince the Scottiſh Buſineſs was broken off, they ſhould try what Forces they could raiſe here; which gave Occaſion to the Project of dividing the City, already ſo well underſtood; and alſo at ſeveral other Meetings on the ſame Subject; that in all, he ſhew'd himſelf ready to act his Part: And that when they met for the laſt time, after Keyling's Diſcovery, he ſaid, That he was ſatisfy'd, God would deliver the Nation, tho' he did not approve of the preſent Inſtruments.

Here the Priſoner was admitted to enter upon his Defence; and, over and above what he had before ſugg'eſted, in answer to Rumſey's Evidence, viz. That he had never been at Weſt's Chambers till after the King's Return from Newmarket, inſiſted, that he had never been at Rumbald's but once, as he travell'd from Turk by Norwich, in his way to London: That he lay ſick of the Gout all the time his Majesty was at Newmarket: That Weſt ſaw him often, while he lay in that Condition, and that he never was out but once all the while, which was to dip his Foot in the Wells at Stepney. Theſe were Circumſtances, that if prov'd, would go near to ſhake the moſt material Part of the Evidence. Two new Proofs of his Guilt were therefore produc'd to prevent it; the firſt his own weak Letter to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, before mention'd; and the other a Note, which he had prepar'd to ſend by his Son, to his Landlord, Tracy; requeſting him to ſolicit Rumſey to be tender of him; he having Ground enough to ſerve the King upon others; and alſo to apply to Mrs. Weſt to make the ſame Application to her Huſband; with a broken Hint, that it might be of Service to her Children.

Tho' it was eaſy to foreſee, that theſe Papers, almoſt alone, would be fatal to him, the Priſoner did not throw up his Cauſe; on the contrary, he proceeded in his Defence with an equal Mixture of Spirit and Ingenuity: For he urg'd with great Propriety, that many of the things which the Witneſſes had teſtify'd, concluded very ſtrongly againſt themſelves, but not at all againſt him: That to wipe out their own Stains, they endeavoured to ſwear him out of his Life: That it was not prov'd, that he was preſent, when Goodenough produc'd the Notes of his Leſives, or that he had any Concern in the Matter: That he was not ſuch a Fool as not to know there was no Difference between attacking his Majesty's Guards, and attacking his Perſon; and that he never once entertain'd a Thought of being concern'd in ſo baſe an Action: That as to the Meeting or Meetings at his Lodgings, they were made by Rumſey's Appointment, not his: That he came amongſt them ſometimes, only to hear News; and that no Diſcourſe was ever held there, that he knew of, either of killing the King, or levying War: But then he acknowledg'd, that he had heard of a Deſign carrying on by a great many Lords, Gentlemen, and others, for aſſerting their Liberties and Properties, under theſe Reſtrictions, however, that he never was in any Conſultation with them, nor had receiv'd any Meſſage from them; and that he had never ſeen the Face of any of the Lords to be concern'd: Whence he infer'd, that it was utterly improbable, that that he should be so deeply engag'd as the Witnesses had represented; and, that the Extent of his Crime was but Misprision of Treason.

Here the Lord Chief-Justice interpos'd, to rectify this Mistake of the Prisoner in point of Law, by observing, "That tho' to hear Treason accidentally, and to conceal it, was but Misprision; yet if a Man would assist at several treasonable Meetings, as the Prisoner, even by his own Confession, had done, he became guilty of Treason."

The Jury then desiring he might be ask'd, what he had to say to his Letter, his Answer was, That what he promis'd, he undertook on the Strength of his Intimacy with Ferguson, the Scotch Minister, therein refer'd to; by whose Means he believ'd he should have an Interest with the rest: That he had, according to his Promise, given an Account of what he had heard; but his Majesty was not satisfy'd with it, because he had not descended to Particulars, which it was not in his Power to do, in regard he had never been in their Secrets, nor knew any thing but by Hearsay, from a private Hand.

In the last Place, he produc'd one Witness to prove, when he fell ill of the Gout, and how long the Fit continu'd, who did, indeed, confirm the Matter of Fact, and alledg'd, that he believ'd it lasted about three Months, but would not undertake precisely to adjust the time. The Chief Justice then deliver'd his Charge, and the Jury, after a few Minutes Deliberation, brought in their Verdict, Guilty.

Hone's Trial.

On the same Day, Hone the Joiner was arraign'd, and on the next was brought upon his Trial; when he would have sav'd the Court any farther Trouble, by pleading guilty; but being charg'd in the Indictment with conspiring the Death of the King, and providing Arms in order to effect it, he could not be brought to plead guilty to the Whole; but tho' he acknowledg'd he had been retain'd by Goodenough, as he understood, to kill the King and Duke of York, utterly deny'd that he had ever provided any Arms. He was indeed so wretched a thing, that the very Idea of a Plot becomes ridiculous, when it is suppos'd that such as he had any Concern in it. Keyling and West were the Witnesses against him; but did not wholly agree in their Evidence; for whereas the first swore, that he, the Prisoner, was present at the Dolphin Tavern, during the whole Conversation there, when the Arms were talk'd over under the Cant Name of Quills of all sorts; West, on the contrary, was express, that he did not come in till that Discourse was over; and that he was sure he never spoke any thing of that Nature before Hone in his Life: Keyling moreover swore, that the Prisoner had acknowledg'd to him, that he was to be one of the Assassins; and that it would never be well till the Black-bird and Goldfinch, meaning the King and Duke of York, were knock'd o' th' head: And West, that Goodenough had undertaken to provide the Man; and said, he would try him, whether he would make an Attempt on the Duke, without the King: That he, West, afterwards ask'd the Prisoner, whether he had seen Goodenough? who answer'd, that he had, and that he had spoken to him about a little Jobb for the Duke. He also enlarg'd on other idle Talk, which had pass'd between him and the Prisoner at his Chambers, as that, he thought, he said, "If the Duke of Monmouth would be true, and appear, he would bring fifty or sixty honest Men of the other side of the Water, who would do the Business?" And West asking, what Business? the Prisoner reply'd, either a brisk Pass, or the two Brothers.

Now if the Prisoner had not stupidly thrown away his Life, by his own absurd Confessions, it is scarce supposable that any Jury whatever would have pronounc'd him guilty, when such an irreconcilable Difference star'd them in the Face, in the only Point of Evidence to which both the Witnesses spoke: And it appears, that even West himself was struck with so much Compassion for him, that he could not help extenuating his Fault, in so remarkable a Manner, as drew upon him the Displeasure of the Court.

But tho' the Man was Fool enough to confess away his Life, as in the first Instance with respect to the Indictment; so, in the Course of the Trial, he would not confess more than was true. Thus he confess'd, that he had us'd such Words as Keyling depos'd, with regard to the Black-bird; but then he declar'd, "That as to the Goldfinch, he had never heard a Word till then." And when one (x) Sir Nicholas Butler charg'd him with having been always engag'd in Plots and Contrivances; and, in particular, with having reveal'd to him, that when the King and Duke stood in a Balcony opposite to Bow Church, to see the Lord-Mayor's Shew, in Chaplain's Mayoralty, six Men with Cross-bows were to have kill'd them from the Steeple; he declar'd, that he had been told of such a Design, but was never engag'd in it: When also Richardson, the Keeper of Newgate, swore, that he accompany'd Sir Nicholas when he examin'd the Prisoner concerning the Cross-bow Plot; and that he heard him then moreover confess, that Goodenough came to him and told him, he wanted Labourers; which he explain'd to be Persons to (y) KILL the King and Duke; that he, the Prisoner undertook to be one of those Persons;

[x] This Sir Nicholas Butler had been an Anabaptist, was a Professor of Physic, and a Court-spy; and afterwards, on the Credit of his Services in the last Capacity, became a Privy-Counsellor. In his Evidence he farther gave the Court to understand, that he had impair'd Hone's Intelligence to the King; and that one Harvil (Oldmixon says Sir Robert Southwell) was appointed to watch the Place where these bold

Persons were to take their Stand: But it seems so such Persons appear'd. Witness it may be infer'd, that the Plot was laid only to fathom the Depth of Sir Nicholas's Attachment to the Party; and that Hone was made use of only to draw him into the Snare.

[y] The very Words of Hone's Confession to Alderman Turner, in relation to this Matter, are as follow: "This

A. D. 1683. fons; and that he was to have twenty Pounds to furnish him with Horfe and Arms; and that he also confes'd the Business of the Rye; he acknowledg'd he had been drawn in by Godenough, as above; but persisted in denying, that he either knew where or when he was to do the Business requir'd of him.

But neither his Firmness on one hand, nor his Stupidity on the other, had any Weight with the Jury; who made no difficulty to pronounce him guilty, without stirring from the Bar.

Rouse's Trial. Rouse follow'd next; and against him appear'd Thomas Lee the Dyer; who swore, That the Prisoner had carry'd him to a Club of Conspirators at the King's-Head Tavern in Swithin's-Alley; but that Godenough had previously made him acquainted with the Affair in hand: viz. That the Rights of the People were invaded; that Popery and Slavery were to be establish'd; that it was time to look to themselves; and that he finally put the Question, Whether he would engage to prevent it? That, in consequence of this Discourse, he (the Witness) undertook to make a Party: That he communicated their Names to Rouse and Godenough: That the Latter told him, the Design was to kill the King and Duke: That he acquainted Rouse with this Business; but found he was in the Secret before: That the said Rouse told him, he could raise Arms for a hundred Men; but that nothing was to be done, unless the King were seiz'd upon: Adding, "We remember Forty-one, when the late King set up his Standard; we must therefore seize the present, that he may not do the Like; but in order to secure him only, not shed his Blood." That the Prisoner moreover told him, it would be a convenient thing to have a gilded Ball play'd for upon Black-beat: To which End some Sea-Captains should be spoke to: That he would engage ten, who should have the Management of the Affair: That he who won the Ball should have it: That when the Play was over, every Captain should take his Party, and tell them they had other Work; and then go with Long-boats and Arms, and seize the Tower: That the Prisoner had us'd several such Discourses to several Persons at the King's-Head Tavern in his Hearing: That he had several times gone to view the Tower, and had taken him and William Leigh the Mate along with him: That the said Leigh saying, "He would undertake to attack the Tower at Traitor's Bridge with an hundred Grenadiers;" Rouse reply'd, "He had been at Wapping, and had spoke with some Sea-Captains, who were ready to do the Work." Thus, it seems, Rouse had a (2) Plot of his own; but not to lose Sight wholly of the general one, this Dyer also swore, That they never agreed on any Method of killing the King; but that he was told, They had a thousand Horse ready in the Country, and five hundred in the City: That the King was to be kill'd coming from Windsor: That they were contriving to send Arms in Trunks to private Houses, which they were to resort to in the Night-time: That some brave Men were to be sent to Windsor to know when the King came, and to give Information, that he might be attack'd in some convenient Place: That both the King and the Duke were to be taken off; and that the Prisoner, in particular, whom he had before represented as so averse to the shedding of Blood, should say, Take them off, and then no Man can have a Commission to fight for them.

The Prisoner, after this, demanding, Whether he had ever spoke to the Witness of a Design against the King and Government, and at what Place: And whether the Witness did not begin the Discourse with him first? The said Witness answer'd, He could not be positive whether Rouse came to him, or whether he went to Rouse: But which ever it was, when the Business was discuss'd, the Prisoner was very zealous to get ten Captains, that the Ball might be play'd for, and the Tower seiz'd: And, moreover, ask'd Godenough, what Money was provided? and, when he answer'd 4000*l.* added, The Seamen would swallow up that presently.

William Leigh, the Mate, was the other Witness, who, instead of confirming what the Dyer swore had pass'd between all three of them when reconnoitring the Tower, which, it was reasonable to expect, he would not fail to do, depos'd, That the Prisoner had, several times, enquir'd of him, Whether he could not procure some Seamen who were fit to be Commanders of Ships? And that, when he, in Reply, had ask'd, Where he would procure the Ships which they were to command? he answer'd, He would have some of the King's Men of War, which lay at " This Examinant saith, That about the Fire-time at Newmarket, Mr. Richard Godenough came to him to Clifford's Inn, where he was at work at one Mr. Clark's Chamber, and ask'd him to go along with him, and told him, he wanted some Lubbers: This Examinant then ask'd him, if they were honest? Upon which Mr. Godenough clucht his Fists, and brack in towards his fourth twice or thrice, and told him, it was to raise the King and the Duke; and that there would be 20*l.* apiece to buy Horfe and Arms. This Examinant then told him, he was well settled in his Trade, and did not care to trouble himself."

(e) And yet, in this Man's Confession before the Council, all he says of Rouse is as follows:

" I told him (Godenough) that I had spoken with Mr. Rouse, and that he could help them to Arms for a hundred Men; and that a Way was providen how to raise a thousand Seamen, if they would be at the Charge of a golden Ball to be play'd upon Black-beat. He ask'd me what the Ball would cost? I told him, I was inform'd about 12*l.* He said, if it were forty, they would be at the Charge of it. Then he desired to speak with Mr. Rouse, and appointed to meet him at the King's-head Tavern in Swithin's-Alley; and they met, and went into a Room apart; and afterwards we went to Jessop's Coffee-house in Exchange-Alley, and Mr. Rouse told me, that he would see and get ten Sea-Captains to manage that Affair. The next Day I met with Mr. Rouse, at the Amsterdam Coffee-house; there he spoke with two Captains, as he told me; and from thence he went with them to the Angel and Crown Taverns in Threadneedle-Street; but I did not go with them. I saw him afterwards at the King's-head, and he told me, he must have Mr. Godenough go with him to Wapping. I acquainted Mr. Godenough with it, and he told me, that those Houses of the Tower was left to some Men, that understood those Affairs better than himself; and that they must be in a readiness to do all together: I ask'd him what that was? He told me, they must seize the Tower, and take the City, and secure the Sovey and Whitehall, and the King and the Duke."

at Defford and Woolwich: Adding, We must secure both the Tower and Whitehall, or we shall do nothing." That upon this, the Witnesses asking, Where was his Oath of Allegiance? the Prisoner reply'd, We will secure the King, that he come to no Damage; and he shall remain King still. And, contrary to the Dyer's Testimony, the said Mate, in his first (a) Information to the Council, expressly says, That Rouse and his Wapping Friends had a Meeting; and that not liking his Ways, they parted.

There was also a third Person who appear'd against him, impertinently enough; since all he had to swear, was to the Words which the Prisoner had been formerly indicted for, which had no Relation to the present Indictment, and which could only serve to put the Jury in mind, that by the help of Ignoramus, he had slipped thro' the Hands of the Court before.

As to the Prisoner's Defence, it did not consist in detecting and exposing the want of Agreement in the two Witnesses; nor the manifest Inconsistency of his being at one time against shedding of Blood, at another, for taking off both the King and his Brother; and again at another, for raising an Insurrection, without any Purpose of even depriving the King of his Crown, &c. but in urging, in the Presence of God, before whom he stood, that the Designs charg'd upon him, had never enter'd into his Heart; and that the Discourses he had held with the Mate and Dyer had been only to get at the Bottom of their Practices, in order to discover them. But of this the King's Council took the Advantage to insist, That his own Confessions were sufficient to hang him. And the Court being in no Disposition to shew him Mercy, the Jury, as before in the Case of Hone, pronounc'd him Guilty, without removing from the Bar.

Blague, one of Rouse's suppos'd Captains, was the next Person whose Life was brought into question, for being concern'd in this Presbyterian Plot: And, as the very same Persons appear'd as Witnesses against him, whose Testimony had been fatal to Rouse, it was not only reasonable to think, that his Destiny would have been the same, but that the additional Proofs, arising from this Trial, would have stamp'd an additional Authority on the last.

The Captain, however, was either so in-ferable of his Danger, or so fortify'd in his Innocence, that he submitted his Cause to the same Jury, without troubling the Court with a single Challenge. The Indictment was for compassing the Death of the King, seizing the Tower, providing Arms, &c. Lee the Dyer led the Way, as first Evidence, and swore, That the Prisoner being in discourse with him and Goodenough, at the King's-head Tavern in Chancery-lane, on the Means of seizing the Tower, declar'd, that the only Way was to do it with Mortar-pieces: That he would venture his own Ship: That he would make up the fourteen Guns he had already, twenty-four; and that he would provide two hundred men. Then Leigh, who was the Captain's own Mate, added, That being with the Captain in a Coach, he said, One of these Days we shall have a Ball to toss; which he, afterwards understood by Rouse; and Lee the Dyer was the Ball to be toss'd on Black-beat: And, farther, that the Prisoner and he one time walking about the Tower, and discoursing of seizing it, he, the Witness, gave it as his Opinion, that the best way would be to scale it, but that the Prisoner was for making use of Mortar-Pieces from the Soutb-wark Side; but as to any use he was to make of his Ship, he said, he could say nothing.

On the other Side, the Captain's Defence consisted in these Particulars: That all his Business with Rouse, was to negotiate a Sum of Money, Rouse being a Broker: That while he was in this Pursuit, he sometimes fell into Goodenough's Company; but that if he ever discours'd with him about public Affairs, or any thing tending to the Disturbance of the Public, he was no Christian: That as to his Discourse concerning the Tower, it was purely accidental, being held with the Waterman who row'd him by it from his Ship, and arose from an Observation, that the Place was ill fortify'd, and that the Side next the Water was even more expos'd than any other Part, &c. That as to Arms, he had none but such as he bought with his Ship, for his Defence at Sea: That he never so much as talk'd of a Bank of Money: That in the Matter of the Ball, he was, to that Moment, as ignorant as one who had never seen a Ball; and that he was not even in Possession of his Ship, at the time when it was said, he would venture her in such warm Work as an Attack upon the

Trial.

(a) Which, as far as it related to Rouse, was as follows: " I do declare, that my first Acquaintance with Mr. Rouse and Mr. Lee was by reason of Captain Blague, and his Intreat to go his Mate; and the first time that ever Mr. Rouse spoke any thing to me, about the Plot, was one Day I met him by the Exchange: He told me he had something to say to me; and, to the best of my Remembrance, he said, I do presently after, if I did know of any Schemes that were fitting to make Captains, in Wapping? I told him, No; but I would like what I could do: And he promis'd, he and Mr. Lee to come to the Blue-masher by Wapping-dock, next Morning about Ten o' Clock; but came not. Another Day, he and Mr. Lee came down, and discours'd with some of Mr. Rouse's Friends that he met; but they did not like his Way, and so parted."

He also took upon him to answer for the Truth of what the Dyer had the same Day depos'd; and, upon farther Recollection, sent in a Supplement, from whence he drew his Evidence, as follows:

" Shall I please your Majesty. " Since I sent in my Paper, I have sent something more, which came in my Mind since: That is, about getting some Schemes, that might be fit to go Commissioners or Captains of Ships; And as he said, if I could get two or three, some time afterwards I did enquire what he would do with them? He told me, to make Masters of Ships. I ask'd, for what End? He told me, to put in Ships in Defford or Woolwich; that is, Men of War, to make Guard-ships, to stop all going and coming. I did ask him, what he would do with them, when there was no Gun, nor Powder, nor Shot on board? but I told him, if he had the Tower, even he might do something. But his Answer was, if not then, some time after that, says he, Mr. Rouse by Name, we must secure the Tower and Whitehall both together, or else there could be nothing done: For, says he, we must take the King, and then our Work is done, to the best of my Remembrance. I asked, what was then his Oath of Allegiance? He told me, if they had the King, he should be King still, but he might under his Commission. I do shew Mr. Lee was there present."

A. D. 1683. Tower: And finally, he call'd three Witnesses to prove, that his Ship was not fit for Service on the Water three Weeks before, &c. So that the Charge appearing so weak, and the Defence so strong, the same Jury who condemn'd Rouse, on the Evidence of the same Persons, by the very Direction of the Court, acquitted him: And as no Trial of this nature is ever brought on without a thorough Examination of the Allegations which are to support the Indictment, it can no otherwise be accounted for, that the King's learn'd Council should suffer the Course of their Prosecutions to be damp'd by this Acquittal, than by supposing, that Blague would have been a material Witness in the Behalf of Rouse; and that there was no way so effectual to silence him, as to treat him as an Accessary.

From these Plebeians, who were made use of to cure the Itch of Patriotism in the People, we are now to ascend to those of Patrician Race; who, tho' not charg'd with being concern'd in the Assassination, were to partake of the Ignominy of it, and to suffer in the same List as if involv'd in the same Crime. And why of all the four in the Tower, Lord Ruffel was pitch'd upon to be the first Sacrifice, may furnish Matter for Enquiry, without producing any satisfactory Conclusion. It may be urg'd by some, that of the whole Faction, this Lord was the most eminent for the Simplicity of his Manners, and the Purity of his Life: That he had distinguish'd himself most by his Zeal against Popery, and for the Exclusion of a Popish Heir; and that he was the most formidable both on Account of the vast Property he possess'd and was Heir to, and the Interest he had among the People: And by others, that the Court were most fortify'd with Matters of Fact against him, and Witness to justify them; and that therefore they made their Attack where the Breach was widest.

Possibly all these Considerations had their Weight: And certain it is, that after Walcot and Howe were dispatch'd, his Lordship was brought to the Bar, and in Compliment to his Quality, had the Privilege to be plac'd within it. The Indictment was in Substance, for conspiring the Death of the King, intending to levy War; and in order thereto to seize the Guard; for so the last Period of the said Indictment suggests, in the following Words: "And the Guards, for the Preservation of the Person of our said Lord the King, to seize and destroy against the Duty of his Allegiance, against the Peace, &c. and also against the Forms of the Statutes, &c."

To this his Lordship pleaded, Not Guilty; and mov'd, first, That his Trial might be put off for one Day, and then till the Afternoon, that one of his Witnesses, who he believ'd was on his way to Town, might have so much more time to come in; which Request (b) (Pemberton) the Lord Chief Justice, thought to be reasonable, that he was for complying with it, in case the Attorney-General would have given Leave: But the Attorney would admit of no Delay: And in Consequence his Lordship was oblig'd to join Issue immediately. He had, however, another previous Point to litigate, which related to the Jury; who, as Bishop Burnet asserts, "were pick'd out with great Care, being Men of fair Reputation in other Respects, but so engag'd in the Party for the Court, that they were easy to believe any thing on that Side." This, no doubt, was the true Objection to them, but this could not be urg'd; and his Lordship came ready furnish'd with another, and with Council at hand to support it, viz. That they were no Freeholders; in Support of which he cited the Statute of the 2d of Henry V. Where it is provided, That no Man should be try'd for his Life, except by such as had forty Shillings a Year. But tho' the Law was express, the Attorney-General would not allow it to have any Force: And the Prisoner insisting on the Benefit of it, the Lawyers were call'd in, and the Matter was learnedly debated: But in the End, the Prisoner's Objection was over-ruled by the unanimous Voice of the whole Bench, "Because, That at Common-Law the want of Freehold was no Exception in a City: And the Statute of 1 Mary declar'd, That all Trials for Treason should be according to Common-Law: And because want of Freehold had never been allow'd as a sufficient Challenge in the City." And yet in Fitzbarri's Case, when the same Challenge was made in the King's Behalf, it was admitted without any Difficulty, such a Prætextus is Authority!

All Demurrers being thus set aside, after the Prisoner had made his Challenges, which were peremptory to 31, the Jury were sworn, and Rumley enter'd upon his Evidence; which he open'd with an Account of his Message from Lord Shaftsbury to the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Ruffel, &c. at Shepherd's, and their Answer: In the Course of which, he deviated into some Variation both of Phrase and Circumstance from his former Depositions: For whereas, in his Information, N<sup>o</sup>. 3, the Words he made use of are general to the Rising, in his Evidence he grew more particular, and call'd it the Rising at Taunton: He also took care to add, that Shepherd introduced him to those Lords: And when the Chief-Justice demanded, Who gave him that Answer? he did not adhere to the Sense of the remarkable Parenthesis in the said Information, viz. That the Answer was made by Ferguson, and that, afterwards, the Lord Grey said Words to the same Effect; but, on the contrary, express'd himself thus: That Ferguson spoke most of it; and that, he thought, or to the best of his Remembrance, Lord Grey said something to the same Purpose; the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Ruffel being present: But then he was no more certain now than when he gave in his last Information, quoted, p. 732, Whether he was at one Meeting at Shepherd's, or two? or whether he then heard the Heads of a Declaration read? or whether he heard them reported afterwards? And, though he had fresh Matter to depose, the Fruits of further Recollection, and Shepherd's more forward Testimony, of so capricious a Nature was his Memory, that he could not recur to it, till prompted by the King's Council: And even the Questions put to him for that End serv'd rather to (e) disgrace than to authenticate his Testimony. When also he was ask'd, How long he was at Shepherd's? he answer'd, About a Quarter of an Hour: In which short Space, we are to understand, the important Commission he was charg'd with was fully dispatch'd; and another Resolution, as important, was taken: For, in the midst of all this Uncertainty as to Times and Seasons, Knowledge or Report, he proceeds to depose farther, That, while he was at Shepherd's, there was some Discourse about seeing in what Posture the Guards at the Survey and Meuse were, in order to know how to surprize them, in case the Rising had gone on; which Discourse was begun by Armstrong and Ferguson, and carry'd on by all the Company: That he thought the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, and Armstrong, undertook to view them: That the Prisoner was present when they did so undertake it: And being farther ask'd, not whether the Prisoner gave his Consent to this Undertaking, but to the Rising? he answer'd, He did.

Having thus finish'd both the Rising and the Design to seize the Guards on the Prisoner, as they would have it believ'd, the Court indulg'd him in saying what he thought proper to the Witnesses before him: On which Occasion, his Lordship seem'd to admit, that there had been such a Meeting at Shepherd's, and that Ramsay came on such a Message; but said, he was there by accident; that when he found himself in such Company, he was immediately for withdrawing; and appeal'd to the Witnesses himself, whether he had given any Answer to this Message? who, instead of replying somewhat directly, as he ought to have done, said, that he had discours'd of the Rising at Tannton: But when the Lord Chief-Justice recur'd to the Question, "Whether the Prisoner had given his Consent to the Rising?" the Colonel grew positive again, and affirm'd, most explicitly, That he had.

Shepherd's Evidence.

This Answer, which was held decisive, made way for Shepherd to appear, who was also more particular in his Testimony, than he had been in his Information: For he now depos'd, that the Conveniency of his House was previously bespoke by Ferguson: That when this Company met, he was desir'd to wait upon them in Person, that they might not be observ'd by his Servants: And that the Substance of their Discourse was, How to surprize the Guards. He did not, however, depose, that any Resolution was then taken thereon: But proceeds to say, That, as he remember'd, the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, did go one Night to the Meuse, or thereabouts, to view them; and that when they met next at his House, he heard Sir Thomas Armstrong say, They were remis, &c. that he remember'd but two Meetings; and being ask'd, Whether the Prisoner attended both? he answer'd, Yes, to the best of his Remembrance: But he did not remember that Lord Ruffel had any Business with himself, or that there pass'd any thing in private between Ramsay and his Lordship, or that there was any farther Discourse, or any Writings or Papers read: Only, at last, he recollected one Paper, which had been read by Ferguson, of the Nature of a Declaration, setting forth the Grievances of the People: Particulars he had forgot; He suppos'd it was produc'd for Approbation; was positive, that no Time was discours'd of, when it was to be set forth; and that it was first shew'd by Armstrong: Said, that, as he remember'd, the Duke of Monmouth was present at the Reading of his Paper; and, he believ'd, Colonel Ramsay—(Here the Colonel's Memory return'd all at once, and he declar'd positively, he was not present, tho' he had been so uncertain as to this Matter till now.) That he could not say Lord Ruffel was: Peristed in affirming, that he was there, when the Discourse was held in relation to the Guards: Could not, however, be precise in setting the Time when these Meetings were held; nor be positive, whether the Prisoner assist'd at Both, or not: He thought he was at Both; he was sure he was at One.

And now came forward the Person, who, in all but the Nobility of his Birth, was the reverse of the unhappy Prisoner; a Man of Outfide only, who made the best Practices subservient to the worst Purposes: who was distinguish'd by high Rank, quick Parts, and happy Address, only to be the more emphatically despis'd; and whose whole Life was so thoroughly profligate, that his turning Evidence against his best Friends, has been represented by some, as the least exceptionable Part of it. After saying thus much, every Man conversant in the Story of this Reign will think of Lord Howard; who now appear'd as a Witness in that Court, where he, of all others, most deserv'd to have been prosecuted as a Criminal; and who ran over again the Contents of his first Narrative, above cited, by way of Introduction to his second; tho' not without many Additions and Embellishments: In particular, instead of speaking dubiously of the Number of Persons suppos'd by Lord Shaftsbury to be ready to rise when he, Shaftsbury, held up his Finger, as he had done before, we now find him speaking positively of ten thousand British Boys, who were ready to obey that Motion: And what is yet more extraordinary, we find him also relating a Conversation between himself and the Duke of Monmouth, of which he had not utter'd ter'd one Syllable in his said Narrative; namely, That his Grace told him, "That Lord Russell had been with Lord Shaftsbury, and had prevail'd with him to put off the Day of Rendezvous, upon Condition, that the Lords and others of the Party should be in a Readiness to raise the Country within a Fort-night after." And yet farther, that the Duke added, "He had been at Wapping all Night, and never saw a Company of bricker, bolder Fellows in his Life; and that he had also view'd the Avenues of the Tower, and did not think it difficult to possess themselves of it." And, tho' in his supplemental Deposition, inserted in p. 735, he takes so much Pains to involve the Duke and his Favourite, Armsstrong, in the Odium of way-laying the King, in his Return from Newmarket, he now tack'd about again, and endeavour'd as much to acquit his Grace of all Concern in the Assassination, at the same time that he plung'd him deeper than ever in the Insurrection: To this End, telling a Story, "That about the 17th or 18th of October last, Walcot told him, They were positively resolv'd to rise; and believ'd, that a smart Party might meet some great Men: That he reported the same to the Duke with his Opinion, that it contain'd a dark Intimation of an Attempt on the King's Person: That his Grace thereupon with great Emotion struck his Breast, and cry'd out, Gods! Kill the King? I will never suffer them: That Lord Grey, with an Oath, also observ'd upon it, That if they made such an Attempt, they could not fail; and that they remain'd in great Anxiety till they heard the King's Coach was come in."

In the Course of this dangerous Rhapsody, the noble Prisoner could not forbear interposing with a Complaint, that his Life should be thus expos'd to Hear-say Evidence, which he call'd very hard Measure. But tho' the Lord Chief Justice thereupon took notice to the Jury, that nothing of that Nature could affect his Lordship at the Bar, the Attorney General gave the Hint to Lord Howard to proceed in Order of Time; or in other Words to tell his own Story his own way. His Lordship accordingly rambled on as before, and omitted nothing that might pass at Court for good Service.

At last, however, he came down to the Establishment of the Council of Six; and the Detail of what pass'd at the two Conferences held by them at Hampden's and Lord Russell's; and was yet more particular in his Testimony, than before in his Narrative; for whereas in his Account of the first of those Conferences, he barely ran over the Points in Debate, he now enlarg'd on the Duke of Monmouth's particular Share in it; and intimated, that, in Defence to his Arguments founded on the Impossibility of a Rabble's making head against a disciplin'd Force, it was thought most advisable to begin the Raising in the Country first. In his Account of the second, which, turn'd on the opening a Correspondence with Lord Argyle, and inviting a Deputation from the discontented Scots, he had also a Supplement to add; which was, that the Management of this Affair was left to Colonel Sydney, who, afterwards told him, that he had sent Aaron Smith to Scotland, and given him 60 Guineas for his Journey.

As in these last Particulars consisted the Strength of his Evidence, Care was taken to ask him such Questions as should bring it to bear as hard as possible against the Prisoner, viz. Was Lord Russell at these Meetings? Did he sit like a Cypher among them? Did he give his Assent to what pass'd? To which his Lordship, the Evidence, answer'd, "That he with'd he could say he was not there: That every one knew that Lord Russell was a Person of very great Judgment, and not over lavish in Discourse; and that there was no formal Question put; but then there was no Contradiction; and, as he took it, all gave their Consent."

The Prisoner having now Leave to make his Objections to what had been said by Lord Howard, seem'd to admit the Meetings, as he had before done the Messengers; but insisted, that the Company met on no form'd Design, but only to talk of News and things in general. He also insisted, that Lord Howard's Evidence consisted chiefly of Hear-say; which drew from the Bench a Recapitulation of such things as he had advanc'd on his own Knowledge: And to give the greater Weight, the Attorney General call'd upon the Messenger, who had some of the Scottish Gentlemen in his Custody, to prove, that the Matter of Fact so far corresponded with the Depositions: He also call'd upon Wool to satisfy the Court whether he and his Associates in the Project of a Rising, look'd upon any of the Lords, &c. of the Cabal, as concern'd in the same Design? who made no Difficulty to answer, That they always said, Lord Russell was the Man they most depended on, because of his great Sobriety. And here the Counsel for the King left the Prisoner to proceed with the Residue of his Defence, which his Lordship accordingly enter'd upon: First modestly touching on the Hardships he labour'd under, and his own Incapacity to make a proper Defence, and appealing to the Justice of the Bench and the Conscience of the Jury. Then alledging, that tho' the Persons who testify'd against him might be accounted legal, they were not credible, Witnesses, because they swore against him to save their own Lives: And demanding to know on what Statute he was indicted; For, if it was on the 13th of the King, the time prescrib'd by it for Prosecution was elaps'd, which destroy'd Ramsay's Evidence: And if on the 25th of Edward III. a Design to levy War would not amount to Treason, unless that Design was render'd manifest by some Overt-Act.

The Attorney-General reply'd, That he was indicted on the latter; adding, according to the Rules of Law-Logic, "That to prepare Forces to fight against the King, was a Design to kill the King within that Statute: That a Design to depose the King, to imprison him, or raise his Subjects against him, were within that Statute, and Evidences of a Design to kill the King."

The Prisoner then, presuming on the Letter of the Law, which it seems is what is least regarded on these Occasions, ventur'd to urge, That he did not hear Rumsey's Message: That Rumsey himself had not testify'd, that he had given any Answer: That Shepherd knew nothing of the Matter: That consequently here was but one Witness against him; whereas the Statute requir'd two; and that, besides, the Overt-Act was wanting which constituted the Treason; for a Consultation could not be call'd an Act; and this being Matter of Law, he pray'd the Benefit of Counsel to argue it.

The Chief Justice here declar'd, "That it had been resolv'd, that there need not be two Witnesses to the same individual Act; and that if there were several Acts manifesting the same Treason, and one Witness to each of them, they were two Witnesses within the Statute of Edward VI. And as to the other Point, whether Consultation or Conspiracy was Treason, the Fact must be admitted, before Counsel could be admitted to argue it."

But this was an Experiment which no Man in his Senfes would make. The Force of the Law lies in the Interpretation: And in Cases of this nature, it is never to be suppos'd, that the Decision of the Bench will be directed by the Pleadings at the Bar. Instead, therefore, of exposing his Life to be wrangled away, his Lordship chose rather to leave it in the Hands of his Jury, and to bespeak a favourable Verdict by shewing the Weakness and Uncertainty of the Evidence which was brought against him: In particular, he again demand'd of Rumsey, whether he could swear positively, That he heard the Message, or gave any Answer? And Rumsey could only reply by Circumstance, viz. "That when he came in, they were standing by the Fire-side; but they all came from the Fire-side to hear what he said." On the other Side Lord Ruffel averr'd, That he came in with the Duke of Monmouth, and found Rumsey there before him; which Rumsey again deny'd, with this additional Correction, That indeed the Duke and his Lordship went away together.

His Lordship's next Endeavour was to blast the Credit of Lord Howard, and establish his own; and in order thereto, he brought forward several Persons of the highest Rank, and the most unexceptionable Characters. The old Earl of Anglesey inform'd the Court, that, being on a Visit to the Earl of Belford (the Prisoner's Father) Lord Howard came in, and took Occasion to say, That it was impossible Lord Ruffel should be in such a Plot; that he ought not to be suspected of it; and that he knew nothing either against his Lordship or any body else relating to so barbarous a Design. The Earl would have proceeded also to recite what he had heard from one Lady Charworth; but was cut short by the King's Council, who insist'd, that the Prisoner should not have the Benefit of Hearsay-Evidence, after it had been over-ruled on the Behalf of his Majesty. And the Prisoner gave way to the Interruption, forgetting that, tho' the Chief Justice had appiz'd the Jury, that Howard was no Evidence, the Attorney-General had, nevertheless, directed his Witnesses to proceed as before; which Direction the said Witnesses punctually obey'd.

Mr. Howard then depos'd, that, in his Hearing, the Lord Howard, upon his Honour, his Faith, and with as much Solemnity as if had taken an Oath before a Magistrate, deny'd he knew of any Man concern'd in the Plot; and particularly of Lord Ruffel, whom he took pains to vindicate, saying, That he did not only suffer unjustly, but that he thought him the worthiest Person in the World.

Dr. Barnet the Historian declar'd, That Lord Howard had been with him the Night after the Plot broke out, and, with his Eyes and Hands lifted up to Heaven, said, That he knew nothing of any Plot, nor believ'd any, and treated it with great Contempt.

Lord Cowenish inform'd the Court, That he had heard Lord Ruffel express his ill an Opinion of Rumsey, that it was not likely he should trust him in such a Secret.

Dr. Tillotson spoke highly in the Prisoner's Praise. Dr. Barnet, again, and Dr. (J) Cox, said, that they had heard him declare against all Insurrections. And the Duke of Somerset, That in the Course of two Years Conversation, he had never heard any thing from him but what was just, honourable, and loyal.

Here, at the Instance of the Jury, the Court call'd upon Lord Howard to account for the Difference between his Discourse in the Presence of the Earl of Anglesey, and his Depositions now: Upon which his Lordship had recourse to such a Subterfuge, as shew'd Fortune had made a grievous Mistake in placing him among the Nobility, when Nature had design'd him to be the lowest Quibbler at the Bar; and as also laid him under a strong Suspicion that he did not become a Witness by chance: For, in the first place, he confess'd he had us'd such Expressions as the Court had heard; but then it was at a Time when he was to out-face the Thing, both for himself and his Party; and when he did not intend to appear in that Place, or act such a Part. He further said, That he did not think the Religion of an Oath was derived from the Form, but from the Appeal to God; and that if he call'd God and his Angels to witness to a Falshood, he ought not to find Belief: And then proceed'd in these Words: "Your Lordship knows, that every Man that was committed, was committed for a Design of murdering the King. Now I laid hold on that Part; for I was to carry my Knife close between the Parting and the Apple: And I did say, that if I were an Enemy

A. D. 1683.

(J) This Gentleman also depos'd, that he had heard his Lordship speak of Lord Howard as a Man of eminent Parts, but not trusted by any Party; and of Rumsey, as one he knew but little of, and with whom he had nothing to do unless in Lord Howard's Business.

to my Lord Ruffel, and to the Duke of Monmouth, and were call'd to be a Witness, I must have declar'd, in the Presence of God and Man, that I did not believe either of them had any Design to murder the King?

But as Lord Delamere judiciously observes, what he said to the Earl of Bedford related to the Plot in general; or, if to any particular Part of it, it must have related to the Infurrection only; which, according to his own Evidence, was to be Lord Ruffel's Province. He moreover knew, that all the several Warrants of Commitment ran as well for levying War, as for conspiring the King's Death: Whence it follow'd, notwithstanding all his Subtlety, that he solemnly said one thing, and swore another.

Having however thus patch'd up his Credit with the Jury, which was all his Lordship aim'd at, the noble Prisoner proceeded to call yet other Persons of Distinction to bear witness to the Uprightness of his Life and Conversation; as the Lord Clifford, Mr. Levesin Gower, Mr. Spanner, and Dr. Fitzwilliams; who all spoke of him as one of the most amiable and inoffensive of Men.

His Lordship then undertook to say something for himself; but not to sum up the Evidence against him, or what had been urg'd to confute it: On the contrary, he contented himself with speaking to this Effect: "That his Heart had been ever sincerely loyal and affectionate to the King and Government, which he thought the best Government in the World: That he pray'd as sincerely for his Majesty's long and happy Life, as any Man alive: That therefore there was no Likelihood that he should go about to raise a Rebellion, which he look'd upon as both wicked and impracticable: That he had never desir'd any thing to be redress'd, but in a parliamentary and legal Way: That he had always been against Innovations, and all Irregularities whatsoever; and should be, as long as he liv'd, whether his Life was to be long or short." Then addressing himself to the Jury, he made use of these warm and affecting Expressions: "Gentlemen, I am now in your Hands; eternally; my Honour, my Life, and all, and I hope the Heats and Animodities that are among you will not so bias you, as to make you in the least incline to find an innocent Man guilty. I call Heaven and Earth to witness, that I never had a Design against the King's Life. I am in your Hands; so God direct you."

It is, it seems, the Privilege of the King's Council to have the last Word against the Prisoner, that the Impressions they are to make on the Jury may remain in their full Force: Thus the Solicitor-General Binch, and Serjeant Jessrey, made each their Harangue; and the Solicitor, in particular, took care to urge, "That nothing was more common than to indict a Man for conspiring the Death of the King, and to assign a Consultation for levying War against him, as an Overt-Act or Evidence of such a Design; and also, that a Design to bring the King into their Power, till he had consented to such things as should be mov'd for in Parliament, was equally Treason, as if they had agreed to assassinate him."

It must be presum'd, that the Last of these Propositions was thrown into the Jury's Way, for fear they should not concede to the First; which is too much, and too violently, strain'd, to square with any Man's Understanding, which has not been distorted by the Study and Practice of the Law; and to bar up every Passage by which the Prisoner might escape: But the Propositions are diffus'd; and surely the Prisoner was not liable to the Edge of Both: If he had entertain'd Designs on the King's Life, he had no Intentions to confine his Person, in order to make use of his Name and Authority: And if his Purpose was to make such use of his Name and Authority, it was plain he had no Designs on his Life. Reason delights in Certainty: The Facts assign'd in Evidence, if clearly stated, never fail to lead to that Certainty: And if it was equally treasonable to practise on the Life or Liberty of the Sovereign, and Equity was consulted in this Case as well as Law, why was not the Colour of it precisely specify'd? And why was the Object plac'd between two opposite Lights, that serv'd rather to dazzle, than to convince those who were upon their Oaths to represent it as it appear'd?

The Chief-Justice, indeed (tho' somewhat awkwardly and uncouthly) recurs to the Basis of the Indictment, viz. a Conspiracy to kill the King, and makes it the Basis of his Charge to the Jury, by saying, "The Question before you will be, Whether, upon the whole Matter, the Lord Ruffel had any Design on the King's Life; to destroy the King, or take away his Life?— For that is the material Part here. Thus'd, and given you, (proceeds his Lordship) by the King's Council, as an Evidence of this, that he did conspire to raise an Infurrection, and to cause a Rising of the People, to make, as it were, a Rebellion within the Nation, and to surprize the King's Guards; which, say they, can have no other End than to seize and destroy the King. And it is a great Evidence (if my Lord Ruffel did design to seize the King's Guards, and make an Infurrection in the Kingdom) of a Design to surprize the King's Person. It must be left to you upon the whole Matter: You have no Evidence in this Case, as there was Yesterday against the Conspirators to kill the King at the Rye. There was direct Evidence of a Consult to kill the King; that is not given you in this Case. This is an Act of contriving Rebellion, and an Infurrection within the Kingdom, and to seize his Guards; which is urg'd as an Evidence; and surely it is in itself an Evidence, to seize and destroy the King. Upon the whole Matter, if you believe the Prisoner at the Bar to have conspir'd the DEATH OF THE KING; and, in order to THAT, to have held these Consults that the Witness speaks of; you must find him guilty of this Treason that is laid to his Charge."

There is manifestly a wide Difference in the Tendency of this State of the Case, imperfect as it is, and that of the two Propositions laid down by the Solicitor-General. All is here fairly and candidly left to the Jury; who are requir'd to compare the Evidence with the Charge; and to pronounce, as it appear'd to them that the one tally'd with the other. Whether they as fairly and candidly follow'd his Direction, we shall forbear to decide: Party-men see with the Eyes of their Party, not their own; and are too much prepossess'd to make the Discriminations necessary in so nice a Case as this: When, therefore, they do wrong, they often mean right; and all Men are within the Reach of Charity, who act according to the best of their Judgment. The Court adjourn'd till Four o'Clock in the Afternoon; and then they brought in their Verdict, Guiltily.

A few Remarks, partly by way of Recapitulation, perhaps may still be of use, for the thorough understanding of this important Case: And first, of the Indictment. To kill the King, and subvert the Government, were, in two Words, the Charge: And for Proof, it was alleg'd, That the Prisoner had, with divers other Persons, conspired to raise a Rebellion, and to seize and destroy the Guards. Three Witnesses presented themselves to make this apparent; who were held the better qualify'd to testify, because they had been deeply concern'd in the same Treason: And against whom no Objections were permitted to lye, tho' they were still unparдон'd; and it might be presum'd they would shew more Respect to their Lives than their Oaths. As to the Matter testify'd, it was part clear and positive; part dark, perplex'd, and inconclusive, at least in Behalf of the Indictment: Part was admitted by the Prisoner; and part was to his last Breath deny'd. According to the Letter of this Testimony, it was the Juryman's Duty to decide; nor was he to infer one Tittle more than the fair Construction of that Letter would warrant. The positive Part of the Evidence was this: Ramsley swore, that he brought a Message from Lord Staffbury to Lord Russel and others, assembled at Shepherd's, relative to a Rising; and received thereto an Answer, importing, That for certain Reasons the said Rising was put off. Shepherd swore, that, at the same Meeting, he heard the said Person discourse on teizing the Guards. Lord Howard swore, That the Prisoner and himself were Two of a Cabal of Six who undertook to manage Matters after Lord Staffbury's Departure: That they met twice; That they discuss'd of many Particulars relative to a Rising; but came only to one Conclusion, which was, to send a Person into Scotland, to invite certain of the Scottish Malcontents (by him specify'd) hither, in order to know the exact Circumstances of that Kingdom, &c. Of all these, the Particulars admitted by the Prisoner were, the Meeting at Shepherd's, and those of the Council of the Six. The dark, perplex'd, and inconclusive Part was that which was of most Consequence to bring the whole Charge home to the Prisoner. Ramsley did not know whether he had been once or twice at Shepherd's; whether he had heard with his own Ears the Heads of a Declaration, or whether Ferguson had repeated them; yet afterwards became positive, that the said Declaration was read before he came in. Before he could recollect the Discourse concerning the Guards, he declar'd that the Message and the Answer was all that pass'd at the Meeting; as he remember'd; nor did he speak to the Matter of the Guards at all, till question'd as to the Drift and Purport of the said Declaration; and then evasively pass'd on to this fresh Piece of Evidence, when it was his immediate Business to clear up the former. When first ask'd, Whether Lord Russel had spoken in answer to the Message, and what? he answer'd, still fallaciouly, that his Lordship spoke concerning the Rising at Yaunton, without specifying wherefore, or to what End; and yet, when he gave the Denial of the Message and Answer, he said most explicitly, that the Letter was given by Ferguson, assist'd, as he thought or remember'd, by Lord Grey: Nor when push'd by Lord Russel with Interrogatories to this Effect, Whether he could positively swear, that he gave any Answer to, or even heard, the Message? he could only recollect then, by Circumstance, as before observ'd, that the whole Company came from the Fire-side to hear it. Shepherd said, he remember'd two Meetings at his House: But when press'd by the Prisoner, could be positive but to one: And as to the Discourse concerning the Guards; he does not to much as hint, that the Company came to any Resolution upon it: And whereas he says, that Armstrong, at their next Meeting, made a Report of his having taken a View of them, &c. if he was not certain that there was a next Meeting, he could not be certain of any thing transacted at it: And if this Report was made at the same time that the Discourse was held, then Ramsley's Memory also fail'd him, when he swore, that, as he thought, the Duke of Albany, Lord Grey, and Armstrong, undertook to take this View: Besides this, Shepherd could not fix the Time, even when this one Meeting was held; and acknowledg'd besides, that, while the Company staid, he left them several times, to fetch Wine, Sugar, and Nutmeg; which render'd it impossible for him to give a consistent Account of the Business which occasion'd it; as is further demonstrable from his not saying one Word concerning Lord Staffbury's Message, or the Answer to it. The like Inconclusiveness is to be trac'd onwards into Lord Howard's Evidence; for, however particular he is in enumerating the several Topics which were discuss'd of in the two Meetings of the Council of Six, he speaks but of one Resolution, viz. The sending a Messenger to Scotland: And could no otherwise make out, that even That was executed, than by a Supplement of what he had been told by Colonel Spikey.

There is, moreover, something incongruous in the Story, whether we consider it in Parts or in the whole. The Answer to Lord Staffbury's Message, as recited by Ramsley, himself, argues, That all Thoughts of a Rising were for the present given over: And it is ment and Conclusion actually: to seize the King's Guards, and to raise a Rebellion, are a natural and genuine Declaration, that the Person who did so confess, agree and conclude, did compass and imagine the Death of the King, either in his natural or civil Capacity (and Both, the Lawyer's Glossary pronounces, are equally comprehended in the great Law of Treasons of Edward III.) and, fully constitute the Overt-Act, requir'd by the said famous Law. And that all those who are Advocates for the Prisoner, on the contrary say, "That a Conspiracy to levy War is not an Overt-Act of imagining the Death of the King: That there is no Statute, which, in express Terms, declares any such thing: That Treason by Construction or Implication is what the Law abhors: That Treasons not reducible to the very Letter of any Statute or Statutes are refer'd to the Judgment of Parliament, and can be try'd in no other Court: That compassing the Death of the King, and levying of War, are two distinct Species of Treason, requiring different Modes of Proof: That the King may be murder'd, and no War levy'd nor design'd: That War may be levy'd without any Intention to destroy or injure the King: And lastly, that if the Overt-Act assign'd in the Indictment against Lord Russell, viz. That he confess'd, agreed, and concluded to seize and destroy the Guards, had been ever so demonstrably prov'd, he could not have been legally prov'd guilty of Treason within the Statute he was prosecuted upon; because in those times the Kings of England had no (f) Guards: Because the Law could no more presume, that an arm'd Force was necessary for the King's Prelevation, than for the Redress of the Subject's Grievances; and because that down to that very Hour they had never been consider'd but as useless, burdensome, and grievous."

Thus especially was the Matter handled on both Sides: But sometimes good Archers shoot beyond the Mark. If it appear'd there was no such Confession, or Agreement, or Conclusion, as is express'd in the said Indictment, there was no Occasion for all these Subtilties and Refinements. And it has been already prov'd, that the Meeting at Stow-berd's parlour, in no one Circumstance, of the raising a Rebellion within the Kingdom, and no other Overt-act in the Indictment, but several Meetings, Consultations, and Agreements between the Conspirators, to raise a Rebellion for the Purposes aforesaid.

The Lord Grey was try'd by his Peers, and had Judgment to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd.

In Sir Henry Vane's Case, Meeting and Consulting about Treason were held full Overt-acts.

In Florent's Case, lately in the King's Bench, the Indictment was for High-Treason, in compassing the Death of the King; the Overt-acts alledged against him were compassing to raise an Insurrection in Ireland, and bringing of the French into Ireland, and collecting Money in Ireland, and holding Correspondence in France for that Purpose. There was no Proof of any Design upon the King's natural Person, which was in England; yet he was attainted, and executed for High-Treason, tho' no Insurrection or Invasion followed: So that there can be no Question at this time of day, but that Meeting and Consulting to raise a Rebellion, tho' it be not an actual Levying of War within another Branch of the Statute of 25 Edw. III. yet they are Overt-acts of Compassing the King's Death, under the 5th Branch of that Statute (Antiquary's History, p. 6. c. 2.)

On the other hand, says the Lord Deane, in his Case of the Lord Rush, p. 17. Mr. Solicitor Finch testified on two of three important Precedents, viz. that of my Lord Colton, Dr. Stow, and Phalet. These, as they are not altogether to the Purpose, in they are very modern, that no such Record is to be had to them: And they either prove the Ignorance or Boldness of those Judges, that that a Conspiracy to levy War is an Overt-act of compassing the King's Death. Beside the Statute of 25 Edw. III. he provided, that any such like Treasons were to be proved, by the King, and any witness going in Judgment, till the Case be shewn before the King and his Parliament. And therefore, for some Judges to take upon them to judge upon that which was doubtful, and not literally say, expressly a Treason, was to violate the Part which the King and Parliament had reserved to themselves. And therefore, upon what has been said, this Conclusion will follow, that no Man can (before the Judge) be convicted of Treason, unless the Fact be expressly and literally Treason within some Statute; and he be thereto expressly attainted by some Overt-act and Overt-act, a Conspiracy to levy War is, not an Overt-Act of compassing the King's Death, but a Treason, or high-Misdemeanour: And therefore the Judgment against my Lord Rush was manifestly unjust, and in of course it ought to be reversed.

(f) On this Subject Lord Deane enlarges as follows: "If a Conspiracy to levy War were Treason of itself, or an Overt-act of imagining the King's Death, yet my Lord Rush was not guilty of High-Treason within the Statute of 25 Edw. III. because the Overt-act assign'd against him was, his being of a Council of War, to manage an Insurrection; and, in order to it, to seize the Guards: For had he actually seiz'd the Guards, yet it could not be Treason within the Statute of 25 Edw. III.

(g) For, because the Guards are not settled by Act of Parliament; and, consequently, they are no legal Force: For the Law has pronounced, that all standing Hosts, more than the Militia, is contra jus, illegal, and a Grievance. And the Reason of it is clear, because the Law does never protect or countenance any thing that is, or may be, burdensome, or that is useless. And it is so evident, that in the Parliamentary Proceedings, this Vote was'd in the House of Commons, namis, vestratibus, That all standing Hosts, other than the Militia, is illegal, and a Grievance. And tho' they have the King's Commission, as may be objected, yet his Commission cannot make that lawful that is illegal, no more than he can tolerate a Riot, or pardon a common Nuisance. For if several Persons were try'd for a Riot, and it manifestly appear upon the Evidence to be such, would their producing the King's Commission keep them out of the Compass of the Law? or should those that did assemble together to suppress them be guilty of Treason, because those other Persons had the King's Commission? Therefore if my Lord Rush had attended a Private Meeting to raise the Guards, and that could have been made out if it was, to be done within the Statute of 25 Edw. III. which makes it a Treason. And this being duly compar'd with the Precedents say'd by Mr. Annesley, and Mr. Solicitor, will restore them to my satisfaction.

(h) It could not be Treason within the Statute of 25 Edw. III. because, at the Time of making that Statute, there was no such thing as the Guards: For the first thing of that kind was the Band of Penitents, which Henry VII. upon institution of what he had first seen and learnt of France. For in Edward III's Time, tho' he was the Third that without Interruption had succeeded to the Crown, yet Succession had not then obtain'd by Inheritance, as hath since been the custom of the People to appoint him to the Throne. And therefore the King were then too wise to do any thing that would be so apparent a dishonouring of the People, as to call in Guards to their Aid. And besides, the custom was, either with Force or Sustenance made them stand continually in need of the People's Supplies; and therefore they could be sure cautiously to avoid all things that might give any Nuisance occasion of Offence: And nothing could be more dishonouring to the People, than to be assist'd by a standing Force, which the Law had designed to be illegal, and a Grievance. And therefore, as there was no such thing as Guards, at the making of that Statute of 25 Edw. III. so that Statute cannot be supposed to take notice of them.

(i) Surely, if the Guards were established by Act of Parliament, yet if they were so established since the year of 25 Edw. III. the said Statute was not within that Statute, because it presuppos'd the standing host, which was not only in being at the Time when it was made: So that, if it were an Objection, to hold the Guards by Lord Rush guilty to have been indicted upon that Statute which did not make it an Overt-act of Treason if a Prisoner is indicted upon a wrong Statute, and the Evidence proves nothing of that Statute on which he is indicted, but some very near, and near to him, so as Statute on which he might be tried and just, he may plead specially to it, and the Court must discharge the Jury in being him in Not Guilty.

the nature of a Consultation; and that one Part of the Evidence, to all Intents and Purposes, destroy'd the other. In strictness therefore, the Question did not occur, whether a Consultation, Agreement, and Conclusion, to seize the Guards, was such an Overt-Act as the Statute requir'd: For as to the other Consultations given in deuil by Lord Howard, and wherein, according to Leffrange, the Pinch of the Charge lay, neither Ramsey nor Shepherd pretended to know any thing of them; and of a single Testimony, the Law takes no Cognizance.

It may be objected that the Interpreters of the Law have had the Ingenuity to find out that if the same Treason is prov'd in two Branches by two Witnesses to each, the Law is satisfy'd; and that we have already seen it urg'd in this very Trial: But if as above hinted it be true, that the Meaning of Shepherd's was the last Scene of one Conspiracy; and the Consultations, at Hampton and Ruffel's, were the first Scenes of another, then that Rule, artificial as it is, loses its Force in this Instance; and the Proof of one, if one was prov'd, could lend no Credit nor Support to the other.

Upon the whole, the great Question before the Jury was, whether the Prisoner being present at and within the Hearing of Ramsey's Message, and Ferguson's and Leed Grey's Answer, as Ramsey, alone, swore; and when such a Discharge was held concerning the Guards, as Ramsey thought he heard, and Shepherd actually swore he did hear, tho' unaccompany'd with any Agreement or Resolution therein; and his assisting at such Consultations as Lord Howard bore witness to, amounted to legal, positive Proof (all the Variety of Circumstances which weaken'd, disjointed, and discredited the Evidence consider'd) that the said Prisoner was guilty of the Matters alleg'd in the Indictment, namely, that he had conspired, agreed, and concluded to seize and destroy the Guards in order to kill the King and subvert the Government, within the Statute, upon which the said Indictment was laid to be founded.

The Lawyers are to be sensible of the many apparent Flaws in this Proceeding, notwithstanding all the Art us'd to hide them, (more especially in the Violence put upon the said Statute, by making it an Instrument to involve a Man in the Guilt of Capital Treason, for a Design upon the Guards, when for so long a time after, there was no such Establishment in the Kingdom, and at the very time of Trial, it was altogether unknown to our Laws) that they are confin'd to appeal to (g) Common Sense, which is ever the last thing they do, whether the Death of the King was not imply'd in such an Attempt; whereas the Jury have nothing to do with Implication; and nothing can be more irreconcilable to common Sense, than to suppose, that a Law enacted purposely to restrain and limit the Interpretation of Treasons, as that notoriouly was, should authorise any Attempt of any kind, out of Parliament, to enlarge and multiply them.

And now, tho' (h) it might be the Obvious Interest of venal Councils, bona-fide Judges,

(g) This is a Paraphrase call'd, The Majesty and Government of England unviolated, we find the following Particulars:

"The great Objection he seems to rely on, is, That the Law takes no notice of them (the Guards); for once I will suppose that it doth not, and then let us observe if any Arguments can be drawn from thence? Perhaps the thing was not said or known when the 25th Edward III. was made. Can nothing be said? If the Proc laid, so accomplish'd it by conveying a design not in act, at the time of the Statute? Certainly it may. If several Malcontents should conspire, and agree, and purpose in order to an Intention to seize the Tower, Parliament Hall, and Whitehall, would not this be an Overt-Act of Treason? and yet our Law takes no Notice of any Garrison there or any where else; they have no Relation to the Militia, nor were there any Arms in their Power at Edward III. his time, then we read of in our Law Books. If this be otherwise, why did not the Author find Fault with Rowe's Indictment, which was tried much at the same time with this in question. Suppose all the Gentlemen, Pages, Grooms of the Stole, Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber, and the like, kill'd in the Night, and the Doors of Whitehall broken up, and all the Swords, Muskets and Pistols there taken away; and yet it happened that the King's Person was left untouched, would this be a kind of Rape, and Murder only? We have no Law Books that take notice of Arms at Whitehall, or such Names as those Services go by. And suppose, at the same time, upon the Conflict, that the Confederates did move, dislocate, detain, and conclude of an Intention, would it not then be Treason? If not, nothing can be to save the King's Person by murder or his'd; and the Subjects should not have said, conspire or conspire, but seize and kill, &c. It is said also, that the Guards are, in stricto Verborum, known to be wind and employ'd for the Attendance upon, and Preservation of, his Person. If consensu Regis et Regiarum Judges, no Man can think but that he was intended to move an Intention and seize the Guards, had a further Design upon the King's Person; and then to Treason: If otherwise, what of England is it a worse Condition than the worst and manner of his Subjects for a King shall not, cannot, nor by our Law, shall, seize, strike, or imprison in Prison, and consequently cannot defend himself; and shall see in Servants, Guards, and Attendance, which are all of the same Nature, was a Swind or vary Mal-quot before him? If they do so, it is not then enough that they do not; it is commonly known to us, that not but that there will destroy those Attendants, and so, that the King's Person? And if that be so, the Intention is only: It can never be, it will never be allow'd for Law, that a taking all the King's Guards is only a Breach of the Peace, unless we renounce the Law, and will judge more by Inclination and Bias, than by Reason and Equity. And as to the Distinction between a design taking them, and a Confess and Agreement to seize them, when I have urg'd before notwithstanding it's said what the Author says, but maintain it, for both have a Tendency to the Execution of the Treason intended.

(h) Lord Deane further observ'd upon this Indictment, that it concluded more fully than it had ever been heard of; First, containing the Loading, it says, for the Guards for the Preservation of the Person of our said Lord the King, at that and before against the Duty of his Allegiance, against the Peace, and also against the Peace of the Kingdom. This Conclusion contains in it four Parts, and none of them is true. First, that the Guards are for Preservation of the King's Person. It will be an easier Matter to send a Word in the Moon, than that the Law has made the Guards a Mortal Force, or any Feature that has established any Force, particularly for the Guard of the King's Person. And tho' the Law had establish'd any such Force, yet it was not done by the 25th Edward III. and therefore in this the Indictment concluded fully.

The Second is this, That to seize and detain the Guards was against the Duty of his Allegiance. To plead fully to the Nature of allegiance, would require a long Discourse. But if we will try this upon its Face. It cannot be deny'd, that allegiance of the Law did nothing in this. And if so, can it be imagin'd that the Law would establish such a Thing as the Guards, which had made it much a better Protection for the Preservation of the King's Person, even the Duty and Interest of every one of his Subjects? In the next Place, Subjective and Possessive are convertible Terms, and therefore if the Subjects do not receive Protection by the Guards, it is not against their allegiance to force and destroy them; whereas to force allegiance is against their allegiance. Therefore they have Prescriptive by them. Hence, no Man but a venal Council, all the Law has been pass'd by, &c.

sure, yet he forgave all concern'd in it from the highest to the lowest, and concluding with a Hope, That his Majesty's Displeasure would cease, when he himself ceased to live, and that no Part of it would fall on his Wife and Children.

His Lordship was also in this melancholy Interval attended by Dr. Tillotson, then Dean of Canterbury; which is intimated in several Places by the Historian just quoted, but most particularly in that which follows: "Tillotson was sit with him that last Week: We thought the Party had gone too quick in their Consultations, and too far: And that Resistance, in the Condition we were then in, was not lawful. He (Lord Russell) said he had not Leisure to enter into Discourses of Politics, but he thought a Government, limited by Law, was only a Name, if the Subjects might not maintain those Limitations by Force; otherwise all was at the Discretion of the Prince: That was contrary to all the Notions he had liv'd in of our Government:

But he said there was nothing among them but the Embrion of things, that were never like to have any Effect, and that were now quite dissolv'd."

Thus we are to conclude, that the two Divines drew together; and that the Scope of their joint Endeavours was only to convince Lord Russell, that he and his Party had only been too haughty and violent in their Resolutions: But Locke, in his Answer to the Paper deliver'd by his Lordship on the Scaffold, has taken some Pains to (k) shew, that the Doctor declar'd himself against the Doctrine of Resistance, without any Reserve at all (whereas those Words, In the Condition we were then in, imply the Contrary) and has subjoin'd a Letter of the said Dean to his Lordship, which our Right Reverend Historian never once mentions, and which is express'd to that Purpose.

Mr. Bechard, also, gives his Readers to understand, That he had obtain'd a (k) Narrative from some great Man, which had been taken

(l) As follows, viz. "Upon the Monday after my Lord's Commendation, the Reverend Dean of Canterbury, Dr. Tillotson, gave his Lordship a pious and friendly Visit: expressing the extreme Affliction, as well as Compassion, that he had for his present Condition; and not without great Admiration at my Lord's being engag'd in a Meditation of that Quality. But after a little Discourse upon that Subject, the Doctor was much more troubled to find, that my Lord was not only engag'd in that pernicious and wicked Design, but possid'd with the Principle of his Chaplain, (S. Julian, Author of Tulien the Apostle, which was published that very Year) and, that Resistance was lawful, (i.e. reasonable or allowable) in the case of Religion, Liberty and Property being invaded. Whomupon the Doctor apply'd himself, by Argument and Counsel, in the setting of his Lordship right in that Particular, with all the Freedom, Tenderness, and Respect imaginable; and not without flattering himself at last, that he had gain'd his Point upon my Lord's Judgment; who promis'd the Doctor at parting, to shew himself freely of what he had said.

The next Day Dr. Barrow tells the Dean, that his Discourse had wrought a very good Effect upon my Lord; and that he was resolv'd to do all that might become a Man under his Circumstances, and to discharge his Conscience, both towards God and Man. Hereupon the Dean apply'd himself forthwith to a Person of great Honour with the Account of his success, desiring that the Matter might be represented to his Majesty, which was done accordingly; (and the Dean writes, in such a Case, the Doctor could stand to his Lordship.)

Upon Wednesday, the Dean gave my Lord another Visit, when, being for granted, that his Lordship continued in his late Resolution, he entertain'd him only with Presumptory Discourses toward the setting of him for a better Life.

Upon Friday Morning, the Dean advis'd to my Lord the Holy Sacrament, having previously received such Satisfaction from him, as the Occasion and the Duty required. But afterwards, Mr. Dean finding him unwilling, went his way. About about five or six in the Evening brought him a Letter which was expressly well accommodated, and very pertinently apply'd to the point in question. The Dean deliver'd the Letter to my Lord, and discours'd at large upon it, earnestly beseeching him to rethink himself, how much it concern'd him not to leave the World under so dangerous a Mistake; but my Lord seem'd much otherwise, than before, the Dean however pressing him to enter into a full and free Examination of himself, and so he deserv'd, leaving the Letter in his Lordship's Hand.

The next Morning (being the Day of his Execution) the Dean waited upon my Lord again, when he found him very cooler, and earnestly desiring any Occasion of farther Discourse upon the said Matter. Upon this, the Dean desisted, and attended him afterwards, and pray'd with him on the Scaffold: Discharging himself, from first to last, in all the Parts of a Churchman, and of a Friend. A true Copy of the Letter here follows:

My Lord, July 20, 1683.
I was heartily glad to see your Lordship this Morning, in that calm and devout Temper at receiving the Sacrament; but Peace of Mind, which it is well-grounded, will avoid fits, and because transient Discourses, many times, both little Effect, for want of Time to weigh and consider it, therefore, in tender Compassion of your Lordship's Case, and from all the good Will that one Man can bear to another, I do humbly offer to your Lordship's deliberate Thoughts, these following Considerations, concerning the Point of Resistance, if our Religion and Rights should be invaded, as your Lordship puts the Case concerning which I understand, by Dr. Power, that your Lordship had once received Satisfaction, and can yet to find a Change.

First, That the Christian Religion doth plainly forbid the Resistance of Authority.

Secondly, That though our Religion be established by Law, (which your Lordship argues, in Difference between our Case, and that of the Yankees Colonies) you in this sense Law which establishes our Religion, it is declared, That it is not lawful, upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take up Arms, &c. Besides, That there is a particular Law declaring the Power of the Militia to be solely in the King. And this is the Hand of Subjects, though the Law of Nature, and the general Rules of Scripture, had left us at liberty, which, I believe, they do not, because the Government and Peace of human Society could not well subsist upon these Terms.

Thirdly, Your Lordship's Opinion is contrary to the declared Doctrine of all Protestant Churches; and though some particular Persons have taught otherwise, yet they have been contradicted, rebell'd, and condemn'd for it, by the generality of Protestants; and I beg of your Lordship to consider how it will agree with an avowed asserting of the Protestant Religion, to go contrary to the general Doctrine of the Protestants. My field is this, to convince your Lordship that you are in a very great and dangerous Mistake; and being so convinced, that, which before was a Sin of Ignorance, will appear of a much more heinous Nature, as in Truth it is, and call for a very particular and deep Repentance; which if your Lordship sincerely exercise upon the Night of your Sleep, by a penitent Acknowledgment of it to God and Man, you will not only obtain Forgiveness of it, but prevent a mighty Scandal to the Reformed Religion. I am very loth to give your Lordship any Disquiet in the Dispute you are in, which I communicate from my Heart; but am much more concern'd, that you do not leave the World in a Delusion and false Peace, to the Hindrance of your eternal Happiness. I heartily pray for you, and beseech your Lordship to believe, that I am, with the greatest Sincerity and Compassion in the World,

Your Lordship's
well wish'd and affeeted Servant,
JOHN TILLOTSON.

[4] Which, as far as relates to this Controversy, was as follows:

viz. "That about two Days before Ed. Ruffe's Death, Dr. Tillotson, upon an arrival upon that unfortunate Lord, was suddenly stopp'd by Dr. Barrow in the Street, who told him that he had not some good Hope of saving his Lordship's Life. The quite Impulse of which being his avowed Principle, That Resistance was, in your Case, lawful, he had convinc'd that Lord of his Mistake, and that he was ready to own he Erro'd in it. Therefore he desired Dr. Tillotson to go immediately to the Lord Russell, and separate

A. D. 1685. taken from the Dean's own Mouth, importing among other Particulars, that the said Dean having been persuaded by Dr. Burnet into a Belief, that Lord Russell was now become an Object of the King's Mercy, by departing from his hitherto avow'd Principle, That Resistance in some Cases was lawful, and finding himself deceiv'd, thought it of some Importance to himself to undertake his Conversion: That this gave rise to the Letter above mention'd; but that instead of making a Profelyte of his Lordship, his Lordship made a Profelyte of him; at least the Story infimates as much; for when the Dean was question'd concerning the Controversy before the Cabinet-Council, and the King himself discours'd of his Letter as unanswerable, it farther specifies, That he, the Dean, could not forbear intimating, That he, himself, was now of Lord Russell's Opinion, tho' he had before written so warmly against it.

He prepares for Death.

To draw toward the Catastrophe of this real Tragedy, no sooner was it understood that Money would not purchase Mercy, than it was also understood, that none was to be expected, nor would be (*) found; and the Prisoner seriously endeavour'd to reconcile himself to his Destiny. From the Historian of his own Times we learn, that he gave himself up to Devotion, and the composing his last Speech: That in taking leave of his Children, who were very young, he maintain'd his Constancy of Temper, tho' he was a very fond Father: And that tho' he lov'd and esteem'd his Lady beyond Expression, he parted from her with a compos'd Silence: What he felt during this dreadful Moment, may, however, be gather'd from what he said immediately after, viz. The Bitterness of Death is pass'd. And as to her, she bore the Shock with the same Magnanimity which she had shewn at his Trial, when in open Court, attending at her Lord's Side, she took Notes, and made Observations on all that pass'd in his Behalf: When prostrate at the King's Feet, and pleading with his Majesty in Remembrance of her dead (†) Father's Services, to save her Husband, she was an Object of the most lively Compassion; but now, when without a Sigh and Tear she took her last Farewell of him, of the highest Admiration.

The same Historian tells us, that Lord Russell, with whom Lord Russell had liv'd in a close Friendship, made him a gallant Offer to manage his Escape, by changing Clothes with him, and staying in Prison in his stead; but he nobly refus'd it: And, as he had submitted his Case to the Decision of the Laws, resolv'd to abide the Penalty: And when the Duke of Monmouth, by Messengers, offer'd also to surrender himself, if he thought it would any way contribute to his Service, he answer'd, It would be no Advantage to him to have his Friends dye with him.

Russell to make his Escape.

These Instances serve to shew, how many happy Ingredients made up the Composition of this unblest Man, and how natural it was for his Party to make use of his idoliz'd Name, to give a Sanction to their Cause: But then it ought also to be remember'd, tho' with Regret and Concern, that the Rage of that Party had once so far got the better of his own excellent Nature, that he appear'd against the unhappy Lord Stafford with as much Eagerness as his own Persecutors had shewn against him; having even countenanc'd that savage Paper of the then Sheriffs of London, which made it a Question, whether the King, by his Prerogative, could alter the Sentence of the Law, as to the Manner of Execution. This was recollect'd in Council, * acceptor him with it, who would themselves go again to the King, and use his usual Endeavours to obtain his Pardon. This being perfus'd with some Warmth and Vehemence, Dr. Tillotson went accordingly, and deliver'd his Message to the Lord Halifax. But calling upon the Lord Russell in Negate upon his Return, he was very much surpris'd and troubled to find that his Lordship was under no such Conviction, as Dr. Burnet had hastily believed, and reported him to be.

Dr. Tillotson, vexed and uneasy at what he had done, and willing to clear himself of it after the best manner, refused the next Day to try what he could do to bring his Lordship to some Change in his Opinion. But it being the last Day before his appointed Execution, and not knowing whether he should be able to see him alone, he wrote the Letter, which was sent after prison, and took it in his Pocket; resolving if he could not discourse with him, to desire him to read, and consider the Letter he should give to him.

He found his Lordship alone, told him when he had done, and gave the Letter to him, who read it with great Deliberation, and acknowledged to him, That he had therein offer'd more to convince him, than he had ever met with before. That he was now fully resolv'd, and a Copy of a very extraordinary Nature, could justify subjects in taking up Arms against their Prince: That he was full of Opinions on such Cases, had been given by the King, to justify any such Attempts against him. But still he thought such Circumstances that might be, in which it would be lawful for them to resist. Being asked by the Doctor if he thought more, he answer'd, He had not consider'd the Matter so far and fully, and he had after Things more proper to be thought on at that Time.

On that same Evening Dean Tillotson waited again upon the Lord Halifax, to account to him what Mistake he had been led into, and what he had done upon it: And the latter to justify himself, shew'd him the very Letter he had written to the Lord Russell. While that Lord was reading it, Sir Thomas Clarges came in; and after a little Time the Dean took leave, my Lord Halifax putting the Letter in to his Pocket, and promising to be answerable for it. But in the mean Time Sir Thomas not only found Opportunity to read it, but to take a Copy of it, and from that Copy, and I think by his Means, it was very soon after printed.

On the Evening of the next Day, when the Lord Russell was executed, Dean Tillotson was sent for to the Cabinet Council, and carefully examined touching that Lord's Behaviour before and at his Death. The King particularly commended the Dean's Letter, and wonder'd What could he have said to it. He told his Majesty the Lord's Opinion, That such Circumstances there might be, in which it would be lawful to resist; and further intimated as tho' it was his own, That it was not impossible to find out a Case of Exception, tho' he would not profess himself to justify it. The Duke of York, who was sitting in his Chamber there, was sent, with some Warmth, urg'd him to name the Case. And not being fully satisfy'd, the King more mildly said, Whether, he did speak like an honest Man, or not, he was not to consider.

(*) According to Bishop Burnet, who quotes the Authority of the Earl of Rochester, the King would not bear the Disgrace of shewing any Favour to Lord Russell; and the Duke of York would bear the Disgrace, tho' he was resolv'd against the thing. But, according to Dr. Williams, his Majesty was not only inclin'd to pardon him, but offer'd some Words to excuse, on the very Day he was executed, as sufficiently shew'd his Intimation in that Matter. And the same Author has given us the following Passage, among several others, which he says were extract'd out of the Duke of Monmouth's Pocket book, found upon him when he was taken Prisoner in the Well: "29 (The Cypher which stood for the King) took me aside, and falling upon the Bows of L. R. (Lord Russell) said, He inclin'd to have sav'd him, but he was forc'd to it; otherwise he might have broken with you, the Duke of York."

Council, when his own Death-Warrant was to be sign'd: And his Majesty took Occasion to say, That Lord Ruffel should see he had Power to miske the Alteration he then dilput.

This was all the Favour that was shew'd him; and this was considerably abated by making Choice of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields to be the Place of Suffering; for which no better Reason could be assign'd, than a Purpose to expose him in all the principal Streets of London, and to mortify the Faction by this signal Triumph over one of their most popular Leaders.

It does not, however, appear, that he was at all affected by it: And when some of the Populace had the shocking Barbarity to insult him in his Passage, and others could not restrain their Tears, he seem'd touch'd with the Tenderness shewn by the Latter, without expressing any Indignation against the Former. The two Divines, before mention'd, accompany'd him in his Coach to the Scaffold, the one, it may be presum'd, to assist him in his Devotions, and the other to do Justice to his Memory; for so they divided their last Duties to their common Friend. Tillotson pray'd, and Burnet held the Pen. As to his Lordship, having several times walk'd round the Scaffold, he address'd himself in few Words to the Sheriff (Rich, who had once been an Anti-Courtier, and had voted with him for the Exclusion-Bill) importing, That because he had never lov'd much speaking, nor expected now to be well heard, he had, set down in the Paper he then deliver'd to him, what he had thought proper to leave behind him, adding, "God knows how far I was always from Designs against the King's Person, or of altering the Government; and I still pray for the Preservation of both, and of the Protestant Religion." And again: "In the Words of a dying Man, I profess I know of no Plot either against the King's Life, or the Government.—But I have now done with this World, and am going to a better. I forgive all the World. I thank God, I dye in Charity with all Men; and I wish all sincere Protestants may love one another, and not make way for Popery by their Animosities."

His Execution.

Having made this general Preface to his Paper, he spent some time in his Devotions; after which, having undress'd himself, and embrac'd the two Divines, without any Change of Countenance, he laid himself down, and fitted his Neck to the Block; and with two Strokes the Executioner perform'd his Office. And now it became again observable, as before in the Case of Lord Stafford, that tho' the People of England crowd to these horrid Spectacles, it is rather to gratify their Curiosity than their Cruelty: For now, as then, when the bleeding Head was expos'd with the usual Proclamation, no Shout of Applause ensu'd; on the contrary a general Groan went round the Scaffold; and in every Face was to be read the Anguish which had taken Possession of every Heart.

The Execution was scarce over, but every Corner of the Town rung with the dead Lord's last Paper, which he had deliver'd to the Sheriff, and which had a wonderful Effect on the Minds of the People, already soft'n'd with the Tragedy of the Day. It is too long to be given entire; but some Parts of it are so essential to our History, and open such a Sluice of Controversy, that they ought to be insert'd verbatim, viz.

"I have lived, and now die of the Reformed Religion, a true and sincere Protestant, and in the Communion of the Church of England, tho' I could never yet comply with, or rise up to all the Heights of many People.

For Popery, I look upon it as an idolatrous and bloody Religion; and therefore thought myself bound, in my Station, to do all I could against it. And by that I foresaw I should procure such great Enemies to myself, and so powerful ones, that I have been now for some time expecting the worst. And blessed be God, I fall by the Ax, and not by the fiery Trial. Yet, whatever Apprehensions I had of Popery, and of my own severe and heavy Share I was like to have under it, when it should prevail, I never had a Thought of doing any thing against it basely, or inhumanly, but what could well consist with the Christian Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom. And I thank God, I have examin'd all my Actions in that Matter, with so great Care, that I can appeal to God Almighty, who knows my Heart, that I went on patiently, without being mov'd, either by Passion, By-End, or ill Design. I have always lov'd my Country much more than my Life; and never had any Design of changing the Government, which I value, and look upon as one of the best Governments in the World, and would always have been ready to venture my Life for the Preserving of it; and would have suffer'd any Extremity, rather than have consented to any Design to take away the King's Life: Neither had ever any Man the Impudence to propose so base and barbarous a thing to me. And I look on it as a very unhappy and uneasy Part of my present Condition, That in my Indictment there should be so much as Mention of so vile a Fact; tho' nothing in the least was said to prove any such Matter; but the contrary, by the Lord Howard. Neither does any body, I am confident, believe the least of it: So that I need not, I think, say more.

For the King, I do sincerely pray for him and wish well to him and to the Nation, that they may be happy in one-another; that he may be indeed the Defender of the Faith.

As for the Share I had in the Prosecution of the Popish Plot, I take God to witness, that I proceed in it in the Sincerity of my Heart; being then really convinc'd (as I am still) that there was a Conspiracy against the King, the Nation, and the Protestant Religion: And I likewise profess, that I never knew any thing, either directly or indirectly, of any Practice with the Witnesses; which I look upon as so horrid a thing, that I could never have endur'd it. For, I thank God, Fal-

hood

hood and Cruelty were never in my Nature, but always the farthest from it imaginable. I did believe, and do still, that Popery is breaking in upon the Nation; and that those who advance it, will stop at nothing to carry on their Design. I am heartily sorry that so many Protestants give their helping Hand to it: But I hope God will preserve the Protestant Religion, and this Nation; tho' I am afraid it will fall under very great Trials, and very sharp Sufferings.

But to look back a little, I cannot but give some Touch about the Bill of Exclusion, and shew the Reasons of my appearing in that Business; which in short is this, That I thought the Nation was in such danger of Popery, and that the Expectation of a Papish Successor (as I have said in Parliament) put the King's Life likewise in such danger, that I saw no way so effectual to secure both, as such a Bill. As to the Limitations which were propos'd, if they were sincerely offer'd, and had pass'd into a Law, the Duke then would have been excluded from the Power of a King, and the Government quite alter'd, and little more than the Name of a King left. So I could not see either Sin or Fault in the one, when all People were willing to admit of the other; but thought it better to have a King with his Prerogative, and the Nation easy and safe under him, than a King without it; which must have bred perpetual Jealousies and a continual Struggle. All this I say only to justify myself, and not to enflame others: This I cannot but think my Earnestness in that Matter has had no small Influence in my present Sufferings.

And as to the conspiring to seize the Guards, which is the Crime for which I am condemn'd, and which was made a constructive Treason for taking away the King's Life, to bring it within the Statute of Edw. III. I shall give this true and clear Account: I never was at Mr. Shepherd's with that Company but once, and there was no Undertaking then of securing or seizing the Guards, nor none appointed to view or examine them; Some Discourse there was of the Feasibility of it; and several times by accident, in general Discourse elsewhere, I have heard it mention'd, as a thing might easily be done; but never consented to, as fit to be done. And I remember particularly, at my Lord Stafford's, there being some general Discourse of this kind, I immediately shew'd out, and exclaim'd against it, and ask'd, If the thing succeeded, what must be done next, but massacring the Guards, and killing them in cold Blood? Which I look'd upon as so detestable a thing, and so like a popish Practice, that I could not but abhor it. And at the same time the Duke of Monmouth took me by the Hand, and told me very kindly, My Lord, I see you and I are of a Temper: Did you ever hear of so horrid a thing? And I must needs do him that Justice to declare, that I never observ'd in him but an Abhorrence to all base things.

As to my going to Mr. Shepherd's, I went with an Intention to taste Serry; for he had promis'd me to reserve for me the next very good Piece he met with, when I went out of Town; and if he recollects he may remember I ask'd him about it, and he went and fetch'd a Bottle; but when I tasted it, I said 'twas hot in the Mouth, and desired, that whenever he met with a choice Piece, he would keep it for me; Which he promised. I enlarge the more upon this, because Sir Geo. Jeffreys insinuated to the Jury, as if I had made a Story about going thither; but I never said, that was the only Reason: And I will now truly and plainly add the rest.

I was, the Day before this Meeting, come to Town for two or three Days, as I had done once or twice before; having a very near and dear Relation lying in a very languishing and desperate Condition: And the Duke of Monmouth came to me, and told me, he was extremely glad I was come to Town; for my Lord Stafford, and some hot Men, would undo us all. How so, my Lord, I said? Why, answer'd he, they'll certainly do some disorderly thing or other, if great Care be not taken; and therefore, for God's sake, use your Endeavours with your Friends to prevent any thing of this kind. He told me these would be Company at Mr. Shepherd's that Night, and desired me to be at home in the Evening, and he would call me; which he did: And when I came into the Room, I saw Mr. Rumsey by the Chimney; tho' he swears he came in after; and there were things said by some with much more Heat than Judgment; which I did sufficiently disapprove: And yet for these things I stand condemn'd. But I thank God, my Part was sincere, and well meant. It is I know infer'd from hence, and was pres'd to me, that I was acquainted with these Heats and ill Designs, and did not discover them. But this is but Misprision of Treason at most. So I dye innocent of the Crime I stand condemn'd for, and I hope no-body will imagine that to mean a Thought could enter into me, as to go about to save myself, by accusing others. The Part that some have acted lately of that kind, has not been such as to invite me to love Life at such a rate.

As for the Sentence of Death pass'd upon me, I cannot but think it a very hard one. For nothing was sworn against me (whether true or false, I will not now examine) but some Discourses about making some Stir. And this is not levying War against the King, which is Treason by the Statute of Edward III. and not the consulting and discoursing about it, which was all that was witness'd against me. But, by a strange Fetch, the Design of seizing the Guards, was construed a Design of killing the King; and so I was in that call.

And now I have truly and sincerely told what my Part was in that, which cannot be more than a bare Misprision; and yet I am condemn'd as guilty of a Design of killing the King. I pray God lay not this to the charge, neither of the King's Council, nor Judges, nor Sheriffs, nor Jury: And for the Witnesses, I pity them, and wish them well. I shall not reckon up the Particulars wherein they did me wrong; I had rather their own

Confidences

Conscience should do that, to which, and the Mercies of God, I leave them. Only I still aver, that what I said of my not hearing Colonel Rumsey deliver any Message from my Lord Shaftsbury, was true; for I always detested lying, tho' never so much to my Advantage. And I hope none will be so unjust and uncharitable, as to think I would venture on it in these my last Words, for which I am so soon to give an Account to the Great God, the Searcher of Hearts, and Judge of all things.

From the time of choosing Sheriffs, I concluded the Heats in that Matter would produce something of this kind; and I am not much surpris'd to find it fall upon me. And I wish what is done to me, may put a Stop, and satiate some Peoples Revenge, and that no more innocent Blood be shed; for I must, and do still look upon mine as such, since I know I was guilty of no Treason; and therefore I would not betray my Innocence by Flight; of which I do not, I thank God, yet repent (tho' much press'd to it) how fatal soever it may have seem'd to have prov'd to me; for I look upon my Death in this manner, I thank God, with other Eyes than the World does. I know I said but little at the Trial, and I suppose it looks more like Innocence than Guilt. I was also advis'd not to confess Matter of Fact plainly, since that must certainly have brought me within the Guilt of Misprision. And being thus restrain'd from dealing frankly and openly, I chose rather to say little, than to depart from that Ingenuity, that, by the Grace of God, I had carried along with me in the former Parts of my Life, and so could easier be silent, and leave the whole Matter to the Conscience of the Jury, than to make the last and solemnest Part of my Life so different from the Course of it, as the using little Tricks and Evasions must have been.

It has been already observ'd, that this Paper had a wonderful Effect on the People; and it is now to be observ'd, That it equally exasperated the Court. This we learn from [P. 5. p. 561] Bishop Burnet, who adds, with his usual Elegance of Expression: "So Tillotson and I were appointed to appear before the Cabinet-Council. Tillotson had (as) little to say, but only that Lord Ruffel had shewn him his Speech the Day before he suffer'd; and that he spoke to him what he thought was incumbent on him, upon some Parts of it, but he was not dispos'd to alter it." The Bishop proceeds to say, in substance, That he was longer under Examination: That they apprehended he had pen'd it: That, however, he offer'd to take his Oath, that it was (a) pen'd by Lord Ruffel himself, and not by him: That he receiv'd the Journal which he had compos'd of every Passage, great and small, which had happen'd during his Attendance on that Nobleman to his Majesty: That they were all astonish'd at the many extraordinary things contain'd in it: That the Lord Keeper seeing the King silent, added, You are not to think the King is pleas'd with this because he says nothing; and that the Duke was highly offended at his reading the said Journal, which he took to be a study'd Panegyric on Lord Ruffel's Memory.

But tho' nothing satisfactory relative to this obnoxious Piece was drawn from these Examinations, Leffrange, and others, were both employ'd to answer it, and to lay the Composition at the Door of our Historian: Not in the Course of this Week did they spare any of those Poignancies, which make controversial Papers to entertaining to the Reader.

Leffrange, in particular, makes no Difficulty to pronounce it, "A Approach in the Form of a Vindication; the Panegyric of a Pedant, instead of the Confession of a Penitent; the last Prayer and Agony of a dying Christian dissolv'd into a Flood of Calumny and Bitterness against the Church and State, &c." And all in general remark, That under the Appearance of Ingenuity, it abounds with Reserves and Fallacies. It is indeed obvious, That his Lordship's Extenuations are confin'd to that Part of the Indictment which charg'd him with conspiring the Death of the King, and altering the Government: That as to his Concern in the intended Rising, he is wholly silent; and that even his own Confessions very sufficiently shew, that there was rather a Deficiency of legal Evidence, than of legal Matter against him: But then his Adversaries shift their Ground in their Reply to them: For, whereas upon his Trial, they chose to put the Issue on the joint Evidence of Rumsey and Shepherd, with respect to the Discourse, concerning the Guards, and to shew from thence, that the Indictment was in every Part fairly prov'd, they, upon this latter Occasion, dwell upon the Rising chiefly, which was supported only by the Testimony of Lord Howard; and consequently if the Pinch of the Charge lay there, it must be allow'd his Lordship had hard Measure, in being condemn'd on the Credit of one Witness.

Upon the whole of the Case, as it has been over and over again observ'd in the Course

A. D. 1683

[Castlereign on a printed Sheet, p. 45]

[Conclusion upon the whole Case.]

(a) The Refuse of Mr. Edward's Narrative, already quoted, and said to be taken from Dr. Tillotson's own Mouth, is as follows:

"After which, he told his Majesty, that the Lord Ruffel had declar'd to him, That he was perswaded the King had never done any thing to justify any one in rebelling against him: That he had never any such Thoughts himself, and kept company with such wicked Men, only to preserve the Duke of Monmouth from being led into any right Consideration by them, and more particularly the Earl of Shaftsbury. Being then ask'd, Why the Lord Ruffel did not discover their Design to his King? His Answer was, that That Lord had said, He could not betray his Friends, nor turn Informer against them, while he saw there was the Danger: But if things had come to a Crisis, he would have contriv'd some Notice to have been given the King of it; and, in case of Violence, would himself have been ready to oppose them with his Sword in his Hand.

The King himself (afterward) confirm'd the Truth of the greatest Part of this Account, and in conclusion said JAMES, (meaning the Duke of Monmouth) has told me the same thing." Edward, p. 1037.

(b) "And because he had not been accus'd to draw such Papers (saith the Bishop, p. 568) he declar'd me to give him a Scheme of the Heats as to be broken to, and of the Order in which they should be laid; which I did."

A. D. 1683.

Course of this Work, the Laws now in force have made no Provision for the Indemnification of Patriots who have recourse to Arms, nor will admit any Subject to be held innocent who breaks in upon his Allegiance. Whoever, therefore, in Imitation of Curtius, leaps into the Gulph, must not complain if it closes over him. But then, on the other hand, a Crisis may happen agreeable to Lord Ruffel's Supposition, when the Rod of Power may be turn'd into a Serpent, when the Laws themselves may lose their Authority, by losing their Virtue, and when the whole Business of Government may be, to exhaust all the Ways and Means of Oppression, in order to fatten on the Spoil; in which Case it would be a vain thing to urge the Obligations of the Subject, for all Obligations would be vacated; and he who ventur'd most and farthest for the Redemption of his Country, tho' a nominal Transgressor, would to the End of the World be number'd among the best and bravest of Mankind.

The Execution of Walcot, Route, and
Hone.

The Day before the Execution of Lord Ruffel, Walcot, Rouse, and Hone suffer'd at Tyburn. A few Words ought to be said of each. Walcot made a long Speech, in which he said he neither blam'd the Judges, Jury, nor King's Counsel, but only the Witnesses, who had drawn him into their Cabals, under the Notion of asserting their Liberties and Properties, and then made his Blood the Price of theirs. He was particularly severe on West and Shepherd, the first of whom he accus'd of frequently discoursing of tepping the two Sparks, in his hearing; but never with his Approbation; and the latter for betraying him, after he had promis'd and undertaken to carry him into Holland. He desir'd it might be observ'd, whether their End was Peace. He advis'd his Friends neither to speak themselves, nor hear others speak what they would not have repeated; for there was no such thing as Faith in Man to Man, whatever there was in Man to God. He added, That when God had a Work to do, he would not want Instruments: That he pray'd the Almighty to stanch the Issue of Blood then open'd, and to incline the King's Heart to Mercy: "For said he, Acts of Indulgence would make him sit much easier in his Government, and his People sit much easier under it.—What hath happen'd, and what hath been the Occasion of our present Calamity, I suppose every Man knows. What Provocations have been on the one hand; Fears, Necessities, Jealousies and Sufferings on the other, I will not intermeddle with,— resolving to use my utmost Endeavours to make that Peace and Reconciliation with my God, which it is impossible to make with Man.— With these and the like healing Expressions, he clos'd his Speech. And when afterwards drawn into a Controversy by Dr. Curtwright, Dean of Rippon, who, bluntly enough, took upon him to justify the Witnesses, he sustain'd his Part with much Address, Temper, Presence of Mind, Sense, and Ingenuity; insisting, at one time, that he did not know that the King's Death was agreed on: That he was to have no hand in it: That the Meetings he was concern'd in were for asserting their Liberties and Properties: At another, declaring, That he did not come there to dispute of Religion, but to dye religiously: At a third, confessing, That his Life was justly forfeited to the Law; and finally, so far conceding to the Dean, as to pray for the Forgiveness of those very Persons he had before condemn'd.

The Dean then address'd himself to Hone; who, as stupidly as before, continu'd to confess himself guilty of the Crime for which he was condemn'd; and that once, in Discourse with Keyling, he had said he was for killing the King and letting the Duke escape, because the latter did not differble his Religion, but withal declar'd, That he was drawn in: That he was never at their Meetings but in a public Coffee-House or Tavern: That he knew as little of the Design, as any poor silly Man in the World: That he was fain to gather it, &c. As to Rouse, he made a long Discourse, but in so broken and confus'd a manner, that it is scarce intelligible: In general he confess'd, that he was acquaint'd with a Duke to seize the King, to set aside the Duke of York, and to advance the Duke of Monmouth in his stead: That he endeavour'd to make himself acquainted with the Particulars, to be the better able to make a true and faithful Discourse, that he might not go to Whitehall or a Justice of Peace with an Idle Story or a Sham: That Lee the Dyer had charg'd him with uttering the very Words he had us'd himself: That he was never at any Consultation, nor knew aught of the Design but from him: That in truth he had propos'd to the said Lee the throwing up a Silver Ball, as a Means to draw the People together, but still with an Intent to make himself a Discoverer, not to facilitate a Rising: And that as to the taking of the Tower, which was to particularly charg'd upon him, he never entertain'd any such Thought; and that the only discourse he ever heard on that Subject was open'd by Lee, himself, in the Company of Captain Blague; who, in a jocular way, said, He would engage to take it with six Ships, and two or three hundred Men; but without the least Purpose to put any such Attempt in Practice.

After these several Speeches and Confessions, they all Three in turn pray'd aloud, (Walcot, in particular, with equal Fervor and Elevation both of Thought and Expression) and having taken their last Leave of the World, were dismiss'd by the Hand of the Executioner.

What we are next to treat of is, the deplorable End of the Earl of Essex: And how ever painful and wearisome the Pursuit, we are still under the necessity of following Truth thro' the Heirs of Controversy: 'Tis the Way she has been forc'd to wander in; and if we grow impatient of the Fatigue, we shall never overtake her.

On the very Day that Lord Ruffel was on his Trial, the King and Duke took a Fancy to visit the Tower, (where, it is said, they had not been for several Years before;) and of the Earl of Essex.

A. D. 1685.
[Echard, p. 722.] as they were going back to their Barge, the Cry follow'd them, That Lord Essex had kill'd himself: It also found an immediate Passage to the Old-Bailey. Mr. Echard says, "The News was brought to the Old-Bailey." Bishop Kennet's Expression is, that "Particular Care was taken to give immediate Notice of it to the Court at the Old-Bailey:"

[Kenset, vol. 11. p. 400.] Adding, "And the King's Council made a direct Use of it to confirm the Plot, and to condemn Lord Ruffel as the more apparently guilty of it."

[P. 63.] Sir John Hawkes also, in his Remarks on that Nobleman's Trial, has these Words: "All Persons agreed, there was some extraordinary Reason for not respiting the Trial the next Day: And, before the Trial was over, the Riddle was out; my Lord Essex was kill'd, or to be kill'd, that Morning— They were sensible the Evidence against my Lord Ruffel was very defective, and this Accident was to help it out." But then, he says, the Fact, and Reason of it, were only slily insinuated. Where-

[P. 102.] as Mr. Echard more at large declares, "The Fact was twice mention'd and insinuated by the King's Council, for no other End that appear'd, but to exasperate the Jury, now susceptible of any Impression: And it is (p) reported, that some of them said, That it went farther with them, than all the Evidence of the Witnesses produced." But, in contradiction to all this, Mr. North is express as to

[Examen, p. 401, 402.] the Manner in which the News was brought into Court: "That it came in, as Air, at the Doors: That the next Man had it first: That it spread all Ways at once, as People told it each other: That the Council, who sat below, heard it before the Bench: That it made the most Haite towards the Prisoner: That the Judges, observing some Disorder in the Company, stood up to know what was the Matter; and, upon Enquiring, the Attorney-General slily told it the Chief-Justice: That, during this Interval, there was a stop to all Business: That neither direct nor insinuated Use was made of the Accident, so as to affect the Prisoner at the Bar: And that the only public Notice that was taken of it was by the Lord Howard, who prefac'd his Evidence with certain Crocodile-Tears, to express his Sorrow for a departed Relation."

And yet, in justification of Echard, Hawkes, and Kennet, and to the utter Confusion of North, we find the two following Passages still upon Record, in Lord Ruffel's Trial, viz. in p. 8, the Attorney-General, in his prefatory Harangue to the opening of the Evidence, says, "That my Lord Ruffel was one of the Council for carrying on the Plot, with the Earl of Essex, who had, that Morning, prevented the Hand of Justice, upon himself." And again, that the Jury might be kept warm, Sir George Jeffreys, in summing up the Evidence, express'd himself in these Words, "Who should think that the Earl of Essex, who had been advanc'd so much

A. D. 1685. in his Estate and Honour, should be guilty of such desperate Things; which, had he not been conscious of, he would scarce have brought himself to that untimely End, to avoid the Methods of public Justice?"

Thus it becomes undeniable, that a very indecent and unjustifiable Use was made of this tragic Incident: And possibly to unfair a Procedure, on one side, made way for that Reprisal on the other, which has not only been so loudly complain'd of, but so severely punish'd.

Clos'd upon the Heck of the first Report concerning the Earl's Death, another took place, and by degrees gain'd ground, till it became the Discourse of the whole Kingdom; namely, That the Earl was murder'd: Whence Inferences were immediately drawn, and propagated as fact, which reflected grievously on the two Royal Brothers; and, of course, contributed as much to shake the Credit of the Plot among the People, as the Former had to establish it with Lord Ruffel's Jury.

It cannot be positively pronounc'd, that, to encounter this dangerous Impression, the Depositions of the Earl's Servant Bomeny, and of the Warder Ruffel, who was posted at his Chamber-door, as also the Coroner's Verdict, were made public (q) by Authority; because the Date of the Publication is not prefix'd to those Papers: But 'tis reasonable to think so; for, tho' the Gazette takes notice of the Sentence pass'd on Lord Ruffel, Walcot, &c. and takes care to state the Matter so, as that it may be believ'd, that they were all alike concern'd in the same Treasons; not one Line is bestow'd on the Earl of Essex; as if his Death was either of too tender or too insignificant a Nature, to deserve Notice.

The first of these Depositions is Bomeny's; who saith, That when his Lord came first to Captain Howley's House in the Tower, where he was to lodge, and which was July the 11th, he ask'd for a Penknife to pare his Nails: That he the Deponent, not having one at hand, said he would send for one: That he accordingly sent his Lordship's Footman with a Note to the Steward, for such things as were wanting, and among the rest a Penknife: That he nevertheless return'd without one, the Steward saying he would get one the next Day: That accordingly, on the next Day, the TWELFTH, as soon as my Lord was up, the Footman was again dispatch'd for it: "And when the Footman was gone (these are the very Words of the Deposition) about, or a little after, EIGHT o'Clock, my Lord sent one Mr. Ruffel, his Warder, to this Informant, who came, and then he ask'd him, If the Penknife was come? This Informant said, no, my Lord, but I shall have it by-and-by; to which my Lord said, That he should bring him one of his Razors, it would do as well: And THEN this Informant went and fetch'd one, and gave it it my Lord; who THEN went to pare his Nails; and THEN this Informant went out of the Room into the Passage by the Door, on FRIDAY the THIRTEENTH Instant, and began to talk with the Warder, and a little while after he went down stairs; and soon after came the Footman with the Provisions, and brought also a Penknife, which this Informant put upon his Bed, and thought my Lord had no more need of it, because he thought he had par'd his Nails; and THEN this Informant came up to my Lord's Chamber, about EIGHT or NINE in the Forenoon, on FRIDAY the THIRTEENTH Instant, with a little Note from the Steward; but not finding his Lordship in the Chamber, went to the Closet-door-Closet-door, and found it shut; and he, thinking his Lord was busy there, went down, and laid a little, and came up again, thinking his Lord had been come out of the Closet, and finding him not in the Chamber, he knock'd at the Door with his Finger thrice, and said, my Lord! but no body answering, he took up the Hanging, and, looking thro' the Chink, he saw BLOOD, and a Part of the RASOR, whereupon he call'd the Warder Ruffel, and went down to call for Help; and the said Ruffel pull'd the Door open, and there they saw my Lord of Effex all along the Floor, without a Perriwig, and all full of Blood, and the Rasor by him.

The second Deposition was Ruffel's, the Warder, who said, "That, on FRIDAY the THIRTEENTH Instant, about Eight or Nine o'Clock in the Forenoon, he was present, when he did hear the Lord of Effex call to his Man Mr. Bomony for a Penknife to pare his Nails, and THEN for a Rasor, which Mr. Bomony brought him, and THEN my Lord walk'd up and down the Room scraping his Nails with the Rasor, and shut the outside Door: That Bomony, half a Quarter of an Hour afterwards, not finding my Lord in his Bed-chamber, went down stairs again, believing that my Lord was then private in his Closet: That, about a Quarter of an Hour afterwards, he came up again, and knock'd at the Door, then call'd, my Lord! three times, and he not answering, peep'd thro' a Chink of the Door, and saw the EARL lying on the Ground in the Closet; whereupon he cried out, That my Lord was fallen down sick; and that then this Informant went to the Closet Door and open'd it, the Key being on the outside, and saw my Lord lying on the Ground in his Blood, his Throat being cut."

Two Surgeons depos'd farther, that the (r) Apera Arteria, or Wind-pipe, Gullet and Jugular Arteries were all divided, even to the Vertebrae of the Neck: And then follow'd the Coroner's Verdict, pronouncing the Earl Felo de se.

(r) Notwithstanding which, Bishop Burnet asserts, vol. 1. p. 553. The Wound was above the Apera Arteria. And again in the same Page he proceeds that: "When his Body was brought home to his own House, and the Wound was examin'd by his own Surgeon, he said to me, it was impossible the Wound could be as it was, if given by any Hand but his own: For except he had cut his Head back, and stretch'd up his Neck all that he could, the Apera Arteria could have been cut."

These are all the Depositions that were publish'd; and if there are all that were taken, it is apparent they are not all that should have been taken; for it is acknowledg'd in Bomony's Paper, that the Foot-man (Samuel Peck) who had been sent to the Steward for the Pen-knife, &c. was return'd with it, before the Discovery of his Lord's Body was made: And when the Out-cry which follow'd that Discovery broke out, it is not to be imagin'd, but that he rush'd in among the rest to gaze on that horrid Spectacle; and, of course had something to depose, in relation to the Manner in which the Body was found, which, it must be presum'd, would have help'd either to confirm or strengthen what Bomony and Ruffel had before sworn; and if so, to set the Fact out of the Reach of Misrepresentation: And as this was the sole End of publishing those Papers, it furnishes Matter of Wonder, at least, that any one Circumstance was omitted, which would have contributed thereto. There was also another Warder, Munday by Name, who kept Guard at the Stair-Foot, one Lloyd a Centinel who was upon Duty at the Door of the Houle, one Mary Johnson a Servant in Hensley's Houle, who, together with one Whiffler, the Bailiff to the Tower-Library, help'd to strip and wash the Body, &c. All of whom should have been heard previous to the Verdict; and from the whole joint Evidence, the Truth should have been made manifest.

It is farther to be regretted, 1. That, when the violent Death of so eminent a Person, while the King's Prisoner, at so extraordinary a Crisis, was to be enquir'd into, not only for the Satisfaction of the Laws, but to close up the Mouth of Slander and Obloquy in eternal Silence, the Body was not left exactly as it was found, the Rasor as it had dropt from his dying Grasp, and every other Circumstance, unalter'd and unremov'd, that might have either serv'd as positive Evidence, or have furnish'd out those Suggestions that would have prov'd in the next Degree satisfactory. 2. That the Coroner and his Jury were not immediately directed to sit upon the Body; as also, that any Colour should be given to urge, that they were aw'd, or hurry'd, or had given a precipitate Verdict. 3. That Bomony and Ruffel should omit one material Allegation in their Depositions, which Both afterwards recollected, and swore to, almost in the same Words. 4. That the said Depositions should not only be deficient in themselves, but inconsistent with each other. And, 5. That free Scope was not given to any subsequent Enquiries, which would have disarm'd Malice itself, and demonstrated to late Posterity, that the Court had nothing to apprehend from them.

Now,

On the other Hand, in the Pamphlet call'd, An Enquiry, &c. p. 44. it is said, "That a certain Gentleman, who had been an Eye Witness of the Wound, affirm'd, That it began at the Side of the Neck-bone, behind the left Jugular, and extended to the Bone of the Neck, beyond the Right, being between eight and nine Inches in Dimension from one Side to the other; and that it so nearly approach'd and pierc'd into the Vertebrae, that had it light on a joint, it would have cut off his Head, instead of merely cutting his Throat."

A. D. 1684.

Now, in regard to the first of these Points, That all things should have remain'd as they were, till the Inquest had been made, as Custom and common Sense requir'd; the direct contrary, as we are told, was put in practice: For the Body was remov'd, stript, and wash'd, and both the Closet and Chamber were clean'd.

[Enquiry and Doubts of the Honor of the Earl of Essex,
4th p. 53, 54.]

As to the second, We see by the Date of the Verdict, that the Jury did not sit on the Body till the next Day: And that they neglected to take the Depositions of those other Persons just nam'd, sufficiently proves, that they did not proceed in the Manner that their known Duty, and the peculiar Importance of the Case, requir'd: In consequence of which Misconduct, the Evidence, real or pretended, of those Persons, was afterwards made use of to blurt that of Ruffel and Bonemy, as will be speedily explain'd. We are also told, that when one of the Jury demand'd to see the Clothes of the Deceas'd, answer was made by the Coroner, by Direction from certain Persons waiting without, tho' within Hearing of all that pass, "That they were call'd to sit on the Body, not the Clothes; and that it was sufficient for them, that they had seen the said Body, and receiv'd an Account upon Oath of the manner in which it was found." From whence Occasion was taken to assert in the Name, and on the Credit of the Earl's Footman, That the Print of a bloody Foot was visible on one of his Stockings: And also in the Name, and on the Credit of Mary Johnson, That his Cravat, which was three times round his Neck, was cut thro' every Fold. And yet again, as to the precipitate Verdict, That the Jury were scarce met before a Message was sent them to make haste in their Inquisition, because one waited to carry it to the King, who had declar'd he would not rise from the Council-Board till he had Notice of the Issue.

[Ibid. p. 56.]

To the third, that Ruffel and Bonemy made a capital Omission; it consisted in this, That when, upon Bonemy's Outcry, Ruffel came up and open'd the Door, he could not push it quite open, said one; he could not open it far, said the other; because my Lord's Feet were against it, said both. And Mention is made of another Deposition by Munday, which says, That the Earl's Body lay so close and strong against the Closet Door, that neither Ruffel nor Bonemy could open it; but that Munday, being stronger than either, put his Shoulder and forc'd it open. Thus we have either Omission upon Omission, or Improvement upon Improvement. And in opposition to all, the Footman is said to have testify'd, that when he ran up, he found Part of his Lord's Legs without the Door; which again is utterly irreconcilable with what Mary Johnson aver'd, namely, That the Earl was found on his Knees, leaning against the Wall: And that the Body was then stiff and cold. A Circumstance wholly incredible, if it be true that the Fact was committed in less than Half an Hour before.

To the fourth, concerning the Incon-

ency of Ruffel's and Bonemy's Depositions; Bonemy deposes, it was upon the Tuesday, that the said Bonemy sent the Footman for the Penknife before his Lord was up; and about, or a little after, eight o' Clock, whilst the Footman was gone, that the Earl sent Ruffel, the Warder, for Bonemy, to ask if it was come; whose Answer was, No, But I shall have it by and by: And the very Words of the said Deposition, before quoted, and all the several Turns so often repeated in it, as well as the whole Train of Circumstances to which they relate, imply and declare, that the Earl's Demand of the Razor, Bonemy's giving it him, the Earl's proceeding to pare his Nails, Bonemy's going out into the Passage, and the Return of the Footman with the Penknife, &c. were all the Transactions of that same Morning, and not on Friday the Thirteenth; tho' we find those Words so impertinently and absurdly, crowded in: Whereas Ruffel, on the contrary, without taking any notice, that he had been sent by the Earl for Bonemy, faltens on the said Friday at his Outlet; and is express, that the two main Occurrences happen'd that Morning, which Bonemy to circumstantially ascribes to the precedent: From which manifest Disagreement, occasion has been taken to assert, That the said impertinent Words were suffic- [Munday will ed into Bonemy's Deposition at Whitehall, in defiance of Grammar or Construction, to make the whole Evidence seem to be of a piece.

A. D. 1685.

As to the fifth, That free Scope was not given to Enquiries, appears from the Story of Braddon; which was in substance this: Braddon discourses with a Friend of the Particular which closes Bonemy's Deposition, viz. That the Razor was found lock'd up in the Closet with the Body; was told by his said Friend, That the Fact was otherwise; for one Edward, a Boy of about thirteen or fourteen, had been a bloody Razor thrown out of the Earl's Window, before it was known he was dead. Braddon, hereupon, suspecting foul Play, and growing eager to detect it, officiously goes in quest of Edward; learns from his Mother and Sister, that he had told this Tale as soon as he came home, the very Morning of the Earl's Death; takes down Notes of what they and he depos'd; which Notes he first cury'd to a Magistrate, and then to Lord Sunderland, as Secretary of State, who order'd him to attend the Council the next Day, together with the Boy, &c. He did so, was immediately taken into Custody, before any one of them had been examin'd, and oblig'd to give 2000*l.* Bail before he could procure his Discharge; the Boy having unaid, before his Majesty, all he had said at home. Braddon, however, persevering in his Enquiries, found out a Girl of about the same Age with the Boy, who told a Story of the same kind; took her Deposition also; and having been further inform'd, that it had been discours'd, above a hundred Miles from London, that the Earl had cut his Throat in the Tower, on the very Day that his Death had actually taken place, set out in quest of the Proof, having in his Pocket the two Papers sign'd by the two Children, a Letter of Recommendation from one Mr. Speke to Sir Robert Atkins, and another from one Burgess of Marlborough to the Post-master of France, requesting him to assist in the said Enquiries: But Braddon's Motions were now to closely watch'd, that he was overtaken at Fifflerton in Wiltshire, by a Messenger, and carry'd before a proper Justice of Peace, who without Remorse, committed him to the County Goal, for being a dangerous and ill affected Person to the Government; and in his Warrant to the Goaler, requir'd, "That he the said Laurence Braddon would safely keep, till he should receive farther Order from the King and Council." Hence he, however, made a Shift to get himself remov'd to London by a Habean Corpus; and all the Judges being out of Town, he had the ill Luck to be oblig'd to apply to the Lord Keeper for his Redemption; who, instead of proceeding by his own Authority as the Statute requir'd, postpon'd the Prisoner's Suit till the next Day, when he was again brought before a Committee of the Council, consisting of the Lord Keeper, Lord Privy-Seal, Duke of Ormond, and Secretary Jenkins; and after many bitter Reproaches, requir'd to give 12000*l.* Security for his Appearance; and also Security for his good Behaviour. This was, in Effect, denying him his Liberty, as became yet more apparent, when one half of that Sum was offer'd and refus'd. Thus he stood committed to the Custody of a Messenger, as before, at so great an Expence, that he made it his Petition to be remov'd into the King's Bench, as a sort of Deliverance. This was, at last, comply'd with: But, after he had given 10,000*l.* Security to be a true Prisoner, within the Rules, he was deny'd that Liberty, tho' he had thus dearly purchas'd it. Thus he remain'd in close Confinement during the whole Vacation. On the fifth Day of the next Term, he was once more set at (1) Liberty on the giving 2000*l.* Bail: And in the Hilary Term following he was try'd for a (2) Misdemeanour at the King's Bench Bar, together with Speke, in maliciously conspiring to make his Majesty's Subjects believe, that the Coroner's Inquest in the Case of the Earl of Essex was unduly taken; and that the said Earl did not murder himself, but was murder'd by those who had him in Custody; and in procuring false Witnesses to attest the same, to the great Scandal of the Government.

It was upon this public Occasion, that the Court not only undertook to punish this forward Busy-body, but to prove, by a Cloud of Witnesses (for the Attorney-General expresses himself) that the Earl was his own Murderer. In order to which, an Attempt was first made to raise a Belief, that Edwards, the Father of the Boy, tho' a Custom-house Officer, whose Bread depended on the Court, had forg'd the Story, which his Son had told: One Evans charging him with saying to him, about eleven o'Clock, on the Morning the Fact was committed, that he had heard it from home; and that in the Afternoon, he came to him again, and told him farther, that he had now been home, and the Boy had confirm'd it to him. But Edwards, himself, insisted he had his Intelligence at home from his own Family at ten the same Morning: That on examining the Boy, he confirm'd it; and that he, the Boy, had never deny'd it, till Braddon had been at his House to enquire into the Truth of it: And then, in his (the Father's) Absence, some of his Family talk'd to him at such a rate, that he began to retract what he had said before: That nevertheless, in Half an Hour's time he own'd it again, and again relaps'd; and so continu'd affirming and denying, till he was carry'd before the Council; since which time he had been steadfast in the Negative; but whether he would now be so, he could not say. Here being ask'd by the Court, whether he had not inform'd Braddon, that his Son was a lying Boy, he answer'd, He had; and farther that he would not undertake for the Truth of the Story. He was then re-examin'd on the Point of his having been first at home before he mention'd it to Evans; and insisted, that he had; as also that as soon as he came within the Door his Family had made him acquainted with the News the Boy had brought in; adding, That he could not have dispos'd of it before, unless he had been the Contriver of the Story. To which the Attorney-General was pleas'd to reply, It is like enough you were, Evans was, after this, produc'd to confront him; but only said, He thought Edwards had the Story from home, and did not go home; whereas Edwards continued positive, That he went home first. The Boy, himself, being now call'd upon, and the Father charging him to speak the Truth and nothing but the Truth; the Chief-Justice was pleas'd to direct the Boy to give the same Charge to his Father. The Boy, however, made no Scruple to acknowledge, that he had told such a Story to his Father, before he had seen Braddon, and again to Braddon afterwards; and that he did not deny the Truth of it to Braddon. One Hawkins, another Lad, like himself, the Son of the Doctor who took Vitabarris's Confession, was then call'd, and swore, That, after the News was brought to his Father, that the Earl of Essex had kill'd himself, he follow'd his Father out; and after a little time was join'd by young Edwards; that they stood together for an Hour or two at least, looking up at the Earl's Window; and that during that time, no Rascal was thrown out; and that they went away together out of the

(1) Having once more got my Liberty (says Braddon himself, in his Pamphlet call'd A border will use, p. 7.) I resolv'd my Prosecution, &c. but, as a design'd Prevention thereof, I was, about November 1681, again taken up on an illegal Warrant at the former: For having no Crime was specify'd; but it was granted against me for being supposed to be defamed in the Government.—The Design of this was to charge me with helping 500 Protestant Exiles, for the Detraction of the loyal Party. But, upon full Examination, in this Accusation there appear'd such Falshood, and inconsistent Mixture, that I was order'd forthwith to send home.

(2) The Duke of Tork is charg'd by the Author of the Exposé and Deliver with having said, That Edwards was revelling with such a Bawling: But what he must give it to run like if all the Lords of England would do so. Enquiry and Detection, p. 21.

Tower-Gate; and that young Edward mention'd no such thing to him. Young Edward was also ask'd, if he ever told any body he had been at the Lord Brandon Gerard's Lodging in the Tower; and answering, Never in his Life, the Information taken by Braddon was read; in which it was said, That as he, Edward, was standing between the Lodgings of the Lord Brandon Gerard, and those of the Earl of Essex, he saw a Hand cast out a bloody Razor: That as he was going to take it up, a Maid, ran out of Captain Hensley's, and prevented him, by taking it up first. Spike's Letter by Braddon to Sir Robert Atkins was also read to prove his Concern in the Business, as also the Letter to the Post-master at Freme; and then the Girl's Information, before spoken of, and which, together with these two Letters, was found upon Braddon, when apprehended at Fiberton.

Thus stood the Case on the King's Side, and from hence it appear'd plain enough that Braddon had busy'd himself in gleaning up Matters tending to prove, that the Earl was not his own Murderer: But then the Malice of his Proceeding, and the Drift of it to scandalize the Government were as yet in no one Circumstance demonstrat'd, unless the Suggestions of the King's Council, and the Ravings of the Bench were to pass for Evidence.

On the other hand, Braddon prov'd by the corresponding Evidence of the Boy's Father, Mother, Sister, and one Mrs. Burt, that the Boy had often repeated and overr'd the Story of the Razor; whence it follow'd that he, Braddon, was not the Forger of it: And as to the Boy's denying it afterwards, he endeavour'd to account for it, by allying the Sister, Who he had ran to his Mother, crying he should be hang'd! To which the reply'd, in effect, That the Child had entertain'd that Conceit, the fopp'd, from a Conviction that he had told a Lye. But Mr. Wallop, Council for the Defendants, did not suffer the Issue to rest here, but proceeded to ask, Whether they did not tell the Boy, his Father would lose his Place? Upon which, she who was for good at Supposition before, thought fit to confess, That they did. But when the same Council would have further ask'd, "Whether she had not told her Brother, that the King would hang his Father, if he did not deny what he had so often affirm'd?" The Lord Chief-Justice interpos'd in a violent Fury, and threaten'd him with the Animadversion and Correction of the Court for stirring a Question that was so dishonourable to his Majesty and the Government. When this Storm was over, Jane Ledden the Girl, was brought forward; concerning whom we are expressly told, That she had no Acquaintance with, nor Knowledge of, the Boy; and consequently there could be no Concert between them to relate and agree in all the main Circumstances of the same Story: And she depos'd; firmly, in the Face of the Court, "That she saw a Razor thrown out of a Window; which the People told her were the Earl of Essex's Lodgings; that she heard Shrieks and Cries, that the Razor fell within the Pales; that she saw a Woman in a white Head come out; but whether she took up the Razor or not, she could not tell; that she saw it only as it was flying; that it was open and very bloody; and that she was sure it was a Razor, and not a Knife." And these several Circumstances she had recounted at ten o' Clock the same Morning the Fact was committed, as her Aunt and others; only she had then happen'd to lay, as one Glassbrook testify'd, "That she was sure the Earl of Essex had cut his Throat, because she had seen him throw the Razor out of the Window." Of this Slip the Court took the Advantage; and from it endeavour'd to shew, that her Evidence, positive as it was, did not deserve any Regard, 1. Because it was not possible that the Earl, himself, should be able to throw the Razor out of the Window, 2. If it was possible, he must have thrown it out of his Closet Window where he dy'd. In which Case, the Girl's Evidence would have disagreed with the Boy's, who said the Razor was thrown out of the Chamber Window. But if all the Boy told was a Fiction of his own, how can it be held of any Authority to destroy the Girl's Depositions? Or, if it should be urg'd, that the Girl's was Fiction too, is it not more wonderful that the Fictions of two different Persons should tally so well, than that they were in any respect irreconcilable? Besides, the Girl specified in her Evidence, that she stood in that Part of the Tower call'd the Mans, which look'd towards the Chamber Window, and that there was a Coach at the Door; whence it was manifest, she meant the Chamber Window; and, in the (2) main, she stands answerable only for having said, That she saw the Earl,

1. The Court were, however, to enquire to what use this Discovery, and an exact of publick Life of them, that they fell into the Hands of the Court, which we find thus observ'd by the Author of the History and Detraction, p. 60.

2. And whereas Mr. Justice Holt was pleas'd to except against the Deposition of the Girl in another particular, namely, that while she stood in the Place she said she was in, she had said that it fell within them; I do return this Answer of mine to it: First, That the Reports of the young Children are much more truly to be receiv'd, than the Observations of Mr. Justice Holt; upon this Point it to be remember'd with that of my Ld. C. J. concerning the same Case, where Justice Holt would have the Contradiction between his Information of the Children do lie in this, That the Girl said the Razor fell within the Pales, and the Boy said it fell without; the Lord Chief-Justice will have it to be as the Boy is saying the Razor was thrown on the outside, while the Boy said it was thrown on the inside. I am sure one of these two Judges shall be mistaken, since it is impossible that two Accounts of the same thing, so directly contradictory the one to the other, can be true. And indeed the Middle lies with my Lord Chief-Justice * * * (whose Passion had transported to that degree, that he neither durst mislead what himself or others said) in affirming that the Girl should say, the Razor was thrown on the outside the Pales, when she had expressly sworn that it was thrown on the inside of them. But then, secondly, as to the Inconsistency between what the Boy inform'd, and that which the Girl depos'd, I say, that young Edward had, both in Words, and by assisting the Father and Motion of the Hand, got of which the Razor fell, frequently declar'd, that it was call'd on the inside of the Pales. His Father, Mother, and several others, are ready to depose, that when he first told the Story of the Razor, he express'd it by saying, that it drops out of a Hand from the Earl's Window; which did plainly signify, that he meant it fell on the inside of the Pales. And whatsoever he said to justify the Motion of the Hand from (which we find resolv'd by the Author of the Enquiry and Detection into childlike Simplicity) and that in her Information she had said, she heard a Soldier at the Door, call to those within to come and take up the Rasor, whereas in Court she could recollect no such Circumstance.

Yet farther; to prove that Braddon's Journey into Wiltshire was not to make or furnish Evidence, but to trace it where it lay, one Mrs. Max was produc'd at the Trial, and offer'd to depose, that, being in a Coach on a Journey with her Daughter into Berkshire, on Thursday, July 28, being the Day before Ld. Effes's Death, her said (7) Daughter then told her she had heard a Report, "That one of the Lords committed for the late Plot had cut his Throat in the Tower:" But the Chief Justice would not permit her to be examin'd, on the Maxim, That Hearsay was no Evidence; tho' it was urg'd by Mr. Wallis, that in this Case it was; since it prov'd, that there had been such Talk. But one Fisher, a Shop-keeper of Andover, swore positively, That the Earl of Effes's Suicide was so commonly discours'd of in that Place, from the Wednesday Night, which was the eleventh, to Friday Noon the thirteenth, that he depended on seeing it confirm'd by the Post of that Day; which only bringing a Confirmation of his Commitment, he could not help wondering how such a Report came to be rais'd; and much more afterwards, when he found it was the Fore-runner of the Truth. One Lewis of Marlborough, also depose'd, that being on the Road within three or four Miles of Andover, on the said Friday, he fell in with a Person who told him the said Earl had cut his Throat; and one Bergez of the same Place, That he heard the same at Frome the same Day.

And tho' all these several Depositions were, at least, sufficient to justify Braddon in his Endeavours to bring the Truth to light, more especially, as he offer'd to put all his Vouchers into the Hands of the Government, and of course to leave the Prosecution to themselves, the Lord Chief-Justice was pleas'd to treat the whole Matter as a Contrivance to deceive the King's Subjects, and to sit together by the Ears; calling it, most eloquently, as he thought, Stuff raked out of Dung-hills, and picked up on purpose to make a Fire, and set us all in a Flame; and discharging the Witnesses all the Rancour and Bitterness, his own corrupt Heart overflow'd with.

The Attorney-General then undertook to shew, that it was impossible for any Man, unless the most malicious and villainously inclin'd against the Peace and Government of the Kingdom to spread such a Report. In order to which, he proceeded to call the Cloud of Witnesses, before spoken, viz: 1. Bennet, whose Deposition was agreeable to that already cited, except that he now for the first time recollected, that the said Earl's Feet bore so hard against the Door, that they could not open it; and that it does not appear, he fell into that obvious Inconsistency, above-mention'd, relating to the Dates of delivering the Rasor, and his Rasor's applying it to so fatal a Purpose. 2. Ruffel the Warder, who kept to his former Story, so minutely, that he again swore, Bennet, on lifting up the Hangings, saw his Lord lying in his Blood, tho' Bennet, himself, only swore, that he saw Blood and Part of the Rasor. And the Court demanding, If any Person had been with the Earl from the time Bennet went down, to the time of his Return? he answer'd, No. 3. Lloyd, the Centinel, who swore, that he saw the Earl at his Window when Lord Ruffel went by to his Trial: That about Half an Hour after, a Cry was made, That the Earl had kill'd himself: That there was no Rasor thrown out of the Window: That no Maid came out of the House; nor did he call one: That no Soldier was at the Door but himself, and that no body went into the House that Morning while he stood there; which is most strange, if the Earl's Footman return'd within that very Half Hour, as Bennet had sworn, with the Penknife. 4. Captain Howley, himself, at whose House the Earl was confin'd, depose'd, That he, standing at the Tower Gate that Morning, receiv'd Intelligence of the said Earl's Death by a Warder, whose Name he does not specify: That betwixen he went up Stairs to the Gloiet, which the Rasor fell, he did put it into such a downy Pad, as that all who observ'd him, including what he saw done, concluded, that the Rasor fell on the inside of the Palet. Now was he ever heard to say, that it fell on the outside of the Palet, but only that time that Mr. Francis took his Information in Wiltshire, when his Sister, by understanding to threaten him into a Deal of the whole Story for love, and put him into such a Fright, that either he could not remember, or did not mind every little Circumstance of what he as well saw, as he often repeated before. And it is remarkable, that Francis himself, at Mr. Douglas's Trial, where he repeated and acknowledged what he had formerly reported, nor any other Witness, who appear'd at the said Trial in Wiltshire, when they had heard his Story, did in the least mention his having always said, that the Rasor fell on the outside of the Palet; but, on the contrary, his Mother does to avoid her Deposition, as she was to prove, that she believ'd he always meant the inside of the Palet; for he swore, "That he did see a Hand out of a Window, and a Rasor fall down." And in the whole Story of a Rasor's being thrown, or let fall, out of the Earl of Effes's Window, immediately before the Notis of his Death, will be stretch'd by several other Persons, when there is occasion; to the Centinel Maid, whom we have formerly mention'd, not only reported it to several Persons, both that Morning my Lord was kill'd, and afterwards, but he added two or three remarkable Circumstances, since whereas the Boy had not taken notice of, nor the Girl above; either. That which Maid then declar'd to three Persons, the very Day my Lord was kill'd, and which they are ready to swear when call'd thereunto, is, "That, just before the Earl's Death was publicly known, there was a bloody Rasor thrown out of his Chamber Window, which was seen by some of the Soldiers, as well as by others; and whilst a little Boy, who had been the Rasor thrown out, ran towards it to take it up, a Maid, or Woman, that came out of the House where the Earl of Effes lay'd, was too quick for the Boy, and catch'd up the Rasor, and having run in with it to a House, a Maid was soon after cry'd out! That we have not only a Confirmation from a third Person, that there was a Rasor thrown out of the Earl of Effes's Window, before any Tidings of his Death, and that a Boy went to take it up, but was prevented by a Ward Woman from Captain Howley's House, who took it up, and run in with it (the last Passage of which the Girl had not observ'd); but we have also a Particular of a Palage for Gov, which the Boy gave me Account of, whereby, that they were divers other Persons standing by, who saw the bloody Rasor thrown out of my Lord of Effes's Chamber Window.

(7) Was, we are told, would have depose'd the same in Person; but that being big with Child, and at the End of her Recollection, she durst not venture abroad.

Closet, where the Body lay: That not being able to open the Door far, look'd in, and saw the Rasor, bloody, and my Lord lying on his Arm: And that a Confable was call'd to examine the Servants. And here occurs fresh Matter of Wonder and Regret, viz. That this Confable was not examin'd by the Coroner and his Jury, and his Depositions publish'd, together with those of Ruffel and Bemery; as also, that he was not on this Occasion subpoena'd into Court, to relate what he had seen and heard; since it is reasonable to suppose, that his Evidence would have had more Weight with the Public than that of Bemery, because of its flagrant Inconsistency; or of the rest, because of their manifest Dependence on the Pleasure of their Superiors; to say nothing of the Presumption against them, that, in case there was any foul Play, these very Comparators must have been either Principals or Accessories in it.

Upon the whole, tho' in the famous Case of Sir Thomas Overbury, who was murder'd in the Tower in the Reign of James I. and upon whom the Coroner pronounc'd, That he dy'd a natural Death, it was held no Dishonour to the Government to make a more thorough Disquisition into this dark Affair, and tho' in consequence of that Disquisition, the Murder was discover'd, and all the Parties concern'd in it were brought within the Reach of Justice, and tho' Braddon himself took notice, that it had not been prov'd he had us'd any ill Arts to persuade the Witnesses to testify what was false, and that he had proceeded with all the Caution and Candour imaginable, such was the Violence of the Bench, and such the Ductility of the Jury, That they brought in both the Defendants guilty: Which Verdict was follow'd by as severe a Sentence, Speke being fin'd 1000*l.* and Braddon 2000*l.* which was far more than he was worth. Nor was this all, for both were to remain in Prison till they had paid those unconscionable Fines, and to

All that now remains for the thorough understanding of the Pretensions of either Party, with respect to this calamitous Case, is to give a brief State of the Assertions maintain'd by both; most of which our Historians have too incuriously paid'd by; possibly in Tenderness to the Infirmary of their Readers; who, too often, desire rather to be amus'd than inform'd; or to be flatter'd in their Prejudices, rather than to have those Prejudices remov'd.

And first, the Advocates for the then Government, who, one and all, most strenuously abide by the Coroner's Verdict, That the Earl of Essex was Fel de se, ground their Opinion, not more on the Depositions set forth by Authority, and the Testimony which was given in Court at Braddon's Trial, than on the Earl's avow'd Principle, That Self-murder was lawful; which we are told, he had often taken occasion to declare, when discourting of his Lady's Grand-Father, the Earl of Northumberland, who, "being imprison'd for Treason in Queen Elizabeth's time, pistol'd himself in the Tower," says Mr. Carte, and left a Note on the Table expressing, That the Where should never base his Honour and Estate." The Lord Keeper North, in his Memorials left with his Brother, not only alludes to this Case of the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Essex's usual Comment thereon, but, in relating what pass'd at the (x) Conference between the Earl and his Brother-in-law the Earl of Clarendon, before spoken of, gives us to understand by Circumstance, that the Earl was confin'd in those very Lodgings where his Father, the Lord Capel, had been confin'd, and where he receiv'd his last Advice, to be loyal to the Death, when he was led to Execution under the Dominion of the Commonwealth: And Mr. North, in treating of this Accident (y) adopts the Opinion of

(x) "After he had been a little while in the Tower, he sent to desire the Earl of Clarendon might come and speak with him; the Earl (having whom I have said, sent, at his first coming to him, he said, *Brother, you may imagine I am acquainted with this Lodging, for I have been sixteen Months with my Father, when he was a Prisoner, The Earl of Clarendon reply'd, Brother, that was a glorious Occasion, I am fain to sit in here upon a different Account. The Earl of Essex then told him, he had a Desire to speak with him; he said something by upon his Spirit, that the King had to him, which had been to great a Trouble to him, that he had not time to see his Night, and he had a great Desire to testify his Friends upon it: It was, that the King, upon his Examination, said, my Lord, you had said before of my Wapping Prison, and concluded from thence that the King believ'd him engag'd with them in the Assassination. This was a great Trouble to him, and he desired the Earl of Clarendon to go to his Majesty, and likewise the Lords of the Council, that would his Acquaintance, and clear him in this Matter; and to advise them, that he was at clear of any Design against the King's Person, as any Man whatsoever. That the Earl of Clarendon told to one of the Lords, to whom himself of his Friends, concerning him one of the Friends the Earl of Essex, answer'd, Brother's Examination p. 385, 386.*

(y) In these Words:

"I should have never dropt this remarkable Case of the Earl of Essex, had there been any other, my blood a falling, related to me by a very venerable Person, which ought to be made known to I know, early or late, it will be commended to the Public by some, who, I do not think, he proceeded, or said, I shall endeavour to do, so far as I can, by relating what he told me, which it may not be amiss to do."

support the justifiable Course of a controversial Style, in which I am engag'd, with an Account of a most remarkable Incident. The good Lord Capel, Father of this Earl of Essex, who suffered Death for his Loyalty to King Charles I. when he was taken by the Rebels and was Prisoner in the Tower, was hold'd in the same Rooms that receiv'd this noble Earl when he was committed, and where the Earl of Clarendon follow'd him with that unshaky Resolution, concerning the Summits of the Lodgings, pushed between. When the time of the Lord Capel's Execution was at hand, he had his Lady, the Earl's Mother, and this Earl himself, being then young, with him in the Lodgings: And having resolv'd for a while to be kind to his Death, he returned to comfort his Wife, and leave a Blessing with his young Son, and to take his former Leave of both. The Lady could not bear his Condition, but, upon her Lord's Approach, fell down in a swoon. With some help she recover'd a little, but, on the like Approach, she fell, and the Lord, who is the next Part of my Execution, but I was not contented, so he resolv'd to stir up his Lady on a mat, but took up his young Son in his Arms, and, kissing him in a most tender Manner, gave him his Blessing, and, with all the Ceremony of a dying Father's Authority, charg'd him that, whatever Accusation or Charge he should receive for a Treason in his King, Add to be his the Reason, and received the Stroke. It may be an insupportable Soul indeed, that does not imagine what a Confirmation of Mind it was to this noble Earl, to be brought in, a Prisoner for High Treason, to that very Lodging, where the confusions Walls must needs serve in him the Image of his dying Father's solemn Charge, as if Providence had dispos'd it so on purpose to impress the Remembrance of his parents Blessing, in breaking it as he had done. I have not added, the Some of Insults of the same, Loss of Honour in his Father's Morley, Bishop of Winchester, who, according to Mr. Eckard, made foisonable Remarks on the Earl's dying, by his own Hand; "As if the Sight of that Room had rais'd such a Conscience of Guilt, as threw him into an unconquerable Fit of Despair." But then the same Gentleman, Mr. North (as also Mr. Corie and others) countenance another Opinion, "That the Sight of Lord Russell passing by under his Window to his Trial, rais'd in him those agonizing Reflections, which drovohim so violently on his Fate; For, say they, it was at the Earl's Influence, that Lord Russell had given way to the Admission of Lord Howard into their Councils; against whom he had entertain'd an insuperable Aversion. If then the latter was the Cause of his Despair, it could not be the Former: If the Former, it could not be the latter; and if one was false, it is possible the other was not true: If the Memory of his Father's dying Charge weigh'd most with him, it is reasonable to think, the Moment of his Entrance into that fatal Chamber would have been the Moment of Despair; and the Reser would have been immediately call'd for, in lieu of the Penknife: But, instead of that, Bontey, himself, testify'd at Bradden's Trial, that they had no reason from his Department to suspect any thing more than ordinary: Besides, the Manner of his Lordship's recollecting and mentioning that Circumstance, rather shews that he quoted it in his own Favour: It is also plain from Lord Clarendon's Answer, that he understood him so. And if the Consideration of Lord Russell's Case stuck so close to his Heart, why should he not have held his Hand till the Trial was over, till his Doom was seal'd, till he knew the Door of Mercy was shut against him, and till he found no Endeavours of his own could contribute to his Preservation? And why are his repeated Importunities for the Penknife, long before Lord Russell came in Sight, made use of as an Argument, that he had from the Beginning taken a Resolution to destroy himself?

Yet farther, whereas even Bishop Burnet admits, that he us'd to have very black Fits of the Spleen: That he had strange Principles; in particular, that he thought a Man was Master of his own Life; and that he fear'd to approve the Earl of Northernham's Self-murder: The Author of the Enquiry and Detestation affirms, in express Words, That, upon Application made to his Lady concerning the Truth of the Report, That the Earl had occasionally declar'd himself in favour of Suicide, she had, with all the Solemnity requisite in a Matter of that Importance, deny'd it, laying, on the contrary, That he us'd to speak against it with an Emotion beyond what was customary to him. He also affirms, that the very Day before his Death, he had order'd a large Quantity of useful Plate to be brought up from Cashbury, for his use in the Tower; and also of the best Sorts of Wines to be laid in for his drinking; which gave Occasion to Ruffell, and others of the Warders, to tell his Servant, "That tho' the Wines came too late for his Lordship's drinking, they came very seasonably for his Funeral."

The Use made of these two Particulars is to shew, that the Earl was so far from entertaining any Design to destroy himself, that he took all imaginable Precautions, that he might not be destroy'd by others: And that he actually was destroy'd by others, the same Writer not only undertook to prove, in case his then Majesty would grant an Indemnity to three or four Persons, but also to fasten the Murder on some of the principal Persons of his Court. This, however, is rather to be look'd on as the Rage of intemperate Zeal, than the Effect of sober and rational Conviction: For tho' he has taken Abundance of Pains to collect and set forth every Circumstance of every kind, probable, or improbable, that could ever to remotely countenance to hold a Challenge, all that can be deriv'd from the whole is Matter of Suspicion, none of Evidence.

Thus he tells us, that the Gate at the End of those Apartments in the Tower where the Earl, and the rest of the Protestant Prisoners were lodg'd, and which us'd to stand open from Morning to Evening, was that Morning kept close shut, till after the Earl was dead, except when Lord Russell was let out to his Trial: That when one of those Prisoners enquir'd of his Warder the Cause, he receiv'd for Answer, There was special Order given for it: That the Sentinels, who us'd to be reliev'd every two Hours, were that Morning continued on their Posts from Four till about half an Hour after Nine: That the King and Duke having been at the Lieutenant's House, which we are told was about the middle of the Alley where the Earl, &c. were imprison'd, and having stood in a Balcony to see Lord Russell pass by, the Duke, soon after, withdrew from the King, and dispatch'd several Persons from his Side towards the Earl's Lodging, who did not return till they brought News of his Death: That the Sentinels, just mention'd, and other Soldiers, were call'd together on the next Morning, and charg'd by a certain military Officer, on pain of incurring the severest Penalties, not to divulge any one Title of any thing that had been transacted in the Tower the Day before: That this was testify'd by several ally, Injury to his Friends, and the Decadence of all the Good he had done, or could hope for, in the World, and also other Design of a clear Recovery of those irreparable Losses, all together, may make, without a World of religious Fortunes, redemption visible to live. And it becomes no Wonder at all, that no Hope, any Assurance of Pardon, as he might have had, or of any Good in the World, as to him, could ever be in his Mind out of this miserable Dejection which drove him to see his Life, though that Violence as he countenanc'd upon himself. Lawson, p. 495, 496.

I cannot take any leave of what is said of the Matter, in the Excess, without observing, That all the Mentions made by the Lord Keeper of the Great Evidence, tho' he expatiates on the Story, is contain'd in the following Letter: "Nevertheless Bontey went to work afresh, and took a Journey into the Country, with Copies of these intended Depositions of an idle, but more subtle, Girl, of the same Age. And that Mr. North makes no mention of the Girl at all."

(2) Which might be as well to the King's coming thither at that time when of the they should have been reliev'd; and the Hurry of the arising from such an Incident.

"That the Razor, which Bonney swore was the same wherewith the Earl dispatch'd himself, was a small French Razor, of about four Inches and a half long at most, without any Spill or Tongue at the End of the Blade, to keep it steady, which all the English Razors have; that no Proposition in England was more demonstrable, than that such a Razor could not be employ'd to such a Use, unless the Hand and Fingers were grasp'd on full two Inches of the Blade, that, consequently, it was utterly unimaginal, how, with the other two Inches and a half, a Man should inflict on himself, with one Stroke, a Gash or Wound of Four Inches in Depth, and Eight in Length: That the very Razor itself confirm'd the Evidence of the Boy and Girl, in relation to its being thrown out at Window; for at the Point, there was one Gap so large, that it would almost admit the End of a Man's little Finger; from whence, for somewhat more than two Inches, it retain'd its Edge; and the Remainder, to the Handle, was so remarkably notch'd, that some of the Coroners Jury call'd upon the Surgeons to account for it; which one of them undertook to do, by ascribing it to the French-fashion which was in the Hand, by that time it came to the Neck-bone: That old Edwards actually did lose his Place, after Thirty-nine Years of Service in it, for having appear'd in Braddon's Bohell: And that Bonney, who was immediately discharg'd out of the Family by Lady Essex, was admitted into one of the Troops of Horse-guards.

On the other hand, in confirmation of all this, Mr. Ecard cites a Letter from one whom he calls a Person of full Credit and Worth, who had the trust Honour and Respect for that noble Lord; in which are the following Expressions: "There were two or three Pamphlets publish'd, especially one large one by Speke and Braddon, to prove that he was murder'd in the Tower; but I do believe, and I think, I am as sure as I can be of a thing I did not see, that the Earl, in a sudden Transport of Passion, was the Author of his own Death. As soon as his Lady the Countess heard there was a Report of his being murder'd, (for none of the Pamphlets were then publish'd) about four Days after his Death, she sent Mr. with Letters to the Earl of Clarendon, who marry'd the Earl of Essex's Sister, to Sir Henry Capel, afterwards Lord Capel, the Earl's only Brother, and to Dr. Walter Nertham, their Physician and Friend, and desir'd and improv'd us Four to take all Care we could, and to spare no Charge, to enquire fully into that Matter. Accordingly we Four met at Essex-house in St. James's-square, and sent for the Coroners, and several of the Jury, and I myself went to the Tower, to see the Room, and to consider how what they said corresponded; and I must truly say, that every one of us was fully satisfy'd, That it could be done by no body but by himself. And so I dare say was the Countess satisfy'd, and so was Dr. Burnet, tho' he was the Person who gave the Countess the first Notice of the Report of his being murder'd, which gave Beginning to the Enquiry. — We all lov'd and honour'd him so entirely, that if we had found any just Ground of thinking otherwise, we should not have conceal'd it."

Dr. Burnet himself has also yet farther authoriz'd this Letter, by saying in his History, "That as soon as Lady Essex heard of what the Boy and Girl had reported, the order'd a strict Enquiry to be made about it, and sent what she found to me. — When I perus'd all, I thought there was not a Colour to found a Prosecution on; which the world have done with all possible Zeal, if she had found any Appearances of Truth in the Matter."

P. 569.

And Mr. North even proceeds to say, Examen, p. 400. "That the Circumstance of the Earl's falling against the Door of the Closet, and a View of the Closet on the Inside, so far satisfy'd the Committee appointed, after the Revolution, purposely to scrutinize into all the Particulars of the Fact, that they gave over their Enquiry."

These are strong things, and by most Men they will be held satisfactory: But to do Justice to the Subject before us, it ought to be observ'd, as before, in answer to the Letter, that an Examination of the Coroner and his Jury only would neither come up to, nor answer the end of, a strict Enquiry; for it was scarce to be suppos'd, that they would suffer any thing to escape to falsify their own Verdict: That as to Dr. Burnet, he is generally inaccurate as a Writer; and, as a Man, was most easy to be improv'd upon: How widely his Description of the Wound differs from that given by the two Surgeons to the Coroner and his Jury, and by their reported in their Verdict, has been already remark'd in a Note: And even in this very Passage now under Examination, when his Purpose is to make the Earl himself answerable for his own Fate, he most inconsistently endeavours to obtain some Degree of Credit to the Evidence of the Children, by saying, the Girl stood firmly to her Story; and by accounting for the Boy's Tergiversation thus: "But his Father had an Office in the Custom-house; so it was thought he prevail'd with him to deny it in open Court." Whereas the Fact was, "That the Father was earnest to keep

L. D. 1683. the Boy to his first Story; and was not only reprimanded for it in open Court, but actually depriv'd of that very Place; which the Bishop thought he had preserv'd, at the Expence of his Innocence.

But as to what Mr. North advances, with respect to the Lords Committee, Braddon himself says, That they sat, for the most part, twice a Week, from the Beginning of February, 1688-9, to the Middle of May: That, on the 22d of this Month, many Depositions and Examinations taken by the said Committee were read to the House: That (6) three of the four Lords, who compos'd the Committee, being then gone out of Town in his Majesty's Service, the said Papers were order'd to be seal'd up, and left in the Custody of the Clerk: That, on the 26th of October following, the said Committee was re-visit'd: That they again sat for a considerable time twice a Week; and that, before they had digested the great Variety of Matter before them into such a Method as it was thought proper to report it unto the House, a Prorogation took place, and put a final Stop to all Proceedings.

This is, in effect, acknowledging, that those Lords either could not or would not countenance his Proceedings; and it is plain he made it his Business to have the latter believ'd; for he not only publish'd yet other Papers, recapitulating all he had publish'd before, but insinuated, that fresh Proofs had actually arisen to that very Committee: That, in particular, one D. S. Servant to one Holmes, had twice over-heard the Murder of Lord Essex discover'd of by her Mailer and others, before it was committed: That in these Discourses the manner in which it was to be done, the Colour that was to be given it when done, and the Person who directed it, were distinctly specified: That the said Holmes, some time after, abusing his Wife, she not only call'd him a murderous Rogue, but said, she could hang him when she pleas'd, &c. That Lloyd, the Sentinel, having been seiz'd and brought before the Lords Committee, confess'd (in direct contradiction to what he had sworn at Braddon's Trial) that he had, the Morning of the Earl's Death, suffer'd three Men, of whom Webster the Tower Bailiff was one, to go into the said Earl's Lodgings, by the Direction either of Mandary the Warder, or Major Howley: That the said Webster, who was before miserably poor, after this, to overflow'd with Money, that in the Course of one Year, it was computed, that he lost at Play no less than gold, and that his Wife, also, in a Quarrel between them, took occasion to tell him: "He was a Fool, as well as a Rogue, to treat her so, considering he knew it was within her Power to hang him, and one in the Tower." And that one Sir C——, who had first been dispatch'd by the King to take Examinations at the Tower, receiv'd repeated Orders to desist, and to give Notice of the Fact to the Court then sitting at the Old-Bailey on Lord Russell.

Having thus laid all that is material on both Sides fairly and candidly before the Reader, it seems reasonable to conclude from the Whole, as before-hinted, That there were sufficient Grounds to justify Suspicions, and to set on foot Enquiries; but not sufficient Evidence to blast a Government with the Guilt of so horrid a Murder: But then, whereas our Historians tell us, that the King was pleas'd to say with a Sigh, when first arriv'd of the Earl's Death, My Lord of Essex needed not to have despair'd of Mercy; for I lov'd him a Life; Account, p. 147 And again, more solemnly in Print, "That there was no Man in his Dominions more deeply afflicted with the deplorable End of the said Earl than himself, his Majesty having been thereby depriv'd of an extraordinary Opportunity to exercise his Royal Clemency, and to testify to all his loyal Subjects and old Friends, how highly he valued the Memory and Sufferings of the Lord Capel;" nothing is more clear and self-evident, than that the Earl was not within the Reach of Justice, and consequently did not stand in need of Mercy: If all was true that Lord Howard swore against him, Lord Howard was but a single Evidence; and it has never been insinuated, that the Court had any other in reserve: So that all this seeming Gratitude to one dead Man, and Clemency to another, was no more than Parade: And it may be decently question'd, whether the Heir of Lord Capel would have been shewn more Favour, had his Life been forfeited to the Law, than the Heir of the Earl of Southampton, in the Perion of her Husband the Lord Russell.

And now the good Effects of the King's former Declaration in Defence of the sudden Dissolution of the Oxford Parliament being recollected, it was resolv'd to try the same Expedient again, in the Assurance of yet better Success: For Sir William Jones was dead, who put in so thrust a Reply to the last, and the whole Faction lay, without Head or Heart, under the Disgrace of that Treason charg'd upon their Leaders, and the Terror of being involv'd in their Punishment. Such a Paper was accordingly prepar'd, it may be presum'd, by the same Hand who prepar'd the other; and having receiv'd the Sanction of the Cabinet and Privy-Council, was order'd, July the 27th to be made public, not only by the Preis, but by all the Parish Clergy in the Kingdom; who had been found by Experience to be as prompt in their Obedience as a Standing Army. Mr. North speaking of this Paper, says, "It is complete and authentic, having no Syllable express'd, whereof the Sense is not vouch'd by incalculable Proof." But tho' it must be own'd, that it has Truth for its Foundation, it is easy to shew, that a mighty Mass of Fallacies, of every sort, is the Building rais'd upon it. Thus, that a malevolent Party had, by all imaginable Artifices, for a long while together, endeavour'd to make the Government appear as the Preamble of it to forth: That

A. D. 1683. had not only engag'd, but proclaim'd an Impunity to their Adherents: That they had practis'd with such Success on the Affections of the People, that, for a while, the Majority were at their Devotion: That the Over-violence of their Proceedings revers'd the Charm, and once more carry'd over the Majority to the other Side: And that, when dispossest of the Magistracy of London, they meditated to carry their Point by Force of Arms; first, by concerting a general Rising in England, and then in both Kingdoms, in Concurrence with the Earl of Argyle, and other discontented Sects, were Points, that would not admit of Controversy. But then many of the other Particulars grafted upon these, and made the Subject Matter of the same Declaration, threw more of an Inclination to blacken one Part of the People, and to deceive the rest, than to speak the Words of Truth and Sobriety: For the Author of it adopts and authorizes all the horrid things advanc'd by Woff, to merit his Pardon, tho' taken at the Rebound by him, and depos'd but as Hearsay: Such as the Invitation of several Lords to dine in the City, in order to countenance the Assassination, when the News of it should arrive there: The Declaration said to have been prepar'd by Ferguson: The Resolution taken to follow their Blow by a Massacre of all the obnoxious Magistrates of London, and Ministers of State: The several Projects to take off the King and Duke, discourses'd of after that of the Rye had fail'd; which are severally enumerated, even down to that recommended by Gibbons, the Duke of Monmouth's Footman, to be executed from the Earl of Bedford's Garden-Wall; and that founded on the Imagination, that the two Brothers would assist at a Bull-feast in Red-lion Fields. He also, by Craft, fastens the Guilt and Scandal of all these desperate Projects on the Malcontent Lords (who are chargeable with the Rising only) in these Words (c): "During all this time, the principal Conspirators were managing their other Design for a general Insurrection in both Kingdoms." And again in the general List of Conspirators, which we find crowded into the same Piece; the Names of Goodenough, Rumbald, &c. follow in Train after that of the Duke of Monmouth, that the negligent Reader may be farther induc'd to believe, that all were alike engag'd in the same wicked Designs: And even that the more circumspect might be perplex'd, at least, in their Conclusions, Ferguson is plac'd between the Assassins on one hand, and the English and Scottish Lords and Gentlemen on the other, as the common Hinge on which the several Conspiracies turn'd.

At the same time, also, with this Declaration, a new Form of Prayer was compos'd, and appointed to be read in all Churches; that Religion, itself, as well as the Teachers of it, might be made an Implement of State; and that in their most solemn Acts of Devotion to the Lord and Father of the World, Men might be sharpen'd and embitter'd against one-another; for such is the Tendency of the Thanksgiving Clauses contain'd in it; as may be seen from that which follows: "We yield unto thee, from the very Bottom of our Hearts, unfeign'd Thanks and Praise for the late signal and wonderful Deliverance of our most gracious Sovereign, his Royal Brother, and loyal Subjects of all Orders and Degrees by the FANATIC Rage and Treachery of wicked and ungodly Men, appointed as Sheep to the Slaughter, in a most barbarous and savage manner."

To close on this Head, the Declaration was appointed to be read twice in the Churches, that it might make the deeper Impression, viz. on Sunday, September the 2d, and the Sunday following, which was the Day appointed for the Thanksgiving; and which, we are told by Mr. Ecard, was celebrated in so extraordinary a manner, and with such mighty Pomp and Magnificence, that there was hardly a little Parish in England, that was not at considerable Expence to testify their great Joy and Satisfaction.

The same Author also acknowledges, That the ill Success of the Whig Party, and the general Belief of the new Conspiracy, made the Tories ride in Triumph this Year, and occasion'd the Straining, and, perhaps, not sufficiently explaining the Points of Prerogative and Subjection. They now alleg'd, 'That the Discovery of the Plot had decid'd the Argument, and had shewn the Necessity of Passive Obedience.' And accordingly it seem'd equally espous'd by the Court, the Pulpit, the Bench, and the Bar. And, besides the Arguments brought from the Laws of God, and those of the Land, the Humour of the People carry'd it to that Height, that it was dangerous, or at least unfashionable, to oppose it. Under the Impulse of this increasing Zeal, the University of Oxford made a solemn Decree, which pass'd in the Convocation there, on the same Day of the Execution of the Lord Russel, and presented it to the King under this Title: The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford, pass'd in their Convocation, on July 21, 1683, against certain pernicious Books, and damnable Doctrines, destructive to the Sacred Persons of Princes, their State and Government, and of all Human Society. In which Decree they formally condemn'd twenty-seven Propositions, collected out of several modern Authors, as Bucanan, Bellarmino, Milton, Dolman, Hobbs, Goodwin, Owen, Baxter, Jenkins, Goodman, Julian, Protestant Reconciler, &c. Which Propositions they declar'd to be, 'False, seditious, and impious; and most of them heretical and blasphemous, infamous

An unchristian and unsafe Passage in the Form of Prayer on that occasion.

(c) There is another Passage in this Piece, which begins thus: "While the Design was forming (of the Rising) James were likewise carrying on that horrid and execrable Plot of assassination." &c. This Mr. North, it seems, did not think sufficiently pointed, and therefore, in his Epitome of it, he gives it the following Turn: "Whilst this depended, another Pack of Filibusters apply'd to that execrable Design." &c. Examen, p. 376.

And the Books from whence they were taken were at the same time order'd to be burnt in the public Court of the Schools. It ought to be added, That the Propositions thus solemnly condemn'd by that learn'd Body, were of various kinds; some being the Work of Politicians, and some of Enthusiasts: That as to what regards the Latter, viz. That Dominion is founded in Grace: That the Powers of this World are Usurpations upon the Prerogative of Christ: That the Presbyterian Government is the Stepter of Christ's Kingdom; to which Kings, as well as others, are bound to submit, &c. the Decree will justify itself: And that as to what regards the Former, viz. That all Civil Authority is deriv'd from the People: That if lawful Governors become Tyrants, they forfeit their Right of governing: That the King of England has but a co-ordinate Power with the other two Estates: That Birth-right and Proximity of Blood give no Title to rule: That there lies no Obligation on Christians to Passive-Obedience, &c. we shall find that learn'd Body stand self-condemn'd upon their own Decree, by their own subsequent Actions.

The King regulates the Government of the City.

Thus countenanc'd, flatter'd, and supported by the Lawyers on one Side, and the Divines on the other; and not only declar'd, but become absolute Master of the Liberties of his People, in consequence of the late rash Efforts which had been made for their Defence, it is not to be wonder'd at, that the King continu'd to insist, That the Citizens of London should not only submit to his new Regulations, but actually sign their Submission. And, on the other hand, it is scarce to be wonder'd at enough, considering the Turn which the Humour of the People had taken, and the Terror which now accompany'd the Commands of the Crown, that the Majority of them should still have Firmness enough remaining to persist in their Refusal; and that they should rather chuse to leave the City at the Will and Pleasure of his Majesty, as the Law had deliver'd it up, than warrant the Surrender by their own Act and Deed. The Liveries, however, at least such as attended, confirm'd the Lord-Mayor's Sheriff, as they were requir'd, and chose another of the same Stamp for his Colleague; not indeed at the usual Time, nor in the usual Way; for instead of the 24th of June, the Choice was now made on the 5th of September, and that without any Opposition; or, as Mr. Echard chuses to express himself, with the ancient Gravity and Moderation; not such riotous and factious Heats and Animosities as of late Years: And whereas the Right of electing their Mayor was now no longer in the Citizens, the King, perhaps, for the more ample Manifestation of his Power, suffer'd Mischmet-Day, on which the Election us'd to be made, to elapse; and on the 4th of October following, having order'd the Attendance of Sir William Pritchard, who had almost completed his Year, and the two new Sheriffs at the Council-Board, the Former there receiv'd his Majesty's Commission in Form, to continue in the City-Chair during Pleasure; and the two Latter, the like, to act as Sheriffs, in confirmation of the Suffrages of the People. His Majesty, also yet farther exerted his new Authority, by displacing Treby the Recorder, and substituting one Jennour in his Room, whom he, at the same time, knighted; that in State and Title, at least, he might not be inferior to his Predecessor: And, to complete the Reform of the City, sixteen of the old Aldermen, who were after the King's own Heart (having been first depriv'd of the Honours they had receiv'd from their Fellow-Citizens, and perhaps, oblig'd to attend the Lord Mayor at his Chapel, on the Sunday following, in their common Clothes, as if on purpose to denote their Severity and Dependency, while his Lordship and the two Sheriffs, on the Strength of the King's Commission, appear'd in Fur and Scarlet, as the sole Magistrates of the City) were dubb'd Justices of the Peace by one Commission, and Aldermen by another; together with eight other loyal Worthies to perfect the Set, who had the Honour to be inducted into the Seats of Allen, Frederick, Lawrence, Clayton, Ward, Sbrter, Gold, and Cornish, who were all turn'd out for lying under the horrid Suspicion of loving their Country better than their King.

While the King was thus at the Height of his real Power and imagin'd Glory, the Nation was amus'd with the Marriage of the Lady Anne, the Duke's second Daughter by his former Duchess, to the Brother of the King of Denmark; which, according to Mr. Echard, was the King's own Act, against the Inclination, Design, and Interest of his Royal Highness; and also, that it was highly acceptable to his Subjects: Whereas Bishop Burnet, [Vol. I. 562.] on the contrary, affirms, "That it did not at all please the Nation; for it was known the Proposition came from France, and apprehended that both Courts were sure he would change his Religion." As to the Sentiments of the Public on this Occasion, it is reasonable to think the former of these reverend Authors was most in the right: For the People were now in a Disposition to like any thing the King lik'd: And that she was not married to an actual Papiſt, could not fail to be represented and allow'd as a new Proof of his Majesty's cordial Attachment to the Religion of his Country: But then, if the Motion of this Marriage came from France, no Doubt can be made but that the Duke was in the Secret, and had his Reasons for approving it. Possibly his Royal Highness had already plac'd his Hopes on the Fruits of his second Marriage, and therefore was become the more indifferent as to the Disposal of those of his first: And, possibly, this other Protestant Alliance was given way to, that the People might grow into a more full and firm Persuasion, That they had nothing to apprehend from a Popish Successor. It may be collected yet farther, that this Lady had been all along destin'd to a Protestant Prince, and that the Court of France had consented to it, with the Proviso, that they might have the naming the Person. It was on this Errand the Prince of Hanover had come over some time before: And tho' Bishop Burnet intimates, that he was recall'd by his Father for the sake of marrying him to the Princess of Zell, his first Cousin, it is elsewhere insinuated, that the Lady had not the good Fortune to please him; and that, like other great Ladies, she never forgot or forgave the Affront to her dying Day.

We are now to proceed with the Prosecution of the Plot, which, in a manner, slept from the End of July to the Beginning of November: And in that Interval, Sir Francis Pemberton had his Quietus, as the Gazette bears witness. And Sir George Jeffreys, who had shewn such an outrageous Zeal against the Conspirators, was made Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench in his stead. And how well qualify'd he was for the Post at this particular Crisis, let the Reader judge by the Character given of him by his Contemporaries, as well as his own brutal Deemeanour, of which we have already had a

[l. p. 567.] Specimen in the Case of Braddon. Says Bishop Burnet, "All People were apprehensive of very black Designs when they saw Jeffreys made Lord-Chief Justice, who was scandalously vicious, and was drunk every Day; besides, a Drunkenness of Fury in his Temper that look'd like Enthusiasm. He did not consider the Decencies of his Post; nor did he so much as affect to seem impartial, as became a Judge; but run out, upon all Occasions, into Declamations that did not become the Bar, much less the Bench. He was not learn'd in his Profession; and his Eloquence, tho' viciously copious, was neither correct nor agreeable." And even Mr. North, with whom implicit Loyalty and flaming Zeal ought ever to have pass'd for Righteousness, hath given Posterity his Portrait in the following glowing Colours: "His Friendship and Conversation lay much among the Good Fellows and Humourists; and his Delights were all the Extravagancies of the Bottle.--- No Friendship or Dearness could be so great in private, that he would not use (d) ill, and to an extravagant Degree in Public.--- Those above, or that could hurt or benefit him, and none else, might depend on fair Quarter at his Hands.--- His Weakness was, that he could not reprehend without scolding, and in such (e) Billingsgate Language as should not come out of the Mouth of any Man. He call'd it, giving a Lick with the rough Side of his Tongue.--- He seem'd to lay nothing of his Business to Heart, nor care what he did or left undone." But then the same Writer also says, "When he was in Temper, and Matters indifferent came before him, he became his Seat of Justice better than any other I ever saw in his Place. He took a Pleasure in mortifying fraudulent Attornies, and would deal forth his Severities with a sort of Majesty. He had extraordinary natural Abilities, but little acquir'd beyond what Practice in Affairs had supply'd."

These are, however, the mildest Features of this thorough-pac'd Inquisitor, who was, in truth, rather a Fury than a Judge; and fitter to let loose military Execution, than to give Authority to the Laws. The Rage and Violence he had shewn in the late Prosecutions, were apparently the Grounds of his Preference. It was from thence concluded, that he would stick at nothing; and whoever had any Remains of Conscience, or Decency, would have been held, for that Reason, unqualify'd. It is therefore so much the more strange, to find a profess'd Historian treating of his Promotion to the King's-Bench, as a mere chance-medley Affair. "Before the chief and oldest of the State-Prisoners, (says Mr. Echard) Colonel Sydney, was brought to his Trial, there happen'd a considerable Change in Westminster-hall; the celebrated Sir George Jeffreys was made Lord-Chief-Justice, &c." The Matter of Fact, in brief, is this: There was much dirty Work to be done, and he offer'd his Service. Pemberton had neither the Grace to keep strictly to what was right, nor the Resolution to go all Lengths in what was wrong. Jeffreys had no Scruples but such as rose from his Concern for himself; and provided he kept himself on Horseback, car'd not who he rid over.

His first Expedient was try'd on the noble Colonel Sydney, who had been kept in the Tower ever since the middle of July, not from any merciful Consideration, but for want of Methods and (f) Instruments to take him off. And both being now found, he was brought up to the Bar of the King's Bench, November the 7th, and indicted, "for contriving to stir up War and Rebellion against the King, in order to subvert the Government, depose his Majesty, and put him to Death; to which Ends he had assisted at several Consultations, &c. had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland to invite thither several evil-dispos'd Subjects of that Kingdom to assist also at the said Consultations; and had compos'd a traitorous Libel, in which is contain'd as followeth in these English Words, viz, "The Power originally in the People of England is delegated to the Parliament, He (the most Serene Lord, Charles the Second, now King of England, MEANING) is subject to the Law of God, as He is a Man to the People, that makes him a King, inasmuch as He is a King, &c." In this manner,

ney.*

(d) Thus we are told, that when he was Chancellor, a Pension coming before him against a certain City-Attorney who had been greatly instrumental in bringing him into Business; in which Affidavit was made, That when the said Attorney was haizen'd with being brought to answer for his Conduct before the Lord-Chancellor; and that in a sort of Contempt he reply'd, My Lord Chancellor! If by I made him; he cry'd out immediately, This will I lay my Maker by the Heels; and committed the Man without Mercy.

(e) It was ordinary to hear him say, says the same Author, Go, you are a filthy, lazy, stinking Rascal.

(f) Bishop Burnet affirms, (vol. i. p. 567.) That great Pains were taken to find out more Witnesses: That Pardons and Rewards were offer'd very freely; but that none came in; which made it evident, that nothing was so well laid, or brought to near Execution, as the Witnesses had depos'd, or that, otherwise, People would have been crowding for their Pardons.

A. D. 1683. in these very Words, with this very Pointing, with this unfair Intendo, is this traitorous Passage, as 'tis call'd, quoted in the Indictment; at least, so it stands in the first Edition of the printed Trial, from whence we derive our Authority.

The whole of it was long, confused, verbose, and overflowing with Invective; and he that was least fond of living, would grudge to dye by so vile a Tool. The Colonel, instead of pleading, offer'd to shew, that it was impossible to plead sensibly to such a Jumble of Things, distinct both in Nature and in Law: And, moreover, made a Tender of a special Plea; but withdrew it on being told by the Court, That he must either plead or demur; and that his Life depended on the Validity of his Plea, or rather on the Sentence that should be pass'd upon it. Mr. Williams, 'his Council, however, prompted him to rely upon it; which being complain'd of by the Attorney-General, he was reprimand'd by the Lord Chief-Justice for his Pains. In this Distraction, and with a sort of Protest against the Constraint put upon him, he pleaded, Not guilty: After which he desir'd a Fortnight's time to prepare himself for his Trial; which was granted. He also contended strongly for a Copy of his Indictment, and the Benefit of Council; but both were refus'd; not as the arbitrary Decree of the Court, but the Dictate of the Law.

Nevertheless on the 21st, when the Prisoner was again brought up, in order to his Trial, in Justification of his Demand of a Copy of the Indictment, he produc'd the Statute of the 46 Edw. III. wherein is express'd, that tout Parties, & tout Gentes, that is, all People should have a Copy of every Record, as well against the King as others: In answer to which, the Lord Chief-Justice quoted the Rule of Court in Sir Henry Vane's Case, and also that of Lord Ruffel; in both which it was the Voice of all the Bench. That no Copy of the Indictment, or any Part of it, should be granted, except Matter of Law was shewn; Colonel Sydney reply'd with a Question, Is this a good Law, my Lord? and was silenc'd with a Rule of Court, and a thundering Command to arraign him on the Indictment, accompany'd with this Remonstrance, We must not spend time in Discourses to captivate the People.

The Names of the Jury being then call'd over, the Prisoner excepted to several for not being Freeholders: But his Exception was over-ruled; it must be presum'd arbitrarily; for this Trial was in Middlesex, and therefore it could not be alleg'd, as in Lord Ruffel's Case, That want of Freehold in a City was no Challenge.

To pass over the Harangues of the King's Council, as so much envenom'd Air, West being call'd upon by Mr. North (the Examiner) to open the Evidence with an Account of what he knew concerning a general Insurrection, the Colonel interpos'd with these significant Words, What he knows concerning ME; which made way for such a Recrimination, from the Bench, as ought to have deter'd all Parties from setting ill Precedents for the future, for fear of setting a Snare for themselves: For the Lord Chief-Justice, tho' he declar'd, in the same Breath, that no Evidence should be given but what ought to be given; and afterwards, if such were given, it should not affect the Prisoner, immediately refer'd to the Authority of Sir William Jones, and his manner of conducting the several Prosecutions of the Papist Plotters, which had ever been by leading the Court into the Business, by such a Summary of the general Charge as was now requir'd. Possibly the Colonel, himself, was shock'd at this Recollection, for he made no Reply: And Mr. North, taking Advantage of his Silence, renew'd his Question: West began his Narrative, and proceeded smoothly on with it, till he came to mention what Nelbrop had told him concerning the Prisoner at the Bar. On which Occasion, the Colonel rous'd himself again, and would have interrupted him, but was not permitted. So West went on with his Hearsay, which was, "That the said Nelbrop had told him, that Mr. Sydney had sent Smith to Scotland with Letters to invite certain Scottish Gentlemen to Town, under a Pretence of making a Settlement in Carolina: That Smith afterwards return'd, together with the said Gentlemen: That Ferguson told him what pass'd at the Negotiation; which, however, came to nothing, because the Money demanded by the Scots could not be comply'd with, because the Prisoner at the Bar and Major Wildman insisted on declaring for a Commonwealth; which the Scots said their Nobility would not, for the present, agree to, tho' in time they possibly might; and that as to the Prisoner, in particular, he knew nothing.

Ramsay follow'd West; and the Amount of what he had to say was, That the said West and Goodenough had told him, that there was a Council of Six, of whom Col. Sydney was one, who were busy in promoting an Insurrection, in concert with the Scots: And it is remarkable; that, being chid by the Court for not delivering what he had to say in such home Expressions as they expected from him, he defended himself by saying, that West, who had heard this from Lord Howard, and who had retail'd it to him, was fitter to tell his own Story than he; whereas West himself speaks after Nelbrop, and never mentions Lord Howard at all.

Keyling made his Entrance next; who, after a slight Mention of the three Papers he had receiv'd from Goodenough, and of some Discourse with him on the Use he was to make of them, in raising Men, depos'd, That he had heard the said Goodenough say, that Colonel Sydney was to have a considerable Part in the Management of that Affair.

All this, it seems, was mere Preface and Introduction; even the very Bench had the Grace to acknowledge as much: But then, as Colonel Sydney complain'd, it prepos'd the Jury notwithstanding; and, for that reason, had the Trial been any thing more than mere Matter of Form, so unfair a Proceeding would never have been allow'd.

But

Hearsay Evidence against him by West.

A. D. 1685.

Lord How-
ard's Evidence.

But now the Arrow was drawn to the Head, and level'd directly at the Mark; for to the Attorney-General intimated, when Lord Howard was call'd upon, to declare his Knowledge of the Prisoner's Concern in the Affair of a general Rising; who, after a solemn Profanation of the sacred Name of Truth, by way of bespeaking a due Regard to what he had to say, enter'd on his Detail of the Establishment of a Council of Six, &c. but with several Additions, Improvements, and Embellishments: As, in particular, that the Duke of Monmouth, Colonel Sydney and himself, were the first Contrivers of that Establishment: That the Duke undertook for the Lord Russell and the Earl of Salisbury, and the Colonel for the Earl of Essex and Mr. Hampden: That Mr. Hampden open'd the first Session, which was held at his House between the Middle and the latter End of January, with a set Speech; That it was impossible to be exact in reciting every Particular advanc'd by every Person; but that, in the general, Magazines were discours'd of, and Money to procure them: That the Duke of Monmouth urg'd, that 25,000, or 30,000l. would be necessary for that Purpose: That, at the second Meeting held at Lord Russell's, about a (g) Fortnight or three Weeks after, Mr. Hampden somewhat disconcerted the Company (who, he insinuated, were not all bound for the same Part, tho' embark'd in the same Bottom) by another Speech, in which he endeavour'd to shew the Expediency of laying down the Principles on which their Design was founded, and the Ends they had in View; which, it seems, he was of opinion ought to be submitted to the Authority of Parliament; and that, tho' this founded a little harshly to some that were present, (meaning, it must be presum'd, the Duke of Monmouth) it was confuted to. About these new Discoveries, his Lordship fell into his old Track again, and depos'd, as before, that the great Question of the Day turn'd on sending a special Messenger to the discontented Scots (some of whom he casually nam'd; as the Lord Melvin, Sir John Cockran, Commisary Mears, and two Campbells) and that the Prisoner was the Man who recommended Smith to be that special Messenger. Here his Lordship came to a full Stop, saying, "This is ALL that occurs to me, that was (done) at the second Meeting, and they are the only Consults I was at." And this ALL made up wretched a Figure after so pompous an Introduction, that the Attorney-General found it necessary to use his utmost Dexterity in prompting, under the Guise of asking Questions: Accordingly he first ask'd, What Smith was to do (in Scotland must be understood)? And receiv'd for Answer, Nothing but to carry a Letter, which he suppos'd was writ by Lord Russell; and in which, the Business of Carolina was the only thing mention'd. This made bad worse. The bare Recommending a Person to carry a Letter, which appear'd

to be no more than a common Letter of Business, which another Person had wrote, and with which that other Person had never been charg'd, tho' a Martyr in the said Cause, fell to those of the dreadful Matters laid in the Indictment, that the Attorney-General found it yet farther necessary to ask, "To what Purpose these Sectis Gentlemen were to come up?" And his Lordship, the Evidence, now sensible of the Error he had committed, and the Reparation expected from him, return'd for answer, "That it was to found the Temper of the Scots: And what Opportunities there were, or might be, of putting them into a Commotion; to learn how Men might be rais'd; what Use might be made of Argyle; and so to adjust things, that the two Parties might, in all things, draw together. He also threw in, That he was with Colonel Sydney when he took out several Guineas, he suppos'd about sixty, which he, Sydney, said were to give Smith. Whether he gave them to him or no, continu'd he, I don't know; but after that he was sent." Who told you so? again interpos'd the Attorney: Colonel Sydney, reply'd the noble Evidence: And here the Solicitor-General, thinking to skrew the Instrument yet one Note higher, ask'd, Whether he knew that Smith did go? But the Experiment did not answer; for his Lordship most untowardly reply'd, That he knew nothing but by Hearsay from Colonel Sydney: Whereupon the very Bench thought it of Consequence to lend a helping Hand; the Lord Chief-Justice, himself, asking, Whether he, Howard, understood by the Discourse after Smith was gone, that he went in pursuance of that Debate? And Mr. Justice Withins (the Abborrer) Whether Colonel Sydney was the Person who undertook to send him? To both which Questions, his Lordship, the Evidence, answer'd like a Man who was resolv'd to deserve his Pardon. Here therefore the Matter was brought to a due Bearing; and here, for that Reason, it was suffer'd to rest; the Lord Chief-Justice indicating to the King's Council, that they could not stop in a better time, by demanding of the Prisoner, Whether he would ask Lord Howard any Questions? Which is never done till an Evidence is clos'd. As to the Colonel's Reply to this Demand, it was in these Words: "I have no Questions to ask him." And this the Attorney was pleas'd to interpret into a Confession of Guilt, by saying, Silence, — you know the Proverb: Whereas, in Truth, it was rather a strong Expression of Disdain and Contempt for the Man, whom he held to be too infamous to be parley'd with.

Sir Andrew Foster, and Atterbury the Messenger, being then sworn, the Former depos'd, that all the Sectis Gentlemen nam'd by Lord Howard, except Lord Melvin, actually did come to Town under the Carolina-Pretext: And that, on the Rumour of a Discovery, all but Mears absconded: And the Latter, that he

he was sent for into the City to seize Campbell and Cockran; and that the Common Serjeant had taken them, before he got thither, as they were endeavouring to make their Escape in a Boat.

The Libel found in his Study.

This was all the Evidence against the Prisoner, as to the Conspiracy: And to make up Weight, the Attorney spake as follows: "Now to shew that Wright this Emilia (Smith) was in Scotland, at the SAME TIME the Colonel (which will be another Overt-Act of Treason) son) was WRITING a treasonable Pamphlet." He then call'd Sir Philip Lloyd, the Clerk of the Council, to prove, that he, being sent with a Warrant to seize Mr. Sydney's Papers, found the said Pamphlet lying on his Table. After which, three Persons testify'd, That they believ'd it to be of the Colonel's own Hand-writing: And, finally, to shew it was a treasonable Pamphlet, that Section was read in Court at full (b) length; which was to partially and corruptly insinuate in the Indict-

(b) And it is proper to do the same here, (as well as a vicious Copy will give leave) not only for the better understanding Mr. Sydney's Case, but because it is no Part of that Book of his own Government, which hath since been publish'd, as some have inconsiderately thought:

"Secondly, There was no Absurdity in this, tho' it was their own Case; but the contrary, because it was their own Case; that is, concerning themselves only, and they had no Superior: They only were the competent Judges: They decid'd their Controversies, as every Man in an own Family doth, such as arise between him, and his Children, and his Servants. This Power hath no other Restriction, than what is put upon it by the municipal Law of the Country, where that hath no other Force over any Man, than as he is understood to have consented unto it. Thus in England every Man (as a Magistrate) hath a Right of chastising them, and in many Places (even by the Law of God) the Magistrate hath a Power of Life and Death over his Subjects. It is not a fault abroad to say, that a Man might be put away, or, in some Places, kill an adulterous Wife, a disobedient Son, or an insubordinate Servant, because he is a Party and Judge for the Cause death of another, unless he had abrogated his own Right, by coming into a Society, whose other Rules are agreed upon, and a superior Judge constituted, there to be sole Judge between King and People. The People must needs be the Judge of Things happening between them and him, whom they did not constitute, that he might be more glorious, and rich; but that he might judge them, and fight their Battles; or otherwise do good unto them, as they should direct. In this Sense, he that is Magistrate ought to be obey'd by every Man, in his just and lawful Commands, tending to the public Good; but must be forc'd to do nothing against it, nor in any respect more than the Law doth allow.

For this Reason Brutus saith, that the King hath three Superiors, he wit, Deus, Ages, et parlamentum; that is, the Power originally in the People of England is delegated unto the Parliament. He is subject unto the Law of God, as he is a Man; and to the People that makes him a King, in so much as he is a King; the Law sets a Measure unto that Subjection, and the Parliament judges of the particular Causes thereupon arising; he is not more content to submit his Interest unto them, than he is more than any man of them, in any other respect than that he is, by the Consent of all, raised above any other.

If he doth not rise to this Condition, he may renounce the Crown; but if he receive it upon that Condition, (as all Magistrates do the Power they receive) and swear to perform it, he must expect that the Performance will be exacted, or Revenge taken by those that he hath betray'd.

If this be not so, I desire to know of our Author, how one or more Men can come to be guilty of Treason against the King, as Lucifer saith to Belzebub. No Man can owe more unto him, than unto any other, or be answerable other Men, by any Rule, but the Law; and if he meet our be Judge in his own Case, neither he, nor any other, by Power received from him, would ever try any Man for an Offence against him, or the Law.

If the King, or such as he appoints, cannot judge him, he cannot be the Jury to condemn the Master, and, if he or other, by Authority from him, may judge, he is Judge in his own Case, and we fall under that which he accuses the utmost of all Absurdities. If a Remedy be found for this, he must say, that the King in his own Case may judge the People, but the People must not judge the King, because it is shewn that it is to try, the Servants, entrusted by the Master, not more than that the Master must not judge the Servant, whose task is only for his own Life. The Magistrate is bound by no Oath of Obedience to the People that created him; but the People is bound to its own Creator, the Magistrate.

This means to be the Ground of all our Author's Follies; he cannot comprehend, that Magistrates are for or by the People; that makes him conclude, as if Nations were created by one for the Glory or Pleasure of Magistrates; and, affected by such a Piece of Nonsense, it ought not to be thought strange, if he represent as an absurd thing, that the Magistrate may make off the Yoke when they please. But I would know, how the Magistrate comes under the Yoke, that is, a Bridge of Slavery? He says, that the Power of Kings is for the Persecution of Liberty and Property. We may therefore charge or take away Kings, without breaking any Yoke; or that made a Yoke, which ought not to be one: The Injury is therefore in making or imposing, and there can be none in breaking it.

[That if there be not an Injury, there may perhaps be an Inconvenience, if the headless Multitude may break off the Yoke.] I know not why the Multitude should be considered to be insensible: it was not always so. Melchior was Head of the Multitude that went out of England; Oliver led them against the King of Spain; and the Conduct of Edward they oblied a Viceroy against the Maldives; they had the like Success under Shangor, Beloe, Gilboa, Japhtha, Samson, Tamath, and others, against Assurians, Mediterrans, Phoenicians, and others; the Multitude that opposed Raul and Abraham had David for its Head; and the ten's ribes, that revolted from David, made themselves Jeroboam; the Absolution, if they against the Shir Pharao, had Moses for their chief Guide; — from David were conducted by Abigail; when the Romans drove out the Tarpens, they chose Brutus and Publius; and they drove out the Danones under Horatius and Fabius. All the Multitudes that afterwards revolted from them under Mauritius, Tiberius, Spertax, and others, were not headed; and we know of some that were, but all others found Heads to make them. The Greeks led up Demetrius; the Britains and others, in like Times, — — — the English; that rebel against James the cruel, and the Lord of Arden more.

The People, when they grew weary of the corrupted Races of Pharao and Pope, and the same Pope and King Charles — the Scots, when they flew James III, had his Son to be their Head; and when they depos'd and imprison'd Queen Mary, the Earl of Morey, and others supply'd the Want of a Head that was in her Son. And in all the Revolutions we have had in England, the People have been headed by the Parliament, or the Nobility and Gentry, that came in; and when the Kings fell off their Duties, by their own Authority call'd in. The Multitude therefore is not ever headless, but doth either add or create Heads unto itself, as occasion doth require; and whether it be one Man, or a few, or more, for a short or a longer time, we see nothing more than what is Abraham. But they may say, that our Author, broke off the Yoke. And why may they not, if it prove uneasy, or hurtful unto them? Why should not the Magistrate break off the Yoke of Pharao, Ages, and others that oppressed them?

When Pharao had changed Nehemias into a Beast, what should he do, but drive him out amongst Beasts, until God had restored unto him the Heart of a Man? When Yan had had turn'd the legal Authority of Rome into a most detestable Tyranny, why should they not abolish it? And when the Pretensions of the Law Contract were so grievously oppos'd by the Power of Spain, under the proud, cruel, and savage Cardinal of the Duke of Alva, why should they not make use of all the Means that God had put into their Hands for their Deliverance? Let any Man who sees the present State of the Pretensions that thus oppress themselves, judge, whether it is better for them to be as they are, or in the Condition men which the Party of God has reduced them, unless they had to thank him, renounced God and their Religion. Our Author may say, they ought to have suffer'd. The King of Spain by their Resistance had ruin'd their Country; and that they ought not to have been Judges in their own Case. To which I answer, That by refusing, they laid the Foundation of many Churches, that have sustained Millions of Souls, and many of God's Grace; and establish'd a most glorious and happy Commonwealth, that hath been since the beginning, the strongest Pillar of the Protestant Cause now in the World; and a Place of Refuge unto those who in all Parts of Turkey have been oppress'd for the Name of Christ: Whereas they had finally, and, I think I may say, wickedly as well as foolishly, renounced themselves to be Slaves; if they had left those happy Protestants under the Power of Armadilla, where the Name of God is so otherwise known than to be blasphemed.

If the King of Spain desired to keep his Subjects, he should have govern'd them with more Justice and Mercy; when, contrary unto all Laws both human and divine, he seeks to destroy

The People have been so often oppress'd, that it is probably a Question from Pharao, though not to be answered.

Indictment: By which it appear'd that the whole Book was so far from being calculated to answer any present End, that it was only a controversial Discourse, in answer to Falmer, containing Matters merely hypothetical, and no more applicable to the particular Reign of Charles the Second, except by the Torture of Innuendoes, than that of Henry the Eighth. And as to the Passage so inhumanly mangled, and vilely prostituted in the said Indictment, when fairly pointed and restor'd to its original Sense, it is no more than an innocent Comment on the Words of the old Lawyer Braithem, and sounds simply thus: "The People must needs be Judge of things happening between them and him (their King) whom they did not constitute, that he might be great, glorious, and rich, but that he might judge them, and fight their Battles; or, otherwise, do good to them, as they should direct. In this Sense, he that is Singulis Major, ought to be obey'd by every Man in his just and lawful Commands, tending to the Public Good; but must be suffer'd to do nothing against it, nor in any respect more than the Law doth allow. For this Reason Braithem says, That the King hath three Superiors, to wit, Deum, Legem, & Parliamentum; that is, the Power originally in the People of England is delegated to the (*) Parliament. He is subject to the Law of God as he is a Man; to the People that makes him a King, inasmuch as he is a King. The Law sets a Measure to that Subjection, and the Parliament judges of the particular Cases thereupon arising. He must be content to submit his Interest to theirs, since he is no more than any one of them, in any other respect, than that he is, by the Consent of all, rais'd above any other. If he doth not like this Condition, he may renounce the Crown: But if he receive it upon that Condition (as all Magistrates do the Power they receive) and swear to perform it, he must expect that the Performance will be exacted, or Revenge taken by those that he hath betray'd."

The Reading being dispatch'd, the Sheets were handed to the Prisoner, under the Presence of Favour, that he also might select such Passages as he thought of force to explain away the imputed Maliginity of those refer'd to by the Attorney; but, in Reality, that he might say or do something that would prove him to be the Author of them in the Face of the Court: The Chief-Justice, unfairly and ungenerously, saying, I perceive you have dispos'd them under certain Heads; so what Heads will you have read? But the Colonel discern'd the Snare, and prudently avoided it by replying, Let him give an account of it that did it. Finding, therefore, that the Stratagem did not take effect, the Attorney clos'd his Evidence with the Record of Lord Ruffel's Conviction; which, as Sir John Hawker well observes, was of no more Authority against Mr. Sydney, than the Story of Lord Essex's Death against Lord Ruffel.

The Colonel was now left to his Defence, and having been told, that he was indicted on that Branch of the old Statute of 25 Edw. III. which related to the conspiring and compassing the Death of the King, all'd, with a good deal of Scorn and Derision, Whether a Paper, found in his Study, of Ness and Carligula, was a Proof that he had conspir'd and compass'd the Death of the King? After which, descending to Particulars, tho' in a rhapsodical way, as Matters occur'd to his Memory, or as Indignation inspir'd him, he insinuat'd, That the conspiring to levy War, and to compass the Death of the King, were two distinct things: That the latter only was Treason: That in either Case two Witnesses were necessary: That of a Conspiracy to kill the King, nothing had been said: That as to the Point of conspiring to levy War, it was attested only by Lord Howard, against whose Credibility he had much to say: That it appear'd the Select Council he talk'd of were selected by no Man in the World: That these Six were Strangers to each other: That, for his own Part, he had never spoke to the Duke of Monmouth above three times in his Life: That one of those times was when Lord Howard, himself, had brought the said Duke to his House, having cozen'd them both, by telling the Duke, that he, the Colonel, had invited him; and by telling the Colonel, his Grace had invited himself: That it was utterly improbable, that Men scarce knowing one-another, should enter at once into such Consultations as were laid to their Charge, unless they were mad: That Lord Howard's Depositions now did not agree with what he had depos'd against Lord Ruffel: That he had alter'd Dates and Circumstances: That he had made several Additions: That he had accus'd himself of divers Treasons: That he had not receiv'd his Pardon for any: That he was under the Terror of those Treasons and the Punishment of them: That he had shewn himself to be under those Terrors by saying, That he could not get his Pardon, till he had done some other Jobs, and till the Drudgery of swearing was over: Meaning, That he was to earn his Indemnity by destroying others: That, according to the Law of God and Man, this ought to destroy his Testimony: That he was, besides, his Debtor for a considerable Sum: That his Mortgage was forfeited: That when he, deliver those he ought to have preserv'd, he can blame none but himself, if they deliver themselves from his Tyranny: And when the Matter is brought to that, That he shall not reign, or they over whom he would reign must perish, the Matter is already decided, as if the Question had been ask'd, in the time of Nero or Domitian, Whether they should be left at liberty to destroy the best Part of the World, as they endeavour'd to do, or it should be refus'd by their Destruction? And as for the People's being Judges in their own Case; it is plain, they ought to be the only Judges, because it is their own, and only concerns themselves.

he, the Prisoner, should have taken the advantage the Law gave him, the Evidence found out a Way to have him laid up in the Tower: That his Lordship was a very subtil Man; for as at Lord Railiff's Trial he said, he was to carry his Knife between the Faring and the Apple, so in this he had so manag'd, as to get his Pardon, and save his Estate: That he came to his (Sydney's) House, soon after he was made a Prisoner, and swore to his Servant, in the Presence of God, that he did not believe there was any Plot; as also, that he was confident, if the Colonel had known of any such thing, he would have communicated it to him; and that, however, for fear of the worst, it would be well to remove his Plate, and other Valuables, to his Lordship's House, for the more Security: That as to what he had sworn concerning Jaren Sauts, and the two Consults, all rested upon his single Evidence, and therefore had no Force in Law against him: That besides, the thing itself was unlikely; for how could Men without Followers think of so vast a Design, or hope to put it in Execution, without Officers, Soldiers, Place, Time, or Money? That as to the Papers, he thought, in the first place, the King's Officer, Sir Philip Lloyd, was not in a Capacity to be the King's Witness: That, even in France, when a Minister of State had his Papers seiz'd, and abundance of them contain'd Matter of Treason, it was held; no Use could be made of them, because they had not been inventory'd in his Presence, nor in the Presence of any deputed by him: That whether these Papers were his or not, they abhor'd any such Design (as conspiring and compassing the King's Death): That the Ink was visibly so old, that it might be presum'd they had been written these Twenty Years: That they seem'd to contain a polemical Discourse in answer to Filmor, which was not calculated for any particular Government in the World: That, among other things, the said Filmor's Book contain'd the following desperate Principle, That Possession was the only Right to Power; and that he could see no hurt in any Man's endeavouring to explode it. Here he ask'd the Attorney, how many Years ago that Book (of Filmor's) had been written? and, by way of Answer, was told by the Chief-Justice, That they had nothing to do with Filmor's Book; nor to waste their Time on a Subject that serv'd only to gratify a luxuriant Way of talking he had. Answer, proceeded his Lordship, to the Matter you are indited for. Do you own that Paper? The Colonel reply'd, No. The Judge add'd, Go on then? Which he began to do in these Words: "I say, first, 'tis not prov'd upon me: And, secondly, 'tis not a Crime, if it be prov'd."— Nothing was ever said more pertinently than this, and every Man of common Sense must perceive, that if he had kept to these two Propositions, he must have had the bell of the Argument: But the shrewd Chief-Justice, who saw the Opening, and dreaded the Consequence, with as much Wickedness as Artifice, put him immediately on another Sent, namely, to take off the Credibility of Lord Howard's Evidence; and thereby (7) bewilder'd him, under the pretence of shewing him a nearer Way.

The Colonel, with all his Circumspection, was

(1) There is no explaining the Chicanery and Perfidy manifest on this Occasion, without having recourse to the Passions themselves, which cannot be read by an honest unprejudic'd Man without the highest Indignation.

Col. Sydney. I say, first, 'Tis not prov'd upon me: And, secondly, 'Tis not a Crime if it be prov'd.

L. Ch. Just. You began very materially in one thing: It is material for you to supply yourself to take off the Credibility of my Lord Howard, that is a Witness; call your Witnesses to that purpose, or if you have any other Point to take away the Credibility of any other Witness.

Col. Sydney. My Lord, I have seven or eight Points of Law.

L. Ch. Just. I hear not one yet.

Col. Sydney. Why, my Lord, Conspiring to levy War is not Treason, and I desire to have Council upon that.

L. Ch. Just. 'Tis not a Question. You had a good ask me, whether the first Chapter in Lititum be Law?

Col. Sydney. My Lord, I have neither made War, nor conspir'd to levy War.

L. Ch. Just. You are fill in a Mistake. You shall not think that we intend to dialogue with you, so let you know how far the Proof hath been given, or not given; but when we come to direct the Jury, they will shall deliver how far the Law requires there should be two Witnesses. But whether there be such a Proof, that must be left to the Jury.

Mr. Jud. Wilkin. If you agree the Conspiracy, I will tell you my Mind of it; I cannot give you any Opinion in Law, till the Fact be proved.

L. Ch. Just. The Law always arises upon a Point of Fact; there can be no Doubt in point of Law, till there be a judgement in point of Fact.

Mr. Jud. Hillhouse. My Lord has put you in a right Way; the Conspiracy is prov'd but by one Witness; if you have any thing to take off his Credibility, 'tis to the Purpose.

Col. Sydney. Truly, my Lord, I do so little intend to dispute my own Spirit, and your Wit, as ever any Men when they stand upon you, Now, my Lord, if you will make a Concession of one thing, a Supposition upon Supposition, I would take all this matter, and show, if more of these things are any thing in themselves, they can be nothing join'd together.

L. Ch. Just. Take your own Method, Mr. Sydney; but I say, if you are a Man of low Spirit and weak Body, 'tis a Duty incumbent upon the Court to exhort you, not to spend your Time upon Things that are not material.

Col. Sydney. My Lord, I think 'tis very material, that a whimsical Imagination of a Conspiracy should not pass for a real Conspiracy of the Death of the King; Besides, if these Papers were found in my House, 'tis a Crime created since my Imprisonment; and that cannot come in, for they were found since. My Lord, if these Papers are right, it mentions two hundred and odd Sheets, and these few neither Beginning nor Ending; and will you, my Lord, send a Man for Treason for Scraps of Paper found in his House, relating to an ancient Paper, intended so innocently as any thing in the World, and pleas and patch this to my Lord Howard's Discourse, to make this a Conspiracy to kill the King? Then, my Lord, I think 'tis a Right of Mankind, and 'tis exercised by all sensible Men, that they write in their own Closets what they please for their own Memory; and no Man can be answerable for it, unless they publish it.

L. Ch. Just. They don't go away with that Right of Mankind, that it is lawful for me to write what I will in my own Closets, unless I publish it; I have been told, Care not for the King, nor in thy Thoughts, nor in thy Backslider, the Birds of the Air will carry it. I think it to be the Duty of Mankind to observe that.

Col. Sydney. I have liv'd under the Inquisition—

L. Ch. Just. God be thanked, we are govern'd by Law.

Col. Sydney. I have liv'd under the Inquisition, and there is no Man in Spain can be try'd for Heresy.

Mr. Jud. Wilkin. Draw no Precedents from the Inquisition, here, I beseech you, Sir.

L. Ch. Just. We must not exhort Men to talk, that, by the Right of Nature, every Man may contrive Mischief in his own Chamber, and he is not to be punished, till he thinks it to be criminal to do so.

Col. Sydney. My Lord, if you will take Scripture by Parts, you will make all the Princes of the Scripture Impious; and you may easily detect of lying, There is no God; and so on.

A. D. 1683. was now over-reach'd: It flatter'd his Passions to expose Lord Howard, and it also seem'd favourable to his Cause: And tho' he did not immediately forego that Part of his Defence which depended on Reason and Argument, he was at last wrangled out of his Method, and, by being in a manner compelled to call his Witnesses prematurely, lost the great Benefit of the many plain, strong, and clear Inferences, that naturally and necessarily must have arisen from it.

These Witnesses were the Earls of Anglesey and Clare, the Lord Paget, two of Lord Howard's own Kintmen, Dr. Burnet, one Mr. Ducast a Frenchman, one Mr. Blake, and two of the Colonel's own Servants. The Earl of Anglesey and Dr. Burnet repeated the same Evidence they had given at Lord Ruffel's Trial. The Earl of Clare, with great Spirit, depos'd, that Lord Howard, speaking of the Times, had said to him, That if ever he was question'd again, he would never plead: That the quickest Dispatch was the best: That he was sure they would have his Life, tho' he was never so innocent: That he believ'd the Persecution foretold by Bishop Usher was begun: That he also believ'd it would be very sharp, and hop'd it would be (A) short: That of Colonel Sydney he did with great Assurances assert, that he was as innocent as any Man breathing: That he us'd great Encomiums in his Praise: That he seem'd to bemoan his Misfortune: That he (the Witness) did believe his Concern to be real; for never was any Man more engag'd to another, than he was to Colonel Sydney: And that, when he (the said Witness) told him the Colonel's Papers were seiz'd, he (Lord Howard) reply'd, I am sure they can make nothing of any Papers of his.

Mr. Philip Howard depos'd, That discovering with Lord Howard on the Discovery of the Plot, and the Confessions of those concern'd in it, his Lordship affirm'd, that it was impossible such a thing could be: That in all Countries there were disaffected Persons; but none of Honour, Interest, or Estate in this, who would engage in such a Design: That he (Mr. Howard) ask'd his Lordship, if he knew any of the Persons concern'd in this? He answer'd, none but Rainbold, whom he had seen at Lord Staffbury's: That he even agreed, at the Instance of the Witnesses, to join in an Address of Abhorrence: That, meeting him again, after Lord Ruffel's Commitment, and telling him of it, he said, 'Then are we all undone.' Pray, go to my Lord Privy-Seal, and see whether I am to be taken up.— I doubt 'tis a sham Plot. If it was a true Plot, I should have nothing to fear; but if it is a Plot made upon us, no Man is free.' That seeing him again a third time, when Colonel Sydney was taken, he seem'd extremely melancholy, and gave it for a Reason, that he had receiv'd such Obligations from Colonel Sydney, as no Man had from another.

Dr. Burnet depos'd, That meeting Lord Howard at Colonel Sydney's House, after the Colonel was committed, his Lordship said, 'God knows, I know nothing of this; and I am sure if Colonel Sydney was concern'd, he would have made no Secret of it to me.' And that when he, the said Ducast, advis'd him to withdraw, saying, There was more Danger in that House than any other; his Lordship reply'd, 'I have been a Prisoner already, and I had rather do any thing in the World than be a Prisoner again.'

Lord Paget said, Lord Howard was with him presently after the breaking out of this Plot, and before he appear'd in that Part which he then asked, (these are the very Words of the Evidence) upon which Occasion he declar'd, That he knew nothing (relating to it) either of himself, or any body else.

Mr. Edward Howard depos'd, That he had liv'd in the greatest Intimacy with Lord Howard: That, when the Plot broke out, his Lordship had express'd to him the highest Detestation of it, affirming, under very great Assurances, that he could never accuse himself, nor any Many living: That he moreover manifest'd much Concern for these Persons of Quality who were imprison'd, or so much as reflected upon, as Parties in it: That he, the Deponent, believ'd in his Conscience, he said all this without any Equivocation, or mental Reservation, because he had no Occasion to make use of any to him: That, from the Knowledge he had of his Lordship, it was his Opinion, that if he had been in any such Secret, he would not have said to be taken, or have made his Application to the King, in a Manner so unimpeachable to his Quality.— Here the Ld. Chief Justice interposing, with these Words, No Reflections with the Evangelist of being Christ was a blasphemy and a blasphemy, and the Apostles that they were deists.

L. Ch. Jus. Look you, Mr. Sydney, if there be any Part of it that explains the sense of it, you shall have it read: indeed we are misled with a line. 'It is true, in Scripture, it is said, There is no God; and you must not take that alone, but you must say, The Fool hath said in his Heart, there is no God.' Now here is a thing ascribed to you in the Label; if you can say there is any Part that is an excuse of it, call for it. As for the Purge, whoever does publish, that the King may be put in Chains, or deposed, is a Traitor; but whoever says, that some bad Traytors would put the King in Chains, or depose him, is an honest Man; therefore say of them, but don't let in some Excusations.

Col. Sydney If they will produce the Writ, my Lord, then I can be waighter and put ourselves together.

L. Ch. Jus. Well, if you have any Witnesses, call them.

Col. Sydney The Earl of Anglesey.

L. Ch. Jus. Ay, in God's Name, say till to-morrow in things that are pertinent.

(I) It could not be to be forgotten, that the Earl of Clare was one of the perjuring and persecuting Lords: And, possibly, it was for this Reason that the Attorney-General had two Statutes for him, in the Course of his Evidence; both which he nevertheless broke thro'. His Lordship, in respecting what Lord Howard had said of Usher's Prophecy, and his hoping the Persecution would be short, if sharp, said these Words, and I protest by St. Ives. Upon which the Attorney immediately interpos'd with this infinite Question, What Answer did your Lordship give to it? and the Earl reply'd, I have said you what I have: My Lord is the full of Discretion for me to answer all he says. Again, having cho'd what he had to say, the Attorney betes him thus: 'I would ask you, my Lord, upon your Honour, would not any Man have said as much, that had been in the Plot?' To which the Earl return'd this Spanish Answer, I can't tell: I know of no Plot.

A.D. 1685.

Reflections upon any body: possibly in a menacing Tone, it not only put Mr. Howard (who had been disconcerted by the like Usage from the Court in Lord Russell's Trial) on his Mettle; but had a good Effect on his Memory; for, said he, "Since your Lordship has given me this Occasion, I will speak now what I omitted then:" Which was, That Lord Howard had told him, that even to his Knowledge, it was a thum Plot, forg'd in the dark by Priests and Jesuits; and that he himself went to Lord Halifax, in Lord Howard's Name, and by his Authority, to assure that Minister, that he, Lord Howard, was willing to express his Detestation under his Hand; and to declare there was no such thing to his Knowledge. And after all this Mr. Howard concluded his Evidence in these remarkable (1) Words: "I must needs add, from my Conscience; and from my Heart, before God and Man, that if my Lord had spoken before the King sitting on his Throne, abating for the Solemnity of the Presence, I could not have more believ'd him, from that Assurance he had in me; And I am sure, from what I have said, if I had the Honour to be of this Gentleman's Jury, I would not believe him."

Mr. Sydney would have then brought the Proof of his Mortgage on Lord Howard's Estate; but his Lordship confests it: And so he pass'd on to shew, "That he swore with a Halter about his Neck, and durst only say what would help to remove it; by the way quoting the Words of his Lordship's own Son, viz. "That he was sorry his Father could not get his Pardon, unless he did swear against some others."

Under this Head Mr. Blake was call'd, who, after a decent Profession, that he did not know how he came to be thus oblig'd to give a public Account of a private Conversation, proceeded to depose, That it was to him Lord Howard had said, That he was not to have his Pardon till the Drudgery of swearing was over. The Colonel then call'd two other Persons, who not appearing, he complain'd somewhat warmly of their Neglect; and added, "One of them was to have prov'd, That Lord Howard said he could not have his Pardon till he had done some other Jobs." Finally, the Colonel's two Servants depos'd, That his Lordship, the Evidence, had taken God to witness, that he was sure the said Colonel knew nothing of a Plot; and that he desir'd his Goods and Plate might be sent to his House as to a Place of Security. And one Mr. Wharton, to shew, that a Man's Life ought not to be drawn into question for a Similitude of Hands, undertook, in a very little time, to imitate that of the Label, so as the Court should not be able to distinguish the one from the other.

All that now remain'd, was for the Colonel to sum up the Force of his Defence by way of Direction to the Jury; which he did by saying, in Substance, That by conspiring to kill the King, must be understood a Purpose to kill the Person of the King; for in his politic Capacity, the King could never dye: But nothing of this nature was so much as suggested in support of the Indictment, consequently the whole fell to the Ground: That if it should be arg'd that the Death of the King was imply'd in a Design to levy War against him, no such Implication ought to be allow'd; for none ought to be allow'd but what was natural or necessary; and this was neither, as was evident both from Law and History. History shew'd, that many Wars had been made, nay, that many Kings had been taken Prisoners; yet they had not been put to Death: And if it was allow'd that the Death of a King might fall out by the Chance of War, it would not follow, that the War was levy'd for that End. Then as to the Law, the very Statute on which the Indictment was founded, makes the conspiring the Death of the King to be one Species of Treason, and the levying of War another. And it is a Maxim of Lord Coke's, That to confound Membris Dividentia, is the Overthrow of all Justice: That, indeed, levying of War was Treason, when prov'd by Overt-Act: But there was no Overt-Act to prove the levying of War in this Case; nor was any even pretended: And if the War was not levy'd, it was not within the Act, for conspiring to levy War was not comprehended in it. But even this very Conspiracy was not prov'd: Lord Howard was the only Person who said any thing concerning it; and all he said, if all were admitted, and he had been a credible Witness, amounted to nothing more than a Discourse at large of what might, or might not be, without coming to any one Resolution: That it was even ridiculous to imagine, that a War should be made by five or six Men, not knowing one-another, or trusting one-another. Then as to the Business of Swear, it was so imperfectly told, was so merely conjectural, and was in every respect so inconclusive, that wanting Authority itself, it could give none to any thing else. The very Letter he was said to carry, was not imputed to him (the Prisoner.) The Contents of it were unknown; the Delivery of it unprov'd: And if certain Scottish Gentlemen did afterwards come up to London, nothing had been prov'd of what they had transacted there: For his part, he had not seen any one of them: If it could be prov'd he had, he would be content to suffer: Nor had he ever sent or writ a Letter to Scotland since the Year 59; nor did he know any one Man in Scotland to whom to writ. Again, as to the Papers, admitting they were found in his Custody, no fair Judgment could be made of their End and Use without producing the whole; which had not been done: Nor was it reasonable to call upon him (as the Court had done) to chuse in his Turn what Passage he would have read, since it was not in his Power to do any such thing, if he was an utter Stranger to them; and if he was not, in selecting such Passages as were necessary to prove the Innocence of the whole Book, he acknowledg'd his Acquaintance with it, and so far Good fell-condemn'd. There was, besides, no Connection between the Papers and the Depositions made by Lord Howard: For tho' the Attorney was pleas'd to alledge, that he was composing this Libel at the very time that Smith was on his Errand to Scotland; and would thereby intimate such a Connection, the very Papers themselves demonstrated the contrary: For, over and above the Circumstances, before-mention'd of the apparent Age of the Ink, it's being an Answer to Fisher shew'd, that it was not the Growth of that Crisis, nor indeed could be, for the very Notes would furnish out Work enough for four or five Years, to make out what was contain'd in those Scraps of Paper. The two Matters thus standing separate, and not one Circumstance relative to killing the King appearing in either, if each was ever to fall-evidently prov'd, or by ever such unquestionable Witnesses, neither came up to the Charge in the Indictment, or within the Statute on which it was founded: And if neither, separately, was Treason, under the Description of the Law, both together could not be made such, for that would be setting up constructive Treason again, which that very Statute was calculated to prevent, and which is thereby, as also by several other Statutes, expressly reserv'd for the Judgment of Parliament. And, finally, the Papers in question had never been (m) publish'd or shew'd to any body, nor even to Lord Howard, himself, tho' so dangerously intimate with the Colonel, consequently they were neither directly nor indirectly any Part of the Conspiracy, nor any way an Offence either against Prince or People.

With this, and a Proviso that the Benefit of Law might be reserv'd to him, the Colonel came to a Period. And the Solicitor-General, according to the Duty of his Office, took upon him to reply to the King: And was so extremely careful to acquit himself as a good Advocate, that he forgot all the Duties of a Christian, a Fellow-Subject, and a Fellow-Creature. He said the Prisoner was mistaken in his Law: That an Act which fell under one Branch of the Statute (25 Ed. III.) might be an Overt-Act to prove a Man guilty under the other (that is to say, that to levy War, is to conspire the Death of the King) which except in Law-Matters, would be held the highest Affront that could be offer'd to Common Sense: That this had been adjudg'd in the Case of Sir Henry Vane, as also in the recent Case of Lord Russell: That there needed not two Witnesses to every particular Fact: That one Witness to one Fact, and another Witness to another Fact, were two Witnesses. Having advanc'd thus far, he sum'd up all that had been depos'd by Wiff, Rumsley, and Keyling, tho' declar'd no Evidence against the Prisoner, under this Salvo. That if it had stood alone, it would not have affected him. Hence he proceeded to the Depositions of Ld. Howard, Foster, and Atterbury, which he artfully interwove into one Story, against which he most immodestly said, no Objection had been made. With the like Immodesty he also affirm'd, that the Testimony of the several Persons who appear'd in behalf of the Prisoner, had not impeach'd the Credit of Lord Howard in the least; but, on the contrary, had contributed greatly to establish it: That it was but natural he should talk as he did: That the Words us'd by him to Mr. Phillip Howard, when told of Lord Russell's Commitment, viz. We are all undone, argu'd he had a Guilt upon him: That his saying afterwards, he believ'd it was a Sham-Plot, was but a trivial Put-off: That the Words spok'd by Lord Howard to Blake relating to his Pardon, were but his Lord Howard's own Conjecture; and did not imply, that the Promise he had receiv'd was (n) conditional: That as to the Papers, they were prov'd to be found on the Prisoner's Table, and writ in his Hand: That as to the Objection made by the Prisoner, that but Part of them was read; and that no Judgment could be pass'd on them without the whole, what was read contain'd a whole Series of Argument, which, together with the other Evidence, was sufficient to prove his compassing the Death of the King: That he had, in particular, taught, that when Kings broke their Trust, they might be call'd to Account by their People, and that the calling and dissolving of Parliaments was not in the King's Power: That in this he did, as good as affirm the King (then reigning) had broke his

The Solicitor-General's Reply.

(m) Smith Sir John Heveler, in his Remarks, p. 72. The Indictments ought to have express'd, that he publish'd it, which the Indictment in this Case did not; and upon good Reason, which was, That the Jury might not be put in mind, that Publish'd by it was necessary to make it known; whereas they very well knew, that the Evidence would not, nor did, come up to it. This was in the first Indictment of High Treason, upon which my Man told his Life, for writing any thing without publishing it: for in Fisher's Indictment, he was charg'd with publishing his Libel; and so in all other Indictments for writing, and upon good Reason; for this being made an Overt-act of Treason, it must be an Evidence of a Design to kill or depose the King, or his like; and in the Consequence of what was in the Writing contain'd, which was, that the Power was in the People, &c. being in its Nature no crime, nor argu'd by the King's Council in any other Intent, than to corrupt the Subject's Mind, could not be Evidence of such Matter, unless prov'd he had written and publish'd it; whereof the last was not pretended to be prov'd.

That it was necessary to be express'd in the Indictment, and prov'd at the Trial, appears by the Resolutions of all the Judges of England, in High-Fin's Case, reported in Cr.

Cr. 89. at a time when Prerogative run pretty high; where-in, besides the Resolutions, that no Words charging the King with any personal Vice is Treason. There is the Case of one Prockman, in the 33d of Henry VIII. cited, who was indicted for Treason, for transcribing Passages in a Sermon, never preach'd, nor intended to be preach'd; but found in Writing in his Study; he was found guilty, but never executed, for many Judges at that time were of Opinion it was not Treason, in the Book says, which I think, according to the Evidence here given, was the express Case of Colonel Johnes, admitting he wrote the Book propos'd, and that the Passages in it were treasonable.

(n) Smith's Words are these, "I went, and we talk'd of Newgate. I told him, I had no body had their Pardon, but in that his discovery of the Plot: He told me, No. But he had his Warrant for it. And, says he, I have their Word and Honour for it: But, says he, I will do nothing in it, till I have further Order: And, says he, I have nothing of it, and I can ascribe it to no other Reason, but that I must not have any Pardon, till the Drudgery of Swearing is over. These Words my Lord said: I believe my Lord would say so."

his Trust: For every body knew the King had dissolv'd Parliaments; and, consider'd with this Circumstance, what was there Matter of Argument became Affirmation: That tho' this Book was not debated by the Council of Six, it was more than two Witnesses against the Prisoner: For if a Man tell one Person that it is lawful to rise in Arms against the King, if he breaks his Trust, and another, That he hath broke his Trust, and it was necessary to persuade the People to rise, they were two Witnesses: And in the present Case, Lord Howard was one of these Witnesses, and the Prisoner's Book (tho' never publish'd nor communicated) was another: That hence arose sufficient Demonstration, that the Imagination of this Man's Heart was nothing but the Destruction of the King and Government, and indeed of all Governments: And that he was to be look'd upon as the most dangerous of all Conspirators, because he acted upon Principle, and not Passion; which was the Motive that usually actuated other Men.

[Salmon's Critical Review of the State Trials, p. 481.]

A modern Writer has had the Courage to say, that this Reply seem'd to him to be unanswerable: But Mr. Sydney was of a very different Opinion, and very probably would have demonstrated, that he had Reason on his Side, if the Court would have given him a Hearing: For having desir'd Leave to speak a very few Words, and having premis'd, that he desir'd Mr. Solicitor would not think it his Duty to take away Mens Lives any how, he proceeded to say, That the Matter of Sir Henry Vane was utterly misrepresented: That both Coke and Hales were of Opinion, that the Overt-Act of one Treason was not the Overt-Act of another: And to read out of the latter, That compassing by bare Words was not Treason: That conspiring to levy War was no Overt-Act: And Mr. Solicitor, himself, appear'd so sensible of the Weight of this, and the like Authorities, and the Inferences naturally flowing from them, that with an affected Ingenuity, he broke in upon the Prisoner, and (c) submitted all the Mistakes he had made, both in Matter of Law and Fact, to the Correction of the Court, as well knowing, that if he could any way silence the Prisoner, he was sure of the Cause.

[The L. C. Justice's Charge to the Jury.]

And now the Lord Chief-Justice, himself, was to play his Part; which he did with such a Lawyer-like Dexterity, that it may be truly said, that none but (p) King Alfred could have properly rewarded him for it. He first bespoke the Favour of his Audience by declaring, That neither the King nor any of his Judges desir'd to take away the Life of any Man, which by Law ought not to be taken away: And that, for his part, he had rather many Guilty Men should escape, than that one Innocent Man should suffer. He told the Jury they were to regard nothing advanced on either Side, not warranted by Proof; but that it was both the Custom and Duty of the King's Council to enforce whatever appear'd against the Prisoner, and to endeavour to answer all Objections. He then gave such a Sketch of the Law, with respect to Treasons, as would best answer the present Purpose; and, what was yet more material, of the Law, or rather Rule, of Evidence, saying, That, if two Witnesses prov'd two several Facts, which had a Tendency to the same Treason, such two Witnesses were sufficient to convict a Man of Treason: And that tho' some Judges had been of Opinion, that Words of themselves were not an Overt-Act, neither Hales nor Coke, nor any other of the Sages of the Law, ever question'd but that a Letter was a sufficient Overt-Act: For, continu'd his Lordship, forbere of agere. His Lordship's next Topic was to shew, That the compassing the Death of the King in his natural Capacity, and the levying War, were not the only Treasons comprehended in the great Statute 25 Edw. III. For it had been adjudg'd, That to compass to imprison the King, or to lay him under any Compulsion otherwise than by Law, was Treason within the said Statute: He also asserted, That, notwithstanding it was provided, under the Branch of levying War, that War should be actually levy'd, yet in this Case, where the Indictment was laid for compassing the Death of the King, the levying War might be given in Evidence, that the King's Death was to compass'd.

Thus, tho' it was acknowledg'd, that to levy War, and to compass the King's Death were two distinct Species of Treason; and that a Man could not be sentenced capitally for only conspiring to levy War, which was the work of Mr. Sydney's Case, it was only to indict him for compassing the King's Death, and allege, that the conspiring to levy War, which was not Treason, was the Overt-act to what was, and his Business was done: And from hence we are farther to understand, that a Capacity to make these happy Refinements, and a Disposition to improve them, seasonably and properly, are the Ingredients which constitute an able Lawyer.

His Lordship, the Chief-Justice, having thus laid down the Law, gave the Jury farther to understand, that they were bound to be directed by it: And tho' he took care to distinguish between hearsay and positive Evidence, he also took care to remember, that what was practis'd in this Case had been authoriz'd by the Practice in Lord Stafford's Case, and that tho' Hentley did not affect the Prisoner, it supported the Credibility of the Witness, and also of the Plot in general, which he was sorry to find any Man made a doubt of. He, moreover, took upon him to speak of this Plot, not like an equal Judge between Sovereign and Subject, but as if he was fill

(a) In these Words: "I desire but one Word more for my own sake, as well as the Prisoner's; and that is, that if I have said any thing that is not Law, or misrepresnted, or misapply'd the Evidence which hath been given, I do make it my humble Request to your Lordship to rectify those Mis-

of the King's Council, at the Foot of the Bench he sat on: For said he, "It was, that there might be a general Insurrection, not only to destroy the King and the Duke, but to destroy ALL the King's loyal Subjects; and in taking away their Lives, to take away the Life of Monarchy itself, and to subvert the Religion establish'd by Law." In summing up the Evidence, he still acted in the same Character; gave an Edge to all that had been advanc'd on Hassay, as well as what had been depos'd by Lord Howard, on his own Knowledge; and, coming to the Papers again, recur'd to his former Distinction, namely, That if one Witness prov'd a direct Treason, and another a Circumstance which contributed to that Treason, they were two sufficient Witnesses.

Men often contribute to their own Destruction thro' human Frailty, for want of Apprehension, Memory, or Presence of Mind. There is some Reason to believe, that this very Maxim of the Lawyers is an Injury to the Law: But, allowing it to have Authority from Practice, it is here put to the Torture: For in the solemn Decision of the Question put by Lord Stafford, Whether the Law requir'd two Witnesses to every Overt-Act, Ten of the twelve Judges, with the Lord Chief-Justice North at their Head, (g) answer'd, before the whole House of Lords sitting in Judgment on that unfortunate Peer, That if there was one Witness to one Overt-Act, and another Witness to another Overt-Act, both those Acts being Evidences of the SAME MEASURE, the Law was satisfy'd. There is nothing of Circumstance or Tendency in this Sentence, which are the qualifying Terms insiduously made use of by the Lord Chief-Justice in the Case before us, to draw it within the Vortex of the Law. The Words are as simple and express as possible, and treat distinctly of two several corresponding Overt-Acts in the same Treason; whereas, nothing can be more notorious, than that an Answer to Ellmer, never communicated to any single Person, could never be a Part of the same Treason meditated by the Council of Six, in concert with the Scots: Besides, the conspiring to levy War, unless War was actually lev'd, as before shewn, was not a direct Treason: So that the very Building which these Papers were made a Buttress to support, was without any legal Foundation.

The Lord Chief-Justice, indeed, seem'd to be so conscious of the many Fallacies contain'd in those few Words, that he made haste to shelter himself and them under an Authority superior to his own, as follows: "Not long ago all the Judges of England were commanded to meet together; and one that is the Senior of the King's Council was pleas'd to put this Case: If I buy a Knife of J. S. to kill the King, and it be prov'd by one Witness, I bought a Knife for this Purpose, and another comes and proves I bought such a Knife of J. S. they are two Witnesses sufficient to prove a Man guilty of High Treason: And so it was held by all the Judges of England then present, in the Presence of all the King's Counsel."

It is as plain to every Eye for what End this Case was put, as for what End it was now recited. But instead of authorising the Procedure against the Prisoner, it rather serves to shew with what Eagerness the Blood-Hounds of the Law were let loose upon him, and how premeditatedly he was ran down. If there is any Force in this pernicious Instance, any two confederate Villains have it in their Power to take away any Man's Life that either buys or wears a Sword. And yet even in this fictitious Case, manifestly fram'd on purpose to bring Mr. Sydney to his End, that Sameness of Act is preserv'd, which is requir'd in the Decision given by the Judges at the Command of the Lords; and of which not the least Similitude is to be trac'd in the real one of the Prisoner at the Bar.

That these terrible Papers might, however, stand in the stead of another living Witness, which is what the Law requires, and might be mistaken for a Vein of the same Treason open'd by Lord Howard, his Lordship the Chief-Justice, after enlarging on the Evidence that they were really the Composition of Mr. Sydney, took upon him not only to say, That they contain'd all the Malice, Revenge, and Treason, that Mankind could be guilty of; but that in these the Prisoner carry'd on the Design still (of the Conspiracy must be understood) and that the Doctrines in the one justed with the Debates in the other: That a general Insurrection was discours'd of in both: That the late Rebellion was begun by such kind of Principles: And from the whole he infer'd to the Jury (how fairly let the Reader judge) That, if the Prisoner had design'd to depose or remove the King, if, in Order thereto he had been guilty of conspiring to levy War, or was privy to the Letter sent by Lord Ruffel, or if they believ'd those Papers were written by him, why then, truly, those Papers would be Evidences against him; and instead of two, would have the Weight of twenty-two against him; and, consequently Lord Ruffel had been indicted, condemn'd, and executed on a LESS TESTIMONY.

His Lordship, in the next Place, proceed'd to sum up the Prisoner's Defence; but then it was only in order to disgrace and explode it: And this he did with such flagrant Partiality, that in speaking of the Mortgage which the Colonel had upon Lord Howard's Estate, he said, the Fact no otherwise appear'd than by the Prisoner's Allegation: Nor when the Prisoner remonstrated the contrary, by saying, Lord Howard, himself, had confess'd it in open Court, and he was forc'd to admit it, did he seem abash'd, but had immediate recourse to another Extentive by suggesting, that in case the Colonel should be convicted, the Debt would accrue to the King; and consequently his Lordship, the Evidence,

Evidence, would not be a Farthing the better for it. Again, in speaking of the other Depositions which had been given to shew, that Lord Houcard was no credible Witness, he urg'd, that his several Disavowals of the Plot were so many Proofs of his Concern in it; and that what he had said in relation to the Drudgery of Swearing, only prov'd he was an unwilling Witness, which made for his Credit, instead of destroying it. Finally, as to the Papers, he barely mention'd the Circumstance of the slowness of the Hand, without allowing it any weight, or attempting to give it any Answer. The material Inference drawn from it by the Colonel, That these Papers could not have been written during the time that Smith was on the Message to Scotland, as the Attorney had alledg'd, he never mention'd at all; nor that other yet more material one, That the Book was apparently an Answer to Filmer; and yet in these Particulars, the main Defence of the Prisoner, as to this Part of the Charge, consisted. His Lordship, indeed, intimated, "That he had recapitulated the Matters given in Evidence, according to his Memory." But if his Memory was bad, he was not qualify'd to be a Judge; for one Man's Defects are not become another Man's Ruin: And it is besides notorious, that the same Degree of Retention which had serv'd him so well on the King's Behalf, in case his Lordship's Heart had been as good as his Head, would have been equally serviceable to the Prisoner.

The Jury pronounce him Guilty.

The Issue being now left to the Jury, it appear'd, that either those good Men and true were such perfect Masters in the Art of judging, or had so greatly profited under the sage Directions of the Lord Chief-Justice, that in Half an Hour's Time, they had got the better of all Difficulties and Scruples, and pronounce'd the Prisoner guilty.

It may be thought by Some superfluous to be thus particular in giving the Summary of Proceedings of this nature; but in such Works as these, the Judgment ought more to be consulted than the Palate; and more Regard ought to be paid to Use than Ornament. Now there is no Scene in History in which the People are so much concern'd as in Trials of this nature; nor has any Branch in the Administration of Government been more abus'd than that of Justice. It is fit, therefore, that the Censures of Posterity should be directed to fall in the right Place; and that those who value themselves so highly and justly on the Excellency of their Laws, should be thoroughly appriz'd how liable they are to Perversion, and how little able, in many Instances, either to defend the Innocent or punish the Guilty.

Passages between him and the Lord Chief-Justice, previous to his Sentence.

Sentence was still to be pass'd on this noble Prisoner; and whereas that Ceremonial had been usually left, as in Lord Ruffel's Case, to any Understrapper of the Bench, the Lord Chief-Justice now attended in Person; and with good Reason; for it was known Mr. Sydney had many things to urge why Sentence should not pass upon him; and that he would not fail to enforce them with all the Spirit that became a Man, who knew he was to die, and resolv'd to make his Death exemplary.

Accordingly, when summon'd to speak on that Occasion, by the Clerk of the Court, he first declar'd, "That, as he conceiv'd, he had had no Trial, for some of his Jury were not Freeholders; and no Precedent could be shewn, of any Man's having been so try'd before, when the Indictment was laid in a County." The Lord Chief-Justice reply'd, That he had receiv'd the unanimous Opinion of the Court on that Point already; for all the Judges of England had declar'd, in Lord Ruffel's Case, tho' a Case of Corporations, That by the Statute of Queen Mary, the Trial of Treason was put as it was at Common-law; and that there was no such Challenge at Common-law. The Prisoner then requested, that a Day of Hearing might be appointed, and Council assign'd to argue it: And this being refus'd, as not in the Power of the Court to grant it, he shew'd, in the next place, that there was a material Defect in the Indictment, which made it absolutely void; for the King was depriv'd of Title, which was Treason by Law, the Words Defensor Fidei being left out. This fir'd the Chief-Justice, who, brutally and absurdly enough, said, In that you would deprive the King of his Life, that is in very full, I think: And, the Prisoner rejoining, "That, in a Case of Life, such things as these were not to be over-ru'd so easily:" Added, in the same Tone, "Mr. Sydney, we very well understand our Duty; we don't need to be told by you what our Duty is: We tell you nothing but what is Law; and if you make Objections that are immaterial, we must over-rule them.— The Treason is sufficiently laid." But not sufficiently prov'd, was a natural and obvious Answer. The Colonel, however, did not make it in so many Words; but contented himself with saying, "That the Papers had no otherwise been prov'd upon him, than by a Similitude of Hand; which, in a criminal Case, ought not to have been admitted: That, however, there was no Treason in them: That he desir'd the Nature of the thing might be examin'd; and that he was willing to put his Life on the Issue. But the Chief-Justice was for no new Experiments; he had got the better once, and was for keeping it, right or wrong: In order to which, he insisted, "That there was scarce a Line in the Book, but what was Treason; That his Incredulity on that Head was the worst Part of his Case; and that when Men entertain'd and justify'd such Doctrines, it was high time to call them to an account. The Prisoner again defended himself by urging, That all which was thus condemn'd was grounded on the (r) first Speech

(r) In which are the following Passages: "That the Difference between a rightful King, and an usurping Tyrant, was this: That the latter thought his Kingdom and People were ordain'd for the Satisfaction of his Desires, and unreasonable Appetites; while the Former, on the contrary, acknowledg'd himself to be ordain'd for procuring the Wealth and

A. D. 1683. Speech of King James to his first Parliament; and also by reminding the Court, That they had never been publish'd, (unless by the Court; who thereby propagated the very Mischiefs they complain'd of, and shar'd in the Guilt they undertook to punish;) And that the Attorney press'd them into the Service, only to supply the Deficiency of other Evidence. He moreover added the following remarkable Passage, "My Lord, there is one Person I did not know where to find then, but every body knows where to find him (s) now, that is, the Duke of Monmouth: If there had been any thing in Consultation, by his means to bring any thing about, he must have known it, for it must be taken to be in prosecution of those Designs of his; and if he will say, there ever was any such thing, or that he knew any thing of it, I will acknowledge whatever you please." His Lordship's Reply was, "That is over; you were try'd for this Fact; we must not send for the Duke of Monmouth." The Colonel then desir'd, that his Reasons might be heard, why he ought to have a new Trial; but was told, That could not be; and continuing to insist upon it, the Clerk of the Court, by the Direction of the Bench it must be presum'd, called upon the Cryer to make an Oyes; and Mr. Sydney thereupon exclaiming with Warmth, Can't I be heard, my Lord? his Lordship as warmly reply'd, "Yes, when you speak who is proper: But if you arraign the Justice of the Nation, it concerns the Justice of the Nation to prevent you." This driving the Prisoner from Expostulations back to Facts, he urg'd further, "That he was brought up to be arraign'd on the 7th, by Habeas Corpus granted the Day before, when no Bill was exhibited against him, and when his Prosecutors could not know it would be found, unless they had a Correspondence with the Grand-Jury, which was not allowable." To this his Lordship insolently reply'd, "We know nothing of it: You had as good tell us of somebody's Ghost, as you did at the Trial." After some farther Altercation concerning the Plea, which the Court had deterr'd the Prisoner from putting in, he spoke of the Hardship of being refus'd a Copy of the Indictment, which, by an express Statute, was allow'd to all Men, in all Cafes: And then proceeded to say, "That the Jury was not summon'd as it ought to have been, by the ordinary Bailiff; but consisted of such only, as had been selected by Burton and Graham, and made his Appeal to the Court, Whether they were a good Jury? The Answer was, "We can take notice of nothing but what is upon the Record. Here is a Return made by the Sheriff; if by indirect Means, you should have mention'd it before they were sworn.--- The Time is past." Thus driv'n from this, he touch'd again on the Hardships he had suffer'd in the Matter of the Papers: And proceeding yet farther in these Words, "When I alleg'd, that, in criminal Cafes, Similitude of Hands could not be taken for Evidence, propos'd my Points of Law, concerning constructive Treason, &c. said, that I did conceive, that no Court under the Parliament could be Judges of it; and did desire, that the Statute that did so enact it might be read; it could not be obtain'd; and I cited many Judgments in Parliament;--- the Lord Chief-Justice cut him short with another Reprimand, for arraigning the Justice of the Court: And as to the Point of constructive Treasons, with Assurance inexpressible, affirm'd, The Crime in question was not constructive, but plain Treason, within the Act on which the Indictment was grounded: And the Prisoner demanding whether Writing was an Act, with the like Assurance reply'd, Yes, tis AGREE. Here one Mr. Bampheld with great Modesty interpos'd as amicus curiae, and under that Umbrage humbly hop'd his Lordship would not proceed to Judgment when there was so material a Defect in the Indictment as that before mention'd by the Prisoner. But Justice, it seems, was now deaf as well as blind; and the Obstacles thrown in his Lordship's Way, serv'd only to make him more eager to surmount them. "There remains nothing for the Court to do, said he, but to discharge their Duty in pronouncing that Judgment the Law requires to be pronounc'd.--- And I must tell you, that tho' you seem to arraign the Justice of the Court and the Proceeding.--- He was going on thus when the Prisoner threw in this his last Remonstrance: "I must appeal to God and the World, I am not heard." Which so incens'd his Lordship, that he first impiously said, Appeal to whom you will! And then absurdly added, "I could wish with all my Heart, that instead of appealing to the World, as tho' you had receiv'd something extreme hard in your Case, that you would appeal to the great God of Heaven (which he had already done) and consider the Guilt you have contracted by the great Offence you have committed." He also reproach'd the Prisoner with the Grace he had receiv'd from the King, the general Pardon, and also with lying under particular Obligations to his Bounty and Mercy. After which, and some additional Censures on his Book, his Lordship soften'd his Tone a little, and with an Affectation of Tenderness and Charity, pronounc'd Sentence; which he had no sooner finish'd, than the Prisoner, with a loud and firm Voice, express'd himself as follows: "Then, O God! O God! I beseech thee to sanctify these Sufferings unto me, and impure not my Blood to the Country, nor the City thro' which I am to be drawn. Let no Inquisition be made for it; but if any say the shedding of Blood that is innocent, must be reveng'd, let the Weight of it fall only upon those and Prosperity of his People; and that in these consisted his principal worldly Felicity." And, a little after, he said, "That as the Head is ordain'd for the Body, and not the Body for the Head; so must a righteous King know himself to be ordain'd for his People, and not his People for him."

(c) Which will be explain'd in its proper Place

those that maliciously persecute me for Right-cousness sake." No doubt, this had a wonderful Effect on the Audience, and for that Reason, possibly, the Chief-Justice, half enrag'd, and half confounded, thought himself oblig'd to put up his Prayer also, which he did in these Words: "I pray God work in you a Temper fit to go into the other World, for I see you are not fit for this." Upon this the Prisoner with a philosophical Gallantry, which the modern World has very rarely seen an Instance of, held out his Hand, and spoke as follows: "My Lord, feel my Pulse, and see if I am disorder'd: I bless God, I never was in a better Temper than I am now."

This ended this extraordinary Scene; in the Course of which, as we are told by Bishop Burnet, Judge Withins gave Mr. Sydney the Lye in open Court; but no such Circumstance is mention'd in the printed Trial: which, indeed, does not seem to be given with the Candour and Impartiality which are essential to a Record. It was, however, but natural that the Prejudices of the Court should be propagated by the Press; and we are to wonder that any Justice was done to the Prisoner's Plea in the Report, when so little was done to the same Plea in the Trial and Sentence. When Power is at the full, Truth is in the wane; but as Power fades, Truth brightens: And tho' the Eye is at first overpower'd with Splendor so unusual, it gathers Strength by Degrees, and delights in the Radiance which before it could not endure to look on. It is thus in the Case before us: For, tho' the Lord Chief-Justice was pleas'd to say, "That Mr. Sydney had as much Favour shewn him, as ever any Prisoner had; and that if they had shewn him less, they had fulfill'd their Duty more; tho' Mr. North, who had his Share in the Job, has left a posthumous (t) Defence of it; tho' yet other Writers, as well as he, have quoted Instances since the Revolution to shew, that the Practices of Lawyers and Courtiers have been in all Reigns alike; and tho' a Party-Creed has been form'd on these several Misrepresentations, it is now the general Voice of all sensible Men, That Forms and Ceremonies were scarce ever more wickedly abus'd than when Jeffrey was the Priest, and Sydney the Sacrifice.

It may almost be presum'd, that even in those over-loyal Times, when it was apprehended, that every Breath which seem'd to murmur Resistance, would create a Storm of Rebellion, the apparent Partiality of the Court, was very clearly discern'd; and that the intrepid Deportment of the Prisoner did not fail to excite a due Degree of Admiration; for neither when the Verdict was brought in, nor when the Sentence was pronounc'd, does it appear that he was insulted with any of those barbarous Shouts, which upon the like Occasion have been taken notice of, in order to expose that desperate Spirit of Animosity that turns Men into Furies.

As to the last Scenes of this great Man's Life, they partook of the same Magnanimity which had so eminently distinguish'd him on his Trial, and which had indeed distinguish'd him always, as one that did Honour not only to his own illustrious Family, but to his Country and even to his Kind. Instead of petitioning the Throne for Mercy, at the Expence either of Truth or Honour, he petition'd only for Justice. In a Paper which he sent to the King by Lord Halifax, who was his Nephew by Marriage, he gave a Brief of his Trial, and the many Hardships inflict'd on him by the Tyranny of the Court in the Course of it; the most material of which have been already enumerated; and concluded

(t) In Substance as follows:

"Mr. Sydney was indicted for conspiring and imagining the Death of the King, which is the first Article in the Statute of Edw. III. and by CONSPIRATORS or LAW thereupon. It is understood that, not only the Life of the King, but his Liberty and Power to exercise his Government, are equally under the Guard of this Article. So that if the Evidence be of an Intent to seize or imprison the King, or to smother his Forces that guard his Person, [But in this Case, no such Evidence appear'd] tho' it appear not that the Intention was directly to bring the King to Death, yet it is High-Treason within that Article. For it is by Experience, that, in the Case of Kings, Lots of Life is the Consequence of Loss of Liberty [the contrary of which was shown by Mr. Sydney in his Trial]. And to the Law stands declar'd in divers Instances, about the Time of Oates's Plot, pursuant to former Resolutions; and the Lord Russell's Case was determin'd upon the same Law. But since this Article charges the Intent, which is the Act of the Mind, it is added, that such Intent is to be made appear by Overt-facts: Which creates a Distinction, upon the common Notion of High-Treason, between Facts that are the Treason, and Facts that are only the overt Evidence of it; which latter may be in themselves innocent, but, as they declare a secret Intent, are vulgarly, but inadequately, called the Treason. Then the same Law hath provided, that, for Treason, there shall be two lawful Accusers, that is, Witnesses; which, by Judgment of Law, goes to the Treason in the Indictment, and the Intention, but not to every Overt-fact brought to evidence that Intention: For if there were two Overt-facts (of the same Treason, for the best Advantage prefer us) and each prov'd only by one Witness, that is two lawful Accusers of the Treason charged. And to the Law is left indubitably settled in 46th Cases, whenever any libelling Lawyer hath pretended, or shall pretend, to the contrary.

In Mr. Sydney's Case, the Overt-facts charged were first, the being of a Council of Six, that met for managing the Infurrection, where it was resolv'd to call in the Scots; and he particularly undertook that Province, [which is false] for, according to Lord Howard's Evidence, which was the sole Evidence, the Letter sent by Smith was written by Lord Russell; employ'd James Smith, and paid his Charges.

And secondly, A Book which he had some time before wrote, upon the Subject of a Commonwealth, against Monarchy. In which he set up Principles and Positions directly inconsistent with the English Government, as are specify'd in the Indictment. It appear'd in the Evidence, that, at the very time when he was taken, and his Papers seiz'd, the Book was brought forth, and lay upon his Desk, with Corrections evident upon it [but not recent, should have been added]; and in that Posture it was found at the Discovery of the Book's Conspiracy, intended, as was understood [without the least Shadow of Proof] to be engrav'd; and the whole Drift of it being to show it was lawful, commendable, and necessary, to do what he was above, that is, to take up Arms against the King, and to depose him [which is false] for the main Drift of it was to advise Filium: Nor was there any such Application of the Doctrine of Resistance, in the Title, as is here most deplorably insinuated: And it is equally dangerous not to mention any of the Testimonies in it, there is only mention'd to be the Rights of the Subject to have recourse to Arms. This being join'd with the other Circumstances in the Case, and upon a full Proof by divers Witnesses, and Compulsion of Hand-writing, that the Book was wrote and corrected with his own Hand; the Court took the Book as another Overt-act of the Treason within the Indictment. It is to be remembered, that it importeth not whether the Book itself was Treason for an innocent Fact, as whening a Knife, or the like, join'd with Circumstances, that constitute it done with an Intent to compass the King's Death, is an Overt-act. Nor is it material, whether the Book alone, without the express Treason proved, had made good the Indictment, or not; for here they were both together. Examen, p. 408, 409.

concluded with these Words, "Now, forasmuch as no Man that is oppress'd in England can have Relief, unless it be from your Majesty, your Petitioner humbly prays, that the Premises consider'd, your Majesty would be pleas'd to admit him into your Presence; and if he does not shew, that tis for your Majesty's Interest and Honour to preserve him from the said Oppression, he will not complain, tho' he be left to be destroyed."

Bishop Burnet affirms, that upon this, Jeffreys in his furious way said, That either Sydney must die, or he must die. In which Case it was easy to foresee on whom the Lot would fall. Accordingly, after some Demur, it was thought more advisable to countenance the Sentence, however unjust, by putting it in Execution, than to acknowledge the Injustice of it by any Act of Reparation. Our Bishop further observes, That when the Colonel was shewn the fatal Warrant, he gave way to no Bitterness, nor express'd any Repentment: And, tho' he expostulated with the Sheriffs who brought it, on the unfair Return they had made of the Jury, by the Directions of the Solicitor-General, and intimated, that they were thereby answerable for his Blood, he add'd at the same time, that he did not say this for his own sake, for the World was now nothing to him, but for theirs. With which one of the Sheriffs, Rich, it must be presum'd (for the Family of the Norths were not over apt to melt on these Occasions) was so affected by it, that he burst into Tears. But tho' Remorse and Pity found their way into Prison, they could have no Admission at Court: The Decree was gone forth irrevocably, and Death, the Avenger, had it in Charge. The 8th of December was appointed to be the Day of Blood; and Tower Hill the Scene: For tho' those in Power were at War with his Virtues and Accomplishments, the Nobility of his Birth was so far consider'd, that he was privileg'd to dye by the Axe, instead of the Halter. The Ceremonial was soon over. He mounted the Scaffold with the Air of one who came to conquer, not to suffer; or as one who was in haste to leave a Place he had reason to loathe. His parting Words were few; his Prayer was short; and having given a Paper to the Sheriff, as his last Legacy to the World, he repos'd his Head on the Block; and the Executioner took it off at a Blow. All was dispatch'd in a few Minutes: And that Head was expos'd as a Traitor's, which in Rome, or Athens, had been almost ador'd. So dyed one of the best and bravest Men who ever did Honour to the English Name: A Patriot indeed, however mistaken (for so he certainly was) in hoping and endeavouring to graft the Virtues of Antiquity on the rotten Stock of modern Depravity. May his Ashes rest in Peace! May his Name be ever dear to Remembrance! May his Virtues be imitated by latest Posterity! When his Failings are recollected, may it be recollected also that he was a Man! And when the Liberties of a free People are openly and avowedly invaded, may they never want a Sydney to lay down his Life in their Defence!

There are those, it ought, however, to be confess'd, who set him out in very different Colours, who tread in the Steps of inhuman Jeffreys, by making those very Principles a Reproach to him, which misled him to try Practices on the Constitution; and for the sake of the Public to endanger the public Peace; who more particularly condemn him for conspiring to disturb the King's Government after he had accepted the King's Pardon, and who accuse him of having been uniformly a Republican from his Youth upwards: But surely he that acts up to his Principles, however erroneous those Principles may be, is a more worthy Being than he who has no Principles at all. And if Mr. Sydney himself is to be credited, he had once sav'd the King's Life (how is not explain'd) and consequently his Pardon was to be look'd upon rather as a Debt, than a mere Act of Grace.

Upon the whole then, tho' we may see Cause to charge him with some Mistakes in point of Judgment, we cannot impeach him of wilful Crimes. He was born in an Age when Liberty began to use her Wings. He had, himself, assist'd in teaching her to soar. He had seen her in her highest Exaltation. He had seen her insidiously lim'd and cap'd again; and he was too fondly and rashly bent to set her free. He had all her Heroes ever before his Eyes; and thought that true Patriotism included all Virtues and all Honours. But let his last Speech (a) bear witness for him; his last Paper in

(a) Which Bishop Burnet tells us was not publish'd till a Fortnight after his Death; nor till the Government understood that it was circulated in Manuscript; and (he might have add'd) not all they were provided with Answers to it. The Paper itself was as follows:

"Men, Brethren, and Fellowes, Friends, Countrymen, and Strangers,

It may be expected, that I should now say some great Matters unto you; but the Rigour of the Season, and the Infirmities of my Age, enclosed by a close Imprisonment of above five Months, doth not permit me.

Moreover, we live in an Age that maketh Truth pass for Treason: I dare not say any thing contrary unto it, and the Fears of those that are about me will probably be found too tender to bear it. My Trial and Condemnation doth sufficiently evince this.

W. B. Rantley, and Killing, who were brought to prove the Plot, had no more of me, than that they knew me not; and some others, equally unknown to me, had used my Name, and that of some others, to give a little Reputation unto their Designs. The Lord Howard is too infamous by his Life, and the many Perjuries not to be deny'd, or rather feign'd by himself, to deserve mention; and being a single Witness would be of no Value, though he had been of unblemish'd Credit, or had not fear and confus'd that the Crimes committed by him would be pardon'd only for committing more; and even the Pardon promised could not be obtain'd, till the Drudgery of Swearing was over.

This being laid aside, the whole Matter is reduced to the Papers said to be found in my Closet by the King's Officers, without any other Proof of their being written by me, than what is taken from Suppositions upon the Similitude of an Hand that is easily counterfeited, and which hath been lately declar'd, in the Lady Carr's Case, to be no Lawful Evidence in criminal Causes.

But if I had been seen to write them, the Matter would not be much alter'd. They plainly appear to relate unto a large Treatise written long since in answer to Filmer's Book; which by all intelligent Men is thought to be grounded upon wicked Principles, equally pernicious unto Magistrates and People.

in which he diffains alike to assert a Falshood or deny a Truth: For he did not deny the two Meetings at Mr. Hampden's and Lord Russell's: And in the Cloſe of the Paper he made it his Glory, that he dy'd for the Old CAUSE in which he had been from his Youth engag'd.

It is now time to explain the Reference which had been made by Mr. Sydney to the Duke of Monmouth, when he was brought up to receive Sentence; as far, at least, as the Minutes which have been left us of the Transactions of those Times will give leave.

His Grace of Monmouth absconding in July, and the Proclamation against him producing no Effect, the Attorney-General had Orders to prosecute him to an Outlawry. But thro' the King's Name was of Necessity to be made use of in such Proceedings, his Heart did not go along with it: For it appears by the Extracts out of the Duke's

The King corresponded privately with the Duke of Monmouth.

Pocket Book given us by Dr. Hildesheim, during that very Interval, his Majesty kept up a secret Correspondence with him; and it is to be told, that he could never be brought to believe, that he knew any thing of that Part of the Plot which concern'd the Roy-Head; but that, as things were, he was oblig'd to behave as if he did believe it; encourag'd him to write to him; advis'd him to keep himself conceal'd till he had an Opportunity to interpose in his Behalf; admitted him to a private Interview, October 23; receiv'd him pretty well; (these are the Duke's own Words) and went away in a good Humour.

Who was the Confidant on this delicate Confession is no otherwise denoted than by the Letter L, in his Grace's Diary; But by the concurrent Testimony of Bishop Burnet and Sir John Reresby, it is reasonable to think, that Letter stands for the Marquis of Halifax.

According

If he might publish into the World his Opinions, That all Men are born under a Necessity deriv'd from the Laws of God and Nature, to submit unto an absolute, kingly Government, which could be resist'd by no Law or Oath; and that he that hath the Power, whether he came unto it by Creation, Election, Inheritance, Usurpation, or any other way, had the Right, and made most speedy his Will, but the Person and Estates of his Subjects must indifferently submit unto it; I know not why, I might not have publish'd my Opinion to the contrary, without the Breach of any Law I have yet known.

I might, as freely as he, publicly have declar'd my Thoughts and the Reasons upon which they were ground'd, and I perswaded to believe, That God will best Nations unto the Liberty of setting up such Governments as best please themselves.

That Magistrates were set up for the Good of Nations, not Nations for the Honour or Glory of Magistrates.

That the Right and Power of Magistrates, in every Country, was that which the Laws of that Country made it to be.

That those Laws were to be observ'd, and the Oaths taken by them, having the Force of a Contract between Magistrate and People, could not be violated, without Danger of forfeiting the whole Franchise.

That Usurpation could give no Right, and the most dangerous of all Enemies unto Kings were they, who raising their Power to an arbitrary Height, allowed unto Usurpers all the Rights belonging to Kings.

That such Usurpers might be slain without committing the slaughter of the reigning Person or Family, the word of all Villages was cheerfully rewarded with the most glorious Privileges.

That if such Doctrines were receiv'd, they would stir up Men to the Detestation of Princes with more Violence than all the Passions that have hitherto rag'd in the Hearts of the most Unhappy.

That none could be safe, if such a Reward were propos'd unto any that could deny them.

That few would be so gentle as to spare even the King, if by their Detestation a wild Usurper could become God's Anointed; and, by the most execrable Wickedness, invest himself with that divine Character.

This is the scope of the whole Treatise: The Writer gives such Reasons as at present did occur unto him to prove it. This seems to agree with the Doctrines of the most revereud Authors of all Times, Nations, and Religions. The best and wisest of Kings have ever acknowledg'd it. The protest King of France hath declar'd, that Kings have that happy Want of Power, that they can do nothing contrary unto the Laws of their Country; and grants his Quarrel with the King of Spain, June 1682, upon that Principle. King James, in his Speech to the Parliament, June 1602, doth in the blessed degree assert it. The Scripture seems to declare it. If ever the King the Wizard was mistaken, he might have been refer'd to Job, Balaam, and Serpentine; and so Men, for such Matters, may ever otherwise punish, than by being made to see his Error; and it hath not (as I think) been excus'd, that they had been refer'd to the Judgment of a Jury, composed of Men strictly unable in conscience to do it.

But there was little of this in my Case; the Extravagance of my Pretensions was such, that I do above-mention'd Tyranny was never fail'd, nor could be in many Years, and most probably would never have been. So much as it is of it was written long since, never review'd nor shew'd unto any Man; and the English Part of it was not produc'd, and not the Tenth of that offer'd to be read. That which was never known unto those who are said to have conspired with me, was said to be intended to stir up the People in prosecution of the Design of those Conspirators.

When making of particular Applications upon Time, Place, or Person, could be found out, it is hard to say how close by those who intend'd to raise Insurrections all was apply'd by Insinuation.

Whatever is said of the Expulsion of Turkey, the Infurrection against Novy, the Slaves of Calicut, the Disturbance of the Translation of the Crown of France from Henry's Race unto Pope's, and from his Descendants unto Hugh Capet, and the like, is apply'd by Insinuation to the King. Every have not consider'd, that, if such Acts of State be not good, there is not a King in the World, that has any Title to the Crown he bears; nor can have any, which he could deduce his Pedigree from the eldest Son of Noah, and hence, that the Sacrament had still continued in the child of the eldest Line, and born so deduc'd to him.

Every one may see what Advantages this would be to all the Kings of the World; and whether, this falling, it were not better for them to acknowledge they are not Kings, than to be Crown'd by the Consent of wicked Nations; or to have no better Title unto them than Usurpation and Violence, which by the same Ways may be taken from them.

But I was long since told, that I must die, the Plot must fail.

Let the Means of the best Protection in England should fall, the Breach must be fill'd with such as had been Enemies to the line.

None but such as this would have arriv'd with the King's Counsel of the Means of bringing a Man to Death; I stir'd a Jury to be pick'd by the King's solicitors, and the Under-sheriff's choice of Jurymen who are not Freeholders; I receiv'd such Evidence as above-mention'd, I receiv'd a Copy of an Indictment, or to refer the Sentence of Edw. III. to be read, that doth expressly enact, It should be so safe to be pleas'd unto any Man, upon any occasion whatsoever; over-rule the most important Point of Law, without charging. And whereas the Statute of Edw. III. upon which they said I should be try'd, doth referre unto the Parliament all Contradictions to be made in Points of Tradition, they could silence unto themselves not only a Prince in such Contradictions, but his Counsellors as neither agree with Law, Religion, or Common-Sense.

By this means I am brought to this Place. The Lord forgave their Professions, and sett that by'd that detest the Nation from them. The Lord forgave their sufferings unto me; and, tho' I fall as a Sacrifice unto God, yet my Liberty to be establish'd in this Land. But my People, and I love them. Defend thy own Country, but defend those that defend it. Set up such as are best; I wish those that are willing a sword to draw that sword; give William and Henry upon all. Under all things to be as good yet judg'd unto some own Glory. Grant that I may die glorifying thee for all thy Mercies; and that as the last time has permitted me to be suppl'd out as a Witness of thy Truth; and even by the Commission of my Opposers, for that this Cause, in which I was from my Youth engag'd, for which I have had often and wonderfully declar'd thy Will.

This last day Mr. Felovd, who thought he understood and thought, that his Death was meant but to give it and moved that of Lord Russell; tho' the Highness he mixt words were look'd upon to be greater than any before him.

According to the Bishop, "The Lord Hallifax seeing things run so much farther than he apprehended, thought that nothing could stop that so effectually, as the bringing the Duke of Monmouth again into Favour." And, according to Sir John, the Marquis own'd to him, that he had been chiefly instrumental in restoring his Grace to the King's Favour: "For which, says he, his Lordship gave me several Reasons, both public and private, tho' not proper to be here enumerated." What these public Reasons were, may be gather'd from the Right Reverend Prelate, just quoted: And those who reflect, that Lord Rochester and his Cabal had the sole Possession of his Royal Highness, and were ever at work in the dark to undermine the Marquis, will be at no loss to guess at the private.

But if the King in this Affair acted by the Marquis's Advice, it is evident he was directed in it as much by Inclination as Policy: For, at a second Interview, upon November the 4th, the Diary farther tells us, he became very kind, gave the Duke Directions how to manage his Business, prescribed the very Words he was to say to his Royal Highness, and appointed a Person to come to him every Night with such farther Instructions as in the Progress of the Affair should become requisite. Thus it appears his Peace was already made with the King: And all that remain'd to be done, was the Adjustment of such Forms as should prove satisfactory to the Duke of York. This it seems, was carry'd on entirely by the Mediation of Lord Hallifax, who at his next Visit, gave his Grace to understand, That the (w) Queen was his Friend, and had succeeded for him with the Duke and Duchefs, which his Majesty had taken so particularly kind of her, that he had even made her his particular Acknowledgments; and that nothing would be requir'd of him but what was just and honourable; only something was to be done to blind the Duke of York. After this artful Preparative, the Marquis came again with the Copy of a Letter, which he requir'd his Grace to sign, to please his Royal Highness. These are the very Expressions of the Diary. And when his Grace insisted, that in case he did sign it, it should be deposited in no Hands but the King's, the Marquis agreed to it, but added, That if the Duke demanded a Copy, it could not well be refus'd: And upon this Head, his Grace refer'd himself entirely to his Majesty's Pleasure.

Notice has been already taken, that he had once before writ to the King, at the Marquis's Instance; and (x) both Letters (for both were in the same Strain; all Acknowledgment,

(w) See to the Letter Q, in the Diary seems to indicate (x) which were pen'd by Sir Bishop Burnet, by Lord Hallifax with extraordinary Force, and which were as follow:

THE FIRST LETTER.

"If I could have writ to your Majesty sooner, with any Safety to myself, I would have done so, to have told you, That there is nothing but struck me so to the Heart, as to be put into a Predication for an Instance of murdering of you, Sir, and the Duke. I do not feel Almighty so unwilling, and I wish it may end this Moment I am writing, if ever I entered into my Head, or ever felt the least thing to my body, that could make me think I could with such a thing: I am far from either: But I will not upon Heretics say I ever did. But I am so innocent to this Point, that I will try to ease of it, for I know God Almighty is just, and I do not doubt his he will put it into your Heart that I am clear of this most heinous and black Obstruction. But, Sir, the chief Injury of this Letter is to beg Pardon both of you, Sir, and the Duke, for the many things I have done that have made you both angry with me: But more especially of the Duke, who I might have some Justification for myself, that many People may be believe he intended to destroy me: for to you, Sir, I will never be less than God Almighty, and I wish I may never profess more, than all I have done was only to save you, as I had continued your Majesty, if ever I am to live as to speak to you, and I hope you will let me do it, before it be long for I have that to say to you, Sir, that will for ever I hope settle you quiet in your Kingdom, and the Duke after you, whom I intend to serve in the utmost of my Power: and, Sir, to convince him that I will do so, if your Majesty will give me your Pardon, I will deliver myself up into his Hands, that the Duke may bring me to your Majesty, Sir, I should be glad to have him by when I speak to you, but to body else: and by this kindness of the Duke, if ever I should by any thing afterwards against him, I shall be thought the ungratefullest Man living. What good can it do you, Sir, to take your own Child's Life away, that only serves, and repays but £2000 in five years? And indeed, Sir, I am sure I can be serviceable to you, and, if I may say so, make the rest of your Life happy, or at least continue a great deal towards it. You may believe me, Sir, for I do not tell you this out of Fear, but because I do think myself sure of it. I do beg of you, Sir, if you have any Thoughts of Mercy on me, that you will let me know it soon, for the sooner I speak to you the better. And now, Sir, I do swear to you, that from that time I never will dispute you as to any thing, but the whole Study of my Life shall be to show how truly content I am for being done it, and how well I will deserve the Life you give me. And for the Duke, that he may have a more firm

Confidence of the Service I intend to do him, I do here declare to your Majesty, that I will never ask to see your Face more, if ever I do any thing against him, which is the greatest Curse I can lay upon myself.

SECOND LETTER.

"You must allow me, Sir, till to importune you, not without Hopes of prevailing at last upon your Generosity, to as it may get the better of your Anger to me. I am half-oblinded, Sir, with the Thought of having offended you, and the Consent it gives me to perhaps rather than your forgiving Nature would know how to inflict upon the most criminal Offenders. The Character I be under is too heavy for me to bear: even Death itself would be a Relief to me, could I have it without the Aggravation of leaving the World under your Displeasure. I must therefore throw myself upon your Compassion, which being a Virtue so accessible to your Nature, I hope your Child, Sir, will not be an absolute Instance of your denying it, when its Impiety, if I may say so, I have here to fault, with, and is sensibly engaged in Things of which the Conscience was not enough understood by me. Yet I can say, I never had a revolting thought towards your Majesty, not pretending by my Judgment, and, by doing what is a saving Light, to try me into any fatal Mistake: But now that I have had Time to recollect myself, every thing like a Penitence towards your Majesty appears to me in such a reproaching, terrifying Shape, that I have a Remorse for it, which could it be seen, I assure myself it would move your Compassion to me. I humbly beg, Sir, to be admitted to your Face, and to be disposed of as you direct, not only now, but for the Remainder of my Life: And tho' my Repentance is too full to admit any Reserve, your Majesty will permit me to take to you, whether you will let put any thing as a Penalty upon me, which may by a State upon my innocent Children? Whether you will make me undergo the Ignominy of a Trial, before you give me your Pardon? And of what Use or Satisfaction can it be to you to forgive me, and yet give me the cruel Punishment of being myself arraign'd for Treason against such a King and such a Father? And whether my being carry'd to the Tower, in case you be pleas'd to execute my Trial, will have any Effect but an unnecessary Mortification of one, who, God knowing, is already enough afflicted, and whose kind of Death is too to my Family, as well as an utter Destruction of your Majesty's Mercy? Sir, I say these things before you in the most submissive Manner that is possible, with an entire Relinquish to what you shall determine. Neither do I imagine to resolve your Pardon any otherwise than

A. D. 1683.] knowledge, Submission, Penitence, and Promises of Amendment) were made use of to mollify his Royal Highness: And they had the desired Effect, or his Royal Highness dissimul'd also on his Side, on a Persuasion that he should derive more Advantage from his Adversary's own Confessions on this Occasion, than even from his Punishment. However this may be, the Marquis came again from the King with an (y) Order for him to surrender himself the next Day; (October the 24th) accompany'd with a Caution, That he would play his Part well; that he would avoid Questions as much as possible; that he would seem absolutely convert'd to the Duke's Interest; and that he would bear with some Words that might seem harsh. Accordingly, on the next Day he surrender'd himself to Sir Leslie Jenkins, and, as had been preconcerted, was left alone with the King and Duke, that none but they, themselves, might be Witnesses of the Mortification his proud Spirit was now to undergo.

[Mem. p. 171.] Thus far we have the Authority of the Diary, which Whedon says he copy'd from the Original in the Duke of Monmouth's own Hand: And thus far we have the Image of a relenting, fond Father, without the Inter-mixture of any one Feature of the offended King. But then it is fit the Reader should know, that the same Story is told differently elsewhere; as, "That the King at last seeing his Patience abus'd, and resolving to be trisled with no longer, caus'd the Duke of Monmouth to be ARRESTED." Which indicates nothing but Indignation and Violence on the King's Part, and nothing of Resignation on the Duke's. His Royal Highness, himself, however, bears witness, That the Duke did not stay to be arrested, but came in voluntarily. These are his own Words, as inserted by his own Command in the Appendix to Bishop Sprat's True Account, p. 136.

"November the 25th, 1683, Yesterday the Duke of Monmouth came and surrender'd himself to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and desir'd to speak alone with the King and Duke, which was granted him. First he threw himself at his Majesty's Feet, acknowledging his Guilt, and the Share he had in the Conspiracy, and ask'd his Pardon; then confess'd himself faulty to the Duke, ask'd his Pardon also; assur'd him if he should survive his Majesty, that he would pay him all the Duty that became a loyal Subject, and be the first should draw his Sword for him, should there be Occasion. He then desir'd his Majesty would not oblige him to be a Witness, and then gave an Account of the whole Conspiracy, naming all those con-cern'd in it; which were more than those had already been mention'd by the several Witnesses. He deny'd any Knowledge of the Assassination. When he had made an end of his Confession, his Majesty order'd him to be put into the Custody of a Sergeant at Arms. This Day admitted him to his Presence, and order'd a Stop to be put to the Outlawry, and pardon'd him his Pardon. He further added, That Dr. Owen, Mead, Griffin, and all the considerable non-conformist Ministers knew of the Conspiracy."

A. D. 1683.] Whether this is a true State of the Fact, must be consider'd hereafter; but from hence it appears undeniable, that the Duke's Confession was made before he was taken into Custody. And it further appears, that his being so deliver'd over to the Sergeant at Arms, was rather for Form's sake, and as a Part of the Compromise, than as any Mark of the King's Displeasure: For Bishop Burnet asserts, That when his Royal Highness's (l. 3. p. 574.) Creatures in the Cabinet, mov'd for his being committed to the Tower, the King, himself, over-ruled it. And Sir John Kersey says, "That he was suffer'd to go to his own Lodgings at the Cockpit, attended by his own Servants, and under no other Restraint than that of a Sergeant at Arms." The same Gentleman further asserts, "That the King could not refrain from the most open and public Expressions of his paternal Affection for his Grace." The Bishop again has also these Words, "The King receiv'd him with a Fondness that confounded all the Duke's Party: He us'd him more tenderly than he had done formerly." And what is above all, the Duke himself in his own Diary, says, "That the King could not dissimble his Satisfaction; and that, in particular, he press'd his Hand, which he did not remember he had ever done before, except when he return'd from the French Service."

[Mem. p. 168. 169.] But if nothing could be more gracious than the personal Department of the King to his reclaim'd Son, he certainly gave way to every Measure that had a Face of strengthening the Government at his Grace's Expense: Thus, tho' he had promis'd, by Lord Halifax, that nothing should be requir'd of him but what was safe and honourable, tho' he had caus'd him to be told, that whatever was requir'd of him was only to please and blind the Duke of Toré; tho' he had, in particular, exempted him from the Ignominy of becoming an Evidence against his own Partisans; and lastly, tho' he had suffer'd his Grace to batter himself, from the Privacy of the Manner in which his Submissions and Confessions had been taken, that no other than by the Intercession of the Duke, whom I acknowledge to have offend'd, and am prepar'd to submit myself in the humblest Manner; and therefore beg your Majesty would direct how I am to apply myself to him; and I shall do it, not as an outward Pious, but with all the Sincerity in the World. If what I have said can move you to forget my past Faults, it will be Grace I shall endeavour to deserve by all the Actions of my Life: And I am to desire how ill a Guide my own Will hath been to me, that I am resolv'd for the future to put it entirely into your Majesty's Hands, that I may by that means never commit a Fault but for want of your Direction or your Commands. Dear Sir, be pleas'd to reply, by a kind Answer, the most moderate, and constant Custom now being,

[7.] This Order (if it may be so call'd) was the Result of an extraordinary Council held that Day, and was contain'd in these Words: "If the Duke of Monmouth desire to make himself capable of my Mercy, he must render himself to the Secretary, and resolve to tell me all he knows, resigning himself to my Mercy."

Use would be made of them, than to make his Peace with the Duke of York, an extraordinary Council was held the very next Day after his Surrender, in which his Majesty was not only pleas'd to declare, That the Duke of Monmouth had shewn himself very sensible of his Crime in the late Conspiracy, had made a full Declaration of it, had express'd extraordinary Penitence, had made a particular Submission to his Royal Highness, and that, at his Royal Highness's Desire and Intreaty, he had granted him his Pardon; but to give leave that a Paragraph to this effect should be publish'd in the next Gazette. Mr. Carte intimates, that his Majesty even took the Pains to revise and correct this Paragraph himself: And yet farther, that he had a Parley with the Duke of Monmouth upon it: That he would admit of no Extenuations, and that he (the King) thought his Grace acquiesc'd in it: But then the same Gentleman, in the very same Passage, uses these Words, "That Print gave great Offence to Monmouth's Party, which made him complain of it to the King and to others, as highly injurious to himself. The King told him, it was not so, and so must be publish'd or nothing at all." Now his Majesty's Answer implies, that the Paragraph was not then publish'd, and the Duke's Complaint, that it was; and where Certainty is destroy'd by so glaring an Inconsistency, we must be govern'd by Probability: Thus, tho' the Duke's Safety was unquestionably consult'd on this Occasion, his Honour as unquestionably was the Price of it, and, under this latter Head, the Duke had so much Reason to expostulate, that it is reasonable to conclude, it was never imparted to his Grace; that his Pardon not being pass'd in form, it was thought he would be oblig'd to acquiesce in it, that, if he did express any Uneasiness after it was over, it would be without Consequence; and that the Enlargement of his Friends, upon Bail, would make him sufficient Reparation.

The Right Reverend Historian of his own Times is moreover express, That the King had promis'd the Duke of Monmouth, that no Use should be made of his Confession: He also adds, "That Lord Halifax press'd him earnestly, upon his first Appearance, to be silent, and for a while to bear the Censures of the Town: That the last Day of the Term was very near, in which all the Prisoners were to be discharge'd, according to the Habeas Corpus Act: That this would shew he had discover'd nothing to their Prejudice; so that all Discourses concerning his Confession and Discoveries would vanish in a few Days." And again: "The King said, next Day, (after the Duke had surrender'd himself) that James had confirm'd all that Howard had sworn." This was carry'd to the Duke of Monmouth, who deny'd he had ever said any such thing: Adding, that Lord Howard was a Liar and a Rogue; and this was set round the Town by his Creatures, who ran with it from Coffee-house to Coffee-house. The next Gazette mention'd, that the King had pardon'd him, on confessing the late Plot. Lord Halifax press'd the Duke of Monmouth to pass that over, and to impute it to the Impertinency of his Enemies, and to the King's Easiness. But he could not prevail: Yet he said little, till his Pardon was pass'd; but then he openly deny'd that he had confess'd the Plot."

Thus the Bishop: And if any Regard is due to his Authority, we are yet farther warranted to abide by our former Conclusion, That the Article in the Gazette was a Matter of Surprise upon him, and indeed a Treason on the Promises which had induced him to come in. What his Confessions amounted to is a new Question: In his own two Letters he pleads Provocations, real or imaginary, in alleviation of what he had done; purges himself from a criminal Thought against the King; asserts it was even to save his Majesty's Life he ventur'd his own; and reduces his whole Acknowledgment to Offences against the Duke; whereas it was for Offences against his Majesty, that Russell and Sydney dy'd; and the Plot was never call'd a Plot against the Duke, but against the King. With these Acknowledgments his Majesty was satisfy'd, and requir'd nothing farther of him, but to say what would please and bind the Duke; nay caution'd him to avoid Questions as much as possible. Whether therefore it is supposable that his Grace, who had express'd such a Diffidence of his Royal Highness, as to stipulate, that he should not even be trusted with his Letter, would voluntarily enter into a dangerous Detail, and even descend to mention Particulars, and name Persons, never nam'd or mention'd before, let the candid and discerning Reader judge: For as to his own Diary, he only says in it, that they all play'd their Parts well, and he in particular; which was the utmost the King had recommended to him.

Those, however, who put an implicit Confidence in the before-quoted Account of his Royal Highness affirm in the following broad Terms: "That the King was incens'd at the Report of a Matter so false and impudent, (viz. That the Duke of Monmouth had deny'd the Conspiracy, which he was said in the Gazette to own, &c.) and, for Correction thereof, propos'd, that his Grace might come to the Council, and make some Declaration, which might be there enter'd, and afterwards publish'd: But (says his Majesty) he is such a BLOCKHEAD, that there will be Mistakes, and he will not speak as he ought. Upon this the Duke of Ormond propos'd somewhat to be put by the Duke of Monmouth into Writing, to prevent Mistakes on all Sides; the King lik'd the Method, and said he would order it accordingly."

Thus the King is uniformly represented in these Accounts, as indissolubly attach'd to his Brother; and not the least Insinuation is any where dropt, that he had all his Managements to preserve with his Son: But the Truth is, that he scarce enter'd the Stage in one Character, but he re-quer'd in another: For the Duke's Diary bears witness, that, on the very Day the said Gazette was publish'd, namely November 26, his Majesty made use of those relenting Expressions with respect to Lord Ruffel, before-quoted: And that Lord Hallifax, that very Night, told his Grace, The Duke began to smell out the King's Carriage, and had in the Morning been told by one of his Creatures, That all that was done was but sham. In treating therefore of the King's Earnestness to bring the Duke to a more explicit Confession of the Plot, we may fairly and candidly ascribe a great Part of it to his Desire to get the better of his Brother's Suspicions, which, if suffer'd to continue, would expose him to continual Uneasiness.

Thus, tho' his Majesty gave into the Duke of Ormond's Proposal, he undertook for the Execution of it himself; and, concurring with this very Account, we find, by Bishop Barnet, the Marquis of Hallifax, who had been in the Secret all along, was the Person employ'd by him to persuade the Duke to swallow this bitter Pill, for Persuasion was all that could be made use of: His Pardon was already seal'd; and there was no compelling him to give that under his own Hand, which he had before complain'd of as an Injury to him, when set forth by the Authority of King and Council. Hence, however, it appear'd, that his Royal Highness, and his Friends, were no bad Politicians; for in prevailing with the King to urge this Point, one of these Consequences was sure to follow: If the Duke of Monmouth refus'd to gratify his Majesty, his Disgrace would be unavoidable: And, if he did, he must break with his Party for good and all; for not a Man would ever confide in him any more.

His Grace, it must be own'd, was far from being a first-rate Genius; but then, on the other hand, he was as far from being the Blockhead which we find him so coarsely represented to be: He had surrender'd himself to a Father as well as a King; he had been assur'd, that nothing but what was both safe and honourable should be exacted from him; and that all he had to do was, to say such things as would pacify his Royal Highness: The things he had said had been held sufficient for that purpose; and in virtue thereof, he had receiv'd his Pardon. Thus far, therefore, it appears, that he had made no bad Negotiation of it; and as to this new Difficulty that he was fallen into, it was unexpected, unforeseen, and, in fact, he had apparently more Reason to complain of, than to comply with it; since it was entirely foreign to, and inconsistent with, the Terms on which he had made his Submissions to his R. Highness. It requir'd, therefore, all the Skill and Address that even Lord Hallifax was Master of, to superintend this new Condition on a Treaty already perfected; and to prevail with his Grace to do that after he was pardon'd, which had not been requir'd of him before. "He press'd him, says Bishop Barnet, to write a Letter to the King, acknowledging he had confess'd the Plot. Plot was a general Word, that might signify as much or as little as a Man pleas'd: They had certainly dangerous Consultations among them, which might be well call'd Plots. He said, the Service he might do his Friends by such a general Letter, and by his gaining the King's Heart upon it, would quickly balance the seeming Prejudice that such a general Acknowledgment would bring them under, which could do them no Hurt." By these and the like Arguments, it seems, the Duke was prevail'd upon to pleasure the King with the Concession requir'd: And we find elsewhere, "That he presented the Paper with his own Hand to his Majesty; and that before it was read in this Committee, which was held at the Duchies of Portsmouth's Lodgings, he made, before all the Company there present, a like Declaration, calling himself Blockhead for being so long in all Company, that were a Parcel of Wish, &c. When the Paper came to be consider'd in the Committee, it was found to be finely worded, full of Sorrow for displeasing the King, and of Acknowledgment of his Folly. The Duke of Ormond seeing this to be the Substance of it, said, 'that it look'd rather like a Justification of the Plot, and to make them guilty who had assist'd in all the Prosecution; that it was a great Contempt of his Majesty's Understanding, to think to impose upon him in such a manner; for there was no plain Confession of any Conspiracy; and he that drew it up had Wit enough to know it was ineffectual, and would do ten times more hurt than good.'

The King propos'd to the Committee (proceeds our Author) to draw another Paper, which was done; some things struck out, others put in; and his Majesty correct'd it materially with his own Hand; his View being to have a plain Confession of the Conspiracy, and a disowning of the Duke's being concern'd in the intended Murder. When the Paper was settled, the King took it with him for the Duke of Monmouth to sign. The Duke made Exceptions to several things, but the King telling him, it must be that or nothing, he went away and brought it wrote in his own hand; yet still repeated his Exceptions, whereof one being, that it would hang young Hampden, his Majesty told him, 'It would not, nor should it ever be produced to such a Purpose: But that a better Man than he (Gilbert Duke of Orleans, Brother to Lewis XIII. King of France) could not otherwise make his Peace, and had been forc'd to hang his Comrades, as he, if rightly serv'd, should have been oblig'd to do.' Monmouth supp'd at Night with old Hampden and Mr. Frenchard, and waiting on the King next Morning, desir'd back the Paper, and said, That he would not appear in Council to make the Declaration he had signed, nor consent that it should be published; alleging, that he had said enough in public on the Tuesday before at the Duchies of Portsmouth's. "Yes, said the King, you were there, with much ado, forc'd to say something, and did it like a Blockhead." He then added, that he should consider what he was doing, that nothing less than his appearing and making the Declaration in Council, could either save his own Honour, and the Truth of what he had before him and his Brother declared, or justify the Government.

[Life of the D. of Ormond, vo. ii. p. 551.][He signs one, which is judg'd ineffectual.][He signs another.]

A.D. 1683.

In arguing this Matter, the King told the Duke, "That tho' he fancy'd there was no Harm in his Share of the Plot; yet it was plain he had been with others to visit the Guards; And what did that mean, but to secure his Person, and knock him, as well as his Brother, on the Head?" In fine, Monmouth was so importunate to have back the Paper, that the King said, since he was such a Beast and disobedient Fellow to behave himself at that rate, he should have it; but should restore the original Paper from whence it was wrote. The Duke said at first he had burnt it; but his Majesty insisting on it, and his Grace seeing it was the only way to get back that which he had signed, he went and fetch'd it, and the Papers were exchange'd. So pass'd this Affair, upon which the Vice-Chamberlain was sent to forbid Monmouth the Court. And this is the Account which the Duke of Ormond gave of it at this time to Sir Robert Southwell, who immediately committed it to Writing, and which agrees with the Account Sir Leoline Jenkins gives of it in a Letter of Dec. 15, 1683, to the Lord Deputy of Ireland.

This Account is inserted at length, in respect to the Author of it, and the great Authorities on which it is founded: But, after this Acknowledgment has been made, Truth requires that some Animadversions should be made upon it. And, 1. (to over-look the potherly and contemptuous Language here delivered out of the Mouth of a Prince, famous for his Wit and Politeness, when speaking of a darling Son) It does not appear, that the King made any Objection to the first Paper, or the Declaration founded upon it, however calculated to impose on his Understanding: On the contrary it is reasonable to suppose, that his Majesty was, himself, a Party to that very Paper; and that the Lord Hallifax was the Person who had the Wit to draw it up in that ineffectual manner. 2. As to the material Corrections made in the second Paper, with the King's own Hand, it appears by Bishop Sprat's True Account, that they were rather of a palliative, than an aggravating Nature: "For, says that Prelate, the Duke of Monmouth seeming willing to comply with his Majesty's most gracious Desires, all that his Majesty oblig'd him to do was to write over and subscribe a Letter, which his Majesty, himself, was pleas'd so to word, as not only to consult the Duke of Monmouth's Safety, but also his Credit, as much as could possibly stand with his Majesty's own Safety or Credit." Indeed, the Instance he is pleas'd to give of his Majesty's Tenderness on this Occasion is invidious enough; for he would have it to consist in his permitting him to purge himself from any Concern in the Assassination: But that had never been laid to his Grace's Charge: And he immediately recurs to his first Thought, by appealing to the whole World in his Majesty's Name (the Duke of York then King) whether King Charles had not in this Letter express'd the Duke of Monmouth's Guilt, far more tenderly than the Duke had done in his own. 3. To manifest that the King was driven to exact this severe Instance of Obedience, and that his own Importunity on that Head, arose merely from those of the Duke of York, we are told by Bishop Burnet, that, among other Persuatives, us'd by him to his Grace of Monmouth, he said, If you do not yield in this you will ruin me. 4. It is scarce reconcilable to common Sense, that the King should seemingly admit there was no Harm in Monmouth's Share of the Plot; and yet, at the same time, should take it for granted, that he had visited his Guards, and so far contributed to the Design on his Life.

5. It is not unworthy Notice, that, whereas in the above Account the Duke of Monmouth is represented as to the last Degree unwilling to sign the Acknowledgment requir'd of him, Bishop Sprat, on the contrary, avers, That he readily subscrib'd it; but then it is a Matter of much Admiration, that the King should be so resolute to have the Plot plainly and publicly confess'd, and so incens'd against his Grace for refusing to contribute his Confession towards it, as we are told he was, and yet having at last procur'd that Confession under the Duke's own Hand, should neither make it the Instrument of Justice to himself, or Vengeance on his Grace; but should restore it again at his Son's Instance; as if he valu'd his Peace of Mind above all things. 6. It is in vain to say, after Bishop Sprat, That his Majesty did this from an Excess of Delicacy, because the Duke should not have the least Occasion to say he was forc'd to do what he had done: For in the first Place, it is plain his Grace was under all the Force that the King, without the Law, could lay upon him: And secondly, as soon as his Majesty had put it out of the Power of his Grace's Enemies to make a worse Use of that Paper than he design'd they should, he did press it into the Service, as we shall see presently. And, 7. When his Majesty, for Peace sake, was induc'd to lay the Transaction before his Council, there is Reason to think he did not recount it simply, as it took place; for we find him, in December, declaring, that the Duke having sign'd the Paper requir'd of him, had got it away again, under Pretence of mending; whereas we have been told above, that tho' his Grace made Exceptions, they were not allow'd: That he was requir'd to sign what was offer'd to him, or nothing: That when he importun'd the King to return the said Paper, it was without any such Pretence; and that it was restor'd without any such Condition.

And now we come to the Use which, after so much Controversy, was made of this important Paper; and which was possibly conniv'd at even by the Duke of Monmouth, himself, that he might have the Merit of contributing to the Re-establishment of the King's Repose, without incurring the Reproach of being accessory to the Ruin of his Friends. The next Day after the King had made the Declaration, just mention'd, to his Council, he farther acquainted them with the Duke of Monmouth's Resolution not to comply with what had been demanded of him, and order'd an Entry to be made in the Council-

Council-Books of the Letter in question, with the following Preamble; in which the Reader will observe, that, instead of reciting that the Duke had withdrawn the said Letter, after he had sign'd it, it is said, That he had refus'd to sign it; which is a new Proof, that his Majesty did not care to let his Council into the whole Secret; and that in the midst of his Concessions to his Brother, he did not wholly forget his Son.

The Entry made in the Council book, on that Occasion.

“His Majesty was pleas'd this Day to acquaint the Lords of the Council, that since he had receiv'd the Duke of Monmouth unto his Mercy, having heard several Reports, that the said Duke's Servants, and others from him, endeavour'd to make it believ'd, that he had not made a Confession to his Majesty of the late Conspiracy, nor owned the Share he himself had in it, his Majesty had thought fit, for the Vindication of the Truth of what the said Duke had declar'd to himself (his Royal Highness being present) to require from him in writing, by way of Letter under his own Hand, to acknowledge the same. Which the said Duke having refus'd to do in the Terms that it was commanded him, his Majesty was so much offended therewith, that he had forbidden him his Presence, and had commanded him to depart the Court.” The Paper itself was as follows:

The Paper the Duke was receiv'd in.

“I have heard of some Reports of me, as if I should have lessened the late Plot, and gone about to discredit the Evidence given against those that have died by Justice. Your Majesty and the Duke know how ingenuously I have owned the late Conspiracy; and though I was not conscious of a Design against your Majesty's Life; yet I lament the having had so great a Share in the other Part of the said Conspiracy.

Sir, I have taken the Liberty to put this in Writing for my own Vindication; and I beseech you to look forward, and endeavour to forget the Fault you have forgiven me. I will take care never to commit any more against you, or come within the Danger of being again misled from my Duty, but will make it the Business of my whole Life to deserve the Pardon your Majesty hath granted to

Your dutiful

MONMOUTH.”

Remarks on his Grace's Behaviour.

Now if 'tis consider'd how very lately Mr. Sydney's Book, which had no visible Connection with the Plot, was admitted to hold the Place of a second Evidence against that Gentleman, it is not at all to be wonder'd that the Duke was apprehensive this Acknowledgment of his would be fatal to Mr. Hampden: For tho' he had been enlarg'd, together with the Lord Brandon, Willman, Booth, Charlton and Trenchard, he had given in fifteen thousand Pound bail; which was then held a very sufficient Security: And as to the King's Promise, that it should not be made use of, it appears plainly enough, that if the King was so far Master, as to be in a Condition to keep it, which is Matter of Doubt; and that if no direct Use was to be made of it in the Courts, it was to have been made public in the Gazette: And the Jurymen, who had receiv'd his Information without Doors, would scarce have thought himself bound in Conscience not to be directed by that Information within: Besides the Duke of Monmouth himself, in his own Diary, takes notice, so early as the 27th of October, which was the third Day after his Surrender, “That several had told him of the Storm that was brewing; and that Rumour had been with the Duke (of York) and had been seen to come out crying, That he must accuse a Man he lov'd.” And even the Lord Halifax acknowledg'd to his Friend, Sir John Reresby, That the manner in which this Confession was extorted from the Duke of Monmouth was something hard; tho' he insisted at the same time, that his Grace ought to have submitted himself entirely to the King's Pleasure. But tho' it cannot be deny'd, that the Duke had great Obligations to his Majesty, he had yet greater to his Honour: And if he had contributed ever so remotely to strengthen the Evidence against those who had run such Risks either as his Associates or Followers, he must have been contented to have rank'd with that very Lord Howard, whom he had so publicly branded as a Rogue, a Liar, &c.

But those who inveigh against him for having refus'd to sign this Paper will not allow him the Credit even of persisting in this Refusal. Thus, in the Life of the Duke of Ormond, we find the following Passage:

and consequently no Steadiness in his Conduct. When he was forbid the Court, he retir'd to Moore-park; where a Day's Conversation with his Lady made him repent of his Conduct, and willing to sign any Paper of the same Nature with that which he had sign'd before, and had got back in the Manner related. But as he was too desultory to be depended on, and his Confessions and Retractions had render'd his Testimony in an ordinary Way to be of little Weight, the King resolv'd to proceed with him in another Manner, and to force him to declare the whole Truth before a Court of Judicature. Accordingly (as I find it mention'd in the Duke of Ormond's) Letter to Lord

(*) Mr. Carte has also connected another Letter of the same Duke with this Account, which I shall take leave to insert; first, because, it clearly shews that his Grace, almost in spite of his Teeth, is oblig'd to acquit the Lords of any Concern in the Affiliation; and, secondly, because of the Mention it makes of Mr. Sydney; from which it may be more than conjectur'd that he dy'd for Reasons of State:

“Though there have happen'd great and unintelligible Turns at Court, upon the account of the Duke of Monmouth; yet, because I do not love to write Conjectures in Matters of that Nature, but had rather stay till Time expounds them,

I have scarce written unto you at all since that Lord's Apparition, and his Remove from amongst us. Of both which the King was pleas'd Yesterday to give his Council such an Account and Declaration, as you will shortly see, as it will be enter'd in the Council-book, to remain as a Record of the Indulgence of a Father, and the Reintment of a King. Upon the first whereof it seems the young Man to much depend, that he thought himself secure against the latter. For it is evident, (and he made it too soon for) that he thought he had Skill enough to recover his Interest with the King, and retain his Credit with his Party; a Design that required

Lord Arran of Jan. 26, 1682-3) a Subpœna was issued out to bring up the Duke of Monmouth to give his Testimony at Mr. Hampden's Trial."

Now it is obvious, that, as to the Subpœna, his Grace was very unfairly dealt with; for his refusing to sign the Paper did not vacate the Promise he had receiv'd, that no Advantage should be taken of his Confessions, of what kind soever they were; because it was not made on any such Condition. But the other Fact is scarce credible; for the same Objection with regard to young Hampden still stur'd him in the Face: And we learn out of the same Author, that, rather than obey the Subpœna (by appearing as Evidence against his Friend) he chose to fly his Country (which our said Author calls deserting his Friend) and retire into Flanders, from whence he soon remov'd into Holland: And hence it must be concluded, that his Scruples stuck to him to the last; that whatever Offers he afterwards made, they did not come up to what had been requir'd of him in that Paper, and that they were drawn from him by the continued Importunity of his Majesty and Lord Hallifax, who, by his Share in this Transaction, had so embroil'd himself with the Duke, that he foresaw his Royal Highness would never forgive him. Nor, indeed, is it to be conceiv'd, that the King was so respect'd, as is above represented, to force him to become an Evidence: For, not to insist on what Bishop Kermet says, That he had secret Instructions from his Majesty to withdraw for his own Safety, Wellwood has extracted a Passage out of his Grace's Diary, which takes notice of a Letter he had receiv'd, December 10, from the King, directing him not to let out till he heard farther from him; which argues, that his Majesty continu'd to under-plot with him against his Brother, tho' he was constrain'd, in the Cabinet, to put a Force upon his Inclinations, by seeming to join in the Persecution against him. Wellwood moreover says, it may be on the same Authority, that the King continued to express his Kindness to him even in his Absence, by remitting him Money, sending him Messages, and sometimes writing to him with his own Hand; which it is scarce to be presum'd he would have done, if the Duke had been so wholly lost in his good Opinion, as we have been taught by some to believe. Wellwood yet farther adds, He could not bear any hard thing to be said of him in his Absence; and that some officious Courtiers found to their Cost, that it was not the Way to make their Fortunes to aggravate Monmouth's Crimes.

It is true we find, by a manuscript Letter from Bullstrode, the King's Resident at Brussels, to the Duke of Ormond, that he had receiv'd his Majesty's Orders to enjoin the English Officers in the Spanish Service, not to pay their Court to his Grace, on his Arrival at that Place: But then we learn, from the same Authority, that he was highly respect'd by the Marquis de Gramma, Governor of the Netherlands; and all the General Officers under him: Which is a shrewd Indication, that his Excellency was sure, that, in shewing so much Respect to the Son, he should not give any Offence to the Father. And, finally, Bishop Burnet takes occasion to inform his Readers, "That when the Prince of Orange was last in England, the King shew'd him one of his Seals, and told him, that whatever he might write to him, if the Letter was not seal'd with that Seal, he was to look upon it as only drawn from him by Importunity. The Reason for which I mention that in this Place (proceeds his Lordship) is, because tho' the King wrote some terrible Letters to the Prince, against the Countenance he gave to the Duke of Monmouth, after his Retreat to Holland, yet they were not seal'd with that Seal: From which the Prince infer'd, that the King had a mind that he should keep him about him, and use him well." But then the same Prelate also adds another Circumstance, which seems to be wholly irreconcilable with the Fact above-speak'd of, viz. "And the King gave Orders, that, in all the Entries that were made in the Council-books, of this whole Business, nothing should be left on Record that could blench him."

But tho' his Majesty had certainly an inexhaustible Fund of Tenderness for his Son, fronger Parts and more Temper than he or they (Thanks be to God) have endur'd with. For the unseasonable Expressions of Joy by all the Faction, amounting to a Triumph, as upon a Victory gain'd, wrought such a Consideration, and so vile and universal a Detraction, in the Well-sifted, that it became necessary to mortify the one, and settle the Spirits of the other. This happen'd in a conjuncture perhaps fatal to Mr. Sturges-Bury, whose Life could not then have been fear'd, but that the Mice would have been interpreted to proceed from the Satisfaction the Duke of Monmouth had given the King, that there was no real Conspiracy to trouble, at least not so change the Government, among those he had join'd and consulted with, whatever they might intend who had (to us are to believe) a separate Conspiracy against the King, and the King's Lives.

I confess it is hard to believe that my Lord Ruffin, the Earl of Saunderland and Essex, and the Lord Grey, could have any Part in the Assassination; but it is horrible to imagine the Duke of Monmouth (if he believes himself to be the King's Son) should have the least Suspicion of it, and not immediately, and before he had set upon it, quit the whole Party, and run himself out of breath, to tell the King his Fears, and his Majesty's Danger. Yet, without the assisting Part, the other of raising Force to seize the King's Guards and Person, was but a crude Project; tho' with it a very probable design. And it is plain, that the same hands, or the like, who were to set the one, were to be made use of in the other. I will not infer from hence, that any of the Lords, much less the Duke of Monmouth, had any Suspicion that the King and Duke were to be murder'd, and that by some of those who cry'd them up for the chief Patron for the Liberty of their Country and Nation, and the heroic Champion for the Protestant Religion. But if they had no Inking of that impious Treason, they were very negligent, or ill-befriended in their own Party; and it should be for ever a Warning to all who desert such a Participle, how they enter into Conspiracies to reform the Government by Force, when such Under-plots may be carry'd on against their Mind, and without their Knowledge. At the Instant I write, I know not how to describe the Figure the Duke of Monmouth makes, nor fancy what Course of Life he can propose to himself. It must be left to Time, Chance, or his wiser Advisers, to discover. And so ends my Letter, which is become so much longer than I first intended it upon this Subject, that I will for this time fall upon no other; and till I hear again from you, I know little I have to say of the Education of Ireland."

Sir S. Bernardiston's

he continued as much embitter'd as ever against his Party. Thus when certain private Letters of Sir Samuel Bernardiston's to Sir Philip Shippen (whether stop'd at the Post, or betray'd, is not signify'd) fell into the Hands of the Ministers, which express'd an overflowing Joy for his Grace's Return to Court, the very affectionate Reception he had met with from the King, the Mortification visible in the Duke's Party thereon, &c. he suffer'd the said Duke and his Party to take their own Revenge, which, according to Custom, was in form of Law. The Attorney-General proceeded against Sir Samuel (who was before obnoxious for having been the Foreman of Lord Shaftsbury's Ignoramus Jury) by Information, in which he was set forth as a Person of a turbulent and unquiet Spirit, and the Letters were said to be written in order to scandalize and vilify the Evidence in the late Conspiracy. In short, these Letters from one Friend to another were deem'd a Libel, and the Chief-Justice, while declaiming against Libelling, was pleas'd to authorize it from the Bench by his own Example; for, not confining himself to the Treasons before the Court, he discharg'd his whole Stock of Virulence against the Man, saying, "That though he pretended to gild over his Practices with a Zeal for the Protestant Religion, his Infide was rotten: He was factious and seditious at the Bottom, and full of Malice against the King and Government, against both Church and State, and against every Man who had not a Share in the late bloody Conspiracy." &c. After which returning to the Letters, he said, They were as factious and seditious as could be written, and, in his Opinion, border'd on High-Treason: To which he was pleas'd to add, in contempt of the Act of Oblivion, That they contain'd the same Language as had given rise to the late Rebellion, which ended in the Destruction of the best of Kings and the best of Governments. With these inflammatory Expressions the Matter was left to one of those thorough-pac'd Juries, who were no better than the Puppets of Burton and Crabbe, and who, without going out of Court, pronounc'd the Defendant Guilty. As to the Penalty, it lay in the Breast of the Court; and, as Mercy was at that time wholly out of Fashion, they sentenc'd Sir Samuel to pay a Fine of 10,000*l.* and to give Security for his good Behaviour during Life.

That of young Hampden.

The Court-Thunder fell next on young Hampden, who, notwithstanding his being admitted to Bail, was brought on his Trial in the next following Term: But, instead of being indicted for High-Treason in compassing the King's Death, as his two Associates in the Council of Six had been, he was indicted only for a Misdemeanour, in consulting to raise a Rebellion; which, to Men unpractis'd in the Law, seems not a little extraordinary: For, according to common Sense, the same

Offence cannot fall under two several Descriptions, nor be liable to two several Punishments. But, to obviate this Objection, the Attorney-general plausibly alledg'd, that the King had chosen this milder Way of proceeding against the Defendant, that he might have all Opportunities to clear his Innocence, viz. by the Assistance of Council, and the admitting his Witnesses to give in their Depositions upon Oath; And in order to silence the Clamours of the Faction, who had accus'd the Government of laying his Accomplices under great Hardships, for the want of these Advantages. The very Truth, however, is, that there was but one Witness against Mr. Hampden, namely, the Lord Howard (for tho' the Duke of Monmouth was indeed suborn'd to appear for the King, it was known he would not yield Obedience); nor had any supplemental Papers been found in his Study, as in Mr. Sydney's; nor had he kept company with either Woff, Shepherd, or Ramsey: So that, in effect, this singular Milnash was singular Cruelty; for it utterly depriv'd him of the Benefit of the Law, which would have absolv'd him for want of Evidence; and expos'd him to the Rigor of an unmerciful Court. There is no need to run thro' the Detail of the Trial; since all that could be prov'd against the Defendant has been already specify'd in those already before the Reader: Only it deserves notice, 1. That Whereas Ld. Howard had made two Speeches for Mr. Hampden, in his Evidence against his FRIEND Mr. Sydney, he was not able now to recollect one Word of either, though the King's Council made use of all their Arts to put him in mind of them. 2. That when the Council for the Defendant would have produced a Witness to depose, that the Earl of Essex had in mean an Opinion of Lord Howard, that it was not likely he should ever mix with him in Consultations of so delicate a Nature, the Chief-Justice not only refus'd to admit the Evidence of a third Person, but added, most savagely, that it seem'd the Earl had such an Opinion of Lord Howard's Evidence, that he cut his Throat upon it. And, 3. That when the Jury had found for the King, the Court set a Fine on the Defendant of no less than 20,000*l.* for the Misdemeanour, though he had given in but 15,000*l.* Bail for the Treason; and moreover order'd him to be (a) committed till it was paid, and to find Sureties for his Behaviour during Life.

About this time also, all the Terrors of de iure of the Law were let loose against all such as <sup>Johnson</sup> presum'd to take the least Liberty with their Superiors, either in Writing or Conversation. Thus Mr. Johnson, who had been Chaplain to the late Lord Russell, having set forth a Book, call'd Julian the Apostate, tending to prove, that the Doctrine of Non-resistance was neither practis'd nor taught by the primitive Christians, the King's Council (b) declar'd,

(a) Which was done in soon as the Trial was over, he surrendering himself into Court in discharge of his Bail.

(b) We are told by the Writer of his Life, that one of his Brother Clergymen selected the Passages out of his Book for which he was prosecuted; one of which was as follows: "And, therefore, I much wonder at those Men who trouble ward, Twelve good Men and true found it, to be scandalous and seditious; and the Sentence of the Bench was, That the Author should be fin'd 500 Marks, and suffer Imprisonment till the Money was paid. On the very same Day, the Printer of Lord Ruffel's last Speech, which was also pronounced to be scandalous and seditious, was try'd and found guilty; but throwing himself on the Clemency of the Court, was us'd with more Mercy. Two other obnoxious Persons, viz. Sir Trevor Williams, and (c) John Araskil, Esq; having taken unwarrantable Liberties with the Duke of Beaufort, his Grace had not only the Privilege of his Peerage on the Statute de scandalis magnatum, but also of his own Loyalty against their suppos'd Disaffection: On the Strength of which several Considerations, he was favour'd, if not with a Verdict, at least with 10,000 l. Damages against each of the said Offenders. And yet again, Titus Oates, and John Dutton Cole, Esq; having been severally accus'd of uttering many insolent and menacing Speeches against his Royal Highness; and the Charge having been made good, to the Satisfaction of a Jury, who, it must be presum'd, were no Idolaters of Magna Charta, they assign'd on each Verdict no less than one hundred thousand Pounds Damages.

Having just touch'd on these Passages in our way, we are next to proceed to the Cases of Holloway and Armstrong, who were the last that suffer'd in England on account of the Plot in this Reign.

Holloway,

Holloway was a Merchant Linnen-Draper of Bristol, who had engag'd in a very laudable Design of establishing a (a) Linnen Manufactory in England, and had proceeded in it with some Success; but finding the Prohibition of French Linnens was but nominal, and that greater Quantities were imported and sold cheaper than ever, was oblig'd to give it over, after some Lots: And it was in the Pursuit of an Act of Parliament to support him in this Undertaking, that he became a Politician, and an Adventurer for the Liberties of his Country. He had been twice taken after Kings's Discovery, and had as often made his Escape; and after having been outlaw'd, was finally discover'd and seiz'd in the West Indies, whither he had sail'd on a Trading-Voyage, thro' the Treachery of his own Factor, and by Sir William Stapleton, remitted a Prisoner to England. In which

Condition, either a Sense of Duty, Love of Life, or Dread of Punishment, induc'd him to seek Mercy by a voluntary Confession of all he knew, which he address'd in his own Hand-Writing to Mr. Secretary Jenkins; but without the desir'd Effect: For, according to a Maxim scrib'd to the Lord Keeper North, he was to be hang'd, that it might not be suppos'd, that he had barter'd a Confession for a Pardon; nor indeed was what he said thought worth one: For tho' he said all he could to demonstrate the Reality of a Plot, the King in his Declaration, the Clergy in their Prayers, and the Judges from the Bench had gone so far beyond him, that his Acknowledgments rather tended to lessen the public Horror on that Occasion, than increase it. For Instance: Tho' he acknowledg'd he had heard of a Project for a Raising in the Year 1682, under the Direction of the Lords Shaftsbury and Howard, he acknowledg'd also, that for nine Months together it had been only talk'd of. Then as to the Matter of the Assassination, he declar'd, That he had the first Intimation of it from Wesl and Ramsley, who were both eagerly set upon it: That he, himself, express'd his Detestation of it in the strongest Terms: That (e) asking Wesl, who were to act in it, he could or would name but two Men, who were Rumbold and his Brother. And again demanding who were for it, he nam'd only himself, Ramsley, and Richard Goddenough, and no more, as far as he could remember: And that it was carry'd on without the Approbation or Knowledge of those who carry'd on the general Design. He moreover signify'd, that when that general Design came under a new Direction, viz. of the Lords Effix, &c. it still hung so long under Dissemble, and made so little Progress towards Action, that those who waited in Expectation of the Word of (f) Command, thought it of the utmost Consequence to undertake for themselves: That this gave rise to the Project of dividing London into twenty Parts, which was founded on that before agreed upon by himself and Wade for the Division of Bristol: And that it was resolv'd not to communicate what they were about, to the chief Managers, till it appear'd from this Experiment what real Strength they had to depend upon.

This was the Sum of his Confession, and upon it was grafted one of the most solemn Mockeries ble the Nation at this time of day with the unreasonable Prescription of Prayers and Tears, and the passive Obedience of the Thirteen Legions, and such like tall Remedies, which are proper only at such a time as the Laws of our Country are arm'd against our Religion.

(c) The Time Person who was assassinated in Bell-gate in the Year 1680.

(d) Which, as he said himself, would have advanced the Revenue 200,000 l. a Year, have employ'd 800,000 poor People, and about 40,000 Acres of Land.

(e) Holloway's own Words are as follow:

"Then we ask'd, Who was to have acted in it? To which he, Wesl, could give but a slender Answer, and could or would name but two Men, who were Rumbold and his Brother, saying, if they could have rais'd us or eight hundred Pounds to have bought Horses, and something to encourage Men, they should have had Men enough: so that we found they had few Men, if more than two, and no Horses, only a Parcel of Arms, which afterwards he show'd us at a Gunsmith's House in a little Lane near Temple-Bar. Then we ask'd him, What they design'd, if it had taken effect? To which he answer'd, that the Men should have come up with all Speed to London, and surpris'd themselves immediately, declaring for the Duke of Monmouth; and that the King and Duke being dead, no Opposition could be made. Then we ask'd, Who were for this Design? He nam'd Colonel Ramsley and Richard Goddenough, and, as far as I can remember, no more: So we found it was carry'd on by them contrary to the Knowledge or Approbation of those who managed the general Design. Then we declar'd our great Disslike of it, telling him, it was a base, dishonourable, and cowardly Action, and would prove odious to all the World, that any pretending themselves Protestants, should be concern'd in such a bloody Action: and that we thought it was his Conscience put him upon it: To which he said, that he could not fight, but would be as forward with his Money, as any of his Capacity." Syrat's Apology, p. 70.

Mockeries that ever disgrac'd the Name of Mercy: For the Prisoner being soon after brought into Court, he was first told by the Lord Chief-Justice, That nothing remain'd, but to make a Rule for his Execution; and then the Attorney-general gave him to understand, that, as a Matter of Grace, the King was willing to wave his Outlawry, and to admit him to a Trial: To which he reply'd, "My Lord, I cannot undertake to defend myself; for I have confess'd before his Majesty many things contain'd in the Indictment; and I throw myself on the King's Mercy." And now the Secret of this gracious Offer was made manifest; for Mr. Justice Withins called upon every body present to take notice of his open Confession: Adding, "Surely, there are none but will believe this Conspiracy now, after what this Man hath own'd." The Lord Chief-Justice had also his Share in the Interlude; and between him and his Brother Withins it was agreed, that whereas Sir Samuel Bernardisen had, in his Letters, call'd it a swam Plot, and had said, it was lost, unless it should be found among the Abhorers and Addressers, he might now let his Correspondents know, "It was found among the Reformers of Government and Religion, that could swallow all things, that could kill Kings, levy War, and do the worst of Villanies to promote Religion and Reformation." After which the Scene was clos'd with appointing the Wednesday se'night for the Prisoner's Execution. It seems, however, that he did not yet despair of Mercy; for he apply'd to his Majesty by Petition; but as vainly as before: And there are some Passages even in his last Paper, which he deliver'd to the Keeper of Newgate, before he was carry'd to Execution, which seem to indicate, that he was permitted to hope almost as long as he was permitted to live. Thus he says, "I am fatisy'd, that all Means that could be thought of had been us'd to get as much out of me as possible." And again: "Besides I had some other Reasons why I did not plead, which, at present, I conceal, and also why I did not speak what I intended. More I may say at the Place of Execution, before I leave the World; which will be according as I find Things." He also insinuates, that he had Reason to think, Suspicions were entertain'd, that he had not confess'd all he knew; in particular, that he had not discover'd all his Accomplices: And it was to obviate these Suspicions, that this Paper was apparently calculated; and that there might be a Possibility, at least, of its operating in his Favour, it was left with the Keeper, instead of being deliver'd to the Sheriff: But neither did this new Device answer: It was still believ'd he had his Reserves; and possibly, that he might be induc'd to give them up, he was told in the Conference between him and the Sheriffs, under the Gallows, That he had Liberty to say what he pleas'd: But he did not make use of it, as was expedient: On the contrary, having profess'd, that he had already made all the Discoveries in his Power; and that he was heartily sorry for his having had any thought of recurring to Arms, he solemnly affirm'd, That the Plot he was acquainted with, was nothing against the KING'S LIFE: That the said Plot consisted in a Design to TAKE them that were guilty of the Popish Plot, and were Enemies to the Privileges and Liberties of the Subject. (These are his own Words.) That many things having been done contrary to the King's Knowledge, it was presum'd, that, on better Information, his Majesty would have alter'd his Measures, and given up those Offenders to Justice. And Sheriff Daniel here suggesting, That the seizing and detaining the King till he consented to these things, was to be infer'd from these Words. He reply'd, Ye may interpret it how you please, Sir: Adding, "It was, that all such Differences among the King's Subjects might be prevented for the future; for I believe there never were greater Differences in the Spirits of Men; tho' some think the Times were never better than now; because all things go according to their own Humour. But I suppose many in the Nation are fatisy'd, that many things have been done contrary to Law." Here the same Sheriff ask'd, Whether it was fit for him to set up for a Politician, or a Statesman? And farther put him in mind, that he had not given in the Names of the Persons he had before spoken of; meaning when he had given it as his humble Opinion, that the King could do nothing that would contribute more to his own Safety, and the Safety of the Nation, than to pass an Act of Oblivion; for, said he, I believe many are concern'd: But, it seems, he spoke of such as were Well-wishers only; and so explain'd himself, by adding, "If we should name every one that we thought would be concern'd, I believe we might name Three Parts of London." Here he again distinguish'd between the Design he was engag'd in, and that of Wyll and Ranssey, the two Evidences; over and over again affirm'd, that they never had any against the King's Person or Interest: Talk'd of Mis-government, of notorious Partialities to Papists, and Impositions on Protestants: Said, that the Stiling of the Popish Plot was the Occasion of the present: And observ'd, that tho' the Irish Witnesses could not find Credit when they appear'd against Papists, they no sooner turn'd upon the Protestants, than their Testimony was deem'd unexceptionable. Here Mr. Sheriff Dalwood saying, "I pray God all Mens Eyes may be open'd to see what is done," Hellonay reply'd, "I wish the King's Eyes may be open'd, that he may see his Enemies from his Friends; and I think he hath Cause to look for them near his Home." And being then ask'd, if he had any Papers to deliver; he answer'd in the Negative: Adding, "That he had written a Paper to give some Satisfaction to the Minds of People touching what he knew, that all Errors might be rectify'd; which Paper the Council had, and, it seem'd, took it very humbly, that he should presume to write such a thing." And again afterwards, "I thought, that if any God had been design'd for England, I had done enough to merit Pardon, having writ so much of Truth, and having

A. D. 1683. having been so fair and plain in it.—If I could have discover'd more for the King and Kingdom's Interest I would have done it.—I hope it will be a Satisfaction, that there was such a Plot.—It was fear'd, that arbitrary Government and Popery were design'd; and truly I think, at this present time, by what I can understand, there is little better design'd.—Here he was again interrupted, and told; That he was not to reflect on the Government: In particular, Mr. Sheriff Daniel said, They had neither a Reprieve nor a Pardon for him. And soon after Richardson demanded, If he had any thing to say that more nearly concern'd himself? And it appearing he had not, Daniel signify'd, They were at the End of their Commission, by directing him to fit himself for Death, and declaring, he had not long to live. He then address'd himself to his Devotions; and finally underwent the Sentence of the Law: Having thro' the whole of this preparatory Scene, manifest'd so much Sense, Firmness, and Ingenuity, as indicated, That he deserv'd a much better Fate.

and Execution.

Sir Thomas
Armstrong sent d in Holland.

Sir Thomas Armstrong's Turn was next: He also had been out-law'd, and had taken Sanctuary at Leiden: But, as we learn from Bishop Burnet, Chadleigh the English Resident in Holland, by virtue of a Warrant from the States for seizing such as fled out of England on Account of the Plot, and a Bribe of 2000 Guilders to the Bailiff of the Town, caus'd him to be apprehended there, and sent him instantly over to London, in one of the King's Talets, where it was pre-determin'd to make him feel the utmost Severity of the Law. For whereas in Holloway's Case, against whom his own Confession was sufficient Evidence, a Trial was offer'd as an Act of Grace, in this, no such Grace could be obtain'd; which seem'd to argue a Consciousness, that Proof was wanting, and that the Outlawry was to supply all Defects. Possible, having been in the Duke of Monmouth's Secrets, and being thought a worse Man than he prov'd, he was brought before the Privy Council, with a View to draw a Confession also from him; for if he was from the Beginning look'd upon as a Forfeit to the Law, why was he put to the Torture of an Examination? But if any such Expectations were built on that Experiment, the Event did not answer. Sir Thomas had either no Confession to make, or could not be induc'd to furnish Evidence either against himself or his Friends. He said that he knew of no Plot but the Pope's Plot, and that he desir'd only a fair Trial for his Life: And if the Evidence against Lord Ruffel was full and clear as had been represented, it is strange his Suit was not granted. Lord Ruffel had

Council.

A. D. 1683. been charg'd with only being present when the Discourse was held at Sieghard's, concerning seizing the Guards: But Armstrong was said to be one of the Persons who had undertaken to view them, &c. and both Runsey and Lord Howard, as it may be recollected, had gone far in their Endeavours to make him a Principal in the Assassination. Had, therefore the Court consult'd the Credit of their Proceedings, they should have made it their Choice to join Issue with Sir Thomas, and leave him to his Country. But from whatever Motives, this is certain, They chose the most compendious way of dispatching him; which was by turning him over to Inquisitor Jeffress, before whom he was brought on the fourth Day after his being set on Shore, and by whom he was treated, as if the Life of a Subject was of no more Consideration in the Eye of the Law, than in the Front of the Battle, when Murder is the Business of the Day: For, having claimed the Benefit of the Statute (th Edw. VI. which (g) provided, That if any Out-Law yielded himself to the Chief Justice within one Year, he should be discharged of the Outlawry, and entitled to a Jury, having urg'd, that the Year was not yet expir'd, and that he then yielded himself; and having also demand'd a Trial, according to the Letter of the said Statute, and Counsel to prove it was his Right, his Lordship very cavalierly over-ru'd all, by alleging, That the Statute extended only to such as came in of their own accord; not to such as were apprehended, as he had been: Whereas the Law makes no such Distinction: And it is obvious to common Sense, that if it was to be allow'd, the Privilege might be frustrated, at the very Instant that the Party was proceeding to qualify himself as directed: Then as to the Demand of Council, he said, that there was no need of any; for there was no doubt in the Case, which was thought, says Burnet, a very impudent Piece of Injustice. And when Sir Thomas again insisted, That the Statute was plain, his Lordship, with a Pleasantry that would have become none but a Care-Demon, reply'd in these Words: "So it is very plain, that you can have no Advantage by it. Capt. Richardson, you shall have a Rule for Execution on Friday next." Sir Thomas hereupon refer'd to the Offer that had been so lately made to Holloway, saying further, "I thank God my Case is quite another thing than his: I know my own Innocence; and I desire to make it appear by Trial." But still his Hold was cut off as before. "That which was done to him you speak of, reply'd his Lordship, was the Grace and Mercy of the King; and he may, if he please, extend the same Grace and Favour to you. But that is not our Business: Executed d in
We an Out-law.

(g) In these Words: "Envi'd away, and he it executed by the Authority aforesaid, That if the Party so hereafter to be outlaw'd shall, within one Year next after the said Outlawry pronounced, or Judgment given upon the said Outlawry, yield himself unto the Chief Justice of England for the time being, and offer to satisfy the Indictment or Appeal whereunto the said Outlawry shall be pronounced as is aforesaid: That then he shall be received to the said Trivers; and being thereupon found Not-guilty, by the Verdict of Twelve Men, he shall be clearly acquitted and discharged of the said Outlawry, and of all Penalties and Forfeitures by reason of the same, in as large and ample Manner and Form as though no such Outlawry had been made; any Thing herein contained to the contrary in any writ notwithstanding.

We are satisfi'd that, according to Law, we must award Execution upon this Outlawry." Here a Daughter of the Prisoner's, who was present in Court, broke out into these passionate Expressions: My Lord, I hope you will not murder my Father! This is murdering a Man. And the Chief Justice, in a Rage, ordering her to be committed, with the like Transport the added, God Almighty's Vengeance light upon you! Sir Thomas had now the additional Mortification to see his Daughter carry'd off by the Marshals: And Jeffreys having taken Occasion from the Incident, and the Ruffie it caus'd, to thank God, That he was Clamour-proof, the Attorney-General took the Lead, and said, "That the King, perhaps, had some Reason for having indulg'd Holloway with the Offer of a Trial: But the Prisoner truly (so he express'd himself) deserv'd no sort of Indulgence or Mercy: For there was full and clear Evidence, that he was one of those who actually undertook, on the King's hally Return from Newmarket, to cut him off by the way.— That over and above all this, when he was taken beyond Sea, Letters of Communication with Foreign Ministers and others were found upon him.—The Attorney was running on in this Manner, without once mentioning the Discourse at Shepherd's at all, when the Lord Chief-Justice craftily cut him short, by intimating that the Outlawry, and not the Evidence, was now before the Court; and by recurring to his first Decision, namely, That yielding upon Force was not yielding within the Statute. Sir Thomas then gave the Court to understand, that the Lords of the Council allow'd him to have the Advice of Council; but that the Order had been of no Use to him; for, having been robb'd of all the Money he had by those who took him, it was not in his Power to see a Lawyer; and it was not their Custom to impart their Assistance for nothing. This gall'd the Lord Chief-Justice; and with the following rough Dialogue, the Scene clos'd:

L. Ch. Just. Sir Thomas Armstrong, you take the Liberty of saying what you please; you talk of being robb'd; no body has robb'd you that I know of.

Sir T. Armst. No body says you do know of it; but so it is.

L. Ch. Just. Nay, be as angry as you will, Sir Thomas, we are not concern'd at your Anger: We will undoubtedly do our Duty.

Sir T. Armst. I ought to have the Benefit of the Law, and I demand no more.

L. Ch. Just. That you shall have by the Grace of God. See that Execution be done on Friday next according to Law. You shall have the full Benefit of the Law."

Every body knows, that Authors almost without number have been found to vouch for almost every Measure of this Reign; and to declame with all the Rage of Invective against every Man who has presum'd to treat any Part of it with any Degree of Bitterness. With them Charles, as well as David, is a King after God's own Heart; even Jeffreys himself is a very Daniel for Uprightness; and it is superlative Merit to be so attached to the Majesty as to have no Feeling for the Misery and Sufferings of a Fellow-Subject. But surely such Passages as these can, at this time of Day, find no Advocate; and no Englishman can reflect on such Language out of the Mouth of a Lord Chief-Justice of England without Horror. Even Bishop Sprat, a Panegyrist profess'd, has no better Apology to make for this Proceeding than to ground it on the two infamous Depositions of Howard and Rumsey, before quoted in Page 735, and to accompany them, with the following Bimley Comment: "After this the King could not think himself, in the least, bound to go out of the way of the Law for shewing any distinguishing Act of Grace to Sir Thomas Armstrong, especially when it is manifest there was scarce a Man living, who had more personal Obligations to his Majesty than he had; and yet no Man had made more ungrateful Returns for them than he had done: Nor could his Majesty forget how many other Persons, and some very near his Majesty, Sir Thomas Armstrong had been the chief Instrument of perverting. Upon which Account his Majesty had Reason to look on him as the Author of many more Treasons besides his own."

Here is accumulated Treason with a vengeance! And another Right Reverend Prelate, Barnet, has inform'd us, that there was yet another Imputation fasten'd on Armstrong, which surpass'd all the rest. "The King, [Vol. 1, p. 579] said he, had publish'd a Story all about the Court, and had told it to the Foreign Ministers, as the Reason of this extreme Severity against Armstrong: He said, that he was sent over by Cromwell to murder him beyond Sea; and that he was warn'd of it, and challeng'd him on it, and that, upon his confessing it, he had promis'd never to speak of it any more as long as he liv'd. So the King, counting him now dead in Law, thought he was free from that Promise. Armstrong took this heavily; and in one Paper which I saw writ in his own Hand, the Remembrances upon it were sharper than I thought became a dying Penitent. So when that was represented to him, he chang'd it: And in the Paper he gave the Sheriffs, he had soften'd it much." But tho' he might have been induc'd to soften his Rementment, there was no Necessity for his giving a different Colour to the Provocation: And if the Paper was fairly publish'd, it does not authorize us to conclude, that so horrid a Charge had either been laid against Cromwell or him. Sir Thomas only says, "I was told, a very great Person says I was a Spy of Cromwell's." And then proceeds thus: "I have been sent from England by the best and most considerable Friends the King had then, with Bills of Exchange for his Majesty's Use, and Letters of very great Importance to his Majesty then at Brussels. I appeal to his Majesty, if I deliver'd them not safe to him, and his Answers too when I return'd; which I had not been above six Days, but I was clapt up ten Weeks a close Prisoner in the Gate-house, and in no small Hazard of my Life for that Journey.

[True Account, p. 144.]

Journey. Before this time I had been a whole Year, at least, in Lambeth-houfe, a Prisoner; and after both these times a Prisoner in the Tower, when the Usurper dy'd, and near starving in every one of them. Very ill-Treatments for a Spy and a Penfioner. My Lord of Oxford, and many other Persons of Quality will, I think, testify my Innocency in this Point. I protest before God I was never a Spy to Cromwell, or any other Man.

Thus it appears, that the personal Obligations conferr'd by his Majesty on Sir Thomas were not underv'd: And if he made ungrateful Returns, sufficient Care was taken to balance the Account. The Historian of his own Times is express, "That he was loaded with Irons; tho' that was not ordinary for a Man who had serv'd in such Posts as to be Lieutenant (Colonel he should have laid) of the First Troop of Guards, and Gentleman of the Horse to the King." But Sir Thomas had a much better Title than he deriv'd from his Rank, to be exempt from such rigorous Treatment: He had had the Honour of being a Sharer in the King's familiar Hours; and, in tenderness to an old Acquaintance, his Majesty might have excus'd him from the Pain and Ignominy of Fetters, without going out of the way to the Law.

His Execution.

But the whole of the Proceeding against him partook of the same Severity; and it was resolv'd that the whole of his Sentence should be executed upon him without the least Abatement. He had but Six Days allow'd him to prepare for Death. He was drawn on a Sledge from Newgate to Tyburn, surrounded with a numerous Detachment of the Guards he had once commanded; and, after the Executioner had done his Office, his Bowels were taken out and burnt, his Body was divided, and his Quarters were hung up in terror.

Even those who have treated his Memory with the most Bitterness are forced to acknowledge, that he bore the Ignominy of being made a public Spectacle without being decompos'd; and that he fac'd the King of Terrors without being terrify'd. As to the Scene that pass'd between him and the Sheriff, under the Gallows, it was just the reverse of Holloway's; for whereas that ran into a Length of Question and Answer: In this the Sheriff signify'd his Purpose not to ask any Questions, and the Prisoner his Desire, that no body else would: And whereas the Sheriff farther told him, he had Leave to say what he pleas'd, provid'd he did not upbraid the Government, he declin'd speaking to the People at all; and said his Mind was contain'd in the (b) Paper which he then deliver'd. After these few Words had been exchanging, Dr. Tenison pray'd with him: He also pray'd by himself; and having thank'd the Doctor for his Christian Offices, and sent his last Farewell to his Wife and Children, reugg'd his Body into the Hands of the Executioner, and his Soul to him that gave it.

There were no Remarks made upon his Speech; which Dr. Burnet intimates was owing to the Passage in it, which contain'd an Answer to the Calumny rais'd upon him by the King; and also, "because they saw how much Ground they had lost by this Stretch of Law, and how little they had gain'd by his Death."

But surely this latter Consideration had little Weight; for in the very next Michaelmas Term following, when Armstrong's Story was yet fresh in every one's Memory, one Mr. Joseph Hayes, an eminent Citizen of London, was indicted for High-Treason, and put on his Country for his Life; for that he had traitorously reliev'd the said Armstrong, by affigning or paying to him, or for his Use, 150 l. contrary to the Duty of his Allegiance, &c. which Indictment was supported by the following Evidence, viz. 1. One Everis swore, That Sir Thomas Armstrong, at Cleve, shew'd him a Bill of Exchange for 160 l. odd Money, which was sign'd Joseph Hayes, and drawn upon Israel Hayes, his Brother, of Amsterdam; and also a Letter of Advice from the said Israel Hayes, that he had remitted the said Sum to Cleve. 2. Three Letters were produc'd in Court, which Chudleigh's Secretary swore were the Letters found upon Sir Thomas Armstrong, when taken at Leyden, and which Hayes a Merchant indic'd for High Treason, for remitting Money to him traitorously.

(b) The Residue of which was as follows:

"On Saturday last I was brought to the King's Bench Bar on an Outlawry of High-Treason; I was ask'd, What I had to say for myself that Judgment of Death should not pass? I was beyond seas when the Outlawry came out; I thought a Writ of Error to reverse it the Law allow'd; I pray'd I might be allow'd a Trial for my Life, according to the Laws of the Land; I was deny'd the Senate of Edward VI. which was express'd for it, it being within the Twelve Months allow'd by that Statute. If signify'd nothing, I was with an anonymous Resolutions condemn'd, and made a Precedent, tho' Mr. Hobbes says the little before, had it offer'd him: I cannot but think all the World will conclude my Case very different, else why refer'd to me?"

Mr. Attorney said I was accus'd for being one of those that was to kill the King as he came from Newmarket, after the Fact: I take God to witness I never had any Design, nor ever had such a Thought, to take away the King's Life; neither ever had any Man the Impudence to propose to barbarous and such a thing to me; neither was I ever in any Design to alter the Government of England. What I am accus'd of more, I know to otherwise than by Reports and Rumour, which I take to be uncertain: So that it cannot reasonably be expected I should make particular Answers. If I had never try'd, I could have prov'd my Lord Henners's late Reflections on me to be a notorious Falshood: For I know there is at least Ten Gentlemen, besides all the Servants of the House, can testify I din'd there that day.

I have liv'd, and now die, of the Reformed Religion, a true and sincere Protestant, and in the Communion of the Church of England; and I heartily wish I had more strictly liv'd up to the Religion which I believ'd; and I have found the great Comfort of the Love and Mercy of God, in and through my blessed Redeemer, in whom I only trust; and I do verily hope, that I am going to partake of that Fulness of Joy, which is in his Presence, the Hope whereof doth infinitely please me.

I thank God I have no Repining at my Heart, for the Condition my Sins have most deservedly brought upon me; I have deserv'd much worse at the Hands of God; so that I cheerfully submit to this Punishment, as being taken off but a small time sooner.

I do freely forgive all the World, even those concern'd in taking away my Life. As for the Sentence of Death pass'd upon me, I cannot but think a very hard one, being, I think, deny'd the Laws of the Land.

To conclude, as I never had any Design against the King's Life, or the Life of any Man; so I never was in a Design to alter the Ministry.

I die in Charity with all the World; and therefore I heartily pray God to bless the Church of Christ every where, these poor Nations, the King's Majesty; and I heartily commend my Soul to God's infinite Mercy, through my blessed Saviour Jesus Christ.

which had been refer'd to, as we have seen by the Attorney-General. 3. One Devis depos'd, That he had seen Sir Thomas, alias Henry Laurence, and Israel Hayes, together at Amsterdam: And that he had heard the King several times abus'd by the English Fugitives at that Place. 4. One of the said Letters, directed to Henry Laurence, and subscrib'd Joseph Hayes, was read, importing, that at his Desire he had sent him a Bill, &c. 5. One Wolpole, who had been a Servant to the Prisoner, swore, that he believ'd the Letter was his Master's Hand. 6. The East-India Company's Books, in which was a Contract sign'd by the Prisoner, were produc'd, and on a Comparison of the Hand there with that of the Letter, they were pronounced to be the same. 7. The like Comparison was made between the said Letter and a Note of the Prisoner produced by one Captain Poirdecause; and the like Decision was pass'd upon it. 8. Another of the Letters found in Sir Thomas's Pocket, address'd to him, and sign'd Joseph Hayes, was read. 9. Atterbury, the Messenger, who had taken the Prisoner, and who had, most unfairly, been permitted to be present at his Examination, that he might be qualify'd for an Evidence, depos'd, That when the Letter was shewn to the Prisoner before the Council, and the King and the Lord Keeper press'd him to declare whether it was his Hand or not, he, the Prisoner answer'd, He should say nothing to it: If they could prove it upon him, well and good. Lastly, the Lord Chief-Justice himself was pleas'd to say, in what Capacity it is hard to ascertain, "That this was true: The Prisoner had not absolutely deny'd the Letter; but said, he was not bound to accuse himself; only he had indubitably deny'd that he knew either Laurence or Armstrong."

From this Sketch of the Evidence, and in truth from the very Face of the Indictment, it is apparent, that whatever Game the Court started, the Lawyers undertook to run it down; and that they had shook hands with Shame, as well as Virtue. It happen'd however that the Prisoner was a Man of Sense and Spirit; whom the Fury of the Bench could not daunt, nor the Craft of the Bar bewilder. Thus, at the very Opening of the Trial, he shew'd what Metal he was made of, and how hard a Task they would have either to bend or break him; for he made no less than Thirty-five peremptory Challenges, that he might have the better Chance at least for an upright Jury, which he was sensible was the single Thread on which his Life depended.

When he enter'd on his Defence, he undertook to shew, that Wolpole was govern'd by Malice, or some corrupt Motive, to appear against him: He alleg'd, that instead of having two Witnesses against him, as the Law requir'd, only a Letter was produc'd, which it was not even pretended that Everis the first Witness had ever seen, and whose Testimony, as to the Payment of the Money, was only Hearsay: That there was a flagrant Inconsistency in the Indictment, and the Proof brought in support of it; for, according to the first, the Money was paid in London; and, according to the last, it was paid beyond-sea. He also started several Points of Law, on which he demanded the Assistance of Council: As, Whether the Proclamation and Outlawry were to be deem'd a sufficient Proof that he knew Armstrong was guilty of High-Treason; without which it was no Crime to hold Correspondence with him. 2. Whether Similitude of Hands was Evidence in High-Treason. And, 3. Whether he could be try'd for a Fact said to be done beyond-sea, any otherwise than by a special Commission. &c. as prescrib'd by the Statute 35 Hen. VIII. c. 2. But he was over-ruled in all. He then call'd one Mr. Sturdevant, who had dealt with him for several thousand Pounds; who being shewn the Letter concerning the Bill, declar'd that he did not believe it to be the Prisoner's Hand. He also happen'd to say, that he was not a Person of that Quality to give Sir Thomas Armstrong 150 Guineas (for that was the Sum spoken of by Everis, tho' 150 l. was specify'd in the Indictment) which gave his Lordship occasion to say, in his humane, impartial, well-bred Manner, "That they all knew he had been a very active, busy Fellow about the City; as forward a Spark as any he knew. He did not know his Quality indeed, but he knew his Qualifications, that he had always been factious and turbulent against the King and Government." Having clear'd his Way thro' these malignant Aspersions, the Prisoner proceeded to observe, That the Common-Sergeant had had his Books several Days, in which there was an Account of 20,000 l. between him and his Brother, but not a Minute of the Name of Laurence, or any such Sum paid; though there was an Account of divers Parcels of Money disburs'd in little Sums, amounting to the Whole to the Sum in the Indictment. But then he also observ'd, (and appeal'd upon it to any Merchant) that Bills of Exchange were never paid piecemeal. He then call'd forth of his Fellow-Citizens to his Character, one of them an Alderman, who all of them acknowledg'd he was a fair Dealer.— Here his Lordship took fire again, and ask'd, "Whether they had been how active he had been when Cornish and Bishop, and such-like Men were chosen Sheriffs?" Upon which the Prisoner, with a proper Disdain, took the Cause out of his Hands, and address'd himself wholly to the Jury, conjuring them to regard only the Evidence before them; observing, that the Witnesses did not swear positively, but only according to their Belief: That no Two of them swore to the same Point: That Cauldleigh's Secretary alone had sworn the Letter was found in Sir Thomas's Papers: And that Everis alone had sworn, that he had seen such a Bill, but did not know the Hand: Protesting, in the Presence of God, Angels, and Men, that he had never given, sent, lent, paid, or order'd to be paid, any Money, directly or indirectly, to Sir Thomas Armstrong, or Henry Laurence, or by any other.

other Name, or for his Use: And this, said he, Speak without Counterfitting or Equivocation.— He farther alledg'd, That Overtures of Life had been made him, on certain Terms; and ask'd, Whether they could think he would have ris'd his Life, if he might have secur'd it by declaring the Truth? This gave his Lordship an Opportunity to let loose another Storm; but fall to no Effect: The Prisoner justify'd what he had said, by adding, "That he had been told, the Way to save his Life was to confess: And that one Mr. Foster was the Man who had told him so." To which the Chief-Justice reply'd, whether as Party, or Witness, is again uncertain, "That he also could tell him of (7) four or five thousand Pounds offer'd for his Escape." And thus Recrimination was to hold the Place of Argument. But the Prisoner was still above him, and deserves to be pointed out as worthy the Admiration of Posterity, for having clos'd his Defence in the following earnest, affecting, and sensible Manner: "Gentlemen, I have declar'd to you the whole Truth, with all the Solemnity that becomes an innocent Man; and you have heard the Evidence: It is nothing but Circumstance and Hearsay: And shall a Man's Life be taken away for I believe,— I think,— or, I have heard? Gentlemen, you are my Fellow-Citizens and Fellow-Christians; of the same Reformed Religion that I am; and I hope you are Tworn into this Service without any Prejudice against me, but with an impartial Resolution to do Justice: And therefore I cheerfully leave the Matter to you. I am sure, that if God help me, and deliver me in this Exigency, it is you that, under him, must preserve my Life. Gentlemen, the great Uncertainties, Improbabilities, and Consequences in this Case, I hope will be weigh'd by you. We must all die; and I am sure it will be no Grief to you, when you come to die, that you have acquitted an innocent Man. I leave it with you. The Lord direct you."

The Effect of this warm, courageous, and pathetic Address was no doubt visible to the Bench; and to throw a Dump upon it, the Lord Chief-Justice, in his Charge, employ'd all his Powers and Faculties to make his Protestations pass for a Strain of the same Hypocrisy, which, according to him, was the distinguishing Characteristic of the whole Party. But for this once he lost his Labour. There happen'd to be a Sprinkling of Men of Conscience among this Jury, who refus'd to go thro' the infamous Drudgery expected from them: And hence it happen'd, that, after a Debate of two Hours, they brought in their Verdict NOT GUILTY. Whereupon the Prisoner was discharg'd; tho' the King's Attorney had the Modesty to move, That, in consideration of the strong Evidence against him, he might be first oblig'd to give Security for his good Behaviour during Life.

The Prosecution of the Scottish Part of this Protestant Plot remains still to be discours'd of: But as it may be reasonably enough presum'd, that the Subject grows stale upon our Hands, and the Subject-matter of the Treaty between the Malecontents of both Nations has already been touch'd upon, we shall reduce what we have farther to add to the narrowest Bounds possible.

The first Notice the Court receiv'd that the Scottish Gentlemen, who were come up to London under the Pretence of a Deputation from the Caroline Company, had any other Design on foot, came from Shepherd: But his Evidence was only Hearsay, from Ferguson and Baillie of Jerviswood, and encl'ed besides in a Signification, that the Money they demand'd could not be rais'd, and so the Project became abortive. Major Hobbes, a Friend and Agent of the Earl of Argyll's, made the next Discovery; and all he had to depose was, That Ferguson was carrying on a Money-Treaty with certain great Persons, to enable the said Earl to raise a Rebellion in Scotland: That they had offer'd him demanded 30,000*l.* That they had offer'd but 10,000*l.* which he did not know whether the Earl had accepted of or not: And that he had heard these great Men were the Duke of Monmouth, and the Lords Russell and Grey; but that he had never convers'd with any of them himself. Thus far his Evidence was as inconclusive as the other: But then certain Letters were found upon him in Cypher, to and from the said Earl and his Lady; and he acknowledg'd that one Carstairs, a zealous Field-preacher, was concern'd in carrying on the said Correspondence; and that one Spence was in the Secret of the Cypher: Both of whom were immediately apprehended; as were Baillie, and several more of the Gentlemen employ'd in the Caroline Business; and also Alexander Gordon, Laird of Earlston, who, says Bishop Sprat, had a formal Commission to raise Contributions for the Fugitives of the Party.

Still here was nothing but Matter of Alarm and Suspicion, nothing of Proof. It was therefore necessary to enlarge the Evidence, by drawing out Confessions, if possible. But neither would that Experiment answer; in England at least: For when the several Parties were brought before the Council here, they either refus'd to be examin'd, or to give such Answers as were expected from them. An Order was, therefore, made for the Prosecution of the Scottish Conspirators.

He is acquitted and discharg'd.

(7) It is remarkable, that the Lord Keeper North, between whom and Jessop, after his Elevation to the King's Bench, there were continual Strife, gave himself the Trouble to take Minutes of his Discourses: Among them is the Account of this Mr. Byers upon which Mr. North comments as follows:

"This was a Circumstance, that he Jessop could not be prosecuted for High Treason, and then at the Trial apparently help'd him out with the Jury [tho' as fact thing it appears as the Trial] Which, it may be, was not without Reason: yet Evidence, as fact Trial, ought to be shown all Exceptions [in Maxim which was never thought of in the Case of your College]. But since nothing new being at the Trial, which was not first before, it was pleasant for a Man hunted into the Tally, and then let go. So luckily many Enemies become Friends! Upon what Terms who knows? Life of Lord Keeper North, p. 214.

Spence and Carstares put to the Torture.

the removing them to Scotland: And there it seems Spence, in the first place, and afterwards Carstares, Gordon, &c. were brought to discover the whole Intrigue: By what Means the Right Reverend Author, who makes Use of these tender Words, doth not think proper to specify: But that Deficiency is amply supply'd by another Right Reverend Historian in the following Words:

"One Spence, who was a Servant of Lord Argyle's, and was taken up at London, only upon Suspicion, and sent down to Scotland, was requir'd to take an Oath to answer all the Questions that should be put to him. This was done in a direct Contradiction to an express Law against obliging Men to swear, that they will answer super inquirendis. Spence likewise said, that he, himself, might be concern'd in what he might know: And it was against a very universal Law, that excus'd all Men from swearing against themselves, to force him to take such an Oath. So he was struck in the Boots, and continu'd firm in his Refusal. Then a new Species of Torture was invented: He was kept from Sleep eight or nine Nights. They grew weary of managing this: So a third Species was invented. Little Screws of Steel were made use of, that screw'd the Thumbs with so exquisite a Torment, that he sunk under this; for Lord Perib told him, they would screw every Joint of his whole Body, one after another, till he took the Oath. Yet such was the Firmness and Fidelity of this poor Man, that even in that Extremity, he capitulated, that no new Questions should be put to him, but those already agreed on; and that he should not be oblig'd to be a Witness against any Person, and that he, himself, should be pardon'd. So all he could tell them was, who were Lord Argyle's Correspondents. The chief of them was Holmes at London, to whom Lord Argyle wrote in a Cypher, that had a peculiar Curiosity in it. A double Key was necessary. The one was, to shew the way of placing the Words or Cypher, in an Order very different from that in which they lay in the Paper: The other was, the Key of the Cyphers themselves, which was found among Holmes's Papers, when he absconded. Spence knew only the first of these: But he putting all in its true Order, then by the other Key they were deciphered. In these it appeared, what Spence had demanded, and what he undertook to do upon the granting his Demands: But none of his Letters spoke any thing of any Agreement then made.

When the Torture had this Effect on Spence, they offer'd the same Oath to Carstares. And, upon his refusing to take it, they put his Thumbs in the Screws; and drew them so hard, that as they put him to extreme Torture, so they could not unfix them, till the Smith that made them was brought with his Tools to take them off. So he confess'd all he knew, which amounted to little more than some Discourses of taking off the Duke; to which he said, that he answer'd, His Principles could not come up to that."

The very Words of Carstares, as to this Matter are as follow: "This Mr. Ferguson had in October or November before, as the Deponent remembers, in a Conversation with the Deponent in Chappide, or the Streets somewhere thereabout, said, that for the saving of innocent Blood, it would be necessary to cut off a few, insinuating the King and the Duke, but cannot be positive whether he nam'd them or not. To which the Deponent said, That's Work for our wild People in Scotland; my Conscience does not serve me for such things." Of all Confessions, those extorted by the Rack, deserve the least Credit; for if a Man to be reliev'd from Pain intolerable, may be induc'd to reveal a Truth, he may also by the same Means be induc'd to father a Falshood: But if it should be allow'd that every Syllable depos'd by Carstares was self-evident Truth, it did not authorize the many Engine things said of the Plot: For, as before hinted, he speaks of as great a Diversity of Opinions, almost, as of Persons; and is express that no particular Method of Proceeding was agreed upon; which is yet farther confirm'd by the said Earl Argyle's own (j) Letter; wherein he expostulates

(j) Which is here infered entire, for the Reader's better Information, as 'tis given by Bishop Spear:

"That he knew not the Grounds their Friends had gone upon, to offer so little Money; nor did he understand what Assistance they would give: That all he knew both, and heard what Carstares, or any other they should send over, had to say, he purpos'd neither to cease his Service, nor object against any thing resolv'd here.

However, that the said Earl had truly mention'd, in his Propositions formerly made, the very least Sum he thought could do the Business essentially; which was not half of what had been requisite in another Juncture of Affairs: That what Money he propos'd to be rais'd was so much within the Power of the British concern'd, that if a little less could do the Business, he had thought it would not be flood upon: That the said Earl reckon'd the Assistance of the Horse absolutely necessary for the first Brunt: That as to the precise Number nam'd, he would not be presumptuous, but he believ'd these would need that essential Number: That a thousand might be as easily rais'd as five or six hundred; and it were hard if it were at the Oath.

That they should consider, whether all ought to be hazarded upon so small a Difference as to the Money: That tho' 'tis true what was propos'd is more by half than is requisite for the first Week's Work, yet, soon after, all or more will be necessary; and then Arms cannot be sent like Money by Bills.

That there are above twelve hundred Horse and Dragoons, and two thousand Foot at least, in Scotland; all well appointed, and tolerably well command'd: That it were hard to expect Country people on foot, without Horse, should beat them up the Number: That if Multitudes could be got together, they would still need more Arms and more Provisions.

That if ever considerable thing be not suddenly done at the first appearing, it may fright a little, but will do no good.

That the Standing forces will take up some Estates; probably at twenty; That they will have for Aid not only the Militia of twenty thousand Foot and two thousand Horse, but all the Heritors, to the Number it may be of fifty thousand Men: That tho' many should be unwilling to fight for the Standing forces; yet most will once join, and many will be as concern'd for them, as any can be against them.

That tho' the said Earl's Party should have at first all the Success imaginable, yet it is impossible but some will keep together, and have Assistance from all the three Kingdoms; then it will not be time to call for more Arms, but for more Money to buy them; and they should then prove like the foolish Virgins.

on the Smallness of the Sum offer'd, and wishes that, before the Design be given out, he might either come privately in Person to confer with those of London, or that they would appoint somebody to confer with him in Holland.

But the more imperfect these Discoveries were, the more necessary it was held to procure farther Information: And to add the more Terror to the Inquisition, a secret Committee was appointed to search to the Bottom of the Business; who issu'd out Warrants for apprehending the Earl of Tarras, Brother-in-law to the Duke of Monmouth, Sir Patrick Hume, Laird of Polwart, Pringle, Laird of Torwooddie, Murray, Laird of Philipsburgh, and Scott, Laird of Gallowburgh; all of them Adherents of the Earl of Argyle in the Affair of the Test; and, as we are told, having been nam'd by Carshares and others as Accomplices in the Plot: Whereas Carshares in his Depositions, names only the Lairds of Polwart and Torwooddie, both of whom made their Escapes, as the Lord Mehil, Sir John Cockran, and Fergusson had done before. The Earl of Tarras, Murray, and Scott were taken: And tho' it does not appear that any special Matters were laid to their Charge, we are told by Bishop Sprat, that they freely made their Confession upon Oath; and the Earl of Tarras, in particular, without either erasing or receiving any Security for himself. But our other Bishop, on the contrary, insinuates, That the great Object of the Scotch Ministry's Attention at this time, was the Destruction of Baillie, already at Death's-Door, thro' the barbarous Usage he had undergone in his Confinement: That they try'd what could be drawn from these Gentlemen against him; and that they prosecuted him after a Method wholly unprecedented. "An Accusation, says his Lordship, was sent him, not in the Form of an Indictment, nor grounded on any Law, but on a Letter of the King's, in which he charg'd him not only for a Conspiracy to raise Rebellion, but for being engag'd in the Rye Plot; of all which he was now required to purge himself by Oath, otherwise the Council would hold him guilty of it, and proceed accordingly. He was not, as they said, now in a criminal Court upon his Life, but before the Council, who did only fine and imprison. It was to no Purpose for him to say, that by no Law, unless it was in a Court of Inquisition, a Man could be requir'd to swear against himself; the Temptation to Perjury being so strong when Self-preservation was in the Case, that it seem'd against all Law and Religion to lay such a Snare in a Man's way. But to answer all this, it was pretended he was not now on his Life, and that whatsoever he confess'd, was not to be made use of against his Life; as if the Ruin of his Family, which consisted of nine Children, and perpetual Imprisonment, were not more terrible, especially to one so near his End as he was, than Death itself. But he had to do with inexorable Men. So he was requir'd to take this Oath within two Days. And by that time, he not being able to appear before the Council, a Committee of Council was sent to tender him the Oath, and to take his Examination. He told them, he was not able to speak by reason of the low State of his Health, which appear'd very evidently to them: For he had almost died while they were with him. He in general protested his Innocence, and his Abhorrence of all Designs against the King, or the Duke's Life: For the other Interrogatories, he desir'd they might be left with him, and he would consider them. They persister'd to require him to take his Oath: But he as firmly refus'd it. So, upon their Report, the Council confirm'd this Refusal to be a Confession; and fin'd him 6000 l. and order'd him to be still in Prison till it was paid. After this it was thought that this Matter was at an End, and that this was a final Sentence: But he was still kept shut up, and deny'd all Attendance or Assisstance. He seem'd all the while to compos'd, and even to cheerful, that his Behaviour look'd like the Reviving of the Spirit of the noblest of the old Greeks or Romans, or rather of the primitive Christians, and first Martyrs in their best Days of the Church. But the Duke was not satisfy'd with all this. So the Ministry apply'd their Arts to Tarras, and the other Prisoners, threatening them with all the Extremities of Misery, if they Earl of Tarras, &c., as prohibited.

Baillie's Self-serving.

That it is next to be consider'd how the discontented English Lords could employ so much Money, and so many Horles, better for their own Interest, tho' the Protocols Case were not concern'd; this being a little Sum, and small Funds, to raise so many Men, and, by God's Blessing, to repulse the whole Power of Scotland.

That the Horle to be sent from England need buy a little while to do a Jobb, when future Events would make Scotland the Best of the West; which would be yet more to the Advantage of England.

That by the best husbanding the Total of the Money propos'd, it cannot purchase Arms and absolute Necessaries for one time, for an Army of the Number they were to deal with: That nothing out of the Whole is design'd to be bestow'd on many things useful, and some necessary, as Tent, Waggon, Cloath, shoes, Horle, Horle-shoes, &c. All which are not only once to be had, but duly recanted: Much less was any of it appointed to provide for Meat or Drink, Intelligence, or other incident Charges.

That some honest, well-meaning, good People, may undertake for little, because they can do little, and know little what it is to be done.

That the said Earl had made the Reckoning as low as if he had been to pay it all out of his own Purse: That he was resolv'd never to touch the Money; only to have it lias'd out according to Order: That he freely submits to any knowing Soldier for the Lists, and to any skillful Merchant for the Price he had calculated.

That it will be a great Encouragement for Persons of Estates and Consideration to venture, when they shall know there is a Project and Prospect of the whole Affair, and Necessaries provided for such an Attempt.

That if after the said Earl shall have spoken with Cardenas, he find he is able to do any Service, he will be very willing; if he be not able, he will pray God some other may.

That before it be given over, he wishes he might have such a Conference as he had mention'd in another Letter a Week before; wherein he had offer'd either to come over privately in person, or to meet any to be sent from hence.

That he expected not all the Horle from the discontented Lords, but some considerable Part might be rais'd by particular Friends.

That he had yet more to add, to inform all he had said, but it could not be express'd as that Distance: That something more was to be done to prevent the Design of the Enemies, which he there not now mention, but it should put them on their Guard: That he has a considerable Discretion in his Head, but all is in God's Hand.

A. D. 1683. they would not witness treasonable Matter against Baillie. They also praecified on their Wives, and frightening them set them on their Husbands. In Conclusion, they gain'd what had been so much labour'd."

Thus far the Historian of his own Times: And it must be acknowledg'd, that his Narrative deserves some Credit even from the very Depositions of Lord Tarras and Commissary Murray, (who was also inclin'd to turn Evidence); which, even as they are given by Dr. Sprat, contain rather an Impeachment of Baillie, than a Confession of the Plot in general. But then it must be acknowledg'd also, that Murray speaks abundantly more to the Business than to the Man; and thence it became plain, that whatever were the Views of these doughty Conspirators with respect to their Adversaries, they were very far from having establish'd a proper Concert among themselves. In Carstairs's first Deposition, it is said, "That one Martin, late Clerk of the Justice Court in Edinburgh, was sent from the Scottish Gentlemen in England to the Lords of Polwart and Torwoodlie, to desire their Friends to hinder the Country from rising, or taking rash Resolutions (i) in Account of the Council, till they should see how Matters went in England." And it appears that Martin actually was sent to the said Lords, by those Gentlemen: But then the whole of his Errand, and the whole of what ensued in Scotland thereon, is only to be found in the Depositions of the said Murray, as follows, viz. "That in May 1683, the said Deponent, coming to Torwoodlie's House, at his Invitation, found Martin there, and was told by the said Torwoodlie, That great Matters were in Agitation at London; That Martin was come down with a Commission to their Friends here; but he was to communicate his Instructions only to Polwart and himself, who were to pitch on such Persons as they thought fit to intrust with the Affair: That he had great Confidence in the Deponent, and therefore had sent to acquaint him, that things were now come to a Crisis: That he had reason to think England would shortly be in Arms; That it was no Project of an inconsiderable Party, but a Design through the Kingdom; That many of the best Men, and of greatest Integrity and Credit were engag'd in it there, and had agreed for the advancing Money to furnish Arms here: That Polwart would be at Glasgow that Night; and it would be necessary the Earl of Tarras and the Deponent should confer with him fully on the Business.

That about this time the Earl of Tarras came, who retir'd a little to discourse with Martin.

That then Torwoodlie told the Deponent; that altho' Martin would not commune with them upon his Commission directly, yet it would be fit they conferr'd; and, without taking notice of his Commission, discourse of things as their own private Notions, abstracted from any Prospect of a present Design.

That accordingly after Dinner they four retir'd to a Chamber, and after some general Talk of the Discontents of both Kingdoms, their Suppositions following were discuss'd of; Martin starting all, or most of them.

1. If the Country Party in England should have thoughts of going into Arms what could be expected here in such a Case?
2. Would it not be expedient to have a settled Correspondence between that Party there, and here?
3. Might it not be so adjust'd, that both Kingdoms should draw out in one Day?
4. Might not as many be expected in these Shires, and about Edinburgh, as would surprize the Rulers, and some to join with the English on the Borders, and seize on Berwick, others to attempt Stirling-Castle?
5. If Argyle should at the same time land in the West, and raise that County, would not these Measures contribute much to the Advancement and Interest of the Party? encourage all that had an Inclination to them, and scare many others from acting against them?

(i) What is meant by these Words may be gather'd from the Passage here addid from Dr. Sprat:

"A great Breach was form'd, and appear'd on all Occasions, between the Earl of Arden and Queensberry. The latter was very easy in his Opinions, both of the Soldiers and of the Peasants; so his Party became the strongest. Lord Arden's Method was this. He writ up Letters to the Duke of all Affairs, and offer'd Expedients, which he preceid were concern'd at Edinburgh; and sent with them the Draughts of such Letters as he desir'd should be sent down from the King. But these Expedients were not concern'd, as he said: They were only his own Opinions. Lord Queensberry, offended with this, let the Duke understand how he had been deceiv'd. So an Order was sent down, that all Expedients should be concern'd by a Junta, consisting of Lord Queensberry's Creatures. Lord Arden saw that by this he came to signify little: And seeing he was losing Ground at Court, he intended to recover himself a little with the People. So he resolv'd for the future to keep to the Law, and not to go beyond it. And such was the Fate of this Time, that the weak Moderation and Popularity. The Churches were now all well kept by the Men; but their Wives not being so in the Act of Parliament, none of them went to Church. The Mixture was laid before the Council: And a Debate arose upon it, whether, Man and Wife making one Person in Law, Husbands should not be fin'd for their Wives Offence, as well as for their own. Lord Arden oppos'd upon this, that the Act did not mention the Wives: It did indeed make the Husbands liable to a Fine, if their Wives went to Conventicles; for they had it in their Power to restrain them: And since the Law provided in the one Case, that the Husband should suffer for his Wife's Fault, but had made no Provision in the other, Case, as to their going to Church, he thought the fitting thing on that account could not be legally done. Lord Queensberry was for every thing, that would bring Money into the Treasury; so, since in these Parts the Ladies had for many Years withdrawn wholly from the Church, he propos'd the fitting Taxes on their Husbands to the Rigour would recal the Estates of the Country to the Point to the King: And Lord Arden came up to have his Resolution upon it. The King determin'd against the latter; which was thought very improper; for, in almost every Case, the Noblemen of a Prince's Temper should direct him to the most solid Side. This was the last expression from the King, who had all his Lifetime express'd as great a Neglect of Women's Conscience, as a Illusion for their Persons.

But, as by his right, he was determin'd to do by the Duke; who, from the breaking out of the Plot, had got the whole Management of Affairs, Argyle as well as Queensberry, into his Hands.

A. D. 1686. them? And so they might have leisure to join from all Places. And then might it not be expected there would be as many in this Kingdom, as would be able to deal with the Forces here, at least divert them from troubling England?

These Queries being propos'd, it was answer'd, That as to settling a Correspondence, it was very convenient for those of a common Interest, but none could be found here fit to manage it that would undertake it.

That as to trifling, that is to say, rising at the same time, that could not be done without divulging the Design to all Ranks of People, which none would consent to, except those already in desperate Circumstances, and they would not generally have much Influence.

That the thing was not at all advisable for Scotland, because if those in England, especially in London, the Spring of their Motions, should happen to have an Interruption near the time appointed, then the Scots not having timely Notice, might rise alone, and be expos'd as a Prey.

That Argyle's coming was not much to be rely'd on, by reason of the Uncertainty of Sea-Voyages: That he might, himself, be suspected of private Designs: That Despair might blind his usual Prudence, and prompt him to indigested Methods; so it was expected few of the Gentry, but such as were under very hard Circumstances, would embark with him. That as to the surprizing their Rulers, it was inveigh'd against, as an Action not to be thought of amongst Protestants.

That then Martin told the Company, if any had a mind for a Suit of Armour, he could provide as many as pleas'd, of a new Fashion, very light, and of an easy Rate, from one who had made a great many lately for honest Men in London.

That then all the Company, except Martin, went to Gallowghie's House, where they met him and Pelwairt.

That after Supper, having given and receiv'd mutual Assurance that they were free to commune with Gallowghie's, and he with them, touching Matters of great Secrecy and Importance, they sat close together, Pelwairt beginning the Discourse.

And signifying to them, he was credibly inform'd, that the Country Party in England would draw into the Fields shortly, and as he heard, before Lammas: That Gallowghie's seem'd visibly surpriz'd at it, saying, he lov'd better to be walking in his own Parks than to be meddling in such Matters: However assuring them, if there came any troublesome Work, he would join with them firmly.

That the Earl of Tarras also disapprov'd of doing any thing during the King's Life; because that might strengthen the Duke's Interest: That therefore he suspected it was a Project of the Common-wealth's men, with whom he believ'd few Scotch Gentlemen would join; and that he was almost persuad'd the Duke of Monmouth would not concur in any Rising during the King's Life.

That to all this Pelwairt answer'd, he heard

NEMB. LXVIII.

A. D. 1687. the English had once agreed on that Principle, but it seem'd they found they must either do their Business now, or lay aside all Hopes of doing it hereafter. For if the Charter of London were let fall, they should not only lose all safe Opportunities of digesting Matters, but also a great Part of their Strength: Adding, that he heard all things were concerted mutually between Monmouth's Friends, and the Heads of the Common-wealth Party; and tho' Monmouth was shy on that Account, yet he hop'd he would engage, or he would be deserted by that Party.

That then Pelwairt mention'd the former Queries, as Overtures agreed on between other Friends in London, and the principal Men of that Party there.

That the Earl of Tarras and the Deponent repeated their former Answers, Gallowghie's joining forwardly with them.

That Pelwairt reply'd, He was fully of their Opinion, if things were entire, but refer'd it to be consider'd, whether it were not better to comply with some of these Methods, tho' not so justifiable as could be with'd, rather than disappoint the Business totally.

That there was another Argument urg'd against rising with the English, because it was talk'd there had been a Day appointed in England in Shoffsbury's time, which did not hold; so they were not to be rely'd on.

That then it was propos'd to be deliberated what Methods were most proper in the Company's Opinion for Scotland to follow, in case of England's rising first.

That it was said, All that could be expected or desir'd from Scotland was, that upon certain News of England's being in the Field, those of the Southern Shires could presently rise, and as soon as so many should convene, as would be able to deal with straggling Parties, march to join the English on the Borders, that then it would be seasonable for Argyle to land in the West; and these Parties on the Borders might divert the Forces, till he had time to put himself into a Posture.

That it was left to Pelwairt to commune with others to this Purpose.

That all the Company seem'd to agree, they should move nothing in the Affair, till they had a certain Account what England propos'd, and who were to be their Heads: That if they design'd any thing against the King's Person, or for overturning Monarchy, they should not be clear to join.

The Earl of Tarras and Gallowghie's also, make the actual Rising of the English the Condition,  sine qua non, of the Scots doing the same: And thus it becomes more and more apparent, that after all these Consultations and Negotiations, the Shell was more likely to burst in the Hands of those who held it, than upon the Heads of those against whom it was aim'd. And we shall now find, that if it was not expressly agreed, it was sufficiently understood, that Baillie was to be the only Sacrifice: For having procur'd this Evidence against him, dying as he was, he was brought upon his Tryal for capital Treasons: And tho' his Council objected, that he ought to have had fifteen Days notice of

Triall,

A. D. 1685. Trial, that had been (*) prosecuted before, and severely fin'd for the same Offence; and that in Cases of Treason, Accomplices were not legal Witnesses, all was over-ru'd. The Earl of Tarras, Comissary Montro, and Carstairs, in (1) Person, appear'd against him: And by way of Auxiliary, the Depositions of Shepherd and Bourne, in London, consisting of what they had severally heard from Ferguson concerning the Prisoner's Transactions there were read. Bishop Burnet says, that though the Witnesses exceeded the Truth, all they depos'd did not amount to full Proof; with what Reason those alone who are acquainted with the Laws of Scotland can determine. But the Earl of Tarras depos'd, That he went to London to negotiate a Sum of Money to enable Argyle to invade Scotland; and that he writ him word by Martin, that 10,000*l.* was to be rais'd for that Purpose. Montro, That Baillie had spok'd to him more than once of getting Money from the English for Argyle, to promote an Insurrection; and that Martin receiv'd his Commission, above specify'd, in Baillie's Chamber, from all the Persons present; namely, the Prisoner, the Deponent, Carstairs, &c. And this last Particular was not only confirm'd by the said Carstairs, but he likewise swore, That he met the Prisoner at Shepherd's in Company with Lord Russel; at which time, he, the Deponent, made the Earl of Argyle's Proposal to his Lordship for raising 30,000*l.* That his Lordship reply'd, 'So much could not be rais'd at that time; but that if they had 10,000*l.* to begin with, that would draw People in: And yet further (a) officiously and impertinently, if not falsely, That he had heard of the Design of killing the King and the Duke from Shepherd, who said, that some were fall of it; and that he, himself, had communicated the Design to Quon Crisfith, and Mede, Dissenting Preacher, who all concurr'd in it. This was the Sum of the Evidence: And nothing the Prisoner could urge in his Defence making an equal Impression on the Jury (who, according to the Custom of Scotland, consisted of twelve Gentlemen, one Knight, and two Peers) they unanimously pronounc'd him, Guilty. And to afraid were those in Power, says Dr. Burnet, lest Death should be too quick for them, that he was condemn'd by the Bench to be executed the same Day.

"He was very little disturb'd at all; he proceeds this Bishop: His languishing in a solitary manner made Death a very agreeable Deliverance to him. He, in his last Speech shew'd, that in several Particulars the Witnesses had wrong'd him. He still deny'd all Knowledge of any Design against the King's Life, or the Duke's; and deny'd any Plot against the Government. He thought it was lawful for Subjects, being under such Pressures, to try how they might be reliev'd from them. And their Design never went further. But he would enter into no Particulars. Thus a learn'd, and a worthy Gentleman, after twenty Months hard Usage, was brought to such a Death, in a way to fill in all the Steps of it of the Spirit and Practice of the Courts of Inquisition, that one is tempted to think that the Methods taken in it were suggest'd by one well study'd, if not practis'd in them. The only Excuse that was ever pretended for this infamous Prosecution was, that they were sure he was guilty; and that the whole Secret of the Negotiation between the two Kingdoms was trust'd to him; and that since he would not discover it, all Methods might be taken to destroy him; not considering what a Precedent they made on this Occasion; by which, if Men were once possess'd of an ill Opinion of a Man, they were to spare neither Artifice nor Violence, but to hunt him down by any Means."

Thus we are, at last, come to the End of General Reflections on the Plot. this intricate Tragedy; for with Baillie's Death the Curtain was let fall. And upon the whole, what Reflections shall we make? What Judgment shall we pronounce? As to the mere Matter of Fact, it is out of all Doubt there was neither so much Guilt in it as one Side pretended, nor so much Innocence as the other. It cannot be deny'd, but that the assassinating the two Brothers had been talk'd of by some, but then it had been talk'd of only, and that chiefly if not solely by those who became Witnesses for the King, and who

(*) "He was carry'd to Newgate in the Morning that Lord Russel was try'd, so that if he could be persuaded to be a Witness against him. Every thing that could work on him was made use of; but all in vain: so they were oblig'd to let him go." Burnet, vol. 1. p. 454.

(1) John Burnet says, "The Ministers, being afraid that a Jury might not be so easily as they expected, order'd Carstairs's Confession to be read in Court, not as an Evidence, (for that had been promis'd him should not be done) but as that which would fully satisfy the Jury, and dispose them to believe the Witnesses." Which implies, that Carstairs was not of the Number: But the contrary is true.

(a) "The Whole of Carstairs's Depositions are to be found in Spence's History; and in the very manner these, that they were extract'd from him by Force and Violence. If they had show'd freely, it is scarce to be imagin'd but that, when he mention'd that transact'd with Ferguson concerning the Expediency of cutting off some few, animating the King and Duke, he would also have mention'd what he had heard more plainly on the same Subject from Shepherd: Whereas it does not occur till almost the Close of the Deposition; and there without any previous Circumstance to lead him to such a Recollection: Nor does Shepherd himself, tho' a remarkably forward Witness, any where take notice that he ever communicated that Particular to Carstairs."

at all; nor that Carstairs ever saw his Name. Nay he does not so much as mention his Name. That is so the Particular of the Dissenting Ministers, he does not breathe a Syllable concerning them, till his second Deposition, which was taken ten Days after his first. And tho', by the regular Manner of placing his Evidence concerning it, the Reader is oblig'd to conclude, that it was the Assassination he communicated to them, and they conceal'd in it; in his first second Deposition it appears, that he communicated no more to them, than regarding the Proceedings with his malcontent Countrymen: And Dr. Spence, in his First Account, p. 21, 22, makes it Matter of Reproach to two of them, namely Blond and Deves, That the first should depose before his trial, in substance, that it was the Assassination he communicated to them; but that, on the contrary, he himself had once absolv'd Argyle, upon Discharge of some Libel of his, then newly made public, that it was not their Part to do such things: And that the last, whom he calls in Derision the great Oracle of the Dissenters, being examin'd upon Oath, before the Lord Chief Justice Town, and being ask'd, Whether he had not heard of a bond not against the Life of the King, did, not long before his Death, take God to witness, and fabricate it with an dying Head. "This indeed he had heard of such a Plot, by the means of the King's Prothoman; but so otherwise."

who were never able to bring the rest of their Associates even to countenance so wicked a Proposal. It cannot also be deny'd but that a Design to seize and detain the King till he had made the Concessions the Party requir'd of him, had been propos'd by many more; and that an Insurrection of some sort or another was the general Pursuit of all: But then nothing can be more unjust or cruel than to couple, as some have done, the Insurrection with the Assassination; the Schemes of Monmouth and Sydney with the Phrenzies of Woff, Ramsay, and Goodenough; or to formalize, that because Men had recourse to violent Methods on the Principles of Self-preservation, they therefore meant nothing less than a general Massacre, and the total Subversion of the Constitution.

The plain Truth is, that, instead of being a desperate Band of Plotters, they scarce deserv'd the Name of a Party. But a Handful out of the Legions who stood up to obstinately for the Exclusion-Bill, appear to have had any Knowledge of the Matter. Of all the City Patriots who had to fiercely and openly oppos'd the Court, not one considerable Man appear'd on their List. Among the few Persons who did throw themselves into the Breach, it is manifest, there were no solid Principles of Confidence and Union: Sydney distrust'd Argyle, Ferguson complain'd of Sydney: Some of the English were out of Love with Royalty, and the Scots would not bear the Name of a Republic again: The Scots would not believe the English were in earnest till they saw them in the Field: Nor could the English be induced to part with their Money till they could be secur'd that it would be laid out in their Service. Not so much as a regular Scheme had been form'd of what they wish'd to have done; or of the Means by which it was to be effected. Day after Day slid from under their Feet, and produc'd nothing but Danger to themselves without any good to their Cause. And thus when the Discovery took place, it appear'd they had just ventur'd far enough to undo themselves, without having taken one effectual Step for the Service of their Country.

Can therefore any rational Pretence be assign'd for countenancing the Fanaticisms of those over-heated Loyallists, who so confidently assert, that nothing but the immediate Interposition of Heaven, by the means of so profligate a Tool as Keyling, could have sav'd the invaluable Lives of the King and Duke, on which the very Being of Church and State depend'd? Or can we imagine, that such a mighty Cobolus as any Government is that has the Laws for its Pedestal, could, like the Image in Nebuchadnezzar's Dream, be destroy'd, by a Stone without Hands?

There is no Machine in the whole Compass of human Action that requires greater Abilities to frame and conduct it, than a Conspiracy: And, tho' a Fireship in a Fleet is not a more dreadful Pest, when it takes effect, common Vigilance is all that is requisite to disable it before it fastens, and even to destroy the Managers, in the midst of their own Combustibles: Unless the Pilot, Officers, and Mariners, have all one Heart, one Will, and direct all their Powers and Faculties to one End, they have no Chance for Success, and only rush upon their own Ruin. Had this, therefore, which was to form an Embrio, as we have seen, that the very Model was not agreed upon, been allow'd Time enough to attain Maturity, it must, in all Probability, have slid into Form, by a mere Co-incidence of lucky Events; and from thence have deriv'd Virtue, Motion, Vigor, and Efficacy; which had been a Series of Miracles indeed: And as to the Condition in which it lay when Keyling came forward with his Dark-lantern-discoveries, it only serv'd to disgrace all Conspiracies; to rivet that sordid Selfishness in human Nature, which leads Men to betray and sacrifice one another; and at the same time that it serves to extenuate the Guilt of the Undertakers in the Eye of the Law, leaves an indelible Stain on their Understandings.

Having trespass'd on the Order of Time, for the sake of throwing the Whole of this domestic Occurrence together, we are now to resume the Thread of our foreign Affairs, and endeavour to shew, as far as the imperfect Traces left us of those Matters will give leave, the Influence they may be supposed to have had on our Management at home.

We left the Marquis de Grana, an irreconcilable Enemy to the French Power and Interest, in possession of the Austrian Netherlands, where he immediately apply'd himself with all his Powers and Faculties, to establish such Regulations in those Provinces, as should contribute to the more effectual Preservation of them from the Inroads of France, for the future: We left that insidious Power in prosecution of new Claims of such Places and Districts as were convenient for her; and holding Luxemburg in Blockade till they were satisfy'd: We left Spain in a Resolution to enter into a new War, rather than comply with them: We left England in a Disposition to connive at whatever France should please to undertake: We left the Republic of Holland endeavouring with all their Address to bring these Disputes to a Compromise: We left the Emperor and Prince of Orange with quite opposite Views, eager to have the War declar'd, and making use of all their Efforts to that End; And all this time the Powers at Variance had their Commissaries at Courtray, and held perpetual Conferences on the Subject-matter of Difference, on the Side of France, only to amuse; on that of Spain, with a vain Hope that they should derive those Advantages from the Justice of their Cause, which they had no Reason to expect from the Sword.

During this Situation of Things, the arbitrary and wicked Government of the Emperor in Hungary had provok'd a great Body of the Oppress'd to solicit the Protection of the Turk, and, at length, to appear in open Arms against their Oppressors: And, not long after, mighty Preparations were made at the Port, to wage War upon his Imperial Majesty in form.

King Charles
still in the Interest of France.

Bishop Burnet is express, that France was deep in both these Intrigues; and indeed it is scarce supposable that she was not: But that no such Surmise might be entertain'd on this Side of Europe, she not only rais'd the Blockade of Luxembourg, but caus'd her Commissaries at Courtray to declare, that it was done that there might be no Cause of Jealousy or Suspicion to hinder the Christian Princes from opposing the common Enemy. That however she might find her immediate Account in this affected Moderation, the said Commissaries at the same time declar'd, That the King their Master would no longer suffer his Pretensions to be litigated there; but that he should refer them to the Arbitration of the King of Great Britain: Which was declaring, in effect, that he would submit to no Decision but what was dictated by himself: It was in vain that the Spanish Commissaries objected, That they were not instructed on any such Head, and consequently could not accept of the said Arbitration: They were told by Messieurs de France, That their Commission was at an end, and that they could not accept of one Paper more. The Court of Spain was still too high-minded to be prescrib'd to, but withal too weak to defend herself from it: In order therefore to qualify as much as possible the Force put upon her, and to avoid alike the ill Consequences of accepting or refusing it, she recurr'd to the Principle which gave rise to the Treaty of Nimwegen; and offer'd to accept of the Mediation of England, tho' she could not submit to the Arbitration. But France would hear of no Medium; and insisted on having her own Will, or of appealing to the Sword.

True Politicians never make a Motion before they have consider'd all Consequences: And those of France must have laid down this Law on one or other of these Considerations, viz. Either that, in case it was submitted to, the King of England would have acted up to the full of all that was requir'd of him by his Brother of France; or that, in case it was refus'd, his most Christian Majesty might be furnish'd with something like a Pretence for having recourse to Arms. As to Proofs of the thorough Union between the two Kings, or rather, the Subserviency of the one to the Views and Designs of the other, drawn from Instructions, Letters, and Negotiations, they seldom fall in our Way: But by Circumstance or Inference, they arise at almost every Step we take. Thus it must be presum'd, that while it appear'd there was a Division of Interests and Parties in the Cabinet or the State, the Agents of all the several Powers who were apprehensive of the Encroachments or Menaces of France, left no Expedient untry'd to strengthen the Endeavours of those who were for putting an end to that Subserviency, dissolving that Union; and enabling his Majesty, by the Assistance of his Parliament, to turn the Scales of Europe: And that all those Expedients were ineffectual, is a Truth too notorious to admit of Controversy. Some indeed will have it, that they ow'd their ill Success, not to the Ascendancy of France, but to a Fear of the Malcontents; who in Parliament were in the Center of their Web, and were thereby empower'd to be more extensively mischievous. Thus we are assur'd, that tho' their Leaders, before they had recourse to Plotting, had made very large Propositions to the Ministry of granting what Money the King should desire, without either meddling with the Duke of York, or any of the Ministers, in case the King should think fit, according to their humble Advice, to call a Parliament, and pass a general Act of Indemnity, those Propositions were rejected, because the King knew not how to trust them, who had disappointed him so often.

But, on the other hand, we have already seen, that the Motion for a Parliament had been propos'd by Lord Halifax himself; and that not for the sake of gratifying the Malcontents merely, but for the sake of putting some stop to the arising Projects of France: And that it was over-ru'd by the Influence of his Royal Highness, who was known to act in all things, as if the Interest of his most Christian Majesty was his own. Besides, the same Minister made the Motion, after Keyling's Discovery; and was supported in it even by the Lord-Keeper North, tho', perhaps, not altogether on the same Grounds. The Marquis of Halifax was a Politician profess'd, who took the whole Circuit of the Cabinet for his Sphere, and who held himself equally qualify'd to preside both in foreign and domestic Affairs. The Lord Keeper, on the contrary, as we are told by Mr. North, never car'd to attend the Committee of foreign Affairs, professing himself, for want of a fit Education and Study, incompetent to judge at all of those Matters: In advising the King therefore to call a Parliament, we may be sure he made use of no foreign Considerations; on the contrary, we learn from his own Minutes, and his Brother's Comments thereon, that his Advice was founded purely and simply on the Equity and Expediency of the Measure, and the Right of the People to claim the Benefit of it. The King had given his Royal Word in Print, that he would govern according to Law: And even as the Law then stood, Parliaments were not to be discontinued above Three Years. According to him, therefore, in dispensing with that Law, he would falsify his own Declaration; and, in consequence, would furnish the Faction with such reasonable Matter of Complaint against him, as would enable them once more to deprive him of the Hearts of his People; which his Lordship very rightly held to be the greatest Misfortune that could befall him: The Torrent of the People, says he, is irresistible; neither Laws nor Arms can prevail against it. The Lord Privy-Seal, on the other hand, back'd his Opinion with Arguments deriv'd from Policy as well as Equity: According to him, This was the Time for the King to put himself out of the Necessity of depending on France, and to make himself more consider'd by his Opposition, than he had ever been by his Services: The Faction, which had

And it must be own'd, that the Advice was so sound, so honest, and so reasonable, that, except by the Ascendancy of the Duke of York, and the Money of France, there is no way to account for its not being taken: And that it was not only absolutely rejected, but that a contrary Scheme was actually form'd, to preserve his Majesty from ever being under any Necessity to yield to it, appears from the Resolution that was soon after taken to send Lord Dartmouth with a Squadron of Men of War to Tangier, (which it is reasonable to think the French were at the Expence of) with a Commission to blow (n) up the Works, which had cost such mighty Sums, and to bring home the Garrison: By which a very considerable Saving was made to the Revenue, and a very considerable Access to the standing Forces of the Crown.

Lord Dartmouth sent to demolish Tangier, and bring home the Garrison.

Remarkable Conformity in the Motions of France and England.

The most Christian King renounces his Pretensions upon Alost.

M. de Grana's Answer.

It is moreover observable, that there was a remarkable Conformity in the Measures and Motions of the two Courts at this time; for, whereas Lord Dartmouth sail'd first from Spithead August 22, on the 23rd of the same Month the Marquis de Grana receiv'd a Message from the Marshal d'Humieres, signifying, that his most Christian Majesty, having for two Years together, vainly expected Satisfaction for his Pretensions on Alost, &c. had commanded him to assemble his Forces, and to take possession thereof. Whence it became manifest to every Man conversant in public Affairs, that the Crisis was such, that France was sure of carrying her Point: That is to say, that the Emperor had already Business enough upon his Hands (the Grand Vizier, with a vast Army, having then lain fifty Days before Vienna): That she had made sure of a sufficient Party among the German Princes: That she had Interest enough among the States to traverse the Efforts of the Prince of Orange: And that she had nothing to apprehend from England.

But, however legible these Characters were, both the Marquis de Grana and the Court he serv'd were in no Disposition to take their Measures either from their own Weakness, or the Strength of their Adversary: And, accordingly, his Excellency's Answer to this peremptory Message suited better with the Justice of his Cause, than his Capacity to make it good: "Tell the Marshal who sent you, said he to the Officer, or rather Herald, who brought the Message, that his Commission strangely surprizes us: Tell him, that we thought ourselves in the midst of a profound Peace: That the Treaty of Nimwegen had so fully and distinctly specify'd in what manner all Claims and Differences should be decided, that no Man could have expected, especially the present State of Christendom consider'd, that any Alterations would have been propounded so contrary both to the Spirit and Letter of the said Treaty: That his Catholic Majesty had a Minister at Paris; that the most Christian King had one at Madrid; and that Demands of this kind should have been made at those Places; not to me, for my Business is to defend the Provinces committed to my Charge, not to surrender any Part of them."

Having given this firm Answer to the Marshal's Demand, and having follow'd it with as bold a Complaint of that General's Conduct, which he sent express by one Mr. del Val to the most Christian King, his Excellency proceeded, with all imaginable Diligence, to make his Actions answer his Words, by soliciting Aids of the States of Flanders, and dispatching Advices of what had happen'd to Spain, Germany, England, and Holland, accompany'd with the most lively Remonstrances of the Danger at hand, and the apparent Necessity of immediate Assistance: With the Prince of Orange he conferr'd in Person: And the Result of all was, that the States of Flanders granted him a large Benevolence; Spain sent him Remittances of Money; Germany and England fair Words; Holland the eight thousand Auxiliaries they were oblig'd by Treaty to furnish; and as to the Prince of Orange, he took the Alarm, as if the Frontier of the Republic had been invaded; he caus'd the States to be extraordinarily assembled, and, in concert with the Pensionary Fagel, the Spanish Resident, and the whole Council of State, left no Expedient untry'd to engage them in a new Levy of sixteen thousand Men: But, notwithstanding all the Instances they or he could make, their High and Mighty Lordships separated, without coming to any Resolution, under the Pretence of consulting their Principals upon it; which, however plausible in Appearance, was no better than a Trick of the French Faction to gain Time for the starting such Objections, and raising such an Opposition, as should end in the utter Disappointment of his Highness. And no sooner did the States re-assemble, but this became apparent: Several of the Deputies, particularly those of Amsterdam, came instructed to give their Negative to the Motion; and after warm and violent Debates, which lasted for eight Hours together, the Prince being present,

The Prince of Orange moves for a new Levy of 16,000 Men.

And is oppos'd by the French Faction.

(*) Concerning which Circumstance, Illioph Ewert writes as follows:

"The King, when he communicated this to the Cabinet Council, charg'd them to be secret. But it was believ'd, that he himself spoil'd it to the Lord Arlington, and that Lord Arlington told it to the French Ambassador: For the Ambassador took fire upon it, and said, that, if the King was weary of keeping it, he would restore it to his Master:

And he undertook to pay a great Sum for the Change the King had been at, all these Years that he had it. But the King believ'd, that, as the Money would never be paid, so the King of Portugal would not be able to maintain that Piece against the Seas: So that it would fall in their Hands, and by that means prove too important to command the Straits. This thing was boldly deny'd by the Ministers, when press'd by the Ambassador upon the Subject."

sent, they separated again without coming to any Decision.

All this while the Marshal d'Humieres had sent out his Parties on every side, and had laid the open Country under heavy Contribution: And M. del Val taking the Liberty to treat this unjust Method of proceeding with all the Bitterness it deserv'd, he was not only order'd to leave Paris immediately, but was conducted under a Guard back to Flanders; whence he was dispatch'd by M. de Gramé to the Hague, to give an Account to his Highness of Orange and the States, of the Treatment he had receiv'd, and what was farther to be dreaded from the Omnipotence of his most Christian Majesty: No doubt with an Expectation that the Story he had to tell, and the Inferences to be drawn from it, might possibly facilitate the new Levy, and even silence the Faction who oppos'd it. But if any Considerations from without could have got the better of the Perverseness within, the Progress of the Marshal d'Humieres would alone have effected it: He had already seiz'd the Cities and Towns of Leffines, Beaumont, Chinay, Walcourt, Borsigni, &c. And while M. del Val was yet at the Hague, made himself Matter of Courtray and Dismynde: Notwithstanding all which, those who at first oppos'd the Levies continued still to oppose them: For as, on the one hand, they dreaded the Stadtbolder and his military Humour more than the Power of France; so, on the other, it may be reasonably presum'd, that the Count d'Armaux had engag'd them in his Master's Interest by such Motives and Inducements, as Persuasions and Arguments have been seldom known to counterbalance.

Grand Deputation from the States to the City of Amsterdam

At the Head of this refractory Party were the Lords of Amsterdam; who were too great to be frighted, and too well practis'd in Business to be easi'd, out of their Sentiments. No other Expedient therefore remain'd, but to make a solemn Appeal to their Principals, in the Name of the whole Republic; for this was one of the Cases in which the Consent of every City was necessary, according to the Fundamentals of the Dutch Constitution. Accordingly, a solemn Deputation was sent from the States to the Magistracy of that City, at the Head of which the Prince of Orange descended to be plac'd; and after him, by way of Spokesman, the Grand-Pensionary Fagel: But notwithstanding all this Parade, his Highness, except in the Ceremonial, had no Reason to be satisfi'd with his Mission: He was indeed receiv'd with much outward Pomp, but with little inward Respect; for the Men of Power and Interest looking upon this splendid Embassy as an Attempt to dazzle the People on one side, and to exasperate them on the other, took timely Care to bespeak such a Disposition as should render his whole Project abortive. Thus, tho' the Pensionary exhorted the whole Force of his Eloquence and Authority, in a long Harangue to the Magistracy and Council, and also left them a Copy of it in Writing, for their more mature Consideration, it was the next Day resolv'd by the Voice of the City, not to agree to the said Levy: And with this Answer his Highness immediately left the Place, not only disappoint'd, but enrag'd to find, that France had a better Interest in the first City of the Seven Provinces, than he.

At or about the same time that the Marshal d'Humieres began to draw his Forces together on the Frontier, the French Court had caus'd a Paper to be communicated both to the Dyet at Ratisbon, and to their High Mighinesses at the Hoyac; importing, on what (a) Terms his most Christian Majesty would continue to keep the Peace, that is to say, till he had found out new Pretences, and new Opportunities to break it: And it was under the Umbra of this Paper, that the French Party at each of those Places took shelter, when press'd to enter into any Measure Proposal of France for the Re-establishment of the Peace.

(*) Viz. The Equivalent, which can most speedily put an end to the Differences which the most Christian King hath with Spain, is the Delivery up of the City of Loosburg, in its present Condition, or even demolish'd; with the few Villages and Hamlets depending upon it, which are not above fourteen or fifteen.

But, if the Spaniards persist still in refusing this Proposal, the second Equivalent wherewith his most Christian Majesty can content, will be Dismysd and Courtray, with their Dependencies; of which however the Town of Hainaut in Dependence (tho' one of the Districts which compose the Chancellerie of Courtray) shall remain to Spain: The Fortifications of Dismysd and Courtray to be demolish'd, as also the Citadel of Courtray, in such manner as only to leave a Wall to inclose them, for the Security of the Manufactures and Commerce of those two Cities.

Further, the Villages belonging to the Chancellerie of Arth, which, having been annex'd to the Government of Tourain, have been by the most Christian King's Consent dimiss'd by the Treaty of Nimegue, just there might be no Delay to the re-establishing of a Peace. Beaumont and Buzancy, with the Villages and Places which depend on them, of which there remain not above four or five whereof the most Christian King hath not already taken possession. Lastly, Cromoy, with its Dependence.

And as by means of this Accommodation there will remain for the future no Cause of a rupture, besides all the Pretensions on both sides will be reduc'd solely to what each Party hath been in possession of for above a Year, without any other Change than what this Equivalent is to contain, there will be no Difficulty to maintain that Tranquillity in the Low Countries, which the neighbouring Princes and States desire.

But if the Catholic King desires rather to give an Equivalent in Catalonia, or in Navarre, his most Christian Majesty will be content, as to the first Crown, with that Part of the County of Cordeux which the King of Spain now has, wherof Peperin, now entirely demolish'd, is a Part; with the town of Urgell of Compedes, and with Castellillo, and those Dependencies. Or else with Riba, Girona, and Cap de Saver.

And as to the Frontier of Navarre, with Espelette and Espelette, and their Dependencies.

There is no Condition upon which a good and firm Peace may be again establish'd before the End of the Year: And that no Cause may remain to disturb it, the Emperor, his most Christian Majesty declares, That, provided the Emperor and the Dyet at Ratisbon accept, within the same Term, the Terms that hath been offer'd, either for thirty, twenty, five, or even twenty Years, his most Christian Majesty will again support the said Paper to establish it; and will confirm, that all the Princes and States who are Guarantors of both Treaties.

But if some of these Proposals, the Emperor is oblig'd to refer to the Catholic King, he not accepted before the End of this Year, and the Parliament deliver'd up, on the most Christian King of those Places which he offers to take for an Equivalent, his most Christian Majesty not only stands to be no longer oblig'd to stand to these Conditions, but even thinks he shall have great Reason to procure himself Satisfaction for those extraordinary Expenses he shall be forc'd to be at in taking possession of what belongs to him; and that all the Mischiefs of a War begun by Spain, after they had retir'd all Means of an Accommodation, can be imputed to none but them, and the Support given them by their Allies.

ture which tended to encourage Spain to rush into a new War.

When therefore the Court of Spain saw itself so wholly abandon'd by England, to little regarded by the Princes of the Empire, and in danger of being depriv'd even of the Countenance of Holland, by the Obstinacy or Corruption of the City of Amsterdam; to put an end to all further Importunities, and to extinguish all Hopes of their being ever induc'd to humble themselves yet further under the Rod of France, they all at once set forth a formal Declaration of War against that domineering Power, in hope that their own apparent Inability to defend the Residue of these Provinces, which France so greedily covet'd to possess, would oblige their Allies to come in to their Assistance, when the Obligation of Treaties, and the Call of Justice, had prov'd ineffectual.

But if this Measure was, in the main, the Effect of Rage and Desperation, it was at least taken at a time when the Emperor was in a fairer Way to co-operate than he had been since the Commencement of the Turkish War; for, having been seasonably, bravely, and fortunately assisted by the King of Poland, in Person, at the Head of a gallant Army, the Duke of Lorraine his General, in concert with his Polish Majesty, had obtain'd a complete Victory over the Turks; had thereby rais'd the Siege of Vienna, which, after a Nine Week's Defence, was on the point of opening its Gates to the Enemy; had put them to the Rout a second time, at Barhan; and, after the Reduction of many important Places, had clos'd his triumphant Campaign.

To proceed: No sooner was it known at the Hague, that War with France had been declar'd at Madrid, than the States resum'd their Deliberations on the grand Affair of the new Levies, and the Negative put upon them by the City of Amsterdam; but tho' the Debates continued for several Days, and, during that time, the Marshal d'Humieres not only gave Orders for the burning of all such Farms, Villages, and Towns, as were deserted by the Inhabitants to avoid paying the Contributions impos'd upon them, but actually advanced into the County of Waes, while the Marshal de Crequi bombard'd Luxembourg, they again separated without coming to any Resolution. What was still worse, the Towns of Delft, Schiedam, the Brell, and Leyden, were prevail'd on by the Deputies of Amsterdam to join in the said Negative, to declare that the French Conditions of Peace ought to be embrac'd, and to inveigh against the Proposal in question, as more calculated to favour the Ambition and Resentment of the Prince of Orange, than to advance the Interest of the Republic: And yet farther to augment the Confusion which arose from this obnoxious Struggle, the Count d'Araxes presented a Memorial at this (p) Crisis to the States, importing, "That the King his Master, having been inform'd that the last Offers he had made for the Re-establishment of the Peace were, by most of the Princes and States of the Empire, held to be just and reasonable; believing also the said Princes and States would make the best Use in their Power of the time he should farther allow to dispose the Powers concern'd to embrace the said Offers; and being no less persuaded of the good Intentions of the States to further the same Ends, had authoriz'd him to declare to their Lordships, That he would yet oblige himself to abide by those Offers till the End of the next ensuing January; and that he would not undertake any Siege in the mean time."

But tho' the Lords of Amsterdam and their new Proclayves to the Views of France were hence furnish'd with fresh Arguments against the Augmentation, and to set forth the Expediency of obliging Spain to accept of the Peace on the Terms she had hitherto rejected, so great was the Authority of the Prince of Orange with the States, and so strongly was he supported by the grand Pensionary, that the most pressing Influences of the Partizans of France could not prevail with their Lordships even to take it into Consideration.

Thus the two Factions, like two Tides, meeting always in full Opposition, the Commonwealth, in a manner, rec'd with the Shock; and the whole Current of publick Business was at a stand; for neither could these precipitate the State into a dangerous War, nor could those induce it to rest satisfi'd with a precarious Peace.

In the mean while, the Prince who had, above all things, the War at Heart, and who more than suspected to what Inauspice his Republic at Amsterdam was owing, enter'd into such a Concert with the Marquis de Grana, as he had reason to think would help him in a good degree to be reveng'd both on the Deputies of that City, and the Monarch they had undertaken to serve: For as an Express from Mr. Araxes was passing by Mastricht in his way to Paris he was set upon by certain Soldiers, who robb'd him of his Packets, in one of which was a long Letter from that Minister to the King his Master, containing a Detail of the Measures he had taken, in concert with the Lords of Amsterdam, to disappoint the Prince of Orange of his new Levies, and to compel Spain to submit to the Prescriptions of his most Christian Majesty. This Letter and three more of a like Tendency from other Persons, fell into the Hands of the M. de Grana, who very punctually forwarded them to the Hague, where they were laid carefully by, in order to be produc'd when the Ferment of the State should be at the height; and it might be presum'd they would operate with the greatest Force.

The Hague now seem'd to be the Center of all the Business of Europe. Prince Waldeck came thither with a special Commission from the Emperor, and, together with the Ministers Ministers of every other Power who was desirous to embark in the same Cause, held almost perpetual Conferences with the Prince of Orange, who labour'd Night and Day to traverse the Views of France; and in order thereto, to force the Republic, at any Hazard, upon the War.

The Dutch Cepitulation
incited by the Prince of Orange.

His Zeal upon this Occasion, was, indeed, so over-violent, that rather than lose his Point, he took a Resolution to make the very Fundamentals of the State give way to it: For, whereas the Affair of the Levies was one of those Points which, as before observ'd, could not be carry'd without the Consent of every City, he sentur'd upon this Occasion, to dispenſe with that Corner-stone of the Union, and to solve all Difficulties by a Plurality of Votes. And now the Lords of Amsterdam appear'd against him with more Warmth and Animosity than ever. They had now the Patriot Side of the Question; and, grafting their Opposition upon their public Spirit, endeavour'd to make it appear, 1. That upon no Emergency, they ought to give up the Constitution of their Country: And, 2. That by rushing into the War, they should plunge themselves into far greater Calamities than they pretended to remove. To prove which, they alleg'd, That the French Minister had already offer'd a Plan of Peace, which Spain might be oblig'd to accept of, as not being in a Condition to carry on the War alone, nor even with the Assistance of the Republic singly. That there was little Prospect of the Concurrence of any other Power: That if there was, France would still be an Overmatch, and consequently no better Conditions were to be expected at the End of a War, than were now offer'd to prevent one: That as to the Princes of Germany, they were not to be depended on: That Spain had even no Call on the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, because they had never engag'd themselves in the Guaranty: That many of the rest had actually espous'd the Pretensions of France: That the Princes of the House of Branſwic had excus'd themselves from sending their Troops into the Netherlands, tho' they had receiv'd Subsidies from Spain for that very Service: That his Imperial Majesty had still the Turk upon his Hands, in Concert with the Malcontents of Hungary: That the Sweedes had hitherto declin'd taking any Part in the Affair: That England, instead of fulfilling its Engagements, acted injuriously both towards the Republic and Spain: That his Catholic Majesty, himself, was more con-

cern'd for the Preservation of his Italian Dominions, than the Netherlands: And that, upon the whole, it was more advisable to take the Offers of France into Consideration, than to widen the Breach, which the making new Levies would not fail to do.

But his Highness was no more to be mov'd by this notable Plea, than the Deputies who made it, by the Efforts of his Highness: And in Contempt of all they had to urge, it was insisted and carry'd, That Plurality of Voices should, in this Instance, be held of equal Authority with the Unanimity requir'd by the Constitution. This was certainly a very daring Trespass on the Rights of the Minority; and, as such, threw the whole Country into a Flame. The Count d'Arnaux on the one hand, taking care to heap on additional Fuel, and the Prince on the other pushing on thro' the middle of it, as if he could not how soon his Country was in Ashes.

As in the Province of Holland there were several dissenting Cities, so of the whole seven three stood out, namely, Zeland, Friesland, and Groningen: And tho' Zeland was, after some time, induc'd (by Plurality of Voices at least) to come into the Stadtholder's Measures, the other two continu'd immovable to the last; nor would even admit of a Deputation from the States, to lay before them such Considerations as might help to convince them, that they ought to give into the Sense of the Majority: And as to the City of Amsterdam, they carry'd their Refusments so far, as not only to enter a Protest against the Resolution for making the Levy in question, but to declare therein, That they could not look upon the said Resolution as an Act of the States of Holland, seeing, that by the very Fundamentals of the Government, it should have been authoriz'd by the unanimous Consent of all their Members; and that they did not intend to contribute any thing to the Charge thereof.

In the midst of this terrible Broll, the Spanish Envoy presented a Memorial to the States, in the Name of the King his Master, in which he press'd them to declare against France; and in the mean time to assist him with all their Forces both by Sea and Land. And as an Expedient that bid the fairest of any to moderate the Violence of all Parties, their Lordships sent a Deputation to Mr. d'Arnaux to propose a Suspension of Arms for four, or even for two Months: But this not taking immediate effect, the Prince of Orange, as well to quicken the Motions of France, as to humble his Amsterdam Opponents, produc'd the (9) Letters intercepted by the States by the Prince of Orange.

(9) The most material Passages of which were as follow:
" They (the Lords of Amsterdam) also declar'd to me, that they could wish that I would present a Memorial, though it were only to make public the good Inclinations of your Majesty to the Republic: I alighting, that the Knowledge of what has been already done has had so considerable Effects, that it is to be hop'd they will have more when it comes to be spread abroad. They also intreated to me, that a Memorial might be form'd, so that the Proposals might seem no otherwise intencion'd but to the Advantage of the States General: As for Example,
" I hat I having observ'd, from several Discourses from the Members of this Government, the Apprehensions they have of the Arms of your Majesty, in case the Spaniards should not come to an Accommodation before the End of January, of which having the Honour to give an Account to your Majesty, and that your Majesty had given me Order to declare to the States General, that in case they remain'd as they were, and that they would send Orders to those Troops that were sent to assist the Spaniards, not to act otherwise than for the Defence of the Spanish Garrison; that then your Majesty, for the quieting of the Apprehensions of the States General, will promise to allow them to defend from further Attacks, and turn your Arms elsewhere; and that it would be contented only with quartering of Troops, and raising of Contributions.

As to what concerns the Affairs which your Majesty expects from them, that they will not begin any new Levy: that

A.D. 1683-4. the Marquis de Grana, before spoken of, in the Assembly of the States; the Pensionary Fogel first directing the Doors to be shut, and his Highness in Person moving, that two of the Deputies of that City might be directed to withdraw while they were read, as being particularly concern'd therein; and declaring, that they contain'd a circumstantial Account of a clandestine Correspondency between the French Ambassador and that City, which was not consistent with the Welfare of the State. The said Letters were then read, and had such an Effect on the Assembly, that they order'd Copies of them to be sent to all the Cities of the Republic; and also, that all the Papers belonging to the whole Deputation should be immediately seal'd up, till the Sense of the States-General was known on the whole Affair.

Mr. d'Avaux makes new Offers towards an Accommodation.

The Tide running thus violently against them, the Lords of Amsterdam withdrew from the Assembly; and at Twelve o' Clock that Night return'd from the Flague, to give their Principals an Account of what had happen'd; having first, as it may be suppos'd, enter'd into such a Concert as the Exigence requir'd with their good Friend M. d'Avaux: For on the very next Day, (February 27.) his Excellency presented a Memorial, in his Master's Name, to the States, renewing the Offers formerly made, and declaring, That, if their Lordships would engage that Spain should accept of one of the Equivalents contain'd in the said Offers, or a Truce of twenty Years, within three Months, his Majesty would cause all Hostilities against that Crown to cease: That in case Spain should not accept of either of those Proposals before the Expiration of that Term, yet, if the States would agree that their Troops in the Spanish Service should be employ'd only for the Defence of such Places as were still in the possession of his Catholic Majesty, without interposing any farther in the Quarrel, his Majesty would oblige himself not to reduce or attack any other Place in the Spanish Netherlands: That his Majesty would also forbear Hostilities in the open Country, if the Spaniards would do the same: And, finally, That his Majesty would consent to a Suspension of Arms in Flanders, as long as the War should last, on the above Condition, viz. That the Dutch Forces in the Service of Spain should act on the Defensive only.

But whatever Tendency this Paper had to justify the Lords of Amsterdam, for having enter'd into so close a Correspondence with the Minister of France, it appears to have had but little Effect on the States-General. The Prince, the Pensionary, and the Council that is an Affair that must be discuss'd by Word of Mouth, and not by Memorial; for that would look like meddling with their Government; But it will be enough to lay before them, that they continue in the Condition in which they are, and such other Matters as may be convenient; and then they will sooner think of the cashiering of Troops, than raising more. The Lords of Amsterdam have extremely press'd me to obtain this Permission from your Majesty, assuring me, that they will not be wanting that it shall obtain its End: They have also assur'd me, there is hardly a Day pass'd, but they gain some of the Cities of Holland to their Sentiments; and that they have just now obtain'd the like from one of the Principal; and that they are using all Endeavours to bring the Spaniards to an Accommodation; which if they cannot obtain, that then such Methods should be us'd as were proposed for the Peace and Security of the Netherlands; and that they hop'd that the Provinces of Friesland and Groningen will come over to their Sentiments; and therefore desir'd me to discourse with some of their Deputies, that they may continue herein.

Sir, I can assure your Majesty, that the Lords of Amsterdam have been wanting in nothing on their Part; and that they are not wanting in their Endeavours with other Cities: But, Sir, I must not forget to lay before your Majesty, that some of the Members of this State have made a difficulty to allow your Majesty to come with military Expedition upon the open Country of the Spanish Netherlands; for that being done, it will be impossible for those Provinces to maintain themselves, they being depriv'd of Subsilience; and that it will tend immediately to the taking away of the Barrier.

In case the Ways through Flanders had been secure, I should not have taken the Freedom to have sent this Paper by a Courier; but because I could not have written till Tuesday by the way of Lige, I thought it a Matter of greater Importance, than to defer it till that Day from giving your Majesty Account of Affairs in this Country; for that it appears to me to be a Matter of so great Concern that your Majesty be exactly inform'd thereof.

In case the Dispositions which I perceive in the Minds of People do not suddenly change, this Affair in a few Days will come to a great Extremity. Your Majesty well know, that in the Beginning, the Prince of Orange endeavour'd to win those of Amsterdam to consent to the Levies; but not obtaining his End, he would resolve it in the Assembly of the Lords of Holland, notwithstanding the Opposition of the Lords of Amsterdam: There was in the Beginning but one City that declar'd they could not consent that a Matter of so great Importance should be brought to a Resolution without a general Consent: The Prince of Orange flatter'd himself that he could bring that City to agree with the rest; and so have concluded that Matter. But the Lords of Amsterdam, being animated by the Goodness of your Majesty declared towards them, and being strengthen'd by those Methods laid before them, were not contented only to refuse their Levies, but inveigh'd severely against them; and have made so great an Interest in many of the Cities, that several of them are come over to their Sentiments.

And thus your Majesty may see how this Matter continued for some time; the Prince of Orange not being able to bear the Affairs any longer, after four Days entered upon a desperate Resolution: For, considering that there were more Cities in Holland that gave their Consent for the Levies, notwithstanding the Opposition of Amsterdam, than those against it, he took a Resolution to cause all the Cities to give their Voices; and tho' there might be six or seven that might agree with Amsterdam in the same Sentiment, yet he intend'd to conclude the Levies by Plurality of Voices.

But 'tis believ'd his principal Design was to save his Reputation abroad, by causing the said Levies to be resolv'd on, against the Consent of Amsterdam; it being well known in this Country, that Pensionary Fogel can come to what Conclusion he pleases, tho' against the Constitution of the Republic, when assist'd by the Power of the Prince of Orange; and it is so well known, that he can have no great Advantage by this Resolution, for that no Man will venture to lend Money to the Solicitors for the advancing of these Levies. And this is the Sentiment of the Prince of Orange, which he declar'd to the Heer van Haren; whom he also told, that he would come to this Resolution the next Week: But tho' this Resolution may be of little Profit to the Prince of Orange, yet in other respects it may be of great Advantage to him; either by reason of those great Divisions that will be made in the State, or by pleasing the Marquis de Grana, thereby to make Spain believe that the Hollanders will send great Supplies to them, and that the Amsterdamers use Endeavours to prevent it.

Sir, as for me, I hope that for the same Reason that makes me fear the Lords of Amsterdam will not be able to obtain any thing against the Will of the Prince of Orange, that the States-General will not have Cause to complain of your Majesty concerning the Alliance desired of them, that the Prince of Orange should not be able to gain his End, in raising the Levies against the Will of Amsterdam; and in case he pursues his Resolution, it will soon appear that it will be of little Purpose; for that it will be enter'd both for one and the other Side to traverse each other in their Sentiments, and thus cause them to take effect.

I must say this farther to your Majesty, That Monsieur Fari, and others of the same Sentiment, have reassum'd Courage, and told their Friends, that they had not hither-to been in acquainting them with what your Majesty had done in Flanders, of Good 186, and yet he.

cil of State, continued to stickle for the new Levy as vehemently as ever, and left no Practice untry'd to procure the same Submission to the Act of the Majority, as was due to an Act of the State.

The City of Amsterdam justify their Deputies.

On the other hand, the City of Amsterdam receiv'd their Deputies with open Arms, espous'd their Quarrel, and sent a solemn Letter to the States in their Justification; alleging, That they had done nothing but by their Orders: That the Letters which were brought in Evidence against them being partly in Cypher, were both misunderstood and misinterpreted: And that the utmost of the Charge against them was no more than this, viz. That they had done their Endeavour to bring the Proposals of France to a Hearing, that the State might be preserv'd from the Expence and Hazard of a new War; and that the Spaniards might be made sensible of the Necessity of submitting to a Peace. This Letter was accompany'd with a Demand of their Papers, and those of their Pensionary, which had been seiz'd; as also, of Security for their Deputies to attend the Service of the Public. At the same time also they sent circular Letters to all the Cities in the Union, complaining of the Treatment their Deputies had receiv'd, and endeavouring to stir up a general Resentment: And to raise the Storm as high as possible, M. d'Acvaux, in two several Memorials, insisted on the Restitution of his Letters: And, in a third, remonstrated, that the Contents had been falsify'd; and, consequently, as they lay before their Lordships, no true Judgment could be made of them.

The Violence of the Prince of Orange.

All this was as Oil to the Fire: The Prince of Orange stuck to his Charge, with more Firmness than ever: And, instead of restoring the Papers, several Motions were made to bring them under Examination: But this being a Matter of Privilege, in which all the Deputies were equally concern'd, it was dropt as often as mention'd, under the Pretence, that they had not receiv'd Instructions from their Principals how to proceed on that Occasion. In the same Interval also, his Highness pursued the grand Point of the War with the same Ardour, and seemingly yet more Success; for he procur'd a further Supply of Horse and Foot to be granted by the States, his own Guards being of the Number, for the Service of his Catholic Majesty; issued his Orders for their immediate March, which were accordingly obey'd; as also for preparing a Train of Artillery; and gave out, that he would in Person take the Field. It happen'd however, that when this Aid was resolv'd upon, the Deputies of Friesland and Groningen were absent; whence it follow'd, that the passing any such Vote, without their Knowledge and Consent, was a new Infraction of the Union; and of this advantage was taken by the States of those Provinces severally assembled, not only to enter their Protest against it, but to order their Deputies to insist strenuously on the recalling of the said Forces: As also to resolve, That all possible Means ought to be us'd to dispose the King of Spain to agree to the Offers of France; since thereby a dangerous War would be prevented; and the Barrier of Flanders, which so much concern'd the Security of the State, would be sufficiently preserv'd.

While their High and Mighty Lordships, their Pensionary, and Stadtholder, were thus held in check by the Artifices of France, the Spanish Netherlands felt the Fury of her Arms; and that by a Method which had rarely, if ever, been practis'd before: For, after they had taken possession of the Towns abovemention'd, Contributions, and not Conquests, seem'd to be the sole Object of their Endeavours. Wherever they took their Course, these were their first Demands; and, in case of Refusal, what they did not aim to possess, they immediately apply'd themselves to destroy. Thus the Martial d'Humieres having previously erected a Battery of Thirty-two Mortars, and several Pieces of Cannon, on an Eminence which commanded the Town of Audenarde, sent a Summons to the Magistrates to remit him 60,000 Florins to exempt that Place from a Bombardment; and his Message not being comply'd with, he the next Morning caus'd a general Discharge to be made on the Town; which was repeated, till of 600 Houses scarce one Third were left in a Condition to shelter the miserable Inhabitants: And terrify'd by this severe Example, Ghent, Bruges, Aeth, and Mont, redem'd themselves from the like Treatment, by answering his Demands at the first Summons.

Finding however at last, that neither the Disensions in Holland, nor the Distresses of Flanders, produced the Fruits expected from them, the French Court resolv'd to make such an effectual Use of their superior Force, as should put their Pretensions out of dispute. Accordingly, the new Conquests were fill'd with Troops; and such Preparations of every kind were made, as were sufficient to convince all Europe that they were now in earnest, and that nothing but the highest Degree of Vanity and Desperation in the Prince of Orange, and the Marquis de Grana, could prompt them to think of holding out any longer. That the Experiment might however cost them as little Trouble as possible, M. d'Acvaux had Orders to try the Force of another Memorial, to open the Eyes of the States, and induce them, from Considerations of their own Repose and Safety, to leave these two Heroes to fight it out, if they thought it proper, by themselves. To this purpose, April 22, he gave their Lordships to understand, That the King his Master, having in vain expected the good Effects of his last Proposals to them, in which he had been so careful to remove all Cause of Disquiet with respect to the Barrier; and on the contrary, having found that their Lordships were come to a Resolution to assist the King of Spain with all their Forces, was now on the point of putting himself at the Head of his Forces, in order to open by the Force of his Arms the Way to a Peace: That tho' his Majesty was now disengaged from all his former Offers, by the Expiration of the Time prefix'd for their Acceptance; and though he might attack Places easier to be carry'd, and more advantageous to the Possessor, than Luxemburg, he had nevertheless chosen to direct his Arms against that Place; as well because it was no Part of the Barrier, as that the Reduction of it would most of all facilitate a Peace; as likewise, because it was of more Consequence for the Security of his own Subjects, than to prejudice those of the Catholic King, to whom this Place could no longer be of use, seeing his Majesty was Master of all the Country round about it. That his Majesty, in the mean time, farther declar'd, that, if before the 20th of May next, the said City with the 14 or 15 Villages belonging to it were surrender'd to him by the Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, he would not only restore Courtray and Dixmude (dismantled) together with their Dependencies, but recede from the Demand he had made of the forty Villages, which, by the Treaty of Nimwegen were taken from the Government of Tournoy, and reunited to the District of Arth: And, moreover, that of all the Places he had taken Possession of since the 20th of August last, he would only keep Beaumont with three or four Villages which remain'd of its Dependencies, Bouvines which had none, and Chimay with 12 or 15 Villages thereunto belonging: That by this reciprocal Session or Renunciation a Peace might yet be establish'd, and all Occasion of Difference for the future be taken away: That his Majesty had Cause to believe, that, if the States had no other Aim than the Re-establishment of the Peace, with the Preservation of the Barrier, they would either immediately oblige the King of Spain to accept these his last Offers, or else take such Measures as should hinder their Troops from committing Hostilities against those of his Majesty's: That, in case they should neglect the Means thus put into their Hands, of restoring the Peace, his Majesty would be oblig'd, on the very first Act of Violence committed by their Troops, not being in the fortify'd Towns belonging to the Catholic King, to issue immediate Orders for the seizing all the Ships, Merchandizes and Effects belonging to the Subjects of this State, and to treat them as Enemies: That his Majesty had order'd him, the said Ambassador, to demand a positive Answer to this Representation within fifteen Days, to be presented to him at the Head of his Army: And that after that time, his Majesty would not be ty'd up either to these or any of his former Propositions.

At the time of the Delivery of this thundering Memorial, every Measure at the Hague had more the Aspect of War than of Peace. The Reinforcement actually sent to the Marquis de Grana amounted to 14,000 Men. The States, in answer to the Remonstrances of Friesland and Groningen had signify'd, They could not recall that Reinforcement: And when those Provinces had thereupon declar'd, they would no longer contribute to the Payment of Forces over whom they had no Command; neither had that Remonstrance any Effect: The last Detachments of the Prince's Life-Guards were on their way to Flanders; as was also his Highness's Field-Equipage; and he, himself, had nam'd the very Day of his Departure to co-operate with the Marquis de Grana, in the Conduct of the Campaign. But no sooner were the Purposes of France made manifest in this menacing Tone, than all this Ardour was visibly damp'd: Neither the Prince nor Pensionary could hinder the Memorial from being taken into Consideration, and at the very Entrance of the Debates upon it, it became sufficiently manifest, that Interest and Terror in Conjunction, would, in the End, become irresistible.

To make some Head, however, against this sudden Revulsion of Humours, the Spanish Envoy came Post from Brussels, whither he had been to confer with the Marquis de Grana; and deliver'd in a Counter-memorial to their Lordships, importing, That the King his Master was resolv'd not to give ear to any impracticable or artificial Propositions from the French Court, nor to enter into any Negotiation with them, but upon such Terms as became the Dignity of Sovereigns of equal Rank; nor to countenance any Project of Accommodation that was not equitable with respect to themselves, nor general, so as to comprehend all their Allies: That on these Principles his Majesty was determin'd to hazard the rest of the Low Countries; and never to submit to the Prescription of France till he could no longer withstand them. That the Propositions now made to their Lordships were more arrogant and unreasonable than any of the former: That all were alike illusory, and calculated only to lull them into a false Security, while they (the French) gradually enlarg'd their Borders, and put themselves into a Condition to give the Law to the Republic, as well as the Crown of Spain; and that, therefore, their own Interest, as well as the Faith of Treaties, oblig'd them to make the War a Common Cause with his Catholic Majesty, and to assist him with all their Forces either to prevent or repair the Loss of Luxemburg; the Resolutions of his Majesty being unalterable at all Adventures, because founded not only on Interest, but Conscience and Honour.

But all this Shew of Magnanimity and Resolution on the Part of Spain, as it was unsupported with suitable Power, had none of the Effect desir'd. Such a Pannic had now taken hold of their Lordships, as no Words were able to dissipate: And they came, without Delay, to a Resolution to treat with Mr. d' Acoux on the Proposals offer'd by him, the Day after the Correspondence between him and the Lords of Amsterdam had been laid open to the States by the Prince of Orange; and which they had then so negligently overlook'd. But in answer to their Deputation on this Head, his Excellency, by another Memorial, gave them to understand, That those Conditions were no longer before them: That they had suffer'd the Time to elapse in which they were of Force: That they had thereby necessitated his Majesty to have recourse to new Measures: That he had now actually open'd the Siege of Luxemburg: That, consequently, quently, there was no Reason to expect, that he would treat on the same Conditions which they had before so long neglected: That, on the contrary, his Majesty had since imparted others, which were then declar'd to be his Ultimatum, and which were limited expressly to a Peace, without any Mention of a Truce; of which they had the Choice in the Former: That, nevertheless, he the said Ambassador, knowing the State was more inclin'd to the one than the other, and being willing to contribute all in his Power, as well to their particular Satisfaction, as to the Re-establishment of the public Peace, had, by Express, desir'd a further Explanation of the King his Master's Pleasure thereon, who had graciously empower'd him to give their Lordships their Choice of either, on the Conditions express'd in his last Memorial; but that withal, he had it in Charge to assure their Lordships, That no farther Moderation, Mitigation, or Mutation, would be admitted: And that he made it his own earnest Request, that they would make a good Use of the remaining Term, by giving in a speedy and precise Answer, which was what his Majesty expected and requir'd.

On the very Day this Memorial was presented, the States, by their Deputies, communicated it to the Ministers of their Allies, who appear'd to be greatly irritated at it; and so much the more, as their Lordships undertook to shew the Necessity of complying with it. The Spanish Envoy, in particular, took Fire on this Occasion; and not only made use of many severe Expressions during the Debate, but the same Day reduc'd them to Writing, and gave them in to the States General, in the Form of a Memorial, setting forth in very lively Colours the Indignities offer'd by his most Christian Majesty to the State and Royalty of the King his Master, in leaving it to the States to decide in what Form he should be strip of his Dominions, as if the Fate of him and his Subjects were to be dispos'd of according to their good Pleasure. Does Luxemburg, said the exasperated Envoy, and the several Towns in question, belong to your Lordships? Have you receiv'd full Powers from his Catholic Majesty, to make what Bargains for him you think proper? Have you receiv'd any Assurances that he will abide by your Determination? On the contrary, it hath been often declar'd, and it is now again repeated: That he will never consent to any such Demands: Should your Lordships, therefore, continue to espouse them, it will be to no Purpose: And without his Majesty's Consent, how can your Lordships take upon you to dispose of what is none of your own? His Catholic Majesty is your Friend, Ally, and Confederate, but not your Pupil: And your Lordships would do well to consider, that if you proceed to treat your other Confederates as you are treating him, you may, possibly, have none left, when you need them most. In contributing to injure him, you contribute to ruin yourselves: Nor could his Majesty more severely resent the Measures you are pursuing, than by complying with them. But his Majesty is still desirous to be instrumental to your Preservation, and to risk the Residue of his Dominions in your Service. The Ministers of the High Allies have sufficiently manifested to your Lordships the Importance of Luxemburg, both to the Republic and the Empire; and what destructive Consequences might follow to both, if it be suffer'd to be lost, as also the Readiness wherewith they are dispos'd to co-operate for its Succour: Since, therefore, we are morally assur'd, that it will make as vigorous a Defence as Vienna has done: Since the Numbers that assail it are not equal to those which assail'd Vienna: Since those who may relieve it are not so remote as those who reliev'd Vienna: Since the Conservation of it as much imports the Welfare of Ceribundum, as that of Vienna did; since there is the same Justice in the Cause, and the same God to confide in: Let us in the Name of that God, make the same Efforts for its Deliverance, and trust in him for the same Success.

It is not to be presum'd, that this Remonstrance, however vehement, had any great Weight; States take their Direction from Things, and not from Words: But then it was supported with all the Interest and Authority of the P. of Orange, and of the Pensionary. At the same time also Prince Waldeck, in Behalf of the Emperor, and every other Minister of every (r) other German Power, who expected to find their Account in the War, made their utmost Efforts to keep up the Spirit of the States, and to persuade them, that an Army might be drawn together strong enough, and soon enough to save Luxemburg, and frustrate the Menaces of France: And as if in Fear that the time of Action would be but short, his Highness actually left the Legue, and put himself at the Head of the Allied-Army, that if any Opportunity of snatching an Advantage offer'd, he might be ready to make the most of it: Hence their Lordships grew irresolute again; and thus fluctuating between the two Parties, the fifteen Days, prescrib'd by France, claps'd, and yet five more, which, as a Matter of Grace, were thrown in: All this while they were, moreover, ply'd with Memorials on all Sides from without, and with the Remonstrances of their own turbulent Members within, Day after Day the States were assembled, and Conferences were held with the foreign Ministers, without producing any Resolution of any kind. Scarce ever was the Republic beset with more Difficulties, or shew'd less Ability to surmount them: And yet our Historians, one and all, pass over this important Scene, as not worth Notice or Remembrance.

The Province of Groningh and the City Groningh, of Amsterdam, in the mean time, did not fail to lend all the Aid and Assistance in their Power to their good Friends of France: The

Amsterdam, and the Elector of Brandenburg, cooperate with the former of Vienna of France.

Former acquainting the States General by Deputation; That seeing their Troops were detain'd in Flanders, contrary to their repeated Instances to have them recall'd, they had resolv'd to disband them; That they did, accordingly, look upon them as disbanded; and, that they would proceed to raise others in their stead, for the Security of the Province at this Conjunction; and the latter coming to an express Resolution, That they would not contribute a Silver to the ordinary or extraordinary Charge of the Year, if the States General proceeded to embark the Republic in a War, and did not cause their Papers to be restor'd: Besides which, the Elector of Brandenburg was press'd into the same Service, and by his Minister at the Hague, interpos'd in the most earnest manner to embrace the Offers of France, and thereby re-establish the Peace; urging, That Affairs were never so intricate or desperate as now: That nothing but a speedy Accommodation could prevent the total Ruin of the Republic: That there was no Time left to be over-scrupulous about the Terms: That every Delay would render them more and more disadvantageous, as they had already found by embracing too late what was no more to be obtain'd: That all imaginable Care was to be taken to prevent the Fire which consum'd Flanders from spreading to Germany: That whatever was pretended, no solid Assistance was to be expected from thence: And that it was the indisputable Duty of their High and Mighty Lordships to extinguish the Flame before it caught hold of themselves.

States of the Surrender of Luxemburg.

But all was ineffectual: Their Lordships, it seems, labour'd under so strange an Infatuation, that they had not the heart either to make Peace or War. And in this distracted Condition they continu'd till May 27, O. S. when Mr. d'Avaux gave them to understand, that Luxemburg was fallen into his Master's Hands; whereby he was in a Condition to enlarge his Pretensions, or make farther Conquests, as he thought proper; his Proposals of April 17, being no longer in force: But that such was his Moderation, and his sincere Disposition to restore the Peace, that he would allow them twelve Days longer to deliberate on the said Proposals; hoping they would, at last, make a right Use of his Forbearance, and either by themselves, or jointly with the Spaniards, accept of an Accommodation: For that their Lordships might be assur'd, that if they suffer'd this Term to elapse, like the former, without returning a positive Answer, his Majesty would, for the future, regulate his Demands, according to the Success it should please God to give to the Justice of his Arms.

Upon which the States give rise to an consultation.

And now it began to appear, that the Orange Faction would not be able to withstand the Instances of the French: For the said Memorial being instantly taken into Consideration, it was resolv'd that Conferences should be open'd with his Excellency thereupon without Delay. It is true, these Conferences were open'd with Objections on the Side of the States, viz. 1. That the Time preferri'd by the King was so short, that it would not permit their Lordships to pay a due regard to the Forms of the Republic, much less to take the necessary Measures with the Ministers of Spain and their Allies. And, 2. That no Provision was made that the Peace or Truce might be general, which they expected, and desir'd it should: But then these Objections were so easy to be remov'd, that it was obvious they were made almost for no other End. Accordingly Mr. d'Avaux to the first reply'd, That in ten or twelve Days the Sense of all the Provinces might be both known and taken, that as the Advice of the Surrender of Luxemburg was (1) premature by three Days, they would have those three Days Advantage: That if the Province of Holland and those nearest, should, within that time, notify their Acceptance of the Conditions propos'd, his Majesty would indulge the rest with a Day or two longer: And that in case the States did execute the Treaty as requir'd, the Spaniards should be allow'd a Month, or six Weeks longer, to be reckon'd from the Day of signing, to ratify the same; and the Diet of Ratisbon a Month; which was his Excellency's Answer to the second: All which several Concessions, their Lordships were farther requir'd to consider as so many new Proofs of his Majesty's sincere Dispositions towards the Peace.

But tho' the States were in this relenting Mood, the Minister of Spain appear'd as determin'd as ever. He put in another Protest against the whole Proceeding; declar'd, in the strongest Terms, his Master would never accept of the Terms propos'd, and threw out Menaces, that his Majesty would sooner give up the Residue of Flanders to the French, in exchange for some Addition to his Frontier on the other Side; which was also the Language made use of by the Marquis de Grana at Brussels. At the same time, also, the Prince of Orange drew together the ally'd Army, consisting of 16 Battalions, and 31 Squadrons, between Vicoz and Louvain; and it was given out, that the Troops of Bavaria, and those commanded by Prince Walldeck, were in full March towards the Rhine. Finding, however, that neither Remonstrances nor Menaces, nor any other Device of any other kind could prevail with their Lordships to break off the Treaty, his Excellency (the said Spanish Minister) condescended so far to abate his Stiffness, as to signify, that his Master would accept of neither Truce nor Peace with Spain, in which the Gens de were not comprehended. And this led us to another Scene of this complicated Brouil.

Tho'

was till the third Day following, when the Capitulation was sign'd.

A. D. 1684.

Tho' the War had been kindled in Flanders, it spread on all Sides: For at the same time that Mr. de Crequi carry'd on the Siege of Luxemburg, Mr. de Belfonds invaded Catalonia, and fat down before (t) Gironne. The City of Triers in Germany was also oblig'd to receive a French Garrison, who immediately apply'd themselves to demolish the Fortifications. And, during this Interval, the Spaniards, fearful that the like Endeavours would be us'd by the French to make an Impression on their Dominions in Italy, enter'd into some precautionary Engagements with the Genoese, which so highly incens'd his most Christian Majesty, that he sent a Fleet of 14 Men of War, twenty Gallies, ten Gallies or Bomb Vessels, eight Fly-boats, twenty-four Tartans, &c. to convince that Republic of their Error, and oblige them to make such Acknowledgments, as were held fuitable to the Greatness of the Offence. May 27, this Fleet came before Genoa, and was twice saluted by the Fort, and as often return'd the Compliment. The next Morning six of the Senate waited on Mr. Sangusley, the Commanding-Officer, in the Name of the Republic, to know the Cause of his Visit: who gave them to understand, "That the King was very much dissatisfy'd with their late Conduct, and that his Majesty requir'd of them to quit the Protection of Spain, to join the four Gallies they had lately built, with those of France, to permit the French to have a Magazine of Salt at Savona; and to send four Senators on board his Ship, to beg his Majesty's Pardon in the Name of the Republic." The Senate were now provok'd in their Turn, and disdaining to submit to such ignominious Terms, caus'd Mr. de Sangusley to be inform'd, "That if he did not withdraw out of the Reach of their Guns, they should treat him as an Enemy." And yet further to convince him they were in earnest, they first gave him a Discharge from their Guns with Powder only, and then with Shot. Upon which the ten Bomb-Vessels began immediately to fire upon the City, to the infinite Terror of the poor Inhabitants, who till they felt the dreadful Effects, seem'd to have been utterly ignorant of the Nature of a Bombardment. Having continu'd this new Method of Negotiation from the 18th to the 22d, they sent a Message to the Doge and Senate, importing, "That being sorry to ruin so fine a City, they would yet give them 24 Hours to deliberate on the King's Demands." This was taken into Consideration by the Great Council, early the next Morning; and upon the Issue of the Debate, it was resolv'd to abide all Extremities rather than submit to any thing so unworthy of the Majesty of a free State; which was declar'd to the Enemy from the Mole-Head, in the midst of the Acclamations of the People, who on this Occasion, seem'd more concern'd for their Honour than their Safety. Immediately the Firing on both Sides was renew'd, and continu'd all that Day; and the next, towards the Close of which, the French not only drew up closer, but landed two Parties of Men, one of 1860, and the other of 2000, to the eastward and westward of the City; according to Bishop Burnet, with a Design of reducing the State; but in both Places were repuls'd, by the Assistance of 2000 Spaniards from Milan, having lost about 200 Men in the Experiment. For ten Days together the City bore this severe Visitation, with a Firmness that cannot be too highly applauded. In which Interval, upwards of 10,000 Bombs were discharg'd, to the utter Ruin of the Doge's Palace, the public Treasury, several Churches and Monasteries; and, according to the French Account, 3000 private Houses. Finding, however, that they only wasted their Ammunition with regard to the main End of humbling the Senate, on the 11th, they set Sail, less satisfi'd with having done so much Mischief, than the People with having sav'd themselves from so much Ignominy.

Genoa having thus severely suffer'd for its Attachment to the Spanish Cause, it was but reasonable to make an Effort to provide for its farther Preservation in the general Peace. But, unfortunately, Spain was not able to protect its own Interests, and consequently could not extend Protection to theirs. The States Deputies not only in Contempt and Defiance of the Spanish Envoy's Remonstrances, proceeded in their Conferences with Mr. de Ayaux, but the Provincial States of Holland, after long and warm Debates, resolv'd to accept of a Truce for twenty Years, on the Conditions last propos'd, and went in a Body to communicate that Resolution to the States General, tho' all the Nobles, and two of the Eighteen Towns, viz. Rotterdam and Medemblick, dissent: The Provinces of Friesland, Groningen, and Overyssel, soon follow'd the Example of Holland: And when Zealand and Guelderland could not be prevail'd on to do the like, the French Faction made no Difficulty to avail themselves of the Precedent lately set of deciding the Question by a Plurality of Voices: On the Strength of which, six of the States Deputies waited on Mr. de Ayaux to notify their Accession to the King his Master's Demands; and at the same time, as if those Demands, and those of the City of Amsterdam turn'd on the same Hinge, the Papers of their Deputies which had been seiz'd, were restor'd; and an Order was made, that every Entry relative to that Affair which had been made in the Journal-Books of the States, were ruz'd, on one hand, and on the other, the Magistrates of that City, open'd their public Cash, and made a considerable Payment to the Receiver-General of the Provinces, for the public Service.

At the time this Notification was made by the Deputies to the French Ambassador, the Prince of Orange was with the Army in Flanders; and their High and Mighty Lordships, not without Reason, dreading that he would again venture upon some such daring Action,

A. D. 1684. Action, as that of Mons. after the signing the Treaty of Nimwegen, sent three of their Members expressly to acquaint his Highness with the Measure they had taken, and to desire him to take care, that no Hostilities might be committed by their Troops. Mr. d'Arvans also dispatch'd a Courier on his Side to Mr. de Schomberg (who on Mr. de Crequi's marching into Germany, had the command of the French Forces in Flanders) with the like Intelligence; that his Highness might not be furnish'd with any Pretence to open the Wound afresh.

These Precautions having been taken on both Sides, June 11, the Minister of France, and the Deputies of the Republic reciprocally sign'd the Truce, on the Plan before-specified: Luxemburg being left to France, for the time of the Truce: The King of Great Britain to be Arbitrator in case any Disputes should arise between the contracting Parties; as also Guarantee; Contributions to be continued on both Sides, till the Day of the Exchange of the Ratifications: All Arrears then due to be paid within three Months: All Hostilities to cease: The States to withdraw their Troops out of his Catholic Majesty's Service, in case he should not accept the Truce within the Term prefix'd, and not to give him any Assistance in the further Prosecution of the War: The most Christian King not to make any new Conquests in Flanders, or to accept any Equivalent there, for the Conquests he should make elsewhere.

The Ratifications exchanged.

As this was such a Bargain as France was contented with, and the States could not refuse, the Exchange of the Ratifications follow'd of course; to which, as to the Convention itself, the Provinces of Zealand, Guisderland, and Utrecht, declin'd giving their Consent. Notwithstanding which Fundamental Defect in point of Form, Mr. d'Arvans was so compliant, as to start no Objections, and to accept of the said Exchange as the Act of the Republic.

It was now a vain thing for the Emperor, Spain, &c. to formalize any longer: The latter could make no Defence without the Assistance of the States, and the former was still involv'd in a cruel War with the Turks, which exhausted all his own Wealth and Strength; and all that the Zeal and Piety of his Holiness could supply him with. Notwithstanding which, both these Powers held out till the very last Day of the Limitation; and then (u) submitted as to the least Evil; having first made a Shift to graft upon the League Convention the following unmeaning Article in favour of the poor Republic of Genoa, viz. "It is further agreed, That all the Princes and States of Italy shall be included in this Treaty, and particularly the Republic of Genoa; yet so, as that the most Christian King, tho' he promises not to besiege nor take the City of Genoa, nor any other Place belonging to the Republic; reserves to himself the Liberty to procure the Satisfaction he pretends to of the said Republic."

Genoa the Sacrifice.

As the Genoise had before shewn they did not want Courage, so they now shew'd they did not want Penetration; for they saw clearly enough, notwithstanding this pretended stipulation in their favour, that they were to be sacrific'd; and that tho' their City was protected from a Siege, it still lay open to a Bombardment, unless they made their Peace on worse Terms than they had before refus'd. Instead, therefore, of being thankful for this imaginary Favour, they resented it as an Insult to their Understanding, and continu'd as averse as ever to the Humiliation requir'd of them, at the Footstool of France.

Enrag'd to find such Fumblers in the midst of such apparent Weakness, his most Christian Majesty caus'd his Fleet, consisting of eleven Men of War, and thirty Gallies to make them a second Visit, the latter of which came within half Gun-shot of their Castles, in hope, that either they would be terrify'd into a Compliance, or rush into the opposite Extreme, and by committing some Hostility, authorize him to break thro' the flimsy Article above mention'd, and to lay the City in Ashes. But they did neither. They again accepted of 2000 Spanish Auxiliaries from Milan: And having made the best Disposition they could for a vigorous Defence, rested upon their Arms, expecting the French to strike the first Blow; who, finding themselves every way disappointed, put to Sea again, without committing any Act of Hostility.

Unwilling, however, to live under perpetual Terrors, they apply'd to the Pope to interpose with his most Christian Majesty in their favour; who did, accordingly, by his Nuncio at Paris, endeavour to procure their Peace on more moderate Terms. But all in vain: His most Christian Majesty like all other Oppressors, was at open War with all the Virtues when level'd against himself: And instead of abating, rais'd his Demands higher than ever, and insisted on having them comply'd with, in such Terms, as manifested, that the Continuance of the Dispute would, in the long Run, be the Ruin of the Republic; namely, 1. That if they did not, within one Month, yield to his Demands, he should think himself no longer bound by the separate Article above specify'd. And again, upon granting them one Month longer, at the Intercession of his Holiness, That in case they suffer'd that Term also to elapse, without giving him Satisfaction, he should insist on being paid 100,000 Crowns a Month for the extraordinary Charges they should put him to, till they did comply. This being made known to the Doge and Senate, they at last submitted to pass under the Yoke, and in their own Persons to sustain the Vengeance which was vow'd against their Country.

What was now requir'd of them, was, That the Doge, and four of the Senate, should should, in Person, repair to France, by a certain time, and proceed to the Place where the King should then be; and being admitted to an Audience, in their Robes of Ceremony, should, in the Name of the Republic, declare their Sorrow for having displeas'd his Majesty; and use such other Expressions of Respect and Submission, as should demonstrate the sincere Desire of the Republic to deserve his Majesty's Kindness for the future: That the Place of the Doge should not be supply'd during his Absence: That he should resume the Exercise of his Function at his Return: That the Republic should dismiss the Spanish Forces in her Service: Renounce all Leagues since the 1st of January, 1683: Reduce their Gallies to the same Number they were three Years before: Give such a Sum of Money as the Pope should think fit towards the Reparation of the Churches and Monasteries damnify'd by the Bombs; and pay 100,000 Crowns to the Count de Fiesque, &c.

Vanity, Injustice, and Inhumanity, are the Ingredients of this shocking Composition; and it is hard to say which is the most prevalent: But, however nauseous the Draught was, these illustrious Patriots were oblig'd to swallow it: And it ought to be acknowledg'd, that in submitting to do so, they shew'd themselves more worthy of this sublime Character, than even he who dies in his Country's Cause; for Shame is harder to be borne than Death itself. But neither in the very Article of Suffering, did their Fortitude and Gallantry desert them; on the contrary, when the Splendor of that Idol of Majesty, before which they were compell'd to bow, was set forth as if on full Purpose to dazzle them, they so demean'd themselves, as manifested that they had in their Bosoms a Reserve of true Greatness, which was superior to all, and which supported them under all the Endeavours that were us'd to make them feel their Disgrace; as is more particularly exemplify'd by the Saying of the Doge (remember'd by Burnet) at Versailles, That the most extraordinary thing he saw, was to see himself there.

But the Genoese were not the only Sufferers under the Indignation of his most Christian Majesty. The Prince of Orange had a thousand times, and a thousand ways offend'd the same vindictive Power: And tho' it was scarce possible to bring him on his Knees at Versailles to render the Triumph of that mighty Monarch complete, the time was now come when he was to undergo all that the Retentment of so unequal an Adversary could lay upon him.

While the Negotiation with Mr. d'Armaux was yet in Suppence, the Wrongs, Damages, and Oppressions which his Highness had sustain'd either by the Connivance or immediate Authority of the most Christian King, were often recommended by his Partizans to the Consideration of their High and Mighty Lordships; and Motions were made to procure an express Article in his Favour, in the ensuing Truce: But care was taken as often to set them aside by urging, that his Pretensions requir'd more time to discuss, than was allow'd for the Conclusion of the Treaty: And that, therefore, it would be more advisable to reserve them for a separate Negotiation. But those who pleaded his Highness's Cause, very clearly foreseeing, that if it was disjoin'd from that of the States, it would never meet with the Attention which it deserv'd, would not hear of any such Disjunction; but continu'd to press, as before, that the obtaining Satisfaction for him might be inclin'd on, as one of the Conditions of the Truce. Nor did they fail to enumerate the many Outrages he had sustain'd; as, 1. The obliging the Magistracy of Orange to expel all the French Scholars out of their College, and all the French Artizans out of their City. 2. The sending a Regiment of Dragoons to quarter among the Inhabitants at Discretion, till they had levell'd a Wall, which they had erected only to screen themselves from the Midnight Incurions and Depredations of bad Neighbours. 3. The spurring up the Prince of Condé to put in a Claim to the whole Principality in quality of Administrator to the Duke of Longueville. 4. The citing his Highness to appear before the French Privy Council, by the Title of Messire Guillaume, Comte de Nassau, demeurant à la Haye, en Hollande, to answer the said Clause. And, 5. The authorising the Prince, d'Orange to seize his Lands in Brabant, Dauphiné, and the Duchy of Luxemburg; his Customs on the Rhine, and in the Principality of Orange; his Lordships in Burgundy; and to expose to public Sale the Counties and Demains of Warneffin, Wanden, Duesburg, Budgebuch, St. Vith, &c. The Provinces of Zeland, Guichterland, and Virecht, appear'd with one Voice for his Highness on this Occasion: And he had, besides, a Party in that of Holland: But their united Remonstrances had no Effect: His Interest and Credit which had been so long in the wane, were now in a manner extinct; and whatever contributed to depress him, equally tally'd with the Views of his Opponents in the Republic, and of his grand Adversary of France. Mr. Heinsius, indeed, was sent to be his Solicitor at Paris; but after a whole Year's Trial, found all manner of Applications fruitless. And as to the King his Uncle, and the Duke his Father-in-Law, it appears they were so closely connected with his most Christian Majesty, that instead of interceding in his Behalf, they cooperated in heaping Mortifications upon him. According to Bishop Burnet, Chadleigh, the English Envoy had join'd with Mr. d'Armaux in widening the Breach between the Prince and the Town of Amsterdam: And what was still worse, had pretum'd to offer (*) personal estate.

(*) The little Principality of Orange is situated in the north of France.

(*) It is reasonable to think these personal affronts were not given in the Course of this Affair. The Duke of Anjou was now at the Hague; and Chadleigh, by Order, commanded the British Troops in the Dutch Service not to salute his Grace when they saw him: Which interest'd with the Commanders they had receiv'd from their General the Prince of Orange; which his Highness returned to warmly, that the Envoy receiv'd Instructions to visit him no more.

sonal Affronts to his Highness. Notwithstanding which, so little was he consider'd at the English Court, that he could not get Chudleigh recall'd upon it. But then his Lordship does not remember, that in the Heat of his Resentment, the Prince list'd up his Hand against Chudleigh, which rather more than balanc'd the Account.

Still it was thought his Highness was not sufficiently humbled: As soon, therefore, as the Truce had pass'd thro' all its Forms, the States came to a Resolution to disband all the Forces which had been rais'd in the Year 82, consisting of 1446 Horse, and 9642 Foot: And such Use was made of the peculiar Animosity which reign'd among the Magistrates of Amsterdam against his Highness, that they were induc'd to invite thither Prince Casimir of Nassau, who was Stadtholder of Friesland and Groningen, and his Court, with a View to make him their Stadtholder, also in the Room of his Kinsman the Prince of Orange. But after he had been nobly entertain'd by them for near a Month, and receiv'd a Present of Gold-Plate, he took his Leave: And soon after, the two Princes came to so good Understanding with each other, that the Project came to nothing. Resolving, however, to continue their Opposition, they intrusted their Deputies to propose in the Assembly of the States, That the Condition of the Fleet might be enquir'd into: That more Ships might be built: That the Land-Forces might be yet farther reduc'd: That the Pay of both Officers and Soldiers might be diminished; and that the Moneys allow'd for Fortifications and secret Services might be more carefully and frugally manag'd. All these several Points were level'd at the Power and Prerogative of his Highness; but withal affect'd the Interest of so many other Persons, that, after many Attempts, and as many Disappointments, their Lordships of Amsterdam found that his Highness, on this Ground, was mightier than they: All the Nobles, and twelve of the Towns being against this new Reform, and only six for it.

Caution of our foreign and domestic Affairs.

Thus France continu'd to be still almighty and irresistible; and England had still the Honour either to smooch her way, or hold up her Train: For when Courtray and Dinwyde fell into her Hands, and she appear'd determin'd to make good her Pretensions by the Superiority of her Arms, all the Powers who were led by their Hopes and Fears to unite against her, call'd upon the King to take Part in the League, and to co-operate in the Preservation of Europe. But, however apparently they were directed by their own Interest in making these Applications, it was understood, or at least it was represented, that they were inflat'd to do so by the Malcontents; not that those Powers (w) might be help'd by his Majesty out of their Distresses; but that his Majesty might be under a Necessity to have recurr'd to a Parliament, and that the Malcontents might from thence derive Opportunities to grow once more considerable, by opposing his Measures, and taking Advantage of the very Difficulties they themselves would make it their Business to plunge him in. And that the King did not lend an Ear to these Importunities, we are further taught to believe was owing to his being vers'd in the Artifices of that Faction, and not to any secret Engagements he had contracted with, or Advantages he deriv'd from, the Court of France.

These are the Colourings on one Side; and if we consult the other, we shall be told, that the Embassadors of those Powers, acted purely and simply, by the Instructions of their Principals, without any Intercourse with them; and that they espous'd their Memorials and Remonstrances, from no other Motive than a Zeal for the Honour of their Country, and the Liberty of Europe. The Truth, however is, that if there had been no such malignant Faction in England; as is above suppos'd to have been the Promoters of these Foreign Ministers, they would, nevertheless, have solicited his Majesty's Assistance: And that, if those who affect'd to be thus tenderly interested in the Cause of Europe, had not also found it to be, for some way or other, connected with their own; they would scarce have gone such Lengths to make his Majesty a Party whether he would or no.

Then, as to the King's Engagements with France (over and above what has been already said on that Subject) it is not to be imagin'd, that his Majesty would have violated his Defensive Alliance with Spain, by refusing to send a single Man to her Assistance; or that France would have left her Pretensions to his Arbitration; or that Spain would have refus'd that Arbitration, tho' under the Terror of an immediate Rupture; or that his most Christian Majesty would have persecuted

[w] Seen by the Duke of Ormond, himself, in a Letter to the Earl of Arden, viz. "The public Affairs here go on so prosperously, that the last Game the Dissaffected seem to have to play is, to urge the Ministers of the Emperor, Spain and Holland to call upon the King to perform his Engagement by Treaty upon the Intraction of public Faith and Treaties by France. This they suppose will force the King to call a Parliament, or expose him afresh to the Inconvenience, that he is govern'd by French Councils, and intends to introduce a French Model of Government, and consequently Popery. The Memos are given in lately by those Ministers, thro' that he is Design'd, since there are none of them but must know the Inability the King is in to bear any considerable Part in giving a Stop to the Progress of France, without the Assistance of a Parliament. And possibly they may be made believe, that a Parliament would now give that Assistance upon more moderate Terms than heretofore. But I doubt it is too early and too dangerous to make the Experiiment. For though the King may dissolve a Parliament when he finds it useless, or rather intolerable, yet the Fear is, that the Dissatisfied having found how much Ground they have lost by their extravagant Violence, may more effectually compass their Ends in a smoother way. They may offer Money to draw the King into a War, but so little, that he must necessarily come to them for more; and then it is that they will run into their former Lengths. And if the Money, tho' too little to carry on the War for any reasonable time, shall be refus'd (being accompany'd with Popery, but insignificant Promises of assisting by his Majesty to the End) it will then be thought manifest, that the King is really partial to France, and will at no hand break with it. Much of this, no doubt, will be said, as well if the King refuse to call a Parliament, as if he refuse the Money it shall offer, when it is call'd. The Difficulties are great on all Sides. God direct the King to the best. Life of the Duke of Ormond, vol. II. p. 226.

persecuted a Nephew of England in so violent a manner, if such a Friendship was not subsisting between the two Monarchs, as was superior to every other Consideration.

Sir John Revelly, a profess'd Admirer of his Majesty, after acknowledging, That the Conditions of the Peace or Truce offer'd to the Allies by France, were very hard, is, moreover, express'd, That they were recommended by him as reasonable. In another Place he also says, That when the News came, that the French had possess'd themselves of Luxembourg (which some of the King's best Friends were extremely sorry for, because that Place was reckon'd to be the Key of Germany, Holland, and Flanders) our Court seem'd to be not at all (s) displeas'd at it. Again, in a third, he gives it as Lord Danby's Opinion, That there was a very strict Conjunction between us and France. And yet again in a fourth, that, making a Visit to the Duke of Newcastle, his Grace gave him to understand, That he had lately been honour'd with the Company of the Duke of Buckingham, who had enter'd into a long Detail of the public Affairs, purposely to insinuate, That the French Interest was still uppermost at Court; and that there was no other way to Favour, than thro' the Postern in their Keeping: For he express'd much Displeasure that the Marquis of Halifax refus'd to admit of a private Conference with the French Ambassador, when he (Buckingham) would have brought them together; adding, That his Lordship's Poëtry would never be considerable while he continu'd access to that Interest.

Those who are accusom'd to make deep Researches into the Conduct of Princes, will not need the Assistance of this Clue to come at the Secret of King Charles's Cabinet. To them the Action reveals the Principle; and when they have the Object before them, they are at no loss to give it a proper Colour: And on the other hand, it must be expected, that the Willfully-perverse, will only quarrel with the Guide that shews them the way; and rather chuse to wander on in a Perfusion that they are right, than be forc'd to acknowledge they had till then been astray.

If then it must be admitted, upon the whole Matter, that his Majesty was contented to have his Steerage directed by the Rudder of France, it will follow, that the Violation of the last Triennial Bill, by which it was provided, That Parliaments should not be intermitted above three Years; and of his Majesty's solemn Declaration, That he would make the Laws the Measure of his Government, was not so much owing to the Apprehensions of our own Court, with regard to the Malcontents, as to those of the French for themselves: By which it was clearly foreseen, that no sooner should there be a thoro' Union between the King and his Subjects, and the Power of the Crown should become invigorated by the Wealth of the People, than his Majesty would not only find himself above those Wants and Difficulties, which had in a manner oblig'd him to become a Seditary to them, but in a Condition to enter the Lists against them, and from that great Moment act as Arbitrator of Europe.

No Parliament, was, however, most undeniably the Word at Court; and from thence was echo'd most industriously to every Corner of the Kingdom: And as, on the one hand, Tonger was demolish'd in Ease of the Revenue, so, on the other, whatever had a Tendency to make Matters desperate between the King and his People, was carefully kept in Practice. Thus all manner of Prosecutions against the Messengers, and other Servants of the late House of Commons, were manifestly encourag'd; and even William's their Speaker was sued to the utmost Extremity, for the Votes he had sign'd, and the Warrants he had issued, in Obedience to the Orders of the House: A Proceeding which even Mr. North himself makes no Scruple to condemn; and concerning which, Bishop Burnet writes as follows: "This was driven on Purpoise by the Duke's Party to cut off the Thoughts of another Parliament; since it was not to be suppos'd, That the House of Commons could bear the punishing the Speaker for obeying their Orders."

At the same time also that the Servants of the House were prosecuted as Criminals, for doing what their Duty requir'd, it was resolv'd that the Lords in the Tower who had been impeach'd by one House, and committed by the other, should be enlarg'd. A Matter highly reasonable and equitable in itself, it must be allow'd, but without Precedent in point of Practice. It may be remember'd, that when Lord Shaftsbury made his Appeal to the King's Bench, but under Commitment only for a Contempt, he was told, he could have no Redress but from his Peers, whom he had offended: And Lord Danby, had in particular, given way to many threatening Expressions against him, for having been guilty of so famous a Breach of Privilege. His Lordship, however, was forc'd to try, and even to repeat, the same Experiment; and to his no small Mortification, in vain. The several Lords Justices of the King's Bench, down to Jeffries, and with them the Lord Keeper North, were of Opinion, That that Court being inferior in Jurisdiction to the House of Lords, could not bail their Prisoner after he had been charg'd with special Articles. For they had no Means to bring down the Record whereby to determine any thing of the Cause of his Commitment; and for aught they could judicially know, he might be attainted of the Treason. But Jeffries, we are told, had condition'd for the Jobb, at his Elevation, and the Crisis was extremely favourable; for, over and above, the grand Motive, of rendering the Breach between the King and

and Parliaments as wide as possible, both the Court Factions had their peculiar Ends to serve by this extraordinary Goal-Delivery: For the Lord Privy-Seal, finding he had lost Ground, by bringing the Duke of Monmouth to Court, without being able to keep him there, look'd round for one who might serve, upon Occasion, as his Co-adjutor, and came to a Conclusion, that none was every way so well qualify'd as Lord Danby, who like himself was an irreconcilable Enemy to the French Interest; and who, after so long an Exile from Court, would be contented, it might be presum'd, with a second Place in the King's Confidence and Favour: And, on the other hand, to complete the Triumph of his Royal Highness over those who had so eagerly endeavour'd to expunge him out of the Line of Succession, it was thought necessary, that, while the Voice of the Law pronounc'd one Set of Plotters, guilty, the Voice of the Bench should go as far as possible in pronouncing the other, innocent.

Under all these auspicious Circumstances, the Earl of Danby was first brought up by Rule of Court to the King's-Bench, February the 4th, 1683-4, and his Council, having expatiated on the Hardship and Length of his Imprisonment, which had now continu'd for five Years; having also urg'd, That in the Intervals of Parliament the King's-Bench was the supreme Court to which the Subject could have Recourse for his Liberty, That the Law did not mean to have any Subject under an indefinite Confinement without any Remedy, And that the Earl had also obtain'd his Majesty's most gracious Pardon, concluded with a Prayer, That his Lordship might be admitted to Bail. The Pardon was then read in Court. But whether their Lordships were not provided with such Expedients as were thought necessary to qualify the Proceeding, or had been (y) instructed to demur, or held that a seeming Difficulty would add the more Weight to their Opinions, some of them desir'd time till the next Term to consider his Lordship's Case; which they said was wholly new to them: But the Earl, himself, objecting against so long a Delay, and making it his earnest Request that they would come to a Decision by the latter End of the present, they allow'd him to apply by his Council to know their Pleasure accordingly; and in the mean time remanded him to the Tower.

This solemn Farce having been thus play'd over, on the last Day of the Term, the Earl was again brought up, and their Lordships severally declar'd, That he ought to be admitted to bail: But then it was with this Salvo, That he should appear in the House of Lords the next Sessions of Parliament, and not depart without leave of the Court. The Ice being thus broke in favour of a Protestant Lord, the three Roman Catholics, viz. The Earl of Poussin, and the Lords Arundel, and Bellasis (Petre was dead, and had (z) deny'd the Papish Plot with his last Breath) as also the Earl of Tyrone were severally brought Lord Danby and the People Lords bail'd.

(y) In Sir John Rooley's Memoirs, p. 177, 178, 179, we find the following Passage relative to this Affair:

"What is very strange, the Earl of Danby was on the point of stepping out of the Tower, tho' against his Highness's Consent. My Lord Privy-Seal assur'd me his Enlargement was at hand; that he, himself, had been his Lordship's chief Friend, and that the King had made both the Duke and Lord Rochebiter seemingly set their Hands to it. The Duke, indeed, appear'd to be heavy in it, and that the King was so, there could be no Doubt; but Rochebiter and Sealand did understand otherwise it with might and main, and so contriv'd that the Judges delay'd to bail out his Lordship till the very last Day of the Term; those two Lords agreeing, That Danby might join with Hallifax to weaken their Interest.

Lord Danby came the same Day to kiss his Majesty's Hand in the Bedchamber, where I happen'd to be present. The King receiv'd him very kindly; and when the Earl complain'd of his long Imprisonment, his Majesty told him, he knew it was against his Consent, which his Lordship thankfully acknowledg'd; but they had no manner of private Discourse together. My Lord Privy-Seal came into the Presence presently after, and the two Lords saluted each other; but it was very slightly done on both Sides. The next Day, however, I went from the Lord Privy-Seal, to wait upon the Earl, when his Lordship desir'd me to profess his Service to him, and to tell him, that he should have taken a more particular Notice of him, but that he thought it would not prove so much for his Service: And the Earl said, it was for the very self-same Reason he had behav'd so indifferently towards his Lordship, for there was at that time great jealousy of a Friendship between them. Lord Danby told me, he would retire to his House out of Town, nor concern himself with Business, tho' he doubted not but he might if he would, but not upon the national Foundation he desir'd, and therefore would have nothing to do with it, declaring his Aversion to a French or a Papish Interest. He told me also, the Substance of what had pass'd between the Duke and him, at the Vill; he made no mention of his Highness, after he had been with the King, and I thereby understood his Lordship was upon a very affectionate Terms with that Prince. He said his Highness told him, he had heard he had poison'd Boothby of him, and that he answer'd, it was true he had often been so unfortunate as to differ with him in Opinion, and could not help saying, That he had never yet found any Cause to repent him of it; but that for expressing himself any bow against his Person, it he heard so, they were Whispers and Lies; and desir'd to know who were his Informers; but the Duke evaded that. In short, I found by my Lord Privy-Seal, that he and the Earl of Danby had a good Understanding together."

(z) As we learn from a Death-bed Letter of his Lordship's to the King in these Words:

"May it please your Majesty,
"I give myself the Hopes that your Majesty will pardon this Proposition of a dying but dutiful Subject, in giving you the Trouble of this short Account and Declaration of myself, by which, in the first place, I offer to my God my hearty Prayers for your Majesty's long Life and happy Reign, with all the Blessings of this Life, and eternal Happiness of the next.

I having been now above five Years in Prison, and what is more grievous to me, laid so long under a false and injurious Calumny of an horrid Plot and Design against your Majesty's Person and Government; and I am now, by the Disposition of God's Providence, call'd into another World, before I could by a public Trial make my Innocence appear. I receiv'd it necessary for me, as an incumbent Duty & owe to Truth, and my own Innocence, to make this ensuing Protestation to your Majesty and the whole World, That whereas one Jean Oates hath maliciously and falsely sworn, That he saw me receive a Commission directed to me by Johannes Paulus de Oliva, confiding me Lieutenant General of an Army, which he pretended was to come into England; I declare in the Presence of the All-seeing God, before whose just Tribunal I am shortly to appear, that I never saw any such Commission directed to me, or any other Person whatsoever; and do firmly believe, there never was any such.

But of the Folly as well as the Foolishness of the Information, the most Part of Mankind, as, as I conceive, sufficiently are this convinced.

And as to those Aspersions which the Ignorant and Malicious have thrown upon the Roman Catholic Church (of which I am, and by the Grace of God, do dye a Member) as if murdering of Kings, and taking up Arms against our Sovereign, were an authorized Principle of that Religion, I do knowingly affirm, there is nothing with more Horror detested by the Catholic Church, as being expressly contrary to the

A. D. 1684. brought up, and under the like happy Salvo, obtain'd their (a) Liberty.

[Mem. p. 175.] Thus it appears from every Circumstance, that, for this Reign at least, Parliaments were at an end; and that the monarchical Part of the Constitution had master'd both the others. Reresby is explicit, That there were some near the King who advis'd him to another way of ruling the Kingdom: And what this way was, every Step we take, will more and more demonstrate.

Godolphin
made Secretary of State.

Sir Leslie Jenkins was still in the Secretary's Office; but, whether, presuming on his long and faithful Services, he ventur'd occasionally to object to the (b) violent Measures now pursuing, and so was look'd upon as of the Party of the Lord Privy-Seal, or whether, as pretended, he was really worn out with the incessant Fatigues of his Office, which no body was ever more devoted to than he, in the Beginning of this Year he was induc'd to quit, for a valuable Consideration, to Mr. Godolphin. According to the Author last quoted, Lord Rochester was the principal Engine in this Remove. The Dukes of Portsmouth had also her Share in it, and both, together with his Royal Highness, made it their joint Endeavours to undermine Lord Hallifax. And Mr. North makes no Scruple to say, "It was notorious, that, after this Secretary retir'd, the King's Affairs went backward, Wheels within Wheels took place; the Ministers turn'd Formalisers, and the Court, mysterious; And no wonder, when the two then Secretaries, profess'd Gamblers and Court-Artists, supply'd the more retir'd Cabals; and, being habituated in Artifice, esteem'd the honest plain Dealers, under whose Ministry the King's Affairs were so well recover'd, to be no better than Beasts of Burden."

[Ibid. p. 181.]

The Duke of York retir'd in his Office of Lord High Admiral, and in his Place at the Council.

The next remarkable Change that alarm'd the Public, was the dissolving the Commission of the Admiralty, and the investing the Duke once more with the Title of Lord High-Admiral, and with all the Powers and Profits belonging to that grand Employment; but not by Patent after the usual Form; for as His Highness could not qualify himself by taking the Test prescrib'd by the Laws; so the Lord Keeper was too wary to prostitute the Great Seal to any Purpose, or in any Service, that he could not legally justify. Nor was this all; for, a few Days after, he was also restor'd to his Place at the Council-board, without taking the Oaths, as in the former Instance; and of both these surprising Turns public Notice was given in the Gazette, as if the King had not only forgotten his solemn Promise to govern by the Laws, but the People had forgotten it too; or as if their Resentments were now no longer of any Consequence. Tho' over-aw'd, they were not however insensible: It became the Subject of much Talk, says Reresby, as being deem'd a Breach of one of the most solemn and most explicit Acts of Parliament: And many a melancholy Preface was drawn from it, which the Sequel but too fatally made good.

While the Court in this manner took what Ply his Royal Highness thought fit to give it, the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys was made the chosen Instrument to complete the Reduction of the Nation: And after what Manner it was done, and what farther Projects were gratified upon it, no Words are so proper, for many obvious Reasons, as those of Mr. North himself, to let forth, viz.

"When this Chief-Justice had chosen the Northern Circuit for his Expedition, it was to contriv'd, that, on a Sunday Morning, when the Court was full, the King should take notice of his good Services, and, in token of his Majesty's gracious Acceptance of them, give him a (c) Ring from his Royal Finger. This was certainly so done, by way of Engine to rear up a mighty Machine of Authority; and the printed News informed the whole Nation of it. Whereupon the Lord Chief-Justice was commonly reputed a Favourite, and next door to premier Minister, sure enough to eclipse any thing of the Law that stood near him. It is to be remember'd that, at this time, the Trade of procuring Charters to be surrender'd, was grown into a great Abuse; and nothing was accounted at Court so meritorious as the procuring of Charters, as the Language then was. Therefore as it was intended that the Chief-Justice should be ingratiated into his Majesty's good Opinion and Favour, as much as was possible; this Care was taken that, through the Fame of his great Honour, he should have appear'd to the Country, and, in consequence of that, wherever he went, all Charters must needs fall down before him; and, for that Reason, the Towns were to be prepared by (d) 200 Warrants sent down. This the Command of our Saviour, and Christian Doctrine; and as such I renounce and detest it, as I do all Plots and Conspiracies against your Sacred Person.

Having thus briefly, and with all Sincerity of a dying Man, discharged my Conscience; I shall end where I began, and with my last Breath beg of God to defend your Majesty from all your Enemies, and to forgive those who by their Perjuries have endeavour'd to make me appear to be one: Who am living and dying (as in Duty bound, &c.)

(c) And yet we find Mr. North, who was of the King's Council, writing of this Fact as follows: "It is certain that the Lord Jeffreys, then Chief Justice in Court, refus'd it (submitting the Lords to Bull) and yet he was a great Stirrer up of the Point, in order to gain the other Judges to countenance his then sodal'd Opinion for the Ring, which was taken ill: So the Lords were not bull'd at that time; but in the Reign of King James they were let free." Life of the Lord Keeper North, p. 164.

(d) It appears by a Paper of his, inserted in his Life, that he thought Popery the worst Evil that could befall us, a Breach in the Succession the next, and a Commonwealth the least of the Three.

(c) Dillop Burett says, vol. 1. p. 280. It was called his Blood-Sword: And adds, that when Jeffreys took his Leave of the King, his Majesty told him, It was a hot Summer, and, as he was going the Circuit, advis'd him not to drink too much.

(d) And on what frivolous Pretences they were found, may be gather'd from the following Passage taken out of Sir John Reresby:

"The King had now conceived a Displeasure against the City of York, and coming from the Dukes of Portsmouth's he ask'd me, leaning upon my Arm, If I knew sufficient Matter for bringing a 200 Warrants against their Charter? I told his Majesty, I did not, but would endeavour to inform myself, but fear'd I could not so well do it as such a Dilator, as if I was upon the Spot: To which his Majesty reply'd, I only recommend it to you. The Lord Mayor it seems had refus'd

A. D. 1684. This affords an useful Speculation how mean Persons derive to themselves Merit from the Power of great ones, who shall ascribe to their Inferiors those very Events which flow really from their own Power. Here the Chief-Justice is made to seem powerful by the King, with whose Authority he is grac'd; and that makes the frighted Town, at his Instigation, surrender. This must be argu'd to demonstrate to the King that the Chief-Justice had a mighty Influence upon the Country, having done greater things, in his Majesty's Service, than any Judge had ever done before; when, in truth, it was not his own proper Influence, but the King's Power, though him, that had such Virtue in the Country. It was for a like respect to the City of London; over which the Chief-Justice exercis'd a sort of violent Authority. That he had a great Influence there was true, but it was because the Citizens thought him a great Man at Court; and he obtain'd Favour at Court, because he was thought to have a great Influence in the City. Thus the Court conferred their own Influences, and took them back by rebound, so to much Merit reflected from the Person that manag'd them. Then it is also to be remember'd, that the North of England is the Seat of the Roman Catholic Interest; and some things were to be manag'd by this Chief-Justice, with respect to them, which no other of the twelve Judges would have done, and I am about to relate.

In the Course of this Northern Voyage, which was carry'd with more Leffiness and Authority, than had been known at any Ages before, the Charters (as was to be expected) tumbled down, and the Chief-Justice order'd all the under-Sheriffs and Bailiffs to give him perfect Lists of all Persons, who, upon Account of Recusancy, lay under Commitment. When he return'd to London, and his (s) great Services, which argu'd no less Abilities to serve the King, were display'd, the next Step, was his being appointed to attend his Majesty, at the Cabinet. The Lord Keeper, who was but an Observer of these Motions, did imagine that somewhat extraordinary was to come forth at the next Meeting, the rather, because, on Sunday Morning (the Meetings were usually on Sunday Evenings) the Duke of York spoke to his Lordship to be Affiliant to a Business, which, that Evening, would be mov'd to his Majesty; and that Morning, his Lordship observ'd a more than ordinary Shyness in the Countenances of the great Men, whose remarkable Gravity satisfi'd him that they were upon their Guard. But what the Matter was, his Lordship did not discover till he came to the Cabinet; where, after the King was come, and they were sat, my Lord Chief-Justice Jessop stood up, and with the Rolls of Recusants before him, Sir, said he, *I have a Business to lay before your Majesty, which I took notice of in the North, and which will deserve your Majesty's Royal Consideration. It is the Case of numberless Numbers of your good Subjects that are imprison'd for Recusancy. I have the List of them here, to justify what I say. They are so many that the great Gods cannot hold them without their lying one upon another. And then he let fly his Tropes and Figures about rotting and sinking in Prisons, concluding with a Motion to his Majesty, that he would, by his Royal Pardon, discharge all the Convictions for Recusancy, and thereby restore Liberty and Air to these poor Men. This Motion, at that time, was indeed a Sauger; for, in Consequence, the Execution of it, by such a Pardon of all Convictions, had lost the King irrecoverably, spoil'd all future Parliaments, set up the Fanatic Interest, his Majesty's declar'd Enemies, and disabled his Friends from appearing, with any Countenance, for him. The Language had been Now it is plain— you would not believe us. What is Popery, if this be not? What signify the Laws? Will you not expect some better Security? and the like.*

His Lordship was not to learn such Consequences as these. But there was yet more, and what directly concern'd himself in the Duty of his Office. He could turn his Thoughts no way clear of Precipices, which, to him, were fatal, though others made Account to leap over them. It must needs occur that such a Pardon must pass the great Seal, of which he was the Keeper, whose Office it was to affix it: And altho', in Strictness, he could not disobey the King's express Command in that, or any thing else that might be called an Act of Grace, nor be render'd criminal for so doing; yet all the loyal Party of England who were his sure Friends, would have expected from him such strong and plain Advice to the King, as might have averted him from such a pernicious Step, whatever the Consequence was to himself, who ought, as many would have said, to have quitted the Seal rather than held them on such Terms; and, for certain, the next Parliament had retented it in all Extremity. Now let us see with what Tem-per'd to let a Mountebank erect his Stage in that City, tho' he was furnish'd with the King's Recommendation, which the Mass complaining of, his Majesty thought himself thereby Righted, or injured.

The Lord Mayor of York being arriv'd, came, in desire to make use of my Name before the Council, to sit as to fly; The Governor knew how ready he was with his Assistance upon occasion of the late Plot; to which I gave my Consent. I will leave that the Duke of York, who thought him necessary to his once all Reception in that City, wou'd in his Heart, the Man might be punish'd; but I imagin'd I could not but in Justice face by him in what was right, and that I could not do amiss in carrying him to my Lord Privy-

Seal, who gave him his Promise to assist him at the Board. I knew there was Pique and Malice in the Complaint against him, and was in hopes it might be a Means of making him a thorough Convert, if he was but mercifully handled in this troublesome Matter.

(s) Bishop Keest says, vol. III. p. 215. "That having made it his great Business to terrify the People into a Compliance, at his Return he wai'd on his Majesty at Windsor, and deliver'd up to him the Charters of the City of London, and of several other Corporations, within his Circuit, as an Obligation of his own Loyalty, and a Triumph over the People's Liberties."

A. D. 1684.] per, Prudence, and Courage, his Lordship comported under this sudden and desperate Trial. After the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys had done, and compos'd his Rolls and Papers upon the Table (which none there cared to inspect) his Lordship, the Lord Keeper, sat a while silent, as the rest, expecting some of the Lords, eminently in the Protestant Interest, as Hollis, Rochester, &c. should begin to speak; but finding no Probability of their saying any thing, but rather a Disposition on their Parts, at that time, to let the thing pass, he apply'd himself to the King, and Sir, said he, I humbly intreat your Majesty that my Lord Chief-Justice may declare whether all the Persons, nam'd in these Rolls, were actually in Prison, nam'd in these Rolls, were actually in Prison or not. The Lord Chief-Justice hastily interpos'd, saying, he did not justly imagine any one could suspect his Meaning to be that all these were actual Prisoners; for all the Gaols in England would not hold them. But if they were not in Prison, their Case was little better, for they lay under Sentence of Commitment, and were obnoxious to be taken up by every peevish Sheriff, or Magistrate, and were made to redeem the Liberty they had with gross Fees, which was a cruel Oppression to them and their Families. Then the Lord Keeper turn'd to the King, and Sir, said he, I beg your Majesty will consider what little Reason there is to grant such a general Pardon, at this time, at this time. For they are not all Roman Catholics that lie under Sentence of Recusancy, but SECTARIES of all Kind and Denominations; perhaps as many or more, who are all professed Enemies to your Majesty and your Government in Church and State. They are a turbulent People, and always stirring up Seditions, and if they do so much when they lie obnoxious to the Law, which your Majesty may insist upon them at your Pleasures what will they not do, if your Majesty gives them all a Discharge at once? That would be to quit the greatest Advantage you have of securing the Peace of the Nation. Is it not better that your Enemies should lie under such Disadvantages, and be obnoxious to your Majesty's Pleasure, who may, if they are turbulent and troublesome, insist the Penalties of the Law upon them? And as to the Roman Catholics, if there be any Persons to whom your Majesty would extend the Favour of a Pardon, let it be particular and express, and not universally, to let your ENEMIES, as well as FRIENDS of Ease. And, after all, the Disadvantage they lie under is but the Payment of some Fees to Officers, which is compensated by the Exemptions they have from serving in chargeable Offices, which other conformable Persons sustain. But, in a general Review of the ill Usses that would be made of such a Step, in the Nation at large, is the Prejudice of your Majesty's Interest and Affairs, both in and out of Parliament, as they were obvious, is the Extent of them it beyond my Power, and, as I think, here no Ends, or to this Effect. The King gave great Attention, and the other Lords wondered; but no farther Word was made of the Matter; and they proceeded to other Business. That Night his Lordship came home full of Melancholy, and it was some time before any Person near him knew the Occasion of it. But he would sometimes break out in Exclamations, as, What can be the Meaning! Are they all stark mad! and the like. That very Night he took his Pocket-Almanac, and, against the Day, wrote

" Motion, cui solus obstitit.
Mortem, which I alone opposed.

For he accounted this Action of his the most memorable that he had ever done."

Jeffreys, it seems, had before this set himself in opposition to the Lord Keeper: In particular, when flaming drunk, says Mr. North, he had made a furious Harangue against Trimmers, at the Council-board, with an Intention to render him obnoxious for his Moderation: And in fact were his Endeavours crown'd with Success, that, upon his Arrival from this Northern Expedition, he was admitted into the Cabinet, on purpose to crowd him out of his Place, which, we are told, it was resolv'd by the rising Party he should; He had indeed shewn himself, by what he had already done, to be every way qualify'd to go thro' with what was farther expected from him: He had shewn a Conscience that disdain'd Scruples; he had shewn a Heart incapable of Remorse; and he had shewn a Disposition equally prone to submit to any Balances on one hand, or combat any Outrage on the other.

Other Conflicts between these Lawyers.

Thus he had scarce set his Foot in the Cabinet, before he rush'd into a Contest with the Lord Keeper; and was not only countenanced in it, but enabled to get the better of it; and that in favour of a Man, who, instead of deriving Honour to himself from Preferment, disgraced whatever Preferment he receiv'd: This Man was one Serjeant Wright, whose Extravagances had reduced him to great Necessities; and whose Necessities made him aspire to be a Judge: But then he was so poor a Lawyer, says our Author, that he could not give an Opinion on a written Case: and withal so bad a Man, that he mortgag'd his Estate twice over; having the last time made affidavit, That it was clear from all Incumbrances. The Lord Keeper, while at the Bar, had furnish'd him both with Law and Money: It was he who had the first Mortgage of his Estate; and he had discover'd the Wickedness of the Last: When therefore he apply'd to his Lordship with Tears as well as Invitations, to forward his Suit, saying, he was utterly ruin'd if he said him now, his Lordship remain'd inflexible, nor would, for any Consideration, give his Sanction to what he could not approve. But, luckily for Wright, what ruin'd him with Lord North recommend'd him to Jeffreys: He knew, that the Court had no Employment for Integrity or Capacity; and that he alone who would do any thing was fit for any thing; he therefore not only receiv'd him with open Arms, but procur'd him the Patronage of the Faction he serv'd; and, thro' them, of the King himself; who was prevail'd prevall'd upon to name him to the Lord Keeper; and when inform'd by him, that he was to his Knowledge the most unjust Person in England to be made a Judge, to renew his Influences notwithstanding, and even grew importunate to have them comply'd with. This oblig'd his Lordship to open the whole Man to his Majesty, which he did circumstantially; and then to make the Appeal to his own breast, Whether such a Man ought to be made a Judge? But though the King thank'd him for his Plain-dealing, he acted upon it, as if all he had said had been Matter of Recommendation; and Wright was made a Judge accordingly.

The Letter previous to the Infamous Creature of his made a Judge.

By the driving of these several Points in this manner, one would imagine, that the Duke was now absolute Lord of the Ascendant; and that the King had reserv'd to himself only the Name of Power and Superiority: But, in this same Interval, yet other Incidents took place, which serve to shew, that the Court-Cabals had each their Day; and that his Majesty's Policy consisted, in so dividing his Favours between them, that both might have Reason to be satisfy'd with him, however dissatisfy'd they might be with one another.

We have been already apprisd of the Feuds which had arose between the Lords Hallifax and Rocheſter, in relation to the Administration of the Treasury, under the Direction of the Latter. Those Feuds still continued: Lord Hallifax was ever in quest of Abuses; and Lord Rocheſter thought himself injur'd by every Step which had a Tendency either to control his Power, or to perſe his Conduct. Hence he was led to aspire continually to be sole in the Commission, with the splendid Title of Lord Treasurer; and, to his infinite Mortification, not only found his Antagonist labouring as vigilantly and industriously to prevent him, but that he labour'd also with Success: For about the time that Godolphin was remov'd from the Treasury-board to the Secretary's Office, Deering, another of the Commissioners, dy'd, and by his Interest, and that of the Lord Keeper, conjointly, Sir Dudley North, the famous Sheriff, and another, fill'd up those Vacancies: And what was worse, being Men of Business, made him too uneasy with their Inspections, Examinations, and Proposals for the better Management of the Revenue, that he grew to weary of his Post, that, according to Bishop Burnet, he chose to resign: But according to Rochester, there was little of Choice in the Case: And as he produces Part of a Letter from Lord Hallifax to himself, which seems to indicate the same thing, more Credit is due to him, than to that Right Reverend Historian: His Words are these: "Lord Rocheſter had been remov'd from the Head of the Treasury-board to that of the Council; in which, tho' he was advanced in Honour, he was put backward in Profit and Power: It was therefore most evidently what he never sought for, and as plain, that Lord Hallifax had brought it to pass: Thus it was that Lord Danby, now in the Country, conjectur'd; and it was soon confirm'd to me, by a Letter from my Lord Mansfield himself, wherein he made use of these Words: "You may believe I am not at all displeas'd to see such an Adversary remov'd from the only Place that could give him Power and Advantage; and he bears it with so little Philosophy, that, if I had Nature enough, he gives me sufficient Occasion to triumph. You see I cannot hinder myself from imparting my Satisfaction to so good a Friend. But the Wonder was, how the Finger of my Lord Privy-Seal was able to effect this against the Shoulder of the Duke of York, who still continued a Friend to Rocheſter as much as ever."

But whatever Lord Rocheſter, in his own Particular, felt by this Exchange, his great Patron the Duke, may be suppos'd to have been a Gainer; for the Earl of Rochester was remov'd to make Room for Lord Rocheſter at the Head of the Council Board, Godolphin (who, in these Days, was another of his Creatures, and who was now also advanc'd to the Peerage) was made first Commissioner of the Treasury; and the Earl of Middleton, a Secy, Secretary of State.

Godolphin first Comptroller of the Treasury, and the Earl of Middleton Secretary.

It will not, perhaps, be an Over-refinement to suppose, that, almost as soon as the Lord Rocheſter underwent this Mortification, a Scheme was form'd, tho' without his Privy, for keeping him effectually in Countenance: For we shall find more Cause to wonder, that it should be laid at the Expence of so illustrious and deserving a Subject as the Duke of Ormond, and in favour of the most secret Views of the Roman Catholics, than to question the Truth of the Fact.

The latter End of April the Alterations had been made at the Treasury-Board. In June his Grace receiv'd sudden and unexpected Orders to return to his Government, tho' in the midst of a dead Calm, when not only Ireland was all Loyalty and Submission, but England too. In August he set out accordingly. Toward the latter End of this Month Lord Rocheſter was driven to the upper End of the Council-Board. About the same time, Sir Robert Southwell sent the Duke word, That his Removal was absolutely resolv'd on. And in October following he receiv'd Notice of it in Form from the King (who had formerly declar'd to him, that he never should be remov'd as long as he liv'd) the Duke, and Lord Rocheſter himself.

The Lord Rocheſter appointed Lord Lindsay of Rothesay in the room of the Duke of Ormond.

The Reasons assign'd in his Majesty's Letter for this Measure are, 1. That he found it absolutely necessary for his Service, That very many, and almost general, Alterations, should be made in Ireland, both in the Civil and Military Part of the Government. 2. That several Persons who had been recommended and plac'd by his Grace, and who were fit to be so at that time, must now be remov'd. 3. That he thought it would be a Hardship to impose this Talk on him; And 4. That for that Reason he had appointed Lord Rocheſter to be his Successor.

Letters in that Opinion.

The Duke's Letter contain'd little more than Expressions of Esteem and Friendship; and

and that of the Earl's was chiefly an Attempt to purge himself from any Suspicion of being concern'd in supplanting so noble a Friend and so near an Ally: For therein he affirm'd in particular, upon his Word, that tho' he had suspected something of this kind was coming on almost ever since his Grace's Departure, he had done all he could, first to hinder it, then to delay it; and professes, that he would still contribute any thing in his Power to keep things as they were. All these several (J) Letters his Grace answer'd in such Terms as shew'd the utmost Relinquishment to his Majesty's Pleasure: And from what he writes to his great Friend Sir Robert Southwell, it further appears, that he was more surpris'd and out of Countenance, than sorry for what had happen'd. He cannot help, however, in a Letter to the Earl of Arran, to make a sort of Comparison between the Treatment he had receiv'd from the King during the Height of the Papish Plot, and that which he met with upon this Occasion. "My Defects and Failings, said his Grace, were then courted, but now they are conspicuous and muster'd up. My Age, my Sloth, my Aversion to Roman Catholics, my Negligence in the Choice of such as I have recommended to, or plac'd in, the King's Service."— And again in another Letter to the Earl of Rochester, he expresses himself with unusual Warmth, of the intended Alterations which had been touch'd upon in the King's Letter, in the following Words:—"I have been so long suffer'd to mistake what was, or what was not, for the King's Service, or what he thought was, or was not, that I wonder how the Impertinence of the things I still propos'd was so long borne with: And I confess I am at this time confounded in my Notions more than ever I was; not only from the Reports we have of almost a total Change in all the changeable Part of the Government of this Kingdom, but from what the King himself was pleas'd to intimate to me, to the same Purpose; for which Alteration I must say (let the Consequence of saying it be what it will to me) there neither is, nor can be, any Necessity or good Reason at this time; and this upon enquiring into Particulars, might manifestly appear: And, therefore, for the Honour of the King's Justice, and for his Service, I hope that Intention will at least again be consider'd before it be put in Execution. I take the Liberty to interress the King's Justice in this Case; not but that I know his Majesty may justly change his Servants and give no Reason for it: But if he gives any, that Reason should be well grounded, especially if it be such as fixes a Mark of Incapacity or Infidelity." He adds, That if he himself had not been quite out of the question, by his Majesty's very explicit Declarations in his Favour, he had not said so much; and then complains, that the Darkness he was in, as to what was really intended, disabled him from communicating any useful Thoughts to his Lordship, in Conformity to his Request. That so great, so able, so faithful, and so try'd a Servant as his Grace, should be thus, all at once, left out of the whole System of the very Government he had so long, and so honourably, fill'd, may be justly thought somewhat strange: But that his Successor, who was to be the Instrument employ'd in these new Regulations, should till the Middle of December be kept almost as much in the Dark, as he, can never enough be wonder'd at. And yet these are the very Words of his Lordship's Reply: "I confess what your Grace says as to the Darkness you are in, which makes you incapable of communicating such useful Thoughts to me, as would be extreme necessary and desirable, is without Reply, even in my own Judgment. And if I should tell your Grace, that I who am going, am not much more in the Light, it might be some Matter of greater Wonder to you: I say not much more, for I have not yet the Honour to be trusted with the Secrets, upon my Word. I have waited on the King three or four times, with other Company, to discourse, and receive his Majesty's Instructions in relation to Ireland; but it hath never gone farther yet than Discourse in general, that several Officers in the Army must be remov'd, that the Council must be chang'd, and that some of the Powers of the Lieutenant, himself, must be restrain'd."

Thus it appear'd, that even the Earl of Rochester himself, who had gone such Lengths in the Service, and seem'd to be so deep in the Confidence of his Royal Highness, was not his only or chief Favourite; and that there was behind the Curtain some one, who was yet deeper in that Confidence than he. If it be true, as Bishop Burnet asserts, that the intended Innovations in the Government of Ireland were projected by the Earl of Sunderland to keep that Kingdom in Dependence on himself, it follows, that he was the Man who had thus got the start in the Race of Favour, and kept his Rivals at what Distance he pleas'd. But it appears the King was as forward to co-operate in this Project as the Duke: And thence it may be presum'd, that Lord Hallifax was of the Concert; at least so far as the setting Limits to the Power of the new Lieutenant, in whole Mortification, as we have seen, he took such a peculiar Pleasure.

As to the Project itself, it was, in the first place, to separate the Power of the Lieutenant from that of the Army, which was for the future to be under the sole Command of a Lieutenant-General, with such an absolute Exclusion to the Influence of the Civil Governor, that he was not to have the naming of the lowest Commission'd-officer in it: And, in the second, That a Door might be immediately open'd for the Admission of Roman Catholics; which it was known his Grace of Ormond would never have consented to, and which even his Successor, perhaps, would not have car'd to answer for.

Our

(J) The Whole of this epistolary Correspondence is to be found in Mr. Curtis's Life of the Duke of Ormond.

Our Right Reverend Historian of his own Times relates two Facts, which have a very intimate Relation to each other, and which serve to illustrate the present Crisis yet farther, in these Words:

"The Earl of Clancarty in Ireland, when he dy'd, had left his Lady the Guardian of his Children. It was one of the noblest and richest Families of the Irish Nation, which had always been Papists. But the Lady was a Protestant. And she, being afraid to trust the Education of her Son to Ireland, tho' in Protestant Hands, considering the Danger he might be in from his Kindred of that Religion, brought him over to Oxford, and put him in Fell's Hands, who was both Bishop of Oxford and Dean of Christ-Church, where the reckon'd he would be safe. Lord Clancarty had an Uncle, Colonel Maccarty, who was in most things, where his Religion was not concern'd, a Man of Honour. So he, both to pervert his Nephew, and to make his own Court, got the King to write to the Bishop of Oxford to let the young Lord come up, and see the Diversions of the Town in the Christmas Time; to which the Bishop did too easily consent. When he came to Town, he, being then at the Age of Consent, was marry'd to one of the Lord Sunderland's Daughters. And so he broke through all his Education, and soon after turn'd Papist. Thus the King suffer'd himself to be made an Instrument in one of the greatest Crimes, the taking an Infant out of the Hand of a Guardian, and marrying him secretly; against which the Laws of all Nations have taken care to provide very effectually."

This was the first; and the (g) second was as follows:

"The first Instance, in which the King intended to begin the immediate Dependence of the Irish Army on himself, was not to well chosen, as to make it generally acceptable: For it was, that Colonel Maccarty was to have a Regiment there. He had a Regiment in the French Service for several Years, and was call'd home upon that Appearance that we had put on of engaging with the Allies in a War with France in the Year 1678. The Popish Plot had kept the King from employing him for some Years, in which the Court was in some Management with the Nation. But now that being at an End, the King intended to employ him upon this acceptable Service he had done with relation to his Nephew. The King spoke of it to Lord Hallifax; and he, as he told me, ask'd the King, if he thought that was to govern according to Law. The King answer'd, he was not ty'd up by the Laws of Ireland, as he was by the Laws of England. Lord Hallifax offer'd to argue that Point with any Person that assert'd it before him: He said, that Army was rais'd by a Protestant Parliament, to secure the Protestant Interest: And would the King give Occasion to any to say, that where his Hands were not bound up, he would shew all the Favour he could to the Papists? The King answer'd, He did not trouble himself with what People said, or would say. Lord Hallifax reply'd to this, that it was a just Piece of Greatness in the King not to mind what his Enemies said; but he hop'd he would never despise what his Friends said, especially when they seem'd to have Reason on their Side: And he wish'd the King would chuse rather to make up Maccarty's Losses for his Service in Pensions, and other Favours, than in a way that would raise so much Clamour and Jealousy. In all this Lord Hallifax only offer'd his Advice to the King, upon the King's beginning the Discourse with him. Yet the King told it all to Maccarty; who came and expostulated the Matter with that Lord. So he saw by that how little safe a Man was, who spoke freely to the King, when he cross'd the King's own Inclination."

Thus all things seem'd to indicate, that the Catholic Kingdom was already at hand: And that Men of all Professions might be dispos'd to yield an unreserv'd Obedience, Jeffreys with the Return of the Term took care to open the Terrors of Westminster-hall: Every other Process of every other kind was also let loose, which could help to convince the whole Community, by the Sufferings of Individuals, that they were effectually subdued; and that it would be more advisable to kiss the Rod, than to shew any Repentment of the Smart. It was now that Poillon (Dubois was dead) was brought to account for the Infult offer'd to the Magistracy of London, by the Arrest of the Lord Mayor, at their Suits: In the Course of which Trial, Cornish (one of the discarded Aldermen) appearing as a Witness in Behalf of the Defendant, Jeffreys took occasion to disgrace the Bench with the following outrageous Invectives: "I know these things very Proceedings in Westminster-hall.

(g) And there is yet a Third, told by the same Author, which is yet less for his Majesty's Honour, than either of the former, viz.

"A Trial in a Matter of Blood came on after this. A Gentleman of a noble Family (according to Oldmixon, the Son of an infamous late King of a Slavy being at a public Supper with much Company, some hot Words pass'd between him and another Gentleman, which rais'd a sudden Quarrel, soon but three Persons being engag'd in it. Swords were drawn, and one was kill'd outright: But it was not certain by whose Hand he was kill'd: So the other two were both indicted upon it. The Proof did not carry it beyond Man-Slaughter, so Marks of any precedent Malice appearing; yet the young Gentleman was prevail'd on to confess the Indictment, and to let Sentence pass on him for Murder: a Father being promis'd him if he should do so, and he being threaten'd with the utmost Rigor of the Law, if he stood upon his Defence. After the Sentence had pass'd, it appear'd on what Design he had been promis'd on. It was a rich Family, and not well affected to the Court: So he was told, that he must pay well for his Pardon: And it cost him sixteen thousand Pounds of which the King had the one half, the other half being divided between two Ladies that were in great Favour. It is a very ill thing for Princes to suffer themselves to be prevail'd on by Importunities to pardon Blood, which cries for Vengeance. Yet an Excess to Impiety is a Feelsense of God-nature, and so is in itself less criminal. But it is a monstrous perverting of Justice, and a destroying the chief End of Government, which is the Preservation of the People, when their Blood is let to flow; and that not as a Compensation to the Family of the Person murder'd, but to let the Prince himself, and to some who are in Favour with him upon unworthy Account: And it was Robbery, if the Gentleman was innocent."

A. D. 1684. very well without their Assistance, and only ask these Questions to let the World know what sort of Men these are that pretend to Saintship. You see we can hardly get one Word of Truth out of them; neither Behel, nor that FELLOW, Cornish, would take the Oaths and Sacrament, according to Law, till they found it would contribute to their Design of subverting the Government: Then these RASCALS could qualify themselves for an Office, only to put the Kingdom in a Flame.

It was now also, that one Best was sentenc'd to pay a Fine of a thousand Pounds; to stand in the Pillory three times; to find Sureties for his Behaviour during Life; and to remain in Prison till all was comply'd with; for speaking very scandalous and seditious Words, as we find it express'd in the [Nov. 198.] Gazette: And that one Mr. Butler of Northamptonshire was also sentenc'd to pay a fine of 500 Marks, to give Security for his good Behaviour during Life, and to be committed till he had done both; for having presented a Jacobin and seditious Paper, in the Name of the Freeholders, to the Knights of that Shire, at the last general Election. And it was now that Mr. Roswell, a Dissenting Minister, was most ridiculously, as well as cruelly, indicted for compassing and imagining the Death of the King, and to raise a Rebellion, by uttering in a certain unlawful Assembly (i. e. an Assembly of Nonconformists) the following Words, viz. "That the People made a flocking to the King, upon Pretence of healing the King's Evil, which he could not do; but that they (meaning himself and other traitorous Persons, the King's Subjects) were the Persons they ought to flock to, because they were Priests and Prophets, who, by their Prayers, could heal the Dolours and Griels of the People: That they had had two wicked Kings together (meaning Charles I. and Charles II.) who had permitted Popery to enter in under their Noies, and whom they could resemble to no other Person than to the most wicked Jeroboam: And that if they (meaning the said evil-dispos'd Persons, unlawfully assembled) would stand to their Principles, he did not fear but they would overcome their Enemies (meaning the King and his Subjects) as in former Times, with Rams Horns, broken Pitchers, and a Stone in a Sling." The Witnesses to support these senseless Allegations, were three Women, who were all of the Preacher's Flock that Day, and who were all positive to the very same Words. Roswell on the other hand, after some notable Exceptions to the Indictment, produc'd two sensible Witnesses, who depos'd, That he had no otherwise mention'd the King's Best, than in Reference to the Case of Jeroboam's wither'd Arm, which had been restor'd by the Prophet's Prayer: That the Rams Horns, broken Pitchers, &c. had allusion only to the Power of God, which even by such inconsiderable Instruments in the Hands of Grison and Josiah, had produc'd such wonderful Effects; and that except in his Prayers, he had never once mention'd any King of England in his whole Exercise. He then call'd several Per-

A. D. 1684. sons of Reputation to shew that the Witnesses had none; as also to prove his own Loyalty: And then taking the Matter of his Defence into his own Hands, shew'd, That tho' the Witnesses had such incredible Memories as to give in the very same Passages in the very same Words, as Matter of Evidence against him, they vary'd essentially in naming his Text, as also in specifying the Place where they swore the Words were deliver'd: And farther, that whereas, according to them, those Words were deliver'd in the Forenoon, his Witnesses prov'd that the Discourse they had so perverted, was deliver'd in the Afternoon: That the Charge against him, if true, rather made it appear, that he was a Fool or a Madman than a Traitor: That he had the Sirets of his Defence not on the Incredibility or Improbability, but the Impossibility of the Truth of the Evidence against him, &c. In short, his Defence very sufficiently manifest his own Innocence, and the amazing Wickedness of the Prosecution against him: Neither the Attorney or Solicitor made any Reply as usual on the like Occasion: And even the Chief Justice, himself, in his Charge to the Jury, did little more than inveigh against Conventicles in general, laying against the Author of Hudibras, That, perhaps, as many Rebels were rais'd against the late King, by the beating of the Cud-dion in the Pulpit, as by the beating of the Drum in the Street. And upon the whole, directing them to consider whether the three Witnesses produc'd against the Prisoner, had sworn to the Truth, or were guilty of Perjury. But all this unusual Moderation on the Side of the Court, had no Effect on the Jury: They had been to us to condemn, that they knew not how to acquit; and, accordingly, in Defiance of Shame and Confidence, they gave in their Verdict, Guilty.

Mr. Roswell did not, however, throw up his Cause; but, on the contrary, when brought up to receive Sentence, alledg'd, That there was not sufficient Matter even in the Indictment itself, to justify the Verdict against him: That Inventures had supply'd the Place of Facts: That the Words were repugnant and insensible: And, upon the whole, demanded, that Judgment might be arretted, and that he might have the Benefit of Council to argue his Exceptions. All was granted that he ask'd. Mr. Wallop and Mr. Pollexfen had the Management of his Cause; the Meets of which were solemnly argu'd three Days after, and that with so much Advantage to the Prisoner, that even the Lord Chief Justice, himself, as well as his two Assistants, Wilmot and Walcot, declar'd the Indictment to be erroneous, nor would allow there was any Force in the Arguments brought by the King's Council in Support of it: But, as it was impossible that Jessu should ever act uprightly, without some corrupt Motive, we find his Behaviour in this Case number'd among his Enormities, both in the Minutes of the Lord Keeper North, and also in his Brother's Comments upon them. However this may be, we find the Prisoner was neither to have the Benefit

[List of Lord Keeper North, p. 214.]

A. D. 1684. now at the Height of his Power, and, therefore, of his Glory. Most Men, says Mr. Richard, were ready to fall down and worship him, and even his very Image, likewise, as the same Author would almost persuade us to believe; For immediately after he has thus express'd himself of his Majesty, he makes a Transition to the Statute set up, about this time, to his Honour in the Area of the Royal Exchange, by the Hamburg Merchants; and talks of it as the Wonder of the Times.

But whatever Additions his Majesty had made to the Grandeur, Independency, and Power of the Crown, it appears he had made none to his own Happiness. Authors of all Parties agree, that in this exalted Condition, he never seem'd less at ease in himself, or less satisfy'd with the Situation of his Affairs. Bishop Burnet's Words are, That the King grew more than ordinary jealous: Mr. North's, [Polity, 605.] "That the King having had some squall Attacks, appear'd to be more confederative, and grew more sensible of the Niceties of State-Government, than he had been before, especially relating to the Treasury." And again, "The King grew weary of his Sunderland's, Jeffreys, and other more latent Operators of the new Model; and had he liv'd

[Life of Lord Keeper North, p. 251.] six Months longer, would probably have remov'd them; for he found his Affairs move untowardly, and Faction, in fresh Hopes of a new Game, began to be busy.—According to Wetwood,

[ib. p. 243.] "The Shame of seeing himself impos'd upon by others far short of him in Parts, and that the Court was anticipating his Death by their Addresses to his Brother, as if he had been already King, did help to awaken him out of his Slumber." The same Author further says, "That his Majesty being in Company where the present Posture of Affairs was discours'd of, there escap'd him some warm Expressions about the uneasy Circumstances he was plung'd into, and the ill Measures that had been given him: And how, in a certain particular Affair he was pleas'd to mention, he had been abus'd: Adding, in some Passion, That if he liv'd but a Month longer, he would find a Way to make himself easy for the rest of his Life." Then, as to the Necessity of a Change of Measures, we find it thus insist'd

[Well. Mem. p. 189.] on by Mr. North, in the last Chapter of his Examen: "Some unlucky Steps taken at Court, (by the Persons above-named) and the like or worse expected to follow, had infallibly spoil'd the next Parliament, unless the King, by some gross Change of his new Measures, should not prevent or avert the Consequences."

But if all Authors are agreed as to the Alteration in the King's Temper, and his Purpose to make as great an Alteration in his Court; there is not the same Agreement in their Hints of what this Alteration was to be; and each tells his Story in so broken a Manner, that nothing positive results, for the Information of Posterity. Thus Mr. North seems persuas'd that Sunderland and Jeffreys were the Persons the King first design'd to get rid of: And, on the other hand, Bishop Burnet, after declaring, That [ib. p. 142.] the new Scheme was so great a Secret, that he could never penetrate into it, proceeds to say, in a desultory Manner, That it was hid at Lady Portland's: That Monsieur Barrillon and Lord Sunderland were the chief Managers of it: That Lord Godolphin was also in it: That Lord Hallifax was not in any Part of it: That Mr. Mas, of the Privy Purse, who, tho' deep in the King's Amours, was equally averse to Popery, the French Interest, and arbitrary Government, had told him, that he had been told, there was a Design to break out, with which he (Mas) himself would be well pleas'd: That when it was ripe, he was to be call'd in to come and manage the King's Temper, which no Man understood better than himself: That the thing they were to begin with, was the sending the Duke to Scotland: That it was generally believ'd if the two Brothers were once parted, they would never meet again: That the King had spoke to the Duke concerning his going to Scotland (the Pretence, according to Mr. Carte, being to hold a Parliament there, which was to be open'd, March 10) And his Highness answering, There was no Occasion for it, his Majesty had reply'd, Either you must go, or I: And that it was observ'd he treated him with more Coldness and Reserve than ordinary.

Now it is impossible that Sunderland should be the first Mover of a Scheme for his own Ruin; and, of course, either Mr. North was mistaken in his Supposition, that the King was preparing to remove that Minister, or the Bishop, in his Information, That he was at the Bottom of the intended Alteration. Then, how can it be conceiv'd, that he should co-operate in the Schemes of France, devoted as he was to the Interest of the Prince of Orange? Again, Why should the French Agents sollicit the Disgrace of a Prince, with whom his most Christian Majesty had been so long and so intimately ally'd, and with whom he afterwards continued to maintain so close a Correspondence? That Lord Hallifax should decline having a Concern in a French Cabal, we have Reason sufficient to believe; but that the Duke of Monmouth should come over without his Concurrence and Participation, is utterly incredible: For it appears, by the Duke of Monmouth's Diary before-quoted, that the private Inter-course between his Grace and the King was carry'd on by the Interposition of the Lord Privy-Seal; and that the Concert for his Return to England was directed by the same Hand. As to the Matter of Fact, that the Duke did come over, Mr. Carte asserts it as well as the Bishop of Salisbury, with this further Circumstance, That he was actually admitted to a private Interview with his Majesty. But surely his Grace's Diary would not have pass'd over so memorable an Incident; and yet that only takes notice of the preparatory Motions towards it; the time when it might probably take place. &c. In short, the very Words of his Grace's Minutes are these, viz. January 8, I receiv'd a Letter from Lord (Hallifax) mark'd by 29 (the King) in the Margin, to trust entirely

A. D. 1684.5 to 10: And that in February, I should certainly have leave to return: That Matters were concerting towards it: And that, 29 (the Duke) had no Suspicion, notwithstanding of my Reception here. February 3. A Letter from L. that my Business was almost as well as done; but must be so sudden as not to leave Room for 39's Party to counterplot: That it is probable, he would chuse Scotland rather than Flanders or this Country, which was all one to 29.<sup>1</sup>

Thus it is manifest, that tho' the Duke had the promis'd Land in sight, he had not as yet set his Foot upon it: That the Lord Privy Seal was so far at least in the Secret, as regarded his Grace's Return and the intended Removal of his Royal Highness; which, even according to Bishop Burnet's Account, was one of the greatest Points in View: And how very near the whole was to take effect, may be yet farther collected from another Passage of Welwood's, in these Words:

"Indeed all things were making ready to put the latter (meaning the Duke of York's Departure) in Execution; and there is Reason to believe the King had intimated as much to the Duke himself; for some of his richest Furniture was put up, and his chief Servants order'd to be in a Readiness to attend their Master upon an Hour's Warning; and Yachts were waiting to transport some Person of Quality without mentioning who it was, or whether bound. The Ramish Party who manag'd about Court, were observ'd to be more than ordinary diligent and busy up and down Whitehall and St. James's, as if some very important Affair was in Agitation: And a new and unusual Concern was to be seen on their Countenances. Nor was it any wonder; for, in this suspected Change, they were like to be the only Losers, and all their teeming Hopes were in a fair way to be disappointed."

These are all the Particulars (except one, which will be mention'd in the Sequel) that have hitherto transpir'd with respect to this momentous Affair: For it does not appear that Lord Hallifax ever let Sir John Reresby into any Part of it; or that the Lord Keeper was himself in the Secret: Which accounts for the little Satisfaction to be deriv'd from Mr. North. Bishop Burnet indeed moreover says, That Lord Hallifax had prevail'd with the King to appoint Monday February 2, to inspect the Treasury Books; and to be convinced by his own Eyes, of the Mismanagements which his Lordship had from time to time complain'd of: That Mr. Mary was desir'd to be at hand; and that it was expected it would be a critical Day. But the Reform of the Treasury was apparently but an Underpart in the present Design: Lord Rochester was already remov'd; and Statesmen generally set with more Zeal against the Offender than the Offence. We learn also from that other Particular above allud'd to, and which is communicated by the same Prelate, that the Tuesday was to have been the Day of Trial; and if so, this Affair of the Treasury may be reckon'd but a Prelude to the other.

From all these Circumstances it is however sufficiently manifest, that as the Duke of York, and his Partisans, had never so much to lose as then, so they had never so much to apprehend from the Disposition of the King towards them: Tho' he had gone greater Lengths to serve and oblige them, than was consistent, either with his own Interest or that of his Subjects, still they were unsatisfy'd; still they were pushing him on Expedients yet more dangerous and desperate; and possibly he was induc'd to resume the Reins of Government into his own Hands, rather from a Dread of his Brother's Rashness, than a Jealousy of his Greatness.

However this may be, in the midst of this Ferment, this Uncertainty, this Expectation, the King, who had for the most part of his Life been one of the healthiest of Men, and who had been careful to preserve that excellent Habit by continual Exercise, fell suddenly ill, on the very Monday that the new Scene was to have been open'd: He had indeed rested but indifferently the Night before, and had dropt some Complaints of an Oppression at his Stomach, and of a Pain at his Heart; but, as no body thought of Danger, no body thought of Prevention. The same Pains return'd in the Morning: His Face was observ'd to be pale and ghastly: He could not sit upright, as usual; and kept his Hand continually on his Stomach, as an Indication of continual Pain in that Part: And while in this Posture, he all at once cry'd out, fell back in his Chair, and lay as one dead. According to Mr. North, this happen'd at his Levee, when the Room was full: He also affirms, that his Majesty was blest by his Physician in waiting: But Bishop Burnet lays the Scene in the Bed-chamber; and leaves us to presume, that Dr. King, an eminent Chemist, as well as Physician, who waited on the King by a particular Order that Day, was the only Person present at the first Appearance of his Majesty's Disorder, by saying, That he went out, and meeting the Earl of Peterborough, told him, That the King was in a strange Humour, for he did not speak one Word of Sense; that the Earl persuading him to return, they had scarce enter'd the Chamber before his Majesty fell down, &c. That the Doctor then resolv'd to bleed him at all Hazards; and did so: That the King came to himself: That his Physicians afterwards approv'd what had been done; and that the Privy Council order'd the Doctor a thousand Pounds for his good Service; which was never paid.

That the King fell into such a Fit as hath been describ'd, that he recover'd upon Bleeding, and that his Disease was then held to be an Apoplexy, all agree: It appears further, that the Moment the Report of his Illness took air, it threw the Public into a strange Ferment, which, according to the Interpretation of his Majesty's (B.) Idolaters, was purely and simply the Effect of their Love

(2) Mr. North, with all due Qualities, is pleas'd to say, That the very Remembrance of this Incident makes the last Part, and more after it, than the First.

A.D. 1684.

An Article in the Gazette, that begins on the Recovery.

[Life of Lord Keeper North, p. 252, 253.]

to his Perſon, and Concern for his Welfare: But tho' it muſt be admitted, that few Princes were ever ſo perſonally dear to their People as he, it is reaſonable to think, that their Dread of his Succeſſor did not a little contribute to ſwell their Sorrow: And poſſibly it was more for the ſake of keeping the Peace, than to adminiſter Conſolation to the Afflicted, that the Lords of the Council ſet forth an Article in the Gazette, on the third Day of the King's Indiſpoſition, importing, That his Phyſicians conceiv'd him now to be in a State of Safety, and that in a few Days he would be freed from his Diſtemper.— Mr. North is explicit, on the Authority of the Lord Keeper, That the Doctors could not for ſome time be prevail'd upon to ſay any thing decisive of his Caſe; all lay in Hope: And when they did venture to pronounce, That all was like to be well, it was becauſe they had diſcover'd the King had a Fever, and now they knew what to do, which was to give him the Cortex.

But their Art prov'd as vain as their Divinations. On Thursday he fell into a ſecond Fit, and then the Phyſicians conſign'd him over to the Fathers of the Church: His Lordſhip of Sarum ſays he was attended by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sancroft; the Biſhop of London, Compton; and the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Ken: That Compton advis'd him to prepare for the worſt: And that Sancroft made a very weighty Exhortation to him, in which he us'd a good degree of Freedom, becauſe he was going to be judg'd by one who was no Reſpecter of Perſons: A.D. 1684. But then he tells us, the King gave no Answer to any of them: Nor does it appear, that he ever diſcover'd to any body why he behav'd either with ſo much Reſerve or Contempt. Out of their Hands, his Royal Highneſs, as we learn from the ſame Author, transfer'd him to the Fathers of his own Church, and in particular to Huddellſton, who, having been greatly instrumental in ſaving his Majeſty after the Battle of Worceſter, had been exempted out of every Act of Parliament againſt Romiſh Priests: And as the King was ſilent before, ſo he choſe to be private now. The Room was clear'd by his Majeſty's Order of all but the Duke, and the Earls of Bath and Ferriſbam, who were of the ſame Faith: After which the Door was doubly lock'd; and ſo continu'd for half an Hour, except that Lord Ferriſbam once open'd it for a Glaſs of Water. But notwithstanding all theſe Precautions, there was ſo little Intention to keep the Secret, that we learn not only from Biſhop Burnet, but from an Account publiſh'd by Father Huddellſton, himſelf, that his Buſineſs was to receive the King's Confeſſion, as alſo to ſeal his Pardon after the Form of the Romiſh Church: And that Ceremonial having been diſpatch'd, thoſe without were again admitted; and the King, by manifeſting an extraordinary Compoſure, manifeſted alſo how great a Stress he laid upon the Operation.

The Biſhop's (*) Account is, however, in (*) The two Accounts are as follow.

The Duke immediately order'd Huddellſton, the Prieſt that had a great Hand in ſaving the King at Worceſter Fight, (for which he was exempted out of all ſevere Acts that were made againſt Prieſts) to be brought to the Lodgings under the Bed-chamber. And when he was told what was to be done, he was in great Confuſion, for he had no Holie about him. But he went to another Prieſt, that lived in the Court, who gave him the Fix with an Holie in it. But that poor Priest was ſo frighted, that he ran out of Blackfriars in ſuch Haſte, that he truck againſt a Poſt, and ſeem'd to be in a Fit of Madneſs with Fear. As ſoon as Huddellſton had prepar'd every thing that was neceſſary, the Duke whiſper'd the King in the Ear. Upon that the King order'd, that all who were in the Bed-chamber ſhould withdraw, except the Earls of Bath and Ferriſbam: And the Door was double lock'd. The Company was kept out half an Hour: Only Lord Ferriſbam open'd the Door once, and call'd for a Glaſs of Water. Cardinal Harwood told me at Rome, that Huddellſton, according to the Relation that he ſent thither, made the King go thro' ſome Acts of Contrition, and, after ſuch a Confeſſion as he could then make, he gave him Abſolution, and the other Sacraments. The Holie ſtick in his Throat: And that was the Confeſſion of ſinners, for a Glaſs of Water. He alſo gave him ſome Uncious. All muſt have been perform'd with extreme ſilence, ſince it was ſo ſoon ended. But the King ſeem'd to be at great Eaſe upon it. It was given out, that the King ſaid to Huddellſton, that he had ſiv'd him twice, firſt his Body, and now his Soul; and that he ſaid'd him, if he would have him deſire himſelf to be of their Church. But it ſeems he was prepar'd for this, and to deliver the King from it; and ſaid, he had it upon him to ſignify the World in that Particular. But tho' by the Principles of all Religions whatſoever he ought to have oblig'd him to make open Profeſſion of his Religion, yet, it ſeems, the Conſequence of that was apprehended; for without doubt that poor Prieſt ſaid by the Directors that were given him. Fel. i. p. 607, 608.

On Tueſday the Fifth of February 1684, between Seven and eight o' Clock in the Evening, I was ſent for by the Queen's Bed-chamber at Whitehall, and deſired to bring with me all things neceſſary for a dying Perſon. Accordingly I came, and was order'd not to ſtir from thence till further Notice. Being thus oblig'd to wait, and not having had Time to bring along with me the moſt Holy Sacrament of the Altar, I was in ſome Anxiety how to procure it. In this Conſultation (the Divine Providence diſpoſing) Father Berns de Lema a Præſent, came thither, and underſtanding the Circumſtance I was in, readily proffer'd himſelf to go to St. James's, and bring the moſt Holy Sacrament along with him.

Soon after his Departure I was call'd into the King's Bed-chamber, where approaching to the Bed ſide, and kneeling down, I firſt pronounced his Majeſty with what Sacrifice I could perform, for God's Honour and the Happineſs of his Soul, at this laſt Moment, on which Eternity depends. The King then declar'd himſelf, that he deſir'd to die in the Faith and Communion of the holy Roman Catholick Church, that he was moſt heartily ſorry for all the Sins of his Life paſt, and particularly for that he had deſer'd his Reconciliation to long a ſeat, though the Merits of Chriſt's Paſſion, he lov'd for Satisfaction; that he was in Charity with all the World; that with all his Heart he pardon'd his Enemies, and deſir'd Pardon of all thoſe whom he had my ſelf offended; and that if he pleas'd God to spare him longer Life, he would amend it, detaching all Sin.

I then adverted his Majeſty of the Benefit and Neceſſity of the Sacrament of Penance, which Adverſaries to the King muſt willingly confeſs, and: an exact Condition of his whole Life, with extreme Compoſure and a ſerious, of Heart. Which ended, I deſir'd him, in ſign of Repentance, and true Sorrow for his Sins, to ſay with me this little Short Act of Contrition.

O my Lord God, with my whole Heart and Soul I deſire all the Sins of my Life paſt for the Love of Thee, whom I love above all things, and I ſolely truſt, by thy holy Grace never to offend thee more. Amen, Sweet Jeſus, I ſwear, into thy Hands, ſweet Jeſus, I commend my Soul; Mercy, ſweet Jeſus, Mercy. The King pronounced with a clear and audible Voice, which done, and his ſacramental Penance admitted, I gave him Abſolution.

After ſome Time thus ſpent, I ſaid, his Majeſty, if he did not ſtill deſire to have the other Sacraments of the Holy Church adminiſter'd unto him? He reply'd, by no means, I deſire to be Partaker of all the Helps and Succours neceſſary and expedient for a Catholick Chriſtian in my Condition. I added, And ſhall not your Majeſty alſo deſire to receive the precious Body and Blood of our dear Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in the moſt Holy Sacrament of the Eaſtward? The Answer was this: If I am worthy, pray ſend not to let me have it. I then

D. 1584-5. in one main Point utterly irreconcilable with that of Huddleston: For whereas he says, Huddleston refus'd to accept the King's Offer to declare himself of the Romish Church; Huddleston is explicit, that the King did make such a Declaration. His Lordship, moreover, places the Scene between the dying Monarch and Bishop Ken, after this; whereas, Mr. (A) North, on the contrary, will have it, that the said Bishop continu'd in his Duty about his Majesty, as long as there was any Appearance of his Attention to any thing; and intimates, that what was done AFTERWARDS, was rather an Imposition on his Weakness, than the Result of his own Will and Understanding. But even he, tho' more solicitous than any other Writer to establish a Belief, that the King was really of the Church he was by Law the Head of, has no one Circumstance or Syllable to alledge in Proof, that his Majesty thought it worth his while to be thought a Protestant. On the other hand, the Bishop is positive, That Ken apply'd himself much to the awaking the King's Conscience: That he spoke with great Elevation both of Thought and Expression, like a Man inspir'd: That he refus'd the Matter often: That he pronounc'd many short Ejaculations and Prayers, which affected all but him that was most concern'd, who seem'd to take no notice of him, and made no Answers to him: That he press'd his Majesty six or seven times to receive the Sacrament, which he always declin'd: That when he would have compounded with a Declaration, That he desir'd it, and that he dy'd in the Communion of the Church of England, he could procure no Answer; and that the only Concession he could extort from him, was, to accept the Absolution of that Church he refus'd to acknowledge.

But tho' this Account is not contradicted by Mr. North, who, it must be presum'd, must have been acquainted with it; because we find his Name in the List of Subscribers to the Bishop of Salisbury's History, it ought not to be forgot, that Mr. Echard testifies this latter Circumstance with respect to the Sacrament, by saying, It was not absolutely rejected, but only delay'd from time to time, till by some new Authority the Bishop and others were remov'd from his Presence; which in part coincides with Mr. North's Minutes, That Ken took his leave before Huddleston appear'd.

The Chemit has scarce a harder Task to fix Mercury, than the Historian Certainty. The Bishop and the Archdeacon differ as widely in some other Particulars of this Death-Bed Scene, as the same Bishop and North, or Huddleston. For, according to [P. i. p. 607.] his Lordship, while the Bishops were employ'd in their Exhortations, Lady Portsmouth sat in the Bed, taking care of him (the King) as a Wife of a Husband; and Ken presented the Duke of Richmond, the Duchess of Portsmouth's Son, to be blessed by his Majesty: While the Archdeacon on the contrary, says, That the favourite Mistress, the Duchess of Portsmouth, coming into the Room, the Bishop prevail'd with his Majesty to have her remov'd. The Bishop again asserts, That the King, in his last Words, to the Duke, recommended the same Lady over and over again to him in the most melting Words he could fetch out, as also his other Children, and Mrs. Grey. But, continues his Lordship, he said nothing of his Queen, nor any one Word of his People or his Servants: Nor did he speak one Word of Religion, or concerning the Payment of his Debts, tho' he had left behind him about 90,000 Guineas, which he had gather'd, either out of the Privy Purse, or out of the Money which was sent him from France, or by other Methods; and which he had kept so secretly, that no body whatsoever knew any thing of it. While the Archdeacon, on the other hand, assures us, that Bishop Ken, taking the Hint from the Sight of the Duchess of Port- [P. 1046.] mouth,

then told him, it would be brought to him very speedily, and desired his Majesty, that in the Interim he would give me leave to proceed to the Sacrament of Extreme Unction: He reply'd, With all my Heart. I then pointed him, which as soon as persons'd it was call'd to the Door, whether the blessed Sacrament was now brought and deliver'd to me.

Then returning to the King, I entreated his Majesty that he would prepare and dispose himself to receive. At which the King, smiling up himself, said, Let me not so loosely look in a better Place than in my Bed. But I humbly begg'd his Majesty to repeat himself; God Almighty, who lov'd his Heart, would accept of his good Intention. The King then having again receiv'd the sacramental Act of Contrition with me, he receiv'd the most holy Sacrament for his Penance, with all the Symptom's of Devotion imaginable. The Communion being ended, I read the usual Prayers, term'd The Remembrance of the Soul, appointed by the Church for Catholics in his Condition. After which the King desir'd the Act of Contrition, O my Lord God, &c. to be repeated: This done, for his last spiritual Encouragement I said,

Your Majesty hath now receiv'd the Comfort and Benefit of all the Sacraments, that a good Christian (ready to depart out of this World) can have or desire. Now it rest only, that you think upon the Death and Passion of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, of which I permit unto you this Verse (showing him a Crucifix) I lift up therefore the Eye of your Soul, and represent to yourself your sweet Saviour Jesus crucify'd: Bowing down his Head to kiss you: His Arms stretcht out to embrace you: His Body and Members all bloody and pale with Death to comfort you: And as you see him dead, and fixed upon the Cross, for your Redemption; so have his Remembrance fixed and fresh in your Heart: Behold him, with all Humility, with his most precious Blood not to be shed in vain for you: And that it will please him, by the Merit of his bitter Death and Passion, to pardon and forgive you all your Offences, and finally to receive your Soul into his blessed Hand; and when it shall please him to take it out of this transitory World, to grant you a joyful Resurrection, and a eternal Crown of Glory in the next. In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Amen.

So recommending his Majesty, on my Knees, with all the Transport of Devotion I was able, to the Divine Mercy and Protection, I withdrew out of the Chamber.

In testimony of all which, I have herewith subscribed my Name.

Jo. HUPPESBROS.

*) To see, the Case fell into the Hands of the respectable Clergy, that took their Turns in the Room with the Physicians, and particularly Dr. Ken, who perform'd the Office of the Visitation Prayers, and Ejaculations, so were most fit on so solemn an Occasion, as long as there was any Appearance of the King's Attention to any thing. And, as for what might be said afterwards, it may be conceiv'd, by all that have heard of the Methods, and by Ross's Predicts to dying Persons in their Power, who take the Chance of greater Consequence (religious Prediction) from Persons that have less Capacity to judge, which forces the Turn of Publication abroad in what is the best; and that it more regarded by them than what it does within doors, which they cannot but know, it really, must be of no Signification, but only for a Pretence. Examen, p. 650.

A. D. 1684-5. month, represented the great Injuries and Injustice done to his Queen by her and others; which he did, says he, so effectually, that his Majesty was induc'd to send for the Queen; and, asking Pardon of her, he had the Satisfaction of her particular Forgiveness at this time. And yet again, as to the Article of Religion, Puffendorf writes, "That when the King gave the Key of his strong Box to his Successor, he advis'd him not to think of introducing the Romish Religion into England, it being a thing dangerous and impracticable."

These are the several Representations of the same Fact: And as we are not furnish'd with any decisive Authority, it is fit the Reader should be left to make his own Conclusions. It is, however, worthy of Remark, that in the five Days of the King's Illness, it does not appear, that he utter'd one Syllable concerning his darling Son the Duke of Monmouth, tho' so lately in his Thoughts, and in so fair a way to be restor'd to his Favour; nor that his Grace had any Friend at Court to plead his Cause, or prevail with his Majesty even to interpose with his Brother for his Pardon: And it is almost as remarkable, that not one of our Writers has bestow'd a Line on this Omission.

His Death. Friday, February 6, was the last Day of King Charles's Life: He had complain'd

[F. 1. p. 608.] often, says Dr. Burnet, but with great Decency, That he was burnt up within; and,

[Mem. p. 141.] says Wetwood, of a racking Pain in his Stomach (but of no Indispositions any where else) which became so violent, that when all Hopes were gone, the Physicians were desir'd to use all their Art to procure him an easy Death, which he obtain'd at eleven o' Clock in the Forenoon, on the Day above-mention'd, in the Fifty-fourth Year of his Age, and the Twenty-fifth of his actual Reign.

But still we are not deliver'd from Controversy. It has been Matter of question whether his Majesty dropt into the Grave like Fruit, by its own Maturity, or whether he was shook by Violence, from the Tree; and what is said on each Side of the Question, serves rather to perplex the Truth than reveal it. Thus it is said, "That he had no sooner heard, that Lord Allington, Lieutenant of the Tower (with whom it is also said, he had drank Chocolate some Days before, and concerted Measures to secure the Duke of York) was dead after a very strange manner; but he began to be afraid of his own Life."

[Mem. p. 147.] And yet it is agreed on all Hands, says Wetwood, That King Charles express'd no Suspicion of his being poison'd, during all the time of his Sickness. But, withal, he adds, "That, during the Fits, he could not speak, and that he shew'd an Aversion to speaking during the Intervals. Our Historians of his own Times, is express'd, "That there were many very apparent Suspicions of his being poison'd: FOR tho' the first Access look'd like an Apoplexy, yet it was plain in the Progress of it, that it was no Apoplexy."

But Dr. Wetwood takes some Pains to prove, That the Symptoms in his Majesty's Case had but little Relation to an Apoplexy: For according to him, tho' that Disease seizes all the vital Faculties at once, it generally gives some short Warnings of its Approach, by unusual Obstructions of the Head; and many times is to be accounted for by some evident preceding Cause: Whereas, in King Charles's Case, there appear'd no visible Cause either near or remote, to which, with any Certainty of Reason, his Disease could be ascrib'd; And the Forerunners of it were rather to be found in the Stomach and the Bowels, than in the Head. Notwithstanding which, the same Author intimates, That [F. p. 144.] when his Body was open'd, there was not sufficient time given for taking an exact Observation of those Parts: And that when one of the Physicians seem'd to be more inquisitive than ordinary as to that Matter, he was taken aside and reprovd' for his needlesi Curiosity. Bishop Burnet tells us, that this Physician was Needham; adding, "That he call'd twice to have the Stomach open'd: That the Surgeons seem'd not to hear him: That when he mov'd it the second time, he heard Lower and another of the King's Physicians, say to one who stood next him, Needham will undo us:—He may see they will not do it: That he learn't this from Needham, himself, as also that his Reason for this Motion, was, the Appearance of certain blew Spots on the Outside of the Stomach; which Lower had also observ'd as well as he: That having been diverted to look on something else, when they return'd to look on the Stomach, it was carry'd away: And that Le Fevre, another of the Inquest upon this Occasion, discerning a Blackness in one of the Shoulders, caus'd it to be open'd, and found it was mortify'd." Wetwood again pronounces, That his Body sunk so extremely within a few Hours after his Death, notwithstanding the Coldness of the Season, that his Attendants were extremely amoy'd with the Smell; which he specifies as a very extraordinary thing in one of his strong and healthful Constitution, and no proper Consequence of a mere Apoplethical Case.

But notwithstanding all that appear'd, and all that was conceal'd, these worthy (I) Gentlemen of the Faculty; and who, in their Way, had been the Life-guard of the King, gavé it under their Hands, That he dy'd of an Apoplexy.

But however unanimous they were at the Time of giving in this Verdict, it seems they did not long continue so: Sir Edmund King, as we are told, wrote another Paper afterwards, declaring, That the King had been poison'd, and would have persuaded Lower to sign it with him; which he declin'd, because he had given in another Opinion before. We are farther told, that Short, who was

(1) Sir Thomas Millington, Sir Thomas Wilmot, Sir Charles Scarborough, Sir Edmund King, Bertouch, Cordes, Lower, Short, and Le Fevre.

A. D. 1684-5. was a Papist, made no Scruple to declare to some of his intimate Friends, that he believ'd King Charles had faul Play done him: These are Walswood's Expressions. Bishop Burnet's are, That Short did very much suspect faul Dealing. And both these Authors agree, That when he (Short) came to die himself, he discover'd some Suspicions (to Lewer and Millington, says the latter, to Le Fevre, who afterwards deny'd it, says another Writer)

[ibid p. 138.] That he had met with the same Treatment, for opening his Mind too freely concerning the King's Death. And the Duke of Bucks (Shrewsbury) in his Character of this Prince, so far countenances these Expressions as to say,

"I am oblig'd to observe, that the most knowing and most deserving of all his Physicians did not only believe him poison'd, but thought himself so, not long after, for having declar'd his Opinion a little too boldly."

Now there is no body who can admit Dr. Burnet's Reasoning, That because the King's Case was not apoplectic, therefore there were apparent Suspicions of Poison: But Mr. North makes no Difficulty to pronounce all that is said in relation to Dr. Short to be a shallow Story. According to him, the Words us'd by that Doctor, viz. faul Play, or faul Dealing, meant no more, than that Dr. King had mistaken the Cause: That Bleeding was fatal in it; and that every Method they afterwards pursued did him more Hurt than Good. And he farther says, that this was agreeable to the Opinion of one Dr. Stokes, an eminent Physician in Convent-garden, who had declar'd to him, that the King's Case was epileptic, not apoplectic; and that, consequently, all that was done was diametrically wrong. And yet Dr. Short was not only of the Consultation, but probably presid'd in it, and gave his own Bias to the whole Proceedings, as we shall find reasonable to conclude even from certain Passages of Mr. North's own Book; and from whence it follows, that the Words faul Play, or faul Dealing, must relate to the Cause of the Malady, and not to the Manner of treating it. One of these Passages has been already cited, namely, that wherein it is said, That the King had a Fever, and his Physicians had order'd him the Cortex: And the second is as follows: "But his Case (Short's own Case, that is to say) was known: He was attended by all the eminent Physicians in Town; and which of them says he was poison'd? But it is well known they all said, that he made an end of himself by his own bold Methods in using the Cortex." Thus it appears, that Short was the Patron of that Medicine in those Times, and pres'd it almost into every Service; which, according to the present Practice, not only does Honour to his Judgment, but justifies what has been already insinuated, that he himself had the Lead in the King's Case; and, consequently, could not be understood to condemn his own Prescription.

But Mr. North is tenacious of his Opinion; insinuates, that scarce any Man can be said to have faul Play for his Life, who labours under Ten Physicians, as the King did; observes, that, in Plot-work, obscure Hints go farther than clear Speech; and that the Propriety of the Mind is ever to the malevolent Side, which he exemplifies by another Instance to the Point before us, in these Words: "I heard a Gentleman of Value in the Law say, he ask'd a Man (he thought could tell) if the King were poison'd, or no? And his Answer was, That he was not to reveal what he knew of that Matter. Who now, after this, takes not the worst Sense? Whereas all that can be justly taken is, that the Man was willing you should believe it, but would neither lye to convince you, nor speak plain to undeceive you."

Walswood is also candid enough to lay before his Readers several Considerations tending to prove, that his Majesty dy'd after the ordinary Course of Nature: As, 1. That he had liv'd so fat, as might enervate, in a great measure, the natural Force of his Constitution, exhaust his animal Spirits, and thereby render him the more subject to an Apoplexy; which, says he, is a Disease that weakens and locks up those Spirits from performing their Functions. 2. That he had once or twice before been attack'd by (m) Fits, that much resembled those of which he afterwards dy'd: But then he will not allow those Fits to have been of the apoplectic kind; but rather convulsive, as was evident by the violent Distortions of his Face, and of his whole Body, while they were upon him. And, 3. He relates, that, for some time before his Majesty dy'd, he had had an Issue in his Leg, which had produced a very great Discharge, and consequently must have produced as great a Revulsion from his Head; and that, tho' it was probably made for that End, and his Physicians remonstrated the ill Effects of discontinuing it, he suffer'd it to be dry'd up a few Weeks before he dy'd.

On the other hand again, he tells us, (ibid p. 144) "There was some Weight laid upon an Accident, which had fallen out at Windfor, some Years before his Majesty's Death; where

[m] Of which he gives the following Instance: "During the Heat of the Popish Plot, King Charles had some secret Matters to manage by the means of a French Priest then beyond Sea, whom he order'd to be privately sent for: And the Gentleman employ'd between the King and him (from whom I had the Story) was directed to bring him in Disguise to Whitehall. The King and the Priest were a considerable Time together alone in the Closet, and the Gentleman attended in the next Room: As his Majesty came out, with all the Marks of Fright and Abhorrence in his Face, and having receiv'd himself a Joke, he told the Gentleman, That he had seen the greatest Kibbe ever Man did; for while he was with the King, his Majesty was suddenly surpriz'd with a Fit, accompany'd with violent Convulsions of his Body, and Contortions of his Face, which lasted for some Moments; and when he was going to call out for Help, the King held him by Force, till it was over; and then bid him not be afraid, for he had been troubled with the like before: The Priest adding, what a Condition he should have been in, considering his Religion, and the present Juncture of Affairs, if the King had dy'd of that Fit, and no body in the Room with him besides himself. Walswood, p. 140, 147.

A. D. 1685; where the King, after the Fatigue of Riding, having drank more liberally than usual, retir'd to the next Room, and, wrapping himself up in his Cloak, fell asleep upon a Couch. Having thus taken some Repose, he return'd to his Company; and a Servant of one of them, wrapping himself up in the same Cloak, lay down in his Place; which he had scarce done, before he was stab'd to the Heart with a Poinard; and in that Condition was found dead. He adds, That it was never known how it happen'd: And what is stranger, that the Matter was hush'd up, and that no Enquiry was made about it.

Probably, those who delight in the Marvellous would have complain'd if this Anecdote had been omitted: But if any Weight was ever laid upon it, the Story could very ill support it. For if there was any Room to suppose that the Blow was aim'd at the King, it is not to be suppos'd that the Matter would have been hush'd up, without an Enquiry: And if the poor Fellow was kill'd in a Fit of barbarous Resentment, that he should have the Infolence to make to free with his Majesty's Place, as (if there is any (n) Truth in the Tale) it is probable he was, then it has no Relation to this controverted but real Death of his Majesty: Concerning which, we find the Lord Delamere expressing himself to the Grand-Jury of Cheshire, in these very Words:

"Whether he dy'd a natural Death, or had FOUL PLAY, I will leave to be determin'd by every Man in his own Thoughts: Only thus much I must observe, That manifest Symptoms of Poison appear'd on his Body, and Matters were then so laid, that it was necessary to have a popish Prince on the Throne." Thus we have the Crisis urg'd as a Presumptive of the Fact; but there would be more Justice and Impartiality in urging it as the Cause that the Suspicion was so greedily entertain'd, and so readily believ'd: To this purpose the Bishop of Salisbury has the Grace to say, "But his dying so critically, as it were in the Minute in which he seem'd to begin a Turn of Affairs, made it to be generally the more believ'd, and that the Papists had done it, either by the means of some of the Lady Portsmouth's Servants, (he had before told us, that the King had drank a little Soup at her Grace's Lodgings, the Night before he was taken ill) or, as some fancy'd, by poison'd Snauff; for so many of the small Veins were burst, that the Brain was in great Disorder, and no Judgment could be made concerning it." Too much Regard cannot be paid to the former Part of this Passage: But as to the Latter, it only serves to shew, on how very imperfect Evidence this Notion of Poison was founded: For if the Stomach was the Part affected by the Dose, as we are to conclude from the Story of Natalium and Lover, then no Conclusions are to be drawn from the State of the Brain: If the Brain was the Part most remarkably disorder'd, then no Conclusions are to be drawn from that Circumstance relating to the Stomach: If either may be false, it follows, neither may be true: And where the Premises are so uncertain, Reason cannot, and Integrity will not, make any certain Inference. But then the same Prelate, in the same Place, throws in by way of Supplement, what he calls a very surprizing Story, on the Authority of Mr. Henry of Hampshire, as follows:

"He told me, that, when the Duchess of Portsmouth came over to England in the Year 1699, he heard, that she had talk'd as if King Charles had been poison'd; which he desiring to have from her own Mouth, she gave him this Account of it: She was always pressing the King to make both himself and his People easy, and to come to a full Agreement with his Parliament: And he was come to a final Resolution of sending away his Brother, and of calling a Parliament; which was to be executed the next Day after he fell into that Fit of which he dy'd. She was put upon the Secret, and spoke of it to no Person alive, but to her Confessor: But the Confessor, she believ'd, told it to some, who, seeing what was to follow, took that wicked Course to prevent it. Having this from so worthy a Person, as I have set it down, without adding the least Circumstance to it, I thought it too important not to be mention'd in this History. It discovers both the Knavery of Confessors, and the Practices of Papists to evidently, that there is no need of making any further Reflections on it."

Who these some were, is left to Conjecture: But then his Lordship, with much Ingenuity, declares, That he never heard that the Suspicions of those Times were ever fasten'd on the Prince who succeeded to the Throne: And his Grace of Bucks winds up his Character of King Charles with the following remarkable Paragraph: "But here I must needs take notice of an unusual Piece of Justice, which yet all the World has unanimously agreed in, I mean, in supplanting his Successor of the least Contrivance in so horrid a Villany: And perhaps there was never a more remarkable Instance of the wonderful Power of Truth and Innocence. For 'tis next to a Miracle, that so unfortunate a Prince, in the midst of all those Disadvantages he (s) lies under, should be yet clear'd of this, even by his greatest Enemies, notwithstanding all those Circumstances that use to give a suspicion, and that extreme Malice which has, of late, attended him in all his other Actions." That unfortunate Prince has not, however, escap'd wholly free from Calumny, on this Occasion; for, in defence of both their Authorities, a Modern Writer has been hastily enough to express himself as follows: "It is said that the King, being one Day importun'd by the Duke to undertake things which he thought very dangerous, told him, Brother, I am resolv'd never to sword again, you may do so if

(n) Which is very dubious; not only because it is never mention'd but on Walsingham's Authority; but because an Incident of the like Nature is told by the Author of the Tales.

(s) Scy, as having happen'd in the Court of France.

(t) He was living, when this Character was written.

A.D. 1684-5. you please. And it might, perhaps, not be difficult to prove, that some warm Speeches had pass'd between them. After which King Charles was heard to say, That he had been abus'd, and that if he liv'd a Month longer, &c. (as before recited). This being carry'd to the Duke of York (as there ever were, and, probably, ever will be Carriers among Courtiers, as well as Pigeons) he, in his natural way, reply'd, (p.) That then it was time to take Care of himself. The Oracles of Delphos were always ambiguous, and so was he in his Manner of expressing himself."

This is the whole of the Evidence that has yet appear'd in this dubious Case; and possibly from the very Nature of that Case, no more is ever likely to arise; for which Reason all Decision must, and ought to be postpon'd to the general Audit.

The Character of this Prince, and the Profit and Loss of his Reign, remain still to be discours'd of.

As to the first, it has been so often drawn, and is at present so familiar to every Man's Memory, that it seems a superfluous Talk to touch upon it any farther: But in Process of time these traditional Ideas will be worn out, and then Posterity will vainly endeavour to retrieve what their Ancestors have forgot. Besides, the Draughts which have been hitherto taken, are, in many Respects, so unlike each other, that it is scarce supposable they were taken from the same Face. According to some, his Complexion is fair and spotless: According to others, no Etiashop is blacker or more deform'd: And this Contrariety of Colours, made use of in painting the same Object, arises from the different Lights in which it is shewn; or rather, from the different Mediums thro' which it is beheld.

With regard to Generals, the Papists praise him no farther than he made Approaches to their Religion and their Interest: For endeavouring to procure them a Toleration: For being to firm in maintaining the Succession; and, thereby, providing them a King after their own Hearts: And lastly, for dying in the Bottom of the Church. But then they censure him for putting his Hand to the Plough, and then looking back; for departing from his Declaration of Indulgence, and for dissenting with God and the World in the Article of his Religion.

The Protestant Nonconformists, more particularly the Presbyterians, reproach him with the highest Ingratitude to them; to whom he stood so highly oblig'd for the Recovery of his Throne: In particular; for setting on foot Projects of Reconciliation and Comprehension, only for a Snare to justify the Breach of his Engagements, and to give them up as a Prey to their Enemies; and for so readily and cheerfully giving his Assent to those severe Laws against them, under the Weight of which they groan'd all the rest of his Reign.

In the Charge of Ingratitude, join the Remnant of the old suffering Cavaliers, who liv'd to see the Restoration, and to be sadly sensible they were like to receive no Benefit from it; being first thrown by him on the Charity of the Parliament (which they had once drawn their Swords against and had vow'd to extirpate) and afterwards author'd by (q) Patent to prey on their Fellow Subjects for a Subsistence.

On the other hand, in the Writings of the Champions for the establish'd Church, he is ever represented as a most Religious and Gracious Prince; and as such even recommended to the Divine Protection, in their very Prayers. And they had much Reason for this Partiality in his Favour; for by him, they were restor'd to their Possessions and Dignities, and enabled to lord it once more over the Bodies and Estates of their Fellow-Subjects; and Men are most apt to overflow in their Acknowledgments for those Benefits which they covet most.

Then as to the Portraits of his Majesty, And by particular Persons. which have been left us by particular Hands, they also have partook of the Leaven of Passion and Prejudice, either thro' personal Disgust or Obligation, or the more general Inflection of Parties.

Thus Mr. North, towards the Close of his Examen, in a Transport of Zeal and Veneration, expresses himself as follows:

"And I must say for King Charles II. that, bating his being addicted to his Pleasures, chiefly of Women, and the Consequences, he had as many Virtues, and as few Faults as may readily be found in any one Man. He never did learn to any living thing willingly. He was affable and courteous, and would frequently lay aside Kingship to enjoy himself in Company; which made him be term'd a very honest Gentleman. And, as he was very witty himself, he lov'd it immoderately in others, and would bear to be jest'd with: And indeed, generally, he bore ill Usage like an Hermit, and forgave like a Saint. The King had also a great Judgment to discern Truth and Right. I heard one of his ablest Counsellors say, He never knew a Cause heard at the Council publicly, but he determin'd the right Way. He was honest, and did Justice to all, unless his Affairs constrain'd him to fail; and of this the Bankers Case, is an eminent Instance: But some were Sufferers by postpon'd Debts, for which his Ministers had more to answer for than he had. They were contracted by the unadvise'd War; and the Parliament not paying them, he could not compass to do it; but, if he had liv'd longer, it is probable he would have compass'd all his Debts.

The

(p) On whose Authority this Answer is founded, I am not able to ascertain. But what precedes it is partly taken from Walsley, and partly from Oldmixon, who says, that Cromwell the Peer, as he himself told the Story, being in waiting at the Cabinet Door, with four Scenes of his Comedy of Sir Courty Nite, (which he was writing by the King's Command, on the Plan of two Spanish Plays) overheard those Words of his Majesty to his Brother: And that they were no sooner utter'd, than the Door open'd, and his Royal Highness pass'd hastily by him, as in a Passion. See Oldmixon, vol. i. p. 690.

The greatest Blame, that, in common Talk, fell upon the King, was his falling of his Word and Promise, with which most of his Minions, as well as Enemies, reproach'd him. But that Matter is not well understood; for he seldom or never fail'd of his Word in a Matter reasonable or just, wherein he was not surpris'd or ill us'd. But he was averfe to Study and Thinking, and, for that Reason, too much resign'd to his Ministers; yielding almost to every thing they presented to him, because he trusted them, and would not break his own Head with Business. Thus he found himself intangled by Shaftsbury, to engage in Words and Actions, which, pursu'd, had been his Ruin, so he broke with him, and was, for that, accus'd of being fickle, and not standing to his Word. So among his Minions, they would take Advantage, through the mollis tempera fandi, to get Promises of unreasonable things, which, coming afterwards to understand rightly, he found he could not well comply with. Then did those Men rail at him in Prose and Verse, because their unreasonable Surprises had not Effect. But often (r) Importunity got the better of his Nature, and made him do unkind things to his Friends.

Barnet,

On the other hand, Bishop Barnet, with all the Bitterness he is Master of, assures us, That he had been oblig'd to so many, who had been faithful to him, and careful of him, that he seem'd afterwards to resolve to make an equal Return to them all. And finding it not easy to reward them all as they deserv'd, he forgot them all alike. Most Princes seem to have this pretty deep in them; and to think that they ought never to remember past Services, but that their Acceptance of them is a full Reward. He, of all in our Age, exerted this Piece of Prerogative in the simplest manner: For he never seem'd to charge his Memory, or to trouble his Thoughts with the Sense of any of the Services that had been done him. While he was abroad at Paris, Calen, or Brussels, he never seem'd to lay any thing to Heart. He pursu'd all his Diversions, and irregular Pleasures, in a free Carrier, and seem'd to be as serene under the Loss of a Crown, as the greatest Philosopher could have been. Not did he willingly hearken to any of those Projects, with which he often complain'd that his Chancellor persecuted him. That in which he seem'd most concern'd was, to find Money for supporting his Expence. And it was often said, that, if Cromwell would have compounded the Matter, and have given him a good round Pension, that he might have been induc'd to resign his Title to him. During his Exile he deliver'd himself to entirely to his Pleasures, that he became incapable of Application. He spent little of his time in reading or Study, and yet less in thinking. And, in the State his Affairs were then, he accusom'd himself to say to every Person, and upon all Occasions, that which he thought would please most: So that Words or Promises went very easily from him. And he had so ill an Opinion of Mankind, that he thought the great Art of living and governing was, to manage all things and all Persons with a Depth of Craft and Dissimulation. And in that few Men in the World could put on the Appearances of Sincerity better than he could: Under which so much Artifice was usually hid, that in Conclusion he could deceive none, for all were become mistrustful of him. He had great Vices, but scarce any Virtues to correct them: He had in him some Vices that were less hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones. He was, during the active Part of his Life, given up to Sloth and Lewdness to such a Degree, that he hated Business, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much Trouble, or put him under any Constraint. And, tho' he desir'd to become absolute, and to overturn both our Religion and our Laws, yet he would neither run the Risque, nor give himself the Trouble which so great a Design requir'd. He had an Appearance of Gentleness in his outward Deportment: But he seem'd to have no Bowels nor Tenderness in his Nature: And in the End of his Life he became cruel. He was apt to forgive all Crimes, even Blood it self: Yet he never forgave any thing that was done against himself, after his first and general Act of Indemnity, which was to be reckon'd as done rather upon Maxims of State, than Inclinations of Mercy. He deliver'd himself up to a most enormous Course of Vice, without any sort of Restraint, even from the Consideration of the nearest Relations. The most study'd Extravagancies that way seem'd, to the very last, to be much delighted in, and pursu'd by him. He had the Art of making all People grow fond of him at first, by a Softness in his whole way of Conversation, as he was certainly the best bred Man of the Age. But when it appear'd how little could

(r) Of this sort (contains the same Author) one Instance was this: Sir Joh. Cholmon was Chief Justice of Chesler, a very reverend, deserving Gentleman, and of the old Cavalier Party. This Place suited with his Way of living, for he had a good Estate not far off, and was of a retired Humour. But Sir George Jefferys coming upon the High Court Intervi, and being a Whigman, through his Title to that Place failed, and, upon instance of City Merch, with Interest, and testifying, prevailed to have the King make Sir Joh. Cholmon a Judge of the Common Pleas, that the other Place might devolve to himself. This was like taking out the Eyes of the good old Gentleman, who, after he found that against this Remove he could prevail nothing by Friends, sought to speak to the King in Person; and, for that end had planted himself in a Window, as the King was to pass by: the King came, and seeing him at a distance, could not find the Means, but turn'd off another Way. After that, Sir Joh almost plied the King, and never tired more, but sat in his Justice-seat in the Common Pleas, till, laden with Years, and not without the Esteem and good Report of all Men, he parted with his Life and Trail together. To balance this Story, I will join another short one, which is, that when the Judges were under Question in Parliament, the King, observing in the House of Lords, one of them (Sir Francis North) sit serene upon the Wood-stock, went and clapped down close to him, and, in good Company, said he, I could never forgive my Friends, as my Father did, and immediately rose up and went away. He never pretended to justify his Servants, if they were regularly question'd for what they had done, but would see none of them oppress'd; and his Protection of Queen, in her Innocence, was a glorious Act of his Justice.

be built on his Promise, they were cur'd of the Fondness that he was apt to raise in them. When he saw young Men of Quality, who had something more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and set himself to corrupt them both in Religion and Morality; in which he prov'd so unhappily successful, that he left England much chang'd at his Death from what he had found it at his Restoration.

We have here the Image of a Royal Fury, and a Guardian Scraph, in the same Person; and these different Representations have help'd to divide the Affections and confound the Understandings of the People: Those who adhere to the one approach it with a Reverence next to Idolatry; and those who adopt the other reflect on the Original with Detestation and Horror: But neither is wholly or strictly copy'd from the Life, as we shall in part find, from two other Sketches, which are at least more dispassionate, and therefore it may be presum'd more exact than the two former. These are the Workmanship of Sheffield Duke of Bucks, and Dr. Wotton; and in some respects they tally so precisely, that one cannot help supposing, that the Doctor stood oblig'd for his Out-lines to the Duke. According to his Grace, the King's Religion was that which is vulgarly, but unjustly, counted none at all, Deism; which he fell into thro' Carelessness, and retain'd thro' Laziness: And the Doctor, in other Words, affirms the same: Both, however, acknowledge his Bias to the Roman Catholic Mode of Worship, (which Mr. North will by no means allow of, because he attended his own Chapel-Service only, and comply'd with the whole Ceremonial of the Church of England) and which they impute to his Complaisance, during his Exile; and, towards the latter End of his Life, to Habit, and political Considerations. Both agree, that he hated Business, and lov'd Quiet above all things; but, withal, that he sometimes out-dudged his Ministers in Business, and other times, that he was more a Master of it than any of them: That Jealousy, either in Love or Dominion, made up no Part of his Composition; and that it was owing to this kind of Incontinency, that he could not be brought to repine at the growing Greatness of France, or at the mighty Share of his own immediate Power, which his Brother engros'd even in his Life-time: That, in some Instances, he was not only liberal, but prodigal; and yet, in others, not only frugal, but niggardly: That his Prodigality threw him into Necessity, which forced him into a Dependence on his great Neighbour of France; who play'd the Broker with him sufficiently, in all those Times of Extremity: That he was so much an Enemy to Formality of every sort, that he even departed from his Dignity; upon all Occasions, tho' ever so public, descending from the Stately to the Familiar, and with all Persons conversing almost upon the Level: That no Man ever practis'd Diffimulation more, or with more Dexterity, and yet, that no Man was more easily or more grossly impos'd upon.

on: That he abounded in Wit and Pleasantry, which he let fly at random at any Game that rose: That he was inclin'd to be just, as appear'd by his Resolution to run all Hazards, rather than injure his Brother in the Succession; and that possibly his giving way, in such a Variety of Cases, to all the Rigours of the Law, which has drawn his Clemency into question, arose from the same Principle: That the Study he principally delighted in, was Ship-building, and maritime Affairs; whence he was, both by Nature and Habit, the best qualify'd of all our Princes to advance the true Interest of his Country: But that in applying those Talents to the Service of France, as well as his own Kingdom, he undid with one Hand what he did with the other. Thus far our two Authors keep pace with one-another: But for what follows, the Doctor is answerable only. "If he had any one fix'd Maxim of Government, says he, it was to play one Party against another, to be thereby the more Master of both: And no Prince understand better how to shift Hands upon every Change of the Scene. To sum up his Character, he was dextrous in all the Arts of Intimation, and had acquir'd to great an Ascendant over the Affections of his People, in spite of all the unhappy Measures he had taken, that it may, in some Sense, be said, he dy'd opportunely for England; since, if he had liv'd, it is probable we might, in Compliance with him, have complimented ourselves out of all the Remains of Liberty, if he had had but a Mind to be Master of them, which it is but Charity to believe he had not, at least immediately before his Death. Thus reign'd, and thus dy'd, he also says, King Charles the Second, a Prince endow'd with all the Qualities that might justly have render'd him the Delight of Mankind; and entitl'd him to the Character of one of the greatest Geniuses that ever sat upon a Throne, if he had not fully d'rob'd those excellent Parts with the soft Pleasures of Ease, and had not entertain'd a fatal Friendship, that was incompatible with the Interest of England."

These are the historical Features of King Charles, as they have been transmitted to us by these several Hands; and after all, perhaps, they will be found insufficient to give the critical Reader Satisfaction: For in each the King is mingled with the Man, his private with his public Life; and such Colours are hid on as the Transiptions of his Reign will scarce verify. Where, for Example, can we find any Trace of that sublime Understanding, and that enlarg'd Heart which constitute a great and royal Genius? And if he was so constituted as to be the Delight of Mankind, how grievously must he have abus'd and perverted that happy Constitution, by giving into such fatal Measures, as have furnish'd his Adversaries with Pretences to compare him to the worst, instead of the best of the Roman Tyrants? Could the meanest of Men have behav'd with less Spirit than he did, when appriz'd of the tragical Death of his beloved Sister the Duchess of Orleans? Then how can Mr. North be justify'd for affirming he never did Hurt to any living

Creatures

A.D. 1647. Creature willingly? Was not the very Entrance of his Reign polluted with the Violation of Palmer's Bed? Can it be suppos'd that his Will was not concern'd in the premeditated Barbarity inflicted by his Command on Sir John Coventry, for a Freedom taken with his Pleasures in the House of Commons? Can we reflect on the many savage Executions that sadden'd his Reign, without being tempted to think they were pleasing to him? Or if he adopted the Cruelties of others, and did a Violence to himself in giving way to them, does it not argue, that his Virtues sunk under his Frailties? At which ought we to wonder most, that he pardon'd Blood, for stealing the Crown and endeavouring to destroy his old and faithful Servant the Duke of Ormond, or for his ordering Sydney to be executed? It must be allow'd there is much Modesty in that Expression of his Grace of Bucks, That he was inclin'd to Justice. But then the single Instance which he draws from his unalterable Attachment to his Brother, is rather to be consider'd as a Matter of Policy. And it is, besides, notorious, that in all public Cases he ever prefer'd what was convenient to what was just: Witness, in general, his two Dutch Wars, and the Methods he took to support them; the Non-observance of his defensive League with Spain, and the notorious Breach of so many solemn Declarations. But then, on the other Side, if he had great Weaknesses or Vices, it is hard to say, that he had few or no Virtues to balance them. What the Duke of Bucks declares, the common Voice of the World confirms, viz. That he was an easy, generous, Lover; a very obliging Husband; a friendly Brother; an indulgent Father; a good natur'd Matter; and an excellent Companion; which no Man can be, without a Gentleness of Disposition, without a Tenderness of Heart, and all those other captivating Ingredients, which are only to be found in the most humane and most accomplish'd of the Species. It is true, these were the Graces and Ornaments of his private Life: And that in his Public, they no otherwise appear'd, than in that enchanting Affability and Condescension, which, as Wells observes, riveted the Affections of his Subjects to him, after he had done all he could to forfeit their Esteem, Confidence, and Veneration. Thus the Equity appears of distinguishing between the Man and the King; and of making separate Articles of his Life and his Reign. And, upon the whole, it must be acknowledg'd, That his Majesty was a Voluptuary of the most exalted Class, as well as the highest Rank; that he made his Power and his Parts alike subservient to his Ease and Pleasure; that when he shifted Sides, it was only like Solomon's Sluggard, to favour his Repose, that, when good and evil Measures were set before him, his own peculiar Interests ever govern'd his Choice; that having an ill Opinion of human Nature, he thought himself authoris'd to do so; that, in particular, believing all the Leaders of Parties were ever designing upon him, as well as those they led, he

A.D. 1647. thought it was but Self-defence to take all Advantages against them in return; that he was as susceptible of Right as of wrong Impressions: And that if any Method could have been found out to have harden'd the Wax after it had receiv'd the Form, he might have been the greatest, happiest, and final renown'd of our Kings.

And now as to the Profit and Loss of the Reign: If we are to consider the supporting, strengthening, and enlarging the monarchical Part of the Constitution, as the most important Duty of an English King, and most conducive to the Good of the People, as many Writers would oblige us to acknowledge, it must be acknowledg'd also, that few Princes were ever more in the Interest, or did more for the Service, of the Commonwealth, than Charles the Second. When first restor'd to his Throne, he seem'd to hold it almost by the Courtesy of the Convention-Parliament, who put him into the Possession of it; and whom he then treated more as his Friends and Co-adjutors, than as his Subjects: But having made use of their Credit and Authority to destroy that almighty Monster the Army, and to make some Provision for his own Establishment, he gave them their Epitaph, and sent out his Writs to assemble another yet more docile than They; and who accordingly resolv'd to do every thing requir'd of them, except that of rendering themselves wholly insignificant. The Time and Manner of calling and dissolving Parliaments was now left, in a manner, at the King's Mercy: The Militia was put wholly in his Hands: The Subject was enforced to abjure the first Claim and Right of Nature, Self-defence: The dead Weight of the Bishops was again saddled on the House of Lords; and as much of Archbishop Laud's Scheme for aggrandishing the Church, as the Times would yet bear, was adopted, for the more effectual Subjection of the People: Unfortunately, the rapacious and prodigal Spirit of the Court could not be conceal'd, and the Commons found themselves oblig'd for their own Sakes, to be as sparing as possible of the public Purse: Such Grants had, however, escap'd them, such Sums had the Sale of Dunkirk, and other Jobs, produc'd, that when the King and his People never met but with Fretbands between them, and his Majesty grew weary of a Contest in which he was never like to overcome, he was enabled to shake off the Restraint of Parliaments for good and all: And what by the utmost Stretch of the Laws, the Violence of Judges, the Prostitution of Juries, the voluntary Servility of the People, and the Terror of that Novelty a standing Army, he found himself in a Condition to be not only the King and Head, as by the Constitution he ought to have been, but the Lord and Master of his People. By this means, indeed, the Ferment arising from the desperate Struggle of two opposite Factions, which had convulsed and disorder'd his Reign, was suspended: But the same sarring Principles remain'd: And if it was Matter of Triumph to the one to find itself in possession of a complete

A.D. 1647. The Profit and Loss of the Reign.

A.D. 1684-5. complete a Victory over the other, it was Matter of the deepest Sorrow and Anguish to all those, who had lamented the Distractions they could not remedy, and who panted only after an equal and happy Temperament of Prerogative and Privilege, to see the Trophies of Power erected on the Ruins of Liberty: For such was the Fact; and as that Government is not to be set aside, because it may be wickedly administer'd; so Liberty ought not to suffer for the Offences of Faction.

As to foreign Affairs: His Majesty was seduced by his own absurd Inclinations, and the narrow Notions of a short-sighted Ministry, to adopt the very worst Principles of Cromwell's Politics; namely, the embracing the Interests, instead of setting up as the Rival, and endeavouring to put an immediate Stop to the Growth of the Power, of France. Cromwell was neither deceiv'd nor flatter'd into that Measure; he knew, that the Royalists, depriv'd of Assistance from thence, could give him no material Disturbance; and it was true Policy in his particular Case, to shut the Door against every possible Danger: But tho' what he did was the Dictate of Self-preservation, he set his own Price on his Friendship; he made it a Point to provide for the Honour of the Nation, at the same time that he made free with its Interest; and, tho' an Usurper, exacted more Obedience from that haughty Court, than it has at any time since shewn to our legal Sovereigns. Now all the Concessions of France to that Master-spirit of the Globe were so many Indignities to his Majesty; and one would have thought, that the Man as well as the King would never have lost sight of them, till he had found an Opportunity to make himself ample Reparation. Spain had been the Dread of Europe; but her Terrors were all extinct: His Majesty had seen her worsted both in the Field and the Cabinet; had seen her bend before the superior Genius of France, and still saw her to feeble, that, with her whole Power, she was scarce able to reduce the revolted Portuguese. Had he hearken'd, therefore, either to Reason or Repentment, he would have discern'd the Necessity of throwing his whole Weight into the lighter Scale, and at the first Step render'd himself the Arbitrer of Europe. The English, as a Nation, when they fell under his Dominion, were every where look'd upon as the Heroes of the Universe; and by the Help of one vigorous Measure, at the Entrance of his Reign, he might have liv'd on the Stock of Reputation he found, for many a long and happy Year to come: Instead of which, he became the Dupe of France, which had cover'd him with Assaults; and the Champion of the Portuguese, against all the Solicitations of his Catholic Majesty, who had given him an Asylum and Subsistence, when his most Christian Brother had driven him like a Fugitive out of his Dominions: Nor was he barely content to do the Drudgery of the French Court, which was ty'd up by the Pyrenean Treaty, from interfering directly or indirectly, by taking Part in the Portuguese Quarrel, but

A.D. 1684-5. was induc'd yet farther to make it his own for Life, by marrying a Princess of the House of Braganza, incapable of Children; which also pay'd the way for all those terrible Broils in relation to the Succession, that were afterwards so fatal to his own idoliz'd Repose. Again, That the Ties of Friendship between the two Royal Houses of France and England, might be drawn yet closer, a Treaty of Marriage was set on foot between the Duke of Orleans and the Princess Henrietta: And yet farther to widen the Breach between England and Spain, Dunkirk, which of right belong'd to the Latter, was injuriously and impolitically made over to France, that his Majesty's Coasters might be replenish'd with the Purchase-money; and that the brave Garison might be sent to perish in the Service of Portugal. To say nothing of the first Dutch War, and the solemn Farce of the Triple League, the second was apparently the joint Project of the two confederate Courts; and tho' in the Course of it his Majesty had very sufficient Reason given him to complain of his haughty and intidious Ally, and even to dread the Success of the very Experiment he had help'd to make, nothing could wean him from an Attachment he had such numberless Reasons to be asham'd of. He was, indeed, compell'd by his People to give over his Share of the War: But neither his People, nor the Solicitations of almost all the Princes of Europe could induce him to embrace the contrary Party, and assist in humbling the Power he had so greatly contributed to raise: On the contrary, it was now that he made it his Business to pacify his most Christian Brother for the Step he had taken, by endeavouring to make him a Seaman: And, during the whole Course of his ostentations, but ineffectual, Mediation at Nimwegen; as also, when enabled by his People to enter into an actual War; and afterwards when the daily Encroachments of France afforded the most righteous Occasion for a new Confederacy against the Common Enemy, his Majesty's chief Concern was, all along, to find Evasions and Excuses for his Conduct, and, at the same time, to act whatever Under-part that common Enemy should allot him.

War, it is true, is not the Element of a trading Nation: And while the People, in spite of themselves, were thus preserv'd in Peace and Plenty, instead of being exhaust'd with burdencome Taxes, and expos'd to Dangers, Losses, and all the other Calamities incident to that tragical State, they found themselves at Leisure and Liberty to pursue their Commerce wherever Ship could sail. And so good a Use did they make of both, that never were our Manufactures in a more thriving Condition; never were the Poor better provided for; never were our Exportations larger; never were our Returns more profitable; never was the Tonnage of our Mercantile Shipping higher. Besides which, the magnificent re-edifying of our Capital; the many noble and expensive Structures it was adorn'd with; the visible Access of Wealth in private Families; the annual Produce of the

A.D. 1684-5. the Customs, and Amount of the Coinage, and the low Rate of Interest, were so many additional Proofs, that, however the general Cause of Europe languish'd, England had her full Measure of Happiness, as far as it depended on Wealth, and the full Enjoyment of it.

But all these splendid Scenes were rather the Result of private Industry, than public Providence and Wisdom. Even in commercial Matters, our Court was so pliant as to truckle to the Will of France: At the very Entrance of his Majesty's Reign, they laid new Impositions on our Woollen Goods, Lead, Tin, Coals, Tobacco, Sugar, Fish, &c. They also restrain'd the Importation of our own Woollen, and our re-exported East India Goods, &c. to Calais and Dieppe; and other Commodities to some other inconvenient Ports; all which his Majesty and his Ministers either wilfully or negligently conniv'd at; inasmuch, that the celebrated Dr. Downham, himself, tho' writing purposely to shew, that the Difference in the Balance of Trade between the two Nations was never so great as had been generally reported and believ'd, is compell'd to acknowledge, "That England was wanting to its own Interest in the seven or eight first Years of King Charles the Second's Reign, in not retaliating time enough with high Duties laid upon their Goods, the high Impositions they had laid on our Woollen Manufactures, and others of our Product." And again, afterwards, "The French began to make this Breach in good Neighbourhood, and dealt with us as if they thought the Genius of France had got a perfect Mastery over the Genius of England; otherwise they would not have so impos'd upon us in Matters of this nature; where tho' our Court would not see, the People must needs feel; and where the Legislature was certain to be alarm'd, and at last to interpose."

Besides, how dearly have the poor People of England since paid for this transitory Period of Affluence and Prosperity! He is not worth the Name of a Politician, who provides only for the Day, and who is either unwilling or unable to provide also for the Peace and Welfare of Posterity; and he who loses an Opportunity to do any thing wise and great, is equally blameable with him who rushes on the same Undertaking, when the Opportunity is over. Had the enterprising Spirit of France been regarded as it ought to have been, from the Time of the King's Accession, the Happiness of his People would have been as permanent as his own Glory: It was then no impossible thing to have set Bounds to her Greatness, if not to her Ambition; and One Million had gone farther in preventing her Encroachments, than Ten in forcing her to quit her Hold, and make Restitution: Whereas, by suffering this gigantic Power to gather Strength, or rather to nurse it up with their own Hands, till it grew to be a full Match for all its puny Neighbours in conjunction, it may be truly said, that the Statesmen of those Times bought their own Tranquility at the Expence of succeeding Generations; who, according to the usual Extravagance of human Nature, ran as far out of the Way to meet Danger, as they to avoid it.

To conclude: If we should throw foreign Affairs wholly out of the question, and allow all that can be allow'd in Honour of this Reign, on account of the flourishing Condition of Trade and Manufactures, the Condition of the Subject will, notwithstanding, appear to be Matter of Pity, rather than Envy. Riches are, indeed, of mighty Moment to a Commonwealth; more especially, when they are the Product of Industry: But Integrity, Bravery, and Public Spirit, Simplicity of Manners, and Simplicity of Life, Love of Glory, and Love of Country, are of much more. And where were these ancient Virtues to be found? If any where, farthest from Court; in Obscurity, in Difficemy; and more liable to Persecution than Advancement. As in France the Zeal and Affection which make Men Heroes in the Service of the Community were all center'd in the Person of the King; and Acts of unresolv'd Submission and Resignation to the Sense of the Court were held the Sum-total of Loyalty and national Virtue. The democratical Part of the Constitution, in which was comprehended the Birthright of every Individual, had receiv'd a desperate, if not a mortal Wound. The Aid of a mercenary Soldiery had been call'd in as a Supplement to Government, to the Reproach of the Laws. The peculiar Rights of Corporations had been garbled of whatever render'd them valuable to free-born Subjects. To write or talk like an Englishman had been construed Sedition; and every exemplary Act of Patriotism had met with exemplary Punishment. Property was the only thing that remain'd inviolate; and in proportion as Will and Pleasure gain'd the Ascendancy, even that grew precarious. This, without Exaggeration, was the State of Things at the Death of Charles II. And those who are so just to themselves, and the Commonwealth, as to look upon Kings as the Servants, not the Masters, of a State, will judge of their Administration, not by the Advantages they procur'd to themselves, but the Blessings they deriv'd to their People.

The End of the Reign of King CHARLES the Second.

A.D. 1684-5. NO Papiſt ſhall ever be King over me, was the univerſal Cry of the Excluſioniſts, till the Time of Keſling's Diſcovery: And if we ſhould reflect on the Number, Weight, Boldneſs, and Popularity of that mighty Faction, at the Time of the Oxford Parliament, without reflecting alſo on what afterwards beſel them, we ſhould be amaz'd beyond Expreſſion, to ſee that very Duke of York, againſt whom they had levelled their whole Force, ſucceed to the Throne of his Fathers, not only without the leaſt Breath of Oppoſition; but with all thoſe Expreſſions of Joy and Satisfaction, which, on the People's Part, ſeem'd to betoken a happy Reign.

His late Maſtey was not cold, before his Succeſſor order'd the Privy-Council to be aſſembled, and enter'd upon the Kingly Office with the following gracious Declaration, which, at the Inſtance of their Lordſhips, [Num. 206.] was made public in the next Gazette:

The King's Declaration to Council.

"My Lords, Before I enter upon any other Buſineſs, I think fit to ſay ſomething to you. Since it hath pleaſed Almighty God to place me in this Station, and I am now to ſucceed ſo good and gracious a King, as well as ſo very kind a Brother, I think it is fit to declare to you, That I will endeavour to follow his Example, and moſt eſpecially in that of his great Clemency and Tenderneſs to his People: I have been reported to be a Man for arbitrary Power; but that is not the only Story has been made of me; and I ſhall make it my Endeavour to preſerve this Government, both in Church and State, as it is now by Law eſtabliſhed. I know the Principles of the Church of England are for Monarchy, and the Members of it have ſhewn themſelves good and loyal Subjects; therefore I ſhall always take care to defend and ſupport it. I know too, that the Laws of England are ſufficient to make the King as great a Monarch as I can wiſh; and as I ſhall never depart from the juſt Rights and Prerogative of the Crown, ſo I ſhall never invade any Man's Property. I have often heretofore ventured my Life in defence of this Nation; and I ſhall ſtill go as far as any Man, in preſerving it in all its juſt Rights and Liberties."

According to thoſe who have taken upon them to palliate the Miſcarriages of this Reign, we are charitably to believe theſe were his Maſtey's genuine Thoughts, and ſincere Intentions at that time: Wetwood is of opinion, that Trojan or Autonne could not have ſaid any thing which would have redounded more to their own Honour, or the public Satisfaction: And even Burnet ac- knowledges, "That this Speech gave great Content to thoſe who believ'd he would ſtick to thoſe Promiſes made in it: And that thoſe Few who did not believe it, yet durſt not ſeem to doubt of it." Adding, "The Pulpits of England were full of it, and of Thankſgiving for it. It was magnify'd as a Security far greater than any the Law could give. The common Phraſe was, We have ſeen the Word of a King, and a Word never yet broken."

On the ſame firſt Day of his Maſtey's Reign, he was further pleas'd to direct, that all Perſons ſhould be continued in the Places, Truſts, and Offices, which they had held under the King his Brother; and declar'd it to be his Will, and Pleaſure, and expreſs Com- mandment, that all his Subjects ſhould yield Obedience to all the Orders and Directions of his late Maſtey.

Theſe, and the Ceremonial of his own Proclamation, were his firſt Acts of State: But theſe were mere Matters of Courſe, and only ſerv'd to keep the Wheels of Government in Motion. The main Point under Conſideration related to the Revenue, and eſpecially of the Tonnage and Poundage, Cuſtoms and Excife in part, which had been granted only for the Life of the late King; and conſequently could no longer be legally levy'd, without a new Grant from the Repreſentatives of the People in Parliament. This was the only favourable Circumſtance reſulting to the Public, by the Demiſe, and the only Difficulty the Court had to ſtruggle Caſe of the Revenue on the late King's Demiſe.

A.D. 1684. s. with the But, great as it was, it was surmounted; after what Manner, we are best inform'd
by Mr. North, as follows:

"The caluable Merchants of London came to the Commissioners of the Customs, and entreated of them that the Customs might be gather'd as formerly. Otherwise we, said they, that have great Stocks in our Warehouses, for which we have paid Custom, are undone; for the unfair Traders and Runners, and such as come in before the Duties are recharg'd, will undersell us, as they will may, paying no Custom. There is no Doubt but the Parliament will give the Customs for the whole time; and why should they not be collected in the mean time? The Commissioners were careful not to do a thing, however reasonable, so obnoxious as that was; for the levying Money of the Subject, without any Law to warrant it, was a Case utterly defenceless in Parliament; and they would not stand in the Gap to be buffeted, in Case any Member should stir up a Charge upon them for so doing. Therefore, desiring to disengage the Thorn, and fix it in the Foot of their Superiors; they attended the Treasury in a Body, and made a Representation of the Request of the Citizens, their Reasons, and the undoubted ill Consequences to the King and People, if the Revenue of the Customs was not collected, and prayed their Lordship's Directions how they should behave themselves in the Matter. There sat Lord Godolphin, Sir Dudley North, and other judicious Persons Commissioners. They saw the Intent of these Gentlemen, which was to screen themselves by their Order; wherefore, calling them in, they told them that they were his Majesty's Commissioners for collecting the Customs, and had all the Laws, touching the Revenue, before them; which Laws they would do well to peruse carefully, and govern themselves accordingly; and that was all the Answer they could give them. This was cold Comfort; but soon after, the Business pressing, the King laid it before the Council, and demanded their Advice what would be the best Method for managing this Affair. The Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys mov'd that his Majesty should cause his Royal Proclamation to issue, commanding all Officers to collect, and the Subjects to pay the Revenue, as formerly. My Lord Keeper North was not of Opinion that to issue such a Proclamation, at this time, would be for the King's Service; because it would have the worst Turn that such an Affair could take; that is, giving a direct Handle to his Majesty's Enemies to say, that his Majesty, at the very Entrance upon his Government, levied Money of the Subject without Act of Parliament. There was no doubt but the Parliament would renew the Act as full as before; and, if the Collection might be carry'd on without such Misconstruction, it were better. Therefore he propos'd that the Proclamation should require the Duties to be collected, and paid into the Exchequer, and that the Officers of the Exchequer should keep the Products, return'd, safe, and apart from other Revenues, until the next Session of Parliament, in order to be dispos'd of according as his Majesty, and the two Houses, should think fit. One would have believ'd this Expedient plausible enough, and calculated to obviate the ill Use a repulsive Faction might make, if the other way was taken. But, it seems, this was too low and trimming for the State of the Court at that time, and a positive Proclamation issued."

The Reasons assign'd for this positive Proclamation, were the Necessities of the State: Besides which, upon this important Occasion, his Majesty condescended to plead the Advice of his Privy Council, as well as to urge his own Will and Pleasure: And to make the Dole yet more palatable, this thundering Edict was introduc'd with a most gracious Intimation, that he had thought fit to call a Parliament speedily to be assembled, in which he made no doubt but Care would be taken for settling a sufficient Revenue on the Crown, for the Support of the Government.

But whereas we are to understand by Mr. North, that this bold Step of seizing the Revenue was made at the Entreaty of the caluable Citizens, we have the Authority of an Act of State, as well as the Reason and Nature of Things, to evince, that the Coarctation had before them first: For in the Gazette, No. 2009, we find a Proclamation dated Feb. 17, setting forth, That on the 6th Instant (which was while the King lay in his last Agonies) the Commissioners of the Treasury (viz. The Lord Godolphin, Sir John Egerton, Sir Stephen Fox, Sir Dudley North, and Richard Thynne, Esq;) had bargain'd the Excise to Sir Peter Jolly, Sir Benjamin Botolph, and James Graham, Esq; for the Term of three Years, at the yearly Rent of 550,000*l.* to be paid quarterly: And that his Majesty, having been advis'd by the Opinion of the Judges (whose Opinion, for our greater Satisfaction herein, I have requir'd) that the said Farm was good and valid in Law, and has Continuance during the said three Years, as well for the temporary as the hereditary Excise, did thereby signify his Will and Pleasure, that the said Revenue should be collected and paid as before, on the usual Penalties, in case of Disobedience.

Now it is obvious; to the meanest Understanding, that the Term in the Farm could not be extended beyond the Term of the Grant; and tho' there was a Clause in the Act, authorizing the Treasury to lease out those Revenues for three Years, the Sense of that Clause was govern'd by the general Sense of the Act, and could by no Violence of Construction, be made to extend beyond it. But Bishop Burnet makes no Scruple to assert it as a known thing, That there was no such Farm subsisting at the King's Death: That, on the contrary, it was made afterwards, and antedated (to afford a Colour, no doubt, for the Opinion of the Judges) and that two had, nevertheless, the Grace to dissent from their Brethren. The same Prelate also observes, That, to obviate the Mischief apprehended from the Discontinuance of the Customs, it was urg'd, the legal Method was to have the Entries made as usual, and to take Bonds for the Duties, to be paid after the Renewal of the

Another relating to the Excise.

A.D. 1684-5. the Grant: And that a Proceeding of this violent nature did not agree with the King's Promise to maintain Liberty and Property.

 We find, moreover, by the Journals of the House of Commons, that all the valuable Citizens did not join in the Entreaty: For after these Proclamations were set forth, many of them made a Difficulty of obeying them. Of this several Instances are given; as also of the Behaviour of the (a) Commissioners to extort a Compliance: In particular, Mention is made, that one Mr. Miller declar'd to the Board, He was not free to pay the Customs, and that he had his Fears of what might be the Consequence. To which Sir Nicholas Butler reply'd, That Fears brought on the last Rebellion; and that one Mr. Cockran and others, being ask'd by the said Commissioners, What Lawyers the Merchants had advis'd with? And making Answer, They had as yet advis'd with none, the same Sir Nicholas, in the same menacing way, rejoyn'd, We know what you are; if you are ready to dispute it, we are ready to dispute it. To which Sir John Buckworth added in the pathetic, Do not dispute it! It must be paid!

Thus it appears, that the Merchants were not unanimous on this Occasion; and that the Submission of some of them at least, was rather the Result of Fear than Love. And as to the Measure itself, it is hard to say, whether so notorious a Breach of the Constitution, or the solemn Approbation that the People were inclin'd to give it, was the most alarming: For as on the one hand, every thing was to be decided in Consequence of so bold a Beginning; so, on the other, the Reception it met with seem'd to indicate, that the Spirit of the Nation was lost, and that his Majesty might venture to let slide every other Restriction, and to govern by a Model of his own.

The Practice of procuring Instructions from Corporations to the Members, had shewn the Court the way to procure Addresses, upon what Occasion, or of what kind, they pleas'd. The Accession was a Lib Opportunity for all the Recorders, Town Clerks, and all other Managers of Bodies Corporate in England, to display their Eloquence and Loyalty: But they were not satisfi'd with Congratulations only; which would scarce have disgust'd the most squeamish Stomach, but took upon them, no doubt, according to the Lesson they had been taught, either to complement the King on the Treasure he had committed on the Rights of his People, or to set a Precedent of Vassalage to their Fellow-Subjects, by obliging themselves to return such Persons to Parliament, as were most likely to give into all the Violences of the Times.

 Thus we find the Royal African Company thanking his Majesty for his Proclamation for continuing the Collection of the Customs, and promising to yield due Obedience to his Royal Will and Pleasure: The Turkey Merchants cheerfully submitting to his Ma-

esty's Pleasure in the Payment of Customs, agreeable to his late Royal Proclamation: The Merchant Adventurers rendering infinite Thanks for his gracious Proclamation: The Maryland Merchants humbly acquiescing and submitting to it: The East-land Merchants humbly submitting to his Royal Will and Pleasure, in the Payment of the Customs: Those of Hudson's Bay declaring they would never fail to show their most dutiful Allegiance, in paying their Customs, &c. The British Merchants protesting they would, with all Readiness, comply with his Majesty's late gracious Proclamation, as a Proof that he might depend on their standing by him with their Lives and Fortunes: The Jamaica Merchants, submitting with all willingness to his Majesty's Pleasure: And, lastly, the Merchants of the Law, that is to say, the Barriers and Students of the Middle Temple, with Sir Humphrey Mackworth at their Head, acknowledging, with the deepest Sense of Gratitude, his Majesty's great Goodness and Condescension in his late Declaration; and in particular, that his Majesty had been graciously pleas'd to extend his Royal Care of the Government to the Preservation of the Customs: To silence all Gainers, they, moreover, undertook to enumerate the many Mischiefs that would have ensu'd, if his Majesty had not been thus careful to preserve the Customs, and then proceed as follows:

"Tis a receiv'd Maxim of the Common-Law, The Sacra Regis est Vinculum pacis & honorum Nostri: Such is the happy Constitution of this Monarchy. That your Majesty's high Prerogative is the great Security of the Liberty and Property of the Subject: So that whoever would impair the Revenue of the Crown, must, by this fundamental Law (as binding as Magna Charta, and more ancient) be esteem'd an Enemy to the Peace and Welfare of the Kingdom.

We therefore think it our indispensible Duty to endeavour the Choice of such Representatives for the respective Counties and Boroughs (to which we belong, as may not only concur in setting a Revenue sufficient to support the Government as formerly, but also shew a grateful Sense of the Great Things you have done and suffer'd for us already, an entire Confidence in your Majesty's Goodness towards us for the future, and a cheerful Compliance with your Heroic Inclinations to advance the Honour and Interest of these Nations. May there never be wanting Millions as loyal as we are to sacrifice their Lives and Fortunes in Defence of your Sacred Person and Prerogative in its full Extent, and incessantly pray the King of Kings to grant your Majesty a long and happy Reign over us."

Do we blush, that such a scandalous Instance of the lowest and basest Prostitution is to be found in our Language? Let the same generous Dye continue glowing on our Checks, while we farther read what the University verity of Oxford was not alham'd to utter, "We, &c. do here prostrate ourselves at your Royal Feet, to present with all Humility, this public Testimony of our unfeigned Sorrow for the Demise of our late dread Sovereign, of blessed Memory: And withal, from the Bottom of our Hearts, to adore and magnify the Providence of our good God, by whom Kings reign, who, out of his unspeakable Mercy to this Church and State, hath prefer'd your sacred Majesty to succeed in the Government of these Kingdoms. And, as we can never swerve from the Principles of our Institution in this Place, and our Religion by Law establish'd in the Church of England, which indispensably binds us to bear all Faith and true Obedience to our Sovereign, without any Restriction and Limitations; so we cannot but most thankfully acknowledge that farther Obligation your Majesty hath laid upon us, by your Royal Assistance, to defend that Religion, &c."

And tho' the other Light of the Nation, Cambridge, did not soar quite so high a Pitch as he had formerly done, she nevertheless took care not to lose sight of her Sister Oxford: Thus a short Condolence made way for a long Congratulation: "And considering (said her Reverend Sons) that, in despite of all the Violence and Treachery of turbulent Men, who maliciously endeavour'd to turn the Stream of lineal Succession out of its proper and ancient Channel, God has been pleas'd to provide a lasting Security for these Nations, as well by preserving the sacred Life and Person of your Majesty, as also by your rightful and peaceable Accession to the Imperial Crown of these Kingdoms, we do rejoice with all our Souls, and bless God for these singular Mercies, which have as fully repair'd our former inestimable Loss, as our Hearts could hope or desire; and we do, with all humble Submission, present to your Sacred Majesty our most unfeigned Loyalty, the most valuable Tribute that we can give, or your Majesty receive from us: This is a Debt which we shall be always paying, and always owing; it being a Duty naturally flowing from the very Principles of our Holy Religion, by which we have been enabled, in the worst of Times, to breed as true and steady Subjects as the World can shew, as well in the Doctrines as Practice of Loyalty, from which we can never depart."

When such rever'd Bodies as these, who were Masters, by Profession, of Law, Divinity, and all human Literature, advanced such Doctrines, and us'd such Language to the Throne, it is scarce to be wonder'd that the Herd implicitly obey'd their Leaders, and took the same Leap over all the Restrictions in their Way: Such great Examples were an Authority to those who did not understand their Motives, and furnish'd Pretences for those that did: And accordingly they were almost as generally as fatally follow'd. The Justices of Middlesex would needs have it, that it was by the Interposition of God himself, that his Majesty had escap'd the villainous Designs of Regicides and Excluders. The Seamen of Kingston upon Hull engaged to vote unanimously against all who had voted for the Exclusion. The Inhabitants of Malton, speaking of his Majesty's Declaration in Council, That he would defend the Church, assert, "It had but added Demonstration to their Faith; and that to make Protestations of Fidelity upon the Consideration of that, would be to contradict the Principles of their Religion, and to make their Obedience conditional." The Men of Monmouth begg'd of Heaven, that their Vows might rise in Judgment against them, if ever they sent any to Parliament who would invade the Prerogative, by joining in Votes any way derogatory to it." The City of Bristol express'd their Abhorrence of all those antimonarchical Persons and Principles, which would either exclude Princes from their just Rights, or disturb their peaceable Enjoyment of them. The Peters of Heflmore covenant with the King in due Form of Law, not to return any Member or Members, who could not prove that he or they did openly and avowedly oppose the Exclusion-Bill. Those of Woburn stigmatiz'd the said Bill as unjust, illegal, impious, &c. Those of Scarborough (in Yorkshire) declare, That the King's Enemies should evermore be theirs, especially the impudent Promoters of the Exclusion-Bill, who, as far as in them lay, should stand for ever excluded his Majesty's great Council of Parliament. The Corporation of Wigan, in a very peculiar Style, undertake, "with their Lives and Fortunes, to defend his Majesty's most just Rights to these Crowns, against all the factious Machinations of Alditophels, and the unlawful Pretences of rebellious Aboloms, who, like blind Balaam, attempted the forbidden Path, had not the Angel of the Lord stop't their Career. Mayors, Bailiffs, &c. of the Coke-Ports, in gratitude for the Conservation of their Privileges, declar'd, "That they would neither elect nor admit into any Office, or Place of Trust, any Person who abetted, or voted for, that diabolical and unjust Bill of Exclusion, design'd to involve us in Blood, and to destroy the Constitution of the ancient Monarchy of these Kingdoms: And farther, That they did readily acknowledge their Lord Warden's Right of Recommendation of one Member for each Port, to serve in Parliament." And, to close this odious Scene, the two Grand-Juries of Suffolk assur'd his Majesty, That his Grandeur and Honour were their first Aim; in order to which, they were then making it their daily Care to send fit Representatives to a Parliament, which they hop'd would no more endure Excluders, than a late one did Abolers: And farther, that they had every Day such Intimations of that great Favour HER Majesty was pleas'd, upon all Occasions, to express to his People; and of that great Will-dom with which he managed it, so they begg'd leave they might there mention the humblest of their Acknowledgments.

It ought, however, to be remembered, that tho' this Mode of addressing was general, it was not universal. Some Places continu'd mute; and some us'd only such Expressions were respectful without Meanness, and which seem'd to argue, that there was still something dearer to them than the Will and Pleasure of the King. Even the University of Cambridge ventur'd to intimate, "That they thought themselves oblig'd to be more particularly grateful for his Royal Word: That he would support and defend the Church of England as it then stood by good Laws most happily establish'd." And inch of the Clergy of Hertfordshire, Essex, and Middlesex, as were within the Diocese of London, in their Address of Thanks to his Majesty for the same gracious Assurance, took the Liberty to say, That their Religion, establish'd by Law, was dearer to them than their Lives.

The King was

Maj.

In this Interval, the new King, who, before his Advancement to the Crown, had so severely persecuted several Persons for calling him a Papist, and had obtain'd such exorbitant Damages, made a public Acknowledgment, that those Persons had suffer'd only for speaking the Truth, by going openly to Mass, and making Profession of his Faith before the whole World. This was done the very first Sunday after his Accession: And the Colour given to this intemperate Zeal by his Church-of-England-Advocates, is, "That he thought it beneath him to prevaricate with God and Man in an Affair of that Consequence." But if there was any Meanness in doing what the so much glorify'd Act of Uniformity requir'd of all Men, his Majesty took all the Care he could to lessen that Meanness on the Memory of his departed Brother, by causing Hudleston to set forth in print the Account (before quoted) of his dying in the Communion of the Reas'd Church: And by condescending to be himself the Publisher of (y) two Papers which he declar'd in his own Royal Name, were found by him of which being alone sufficient to show how irrational it was to suppose, that the new King would ever be the Defender of the Protestant Faith, are here inserted as follow.

The First Paper.

"The Discourse we had the other Day, I hope, satisfi'd you in the main, that Christ can have but one Church here on Earth: and I believe, that it is as visible, as that the Scripture is in Print, that none can be that Church, but that which is call'd the Roman Catholic Church. I think you need not trouble yourself with entering into that Open of particular Disputes; when the main Fact, in truth, the only Question is, Where that Church is, which we do profess to believe, in the own Creeds: We declare there to believe our Catholic and Apostolic Church: And it is not left to every fanatical Man's Head to believe as he pleases, but to the Church, in whom Christ left the Power, upon Earth, to govern as in Matters of Faith, who made the Creeds for our Directions. It were a very irrational thing to make Laws for a Country, and leave it to the Inhabitants to be the Interpreters and Judges of those Laws: For when every Man will be his own Judge, and by Consequence to each thing as either Right or Wrong; can we therefore suppose, that Almighty God would leave as at those Uncertainties, as to give us a Rule to go by, and leave every Man to be his own Judge? I do sit my ingenious Man, Whether it be not the same thing, to follow our own Fancy, or to interpret the Scripture by it. I would have any Man show me, where the Power of deciding Matters of Faith is given to every particular Man: Christ left his Power to the Church, even to forgive Sins to Honour; and left his Spirit with them, which they exercis'd after his Retraction: First, by his Apostles, in those Creeds; and, many Years after, by the Council at Nice, where that Creed was made that is call'd by that Name: And by the Power which they receiv'd from Christ, they were the Judges even of the Scripture itself, many Years after the Apostles, which Books were canonical, and which were not. And if they had this Power then, I desire to know how they come to lose it; and by what Authority Men leav'd themselves from that Church? The only Pretence I ever heard of was, because the Church hath fall'n, in wresting and interpreting the Scripture, contrary to the true Sense and Meaning of it; and that they have imposed Articles of Faith upon us, which are not to be warrant'd by God's Word. I do desire to know, who is to be Judge of that: whether the whole Church (the Successors whereof has continued to this Day, without Interruption), or particular Men, who have rais'd schisms for their own Advantages?

The Second Paper.

It is a sad thing to consider what a world of Heretics are crept into this Nation, every Man thinks himself as competent a Judge of the Scriptures, as the very Apostles themselves: And 'tis no wonder that it should be so; since that Part of the Nation who looks most like a Church, does not bring the own Arguments against the other Sects, for fear they should be argu'd against themselves, and confuted by their own Arguments. The Church of England (as 'tis call'd) would run have it thought they are the Judges in Matters spiritual, and yet dare not say positively there is no Appeal from them; for either they must say, that they are infallible, (which they cannot pretend to or confess, that what they decide in Matters of Conscience is no further to be follow'd, than it agrees with every Man's private Judgment. If Christ did leave a Church here upon Earth, and we were all one of that Church; how, and by what Authority, did we separate from that Church? If the Power of interpreting Scripture be in every Man's Brain, what need have we of a Church, or Churchmen? To what purpose then did our Saviour, after he had given his Apostles Power to bind and loose in Heaven and Earth, add to it, That he would be with them to the End of the World? That he would be with them in the End of the World? That he would be with them in the End of the World? Christ was not hypocritically, or by way of Figure, Christ was then ascending into his Glory, and left his Power with his Church, even to the End of the World: We have had, these hundred Years past, the sad Effects of denying to the Church that Power in Matters spiritual, without an Appeal. What Country can subsist in Peace or Quiet, where there is not a supreme Judge, from whence there can be no Appeal? Can there be any Justice done, where the Offenders are their own Judges, and equal Interpreters of the Law with those who are appointed to administer Justice? This is our Case here in England, in Matters spiritual: For the Protestants are not of the Church of England, as 'tis the true Church from whence there can be no Appeal, but because the Disposition of that Church is conformable, at that present, to their Fancies; which as soon as it shall contradiet or vary from, they are ready to embrace or join with the next Congregation of People, whose Disposition or Worship agrees with their own Opinion at that time: So that, according to the Doctrine, there is no other Church, nor any Interpreter of Scripture, but that which lies in every Man's giddy Brain. I desire to know therefore of every serious Considerer of these things, Whether the great Work of our Salvation ought to depend upon such a sandy Foundation as this? Did Christ ever say to the Civil Magistrates, (much less to the People) That he would be with them unto the End of the World? Or did he give them the Power to forgive Sins? St. Paul tells the Corinthians, It is God's Willingness, ye are God's Building; we are Labourers with God. This shows who are the Labourers, and who are the Husbandry and Building. And in this whole Chapter, and in the preceding one, St. Paul takes great Pains to set forth, That they (the Clergy) have the Spirit of God, without which no Man toucheth the deep Things of God: And he concludes the Chapter with this Verse, For who hath known the Mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the Mind of Christ. Now, if we but consider, in human Probability and Reason, the Power Christ leaves to his Church in this Gospel, and St. Paul explains so distinctly afterwards, we cannot think that our Saviour did all these things to no purpose. And pray consider, on the other side, That those who tell the Truth, and will not submit to his Church, draw their Arguments from Implications, and far-fetch'd Interpretations, at the same time that they deny plain and positive Words: Which is so great a Diligence, as 'tis not almost to be thought, that they can believe themselves. Is there any other Foundation of the Protestant Church, but that, if the Civil Magistrate please, he may call such of the Clergy as he thinks fit for his Turn at that time, and turn the Church either to Protestant, Independency, or indeed what he pleases? This was the Way at our pretended Reformation here in England; and, by the same Rule and Authority, it may be alter'd into as many more Shapes and Forms, as there are Fancies in Mens Heads.

in his Brother's strong Box; the Tendency of which were to prove, that there could be but one true Church, which was that of Rome; that whoever set up their own Authority against it, whether Individuals, Nations, or Governments, fell immediately into Fanaticism; and that by Consequence, the Church of England lay as open to that Impiety, as any of those Sects which had separated from them.

But notwithstanding all these broad Intimations of something worse to ensue, so intimated were the People, both Laity and Clergy, with the cordial Assurances they had receiv'd, that Words weigh'd more with them than Facts; and they testify'd more Indignation at the Frugality which appear'd in the late King's Funeral, than at the Insults offer'd to their Religion; which they show unwillingly ill Impressions are entertain'd of a Prince in the Morning of his Reign; and how much more sensible we are of Disappointments in our own transient Pleasures, than of such as regard the Well-being of the Commonwealth.

We are now to treat of the Partition of Power under the new King; and upon whatever Terms it was to be bestow'd, we find every Man eager to accept what he could get, and determin'd to hold it as long as he could. Thus it soon appear'd, that the Earl of Rochester was the Man whom the King delighted to honour; for instead of being remov'd to Ireland, against his Inclination, he was gratify'd to the Height of his Ambition, in being appointed Lord High Treasurer of England; the Lord Godolphin and the rest of the Commissioners having been continu'd, only till they had seen their Orders take Effect, for continuing the Payment of the Revenues as before the King's Demise, and till they had, thereby, smooth'd his Lordship's Way, as well as screen'd his Administration from the Reproach of such a Jobb. At Court, however, we are to suppose, this Jobb pass'd for Righteousness; for we find Lord Godolphin made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen immediately on his Removal from the Treasury; tho' Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to say, that both he and the Earl of Sunderland were look'd upon as lost Men. His Lordship, indeed, enlarges on the Case of the latter, but leaves us wholly in the dark as to the time. His Words are these, "The Earl of Sunderland insinuat'd himself so into the Queen's Confidence, that he was beyond all People's Expectations, not only maintain'd in his Posts, but grew into great Degrees of Favour. The Queen was made to consider the Earl of Rochester as a Person that would be in the Interest of the King's Daughters, and united to the Church-Party. So the law it was necessary to have one in a high Post who should depend wholly on her, and be entirely hers: And the Earl of Sunderland was the only Person capable of that. The Earl of Rochester did, upon this Advancement, become so violent and boisterous, that the whole Court join'd to support the Earl of Sunderland as the proper Balance to the other. Lord Godolphin was put into a great Post about the Queen." Thus, tho' we are left to make what Conclusions we please against Lord Sunderland, we are to suppose Lord Godolphin was prefer'd to her Majesty's Service, without having any such Views to deserve her Favour. His Lordship seems, however, to be a little mistaken in supposing that the Earl of Sunderland was the only Person capable of balancing the overbearing Temper of the Lord Treasurer, for the Marquis of Hullifax had been his profest Adversary: And tho' he had undergone the same kind of Mortification which in the former Reign he had help'd to bring on Lord Rochester, by being remov'd from the Office of Lord Privy Seal to that of Lord President, he still continu'd in a high Post, and, no doubt, retain'd his old Animosity: Then, it it could be urg'd that he had made his Peace with the new Minister, as well as the new King, as in (2) Truth he had, it follows, that the whole Court was not in Confederacy against this new Minister. And this becomes farther evident, when we reflect that the Person who succeeded the Marquis as Privy Seal, was the Earl of Glarendon, who was the Earl of Rochester's own Brother. Mr. North, indeed, has prefer'd an Instance of the Treasurer's Baseness; for his Lordship having warmly declar'd, That none but Tories and High Flyers ought to be admitted into the King's Service; and the Lord Keeper, on the contrary, urging, That Men should be prefer'd for their Abilities and Experience, and not their Party-Attachments, the former roar'd out, God's Will, my Lord! Don't you think that in our Month's Time I could understand any Business in England? And the latter dryly reply'd, Yes, my Lord; but you would understand it much better in two: But then Mr. North makes no Mention of his Brother's contributing any way to support Sunderland against him. On the contrary, in numberless Places of both his Books he declares the Lord Keeper, and the Lord Sunderland to have been perpetual Opposites; and that they had a cordial Aversion to each other. How the Lord Arlington, who was continu'd Lord Chamberlain, and the other Officers of the Household were affected towards him, is a Matter of little Consequence, because it does not appear they were of the Cabinet. And as to the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys, he was sure to follow the Banner of whoever was in Power; and therefore it may be presum'd, at the Entrance of the Reign, at least, that he was not of the Faction against the Lord Treasurer.

The King, himself, as we are told, was at the Head of all his Affairs; and in particular, apply'd himself to the Management of his Revenue, and to the Retrenchment of every superfluous Expence. We are also told he was zealous for the Glory and Interest of this Nation; that he undertook to reform the (a) Vices of the Court; and that he was, in all Respects, as well qualify'd for an English King, as any that ever sat upon the Throne, if it had not been for the Point of his Religion. How far his Majesty deserv'd this noble Testimony in his Favour, will best appear from the Transactions of his Reign. But hence it, however, appears, that tho' the Earl of Rochester was the first of his Servants, he had, by no Means, that absolute Dominion, which other Persons in the like Station have since enjoy'd: And, possibly, we shall find Reason to conclude, that even the King himself was in Leading-strings; and that his Leader (the Queen) was led in her Turn, by her Priests, who came, at last, to have the Dominion of all things.

We learn, nevertheless, from Bishop Burnet, who derives his Authority from Lord Rochester himself, that the King, for a while, talk'd to him of all his Affairs with great Freedom, and commonly every Morning of the Business of the Day. It is, therefore, so much the more astonishing, that the King should not only renew the Orders to dismiss the Duke of Ormond from the Government of Ireland, (which, as it happen'd, he had held, according to his late Majesty's Promise, as long as he held the Throne) but with one Circumstance peculiarly mortifying; For, whereas other Governors had retain'd their Character till they arriv'd at his Majesty's Presence, his Grace was requir'd to deliver up the Sword, at Dublin, to the Lords (b) Justices appointed to receive it; which has given rise to a Remark, That the Favourites of the new King were in great Haste to publish to all the World, that the Duke of Ormond was not in his Majesty's good Graces. And as the Lord Treasurer was the principal of those Favourites, it is therefore astonishing, that he did not make Use of his Ascendancy to save his old Friend and Ally from such an Indignity.

[Secret Con-
fessions, &c.

In certain Memoirs of the Irish Affairs, which stem founded on good Authorities, we find a Passage to this Effect, That the Duke of Ormond having given a Dinner to all the Officers of the Army then at Dublin, at the Close of it, rose up with a Bumper of Wine in his Hand and said, "Look here, Gentlemen; they say at Court that I am now become an old dotting Fool; you see my Hand doth not shake, nor doth my Heart fail, nor do I doubt but I shall make some of them see their Mistake." And it was true his Grace was as capable of serving the Crown as ever: But the Service now to be done requir'd a more ductile Instrument; and therefore it was necessary to represent him as superannuated, by way of Excuse for removing him out of the way. Ireland was first to be put into the Hands of the Papists; and Colonel Talbot (the very Person pointed out by Oates, in his Discoveries for the like Employment) had undertaken to do what could never have been expected from the Duke; and for his Encouragement had the Regiment of Horse given him; which had, till then, been commanded by his Grace. The Duke was, however, continu'd Lord Steward of the Household, and his Grandson the young Earl of Offory was made a Lord of the Bedchamber: But it does not appear that he ever afterwards interfer'd in the Cabinet; or if he did, that his Advice had any Weight.

When a Prince lays aside a Servant of try'd Integrity, without Cause, it authorises a very strong Suspicion, that his Integrity was his Disqualification. But if Bishop Burnet is to be credited, his Majesty made no Secret of his Intentions, and from the very first, gave out, That he would not be serv'd at his Brother's had been; and that he would have all about him serve him without Reserve, and go through in his Business. And yet we find no one Instance of any Man's refusing his Service upon these Terms, or of laying down to avoid the Imputation of Disobedience. We learn also from the same Author, that his Majesty, instead of magnanimously overlooking the Affronts which had been offer'd him while Duke of York, nourish'd the Remembrance of them, and behav'd as if he waited only for an Opportunity to be reveng'd. In particular, that when the leading Whigs came to pay their Court in common with the rest of his Subjects, most of them were but coldly receiv'd; some were sharply reproach'd for their past Behaviour; and others were deny'd Access. And this was the general Disposition of things at home, at the Commencement of this unfortunate Reign.

In one thing only, we are further told, the King seem'd to comply with the Genius of the Nation; and that was in declaring, That he would not be govern'd by French Councils: That he would maintain the Balance of Europe with a more steady Hand than it had hitherto been; and that he would treat with his over-grown Brother of France upon the Level in all things. And all this met with some Credit, when it appear'd that the Lord Churchill, who was the Person he pitch'd upon to notify the Death of his Brother, and his own Accession to the

(a) The Lord Primate and the Earl of Granard: At the same time, the old Privy-Council was dissolved, and a new one was appointed.

(b) Upon this Subject, the Right Reverend Historian of the reign of James writes as follows: "The King did, some Days after his coming to the Crown, promise the Queen and his Priests, that he would see Mrs. Sedley no more, by whom he had had some Children. And he spoke openly against Lewdness, and express'd a Detestation of Drunkenness. He sat many times a-day about Business, with the Council, the Treasury, and the Admiralty. It was upon this said, That now we should have a Reign of Action and Business, and not of Sloth and Luxury as the last was. Mrs. Sedley had Lodgings at Whitehall; Orders were sent her to leave them. This was done in words; but she pretended, that she should now govern as absolutely as the Duchess of Portsmouth had done. Yet the King still continued a secret Commerce with her." Vol. I. p. 627.

A. D. 1684-5. French Court, had Orders to observe exactly every Circumstance of the Ceremonial of his Reception; and that his Majesty govern'd himself to a Scruple by it, when the Marshall de Lorge came over hither to return the Compliment.

In this, as he did Justice to his own Dignity; so he fell in with the Foible of his People: But in sending Mr. Caryll (c) to the Court of Rome to prepare the way for restoring them to the Bosom of the Church, and to be inform'd whether his Holiness would open his Arms to receive them, he threw up all the Principles of good Policy, and even made a Sacrifice of his own darling Power, in Compliance with the unhappy Prepossessions of his Religion. And never, perhaps, did the Perverseness of human Nature appear stronger than in this Instance; for while he shew'd such an Eagerness to extend his Prerogative in Temporals, in Spiritu-als he appear'd equally eager to compliment it all away.

With respect to the Prince of Orange, Father Orleans tells us, and many of our own Writers have implicitly follow'd his Authority, that one of the first things the King did upon his Accession was, to let his Highness know, how desirous he was to correspond with him rather as a Father than an Ally, and a neighbouring King; which say they, ought to have been the Foundation of a right Understanding between that Prince and his Majesty: And Bishop Burnet, in part, acknowledges the same thing: But then the only Proof that is given of his Majesty's Sincerity in this Matter, consists in his recalling Chudleigh; between whom and his Highness there was an irreconcilable Quarrel, and the sending Skelton in his Room.

On the other hand, the Dutch Historians urge, it might have been expected, that the King, who had such an establish'd Interest in his most Christian Brother of France, would have made use of it in favour of his Nephew and Son-in-law, as soon as he had possession of the Throne: He was fully acquainted with, say they, all the several Grievances which the Prince had to complain of, and how vainly he had solicited Redress; but when the Marshall de Lorge was at London, instead of pleading his Cause, he never mention'd one Word about him or his Affairs; as if they were no Part of his Concern.

The same Authors (and also their good Ally and Confederate Bishop Burnet) moreover spare no Pains to demonstrate, that his Highness, and the Republic he was at the Head of, were equally solicitous to obtain the Favour and Friendship of the new King; and that they made all the Advances and Compliances which could be expected from them, to deserve it: The Bishop is express,

That, as soon as the News of King Charles's Death, and King James's Accession, reach'd the Hague (which, on the account of a great Frost, that had lock'd up all the Dutch Ports, was not till some Weeks after these Events had taken place) his Highness requir'd the Duke of Monmouth to chuse some other Asylum; and this, we are to understand, was the best Expedient he could think of, at once to fulfil the Laws of Hospitality, and to pay his Court to his Father-in-law: For as, on the one hand, he knew, that he should offend the King by conniving at his Continuance there; so he fear'd, on the other, that his Majesty would call upon him to deliver him up; which he knew the States would never submit to. The Duke hereupon was forc'd to retire to Brussels; (others say, he had retir'd thither before the Death of the King his Father) and, tho' surpris'd at the Notice he had receiv'd, and the Necessity that was impos'd on him, took his Leave of the Prince and Princess with a good Grace, and vow'd an inviolable Attachment to them and their Interests. The same Prelate yet farther asserts, That the King, being unsatisfy'd with the bare Dismission of the Duke, requir'd his Highness to dismiss those Officers likewise, who, in contempt of the Orders they had receiv'd from Chudleigh in his Majesty's Name, had always saluted his Grace, as often as they had made their Appearance before him; urging, That he could not trust to him, nor depend on his Friendship, as long as such Men serv'd under him: And that, however hard it was of Digestion, those Gentlemen having only acted in conformity to his own Directions, his Highness chose to comply, rather than give the King any Shadow of Cause to complain of him.

The like Disposition appear'd also in the Court of Spain to oblige his Majesty in all things; and indeed, by the solemn and respectful Congratulations which he receiv'd from all the Princes and Powers of Europe, and the Advances made by each to obtain his Friendship, he had very good Reason to set a value upon it, and to be convinc'd of his own Importance.

From Puffendorf, indeed, we learn, that when Don Pedro Ronquillo, his Catholic Majesty's Minister in England, had his first private Audience of the King, after his Accession, he desir'd Leave to lay open his whole Heart before him, for the common Good of both Kingdoms; and, having obtain'd it, among other things, took the liberty to tell him, "That he saw several Prejits about him, who, to his Knowledge, would importune him to alter the Establish'd Religion in England: And that he wish'd his Majesty would not give ear to their Advice; for if he did, he was afraid he would have Reason to repent of it when it was too late." (c) Though Father Warner, in his manuscript History, quoted by Dr. Gou, affirms, that his Mr. Caryll succeeded according to his Wish, Puffendorf affirms, that his Holiness sent a Letter to his Majesty, to this Effect: "That he was highly pleas'd with his Majesty's Zeal for the Catholic Religion: But that he was afraid his Majesty might press it too far; and, instead of contributing to his own Greatness, and to the Advancement of the Catholic Church, he might come to do both it and himself the greatest Prejudice, by attempting that which his Holiness was well assur'd, from long Experience, would not succeed."

A. D. 1684-5. same Author proceeds to tell us, That the King was offended at this Discourse; and ask'd Don Pedro, with Emotion, Whether in Spain it was not usual for Kings to consult their Confessors? And that his Excellency shrewdly reply'd, Yes, Sir, it is: And that's the Reason our Affairs go so ill: But this cavalier Department of Rocquillo is not to be ascrib'd to the Instructions of the Court he serv'd; on the contrary, it appears, that the Marquis de Grana, by the Directions of the King his Master, oblig'd the Duke of Monmouth to depart from Brussels, at the very first Instance of his Majesty.

With regard to that unfortunate Nobleman, Dr. Whiston says, he had Reason to know, that he had come to a Resolution to live a retired Life, and not to give King James any Disturbance. Others give out, that when he took leave of the Prince of Orange, his Highness not only supply'd him with Money, but persuaded him to go into the Emperor's Service; in which Case he undertook to furnish him with an Equipage, and to support him out of his own Purse, according to his Quality: Ferguson, in a Manuscript quoted by Mr. Echard, affirms, That, had he been allow'd to follow his own Sentiments and Resolutions, he would have spent this Summer in the Court of Sweden: And it appears by a (d) Letter of the Duke's own writing, that Ambition was mortify'd in him, and that he had no longer any Inclination to make a Buſſe in the World.

Thus, in all human Probability, if the King had not follow'd him with Persecutions, and branded him in his Letters with High Treason, he had never been over-persuaded to incur the Guilt of it.

While his Grace was yet at Brussels, the Earl of Argyle, the Lord Melville, Sir Patrick Hume, Sir John Cockburn, &c. who had taken Sanctuary in Holland, and there continu'd ever since Kepling's Discovery, enter'd upon new Designs against the Government of England, and importun'd the Duke to enter into the same desperate Undertaking with them; as did also the Lord Grey and Mr. Wade; and, according to Bishop Burnet, the Lady Westworth and Ferguson. But Ferguson, himself, in the Manuscript before quoted, affirms,

"That he had the least Accession of any that were there about him."

However this may be, when the Duke saw himself compell'd to leave Brussels, he return'd privately to Holland and mingled with the Malcontents, whom he found full of Animosity against each other; Lord Argyle playing the Tyrant even before he had Power, and when he was on the Point of declaring for Liberty; and those who thought themselves Coadjutors in the same Cause, not being as yet dispos'd to submit to a Master: Like all other Projectors, each had a Scheme of his own, and insisted on the pursuing that or none. When, therefore, his Grace came among them, his first Business was to make up their Quarrels, and dispose them to agree better for the future: But it appears his Influence went no further; for, tho' the Earl of Argyle had so urgently solicited his Countenance and Assistance, and had drawn him to Amsterdam, on Purpose to make him a joint Adventurer, we shall find he would not recede from one Title of his Project, in Compliment to a Man whose personal Interest, high Pretensions, and Fame in Arms, render'd him of such Consequence to their Cause.

The Earl, as we are told by Bishop Burnet, had still retain'd his former Persuasion, that Money was the only thing he wanted to ensure his Success. He was confident of raising five thousand Men among his own Vassals, and those of his Friends and Followers; and took it for granted, that the Western and Southern Counties were under such Apprehensions of the new Government, that they would pour in to him, as soon as they heard his Standard was set up, without even the Ceremony of a previous Concert: A rich and zealous Widow of Amsterdam had supply'd him with 10,000*l.* And one who us'd the Venitian Trade, had, by the Help of this Money, procur'd him a Supply of Arms and Ammunition, which were happily embark'd without Interruption; it being presum'd that they were for the Service of that Republic.

The Earl being thus in full Possession of all the Requisites for his Design, except the Concurrence of the Duke of Monmouth, which

A Letter of the late Duke of Monmouth's, written in his Retirement in Holland, a little before his Attempt in the West.

"I receiv'd both yours together this Morning, and cannot delay you my Answer longer than this Post; though I am afraid it will not please you so much as I heartily wish it may. I have weigh'd all your Reasons, and every thing that you and my other Friends have writ me upon that Subject; and have done it with the greatest Inclination to follow your Advice, and without Dissimulation. You may well believe I had time enough to reflect sufficiently upon our present State, especially since I came hither. But whatever way I turn my Thought, I find insuperable Difficulties. I pray do not think it an Effect of Melancholy, for that was never my general Fault, when I tell you, That in these three Weeks Retirement in this Place, I have not only look'd back, but forward: And the more I consider our present Circumstances, I think them still the more desperate, unless some unforeseen Accident fall out, which I cannot divine nor hope for. [How follows a long Letter all in Obedience] Judge then what we are to expect, in Case we should venture upon any such Attempt at this time. It's to me a vain Argument, that our Enemies are scarce yet well settled, when you consider, That Fear in some, and Ambition in others, have brought them to comply; and that the Parliament being made up for the most Part, of Members that formerly run our Enemy down; they will be ready to make their Peace as soon as they can, rather than hazard themselves upon an uncertain Bottom. I give you but Hints of what, if I had time, I would write you more at length. But that I may not seem obstinate in my own Judgment, nor neglect the Advice of my Friends, I will meet you at the Time and Place appointed. But for God's Sake, think in the mean time of the Improbabilities that lie naturally in our way; and let us not by dragging with our Chains make them stronger and heavier. For my Part, I'll run the Hazard of being thought any thing, rather than a rash, inconsiderate Man. And to tell you my Thoughts without Digressions, I am now so much in love with a retir'd Life, that I can never like to be fond of making a Buſſe in the World again. I have much more to say, but the Post cannot say; and I refer the rest till Meeting, being entirely,

A. D. 1684-5. which he likewise thought of Importance, in order to make a Diversion, and thereby facilitate his Progress, had no sooner obtain'd it, than he discover'd a settled Purpose, to make for Scotland, and enter upon his Share of Action, as soon as it was possible for his Ships to set sail. The Duke, on the contrary, who had a much harder Talk to manage, and was utterly destitute of every thing that could encourage him even to dream of Success, was as earnest for a Delay, as the Earl to admit of none: And it is equally Matter of Admiration, That the one should be so obstinate, and the other so compliant.

Tho' the King had made free with his People in the Affair of the (e) Revenue, and also in avowing his Religion, he had, as yet the Majority on his Side; He had, likewise, summon'd a Parliament to sit in each Kingdom, and had thereby part remov'd one of the most crying Grievances of the former Reign: The time of their Sitting was at hand: That they would give his Majesty all the Assistance he should demand, was not to be question'd; any more than that even those among them who wish'd well to their Cause, would find themselves not only unable to contribute to its Success, but oblig'd to join in every Vote that tended to defeat it. And what was still worse, their Authority and Example would have great Weight with the Nation. These were Considerations that the Duke could not fail to urge; and it is utterly inconceivable that the Earl should not see the Force of them; or if he did, for what Reason he persisted in forcing the Duke to rush upon the King in the Fulness of his Strength, and before even the Novelty of his Reign was worn out, against his Reason, and manifestly to his Ruin.

Ferguson, indeed, endeavours to account for the Earl's Conduct by saying, "He was not willing to lose the Opportunity, left, besides the offending and alienating those whom he had drawn in and depended upon, the Enemies thro' Delay might come to understand what he and his Friends had been projecting. And again: Nor will any Man think it strange, that the Earl of Argyle, being visibly fix'd in that Resolution, should be earnest with the Duke of Monmouth to invade England at the same time; seeing it would not only oblige the King to divide his Forces, and thereby leave the Earl to be withstood only by a Part of the Army, but would give Encouragement to many in Scotland, who would have otherwise stood neuter, to join with the said Earl upon the Intelligence of the Duke of Monmouth having made a Descent into England, and that they two acted by Concert." But the Strangeness consisted in his taking such a Resolution: And even Ferguson, himself, farther says, "And so unreasonably forward was the Earl of Argyle of prosecuting what he had design'd in Scotland, that he would not be prevail'd upon to delay so much as one Month, till the Duke could make some Preparations, tho' far from proportionable to the Undertaking he was hurrying him upon; and till he could receive Answers from the Messengers he had dispatch'd into England, whereby he might know what Assistance he was to expect from his Friends. Nor would the Earl; after his own ominous Haste, set sail for Scotland, till he forc'd a Promise from the Duke of embarking for England within so many Days after; which the Duke, rather than suffer his Honour to be stain'd, comply'd with, as far as the Weather would permit; tho' he found the Observation of his Word to interfere with his Interest, as well as all the Principles of Prudence and Discretion."

Fletcher of Saltoun, according to Bishop Burnet, was the only Person who oppos'd Lord Argyle's Impatience, and endeavour'd to hinder the Duke from giving way to it: But, according to Ferguson, one Capt. Matthews was of the same Sentiment. The Torrent on the other Side, was, however, too violent to be withstood: For Lord Grey and the rest would needs have it, that the Duke's Popularity would be an Overmatch for the King's Power: That the whole West of England would come in to him on his first Appearance: That the King's Guards, &c. would melt before him: That there would be no Occasion for fighting: That there would be a Rising in London in his Favour: And Lord Grey, in particular, urg'd, That Henry the Seventh landed with a smaller Number than his, and succeeded.

Thus beset with Falacies, as well as borne down by Importunities, and perhaps, absurdly assum'd of making Use of his Understanding, when he was call'd upon to make Use of his Courage, the Duke suffer'd himself to be govern'd by a contemptible Party of those Nations he aspir'd to govern; and ventur'd to set up for a Kingdom, on so small a Stock, as he could borrow on his Jewels.

By all the Circumstances that have yet occur'd with Relation to this Adventure, it appears to have had no other Foundation than the Hopes, Views, and Passions of those immediately engag'd in it; or if there is any thing mysterious in any Part of the Project, it is, That a rich Widow should be found who, bearing of it, and where it stuck, should, unsolicited, furnish 10,000*l.* to set it in Motion: That this Money should fall into the Hands of Lord Argyle; and that the Duke of Monmouth should find no more Credit than the Relics of his former Splendor would answer. But Father Orleans and other Authors after him, have refin'd upon the Affair, and will needs have it, that both the Prince of Orange, and the States were in the Secret; and that if they did not contribute to the Operation, they at least conniv'd at it. Orleans, in particular, is so far from allowing his Highness the Merit of having dismiss'd the Duke, of his own accord, in Compliment to the King, as Burnet tells the Story, that he would, on the

He is said to have said his own Duty.

(A) The Author of the Cross against the Whigs, Part ii. p. 5. pronounces, "That the King had then made no Innovations on the Law, no Alteration in the Church or State."

A.D. 1684-5. the contrary, have us believe, that his Majesty had form'd a Design to get the Duke seiz'd at the Hague, which the Prince, having Notice of, sent his Favourite Bentinck to make his Grace acquainted with it; as also to furnish him with Money, to enable him to remove to Brussels; and that Skilton actually seiz'd certain Papers, at the Duke's House, after he was withdrawn, which contain'd positive Proofs of the Correspondence which had been kept up between his Grace and Bentinck. He farther insinuates, that there was a sort of Contract between the Prince and the Duke, by which the latter stood engag'd to make a Transfer of whatever Conquests he should make to his Highness; and that, how little soever there was of the Politician in his Grace, he made such Counter-propositions to the Prince, and his Republican Followers, with no other View than to deceive both. "Others are of Opinion, says the Author of the Genet against the Whigs, and perhaps more justly, That the Prince was not the Man impos'd on, but that under all the Out-side Appearance of his Kindness to Monmouth, there was nothing of real: That he look'd upon him as one who stood in his Way to the Crown he had so long aimed at, and was willing to be rid of him; but in what Manner, was not so easy to be resolv'd: Hungary, where he propos'd to have sent him, might have yielded him fresh Harvests of Laurels, which would have still more endear'd him with the People of England, to whom, upon Occasion, he might have return'd at a short Warning: On the other hand, there was no trusting a Man of his Levity and Ambition on an Enterprize which might, possibly, succeed beyond Expectation: That tho' he was despis'd by the Leaders of the Faction, who thought to use him only as a Tool they might lay at Pleasure, he knew him to be brave and enterprising, and infinitely belov'd by the common People, who are of the greatest Weight in violent Revolutions, when the Flood-gates of their Mob-Original of Power are set open to overwhelm the Laws and Government: That there is no Doubt, but that wary Prince, in an Affair of so great Consequence, and near Concern, weigh'd all these Matters: And that he founded the Dispositions of the more considerable of the Fugitives." With whom the same Author would have us conclude, that he took his Measures for the Ruin of the Man he pretended to aid. But this is to be look'd upon as the Blast of a malevolent Faction. The whole Course of the Duke of Monmouth contains a Series of Proofs, that he was a mere Adventurer, without any Alliance of any kind to support him; for his Concert with Argyle was rather a Snare to him than an Advantage: And if there is any Reason to surmise that he was sent to be a Sacrifice, it is rather to be drawn from the Over-vehemence on that Side, than any preconcerted Treachery among his own Followers.

It is, however, Matter of some Surprise, [P. l. p. 61.] that Bishop Burton should assert, "That King James was so intent upon the Pomp of his Coronation, that, for some Weeks, more important Matters were not thought on. Both Argyle and Monmouth's People (says he) were so true to them, that nothing was discover'd by any of them. Yet some Days after Argyle had fall'd, the King knew of it: For the Earl of Arden came to me and told me, the King had an Advertisement of it that very Day." Upon which, his Lordship, who hated a raw Rebellion, farther informs us, That he saw it was fit for him to make haste away, "for fear of being seiz'd; if it had been only to put the Affront on him, of being suspected of holding Correspondence with Traitors."

For Orleans and others are as positive, that Skilton had Notice of Argyle's Preparations, and of the Persons employ'd in making them: That he gave in a Memorial to the States, desiring they might be seiz'd: That the particular Port he mention'd was order'd to be search'd; but that Notice was privately given to the Persons concern'd to make Use of others. They, moreover, alledge, That the same Minister gave in a List of about a hundred Persons, whom the King his Master requir'd to be seiz'd and banish'd: That the States did, indeed, comply as before, but not till the Birds were flown: That he also gave their Lordships an Account of the Vessels, afterwards hir'd for the Duke of Monmouth, and importun'd the Admiralty of Amsterdam, by Letter, not to suffer them to sail, which Letter was delay'd in the Carriage, and afterwards denurr'd to, till the Orders which were given in Consequence of it, to arrest the Frigate, on board which the Duke in Person was to embark, were likely to be ineffectual: That, as it happen'd, the said Frigate was still in the Start, and was actually arrested; but was suffer'd to escape, and make the best of her way for England.

By the way it is necessary to observe, that these several Circumstances are urg'd as so many Proofs that the States conniv'd at the Mischief, at least, if they were not Parties in it: But every body who has any Idea of the Conduct of that Republic, knows, That 'tis one of her fundamental Maxims to give Protection to all Strangers; and that tho' in some particular Cases, and at some particular Times, they have been oblig'd to break thro' it, they generally steer a middle Course, by giving the Orders requir'd on one hand, and sending timely Notice to the Parties concern'd to get out of the way, on the other.

Mr. de la Neuville, indeed, is pleas'd to say, That tho' the States had no great Reason to be over-satisfy'd with a Prince, who, during the Reign of his Brother, had lain under a Suspicion of fomenting the Divisions between England and the Republic, they instantly comply'd with the Envoy's Demands, by sending Copies of his Memorial and of his List to all the Towns of the Seven Provinces; commanding the Bailiffs to make a diligent Search after those Englishmen, and to oblige them to quit their Territories: But then he acknowledges their Quest in vain; for they were already embark'd for Scotland and England; which very sufficiently indicates, that in this one Particular, Father Orleans is more to be depended on than he.

A Proclamation
in Scotland, to arm
the Country against any Insurre.

Thus it appears, that, however intent the King was on the Pomp of his Coronation, Skellon had his Eyes about him; and that if his Majesty had not particular Information, that the Duke of Mannouth and the Earl of Argyle were the Persons under whom these Preparations were made, he receiv'd sufficient Intelligence of what was doing to put him on his Guard: And that he made the wisest Use imaginable of it, appears by a Proclamation, which was set forth by the Regency of Scotland, so early as April 28, specifying, in the King's Name, "That, forasmuch as those traitorous Conspirators, who design'd the horrid Murder of his dearest Brother, and the Destruction of that ancient Monarchy, continuing still in the same hellish Project and Fury against him, were now again setting their Designs on work, to raise Com-motions in that his ancient Kingdom, as being the last Strugglings of them, and their execrable Party, for the preventing thereof, the King did strictly require and command all and every of the Subjects of that his Realm, that they should be in a Readiness, with their best Arms, to concur and assist him against any of the afore-said Com-motions or Insurrections, &c. As, likewise, that he required all his Lieges, on, or near the Sea-Coasts of this Kingdom, so soon as they heard of any Vessels arriving at any Place from abroad, with Men, Arms, or Ammunition, forthwith to convocate and rise in their best Arms, and to beat them off, or seize upon and secure the Ships and the Men, &c. And for their Security in obeying these his Royal Commands, he thereby fully pardon'd and indemnify'd them for ever, of all Slaughter, Blood, Mutilation, Fire-raising, burning of Ships, or such warlike Inconveniences that might follow, in case they met with hostile Opposition, &c." And what were the happy Effects of this provident Step, and, consequently, how worthy it was of the Imitation of After-times, the Sequel will best inform us.

While these desperate Projects were carrying on abroad, the Inhabitants of both Kingdoms were taken up with the Elections of their several Representatives; and his Majesty not so much with the Pomp, as with Ways and Means to lessen the Expence, of his Coronation. It had antiently been the Custom for the King, attended with his whole Court of Peers, and great Officers, to cavalcade it, with all possible Splendor and Magnificence, from the Tower, through several triumphal Arches, to Westminster: This was now laid aside, to the great Disappointment and Mortification of the City: Nor did his Majesty create any Knights of the Bath, as had been done by the late King: By which, and other Reductions, we are told by Mr. Echard, he made a Saving of at least 60,000*l.* St. George's Day was appointed for the Ceremonial; and both their Majesties condescended to agree, that it should be after the Protestant Form, with an Exception to the taking of the Sacrament, which had till then been ever a Part of it: For this Omission, which Mr. Echard does not care to give Credit to, the Committee of Council, who had the adjusting it, were undoubtedly answerable; and it has been particularly laid to the Charge of Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury; but without Reason, if there is any Truth in what Mr. North writes concerning that Prelate. His Words are these: "The Archbishop, and his Lordship (the Lord-Keeper) had some Difference. The Archbishop, as the Council thought, spun too fine; for that was his Way, and he would not abate one Scruple of what he thought his Duty; which made them think he trifled; and my Lord Hallifax said his Name should be sedes vacante." Now it is natural to conjecture, that the Difference between these two great Oracles, of the Law and Gospel, arose on this very Point; and, if so, it is plain the Archbishop did his Duty, and was overcome by the Cry that was rais'd against him, for being righteous over-much.

As to the Solemnity itself, both the Bishop of Salisbury, and Mr. Archdeacon Echard, lead it with ill Omens. Says the First, "The Crown was not well fitted for the King's Head; it came down too far, and cover'd the upper Part of his Face. The Canopy carry'd over him did also break; and his Son by Mrs. Sedley dy'd that Day." Says the Last, "The King that Day could hardly keep the Crown steady upon his Head, but was often observ'd to be in a tottering Condition, and that once the old Earl of Burlington kept it from falling off; pleasantly telling his Majesty, This is not the first time our Family have supported the Crown: It was farther observ'd, that the King's Arms, finely painted in a Glass Window, in one of the Churches of London, on the same Day suddenly fell down, while the rest was standing, and broke in pieces after an unheard-of manner. These, and some other foreboding Circumstances, were for some time the Discourse of many sorts of People." Let it not be thought, that we countenance these Follies, by repeating them; we repeat but to expose them: There is no Record, that the Day was blacken'd with any tragical Accident: Their Majesties, and those who glory'd in being of their Train, cheerfully underwent the Fatigue, for the sake of the Trappings: The People had their Holiday, and shouted as loudly then for King James, as they have since done for any of his Successors.

On the (c) Day of the King's Coronation, Meeting of the Scots Parliam. that Edinburgh might have her Jubilee as well as London, the Parliament of Scotland met for the first time, and the Duke of (f) Queensberry, his Majesty's Commissioner, open'd

(c) Oldmiss erroneously says, it was open'd March the 23th: whereas that was only the Date of the King's Letter: And Bishop Burnet, yet more erroneously, places this Meeting after the Evocation of the Earl of Argyle.

(f) Concerning this Nobleman, and his Colleague the Chancellor (Peck) Bishop Burnet writes as follows:

pen'd it with unusual Splendor. The King in his Letter gave them to understand, That he had call'd them together, not only to give them an Opportunity of shewing their Duty to him as formerly, but likewise of being exemplary to others, in their Demonstrations of Affection to his Person, and Compliance with his Desires: That what he had then to propose was as necessary for their Safety, as his Service, and tended more to secure their Privileges, than aggrandize his Power and Prerogative, which he was resolv'd to maintain in its greatest Lustre, to the end that he might be the better enabled to defend and protect their Religion establish'd by Law, as also their Rights and Properties against fanatical Contrivances, Murderers, and Assassins, &c. The Lord-Commissioner, by way of Supplement, farther signify'd, That he was allow'd to assure them of his Majesty's Resolutions to protect and maintain the Religion and Government of the Church, as they were then established: That he would take the Persons and Concerns of the Regular Clergy into his special Care and Protection; in order to which, he was to give the Royal Assent to such Laws and Acts as could be reasonably propos'd: That his Majesty would not allow of oppressive, arbitrary Proceedings, in Soldiers or others: That being sensible of the Decay of Trade, his Majesty had authoris'd him to consent to such Laws as could be reasonably propos'd for the Recovery and Improvement thereof: That even in the Business of Excise and Militia, his immediate Concerns, his Majesty had also authoris'd him to go the greatest Lengths for their Ease and Convenience, that the Nature of those things would bear, or the Nature of the Service allow: That, in return for all this Grace and Favour on his part, all his Majesty requir'd of them was, That they would assert the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, and establish the Revenue as amply upon his Majesty, and his lawful Successors, as it was enjoy'd by the late King: And that they would fall on effectual Ways to destroy that desperate, fanatical, and irreclaimable Party, who had brought them to the Brink of Ruin and Disgrace, &c. And, as if all this was not enough, the Lord-Chancellor (Perth) yet farther put in for his Share of Merit and Service: By reminding them, first, of the many Obligations the Nation lay under to be grateful to their great Monarch, of which, according to him, the greatest, and what they ought to prize the most, was the peculiar Favour shewn them, in giving them the Opportunity of presenting him with the Fruits of the Service of his Parliaments, and of becoming Examples to his other Dominions, by improving it as far as it would go: By calling upon them to unite like HONEST SCOTSMEN, in driving from among them whoever would not join with them upon such Terms, as might conduce to the Advancement of the Honour and Interest of their King and his Crown, and the Well-being of the Nation, which they should not suffer to be desil'd, and render'd contemptible to the whole World, by countenancing so venomous a base and villainous Men, as had of late maintain'd Principles, and ventur'd upon Practices, as were not to be nam'd amongst any who had heard of a Government, much less of Religion: By inveighing, in the same happy Style, against the Persons concern'd in the late Conspiracy against the sacred Lives of the Two Royal Brothers: "And who but incarnate Devils, proceeded his Lordship, could think of attempting any thing against such precious Lives. For what Prince in Europe, or the whole World, was ever like the late King, except his present Majesty?" As also against the wretched Remains of the Covenanters; to get rid of whom, and of all who inclin'd to their Principles, he farther said, they were to offer his Majesty their Advice, Concurrence, and utmost Assistance: And here launching out a second time into all the Intemperance of Panegyric. "To encourage us, said his Lordship, to do all we can towards the Service and Honour of our glorious Monarch, let us consider him in all his Personal Advantages, whether in what relates to War or Peace, where has the World afforded such another? to Court. The Duke of York told the King, that, if he had any Thoughts of changing the established Religion, he could not make any one Step with him in that Matter. The King seem'd to receive this very kindly from him, and assur'd him, he had no such Intention, but that he would have a Parliament call'd, to which he should go his Commissioner, and give all possible Assurances in the Matter of Religion, and get the Revenue to be settled, and such other Laws to be pass'd as might be necessary for the common Safety. The Duke of York press'd the Earl of Perth to speak in the same Strain to the King. But, tho' he pretended to be still a Protestant, yet he could not prevail on him to speak in so positive a Style. I had not then left London: So the Duke left the word of this, and seem'd so fully satisfy'd with it, that he thought all would be safe. So he prepar'd Instructions, by which both the Revenue and the King's Anstices were to be carried very high. He has often since that time told me, that the King made those Promises to him in so frank and hearty a Manner, that he concluded it was impossible for him to be siding a Part. Therefore he always believ'd that the Priests gave him leave to promise every thing, and that he did it very sincerely; but that afterwards they proceeded, they had a Power to dissolve the Obligation of all Oaths and Promises; since nothing could be more open and free than his Way of expressing himself was, tho' afterwards he had so sort of Regard to any of the Promises he then made. The King had been the King's own Act while he was in Scotland. So he thought the party that on all Parties would be the most acceptable Method, as well as the most effectual, for securing the Protestant Religion. Therefore he propos'd an Indulgence, obliging all People to take the Test, not only to qualify them for public Employments, but that all those to whom the Council should tender it should be bound to take it, under pain of Treason: And this was granted. He also propos'd many other severe Laws, that left an arbitrary Power in the Privy Council. And, as he was usually violent and impatient in his own Temper, so he saw the King's Inclinations to those Methods, and hoped to have recommend'd himself especially, by being instrumental in setting up an absolute and despotic Form of Government. But he found afterwards how he had deceiv'd himself, in thinking that any thing, but the delivering up his Religion, could be acceptable long. And he saw, after he had prepar'd a cruel Scheme of Government, other Men were trusted with the Management of it: And it had almost prov'd fatal to himself.

of the most different kinds; those of Prosperity and Success, and of Adversity and Opposition, of Hazards and Toil, and of Authority and Command. Did ever Man shew so exact an Honesty in the strictest adhering to his Word; such Temperance and Sobriety, so indefatigable a Diligence in Affairs, so undaunted a Courage upon all Occasions, and so unwearied a Clemency towards the most obstinate, malicious Offenders? Did ever Hero complete the Character so fully, in overcoming bravely, and shewing Gentleness to the conquise'd? And I must say, the Triumphs of his Patience are not his obscurest Glories; nor is the forgiving of those whose virulent Tongues would have tainted his Fame, if their Malice could have reach'd it, what is least to be admir'd in him. What Reputation other Princes have labour'd for, at the vast Expence of Blood and Treasure, and the putting of a constant Restraint upon themselves, fits so easily upon him, that what they would have, he forces from the Conscience of his very Enemies by his Merit, and it costs him no more than to be HIMSELF.--- But this Theme is not for me, and I do him wrong.--- And by way of Use and Application, in his last Period, he uses these Words: "And seeing he takes Pleasure in nothing so much as our Felicity and Prosperity, let it be an additional Tye upon us to advance his Honour and Greatness, by all the Endeavours of our Lives WITHOUT RESERVE."

Nor did the HONEST SCOTSMEN, to whom these Harangues were address'd, at all disappoint the Expectations of those who made them: For in the Answer to his Majesty's Letter, they most loyally declare, "That his Majesty's gracious and kind Remembrance of the Services done by this ancient Kingdom to his Brother, of ever glorious Memory, should rather raise in them ardent Desires to exceed whatsoever they had formerly done, than look upon them deserving the Esteem he was pleas'd to express of them. That the Death of their excellent Monarch was lamented by them to all the Degrees of Grief, which were consistent with their great Joy for the Succession of his most Sacred Majesty, who had not only continu'd, but secur'd the Happiness which his Royal Brother's Wisdom, Justice, and Clemency had procur'd them; that being the first Parliament which met by his Authority, he might be confident they would offer such Laws as might best secure his Person, the Royal Family and Government; and that they would be to exemplarily loyal, as to raise his Honour and Greatness to the utmost of their Power. And furthermore, they promis'd, that they would not leave any thing undone for extirpating all Fanaticism, but especially those fanatical Murderers and Assassins; and for detecting and punishing the late Conspirators, whose pernicious and execrable Designs did so much tend to subvert his Majesty's Government, and to ruin them and all his Majesty's faithful Subjects." Adding, "That, God be prais'd, the only way to be popular among them, was to be eminently loyal; and that his Majesty might expect that they would think his Commands as sacred as his Person, and that his Inclination would prevent their Debates."

As to Business, their first Act was for the farther Security of the Episcopal Church, as then by Law establish'd, by a Ratification and Confirmation of all Acts and Statutes, formerly pass'd for the Security and Liberty thereof, under the Titles of the True Church of God, and the Protestant Religion at present profess'd within the Kingdom, in their whole Strength and Tenor, as if all had been separately and circumstantially repeated.

They display'd their Zeal, Piety, and Loyalty next against the Fanatical Party (who, as we learn, by the Preamble of the Bill, had the Obstinacy to persevere in holding their House and Field Conventicles, Nurseries and Rendezvous of Rebellion, notwithstanding all the Penal Laws already in force for their Suppression) by statuting and ordaining, That all such as should hereafter preach, or assist at any such Fanatical House or Field Conventicles, should be punish'd with DEATH and Confiscation of Goods.

In this Act there was a Clause obliging all People to take the Tith, not only to qualify them for public Employments, but that all those, to whom the Council should tender it, should be bound to take it under the Pain of Treason.

By a third, they enacted, That the giving or taking of the National Covenant, or of the Solemn League and Covenant, or the writing in Defence thereof, or the owning them to be obligatory, should infer the Crime and Pains of Treason.

They also (g) ordain'd, That all such Persons as being cited in Case of High Treason, Field

Their Severity and Gravity.

(g) Another Act, says Bishop Burnet, vol. i. p. 636, 637, was only in one particular Case: But it was a crying one, and so deserves to be remembered.

When Carleton was put to the Torture, and came to capitulate in order to the making a Discovery, he got a Promise from the Council, that an Use should be made of his Deposition against any Person whatsoever. He in his Deposition said somewhat that brought Sir Hugh Campbell and his Son under the Guilt of Treason, who had been taken up in London two Years before, and were kept in Prison all this while. The Earl of Meibert got the Promise of his Estate, which was about 1000 l. a Year, as soon as he should be acquitted of High Treason. So an Act was brought in, which was to kill only six Weeks, and enacted, That if within that time any of the Privy-Council would depose, that any Man was proved to be guilty of High Treason, he should enjoy such a Pardon as should be obtained. Upon which, as soon as the Act was pass'd, four of the Privy-Council stood up, and affirmed, that the Campbells were proved by Carleton's Deposition to be guilty. Upon this both Father and Son were brought to the Bar, to see what they had to say why the Sentence should not be executed. The old Gentlemen, then near Eighty, seeing the Ruin of his Family was determined, and that he was condemn'd in so unusual a Manner, took courage, and said, the Oppression they had been under had driven them to Despair, and made them think how they might secure their Lives and Fortunes: Upon this he went to London, and had some Meetings with Baillie, and others: That one was sent to Scotland to hinder all King's: That an Oath of Secrecy was indeed offer'd, but was never taken upon all this. So it was pretended he had confess'd the Crime, and by a Show of Mercy they were pardon'd. But the Earl of Meibert possid'd himself of their Estate. The old Gentlemen died soon after. And very probably his Death was hasten'd, by his long and rigorous imprisonment, and this unexampled Coercion of it, which was so universally condemn'd, that when the News of it was written to foreign Parts, it was not easy to make People believe it possible.

A.D. 1685; Field or House Conventicles, or Church Irregularities, should refuse to give Testimony, should be liable to be punish'd, as guilty of these Crimes respectively, in which they refus'd to be Witnesses: Which, says Bishop Burnet, put all Men under great Apprehensions; since upon this Act an Inquisition might have been grafted, as soon as the King pleas'd.

And, as a Free-will-Offering to the Throne, they granted to his Majesty for Life (which they thought God long to preserve, that, say they, being the greatest of our earthly Wishes, as it is the chief of our temporal Felicity and Glory) the yearly Sum of two hundred and sixteen thousand Pounds, over and above the Grants already on Foot; which they introduce with the following flagrant Acknowledgment of their own Unworthiness to be entrusted with the Right and Properties of their Fellow-Subjects: "The Estates of Parliament, say their long'd Scotsmen, calling to Mind the many great Blessings they have and do enjoy under the Protection of the Royal Government, and especially by the many Deliverances from the rebellious Insurrections and Designs of Fanatical Traitors, from whom they could expect no less than Confusion in Religion, Oppression in their Estates, and Cruelty against their Persons and Families; and that the Terror of his Majesty's Forces hath been very instrumental for procuring our present Security: But, considering that not only these Enemies continue their inveterate Hatred against King and People, but that their frequent Disappointments have heighten'd their Malice to Despair; and that the present Forces may be too few to undergo all the Fatigues which his Majesty's Service, or the Protection of the Country do require, and to demonstrate to ALL Seditious Men, That this Nation is resolv'd to bestow ALL they have in the King's Service, rather than to be expos'd to the least of their Insults; do therefore," &c.

[P. 1053.] Thus, says Mr. Echard, all things appear'd quiet and calm in Scotland, without any Forbodings of the Storm at Hand, tho' he himself afterwards mentions the Proclamation, already cited, which had been issued to put the Scots on their Guard.

Argyle's Expedition.

May the second, the Earl of Argyle set Sail from the Fy with three small Vessels, freighted with his Arms and Ammunition, and met with such favourable Winds, that he came before Orkney on the fifth following; where sending his Secretary and Surgeon ashore, either to communicate or procure Intelligence, both were immediately seiz'd by the Care of the Bishop of that Place, and sent Prisoners to Edinburgh in order to be examin'd by the Privy-Council.

Thus, the very Moment he came on the Coast the Government had Advice of his Strength and Purpose, and in consequence lost no Time in making the necessary Preparations to render both ineffectual. This unhappy Beginning did not, however, deter the Earl from prosecuting his Enterprize: But in failing round to the West-Highlands, he lost so many Days, that the Alarm had time to spread on every Side; and the King's Friends, as well as his Servants, having been already empower'd so to do by the Proclamation, rais'd and arm'd their Vassals, and crowded in from all Quarters to crush this bold Invader; whose Attempt, according to Father Orleans, resembled more the Irruption of a Gang of Robbers, than the Expedition of a Warrior. There was, however, this Difference in the two Cases, That a Robber assigns no Reason for his Rapines, but his Wants or Appetites, nor admits of any Authority, but a Force superior to his own: Whereas the Earl and his Associates, set forth two solemn Declarations; which argued an Appeal to the Common-sense of Mankind, and a Reliance on the Justice of their Cause.

The first of these was intitled, The Declaration and Apology of the Protestant People, that is, of the Noblemen, Barons, Gentlemen, Burgesses and Commoners of all sorts, within the Kingdom of Scotland, with the Concurrence of the true and faithful Pastors, and of several Gentlemen of the English Nation join'd with them in the same Cause. In which they (b) set forth the great Advantages which the Protestant Religion, both at home and abroad, had receiv'd by the Success of the War against King Charles the First; which they (i) ascrib'd to the Blessing of God, and the Goodness of their Cause. They magnify'd the Loyalty of the Scotch Covenanters, who had admitted his Son to reign upon certain Terms and Conditions (k), which he having broke, his Government was become illegal, arbitrary, tyrannical and a continu'd Apostacy. In particular, they accus'd the Government of putting Men to Death contrary to Law, of desolating the Churches, changing the Ordinances of God to the Inventions of Men, conniving at Papists, and keeping up of standing Forces, the Bane of Civil Government; but more especially they complain'd, That by rescinding the Solemn League and Covenant, all the Oaths since impos'd, were horrid Perjury. They declare against the King's Supremacy, and all the Wars against the United Provinces, the Forfeiture of the late Earl of Argyle, the Torture of Spence and Carstairs, and against the Inquiries into the Insurrection at Bethwell-Briggs, by the Circuit-Courts, (l) which they call'd Pobery and Tyranny twist'd together. They declar'd against James Duke of York's Ascension to the Throne, as being excluded from it by the Commons of England; and likewise against the present House of Commons of both Kingdoms, as pack'd, caball'd, and return'd by Fraud and Injustice. For all which Reasons they totally threw off all Bonds of Subjection, and took up Arms against against James Duke of York, and all his Accomplices, their most unnatural Enemies, for these Ends. 1. The restoring and settling the Protestant Religion. 2. The Suppression and perpetual Exclusion of Popery, and its bitter Root and Spring, Prelacy. 3. The restoring of all who had been Sufferers for their Adherence to their Liberties and Religion. Then they declar'd, That they would never enter into any Capitulation or Treaty with the said Duke of York, but prosecute the War till all their Ends shall be obtain'd, and invited all their Brethren in England and Ireland to their Assistance. And lastly, they promis'd Indemnity to those who had been formerly their Enemies, upon their sincere Repentance, joining with them, and vigorously assisting them against a persecuting Tyrant, and an apostate Party.

This was the Substance of the general Declaration publish'd by Argyle's Followers: And as to the other, which was in the Earl's own Name (after a Reference to his Case at large, set forth by himself, and largely quoted in the former Reign) it proceeded to this Effect: "That as he had taken up Arms with those who had appointed him to be their Leader, for no private nor personal Ends, but only for those contain'd in the Declaration before-mention'd; so he claim'd no Interest, but what he had before the pretended Forfeiture of his Family, and to which he had sufficient Right. He freely remitted all personal Injuries against himself and Family to those that should not oppose him, but concur with him in his present Undertaking, for the Ends aforementioned; promising also, upon the Recovery of his Estate, to pay both his own and his Fathers Debts. Lastly, That he had patiently suffer'd for three Years and an Half an Exilement, according to Sentence unjustly pronounc'd against him in the Reign of the late King, to whom he had always been truly loyal; but he being dead, and the Duke of York having taken off his Mask, and invaded the Religion and Liberties of the Kingdom, he thought it not only just, but his Duty to God and his Country, to oppose and repress his Tyrannies and Usurpations: And accordingly he earnestly invited and obtained all honest Protestants, and particularly Friends and Blood Relations, to concur with them in the said Declaration."

On the other hand, the Parliament at Edinburgh, no doubt, to convince the Subject that there was no Ground for these Declarations, pass'd an Act, "That all the Subjects of Scotland should take the Oath of Allegiance anew, and assert the Royal Prerogatives whenever they should be requir'd by the Privy-Council, upon Pain of Banishment and Imprisonment, or such other Punishment as should be thought fit to be inflict'd upon them."

Before this time, as we have seen by the first of Lord Argyle's Papers, the Parliament Elections were over in England; but after what Manner has been Matter of Dispute between the two contending Parties, as often as the Transaction itself has been mention'd: According to Bishop (m) Burnet, C. 12, &c. nothing could be more outrageously violent, illegal, and unjustifiable, than the whole Proceeding on the Court-side of the Question; And according to Echard, the contrary was true; "for, say he, the Elections were generally carry'd on and completed with the most uncommon Coolness, Discretion, and Unanimity." Mr. North contents himself with saying only, "All People interest'd themselves one way or another, to procure or disappoint Elections: And the Court was not idle; his Lordship (the Lord-Keeper) got as many of his Friends and Relations to be chosen as he could; in which, besides his own Influences, he had the Nomination to some of the King's Boroughs. Those who came in by his Recommendation were, for the most part, Gentlemen of Honour and Estates, Relation in the general Elections in England.

(m) "All Arts, says his Lordship, were used to manage Elections so, that the King should have a Parliament to his Mind. Complaints came up from all the Parts of England, of the Injustice and Violence us'd in Elections, beyond what had ever been practis'd in former Times. And this was so universal over the whole Nation, that no Corner of it was neglected. In the new Charters that had been granted, the Election of the Members was taken out of the Hands of the Inhabitants, and restrain'd to the Corporation-men, all those being left out who were not acceptable at Court. In some Boroughs they could not find a Number of Men to be depended on: So the neighbouring Gentlemen were made the Corporation men: And, in some of these, Persons of other Counties, not so much as known in the Borough, were nam'd. This was practis'd in the most sly manner in Greenwell by the Earl of Bath: who, to secure himself the Groom of the Stole's Place, which he held all King Charles's time, put the Officers of the Guard's Names in almost all the Charters of that County; which sending up forty-four Members, they were for the most part to be chosen, that the King was sure of their Votes on all Occasions.

These Methods were so successful over England, that when the Election were all returned, the King said, there were not above forty Members, but such as he himself wish'd for. They were neither Men of Parts nor Estates: So there was no Hope left, either of working on their Underhandings, or of making them for their Interest, in not giving the King all at once. Most of them were furious and violent, and seem'd resolv'd to recommend themselves to the King, by putting every thing in his Power, and by ruining all those who had been for the Exclusion. Some few had design'd to give the King the Revenue only three Years to three Years.

The Earl of Rochester told me, that was what he look'd for, tho' the Poll he was in made it not so proper for him to move it. But there was no Prospect of any strength in opposing any thing that the King should ask of them.

This gave all thinking Men a melancholy Prospect. England now seem'd lost, unless some happy Accident should save it. All People saw the Ways for packing a Parliament now laid open. A new Set of Charters and Corporations, if those now nam'd should not continue as they were, or if those now nam'd should not continue as they were, was a certain Remedy, to which Recourse might be easily had. The Boroughs of England saw their Privileges now wrested out of their Hands, and that their Elections, which had made them so considerable before, were henceforth to be made as the Court thought directed: So that from henceforth little regard would be had to them; and the usual Practices in courtship, or rather in corrupting them, would be no longer pur'd. Tho' all People were alarm'd; but few dur'd speak out, or complain openly. Only the Duke of Monmouth's Agents made great use of this to inflame their Party. It was said, there was a Parliament to meet, that was not the Choice and Representative of the Nation, and therefore was no Parliament. So they upon this possess'd all People with dreadful Apprehensions that a blow was now given to the Constitution, which could not be remedied, but by an Insurrection. It was resolv'd to bring up Petitions against these Elections, that were so indecently managed, that it formed some parties to excite them: But these were to be dissolv'd by a Majority of Men, who knew their own Election to be so faulty, that to raise themselves they would justify the rest: And Fair-dealing was not to be expected from those, who were so deeply engag'd in the late Injustice." Estates, as well as Credit in their Counties." Which alone is sufficient to shew, that there was little of that Unanimity, which Mr. Echard boasts of: And it is scarce to be suppos'd, that a Party, who had of late so mighty an Interest in the People, and who had no other Prospect of being considerable, than by their Assistance, should suffer an Opportunity, which they had Reason to look upon as their Last, to slip thro' their Hands, unregarded: Some of their (a) Leaders, in spite of all Opposition, did actually make their Way into Parliament: And if others attempted it, and were defeated, as it is certain they did and were, it must be concluded, that the Court was not idle; and, from the universal Practice upon these Occasions, that, provided they obtain'd their End, they were indifferent as to the Means. Indeed the two Parties no longer wrangled on even Terms, as they had done formerly: The late Reform of the Charters put it out of the Power of Numbers of Peers, to act any otherwise than by the Direction of the Court: And of those other Places whose Fate was yet in suspense, some thought themselves oblig'd to be as pliant as possible on this Occasion, that they might suffer the less in their Privileges. Coker, a Writer of more Passion than Ingenuity, is express'd, that the Lords and Deputy-Lieutenants were as imperious in the Choice of Knights of the Shires, as the Lord-Mayor Moor had been in the Nomination of North and Rich for Sheriffs: That more Frauds and Violences were made use of in forming this Assembly, than ever had been practis'd since the Parliament of 21 Rich. II.: And that the long Delay of their Meeting, after the Time prefix'd for the Return of the Writs, was owing to the Practices, which were thought necessary to be try'd on such Corporations as had not yet submitted to be new-fashion'd in the Court-Mint, and to receive the Image of Cæsar instead of the Guardian-Genius of the Commonwealth.

It is certain the Parliament did not meet till May 193, and it was not till the 22d, that the King made his Speech to both Houses, which, we are told by Mr. North, was of his Majesty's own composing; "at least," says he, the Lord-Keeper had no Hand in it: For he was not so much as consulted about either the Matter or Expressions the King intended to use, as one may well judge by the unguarded Tenor of it." His Lordship, it seems, had prepar'd an Harangue of his own, in Imitation of these flowery Pieces of Rhetoric, which had been formerly deliver'd at the Opening of Parliaments, by his Predecessors: But tho' he had try'd his Talent at Pænegyric in it; had discover'd the same princely Virtues and Excellencies in the present gracious Sovereign which had endear'd the Reign of the late gracious Sovereign; had glory'd in observing how very different his Government was like to prove from the dreadful Ideas which his Enemies had maliciously encaavour'd to raise of it; had very cavalierly spur'd at the almost-lifeless Carcass of a disabled Faction; had boldly engag'd, that his Majesty's Promises would be more binding and effectual, than any Laws which could be propos'd to him; and had made all the necessary Demands, in return for such Royal Goodness; it fell so short of the great Original, set forth by the Scottish Lord-Chancellor Perth, that, like Cain's Offering, it prov'd unacceptable; and so had been lost to the Public, if his Brother had not (e) preserv'd and embalm'd it, for the Use of Posterity.

To proceed. Sir John Trevor having been chosen Speaker by the Commons, and approv'd by the King, his Majesty repeated from the Throne, almost in the same Words, what he had before made use of to the Privy Council at his Accession. The better, said he, to evidence to you, that I spoke then not by chance, and consequently, that you may freely rely upon a Promise so solemnly made. He then express'd a firm Dependence, that he should meet with suitable Returns in what related to the settling his Revenue, and continuing it during his Life, as in the Time of the King his Brother; and proceeded thus: "I might use many Arguments to enforce this Demand, for the Benefit of Trade, the Support of the Navy, the Necessity of the Crown, and the Well-being of the Government itself, which I must not suffer to be precarious: But I am confident your own Consideration of what is just and reasonable will suggest to you whatsoever might be enjoin'd upon this Occasion." His Majesty was then pleas'd to start an Objection, as what he foresaw would be us'd as a popular Argument against what he ask'd; namely, "The Inclination Men have for frequent Parliament, which some may think, said he, would be the best secur'd, by feeding me, from time to time, by such Proportions as they shall think convenient: And this Argument, it being the first time I speak to you from the Throne, I will answer once for all, that this would be a very improper Method to take with me; and that the best Way to engage me to meet you often is, always to use me well. I expect, therefore, that you will comply with me in what I have desir'd; and that you will do it speedily, that this may be a short Session, and that we may meet again to all our Satisfaction." He then imparted the News of Argyle's Landing in the West Islands; and clos'd his Speech in these Words: "And I will not doubt but you will be the more zealous to support the Government, and give me my Revenue, as I have desir'd it, without delay."

fore them, it may not be improper to refer to Sir John Roelley, who serv'd in this Parliament for York, (that City being now as entirely subdued as London) and who says, "The Report went, that there would be more requir'd, in behalf of Popery, than the Laws now in force would allow of; that the King would insist on the Revenue for Life, as also a Sum of Ready-money to answer his present Occasions; and that it would be propos'd to repeal the Habeas Corpus Act, which I found was much oppos'd by some great ones, in their private Discourse, as well as by some of us; and to enact a general Toleration or Liberty of Conscience, which some seem'd willing enough to subscribe to; tho', at the same time, the Resolution was to admit of no Alteration to capacitate Papists to enjoy any Place or Employment in or under the Government. As for the Affair of Money, Men in general seem'd willing to settle an handsome Revenue upon the King, and to give him Money; but whether their Grant should be permanent or only temporary, and to be renewed from time to time by Parliament, that the Nation might be the oftner consulted, was the Question: In all this (proceeds Sir John) I resolv'd punctually to do my Duty to the Crown, but not to be unmindful of a due Regard for my Country, and my Religion."

And again: "I had some Discourse, May 4, with Mr. Hilliard, Sir Roger Martin, and other Gentlemen of great Consideration with the popish Party: They told me, The King would expect a Repeal of the Sanguinary-Laws; that the Papists should be allow'd the private Exercise of their Religion; and that they, at least such as had serv'd the Royal Family in the Wars, or otherwise, should be capable of Employment under him: That the King would, in Parliament, give full Satisfaction to the Nation, with regard to their Religion and Properties; but that if Reason would not serve his Purpose, he knew what he had to do: That the King would never divide the Regal Power, by admitting of that of the Pope; that his Majesty was too fond of Power to be guilty of that Oversight; and that his adhering to the Defence of the Church of England would, on the other hand, deter the Pope from pressing him to admit of his Supremacy; in short, that it was but reasonable the King should insist on the Repeal of the severer Penal-Laws against the Papists; for that if he should die, he would leave them in as ill a Plight as he found them."

Thus it appears, that the King's Intention with respect to the Revenue, was known long before he explain'd himself in Parliament, that his Creatures had early began to make Supplications in Favour of Popery, and had even us'd Menaces without-doors, in case of Opposition within; and that it was actually a Question among the Members whether they should not leave his Majesty under the same Necessity to consult them occasionally, as had oblig'd him to assemble them now. When therefore he chose to express himself from the Throne in a Style so unusual; and that seem'd to extinguish the very Privilege of Debate, and to assume the Dictator, when depending on the Courtesy of the House of Commons even for Subsistence, what could be more natural than that they should have taken the Alarm, and pluck'd themselves on correcting this over-bearing Spirit in this first Instance? Even the long Parliament of the preceding Reign, in whose Steps, it must be presum'd, they were ambitious to tread, had shewn them, that, since the Repeal of the Triennial Bill, there was no other way to ensure the Continuance of Parliaments, than by leaving the King under a continual Necessity of their Assistance: And Experience had demonstrated, that the said Long Parliament, however cautious in that Particular, had trespass'd on their Rule; and, contrary to their own Intentions, enabled the King to break thro' a positive Law, as well as his own repeated Engagements to govern by Law only, and keep up both the Authority and Terror of Government without them. Those very Words of his Majesty's, That the way to engage him to meet them often was to use him well, reduc'd to plain English, signify'd, That as long as they did what he would have them, he would make Use of them and no longer; and hence it became notorious, that if ever they they should demur to any of his Demands, they would lose all the Merit of past Compliances, and be set aside to suffer the ill Effects of their own Servility, in common with the rest of their Fellow-Subjects.

Reflections so natural and obvious as these, undoubtedly occur'd to every Man in the House of Commons; and yet when the Speech was taken into Consideration, without bestowing a Thought on the State of the Nation, or the Grievances of particular Corporations, without once touching on the Breach that had been made in the Constitution, by the King's applying the Revenue to his own Use without the Authority of the Laws, or by the Discontinuance of Parliament; without starting any Expedient to prevent the like Mischiefs for the future, which was the only Pretence that could have been assign'd to justify an unexcus'd Compliance with the King's Demands; or even making any Provision for the securing and strengthening their own Privileges, which had been so flagrantly violated in the Case of Mr. Wilkens, their late Speaker, they resolv'd, me Their want, mine contradicente, "That the humble Thanks of the House be given to his Majesty for his most gracious Speech (in which Vote the Lords also concurr'd) and that all the Revenue given to his late Majesty, and enjoy'd by him at his Death, be given and granted to his present Majesty, and settled upon him during his Life: So highly were they pleas'd, according to Sir John Roelley, with the selemn Security the King had given them, as to their Religion and Property.

In the same meritorious Disposition to do whatever should be requir'd of them, when the Earl of Middleton communicated to them one of the Lord Argyle's Papers, namely, that

A. D. 1687. that which turn'd only on his own peculiar Case, without once enquiring for, or why the other was withheld, they rush'd into another namine contradicente Vote, to stand by his Majesty with their Lives and Fortunes, against Archibald Campbell the pretended Earl of Argyle, and his Adherents, and other Rebels and Traitors, and all others whatsoever, that should assist them, or any of them."

Never, says Mr. Echard, with an Air of Triumph, did any Parliament shew greater Unanimity: And never may any other shew so much, unless when the Grace and Goodness of the Sovereign shall keep equal Pace with the Loyalty and Liberty of the People! For however the Adorers of the Prerogative glory in the blind Submission of these Men to the Will and Pleasure of their Prince, we shall find, that by every one of these slavish Steps, they contributed as much to the Ruin of his Majesty, as to the enslaving themselves and their Posterity: For had they made use of the dependant Situation they found him in, to convince him, that he had no other way to be great and happy, than by providing for the Happiness and Security of his People, he had also been convinc'd of his Mistakes before he had been overwhelm'd by his Misfortunes; Whereas, by this shameless Resignation to his Will and Pleasure, without contending for any one Provision against any of the Evils so justly apprehended, they misled him into a fatal Persuasion, that the Spirit of the Nation was so effectually broke, that he might go what Lengths he pleas'd, without any Pain for the Success or Dread of the Consequence.

A Motion in behalf of the Church.

It is, indeed, remember'd by Sir John Reresby, that, after the House had proceeded thus far to gratify his Majesty, a Motion was made in the House, That something now should be done to please the People, after so much had been done to gratify the King; pointing at a proper Security for the Protestant Religion: Upon which a Debate arising, it was refer'd to the Committee of Religion. This Committee, the next Day, pass'd a Vote, That the House should be mov'd by them, to resolve to stand by the King, with their Lives and Fortunes, according to their bounden Duty and Allegiance, in Defence of the reform'd Religion of the Church of England, as by Law established: As also to present an Address to the King, to issue out his Royal Proclamation for putting the Laws in Execution against all Dissenters of what Denomination soever; and these Votes, tho' in a very full Committee, pass'd namine contradicente.

Pass'd unanimously to the Committee.

But the next Day, when the same came to be reported to the House, a Debate took birth (by what Management has never yet been explain'd) whether the House should concur with the Committee or not? Against the Question it was argu'd, That it was reminding the King of a Neglect of his Duty; that the Justices of Peace were in Fault that the Laws were not more duly executed; that Votes of this Sort would alarm the Kingdom, and might create a Jealousy of the King, who had so solemnly declar'd his Intentions to defend our Religion; that the King had told us, The way to keep a good Understanding between him and his Parliament, would be to use him well, and that he could not but take this arms; and, finally, That it might be an Encouragement to the Rebels already in Arms in the Kingdom of Scotland, and so on. To this it was answer'd, That it would have but an indifferent Look with the Nation, if they, being Members of the Church of England, should let such commendable Votes in favour of our Religion drop unheeded. At length the previous Question being put, Whether to agree, or not to agree with the Committee, it was carried in the Negative. The whole Matter then was summ'd up in this Vote, That an Address should be made to the King, purporting, "That the House did acquiesce and entirely rely and rest wholly satisfy'd on his Majesty's gracious Word and repeated Declaration to support and defend the Church of England, as by Law establish'd; which was dearer to them than their Lives."

And shew'd us on the Report.

They refused to rely on the King's Word for the Security of the Church.

Thus, however exemplarily loyal the Seventeenth Parliament undertook to be, the Commons of England went many Stages beyond them in the same broad and beaten Road: For whereas the former provided for the Security of their Church, before they made Provision for the King; the latter postpon'd the Cause of God to that of his Majesty; and in the same Breath wheresoever they declar'd their Religion founded on the Laws was dearer to them than their Lives, gave up that Security, and chose to leave it at the Courtesy of the Throne.

Mr. Echard, tho' a Dignitary of the same Church, is pleas'd to call this a generous Resolution. And, in another Place, "Never were more fair Promises on one Side, nor greater Generosity on the other." But Generosity in Matters of Government is, on the Side of the People, the Height of Phrenzy. Power is such a Corrosive, that in Process of Time it will eat thro' the firmest Constitution, if the Guardians of it are not ever at hand with Preventives: And in fact there is any Willom or Propriety in placing such an unlimited Confidence in the King, why is a Jealousy of the Royal Prerogative, the very Basis of that Constitution? Why are such Guardians chosen? Why should not the People put in for the Merit of giving themselves away? And why do they amuse themselves from time to time with the solemn Farce of a Representative?

Those who, at this time, were the Trustees for the Nation, did not, it seems, find themselves any way affected by Queries of this Nature: For when the Speaker, follow'd by the whole House, waited upon the King with the Revenue-Bill, he was pleas'd to state it as their peculiar Glory, that they presented the said Bill to his Majesty, without any other for the Preservation and Security of their Religion, which was dearer to them than their Lives, and without the Condition of any additional appropriating, or tacking Clauses whatever."

Speaker's Speech on presenting the Revenue Bill.

This, it must be own'd, was bidding as high

A. D. 1684. high as possible for his Majesty's Favour; and one would have thought, that he could scarce have avoided the letting fall some gracious Expressions in behalf of their Religion, by way of Acknowledgment. But his Majesty no doubt, upon this Occasion likewise, though it mean to prevaricate with God and Man; for he did not bestow one single Syllable upon it; and that the less Notice might be taken of the Omission, artfully enough gloss'd it over, by dazzling the Eyes of the Public with Professions of his Zeal for the public Glory: The Readiness and Cheerfulness wherewith the Bill was dispatch'd, were the only Circumstances relating to it, which he took notice of: After which he proceeded as follows:

King demands

"After so happy a Beginning, you may believe I would not call upon you unnecessarily for an extraordinary Supply: But when I tell you, That the Stores of the Navy and Ordnance are extremely exhausted; that the Anticipations upon several Branches of the Revenue are great and burthenfome; that the Debts of the King my Brother, to his Servants and Family, are such as deserve Compassion; that the Rebellion in Scotland, without putting more Weight upon it than it really deserves, must oblige me to considerable Expence extraordinary: I am sure such Considerations will move you to give me an Aid to provide for those Things, wherein the Security, the Ease and Happiness of my Government are so much concern'd. But, above all, I must recommend to you the Care of the Navy, the Strength and Glory of the Nation, that you will put it into such a Condition as may make us considered and respected abroad. I cannot express my Concerns upon this Occasion more suitable to my own Thoughts of it, than by assuring you, I have a true English Heart, as jealous of the Honour of the Nation as you can be; and I please myself with the Hopes, that, by God's Blessing and your Assistance, I may carry its Reputation yet higher in the World, than ever it has been in the Time of my Ancestors. And as I will not call upon you for Supplies, but when they are of public Use and Advantage; so I promise you, that what you give me upon such Occasions shall be managed with good Husbandry, and I will take care it shall be employ'd to the Uses for which I ask them."

But tho' this Overflow of Deference and Regard had produc'd no Mark or Sign of Affection or Gratitude to the Church, which was so dear to them, the Commons proceeded to resolve, with the same Generosity and Unanimity as before, That a Supply be given to his Majesty for the several Uses particularized in his Speech, and to deliberate on Ways and Means for making that Resolution good: In answer to their Address against Lord Argyle, his Majesty had indeed signify'd, "That he could expect no less from a House of Commons, so compos'd as he thank'd God they were: That he rely'd on the Assurances they had given him, which were the natural Effects of monarchical Church-of-England-Men: That he should stand by all such; and that, so supported, he had no Reason to fear any Rebels, or Enemies, he either had or might have." And possibly after these Assurances, tho' regarding only the Men, and not the Thing, they thought themselves sufficiently contented for whatever they should say or do, through the whole Session.

All this while, the Lords had kept pace with the Commons in almost every Species of Loyalty: They had concurr'd in the first Address of Thanks; they had pass'd the Money-Bill without Amendment; they had address'd against Argyle; and if they had not by express Vote resolv'd to rely on the King's Word for the Security of their Religion rather than the Laws, even the Right Reverend Fathers among them, as well as the lay Peers, nodded on the Bench in full Tranquillity, while the Commons fell into that Extravagance, without giving themselves the Trouble to form one Motion that might lay his Majesty under a Necessity to declare himself yet more explicitly the Defender of their Faith, and thereby shew that the Confidence repos'd in him was well plac'd; or that might have the least Tendency to warn the People of their Danger, in case he declin'd it. The King, in his Answer to their Address, in Relation to Argyle, had, in the most obliging manner, acknowledg'd their Services to him in the Case of the Exclusion-Bill; and even condescend'd to intimate the Expediency of a perpetual Alliance offensive and defensive between the Throne and them, founded on reciprocal Interest. But then he had preserv'd a total Silence on the Head of the Religion. This, alone, was sufficient to shew, that his Majesty had his Reserves; but his Speech when he pass'd the Money-Bill, put it out of all Dispute; and, therefore so much Resignation as appear'd on their Side, fell very little short of the more forward and active Proceedings of the Commons.

Proceedings of the Lords.

On the very first Day of the Session, they had sent a favourable Ear to the Petitions of Lord Danby, and the three Popish Lords, who lay under the like Circumstances with him; a Question was stated, Whether the Order of the House, of March 10, 1678-9, should be revers'd and annull'd; which pass'd in the Affirmative, without any material Opposition: For, though mention is made, that several Lords appear'd in the Debate, but Four join'd in the Protest (p.) which follow'd it,

(1) And which was drawn up in these Words, viz. "Because it doth, as we conceive, extrajudicially, and without a particular Cause before us, endeavour in Alteration in a judicial Rule and Order of the House, in the highest Part of their Power and Jurisdiction. 2. Because it shews and lays aside an Order made and remov'd upon long Consideration and Debate, Report of Committees of Precedents and former Resolutions, without permitting the same to be read, tho' call'd for by many of the Peers, and against weighty Reason, as we conceive, appearing for the same, and contrary to the Practice of former Times. 3. it, viz. the Lords Radnor, Anglesy, Clares, and Stamford.

Some little time before the Meeting of the Court, that the Sable'd, and all Persons concern'd may know how to apply themselves for Justice; the very Charters, King's Bench, &c. having their settled Rules, from which there is no Variation. And it appears that Reason had Weight enough with the House to produce the following Order, which contains a sort of Expedient to reconcile the Equity of discharging those persecuted Persons, with the Forms and Orders by which they had been to long condemn'd, &c. Whereas several Indictments were found at the Sessions held at Westminster against William Earl of Powis, &c. which are since brought into this House by Certificate, pursuant to an Order of the 19th of April, 1678; the House being this Day inform'd by Mr. Attorney-General that his Majesty hath sent a Warrant to him directed to enter a Nolle prosequi upon the said Indictments: It is ordered, that his Majesty's Attorney-General may have recourse to the said Indictments, in order to enter a Nolle prosequi thereupon, pursuant to his Majesty's Warrant. And it is further order'd, That the Bill given in the Court of King's Bench for the Appearance of the said William Earl of Powis, &c. be, and is hereby discharge'd.

(g) The first of which was for focusing that there was a notorious Cause of Injustice at the White Horse Tavern in the Strand, on April 21, 1679, at which were present Whitebread, French, Arisland, &c. and himself; whereas, in Reality, he was at no such Confess, nor in England at the time when he said it was. And to prove this, the whole Possession of St. Omer's gave in their concurrent Testimony, that Gate came to this Place a little before Christmas 1677, and continued there till about Midsummer 1678, without ever lodging out of the College, except one Night at Watter, in the Month of June. Outyaino, on his Side, produced the Remnant of his old Coadjutors; who, being cross-examin'd by the Court, fell into some Inconsistencies; and, what was worse, fix'd the Time of seeing him in Town in May; whereas, according to his own Narrative, as was observ'd by the Attorney-General, he return'd to St. Omer's three or four Days after the Confess; and consequently one or other of the Parties was perjur'd. Lord Cosmains and Sir George Wolman moreover protested, in open Court, with the most solemn and vehement Imprecations, That there was not one Word of Truth in the whole Charge against them. And, to expose him yet farther, it was shewn, that he had absolv'd Clay, at the Trial of the five Jeitain: And when he call'd upon several Persons of Eminence and Quality to speak of the Reception and Credit he had formerly receiv'd, the Earl of Hastings, formerly one of the petitioning and protesting Priests, but of late a Quart Convert, express'd himself in these Words: "I do believe Mr. Outyaino's Discovery found a good Reception in the House of Lords; but it was grounded upon the Opinion, that what he said was true, and that he was an honest Man.— But since that time it being apparent there were so many and great Contradictions, Falsities, and Perjuries in his Evidence, upon which so much Innocent Blood hath been shed, I believe a great many Persons who were concern'd in the Trial should those unscrupulous Men, were heartily afflicted and sorry for their share in it. And I do believe most of the House of Peers have alter'd their Opinion, as to the Man's Credit, and look upon his Evidence as I do, to be very Lye."

But, notwithstanding all this Weight of Evidence, and every other Circumstance, which would have overwhelm'd any other Man, he bore up with a Spirit that seem'd invincible; and exerted Talents and Abilities, that would have done honour to a better Man. In particular, he defied the Jury to observe, "That tho' the King's Council was now against him, yet they were also against themselves; for both Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Attorney-General, were Council on his Side in those Trials." Then he exclaim'd, "Can any thing more plainly tend to destroy and overturn the Methods of Justice, to frighten all Witnesses from henceforth from ever appearing to discover any Conspiracy? And does it not tend to expose and vitiate the known Understanding and Justice of the late King of ever blessed Memory, to assign the Wisdom of his Privy Council, his great and noble Peers, his loyal Commons in four successive Parliaments, his twelve Judges, and all those several Juries that were upon those Trials? Had not those Juries Seal'd? Had they not Hoars'd? Had they no Consciences? And the Judges before whom those Conspirators were try'd, were they Men of no Justice, nor Honour, nor Integrity, nor Conscience nor Understanding? Will those Juries be said to have drawn the innocent Blood of these Men upon their own Heads and the Nation?"

And for a Constancy of all. I app'd to the great God of Heaven and Earth, that he, the Judge of all; and once more in his Presence, and before all this Auditory, I avow my Evidence of the Popish Plot, and all and every Part of it, to be nothing but true, and will expect from the Almighty God, the Vindication of my Integrity and Innocence.

Parliament, Oates, the quondam Saviour of the Nation; had been convicted of two (g) Perjuries in the Course of his Charge against the

The second Indictment was for focusing at the Trial of the five Jeitain, That Mr. Ireland took leave of himself and others in London, betwixt the 8th and the 11th of August, 1678; whereas in Reality, Mr. Ireland was, at both the said times, and for several Days before, and after, in Staffordshire, or in the Parts adjacent. To prove all which now above forty Witnesses were produc'd, who testify'd, That Mr. Ireland was never at all in London from the third of August, in the same Year, to the 17th of the following September, and specify'd every thing according to Time and Place, with the Authentick of a Journal, accompany'd with all proper Tokens and Circumstances; and what fell bore harder upon him than the former Tryal, was, that no less than nine of these Witnesses were Protestants, and of the Church of England, against whom he could raise no Exception. His Defence, says Mr. Echard, was much to the Issue Effect that it was the Day before, Appeals to Parliaments and Vouchers, insinuating upon his Reputation; Clamours against the Papers, and Quotations, as if the Protestant Interest and his Credit were to stand and fall together.

In summing up the Evidence, the Lord Chief Justice Joffrey, took upon him to say, It will be good to refresh the Memory, to beator his Majesty's Pleasure hereby to express: A his Concern, for having consented to Mr. Ireland's Execution; and this contain'd with him to his dying Day, as the Bishop of my Lord of Stafford did with his Royal Father. Good-ford, said he, has not build up our souls. Excuse us, to fulfill the greatest Pleasures, that the Justice of the Nation can permit upon such Villains as these are, that have contrived to murder his Majesty, and oppress upon us, and so much Guilt upon ourselves.

Mr. Justice Wilkes had the Honour to pronounce the Sentence upon him, which he did in a Style that very ill became the Bench; for he went thro' the several Articles of it with a sort of wondrous Pleasantry, and almost seem'd to repine that he could not be his Executioner.

His Words were these: "First, the Court does order for a Fine, that you pay a thousand Marks upon each Indictment. Secondly, that you be strip of all your ecclesiastical Habits. Thirdly, the Court does award, That you stand upon, and in, the Pillory, here before Westminster-hall Gate, upon Monday next, for an Hour's time, with a Paper over your Head (which you must first walk with round about to all the Courts in Westminster-hall) declaring your Crime, and that upon the said Indictment. Fourthly, on the second Indictment, upon Tuesday, you shall stand upon, and in, the Pillory at the Royal Exchange, for the space of an Hour; with the same Inscription. Fifthly, you shall, upon the next Wednesday, be whip from delegato to Neuigate: And upon Friday, you shall be whip from Neuigate to Yttern, by the Hands of the Common Hangman. But Mr. Oates, proceeded he, we cannot but remember, there were several particular Times you were false about; and therefore, as annual Commemorations, that it may be known to all People, as long as you live, we have order'd care of you for an annual Parliament: Upon the 14th of April, every Year as long as you live, you are to stand upon, and in, the Pillory at Windsor, just opposite to the Gallows. You are next to stand upon, and in, the Pillory, here at Westminster-hall Gate every 9th of August as long as you live: And that it may be known what women by it, 'tis to remember that you focus about Mr. Ireland's being in Town between the 8th and 11th of August. You are to stand upon, and in, the Pillory at Charing Cross, on the 10th of August, every Year during your Life; the like ever against the Temple Gate, upon the 11th. And upon the second of September (which is another notorious time, which you cannot but remember) you are to stand upon, and in, the Pillory, at the Royal Exchange. And all this you are to do every Year during your Life; and to be committed close Prisoner, as long as you live. This Proclamation to be the Judgment of the Court upon you, for your Offences. And I much will you plainly, if it had been in my Power to have carry'd it farther, I should not have been unwilling to have given Judgment of Death upon you; for I am sure you deserve it."

If a pretty plain, that the Design of the Court was to have him alive to Death; and had he been left a Prisoner in every respect, he had certainly fast under so horrible a Punishment: For he was made to suffer the full Rigour of his Sentence, without the least Abatement. And tho' not able to go or break the second Day, thro' the insupportable Arguings of his Sufferings during the first, and his Discard of worse to enure (or according to the Charity of Lebrange, because he was scandalously drunk) he was reverentially laid on a Sledge, his former Wounds were cross-bur'd with new; and like a Corpse contain'd in to own Blood, he was carry'd back to Neuigate, where, thro' the Excellence of his Constitution, and the Care of those who fill order'd his Infirmity, he receiv'd a perfect Cure, and liv'd to see the great Guilt he had been so deeply engag'd in, once more triumphant.

the Popish Plotters, and had met with as little Mercy in his Punishment, as he had shewn in his Evidence: Upon the Strength

* It is further necessary in this Place to take notice of two other Prosecutions which took place about the same time. Dangerfield was almost as obnoxious as Oates; and therefore Dangerfield was to be almost as severely punish'd. In fear of a Storm he had taken Sanctuary in Flanders; but returning back in an unlucky Season, says Mr. Edward, he was seiz'd, and carry'd before the Council, where persisting in the very Presence of the King, himself, in his former Evidence, he was committed close Prisoner to Newgate. On the tenth of May he was try'd at the King's-Bench Bar, upon an Information, for writing and publishing a villainous and scandalous Libel, call'd his Narrative; wherein, according to his Depositions before the Parliament in 1680, he testify'd, That he was employ'd by the Popish Party, and chiefly by the Popish Lords in the Tower, and the Countess of Perth, to invent the Mad Mad Club, which was to have thro' the Popish Plot wholly upon the Presbyterians. This Narrative was order'd to be printed by the House of Commons, November 10, 1680, in the hottest time of their Sifting; but notwithstanding that Order, their Speaker, Mr. Williams, was afterwards fine'd ten thousand Pounds for licensing it to be printed; and we are told, he could not escape without paying the greatest Part of it. And Mr. Dangerfield being now found guilty, receiv'd Judgment at the King's-Bench Bar, That he should stand twice in the Pillory; that he should be whip'd from Algate to Newgate in one Day, and from Newgate to Tower on another, and should pay a Fine of five hundred Pounds.

Dangerfield was struck with such Horror at this terrible Sentence, that he look'd on himself as a dead Man, and accordingly chose a Text for his Funeral Sermon; but perforce'd in offering, That all he had deliver'd in Evidence before the House of Commons, was true.

The whipping was executed in full Rigour, as before, upon Oates, and it was scarce over, before one Mr. Robert Francis, a Barrister of Gregg's Inn, gave him a Wound with his Case, in or near the Eye which, according to the Depositions of the Surgeons, was the Cause of his Death. The Story is told very differently by different Authors. According to Bishop Burnet, The Blow was given as he receiv'd his last Lull. According to Edward, He was in a Coach on his Return to Newgate; and Francis coming by Chance to the Coach-side, out of an interminate Rage, said to him, How now, Friend! Have you had your Head thro' this Morning? The other, with two or three Curses, call'd him Son of a Whore, and spit in his Face, which drew on the Stroke. The same Author also says, That Francis, thinking that he had done no Hurt, endeavour'd to escape; and that many have doubted, whether his Death was the Effect of the Wound or the Torments of his Body, which was exceedingly swell'd and callum'd. But a Man under such Sufferings and Agonies, it is reasonable to suppose, could scarce sit erect in a Coach, or have a sufficient Stock of Spirits remaining to enter into such a Parley. Others agree that the Wound was given in his Return, but alledge it was done with a Tack at the end of the Case: That the Murderer fled; but was pursu'd, and had like to have been torn to Pieces by the Ribble: That Newgate he justly'd the Fate, and said, That he had the greatest Men in the Kingdom to stand by him: That Attempts were made to bring Dangerfield's Widow to consent that Francis should be pardon'd; and that thro' the rejection of those Offers, he would have been pardon'd notwithstanding, if Lord Chief Justice Jefferys had not gone to Windsor, and told the King, He might see, for that the Ribbles were now thoroughly heard. This one Francis. And Mr. Edward thus sums up the Story for the other: "This fatal Accident had a furious Influence upon the Minds of the Multitude, who were sufficiently exasperated before; so that tho' great Applications were made to the Court, no Pardon could be obtain'd for Mr. Francis. Many Stories were immediately invented and dispers'd concerning him; particularly, that he was a violent Party not a Jew, and had set on by some great Men; that the Case had a Steel Dart in it, that was thro' into the Prisoner's Eye upon deliberate Malice; and it was further said, it was also a particular Revenge upon a Jealousy against Dangerfield for his Lady. All which were fully confuted in Mr. Francis's Speech at his Execution, and publish'd by Authority. He freely owns, That by this rash and impudent Act, he had not only offended against the Government and against Justice, but against Christianity, and even the Rules of Morality itself; but solemnly declar'd, that it was done without the least Fore-thought, Malice, or Jealousy whatsoever, and that he had never seen the Man but once in the Pillory at a Distance: That he had led a quiet and inoffensive Life for twelve Years in Gray's Inn, without any Quarrel or Controversy; and that his whole Life was without any other Crime, saving this single strange one. As to his Religion, he prov'd himself to be an obedient and zealous Son of the Church of England, as by Law establish'd: And for his Wife, he believ'd her the best of Women; and was so far from suspecting her Virtue, that she was the only Lot he request'd on Earth, and could freely part with every thing else below without keeping. In sum, he dy'd like a true Penitent and a good Christian, with the infamous Load of a Crime, the Nature of which can hardly be parallel'd in History."

The other Prosecution was of a very different Person, and to assert a very different End. The Person was Mr. Richard Baxter, a Person of great Eminence among the Presbyterians, as well for his Learning and Piety, as his having refus'd a Bishopric, for Conscience sake: And the End was to make him a sacrifice to the Church, as Dangerfield and Oates were the Victims of the Popish Party; between whom a Project had been already entertain'd to bring about some-thing of an Union. The Charge against him was, That in his Paraphrase on the New Testament, which he call'd a fundamental Piece, he had highly reflected on the Prelate of the Church of England; and that in so doing he was guilty of Sedition: "For which being brought before the Lord Chief Justice Jefferys at the King's-Bench Bar, he was treated, says Mr. Edward, himself, with unusual Scarcity, and far from what was due to the Gravity of his Person and Behaviour. Having pleas'd, Not Guilty, to the Information, and mov'd that farther time might be allow'd him for his Trial, the Chief Justice cry'd out, I will not give him an Month's time more to serve his Life. We have had to do with other sorts of Men, but were once upon a Saint to deal with, and I have been to deal with Saints as well as Sinners. Youde, says he, binds Oates in the Pillory, as he actually did at that very time, and he says he suffers for the Truth, and so says Baxter; but if Baxter did but stand on the other Side of the Pillory could he, I would for these five years if the greatest Kings and Rulers in the Kingdom."

Upon the 30th of May he was brought to his Trial before the same Lord Chief Justice at Guild-Hall, where was a numerous Concourse of his Friends and others; and his Council were Mr. Wallis, Mr. Williams, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Wood, and Mr. Piapp, all retain'd by Sir Henry Jones, who shew'd a particular Respect both to Mr. Baxter's Person and his Cause. The Council cry'd, That the Passage mention'd in the Information, ought not to be strain'd to that Sense which was put upon them by the Invidious; nor could any of them be apply'd to the Prelates of the Church of England, without a forc'd Construction, but were design'd against those of the Church of Rome: And they further insist'd, That Mr. Baxter had frequently attended Divine Service, went to the Sacrament and purchased orders to do the same; and had in the very Book for church'd, spoken moderately and honourably of the Bishops of the Church of England. And Mr. Baxter, himself, alledge'd, That he had been so moderate with respect to the Church of England, that he had receiv'd the Confession of many of the Dissenters upon that Account. The Lord Chief Justice said, That Baxter was an Enemy to the Name and Thing, the Office and Person of Bishops, and fell severally both upon the Council and Defendant. As to the latter, he call'd out, Richard, thou wert an old Fellow, an old Knave; thou hast written Books enough to load a Car, every one as full of Seditious, I might say Treason, as an Egg is full of Milt. Hast thou been whipp'd out of thy Writing-trade forty Years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretend'st to be a Preacher of the Gospel of Peace, and thou hast me Vent to the Crown: 'Tis time for thee to begin to think what Account thou intend'st to give. But leave this to thy self, and I for thou'lt give us no other help begun; but by the Grace of God, I'll look after thee. I know thou hast a mighty Torry, and I see a great many of the Brotherhood in Coverts, waiting as five upon his backs of their mighty Don, and a Doctor of the Party (Dr. Bates) at your Elbow; but by the Grace of Almighty God, I'll crush you all. Besides other Reproaches upon him and his Council, in summing up the Evidence, he said, 'Tis universally known, there has been a Design to raise the King and the Nation; and this has been the main Intentionary: He is as ready now as he can be; but ting your robes on Men you for trade us. Bind your Kings in Chains, and your Nobles in Fetters of Iron; and to your Tents, O Israel! Gentlemen, for God's Sake, don't let us be call'd Justice in an Age. In Conclusion, he said the Jury, If in their Conscience they believ'd it to be the Rights and Liberty of the Church of England, in the Proposition which the Information refer'd to, they must find him Guilty; and he could never see Men eyes; that they must find him Not Guilty."

Here Mr. Baxter interpos'd, *Does your Lordship think any Jury will pretend to put a Verdict on me upon such a Trial? And his Lordship reply'd, He warrant you, Mr. Baxter; don't trouble yourself about that. And, as it prov'd, his Lordship knew the better than Mr. Edward. For after a short Stay, they found him Guilty: And the Court sent* brought in for reversing the Attainder of the Lord Viscount Stafford: And, tho' Bishop Burnet is pleas'd to say, that the Reasonings urg'd in favour of it, namely, "That the Witnesses were now convicted of Perjury, and therefore the Restoring the Blood that was tainted, was the least Reparation, stuck with the House, and would not go down;" and again, The Lords had no mind to reverse and condemn sth Proceedings, nothing is more certain than that their Lordships not only admitted, and pass'd the Bill, but with the following remarkable Preamble: Whereas it is now MANIFEST, that the said William Lord Viscount Stafford, was INNOCENT of the Treason laid to his Charge, and the Testimony whereby he was found guilty, was FALSE, be it enacted, &c. It is true, the Matter was warmly debated for three Days together; and several zealous Lay-Lords appear'd against it with all the parliamentary Skill they were Masters of; and, when defeated, summ'd up their Arguments in a strong Protest, founded on the following Reasons, viz. 1. Because the Preamble consisted of Assertion only, unsupported by any Proof, Warrant, Testimony, or Matter of Record, before them. 2. Because the Record of Oates's Conviction, before the King's Bench, regarding only collateral Points of Proof, of no Affinity to the Lord Stafford's Case, could be no Ground to invalidate the Testimony against the said Lord, who could not have been legally convicted on the Evidence of one Person, and was in fact by three. 3. Because it was conceiv'd, the Judgment of the King's Bench was unprecedented, illegal, unwarrantable, and highly derogatory to the Honour, Judicature, and Authority of the Peers, who had Power in themselves to punish the Perjuries of Witnesses before them, and ought not to be impos'd upon by the Judgments of inferior Courts, nor their Attainder of a Peer invalidated by Implication: Nor ought the Papish Plot, so condemn'd, pursued, and punished, by his late Majesty, and four Parliaments, after public, solemn Devotion, through the whole Kingdom, by Authority of Church and State, to be eluded, to the Arraignment and Scandal of the then Government, only for the restoring the Family of one popish Lord: And all this without any Matter judicially appearing before us, to induce the same; and after the Records of the Trial, for the Information of the Truth, had been refus'd to be read, &c. But tho' it was plain, that the Ghost of the Papish Plot was thus conjur'd up, chiefly to create a fresh Horror against popish Councils; tho' it was not unreasonable to suppose, that some wholesome political Ends might have been answer'd by it; tho' the Credit of the whole Legislature was undoubtedly concern'd in the Issue; and tho' every Endeavour to blot the Papists was, at that particular Crisis, apparently injurious to the Protestant Interest;

the Bill had all the Sanctions which the Lords could give it, and at last receiv'd its Quintus (after the second Reading) from the Commons; who, tho' so blindly subservient to the King, were unwilling to cut the Ground from under their own Feet, by acting as the Peace-makers between the Nation and the popish Party, which was every Day gaining Strength, and growing more formidable than ever.

One of the orthodox Authors in the Pay (Cavent, p. 11.) of the Church takes occasion to glory in the very different Spirit which appear'd in this Parliament, from that which possess'd the three preceding: But all Excesses are equally blameable; and if they were justly obnoxious for keeping up the Ferment of the Nation, when it was in their Power to allay it, surely these were the same, for groveling at the Footstool of the Throne, and in a manner inviting the King to trample them in the Dust beneath it. If Firmness is ever a Virtue, it was now doubly virtuous to make use of it; and if ever a Union amongst Protestants was necessary, it was now doubly so, when Popery was enthron'd: And yet such was the Spirit of the present Parliament, as we have seen, that they chose to shew their Zeal by persecuting Papist and Protestant-Dissenter alike; and when the Latter was (sken'd for the sake of the Former, they rush'd into the opposite Extreme of complimenting away even their own Security.

Mr. Echard indeed is pleas'd to connect the first of these Measures with Mr. Baxter's Prosecution, as if the one made way for the other; and also to add, that if it had been ratify'd by the House, it might have prov'd fatal in that Juncture, to the Dissenters: But surely, if the venime contradicente Vote of one Day was against the Dissenters, the venime contradicente Vote of the other could not be for them.

But we shall trace the Reason of the said Procedure against Mr. Baxter to another Source; and thence shall be authoris'd to conclude, that Mercy to Dissenters was the Thing at that time least consider'd; and that, on the contrary, a Project was entertain'd of making them a Sacrifice to the Church, that the Church might be induced, in return, to make certain Concessions to the Cause of Rome.

On the 29th of May, which was two Days after the Vote of Confidence, to rely on the King's Word, Dr. Sherlock, preaching before the House of Commons, had clos'd his Discourse with these Expressions: "I deny not, but some who are Papists, in some Junctures of Affairs, may have been very loyal; but I am sure the popish Religion is not: The Englishman may be loyal, but not the Papist: And that there can be no Security of those Mens Loyalty, whose Religion, in any case, teaches them to rebel." This Sermon, it may be presum'd, was publish'd of course; and in a few Days after came forth tried him to pay a Fine of five hundred Marks, to lye in Prison till he had paid it, and to give Security for his Good Behaviour for seven Years. Beh. the Usage and the Sen-

ence, says Mr. Echard, were thought excellent by many. But there were Reasons and Precautions, which he has not thought proper to particularise.

A. D. 1685. Jurists were, for the most part, without Justice, Loyalty, Confidence, or Religion, tho' making a Pretence to all, for a Cloak to their Villanies; and that if it was to take them into her Bosom, they would make Use of the Vigour they deriv'd from her Warmth to sting her to Death; proceeds to advise her Sons to consider the King, as the Corner-Stone on which the two Walls, which had been so long separated, might be reunited; and concludes as follows:

"Upon these Considerations, My Lords and Gentlemen, my humble Request to you in this Assembly is, that you would advise about some Means for our Quiet, Concord, and Agreement, and take care, that what may widen our Breaches may be rejected, and what may close them embraced. The best way to effect which, in my Thoughts are these:

First, That it may be provided that those who are known to be faithful Friends to the King and Kingdom's Good, may equally share us enjoy those Favours and Blessings we may hope for under so great and so just a King, without being liable to the sanguinary, or penal Laws for holding Opinions no ways inconsistent with Loyalty and the Peace and Quiet of the Nation: And that they may not be oblig'd by Oaths and Tests, either to renounce their Religion, which they know they cannot do without Sacrilege, or else to put themselves out of Capacity of serving their King or Country.

Secondly, That for healing our Differences, it be appointed that neither Side in their Sermons touch upon Matters of Controversy with animating Reflections; but that those Discourses, may wholly tend to Peace and Piety, Religion and sound Morality: And that in all public Catechisms the solid Grounds and Principles of Religion may be solely explicated, and establish'd, all reflecting Anaphorics being laid aside.

Thirdly, That some learned, devout and sober Persons may be made choice of on both Sides, who may truly state Matters of Controversy betwixt us, to the End each one may know the others Pretensions, and the Tenets they cannot abandon, without breaking the Chain of Apostolic Faith: Which if it be done, we shall, it may be, find that to be true, which the Papists often tell us, That the Difference betwixt them and us, is not so great as many make it, nor their Tenets so pernicious, but if we saw them naked we should (if not embrace them as Truths, yet) not condemn them as Errors, much less as pernicious Doctrines. Yet, if notwithstanding all this, we cannot perfectly agree in some Points, let us however endeavour to live together in the Bonds of Love and Charity, as becomes good Christians, and loyal Subjects, and join together to oppose those known Maxims, and pernicious Errors, which destroy the Essence of Religion, Loyalty, and good Government."

And thus we have the Reasons for Mr. Baxter's Prosecution, which none of our Historians have as yet touch'd upon: And as to the Provocations mention'd also by Mr. Eschard, he means the Troubles which we are presently to speak of; but in these it was never pretended that Mr. Baxter had any Share: It was besides notorious, that he was thrown into Prison the 28th of February, which was long before those Troubles were thought of: And how agreeable the Usage he met with was to the meek, charitable, and Gospel-spirit of the Rabbits of those times, appears from a Passage of the late Dr. Calamy's; wherein he asserts, "That a certain noted Clergyman put into the Minds of his (Baxter's) Enemies some Accusations out of Roman's 13, as against the King, to touch his Life; but no Use was made of them."

In this Interval, the Earl of Argyle's Pro- landed his little Force at a Place call'd Cann- platon; and had issued our Orders to all his Vassals, from Sixteen to Sixty, with all their useful Arms, and two Weeks Loan, to join him, under pain of military Execution; and several

If we cannot assure ourselves of a perfect Peace and Union with Rome, we may hope for a Truce, a Cessation of Arms, a happy Correspondence and mutual Commerce.

Yet some Overtures of Peace have been frequently made by the Roman's; and I may lay with Truth, if it had not been for some head-headed Zealots, and other ignorant Polemic, our Breaches had never been so wide; yes, on the contrary, would have been long since healed. Our Arch-bishop cry perpetually against the Idolatry of the Church of Rome; and yet the Roman's, 'tis well known, cry as much against Idolatry as we. If they would paint a Pop's, they bestir him with the only Colours of Equivocation, mental Reservations, Dispenations to lye, forswear, and mislead their Neighbours; when, on the contrary, the Roman's Catholics recommend Simplicity and godly Sincerity, as truly Christian Virtues, necessary to the Conservation of Justice, Truth, and common Society; and tells us, That all Pretences and Dispenations past, or pretended to be granted, in order to any such Ends or Design, have no other Validity or Effect, than to add Sacrilege and Blasphemy to the already named Crimes. And as for our common Controversy, how often are we told they imitate the Roman's Catholics Tenets, misrepresent their Doctrine, fight against Calamity of their own Hearts; and most commonly either spend whole Volumes in refuting Errors, which they condemn, as well as We, or establishing Truths, which they affirm: How often have they told us, we must separate our Articles of Faith from their theological Disputes, and take their Doctrines from their Councils, not their Schools? And yet how little Profit have our Polemic reap'd from this Almond? How often have they formerly urg'd us to an Oath or Foedus betwixt us, upon Condition Security and Freedom might be given them; the Questions rightly stated, and the other common Laws of Disputation strictly observ'd: But still, either the real or pretended Interest of some party stop thereto, inasmuch that in their public Writings they have often told us, we behave ourselves like Persons distant of our Cause, Justice Divines on equal Terms, and either misrepresent their Tenets; or manifestly in their Doctrine of Justification and Merit, Satisfaction and Indulgence; or else play the Buffoon, joking, scoffing, and relating Stories, which, if true, would not touch Religion: I must confess, many of our young Divines (if I may call them Divines, who have not spent above a Year or two in the Universities) are to blame in this, who having obtained a good Eke-out by the Solicitation of Friends, and not by their Merit, are forced to proceed to other ways that scarce understand themselves, such as these, let Want, it may be, of Matter, are glad to fly, as the Devil; for which being applauded by their zealous and ignorant Auditors, and moved with an itch of being in Print, they publish their own perverse Conceptions, or such as they have glean'd from others of the File Learning, Judgment, and Reading; and too far be all to no Purpose, yet they first see themselves, so it from thence the Lowell of Epiphany, and the three Destructions of the House of Rehoboth, was necessary, since."

A. D. 1685. Several not only refusing Obedience, but, on the contrary, going over to the King's Forces, their Houses were burnt to the Ground. Thus, partly thro' Terror, and partly thro' Affection, in a few Days he saw himself at the Head of about 2500 Men, some of them Horie; and, as a farther Inducement to the Country to side with him, he gave out, That all England was in Arms, in three several Places; that the Duke of Monmouth had set up his Standard, on the same Grounds as he had done; and that the South and West of Scotland waited only for positive Intelligence of his Landing, to declare for him: But either he was greatly deceiv'd himself, or he purposely deceiv'd his Followers; for as yet Monmouth had not left Holland; the whole Possé of Scotland, consisting of 22,000 Men, had been seven Days in Arms for the Government; and about one Third of them were actually in full March towards Argyleshire, under the Command of the Marquis of Athol, the Earl of Brae d'Alain, &c. in order to reduce him: But against these he was as yet able to defend himself; for having his Three Ships to wait his Motions, one of which was of thirty Guns, one of twelve, and the third of six; as also a fourth, which he had taken on the Coast, laden with Corn; and twenty Boats; he was for a while able to shift his Situation at Pleasure, and either charge or retreat as best suited his Convenience. But so provident was the Government, that he soon found himself equally beset both by Sea and Land: Two of his Majesty's Ships were sent in quest of his little Fleet: He had Notice of it, and endeavour'd to take Sanctuary in Lochfine; but the Winds proving contrary, he was prevented by the Arrival of the Enemy in the Mouth of Lectrowan, where he then lay. He then set himself to unlade his Ships with all Expedition, and lodg'd the Remainder of their several Freights, consisting of Arms and Ammunition, in a little Castle call'd Ellengreg, which he fortify'd, as also a Rock that lies near it, and made such a Disposition of his Ships as enabled those on board and those on shore to act for their common Preservation: Having taken these Precautions, and left a Garrison of 150 Men to defend the Castle, and one of his Parties having been worsted in the Interval by the Marquis of Athol, he pass'd Loch-long June 15; and directed his March to Lenox in Dumbartonshire. The very same Day the King's Ships coming up to Ellengreg, and preparing to make an Attack, two Men came off in a Boat with a white Flag, and told them, they might save themselves the Labour, for that both Ships and Garrison were already deserted; those entrusted with their Defence having taken flight as soon as their Sails appear'd; by which all the Stores, consisting of 5000 Arms, 500 Barrels of Powder, several Pieces of Cannon, &c. fell, without a Blow, into the Hands of the Royalists.

The Earl in the mean time pursued his March; but at every Step found his Difficulties and Dangers increase: The Lord Charles Murray, with three Troops of Dragoons, had Orders to prevent his passing the River Clyde, which was on his Right: The Duke of Gordon, with another Party, kept pace with him on his Left: The Marquis of Athol waited upon his Rear: The Earl of Dumbarton, with the main Body of the King's Forces, was posting from Glasgow, at the same time, to give him Battle: And to complete all, his Provisions fail'd; all Supplies were cut off; and Numbers of his Followers to avoid starving, thought it advisable to return to their Duty. But the Earl who had taken a Resolution to dare and suffer all things, push'd on, notwithstanding, towards the Fords of the River Leven, between Leck-lomand and Dumbarton, which they made a Shift to pass, but were overtaken the next Morning in the Parish of Kilerne in their way to Sterling, by the King's Horie and Dragoons, who kept them in Play till the Foot came up, which was not till towards the Evening; and then it was judg'd that the Post they occupi'd was so strong, and their Disposition to good, that it was not held advisable to attack them till the Morning. The Earl, however, did not think proper to maintain it, but in the dead of the Night, as silently as possible, march'd off to the River Clyde, which he pass'd without any great Opposition; his Horie swimming over, and his Foot having the Convenience of Boats. Thus they got to Renfrew, where Sir John Cochran undertook to find them Guides, to conduct them into Galloway; by whom they were ignorantly or wilfully misled into a Bog; in which they lost both their Hories and Baggage, and were so every way distress'd and embarras'd, that all Order was at an end, and every Man thought only of providing for his own Safety. The Earl, himself, seeing all lost, fled towards Clyde; and in the way was met upon by two Men, who call'd upon him to yield: Instead of which he fir'd upon them; and, having receiv'd a Wound in the Head, alighted from his Horie, and ran into the Water, almost up to the Neck; a Countryman, who had heard the Noise of the Fray, plung'd in after him: The Earl snapp'd a Pistol, but it mis'd Fire; and the Countryman giving him another Blow on the Head, he cry'd out, Unfortunate Argyle! and fell. Having thus made himself known, he was immediately seiz'd, and sent first to Glasgow, and then to Edinburgh.

This Nobleman (says Mr. Beal Hig- [Short View, gons, a profest Apologist for all the Princes of the Stuart Race) by reason of some very severe Treatment, not to say worse, in the preceding Reign, was by much the most excusable, and most to be pity'd of any who drew a Sword in this Quarrel. But those who were the Punishers of his Crime, were pleas'd to forget his Provocations, as well as his high Rank and Quality, and heap'd all the Indignities upon him, which could make him yet more sensible of his Calamities. He was led into Edinburgh harcheaded, with his Hands ty'd behind him, like the vilest and wickedest of Malefactors, surrounded with Guards, the common Executioner with his Ax going before him, and expos'd to the Clamour

Clamours and Insults of the Populace. And all this we are taught by Mr. Archdeacon Eckard to hold but a just Retaliation for the like Indignities inflicted on the Marquis of Montrose, chiefly at the Instance of the Earl's Father.

If it can be said, that any Mercy was shewn him, it consisted in giving him a speedy Dispatch out of a World he had so many Reasons to loath. The thirteenth Day after he was taken, was the Day appointed for his Execution; which, as if to authenticate his former Perfection, was in Pursuance of his former Sentence, and not for the Hostilities he had since committed. Bishop Burnet says, he was examin'd by the Duke of Queensberry, in private, but made no Confessions: That he express'd a cheerful Calm in the midst of all his Misfortunes: That he justify'd all he had done, for having been unjustly attainted, he thought that Injustice had dissolv'd his Allegiance; and that he complain'd much of the Duke of Monmouth for having so long delay'd his coming, and for a Step he took afterwards, which was contrary to their Agreement at parting.

On the Scaffold he made a Speech which had more of Piety than Politics in it. "He thank'd God, that no more Blood had been spilt; wish'd his own might be the last that would be spilt; hinted a Hope, by the Application of a Text, That God's Work might be done, not by the Hand of Power, but the Influence of his own Spirit; acknowledg'd, that his own Sufferings were the Result of special Providence; but hop'd none would either insult or stumble at it, seeing God did all things well, for good and holy Ends, tho' it was not always understood by us; warn'd his Hearers from bringing Sin upon themselves, by pusillanimous Compliances in wicked Courses; quoted Hosai's Case to shew the Danger of such Temporizings; recommended certain Texts to the Consideration of those in Power; declar'd, that he freely forgave his Enemies, besought all People to forgive him; and pray'd that God would send Truth and Peace into the three Kingdoms; sanctify his own Lot, &c." Here he seem'd to have ended all he design'd to say, but was induc'd to proceed yet farther, in the following remarkable Words: "It is suggest'd to me, That I have said nothing of the Royal Family; and it remembers me, that, before the Justice at my Trial about the Test, I said, That, at my Death I would pray, That there should never want one of the Royal Family to be a Defender of the true, ancient, apostolic, catholic, Protestant Faith; which I now do; and that God would enlighten and forgive all of them that are either lukewarm, or have think from the Profession of it, &c." Now, if he had embark'd in a Republican Cause, as some would persuade us to believe, he would scarce have employ'd his last Breath in praying for a Protestant King. And if on the other hand, it is truly said, that he was disgusted with Monmouth and his Proceedings, it is not supposable, that he put up this dying Prayer for him. The King, himself, he could not mean, because the whole Tenor of his Speech shews, that his Misfortunes had not alter'd his Sentiments concerning him; and, except the Prince of Orange, there was no other legitimate Male then in being, of the Royal Race: And as to the Inferences deducible from hence, it is fit every Reader should make them for himself.

Thus, however, he fell; and if the Historian of his own Times is to be depended on, his Fate was not more owing to the superior Power of his Adversaries, than to the Mistakes in his own Conduct: For, it seems, he was all-sufficient, and would neither hear Advice, nor bear Contradiction.

As to his Followers, most of the Gentlemen forc'd their way thro' the King's Troops, and found Means to make their Escape: But Sir John Cochran, Captain Ayliffe, and Rienbald, the last of whom fought desperately, and receiv'd several Wounds, were taken, Cochran made his Peace and was pardon'd, according to many Writers, on the Merit of having betray'd his Friends: But the Bishop of Salisbury utterly denies it, and tells the Story thus:

"Cochran had a rich Father, the Earl of Dundonald; and he offer'd the Priests 5000*l.* to save his Son. They wanted a Stock of Money for managing their Designs: So they interpos'd so effectually, that the Bargain was made. But, to cover it, Cochran petition'd the Council that he might be sent to the King; for he had some Secrets of great Importance, which were not fit to be communicated to any but to the King himself. He was, upon that, brought up to London: And, after he had been for some time in private with the King, the Matters he had discover'd were said to be of such Importance, that in Consideration, of that the King pardon'd him. It was said, he had discover'd all their Negotiations with the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Prince of Orange. But this was a Pretence only given out to conceal the Bargain; for the Prince told me, he had never once seen him." Not that there had been no such Negotiations.

The same Author also says, That Ayliffe had a mind to prevent the Course of Justice; and having got a Penknife into his Hands, gave himself several Stabs. And thinking he was certainly a dead Man, he cry'd out, and said, Now he deserv'd his Enemies. Yet he had not pierc'd his Guts: So his Wounds were not mortal. And, it being believ'd that he would make great Discoveries, he was brought up to London, where the King examin'd him, but could draw nothing from him, but one severe Repartee. He being fullen, and refusing to discover any thing, the King said to him, Mr. Ayliffe, you know it is in my Power to pardon you, therefore say that which may deserve it. It was said that he answer'd, That tho' it was in his Power, yet it was not in his Nature to pardon. He was Nephew to the old Earl of Clarendon by Marriage; for Ayliffe's Aunt was his first Wife, but he had no Children. It was thought, that the Nearness of his Relation to the King's Children might have mov'd him to pardon him, which would have been the most effectual Confutation of his bold Repartee: But he suffer'd with the rest."

Why Ayliffe and Rumbald, who were Engliſhmen, choſe to follow the Fortunes of Argyle rather than Monmouth, the Biſhop firſt ſays, he was never able to find out: But as Fletcher and Ferguson, Scottiſhmen, follow'd Monmouth, poſſibly it was by way of mutual Precaution, that neither ſhould, after their Separation, give into ſeparate Views, but, as often as they ſhew'd any ſuch Diſpoſition, ſhould be reminded by theſe reſpective Delegates, of their reciprocal Engagements to be faithful to each other.

Rumbald's Tale, and gallant De-

Rumbald was the famous Maltreſer of the Rye-house, ſo often mention'd in the laſt Reign: And let it give no honeſt Man Offence, if, inſtead of handing his Portrait down to Poſterity, in the dreadful Colours of a deſperate Aſſaſin, we pronounce, from his Behaviour in the laſt Scene of his Tragedy, that he was one of thoſe exalted Minds which ſerve to the Body-politic, as the animal Spirits do to the natural Body, to keep the Flame of Liberty alive, and to maintain the Dignity of human Nature, apart of thoſe artificial Helps, which are drawn by the Statesman from Power, Office, Wealth, and Titles.

Before his Wounds had Time to cloſe, much leſs to heal, he was brought to his Trial in an Elbow-chair, on Mens Shoulders; and, before the Charge againſt him was read, ſeveral Questions were put to him by the Court; to which he at firſt made no Reply; but growing uneaſy under their Importunity, he gave them to underſtand, that he did not think himſelf oblig'd to add to his own Accuſation: That there was no Neceſſity he ſhould; for they had Matter enough already againſt him to do his Buſineſs: And that therefore he did not deſign to fret his Conſcience with answering Questions. The Libel or Indictment was then read; in which he was accus'd not only of being an Accomplice with the Earl of Argyle, but alſo of proſecuting his Deſign to kill the King, as had been laid to his Charge in the Rye-house Conſpiracy: And, in his Reply, he own'd it all, except what related to any Deſign on the King's Perſon. "Let all preſent, ſaid he, believe the Words of a dying Man: I never, directly nor indirectly, intended any ſuch Villany: I even abhorred the very Thoughts of it; and, bleſſed be God, I never had ſuch a Reputation in the World, that no Man had ever the Impudence to propoſe it. This is the only Way I have now to clear myſelf: But at the laſt Day the Truth will be made manifeſt to all Men." In half an Hour the Jury pronounc'd him guilty: His Sentence was, to be drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd: Which he heard with ſuch an undaunted Compoſure, as is only to be expreſs'd in his own gallant Words; for being ask'd, if he was not ſtruck with Horror at it, he answer'd, I wiſh I had a Limb for every Town in Chriſtendom. His Speech at the Place of Execution had alſo many things in it worthy of eternal Remembrance:

"Gentlemen and Brethren, ſaid he, It is for all Men that come into the World once to die, and after Death to come to Judgment; and ſince Death is a Debt that all of us muſt pay, it is but a Matter of ſmall Moment what Way it be done; and ſeeing the Lord is pleas'd in this manner to take me to himſelf, I confeſs, ſomething hard to Fleſh and Blood; yet, bleſſed be his Name, who hath made me not only willing but thankful for his honouring me to lay down the Life he gave, for his Name; in which, were every Hair in this Head and Beard of mine a Life, I ſhould joyfully ſacrifice them for it, as I do this: And Providence having brought me hither, I think it moſt neceſſary to clear myſelf of ſome Aſperſions laid on my Name: And firſt, That I ſhould have had to borrow an Intention of deſtroying the King and his Brother."

Here he repeated what he had ſaid before to the Juſtices on this Subject.

"It was alſo laid to my Charge, that I was anti-monarchical.

It was ever my Thoughts, that kingly Government was the beſt of all, juſtly executed: I mean, ſuch as by our ancient Laws; that is, a King, and a legal, free-choſen Parliament. The King having, as I conceive, Power enough to make him great, the People alſo as much Property as to make them happy; they being, as it were, contracted to one another. And who will deny me, that this was not the juſt-constituted Government of our Nation? How abſurd is it then for Men of Senſe to maintain, That, though the one Party of this Contract breaketh all Conditions, the other ſhould be oblig'd to perform their Part? No; this Error is contrary to the Law of God, the Law of Nations, and the Law of Reaſon. It was therefore in the Defence of this Party, in their juſt Rights and Liberties, againſt Popery and Slavery."

At which Words they beat the Drums, and he proceeded thus:

"They need not trouble themſelves, for I ſhall ſay no more of my Mind on that Subject, ſince they are ſo diſtinguiſhed as to interrupt a dying Man, only to aſſure the People, that I adhere to the true Proteſtant Religion, deteſting the erroneous Opinions of many that call themſelves ſo; and I die this Day in the Defence of the ancient Laws and Liberties of theſe Nations: And tho' God, for Reaſons beſt known to himſelf, hath not ſeen it fit to honour us, as to make us the Inſtruments for the Deliverance of his People; yet as I have liv'd, ſo I die, in the Faith, that he will ſpeedily ariſe for the Deliverance of his Church and People. And I deſire of all you to prepare for this with Speed. I may ſay, This is a deluded Generation, veiled with Ignorance, that though Popery and Slavery be riding in upon them, do not perceive it; tho' I am ſure there was no Man born mark'd of God above another; for none comes into the World with a Saddle on his Back, neither any boot'd and ſpur'd to ride him; nor but that I am well ſatisfy'd, that God hath wiſely order'd different Stations for Men in the World, as I have already ſaid: Kings having, as much Power as to make them great, and the People as much Property as to make them happy: And, to conclude, I shall only add my Wishes for the Salvation of all Men, who were created for that End.<sup>19</sup>

His Face and Manner were as resolute as his Words; and, tho' he was still unable to stand, without the Support of two Men, he seem'd to triumph over his own Weakness, and indeed over Death itself: He saluted the People cheerfully, he pray'd fervently, he took his last Leave of the World heroically, and in every Instance demonstrated, that he was fit for the great Work he had undertaken, of contending for the Liberties of Mankind.

Monmouth's Expedition.

We are now to wait on his Grace of Monmouth, who set out from Amsterdam May 24, in a small Shallop, in order to embark on board his little Fleet, which waited for him in the Mouth of the Tees; but met with such contrary Winds, that he could not reach them till the 30th following; in which time Skelton had got Intelligence of what was in agitation, and had caus'd the Duke's Ship to be laid under Arrest; but the next Day they broke thro' it, and set sail: The whole of his Strength consisted but of one Ship of thirty-two Guns, and two Tenders; the King had many Cruisers at Sea to intercept him; the Wind was still in his Teeth, and continued to thro' the Whole of his Passage; which accounts for the long Interval of Time between Angle's Landing and his, and frees him from all Blame on that Account: He nevertheless made a shift to reach the Port of Lime (in Dorsetshire) in Safety, June 11, and landed about nine o' Clock in the Evening, without Opposition; the Duke himself, as soon as he set Foot on shore, falling on his Knees, and the rest of his Company following his Example, while he put up a short Thanksgiving for the Dangers they had already escap'd, and earnestly besought the Almighty to grant them his farther Protection. He then marshal'd his little Army, [which, according to some, and those the best-informed, consisted but of eighty-two Persons; but, according to others, of about a hundred and fifty] on the Sands, and march'd at their Head towards the Town, which was neither prepar'd nor dispos'd to resist him: On being come into the Market-place, he set up his Standard, exercis'd his Men, and being assur'd what his Purpose was, made answer, To secure the Protestant Religion, and extirpate Popery; in which Cause he invited the Country to join him: And so captivating was his Person to the People, and so specious his Pretensions, that the next and the following Days such Numbers crowded in to him, that his Commisaries had full Employment, in taking their Names, and supplying them with Arms.

He lands at Lime.

[Bloody Asses, Eckard, Weiswood, Com. Journ.]

This sudden and surprising Success must be attributed to his Declaration; which was compos'd by Fergufon, and which, however long, ill-tem'd, and full of black and dull Malice, as Bishop Burnet characterizes it, coincided perfectly with the Prejudices and Passions of those it was principally address'd to; and, of course, was well calculated to answer the great Ends in view. It was call'd, "The Declaration of James Duke of Monmouth, and the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Commons, now in Arms for the Defence of the Protestant Religion, and Vindication of the Laws, Rights, and Privileges of England, from the Invasion made upon them, and for delivering the Nation from the Usurpation and Tyranny of James Duke of York; and had for its Basis the following self-evident Propositions, viz. 1. Government was not instituted for the private Interest or personal Greatness of the Governors, but the Security and Protection of the Govern'd. 2. It cannot be imagin'd, that Mankind would part with their Power to arm their Governors against themselves, or to be render'd more miserable than they were, in the State of Nature. These Generals having been thus laid down, a Transition was instantly made to the peculiar Case of England. In our Constitution, it was observ'd, both Religion and Liberty were fenced and hedged round by all the Laws that the Wisdom of Man could devise, to preserve both from Encroachments; yet such had been the Management of Affairs for many Years past, that the Power of the Crown had been apply'd wholly to the Destruction of the People: The Duke of York was then made answerable for this notorious Perversion; was describ'd as a Man of immoderate Ambition, as panting after absolute Dominion, and as desirous of introducing popish Idolatry, in order to obtain it: That the Constitution itself had given way and sunk under the Weight of his oppressive Administration, was the next thing endeavour'd to be prov'd; and among the Particulars mention'd, the corrupting of Parliaments was the first: It was by the way also observ'd, That the People, by parting with the Power of electing their own Sheriffs, and the Command of their own Militia (which last Surrender is plac'd to the Account of a brid'd Parliament) were become naked of all Defence, and had found no Security in bare Laws, or the Words and Promises of Princes, while unable to enforce the Performance of them: That the Edge of the very Laws made for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion had, thro' the Corruption of Judges, been turn'd against Protestants: That, by the means of Sheriffs as corrupt, even Juries themselves, which the good old Laws of the Land had provided as an insurmountable Barrier between the Subject and Oppression, had on the contrary prov'd a Snare to them, and had

A. D. 1685. had only serv'd to give a Colour to their Ruin: That it was from the Power of executing of Laws, proroguing and dissolving Parliaments at Will and Pleasure, before the Petitions of the People were heard, or their Grievances redress'd; of placing and displacing Judges, as if their Oath and Office were to be the Tools of a Court, and not the upright Arbiters between King, and People, &c. the said Duke of York, and the rest of the Conspirators, were enabled to prosecute their arbitrary and tyrannical Purposes, without Fear of Punishment. Then descending to Particulars, they charg'd on the said Duke the Burning of London, and the Prorogation of the Parliament, when in prosecution thereof, the shutting up of the Exchequer, whereby the People were defrauded of twelve hundred thousand Pounds sterling, and upwards; the Breach of the Triple League, whereby Europe was involved in a bloody and expensive War, and the Protestant Interest almost ruin'd; the Popish Plot; the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey in order to stifle it; the many forged Plots against the Patriots of our Country, and the Protestant Religion; the frequent Dissolutions and Prorogations of Parliament, to prevent their securing of the Protestant Religion at home, and giving Succour to the Protestants abroad; the imposing a malignant Mayor and Sheriffs on the City of London by Fraud and Force, and justifying the same by infamous Judges branded by Parliament, and laying Punishment on the Innocent, who in discharge of their Duties oppos'd it; the violent seizing of Charters, and more especially that of the City of London, being the last Place wherein any Mark remain'd of the ancient Government, by electing of Sheriffs by the People; the barbarous Murder of Arthur Earl of Essex, in the Tower; and of several others, to conceal it; the most unjust Condemnation of William Lord Russell, and Colonel Algernon Sydney, being only accused, for meeting in discharge of their Duty to God and their Country, to consult of extraordinary yet lawful Means to rescue our Religion and Liberties from the Hands of Violence, when all ordinary Means according to the Laws were deny'd and obstructed; the illegal Delivery of the popish Lords out of the Tower; the unparallel'd Execution and Murder of Sir Thomas Armstrong, without a Trial, the eluding and breaking thro' the Act of Parliament, made in the late King's Time, for calling and holding a Parliament once in three Years; and, after all, the poisoning the late King, to prevent the Discovery and Punishment of the Murder of the said Earl of Essex, and to make way for the said Duke of York to the Throne.

Not satisfy'd with all this, they say, that the whole Series of his Life had been one continued Conspiracy against the People; and that, by the Example and Encouragement of the Conspirators, this Nation, once so famous for Virtue and Honour, was overspread with all the Vices that had any where prevail'd in the worst of Times; and was become the Scorn, Scandal, and Reprach of the Nations round about.

What follow'd next was a Summary of the said Duke's Conduct, since his intruding into the Throne; [the Words of the Declaration] which began, say they, with an impudent and barefac'd Avowal of the Romish Religion, in defiance of the Laws and Statutes of the Realm: The arbitrary Seizure of the Customs made the second Article: And the third, That he had attempted the utter Subversion of all the Laws and Liberties of the People, by packing together, by colour of new and illegal Charters, false Returns, and other corrupt Means, a Company of Men, which he fill'd a Parliament.

Then coming to the Use of all, they proceed to say, That, unless they could rectify'd to see the Protestant Religion extirpated, Popery establish'd, and Liberty trampled under-foot; unless they could forget the Example of their noble and generous Ancestors, their Duty to God, their Country, and Posterity; and unless they could be deaf to the Groans and Cries of their suffering Friends, they were indispensably oblig'd to have recourse to Arms; which they should not have done, had they not been depriv'd by their Enemies of all other Means of Redress; and were not the Miseries impending over the Nation worse than War itself. For these Reasons they charge all the Guilt and Calamity of that War upon them, and solemnly appeal to Almighty God, the Searcher of Hearts, that they have not rush'd on that cruel Experiment, either from any corrupt or private Concernment whatever, but out of Necessity, for Self-preservation, and to preserve their Country from Ruin. They then proclaim the Duke of York a Traitor, a Tyrant, a Popish Usurper, a Murderer, and an utter Enemy to all things that are good; enter into a reciprocal Engagement to prosecute him and all his Adherents with War, till they had brought him to Justice; and that they would not separate themselves, nor lay down their Arms, till the Liberties of the People were restor'd, and the Protestant Religion was secur'd: And yet further, that they would do their utmost Endeavour to procure the several Laws, Rights, and Privileges following:

1. That no (a) Protestant, of what Persuasion soever, shall, for the future, be molested or troubled for the Exercise of Religion.
2. That Parliaments shall be annually chosen and held, and shall not be prorog'd, dissolv'd, or discontinu'd within the Year, till Petitions shall be answer'd and Grievances redress'd.
3. That Sheriffs shall annually be elect-ed by the Freeholders of the County; and that the Militia Act shall be repeal'd, and some way found out for settling the Militia, which shall shall be commanded by the Sheriffs: And that no other standing Force shall be allow'd without the Consent of the Parliament.

4. And lastly, That the Corporation Act be repeal'd, and that the Cities and Corporations be restor'd to their ancient Charters and Freedoms.

They also declar'd, That all late Judgments given against them, and all Surrenders made by a corrupt and perjur'd Party amongst themselves, were null and void in Law; That their old Charters were good and valid, notwithstanding the said Surrender; And that they invited and encourag'd all honest Burgeses and Freemen to reassume the Rights and Privileges which by the said Charters belong'd to their respective Corporations: And that they would deliver themselves from those Court Parasites and Instruments of Tyranny fit up to oppress them.

To all this was added, That they would come to no Capitulation with the said Duke of York: That they would prosecute to Destruction all that continued to adhere to him; and that they would receive to Mercy any of his former Tools, who should atone for their past Mis-conduct, by joining in the present great Work of redeeming their Country. The Duke of Monmouth, also, for himself, declar'd, That tho' it had been, and still was, believ'd, that he had a legitimate Right to the three Crowns, &c. of which he made no Doubt to give the World full Satisfaction, notwithstanding the Means used by the late King his Father, upon Popish Motives, and at the Instigation of James Duke of York, to weaken and obscure it: Yet such was the Generosity of his own Nature, and such the Love he bore the Nation, whose Welfare and Settlement he infinitely prefer'd to whatsoever might concern himself, that he would, for the present, waive all Disputes as to that Matter, and leave all those his Rights and Pretensions, and the settling of the Government, to the Wisdom, Justice, and Authority of a Parliament duly chosen and acting with Freedom; and most solemnly promis'd, by all that was sacred, that, in Conjunction with the People of England, he would employ all the Abilities bestow'd on him by God and Nature, for the Preservation and Establishment of the Reformed Protestant Religion, the Reformation of Manners, the Vindication of the Laws of the Land, the Rights of the People, the Furtherance of the Articles before specify'd, and whatsoever else might conduce to the Peace, Happiness, and Safety of this Nation; and the putting it out of the Power of any Person, whatsoever, hereafter, to deprive the good People of their Rights, or defeat the Ends of Government.

And the last Article of all was express'd in these awful Words: "And we do appeal unto the Great God concerning the Justice of our Cause, and implore his Aid and Assistance, that he would enable us to go forth in his Name, and to do valiantly against his and our Enemies, for he it is that knows we have not chosen to engage in Arms for private and corrupt Ends or Designs, but out of a deep Sense of our Duty; we therefore commit our Cause unto him who is the Lord of Hosts, and the God of Battles."

It must be acknowledg'd these were great and tempting Offers; and as great Numbers of the People had grievously smarted for the want of those very Restrictions on one hand, and Indulgences on the other, it is scarce to be wonder'd, that the Discontented, the Persecuted, the Zealous, and the Unwary, crowd'd in to him on all Sides, either to share with him in the Spoils, or partake of the Glory in establishing a System of Government that promis'd to fair to incorporate Power and Liberty.

About an Hour after the Duke landed, the Mayor of Lime, and the principal Officer of the Customs of that Place, set out Post for London with the News, which was communicated by the King to both Houses, and produc'd immediate Votes to stand by his Majesty with Lives and Fortunes, according to Custom on the like Occasions. The Commons, moreover, made it their humble Request, and gave it as their humble Advice to his Majesty, That he would be pleas'd to take care of his Royal Person. They also brought in a Bill of Attainder against the Duke of Monmouth, with an additional Prayer, that his Majesty would be pleas'd to set a Reward of 5000*l.* on his Head; concurr'd with the Lords in an Order for burning his Declaration by the Hands of the common Hangman; and added a Clause to the Bill of Supply; by which it was made High Treason to assert the Legitimacy of the said Duke; and, in Conformity to a Message from his Majesty, by the Earl of Middleton, desiring they would provide a good Fund for a present Sum of Money, to answer the immediate Charge of quelling the Rebellion in the West, resolv'd, That a Supply, not exceeding 400,000*l.* be given to his Majesty for his present extraordinary Occasions.

Thus all the Help that could be deriv'd from the Legislature, to keep the Crown steady on his Majesty's Head, he was immediately put in Possession of; and, as before in Scotland, he had already made Use of all the Power of the Prerogative, by way of Precaution against so enterprizing and popular an Enemy: As the Duke's Interest lay principally in the West and North-west Parts of the Kingdom, the several Lords Lieutenant of Devonshire, Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire, had receiv'd Orders to draw out the whole Poise of those several Counties; but with Orders not to proceed to Action, if it could be avoided, till they were join'd by some of his Majesty's regular Forces.

It appears the Duke of Albemarle, who had that Command in Devonshire, was actually in Arms, when the Duke of Monmouth landed at Lime; for on the third Day afterwards, we find, that certain of his Forces were in Possession of Bridport, which is but six Miles from Lime; and that the Invader was thus early in a Condition to detach a Party of 300 Men to storm that Town; which they actually did, much to their Reputation, and made their Retreat afterwards in good Order,

Lord Grey's
Cowardice.[Ferguson's
MS. in Ech.

Order, and with little Loss: But this Shew of Spirit in his Men, was miserably overbalanced by the ill Conduct of his Officers. Lord Grey, who was intrusted with the Command in this little Expedition, deserted his Men without striking a Blow; and, returning full speed to Lime, brought the News of a Defeat, when his Party had actually obtain'd a Victory. "The Duke, says Bishop Burns, was much struck with this, when he found the Person on whom he depended most, and for whom he design'd the Command of the Horse, had already made himself infamous by his Cowardice." But Lord Grey did not act more absurdly as a Soldier in this Instance, than the Duke himself as a General; which he was given to understand very freely by Colonel Mattews; for his Grace saying, What shall I do with him? the other reply'd, There is not a General in Europe that would ask such a Question, but yourself. On the other hand, Pletcher of Saltsou, who was to have been join'd with Lord Grey in the Command of the Horse, and who was order'd out with another Party, either thinking, that all things were in common, in such Adventures as these, or that Superiority of Rank entitl'd him to make as free with Property as Persons, equip'd himself with the Horse of one who was just come from Taunton to join his Grace, and who deserv'd so much the more Consideration, in regard he had brought a large Body of Volunteers with him. This Man, brutal by Nature, and proud of his present Importance, when Pletcher return'd, not only accosted him with very provoking Language, but held up his Cane in a threatening Manner, which so highly enrag'd Pletcher, that he discharg'd a Pistol, and shot him dead on the Spot. So rash and violent an Action as this very ill agreed with the pious Spirit of his Grace's Declaration, and had a very ill Effect on his Affairs: The murder'd Man's Followers immediately espous'd his Quarrel, and came in a Body with their Complaints to the Duke, who now thought himself under the desperate Necessity of dismissing an Officer who had Courage, and of continuing to employ one that had none.

But, notwithstanding this ill Accident, his Affairs seem'd to wear a more florid Aspect every Day than the other, such Numbers pouring in to him, on all Sides, that he had not Arms to supply them. Having thus done all he could hope to do at Lime, on the 4th Day after his landing, he march'd out of that Place at the Head of almost two thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. The Rout he took was for Asmister, a small Town at about four Miles Distance; and when Midway, discover'd on the other Side of it, the Duke of Albmarle at the Head of about four thousand of the Devonshire Militia; who thinking it impossible that Monmouth should have gather'd such a Strength in so short a time, was pulsing on; in order to storm his Quarters in Lime, and make the first Stage of his Expedition the last: But finding him, on the contrary, so well prepar'd to receive him, being restrain'd also by the Orders above mention'd, and apprehending his Men were more inclin'd to revolt, than to do their Duty, he, all at once wheel'd about, when within a Quarter of a Mile of Asmister, in great Disorder and Confusion: And had his Grace of Monmouth, who had drawn up his Forces in that Place, taken the advantage and flank'd them on a flying Enemy, he had certainly much advantag'd his Cause: For he would in Consequence have had a new Supply of Arms, his Power and his Reputation would have increas'd together; and he might have made his way good to the Gates of Exeter, in two Days, without any great Opposition. The Matter, it seems, was debated, and over-ruled by the Duke himself; who, having a worse Opinion of his irregular Troops, than in fact they deserv'd, and forgetting that the Militia were little better, declar'd, "It was not his Business to fight yet, till his Men were a little disciplin'd; but rather to make up into the Country as fast as possible, to meet his Friends." Not questioning but there would have been Commotions in several Parts of the Kingdom, on the News of his Success. But of these Friends of his, some had been secur'd by Order of the King and Council, by way of Prevention: And the rest, it seems, were Persons of such Discretion, that they chose rather to lye in wait for his Success, than to partake of his Dangers.

From Asmister he proceeded on to Taunton, where his Reception was such as indeed manifest'd, that he had the Hearts of the People; for they strew'd his Way with Herbs and Flowers; the Emblems of his own short-ly'd Prosperity! they rent the Air with Acclamations; they set open their Houses to his little Army; they supply'd him with all the Necessaries in their Power: Twenty-six young Maids presented him with Colours, in the Name of the Townsmen, as also a Bible; which gave his Grace an Opportunity to say, That he had taken the Field with a Design to defend the Truth contain'd in that Book, and to seal it with his Blood, if there was Occasion.

Possibly this latter Ceremonial was but a preparatory Step to his assuming the Title of King; for Defender of the Faith, is a Part of the Style Royal; and the very Day after he had made this notable Advance, he was induc'd by evil Counsellors, "And I have been assur'd, says Oldmixon, by Persons who were with him, and in his Confidence, by that Arch-Traitor and Villain, Ferguson, to go the rest of the way. But Ferguson, himself, declares, and calls upon Mr. Hook, the Duke's Chaplain, to bear him Witness, that he disput'd the Convenience of his assuming the Kingship, at that juncture; with all the Strength and Vigour of Mind he was Master of.

He also asserts, "That it was not from Ambition that he chose at that Juncture to take upon him the Royal Style, but that it proceeded from a Necessity he conceiv'd himself under, in order the better to pursue and attain those Ends of his Declaration, wherein the Deliverance and Safety of his People were concern'd. He judg'd it to be the giving the Enemy too much Advantage, thro' the Duke of York's being in the Throne and de facto King, of Proclaiming us all to be Traitors, without putting himself into a Capacity by taking the Royal Title, of charging that upon his Party, of which they accus'd and criminated ours. For whatsoever Mens Inclinations were towards us, yet if they were any ways sagacious, they could not but see a vast Difference between adhering to the Duke of York, which the Duke of Monmouth, without assuming the Name of King, could not threaten to punish as a Crime, and the promoting his Grace's Interest, while it was branded with the Name, and stood liable to the Penalties of High Treason. Accordingly he had not only Messengers from great Gentlemen, but was told by several Non-conforming Ministers that came into the Camp, That unless he took the Style of King, none who had Estates to lose, would venture themselves in his Quarrel. This I heard often said by many, and particularly in a Meeting where several were assembled from different Parts of the Country to advise and persuade him to assume the Kingship."

Another Writer, who has been very closely follow'd by our Historians, has these Words: "Nothing now would content the Country, but he must be proclaim'd King, which he seem'd exceedingly averse to, and really I am of Opinion, from his very Heart. They said the Reason why the Gentry of England mov'd not, was, because he came on a Commonwealth Principle. This being the Cry of all the Army, he was forc'd to yield to it: And accordingly on Saturday Morning, June 20, he was proclaim'd." Then as to the Consequences of this bold Step, Ferguson, farther explains them in these Words:

"Nor did it appear, that the Duke's assuming the Regal Title discourag'd Men from coming to our Assistance, since we not only enroll'd a whole Regiment of Foot, besides Horie, at Taunton, where he was first proclaim'd, but greater Numbers presented themselves afterwards to offer their Service, than we had found and observ'd before: Tho' by reason of our wanting Arms wherewith to supply them, there was not that Proportion continu'd with us, as there did of those who join'd us ere our Stores were empty; but they were forc'd to return home, and we necessitated to allow it, being destitute of Weapons to bestow upon them."

We learn, indeed, from the same Author, that Colonel Dawvers, who was deep in the Duke's Secret, and who had even engag'd to form a Rising in London on his Behalf, afterwards pleaded his Grace's taking upon him the Kingship, contrary to his Declaration, in Excuse for his own Breach of Promise. But then he (Ferguson) farther asserts, That Dawvers, himself, actually advis'd him to do so, before he set sail from Holland: That when he was inform'd of his being actually proclaim'd, he said, "That it would be of more Advantage and Importance to him than twenty thousand Men; that he afterwards sent two Messengers to the Duke to re-assure him of his Readiness to declare for him in the City, as soon as he should receive his Grace's Commands to authorize it: And that the true Reason why he fail'd him, was his own Cowardice and Baseness; which deterr'd him from making good his Engagements, against the repeated Importunities of those who were embark'd in the same Cause; as had been foretold by Major Perret; who, as often as the Duke express'd any Dependence on his Efforts, declar'd, "He had no Truth nor Valour; and that his Fear would lead him to frustrate whatever his Confidence prompted him to undertake."

And finally, as to the Inconsistence of this Proceeding of the Duke's with regard to the Letter of his Declaration, and his Engagements to the Earl of Argyle, &c. Ferguson endeavours to extenuate it as follows:

"And tho' the Duke's taking the regal Style, might seem a Departing from the Words of his Declaration, yet it was very consonant to the Clame he made in it, and most agreeable to several Clauses therein affirm'd and asserted. For as the declaring against James Duke of York as an Usurper, and the publishing himself to be the lawful and legitimate Son of King Charles the Second, was a plain claiming his being King de jure; so whether he should assume the Name (abstracting from his Promise) Discretion and Modesty, and not Right and Justice, were concern'd; and consequently [Here something is omitted by our Author.] to be a King, provided all the other Parts of his Declaration stood secur'd, in which he might accommodate himself to the Necessity of his Affairs, and comply best with those Measures that had the greatest Tendency to his Success; which he believ'd the assuming the Name of King would do. And therefore, as he in a second Declaration, after he had taken the Royal Title, confirm'd and secur'd all the other Parts, Promises and Engagements of his first; so he signify'd the Grounds that had made him recede from the Clause in the first, that barr'd his claiming the Name of King, without the Concurrence of a Parliament, hoping that the Necessity which enforc'd him to it, would have justify'd it."

But if the Duke was really invited by any Men of Rank and Estate, to take upon him the Style and Title of King, they made him but very scurry Returns for his Complaisance; for whatever Numbers flow'd in upon him, after his Proclamation, they were, in general, as before, the Dregs of the People, or Tradesmen of the middling Rank, with little more than a Sprinkling of the inferior Gentry. So that his nominal Reign had, from the very Beginning, a farce-like Aspect; and he himself appear'd to be no other than the King of the Mob.

He ventur'd, however, to distinguish the first Day of his Reign by certain Acts of Royalty: Such as a Proclamation setting a Price on the King's Head, as his Majesty had before done by him; a second, declaring the Parliament to be a salutous Assembly, and threatening, if they did not separate them-

He sent forth three Proclamations.

A. D. 1685. selves before the End of June, to authorize his Subjects to proceed against them as Rebels and Traitors; and a third, requiring the Duke of Albemarle, who lay with his Militia within six Miles of Taunton, to lay down his Arms immediately, and in case of Refusal denouncing him a Traitor.

[Richard, Orlisson.] To give the more Weight to the last of these Edicts, he sent a Letter to the Duke of Albemarle, and also another to Lord Churchill, who lay at Charl with some regular Troops, inviting both to join him; but without Effect: The Latter made a Jest of the Summons, and the Former sent for Answer, "That he was a Subject to James the Second, the late King's Brother; that he knew no other Lord; and intimated farther, that his Grace had better have let his Rebellion alone."

The next Day the Duke march'd from Taunton; but not to fight or dislodge his Grace of Albemarle, who lay so near him: He was still, it seems, afraid to trust his Irregulars in a Battle; and still perswaded himself, that the longer they were in Arms, the better Use they would make of them; as also that the longer he delay'd coming to Action, the more powerful he should become. But then he did not sufficiently consider, that the King's Resources were infinitely greater than his; that according to the Time allow'd him to make use of them, would be his Strength; and that if he (Mounmouth) could not venture to attack the Militia, whom his Majesty himself could not venture to depend upon, the postponing the Dispute till the disciplin'd Troops came up, would double the Odds against him. Human Reason is never infallible; but, in such Adventures as these, it is most liable to Deception and Infatuation: And it is a much easier Task to refine on past Actions, than to furnish wise Expedients under present Difficulties: That therefore, of the two Ways before him, the Duke should chuse the worst, is so much the less to be wonder'd at; more particularly, when we further reflect, that the very Dream of being a King might so far get the better of his Understanding, as to render him unwilling to incur the least Danger of being scold'd.

When he march'd from Taunton to Bridgewater, his Army was between five and six thousand strong, all in good Heart and Spirit, if not precis'd in the Rules of War: And as he had not thought fit to attack the Duke of Albemarle, to neither did the Duke of Albemarle think fit to interrupt him. The two Towns were but eight Miles asunder; the same Spirit prevail'd in both; and the Example which the former had set, the latter very gladly follow'd, by proclaiming him a second time (the Mayor and Burgesses assisting in their Formalities) lodging him in the Castle, providing liberally for his Soldiers, and contributing all the Money they could raise to his further Support. Here he divided his Forces into six Regiments, and began to make them acquainted with the Rudiments of War: Out of above thousand Horse of various sort, we are farther told, he made a slight to form two very good Troops, besides a Life-Guard of forty Volunteers, who serv'd him at their own Charge. And thus he was, in some sort, equip'd with the State of a King, as well as the shew of an Army: And had many of the Friends he so much depended upon, at this Juncture, supply'd him but with Money and Arms, he had bid fair for the Kingdom, without their personal Appearance to do Honour to his Cause: But for want of these Essentials, he was every Day forc'd to dismiss thousands of the Populace, who crowded to follow his Ensigns: And it is plain he was more discourag'd with the Disappointments that befel him on one hand, than elated with the Successes he met with on the other.

Having receiv'd this additional Countenance, and gain'd this additional Strength, at Bridgewater, he pass'd on to Gloucester, and thence to Wells, where he was again proclaim'd; and here he came to a Resolution of great Importance, which was, to march over Mendip-Hills to Bristol: Wade and Roe, both Bristol-men, and both proscrib'd on account of the Rye Conspiracy, had given him repeated Assurances, that the Majority of the Inhabitants were in his Interest, and at his Devotion; and that the Militia, who kept Garrison there under the Duke of Beaufort would make no Resistance. These were powerful Inducements; and the Duke was so far govern'd by them, that he march'd as far as Cainham, a little Village within three or four Miles of Bristol, with a Purpose, as it was generally believ'd, to make an Attempt on that Place the next Morning. But while his Men were refreshing themselves there in full Security, a Party of Horse commanded by Colonel Oglethorpe fell in with them before they were perceiv'd; and were, themselves, surpris'd with an unexpected Resistance; for as the Mounmouth Men were not aware of any Enemy, so they took the Mounmouth Men for Friends: A slight Skirmish follow'd, in which Oglethorpe, being overpower'd with Numbers, was forc'd to retire. But it does not appear, that there was any Pursuit, or that the Royalists thought of returning to the Charge; which, on the Duke's Side, is Matter of Astonishment; for his Horis was superior in Number to these; and tho' the latter were within reach of a Body of Foot, the Odds were still on his Side, and he could scarce hope to conduct a War against the Power of the Crown on any better Principle, than that of engaging it piecemeal. What was still worse, and more unaccountable, this little Adventure deterr'd him from pushing his Design on Bristol: For, it seems, these Parties in his Way were regular Forces, who had been sent on purpose to assist in the Defence of Bristol; and he had to high a Notion of Discipline, that he scarce thought it possible for Irregulars to make their Party good against them. And hence, by a strange Fatality every Argument that was made Use of to shew the vast Consequence of his mighty Acquisition, only serv'd to make him despair of succeeding in it. In vain the Wade and Roe retrouble their Importunities, and offer

He foresaw Difficulties which seem'd insurmountable, and therefore gave over the Enterprize, when in Sight of the Place: And when, according to Oldmixon, a Conspiracy was actually form'd in the City to receive him, as appear'd by their setting Fire to a Ship in the River, on a false Alarm of his Approach, to draw the Militia that way, while his Friends admitted him.

But this traditionary Story has been told differently by some of the Inhabitants of that Place: For, according to them, the Duke of Beaufort, justly apprehending that while he endeavour'd to oppose the Enemy without, there would be a Sedition within, gave Notice, that the very Moment the Citizens took any such dilloyal Step, he would fire the Town about their Ears: They add, That this Menace was carry'd to the Duke of Monmouth at the Instant the Ship was fir'd in the River: Upon which, taking it for granted, that the Experiment was already making on those who were deem'd most devoted to his Cause, and being touch'd with a quicker Sense of Compassion, than is consistent with the Purposes of Ambition, and the Trade of War, he said, "God forbid that I should be accessory to the Ruin of my Friends, or that, for any Consideration, I should subject so great a City to the double Calamity of Sword and Fire:" And gave immediate Orders for his Troops to face about, and take the Road to Bath. Those who were most anxious for his Grace's Success express'd the most Concern and Uneasiness, that he should thus desist from the only Enterprize that, according to the common Course of things, could have smooth'd his way to the Throne. Brissel abounded with Riches, Arms, and Stores of all Sorts. And had the Duke got Possession of it, he would thereby have been enabled to arm and pay a much greater Force than the King had as yet to oppose him; for the whole of his Majesty's regular Forces did not exceed seven thousand. But, say they, "God saw it not fit for us, and over-ruled our Consultations to our own Ruin: For this was the Top of our Prosperity; and yet all the while, not a Gentleman more than went (sic) over with us came to our Assistance."

When the Duke came before Bath, he sent in a Trompet to summon the Place to surrender; which they not only refus'd, but treated his Herald with the utmost Barbarity. And this cruel Affront he was oblig'd to overlook: For the Earl of Feverham, with the King's Forces, was in Sight on the Hills, on the other Side of the City; and the Duke was not yet resolv'd to face him. Thus, doubly disappointed, he, the very same Day, whistled about for Philipparton, in Hopes to strengthen himself by Deserters from the several Bodies of Militia that hover'd round him, the Majority of whom, we are told, were so well affected towards him, that they only long'd for a fair Opportunity to go over to him. But here his Quarters were a second time beat up by a Party of 500 Horse, which had been detach'd by Lord Feverham, under the Command of the Duke of Groston (the Duke's Half-brother) to insult their Rear. A sharp Skirmish ensu'd; which was maintain'd with great Obstinacy on both Sides for above an Hour, when the Monmouth-Men became victorious, and the Royalists retir'd, the Duke of Groston, himself, having some Difficulty to make his Escape: But Lord Feverham coming up with the rest of his Forces, there was no Pursuit. And now both Armies drew up within a Mile of each other, and began a mutual Canonade; when, all at once, the Royalists, not caring to fight in the Rain, it seems, which fell in great Plenty that Day, retreated to Bradford, and left his Grace at Liberty to prosecute his March to Frome; which he did the same Evening without making any new Attempt on the Enemy.

Frome was as warmly and cordially attach'd to him, as Tunton or Bridgewater, and gave him a suitable Reception: But the Joy the Inhabitants express'd, and the Welcome they gave him, did not atone for the Disappointments and Mortifications, which now began to thicken upon him on every Side. He had depended on a Supply of Arms at this Place; but, a few Days before his Arrival (x) they had fallen into the Hands of the Enemy. He had scarce had time to ruminate on this Misfortune before he receiv'd Intelligence of Argyle's Defeat: And while he was yet stunn'd with a Blow he so little expected, by another ill-boding Messenger, he was inform'd, that Lord Feverham, now reinforc'd with a Train of 30 Field-pieces, was again upon his March to give him Battle. In Addition to all this, he saw, that for want of Arms it was impossible for him to increase his Forces: And that for want of Money, it was equally impossible to subsist those he had: And now the Diffidence, which had been hitherto visible in all his Actions, turn'd to Despair. He call'd a Council, 'tis true, but then the Subject-Matter of Deliberation was how to provide for their own Safety, not how to make one great Effort, that Fortune might have it in her Power to declare for him at last; which shew'd that the Undertaking he had engag'd in, was beyond his Genius, as well as his Strength. The Result was, that, seeing they durst not face a superior Enemy in the open Country, the wisest Course would be to retire to Bridgewater, and there remain on the Defensive, till it should appear whether Danvers would seize the Opportunity, which the Absence of the best and greatest [x] There had been a Rising in this Place some Days before, in favour of the Duke, which was headed by the Con-table: But the Barbours Proctors, with a Party of the Wiltshire Militia, Horse and Foot, entering the Town, they drove down these Arms, and shot for it by which lucky Incident, the whole Town was plac'd at foot.

A. D. 1685.

Part of the King's Forces gave him, to begin the Rising in London, which he had so confidently promis'd: And in Case he fail'd them, that then those who came over with the Duke, should make the best of their way to Peal, in order to seize a Ship, and once more sail for Holland, leaving their wretched Followers to the Mercy of the Enemy.

He returns to Bridgewater.

A Disposition was made accordingly, and put in execution forthwith: But tho' they recover'd Bridgewater, July the 3d, without any Interruption, and were receiv'd as affectionately as before, the very Men themselves began to discover the Dependancy of their Leader; and were so dishearten'd by it, that, finding themselves within reach of their own Habitations, many of them withdrew, and return'd no more. But still the far greater Part stood their ground, and seem'd resolv'd to abide all Extremities. The next Day but one, July 4, the King's Troops, came to Summertown, and early the next Morning to Weyton, where they encamp'd on the Moor, within three Miles of Bridgewater, and immediately secur'd the great Pass or Road, by lining it on both Sides with their Artillery: So that now the Duke and his Forces were held at bay, and found themselves under a necessity to make that Experiment with the regular Troops, well supply'd with all things, which they had before too cautiously avoid'd even with the Militia.

King's Forces.

The Duke's first Purpose was to defend himself in the Town; in order to which, certain Works were to have been thrown up; but had Time given him to come to a much more gallant and sensible Resolution; for the Earl of Feverham not making any Offer to quit his Post and advance any further, the Duke, Lord Grey, and others of his chief Officers, in the Afternoon, took a Survey of their Camp from the Tower of Bridgewater, and by the Help of Glasses discover'd, that their Horse and Foot lay at some distance from each other; and that both were in such a Posture as argued, they rather despis'd than fear'd their Enemies; which was also confirm'd by the Country-people: And hence it was immediately resolv'd, in a Council of War, to march out in the Night, and attack them in their Camp; the Duke himself, as we are told, growing sanguine enough to declare, from what he had seen and heard,

"That they should have no more to do than to lock up the Stable-doors, and seize the Troopers in their Beds." But his Grace was not given to Gasconading; and if there is any Truth in what is told of him besides, namely, That he should express some Concern on discovering, that Lord Dunbarton's Regiment of Foot-Guards, which he had once commanded himself, was posted at the very Pass where they were to make their Impression, saying, I know those Men will fight, and, if I had them, I would not doubt of Success, it is scarce to be suppos'd that he should, almost in the same Breath, speak with so much Respect of one single Corps of the King's Forces, and with so much Contempt of the Whole. However this may be, it is demonstrable, that the Resolution to surprize the King's Troops was sudden; for he had detach'd Captain Hewling the Day before, with two of his best Troops of Horse, to bring off some Cannon from Minburn, which he had certainly waited for, if the unguarded Posture of the Enemy had not invited him to overlook every other Consideration; and if he had not received positive Intelligence, that the Earl of Feverham would gather more Strength by every Day's Delay than he.

iii. p. 432.]

At Seven in the Evening his Troops were summon'd to their Rendezvous in the Casslefield, and by eleven they were all form'd, and began to march, without Sound of Drum; having receiv'd express Orders not to fire a Gun, till they were within the Enemy's Lines. The Duke put himself at the Head of the Foot; and, notwithstanding the Proof he had receiv'd of Lord Grey's Cowardice, and his being reminded of it in the Field by Matthews, was so fatally complainant as to say, I will not affront my Lord, and what I have given him in Charge is easy to be executed. It seems his Lordship's Orders (as we learn from a Sketch of the Battle, left by an Officer on the King's Side) were to wheel round the Edge of the Moor to the Village where the Horse were quarter'd, and to set fire to it; after which he was to fall on the Rear of the King's Foot, while the Duke in Person charg'd them in Front: And it is agreed on all hands, that a more rational Plan was never laid, or one that bid fairer for Success.

[Echard, p.

iii. p. 432.]

A young Maid of Bridgewater, according to the same Officer, who had got Intelligence of the Duke's Purpose, and who was a Well-wisher to the Royal Cause, made her Escape out of the Town, and posted to the Village with the News: But on being introduced to the commanding Officer, instead of giving her a Hearing, he most perfidiously debauch'd her; and she, enrag'd at the Violence that had been offer'd to her, kept the Secret in revenge for the Loss of her Honour: I saw her, said he, in the Fright and Disorder she was left in. And he adds, that most of the other Officers were drunk, and utterly void of all Apprehension of the Enemy.

There was a deep Ditch between the Moor and the Royal Camp, which greatly contributed to this shameful Security; for it was deem'd impassable: But in one Place it was otherwise; and there Lord Grey and the Horse were to have made their Charge; having been furnish'd with a Guide, who had been till then esteem'd incapable of Error: But now, according to some, he was to be confounded by his own Concern, that he led them above the Ford; according to others, they did not stay for his Direction; according to Ferguson, Lord Grey dismiss'd him as soon as they came in sight of the Enemy's Fires, and before they came to the Place where his Skill was chiefly of use: He also alleges, that one Hitcher, of Taunton, being offended with the Duke for not bestowing on him the Government of that Place, fir'd a Pistol, purposely to give the Enemy notice of their Approach, and then rode off full Speed to take the Benefit of a Proclamation emitted by the King, with an Offer of Pardon to all such as should return to their Duty by a certain Day (*). But the Officer before-quoted more naturally says, that the Royalists taking the Alarm about one o'Clock, on the Approach of Lord Grey and the Horse to their Out-guards, and in great Confusion demanding the Word; Answer was made, King Monmouth! upon which, Sir Henry Compton order'd those on Duty to fire; which they did; the immediate Consequence was, that Lord Grey and his whole Body of Horse took flight, and gallop'd off in the utmost Confusion, without firing a Pistol, or striking a Blow. All agree, that the Duke's Orders were never executed, and the Misbehaviour of the Horse gave the Enemy Time to recover their Surprise, and to put themselves in a Posture to receive and return the Charge.

On the other hand, our Officer further observes, that the Duke himself waited too long in Expectation of the Signal of Lord Grey's Success by firing the Village, and so contributed to his own Misfortune: For had he pass'd the Ditch at once, and fell on without Hesitation, they would have been destroy'd before it had been possible for them to form; their Knowledge of Discipline would have been of little or no Use to them; all, in that Confusion, had been Irregulars alike: And as the Advantage of Numbers was of his Side, and his Disposition was already made, it is reasonable to think he would have carry'd all before him, at the first Impression; and when the Foot were wholly broken and scatter'd, it had been impossible for the Horse to have wrested the Victory out of his Hands. But it was his Curiosity to be too much and too little a Soldier. He was too much a Soldier in placing the Whole of his Hopes and Fears on Discipline; and too little, in not sufficiently discerning how far he might proceed without it. If his Men were inferior to the Royalists in point of Skill, they were equal in bodily Strength, and superior in Courage: They follow'd the Duke out of Love to his Person, and were inspir'd with his Cause, which they believ'd to be the Cause of God and their Country; and, in this fatal Action, gave him many signal Proofs, that had he rely'd on them more, they had serv'd him better. As soon as they had Leave to fall on, they forced their Way over the Ditch; and having drawn up on the other Side, began the Battle with so much Spirit and Bravery, that the Royalists gave way to the Shock, and fell into some Confusion. Here was another Opening to Success, which, according to our Officer, the Duke unhappily overlook'd: For, says he, as if he had been at the Head of regular Forces, he kept them in too good Order; whereas, if he had, on the contrary, suffer'd them to have rush'd in, after the first Discharge, (which, by levelling their Pieces too high, was not so effectual as it ought to have been) and to have ply'd their other Weapons, they had borne down all Opposition, and swept the Field: Whereas, by reversing this Conduct, the Royalists had Time to rally, and hid besides the Advantage of fighting in the Way which enabled them to make the best Defence, and do the most Execution. But this Mistake in their Commander did not deprive them of their Courage; on the contrary, they faced their too-much-dreaded Veterans Line to Line, and not only stood their ground with Firmness and Intrepidity, but fought as if every Individual expected a Kingdom for his Reward.

We have already observ'd, that the Royal Artillery had been planted on each Side of the great Road, for the Security of what was then thought the only accessible Pass to the Camp: But when the Mistake appear'd, and that every thing was to be dreaded from so desperate an Attack, Orders were given to change their Position, and to bring them to flank the Enemy. There was, it seems, among the Royalists a fighting (y) Bishop who acted as General of the Ordnance; and by the Help of his Coach-horses this important Point was brought to bear. Discharge upon Discharge follow'd, by which the Monmouth-Men suffer'd extremely; and yet it does not appear that the Duke order'd any Party to attack those who had them in Charge, either for the Relief of his own Forces, or to endeavour to turn them on the Enemy.—But, possibly, this Omission was owing to the continu'd ill Behaviour of his Horse; who tho' they had all this while kept in Sight, yet never made one Attempt either to cover the Foot, or even to make a Stand in their own Defence: For as often as Colonel Oglethorpe, with about two hundred Horse, which appears to have been all that had any Share in the Battle, made up to them, they fled like a Drive of Sheep from Place to Place, till he grew both weary and ashamed of following such fugitives; from whom no Mischief was to be apprehended, nor Honour to be gain'd. All at once, therefore, when the Bishop began to thunder with his great Guns, did he wheel about, and fell in on Monmouth's Rear; who, notwithstanding they were thus every way beset, continu'd to fight like Lions, till all their Stock of Ammunition was wasted, and they found it impossible to be supply'd with more: For the Runaway-Horse had communicated their Panic to those who had the Care of the Ammunition-waggons, who immediately drove off with

(*) And further, that he had been told, the said Hacker pleaded the Merit of the Admission examination of his Crime, at his Trial, before Jefferys, who reply'd, "That he, above all other Men, desired to be hang'd, that is to say, for being double a Traitor, to Monmouth, as well as to the King." But Hacker himself, in a Letter to a Friend, just before he was executed, makes use of these Words: "I also lie under a Reproach of being unfaithful upon Interest that I own'd; which I utterly deny." Black's Lives, p. 286.

with all the Speed they could make, and never once stop'd till they had got twelve Miles from the Field of Battle: And to complete the Ruin of the Day, as Peirsson tells the Story, Lord Grey rode full Speed to the Duke, who, during the whole Engagement, had hitherto acted up to the Height of his Character and Pretensions, in the midst of the Foot, telling him, That all was lost, and that it was more than time for him to fight for himself; which, it seems, his Grace too soon, too easily, and fatally, believ'd; and taught his Men to fly by his own Example; which was so much the more to be regretted, since another of his Officers was at the same time in quest of him, to conjure him to put himself at the Head of his Horse, who still hover'd in Parties up and down the Field, and to endeavour by his Presence and Authority to bring them to a Charge, which might yet have retriev'd all, and crown'd him with Victory and Glory. But his good Angel had forsook his Charge, and every predominant Star seem'd in full Commission to devote him to Destruction. About fifty of those heartless Wretches who had so signal-ly contributed to his Disgrace and Ruin in the Engagement, now follow'd him in his Retreat, which his valiant and faithful Infantry render'd safe and easy, in the first Stage at least, by contributing to fight and dye in their Ranks, till he could no longer hear the Groans of those that fell, nor the Shouts of those that conquer'd: At last they gave way, and retreated in Confusion; but, either so astonish'd were the Royalists with their unexpected Success, or so fearful were they, that the Enemy would yet rally, and make another Effort, that they did not venture to pursue (tho' it was broad Day, by that time the King's Fortune prevail'd) till some Hours after. At the Beginning of the Action Monmouth's Army was between 5 and 6000 Men strong; the King's no more than 2000 Foot and 700 Horse: And at the Close of it, according to the Gazette, the Loss on the Duke's Side was 2000; but, according to others, not above 700. To account for this Disparity, we must presume the former makes but one Article of those who were kill'd in the Heat of Action, and those who were massacred after it was over (when, says our Officer, the Fugitives were started from the Hedges, and Corn Fields, and shot like Game by the King's Soldiers) whereas, the latter make two distinct Items of those who fell in Arms, and those who were slaughter'd in cold Blood; and compute the last at 1000: Of the Loss on the King's Side, the Gazette is wholly silent; and those who rated it highest speak but of 400, tho' the Contest lasted full three Hours.

The same Officer yet farther relates, That the next Day the Earl of Feverisham march'd away from Salisbury with many poor Prisoners, ty'd together like Slaves, and making an Halt at the first great Sign-Post that stood across the Road, he commanded four or five of the poor Wretches to be hang'd upon it; of whom one Captain Adams, tho' mortally wounded was one; and would have gone on in that way of arbitrary Execution, if the Bishop of Bath and Wells (as the better Soldier and the better Lawyer too) had not come up and expostulated with him: My Lord, you know not what you do: This is Murder in the Face, and your Lordship may be call'd to account for it. These poor Rogues, were the Bastards' sons, must be try'd before they can be put to Death.

Bishop Kennet holds himself authoriz'd to say, "That this decisive Battle was a Day or two too soon; for immediately after, Capt. Hewling return'd with two of the bravest Troops of Horse, and the very next Day Mr. Vaughan of Southsejourne, would have join'd the Duke with 1000 Men; and Colonel Danvers and Sir Robert Peyton were just ready for a Rising in Essex, which would have given Opportunity for Multitudes in and about London to have join'd with them."

But then his Lordship does not seem to have known, that a large Body of Horse, and three of the Regiments of Foot sent by the States of Holland to the King's Assistance, were actually on the Road, to reinforce the Earl of Feverisham; and, by the whole Tenour of his Grace's Conduct, we have sufficient Reason to be convinc'd, that he did not look on Mr. Vaughan's Auxiliaries to be a Match for them: But it no where appears that these Auxiliaries were even assembled, much less on their March. And as to Colonel Danvers, Sir Robert Peyton, and the rest of his Friends, however probable it may be that they would have join'd him, in case he had been victorious, it is pretty plain they never intended it, till he was so.

The States had six British Regiments in their Service, namely, three English and three Scots; and at the King's Instance, they assisted him with all of them; and that with such Expedition, that the three above-mention'd, were landed at Gravesend before the End of June. And as to the Prince of Orange, we are told by Bishop Kennet, that he sent over his Favourite, Mr. Bentnick, with Instructions to acquaint his Majesty, that tho' he look'd upon the Duke of Monmouth to be a Man of no great Parts, yet that he had a Warlike Genius, and was better skill'd in the Military Art, than any the King had to employ against him; and therefore, if his Majesty pleas'd, he would not only lend him his Troops, but come in Person to head his Army. The same Officer had been before communicated to Skelton at the Hague; who was either so jealous of the Prince, or so malicious to him, that he gave the King Notice of it, with a wrong turn of Suspicion and Fear: So that the King put off Mont. Bentnick, with telling him, He should acquaint his Master that their common Interest did require the Prince's staying in Holland: And further, open'd his Mind to him in such Terms as sufficiently discover'd, he did not take his Highness's Zeal for his Service to be at that time reasonable.

Mr. Echard follows the Bishop Step by Step in this Account, but with some additional Bitterness: For, according to him, Skelton look'd on the Prince as one of those Politicians whose Steps are always suspicious.

Both

1685. Both copy after Father Orleans, who imputes his Highness's Zeal on this Occasion, to his Rage against the Duke for assuming the Title of King, which he would have us believe, was contrary to the Agreement between them. But, unfortunately, Denwick had his Audience at Whitehall on the very Day that Monmouth was first proclaim'd at Taunton. Three of the six Regiments were then at Sea, for the Scottish Service, and he had Orders from the States, as well as the Prince, to make a Tender of whatever Forces his Majesty should have Occasion for. And it is reasonable to think that both were sincere; for it was the real Interest of the States to secure the Friendship of the King: And whatever distant Views the Prince had entertain'd, it was notoriously his immediate Concern to crush as soon as possible so dangerous a Rival as the Duke of Monmouth: Who, to reforme the Thread of the Story, was now no longer in a Condition to excite either Terror, or Envy: For having once turn'd his Back on the Field of Battle, he gallop'd on full Speed for twenty Miles together, in all the Distraction of Thought, that never fails to accompany such a Torrent of Misfortunes. As soon as there was a Moment's Time for Reflection, Dr. Oliver, one of his little Company, advis'd him to turn off to the Sea-Coast over against Wales, to seize one of the Passenger-Boats at Uphill, and to make over to the other Side; where he was sure he had Friends who would conceal him till the Heat of the Pursuit was over. And he seem'd inclin'd to do so; but Lord Grey checking the Doctor for giving what he call'd such foolish Advice, the latter took his Leave, with Tears in his Eyes, saying, God bless you, Sir, I shall never see you more, and made the best of his way to Bristol, where he met with a Friend, who gave him Protection first, and procur'd him a Passport afterwards: But the Duke and his Party were soon after so hotly pursu'd, that they were oblig'd to quit their Hosts, and disguise themselves on Foot to seek a Refuge wherever they could find it. The very next Day the Lord Grey was taken in the Disguise of a Shepherd, by a Party of Lord Lansley's Men, near Halt-Lodge in Dorsetshire, in the Neighbourhood of Ringwood; and, immediately quitting his Disguise, confess'd, That since his landing in England, he had never enjoy'd a quiet Meal, or a Night's Repose. Early the next Morning the German Count, another of the Party, fell into the same Hands, who confest he had parted with the Duke about Midnight, the Search was redoubled, and about eleven the same Day, the unhappy of Mat, as Mr. Eckard The Duke of Monmouth's Story. [Ed. iii. p. 462.] [Orest. P. ii. p. 19.] [Mon. p. 212.] well files him, was found in a Dutch cover'd over with Fern, by one (a) Parking, and by him surrender'd to the Soldier, whom he had call'd in to his Assistance. Bishop Kennet says, he at first offer'd to [Ed. iii. p. 462.] resist; but another Church Writer is pleas'd to assert, with much Bitterness, That his Behaviour was meaner than his Garb, and more unfitable to his former Character, trembling and fainting away, so that it was difficult to keep Life in him. And how should it be otherwise? He was destitute of Arms, says Sir John Kenesley: He had not been in a Bed for three Weeks: Since Saturday-Night he had not slept, and after all the Fatigues of the Battle and the Flight, he had receiv'd no other Sustainance, than the Brook and the Field afforded (some green Peas were actually found in his Pocket) and when the Body sinks, the highest Mind will sink with it: Even Kings, themselves, are Men: And he that is proffert of a Throne; if reduc'd to the like disastrous Circumstances, would confess his Mortality, by the like Relinquings.

Mr. Eckard is also extremely severe on him for writing a submissive (a) Letter to the King, the very Day he was taken; in which he stoop'd to beg his Life in Terms that were beneath even a Pretender to a Crown: And, indeed, that Life should still have so much Sweetness left to one who had so much Reason to loath it, and who had before so prodigally expos'd it as a thing of no value, can no otherwise be accounted for, than by his Passion for the Lady Horrible Wentworth. Having lost all Hope of a Crown, he thought it worth his while to live on for her: And in her he had plac'd so much of his Happiness, that 'tis more to be wonder'd, that he should retire what he there possess'd, and so highly vain'd, to gratify his Ambition, than that he should, after so immense a Disappointment, turn his Back on that Ambition, and once more set up his Rest in Love.

Your Majesty may think it the Misfortune I now lie under, that makes me make this Application to you; but I do assure your Majesty, it is the Reason I now have in me of the Writing I have done you in several things, and now in taking up Arms against you. For my taking up Arms, it was never in my Thought since the King dy'd. The French and English of Orange will be Worthy for me of the Assistance I give them. Let I would never see you more. But my Misfortune was such, as to meet with some hard People, that made me believe things of your Majesty, and gave me to many false Arguments, that I was fully resolv'd to believe. That it was a Shame and a Sin, before God, not to do so. But, Sir, I will not trouble your Majesty as I speak with many things I could say to you, only that I do truly would have your Commission to the chief Lord of this Letter, being only in love of you. That I may have that Happiness as to speak to your Majesty, for I have that to say to you, Sir, that I hope may give you a long and happy Reign. I am sure, Sir, when you read me, you will be convinced of the Zeal I have of your Preservation, and how heartily I regret of what I have done. I can say no more to your Majesty now, being this Letter must be sent by those that keep me. Therefore, Sir, I shall make an end, in begging of your Majesty to believe as well of me, that I would rather die a thousand Deaths, than receive any thing I have said, if I did not really think myself the most in the wrong that ever a Man was; and had got from the bottom of my Heart an Abhorrence for those that put me upon it, and for the mischief itself. I hope, Sir, God Almighty will strike your Heart with Mercy and Compassion for me, as he has done mine with the Abhorrence of what I have done. Wherefore, Sir, I hope I may have to show you one reason I shall ever be for your Service; and could I but be as old Wen in this Letter, you would be convinced of it, but I wish of that God you see, that I did not do so. Therefore, Sir, I do beg of you one more thing, which is, that you will be so good, for that you will be convinced how much I do love you.

The Duke's very humble and dutiful,

MONMOUTH.

A. D. 1687; together with Lord Grey and Count Horn (the German) to London, and lodg'd in the Tower, he again apply'd to the King for an Audience; and by the Queen-Dowager's Interposition, who had ever favour'd him, obtain'd it; which, says Bishop Burnet, was thought very indecent in his Majesty, since he was refus'd not to pardon him. His Behaviour was of a piece with his Letter; he fell at the King's Feet; he shed Tears, at least we are told by Kennet and Richard; He confess'd he deserv'd to dye; but endeavour'd to convince the King, that it would be nobler to grant him Forgiveness. He told him, That in shedding his Brother's Blood, he at the same time shed his own. He sign'd an Acknowledgment, "That the late King had told him, he was never marry'd to his Mother." According to Bishop Burnet, he even insinuated a Readiness to change his Religion: And not till the King had refus'd his Suit, and he was cruelly and arrogantly insulted by the Queen, who, it seems, was present, did he shew one Spark of his former Gallantry and Magnanimity: But then Indignation awaken'd all that was brave and great in him anew, and rising from the King's Feet, with the Air of a Man, who had hitherto acted a Part, and was now refusing himself, he quitted the Presence, like one that had no more to suffer. He had presum'd that Submissions would make his Peace: And the King, on the other hand, had no Ear to any thing but Confessions, which the Duke's Letter had put him in Expectation of. But either he had none to make, or he was a Man of the most Honour in the World; for those whom he esteem'd his Friends, and who by their fallacious Promises, had drawn him into this Snare, deserv'd no Mercy at his Hands: And yet, as Sir John Revely repeats after the King, himself, he nam'd no-body but the Earl of Argyll and Ferguson. And as to the Prince and Princess of Orange, he had given it under his Hand, as we have seen, That they had exacted repeated Assurances from him, That he would not do any thing against his Majesty.

[Echard, p. 167, from MS. of Dr. Lloyd's, Bishop of St. Asaph.]
Thus both Parties were equally disappointed; and yet both renew'd their Practices upon each other: The Duke made another Experiment on the King by Letter, representing how useful he might and would be, if his Majesty would be pleas'd to grant him his Life; and beseeching, in case that was refus'd, that he might be allow'd a little longer Time, and to have another Divine (he had already Bishop Turner) to assist him; Dr. Tenison, or whom else his Majesty should appoint: And his Majesty, by way of Answer, sent him Bishop Keble, with Notice, That he was to die the next Day; and with proper Instructions for the Management of his Conscience in the mean time. These two Bishops kept him company the rest of that Day, and all the following Night: And the Morning of his Execution (which was to take place in virtue of the Bill of Attainder pass'd against him) the Lords Clarendon and Dartmouth visited him, by Order of the King, accompany'd with Dr. Tenison and

Dr. Hooper. All these Divines made very free with his Passion for Lady Harriot Wentworth; but none could bring him to express the least Sorrow for it. To one of them he spoke with some Indignation of Lord Swaffham, whom he call'd a tricking Man; and more especially of Ferguson, who, he said, was a bloody Villain. Bishop Burnet mentions an Interview which he had with his Duchess, and says, they parted very coldly: And Dr. Tenison told Bishop Kennet, That he advis'd him to be better reconcil'd to her; but he excus'd himself, saying, That his Heart was turn'd against her, because, in his Affliction, she had gone to Plays, and into public Companies, by which, said he, I know she did not love me. What the Lay-Lords had in Commission does not appear; unless it was to see the Headman on his Duty: For about Ten that Morning, July 31. 1687, he was led out of the Tower, doubly and trebly surrounded with Guards, for fear the Despair of his Friends, or the Compassion of the Populace, by whom he was so infinitely belov'd, should have prompted either to attempt his Rescue; and for the same Reason all the Avenues to the Tower were also filled with Soldiers. The Ground, the Windows, and the House-tops, as far as the Eye could see, were nevertheless filled and cover'd with gazing Multitudes, who came to share in the melancholy Spectacle of the Day; all of whom would have hung upon his Chariot-wheels, and rent the Clouds with their Acclamations, if Fortune had been propitious to him, and led him to the same Place, in Triumph, as a King and Conqueror.

On his first Appearance, a Murmur of Sighs and Groans went round the whole Assembly, which by degrees sunk into an almost breathless Silence, as if every Syllable he had to utter was sacred, and not to be profan'd with the unhallow'd Intermixture of any vulgar Sound. Having mounted the Scaffold with his Assistants, and saluted the People, and enjoin'd the Executioner to do his Work well, there ensu'd a very extraordinary Parley between him and his Divines, which, indeed, one of them had prepar'd him for, on the Way, by saying, They hop'd he would not be surpris'd if they, to the very last, upon the Scaffold, renew'd those Exhortations to a particular Repentance, which they had so often repeated before: So they were pleas'd to word it. But we shall find the great End they had in view was to make him instrumental to the Disgrace of his own Perion, and his own Cause, in his last Moments, in the Presence of such a Mighty Concourse of People, and at the Rebound, to all Europe: For he had no sooner open'd his Mouth with these Words, I shall say but very little, I come to dye, I am a Protestant of the Church of England, than they endeavour'd to entangle him in the Nets and Snarles of Controversy; urging, That if he was true to his Profession, he must acknowledge the Doctrine of Non-Resistance to be true: And when they could not prevail on him to adopt either their Po-

Finding they would not be fatisfy'd, he endeavour'd to flence them, by making a Transition to what had been imputed to him on the Score of the Lady Harriet Wentworth, whom he mention'd by Name, calling her a Woman of Virtue and Honour; and infisting, that what had pass'd between them was very innocent and honest in the Sight of God. But here Goffing, one of the Sheriffs, rudely interrupted him, by asking, if he had ever been marry'd to her? and then adding, "I hop'd to have heard of your Repentance for the Treason and Bloodshed which have been committed." And his Grace answering mildly, I dye very penitent, the Bishops call'd upon him to be particular in his Acknowledgments; which he rejoind, by referring them to a Paper he had sign'd for what he had thought fit to say of public Affairs: Being told there was nothing in that Paper about Resistance, and indecently press'd to own a Detestation of his Rebellion, he answer'd, I am come to dye.—Pray my Lord.—I refer to my Paper. Which, and the like Expressions, he repeated, as often as the Intervals of their Persecution gave him Opportunity to be heard.—At last, weary'd out with their continu'd Importunities, he gave them leave to call his Enterprize by what Name they pleas'd; adding, "I am sorry for invading the Kingdom, for the Blood that has been shed, and for the Souls which have been lost by my Means. I am sorry it ever happen'd." These Words the other Sheriff, Vandepuit, officiously echo'd to the People. And the Divines, thinking they had now the Advantage of a relenting Moment, ply'd him again with Exhortations to atone for the Injuries he had done the Kingdom, by resisting his lawful Prince. This drew from him other general Expressions of Concern for whatever had been done amiss: "I never was a Man, said he, that delighted in Blood.—I was as cautious in that as any Man was.—The Almighty knows I dye with all the Joyfulness in the World." The Colloquy then proceeded thus:

Affiliants. "God grant you may, Sir. God give you true Repentance."

Monmouth. "If I had not true Repentance, I should not so easily have been without the Fear of dying. I shall die like a Lamb."

A. "Much may come from natural Courage."

M. "I do not attribute it to my own Nature; for I am fearful as other Men are: But I have now no Fear, as you may see by my Face. But there is something within me which does it; for I am sure I shall go to God."

A. "My Lord, be sure upon good Grounds: Do you repent of all your Sins, known or unknown, confess'd or not confess'd; of all the Sins which might proceed from Error or Judgment?"

M. "In general for all, I do with all my Soul."

A. "Almighty God, of his infinite Mercy, forgive you! Here are great Numbers of Spectators: Here are the Sheriffs; they represent the great City, and in speaking to them you speak to the whole City. Make some Satisfaction by owning your Crimes before them."

He was silent here.

These Affiliants of his then fell to their Prayers; in which he join'd with great Fervour and Devotion; and, when they were risen up, try'd a new Practice upon him; which was, to oblige him to pray for the King, by repeating twice over the Vesticle in the Liturgy, O Lord, save the King; to which, after some Pause, he said Amen. He then began to undress himself; and refus'd to have a Cap, as usual, over his Eyes: And during this dreadful Ceremonial, that their Lordships might have the Merit of fulfilling their Instructions to the minutest Circumstance, they had the Modesty and Charity to proceed as follows: "My Lord, you have been bred a Soldier; you will do a generous, Christian thing, if you please to go to the Rail, and speak to the Soldiers, and say, That here you stand a bad Example of Rebellion; and entreat them and the People to be loyal and obedient to the King." But his Grace was so displeas'd at this strange Proposal, that he reply'd with some Warmth, I have said I will make no Speeches; I will make no Speeches, I come to dye. And the Bishops yet again redoubling their Attack, by saying, My Lord, Ten Words will be enough, he turn'd from them; and taking out his Tooth-pick Case, deliver'd it to his Servant, for the Person to whom he was to give the other things; meaning Lady Harriet Wentworth. His last Address was to the Executioner, to whom he gave six Guineas, with a farther Caution, That he would not serve him as he had done Lord Russell: For, said he, "I have heard you strike him three or four times; and if you strike me twice, I cannot promise you not to stir." Then depositing certain other Guineas in his Servant's Hand, to be given him, in case he dispos'd of him at a Blow; he laid himself down on the Block: After which, turning himself on his Elbow, he desir'd to feel the Ax, and said, he fear'd it was not sharp enough; but being assur'd to the contrary, lay down again, and the Divines bestowing these parting Exhortations upon him, God accept your Repentance! God accept your imperfect Repentance! God accept your general Repentance! God Almighty shew his compassionate Mercy upon you! &c. the Headman proceeded to do his Office; but under such Distraction of Mind, that he fell into the very Error which the Duke had so carefully caution'd him to avoid, wounding him at first so slightly, that he lifted up his Head, and look'd him in the Face, as if to upbraid him for making his Death painful, but said nothing: He then prostrated himself again, and receiv'd two other infernal Blows: Upon which the Executioner threw down his Ax in a Fit of Horror, crying out, He could not finish his Work: But on being brought to himself by the Threats of the Sheriffs, took

A. D. 1685. up the fatal Weapon again, and at two other Strokes made a shift to separate the Head from the Body.

The Paper his Grace refer'd to was drawn up in these Words:

"I declare, That the Title of King was forced upon me; and that it was very much contrary to my Opinion, when I was proclaim'd. For the Satisfaction of the World, I do declare, That the late King told me, he was never marry'd to my Mother. Having declar'd this, I hope that the King who is now will not let any Children suffer on this account. And to this I put my Hand, this 15th Day of July, 1685.

MONMOUTH."

Thus far, except in the very Article of the Execution, which is deliver'd by Mr. Echar'd from the Manuscript of Dr. Lloyd, we have follow'd the (b) Account set forth by these Reverend and Right Reverend Assistants, and sign'd with their own Hands; and which, however calculated to flatter the Humour of the Court at that time, is in general of unquestionable Authority. But as certain of our Historians have not only overlook'd it, but given a Paper of a quite different kind as the last Words of that unfortunate Nobleman, it may not be improper to lay that likewise before the Reader, as follows:

"I repent in general of all my Sins, and am more particularly concerned for what Blood hath been spilt on my Account, and the rather, seeing the Issue is such as I fear will prove of fatal Consequence to the Reformed Protestant Religion.

Instead of being accounted factious and rebellious, the very opposing of Pepery and Arbitrary Power, now arising, and appearing plain enough, would sufficiently have protected my Cause; besides, several other most heinous and notorious Crimes, (such as the unhappy Fate of the Earl of Essex, and my Father of ever-blessed Memory, and others, now cover'd over with Jesuitical Policy) should have been detected and avenged.

I have lived, and shall now die, in the Faith of this, that God will work a Deliverance for his People; and then will be discover'd the great, horrid, and scarcely to be parallel'd, Villanies our Enemies have been guilty of: But now you see my Cause is desperate; yet know that I die a Martyr for the People, and shall rather pity the State that their false and covetous Minds have brought themselves and me to, than discover who are the Persons concerned in my Overthrow; and I heartily forgive all that have wrong'd me, even those that have been instrumental in my Fall, earnestly praying for their Souls.

And I hope King James will shew himself to be of his Brother's Blood, and extend his Mercy to my Children, even as he was wont, to his greatest Enemy." &c.

But tho' this Paper is call'd, A brief Abstract of his TRUE SPEECH, it ought to be look'd upon as one of the Artifices of his broken Party, to keep up the Spirit of Opposition, and to prepare the Minds of the People for a new Struggle, when Time should serve, and any new Adventurer should appear, to take the Duke of Monmouth's Place.

And so far was this Spirit of Delusion carry'd, and such amazing Effects did it produce, that we are told by Mr. Echar'd, it was asserted, both in Print and Conversation, that his Grace was not the Person that suffer'd, but another who nearly resembled him, and who was so faithful to him, as to lay down his Life for his sake: And that those who had the Confidence to propagate this and the like ridiculous Stories, found many thousands of his Followers who were mad enough to believe in them, and to remain for many Years in expectation of his next Coming, more great, more glorious, and more irresistible than ever.

But setting aside these Forgeries, with the Scorn they deserve; thus fell this Idol of Majesty; and justly he fell: For, though it should be acknowledg'd, that, if he had waited till the Measure of the Court-Iniquities had been full, and till he had been call'd upon by the general Voice of the People to interpose between them and Oppression; he might have pleaded that extraordinary Call in his Vindication, and been honour'd as a Deliverer, by all future Ages, it must also be acknowledg'd, that no Man whatsoever has any Title to appeal to the Sword on the first Appearance of Misgovernment, or to redress his own private Wrongs at the Expence of the public Peace.

To conclude his melancholy Story: He was scarce thirty-six Years old when he dy'd: In the first Stage of his Greatness, if the King led him by one Hand, the Duke of Ferd did the same by the other: The Earl of Armagh, afterwards Duke of Bucks, as he banish himself, was the Person that first broke in upon their Union; after what manner, the Reader will learn from the Note below (c): And the King caus'd two savage Medals to be struck,

(b) To be found in Sir James Wadley's Collection.
(c) The first Step of the Duke of Monmouth's rising to Authority as the Army, was his being surpris'd with the Court, tho' not the Government, of his march, the Lord Armagh accompanied us, (now publishing in France, his Treatise on the Province, as chief Secretary of State) both in Friendship to him, and for his own sake, since it would aim the Troubles of such Affairs, without Dismission, either to his Power or Profit; since all Commissions still pass'd through the Secretary's Hands, and only Orders now through the Duke's. The second Advance he made was, the King's sending his Commands to every Colonel that they should obey all Dispositions which came from the Duke of Monmouth. This wanted but the Formality of a Commission to make him an absolute General: and yet even thus far, the Duke of Ferd oppos'd him, so bloudy he was for his Prudence; of sister Husband to Wife, or rather I should have thought.

But now on this Article, only worth relating on that account, will let us see the great Necessity of Court-officers, as well as the Ignorance of those who most commonly write of them; very grossly mistaking to Prudence of Providence, what is often nothing else but Humour, Love, or Jealousy: For, notwithstanding all the Intercourse between the Duke of Ferd and his Nephew, (such a firm one, that even a direct contrary Interest was possible as well as) yet a little Inconclancy in one of their Mistresses, though in favour of a third Person, struck, to perpetuate the Remembrance of his Rival's Fall, and his own Felicity.

As to his Grace's Followers, Lord Grey had a Pardon from the King, which help'd to establish a Belief, that he had been all along in the King's Interest, and had betray'd the Duke to him: But his Pardon was neither a Reward of Services, nor an Act of Mercy. He had been given, as the Phrase then was, to the Lord Rochester; and his Estate being so entail'd, that no Forfeiture could prevent its descending to his Brother, his Life was spar'd, that the Grantee might have the Benefit of the main Profits. Of what held the German Count, no Mention is made; for which Reason, we may conclude, that, for some Consideration or other, he also made his Peace. But that Forgiveness should fall into their Hands, as we are told he did, the third Day of the Battle, and should be spar'd, as he certainly was, surpasses the Power of Conjecture to account for: And no one Circumstance remains on Record to assist our Conclusions.

With regard to the rest of those who accompany'd the Duke from Holland, against whom it was reasonable to think the Shafts of Power would be peculiarly level'd, some of them made their Escape, and some of them fell among the Heavens offer'd up by inhuman Fury to glut the Vengeance of an unforgiving, unrelenting Court: For no Distinction was made between Artifice and Credulity, between Ambition and Delusion.

Person, was the accidental Cause of such a Division between us, as never can't till I cost one of them the Hazard of his Crown, and the other that of his Life on a Scaffold.

All which, to comply with your Commands, shall be set down freely and faithfully, though not poll'd to be reconcil'd with any frequent Imputation of myself. At the Return from Termonah, the old Holland Regiment was given me, and joined to another I had rais'd by which I remain'd in Command after the Peace, when all our new Comrades were dismissed. This, I suppose made those two Dukes think of me soon after for commanding the first Regiment of Foot-yearly, and oblig'd the King should buy Colonel Ruffel out of it, for that Purpose; having before presented with the good Lord Covent to let me come over his Head, who commanded the second Regiment. But just while this was talking, the Duke of Monmouth, ever engag'd in some Ambition, fell into great Anger against me, for an insidious Discovery that made too great Notice in the Court at that time.

He had always great Temper, and therefore offer'd no Affront to the Place; but wanted out the Counting to revenge himself a better Way, by privately obtaining a Promise of the King to let him have that Command which was design'd for me: Forciving then, his own would become void, and perhaps be given to me, he propos'd the Earl of Osney for that, upon whom there could be no Objection; to stepping up my Way in both Places.

The Duke of York having openly made us Friends, affected no such Artifice and Conspiriting in his Nephew, as he found him but too capable of afterwards, in a much greater Matter. Accordingly he thought it time to move the King about that Alteration in the Guards, not in the least apprehending a Repulse. For the King, tho' of more Wit than most of those who influenced him, and that Father of his Family, to be easily impos'd on; so that it was a constant Method among all Ministers, first to settle what they agreed to be done, and then offer it to the King, like an Act of Parliament, in which the negative Voice is seldom apprehended.

Between that Way of proceeding was the Loss of our Battles, and the Duke's disservice only by the Unsuccess of his Management: For the King shou'd all Brother, that never dream'd of this his Proposal he was engag'd already, but yet to another of his great Friends; and then naming him, contented at his being so soon acquainted with it.

The Duke was pleas'd to tell me this privately with great Confidence, but was for my Disappointment, by that an situation named Termonah in the two last Comrades of the Army, without his being first acquainted with it. It was return'd for a while, and had an Intention, not to lessen the Countess in the Duke; and therefore I, who during the Duke of Monmouth's Quarrel to me, had often propos'd to make his Interest in that manner, would not loze to fair an Occasion to turn them for ever.

I told him therefore of how little Importance was the situation in the British War, which I found imply reconsecr'd by his being so much oppos'd to it. But I cou'd not myself extremely oppos'd to another Part of the Army, which gave me a strong fort of Opinion. The Duke could not fail to enquire, what it was; and, with some Reserve, I explain'd it: That the Duke of Monmouth's own Command of the Horse-Lifeguard, was better than Colonel Ruffel's Regiment of Foot, both for Honour and Profit; and therefore, he would surely change it into such, without some Alteration, in which to my great Contentment of Foot might be more stick, than a single Troop of Horse.

That dissembling of me was not his only Aim; since he might have had that satisfaction as well, by getting the Earl of Osney into that Regiment, without taking it himself by leaving a better Fall for it.

As the Duke grew warm at this, I engag'd him more, by freely quitting my own Pretension, if his Highness could find a worthy Man for it, whom the Duke of Monmouth could have no Pretence to oppose, as he did me, on account of our Quarrel; replying it to be a Toll of his Consequence, that, one Day, perhaps, he led a thing about the Crown of England might depend on it.

The Duke accepted kindly the laying down my Pretension, and propos'd some others for that Command; but to no purpose: For, the King reproach'd him with opposing a thing already settled between himself and his Son. Upon which, almost in despair, he tried a little with my Lord Arling, the Duke of Monmouth's best Adviser at that time: freely making him understand, that if the Duke of Monmouth would not desert himself from making it any further, he must lose his Friendship, which had been so useful to him; and consequently pay too dear a Price for what was but a Trifle in comparison with it: To which that detestable Minister reply'd something roughly, that the Duke of Monmouth could not need an Favour more than his Highness needed the King's, which he might labour to fill, by thus creating his Inimicity for to be beloved a Son.

With this surprising Answer from a Secretary of State, the Duke grew more concern'd than ever; and at last resolv'd on the only Expedient now left; which, in the first Place, serv'd the Duke's Interest by leaving that Employment in safe Hands; and, next, my own Resigning, in keeping the Duke of Monmouth out of it. He was advis'd therefore to send immediately for Colonel Ruffel, who was very contentous, and by any means whatsoever, viz. by my Move, to chase him out of his Revolution to sell his Command; which the King was to do from imposing on a wicked Officer of such Merit and Quality, that he hadly allow'd him no such Change had ever been thought of, if Mr. Ruffel himself had not ask'd the Favour of selling his Command, and the Good of his Heir. What pill'd between the Duke and Ruffel it is not hard to guess; for the latter kept his Command by presenting to the King, that, when it came to the point, he could not find in his heart to quit his Country, and desir'd to do it so: But upon all this matter, follow'd such an Amenity between those two Princes, it will serve to fill our Ankle with the fatal Effects of it, while yet this first Occasion of their Breach is not like to be so much as mention'd.

The Turns of Court are such, that, since all this Bullie and Composition between at Root the Regiment of Guards; a third Person not least thought of for such a Command, nor for such in his Army, shou'd grow from me, by the Duke of York's being pleas'd in Sweden, and Poland, leaving his Interest on account of the Polish War; and to granting his Desire to sell. The Duke of Monmouth at that time was in such Distress, as to have his Government of Hull and *Lord-Licentency of *Torsholm given to me; which, with the old Holland Regiment I had before, was almost more than, being so young, I could reasonably perform. The King therefore, at last, bought that Command of Colonel Ruffel, by his eldest Son the Duke of Griffin. What respects to this Story most remarkable is, the Probability that, in those early Days, the Duke of Monmouth had some Thoughts of what he afterwards attempt'd; and the Solution of him that accidentally led into the Regiment of York, was not without some Ground: since that Regiment consist'd of two thousand four hundred Men, a great Part of our little Army, always kept together, and quarter'd in London, when the other few Regiments were rais'd into all the Garrison of England.

This surpris'd Reflection on King Charles's Death, when it had so been impossible for the Duke of Monmouth to succeed him if he had then arriv'd in Court as the Head of so considerable a Regiment.

son. It seem'd resolv'd, that wherever Sin had been, Death should follow. To countenance the compendious Method of dispatching the poor Prisoners, first practis'd by General Feverham, Colonel Kirk (who, according to Bishop Burnet, had learnt Barbarity of, but according to the Truth, might have taught it to the Moor) hung up nineteen at his first Entrance into Bridge-water, not only without once entering into the Merits of their several Cases, but without giving them one Moment's Preparation; ordering his Drums to beat and his Trumpets to found as they were turning off, to drown the Cries and Groans of those that bewail'd their Sufferings. The wounded, bleeding as he found them, he threw into the common Goal to rot and dye by Inches. One Man he caus'd to be hang'd three several times, and at last in Chains, for Contumacy; he refusing to acknowledge, that he had done amiss; but on the contrary affirming, That if it were to do again, he would engage in the same Cause. Nor were these Outrages of his confin'd to those who were actually found in Arms; the whole Country was stain'd with the Guilt of Rebellion; and therefore the whole Country was to be made an Example. Accordingly, it was, in a manner, given up to Military Execution; the Soldiers, Horse and Foot, were let loose to live at Discretion on the wretched Inhabitants: And so infamous was the Behaviour of his own particular Corps, that he, himself, by way of Irony, call'd them his Lambs; an Appellation which was adopted by the whole West of England, and which stuck to them for many a Year after the Man, himself, was rotten in his Grave.

What was yet further remarkable, as if Extirpation itself was the great Point in View, Commitments and Prosecutions were not confin'd to those who were actually found in Arms, but whoever had been a Favourer, or was held even a Well-wisher to the same Cause, was seiz'd, imprison'd, and devoted to the same Fate.

And to give the more time to Informers to spread their Toils, and to drive in all the Game they could meet with, Jeffreys did not set out on his Expedition till towards the latter End of August; in which Interval, being the hottest Portion of the Year, the Sufferers grew a Nuisance to each other, and corrupted the very Air they breath'd; in so much, that Life itself grew a Burden, and Death was call'd upon as a Deliverer.

Jeffreys had for his Assistants, the Lord Chief-Baron, and three puisne Judges: And what was peculiar to his Commission, he was empower'd (whether legally or not, let the Lawyers decide) to command the Forces in chief, as General of the West; for to be was styl'd, and in that Capacity he acted thro' the whole Circuit, being guarded from Place to Place by Troops of Soldiers, who took the Word from him, and obey'd him in all things as their legitimate Commanding Officer. A. D. 1653.

To trace him by the Blood, thro' every Step of his civil Campaign, would be an almost endless Task. We must, therefore, content ourselves with touching only on some of the most signal of his Exploits, and refer Posterity for the Detail to his own Biographer.

At Windsor he open'd his Commission; Lady Lisle, and the first Attack he made was on the Lady Lisle (for so she was commonly call'd, her Husband having been one of the Protector Cromwell's Lords) who was indicted for harbouring John Hicks of Canthorpe, Clerk, well knowing him to be a Traitor, &c.

There is no need to enter into all the Minutencies of her Trial. Hicks and Nellbery, so often mention'd among the Bye-Conspirators, were found in her House. This was the Fact. The former of them had, by Message, besought her Protection; and she had generously bestow'd it, presuming, that he was no otherwise obnoxious to the Law, than as he was a Nonconformist Minister; and the latter she had no Knowledge of, nor was his Name in the Indictment. To prove her guilty, it was necessary to prove, That the new Hicks had serv'd under Mommsbury. But in the whole Course of the Evidence, no such Proof appears. Three Persons, indeed, depos'd, That Hicks had solicited them to join the Duke; And Jeffreys, himself, according to Bishop Burnet (d) gave it upon his Honour, that both he and Nellbery had confess'd their being in the Rebellion. But this did not prove that they had made any such Confession to the Prisoner; and Hicks's Name had never been infer'd in any Proclamation. The Lady, herself, assur'd the Court, she had never had any kind of Information that Hicks had been in the Army: That she abhor'd both the Principles and Practices of those concern'd in the late Rebellion: That she hop'd the Court would entertain no Prejudices against her on Account of her Husband: That she had shed more Tears for the Death of King Charles I. than any Woman then living: That she had educated her Son in every loyal Principle, and had actually sent him to fight for his Majesty against the very Men she was now accus'd of protecting: And she urg'd, That she had been told, she could not be try'd as a Traitor for harbouring Hicks, till he was convicted of being a Traitor. Jeffreys, in Answer, charg'd the Jury, as they would answer it at the last Day, to govern themselves by the Evidence before them, and not to regard her Protestations, &c. obli'd, that the Father of Colonel Pearnsdick, who had taken the Traitor at her House, had suffer'd Martyrdom in the Royal Cause, at the same time giving a broad Intimation to the Jury, that Lisle, the Prisoner's late Husband, was his Judge: Admir'd the Justice of God, in making the Colonel an Instrument in the Business

The Merits of the Case being now left to the Jury; one of them, before they withdrew, desir'd to be inform'd, Whether it was equally Treason to harbour a Traitor before Conviction, as it was after? And his Lordship had the astonishing Assurance to answer, It was; tho' no Man is pronounc'd a Felon, Murderer, or Traitor, by the Voice of the Law, till declar'd so by a Verdict. The Jury, after a considerable Demur, return'd into the Court, with a new Doubt, "Whether there was sufficient Proof that the Prisoner knew that Hicks had been in the Army? And his Lordship, after a Misrepresentation of what had been offer'd in Evidence, by one Person only, reply'd, "If there was no such Proof, the Circumstances and Management of the thing was as full a Proof as could be." Now this one Person, after such Usage as would terrify any Man, in such Times, to swear almost any thing, in Answer to Jeffrey's Question, "If there was no Discourse about the Battle, and of their being in the Army?" (that is to say, between Lady Lisle, and Hicks, and Nelthorpe) had said, There was some such Discourse: But, being provok'd to explain what that Discourse was, added, They talk'd of fighting. But I can't exactly tell what the Discourse was. Then as to the Circumstances and Management, it is notorious, that a Jury is only to be directed by Facts: And this Management, and these Circumstances, consist only in these things. Hicks sent a Messenger to enquire, whether Lady Lisle would receive him and his Friend; and the directed them to come in the Evening: And when Penruddock came to seize them, she deny'd they were there; which the said was the Effect of her own Confusion: For as soon as ever the Soldiers had Admission into her House, they fell to plundering it, even before the Persons they were in quest of were discover'd.

The Jury remaining still unconvinc'd, and inclining to the merciful Side, it is asserted by [Vol. 1. p. 655.] the Right Reverend Fathers in God, Burnet, [Vol. 1. p. 433.] and Kennet, and confirm'd by the Prisoner's last Paper, That he forc'd them by Menaces to violate their Oaths and sacrifice an innocent and meritorious Fellow-Subject, to gratify his Avarice and Tyranny. The former also asserts, that Jeffrey had obtain'd a Promise of the King, that he would not pardon her; which his Majesty own'd to Lord Essexham, who was prevail'd upon to apply to him in her Behalf, by the Promise of 1000*l.* Consideration-money. Even the very Writer, who endeavours to set a Gloſs on this cruel Proceeding, acknowledges, that when the King was petition'd to respite her Execution but four Days, he answer'd, That he would not respite it one. Indeed he descended to change her Sentence from Hanging to Beheading: Which is somewhat strange; since he thereby allow'd her the Privilege of the Nobility, which she had deriv'd from Cromwell.

That she slept on her Trial, as some have suggest'd, does not appear; for she made as good a Defence as could have been expected from a Woman of upwards of seventy Years of Age, not vers'd in the Laws, and unassisted with Counsel. Her Behaviour at her Death was worthy of the Innocence and Piety of her Life; not intensible of her Vilitation, yet dispos'd to bear it. Having deliver'd her (e) Paper to the Sheriff, and offer'd up her last Prayer, she laid her Head on the Block, and was in a Moment laid to rest for ever.

As to Nelthorpe and Hicks, there was no need to strain Matters against them, because their Guilt was apparent and undeniable; and they receiv'd Sentence and were executed, at different times and Places, accordingly. Nelthorpe, while in Newgate, fell into a sort of Madnets, but recover'd himself perfectly before he dy'd: And in his last Speech, declar'd, That as to the Design of assassinating the late King, or his present Majesty, it always was a thing highly against his Judgment; and what he always detested, saying, "I was never in the least concern'd in it, neither in Purſe nor Person; nor ever knew of any Arms bought for that Intent; nor did I believe there was any such Design, or ever hear of any Disappointment in such an Affair, or Time, or Place, save what, after the Discovery of the general Design, Mr. Wyl spoke of, as to Arms bought by him." He also said, That, instead of joining in the Advice given to the Duke of Monmouth to declare himself King, he had complain'd of it, and

(e) Part of which being necessary for the Rescue of her Case out of the bad Hands it has fallen into, is here added, as follows:

"I did ever as little expect to come to this Place on this Occasion, as any Person in this Place or Nation; therefore let all learn not to be high-minded, but fear: The Lord is a Sovereign, and will take what Way he sees best to glorify himself, in and by his poor Creatures; and I do humbly desire to submit to his Will, saying to him, Thou, I may justly say, find'st me Patient. I be Glue that was laid to my Charge was, for entertaining a Nonconformist Minister, who is since known to have been in the late Duke of Monmouth's Army; I am told, that if I had not deny'd them, it would not at all have struck me; I have no Escalot but Surprise and Fear, which I believe my Jury will make use of to excite their Passion to the World. I have been also told, That the Court did use to be of Council for the Prisoner; but, instead of Advice, I had Evidence against me from them; which, tho' it were only Heartry, might possibly affect my Jury. My Defence was such, as might be expected from a weak Woman; but, such as it was, I did not hear it repeated again to the Jury; which, as I have been inform'd, is usual in such Cases. However, I forgive all Persons that have done me wrong; and I desire that God will do to likewise. I forgive Colonel Penruddock, altho' he told me, that he could have taken these Men before they came to my House. And I do likewise forgive him, who desired to be taken away from the Grand Jury to the Petty Jury, that he might be the more easily prevail'd in my Death. As to what may be objected, that I gave it under my Hand, that I had discov'rd with Nelthorpe; that could be no Evidence against me, being after my Conviction and Sentence: I do acknowledge his Majesty's Favour in revoking my Sentence; I pray God to preserve him, that he may long reign in Glory, as well as Justice, that he may reign in Peace; and that the Protestant Religion may flourish under him. I also return the Thanks to God, and the Reverend Clergy that assisted me in my Imprisonment."

and that as to the turning Evidence, which he had been strongly sollicit'd to do, he thought it more eligible to die, than to submit to such Balencis.

And Hicks's.

Hicks also, when he came to die, spoke with great Satisfaction of his rejecting all Applications to induce him to bear witness against his Protestant Brethren. He moreover complain'd very sensibly and pathetically, that Nonconformity should be render'd criminal; and yet, that the Door of Conformity should be purposely made so strait and difficult, that no Man could find Admittance through it, unless he left his Conscience behind him: Declar'd himself fully satisfy'd with the Monarchical Form of the English Constitution: That it was not warrantable for any Subject to resist their lawful and rightful Sovereign; and that if he had not been induc'd by many things, he had read and heard, to believe, that the Duke of Monmouth was the legitimate Son of his Father, Charles the Second, notwithstanding his Majesty's Declarations to the contrary (for Kings and Princes, said he, are often forc'd to make their natural Affections stoop to Reasons of State) he would never have join'd him: This Hicks was Brother to Hicks Dean of Worcester, who, we are told, being urg'd to intercede in his Behalf, most savagely reply'd, I cannot speak for a Fanatic.

From Winchester, with a Train of Guards and Prisoners at his Heels, which he had glean'd up at different Places on his Way, Jeffreys proceeded on to Salisbury, and from thence (having there also enlarg'd his Collection) to Dorchester, where he hoisted his bloody Flag, and made it first apparent, that he resolv'd to give no Quarter. Every body knows, that 'tis usual for the Judges on their Circuits, to go to Church and hear a Sermon, before they open their Commissions. Jeffreys did the same: The Preacher happen'd to recommend Mercy; which was so foreign to the Business in Hand, that his Lordship could not help laughing almost out, at the Folly of the Divine, who could hope, either by Reason or Rhetoric, to alter or mitigate the rigid Purposes of State.

This Ceremony being over, the Court sat, and the Commission read as usual, his Lordship proceeded to give his Charge to the Grand-Jury; in which he directed them to enquire after, and make Discoveries of, all who had been Aiders and Abettors, as well as Principals, in the late Rebellion, on pain of High Treason. This struck the very Jury themselves with Terror, who, on the one hand, had no Inclination to countenance such excessive Severity; nor, on the other, to expose themselves to the Rage of such a Tyrant. But, as it prov'd, their Fears were stronger than their Compassion. They redeem'd themselves, by finding Bills against Thirty of their Fellow-subjects, before the next Morning: And that he himself might make the like Riddance, he took occasion to declare, That if any put themselves on a Trial, and the Country found them guilty, they should have little Time to live; and also to insinuate, That, if any expected Pa-your, their best way would be to plead guilty. But of these Thirty not one could be seduced to throw his Life on his Lordship's Mercy: All stood Trial, and all but one were found guilty; His Lordship pronounc'd Sentence upon the spot, and that very Evening (Friday) he sign'd a Warrant for the Execution of Thirteen of them on the Monday following; which was accordingly perform'd. Among them was one Brag, an Attorney, who had fallen in with a Party of Monmouth's Men, as they were going to search the House of a Roman-Catholic for Arms; and because they had taken his Horse from him, and he walk'd home without it, this was deem'd aiding and assisting the Rebels; his Lordship withal declaring, That if any Lawyer or Parson should come under his Inspection, they should not escape. Another of them was the Constable of Charstock, who having some Money in his Hands for the Use of the Militia, was forc'd by certain of the Duke's Friends to deliver it to them: The Witnesses against both these Persons were the Roman-Catholic whose House had been search'd, and a Woman of ill Fame; and the Constable making Exception to the Characters of both of them, Jeffreys blam'd him with Villain! Robert! Methinks I see thee already with a Halter about thy Neck, &c.

We are farther told, that his Lordship, not satisfy'd with dispatching twenty-nine in one Day, had recourse to a new Artifice which brought Matters to almost as speedy an Issue, as the Method pursu'd by Few-John and Kirk, viz. Two of his Officers were sent to take a List of the Prisoners, and, at the same time, to give out Promises, that if they made a free Confession, they might expect Mercy; otherwise not: Which Offers on one hand, and the terrible Example of the twenty-nine on the other, had such an Effect, that the far greater Part of the remaining Herd embrac'd them as the least Evil: And this Proceeding was so manag'd, that to ease they should afterwards retract, these very Men might appear as Witnesses against them.

Thus he reduc'd the Business of the Court to little more than the single Article of Condemnation; which was indeed the Business of his Commission: And no less than two hundred and ninety-two receiv'd Sentence, all at once, of whom about eighty were executed, and their Heads and Limbs distributed all over the County.

His Lordship's next Stage was to Exeter, where another red List of two hundred and forty-three Persons was laid before him; one of them pleading Not Guilty, and being found otherwise by the Jury, he not only pass'd Sentence on him immediately, but order'd immediate Execution, which so terrify'd the rest, that they thought it advisable not to exasperate his Lordship, by putting him to the Trouble of doing the Duty of his Office, or of admitting them to the Privilege of Englishmen: So all he had to do was to assign them over in a Body to the Executioner, which he did without Remorse: But as he was less fatigu'd with Hearings here, than before at Dorchester, so he was not altogether ther to prodigal to the Hangman; tho' what the Abatement precisely were, we do not find specify'd.

His next Remove was to Taunton; and his Arrival there struck as much Terror into the miserable Inhabitants, as if the Plague was in his Breath, and Desolation at his Heels: The very Evening he came into the Place he open'd his Commission; and the Language he us'd in his Charge was such as argu'd it would not be his Fault, if he did not utterly depopulate the Place. It was here Monmouth was first acknowledg'd; and, according to him, the whole Country could not make Expiation for so infernal a Treason. One Mr. Simon Hanbury was the first Person who was arraign'd: Two common Informers were the Witnesses against him: And tho' he undertook to prove by the concurrent Testimony of several credible Persons, that he had no Concern in the late Rebellion; that while it continu'd he had never been but twice in Taunton; once to charge his Son, on his Blessing and Countenance, not to become a Party in it; and the second, to supply his Family with Provision on the Market Days, Death was the Word: And tho' the very Justice of Peace, who had forwarded the Prosecution, apply'd to Jessops in his Favour, urging there was some Mistake in the Allegations against him, he turn'd a deaf Ear, and only said, You have brought him on; if he be innocent, his Blood be upon you! A Constable of the Hundred, who had, unfortunately, fallen into the way of one of Monmouth's Parties, and who had been compell'd by them to execute a Warrant of his, for the bringing in of Provisions for the Use of his Army, on pain of having his House burnt, Sec. was the next Person who ventur'd to take his Trial, on a Presumption, that the Violence he was under, and the Danger he was expos'd to, would be held sufficient for his Indemnification: But his Lordship being determin'd to admit of no Extenuative, he was cast like the former; and Both were order'd to be executed the next Morning, as well to cut off all Impunity, as in conformity to the Rule he had before laid down, to frighten the Prisoners from standing Trial. At this Place and Wells, he had still five hundred to dispatch; and he had many weighty Reasons to wish that the bloody Scent was clos'd. As if Justice therefore had been arm'd with a Scythe, instead of a Sword, he mow'd down all before him: And out of the Legion he condemn'd, no less than two hundred and fifty-one were executed, besides those destroy'd in cold Blood by Kirk and Fewerham. His whole Progress might be trac'd by the Carnage he left behind him: Every Tower and Steeple was set round with the Heads of Traitors: Wherever a Road divided, a Gibbet serv'd for an Index: And there was scarce a Hamlet, however obscure, that he did not order a Limb to be distributed to, that those who surviv'd, either abroad or at home, might never lose Sight of their departed Friends, nor the Remembrance of their Crime or Punishment.

Among these, the most eminent were Holmes, Temple, Ansell, the two Hewlings, Tyler of Bristol, Speake, and one Battiscombe. Whether Holmes was the Major Holmes, formerly employ'd by Argyle, is no where explain'd: But he was an elderly Man; He came over with the Duke, and was therefore look'd upon as a Principal in his Expedition. He fell into the Hands of the Royalists, at Philipstown, having had his left Arm first shatter'd by a Musket-ball; in which Condition he was stript, and carry'd to a Justice of Peace, who had the Humanity to cloath him again, before he committed him. Condemnation he was sure of, for which Reason he never once amus'd himself with the Hope of a Pardon; and, to the last Moment of his Life, his Fortitude never once forsook him: It is said he cut off his own shatter'd Arm, in the Justice's Kitchen; and 'tis certain, that he glory'd in his Chains; as also, that with his last Breath, he express'd himself satisfy'd with the Duke's Title, and his own Concern in the Support of it. Temple, on the other hand, acknowledg'd, that he was surpris'd into the Duke's Service, under the Pretence of an Expedition to the West Indies: That, when let into the Secret, he was dissatisfy'd with it; but that Hope of Advancement induc'd him to persist in what he did not approve. Ansell again, an Independent of the old Strain, declar'd, That, like a true Englishman, he had drawn his Sword in defence of the Protestant Religion: That he had left his House on purpose to join the Duke: That he acted as a Captain of Foot in the Battle of Sedge Moor, which he did not repent of: That if he had a thousand Lives, he would venture them all in the same Cause: That he might have sav'd his Life, if he would have impeach'd others; but that he abhor'd such Ways of Deliverance: And that he had rather suffer Affliction with the People of God, than enjoy Life with Sin. The Hewlings were young Gentlemen of Parts, Education, and Courage, but no Experience in the crooked Designs of Courts, or the perfidious Hearts of Men. The eldest was scarce twenty-two Years of Age, the youngest not twenty. They were charm'd with the Words Religion and Liberty; and were animated, like the Decii of old, with an Ambition not only to fight but to die for their Country. It has been said, they were sent to Mindeval for Cannon, the Day before the Battle, and in their Return they met their Friends in all the Confusion of a total Rout. This oblig'd them to mingle also with the flying Herd, and to go in search of what they never found, a Place of Safety. Their Behaviour under Sentence came literally up to all that is believ'd of Saints and Martyrs; and when they came to die, as such they were honour'd by the lamenting Crouds that waited on their last Moments. Tyler of Bristol had also commanded in the same gallant Body of Foot, and was so far from being convinc'd, by the Defeat, of the Injustice of his Cause, that he thus express'd himself, at the Place of Execution: "As to the Matter of Fact,

Which was all he was permitted to say on that Subject. Speake was the younger Brother of Speake before-mentioned, and who was in the Action; and all that could be prov'd against him was, That he had been at Ilminster, at the time when the Duke was there: Which it seems was sufficient to do his Business; how righteously, may be gather'd from what pass'd between Jeffreys and the Mayor of Taunton, when his Lordship was on the point of leaving the Town; The Mayor, it seems, was prevail'd upon to be a humble Petitioner for Speake: Or rather to stand at distance, whether any Hope might be entertain'd, that Grace would be extended towards him, seeing it was now acknowledg'd, He was not the Person more immediately aim'd at: And the Chief reply'd in Thunder, No: His Family owes a Life, and he shall die for his Name's sake. Battiscombe was a young Gentleman of a moderate Estate, lying between Dorchester and Lime, and having enter'd himself a Student of the Temple, came with-in his Lordship's Description of such to whom he was resolv'd to shew no Mercy. He had fallen under Suspicion in the late Reign, on account of the Rye-Affair, and had been actually in Arms at Sedgemoor: There was no Want of Evidence against him, nor did he want for Spirit to defend the Equity of the Cause, in Court, which he had maintain'd with his Sword in the Field: This was Oil to Flame; and Jeffreys having storm'd himself almost out of Breath, condemn'd him in a Fury: Recollecting, however, when the Fit was over, that his Evidence might be of Consequence, he several times made him Offers of Life, in case he would be prevail'd upon to testify for the King, against certain of his Accomplices; and being as often rebuff'd, grew ten times more incens'd against him than ever. Battiscombe was remarkably handsome, and as remarkably the Favourite of the Ladies: Even to Prison they follow'd him with their Condolences, and in hope that Jeffreys himself, brutal as he was, had still some Remains of Tenderness about him, which Youth and Beauty might awaken, one of the fairest fell at his Feet, and with Showers of Tears presented a Petition in behalf of the Man she lov'd: To which the Monster return'd such an (g) Answer as shew'd him to be as void of Civility as Virtue.

[Caveat, P. ii. P. 22.] There is no following such a Blood-hound as this tyrannical Judge, thro' such a dreadful Path, without Horror: And yet, a certain orthodox Writer, several times before-quoted, has not blush'd to set forth in Print the following meek, and Christian-like Passage: "I have indeed sometimes thought, that, in Jeffreys's Western-Circuit, Justice went too far, before Mercy was remember'd, tho' there was not above a fourth Part executed of what were convicted: But when I consider, in what manner several of these Lives, then spar'd, were afterwards spent, &c. I can't but think a little more Humour might have been usefully employ'd on that Occasion." He does not drop one Word of the Terms on which they were spar'd; nor the Manner in which they were condemn'd; and we are left to conclude, that Rigor had no sooner quitted the Stage, than Grace and Indulgence enter'd. But the Fact is notoriously otherwise: Many of those who had their Lives given them for a Prey were forc'd to submit to Whippings more grievous even than Death itself; and many others were forc'd to purchase their Pardons at the Expence of Half, All, and sometimes more than they were worth. The Extortions of this kind, that were not only conniv'd at but authoris'd, are of themselves sufficient to fill a Volume: And what is worst of all, they were not only practis'd on the Guilty, but on those who had been persecuted on Suspicion only, who had never been admitted to a Hearing, and against whom nothing positive had been urg'd, nor Witnesses appear'd. To illustrate this in a capital Instance, it is fit that Posterity should know, That Mr. Prideaux of Ford-Abbey in Devonshire, was taken up by a Secretary's Warrant, dated the second Day after the Duke of Monmouth's Landing, and continued in Custody till July 14, when he was admitted to Bail: That during that Interval he several times petition'd to be heard before the Council, but never could obtain that Justice or Favour: That he was soon after seiz'd a second time, and committed close Prisoner to the Tower; where not to much as his own Wife was allow'd to have access to him, till the petition'd to be confin'd with him; which was at last granted: That, during this Interval, the Prisoners and condemn'd Persons in the West were temper'd with by the Agents of Jeffreys, with Threats of instant Execution, and Promises of Life, to become Witnesses against him, as was declar'd by Speake and others: That the said Prideaux was never able to discover what had been laid to his Charge: That Application being made in his behalf to several Persons of Quality and Interest, Answer was made, "That nothing could be done, for the King had given him to Jeffreys." That Mrs. Prideaux at last, seeing the Necessity of buying her Husband's Liberty of him, at almost any rate, apply'd to two of his Creatures to know the Terms: That no less than ten thousand Pounds being demanded, and the demurring on account of the Exorbitancy of the Sum, the Price was rais'd to fifteen thousand: And that, with the Abatement of 240 l. for prompt Payment of a Part of it, the said immense Fine was actually paid by the said Prideaux, for the Redemption of the Liberty he was born to, and which he had done nothing to forfeit!

To

[g] Fin. "Come, I know your Meaning: Some Part of your Petition I will grant, which shall be, that, after he be hang'd and quarter'd, you shall have this Member you best lik'd when he was living: And so I will give Orders to the Sheriffs." Life of Lord Jeffreys, p. 273.

A. D. 1685.

To conclude; even the young Girls of Taunton who had presented the Colours to the Duke at Taunton; and who were not above eight or ten Years old, were given to the Maid of Honour, who sent down an Agent into the County to compound the Matter with their Parents, who redeem'd their innocent Lives, at 30 and 700*l.* a Head, according to their several Abilities.

[Life of the Lord Keeper
North, p.

And so widely does Mr. North differ from the Author of the Gravat, that, upon the News of the violent Proceedings in the West, says he, "The Lord Keeper saw the King would be a great Sufferer thereby, and went directly to his Majesty, and mov'd him to put a Stop to the Fury, which was, in no respect for his Service; but, in many respects for the contrary. For tho' the Executions were by Law just, yet never were the de- cluded People all capitally punish'd: And it would be accounted a Carnage, and not Law or Justice: And, thereupon Orders went to mitigate the Proceeding; but what Effect follow'd, I know not: (b) "Nay, Father Or- leams himself allows, That it was then said, That Men were not punish'd or pardon'd, according to the Degree of their Innocence, or their Guilt; but according to their Ability to purchase Favour; adding, The King was inform'd of these Disorders too late; but as soon as it came to his Ears, he express'd his Displeasur," &c. And how far this Jesuit has Truth on his Side, the Sequel will best inform us.

It has been already hinted from Bishop Barnet, that from the very Day that his Majesty had the News of the Duke of Monmouth's Defeat, Lord Rochester had no longer the first Place in his Confidence: And farther we learn from all the other Authorities of those Times, that he thenceforward thought himself in a Condition to prescribe his own Measures to his Council, and to exact Obedience. The Earl of Sandwich, who is sup- pos'd to have rose in favour, as Lord Rochester declar'd; and who has been accus'd of advising or countenancing all the Intemperances of this Reign, has in his own Justification asserted, That when his Majesty was first alarm'd with Monmouth's Approach, he even then declar'd, that he was resolv'd to give Employments to Roman Catholics, al- ledging, It was fit all Men should serve who could be useful, and on whom he could depend. And that tho' every body, as he thought, advis'd him against it, he nevertheless persisted in his Opinion, and acted accordingly. And Mr. North, speaking of the Lord Keeper's nearer Comportment with his Majesty upon the Subject of the new Measures, which his Lordship saw to be firmly entering at Court (these are his own Words) proceeds to say, "That the King, partly from his own Humour, which might affect those Braveries, and partly from the Fears, and,

land's Letter

Keeper North,

consequently Treachery of his Ministers, who thought themselves not safe in what they had done or intended to do, but upon the Foot of Force, kept up the Army, al- though there was no real Occasion or Reason for so doing: That this created Discontent enough: That what was worse, the King gave his Commissions to Persons unqualify'd by Law: That this was look'd upon as a Fore-runner of the setting aside the Test and Penal Laws. And his Lordship was not so short-sighted, but he foresaw not only that this Current, tho' beginning afar off (for military Commissions do not pass the great Seal) yet in the End, would overflow him, but also that, upon the main, it would bring a Con- fusion fatal to our happy Constitution in Church and State, and for certain destroy the King. This was a Subject melancholy enough for him, and void of all Hopes or Consolation. For he knew the King's Hu- mour, and that nothing that he could say to him, would take place, or sink with him. So strong were his Prejudices, and so feeble his Genius, that he took none to have any right Understanding, that were not in his Mea- sures, and that the Council, given him to the contrary, was for Policy of Party more than for Friendship to him. But, for all that, his Lordship, in this difficult Case, was resolv'd, once for all, to be plain and ex- plicit with him, and so, at least, satisfy his own Conscience. And once, getting an Audience, he took Occasion to declare to him all his Prognostics, depending upon his Majesty's declining the Test and Penal Laws, and that with no less Zeal, Sincerity, and Tenderness, than if he had been a Parent. He mind'd him of the uncontrollable Influence of an universal Discontent; that no Branch of his Affairs, especially those of his colligible Revenues, would move with any Con- tent to him. People would go on conti- nually exaggerating each other's Discon- tents, and mutual Encouragements would take place therein, and among Persons that should appear fair to him, and neither he, nor any of his Ministers, would dis- cover any such their secret Practices and Engagements; and if there happen'd any Advantage to cover Attempts, all would break out in a Flame, as if a Mine fir'd under him. And although the Duke of Monmouth was gone, yet there was a P. of O. on the other Side of the Water, And as to his Army, his Lordship said, that upon an universal Discontent, he would find it a broken Reed, that the People would grow upon it, or wear it out by their intermix'd Conversation. Men naturally fall in with Parties and their In- terests among whom they live, and they will not bear the Reproaches of their Wo- men and Pet-Companions, without falling into Harmony with them. That it was utterly

Advice
to the King.

(b) I am sure, concludes he, of his Lordship's Inter- action to the King on this Occasion, being told it at the very end by himself. Which, by the way, is utterly impos- sible: For it was not till the 25th of September that the Grand Jury of Dorchester found Bill against the first Thiry who were try'd; and it was on that very Day the Lord Keeper dy'd at Worcester, in Bedfordshire, where he had been for some time before.

utterly impossible to bring the People to a Reconciliation with his Persuasion; and that the more they were urg'd, or even shew'd it, the worse they would be. And that the Securies were false and treacherous, and would infallibly, at a Pinch, whatever Countenances they shew'd him to the contrary, not only desert his Party, but turn against him; for they never were, nor would be Friends, really, to the Royal Family, and their peculiar Way and Means of working was by Fraud. I can, with great Assurance (continues our Author) affirm the SubSTANCE of this free Discourse to the King to have been really so made as I have represented; For his Lordship hath often said to me that, whatever happen'd, he would do it, and would have it in his Power to say to himself, at the Hour of his Death, that he had done his Duty to the King and his Country. And after he return'd from Court, he told me he had done accordingly; altho' as well before as since, he thought it signify'd nothing.

This remarkable Audience, it must be presump'd, was the last which this great Lawyer ever had of his Majesty: And, indeed, it is somewhat difficult to account, in Point of Time, for his having had it at all: For his Brother has given us a Letter of his Lordship's to the Lord Treasurer, Rochester, dated June 11, (the Day of Monmouth's landing) in which he expresses an earnest Desire to resign the Seal (which he was heartily weary of, not only because of the violent Turn which the Cabinet had taken, but because Jeffreys had wholly supplanted him there) and has farther inform'd us, that Lord Rochester, as well in Spleen to Jeffreys, who was already mark'd out for his Successor, as for the Convenience of such a Sever as his Lordship to himself, diverted him from that Purpose, and procur'd him the King's Permission to retire with the Seal, and the Officers attending it, to his Seat at Wroston, in the Neighbourhood of Alcester, for the Recovery of his Health, where, we are to understand, he continu'd till his dying Day, which has been already specify'd. Now it is natural to conclude that this Permission was obtain'd at the Adjournment of the Parliament, July 2, which was before Monmouth was defeated; and therefore, we must either suppose, that his Lordship, however dangerously indispos'd, did not make Use of it, till after the Advice of that Event arriv'd, or else, that he came up to Town in the Beginning of August, merely to assist at a further Adjournment; and that he then snatch'd an Opportunity to give his dying Advice to the King, who, on the very Day of that second Adjournment, set out for Windsor.

It seems his Lordship was so mortify'd at the Loss of his Ascendancy at Court, under his own peculiar Patron (for it was to the Duke of York, as his own Brother gives us to understand, that he ow'd every Step of his Promotion even to the Peerage itself) that he not only laid it to heart, but took a fancy that he look'd out of Countenance, as he term'd it, "That is (says Mr. North) as one aham'd, or as if he had done ill, and not with that Face of Authority as he us'd to bear: And, for that Reason, when he went into Westminster-Hall, in the Summer Term, he us'd to take Notegays of Flowers to hold before his Face, that People might not discern his Dejection."

From Wroston, 'tis certain, he never return'd; and the Great Seal was no sooner surrender'd into the King's Hand, by his Executors, than he set it aside for Jeffreys, now in the midst of his Campaign, and driving Post over the Necks of his Fellow Subjects, to take Possession of his new Prefecture. Echard affirms, that as soon as the Vacancy occur'd, his Majesty wrote a Letter to Jeffreys, "requiring him to dispatch the Business before him, that he might come and take the Seal, for he was forc'd in the mean time to be Chancellor himself." And Bishop Burnet, in direct Opposition to Father Ockens, farther affirms, that the King had a particular Account of his Lordship's Proceedings, wrote to him every Day, that he took Pleasure to relate them in the Drawing Room to foreign Ministers, and at his Table, calling it himself, Jeffreys's Campaign; speaking of all he had done in a Style that neither became the Majesty nor Mercifulness of a great Prince."

Bristol was the last Place that trembled at his cruel Visitation; which, tho' it had not actually open'd its Gates to Monmouth, had appear'd to well dispos'd to do so, that it was resolv'd even there to make some Examples. The Fault, it seems, was laid at the Door of the Mayor and some of his Brethren the Aldermen, but unluckily it was utterly destitute of Proof: So an Expedient was thought of to punish them as Kidnappers, as Wilmot's had been serv'd in the preceding Reign, for what they were supposed to have intended as Traitors: And, by the Drift of his Charge to the Grand-Jury, it appears, that he either thought to terrify them into Self-Accusations, or to make their Peace with him by the Mediation of their Purges.— He began with telling them, that he did not value the Splendor he had been receiv'd with, for, (Lord! said he, we have been us'd to these things) nor their Resentment, that his Name should be fast in the Commission, in breach of the ancient Privileges of the City.— We come, continu'd he, to do the King's Business; a King, who is so gracious as to use all possible Means to discover the Disorders of the Nation, and to search out those who, indeed, are the very Pest of the Kingdom.— For Points or Matter of Law I shall not trouble you, but only mind you of some things which have lately happen'd in this City; for I shew the Calendar of this City in my Pocket.— He then, all at once, made a Transition to the late Civil War, ran a Parallel between King Charles I. and our Saviour Christ, came down to the Rye-Conspiracy, and smil'd that Part of his Discourse with Monmouth's Expedition, whom he call'd a Puppet-Prince, who had no More Jeffreys's Proceedings at Bristol.

A. D. 1685. Right to the Crown than any of them, for he hop'd they were all legitimate: And, by way of Use and Application, he came to the Point, as follows:

"Rebellion is like the Sin, of Witchcraft; Fear God, and honour the King, is rejected by People for no other Reason, as I can find, but that it is written by St. Peter. Gentlemen, I must tell you, I am afraid, I am afraid that this City hath too many of these People in it. And it is your Duty to search them out: For this City added much to the Ship's Loading: There was your Tylers, your Roes, and your Wades, Men started up like Mushrooms, Scoundrel Fellows, meer Sons of Dunghills: These Men must forsooth set up for Liberty and Property. A Fellow that carries the Sword before Mr. Mayor, must be very careful of his Property, and turn Politician, as if he had as much Property as the Person before whom he bears the Sword; tho' perchance not worth a Groat. Gentlemen, I must tell you, you have still here the Tylers, the Roes, and the Wades: I have brought a Brath in my Pocket, and I shall be sure to rub the Dirt wherever it lies, or on whomsoever it sticks. Gentlemen, I shall not stand complimenting with you, I shall talk with some of you before you and I part: I tell you, I tell you, I have brought a Beesom, and I will sweep every Man's Door, whether great or small. Must I mention Particulars? I hope you will save me that Trouble; yet I will hint a few things to you, that perchance I have heard of. This is a great City, and the Magistrates wonderful loyal, and very forward to assist the King with Men, Money, and Provisions, when the Rebels were just at your Gates: I do believe it would have went very hard with some of you if the Enemy had enter'd the City, notwithstanding the Endeavours that were us'd to accomplish it. Certainly they had and must have great Encouragement from a Party within, or else why should their Design be on this City? Nay, when the Enemy was within a Mile of you, that a Ship should be set on fire in the midst of you, as a Signal to the Rebels, and to amuse those within; when, if God Almighty had not been more gracious unto you than you was to yourselves, (so that Wind and Tide was for you) for what I know, the greatest Part of this City had perished; and yet you are willing to believe it was an Accident. Certainly here is a great many of those Men which they call Trimmers. A Whig is but a meer Fool to these; for a Whig is some sort of a Subject in comparison of these; for a Trimmer is but a cowardly and base-spirited Whig; for the Whig is but the Journeyman or Apprentice, that is hir'd and set on in the Rebellion, whilst the Trimmer is afraid to appear in the Cause; he stands at a doubt, and says to himself, I will not assist the King, until I see who hath the best of it; and refuses to entertain the King's Friends, for fear the Rebels should get the better of it. These Men sink worse than the worst Dirt you have in your City; these Men have
